1. Relation of the story to Josh. 6²⁶. 2. Who was Hiel? to Ewald (GVI 349c) Hiel was a 'rich man of an enterprising turn of mind.' The building of a city, however, is an unusual enterprise for a private person, and such a distinguished man ought to have had a genealogy. Next, we notice that the second part of the Hebrew for 'the Bethelite' (הִיֵּלֵי) contains nearly the same letters as Hiel (הִיֵּלֵי): This suggests that Hiel may have been a variant of Hiel, and have been transformed into Beth-hā'eli, when the two readings had come to stand side by side. But who is Hiel? Not a Bethelite, but some one important enough to do without a patronymic. It is a probable conjecture that Jehu (possibly from הִיֵּלֵי?) is disguised as Hiel, and that the notice of his rebuilding Jericho originally stood after 2 K. 10³³.³ JEHU [1] built or refortified Jericho because he had been deprived of so much territory by Hazael, and had to protect what was left. The change of 'Jehu' (Jéhoël?) into 'Hiel' and the transference of the notice to the story of Ahab arise out of the embarrassing fact that the story of Elijah represented that prophet as having been sent to Jericho (2 K. 24).

Lastly, as to the fate of Hiel's or Jehu's two sons.

² Tg. gives בֵּית-חֵיָהּ, Pesh. حَيْهَ حَيْهَ; Ar. بَيْتِ الْاَمْتَامِ, all in agreement with the Rabbinical tradition (Rashi, etc.) which connects בֵּית-חֵיָהּ with אֵלָה ('a curse'), Jericho being the 'house of a curse.'

³ This view is due to C. Niebuhr (Gesch. 1332f.), except that he cannot see that the sons mentioned have anything to do with Jehu; nor is he quite full enough on the disguising name Hiel.

HIERAPOLIS

The writer of the notice makes Hiel (Jehu) responsible for their deaths, and the inserter of the 3. The sacrifice of Hiel's (Jehu's) sons. gloss, 'according to the word of Yahwé which he spoke by Joshua,' supposed the deaths to have been judgments upon Hiel (Jehu) for his impiety in breaking the taboo laid upon the site of Jericho by Joshua. Of this taboo, however, we have no early record, and the explanation is certainly not natural. The key to the passage is supplied by the comparative study of primitive customs. It is not the ordinary sacrifices of children that we have before us (so Kue. Ond.⁽²⁾ 1233 = Hex. 240), but a special kind of sacrifice to the local supernatural powers such as has been practised in many countries.

This can hardly fail to have suggested itself to many readers of Tylor's Primitive Culture (1 104 ff.), and has for many years been held by the present writer. From Tylor's instances it is enough to quote the Japanese belief (17th cent.) that 'a wall laid on the body of a willing human victim would be secure from accident; accordingly when a great wall was to be built, some wretched slave would offer himself as foundation, lying down in the trench to be crushed by the heavy stones lowered upon him.' Similarly at Algiers 'when the walls were built of blocks of concrete in the sixteenth century, a Christian captive named Geronimo was placed in one of the blocks and the rampart built over and about him.¹ At Shanghai, when the bridge leading to St. John's College was being built, an official present threw into the stream first his shoes, then his garments, and finally himself, and as his life went out, the workmen were enabled to go on with their building.' In India, to this day, engineers and architects have to reassure the natives at the commencement of any great undertaking, to prevent them from anticipating a sacrifice of human victims (Sewell). It is still more important to notice that the American explorer, J. H. Haynes, in excavating the zikkurat of the temple of Bel at Nippur (the oldest yet found) discovered many skulls built in with the bricks.²

It is probable that in primitive times these foundation-sacrifices were customary in Palestine as well as in Babylonia, and that they even lingered on in northern Israel. Even if we believe that Hiel (Jehu) sacrificed his two sons in the usual way (i.e., not adopting the precise practice referred to by Tylor), we must at any rate suppose that he sprinkled the foundation-stones and the side-posts of the gates (cp Ex. 127 22 f.) with his children's blood, just as Arabian husbandmen, when they build, are still wont to sprinkle the blood of a peace-offering upon the stones.³

That he selected his firstborn and his youngest sons as the sacrificial victims, is in accordance with the principle implied in 2 K. 327 Mic. 67.⁴ The only biblical critic who has explained the passage by folklore is Winckler (Gesch. 1163, n. 3); but the present article is independent of his work. HIERAPOLIS (Ἱεραπόλις, Ἱερά Πόλις [WH; Str. 629]), a city in Phrygia, mentioned incidentally in Col. 413 along with the neighbouring Laodicea. It occupied a shelf, 1100 ft. above the sea, springing from the mountains bounding the Lykos valley on the NE. The modern village Pambúk Kalesi ('cotton castle,' from the lime of the springs) lies close to the site. The hot calcareous springs, and the chasms filled with carbonic acid gas, were and are still remarkable features.⁵ The water of the springs falls over the cliffs, 100 ft. or more in height, above which the city stood, and the snowy white stalactites present the appearance of a frozen cascade. The Plutonium, a hole from which mephitic vapour issued, was filled up by the Christians between 19 A. D. (Strabo's visit) and 380 A. D. this appears in legend as the subjugation of Echidna (Snake = Satan) by the Apostles Philip and John.

HIGH PLACE

As contrasted with the Seleucid foundation of Laodicea, 6 m. to the S., Hierapolis was the focus of Phrygian national feeling and religious ideas. As Ramsay points out, it exemplifies a phenomenon common in Asia Minor. The sacred cities of the early period generally grew up in a locality where the divine power was most strikingly manifested in natural phenomena. A sacred village (Ἱερά κώμη) arose near the sanctuary (cp Ephesus), and this developed into a city of the native character, with the name Hieropolis.

Wherever native feeling is strong, the form of this name is Hieropolis, 'City of the Sanctuary'; but where Hellenic feeling and education spreads, the Greek form Hierapolis, 'Sacred City,' is introduced. The difference in form corresponds to a difference in spirit. According to the former the sanctuary, according to the latter the city, is the leading idea.

The great goddess of Hierapolis was the Mother Leto (Str. 469 f.; see PHRYGIA). Hence the warnings issued in Col. 35 16 Eph. 4 17-19 5 3 f. The churches in the Lykos valley were not founded by Paul personally (see COLOSSE, § 2). That of Hierapolis may have been the creation of Epaphras (Col. 4 12 f.). Justinian made it the metropolis of a group of bishoprics.

A derivation from הגה 'to moan, muse' (cp AV^{mg.} 'meditation'), is as unsatisfactory as the EV rendering ('solemn sound') of the same word in Ps. 92 3 [4], for which Wellh. -Furness ('Psalms,' SBOT) substitutes 'with resounding chords.' Cheyne (Ps.⁽²⁾) emends the text in both passages.

In Ps. 92 3 [4], with הָיִן , he reads $\text{הָיִן עֵינַיִךְ בְּנֵיִךְ}$, 'to the sweetly-sounding notes of the lyre.' In Ps. 9 15 [17] (for הִגְיֹן הָיִן) he reads הָיִן לִבִּי , 'the meditation of my heart,' and regards it as a marginal correction of the partly corrupt הָיִן לִבִּי of MT in Ps. 10 17, which intruded into the text of another column of the archetype (cp a similar suggestion in HAR-HAIAH).¹ Cp SHIGGAION, SELAH.

1. Poetical use. plural and only poetical (2 S. 1 19 25; cp Ezek. 26 2, where however the text is questioned).

The literal sense is found chiefly in certain phrases: to ride or stalk over the 'heights of the earth' (Dt. 32 13 Is. 58 14 Am. 4 13 Mic. 1 3, cp Hab. 3 19), or stand upon them (2 S. 22 34 = Ps. 18 33 [34]); 'heights of the sea' (mountainous waves, Job 9 8); 'cloud heights' (Is. 14 14); cp Assyrian bamāti ša šadē, 'mountain heights' (Del. HWB 177 b).³

In prose (sing. and pl.)⁴ bāmāh is always a place of worship.

In this use בָּמָה —which frequently transliterates (cp, e.g.,

² The other words occasionally rendered in EV 'high place' (מִצְדָּה , מִצְדָּה) are not used in the specific sense of bāmāh.

⁴ Sing. 1 S. 9 f. 1 K. 3 4 (Gibeon), 2 K. 23 15 (Bethel), Is. 16 12 Jer. 48 35 Ezek. 20 29.

HIGH PLACE

1 S. 9 12)—renders in Pent. σῆλαι,¹ in the Prophets generally βωμοί, in the Hist. Books ὑψη, ὑψηλά; Aq. and prob. Sym. ὑψώματα, ὑψηλά; Vg. consistently of worship. excelsa; Pesh. 'alawāthā, 'high places,' sometimes pīrakkē, 'idol shrines.'

The connection of the notion 'place of worship with the primitive meaning 'high place' is well illustrated by 1 S. 9 10-25; the town (Ramah) lay on the side of the hill, with its spring of water at the foot of the hill below it, and the place of sacrifice (the 'high place') above it on the summit.² That mountain and hill tops were the common places of sacrifice we have abundant evidence in the OT.

See Hos. 4 13 9 1 f. (cp 2 S. 24 16 f.), Jer. 17 2 220 36 Ezek. 6 13 20 27-29 1 K. 14 23 2 K. 16 4 17 10 etc.³

In the older prophets 'high place' (בִּמְתָה) is synonymous with 'holy place, sanctuary' (מִקְדָּשׁ); see Am. 7 9 Is. 16 12, also Lev. 26 30 f. Such places were very numerous; we know of many from the historical books, and may with all confidence assume that every city, town, and village had its own (cp 2 K. 17 9 11 238). Some of these sanctuaries, like those at Bethel, Gilgal, and Beersheba, had a wider fame, and were frequented at festival seasons by worshippers from near and far.

As a place of sacrifice,⁴ the bāmāh had its altar (Hos. 8 11 10 18 12 11 [12] etc.); further, according to a Canaanite custom adopted by the Ezek. 6 3-6 13 Lev. 26 30 f.; cp Philo Byblus, frag. 17 (FHG 3 564 B).⁵ Often there was also a sacred tree, as at Gibeah where Saul sat in council (see SAUL, 'under the tamarisk tree in the bāmāh' (1 S. 22 6),⁶ see also Hos. 4 13 Dt. 12 2 Jer. 20 Ezek. 6 13 etc.⁷ At Ramah there was a hall (שָׁמֵרָה, cp λέσχη) in which the sacrificial feast was held (1 S. 9 22), and doubtless such an adjunct was common; the greater sanctuaries may have had, like that in Jerusalem, several such rooms. In some places there was also an idol or idols (Hos. 4 17 8 4-6 10 5 11 2 13 2 14 3 [4] 8 [9] Mic. 17 Is. 28 18 20 Ezek. 6 3-6 9 13 Lev. 26 30 f.),⁸ such as the bull images of Yahwē at Bethel and Dan (1 K. 12 26-30) and the serpent idol at Jerusalem (2 K. 18 4);⁹ where this was the case there would necessarily be a sacellum or small shrine to protect the idol, which was often made wholly or in part of precious metals (Judg. 17 5 ביה אלהים, cp 1 S. 31 9); there was such a structure at Shiloh, in which the ark of Yahwē was kept, with a servant of the priest as ædituus (1 S. 33), and probably at Nob (1 S. 21).

It is possible that the more primitive agalmata, the stone stelés, obelisks, or cones, were sometimes sheltered by a cella with open front, as we occasionally see it upon Phœnician coins; but of this there is no direct evidence.¹⁰ Small tents or tabernacles may have been used for a similar purpose; David provided such a shelter for the ark (2 S. 6 17 1 K. 2 28-30; cp Ex. 33 7 f.), and 2 S.

HIGH PLACE

7 2-7 shows that at a comparatively late time there were those who thought that a tent was a more suitable dwelling for Yahwē than a house. Ezek. 16 16 speaks of bāmōth (עֲבֹדָא) made of clothing stuffs, a patchwork of divers colours, by which tents or canopies are perhaps to be understood (Targ., etc.); see also Hos. 9 6 2 K. 23 7.¹

The later Jewish distinction of public and private bāmōth, and descriptions of them (Alsh. Meg. 1 10; Mish. Zebachim, 14 10; Tos. Zebach. 13 11 f.), are of no authority for the times with which we are concerned.

All the worship of old Israel was worship at the high places; to them the tithes were brought (Gen. 28 20-22 Am. 4 4); at them all sacrifices, stated and occasional, by the individual, the family or clan, or the larger sacrificial community, were offered (1 S. 9 11 f.; and in general Dt. 12 5-8 11 13 17, whose prohibitions are testimony to the former practice);² there transactions requiring a solemn sanction were ratified before God (Ex. 21 6 228 [7] 28 [27] etc.), and there councils were held (1 S. 22 6 5).

To the high places the troops of dervish-like nbbi'im resorted to work up the prophetic ecstasy by music and whirling dances (1 S. 10 5 10).³ At the great high place at Gibeon Solomon offered his hecatombs and practised incubation (1 K. 3 3 f.). Of the worship at the high places of Israel in the eighth-century Hosea paints for us a vivid picture; the joyous gatherings on festival days—new moons, sabbaths, annual feasts—when the people appeared in gala dress (2 13 [15] 15 [17]); the sacrifices and libations (9 4), and offerings of corn and wine and oil, of flax and wool, of figs and raisin-cakes, in gratitude for the fruits of the year (2 5 [7] 8 [10] f. 12 [14] 3 1); in times of scarcity the 'cuttings in the flesh' to move the obdurate god (7 14 5, cp 1 K. 18 28);⁴ the licentious intercourse of men and women, in which the priests and the consecrated women (קִשְׁרוֹת, religious prostitutes; see CLEAN, § 1, col. 837, IDOLATRY, § 6, SACRIFICE) set the example—a rite hallowed by sacrifice (4 13 f., cp 11; and see what is narrated by a late writer of Eli's sons, 1 S. 2 22); the divination (rhabdomancy? 4 12). In similar terms Jeremiah and Ezekiel describe the worship of their time.

In writers of the seventh and the sixth centuries the word bāmōth (always plural, even when a single holy place is meant)⁵ is used with the pre-dominating connotation 'sanctuaries of a heathenish or idolatrous cult'; thus Jer. 7 31 19 5 32 35 (Melek), cp 17 3 (5 om.) Ezek. 6 3-6 13 Lev. 26 30 f.⁶ The deuteronomic author and the subsequent editor of Kings apply the name to the sanctuaries of Judah outside of Jerusalem, which they unhistorically represent, not as holy places older than the temple of Solomon, but as originating in the apostasy of Rehoboam's time (1 K. 14 22-24 2 K. 23 5, cp 8 f.), and as having been, after their destruction by Hezekiah, rebuilt by Manasseh (2 K. 21 3); also to the shrines of other gods in Jerusalem (2 K. 23 8) or its vicinity (1 K. 11 7 2 K. 23 13, on the Mt. of Olives); and particularly to the holy places of the northern kingdom (on which more fully below, § 4). In the same way הכִּתִּים the priests of 'high-place priests,' is an opprobrious title for the priests of the cities of Judah (in distinction from the priesthood of Jerusalem; 2 K. 23 9, cp 8 = Levites Dt. 18 6), who are also called כַּתְּיִים, 'pagan priests' (2 K. 23 5; see CHEMARIM), and for the priests of Israel, whose illegitimacy is emphasized (1 K. 12³² 13²³ 2 K. 23²⁰), as well as for the priests of the heathen colonists of Samaria (ib. 17³²). In this period the stigma of heathenism thus everywhere attaches to the word.

In several places (none earlier than the end of the 7th cent.) we read of a בַּיִת בְּמֹת (sing.¹ plur. בְּמֹתַי),

6. The bāmōth-temples. —i. e., a temple of an idolatrous cult; thus, 2 K. 17²⁹ 32, the old temples of the Samaritans, in which the alien colonists set up their images and worshipped Yahwè after their fashion; 1 K. 12³¹, the temples which Jeroboam I. built in rivalry to the temple of Yahwè at Jerusalem; further, 1 K. 13³² 2 K. 23¹⁹.

In other cases בְּמֹת alone (always plur.) seems to be used in the same sense; note the verbs בָּנִי, 'build' (1 K. 14²³ 2 K. 17⁹ 21³ Jer. 7³¹ 19⁵ 32³⁵), and הִסִּיד, 'pull down, demolish' (2 K. 23⁸ 15, cp Ezek. 16³⁹),² though by themselves these verbs do not necessarily imply an edifice, being used, e.g., of an altar.

In the passages just cited the word bāmāh has lost the physical meaning 'high place' altogether; the bāmōth spoken of were in the cities of Israel and Judah (2 K. 17⁹ 23¹⁵), in one of the gates of Jerusalem (2 K. 23⁸), in its streets or open places (Ezek. 16²⁴ f. 31 39, where רֶבֶת [בַּיִת] is equivalent to בְּמֹת, if indeed the text should not be so emended);³ the bāmōth of the Melek cult were in the valley of Hinnom (Jer. 7³¹ etc.); see MOLECH. We often read of bāmōth on hills (e.g., Ezek. 6³ 1 K. 11⁷), and under green trees (e.g., 1 K. 14²³); observe also that the sacrifices are always said to be offered בְּבֹמֹת (in or at the bāmōth), never עַל (on), and contrast Is. 16¹². It has been thought that the bāmōth in valleys, cities, etc., were artificial mounds, taking the place of the natural 'high places,' the summits of hills and mountains, such as are found among various peoples.⁴ This is in itself possible enough; but evidence of it is lacking in the OT; even in Ezek. 16²⁴ f. 31 39 it is doubtful whether this is the prophet's meaning.

The history of the high places is the history of the old religion of Israel. Here we have only to do with

7. History: pre-deuteronomic. the attitude to them assumed by the religious leaders and reformers.⁵

Most of the high places were doubtless old Canaanite holy places which the Israelites, as they gradually got possession of the land, made their own (see Dt. 12² f. 2 K. 17¹¹ etc.); the legends in Genesis which tell of the founding of the altars of the more famous sanctuaries by the forefathers, Jacob-Israel and Abraham, often in connection with a theophany or other manifestation of Yahwè's presence at the spot, are at once a recognition that these holy places were older than the Israelite invasion of Palestine and a legitimization of them as altars of Yahwè; the name bāmāh itself was probably borrowed from the Canaanites. There can be little doubt that the cultus at the high places was in the main learned by the Israelites from the older occupants together with the agriculture with which it was so closely interwoven (cp ISRAEL, § 26 f.). Not only were the rites the same as those with which the Canaanites worshipped their baals, but it is probable that at the beginning the worship was actually addressed to the baals, the givers of the fruits of the soil (cp BAAL, § 5 f.).

Later, when Canaan had become completely the land of Israel, and thus Yahwè, Israel's God, whose old seats were in the distant south, became the God of the land, the cultus was addressed to him;¹ but as its character was not changed, the consequence was that Yahwè was worshipped as a baal. It is thus easy to understand how, to a prophet like Hosea, the religion of his countrymen should seem to be unmixed Canaanite heathenism (2⁵ [7] cp 8 [10] 12 [14] f. 16 [18] f. 13 1 etc.), and how, from the same point of view, the religious reformers of the seventh century should demand the abolition of the high places as the first step to restoring the true religion of Yahwè.

From the standpoint of Dt. and the deuteronomic historians, the high places were legitimate places of sacrifice until the building of the temple at Jerusalem (1 K. 8²); after that they were forbidden.² The history, however, shows that they continued to be not only the actual, but also the acknowledged sanctuaries of Judah as well as Israel down to the seventh century. The building of the temple in Jerusalem had neither the purpose nor the effect of supplanting them. The author of KINGS (who reckons it a heinous fault) records of all the kings of Judah from Solomon to Hezekiah that they did not do away with the high places. The oldest collections of laws, in Ex. 34²⁴⁻²⁶, assume the existence of these local sanctuaries; Ex. 20²⁴⁻²⁶ formally legitimates their altars. The prophets of the ninth century contend (against the foreign religion introduced by Ahab) for the worship of Yahwè alone in Israel; to Elijah the destruction of the altars of Yahwè (high places) is a token of complete apostasy (1 K. 19 10-14); he himself repairs the fallen altars on the sacred mountain Carmel (18³⁰). Amos and Hosea assail the cultus at the high places as corrupt and heathenish, like the whole religion of their contemporaries; but it is the character of the worship and the worshippers, not the place, that they condemn; the worship in Jerusalem pleases the prophets no better (Is. 1 10 f.; cp 28 7 f., which is at least applied to Judah). Hezekiah is said to have removed the high places (2 K. 18 4 22 21 3);³ but it is hardly probable (see HEZEKIAH, § 1) that the king's reforms went beyond an attempt to suppress the idolatry against which Isaiah so incessantly inveighed;⁴ the mention of the high places is from the hand of the deuteronomic author, who thus conforms the account of Hezekiah's good work to that of Josiah (2 K. 23) and to the deuteronomic law. Certainly the high places were in their full glory in the reigns of Hezekiah's successors Manasseh and Amon.

One of the chief aims of Deuteronomy is to restrict the worship of Yahwè to the temple in Jerusalem. All other

8. Deuteronomy and Josiah's reforms. places of sacrifice—which are significantly described as the places where the Canaanites worshipped their gods —are to be razed; no similar cult is to be offered to Yahwè (12-2-8 and many other places).⁵ Within the limits of his little kingdom Josiah (621) carried out the prescriptions of the new law-book.

We are told that he also destroyed the high places at Bethel and in the other cities of Samaria (2 K. 23 15 19 f.). In the weakness of the moribund Assyrian empire such an action is conceivable (cp 2 K. 23 29 f.); but the author of 2 K. 23 15-20 is hardly a competent witness.

That the people of the Judæan cities and villages saw unremoved the altars at which their forefathers had worshipped Yahwè for centuries torn down, the venerated symbols of the deity destroyed, the holy places profaned, the priests forcibly removed to Jerusalem—their whole religion plucked up by the roots—is not to be imagined; their temper may be guessed from the reception which one preacher of the new model met in his native town of Anathoth (Jer. 11). When, in 608, Josiah fell in battle against Pharaoh Necho, a swift and sweeping reaction set in. Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Zephaniah, as well as the author of Kings, give abundant evidence that the old cults flourished in full vigour down to the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 (cp ISRAEL, § 36 ff.).

¹ Stade's view, that the high places were ancestral tombs, and that the cult which was supplanted by that of the national god Yahwè was that of a tribal hero (GVf. 1 449 f.), is perhaps true of some of them; there is no reason to believe that this was the universal development.

It is commonly believed that the Exile accomplished what the covenant and the reforms of Josiah had failed permanently to achieve.

The population of Judah, it is assumed, was carried away to Babylonia; and

9. The Exile and the Restoration.

Moreover, those who came back were men of a new mind; the propensity to polytheism, idolatry, and a superstitious and sensuous worship had been eradicated; the one great end of the returning exiles was to re-establish the pure religion of Yahwè on the basis of the deuteronomic law.

This representation of the effect of the catastrophe of 586 rests upon conceptions of the character of both the 'Exile' and the restoration which are demonstrably erroneous (cp ISRAEL, § 41 ff.). Jeremiah and Ezekiel are our witnesses that the deportation of 597 wrought no amendment either in those who were carried away or in those who were left behind; from Jer. 44 we see that the events of the disastrous year 586, so far from making the people throw away their idols, led directly to a revival of foreign cults. The Jews who were left in the land—and they were the greater part of the old population of Judah—certainly continued to worship Yahwè after the manner of their fathers; and that they paid small respect to the deuteronomic laws is shown by the attitude which, at a later time, the representatives of the gōlāh take towards this 'am hā-areṣ. Evidence of the survival or revival in the Persian period of the cults which were put under the ban of Deuteronomy is perhaps to be found in Is. 57 3 ff. 65 17 66 17 f. 27 9, cp also the glosses in 178.¹ So far was the dogma that sacrifice could be offered to Yahwè only in one place from being universally acknowledged after the Exile, that in the second century B. C. a temple after the model of that in Jerusalem [so far as the internal arrangements were concerned] was erected by the Egyptian Jews at Leontopolis, with a priesthood of unimpeachable legitimacy.² In the petition which Onias addresses to Ptolemy and Cleopatra for permission to build this temple (Jos. Ant. xiii. 3 1, § 65 ff.), one of the reasons urged is that the Egyptian Jews—like those in Cœlesyria and Phœnicia—have many temples (tempā; cp also Jos. Ant. xiii. 23) not of the proper type, and on this account are at variance with one another, as the Egyptians also are on account of the multitude of their temples and differences in their cultus; he asks, therefore, to be allowed to build a temple after the pattern of that in Jerusalem, that the Jews in Egypt may be united by having one common place of worship. This testimony is none the less remarkable if the letter of Onias was composed by Josephus himself, or by a preceding historian. In view of all these things, we may well hesitate to believe that the old high places of Judah disappeared for ever with the Exile. The process was probably gradual,

That Hilkiah 'forged' the book which he stated (2 K. 22 8) that he had 'found' is an impossible theory (WKS OTJC⁽²⁾ 363). What led Hilkiah to say that he had 'found' the book of direction ('EV 'the book of the law') is not recorded. He may merely have meant 'Here is the best and fullest law-book, about which thou hast been asking,' כִּנְאוֹתֵי need not mean 'I have found for the first time.' It is possible that the seeming connection of the 'finding' of the law-book with the arrangement about the temple-money may be simply due to the combination of two separate reports. At any rate, Shaphan, not Hilkiah, must have begun the conversation on the law-book. 'In the house of Yahwè' probably means 'in the temple library.' See JOSIAH, § 1.

Böttcher, Graf, and Ges.-Buhl derive הנח from Ar. hanna, 'to sigh, whimper'; but the word is much more probably an unmeaning fragment of a name. The true name was hardly that of a person (so Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 172), for in Jer. 732 196 the name is altered to 'valley of slaughter'; originally therefore it had some agreeable sense. Considering the use made of the valley we may further assume that the true name had a religious reference, and may with some probability emend הנח into הנח, 'pleasant son' (Che.), and suppose that a syncretistic worship of TAMMUZ and Melech (see MOLECH) was practised in the valley. This helps us to understand the horror felt by Ezekiel (if the view of GOG and MAGOG is correct) at the worship of 'Tammuz-Lord.'

The first occurrence of gē hinnōm (?) is probably in Is. 225 (cp v. 1), where no less a writer than Isaiah has been thought to mention it. The occurrence, it is true, is gained by emending the text; but a parallel emendation is called for in Zech. 145 (see VISION, VALLEY OF). The most notable reference, however, is in 2 K. 23 10, where we read that Josiah 'defiled the Topheth which is in the valley of the sons of Hinnom' (see above, § 1*b*), 'that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech'; so that, if Ben Naaman was the name of the divinity originally worshipped in the 'valley,' the awful Molech (or rather Melech) had acquired a precedence over Ben Naaman. Probably too, as Geiger suggested,¹ the phrase 'the graves of the common people' (v. 6) should rather be 'the graves of ben-hinnom'² (ben na'aman?). The text, thus corrected, shows that the burying-place of ben-hinnom was at any rate near the gorge of KIDRON (q. v.). It was in this valley, according to the Chronicler, that Ahaz and Manasseh sacrificed their sons (2 Ch. 283 336). Jeremiah (731) speaks of the 'high places of the Topheth, which is in the valley of ben-Himmon (?)'; in the || passage (8235) he calls them 'the high places of Baal.' The abominations there practised were the cause of the change of name announced by the prophet (Jer. 732 196). See further ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 10 ff. 63 (3) 70 (iii. f.) 81 (3, iii.); TOPHET.

Opinions differ as to the site of this valley. The question is complicated, and it is not easy to decide it with confidence. 'Whatever view is taken of the position of the valley of Hinnom, all writers concur in its extending to the junction of the three valleys of Jerusalem below Siloam—i. e., there must be one spot below Siloam which all agree in making a portion of the valley of Hinnom' (Warren). The point on which geographers are divided is whether the valley is the Wady er-Rabābi (the west and south valley), the Tyropæon (the centre valley), or the Kidron (east valley). The first view is supported by Robinson, Stanley, Barclay, Bæd.-Socin, and Buhl; the second by Robertson Smith (Euc. Brit.⁽⁹⁾, 'Jerusalem'; cp RS⁽²⁾, 372), Sayce (PEFQ. '83, p. 213), and Birch (PEFQ. '78, p. 179f.); the third by Sir C. Warren³ (Recovery of Jerus., 307; Hasting's DB 2387). Cp JERUSALEM, § 10 f.

clear, that the border-line runs through NEPHTOAH, the Mount (הר), the Valley of Hinnom, En-Rogel, and En-shemesh.

In describing the border of Judah from E. to W. (Josh. 158) 'the Mount' is spoken of as 'before' (לפני) the valley of Hinnom westward' and 'at the end of the plain of REPHAIM (q. v.) northward.' Similarly in 18 16, which proceeds in the reverse direction, 'the Mount' is still 'before' the valley but is mentioned first. It would seem that either (a) לפני does not (exceptionally, see CHERITH, col. 740, n. 3) mean the east, or (b) the words defining the position of 'the Mount' are an inaccurate gloss.

2. In Jer. 192 the gē ben-Hinnom is said to be 'by the entry of the gate HARSITH' (Harsuth?). Wherever this gate was, its name does not mean 'east.' If it is the same as the 'Dung-gate' (הרסות) may even be a corruption of the הרשפת, see Neh. 313, it was at the end of the Tyropæon valley.

3. We have also to note what is said of the position of the 'Valley Gate' (rebuilt by Uzziab: 2 Ch. 269 γωσιαν [Bab. mg.], πύλην γωσιαν τῆς φαρ. [B^aA], π. αγγα [L]). It faced the 'Dragon Well' (Neh. 213; perhaps EN-ROGEL [q. v.], see also DRAGON, 4 [g]), and was distant a thousand cubits from the 'Dung-gate' (Neh. 313; πύλην τῆς φαρ. [BA], π. γαι [L]), beyond which came the 'Fountain Gate,' and the 'King's Pool.'

Of discussions on the site of the Valley of Hinnom we may mention Sir C. W. Wilson's in Smith's DB⁽³⁾ (93) and Sir C. Warren's in Hastings' DB (99). At present the majority of scholars adhere to the view expressed by the former, that the true Valley of Hinnom is the Wady er-Rabābi; but cp JERUSALEM, col. 2423. T. K. C.—S. A. C.

HIPPOTAMUS (הַיְפוֹטָמוֹס, ΘΗΡΙΑ [BNA], ΚΤΗΝΗ [Aq., Theod.]; see BEHEMOTH, § 1), Job 4051, RV^{mg.} Ten verses (vv. 15-24) or distichs are devoted in Job 40 to a description of an animal which is most probably the hippopotamus (H. amphibius), though there are elements in the description which appear to some to require a mythological explanation (see BEHEMOTH, § 3). Sa'adya, it is true, the only old interpreter who ventures on an identification, renders Behemoth by the Arabic word for rhinoceros, and Schultens, unmoved by the arguments of Bochart, identifies it with the elephant. Most commentators, however, since Gesenius, have taken the side of Bochart, who has, as they believe, clearly shown (1) that the animal is described as amphibious, (2) that the juxtaposition of Behemoth and leviathan here accords with the close association of the hippopotamus with the crocodile in ancient writers (e. g., Herod. 2 69-71, Diod. 135, Plin. HN 825 288) as chief among the tenants of the Nile, and (3) that the description, apart from one or two difficult clauses, exactly suits the hippopotamus. Some commentators (e. g., Del.) would also find the Behemoth or hippopotamus in Is. 306; but this is not a probable view (see BEHEMOTH, § 1).

We now turn to the details of the description. Verses 15*b* and 20¹,

'He eateth grass like the ox' . . .
'Surely the mountains bring him forth food;
'Where all the beasts of the field do play,' refer to the fact that the hippopotamus is graminivorous, and inoffensive towards other animals. In vv. 16-18 we have a powerful picture of his muscular strength, on the ground of which he is to be regarded as among the most 'wonderful of God's creatures' (v. 19a).¹ Verse 19*b* is difficult, but (unless we emend the text [see BEHEMOTH, vol. i. col. 521, middle]) must allude to the animal's tusks, with which he shears his vegetable food:

'(God) who made him so that he should apply his sword' (so Di.).

Verses 21 f. describe his favourite haunts, and v. 23 refers to the most wonderful fact of all—that the animal is equally at home on land or water; it is puzzling, however, to find the Jordan mentioned.² Verse 24 is generally taken interrogatively; but Di., referring to the fact that the Nubians of the present day openly attack the hippopotamus with harpoons, understands an actual description.

² Di. and Du. think that 'Jordan' may be used as a kind of appellative. [For a critical emendation of the text see JORDAN, § 2 (3).]

'They take him though he be on the watch (literally 'in his own sight'), And pierce through his nose with snares' (probably ropes with harpoons attached).

This is a more natural rendering of the Hebrew, though it is doubtful if it suits the context so well. Bu. renders an emended text,

Who will seize him by the teeth, And pierce his nose with a snare?1

The chief question that arises in connection with this animal (Hippopotamus amphibius) is whether it ever lived in Palestine, or whether its fame had spread to the poet from Egypt. At the present-time the river-swine (as the ancient Egyptians called them) do not extend north of Dongola, between the second and the third cataracts, and even there they are rare; but both the frescoes and writings of the Egyptians and the fossil remains found in the Delta of the Nile show that in former times it inhabited Lower Egypt and was harpooned by the inhabitants. During the Pleistocene and Pliocene epochs an animal specifically indistinguishable from the hippopotamus was widely spread over southern and middle Europe, extending even into England, so that although at present there is no distinct evidence of its existing in the Jordan it is possible that it may formerly have done so.

The animals are exclusively fluviatile, and can remain under water for considerable periods—as much as ten minutes. They are fond of frequenting the reed-covered margins of the rivers, piercing tunnel-shaped paths in the closely-matted vegetation on the banks. They are herbivorous. (See, further, ВЕНЕМОТН, §§ 13.)

[There may be a safer reference to the hippopotamus in Ps. 80:14 (13), where the reading varied between מִיָּם וּמִן הַיָּרְדֵּן (i.e., 'from the forest' and 'from the River'); see Ginsb. Introd. to the Mas.-crit. ed. of the Heb. Bible, 338 ff. The latter reading was the more popular one in Palestine in pre-Roman times; the swine of the River would naturally be the hippopotamus. The later tradition that the friendship between the two was strengthened by Solomon's marriage with a daughter of Hiram (Tatian, Cont. Grac., § 37) may rest upon 1 K. 11:1 Ps. 45:12 [13]. David, soon after occupying Jerusalem, is said to have received cedar-wood and workmen from Hiram to help him in his building operations (2 S. 5:11, cp 1 K. 5:1 [15]); but Hiram was also a contemporary of Solomon's. Unless, therefore, we assume that the event referred to in 2 S. relates to the last part of David's reign, we meet with a serious chronological difficulty. Hence some conjecture that the length of Hiram's reign (969-936 B.C., based upon Jos. c. Ap. 1:18) is inexact, or that it was Hiram's father, Abiba'al, who really helped David (cp Kittel, Hist. 2:157 n.).² More probably Hiram's kindly offices towards Solomon have been anticipated.³ Hiram's reputed tomb (Kabir Hiram [Hairān]) is still pointed out to the E. of Tyre; the date is unknown (cp Bæd. HIROM to the reader to suppose that his father, as well as his mother, may have been Israelitish.¹ His name is variously given in Kings and Chronicles. In 2 Ch. 2:13 [12] (not 4:11), according to the common view (see Bertheau), the word אַבִּי, 'my father' (τὸν πατῆρα μου² (Bab. אבִּי אֲבִי)) and 4:16 אַבִּי, 'his (i.e., the king's) father' [⊕ [καὶ] ἀδελφῆς γένου; see note] is appended to Huram. Giesebrecht (ZATW 1:239 ff.), indeed, has argued ably for the view that Hiram-abi or Hiram-abi ('Hiram is my father') was the real name of the artificer sent from Tyre (אבִּי in 2 Ch. 4:16 being supposed to be an error). So, too, Stade (Gesch. 1:330, n. 2), whilst Kamphausen (Kau. HS) thinks that Hiram-abi³ may have been the original form of the name, shortened in our text of Kings and of 2 Ch. 4:11 into Hiram or Huram, and in our text of 2 Ch. 2:13 [12] into Hiram-abi. These scholars, however, seem too ready to trust the Chronicler in this point; neither form of the solution proposed seems plausible.

We are bound to consider in the first instance whether some error, either of the Chronicler or of the scribe,⁴ may not be at the root of the strange name or reading Hiram-abi. It appears certain that either the name of the artificer was precisely that of the Tyrian king (for which ancient parallels might be adduced), or that it was near enough to Hiram to be assimilated to this name through corruption. It might, e.g., be (1) AHOLIAH [g.v.], a name which has analogies in Phœnician (אֶחְלִיָּה, אֶחְלִיָּה), and S. Arabian (أهلآء), and is given by P to the colleague of the artificer, Bezaleel, or (2) Huram (with a 1 for 1); one remembers that Bezaleel in P is called ben Uri, ben Hur.⁵

The more common form of the name is חִירָם (cp ⊕ above) found in 2 S. 5:11 1 K. 5:1 ff. [15 ff.] 9:11 ff. 27:10 11 22, and Kt. in 1 Ch. 14:1 2 Ch. 9:10, for (1); for (2) in 1 K. 7:13 40 45. A variant is חִירָם (EV HURAM, cp פְּנִיָּאֵל used of no. 1 in 2 Ch. 2:3 [2] 11 [10] ff. 8:2 18 9:21, and Kr. in 1 Ch. 14:1 2 Ch. 8:18 9:10; also of no. 2 in 2 Ch. 4:11 16 and 10 [Kt.]). On 2 Ch. 2:13 [12] 5:16, see above. Finally, the rare form חִירָם־אֲבִי is met with in 1 K. 5:10 18 [24 32] referring to no. 1, and in 1 K. 7:40 45 for no. 2. This form agrees with the Ass. חִירָם־אֲבִי, the εἰρημισ, ἱεραμισ of Jos. (the last form used to represent no. 2), and the ἱεραμισ of Herod. 7:98. Thus the names of the two Hirams present identical variations. Kittel on 1 Ch. 14:1 suggests that the original form may have been Huram (חִירָם), which passed successively into חִירָם and חִירָם־אֲבִי (on this phonetic change see Barth, NB, p. xxix); hence, from a combination of these two forms, arose חִירָם־אֲבִי. 1 1 K. makes his mother of the tribe of Naphtali; 2 Ch., of that of Dan. To the latter belonged Aholiab.

2 This early reading found favour with the correctors of ⊕ B and with one corrector of ⊕ A who may possibly have been the original scribe himself. Swete gives אבִּי אֲבִי. The reading seems to be a guess, corresponding to the guess אֲבִיָּאֵל presupposed by ⊕ in 4:16 (see next note but one).

3 The name εἰρημισ, which the artificer bears in Josephus, Hypomnesticum, 63, is only a corruption of εἰρημισ (= אֲבִי).

4 Two views seem possible. (1) The Chronicler may have misread חִירָם אֲבִי ('the fleet of Hiram') in 1 K. 10:11, אַבִּי אֲבִי, as if a person called Abi-Huram were the leader of 'Hiram's servants,' and changed the relative position of Abi and Hiram or Huram to prevent the mistranslation 'father of (king) Hiram'; see Che. Exp. T 9:471 [July, '98]. (2) For אבִּי אֲבִי we may read אֲבִי אֲבִי, 'my servant,' אֲבִי אֲבִי, 'his servant'; cp readings of ⊕ in 2 Ch. 2:13 [12]. But this seems too simple an expedient.

5 Josephus names the craftsman's father Uri(os) or Uri(as); πατρὸς δὲ Οὐριου, he says (Ant. viii. 3:4). Does he think of Bezaleel's father?

The aim of the present article is to sketch the development of Israelitish and Jewish historiography from its beginnings down to the second century of our era. For fuller information about particular books the reader is referred to the pertinent articles.

The making of history precedes the writing of history, and it is often found that the impulse to write history is first given by some great achievement which exalts the self-consciousness of a people and awakens the sense of the memorable character of what it has done. The Persian wars in Greece, the second Punic war in Rome, the empire of Charles the Great among the Germans, are familiar instances. In Israel, the national history begins with the consolidation of the tribes in a kingdom and the throwing off of the Philistine yoke. The circumstances in which this was accomplished, and the personality of the men who freed and united Israel and raised it at once to a leading place among the kingdoms of Syria, were such as powerfully to stimulate the national spirit and kindle the imagination. Internal evidence makes it highly probable that the earliest Hebrew historians wrote in the reign of Solomon (middle of the 10th cent. B. C.), and wrote first of the great events of the preceding half-century.

A large part of 2 S. 9-20 & K. 1*f.* is derived from such a work, the author of which was exceedingly well-informed not only about political affairs but also about the inner history of David's house and court. The story of David's youth, his relations to Saul, his romantic friendship with Jonathan, his adventurous life as a freebooter in the south, forms the natural introduction to the history of his reign. The older form of the history of Saul is probably of approximately the same age¹ (see SAMUEL II.).

The beginnings having thus been made, the Israelite writers naturally turned to the earlier history of their people.

i. Sources.—Their sources, like those of the Greek logographers with whom it is natural to compare them,

2. The first comprehensive historical work. were poems, such as the Song of Deborah, and briefer lyrics like those in Nu. 21, of which collections had been made (see JASHER, BOOK OF; YAHWE, WARS OF);² GENEALOGIES (g. v.), often representing clan-groupings; tribal and local traditions of diverse kinds, such as furnish the material for most of the book of Judges; the historical traditions of sanctuaries; the sacred legends of holy places, relating theophanies and other revelations, the erection of the altar or sacred stone, the origin of peculiar usages—for example, Bethel (Gen. 28); laws; myths of native and foreign origin; folk-lore and fable—in short, everything which seemed to testify of the past.³

To us the greater part of this material is not in any proper sense historical at all; but for the early Israelite as for the early Greek historian it was otherwise; our distinctions between authentic history, legendary history, pure legend, and myth, he made as little as he recognised our distinction of natural and supernatural. It was all history to him; and if one part of it had a better attestation than another, it was certainly the sacred history as it was told at the ancient sanctuaries of the land.

² The theory that poems form the nucleus of the earliest prose narratives, the chief source of the first historians, has been much exaggerated.

³ For a more particular account of these sources see GENESIS, § 4*f.*; EXODUS, § 3; NUMBERS, § 9; JOSHUA, § 15; JUDGES, § 15.

The sources were not equally copious for all periods. The stories of the heroes who delivered their countrymen from invaders and oppressors gave a vivid picture of the times before the kingdom. Of the crossing of the Jordan and the taking of Jericho the local traditions of Gilgal furnished a pretty full account. Of the further progress of the invasion, the struggles by which the Israelite tribes established themselves in the hill-country, the oldest historian found no tradition.¹ About the deliverance from Egypt and the adoption of the religion of Yahwè at his holy mountain a mass of legendary and mythical circumstance had gathered (cp EXODUS I., §§ 1*f.*); but of the wandering in the deserts S. of Palestine only the most fragmentary memories were preserved (cp WANDERINGS). Of the sojourn in Egypt, again, there was no tradition (cp MIZRAIM, § 2*b*); the gap is filled by genealogies which really represent later clan-groupings. Beyond these centuries the stream of narration suddenly broadens out; the stories of the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Israel and his sons, are told with a wealth of circumstance and a vividness of colour which show that we have entered the realm of pure legend² (see the several articles).

ii. Limits; remains.—Whether the earliest comprehensive history of Israel began with the migration of the Terahites, or with the primeval history—the first man, the great flood—is uncertain. The literary analysis cannot decide the question, and the examination of the foreign elements in Gen. 1-11 has as yet led to no positive results. Nor is it quite certain where the history ended. The presumption is that the author brought it down to his own times; but the evidence in our historical books is not as clear as we could wish.

A considerable part of this oldest Hebrew history is preserved in the stratum of the HEXATEUCH which critics designate by the symbol J, and in the parts of Judges and Samuel that are akin to J. It has not, indeed, come down to us intact or in its original form; redactors, in combining it with other sources, have omitted parts, and additions to it of diverse character and age have been made. What remains, however, gives us a most favourable impression of the authors' abilities. To this writing we may apply what a Greek critic says of the early Greek historians: λέξω ἐπετήδευσαν σαφή και κοινή και καθαρά και σύντομον και τοῖς πράγμασι προσφυή, και μηδεμίαν σκευωρίαν ἐπιβαύουσαν τεχνικήν.³

The early Hebrew historians did not affix their names to their works; they had, indeed, no idea of authorship.

3. Recensions. The traditions and legends which they collected were common property, and did not cease to be so when they were committed to writing; the written book was in every sense the property of the scribe or the possessor of the roll. Only a part of the great volume of tradition was included in the first books. Transcribers freely added new matter from the same sources on which the original authors had drawn, the traditions of their own locality or sanctuary, variants of historical tradition or legend. Every new copy was thus in some measure a fresh recension. When in the course of time the enrichment of the narrative directly from oral tradition became a less considerable factor, it was succeeded by the more literary process of conflation or contamination of recensions; scribes compared different copies, and combined their contents according to their own judgments or interests. The transmission of the oldest historical writings, even in its earlier stages, before the systematic redactions of R_J and his successors, was thus an extremely complicated process.¹

² The same phenomenon is observed in Greek and Roman history; see Wachsmuth, Einf. 511, 620.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

The problems thus presented to criticism are often insoluble; in general, only those elements can be certainly recognised as secondary which by underscoring the moral of the history or enlarging on its religious aspects in a prophetic spirit betray a different religious point of view from that of the older narrators, and even in these cases the age of the addition is often in doubt.

The oldest Hebrew history (J) was written in the southern kingdom. At a somewhat later time a similar work (E) was produced in Israel. The material, drawn from the common fund of Israelite tradition,² is in the main the same; but the local interest in E is that of the northern kingdom, and the moral and religious point of view is more advanced.

Thus, in the patriarchal legend traits offensive to a more refined age are frequently tacitly removed (cp. e.g., the way in which Jacob's flocks are increased in J and in E, Gen. 30*f.*); theological reflection is shown in the substitution of dreams and audible voices for theophanies as modes of revelation; historical reflection, in the representation of the Aramaean forefathers as idolaters, in the avoidance of the name Yahwè before Moses, and so forth.

In later recensions of the work (E₂) the conduct and fortunes of Israel are judged and interpreted from a point of view resembling that of Hosea. If those critics who ascribe to secondary strata in E such chapters as 1 S. 7 12 15 are right, some of these editors approximated very closely to the deuteronomic pragmatism.³

For the period down to the time of Solomon the sources of the historians were almost exclusively oral tradition

4. The Ephraimite history. of the most varied character and contents; of records and monuments there are but few traces, and these for the most part doubtful. With the establishment of the monarchy this is changed in some degree.

The stream of popular tradition flows on and continues to be drawn upon largely by writers of history; but by its side appears matter evidently derived from documentary sources. Records were doubtless kept in the palace.⁴ From the references to them in the Book of Kings, and from the similar records of Assyrian and Egyptian monarchs we may infer the nature of their contents: the succession to the throne, the chief events of the reign (probably year by year), wars, treaties and alliances, important edicts, the founding or fortifying of cities, the building or restoring of temples, and the like.

Everything goes to show that these ἀναγραφαί were brief; there is no reason to imagine that the records of a reign were wrought into narrative memoirs. It is antecedently probable that the kings of Israel and Judah, like other Oriental monarchs—for example, their neighbour, Mesha of Moab—commemorated their prowess or their piety in inscriptions; but there is no evidence of this in the OT, nor has any such monument hitherto been recovered.

The temples also doubtless had their records, running in great part parallel to those of the kingdom.

² The distinctively Judæan element in J is small.

³ See further, GENESIS, § 6 end, EXODUS II., § 3, JOSHUA, § 6, JUDGES, § 3, IV.

⁴ Direct evidence of this has frequently been sought in the titles of two officials of the court, the מְכַתֵּב (EV RECORDER) and the קֹטֵר; but it is doubtful whether rightly. See GOVERNMENT, § 21.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

The succession in the priesthood (dated by the year of the reigning king); repairs of the temple—as under Joash and Josiah—or changes, such as the new altar of Ahaz; the intervention of the priests in the affairs of state, as in the revolution which overthrew Athaliah and brought Joash to the throne, would naturally be set down in the archives of the temple. The priestly annals may, as in other countries, have taken a wider range, and included political events and remarkable occurrences, such as earthquake, famine, pestilence. There may have been also local records of cities and towns.

It is in accordance with frequent observation in other literatures to suppose that the history of the early kingdom of which we have spoken above was carried on from age to age by successive continuators. Such a continuation seems to underlie, e.g., the present accounts of the reign of Solomon and the division of the kingdom, and traces of others may perhaps be recognised in the subsequent narrative. The continuators were doubtless at the same time redactors, who supplemented the work of their predecessors from oral or written sources—as, for example, the history of Solomon is amplified and embellished from the luxuriant Solomonic legend—or abridged those parts which seemed to them less interesting or less important.

The kingdom of Israel also had its own historians, but little of their writing has come down to us; even the reign of a monarch as great as we know from foreign sources that Omri was is an absolute blank in our Book of Kings. There is, however, one portion of the Israelite historical literature that strongly appealed to later Judæan writers, and has consequently been largely preserved—viz., the lives of the great Israelite prophets of the ninth century, Elijah and Elisha. These stories are not all of the same age or origin; whether they were taken from an earlier written collection is not certain, though, on the whole, probable. They are of the highest value for the light which they throw on the political as well as on the religious history of the northern kingdom (see KINGS, § 8, and ELIJAH).

The relations of the two neighbour nations of the same people to each other in peace and war must have filled a large place in the histories of both, which accordingly had much in common; but it is not probable that the attempt to unite them in a parallel history of the two kingdoms was made till some time after the fall of Samaria. In this combined history Judæan sources and the Judæan point of view naturally preponderated; but it does not appear that any effort was made to exalt Judah at the expense of Israel. The impartiality with which the author records, e.g., the rebuff received by Amaziah from Joash (2 K. 14*f.*) is noteworthy. This history is the basis of our Books of Kings; but the deuteronomic redaction has here been so thorough that the attempt to reconstruct the earlier work or even to determine more exactly its age is attended with unusual difficulty.

The prophets of the eighth century interpreted Yahwè's dealing with his people upon a consistent moral principle: the evils which afflict the nation,

6. Influence of the Prophets. and the graver evils which are imminent, are divine judgments upon it for its sins—the injustice and oppression that are rife, the political fatuity of its statesmen, the religious corruption of priests and people, who desert Yahwè for other gods, or offer him the polluted worship of the baals, or affront his holiness with the sacrifices and prayers of unrighteous men. Nor was it the present generation only that had sinned: Hosea, in particular, traces the worship of the baals back to the first settlement of the Israelites in Canaan; and in every age sin must bring judgment in its train.

The application of this principle by the writers of the seventh and sixth centuries makes an era in Hebrew historiography; narrative history is succeeded by pragmatic history; not the mere succession of events, but also their interdependence and causation engages the author's interest. This step has been taken at some period in most historical literatures; what is peculiar in the Hebrew historians is that their pragmatism is purely religious.

The favour or the displeasure of God is the one cause of prosperity or adversity; and his favour or his displeasure depends in the end solely on the faithfulness or unfaithfulness of the people to the religion of Yahwè. The standard was at first that which the prophets of the eighth century had set up; later, it was the deuteronomic law. Under the impression of the deuteronomic movement, of the prophecy of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and of the events of the last half-century of the kingdom of Judah, the interest of the writers was increasingly absorbed in the lesson of the history; history was indeed for them prophecy teaching by example.

The influence of the prophets (orators) is manifested in another way; the pragmatism of the new school of historians, like that of the Greek and Roman historians, especially under the influence of Isocrates, is a rhetorical element. This appears in the amplification and heightening of the congenial portions of the older narratives, and especially in the introduction at critical points in the history of speeches by prophets—often anonymous—in which the author's own comment or reflection is effectively put into the mouth of an actor or a spectator of the action.

This pragmatic historiography is frequently called 'deuteronomistic'; on account of its affinity to Deuteronomy.¹ It flourished in the latter part of the seventh century and especially in the sixth; but the same moralising treatment of the history, the same distinctive turns of thought and phrase, recur in much later writers—e.g., in the Chronicler²—and the fundamental principle of the school is nowhere formulated so clearly and concisely as by Josephus in the Introduction to his Antiquities (3, § 14, Niese).

i. Deuteronomistic history of the two kingdoms.—The first product of the new school of historians was a history of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel from the accession of Solomon,³ written before the fall of Jerusalem, which (in a second redaction dating from after the middle of the 6th century) we have in the Books of Kings. The author took his material from older histories such as have been spoken of above (§ 5). The purpose to enforce the moral of the history appears in the selection of material as well as in the treatment of it. It is presumably to this author that we are to ascribe the omission of all details concerning whole reigns (e.g., Omri), where the recorded facts did not conform to the historical theory. The sovereign is responsible for the purity of the national religion; upon every king a summary judgment is passed from this point of view.

With hardly an exception, all have come short of the strict standard of the deuteronomic law; but this departure has degrees; some—the good kings of Judah—only tolerated the worship of Yahwè at illegitimate altars (high places); others—Jeroboam and his successors in the northern kingdom—worshipped idols of Yahwè; others still introduced foreign gods and rites. A few suppressed gross abuses such as the kedeshim (see IDOLATRY, § 6); only Hezekiah and Josiah instituted thoroughgoing reforms, which were made the more imperative by the revival and importation of all kinds of heathenism under their predecessors, Ahab and Manasseh.

The history is interpreted upon deuteronomic principles, which are clearly set forth at the beginning in the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple, and are first applied to Solomon himself.

The earlier part of his reign, we are told, was prosperous; in his later years there were revolts abroad and treasons at home; after his death the kingdom was divided; the cause was that Solomon in his old age, under the influence of his foreign wives, introduced the worship of other gods; the prophet Ahijah the

Shilonite declares the sin and denounces the divine judgment (1 K. 11).

The editor, who after the fall of Judah revised the work of his predecessor and gave the Book of Kings substantially its present form, sharpened the pragmatism throughout in the spirit of Jeremiah and Ezekiel and of the contemporary additions to Deuteronomy (esp. 4 29 f. and the end of 28); the Exile itself is the final vindication of the prophetic theodicy.

The rhetorical character of the new historical writing especially invited amplification; if the older authors seemed not sufficiently to have emphasised the lesson, the later ones supplied the deficiency. Such chapters as 1 K. 13 exemplify the growth of moralising legend in the youngest additions to the book. The systematic chronology also, with its calculated synchronisms, is the work of the exilic editor.¹

ii. The pre-monarchic period.—The earlier history was now taken in hand by the new school. The invasions and forays of the neighbouring peoples in the period before the kingdom were divine visitations, just like the invasions of Egyptians, Syrians, Assyrians, Babylonians in later times.² The sin, also, which provoked this judgment was the same, unfaithfulness to the religion of Yahwè. The stories of the judges illustrate this moral.

In a general introduction (Judg. 2 6 36) and in the introductions to the individual stories the author draws out the lesson: whenever Israel fell into the worship of the gods of Canaan, Yahwè gave it over into the power of its foes; when in distress it turned to him again, he raised up a champion and delivered it (see JUDGES, § 2). Those parts of the older book of stories which could not be adapted to this scheme were omitted. A chronology having the same systematic basis as that of Kings, and directly connected with the latter, was supplied (see CHRONOLOGY, § 5).

Here also more than one stage in the deuteronomistic redaction is probably to be recognised. The deuteronomistic book of Judges included Eli and Samuel, and was an introduction to the history of the kings.

In the view of the author, the deliverers formed a continuous succession of extraordinary rulers (shōphētim, 'judges'), differing from the kings who followed them in that their office was not hereditary, each being immediately designated by God.

The history of Saul and David (1 S. 13 ff.) was not subjected to so thorough a deuteronomistic redaction.

The rejection of Saul was already sufficiently motivated in the prophetic source—he disobeyed the commandment of God by his prophet (1 S. 15); the glorious reign of David was, from the point of view of the pragmatic school, evidence enough of his fidelity to the religion of Yahwè. The traces of deuteronomistic hands in 1 S. 13-2 S. 21 are limited to relatively inconsiderable additions (see SAMUEL II., §§ 2 f. 5 f.).

iii. Prehistoric period.—The peculiar deuteronomistic pragmatism was from its nature little applicable to the patriarchal story or the primeval history. The wanderings, from Horeb to the banks of the Jordan, are briefly recounted from this point of view in Dt. 1-3 (cp also 9 7-10 5); but in the parallel portions of Ex. and Nu. there is no evidence of a deuteronomistic recension. The history of the conquest of Canaan as we have it in Joshua is, on the other hand, largely the work of an author of this school (see JOSHUA, §§ 4 11).

The corruption of the religion of Israel was, as Hosea had taught, the consequence of contamination with the religion of Canaan; the prophetic legislation strictly forbids alliance and especially intermarriage with the inhabitants of the land (e.g., Ex. 34 12-16); the later deuteronomists demanded their extermination as the only sure way to prevent the infection (Dt. 7 2). The generations which followed Joshua had neglected these commands and reaped the bitter consequences (cp Judg. 2 1-5, late); but Joshua and the god-fearing generation, which in the might of Yahwè conquered Canaan, did God's bidding faithfully in this as in all other things. They must, therefore, have destroyed the Canaanites, root and branch; if the older histories did not so represent it, they must be corrected. This is the chief motive of the deuteronomistic account of the conquest (see esp. Josh. 10-12). We have here an instructive example of the way in which the pragmatic dogma overrides a conflicting tradition; what is said to have been has to yield to what must have been. The unflinching consequence with which this unhistorical representation of the conquest is carried through reminds us of the Chronicler (see below, § 15), and, with other things, suggests that the deuteronomistic redaction of Joshua is one of the later products of the school,¹ which continued its work long after the restoration.

Besides the productions of the deuteronomistic school of historians, we have one other work from the sixth century which possesses a peculiar interest; the life of the prophet Jeremiah, which was united with the collections of his oracles by the compiler of our book of Jeremiah. It was written from the memories of the prophet's intimate disciples, apparently not long after his death. In addition to its historical value, especially for the reign of Zedekiah and the years following the fall of Jerusalem, and its still greater value as a revelation of the personality of one of the greatest of the prophets, it is, as far as we know, the first essay in biography, and stands nearly, or quite, alone in the extant literature.²

8. Biography of Jeremiah.

In the Persian period, probably in the fifth century, appeared a work which treated the ancient history from a new point of view.

9. The Hebrew 'Origines': P.

i. The history.—The author's purpose was to set forth the origin of the sacred institutions and laws of the Jews, thus showing their antiquity and authority. Beginning with the creation of the world, he closed with a minute description of the territories of the several tribes in Canaan. The contents and character of this work, now generally designated by critics by the symbol P, P_g, P_c, etc., are sufficiently exhibited elsewhere.⁴

The whole tendency of the book is to carry back the origin of Jewish institutions to the remote past; the sabbath was ordained at the creation; the prohibition of blood was given to Noah; circumcision is the seal of the covenant with Abraham; the developed temple ritual of the kingdom and even the temple itself with all its paraphernalia—in portable form—are Mosaic; the post-exilic high priest has his prototype in Aaron.

This is, no doubt, to some extent to be ascribed to the working of a natural and familiar process which may be observed in the older literature as well as in the later (Chronicles); it may also be surmised that there was a desire to give the laws, in the eyes of the Jews themselves, the authority of immemorial prescription or the sanctity of most solemn promulgation. Besides this, however, the question may properly be asked, whether contact with the ancient civilisation and religion of Babylonia may not have prompted the author to attempt to vindicate the antiquity of the Jewish religion, just as, somewhat later, the Hellenistic historians, especially in Egypt, were moved to do. The same influence may be suspected in the minute chronology, which in its antediluvian parts certainly stands in some connection with that of the Babylonians (see CHRONOLOGY, § 4).

ii. The laws.—The Mosaic laws in the 'Origines' are doubtless to be regarded not as a transcript of the actual praxis of the author's own time, but as an ideal of the religious community and its worship, projected into the golden age of the past as Ezekiel's is projected into the golden age of the future. Whether the book was composed with the more definite aim of serving as the basis of a reform in the Jerusalem use, is not so clear; the whole character of the work seems unfavourable to the hypothesis that P_c was from the beginning a reform programme as the original Deuteronomy was.

iii. Sources.—The narrative portions of the work present an appearance of statistical exactness in matters of chronology, genealogy, census-lists, and the like, which led earlier scholars, who regarded P as the oldest stratum in the Pentateuch (cp HEXATEUCH, § 24), to infer that the author had access to ancient documentary records. This supposition is excluded both by the late date of P_c and by the character of the matter in question. See GENESIS, § 2 f.

² The older legends of Elijah and Elisha, and the multitudinous prophet legends of later times are hardly to be compared.

⁴ See HEXATEUCH, § 24; GENESIS, § 2 f.; EXODUS, §§ 2 5; LEVITICUS, § 3; NUMBERS, § 10 ff.; JOSHUA, §§ 5 12.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

The semblance of more definite statistical knowledge in P, as compared with the older historians, has an instructive parallel in the younger Roman annalists, for example, Valerius Antias,¹ and is to be explained in the same way. We have another illustration of the same phenomenon in Chronicles.

In the patriarchal story and the narrative of the exodus it is not demonstrable that the author used any other sources than the older historical works which, combined with his own, have been transmitted to us (J and E); but he doubtless had them in a more complete form, and, it may be, in a different recension. Whether in the primeval history he made a fresh draught upon Babylonian tradition—in the account of creation (Gen. 1), for example, or in the variant form of the flood legend—or whether here also he had Hebrew precursors, is a question which seems at present not to admit of a confident answer (see CREATION, §§ 3 ff. II 17 f.; DELUGE, §§ 10 ff.).

iv. Later additions.—P contained many laws purporting to have been given to Moses; to these a multitude of others were added by later hands, sometimes singly, sometimes in whole collections (P_g), until the symmetry and consistency of the original work was completely destroyed; the result was the heterogeneous conglomerate which it is customary to call the Priests' Code (see HEXATEUCH, LAW LITERATURE). Late additions to the narrative parts of P also can be recognised, especially in Ex. and Nu. (see EXODUS, § 5, NUMBERS, §§ 10 ff.).

It has been observed above (§ 3) that copies of the same work, differing in text or in contents, were compared and combined by subsequent transcriber-editors. A process of a similar kind, on a much larger scale, was the union of the parallel histories J and E in one continuous narrative, JE.

i. Union of J and E.—This task was accomplished with considerable skill; the redactor (R_{JE}) for the most part reproduces the text of his sources with little change, combining them in different ways as the nature of the case indicated. The additions of his own which he makes are akin to the later strata of the separate books, J and E; they are chiefly enlargements upon prophetic motives in the history, and have frequently a reproductive character, as, e.g., in the renewal of the promises to the patriarchs.² The author (R_{JE}) probably lived in the second half of the seventh century. This composite work can be followed in our historical books from the creation to the reign of David; if it went farther than this, the latter part was supplanted by a history of the kingdoms written on a different plan.

JE did not at once displace the separate works J and E; they continued to circulate till a considerably later time, and later transcribers of JE may have enriched their copies by the introduction from the older books of matter which the first redactor (R_{JE}) had not included.

The deuteronomistic redaction described above (§ 6 f.) is based upon JE, though some of the deuteronomists used E, at least, separately.

ii. Union of JE with D and P.—A post-exilic redaction, finally, united P with JE and D. The method of the redactor (R_P) is more mechanical than that of R_{JE}; his religious and historical point of view is that of P—especially of the later additions to P—and Chron.³

iii. Later priestly editors.—R_P very likely ended his compilation where P itself ended; but later editors not only made additions to his work, but also extended a priestly redaction over the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings, sometimes restoring (from JE) passages which the deuteronomistic redaction had omitted, sometimes adding matter drawn from the midrash of their time, sometimes combining the old version of a story with the midrash upon it. In this way the great Hebrew history, from the creation to the fall of Judah, which we possess in Gen.-2 K., gradually assumed substantially its present form. In consequence of the essentially compilatory character of the Jewish historiography, this work of the fifth or fourth century B.C. has fortunately preserved, without material change, large parts of the pre-exilic historical literature, from the tenth century to the sixth.¹

The national history of Judah came to an end in the year 586, when Judæa became a Babylonian province.

11. History of the Jews after the restoration of the temple.

During the century which followed, many writers occupied themselves with the history of the kingdoms and of the earlier ages (see above, § 7); but there was little to inspire the Jews either in Judæa or in Babylonia to write the history of their own times. It is plain that when long afterwards the attempt was made to relate the events of this period, the author had hardly any material at his command except the references to the completion of the temple in the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. It is scarcely to be doubted that in the archives of the temple the succession of the priests, repairs and improvements of the edifice, and other matters, were recorded, and official documents relating to the temple and its privileges or to the city were preserved;² perhaps also lists of families (with their domiciles), on the basis of which the capitation tax was collected; some such material is preserved by the Chronicler. There is much less, however, than might have been expected; it is possible that the archives were partially or completely destroyed when the city was taken by the armies of Ochus, as they were almost certainly destroyed in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes.

A new type of Jewish historical literature is represented by the memoirs of Nehemiah and Ezra.³

12. Personal memoirs. Nehemiah narrates in a plain and straightforward way, though not without a just appreciation of his own merit, what he had done for his people by restoring in the face of great difficulties the ruinous defences of Jerusalem, and by remedying many abuses which he found rife in the community.⁴ Ezra tells how he conducted a colony from Babylonia to Jerusalem, and describes the sad state of things he found among priests and people, his efforts to purge the community from the contamination of mixed marriages, and finally the introduction and solemn ratification of the book of the law.⁵

The memoirs of Nehemiah and Ezra were used by the Chronicler as sources for the reign of Artaxerxes, and through him considerable portions of them have been transmitted to us, though curtailed, deranged, and in parts wrought over.

13. Aramaic chronicle of Jerusalem. To the latter part of the Persian or the beginning of the Greek period must be ascribed another of the sources of the Chronicler; an Aramaic narrative, incorporating documents relative to the building of the walls of Jerusalem and of the temple, parts of which, worked over and supplemented by the Chronicler, are preserved in Ezra 4-6. The original scope of the

² The library of the Jerusalem patriarchate now contains a collection of Arabic and Turkish edicts about the holy places, beginning with the 'Testament of Mohammed.'

³ Delitzsch (ZLT 81 36 [70]) compares the beginning of the memoir literature among the Greeks and Romans. See also Wachsmuth, Eintl. 204 f.

⁴ A natural motive for the memoirs is the desire to acquaint the Jews in the E. with what he had found and done in Jerusalem. See NEHEMIAH.

work can only be uncertainly guessed from the extant fragments. The conjecture that other parts of Ezra were translated into Hebrew from the same source (van Hoonacker, Howorth) is not well founded. Some interest attaches to these fragments as the first trace of historical writing in the vernacular. The experiment seems to have found little favour; Hebrew was too firmly established as the literary language.

To the same age is to be assigned a lost work on the history of the kingdom which is frequently referred to

14. The Midrash of Kings. by the Chronicler, and of which considerable parts are preserved in Chronicles. The Chronicler cites this work under a variety of names (Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah, or, of Judah and Israel, etc.), and particular sections of it under special titles ('Words' of Samuel the Seer, Nathan the Prophet, Gad the Seer,² and so on). Twice the book is referred to under the significant name 'midrash' (מִדְרָשׁ),—The Midrash of the Book of Kings (2 Ch. 24 27), the Midrash of the Prophet Iddo (ib. 13 22).

The name denotes a homiletic exposition, particularly a story teaching some edifying religious or moral lesson, and usually attaching itself more or less loosely to the words of an older text. This is the character of both the passages in connection with which the term occurs, and of many others in Chronicles e.g., 2 Ch. 14 8 [7]-15 15 20 28 5-15 33 10-19, etc. Budde (ZATW 12 37 ff.) called attention to the fact that edifying stories of a kind similar to those which in Chronicles are supposed to come from the lost Midrash of Kings are found in other parts of the OT, and conjectured that the Prayer of Manasseh and the Books of Jonah and Ruth are derived from the same work, extracts from which he surmises in 1 S. 16 1-13 and 1 K. 13. The obvious resemblance is, however, sufficiently explained by the supposition that these writings, together with other pieces of the same kind in Num. and Judg., are the product of the same age and school; that they were all taken from the same book is hardly to be proved.

That the 'Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah' which the Chronicler cites was based upon the deuteronomic history of the kingdoms (Sam.-Kings) is beyond question. The most probable theory is that it was an edition of that work enriched by the introduction of a large element of historical midrash illustrating the moral and religious lessons which the history ought to teach, and with such changes and omissions as the additions or the author's pragmatism rendered necessary. Its relation to the canonical KINGS was thus very similar to the relation of the Book of Jubilees to Genesis. The author's religious point of view, ruling interests, and literary manner so closely resemble those of the Chronicler that what is to be said under this head will best be reserved for the next paragraph.

In the early part of the Greek period, probably after 300 B.C., an author connected with the temple composed 15. The Chronicle of Jerusalem. a history of Jerusalem from the time of David to the latter part of the fourth century; prefixing a skeleton of the preceding history from the creation to the death of Saul in the form of genealogies, in which are manifested interests the same as those which dominate the body of the book. This history we possess in our Books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, which originally formed a single continuous work.

The narrative begins with Saul's last battle, the anointing of David as King of all Israel, and the taking of Jerusalem (1 Ch. 10 f.); from this point to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar it runs parallel to Sam. and Kings, but deals with Judah only. From the deportation of 586 the author passes at once to the edict of Cyrus permitting the Jews to return to Palestine (2 Ch. 36 22 f. = Ezra 1 1 f.). The return and the rebuilding of the temple are then related, to the completion of the building in the sixth year of Darius; then follows immediately the commission of Ezra in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, his return at the head of a colony, and his attempted reforms in Jerusalem (Ezra 7 f.); and, again without any connection, the appointment of Nehemiah as governor in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, the rebuilding of the walls (Neh. 1-7), and the ratification of the law (Neh. 8-10). The narrative ends with the measures of reform which Nehemiah found necessary on the occasion of a second visit in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes; but the genealogies are brought down to the reign of the last Persian king.

² See CHRONICLES, § 62. It is not quite clear whether this form of citation is only a convenient way of indicating the part of the extensive work in which the prophet named figured; or whether it implies a theory that each prophet wrote the events of his own time (Jos. c. Ap. 18).

The author's sources naturally varied for the different periods.

i. For the earlier part of the work he used the Hexateuch and the older historical books, the genealogical material in which he excerpted, condensed, and combined in his own way, supplementing it with constructions of his own which plainly reflect post-exilic conditions.

ii. For the history of the kingdom the ulterior source was the deuteronomistic work (Sam.-Kings); it seems probable, however, that the Chronicler used this work, not in the form in which it lies before us, but as it was embodied in the Midrash of Kings (§ 14), of which Chronicles may then be regarded as mainly an abridgment.

iii. From the fall of Jerusalem in 586 to the time of Alexander, the sources were the prophets Haggai and Zechariah,¹ the Aramaic history already spoken of (§ 13), the Memoirs of Nehemiah and Ezra (§ 12), a list of high priests from Jeshua to Jaddua, and probably other priestly genealogies, etc. The narrative material all belonged to the first quarter century of the Persian period and a few years in the reign of Artaxerxes; there was evidently no continuous historical tradition, written or oral, when the Chronicler wrote; indeed, his knowledge was not sufficient to enable him rightly to arrange the fragmentary remains at his disposal.²

In the Chronicler's account of the first two (i. and ii.) of these three periods there are occasional historical notices not otherwise transmitted to us which seem to come from old sources.

The recension of Gen.-Kings which lay before the Chronicler or the author of the Midrash may have been different from ours, as the recension in the hands of the Alexandrian translators frequently differed from that on which MT is based. The restoration, by the last redactor of Judges, of considerable material from JE which the deuteronomistic redactor had omitted, proves that the final loss of the old Hebrew history books occurred at a comparatively late time, as so much of the classic literature perished late in the Byzantine period.

The Chronicler's work is an ecclesiastical history; the Jewish Church in Jerusalem is its subject. The whole history of the Northern Kingdom, which was included not only in the deuteronomistic Book of Kings but also in the Chronicler's immediate source, the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah, is therefore omitted. The temple, the ministry, the ritual, have central importance; and special interest is shown in the prominence of the Levites on festal occasions (see CHRONICLES, § 7). The clergy are also the custodians of the law; they give instruction in it and decisions under it. The liturgy of the temple and the minute organisation of the ministry with its guilds of musicians, singers, door-keepers, etc., are attributed to David.³ Upon the deuteronomistic pragmatism which it found in its sources the post-exilic History superimposed a pragmatism of a new type. In it also prosperity and adversity depend upon fidelity to the religion of Yahwé; but the conception of religion is clerical rather than prophetic. The ideas of theodicy and retribution are more mechanical;⁴ the vindication of God's law is not only sure, it is also signal and swift.

The exhibition of this principle in history is the motive of the most radical changes made in the representation of the older books as well as in the long haggadic additions. In both, it is probable that the Chronicler was preceded by the author of the Midrash; but the same spirit appears in the Chronicler's own work in Ezra and Neh.⁵

² The derangement of Ezra-Neh. is, however, partly to be ascribed to later hands.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

Taken altogether, it is as historical midrash (i. e., as edifying fiction with an historical background), not as history, that Chronicles, like its lost precursor, must be regarded and judged. This type of literature enjoyed, as we shall see, an immense popularity in the Greek period among both Hebrew and Hellenistic Jews.

The first part of the Chronicle of Jerusalem, from the creation to the exile, ran parallel to the great historical work Gen.-Kings; the second, beginning with the edict of Cyrus, had no competitor. The latter was accordingly detached to serve, under the title Book of Ezra,¹ as a continuation of the older history through the Persian period. When at a later time the first part (Chronicles) was given a place in the canon, it was not reunited with Ezra, but was counted either as the last (Talmud) or as the first (Massōra) of the Kethūbim (see CANON, § 9). In the Alexandrian Bible, where a general rearrangement was effected, the original order was restored.

The oldest Greek translation of the post-exilic History is preserved to us as a torso, beginning with 2 Ch. 35 1-27 and ending abruptly with Neh. 8 12.² It presents the material in a different—and to some extent more original—order than MT and the later Greek version; and contains one long passage not found in either (Pages of Darius, 3 ff.).³

A sketch of Jewish historical literature would be incomplete without some mention of the popular religious stories so abundant in the last three or four centuries before our era. These all have an historical setting, and doubtless passed from the beginning, as they still do with many, for veracious history. In character they do not essentially differ from the haggadic additions in Chronicles; but instead of attaching themselves to a given situation in the older history, they create their own situation. With this freedom is naturally connected a greater variety in the motive and moral of the story.

i. and ii. Two of the longer tales of this class, to which we might perhaps give the name historical romances, are the books of Judith and Esther. They have in common the patriotic motive, and also that in each it is a woman who, at great peril to herself, saves her people from threatened destruction. JUDITH (q. v.) was probably written in Palestine, in Hebrew. The setting of the action is purely fictitious; the author's notions of history and of geography, beyond his own region, are of the most confused kind.

If any historical incident furnished the nucleus of the story, the circumstances had been thoroughly forgotten. The religious point of view, as it appears in the speech of Achior, for example, and in the stress laid on clean meats (cp Dan. 1) and the sacredness of tithes, etc., is that of correct Judaism;—it is erroneous to say of Pharisaism. The lesson of faith in God and fidelity to his law is obvious; but it is not necessary to assume that the book was written to inculcate this lesson and to encourage its readers in a particular crisis.

The considerable differences in the recensions (three Greek, Old Latin, Syriac) show that the book had considerable currency; but it never enjoyed the same popularity as its companion, Esther.⁴

A peculiar interest attaches to ESTHER (q. v.) as one of the very few remaining pieces of the literature of the Oriental Jews.⁵ The feast of PURIM (q. v.), the origin of which is celebrated in the book,⁶ was certainly adopted by the Jews in the E. Probably too (see ESTHER, § 7) the legend was borrowed or imitated; but this does not alter the fact that the story constructed upon it is one of the most characteristic works of Jewish fiction.

⁶ In the subscription to the Greek version it is called ἐπιστολή τῶν φρουρῶν (Esth. 10 11).

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

the proud vizier Haman is compelled to do the almost royal honour he had conceived for himself to the Jew Mordecai whom he hates most of all men; and how Esther by her address saves her people from the general massacre which Haman had planned, gets the minister hanged on his own gallows and Mordecai appointed in his place, and procures a counter-edict by authority of which the Jews in Susa and the provinces slaughter their fellow-subjects without resistance,—that was something to delight the heart of a race whose peculiarities and contempt for the state religion involved it in such bitter sufferings.

When the temple was destroyed and the other feasts ceased, Purim only gained in importance, and the book connected with Purim so well expressed the feelings of the oppressed Jews that Esther became, next to the Torah, the best known and most highly-prized book in the Canon.¹

iii. A book of very different spirit and tendency is JONAH (q.v.), which tells how the prophet, who was unwilling to preach to the heathen, was miraculously constrained to go, and how at his message Nineveh repented and its doom was averted, and pointedly rebukes the spirit which would have God show no mercy upon the nations. The protest against the persuasion that God's word and his compassion are for the Jews only is noteworthy. The book is not only a story about a prophet; more than any other product of its age, it breathes the prophet's spirit.²

iv. A similar motive is thought by many to actuate the Book of RUTH (q.v.); the author would answer those who, like Ezra and Nehemiah, were so hot against mixed marriages, by showing how the blood of a Moabite ancestress flowed in the veins of David himself.

v. One of the most pleasing of these writings is TOBIT (q.v.), with its attractive pictures of Jewish piety and its instructive glimpses of current superstitions, for the history of both of which it is an important source. It is a moral tale simply, without any ulterior motive other than the edification of its readers. The numerous varying recensions show that it had a wide popularity among Jews as it had afterwards among Christians. See ACHIACHARUS.

vi. Smaller didactic stories.—Other stories celebrate the constancy of pious Jews to their religion in spite of all efforts to turn them from it. The Gentile world-power, whether represented by Babylonian, Persian, Seleucid, or Ptolemy, appears not only as the oppressor but also as the persecutor of the Jews, prohibiting the exercise of their religion and trying to force them to worship idols and practise abominable rites.

Some of the stories tell of the miraculous deliverance of God's faithful servants, others of the triumphant fortitude of the martyrs under the most appalling tortures. To inspire a like faith and devotion in the readers, leading them to prize more highly a religion which has produced such fruits, and making them also ready, if need be, to die for their holy law, is the obvious motive of the tales.³

To this class belong the stories of Daniel and the three Jewish youths in Babylon, in the Book of DANIEL (q.v.).

Here the faithful worshippers of Yahwè are miraculously delivered from the fiery furnace and the lions' den, and endowed with a supernatural wisdom which puts all the Chaldean astrologers and magicians to shame, so that the heathen kings are constrained to confess the god of the Jews the supreme God.

In the Greek version other stories are added; Susanna and the Elders, illustrating Daniel's wisdom in judgment; Bel and the Dragon, showing how Daniel ingeniously proved to Cyrus that the gods of the Babylonians were no gods. The display of Jewish wisdom before heathen kings is the motive also of the story of the Three Pages of Darius (1 Esd. 31 f.), where a contest of wits in answer to the question, What is the mightiest thing on earth? wins for Zerubbabel permission to return and restore the temple at Jerusalem.⁴

The Greek-speaking Jews also had their story-books with similar subjects. One of these is 3 Maccabees (see MACCABEES [THIRD]), which professes to narrate events in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator after the defeat of Seleucus III. at Raphia in 217 B.C. It may be regarded as in some sense a Hellenistic counterpart to Esther, and is one of the worst specimens of this kind of fiction.

It seems to be an elaborated variation of an older legend preserved by Josephus (c. Ap. 25). Many scholars are of the opinion that the occasion of writing the book was the persecution of the Alexandrian Jews under Caligula.¹

Of the stories of martyr heroism, the most famous are those of the aged Eleazar and of the mother and her seven sons in 2 Macc. 6 f., repeated in great detail in 4 Macc., which took their place among the most popular of Christian martyria.

There were doubtless many other religious stories in circulation; from a later period considerable remains of a similar literature have come down to us; e.g. the tale of Joseph's wife Aseneth (see APOCRYPHA, § 12).

The glorious events of the Asmonæan age inspired more than one author to write the history of Mattathias and his sons. The oldest and by far the

17. Hist. of Asmonæans: most important of these works is that which we have in the First Book of Hebrew Maccabees (see MACCABEES [FIRST]), written in Hebrew, probably in the reign of John Hyrcanus. It covers the period from the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.) to the death of Simon (135 B.C.); but it deals chiefly with the struggle with the Syrians; of the fierce and treacherous strife of Jewish parties we catch only passing glimpses. The author had probably no older written account of the events, but drew upon a tradition close to the Asmonæan house. Besides this tradition, he incorporated certain documents which were preserved in public places (14 27 ff.) or in the archives (cp 11 37 127).²

The writer is sincerely religious, as are the heroes of his story. As to his method of conceiving history, we need only point out here that the action moves wholly on the earthly stage, without miracle, or prophecy. 1 Macc. is an historical source of the first value for the times of the early Asmonæans; it is deeply to be regretted that we have not similar sources for other epochs of Jewish history.

At the end of the work (16 23 f.) the reader is referred for information about the following period to the Chronicles of the high-priesthood of John Hyrcanus. Of these Chronicles nothing has survived; it cannot even be shown that the history of Hyrcanus' rule in Josephus ultimately goes back—in whole or in part—to these Chronicles.³

The struggle of their brethren in Palestine had a keen interest for the Greek-speaking Jews also. Jason of

18. Greek. Cyrene wrote a history of it in five books, beginning with the antecedents of the conflict under Onias III., and ending, if we are to judge from the summary of its contents in 2 Macc. 219-23, with the liberation of the city by Judas after the victory over Nicanor (cp 2 Macc. 15 37).⁴ We know this work only through 2 Macc., which is professedly an abridgment of it. The original must have been very prolix, which is perhaps one reason why it was not more generally known. The character of the work is in striking contrast to 1 Macc.; it imitates and outdoes the worst types of Greek rhetorical historiography.⁵ The straining for effect is tiresomely persistent. Everything is exaggerated; special divine interventions occur at every turn; and the operation of the law of retribution is everywhere emphasised (see chap. 9). There is no evidence that Jason had any written sources; the whole character of the book suggests rather that he derived his information from the reports—confused and mingled with legend—which came¹ by various channels from Palestine. On the two epistles in 2 Macc. 1:1-2:18, and on the other critical points, see MACCABEES (SECOND).²

Other writings of a legendary character are known to us through Josephus, who, directly or indirectly, drew upon them in his history of the Greek period; among them were the account of Alexander's relations to the Jews (Ant. xi. 8) and the story of the Tobiadae and Oniadae (Joseph the tax-farmer), Ant. xii. 4, cp BJ 1:1. On the latter see Büchler (op. cit. preceding col. u. 1).

and Berossus, written in Greek, through which the ancient history of Egypt and Babylonia from authentic sources was brought to the knowledge of the educated world. It would be strange, indeed, if they had not felt stirred to perform a like service for the history of their own nation.

i. Demetrius.—The earliest of these writings of which we know anything is that of Demetrius, Περὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ βασιλείων.⁴ It is a chronological epitome rather than a narrative history, and was doubtless composed for Jewish readers. The author brings to the solution of the difficult problems of chronology thorough knowledge of the OT and great acumen.

The occasional explanations of other difficulties in the Scriptures show honesty as well as ingenuity. The close connection in many of these points between the Hellenistic and the Palestinian exegesis has also been remarked.

ii. Eupolemos.—The work of Eupolemos under a similar title was of a different nature. He narrated the history more at large, and with embellishments in the taste of his times, such as the correspondence of Solomon with the pharaoh, the legend of Jeremiah (fr. 24), and so on. In him also we first note the disposition to vindicate for the Hebrews the priority in philosophy, science, and the useful arts, which is so characteristic of later Hellenistic authors.

Moses was the first sage (σοφός), and the first who gave his people written laws. He taught the art of writing to the Jews; the Phœnicians learned it from the Jews, and the Greeks from them.

Eupolemos probably wrote under Demetrius Soter (circa 153 B.C.), and it has been surmised that he may be the same who is mentioned in 1 Macc. 8:17; in which case his book would have additional interest as the work of a Palestinian Hellenist.⁵

iii. Artapanos.—It was natural that Jews in Egypt should seek to connect the story of Abraham's sojourn in Egypt, of Joseph's elevation, and above all, of Moses and the exodus, with Egyptian history.

They had an additional reason for giving their version of these events in the fact that native writers had set afloat injurious accounts of the expulsion of the leprous hordes, which found only too willing credence not merely among the populace but with serious historians.⁶

The Jewish writers had no access to authentic sources of information; in the most favourable case they could give only uncritical combinations of names and events taken from Egyptian history or legend (known to them through a Greek medium) with the narratives of the Pentateuch. The spinning out of these combinations is doubtless in the main pure invention.

Considerable fragments of a work of this sort have been transmitted to us under the name of Artapanos. This Persian name is with reason suspected of being a pseudonym, the glorification of the Jews being for greater effect attributed to an unprejudiced foreigner¹ who collected his information from the best Egyptian authorities. However that may be, the author shows considerable knowledge of things Egyptian and a very respectable degree of Hellenistic culture. The design of the book is plainly to magnify the forefathers of the Jews by showing that they are the real authors of the Egyptian civilisation.

Abraham, during his twenty years' sojourn, taught the Egyptians astrology;² Joseph first caused the fields to be properly surveyed and meted out, reclaimed by irrigation much uncultivated land, allotted glebes to the priests, and invented measures. His kinsmen, who followed him to Egypt, built the temples in Athos and Heliopolis. It is particularly in the story of Moses, however, that Artapanos develops all his art. Moses, who was named by the Egyptians Hermes and is known to the Greeks as Musæus, was the adopted son of Merris, the childless queen of Chenephres. He was the inventor of boats, the Egyptian weapons, engines for hoisting stones, for irrigation, and for war; he divided the country into its thirty-six nomes, and assigned to each the god which was to be worshipped in it; he was the founder of philosophy and the author of the hieroglyphic writing used by the priests. Besides all this he was a great general, who at the head of an army of fellahin subdued the Ethiopians, built the city of Hermopolis, etc. The jealousy of Chenephres finally compelled him to flee the country; on the way he slew an Egyptian officer who lay in wait for him to kill him (cp Ex. 21:1 ff.). As the last example shows, the author deals very freely with the biblical narrative when it suits his purpose.

iv. Fragments.—We possess fragments of several other works of similar tendency to those of Eupolemos and Artapanos; the names of Aristæas and Malchos-Kleodemus may be mentioned. Of peculiar interest are some fragments of this sort which plainly come from the hand of Samaritan Hellenists. One of these (erroneously ascribed in Eusebius to Eupolemos) makes Mt. Gerizim the site of the city of Melchizedek and the temple of the most high God; and is otherwise instructive for the combination of the OT narrative with Babylonian learning: for example, Ur of the Chaldees is Camarina; Abraham brought the Babylonian astrology to Egypt, but the real father of the science was Enoch, etc.

The same aim, to exalt the Jewish people in the eyes of other races, appears in a different way in various pseudographic works purporting to be written about the Jews by foreigners.³

v. Pseudo-Hecataeus.—Hecataeus of Abdera (under Ptolemy I.) had given in his History of Egypt a brief and unprejudiced account of the Jews; which gave occasion for forging in his name a whole book, the partiality of which for all things Jewish aroused the suspicion of ancient critics.

vi. Aristæas.—The letter of Aristæas, pretending to be written by a Gentile to a Gentile, giving the history of the translation of the Hebrew law into Greek, also is palpably spurious.

In it we have a glorification of the Torah and of the LXX translation, of the profound and practical wisdom of Jewish sages, of the temple and the cultus—a fabrication on a grand scale, fortified with edicts, correspondence, and all the apparatus with which fictitious history had learned to give itself the semblance of authenticity.

Among the voluminous writings of Philo at least one work dealing with the ancient history of his people demands mention here—the life of Moses.

20. Philo of Alexandria. The first book, in particular, on Moses as a ruler, fairly deserves to be called the best specimen of Hebrew history retold for Gentile readers.

² This is repeated by many Jewish writers. Abraham brought the art from Babylonia (FHG 3:213 A).

³ This species of literature flourished rankly in the centuries before and after our era.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

It narrates the life of Moses from his birth to the permission to the two tribes to occupy the conquered territory E. of the Jordan (Nu. 32), following the Pentateuch with occasional allegorical digressions and many edifying reflections, and with those speeches by the personages at important moments without which no author of this time would have thought it possible to write history; but free from any infusion of the Hellenistic midrash which we have found in Eupolemos and Artapanos.

Philo's work differs favourably from the corresponding parts of Josephus' Antiquities in the point just mentioned, and also in the fact that Philo does not, like Josephus, suppress unpleasant passages, such as the worship of the golden calf which Aaron made. The second book is on Moses as a lawgiver;¹ the third, on Moses as a priest (the tabernacle and its furniture, priests' vestments, and so on).

Philo wrote also a history of the persecutions of the Jews in his own time, apparently in five books.

The first, it is inferred, was introductory; the second described the oppression of the Jews in the reign of Tiberius by Sejanus at Rome and by Pontius Pilate in Judæa; the third dealt with the sufferings of the Alexandrian Jews at the beginning of the reign of Caligula; the fourth, with the evils in which the Jews were involved by the demand of Caligula that divine honours should be paid him, and his determination to set up an image of himself in the temple at Jerusalem; whilst the last described the change in the fortunes of the Jews brought about by Claudius's edict of toleration.

Of these books only the third and the fourth have survived (Adversus Flaccum, Legatio ad Caium). Philo was a witness of the tribulations of the Jews in Alexandria in the last year of Flaccus's administration, and was the leading member of the deputation to Caligula. Notwithstanding their tiresome preaching tone, and obvious reticence about the result of the mission—not to say suppression of its failure—the books are historical sources of high value, not only for the troubles of the Jews but also for the character of the Emperor.

found its historians in two men who had themselves been actors in it, Justus of Tiberias.² Tiberias and Flavius Josephus.

The work of Justus is lost—it is known to us only through the polemic in the autobiography of Josephus—and the loss is the more to be regretted because Justus would have enabled us to control Josephus's account of the events in Galilee, where we have only too good reason to distrust him. Justus wrote also a Chronicon or concise history from Moses to the death of Agrippa II. (in the third year of Trajan), which was used by Julius Africanus, through whom some material derived from it has been transmitted to us. Both works of Justus, like those of Josephus, were written in Greek—Josephus testifies that he had a good Greek education—for Greek and Roman readers.

22. Flavius Josephus³ (he says) by the number of misleading accounts which were in circulation, he put his own work into Greek.⁴ The Greek cannot, however, be a mere translation of the earlier work; for Greek and Roman readers it would need to be materially recast, and we can hardly doubt that his own part in the action was put in a quite different light. Very probably also the résumé of Jewish history from the time of Antiochus Epiphanes to the death of Herod (bk. i.) was first prefixed in the Greek; the greater part of the seventh book was doubtless added at the same time. The history ends with the taking of Masada (the last stronghold of the insurgents) and the closing of the temple of Onias in Egypt, with a final chapter on the outbreak in Cyrene. The work was completed before the death of Vespasian (79 A.D.).

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

For the agitation which preceded the war, and for the war itself, Josephus was both at the time and afterwards in a position to be exceptionally well informed; but it must be remembered that, writing for the eyes of the emperor and his officers, he was under strong temptation to put things in the way which would be most pleasing to his imperial patrons; and that he had the difficult task of giving an honourable colour to his own conduct. We know that Justus charged him with falsifying the history of the events in Galilee, and the acrimony of Josephus's reply shows that the shaft had found a vulnerable spot.

For the earlier part of the work, from Antiochus Epiphanes to the death of Nero, he used substantially the same sources as in the parallel books of his Antiquities. The Jewish War is composed with considerable art; Josephus had a remarkably dramatic subject, and he puts his facts together in a highly effective way; the Greek style, in revising which he had expert assistance, is praised by Photius for purity and propriety.

ii. Antiquities.—Later in life Josephus wrote his Antiquities, or, rather, 'Archæology' (Ἰουδαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία), the Ancient History of the Jews, in twenty books.¹

The first ten books extend from the creation of the world to the end of the Babylonian exile (closing with Daniel). His sources here were the books of the OT, chiefly in the LXX version; but when he affirms (I Proem. 3, α. 106) that he reproduces exactly the contents of the sacred books, without addition or omission, he claims too much—or too little.

The Antiquities was written for Gentile readers, and was intended not merely to acquaint them with the history of the Jews, but also to counteract the current prejudice against the people and its institutions, and to exhibit both in a favourable light. To this end he omitted things which might give ground for censure or ridicule, and embellished the narrative from legend and midrash. That he used the writings of Hellenistic Jews who before him had treated the history in the same way (see above, § 10) is certain; the extent to which he was dependent upon them cannot now be determined. Josephus also often refers for confirmation or illustration of the biblical narrative to foreign authors; who are sometimes cited, not at first hand, but from compilations or other intermediate sources.²

For the following period, from Artaxerxes I., under whom he puts Esther (the latest book in the OT), the sources used were of diverse character and value.³ From the middle of the fifth century to the beginning of the second there was no authentic historical tradition; a few stray facts and a mass of legends have to stop the gap. From Antiochus Epiphanes to the accession of Herod, Josephus's chief authority was an unknown Jewish writer who had combined his Jewish sources (I Macc., a history of the later Asmonæans?) with Greek writers on the history of Syria (Polybius, Posidonius, Strabo). This work probably began with Alexander, and came down at least to the death of Germanicus (19 A.D.). To this Josephus added the fruit of his own reading in the Greek historians, some Jewish marvel-stories, and a collection of documents authenticating privileges of the Jews. For the life of Herod he drew directly on Nicolaus of Damascus, with additions from a Jewish source unfavourable to Herod. In the later part of the work the narrative becomes fuller and the sources more numerous; among them information derived from King Agrippa, and a Roman author (? Cluvius Rufus) may be recognised. The history closes with Gessius Florus (= BJ ii. 141), on the eve of the war.

iii. The Life, which in the manuscripts immediately follows the Antiquities, is not really an autobiography; it is an apologia, and is chiefly occupied with a relation and defence of the author's conduct as commander in Galilee in the earlier stage of the revolt. It supplements the War; but is to be used with even greater caution.

iv. The short work which we commonly call the Reply to Apion (Contra Apionem), but of which the true title seems to be 'On the Antiquity of the Jews' (Ἐπὶ τῆς τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἀρχαιότητος) is a defence of the Jews against their assailants, of whom the Alexandrian grammarian and polyhistor Apion is taken as a leading representative.¹ The chief value of the book, apart from the light it throws on the 'antisemitism' of the times, lies in the copious extracts from profane writers on Oriental history which are incorporated in it.

Josephus was the author through whom the Roman and, later, for centuries, the Christian world got most of its knowledge of Jewish history. His works were translated into Latin; a Greek abridgment of the voluminous Antiquities was made; the mediæval Hebrew 'Josippon' professes to be the work of Josephus, from whose writings the material is largely drawn; in modern times Josephus has been translated into all the languages of Europe. His authority as a historian stood very high, his writings were appealed to with almost as much confidence as the OT itself.

In recent times, on the contrary, he has not infrequently been judged with unjust severity. The gravest faults of the Antiquities are those which it shares with the Jewish Hellenistic historiography in general, and indeed with no small part of the profane history of the Alexandrian age, not the individual sins of Josephus.

To expect critical history of these writers is to look for figs on thistles. The business of the historian is to interest his readers; an effective story carries it off over all dry investigations; and legends which rounded to the glory of the race were accepted without impertinent question. It is not to be charged as a crime to Josephus that in these respects he is an author of his time and his people. On the other hand, the carelessness and lack of pains with which the latter part of the Antiquities particularly is worked out may fairly be laid at his door; he visibly wearies of his long task before it is completed.

We have no extensive historical writings in Hebrew or Aramaic to set beside the productions of the Grecian Jews. Some works on particular

23. Seder Olam. periods have perished, or, like 1 Macc. and Josephus's Jewish War, have reached us only in Greek garb. The chief motive of the Hellenistic authors for retelling the ancient history of their people—to bring it to the knowledge of foreigners—was lacking. Their own need was satisfied by the Sacred Books themselves, interpreted by Targum and Midrash. The only comprehensive Hebrew work on Jewish history of which we know anything is the bald chronological epitome known as Seder 'Olam. Down to the Persian period it follows the OT with occasional midrashic episodes, and with 1 minute determination of the chronology which is evidently the raison d'être of the work.² The six centuries and more from Nehemiah to the war under Hadrian are comprised in the second half of chap. 30. The lack of any continuous historical tradition is here again obvious; the chronology of the Persian, the Greek, the Asmonæan, and the Herodian periods—partly in consequence of corruption of the text—is far out of the way. The work, which enjoys Talmudic authority, is attributed to R. Jose ben Halaphta (circa 130-160 A.D.), probably because he is often cited in it as an authority. It has undoubtedly been more than once worked over by later hands.³

HITTITES (דְּחִיטִי), a name which occurs rather frequently in the OT, and is often connected with regions somewhat remote from one another.

1. Occurrence of name in OT.

The name is given to one of the groups of pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Southern Palestine, whose full name is B'ne Hêth (חֵת); so Gen. 23 357 27 46. A single member of the group is Hitti (חִיטִי) χαιταῖος, e.g., Gen. 49 29, 2 S. 11 24, and from the form, the group is commonly referred to as ha-Hitti—i.e., the Hittite. So throughout Ex., Nu., Dt., Josh., Judg., Ezra, and Neh., and also 1 K. 9 20 (|| 2 Ch. 8 7). The references so far given refer to the earlier period of Hebrew history, before definite steps had been taken leading to the formation of the kingdom; but Hittites are mentioned also in the later period, in the days of Saul (1 S. 28 6), David (2 S. 11 3 6 17 21 24 129 2 23 39 חֵרְרַי [L], and a parallel passage 1 Ch. 11 41 חֵרְרַי [B], חֵרְרַי [AL]), Solomon (1 K. 10 29 חֵרְרַי [B; om. A], חֵרְרַי [L], 11 1 2 K. 7 6 and a parallel passage 2 Ch. 1 17 חֵרְרַי [A]). The term Hittite occurs more rarely—only twice for the earlier period, Josh. 14 (BA om.), Judg. 1 26 (חֵרְרַי [B], חֵרְרַי [A], חֵרְרַי [L], 'land of the Hittites'); and three times for the later period (1 K. 10 29 2 K. 7 6 and a parallel passage 2 Ch. 1 17, 'kings of Hittites'). The persistent occurrence of Hittites in the Greek transliteration in place of Hittites should not be overlooked.

In the genealogical table, Gen. 10, Hêth is introduced (v. 15 [J]) as a son of Canaan; but the mention of Hêth here is evidently a gloss—though an old one—tacked on to 'Sidon, the firstborn of Canaan.'

The Greek translators, perceiving the incongruity of the use of Hêth for the nation alongside of gentilicia, like Jebusi, Emori, etc., changed Hêth to Hitti (τῶν χαιταῖων). We may indeed accept the view of Ball (SBOT ad loc.) and others, and regard the introduction of all the nations mentioned in v. 16 as a redactorial addition suggested by the gloss Hêth; but this will not affect the question of the inference about Hêth to be drawn from the passage. For the entire section, Gen. 10 16-19, is an independent fragment (taken from some genealogical list of Canaanites) belonging to the same stratum of tradition as that preserved in the song, Gen. 8 25-27, according to which the three divisions of mankind were Canaan, Shem, and Japheth. This wide sense of Canaan (10 19) accords well with certain passages in the OT (see CANAAN, § 2) which make Canaan a general term for the whole district between the Jordan, the Mediterranean, the wilderness in the S., and the Lebanon range in the N.; but it is to be noted that this usage is in contradiction to the more common application of the term in the Hexateuch and in passages like Judg. 8 5 Ezra 9 1 (חֵת [B], חֵת [A]) Neh. 9 8—dependent upon the Hexateuch—where the Canaanites are merely one of five, six, or seven divisions into which the district defined is divided. When it is furthermore considered that in this enumeration the Canaanites are assigned not always the first place—at times the second (Ex. 23 28 34 11) or the third (Dt. 20 17 Josh. 9 1 24 11), or even the fourth (Ex. 23 23)—it is evident that no value is to be attached to the assignment of Hêth as a 'son' (i.e., subdivision) of Canaan. One conclusion, however, may be drawn from the variation in nomenclature: at one time the Canaanites were spread over a much larger area than was the case when the Israelites entered the country. To Israel the Canaanites still loomed up large enough; but the tradition which made them the ancestors of all the other groups occupying the highlands and valleys to the west of the Jordan, and which regarded them as one of the three great divisions of mankind, belongs to a more remote age.

We conclude, then, that the Hittites of the OT, as an ethnic group, do not necessarily stand in a closer relation to the Canaanites than to the

3. Hittites of S. Palestine, Gen. 23.¹

Amorites, Hivites, Perizzites, or any of the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine.

The question confronts us here, whether in all cases where the OT mentions Hittites, the same people is meant? To put it more precisely, are the B'ne Hēth, of whom an interesting incident is recorded in Gen. 23 [P], identical with the group called ha-Hittī (הַחִיטִּי), and enumerated among the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine, and are these Hittites the same as those found in the days of Saul, David, and Solomon?

According to Gen. 23 [P], Abraham purchases a burying-cave at Mamre from the B'ne Hēth, who are represented as a settled population with Hebron as a kind of centre.

The antiquity of the tradition is hardly open to question, though the details, such as the formal deed of purchase, may have been supplied by the fancy of a much later age, to which Abraham had already become a favourite subject for Midrashic elaboration. That the Hebrew tradition regards the Hittites of Hebron¹ as identical with those mentioned elsewhere follows from the introduction of Hēth in Gen. 10:15 [J], as well as from the qualification ha-Hittī added to the name of Ephron (Gen. 23:10),² the chief of the B'ne Hēth.

These Hittites extended as far south as the edge of the desert, since we find Edomitic clans, settled around Gerar and Beersheba (Gen. 26:34 [P], χερυαλου [E]), entering upon matrimonial alliances with Hittites.

The opposition of Isaac and Rebecca to Esau's marriages with Hittite women (ib., 27:46 [R]) reflects the later sentiments expressed in the Hexateuchal prohibition (Dt. 7:3), whereas the tradition itself clearly points to there being at an early period friendly relationships between Hebrew and Edomitic clans on the one side and Hittites on the other.

Bearing these two features in mind—(1) the settlement of the B'ne Hēth in the extreme south of Palestine, and

4. Hittites of Central Palestine.

(2) the friendly relations between them and the clans which constitute the ancestors of at least a section of the later Israelitish confederacy—it is certainly not without significance that the Hittites mentioned in the OT outside of the book of Genesis dwell in the centre or extreme north of Palestine, and that they are viewed as the bitter enemies of the Israelites. True, in the days of Saul and David, we find Hittites joining their fortunes with David (1 S. 26:6), and a Hittite occupies a prominent place in David's army (2 S. 23:39) (see below, § 5), whilst Solomon enters into matrimonial alliances with Hittite princesses (1 K. 11:2) (see below, § 6); but these are exceptional incidents. The Hittites, together with the Canaanites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, Jebusites, and Girgashites,³ hold the various parts of Palestine proper against the Hebrew invaders, and contest every advance. The chief passages are Ex. 38:17 18:5 23:23 33:2 Dt. 7:1 20:17 Josh. 3:10 11:3 (om. F) 12:8 (om. L) 24:11 Judg. 3:5. An important indication of the distribution of the various groups is furnished by Josh. 11:3. The Canaanites are settled both in the E. and in the W.; Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, and Jebusites in the mountains, and the Hivites at the foot of Mt. Hermon in the N. (In Ḥ the positions of the Hivites and Hittites are exchanged; but the gloss in Nu. 13:29 is a support for MT; see Hivites, § 2.) Here, then, we find the Hittites settled in the mountainous districts of Central Palestine contesting the encroachments of the Hebrews. It is, of course, not impossible that the southern Hittites were gradually forced northward through circumstances of which we are ignorant; but a solution of the problem more in keeping with the conditions of OT nomenclature is to suppose an inexactness and vagueness in the use of the term Hittites, similar to that which characterises the use of such terms as Canaanites, Amorites, and even Philistines. A support for this view is to be found in Josh. 14, where the whole district of Israel's prospective possessions, from the wilderness in the S. to the Lebanon in the N., and eastward to the Euphrates, is designated as 'the whole land of the Hittites.' It is true that these words are a gloss, and perhaps a late one, since they are not contained in Ḥ^{BAL} (Ḥ^F alone inserts). Their value is not impaired, however, by this circumstance; in the opinion of the scribe who added them, 'Hittite' was a term covering a very large territory.

Judg. 1:26 is perhaps another instance of the vague use of the phrase 'land of the Hittites,' though here we have to reckon with the possibility of a redactional insertion referring to a Hittite empire established in NE. Syria, of which we hear much in the inscriptions of Assyrian monarchs (see below, § 6), just as this empire is referred to in 2 K. 7:6, and probably in 1 K. 10:29.

Again, when Ezekiel tells Jerusalem, 'Thy father was an Amorite and thy mother a Hittite' (Ezek. 16:345 [om. Q*]), he is using both terms in a vague and comprehensive sense for the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine.

From such usage it follows that there is no necessary connection beyond the name between the southern Hittites and those whom the Israelites encounter in Central Palestine. Indeed one might be inclined to regard the grouping of Hittites with Canaanites, Amorites, etc., as a conventional enumeration without any decided reference to actual conditions; but such a passage as Josh. 11:3 is against this view.

Since the older inhabitants of Palestine were not exterminated, it is not surprising to find a Hittite—the famous Uriah—among the chiefs that constituted the following of David (2 S. 23:39 1 Ch. 11:47). The position occupied by Uriah points to a partial assimilation between Judæans and Hittites, and similarly the strange tale of David and Bathsheba (Uriah's wife), as related in 2 S. 11, embodies a distinct recollection of a close alliance at one time between the two groups. The unfavourable light in which David's act is placed is due to an age which regarded it as a heinous crime for any Hebrew to marry a woman who was not a worshipper of Yahwē; but the age of David is still far removed from the spirit which animates Deuteronomy and the Priestly Code on this point. There is no objection against regarding these Hittites as the descendants of those whom we encounter in the days of Abraham.

5. S. Hittites in later times.

The case is different, however, when we come to Solomon, whose marriages with Hittite princesses

6. Solomon's Northern Hittites.

solemnize political alliances, just as does the enlargement of his harem through Moabitish, Ammonitish, Edomitish, and Sidonian concubines. Solomon but imitated the example set by the kings of Egypt, who had long been in the habit of adding to their harems representatives of the various nations whom they had conquered or with whom they had entered into political alliances. The king's harem in ancient days in a measure took the place of the diplomatic corps of our times. These Hittites cannot possibly be identical with those we encounter in the days of David; there is no room in the days of Solomon for a Hittite empire or principality in Southern Palestine. The Hittite district must have been as clearly defined, however, as that of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Sidonians (1 K. 11:1). That there was a Hittite empire, and that it was important, is implied by the statement (1 K. 10:29) that Solomon imported horses from Egypt for 'all the kings of the Hittites' (see HORSE, § 3, MIZRAIM, § 2*b*). The same Hittite power is referred to in 2 K. 7:6, where the juxtaposition of 'kings of the Hittites' with 'kings of Egypt' may be taken as a measure of the importance of this power. This reference alone might be sufficient warrant for concluding that the Hittite district is to be sought in the N. of Palestine, the purport of the passage being to imply that Aram was attacked simultaneously from the N. and the S. A more definite conclusion, however, may be drawn from 2 S. 246. Despite the corruptness of the passage, one may be certain that it contains a reference to the 'land of the Hittites.'¹ The reference is to a land lying N. of Gilead, and we are thus brought to the region where, as we know from other sources to be mentioned presently, an extensive 'Hittite' empire flourished as early at least as 1000 B.C.

In a study of the Hittites of the OT we must therefore take into consideration the varying use of the term.

7. Summary of OT data. We must distinguish (a) the Hittites settled around Hebron (who maintain their identity down to the days of David) from (b) the 'conventional' Hittites whom tradition enumerated with other groups as opponents whom the Hebrew invaders in a severe and protracted struggle dispossessed of their land; and both these divisions must be kept separate again from (c) an extensive Hittite power (divided up into principalities) situated in the north-eastern part of Syria, beyond the confines of Palestine proper; and, lastly, there is the vague and indefinite use of the term which makes Hittite almost synonymous with (d) all Palestine and Syria, and thus adds another complicating element.

So far as the evidence goes, there is nothing to warrant any connection (beyond the name) between the Hittites (b) who form part of the pre-Israelitish population of southern Palestine, and the Hittites (c) whose alliance is sought by Solomon. It is the latter Hittites who play much the more prominent part in the ancient history of the East.

Thotmes I., the third king of the eighteenth dynasty, began about 1600 B.C. an extended series of Asiatic campaigns which eventually brought about the subjection of Palestine and Syria to the pharaohs of Egypt. Among the more formidable enemies enumerated by the Egyptian rulers is a people whose name Ḥ-t' appears to be identical with the term Ḥēth or Ḥetti of the OT. This people occupied the mountainous districts of northern Syria, and extended to the E. as far as the Orontes, indeed at times beyond it to the Euphrates. A stronghold of the Ḥ-ta which is prominently mentioned in the inscriptions of Thotmes III. (circa 1500 B.C.) is Kedesh. The Ḥ-ta did not confine themselves, however, to their mountain recesses. Joining arms with the various nationalities of northern Palestine and the W. district, they advanced as far as Megiddo to meet the Egyptian armies. The pharaohs found their task difficult, and, even after many campaigns had been waged, the subjection of the Ḥ-ta was not definitely accomplished. The kings of Egypt advanced to Carchemish, Tunep, Hamath, and claim to have laid siege to these places; but again and again armies had to be sent into northern Syria and the Taurus region. Marash, at the extreme E. of Cilicia, appears to have resisted all attempts at conquest. The Egyptians at one time found a valuable ally in Dušratta, king of Mitanni—a district to the NW. of Assyria. This alliance between Egypt and Mitanni seems to have kept the Ḥ-ta in check; but it was not long before the Ḥ-ta of Marash, Carchemish, Hamath, and Kedesh regained their complete independence. In the fourteenth century the hold of Egypt upon her Asiatic possessions was loosened, and about a century later her control practically comes to an end.

It is clear from the way in which the Ḥ-ta are spoken of in the Egyptian records that the prevailing notions about them were vague. To assume that there was at this time an extensive Hittite empire is a theory that meets with serious difficulties. The district embraced by the Egyptian rulers under the designation Ḥ-ta appears to have been divided up among a varying number of principalities, and it does not follow that the rulers and inhabitants of these principalities were even of one and the same linguistic or ethnic stock.

Our knowledge of the early history of Babylonia and of the rise of the Assyrian power is still too uncertain to

9. Cuneiform statements. enable us to say when the inhabitants of the Euphrates valley first came into contact with the Hittites. The Kaššite dynasty, which maintained its sway over Babylonia for upwards of 500 years, was of an aggressive character, and in the fifteenth century we find Babylonia joined with Egypt in a close alliance. The use of the Babylonian script and language at this time as the medium of diplomatic interchange between the court of Egypt and officials stationed in Palestine and Syria under Egyptian control points to a predominating Babylonian influence and an earlier Babylonian supremacy, during which the Babylonian language was introduced into the district in question.

The text containing an account of the western exploits of Sargon I. [see BABYLONIA, § 41] (whose date is provisionally fixed at 3800 B.C.) is of a very late date, and cannot therefore be relied upon as confirming the general tradition of an early conquest of Syria on the part of Babylonian rulers. (The name Hittite does not appear in the text referred to, the lands to the W. being embraced under the general designation of 'Amorite country.' On this point see CANAAN, §§ 7 ff.)

As the Asiatic campaigns of Egypt begin in the eighteenth century B.C., we must assume that the Babylonian control of Syria and Palestine belongs to an earlier time. We know enough of the history of the Kaššite dynasty in Babylonia to say that it was probably during the period of its ascendancy that the control of Babylonia over the western districts was most effective, and the testimony of the Egyptian inscriptions warrants us in assuming that the Hittites were then the most powerful federation against whom the Babylonians had to contend. It is to be noted, however, that the term

10. The Ḥatti. Hittite, or Ḥatti, which appears to be identical with it, does not make its appearance in cuneiform literature till the days of Tiglath-pileser I., about 1100 B.C. Then it means a distinctly defined kingdom lying along the Orontes (with Carchemish as one of its important centres) and extending well into the Taurus range. Against these Ḥatti the Assyrian ruler waged a fierce campaign. According to his account it ended in a complete triumph for the Assyrian arms. In reality, however, the conquest was far from complete. The successors of Tiglath-pileser were much harassed by the troublesome Ḥatti, and it is not until the reign of Sargon (721-704 B.C.) that they finally disappear from the horizon of Assyrian history.

Curiously enough, we encounter in the Assyrian inscriptions the same vagueness in the use of the term Ḥatti that is characteristic of OT usage; Sennacherib and other Assyrian rulers, when they speak of the 'land of Ḥatti,' have in mind the entire region to the W. of the Euphrates, embracing the Phœnician coast and including apparently Palestine (see CANAAN, § 12). Still, there can be no doubt that the Assyrians distinguished the Ḥatti proper from the other principalities of Syria and Palestine; and if the testimony of the comparatively late Assyrian inscriptions could only be used for the earlier periods, the ethnic and geographical problems involved would be considerably simplified.

Fortunately, as an aid to the solution of these problems, we have a considerable number of monuments left us by

11. Hittite monuments. the Hittites themselves, and although the date of these monuments does not carry us back to as early a period as the Egyptian campaigns in Western Asia, they help us to a clearer understanding of the earlier history of the Hittites. At Carchemish and Hamath have been found remains of sculptures accompanied by inscriptions, and elsewhere in this region, as at Zenjirli, there are abundant traces of Hittite art. Quite recently (August, '99) a Hittite stèle has been found at Babylon, transported from a Hittite centre by an Assyrian monarch.¹ This art is so distinctly based upon Assyrian and Babylonian models as to decide definitely the influences at work in producing the civilisation in this region. In addition to this, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Lycaonia, and Phrygia abound in remains of edifices and of works of art showing the same types and the same general traits as those of Carchemish and Hamath, whilst the inscriptions found with the edifices belong likewise to the same class.

Thanks to the researches of Jensen it may now be regarded as certain that the inscriptions cover the period 1200-800 B.C.; and it has also been made probable that the spread of the Hittites was gradual from the region of Cilicia to the N., NE., and NW., nearly to the borders of the Euxine, and W. to the Ægean.² It is fair to presume that the language of all the so-called Hittite inscriptions is the same, although it may be added that several styles of Hittite characters may be distinguished, some being pictorial, others branching off into conventional forms with a strong tendency towards becoming linear. These varieties, which are quite paralleled by the styles of writing in the Egyptian and Babylonian-Assyrian inscriptions, do not affect the question of the language; and, this being the case, we can understand the vagueness in the geographical use of the term Hittites among the ancients. At what period the extension of Hittite settlements began it is as yet impossible to say; but the indications are that we must go back several centuries beyond 1200 B.C. for the date. On the other hand, whilst in general the Hittite traits are clearly defined on the monuments, there are good reasons for assuming several ethnic types among those grouped under the term. From an anthropological point of view, the Mongolian, or to speak more definitely the Turanian, type seems to prevail; but, whatever the ground-stock of the Hittites of Asia Minor may have been, there is a clear indication of Semitic admixture.

The decipherment of the Hittite inscriptions which would throw so much needed light on the ethnic problems, is now being vigorously prosecuted. After several attempts on the part of Sayce, Peiser, and Halévy, which constituted an opening wedge, Jensen has recently struck out on a new path which gives promise of leading, ere long, to a satisfactory solution of the mystery. With great ingenuity he has determined much of the general character of the inscriptions. He has identified ideographs and sign-groups for the names of countries and gods, some of which appear to be established beyond reasonable doubt.

Passing beyond those limits, Jensen is fully convinced that the language of the inscriptions belongs to the Aryan stock—is in fact the prototype of the modern Armenian. This rather startling result, although it has received the adherence of some eminent scholars, cannot be said to be definitely assured, and for the present remains in the category of a theory to be further tested. The proof furnished by Jensen for the Aryan character of the Hittite language is not sufficiently strong to overcome the objection that many of the Hittite proper names occurring both in the Egyptian and in the Assyrian inscriptions are either decidedly Semitic or can be accounted for on the assumption of their being Semitic, whilst the evidence which can be brought to bear upon the question from OT references points in the same direction. Again, if, as Jensen believes, and as seems plausible, the Hittite characters are to be regarded as showing a decided resemblance to Egyptian hieroglyphs—so much so, indeed, as to suggest a connection between the two systems—there would be another presumption for expecting to find an affiliation between the Hittite language and the Semitic stock, if not indeed, as in Egyptian, a Semitic substratum. No valid conclusion can be drawn from the unquestionable relationship of the Cypriote characters to the Hittite signs, since the Cypriote syllabary is clearly the more simplified of the two, and is presumably, therefore, a derivative of the former. What we know of early Semitic influences in the proto-Grecian culture and religion of Asia Minor, speaks against an Aryan civilisation flourishing in the region covered by the Hittite monuments.

These suggestions are thrown out with all due reserve, for the problem is too complicated to warrant at present anything like a decided tone. So far as Jensen's decipherment has gone, the inscriptions—some thirty in all—contain little beyond the names and titles of rulers, lands and gods, with brief indications of conquests. Valuable as such indications would be if definitely established, it does not seem likely that our knowledge of Hittite history would be much advanced by the complete decipherment of the meagre material at our command. On the other hand, there is every reason to believe that excavations in Hittite centres will increase the material, and we may also look forward to finding a bilingual inscription of sufficient length to settle definitely the still uncertain elements in the decipherment,¹ and clear the field of the many hypotheses that have been put forward. Meanwhile, bearing in mind the necessarily tentative character of all conclusions until excavations on a large scale shall have been carried on in centres of Hittite settlements, we may sum up our present knowledge as follows:

1. Among the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine there was a group settled in southern Palestine, known as the Hettites or Hittites.

2. When the Egyptians began their conquest of Syria, Hittites formed one of their most formidable adversaries, and continued to be prominent throughout the several centuries of Egyptian supremacy in Syria and Palestine. The chief seat of these Hittites was in the extreme N. of Palestine and extended well into Syria. The further extension of Hittite settlements brings under control not merely the district to the W. of the Taurus range, but a considerable portion of western Asia Minor (including Cilicia and Cappadocia) extending to the Euxine Sea on the N. and the Ægean to the W. The north-eastern boundary is uncertain; but it may have reached to Lake Van. After the withdrawal of the Egyptians from Asia Minor the Assyrians engage in frequent conflicts with the Hittite kingdom in the region of the Orontes, and it is not until the eighth century that they are finally reduced to a condition where they could no longer offer any resistance.

The vagueness in the use of the term Hittite, in the OT as well as in the Egyptian and Assyrian records, makes it difficult to decide whether all Hittites are to be placed in one group. The evidence seems to show that the sons of Hēth settled around Hebron at an early period, have nothing in common (beyond the name) with the Hittites of central and northern Palestine, and have nothing to do, therefore, with the Hittites of Syria and of regions still farther N. The Hittites of Hebron were Semites and spoke a Semitic tongue; the Hittites of northern Palestine and Syria were probably not Semitic but became mixed with Semites at a comparatively early period. Their language, likewise, appears to contain Semitic elements, and may indeed have a Semitic substratum. The Hittite script appears to have been taken over from the Egyptian hieroglyphics, and in any case has strong affinities with it, though it seems also certain that it contains elements which are either original or derived from some source that is still unknown.

HIVITES, RV 'the HIVITE' (הִיִּטִּי)—i.e., 'the Hivites'; οἱ Ἐγυπιοὶ [BAL], named in the lists of tribes driven out of Palestine by the b'ne Israel (Ex. 38 17, etc., also Is. 17 9¹ SBOT, where, however, Cheyne now holds the reading to be impossible).

The origin of the name and even its existence (see below) in the true text have been disputed (see HORITE). Some critics explain from the Ar. ḥayy, 'family,' as if = people who live in חַיִּים, Bedawin encampments (see GOVERNMENT, § 4, HAVVOTH-JAIR)—whilst Wellhausen (Ch 34) suggests that the name is derived from חַיִּי, Eve (on the meaning of which name see ADAM AND EVE, § 3b). It is at any rate possible that, if the reading חַיִּי is correct, the early interpreters in the Onomastica were right in connecting it with חַיִּי, 'serpent' (θηρίωνες, ὠσπερ ὄφεις: OS 1844, etc.), and that the Hivites were originally the 'Snake' clan (so, doubtfully, Moore, Judg., 83*f.*).

In Gen. 10 17 (= 1 Ch. 1 15, B om., evet [L]) the Hivites are reckoned among the sons of Canaan. Moore thinks they were a petty people of Central Palestine (Judges, 79); but, if so, the textual and critical difficulties in passages which would otherwise be of value, render it impossible to fix upon their locality.

In Josh. 9 7 the Gibeonites are spoken of as 'Hivites'; cp 11 19 'the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon' (Ⓞ^{BAF} om.; cp Bennett, SBOT). As we know, GIBEON [g.v.] remained for a long time in the possession of non-Israelites, but whether they were Hivites, Horites (as Ⓞ^{BAFL} suggests),² or Amorites (cp 2 S. 21 a) is uncertain. Ⓞ may, however, be right in reading 'Horite' for 'Hivite' in Gen. 34 2 (see SHECHEM b. Hamor; cp HORITE), and the same emendation is required in 36 2 (see ANAH, BASHEMATH, ZIBEON).

Another error occurs in Josh. 11 3, where the Hittites must certainly be referred to in the geographical location, 'under Hermon in the land of Mizpah'; the Hivites (om. Ⓞ^A) and Hittites, as Ⓞ^B shows, have accidentally exchanged places (cp Meyer, ZATW 1 126, Bu. Ri. Sa. 81 n., Moore, Judg. 81; see HITTITES, § 4). So again in Judg. 3 3, for the 'Hivites' who dwell in Mt. Lebanon, etc., and who are named after the Zidonians, we should most probably read 'Hittites' (cp Moore, l.c.). It is difficult to decide whether 'Hivites' in 2 S. 24 7 (evet [L]) is correct. The 'cities of the Hivites and the Canaanites' are enumerated after Zidon and Tyre, and by adopting the reading 'Hittites' (so Pesh.) the geographical details will agree substantially with the above-quoted passages. On the other hand, the words in question may be a gloss based on the lists in Ex. 38 etc., and it is noteworthy that the Pesh. goes a step further and adds 'Jebusites.' S. A. C.

HOBAB (חֹבָב), son of REUEL [g.v.], Moses' father-in-law (Nu. 10 29 Judg. 4 11 [a gloss? see Moore], and probably Judg. 1 16 [emended text; cp וְחֹבָב [A], וְחֹבָב [L], see Moore]). In Nu. 10 29 he is represented as a Midianite, in Judg. 1 16 4 11 as a Kenite. Elsewhere (except in 1 Ch. 2 55, see HEMATH), JONADAB [g.v.], or Jehonadab, is called the founder of the Rechabites, and we may doubt (but see RECHABITES) whether the simple mode of life of the Rechabites really dates back only to the age of Jehu, and whether the Rechabites at that time really adopted a new 'father' or founder different from the reputed 'father' of the Kenites. If so, we may suppose Hobab to be a corruption either of Jehonadab (or Naclab) or else of Jehobab (יהובב), which is probably the fuller form of JOBAB [g.v.]. The latter alternative is the easier; accepting it, we shall proceed to emend Jehonadab and Jonadab in Jer. 35 6 8 ff. into Jehobab (יהובב) and Jobab (יובב) respectively.¹ Thus Jehobab the father-in-law of Moses becomes the father and legislator of the Kenites or Rechabites.

Ⓞ has וְחֹבָב [BAL] in Judg., וְחֹבָב [B], וְחֹבָב [A], וְחֹבָב [F*], וְחֹבָב [F1mg-L] in Nu.; see readings in Swete, We. Heid. (2) 146 compares Hobab with Ar. ḥubāb, 'serpent'; but most connect the name with חֹבַב, 'to love'; cp Nab. חֹבְבִי 'beloved.' T. K. C.

HOBAB (חֹבָב); חֹבָב [D]; חֹ. [L]; Joseph. וְחֹבָב, the point to which Abraham pursued CHEDOR-LOOMER (g.v.) and his allies (Gen. 14 15). It was on the left hand (i.e., on the N.) of Damascus. In the Amarna Tablets, 139 59 63 146 rev. 12, māt Ubi is mentioned; once, to define Damascus, 'D. in the land of Ubi' (ib. 63). On the edge of the Syrian desert, between Damascus and Palmyra, there is a spring called Hoba which is still famous in the songs of the Bedouin. Wetzstein in Deil. Gen. (4) 561 ff. identifies this with Hobab. The objection is the distance from Dan, where Abraham is said to have set upon the kings and defeated them. From Dan (Tell el-Kādi) to Damascus is fifteen hours' journey, from Damascus to Hoba more than twenty. This is not decisive, however; the narrator (if he knew the distance) may have wished to emphasise the unwearied energy of Abraham. It is likely that in ancient times so excellent a spring was even more frequented than now; for then, like other important springs on the verge of the desert, it probably had a village beside it. T. Since, however, Jeshua, Kadmiel, and Bani are mentioned together in Neh. 9 4*f.* it is better to emend Ezra 2 40 etc. and read 'the h'ne Jeshua, Kadmiel, Bani, and Hodaviah.' So already in 1 Esd. 5 26 Kadmiel, and Bannas, and Sudias. From a comparison of the lists in Neh. it is probable that Hodaviah is the same as Hodiah in Neh. 8 7 etc. and Judah in Neh. 12 8. HODIAH

HODIAH (הֹדִיָּה, 'Yahwè is my glory,' cp HODAVIAH: $\omega\delta\omicron\upsilon\gamma\iota\alpha(\text{C})$ [L]).

1. As the text stands, a Judahite, whose wife was a sister of NAHAM [g.v.], 1 Ch. 4 19 (ἡγὴς ἰδουίας [B], ἡγὴς ἰουδαίας [A], ὠδία [L]). Θ^{BA} , however, has the better reading 'his wife Hodiah' in v. 18. Thus we see that Hodiah and Ha-Jehudijah are really the same genealogical person, who is called in v. 19 mother of 'the father of KEILAH [g.v.] and of ESHTEMOA' [g.v.], and was the wife of MERED [g.v.]—a corrupt form which needs emendation. Θ^{L} makes Hodiah the brother of Naham.

2. AV Hodijah, mentioned in lists of priests, teachers, and Levites, Neh. 8 7 9 5 [4] (om. Θ^{BNA} in both passages), 1 Esd. 9 4 8 (ΑΥΤΕΑΣ; αντατας [BA]); Neh. 10 10, ὠδουα [BNA] 13 [14] (ὠδουα [BN], ὠδουα [A], ὠδίας [L]); v. 18 [19] (ὠδουα [BNA], ὠδίας [L]). He is probably the same as HODAVIAH (4). The name apparently recurs in 1 Esd. 5 16 under the corrupt form ANNIS (so RV); see ANANIAS, 1.

HOGLAH (הֹגְלָה), as if 'partridge,' § 68; $\epsilon\gamma\lambda\alpha$ [BL], $\delta\iota\gamma\lambda\alpha$ [AF], in Josh. $\delta\iota\gamma\lambda\alpha\mu$ [BA], the third of the five daughters of ZELOPHEHAD, i.e., Šalhad (Nu. 26 33 27 1 36 11 $\delta\iota\gamma\lambda\alpha$ [F], Josh. 17 3 P†). Though a place-name Hoglah is possible (see BETH-HOGLAH), yet some better known name is more probable for a 'daughter' of Šalhad. Perhaps הֹגְלָה is a corruption of הֹגְלָה—i.e., Abel-meholah. See MAHLAH.

HOHAM (הֹחַם), king of Hebron, defeated by Joshua (Josh. 10 3; $\delta\iota\lambda\alpha\mu$ [BA], $\epsilon\lambda\alpha\mu$ [L]). According to Hommel (AHT, 223 n.) the name is identical with the Minæan Hauhūm. See HORAM.

HOLD. A stronghold or citadel, used especially with reference to David's retreat in the cave of ADULLAM (הַר הַצִּיָּוִן, mēšūādāh, 1 S. 22 4 f. [but see HARETH], cp 24 22 [23] 2 S. 5 17; $\eta\epsilon\gamma\gamma\eta$, mēšādāh, 1 Ch. 12 8 16).

Both words are employed to denote the fortress of Zion (2 S. 5 7 1 Ch. 11 7), and in a general sense are used of any place of refuge or safety. See FORTRESS (beg.).

The legitimacy of the rendering 'hold' for $\eta\epsilon\gamma\gamma\eta$, šerāāh, in 1 S. 18 6 (AV 'high places') Judg. 9 46 49 (EV), is not certain. The signification rock-hewn or sepulchral chamber which the word has in Nabatæan (see Cook, Aram. Gloss., s.v. $\eta\epsilon\gamma\gamma\eta$) is suitable in 1 S. (cp RVmg. 'hole'), but appears less satisfactory in Judg. l.c., where (unless some underground chamber, e.g., the reputed antrum of the god BAAL-BERITH [g.v.] be intended) the rendering 'tower' (as in Sabæan) seems preferable (cp Moore, ad loc.). The text, however, may be corrupt.

See Dr. (Sam. 76), Moore, Bu. ad loc., and for $\eta\epsilon\gamma\gamma\eta$ cp Barth, AJSL, 97, p. 273 (with lit. cited).

2. pninos (ilex, $\lambda\iota\sigma\sigma\omicron\varsigma$), mentioned in Sus. 58 with the characteristic paronomasia, 'the angel of God waiteth with the word to cut thee (pninosi se [Theod.], ἡνα καταρτίζω σε [Θ⁸⁷]) in two'; see SUSANNAH. By pninos [87 and Theod.] (cp Theophr. Hist. Plant. iii. 7 3 and Aq. in Gen. 14 3 8; the adj. pninos Aq. in Ezek. 27 5) is intended probably the Quercus Coccifera L. and Q. pseudo-coccifera (Houghton). Similarly, a Syriac gloss (in Löw, Pflanz. 72) treats it as a species of oak (כַּלְמִישׁ).

HOLOFERNES (ὈΛΟΦΕΡΝΗΣ [BNA]; $\eta\epsilon\gamma\gamma\eta$ [Syr.]), the name given to the Assyrian general in the legendary book of Judith. The name, also pronounced Olofernes, was borne by two Cappadocian princes, the one, a young son of Ariannes, and the other a son of Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus the Great, and, at one time, the friend of Demetrius I. The latter has been identified with Holofernes by Ewald (4 621) and independently by E. L. Hicks (J. Hell. Stud. 6 261 ff. [85]). Ball, however, prefers to identify him with Nicanor the Syrian general overcome by Judas the Maccabee, and Gaster with Scarus, the general sent by Pompey into Syria 65 B.C. According to Winckler (AOF 273) Holofernes = Osnappar (Asur-bāni-pal).

If the termination is genuine we may compare Artaphernes, Dataphernes, Tissaphernes, and two Median princes of the time of Esar-haddon, viz. Sidir-parna and E-parna (see Ball, Speaker's Comm., ad loc., and cp the Syr. form supra). See JUDITH, Book of, and esp. Willrich, Judaica, 28 ff. (1900).

In || 1 Ch. 6 58 (43) it is HILEN (חֵילֶן; $\sigma\epsilon\lambda\nu\alpha$ [B], $\nu\eta\lambda\omega\omicron\omicron$ [A], $\chi\epsilon\lambda\omega\omicron\omicron$ [L]), for which there is a v.l. Hilez (חֵילֶז; so the Soincio edition of the Prophets).

According to Klo. in Θ^{BA} of 1 S. 17 2 (see ELAH, VALLEY OF) $\alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\iota$ = $\alpha\upsilon\lambda\omega\omicron\omicron$ = Holon. Possibly, too, Holon is intended in Judith 15 4; see COTA.

HONEY (שֶׁבֶךְ, dēbaš, same order of root letters in Aram. and Ar.; Ass. dišpu, 'honey,' dašpu, duššuru, 'a sweet drink'; $\mu\epsilon\lambda\iota$). The word dēbaš has three distinct senses: (1) the honey of the wild bee, (2) the honey of the domesticated bee, and (3) manufactured honey, or syrup, the dibs of modern Syria.

1. In the sense of 'wild honey' the word is of frequent occurrence. 'Honey out of the rock' is

1. Varieties of Honey. [17]; and Canaan is even described, and similarly Goshen (Nu. 16 13), as 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Ex. 3 8 17 passim; cp Dt. 8 8 2 K. 18 32 Jer. 41 8).³ Theories attaching either of the two other significations to the term dēbaš as used in this phrase, have no adequate justification. It was, further, the honey of the wild bee which Samson found in the carcass of the lion (Judg. 14 8 ff.; see BEE), and of which Jonathan partook (1 S. 14 25 ff.),⁴ by dipping his staff into the honey-comb (שֶׁבֶךְ הַצִּיָּוִן; cp Cant. 5 1); and wild honey ($\mu\epsilon\lambda\iota$ $\theta\gamma\gamma\iota\omicron\upsilon\omicron$) was the fare of John the Baptist (Mk. 1 6 Mt. 3 4).

2. There is no direct reference to domestic bee-keeping in the OT (see BEE). Nevertheless, it would be strange, in view of the antiquity of the domestication of the bee in the East (Am. Tab. 138 12 speaks of honey and oil in Syria), if the Hebrews were

² In the latter passage Lagy, Gr., We., Che. read, 'With droppings ($\eta\epsilon\gamma\gamma\eta$ for $\eta\epsilon\gamma\gamma\eta$); note the parallelism.

³ [The phrase 'a land flowing (חַרַח) with milk and honey' is more poetical than its context seems to justify. It was already conventional in the time of JE. It is a reasonable supposition that it comes from ancient poetry; and, since ancient poetry is always tinged with mythology, it is not improbable that the phrase in question had a mythological origin. If it were Sanscrit, we should not doubt it. But the more sober Semitic mythology does not appear to have spoken of the sun as a cow and the moon as a bee (Goldziher, Hab. Mythology, 28 f.). Nor was it imagined by the Semites that the Milky Way was specially the abode of the Sun-god (as by the Egyptians: Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 181). Probably the phrase alludes to the idealised past of human history. In the time of Nephcheres, says Manetho (Müller, Fr. Hist. Gr. 2 542 f.), the Nile flowed with honey for fifteen days. So, in the Hebrew Golden Age it may have been said, with perfect sincerity, that the land 'flowed with milk and honey.' It is to such a myth that an Assyrian poet may allude, when he wishes for his king, besides the protection of the Sun-god and the Moon-god, that God may cause to flow into his channels dišpa himeta, 'honey (and) curdled milk' (Frd. Del., G. Smith's Chald. Gen.). CP MARAH.

T. K. C.]

acquainted only with wild honey, nor could this be reconciled with the mention of honey as well as other products of cultivation in 2 Ch. 31 5.

Apiculture is first mentioned by Philo, who says that the Essenes were fond of it (2633, ed. Mangey). In the Mishna references to it abound. The hive (פְּרָחִית) was either of straw (פְּרָחִית) or of wicker (פְּרָחִית), doubtless plastered over, as at the present day, to keep out the excessive heat (see description of modern hives under BEE). The technical term for removing the combs when filled was רָרַךְ (lit. to scrape, see Levy NHWB s.v., with quotation from Rashi; see also Moore's note on Judg. 14 9, where alone in OT the word occurs). The bees, it would appear, were first stupefied by the smoke of charcoal and dung kindled in front of the hive on the סָרְחָה (see Kilim, 16 7 ap. Surenhusius, with Maimonides' commentary). When the combs (שְׂבָחִים הַלֵּחִים) were removed in this way, at least two had to be left in the hive as food for the bees during winter (Bab. bathra, 5 3).

3. In later Hebrew certainly, and in the OT possibly, dhbas is also used to denote certain artificial preparations made from the juice of various fruits by inspissation, like the modern dibs. Reference has already been made to the theory that the 'honey' with which the land of Canaan was said to 'flow' was this inspissated syrup; it has also been held that at least the honey intended for transport (Gen. 43 11 1 K. 14 3) and export (Ezek. 27 17) must be so understood. The former view is unsatisfactory; to the latter, if Cheyne's emendation of Ezek. 27 17 be accepted (see PANNAG), no objection need be offered. Stade (Gesch. 1 371, n. 2), it is true, thinks that grape-syrup was unnecessary in the 'land which flowed with milk and honey.' The early inhabitants of Canaan, however, as Bliss appears to have shown, were certainly acquainted with this manufacture. His excavations at Tell el-Hesi (Lachish) revealed two wine-presses, with apparatus (as he judged) for boiling down the filtered juice (inspissation) into grape syrup.¹

The first unmistakable Jewish reference to it is in Josephus (the date-syrup of Jericho; see PALM TREE); Tg. ps.-Jon. (see Dt. 8 8) also mentions it. In the Mishna it is called שְׂבָחִים הַלֵּחִים, and we may infer that in the Mishnic period dates were the chief source of the manufacture. Since the spread of Islam, which forbids wine-drinking, the grapes of Syria have been mainly diverted to the manufacture of dibs. The pure grape juice is drawn off into a stone vat (see description of press under WINE), and allowed to settle, after which it is conveyed to a large copper cauldron (khalkin, or khalkin, Landberg, Pro-verber, etc., 53), about three feet in diameter, in the wine-press boiling-room close at hand (cp Bliss's illustration, above). After the juice has boiled for a short time it is returned to the vat, which in the interval has been thoroughly cleaned, and allowed to cool. The process of boiling and cooling is repeated, after which the juice is boiled for the third and last time, the yellow syrup being constantly stirred and lifted up by means of a large perforated wooden spoon with a long handle (the mukhabbat, Landb. op. cit. 107). The boiling is an affair of much skill, and every village with large vineyards has several experts, who superintend the process, and from the colour, consistency, and manner of boiling recognise the moment when the process is completed. The inspissated syrup is now hurriedly conveyed to a clean stone cistern within the building, and allowed to cool before being put into vessels for conveyance to the owner's house. 'The final stage of the process is to beat the dibs with a stick and draw it out to make it of a firmer consistency, and somewhat lighter in colour. It is of a dark golden brown colour like maple molasses, and its taste is intensely sweet like honey' (Rev. Geo. Mackie, Beyroust, to whom the writer is indebted for most of the above details). Both Greeks and Romans were alike familiar with this process of inspissation, the products being variously known as σβημα, σιρσιον, saba, defrutum. The first three, according to Pliny, were prepared by boiling down the must to one-third its bulk, 'when must is boiled down to one-half only, we give it the name of defrutum,' HV 14 11). Burckhardt also states that three hundredweight of grapes are calculated to yield a hundredweight of dibs. Wellstedt found the Arabs using the pods of the carob-tree (cp HUSKS) for the manufacture of dibs (Reisen in Arabien, 1 331 f.), a practice still followed in Syria (Coste, Flora, 297).

Among 'the principal things for the whole use of man's life' Ben Sira fitly assigns a place to honey (39 26). It was eaten alone as a delicacy,

2. Uses as by Samson and Jonathan (cp also 2 S. of Honey. 17 29 1 K. 14 3) and as a relish with other articles of food. 'A piece of broiled fish and of an honeycomb (ἀπὸ μελισσίου κηρίου) was doubtless a familiar combination, although absent from the best MSS of Lk. 24 42 (and RV). But curdled milk and honey alone (EV 'butter and honey'; Is. 7 15 22) was very poor diet (see MILK). It was as a sweetener of food that, before the introduction of sugar, honey was everywhere in demand; 'the bee is little, but her fruit is the chief of sweet things' (Ecclus. 11 3). In particular it was used for all sorts of sweet cakes (Ex. 16 31, ἐγκρις; see also BAKEMEATS, § 3)—such cakes (πλακοῦντες) as were so much relished by the Greeks as dessert. But it is well known that honey partaken of too freely produces nausea¹ (Prov. 25 27). Honey, however, was disallowed, at least by the later legislation (Lev. 2 11 f.), as an ingredient of any meal-offering, because of the ease with which it ferments (cp Pliny, HV 11 15), although admitted freely in other cults (see Bertholet, KHC on Ezek. 16 19). A drink resembling mead was known to the later Jews by a name (יַיִטְיִילִין) derived from the Greek οὐνόμελι, and said to have been compounded of wine, honey, and pepper (Tērūm. 11 1 Shabb. 20 2). Honey was kept in jars (1 K. 14 3, EV 'a cruse of honey'; cp Jer. 41 8), in which probably it was largely exported through the markets of Tyre (Ezek. 27 17). Cp PANNAG.

The medicinal uses of honey are discussed at length by Pliny (NH 22 50) and were not unknown to the Jews either of Jerusalem (Shabb. 8 1) or of Alexandria (see addition to Gk. text of Prov. 9 8 quoted under BEE). The body of Aristobulus, Josephus informs us, was preserved from decomposition by being laid in honey (ἐν μέλιτι κεκρησμένους, Ant. xiv. 7 4, § 124). As 'the chief of sweet things,' honey is much used in similes and metaphors by Hebrew writers. The word of Yahwé to the Hebrew poet is 'sweeter than honey and the honeycomb' (נֶחֱמֵת מִחֶמֶת וּמִדְבַּח פְּס. 19 10 [11], cp EV 10 10; also Ps. 119 103). The pleasant speech of one's friends, also, is 'as an honeycomb, sweet to the soul, and health to the bones' (Pr. 16 24, cp Cant. 4 11). Wisdom, even, is comparable to honey (Pr. 24 13 f. 25 16 Ecclus. 24 20), and the memory of a good man is 'sweet as honey in every mouth' (Ecclus. 49 1, said of Josiah).

Not the capitals of the pillars (as ἄ), but probably tenters or hooks rising from the tops of the pillars.

7. חֹפְפֵי, sh'phattain, Ezek. 40 43, a word which greatly puzzles the interpreters (cp AVmg. and RVmg.); neither 'posts' nor 'gutters' will do. The preferable reading, as Cornill has shown, is חֹפְפֵי ('their edge,' lit. 'lip'); ἄ γείσος; Aq. (2), Theod., Sym., χεῖλα.

'Hook' in NT corresponds to ἀγκιστρον, which is common in ἄ for a 'hook' (in one case, Ezek. 32 3, used to represent חֹךְ, NET [q.v.]).

² חֹכֵי דִגְיָה, EV 'barbed irons,' Job 41 7 [40 31], seems to be a corruption for חֹפְפֵי דִגְיָה, 'ships'; cp ἄ; חֹכֵי דִגְיָה, AV 'thorn,' ib. 41 2 [40 26], should certainly be חֹךְ, 'nose-ring' (Beer, Che.).

HOOPOE

HOOPOE (דִּיקִיפָּחַת, dūkiḥpath; εἶπος; urupa, נָר טָרָר [Targ.], נָר טָרָר [Pesh.], Lev. 11 19 Dt. 14 18 [16]† (uṣṣa [B*F], uṣṣa [A]). RV, however, and the older English versions, without authority, LAPWING. It is usual to acquiesce in the traditional rendering 'hoopoe.' The Urupa epops is in fact, not less than the lapwing, a Palestinian bird. It winters in and near Egypt, and returns to Palestine in March.

It seeks its food in dunghills, and, it is supposed, was on this account included among the unclean birds; it is, however, freely eaten in the Levant at the present day. Possibly because of its crest (Aristoph. Birds, 94), it has always inspired a superstitious awe, and the Arabs, who call it hudhud, from its cheery cry, ascribe to it the power of discovering water and of revealing secrets. In the late Jewish legends respecting Solomon the hoopoe plays a great part in connection with the queen of Sheba (see second Targ. on Esth. i), and the story is adopted in the Quran (sur. 27).

But it is by no means certain that dūkiḥpath is really (see Di.) 'the cock of the rock' (or 'of beauty'), or that it refers to the hoopoe's fondness for rocks and mountain-ravines (cp Tristram, Land of Israel, 461, 467), or to its striking crest. This odd-looking word דִּיקִיפָּחַת is simply, apart from the final ה, a corruption (by transposition of letters) of ḥippōd, חִפּוֹד (Che.). That late Heb., Aram., and Arabic usage favour the rendering 'hedgehog' may be admitted; but 'zoologically there are considerable difficulties.' This discovery (as it seems) of ḥippōd in the list of unclean birds seems to show that Tristram, Houghton, and Cheyne (Proph. Is.⁽⁹⁾ 193 2 149; SBOT, Isaiah, Eng. 64) were right in preferring 'bittern' to 'hedgehog' as a rendering of חִפּוֹד. See BITTERN.

There is of course no connection with Sansk. kapōta, a kind of pigeon, regarded as a bird of ill omen (Acad. Dec. 25, '86).

HOPHNI (חֹפְנִי; οφνη[ε]) [BAL] b. Eli; brother of PHINEHAS [q.v.]; 1 S. 13 24 (εφνε[Α]), 4 4 11 17† (om BL). Hophni and Phinehas seem very much like Jabal and Jubal, as Goldziher should have noticed (Heb. Myth. 347 ff. [Mythos bei den Hebr. 232 ff.])—i.e., Hophni has been developed out of Phinehas. Add ח and the component letters of חֹפְנִי are complete. Possibly both have developed out of a third form (see PHINEHAS). We cannot isolate the name Hophni, and trust in Sabæan (cp, e.g., פִּנְחַס) and other seeming parallels.

HOPHRA (חֹפְרָא; ογαφρη [BNAQ]; αφρη [N*]; Vg. EPHREE; Aq. Theod. οφρη [accus.] Q margin [where σ(ύμμαχος): εκδοσ=εκδοσων],¹ Jer. 41 30† is mentioned as 'the king of Egypt' after the destruction of Jerusalem. He is identical with the king called merely 'Pharaoh' in Jer. 37 5 11 Ezek. 29 3 etc.

The name is transcribed ογάφρη by Manētho, ογάφρη (after Ⓞ) by Clem. Alex. 1 332, ἀπρίης by Herodotus and Diodorus. In Egyptian his names are Hā'ā'·ib·rē' (vulgar p·rē')²—i.e., 'glad is the heart of the sungod'—and Uah (=later uēh)·ib·(r)·rē',³ 'confident is the heart of the sungod' (the same name as Psameṭik I.). This latter name was evidently rendered both by the Greeks and by the Hebrews. Both have assimilated the ib to the following p. The Hebrew transcription is rather exact.

This king, the fourth (or, according to another reckoning, the seventh, see EGYPT, § 66) of the Saïte or twenty-sixth dynasty of Manētho, the son of Psameṭik II. (Psammis of Herodotus) and grandson of Necho, came to the throne about 589 or 588 B.C., and reigned according to Manētho (in Africanus) nineteen years, according to Herodotus and Eusebius 25 years (22

חֹפְרָא. The preceding 'Pharaoh' is wanting in most MSS of 15 (put in by codd. 22, 36 etc.), being taken for a doublet of Hophra.

HOR, MOUNT

Diodorus, 30 Jerome, 34 Syncellus). The monuments confirm the first number. He ruled, therefore, about 588-569 B.C. His reign fell in a very critical period, when Egypt was exposed to constant danger from Babylonia. Hophra seems to have shown energy both in building (traces in the chief temple of Memphis, in the Serapeum, at Sileh etc.), and in foreign politics. He even attempted to check the Babylonians. Thus, according to Herodotus (2 161), he conquered the Phœnicians ('Tyrus') at sea;¹ but most likely Herodotus only means that he sent assistance to the Tyrians in their long resistance to Nebuchadrezzar.

The (distorted?) statement of Herodotus, 'he led an army against Sidon,' refers evidently to the expedition planned with a view to succour besieged Jerusalem (Jer. 37 5 11). Hophra did indeed interrupt the siege for a short time; but, if Herodotus was not mistaken, we may assume Hophra's final defeat in the N. of Palestine. It does not seem that he took the offensive again after his repulse; but he gave an asylum to the many fugitives from Palestine in Egypt. Of the Babylonian attacks upon Egypt which we should naturally expect, we are ignorant; but so much is now certain—that Jeremiah's and Ezekiel's predictions of a conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadrezzar were not fulfilled.² A supposed military revolution at the S. frontier of Egypt is referred to elsewhere (EGYPT, § 69). From this we can imagine in what difficulties this unwarlike country was involved through having to sustain large battalions of foreign mercenaries. These difficulties led to Hophra's ruin. The account in Herod. 2 161 may be full of doubtful anecdotes, but is probably trustworthy in a general sense. The Egyptian (or rather Libyan) mercenaries sent against Battus of Cyrene to aid the Libyan chief Adikran revolted after two defeats. Apries and the European and Asiatic mercenaries at Momemphis were overpowered by Amasis II. ('Ahmose), who, according to Herod. (2 169), left the unfortunate king alive for some time, but at last permitted an infuriated mob to 'strangle' him.³ W. M. M.

HOR, MOUNT (הַר הָהָר, 'Hor the mountain').

1. (ωρ τὸ ὄρος [BAFL]), the scene of the death of Aaron (Nu. 20 22-27 21 44 33 37-41 Dt. 32 50† [all P]). In Nu. 33 37 the situation is defined as 'in the edge of the land of Edom,' and tradition, since Josephus, identifies it with the Jebel Nebi Hārīn (4800 ft.), a conspicuous double-topped mountain on the E. edge of the Wādy el-'Arabah, a little to the SW. of Petra. Trumbull (Kadesh-barnea, 127-139) refutes this view on grounds of 'revelation and reason'; critics, since Knobel, have taken the same view. Trumbull himself identifies Mt. Hor with the Jebel Madara, a conical mountain NW. of 'Ain Kādis (cp HALAK, MT.). Cp GUR-BAL, and WANDERING, WILDERNESS OF.

2. (τὸ ὄρος τὸ ὄρος [B; om. τὸ ὄρος 2nd in v. 7 AFL], in v. 8 τὸ ὄρος τὸ ὄρος), a point on the ideal N. boundary of Canaan, Nu. 34 7 f. (a post-exilic passage). According to Furrer (ZDPV 8 27 ff.) Hor is a term for N. Lebanon; but Van Kasteren thinks that it means the mountains where the Nahr Kāsīmiyeh bends upwards (Rev. Bib., '95, p. 28 f.). The Targums render Amanos or Amanon (= Amanna?). Unfortunately the existence of the northern 'Mt. Hor' is threatened by Halévy's practically certain restoration of הַרְרַח, 'Hadrach,' for MT's impossible reading, הַרְרָה, in Ezek. 47:15. In Nu. 34:8 f. we must obviously read הַרְרָה עַד הַרְרָה לְכֶם עַד הַרְרָה מִן הַיָּם הַגְּדוֹל הַחֲמָוִי לְכֶם עַד הַרְרָה תִּחְתְּוּ עַיִן לְבַטּוֹת הַקָּסָם, 'from the great sea ye shall draw a line for you as far as Hadrach; and from Hadrach ye shall draw a line.'

² The contrary has been often asserted; but merely on the basis of a vague statement of Bérössus, on a misinterpretation of the report on the rebellion of foreign mercenaries referred to above, and on two forged inscriptions relating to Nebuchadrezzar which had been brought to Egypt from Bagdad.

Di.'s proposal to read הַרְרָה, 'ye shall desire' (cp v. 10)—as if suggesting that the boundary was only desirable or ideal—is most improbable. In v. 10 we should read הַרְרָהּ.

HORAM (הֹרָם), king of Gezer, who sought to help Lachish, but was defeated and slain by Joshua, Josh. 10:33 (אֶלְעָזָר, אֶלְעָזָר [BA], אֶלְעָזָר [L]). The reading of 6 agrees with that which it gives for HOHAM.

HOREB (הֹרֵב), Ex. 33:6. See SINAI.

HOREM (הֹרֵם, or perhaps rather הֹרֵם, 'sacrosanct'; [μεγαλα]ραειμ [B], ωραμ [AL]), either the full name or the epithet of a city in Naphtali (Josh. 19:38). Van de Velde identified it with Hurrah, a little to the W. of Yārūn (see IRON). Guérin, however, and the PEF lists give the name as Kh. el-Kirah. For reasons against searching modern name-lists for an echo of Horem, see MIGDAL-EL.

T. K. C.

HOESH (הֹשֶׁה; 6^{RAL}, Jos. [H] καινη, i.e., הֹשֶׁה), according to RV^{MS}, Stade, Wellhausen, and others, the name of a place in the wilderness of Ziph (1 S. 23:15 f., 18 f.). Wellhausen would also read the name Hoesh in 1 S. 22:5 (but see HARETH). The reference in 1 S. 23 occurs in the account of David's last interview with Jonathan, and in the description of David's retreats among the Ziphites, and in the latter passage Hoesh (?) is co-ordinated, singularly enough, with the hill of Hachilah (?). This co-ordination is sometimes ascribed to an editor (see HACHILAH); but no one has doubted that both Hoesh (?) and Hachilah (?) were in the neighbourhood of Ziph. Hoesh is supposed (see FOREST, 1) to mean 'wood' or (comparing Ass. huru) 'mountain' (Del. Heb. Lang. 17). The meaning 'mountain' would be the more suitable for the narrative in 1 S. 23, for certainly the wilderness of Ziph was never thickly wooded (see ZIPH). It should be noticed, however, that Hoesh is not the name given in 1 S., but Hōrēshāb, and that experience warns us to look closely at the text when the locative ה is affixed to a proper name without any apparent reason (it is always בחרשה). Add to this that there is no certain evidence elsewhere for the existence of הֹשֶׁה in Hebrew.¹ It is extremely probable that Hōrēshāb (חרשה) is a corruption of ערבה; the intermediate stage is ברעה. A reference to 1 S. 23:24 will make this plain. There we have the statement that David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon in the Arābah, S. of the Jēshimōn. It may reasonably be held that in v. 19 the original question of the Ziphites was, 'Doth not David hide himself with us in the retreats in the Arābah?' The rest of the question in MT is, of course, an editorial insertion. The Ziphites were too clever to tell Saul precisely where David was hidden. The insertion is of interest to us just now as proving that the editor read בערבה, not בחרשה.²

Conder has identified the supposed Hoesh with the ancient site Hureisa, 1 m. S. of Ziph. Yet even if Hoeshah were genuine, it could hardly mean 'a village or hamlet belonging to the larger town at Tell Zif' (PEFQ, '95, p. 45).

T. K. C.

¹ On Is. 17:9 Ezek. 31:3 see Che. and Toy (SBOT). חרשים in 2 Ch. 27:4 is also corrupt; read either ערבים (cp Di. on Is. 15:7) or ערבו.

² When he made the insertion he had his eye on v. 24, where ערבה occurs, and therefore wrote 'south of' instead of 'fronting.' See HACHILAH.

HORMAH

HOR HAGIDGAD, RV Hor-haggidgad (הֹר הַגִּידְגָּד), 'the Hollow of Gidgad'; TO OPON ΓαδΓαδ [BA], T. O. Γα. Γα. [F], T. O. ΓαδΓαδ [L], Nu. 33:32 f.†, a station in the wilderness of WANDERING (g.v.); cp also GUDGODAH.

HORI (הֹרִי, הֹרִי), 1. (χορη[ε] [ADEL]). Son of Lotan, son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:22). Possibly a substitute for some lost clan name.

2. (σορη[ε] [BAF], σουρη [L]). Ancestor of the Simeonite Shaphat (Nu. 13:5). See SIMEON.

3. In Gen. 36:30 AV, RV 'the HORITES.'

HORITE (Gen. 36:20†), Horites (הֹרִים, הֹרִים, usually explained 'cave-dwellers,' 'Troglodytes'¹; but Jensen [Z.A., '96, p. 332] questions this; χορραιος, χορραι [ADEL]), the name given to the primitive population of Mt. Seir in Dt. 2:12 (AV Horims). It also occurs in Dt. 2:22 (AV Horims), Gen. 14:6 (χορδαιους [E]), and (virtually) Gen. 36:2 (for 'Hivite' read 'Horite') 20 f. 29 f.; and it should be restored in 36:2 (see 6), possibly too in 34:2 (6) in preference to הָרִי, if we take הָרִי to be a contraction of הָרִי = הָרִי another form of הָרִי. D. Haigh, Stern, and Hommel (AHT, 264, n. 2, 267) combine 'Hori' with the Eg. Haru, a name frequently applied to a part of Palestine, e.g., on the stèle of Merenptah (cp Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 121; WMM As. u. Eur. 137 148 f.), and Hommel identifies both with the land of Gar mentioned on the Amarna Tablets (but cp GUR-BAAL). WMM seems to be right in rejecting this view. 'Cave-dwellers' can only be justified if we interpret this (with WMM) as merely an epithet of the Seirites, or people of Mt. Seir. Cp Driver, Deut. 38; EDOM, § 3 end.

HORMAH (הֹרְמָה; 6^{RAL}), according to one statement was so called because the Israelites in fulfilment of a vow 'devoted' it to the hērem (הֹרֵם) or ban (Nu. 21:3; ἀναθεμα [BAFL]); according to another, it received its name when Simeon and Judah similarly devoted it (Judg. 1:17, ἀναθεμα [B], ἐξολοθρευτικ [AL]). This, however, is merely a literary etymology, and falls to the ground together with the misread name Hormah, which, as we shall see, appears to be a very old corruption.

Hormah was a city of Simeon (Josh. 19:4 1 Ch. 4:30, αραμα [L]) or Judah in the remote south (Josh. 15:30, εραμα [A], cp v. 21). David sent presents to its elders from ZIKLAG—i.e., Halasah (1 S. 30:30, ερεμμουθ [B], ραμμα [A]). Earlier still, a king of Hormah is mentioned among the kings of Canaan overcome by Joshua (Josh. 12:14, D⁽²⁾; εραμαθ [B]); we also hear of defeats inflicted on the Israelites by the Amalekites and Canaanites, which extended locally 'as far as (the) Hormah,' Nu. 14:45 (הורמה, see below; εραμαθ [B]); cp Dt. 1:44 'from Seir to Hormah' (Di., Dr. following 6). Two more references remain. According to the present text of Nu. 21:1-3 (J) the Canaanite king of ARAD (g.v.), who had at first defeated the Israelites, was at last overcome by them, on which occasion 'the name of the place (הַקְּרוֹת) was called Hormah.' From this it would appear as if Arad were the old name of Hormah, and yet we are told in Judg. 1:17 (see above) that its old name was ZEPHATH (g.v.). How is this to be accounted for? To suppose with Bachmann that the city was twice destroyed and re-named, seems absurd. Nor is it easy (though Dillmann, Wellhausen, and others adopt this expedient) to explain Nu. 21:3 as relating by anticipation the destruction by Simeon and Judah (Judg. 1:17), in which case the king of Arad must also have ruled over Zephath.

The simplest explanation is the boldest. In Nu. 21:1, for 'the king of Arad who dwelt in the Negeb' read '(the Canaanites) who dwelt in the Negeb of the Jerahmeelites.'³ The corruptions assumed are regular, and the whole passage receives a flood of light. It is highly probable that the writers of Judg. 17 Nu. 213 confound the names of two neighbouring places, which, being in the far south, they had never visited. The true name of the city of Hormah is probably Rahamah; it was apparently the chief town of the 'Negeb of the Jerahmeelites' (1 S. 30 29 f.). It is true קרחה occurs eight times; but there is evidence enough that at a very early date passages containing some remarkable word were systematically harmonized. For קרחה we should restore in all the passages except Judg. 17 Nu. 213, קרחה. The Wady Kulkhamā perpetuates the name (see JERAHMEEL).

T. K. C.

HORN (קַרְנִי, κερας). Nowhere perhaps is the necessity for looking closely into seeming trifles more apparent than here. The usual explanation is unquestionable in such passages as the following:—

1 S. 21, 'By Yahwè my horn is exalted'; Ps. 89 17 [18], 'By thy favour our horn is exalted'; Ps. 75 4 [5], 'Lift not up your horn'; Jer. 48 25, 'The horn of Moab is cut off' (cp Lam. 2 3). In such passages 'horn' symbolizes power, and its exaltation signifies victory (cp 1 K. 22 11) and deliverance (Lk. 1 69, 'horn of salvation', κέρας σωτηρίας). It will be remembered that in an oracle of Balaam the re'em, or wild ox, is the emblem of an invincible warrior (Nu. 23 22); cp also Dan. 7 7.

In other passages it will not suit.

1. When we read in Job 16 15, 'I have defiled my horn in the dust' (AV), or 'I have laid my horn in the dust,' we see that there must be something amiss with the text; the language is inappropriate. 'To lift up the horn' may be to increase in power, or to show a proud sense of greatness; but it is hardly safe to maintain, on the ground of a single doubtful passage, that to 'thrust it into the dust' (Dt.), or to defile it in the dust, is a Hebrew phrase for feeling the sense of deepest humiliation. In Hebrew idiom, people 'roll in the dust' themselves (Mic. 1 10), not their 'horn.' The remedy is to examine the text, and see what errors the scribe was most likely to have committed. There are in fact two very likely errors, by emending which we obtain the very suitable sense 'I have profaned my glory in the dust.'² There is a similar error in Am. 6 13; where the 'horns' appear through an error of interpretation of the first magnitude. 'Have we not taken to us horns?' should be, 'Have we not taken Karmaim?' Men can be said to 'lift up horns, not to take them. Travellers have sometimes illustrated the former phrase by the silver horn which was formerly worn on the head by Druse women in the Lebanon. This, however, is a mistake. The silver horn was simply an instrument for holding up the long veil worn in the Lebanon by married women.

2. The old painters, and Michael Angelo after them, represented Moses with two horns. Ultimately perhaps this may be traced to the two horns of Am(m)on, the god of the Egyptian Thebes, which were adopted by Alexander the Great on his coins (cp 'the two-horned' in the Koran, Sur. 18 85). The immediate cause, however, of this mode of representation is what we may safely regard as an error of the text in Ex. 34 29 (cp vz. 30, 35), where Vg. very naturally renders יְהִי קַרְנֵי עוֹר פְּנִי 'quod cornuta esset facies sua' (so too Aq., according to Jerome). Here the original reading must have been not קַרְנֵי, but קִרְנֵי, 'lightened.' It is usual, indeed, to say that קַרְנֵי means 'to radiate light' (ὅς δέδοξαται), and to compare Hab. 3 4, where AV has, 'His brightness was as the light; he had horns (coming) out of his hand,' but in mg., 'bright beams out of his side.' RV substitutes 'rays' for 'horns,' but truthfully records 'Heb. horns' in the margin. No doubt קִרְנֵי should be קִרְקִי, 'lightnings'; Hab. 3 is not an Arabic but a Hebrew poem. It is just possible, however, that Jerome's version 'that the face of Moses was horned' was influenced by the symbolism of Alexander's coins. It would be going rather too far off to compare the horns of the moon-god Sin, whose emblem was a crown or mitre adorned with horns, though G. Margoliouth has lately defended the very improbable reading just referred to by making this comparison, which seems to him to fit in admirably with the primitive worship of Sin recorded by the name Sinai.

3. That the term 'horn' can be used for a horn-shaped vessel, is intelligible (1 S. 16 13 1 K. 1 39). Such a phrase as 'horn of pigment for anointing the eyelashes' is therefore in itself possible. But was there ever a father in ancient legend who gave this name to his daughter, as Job is said to have done in MT of Job 42 14 (see KEREN-HAPPUCH)?

4. On the meaning of the expression 'the horns of the altar,' see ALTAR, § 6.

Whether the phrase has a right to stand in Ps. 118 27^b is extremely doubtful. Some (e.g., J. P. Peters) would place the passage in the margin as a ritual gloss, and if the text is correct, this is the best view; no ingenuity can avail to explain v. 27^b as a part of the text. For a critical emendation of the text³ based

HORNET (חַרְצֵף, σφηκία [BAL], CRABRO).

Strictly, the word hornet is applied to Vespa crabro; but it is often used for any large species of wasp. There are many species of these Hymenoptera in Palestine, but the most conspicuous is Vespa orientalis, which spreads from S. Europe through Egypt and Arabia to India. It is frequently very abundant. It builds its cells of clay, and they are, as a rule, very symmetrical and true.

The hornet is mentioned in the OT as the forerunner sent by Yahwè to destroy the two kings of the Amorites (Josh. 24 12, E or D₂), and to drive out the Hivites, Canaanites, and Hittites (Ex. 23 28 [E], Dt. 7 20; cp Wisd. 128, σφήξ, AV RV^{mg.} 'wasp'). The old identification of חַרְצֵף, sir'ah, with חַרְצֵף, 'leprosy,' may be passed over; the main question is whether 'hornet' is employed literally or figuratively. A metaphorical interpretation of the term (cp Lat. æstrus, 'panic,' properly 'gadfly') is not favoured by the passages quoted (cp especially Ex. 1 c.). On the other hand, a reference to the insect itself raises difficulties. Although the absence of any mention of the appearance of hornets (e.g., in Nu. 21 Josh. 2 f.) is not in itself an insuperable objection, the fact remains that the implied extent of their devastation is unique, indeed incredible.

Parallels have certainly been quoted as examples of the inconvenience caused by these and similar pests; but the cases adduced refer not to peoples but to the inhabitants of more circumscribed limits (towns, e.g., Megara, Ælian, 9 28; Rhacusa, Ælian, 17 35 [quoting Antenor of Crete]; cp Di., ad loc., and see Smith's DB (2) s.v.).

Further, hornets, though their attacks are furious, when their nests are disturbed, and are continued when the foe retreats, are not wont to attack unprovoked. Hence, for example, Furrer (ap. Riehm, HWB) expresses a doubt whether 'hornet' can be the true meaning of חַרְצֵף, and Che. (Crit. Bib.) proposes to emend the word into חַרְצֵף; cp Dt. 28 42, 'All thy trees and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume.' See LOCUST.

A new line must, at any rate, be taken. חַרְצֵף (if correct) seems to refer to some enemy who made an early inroad upon Canaan. Sayce (Early Hist. of Hebrews) ingeniously finds a reference either to the campaign of Rameses III. (p. 286) or to the Philistines (p. 292 f.), and in regard to the former it is noteworthy that the Egyptian standard-bearer wore among other emblems two devices apparently representing flies (see ENSIGN, § 3). But if we may lay stress upon the fact that the hornet does not attack unprovoked (see above), it is plausible to suggest a new rendering for חַרְצֵף—viz., 'serpent' (cp Ass. širu)—and see a reference to the uræus or sacred serpent on the crown of the pharaoh (cp Ode of Thotmes III., v. 11; Brugsch, Gesch. Äg. 354).¹ On the other hand, however, the reference may be to some local invasion which has been amplified by E or his informant. In this case a tribe, whose totem was some kind of serpent (cp ZORAH), may conceivably be intended.² A. E. S.—S. A. C.

HORONAIM (חֲרוֹנַיִם, Jer. 48 3, חֲרוֹנִים, Jer. 48 34, ὠρῶναϊμα [BNAQ], cp. [N in v. 3]), a place in Moab; the 'descent of Horonaim' (חֲרוֹנַיִם מוֹרֵד, EN ὠλσ ὠλ ωρωναίμ [αρ. N*, op. Nc.a] is mentioned in Jer. 48,5, and the 'way of Horonaim' (יָמֵי הַיַּרְדֵּן הַזֶּה, [TH] 0Δω ΔΡΩΝΙΕΙΜ [BNQF], O. ωρωναίμ [Qm.], T. O. ΔΔΩΝΙΕΙΜ [A]) in Is. 15.5. The former phrase is illustrated by Meshah's statement (inscr. U. 31 f.) that he 'went down' to Horonēu (חררנן). Horonaim is nowhere mentioned as an Israelite city, which confirms the natural inference from Is. 15.5 that it was near the S. border of Moab, on one of the roads leading down from the Moabite plateau to the Jordan valley. Buhl (272 f.) thinks of some ruins near the Wady ed-Derā'a (W. Kerak); but these are described as insignificant. Josephus states that Horonaim was one of the places in Moab conquered by Alexander Jannæus (Ant. xiii. 154 xiv. 14). That SANBALLAT [q.v.] had any connection with the place has been shown to be improbable. On 'Horonaim' for the two Beth-horons, see BETH-HORON. T. K. C.

¹ The reference to the uræus, and the Ode of Thotmes, is due to Prof. Cheyne, who compares Is. 15 9, but on the whole inclines to suspect corruption of the text (see above).

² One recalls the classical legends of races that were led to their seats by a bird or animal. That such creatures were originally totems is in the highest degree probable (see Lang, Myth, Ritual and Religion [99], 295). For a parallel to the theory of a totem-ensign suggested above see M'Lennan, Studies, 2nd ser. 301 (on the serpent as a totem see ib. 521 f.).

HORSE (כֶּסֶד, ἵππος, see below). Many interesting points arise in connection with references to the horse (equus, caballus) in the Bible. The philologist will find scope for all his keenness in dealing with the names of the horse; the historical student will gather valuable facts illustrating political and religious history. That the horse is one of the most important factors in a people's growth, appears once more from the OT literature, for though the prophets spoke strongly against its use, civilization could not be held back. A late prophetic writer predicts that the flock of Judah (the Jews) will become like 'finest horses' in battle (Zech. 10.3), and one of the most fervently religious of the 'wise men' gives us an unsurpassable picture of the war-horse (see § 2 end). The following Hebrew words come under consideration.

1. כֶּסֶד, sūs (Ass. sīšū, Eg. sesmet [see EGYPT, § 9 n.],

1. Names. Aram. כֶּסֶד, origin unknown), Gen. 49:17 Ex. 9:3 14:9 23 15:1 19 21 and often.

In Gen. 47:17 there is a confusion in the text. 'Horses and asses' should come together as in Ex. 9:3 at the close. In Ex. 14:9 כֶּסֶד should be rendered 'all chariot-horses' (see 2). Just so in Ass. sīšū is a general term for horses; but add rihābi, and the phrase means 'chariot-horses.' In Cant. 1:9 (RV) the bridegroom compares the bride to 'a steed in Pharaoh's chariots' (כֶּסֶד, with old 'construct' form); but the figure does not suit the context, and the termination י is suspicious. Not a 'mare' (Margolouth), but 'grape-clusters' (in Solomon's vineyards) are probably meant; cp 8:11 f. and see Che. Crit. Bib. (AV 'a company of horses'; RVmg. 'the steeds'; ḡ imos; equitatus).

2. פָּרָשׁ, pārāš (in Syr., Ar., Eth., 'horse'; hence Spanish alfaraz, Mid. Lat. farius, etc.).

Not found in the sing. in this sense; 2 but this may be accidental. We certainly want a word for 'riding-horse' = Ass. biḥallu. The plur. should be פָּרָשִׁים; MT's פָּרָשִׁים presupposes the sense 'horsemen' (ḡ imnoi, but also ḡ imoi). In 1 S. 8:11 1 K. 4:26 [56] Is. 28:28 (interpolated; not in ḡ) Joel 2:4 פָּרָשִׁים, 'horses,' can hardly be explained away, and Haupt (Isaiah, Heb. SBOT 122 f.) recognises it in Is. 21:9. To read פָּרָשִׁים, 'mules,' would be too bold; to render 'horsemen' is not at all plausible. Schwally's decision (ZATW 8:19 n.) must be reversed.

3. אַבְדִּיר, 'abdir, 'strong one,' poetically (cp CATTLE, § 2 d); Jer. 8:16 47:3 50:11 (ḡ ταύρου) Judg. 5:22 (? see JQR 10:566).

4. רֶכֶשׁ, rekēš, Mic. 1:13 (see LACHISH), 1 K. 4:28 [58] (ḡ ἀρμασιν, reading רכב), Esth. 8:10 (om. ḡ) 14

1 Read כֶּסֶד הַיָּרְדֵּן (or יָרְדֵּן).

2 In Ezek. 26:10 פָּרָשׁ comes probably from פָּרָשׁ, a variant of שַׁפְּעוֹת (Che. cp v. 11). Read יָרְדֵּן וְיָרְדֵּן (cp 23:24). Co. doubts פָּרָשׁ, but omits to explain its presence in MT and ḡ. Observe, however, that ḡBA renders ἵππων, not ἵππων (ḡ).

HORSE

(BN*A om.; τῶν ὀπλῶν [Nc.a mg.]); 'swift beast'; RV 'swift steed'; AV in Esth. 'mule,' cp Syr.

אֲמָלָה, Esth. 8:10, possibly 'herds of horses' (cp אֲמָלָה), RV 'bred of the stud' (AV, RVmg. 'young dromedaries').

The word is not explained in the Lexicons. Considering, therefore, that אֲמָלָה and אֲמָלָה (though confounded by ḡ in Nu. 16:32) cannot plausibly be connected, and that rakisu in the Ass. phrase cited elsewhere (LACHISH) never appears by itself in the sense of horse, we must take an entirely new course.

If it is true that the term אֲמָלָה = Ass. subiru (some kind of costly animal, a variety of the horse or perhaps of the camel) has (no doubt rightly) been restored for אֲמָלָה in 1 K. 10:28 (see MIZRAIM), and in the plural compound phrase אֲמָלָה אֲמָלָה, in Ezek. 27:20 (see CLOTH, n.), and in the phrase אֲמָלָה אֲמָלָה, in Esth. 8:10 we cannot doubt that for אֲמָלָה, in the four passages in which it occurs, we should read אֲמָלָה (Exp. T. Dec. '99).

6. Another naturalised Assyrian term is murnishē (murnishē), i.e., perhaps 'splendid young (horses)'; so Del. Ass. HVB 473 b; cp 391 b. See also KB 2:134 l. 53, 140 l. 46; and Houghton, TSBA 5:51 ('77). Not improbably this should be restored in (a) 1 K. 10:25, 2 Ch. 9:24 (Cook, Exp. T. 10:279 f. [March, '99]), (b) for אֲמָלָה in Esth. 8:10 14 (Che. Exp. T., Aug. '99), but cp CAMEL, § 1, n. 1, and (c) Gen. 41:43, see JOSEPH, § 6.

The horse was kept in a stall (אֲמָלָה or אֲמָלָה, see BDB), and fed upon barley and straw (1 K. 4:26 28 [56 8]). It was controlled by a bit (רֶכֶשׁ); cp

2. OT references. חֲלִיבֹתָסִים Jas. 3:3, and bridle (חֲבַת), and urged on by a whip (שֹׁטֵף). The hoof is likened to a flinty rock (Is. 5:28)—a sudden sting in the heel (עֲקָב) from the lurking scorpion unseats the rider (Gen. 49:17).

Whether its 'harness' is really referred to by נֶשֶׁק in 2 Ch. 9:24 (AV) is doubtful (see WEAPONS); nor can we safely make Ezekiel speak of 'saddle-cloths' (Co.) in Ezek. 27:20 (see above). On Zech. 14:20, see BELLS.

Passing over the references to the horse in symbolical phraseology, and its association with religious cults (see § 4), we turn to the use of the horse among the Hebrews. Like the Assyrians they never used it for draught purposes (the text of Is. 28:28 is faulty; see Du., Che. SBOT). Nor can we assume that the horse was used to any extent for riding purposes in pre-exilic times. The mention of a king's horse for state occasions, and of a royal stud (if RV's 'bred of the stud' for אֲמָלָה is admitted) occurs first in the Persian period (Est. 6:8 8:10 14).

The horse known to the Hebrews was a war-horse. As such it excited mingled admiration and awe. Its strength (cp § 1 3 אַבְדִּיר) and swiftness (Hab. 1:8 Jer. 4:13) seemed almost supernatural, so that the early prophets complained that it was more regarded by politicians than the God of Israel himself (Is. 30:16 Ps. 207 [8] 33:17 147:10). The Hebrews marked its fiery trampling (שֹׁטֵף Jer. 47:3 f.), its rushing and stamping (רָרָה Nah. 3:2 Judg. 5:22 [doubtful]), and its eagerness for the fray (Jer. 8:6). The finest expression of Jewish sentiment, however, is to be found in Job 39:19-25. The delighted wonder with which the poet describes the war-horse appeals to modern readers.

1 Most connect the רֶכֶשׁ of MT with Syr. رَكش (a loan-word from old Pers.?). But Persisms are not to be accepted where an Ass. or Bab. origin is defensible. כ and ח, and כ and ח are easily confounded. ח רכב in Esth. 8:10 is therefore to be cancelled as a doublet.

2 That the forgotten word murnishē was corrupted, first by misarrangement of letters, and then by confusion of letters and editorial manipulation, so that a seemingly Persian word (cp אֲמָלָה Ahasuerus) arose, is intelligible. א is an editorial prefix; ח = כ, ש = ט, ח = ט; the rest is clear (Che.).

The text is not in perfect order, and in vs. 19 f. a slight disarrangement seems to have occurred, which Duhm rectifies thus:

Givest thou strength to the horse—
His resounding, terrible snorting?
Dost thou clothe his neck with a mane,¹
And cause it to spring like the locust?

The fact that the horse of the Hebrews is a war-horse shows that its introduction among them was not of early date. For its original home we must look outside the regions occupied by the Semitic and Egyptian civilisations.

The horse was not known in Egypt before the time of the Hyksos (EGYPT, § 9; Masp. Dawn of Civ. 32 n. 2, Struggle of the Nations, 51 n. 4). It is first depicted in the time of Amenhotep I., and appears among the presents sent to Egypt by Burnaburiaš of Karduniaš (Anu. Tab. 10 rev. 12). Upon the monuments of Assyria the horse appears very frequently, and the care bestowed on its appearance (mane, tail and trappings) shows how much it was valued. 'The whole animal was more fitted for war-purposes than for those requiring speed.' They are 'not represented drawing carts, or carrying baggage of any kind.'² Like the Egyptians, the Assyrians no doubt obtained their horses from N. Mesopotamia,³ where, in turn, they were introduced from Central Asia, whose plains and steppes seem to have been one of the earliest homes of the horse.

The Amarna Tablets give evidence of the presence of the horse in Palestine. Feudal princes, Aziru, Rib-addi, Milkili, and others of the N. of Canaan beg for chariots and horses from the Egyptian king. Abd-milki of Šasjimi, and Amayaši, on the other hand, offer to furnish them to the king. The region around Jerusalem being unsuitable for chariots, Abd-hiba makes no mention of them, and asks only for troops. The odd phrase, 'servant of thy horses' (karlabbi, kuzi, or gusi sista), perhaps to be taken literally, is used by Japahi of Gezer, Jabnilu of Lachish, Pu-addi of Wurza and others (see KB. 5 nos. 224, 243).

The earlier OT narratives vouch for the use of this noble animal among Egyptians, Philistines, and non-Israelite tribes of the N.; but it was long before the Israelites attempted to supply their own deficiency of horses. Apart from a few untrustworthy passages (2 S. 84 15; 1 K. 15)⁴ horses do not appear as in use among the Hebrews until the time of Solomon (1 K. 426 [56]), who, it is stated, imported them in large quantities, with the result that in the following centuries they were not unfrequently employed in war by both Judah and Israel (see CHARIOT, § 5).

That the horse was not commonly used appears further from there being no mention of it in the earlier legal literature. It finds no place in the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 21 f.); it is not mentioned even in the tenth commandment (Ex. 20 17 Dt. 5 21). It appears first in D's code, where the king of Israel is forbidden to multiply horses (Dt. 17 16). The warning is aimed partly against the foreign intercourse which rendered easy the introduction of heathenish cults (see below, § 4), and partly against alliances with Egypt.

The Hebrews obtained their horses indirectly from Egypt (Is. 31 13 Ezek. 17 15), or Assyria (Hos. 14 3 [4]), doubtless by hiring mercenaries; but more frequently through the Tyrians who traded directly with Armenia (Ezek. 27 14, see TOGARMAH), and the adjacent regions of Kué (E. of Cilicia), and Mušri (N. Syria, S. of the Taurus).⁵ The whole region in question has been famed for horses from the earliest times, and to a Hebrew prophet no description of an invader from the N. seems to be complete without a reference to its horses and horsemen (Jer. 47 3 50 42 Ezek. 26 7 10

⁴ 2 S. 8 is late (see SAMUEL II., § 4). As for 2 S. 15 1, there is no further reference to horses in Absalom's revolt; he himself rode a mule (189). See also ARMY, § 4. The mule or ass continued to be the ordinary animal for riding purposes, even for royal persons (2 S. 13 29), and upon state occasions (1 K. 1 33 f.).

38 4 15). The horse of the ancient Hebrew was probably similar to the lusty, stalwart animal depicted upon the Assyrian monuments. The gentler and more domesticated 'Arab' steed, which has derived its name from the country in which it has been bred for centuries, does not seem to have been introduced until about the beginning of the Christian era.¹

The horse is a favourite image in symbolical language (cp Zech. 18 f. 6 1 f. Rev. 6 2 f. 19 11 f.; and see CHARIOT, § 13).

Evidence for the worship of the horse among the Semites (except as a borrowed cult) hardly exists. It is true the Quran supposes Yā'ūs to have had the form of a horse; but another explanation is more probable (Kin. 208 f., We. Heid. (2) 22 f.). An instance is quoted of the worship of the horse by an Arabian tribe in Bahrein; but its name alone (the Asbadhūyūn) seems rather to point to a Persian origin of the worship (from the Pers. asp, 'horse'). Horse-worship appears to be implied in the Phœnician name ענירסס (CST 168 115).

The horse, especially as related to sun-worship (CHARIOT, § 13), was worshipped in Armenia, Persia, etc.² Horses were sacrificed to the sun at Mt. Taletum, a peak of Taygetus (Paus. iii. 20 4), and annually thrown into the sea for a similar purpose at Rhodes. Considerable interest, therefore, attaches itself to the unique notice of the bronze horses and chariots of the sun which Josiah burned in the course of his reforms (2 K. 23 11). This cult, obviously of foreign origin, was probably introduced at the same time as the horse, and from the same quarter. The Hebrews being unaccustomed to the care of horses, foreigners would be required to tend them, and their presence would facilitate the spread of this particular worship. D's enactment regarding the horse thus appears in a clearer light. In 2 K. 11 16 reference is made to the way along which the horses were brought from the palace to the temple, alluding perhaps to their being regularly sacrificed upon the altar. HORSE-LEECH (עלוקה, 'ālūkhā, 'sucker'; ἄλελλα [BNAC]; SANGUISUGA) or EV HORSE-LEACH (Pr. 30 15) [ἄ 24 50].

The passage runs, 'the horse-leech hath two (thrae, ἄλελλα daughters (crying) Give, give' (so EV; cp Toy). This rendering is supported by ἄ, by the Ar. alakh, which is used in the present day to denote a species of leech, and also by the passage in the Talm. 'Abōdāh Zārāh, 17 b, where a warning is given against drinking water from a river or pool for fear of the עלוקה טקנה—i.e., the danger of swallowing a leech. The voracity of the horse-leech is proverbial; cp the Targ. on Ps. 128 [9], where oppressors are compared to the עלוקה which sucks the blood of men.

Both the horse-leech, Hæmofis (Aulastomum) gulo, and the medicinal leech, Hirudo medicinalis, are common in the streams and fresh waters of Palestine. The former, which is indigenous in Europe and N. Africa, has thirty teeth or serrations on its jaws, by means of which it punctures the skin, and it adheres to the surface of the wound with the greatest tenacity by means of the sucker which surrounds its mouth. In the East a species of Limnatis, of small size, also occurs in the same pools as H. gulo. Both cause much trouble to man and cattle. They are taken into the mouth with the drinking-water and attach themselves to the back of the throat, and there cause loss of blood.

The natural history explanation of 'ālūkhā is not, however, the only one, and the mythological interpretation is perhaps preferable (see LILITH and VAMPIRE). A. E. S.—S. A. C.

NE. of Acre (PEEM 146 153; cp Baed.⁽⁹⁾ 306). If, however, we accept 'Hosah,' it is tempting to connect it with the 'Osu in Seti I.'s list of conquered places (WMM As. u. Eur. 194), the Ušū of the Assyrian inscriptions (see, e.g., KB 291; G. Smith, Hist. of Assurbanipal, 281; Am. Tab. 15318).

Ušū was certainly by the sea, and had within its walls reservoirs, on which the island-city relied for its water-supply (cp Sayce, Pat. Pal. 128 f. 1, Maspero, Hist. anc.⁽⁴⁾ 185). It appears probable (as Prašek first suggested; see Es. 11) that Ušū was the Assyrian form of the name of the old city of Tyre on the mainland; and if, with Smend (Riehm's HVB⁽¹²⁾ 1720), we may explain the phrase 'the fenced city of Tyre' (Josh. 1929) of the island-city, and accept the statement of Strabo (16758) that the so-called Palætyrus was thirty stadia S. of the island-city at the modern Râs el 'Ain (see TYRE), it is not impossible to identify Hosah with Ušū, as Sayce (Crit. Mon. 429) and Moore (Judges, 51) suggest. The Papyrus Anastasi I. speaks of the 'land of Ušū,' so that Ušū-Hosah would be a well-defined boundary. The Ušûs (of Philo of Byblus), whom Porter in Smith's DB (following Kn. and Di.) compares with the biblical Esau, seems to be really a personification of Ušū.¹—On Josh. 1928 f. see RAMAH (6).

According to MT, his charge was 'by the gate of Shallecheth,' which critics have unwisely retained. Both in Is. 613 and here וּסְסָה is very doubtful. Read here וּסְסָה '(of) the chambers' (of the temple-ministers, 1 Ch. 926). וּסְסָה, [טוֹן] παστοφορίου (טוֹן). In v. 18 (which, in וּסְסָה, is almost an exact repetition of v. 16 f.) the name appears as וּסְסָה [B] or וּסְסָה [A].

HOSANNA (Ὠσαννά, Ti.; Ὠσαννά, Treg. WH. Note the variations of D, οσσανα*, ωσσανα bis, item 15 [in Mt.], οσσανα*, ωσσανα. [in Mk.], οσσανα, ωσσανα. [in Jn.]; Evang. sec. Hebr., ap. Hieron., Ep. 20 ad Dam., Osanna barrama, i.e., Osanna in excelsis. Pesh., Syr. Curet., Syr. Sin. אֹסַנְנָא; Syr. Jer. אֹסַנְנָא).

The cry of praise of 'those that went before and those that followed' at the last entry of Jesus into Jerusalem (Mt. 219 Mk. 119 f. Jn. 1213), and afterwards of the children in the temple (Mt. 2115). Twice (Mk. 119 Jn. 1213) it stands by itself; twice (Mt. 219 15) it is combined with the dative ('to the Son of David'), and twice (Mt. 219 Mk. 1110) it is followed by 'in the highest.' We must not begin by assuming that 'Hosanna' means ὠσανω δὴ (Theophylact), i.e., 'save now'; the signification of the term can only be gathered from the gospels. Now, the gospel narratives are not favourable to the interpretation 'save now.' If a doubt be permissible whether τῷ υἱῷ Δαυείδ, 'to the son of David,' may not be a too literal translation of לְבִן דָּוִד (הוֹשַׁעְיָנָא)—a legitimate Hebrew phrase (cp Ps. 724 8616 11616),—yet ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις, 'in the highest,' seems quite incapable of being joined to 'Hosanna,' if this term is really an ejaculation meaning 'Save now.' As Dalman remarks (Die Worte Jesu, 1181), Mt. (and surely we may add, Mk.) cannot have understood ωσ. ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις otherwise than in Ps. 1481 (ὧ αἰεὶτε αὐτὸν ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις—i.e., of the praise rendered to God by the angels. Lk. (1937 f.) supports this view. He says that the multitude 'began to rejoice and to praise God with a loud voice,' and closes the popular song with the words ἐν ὑψίστοις ἐλόγηθη καὶ δόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις.

These are not, however, the only difficulties which attend the still prevalent view that Hosanna, or Osanna, is derived from הוֹשַׁעְיָנָה, 'save now,' in Ps. 11825 (see below). A careful reading of Ps. 118 will show that it was by no means the most natural psalm for the multitude instinctively to quote from, especially as it was not then the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, to which this psalm was appropriated. Nor is it unimportant to remark that the psalmist's reference in Ps. 11825 is not to the Son of David, but to the assembled congregation whose mouthpiece he is. To these objections the present writer knows no satisfactory answer. Few, at any rate, will agree with Wünsche (Erläuterungen der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrash, 241) that in Mt. 218, 'it is beyond doubt that either the Feast of Passover is confounded with that of Tabernacles, or else the narrator has intentionally transferred to the former festival a ceremony properly belonging to the latter.'

In order to advance further, we must gently criticise the narrative of the entry into Jerusalem. No reference is made to this 'triumphal entry' (as it is usually called) in the accounts of the trial of Jesus, and it does not seem in accordance either with his spiritual interpretation of his Messiahship, or with his clear anticipation of the bitter end which was approaching. Dalman has already found the view of Wellhausen (IIG⁽⁸⁾, 381, n. 2) acceptable, that the facts connected with the entry of Jesus received a distinctly Messianic colouring at a later day; and when we look at the narrative of Mt., we find that its second section abundantly suffices as a description of the way in which the Christ (as since Cæsarea Philippi we may call him) made his arrival known to the poor and distressed. He went, we are told (Mt. 2112 f.) into the temple, cast out those that sold and bought there, and healed the blind and the lame (for whom there was now room), and thereupon the very children cried aloud, saying, 'Hosanna to the Son of David.' (Were they, literally, the blind and the lame? were they, literally, children?) The chief priests and scribes, indeed, were 'sore displeased,' but Jesus reminded them of the words of the Psalm (823), 'Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise' (ὧ κατηγοροῦσθε αὐτὸν).

This quotation may, perhaps, as Nestle has pointed out, enable us to account for the introduction into the gospel narrative (which has obviously been amplified) of the obscure word ωσαννα. The Hebrew text of Ps. 823 has וְכַח, 'strength,' or possibly 'praise' (hence ὧ's αἰνον). The Tg., more literal than ὧ, renders this by אֹסַנְנָא, āsnā ('strength'). The question arises whether the tradition that Jesus defended the songs of praise to God into which the simple-hearted children ('boys,' τοὺς παῖδας) broke by a reference to Ps. 823 may not have suggested to a pre-canonical evangelist to put the words 'Strength' (i.e., praise) be ascribed to the son of David' into the mouth of the children as a short hymn. He himself read the OT in the Targum, and he introduced the significant word āsnā from the Targum into the children's hymn. The right form of the word will then be Osanna (strictly, Osen[n]a; the final a however has a retro-active assimilating force), not Hosanna. For the double n, if accepted, cp Πεβεκκα for רַבֵּקָה, Βοσορρα for בִּצְרָה, Μαθεκκα or Ματεκκα for חַתְּקָה.

Apart from the difficulties here mentioned, the best explanation of Hosanna is that of Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, 1182; cp Gramm. 198). It may conceivably have come from חָשַׁן, a shortened form of חָשִׁיעָה, 'save now.' This phrase was in liturgical use among the later Jews (see TABERNACLES, FEAST OF). Keim (Jesus von Naz. 391, n. 3) remarks truly, that Merx's explanation of Osanna from Aram. אֹסַ'נָּא, 'deliver us,' agrees neither with Ps. 118²⁵ nor with the following dative.

It is worth reminding the reader that when a passage of a psalm or a prophecy is clearly unsuitable to the context, we are justified in considering the possibility of interpolation or corruption. Interpolation seems to be the theory called for to account for Ps. 118²⁶, 'Blessed in the name of Yahwê be he that enters! we bless you from the house of Yahwê.' It is not less probable that the original form of v. 25 has been turned by transcriptional error. Probably we should correct thus,—

Our Redeemer is Yahwê; he has succored us;

Our Redeemer is Yahwê; he has prospered us.

Duhm, it is true, adheres to the MT of v. 25, and retains v. 26 as a part of Ps. 118, but without showing how v. 25 f., thus read, fit into the context. He holds that חָשִׁיעָה (rendered in his metrical version 'Hosanna') was an ancient ritual exclamation. For this he refers to Jer. 22⁷, 'In the time of their trouble they will say, Arise, and save us,' but חָשִׁיעָה is no ritual formula, and even if it were, it is a long way off from אֹסַ'נָּא. In fact, if it favours any of the current views of the origin of אֹסַ'נָּא, it is that which is now seldom defended, viz. that אֹסַ'נָּא comes from Aram. אֹסַ'נָּא, 'save us.'

Thayer (in Hastings, DB 2419), whose name deservedly carries great weight, refers to the obscurity of the true 'etymological meaning' of Hosanna in many patristic writings. Even Clem. Alex. (Pæd. 15 12) says that it means φῶς καὶ δόξα καὶ αἶψος, while Suidas 'or his annotator' defines it εὐφροσύνη καὶ δόξα, and adds that ὁσῶν δῆι is, by some, incorrectly given as the meaning. Augustine too (De Doctr. Christ. 2 11, and Tract. in Johan. 512) says that Hosanna is only a joyous interjection, and, carrying on this tradition, our own Anglo-Saxon versions render it 'Hail.' As a rule, we should not attach much importance to these authorities. When, however, we find their view confirmed by the early Christian doxological use (Didaché, 106; HE ii. 239), we may be excused for preferring the unsophisticated judgments of Clement and Augustine to the less penetrating though more erudite statement of Jerome (Ep. xx ad Damasum). The 'Glossæ Colbertine' combine the two views, אֹסַ'נָּא, δόξα, ὁσῶν δῆι, with which we may contrast Jerome's 'Osanna, salvifica' in the Liber interpretationis (OS 204 50 62 29).

According to Ewald, the words of the popular cry in Mt. 219, Mk. 119 f. are an 'Urlied des Christenthums'; Dean Stanley too, calls it the 'earliest hymn of Christian devotion' (cp HVMNS). But, as we have seen, Mt., and Mt. alone, gives the earliest summary of the Messianic song on the entry of Jesus, viz. אֹסַ'נָּא רַבּי בְּרִיךְ אֱלֹהֵי דָּוִד, 'Praise to the son of David.' The song was added to by Mt. himself, and still further by Mk. (cp also Lk. and Jn.); and is said (by all the evangelists) to have been uttered while Jesus was in the public way. It was originally an inspired outburst of the praise and gratitude of children, or perhaps rather of child-like believers; it became under the hands of the evangelists the acclamation of a multitude, either of Jerusalemites, or (Lk.) of disciples, or (Jn.) of pilgrims who had come up for the feast.

T. K. C.

HOSEA (חֹשֶׁעָה; ὠσηε [BAQ]; OSEE), the son of Bēḥri, the first in order of the minor prophets. The name ought rather to be written Hōshēā, and is identical with that borne by the last king of Ephraim, and by Joshua in Nu. 13¹⁶ Dt. 32⁴⁴. Of the life of Hosea we know nothing beyond what can be gathered from his prophecies. That he was a citizen of the northern kingdom appears from the whole tenor of the book, but most expressly from 12, where 'the land,' the prophet's land, is the realm of Israel, and from 75, where 'our king' is the king of Samaria.

The date at which Hosea flourished is given in the title (1x) by the reigning kings of Judah and Israel.

1. Date: editorial note. He prophesied, it is said, (1) in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; (2) in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel. As Jeroboam II. died in the lifetime of Uzziah, these two determinations of the period of Hosea's prophetic activity are not strictly coincident, and a question arises whether both are from the same hand or of equal authority.

There is no doubt that the second date (Jeroboam II.) rests upon 14, where the downfall of the dynasty of Jehu is threatened, which justifies the inference that the incidents in the domestic life of the prophet described in chap. 1 had taken place before the death of Jeroboam. On the other hand it seems equally certain that chaps. 4-14 are in their present form a continuous composition dating from the period of anarchy subsequent to that king's death. Thus it might seem natural to suppose, with Ewald and other scholars, that the name of Jeroboam originally stood in a special title to chaps. 1-3 (which are closely connected), which was afterwards extended to a general heading for the whole book by the insertion of the words 'of Uzziah . . . and in the days of.' As Hosea himself can hardly be supposed to have thus converted a special title into a general one, the scholars who take this view suppose further that the date by Judæan reigns was added by a later hand, the same perhaps that penned the identical date in the title to Isaiah.

According to the view just described, the Judæan date merely expresses knowledge on the part of some

2. Internal indications. Hebrew scribe that Hosea was a contemporary of Isaiah. The plausibility of this hypothesis is greatly increased by the fact that there does not appear to be anything in the book of Hosea that is clearly as late as the reign of Hezekiah. On the contrary, the latter part of the book seems to have been written before the expedition of Tiglath-pileser against Pekah in the days of Ahaz.

In that war Gilead and Galilee were conquered and depopulated (2 K. 15 29); but Hosea repeatedly refers to these districts as still forming an integral part of the kingdom of Israel (5 1 68 12 11 [12]). Assyria is never referred to as a hostile power. It is a dangerous ally, from which some of the godless Ephraimites were ready to seek the help which by another party was expected from Egypt (but cp MIZRAIM, § 26), but in truth was to be found only in Yahwê (5 13 7 11 8 9 10 6 [14 3 4]).

The picture given in the book thus agrees precisely with what we read in 2 K. 15 of the internal dissensions which rent the northern kingdom after the fall of the house of Jehu, when Menahem called in the Assyrians to help him against those who challenged his pretensions to the throne.

Under Pekah of Israel, and Ahaz his contemporary in Judah, the political situation was altogether changed. Israel was in alliance with Damascus, and Assyria made open war on the allies (2 K. 16). This new situation may be said to mark a crisis in the history of OT prophecy, for to it we owe the magnificent series of Isaiah's Assyrian discourses (Is. 7 ff.). The events which stirred Judæan prophets so deeply, however, have left no trace in the book in which Hosea sums up the record of his teaching. He foresees that captivity and desolation lie in the future; but nowhere in Hosea do we find the Assyrians spoken of otherwise than as a people to whom Israel looks for help and victory.

The traditional chronology of the kings of Judah and Israel is notoriously precarious. A comparison of the Assyrian monuments and eponym lists with the biblical data makes it probable that the period from the accession of Zachariah, son of Jeroboam II., to the fall of Samaria must be shortened by as much as twenty years, and that the interregnum which was commonly supposed to have followed Jeroboam's death must be cancelled. This correction may be held to remove one difficulty in the title of our book, which on the current chronology assigns to Hosea some sixty years of prophetic activity. On the other hand, most Assyriologists agree that the expedition of Sennacherib took place in 701 B.C. In that case Hezekiah did not come to the throne till after the fall of Samaria, which the book of Hosea predicts as a future occurrence (13 16 [14 1])—another argument against the authority of the title. There is still, however, a large element of uncertainty in the reconstruction of Hebrew chronology by the aid of monuments.

One date bearing on our book may be taken as certain—viz. the war of Tiglath-pileser with Pekah in 734—and, according to our argument, Hosea committed his prophecies to writing before that year.¹

A more exact determination of the date of the book has been sought by comparing 89 f. with the statement on the monuments that Tiglath-pileser received tribute from King Menahem (Minhimmi) of Samaria in 738 B.C. That Minhimmi of the monuments is the Menahem of the OT there seems no good reason to doubt, in spite of the objections of Oppert and G. Smitb; but it cannot be assumed that tribute was paid by him in 738 for the first time. The narrative in 2 K. 15 19 seems to indicate that the relations of Menahem to Assyria began earlier

perhaps not long after his accession, which may be dated with probability circa 742 B.C.¹

To sum up, the first part of Hosea's prophetic work, of which we read in 1-3, falls (partially at least) in the years immediately preceding the catastrophe. 3. Conclusion: strophe of the house of Jehu in or origin of superscription near the year 743. The second part of the book is a summary of prophetic teaching during the subsequent troublous reigns of Menahem and of Pekahiah his successor, and must have been completed before 734 B.C.

The conclusion thus gained from the book itself as to the date of the prophet is not favourable to the hypothesis of Ewald and others, with which we began, as to the origin and importance of the title.

Of the four kings of Judah not only Hezekiah but also Ahaz, who did not ascend the throne till 734, is incorrectly included in 1, and the assumption that Hosea himself at 1:1 affixed a date—that of Jeroboam—but failed to place a similar date at the head of chap. 4, although a new period was now being dealt with, sounds highly improbable, quite apart from the consideration that from the prophet one would rather expect no date at all than a defective one.

Besides this, the form of the superscription presents difficulties. 'The word of Yahwé that came to Hosea the son of Beeri' is by no means very appropriate to the narrative chapters 1 and 3, and, so far as the remaining chapters are concerned, such a heading is intelligible only from the post-Deuteronomic period, which identified the written prophetic word with the word of Yahwé. On the analogy of Am. 1:1 and Jer. 1:1, it is therefore to be conjectured that the old superscription may have run somewhat thus: 'words of Hosea the son of Beëri' (הוֹשֵׁעַ בֶּן-בְּעֵרִי), where it is to be observed that רְבִי may also have borne the more general meaning 'Story of.' In any case it is the view of a later century as to the age of Hosea that is conveyed by the data of the superscription. In fact it is perhaps possible for us still to perceive how this view may have arisen.

From 1:4 it was possible to infer that Hosea must have lived in the time of Jeroboam, who was known to have been a contemporary of Uzziah. The name of Hezekiah, on the other hand, suggested itself to close the series of kings of Judah, as 1:7 was rightly regarded as containing an allusion to the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib, which took place under his reign.

Since, if this view be correct, the dates are only deductions of scholars from the contents of the writings, we have no longer any reason for giving an earlier date to the writing of chaps. 1-3, than to that of chaps. 4 ff.

The occurrences of which chaps. 1-3 speak are some of them—e.g. the prophet's marriage and the birth of his eldest son Jezreel—earlier than the fall of the house of Jehu; but it is not to be concluded on that account that they were committed to writing earlier than the complete narrative. There is no obvious reason why the prophet could not have written 1:4 ff. at a later date; for the confusions immediately following the downfall of the dynasty of Jehu could not have presented themselves to him otherwise than as the last convulsions of the kingdom of Israel after it had received its death-blow in the overthrow of that royal house.

Further, the first three chapters express an understanding of the occurrences in the home-life of the prophet that he could have arrived at only after he had brought back his faithless spouse. If, then, it is only the birth of Jezreel that can safely be dated within the period before Jeroboam's death, the restoration of Hosea's wife already brings us down to Menahem's reign, since she had borne him two more children.

More precisely, therefore, we are able to say that before 743 (before the death of Jeroboam) Hosea was already a prophet—this appears from the significant name he gave to his son—but that the production of the written book belongs to a date after 743, though before 734.

The superscription, however, is not the only element which the book of Hosea owes to later hands.² Apart from minor and more casual interpolations there are two distinct categories of such additions: (1) those which

bring the prophecies into relation to the southern kingdom, and so supply a painfully felt omission; and (2) those which interrupt, or round off, Hosea's predictions of the coming judgment, with promises of a time of final blessedness (of which, in the view of a later age, every prophet must of course have known).

To the first class, over and above the interpolations of entire verses or of entire portions of verses, such as 17 (the allusion to the deliverance of Jerusalem in Sennacherib's time), 4:15a 5:5b 6:11 8:14 (cp also Am. 2:5), 10:14 end (?), and 12:16, we must reckon all those changes by which 'Judah' was simply substituted for 'Israel' or 'Ephraim' in the original text—so in 5:10 (unless the entire verse be an interpolation), 5:12-14 6:4 (also perhaps wholly interpolated) 10:11 and 12:2[3] (where clearly 'Israel' is to be read for 'Judah'; cp the play on words in 12:3[4]).

To the second category belong 1:10-2:1 [2:1-3]—a section which interrupts the picture of the judgment contained in 1:2-2:15 [17]; 2:16-23 [2:18-25] (perhaps with the exception of 2:17 [19])—an appended description of the blessedness to come 'in that day' (viz. in Messianic times); 3:5—the promise of the return from the dispersion to the happy fatherland; 5:15-6:3—the penitent return after the judgment; 6:11-7:1—an utterance relating to the restoration after the Exile; 11:10 f.—again a promise of the home-coming after dispersion (cp Is. 60:8 f.); and 14:1-9 [14:2-10], an appendix (cp z., 2, above) pointing forward to the blessed coming time which stands in glaring contrast with 13:16 [14:1].

Apart from the narrative in chaps. 1-3, to which we shall presently recur, the book throws little or no light

5. Hosea's life. appears from 9:7 f. that his prophetic work was greatly embarrassed by opposition; 'As for the prophet, a fowler's snare is in all his ways, and enmity in the house of his God.' The enmity which had its centre in the sanctuary probably proceeded from the priests (cp Am. 7), against whose profligacy and profanation of their office our prophet frequently declaims—perhaps also from the degenerate prophetic guilds of the holy cities in the Northern Kingdom, with whom Hosea's elder contemporary Amos so indignantly refuses to be identified (Am. 7:14). In 4:5 Hosea seems to comprise priests and prophets in one condemnation, thus placing himself in direct antagonism to all the leaders of the religious life of his nation. In such circumstances, and amidst the universal dissolution of social order and morality to which every page of his book bears testimony, the prophet was driven to the verge of despair (9:7), and only the sovereign conviction of Yahwé's essential nature, which is no other than salvation, and of his infinite power, which will surely bring salvation to pass, so upheld him that the inevitable collapse of the existing commonwealth of Israel did not mean for him that all the workings of Yahwé had come to an end. The hypothesis of Ewald, that he was at last compelled by persecution to retire from the Northern Kingdom, and composed his book in Judæa, rests mainly on an improbable exegesis of some of the passages mentioning Judah, referred to above, which it is impossible for us now to attribute to Hosea.

The most interesting problem of Hosea's history lies in the interpretation of the story of his married life (chaps. 1-3). We read in these chapters 6. His marriage. that Hosea married a profligate wife, Gomer the daughter of Diblaim, and that the prophet regarded this marriage as in accordance with a divine command.

Three children were born and received symbolical names illustrative of the divine purpose towards Israel, which are expounded in chap. 1. In chap. 2 the faithlessness of Israel to Yahwé, the long-suffering of God, the moral discipline of sorrow and tribulation by which he will punish and yet bring back his erring people are depicted under the figure of the relation of a husband to an erring spouse. The suggestion of this allegory admit editorial manipulation. He is conservative as regards chap. 14, and Nowack partly supports him. Cp however, Che., op. cit. p. xix; Exp. T., March 98. See also Che. Introd. to WRS Proph. (2), '95, and especially We. Kl. Proph. 95 ff., and Oort (referred to in next note).]

lies in the prophet's marriage with Gomer; but the details are worked out quite independently, and under a rich multiplicity of figures derived from other sources. In chap. 3 we return to the personal experience of the prophet. His faithless wife had at length left him and fallen, under circumstances which are not detailed, into a state of misery, from which Hosea, still following her with tender affection, brought her back and restored her to his house, where he kept her in seclusion, and patiently watched over her for many days, yet not readmitting her to the privileges of a wife. In this last action, too, the prophet sees a fulfilment of the will of God.

In these experiences the prophet again recognises a parallel to Yahwé's long-suffering love to Israel, and the discipline by which the people shall be brought back to God through a period in which all their political and religious institutions are overthrown.

Throughout these chapters personal narrative and prophetic allegory are interwoven with a rapidity of transition very puzzling to the modern reader; but an unbiassed exegesis can hardly fail to acknowledge that chaps. 1 and 3 narrate an actual passage in the prophet's life. The names of the three children are symbolical; but Isaiah in like manner gave his sons symbolical names embodying prominent points in his prophetic teaching (Shear-jashub, Is. 7, 3, cp 10, 21; Maher-shalal-hash-baz, 8, 3). Gomer bath Diblaim is certainly the name of an actual person (cp GOMER ii.).

On this name all the allegorists, from the Targum, Jerome, and Ephrem Syrus downwards, have spent their arts in vain, whereas the true symbolical names in the book are perfectly easy of interpretation.¹ That the ancient interpreters take the whole narrative as a mere parable is no more than an application of their standing rule that in the biblical history everything which in its literal sense appears offensive to propriety is allegorical (cp Jerome's proem to the book). The supposed offence to propriety, however, seems to rest on mistaken exegesis and too narrow a conception of the way in which the Divine word was communicated to the prophets.

There is no reason to suppose that Hosea knowingly married a woman of profligate character. The point of the allegory in 1, 2 is plainly infidelity after marriage as a parallel to Israel's departure from the covenant God, and a profligate wife (אשה זונה) is not the same thing as an open prostitute (זונה). The marriage was marred by Gomer's infidelity; and the struggle of Hosea's affection for his wife with this great unhappiness—a struggle inconceivable unless his first love had been pure and full of trust in the purity of its object—furnished him with a new insight into Yahwé's dealings with Israel. Then he recognised that the great calamity of his life was God's own ordinance and appointed means to communicate to him a deep prophetic lesson. The recognition of a divine command after the fact has its parallel, as Wellhausen observes, in Jer. 32, 8.

The explanation of the narrative here adopted, which is essentially Ewald's, has commended itself to not a few recent expositors, as Valetton, Wellhausen, and Nowack, also to v. Orelli, but with the qualification that it is another wife that is spoken of in 3.² It has the great advantage of supplying a psychological key to the conception of Israel or the land of Israel (1, 2) as the spouse of Yahwé, which dominates these chapters, but immediately, in the other parts of the book, gives way to the personification of the nation as God's son. This conception has, indeed, formal points of contact with notions previously current, and even with the ideas of Semitic heathenism.

On the one hand, it is a standing Hebrew usage to represent the land as mother of its people, whilst the representation of worshippers as children of their god is found in Nu. 21, 29, where the Moabites are called children of Chemosh, and is early and widespread throughout the Semitic field (cp TSBA 6, 438; J. Phil. 982). The combination of these two notions gives at once the conception of the national deity as husband of the land. On the other hand, the designation of Yahwé as Baal, which, in accordance with the antique view of marriage, means husband as well as lord and owner, was current among the Israelites in early times (see BAAL), perhaps, indeed, down to Hosea's own age (unless 2, 16 [18] be merely a learned gloss, reminiscent of the earlier time). Now it is highly probable that among the idolatrous Israelites the idea of a marriage between the deity and individual worshippers was actually current and connected with the immorality which Hosea often condemns in the worship of the local Baalim, whom the ignorant people identified with Yahwé. For we have a Punic woman's name, אִישְׁתֵּי בַּאֵל, 'the betrothed of Baal' (Euting, Punische Steine, 9, 15), and there was a similar conception among the Babylonians (Herod. 1, 181 f.).

² Seeemann also now upholds the view that another wife is intended in 3 (Israel u. Juda bei Amos u. Hosea, '98, pp. 32-44). Volz on the other hand (Die Ehegeschichte Hosea's in ZWT, '98, pp. 321-335) takes 3 to be an allegorical narrative added to 1 at a later date. Perhaps there is some truth in this. To the present writer the matter presents itself somewhat as follows: Hos. 3 is a later addition and is intended as an allegory referring to Israel (cp בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, 3, 1). Hosea's own words, especially chap. 1, having been taken as referring to Judah. In the mind of the redactor Hos. 1-3 was a companion picture to Ezek. 23, and if so we shall then have to say that Hosea had two wives,—one literal, viz. Gomer (= Judah), one allegorical (chap. 3=Israel).

Hosea, however, takes the idea of Yahwé as husband, and gives it an altogether different turn, filling it with a new and profound meaning, based on the psychical experiences of a deep human affection in contest with outraged honour and the wilful self-degradation of a spouse. It can hardly be supposed that all that lies in these chapters is an abstract study in the psychology of the emotions. It is actual human experience that gives Hosea the key to divine truth.

Among those who do not recognise this view of the passage, the controversy between allegory and literalism is carried on chiefly upon abstract assumptions.

The extreme literalists, of whom Pusey may be taken as the modern representative in England, will have it that the divine command justified a marriage otherwise highly improper, and that the offensive circumstances magnify the obedience of the prophet. This is to substitute the Scotist and Neo-Platonic notion of God for that of the prophets. On the other hand, the allegorists, who argue that God could not have enjoined on his prophet a marriage plainly improper and fitted to destroy his influence among the people, are unable to show that what is repulsive in fact is fit subject for a divine allegory. A third school of recent writers (including the elder Fairbairn), led by Hengstenberg, and resting on a thesis of John Smith, the Cambridge Platonist, will have it that the symbolical action was transacted in what they allow themselves by a contradictio in adjecto to call an objective vision. Cp J. Th. de Visser, Hosea, De man des gastes, Utrecht, 1886.

It was in the experiences of his married life, and in the spiritual lessons opened to him through these, that Hosea heard the revealing voice of Yahwé.

7. His message. Even so early as at the birth of Jezreel he had perceived the will of God concerning Israel, and given to his son a significant name accordingly. At a later date he recognised that the word of Yahwé had been leading him even at the time when he married Gomer bath Diblaim. Like Amos (Am. 3, 8), he was called to speak for God by an inward constraining voice, and there is no reason to think that he had any connection with the recognised prophetic societies, or ever received such outward adoption to office as was given to Elisha.

Hosea's position in Israel was one of tragic isolation. Amos, when he had discharged his mission at Bethel, could return to his home and to his friends; Hosea was a stranger among his own people, and his home was full of sorrow and shame. Isaiah in the gloomiest days of Judah's declension had faithful disciples about him, and knew that there was a believing remnant in the land. Hosea knows no such remnant, and there is not a line in his prophecy from which we can conclude that his words ever found an obedient ear. For him the present condition of the people contained no germ or pledge of future amendment, and he describes the impending judgment, not as a sifting process in which the wicked perish and the righteous remain, but as the total wreck of the nation which has wholly turned aside from its God.

In truth, while the idolatrous feasts of Ephraim still ran their joyous round, while the careless people crowded to the high places, and there in unbridled and licentious mirth flattered themselves that their many sacrifices ensured the help of their God against all calamity, the nation was already in the last stage of internal dissolution. To the prophet's eye there was 'no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land—'nought but swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and adultery; they break out, and blood toucheth blood' (4.1f.).

The root of this corruption lay in total ignorance of Yahwè, whose precepts were no longer taught by the priests, while in the national calf-worship, and in the local high places, this worship was confounded with the service of the Canaanite Baalim. Thus the whole religious constitution of Israel was undermined.

The political state of the realm was in Hosea's eyes not more hopeful. The dynasty of Jehu, still great and powerful when the prophet's labours began, is itself an incorporation of national sin. Founded on the bloodshed of Jezreel, it must fall by God's vengeance, and the state shall fall with it (1.4.34). This sentence stands at the head of Hosea's predictions, and throughout the book the civil constitution of Ephraim is represented as equally lawless and godless with the corrupt religious establishment. The anarchy that followed on the murder of Zachariah appears to the prophet as the natural decadence of a realm not founded on divine ordinance. The nation had rejected Yahwè, the only helper. Now the avenging Assyrian is at hand. Samaria's king shall pass away as foam¹ on the water. Fortress and city shall fall before the ruthless invader, who spares neither age nor sex; and thistles shall cover the desolate altars of Ephraim.

Is this, then, the last word in the message of the prophet?

If the passages already indicated as later additions, in which a happy future is spoken of, could have been assigned to Hosea, we could answer 8. Is the future all gloom? with a categorical negative. In that case alone could we say

'Hosea could discern no faithful remnant in Ephraim, yet Ephraim in all his corruption is the son of Yahwè, a child nurtured with tender love, a chosen people. This people, the prophet knows, is destined once more to return in truth and faithfulness to its father [see Hos. 11.1, and cp LOVINGKINDNESS] and its God, through whose love all its plagues will be healed and a glorious and blessed land prepared for its occupation. Of the manner of Israel's repentance and conversion Hosea presents no clear image; the certainty that the people will at length return rests only on the invincible supremacy of Yahwè's love.'

Even so we should have to say of Hosea that the two sides of his prophetic declaration, the passionate denunciation of Israel's sin and folly, and the not less passionate tenderness with which he describes the final victory of divine love, are united by no logical bond. The unity is one of feeling only, and the sob of anguish in which many of his appeals to a heedless people seem to end, turns once and again with sudden revulsion into the clear accents of evangelical promise, which in the closing chapter (if we accept this as Hosea's) swell forth in pure and strong cadence out of a heart that has found its rest with God from all the troubles of a stormy life.

What, however, we are compelled by the actual facts as they present themselves to conclude, is that in the original historical Hosea there was no assurance of a final triumph of the divine love or of a penitent return of the sinful nation.

Hosea's last word was in reality an announcement of the unrelenting judgment upon his people which Yahwè, with bleeding heart indeed, is threatening and in course of fulfilling; as the Holy One, in spite of his love, he dares not allow himself after the manner of men to be swayed by his feelings, or exercise compassion any further (11.8f. 13.14). The land of Israel is becoming as Admah and as Zeboim, its inhabitants are destined to be swept away to death and Shēol, or to live in an exile where all communion with their God is cut off just as the wife of the prophet is excluded from communion with her husband.

Still we should not have fully understood Hosea did we imagine we saw in this judgment the final close of all God's dealings. We must not fail to notice that for Hosea the judgment passed upon Israel means, not an end to all salvation, but a self-assertion of Yahwè. Yahwè for the prophet is the very impersonation of salvation, and therefore it is precisely by his asserting of himself that the accomplishment of salvation is guaranteed. What the further ways of God might be Hosea was unable to say; salvation, however, depended not upon the continued existence of the nation, but upon Yahwè. This recognition of Yahwè, and hope in him (4.1.66.126 [7]) saved the prophet from despair and enabled him with a tranquil heart to leave the future to his God. Cp AMOS, § 18; ISAAH I., § 2.

Bēerāh, the prophet's father, is identified by the Rabbins with Bēerāh (1 Ch. 8.6), a Reubenite prince carried captive by Tiglath-pileser. This view is already expressed by Jerome, Quest. in Paralip., and doubt-about Hosea, less underlies the statement of the Targum to Chronicles that Bēerāh was a prophet. For it is a Jewish maxim that when a prophet's father is named, he too was a prophet, and accordingly a tradition of R. Simon makes Is. 8.19 f. a prophecy of Bēerāh (Kimchi in loc.; Leviticus Rabba, par. 15). According to the usual Christian tradition, however, Hosea was of the tribe of Issachar, and from an otherwise unknown town, Belemoth or Belemon (pseudo-Epiphanius, pseudo-Dorotheus, Ephrem Syr. 2.234; Chron. Pasch., Bonn ed., 1.276). As the tradition adds that he died there, and was buried in peace, the source of the story lies probably in some holy place shown as his grave. There are other traditions as to the burial-place of Hosea. A Jewish legend in the Shalshet haqqabala (Carpzov, Introd., pt. 3, ch. 7, § 3) tells that he died in captivity at Babylon, and was carried to Upper Galilee, and buried at נַצַּח, that is, Safed (Neubauer, Gögez. 2.27); and the Arabs show the grave of Neby Osha', E. of the Jordan, near Es-Salt (see GILEAD, 2, and cp Burckhardt's Syria, 353).

Of the older comms. on Hosea, which have been fully catalogued by Rosenmüller in his Scholia, it is sufficient to name Le Mercier's Latin annotations, embodying a translation of the chief rabbinical expositions, and the English comm. of E. Pococke (Oxford, 1683), which is not surpassed in learning and judgment by any subsequent work. Among special commentaries may be mentioned those of Simson ('51), Wünsche ('68), with abundant references to Jewish interpreters, Nowack ('80), Cheyne, in the Camb. Bible ('84; (2) '92), and J. H. de Visser (see above). Ew., Hitz., and (especially) We. and Now., have done much for Hosea in their comprehensive works (to which WRS Proph., Lect. 4, G. A. 1. The last king of Israel (733-722), called Ausi'(a) in the Assyrian inscriptions. In retracing his tragic fortunes we must at once start from a critical point of view. Hoshea came to the throne not in the twelfth year of Ahaz (see 2 K. 17.1), but in 733,¹ when Pekah was killed by his subjects, and Hoshea (Ausi') was set up, as king of the land of Bit Humri (see PEKAH), by Tiglath-pileser, who records it. No doubt Hoshea was a leading member of the Assyrian party, whereas Pekah had done his utmost to promote resistance to Assyria.

HOSHEA

It is equally impossible to hold that Hoshea twice revolted from Assyria, and twice was punished by an Assyrian invasion. It must be to the redactor that the present tissue of improbabilities is due, and the only remedy is critical analysis of the section, 2 K. 17:3-6. Two parallel reports, as Winckler has shown, have been combined.

(15:30) And Hoshea ben Elah conspired against Pekah ben Remaliah, and smote him and became king in his stead.

(17:34) Against him came up Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, for¹ Hoshea used to bring him tribute every year, but in this year he brought him no tribute. 5. And the king of Assyria came up against the whole land, and went up against Samaria, and besieged it three years. 6. And after three years² he took Samaria, and carried Israel away to Assyria.

Thus we have four fixed points in the history of Hoshea:—(1) he steps to the throne over the body of his murdered predecessor; (2) he pays yearly tribute to Assyria; (3) he revolts, in reliance on the support of the king of Mišrim; (4) his land is invaded, and, on the capture of Samaria, he is blinded (a vassal king's usual punishment for treason) and imprisoned. The payment of tribute probably went on till the death of Tiglath-pileser in 727. Inevitably it much increased the burdens of a land already weakened by Tiglath-pileser's annexations. The nobles would suffer most directly; but these would seek to compensate themselves by oppressing the commons. This is probably referred to by Hosea (5:11-13).

Ephraim is oppressed, is crushed by his judges,
For he chose to go after Assyria!
And I am as the moth for Ephraim,
As rottenness for the bouse of Judah.
And when Ephraim saw his sickness,
And Israel his festering wound,
Ephraim went to Masor (i.e., Mušri),
Israel to the Arabian king;
But he will not be able to help you,
Nor will he cure you of your wound.⁵

Now we see clearly what was the immediate cause of the ruin of Israel. The people could not any longer bear the exactions of Assyria. A gleam of hope shone when their tyrant (Tiglath-pileser) died. The anti-Assyrian party everywhere formed plans for concerted action. Jeroboam I. of N. Israel, and long afterwards Hanun of Gaza, had already sought refuge in the land of Mušri, which was a province of the great kingdom of Meluḥḥa in N. Arabia;⁶ and, later, we shall find Yaman of Ashdod following their example. What more natural than for Hoshea to enter into negotiations with the powerful prince, Pir'u, king of Mušri, whose tartan, or general, Sargon names Sib'i (out of which name the Hebrew scribes have made סִיב, see So)? It was of no avail. In 724 B.C. the Assyrian army took the field against Samaria. In 722 the city was taken, and there is no sufficient reason for closing the political career of Hoshea at an earlier date.⁸ The prophets

⁸ Whitehouse, however (Hastings, DB 426), besitates between this view and that of Hommel (GBA 675) and Tiele (BAG 232) that Hoshea was taken captive before the siege of Samaria. The latter view makes Hoshea's reign last only nine years (agreeably to 2 K. 17:1), but requires us to suppose not only that the writer of v. 6 confounds the capture of Hoshea with that of Samaria, but also that the people of Samaria had courage to Hosea and Isaiah foresaw the result (Hos. 14:1[2] Is. 28:1-4).

We know but little of Hoshea; but the redactor of Kings found reason to believe that he was a better king than his predecessors (2 K. 17:2). Lucian's recension of GB, however, turns the praise into blame,—no doubt, as Benzinger remarks, to carry out the theory of proportionate retribution. Hoshea, having suffered so terribly, must have been the worst of Israel's kings.

HOSPITALITY. The duty of hospitality is recognised both in the Old and in the New Testament. The ideal Hebrew, Abraham, runs to meet the strangers who approach his tent (Gen. 18:2); Paul would have his converts 'pursue hospitality' (τὴν φιλοξενίαν διώκοντες, Rom. 12:13). It will be observed, Paul does not inculcate the duty as something new to Gentiles; with the Greeks, as with the Hebrews, hospitality rested on religious sanctions (cp Hom. Od. 6:206). Zeus Xenios is a well-known divine title; it was to Zeus in this character (RV 'the Protector of strangers') that the Samaritan temple at Gerizim was rededicated by Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. 6:2). The God of Israel too was 'a preserver of strangers' (עֲרֵב, Ps. 146:9); in fact, it was everywhere the gods who set the example of hospitality by granting protection to fugitives in their sanctuaries, and by welcoming poor as well as rich to the sacrificial feasts in which, it was believed, the gods and their worshippers met and ate together.

The Jewish law as to the treatment of sojourners requires separate treatment (see STRANGERS); it is only the externals of hospitality (in its wider sense), as described in the Bible, that here concern us.

We naturally turn in the first instance to passages like Gen. 18:1 ff. 19:1-3 24:18 ff. 29:13 f. Ex. 2:20 Josh. 2:1 cp 4, Judg. 13:15 19:17-21. No question was asked as to the name and circumstances of the guest until his first needs were satisfied (cp Gen. 24:32 f.). While under the roof of his host, the guest was in security; hence the earnest appeal of Lot to the men of Sodom—death, or something as bad he could suffer, rather than that his guests should be exposed to gross ill-treatment (Gen. 19:6-8). To illustrate this we must go to Arabia, where the insecurity of the land has ensured the permanence of primitive hospitality. As Doughty says, 'Perilous rovers in the field, the herdsmen of the desert are kings at home, fathers of hospitality to all that seek to them for the night's harbour. "Be we not all," say the poor nomads, "guests of Ullah"? Has God given unto them, God's guest shall partake with them thereof: if they will not for God render his own, it should not go well with them. The guest entered, and sitting down amongst them, they observe an honourable silence, asking no untimely questions (such is school and nurture of the desert), until he have eaten or drunk somewhat at the least, and by 'the bread and salt' there is peace established between them, for a time (that is counted two nights and the day in the midst, whilst their food is in him).'¹

Indeed, hospitality is to the poor Bedouin what almsgiving became to the later Jews—the proof and expression of righteousness. These are the words of a thoughtful Bedouin to a Dowlány, or government officer, at Damascus.

'Hearken! A stranger alighting at a Bedawin booth, we welcome him, and are busy to serve him and we prepare the guest-supper; and when he has eaten, in the same place he sleeps, in the assurance of Ullah, and with the morning light he rises up refreshed to hold on his journey. But ha! when I came to es-Sham, riding upon my thelál [riding-camel], it was an evening (at the supping hour), and passing weary and hungry by the sūk [street], I alighted before some door where I thought to take my night-lodging. . . . This is their dealing prolong the struggle even after such a decisive event as the capture of their king.

'With all this,' continues Doughty, 'there lacks not Arabic hospitality in the good city of Damascus,' and among the faults of the Jews, according to Jesus Christ, the vice of inhospitality was not included. Even a poor man, receiving a late visit from a friend, would take the trouble to go to an acquaintance at midnight and ask and ask again for the loan of three loaves to set before his friend (Lk. 11.5-8). But while even a Naṣrāni in our day receives hospitality in the desert, a Jew could not be received by a Samaritan in our Lord's time, nor a Samaritan by a Jew (Lk. 9.52 f. Jn. 4.9; but cp Lk. 10.33 f.).

The Arabic term for the bond between the host and his guest is mīlhat, from mīlḥ 'salt.' There is no such phrase in Hebrew; but in Nu. 18.19 2 Ch. 13.5 we find the phrase בְּרִית מֶלַח, berith mēlah, 'a salt pledge,' which is usually explained by the light of the Arabic phrase, 'the salt that is between us,' as a reference to the commensality of the god and his worshippers at the sacrificial feast. This was hardly the original intention of the phrase, but was, probably enough, an early explanation.² Still salt, in the Arabic phrase quoted above, is only symbolical. Drinking milk together in the same tent is the best sacramental form in hospitality, for milk is the natural substitute for blood; a milk-covenant is the nearest equivalent to a blood-covenant. Upon this theory Sisera very nearly became the true guest of the Kenite woman Jael. He drank of her milk, but not with her, nor within her tent.

As Judg. 5.27 shows, the fugitive stood at the door of Jael's tent; there he began to drink, and there sank down, struck by a deadly blow. That the text is corrupt is certain; that it has been correctly emended is probable (see Jael). An early narrator appears to have had the Song of Deborah before him in an already corrupted form. The housewife's coffer had become a tent-peg, and the flint-stone a hammer.³ We have no occasion either to devise some subtle excuse for Jael, or to call her act fiendish. She was in covenant with Barak not with Sisera, and by keeping Sisera outside her tent retained her right of blood-revenge. It remains true, however, that the importance of the law of hospitality was not adequately appreciated by the writer of Judg. 4, and that the Jael of his narrative contrasts strongly with the Canaanitish woman Rahab in Josh. 2. Very different was the common Israelitish feeling, as is shown by the vengeance for the outrage on hospitality related with such painful preciseness in Judg. 20 (see JUDGES, Book of, § 13).

For NT references to hospitality see Rom. 12.13 16.23 1 Tim. 3.2 5.10 Tit. 1.8 Heb. 13.2 1 Pet. 4.9. Cp WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 76 269 f. 458, and see INN, MEALS, § 4.7, STRANGER, § 2.

³ Either סֶבֶת in Judg. 4.21 is a substitute for הַלְמוֹת, at the meaning of which the narrator guessed, or it is, like הַלְמוֹת, a corruption of חֶלְמוֹת = חֶלְמוֹת (flint), ל having been misplaced.

HOUSE

Sab. = fortress or temple. It is used occasionally of a tent (see TENT), but more generally of an abode made of solid materials with doorposts. For the various turns of expression in combinations of בַּיִת, see BDB, s.v. On its use as a house containing a family, hence descendants as an organised body, etc., cp FAMILY, § 2. בַּיִת occurs in numerous compound place-names; see BETH, and cp NAMES, § 96).

In attempting to describe the houses of ancient Palestine we must take into consideration the houses now used in those parts of Western Asia which have been the least exposed to the changes of time, and in which the manners of ancient days have been the best preserved. The Hebrews themselves were a people who had been accustomed to tent-life; hence their knowledge of house-building must have been derived from the inhabitants of Canaan, who, as the Amarna Tablets clearly show, were at one time largely influenced by Assyrian culture.

The construction of houses depends upon the accessibility of suitable material and climatic exigencies. At

1. Material. the present day clay-bricks are used in the plain, stone in the mountains. Sun-dried bricks (בְּרִיקָה, see BRICK) were used in the older times in Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Palestine; hewn stone (בְּנֵיִן) was rare, and, in the time of Amos, a sign of luxury (Am. 5.11 1 K. 7.9, cp Is. 9.10 [9]).¹ The houses of the lower classes were low and frail, and contrasted with the high stone houses of the rich nobles. Job speaks of 'houses of clay' (Job 4.19), also of those who 'dig (or break) into houses' (Job 24.16),² and a parable of Jesus describes the ease with which a house (on a sandy foundation, it is true) might be beaten down by a storm (Mt. 7.27). In fact, the houses of the peasantry even in the present day need continual renovation. At best they are made of small stones and untempered mortar; often they are of nothing but hard earth with layers of sun-dried bricks, and, if neglected, soon perish. The town-houses are more solid and permanent. Though nearly always of only one story, they are sometimes as high as houses of three stories among ourselves. Approached from the outside, the modern house presents little more than a dead wall.

Entering the GATE (q.v.), one finds oneself in a passage usually sloping downwards, which with an

2. Court. abrupt turn (to ensure privacy) leads into the court (חֶסֶר, hāsēr). This is paved with slabs of stone, and is frequently planted with trees which, extending sometimes above the roof, present that curious effect which has been noticed in towns in SW. Asia (cp the illustration of the Egyptian house, Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. 1.361, fig. 130). That the richer Jews in later times had the like arrangement is possible, but cannot be inferred, even as regards the temple, from Ps. 84.2 [3] f. 92.13 [14] (cp BIRDS, col. 576, n. 1). A large basin of clear water (or perhaps a well, 2 S. 17.18) occupies the centre of the court, once used for bathing (cp 2 S. 11.2?), but now superseded by the establishment of public warm baths in every town and in private mansions. Cold bathing has all but ceased in W. Asia.

The number of courts varies. Small houses have one, superior houses have two, and first-rate houses three, communicating with each other; for the Orientals dislike ascending stairs or steps, and prefer to gain room rather by the extent than by the height of their habitations. If there are more than two courts the second is devoted chiefly to the master's use, whilst the outer one is devoted to social intercourse, and is therefore different from the others. When there are only two courts the innermost is the harem (עַמֻּדָת הַיְמָנִית, Esth. 23), which is occupied by the women and children, and is the true domicile of the master. In the country districts the court is not infrequently used as a stable; in other cases the occupants live above the stables, which take up the ground floor (cp Rob. BR⁽²⁾ 339). The former arrangement has probably come down from the nomadic custom of encamping with the cattle in the enclosure formed by the encircling tents.

² Job, it must be remembered, is in the main a work probably of the early Greek period.

HOUSE

The mandara, or reception-room of the master, faces the outer court. It is entirely open in front, thus corresponding to the open place in the tent used for the same purpose, and is richly fitted up with divans, etc. This is used also as a guest-chamber. A large portion of the other side of the court is occupied with a frontage of lattice-work filled with coloured glass, belonging to a room as large as the guest-chamber, which in winter is used for the same purpose, or serves as the apartment of any visitor of distinction. The other apartments in this outer court are comparatively small, and are used for visitors, retainers, and servants; they are usually upon what we should call the first floor, or at least upon an elevated terrace. The ground floor is in that case occupied by various store-rooms and servants' offices. In all cases the upper floor, containing the principal rooms, is fronted by a gallery or terrace, protected from the sun by a sort of penthouse roof supported by pillars of wood. See CHAMBER.

Over the gateway stands a latticed chamber, corresponding to the upper-room (ὑπερφῶρον) or cooling-room; see BED, § 1. It was to the chamber of the gate that David retired to indulge his grief, and it was here perhaps that consultations with a prophetess were held (2 K. 2214, emended text); see HULDAH.

The arrangement of the inner court is very similar to that of the outer; but the whole is more open and airy. The buildings usually occupy two sides of the square, of which the one opposite the entrance contains the principal apartments. They are upon what we should call the first floor, and open into a wide gallery or verandah, which in good houses is nine or ten feet deep, and covered by a wooden penthouse supported by a row of wooden columns. This terrace, or gallery, is furnished with a strong wooden balustrade, and is usually paved with squared stones, or else floored with boards. The greater part of one of the sides of the court front is usually occupied by the large sitting-room, with lattice-front covered with coloured glass, similar to that in the outer court. The other rooms of smaller size are the more private apartments of the mansion. There are usually no doors to the sitting or drawing rooms of Eastern houses; they are closed by curtains, at least in summer.

The basement is occupied by various offices, stores of corn and fuel, places for the water-jars to stand in,

3. The places for grinding corn, baths, kitchens, etc. The kitchen, which is open in front, is always in this inner court, as the cooking is performed by women. It is surrounded by a brick terrace, on the top of which are the fireplaces formed in compartments, and separated by little walls of fire-brick or tile. In these different compartments the various dishes of the Eastern feast may be at once prepared at charcoal fires (cp COOKING, § 4). This place being wholly open in front, the half-tame doves, which have their nests in the trees of the court, often visit it, in the absence of the servants, in search of crumbs, etc. (cp Rob. BR⁽²⁾ 360).

In Turkish Arabia most of the houses have underground cellars (serdabs as they are called) to which the inhabitants retreat during the mid-day heat of summer, and there enjoy a refreshing coolness. The biblical writers do not refer to this usage. At Acre, however, the substructions of very ancient houses have been discovered with just such cellars (cp Thomson, LB [94] 309). Commonly, the winter-house is the lower apartment (el-beit), the upper (ulliyeh) being the summer-house. Every house of the better class has both, and they are familiarly called b. shetancy and b. saify, the winter and summer house. Where both are on the same story the interior and more sheltered chamber becomes the winter-house, the external and more airy one being used in summer.

From the court a flight of stone steps, usually at the corner, conducts to the gallery, from which a plainer stair leads to the house-top. If the house

4. Roof. be large, there are two or three sets of steps to the different sides of the quadrangle, but seldom more than one flight from the terrace to the housetop of any one court. There is, however, a separate stair from the outer court to the roof, and it is usually near the entrance. This will bring to mind the case of the paralytic, whose friends, finding they could not get access to Jesus through the people who crowded the court of the house in which he was preaching, took him up to the roof, and, uncovering it, let him down (Mk. 21-4). Lk., writing for Roman readers, describes a Roman house (517-20). His readers are accustomed to a house with tiles (cp tegula, κέραμος) and with a hole (impluvium) in the roof of the principal chamber, where the company would be assembled. For him to have said that the roof was uncovered would have been unintelligible to his readers (Ramsay, Was Christ born in Bethlehem? 58 ff.).

The roof (23) of the house is, of course, flat,¹ and in modern villages is reached by a stairway from the yard or court. It is formed by rafters of tamarisk or palm-trees, across which are laid branches, twigs, and matting; earth is then laid over and trodden down; after which it is covered with a compost which acquires considerable hardness when dry. Such roofs would not, however, endure the heavy and continuous rains of our climate; and in those parts of Asia where the climate is more than usually moist, a stone roller is usually kept on every roof, and after a shower a great part of the population is engaged in drawing these rollers over the roofs (cp Rob. BR⁽²⁾ 339 44). It is now very common, in countries where timber is scarce, to have domed roofs; but in that case the flat roof, which is indispensable to Eastern habits, is obtained by filling up the hollow intervals between the several domes, so as to form a flat surface at the top. These flat roofs are often alluded to in the Bible; and the allusions show that they were used for recreation and many other purposes (Josh. 26 Judg. 1627 1 S. 925 f. 2 S. 112 1622 Is. 221 Jer. 1913 Zeph. 15 Mt. 2417 Mk. 1315 Acts 109), cp HUT. A similar arrangement known in Assyria was a long open arcade (the Italian loggia) running along above the roof the whole length of the façade. This is not unlike the constructions adopted by the Nestorians in the villages of Kurdistan (see Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Chald. etc. 1139 f., with illustrations).

The roofs of the houses are well protected by walls and parapets. Towards the street and neighbouring houses is a high wall, and towards the interior courtyard usually a parapet or wooden rail. Parapets of this kind, for the prevention of accidents, are strictly enjoined in the Law² (Dt. 228, חָקַע, στεφάνη; cp Ar. akā, 'to hinder,' 'withhold'; note the form of the battlements of the Egyptian house in Wilkinson, Anc. Eg.⁽²⁾ 1362, fig. 132).

² The Law is peculiar to D; 'a provision prompted by the same general motive is found in Ex. 21 33 f.' (Dr. Deut., ad loc.). The Book of the Covenant does not anywhere presuppose houses; the community for whom it was intended had not perhaps advanced so far.

HOZAI

The windows had no glass. Windows were rare, and in the winter the cold was kept out by veils over the openings; see LATTICE. Chimneys

5. Windows, were unknown, and artificial warmth was supplied by braziers (see COAL, § 3).

In the East, where the climate allows the people to spend so much of their time out of doors, the articles of furniture and the domestic utensils have always been few and

6. Furniture, simple. On these see the separate articles on BIRD, CANDLESTICK, LAMP, TABLE, and the like; also POTTERY, COOKING UTENSILS, MEALS.

See Benz. H.A., Now. H.A., etc., and Kitto's art. in the Biß. Cycl., from which several sentences in the above have been taken. S. A. C.

HOZAI, in RV, or Hosai, in AV^{msk}, as a proper name, represents חֹזַי in 2 Ch. 33 19 ('the history of Hozai'), where RV^{msk} and AV have 'the seers (the sayings of the seers)'.
Kautsch, with Θ BAL ($\tau\omega\upsilon\lambda$ λόγων τῶν ὀρώντων), reads חֹזַי; Budde (Z. d. Th., '92, p. 38 117) 'his [Manasseh's] seers,' which is easier, and is accepted by Kittel. See CHRONICLES, § 6, col. 707, n. 1.

HUKKOK (קִּקֹּק, ἰακκῶνα [B], ἰακωκ [A], κικωλ [L]), a place in Naphtali (Josh. 19 34), but hardly Yākūk, SE. of Safed (Rob.), which is too far N. The name is probably corrupt (cp HUKOK).

HUKOK (קִּקֹּק; ἰακκ [B] etc.), 1 Ch. 6 60 [75]. See HELKATH.

HUL (הוּל, οὐλα [AEL]), Gen. 10 23 1 Ch. 1 17. An Aramæan region; see GEOGRAPHY, § 20.

HULDAH (הַלְדָּה, 'weasel,' 'mole,' cp Achbor, 'mouse,' and see HELDAI; otherwise we might explain 'long-lived,' §§ 67, 68; Palm. הַלְדָּה; ὀλλῶνα [BAL]), a prophetess, whose husband Shallum held the court office (or temple office) of 'keeper of the wardrobe' (2 K. 22 14 ff. = 2 Ch. 34 22 ff.). The strangely insignificant notice, 'Now she dwelt at Jerusalem in the Mishneh' (RV 'second quarter'), is due to an error like that in the text of 1 S. 17 54 (see NOB). The true reading no doubt is, 'Now she was sitting in the upper part of the gate of the old city'—in a public, central position, ready to receive those who desired to 'inquire of Yahwé.' It was to Huldah that the priest Hilkiah and his four companions resorted when the alarmed king bade them 'inquire of Yahwé' after the reading of the law-book found in the temple. Her response is not preserved in its original form; the slender promise in v. 20 was certainly not enough to kindle in Josiah such extraordinary zeal as chap. 23 describes. 'Tell ye the man that sent you unto me' (v. 15) looks original, and vv. 18 19 20 may be fragments of the true oracle; the rest has been thoroughly recast in accordance with the melancholy facts of history (see Stade, Gesch. 1652 f., Benzinger, ad loc.).

Why did not the deputation consult Jeremiah in preference? Probably they were afraid of him; Huldah, sitting in the chamber of a city gate, was evidently a popular personage. Peritz (JBL 17 142 ['98]) sees a trace of the importance of women in the ancient religious rites; but the connection is obscure. Cp DEUTERONOMY, § 2 (end). T. K. C.

HUMTAH (חֻמְתָּה; Josh. 15 54†: εὔμα [B], ἡλματά [A], ἡλματά [L]), a place in the hill-country of Judah, mentioned between Aphekah and Hebron. Grove (Smith's DB) remarks on its resemblance to κειμαθ (Kimath), mentioned in Θ B 1 S. 30 29 between γῆθ (= γεθθορ = Jattir) and σαφεκ (= Siphmoth) as a town in S. Judah. Evidently the two names are the same.

In another interpolation (see v. 28, Θ B) Humtah appears as αἰμαθ (cp αἰματα above) between Aroer and Siphmoth. Cp We. and Klo. ad loc. Cp further CHADIASAI. T. K. C.

HUSHAI

HUPHAM (חֻפְּהָם), the eponym of the (Benjamite) Huphamites (חֻפְּהָמִי; Nu. 26 39: BAFL om.). Cp HUPPIM, HURAM.

HUPPAH (חֻפְּהָה), the name of the thirteenth priestly course: 1 Ch. 24 13† (οὐλοφφῶ [B], οφφῶ [AL]).

HUPPIM (חֻפְּיָם), a son of Benjamin (but see HUPHAM): Gen. 46 21 (ὀφμειν [D], ὀφμ[ε]ιν [AL]); 1 Ch. 7 12 (αφμειν [B], αφμειν [A], ηφαν [L]); 1 Ch. 7 15 (αμμειν [B], αφφ. [A], οφερ [L]).

HUR (חֹר, ωρ [BAFL], § 81). A connection with the Egyptian Horus seems very probable, cp Nab. and Sin. חור, Eg. Aram. חור, חורי, חר, חרי. In Ass. Sayce (PSBA 20 260 f. ['98]) compares Abihar, 'my father is Horus,' on an early Babylonian contract tablet, templ. Apil-Sin, KB 4 15 l. 20. Ass.-Aram. compounds of חר (ע.ע., חר, חר, חר) are uncertain; for the softening of the guttural see HAKNEPHER, but Hoffmann (Z 11 228) reads everywhere חר (= חר) 'Hadad.' Marq. finds another trace of Horus in the Benjamite Abihur (so read for AHHUD, 1 Ch. 8 7, which in 7 10 is corrupted to AHISHAIAR).¹

1. Mentioned together with Aaron as being present at the battle of Rephidim (Ex. 17 10-12, E) and left in charge of the people during Moses' absence on Mt. Sinai (ib. 24 14, E). Possibly his connection with Moses belongs to a secondary stratum of E, i.e., E₂ (cp MIRIAM, § 1); P (see 3) regards the name as Midianitish, and we remember that Moses married a Midianitish wife. Josephus (Ant. iii. 2 4) calls Hur the husband of Miriam (iii. 6 1), and identifies him with 2.

2. A Judahite, the grandfather of BEZALEEL (g.v., 1), a temple workman (Ex. 31 2=35 30, 38 22 [om. Θ] [P], 1 Ch. 2 19 f. 50 4 14 2 Ch. 1 5). Cp HIRAM, 2.

3. One of the five kings of Midian mentioned in Nu. 31 8 Josh. 13 21 [P] (sup [BAL in both places, F in Nu.]). See MIDIAN.

4. Father of REPHAIAR, 5 (Neh. 3 9, om. BNA [ραφαίης]) υἱὸς σαβανίου υἱοῦ σουρ [L].

5. 1 K. 48, see BEN-HUR.

HURAI (חֻרַי; οὐρα[ε]ν [BA], ογρια [L]), of the 'brooks of GAASH' [g.v.], one of David's 'thirty,' corresponds in 1 Ch. 11 32 to the HIDDAI (g.v.) of 2 S. 23 30.

Kennicott (Dissert. 194), We. (TBS), H. P. Smith and Budde (SBOT) prefer 'Hurai'; Klost. (on 'Sam.,' l.c.) and Kittel (SBOT) defend Hiddai (חֻדַי), out of which חֻרַי could so easily have been corrupted. Marq. (Fund. 20), however, suggests that αδδαι (Θ B, 2 S. 23 30) is a corruption for αδδαι, and would restore חֻרַי (cp Hadlai, 2 Ch. 28 12). Adlai (1 Ch. 27 29) is also possible. See GEBER, 2.

HURAM (חֻרָם), a. b. Bela in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (g.v., § 9), 1 Ch. 8 5†: (καὶ γέρα κα [sic] σωφραφκα καὶ ωμ [B], καὶ γέρα καὶ σωφρα καὶ ἀχίρα καὶ ιωμ [A], γέρα καὶ σερφαμ καὶ αρουαμ [L]). In P's list in Nu. 26 39 the name appears as HUPHAM (g.v.).

2. and 3. See HIRAM.

HURI (חֻרִי, § 81); in Gadite genealogy; 1 Ch. 5 14† (sup [ε] [BAL]).

HUSBAND (חֻשָּׁב), Gen. 36. See FAMILY, KINSHIP, MARRIAGE.

HUSHAH (חֻשָּׁה; ωσαν [BA], ογσα [L]), a Hurite name (see HUR, and cp Edomite HUSHAM); the context seems to suggest a locality (1 Ch. 4 4†). Sibbecai (less correctly Mebunnai in 2 S. 23 27) was a Hushathite (חֻשָּׁתִּי).

Θ 's renderings of חֻשָּׁה are: 2 S. 21 18, ὀσσταθθει [B], ὀσασσασθθει [A], ὀσσταθθ [L]; 2 S. 23 27, τὸν ἀνωθιτον [B], τὸν ἀσω. [A], ὀσθθ [L]; 1 Ch. 11 29, ὀσθθ [B], ὀσθθ [A], ὀσθθ [A], υἱὸς ὠσθθ [L]; 1 Ch. 20 4, θωσθθ [B], ὀσθθ [A], ὀσθθ [L].

filled the office of 'friend' (רַעַף [1 Ch. 27 33], רַעַף¹ [2 S. 15 37 16 16]; εἰραῖρος [B in 2 S. 15 37²]) of king David. See FRIEND.

By a simulated adherence to the cause of Absalom, Hushai was able to get his advice preferred to that of Ahithophel and thus brought about the downfall of Absalom. See AHITHOPHEL.³

HUSHAM (חֹשָׁם [Gen.], חֹשָׁם [Chron.]; Ἀσομ [BADL, om. E]), the third Edomite king (Gen. 36³⁴ f. 1 Ch. 1 45 f.). His city is not named; but he is described as 'of the land of the Temanites.' For a possible connection of the name with one of the stories in Judges, see CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.

1. The name of 'the sons of Dan' in Gen. 46 23 (οἰοὶ δὲ δαν Ἀσομ [DL], υ. δὲ δαι δαν α. [A])=Nu. 26 42 f., SHUHAM (σαμ[ε]c [BF], -δῆ [A], -με [L]). Perhaps the same as

3. Probably the same as (1), a name in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v. §§ 3, 9, ii. β): 1 Ch. 8 8 (σασω [B], ὠσεμ [L]); and 8 11 (ὠσμεν [B], μωσεμ [L]). (Cp JQR 11 104, § 2.)

HUSKS (κερατῖα, i.e., 'little horns'; 'carobs' [Pesh. and Syr. Sin.]; 'carobs of the sea' [Syr. Curet.]),⁶ The prodigal son, when reduced to tend the swine of a Gentile, would fain have kept off hunger with 'the husks that the swine did eat' (Lk. 15 16). So at least EV, obscuring one of the most striking touches in the parable. The 'husks,' as explained in RV^{mg}, are the pods of the carob tree (חֹשִׁים, חֹרֵבִים = Ar. harrābīn), also called the locust tree (Ceratonia siliqua), which is a characteristic tree of the shores of the Mediterranean, and common in Palestine from Hebron northwards. Cp Theophrast. i. 11 2; Dioscor. i. 158.

The foliage is dense (see HUT); the leaves are 'like those of our ash, but the leaflets more rounded and very dark, glossy, and evergreen.'⁵ It blossoms at the end of February, and the pods are found in enormous quantities in April and May. They are flat and narrow, from six to ten inches in length, of the shape of a horn, whence the Greek name [as above]. These husks are to be seen on the stalls in all Oriental towns, where they are sold for food' (Tristram, NHB 361).

Carob-pods, then, to the prodigal son took the place of bread—a poor but by no means an innutritious substitute.⁷ There are certainly two (2 K. 6 25 18 27 || Is. 36 12), and most probably three (Is. 1 20) OT passages in which the carob-pods may be referred to (see Che. Expos., July '99).

1. 2 K. 6 25, which should run thus, when the errors of an early scribe have been removed: '... and, behold, they besieged it, until a homer of lentils (הֶחָרִיב עֲרִישִׁים) was sold for fifty (so Ⓢ) shekels, and a quarter of a cor (כֶּבֶד) of carob-pods (חֹרֵבִים) for five shekels.'

² B elsewhere and AL everywhere have joined the Gentile 'Archite' to εἰραῖρος and produced the title ἀρχιεραῖρος, 'chief friend,' which BA once (1 Ch. 27 33) translate ὁ πρῶτος φίλος τοῦ βασιλέως.

⁴ On Ἀσομ=חֹשִׁים see Ball, SBOT, on Gen. 46 23.

⁶ In Enoch 82 4 the leaf of the tree of wisdom is compared to that of the carob tree.

⁷ Carobs are largely used in the composition of Thorley's food for cattle. English corn-dealers supply the pods under the name of 'locusts.' The brown hard seeds used to be the weights employed by jewellers for weighing gold and silver; hence the familiar term 'carat.'

HUZZAB

2. 2 K. 18 27: '... to the men who sit on the wall to eat their carob-pods (חֹרֵבִים) and to drink their sour wine (חֹמֶץ) with you.' So Is. 36 12.

3. Is. 1 20: 'If ye be willing and obedient, the good of the land shall ye eat; but if ye refuse and resist, carob-pods shall ye eat (חֹרֵבִים תֹּאכְלוּ).' So by a happy guess the Midrash Wayyikrà Rabbā 35.

These three passages are mutually illustrative. In a time of siege, when better victuals were scarce, men were only too glad of carob-pods and vinegar, and were sometimes even reduced to buy these at a high price. It is worth noticing that not a few coarse passages in the OT are due to corruption of the text. Cp DOVE'S DUNG.

4. It is a probable view that another reference to carob-pods occurs in Mt. 3 4 (John the Baptist's 'locusts').

It is true, the handbooks tell us that 'the Greek word for locusts [ἀκρίδες] shows the insect to be meant; not the ceratonia pods' (Sir Joseph Hooker, in Queen's Printers' Aids, 39 [80]), and Bochart's references for the eating of locusts have been copied again and again. The fact that dried locusts were and still are eaten is undenied (cp Lev. 11 22). Common sense, however, tells us that locusts would not have been preferred by the Baptist as his habitual food to nourishment supplied by the soil. Humility would not pass over the ordinary food of the poorest class, viz. carob-pods. It was a Jewish saying that 'Israel needs חֹרֵבִים (carob-pods) to do repentance' (Wayyikrà R. 35), and the Baptist was κατ' ἐξοχήν, the preacher of repentance. Mt. 3 is thoroughly Semitic in phraseology; the Greek translator or adapter may easily have made mistakes. חֹרֵבִים was possibly mistaken for חֲנוּמָה or חֲנוּמָה by one who remembered the Tg. of Lev. 11 22. Thomson's remark (LB 665), 'The name of "St. John's Bread" has been given to the gelatinous pods of this tree by pious pilgrims, anxious to rescue the Baptist from the imputation of feeding on locusts,' only shows that the realism of pilgrims may now and then be worth more than the learning of doctors. Cp JOHN THE BAPTIST.

HUT, RV, AV COTTAGE, Is. 24 20f (מְלוּנָה). In Is. 1 8a the same Hebrew word is rendered 'lodge,' in order not to tamper with a familiar piece of dignified old English. In Job 27 18 (cp מוֹתָה) and in Is. 1 8b a synonymous word (מְנוּחָה)¹ is rendered BOOTH. All these words mean the temporary shelter erected for the 'watcher' (מִשְׁמָר, Job 27 18) in a vineyard or garden of cucumbers.

The sort of booth now used in Syria is well described by Wetzstein in Del. Hibb⁽²⁾, 348, and an illustration is given in SBOT, 'Isaiah,' 162 (cp Niebuhr, Beschreib. v. Arabien, 1, Tab. 15, Fig. F). As the illustration shows, the floor or platform is sometimes bound at the corners to four poles, at some distance above the ground; the roof is formed of boughs of trees or matting. From its dense foliage, the carob-tree (see HUSKS) is specially adapted to supply the branches required (cp Bliss, PEFQ, July '99, p. 189). The same practical sense dictated the very common arrangement of huts of boughs on the house-tops in the heat of summer (see BED, § 1, end). The garden-huts (ὄσπαραφύλακτον, Ⓢ. Is. 18), however, are the more striking emblems of instability. When the winds with which they are bound are loosened by the withes of autumn, the shelter soon falls asunder and becomes a ruinous heap (cp Is. 24 20). Cp SCARECROW.

HUZ (חֹז), Gen. 22 21; RV UZ.

HUZZAB (חֹזָב; Η ΥΠΟΤΑΓΙC [BNAQ]), a corrupt word in Nah. 2 7 [8], which Rabbinic commentators supposed to be the name of the Assyrian queen. RV^{mg}.

treats it as a Hophal, from הִפְחִיל .—'and it is decreed' (so De Dieu; AV^{mg}. is still less plausible).

The first question is whether הִפְחִיל belongs properly to v. 7 [8] or to v. 6 [7]. In the former case, the conjectures offered under NĀHUM are more plausible than the renderings of AV and RV; in the latter, we require a noun in apposition to 'the palace' such as הַמְּצִיב (1 S. 13 23), and may render, 'the palace is in consternation, the garrison is terrified' ($\text{הַמְּצִיב בְּהִלָּה}$).¹ T. HYACINTH (ΥΔΑΚΙΝΘΙΝΟΣ), Rev. 9 17 RV, AV JACINTH (q.v.). See also SAPHIRE, PRECIOUS STONES.

HYÆNA, but EV HYENA (הַיָּנָא , יָנָא , יָנָא), Ecclus. 13 18†. The Sabūū' is the striped hyæna, H. striata, of S. Asia and N. Africa, which is meant. To express the intensity of class-hatred among the later Jews the wise man asks, 'Whence should there be peace between the hyæna and the dog? whence peace between the rich man and the poor?' It is true, he speaks only of the abhorrence of the rich for the poor; but the Psalms offer proof enough of the abhorrence of the poor for the rich. Indeed, Ben Sira himself evidently takes the part of the poor, for the hyæna is, in the eyes of the natives of Palestine, the meanest of the beasts of prey except the jackal. It is very cowardly, and attacks living animals only under pressure of hunger. Its food is carrion; it prowls about the graveyards, or if it meets with a skeleton already picked clean by vultures, it can still make a meal off it by crushing the bones with its powerful jaws and extracting the marrow. Those bones which baffle its gnawing power it carries back to its den. As a rule it is solitary. We thus see the force of the bitter cry of Yahwê, according to עֵ , in Jer. 12 9, 'Is my heritage (become) a hyæna's den to me?'

The passage is no doubt difficult; for another quite possible view of it see BIRD, col. 576, n. 2. עֵ 's reading, however, is in harmony with v. 8. Probably there is no interrogation. The first הַיָּנָא should be הַיָּנָא ; the second, הַיָּנָא . The second line will then become 'wild beasts (i.e., hyænas, etc.) are round about it' (Che.). Then the other wild beasts are summoned to aid in the desolation of Israel. On the form הַיָּנָא see Lag. Ubers. 36; but cp Kôn. Lehrg. 2a 137, n. 3.

We also meet with the hyæna in a place-name; valley of ZEBOIM [q.v.] probably means 'valley of hyænas.' The Horite proper name 'ZIBEON' [q.v.] also may be connected with the name of the same animal. This is not to be wondered at. The hyæna plays an important part in early Arabian beliefs (cp Rel. Sem. (2) 129, 133; Kinship, 198; and Lane, s.v. ḏab'ūn), and the diminutive form dabay'a is found frequently as a tribal name in Arabia, indicating perhaps a totemic belief.

An animal, half hyæna and half wolf, concerning which Arabian fables have much to say is the Sini' (sim'ūn), whose name, according to Robertson Smith, was borne by the totem-clans Sini' (a division of the Medinites). Cp also the Sam'an, and perhaps Heb. SHIMEI, SIMEON.

HYDASPES (ΥΔΑΣΠΗΣ [BNA]), a river mentioned in Judith 16 along with the Euphrates and the Tigris. The context shows that it cannot be the Indian Hydaspes (Jelum). On the assumption that the present reading is correct, it has been suggested that it is the Choaspes—which some commentators understand by the 'Medus Hydaspes' of Virgil (Georg. 4 211). The Vg. reads Jadason; but the Syriac has ܝܕܫܘܢ , i.e., ULAI (q.v.), and Ball (against Fritzsche) regards this as the probable original.

HYMENÆUS (ΥΜΕΝΑΙΟΣ [Ti.WH]). We cannot critically assert that Hymenæus was 'a false teacher of the time of St. Paul.' He is mentioned in 1 Tim. 1 20 2 Tim. 2 17. In the former passage he is represented as belonging (with Alexander) to those who have deliberately 'thrust away' both 'faith' and 'a good conscience, and have 'made shipwreck as regards the faith,' and who have been 'given over (by the writer) to the Satan, that they may learn by chastisement not to blaspheme.' In the latter he is included (with PHILETUS) among those who have 'swerved from the right direction (ἠσθηόχρησαν) as regards the truth,' saying that 'the resurrection has taken place already (i.e., in the intellectual sphere, Iren. Haer. 2 31), and who 'subvert the faith of some,' leading them (as v. 19 clearly implies) into the practice of 'unrighteousness.' By comparing 2 Tim. 2 16 18 with 1 Tim. 6 20 1 6 we see that the doctrine of a past resurrection belonged to that 'empty verbiage' which constitutes 'gnosis falsely so called' (κενοφωβίας, ματαιολογίας, τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως). All this, as Jülicher (summing up the conclusions of a long period of criticism) has pointed out, is thoroughly un-Pauline. We cannot, therefore, be sure that there were forerunners of the later Gnosis (cp προκόπτουσι, 2 Tim. 2 6) named Hymenæus, Alexander, and Philetus in Paul's time. And though it is no doubt possible to explain 1 Tim. 1 20 as a reference to an act of 'giving over to Satan,' said to have been performed by Paul (cp 1 Cor. 5 5) upon persons called Hymenæus and Alexander (a reference which had for its object the suggestion of church penalties for Gnostic teachers contemporary with the real writer of 1 Tim.), how do we know that the evidence of this fact (if evidence there were) was historically sound? We have to do with mere possibilities, and though it is reasonable to suppose that the author of the Pastoral Epistles, who shows such zeal for truth, was not a mere romancer, how can we tell that the presumed sources from which he (ex hypothesi) drew were worthy of the credit which he gave to them? The name Hymenæus may even suggest that in the source from which the writer possibly drew, the name of this Gnostic teacher was given him as an ironical nickname, because he 'forbade to marry' (see 1 Tim. 4 3). Cp PHILETUS, PASTORAL EPISTLES, EXCOMMUNICATION, GNOSIS.

Cp Zahn, Einkl. 1 412 472 486, who points out that in the Acta Thecla, 14, Demas and Hermogenes (2 Tim. 1 15 4 10) take the place of Hymenæus and Philetus. T. K. C.

HYMNS. Psalms and hymns and songs ($\omega\delta\alpha\iota$), suggested by the Spirit of God, and designed for use in the Christian assemblies, are spoken of in Col. 3 16 Eph. 5 19. The former passage is the fuller, and seems to be imitated in the latter.

² Be filled with spiritual influence, while ye speak to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spirit-given songs, singing songs and chanting psalms with your (whole) heart to the Lord . . . while ye give thanks always for all things' (Eph. 5 19).

The predominant tone of Christians is to be one of thanksgiving. Teaching or learning is not to be a

1. Nature. mere intellectual exercise; the truths taught or learned are to blossom, as it were, into hymns. Indeed, not only teaching, but also all words spoken and all deeds done are to suggest articulate or inarticulate thanksgiving to God the Father. The hymns are described by three terms, the first of which (psalms) may imply the influence of OT models, though it need not do more than express the suitability of the songs spoken of to be accompanied with music.¹ The songs are further described as πνευματικαί—i.e., suggested by the divine spirit which (or, who) dwells in the community, and those who are to sing the songs are directed to do so *ἐν χάριτι*²—i.e., pleasantly—so as to charm both singers and hearers. It is a mistake to infer from 'in your heart(s)' (ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις [or τῇ καρδίᾳ] ὑμῶν) that the singing is to be purely inward, as if the phrase formed an antithesis to 'teaching.' Inward psalm-singing would certainly not have contented the writer of Colossians. A spiritual impulse comparable in intensity to that of wine must have suggested audible expressions of praise. The phrase quoted is like קָרַבְלָהּ, which can undoubtedly mean 'with all your heart,' 'heartily' (the instrumental 'with' as in Ps. 122 [3] 15a).

² The reading of TR (ἐν χάριτι) is that of A^m*C^{ut} vid. Dc rel. Arm.; ἐν τῇ χάριτι is read by B^{nc} D*FG, Clem. The former is not the best attested; but it is the most suitable reading. Even as a conjecture it would be worth accepting. Cp Col. 4 6. Von Soden's rendering 'with thankfulness' for ἐν τῇ χάριτι is not, indeed, inappropriate; but it is too bold.

These are not the earliest references to 'spirit-given songs' among Christians. The language of the writers may perhaps presuppose the existence of a stock of songs, which were known (in more than one sense) by heart, and naturally rose to the lips even of those who had themselves no poetic gift. Turning to 1 Cor. we find ourselves in a somewhat different atmosphere. Says the apostle—'What is it then, brothers? Whenever you come together, each one has a psalm . . .' (1 Cor. 14:26). He means not that every Christian in the assembly feels an impulse to utter a freshly inspired psalm, but, as the context shows, that there is a conflict of gifts; one man breaking into song, another into a speech in a strange tongue. It sometimes even happened that the 'spirit-given song' was in a strange tongue, and unintelligible to the λίωτῆς or 'plain man,' so that the apostle has to declare that for his part if anything obscure comes out of his lips under inspiration he will not omit to interpret it.

'I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray also with the mind. I will chant a psalm with the spirit, and I will chant a psalm also with the mind' (1 Cor. 14:15).

To do justice to these NT facts we must consider two points: (1) the long continuance of the practice of writing psalms among the post-exilic Jews, and (2) the close affinity between prophecy and the composition of psalms for the use of the faithful. To illustrate the former point, we may refer to the Psalms of Solomon, the psalms in the Greek Daniel, in Judith and Tobit, and in the 'Assumption of Moses'; to illustrate the latter, to the prophetic character of Miriam and Deborah (both writers of 'spirit-given songs') and to the frequent occurrences of an oracular tone in the canonical psalms (cp Hickeys, The Spirit of Enthusiasm Exorcised, 31 f. [1709]). Since the Jewish psalms were certainly not uttered at random, but had their proper place in the services, we may assume that the psalms referred to by the apostle also had their proper place. Paul speaks of prayer and praise (προσεύχεσθαι and ψάλλειν) together. This would be the natural combination in the very earliest liturgical arrangements. From the fact, however, that 'a psalm' (ψαλμός) is mentioned alone in 14:26, we may infer (with Weizsäcker)¹ that the song of praise was as a rule more prominent than prayer (in the usual sense of the word).² Cp GOSPELS, § 26, n.

According to the scholar just mentioned, the psalm spoken of by Paul was not necessarily in every case a new and original composition. Certainly. But it does appear to be a probable inference that there was in every case a new and original element in it. Inspiration appears to be presupposed, and the inspiration of the canonical psalms, though often secondary in character, never fails to add some touches which redeem the work from the discredit of absolute unoriginality; if there be any exceptions to this rule, let it be conceded that such psalms have only been admitted to make up the required number of 150.

The songs ascribed in Lk. to Mary, Simeon, and Zachariah, and known to us as the Magnificat, the Palm Sunday, see HOSANNA), are obviously Jewish Christian hymns. Israel is the 'people' which is redeemed; its believing members are the 'poor' who are comforted. It is for no merely worldly conqueror, however, that these Christian psalmists look, but for one who can communicate 'forgiveness of sins.' It is the Christian community which speaks, and these 'canticles' gain in beauty and in interest by the recognition of this. That Resch¹ and Warfield should hold that Mary herself wrote the Magnificat, is unfortunate. The latter scholar, however, admits that 'had we met with the Magnificat in the midst of the Psalter it would have occasioned no suspicion and seemed in no sense out of place' (Expositor, '85 b, 304).

HYPOCRISY, HYPOCRITE

The ᾠδαί or songs given in the Apocalypse are more distinctly prophetic than the canticles in the

4. Songs of the Gospels. Weizsäcker (Apost. Age, 2260) divides them into two classes—those of the Apocalypse, which are related by their contents to the prophecy of the book, and those which, the contents being of a general nature, may be traditional. To the former class belong the song of triumph in chap. 18, the nuptial ode in 19:1-8, and the triumphal chant of the twenty-four elders in heaven, 11:17 f. To the latter belong the songs in 4:11 5:9 f. 12:15 f. 15:3 f. 11:17 f. The tone of triumph which pervades these odes or hymns is not less characteristically Christian than Jewish. 'Carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem' are the well-known words of Pliny (Ep. 97).

All these songs display in their structure, in more or less perfection, the characteristics of Hebrew poetry. It was a true insight which led the writer of codex A of the Greek Bible to place the 'prayers' of Mary (τῆς θεοτόκου), Simeon, and Zachariah, together with the ἕμνος ἑωθινός of the Gloria in Excelsis (with an appendix of quotations from the psalms), at the end of the ᾠδαί which follow the Psalms of Solomon. HYPOCRISY, HYPOCRITE, HYPOCRITICAL.

AV's rendering of הָיָה (Job 8:13 [eight times in Job], Ps. 85:16 Prov. 11:9 Is. 9:16 [17] 10:6 32:6 33:14), for which RV has substituted respectively 'godless,' 'profane,' 'profaneness.' But in Ecclus. 1:29 32:15 33:2, RV retains 'hypocrite' (in 2 Macc. 6:25 RV 'disimulation'), and in Mt. 6:25 16:7 Lk. 12:1 Pt. 2:1 etc. (a large group of passages). ὑποκριτής = הָיָה is found in Q in Job 34:30 36:13†, an inconsistency due to the incorporation of passages of Theod. Aq., Theod., and Sym., all sometimes have ὑποκριτής, ὑπόκρισις, for הָיָה, הָיָה. Is this due to the imposition of a late meaning on passages where הָיָה really has quite another sense? Or may we hold with Hatch (Biblical Greek, 92) that 'early in the second century and among Greek-speaking Jews,' ὑποκρ. had come to connote positive badness or irreligion? To decide these points we must observe that on exegetical grounds הָיָה hānēf, in the OT must primarily mean 'polluted.'

A hānēf is not simply a wicked person; he is one who by impiety has become unholy, and therefore cannot enter God's presence (Job 13:16). This loss of religious standing of course implies certain moral or immoral characteristics. First of all, 'speaking impicty' (הָיָה, Is. 9:17 [16])—a note of character which is also assigned to the 'impious' man (הָיָה, see FOOL) in Is. 32:6. Next, the unholy state involves (as indeed these two passages imply) the commission of wicked actions, such as violation of the marriage bond (Jer. 3:1 [2]), murder (Nu. 35:33 Is. 24:5 Ps. 106:38), and apostasy (Dan. 11:32). For a community to be hānēf involves its abandonment by its God to a foreign oppressor (Is. 106 Mic. 4:11).

As a class-name hānēf appears to be late (see references above); hōnēf (Is. 32:6) and hānuppah (Jer. 23:15) are also late.

The verb hānēf first appears in Jer. 3:2 9:28 11, where (as also in Mic. 4:11, later than the prophet Micah) it clearly means 'to be polluted.' In the Psalter, remarkably enough, the class-name hānēf occurs only once, and then only if we emend the text; the 'hypocritical (RV 'profane') mockers in feasts' of

AV (Ps. 35 16) must disappear; but in Ps. 146 [7] (= 585 [6]) הָרָג should probably be restored (for הָרָג, הָרָג). The sense 'polluted' is supported by Pesh. (the verb הָרָג = 'naś) and Tg. (the verb sometimes = הָרָג).

The facts here adduced appear decisive. If Jesus used Aram. hanfā in the sense of the OT הָרָג, he cannot have meant to convey the idea of 'hypocrite.' It is not certain, however, that he did. There may have been a second Heb. and Aram. root הָרָג meaning 'to be untruthful,' 'dishonest' (cp Ar. hanafa, 'to incline'; hanifa, 'to be bandy-legged').

In Am. Tab. 1818, hanāfu apparently means 'to slander' (Wi.), and in old Egypt hnp seems to be a Semitic loan-word = 'false,' applied to weights (WMM, PSBA, 6th Feb. '94). It is apparently this second root which has established itself in New Hebrew (הָרָג = hypocrisy, dishonesty, flattery) and has produced the renderings of the Greek versions of the OT referred to, and perhaps also the Syriac use of hanfā, 'pagan,' the word which corresponds to the ἐθνικός of Mt. 67 18 17 in Curet., Sin., Pesh.

On the whole it seems unwise, until further evidence is produced, to change the rendering of ὑποκριταί in the NT into 'impious ones' as suggested by Hatch. Probably, however, 'dishonest ones' would be better than 'hypocrites.' Jesus may, perhaps, have been thinking of the false Pharisees, called in a well-known saying 'the dyed ones.' See PHARISEES.

The above explanation of הָרָג differs from that given in the recent lexicons. BDB connects hanif with Ar. hanafa, 'to incline or decline,' whence hanif, applied by Mohammed to Moslems (as inclining to the truth). Yet, somewhat inconsistently, BDB gives as the first sense 'to be polluted.' Ges. (13) on the other hand gives two Arabic connections, and, quite consistently, makes the first meaning 'to be impious, or faithless.' Neither lexicon, however, explains how the senses 'to be impious' and 'to be polluted' are connected; hāmē in Heb. and hanfā in Aram. never mean 'impious.' That falseness and impiety are connected, is easy to understand (see TRUTH); but the statement 'the land was polluted' could not be expressed by words which might permissibly be rendered 'the land was untruthful.' On the difficult class-term hanif see We. Heid. (2) 238 f. 250 (end); also Lane, Lex., who states that according to some it was applied by idolaters to themselves as a term of praise, whilst according to others it was applied by them to those who followed the Din Ibrahim. It is not clear that BDB is right in comparing the Heb. class-term hanif with the Ar. class-term hanif; but this Lex. renders a service by pointing out, however inconsistently, that hanif implies primarily, not 'wickedness,' but 'pollution.' This was the view of those famous Jewish lexicographers, the Karāite David ben Abraham (roth cent.) and Ibn Janāb (11th cent.), both of whom define הָרָג as meaning 'defilement.'¹

Eustathius, the commentator on the Iliad, gives this interesting definition of 'hypocrite' (on Il. η, 564, ap. Schleusner):—ὑποκριτὴς παρὰ τοῖς ὑστερογενέσις ῥήτορσιν ὁ μὴ ἐκ ψυχῆς λέγων ἢ πράττων, ἀλλ' ὅπως φρονεῖ, οὐσίους πρῶτως μάλιστα οἱ ἐκ θυμῆος, οἱ σκηνικοί. This will express the ordinary view of the meaning of the 'hypocrites' of the Gospels; but it is not altogether what Jesus meant. We need an interpretation of the word actually spoken by Jesus which will cover both the wickedness which acts a part (as, e.g., in Mt. 62 5 16 Mk. 76 Lk. 642 13 15) and the wickedness which needs not to simulate, and is readily recognised as παιρεία (Mt. 22 18 Lk. 2023). Cp Lk. 1246, where ἀπίστων is || to Mt.'s ὑποκριτῶν, and is most naturally paraphrased 'irreligious.' T. K. C.

HYRCANUS. 1. For John Hyrcanus, see MACCABEES, § 7.

2. (υρκανος του τωβλου), son of Tobias, who had a large amount of wealth deposited in the temple at the time when Heliodorus came to plunder it (2 Macc. 313, AV HYRCANUS). The name was not uncommon among Jews, owing to the deportation of Jews to Hyrcania by Ochus about 350 B.C. (?). Nevertheless, it is plausible to identify this Hyrcanus with the 'Jewish

HYSSOP

Alcibiades' of the same name (referred to in Jos. Ant. xii. 4 11), who, like his father, became a collector of the revenue of Palestine under the Egyptian government. The splendid remains of Arāk el-Emir (see Baed. Pal. (2), 173) still attest his magnificence, and an inscription copied there by Gautier has led Clermont Ganneau (Rev. Crit., '97, p. 503) to conclude that the Jewish name of the builder was Tobiah (Jos. Ant. xii. 4 2 represents a Tobiah as his grandfather).

It is also possible to find a veiled reference to this Hyrcanus in Zech. 114-17, where 'the prominent man who does not fill the shepherd's office in his own interest, but in that of the flock, and gives it up as soon as he sees that the flock is not worthy of him' seems to correspond to the proud character and high-flown plans of Hyrcanus (We. Kl. P. (2), 196). Cp ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.

HYSSOP (חִיְסוֹף, 'ezōb; ὕσσωπος: Ex. 122 Lev.

144649 51 f. Nu. 196 18 1 K. 433 [5 13] Ps. 51 7 [9] Jn. 19 29 [but see below]; Heb. 9 19†), a small wall-growing plant, well adapted for sprinkling, and hence regularly used to sprinkle blood in various purificatory rites.

The name may be of Sem. origin, as kindred forms are found in Ass., Aram., Ar., and Eth.: ὕσσωπος is probably derived from the Sem. word, and, from Greek, has passed into modern languages. But whatever the ὕσσωπος of the Greeks may have been, the Heb. 'ezōb can hardly be our 'hyssop' (Hyssopus officinalis, L.), which is not a native of Palestine.

There have been endless conjectures as to the plant intended (see esp. the 42 pp. in Celsius 1407 ff.). Many have adopted the opinion of Maimonides, who identifies it with the sa'tar of the Arabs—i. e., with some species of Satureia. It is, however, doubtful whether Satureia is a wall-plant; the only species in Palestine is Satureia Thymbra. A more probable identification is that with the caper plant (Capparis spinosa). This bright green creeper has a special fondness for rocks and walls, and is plentiful in Egypt, in the Sinaitic peninsula, in the gorge of the Kidron, and on the walls of Jerusalem (Tristram).

The similarity of 'ezōb to 'asaf, an Arabic name for the caper, is a further argument adduced by Tristram (NHB 457); but the philological connection is doubtful.

The cleansing properties of this plant appear to be traditional in the East (cp Watt, Dict. Econom. Products of India, 2 133). On the whole this identification deserves the preference, unless we choose rather to suppose that the word is somewhat general, including various herbs of the nature of thyme, savory, and marjoram. On the ritual use of hyssop see SACRIFICE.

[Jn. 19 29 states that 'they filled a sponge with vinegar and put it upon hyssop' (ὕσσωπος); Mk. 15 36 says 'upon a reed' (καλάμω). 'A hyssop stalk, then,' say the commentators. But see Naber (Mnemosyne, 363 [78]), who defends the reading ὕσσωπος conjectured by Joachim, Camerarius, and Bentley, and actually found in hscr* [Ti].¹ In v. 34 the spear used in piercing the side is called λόγχη; but ὕσσωπος was at all events a well-known word for javelin (Lat. pilum). De Dieu (Crit. Sac. 526 f. [1593]) gives an elaborate note on the reading ὕσσωπος. He rejects the conjecture of Camerarius, and no wonder, for that scholar thought it necessary to read ὕσσωπος προπεριβύθους, 'binding it [the sponge] round the top of a spear.' He is half inclined to accept the much worse conjecture of D. Heinsius that we should read οἶσνον περιβύθους (scil. καλάμω). That Greek medical writers used ὕσσωπος corruptly for οἶσνον (the grease extracted from wool, and waxed, which was used as a sedative for the pain of wounds) is certain. But the refreshment offered to Jesus was sour wine (ὄξος) mixed with myrrh; what was wanted in addition was not οἶσνον but something to bring the refreshment to the sufferer's mouth. ὕσσωπος suits the context, οἶσνον does not. WH notes corruption in the passage: no other word but ὕσσωπος is available: πω before περι is not a surprising addition. The text of Jn. 19 29d should therefore probably run, 'so they put a sponge full of sour wine upon a javelin, and brought it to his mouth.' N. M.—W. T. T.—D.—T. K. C.

IBHAR (יְבָרָה), 'He (God) chooses,' § 53; cp בְּרָחָה יְבָרָה, C/S 2 no. 147; בְּאֵר [BN], יֵבֵט. [AL]), a son of DAVID (g.v., § 11, col. 1032), 2 S. 515 (עֲבֵאֵר [B], יֵבֵטֵאֵר [A]), 1 Ch. 36 145.

IBIS (יְבִיִּסָה), Lev. 11 19† RV^{mg}; EV HERON (g.v.).

IBLEAM (יְבִלְעָם); local names of this formation [cp AMMI, NAMES WITH, col. 138, n. 1, § 3; NAMES, § 97] may have been originally clan-names; י[ע]בְּלֵאָם [BAL]), together with its 'daughters' (i.e., dependencies), was one of the towns whose (Canaanite) inhabitants Manasseh was unable to drive out (Judg. 127, בְּלֵאָם and יֵבֵט. [B], בְּלֵאָם and יֵבֵט. [A], יֵבֵטֵאָם [L]).

In Josh. 17 11 the mention of Ibleam is not original, as it is manifest that the whole passage has been arranged to suit Judg. 127 (om. BA, יֵבֵטֵאָם [L]).¹

It was near Ibleam at the ascent of GUR that Ahaziah, king of Israel, was slain; 2 K. 9 27 (עֲבֵלְעָם [B]).

According to MT, 2 K. 15 10, Zechariah, the son of Jeroboam, was slain by Shallum, עֲבֵלְעָם. This un-Hebraic phrase, which RV ungrammatically renders 'before the people' (a legacy from AV), was emended by Grätz (Gesch. 21 99) to בְּיְבִלְעָם, 'in Ibleam'—a happy conjecture which was afterwards confirmed by Ⓢ (ἐν יֵבֵטֵאָם, κεβλααμ. [BA]).

In 1 Ch. 6 70 [55] the name appears as BILEAM (יְבִלְעָם, om. B), and perhaps in Judith in several forms (see BELMEN). It seems to have been near EN-GANNIM, and the name has probably survived in the Wady (and Bir) Bel'ameh, about half-an-hour S. of Jenin. The identification with el-Jelameh is unsatisfactory: this place is situated in an open plain, there is no pass in the neighbourhood, and it could never have been a place of great strength.² Ibleam occurs together with Taanach in the list of Palestinian cities subdued by Thothmes III. in the sixteenth century B.C. (Y-b-ra'-a-my, see WMM, As. u. Eur. 195). See GATH-RIMMON, 2. S. A. C.

IBNEIAH (יְבִנְיָה), 'Yahwè builds up,' § 31; cp IBNIJAH; בְּנֵי־יָהּ [B], יֵבֵטֵנְיָה [AL]), head of one of the Benjaminite clans settled in Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (1 Ch. 98). In || Neh. 118 the name appears as GABBAL. See GABBAL.

IBNIJAH (יְבִנְיָה); בְּנֵי־יָהּ [B], יֵבֵטֵנְיָה [A], יֵבֵטֵנְיָה [L]), a Benjamite (1 Ch. 98). Cp IBNEIAH.

IBRI (יְבִרִי), אֲבֵי [B], אֲבֵי [A], אֲבֵרִיָּה [L]), a Merarite Levite (1 Ch. 24 27); see BENO, JAAZIAH. In view of the way in which the Chronicler built up his name-lists (see GENEALOGIES i. § 7 [ii. f.]), it becomes highly probable that for עֲבִירִי we should read יְבִרִי,³ which the Chronicler seems to have used as a useful Merarite 'dummy' name.

ABDI (1), ABDA (2), and the cognate OBADIAH (3) occur in the genealogy of the Merarite Ethan-Jeduthan, and to the same Levitical division belong the names OBED-EDOM, OBED (4), and OBADIAH (5). S. A. C.

IBSAM (יְבִשָּׁם), 1 Ch. 7 2 RV; AV JBSAM.

IBZAN (יְבִצָּן, Judg. 12 8-10†; אֲבֵי־צָן [B], εἰσεβων [AL], ἀψανηκ [Jos.]), one of the six minor judges in the Book of Judges, belonged to Bethlehem (i.e., not the place of that name in Judah, as Jos. Ant. v. 7 13, but the Bethlehem in the land of Zehulun), and was buried there (v. 10, ἐν εἰσεβων [A]).

The name seems to be connected with that of ABEZ; cp Cain and Cainan, Hazor and Hezron, Sbema and Shim'on (Simeon). He 'had thirty sons, and sent out thirty daughters, and brought in from abroad thirty daughters for his sons'—i.e., was the head of a widely ramified clan.

ICE (יְצֵה), Ps. 147 17 Job 6 16 EV, etc. In Ezek. 1 22 RV^{mg}; AV CRYSTAL. See FROST.

ICHABOD (יְחִיבֹד), h. Phinebas, b. Eli, the brother of Ahitub (1 S. 143, ἰωχαβηλ [B; om. A], -be [L], Jos. ἰαχαβηλ [Niese], יְחִיבֹד [Pesh.]). In a passage of later date (1 S. 4 21 f.), resembling the narrative of the birth of Benjamin (Gen. 35 16 ff.), an account is given of his birth and a quasi-historical explanation of his name. The tidings of the loss of the ark and of the death of Eli and his sons are stated to have reached the wife of Phinebas as she lay in childbirth; she named the new-born babe 'Ichabod,' saying, 'The glory (כְּבוֹד, i.e., the divine glory) is departed from Israel' (cp Hos. 10 5, also 1 Macc. 28, ἀνγκυρὴ ἐνδοξος).¹ A touching story, but one that is obviously suggested by a popular etymology.

Instead, however, of at once seeking for this etymology, let us apply for a suggestion to the versions. In 1 S. 4 21 Ⓢ gives οὐαβαρχαβωθ [B], οὐαχαβωθ [A], οὐαβαρωχαβηθ [L], יְחִיבֹד [Pesh.]. Ⓢ's reading is variously expressed as representing אֵי, 'woe on the streets' (We.), or אֵי עֵבֶר כְּבוֹד, 'alas! the glory has passed away' (Klo.). Ⓢ A, however, suggests a simpler reading, אֵי יְבִיבֹד. In 1 S. 14 3 the Vss. (see above) presuppose the reading יְבִיבֹד, JOCHEBED (g.v.), and Ⓢ L's reading in 1 S. 4 22 combines this with the first part of Ⓢ's. It is very plausible to suppose that tradition gave a slight turn to this name, so as to reflect the painful feelings of contemporaries of the capture of the ark (cp Ben-om side by side with Benjamin in Gen. 35 18).

In short, the popular etymology presupposed by 1 S. 4 21 was not יְחִיבֹד, 'inglorious' (Jos. ἀδόξα), but יְבִיבֹד, 'alas for the glory' (so Klost.; cp 1 K. 13 30 Am. 5 16). If so, we must decline the view (proposed afresh by Marq. Fund. 24) that the original name was Abi-cabod (cp JESSE, JEZEBEL). Jochebed (or Jocabod)—i.e., 'Yahwè is glory'—would seem to be the true name—certainly an appropriate one for the brother of Ahi-tub, i.e., 'The (divine) brother is goodness.' It will be seen from these facts that Hommel's explanation, 'Ai (=Yah) is glory' (AHT 116), is, to say the least, quite needless. One point remains. The vicissitudes of ethnic names are so strange that we may surmise I-cahod, or rather Jochehed, to be the original form of the name Jacob (Che.); see JOCHEBED.

ICONIUM (IKONION [Ti. WH], mod. Konia). The site has preserved a single name from the earliest times. The town was selected by the Seljûk Sultans as their capital, owing partly to its central position, and partly to its pleasant surroundings, which are in great contrast to the rest of the Lycaonian plain (cp Strabo, 568). The gardens of the suburbs are still a pleasant feature; they depend entirely on irrigation (cp Nik. Chon. 542). The town lies on the W. edge of the vast upland plain of Lycaonia; the mountains rise six miles to the W., whilst on the N. and S. at a distance of ten miles are ranges of hills.

On first seeing Konia from the hills above, the traveller is struck by its open and undefended position, lying as it does in the plain, with no natural citadel, and equally by its apparent size. Modern Iconium very meagrely fills out its old framework. Little remains of old Iconium' (Hogarth in JHS 11, 154).

Under the Persian empire Iconium was the frontier city of Phrygia (first mention in Xen. Anab. i. 219, τῆς Φρυγίας πόλις ἐσχατή, sc. in the direction of Lycaonia). In precise agreement with this is the implication in Acts 146, that in traversing the eighteen miles between Iconium and Lystra the apostles crossed the Lycaonian frontier. Yet the city is assigned to Lycaonia by Pliny, Strabo (l.c.), and Cicero (Ad Fam. 154: castra in Lycaonia apud Iconium). This is because during the first century before and after Christ the town was united with Lycaonia for administrative purposes. Under Roman dominion geographical facts prevailed over ethnical affinities, and Iconium was recognised as the centre of Lycaonia and the capital of its tetrarchy of fourteen cities added to Galatia Proper probably about 160 B.C. (Plin. HN 595: the region called Προσειλημμένη, the Added Land, by Ptol. v. 410). In Acts 146, therefore, the writer speaks according to local Iconian, not official, usage.

In 39 B.C. this district (i.e., part of Lycaonia, with Isauria and some of Cilicia Tracheia), was given by Antony to M. Antonius Polemon (Strabo, 568); but Iconium and the Lycaonian part of Polemon's kingdom soon passed into the hands of Amyntas, who in 25 B.C. left his kingdom to the Romans. By them it was formed into the Province Galatia. When Claudius turned his attention to the fringe of the Empire, Iconium was given the title Claudian (50-54 A.D.), and struck coin as Claudeikonion—a title which expresses the bare of the town in the Romanisation of the Province, and its pride in its position. Not until Hadrian's time was Iconium raised to the rank of a Colony, with the title Aelia Hadriana Iconiensium. Hence in Paul's time the town was popularly described as Phrygian, officially as Galatian, or Phrygo-Galatian (i.e., belonging to that part of Phrygia which was attached to Galatia Provincia; so in Acts 166: 'and they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia,' διήλθον δὲ τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν, referring to this district. See PHRYGIA, but cp GALATIA, ITUREA). In polite style its inhabitants would be addressed as Γαλάται, for Φρύγες in ordinary parlance meant slaves (cp Cic. pro Flacc. 65: hoc vetus proverbium, Phrygem plagis fieri solere meliorem). The name Lycaeones, again, would have been peculiarly inappropriate at any time between 37 and 72 A.D. as it then signified the inhabitants of the non-Roman part of Lycaonia, the subjects of king Antiochus (cp his coins with the legend ΑΤΚΑΘΝΩΝ). The only other possible mode of address would have been to use the title 'Ἕλληνας.

The idea supported by Farrar, that Paul and Barnabas used the frontier like brigands, must be rejected. They found safety in an intelligent use of the self-government of the various cities.

The events in Iconium, where the magistrates (ἀρχοντες, native, not Roman, officials) play so active a part, illustrate the difference in attitude displayed by the Roman colonial and ordinary municipal magistrates towards the new teaching (cp Ramsay, St. Paul, 304 f.). Iconium owed its importance in Paul's time to its connection with the backbone of the Roman road-system in Asia Minor (i.e., the great road from Ephesus to the Euphrates) by a cross-road running northwards to Laodicea Katakekaumene (Combusta) about nine hours distant (Strabo, 663; traversed by Paul, Acts 166). It lay itself in the direct route to the Cilician Gates (by way of Barata and Kybistra). This commercial importance is illustrated by the presence of many Greeks and Jews (Acts 141, cp the inscrip.: see Rams. Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, 266, 673); the latter evidently possessed considerable influence (Acts 145). Timothy's reputation had easily spread from his native town to the Jews of Iconium (Acts 162). 'One of the most extensive groups of early Christian inscriptions belongs to Iconium and the country N. and NE. from it' (Rams. Hist. Comm. 220). The city seems to have been the centre from which Christianity radiated in S. Galatia (cp Rams. Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, 2511). It was the scene of the legend of Thecla. According to tradition Sosipatros, one of the Seventy, was bishop of Iconium, and was succeeded by Terentius, also one of the Seventy (Rom. 16 21 f.).

IDOL, a representation of a deity which is made an object of worship. In this article the word is used in the restricted sense to designate an iconic representation, an image; on the aniconic agalmata see MASSEBAH, ASHERAH; cp also IDOLATRY, § 2.

a. A name for 'image' common to all the Semitic languages is selem (סֵלֶם, š generally elcōn, also omoloma, elδwlon).

Sēlem is used of the golden images of field mice and of tumours (?) which the Philistines sent to appease the anger of Yabwē when they returned the ark (1 S. 65 11); of figures of 1. Names. Chaldeans painted on a wall (Ezek. 23 14); cp also Gen. 126 f. (man made in the image of God), 96 53; of idols, Ezek. 7 20 (of gold and silver), 16 17 (images of males), 2 K. 11 13 Nu. 33 52 Dan. 3 1 ff. (in Aramaic). In this sense the word does not occur in any writer earlier than the later part of the seventh century (in Am. 5 26 it is a gloss).

b. Another general name for idols is šābbīm (שָׁבִיִּים, sing., Is. 48 5 'šēb, conformed to שָׁב, 'pain');¹ usually εἰδωλα, also γλυπτὰ, θεοί.

Hosea speaks contemptuously of 'šābbīm as the manufacture of craftsmen (13 2, parallel to massēkâh, 'molten image'; note also 'the calves' in the following clause); they were of silver and gold (8 4, cp Ps. 115 4); see also 4 17 14 8 [9]. Is. 48 5 couples the name with pesel and nesek, 'graven image and molten image'; see, further, Is. 46 1 (Bel and Nebo), Jer. 50 2 (Bel and Merodach); 1 S. 31 9 2 S. 5 21 (gods of the Philistines; see below, § 3) Zech. 13 2 Is. 10 11 Ps. 106 36 38.

The derivation of the word is not clear; according to the most probable etymology the primary meaning is akin to that of pesel, a work of sculpture (cp the verb, Job 10 8 Jer. 44 19). Jewish scholars in the Middle Ages connected it with the ordinary meaning of the verb 'āšab and its derivatives in Hebrew, and interpreted 'cause of woe'; but this would be possible only if we could suppose that the name, like šlīm, šlām, etc. (see below, § 3), was coined by the haters of idolatry.²

c. Sēmel (שֵׁמֶל, εἰκὼν, γλυπτὸν) is used by Ezekiel in (83 5) speaking of a particular idol in the temple at Jerusalem, called שֵׁמֶל הַקְּהִינָא (sēmel haqqhīn'āh), 'the jealousy image,' because, it is explained (v. 3), it provokes (Yahwē) to jealousy.³ (Cp CHUIN and SICCUTH.) The word occurs also in Dt. 4 16, 'an image in the form of male or female'; 2 Ch. 33 7 15, where sēmel is put in the place of the āšhērāh of 2 K. 21 7 (pesel is a gloss both in Kings, l.c., and in Ch. v. 7). In Phœnician semel (סמל, ἰδὼν) is a statue of a man or woman (CIS 1, no. 88, l. 2; no. 91, l. 1).

In Hebrew sēmel seems to be a loan-word introduced in the sixth century.

d. Ptsel (פֶּטֶל, plur. פֶּטִילִים; usually γλυπτὸν, also εἰκὼν, γλύμμα, εἰδωλον), EV 'graven image.' The verb from which this noun is derived is used of cutting, hewing, or dressing wood or stone (e.g., 1 K. 5 18 [32]). The graven image is described as the work of a craftsman (שֵׁמֶל, hārās, Is. 40 19 f. Dt. 27 15; see HANDICRAFTS, § 1); it was commonly of wood (Is. 40 20 44 15 45 20, cp Dt. 7 5 25 12 3), but sometimes of stone (Is. 21 9, idols of Babylon). As the graven image was probably always the commonest kind of image, the word pesel is frequently used generically for 'idol' (Ex. 20 4 Dt. 5 8), even for those which were cast in metal, the specific name of which was massēkâh (Is. 30 22 40 19 44 10 Jer. 10 14, cp Judg. 17 4); on the massēkâh see below (e). The pesel might represent human or animal forms, or the heavenly bodies (Ex. 20 4 Dt. 5 8, especially Dt. 4 16 23 25).

See further Hos. 11 2 (parallel to 'the baals'), Mi. 1 7 5 13 [12] Nah. 1 14 Hab. 2 18 Jer. 8 19 2 K. 17 41, frequent in Is. 40 ff. Jer. 10 50 61.

e. The counterpart of the 'graven image' is the 'molten image,' massēkâh (מַסֵּכָה, also מִסְכָּה, nesek, Is. 41 29 48 5 Jer. 10 14 51 17, and מִסְכָּה, n'sēk, Dan. 11 8; usually χωνευτὸν, occasionally χώνευμα, γλυπτὸν), properly an image of metal cast in a mould, the work of the founder (מִסְכָּה, šōrēph, goldsmith; specially idol-maker, Is. 40 19 41 7 46 6 Jer. 10 9 14; cp Judg. 17 4). The name is used repeatedly of the golden 'calf' which Aaron made (Ex. 32 4 8, cp 2 4b, 'I cast it into the fire and out came this calf,' Dt. 9 12 16 Neh. 9 18), a story aimed at the worship of the Yahwē bulls in the kingdom of Israel; cp 2 K. 17 16 (where 'two calves' is a gloss to 'a molten image,' 1 K. 14 9). See also Hos. 13 2 (of silver; cp 28 [30] Ps. 106 19). The 'molten image' is the only kind of idol specifically prohibited in the oldest legislation (Ex. 34 17, repeated Lev. 19 4, cp Nu. 33 52). Pesel and massēkâh are frequently coupled, to include every species of idol; Nah. 1 14 Hab. 2 18 Is. 48 5 Jer. 10 14=51 17 Dt. 27 15. The name and the thing were probably adopted from the Canaanites; in Phœnician to cast, found, metal is נָסַק, nāsak, in Hebrew נָצַץ, yāsāz (1 K. 7 46, etc.).

² The older Jewish explanation of the name—these idols were called šābbīm, because they were made of joints or members (Sifra on Lev. 19 4)—is based on an etymology which we do not understand.

f. In Lev. 26 1 then maškīth (מַשְׁכִּית אֲבָן); ³ BAL λιθον σκοπόν, ³ F λιθοσκοπόν; RV 'figured stone,' mentioned with šlīm, pesel, massēkâh, as an object of idolatrous worship, is generally, and doubtless rightly, understood of a stone with images in relief, such, for example, as the winged solar disk; cp Nu. 33 52 (plur. מַשְׁכִּיתֵי, maškīyōth, ³ C σκοπίάς) in a similar context; also Ezek. 8 12 (³ C κρυπτῶ), chambers in private houses decorated with mythological reliefs or paintings (?).¹

See for further illustration of the meaning of the word, Prov. 25 11 (embossed silver vessels), Is. 2 16, and the tropical uses in Ps. 73 7 Prov. 18 11.

g. In Is. 45 16 the מַשְׁכִּיתֵי צִירִים, hārāsē šīrīm, are makers of 'figures,' idols; cp NH מַשְׁכִּיתֵי. MT intends a play on צִירִים, 'pangs.' ³ has a different text. Cp also נָצַץ, Hab. 2 18. Cheyne reads מַשְׁכִּיתֵי.

h. In the prohibitions of idolatry the words šmūnāh and tabnīth are of frequent occurrence.

Of the two šmūnāh (שְׁמוּנָה), ³ generally ὁμοίωμα, also δόξα, μορφή, ὁμοίωσις [A] is connected with mīn, 'species,' and is properly that which is distinctive in the appearance of a thing (see Nu. 12 8 Ps. 17 15, also Job 4 16 ³ C μορφή; in the laws, Ex. 20 4 Dt. 5 8 4 12 15 f. 23 25). Tabnīth (תַּבְנִית, ³ commonly ὁμοίωμα, sometimes more exactly παράδειγμα) is properly a building-plan, pattern, model (e.g., Ex. 25 9 2 K. 16 10), hence 'likeness' (Ezek. 8 3); Dt. 4 16 ff. Is. 4 13 Ezek. 8 10 (gloss from Dt. 4 17 f.).

i. Other words translated in EV 'idol' or 'image' are mīph-lēseth, מִפְּלֵצֶת, 1 K. 15 13 (see below, § 2 f.); massēbâh, מַסֵּבָה, šanmānīm, מַשְׁנָמִים (see MASSEBAH); tērāphīm, תְּרָפִים (see TERAPHIM); cp also EPHOD.²

j. Greek names in Apocrypha and NT are εἰδωλον (1 Macc. 1 43 47 etc., 2 Macc. 12 40 Tob. 14 6 Wisd. 14 11 f. etc., Acts 7 41 15 20 Rom. 2 22 1 Cor. 8 4 etc., Rev. 9 20 etc.); εἰκὼν (Wisd. 13 16 14 15 17 Rom. 1 23 Rev. 13 14 etc., 14 9 11 15 2 etc.); εἶδος (Wisd. 15 4); γλυπτὸν (1 Macc. 5 68 Wisd. 14 16 15 13 etc.).

The words discussed in the preceding section are the proper names for idols in general or for particular species; they may all, so

2. Opprobrious terms for idols and idolatry.

As far as we know, have been used without offence by the worshippers themselves.⁴ Beside these, however, we find in the OT a great variety of terms which express the writers' contempt for the idols and their abhorrence of idolatry. These are of much more frequent use, and indeed in some books predominate so that the proper designations occur rarely or not at all. Some of these terms are rendered in EV ad sensum, 'idols.'

They describe the idols, or the heathen gods identified with the idols, as unreal, vain (מַשְׁ, šāw, Jer. 13 15 Ps. 31 6 [7] etc.; מַשְׁ, hēbhel, Jer. 2 5 8 19 Dt. 32 21, and often), or false (מַשְׁ, šeker, Is. 44 20 Jer. 10 14 etc.; מַשְׁ, šūābūm, Am. 2 4 etc.; מַשְׁ, šūābūm, Is. 41 29 66 3 etc.); no-gods (לֹא אֱלֹהִים, lō 'ēlōhīm, Is. 41 24 etc.); impotent (לֹא יִשְׁעוּ, lō 'išēu, Jer. 2 8 etc.), lifeless, mere carcases (מֵתִים, mētīm, Ps. 106 28; מֵתִים, šegāwīm, Lev. 26 30; cp Wisd. 13 10 17 etc.).

The following words of this class require somewhat

² [מַשְׁכִּיתֵי צִירִים in 2 Ch. 3 10, 'image (AVmg. 'moveable') work' is obscure; see comm. ad loc. || 1 K. 6 23 has מַשְׁכִּיתֵי.]

fuller discussion; (a) ēlīlim (עִלְיִלִּים, Ἐἰδωλα, χειροποίητα, βδελύγματα, etc.), first in Is. 28 20, perhaps coined by the prophet, and in secondary or doubtful passages, 10 10 f. 19 13 31 7; further, Hab. 2 18 Jer. 14 14 (כִּי־יָרָז) Ezek. 30 13 Lev. 19 26 1 Ps. 96 5 97 7.

The derivation of the word is disputed; the most probable and next widely accepted hypothesis is that it is connected with the negation אֵל, al, 'not'; cp Ass. ul, 'not', ullu, 'non-being', ulīlu, 'powerless' (Del. Ass. HWB, 71), Syr. āll, 'weak' (in body or mind); also NH לֵלֵן (Levy, NHWB 1 86); see Job 13 4 (Ἐ κακῶν), where ēlil is parallel to šeker, 'falsehood, deceit'. Others regard ēlil as etymologically a derivative of ēl, 'god' (diminutive, Movers, Fürst); cp ἡλιόλι in Sabæan inscriptions (Nö. SBAW, 1882, p. 1191). The word was then by popular etymology associated with al, 'not'. The similarity of sound leads to the paronomasia עִלְיִלִּים עִמְעַתְּ לֵלֵן (Ps. 96 5, 'all the ēlōhim of the nations are ēlīlim); see also Hab. 2 18. It does not appear, however, that this design was intended in the formation of the word.

δ. The favourite word for idols in Ezekiel is gillūlim (גִּלְלִיִּים, Ἐ most frequently εἰδωλον, but often ἐνόμημα, also βδελγμα, ἐπιτήδευμα [?] ἡλίγ); Ezek. 6 4 etc. (more than forty times) Jer. 50 2 Lev. 26 30 Dt. 29 16 1 K. 15 12 21 26 2 K. 17 12 21 11 21 23 24 (all deutero-cronistic).

The etymology of gillūlim also is uncertain; the Rabbinical interpreters connect it with gēl, gāllēl, 'dung' (e.g., Ezek. 4 12 15); so probably Aquila's καθάρματα (Ezek. 6 4) is meant; cp AV Dt. 29 17 [16] mg., 'dunгы gods.' So Ges.-Bull., Stades-Siegfried, and others. Cp the use of גַּל and גִּבּוֹל in the Hebrew of the Talmud (see BEELZEBUL). That Ezekiel should coin such a term is quite conceivable in the light of chaps. 10 and 28, where no expression is too gross for him. Others prefer to connect the word with gal, 'stone heap,' or with the primary meaning of the root, 'be round'—the idol contemptuously called a mere log, a shapeless mass; so Jahn (not excluding the former explanation), and many recent scholars. It is possible that in the coinage of the word a contemptuous play upon some term in use in the worship of the host of heaven may have been designed (cp MH galgal, 'celestial sphere,' especially the sphere of the fixed stars in which is the zodiac); but we have no evidence of this use in the OT.

ε. Another term, expressive of the deepest abhorrence of idolatry, is šēḥkūs (שֶׁחָקֻשׁ, Ἐ generally βδελγμα, sometimes προσόχθισμα, μίαισμα; EV 'detestable things'; less frequently 'abomination').

The word is cognate with šēḥes, which is a technical term for tabooed kinds of food (flesh of various animal kinds, vermin, carrion, etc.), with a connotation of loathsomeness; similarly šēḥūš itself in Nah. 8 6 Zech. 9 7 (see ABOMINATION, 2). Since these prohibitions in great part had their root in religious antipathies, being laid on things associated with superstitions which the religion of Yahwē abhorred, the opprobrious term šēḥkūs is not unnaturally applied to everything which belongs to another religion, its cultus, the images of its gods, and the gods themselves; the worship of Yahwē in similar ways, which the prophets treat as mere heathenism, is included. Thus, of idols, Jer. 16 18 7 30 32 34 Ezek. 20 7 f. 30 2 Ch. 15 8 etc.; of cultus, Jer. 18 27 Ezek. 8 7 23 Is. 66 3; in many cases, naturally, this distinction cannot be made. See, further, Jer. 4 1 Ezek. 5 11 7 20 11 18 21 Dt. 29 16 2 K. 28 24 etc. (on cases in which šēḥkūs is a substitute for ēlōhim see below, § 3).

δ. A word of like meaning, history, and application is tō'ēbāl (תּוֹעֵבָל, Ἐ generally βδελγμα, sometimes ἀνομία, AV 'abomination'; see Is. 44 10 Ezek. 16 36 7 20 11 21 Jer. 16 18; more generally, Ezek. 6 9 1 K. 14 24 2 K. 16 3 etc.).

ε. In Dan. 8 13 (cp v. 12) Ἐ peša' (עֲשָׂה) 'crime' (Ἐ ἀμαρτία) is used just as šēḥkūs is in the parallel passages 9 27 11 31 12 11; see also Ezek. 14 11, and the conjunction of gillūlim, šēḥkūs, and peša'im in Ezek. 37 23.

f. The words miphleseth (מִפְלֵסֶתַח, 1 K. 15 13 2 Ch. 15 16), 'an object of horror,' and emēm (עִמְעַתְּ, 'terrors' for 'idols' (Jer. 50 38), also belong to this class (see below, § 3 end). Contempt for the idols is also expressed by more general terms when they are described as the work of men's hands (e.g., Is. 28), mere wood and stone (Dt. 4 28 28 36 64 2 K. 19 18 Ezek. 20 32 Dan. 5 4 etc.).

There can be no doubt that in many instances the contemptuous expressions which we have been examining were introduced into the text by later editors or scribes in the place of the proper words for idols or heathen gods, in the same way in which bōšet, 'shame,' has been put for ba'al, both alone (e.g., Jer. 3 24 11 13 etc.) and in proper names like Ishbosheth (see ISHBAAI), and with the same motive. In particular, the word ēlōhim, 'god' (or 'gods'), when used of other deities or their idols, gave much offence, and led to many alterations of the text.¹ Thus in 2 S. 5 21 the Philistines, routed by David, left their gods on the field of battle (Ἐ τοὺς θεοὺς αὐτῶν, MT 1 Ch. 14 12 עֲרִיבִים); MT substitutes עֲרִיבֵי, 'their idols'; in 1 S. 31 9 this correction has prevailed in all the texts, though the context leaves no room for doubt that the author wrote 'their gods.'

3. Substitution of opprobrious for inoffensive terms.

1 K. 11 contains some peculiarly instructive examples; in vv. 5 7 the original reading was, 'Astarte the god of the Phoenicians, Milcom the god of the Ammonites, Chemosh the god of the Moabites'; cp v. 33, where MT has preserved this text, and v. 8, 'their gods.' Ἐ translates עֲרִיבֵי, 'god,' by εἰδωλον; in MT šēḥkūs has been inserted in two of the three cases, but 'Astarte the god of the Phoenicians' remains untouched, whilst in Ἐ this alone has been changed to βδελγμα. In 33, where, as has been said, MT has thrice εἰδωλον, Ἐ has τῆ Ἀστάρτη βδελγῶν καὶ τοῦ Χεμουὶ εἰδωλῶ Μωαβ καὶ τοῦ Μελχὶμ προσόχθισμα ἰδῶν Ἀμμων. Cp also 2 K. 28 13 in MT and Ἐ. So also in Is. 19 3 Ἐ has θεοὺς whilst MT reads ēlīm. For another case of substitution see ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

These illustrations show that as late as the time when the Greek version was made the text of such passages was very variable.

Note also passages like Ezek. 7 20, where šēḥkūsīm appears as a doublet to tō'ēbāl; further βδελγματα for עֲרִיבֵי (Is. 17 8), for עֲרִיבֵי (Is. 28 20), for עֲרִיבֵי (1 K. 21 26 Ezek. 30 13); προσόχθισμα for עֲרִיבֵי (1 K. 16 32). Perhaps the substitution of the contemptuous words was at first made (both in Hebrew and Greek) in reading, as a standing Ḳere (cp ἡ βάαλ read αἰσχύνη), which then made its way into the written text as so many other Ḳere's did at an early time. It is probable that miphleseth, 'object of horror,' in 1 K. 15 13 2 Ch. 15 16, is also a substitute for some more concrete word; but the conjectural restorations proposed are not altogether satisfactory.

This perversion of names associated with idolatry is not an accidental conceit of individual readers or scribes; it has the warrant of an old and authoritative tradition which attaches itself to the command, 'Ye shall not mention the name of other gods' (Ex. 23 13; see Mechilta, Mishpātīm, 107a, ed. Friedmann); and, 'Ye shall destroy their name out of that place' (Dt. 12 3), combined with 'thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it' (אֲנַחְתֶּנּוּ בְעַתְּ אֲנַחְשֶׁנּוּ יָרָשׁ, Dt. 7 26; interpreted, 'thou shalt make a šēḥkūs and a tō'ēbāl of it').

See Tosephta, 'Abōdā zārā, 6 4, ed. Zuckermantel, 469; Jer. 'Abōdā zārā, 3 6; Bab. 'Abōdā zārā, 45b 46a; Tēmura, 28b; Aboth de Rabbi Nathan, § 34. Examples of such changes are given in the places cited; among them Beth-aven (בֵּית אֵוֶן, Hos. 4 15 10 5 etc.) for Bethel. Without any direct testimony we should unhesitatingly assume that bōseth and šēḥkūsīm in Hos. 9 10 were the words, not of the eighth-century prophet, but of a Jewish copyist; and so in many other cases. The principle of substitution is illustrated in the Targums, which put עָרָא 'error' for ēlōhim 'god,' when used of the gods of the heathen (e.g., Dt. 28 36 Judg. 17 5 Is. 21 9 2 Ch. 32 15 35 2 etc.); and render by the same general term many words for 'idol'; e.g., ēlīm (Is. 2 18 20 19 etc.), āšādīm (Hos. 4 17 8 4 14 8 [9]), gillūlim (Ezek. 6 4 f. 8 10 and often), semel (Dt. 4 16 ps. Ton.), miphleseth (1 K. 15 13), etc. Similarly מִפְלֵסֶתַח, dahlā, 'fear,' is used to translate ēlōhim (Ex. 20 20 Hos. 8 6), etc. Compare also הִרְיָה, 'fear,' for 'idol' in the Talmud (Levy, NHWB 2 263).

Of idols which were the object of a public cult among the Israelites, we have descriptions only of the bull-ably other temples in the Northern Kingdom, and of the serpent in the temple at Jerusalem. The former were introduced by Jeroboam I. (1 K. 12 28 f. 2 K. 10 29 17 16 etc.); they were of less than life-size—hence the contemptuous 'calves'—and of gold, that is, covered with gold (see § 5). Down to the fall of Samaria (721) the worship of these bulls was the national cultus of the kingdom of Israel; see Hos. 8 5 f. 10 8 13 2. According to Ex. 32 a similar idol which Aaron made at Horeb was indignantly destroyed by Moses, and the people severely punished for their apostasy—an anticipative repudiation of the religion of the Northern Kingdom (cp Dt. 9 16 Neh. 9 18 etc.). Whether the conception of Yahwē as a bull belonged to the Israelites—or some part of them—at an earlier period, or was borrowed by them from the Egyptians or from the Canaanites, is a question which cannot be discussed here¹ (see CALF, GOLDEN).

In the temple in Jerusalem, down to the end of the eighth century, sacrifice was offered to a bronze serpent (2 K. 18.4, cp Num. 21.8f.); see NEHUSHTAN. The form of the 'jealousy image' (Ezek. 8.3) is not known (for a conjecture see above, § 1c, note).

The idol of Dagon at Ashdod (1 S. 5) had a head and hands, and was thus at least partially anthropomorphic; the opinion that the lower half of the image was in the form of a fish rests on a very slender basis (see DAGON). Images in human likeness are mentioned by Hosea (13.2 Vers.) and Ezekiel (16.17 זכר ונקר, cp 18); more explicitly in Is. 44.13. Cp DIANA, § 2.

Ps. 115.8 (? 135.15-18) assume anthropomorphic images to be the ordinary type; the author lived well on in the Greek period; cp Wisd. 14.15-16-20 (portrait statues of a dead child, and of a king worshipped as gods). The 'grisly object' (miphleseth, מִפְּלֶסֶת) which the queen-mother Maacah made for the (or, as an) āshērāh (1 K. 15.13 2 Ch. 15.16) was understood by the Jews in the early centuries of our era as an ithyphallic idol (see 'Ābōdā zārā, 44a, and cp Jerome, simulacrum Priapi);² an obscene interpretation perhaps underlies the translation of אֲשֵׁרָה in 1 K. There is, however, no reason to believe that this is more than an exegetical conceit (see above, § 3f.).

In the laws, images of man or woman, beast, bird, reptile, or fish, are forbidden (Dt. 5.8, especially 4.16-19); all these forms—and composites of them—were doubtless known to the authors of the legislation (see also Wisd. 13.10-16). The scanty information on this subject which can be gleaned from the pages of the OT must be supplemented by the descriptions of Phœnician and Syrian gods in Greek and Latin writers, and especially by the archaeology of religious art in Egypt, Assyria, Phœnicia, and Cyprus.

A selection of types may be found in the plates at the end of Scholz's Götzendienst, etc., 77; see also Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Phœn. 1.56-83 2.9-27 147-179.

The Phœnicians, who manufactured idols and exported them in numbers to all parts of the Mediterranean basin, imitated Egyptian types, but—remarkably enough—only anthropomorphic (not theriomorphic or therianthropomorphic) types; see Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Phœn. 1.77 f. 80.

The vast majority of the images were private or household idols (see IDOLATRY). These were generally small, and of materials and workmanship corresponding to the means of their owners and the fashion of the times. The commonest were of wood, carved and painted (Wisd. 13.14 15.4; cp Paus. ii. 2.5 vii. 26.11 viii. 39.6, Plin. NH 33.36), or adorned with gold and silver (Jer. 10.4); there were also graven images of stone and idols of clay, the work of the potter (Wisd. 15.7 ff. 13).⁴ Small idols were cast in silver and gold (see massékāh, § 1e), doubtless also in less precious metals (bronze, as in Egypt, etc.; lead, cp the very old leaden idol from Troy, Baumeister, 1191). Larger images were made of cheaper material and covered with gold or silver.⁵ From the procedure attributed to Aaron in the destruction of the golden calf (Ex. 32.20), it has been inferred, with much probability, that the bull images of the Northern Kingdom had a wooden core; see also v. 4, where the words 'he fashioned it with a graving tool' are more naturally understood of the carving of a wooden image than of finishing a casting (AV); cp, however, v. 24. Is. 40.19 describes the making of an idol the core of which was cast of baser metal, and covered by the goldsmith with plates of gold hammered and soldered on (41.7); in 44.12 it would seem that the body of the image was worked out by the smith in his forge.¹ One of the apocryphal additions to the Book of Daniel tells of an idol which was clay within and bronze without (Bel and the Dragon, 7); and such images of gilded pottery—though hardly great temple images—there may have been. The colossal statues (cp Dan. 3.1 2.31 ff.) were constructed upon a wooden framework.²

Paintings (or reliefs) were probably adored only in mystery cults such as are described in Ezek. 8.10 (cp 23.14).

When an idol was finished it was solemnly installed in its place (עָנַן, Judg. 8.27 1 S. 5.2 2 S. 6.17; cp Gk. ἰδρῦεν). In the case of those which were set up in temples as objects of a public cultus, the installation was doubtless an act of great ceremony, attended by processions, sacrifices, hymns, and prayers; and even the rudest domestic idol would not be set up without rites of similar purport. A procession bearing the god to his shrine is perhaps meant in Is. 46.7, cp Jer. 10.5. The idol was placed in a cella or sacellum (a bēth elōhīm, Judg. 17.5; olkia, Bar. 6.12.19; contemptuously εἰδῶλιον or εἰδωλείον, 1 Esd. 2.10 1 Macc. 10.83 etc.); in a private house it might have a shrine prepared for it (olkma, Wisd. 13.15), where it stood in a niche in the wall (ib.). The idol was fastened up in its place by nails (Is. 41.7 Jer. 10.4 Wisd. l.c.), or secured by chains that he might not desert his worshippers (Is. 40.19).³ The idols were often dressed in costly stuffs and rich colours (Ezek. 16.18 Jer. 10.9 Bar. 6.11 f. 58.72),⁴ and adorned with jewels (M. 'Ābōdā zārā, 19). Some of them wore crowns upon their heads (Bar. 6.9) and held in their hands weapons of war (Bar. 6.15) or various insignia and attributes (cp M. 'Ābōdā zārā, 31).

The manufacture of idols is satirically described in certain passages in the OT; see Hab. 2.18 f. Is. 40.18 ff. 41.6 f. 44.9-20 46.6 f. Jer. 10.2-5 9.14 f. Ps. 115.4 ff. = 135.15 ff. IDOLATRY AND PRIMITIVE RELIGION.

Idolatry (εἰδωλολατρία) is etymologically the worship of images; but as the word εἰδῶλιον was used in the LXX of a false god, whether represented by an image or not,⁵ so Paul, by whom the word 'idolatry' (εἰδωλολατρία) may have been coined—it occurs first in his epistles—employs the term in a wider sense of the worship of false gods and the whole heathen cultus.

See Gal. 5.20 1 Cor. 10.14 1 Pet. 4.3; cp Col. 3.5; cp also the use of εἰδωλολάτρης 1 Cor. 5.10 f. 6.9 10.7 Eph. 5.5 Rev. 21.8 22.15.

The equivalent Hebrew term is 'Ābōdāh zārāh (עֲבֹדָה זָרָה), 'foreign worship,' often concretely, the object of such worship, 'idol' (Mishna, freq.).⁶

Thus, broadly, idolatry may be defined as the giving to any creature the homage or devotion which belongs to God alone.

So Cyprian: tunc idolatria committitur, cum divinus honor alteri datur;¹ Gregory Nazianzen: 'the transference to the creatures of the adoration which belongs to the creator';² Maimonides: 'the worship of any one of all the creatures.'³

In a somewhat more restricted sense the term may be properly employed to comprehend those forms of religion in which the worship of a deity is connected with some material object, in which he is supposed to reside, or to be present at the performance of the sacred rites. So the word will be understood in this article.

The origin and progress of idolatry lies beyond the scope of our present inquiry,⁴ which has directly to do only with the forms of idolatry mentioned in OT and NT.

Men early recognised certain places as the homes or haunts of the gods. These spots were protected by religious reverence, and thither worshippers resorted to bring their offerings and present their prayers to the deity.

2. Haunts of gods and of spirits.⁵

Among the Semites, as among Indo-European peoples, mountains were often thus sacred to the gods; on their summits were sanctuaries; altars were erected there beneath the open sky (see HIGH PLACES, § 2 ff.).

Many such mountains are known to us from the OT: Horeb, 'the mount of God,' Sinai, Mt. Peor and Mt. Nebo in Moab, Carmel, Tabor, Hermon, Lebanon, Ebal and Gerizim, Zion. Worship on the mountains and 'on every high hill' is in Jeremiah and Ezekiel the distinctive mark of heathenism.⁶

Fountains, wells, and rivers, also, were frequently sacred; the living waters, the verdure which they supported, were visible signs of a present deity.

Beer-sheba, Beer-lahai-roi, Kadesh (En-mishpat), and Dan, are holy places of this class; the veneration for sacred fountains, streams, and lakes among the Phœnicians and Syrians is well known.⁷

Holy trees are extremely common among the Semites, as among other races; and rites which had their origin in tree-worship have here as elsewhere proved among the most ineradicable of survivals. In the OT we read of sacred trees at various places.

At Shechem (elôn môreh,—the name implies that it was an oracular tree; Gen. 12 6 f., cp 35 4; further, Josh. 24 26 Judg. 9 6), Hebron (Gen. 13 18 18 1),⁸ Beer-sheba (Gen. 21 33), Gibeath (1 S. 14 2 22 0), and elsewhere. The idolatrous Israelites set up their altars 'under every luxuriant tree' (Dt., Jer., Ezek.).⁹ Holy trees often stood beside sacred waters, as at Beer-sheba, and on hill-tops, with which they are constantly associated in the seventh-century polemic against idolatry.

Fountains and trees were regarded in early times as possessing a demonic life of their own; at a later stage, as the dwelling-place or embodiment of a demonic spirit. Each such object had its own numen; in the language of Canaan, its ēl or bā'al. So, too, every holy mountain had its bā'al (see BAAL). In the development of anthropomorphic religion these old local numina are frequently supplanted by gods of a wholly different character,—an old holy tree, for example, becoming a Zeis ἐνδεδυδρος; then the felt incongruity of the association may give rise to a myth, as in the case of Atargatis at Hierapolis and at Ascalon (WRS Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 174 f.). Under the influence of more advanced ideas the place or object which was primitively holy of itself comes to be thought of as merely the abode or the symbol of a god, owing its holiness (as did the artificial sanctuaries presently to be spoken of) to this association. Finally the association itself is rejected by a more spiritual conception of the godhead; idolatry is a folly and an impiety. Thus, in Canaan, Yahwè superseded the multitude of local bā'als at the old holy places of the land; the prophets and Deuteronomy regard the result of this syncretism as pure heathenism (see below, § 9).

Another class of holy places are the tombs of the ancestors of clans and tribes, whose spirits watch over and protect their descendants (see Jer. 31 15 f.).

The burial-place of Abraham, the cave of Machpelah at Hebron, which is still one of the holiest places of Islam; the tomb of Joseph at Shechem; the tombs of Rachel near Ephrath in Benjamin, of Deborah near Bethel, of Joshua at Timnath-heres, are familiar examples from the OT.

That worship was offered at these tombs is not directly attested in the OT; but it is on other grounds very probable.¹

Of the worship of animals among the Israelites in historical times we have no evidence; the totemistic survivals which have been discovered in institutions and cultus come down from an earlier stage in the history of religion; and the images of Yahwè in the form of bulls in the Northern Kingdom, and the bronze serpent at Jerusalem, are not to be confounded with the worship of living animals (e.g., the Apis and Mnevis bulls in Egypt), or of whole species of animals.

An ancient and widespread theory regards the worship of the heavenly bodies as the beginning of idolatry;² and the whole history of Semitic religion has often been constructed upon this assumption—Baal was originally the sun, Astarte the moon, etc. All the evidence which we possess, however, goes to show that in Palestine and Phœnicia, whilst the sun and the moon under their proper names were worshipped in various places, the identification of the old deities with the heavenly bodies, and the introduction of distinctively astronomical cults, fall comparatively late, and were accomplished under foreign influence. In Israel the invasion of these cults occurred in the seventh century, and there is no reason to think that it came materially earlier in Phœnicia (see NATURE WORSHIP).

Thus far we have been considering objects and places which were sacred apart from any act of man, natural sanctuaries. There is an important distinction—not always observed—between this class and that in which human agency has a part in the constitution or consecration of the holy place or object; we may call the latter artificial sanctuaries. Of these, probably the oldest, as it is certainly by far the most important, is the sacred stone (monolith or heap of stones. See MASSEBAH).

The sacred fountain and the sacred tree were common hut not universal adjuncts of the sanctuary; in the times covered by our evidence they played a very subordinate part in the ritual (see below, § 10). On the other hand the sacred stone (massēbāh) or the rude altar of stones was found at every place of worship; it was anointed with oil (Gen. 28 12, cp Lev. 8 11); the blood of the victims was smeared upon it or poured out at its base; with it all those rites by which the worshipper comes immediately into contact with the object of his worship are inseparably connected.³ The massēbāh was set up, the altar built, for this purpose.

The holiness of the stone is not derived from the discovery that a spirit already dwells in it; it is holy because a deity has consented to enter into it, in it to be present in the midst of his worshippers, and receive their sacrifice; it is the seat (ēdos) of the god. This stage or type of religion is frequently called 'fetishism'; but this much-abused name ministers only to misunderstanding and prejudice (WRS Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 209 f.).

A connecting link between this conception and those rocks, of strange shape or otherwise remarkable, which are natural sanctuaries may perhaps be found in the worship of aerolites (βαυρόλιον = בְּנֵי־בַרְזֵל, bēthēl, λίθου ἑμψυχοῦ), or thunder-stones; but of this connection there is no direct evidence (see MASSEBAH).

A particularly interesting question is suggested by the tradition that the ark which Moses made at Horeb contained stone tablets inscribed with 'ten commandments' (cp ARK, § 10; DECALOGUE). That the fundamental laws were thus put where they could not be seen is in the highest degree improbable; on the other hand, the chest was certainly made to hold some sacred object, and nothing is more likely than that this object was a stone from the 'mount of God,'¹ by taking which with them the Israelites were assured of the presence and protection of Yahwē when they wandered away from his holy mountain.

Another 'artificial sanctuary' is the wooden pole or post (āshērāh) which ordinarily stood at Palestinian holy places. It is a common opinion that this pole or mast was a surrogate for the living holy tree; but this is not certain (see ASHERAH, § 2). What the significance of the āshērāh was, or what rites were connected with it, we do not learn.

Images of the gods belong to a comparatively advanced stage in the history of religion; they presuppose a definiteness of conception which is foreign to early religions, and a discrimination of the character and attributes of different deities which is a product of history and reflection. From the ancients themselves we have many testimonies that the introduction of cultus-images was a recent thing.

Thus Varro affirms that for more than 170 years from the founding of the city the Romans had no image of a god in human or animal form: Numa is said to have forbidden such representations;² the Persians had no temples or idols before Artaxerxes I.;³ in Greece also temples and images of the gods were unknown in ancient times;⁴ the earliest temples of the Egyptians were without idols.⁵ Arab tradition, which is supported by philological evidence, declares that idols like that of Hōhal at Mecca were of foreign origin.⁶

Some of these testimonies have no historical value; they represent a theory of antiquity which is generalised by Eusebius: 'the oldest peoples had no idols.'⁷ Archæological evidence, however, confirms the fact that the iconic age was everywhere preceded by one in which the objects of worship were aniconic.⁸

The development of the stone image of the deity out of the ἀργός λίθος, and of the wooden idol (ἕβανον) out of the aniconic wooden posts, can be traced with some distinctness in Greece; it is natural to conceive that the same evolution took place in Palestine and Phœnicia; but the proof cannot be given. Our texts do not enable us to connect the p̄sel (graven image) with the āshērāh (wooden post) in any way, and monumental evidence is lacking. What is certain is that the aniconic agalmata, especially the stone stēlēs, obelisks, pyramids, or cones, maintained themselves in the Phœnician cults down to late times, and were not superseded by stone temple idols. Images of the gods seem to have been first introduced as domestic idols: most of the images which have been found in Phœnicia and its colonies are of small size and inferior materials; none have been discovered which can be certainly identified as cultus-idols. (See IDOL, § 5.)

It does not fall within the scope of this article to describe the worship of the Semites in general; we must confine ourselves to a brief mention of the idolatrous ceremonies mentioned in the OT or the NT.

Holy mountains, waters, and trees, as we have seen, were places of worship in Palestine; but we learn nothing from the OT about peculiar rites such, for example, as in Syria are connected with the sacred fountains and lakes; and it is only from the practice of other Semites in ancient and modern times that we may infer that offerings or mementoes (strips of cloth, and the like) were hung upon the sacred trees.¹ It is obvious that these cults were of inferior importance; indeed, tree worship was probably under the kings just what it is now for both Christians and Moslems—a superstition, in the proper sense of the word—that is, a cult which has been left on one side by the development of religion. The nature of the places of worship and their ordinary furniture has been described elsewhere (see HIGH PLACE, and ALTAR).

The rites of sacrifice are essentially the same throughout the Semitic world (see SACRIFICE). They connect themselves primarily with the sacred stone (see MASSEBAH, and above, § 6). Distinctive ceremonies associated with the sacred post or pole are not mentioned in the OT; the numerous Assyrian reliefs and the seals which appear to represent the adoration of the sacred post are of uncertain interpretation (see ASHERAH). Sacrifices to the idols were offered by fire (Hos. 4 13 etc.); libations were poured out (Jer. 7 18 etc.); the fruits of the earth (tithes, first-fruits) were presented to them (Hos. 2 8 [10] Is. 57 6 etc.); tables spread with food were set before them (Is. 65 11; cp Bar. 6 28 f., Bel and the Dragon, 3 ff.).

The worshippers kissed the idols (Hos. 13 2 1 K. 19 18; cp Cic. in Verrum 4 43), or threw kisses with their hands (Job 31 27, to the sun and moon);² stretched out their hands in prayer and adoration (Ps. 44 20 [21]); knelt before the idols or prostrated themselves to the earth; when the deity was obdurate the priests leaped or danced about the altar,³ calling loudly upon the name of their god, and gashed themselves with knives (1 K. 18 26 28).

The Mishna enumerates the acts of worship or homage by which the prohibition of idolatry is violated thus: He breaks the law who sacrifices or burns incense to an idol, offers a libation, prostrates himself before it, or acknowledges it to be his god; also he who embraces the idol, kisses it, sweeps or sprinkles water before it, washes it, anoints it, dresses it, or puts on its shoes (Sanhedrin, 76; cp Maimonides, Aboda Zara, 36).

The idols were often carried in procession, either at fixed seasons, or upon some particular occasion (Is. 46 7 Jer. 10 5); such processions are represented on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, and frequently referred to by Greek and Roman authors.

The idolatrous cults had their priests (for an opprobrious name of whom see CHEMARIM) and prophets (1 K. 18 40) and oracles (2 K. 1 2 6). To the ministry of some of these religions belonged also the 'consecrated men and women' (קְדוּשָׁה, קְדוּשָׁה, Dt. 23 18 f.); that is, religious prostitutes of both sexes (cp HARLOT).

The offering of the body in honour of the deity prevailed widely in the North-Semitic religions; in some of them it is said—though not on the best authority—to have been obligatory on every woman once in her life;⁴ in others—perhaps in all—a special class of temple-harlots was maintained. Commerce with them was a religious act, accompanied by sacrifice (Hos. 4 13); the hire was sacred and was brought into the treasury of the god (Dt. 23 18 [19]). The laws forbidding men and women to wear the garments of the opposite sex (Dt. 22 5) are aimed at cults of this kind.

Certain peculiar rites and customs are known to us from passing allusions in the OT; the priests of Dagon would not set foot on the sacred threshold (1 S 5 5; cp Zeph. 1 9); the altars to the host of heaven were erected on the roofs of the houses (Jer. 19 13 Zeph. 1 5 etc.); cakes of a peculiar form were offered to the Queen of Heaven (Jer. 7 18); the sun-god had a chariot and horses stabled in the temple in Jerusalem (2 K. 23 11); the worshippers of the sun stood with their faces to the east (Ezek. 8 16); children were sacrificed to the divine king at the Topheth in the Valley of Hinnom (Jer. 7₃₁ etc.; see MOLOCH); the women of Jerusalem made a mourning for the death of Tammuz (Ezek. 8₁₄); the gardens of Adonis are referred to by Isaiah (17_{10 f.}); lectisternia to Gad and Meni by a post-exilic writer (Is. 65₁₁). An examination of the seemingly irrational prohibitions in the legislation, in the light of comparative ethnology, yields considerable information about the older cults and superstitions which were put under the ban by the religion of Yahwè; but into this field it is impossible to enter here.

The Israelites when they invaded Canaan brought with them the common ideas of the nomadic Semites; they had their holy mountain (Horeb), holy wells (Beer-sheba), and fountains (Kadesh); the standing stone or stone-heap (altar) represented the deity in sacrifice; domestic idols were probably not unknown (see TERAPHIM). They found in Canaan a people of kindred race, possessed of an agricultural civilisation which the newcomers adopted. The Canaanite high places became Israelite sanctuaries (see HIGH PLACE), and the massēbāhs and āshērāhs beside the fire-altars and beneath the holy trees were taken over with them; if new sanctuaries were founded, they were furnished with a similar apparatus. The prophets and prophetic historians regard the idols also as adopted from the Canaanites; and, speaking generally, this is doubtless true. The Baals and Astartes, the gods of the land, were worshipped by the side of Yahwè. The founding of the national kingdom gave rise to international relations and led to the introduction of foreign religions (Phœnician, Moabite, Ammonite, 1 K. 11), which were externally much like that of Israel. The worship of the Tyrian Baal in the reign of Ahab, however, provoked a reaction which overthrew the dynasty of Omri. The larger political horizon in the eighth and seventh centuries, and especially the long-continued friendly relations of Judah with Assyria, opened the way for the introduction of many foreign cults, among which the worship of the HOST OF HEAVEN, the QUEEN OF HEAVEN, the MOLOCH-worship, and the rites of mourning for TAMMUZ are the most important; 2 K. 23_{4 f.} shows us the state of things in Jerusalem and its suburbs in 621.

The reforms of Josiah made no permanent change, as is evident from the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel; the latter gives us glimpses of the strange rites which were introduced or revived in the last years of the city (Ezek. 8). In the Persian period the strongest foreign influence was Aramæan; this is seen not only in the gradual displacement of Hebrew by the Aramaic vernacular, but also by the allusions to Syrian cults such as those of GAD and MENI (Is. 65₁₁; see FORTUNE). Under the successors of Alexander, the Jews in Palestine as well as in Egypt and Syria were brought under the spell of Hellenic civilisation, and the liberal party, especially strong among the priestly aristocracy, showed no prejudice against the Greek religions,¹ until the violent measures of Antiochus Epiphanes provoked an equally violent reaction.

8. Religious leaders. ² 'calves' were of this kind, and we may well believe that they were condemned in his own time by men who looked with jealous eyes upon the assimilation of the religion of Yahwè to that of the baals of Canaan (on the untrustworthy record 1 K. 13, see JEROBOAM, 1 [end]). The Deuteronomic historians are in error, not in assuming that there was opposition from the first to the Canaanitizing of Israel, but in ascribing this opposition to higher religious ideas like their own. The prophets of the eighth century, particularly Hosea and Isaiah, zealously declaim against the images, of which the land was full (Is. 28); under the influence of Isaiah, Hezekiah probably made an effort to root out the idols (2 K. 18₄). The older aniconic representatives of the deity, the massēbāhs, were not yet assailed—the command to destroy the Canaanite sacred stones has a different motive. In the succeeding period these also fall under the condemnation of idolatry: no such symbol shall stand by the altar of Yahwè (Dt. 16_{21 f.}, 12_{3 f.}, Lev. 26₁ etc.); no image of any kind is to be tolerated (Ex. 20₄ = Dt. 58 etc.). In Dt. 4₁₅₋₁₉ (sixth century) a reason is annexed to this prohibition: at Horeb, where Yahwè revealed himself to Israel, they saw no visible form in which they might image him. Violation of these laws incurs the severest penalties,—for the individual, capital punishment (Dt. 17_{2 f.}); for a city, the ban (Dt. 13); for the people as a whole, national ruin (29_{10 f.} etc.). With the prophets

9. Hostility to foreign cults. of the seventh century begins the contemptuous identification of the gods of the heathen with their idols, and in the sixth the trenchant satire upon the folly of making gods of gold and silver, of wood and stone, which runs through the later Psalms, Wisdom, Baruch, the Jewish Sibyllines, etc. (see IDOL, § 5 end), to be taken up again by Christian apologists. The attack of Antiochus Epiphanes upon their religion made offering sacrifice to idols the very act of apostasy; faithful Jews submitted to martyrdom rather than obey the king's command; the Maccabæan revolt was a rising against the attempt to force idolatry upon them. With the memories of bitter persecution, of heroic struggle and glorious victory, there was instilled into the breast of every true Jew an inexpendable hatred of idols at which the ancient world wondered. Their Roman masters were more than once surprised by the outbreaks of this to them incomprehensible fanaticism. Pilate's first collision with the Jews was occasioned by his bringing the military ensigns (see ENSIGNS) from Caesarea to Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xviii. 31); the order of Caligula that his statue should be set up in the temple would have precipitated the Jewish revolt had not the good sense of Petronius interposed delays, and the death of the Emperor put an end to the plan (Ant. xviii. 8, BJ ii. 10); the desperate war under Adrian was provoked by the setting up of a temple and image of Jupiter on the site of the ruined temple (Dio Cassius, 69₁₂; cp Jerome on Is. 29).

It is instructive to compare this history with that of the Greek religion. Some of the greatest of Greek philosophers had protested against idolatry almost as strongly as the prophets of Israel. Heraclitus, Xenophanes, Empedocles had satirised the folly of praying to images; Zeno declared that neither temples nor idols befitted the gods.¹ Their words, however, made no impression upon the popular religion; and later philosophers had no difficulty in discovering good reasons for the use of images.² In Israel, on the contrary, a whole people had been trained to the worship of God without visible embodiment or symbol.

On Idolatry in general the older works of G. J. Voss, and A. van Dale may still be consulted; from a modern standpoint, Tylor, Early History of Mankind, chap. 6;

IGNORANCE. If true religion is 'wisdom' or 'knowledge,' false religion must be 'folly' or 'ignorance' (cp Wisd. 14:22), and in the Bible 'religion' includes practice as well as theory. This antithesis is constantly present to the minds of the biblical writers, though they may not always develop the antithesis in the same way. Legislation drew a broad distinction between intentional sins (עוון רב, 'with a high hand') and sins committed 'by error' (עוון שגגה; RV 'unwittingly'). The modern Christian standard must of course not be applied too rigorously to the details of the law, and the extreme anxiety (cp Ps. 19:13) produced by the ease with which 'sins of ignorance' could be committed appears to us not to be a feature of an ideal character. However, the principle of discrimination recognised by the legislators is still acknowledged in Christendom, and self-distrust, if coupled with trust in the 'higher self'—the indwelling Spirit—is an undeniably Christian quality (2 Cor. 12:9).

Another variety of ignorance shows itself in doubts of the divine justice; 'so foolish was I and ignorant' (Ps. 73:22 92:6 [7]). There are mysteries which, if handled at all, should be handled wisely; and who can keep off the mystery referred to by the Psalmist? On the other hand, a mystery such as the cause of Israel's blindness (Rom. 11:25) is one which does not touch the ordinary Christian so closely that he must either solve the problem or suffer spiritual shipwreck.

The spiritual ignorance of the heathen and of unbelieving Jews is a point which is variously treated by the OT writers. Sometimes it is assumed that the heathen deliberately neglect the elementary divine laws (Is. 24:5 Ps. 9:17 [18]?, cp Ps. 22:27 [28]); sometimes it is stated or implied that God allows each nation to follow its own course in religion; the course may be a foolish one, but it is at least natural and uncondemned (Jer. 2:11 Mic. 4:5). Even in the NT we find a certain variety of view. In Rom. 1:20-23 idolatry is represented as a deliberate silencing of the conscience, which leads to the manifestation of the wrath of God (v. 18). In Acts 17:30, however, the Paul of the Acts of the Apostles excuses the error of Jews and heathen in the times before Christ as 'ignorance' (ἄγνοια) which God has 'winked at' (ὑπεριδών; D*, παριδών)—a phrase which reminds some of us of the term 'ignorance' applied in Arabic to pre-Mohammedan paganism. If, with Denney (Hastings, DB 2:449^b), we attempt to combine these two passages, we arrive at the difficult view that God can 'wink at' or excuse something which is 'in the last resort due to an immoral suppression, and even extinction, of divine light.' If, on the other hand, we recognise that the speeches in the Acts of the Apostles are literary compositions, we shall at once see how well these speeches are adapted to effect their assumed purpose. See, for instance, Acts 3:17, 13:27, and, to illustrate ὑπεριδών, 14:16, 'who in time past suffered all the nations to walk in their own ways.' It is true that Paul himself speaks of 'the passing over (τὴν πάρεσιν) of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God' (Rom. 3:25, RV); but the sins of the past (προγεγονότα ἁμαρτήματα) are the whole mass of human sins, with no special reference to heathenism. Since only in the sacrificial death of Christ could the righteousness of God be satisfied, it was theoretically necessary to maintain that God had shown forbearance to the sins of the pre-Christian period, to those of a Moses or an Ezra not less than to those of an idolater.

That ἀγνόημα and ἁμαρτία are practically synonymous will appear from Judith 5:20 and from the parallelism in 1 Esd. 8:75 [72] Ecclus. 23:2; see also Heb. 9:7 (cp 5:3).

The beautiful application of the legal phrases ἀγνόημα and ἀγνοῖαν in the Epistle to the Hebrews should be noticed. The ideal High Priest is one who can 'hear gently with the ignorant and erring (τοῖς ἀγνοοῦσι καὶ πλανωμένοις), for that he also is compassed with infirmity' (Heb. 5:2 RV); Jesus can do this, without ever having yielded to sin (Heb. 4:15). Nor does the author ignore the terrible possibility of 'sinning willingly' (ἐκουσίως), i.e., 'with a high hand, after having been once 'enlightened' (Heb. 10:26, cp 6:4-6). Cp Is. 22:14, 1 John 5:16.

ILIADUN (ἰλιαδουν [A], ειλιαδουν [B]), 1 Esd. 5:58 RV, AV MADIABUN (q.v.).

ILLYRICUM (ἰλλυρικον [Ti. WH]). The 'inhospitable district between Istria and Epirus, which, with its wild series of mountain-caldrons broken neither by river-valleys nor by coast-plains and arranged like scales one above another, and with its chain of rocky islands stretching along the coast, separates rather than connects Italy and Greece' (Momms. Hist. of Rome, 3:172, ET; cp Strabo, 317).¹

Illyricum in its widest sense denoted the entire region S. of the Danube from Rhetia (or at least Noricum) to Mœsia. As first known to the Romans it was the region between the river Drilo and Epirus (Illyris Græca). Illyris Barbara extended northwards towards the head of the Adriatic; part of it was distinguished by the name Dalmatia. In 11 A.D. the district was divided into Lower Illyricum (Pannonia) and Upper Illyricum (Dalmatia) [but see Ptol. 2.16]. The name Illyricum applied in this narrower sense to the region between the Arsia (Arsia) and the Drilo was gradually displaced by the name Dalmatia, which, from the time of the Flavian emperors, was the regular term.

The mention of Illyricum in the NT is confined to Rom. 15.19, where Paul affirms that he has 'fully preached the gospel' 'round about unto Illyricum' (κύκλω μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ). Two questions are raised by the passage—viz. the exact meaning of (1) Illyricum, (2) 'unto' (μέχρι). Illyricum may here be understood of the southern part attached to Macedonia, which contained the important commercial cities of Epidamnus (in Roman times Dyrhacium = modern Durazzo) and Apollonia—the two termini of the Via Egnatia, which runs a distance of 500 m., from the Hebrus to the Adriatic. The great landing-place on the Macedonian side was Dyrhacium (cp Catull. 36.15: 'Adriæ tabernam,' Strabo, 283, 329). The apostle might easily have undertaken the transcontinental journey from Thessalonica or Berea during 57 A.D.¹ (see CHRONOLOGY, § 71).

On the view that Paul always uses geographical terms in their Roman sense (Zahn, Einleit. 1.24), Illyricum must be taken to denote the Roman Province N. of the Drilo. In favour of this interpretation are the facts (1) that Paul is writing to a Roman church, in which his words would naturally be taken in their Roman sense; and (2) that he uses not the Greek form Ἰλλυρίς (Ἰλλυρία), but the adjectival form Ἰλλυρικόν (= Lat. Illyricum).

Applying the same reasoning to the use of the term Dalmatia (2 Tim. 4.10), we shall be compelled to take that also as denoting the Roman Province, and hence to trace in the NT writings the change in Roman usage with regard to the name of the Province which has been above explained. All the more striking appears the variation when it is remembered that it is in writing to a Greek that the word Dalmatia is used in preference to the (to a Greek) more familiar form Illyria [see DALMATIA].

The decision of the question whether by Illyricum Paul meant Illyris Graeca or the Roman Province Illyricum (Dalmatia) really lies in the answer given to the further question—whether 'unto' (μέχρι) is used in an inclusive or exclusive sense.

Μέχρι, perhaps, need not involve the inclusion of the word with which it is combined, hence an actual crossing of the frontier of Illyricum from Macedonia is not to be proved.

An unprejudiced reader, however, would here undoubtedly understand Illyricum to lie within the circumference of the ever-widening circle of missionary enterprise pictured by the phrase ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ καὶ κύκλω μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ. For in fact, if Berea, the most westerly recorded city (Acts 17.10), is taken to have been the most westerly point actually reached in this region by Paul, he was still nearly 100 miles east of the Illyrian frontier—and therefore the employment of Illyricum to mark the extreme limit of preaching can with difficulty be justified. We hold, then, that Paul's words imply actual work in Illyricum—i.e., probably in Illyris Graeca—(cp his apparent familiarity with Nicopolis, Tit. 3.12); but a visit to, e.g., Salona (Colonia Martia Julia Salona), the capital of the Roman Province Illyricum (Dalmatia) may also have found a place in the itinerary of which we get this solitary glimpse.

That the phrase 'unto Illyricum' might have been legitimately used 'even if his [Paul's] apostolic labours were entirely to the eastward of the mountains (sc. Mt. Scardus), in the country watered by the Strymon and the Axius' (Conybeare and Howson, 2.150), cannot be maintained by reference to the vague use of the word Illyricum to designate the region S. of the Danube (e.g., Tac. Hist. 1.276.285, where Illyricum = Pannonia Moesia and Dalmatia; id. Ann. 1.46.244, where it = Pannonia Raetia Noricum).

IMALCUE (AVSIMALCUE, CΙΝΜΑΛΚΟΥΗ[A], ΙΜΑΛΚΟΥΕ [NV], EMALCHU-EL [Vg.], ΤΟΝΜΑΛΧΟΝ [Jos. Ant. xiii. 51], ܐܡܠܚܘܐ [Pesh.], MALCHUS [Vg. cod. Sangerm.]), an Arabian prince who had charge of the young ANTIOCHUS [g.v., 4] (1 Macc. 11.39).

The name is clearly equivalent to ܐܡܠܚܘܐ, a name found in Palm. and closely allied to the common Nab. name ܐܡܠܚܘܐ. According to Diodorus (who gives the name as Jamblichus),¹ the prince reigned near Chalkis (Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec. 2.17, n. 21); see Schürer, GV 1.184, n. 24, and the authorities quoted there. He was perhaps related to ZABDIEL, or the son and successor of Diocles in whose hands Balas placed Antiochus (Diod. Fr. xxxii. 101).

ΙΕΜΙΑC [B; in v. 9 -a], ΙΕΜΑΔ [A], ΝΑΜΑΛΙ [L]; in Ch. ΙΕΜΑΔC [B; in v. 18 -aa], ΙΕΜΛΑ [A], ΝΑΜΑΛΙ [L]).

IMMANUEL, a symbolic name, meaning 'With us (is) God' (cp Judg. 6.12.16), found twice in EV, viz. (α) in Is. 7.14, and (β) in Is. 8.8.

In (α) there is no doubt that the expression is to be viewed as a proper name, whether with Baer we adopt ܐܡܢܘܨܘܐ, or with Ginsb. ܐܡܢܘܨܘܐ as the Mass. reading. All the versions are here agreed (Θ, Mt. 1.23, ܐܡܢܘܨܘܐ [BNAQT]). In (β), however, whereas Vg. Pesb. recognise 'Immanuel' and MT, which gives ܐܡܢܘܨܘܐ, does not exclude this view, ΘBBAQT renders ܡܘܪ ܗܝܡܢ ܕ ܫܥܝܘܨ, i.e., 'God is with us'—an affirmation of the favourableness of God to the people of Judah, and Tg. closes the verse with the words, 'thy land, O Israel.'

The historical occasion on which the prophecy of Immanuel was given is described elsewhere (see ISAIAH i.,

1. Various § 3). We have now simply to record theories. the answers which have most recently been given to the question, Who is meant by ܐܡܢܘܨܘܐ ('the 'almāh'—lit. the maiden or young woman),² and by Immanuel?

(a) Lagarde, M'Curdy, and, with some hesitation, Porter, identify the 'almāh with the wife of Ahaz, or (at least) with some one of the inferior members (cp Cant. 6.8) of the royal harem. In this case, it is natural to take the further step of identifying Immanuel with Hezekiah.

As M'Curdy points out, the chronological objection still urged by some scholars rests upon disputable grounds. Those who go thus far may also wish to modify the vocalization of one Heb. word (reading ܐܡܢܘܨܘܐ),³ so that the formal naming of the child will be entrusted to the father.

(b) Hitzig and Reuss identify Immanuel with Maher-shalal-hash-haz, the child whom 'the prophetess' bore to Isaiah soon after his meeting with Ahaz (Is. 8.3).

Riehm and H. Schultz, however, suppose that an elder brother of this child may be meant, and the former accounts for the phrase 'the maiden' by conjecturing that Isaiah had recently become a widower and had married again.

(c) Weir, Hofmann, and Orelli explain the phrase 'the maiden' allegorically.

The people of Israel is often described as the bride of Yahwe (e.g., Is. 54.5 Ezek. 16 Hos. 2), and Mic. 5.3 [2] (cp 4.10) may be plausibly understood as interpreting 'the maiden' in Is. 7.14 of the faithful Israelitish community. According to Hofmann, the child Immanuel means the regenerate people of Israel; Weir, however, thinks that child-birth is simply an allegory of deliverance from danger, though, inconsistently, he admits a secondary reference of the passage to the Messiah.¹

³ This pointing is supported by Θ (except Q* καλεσετε, and Γ καλεσουσιν), Aq., Theod., Symm. In Mt. 1.23 the more general καλεσουσιν is substituted for καλεσεις, which might be paraphrased 'men shall call.'

(d) Ewald and many other critics take the 'maiden' to be the mother of the Messiah, and it has been regarded as Isaiah's chief distinction that he had thus early an intuition of this grand eschatological figure.

The vagueness of the title 'the maiden' may be intentional; we are meant to fix our attention on the personality of the child, whose speedy advent and strange experience will be the divinely appointed 'sign' of the truth of Israel's prophecy. This view was formerly that of the present writer, and is still maintained by Guthe, G. A. Smith, and Skinner. If it be correct, Is. 7 14 is the only prophecy of the Messiah addressed by Isaiah (whose authorship of 96[5]f. 11 1-9 is here assumed) to any but his attached disciples, and there Isaiah kept silence as to the Davidic origin of the mysterious child.

(e) Roorda ('40), Kuenen, W. R. Smith, Smend, Duhm, Cheyne, Marti take a different, and, at first sight, a startling view, which, however, is in perfect accordance with Hebrew grammar. 'It does not appear that he [Isaiah] pointed his hearers to any individual. He says, only, that a young woman, who shall become a mother within a year, may name her child "God with us." For before the babe begins to develop into intelligent childhood, the lands of Pekah and Rezin shall be laid waste' (WRS Proph. (2) 272). Those who take this view will most naturally regard לַאֲמִינִי in 88 (as well as in v. 10) as a statement that 'God is with Judah,' not as a proper name ('thy land, O Immanuel'), and will, by a very slight rearrangement of the Hebrew letters, read '... of the land. For with us is God.' Various considerations, critical and exegetical, almost irresistibly urge this theory upon us (see Duhm, Is., and cp Che. SBOT, and Intr. Is. 32-37).

(f) F. C. Porter (JBL 14 26 ff. ['95]) suggests that Immanuel 'expresses not the prophet's faith, but the false faith, the ungrounded confidence of the king and the people.'

"'Yahwè is with us' was a popular expression of religious faith (Am. 5 14); Amos denies it of Israel as a nation." So Hosea and Micah, the one by the names of his children, the other by express contradiction, oppose this superstition. Jer-miah too denies it in its more recent form (Jer. 88). Immanuel, then, would be 'a name which a Jewish woman soon to give birth might naturally give to her son, but which the experiences of such a son even in his earliest infancy would contradict.' The sign consists 'not in the name nor in the lot of the boy, but in the relation of the two, in the contradiction of the name by the lot.' Thus the name forms a climax to the announcement of judgment in Is. 88.

That the historical meaning of Is. 7 14 should be forgotten in the post-exilic period was only natural. It then became essential to fill the old prophecy with a new meaning—for the 'scriptures' (men thought) should throb with life from end to end, if they were indeed divine. This was done by giving the passage a reference to the gradually developing doctrine of the 'last things.'

We find the first certain trace of this in Mic. 5 3,² which is not from the pen of Micah, and is rooted, not in contemporary history, but in the deductive theology or rather eschatology of post-exilic times (see Gesch. d. isr. Rel. 255, Kaiser-Marti). Jewish Christians interpreted the passage on the same principles. Just as they explained Is. 9 1 [8 23] of the residence of Jesus at Capernaum, and Hos. 11 1 of the flight into Egypt, so they interpreted Is. 7 14 of the virgin birth of Jesus.

Several interesting points must necessarily be passed over here. (1) The controversial use of Is. 7 14 belongs specially to the history of the OT in the Christian Church (cp Diestel's useful work, '69). (2) The LXX rendering of אֲמִינִי also requires attention.

J. P. Peters has suggested that the true reading in Is. 7 14 may be אֲמִינִי הָיָה. If so, a view of the meaning of 'Immanuel' which a recent commentator describes as 'purely fanciful' (mentioned above as c) becomes almost forced upon us. Most scholars, however, will doubt this hold conjecture, and think that ἡ παρθένος in ̄ is a trace of the belief that the Messiah was to be born of a virgin. Badham (Acad. 8th June, '95) has adduced much evidence to show that such a belief was current among Palestinian and Alexandrian Jews. Aq., Sym., Theod. have ἡ παρῆνις.

(3) The relation of the Immanuel prophecy to Is. 9 2-7 [1-6] and to Ps. 46 is critically important. See the special introductions. (4) The meaning of 'signs' in Hebrew prophecy deserves special study. We can here only quote a Mohammedan illustration of ordinary non-miraculous signs such as that given to Ahaz by Isaiah. It was a common belief among early Moslems that the coming of the prophet had been announced by various 'signs' to the world at large. One of the non-miraculous 'signs' is thus described by Ibn Hishām, A Jew was speaking of resurrection and judgment to heathen Arabs, who demanded a sign of the truth of his statements. 'A prophet,' he answered, 'sent from yonder country' (Mecca). 'But when,' they asked, 'do you think he will come?' Then he looked at me, and said, 'If this boy reaches the full term of life, he will see him.' Here, as Bevan remarks,¹ it is not merely the doctrine of a future state which receives a sign. The sign that there is a future state consists in the coming of the prophet, and the sign that the prophet is really coming consists in the fact that the boy who is singled out will live to see him. The applicability of this illustration to Is. 7 14 is obvious. Whether Immanuel is an individual, or a whole generation of children, makes no difference. Cp also Ex. 3 12, which is strikingly parallel to Is. 7 14, and equally requires illustration.

INCENSE is the perfume arising from aromatic substances during combustion, and the substances themselves which are burned to produce the perfume. In EV 'incense' translates two Hebrew words, one of which (קֶטֶר, ḥiṭṭer, θυμίαμα) properly denotes 'smoke,' specifically the smoke of offerings to the deity by fire; the other (לְבָנָה, lebḥōnāh, λίβανος), more frequently rendered frankincense, is the name of a species of gum (see FRANKINCENSE).

Ḥiṭṭer is used of the savoury smoke of victims (Homeric κνίσθη), Dt. 38¹⁰ (קֶטֶר, ḥiṭṭer), Is. 1¹³ Ps. 66¹⁵;¹ and the verb (קָטַר, ḥiṭṭer, Piel) means 'cause to smoke' upon the altar, e.g., the fat of a sacrifice (1 S. 2¹⁵ f., falsely pointed as Hiphil, cp קָטַר in 16), an oblation of bread (Am. 4⁵; not 6); more frequently without direct object (Hos. 4¹³ 11² Jer. 19¹³ etc.). Then, as the burning of at least a portion of the offering was an essential part of the religious rite, by a development analogous to that of šābāh ('slaughter, sacrifice') ḥiṭṭer means 'offer sacrifice.' Later, Ḥiṭṭer is used specifically of the sweet smoke of frankincense and other aromatics; of the incense-offering (as in קָטַר, Ex. 30⁸ etc.); and of the material burned in this offering (Ezek. 8¹¹ Lev. 10¹ and frequently); the last meaning finally predominates.² The compound prescribed in Ex. 30³⁴ is קֶטֶר הַסַּמִּים, 'the incense of aromatics.' The verb ordinarily used in this connection is ḥiṭṭer (Hiph.), which predominates in the later literature in all uses.

The use of incense in religious ceremonies is very widespread, and a great variety of substances has been used for the purpose—woods, barks, dried flowers, grasses, seeds, resins, gums.³ In Egypt the offering of incense by a king is a very frequent subject on the monuments; ⁴ enormous quantities of incense were consumed in the temples; ⁵ and expeditions were repeatedly sent to the land of Punt (Somali) to bring back the fragrant gums.⁶ In the religion of the Babylonians and Assyrians incense (ḫutrinnu) was also much used: the hero of the Deluge after leaving the ark offers sweet calamus (קנה), cedar wood, and fragrant herbs (?); ⁷ references in the royal inscriptions, hymns, and magical texts are not infrequent.⁸ Herodotus says that a thousand talents' weight of frankincense was offered on the great altar of burnt offerings at the annual feast of Bēl (183). Sabæan inscriptions, some of them on censers, name various substances used for incense.⁹

The gums and resins of Syria were carried to market in Egypt through Palestine (Gen. 37²⁵); the perfumes

3. Earliest use for which Southern Arabia was famous in Israel. were brought to Jerusalem in Solomon's time (1 K. 10¹⁰ f.); but there is no reference to the use of incense in Israelite worship before the seventh century B.C.

The prophets of the eighth century, in their picture of the ostentatious religion of their contemporaries (Am. 4 4 f. 5 21 ff. Is. 1 11 ff.; cp also Mic. 6 6 f.), could hardly have failed to make some allusion to this feature of the cultus, if it had been customary in their time. Nor is there any mention of it in the older historical books or laws; ¹ it is, indeed, at variance with the fundamental principle of the older laws, that the material of sacrifice should be the gift of Yahwē—i.e., the product of his land. Jeremiah is the first to speak of it: 'What care I,' says Yahwē, 'for frankincense (לְבָנָה) that comes from Sheba (cp Is. 60 6) and sweet calamus (קנה) from a distant land' (6 20, cp 41 5; 17 26 is post-exilic); see, further, Is. 43 23 f. Yahwē did not burden Israel with a costly cultus, frankincense and calamus (see REED [δ]) bought with money.² The earliest determinable use of Ḥiṭṭer for the material of incense is Ezek. 8 11—significantly enough, in a description of a heathenish mystery-cult; see also 28 41.

It is to be conjectured, therefore, that the use of these imported aromatics in the worship of Yahwē came in, with other innovating imitations of foreign religions, during the reign of Manasseh.³

We may distinguish (1) the use of incense as the concomitant of certain oblations, and (2) the offering of incense by itself.

4. OT usage. (1) In the first case the oblation consists of fine flour and oil (the ordinary minḥāh), or roasted ears or grits (first-fruits) and oil, with frankincense; a handful of the flour or grain, and all the accompanying frankincense was burned on the great altar (the askārāh; see SACRIFICE).⁴ On the table of shewbread pure frankincense was placed (in two golden vessels, Jos. Ant. iii. 10 7, M. Mēnāch. 11 57 f.); when the bread was removed on the following sabbath, the frankincense was burned on the great altar, as an askārāh to the bread (Lev. 24 7-9). In all these cases frankincense alone is prescribed.

(2) In the offering of incense Ḥiṭṭer by itself, the older use was to burn it in censers,⁵ of which it seems to be assumed that each priest had one.

So in P; Nadab and Abihu are destroyed by lightning from Yahwē because they put profane fire (coals not from the great altar) in their censers, and offered incense to Yahwē (Lev. 10 1 ff.); cp also Nu. 16 (laymen presume to usurp a priestly function), and 17 11 (16 46) (Aaron carries his censor through the camp to stay the plague). This was the common mode in Egypt (see Wilkinson, as in preceding col. n. 4, and CENSER; cp also Ezek. 8 11).

This practice survived in the ultimate ritual of the temple only in the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement in Lev. 16, where precisely this part belongs to the older stratum (P) connected unmistakably with Lev. 10; see ATONEMENT, DAY OF, §§ 1 3, LEVITICUS, § 12.

In a later stratum of P a permanent golden altar is provided in the Holy Place, upon which the stated incense-offering (קֶטֶר) is burned morning and evening (Ex. 30 1 ff.; see ALTAR, § 11, and EXODUS ii., § 5 [i.]). The pan, or rather shovel (קַתֵּר, see CENSER), which formerly served as a censor, is now used only to take the coals from the great altar and carry them to the altar of incense.

In the same late stratum of P we find directions for in general Dillm. Exod. u. Lev. on Ex. 30 34 ff., Birdwood in EB(9), s.v. 'Incense.'

¹ The silence of Kings must be compared with the frequent references in Chronicles. See Welh. Prot.(4) 64 ff.; Nowack, HA 2 246.
² The 'fragrant calamus' is an ingredient of the holy chiasm, Ex. 30 23.
⁴ See Lev. 21 f. 15 f. 6 15 [8]; cp Neh. 13 5. In two instances it is prescribed that the minḥāh shall not be accompanied by frankincense (Lev. 5 11 Nu. 5 15).

the ceremonial: Aaron (i. e., the high priest) shall burn incense on the golden altar every morning when he dresses the lamps, and every evening when he replaces them on the candelabra; this is a קטרת תמיד (EV 'a perpetual incense'), corresponding to the stated morning and evening offerings on the great altar (Ex. 307ff.).

The incense is of a peculiar composition, and is very sacred; the use of any other kind in the temple, or of this compound for any other purpose, is a mortal sin (Ex. 3034-35). To offer incense is a high prerogative of the priesthood: the story of Uzziah (2 Ch. 26 16-21) illustrates the peril at which others intrude upon it.

The formula for compounding the sacred incense is given in Ex. 3034-38.

The ingredients are four fragrant substances (סַמִּימִם, sammim), viz., נָחַשׁ, nāšāph (στακτή; EV STACTE), חֲלִבֹתַיִם, ḥēlēth (ὄνηξ; EV ONYCHA), קַנְבֹנָה, ḥelbonāh (χαλβάνη; EV GALBANUM), and זָבְחָה, zəbhōnāh (σαβόνα; EV FRANKINCENSE).¹ These in equal parts, with a seasoning of salt, are to be made into a 'perfume incense according to the perfumer's art,' and reduced to a very fine powder.

In the Herodian temple was employed a much more elaborate compound containing, according to Jos. (J. v. 55), thirteen constituents. This agrees with the Talmudic testimony, which names eleven aromatic substances, besides salt and a certain herb.²

The additional ingredients are myrrh, cassia, spikenard, saffron, costus (קוסטוס), mace (קולומבה), cinnamon (Jer. Yōmā, 45; Bab. K'irithōth, 6a). These were combined with the four prescribed in Exodus in such quantities as to make for the year's supply a total of 368 minas (say, roughly—pounds), one for each day of the solar year, and three additional for the rites of the Day of Atonement. With the aromatics was mixed a small quantity (¼ kab) of Sodom salt, and a certain herb which had the property of causing the smoke to ascend in a vertical column. With this formula we may compare the description which Plutarch gives of the Egyptian incense (and medicinal) compound called kuphi, which consisted of sixteen ingredients (De Isid. et Osir. p. 383).³ Cp also Jubilees 327 1624. According to Apoc. Moses, 29, Adam was allowed to take with him, when he was expelled from Paradise, the sweet-smelling plants used for incense.

The proper compounding of the incense was an art and mystery.

Some of the ingredients required previous preparation: the onycha or sea-shell (נָחַשׁ), e. g., was purified with vegetable alkali, and steeped in a particular kind of wine to take off the rankness of the odour. The materials were powdered in a mortar, the workman repeating as he pounded, 'bray it well!' and the incense was left in a fine powder, not made up into pastils or osselets such as we see in Egyptian representations. The stress laid on the prohibition of honey, though it has a general warrant in Lev. 211, may be a side-glance at the Egyptian mode of preparation, in which honey was probably used to make the mass.

In the last age of the temple the fabrication of the incense was in the hands of the family of Abtinus (Εἰθίνος or Εὐθίνους), who had a room in the precincts assigned them for the purpose. They alone knew the herb which caused the column of smoke to ascend straight to the roof before it spread out; no others could get this effect (Jer. Yōmā, 39; Bab. Yōmā, 38a, etc.). They are said to have had a secret book of formulas.

The ceremonial also became with time much more complicated. Instead of the high priest, the duty of burning the incense was assigned daily by lot (cp Lk. 18-10) to a priest who had not previously enjoyed this distinction.

Three others assisted: one removed from the altar of incense the ashes from the preceding day; another filled a shovel or pan with coals from the south-western of the two fires on the great altar, put them upon the altar of incense, spreading them out evenly, made his prostration, and withdrew. The officiating priest then entered the Holy Place, carrying the proper quantity of incense (¼ mina) in a cup with a lid (כַּוֵּץ)¹ set inside a shallow vessel (כַּף) with a handle, over which a cloth was laid. Another priest accompanied him; when they reached the altar the assistant took the vessel and poured into the hands of the officiating priest every grain of the incense; he then made his prostration and withdrew. At the word from the master of ceremonies (מְבַרְכֵי), 'Incense!' (הַקְטִיר), the priest sifted the incense on the coals, then made his prostration and retired.² During this ceremony no one was allowed to be in the temple, nor within the court between the altar and the front of the temple.³

The exact moment for burning the incense was carefully fixed in the series of rites, and served to mark the time of day (Judith 91 Lk. 110). On the ritual of the Day of Atonement, see ATONEMENT, ii. § 7.

Philo (Quis rerum divin. heres. c. 41) finds in the four ingredients of the incense (Ex. 3034) symbols of the four elements, water, earth, air, fire;

8. Significance. the composition represents the universe. Josephus (J. v. 55) thinks that the thirteen ingredients, gathered from the sea, the desert, and the inhabited earth, signify that all things are of God and unto God. Maimonides (Morē Nēbōkchim, 345) sees in the incense only a means of overcoming the slaughter-house stench arising from the sacrifice of so many victims.

That it is a symbol or vehicle of prayer is suggested by a natural association with the sweet smoke rising heavenwards (cp Ps. 1412 Rev. 83f. 58).⁴ The more subtle speculations of modern 'symbolists,' such as Bähr, testify to the authors' ingenuity rather than to their sobriety.

Many recent scholars remark the fondness of the Orientals for perfumes and the common use of fumigations in honour of guests and rulers⁵ (cp Prov. 717 Cant. 36 Ps. 459 [8]). The perfuming of garments by fragrant smoke, and the use of fumigatories after meals are frequently alluded to in the later Jewish literature. The use of incense in worship is thus explained: men believe that what is so grateful to themselves is pleasing to the deity. That there is truth in this explanation need not be questioned; and it is not improbable that in Israel this was the prevailing conception.⁶

This is not the whole truth, however, any more than the theory that the origin of all sacrifice is the offering of food to the gods. We have only to recall the wide use of fumigation as a demonifuge, of which Tobit 6r-7 81-3 are familiar instances. In Nu. 1646 [1711]ff., where Aaron with his censur stands between the living and the dead and stays the plague, the incense is called an atonement (cp Wisd. 1821); but the background of older belief is not concealed. The use of fumigation in magical rites is also to be noted, one striking example of which is found in Baruch 643 [42]; the Babylonian women who exposed themselves to prostitution by the wayside 'burnt bran for fumigation,' with which the commentators properly compare Theocritus 233, where a girl, in the course of a complicated magical ceremony to win back the affection of her lover, burns bran to Hecate (cp Verg. Ecl. 882 'sparge molam'). On incense in magical ceremonies see also Test. Salom. ed. Fleck, 119.

The principal texts have been cited in the foregoing. A clear description of the ritual, using all the Talmudic material, is given by Maimonides, Mishnē Torā, Tēmidim u-mūsāphin, 31ff., cp Kēle hamikdash, 21ff.

INDIA (הִינדֻ; Η ΙΝΔΙΑ [ΒΝΑΥΛ^{αβ}]). That the Pishon of Gen. 2:11 is the Indus, and that Havilah is India properly so-called (i.e., the region watered by the Indus); that the wood brought to Solomon from Ophir (1 K. 10:11 f.) was sandal-wood, and that 'ships of Tarshish' imported for him Indian ivory and animals (1 K. 10:22), are opinions which have been widely held, but are now, to say the least, seriously threatened by recent investigations (see HAVILAH, IVORY, APE, PEACOCK, ALMUG TREES, OPHIR, TRADE AND COMMERCE). That Indian wares did sometimes find their way to Palestine, is possible enough; but no distinct knowledge of India, or direct intercourse with it on the part of the Jews, can be imagined before the time of Darius (see Herod. 3:94 98) or confidently assumed before the time of Alexander. It is in Esther (a work of the Greek period) that we find the first mention of India under the term Hōd(d)ū (or perhaps rather Hiddū: cp the form *hiñduš*¹ in the Old Pers. cuneiform inscriptions, also Syr. hendū, Ar. hind, all derived ultimately from Sanskr. śindhu, 'sea, great river'). 'From Hod(d)u [Hiddu]—EV "India"] to Cush [EV "Ethiopia"]' is the description of the range of the dominions of Ahasuerus in Esth. 1:189.² In 1 Macc. 6:37 we read of the Indian 'ruler' of the war-elephants of Antiochus V. (see ELEPHANT), and in 1 Macc. 8:8 India is included among the dominions of Antiochus the Great, transferred by the Romans to Eumenes.

The statement in 1 Macc. 8:8, which is plainly unhistorical (see EUMENES), raises a text-critical point of some delicacy. It is scarcely fair to say with Rawlinson (Speaker's Apocr., ad loc.) that 'attempts have been made to save our author's credit by turning "India" into "Ionia" and "Media" into "Mysia".' The simple fact is that names of countries were very liable to be miswritten, and in Acts 2:9 we find a very similar difficulty—viz. Judea (Ἰουδαίαν without the article) coupled with 'Cappadocia', which, as Blass truly says, 'is intolerable, especially here.' In both passages (1 Macc. 8:8 Acts 2:9) we should probably read 'Ionia'³ (for 'India' and 'Judaea').

These are all the references to 'India' in the biblical writings. The hypothesis of Hitzig that Sanskrit words underlie some of the names in old Hebrew legends was only possible before the renascence of Semitic archæology. Nor can Sanskrit etymologies of names of precious stones be trusted. T. K. C.

INHERITANCE (נַחֲלָה), Gen. 31:14. See LAW AND JUSTICE, § 18.

INK (יִינִק, cp MH id., Aram. ܢܝܩܝܝܢ, √ uncertain; μέλαν). Once in OT, Jer. 36:18, where Baruch says that he wrote Jeremiah's prophecies 'in the book with ink.' 𐤀𐤍𐤊𐤍 does not express יִינִק (some cursives [e.g. 22 36 48 51] however en melani). If the reading is correct, it may imply that the words were written indelibly.⁴ Robertson Smith, however (OTJC⁽²⁾ 71 n.) thinks the ancient ink of the Jews could be washed off (Ex. 32:33 Nu. 5:23). In any case, בְּרִי is not very probable.

Rothstein (Kau. HS) reads 𐤀𐤍𐤊𐤍, 'at his mouth'; but a repetition of this word is hardly probable. Giesebrecht, 𐤀𐤍𐤊𐤍, but the antithesis, 'with his mouth'—'by my hand,' is unpleasing.

⁴ Cp Galen, De vir. medic. simplic. 11, ἐκ τοῦ μὴ βλάπτειν μὴ ἐφαλεῖται αὐτῷ [τῷ ἐλαίῳ] διὰ τοῦ μέλανος ἐν ταῖς βίβλοις γραφομένῳ (quoted by Wetstein, Nov. Test. 2:184).

Probably בְּרִי is a corruption of [ה]־בְּרִים (Che.). μέλαν occurs thrice in NT, 2 Cor. 3:3 2 Jn. 12 3 Jn. 13. See WRITING MATERIALS.

INKHORN. In Ezek. 9:2, ὁ Ἐβραῖος in Orig. Hex. renders 𐤀𐤍𐤊 (יִינִק [BAQ]) by μέλαν καὶ κάλαμος γράφειος, and so EV.¹ 'Inkhorns' no doubt contained both ink (in the cup) and reed-pens, as they still do in the East. On the writer-angel referred to, see NEBO.

The name hēsēth was borrowed with the object from Egypt; the scribe's box (see illustration in Toy's 'Ezekiel,' SBOT 113) was called in Eg. gsty-i.e., that which is in two parts. (WMM, OLZ, Feb. 1900, col. 50.)

Ar. funduk and Span. fonda).

A mālon (יָלִין) is a station for the night, a lodging-place; the same word can be used for the night-quarters of an army (Josh. 4:38 Is. 10:29 2 K. 19:23 = Is. 37:24, see SBOT); a κατὰλυμα is a place where burdens are loosed for a night's rest. The warm commendations of hospitality in the NT show that even in the Roman period the buildings set apart for strangers to lodge in were of a simple character in Palestine; hence a description of a modern khān or karavanserai (the former term properly belongs to an 'inn' within or near a town) may be not without some illustrative value. Let the reader imagine, then, a large building, in the form of a square, whose sides, each about 100 yards in length, are surrounded by an external wall of fine brickwork, based on stone, rising generally to the height of 20 feet. In the middle of the front wall there is a wide and lofty archway, having on one or both sides a lodge for the porter and other attendants; the upper part of it, being faced with carving or ornamental mason-work, and containing several rooms, surmounted by elegant domes, is considered the most honourable place of the building, and is therefore appropriated to the use of the better sort. This archway leads into a spacious rectangle, the area forming a courtyard for cattle, in the midst of which is a well or fountain. Along the sides of the rectangle are piazzas extending the whole length, and opening at every few steps into arched and open recesses, which are the entrances into the travellers' apartments. An inner door behind each of these conducts to a small bare chamber, which derives all its light from the door, or from a small open window in the back wall. In the middle of each of the three sides, there is a staircase leading to the flat roof, where the cool breeze and a view may be enjoyed. In the few buildings of this sort which have two storeys, the travellers are accommodated above, whilst the under flat is reserved for their servants or as warehouses for goods.

Such superior karavanserais, however, are not often met with. The most part are but wretched lodging-places, which supply neither necessities nor comforts. The only service the traveller can depend upon receiving from the keeper, besides water for man and beast, is attendance in sickness. For one of the qualifications of this functionary is the possession of a knowledge of simples and of the most approved practice in case of fracture or common ailments. Hence the good Samaritan in the parable (Lk. 10:34), although he is obliged, in the urgency of the case, himself to apply from his own viaticum a few simple remedies for wounds, may be supposed to leave the wounded man in full confidence that he will be nursed by the keeper of the khān (ὁ πανδοκεύς, or -δοχεύς [WH]), whose assiduities in dressing the wounds of his patient will be quickened by the prospect of an adequate remuneration. See HOUSE.

Surely we cannot venture to suppose, with Jülicher (Gleichnisse, 590) that the Good Samaritan's κατάλυμα was a Gasthaus or hostelry. It is much more probable that the 'lodging-place' differed but slightly from the so-called Good Samaritan's Inn on the way to Jericho, which bears the name of Khan Hatrura.

Nor would it be reasonable to suppose that a different sort of lodging-place is meant by the κατάλυμα (EV inn) of Lk. 27; that Lk. uses different words in 27 and in 10³⁴ may only arise from a difference in the literary source. It is true that in Lk. 22¹¹ κατάλυμα seems to mean a room that was lent to pilgrims (for the passover); but the context in 27 is as adverse to the meaning 'guest-chamber' as to that of 'inn.' That the gerāth Chimham of Jer. 41¹⁷ (RVmg. 'the lodging-place of Chimham') is meant, is quite impossible, though this has been suggested (cp Plummer, St. Luke, 54). See CHIMHAM, and cp NATIVITY.

That an Oriental 'manger' (φάτνη) was not like those of the West is shown at great length by Kitto (Pict. Bib. Lk. 27), who states that 'when persons find on their arrival that the apartments usually appropriated to travellers are already occupied, they are glad to find accommodation in the stable, particularly when the nights are cold or the season inclement, and adds that "the part of the stable called "the manger" could not reasonably have been other than one of those recesses, or at least a portion of the bench which we have mentioned as affording accommodation to travellers under certain circumstances.'

1. b. Ikkesh, the Tekoite, was one of David's heroes (2 S. 23²⁶, ἰδαε [L]; 1 Ch. 11²⁸, ἰρα [BNA]); in 1 Ch. 27⁹ (εἰρα [A], ὀδοῦνας [B], ἰδ. [L]) he is at the head of the sixth division of David's army. Marq. (Fund. 19) would read אִירָא (cp L and B in Ch.) and identify him with the Iddo in 1 K. 4¹⁴; see IDDO (iii. 4).

2. The ITHRITE (q.v.), another of David's heroes, 2 S. 23³⁸ (οἰαδ [L]), 1 Ch. 11⁴⁰ (ἰρα [B], ἰα [N], ἠρα [L]).

3. The JAIRITE (יִרְיָה)—i.e., a man of JAIR (a Gileadite clan)—was one of David's 'priests' (יִרְיָה [B], 2 S. 20²⁶; cp Dr. TBS 220 (εἰρας ο ἰαρεν [B], ε. ο ἰαερεῖ [A], ἰωδαε ο ἰεθερ [L]; Pesh. יִרְיָה). Perhaps for יִרְיָה we ought to read יִרְיָה, i.e., the Jatirite (so Th., Klo., after Pesh.; cp L). See ABIATHAR.

IRAD (עִרָד), Γαῖδαδ [ADEL]; IRAD. Gen. 418†. Philo explains, γαῖδαδ δ ἐρμηνεύεται πόλιμιον (de Post. Caini, Mangey, 1237); possibly he read γαῖδαρ, which the copyists altered. The best reading seems to be עִרָד, 'Ērād (cp עִבָּל, Mt. 'Ebal); but Lagarde (Orientalia, 233) prefers 'Ēdād.

To read עִרָד, 'Ārōd, 'wild ass,' and compare the 'sons of Hamor,'—i.e., members of the Ass-clan (?), Gen. 33¹⁹—does not suit the character of the genealogy, nor are we helped by the proper name Arad. The name is probably of Bab. origin. See CAINITES, § 7. T. K. C.

IRAM (עִירָם), a phylarch (allāph) or rather clan (eleph) of Edom (Gen. 36⁴³ [G om.], 1 Ch. 1⁵³ [HRAH, A; אִיר. L]). In Gen. l.c. G's Hebrew text had עִירָם (a variant of עִירָד); so also G^B reads in Ch. l.c. B. W. Bacon, following Ewald, suggests that originally Zepho (עִירָם) stood before Iram, thus making the number of clans twelve. But from G of Gen. 36¹¹ (see ZEPHO) we shall do better to adopt the reading עִירָם 'Zophar' (cp ZOPHAR), and may then with probability emend עִירָם into אִירָם (Omar) which precedes Zepho in Gen. 36¹¹, so that all the sons of Eliphaz but GATAM [q.v.], will be included in the list of clans of Edom. It is also possible, however, with S. A. Cook, to connect Iram with the S. Judahite names IRA, IRU; cp GENEALOGIES i., § 5 n. W. R. Smith suggests a connection with 'Aireh, the name of a village near the ruins of Petra (see SELA, § 2). See also Haupt's note in Ball, SBOT, Gen. 94.

IRIJAH (יִרְיָה), 'Yahwé sees', a captain of the guard, temp. Jeremiah (Jer. 37¹³†; σαρογία [B], -C [NA], ἀρογιάς [Q], ἰαρ. [Q*]).

IR-NAHASH (עִיר נַחַשׁ), as if 'city of Nahash'; so EVmg. is represented as a descendant of ESHTON [q.v.] in 1 Ch. 4¹² (ἰρολεωσ [ΠΟΛΕΩΣ B], ΝΑΔ [BA], ΗΡΝΑΔ [L]); see TEHINNAH. The name has actually been taken to mean Bethlehem (see Jer. Qu. Heb. ad loc., and on 2 S. 17²⁵, cp NAHASH); but it is certainly corrupt.

Probably it has arisen out of עִיר נַחַשׁ, Cor-ashan (1 S. 80³⁰), which is itself an easily explicable corruption of עִיר נַחַשׁ, 'Beer-sheba' (ἔβελ βηροσβε). ASHAN [q.v.] in Josh., 1 Ch., also comes from עִיר נַחַשׁ, 'Sheba.' A less plausible emendation would be עִיר נַחַשׁ, 'serpent's well.'

G adds that πόλις ναας was the brother of εσελων (B, -μ [A]), του χειρ[ε] (B), τ. κενεζ[ε] [A]), or αθθου του κενεζ[ε] (L), which means that Beer-sheba was closely related to HAZAR-SHUAL (in the Wady Seyal). With εσελων cp G's α[σ]α[ρ]σ[ου]α in Josh. 19³. The reference to the Kenizzites confirms the above explanation. T. K. C.

IRON (עִירֹן), κερωε [B], ἰαριων [A], ἰερων [L]), a 'fenced city' of Naphtali named between Migdal-el and En-hazor, Josh. 19³⁸. Now Yārūn, a village 6½ m. W. from Hazor and about the same distance W. by S. from Kadesh (Josh. 19³⁸). On a hill to the NE. are the ruins of a monastery, which was originally a synagogue like the famous one at Kefr Bir'im (Guerin, Gal. 2105 ff.; PEF Mem. 1258).

IRON (עִירֹן); σιδηρος; Vg. *ferrum*²). The Israelites of course derived the use of iron from the Canaanites, and it was comparatively late

1. Among the Semites. that iron displaced bronze as the metal in ordinary use. We should naturally expect this. In Egypt the use of bronze preceded that of iron, though iron was perhaps not wholly unknown as early as the great pyramid of Gizeh, where a piece of wrought iron has been found in an inner joint near the mouth of the air-passage on the southern side.³ For a later period we may mention the oxidised remains of some wedges of iron intended to keep erect the obelisks of Rameses II. at Tanis. Iron is also frequently referred to in the lists of tribute (see Brugsch's Hist. of Egypt). In Babylonia and Assyria, too, the actual working of iron seems to have been late, though it was certainly manufactured and employed much more in these countries than in the Nile Valley.

There is no trace of iron in the early hymns, and it seems clear that iron did not displace bronze till after 800 B.C., for in the ninth century we still find 'bronze axes' mentioned in the inscriptions. Place found hooks, grappling-irons, harnesses, ploughshares, etc., at Khorsabad, and Layard abundance of scale-armour of iron in a very decomposed state at Nimrud.¹

We now pass to Syria and Palestine. It is recorded by the Assyrian king Rammān-nirari III. (810-782 B.C.) that he received 3000 talents of copper and 5000 talents of iron as tribute from the land of Imrišu (i.e., Aram-Damascus). At about the time of Amos, then, iron was plentiful in Syria. This, however, is no proof that iron was not well known in Syria and Palestine at an earlier date. If Hommel is correct, the Canaanites derived their first knowledge of iron from Babylonia.

Both ḫalḫu and Ass. parṣillu were, he says, connected with the Sumerian barḡal and the New Sumerian buṛal, the non-Semitic sound ḡ having become z in Semitic (ZDMG 45 340).

It is probable, however, that before iron was much used in Babylonia, it was worked in N. Palestine. There iron-smelting must have been understood at an early period. The iron chariots of the Canaanites (see CHARIOT, § 3), so familiar to us from the OT, are mentioned also in the historical inscriptions of Egypt; they came from the valley of the Kishon and the inland district to the N.,² and iron objects were found by Bliss in the fourth of the ruined cities in the mound of Tell-el-Hesi (Lachish), which he inclines to date about 1100 B.C.³ We can therefore readily understand that a Canaanite legend (from which the Israelite legend in Gen. 4:22 must be derived) placed the ancestor of iron-workers as well as brass-workers in primeval times (cp CAINTES, § 10).

We are in no uncertainty as to the source whence the Canaanites obtained their iron; it was the mountain-range of Lebanon (Dt. 8:9; see LEBANON). Jeremiah, too (15:12), speaks of iron from the N.;⁴ but whether the eulogist of wisdom refers to these northern mines in Job 28:2 cannot be determined. The unknown writer may have travelled beyond the limits of Palestine. The Egyptians procured iron (with other metals) from the Sinaitic peninsula; had this poet travelled there? At any rate, smelting-furnaces were well known to the later Hebrew writers (Jer. 11:4 Dt. 4:20 1 K. 8:51).

There are but few OT passages of really early date which refer to iron. The references in the Hexateuch

2. OT (e.g., Nu. 31:22 35:16 Dt. 3:11⁵ 19:5 Josh. 22:8) occur in documents of late composition.

The account of Goliath's spear (1 S. 17:7) was written at least 200 years after David's time, and the mention of an axe-head of iron in 2 K. 6:5 (certainly not due to a 'copyist'⁶) belongs to a comparatively late stratum of prophetic legend. The most important reference in the David-narratives is doubtless that in 2 S. 12:31. The phrase 'axes of iron' used there suggests, however, that axes of bronze were still in use; cp Am. 1:3 'threshing-instruments of iron' (see AXE, 6). It is remarkable that according to tradition no iron instrument was used in the construction of Solomon's temple. The editor of the tradition accounts for this by the legal orthodoxy of his hero (see Dt. 27:5 f., and cp Josh. 8:31). The Chronicler is bolder; he supplies the omission (1 Ch. 22:3 and elsewhere), and even represents Solomon as having able iron-workers of his own (2 Ch. 2:7), though obliged to send to Tyre for a chief artificer.

⁶ So Flinders Petrie in Hastings' DB, s.v. 'axe.'

It has often been supposed that the graphic description in Nah. 2:3 [4] contains a reference to steel. Where AV renders 'The chariots shall be with flaming torches' (taking חֲלָיִים as if = חֲלָיִים), the Thesaurus of Gesenius-Rödiger gives 'fulgent chalybe vel falcihus currus.' RV too has 'the chariots flash with steel,' without, however, committing itself to the hypothesis that the Assyrian chariots had scythes. That hypothesis, as is shown elsewhere (CHARIOT, § 1), is untenable; nor is the rendering 'steel' at all well supported.¹ In fact, the word ḫalādīth is corrupt; not improbably חֲלָיִים should be חֲלָיִים = Ass. halūptu, 'covering' (from halāpu, 'to be covered,' in II. 'to cover')² a word often used in connection with horses, chariots, and warriors. Render, therefore, 'the (metal) plating of the chariots flashes like fire.' In view of Nahum's fondness for Assyrian technical terms (see SCRIBE), this is not a difficult conjecture.³ Steel, then, is not mentioned in the OT, for no one will now defend AV's rendering 'steel' (חֲלָיִים) in 2 S. 22:35 Ps. 18:34 [35] Job 20:24 Jer. 15:12 (see BRASS).

From the time of Amos onwards iron was in general use among the Israelites as well as among the Syrians (see above).

Amos (1:3) mentions threshing instruments of iron. Writers of a later date mention iron objects in abundance, e.g., tools (1 K. 6:7 2 K. 6:5), pans (Ezek. 4:3), nails for doors (1 Ch. 22:3), bars for fortifying city-gates (Ps. 107:16 Is. 45:2), a stilus or pen (Job 19:24 Jer. 17:1), hunters' darts (Job 41:7 [40:31]), horns (Mic. 4:13, cp 1 K. 22:11), fetters (Ps. 105:18). Note also that the ideal described in Is. 60 includes 'iron instead of stones' (v. 17), obviously a hyperbole.

(Dt. 4:20) and by iron fetters (Ps. 107:10).
3. Metaphors. a severe rule by a rod, and slavery by a yoke of iron (Ps. 29 Dt. 28:48), obstinacy by an iron sinew in the neck (Is. 48:4); a destructive imperial power by iron teeth (Dan. 7:7); a tiresome burden by a mass of iron (Ecclus. 22:15); insuperable obstacles by iron walls (2 Macc. 11:9). As a beautiful simile drawn from this metal we may select Prov. 27:17, 'Iron sharpens iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend.'⁴

IRPEEL (רְפָאֵל), 'God heals'; cp Rephaiah, and רְפָאֵל in CIS 2 no. 77; NAMES, § 30), an unknown city of Benjamin, grouped with REKEM (or rather Bahurim) and ZELA, Josh. 18:27. We should probably read, 'And Bahurim, and Irpeel, and Zelah' (taking over רְפָאֵל from v. 28).

Observe that in Ἰερραῖα, the corruption (see TARALAH) is given, but the true reading רְפָאֵל is not represented. Neither is the second corruption רְפָאֵל represented in Ἰερ (see ELEPH). In MT the true reading רְפָאֵל and the two corruptions רְפָאֵל and רְפָאֵל both find a place. Ἰερ, however, gives Ἰερραῖα, and Ἰερ Ἰερραῖα.

IR-SHEMESH (עִיר שִׁמְשֵׁי), Josh. 19:41; another name of BETH-SHEMESH [q. v.].

IRU (אִירָא; אִיר [B], אִירָא [A], אִירָא [L om.]), a son of Caleb (1 Ch. 4:15†); cp IRAM.

ISAAC (יִצְחָק), or [Am. 7:9 16 Jer. 33:26 Ps. 105:9] יִצְחָק, § 54; יִצְחָק [ADL, etc.], but in Am. 7:9 τοῦ γελωτοῦ [BΛQ]. ΗΣΑΑΚ [E² Gen. 28:8].

Popular tradition could not mistake the obvious meaning of Isaac. According to J (Gen. 18:12), Sarah laughed to herself when she overheard the promise of

1. Name. a son; when it was fulfilled, she exclaimed, 'Whoever hears of it will laugh at me' (Gen. 21:6; see SBOT). E, however, gives other accounts. On the birth

² Del. s.v. quotes the phrase, 'Forty of his chariots with trappings' (Ausrüstung) they carried away.'

³ On the metal plating of the chariots see Billerbeck, in Beitr. zur Assyriologie, 3 167, and cp CHARIOT, § 3, and on the remainder of this difficult verse of Nahum, see SHOE.

of Isaac she cried out, 'God has given me cause to laugh' (Gen. 21.6a); in v. 9 of the same chapter she sees Ishmael 'laughing,' or rather 'playing' (צחק). Lastly, P tells us (Gen. 17.17) that Abraham laughed in surprise on hearing the promise. Evidently the voice of tradition varied. We might have expected to hear, but we do not hear, that Isaac, like Zoroaster (Plin. H.V. 7.16, and Solinus, c. 1), laughed on the day of his birth.

It is customary to suppose that Isaac was originally at once a tribal name and a divine title, and that the full form of the tribal name was Yishak-el, —i. e., El laughs (so also Ed. Meyer). The divine title Yishak = 'he who laughs,' 'the Laugher,' has been thought to point to the god of the clear sunny sky;¹ the myth of Zoroaster's laugh has no doubt a solar connection. It would be safer, to explain the name as the 'cheerful, or friendly one' (cp Job 29.24), who turns a smiling countenance towards his worshippers.' Such a conception of their deity might seem natural to the pastoral tribes who, to judge from the traditional narratives, honoured and became identified with the name of Isaac, and who in early times paid him religious homage as the divine patron of Beersheba.²

It is much more probable that 'Isaac' like Abraham (see JERAHMEEL) and JACOB (q.v.) is an ancient popular corruption. With much probability it may be regarded as a corruption of Ahīhālās ('the brother defends,' cp Ass. halšu 'stronghold').

Hālāsā is close to the Wady Ruheibeh (Rehoboth), one of the seats of Isaac (§ 2 below), and is probably to be identified with the ancient ΖΙΚΛΑΓ (q.v.). The equivalent name Halasal appears elsewhere as BEZALEEL, also as HAZZEL[poni]. All these are Judahite names which most perhaps ultimately be traced back to the primitive Jerahmeelite divine name Ahīhālās (אֱהִיחָלָאֵשׁ), the original of Isaac (צחק). The religious importance of Elusa (= Hālāsā) can now be more fully considered.

In Gen. 31.42.53 the singular phrase 'the fear of Isaac' (פֶּחַי יִשָּׂאֵל) occurs; פֶּחַי is very rare in the older literature. It is specially frequent in Job; cp Job 4.14a, where פֶּחַי, 'terror,' is the result of an apparition. Hence 'ghost' may seem to some to be a plausible rendering (Schwally, Gespens); Dillmann gives numen reverendum; similarly Holzinger. But the objection from late usage remains. The matter is important in its bearing on early spirit-lore. More probably פֶּחַי is here an old word meaning 1. thigh; 2. ancestor; 3. clan (as sprung from a single ancestor; cp WRS kin. 34.174; Bevan, Daniel, 214).

The narrators found comparatively little to say about Isaac (for the reason see below, § 5); but some of their traditions are of great interest. First in importance is that of Abraham's sacrifice of his 'only son,' accomplished in will but not in act (Gen. 22.1-19). Few of the early narratives have received more light than this from analytic and historical criticism.

It has become certain that the story has been considerably altered since E wrote it. The editor or compiler of JE not only appended vv. 14b-18 (an unoriginal passage, full of reminiscences), but also introduced several alterations into vv. 1-14a.

The most remarkable of the editorial changes concerns the locality of the sacrifice. It is obvious that such a sentence as 'Go into the land of the Moriah (so in the Hebrew) and offer him . . . on one of the mountains which I will tell thee of,' is no longer in its original form, and most critics have thought that 'the Moriah' was inserted (together with the divine name Yahwē in vv. 11-14) by the editor of JE. This writer was probably a Judahite, and it is supposed that he wished to do honour to the temple of Jerusalem by localising on the hill where it was built one of the greatest events in the life of Abraham (see MORIAH). We are, at any rate, not entitled to assume that the original locality was the temple mountain; nor is it safer to suppose, with Wellhausen and Stade, that Mount Gerizim is intended, and to read, 'to the land of the Amorites' (אֶל-אֲרִיִן הָאֲמֹרִיתִים)¹ (cp Gen. 33.19, 'Hamor the father of Shechem'), for Gerizim is undoubtedly too far off;² and we hear nothing of Abraham's having to climb a steep mountain. Dillmann's suggestion (adopted by Ball in SBOT) is at first sight more attractive. A vague expression, such as 'Go into the land of the Amorite'³ (אֶל-אֲרִיִן הָאֲמֹרִיתִי), would harmonise with one of J's leading objects, which was to represent Abraham's action as, not a concession to surrounding superstition, but the height of self-devoting faith. The patriarch, as Dillmann rightly holds, is supposed to set off with his 'only son' (עִבְדִּי יְחִידִי אֲשֶׁר עִבְדָה לְךָ אֶת-אֱלֹהֶיךָ) without balancing the claims of rival sanctuaries, just as he set off from Haran, 'not knowing whither he went' (Heb. 11.8), but following his invisible Guide. The reading 'the land of the Amorite,' however, cannot be held satisfactory. It leaves us without a clue to the situation of the place of sacrifice, except that it was in Palestine, more than two days' journey from Beersheba. The mere name (however we read it) in v. 14 tells us nothing. No sanctuary in Palestine proper with a name at all resembling this is mentioned in the OT.

² Am. 8.14: read, with Wi., דִּרְךָ for the impossible דִּרְךָ of MT. From Am. 5.5, however, it appears that northern as well as southern Israelites resorted to the sanctuary of Beersheba—a recognition, perhaps, of the early connection of Israel with the land of Musri, to which Kadesh apparently belonged. This illustrates Amos's remarkable use of 'Isaac' as a synonymi for 'Israel' in 7.9 (Ἰσααβ, and so Symm. in v. 9).

In considering the question of the reading in v. 2 it would have been better to try another course. The sanctuary (מִקְדָּשׁ, v. 4, means 'sacred place') was no doubt well known, at least by hearsay, to most Israelites. It was called (the narrative being Elohistic) Elohim- (or Ēl-yir'è (v. 14); we abstain here from questioning the accuracy of this reading, and of the El-roi and Lahai-roi of Gen. 16.13 f. (see, however, end of this section). Is there, then, any sacred place bearing this name, or a name that might fairly be regarded as another form of this? There is the divinity who, according to J, appeared to the exhausted Hagar, and was called by her Ēl-roi, i. e., God of seeing (Gen. 16.13); and the name was shared by the divinity's sanctuary. It was in the neighbourhood of the well (be'er) of Lahai-roi or El-roi, that Isaac dwelt (Gen. 25.11; see below), and hence it is reasonable to suspect that here may be the sacred spot intended by the narrative;⁴ the 'mountain' may be the nearest hill to the well called Ain Muweileh, which we have elsewhere identified with BEER-LAHAI-ROI. The place is 10 hours S. of Ruheibeh (Rehoboth), on the road to Beersheba. Going at a leisurely pace, it might conceivably take Abraham three days to reach it. In this case the expression which the editor of JE misread as 'to the land of the Moriah' was probably 'to the land of (the) Mišrim' (אֶרֶץ מִצְרַיִם). As Winckler has pointed out, both Kadesh and Beer-lahai-roi lay, in all probability, in the region anciently called Musr or Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b). A bright light is now thrown on details which have hitherto caused embarrassment, such as the loneliness of the place of sacrifice, and the precaution taken by Abraham of carrying wood for the altar (cp Grove, in Smith's DB, art. 'Moriah').⁵ Habitations, indeed, there must have

² See the books of travel, e.g., Tristram's Land of Israel, where a strong, but not too strong, opinion is expressed. The Samaritan tradition, identifying the mountain with Gerizim, is purely sectarian and artificial.

⁶ Wi. (Gesch. ii.) accepts the proposed reading for Moriah in been not very far from Ēl-rōi; but there was no walled city like Jerusalem, and the ascent of the hill would take less time and trouble than Mount Gerizim. The hill itself is to be imagined as bare of trees; but near at hand Abraham could see thick brushwood (רָבִבִּים), in which a ram was caught by the horns.

This view of the story, too, enriches us with something that we did not know to be recoverable, viz., E's explanation of the name of the old southern sanctuary of Ēl-rōi (or, as he calls it, Ēl-yir'è). The editor of JE having already adopted a fine narrative accounting for the name (161-14), and wishing to attach the great event described in our ch. 22 to the central sanctuary of Judah (see MORIAH), introduced the changes to which reference has been made. Elsewhere, however (see JERAHMEEL), in treating the apparently corrupt text of Gen. 1613f. suggestions have been made which favour the emendation of Gen. 2214 as follows,—'and Abraham called the name of that place Well of Jerahmeel, even as it is called to this day.'

There are, also, two other related aspects under which the 'Moriah' story must be considered. The writer obviously

3. Didactic purpose. wishes, in the most considerate manner, to oppose the practice of sacrificing firstborn sons (cp FIRSTBORN), and, subordinately to this, to justify the substitutionary sacrifice of an animal. In treating this part of our subject, we need not linger on the famous passage of Philo of Byblus¹ (professedly reproducing a primitive Phœnician story), in which Kronos (or rather El) is said to have sacrificed his only son Ιεουδ to free his country from the calamities of war. In spite of its doubtful attestation and modernised form, the story has the appearance of being based on tradition. Probably it was told at Byblus to justify the rite of human sacrifice, and a similar myth may have been current among the Canaanitish neighbours of the Israelites. The story in Gen. 22, however, is clearly intended as a basis for the abrogation of the rite. There may have been stories having the same object among the Canaanites or the Israelites; these, not the story in Philo of Byblus, would be the right narratives to compare with the Elohist's. So far, however, as an opinion is possible, the form of the Elohist's story is, apart from the detail about the ram, all his own. It was suggested, indeed, by circumstances already related in the traditional narratives; but it was moulded by himself, and it is bathed throughout in an ideal light. Evidently this pious writer felt that for the higher religious conceptions no traditional story would be an adequate vehicle.

The course which he adopted shows the writer to have been a great teacher. He admits the religious feeling which prompted the sacrifice of a firstborn son; but he suggests that the idea of such a sacrifice is unnatural (the unsophisticated mind of Isaac cannot take it in, and Abraham himself would never have thought of it but for a divine oracle), and earnestly insists that Israel's God demands no more and no less than absolute devotion of the heart. One thing more he suggests—that there are stages in religious enlightenment, and that an act which was justifiable in the wild days of ЈЕРПТНАН (q.v.), was no longer tolerable. In the Southern Kingdom a protest against the continuance or revival of human sacrifices was raised by the writer of Mi. 66-8; in the Northern, at an earlier date, by the Elohist.²

There is a fine Indian parallel to the story of the deliverance of Isaac in Aitariya Brahmana, 713-16 (Max Müller, Anc.

Gen. 22, and thinks that the original seats of both Abraham and Isaac were in the north near Dan (perhaps the true [according to him] Kirjath-arba). The journey referred to in Gen. 22 would thus be from the far north to the far south.

² See further, Kamph., Das Verhältniss des Menschenopfers zur israelit. Rel., '96, where recent literature is referred to. On human sacrifices in Babylonia, cp Ball, PSBA 14 ('92), No. iv.; in Egypt, Tylor and Griffith, Tomb of Paheri (Egypt Sansk. Lit. 408-419), where Cunaçepha, son of a Brahman, who had been all but sacrificed in honour of Varuna, is liberated by the gods, and adopted by a priest. The stage of moral development, however, represented in this story, is more advanced than that in Gen. 22.

It is true, the narrator is behind the prophet in spirituality—thousands of rams, says the latter, will not propitiate the 'high God' (God of heaven),—but the Elohist spoils his pathetic narrative by a close which, for modern taste, could hardly be more prosaic. 'And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold, a ram caught in the thicket by his horns, and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt-offering instead of his son' (2213). The first readers of the Elohist, like the first readers of the epilogue of the Book of Job, had standards and requirements different from ours. Below the new taste for spirituality lay the old taste for ritual. If human sacrifices were not to be offered, what was the surrogate for them? The voice of humanity in certain priestly circles had, it appears, spoken for a ram, which in the symbolism of vicarious sacrifice was henceforth to represent a man. The animal selected was not always the same. At the Syrian Laodicea (= Phœn. Ramitha) it was a stag, which animal was annually sacrificed in place of a maiden as late as the second century A.D.¹ We would gladly know at what date this stag sacrifice was introduced. Did the humane Israelitish priests precede or follow the priests of Phœnicia? And was the original substitute for the life of the firstborn son among the Israelites a ram (רָמִים) or a stag² (שָׁמִים)? When we consider (1) that wild animals were not usually sacrificed among the Israelites; (2) that in Gen. 227 a sheep is spoken of as a victim; and (3) that in the region of Ēl-rōi we should expect a gazelle (צִבְיִים) rather than a hart (שָׁמִים), it seems best to abide by the ordinary reading 'ram.'

No subsequent narrative comes up to that in 221-14, though the idyllic tone and the deep religious spirit of J's account of the finding of the right wife for Isaac (ch. 24) claim admiration (see 5. Other stories. REBEKAH). The narratives respecting Isaac himself tend to lower our estimate of his character; but we must remember that the patriarchs represent the highest Israelitish ideals only in part; they also embody Israelitish weaknesses. Isaac's shiftiness in his relations with Abimelech (Gen. 261-11 R₇) need not be excused when we have learned to look upon him as a tribal representative; the repetition of, virtually, the same story twice over in the life of Abraham (cp Gen. 1210-20 J; 20 E) is an indication of the comparative lateness of the traditional stories of that patriarch, as well as of the fondness of the people for this particular tradition, which showed how inviolable were the persons of their ancestors.

The mingled greatness and weakness of Isaac is most strikingly shown in the story of his paternal benedictions, one of which, however, is more fitly styled a curse (Gen. 27). It is to us a somewhat repellent narrative, on account of the unfilial and unbrotherly craft of Jacob and the love of good eating ascribed to Isaac. With the ancients it must have been popular. As to the craft of Jacob, we need not excuse it, for it was inherited by the tribes of Isaac and Jacob from their nomad ancestors. As to Isaac's passion for a certain food, this too was, no doubt, a tribal failing; a notable Arabic song in the Hamāsa (Freytag, 506) reckons 'roast flesh' as first among the pleasures of life. The detail mentioned in 27_{3f}. would not, however, have been thought of but for the necessity of giving scope to the cunning of Jacob. Possibly, too, the first tellers of the story may have thought that Isaac, being a semi-divine hero, and being about to pronounce fateful oracles (see ESAU), should not be treated otherwise than as a deity. It was in festival raiment (v. 15) that Jacob the deceiver approached his father (the Jews in Jerome's time said that they were Esau's priestly garments), and Robertson Smith has plausibly defended¹ the view that the skins worn by Jacob on his arms and neck were analogous to those worn by worshippers in many lands at sacrificial ceremonies (cp ESAU). At any rate, it is evident that the pronouncing of the oracles was a quasi-divine act, and that, according to the narrators, the circumstances connected with it were overruled by their God to the accomplishment of his own ends. It would seem that this was not one of the very earliest narratives; in the oldest stratum of tradition Isaac and Ishmael (both attached to Beer-lahai-roi) must have taken the place afterwards occupied by Jacob and Esau. The details of the present genealogical connection were of course afterthoughts. (If Isaac was originally a Jerahmeelite hero we can the better understand how the Israelites, whilst frequenting his sanctuary, adopted comparatively little of his legend.)

It is, however, not only at Beer-lahai-roi, but also at REHOBOTH, BEERSHEBA, and GERAR, that we find Isaac established.² These three places come before us in Gen. 26₁₋₃₃, which is substantially the work of J, though editorial insertions have been made, and v. 33 (as Bacon—see below, n. 4—has rendered very probable) should change places with 21₃₁₋₃₃. It was at Beersheba, according to J and E, that Isaac spent the second part of his life, and no doubt it was there, not at Mamre or Hebron (as P, in 35₂₇, represents), that tradition supposed the patriarch to have died. According to the most probable view of 21₃₃, it was Isaac, not Abraham, who planted the sacred tree at Beersheba, invoking the name of Yahwè.³ It was there, too, that he 'intreated Yahwè for his wife, because she was barren,' and that Esau and Jacob were born.⁴ It was at Beer-lahai-roi, however, endeared to Isaac (as fancy involuntarily suggests) by the memory of the interrupted sacrifice (and not less to Ishmael by the memory of his mother Hagar), that Isaac received his wife that evening when he had gone out on some unknown errand into the open country.

It is worth remarking that the Wādy Muweilih (in which the well of Lahai-roi should be placed) must at one time have been better watered and more cultivated than at present (Palmer).

On apocryphal allusions, see APOCRYPHA, § 11.

² The reader should be cautioned against some inaccurate though seemingly very critical statements in Maspero's Struggle of the Nations, 68. To make Isaac a resident at Hebron effaces one of the leading distinctions between him and Abraham.

ISAIAH, in RV Mt. 33, and OT passim: ESAIAS, in AV; and in AV Eccles. 48 22, ESAÏ (אִשָּׁי), everywhere except in title of book; there אִשָּׁי [see JESHAIAH, 4 5 6]], son of AMOZ (q.v.), 2 K. 19 2 Is. 1 1 2 Ch. 26 22 32 20 32 etc. —the most gifted and powerful of those early prophets who are known to us by written records.

The name is to be explained probably either as 'help of Yahwè' (so J. H. Mich.), cp אִשָּׁי, or as 'Yahwè helps,' from אִשָּׁי אֵל עוֹלָם (so Del.); cp Sab. אִשָּׁי and the names אֵל עוֹלָם, אֵל עֵלְיוֹן; אֵל has אֵל עוֹלָם [= אִשָּׁי]? so Klo. of the prophet—L everywhere, BNA everywhere except 2 Ch. 26 22—αἰσθησιου [BA] and αἰσθησιου [N] in Eccles. 48 20 (23), but never, except Ezra 8 7 [A], of the other six bearers of the name² (see JESHAIAH).

I. Isaiah lived at Jerusalem, was married (83), and had children (73 83). Plainly he was of high social rank. When he needs a witness he

1. Biographical facts. applies to the chief priest (see URIAH), and his whole conduct and bearing bespeak one who can claim social respect. In this he contrasts with Amos and Micah. We may presume therefore that he had every educational advantage which the capital could supply, and it is plain that he inherited a literary tradition of no very recent date. The heading in Is. 1 1 refers to Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah as the kings in whose 'days' (or period) he prophesied. This heading, however, is probably the work of a late editor, who gained his information from a study of the works of Isaiah. From the reference to Judah and Jerusalem as the subjects of the prophecies, we may assume the statement to have been intended to apply only to chaps. 1-12. It remains true, however, that we have no reason to suppose that Isaiah prophesied under Manasseh. The story that he was put to death (the later legend said, sawn asunder; cp Heb. 11 37) by order of Manasseh, as a punishment for speeches on God and on the holy city which were contrary to the law, obtained a wide currency, but has no support in the Book of Kings, and is unworthy of credit.³

These dry bones of biography need to be clothed with living flesh, and for this we must turn to Isaiah's

2. Narratives in Is. 6. discourses, which contain the very essence of his life. Grand and antitiquely simple was his character, and those who have been enabled by a thorough criticism and exegesis to form an idea of the limits, the period, and the meaning of his discourses, will find themselves in a position to rectify some common misapprehensions.

II. It will be convenient to obtain our first introduction to Isaiah from certain still extant narratives respecting portions of his prophetic ministry, proceeding from his disciples or admirers at different periods,—viz., (a) Is. 6, (b) 7 1-16, (c) 8 1-4, (d) 20, (e) 36-39 (2 K. 18 13-20 19 || 2 Ch. 32).

From (a)—which is an account of the vision by which Isaiah was set apart as a prophet—we learn that he entered on his ministry in the year of the death of Uzziah,

² With reference to the א equivalent, it may be noted here that the first vowel is oftenest i or e or ie, the σ being frequently doubled (αἰσθησιου = אִשָּׁי? so Klo.; cp αἰσθη, 1 Ch. 23 1 [A]), but also (four times in B, once in A, once in L) ω or o (ωαρηα, 1 Ch. 25 15 [B] = אִשָּׁי? so Klo.; ωαρηα, 1 Ch. 26 25 [BA] = אִשָּׁי, cp Neh. 12 32? —ωαρηα, 1 Ch. 26 25 [L]).

i.e., probably in 740 B.C. Isaiah had evidently been waiting for indications of the divine will—otherwise how should the words 'Send me' have darted at once to his lips? Already, too, he had the not less humbling than exalting consciousness of a divine presence which glorified the world. To this was now added the sense of a new and special relation between himself and Yahwè. He was sent to work among his people as a prophet. At the same time he had a presentiment, which in the light of his new relation to Yahwè seemed to him a revelation, that, being such as it was, not merely Israel, but even Judah, was doomed to perish.¹ The revelation was, it is true, as yet more like an objective fact than a subjectively realised truth, or rather like many a flash of insight which visits and revisits us for moments, and then disappears, till at length a sad or joyful experience makes it ours for ever. Nor was it so terrible a presentiment as it may appear to us, because it was evidently accompanied by a revelation of the conversion of a remnant, as we gather from the name which Isaiah gave to his eldest son SHEAR-JASHUB (q.v.). And we must believe that, as time went on, apparent changes for the better in the moral condition of Israel somewhat dimmed Isaiah's perception of the contents of his earliest revelation. Only by the sternest experience could he be absolutely and entirely convinced, in the depths of his nature, of the necessity for the fall of Judah.

(b) Probably to a period shortly before the writing down of the consecrating vision belongs the gran rifiuto 3. Is. 71-16; (to apply Dante's phrase) which is related to Immanuel. and Ahaz are the sole acting figures.

Perhaps it is because the consecration narrative (a) serves as a preface that the prophet or his secretary has made no reference to the revelation of the 'remnant.' The unbelief of Ahaz was in fact an unpardonable offence which made Isaiah indisposed to look at the brighter side of his revelation. Nothing can well be sterner than Isaiah's prophecies at this period (see SBOT, or Intr. Is. 396 f.), though a short breathing-time is allowed before the sad end.

The story of the 'great refusal' of Ahaz is well known. The king expected a siege, and was preparing for it, when Isaiah accosted him. He bade him not be afraid, reminding him that Yahwè was the head of Jerusalem, whereas the rulers of Damascus and Samaria were but puny mortals, and no better than half-burned firebrands; in short the coalition against Judah would, in common parlance, 'end in smoke.' The prophet, however, saw clearly the inefficacy of his appeal. Ahaz had no confidence either in his material, or—worse by far—in his spiritual, bulwarks. To his friendly 'fear not' Isaiah therefore added a caution against the dangers of unbelief. What those dangers were he did not say; but Ahaz caught his meaning, and had no need to question him. 'An established house' was a common phrase for a family which did not die out, and remained in its ancient seat (1 S. 235 258 1 K. 1138); Isaiah's caution, therefore, if we may consider its reference as limited to Ahaz, threatened the king with nothing less than the extinction of his dynasty. At this point (Is. 710) the record becomes incomplete; the omission is veiled by a conventional introductory formula, indicating a fresh stage in the discourse. Probably some startling announcement was made, for the accrediting of which Isaiah conjectured that Ahaz would require a 'sign.' Then this extraordinary man, who deals with the king as though his equal or superior, gives

Ahaz carte blanche in the choice of a 'sign' (see IMMANUEL). The king has no doubt that Isaiah can, as we should say, work a miracle, and consequently believes that one way to safety from his present foes would be to obey the prophet; but he is not sure that some worse trouble for himself might not follow. He does not believe that Yahwè will be strong enough, a little later, to save him from Assyria; and yet how can he accept Yahwè's help in the smaller trouble unless he is prepared to accept it in the greater? The only way, from his point of view, to avert the danger from Assyria is to make it a friend, which will moreover be able to save him from Syria and Ephraim. Friendship involves the protection of the weak by the strong, so that there is really no cause (Ahaz thinks) to introduce religious considerations into the question. Then Isaiah, to save his honour as a prophet, hurls, as it were, a sign at the unbelieving Ahaz. He says that Immanuel—i.e., 'God with us'—will be the name which any one of the children soon to be born will receive from its mother, for before the tender palate of the child can distinguish between foods, the lands of Rezin and Pekah will have been devastated by Assyria.¹ Isaiah has, in fact, not less political than religious insight. If he could have put off the prophet, and spoken only as a statesman, he might have asked why Ahaz should pay Assyria for humiliating Syria and N. Israel when it was its own interest to do this. There was, at any rate, no immediate necessity for burdening his small territory with tribute to Assyria; the unbelieving king was as weak in politics as he was in religion. If we possessed a fuller record of the declarations of Isaiah (sv. 17-20 cannot be relied upon, being fragmentary, and partly recast by a late editor), we should probably find that the immediate punishment of the king's unbelief specified in it was this—that deliverance from Rezin and Pekah would be a 'sign' to him, not of good, but of evil import. Since the king has rejected the opportunity so graciously given him of winning Yahwè's favour, he must not look for a long continuance of calm days. Disaster is looming right in front of him.

That the 'Sign' which Isaiah indignantly hurls at Ahaz is one which, in our fragmentary record, appears to be of happy augury, has caused a difficulty to many students. Prof. F. C. Porter in particular has felt this so strongly that he has devised a new interpretation of Immanuel which deserves consideration (see IMMANUEL). Two chief objections to it must, however, be mentioned.

(1) Immanuel—i.e., 'God is with us'—by no means expresses the faith or the 'underlying assumption' of Ahaz; the true object of the king's worship was neither the old national God, nor the Yahwè of Isaiah, but—policy. Hence his perturbation of mind, with which contrast the confidence arising out of a sense of oneness with their God possessed by the N. Israelites (Am. 5146 18 613).

(2) The explanation of Immanuel as an expression of the false faith of the multitude is opposed by the analogy of the name SHEAR-JASHUB (q.v.), which conveys a truth accepted by Isaiah. It is perfectly true, however, that the unbelief of Ahaz made the confidence of the happy mothers of Is. 714 only too likely to prove of short duration. They would suppose that Yahwè was unreservedly favourable to their people, whereas he had but granted a short interval before the sin of Ahaz should bring its terrible punishment on king and people. The sign was not as happy a one as Isaiah had intended.

(c) The third piece of narrative is 81-4 (cp next art., § 6). From 73 we already know that in 734 Isaiah had

4. Is. 81-4; a son named Shear-jashub, who was old Isaiah's sons. enough to accompany his father in his walks. From 81-4 we learn that shortly afterwards he had another son, named MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, whose name portended the fall of the two northern kingdoms. These two sons, apparently, are the 'children whom Yahwè has given him,' and, like himself, they are 'signs and omens in Israel' of divine appointment. His children, at any rate, are 'signs in virtue of their names, which are doubtless as well known in Jerusalem as that of the crown prince himself. With regard to Isaiah we are not told that he received his name by divine appointment. It is only the prophet Jeremiah who claims to have been consecrated from his birth, and who may therefore conceivably have regarded his name as an omen (cp Jer. 1:10). It is enough that Isaiah and his sons alike prophesy of the future, and rouse the dull consciences of men.

Thus, when the crisis comes, Isaiah will not stand alone. Before his inward consecration (in B.C. 740?) he felt himself 'unclean' through his solidarity with his people; but now, by solidarity with him, the members of his family are virtually detached, like himself, from the 'people of unclean lips' among whom they dwell. For Isaiah's wife, too, is a prophetic personage (8:3), though she may not bear a prophetic name; she participates in the privileges of her husband.

(d) Chap. 20 describes the strange procedure by which Isaiah gave, so to speak, an acted prediction¹ of the fate reserved for two neighbouring

5. Is. 20. countries. The people of Ashdod revolted from Assyria in 713, and Judah (now itself a vassal of the Great King) was tempted to follow their example. Isaiah heard an inner voice bidding him go about, like one of the poorest class, without either sandals or an upper garment. He obeyed till the siege and capture of Ashdod in 711, which was a still more striking omen of the punishment in store for rebellion. This is the only prophetic action recorded of Isaiah. Generally he was contented with spoken prophecy,—either upon æsthetic grounds, or because spoken prophecy was less susceptible than acted prophecy of misinterpretation. The strange attire in which he appeared for three years need not have meant what it was at length declared to mean. It might have signified merely the prophet's grief (cp Mi. 1:8) for Ashdod; but as we see from vv. 3-6, it was a perfectly unsympathetic announcement of the fate of the north Arabian countries of Musri and Kuš,² which had long been important factors in Palestinian politics. To this Isaiah added a graphic description of the confusion of the statesmen of Palestine ('this coastland') at the fall of the single great ally on whom they had counted (cp ISAIAH II., § 9 a [4]).

(e) From the two remaining narratives we must not expect too much, owing to the lateness of their date

6. Is. 36-39. (see next art., § 15). One of them (36-37) is no doubt earlier than the other (37:36-38); but even the earlier is full of contradictions to the ideas and the implied situations in the universally acknowledged prophecies. So much, however, we may admit to be just conceivable:—(1) that Hezekiah in 702-1 B.C. really did take pains to propitiate Isaiah, and did convince the prophet of his disposition to obey the divine oracles; and (2) that Isaiah in consequence declared that on this occasion Jerusalem should escape a siege. The grounds for this view, however, are more hypothetical than one likes, and, at any rate, the details of Hezekiah's embassy to Isaiah and the speeches assigned to the prophet are altogether untrustworthy. And yet how transcendently great this prophet of Yahwè must have been to have formed the subject of so much imaginative writing! And how highly the later Jews must have valued the privilege of prophetic revelation to have devoted themselves so earnestly to filling up the gaps in its historical record!

III. We now turn to those discourses of Isaiah which have no accompanying narratives. We will view them as revelations of a great religious character, and treat them with the respect due to all such revelations; i.e., we will not require them to exhibit throughout a cast-iron consistency. The criticism which we

7. Prophecies without narratives: Is. 26-21 have sought to employ elsewhere has not been controlled by preconceived ideas respecting Isaiah's prophetic system, and we may therefore venture, as historians, to build upon its conclusions. We have heard from Isaiah's lips his own account of his consecrating vision. Criticism justifies us in holding that he lost no time in expanding and applying the stern truth which had lodged itself in his mind. For both Israel and Judah he announced a grievous disaster, which to the deeply-moved prophet appeared not less awful than a judgment upon the world (26-21). Never again did he write in a style so poetic, so sublime. Probably he learned that a manner at once more pointed and with more personality was better fitted to win the attention of the people; indeed, in 26-21 he writes, it would seem, more to relieve himself than to impress others.

In 31-5 Isaiah expresses himself more plainly. He anticipates a captivity like that in Jehoiachin's time, when (if we may trust the narrative) few, except the poorer class, were left in Judah, and says that young men of tyrannical character will be the rulers of the humiliated state which should remain.

This picture of the future (which, apart from the reference to the rulers who would take the place of the captive king, he repeated in 31:6-41 51-7 8. Is. 31:6-41 and 58-24) did not correspond to facts. 51-7 58-24. The punishment of the sins of Judah's rulers was delayed; the Davidic king remained on an, as yet, unshaken throne.

Isaiah was not at all perplexed at this. He recognised the divine will that Ahaz should have a fair trial and choose between the broad and the narrow way. Again and again he offered counsel to Ahaz; but the young king was too willful to listen, and his counsellor began to grow 'weary' (7:13). One trial more, as we have seen, was given, but in vain; and then Isaiah distinctly pointed to the 'waters of the river' (i.e., to Assyria) as the source of the calamity in store for Judah as well as for Israel (8:7 f.; cp 5:26-30 7:20).

We have but fragments of Isaiah's discourses at this period; but it is plain that the unbelief of Ahaz had greatly deepened the prophet's conviction

9. Is. 8:5-22. of coming ruin; no words of Carlyle are more fraught with indignation and grief than 8:2 f. Still, even here all is not dark. Many, we are told, not all, will rue their opposition to the divine word (8:14), and if we could be sure that 8:9 f. and 9:2-7 (1-6) were written at this period by the prophet, we should feel that Isaiah was by no means destitute of the richest consolation. The strict conservative view, however, is difficult in the extreme, and though Isaiah certainly believed that a 'remnant' would (like himself and his disciples, 8:16-18) turn, in humble, penitent faith, to Yahwè, and so escape captivity, it is not safe to suppose that Isaiah pictured to himself its future history.

Had Isaiah any hope for (northern) Israel? He had none for the survival of the ancient kingdom; but did

10. Is. 9:9-21 he believe that in Samaria too there was a 'remnant' which would 'turn'? Three important prophecies (not counting 26-21 and shorter passages) relate to Israel: 9:9-21 (8-20) 17 and 28:1-6. The second and third of these contain passages which may seem to favour an affirmative answer; but a strict criticism will not allow us to regard 17:7 f. and 28:5 f. as more genuine than 11:11-13.¹ Yes; Isaiah had no hope for the country which, on the ground of its past leadership, still arrogated to itself the name of Israel. It is probable, however, that when the Assyrian hosts actually drew near Samaria (later than the prophet had at first anticipated), Isaiah's hopes for his own land revived. He appears at that time to have expected an Assyrian invasion of Judah, and in prophetic vision to have seen the foe pressing on to the capital. There is actually a record of this vision in that fine descriptive passage, 10 28-32. 11. Is. 10 28-32 and we have some reason to think that 89 f. 17 12-14. Isaiah at that time uttered the defiant words of 89 f., and in 17 12-14 announced the destruction of the Assyrian invaders of Judah. This, if true, was certainly not mere patriotism on the part of Isaiah. There must have been some change in the internal condition of Judah, which to Isaiah's prophetic eye spoke of a modification (surely not a reversal) of Yahwè's purpose. We can hardly err in connecting this with a change in the government of the country. It is possible that Hezekiah had considerable political influence even before his father's death, and that he was supposed, on good grounds, to have been influenced by the preaching of Isaiah. This will account for the hopeful spirit of 89 f. and 17 12-14 (the present writer would formerly have added, of a third 12. Is. 14 28-32. passage, 14 28-32, which the heading states to have been written 'in the death-year of king Ahaz,' 719 B.C.).¹ Isaiah at this time no longer apprehended an immediate Assyrian invasion; the reason of which is, that the Assyrian arms had (in 721 or 720) received a temporary check in N. Babylonia. He was well aware, however, that Sargon would soon be as dangerous as ever, and if he was still confident in the present security of Jerusalem, it was because the ruler of Judah was now, what Ahaz had not been, a believer. For Isaiah does not yet regard the individual as a moral unit. If Yahwè protects Zion, it is because Zion's ruler has responded to the demand for 'faith' (cp 23 16).

Eight years passed, and still Isaiah held the same language. For though the greater part of 10 5-126

13. Is. 10 5-126 (next art., § 7) is certainly of late origin, and written for other circumstances than those of the eighth century, yet enough remains to assure us that Isaiah in 711 regarded an Assyrian conquest of Judah as contrary to the plan of Yahwè. The grand rebuke addressed to Assyria in 10 5-15 (apart from the interpolations) should not improbably be combined with 14 24-27, which is the misplaced conclusion of the Isaianic prophecy (next art., § 9 [a], 1). Thus in 711 (this date may, on good grounds, be assumed) Isaiah believed it to be Yahwè's purpose 'to break Assyria in his (Yahwè's) land, and on his mountains to tread him under foot' (14 25). No light is thrown either in 10 5-15 or in 14 24-27 on the condition of affairs in Judah; but we must assume that Hezekiah still maintained the attitude of one who 'believed' Yahwè and his prophet, for without this we know that Isaiah could have seen no hope for his country (79 28 16).

It is true, Sargon states, in a fragmentary inscription (KB 2 64 f.), that the inhabitants of Philistia, Judah, Edom, and Moab planned revolt from the Assyrian suzerainty, and entered into negotiations with Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2 6)—the passage relates to the time preceding the siege of Ashdod mentioned above—but it is allowable to suppose either that the Assyrian scribe put down four of the best-known names of Palestinian peoples somewhat at random, or that Hezekiah confessed his error to Isaiah, and gave pledges of future obedience.

At any rate, Isaiah, who had already expressed such strong confidence in the present safety of Zion, could not and would not change his tone without solid reasons.

Again eight years elapsed; but now symptoms of a change appear. The next prophecy in chronological order to the great 'Woe' on Assyria is 14. Is. 28-32. 28 7-22 (next art., § 12, end). No passage of Isaiah gives us quite such graphic details as to the faults of the upper classes at Jerusalem, and it is remarkable that Isaiah appends to these details a solemn re-statement of the spiritual basis of the security of Judah. If we take this prophecy in combination with one of certainly not much later date (the denunciation of Shebna, 22 15-18 : next art. § 9 [b], 2), we may infer that Isaiah again thought he saw an imminent prospect of the deportation of many of the leaders of the state to Assyria (cp 31). There was indeed still a possibility of averting this fate. But would these clever politicians adopt it? Of the king, however, we hear nothing. Isaiah seems to regard Hezekiah as, to a great extent, the puppet of the predominant political faction. Indeed, remembering the story of Padi of Ekron, one is inclined to think that such dependence may have been generally the lot of the small kings of Palestine at this time. At any rate, Isaiah's great object is to startle the politicians out of their security. He warns them that, though the horizon is clear at present, it will not remain so. He will not on this occasion say when the storm will break out. 'Add year to year, let the feasts run their course' (29 1). Certain it is, however, that before long ARIEL (q. v.) will be marked out as his prey by the Assyrian; Jerusalem (for this is the meaning of the symbolic name employed) will be besieged and reduced to great straits. It is not the Assyrian, however, who will deal the final blow. A theophany will take place; Yahwè himself, the storm-God and the war-God, will appear and destroy the guilty city (cp 210-21).

What was the cause of the change in Isaiah's preaching? It was the rise to power of an Egyptian party at Jerusalem. The peoples of Palestine and Phœnicia saw in the new (Ethiopian) dynasty of Egypt the only power which could save them from the oppressive and uncongenial rule of Assyria (cp EGYPT, § 66). Isaiah, on political, but vastly more on religious, grounds, insisted on the futility of an alliance with Egypt (chaps. 30 f.). He supplemented his 'woe' upon Jerusalem by the declaration that the Egyptian allies of Judah should be defeated, for Yahwè himself would fight on the side of the Assyrians (so we must understand 31 3). This cycle of prophecies (28-31) is of the highest value both for the history of Judah and for the biography of the prophet. It gives us a graphic picture of the excitement at Jerusalem and the opposition to Isaiah's preaching, and shows how the initial revelation of Judah's doom was gradually fixing itself more and more in the prophet's mind. It also confirms an idea which has probably already suggested itself to us—that Isaiah's interest is not in the circumstantial details of his prophecy, but in the connection between national sin and national calamity. His object is to reveal God in history, not—except in a secondary sense—to turn the course of events.

The negotiations with Egypt do not appear to have as yet succeeded, and if chap. 18 (next art., § 9 [a], 3) was

15. Is. 18. written at this period, it shows that Isaiah had for a time triumphed over the Egyptian party. Otherwise he would certainly not have given Judah a further breathing-time. Otherwise, too, he would not have so calmly bidden the Ethiopian ambassadors return to their own land. It is remarkable that Isaiah should speak so respectfully of the Ethiopians, for not long since he spoke quite otherwise of Egypt (30 3-7). A fuller acquaintance with this period of Egyptian history might enable us to explain this.¹ It is still more remarkable that Isaiah should have adopted so lofty a tone of enthusiasm in speaking of the prospects of Judah. May we not venture to assume that Hezekiah had initiated something in the nature of a reform,² something which might be charitably regarded as 'turning to Yahwè? Isaiah has already told us how far, at an earlier time, the 'princes' of Judah were from practising the virtues which befitted them. Must we not conjecture that Hezekiah had lately made examples of some of the chief offenders among them (e.g., Shebna)? If so, king and prophet were destined to be sadly disappointed. The prophecy in chap. 18 (if rightly dated) had been delivered on the assumption that the rulers of Judah had really 'turned' to Yahwè. It did not indeed promise that there should be no Assyrian invasion. Sennacherib would, of course, take the field against the kings of Palestine (including Hezekiah) who had refused tribute. But it did guarantee (upon implied conditions) that the invasion should be stopped at the outset by a supernatural intervention. This, however, did not happen. As Sennacherib and Isaiah agree in stating, widespread desolation was wrought in Judah by the irresistible warriors of Assyria. To all—to the prophet not less than to his countrymen—this was a sign of Yahwè's displeasure. All that could now be hoped for was to avert destruction from Jerusalem. The rulers took one means of doing this; Isaiah wished them to take another. Sacrifices had never been so abundant, nor public prayers so fervent (11:15; cp Am. 5:22-24 with vv. 15-18); but Isaiah, like Amos, attached no intrinsic value to ceremonies. One means, and one only, there was to check the progress of Sennacherib; it was to change their lives. Their God would forgive the past, and restore to them his protecting care. They would sow and reap, undeterred by Assyrian warriors; they would 'eat the good of the land.' On the other hand, if they rebelled against the divine will they would suffer the hardships of a siege (see HUSK.).

¹ Or, possibly, if there was a second Assyrian invasion, the prophecy in chap. 18 might refer to this.

'If your sins be scarlet, they may become white as snow; if they be red as crimson, they may become as wool. If ye be willing and obedient, the good of the land shall ye eat; but if ye refuse and rebel, caroh-pods shall ye eat' (1:18-20, last line emended).

Even in the too brief summary (15-26), the discourses of Isaiah delivered at this period move us deeply. We long to know what effect they produced. Only a late tradition on this subject has come down to us; it is that contained in chaps. 36 f. (next art., § 15). It may be barely possible to hold that a good effect was produced, that Isaiah assured Hezekiah of safety. If this was the case, he very soon changed his tone. It is 17. Is. 22:1-14. certain that, as the last Assyrian warriors disappeared, Isaiah, sick at heart, used language (22:1-14; next art., § 9 [b], 2) which can be understood only as a final acceptance of the doom pronounced in 6:9-13. He bows to the decree of the God of Israel. For Judah there is no more hope; for himself no further ministry. The heart of 'this people' has become gross, and there is no possibility of salvation. Therefore cities must become waste, and houses uninhabited, and, should a tenth be left, this must, in turn, be consumed. For the small prophetic band—himself, his children, and his disciples—there may still be a future (cp 8:16-18); but he has received no revelation on this subject; nor could he, without a psychological miracle, have even imagined a condition of things totally opposed to the present. Only a short time ago he could anticipate the restoration to Jerusalem of 'judges as at the first, and counsellors as at the beginning' (1:26). Now it would appear as if, by a moral compulsion, he placed himself by the side of Amos, who had prophesied of the guilty worshippers in the sanctuary at Bethel, that 'not one should flee away, not one should escape' (Am. 9:1).

The reader may need to be reminded that the latter part of this picture of Isaiah is based upon critical conclusions which are not as yet generally accepted. The criticism of the prophecies of Isaiah is slowly emerging from a position analogous to that in which the Hexateuch was before the publication of Wellhausen's Prolegomena. The reader may, if he will, keep his mind in suspense as to the critical problems of the day, and confine his attention to the earlier part of the present article. Should he do so, he will obtain a sound though an incomplete conception of the great prophet. But to those who have seen the weakness of the old criticism, and the strength of that which offers itself as on the whole far more in accordance with facts, and who find the synthesis of new and old presented in this article historically credible, it may be safely said that the more they contemplate the character of Isaiah as now disclosed to them, the grander it will appear. We have not hitherto realised the scale and proportions of his truly heroic faith. What Abraham was in legend, Isaiah was in fact. He was prepared to trust God in the darkness as implicitly as the 'father of the faithful,' when, according to the noble story, he lifted up his hand, at the divine command, to slay his only son. For we may be sure—the variations in his picture of the future attest this—that Isaiah loved his people dearly, and was alive to the least indications of moral progress. And yet he could, with breaking heart, give up the present Israel to its doom, so complete was his faith in the all-wise purpose of the God of Israel. How that which seemed the end of all things could yet not be a fatal blow to the divine purpose, it was not for him to judge.

As a man and a prophet we have now fully recognised Isaiah's greatness. Was he also a poet? In 37:22-29

19. Was Isaiah a poet? (next art., § 15 [β]) a very fine taunting poem on Sennacherib is assigned to him; but the lateness of the narrative in which it is placed, together with the late character of the phraseology, prevent us from accepting this assignment. Another fine taunting poem also has been claimed for Isaiah—that in 14:4b-21, which was not originally connected with the late prophecy against Babylon in chap. 13 (see ISAIAH ii., § 9, b [γ], β). But ideas and phraseology alike point away from Isaiah, unless we apply a very imperfect criticism to both sections of the evidence.

It must suffice here to mention the fact that in 14:12-14 reference is made to a fully developed myth of Babylonian origin, for which there is no parallel in the works of the pre-exilic prophets, and to point out the similarity of this taunting song to that in 37:22-29. Both these songs were probably composed with reference to the story of Sennacherib, and both are of late origin. Probably 14:28-32 (next art., § 9 [δ], 3) also should be included in the group (see above, § 12).

Nor can we reckon as more than a curiosity of criticism the theory that Pss. 46-48 were written by Isaiah, the first when the Syrians, the second when the Philistines, and the third when the Assyrians were overthrown. The simple truth is that Isaiah was too great to be a literary artist; his words were deeds.

The preceding sketch requires to be supplemented by a sympathetic survey of the prophetic literature of the post-exilic period (see PROPHETIC LITERATURE). A critical rearrangement of the prophecies of the Book of Isaiah not only makes Isaiah a simpler and a grander and therefore also a more truly antique personality than he could be according to the older criticism; it introduces us to a number of less original, but in some respects more attractive personages, who being neither public men nor ambitious of fame in an age (αιών) that was passing away, have not been remembered by name. They drew their inspiration (so they must have believed) from the divine Spirit which dwelt within the community (Is. 63:11; cp SPIRIT), and they were content with the hope so touchingly expressed by a psalmist of similar character—

Remember me, O LORD, in the gracious welcome of Thy people; Oh visit me with Thy salvation; That I may look on the prosperity of Thy elect, May rejoice in Thy nation's joy, May triumph with Thy inheritance.

(Ps. 106:4 f., Kay's translation.)

It may be hoped that English students will not any longer cherish the unfounded prejudice that to follow out the many traces of plurality of authorship in Isaiah involves less appreciation of those passages of the book which were not written by the son of Amoz.

The criticism of the Book of Isaiah has been almost revolutionised within the last twenty years.¹ The problems have become more complicated, the methods of the critics more varied and subtle. The present position of criticism cannot be properly understood, however, without some acquaintance with an earlier stage. It is necessary, therefore, to preface this article by a sketch of what appeared certain or probable before 1880. To give the student a mixture of the two criticisms would be misleading. He has to pass as quickly as possible through the initial stage already traversed by criticism, that he may not perplex himself with unreal difficulties.

1. Criticism before 1880.

1. Criticism before 1880.

1. Criticism before 1880.

A. EARLIER CRITICISM

We must begin with the criticism of I. Isaiah (i.e., Is. 1-39), and then proceed to that of II. Isaiah (i.e., Is. 40-66), remarking by way of introduction that critics in general are agreed that the final redaction of the Book of Isaiah must have been anterior to the composition of Ecclesiasticus (probably about 180 B.C.), because of the description of Isaiah's wide range as a prophet in Ecclus. 48 22-25, a passage which occurs not only in the Greek and the Syriac, but also in a lately discovered fragment of the Hebrew text.

Abraham Kuenen ('28-'91), one of the greatest of recent 'higher critics,' gave this sketch of the growth of I. Isaiah in the first edition of his Introductio (Onderzoek) in '63.

A. CHAPTERS 1-39. i. Arrangement.—The earliest parts of the book Kuenen takes to be the two collections, chaps. 1-12 and 13-23. The former consists entirely of genuine prophecies of Isaiah; the latter contains some prophecies dating from the last years of the exile. A characteristic of the second group is that headings are prefixed to the prophecies, with the peculiar term נְבִיאָה ('divine utterance,' or 'oracle' (13: 14 28 15: 17 [20] 21: 11 13 22: 23). It is natural to assume that this was the later of the two collections, and it is possible that the present position of the short prophecy, 14 24-27, is due to the editor of this group, who may have wished, by transferring this passage from 10 5-12 6 (near which it must once have stood) to a place amongst the oracles of his own collection, to connect the two groups, and give them an appearance of homogeneity. This editor certainly lived in post-exilic times, whereas the collector of chaps. 1-12 was either Isaiah himself or one of his disciples (cp 8 2 16). Time passed, and other prophecies came to light which rightly or wrongly were ascribed to the prophet Isaiah. Another editor, wishing to complete a Book of Isaiah, attached chaps. 28-33 24-27 and 34 f., and appended, as a suitable close for the book, a historical account of Sennacherib's invasion and Isaiah's prophetic activity at this period.

ii. Collections of Isaianic prophecies.—a. The earliest.—These are, Kuenen thought, in chaps. 2-4, written in the first years of Ahaz, before the outbreak of the Syro-Ephraimitish war.¹ Chap. 5 describes Isaiah's expectations a few years later, after the first defeat experienced by Ahaz. During the same war Isaiah wrote his account of his great vision (chap. 6), and from chap. 7 we learn what he held out in prospect to Ahaz at the height of the crisis. Chaps. 17 1-11 and 8 1-9 6 [7] are only a little later than chap. 7, whilst the prophecy in 9 7 [8]-10 4, which in 9 20 [11] presupposes the defeat of Rezin by the Assyrians,² and the devastation of N. Palestine, was probably delivered shortly after the close of the Syro-Ephraimitish war, when the N. kingdom was beginning to recover from its serious disasters. 14 28-32 also, in spite of the heading in v. 28, may be placed in this period. The Philistines, threatened by the Assyrian power, may have sent an embassy to Ahaz, the protégé of Tiglath-pileser, desiring his support.

b. The prophecies of the Assyrian period.—These are divided into two classes—(a) those before and (β) those after Hezekiah's revolt.

(α) To the former class belong 21 11 f. and 13-17, which suggest that the Assyrian power was gradually extending towards Egypt. More certainly chap. 28 belongs to the three years of the siege of Samaria. Chap. 23 refers to Salmanser's campaign against Phœnicia. The obscurity of v. 13 permits no very positive critical inference; but the mention of Assyria confirms the Isaianic authorship. Nor is Kuenen prepared to give up the epilogue (vv. 15-18), though he recognises the comparative weight of the objections to the genuineness of this passage and indeed of the whole prophecy. The 'hard king' of 19 4 is Sargon, who is actually named in chap. 20.

(β) Then come the important chaps. 29-32, all of which belong to the year before Sennacherib's invasion, and open the second class of the prophecies referred to. 29 1-8 is regarded as a two-fold prediction, first of Jerusalem's extreme danger, and then of her deliverance.³ The prophecies in 22 15-25 (Shebna) and 22 1-14 were delivered not much later. The description in 22 8-11 is viewed as partly imaginative; the preparations for the defence of Jerusalem were such as would naturally be made on the approach of a foe. 10 5-12 6 was written during the invasion; 14 24-27 is closely connected with it, and may be regarded as its epilogue. Jerusalem itself was threatened when chap. 1 was written, and 17 12-14 18 and 33 belong to the same period. All these prophecies express a firm assurance of the speedy destruction of the foe.

c. The prophecy against Moab.

This prophecy (chap. 15 f.) receives from Kuenen a careful consideration. He recognises the peculiarity in language, in style, and in ideas, of 15 1-16 12, which he assigns to an older prophet of the Northern Kingdom. The epilogue he thinks may well have been written by Isaiah, when he adopted the work of his predecessor, about the same time as 21 13-17 (see above, b (a)). The earlier prophet most probably lived before the great conquest of Jeroboam II., when Edom was subject to Judah (cp 166 with 2 K. 147).

¹ The heading in 1 1 is of course due to an editor and of no authority (cp CHRONOLOGY, § 2 f.).

² This implies the reading 'the adversaries of Rezin' (רְזִין וְאֲדֻרָיו), which is accepted by Dillmann, but rejected by Duhm and Cheyne (see SBOT). Kuenen, however, is not unconscious of its difficulties.

³ Kuenen's view of 29 1-8, 9-14, has been till quite lately the one generally held. It has been well stated by Driver (Isaiah, 56 f.).

iii. The historical chapters (36-39).—These are regarded as having been compiled from contemporary documents shortly after the time of Hezekiah, and inserted by the collector of chaps. 1-35 (or perhaps of the whole book), partly to illustrate the prophecies of the Assyrian period, partly to supplement the narratives in chaps. 7 8 20 (cp above, § 2. i.).

iv. Later additions.—a. Chaps. 24-27.—The earliest of the exilic prophecies inserted in I. Isaiah is held to be that in chaps. 24-27. The evidence against Isaiah's authorship is not indeed so overpowering as in the case of chaps. 40-66, because of the obscurity of the prophecy, but is still forcible enough. Points of contact between the language of these chapters and that of Isaiah are not wanting; but there is such a striking difference in style, in imagery, in vocabulary, and even in ideas, that on this ground alone we may be sure that Isaiah is not the author. Then the historical situation—however difficult of interpretation some features in it may be—is certainly not that of any of the acknowledged prophecies of Isaiah. Kuenen's conclusion is that the author lived during the first part of the exile and that he predicts the fall of Babylon. On three points he remains in doubt—(1) where the prophet lives, whether in Judæa (cp 256 f. 10), or elsewhere; (2) whether 24 1-13 is to be regarded as a prophecy, or as a description, and whether it relates to the whole earth, or to Judah and Jerusalem; and (3) whether 27 10 f. pictures the condition of Jerusalem, or of the hostile city mentioned in 25 2 26 5—i.e. (according to Kuenen), of Babylon.

b. Chaps. 34 f.—To the same period Kuenen assigns chaps. 34 f. The writer's silence as to the Medo-Persians and his indignation against Edom are the reasons for placing these chapters early in the Exile.

Peculiar ideas and words are of course not as abundant here as in chaps. 24-27. This last remark applies also to 13 1-14 23, but the historical situation is defined even more plainly than in 34 f. as that of the Exile, and more definitely of the close of the Exile. The Babylonian oppression is presupposed, and the tone of the writer is evidently embittered by the thought of the sufferings of his people. This embitterment prevents us from identifying the author with the so-called II. Isaiah. The little prophecy in 21 1-10 is also (on account of ab) clearly not Isaiah's work, and is probably not much later than 13 1-14 23.

B. CHAPTERS 40-66. Chaps. 40-66 are regarded by Kuenen (i.e., the Kuenen of 1863) as forming a single book in three equal parts (chaps. 40-48 49-57 58-66) marked by a kind of refrain¹ (48 22 57 21), the substance of which was written by one man, before the capture of Babylon by Cyrus, though the different prophecies or poems composing it may have been collected and arranged after that event.

a. External evidence as to authorship.—Kuenen examines at length the external evidence for and against Isaiah's authorship of this book.

The evidence for it is, (1) the testimony of Ecclus. 48 23-25 (which, however, simply proves that the writer was not in a position to discriminate between works of different ages copied into the same roll).

2. The 'edict of Cyrus' in Ezra 1 2 f. 2 Ch. 36 23 (which has been thought to imply that Cyrus had become acquainted with the prophecies ascribed to Isaiah, but which in reality merely implies that the narrator had such an acquaintance).²

3. The use made of Is. 40-66 by prophets who lived after Isaiah but before the middle part of the Exile (the extreme insecurity of which argument, in the form in which Delitzsch presented it, is shown by Kuenen).

On the opposite side, too, some external evidence is produced.

Stress is laid on the position of chaps. 40-66, which are separated from the preceding collection of prophecies by some historical chapters, and must once have circulated in a separate form. Without any strong grounds an editor who had noticed the reference to a Babylonian captivity in 39 6 f., may have supposed that chaps. 40-66 were a grandly planned supplementary prophecy by Isaiah.

b. Internal evidence.—i. Historical situation.—The most important argument, however, is that based on the historical situation in those chapters. All agree that, at least in general, the author addresses the Israelitish exiles in Babylon.

Jerusalem and the cities of Judah lie in ruins; and this sad state of things has already lasted a considerable time (51 3 52 2 5 58 12 63 18 19 [18 19a] 64 9-11 [8-10] 42 14 57 12 58 12 63 15-19 [19a]). Deliverance, however, is at hand; Cyrus will conquer Babylon and release the Jews, who, on their return, will rebuild Jerusalem and the temple, and enjoy unimaginable prosperity (40 9-11 41 27 43 19 f. 44 26 46 13 58 12 60 10 61 4 66 12 f.). In this connection, it is noteworthy that no mention is made of Israelitish kings or of sacrifices. On the other hand, the keeping of the sabbath (56 2-8) and fasting (58 1 f.) are specially mentioned.¹

We are at once inclined to place such a book in the second half of the Exile.

This conclusion is strengthened by the writer's accurate knowledge of the very heart and soul of the exiles (see, e.g., 40 27 45 9 f. 46 6 f. 49 24 56 3 f. 57 5 f. 58 2 f. 62 6 f. 65 4 f. 66 1-5).

Nor is there anything in the book suggestive of the pre-exilic age. If Isaiah had written it, he would certainly have betrayed his real as opposed to his imaginary period by some involuntary allusion.

On the contrary, (1) all the allusions to the age of Isaiah, to the continuance of Jerusalem and of the temple, and to Judæa as the home of the prophet, which have been indicated in chaps. 40-66, rest without exception on misunderstanding.² (2) The proof derived by the prophet from the predictions of Israel's liberation and the fall of Babylon loses all its significance if the writer were not close at hand (see 41 1-7 21-29 42 9 43 8-13 44 19-21 46 8-13 48). At first sight, indeed, the passages in which idolatry is attacked³ may seem inconsistent with an exilic date; but observe (1) that the writer frequently has in view not Israelites, but the surrounding heathen population; (2) that sometimes it is rather of a danger than of an actual fact that the prophet speaks; (3) that Ezekiel (20 30-38) refers to idolatrous practices among the exiles by the river Chebar; and (4) that we cannot infer from the attachment of the returned exiles to the religion of Yabwè that those left behind were all devoted monotheists.

ii. Language and ideas.—Nearly 200 years could not have passed away without leaving their impress on prophetic language and ideas. The second Isaiah is in fact very different from Isaiah b. Amoz, both as a writer and as a thinker.

1. Of the personal Messiah expected by the son of Amoz⁴ (96 [5] f. 11 1-5) there is not a trace in II. Isaiah (see MESSIAH).

It is to a widely different figure—the 'servant of Yahwè'—that II. Isaiah assigns the liberation and the regeneration of Israel. In connection with this it should be noticed that the older prophet is much more universalistic in his pictures of the future than the younger, who is by no means free from an extreme nationalism, and cherishes exaggerated expectations of the future glory of Israel (for which, it is true, there are points of contact in some of Isaiah's prophecies; ⁵ see, e.g., 11 6 f. 18 7 19 18-25 23 18).

2. Other differences, too, may be referred to.

Thus the high respect for the sabbath expressed in chaps. 56 58 is very unlike Isaiah (contrast 1 21-15). The uniqueness of the divinity of Yahwè becomes more prominent in the second part of Isaiah, and is proved by arguments which Isaiah b. Amoz could hardly have used, whilst the fundamental ideas of that prophet's discourses are somewhat in the background in chaps. 40-66.

¹ It need hardly be said that this is among the weaker of the arguments here adduced.

² Here we may reply in the words of Goethe, 'Du sprichst ein grosses Wort gelassen aus.'

³ These passages are 40 17 f. 41 1 f. 21 f. 43 9 f. 44 9 f. 22 45 14 f. 46 6-9 12 48 1 f. 4 f. 5 55 6 f. 57 4 f. 58 1 59 2 12 f. 63 17 64 6 [5] f. 65 3 f. 66 3 f., though Kuenen admits it to be possible that where general terms are used for the sins of the exiles, the reference may be to moral and religious laxity rather than to idolatry. Not a few passages, too, refer specially to born heathen men.

⁵ Here again Kuenen in 1863 expresses views which later criticism shows to be inaccurate.

Such—apart from the linguistic and stylistic argument, which is not at all adequately presented by the older critics—is the reasoning by which Kuenen in 1863 justified his disintegration of the Book of Isaiah. If we compare it with that of conservative critics we are struck by its superior naturalness. It is the outcome of a critical movement of long duration, and cannot fail to be, to a large extent, in accordance with facts.

B. LATER CRITICISM

If we apply the same critical methods still further, we cannot fail to see weak points. The earlier criticism

3. Subsequent advance.

abounds in inaccuracies, and the newer criticism, after well-nigh twenty years of elaboration, has so far completed its task that Kuenen's older view (still to a very large extent represented in students' books) needs to be superseded. If we do not adopt that form of the newer criticism which is due to Kuenen himself, it is because a growing criticism cannot be tied down to the results of a single man, and because much work has been brought to maturity since 1889 (the date of Kuenen's second edition).

The interval between the traditional view of the Book of Isaiah and that which is now presenting itself was too great to be traversed without a halt. The criticism which has just been summarised will enable the reader to break the journey. He will now be in a better position to consider those points in which the earlier solutions of critical problems may have been unsatisfactory, and consequently to do justice to the criticism which still remains to be described.

The fault of the earlier critics was that they had an imperfect sense of the deep gulf between the old and the new Israel. Even the books which had the most beneficial effect on pre-exilic Israelites were not in all respects suitable for, or even intelligible to, the much altered people of the later age. The prophetic writings in their present form are post-exilic works; such pre-exilic records as they contain have been carefully adapted to the wants of post-exilic readers. With regard, then, to Is. 1-39, our first question should be, not, Is there any reason why this or that chapter or section should not be the work of Isaiah? but, To what age do the ideas, expressions, and implied circumstances most naturally point? We can seldom expect to find that the whole of a long passage belongs to the same period, because a post-exilic editor would almost certainly have found it necessary to modify what the earlier writer had said by longer or shorter insertions. It must be remembered, too, that the prophets of the eighth century were too great and too much absorbed in their message to spend much time in the written elaboration of their prophecies. We can hardly expect to find that Isaiah left much in writing, and we must also make allowance for the perils to the ancient literature arising from the collapse of the state.

It will be well for the student to be continually revising his earlier results in the assignment of dates in the light of his later critical acquisitions. Critics are sometimes accused of arguing in a circle because they, by anticipation, mention facts in favour of the non-Isaianic origin of a prophecy derived from sections which only later will be proved to be non-Isaianic. This accusation is not reasonable. It is necessary that the whole body of relevant facts should be before the student, and it is important to see what points of contact a disputed prophecy has with other prophecies which are equally disputed. To economise space, it is sometimes necessary to leave the student to distinguish between those arguments which are immediately available, and those which will only later be seen in their full force. It will be found that each step we take in the assignment of dates will supply subsidiary facts (especially phraseological) in proof of conclusions already seen to be probable. But the student must not be in a hurry, and must sometimes let difficult problems wait till he is riper for them.

It is too bold to maintain that we still have any collection of Isaianic prophecies which in its present form

5. Chaps. 2-5. goes back to the period of that prophet. To begin with chaps. 1-5. Chap. 1 has, properly speaking, no connection with chaps. 2-5. It is a preface to the whole collection of the prophecies of Isaiah (chaps. 2-33 or 35). It seems to be composite. Verses 29-31 are possibly (or probably) the close of a separate prophecy of an earlier date (see below), whilst vv. 27 f. are certainly a post-exilic insertion (cp Marti). The early section formed by chaps. 2-5 has been much altered. It contains fine prophetic writing; but if a disciple of Isaiah really bestowed much editorial care upon it—i.e., if it was welded by such an editor into a whole—the traces of his work have entirely disappeared.

Chap. 2 (soon after 740 B.C.) is composed of two different fragments of similar contents, on the day of Yahwē (vv. 6-10 18-21, and vv. 11-17), which have been brought together by an early editor, and had prefixed to them an important eschatological prophecy (2-2-4).¹

3-4-1 (735 B.C.) is nearly in its original form (see especially Marti); but the appendix, 4-2-6, is beyond the possibility of doubt post-exilic.² It was in fact a fixed custom of later editors to adapt prophecies of judgment (most early prophecies were such; cp Am. 3-6-8) to the use of contrite post-exilic readers by Messianic appendices. But what of 2-2-4? Why should 2-6-4-1 have a preface as well as an appendix? Probably it has been moved from its original position, to fill the place of a passage which had become illegible. It was originally intended to be the appendix to 1-29-31, which appears to be a fragment of an independent prophecy of Isaiah against tree-worship, linked to 1-2-26 by the editorial passage, 1-27 f. Chap. 5-1-7 and 8-24 (5-25 is editorial) form two distinct but related prophecies (735 B.C.). On 5-26-30 see below (§ 7, begin.).

The next group of prophecies is 6-1-9-7 [6]. In its original form this came most probably from a disciple

6. Chaps. 6-1-9-6. of Isaiah (about 734 B.C.). It consisted of a prologue on Isaiah's inaugural vision, and prophecies on the invasion of Rezin, the ruin of Syria and Ephraim, and the Assyrian invasion, and concluded with a divine warning to Isaiah and his disciples, and an epilogue of great interest, as showing the editorial care which, in this instance at least, a disciple of Isaiah bestowed on his master's work. To this has been added a fragment on the despair of the people of Judah; 8-19 f. (except the last words) are late and editorial. Other traces of late editorial work could be mentioned.

One of them is the opening verse of chap. 7, which is dependent on 2 K. 16-5 (late pre-exilic), and another possibly 8-6-10 (this passage, however, can be defended as Isaiahs).³ Editorial work is also plainly discernible in 7-17-25; but on this we cannot linger.

The most important monument of an editor is not the closing words of chap. 6 in MT (not in \mathfrak{S}), 'a holy seed is the stock thereof,'⁴ but the Messianic appendix, 9-2-7 [1-6]. This appendix, though recently defended by Duhm, is (in the opinion of some scholars)

² So Giesebrecht (Beitr. 27), Duhm, Hackmann, Cheyne. Stade in 1884 took a middle position (ZATW 4-149 ff.).

almost as certainly late as anything in the whole compass of prophetic literature.¹ Its combination of enthusiasm and moderation gives the passage a unique position among Messianic prophecies; to assign it to post-exilic times (which were not incapable of fine as well as poor literature) involves no disparagement. It is clearly an independent composition attached by the editor by means of the linking verse, 91 [823]. Observe the vagueness of 96 [5] f., which implies that the hope of the Messiah was already well defined in the popular mind, which could easily fill up the outlines. In the age of Isaiah such vagueness is inconceivable.² Both these additions, when accepted as Isaiah's, could not but distort the interpretation of the portions really due to the prophet.

The next prophecy is 105-126, to which 98 [7]-104 was prefixed by a later editor, probably to fill up the space on a roll which was too large for the same group of prophecies as 51-7 and 8-24 (see above, § 8). It is nearly in its original form; but, besides minor changes due to accident, 914 [13] f. and 104a have been substituted for passages which had become illegible. The latter is the most important because (as rightly emended by Lagarde) it contains a reference to Beltilis and Osiris which is unexpected in this context.⁴ Chap. 10 is Isaianic, but, even apart from the editorial insertions (see SBOT), does not all come from one time. Vv. 22b-32 are clearly an insertion from some other source; i.e., they were not written as a part of Isaiah's great 'woe' upon the Assyrian. The passage describes the expected march upon Jerusalem of a foe from the N., and Duhm doubts whether a passage so full of plays upon names can be Isaiah's. If it is not Isaiah's, one might plausibly ascribe it to Micah, who, in the bitterness of his spirit, makes very similar plays on the names of towns in danger of capture from the Assyrians (Mic. 1 10-15). We may probably date it 722 B.C. 1016-27a, at any rate, is certainly not Isaiah's. It refers, it is true, to the Assyrian invasion; but it treats this as typical of the attack of the assembled heathen nations on Jerusalem expected by late eschatological writers. It tells us of the great final judgment on all Yahwé's enemies, from which transgressors within Zion itself will not be exempt (cp. Is. 128 33 14, and passages in the Psalms). There is, however, a bare possibility that some scarcely intelligible fragments of Isaiah may have been worked into his material by the editor. The Isaianic portion, 105-9 13 f., may be dated 711 B.C.

To this composite work (ch. 10) three appendices were attached—(1) the last (121-6) very late indeed, so exceedingly poor is it, and so entirely unprophetic in style.⁵ (2) The first (11 1-8) is a description of the

² The fact that this fine composition produced no effect on Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, is not inconsistent with the sketch of the growth of the prophecies given in this article (against Dillm.-Kittel, 90).

⁵ On this point there is unanimity among critics. To make chap. 12 exilic with König would be needless caution.

Messiah as a perfect ruler—a counterpart of 96 [5] f.

It is not well linked to the context. A

8. Appendices better connection was produced for the 111-8 10-16; 12 former passage (92-7 [1-6]), though in 1-6.

neither case is any mention made of that sifting of the population of Jerusalem to which Isaiah (125) refers as a condition of better government. There is also none of Isaiah's classic moderation in the terms of the description. The elaborate description of the transformation of the animal world, and the extravagance of v. 4b, is in the taste of the later period.¹

(3) The second appendix (1110-16) is marked out as such with singular definiteness. Whoever wrote 112-9 certainly regarded it as a suitable close. On the other hand, we can well understand a subsequent writer wishing to insert something on the restoration of the exiles of Israel and Judah. The style is poor (note the impossible expression 'root of Jesse' for the Messianic king); the rhythm still poorer; the phraseology and ideas late. 'Assyria' means to the writer the Persian empire. This is one of the most assured and suggestive results of criticism.

We have now analysed all the first part of our Book of Isaiah (chaps. 1-12), and pass on to a collection of ten oracles (13-23), mostly on the

9. Chaps. 13-23. neighbours of the Israelites, each with a heading containing the word maššā (מַשְׁשָׁ)—an expression which specially belongs to collectors and editors (cp. also 306, where it forms part of a late insertion).

a. Four short passages, however (1424-27 1712-14 18 203-6), strike the eye as having no editorial headings. These must once have stood in some other connection; all appear to be genuine works of Isaiah. (1) The first is perhaps the true conclusion of Isaiah's prophecy on the failure of the plan of the Assyrian king (105-15; see ISAIAH I, § 13). (2) The second is either an appendix attached by Isaiah to 171-11 (see below), or a short independent prophecy of uncertain date. (3) The third (which has a late, artificial appendix, v. 7) belongs to the time of Sennacherib's invasion (Duhm, Cheyne). (4) The fourth, as the brief historical preface states, is contemporary with the siege of Ashdod by Sargon in 711 B.C. It has been thought to predict the ruin of Egypt and Ethiopia; but upon archaeological grounds must be held to refer rather to the fate anticipated for Pir'u, king of Mušri (to whom Yaman, king of Ashdod, fled for refuge). See ASHDOD, MIZRAIM, § 2b. This Pir'u, not the Egyptian Pharaoh, is the king who will grievously disappoint the Judahites, according to Is. 20 5 f., to which 306 is parallel, in complete accordance with Sargon's own statement in the fragmentary cylinder text. The opening verse therefore comes from some ill-informed early editor or biographer.²

b. (1-2). Of the ten oracles with headings, only two can be regarded as certainly Isaianic—viz. (1) 171-6 9-11,³ and (2) 221-14 15-18. (1) The former was evidently written before 720; (2) the latter falls into two parts, of which the first (ISAIAH I, § 17) may have been written in 701, and the second a year or two earlier. Kuenen's former view that 228-11 is an imaginary description can hardly be maintained; but it is probable that the descriptions in vv. 5-7 8-10 have been amplified. On the text of this most important prophecy (221-14) see SBOT (Heb.) 197.

³ On the interpolated passage (v. 7 f.) see Intr. Is. 93, and cp. especially Stade, ZATW 3 10-13 (83).

(3) 1428-32 may plausibly be claimed for Isaiah. In 721 (or 720) Sargon was completely defeated by the Elamites at Dur-ilu in N. Babylonia (Bab. Chron. B, col. 1, lines 33-35; KB 2 276 f.), which led to a pretty general rising in Syria and Palestine. Hanun, king of Gaza, with the help of the N. Arabian Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2b), again asserted his independence. Both in the N. and in the S., however, Sargon put down the rebellions, and Hanun fell into the hands of the Assyrians. Foreseeing this, Isaiah may have written this prophecy; on the other hand, the headings are not generally so accurate, and the language used of Zion seems to Duhm¹ more in accordance with post-exilic views than with Isaiah's. Even Winckler, to whom (AT Unters. 135 ff.) the above historical explanation belongs, feels compelled to sacrifice עַם יְהוּדָה 'the poor of his people' (v. 32) as post-exilic in appearance (in spite of 102). Marti agrees with Duhm, and the present writer now coincides. See ISAIAH i., § 12; SBOT (Heb.) 195; but ep. Intr. Is. 80-82.

(4-8) There are also prophecies in which it has been suspected that there is at least an Isaianic element—viz., (4), chaps. 15 f.; (5), (6), and (7), 21 11-17; (8), 23. As to (4), the only portion which can be at all plausibly viewed as Isaianic is 16 14 (beginning 'In three years').

16 4-5 has also been regarded as a scrap of Isaiah's work. At any rate it has the appearance of being an insertion. To regard it as Isaianic, however, is reasonable only if the prophecy in which it is enclosed can be shown to be an older work adopted by Isaiah,² and against Isaiah's authorship is the striking resemblance between v. 4b and 20 20, and between v. 5 and 9 5 (passages suspected of being late).

Nor is it in accordance with the critical results obtained elsewhere to regard part of 16 14 as Isaianic; those phraseological points in it which at one time seemed Isaianic are now rightly viewed in a different light (e.g., מִיָּד מִיָּד is suspicious, just because it appears also in 10 25 29 17). The original eley on Moab may be most plausibly referred to the time of Nebuchadrezzar; but not on grounds derived from parallel passages in Jer. 48 (see JEREMIAH ii., § 11 ff.).

As to oracles (5), (6), and (7), 21 16 f. shares the same suspicion as 16 14, and is best regarded as post-exilic. The two oracles in 21 11 f. and 13-15 suggest the danger to which Edom and Arabia were exposed, either from Ašur-bāni-pal (W. AT Unters. 124), or from the later Chaldean invasion (Che.). As to oracle (8), Dillmann's view that an Isaianic eley on Tyre was retouched on a large scale by a post-exilic writer is the most conservative view which has still any claim to be considered.

The blockade of Tyre by Shalmaneser IV. (who died during the blockade) and Sargon must have greatly interested Isaiah, and the prophet, if he described the fate of Damascus and Philistia, is not very likely to have passed over that of Tyre. Still it is on the whole hardly worth while to search chap. 23 for fragments of a prophecy on Tyre by Isaiah; the results of an analysis are too precarious, especially if we take account of recent proposed emendations of the text. We may, it is true, reasonably suppose vv. 1-12 14 to be of comparatively early date, though not Isaianic. It was at any rate written before Nebuchadrezzar's siege of Tyre in 586-573 B.C. v. 13, which is a prophecy of the capture of the city by the Chaldeans, is clearly a later insertion; it is the work of a post-exilic editor who held the mistaken opinion that Tyre had been stormed and destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar. The epilogue (vv. 15-18, all in prose, except the dance-song in v. 16) is by another hand, and is also obviously post-exilic.

(9) Of the ten oracles with headings two still remain to be mentioned—(9) chaps. 13-14 21 and (10) chap. 19. (9) a. So far as the oracle on Babylon (chap. 13) is concerned, the older critics gave the correct date; chap. 13, which is closely related to, but earlier than, Jer. 50 f. (see JEREMIAH ii., § 11 ff.) is of not much earlier date than chap. 40 etc. β. The ode 'on the king of Babylon,' however (14 4b-21), can hardly have been written by the author of the oracle.

14 1-4a and vv. 22 f. (which stand outside both oracle and ode, and are more inelegant in style than either) must surely belong to an editor, who probably took the ode from an anthology.

The ode (14 4b-21) is parallel to the poem on Sennacherib in 37 22b-29,¹ and both songs most probably refer to the same Assyrian king ('king of Babylon' in 14 4 is therefore a mistake).² That Isaiah would have expected or even wished Sennacherib to be excluded from the royal tombs is indeed most unlikely. The fact that the poet did both wish and expect this contumely for Sennacherib only confirms the view that the author of the ode was not that great prophet.³ The phraseology, the anticipations, and the ideas of the song are alike opposed to the theory of its Isaianic authorship. See ISAIAH i., § 19.

(10) Chap. 19 is one of the most difficult sections of the first half of Isaiah.

It seemed natural that the prophet should have left some more definite record of his expectations for Egypt than is to be found in chap. 20 or chaps. 30 f. Eichhorn, however, could not see anything Isaianic either in the main prophecy or in the supplement (vv. 16 or 18-25), and Ewald found such a falling off in the style that he felt obliged to assign it to Isaiah's declining years. The present writer till 1892 thought that at any rate vv. 1-4 and 11-15 contained an Isaianic element. He now recognises that even this is too conservative a view, and that the points of contact with Isaiah are not greater than can be accounted for by imitation.

Not only 19 5-10, but also vv. 1-4 and 11-15 are post-exilic. The 'harsh lord' (v. 4) is not Ašur-bāni-pal, but some Persian king; the writer may not have meant any single king. Stylistic and exegetical data point unmistakably to the Persian period, though not necessarily to so late a date as the time of Artaxerxes Ochus (so Duhm).

The supplement (vv. 16 or 18 to 25), which possesses the highest religious interest, still more manifestly belongs to the time when the fusion of Israelites and non-Israelites first became a reasonable anticipation—i.e., to the early Greek period. Before 275 it can hardly have been written. See HERES, and cp SBOT 'Isa.' (Heb.) on 19 18, and TLZ '96, no. 20, col. 522.

(11) Chap. 21 1-10. For a time the present writer (supported by Driver) accepted the view of Kleinert (St Kr. 1877 p. 174 ff.) that Is. 21 1-10 was Isaianic and related to one of the three sieges of Babylon by the Assyrians (710, 703, and 696 B.C.). The chief advantage of that view is that it affords a ready explanation of the grief which the prophet expresses at the 'hard vision announced' to him. The difficulties of the view cannot, however, be completely surmounted (see Intr. Is. 123 ff.). Driver (Introd.) too has fully abandoned Kleinert's attractive view. Winckler's view (AT Unters. 120 ff.) that the war between Ašur-bāni-pal and his brother Šamaš-šum-ukin is referred to, has also not found acceptance. W. H. Cobb (JBL 17 40 ff.) revises the theory of Isaiah's authorship. He takes 21 1-10 to refer to the invasion of Palestine by Assyria. Against this see Marti, Jes. 165 f. Marti's own view, however, which is an improved form of the usual critical view, is not free from objection. Elsewhere (see Crit. Bib.) the present writer has sought to show that the poem in 21 1-10 relates really, not to Babylon, but to Edom, which, in later times, came to be regarded as Israel's arch enemy. The emendations that seem necessary relate mainly to proper names.

² Cobb (JBL 1896 p. 31) thinks that 'king of Babylon' is here used as a title of an Assyrian king, since Sennacherib, as well as Sargon and Tiglath-pileser, repeatedly calls himself 'king of Babylon.' The supposition is as needless as it is improbable. The introduction to the ode can easily be shown to be of late editorial origin.

Let us now turn to that remarkable collection of prophecies in chaps. 28-33, beginning, 10. Chap. for reasons of convenience, with chap. 32.

The phenomena of chapters 32 f. are very peculiar. That chap. 33 is later than any part of chap. 32 is certain, both on account of the phraseology and because of the ideas. It could not indeed otherwise have been possible for Duhm to assign 32:1-5-9-14 and 15-18 to 20 to Isaiah.

In SBOT 32:1-8 is described as a first, and vv. 9-20 as a second appendix. It is possible, however, that Bickell¹ is right in connecting vv. 15-20 (he emends v. 19 with much skill) with vv. 1-5.

The main question is not whether vv. 1-5 (or 1-5, 15-20) are Isaianic or not, for the late date of this passage is even more certain than that of 9:2-7 (1-6) 11:1-8,² nor can it be very much earlier than vv. 6-8, which Duhm admits to be post-exilic.³ It is rather this: Are vv. 9-14 a genuine though strangely misplaced Isaianic fragment, akin to 3:16 f. 24? It is certainly conceivable that it once stood at the end of chaps. 28-31, following the analogy of that very striking little prophecy (cp. Intr. Is. 18c). In order to recognise it as Isaianic, however, it would be necessary at any rate to emend the text, and even then there is a rhetorical indefiniteness which distinguishes the passage from 3:16 f. 24, and does not suggest Isaiah as the author.⁴

On the whole, the remark of Stade is as true now as when it was first made, that when we pass from chap. 31 to chap. 32 we find an altogether new set of ideas and an entirely changed situation.⁵

As to chap. 33, so far as it relates to the period of Sennacherib's invasion it gives in many ways an inaccurate view of the facts. In reality, 11. Chap. 33. however, it is addressed to a later generation which regards the Assyrian invasion as typical of later crises in Jewish history. Hence the absence of any attempt to imitate Isaiah's style; hence, too, the liturgical tone which presupposes a not very early part of the post-exilic period.

The only question is whether we may venture to follow Duhm and Bickell, the former of whom identifies the enemies referred to with the Syrians under Antiochus Eupator (cp. vv. 8-19, with 1 Macc. 6:2-29 respectively), and the situation with that produced by the battle of Beth-zacharias and the capture of Beth-zur (164 B.C.), when Jerusalem was at the last gasp, and the Jewish revolt seemed almost crushed, whilst the latter finds in chap. 33 two Maccabæan poems, the first written after a defeat, the second after Simon the Maccabæe's conquest of the Akra of Jerusalem⁶ (142 B.C.). It is at least not impossible; a prophecy later than 200 B.C. is not indeed to be expected; but the phenomena of this appendix to an appendix are somewhat peculiar. Chap. 33 is more than usually unconnected; it may therefore be composite. In this case v. 1 will be due to the editor. Moreover, the exulting tone of the latter part of the chapter agrees extremely well with Bickell's proposed date. מִשְׁפָּחַי (v. 14) as a religious class-name (almost = lawless, see HYPOCRISY) is specially characteristic of Joh, which probably belongs to the early Greek period. At the same time, it is not impossible that this usage began earlier and that the exultation is a reaction from the preceding melancholy of the writer (as often in the psalms). Bickell rearranges too much, however.

The composition may plausibly be referred to the dark period of the third Artaxerxes (see Intr. Is. 17:1 f.); but the use of מִשְׁפָּחַי (see above) and the reference to the Tax-collectors (cp. 1 Macc. 1:29) in v. 18 (for emended

² Duhm thinks that no post-exilic writer would have written so drily and in such an incidental manner of the expected king. It is evident, however, that there were long spaces in the earlier post-exilic period in which the hope of the Messiah was by no means vital, and in which consequently the Messiah would be spoken of without enthusiasm. On the arguments for a late date, see Intr. Is. 17:2-175, 177-180.

⁴ Stade's objection to vv. 9-20, that the passage is inconsistent with Isaiah's conviction that Yahweh will not let Jerusalem be captured (ZATW 4:260), is, however, invalid, because Isaiah does not seem to have had such a conviction at this period (see ISAIAH I, § 14). According to Duhm vv. 15-20 are of uncertain origin, but most probably Isaianic; of vv. 9-14 he appears to have no doubt, but places it in Isaiah's period.

text, see SCRIBE), together with the peculiarities of the poem, incline the present writer to agree with Marti in dating the work about 163 B.C. The objection drawn from the history of the canon is no doubt weighty; but it is not absolutely conclusive (see CANON, § 39, col. 665, n. 1).

The removal of the chaps. just considered (32 f.) from the work (28-31 : ISAIAH I, § 14 end) to which they are appended makes it somewhat

12. Chaps. easier to appreciate that work. Though

28-31. only the framework of chaps. 28-31 is Isaianic, the inserted passages do not all equally blur the outlines of Isaiah's picture of the future. Still we must not on that account think lightly of the critical problems which remain. No part of the true Isaiah has been so systematically manipulated out of regard to the feelings of later readers as this.

a. Let us first of all take 29:16-24 and 30:18-26.

It is certain from the context that Isaiah was addressing himself not to a penitent and believing community which stood in need of comfort, and whose chief fault was their dreaming of earthly means of realising God's promises, but to irreligious politicians and a 'rebellious' unresponsive people. If we apply the principles set forth above (see § 4), and ask to what age the ideas, the expressions, and the situation in 29:16-24, 30:18-26 most naturally point, we cannot doubt that these passages are of post-exilic origin and addressed to the same set of people as 32:1-5, 15-20. Imagine their being intended for the same audience as that which listened to the preceding prophetic speeches, and we are disposed to doubt Isaiah's sanity. By such a flattering view of the religious condition of his hearers he would have defeated his own object. Besides, what ideas could the rulers possibly have attached to the description of a spiritually regenerated people? The mention of a 'great slaughter' when the 'towers' should fall might perhaps have arrested their attention; but the only 'slaughter' which they would have thought of would be that of the Assyrians, whereas the prophetic writer means a general destruction of all the opponents of what he regards as the true religion both without and within Jerusalem.

The affinity of these passages to the post-exilic type of thought and expression is too striking to be overlooked or doubted by the student.

b. Other post-exilic additions are, probably, 28:23-29 and 30:27-33. The latter passage develops the idea of the 'great slaughter' (30:25); it is more in the manner of 63:1-6 (§ 21) than in that of the two late additions just considered, being warlike and grandly, though luridly, picturesque.¹

28:23-29, if really Isaiah's, must be addressed to an inner circle of disciples, who have assimilated the prophetic teaching of a 'remnant.' However, the leading idea of the passage is characteristically late. Its first occurrence seems to be in Jer. 10:24; but it is not quite certain whether Jer. 10:23-25 is Jeremiah's (see Stade, Gesch. 1:676 n.). As to the phraseology, מִשְׁפָּחַי in v. 29, which occurs only in Prov. and Joh (Mic. 6:9 is corrupt), is perhaps the only very suspicious word. It is most improbable that Isaiah would have used it.

c. The most remarkable insertions of all, however, are those in 29:1-8. According to the older critics (see above, § 2, i. c.), Isaiah put a double-faced enigma before his hearers, which only excited blank amazement as being 'out of all relation to the facts'; but can the delightful part of the prophecy in vv. 1-8 really have been written by Isaiah? Surely not.

Duhm has already recognised later insertions in vv. 4b 5a 8; and we cannot stop short there. We must evidently include v. 7 among the interpolated passages, for here too we are struck by the great falling off in the style, and the wide difference in the picture of the future. 'Rhythm and parallelism came easily to Isaiah; there are but slight traces of them in (all) the passages assigned here to a later writer. And whereas Isaiah can bear to contemplate a sore judgment upon Jerusalem, the author of vv. 57 f. has before him a future day when all nations shall gather together round the holy city, and he cut off' (Intr. Is. 189). With this view Hackmann agrees. He is, indeed, its originator, except that he defends v. 7 by giving a new turn to the meaning. In short, his idea is that the dream in v. 7 is a figure for the suddenness of the appearance of the foes before Jerusalem. This is ingenious; but Hackmann forgets Joh 208, Ohad. 16 (end).

Apart from the interpolations just considered, chap.

29 appears to be a combination of three distinct prophecies (each very short but very striking) dealing respectively with the destruction of Jerusalem, the culpable insensibility of the rulers to the divine teaching, and the fatal consequences of a formal religion. Chap. 29¹⁵ contains a fragment of a prophecy on the Egyptian alliance; and there are two more fragments on the same subject in 30¹⁻³⁵ and 31^{1-5a}.¹ 308-17 clearly formed the close of an ancient propetic collection; 30¹⁻³ (with 45a, and the supplement 67a) must have been misplaced.

Except 28¹⁻⁴, the Isaianic prophecies may be assigned to 703-702 B.C.; the oracle² is earlier, and presupposes the siege of Samaria. 28⁷⁻²² may belong to 703; it gives a warning to Jerusalem, suggested by the doom of Samaria.

The difference between the older and the newer criticism is perhaps even more conspicuous in the group

13. Chaps. of chapters (24-27) placed before that which we have been discussing. (i.)

24-27. Referring by way of contrast to what Kuenen thought in 1863 (above, § 2 iv. a), let us see what Duhm thought in 1892. (a) His method is that which all good critics now employ; he begins, that is, by removing later accretions.

Among these he classes (1) the song in 25¹⁻⁵, which commemorates the destruction of a strong city, and states that on this account another mighty city will praise God; (2) the taunting song on Moab, 25⁹⁻¹¹; (3) an artistic poem (26¹⁻¹⁹) which stands alone in the OT in respect of the many variants which have penetrated into the text; and (4) the little song in 27²⁻⁵.

The prophecy itself comprises chaps. 24 25 6-8 26 20-27 12 f.

27⁸ is a quotation from the margin, which properly speaking illustrates v. 10 and is therefore misplaced, whilst vv. 7 9-11 are the remainder of an exhortation to the Jews to break off from their sins, and so become entitled to deliverance, which is certainly parenthetical and very possibly a later insertion.

(b) Let us then look first at the prophecy or 'apocalypse.'

It describes the desolation of a great world-empire by war, and closes with the final judgment upon Israel's oppressors, the setting up of the divine throne in the holy city, and a festival, full of refreshment and consolation, for all peoples.

The author, Duhm thinks, lived under John Hyrcanus; he saw the siege of Jerusalem and the devastation of Judah by Antiochus Sidetes, the beginning of the war with the Parthians, in which the Jews were forced to take part (B.C. 129), and the defeat and death of Antiochus (B.C. 128). The last is the event obscurely referred to in 24^{14-16a}, which the writer cannot for his part regard as a bappy omen, because the barbarous Parthians will invade and devastate Palestine. In 25¹⁻⁵ Duhm finds the exultation of the Jews at the destruction of Samaria, and the demolition of the temple on Mount Gerizim; ³ the 'city of nations' is Rome (cp Schürer, Jewish People, i. 1 277). The same background is assigned to 26¹⁻¹⁹; 25⁹⁻¹¹, however, Duhm refers to the time of King Alexander Jannæus, who made the Moabites pay tribute (Jos. Ant. xiii. 135). (ii.) The last of the dates just quoted is the least important; the Moabites were not dangerous to the Jews in post-exilic times. The reference to them in 25⁹⁻¹¹ is probably archaistic.⁴ The other dates are rather plausible. The Parthians did not indeed actually invade Palestine before B.C. 40 (cp Enoch 565 f. and Dillmann's note); but the author may have expected that they would do so in 128. The hatred of the Jews for the Samaritans might well find expression in a psalm, and the poor style of the song in 25¹⁻⁵ favours a late date. These passages, however, are admittedly accretions. Their date is of less importance than that of the main prophecy or apocalypse, which refers to so many popular religious beliefs.

² 28⁷ is obviously Messianic in the wider sense, and is a later insertion addressed to the post-exilic community.

To Duhm's date for the main prophecy there are objections derived from the history of the Canon (see CANON, § 39, cp ii. 1, col. 665). Strong reason is required for making any considerable part of Isaiah later than 200 B.C. Chap. 33 indeed, as an 'appendix to an appendix,' may, since internal evidence favours this, be made Maccabæan; but can we venture to assign the important collection of prophecies and songs in chaps. 24-27 to a period even later than the Maccabees?

The matter concerns the history of religious ideas as well as of literature. Will not the period of the fall of the Persian and the rise of the Græco-Macedonian empire answer all the requirements of the passages? It is a pity that the historical evidence is not stronger; but Marti's treatment of it in his commentary is certainly too superficial.

The opening section is the monument of a time of long-continued misery in Syria and Palestine. Such a time began under Artaxerxes II., and lasted till the consolidation of the power of the Ptolemies in Palestine (302). The frequent passage of Persian armies marching to Egypt must have caused much distress to the Jews; and once, if not twice, they were concerned in a revolt against Persia. Cruelly did Artaxerxes punish them; as Nöldke says, 'much blood appears to have been shed in Judæa' at this time. Most probably, too, Robertson Smith is right in transferring the defilement of the temple mentioned by Jos. (Ant. xi. 71) to this period,¹ and seeing in the narrative a legendary or even patriotic distortion of facts. The phrase 'the city (or, perhaps, cities) of destruction' (24¹⁰) may allude to the fate of Sidon and Jerusalem; it would be unsafe to add, of Jericho.² 26¹⁻¹⁹ (a liturgical poem) may describe the feelings of the pious community of Jerusalem when their city had been spared by the army of Alexander. They were deeply grateful for this, but were still painfully conscious of the ruin wrought by the tyrant Ochus. The deportation of many Jews to Hyrcania and elsewhere³ had made a gap in the population, and only by a 'dew of healing' (read אֲרָכָה from God could the martyrs be restored to their brethren. For a study of the ideas, phraseology, and situation, see Intr. Is. 145-162; and see below (§ 21) on 63⁷⁻⁶⁴ 12 [11].

Chaps. 24-27 were prefixed to chaps. 28-33 to indicate that for the post-exilic age the chief interest of the 14. Arrange-ment of chaps. logical. The two closely related compositions in chaps. 34 f. were doubt-

24-35. less added to promote the same interest.

The former, chap. 34 (observe the strange use made of popular superstitions), is somdre in the extreme. It relates to the great future judgment upon the hostile nations. These nations are specially represented by the arch-enemy Edom (cp 63¹⁻⁶), from whom some fresh outrage must have been suffered not long before the prophecy was written. This outrage was presumably connected with the further progress of the Edomite immigration into the S. of Judah.⁴

The companion prophecy chap. 35, makes up for the horrors of chap. 34. It relates to the return of the Jewish exiles and the glorification of their land.

According to Duhm, the author of these works wrote also Jer. 50 f.; but why? Surely there were other members of the same school who were capable of producing or redacting this final outburst of wrath at Babylon. All that we have a right to say is that these various works were written in Palestine nearly at the same time in the post-exilic period. If the MT of 34 16a is correct, the collection of real and supposed Isaianic prophecies to which chaps. 34 f. had lately been attached were already a 'book of Yahwe'—i.e., a sacred scripture. These two prophecies, then, were very probably the latest of the group.

² Solinus (85 4 Mommsen) says that Jericho, which succeeded Jerusalem as the capital of Judæa, was subdued by Artaxerxes; but this has been shown by Reinach (in Semitic Studies in Memory of A. Kohut, 457 ff. [97]) to refer to the invasion of Palestine by Ardashir, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanides, who came into conflict with the emperor Alexander Severus.

To an equally late period we must refer the appending of certain narratives (chaps. 36-39) to 15. Chaps. which reference has been made already (see 36-39. ISAIAH i, § 6).

These narratives, which are derived ultimately from prophetic biographies,¹ agree in most respects with the text of 2 K. 18 13 17-20 19. The older critics were in the main right; but their analysis of the narratives was incomplete, and they gave too much credit for accuracy to the account as a whole. Under the influence of this impression they assigned too early a date to the historical document from which it seemed to be derived.

It has been shown (especially by Stade and Duhm) that Is. 36-39 consists of two distinct narratives: (a) 36 1-37 9a 37 f., (b) 37 9b-36 38 f.

(a) Psalm.—As to the inserted passage, 38 9-20 (Miktābh of Hezekiah) which Kuenen in 1863 did not deny to Hezekiah, there can no longer be any doubt that it is a post-exilic thanksgiving-psalm on the deliverance of the faithful community of Israel from some great danger (cp Ps. 30);² the song or 'supplication' (see MICHAM) is not found in the parallel section of Kings.

(β) Māshāl.—Another passage, which to the last was held by Kuenen to be Isaiah's (though he recognised the weight of the counter arguments), and certainly belongs to the original narrative (more strictly to the second of the narratives) is held by Stade,³ Duhm, Cheyne, and Marti to be certainly post-exilic. This is 37 22b-32. Evidently this was taken by the narrator (or more probably by the first editor) from some lyric anthology, such as that from which we have already supposed the song in 14 4b-21 to have been taken. It is in fact a fine 'dramatic lyric' (cp Pss. 46 48), showing at once a vivid realisation of the traditional story, and a sense of its continued value to the community, which (as we have seen) regarded the invasion of Sennacherib as typical of a great future event.

The final redaction of the first half of Isaiah may be dated (like the appendix to chap. 19) about 250-220 B. C.; but this is not free from doubt.

On chaps. 40-48 we can be somewhat briefer. Taking this collection for the moment as a unit, and putting aside all but historical considerations, we 16. Chaps. can no more dream of assigning it to Isaiah 40-48.

By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept' (Ps. 137 1) to the authorship of David. There might have been a case for the Isaianic origin of 'Go ye out from Babylon' (48 20), if only the passage had run, 'Behold, in the latter days my people shall go forth from Babylon.' There might have been a case for such an origin of 'Thus saith Yahwè to Cyrus' (45 1), and of 'Our holy and our beautiful house . . . is burned up' (64 11 [10]), if these passages had been introduced by 'Behold, I will raise up a king, Cyrus by name,' and 'In days to come Yahwè will send fire upon Jerusalem.' No literary critic, however, would dream of supposing that the author of chaps. 40-66 was a prophet of the eighth century who had become dead to his actual present, and lived again in imagination among men still unborn.⁴

On this point the newer critics have nothing to add to what was so well said by Kuenen in 1863. Indeed, that eminent critic in his earlier stage was right both positively and negatively as regards chaps. 40-48⁵

² See Che. Proph. Is. 1 218 f., Intr. Is. 224 f.; Skinner, Isaiah, 1-39, p. 278, who holds, however, that the song is based on a record of individual experience, which was adapted for use in the temple by an editor.

³ See KINGS, BOOKS OF, § 9.

(Duhm would say 40-55); he was right, at any rate negatively, as regards chaps. 56-66. Where he failed was in not giving due weight to certain phenomena in the second part of chaps. 40-66 which (as conservative critics saw) pointed away from Babylon as the place, and from the closing years of the Exile as the time of composition.¹

It is this second part of chaps. 40-66 that we have now to consider.

The first question is, Have chaps. 49-55 17. Chaps. been rightly assigned to the Second Isaiah? 49-55. (a) Kuenen himself in 1889 already saw the difficulty of his former position.

He came to the conclusion that chaps. 50 f. 54 f. were written after the return from Babylon, and even expressed some doubt whether chap. 49 should not be added to the group (Ond. (2) 2 137 f. 142). In 536 B. C. the Second Isaiah might have brought the original Prophecy of Restoration to Judæa (ib. 145), and Kuenen thought it not unreasonable to credit the same great writer with the composition of the four chapters just mentioned.

(b) Kusters, too, who did not accept the tradition of a return in 536, was of opinion that 49 12-26 51 1-16 51 17-52 12 54 f.² cannot have the same origin as chaps. 40-48. They were written, according to him, in Palestine, but not by the Second Isaiah. The following are Koster's arguments.

1. As to style and diction. There is no doubt a general resemblance to chaps. 40-48. But observe that nowhere in these passages are the persons addressed described collectively as 'Jacob' and 'Israel,' and that in 52 1 Jerusalem is called the 'holy city' (עִיר הַקֹּדֶשׁ), a characteristically late phrase, found also in 48 2 (which is probably interpolated) and in Neh. 11 1 18 Dan. 9 24; cp also 64 10 [9], 'thy holy cities' (עִירֵי קֹדֶשׁ).

2. As to contents. Almost throughout, the point of view is shifted from the exiles at Babylon to the small and struggling community of Zion. There are indeed points of contact with the preceding prophecies; but this only proves that the writer of this section was acquainted with the other work, not that he wrote it. Moreover, when he comes to speak of the departure of the exiles from Babylon, his expressions are inconsistent with those of a parallel passage in the other work³ (contrast 52 12, 'not in hurry shall ye go out,' with 48 20, 'flee ye from Chaldaea'), and if not in 52 10-12, yet in 49 12 18 he admits the idea of a general return of the Diaspora, which is not mentioned in the earlier chapters, but was one of the chief hopes of the later Jews. (See also Kuenen's argument from internal evidence, Ond. (2) 2 138, or Intr. Is. 296 f.).

(c) On the other hand, several things must be observed.

(1) The disputed passages are written in the manner of II. Isaiah, and contrast strongly with chaps. 56-66; (2) they display an optimistic idealism which residence in the Jerusalem of Haggai and Zechariah would have speedily diminished;⁴ and (3) the address in 55 2, appropriate enough for a preacher in Babylonia, would have sounded hollow and insincere if spoken at Jerusalem.

Thus the evidence does not all point in one direction, and a reconciling theory is required. Let us then suppose that the passages in question were written in Babylonia by a writer of the school of II. Isaiah, but with an eye to the circumstances of Judæa. The writer's object was partly to induce Babylonian Jews with severe reproaches addressed to his own contemporaries, whom he conceived to have fallen back into obstinate unbelief (see 'Isaiah,' SBOT). Nor can we here consider the question, Where did the author of chaps. 40-48 live? Probably the right answer is, at Babylon. See Intr. Is. 273-276, 282 f.

² 49 1-11 50 52 13-53 12 he treats in another connection. See farther on in this article (§ 18).

to go to Judæa and assist in the regeneration of Israel, partly to encourage sorely tried workers in Jerusalem, such as Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi.

Sellin (Serubbabel, '99) has endeavoured to show that chaps. 40-55 were written, not in Babylonia, but at Jerusalem between 515 and 500 B.C., to comfort the Jews for the failure of the high hopes attached to ZERUBABEL [7. v.]. Those passages which seem to refer to the fall of Babylon he regards as having been written by the same author at Babylon about 545 B.C.

The passages which are most certainly Babylonian are, Sellin thinks, 40 18-20 41 2-4 41 6-8 [41 17-20?] 41 25 42 14-16 43 1-8 43 14 44 9-11 44 26-28 45 1-13 46 1 f. 6-8 10 b 11 47 48 14 (20 f.?). The reference in various passages to 'the former things' (41 22 42 9 43 9 [?] 46 9) with which 'new things' (42 9 48 6) or 'a new thing' (43 19) are contrasted is explained by this theory. The successes of Cyrus are the 'former things' prophesied some thirty years ago, the glorification of Israel and the accomplishment of God's purposes for the world through Zerubbabel, as the Messianic king of Israel, are the 'new things' now just being announced.² When the hopes attached to Zerubbabel failed in one sense, the prophet was still able to look forward to their realisation in another (see chap. 63).

It is absolutely impossible to accept this theory as a whole. But to those who do not accept Koster's theory (that chaps. 49-55 are a later appendix to chaps. 40-48) it may seem plausible to hold that chaps. 40-55 were written at Babylon with the object of encouraging the community of Jerusalem to hope for a speedy regeneration, and of stimulating patriots in Babylonia to go to Jerusalem and help forward the cause of progress. We say 'at Babylon,' because certain passages presuppose that Jerusalem is desolate, which, strictly speaking, it was not. Only a writer living at a distance from Judæa can have indulged in such idealism.

Another difficult problem relates to the four very beautiful songs on the Servant of Yahwè (42 1-4 49 1-6 18. Servant of Yahwè Songs. 50 4-9 52 13-53 12). It has been doubted whether these songs are exilic or post-exilic.³ A careful exegesis, however, proves that they could be removed without material injury to their surroundings, and that the tone of thought differs from that of the prophecies among which they are placed. They must have received their present position from a later editor, who wrote 42 5-7 49 7-9a (or 9-12), but not 50 10 f., which (cp Intr. Is. 302 f.) is more recent still. These passages were designed to link the songs with their prophetic framework. The inserter and editor cannot be identified with the Second Isaiah; still less was he the author of the songs. He did his work subsequently to the expansion of the original Book of the Second Isaiah; in other words, he had before him the main part of Is. 40-55.

The songs on the Servant of Yahwè have one general object—that of exhibiting the highest Israelitish ideal in accordance with law and prophecy. They are not, however, without differences among themselves, which require to be studied.

In the first three songs the Servant is 'an imaginative fusion of all the noble teachers and preachers of the Jewish religion in and after the time of Ezra,⁴ those of whom the writer of Daniel says, "And the teachers shall shine as the splendour of the firmament, and those who make the many righteous as the stars for ever and ever"

(Dan. 123). These the poet may have supposed to form a band, whose members would proceed in various directions to 'bring the law to the nations' (42 1). Their experiences were not uniformly favourable; but they knew that in the end their faith in the God who sent them would be rewarded.

In the fourth song, however, the conception of the Servant is somewhat modified. Looking back on the sufferings of righteous Israelites both under Babylonia and under Persia, the poet saw them irradiated by a glorious divine purpose. 'He fused the different nameless martyrs into one colossal form, and identified this personage with the people of Israel, not perhaps without a thought of Jeremiah, who certainly regarded himself as representing the true Israel.' It would seem that the opening and closing stanzas (1-3 14 f., see emended text in SBOT) were written after the description of the fortunes of the Servant as a framework to receive it.

Schian and Koster think that this last of the songs was written by a different writer from the rest; it is the oldest of the songs according to the former critic, the most recent according to the latter. The grounds of this view do not appear to be adequate. Already in the third song there is an approach to the characteristics of the fourth, and the phraseology of the latter is much less obscure than has commonly been thought, if proper text-critical methods are applied.

Cp Budde, 'The so-called "Ebed-Jahweh Songs," etc.,' Ann. J. Theol., '99, pp. 499-540. See further SERVANT OF THE LORD.

It would seem that after the insertion of the Songs in Is. 40-55, a prophetic writer did them the highest honour in his power by imitating them.

19. Soliloquies Three brief soliloquies of this ideal personage (61 1-4a 62 1-3 and 6 f.) are introduced in chaps. 61 f. (on which see below, § 20). The writer evidently regards the Servant as a personification of the company of prophets of whom he himself is one, and gives vividness to his prophecy by introducing the Servant of Yahwè first as discoursing on his delightful mission, and then as importuning Yahwè to fulfil his promises.¹

At this point the present writer may refer to the critical theory (based on an earlier one proposed in 1881 in the article 'Isaiah' in Ency. Brit.) which he put forward in JQR, July and Oct. '91.

He divided the work of the Second Isaiah into two books, viz. (1) chaps. 40-48, and (2) a broken collection of discourses, consisting of chaps. 49 1-52 12; 52 13-53 12 (a later insertion by the Second Isaiah), 54 f., 56 9-57 21 (beginning with a long passage from an older prophet), and 60-62. The second book, being left incomplete by the author, was well adapted to receive additions from the Sophërim, or students and editors of the religious literature. Such additional passages were 56 1-8 58 f. 63-66.

This theory was in advance of the current criticism of the time, but is now superseded by a more completely defensible theory.

Chaps. 56-66 contain no works of the Second Isaiah, but, with the possible (or probable) exception of 63 7-21, 64 12, belong to nearly the same period—that of Nehemiah.

Duhm indeed assigns all these eleven chapters to a single writer of Nehemiah's age whom he calls Trito-Isaiah (as the successor of Deutero-Isaiah). The date is, on the whole, correct, so far as regards 56-63 6 65 f.; this portion gives a vivid picture of the difficulties with which Nehemiah and Ezra contended, and throws fresh light on the dealings of the orthodox Jews with the Samaritans.² On the other hand, the view that the book has anything like literary unity, and that it is the work of one man, is not at all satisfactory. Cp Gressmann, Ueber die in Jes. c. 56-66 vorausgesetzten Verhältnisse (98); Littmann, Ueber die Abfassungszeit des Trito-jesaia (99).

We may hold it to be practically certain that chaps. 60-62 were written as an appendix to chaps. 40-55; probably the original order was 61 62 60 (cp Duhm). As to 56 9-57 13a, it belongs indeed to the same period as the surrounding prophecies; but it shows in a special degree the influence of Ezekiel.

² Ed. Meyer (Entst. Jud. 122) recognises this; cp also Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 27-29, 45.

We now pass to chap. 637-6412 [11], which stands in many respects alone in the prophetic literature. It is at any rate later than the neighbouring prophecies,¹ for though some illustrate it by Neh. 12, the prayer of Nehemiah there given, and his account of what he found at Jerusalem, do not correspond to such a terrible situation as we find in this strange work. That a date in the age of Nehemiah is impossible cannot indeed be said, considering how imperfect is our information. But it is more probable that the work is a fresh monument (cp on chaps. 24-27, § 13) of the oppression and persecution of the Jews by Artaxerxes Ochus. Possibly the opening verses (637-14) were added later to soften the gloom of the passage (cp Ps. 89).

For objections to this view see G. A. Smith (Hastings' DB, 2495), and Marti's commentary. (Marti has to account for 649-11 by making it a later addition.) The objections are not insuperable.

1. The view under consideration separates 637-6412 [11] from the other compositions which make up chaps. 56-66. It is set apart already, however, by its form and contents.

2. The passage expresses a consciousness of guilt not to be found in Ps. 44 74 79, which, also, have been assigned to the time of Ochus. But it was possible, even after the introduction of the Law by Ezra, to take different views of the relation of the people to its God, according to the extent given to the conception of the people. The inner circle deserved to be called pious and loyal to the covenant (Ps. 44 17 [18] 79 2); but the people at large were far from corresponding exactly to this description; they were 'neither cold nor hot.'

3. In 63 18 the possession of the Holy Land is said to have lasted but 'a little while,' which points to an earlier part of the post-exilic period. The text, however, is notoriously doubtful. 63 18 should be emended thus (see SBOT, 'Isa.', [Heb.] 202)—

Why do the wicked tremble thy dwelling-place?

Our adversaries tread down thy sanctuary.

Marti's suggested emendation is hardly an improvement upon this.

4. In 64 11 [20] the temple, over the destruction of which the liturgical poet laments, is described as 'our holy and our glorious house where our fathers praised thee,' which points to the first temple. But (1) the first and the second temple are regarded by Haggai (2 3) as the same house, and can be so regarded by another writer, and (2) the second temple had no doubt been enriched by offerings from the Jews abroad before the time of Ochus (cp Zech. 5 10 f.).

5. Ps. 74 points to the conviction that prophecy has ceased in Israel. But Is. 637-64 betrays no such conviction. We must, however, be quite sure of the correctness of the text of Ps. 74 9. There is much corruption close by. 'There is no prophet any more' is, on more than one ground, to be regarded as a gloss on the corrupt reading ירוע, which should be סְפִיחַ ('sanctuary'). There is no longer among us any sanctuary.

There is one alternative, no doubt. This is to suppose that the authors of Ps. 74 and 79 and of Is. 63 7, etc., threw themselves back imaginatively into the time of the Chaldean invasion. The commemorative fast-days would provide an occasion for this. (So PSALMS, BOOK OF.) This, however, is not quite such a natural view as that here adopted. One may admit that there is a general resemblance between most of the products of the later Persian period; but those which express the deepest misery can hardly find a home except in the period of the insane cruelties of that degenerate Persian king, Ochus. It is remarkable that there are parallels of thought, expression, and situation between Is. 637-6412 [11], and Ps. 74 and 79, to which Robertson Smith has already given this date.

To a still later time belong two outbursts of bitter animosity in 50 10 f. 66 23 f.

The final redaction of chaps. 40-66 may be placed with probability in the early part of the Greek period.

22. Redaction of chaps. 40-66. The first half of the Book of Isaiah (unless chap. 33 be of a later date) was completed between 250 and 220 B. C. (cp § 15, end), and there appears to be no reason why the second half may not have reached its final form about the same time. On the redaction of Isaiah as a whole see above, § 1 (end).

1. Recent commentaries.—For 'college students' no better book can be recommended than Skinner's commentary in the Cambridge Bible (2 vols., '96, '98), with 23. Literature. which Driver's Isaiah ('Men of the Bible') may be combined. For special students the commentaries of Delitzsch (4th ed., '89), Dillmann and Kittel (6th ed. of the Jesaja in KGH, '98), Duhm in HK ('92), and

¹ It could not be placed in its chronological order at the end of the book because of the unmitigated gloom of the conclusion.

Marti in KHC (1900) are indispensable helps; on the whole Marti's is at present the most helpful commentary; but it needs supplementing. H. G. Mitchell's Study of Is. 1-12 (New York, '97) is a good book for those who do not read German.

2. Among the well-known excellent introductions to the whole OT, none is as critical from the point of view of 1900 as was that of Kuenen (Ond. (2) 2 ['89]); German translation, '92) ten years before. One special introduction has appeared (Cheyne's Introduction, etc., '95; Germ. transl. '97).

3. Among dictionary articles G. A. Smith's may be specially mentioned (Hastings' DB 2 485b-498a). This writer's earlier volumes on Isaiah ('Isaiah,' in Expositor's Bible, two separate parts, '88, '90); stimulating as they are, are open to very much adverse criticism. (English critics have lain too much under the spell of Dillmann.) This scholar is now giving way to the force of argument (whether his point of view is quite clear, careful readers of Duhm and Marti, and of similar books on other prophets, will be able to judge). His article, however, is, together with Skinner's unpretending but learned work, one of the most hopeful signs in English Bible-study, which at present in the OT department is too predominantly 'moderate.' G. A. Smith's inclusion of the 'theology' of Isaiah (a bad but generally accepted term) limits the criticism somewhat unduly, and leads him into statements which are not as securely founded as one could wish. But he is true to himself, and what he says, even when critically defective, is sure to be educationally most useful. The bibliography, which occupies over two closely printed columns, is so full that it would seem like imitation to give the like here. Besides, it is really better for the student to find out bibliographical details for himself from the references contained in first-rate books. C. H. H. Wright has a learned article in Smith's DB (2) 1 1450-1474, and Klostermann in PRE (2) 6 585-607. To learning Klostermann joins a singular independence of view; but he often leads the student on rough, unpassable ways.

4. Investigations of parts of Isaiah. Articles by B. Stade in the ZATW ('81-'84) have left their impress on all later works (cp Intr. Is.). Cornill, 'Die Composition des B. Jes.,' ZATW 4 83-104 ['84]. Lagarde, Semítica (78, pp. 1-32); critical notes on chaps. 1-17. Giesebrecht, Beiträge zur Jesaiakritik ('90); cp Siegfried's review, TLZ, '90, p. 568. We find these words in the preface, 'I can find no other epithet for Dillmann's treatment of the text but "antiquated." It cannot be right for an interpreter to put sentences into the mouth of such masters of speech as the prophets, which by the awkwardness of their form and the unnaturalness of their contents are nothing short of offensive.' Guthe, Das Zukunftsbild des Jes. ('85). Winckler, AT Untersuch. '97; Altorient. Forsch. '93, etc.; J. Ley, Histor. Erklärung des zweiten Teils des Jes ('93); J. Meinhold, Die Jesaja-er zählungen Jes. 36-39 ('98), valuable. König, The Exile's Book of Consolation ('99), based on two articles in the Neue Kirchl. Zt., Nov., Dec., '98 (exegetical and controversial). Neubauer and Driver, The 53rd chapter of Isaiah according to the Jewish interpreters, 2 vols., '76, '77. See also ISAIAH I; IMMANUEL; MESSIAH; SERVANT OF THE LORD.

5. Earlier works. Among older commentators Vitrina (2 vols. fol., 1714) stands out by his exemplary thoroughness. But the reconstruction of exegesis produced its first great work in Gesenius's Isaiah ('20, '21); Hitzig ('33), Ewald (Die Propheten, '40, '41; 2nd ed., '67, '68), Dillmann (5th ed. of Knobel's Jes. in KHG, '90) worthily followed. Cp Del. Jesaja (4), 30-36, where the titles of Cheyne's earlier works on Isaiah are given; Che. Proph. Is. (2) 2 268-286; Intr. Is. 283-295.

6. Text of Isaiah. The greatest weakness in most commentaries on Isaiah is their too great dependence on the MT. Among the older exegetical scholars of our day no one has perceived this so clearly as Klostermann, as can be seen to some extent from his article in PRE (2) just referred to, and still more from his indispensable work, Deuterojesaja, Hebräisch und Deutsch, mit Anmerkungen ('93). If the present writer's Book of Isaiah in SBOT (Heb.), 99 (cp English edition, '98) should be grouped by scholars with this little work, and with the collections of critical emendations of other able workers, it will be a recompense. For many specimens of the fine work of Secker, Lagarde, Grätz, Duhm, etc., the reader may be referred to SBOT. Later results on several parts of Isaiah will be found in Crit. Bib. T. K. C.

ISCAH (יִסְכָּה); יִעֲשֶׂה [ADEL], daughter of HARAN i. 1 (Gen. 11 29). The strong probability is that 'the father of יִסְכָּה' is a variant of 'the father of יִסְכָּה' (similarly Ball, Gen. 59, foot). But instead of comparing Heb. kasdim and Ass. kaldu, we can now see that יִסְכָּה comes from יִסְכָּה, which was a necessary emendation of יִסְכָּה. See MILCAH. T. K. C.

i. Most critics hold that the true name of Saul's successor was, not ISHBOSHETH (יִשְׁבֹּשֶׁת), but Ishbaal, and they account for the form Ishbosheth ('man of shame'—i.e., of the shameful idol), and for the faulty pronunciation Eshbaal by religious scruple; see Hos. 2:16 [18]f., and cp Hos. 9:10 Jer. 3:24 11:13 and 6 of 1 K. 18:25; see also JERUBBAAL; MERIBAAAL. Bosheth for Baal gratifies the love of alliteration.

ii. Jastrow thinks that Bosheth in Ishbosheth and Mephibosheth is a distortion of Besheth, which is the name of a Babylonian deity, as inferred from such names as Mutibašiti, 'man of Bašit', and suggests that Bašit (powerful?—cp bašita, Ann. Tab. 575) may have been a designation of the consort of Baal (JBL, 94, p. 197f.).

iii. There is, however, still another explanation which may seem to avoid some of the difficulties of both these views (see MEFIBOSHETH).

i. The youngest son of Saul,¹ and, under the tutelage of ABNER [q.v.], his successor. His authority is said to have extended over 'Gilead, the ASHURITES (Asherites? Geshurites?), Jezreel, Ephraim, Benjamin, and (in fact) all Israel' except Judah (2 S. 2:9 10:8). That his capital was fixed at Mahanaim on the E. of the Jordan shows that Saul's house felt itself safer in Gilead² than within reach of the Philistines, unless indeed we suppose with Winckler that Ishbaal was gradually pushed by the conquering David into trans-Jordanic territory. So much at all events is certain, that Ishbaal was a political nonentity; the true chief of the house of Saul was Abner. Ishbosheth or Ishbaal was too young for his position (the statement as to his age in 2 S. 2:10 implies a wrong chronological scheme), and equally devoid of shrewdness and courage. The precise amount of truth in the story of the dispute concerning Rizpah (2 S. 3:7-12) cannot be determined; Winckler indeed hazards the conjecture that Abner murdered Ishbaal in the hope of becoming king himself. The tradition or legend, however, ascribes Ishbaal's death to two of his captains. But the story is difficult. To a man 'reckoned' as belonging to the same tribe as themselves (see BEEROth, BENJAMIN, § 3), who had also, when they came upon him, the sacredness attaching to a sleeper (see DAVID, § 11, col. 1032, n. 2), and who was above all 'the anointed of Yahwé,' they dealt a fatal blow (2 S. 4:2-7).³

A plausible explanation has been given by Ewald (Hist. 3:118 136). The two reputed Benjamites may have been descendants of the Canaanites, and have had to flee to GITTAIM [q.v.] from the Canaanitish town of Beeroth, when Saul 'put to death the Gibeonites' (2 S. 4:3, cp 21:2). The murder of Ishbaal would in this case be the performance of the sacred duty of avenging bloodshed.⁴

The Greek forms of the name are ἰεβσοθός [Jos.], ἰεβσοθε [B], ἰεβσοθαί [A], ἰεβσοθαί [cod. 93; Aq., Symm., Theod.]. In 2 S. 3:7 occurs the odd reading μεμφιβοσθε [BL], -θαί [A], but ἰεβσοθε [A17a? in 3:7 and A? (mg.) ib. 8]; ἰεβσοθαί [Aq., Symm., Theod.]. If the view maintained elsewhere (MEFIBOSHETH) be adopted, the form 'Ishhosheth' has a better claim to be adopted than Ishbaal.

2. Either Ishbosheth (or a name which may underlie Ishbosheth; see MEFIBOSHETH) or Ishbaal seems to be the true name of the first hero on the list of David's mighty men, which is to be restored in 2 S. 23:8 1 Ch. 11:11 (see JASHOBEAM). If we may follow the prevalent theory, Ishbaal is to be preferred; but in either case the name of David's hero has undergone a strange transformation. Anticipating the explanation given

³ The scene is vividly represented in 6, which in v. 6 is to be preferred to MT (Driver, Budde, H. P. Smith, etc.).

under Jashobeam (see JASHOBEAM, 1) we may remark (1) that out of the final th in bosheth ('shame' = Baal), combined with δ from ben ('son of'), a syllable beth has been produced in MT of 2 S. (the letters being transposed), thus completing Joshebbashebeth (cp RV); (2) that, the final h in h having been dropped, the initial h in החכמי, 'the Hachmonite' has been corrupted into a n, thus producing the otherwise unknown word חחכמי (RV 'a Tahchemonite'); and (3) that the name of the warrior's father can be supplied from 1 Ch. 27:2. On the third point, notice the similar designations of Eleazar and Shamamah in 2 S. 23:9 11 (and cp Budde, SBOT, ad loc.; Marq. Fund. 15 f.).

The corruption, however, of this passage reaches still further. In 2 S. we are told that the hero was 'chief of the captains' (so EV); from the sequel, however, it is clear that we should, with Wellhausen, read השלושה ראשי, 'chief of the three' (cp v. 17b, 'these things did the three mighty men').¹ 'The three' was in fact the title of David's noblest heroes, next to whom came the 'thirty' (see DAVID, § 11a; ABISHAI). The verse continues most tantalisingly with three meaningless words, for a probable restoration of which see ADINO. At the close we hear of '800 slain at once.' In Ch. the number is put at 300; but the reading '800' (which 6 both in Sam. and in Ch. increases to 900) is supported by the obvious fact that it was by outdoing Abishai (cp v. 18) that Ishbaal obtained the first place. The account of Ishbaal in 2 S. 23:8 should therefore most probably be read thus—'Ishbaal, son of Zabdai, a Hachmonite, chief of the three. He brandished his spear against 800 men, slain at one time' (חנה).

The Greek renderings are ἰεβσοθὸς υἱὸς ἀχμανίου [Jos. Ant. vii. 124], in S. ἰεβσοθε [ἰεβσοθαί] [A], ὁ χαναναῖος [BA], ἰεβσοθαί υἱὸς θεκεμανί [L]; in 1 Ch. 27:2, σοβαλ [B], ἰσβοαμ [A], ἰεβσοαμ [L], ὁ τοῦ ζαββ[ε]λη; in 1 Ch. 11:11, ἰεσβεβα [probably a mere textual error for ἰεβσοθαί], υἱὸς ἀχμανί [B], ἰεσσοβαδα υἱὸς ἀχμανί [K], ἰσβοαμ υἱὸς ἀχμανί [A], ἰεσσεβαλ [Dr. TBS ad loc. mentions seven codices with the reading ἰεσσεβαλ and three with ἰσβοαλ] υἱὸς θεκεμανί [L].

3. A Korahite: 1 Ch. 12:6 (עֲרֻכָּי); σοβοκαμ [B],² σοβοαμ [K], ἰεσσοαμ [AL]. See ISSHIAH, 2. T. K. C.—S. A. C.

ISHBAH (יִשְׁבָּח), § 54), the clan to which the people of Eshtemoa belonged, 1 Ch. 4:17 (יעסבא [A], מארעθ [B, i.e., Mered?], נארע and יעדפאט [L]). 6 makes Ishbah a son of Jether; MT, as it now stands, mentions neither of his parents (see Be. ad loc.).

ISHBAK (יִשְׁבַּק), § 54; יעסבוק [AL]; יעסבוק [D in Gen.]; יעסוק [E in Gen.]; עסבאק [B in Ch.], a 'son' of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:2 1 Ch. 1:32). Identified by Fr. Del. (ZKF 191 f.) and Ball (Smith's DB), s.v.) with Yasbuk, a district in N. Syria mentioned by Shalmaneser II. in his monolith inscription (KB 1:159). Its king or chieftain was an ally of the Patineans, and Yasbuk must therefore have lain somewhere between the Euphrates and the Orontes. Yasbuk suggests the spelling ישבוק.

ISHBI-BENOB (יִשְׁבִּי בֶנֶב, יִשְׁבִּי בִּי; יִשְׁבִּי בִּי; יעסבי [BAL], εν σοβ [A]), the supposed name of a Philistine giant (see RAPHA), 2 S. 21:16 (not mentioned in 2 Ch. 20). The words so read, however (given more accurately in Kt. with ו instead of י), have to be taken with their context. Notice first, with Wellhausen, that the closing words of v. 15, ויפתר דוד (EV 'and David waxed faint'), are very inappropriate in a description of a single combat. The verb should probably be יִתְקַב, while דוד appears to conceal the name of the giant with whom David fought; thus we get the sense 'and . . . arose' (cp 1 S. 17:48). The two opening words of v. 16 should obviously be read ויִתְקַב דוד, 'and they (i.e., David and his men) tarried in Nob'; they should be replaced either after עִמָּוֶה 'with him,' or before יִקָּם דָּוִד (v. 15). The latter position is that recommended by Kittel (Kau. HS), who, appealing to the δαδου υἱος of Ⓞ^L (see below), finds in דָּוִד (end of v. 15), pronounced דָּוִד, the name of David's antagonist. At any rate it seems plain that the words rendered 'and Ishbi-benob' should rather be read 'and tarried in Nob,' unless indeed we boldly correct 'Nob' into 'Gob,' and 'Gob' into REHOBOTH [g.v.].

1 1 Ch. 11:11 reads 'chief of the thirty' (Kt.), or 'chief of the knights.' The former is read in S. by Be. and Gr.

2 Kittel (SBOT) suggests that the καινα και σοβοκαμ of 6 stands for καινα σοβοκαμ=και ἰεσσοβοκαμ, whence we should restore 'Ishbaal'; cp Marq. Fund. 16.

Wellhausen, Kittel, and Budde read 'Gob,' for 'Nob' comparing v. 18 f. in MT. This is either too much or too little. We know of no place called 'Gob'; but we do know of 'Nob.' It remains worthy of consideration, however, whether the bold step mentioned above would not really be a proof of true critical circumspection.

If 'Nob' is correct it may mean the place called Nobe by Jer. and now known as Beit Nūba, which is on an old road from Ramleh to Jerusalem, a little to the NE. of Aijalon and some 13 m. NW. of Jerusalem. Though really more than 700 ft. above the sea-level, it lies on flat ground. Twice in 1192 Richard I. stayed here with his army, nor can it be denied that it was a natural place for David and his men coming from Jerusalem (see DAVID) to tarry in, awaiting the Philistines (v. 15 f.). Ⓞ^L καὶ ἐξέλιθη δαυὶδ καὶ δαδου υἱος ιωας κ.τ.λ.; Pesh. has, 'and David and Joab and Abishai feared the giant'.

i. Ishmael, the son of Abraham and HAGAR (g.v.), is the personification of a group of tribes who were regarded as near kinsmen of the Israelites.

Their wild mode of life is admirably portrayed in the account of their ancestor—'he shall be as a wild-ass among men; his hand shall be against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell (as a dangerous enemy) over against all his brethren' (Gen. 16:12). Another passage states only that Ishmael dwelt in the desert and was an archer (Gen. 21:20).

According to some statements the home, or original abode, of Ishmael was the wilderness to the S. of Palestine as far as the frontier of Egypt. When Hagar is driven forth together with her child Ishmael, an angel appears to her in the desert of Beersheba (Gen. 21:14). The other account places the appearance of the angel 'between Kadesh and Bered' (Gen. 16:14). BERED (g.v.) is obscure; but the site of Kadesh ('Ain Kudaïs) is no longer doubtful (see KADESH, i. § 1). The statement in Gen. 16:14 agrees with the passage which represents Ishmael as dwelling in the wilderness of Paran (Gen. 21:21)—i.e., the N. part of the Sinaitic peninsula. His mother was an Egyptian (Gen. 16:3 25:12; cp MIZRAIM, § 2b). The corresponding word in another account (Gen. 21:9) may perhaps be a harmonistic addition by the compiler; the same narrative, however, mentions that Ishmael's mother took him a wife out of Egypt (v. 21). On the other hand Esau, the ancestor of the Edomites, marries a daughter of Ishmael (Gen. 28:9 36:3); in both passages she is expressly designated as the sister of Nebajoth, Ishmael's firstborn; but whilst in the former passage she is called Maḥalath, she bears in the latter the name of Basemath. In Gen. 26:34, however, Basemath is another wife of Esau. How this confusion is to be explained we cannot say; but it seems clear at least that the references to Ishmael's connection with Egypt on the one side and with Edom on the other, accord with the geographical position of the Ishmaelites in the N. of the Sinai desert. This, moreover, is the region explicitly assigned to them in Gen. 25:18, though there we read that their domain extended much farther in the direction of Arabia, for such is doubtless the meaning of the phrase 'from Havilah,' whatever uncertainty there may be as to the precise position of HAVILAH (g.v.), or as to the author's conception of it. The idea that the Ishmaelites were actually spread over this wide territory agrees with all that can be ascertained respecting the 'sons' of Ishmael.

According to Gen. 25:13 f. (= 1 Ch. 1:29 f.) Ishmael had twelve sons; these are to be regarded as eponyms of tribes or localities. In this case we

2. 'Twelve sons.' have even less right to attach a strictly literal sense to the number twelve than in the case of the twelve sons of Israel (cp ISRAEL, § 2, GENEALOGIES, i. § 5). Nor is it possible to ascertain whether at any time there were twelve tribes forming some kind of religious confederation under the name of Ishmael—i.e., 'God hears'—or whether the tribe of Ishmael, in consequence of its superiority, came to be regarded as the father of several smaller tribes, or whether, finally, this classification be due to some other cause.

That the genealogy cannot be treated as the expression of a fixed political system is abundantly clear from the fact that in an ancient narrative (Judg. 8:24) the Midianites are reckoned among the Ishmaelites, whereas, according to the genealogical lists in Genesis, Midian was a step-brother of Ishmael.

The name of Ishmael must have played a considerable part in very ancient times. Soon, however, it fell completely into the background. In 1 Ch. 27:30

3. References. the chief overseer of David's camels is the Ishmaelite Obil, which may be plausibly explained as a Hebrew, or specifically Ishmaelite, form of the Arabic ābil, 'camel-herd' (see ABEL). Another Ishmaelite (but see ABIGAIL, 2; ITHRA) married a cousin of David and was the father of the military chief Amasa (1 Ch. 2:17; ἰσραηλῆτης [L], see AMASA). Moreover, J's version of the story of Joseph describes the people who brought Joseph into Egypt as Ishmaelites (Gen. 37:25 27:28b), whereas E. calls them Midianites (Ⓞ^E renders 'מִדְיָנִים' by ἰσραηλῆται in v. 28). The Yahwistic narrator (8th century B. C. ?) speaks of Ishmaelites carrying spices on their camels from Gilead to Egypt; he must therefore have been acquainted with Ishmaelite caravans engaged in traffic of this kind. In subsequent times we hear no more of Ishmael as an actually existing people; for the mention of the Ishmaelites, together with several other ancient peoples, in Ps. 83:7 [8] (Maccabæan), is a mere figure of speech referring to some hostile nation of the author's own time.

On the other hand, some of Ishmael's 'sons' are mentioned later, and even very much later; we find

4. Nebaioth, them, moreover, in several places separated by considerable distances. (1) The etc. first-born, Nebaioth, not unfrequently appears as Nabaitu (not to mention slight variations of spelling) in Assyrian inscriptions¹ (see Del. Par. 296 f., Schr. KAT⁽²⁾ 147). As an example may be cited the great inscription of Ašur-bāni-pal (668-628 B.C.), KB 2217 ff. This tribe seems therefore to have dwelt in the Syrian desert or farther S. Its name is not to be confounded with that of the NABATÆANS.

(2) A considerable number of passages in the prophetic and poetical books make mention of KEDAR (g.v.), which is invariably described as a desert people in the full sense of the term.

The Assyrian inscriptions several times mention the Kidru or Kadru (see Del. op. cit. 299, Schr. KGF 101 f., KAT⁽²⁾ 147 f.). Once, in an inscription of Ašur-bāni-pal, the name is used even as a synonym of Arabia (see KB 2215 f., with the variants there given). Furthermore, Pliny (5.11, § 65) refers to the Cedrei as an Arabian tribe in the neighbourhood of the Nabateans (cp also OS⁽²⁾ 111 17).

From these passages we may conclude with tolerable certainty that the tents of Kedar were pitched in the Syrian desert, perhaps encroaching upon Arabia proper.

(3) Adbeel is identified by Del. (Par. 301 f.) with the Iðib'ila or Dib'ila (?) of Tiglath-pileser III.'s inscriptions. Their home, he states, was SW. of the Dead Sea, towards the Egyptian frontier—i.e., in the ancient territory of Ishmael (but cp ADBEEL).

(4) Dumah is probably the eponym of the oasis of Dumā or Dumat-el-Jandal, now usually called al-Jōf (about half-way between Damascus and al-Hāil, the present capital of Nejd), on the S. border of the Syrian desert.

In Pliny 6.28 (§ 157) the place appears as Domatha, in Ptol. 5.13 as δομυαθα, and in Steph. Byz., on the authority of the well-informed Glaucus, as δομυαθα. See DUMAH.

(5) Massa seems to occur in Ass. as Mas'u (mentioned with Tēmā), a N. Arabian tribe (see Schr. KB 221, KGF 261 etc., KAT on Gen. 25.14, Del. Par. 302). Cp ΜΕΣΗΑ [i.] (Gen. 10.30).

(6) Tema (Tēmā, 'south country', from the root מָד, cp its synonym Teman from מָד) is doubtless identical with the modern Teimā or Tēmā (in the N. of the Hijāz). Tema was unquestionably one of the most important stations on the ancient trade route from Yemen to Syria. On its historical importance and on other biblical references see TEMA.

(7) Jetur was one of the tribes that waged war with the Israelites settled to the E. of the Jordan (1 Ch. 5.19). From v. 10 it would seem that they dwelt there in the times of Saul. This is, however, probably wrong; but the position may be right for the Chronicler's time. The domain of Jetur must accordingly have been not far from the Israelite Peræa; somewhat fuller information on the subject may be obtained from Strabo (753, 755, 756), who places the Ituræans, a people doubtless identical with Jetur, in the southern part of the Antilibanus, and also, it would seem, in the eastern spurs of this mountain range. The Ituræi or Ityræi² are not unfrequently mentioned during the ages in question. They were partially subdued by the Jewish king Aristobolus I. (107 B.C.) and compelled to adopt the Jewish religion (Jos. Ant. xiii. 11.3); but it is scarcely probable that they remained faithful to the Mosaic law. Afterwards this country, like many other districts of Syria, served a succession of masters, until in 50 A.D., on the death of the last Ituræan king Sohemus (Sohaim), it was finally incorporated with the province of Syria (see Dio, 46.32, Appian, Mithr. 106, Bell. Civ. 5, 7, 10; Eutrop.

² The spelling Eturæi occurs once in a military inscription (CIL 3 3446). On two inscriptions Iaroupaiois, see MDPI, '99, p. 83 f.

6.14; Strabo, loc. cit.; Dio, 59.12; Tac. Ann. 12.23). The Ituræans were an unusually savage people, and the neighbourhood of Damascus suffered much from their depredations (Strabo, 755); 'omnium gentium maxime barbaros,' says Cicero in speaking of them (Philipp. 2.44). See JETUR, ITUREA.

Like the Ishmaelites of old, the Ituræans used the bow as their chief weapon; several authors mention Ituræan archers in the armies of Rome (see Cicero, loc. cit., Bell. Afric. 29; Lucan, Phars. 7230, 514; Vopiscus, Aurelianus, 11; and compare Vergil, Georg. 2.448; Vibius Sequester in Riese's Geog. lat. min. 153). Similarly, in Latin inscriptions dating from the time of the Emperors we read of Ituræan soldiers (e.g., CIL 3 4367, 4368, 4371). In some of the passages above mentioned the Ituræans are represented as Arabs (cp also Pliny, 6.23=§ 81), whilst in others the Arabs and the Ituræans are distinguished. In the fourth century after Christ the name of this people seems to have been obsolete. No genuine tradition as to Jetur or any of his brethren is to be found in Arabian literature, and the sole surviving traces of their existence are the geographical names Dumā and Tēmā.

(8) Naphish occurs in 1 Ch. 5.19 together with Jetur, among the enemies of the Reubenites; but nothing else is known of this tribe. See also MIBSAM, MISHMA, HADAD, KEDEMAH.

Whether the language of the tribes who bore the names of Ishmael and of his sons was more nearly

5. Language. related to Hebrew or to Arabic remains an open question. The former view might seem to derive some support from the OT. That a few of these tribes are occasionally described as Arabs would prove nothing to the contrary, for in the OT the term 'Arab' does not necessarily convey the precise ethnographical and linguistic sense which we attach to it at present (cp ARABIA, §§ 1, 3). In favour of the hypothesis that the Ishmaelite language was at least closely akin to that which we call Arabic, it may be mentioned that in an Assyrian inscription (KB 2216) the god of Kedar bears the name of Atar Samain; here Atar is the Arabic Athtar, not the Hebrew Ashtar, whilst Samain admits of being taken as an ancient Arabic plural of Samā, 'heaven.' Of the Ituræan proper names in the inscriptions (CIL 3 4367 4371) some are undoubtedly Aramaic, others probably Arabic; but from these facts no certain conclusion can be drawn with regard to the original nationality of the people in question, as must be apparent to any one who is moderately well acquainted with the personal names of those times and countries. Still less can we build an argument upon the Arabic name Suhaim, which was borne by the last Ituræan king, for of the use of this name there are other instances in Syria at that period, and it is moreover quite uncertain whether this Suhaim was himself of Ituræan extraction.

The occasional use of the name Ishmael in later times, long after it had become obsolete in reality, as a designation of the Arab race, and the theory of the Muslim genealogists, who regard Ishmael as the ancestor of one half of the Arabs, cannot be derived from any independent native tradition; it must be mere speculation based upon the OT.

2. b. Nethaniah b. Elishama; the murderer of GEDALIAH (g.v.), whom Nebuchadrezzar had made governor of Judah after the captivity of Zedekiah (Jer. 40.8 ff. 41 [LXX, 47.8 ff. and 48; ισραηλ B* vid. in 48g]). The terrible episode is briefly told elsewhere (see ISRAEL, § 43). It is enough to mention here that it was an act of vengeance on the Babylonians who had overthrown the family of David, to which Ishmael himself belonged. This conjecture is not only intrinsically probable, it appears to be proved by the fact that not only Gedaliah and his Jewish attendants but also 'the Chaldeans who were there' (i.e., at Mizpah), namely, the warriors, fell victims to the rage of Ishmael. Another person was not less eagerly bent on this fell deed—this was the Ammonite king Baalis—the same perhaps who, at the beginning of Zedekiah's reign, had sought to induce that king to head a confederacy against the Babylonians (Jer. 27.3).

With Baalis Ishmael designed to place the captives whom he carried away from Mizpah, among whom were relations of his own—certain 'daughters of the king,' whom Nebuzaradan had left. The plan was deeply laid; but word of it had got abroad, and but for his unsuspecting simplicity the honest and patriotic governor might have escaped (Jer. 40 15 f.). Treachery came to the aid of revenge. First, Ishmael and his ten companions were entertained at a meal by the hospitable governor, and then, perhaps at night, they set upon their host and all who were about him, and slew them. Even certain pilgrims, who arrived the next day with offerings for the 'house of Yahwè' (i.e., the sanctuary of Mizpah?), were nearly all cruelly put to death, lest they should spread the news. Their dead bodies were thrown into the 'great cistern' (Jer. 41 9; we follow C) which ASA (q.v.) had long ago constructed in MIZPAH. This done, Ishmael and his caravan moved northward. They paused by 'the great waters that are in Gibeon'—possibly the ancient reservoir, the remains of which may still be seen on the W. side of the hill of el-Jib (see GIBEON, § 4). This gave time for Johanan (one of Gedaliah's captains) to come up with them. Ishmael and his ten warriors had to give way to superior force. Two of them were slain; the rest made good their escape to the Ammonites. The seventh day of Tishri (the seventh month), the day of Gedaliah's murder, was long observed by the Jews as a fast-day (see SHAREZER, 2).

4. Father of ZEBADIAH (q.v.) (2 Ch. 19 11; om. B).

5. b. Jehohanan, a captain who took part in Jehoiahi's revolt (2 Ch. 23 1).

As the lists of P and the Chronicler sometimes seem to contain different forms of the same name, it is probable that 'Ishhod' should rather be יִשְׁהוֹר (as if 'witness,' aramaic), suggested by 'Jegar-sahadutha' in Gen. 31 47; see GILEAD, HAMMOLEKETH.

A proper name seems wanted. Did the editor substitute this phrase for an illegible name? More probably we should read יִשְׁשַׁכָּר, Issachar (cp 1 Ch. 26 5).

ISH-TOB (AV יִשְׁטוֹב, [E] I C T O B [BAL], ISTOB [Vg.], P E S H T [Pesh.]) is mentioned with Aram-beth-rehob, Aram-zobah, and Maacah in 2 S. 10 6 8 (but not in || 1 Ch. 19 6 9). According to AV, it is the name of a state (otherwise unknown) which furnished twelve times as many warriors as Maacah. It appears certain, however, that the words 'a thousand men' after 'the king of Maacah' (see RV of v. 6) should be omitted; they must have arisen, by corruption of the text, subsequently to the time of the Chronicler (see 1 Ch. 19 7). Kittel (in Kau. HS) and Budde (in SBOT) preserve 'and' before 'Ish-tob' (וְאִישׁ טוֹב). This, however, is hardly natural; it seems better to read אִישׁ טוֹב וְעָמָו (the king of Maacah) Ish-tob, and with him. (see Klo.'s note). Ish-tob is apparently the name of the king (so Jos. Ant. vii. 6 1, Klo., Wi.); or rather, it is a substitute for his name, for it only describes the king as 'man of Tob.' RV renders 'the men of TOB' (q.v.), which is philologically quite possible, though here improbable. The second reference to Ish-tob (וְאִישׁ טוֹב, v. 8) may be an interpolation from MT's version of v. 6.

The gentilic Ishvite (AV JESUITES) occurs in Nu. 24 44 (I E C O Y [E] [BAL], I E C C [F]).

2. The second of the three sons of Saul mentioned in 1 S. 14 49 (AV ISHVI; I E S S O U L [A], I E S S O U L [L]). C A L represents the form יִשְׁוִי = יִשְׁוִי which is doubtless an alteration for יִשְׁוִי (cp 1 Ch. 8 33), see ISHBAAL, 1. All four names are given by the Chronicler (1 Ch. 8 33).

C evidently read o after v , and Ewald (Hist. 3 108), Wellhausen, Driver, and others conclude that יִשְׁוִי = יִשְׁוִי or יִשְׁוִי, a transformation of יִשְׁוִי, Ishbaal (see ISHBAAL, 1). This is slightly forced, and, as Klostermann points out, Ishvi is replaced in 1 S. 31 2. It is surely obvious that the notice in 14 49, with a natural kind of art, prepares the way for that in 31 2. But it would be rash to say with Klostermann that the two names may be synonymous. יִשְׁוִי is simply due to textual error. The scribe wrote 'Jonathan, Malchishua, and Melchishua' instead of 'Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchishua.' But of the first מלכישוא all that remained was יִשְׁוִי, which was corrupted into יִשְׁוִי. The first three letters became effaced. That Ishbaal is not mentioned has already been accounted for. (He was not on the fatal battlefield. C 's reading is but a guess.)

ISLE, ISLAND (אִי; C usually N H C O C , but E O N H in Is. 41 5 42 4, $\theta\lambda\alpha\sigma\sigma\alpha$ in Jer. 25 22 Esth. 10 1 [also Dan. 11 18 cod. 87], insula). See GEOGRAPHY, § 21. EV uses the two words indifferently; see for example Is. 41 1 and 41 5, 42 10 and 42 12. In Jer. 47 4 AV 'country' and in Jer. 25 22 AVmg. 'region.' RVmg. frequently 'coastland' and once (Jer. 47 4) 'sea coast.' In Is. 42 15 RV retains the difficult 'islands'; 'dry lands' is the sense we expect, and this could perhaps best be reached by reading אִיִּים (with Oort, Dubn, Grätz, Kittel) or rather אִיִּים. 'Far countries' is not a bad rendering of Lowth in some other passages of Is. 40-66—אִיִּים seems to connote distance.

The biblical writers draw within the circle of their hopes and aspirations a number of countries which were accessible by sea. 'Islands' for 'far countries' is also a common phrase in certain Egyptian records. 'Islands in the midst of the sea,' 'the lands of the sea,' and 'the end (or, ends) of the sea' are phrases used in the same connection with special reference to the coasts of Greece and Italy (WMM As. u. Eur. 334 359 363 369). The later OT writers constantly use the term, and we find the 'isles of ELISHAH' (Ezek. 27 9), the 'isles of 1 Cp Saad.'s rendering of אִיִּים in Is. 23 13.

ISLE, ISLAND

KITTIM' (Jer. 210, Ezek. 276); Phoenicia, too, and Capbotr are 'isles,' according to EV of Is. 232, and RV^{mg.} of Jer. 474. This rendering is defensible in the passage in Jer. (if CAPHTOR [g.v.] be Crete), but not in that in Is. The occurrence of קִיִּים in Is. 1111 (כִּי is arbitrary) is a subsidiary argument for making this verse and its context post-exilic. The writers of the Prophecy of Restoration (Is. 40-55, see ISAIAH ii., § 16 ff.) appeal to the 'islands' or 'far lands' to interest themselves in the successes of Cyrus and the rescue of the Jews. They even say that the 'far lands wait' (longingly) for Yahwè and for the teaching of his servant (Is. 424 515; cp Ps. 971). Very different language is used by a later prophet (Is. 5918), who evidently belonged to a period of disillusionment, when the Gentile world (see GENTILES) seemed wholly given up to wickedness. 'Islands' in Ecclus. 4323 (אִיִּים, νῆσους), and 'island' in Job 2230 (AV) are corrupt. On 'wild beasts of the islands' see JACKAL (4).

The mountains of Canaan are world-famous because they are the scene of the history of the Israelites—a history of gradual growth, brief prosperity, and slow yet glorious decline. For the original roots, however, of the people of Israel we must look elsewhere than in the land where its history was lived. It was not till it had become a growing tree that Israel was transplanted to Canaan, nobler already than when it first appeared, a wilding of the desert. It is true that in relating their reminiscences the Israelites expressed themselves as if in the very earliest times their people had been a full-grown tree planted in Canaan. Unquestionably in this mode of regarding the facts one can see the workings of a primitive nature; it makes the task of ascertaining the historical facts doubly difficult. Events of the wilderness period, which never come into the full daylight of history as they actually happened, are presented in a false light when they are related as events in the life of a united and settled people living and thinking under quite other conditions, such as Israel did not attain until centuries afterwards in Canaan. Thus the attempt to describe the first beginnings of Israel demands the exercise of all the skill and tact that the historian can command. First of all, he must make it his business to remove the materials of his story out of the false light in which he finds them. He must not carry back the settled and fully organised Israel of the land of Canaan into the wilderness, but must begin with separate pastoral tribes such as they were there. Next, he must constantly bear in mind the peculiarities of the narratives he works with—their legendary character, their conformity to a scheme, their didactic purpose (see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 2 ff.). At the same time, he must not allow his readers to forget the impossibility of reaching conclusions at once definite and certain about the beginnings of Israel. What can be done in this obscure period is really only tentative. It would be perverse, however, to be altogether silent, and so the attempt must be made.

The scene of the movement which resulted in the creation of Israel as a people is the wilderness lying

S. and E. of Palestine: more precisely, that portion of it which borders in the N. and W. on those lands of ancient civilisation, the regions of the Euphrates and the Tigris, of Syria and Egypt. The pastoral tribes that had their abode there, in as far as they can be reckoned as ancestors of Israel, belonged to the North Semitic stock, probably to the Aramaean group.

This, at least, is the assertion of Israel's own later tradition, when (1) in the patriarchal histories it uniformly represents its nearest kinsmen of pure blood as being Aramaeans (Gen. 24 29 ff.), and (2) in the liturgical formula preserved in Dt. 265 it designates its ancestor as a 'wandering Aramaean' (cp ARAM, § 3, col. 278). The name 'Hebrew,' far from contradicting this, actually confirms it, for עִבְרִי means one who comes from the lands bordering on the Euphrates (עִבְרִי, Is. 720).¹ Nor is the philological difficulty, that the Hebrew language is not Aramaic, of any weight. What we now call Hebrew is precisely the language of Canaan (Is. 1918), which makes its appearance in the Amarna tablets as early as 1400 B.C.; and the oldest Aramaic with which we are as yet acquainted (cp the Sam'al-Zenjirli inscription of King Panammu, temp. Tiglath-pileser III.) approaches the Hebrew of the land of Canaan very closely; the difference is one only of dialect (cp ARAMAIC, § 2). It may be conjectured that the language of the Bedouins of that period, on the borders of the cultivated territory of Syria, was very similar to this Old Aramaic. If some of their clans or tribes migrated into Canaan and settled there, the exchange, as far as language is concerned, was thus only one of dialect.²

Our earliest notice of these pastoral tribes is met with on the Egyptian monuments. Within the period of the nineteenth dynasty certain Edomites (see EDOM, § 3) seek admission into Egyptian territory, and Rameses III. Israel in Egypt? (20th dyn.) commemorates a defeat he had inflicted on the Seirites (שֵׁעִי). Now, the Edomites, as we know, are reckoned in the OT as blood relations of Israel. It is a matter of indifference whether these 'shepherds' (Šasu) found the means of subsistence failing them in the over-peopled wilderness, or whether the pressure of other tribes behind forced them westward over

² [On the other hand it is most unlikely that there was any Aramaean element of importance in Palestine as early even as the time of Solomon (cp ARAM). Israel's theory of a general Aramaean origin may have arisen from the circumstance that some of the tribes belonged to a N. Semitic stock; cp GENEALOGIES I., § 4; TRIBES.]

the Egyptian border. We must at any rate regard it as a parallel case when Israel's ancestors sought admission into Egypt and received permission to feed their flocks in the land of Goshen—i. e., the neighbourhood of Saft el-Henne (Gen. 45.10 46.34, etc., J).¹ Here they continued to observe the customs and usages of nomads, and consequently were regarded by the civilised Egyptians as utter barbarians who had neither part nor lot in their own public life.

As to the period of this immigration into the eastern part of the Nile Delta, and the duration of the sojourn, we have no trustworthy data.

Nor is it easy to say which of the 'twelve tribes' of Israel took part in it. According to the OT, indeed, all of them did so; but it can easily be shown that this representation is not historical. The number twelve is itself artificial and conventional, as among other peoples.² Nor can it be even plausibly made out from the narrative that all the 'twelve tribes' were contemporaneous (Simeon and Levi, Gen. 49.5-7; Benjamin, Gen. 35.16-20; the 'grandchildren' of Jacob—Ephraim and Manasseh, Gen. 48.8-22). Several of them first came into being in Palestine itself. It is only of Joseph that the OT itself predicates any specially close connection with Egypt (cp JOSEPH II., § 11). In his case the tradition is clear; and the connection can hardly be purely imaginary, though it is now impossible for us to discern distinctly the historical nucleus of truth through the veil with which legend and poetry have enveloped it. To Joseph are to be traced back not only Manasseh and Ephraim, but probably also BENJAMIN [q. v. §§ 1, 3] (the three together being equivalent to Rachel): in other words, Israel strictly so-called. It is probable that Israel, like Ishmael or Jerahmeel, was originally a tribal name, assumed (like that of Joseph?) in contradistinction from other tribes of Hebrews, by the clans which had sojourned for some time in Egypt; but, since at a later date, in Canaan, the name embraced the whole people, we can understand how the later legend came to represent all the tribes which had had a share in the conquest and settlement of Canaan as having also taken part in the Egyptian sojourn.

The Exodus, historically viewed, is but one in a long series of movements having (in general) as their common goal the civilised land of Canaan. See EXODUS I.

Among the Bedouin tribes of that period, MOAB and AMMON (q. v. § 3) seem to have been the first to become sedentary (cp, however, GAD, § 7).—Moab on the E. of the Dead Sea; Ammon on the NE. of Moab, on the Upper Jabbok (Dt. 2.10 f. 20 f.). Their example was followed by the Edomites (cp EDMOM, § 4), who settled on both sides (and chiefly on the E.) of the Wādy el-Araba. Their success exercised an irresistible fascination upon the tribes of the adjacent wilderness. These felt themselves touched with the breath of God, and their aimless wanderings gave way to a planned movement,—they now aimed at Canaan!

When and where they made their first inroad we know not, nor are we concerned to do more than trace the share which Israel took in this movement. We may, however, note in passing that the frequently suggested parallel between the Habiri of the Amārna tablets and the עֲבֵרִים of the OT does not, from this point of view, seem wholly inadmissible: only, it must not be so understood as to make the Habiri identical with Israel.

From the confused mass of tribes and clans the august figure of Moses stands out in bold relief. The name is Egyptian (see MOSES); tradition reckons its bearer (doubtless because he was a priest) to the tribe of Levi. He was a shepherd in the service of Reuel (or, according to another account, of Jethro), the priest of the Midianites, and was also his son-in-law (Ex. 2.16-22; Hobab, son of Reuel, Nu. 10.29-32; Jethro, Ex. 3.1 4.18 18.1 f.; on the other hand, a Kenite, Judg. 1.16 4.11). It may safely be assumed that the Midianite priest exercised an influence on Moses' work (Ex. 18 Nu. 10). The Midianites are repeatedly spoken of as merchantmen well acquainted with the trade routes (Gen. 37.28 36 Nu. 10.31); and we may be sure that all the news brought by caravans, about events in the wilderness and in the settled lands on which it bordered, never failed to reach the ears of their priest. Among other pieces of information came the news that the warlike AMORITES (coming down from the north; cp col. 1.586, top) had invaded the territory of the Ammonites and Moabites in the districts to the E. of Jordan, and after conquering it for the most part, had founded within it two kingdoms—a more northerly, with Ashtārōth and Edrei as its two great towns, and a more southerly, with Heshbon for capital. Perhaps the vanquished may have called upon the wilderness tribes that were related to them to assist in doing battle with the victors; perhaps the tidings of what had occurred may have been inducement enough to form an expedition against the cultivated country beside Jordan. At all events, it was Moses who had the insight to take control of the movement and who became its leader.

² The Hebrew genealogists have either to mention Joseph as one tribe, to make room for Levi (Gen. 46.19 f.), or to omit Levi, so that Ephraim and Manasseh can be counted separately (Nu. 1.20-47). The number twelve may be the result of compromise (see GENEALOGIES I., § 5).

At the mountain of God (Horeb, see SINAI), the legend runs, Moses heard the call of Yahwè his tribal god (Ex. 3.6, 'the god of thy father': cp 18.4) to summon back into the wilderness the tribe of Israel now sojourning in Egypt, and to give it a place in the forward movement. Moses betook himself to Egypt and demanded permission for the tribe of Israel to depart, the God of the Hebrews having commanded them to observe at Horeb, in the wilderness, a sacrificial feast—that of the Passover (Ex. 5.1-3 8.25 [21] f. 108-10, cp 3.12 18). This appears to have been a skilfully chosen pretext. The demand, as relating to worship, was one that could with good reason be made, and the refusal of it must put the Egyptians in the wrong and rouse Israel's anger. Refused, however, it was. The explanation of this in the legend is that the Egyptians required the presence of the Israelites for forced labour on the building of the treasure cities, PITHOM and RAMSES. Still here and there (Ex. 8.28 [24] 10.10 f.) we catch glimpses of Pharaoh's real suspicion. Not improbably the Egyptians were acquainted with what had been happening on the borders of the Jordan, and with the agitation of the wilderness tribes, the growth of which, as being perilous to their suzerainty over Canaan, they wished to arrest. In the end, however, Pharaoh finds himself compelled to give the tribe of Israel the liberty to migrate that it asks, and Moses leads his shepherds with all their belongings—after the manner of pastoral peoples in their migrations—out of Goshen to the wilderness.

Both the routes which lead across the narrow isthmus between the marshes of the eastern branch of the Nile and the northern extremity of the Red Sea (הַיַּם הָאֲדֹמִי) into the wilderness were blocked by walls and defensive works. Accordingly, when the Israelites had reached the vicinity of Pithom (Heroönpolis)¹—at that time the present Gulf of Suez stretched so far inland—an Egyptian army suddenly presented itself in their rear. Escape seemed impossible: the wall and the water cut them off. The men despaired of deliverance. Moses alone did not flinch. He led Israel right up to the shore of the Gulf, the waters of which were being driven back by a strong east wind. Taking this natural phenomenon, perhaps already familiar to him, as a favourable token from Yahwè, he caused the forward march to be continued during the night over the seabed that had been left dry, and the eastern shore was safely reached. The pursuing Egyptians were embarrassed by their war-chariots, and in the morning the waters began to return to their natural state and cut the enemy off. Thus Yahwè saved Israel that day out of the hands of the Egyptians; and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea-shore, and the people feared Yahwè, and they believed in Yahwè, and in his servant Moses' (Ex. 14.30*f.*).

Moses had summoned Israel out of Egypt, in the name of Yahwè, to war, and victory had come to him before he had lifted a weapon. For all those who had lived through the experience it was a manifest work of God. The clans, which were already related by blood, felt themselves drawn together by a new bond of union through the common deliverance which God had vouchsafed to them. By the undreamed-of success he had achieved, Moses was accredited without question as the mouthpiece of God, and the people cheerfully yielded him obedience. He led them to Horeb (Sinai), the mount of God; and that was the scene not only of the sacrificial feast of which he had spoken to Pharaoh, but also of the institution of the 'Israelite' religion. A manifest work of God, a prophet of God to interpret it, a community of men who had experienced it and understood it—such were the conditions under which the new religion arose. It was based neither upon the order of nature as a whole nor upon the manifestation of any particular force of nature, but was called forth by events in human history, events in the spiritual life of men.

From this we perceive that in the religion instituted by Moses we have to do with a new apprehension of God. The name Yahwè, certainly of primitive antiquity, and thus no longer capable of explanation by us, tells us nothing as to the nature of the Godhead.¹ Certain expressions in the OT (e.g., Gen. 19.24), and perhaps also the conception that underlies the CHERUB (q.v. § 7), would seem to indicate that Yahwè was originally thought of as a divinity of the sky. What was peculiar to and characteristic of the conception of God in the new religion was that he was not thought of as a personification of any natural force whatever, but was believed in as the lord over nature. He was not regarded as the one only God; but he was thought of as being the god to whom none of the other gods could be compared (as is shown by the old proper name Micah; see NAMES, § 37, MICAH). His might, therefore, was terrible; he was greatly to be feared. He was, moreover, continually present in Israel; which made his help a certainty, but was a warning not to neglect him. Israel's victories were to be his victories; Israel's disasters were chastisements from him. The ordering of justice in Israel was to be determined and maintained by Yahwè; he was Israel's Lord and owner (לַיהוָה, see BAAL, § 1), for Israel was his handiwork. He had his abode in Sinai or Horeb, it is true; but he was not the deity of any land or city whose power and enjoyment of the gifts of civilisation he guaranteed. Being a wilderness deity, Yahwè was not attached to any definite place in the same degree as the gods of the more civilised peoples: he went wherever his people went.

The community which Yahwè created meant more than a mere natural union of the clan and the tribe. The whole, it is true, continued to be confined within the tribal limits and to retain the tribal organisation; but the manifest work of God (the deliverance from Egypt) and the religious construction that was based upon this, founded all anew on a higher and historical basis, that had expression and evidence in the divine name, now filled with a new meaning. What bound the community together for the future as well as for the present was the exclusive worship of Yahwè (monolatry), the system of law introduced and practised by Moses, the source and guardian of which was Yahwè, but above all the hope of possessing the land of Canaan. Moses made the conquest of Canaan, as a divine command and promise, an article in the religious constitution. The name Yahwè thus acquired a strong power of attraction for the desert tribes, as in its turn it gave the higher sanction of faith to a movement somewhat resembling that of the Arabs against the Byzantine empire. The war-cry was in the name of Yahwè; the sacred ARK (q.v.) instituted by Moses was the symbol of Yahwè the war-god who went forth with his people (Nu. 10.35*f.*; יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵי צְבָאוֹת [יִשְׂרָאֵל]; 2 S. 6.2). How many tribes at the outset put their faith in Yahwè's summons to war and entered into covenant with him by oath we do not know; doubtless Joseph or Israel (properly so called) formed the kernel of the new religious community.

Moses was the founder of the religion of Israel and the leader in Yahwè's war; he was priest of the sanctuary he had set up (Ex. 33.7-11), and, as such, he was also supreme judge (Ex. 18 Nu. 16.15*l*). A later age called him a prophet (נָבִיא; Hos. 12.13 [14] Dt. 18.15), and even unique in his kind (Nu. 12.6-8); this, too, was not substantially incorrect. But lawgiver in the traditional sense, as author of the Pentateuch (תּוֹרָה, δ νόμος, Jn. 1.17), or as the framer of a particular kind of government, the theocratic (Jos. 6. Ap. 2.26), Moses certainly was not.

In Ex. 24 and 34 we still meet with traces indicating that the oldest tradition knew of certain 'words of Yahwè' or 'covenant-words' which had come down from the times when the religion was founded. These words, however, have been so mixed up with non-Mosaic matter in later collections of ordinances that we are no longer in a position to clear the Mosaic kernel. Speaking generally, we may say there can be no doubt that Moses, during the period of his judgeship, established legal principles or rules which became norms and precedents for succeeding times. But it is impossible, out of the collections of laws that have come down to us, to answer the question what these actually were; for every one of the collections in question dates from times in which Israel had already accomplished the transition to the agricultural life. See LAW LITERATURE.

Nevertheless, Moses remains the founder of Israelite law, just as much as he is the founder of Israelite religion. Israelite law—ius and fas—was, in fact, the essential part of the Israelite religion (יהוה יְהוָה, Gen. 18.19; יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ, Jer. 5.4). Apart from the fundamental law that Yahwè alone was to be sacrificially worshipped, Moses appears to have retained the traditional and very simple customs of the wilderness in matters of worship; even images were not forbidden. In 2 K. 18.4, for example, the brazen serpent is carried back to Moses (cp Nu. 21.6-9, see NEHUSHTAN). In fact, we may be certain that it was in the sphere of worship that primitive customs (totemism, animism) continued to survive with greatest tenacity (cp IDOLATRY). The worshipping community, strictly so-called, continued to be the clan, as before (cp GOVERNMENT, § 8). With the above representation cp MOSES, PROPHECY.

Through the foundation of the religion by Moses the political and economical currents of the wilderness were directed into a new and deeper channel,

5. Movements in the wilderness.

the waters of which were augmented from a new source. The mysterious source of faith, touched by God, had opened, and now poured forth its stream with elemental power; the flood laid hold of and swept along all that it could reach. Indeed, if testimony were needed to the power of Moses's personality, it would certainly be found in the fact that he established himself as leader of the movement, gaining the upper hand over all outbreaks of impatience or despondency, yet without quenching the enthusiasm. For there were many delays. A long waiting-time was devoted to self-concentration and to experimental efforts at Kadesh Barnea, now 'Ain Kadis (Nu. 20.1*b* 13 Dt. 1.46; see KADESH, § 1), from which the 'mountain of God,' Sinai or Horeb, the scene of the founding of the religion, was probably not far distant. Relations were entered into and unions formed with the neighbouring or kindred tribes (e.g., Midianites, Kenites, Kenizzites), while collisions with hostile tribes (Amalekites) were not unknown. An attempt to penetrate into Canaan by the shortest way—i.e., from the south—proved unsuccessful (Nu. 13 f. Dt. 120-45 Nu. 211); but the conjecture may be ventured that the peoples known as Kain and Kenaz were originally small groups which remained within the limits of Canaan as the result of this attempt.¹ The first real advance was gained by the flood of immigrants on the road to the land eastward of Jordan; thence it was easy to enter Canaan. Again and again the devastating waters broke through the slight barriers of public order in the civilised territory—principally, it would seem, in two main irruptions, the second of which was of such force that it covered Canaan for centuries.

The details of the movement cannot now be given. It is hardly possible to trace them, for tradition invariably gives the events of the wilderness life as if they related to the entire nation of Israel, such as it was when finally settled in Canaan, and thus distorts the (presumable) facts. Moreover, all the narratives for the most part spring out of legend; many of them, also, have a purely didactic purpose. Legend laid hold of these occurrences with avidity; in the eyes of the hosts who actually took part in them—animated and exalted by religious faith—they were extraordinary, miraculous; how much more so they must have been in the memory of the people!

We can, however, perhaps still discern in dim outline the arrival of separate bands upon agricultural soil, and their attempts at settlement there. For if we compare the order of the tribes of Israel—the twelve sons of Jacob (Gen. 2931 3518)—with the notices we possess of their first appearance, their settlements, and in some cases their early disappearance, we are led to conjecture that Israelite legend has placed at the head of the list those tribes which were the first to become sedentary, while those which were the last to do so are enumerated last. This criterion admits of being applied with tolerable certainty in the case of the first four Leah tribes (Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah), as also in that of the tribes of Rachel (Joseph and Benjamin); and it may, accordingly, be conjectured that the younger Leah tribes (Issachar and Zebulun) were placed between these two groups out of regard to the time of their settlement in Canaan. The position of the Bilhah tribes (Dan and Naphthali) and of the Zilpah tribes (Gad and Asher) is obscure. Why were some assigned to Rachel, and others to Leah? Only this much can safely be asserted: they had come into existence not in the wilderness, but in Canaan.² Leaving these questions aside (see the articles on the several tribes) let us try, out of what can be discerned, to form for ourselves some picture of the manner in which Israel entered Canaan. But, first, as to Canaan itself.

In virtue of its natural situation between such renowned seats of primeval civilisation as Babylon and Egypt, Canaan had at an early period itself become civilised. The oldest culture of Syria, as a whole, was manifestly derived from Babylon; Northern Syria immediately borders on the Euphrates, whilst Egypt, on the other hand, is separated from Southern Syria by a desert journey of several days. The peaceful influences of trade and the inroads of war had, accordingly, brought Babylonian culture to the West as early as the third millennium B.C. (cp CANAAN, § 9, TRADE). How closely the whole life of the inhabitants of Syria about 1400 B.C. was dependent on the culture of Babylonia and Egypt is attested for us in a tangible manner by the 'Amarna tablets,³ consisting as they do, for the most part, of letters in the Assyrian language written in Babylonian cuneiform characters, and addressed from Middle and Southern Syria to the Egyptian kings, Amen-hotep III. and Amen-hotep IV.,

² See RACHEL, LEAH.

about the year 1400 B.C. They confirm the knowledge, previously derived from the Egyptian inscriptions, that from the time of the eighteenth dynasty (Thotmes I. and Thotmes III.) Syria had been under the suzerainty of the Pharaohs, a sovereignty which continued into the tenth century to be reasserted, though in a fitful way, from time to time—then becoming merely nominal, till finally Palestine fell into the hands of the Assyrians and the Babylonians. In this way Egyptian civilisation, beside that of Babylon, acquired a formative influence on Syria; the country had for long Egyptian governors and Egyptian garrisons; and Egyptian monuments were erected.¹ It was this twofold fertilising stream—from the Euphrates and from the Nile—that produced the peculiar civilisation of Syria and gave it the mixed character it possessed, although in the domain of religion and mythology the Babylonian substratum continued to prevail throughout.

The most important representatives of this civilisation were the Hittites and the Phœnicians. Whilst the political power of the Phœnicians was limited to a narrow strip of coast in Middle Syria (see PHœNICIA), the HITTITES (q.v.) moulded between the Orontes and the Euphrates a great empire which continued to subsist until about 1200 B.C. In the south, in Canaan properly so-called, there were, as the 'Amarna letters let us know, many petty princes, kings of cities, who ruled over the territory immediately adjacent to their capitals. They acknowledged the Egyptian suzerainty, but manifestly regarded it as a means of maintaining their own petty power, partly against envious rivals who were constantly accusing them before the pharaoh as rebels, and partly against the hostile inroads of foreign peoples (Amorites, Hittites, and Habiri; cp CANAAN, §§ 12 ff., and see above, § 3). Thus, for example, we find 'Abd-hiba of Jerusalem protesting his loyalty to the Egyptians, while complaining of neglect on their part. Indeed the land seems at this period to have been denuded of its Egyptian troops, and the sovereignty of the pharaohs to be falling into decay.

The religion of the inhabitants of Canaan belonged to the class of Semitic nature-religions. Originally their deities were simply personified forces of nature (e.g., sky, sun, moon, thunder); but from their close connection with the civilisation of the country they had become the protectors of the most important human activities and relations, such as agriculture, vine-culture, law, medicine, and war. The cultus showed manifold variety. The changing scene of life and death reproduced itself now in wild and extravagant sensuous revelry, now in the infliction of cruellest pain. Self-surrender and self-renunciation before God found expression even in the sacrifice of children (see FIRST-BORN). Yet the daily pursuits of the Canaanites—agriculture, gardening, vine-culture, cattle-rearing—impressed upon the worship, in the greater part of the country, especially in the 'hill-country' strictly so-called, a very simple, rustic character. Its forms may be supposed to have been on the whole uniform; yet, on the other hand, there was no such thing as a common order, but rather a multitude of local cults. The deities worshipped were for the most part not called by their proper names, but designated as the 'lord' or 'lady' of the place where they were worshipped (e.g., Baal of Hazor, Baal of Hermon, Baalath of Gebal; see BAAL, § 1, NAMES, § 42). The place of worship had an altar, beside (or upon) which was a sacred pillar (מַצֵּבָה, see MASSEBAH), a sacred tree, or its representative a sacred post (אֲשֵׁרָה; see ASHERAH), and, if the place aspired so high, an image of the god, with a priest and a house for it (see IDOLATRY). The more level districts of the country, especially those places which were touched by the important trade route between the Euphrates and the Nile (see TRADE), were, properly speaking, the seats of civilisation; the mountain country, on the other hand, was the home of the simplest, peasant-like manners and customs.

In the trans-Jordanic region the frontier between the settled parts and the area wandered over by Bedouin shepherds was unstable (GAD, §§ 5 f., 10), and, consequently, the ordinances of the civilised life of Canaan were much less stringently observed. It has already been said that at the time of the onslaught of the Israelite warrior-hordes there were here two Amorite kingdoms, under kings named Sihon and Og, by whom the territory of the Ammonites and the Moabites had been seriously infringed on. These Amorite kingdoms, regarded by the Israelites as hostile territory, formed the first point of attack; the invasion was begun at the southern frontier on the banks of the Arnon (Wādy el-Mōjīb): Nu. 21.13 Dt. 2.24 ff. See GAD, §§ 8, 11.

It is probable that the struggle in the trans-Jordanic region was begun by the four Leah tribes—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah. The Amorite king Sihon was defeated at Jahaz on the borders of the wilderness, and Heshbon, his capital, with the rest of his kingdom, conquered up to the Jabbok. The king of the more northerly kingdom, which had its chief seats at Ashtaroth and at Edrei (by the Yarmūk), the gigantic Og (Dt. 3.11), was vanquished at Edrei (Der'āt). The tribe of REUBEN appropriated to itself the southern portion of the conquered territory (northward from the Arnon), and cattle-breeding continued to be its chief occupation (Nu. 32 Judg. 5.15 f.). The final settlement of the more northern territory seems not to have come to pass till a later day; on the other hand, Simeon, Levi, and Judah pressed on into the country to the W. of Jordan, and settled in the district of Shechem, and to the N. of that. When the independence of one of their clans (Dinah, called the daughter of Leah), which had settled in the city of Shechem itself, was threatened by the Canaanites, Simeon and Levi broke the compact that had been made with these, and massacred them wholesale (see DINAH). But the outrage brought destruction on their own heads. The tribe of Levi was scattered, and the few remnants of Simeon were driven to the extreme southern limits of the land, where at a later date they had settlements alongside of Judah (Gen. 34.49-57 [cp We. CH 213 f. 354 f.]; Gen. 37.12-17?). The tribe of Judah migrated—voluntarily or under compulsion?—southward, along the western slope of the hill-country in the neighbourhood of Timnath and Adullam, formed connections with the Canaanites, suffered repeated losses, and finally obtained a permanent footing only by means of alliance with families that had their seats farther to the south (Perez and Zerah; Gen. 38). Cp CALEB, JUDAH.

The first impact of the Hebrew tribes had effected no permanent changes in the territory west of Jordan; but it was otherwise with the second. How long the interval of time between them may have been we are unable to determine; perhaps the traditional forty years of wandering in the wilderness (Am. 5.25, see WANDERINGS) originally referred to this period. The connection—no doubt there was a connection—between the two immigrations is obscure. It is even doubtful what share, if any, Moses had in the first assault. For, of course, Moses accompanied the ark; but this came up only with Israel properly so-called (the Rachel tribe of Joseph), so that we may take it that Moses arrived in the territory east of Jordan later than Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah. In Nu. 16.1-12-15 25 ff. an obscure reminiscence of disputes between Moses and certain Reubenite families has been preserved; perhaps on this occasion Reuben and other tribes may have broken loose from the leadership of Moses and taken their own independent way. Those who came after had at least one thing to thank their predecessors for: the way to the Jordan lay open, the Amorite power that barred it was destroyed. Yet the Rachel tribe of Joseph also seems to have paused, or to have been detained, for some time on the Moabite borders. For the hostile intentions of the Moabites, of which at a later date Israel was wont to speak in connection with the legendary figure of the Aramæan(?) Balaam (Nu. 22 ff. Josh. 24.9), probably concerned this tribe (but cp BALAAM, §§ 1, 3 ff.). The Midianites, too, seem even then to have taken up an unfriendly attitude towards Israel (Nu. 22.47-25.31-20; cp, however, MIDIAN, § 3).

Moses did not himself reach the goal of the movement. Even in legend every trace of him disappears on Mt. Nebo, from the summit of which he is represented as having viewed the Promised Land; his grave remained unknown. A strange ending which even the later version in Dt. 1.37 f. 4.21 f. 32.48 ff. Nu. 27.12-14 does not succeed in making historically clearer. He lived only to see the first sproutings of the seed he had sown; a long time had yet to elapse before it took firm root or brought forth its first-fruits. The OT, indeed, speaks of Joshua as having been his successor, but only from the point of view that Israel was led to its goal by him. That Moses had any single successor is not to be supposed; in point of fact, he had many—warriors, priests, kings, prophets, scholars—each of whom in his own time and in his own way advanced or maintained the great work of the founder.

JOSHUA (q. v. i.), already mentioned in Ex. 33.11 as the 'minister' of Moses at the sanctuary, was simply the leader of the house of Joseph—Israel strictly so-called. The accounts of the book of Joshua, indeed, represent him as at the head of all the Hebrew tribes, even of that of Reuben. And, inasmuch as Joshua's victories laid the foundation of the possession of Canaan not only for Joseph but also for all the other tribes, this feature in the tradition is easily intelligible. But it is not historical; it is contradicted by what we read in Judg. 1 (cp JOSHUA ii., §§ 13 ff.). What actually happened was that Israel, escorting its sacred object, crossed the Jordan to Gilgal (see ARK, § 4) and conquered Jericho, Ai, and Bethel (Josh. 2-8 Judg. 1.22-26), the last-named being a commanding site on the ridge of the hill-country, and at the same time an ancient seat of Canaanitish worship. It appears to be an original feature in the tradition that Israel under Joshua waged a ruthless war against the Canaanites, that it regarded them as 'devoted' (רמק) to Yahwè, and therefore extirpated them (see BAN). It is certain, however, that the ban of Yahwè fell only on those who attempted to offer armed resistance to the victorious course of his hosts, and not even on these in every case. In this matter, tradition has on the whole generalised; all the more credible and instructive, therefore, are the exceptions which it records, such as the case of Gibeon and the surrounding district (Josh. 9; cp 2 S. 21.2). The region occupied or subjugated by the house of Joseph lay, approximately, between the plain of Jezreel on the N. and the head of what is now called the Wādy Bêt Ḥanīnā on the S.; it was the best part of the hill-country (cp EPHRAIM, § 3). If the younger Leah tribes really entered Canaan earlier than the tribe of Israel (= JOSEPH; q. v. i.) and the Bilhah and Zilpah tribes came into being there (by mixture of race), we may well suppose that they profited by the victories of the 'house of Joseph,' and even that in some cases Joseph actually fought their battles. It is possible to conjecture that such facts underlie the narratives of Josh. 10 f. (with Josh. 11, however, Judg. 4 ought to be compared).

According to the statements of the OT, the Hebrew tribes never came in Canaan into conflict with a power of any magnitude—only with minor potentates among whom there was no firm bond of union. It is otherwise, however, in an inscription found by Prof. Flinders Petrie at Karnak, which speaks of a victorious fight of Me(r)neptah the son and successor of Rameses II. with 'Israel' in Palestine itself.¹ Although the style of the inscription is far from being that of a sober historical narrative, we may learn from it (1) that even in Canaan itself 'Israel' had to fight with the Egyptians, and (2) that as early as 1200 B.C. 'Israel' was already in Palestine. Much, however, remains not clear. We are not told where 'Israel' encountered the Egyptians in Canaan—W. or E. of the Jordan—and we do not know whether or not the Israel with whom the Egyptians fought was identical with the 'house of Joseph' (= Israel). Rameses III. also fought in southern Syria (E. Mey. GA 1, § 263, GA 318 f.). Apparently, however, by 1200 B.C. Egyptian suzerainty in Palestine was no longer a reality but a name. At the same time the kingdom of the HITTITES (q. v., § 8) was, it seems, broken up into petty principalities by the onset of the 'peoples of the sea' (cp Meyer, GA 1, §§ 263, 265). The successful occupation of Canaan by the Hebrew tribes will, accordingly, have to be assigned to the period 1230-1200 B.C., a time when a foreign power to control Syrian affairs and a home power that could unite the forces of the inhabitants in possession for purposes of effective resistance were alike wanting.

Amid such favouring circumstances an entrance into Canaan was effected by Israel; but it had not yet become a nation. A confederation of wilderness tribes is one thing; a consolidated, settled people is another.

8. Gradual settlement.

For this last the primary conditions are a permanent settlement and engagement in agricultural pursuits—conditions which in this case required more than one generation for their realisation. The settlement was carried on partly by warlike and partly by peaceful methods. The Canaanites were gradually pushed back (Ex. 23 29 f. = Dt. 7 20a 22 Judg. 2 20-36). The Hebrews had already taken firm hold of the hill-country, while the Canaanites still dominated the plains by means of their dreaded war-chariots (Josh. 17 16 Judg. 1 19). In each case the details, we may be sure, worked out differently (cp GOVERNMENT, § 11 f.). Where the conquerors had the upper hand entirely they violently took their possessions from the vanquished; those who up to this time had been masters had now to till the soil as serfs for the victors. Where the balance of power was more nearly equal, or where it varied, treaties were no doubt ultimately formed (connubium and commercium), so that Canaanite clans were received into the Israelite union of tribes, or, conversely, Israelite families became settlers in Canaanite cities (see ABIMELECH 2; SHECHEM; and cp Judg. 1 27 ff. 3 5 f.).

One consequence of the transition to an agricultural life now became apparent—the difficulty of maintaining the original tribal organisation (cp GOVERNMENT, § 15). The land had been divided into communes or districts, and the new-comers began to reckon in terms of these; names were chosen in accordance with dwelling places. Thus one group of families of the tribe of Joseph which had become separate from the rest was called 'the Southern' (Ben-jamin, בְּנֵי יְמִינֵי) because it occupied the most southern part of the whole territory of the tribe. From its growing importance and especially its valour in war (Gen. 49 27), it received the rank of a separate tribe and came to be reckoned as the youngest son of Jacob, Gen. 35 16 ff. (cp BENJAMIN, §§ 1, 4). The remainder of the territory of Joseph, again, was divided between Manasseh (Machir) and Ephraim, who are designated as grandsons of Jacob. EPHRAIM (§ 1 f.) was really the name of a district in Canaan, so that this division of Israel also was named after its seat. The permanent settlement of the clans loosened the old tribal bonds, and, more particularly, as one of its results, weakened the old defensive power. Judg. 1 shows what were the weak points of the Hebrew tribes in western Canaan. What happened in the case of DAN (q. v., i.) is particularly instructive. Unable to hold their own on the plain at the western base of the hill-country, they were driven back to the mountain land, but, not feeling secure even there, had no course but to migrate anew. They traversed the length of the territory of Israel, not without plundering an Ephraimite settlement, and at the source of the Jordan subdued the district of the city of Laish, which thenceforth bore the name of Dan (Judg. 1 34 17 f. Josh. 19 47). The northern tribes of Naphtali and Asher found themselves for long—the latter indeed permanently—in the minority and at a disadvantage as compared with the Canaanites (Judg. 1 31 ff.; gēlil hag-gōyim = Galilee).

It would seem that much pressure was always required before the tribes could be got to renew the 'wars of Yahwè' against the Canaanites; the comforts and the pursuits of civilised life may well have impaired the old ardour and delight in the business of war. Yet the religious conscience had not altogether gone to sleep. From time to time clan-chiefs¹ of specially strong personality appealed to it, and did not fail to arouse the old heroism. What the call to arms in the name of Yahwè was then able to accomplish is like a reflected image of the warlike spirit of the earliest days of a religion, which was characterised equally by self-surrender to God, immovable conviction of his nearness and help, death-defying courage in the fight, wild enthusiasm after victory, and scorn, contempt, and even God's curse, for all who refused to take part in the common cause.

The evidence of this is seen in the unfortunately ill-preserved song known as the Song of Deborah (see DEBORAH 1, § 3; JUDGES, § 7; POETICAL LITERATURE). Under the leadership of Barak and Deborah, the tribes bordering on the plain of Jezreel fight the Canaanites under Sisera near Taanach. The Canaanites are defeated, for Yahwè comes to the help of his people in a violent storm. It is remarkable that no mention is made of Simeon and Levi or of Judah, though there are references (in praise or in blame) to all the other tribes (four or five) in addition to those actually engaged (five or six). Here Israel already denotes more than the house of Joseph. In fact, the song seems to take for granted that all the ten tribes which are mentioned ought to have obeyed the war-summons of Yahwè; in other words, that they all belong to Israel. When and how this more extended employment of the name of Israel came in—whether gradually or as the result of a single event—we do not know; but the facts of the case seem to require the assumption that after a successfully accomplished occupation of the land the tribes were united by a solemn compact, as the result of which the name of Israel acquired a wider meaning. This may have been the historical occasion of the Elohistic narrative of the folk-moot in Josh. 24 (cp JOSHUA ii., § 10).

On the borders of the land also the Israelite tribes had their work to do—in the first instance, in the E.

9. Troubles from without. The westward migrations out of the wilderness were not yet at an end; other tribes sought to follow in Israel's footsteps. The Moabites, Ammonites, and Amalekites had taken Jericho (Judg. 3 13); the independence of Reuben was already at an end, and Benjamin had become tributary to Eglon king of Moab, when Ehud b. Gera freed his tribe from this imposition. After assassinating the king in his residence (where?), he called out the levies of Mt. Ephraim and regained command of the fords of the Jordan (Judg. 3). So Jephthah the Gileadite of Mizpah waged successful war, we are told, against the Ammonites (and Moabites?) who threatened Gilead (Judg. 11).

¹ On the transition from the rule of the heads of the leading families of the respective cities to that of tribal chiefs or tribanovoi, see GOVERNMENT, § 17.

Of greater importance, however, and richer in results, was the stand which Gideon, or Jerubbaal b. Joash, of Ophrah, a member of the Manassite clan of Abiezer, made against the Midianites. These nomads had invaded the territory of Manasseh with their flocks and tents, plundering and forcing into subjection the Israelites, who had formerly been their friends (Nu. 10^{29 ff.})—just as the house of Joseph had at an earlier date treated the Canaanites. GIDEON (q.v.), filled with the spirit of Yahwè, led the levies of his clan—300 warriors—against the Midianites, surprised them, and put them to flight (Judg. 6³⁻⁶ 11-24 7 19-83). The story is a most instructive illustration of that union of religious feeling with warlike enthusiasm which characterises the early period of the national development of Israel (cp Gideon's war-cry, 'For Yahwè and for Gideon').¹

The event enables us to perceive how great was the change which in the meanwhile had come over Israel.

10. Attempts at consolidation. Once marauding shepherds, they had become defenders of the agricultural country—defenders against the cupidity of their former allies. Gideon himself rose to great consideration. His territory embraced the richest and most fertile part of the country from the plain of Jezreel southward to Shechem—a petty kingdom, it is true, yet already signifying more than the power of the earlier Canaanite kinglets. Here, for the first time since Israel's coming into Canaan, we observe a movement clearly pointing to a firm fusion of the parts into one whole ultimately to be gained. Gideon (if Judg. 8^{22 f.} really rests upon genuine tradition) declined any hereditary lordship over his territory—anything of the sort seemed to him heathenish—but after his death his (70) sons were accepted at first as masters. Soon the idea that monarchy is better than oligarchy (Judg. 9²) found expression, and, relying upon this, Abimelech b. Gideon, of Shechem, sought to secure for himself the sovereignty over the Shechemites. The Canaanite citizens of Shechem decided in favour of their kinsman by blood, and with their support he hired a band of armed men, who, under his leadership, massacred Gideon's other descendants in Ophrah, Jotham alone escaping. Abimelech was now actually made king by the Shechemites; and for three years he ruled over 'Israel'—i.e., over the territory of Gideon (Judg. 9²²). Violence and injustice were, however, the characteristics of his rule, and, though his reign may have strengthened Israel's position in Canaan (for Abimelech doubtless felt himself to be an Israelite), this unpleasant experience of regal government cannot have disposed the Israelites to regard it with much favour (Judg. 9⁷⁻²⁰). See ABIMELECH, 2.

The Philistines, like Israel, were immigrants in Canaan. The present state of inquiry (see PHILISTINES)

11. Israel loses its independence. justifies the supposition that they first appeared in Palestine in the age of Rameses III., perhaps somewhat later than the occupation of Canaan by the Israelites.

They settled on the southern coast, and, as they were not very numerous, they soon adopted the language, religion, manners, and customs of the Canaanites.² Their strength lay in their formidable armour and in their general military superiority. The slopes of the neighbouring hill-country, peopled by clans belonging to Judah (and Dan), became their subjects. Farther north, too, they pressed on, and advanced into the hill-country, defeating the tribes of Israel properly so-called again and again. The last of these defeats reduced Israel to despair. After an unsuccessful battle the sacred ARK (q.v., § 5), then kept at Shiloh, was brought into the camp in the belief that Israel would thus become invincible. Rudely indeed was the illusion shaken (see ELI). It was an incomprehensible mystery, and morally as well as materially the power of Israel was broken.

² Cp also CAPTOR, CHERETHITES.

The land lay open to the Philistines, who stationed a governor¹ at Geba (1 S. 13^{3 f.}; Gibeah, in 10⁵; see RV mg.),² and subdued and laid under tribute the more level country N. of Shechem as far as Carmel and the plain of Jezreel. It was probably at this time that the temple of Shiloh was destroyed (Jer. 7¹²).

The Ark itself had been carried away by the Philistines, but did not, according to the narrative in 1 S. 6¹, remain long in their possession. Its return to Israel, however, is not represented as having produced any great effect. The tone of feeling was perhaps so closely akin to despair that the recovery of the symbol of the presence of Yahwè failed to revive the moral courage of the people. It is a phenomenon which we cannot help regarding as strange (see ARK, § 5).

From the midst of Israel itself was to proceed that new sense of strength which could alone nerve it to its task. The youthful people had been growing to maturity, and only needed some one to awaken its dormant energy. It was the privilege of the seer SAMUEL (q.v., i.) b. Elkanah, we are told, to find the gifted man who could do this. How early tradition represented the first meeting of Saul and Samuel is told elsewhere (see SAUL, 1, § 1). Distinguished even in outward appearance, the young Benjamin immediately approved himself to the patriotic seer as the divinely appointed prince (נָרִיץ) of Israel. Soon the hesitation which Saul showed at first was dissipated. He was, in fact, changed by the 'spirit of God' into a hero and enthusiast, who was successful in arousing a similar religious and patriotic zeal among his countrymen.

It was in the danger which threatened Jabesh in Gilead, we read, that Saul first heard the call to action. Messengers from the besieged city had passed through all Israel, but found everywhere (we may presume) the same reception as in Gibeah; there was much weeping and lamentation, but no helpful suggestion. Saul alone knew how to rouse the faint hearts of the Israelites. Like Deborah and Gideon before him, he proclaimed a holy war [cp, further, SAUL, 1, § 1, end, and notes], and the proclamation produced its wonted effect. In warlike enthusiasm Israel recovered its victorious might, and at the same time experienced the delivering presence of Yahwè. Jabesh was relieved, and the question whether the tribes should submit themselves to regal authority was decided in the affirmative. The need was indeed great. Unless some strong will should take command of such energies as still remained and unite them, Israel would be ruined. Influences which had hitherto served to unite its separate elements—faith, worship, military force, law, order—were not enough to secure prompt and united action of the aggregate. Monarchy was the one system already familiar in the life of Canaan that seemed capable of bringing the tribes together. There were no doubt some arguments urged against it—an opposition which, we may safely suppose, had two roots. For (1) the Israelite love of freedom, an inheritance derived from the desert, was incompatible with anything that brought servitude in its train, and (2) the religion of Yahwè seemed inconsistent with monarchy, the proudest fruit of heathen civilisation. Both arguments, indeed, coincided in as far as the old piety belonged to the same period with the pastoral life. Nevertheless, there can be no doubt that, at the time, the kingship of Saul was welcomed by the majority as a deliverance, as a saving ordinance of God for Israel. This view not only lies at the foundation of the representation of 1 S. 9¹⁻¹⁰ 16 11, but also appears plainly in a portion of the younger narrative in 1 S. 10²⁰⁻²⁴. A harmony between the two being nevertheless impossible, exclusive use is made in the present sketch of the older narrative.

The effect of Saul's exploit was that he was proclaimed king at Gilgal by the warriors. What means had he at his disposal for the accomplishment of his task? They were not, at the outset, great. At first his rule extended merely over Israel in the narrower sense of the word—Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh, and the more northerly tribes of Western Canaan—and the army at his command was but small, according to 1 S. 13², numbering only 3000 men. Nevertheless Saul straightway took the field against the Philistines; his son Jonathan smote their 'governor'¹ in Gibeah and thus raised the signal for revolt. But the enemy advanced in force to suppress the insurrection, and the courage of all but a faithful few of Saul's followers failed them. Jonathan changed the position of affairs by the daring exploit related in 1 S. 14¹⁻¹⁴, and it was Saul and his six hundred who completed the defeat which Jonathan had begun. Only when the rout was general did the men of Israel who had hidden themselves join their bolder brethren.

This second success of the king was more brilliant than the first; it had been gained over the dreaded tyrants of the land, and Yahwè himself had come amidst the convulsions of nature (1 S. 14¹⁵) to Saul's aid. The kingdom had greatly gained in strength. Unfortunately we know but little of what Saul did further for Israel. It is said that besides carrying on the war against the Philistines, he fought the Amalekites and restored the supremacy of Israel in the territory east of Jordan (1 S. 14^{47 f.} 15)—a statement not to be altogether set aside [cp SAUL, 1, § 3]. Saul's chief concern was, of course, the war with the Philistines. He gave the chief command of his army to his cousin Abner b. Ner; but brave men from all the tribes were welcomed to his banner (14⁵²). An independent command was certainly given for a time to David b. Yishai (Jesse) of Bethlehem,² in whom, as far as we know, we have the first case of a family of Judah coming into connection with the kingdom of Israel. Thus the course of events promoted the unification of Israel; even Judah, which until now had had but a very slight fellow-feeling with the Israelitish tribes, was brought within the range of the regal authority.

More than one reason is suggested by tradition for the introduction of the young David to his king (see DAVID, § 1 a). Suffice it to remark here that, whilst the melancholy from which Saul is said to have suffered and his change of feeling towards David are undisputed facts, the true grounds of his suspicion of David can no longer be ascertained from the tradition (1 S. 18-20). It is possible that a real or supposed intercourse of David with persons whom the king regarded as his opponents was the first cause of Saul's dislike of his son-in-law, and that jealousy of David's success in war and of his increasing popularity intensified this dislike into bitter hatred. At the fortress of Adullam, near the border of Philistia, the exile gathered round him a troop of 400 men who had nothing to lose and much to gain by fidelity to his person, and his fortunate marriage with the widow of Nabal (see DAVID, § 4, col. 1025; NABAL) secured a stable connection with the Calebites. But he could not long maintain his ground. He became the feudatory of Achish, the Philistine king of Gath, finding, however, means to win or retain the good graces of the chiefs of certain towns in Judah (1 S. 27 30). Cp Kamphausen, ZATW 6 74 ff. ('86).

Meantime the Philistines had gained a brilliant victory over Saul, who had ventured to meet them in the plain of Jezreel. His too slightly equipped troops were driven back by these formidable warriors to the mountain range of Gilboa.

Then this noble king, through whom alone Israel had gained courage to resist its tyrants, after seeing his sons fall, perished by his own hand [cp SAUL, 1, § 4]. He could not bear the thought of falling alive into the hands of 'the uncircumcised.' Well might those hated foes of Israel triumph at so complete a ruin of Saul's patriotic enterprise! And well may we be surprised at the darkness which closed in upon a champion so heroic! What was the cause of this blighting of his hopes? Had he overrated Israel's strength in comparison with that of the Philistines? Did the bow break in his hands because he had stretched it too far? We may venture to think so, and to believe that his morbid melancholy was partly to blame for this miscalculation of his powers. [For another view of the course of events see JUDAH, § 5, SAUL, § 4.]

After their victory the Philistines occupied the cities of the Plain of Jezreel and those by the Jordan¹ (e.g., Beth-shan); the hill-country, however, and the land beyond Jordan they left unmolested. Probably they were too weak in numbers to attempt more. We may be sure, however, that Israel as a whole was in at least as bad a position after this defeat as before Saul's first victories; i.e., the tribes on the W. of the Jordan, in as far as they had to serve in Saul's army, became once more tributary to the Philistines. Judah, therefore, shared this fate. This is not to be proved from the OT; but the circumstances in themselves and the subsequent events under David (2 S. 5 17 ff.) make the theory in a high degree probable.² Still, to one acquisition of the preceding period Israel held fast, as a pledge of a better future—regal government. The victorious contests of Saul with the Moabites, the Ammonites, and the Aramæans provided a sure refuge for royalty on the land to the E. of Jordan (2 S. 28 f.). It is the merit of Abner to have saved the tribes then beginning to grow together from the loss of this bond of union. The tribes of Israel on both sides of Jordan (except Judah) recognised Ishbosheth (ISHBAAL, 1) as king, while David, at the direction of an oracle of Yahwè, took up his abode at Hebron. There he was formally anointed 'king over the house of Judah' (2 S. 2 1-4).

The displeasing story of the brief reign of Ishbaal may be sought elsewhere (see ABNER, ISHBAAL, 1). After the deaths of Abner and Ishbaal, David exchanged his tribal kingdom (which he had ruled, it is said, for 7½ years) for the sovereignty which he had long coveted. With the general consent of the tribes, he was made king of all Israel at Hebron (2 S. 5 1-3). To this period belongs the remarkable notice in 2 S. 5 17, 'When the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel, all the Philistines went up to seek David.' As king of Judah, David had still been their vassal; as king of all Israel he naturally broke with his past, and so the Philistines understood the situation. And if, before the close of his tribal kingship, he had already possessed himself of the important Jebusite fortress of Zion (above the Gihon in the Kidron valley at Jerusalem), it becomes all the easier to understand the conduct of the Philistines. For it was the conquest of the Jebusites that made free communication possible between Judah and the northern tribes, so that we must regard it as one of the means by which David sought at once to announce and to achieve his object—the inclusion of the northern tribes within his kingdom. Now that this object was gained, the forbearance of the Philistines was exhausted. There were, it would seem, repeated and violent contests between them and David (cp 2 S. 5 17-25 21 15-22 23 9-17), the traditional stories of which breathe the very spirit of the old accounts of the 'Wars of Yahwè' (cp Judg.

79 ff. 1 S. 14). Finally, David, who was intimately acquainted with the military tactics of the Philistines, achieved the liberation of his people. Whether Israel freed itself by its own unaided efforts, or whether the Philistines were simultaneously attacked by the Egyptians (see DAVID, § 7, end), cannot be decided. The fact remains that David avenged the death of Saul and his sons, completed his work of delivering Israel from the Philistines, and even perceptibly curtailed their territory at the foot of the hill-country. The monarchy, to which men had clung even at the worst of their disgrace and humiliation, had stood the test, and could lay claim to the divine sanction of success. The goal set by Moses in constituting the religion had been reached: the tribes found themselves now in sure possession of the land of Canaan.

This had, however, involved a struggle of about two hundred years, in the course of which much that was old perished, and much that was new came into existence. There were now many who had little or no connection with the old state of things, whether from oneness of blood or from common memories. The old and the new clans and tribes, especially Judah and its allies—and perhaps we should here once more include the Bilhah and the Zilpah tribes (cp above, §§ 5, 7)—were united under the royal sceptre into a new whole—the people of Israel. Its roots were in part quite distinct; but the young stems, in as far as they maintained themselves, gradually grew in Canaan into one tree. The process had begun immediately on the abandonment of the nomadic life, and reached its completion under the first kings. Practically, indeed, it attained its goal when David reconstituted the tribe of Judah and closely united it with Israel, with Jerusalem for the national centre (see DAVID, § 10). And when, finally, the latest-won of all the cities of Israel became not only the royal residence but also the seat of the most venerable of Israel's sacred objects, the ARK (q.v., § 6) (2 S. 6), the history of the genesis of Israel as a nation was at an end; and now we may say that we have gained the presuppositions on which the further history of the nation rests.

The chronology of David's reign is uncertain. Let us, therefore, though this has been done elsewhere (DAVID) classify and summarise, from our present point of view, the events of David's reign. His wars were not, generally, wars of conquest; their aim was the defence of the boundaries of the kingdom, especially east of the Jordan.¹ Before David, Saul had had the same object. That the Moabites should have, been treated with such cruelty (2 S. 82; contrast 1 S. 223 f.) is surprising, but may with some plausibility be explained (see DAVID, § 8 a). The occasion of the Ammonite war is expressly told us (2 S. 10 1-5), and owing to the connection of David's misdemeanour with Bathsheba with an episode in this war, the campaigns against Ammon are described with some fulness. The war was closed with the conquest of Rabbath-ammon and the punishment of the people (see AMMON; DAVID, § 8 b). Aramæan tribes took part in the earlier battles, but without any benefit to their Ammonite allies. These were ZOBAB, BETH-REHOB, ISH-TOB, and MAACHAH i.; neighbours of the Ammonites to the north, and of Israel to the east (cp DAVID, § 8 b). In connection with this we hear of a victory over Hadadezer, king of Zobah, at Helam (2 S. 10 15-19 a 83 f.), which is probably not to be combined with the encounter described in the previous passage. This lends support to the statement in 2 S. 86 that David levied tribute from the Aramæans, even though we must admit the further statement that the Aramæan kingdom of Damascus became a permanent dependency of Israel to be open to grave suspicion.² And it is probably a trustworthy tradition that through these struggles David's warlike fame spread far and wide, and that king Toi (Tou, 1 Ch. 18) of Hamath (Hamath-zobah, 2 Ch. 83; see HAMATH) at this time did homage to David through his son Joram (Hadoram, 1 Ch. 18). Lastly, on the southern frontier, there was a long and bitter struggle with the Edomites which ended in the reduction of Idumæa to the condition of an Israelite province (see DAVID, § 8 c).

As the land of Israel received no additions under the reign of Solomon, the limits of the kingdom after the

20. Extent of wars of David may appropriately be glanced at here. The area occupied by Israel and Judah is indicated in 2 S. 24 1-9; to the SE., on the Moabite side, the valley of the Arnon marks the frontier (Josh. 13 9 16 Nu. 21 13 f.); to the E. the boundary is vague; northward it extends as far as to the head of the Jordan at Dan (cp 1 K. 15 20 2 K. 15 29); in the W. it is limited by the Phœnician territory; and southward it reached the latitude of Beersheba; the current expression is 'from Dan to Beersheba.'

The kingdom of David and Solomon, however, certainly extended its authority and sphere of influence considerably beyond these limits. The subjugation of Edom opened up the way to the Red Sea at Elath. Moab was a tributary state (2 S. 82), as was also Ammon (2 S. 17 27), unless from 2 S. 12 31 we are to infer complete subjection. The Aramæans living towards the Yarmûk, already put under restraint by Saul, became tributary to David and were compelled to surrender many districts to Israel. The boundaries of the Israelite territory eastward of Jordan were always varying; in the NE. the people were really of mixed origin. On the one hand, it seems plain that in the early period of the monarchy there was a considerable immigration of clans belonging to the house of Joseph (Nu. 32 41 f.); on the other hand, we find an Aramæan of influence (see BARZILLAI, 1) settled at Mahanaim (2 S. 17 27; cp 19 38 [37]). It is quite impossible at this point of the frontier to draw the line between Israelite territory, properly so called, and the sphere of Israelite influence beyond that territory. On the N. David's rule made itself felt to the border of the Canaanite kingdom of Hamath, on the Orontes; this appears from the current expression 'to (or from) the entering in of Hamath' (Am. 6 14 1 K. 8 65 2 K. 14 25 Judg. 3 3 Josh. 13 5). The phrase is elastic, and has received various interpretations; but originally it probably meant the point where the plateau of Ijon begins to fall away northwards towards the open valley between Lebanon and Antilibanus. The territory thus defined, though not in itself large, formed a more important kingdom than had been known in southern Syria for centuries, and such as might fitly be regarded as a splendid proof of the might of the God of Israel. (Note the enthusiasm which breathes in the oracles of Balaam.)

Let us now turn to David's internal administration. Some idea of this may be gained from the two lists of his chief officers (2 S. 8 15-18 20 23-26).

21. Internal Here special importance attaches to certain affairs. features. (1) The body-guard of 600 trained warriors (see DAVID, § 11 a), from which we must clearly distinguish the national levy which was placed under the command of Joab. (2) That priests should be included among the king's officers was a necessity, as David from the first had established a royal sanctuary, manifestly with a view to heightening the prestige of his rule. The relations between the monarchy and worship went on steadily extending in process of time until at last, under Josiah, they were decisive for the history of Judah (see below, § 38). (3) It fell to the king to administer the sacred law of Israel (2 S. 8 15 15 2-6). This was plainly his holiest duty, apart from that of leadership in war; in its discharge he was the immediate servant of God. For this function also, as a layman, he required the continual support of priests learned in the law. Unfortunately, we know very little about the range of the king's judicial activities; apart from the legal protection of the weak and needy (2 K. 6:26 ff. 8:3 ff.), he seems, in his judicial capacity, to have occupied himself chiefly in the mitigation and restriction of certain rigours of the common law (2 S. 14:1-11; cp 1 K. 20:31). Cp GOVERNMENT, § 18 ff.

For David the greatest difficulty unquestionably lay in resolving the discord between Israel and Judah. He

22. David's was greatly helped, no doubt, by his judicious choice of a capital,¹ and by the fact that Saul had now no surviving descendant capable of holding the reins of government. David also in his later years was careful to show due consideration for Israel, just as at an earlier time he had been at pains to figure not as the enemy but as the heir of Saul. From the account of the rebellion of his son ABSALOM (2 S. 15-19) it is evident that the most important accomplices belonged to Judah, not to Israel (cp, e.g., 2 S. 19:11-15 [12-16]); and from this, as well as from 1 K. 1:9 (end), it seems a legitimate inference that the interests of his own tribe were subordinated by David to those of Israel. For obvious reasons, the tension of feeling was greatest in Benjamin, the tribe of Saul, as the narratives of SHIMEI (2 S. 16:5-12) and of the revolt of SHEBA (2 S. 20) sufficiently show. The accounts of the successive rebellions dimly reflect the vicissitudes of the popular temper, and if David contrived to maintain himself upon the throne we may be sure that it was not merely on the ground of legal right, but mainly by the force of his strong personality. Marvellous indeed is the inconsistent variety of this great man's character. The reader must have vividly realised for himself the simple and half-savage manners of the period in order even to conceive how this man, whose kingly hand was deeply stained by bloody acts of injustice (not to speak of less grave errors), could have been of a deeply religious nature, and a pious Israelite. Yet even the oldest narratives furnish us with many instructive proofs that this really was the case (2 S. 9-20). How succeeding generations idealised him need not be retold here. The idealisation was by no means entirely unjustified.

The question of the succession was decided by David himself amid peculiar circumstances which have been described elsewhere (see ADONIJAH).

23. Solomon. There were two parties at court—that of Adonijah and that of Solomon. The latter obtained the sanction of the aged king by reminding him of a promise which he had given to Solomon's mother Bathsheba (1 K. 1:13-17); the result was that Solomon was anointed king, by David's order, amid the rejoicings of the people. No blood was shed at the time, but after David's death several lives had to be sacrificed in order to extinguish for ever all hostile personal interests.² The vacancies caused by the death of Joab and the deposition of Abiathar were filled up by the appointment of BENAIH (1) and ZADOK (1 K. 2:35).

The few, though doubtless important, facts respecting Solomon which no critic can gainsay will be collected elsewhere (see SOLOMON). We shall here use them with the special object of illustrating the claim now made for Israel (unified into a new people by David) to a share in the civilisation of the neighbouring Asiatic nations. The internal changes which this involved were no doubt necessary, but were, for religious reasons, encompassed with difficulty.

Close relations were maintained by the new king with Egypt and Tyre. Indeed, as far as the former country was concerned, these relations were to some extent

24. Foreign forced upon Solomon. The pharaoh himself¹ appeared in Palestine, and captured the city of GEZER, which lay not far from the commercially important road from Egypt to the Euphrates. He married his daughter to Solomon, and gave her as a dowry the city which he had conquered (1 K. 9:16). The OT is silent as to the obligations towards Egypt assumed by Solomon—for such there must have been. They would probably include the protection of the trade route, and the contribution of Israelitish troops to the pharaoh's army (Dt. 17:16),—in a word, the recognition of Egyptian supremacy.

With Hiram I. king of Tyre, who at that time maintained a certain overlordship over all Phœnician cities (cp Meyer, GA 1, § 283 ff.), Solomon had a permanent treaty. Whilst the former supplied materials and skilled workmen for Solomon's buildings, the latter repaid him with the produce of his land and the cession to him of the district of CABUL (q.v.) (1 K. 5:10 [24] ff. 9:10-14). Moreover, the two rulers undertook in partnership certain commercial enterprises (1 K. 10:22). Towards the NE. of Israel, on the other hand, the earlier struggles with Aram were renewed, for Rezon b. Eliada of Aram-Zobah founded at Damascus a new kingdom which involved Israel in severe contests. In the SE., the province of Edom revolted under the leadership of a scion of its royal house who fled to Egypt, though he seems to have had no lasting success.

Within Israel Solomon destroyed the last sporadic traces of Canaanite independence (1 K. 9:20 ff.). The

25. Internal commissariat of the court and the army was provided for by dividing the land into twelve departments (1 K. 4:7-19 27 ff.; see SOLOMON). He imported war-chariots and horses from Egypt, and stationed them in selected cities.² He built fortresses which mark out clearly the limits of his territory and the routes that he wished to protect. His realm skirted the Mediterranean from Carmel to Dor (cp DOR, § 2) (1 K. 4:11). Like other great kings, he was a builder on a large scale; but he could only carry out his projects (which included palace and temple in combination, Millo, the walls of Jerusalem, frontier fortifications, and garrison fortresses) by imposing ruthless corvée on his people. The insurrection of JEROBOAM (q.v., 1) was due to the popular indignation at this forced labour. It failed; but its energetic leader found refuge, like other political offenders, at the court of Sheshonk, in Egypt (see SHISHAK).

There were three traditional elements in Solomon's greatness, each of which continued quite late to be proverbial—wisdom, power, and wealth (1 K. 3:5-14). Of these the last can most readily be accounted for; it arose out of Solomon's share in the commerce of Western Asia. To begin with, he dominated (probably in concert with Egypt) a portion of the maritime route which was the means of communication between Egypt and Babylonia (Assyria), together with its lateral branches (Megiddo; cp TRADE). He had in his power the trade which centred in ELATH (q.v.), and even sent ships of his own by the Red Sea to OPHIR (Southern Arabia?). Finally, he appears (1 K. 10:22) to have joined Hiram in sending ships across the Mediterranean to Tarshish (Spain). How much ground there may be for the other elements in the legendary picture of him (see, e.g., 1 K. 3:15-28 10:1-13) we are hardly in a position to say. Even if we allow for exaggeration, however, it is certain that the splendour of his reign was never matched in the history of Israel. He was not indeed such a king as the prophetic writers describe by the name of 'Shepherd' (e.g., Jer. 23:4 Ezek. 34:23). His ideal was that of the ordinary Oriental monarch. He loved display, and his subjects had to defray the cost. Hence the many overseers of taxes and works who appear among his officers. Under David we hear nothing of them, nor can the difference be accidental.

Nevertheless, we must not unduly depreciate what Solomon contributed towards the accomplishment of the task allotted to Israel. As long as this people stood outside the civilised world, it was impossible that its lofty faculty should bear fruit in the history of mankind. It was much that Solomon by the material greatness of his reign gave that compactness to the body politic which Israel needed as a condition of progress. As for religion, by building the temple at Jerusalem, which was at first nothing but the court sanctuary, Solomon closely associated together monarchy and cultus, while at the same time he provided a sacred place that became for a distant future the most precious token of the divine presence and help.

Israel's transition to civilisation is an event of great importance, the effects of which may here be briefly elucidated. In different spheres

26. The new civilisation. There arose the same question: What can Israel adopt from the heathen civilisation of Canaan without impairing or losing its faith in God? There were not lacking indeed, now and in the centuries that followed, some who clung to the simple piety of the wilderness (shepherds, Rechabites, Nazirites); but theirs was a lost cause; the mass of the people decided for civilisation. Along with the agriculture of the Canaanites, Israel adopted the cultus of the land of Canaan (holy places, feasts, sacrificial customs), and transferred it to Yahwè. No doubt there were priests who did the best they could to correct this cultus in accordance with later religious views (Ex. 34.14 ff. 23.14-19); but the superstitious multitude certainly imbibed the fancy that the fruitfulness of the soil depended on the continuance of the old religious ceremonies. Here lay the root of that hard struggle between Yahwè and the 'Baalim' which even the prophets were unable to end.

There were two other influences which Israelitish religion had to contend with. First, political friendship and commercial intercourse with neighbouring states involved, according to the ideas of the time, some recognition of the divinities of those states and of their cultus; these became guests of Israel (cp 1 K. 11.7 ff.). This did not accord, however, with the strict conception of the old ordinance of monolatry (Ex. 34.14). Next, Israelitish law had to undergo a complete transformation before it could meet the requirements of a country of agriculturists. With a view to this, Israel had again to go to the school of its heathen neighbours, who alone had the knowledge and experience required for such a reform. 'Criminal law' was perhaps less affected by these changes; but 'civil law' had to be largely modified, in order to suit entirely new conditions. That this process gradually went forward in an Israelitish sense is vouched for by the collection of laws in Ex. 21-23, and also by the fact that the prophets of the eighth century fought for the law of Yahwè then in force in Canaan as old and well known. Israel's peaceful labours and increasing security in Canaan produced the impression that the 'wars of Yahwè' had achieved their object. Hence more and more Yahwè lost his significance as a god of war, and the sacred ark became a symbol of divinity in general (see ARK).

The engrafting of Canaanitish civilisation on the Israelitish stock produced its fairest fruit in a store of legends, large fragments of which are still extant (cp GENESIS, § 5). It was formerly supposed that we had here a strictly Israelite heirloom. But how improbable it is that Israel should have brought with it from the desert legends which presuppose civilised conditions! Add to this that Assyrio-Babylonian literature has revealed to us similar stories of such high antiquity that there can be no doubt of the dependence of the biblical narratives (J in Gen. 1-11) on them.¹ It is natural to suppose that Israel received these legends from the lips of the Canaanites, transforming them by infusing into them its own religious ideas. Presumably this was how the stories of the patriarchs arose. (See ABRAHAM, ISAAC, JACOB.) It is obvious that Abraham is closely connected with the primitive sanctuary at Hebron, whilst Isaac belongs to Beersheba, and Jacob to Bethel. The Canaanitish meaning of these names [the original form of which is obscure] must be very uncertain. It is clear, however, that when Jacob received the additional name of Israel, it was because this patriarch was the first to be fully adopted by Israel proper, as a sign of which he is represented as father of the twelve Israelitish tribes. It is clear, too, that in constituting these legendary figures its own ancestors, Israel attached to them all that was significant for its own individuality and history—origin, wanderings, fusions and partings, religion and cultus. To them was ascribed the divine favour and the human virtues in which Israel prided itself. The variety in their treatment, and the specific individuality that was developed for each, may perhaps be accounted for by variety of origin. Abraham became a type or ideal of Israelitish piety; Jacob more a picture of the actual Israelite of history.

These transformations may have been accomplished between the tenth and the eighth centuries B. C. They teach us not only with what delight and ease Israel accommodated itself to its new relations, but also how strong and yet assimilative a faculty was at the service of the religious convictions of its leaders. That these were to be sought, in the first instance, among the priests and prophets cannot be doubted.

With the death of Solomon, the unity of the monarchy and of the nation was at an end. Popular sentiment

28. The Disruption. in Israel was against Rehoboam; Israel did not even come to Shechem at his request, but he at Israel's; Israel, not he, laid down the condition; the suppression of the revolt under Jeroboam had left behind it angry feelings towards the house of David. The old men, in their mild wisdom, hoped the best from a policy of compliance. Rehoboam, however, sided with the younger men, who recommended him to try intimidation. This was the signal for the open rupture. The excitement was great. Adoniram, the overseer of the public works, was stoned; Rehoboam himself had to seek safety in precipitate flight. That Jeroboam, the former opponent of Solomon, was proclaimed king over the northern tribes, including Benjamin, shows clearly the connection of the movement with earlier events (cp JEROBOAM, 1).

The division of the nation into two kingdoms was regarded differently by the two parties. The Judæan view of it comes out in Is. 7.17 1 K. 12.19 (cp 1 K. 12.15); the Israelite in Dt. 33.7, and in the Ahijah-story (1 K. 11.29 ff.). Although the latter owes its present form to Judæan editorial work, it yields the very interesting fact that an Israelitish prophet took occasion from Solomon's policy to condemn in the name of Yahwè any longer domination of Israel by the royal family of Judah: he regarded, that is, Solomon's proceedings as a violation of divine ordinances. But if the kingship of Jeroboam was demanded by Yahwè through his prophets, it was legitimate in the best sense of the word, and not at all a revolt against Yahwè. At the same time Israel reasserted its old right to provide for its own government, which did not, however, exclude a willingness to recognise the Davidic rule in Judah (1 K. 12.16)—a remarkable fact which shows how quickly and how deeply this new tribe of David's creation had struck root. Not even the well-earned popularity of David, however, had been able to fill up the gulf between Israel and Judah. By his magnetic personality he had drawn and held together the two parts for a time; but there had been no real blending. Whilst Israel, with or without Judah, felt itself to be complete both in religion and in politics, for Judah the separation meant a serious loss. Hence the longing for reunion continued to live in Judah; the weaker part forgot not the time of its splendour, and afterwards included the revival of it among its hopes.

It is possible that Jeroboam I. treated the ancient rights of the tribes and clans with more consideration than Solomon; but evidence is wanting. In matters of cultus he trod in the footsteps of David and Solomon. According to 1 K. 12.25 ff., he turned Bethel (and Dan?)¹ into a royal sanctuary (Am. 7.13), erected two golden oxen (see CALF, GOLDEN) in honour of Yahwé, appointed priests as royal officials in connection with them, and held at Bethel, as Solomon had held at Jerusalem (1 K. 8.65), a great harvest thanksgiving festival for Israel. The capital of the new kingdom was Shechem.

The disagreement between the two kingdoms made war inevitable. Rehoboam regarded the Israelites as rebels; hence actual hostilities may have been opened by him, as the late addition in 1 K. 12.21-24 assumes. The short statements, 1 K. 14.30 15.6 f. 16, however, are certainly to be understood of a state of war, not of a series of important battles; and matters remained in this condition under Rehoboam's immediate successors, Abijam and Asa, down to Jehoshaphat (some sixty years). At the same time Rehoboam seems to have sought to render still more complete the readiness for war that he owed to Solomon (2 Ch. 11.5-12), and so to secure the existence of the weaker kingdom of Judah.

If, however, its position was not seriously endangered by Israel during his time, this was probably in consequence of Egypt's reasserting itself once more as overlord in Southern Syria. Shishak had, according to 1 K. 14.25 ff., laid Judah under contribution; according to his own monument, preserved at Karnak, he had traversed the whole of Palestine, pillaging and plundering (see SHISHAK). This marauding expedition, however, had no permanent result: lasting and effective protection for Judah could be found only in some greater power in Syria itself. Hence the kings (even Rehoboam?) attached importance to inducing the Aramean kingdom of Damascus to take up an attitude friendly to them and hostile to Israel. Physical conditions favoured this endeavour, as the Arameans—Israel's enemies from of old—were cut off from the maritime district by the intervening Israelitish territory. Besides, the Judæan king, Asa, appealed (1 K. 15.19) to a treaty already formed between his father Abijah and Tabrimmon (Tāb-Rammān) of Damascus. These attacks from the E. fully occupied the northern kingdom, and seemed to guarantee a quiet life for Judah. But appearances were delusive: the clever calculations of the politicians of Judah proved incorrect. For the fierce and prolonged Syrian war not only most painfully weakened the northern kingdom, but also drew Judah into the current of Israelitish politics. And so it happened that the disruption of the kingdom is closely connected with the decline of the power of Israel as a whole in Palestine. The course of events in detail was briefly as follows.

That Israel kept a good watch over its eastern frontier we see from the measures taken by Baasha, who had slain Nadab the son of Jeroboam I. during the siege of the Philistine town of Gibbethon, and was reigning over Israel with TIRZAH [q.v.] as his capital. He prudently came to terms with the Arameans (1 K. 15.19), and then, taking up the war against Judah with energy, cut off its people from all communication with the north. In this extremity king ASA (q.v.) sent all the treasure that remained in the royal palace and temple to BENHADAD I. (q.v.), king of Damascus, with the petition that he would 'break his league with Baasha' (1 K. 15.19). Benhadad thereupon overran the territory of Israel at the upper Jordan as far as the W. shore of the lake of Gennesaret (see CHINNEROTH), and compelled Baasha to break off the war with Judah. Asa was thus enabled to push forward his frontier a little farther N. (see ASA). Baasha on his side (we may suppose) prosecuted the war with the Arameans (cp 1 K. 16.5), and thus Judah enjoyed comparative peace (1 K. 15.16-23).

The rise of the dynasty of Omri was important for Judah as well as for Israel. The new king was a successful warrior, who, after a sharp struggle for the throne (ELAH, 2; ZIMRI, 3; TIBNI; 1 K. 16.8-22), was proclaimed king by the army before Gibbethon. The normal relation between Israel and Judah had hitherto been one of hostility. But we find that when Jehoshaphat, son of Asa king of Judah, went to Samaria to meet Omri's son Ahab (1 K. 22.2 ff. 45), there was an alliance presupposed between the two kingdoms, an alliance, however, in which it was Israel's place to dictate and Judah's to yield. This dependence of Judah is shown by the military service rendered to Israel on several occasions during the Syrian wars (1 K. 22.2 K. 8.28 f.) and against Moab (2 K. 3.4 ff.); probably it did not extend further. Nor can it be decided whether the peace between the two kingdoms was brought about by war or by negotiation, or whether Omri already had views tending in the direction of reconciliation. We know but too little about this king, who had the wisdom to make Samaria his capital, and also brought Moab again under tribute, but was not, it seems, a conspicuously successful king (see OMRI). Ahab, at any rate, stands out in the meagre narratives of the Syrian wars as so strong a personality that one feels inclined to trace the reconciliation with Judah to his firm and skilful policy. The losses and concessions of Omri (1 K. 20.34) may well have made this step a necessity. The result was that in several successful campaigns Ahab drove the Arameans out of the territory of Israel and compelled them to restore the cities which they had previously conquered (1 K. 20.2-34). He established with Benhadad II.¹ (1 K. 20.34) a commercial compact, with equal mutual rights, between Damascus and Israel, and formed a friendly relation with Ethbaal (Ithuba'al) of Tyre, whose daughter Jezebel he received in marriage (1 K. 16.31). Meantime the contemporary king of Judah made an attempt to renew the Red Sea trade (see JEHOSEPHAT, 1). Thus for a time internal peace enabled both kingdoms to revive the famous traditions of the days of Solomon.

Then there rose out of the north, more and more audibly, the angry mutterings of a dreadful war storm.

30. New complications; Assyria. Shalmaneser II., king of Assyria (860-824), following in the footsteps of his father Ašur-našir-pal, had reached in his victorious career the neighbourhood of the middle Orontes. At Karkar (854 B.C.) his course was indeed checked by a large army of the allied kingdoms of middle and southern Syria, the latter represented by Ahab its overlord; but the attack was resumed in 849 and 845 (see AHAB). This was a summons to union for the southern kingdoms of Syria; in the presence of the incessantly advancing power from the north, the old distinctions between great and small must disappear. The enmity between Israel and Aram had rooted itself too deeply, however, to be dispelled forthwith by the recognition of their common danger. Boundary disputes raked up the embers of hate and easily fanned them into flame, and in one of such the heroic Ahab, who had gone forth in company with Jehoshaphat of Judah to the reconquest of the city of Ramoth in Gilead, met his death (see AHAB, RAMOTH-GILEAD). Nevertheless, the friendly relation between Israel and Judah continued. It had been sealed by the marriage of Jehoshaphat's son

Jehoram with Athaliah the daughter of Ahab. Yet Israel's star was obviously on the decline. In the reign of Ahaziah the son of Ahab, MESHACH king of Moab threw off the yoke of Israel (cp the Mesha inscription), and the attempt made by Ahaziah's successor Joram, with the help of Jehoshaphat, to invade and subdue Moab from the south, failed (2 K. 34-27). Not long afterwards Edom freed itself from Judah, and even the Canaanite city of Libnah, on the western frontier of Judah, asserted its independence (2 K. 820-22). On the E. frontier of Israel, however, the Syrians were unable to make any advance, as the attacks of Shalmaneser II. were renewed every three or four years.¹ When Hazael had succeeded Benhadad at Damascus (844-843 B.C.), Joram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah encountered him at Ramoth in Gilead, the very place where Ahab had received his death-wound from the Syrians. Now, however, Israel was in possession of the city, which was not the case in the time of Ahab. Israel's position had, therefore, improved in this direction.

The subversion of the dynasty of Omri by Jehu ben-Nimshi gave a severe shock to the established order of

31. Revolution things. The story of this bold warrior's deeds of blood is told elsewhere (see of Jehu. JEHU). 'Come with me,' he said to Jehonadab ben-Rechab (see JONADAB, 3), 'and see my zeal for Yahwè' (2 K. 1016). This self-laudation was not entirely groundless. An oracle of Elisha suggested his revolt (see below), and the violent extirpation of Baal-worship is in the spirit of a traditional action of Elijah. In external affairs the headstrong usurper had to moderate his energy. Hazael of Damascus was defeated (842; cp CHRONOLOGY, § 28) and besieged by Shalmaneser II.; and, though the siege failed, Jehu found it advisable to buy the favour of the Assyrian by payment of tribute (cp the 'Black Obelisk' of Shalmaneser, AB 1). In Judah too the sanguinary measures of Jehu gave the signal for violent disputes about the crown. On the death of Ahaziah, Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, had the descendants of David slain in Jerusalem, one alone escaping the hands of the assassins. Perhaps she hoped, as queen of Judah, to be able to take vengeance for her kindred on Jehu. We only hear, however, of the vengeance by which she was herself overtaken. After the lapse of six years the chief priest Jehoiada proclaimed Joash, the one Davidic prince who had escaped, king, and ordered Athaliah to be slain in the royal palace. Thus the kingdom of Judah was, after a brief interruption, recovered for the family of David. These bloody revolutions, however, weakened the powers of resistance of both kingdoms, and loosened the restraints of religion and morality; and when Hazael of Damascus ceased to be disturbed by Shalmaneser (i.e., in 839) Israel and Judah had to feel the full weight of his arm. Hazael conquered the east of the Jordan (2 K. 1032 f.²), and traversed the west as far as Gath; indeed he was restrained from an attack on Jerusalem only by great presents (2 K. 1217 [18] f.). This obsequiousness on the part of Joash was regarded, perhaps, as cowardly and premature, and he paid the penalty with his life (2 K. 1220 [21] f.; cp JOASH).

Amaziah, the son of Joash, was indeed admitted to the throne; but his courage and daring, although they probably gained Judah some advantage over Edom, brought, later, the greatest humiliation on his country. A wanton challenge, sent to Joash king of Israel, was expiated by the captivity of the king and the occupation of Jerusalem by the foe. No wonder that Amaziah fell a prey to the same fate as his father (2 K. 1419; cp AMAZIAH, 1).

² [These verses are evidently out of their original connection. Instead of 'to cut Israel short' (חַיֵּשׁ), read 'to be wroth with Israel' (חַיֵּשׁ), with Targ. and Hitzl.]

It is, however, surprising that the crown did not now become the prize of ambitious politicians or daring soldiers, as was the case in Israel. That the people of Judah did not renounce the Davidic family throws a fresh light on the popularity of its founder. Amaziah's son, Azariah or Uzziah (see UZZIAH, 1), was raised to the throne; and through him a last period of quiet and of conscious strength was opened for Judah, as it had already opened for Israel. It is true, Azariah was probably in some degree dependent on Israel. Still, we may infer from Is. 2 that his was a prosperous reign, and we know from 2 K. 1422 that he extended the influence of Judah once more to Elath on the Red Sea. Of the Israelitish kings Joash and Jeroboam II., we learn that they obtained fresh successes against the Aramæans when the Assyrian kings Rammân-nirâri III. and Ašur-dan III. fought against Damascus in 806 (or 803) and 773.¹ Jeroboam II. is even eulogised as the 'deliverer' of his people; he is regarded as having restored in its fullest extent the earlier dominion of Israel (2 K. 1322-25 1423 ff.; cp Am. 613).

These years of peace and renewed vigour revived the pride and courage of the northern Israelites. But they were due, after all, to the weakness and

32. Decline inertness into which the Assyrian kings of Israel. had lapsed (772-746), and when in 745 Tiglath-pileser III. (on the question of his original name see PUL) mounted the throne, the Syrian states could see that a last life-and-death struggle had begun. The internal disorganisation was heightened by dissensions within the parties which recommended, now adhesion to Assyria or to Egypt, now self-defence in alliance with the states of Syria, as the one means of escape from the danger of annihilation. Thus Menahem, who had marched 'from Tirzah' (but see TAPPUAH) against the regicide Shallum, and dealt with him as he had dealt with Zechariah (2 K. 158-15), placing the crown on his own head, sought in 738 (on the date see CHRONOLOGY, § 33) to prop himself on Assyria by paying tribute to Tiglath-pileser (2 K. 1519 f.). On this occasion, we are told, the king of Assyria 'came into the land' of Israel for the first time. Menahem's son Pekahiah was made away with, however, by the Israelitish-Aramæan party, and Pekah son of Remaliah put in his place (see, however, PEKAHIAH). We learn the aims of this party from the war begun by its leaders, Rezon of Damascus and Pekah of Israel, against Ahaz of Judah. They wished to turn the ruling dynasty out of Jerusalem, and place the son of Tâb'el (probably=Rezon; Wi. AT Untersuch. 74 f.) on the throne of David, because Ahaz of Judah had shown himself averse to their plan of holding together in alliance against Assyria (Is. 7). Ahaz flung the warning of the prophet Isaiah to the winds (cp AHAZ, § 2 f.), and, like a clever politician, asked Tiglath-pileser III. to help him against his too powerful enemies, who were now joined in the S. by the Edomites (2 K. 165 ff.). Tiglath-pileser added the northern and eastern frontiers of Israel to his kingdom, sent the principal inhabitants into exile in Assyria (2 K. 1529), marched into the S. of Palestine, appointed Hoshea, one of the Assyrian party, king of Israel (2 K. 1530), and put an end to the kingdom of Damascus (734-732). Hoshea submissively paid tribute for some years till he was seduced from his allegiance by the promises of 'So, king of Egypt.' Hitherto this king has been taken to be pharaoh Šabako, or some Egyptian petty-king. But Winckler (Musri, etc., MVG. '98, i.) finds in him an officer of the N. Arabian land of Mušr, which was unwilling to let itself be driven by the Assyrians from the trade-routes of S. Syria. Shalmaneser IV. (727-722) besieged Hoshea in Samaria for three years. It fell to his successor Sargon, however (722-705), to reduce the city (722). The upper classes (to the number of 27,290) were deported to Mesopotamia and Media, whilst foreigners from the banks of the Euphrates were settled on the vacant lands. By this policy the Assyrian kings sought not only to break the power of a subjugated nation, but also to secure the subjection of its country by filling it with people who could only preserve themselves by close adherence to Assyria.

Such was the end of the N. Israelitish kingdom. It shared the fate of the other states of northern and mid

33. Effect on Syria. It fell a prey to the Assyrian policy of conquest, after the wars with the Aramæans had drained a large measure of its strength. This must be our verdict as long as we take into account only the action and reaction of ordinary forces. In Israel, however, there were not lacking men who saw in the fate of Israel a divine judgment. Of such, we know the prophets Amos and Hosea. They and their successors have so much importance in the history of Israel that we cannot be content with a mere mention of their names; but, in order to do them justice, it is necessary to reserve a fuller treatment of their position and activity for another place (see PROPHETS).

The chief point to notice respecting the prophets of the eighth and seventh centuries is this—that with one accord they took a view of the situation of Israel which was repugnant in the highest degree to the mass of the people. That no less a punishment than annihilation was impending over Israel (Am 5:1-4, Is. 5:1-7) was a statement that could not be reconciled with the popular view of the nature of Yahwè. That men could be found to come forward with such a message is a phenomenon which is especially strange in Judah, because the expeditions of the Assyrians against southern Syria, subsequently to 734, were not dangerous to that kingdom. It is true, Assyria had, since 722, become the next neighbour of Judah, which had to send its yearly tribute to Nineveh; but, for all that, Ahaz could boast that he had secured his land, his capital, and his throne, whilst his opponents, first Damascus, and then Israel, had been extinguished by Assyria. Facts spoke for Ahaz, not for Isaiah the prophet (Is. 7:1-7); and the multitude, as the fashion then was, interpreted this as showing that Judah had received a guarantee of the divine goodwill towards it, and a recognition of its superior piety. The proud and powerful Israel had fallen; the despised Judah had been delivered. For the present and for the future Judah had become heir to Israel, for good as well as for evil. As people went up to Jerusalem from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria to sacrifice to Yahwè (Jer. 41:5), many—such as found it possible to do so—would remove their home from Israel into Judah on the conquest of Samaria (722); for the hopes of the whole nation naturally rested in the remnant that had been found worthy of obtaining deliverance. All this raised the self-respect of the men of Judah and enhanced the importance of Jerusalem.

34. Inter- But at the same time, just as before in national the case of Israel (see above, § 32), there arose political parties, which by their politics. struggles used up what strength remained to the diminished people. As Hezekiah ben Ahaz (from 720 B.C. onwards, see CHRONOLOGY, § 36) was no friend of Assyria, we can understand that Judah did not throw away opportunities of manifesting its aspirations after independence. About the time of the revolt of Hamath, Merodach-baladan made himself master of Babylon and sought (circa 720 B.C.) to incite Hezekiah to a common contest with Sargon (cp Wi. AT Untersuch. 135 ff.). To what extent Hezekiah entered into these negotiations we are not told; but very soon Sargon re-established his dominion over Syria, and therefore over Judah, after defeating at Raphia the Egyptians (or, according to Winckler [see above, § 32] the army of the N. Arabian Musr; 720 B.C.). The year 713 found Hezekiah negotiating again with Ashdod and Egypt (again, according to Winckler, the N.

Arabian Musr), but the conquest of Ashdod in 711 (Is. 20, see ASHDOD) put a speedy end to the warlike programmes. Hezekiah no longer held aloof from the mighty movement that shook the whole Assyrian empire on the death of Sargon in 705. Indeed, partly with his own consent, partly against his will, he was regarded as the head of the allied forces of southern Syria, which looked on this occasion of revolt with all the more confidence in a successful issue, because Babylon had risen once more in the East, and Egypt (or rather Musr-Meluhha in N. Arabia) too was taking an active interest in the concert of nations. In 701 Sennacherib, Sargon's successor (704-682), having first of all reduced to allegiance the eastern part of his kingdom, set out for Syria. There his first step was to compel to submission by the battle of Eltekeh (cp Josh. 19:43 ff. ?), and lay under tribute, the S. Syrian states—among them Hezekiah, whose mercenaries refused obedience (Del. Ass. HWB 171; 2 K. 18:14-16). Later, he sent a division of his army from Lachish against Jerusalem, and demanded the surrender of the city, so as to secure his rear. Isaiah exhorted the resourceless Hezekiah to hold fast, and predicted the preservation of Jerusalem; and in point of fact, perhaps on learning of disturbances in Babylon, Sennacherib withdrew (2 K. 18:17-19:36 ff.). As it is improbable that Tirhakah, who apparently did not complete the overthrow of Egypt until 691, took part in the events of 701, the conjecture has been advanced that on a later expedition to the SW. of his kingdom, undertaken against Egypt, Sennacherib once more threatened Jerusalem in vain, being compelled to retreat by a severe misfortune, as is intimated in 2 K. 19:36-35 and Herod. 2:141.¹

The preservation of Jerusalem from the Assyrians made not the slightest change in Judah's political position. On the other hand, it was a success of the greatest moment for the cause of Yahwè, and of far-reaching importance for the establishment in Judah of the religious ideas of the prophets. For, whilst the prophetic movement came to an end in Israel with the dissolution of the state, in Judah it had time to gather strength and prove itself in overcoming internal opposition. Thus there was formed by degrees that 'remnant,' the seed of the future, which could be entrusted with the intelligent guardianship of Israel's historical inheritance. Isaiah was the originator of this movement in Judah. With enthusiasm and with finished eloquence, he spoke of Yahwè as the sovereign of the world, and of the power of faith or trust in him, also of the vanity of the worship of images (cp HOSEA, § 7) and the transitory nature of all worldly might, of the imperishable character of Yahwè's work in Israel (=Judah, Jerusalem), and the perfection of the future kingdom of David. Nor were those who adopted his ideas few or lacking in influence. The measures, too, of Hezekiah, that aimed at a purification of the cultus (2 K. 18:4) owed their inception to the effect produced by Isaiah's labours; though the preference for Jerusalem as the only place of worship is certainly more in accord with the popular interpretation of the experiences of the last generation and the interests of the royal priesthood. On this question cp HEZEKIAH.

The broad stream of popular life inclined for the present to the other or heathen side, if we may so call it. In its sense of weakness the people looked for divine help, and did not omit to propitiate Yahwè, as popular conceptions of him required, with costly sacrifices (Mic. 6:6-8). Political parties demanded close alliance with Assyria (or Egypt), while the prophetic party taught that Assyria or Egypt was to be regarded merely as an instrument in the hand of Yahwè. Manasseh b. Hezekiah, who came to the throne about the same time as Esarhaddon

(681-668) and reigned till 642, joined unreservedly the ranks of the partisans of Assyria, and was able to carry out to the full the policy begun by his grandfather Ahaz. Perhaps Esarhaddon's expeditions against Egypt in 674 and 672 led him to show marked favour to everything foreign. In honour of Assyria, he made arrangements in his temple for the Assyrian star worship (2 K. 21 5 23¹²). The approval of his people he hoped to secure by once more permitting and patronising the traditional forms of Canaanitish-Israelitish cultus, the so-called worship of the high places that Hezekiah had restricted. Even the Canaanitish cult of Moloch (= Melek, King), child sacrifice, was transferred to Israel's god Yahwé (Jer. 7³¹ 19 5 Ez. 20 26 ff. 30 f.; cp Dt. 12 29-31), and the king himself, like Ahaz before him, set his people the example of this self-sacrificing worship, which was supposed to be well-pleasing to God (2 K. 21 6 16 3). It only indicates the terrible anxiety that oppressed the minds of the people that men did not refuse to offer even their own children in sacrifice to the gods. Manasseh further constituted the temple of Yahwé a sanctuary for the most diverse cults, so as to accommodate with his altars and images the manifold relations of the international trade into which Judah was now led as a dependency of the Assyrian empire. Never had the attempts of the kings of Israel to initiate the people into the civilisation of W. Asia succeeded as they did under Manasseh (2 K. 21 9)—for a considerable time. In religion, however, the faith and simple piety of the people were in the greatest danger. Still, their representatives knew the meaning of the struggle, and showed themselves ready not only to contend but also to suffer for their cause. Neither compulsory measures nor the prospect of external advantages made them waver. Manasseh, however, persevered in his policy throughout his whole reign. If the Chronicler relates the contrary (2 Ch. 33 11-17), he is only reproducing the legend that grew up, under the influence of later theories of divine retribution, out of an incident which was probably simply this, that Manasseh favoured the revolt of Šamaš-šum-ukin against his brother Ašur-bānī-pal, and then obtained pardon of the latter at Babylon. Amon ben Manasseh followed in his father's footsteps; but he soon fell a victim (640) to a court conspiracy. This was, however, suppressed by the people, who came to the succour of the Davidic dynasty, and proclaimed Josiah. Amon's eight-years old son, king.

By this revolution the Assyrian party was thrust aside: it had to give place, in the government and at the court of the young king, to men of national sentiment or prophetic ideas.

37. Religious reform. The fruit of this change was nothing less than the laws of Deuteronomy and the cultus reform of Josiah (621 B.C.). From 2 K. 22 f. we learn only how the king was won for the cause, not who it was that gave the real impulse in this praiseworthy enterprise; but we can have no doubt that it was the prophetic party, though it may seem strange that we see them putting their own hands to the work of reforming the existing conditions rather than, as one might expect, enunciating ideas and principles. It was really necessary, however, for the prophets, if they were not to speak and suffer in vain, to descend from the bold heights of their ideals into the sphere of rude reality. In this they remained true to their old demands with all their rigidity. Fighting for Yahwé and the true Israel, they sought to banish every heathenish element from the popular life, or, where that was impossible, transform it—i.e., make it Israelitish. From this point of view we can understand how, despite previous procedure and their own ideas (e.g., Hos. 8 12 Is. 1 12 Jer. 7 21-23), they made questions of cultus a matter for legislation. The cultus was, as it were, the open door through which heathenism was continually breaking in upon Israel, as the experiences of the times of Manasseh just past had abundantly shown. To close this door the prophets certainly needed powerful allies—namely, the priesthood of the royal temple at Jerusalem and the king himself. The priests were needed, because the future position of the temple and its officers was in question; and the king, because without him uniform changes in the cultus of the whole people would at that time have been quite impossible. Originally, indeed, the position of prince brought with it no right to interfere with the cultus: the management (of the cultus) was the affair of the families and clans, and later, in Canaan, of the tribes and cantons.¹ The kings, however, without in any way changing the old state of things, had added royal sanctuaries where, apart from the cultus of their own clan, they could on special occasions assemble the entire nation to a great sacrificial festival. According to the varying exigencies of the political alliances of the day, they even practised the cult of foreign deities. Thus it was that the kings acquired a claim and found an occasion to interfere in matters of cultus outside the limits of their own clan. (See the history of Jehu, Joash b. Ahaziah, Hezekiah, Manasseh.) It was these relations that made it imperative that the originators of the reform of the cultus should secure the introduction of the laws by the king himself. (On the nature and significance of the new law book, see DEUTERONOMY, § 4 ff.)

The inception and execution of the religious reforms of Josiah coincided with occurrences of the gravest import within the Assyrian empire.

38. Kings as religious leaders. About the year 645 B.C. Psa(m)etiik I. had asserted his independence of Assyria and again reunited Egypt under one sceptre. Soon afterwards his army advanced into Syria.

Herodotus (2 157) is to be believed, siege was laid to the city of ASHDOO (q.v. col. 327) for twenty-nine years (640-610?)—whether the defenders were Assyrians or a native power we do not know. It would not be astonishing to find that, even thus early, Assyria had refrained from opposing the forward movement of Psa(m)etiik, for it was about this time that barbarian hordes of Scythian origin poured down from the north of Asia into the Assyrian empire like a devastating flood (Herod. 1 103 ff. 4 1; cp ASSYRIA, § 34, EGYPT, § 67). Even if in doing so they compelled the Medes, who were also now threatening Assyria, to look to their own safety, these wild and rapacious invaders must inevitably have had the effect of greatly loosening the reins of Assyrian authority in W. Asia, and probably also, in some parts, of breaking them altogether. It would appear that Psa(m)etiik I. succeeded by gifts and entreaties in averting the Scythian irruption from Egypt; but Ashkelon was plundered by them. They must undoubtedly, therefore, have at least touched on the borders of Judah also, but without penetrating into the hill-country properly so called. Under the awe-inspiring impression produced by these new invaders—they were Aryans, not Semites—the prophets Zephaniah and Jeremiah, about 630-626, once more renewed the vaticinations of their predecessors as to the coming judgments of Yahwé, which, following the new development in the knowledge of God and of the world, they now represented as a universal assize or judgment of all nations. If the Babylonians found it possible to cast off the Assyrian yoke with impunity and establish a kingdom of their own under Nabopolassar in 625 (cp ASSYRIA, § 34), assuredly some increased freedom of movement must have been possible about the same time also to Syria, which lay so much farther off; and it is, therefore, not in the least improbable that Josiah was able to lay hands upon parts of what had formerly been the kingdom of Israel without resistance (cp 2 K. 23 15 19 ff.). Everywhere the collapse of the Assyrian power began to be reckoned upon as certain. As soon as the hordes of the Scythians had passed, or had reached some point of rest, Cyaxares of Media, in alliance with Nabopolassar, set out against Nineveh to strike the decisive blow. That powerful fortress was taken in 607-606 and levelled with the ground. The sovereigns of Assyria then disappeared from history. Not, however, the empire over which they had ruled; the victors took possession of their heritage. Egypt also claimed its share in what the Assyrian kings had been compelled to relinquish; Necho II. (609-595) led an army against the lands bordering on the Euphrates. At Megiddo in the plain of Jezreel he was opposed (608) by JOSIAH (q.v.), who, we may be sure, acted as he did trusting in Yahwè, and because he regarded it as his mission to avert a renewal of foreign dominion over Syria. The Greek and Carian mercenaries of Necho proved, however, too powerful for him. He had to pay the penalty for his bold endeavour with his life. He was deeply mourned by his people, who found themselves misled (2 K. 23 29 f.; cp. Ch. 35 20-27 1 Esd. 1 25-32) by the hopes (pitched far too high) which the reign of the pious Josiah had inspired. (See JOSIAH.) Jehoahaz, son and successor of the lost king, was forced to do homage to the new master of S. Syria, whom he overtook at RIBLAH (q.v.) on the Orontes. Necho, who was on his northward march, sent him to Egypt as a prisoner (2 K. 23 31-34 Jer. 22 10 f.), filling his place, as tributary king of Judah, by the choice of his more trustworthy elder brother Jehoiakim (Eliakim) (2 K. 23 34 f.).

Until the fall of Nineveh Necho was left undisturbed in the gratification of his ambition: the whole of Syria up to the Euphrates became Egyptian. No sooner, however, had Nabopolassar seized the Babylonian crown than he despatched his son and successor Nebuchadrezzar II. (604-562) to check the Egyptian advance. At the battle of Carchemish on the Euphrates (605) Necho was defeated and compelled to abandon Syria (Jer. 46 2)—perhaps, however, not all at once, for, according to 2 K. 24 1, it was not till about 600 B. C. that Jehoiakim acknowledged the suzerainty of Nebuchadrezzar.

Thus the result of these great changes, as far as Judah was concerned, was disappointing; in spite of the well-meant reforms of Josiah, and in spite of the downfall of Nineveh, it found itself politically in no better case than under Hezekiah and Manasseh; the only difference was that Babylon had stepped into the place of Nineveh, and that the Egyptians had once more, and with emphasis, resumed their old relations with Syria. The religious disappointment to which we have referred (§ 39, end) was followed, as might be expected, by a strong reaction (Jer. 44 15-19), which vented its rage especially on the prophets, as the Book of Jeremiah repeatedly shows. The policy adopted by Manasseh, but consistently opposed by the prophets, of friendship with foreigners, seemed only too clearly justified by facts. Once more, therefore, we see renewed at the close of the history of Judah the old coquetry with two great foreign powers,—with this difference, that the balance of favour now inclined towards the newly-recruited Egyptian empire.

Three years passed, and Jehoiakim renounced his allegiance (598). Nebuchadrezzar's army promptly

41. Revolts. invested Jerusalem; the boy-king Jehoiachin, who had succeeded his father, quickly surrendered himself and his officers to the Babylonians. Nebuchadrezzar passed sentence of exile (i.e., deportation) both upon him and upon the noblest of the Jews, assigning to them (among them to the prophet Ezekiel) new dwelling-places in Babylonia. It is from this event in the year 597 that Ezekiel reckons the years of the 'Babylonian captivity' (Ez. 1 2 8 1, etc.; on 2 K. 24 1-16 cp. Klostermann).

Nebuchadrezzar plainly considered this humiliation of the little kingdom enough to render it harmless for the future. He handed over the government to a son of Josiah, a full brother of Jehoahaz (Jer. 37 1 2 K. 23 31 24 18), Zedekiah by name, of whom he exacted a solemn oath of fidelity (Ez. 17 13), at the same time causing the poorer inhabitants to take the places of the richer owners of the soil whom he had banished. There was an error, however, in his calculations: the Jews had a stubbornness and a power of resistance for which he had not allowed. The poorer people triumphantly took possession of the estates of their exiled countrymen (Ez. 11 15), and many prophets, the opponents of Jeremiah, foretold a speedy end for the foreign supremacy (Jer. 27 14 f. 28).

As early as in 593, plans were being matured in Jerusalem for a general rising of Judah and its neighbours (Jer. 27 1 f.); the stimulus may have come from Egypt, where Psa(m)etich II. had succeeded to the throne in 594. On this occasion Zedekiah came to the conclusion that it was better to prove his fidelity by appearing in person before Nebuchadrezzar (Jer. 51 59 f.). Later, however, he gave way to the persuasions of Hophra (Apries, 588-570), when that Pharaoh intervened in the affairs of the Phœnician cities (Herod. 2 161), and so this weak king dealt a fatal blow to the independence of Judah and to the house of David.

In 586, after a siege of a year and a half, the army of Nebuchadrezzar forced Jerusalem to surrender, the 42. Sack of Egyptians who were advancing to its relief having meantime been repelled (Jer. 37 5). Jerusalem. Zedekiah sought safety in flight; but before he could cross the Jordan he was captured near Jericho. Nebuchadrezzar, who had remained in his headquarters at Riblah, received his prisoner sternly, and sent him in chains to Babylon. Within a month NEBUZARADAN (q.v.) set fire to the finest buildings in Jerusalem, including the royal palace and the temple, made great breaches in the city walls, and sent some seventy of the higher officers and nobility to Riblah, where Nebuchadrezzar caused them to be executed. Once more the inhabitants of Jerusalem suffered the penalty of exile, their lands being assigned to those of the poorer class who were left behind.

The sorely weakened people received for their governor Gedaliah, son of Ahikam. It was a skilful choice, as Gedaliah was much trusted 43. Gedaliah. and from his father's time had been on terms of close friendship with Jeremiah (Jer. 26 24). He fixed his residence at MIZPAH (q.v.), and forthwith fugitives from far and wide rallied round him to strengthen the bonds of national union. How this promising attempt was ruined by a revengeful prince of the house of David, who treacherously fell upon and murdered both Gedaliah and those who were about him (some of whom were Chaldæans), is told elsewhere (see ISHMAEL, 2). It is an episode the details of which well deserve special study, and we need only add here that Johanan b. Kareah delivered the captives whom Ishmael had carried off from Mizpah, and afterwards, for their greater security, conducted the trembling Jews¹ to Egypt. The aged Jeremiah was, against his will, a member of the party. (See Che. Jeremiah, his Life and Times, 188-200).

Thus came to pass that death of Israel as a nation of which Amos had long before spoken (Am. 5 1 f.).

44. Review. The resistance had been brave; but the enemy was not to be denied. The strength and tenacity which were natural to it had, in the case of Israel as distinguished from its neighbouring kinsfolk, been intensified by a faith in God that was higher than theirs. It was not without reason that men in the olden time had spoken of the great heroes of the 'wars of Yahwè.' As this highly naturalistic form of religious enthusiasm gradually gave way before the influences of a peaceful civilisation, there grew up within Israel itself through the activity of the prophets a religious opposition which was highly prejudicial to the national well-being. It is undoubtedly correct to regard the prophets of the eighth and seventh centuries as the true heroes of the Israelite genius. We must not allow ourselves to forget, however, that they were responsible for the destruction of the nation's old satisfaction with itself, and that the heads of the people often quite honestly regarded them as troublers of the public peace (see, e.g., 1 K. 18:17 Am. 7:10 f.). Upon this internal malady supervened external dangers (Hos. 5:12-14), and thus the effective strength of the nation was doubly impaired, even quite apart from the internal jealousies and rancours of the various tribes and clans: Ahab, Jehu, the Syrian wars in the north, and Manasseh in the south are typical instances. In the later history of Judah the influence of the prophets comes into the very forefront. What arrests and almost astonishes is the disproportion between the soaring flight of religious thought and its practicable impotency. The prophets felt themselves to be messengers of the God of the whole world to the nations (Jer. 1:5-10), at the same time that his people were going helplessly to ruin. Faith rebels at the irksome limitations of space, and feels itself strong enough to face the world. Less attractive to behold is its shadow-like double,—the blind stubbornness and pride, which in Jeremiah's time cannot conceive the possibility that Yahwé, the God of the world, could ever cast off his own. Hence the strange juxtaposition of diffidence and boldness, of courage and despair. That petty selfishness and personal hatreds should be added to these at a time when 'to be or not to be' was the question which let loose every passion need not startle us. For the multitude it was an unintelligible and depressing destiny, that the people of Israel should on account of its faith be precluded from taking a place among the great kingdoms of the world. To us this is no longer a riddle; we give our pity to the vanquished brave, our admiration to the little flock, helpless and despised, which recognises an inward renewal as the only way of healing, accepts suffering as a merited chastisement, and, in humble expectation, waits for the day when God shall bring to victory the cause of his own in the sight of all the world. From the midst of such a company a new Israel did indeed actually spring up; but it was not a new people.

We must not allow ourselves to picture the land of Judah after 582 as a mere howling wilderness. According to Jer. 52:28-30, 4600 men in all were carried into exile out of Jerusalem and Judah; this will represent a total of some 14,000-18,000 souls—certainly but a modest fraction of the entire population, although doubtless representing its best and most vigorous elements. If we take into account also those who had migrated into Egypt, we may safely assume that among those who remained behind were included but few persons who had had experience in the conduct of public affairs. The necessary consequence was that the residents felt themselves reduced to a state of apathy and helplessness. The establishment of such a condition in the conquered land was no doubt in the interest of the conqueror; but it was not a state of complete desolation. A strong Edomite inroad from the SE. still further diminished the territory of what had once been the kingdom of Judah, and forced the Judahites who still remained into closer contiguity (see EDOM). The Calebites whom they drove from Hebron moved up into the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, which at a later date was spoken of as their native seat (1 Ch. 2:50 f.; see CALEB, § 4). Jerusalem remained throughout the centre of the community, and sacrifice was even offered among the ruins of the temple (Jer. 41:5; cp Lam. 1:4). As the resident remnant were now without any natural head—we hear nothing of any Babylonian governor—resort was naturally had to the ancient division of the people according to families and clans, or even according to local communities, and the care of the common interests was handed over to the heads of families (elders).¹ Although no doubt there still remained a few who continued to cherish the old proud spirit (Ez. 33:24-29), the mood of the majority was humble, anxious, subdued in the extreme. The community lay helpless, exposed to the insults of its neighbours; men felt that they had been smitten to the earth by the divine anger; the proudest hearts were crushed by trouble (Lam. 2-4). The truth of the prophet's predictions as to the fate of Israel and Judah had been personally experienced in the direst measure, and all that now remained was with shame and confusion of face to answer the prophet's summons to repentance and amendment; the anniversaries of the sad events of the downfall were observed with fasting and mourning (Zech. 7 f.). In thus turning to God, hearts gradually began to glow again at thoughts of Yahwé's faithfulness and might. The rights of Zion over against the nations were no longer despaired of; hopes of a vindication, of a day of vengeance, began to be cherished, and men to wait on Yahwé (Lam. 5).

For most of the exiles in Babylonia, also, the destruction of Jerusalem was as startling as it was unexpected.

46. In Relying upon prophetic utterances (Jer. 27-29 Ez. 12:21-13:23), they had, from Babylonia. 597 B.C. onwards, looked forward to a speedy release and return to Jerusalem. They regarded themselves as the true Israel, and proudly looked down on those who had been left behind in the old home (cp Jer. 24 Ez. 11:1-21). For this attitude their past certainly supplied them with good reasons; but they did not in the least degree answer the requirements which had been made of a true Israel by the prophets. The chiding discourses of Ezekiel (especially 1-24) show all too clearly that as yet there was no sign of a 'new heart' in them. The capture of Jerusalem in 586 seems at last to have had this consequence, that the exiles, as Jeremiah (29:4-9) had already counselled, began to lay their account with a more prolonged sojourn in foreign parts. To what degree they were distributed over the country at large we do not know; in several localities (Ezek. 1:38, etc., Ezra 8:7) they were settled in considerable numbers, and here they maintained in full force the old clan relations, not only de facto but also by means of registers (Ezra 8:17, cp Ezek. 13:9). Doubtless it fared better on the whole with the exiles than with those who had been allowed to remain behind in the old country. This holds true very specially of those who had no desire to assert Israel's loftier place among the nations, who simply threw themselves into the ordinary tasks of daily life, and soon, amid the widely ramified trade and commerce of the great world-state, found themselves better off than they had formerly been among the lonely hills of their highland home. Most of them, it must, however, be said further, became lost to their own nation, just as already the descendants of the exiles of the kingdom of Israel had become absorbed by their new surroundings in Mesopotamia and Media. The disadvantages of a life in a foreign country were felt to the full, on the other hand, by all those who were

47. Religion unable to forget the God of Israel and and literature. his 'holy city' (Is. 52:1). According to the ideas then prevailing, it was a literal impossibility to serve Yahwé in a foreign, unclean land (Hos. 9:3-5; cp Ps. 137:4). All the more did it become incumbent to practise whatever served to maintain the connection with home. Personal intercourse with Jerusalem, which at first had been vigorously maintained (Jer. 29:1 f. 25:51-59 Ezek. 24:26), naturally became less after the laying waste of the city and the repeated measures for reducing its population; the pious-minded found themselves in the end restricted to the memories, the cherished customs, and the writings they possessed. It being impossible to worship Yahwè by sacrifice, they kept up all the more assiduously such customs as had in themselves some sort of independent existence apart from the temple-worship:—prayer (in which the face was turned towards Jerusalem; see 1 K. 8:48), fasting, circumcision, Sabbath observance; the last two, in particular, came to be distinguishing marks of Israel as opposed to heathendom. At the same time this thought found entrance, that renunciation of one's will and the surrender of the heart to God was the true sacrifice, well pleasing to God (Ps. 51:16[18]f.).

Special diligence was devoted to the preserving, editing, and multiplying of books, and, consequently, the calling of the scribes (כְּסָבִים) rose to great importance.¹

It was to the 'law'—i.e., to Deuteronomy and similar collections, as, for example, Lev. 17-26, which they edited and transcribed—that their attention was given in the first instance. Under the leadership of the prophet Ezekiel, who in chaps. 40ff. of his book lays down specifications for the building of the temple, and prescribes its services after the manner of a legislator, advance was steadily made along the path indicated in Deuteronomy—that of imposing a special stamp upon the worship of Israel by means of laws. New, but in full accordance with the circumstances and temper of the period, was the express enactment of regular days and sacrifices of propitiation (Ezek. 45:18-20). The editing of works of a historical nature was carried on along the same lines as those on which it had been begun in Judah before the Exile—viz., the past was measured by the standard of the law which had been in force since 621, and so was found to present little that was good (cp the books of Kings).²

The thoughts were wholly those of Judah, though the name was that of Israel. The conceptions of prophetic circles, as these had developed and taken root in Judah in consequence of the activity of the prophets from Isaiah onwards, became victorious in the religious field, and it was from these that the new post-exilic Israel took its origin. Judaism, it is true, developed many noticeable characteristics which we are not as a rule accustomed to observe in the prophets (because they are there only in rudiment). The law in the later sense of the word has its roots in Deuteronomy; but it is impossible to separate Deuteronomy from the influence of the prophets. Is. 1:19f. already confronts us with the thought that everything depends on Israel's obedience or disobedience. The idea of retributive justice in itself is of venerable antiquity, and not confined to the religion of Israel; but the prophets had actually put it forward as the key to an understanding of history, and with a view to securing the freedom and responsibility of the individual, had so modified it (Jeremiah and Ezekiel) as to represent retribution as visiting the guilty person alone, and even as judging the individual exclusively according to what might be his attitude at the moment of judgment. Out of this arose a new conception of the divine precepts. They became for Israel the conditions under which it was capable of receiving the divine gifts (Dt. 28ff. Lev. 26): by fulfilment of the law alone could Israel, whether the nation or the individual, receive life (Ezek. 20:11 Lev. 18:5 Neh. 9:29).

The interest in worship, which henceforth has free scope in the laws, first meets us in the legislation of Deuteronomy, and was first aroused by the prophetic view that the worship of Israel ought to have its foundation in the proper history of Israel. The type of personal piety also displayed in Judaism had its pioneers in the later prophets. What Jeremiah had begun in his touching dialogues with God—the expression of the experiences and emotions of the individual soul—the Israelite, by nature lyrically disposed, now took up with great warmth as the motive of his religious poetry. Repentance, supplication, thanksgiving, praise, doubt, assurance of faith, now find their expression in a form that will continue to be the form for religious emotion to the end of time. A closer self-examination, a recognition and confession of sin—manifestations of the religious life so frequently met with after the Exile—were demands of the prophets (Jer. 3:21ff. Ezek. 36:31ff.) with which many in Israel learned in exile to comply. For the exiles were now actually living through and experiencing the nation's death in the land of the heathen; the pain and the sorrow of it was gradually leading many to recognise the full truth of what the prophets had judged. Those thus disciplined learned to bow themselves submissively under the hand of God, and to bear the suffering willingly as a merited punishment (עָנִים, עָבְרִי, עָבְרִי). In such an attitude they became reconciled to God; out of the promises of the prophets the aspiration after deliverance drew strength for hope to live by; and this hope became all the livelier in proportion as Yahwè came to be sincerely acknowledged as the only God of heaven and earth. From him it was possible to expect Israel's vindication in the sight of the heathen nations even against the mightiest world-powers.

The first indication of a turn of affairs for the better was the liberation of Jehoiachin (Jeconiah), and the bestowal on him of regal honours by

48. Dawn? Evil-merodach (561-560; cp 2 K. 25:27-30. Or was it not until Neriglissar?). Yet other, more weighty, indications kept expectation alive for a considerable time. As there was now peace between Media and Babylon, the existing relations of the great powers seemed stable. All the greater was the tension when at last heavy storm-clouds began to gather over Babylonia. Cyrus II. of Persia had become (since 550 B.C.; see CYRUS, § 2) the next neighbour of Babylonia, and was too insatiably energetic to curb himself at the frontier of that empire. The kingdom of Lydia—i.e.,

49. II. Isaiah. all Asia Minor—had been conquered in a single campaign, and as the conqueror passed along the northern border of Babylonia the author of Is. 40-55 discerned in his triumphant march a premonition of the coming vengeance of God upon proud Babylon. At last the hour for a message of peace and comfort to suffering Israel seemed to have come. The prophet spoke in soul-stirring strains of the mighty deeds of Yahwè the God of the world—deeds by which he was to free his people from servitude to the heathen, bring them marvellously back to their own land, and there, before the astonished gaze of all the nations, make them great and glorious as never heretofore. He designated Cyrus as the instrument, the anointed, of Yahwè, through whom Jerusalem and the temple should be again restored; he spoke of the grand mission of pious Israel, to bring to the heathen the knowledge of the one true God. He gave exulting expression—he, a nameless prophet—to his sure confidence in the victory of the monotheistic faith; he saw fulfilling itself before his own eyes and amid the forms surrounding him that which by all the ordinary laws of human existence can only be the growth of a long-continued development.¹

We turn now to the actual sequel. Nabonidus having proved himself incapable of defending the country

50. Cyrus. against the invader, the people of Babylonia hailed Cyrus as a welcome deliverer. The most important cities, including Babylon itself, fell into the hands of the Persians without any serious struggle (538 B.C.). Cyrus, therefore, had no occasion to resort to the harsher rigours of war. On the contrary, although himself a follower of the Zoroastrian religion, he caused himself to be credited with being also a favourite and a worshipper of Merodach (see CYRUS, § 6), his policy being thus most favourably distinguished from the fanatical measures of Semitic princes against the gods and temples of conquered peoples. The Old Persian religion allowed him, and his successors, not only to respect, but also to promote the religions of other nations. He was thus in a position to respond to the religious wishes of the Jews. He gave orders to restore the temple of Yahwè, 'the God of heaven,' in Jerusalem, and sent SHESHBAZZAR 51. Sheshbazzar. (q.v.)—doubtless himself a Jew, and perhaps even a descendant of David—with suitable powers, as his governor to Judah. There, we are told, he laid the foundation of the new temple; but we learn also that an arrest was soon afterwards laid upon the enterprise (Ezra 5:13-16). There can hardly be any doubt that Sheshbazzar was accompanied to Jerusalem by prominent compatriots, such as Zerubbabel, a descendant of David and Joshua b. Jozadak the priest, and that they were able to appeal to royal authority in the prosecution of their aims (cp Ezra 6:1-5). We may doubt, however, whether, as the Chronicler affirms (Ezra 1:1-6), Cyrus gave a general permission for the return of the exiles to their native land.

This was the first event that brought some stir into the quiet and secluded life of the Jewish population at Jerusalem. The impulse, however, seems to have met at first with opposition and obstruction rather than support. Although we have no trustworthy information on the subject, this is certainly intelligible. The returned exiles, with the powers committed to them, would soon become troublesome to the native-born Jews, with their rights and privileges. Moreover, it seems very probable (cp Ezra 4:1-4) that the people of Samaria—among whom, notwithstanding their intermixture with foreigners (2 K. 17:24, Ezra 4:28-10), the worship of Yahwè survived (2 K. 17:25 ff.) and was later brought into connection with Jerusalem (2 K. 23:15-19 f., Jer. 41:5)—endeavoured at first to reap some benefit for themselves from the permission of Cyrus to rebuild the temple, by making common cause with the Jews. Hence the first impulse resulting from the permission of Cyrus may have led to collisions in which the influence of the governor and the goodwill of the exiles spent themselves.

Yet the event of 538, in itself unimportant, was like the little stone flung into a confined sheet of water, which creates a long-protracted disturbance. Nineteen or twenty years later the movement to build the temple was begun again by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. Zerubbabel, who now appears as Persian governor of Judah, a man of Davidic descent, and Joshua the 'high priest,' to whom Zechariah (3:7) expressly attributes the control of the temple precincts, begin with the people of Judah the restoration of the temple in 519. The inactivity of the co-religionists is met by the prophets with the promise that zeal displayed in building the temple will bring down the blessing of God—i.e., the final realisation of the prophetic ideals of pre-exilic and exilic times—the overthrow of the great heathen empires, the gathering of the exiled and dispersed, the rehabilitation of the Davidic monarchy, and the recognition of Yahwè at Jerusalem on the part of the heathen. The temple was actually completed on the 23rd of Adar 515 (with Ezra 6:15 cp 1 Esd. 7:5 and Jos. Ant. xi. 4:7). It had been built by the people of Judah without help from the Persian government.

This appears clearly from Ezra 5:3-6:15, which refers to the latter part of the period of building. According to Ezra 6:8-10, indeed, Darius directs that the expenditure should be refunded out of the revenues of the province of Syria and Phœnicia, and that a regular allowance should be paid for the maintenance of the daily ritual of the temple. But it may be doubted whether this order was really carried out.

The restoration of the temple was an important achievement. In spite of its unpretentious appearance, the temple constituted an important rallying point for the native population, and exerted a strong attractive power on those who lived remote from Jerusalem (cp Zech. 6:10). Naturally it became more than ever imperative for the Jews that they should have a care for the regular service of the sanctuary. Nor was this, in the circumstances of the time, a simple or easy matter. The duty fell in, indeed, with the tendency of religious life in the times immediately preceding the Exile, as we know from Deuteronomy and Ezekiel. But neither was there any longer a king in Jerusalem to maintain the court sanctuary, nor can we find any trace of the provision of Darius (Ezra 6:9 f.) having been carried out. Since, moreover, there was at that time, as Ezra 5:3 ff. shows, no real Persian governor at Jerusalem, the priesthood, with Joshua the 'high priest,' a descendant of Zadok, at their head, were simply dependent on the good will of the people. But, as appears from expressions in Mal. and Is. 56 ff., this does not seem to have secured them any adequate provision. There was no fixed order to unite willing and unwilling in a common contribution with regularity. The wealthy heads of families cared only for themselves (Is. 56:10-12). To the utter absence of any spirit of friendly co-operation were added calumny, fraud, and violence. The administration of justice was feeble or subservient to avarice. A large proportion of the people were poor and suffered actual distress. The pious, who anxiously endeavoured to be obedient to the word of Yahwè, felt themselves much oppressed by these conditions. The promises of a better time not having been realised, the zeal of the pious seemed to have been vain; it was paralysed by the practices of those who would hear of no sharp distinction between the service of Yahwè and their heathen surroundings. Intermarriage between people of Judah and Canaanites was by no means rare, and through the influence of the old family ties a blending of religious cults was brought about, in which the heathen as the stronger became victorious (cp Neh. 13:23-27). Of these two tendencies, which might be called Jewish-Canaanite and Jewish-prophetic respectively, the former maintained close relations with the people of Samaria—whose peculiar history had forced them to a similar course—who now endeavoured to establish rights in the temple at Jerusalem. Naturally the adherents of the prophets would acknowledge no such rights; but even those who favoured the cultivation of closer relations hesitated to change so radically the rights of the temple (fully recognised as these were) and perhaps thereby to endanger their stability. The people of Samaria retorted by resuming an attitude of open enmity, making the Jews feel their superior power (Is. 62:8 f.). It is not strange that in these circumstances a satisfactory ordering of the temple worship was not attained.

Even external peace was not unbroken. Although the expeditions of the Persians against Egypt (517, 485, 455) did not affect the Judæan highlands, the revolt of Megabyzos, satrap of Syria, against Artaxerxes I. (465-425) would affect the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. The condition of things, was therefore, deplorable in Jerusalem about the middle of the fifth century B.C. (Is. 59:15 f.).

It was by Nehemiah and Ezra that a deliverance was effected. In firm faith in Israel's future, with great dexterity and immovable tenacity, they fortified the defenceless Jerusalem, and established the temple worship by the organisation of the Jews as a religious community.

As to the chronological order of the events that secured this result difference of opinion prevails; especially marked is this in the case of the arrival of Ezra and his caravan at Jerusalem (Kuen., Ed. Meyer, and others—458 B.C., under Artaxerxes I.; Koster—about 430 B.C. under the same king; van Hoonacker—398-397 B.C. under Artaxerxes II., Mnemon). The account given in the following paragraphs agrees in the main with the theory of Koster (Het Herstel, 1894; see EZRA ii., § 9).

Nehemiah, a cup-bearer of Artaxerxes I., Longimanus (465-425), learned in Susa from some men from Judæa that Jerusalem lay in ruins and its people were groaning under a burden of wretchedness. He obtained of the king leave of absence and authority, as governor of the district of Judah, to attend to the fortification of Jerusalem. Arrived in Jerusalem in 446-445, he devoted his attention in the first place to external relations. The strenuous efforts of the people of Jerusalem and its neighbourhood enabled him to restore the walls of the city in fifty-two days. The people of Samaria, with Sanballat of Bethhoron at their head, vainly sought by open threats and hidden craft to put obstacles in his way. The plunder of the poor by the rich during the building of the walls he restrained by earnest admonition and the example of his own unselfish conduct. He did not allow himself to be intimidated in his plans by prophetic threats or by the ambiguous attitude of leading members of the community actively allied with Sanballat and his dependants (Neh. 1-6). He took systematic measures for the safety of Jerusalem, and secured an increase of the population by immigration from the surrounding district (Neh. 7 1-5 11 1 f.). Of his further doings during the twelve years of his first stay at Jerusalem we have no information; but he appears even then to have taken in hand the regulation of the temple service (Neh. 12 44, cp 13 4-20). In 434-433 he returned to the Persian court.

Soon, however, he came back to Jerusalem. Henceforth he devoted his attention particularly to religious affairs. Arrangements in favour of the priesthood heresinded, banished from Jerusalem even a member of the high priestly family who had become allied by marriage to Sanballat, provided for regular payment being made to Levites and singers, insisted on strict observance of the Sabbath, and sought to prevent mixed marriages (Neh. 13 4-31).

Many indications favour the opinion that the expedition of Ezra was connected with Nehemiah's second journey to Jerusalem, and was perhaps even 57. Ezra. occasioned by Nehemiah. At the head of some 1800 men of Judah (= 5500-6000 souls), Ezra, priest and scribe, left Babylon with the two-fold mission assigned him by the king—(1) of submitting the state of things in Judah to the test of his lawbook, and regulating it accordingly (Ezra 7 14-25 f.); (2) of bringing to Jerusalem the rich presents of the king and his retinue, of the province of Babylonia, and of the Jews' co-religionists (Ezra 7 15-19). Ezra's enterprise aimed accordingly at pronouncedly religious ends. In the externally mixed and internally disunited people loosely congregated round the temple, Ezra's companions were to form the solid kernel of a new 'Israel' that should render obedience to the law of God, and so could cherish with a good conscience the hope of being worthy to experience the fulfilment of the divine promises (cp Dt. 28 1-14 Lev. 26 1-13). In fact, a company of 6000 souls invested with royal authority might well seem capable of bringing about a thorough-going reform in Judah.

Yet Ezra encountered great difficulties. These would spring not only from the religious contrast between those who came from Babylon and those that were native born, but also from the sudden increase of population produced by this influx of families of the highest rank. It is only, however, of the religious movement begun by Ezra that we hear. Learning with horror and grief of the mixed marriages that were common in all ranks he assembled the people in front of the temple and endeavoured to arouse in them the sentiments he himself felt. His acts and words produced a profound impression. A resolution was passed that a searching investigation should be instituted with a view to dissolving the mixed marriages in the district of Jerusalem. Whether a real separation, however, was made at this early time between 'holy' and unholy is not quite clear from Ezra 10. At all events, Ezra had by his religious energy produced a lasting impression on the multitude.

His greatest achievement, accomplished with the co-operation of Nehemiah, was the organisation of the new Jewish community (about 430 B.C.). This came into existence by the heads of families pledging themselves by formal subscription (cp Neh. 9 f.) to the observance of the law (Neh. 9 38-10 31 [10 1-32]) and other regulations with reference to the temple services (17. 32-39 [33-40]).

The prescriptions quoted from the law (vs. 31 f.) point to Ex. 28 and Dt. 15. The measures decreed and imposed upon itself by the assembly (vs. 32-39 [33-40]) aim at regulating the temple service by contributions made by the community in common (temple tax, firstlings, firstborn, tithes), and culminate in the concluding assertion, 'We will not neglect the house of our God.'

It was apparently after this organisation of the community—not, as the present order of the book of 59. The new law. Nehemiah implies, before it—that Ezra's law-book was solemnly read in public (Neh. 8 1-12). As its first effect is mentioned (vs. 13-18) the new celebration of the feast of 'Tabernacles,' which plainly answers to the prescription now to be found in Lev. 23 39-43. This leads to the assumption that the law-book of Ezra contained in the main the Law of Holiness (P₁ or H) and the oldest parts of the Priestly Code proper (P₂ or P₃; see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 9). The amplification of this book and its combination with the older parts of our Pentateuch will have followed soon after (see CANON, § 23 ff.). How far Ezra himself had a share in this work we do not know. At all events, the work undertaken by Nehemiah and Ezra was thus completed, inasmuch as the laws demanded by the new conditions of things were accorded authority equal to that of the older collections (cp § 61). This fact is reflected in the later Jewish legend according to which the Law was written out anew by Ezra (4 Esd. 14 19-22 40-47; Pirkê Ābōth, i. 1, 2). We have another important monument of the constitution of the post-exilic community in the list of its families and local communities (Ezra 2 = Neh. 7 = 1 Esd. 5) adopted by the Chronicler as a list of exiles returned in the time of Cyrus see EZRA ii., § 9). According to it, the number of men in the community amounted to 42,360—i.e., some 521,000 souls.

Before proceeding with the history of this newly constituted community, we must briefly set forth its

60. Idea of congregation. characteristics and its relation to the pre-exilic people of Israel. The fundamental idea of Ezra's new creation is clearly dependent on those by which it was preceded—Deuteronomy, Ezekiel, 'Law of Holiness' (see LEVITICUS);—it is that of a holy people in a holy land. Since the predominant conception of holiness was in the ritualistic sense of purity, we have the impression of the whole community being regarded precisely as a sacrificial brotherhood of the old times. The stranger (נָכְרִי, נְכִירִי) is excluded; marriage with him makes unclean; circumcision and the Sabbath are the badges of the Jewish community, and serve, along with the observance of other prescriptions, to sanctify the land. In fact, it was the organisation of the Jewish community after the Exile that for the first time completely abolished the old sacrificial communion of families or clans. All its members contributed alike to the maintenance of one and the same cultus at the single sanctuary. Thus the post-exilic community in regulating the cultus by law took up a position completely in harmony with that sketched by the last representatives of prophecy at the beginning of the Exile. But, unlike them, it was not content with expelling from Israel everything heathen. It sought in the institution of a common cultus a bond, firm and strong, to unite in a close fellowship the individual members—an end secured formerly by the establishment of the monarchy. Hence to the highest representative of the ecclesiastically reorganised community—the high priest—were transferred also badges of royalty of many kinds (e.g., ANOINTING [q.v., § 3]).

The support and strength of the community was the new law-book, which was certainly regarded by those

61. The Torah. in authority merely as a seasonable modification and completion, and therefore as the legitimate successor, of Deuteronomy. The application of it became a learned accomplishment.

It was written and its provisions were many and varied. Moreover—and this was the chief difficulty—it was not enough to know the written law. That contained only certain prescriptions, namely those which had been regarded as of special importance when the various collections were made. The system as a whole, the mode of procedure, the various legal precedents, were unwritten. Without a knowledge of the latter, however, administration of justice in Israel was really impossible: the written law could be used only by one who understood the place and significance of the several statutes in the whole body of law, and their use in accordance with the ancient unwritten law of established usage. Hence the skilled use of the law fell more and more out of the hands of the priests and became the affair of the 'scribes' (סופרים), who, no doubt, not infrequently belonged to the priesthood (cp, e.g., the case of Ezra himself). The more influential the scribes became, the more would the priesthood have to reckon with them. The sphere of Jewish law and Jewish legal administration cannot be measured according to the modern distinction between spiritual and temporal, ecclesiastical and political. The 'affairs of Yahwè' (cp the antithesis in 2 Ch. 19 11) included besides the cultus the whole realm of law. In Israel law had always been counted as a holy affair of Yahwè's; the Jewish community could not for a moment give this up if it recognised obedience to the will of Yahwè as its mission; according to Ezra 7 25 f., the royal powers vested in Ezra do not indicate in this respect any restriction of any kind.

On the other hand, Nehemiah and Ezra tacitly abandoned political independence, and in so doing gave up a vital part of the hopes and ideas of the prophets. This very sacrifice, sore as it was, opened to them a way of escape from a desperate position, and guaranteed them not only room for their undertakings, but also the strong support of the imperial power. The followers and adherents of the prophets, indeed, were offended; and there must have been some deeper influence at work than the mere bribes of his enemies, when we find Nehemiah complaining even of enmity on the part of the prophets (Neh. 6 6-14). The result, however, confirmed the policy of Nehemiah and Ezra; and it is accordingly no matter for surprise that in the sequel the position of the prophets fell grievously in popular esteem (Zech. 13 2-6). The abandonment of political independence, however, was only a preliminary. The coming glorification of Israel before all the heathen was the goal for the sake of which Nehemiah and Ezra sacrificed their laborious work on points of detail and minor matters. The old political programme of the prophets was retained or reconstructed in the form of eschatology. The position accorded to strangers in the Jewish community clearly establishes the character of this sacrifice as a mere preliminary. Following Deuteronomy, the law-book of the post-exilic community decides (Ex. 12 49 Lev. 24 22) that there should be one law for native (אזרח) and foreigner (גר); indeed, foreigners have the option of circumcision, and can thus become completely merged in the community. This is a fruit of the universalism of the prophets. On the other hand, from civil qualifications the gēr is excluded.¹ This would aim at keeping the civil community pure as the birthplace of the future nation, preserving a true 'Israel' for the time of the great crisis. In the Jewish constitution instituted by Nehemiah and Ezra, accordingly, what we find is a well thought-out attempt to secure for the remnant of Israel, even without political independence, the enjoyment of their religious inheritance in its fullest extent.

Notwithstanding the emphasis that was, especially in the beginning, laid on the community, piety was a concern of the individual. In this respect the views that meet us in the Memoirs of Nehemiah and Ezra

(see EZRA ii., § 5) are instructive.

63. Practical religion. Every male member of the community who had passed his twentieth year had to pay the temple tax (Neh. 10 32 [33] f. Ex. 30 11 ff.). Except where the nature of the case demanded otherwise, it was the individual that was aimed at in the provisions of the law. The sufferings of nearly 200 years were, indeed, recognised in the true prophetic spirit as divine punishment for the sins of the nation. A thoroughgoing reform would, it was hoped, end the long chastisement and usher in a time of grace. But, although there was no doubt about the common guilt, everyone was required to acknowledge and confess his sin (cp Ezra 9 6 ff. Neh. 9). There thus began to prevail in the Jewish community a constant consciousness of sin. The stiffneckedness so often spoken of must give place to self-abasement and humility before God (ענוה). As obedience to God came to be obedience to the law, to be solicitous (תקיר) about the law was accounted specially praiseworthy. Certainly we have coming to us from post-exilic times the noblest testimony to the supreme blessing of communion with God (e.g., Ps. 73 23 ff.), and touching descriptions of a soul's conflict with unmerited suffering (Job). They show us that personal piety then flourished in strength. Still, under the dominion of law religion could not fail to become prevalingly a matter of form and outward act. The contrast was similar in another respect. The monotheistic attitude of mind toward God was assured; it directed men's eyes beyond the Jewish community on to the other nations. The worship, however, to which men were devoted moved in narrower bounds on the ruins of a popular religion that was no more.

The formation of the Jewish community did not impose on their land a new constitution. The law accommodated itself to traditional relations, supplementing them and filling them with the new spirit.

64. Political constitution. If no special governor for Jerusalem were appointed, the district was administered from Samaria by the resident Persian officer, who appears to have had an adviser at Jerusalem (Neh. 11 24). Taxation and military service were in his hands. The highest place among the native population was occupied by the 'elders' or 'nobles,' the hereditary representatives of the families settled in the capital. In their hands was the civil and, in conjunction with special judges, apparently also the judicial administration, except in as far as these matters were attended to locally (cp Ezra 5 3 ff.). From this, it seems, arose the γερονσία, senate or synedrium, the existence of which, however, we are not able to prove till the Greek age (198 B.C.; Jos. Ant. xii. 33). An officer, however, who at first ranked alongside these, soon rose above them all, even above the descendants of David,—the high priest. He ruled in the sanctuary and administered temple dues paid by all alike. The sacred office, therefore, easily became a prize for the ambitious and avaricious, and occasionally an object of sanguinary struggle. As Josephus says (Ant. xi. 48 xx. 10), the constitution was accordingly an aristocratic oligarchy.

In the country towns also there were 'elders and judges,' the latter of whom were probably subject to appointment (Dt. 16 18 Ezra 7 25). The basis for this new arrangement was plainly provided by the old organisation of the nation by clans. The officers often mentioned by Nehemiah (שִׁבְטָנִים; EV 'rulers'; RV mg. 'deputies') were persons appointed by and subordinate to the Persian governor (Neh. 5 17).

Nothing shows more clearly the deep impression made by the constitution of the Jewish community than the imitation of it in the land of old

65. Samaria. Israel, at Shechem. The alliance of the leading families in Samaria and Judæa had found in Nehemiah an undaunted opponent. He did not shrink from expelling from Jerusalem a descendant of the high priest Eliashib who had married a daughter of Sanballat (Neh. 13 28), and all prospect of nearer relations was excluded by the organisation of the community. What they had not been able to attain in common with the Jews, the Samaritans accomplished, however, for themselves, with the assistance of the Jewish fugitives. They installed the Zadokite from Jerusalem as their high priest, built a temple on Mt. Gerizim, and adopted the Pentateuch, with certain alterations, as their law (see CANON, § 25).

By Josephus, indeed (Ant. xi. 8), these events are brought into connection with the expedition of Alexander the Great; but, since there can hardly be any doubt that Josephus has incorporated in his narrative the statements of Neh. 13²⁸, he must have assigned them too late a date (see CANON, § 25).

The organisation of the Samaritan community must have been completed not later than the first half of the fourth century B. C.

The history of the Jewish community after the Exile is known to us only in part. About the close of the 66. Persian period.

Persian and the beginning of the Greek period we know very little. During the long struggle of the Egyptians for freedom from Persia (408-343 B. C.) not only was Syria often traversed by Persian armies, but also it was itself the scene of battles fought under Artaxerxes III. Ochus (358-338) with great vigour and ferocity. The Jewish community would certainly suffer. It appears, however, also to have made common cause with the insurgents in Egypt and Syria. For, about 351, Ochus seems to have had part of the populace of Judæa conveyed, apparently by Orophernes (the HOLOFERNES [q.v.] of the Book of Judith), to Hyrcania (and Babylonia), and it was presumably in the years 348-340 that the persecutions inflicted on the Jews by Ochus's notorious general, the Egyptian eunuch Bagoas (= Bagoses, Jos. Ant. xi. 71), fell.¹ Undoubted allusions to these events are not to be found in the OT; but passages in Is. 24-27, also 63⁷-64¹² [11], Pss. 44 74 79 89, have lately been referred to them.²

The weight of the intolerable oppression led the Jewish community to hail the wonderful triumphal 67. Seleucidæ. progress of Alexander the Great as a divinely sent deliverance (cp Is. 24¹⁴⁻¹⁶ Ps. 46?). The change of rule seems to have been accomplished peaceably as far as Jerusalem was concerned, though hardly with the special favour personally shown by Alexander that Josephus mentions (Ant. xi. 8). But Alexander's brilliant victories were not followed by peace. After varying contests between Antigonos, Seleucus, and Ptolemy, including even a conquest of Jerusalem by the last-mentioned ruler, probably after the battle of Gaza 312, the S. part of Syria was, in consequence of the battle of Ipsus (301 B. C.), assigned to Ptolemy I.

Under the wise and judicious rule of the first three Ptolemies (306-221) the Jewish community, probably for the first time, enjoyed a considerable period of peace and quiet. The battles fought against the Seleucidæ in the middle of the third century (cp Dan. 116 ff.) did not, it would seem, affect the highland district, and the religious peculiarities of the Jews were respected by the Ptolemies. We must, accordingly, suppose that at this time there was a strengthening and extension of the community.

The advance of the Seleucidæ in Syria did not at first produce any change in the favourable position of the Jews. The victory of Ptolemy IV. Philopator over Antiochus III. the Great at Raphia (217 B. C.) was, indeed, hailed by the Jews with joy. When, however, after 202, Antiochus III. resumed and pursued with better success his plans of conquest, the inclinations of the Jews were transferred to him. After he had defeated the Egyptian general at the sources of the Jordan in 198, the Jews made voluntary submission to him and assisted him in driving out the Egyptian garrison from the citadel (Akra) of Jerusalem. We can hardly credit all that Josephus tells of the consequent favour shown by Antiochus (Ant. xii. 33 f.); but we may infer from it that the Jewish community prospered under this representative of the house of Seleucus. From that time onwards (198-7 B. C.) Judæa belonged to the kingdom of the Seleucidæ.

We come here upon the surprising phenomenon of a Syrian party—i.e., one friendly to the Greeks—controlling opinion in Jerusalem. The 68. Contact with Hellenism.

Chronicles, who compiled the books of Chronicles and also Ezra and Nehemiah (see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 15) in the first half of the third century, proves beyond a doubt the complete victory of the ideas for which Nehemiah and Ezra had fought. The history of the past is there recast as if the standards of the present had always prevailed in Israel. This directly concerns also the estimation in which foreign innovation was held. But it would be wrong to conclude that there were none but orthodox (so to speak) in the Jewish community. The Psalms show that such as remained true to the law had much to complain of in the way of calumny and violence on the part of the 'godless,' whom, it was hoped, Yahwè would sometime cut off from the community in judgment. These were such members of the community as favoured the foreigner. According to the descriptions in the Psalms, they were to be found in the more wealthy classes. Their reliance on the kingdom of the Seleucidæ is explained by the fact that it was there that Greek life was able to get a hold and root itself. The Egyptians were so set and fixed in their way of life and their civilisation that even the Ptolemies could not move them. Alexandria, the creation of Alexander the Great, and other places in the Delta, became famous seats of Greek culture and commerce. But it was otherwise in W. Asia. The natural boundaries of the nations had already been abolished by the Assyrians and Chaldeans (Is. 10¹³ f.), and throughout their empire there had been a blending of races and religions. The equalising influences of trade and commerce increased under the rule of the Persians, who opened new routes. But the state created by the Asiatic conquerors was only a loose collection of separate groups in which the old native forms survived. When the Greek conquerors had forced an entrance for themselves, a great swarm of peaceable stragglers followed in their train, and had no difficulty in making their way into the loose groups and forming alliances with them. Naturally it was in the newly-founded or newly-colonised Greek cities that this process began, and it was even later confined in general to the towns (the settled country was now Aramaic, the desert Arabian). Greek education, art, and trade were pursued; new markets were opened up; luxury and unstinted self-indulgence gave life a seductive lustre. It

69 a. Diaspora. was the Jews outside of Jerusalem, in the Diaspora, that made the first acquaintance with Hellenism (cp DISPERSION, HELLENISM). We cannot trace with any certainty the rise of Jewish communities in foreign lands. The accounts in Josephus (Ant. xii. 1 34), of forcible settlements in Egypt and Asia Minor have been called in question. It is more likely that trade interests led the Jews abroad, and that allied families joined them in the leading commercial towns. Here they learned to speak, think, and live as Greeks. They were sought out by anyone who came from Jerusalem (Ecclus. 31⁹⁻¹¹); and they in their turn visited Jerusalem, their spiritual mother, and told how greatly the world was changed. And for Jews the outer world had long ago come to have a two-fold significance: it was not only the power that was hostile to Yahwè, who would yet break its strength, but also the multitude of those who would sometime bow themselves before him and bring offerings to him at Jerusalem. Hence it was not simply a sign of unbelief or apostasy if men had regard for the new forms of the world, and did not forget the man in the Jew—and the man at that time was the Greek, fairly launched on his career of cosmopolitanism. Writings such as Kohelêth, Jonah, Ecclesiasticus testify to this—each in its own way. Ecclesiasticus allows even the external demands of Judaism to fall into the background in order to lay the emphasis on the demand for fear of God and moral conduct. Such a conception of life approximated to that of the Greek popular philosophy of those times. In the far-reaching current of universalism such inner relations must not be under-estimated. In the intercourse between Judaism and Hellenism it is certainly the lower motives of conduct that come more clearly forward—vanity, greed, lust of power, licentiousness. For the men of distinction and wealth at Jerusalem this was the main thing (cp Jos. Ant. xii. 4).

There were at this time two among the priestly families at Jerusalem that contended for the leadership—the Oniadæ and the Tobiadæ.¹ The 69 b. Two parties. Oniadæ were the pious guardians of the prophetic inheritance rescued from the exile, and set their hopes on the mild rule of the Ptolemies. The Tobiadæ, on the other hand, regarded the strict separation of Israel from other nations, especially from the dominant Greeks, as hurtful; they were, therefore, in favour of the Seleucidæ. But perhaps the question was one of political ascendancy more than of religious antagonism. Matters came to an open conflict when Ptolemy VI. Philométor planned the subjugation of southern Syria (173 B.C.). The high priest Onias² felt himself so strong that he drove the Tobiadæ and their partisans from Jerusalem (Jos. B/i. 11). These sought help of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (175-164), who gladly seized the opportunity to get the better of Ptolemy's friends in Jerusalem. Any compendious account of the struggles in 173-170 for the high-priesthood in Jerusalem is difficult owing to the frequent contradictions of our two sources—Josephus and 2 Maccabees. The course of events was perhaps somewhat as follows: Antiochus IV. displaced ONIAS in favour of his hellenizing brother JASON. The latter in turn had to make way for MENELAUS in 171. In the first campaign of Antiochus IV. against Ptolemy, Jason came back and drove out Menelaus, but was unable to retain his position. He was perhaps slain by Onias (170 B.C.). Onias found an asylum for himself and his followers in Egypt (cp § 71 below). Menelaus was restored by Antiochus to the high-priesthood, and, as years passed, was the better able to ensure the king's protection since the latter had incensed against himself all the more seriously-minded Jews.

On returning from Egypt in 170 B.C., Antiochus made his way into the temple and plundered it. This desecration of the sanctuary aroused the religious feeling of the Jews, and showed them that they had nothing to expect in the way of appreciation of (not to speak of consideration for) their peculiarities. Even the more shortsighted and careless recognised the danger that threatened the Jewish community from the side of Greek civilisation. Any prospect of accommodation or even reconciliation vanished. The tension on both sides increased; even at this time there may perhaps have been bloody encounters in Jerusalem. But Antiochus did not on this account give up his plan of getting the little group of strange enthusiasts on the southern border of his kingdom out of his way; for him Jerusalem was nothing but an inconvenient focus of disturbance and insubordination. When, in 168 B.C., he had to retire before the Romans from Egypt, he sent an officer (Apollonius? 2 Macc. 5 24), who took the city by surprise, and turned the ancient city of David into a military fort (Acra, 1 Macc. 1 33 f.), the garrison of which held the inhabitants in terrified submission.

70. Antiochus Epiphanes.

Antiochus wished to destroy with a firm hand the real roots of opposition, and, accordingly, directed his measures against the Jewish religion. The cultus was suppressed; the altar of burnt offering was changed into a place of sacrifice to Zeus (1 Macc. 1 54 59); the Torah rolls were burnt; Jewish customs (Sabbath, circumcision, etc.) were forbidden; those who remained faithful to the law in spite of the pressure brought to bear on them were executed (December 168 B.C.). The high priest submitted. He plainly regarded it as possible to retain, as a Hellenistic Jew, the position of head of the Jewish community. With the energy which had been manifested at Jerusalem, the king's officers attempted also in the country districts to compel the Jews to offer heathen sacrifices and adopt heathen usages. Thus the work of Nehemiah and Ezra, moderate and conciliatory as it was, which offered a last retreat for the religion of Israel, was dissolved.

The fall of the power of Persia had left the way to the East open to Greece and all that it brought with it, and this it was that stifled the life of Judaism. Having nothing like it to oppose to it, Judaism was powerless against it: devout persons fled for their faith before it. To combat this faith in itself was not the intention of Antiochus; he did not understand it or even perceive that it was, just as at that time the Jews were nowhere understood by the Greeks. All that Antiochus saw in the Jewish faith was the source of passionate quarrels that he had to compose. As the priestly nobility were ready to fall in with him, we must not wonder that Antiochus imagined that he could win the compliance of the people also. But this calculation proved to be false; the Jews resisted. In virtue of his sovereign rights, he demanded of the Jews by force what other Syrian peoples had yielded to the Greek power without difficulty. And here we find his fundamental mistake: he saw nothing more in Yahwè the god of the Jews than in (say) Dagon the god of the Philistines, or in Melkarth the god of the Phœnicians.

The attitude of the Jews towards the violent measures of Antiochus was very various. The priestly aristocracy in Jerusalem submitted; for them probably the question of influence and their revenue was all-important. Onias the high priest, who had fled to Egypt, became the originator of a religious schism by which he seems to have meant to remove the ground from under the feet of the Palestinian Jews. With the permission of Ptolemy VI. Philométor (181-146), he built (in 170) on the ruins of an Egyptian sanctuary at Leontopolis in the district of Heliopolis (= Tell el-Yehūdīyya) a Jewish temple (Jos. Ant. xii. 9 7 133, BJ vii. 102 ff., cp DISPERSION, § 8). This remarkable undertaking was fitted to draw the Jews of Judæa who had remained true to the law in the same direction as the legitimate high-priesthood had gone—namely, to Egypt (cp Is. 19 19). There can be no doubt that at that time many went this way; it seemed a way out of the hopeless night. Most, however, of the devout-minded people could not bring themselves to abandon Yahwè's holy city, and its claim to be the holy city for all nations. They fled into the wilderness and hid themselves in clefts and caves. If attacked on the Sabbath they would quietly submit to death rather than desecrate the day by fighting.

This passive resistance, however, was suddenly changed into active. An aged and honoured country priest at

72. Revolt. Modein, a place between Bethoron and Lydda, slew a Jew who was offering sacrifice according to heathen ritual, killing the Syrian officer at the same time. Fleeing eastwards, Mattathias made his way in safety with his five sons over the mountains, and there in the wilderness entered into an agreement with others of like mind to fight, if attacked, even on the Sabbath. This was the signal for a religious war (167 B.C.). It was a desperate act, the most foolhardy in the whole history of Israel. Faith and holy indignation, exasperation and burning hate, drove the Jews to strain their powers to the utmost. They achieved indeed remarkable feats, aided by the natural advantages afforded them by their native mountains. The Maccabees, however, would have succumbed to the armies of the Seleucidæ had not the latter by their endless contests for the throne themselves provided an escape.

The example of Mattathias and his sons won over the adherents of the Law. Many sufferers from persecution, along with the union of the Assidæans (Häsidim, חסידים; 1 Macc. 2.42), joined them. Their first step was to use force against the renegade Jews, destroy the signs of heathenism in the land, and restore the customs of Israel. Meanwhile Mattathias died after

73. Judas. handing over the work to his sons Simon and Judas. The latter, Judas 'Maccabæus' (see MACCABEES, THE), undertook the leadership in the war (166 B.C.), and proved himself a devout and courageous man, equal to the task he had undertaken. It was only under him that the war with the Syrians themselves began. He first defeated Apollonius (1 Macc. 3.10 ff.; cp 2 Macc. 5.24); then, at Beth-horon, Seron the military commander of Cœle-Syria; then, at Emmaus (= .Amuäs), Gorgias, supported by the viceroy Lysias; and lastly, at Beth-zur, Lysias himself (165 B.C.). The generalship as well as the success of Judas reminds one vividly of the battles fought by Saul and David against the Philistines; faith-inspired enthusiasm, foolhardy valour, and judicious tactics, taking advantage of the natural difficulties of the ground, helped the Jews to victory. Thus, master of the open country between Bethzur and Beth-horon, Judas determined to make the

74. Cultus reorganised. capital the religious centre of revolt. (Mizpeh, north of Jerusalem, had hitherto been the place of resort for common prayer and lamentation.) The temple site was secured against attack from the Syrian garrison in the Acra; new priests were installed, upholders of the law; the signs of heathenism were removed from the sacred precincts; the legal cultus was restored in its full extent. On the 25th Kislev (December) 165 B.C. (exactly three years after its profanation) the temple was formally dedicated—a ceremony that was afterwards commemorated by a yearly feast (תּוֹבַחַת הַבַּיִת, Ps. 30 title). For Judas and his party these achievements were very important. They not only dismayed the friends of the Greeks and animated the hopes of the supporters of the law, but also robbed the schismatic attempt of Onias of all danger as far as Palestine was concerned. What a revolution in men's frame of mind had already occurred in Judah we learn from the Apocalypse of Daniel, which was written about this time (see DANIEL, § 8 f., and cp DEDICATION, FEAST OF).

The religious feeling of the author had already recovered its equilibrium; the leaders of the heathen party are derided; the faithful adherents of Yahwè are comforted; Yahwè himself brings to an end the rule of the heathen; his eternal kingship over the world passes to pious Israel; whoever has died without participating in the divine reward will receive it after the resurrection; the great distress is the pledge that the longed-for time, the glorification of Israel in the eyes of all nations, is at hand. The prophetic picture of Israel's future, repressed by Nehemiah and Ezra, has powerfully affected the author's thoughts. The victories of Judas count for little with him (Dan. 11.34); it is not success of human power that he desires for Israel; what he saw at hand is wrought by God himself—it is the end, the consummation. The ideas of the prophets appear in him in an eschatological form; the goal of his hopes is heaven and earth; the glory of Israel is the work and gift of God, not the fruit of the toil and labour of man.

The thoughts of the Maccabees led, as very soon appeared, to a different goal. The garrison of the Acra in Jerusalem, which was threatened by the growing power of Judas, sent word of their straits to King Antiochus V. Eupator about 163 B.C. The regent Lysias accordingly marched forth with the young king at the head of a large army against the insurgents, drove them back from the south to Jerusalem, and shut them up on the fortified temple-plateau. Matters threatened to go hard with Judas, when unexpectedly an arrangement was come to, by which the king allowed the Maccabees the free exercise of their religion, and promised them indemnity, while they in exchange were to hand over the sanctuary,—in addition to which, however, they had subsequently to consent to the dismantling of their fortresses.

The occasion for the religious war was thus removed, and the disastrous step of Antiochus IV. in 168 retraced. In consequence the question naturally arose: Ought not Judas and his followers to lay down their arms? Many thought so; in particular the Assideans; and so when ALCIMUS (g. z.), who was a priest of legitimate descent and had been nominated by Demetrius I. to the high-priesthood in succession to Menelaus, now at last deposed (171-164 B.C.), was about to be brought into Jerusalem by Bacchides the governor by military force, they declared themselves ready for peace (1 Macc. 7.12 ff.). Following the example of Nehemiah and Ezra, they for the present asked nothing more than religious freedom. Judas, on the other hand, would not hear of any such end to the war; for the sake of religious freedom, and in addition to it, he was determined to achieve political liberty. This too was a revival of prophetic ideas, yet without any such eschatological transformation as is met with in Daniel. The antithesis of the two tendencies, which was not at the outset absolute and irreconcilable, arose in part from divergent views of the situation at the moment, a situation in which Judas had no confidence. However this may be, it is at this date (162 B.C.) that the war of religion may be said to close, and the Maccabean struggles for secular power to begin.

Judas's distrust of Bacchides and Alcimus soon proved to have been justified. The confidence that had been reposed in them they rewarded with violence and blood; as ruler of the capital and of the country, Alcimus favoured the friends of the Greeks, and the situation once more became similar to what it had been between 173 and 168. After the withdrawal of Bacchides, however, Alcimus was unable to maintain his authority, and Demetrius I. ordered Nicanor to break the power of Judas. But an ineffective campaign ended in the defeat and death of that general in a battle between Beth-horon and Adasa on the 13th Adar (March) 161. Bacchides, on the other hand, once more joined by Alcimus, had better success. He routed the army of Judas near Eleasa (?), and Judas himself fell in the battle (161 B.C.).

The cause of the insurgents seemed utterly ruined (1 Macc. 9.23 ff.); all they could do was to maintain themselves in the wilderness of Tekoa as

76. Jonathan. a party of freebooters. Bacchides meanwhile sought by comprehensive measures to give peace and security to the country in the interests of Alcimus and his followers, yet without interfering with religious liberty. When, however, after the death of Alcimus (160 B.C.), a renewed effort to bring Jonathan and his followers under his power had proved abortive, Bacchides decided to enter into the negotiations for peace that Jonathan had proposed. In other words, he now sought to restore order in the country by the help of the very man whom, in common with the Grecian party, he had regarded as the arch disturber. The hellenizing priestly aristocracy thus lost their external support. Jonathan dispensed justice at Michmash and cleansed the land of Hellenisers. Only in Jerusalem and other strongholds did the foreign garrisons and their Jewish supporters retain command. The land itself now finally emerged from a state of war (158 B.C.). This was the first political success of Jonathan.

From this time onwards the rule of the Maccabees or Hasmonæans advanced steadily, as Jonathan was able to secure one advantage after another for himself from the contentions between the various claimants for the throne of the Seleucidæ. Moreover, the majority of the people were manifestly on his side. When, in 153, Alexander Balas was set up as king in opposition to Demetrius I., the latter sought the friendship of Jonathan by giving him permission to surround himself with an armed force. Jonathan transferred his abode to Jerusalem, and fortified the temple hill, and, except from the Acra and Bethzur, the Syrian garrisons were withdrawn. Demetrius was, however, outbidden by Alexander Balas, who designated Jonathan high priest and sent him a purple robe and a crown. Jonathan's ambition was stronger than his fidelity. At the Feast of Tabernacles in 153 B.C. he assumed the high-priestly office which had for seven years been vacant (Jos. Ant. xx. 10). Since Demetrius I., as it fell out, was worsted, Jonathan was able actually to enjoy the fruits of his crafty policy. In 150 B.C. Alexander showed him great honour at Ptolemais, and designated him a high official (σπαρατῆγός and μεριδάρχης) of the kingdom of Syria. Attempts to bring him into suspicion failed of their object. The contentions for the throne between Demetrius II. (see above, col. 1068) and Alexander Balas in 147 B.C. brought Jonathan new advantages; defeating Apollonius, the governor of Cœle-Syria appointed by Demetrius II., he received the town and district of Ekron. After the death of Alexander Balas (145) Jonathan bid defiance to Demetrius II. and besieged the Acra at Jerusalem, and when the king summoned him to Ptolemais in indignation Jonathan contrived to turn his anger into good will. His present dignities were confirmed, and the province of Judah, to which three districts (Apherema, Lydda, and Ramathaim) were added in the north, was declared free of tribute. What engagements Jonathan entered into on his side we do not know (1 Macc. 11.28 ff.). Anyhow, he was unable to get further concessions from Demetrius II., although it was by his soldiers that the king was rescued from the insurrectionary populace of his own capital. It is easy, accordingly, to understand Jonathan's taking the earliest opportunity of joining the side of the king's enemies.

A former officer of Balas, Trypho (Diodotus) of Apamea, came forward as guardian of Balas's young son, still a minor, and proclaimed him king as Antiochus VI. (145 B.C.). In return for valuable presents and confirmation in all his dignities, Jonathan undertook, along with his brother Simon, to drive out the troops and other supporters of Demetrius II. from southern and middle Syria, and assume possession of the land in the interest of Antiochus VI. The carrying out of this commission meant nothing more than the stamping out by force of any opposition the two brothers might encounter. This, however, did not satisfy Trypho, who was aiming at the crown for himself. He decoyed Jonathan to Ptolemais and confined him there. Simon made his way to

77. Simon. Jerusalem, where the people, supposing that Jonathan was already dead, elected him leader. He prepared to resist Trypho, who attempted to force his way into Judæa but had to withdraw without success after pretending to treat about handing over Jonathan. The execution of the latter at the command of Trypho at Baskama in Gilead left a free field to Simon (142-135 B.C.). He carried on the measures for securing the land, and concluded formal peace with Demetrius II., which not only put an end to war, but also secured absolute freedom from tribute, an event of such importance that Jewish dates were thenceforth reckoned from it (Sel. 170 = 143/142 B.C.). Next year, too, Simon forced the Syrian garrison to withdraw from the Acra. Thus disappeared from Jerusalem and Judæa the last mark of foreign supremacy. In 141 the people solemnly conferred on Simon the hereditary rule as high priest, commander-in-chief, and ethnarch (cp 1 Macc. 14.25 ff.). Simon struck the first Jewish coins (1 Macc. 156). Thus out of the war against Greek civilisation there had arisen a new Jewish state.

Simon and his successors not only maintained the position they had won, but also extended its influence. This was the easier that the kingdom of the Seleucidæ was more and more falling apart. Simon must also be regarded as the first of the Maccabees to gain the friendship of the Romans with a view to securing his position in Asia (142 B.C.; 1 Macc. 14.24, 40; Jos. Ant. xiii.73; Justin xxxvi. 3). From a contest with Antiochus VII. Sidetes (of Σιδῆ in Pamphylia), who, after unavailing negotiations, entrusted his general Cendebeus with the war, Simon came out victorious. He was honoured as a circumspect and righteous ruler. His violent death, however, was like a presage of the end the new line of rulers was to meet. Along with two of his sons he was murdered at the castle of Dok (Docus), near Jericho, by his son-in-law Ptolemy, who sought to make himself master of the land. But John Hyrcanus, Simon's third son, anticipated him and secured the support of the people of Jerusalem, where he ruled from 134 to 104.

In the beginning of his reign Hyrcanus was hard beset by Antiochus VII., who subjected Jerusalem to a long siege. That Hyrcanus came off after all without loss of territory may be attributed perhaps to Antiochus's policy, perhaps to the influence of the Romans in Hyrcanus's favour (cp Jos. Ant. xiii. 84 92). On his expedition against the Parthians Antiochus VII. lost his life (128 B.C.), and Hyrcanus once more asserted his independence. He maintained a standing army of mercenaries, built the so-called Baris on the NW. of the temple site (Ant. xviii. 43), and concluded a firm alliance with Rome (Ant. xiv. 10.22). He extended by conquest the narrow limits of his rule towards the E., S., and N. He destroyed the temple of the Samaritans on Mt. Gerizim, subjugated the Idumæans in the S., and compelled them to accept the Jewish Torah. The siege of the city of Samaria brought him once more, however, into serious conflict with the Seleucidæ, a conflict from which it was probably the powerful word of Rome that delivered him. Hyrcanus still regarded himself as in the first place high priest, and also enjoyed a high degree of popular favour. Yet even in his time emerged the opposition of the Pharisees against his family, which was only furthered by the closer connection between the Hasmonæans and the Sadducees. Hyrcanus's son and successor, Aristobulus I. (Judas), saw no means of securing his power save that of putting out of the way several members of his own family. He subjugated and made Jews of the Ituræans at what had till then been the N. limit of his domain (in Galilee?), and assumed the title of king. After a reign of one year (103 B.C.) he was succeeded by 79. Alexander Jannæus. his brother Alexander Jannæus (see JANNÆUS), who secured the throne by the murder of a brother (102-76 B.C.). In his reign the complete secularisation and transformation of the ruling priestly family became very obvious. He had coins struck, for example, not only with inscriptions in Hebrew characters, but also with bilingual inscriptions in Greek characters, in which he designated himself simply king. His aim was to extend as much as possible the bounds of his kingdom, and so he was almost constantly in the field or besieging fortified positions. His operations against Ptolemais involved him in a disadvantageous war with Ptolemy Lathyrus, from which he finally escaped only through the intervention of Ptolemy's mother, queen Cleopatra of Egypt. East of the Jordan, he subdued Gadara and Amathus; on the coast, Raphia, Anthedon, and Gaza.

The changing fortune of war, but still more his strained relations with the Pharisees, deprived him of the favour of the people. At first he sought to quench in blood every appearance of hostile feeling. When, however, he was defeated by the Arabian chief Obadas and lost his whole army, the popular fury broke into open revolt. People were not afraid even to go the length of rousing against the Hasmonæans Demetrius Acærus (Eucærus), one of the last of the Seleucidæ. Alexander Jannæus was defeated at Shechem and fled to the hills. Then the shame and regret of his people came to his succour. A considerable body of armed men gathered about him, with whom he cut his way through the opposing forces; and he came to temporary terms with Demetrius. Blood then flowed in streams to secure peace at home for this inhuman high priest.

The last years of his reign Alexander spent once more in foreign wars, especially with the Arabians. These had now for several centuries been slowly pressing forward out of the desert into the cultivated land, had already settled at certain points (Edom and Lebanon), and were now trying, like the Hebrews more than a thousand years before, to push forward into the heart of the country. Alexander Jannæus encountered them repeatedly on his military expeditions—successfully east of the Jordan, where he conquered Gerasa (?), Golan, and Seleucia. It was on one of these expeditions that he met his death (76 B.C.). His career strikes one as strange—it is as if the Hasmonæan had assumed something of the wildness and ferocity of the Seleucidæ. At all events, the inner contradiction inherent from the first in the Hasmonæan priest-kingship was now undeniable. If the advice he is said to have given his wife just before his death with regard to the conduct of the government (Jos. Ant. xiii. 15) be authentic, something of this contradiction must have been felt by Alexander Jannæus himself. He is represented as having advised his wife Alexandra (Hebr. Salomé or perhaps more correctly Salmā) to concede greater influence to the Pharisees—i.e., to go farther in giving spiritual affairs their rightful place.

Alexandra ruled from 75 to 67. She made over the high-priesthood to her oldest son Hyrcanus, an irresolute indolent man, and held back her second son, the daring Aristobûlus, from any share in public affairs. The power and extent of the kingdom—which was, roughly, equal to what it was in the days of David—she maintained intact, without entering on wars of any seriousness. In internal affairs the Pharisees were supreme (see below, § 83). Their feeling of satisfaction with the rule of Alexandra found expression in edifying fables, in which they extolled those days as a time of special felicity. Scarcely, however, had Alexandra closed her eyes, when there broke out between her sons that struggle for the succession in the course of which the kingdom of the Maccabees went down. Aristobûlus II. defeated Hyrcanus II. at Jericho, and forced him to enter into an agreement acknowledging Aristobûlus as king and high priest. But this peace was short-lived.

Soon there appeared at the head of the opposition to Aristobûlus an Idumæan named Antipater, whose father of the same name had been governor of Idumæa under Alexander Jannæus. This man, the father of the future king Herod, acquired great influence, and contracted alliances widely, in particular with Arêtas king of the Nabatæans. He persuaded Hyrcanus to seek refuge with him, and induced Arêtas, in consideration of promised cessions of territory, to make Hyrcanus king of Judæa by force. Arêtas actually defeated Aristobûlus, and drove him, supported by the Jews, to take refuge in the temple stronghold, where, with the priests, he defended himself boldly.

Such was the state of affairs in the Maccabæan kingdom when Pompey sent his legate Scaurus to Syria about Easter 65 B.C. The rival brothers made him the same offer as the price of his support. Scaurus decided in favour of Aristobûlus, and ordered Arêtas to return to his country; Hyrcanus had to content himself with a diminished territory. But Pompey himself had not yet spoken the final word. He was assailed with presents and embassies, and finally the two brothers themselves, as also representatives of the people who wished the ancient priesthood restored, received a hearing at Damascus in the spring of 63 B.C. Pompey wished to defer sentence; but when Aristobûlus appeared to be preparing to resist, Pompey pursued him with his army to his stronghold of Alexandrium, and then on by way of Jericho to before Jerusalem. Aristobûlus wavered, swaying between defiance and dejection. Pompey had him taken prisoner. The party of Hyrcanus gave over the city, while the supporters of Aristobûlus maintained the temple stronghold. Pompey found himself compelled to subdue this by a regular siege. After three months the Romans forced their way through a breach into the sacred enclosure, where a frightful massacre ensued, the Jews even slaughtering one another. Accompanied by his followers, Pompey visited the interior of the temple, without, however, touching the sacred furniture, and next day gave instructions that the regular sacrificial cultus was to be restored. Hyrcanus received the high-priestly office and with it a principality of diminished extent, and subject to tribute, while Aristobûlus had, with his family, including his two sons Alexander and Antigonus, to follow the conqueror to Rome. The freedom of the Jews had lasted but eighty years (142-63 B.C.). Its end was lamentable. The spirit that gave it birth had long been gone.

Before investigating the last fortunes of the Jews in Palestine under the Romans, we have to notice some internal events which occurred during the rule of the Maccabees. The latter had practically changed the religious community of Nehemiah and Ezra into a secular state; but they were far from subverting the institutions which had arisen out of that community. The high priest remained—they themselves were the high priests; and side by side with them there was still the college of elders (γερουσία), an aristocracy in which the social organism culminated.

It is probably to this body, with the high priest, that the phrase 'community of the Jews,' קְהִלַּת יִשְׂרָאֵל on the coins of the Maccabees from the reign of John Hyrcanus onward refers. At a later date the council usually received the Greek designation synedrion, Hebraised as sanhedrîn (סַנְהֶדְרִין).

However, though this supreme council remained, the seats in it were filled by supporters of the Hasmonæans. In the previous period (§§ 76 f.) the members had been the heads of the clerical and the lay nobility (besides the high priest); the ruling class thus formed received the name of Sadducee (from Zadok; cp Ezek. 44 15 f.). It may be asked whether any of these old families attached themselves to the Hasmonæans. All that we know is that, by the favour of the Hasmonæans, a new aristocracy arose, and, to a large extent, monopolised the seats in the Synedrion. This was the share of power accorded to them. That Alexander Jannæus gave the council but little scope is not surprising. They had ample compensation, however, under his successor Alexandra. The president of the council was the high priest, and Alexandra was a woman. Besides recognising the independence of the council, Alexandra gave seats and votes in it to the long-repressed party of the Pharisees. Their conceptions of religion and law thus received complete recognition, and the function of public judgment was transferred to the so-called Scribes, the sôphêrîm or masters of legal science. This was no slight curtailment of power for the once omnipotent lay nobility.

The leadership of the Synedrion remained with the priests—in the last instance with the high priest—but these found themselves compelled at all points to take account of the scribes who enjoyed the popular favour.

The membership of the supreme council reached the number of seventy-one.

The two parties brought into prominence by the changes in the Synedrium under Alexandra, the Pharisees and the Sadducees, claim our special attention. The Sadducees, in the strict sense of the word, indeed, were, as already stated (§ 81), displaced by the Hasmonæans. As the name persisted, however, we must suppose it to have been transferred to the new priestly aristocracy and their followers.

This is not difficult to understand, for on the one hand the ascendancy of priestly families remained, and on the other hand the same antitheses which had manifested themselves before the wars of religion, reappeared in an altered form. Before the wars, the priestly régime, by its friendliness to Hellenism, had imperilled religion, and now it seemed as if the secular rule of the Hasmonæans were about to overwhelm it altogether. Before the wars the Assidaeans with the scribes at their head had been drawn together for the defence of the heritage left by Nehemiah and Ezra; now it was the Pharisees who came forward on behalf of the law and against the national state which was breaking up the foundations of the law and of the religious community.

The Sadducees represent the new state which grew out of the Maccabean rising, the Pharisees, the community of which the Torah was the first

83. Pharisees. and final cause' (Wellhausen, Phar. u. Sadd. 24 f.). The Pharisees were energetic in the assertion of their principles certainly; but they renounced all political aims. They were not political like the Sadducees; like the Assidaeans, whose heirs they may probably be said to be, they held by the ideals of Nehemiah and Ezra. The Pharisees were the 'scribes' who in dead earnest sought to turn the law into practice with the utmost literality, and thus, if they did not create a new type of piety, they at least remodelled the old on much sharper lines.

It is in this sense that the name Pharisees ought to be taken (see SCRIBES AND PHARISEES); whether assumed by themselves or bestowed by others it well expresses their arrogant claim to be the true Israel. In particular, they put the sanctity of the sabbath upon a new level, and exacted an outward purity by a constantly increasing number of precepts, so that religious fellowship became more and more the fellowship of a school, and piety a highly specialised art. 'The unlearned cannot guard himself against sin, and the layman can never be truly pious' (Hillel). Ignorance of the Pharisæic teaching was in itself an evidence of want of righteousness; acquaintance with their legal precepts was held to be the only means for the attainment of true righteousness. Hence it is written in the Mishna (Sanh. 113): 'It is a graver sin to say aught against the learned in the law than to say aught against the law itself.'

As regarded the future of their people (see the Book of Daniel, and cp ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 47, 58 f.), the Pharisees expected to see the world-supremacy of Israel established by the immediate hand of God from heaven, and deemed it an impertinence to try human means of establishing it. The foreign rule of the Greeks (and afterwards of the Romans) they also considered contrary to the will of God; yet they held it more tolerable than the existence of a national state by which everything was secularised; in point of fact they could not dispense with foreign rule, for its disappearance would take away the condition on which their very existence depended—the law of the post-exilic community. To the national and political questions of the day they had no answer ready; they simply pointed to the future which God was to give. That a party like this should have been able to acquire so great an influence over the people is extraordinary; it is only partially explained by the secular rule of the Maccabean priestly kings. We must also bear in mind that the people longed for a spiritual food which their priestly leaders could not give them, and so betook themselves to the Pharisees who claimed, not without right, to be champions of the law.

Besides these two parties Josephus (Ant. xiii. 59) mentions a third alpeiris or 'sect'—that of the ESSENES

84. Essenes. (q. v.) In point of fact these were a brotherhood, somewhat of the nature of a monastic order. Josephus (l. c.) introduces them about the middle of the second century B.C. (cp Ant. xiii. 112). The name signifies 'the pious ones' (Aram.

אֲרִי), and seems to point to an origin similar to that of the Pharisees. The part they played in the history of Israel was quite unimportant. One of the leaders in the war against Rome was an Essene (Jos. B/ ii. 204).

To return now to the narrative. In 63 B.C. Pompey constituted Syria a Roman province, thus establishing the Roman hold upon the western portion of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ.

85. Hyrcanus and Antipater. The Jewish portion properly so called—Judæa, Galilee, and Peræa—he left under the high priest, Hyrcanus, who, however, was subordinate to the governor of the province and paid taxes to him. At the same time Pompey 'liberated' from the Jewish rule certain towns on the coast and in Peræa, which soon united themselves into a league, the so-called DECAPOLIS (q. v.). Aristobulus and his children Pompey took with him to Rome. These arrangements were a severe blow to the power of the Hasmonæan dynasty and its supporters, the Sadducees. It need not surprise us, therefore, if some resistance was offered; and so strong was the attachment of the people to the native house that in every attempt at revolt a native army was always at command. Jewish history henceforward, accordingly, down to the accession of Herod, is mainly a record of the rebellions against the Romans and of the disturbances connected with the Roman civil wars so far as these affected Syria.

Aristobulus's eldest son, Alexander, had escaped from Pompey and summoned the Jews to arms against his uncle Hyrcanus, the nominee of Rome. The governor of Syria, Gabinius, however, in 57 B.C., shut him up in the stronghold of Alexandrium and compelled him to lay down his arms. In the revolt, Gabinius, plainly with the view of further weakening the Jewish power and lessening the influence of Jerusalem, the capital, broke up the Hasmonæan territory into five administrative divisions—those of Jerusalem, Jericho, Gazara, Amathus, and Sepphoris. A second revolt was headed by Aristobulus himself, who, with his younger son Antigonus, had escaped from Rome; but he was taken prisoner in Machærus and sent back to the imperial capital. Whilst Gabinius was engaged on an Egyptian expedition, a third rising was led by Alexander; but his army was dispersed in 55 B.C. by Gabinius, who had hastened back and now rewarded Hyrcanus and Antipater for their fidelity to Rome by cancelling the arrangement made two years before, and restoring Hyrcanus to his former authority. M. Licinius Crassus, the triumvir, who succeeded Gabinius in the following year, seized the temple treasure of Jerusalem; and after his death the quaestor Cassius Longinus suppressed a fourth revolt of the Hasmonæan party which had broken out, under the leadership of Pitholaus, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee (Taricheæ). Pitholaus was put to death and Alexander brought under pledges to keep the peace (cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 5 ff., B/ i. 8). Julius Cæsar's purpose of sending Aristobulus against the followers of Pompey in Syria was frustrated by the poisoning of Aristobulus before he could leave Rome (49 B.C.). Shortly afterwards Alexander the son of Aristobulus also was put to death, by Pompey's orders, at Antioch. Antipater was more fortunate when, after the battle of Pharsalus and the death of Pompey (48 B.C.), the victorious Cæsar was pressed hard in Alexandria. So useful was Antipater to him that Cæsar acknowledged his debt to the Idumæan by the gift of the Roman citizenship and immunity from taxes. At the same time he confirmed Hyrcanus in his high-priestly office. Antigonus too, the son of Aristobulus, presented himself before Cæsar in Syria and pressed his claims; the only result, however, was that Cæsar bestowed still more signal marks of favour upon Antipater, whom he appointed 'steward' or procurator (ἐπιτροπος) of Judæa. At the same time he constituted Hyrcanus and his sons hereditary allies of the Romans, guaranteeing them immunity from imposts, with other privileges, and granting permission to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xiv. 8-10, B/i. 9*f.*).

Thus the Jewish aristocracy gained nothing by all its scheming. The power of the hated Idumæan, Antipater, went on increasing, and although he was astute enough to pose always as the faithful servant of his lord, in point of fact, under the languid administration of Hyrcanus, he had a free hand. He carried on the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem and established good order throughout the country, committing the administration of Jerusalem and the south to his son Phasaël, and that of Galilee to his son Herod. The Jewish aristocracy, from their own point of view, were fully justified when they sought to get rid of both him and his sons. For this a pretext was supplied them by a high-handed proceeding of Herod, who, in Galilee, had caused to be executed without reference to the council a certain Hasmonæan commander, Ezekias, and certain of his followers who had sought at their own hand to continue the opposition against the Roman supremacy. The dominant party in Jerusalem persuaded Hyrcanus to call Herod to account before the council in Jerusalem. Herod duly appeared, but not as a culprit, and, supported by Sextus Cæsar, the governor of Syria, succeeded in overawing the council so that no judgment was given. Once more he returned at the head of an army and threatened the city; but Antipater was able to appease his wrath. The aristocratic party, however, did not rest content with this. Some years later when C. Cassius Longinus, one of the murderers of Cæsar, was living in Syria (44-42 B.C.), Antipater was poisoned, probably with the connivance of Hyrcanus, by an Arabian prince (Malichus) who seems to have been in his service.

Whilst Malichus was still seeking to gain time, however, before striking again, Herod got rid of him by an assassin's hand (Jos. Ant. xiv. 11, B/i. 10 86. Herod. 4*f.*). Though Antipater had fallen, his family retained or even increased its power. Herod earned on all hands thanks and praise when, in 42 B.C., he successfully repelled, on the borders of Judæa, an attack made by Antigonus with the support of Ptolemy Mennai of Chalcis (Lebanon). Hyrcanus himself publicly showed his favour for him by giving him in marriage his granddaughter Mariamme, a daughter of Alexander. By liberal presents Herod strengthened his hold on Antony, who made Syria his headquarters for some time after the battle of Philippi (42 B.C.), in spite of adverse deputations from the hostile party in Jerusalem. Phasaël and Herod were appointed tetrarchs and charged with the government of the Jewish provinces of Palestine (41 B.C.; cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 12*f.*). However, though all promised well for Herod, it was only to last for a short time. This was how the change occurred. Lysanias of Chalcis, son and successor of Ptolemy Mennai, had carried on negotiations between Antigonus and the Parthians under Pacorus who, in 40 B.C., had pressed into the province of Syria, with the result that the conquering invaders were induced by great promises to make Antigonus king of Judæa. The stroke succeeded; Antigonus found a sufficient number of anti-Roman followers; in Jerusalem itself the parties came to blows. The Parthians induced Hyrcanus and Phasaël to go for purposes of negotiation into the camp of the Parthian satrap Barzaphranes; at his instance they were made prisoners at Ecdippion (Achzib) by the sea-side. Herod escaped the machinations of his enemies by a timely flight to the fortress of Masada by the Dead Sea, where also his family found safety. In this way Antigonus (Heb. Mattathias) came once more into the heritage of his ancestors (40-37 B.C.). Hyrcanus and Phasaël were handed over to him by the Parthians; the former he caused to be incapacitated (by mutilation) for the high-priestly office; Phasaël committed suicide. The Parthians, after seeking to compensate themselves for their services by extensive raids, carried Hyrcanus off to Parthia, where, however, at the intercession of the Jews in that country he was set at liberty (Jos. Ant. xiv. 13*3f.*, B/i. 13).

Herod, however, did not give up his cause for lost. His request for money being rejected by Malichus (the Nabatean prince), he applied to Antony, 87. Herod, journeying by Alexandria and Rhodus to king. Rome. By large promises he induced Antony, who saw how useful he might become, to nominate him through the Senate (with the support of Octavian) king of the Jews. After only seven days Herod was able to set out for his new kingdom (40 B.C.). His way to the throne, however, was not to be as smooth as he hoped. In 39 B.C. he landed at Ptolemais. With the help of Ventidius, the governor of Syria, he first relieved his brother Joseph in Masada and then appeared with his army before Jerusalem. Antigonus, however, had bribed the Roman general Silo, and Herod was soon compelled to retire to Galilee; nor did he again resume operations in Galilee and Judæa (where meanwhile his brother Joseph had fallen) till after he had received fresh encouragement from Antony who was hurrying through to the siege of Samosâta in Commagene. In the spring of 37, however, Herod again attacked Jerusalem, and with the help of Sosius the governor captured it after a five months' siege. Antigonus, who had surrendered to Sosius, was, at the instance of Herod, beheaded in Antioch. Thus, after three long years from his nomination, Herod actually came to his throne (37-4 B.C.). The Idumæan house of Antipater had by Roman help vanquished the house of the Sadducees (Jos. Ant. xiv. 14-16, B/i. 14*183*).

Two things Herod considered to be indispensable for his government—the continued friendship of the Romans and the extinction of the Hasmonæan party. The former object he sought to secure by princely gifts of money; the latter he came near attaining by putting many of the adherents of Antigonus to death: he also lowered the dignity of the high-priesthood by filling the office at his pleasure. To keep on good terms with Antony was an anxious task, as Cleopatra of Egypt coveted southern Syria, and Alexandra, widow of the murdered Alexander (see above), found it to her interest to intrigue with Cleopatra against Herod. The latter had conferred the high-priesthood upon an 'obscure' priest from Babylon named Ananel (Jos. Ant. xv. 24), thereby giving great umbrage to his mother-in-law Alexandra, who had wished to secure the office for her son Aristobûlus. To avoid losing Antony's favour through Cleopatra, Herod forthwith deposed Ananel, and appointed the handsome and popular Aristobûlus in his place. Nevertheless Alexandra still found cause to complain of Herod, and was meditating a secret flight to Cleopatra with her son, when the scheme was betrayed, and Aristobûlus was put to death (35 B.C.). The end of the long story is that Herod's good fortune did not desert him even when Alexandra complained to Cleopatra: Herod once more pacified his patron. Cleopatra made sure of large tracts in Palestine ceded to her by her lover, including the fruitful region of Jericho. All this was on the eve of the decisive battle of Actium. To please Cleopatra Herod had to take the field against the Arabs, whose tribute he had to collect for the queen. He succeeded in conquering them; but it was a hard struggle. Then came the fresh difficulty of winning over to his side the new master of the world, for Antony's cause was ruined. His cunning suggested to him what to do. First, he put out of the way the aged Hyrcanus (whom in the beginning of his reign he had brought back from Babylonia) as an alleged conspirator, and then he went in person to Rhodus and laid his crown at the feet of the victorious Octavian. The result was as he had calculated. Octavian not only confirmed him in his position, but soon after the death of Cleopatra bestowed upon him her domains, as well as other important places in S. Syria. With a single break (Jos. Ant. xvi. 9*f.*) Herod retained the favour of Augustus down to the end of his reign; Josephus declares that he 'was beloved by Cæsar next after Agrippa, and by Agrippa next after Cæsar' (Jos. BJ i. 20.4). Some years later (circa 25 B.C.) he removed the last danger to his crown. The only remaining male descendants of the Asmonæan family were the sons of Baba (Sabba?). He accused them of treason and caused them to be slain.¹

The position of Herod in the Roman Empire was that of a rex socius. His title and authority he held from Cæsar and the Senate. He had to defend the imperial frontier and to furnish auxiliary troops, but was not allowed to make treaties or wage wars at pleasure. On the other hand, he had full freedom in the management of domestic affairs, and was not laid under any tribute, or made subject to the authority of the Roman governor of the province of Syria. The confidence placed by Augustus in his capacities he fully justified. The ravages committed by the Arabs of Trachonitis had caused great complaints. With great skill Herod penetrated into this difficult region, and enforced peace,² receiving from Cæsar a large territory to the N.E. (Batanea, Trachonitis, Gaulanitis). In 20 B.C. Herod was also endowed with the tetrarchy of Zenodorus (Ulatha and Panias).³

Favoured by the pax Romana, Herod did much for the cultivation of the land. He created magnificent cities (Samaria=Sebaste; Strato's Tower = Cæsarea) and built numerous fortresses, temples, theatres, and baths. He extended and beautified the temple site at Jerusalem, and built anew the temple itself. He helped his people in many ways (see, e.g., the account of the famine),⁴ and yet he could only now and then secure their full approval.⁵ Never did the Jews feel affection for his person; they rightly saw in him the obedient servant of Rome, and were all the less ready to forget that he was only a 'half Jew.' His reign did nothing to lessen the tension between Jew and Greek; it rather increased the tension, although he made extraordinary efforts to introduce the seductions of Hellenism into the 'holy mountain.' In a certain sense his aims were those of Antiochus Epiphanes; but he more nearly reached them. He knew the Jews well, and generally speaking spared their religious feelings; the affair of the high-priesthood is an exception. To Hellenise such a people as the Jewish, however, was no longer possible; neither by gentleness nor by severity could the effects of the great Religious War be obliterated. Besides, Herod had really no skill in the arts of compromise and conciliation. He was too passionate, too suspicious, too domineering to be able to inspire confidence. To the end he never lost the tyrant's lust for power, never enjoyed the settled stability of a really strong monarch. Indeed, one may doubt whether he had any wish beyond keeping his power over the Jews; their Hellenisation he did not seriously care for. His entire policy can be explained from this point of view—even to some extent his abominable murders, though it must be admitted that these were partly stimulated by circumstances which could not but excite his jealousy.

Herod's reign was not wanting in splendour. His love of display manifested itself in the magnificent buildings which he erected both within his kingdom and beyond it (cp Jos. BJ i. 21). He had connections with prominent representatives of the culture of the time—notably Nicolaus Damascenus. The visit of M. Vipsanius Agrippa to Jerusalem threw the Jews into veritable transports of joy (Ant. xvi. 2). The foundation of Herod's power, however, was hollow. His extraction indeed made him unfit to be a national king, and in his heart he was more Greek than Jew (Ant. xix. 73). What is more, a national kingdom was no longer what the Jewish community desired. Religion had taken a new turn under the influence of the Pharisees; it was now much more supramundane; the law and the monarchy it held to be irreconcilable. However zealously Herod may have sought at first to meet the Pharisees' views, they could never become his friends. They refused to take the oath of allegiance, just as the Essenes did (Jos. Ant. xv. 10 4 xvii. 24). The old aristocracy he himself had deprived of its influence; to support his rule he had therefore nothing to rely on but force. He never shrank from employing any means, however ghastly, to gain this end (Ant. xv. 8 10 4 xvii. 6, BJ i. 336). Cp further, HEROD, § 3 f.

In his first will, made after the execution of Alexander and Aristobulus, his two sons by the Hasmonæan 89. The succession.

Mariamme (6 B.C.), Herod had appointed Antipater his son by his first marriage to succeed him. Even before the execution of Antipater in 5 B.C., however, this arrangement had been exchanged for another according to which Antipas, his youngest son, by his marriage with the Samaritan Malthacæ, was to be his heir. Shortly before his death (4 B.C.), he cancelled this settlement also, and designated Archelaus¹ as king, Antipas and Philip² tetrarchs—the former of Galilee and Peræa, the latter of Trachonitis, Batanea, Gaulanitis and Paneas. The validity of this will he himself made to depend on its confirmation by Augustus. Hence his heirs one after the other betook themselves to Rome to find safe anchorage for their ship while the storm of revolt was already raging at home. Before Augustus gave his decision, fresh petitioners arrived. It was a deputation of Jews deprecating the continuance of the existing order of things, and desiring that the whole country might be brought immediately under the Roman sway. Augustus, however, decided in favour of Herod's last will. Archelaus as ethnarch became ruler over Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, with the exception of the cities of Gaza, Gadara, and Hippus, which were incorporated with the province of Syria; Antipas became tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, and Philip tetrarch of Trachonitis as far as the Jordan (Jos. Ant. xvii. 9-16).

This apportionment of Herod's dominions did not last long, so far as the realm of Archelaus was concerned (4 B.C.—6 A.D.). A deputation of Jews and Samaritans complained to Augustus of his arbitrariness and cruelty, and Augustus, the emperor, summoned him to Rome and deposed him, relegating him to Vienna in Gaul. His dominions became part of Syria, but under the special charge of a procurator (ἐπιτροπος) of equestrian rank (6-41 A.D.).

The procurators were so called, originally, from the duty which fell to them of collecting the revenues for the imperial treasury. As administrators of a given district they had at the same time the military command, and also judicial prerogatives. These last the procurators of Judæa used but seldom. The ordinary dispensation of justice was left in the hands of the highest native court, the Synedrium, whose position received thereby fresh importance. The ius gladii, however, remained exclusively with the procurator. For military purposes he had not, like the legate-governor of Syria, Roman legions at his disposal, but only auxiliary troops raised in the country itself (Καυσαρείς καὶ Σεβαστηνοί). The military headquarters were at the residence of the procurator—Cæsarea; but there were garrisons all over the country; in the citadel Antonia at Jerusalem, for example, a cohort was stationed. The imperial taxes the procurator collected through the native authorities; how wide were the ramifications of these is shown by the list of eleven toparchies enumerated by

90. Procurator-ship.

² Son of Cleopatra of Jerusalem.

Josephus (BJ iii. 35). The local taxes, on the other hand, were farmed out to contractors (publicani, τελωῖται), who, as a rule, doubtless, were Jews. The Jews had to take an oath of allegiance to the emperor; and though worship of the emperor was not exacted of them, sacrifice for him was offered in the temple twice daily. The Jewish worship stood under the protection of the Roman state; but this did not exclude a certain amount of supervision of temple matters by the Roman officials. As a rule it was customary to spare Jerusalem the sight of the imperial emblems ('effigies') carried by the troops (cp ENSIGN).

Such in brief were the arrangements set up in the domains of Archelaus in 6 A.D.—arrangements which had been desired by the Jews at the death of Herod. The system conferred upon them a higher degree of self-government, and therefore of liberty to follow their own laws and customs, than they had previously enjoyed. An aristocratic constitution with the high priest at its head (Jos. Ant. xx. 10) again came into being. The aristocratic families reaped the chief advantage from this, although in the Synedrium they had to share the power with the Pharisees. The high priests were named, however, by the Roman governors, and it only too soon became evident that the immediate rule of the Romans did not tend to tone down but rather to exaggerate points of difference.

The procurators who held office in Judæa from 6 to 41 A.D. were: Coponius, M. Ambivius, Annius Rufus, Valerius Gratus (15-26), Pontius Pilate (26-36), Marcellus (36-37), and Marullus (37-41) (Jos. Ant. xviii. 22 42 610). At first no doubt unwittingly, but afterwards certainly of malice, they often wounded the religious susceptibilities of the Jews. Pontius Pilate went so far in this that a complaint laid by the Samaritans before the legate L. Vitellius (35-39 A.D.) proved effectual; Vitellius sent Pilate on his defence to Rome and took measures to quiet the agitated spirits in Jerusalem. He handed over to the priests the high-priestly robes which had been kept in Baris-Antonia since the days of John Hyrcanus, and caused his army on its march against the Nabatæans to avoid Jerusalem so that the holy land of the Jews might not be desecrated by the imperial emblems (37 A.D., cp Jos. Ant. xviii. 43 53). These little courtesies, however, were wholly inadequate to heal the ominous breach which was daily driving Jews and Romans farther apart.

With the first procurator Coponius the imperial legate P. Sulpicius Quirinius (Lk. 21 ff.) had come as

91. Quirinius: governor to Syria, and in 6-7 A.D. carried out the Roman census in Judæa. This new method of taxation excited great horror and aversion. The high priest Joazar, a son of Boethus (Ant. xv. 93), was able indeed to turn aside the threatened storm; but the proceeding left a deep mark behind it in the rise of the Zealots—a political party which regarded the payment of taxes to the foreigner as the token of a sinful servitude (God alone requiring to be honoured as king and lord), and therefore advocated war to the death for the establishment of the divine kingship, according to the promise. The founders of the party were Sadduk the Pharisee and Judas the Galilæan (of Gamala) who may probably be regarded as son of the so-called 'robber' Ezekias who was put to death by Herod (Jos. Ant. xvii. 105 xiv. 93 ff. xviii. 1). The very designations of the two leaders would lead us to expect to find in this new party a combination of the doctrines of Pharisaism with the practical aims of Hasmonæan patriotism; and this expectation is realised in the attitude the Zealots actually took. From the Pharisees they took over the then current form of prophetic eschatology—the divine kingship, destruction of the enemies of the nation, freedom, the Messiah, etc.; from the Hasmonæans, the precepts which enjoined a bold fight for religion and fatherland. To expect the divine kingship yet quietly to accept the kingship of the godless, they regarded as a sinful absurdity. The Pharisees repudiated this departure from the purity of their principles (cp Jos. Ant. xviii. 1); but the intensified religious interest which had been diffused throughout the nation by their own influence had prepared the soil for the seed of the Zealots. Between the Sadducean aristocrats (who had again come to the helm after the deposition of Archelaus) and the Zealots, collision was inevitable; the two parties were mutually irreconcilable, as had already been seen at the census of Quirinius. The more the Jews had experience of the harshness of the Roman rule, the more numerous did the Zealot party become. As contrasted with the half-hearted they came forward as thorough, as the out-and-out party who not only taught about the kingdom of God but also were willing to put their lives into jeopardy to set it up. Their immediate result was to keep their own people and the Romans in a state of unrest; but their ultimate aim was to secure the mastery of the capital. So soon as they had reached it, the hour would have struck for the last decisive struggle with the Romans.

In this position of parties there arose once more, unexpectedly, the prophetic summons: Turn ye (שׁוּבוּ; μετανοείτε).

92. John the Baptist. Since Mal. 37 had been uttered, it had fallen into oblivion; it seemed indeed to have become unnecessary.

However, John the Baptist (28-29 A.D.) with his call to repentance presented a picture of the future quite different from that cherished by his contemporaries. The alternative to repentance was judgment, and if he was right, it was on the Scribes and Pharisees that the divine judgment would fall first. His preaching found much acceptance, and before his career was cut short by Herod Antipas (see below, § 95) Jesus of Nazareth had raised the same cry, not in the wilderness, but in the haunts of men.

To Jesus the right way to God was clear; he himself exemplified that way, and he so taught concerning it as to make it easy for any one to find it.

93. Jesus. His thoughts show the closest contact with the religious tendencies of the time; evidently they took shape under the pressure of the questions which were stirring his contemporaries. They had their own roots, however, in a supramundane sphere, and therefore could not be confined by the narrow limits of Judaism. To the call to repentance Jesus added as a motive that the kingdom of God was at hand, thereby characterising the traditional piety as powerless to reach that divine goal. In his teaching he used the same terms as the popular leaders of the time; but he put other ideas into them. Without discarding the current conceptions of a coming judgment and regeneration of the world, he substituted for a Jewish world-theocracy, the idea of a kingdom of kindred souls bound together by their common faith in God and love to man. He dissolved the strange combination of heavenly and earthly elements which formed the latest Jewish eschatology, and thus cleared away the last remnants of the popular religion,—including of course the popular conception of the Messiah. He taught men to apprehend not only God but also the fellowship of man with God in a spiritual manner. For him as for them, the kingdom of God was a divine institution, a divine gift; but it was for men themselves ever to create it afresh and extend it among themselves day by day. All this and more may be historically said of the teaching of the Master (see JESUS, § 11 ff.), who at length crowned his work by enduring a shameful and painful death as of God's ordering, and as the way to complete ultimate success.

All this meant an open breach with Judaism. The ruling classes scorned the means of raising their religion to a higher plane pointed out to them by Jesus of Nazareth. Nay, more: they pronounced him a blasphemer when in his appearance before the high priest he acknowledged himself to be the Messiah—not of course in the sense attached to the word by current Judaism (see MESSIAH, § 6), but in the sense of being the final exponent of the full divine meaning of the religion of Israel. This new forthsetting by his ministry obtained such a degree of independence and strength as no longer to require the shelter of a nationality or of a national religion, and became capable of forming a society of its own, drawn from humanity at large. Judaism, in isolating itself from the course of this development, had to take the consequences. When Christianity and Judaism gradually separated, it was as if a mighty river had changed its bed: a feeble current still crept along the old channel; but the main, the perennial, stream flowed elsewhere.

We turn now to the northern portion of Herod's divided kingdom. As we have seen, the north-eastern part had been assigned to Philip, Herod's son by Cleopatra of Jerusalem. 94. Philip the Tetrarch. 'Philip' built himself a new capital, Caesarea (Philippi), near the most easterly of the Jordan sources on the site of the ancient Paneas, and with the title of tetrarch governed the eastward-lying territory, mainly inhabited by Gentiles, as far as the mountains of the Haurān. It was to his zeal for building that the fishing village Bethsaida (called by him Julius after the daughter of Augustus) owed its promotion to the rank of city. He married Salome (see § 95), and died without issue in 33-34 A.D. Josephus speaks of him as a wise and just prince (Ant. xviii. 46). After his death his dominions were thrown into the province of Syria till 37 A.D., when Caligula bestowed them, with the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Abilene), upon a grandson of Herod and Mariamme—Agrippa I., the son of Aristobulus,—with the title of king (Jos. Ant. xviii. 21 46 6 10).

The territory assigned to Herod Antipas, on the other hand—Galilee and Peræa—was mainly peopled by Jews. For the protection of the main road through Galilee he fortified Sephoris, while towards the S., as a frontier fortress against the Arabs, he built Betharamphtha (Beth-haran) which he named Livias or Julius; but in this line of activity his greatest work was the foundation and adornment of Tiberias. His first wife, whom he married for political motives, was a daughter of the Nabatean King Aretas; after his repudiation of her he allied himself with the ambitious Herodias (see HEROD, § 7). Through her daughter Salome she procured the death of John the Baptist (29 A.D.), whom Herod Antipas had caused to be imprisoned in the fortress of Machærus (see JOHN THE BAPTIST, MACHÆRUS). King Aretas began hostilities on account of the repudiation of his daughter, and inflicted a severe blow upon Herod (36 A.D.). At the instance of the latter, Tiberius ordered his legate Vitellius to suppress Aretas; but while halting at Jerusalem on his way to Nabatea, Vitellius (37 A.D.) heard of the death of Tiberius and forthwith abandoned the expedition. The bestowal of Philip's tetrarchy on Agrippa I. by Caligula led Herodias to urge her husband to go to Rome for a royal title also. At the same time, however, Fortunatus, an ambassador of Agrippa, arrived in the capital with heavy charges affecting the fidelity of Antipas; and as the latter was not able entirely to clear himself, he was deposed by the emperor and banished to Lugdunum in Gaul, whither he was followed by Herodias, his territory being added to the dominions of King Agrippa I. (39-40 A.D.; see HEROD, § 12).

Under Caligula (37-41 A.D.) a heavy storm-cloud gathered over Jerusalem. In 39 A.D.—thus immediately

96. Petronius. after the outbreak of the bloody persecution of the Jews in ALEXANDRIA (g.v.)—a conflict between the Gentile and the Jewish inhabitants of the emperor's city of Jamnia gave occasion for a command by Caligula to P. Petronius, the governor of Syria, to have the statue of the emperor set up by force in the temple at Jerusalem. If the Jews refused compliance they exposed themselves to the wrath of the emperor, who sought the customary divine worship for his own person in good earnest; but compliance would involve disloyalty to their law. They proceeded accordingly in troops to Ptolemais where Petronius was collecting his army, and laid before him solemn protests against what was being proposed. In Tiberias, whither Petronius had betaken himself, the Jews convinced him still further of their inflexibility in this matter, and he accordingly came to the resolution to try to change the emperor's mind. This had in point of fact already been accomplished by Agrippa I. who was then staying in Rome; but when the report of Petronius reached the emperor's hands he was thrown into such a furious passion by the obstinacy of the Jews that he sentenced Petronius to death for disobedience. Tidings of the murder of Caligula (Jan. 41) arrived, however, in time to prevent the execution of this order. Thus the storm-cloud passed away and the outlook of Judæa became brighter than even the boldest had ventured to hope (Phil. Leg. ad Caium, § 30 ff.; Jos. Ant. xviii. 8).

One of the first acts of the emperor Claudius (41-54 A.D.) was not only to confirm Agrippa in his former

97. Agrippa I. dominions but also to add to them Judæa and Samaria. Thus without once drawing sword this gay and showy knight of fortune had come into the entire kingdom of his grandfather Herod. He held it for three years (41-44 A.D.). He knew how to utilise with skill both persons and circumstances alike in Rome and in Palestine. In Jerusalem and elsewhere, where it seemed expedient, he held himself up as the patron and supporter of the approved Pharisaic Judaism of the day. In Cæsarea, as everywhere else among foreigners, he was the man of Greek culture, the friend of the Romans. During his brief reign the land had rest. He even received the praise of the Pharisees, who, we may be sure, would hardly have remained permanently his supporters. Against the heads of the young and growing Christian Church he took violent measures (Acts 12-19). He even made faint tentative efforts to give an anti-Roman character to his reign. He began the building of a strong wall round the northern suburb of Jerusalem; but the legate Marsus procured the imperial prohibition. He also summoned five Roman vassal princes of Syria and Asia Minor to Tiberias; but Marsus again ordered them back to their places. Agrippa I. died suddenly in Cæsarea; his Gentile soldiers welcomed the tidings with joy (Jos. Ant. xix. 4-9).

Claudius, yielding to the representations of those around him, decided not to nominate the son of

98. Procurators. Agrippa I. (also called Agrippa), now seventeen years of age, to the vacant throne, but to place the whole territory under procurators subordinate to the governor of Syria. Very soon again there arose the strained relations which had been found so intolerable in Judæa and Samaria under the previous procurators from 6 A.D. onwards. The first procurator, Cuspius Fadus, revived the old controversy as to the custody of the high-priestly vestments; but, by the emperor's command, the arrangement arrived at by Vitellius in 36 A.D. was adhered to (Jos. Ant. xx. 1), and the supervision of the temple, as well as the right to nominate the high priest, was now bestowed upon Herod of Chalcis (41-48 A.D.), a brother of the deceased Agrippa. What the disposition of the Jews was is indicated by the appearance of the prophet-adventurer Theudas, with whom, however, Cuspius Fadus made short work (Jos. Ant. xx. 51; cp Acts 5 36). His successor Tiberius Alexander, of Jewish-Alexandrian origin, caused the sons of Judas of Gamala, Jacob and Simon, to be crucified—no doubt as being prominent among the Zealots (Ant. xx. 52). After the ravages of a great famine, the exasperation of the Jews against the administration of Ventidius Cumanus (48-52) began to show itself in open insurrection. During the feast of the Passover, a soldier of the Roman guard had insulted the Jews; their complaints led the procurator to take certain defensive measures which in their turn caused a great panic in which many lives were lost (Ant. xx. 53). A Roman soldier seized hold of a roll of the Law; the excitement of the Jews over this was so great that Cumanus caused the soldier to be beheaded (Ant. xx. 54). Festival pilgrims from Galilee were attacked by Samaritans, the Jews retaliated, and when Cumanus sternly interfered, the leading people in Jerusalem had the utmost difficulty in averting a general outbreak. The dispute was referred by the governor Ummidius Quadratus to the judgment of the emperor, who at the instance of young Agrippa sentenced Cumanus to banishment (Ant. xx. 61 ff.; BJ ii. 123 ff.; otherwise Tac. Ann. 1254).

The successor of Cumanus, Antonius Felix (52-60 A. D., see FELIX), was so arbitrary and cruel that discipline broke down and public order threatened to disappear. The Zealots from their hiding-places made the country insecure; it availed little that Felix effected numerous executions and caused their leader Eleazar, who had been taken captive, to be sent to Rome. They began to be looked upon as the champions of liberation from the Roman yoke; their following increased and they secretly leavened the masses with the spirit of revolt. They were named, from the weapon (sica) which they carried concealed under their garment, Sicarii. They assassinated at their own choice, but also at the instigation of others; for example, at the instigation of Felix himself they murdered Jonathan the high priest, who had become an inconvenient monitor. Fanatics, both honest and dishonest, possessed by the eschatological ideas of the time, were continually throwing the sparks of religious enthusiasm among the excited and inflammable masses (cp Acts 21 38; BJ ii. 134 f.). Even the Jewish governing class, the priestly and the lay aristocracy, became disintegrated, each fragment using such power as it had for selfish ends (Jos. Ant. xx. 85-8; BJ ii. 132-6). Meanwhile, the oversight of the temple, and the right to nominate the high priest, after the death of Herod of Chalcis, was conferred by Claudius upon his nephew Agrippa II. (about 50 A. D.), who also received the territory of Chalcis and afterwards (about 53 A. D.), in place of this, the former tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, as well as the territory of Varus (Noarus) with the title of king (Ant. xx. 52 71 97).

The flame of avowed revolt burst forth not in Jerusalem but in Cæsarea. Here in this half-Gentile, half-Jewish city a dispute for supremacy had arisen between the two classes. After Antonius Felix (52-60) had been recalled by Nero and a successor (Porcius Festus, 60-62) appointed in his place, the Gentiles of Cæsarea succeeded in procuring from Nero a decision by which the Jews were deprived of their equality of standing (ισοπολιτεία) with the Gentiles. To the Jews this gave occasion for the great insurrection. For some years indeed it remained confined to Cæsarea and the surrounding country, and did not in the first instance spread as far as to the capital. Porcius Festus (see FESTUS) exerted himself in vain, however, to quell the rising. His successors Albinus (62-64) and Gessius Florus (64-66) disregarded all law and justice to such a degree that pacification became impossible. The Sicarii could not be exterminated; those who could enter into arrangements with them for securing life and position (so, for example, the wealthy Ananias of Jerusalem, who at one time had been high priest); other influential people surrounded themselves with a sort of bodyguard so as not to be helpless at a time when everyone was taking the law into his own hand. Albinus indeed took some trouble to conceal his misdoings; but Gessius Florus did not shrink from the employment of open violence and thus drove even the peaceably disposed of the Jews to retaliation. A coarse insult to the Jews in Cæsarea had again led to street riots. As even the native soldiers took part against the Jews the latter quitted the city, taking their books of the Law with them—an occurrence which for Josephus marks the beginning of the war (BJ ii. 144).

The anger excited in Jerusalem by these events had not yet died down when Florus caused seventeen talents to be taken from the temple treasure, plainly because the Jews had failed to pay their taxes (BJ ii. 165). Popular indignation now expressed itself in intemperate speech against Florus, who thereupon appeared in Jerusalem with his soldiers, would grant no terms, and gave orders to plunder the Upper City, also causing many inhabitants of Jerusalem—among them Roman citizens—to be crucified. Soldiers summoned from Cæsarea answered the friendly greeting of the Jews, by his orders, with coldness and rudeness, and attempted by a coup de main to seize the Antonia and the temple. This plan, however, was not successful; Florus returned to Cæsarea and sought to stir up the Syrian governor Cestius Gallus against the Jews. The prudent bearing of Gallus at this juncture, combined with the appearance of Agrippa II. in Jerusalem, produced a short lull; but when Agrippa spoke not only of obedience to the emperor, but also of submission to Florus, the anger of the people burst forth against him also, so that he had to leave the city. A band of Zealots established themselves in the fortress of Masada by the Dead Sea. At the instance of Eleazar, son of Ananias, it was determined that henceforth offerings of those who were not Jews should no longer be received in the temple—and thus that the daily sacrifice by and for the Roman emperor should be discontinued.

The supreme council of Jerusalem exerted itself to the utmost against this rebellious decision. Florus left it to itself; but Agrippa sent to its aid 3000 horsemen with whose help it carried on a struggle for four weeks against the war party who held the temple. The party of rebellion soon began to gain ground, burned the archives containing the records of indebtedness, obtained possession of the Antonia citadel, and shut the adversary up in the royal palace. A son of Judas of Galilee the founder of the Zealot party, Manaem (Menahem)¹ by name, conducted the siege. The garrison—Roman and native alike—desired to capitulate; but free exit was allowed only to the natives, among them the troopers sent by Agrippa. The former high priest, Ananias, was put to death and soon afterwards Manaem also, who had made himself hated for his cruelty. At last the Roman garrison also had to surrender; though their lives had been promised them on oath, all were massacred, their captain alone excepted. On that same day the Jews who had remained in Cæsarea were put to death or thrown into prison by the Gentile inhabitants. In retaliation armed bands of Jews went round the border places inhabited by Gentiles plundering and massacring. The Gentiles replied with a persecution of the Jews which extended as far as Tyre and Ashkelon and even Alexandria. As Florus was helpless, Cestius Gallus now marched into the Jewish territory with an army. Galilee he soon subdued; and during the feast of Tabernacles he made his appearance in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. After some skirmishes before the gates the army gained possession of portions of the city and began to attack the north side of the temple. The rebels had already given up their cause for lost, when suddenly Cestius Gallus ordered the retreat. The Jews followed him and inflicted heavy losses. Once more songs of victory were sung by her own people within the capital. This was the prelude to the war of May-November, 66; the war party had triumphed both at home and abroad.

Formal preparations for war were now begun on both sides. In Jerusalem everything had to bend before the zeal of the war party, or else take its 102. Formal departure. The aristocracy themselves took in hand the defences of the country. The Jewish territory from Lydda to Peræa and from Idumæa to Galilee was divided into seven districts, each under its own commander; thus for example Galilee was assigned to Josephus the Pharisee, destined afterwards to become the friend of the Romans, and the historian of the war. He has himself described the measures he took for the defence of Galilee (BJ ii. 20 f.; Vit. 7 ff.). It is quite clear from what he says how hard—even to impossibility—was the task of uniting in common defence against the Romans those who had been so long accustomed to deeds of violence. No wonder that the more thoughtful spirits were filled with anxiety. Nero, whom Cestius Gallus had betimes apprised of the state of affairs, summoned his proved general T. Flavius Vespasianus to Achaia and charged him with the conduct of the war against the Jews in revolt. Vespasian caused his son Titus to bring the fifth and the tenth legions from Alexandria while he himself proceeded to Antioch and took command of the fifteenth legion along with the auxiliary troops supplied by three kings in alliance with Rome—Antiochus of Commagene, Soemus of Emesa, and Agrippa II. Father and son met in Ptolemais where they began operations.

The first measures taken were against Galilee. The city of Sepphoris had already received a Roman garrison and was being held against Josephus. As 103. Galilee. soon as the army of Vespasian appeared upon the scene, the Jews withdrew into the fortified cities. Of these the first to succumb to the Romans was Jotapata (Panemos = July 67). Josephus himself, who had already reported to headquarters the evil case of his army, conducted the defence and was seized in a hiding-place by the victors. He ingratiated himself with Vespasian by the prophecy that both he and his son were destined for the imperial throne, and was detained in friendly captivity. After having advanced along the coast as far as Joppa, Vespasian made his headquarters with Agrippa II. at Cæsarea Philippi, whence he caused Tiberias and Tarichææ—both cities belonging to Agrippa—to be brought back to their obedience. The storming of the fortress of Gamala in Gaulanitis proved no easy task (Sept.-Oct. 67). But when in addition to this the garrison of Mount Itabyrion (Tabor) had also been overcome and Giscala the home of the Zealots had opened its gates to Titus, the whole of Galilee was at the feet of the Romans, though John of Giscala, the leader of the rebels in the last named city, had indeed eluded Titus by a ruse and made his escape to Jerusalem. Vespasian fixed the winter quarters of the fifth and fifteenth legions in Cæsarea Palæstinæ and those of the tenth in Scythopolis.

The tidings of the unprosperous course of events in Galilee, when they reached Jerusalem, where the high priest Ananias and Joseph son of Gorion were nominally in command, had the effect of letting loose the full storm of rage and fanaticism against the Romans. The arrival of John of Giscala with his Zealots added fuel to the flames. With the fanatics, to be old or prudent was to be indolent and weak. In the country about Jerusalem the struggle of parties came to bloodshed; the issue soon declared itself in favour of the fanatics. The conflagration now reached Jerusalem itself. It directed itself in the first instance against those who, there was some reason to fear, might seek to quench it—against the high-priestly nobility and their adherents, and in particular against the Synedrium as it had hitherto existed. It had hitherto been unfortunate enough in its efforts against the enemies of the fatherland, and in the judgment of the excited masses this constituted a fault which in those stirring times demanded instant punishment. The ordinary processes of law and justice seemed too long or too uncertain, and the power of those who administered them as dangerous to the sacred cause. Accordingly, no trial was conceded to those priestly nobles who in the meantime had been arrested and cast into prison; they were put to death where they were and the cruel perpetrators of this crime (Ex. 22²⁷) were praised as deliverers of the people out of the hands of traitors. Regard for their own safety bade the Zealots take into their own hands the supreme authority. As, however, the populace, under the influence of Ananus, assumed a threatening attitude, the Zealots withdrew themselves to the temple area, the strong walls of which afforded them protection. The priority of claim to the high-priestly office asserted by certain priestly families they declared to be abolished, and, appealing to an ancient custom, they reintroduced election of the high priest by lot.

The leading members of the Synedrium showed unwillingness to accept such a reversal of existing arrangements without a struggle. The people sided with them and actually forced the Zealots back from the outer temple enclosure into the sanctuary itself. In order to save the latter from desecration Ananus opened negotiations and in doing so gave his confidence to John of Giscala who already on previous occasions had acted as negotiator for the Zealots and now finally went over to their side, accusing Ananus of acting in pre-arranged concert with the Romans. He counselled the Zealots to call in the aid of the Idumæans if they wished to escape certain death at the hand of Ananus or the enraged people. His advice was taken and soon 20,000 Idumæans, eager for war, stood before the walls of Jerusalem. Ananus sought to bring them to reason; but under cover of a dark and stormy night, the Zealots slipped from the temple and led the Idumæans through the sleeping city up to the temple hill and into the inner precincts, whence they now commenced the attack upon the outer temple court and the city. Ananus and his associates were slain and many citizens with them; others were thrown into prison. The triumphant Zealots introduced a new council (Synedrium) of 70 persons, but again dispersed it at the point of the sword when it proved unformable to their wishes. The Idumæans perceived too late the real nature of the work for which their aid had been invited. Filled with shame, they left the blood-saturated city in the hands of the Zealots, who put to the sword all suspected persons, and reduced Jerusalem to helpless subjection (Jos. BJ iv. 3-6).

Vespasian watched this feverish outburst with the coolness of a practised general. He very well knew that the more the strength of the city 105. Vespasian. was wasted by this internal struggle, the feebler would be the resistance he would at last have to overcome. The reports by numerous deserters as to the ambition of John and the envy and ill-will with which he was looked upon by others confirmed him in his watching attitude. The revolution in the capital made itself felt, however, also in the surrounding country. The Sicarii extended their predatory raids as far as from Masada to Engedi. Following their example others also banded themselves together for plundering the cities and villages, amongst them in particular the desperado Simon bar Giora of Gerasa (BJ iv. 7² 93). At last, in March 68, Vespasian resumed the war. He reduced Peræa as far as to Machærus and thereafter occupied the districts of Thamna, Lydda, Jamnia, Ammaus, Bethneptepha¹ and Idumæa. Next he marched by way of Ammaus (where the fifth legion had its camp) and Neapolis (Sichem) down into the Jordan valley and threw a garrison into Jericho (June 68), thus drawing, however widely, the first line of investiture round the centre of the rebellion.

At this juncture, tidings of the death of Nero (9th June, 68) reached Vespasian in Caesarea. He determined to delay the siege of Jerusalem and await the orders of the new Emperor, Galba. Thus the summer passed away, as also the succeeding winter, Galba having been murdered in Jan. 69 and Otho named as his successor. This inaction was, to the Jews eager for battle, hard to bear; but in the meantime they kept their swords in practice in fratricidal conflicts, and thinned their own ranks by all kinds of jealousy, envy, and evil passion. Simon bar Giora plundered right and left through the whole of the territory still unoccupied by the Roman troops, from the district of Akrabattene in the N. down to Idumæa in the S., drove the Zealots back to the shelter of the walls of Jerusalem and made himself master of Idumæa and its capital Hebron. In Jerusalem itself a mutiny broke out against John; his Idumæan soldiers resolved to call in the help of Simon against the Zealots, who had again retreated to the temple hill. Simon in this manner became master of the city in April 69, and exerted himself to get the Zealots expelled from the temple also (B/ iv. 91 ff.).

Vespasian now drew his lines more closely round the city. In June 69 he advanced from the N. as far as Bethel and EPHRAIM (q. v., ii.), and in the S. his general Cerealis subjugated Idumæa and held it in check by garrisons. The way to Jerusalem was now open; but once more grave tidings from Rome hindered him from taking the decisive step. Vitellius had taken the place of Otho on the imperial throne. The news roused the disapprobation of the legions stationed in the E., and in July 69 Vespasian himself was acclaimed emperor from the Nile to the Danube, and hastened to Rome. The siege of Jerusalem was thus left to Vespasian's son Titus, who had at his side Tiberius Alexander, formerly procurator of Judæa, now governor of Egypt, and Josephus, now freed from his captivity.

Titus marched upon Jerusalem from Caesarea at the head of the fifteenth and twelfth legions by way of

106. Titus. Samaria, while the fifth legion advanced from its camp at Ammaus and the tenth from Jericho. Titus pitched his camp one and a half hours northwards of Jerusalem (April 70). The leaders of the revolt within the city had in the meantime gone on with the building of the outer wall which had been begun by Agrippa II. (see § 97), and had even sent messengers to the many Jewish colonies on the Euphrates to stir them to revolt (B/ vi. 62). Jerusalem itself was full of the numerous visitors who had come up for the Passover feast, so that feeling was highly strung; it expressed itself in loud shouts of joy when Titus at the head of a body of horsemen was almost surrounded by a band of Jews close by the northern wall of the city. The Zealots had in the meantime split into two factions: Eleazar son of Simon had made himself master of the inner sanctuary and confined John of Giscala to the outer temple precinct and its immediate southern neighbourhood, so that John had to defend himself on two sides—against Eleazar and against Simon bar Giora who was master in the city. When, however, Titus proceeded to place the fifteenth, twelfth, and fifth legions on the height to the north (Mt. Scopus; see NOB) and the tenth legion on the Mt. of Olives to the east, the Jews combined. A vigorous attack was made upon the tenth legion while it was engaged in the work of entrenchment; but it was repulsed by the bold intervention of Titus. While Titus was making preparations for the investment properly so-called, John succeeded in getting the better of Eleazar and his people in the inner sanctuary, and thus Jerusalem no longer had three parties, but only two—John with 8000 men and Simon with 15,000. Titus directed his first attack, with embankments, towers, and battering rams, against the first wall in the neighbourhood of the Tower of Hippicus. Not until the blows of the rams had begun to fall did the contending parties within the city begin to come to their senses and think of uniting in a common defence. By the fifteenth day of the siege, the seventh day of Artemisius (approximately May 70), the Romans had already forced their way into the northern quarter of the city enclosed by the first wall. Immediately Titus pushed forward his camp and began to breach the second wall. After five days his troops were able to advance through it; but in the vigorous street fight which ensued they were repelled by the Jews and constrained to fight for three days more for the reconquest of the walls.

Meanwhile the siege operations now began to be directed against the citadel of Antonia and the Upper City. Titus sent Josephus a second time to summon the Jews to surrender (B/ v. 33 92 ff.). He knew that pestilence had already broken out in the overcrowded city, and also that famine was beginning to make itself felt, and he wished, if possible, to preserve the city and especially the temple from destruction. The leaders, however, refused to negotiate; they proudly placed their reliance on the temple and the almighty power of God. The inclination of the people was in the other direction; whoever saw a convenient opportunity stole away from the city and went over to the Romans. Those in command were roused by this to all the greater vigilance. Intimidation was not spared, and stringent measures were taken to exact provisions for the soldiers from the wealthier inhabitants. To add to these difficulties Titus now put into force with greater strictness the military law regarding deserters. Yet all these untoward circumstances together could not break the spirit of the defenders. How great was their resourcefulness and how desperate their courage the Romans found by experience. After seventeen days' labour four embankments had been raised—two against Antonia and two against the Upper City. Those before Antonia the Jews undermined and destroyed by fire; those before the Upper City with the machines were also set on fire by them during a hard-fought struggle.

These losses had their effect on the besiegers, and raised grave doubts whether the means hitherto employed would suffice for the reduction of the city. Hence Titus resolved on a strict blockade. A rampart—39 stadia in circumference, with thirteen watch towers—was completed by the legions in three days (B/ v. 122).

The position of affairs in the city daily grew worse; famine led to the most inhuman acts. The preternatural suspiciousness of the Zealots was always discovering new traitors who had to lay down their lives that the city might sleep secure. Still, the hope of a divine intervention and of the Messianic empire (B/ vi. 52 ff.) still held its own through all the pangs of hunger, all the shouts of combatants, and all the blood-thirsty jealousy of opposing parties. What amazing abysses does not human nature here disclose!

In twenty-one days the Romans had raised four new embankments which were watched with the utmost vigilance. Shaken by the rams a part of the wall at the Antonia citadel collapsed; but the Jews had already erected a second behind the breach. This also the Romans surmounted on the 5th of Panemos (approx. July), and accordingly could assert the mastery in the citadel. On the 15th of Panemos the daily sacrifice in the temple (חֲבִיבִי) ceased to be offered. Well might the courage of many sink. Titus, first through Josephus and afterwards personally, pleaded that the temple might be spared; but all in vain. Nothing was left for it but that the struggle should be carried out to its issue within the sacred enclosure. The first battle being indecisive, the Romans built a new embankment against the wall of the inner precinct, while the Jews destroyed the chambers between the Antonia and the inner temple enclosure—partly by fire.

On the 8th of Lous (ca. August) the rams were brought to bear on the walls of the inner forecourt.

As nothing, however, could be effected either by their means or by scaling ladders, the gates were set on fire. When these actually began to burn horror paralysed the defenders. Titus, however, on the following day, caused the flames to be extinguished. His sole object had been to secure a freer path for the larger attack which he had planned for the 10th of Lous. Before this could quite be carried out by the soldiers, however, one of the party tossed a burning brand into one of the chambers surrounding the temple. The wildest consternation ensued among the Jews. Titus ordered the extinction of the fire; but the Roman soldiers pressed on, and put the horror-stricken Jews to the sword. Scarcely had Titus for the first time cast eyes on the Holy of Holies when the flames were already crackling under the door; soon they sprang aloft and enveloped all. On this very day a prophet had summoned the people to the temple to see the fulfilment of the signs of deliverance. The raging flames, the infuriated soldiers, the groans of the wounded and the dying, all spoke with another voice. It was the judgment. The words of John the Baptist and of Jesus of Nazareth had come true.

Thousands perished in the temple flames; some of the Zealots sought safety in the Upper City. The Romans set up their standards in the sanctuary, sacrificed before them, and hailed Titus as Imperator. After an ineffectual attempt at an arrangement with the authorities he ordered the city to be burned. The Jews now retired into the palace of Herod and gave up the rest of the city to the spoiler. Once more the legions had to set about engineering works, and on the 7th of Gorpaius (ca. September) 70 A.D., machines were brought to bear. It was now plain that the powers of resistance of the besieged had been broken at last; when the wall fell their pride turned into helplessness and cowardice, and they sought to hide themselves in the subterranean passages. On the same day the Roman soldiers made their way through the Upper City, burning, plundering, and massacring. Of the Jews who survived, the leaders were put to death, and the finest-looking of the youths were preserved to grace the triumph; of the remainder, some were sent to the Egyptian mines, many were sent as presents into the provinces for use in scenic displays. Death or captivity was also the lot of those who had hidden themselves in the subterranean passages; John of Giscala was sentenced to imprisonment for life, Simon bar Giora was set apart for the triumph. City and temple were destroyed, only the western portion of the city wall with the three towers of the palace of Herod was left standing, so as to admit of the 10th legion and some auxiliary troops having their camp there. Of the rich plunder, there were afterwards exhibited to the Romans in the joint triumph of Vespasian and Titus the Golden Altar of incense, the golden candlestick, and also the book of the Law.

Three strongholds still remained in the hands of the Jews; Herodeion and Masada to the W., Machærus to the E. of the Dead Sea. Herodeion surrendered to Lucilius Bassus, who now commanded the 10th legion, without a struggle; Machærus, only after a protracted siege. As Bassus died soon afterwards, the siege of Masada fell to the lot of his successor, L. Flavius Silva. This fortress stood at a height of more than 1500 ft. above the level of the Dead Sea, on the almost inaccessible summit of a mountain (now es-Sebbeh), and since the commencement of the war had been held by the Sicarii under Eleazar, a relation of Judas of Galilee. After great exertions the soldiers of Silva at last succeeded in making a breach in the walls; but the defenders had already constructed behind it another wall of timber and earth. This withstood the blows of the ram better than the stone wall had done; but it was capable of being set on fire by the besiegers. Hercupon Elcazar persuaded his band to a solemn resolution to commit suicide together. When, accordingly, on the 15th of Xanthicus (ca. April) 73, the Romans made their way over the burning wall into the fortress, they did not find a single man alive. Masada was afterwards held by a Roman garrison.

Vespasian had already settled what was to be done with Judæa, by an order addressed to L. Bassus. The whole scene of the rebellion, as it had been handed over by Nero to Vespasian as a special province, he now claimed as his private property. Cæsarea Palæstinæ was converted into a Roman colony (Colonia Prima Flavia Augusta Cæsarea) and continued to be the seat of a governor (who at the same time commanded the 10th legion) as well as the administrative capital. The 10th legion lay for the most part at Jerusalem. Eight hundred veterans were settled at Emmaus near Jerusalem. All Jews within the Roman empire were required to pay the traditional temple tax, the didrachma (Mt. 17 24), into the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. This determination unquestionably was a very deep wound to Jewish susceptibilities. As a general rule, however, the position of the Jewish religion as a religio licita within the Roman empire was not assailed. Nowhere except in Egypt was violence resorted to. Fugitive Sicarii had fomented disturbances in the Jewish community in Alexandria, and this led Vespasian to order Lupus the governor to destroy the Jewish temple founded by Onias (see HERES). Lupus and his successor, Paulinus, plundered the temple of its dedicated gifts and sacred vessels, closed it and rendered it inaccessible. The Jewish worship had been carried on here for the space of 243 years (Jos. B. vii. 10 4 has 343 years, by an error).

It was but natural that a paralysing reaction should follow the fearful struggle of the Jews with the Romans. Not only were their physical forces exhausted; the community had—a more serious matter—been deprived of its religious centre. Its highest authority, the Synedrium, had even before the siege of Jerusalem been destroyed by the war party (§ 104). Now, with the destruction of the temple, the cultus also had been brought to an end; the priests had been deprived of their vocation, the community of its appointed representation in the presence of God. The mother-country itself was now compelled to live after the manner of the Jewish diaspora. The Pharisees, with Johanan b. Zakkai at their head, settled in Jamnia and addressed themselves to the task of once more rallying the dispersed of Israel around the Law. They revived the Synedrium into new life by the formation of a court of justice consisting of seventy-two members (אַתְּנַיִם), which disposed of civil causes arising between Jews in Judæa and, so far as was practicable without conspicuous disregard of Roman rights, also dealt with criminal cases. This court of justice could not pretend to any legal title; it owed its existence to the necessities of the case; but it seems in all probability to have been ultimately recognised by the Romans. Soon it rose in importance to such a degree that its pronouncements were recognised by the whole diaspora. Its head, who bore the title of nāsî', ethnarch, or patriarch, received from every Jewish community yearly dues, which were brought by so-called 'apostles.' The study of the Law and the practice of Pharisaic piety were also carried on with all the zeal proper to persecuted causes. What had been lost—temple and worship—every effort was made to preserve, so far as was possible by means of writing; the ancient precepts for the regulation of Jewish social life in Judæa were modified in such a way as to admit of their being applied under the altered conditions.

The Jews in Palestine adapted themselves to the new circumstances with remarkable rapidity. This can be explained to a great extent by the reaction which followed the feverish days of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. The Jews were glad to take refuge under the shelter of any new arrangement, however temporary and inadequate. They sought for comfort in their abiding sorrow, certainty in their doubt, some fixed point towards which they could direct their thoughts and hopes. This they found in the teachings of their rabbins, versed in the Scriptures, from whom they learned to accept their misfortunes submissively as a chastisement from God. This was certainly a wholesome salve for broken spirits. Nevertheless the rabbins had not learned from the terrible divine judgment the thing which in truth most concerned their peace. They impressed upon the Jews the old transcendental hope that at the time appointed by God the redemption—i.e., the world-theocracy—would come (cp Apocalypse of Baruch, and 4 Esd.). It was the very depth of their unprecedented humiliation which seemed to justify the expectation that the hour of deliverance was not far off. Nor was it long before the determination was again arrived at to seek to hasten the event by their own efforts.

The Emperor Domitian caused the didrachma tax (which, as we have seen, had from 70 A.D. onwards to be paid to Jupiter Capitolinus) to be exacted with particular strictness, and forbade conversion to Judaism (which still had its supporters even within the precincts of the imperial palace). He is said also to have sought, like Vespasian before him and Trajan after him, to exterminate the Davidic family by persecution. These measures show how greatly the power of the Jewish diaspora was still felt by the Roman empire. It was in the places where the diaspora was strong that the first risings took place when Trajan waged war on the Parthians on the eastern frontier of the empire. Egypt, from the Thebaid to Alexandria, trembled before the wild outburst of Jewish hatred against the Greeks and the Romans. In Cyrene also it burst forth with blood-thirsty ferocity. In Cyprus the Jews carried out a fearful massacre and destroyed the city of Salamis (circa 116 A.D.). Trajan sent one of his ablest generals, Marcus Turbo, to Egypt; but it was only by degrees that he succeeded in quenching the fire of rebellion in the blood of its instigators. Even in Mesopotamia the Jews rose and threatened to bar the emperor's return from Ctesiphon. Here it was Lucius Quietus who restored order with remorseless firmness. Even down to the first year of the emperor Hadrian (117-138 A.D.) the agitation seems to have shown itself—perhaps even in Palestine—in commotions of diminishing intensity.

Towards the end of his reign Hadrian unintentionally furnished the occasion for a rising of the Jews in Judæa itself. Circumcision had been forbidden by law in the Roman empire,

113. Struggle with Hadrian. being placed in the same category with castration. The prohibition was regarded by the Jews—though by no means levelled exclusively at them—as a prohibition of the exercise of their religion. Further, Hadrian issued orders that the now deserted Jerusalem should again be rebuilt as a Roman colony. This expression of imperial goodwill towards their ancient capital the Jews regarded as the worst of injuries, the deathblow to all their dearest hopes; for the execution of the emperor's command would mean nothing less than the conversion of Jerusalem into a Gentile city. The zeal of the Jews was accordingly kindled once more on behalf of the city of their God, and they flew to arms on the sacred soil of Judæa. Probably the disturbances first began about 132, after the emperor's second visit to Syria in 131. So far as we can learn from the scanty notices preserved to us, the struggle took the form of a guerrilla war only; the insurgents fixed their quarters in fastnesses, caves, and subterranean dens, and sought as best they could to expel the Romans from Judæa.

The leader was a certain Simon, better known by his surname, Bar Kosiba or Bar Kocheba; the first of these two forms indicates his origin genealogically or locally (cp 1 Ch. 4:22), the second his dignity (see Nu. 24:17) as Messiah; he was doubtless of Davidic descent. His coins bear the legend 'Simon Prince of Israel.' The Roman Governor Tineius Rufus was unable to quell the rebellion which burst out on all sides and spread even beyond the boundaries of Judæa. Jerusalem was 'liberated,' as the legend on the coins of Simon has it, and the sacrificial system was probably again revived; perhaps an attempt was also made to rebuild the temple. The entire Jewish diaspora supported the movement, so that 'the whole world was thrown into commotion' (Dio Cassius 69:13). It seems probable that Hadrian himself lingered for a while near the scene of the struggle; and he summoned his best generals to deal with it. Julius Severus, who came from Britain, brought it to a triumphant end. The closing scene took place not at Jerusalem but at BETHET (q.v., cp Ezra 2:20 G, see GIBBAR), now Bittir, to the south-west of Jerusalem. In the eighteenth year of Hadrian (134-5) the little fortress was captured after a brave resistance, Bar Kocheba himself having already been slain. The whole war probably lasted 3½ years (132-135 A.D.). It was bloody in the extreme, and brought Judæa to the lowest ebb. The captive Jews were offered for sale at nominal prices on the market place beside Abraham's oak at Hebron, or sent off to the slave markets of Gaza and Egypt.

What the rebellion had been intended to prevent now took place without resistance. Jerusalem was built as a 115. Jerusalem becomes Ælia Capitolina. Gentile city and received the name of Ælia Capitolina, with the rights of a Roman colony but without the jus Italicum. On the former site of the temple was built a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus with an equestrian statue of the emperor Hadrian. No Jew was permitted to enter the precincts of the city; once more it was to be the possession of heathen deities and their worshippers. Such was the end of the history of Israel on the mountains of Judæa.

ISSACHAR (יִשָּׂשכָר); [E]ICCAΧAP [BAL], sometimes ICΑΧAP [B*^hF]; in Rev. 7.7 some MSS ICACXAP; Jos. ICΑΧAPHC; on the name see below, §§ 3, 6 end), apparently the name borne by the inhabitants of the tract lying between the highlands of Ephraim on the S. and those of Naphtali on the N.; between the lowlands of Zebulun on the NW. and the deep Jordan valley on the E.

Issachar finds prominent mention in the present text of the battle-song in Judg. 5. It would be natural that the brunt of the struggle should fall there.

1. Rarely mentioned. It is noteworthy, however, that whilst Josh. 21.28 (1 Ch. 6.72 [57]) assigns Daberath to Issachar, Josh. 19.12 places it on the border of Zebulun. Moreover, in the passage where Issachar is mentioned in Judg. 5 the text is uncertain. There is no quite unambiguous evidence that Deborah or Daberath (whether a person¹ or a town)² or Barak, belonged to Issachar (see DEBORAH, § 2 f.). Can there have been a desire to suppress the name of Issachar? It is not quite impossible. The writer to whom is due the enumeration of tribes summoned by Gideon (Judg. 6.35) and of tribes that gathered together to pursue Midian (7.23), if rightly represented by MT,³ omits Issachar—the very tribe which, one would suppose, would be most intimately concerned, and (if we suppose that Purah is a corruption of Puah; see GIDEON, § 1 n.) may have supplied Gideon with his attendant. Similarly, Issachar is allowed no part in the fight described in Judg. 4. Still more strange, perhaps, is the omission of the same tribe from the list of those summarily told of in the latter part of Judg. 1.⁴ Moreover in the 'Blessing of Jacob' the reference to Issachar is rather disparaging, and in both the 'Blessings' Issachar yields precedence to Zebulun, although in Gen. 30 Issachar is the elder of the brothers. Is all this accidental? Or can a reason be found?

Issachar's being a Leah-tribe associates it with Zebulun (cp the connexion of the two in Dt. 33.18 f.), and they are mentioned together in the

2. Special Cults? Song of Deborah (Judg. 5.14 f.); their territories were contiguous. What is

² C. Niebuhr; Wi. G/2 126.

³ Of course the text may be corrupt; see GIDEON, § 1, where it is proposed to read 'Issachar' in the Gideon story for Asher (Judg. 6.35).

noteworthy, however, is that the 'Blessing of Moses' connects the tribes not as comrades in war (as in Judg. 5) but as guardians of a great religious fair (Dt. 33.18 f.); as if they had formed a northern confederation like that of Shechem which had its religious centre, according to Winckler (GI 256), on Shechem's sacred mountain. On what mountain such a gathering of northern clans may have been held does not appear; possibly on Tabor (Herder, Graf, Steuernagel?) or Carmel (Knobel, Bertholet). Nor have we any clue as to the deity who was thus honoured, unless we can venture to find a veiled hint in a well-known story connected with the birth of Issachar and Zebulun.

Reuben found dūdā'im (see MANDRAKE). These naturally belonged to Leah, the fruitful mother; but Rachel bartered for a share. Issachar and Zebulun were born to Leah, Joseph to Rachel. Whatever be the meaning of Reuben's being assigned to Leah (see REUBEN), the tribe was mixed up with GAD [g.v. § 3]. Now Mesha tells us (L. 12) that when he took Ataroth from Gad he carried off מַרְיָאֵל יְרִיחַ, which implies a cult of some kind. The Gadite cult may have been shared by Reuben; unless, indeed, 'Reuben' in Gen. 30.14 was originally 'Gad,' whose birth has just been told of (v. 11): Gad could be called Leah's son. If there underlies the story of the dūdā'im the fact of an old cult, it is a little difficult to extricate it naturally; but it is noteworthy that the Issacharite tribal hero Tola, or his clan Puah, is said to be 'son of Dodo' (דודו); the text of the passage, however, is doubtful; see § 7).

It seems certain that popular etymology connected the name Issachar with the Hebrew root שָׂכַר, 'wages' (cp the gloss ὁ ἐστὶν μισθός [BAL] and Jos. ἐκ μισθου νεώμενος) and in J's form of the theory the hire had to do with the mandrakes (Gen. 30.15).¹ It has been thought that religious ideas sometimes led to the omission of certain tribe-names (cp GAD, § 2). If the omission of Issachar was intentional, the reason may have been political (see below, § 4); but implications involved in the 'Duda' story might be enough. Or if the connection of the name with an Egyptian god Sokar (which is in fact one of the alternatives proposed by C. J. Ball, SBOT on Gen. 30.18; see below, § 6) was held by some in ancient times, it is barely possible that this may have been disadvantageous to the tribe.

The first syllable of Issachar may possibly have been taken by J to be the Hebrew word אִשָּׁי (so We. TBS, p. v, also 95 f., and Ball, op. cit.), the whole name being explained as 'man of hire.' Another popular explanation may have been אִשָּׁי שָׂכָר (cp Jer. 31.16 = 2 Ch. 15.7 Eccles. 4.9); perhaps also אִשָּׁי שָׂכָר.² The theory that the name is compound is not impossible (cp § 6). Many modern writers, however, incline to the view that it is simple.³ Thus Ball compares the Arabic aškar; Nestle (AJSL 18.175 f. ['97]) seems to favour Wellhausen's comparison of the Nabataean name šaxar-as,⁴ and Cheyne thinks Issachar is a popular corruption of Yizrah[el] (יִזְרְהֵאל), which he has suggested as perhaps the original of Israel (יִשְׂרָאֵל) and of Jezreel (יִזְרְעֵאל) (see JACOB, § 6): Jezreel lies on the borders of Issachar. On the second part of the name see further, below, § 6.

² The name appears in the consonantal text invariably as יִשָּׂשכָר. This is printed יִשָּׂשכָר, which is with the כּרֵי יִשָּׂשכָר; but in different authorities occur the following five other forms: יִשָּׂשכָר (without daghesh), יִשָּׂשכָר, יִשָּׂשכָר, יִשָּׂשכָר, on which see Ginsburg, Introd. 250-254 (cp Baer-Del. Gen. 84 f.).

³ The view that the second š was meant to show that the š is š, not z, is supported by Nestle (AJSL 18.175 f., Trans. IX Or. Cong. 262) who, however, believes that the š was really š. The double š may, however, be due to 'Volksetymologie.'

⁴ 'Sarel,' or 'reddish-brown' of horses (cp Lane, ed. voc., Wi. GI 231, n. 1); cp Gen. 49.14a, and note the derivation of תִּמְרוֹר (see Ass.). The phonetic equivalent of Issachar in Arabic is yaškur, which occurs as a tribal name (see, e.g., Yāqūt 3.288 l. 14); cp יִשְׂכָרְאֵל in a Minæan inscription from Mada' in Šā'el; (DHM Ep. Denk. no. xxv. l. 4; see further Müller's note, p. 48).

⁵ Heid. (1) 3, n. 5; 2d. ed. omits.

If we judged by appearances we should conclude that in historical times Issachar played no important part. Some of the kings of Israel, however, appear to have been men of Issachar.

There seems to be no sufficient reason to doubt that one of the older sources of Kings called Baasha 'son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar' (1 K. 15 27).¹ Of the origin of Omri nothing is said; but that he also was of Issachar is for several reasons not improbable.² If then there is anything in the notion that there was a tendency to avoid mentioning Issachar (see above, §§ 1-3) it might be suggested that under the Jehu dynasty it became the fashion to disparage the 'house of Issachar.' It would not be strange if this were so. On the other hand Jehu himself may have belonged to the house of Issachar.³

That would be the most natural explanation of his being called in inscriptions of Shalmaneser II. 'son of Omri' (KAT 189 f. 208); note also the phrase 'statutes of Omri' (Mic. 6 16; see OMRI, 1). However that may be, Jehu was a trusted general of Ahab and Jehoram. The last king of the line was slain near Ibleam. Jehu's father's name is given as Jehoshaphat, the name (not a common one) of the governor of Issachar in the list in 1 K. 4, where in MT (v. 17) he is said to be son of Paruah, but Paruah should probably rather be Puah, the Issachar clan.⁴ Jehu is oftener, however, called son of Nimshi. This is obscure; but if we may explain it on the analogy of the Punic נִמְשִׁי וְנִמְשִׁי, Nimshi would imply the cult of a god נִשְׁ, which might be the same as that referred to in the Issacharite BAASHA [g. v.].⁵

On the other hand Jehu may have been a southerner. There are not lacking features of his policy that would fit in with such a theory (see JEHU, § 2), and Nimshi may have been a southern name (cp Ahishai, Amasa; and, for the first part of the name, Naomi and Elnaam [1 Ch. 11 40]).

Whether the dynasties of Omri and Jehu were from Issachar or not—and the saying in Gen. 49 14 f. suggests that Issachar supplied, rather than employed, gangs of labourers—there were not wanting influences that might have enabled men of that tribe to take a leading place. If 'nature has manifestly set Esdraelon in the arms of Samaria,'⁶ it has also assigned it a different lot. Commenting on the 'Blessing' of Issachar (Gen. 49 14) G. A. Smith says (p. 383) 'To the highlander looking down upon it, Esdraelon is room to stretch in and be happy.' The most important point, however, is that the plain of Megiddo is the natural route from Sharon to the Jordan. From the earliest times it contained the sites of fortress towns (see ESDRAELON). Though its connection with Ephraim and with Gilead was very close, we have no hint how it became connected with Israel; perhaps in self-defence against the inroads of the still unsettled peoples of the east; or in connection with some other great struggle.⁷

⁴ The γ may be from יר which perhaps stood between פוה and פוה שר ב', as in Ὡβ υἱος φουασσούδ ἐισαχάρ (i. e., 'בן פוה שר ב', and practically in Ὡβ υἱος βαρσαουῦ (i. e., בן ברשוה, פוה שר = בן פוה שר) ἐν ἰσσ.

⁶ GASm. HG 379.

⁷ Guthe (GI 73), who accepts 1 S. 11 as it stands, infers from

It appears that at one time the plain of Megiddo was pretty completely under the power of the Philistines.¹

At least, the Zakkar(i) (Tā-[k]-ka-ra-[y]), who were associated with them had firmly established themselves at Dor in the 12th century.² Who the people were who suffered from these intruders we are not told. It might be supposed that they would hardly be Israelites, who probably settled first in the highlands; that the strangers would be interested merely or mainly in the trade-routes and the cities lying on them, and that it was from them that these were won by Israel. That may be so. The struggle, echoes of which we find in Judg. 5, may conceivably have had this very result. No more, however, can we be sure that the land was found in the undisturbed possession of 'Canaanites.' We hear of the district first in the time of Thotmes III. and it was thereafter more or less continually in the power of Egypt or contesting that power. The Amarna correspondence, however, shows us not only the open country but also the towns (e.g. Megiddo [KB 5 193]) threatened by the Ḥabiri. The one thing that seems to be clear is that the population must have been even more than usually mixed.³

It is not impossible that some Egyptians might remain when Egypt finally withdrew. At least, there would be natives or settlers who had been attached to them in one capacity or another, especially mercenaries. The Egyptian derivation of the name Issachar referred to above (§ 3), therefore, is perhaps not quite impossible. Issachar is the only name of the 'twelve tribes' (besides Naphtali) from which no gentile is formed in the OT,⁴ which makes it not improbable that it is a compound name. The Moabites knew a neighbouring people as Ish-gad (see GAD, § 1). It may be, then, that there was in the Gilboa district a community known to their neighbours by some such name as Is-sachar—i. e., the men of the god Sakar—as Ish-gad were the men of the god Gad (GAD, § 1 f.).⁵

Another theory (Che. Crit. Bib.) not open in the same way to the objection referred to below, regards יִשְׁכָּר as a popular euphonic adaptation of a primitive tribal name Ish-ḥères (יִשְׁכָּר) 'man of the sun'; cp the place-name Beth-shemesh (Josh. 19 22); but the author of this theory prefers the explanation Yizrah (el) mentioned above (§ 3, end).

The difficulty (referred to above) in the way of supposing that 'Issachar' contains a reference to a god Sokar, is that, although, according to the Saqqāra list, a king of the second dynasty (the Sesōkhris of Manētho) bore a name compounded with that of this deity, and such compounds were favourites (Erman, Anc. Eg. 159) in the old empire (cp Seker-h'a-ba'u; Lieblein, Dict. de noms hiéroglyphiques, no. 1359 and others), there does not appear to be any evidence that the name of this god was used in forming proper names outside of Egypt.

Saul's choosing Bezek as mustering place (1 S. 11 8) that he counted on drawing from Issachar and the northern tribes. Bezek, however, is just opposite Jabesh, and Winkler's argument (GI 2 159, etc.) that Saul was a Jaheshite (cp SAUL), is certainly plausible. Even if it were to be held, with Cheyne, that Jabesh-gilead is a corruption of some other name, Guthe's inference is not conclusive: the mention of Bezek might be a consequence of the corruption (see SAUL, § 1, near end).

¹ This statement may stand even if it should be held that the people referred to in the original form of the story in Sam. as holding Israel in subjection were not the Philistines. See SAUL, § 4, and ZAREPHATH, where other related changes in the reading of the traditional story are proposed.

It is true the letters SKR (סכר) occur in several proper names at Carthage: a god סכר (CIS I 253 [254]; cp סכר מיסכר in a Maktar inscr., Lidzbarski, Ephemeris, 1 49); סכר (CIS I 267 372; Eut. 152); but in each case סכר is preceded by ס, and the name סכר (in a Sidon inscription: Rev. d'Ass. II, 3, p. 76 [171]) seems to show that the divine name is not סכר but סכר. Nor is the name סכר, also at Carthage (CIS I 1218 1354), decisive. There does not seem to be any unambiguous case of סכר preceded by a divine name. סכר is therefore probably, as elsewhere, a סכר (so Lidzbarski, Ephemeris, 1 36). We find a סכר (סכר) in 1 Ch. 11 35, as father of David's hero Ahiam the HARARITE (of Arad? Adora?); but in || 2 S. 28 33 סכר becomes Sharar. See also ISHSEHEL.

In 1 Ch. 26 5 a certain Issachar is seventh son of Obed-edom; but there may be a different סכר. Similarly in the case of Sacar, the fourth son (v. 4): סכר.

The later history of Issachar is obscure (cp SCYTHIANS).

7. Later history: genealogies.

How few people are expressly said to have belonged to Issachar has been noted already (§ 4, begin.). For an interesting case see SHUNAMITE, SHUNAMITE; for a tradition regarding N. Israel's great prophet, see HOSEA, § 9. With Belemoth, the name of his supposed birthplace, cp סכר's Baithemoth mentioned below, § 8.

On the Issacharite 'spy' (Nu. 13 7) see JOSEPHI, § 1 n. On the representatives of Issachar in the list (1 K. 4) of Solomon's prefects and in the Chronicler's list (1 Ch. 27) of David's captains (קרי) of tribes (Omri) see above, § 4, with footnote (4).

In Tola we have a typical case of the equivalence of 'genealogies' and 'annals.' According to Judg. 10 1 f. 'Shamir in Mt. Ephraim' boasted that it was the resting-place of Tola, son of Puah, son of Dodo, an Issacharite 'judge' of Israel. In P's 'genealogy' of Issachar part of this story appears as a simple list of names.¹ For 'Tola the son of Puah who dwelt (ישב) in Shamir' we find four sons of Issachar: Tola, Puah, Jashub² (ישוב), Shimron.

In the genealogical lists there is nothing equivalent to the 'ben Dodo' inserted in Judg. 10 1 after Puah. It is therefore not improbable that 'ben Dodo' is to be explained as a marginal note,³ and 'Mount Ephraim' as (a perhaps erroneous) gloss on Shamir or Shimron (סכר Σαμαρια); cp Gen. 46 13 Num. 26 23 f. 1 Ch. 7 1. It is not likely that the genealogy contained a name KAREAH.⁴

With regard to the Issachar clan names it is remarkable that Shamir is a precious stone (DIAMOND, § 2), whilst Tola is a dye-producing worm, and Puah, apparently, a dye-producing plant. On this coincidence see, further, ZEBULUN.

To the four names given in P the Chronicler adds eleven descendants of Tola, four of whom are 'sons' of Yizrah-yah (cp above, § 3, end).

P's geographical details about Issachar are not clear.

Instead of a 'boundary' (v. 18) we find a list of towns (omit AV 'toward', RV 'unto'—i.e., the סכר of סכר—with the versions), ending with a fragment of boundary

8. P's boundary. (v. 22)—Tabor (סכר γαθβαρ ['land of Tabor?'], סכר θαφωθ, סכר θαβωρ, some MSS βαθεμωθ; see below, n. 5), and two unknown places: SHAHAZUMAH and BETH-SHEMESH. The (thirteen; so Pesh.⁵) towns in the list are JEZREEL (Zer'in) on a northern promontory of Gilboa, CHESULLOTH (Kisib) below the hills of en-Nāšira, SHUNEM (Solem) on the SW. slope of Nebi Dahi, HAPHARAIM perhaps (el-Farriye?) on the hills between Carmel and el-Lejjin, SHION perhaps (Ain Sha'in?) across the plain NW. of Nebi Dahi, ANAHARATH perhaps (Atrāne?) on the lower hills west of Gilboa, RABBITH [q.v.], KISHION (Kidshon?; Tell abu Kudés?), EBZ (q.v.), REMETH (q.v.), EN-GANNIM (Jenin), EN-HADDAD (for En-harod?, Ain Jalād), and BETH-PAZZEZ. To these places is to be added JARMUTH (Josh. 21 28) = RAMOTH (1 Ch. 7 73 [58]), which is the third of the four Levitical cities in Issachar: Kishion (Josh.) = Kadesh (1 Ch.), Daberath, Jarmuth = Ramoth, and En-gannim (Josh.) = Anem (1 Ch.).

¹ On the question of the relative priority of P's list and Judg. 10 1, see the article referred to in n. 3.

² For the variants see JASHUB.

⁵ Almost unanimously omits v. 22 b. MT reads 'sixteen.' Possibly 'to Tabor' (בְּתוֹר) was read as a place-name: Beth-tor(?); cp several of סכר's variants. This would give sixteen towns.

According to Josh. 17 10 (also P) Issachar bordered on Manasseh on the (S.) W. (cp EPHRAIM, § 6), whilst according to v. 11-13 (J) the most important cities in Issachar (see § 5)—Beth-shean, Ibleam, Taanach, Megiddo (with Dor)—were, 'with their districts,' claimed by Manasseh and eventually made dependent by Israel (cp Judg. 1 27 1 Ch. 7 29).

ISSHIAH (יִשְׁיָהּ) [once יִשְׁיָהּ] = 'man of Jah'¹; יִשְׁיָהּ [BAL].

1. AV ISHIAH, an Issacharite (1 Ch. 7 3; ισα [B], ισα [A], ισα [L], Isia [Vg.]).

2. AV JESIAH, a Korahite, one of David's warriors (1 Ch. 12 6, יִשְׁיָהּ, ισα [B], ισα [A], ισα [L], Isia [Vg.]). See DAVID, § 11 (a iii.).

3. The head of the b'ne Rehahib (1 Ch. 24 21 om. B, ισα [A], ισα [L], Isias [Vg.]); in 1 Ch. 26 25 his name appears as JESHIAH (יִשְׁיָהּ, ισα [BA], ισα [L]).

4. AV JESIAH, b. Uzziel (Jahaziel), a Levite (1 Ch. 23 20, ισα [B], ισα [L], Isias [Vg.]), of whose sons Zechariah is alone mentioned (ib. 24 25, ισα [B], ισα [A], ισα [L]).

ITALIAN BAND (Η ΣΤΕΙΡΑ Η ΚΑΛΟΥΜΕΝΗ ΙΤΑΛΙΚΗ), Acts 10 1. See CORNELIUS, § 1, and cp ARMY, § 10.

ITALY (ΙΤΑΛΙΑ). From the age of Augustus the word Italy was used as a geographical term in the same sense in which we use it now. See further ROMY; ROMANS.

It occurs four times in the NT, viz., Acts 10 1, 'the Italian band' (see ARMY, § 10; CORNELIUS, § 1); Acts 18 2, the expulsion of the Jews 'from Italy'; || 'from Rome'; Acts 27 1, Paul's voyage to Italy, i.e., to Rome; Heb. 13 24, 'those of Italy' (see HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO, § 9).

ITCH (יִתְחַ), Dt. 28 27 f. See DISEASES, 3.

ITTHAI (יִתְיָ), 1 Ch. 11 31. See ITTAI.

ITTHAMAR (יִתְיָ), derivation uncertain, 'father of Tamar'? יָ being perhaps for יָ, cp ABIEZER and IEZER; but יָ is more probably a fragment of a divine name, see ICHABOD, JEZEBEL; יָ [BAFL], the name of a guild of priests which, to judge from 1 Ch. 24 3 f., was of less importance than that of ELEAZAR (q.v.). See GENEALOGIES, § 7 [iv.], ZADOK, and cp C. Niebuhr, Gesch. d. ebr. Völker, I 280. It is in accordance with this that in the priestly genealogies Ithamar appears as the youngest (4th) son of Aaron, Eleazar being the third [Ex. 6 23 28 1 Nu. 3 2 f., cp Lev. 10 6 12 16 [P]]. In P's description of the wanderings Ithamar is represented as superintending the Gershonites and Merarites (Nu. 4 28 33 7 8). The Kohâthites (to which the high-priestly family belonged) are not under his charge. The guild is mentioned again in the list of the returning exiles (Ezra 8 2 = 1 Esd. 8 29, יִתְיָ [B]). It is curious to notice that in this passage the name occurs in connection with the b'ne Phinehas and Gershom. The supposition that Eli was a member of this guild is manifestly uncritical, and has been shown to rest upon a misunderstanding; see ELI, § 2.

S. A. C.

ITHIEL (יִתְיָ), perhaps 'El is with me,' cp IMMANUEL; and see NAMES, § 28, in list of Benjaminite inhabitants of Jerusalem (see EZRA II, § 5 [b], § 15 [1] a), Neh. 11 7 (אִתְיָ [BA], cēθ. [N; a ditto-graphed c], cēθ. [L]).

Although the Nabataean name יִתְיָ is closely parallel (CIS 2 196), its meaning is equally uncertain—'Bel exists,' or, 'he whom Bel leads'; to render 'Bel is with me' is, of course, impossible, since the preposition יָ is not used in Aramaic.

ITHIEL AND UCAL (יִתְיֵאל וְעָכָל), τοῖς πικτεγοῦσιν θεῶ καὶ παγόμεαι), personal names in Prov. 30.1, where RV renders 'The words of Agur the son of Jakeh; the oracle. The man saith unto Ithiel and unto Ucal.' It is usual to retain 'Agur son of Jakeh' as the name of some unknown Jewish or non-Jewish sage, but to get rid of Ithiel and Ucal by changes of points or consonants. Thus Kamphausen (Kau. HS) renders v. 1 (after the beading), 'The man speaks (saying), I wearied myself about God, I wearied myself about God, and pined away' (יָצַח; so Del., Frank.). This, however, implies an unusual construction of the verb יָצַח with an accusative. Hitzig, Delitzsch, Frankenberg prefer to make לַי, 'God,' a vocative; but the context does not suggest an address to God. 'Agur son of Jakeh' is almost equally hard to explain. Toy owns perplexity. ^ΘBNAC, however, puts us on the right track. τοῖς πιστ. θεῶ represents לַי וְעָכָל, all of which can still be traced in MT, except that נ stands for the second ב (see further Crit. Bib.). The text probably is, 'The words of the man (called) haḳ-ḳōhēleth, the guilty one, to those who believe in God.' Cp KOHELETH. T. K. C.

ITHLAH (יִתְלָה), Josh. 19.42 RV, AV JETHLAH.

ITHMAH (יִתְמָה), a Moabite, named in David's army-list (1 Ch. 11.46†; εθεμα [BN], 1εθ. [A], 1εθAM [L]).

ITHNAN (יִתְנָן), § 10, a town in the southern part of Judah,¹ mentioned along with Kedesh and Hazor in Josh. 15.23 (ΔΟΡΩΝΑΙΝΑΙ ΚΑΙ ΜΑΙΝΑΜ [B] for Hazor and Ithnan; 1ΘΝΑΖΙΦ [A] for Ithnan, Ziph in v. 24; 1ΘΝΑΝ [L]). See ETHNAN.

ITHRA (יִתְרָה), 2 S. 17.25†. EV^{mg}. JETHER (g.v., 3).

ITHRAN (יִתְרָן), 'eminent'; cp JETHRO. 1. A Horite clan-name, Gen. 36.26 (1εθραν [ADE], 1θ. [L]) = 1 Ch. 14.7 (γεθραμ [B], 1εθραν [AL]). See DISHON. 2. In a genealogy of ASHER (g.v., § 4 ii.), 1 Ch. 7.37 (θερα [B], 1εθερ [A], om. L). In 1 Ch. 7.38 the name apparently recurs as JETHER 6 (Ἰθ, 1εθρ [B], 1εθερ [A]). ^ΘL gives 1εθραν (i.e., Ithran?) for Ulla the father of Hanniel and Rizia (v. 39); see ARAH, 1.

ITHREAM (יִתְרֵא), § 46, cp ABIATHAR, JETHER, JETHRO, AMMI [NAMES WITH], and see below; see also Gray, HPV 49 55; 1εθραAM [B], 1εθροAC [Jos.]), the sixth son of David by Eglah, 2 S. 35 (1εθραAM [A], 1εθραM [L]), 1 Ch. 33 (1εθραM [B], 1εθρα[Δ]M [AL]); see DAVID, § 11d. The name is miswritten JERIMOTH (g.v., 9) in 2 Ch. 11.18, where we should probably read 'Mahalath (see MAHALATH), daughter of Ithream and of Abihail daughter of Saul.' The Chronicler, who draws from an older source, not knowing Abihail (a name corrupted elsewhere into MICHAL as a daughter of Saul, has emended 1εθ into 1εθ (Eliab). Accepting the old view which identifies Ithream's mother EGLAH (g.v.) with Michal, Klostermann suggests that Ithream (i.e., 'residue of a kinsfolk') described the child of Michal as a representative of the almost extinct family of Saul. In itself this view is not unpalatable (cp Judg. 7.6), at least if Klostermann's explanation of Eglah be in some form accepted; but it seems to the present writer to be opposed by the analogy of the names Rehoboam, Jeroboam. To explain Rehoboam as 'the people is wide,' and Jeroboam as 'the people increases' (see NAMES, § 46) appears arbitrary; am in such names (when genuine) is, at any rate in the older period, presumably a divine title (see AMMON, § 1), and Ithream ought to mean 'the (divine) kinsman is pre-eminence.' T. K. C.

ITHRITES, THE (יִתְרִי), ΔΙΘΑΛΕΙΜ [BA], Ο ΕΘΡΙ [L]), a family of Kirjath-jearim, 1 Ch. 2.53 (see SHOVAL). In 2 S. 23.38 1 Ch. 11.40 Ira and Gareb are called Ithrites:

2 S. (αἰθραῖος [B*], εθειραῖος [B^{a,b}], εθθεναῖος [B], εθραῖος, τειθραῖος [A], 1εθερει, 1εθεμ [L]), Ch. (ηθρηει, 1εθρηει [B], 1εθρηει, 1εθρηει [N], 1εθερι [A], 1εθρι [L]). In 2 S. 23.38 αἰθραῖος [B] seems to suggest a reading יִתְרִי (Th., Klo., Marq., H. P. Smith)—i.e., a native of JATTIR (g.v.), in the bill country of Judah (Josh. 15.48 21.14).

ITTAAH-KAZIN (יִתְיָאֵה קָזִין), Josh. 19.13, RV ETH-KAZIN.

ITTAI (יִתְיָאֵה, εθθει [BA], 1θι [L], εθιC [Jos. Ant. vii. 9.2], εσθαιος [ib. 10.1]). 1. A Gittite, who with 600 Philistines entered into David's service shortly before Absalom's rebellion (2 S. 15.18 f. [προς] εθθει [B in v. 19]). So far as the text is intelligible, it would appear that Ittai—his name was probably once in v. 18b, thus providing a natural introduction to v. 19a—was a 'stranger' (גֵּר) who had been exiled from his native place (reading יִתְיָאֵה, ^Θ, Vg.), and David advises him to return and take back his brethren with him, adding a benediction¹ (see TRUTH). In the fight against Absalom, he is a commander of the third part of the army. The rapidity with which Ittai, who when we first meet him had only been a short time with David (2 S. 15.20, 1εθραβ [B]), springs to the high position of commander along with Joab and Abishai (2 S. 18.25.12) is surprising. It is natural to suppose that he was one of David's well-tried warriors, perhaps one who had been with him during his residence at Ziklag. It is hardly safe to identify bim with 2 (below).

2. Ittai, one of David's heroes, who, probably to distinguish him from 1 (above), is styled 'h. Rihai from Gibeah of the children of Benjamin,' 2 S. 23.29 (εσθαι [B], om. A, εθθι [L]) = 1 Ch. 11.31 ΙΤΗΑΙ (Ἰτῆ, αἰρει [B], αἰθει [N], ἠθου [A]). S. A. C.

ITUREA—i.e., the territory of the Ituræans, which should mean especially (see ISHMAEL, § 4 [7], and cp GASm. HG 545) the southern part of the Antilibanus. It is mentioned in AV of Lk. 3.7, where the appearance of the new prophet, John the Baptist, is elaborately dated. The passage which, according to RV, runs, 'and his brother Philip (being) tetrarch of the region of Ituræa and Trachonitis,' and according to AV, 'of Iturea and of the region of Trachonitis,' is in Greek (Ti. WH), Φιλίππου δὲ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ τετραρχοῦντος τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας. Which of the renderings is correct? It is important to notice that in Acts 16.6 the AV and the RV differ once more. The best MSS have τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν (so Ti. WH). This, as appears from Acts 18.23² (if the text is right), should mean, in Lk.'s style, 'Phrygia and the region of Galatia.' Herod Philip, then, on this view of Lk.'s meaning, held a tetrarchy composed of two districts called respectively Ituræa and Trachonitis; but here two difficulties arise.

a. It is at any rate doubtful whether there is a single Greek writer before Epiphanius³ (Hæc. 19) and Eusebius (OS 268.93) who uses Ἰτουραία, 'Ituræa,' as the name of a country.

Appian, in a list of countries, mentions Παλαιστίνη καὶ τὴν Ἰτουραίων⁴ (Civ. 5.7), and though in Jos. Ant. xiii. 13 Dindorf reads Ἰτουραίων, Niese's and Naber's reading Ἰτουραίων is proved to be right by the following words, which refer to the people of the Ituræans.⁵

This, however, is the less serious difficulty. In Acts 18.23 it is possible to read with (apparently) Pesh. τὴν Γαλατικὴν καὶ Φρυγίαν χώραν, and apart from Lk.'s presumed usage,⁶ it would be not unnatural to understand the words of Lk. 8.1 as implying that Ituræa and Trachonitis were partly at any rate the same region.

⁶ See Chase, Expositor, '93b, p. 405. Blass and Chase are on one side, Lightfoot and Ramsay on the other, in the interpretation of Acts 16.6.

6. The next difficulty is geographical. It is quite conceivable that a wild, semi-nomadic race like the Ituræans may, when their home on the Antilibanus was taken from them, have migrated into Trachonitis (proper), and that this region was therefore sometimes spoken of as Ituræan. G. A. Smith very aptly refers to the migration of many Druses from the Lebanon to the Jebel Haurân (to the SE. of the Haurân, on the edge of the desert), which has therefore acquired the second name Jebel ed-Drüz. There is, however, no historical proof that the Ituræans migrated in this way, and that hence their name attached itself to this new abode; and in view of the extreme care with which Lk. describes the date of the Baptist's appearance, it cannot be thought likely that Lk. would have used this second, popular name ('the Ituræan region') for Trachonitis, when there were other territorial names which had so much better a claim to be referred to in connection with Herod Philip.

For of what did the tetrarchy of Herod Philip consist? Josephus tells us. It was Batanæa, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and certain parts of the 'house of Zeno (or Zenodorus)' about Paneas (Ant. xvii. 11 4, Bf. ii. 6 3). Now even if we grant (for argument's sake) that the latter territory,¹ not (according to the hypothesis just now rejected) Trachonitis proper, may be intended by 'the Ituræan (region)' in Lk. 3 1, who can think it likely that Lk. would mention the region of Paneas² in preference to the names of more important territories? Surely he would rather have selected Gaulanitis (Jos. Ant. xvii. 8 1) or Auranitis (xvii. 11 4). Is it not on the whole probable that he actually did so? No names are more liable to corruption than those of places. In the very passage which has occasioned this article (Lk. 3 1) there are traces of the existence of a false reading 'Ἰδουμαίας for Ἰτρούπαιος; what if Ἰτρούπαιος itself is a corruption of ἀραβιτρίδος? Omit ἰδ, which, after ἰτ, would be a natural transcriptional error, and you have a group of letters which might easily be confounded with ἰτρούπαιος. This is preferable, not only to the rather improbable conjectures mentioned above, but also to the suggestion of Holtzmann (HC 157) that by an anachronism the evangelist assigns to Philip the territory afterwards possessed by Agrippa.

See the discussion between Chase and Ramsay, and between Ramsay and G. A. Smith in the Expositor, '936, '94a; and cp Schürer, Hist. 2, Appendix 1. T. K. C.

IVORY (יוֹשֵׁ, 'tooth, implying that the Hebrews knew that ivory was not a horn'; MT, and consequently EV, twice assume that יוֹשֵׁ is also means 'ivory').

Apart from such sources as the tusks of fossil elephants and allied animals, and of the narwhal, etc., which may practically be neglected, ivory is derived from the incisor teeth or tusks of the ELEPHANT (q. v.). It is the solid dentine or central substance of teeth, which, alike on account of its mass, its fine elastic quality, and its property of taking a high polish, has always had a high commercial value.

³ יוֹשֵׁ (1 K. 10 22 2 Ch. 9 21, AV mg. 'elephants' teeth, 'δόντες ἐλεφάντινοι [only A in 1 K.] has been taken to mean 'tooth of the habbim' (דְּבִי), which Schrader (KAT 187) connects with Ass. šin al-ab, 'tooth of halab'; but the authority for this supposed Assyrian name for the elephant is most insecure (cp ELEPHANT, n. 2). 'Ivory' in Ass. is šinni-piri, or, in the Amarna tablets, šinni-biri (cp Zeit. f. Völkerpsych. 18 249), and, unless we emend the הַבִּיבִּי ('elephant,' cp Syr. ܘܫܘܒܐ, etc.), it is best either to identify with the Egypt. ab, ebu (cp Lat. ebur), 'elephant' (with this we might combine the theory of an ultimate Sanskrit original iśhas? cp ἐλέφας), or to read 'ivory and ebony' (יוֹשֵׁ) as proposed elsewhere (see EBONY).

The Tyrians, it appears, obtained ivory from Dedanite or Rhodian merchants (Ezek. 27 15; see

1. Source. DODANIM); the Israelites, in Solomon's time, through a ship or ships of their own, from OPHIR (q. v., 1 K. 10 22, cp v. 18). It is generally supposed that part of this ivory came from India,¹ though the African elephant has always been the main source of the commodity (this on account of the large size of the tusks, and because there are tusks in both the male and the female). Assyria received a small quantity from Egypt through Phœnicia—usually in the form of skilfully chiselled plaques or ornaments. Generally, however, it was imported in its rough state; the Assyrians themselves worked it up. This will account for the different style and character of the actual finds (cp Perrot-Chipiez, Art in Chald. 2 319 ff.). The Egyptians obtained their ivory partly from Ethiopia, which was reputed to be very rich in it (cp Pliny, 8 10), partly from Cyprus (Brugsch, Gesch. Aeg. 317 322; WMM, As. u. Eur. 336, n. 2; cp Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, 1 140 191; EGYPT, § 33). On the coast of Asia Minor there was an ivory industry of great antiquity (cp Il. 4 141-144).

Ivory being a hard and durable substance, many articles, carved and venerated, have survived to our time both in Egypt and (especially) in As-

2. Use. Syria. Cant. 5 14 has been quoted as referring to such objects; but eseth (תְּשֵׁת) perhaps rather suggests a mass of ivory than an artistic product (see Siegfried, ad loc.). 'Vessels of ivory' are mentioned only in Rev. 18 12; but ivory was used by the Israelites as well as other peoples in the decoration of palaces (1 K. 22 39; cp Am. 3 15 and, if correct, Ps. 45 8 [9]). The Ninevite palaces were certainly inlaid with ivory (cp Hom. Od. 4 63, chambers of Menelaus). Amos (6 4) refers in anger to the 'beds of ivory' of the nobles of N. Israel (the reference to Zion in 6 1 can hardly be original).² In Taylor's cylinder inscription it is said that in the tribute of Hezekiah to Sennacherib were 'ivory couches, splendid seats of ivory' (Schr. KAT 293; cp BEB, § 5). Rather strangely we read in Cant. 7 4 [5] of a 'tower of ivory.' Some particular tower seems to be meant (cp v. 5 4 4); but where and what was it? Delitzsch thinks that it was panelled with ivory externally—a difficult supposition (see below). Among the Phœnicians ivory was used to ornament the ship's deck (or rudder [?] Ezek. 27 6), just as, at an early age, ivory was used by the

3. Other references. Greeks in the handles of keys or bosses of shields, etc. It is probable, however, that the above list of references should be shortened.

Thus in Ps. 45 8 [9] and Cant. 7 4 [5] יוֹשֵׁ, 'ivory,' only appears through a corruption of the text. In the former passage שֵׁן שֵׁן should probably be שֵׁן שֵׁן, 'ointments' (Che. Ps. 45), and in the latter יוֹשֵׁ should be יוֹשֵׁ (Wi.) or יוֹשֵׁ (Che.). See Winckler (AOF 1 293 f.), and more fully Cheyne (JQR, Apr. '99), who takes 'the tower of Lebanon which looks towards Damascus' to be a variant of 'the tower of Senir.'

Some additions, however, may be made to the list. Thus in 1 K. 10 22 many read 'ivory and ebony' for 'ivory'; in 1 Ch. 29 2 the same reading is possibly right for 'onyx stone'; and in Is. 2 16a 'ships of Tarshish' should not improbably be 'palaces of ivory.' See EBONY.

JAARESHIAH (יַאֲרֵשִׁיָּה), 1 Ch. 8:27 RV, AV JARESHIAH (q.v.).

JAASAU, RV Jaasu, RV^{mg.} Jaasai (יַאֲסָא). Kt. יַאֲסָא; cp יַאֲסָא, §§ 31, 52), one of the b'ne BANI in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5, end), Ezra 10:37 (iasu [Vg.], uthi [Pesh.], και επιουχαν, i.e., יַאֲסָא [BNA], om. L), whose name may be recognised in the ELIASIS of || 1 Esd. 9:34 (ελιασεις [BA], om. L, formation analogous to יַאֲסָא).

JAASIEL (יַאֲסִיֵּל), § 31; 'El performs,' one of David's heroes, 1 Ch. 11:47, AV JASIEL (εσσεια [B]), ec. [N], εσσεια [A], יעס. [L]). He is called יַאֲסִיֵּל (ὁ μεναβεια [BN], ὁ μεσωβια [A], ὁ μασαβια [L], DE MISOBIA [Vg.]). AV and RV (by a virtual emendation of the text) render this 'the Mes(z)obaita.

The reading is conflate; we must read either יַאֲסִיֵּל, 'the Mizpahite,' or יַאֲסִיֵּל, 'from Mizpah.' The designation was no doubt suggested by 'Igal ben Nathan of Mizpah' in 2 S. 23:36 (see IGAL, 2). יַאֲסִיֵּל and יַאֲסִיֵּל were easily confounded (cp the play on יַאֲסִיֵּל and יַאֲסִיֵּל in Gen. 31:49 52). Probably Mizpah in Benjamin is meant by the Chronicler, who gives the name Jaasiel to a Benjaminite prince, b. Abner, in 1 Ch. 27:21 (אסיהר [B], אסיהר [A], יאס. [L], יאסיל [Vg.]).

On the names in 1 Ch. 11:47-49, see DAVID, § 11 (a ii.).

IZLIAH (יִזְלִיָּה), 1 Ch. 8:18 RV, AV JEZLIAH.

IZRAHIAH (יִזְרָחִיָּה), 'Yahwè rises,' §§ 35, 53; cp ZERAHIAH) b. Uzzi, an Issacharite: 1 Ch. 7:3 (ζαρηια [B], ιεζραα [A* vid.], ιεζρια [A¹ and A], ιεζερια [L]), cp ZERAHIAH b. Uzzi (1 Ch. 6:6 [5:32] etc.). The identical name appears also in the EV under the form JEZRAHIAH [q.v.].

IZRAHITE, (יִזְרָחִי), 1 Ch. 27:8. See ZERAH.

IZRI (יִזְרִי)—i.e., a man of יִזְרִי; a Jezerite, see JEZER, a son of Jeduthun (1 Ch. 25:11, יִזְרִי, יעצר [ε]) [BA], יעז. [L v. 14]). In 1 Ch. 25:3 his name appears as ZERI (יִזְרִי; σουρ [ε] [BAL]).

IZZIAH (יִזְזִיָּה), Ezra 10:25 RV, AV JEZIAH.

JAAZANIAH (יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ), § 32; 'Yahwè hears or 'weighs'; cp AZANIAH; יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ, Jer. 35:3, Ezek. 11:1; יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ, Jer. 40:8; יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ, Jer. 42:1; יעזניא [BNAQ]).

1. Son of the Maacathite; a captain (2 K. 25:23; οζωνιας [B]; Jer. 40:8, JEZANIAH). Probably identical with Jezeaniah b. Hoshaiah, Jer. 42:2 (αζαριας [BNAQ])—in 43:2 called AZARIAH [q.v., 16] (αζαριας [BNAQ], αζαριας [N*]), which is read by [except Q^{mg.}] in the former passage. Cp JOHANAN (9).

2. b. Jeremiah, a Rechabite head (Jer. 35:3; ιεζωνια [BNA]).

3. b. Shaphan, head of seventy elders of Israel in a vision of Ezekiel (Ezek. 8:11; ιεζωνιας [BQ^a]).

4. b. Azzur, a leading Jerusalemite (Ezek. 11:1; ιεζωνια [BAT]).

JAAZER (יַאֲזֵר), Nu. 21:32, etc. See JAZER.

JAAZIAH (יַאֲזִיָּהוּ), 'Yahwè strengthens,' cp JAAZIEL; § 29; οζ [ε]ια [BA], οζιας [L]), one of the 'sons' of Merari (1 Ch. 24:26 f.).

JAAZIEL (יַאֲזִיֵּל), 'God strengthens,' cp JAAZIAH; § 29), a Levite, of the second degree, a temple musician (1 Ch. 15:18, οζειηλ [BN], ιηοηλ [A], ιειηλ [L]).

For 'Zechariah, Ben, and Jaaziel we should, omitting [5], read 'Zechariah and Jaaziel' (Z. v. 18), cp Ki. SBOT 'Chron.,' ad loc. With the omission of the initial 'r' the name appears again in v. 20 as αζιελ (AZIEL, οζ [ε]ηλ [BNA]). The proper vocalisation is undoubtedly יַאֲזִיֵּל, a reading to which the versions point.

JABAL (יַבֵּל), Gen. 4:20†. See CAINITES, § 11.

JABBOK (יַבְבֹּק), יאבוק [BADEFL], but יאβωκ [L in Josh. 12: Judg. 11:13 22]; יαβακχοc or ιοβακοc [Jos. Ant. i. 202]). The 'luxuriant

1. Course, etc. river' is the significant name of the tortuous stream which divides the hill-country of Gilead (see GILEAD, § 3), and finally reaches the Jordan just above ed-Dāmiyeh (see ADAM, i.), about 25 m. in a straight line N. of the Dead Sea. Like the Arnon it has a continuous stream; the whole course, not counting the windings, is over 60 m. (G. A. Smith). It is now called (from its clear blue colour) the Nahr ez-Zerkā. It is famous in Hebrew tradition from its connection with Jacob's change of name (Gen. 32:22 [23]), and also as the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og. In Dt. 3:16 Josh. 12:2 it is called 'the border of the B'ne Ammon'; the phrase applies to the upper part of the Jabbok, where, circling round, it passes RABBATH-AMMON, near which are its sources. Cp Nu. 21:24 Judg. 11:13 22. On the N. of the Jabbok are the ruins of Gerasa (see GILEAD, § 7), between which place and Philadelphia, Eusebius (OS 263:78 130:30) rightly places the river.

JABESH

At what precise part of the Jabbok the ford referred to in Gen. 32²² [23] may be supposed to be, is uncertain.

2. The reference The story containing the reference is composite, and the narrators J in Gen. 32²² [23] and E appear to be not quite consistent (see GILEAD, § 3). The Zerka is 'always fordable, except where it breaks between steep rocks' (GASm. HG 584). That there is any play on the word Jabbok, as if there were 'some sympathy between the two tortuous courses' (ibid.), is scarcely probable. We have two explanations of names in the narrative already (Israel and Peniel), and hardly expect a third. Besides, there is the possibility that in the original narrative the Yarmuk (which is the boundary between Gilead and Bashan), not the Jabbok, was the river referred to.

The word rendered 'wrestled' is another difficulty. Not improbably יִיאָבֵק has become corrupted out of יָבֵק (יִיאָבֵק), owing to the vicinity of יָבֵק. See Crit. Bib.

F. B., § 1; T. A. C., § 2.

JABESH (יָבֵשׁ or יָבֵשׁ, i.e., 'dry';¹ (ε)ΙΑΒ(ε)ΙC [BAL], ΙΑΒΗCOC, ΙΑΒΙCOC, ΙΑΒΙC [Jos.]), or, more

1. References. fully, Jabesh-gilead (יָבֵשׁ גִּלְעָד, ΙΑΒ(ε)ΙC [THC] ΓΑΛΑΔΔ, ΤΗC ΓΑΛΑΔΔΙΤΙΔOC), the scene of Saul's first warlike exploit (SAUL, § 1), and the place where his bones were for a time buried (1 S. 11:10 31:11-13 2 S. 21:12 1 Ch. 10:11 f.). It is mentioned in the Am. Tab. (Jabishi, 237²⁸). The importance of Jabesh was recognised by David. By sending presents to its citizens (2 S. 26, crit. emend.; see SAUL, § 5), he sought to counteract the policy of Abner, and to promote his own candidature as king of all Israel. Very possibly, too, Jabesh was the birthplace of Shallum and of Elijah (see SHALLUM, 1; ELIJAH, § 1, n. 1). It is, however, only a late post-exilic narrative (Judg. 218-14) which asserts that in the time of the Judges, by a combined effort of all Israel, the population of Jabesh-gilead was exterminated, with the exception of four hundred virgins who were married to the survivors of Benjamin (see BENJAMIN, § 5; JUDGES, § 13). How long did the importance of Jabesh last? Does Josephus mean to say, in his paraphrase of 1 S. 11, that Jabesh was in his day still the 'metropolis' of the Gileadites² (Ant. vi. 5 1)? At any rate, in the time of Eusebius it was only a village (κώμη), which is described by him as on the eastern tableland, six R.m. from Pella, on the road to Gerasa (OS 268⁸; cp 225⁹, and Jer. Comm. ad Jud.). The great city of Pella had risen beside it and been made capital of the province; this probably led to the decline of Jabesh and its final ruin.

The site is a matter of doubtful conjecture. Robinson (BR 339) thought that Jabesh might be on the site of

2. Site. ed-Deir ('the convent'), on the S. bank of the wādy, about 6 miles from Fahl or Pella; but this place is perched upon an eminence difficult of access, and quite off from the road leading from Pella to Jerash.³ The ruins of Meriamin, however, which evidently belong to a large and ancient town, are not exposed to this objection; they are at a distance of one hour forty minutes from Pella. No other site, according to Merrill, comes into competition with this (see, however, Buhl, 259). About Meriamin there is plenty of room for an army to operate. Robinson did not actually visit ed-Deir, which cannot be the true site. At any rate, the old name Jabesh still survives in that of the Wādy Yābis, which enters the Jordan valley

¹ See NAMES, § 100. The name doubtless belonged first to the wādy, then to the town also (Moore, Judges, 447).

² He says ιαβις δ'εστιν αυτη, but he continues in the historic present πεμνει.

JABIN

about 10 m. SSE. from Beisān (Bethshan), nearly opposite Izbik̄ (Bezek). T. K. C.

JABESH (יָבֵשׁ), father of SHALLUM (q.v., i. 1), 2 K. 15:10 13 f. (ΙΑΒΕΙC [BAL]); in v. 10 ΔΒ [A]. It is probable, however, that 'son of Jabesh' means 'a man of Jabesh-gilead' (so Klo., St., We.). See GINATH.

JABEZ (יָבֵז), ΙΑΒΗC, ΓΑΜΕC [B], ΙΑΓΒΗC, ΓΑΒΗC¹ [A], ΙΑΒΙΗC, ΙΑΒΗΛ, ΙΑΒ[Ε]ΙC [L]. According to the MT (1 Ch. 49 f.) Jabez is like Melchizedek, 'without father or mother,' and the place which bears his name (1 Ch. 255) is of 'unknown site' (Hastings, BD 252⁶); but the riddle can with some probability be solved.

יַעַבְז (1 Ch. 255) is a duplication of [ישבנז] (Kr., ⑤); γ is a corruption of β, the first letter of יָבֵז; יָבֵז fell out owing to the following יָבֵז. A misplacement of words followed, and יַעַבְז in קְרִיִּים־סָפֵר was mistaken for 'סָפֵר (i.e., סָפֵרִים).

Probably the true reading is יַעַבְז קְרִיִּים־סָפֵר, 'and the families of the inhabitants of Kirjath-sepher' (called Beth-gader [?] in v. 51).² The names of the 'families' referred to also became corrupted. Tir'athaim³ probably conceals יָתִירִים or יָתִירָה, men of JATTIR [q.v.], or of Jattirah; Shim'athim⁴ should be שִׁמְחָתִים, men of Eshtemoa; and Sucathim⁵ should be שִׁכְחָתִים, men of Socoh or Socah.⁶ All the places referred to are to the SW. of Hebron, in the neighbourhood of Debir or Kirjath-sepher. The Chronicler adopted the statement which his authority gave, but seems to have been puzzled by the (corrupt) word 'Jabez.' He probably supposed that a person called Jabez was connected with the early history of Kirjath-sepher, and produced a new story to account for the 'enlargement of the border' of Kirjath-sepher in connection with the supposed derivation of Jabez (from oseb, 'pain'). This story is a substitute for that in Judg. 1:14 f. (Josh. 15:18 f.); there is no party feeling in it (C. Niebuhr); it expresses the Chronicler's perplexity, and also, in the prayer of Jabez, his piety. Probably v. 9 f. should come after v. 13; the 'brethren' of 'Jabez' should be the sons of Kenaz.

*This view of the passage precludes conjectures as to the Kenite 'scribes' of whom MT speaks (cp Bertholet, Die Stellung der Israeliten, etc., 80, n. 1). No 'scribes' were referred to in the original text. The latter part of 1 Ch. 255 must be taken by itself. It alludes to the fact that the Kenites dwelt in the S. of Judah; and it is probable that there is a lacuna in the text (cp HEMATH). T. K. C.

JABIN (יָבִין, § 53; 'He (God) perceives'; ΙΑΒ[Ε]ΙC [BNARTFL]), king of Hazor (see HAZOR, 1), who warred against Zebulun and Naphtali (Judg. 4:2 7, ιαμειν [A]; and 1 S. 12:9 [⑤] only); ιαβιν [L], [ε]ιαβεις [BA]). He has really little to do with the narrative in Judg. 4, which in its present form has been shown to consist of a combination of the story of Jabin with that of SISERA (q.v.) against Israel. By making Sisera Jabin's general, the two accounts have been made to harmonise roughly, and it is difficult to say how much of the original history of Jabin has been omitted in favour of that of Sisera. It may be conjectured that at the tents of Heber, Jabin met a fate similar to Sisera's at the hands of Jael.

In the less original account in Josh. 11:9 (ιαβεις [BA]), due to E₂ and worked over by D₂, the war of the two tribes against Jabin is characteristically magnified into the conquest of all N. Canaan by Joshua and all Israel. A preliminary trace of such a scheme is seen in Judg. 42, where Jabin is already called 'king of Canaan who reigned in Hazor.' See Moore, Judges 108*f.*; and Judges, § 7.

JABNEEL (יַבְנֵיֶל), 'God builds'; יַבְנֵהָל [AL], 1. Shortened into Jabneh (יַבְנֵה), 'he [God] builds'; 2 Ch. 266 (αβεννηρ [B], αβεις [A], αβνη [L]); the JAMNIA and JEMNAAN of a later day. A Philistian city between Ekron and the sea (Josh. 1511; λεμνα [B]); cp Jabni-ilu, the name of a prince of Lachish in the Amarna tablets (Wi., 2184). According to Petrie, Thotmes III. mentions two places called Yehema, one of which is our Jabneel, and the other is the mod. Yemma, near Megiddo (Hist. of Eg. 2327; cp WMIN, As. u. Eur. 160). The Priestly Writer includes Jabneel within the limits of Judah (Josh. 1511); but the earliest evidence of Jewish occupation is in 2 Ch. 266, where Uzziah is said to have taken the city and demolished its fortifications. It is next mentioned in the time of Judas the Maccabee. Two accounts have come down to us—one historical, viz., that the two generals Joseph and Azarias made an unsuccessful attempt upon Jamnia (1 Macc. 555-62); and the other most probably a falsification of history, viz., that Judas made a night attack upon 'the Jamnites,' setting fire to the haven¹ (for there was a port also called Jamnia) together with the fleet, 'so that the glare of the light was seen at Jerusalem, two hundred and forty furlongs [stadia] distant' (2 Macc. 128*f.*).

According to Jos. (Ant. xiii. 67; BJ i. 22) Jamnia was taken at last by Simon the Maccabee. But it can hardly have become part of the dominions of the Hasmonæans (see 1 Macc. 1069, 1540) until the time of Alexander Jannæus, who subdued all the cities of the coast from the Egyptian border to Carmel with the exception of Ashkelon (Jos. Ant. xiii. 154). It became Roman under Pompey (Jos. Ant. xiv. 44; BJ i. 77), and, having apparently become greatly depopulated, was restored and repopled by Gabinus (BJ i. 84). It was given by Herod to his sister Salome (Ant. xvii. 81), who in turn gave it to the empress Livia (Ant. xviii. 22; BJ ii. 91). Strabo (xvi. 228) speaks of it as a village which, along with the district pertaining to it, had once been able to send 40,000 men into the field. In Caligula's time its population was principally Jewish (Philo, De Leg. ad Caium), and when the heathen section of the inhabitants erected an altar to the emperor it was immediately destroyed by the Jews. This, being reported to the emperor by the procurator Herennius Capito, was the occasion of the imperial order that the image of Caligula should be set up in the temple at Jerusalem (see ISRAEL, § 96). In the Jewish war Jamnia was taken by Vespasian. It was to this place that Johanan b. Zakkai retired, after having been, by a singular stratagem, conveyed out of the doomed capital to the Roman camp.² There he formed a Sanhedrin, and so Jamnia became the religious centre of the Jewish people down to the collapse of the revolt of Bar Cochba (135 A.D.). In the fourth century it was but a πολιχνη (Onom. 26635); but its bishop took part in the Council of Nicæa.³ In the time of the Crusaders a castle called Ibelin stood on the site of the ruined city, which was supposed to have been not Jabneel, but Gath.

The statements of ancient writers respecting the position of Jamnia are very precise (see, e.g., 2 Macc. 129, quoted above). It is represented by the modern Yebna, a considerable village, 12 m. S. from Joppa, and 4 m. in a direct line from the sea. There are ruins of the ancient port at the mouth of the Nahr Rûbin (see BAALAH, 3) to the NW. The district is fertile, and traces can still be seen of the plantations which once adorned the neighbourhood of the haven.

2. An unidentified site in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. 1933 εφθαμμαι [B]), doubtless the Ἰάμνεια or Ἰάμνιθ of Jos. It must therefore be sought somewhere about Lake Hûleh or in the neighbourhood of Baniâs. The com-

JACHAN, RV Jacan (יַכָּן, § 54; ΧΙΜΑ [B], ΙΑΧΑ [A], ΙΩΔΧΑ [L]), a Gadite (1 Ch. 513*f.*).

JACHIN AND BOAZ. Jachin (יַכִּין; ΙΑΧΟΥΜ [BL], -N [A], ΙΑΧΕΙΝ [Jos. Ant. viii. 34]) was the name of the right-hand (i.e., southern) pillar 'at (Klo., 'before') the porch of the temple,' and Boaz (יָבוֹז; ΒΑΔΑΖ [L], ΒΟΟC [A], ΒΑΛΑΖ [B], [Δ] ΒΑΙΖ [Jos.]) that of the left-hand (i.e., northern) pillar (1 K. 721 = 2 Ch. 317); see PILLAR, and cp the 'pillars by the posts' in Ezek. 4049 (see Toy's note SBOT [Eng.] Ezek., ad loc.).

The names are enigmatical; we cannot evade an effort to explain them. So much is clear at the outset that, like the names of the walls of Babylon (see BABYLON, § 7), they must have a religious significance. The walls, and the pillars in question as well, have names because they are sacred objects. We can advance a step further by considering what these enormous pillars were. They seem originally to have been symbols of the 'vast mountain of the gods' (see CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF) in the far N., the brilliance of which, faintly suggested by the burnished bronze of the pillars, is described by Ezekiel (2816; cp Herod. 244, and see CHERUB, col. 742, n. 4). That mountain had two special features—its firm strength and the abode of the Elôhim on its summit. We may expect therefore to find these two points expressed in the names. Jachin will therefore express the immovableness of the symbolic pillar; cp Ps. 656[7], מְכִיֵן הָרִים, 'who establishes the mountains.'

This explanation at any rate appears certain, whether or not we bring Jachin into relation to the name Akna-zaph, which Erman reads on the so-called 'Stone of Job' (rather, Stone of Rameses II.) in Haurân (see EGYPT, § 58, n. 1).

Boaz ought to refer to the mountain dwelling-place of the divine beings. It is difficult, however, to verify this assumption. Boaz looks like a mutilation of a longer word. The initial ב is a hindrance to our taking י from the root יָבַעַל, 'to be strong,' by the strength of Baal, 'is hardly the right form; we expect a statement such as עוֹבֵל עָלַי, 'strong is Baal.' This, however, would not give us the variety which we look for; such a name would be too nearly synonymous with Jachin, and the initial ב cannot be ignored. We may conclude, therefore, that the last letter י is a fragment of a word; the preceding letters בז are surely a mutilation of בעל (cp Βεεζεβουλ in NB's text of the Gospels; e.g. in Mt. 1024).¹ Looking next at the Psalm which Solomon is said to have sung on the completion of the temple, we notice that two of the striking phrases in it are הֵכִין for the 'establishment' of the sun in his glorious mansion in the sky, and בֵּית וְגָל for the 'high house' or temple in which Yahwê was to dwell for ever (Che. OPs. 212). The word וְגָל in the latter phrase is precisely what we want. Not impossibly, therefore, the full name of the pillar on the left hand is Baal-zebul ('Lord of the high house').² The idea which it expressed was familiar to the Phœnicians; a synonymous title was Baal-zaphon (see BAAL-ZEPHON). It was also not unknown to the Israelites (see BAAL-ZEBUL). In later times, probably, the name of the second pillar was deliberately mutilated, because of the new and inauspicious associations which had gathered round it. It was after all a Phœnician (Hiram) who had given the name; a later age did not approve of Solomon's close connections with heathen peoples.

Subsequently to this pious alteration of the name, one of the supposed ancestors of David (see DAVID, § 1, n. 1) was furnished with the name Boaz (only found late), to indicate that he was a pillar of the Davidic family (cp Tg. on 2 Ch. 317).

A few other conjectures may, in conclusion, be mentioned. Ⓞ in Chron. renders Jachin κατόρθωσις and Boaz ισχύς. Ephrem, who is followed among moderns by Thenius, combines the two words (pointing יַחֲזֵק) into a prayer for the firm establishment of the temple. EVmg. explains Jachin, 'He shall establish,' and Boaz, 'In it is strength'; more plausibly WRS, (RS² 208) interprets the former 'The stabilisher'; the latter, 'In him is strength.' Klostermann deals more boldly with MT; he adopts יַחֲזֵק, 'It shall stand (well), from Ⓞ; and emends יַחֲזֵק into יַחֲזֵק, 'Lord of strength' = 'the strong' (cp B's βαλῶς). In view of the close bond which united Tyre and Jerusalem in the time of Solomon, and the fact that it was a Phœnician who named the pillars, Mr. S. A. Cook suggests that יַחֲזֵק may be a corruption of יַחֲזֵק, 'Baal,' and that יַחֲזֵק might have been understood to be the Phœn. equivalent of יהוה (Ph. יְהוָה, 'to be' = Heb. יהוה, יהוה).¹ T. K. 1. A son of Simeon, Gen. 46 10 Ex. 6 15 (αχαιε [A]), Nu. 26 12. In the parallel text, 1 Ch. 4 24, the name is JARIB (י). Jachinites (יַחֲזֵק), αχαιε [B], -ευν [AL] occurs in Nu. 26 12.
2. Head of a priestly family; 1 Ch. 9 10 24 17 Neh. 11 10.

JACINTH is given by RV for Δυσή (ΛΙΓΥΡΙΟΝ; ligurius) in Ex. 28 19 39 12, where AV has LIGURE; also in EV of Rev. 21 20 (βάκιθος; RVmg. 'sapphire'), and in AV of Rev. 9 17 (βάκιθωρος = 'of jacinth', RV 'of hyacinth'). In Ex. 28 19, RVmg. gives 'amber'; cp Enoch 71 2, where the streams of fire (Dan. 7 10) are likened to 'hyacinth' (Di. and Charles).

The hyacinthus of the ancients (mentioned in Rev.) was probably our sapphire (see SAPPHIRE). It is now commonly held (see, e.g., Riehm, *HWB*²) that the Heb. lšm (ליגύριον) is the jacinth, for a description of which see below. This, however, appears to be a mistake. It is probable that לש is simply a miswritten הש *hšmal*² (see AMBER), or perhaps rather, שחל hšalmš (see TARSHISH, STONE OF). This may enable us to account for the superfluous καὶ ἀργύριον καὶ χρυσίον which comes between λασπίδ and λιγύριον in Ⓞ of Ezek. 28 13 (where, apart from this, the fuller catalogue in Ⓞ is to be adopted). לשחל is in fact understood by many to mean an alloy of gold and silver; ἀργύριον καὶ χρυσίον seems to be a gloss on the word לשחל or שחל (which must have stood in the true text of Ezekiel), intended to correct the rendering λιγύριον. We are of course not bound to agree with this gloss, but the word לשחל or שחל ('white sapphire'?) but see AMBER) may with some confidence be substituted for לש. Elsewhere (see TARSHISH, STONE OF) it has been shown that the word also appears disguised as ששחל, tarššl. It is no objection to this theory that tarššl and lšhem both occur in the list of precious stones in Ex. 28 17-20, for this list comes from P, who makes up such lists as he best can, and does not mind including variants.

The true jacinth is a red-coloured variety of silicate of zirconium, those varieties which are yellow-brown or green being distinguished, if transparent, by the name of jaszoon, while the dull-coloured varieties, more or less opaque, are termed rightly zircon. The true jacinth, when polished, is peculiarly brilliant. It is extremely rare. Probably many of the antique camei or intagli reputed to be jacinth are merely hyacinthine garnets; garnets, however, have a lower specific gravity. T. K. C.

found only in the pl. *יַחֲזֵק*¹ (the fem. form יַחֲזֵקָה, Mal. 1 3, is probably due to corruption; Stade reads יַחֲזֵקָה, 'pastures' [cp Ⓞ δόματα [BNAQ], perhaps for δόματα, but Ⓞ may have connected the word with יַחֲזֵק; Pesh. 'dwellings']; AV renders DRAGONS (but 'sea-monsters' in Lam. 4 3); RV JACKALS.² Throughout Palestine the common jackal is by far the most common of all the beasts of prey.

It is the same jackal which is so well known elsewhere, and has spread through SE. Europe and SW. Asia as far as Burmah, as well as through N. Africa. As its name (Canis aureus) implies, it is of a reddish-gold colour, darker in the upper parts.

Jackals usually hunt in packs, but at times are seen in pairs or even alone. They are comparatively harmless to man, and, as a rule, feed on carrion; but they also attack and kill fowls, lambs, kids, etc., and even weakly sheep and goats. They do not, however, refuse fruit, and are especially fond of sugar-cane. The cry of the jackal may be heard every night by the traveller in Palestine (cp Mic. 1 8). As a rule they are nocturnal, but not exclusively so; they hide during the day in disused stone-quarries, caves, and especially in deserted ruins (Is. 13 22 34 13 35 7). Jeremiah's hearers, therefore, knew what he meant when he spoke of Jerusalem's becoming a 'place of jackals' (Jer. 9 11 [10] 10 22; cp 51 37 49 33).

(2) In Judg. 15 4 Ps. 63 10 [11] Lam. 5 18, RVmg. gives 'jackal' as an alternative rendering for EV 'fox' (יַחֲזֵק). See FOX and cp HAZAR-SHUAL, SHAALBIL.

(3) Whether the word rendered 'doleful creatures' (דוֹלֵם, ḏōlēm) in Is. 13 21 always meant the jackal, we cannot tell. Houghton (TSB. 1 6 32 B) well compared Ass. ānu; but whether this word really means the jackal (so Del.) is not quite certain. Jensen pronounces for the leopard; Houghton, improbably, thought of the hyæna. Cp Del. Heb. Lang. 34.

(4) Finally the iyymim, דוֹלֵם, of Is. 13 22 34 14 Jer. 50 39, AV 'wild beasts of the island,' from a supposed connection with י, 'an island' (cp ד, 'island', and see ISLE), RV WOLVES, mg. HOWLING CREATURES, may be compared with the Ar. banātu āwa, 'jackals.' The equiv. Syr. ḏōmāth away is used by Bar Hebr. in his commentary on Job 80 29. A. E. S.—S. A. C.

JACOB (יַעֲקֹב), but five times יַעֲקֹב; יַאֲקֹב). Son of Isaac and Rebekah, and father of the twelve reputed ancestors of the tribes of Israel; himself also called Israel.

The name is explained in Gen. 25 26 a (J) 'the supplanter,'—'after that, his brother came out, and his hand took hold of Esau's heel; so his name was called Jacob,' as if

1. Name. 'one who takes hold by the heel,' from יַעֲקֹב 'a heel.' In Gen. 27 36 (J), however, 'Jacob' receives a fresh explanation—viz., 'deceiver' (one who slinks after another); so too Hos. 12 3 a [4 a], where render 'he deceived his brother' (see Now.). These, however, are only popular etymologies. It is the prevalent critical opinion that Ya'āqob (Jacob) is really a shortened form of Ya'āqob-el (Jacob-el), a name analogous to Israel, Ishmael, Jerahmeel, and admitting several explanations, such as 'God follows' or 'God rewards' (both from the Arabic; cp Lag. Übers. 127). This is thought to be confirmed by the place-name Y.-k.-b.-'a-rā, found in the Palestinian name-list of Thomes III, which probably corresponds to a Palestinian Ya'āqob-el; see JOSEPH i. and ii., and cp Gray, HPN 214 f. Pinches, too, has found on contract-tablets of the age of Hammurabi (circa 2285 B.C.; see BABYLONIA, § 54) the personal name Ya'kub-ilu, and Hommel (AHT, 61, 96, 112) says that Yakubu (cp Jacob) occurs also. This, if the tablets are genuine, appears to prove the antiquity of the name. It must not, however, prevent us from seeking an underlying earlier form.

Ya'āqob is the name, not of an individual, but of the imaginary ancestor of a tribe; neither 'God follows' nor 'God rewards' is the sort of name that we expect as the condensed expression of the religious faith of the tribe. In the mouth of the people the original name would very likely soon be contracted or distorted. We may plausibly conjecture that Ya'āqob is at once a contraction and a distortion of Abi-cabod (i.e., 'the [divine] father is glory'), the name which was also distorted into ICHABOD and JOCEBED. If the god of the tribes of Israel was Yahwe, whose 'glory' (originally in the storm) so greatly impressed his worshippers, and who is called in an archaic psalm 'the God of glory' (Ps. 29.3), we can well understand that the reputed ancestor of the tribes might have as his second name (but cp § 6) Abicabod. It is quite true that Ya'āqob looks very much like a shortened theophorous name. We are naturally inclined to regard it as analogous to Yiphtah (Jephthah) for Yiphtah-el (Jiphthah-el); but popular imagination was quite capable of reconstructing names on a new model, and we have perhaps other instances of this close at hand in ISAAC and JĒKABZEEL, both of which, as they stand, are formed analogously to Ishmael, but are more probably popular corruptions.

² [Aq. has σειρήνας, Symm., Theod. ἀνεπίβαρα in Mal.]

It may be added that the occurrence of the names referred to above does not prove the disappearance of the form Abi-cabod. This name (a name which may have had different independent personal and local references, and have been by no means confined to the reputed ancestor of the Israelites) may have been in use among the Israelites subsequently to the times of Hammurabi and Thotmes III., as indeed the occurrence of Ichabod in the story of Eli proves that it was.

The story of Jacob is intertwined at the beginning with that of Isaac and of Esau, and at the close with that of Joseph. To the special articles

2. Underlying traditions (a).

ISAAC, ESAU, and JOSEPH we must, therefore, refer the reader to avoid repetition. The interesting reference of Hosea (if it be Hosea who writes) to the story of the infant Jacob's strife with his infant brother in the womb, which receives from him an unfavourable interpretation (Hos. 12.3 [4]), is referred to under JACOB, § 1. It is to this story and to the narrative of Jacob's deceit towards his father and his brother that the Second Isaiah is supposed to refer in Is. 43.27. The difficulties of the passage, however, are not slight, and no stress can safely be laid upon it.¹ The traditions are given with great vividness in Gen. 25.29-34 (J) and 27 (JE), and deserve an attentive study. Here, however, we need only consider the composite narrative in 27.42-28.9, which forms the introduction to the story of Jacob's journey in search of a wife. In 27.42-45 Rebekah is represented as urging Jacob to flee from his incensed brother for a few days to her brother Laban in Haran. This is, undoubtedly, the work of JE. In 27.46 28.1 f., however, the visit to Laban is put forward as a command of Isaac, who, stirred up by his wife, desired to prevent Jacob from following the example of Esau in marrying a Canaanitish—or, more strictly, a Hittite—maiden. There can be no doubt that P (who is the writer of 27.46-28.9) gave quite a different representation of the early life of Jacob from that given by JE, and though it is usual to disparage P, yet here, as in other cases, he preserves valuable material. The danger of a 'Hittite' wife at Beersheba was, it is true, small enough; but it has been maintained elsewhere that the names of the non-Israelitish tribes inhabiting Canaan have suffered much from the errors inseparable from transcription of texts, and that 'Hittite' (חתי) in this and other passages is an error for רחבתי 'Rehobothite.' It has been argued that 'Rehoboth' attached its name to a larger district than the Wādy Ruhāibeh, so that when Isaac, according to popular tradition, left Rehoboth for Beersheba, he may perhaps still have been in Rehobothite territory. It is more probable, however, that Beersheba was introduced out of regard for the increased veneration of Israelites for the sanctuary of Beersheba, and that the original tradition (preserved by P) represented Isaac as passing the close of his life either at Rehoboth or at any rate at a spot almost certainly within Rehobothite limits—viz. Khalāṣah (better known to us as ZIKLAG). This view is confirmed by the consideration that in 35.27-29 Jacob is said to have 'come to his father to Mamre, to Kirjath-arba, that is, Hebron,' where his father Isaac died, and where Esau and Jacob buried him. It seems plausible to

¹ 'Thy first father' is usually explained of Jacob, but was not so understood by Ⓞ, and is very peculiar. The parallel phrase 'their interpreters,' if correct, does not favour this view. Probably, however, we should read,

אֲבוֹתָי רִנְּוּ לַחַטָּא 'Thy magnates were inclined to sin,

וּבְשָׁלֵיָהּ פָּשְׁעוּ בִי 'And thy rulers rebelled against me.'

The next line (see SBOT ad loc.) probably contains a reference to 'thy princes' (סָרְדִי) hold that 'Hebron here is miswritten for REHOBOTH (q.v.).

The view, which was most probably that of P (or at any rate of P's authority), that Isaac lived at or near Rehoboth, and that Jacob started on his quest of a wife from the district of Rehoboth, is not less probably the ancient one. We have now to see where Jacob went. J and E say that it was to Haran; P that it was to Paddan-aram (Gen. 28.25). So at least the present text represents; but there is strong reason to distrust its readings, and to change 'Haran' into 'Haurān,' and 'Paddan-aram' into 'the uplands of Haurān' (שְׂפֵרָה הַחֵרֶן; cp Hos. 12.12 [13], below). In Gen. 29.1, however, we learn from E that on leaving Bethel Jacob 'went to the land of the Bnē Kēdem.' Probably E really wrote this, and interpreted Bnē Kēdem to mean 'easterns'; the phrase 'the land of the easterns' might no doubt be applied to the Haurān, where, according to the earlier tradition, Laban dwelt. It is not very probable, however, that 'sons of the east' (=easterns) was really an ethnographical term; where the phrase appears to be so used, it would seem that Kēdem (east) has arisen by an easy corruption out of Rekem, which in turn may be a very old popular corruption of Jerahmeel (see REKEM, 4). The most natural inference is that E (or rather perhaps E's authority) has preserved a phrase from a very early tradition, according to which Jacob (or Abi-cabod?), on leaving his temporary resting-place, directed his steps to the 'land of the Bnē Jerahmeel.' If so, it is probable that his destination was not the Haurān but Hebron.

Both Haran and Hebron are mentioned in 1 Ch. (2.42 46) as descendants of 'Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel.' Hebron is probably the name of which we are in search; among the descendants of Hebron appear three names which may be different corruptions of the name Jerahmeel (see JERAHMEEL, § 4).

At Hebron (the well-known Hebron) Jacob was, according to the tradition, in the land of 'the Bnē Jerahmeel.' The name 'Jerahmeel' has, it is true, a fluctuating reference. All that concerns us here is the fact that Hebron could be regarded by the early narrator (whom we have no occasion to place before the time of David) as Jerahmeelite. On his way thither the traveller would naturally halt at the site now called ed-Dāhariyeh, but in ancient times probably known as KIRJATH-SEPHER [q.v.]. This may very possibly have been mentioned as Jacob's resting-place in the earlier form of the story. A glance at the map will show that from Rehoboth to Hebron the journey is as straight as possible, and that Khalāṣa, Bīr-es-Seba' (Beersheba), and ed-Dāhariyeh are convenient resting-places on the road. The early narrative must have further stated that while at Hebron Jacob married wives called respectively Leah and Rachel. Rachel (not less than Mahalath,¹ Gen. 28.9) we must take to be a popular corruption of JERAHMEEL (q.v., § 4). Leah (as We. and Stade have seen) is the name whose ethnic is 'Levi'; the manifold connections of the Levites with the far S. have been shown elsewhere (see LEVI). The meaning of this early story is that the tribe called Abi-cabod effected a union with the Jerahmeelite tribe of Levi. Probably Winckler is right in thinking that the priestly character of the tribe of Levi is earlier than its entrance into Canaan, and it is not out of place to remark anew (cp ESAU) that in Gen. 27.15 Jacob seems to be represented as in priestly attire.

As the text stands, however, it is to Haran, or rather to Haurān, that Jacob's steps are bent, and on the way he naturally halts at the famous sanctuary of Bethel. The narrator indeed represents him as having consecrated the well-known maššēbah which stood there; but if Winckler's explanation of LUZ [q.v.] be correct ('sanctuary'), the narrator unintentionally refutes his own statement. The rocky boulders on the site of Bethel must indeed inevitably have suggested the erection of a sacred pillar (see BETHEL, § 2), or indeed of stone circles, in primeval times. Both J and E express their own genuine piety in the description of Jacob's sacred experiences. Whether we should have been equally pleased with the original story may be doubted; the description of 28 11 suggests the idea that the stone which Jacob took for his 'pillow' was a sacred stone, so that נֶפֶס (as perhaps in Gen. 22 3) will have the sense of 'sanctuary.' If this view is correct, it is E who gives a harmless turn to the old story by converting the primeval sacred stone into a maššēbah (cp IDOLATRY, § 4).

In Gen. 29 2-30 J and E describe Jacob's arrival at Haran (or rather Haurān), his meeting with Rachel and then with Laban, and his service of fourteen years for his two wives. Whether there was any Laban in the earlier form of the story we cannot tell. The Laban to whom we are introduced by J and E is certainly a worthy kinsman of Jacob. The narrators' object, however, is not to show that trickiness was a family characteristic, but to throw into relief the divine protection which Jacob constantly enjoyed, so that the only result of Laban's craft was Jacob's ever-increasing prosperity; indeed, as Jacob states, the advantages granted by Yahwē to Jacob were shared by Laban, so that Laban had absolutely no excuse for his attempts to overreach his nephew. This is described in Gen. 30 25-43, 31 7-12. It will be observed that the account in ch. 31, which is E's, differs from the former, which is almost entirely that of J. See LABAN.

We have an external but not independent reference to the same tradition in Hos. 12 12 [13], where a later writer (see Nowack, Wellhausen) mentions a detail in the completed story of Jacob to show the trials which the ancestor of Israel had undergone of old, and the faithful guardianship of his God.

And Jacob fled to the uplands of Aram (אֲרָם שְׂרָרָה; see § 3 on 'Paddan-Aram'), and Israel served for a woman, and kept sheep. (MT gives 'and for a woman he kept,' which is unintelligible, and in conjunction with v. 13 [14] has suggested to Wellhausen the strange idea of a conflict between a good principle represented by a prophet and an evil principle represented by a woman. Read perhaps שְׂרָרָה אֲרָם [or אֲרָם שְׂרָרָה]; cp Gen. 30 32 ff.)

This is a specimen of the way in which Jewish piety nourished itself on the legends of the past. It has an interest as such; but it supplies no confirmation of the supposed facts of the story. It is with pure legend that we have to deal, and it is pure legend which asserts that Jacob had eleven sons (besides daughters) born to him in Haran (Haurān), who became the ancestors of as many Israelitish tribes. All this part of the legend is late; it can have arisen only when the union of the tribes had, under David, become an accomplished fact, and when Aramæan influence upon Israel was so strong that the Israelites themselves were ambitious of being thought to be related to the Aramæan race (cp Dt. 26 5, 'a lost Aramæan was my father'). One of the most interesting points in the narrative is that four of the sons—Dan and Naphtali, Gad and Asher—are said to have been the children of handmaids, the two former of Rachel's handmaid Bilhah, the two latter of Leah's handmaid Zilpah. The origin of the latter name at any rate is transparent; Zilpah = ZELOPHEHAD = Ṣalḥad. When the Israelites conquered Ṣalḥad, they must have become fused with the Aramæan population.

There are, indeed, several clear indications that even such early writers as J and E were not unconscious of Jacob's representative character. The clearest are in 31 22-54 (note especially 'brethren' = fellow-clansmen, 31 23 54). It is not unworthy of notice, however, that in E's account of Jacob's second name (32 28 [29]) it is said, 'for thou hast contended with a god and with men, and hast prevailed,' where it is impossible to put the struggle of wits in which Laban and Jacob were engaged on a par with the physical struggle related in 32 23 [24] ff. No complete justification of the phrase can be given but on the hypothesis that tradition knew of a struggle between the Laban-clan and the Jacob-clan in which the latter represented itself as having been successful.

Here we see the influence of later historical circumstances, and still more in the remarkable narrative, 31 18 [19]-32 2 [3] (JE, but chiefly E), to understand which aright keen textual criticism has to be resorted to. The results are given under GILEAD, nor have we space to repeat them here, except so far as to remind the reader that it is there maintained that a later editor, through unfamiliarity with the early importance of Ṣalḥad, has converted it into Sahadutha, Galeed, and Gilead, and has also seriously interfered with the geography of the next section (32 3-31 [4-32]). On the peculiar type of marriage (the so-called 'beena') represented in this part of the legend, we must also refer elsewhere (KINSHIP, § 8); on the wrestling with Elohim see JABBOK.

Another clan—that of ESAU [q.v.]—now becomes dangerous to the Jacobbeans. 'Behold, Esau came

5. Danger from Esau. men' (Gen. 33 1; cp 32 6 [7]; 'I fear him, lest he come and smite me, the mother with the children' (32 11 [12]). It is at present superior in strength to the Jacob-clan,—'thus shall ye speak to my lord Esau' (32 3 [4]). Whether this narrative fits in perfectly with the preceding one may be doubted, even if we assume that J made Jacob cross not the Jabbok but the Jordan (see GILEAD). If, however, we may assume that according to the earlier tradition Jacob's sojourn was not in Haurān but at Hebron, we can understand the danger to which he was exposed from the Edomites.¹ It may be added that 'Succoth' is elsewhere (see SALECAH, SUCCOTH, PENUEL) identified with Ṣalḥad. Evidently there is some great confusion in this part of the record of tradition, and if the same confusion begins to be visible even earlier, we need not feel any surprise.

Here is another proof of the tribal reference of the name Jacob. Were he an individual, he would naturally return at once to his father, at Beersheba or Rehoboth (contrast 28 21). Instead

6. Shechem and Bethel. of this he goes to Shechem and purchases a piece of land from the clan called bnē Ḥamōr (33 18 [19], E; on 48 22 see SHECHEM). It is worth noticing that the words 'Shechem's father, for a hundred ḥēšītahs' are corrupt (see KESITH). Still more clearly marked is the tribal character of Jacob in the strange narrative of Shechem's endeavour to obtain Dinah (Jacob's daughter) as his wife,² of the amalgamation of the Shechemite and the Jacobean communities proposed by Ḥamor, and of the vengeance taken by Simeon and Levi on the whole city for an act of shameless impropriety (נָבֵלָה; see FOOL.) committed by Shechem. Why does Jacob acquire rights of property in Shechem? and why are the bnē Yaākōb so strict in their requirement of purity of blood in the civic community? Because Shechem became the centre of the confederation of the northern Israelitish tribes.

It is remarkable, however, that the clan does not yet receive the name bnē Israel. According to E (see Dillmann) Jacob's name was changed to Israel³ when he crossed the Jabbok (32 27 [28] f.). It is probable that J, as well as P, represented the change as taking place at Bethel, whither Jacob repaired after leaving

² It is strange that Dinah should be of marriageable age; but, of course, the story once circulated as an independent tradition.

³ The assignment to E is not undisputed.

Shechem, because from this point in his narrative he, like R, uses the name Israel instead of Jacob (see 35 21 f, 37 13 43 6 11, etc.). How J explained the name 'Israel' we are not told. There is nothing to prevent us from supposing that he adopted some different explanation which did not please the redactor as well as E's. It is possible that, like the marriage of Abraham and SARAH [g.v.], the supposed change of Jacob's name really symbolises a fusion of two tribes, the tribes in this case being an Israel tribe from the N. and a Jacob (Abicabod) tribe from the S.

The origin of the ethnic name 'Israel' has been much discussed. ישראל occurs several times on the Moabite Stone, and the ethnic str-la-ai on the monolith of Shalmaneser II. (KB 1172). Sayce (PSBA 21 23 [1900]) cites the name Isarlim (= Israel) as king of Khana (E. frontier of Babylonia) in the time of Hammurabi. At least as old as Jerome is the interpretation rectus domini (as if from ישר, cp JASHER, § 4; JESHURUN); Jerome also gives vir videns deum (as if from ישר ראה איש; cp Gen. 33 10). More attractive philologically, and yet not plausible on other grounds, is a connection with Ass. asru, 'place', as if = 'place of El.' The favourite modern explanation is 'El rules' (from ישר; cp JASHER, § 4); but to convey this idea we should rather have expected 'Malchiel'; nor is the root ישר as well established as one could wish. Gen. 32 28 (cp Hos. 12 5 [4]) suggests 'El strives', or, as Driver (in Hastings' DB 2 530a), on grounds of Arabic usage, prefers 'El persists or perseveres (in contending)'. This view must be admitted to be ancient; but the sense is hardly satisfactory. Let us make a fresh start. It is perhaps unsafe to start from the traditional form ישראל, there being no early personal or local names in the genealogies or elsewhere which confirm it, with the single exception of ישר, which has presumably the same origin (cp SARAH), and must therefore be provisionally set on one side. There are, however, names somewhat resembling 'Isra'el', which may help us, viz. (1) יזרעאל, Jizre'el (JEZREEL), which is both a personal and a local name, and is found both in the centre and in the S. of Palestine; (2) אשראֵל, ASAR'EL, the name of a son of Jehalleel probably = Jerahmeel; (3) זרח, ZERAH, which is given as a Judahite, a Simeonite, and an Edomite name. Of these names (3) is the most helpful. Jizrah-el ('God shines forth') is a highly probable clan-name, and might at an early date be corrupted popularly both into יזרעאל, Jizre'el, and into ישראל, Isra'el. Turning now to the story of the change of Jacob's name to Israel (which has probably been altered), we notice the statement (Gen. 32 32 [31]), which in such a context cannot be merely picturesque, that 'as he (Jacob) passed by Peniel, the sun shone forth upon him' (וַיִּרְאֵה לֹא הַשֶּׁשֶׁק). A reference to our explanation of the story of the covenant between Jacob and Laban (GALEED, 1) will show that the place from which Jacob came was called, not Galeed (Gilead), but Salhad or SALECAH (g.v.). The prominence of this strong fortress in Israelitish legend and history has been too long overlooked. To the other illustrations of this fact we may now add that Salhad (Salhar) not improbably derived its name from the clan, or confederation of clans, which, after leaving the Hauran, found its way to the 'land of the bnē Jerahme'el' (Gen. 29 1, a case of the confusion of legends, see above, § 3) in the far S. of Palestine. If the transformations of names that have elsewhere been assumed be held to be probable it will not be thought improbable that צלהד (Salhad) or סלכב (Salcab) has arisen, partly by transposition, and partly by corruption of letters, from יזרחאל, Jizrah-el. Cp the parallel corruption ישראל for יזרעאל, 2 S. 17 25 (see ITHRA). It need hardly be said that there were in early times both northern (north-eastern) and southern Israelites. The southern Israelites appear to have joined the Jerahmeelites at Hebron (or rather Rehoboth). The above view is no more than a hypothesis; but it seems to be more in accordance with analogies than the rival theories, and what appears to be an obvious explanation of a primitive tribal name noun is very likely to be wrong.

Several details in chap. 35 deserve attention. Thus in vv. 2-4 Jacob's household give up all their heathenish objects (cp 31 18 [19] 52 [53] Jobb. 24 2 14). In v. 8 Rachel's nurse Deborah receives the highest funeral honours; in reality, however, it is 'Dinah, Jacob's eldest daughter,' who dies; the text needs criticism (see above, col. 1102, n. 1). This means perhaps that the Dinah-tribe had perished; hence the mourning of the parent-tem. In vv. 16-19 Rachel dies on the way to Ephrath (but see below). Her child has two names—BENONI and BENJAMIN.

The extracts from J and E give us no very clear idea where Jacob or Israel settled after the death of Rachel; J tells us indeed (35 21) that Jacob encamped beyond Migdal Eder: but where was Migdal Eder? Probably it was not far from Beeroth, which name should probably be substituted for Ephrath in vv. 16 19 and for 'Hebron' in 37 14 (see EPHRATH). P, however, states (v. 27) that Jacob came to his father Isaac at Kirjath-arba (see REHOBOTH, SODOM).

The remainder of Jacob's life is inseparable from the story of Joseph; its events need not be recapitulated here. (See JOSEPH; ABEL-MIZRAIM; 7. Close of life, etc. MACHPELAH.) It is natural for modern readers, approaching the narrative from the point of view of psychological development, to find traces of a mellowing in Jacob's character. If there be anything in this supposition it must be due to the fact that the narrators have put more of themselves into the latter part of Jacob's life, where its threads intertwined with those of Joseph's, than they could venture to do in the former. It is, however, to the popular traditions that we must turn for the truest symbols of Israelitish character as it was in the days of the two great narrators J and E. The elaborate Blessing ascribed to Jacob cannot be treated as a part of the biography; it is, apart from later elements, a splendid monument of early Hebrew literature (see POETICAL LITERATURE), and historically too is of the utmost importance. Even though the text has suffered much corruption, in the special articles on the tribes frequent occasion has been found to utilize its details. See also ISRAEL.

Winckler's mythological explanation of Jacob as (originally) the moon in its relation to the year, corresponding to Abraham the moon in its

8. Mythology. relation to the month, is ingeniously and plausibly worked out (Gesch. 2 57 ff.). That there are somewhat pale mythological elements in some of the biblical narratives may be admitted; but to many minds Winckler's proof of his hypothesis will seem almost too laboured to be convincing. Cp also Winckler, ib. 82; and cp Stucken, Astralmýthen ('Jakob'), whose treatment of parallel mythic details is extraordinarily clever.

JAEL (יָעֵל), § 68; 'mountain-goat'; יאֲהֵל [BAL]; Jos. יאֲהֵל; JAHEL). A Bedouin woman, of whom Sisera, when flying defeated from the field of battle, asked water, and by whom, as he stood drinking the refreshing soured milk (Ar. leban), he was beaten lifeless to the ground. Upon this deed a high encomium is pronounced by a contemporary Israelitish poet, Judg. 5 24-27 (יָעֵל [A]). And rightly, from his point of view, if Jael was a Kenite (see below), for by this bold deed she recognised the sacred bond of friendship between the Israelites and the Kenites (cp Judg. 1:16-4:11). Sisera was out of the pale of charity for an Israelite; therefore also for a Kenite. 'The act by which Jael gained such renown was not the murder of a sleeping man, but the use of a daring stratagem which gave her a momentary chance to deliver a courageous blow' (WRS *OT/C*² 132). A later writer, however, whose version of the story of Sisera appears on the whole to be independent of that in Deborah's Song, employed all the arts of a graceful style to represent Jael as having killed Sisera in his sleep (Judg. 4:18-21). Jael invites the tired fugitive into her tent, covers him up with the tent-rug, and then, when he is sleeping soundly, takes one of the tent-pegs, and strikes it with a hammer into his forehead. She thus violates the double sanctity attaching to Sisera as a guest and (see DAVID, § 1, col. 1023, n. 1) as a sleeper, and seems deserving of a curse (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, 156) rather than a blessing. The narrator, it is true, does not in express terms commend her; but a hardly repressed enthusiasm is visible in his description (ov. 21 f.).

Which tradition has the better claim to be regarded as historical? Obviously not the second. The refined treachery which this account assumes is inconceivable in a Bedawi, and the absurdity of transfixing a man's skull with a tent-peg is so great that one is compelled to conjecture that the passage of the song relative to Jael's deed (Judg. 5:26) lay before the narrator in a corrupt form. Moore and Budde have set forth the present position of textual criticism, and it is one of baffled perplexity. Yet the remedy is perhaps near at hand (see Crit. Bib.). The true text should most probably run thus:—

Her hand to the coffer she reaches,
Her right hand to a flint of the rock;
With the flint she strikes his head,
She smashes—she cleaves his temple.

The bowl in which Jael presented the soured milk was not 'a bowl of the mighty' (מִכְּפֵל אֲרִירִים) but 'a bowl of bronze,' Ass. urudû; cp COPPER, § 2. The 'nail,' or rather 'tent-peg' (קֶרֶן), should be the 'coffer' which, as Doughty says, every Bedawi housewife has, and which contained among other things flints for striking fire (קִינָה or קִינָה). The 'workmen's hammer' (הַלְּמֹת עֲמָלִים)—an impossible rendering—should be a 'flint of the rock' (קֶרֶן מִיִּשְׁפֵּל). It only remains to remark, after Moore, that the words 'in the days of Jael' (Judg. 5:6), and 'the wife of Heber the Kenite' (5:24) are glosses which overload the stichi in which they occur. See DEBORAH, 1; HEBER, 1; JUDGES, § 7; SISERA. T. K. C.

JAGUR (יגור; אָסֹר [B], יִגְרֹר [AL]), a Judahite city on the border of Edom (Josh. 15:21†). Cp KABZEEL.

JAHATH (יחא), cp MAHATH, NAHATH, TAHATH, יֵאֶת [BA], יֵאֶת [L], a well-known Levitical name which has associations with Judah (see 1, below) and Edom; see GENEALOGIES, § 7 [v.].

1. b. Reiaiah b. Shobal, a Judahite, 1 Ch. 4:2 (om. A*, iaeth [L]). A comparison with 1 Ch. 2:52 suggests a possible connection with Manahath (MT מנחא). In view of the vicissitudes of this name (see below) it is to be observed that Shobal is probably the parent of the forms Shebuel and SHUBAEL [q.v.], and that a variant may plausibly be found (see Jastrow, JBL 19:102 [1900]) in the familiar Shēmū'el (Samuel).

2. A Levitical name, 1 Ch. 6:20 [5] (ieeth [B]), 43 [28] (ηχα [B], ieeth [A]), 23:10 (ieeth [L]), 24:22 (iaeth [BA]), 2 Ch. 34:12 (ie [B], ieeth [L]).† In tracing back the Levite Samuel to Korah (the Kehathite), the Chronicler introduces the analogous names Mahath, Nahath, and Tahath (1 Ch. 6:23-26 [cp v. 34], 35:37); cp with these, the Kehathite Jahath (b. Shelomoth b. דודי) in 1 Ch. 24:22. But Shelomoth (b. Shimei) is Gershonite in 23:9 (as also is Shebuel [cp 1, above], ib. v. 16), and in agreement with this we find an important Gershonite division, Jahath b. Shimei, 2 in v. 10. Further, Jahath the father of Shimei, and Jahath b. Libni reappear in the genealogies of the Gershonites Ethan, Ethni, and Asaph (1 Ch. 6:43 [28]), and Jeatherai (=Ethni? ib. v. 20 [5]) respectively. Finally, not only Jahath (2 Ch. 34:12), but also Libni and Shimei (1 Ch. 6:20), are used as Merarite names, to which division even Ethan (see ETHAN, 2, 3) himself is finally ascribed. S. A. C.

1 We may perhaps associate יגור with the name זורח (Zorah) which is brought into connection with Jahath, 1, in 1 Ch. 2:52 f. 42 (for another view see GENEALOGIES, § 7 [v.], col. 1666).

2 Considering the way in which genealogical lists are built up, it is possible that יחא is the same as עמש ב' כחח (1 Ch. 6:35 [20] 2 Ch. 29:12).

JAHAZ, JAHAZAH, JAHZAH (יחז', Is. 15:4 Jer. 48:34 [Mesha's inscr. ll. 19 f.; יחז' or יחז', Nu. 21:23 Dt. 2:32 Josh. 13:18 21:36 Judg. 11:20 Jer. 48:21 1 Ch. 6:63 [78]).

♁ has ιασα [BN*AFQL], but εσσα in Nu. [B*], βασαν in Josh. 13 [B], αζαη [?] in Josh. 21:36 [BAL]; cp v. 39], ιασα [B], ηλ [A] in Judg. 11:20, ιασα [Qmg.] in Is. 15:4, ρεβας [BA], ραφαθ [N*], ρασας [Nc.a] in Jer. 48:21; for v. 34 see Swete).

Jahaz was the scene of the decisive battle between the Israelites and Sihon, king of the Amorites (Nu. 21:23 Dt. 2:32 Judg. 11:20). It was assigned to Reuben (Josh. 13:18 P) and to the Levites (Josh. 21:36 P). Mesha, king of Moab, refers to it as taken by himself from the Israelites.

The site is uncertain. It was near Kedemoth (Josh. 13:18 21:36) and 'the wilderness of Kedemoth' (Dt. 2:26, cp Nu. 21:23), and it was N. of the Arnon. This points to the extreme SE. of Sihon's territory; Oliphant's suggested identification with Yājūz is therefore out of the question. Eusebius (OS 264:94) informs us that Jahaz (εσσα) still existed in his time, and that it was situated between Medeba and Dibon (δηβους). There seems to be some mistake here; the position thus assigned to Jahaz appears too central. Possibly Μηδαβα is corrupt. At any rate we may plausibly hold that the important ruins of Umm er-Resās (cp Enc. Jer. 48:21) are on the site either of Jahaz or of Kedemoth. This spot is two hours and a half NE. of Dibon, towards the desert (see KEDEMOTH). T. K. C.

JAHAZIAH, RV JAHZELIAH (יחזיאה) § 32; 'Yahwē sees', b. Tikvah, one of Ezra's opponents (Kosters, Herstel. 119 f.) in dealing with the mixed marriages, Ezra 10:15 (ΛΑΖΕΙΑ [BN*], -c [N*], יאזי. [A] ΔΖ. [L]) = 1 Esd. 9:14, EZECHIAS (RV Ezekias, εζειακ [B], εζεκι. [A], יאזיאκ [L]). See AHASAI.

JAHAZIEL (יחזיאל) § 32; 'God sees,' cp יחזיאל and יחזיאל, יעזיהל [AL]; Pesh. nearly always יחזיאל.¹

1. One of David's warriors (1 Ch. 12:4, αζαη [BN]).
2. A priest, temp. David (1 Ch. 16:6, om. N*, αζε[ε]ηηλ [Bnc.a mg. A]).

3. b. Hebron, a Kehathite Levite, 1 Ch. 23:19 (αζηηλ [B], αζηηλ [AL]), 24:23 (ασηη [B], αζηηλ [AL]) for whose name we should possibly read UZZIEL (q.v. 1).

4. An Asaphite Levite, b. Zechariah, introduced in the story of the Ammonite invasion; son of Zechariah, who rose up temp. Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 20:14 αζεηηηλ [BA]). Cp HAZIEL, a Gershonite name, and on the relation of Asaph to Gershon see GENEALOGIES 1, § 7 (ib.).

5. The father of Shechaniah of the b'ne ZATTU (q.v.) (Ezra 8:5, om. B, αζηηλ [AL]), so also Pesh. and 1 Esd. 8:32 (JZELUS; ασηηηλ [B], αζηηηλ [A], αζηηηλ [L]), in place of MT's 'of the sons of Shechaniah, the son of Jahaziel'

JAHDAI (יחדי) [Ba.] or יחדי [Gi.] from *√*יהרה 'to lead,' cp Sab. [יחדי?] יחדי [B], יחדי [A], -עי [L]), the head of a family of six abruptly introduced into the genealogy of Caleb (1 Ch. 2:47). The context suggests that a 'concubine' of Caleb is intended. Perhaps we should read יהדיה, 'Jehudijah' (cp 1 Ch. 4:18), the six 'sons' mentioned would then be half-Judahite. T. K. C.

JAHDIEL (יחדיאל), 'El is glad' or 'gladdens,' § 35, cp JEHDIAH; יֵאֶלֶיח [B; λ and Δ confused], יֵאֶלֶי. [AL.], one of the chiefs of Manasseh-beyond-Jordan (1 Ch. 5:24†).

JAHDO (יחדו); cp JAHDIEL; יֹאֲדוּ [B], יֵאֶלְדוּ [A], יֵאֶלְדוּ [L], a Gadite (1 Ch. 5:14†).

JAHLEEL (יחליל), probably corrupt, a son, that is, family or clan, of Zebulun; Gen. 46:14, P (ΔΛΟΗΛ [A], ΕΗΛ [D], ΔΙΗΛ [L]); Nu. 26:26, P (ΔΛΛΗΛ [BAL]; ethnic Jahleelites, יחלילי, ΔΛΛΗΛ[Ε] [BAFvid.L.]). Perhaps, like JAHZEEL, a corruption of יחזיאל, 'God delivers.' T. K. C.

1 In Syr. y is the preformative of the impf. Another similar formation is seen in יחליל for יחליל, 'Jephthah.'

JAHMAI

JAHMAI (יִמְאִי); ΕΙΘΚΑΝ [B], ΙΕΜΟΥ [A], ΙΑΜΙΝ [L], JEMAI,¹ an Issacharite clan-name (1 Ch. 7.2).

Analogy suggests that יִמְאִי is an abbreviated theophorous name (cp WRS in COT 2301), perhaps for יְהוֹמָי, cp Sab. יְהוֹמָי (יָם and יְהוֹמָי),² i.e., 'God protects,' or (since the √מקח does not appear to be used in Heb.) for יְהוֹמָי, which has actually been found upon a Heb. seal. S. A. C.

JAHZAH (יְהִזָּח), Jer. 48.21 RV. See JAHAZ.

JAHZEEL (יְהִזְעֵל), 'God halves' ? § 38; ΔC[Ε]ΙΗΛ [ADFL], a son of Naphtali; Gen. 46.24 (ιασβηλ [L]); Nu. 26.48 (σαηλ [B*], ασηλ [B.a.b]). 1 Ch. 7.13 has Jahziel [EV] or rather JAHAZIEL (יְהִזְעֵל); יεσιηλ [B], ιεσιηλ [A], ιασσιηλ [L]. Nu. 26.48 has the patronymic Jahzeelites (יְהִזְעֵלִים; σαηελ [B*], ασηελ [B.a.b], ασιηελ [AFL]). Rather a corruption of יְהִזְעֵל; cp JAHLEEL. T. K. C.

JAHZIAH (יְהִזְיָה), Ezra 10.15 RV, AV JAHAZIAH.

JAHZERAH (יְהִזְרָה), 1 Ch. 9.12†. See AHASAI.

JAIR (יָאִיר), 'He [God] enlightens,' § 53; ΙΑΕΙΡ [BAFL]. 1. After the main body of the Israelites had settled down W. of Jordan various Manassite clans migrated to the E., and, having dispossessed the Amorites, founded settlements in Bashan and N. Gilead. Among them was (the clan of) Jair: Nu. 32.41 (ιαηρ [A]), Dt. 3.14 1 K. 4.13 [om. BL] ιαρερ [A]. In the above-mentioned passages Jair is called the son of Manasseh; but in 1 Ch. 2.21-23 (v. 22, αειρ [A]; v. 23, σαειρ [B*]; σ a dittograph), ιαρερ [A] he is made to be of mixed descent, namely from Hezron, a Judahite, on his father's side, and from Machir on his mother's side.³ In Judg. 10.3-5, mention is made of Jair, a Gileadite (αειρ [A in v. 5]), and it is very probable that Jair may have been placed by one tradition in the age of Moses and by another in the age of the Judges. He is said to have had thirty sons, who rode on thirty asses and had thirty cities called HAVVOTH-JAIR (q.v.). The notice of the thirty colts may be a gloss based on 12.14 and facilitated by the similarity of the words for cities and colts (the paronomasia in עָרִים [cities] and עֲרֵצֵי [colts] is retained also in Ε πόλεις and πώλους). The expression in Judg. 10.5 'and Jair died, and was buried in CAMON' (q.v.) leads one to suppose that the seat of the clan was at that place. See JEPHTHAH, § 2 f.

2. The father of Mordecai, Esth. 2.5 (ὁ πατὴρ ιαείρου [BNL]... ιάτρον [A]). In the Apocrypha (Esth. 11.2) his name appears as JAIRUS.

JAIR (יָאִיר), 'He (God) awakens,' so Kr. and Pesh.; Kt., however, יָאִיר, Jer. 'filius saltus,—i.e., יָאִיר, with 'defect.'). the clan-name or the name of an ancestor of ELHANAN (q.v.), 1 Ch. 20.5 (ΙΑΕΙΡ [BL], ΔΔΕΙΡ [A]). In the parallel passage (2 S. 21.19) we find the form JAARE-(OREGIM). See ELHANAN, § 2.

JAIRITE (יָאִירִי), 2 S. 20.26. See IRA, 3.

JAIRUS (ΙΑΕΙΡΟΣ [Ti. WH]; probably not=the Jair of OT), a ruler of the synagogue, whose daughter Jesus restored to life just after her death (Mk. 5.22 ff. Lk. 8.41 ff.). The narrative is specially important, because the restoration to life to which it refers is the best attested of the three marvels of this class related in the Gospels, being given in Mt. (9.18 ff.), Mk., and Lk., not, however, without differences.

Of these differences, which are outweighed by the points of agreement, one is the non-mention of the name of the 'ruler' (not 'ruler of the synagogue') in Mt.'s account. Indeed, the Codex Bezae (D) is without the name in Mk., and (originally) in Lk. also.

³ This post-exilic representation probably means that there was a clan made up partly of the tribe of Judah and partly of that of Manasseh, which occupied the region where the 'Havvoth-jair' were situated (cp Be. Chron., ad loc.).

JAIRUS

That the narrative in some form belongs to the earliest stratum of the Gospel tradition is further supported (1) by the profound saying 'The damsel is not dead, but sleepeth,' which occupies a central position and is quite in the manner of Jesus, and (2) by the interweaving of another narrative which expresses one of the popular superstitions so forcibly that it must be as old as any in the Gospels.

The earliest form of the story of the ruler is that given in Mt. 9.18 f. 23-26. As Weiss has pointed out, the earliest traditional narratives were not much concerned about details, but aimed at connecting the remembered sayings of Jesus with the facts which formed (or, it was thought, must have formed) their true setting. Whether Weiss is right in ascribing all the picturesque details in Mk. to a Petrine tradition, is at best doubtful; he is at any rate most probably quite wrong in adopting Mk.'s report of the ruler's appeal to Jesus—viz., 'My little daughter is at the point of death' (ἐσχάτως ἔχει). For this evangelist represents the feeling of a later time that it was too much to believe that the ruler could at once have risen to the height of faith implied in Mt. 9.18; he assumes that the ruler must at first have been afraid of such a bold request as that Jesus would raise the dead. Mt.'s account, however, rightly understood, makes this assumption unnecessary. The ruler's faith, though great, is not heroic. He has the superstitious idea that the soul is still hovering about its former receptacle, and craves of Jesus that by a magic touch of his hand the scarcely parted soul and body may be organically reunited. Another point in which Mk.'s account is certainly inferior to Mt.'s is the injunction to secrecy (Mk. 5.43). This is in place in the story of the blind men which follows in Mt. (9.27-32), but not in the story of the ruler, according to which 'much people' had heard the unhappy father's appeal to the Master. Whether even the words ΤΑΛΙΘΑ ΚΟΥΜΙ [q.v.] may be accepted from Mk. is doubtful. Certainly the name Jairus is the spontaneous invention of a pious and poetic imagination. Tradition (except in Mk.) does not record the names of persons in the crowd who were cured by Jesus,¹ and the origin of the name is manifest, viz. not יָאִיר, 'he enlightens,' but (Nestle, Chajes) יָאִיר, 'he will awaken' (from the sleep of death).

Whether the raising of the dead maiden is historical is another question. That Yahwè was regarded even in the older period as the lord of life and death, and therefore as one who might on special occasions raise the dead, is undeniable. But how could any special occasion arise, now that the belief in the resurrection had become so general? For by this belief the conception of death was transformed; men could not 'sorrow as those who had no hope.' Nor did Jesus himself consider it to be within his ordinary province to raise the dead. It has indeed been said (e.g., by Weiss) that Mt. 11.5 (Lk. 7.22) proves that more instances of the raising of the dead occurred than are reported in the Gospels. But this implies a misinterpretation of the message to John the Baptist, which is certainly allegorical; the words, 'the dead are raised up,' are explained by the next clause, 'and the poor have the glad tidings brought to them.'² That Lk. misunderstood the words (Lk. 7.22; cp NAIN) renders it not improbable that Mk. did so too, and that all three evangelists (whose idea of Jesus was marred by recollections of Elijah and Elisha)³ misunderstood that deep saying of Jesus, 'She is not dead, but sleepeth.'

³ Just as the idea of St. Francis soon became blurred in the minds of his biographers.

JAKAN

They have at any rate preserved the saying for us, even if the setting which they have produced is not the right one.

See Keim, Jesu von Nazara, 247-475; Weiss, Das Leben Jesu, 152-505; Réville, Jésus de Nazareth, 208 f.; Plummer, St. Luke (International Comm.), 233 ff. None of these writers gives complete satisfaction; even Dr. Plummer thinks that 'we may be content, with Hase, to admit that certainty is unattainable as to whether the maiden was dead or in a trance.' On the originality of Mt.'s narrative, Badham, St. Mark's Indebtedness to St. Matthew (97), 47-50, is excellent; but it is a mistake to admit that 'the name Jairus looks original.' See, further, GOSPELS. T. K. C.

JAKAN (יַאֲקָן). § 54; RV JAAKAN), a name in the Horite genealogy (1 Ch. 142†).

In the 11 list in Gen. 36 27 it appears as 'and AKAN' (אֶכָּן) for יַאֲקָן, of which B's reading (καὶ ἰωάν) in 1 Ch. is a corruption. B combines the readings (καὶ ἰωάκμ, 1 Ch. καὶ ἰακάν), the latter being perhaps the original form in both cases; see ΒΕΒΕΡΟΤΗ II. B's text is confate (Gen. ἰωάκμ [D has ἰωω-καμ] καὶ ἰωάκμ [AE]; 1 Ch. ἰωάκμ καὶ ἰωάκμ [A]).

JAKEH (יָכֶךְ), some MSS נִיָּךְ, according to Delitzsch 'scrupulously pious'—i.e., εὐλαβής, cp Ar. waḳā, viii.) father of AGUR (q.v.); Prov. 30 1.

The Midrash (ad loc. and elsewhere) does not, as we might have supposed, identify Jakeh with David, but takes ben-Jakeh to be a description of the poet called Agur (i.e., Solomon), as 'one who is free from all sin and iniquity.' T. K. C.

JAKIM (יָכִים). §§ 86, 53; 'he [El] raises'; cp ELIAKIM, ALCIMUS; ΙΑΚΕΙΜ [BAL]).

1. The name of one of the twenty-four post-exilic priestly courses: 1 Ch. 24 12 (εὐακεῖμ [A]).

2. b. Shimei (r. 13, Shema) in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9, ii. β); 1 Ch. 8 19. See JQR II 103, § 1.

3. In AVMS. of Mt. 1 11 Jakim represents the ἰωάκμ interpolated by some late Gk. and Syr. MSS (apparently also by Irenaeus and Epiphanius; see WH) between the names of Josiah and Jechoniah in the genealogy of Jesus. See GENEALOGIES II., § 2 and cp JEHOIACHIN.

JALAM (יָלָם), Gen. 36 5 RV; AV JAALAM.

JALON (יָלֹן), ΔΑΛΩΝ [B], ΙΔΛΩΝ [AL]), b. Ezra (cp EZER II., 1), one of the b'ne HUR; 1 Ch. 4 7. B^{BAL} suggests יָלֹן, AJALON (q.v., 1, and note readings there cited). This, however, seems too far N., and considering the positions of the other places mentioned, we should possibly read יָלֹן, Gilon=Giloh (on the form cp Driver, TBS 241).

JAMBRES (ΙΑΜΒΡΗΣ [Ti. WH]), 2 Tim. 3 8. See JANNES.

JAMBRI (rather JAMRI), THE CHILDREN OF. An Arab clan or tribe, residing in MEDEBA (q.v.), which attacked John the brother of Jonathan (the Maccabee) as he was on his way to the NABATÆANS, and carried him off with all that he had (1 Mac. 9 35 f.: οὐκ ἴδον ἰαμβριεὺν [A], . . . αμβριεὺν [N], ἰαμβριεὺν [V]; v. 37 ἴδον ἰαμβριεὺν [A], ἰαμβριεὺν [N*V], αμβριεὺν [N^{c.a.c.b} (vid.)]). From v. 38 42 it appears that John was slain; what happened to the women and children of the Jews is not stated. To avenge his brother's death, Jonathan and his brother Simon crossed the Jordan, and surprised and discomfited the b'ne Jamri (Amri) as they were escorting a bride with a great train from NADABATH (q.v., ib. v. 37. Josephus (Ant. xiii. 12 4) tells the same story; he calls the hostile tribe οὐκ ἴδον ἰαμβριεὺν. Ἀμαβριεὺς, like Ἀμαβριεὺς, in Jos. Ant. viii. 12 5, seems to represent ἰαμβρι, Omri (for the B readings of which name see OMR1). Since, however, the name ἰαμβρι has been found in an Aramaic inscription at Umm er-Resâs, about 12 m. SSE. from Medeba (see CIS 2 no. 195 l. 3), it seems best to retain the form Jamri. T. K. C.

JAMES (ΙΑΚΩΒΟΣ. Jacobus), the name of three persons prominently mentioned in the NT—James the son of Zebedee, James the son of Alphæus, and James the brother of Jesus. The first two of these are included in the lists of the apostles given in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts (Mt.

JAMES

10 2 f. Mk. 3 17 f. Lk. 6 14 f. Acts 1 13). The former of this pair was a brother of John; their father—a Galilean fisherman, probably a resident of Capernaum—is represented in the first two Gospels (Mt. 4 21 Mk. 1 20) as having been present when his two sons were called by Jesus to be his disciples, although in the legendary account of this event in the third gospel the presence of Zebedee is not implied, their call being made incidental to that of Peter, who is said to have been a partner of theirs. It is a usual inference from Mt. 27 56 and Mk. 15 40 that Salome was their mother, although this cannot be proved. The call of James to be a disciple was followed some months afterwards by his appointment as one of the twelve apostles. His prominence in this band is indicated by the fact that, in all the four lists referred to above, his name is mentioned among the first, along with Peter, Andrew, and John, who are distinguished, together with him, not only by the position which is accorded to them in the lists (cp APOSTLE, § 1, table), but also in the record of several important events (Mk. 5 37 13 3 Mt. 17 1 26 37, and parallels).

Mk. [very enigmatically] relates that the brothers, James and John, were designated by Jesus, Βοανηργες, which is explained 'sons of thunder.'¹

That this name was bestowed upon them by Jesus prior to a manifestation of certain qualities of character is as improbable as that it was given without a reason. Besides, the part which tradition may have had in attributing to them the name and to Jesus the bestowal of it is indeterminate. We may conjecture that they earned the name, either from Jesus or from some other source, on account of a certain impetuosity, manifested, perhaps, in the incident referred to as mentioned in Lk., and in their rash answer to Jesus' question: 'Are ye able to drink the cup that I drink or to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?' The request which called forth this solemn question may also be regarded as indicating qualities of character which might have given rise to the designation in question. [Further than this on the track marked out by the older criticism we cannot go. It is time, perhaps, to strike out a new path, calling in the aid of philological and textual criticism. Can Βοανηργες be right?]

The last appearance of James the son of Zebedee in the gospel-history is in Gethsemane at the agony of Jesus (Mt. 26 37 Mk. 14 33). He is mentioned in Acts (1 13 f.) among the apostles who, after the resurrection, remained in Jerusalem continuing 'steadfastly in prayer.' The cup which he had so impetuously professed himself able to drink was early prepared for him. At the passover of the year 44 he was distinguished as the first martyr among the apostles by Herod Agrippa I. who, acting, perhaps, in the interest of Pharisaic zealots, undertook a persecution of the Christians. In the language of the writer of Acts (12 1 f.), 'Herod the king put forth his hands to afflict certain of the church. And he killed James the brother of John with the sword.' The prominent position of James in the church is perhaps indicated by his selection for this baptism of blood.

The legend that he went as a missionary to Spain, where in 829 his wonder-working bones were found, and where his apparition in luminous armour struck with terror the infidel hosts in the war with the Saracens, was reconciled with the history in Acts by the supposition that, returning from Spain to Jerusalem, he was slain by Herod, and his body carried back and buried by his Spanish travelling-companions.

Of James the son of Alphæus, called in Mk. 15 40 James the less (ὁ μικρότερος, minor, younger) little is recorded in the NT. According to the same passage, his mother was a certain Mary who is there mentioned as a witness of the crucifixion. The translation of 'Judas of James' (Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου; Lk. 6 16 Acts 1 13) as 'Judas the brother of James' is of doubtful propriety. The apostle Judas was probably the son of a James otherwise unknown (see JUDE, 7). The question whether James the son of Alphæus was identical with James the brother of Jesus must be discussed before proceeding to the consideration of the latter.

Doubtless in early times, and perhaps latterly, a prepossession in favour of the perpetual virginity of Mary the mother of Jesus has had an influence in determining some scholars to maintain the affirmative of this question.

It is argued that from Mt. 27.56 Mk. 15.40 and Jn. 19.25 the inference may be drawn that Mary the mother of Jesus had a sister Mary who was the wife of Clopas, and that she was the mother of two sons, James the little (ὁ μικρότερος) and Joses. Moreover, since James, Joses (or Joseph), Judas, and Simon are mentioned in Mt. 13.55 and Mk. 6.3 as brothers of Jesus, and since in Lk. 6.16 and Acts 1.13 a James and a Jude are included among the apostles, it has been argued that these latter were identical with the James and Judas mentioned among the brothers of Jesus, yet that they were not his brothers, but his cousins. In support of this hypothesis it is maintained that the James called the brother of Jesus, mentioned explicitly by Paul in Gal. 1.19 as such, and frequently elsewhere as simply 'James,' and always indicated as holding a prominent place in the church at Jerusalem, was no other than James the son of Alphæus who is identified by the hypothesis with the Clopas of Jn. 19.25. Thus he would be shown to have been a cousin of Jesus, being the son of a sister of Mary, Jesus's mother, and one of the original apostles.

This argumentation is, however, beset with insuperable difficulties. If the apostle Lebbaeus (Mt. 10.3; but RV and WH Thaddæus) who is called Thaddæus in Mk. 3.18, and who by the hypothesis was identical with the 'Judas of James' of Lk. and Acts, was by the first evangelist known to have been a brother of James the son of Alphæus, it is improbable that this writer would not have indicated this fact after the analogy of 'Simon and Andrew his brother' and 'James and John his brother.' It is no less improbable that, if Judas and Simon were sons of Alphæus and the Mary in question, they would not have been mentioned along with Joses in Mt. 27.56 and Mk. 15.40.

It is also evident from the attitude of Jesus's brothers toward him according to Mk. 3.21-31, that they could not have belonged to the friendly apostolic group. For they are here represented as 'standing without,' and were probably of the 'his friends (οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ) who 'went out to lay hold on him' because he was, they thought, beside himself. (Cp Jn. 7.5.) In this connection the fact is important that wherever they are mentioned in the NT they are distinguished from the apostles (Mt. 12.46 Lk. 8.19 Jn. 7.3 Acts 1.14 1 Cor. 9.5; 'the other apostles [besides Paul] and the brothers of the Lord'). Besides, there is nowhere an intimation that any one of the apostles was either a brother or a cousin of Jesus. The attempt to show from Jn. 19.25 that Mary, the so-called 'wife' of Clopas (identified by the hypothesis with Alphæus), was the sister of the mother of Jesus and that hence James the son of Alphæus was his cousin is hazardous. For it is doubtful whether Clopas and Alphæus are the Aramaic and Greek forms of the same name, since the Syriac version uniformly transliterates them differently (Cleopha and Halpai), and whether 'Mary of Clopas' (Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ) is really in apposition with 'the sister of his mother' (ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ). The opinion that four women instead of three are mentioned here has the support of the Syriac version and of many of the highest authorities (see Meyer on the passage, and Wieseler in St. Kr. 40, p. 650). Besides, the position is quite tenable that according to the prevailing usus loquendi, 'Mary of Clopas' (Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ) means Mary the daughter of Clopas, in which case Clopas would be known only as the father of the Mary mentioned in Jn. 19.25 (see CLOPAS). Thus in any case the improbable supposition that in the same family there were two sisters of the same name is obviated. Still, even if it could be shown that James the son of Alphæus was a cousin of Jesus it would not follow that another James was not his brother, since better reasons than those given by Lange and Meyrick are required to justify the abandonment of the natural meaning of ἀδελφός. Nor is it necessary to resort to the supposition of step-brothers; for, according to the obvious sense of 'first-horn' (πρωτότοκος; Lk. 27 Mt. 1.25, Sin. Syr.), Mary was the mother of other sons than Jesus.

It is questioned whether in Gal. 1.19, 'other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother' (ἕτερον δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων οὐκ εἶδον εἰ μὴ Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ κυρίου), James is included among the apostles. The affirmation is thought to carry with it the identification of the apostle James the son of Alphæus with the brother of Jesus. The passage, however, may be correctly rendered, 'Another of the apostles [save Peter] I did not see, but only James the brother of the Lord.'

εἰ μὴ ('save') finding its exception in the negative οὐκ εἶδον ('saw not') and ἕτερον τ. ἄ. ('other of the apostles') referring to

Peter (v. 18). For a similar construction see Rom. 14.14 1 Cor. 8.4 Gal. 2.16 Mt. 12.4 24.36 Lk. 4.26 f. So interpret Fritzsche, Credner, Bleek, Winer, Holtzmann, and others.

It is not necessary to suppose with Meyer and Lipsius (who object to such an exception to Paul's use of εἰ μὴ elsewhere) that James is here included among the apostles 'in the wider sense.' The conclusion is legitimate that whenever Paul refers to James he has in mind the one mentioned in this passage, not the son of Alphæus. A James who is not called the brother of Jesus, and is not specifically designated, is conspicuous in Acts; but his identification must be controlled by the prominence given by Paul to the 'brother of the Lord' (ἀδελφὸς τοῦ κυρίου; Gal. 1.19, cp 2.9.12). For want of space, discussion of the patristic and other early testimony on this point must be omitted. Suffice it to say that the view that there were three Jameses is supported by Hegesippus, the pseudo-Clementine literature (Hom. 11.35, Recogn. 4.35) and the Apostolic Constitutions (2.55 6.12 7.46 8.35), whilst Chrysostom, Jerome, and Theodoret are quoted for the opposite opinion.

James, surnamed the Just, although sharing with the brothers, of whom he was probably the oldest, in their

3. The brother ministry, appears to have been converted to Jesus during his resurrection. According to 1 Cor. 15.7 he was a witness to one of the manifestations of the risen Christ, indeed, to two, if he may be included in the 'all the apostles' (τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πάντων).

An Ebionite ideal picture of 'James the brother of the Lord' is given by Hegesippus (Eus. HE 2.23) who, after saying that he received the government of the church with the apostles, continues thus: 'This apostle was consecrated from his mother's womb. He drank neither wine nor strong drink, and abstained from animal food. A razor never came upon his head, he never anointed with oil, and never used a bath. . . . He was in the habit of entering the temple alone, and was often found upon his bended knees, . . . so that his knees became as a camel's in consequence of his habitual supplication.' The position assigned to him in the church by Hegesippus accords with the statement in the pseudo-Clementine writings that he was the bishop of the holy church, the bishop of Jerusalem, episcoporum princeps, and archiepiscopus.

According to Gal. 1.18 2.9, Paul finds James (see CHRONOLOGY, § 73 f.) holding a prominent place in the Christian community in Jerusalem along with Peter and John, and with these three, 'reputed to be pillars,' he came to an arrangement respecting his mission to the Gentiles. So great was the influence or the authority of James that Peter was controlled by him at Antioch in the matter of eating with the Gentiles. For when 'certain from James came, he drew back and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision' (Gal. 2.12). From this fact and from Paul's statement that, yielding to the emissaries from James, 'the rest of the Jews dissembled,' and 'even Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation,' the inference is obvious that this brother of Jesus was the acknowledged head of the Jewish-Christian party in the church of Jerusalem and a zealot for the strict observance of the Jewish law. Paul's vehement argument with Peter at Antioch reveals no less clearly the attitude of James and his faction, than the position of Paul himself. The question was that of the validity of the Jewish law for Christians, and Paul exposes the kernel of the matter when he says: 'I do not make void the grace of God: for if righteousness is through the law, then Christ died for nought' (Gal. 2.21). This is the historical account of the affair. The writer of Acts, however, whose aim it was to present the original apostles and James in a favourable light with reference to Paulinism, records events which would render the occurrences at Antioch improbable (11.1-12 21.17-25; see, however, ACTS, § 3).

The testimony of antiquity leaves no doubt that James died a violent death at the hands of Jewish zealots about the year 63. For the dramatic account of his martyrdom given by Hegesippus see Eus. HE 2.23. Josephus relates that, during the interregnum between Festus and Albinus, Ananias the high priest (see ANNAS [end]) called the Sanhedrin together, and having summoned James, secured his condemnation to death by stoning—an act for which he suffered the censure of the influential Jews, and was deprived of his office by Albinus.

JAMES (EPISTLE). The object of this writing, which is with doubtful propriety called an epistle (see, however, EPISTOLARY LITERATURE, 1. Contents. § 9), is to emphasize the importance of practical Christianity and to encourage and strengthen its readers in their trials.

The writer exhorts his readers to receive trials with joy, letting patience have its perfect work, and asking in faith for wisdom of God who giveth liberally (1 2-8). External conditions are without real significance. The man is blessed who endures temptation; but temptations are from within, and God tempts no man (1 9-18). Every man should be swift to hear and slow to speak; but the doing of the word is of paramount importance (1 19-27). Distinctions between the rich and the poor shown in the churches to the disadvantage of the poor are censurable; Love of the neighbour as one's self according to 'the royal law' should be kept, and men should speak and act as they who are to 'be judged by a law of liberty' (2 1-13). Faith without works is 'dead' and can 'save' no one, and by the examples of Abraham and Rahab those are shown to be in error who argue to the contrary (2 14-26). Inquisitive conceit of wisdom, the unbridled tongue, jealousy, and faction, are severely rebuked, and 'the wisdom that is from above' is commended (3). The 'pleasures that war in the members' are condemned as the source of contention in the churches, together with adultery, worldliness, and envy (4 1-10). Calumny and censoriousness are rebuked, and the eager pursuit of gain is shown to be folly in view of the brevity and uncertainty of life, which should be lived in a constant sense of dependence upon God (4 11-17). The rich are threatened who have heaped up 'corrupted' riches, while the cry of the poor whom they have oppressed 'has entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth' (5 1-6). The brethren are exhorted to patience in view of the 'coming of the Lord' (παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου) which is 'at hand' (5 7-11). Swearing is forbidden, and prayer is recommended, which, if offered 'in faith,' will save the sick (5 12-18). Finally, he is felicitated who 'converts a sinner from the error of his way' (5 19 f.).

The different parts of the writing are without logical connection, and it has been well characterised as 'for the most part a loose joining of sayings which are not thought in this connection, but brought into it ready made' (Weizsäcker).

The address, 'to the twelve tribes who are of the dispersion' (cp 1 Pet. 1 1) may be at least regarded as in accord with the general Jewish-Christian

2. Address. character of the epistle, although its meaning and purpose are indeterminable. 'The twelve tribes' qualified by 'of the dispersion' (ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ) can literally mean only the Jews living outside Palestine; but that the writer had Christians, not Jews, in mind is evident (2 1 5 7). Some expositors have sought to resolve this incongruity between the address and the contents of the epistle by assuming that the persons addressed were Jewish Christians, since Jewish Christians are called Jews in Gal. 2 13 and Hebrews in the superscription of the Epistle to the Hebrews and in patristic literature, just as Paul (Rom. 11 13) designates the Gentile Christians as ἔθνη. Whilst, however, the Jewish-Christian tendency of the epistle is unmistakable, it is difficult to find in it decisive evidence that it was addressed especially to Jewish Christians.

There is no probability that there were churches composed wholly of Jewish converts to Christianity in 'the dispersion,' and nothing in the epistle indicates that it was addressed to a faction of the believers in general. The citation of examples from the OT and the mention of Abraham as 'our father' (2 21-25) proves nothing in view of Paul's usage (Rom. 4 1 12 16 Gal. 3 16 29; see also Clem. Rom. 31 4). The use of συναγωγή for a Christian assembly (2 2) was not confined to the Jewish Christians, who, according to Epiphanius (Haer. 30 18), employed it instead of ἐκκλησία. Here it may mean no more than ἐπισυναγωγή in Heb. 10 25 (see Harnack, ZWT, '76, p. 104 f.).

It is very improbable, moreover, that a writer addressing Jewish Christians should not only ignore the Mosaic Law and ritual, but also give prominence to 'the perfect law of liberty,' evidently contrasting it with the former, and to the 'implanted word' (1 21 25 2 12), without any attempt to show the relation of these new conceptions to the ancient economy (see von Soden, HC iii. 2 161).

Another incongruity between the address and the contents appears in the fact that whilst the former is general, there is in the latter constant reference to local and special conditions, as if the writer really had in mind a particular Christian 'assembly' (συναγωγή) with whose errors and needs he was personally acquainted.

The circumstances which he depicts in detail cannot be supposed to have existed throughout an extended territory, such as is indicated in the address (1 2 ff. 13 ff. 2 1 ff. 3 1 ff. 13 ff. 4 1 ff. 13 ff. 5 1 ff. 14).

If, on account of these incongruities the address be not judged to be fictitious and without significance in relation to the contents, it must be regarded as including Christians in general as the 'true Israel,' as 'the new, greater people of God, who have taken the place of the old' (Gal. 6 16; cp Barn. 4 6 13 1 2 Clem. 2 2). The words 'of the dispersion' may be, as Pfeleiderer conjectures, an imitation of 1 Pet. 1 1 with the omission of the local limitation.

The relation of the epistle to the other NT writings and to early patristic literature is instructive with reference to the question of its date and authorship.

3. Relation to other writings.

a. The epistle contains many reminiscences of the sayings of Jesus, principally of those collected in the First Gospel, in the 'Sermon on the Mount.'

(1 17 Mt. 7 11; 1 20 Mt. 5 22; 1 22 ff. Mt. 7 21 f.; 2 8 Mk. 12 31; 2 13 Mt. 5 7; 4 12 Mt. 10 28; 5 12 Mt. 5 34).

The points of contact with the Synoptic Gospels do not indicate a literary dependence upon them or an accurate knowledge of the words of Jesus.

If the author was acquainted with our written Gospels, he cannot be said to have quoted from them, and he never refers to them or to Jesus as the source of the moral apophthegms in which his writing abounds. It is certainly a very vague and limited knowledge of 'the evangelic tradition' that can be affirmed (with Holtzmann) on the ground of 1 6 compared with Mk. 11 22-24, and 5 14 compared with Mk. 6 13. The most that can be said in this relation is that the moral teachings contained in this tradition had made an indistinct impression upon the mind of the writer.

b. That the writer of James was acquainted with Rom., 1 Cor., and Gal., there is little reason to doubt, though he makes no mention of these writings, and does not directly quote from them.

Acquaintance with them is shown in faint reminiscences of their terminology and forms of expression and in declarations which are in apparently intentional opposition to teachings contained in them (1 2 f. Rom. 5 3 f.; 1 13 1 Cor. 10 13; 1 21 Rom. 13 12; 1 22 Rom. 2 13; 2 10 Gal. 5 31; 2 19 1 Cor. 8 4; 2 21 Gal. 3 6 Rom. 4 3; 2 24 Rom. 3 28 Gal. 2 16; 4 1 Rom. 6 13 7 23; 4 4 Rom. 8 7; 4 5 Gal. 5 17; 4 11 f. Rom. 2 1 14 4). The writer shows no comprehension of the leading doctrines of Paul, and it is probable that he could not understand them. Of the Pauline conception of the Messiahship of Jesus, his atoning sacrifice, and his resurrection (in which was the hope of the resurrection of believers at the Parousia), and of the profound Pauline mysticism, there is no trace of even a reminiscence in the epistle. There is only a reference to the Parousia which shows a merely external apprehension of it (5 7 f.).

c. Acquaintance with the Epistle to the Hebrews is not improbable.

This may be argued on the ground of 2 17 20 26 compared with Heb. 6 1 9 14 (νεκρά 'dead' applied in the one case to faith and in the other to works), of 3 18, compared with Heb. 12 11 (καρπὸς δικαιοσύνης ἐν εἰρήνῃ 'the fruit of righteousness . . . in peace' and καρπὸς εἰρηκὸς δικαιοσύνης 'the peaceable fruit . . . of righteousness'), and of 2 25, the example of Rahab, compared with Heb. 11 31. Other points of contact with Heb. are found in 1 17 (cp Heb. 12 9), 3 1 (cp Heb. 5 12), 4 15 (cp Heb. 6 3), 5 10 (cp Heb. 13 7).

d. The relation of James to 1 Pet. necessitates the hypothesis of a literary dependence, and it is a disputed question to which the priority should be accorded.

Cp 1 i with 1 Pet. 1 i, 12 f. with 1 Pet. 16 f., 1 io with 1 Pet. 124, 1 18 with 1 Pet. 123, 121 with 1 Pet. 21 f., 27 with 1 Pet. 4 14-16, 46-10 with 1 Pet. 5 5-9, 58 f. with 1 Pet. 47, 520 with 1 Pet. 48). Expositors have generally maintained the dependence of 1 Pet. upon James; but W. Brückner has shown with probability the priority of the former, by a careful study of the parallel passages (ZWT, '74, p. 533 ff.), and has been followed by Holtzmann, Pfeiderer, and von Soden. (See also Grimm, St. Kr., '72, p. 692 ff.)

e. Dependence on the Apocalypse is at least probable.

Cp 25 with Rev. 29, 1 12 with Rev. 2 10, 59 with Rev. 3 20. Pfeiderer decides for the priority of the portion of the Apocalypse (dating from the time of Hadrian) which contains these passages, and thinks that the writer of James in appealing to the divine promise (1 12) must have had Rev. 2 10 in mind (Das Urchrist. 867). Völter, however, reverses the relation (Die Entsteh. d. Apok. 183).

f. The contacts with 1 Clem. do not show 'incontestably' the use of James by the author of that epistle.

The two most important passages are found in 1 Pet. which may have been a common source for the writers of James and 1 Clem. (cp Clem. 80 2 with 1 Pet. 5 5; Jas. 4 6, Clem. 49 5 with 1 Pet. 48 Jas. 5 20); 1 Clem. 10 20 (cp Jas. 2 23) is explicable from Rom. 4 3; and 88 6 and 17 1 f. do not necessarily presuppose an acquaintance of the writer with Jas. 2 23 and 5 10. If, however, the use of James in this case be conceded, the indeterminate date of 1 Clem. (probably 93-125) excludes any conclusion for the early composition of the former.

g. The points of agreement between the Shepherd of Hermas and James necessitate the conclusion that one of them is dependent upon the other; but it is not clear to which the priority should be assigned.

Pfeiderer is perhaps too positive that it probably belongs to Herm. (cp 47 with Herm. Mand. 12 5; 4 12 with Herm. Mand. 12 6 Sinn. 9 23).

h. The author of James was acquainted with the LXX, but not with the Heb. text of the OT. Theile has shown him to have been familiar with Eccles. and Wisdom, and probable points of contact with Philo have been pointed out.

The acquaintance of the author with some of the Pauline epistles, the particulars of which have already been given, must be regarded as uncontestably established by the criticism of this writing, in regard to which so many disputed questions still remain unsettled. The most indisputable point of contact with Paulinism occurs in the short section in which the writer discusses the doctrine of justification (2 14-26). The twofold prepossession against admitting that the canon of the NT contains pseudonymous writings and contradictory teachings has led to the confusion of a problem which would otherwise have found an easy solution. For if the same critical method should be applied here that is employed in similar cases from the consideration of which such prepossessions are absent, there can be no doubt that a general agreement among scholars would result. The case in question is not a vague allusion to faith and works in general, which might be accounted for on the ground of Jewish ideas and terms known by the writer of the epistle without dependence upon Paul, but a pointed reference to a distinctly Pauline doctrine and the employment of the apostle's terminology and very words. Paul declares explicitly: 'We reckon therefore that a man is justified (δικαιοῦσθαι) by faith apart from the works of the law' (Rom. 3 28) and 'a man is not justified by the works of the law . . . even we believed on Christ Jesus, that we might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law' (Gal. 2 16). He cites the case of Abraham, and affirms that this patriarch was justified not by works, but by faith (Rom. 4 1 Gal. 3 6). On the contrary, the writer of James declares that 'a man is justified (δικαιοῦσθαι) by works, and not by faith only' (2 24), and as if to reply to the advocates of Paulinism by employing the very example adduced by their master he affirms that Abraham was justified by works (2 21-23). He also turns to his purpose the case of Rahab employed in an opposite sense by the Pauline writer of Heb. In the declaration that a man is not justified by faith only (μόνον) is implied the doctrine of the co-operation of faith and works in justification, which is expressed in the words regarding Abraham; 'Faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect' (2 22). This is essentially a justification ἐξ ἔργων in opposition to the Pauline χωρὶς ἔργων, according to the declaration concluding this section; 'For as the body apart from the spirit is dead, even so faith apart from works (χωρὶς ἔργων, the Pauline terminology) is dead.' To Paul, however, the Gospel was 'the power of God unto salvation o every one that believeth,' i.e., faith in itself or χωρὶς ἔργων had a saving efficacy (Rom. 1 16)—an affirmation which is pointedly denied in James (μὴ δύναται ἡ πίστις σῶσαι αὐτόν, 2 14). Paul could never, like our author, as Kern has pointed out, have made salvation depend upon faith and works, because faith in his sense included works—i.e., a new life.

The difference of the two points of view has been well stated by Schwieger: 'With Paul faith because it justifies is the source of good works; with James faith because it is the source of good works and shows itself alive in them has a justifying efficacy. With Paul justification is conditional upon faith, or better, justification and faith are present at the same time within the man, and works proceed out of the justification in faith; with James justification proceeds from the works in which faith shows itself to be alive. With Paul justification comes between faith and works; with James works come between faith and justification' (Nachap. Zeit. 1 429).

Nothing could have been further from Paul's thought than to depreciate good works; but he did not think that the justifying judgment of God was determined by them, for as Luther, rightly apprehending the Pauline thought, says, 'faith lies at the bottom of the heart, and God looks to the bottom of the heart.' (Cp W. Grimm, ZWT, '70, p. 379.) However, the different views of faith and justification entertained by the two men are not of special importance for our purpose. (An admirable statement of them has been made by von Soden in JPT, '84.) Whether the author of James wrote for readers who, as he supposes, misunderstood Paul's teachings, or whether, as is more probable, he did not himself correctly apprehend them, the important fact is that he betrays unmistakably a dependence upon Rom. and Gal. Holtzmann is not too positive in saying that 'there is no more direct sort of polemics than the verbal citation of a formula (δικαιοῦσθαι ἐκ πίστεως μόνον, 2 24), supplied with a definite negation' (Einl.⁽²⁾ 509). If the expedient of Weiss, adopted from Neander, be allowed, that the writer of James was in this section combating a Jewish-Christian prejudice rather than a Pauline doctrine (the epistle being assumed to have been written before the time of Paul), the conflict of teaching would still remain. There is, however, scarcely a probability in favour of this supposition in view of the employment in James of the unique Pauline terminology.

The composition of the epistle in the apostolic age, and, as is generally supposed by those who assign it to this period, by James, the brother of authorship. Jesus, is rendered very improbable by several internal features, which have been repeatedly pointed out. The legalistic point of view of James, one of the 'pillars' of the church in Jerusalem, is not indicated. The question of the relation of Jews and Gentiles, which agitated the early church, is not referred to. 'The Judaistic controversy seems accordingly to have died out and the νόμος τέλειος ὁ τῆς ἐλευθερίας ['perfect law of freedom'] (1 25) to have been actually identical with the new and transformed law of a Christianity already becoming Catholic.' The lamentable condition of the churches which is depicted—too much teaching, the unbridled tongue, worldliness, deference to the rich and scorn of the poor, an eagerness for trade and gain, 'jealousy and faction,' 'wars and fightings,' and the absence of the wisdom that is from above—is not by any means that of primitive Christianity.

An indication of a late date is found in 5 13-15, where supernatural healing of the sick is effected through 'the elders,' that is, the official body of presbyters (1 Tim. 4 14).

In the earlier church the power to effect 'healings' and 'the working of miracles' pertained to believers indiscriminately (1 Cor. 12.9f.). The embodiment of the function in an official class indicates a considerable development of ecclesiastical organisation. Cp SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

The writer was not, moreover, familiar with primitive Christianity on its doctrinal side. He mentions, indeed, as before remarked, the Parousia, and calls Christ 'the Lord of Glory' (2.1). The Christological question, however, included much more than this in the early Church—the life, the atoning death, the resurrection of Jesus, and the testimony of the OT to his Messiahship. That the 'brother of Jesus,' living at the time when these doctrines were taking form, should not have referred to them even in a hortatory epistle is scarcely probable. Moreover, the good Greek style of the epistle, despite Schleiermacher's strictures upon it, is hardly such as could be expected of the son of Joseph and Mary.

Spitta has recently undertaken to show that the epistle is not a Christian, but a Jewish, work (Der Brief des Jakobus, '96). The 'only specifically Christian' passages, καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ('and of the Lord Jesus Christ,' 1.1) and ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ('our [Lord] Jesus Christ,' 2.1), are regarded as interpolations, and the interpretation of the entire book is conducted with reference to parallels drawn from the Jewish literature. The hypothesis of interpolations, however, is somewhat arbitrary; the section on faith and works (2.14-26) presupposes the Pauline doctrine and an acquaintance with Paul's writings, as has been shown in the course of this article; and the relation of the epistle to the NT literature is adverse to the early date assigned to it by Spitta. Moreover, the terminology in reference to eschatology is unmistakably Christian. See εἰς τῆς παρουσίας τοῦ κυρίου ('until the coming of the Lord,' 5.7), and ἡ παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου ἔρχεται ('the coming of the Lord is at hand,' 5.8). The parallels referred to in Enoch do not contain this terminology. Spitta's hypothesis, though defended with great learning and accuracy, can hardly be regarded as established.

Von Soden (in HC, '98), rejecting Spitta's hypothesis, presents a new one of his own. The two sections, complete in themselves, 3.1-18 and 4.11-5.6, show no sort of accord with Christian writings or ideas. The former might be regarded as an essay of an Alexandrian scribe, and the latter as a fragment from a Jewish apocalypse. Although they may have come from the same pen, they betray a different mind in tone, language, and manner of apprehending things. Other parts of the epistle give the impression that sayings elsewhere formulated are grouped on the ground of a general relationship of their contents or of their reference to that with which the author was occupied. Whilst Christian tones are wanting in the sections referred to, in the others notes of accord with Paul and 1 Pet. are frequent (cp 1.2-4, 12, 13, 21, 25, 5.8, 14-26, 4.1-6, 10). Of the forty words in James foreign to the NT there are outside 3.1-18 4.11-5.6 only six: ῥητάρια and ἐμφυτος in 1.21; χρυσόδακτύλιος, προσωπολήμψτης, ἀνάλεος, ἐφήμερος in chap. 2. It is probable, therefore, that in combating the improprieties in Christian circles known to him, the writer called to his aid reminiscences out of his Jewish period, while he contributed of his own only some thoughts chiefly found in chaps. 1 and 2, showing here, however, the influence of his Jewish materials in choice of words, tone, and style. Parallels to this procedure are found in the Didaché, the epistle of Barnabas, the reception of apocalyptic fragments in Rev., and the Pauline anthologies from the OT. From this point of view it is believed that justice will more easily be done to the epistle, the loose connection and the defective arrangement will be less censured, and the absence of specifically Christian expressions, as well as the retirement of the book as soon as Greek influence prevailed in Christendom, will be better understood.

The epistle is poor in doctrinal expressions. The author, indeed, does not conceal his repugnance to doctrinal disputations, and the judgment is well grounded which finds that the episode regarding faith and works was written not so much with a doctrinal purpose, as to enforce the fundamental practical object of the writing—to recommend the wisdom that is from above as more desirable than riches and earthly knowledge. If the Christianity which the author defends has, as Hilgenfeld maintains, an Essene colouring in such teachings as those regarding mercy (2.13), the oath (5.12), riches (1.10 f. 2.5), trade (4.13), and governing the tongue (1.19, 3.3 f.), an Ebionite tendency is more certainly shown in his predilection for the poor and his opposition to the rich, and in his disinclination to teaching, worldly wisdom, and theories of faith. (See the Ebionite points of agreement with the Clem. Hom. in Immer, NT Theol. 428). Whether his points of contact with the Shepherd of Hermas prove his use of that writing or not, the similarities of the two works, which Pfeleiderer has pointed out, give great weight to this scholar's opinion that 'certain it is that both writings presuppose like historical circumstances, and, from a similar point of view, direct their admonitions to their contemporaries, among whom a lax worldly-mindedness and unfruitful theological wrangling threatened to destroy the religious life' (Das Urchrist. 868). Holtzmann characterises this as 'the right visual angle' for the judgment of the epistle (ZWT, '92, p. 66). The latter scholar concludes that in his formulation both of the conception of the law and of that of Christology the writer's thought reaches in its objective points into Catholic Christianity.

It may be regarded as far more probable that the epistle is a product of the second century, perhaps later than 1 Peter, than that it was written in the apostolic age by the brother of Jesus. Perhaps in his polemic against faith the writer had in mind an 'ultra-Pauline Gnosis' which he may or may not have discriminated from genuine Paulinism.

The place from which the epistle was written is indeterminable; but the opinion that it originated in Rome has great probability in its favour on account of the contacts with Heb., Clem. Rom., and Herm.

The epistle did not fare well as to recognition in the early Church. The Canon of Muratori omits it. The earliest trace of an acquaintance with

6. Canoncity. it is found in Irenæus, who refers to Abraham as 'the friend of God' (Jas. 2.23); but he does not mention the epistle. From Tertullian's silence regarding the epistle it must be concluded that he either was unacquainted with it, or knowing it, regarded it as spurious. Eusebius, in writing of it as an historian, classifies it among the controverted books, and says that it is reckoned spurious, and that not many of the ancients have mentioned it. Yet in his commentary on the Psalms he quotes it as 'the holy apostle's.' Doubtful traces of its use by Clem. Alex. are found in his writings, although he is said by Eusebius to have written commentaries on all the Catholic epistles. Good reasons, however, for doubting his acquaintance with it are given by Salmon (Introd. to NT 449). Origen knew and quoted an epistle of which he spoke doubtfully as said to be James's (φερομένη ἡ Ἰακ. ἐπιστολή). Jerome, while acknowledging its genuineness, remarks that it was said to have been published by another in the name of James, though it gradually acquired authority. It is contained in the Pesh., and Ephrem accepted it as the work of James, the brother of Jesus.

The most important commentaries on the epistle are those of Schneckenburger (32), Theile ('33), Kern ('38), Ewald ('70), Erdmann ('81), v. Soden ('98), and Mayor ('92).

7. Literature. Special investigations are contained in the Einll. of Credner, De Wette, Holtzmann, Hilgenfeld, Zahn, and in the Introductions of Salmon and Davidson. Noteworthy articles on the epistle are those of Kern (Tüb. Z. f. Theol., '35, also printed separately), Grimm (ZWT, '70), Hilgenfeld (ib., '73), W. Brückner (ib., '74), Holtzmann (ib., '82, '92), Klöpffer (ib., '85), von Soden (JPT, '84), Haupt (St. Kr., '83), Usteri (ib., '86), Schwartz (ib., '91), and W. C. van Manen, *Th. JANNÆUS, ALEXANDER (יָנַי); also יָנַי, and on bilingual coins יהונתן הסלך, showing that 'Jannai' is a contraction of יְהוֹנָתָן 'Jonathan'.² The first Asmonæan king of Judæa recognised on the coins, third son of John Hyrcanus, and successor of Aristobulus I. (104-78 B.C.), Jos. Ant. xiii. 12-15, B/14. He has been supposed by some to be referred to in Pss. 2 and 110; but the general impression produced on the ancients by his character cannot surely have been very different from that which modern students receive from it. He was not a sovereign like Simon the Maccabee or John Hyrcanus, either of whom might conceivably have received a religious poet's encomium. He 'was during his reign of twenty-six or twenty-seven years almost constantly involved in foreign or in civil wars, which for the most part were provoked by his own wilfulness, and resulted by no means invariably in his favour.'³ 'It could only be with deep-seated resentment that pious Jews could look on and see a wild warrior like Alexander Jannæus discharging the duties of high priest in the holy place, certainly not with the conscientious and painstaking observance of the ordinances regarded by the Pharisees as divine.'⁴

The bitter spirit of Is. 25 10 f. may seem to belong to an adherent of Alexander Jannæus; but here again Duhm's tendency to throw everything that he can into a very late period may lead him astray (cp Smend, ZATW, '84, pp. 209, 212). Much more plausible is the view that there are veiled references to Jannæus in parts of the book of Ecclesiastes (see ECCLESIASTES, § 11). The king spoken of was at any rate not unlike Jannæus (who was called Thracidas 'for his extreme cruelty,' Jos. Ant. xiii. 142), and the difficulty of placing Ecclesiastes in the Persian period is becoming more generally felt.

JANNES AND JAMBRES (Ἰαννης καὶ Ἰαμβρησ [Ti. WH; var. Ἰαμβρησ]). In 2 Tim. 3 8 two

1. Origin of the names. Egyptian magicians, who 'withstood Moses' (Ex. 7 8 f.) are named, though elsewhere the opponents of Moses are anonymous. The author of 2 Tim. may, as Theodoret held, have derived the names from oral tradition; but it is not improbable that there existed a small apocryphal narrative with a title corresponding to the 'Jannes et Mambres liber' mentioned by Origen (Mt. 27 9) and the 'Liber, qui appellatur Pœnitentia Jannis et Mambre, apocryphus' cited in the Decree of Gelasius (cp Schürer, GJV 3⁹) 292 f.; Fabricius, Cod. Pseud-epigr. VT 1 813-825 2 105-111).

It will be noted that the names given in these Latin titles differ from the accepted reading in 2 Tim. The Codices, however, sometimes offer the reading Μαμβρησ for the second name. Most modern authorities accept this reading and regard the name as equivalent to the Hebrew מַמְרֵי (see MAMRE); the β aids pronunciation as in the case of Ἀμβραμ (see AMRAM). So Buxtorff, Lex. Chald. et Talm. col. 945. 'Ἰαννης can be readily explained as Hebrew, for 'Ἰαννης or 'Ἰωάννης would correspond with Johanan (יְהוֹנָן).¹ In the Hebrew sources, however, the names are not always so spelt. In Bah. Talm. Ménächth, 85a, we find the forms יְהוֹנָן וְיָמְרֵי; but in the Jer. Targ. the names are more similar to those in Timothy. There are several spellings even within the Targum itself. Ex. 1 15 יְהוֹנָן וְיָמְרֵי; Ex. 7 11, יָנִים וְיָמְרֵי; Nu. 22 22 יָנִים וְיָמְרֵי. (These spellings are cited from the editio princeps, Venice, 1695, and they are all confirmed by the valuable MS, Brit. Museum Add. 27031.) In other Jewish works the spelling of the names is even less uniform, so that we even find Joannes and Ambrosius (Shalsheth Hakkabbala), and also three names instead of two, Jonos, Juchne, and Mamhre (see Schöttgen, Horæ Hebr. on 2 Tim. 3 8).

JANNES AND JAMBRES

There is another tenable theory as to the origin of the names. Lauth (Moses der Ebräer, 77) held that they are Egyptian, Jannes meaning 'Scribe' and Mambres 'Gift of the Sun God (Heliodorus).' J. Freudenthal (Alexander Polyhistor, 173) also regards the names as Græcised-Egyptian. Freudenthal indeed traces the whole story to a Hellenistic Egyptian source, though one of the names occurs (perhaps in Pliny HN xxx. 111),² and in Apuleius (Apol. c. 90, ed. Hildebrand).³ The fullest citation in a pagan source is from Numenius (Eus. Præp. Ev. 9 8). Freudenthal considers it probable that Numenius derived his statement from Artapanos, a Hellenist who wrote in Alexandria in the second century B.C. (Schürer, however, contests this, but on inconclusive grounds). Ewald (GJV 2³) 128, ET 289, n. 1) also treats the names as ancient, and well compares the Hebrew תַּרְמִסִּים (see MAGIC, § 2) with Numenius's λερογραμματοεῖς. Ewald would thus agree with Lauth in holding that the names are the Egyptian equivalents for 'Scribes' in general.

The explanation of the names, apart from their etymology, has given rise to many conjectures, some of them quite worthless. Iselin, who

2. Explanation. agrees with Freudenthal as to the origination of the story with Artapanos, thinks that the names were due to a mistaken reading (מַמְרֵי וְיָמְרֵי) in Gen. 14 13 (see MAMRE). He cites also 1 Macc. 9 36, of ἰσὺν Ἰαμβρησ [Ἰαμβρη [N^{c,a}, c.b (vid.)]], ἐκ Μηδαβὰ, Medeba being situate in the old land of the Amorites (ZWT, '94, p. 325). See JAMBRI. (Iselin gives a useful collection of the Syriac occurrences of the names.) Geiger (Urschr. 474), using the same passage in 1 Macc., regards the names as Maccabæan, 'Jambres' alluding to the 'sons of Jambri' (but the reading thus assumed is very doubtful), and Jannes the inhabitants of Jamnia. These national enemies gave the names to the opponents of Moses. Levy (Chald. WB., s.v. יָנִים) suggests that John the Baptist and Jesus were meant. Kohut (Aruch Completum, s.v. יָנִים וְיָמְרֵי) compares the Persian demons, Janaya and Vyambura. Jastrow suggests Januarius and Janus. Such suggestions are mere guesses. Levy's theory that Mamre was chosen because of its meaning 'Apostate,' has, however, found considerable acceptance. So too, it is easy to connect יָנִים with the Rabbinical יָנִי, 'to vex or mislead.'

Of the Jewish statements about Jannes and Jambres, the only features that seem ancient are the bare names.

3. Jewish References. In the Talmud (Ménäch. 85 a) Johanan and Mamre, thinking that Moses is a magician like themselves (so Koran 28), retort, 'Dost thou bring corn or straw to Afraim?'⁴ (evidently a city where corn abounded; perhaps a town in Samaria; Neub. Glogr. 155). The Jer. Targ. makes Jannes and Jambres sons of Balaam, who advised the prevention of the birth of Moses (Ex. 1 15), opposed him in Egypt (711), and accompanied Balaam on his journey to Balak (Nu. 22.22). These statements are not real traditions; they are built up from words in the text, after the manner of Midrash. According to some Midrashim, Jannes and Jambres perished in the Red Sea (Mid. Vayyosha'), according to others they joined the Israelites among the 'mixed multitude' (Tanchūma to Ex. 32.1), and died in the tumult after the incident of the golden calf (Yakuṭ K'hubōni). The Zohar (13th cent.) has several references to Jannes and Jambres, but they are of no antiquity. The fullest consecutive narrative is to be found in the Sēpher Hayyāshār (11th or 12th cent.).

See I. Abrahams, 'The Rod of Moses,' in 'Papers of Jews' College Lit. Soc.,' 1887. For further Christian references, which, like the Jewish, add nothing authentic to Timothy, cp Schürer, loc. cit.

JANOAH (יָנוֹחַ), 'resting-place'—but see below).

I. AV Janohah. A point on the eastern border of Ephraim (Josh. 16.6 f.; יאנוּחַ, מאַחוֹ (?)—in Josh. 16.7 יָנוּחַ—[B], יאנוֹ [A], -חַא [L]). According to the Onomasticon (267.59 133.20) it lay 12 R.m. E. of Neapolis, in AKRABATTINE; the definition is almost exact (E. should be SE.). It is mod. Kh. Yānūn (see Guérin, Sam. 26 f.; Rob. BR 4.297). On a rocky hill to the NE. is the praying-place of Nehy Nūn. It was not uncommon to give the ancient names of ruined towns to supposed Moslem saints; in the present instance, however, Yānūn has become the prophet Nūn. Here, no doubt, was the chief high place of Janoah.

2. A town in N. Israel, depopulated by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. 15.29, איוּחַ [B], איוּחַ [AL]). It is mentioned between Abel-beth-maacah and Kedesh, and has been identified by Guérin (Gal. 2.371 f.) with Hunin (famous for its old fortress and for its view), and with more plausibility by Conder with Yānūh, a village 6 m. E. of Tyre (PÉF.F. 1.5196). Apparently Janoah was a frontier city towards the Tyrian territory. The present writer has conjectured (Aeas., July 6, '96) that it is the city of Yenu'amū, which is mentioned in the Israel-inscription of Merneptah and elsewhere in the Egyptian records, and appears in one of the Amarna letters as Yinuamma (Wi. 1428). In the letter referred to some one reports to the king of Egypt that this city 'has fallen away and barred the gate behind him.' Yenu'amū must have been a rich town, for Thotmes III. endowed the temple of Amun at Thebes with an annual sum to be paid by this and two other cities (Brugsch, GA 329). There is an Egyptian picture given by Rosellini and W. M. Müller which shows its position. It lay by a small lake, and was surrounded by forests in which the conquered enemies took refuge. It is difficult to think that such an important place-name as Yenu'amū or Yinuamma has not (like other equally ancient names) survived.

According to the theory here adopted, Yenu'amū is not a compound of נעם (נעם ים, Hommel; cp Yinuamma), but is equivalent to נעמון. In Kings this name was shortened into יָנוֹחַ (Janoah), just as יֶרֶחָ (Jerphah) is shortened from יְרֵחָ. That n before y is not reproduced in the Egyptian form Yenu'amū need not surely surprise us; it would have been very troublesome to an Egyptian to pronounce the name accurately. The alternative explanation נעם ינו (E. Meyer, Z. I.T.W. 6.7) is philologically less probable. Clemont-Ganneau's identification of Yenu'amū with the southern town of Naamah of Josh. 15.41 (Rev. Arch. 29.127) is also linguistically improbable. Naville (Rec. de travaux, 20 [98]) seeks for the site near Gezer, and would even identify it with Jahneel; but this, too, seems unlikely.

JANUM, RV Janim (יָנִים Kt., יָנִים Kr.; Josh. 15.53; ΙΑΜΑΕΙΝ [B], ΙΑΝΟΥΜ [AL]), an unidentified locality in the hill-country of Judah, in the neighbourhood of BETH-TAPPUAH. Read perhaps יָמִי, 'Jamin.'

JAPHETH (יָפֶֿתֿ; ΙΑΦΕΘ [BADEL]), son of Noah

¹ יָפֶֿתֿ, 'to dwell,' is doubtful. Hab. 2.5 and Ps. 68.13 [14] are corrupt.

(Gen. 5.32, etc.; see HAM), and ancestor of the peoples

1. References. N. and W. of Palestine (Gen. 10.2-5, P). That he was generally regarded as Noah's youngest son is shown by the constant order of the three brothers, and is in harmony with 10.21, where 6 is not to be followed (see SBOT, and cp Bu. Urgesch. 304 ff.). It is true that in 9.24 'his youngest son' means Ham, or rather Canaan (see HAM i.), and that the narrative 9.20-27 belongs no doubt to an earlier stratum of narrative than the other passages; but the narrow sense in which Shem, Japheth, and Ham are used here was abandoned by later writers, who made Japheth the youngest son, and the ancestor of remote northern peoples. In the early narrative Japheth (if we suppose that he was really mentioned in it) may represent the Phœnicians (so Bu.), who are to be distinguished from the Canaanites, though they dwelt in the land of Canaan. Wellhausen (CH 15) less plausibly suggests the Philistines. It is very probable, however, that the mention of Japheth (v. 23) and the accompanying blessing (v. 27) are later insertions. The words 'he shall dwell in the tents of Shem' may conceivably allude to the conquests of the Greeks, 'Shem' being taken in the later enlarged sense (Duhm's suggestion, adopted by Bertholet, Die Stellung der Israeliten, 76 f., 198). The narrative gains considerably by the omission of Japheth. The division of the world into three parts caused the troublesome insertion.

In explaining the name it is well to follow the analogy of Shem, which was doubtless a personal, not an ethnic, name. Japheth (יָפֶֿתֿ, yepheth) is usually explained in accordance with Gen. 9.27, 'Let God enlarge (יָפַח, yaphit) Japheth.'

2. Meaning of the name. It seems unlikely, however, that a stem so unusual in this sense as יָפַח (yāphāh) would have been chosen. Since the names Shem, Canaan, Japheth, are doubtless older than the poetic oracles, and there are other cases in which we may hold that old names have become mutilated (cp SHEM, HAM, NOAH), it is not too bold to suppose that יָפַח is a fragmentary form of יָפַח יָפַח (yāphāh 'ēl), 'God opens' (cp the old name Japhti'-Addi in Am. Tab.). יָפַח (yāphāh) is a word well adapted for legendary heroes (see JEPHTHAH), and 'enlargement' is a blessing equally fit for the Phœnicians and for the father of so many races as Japheth, one of which was the conquering Javan. Fürst's and Budde's explanation, 'beauty,' from יָפַח (yāphāh), accepted by D. S. Margoliouth (Hastings' DB 2.549b), is not in accordance with analogy, and is rightly rejected by Dillmann.

Of quite another order is the theory of E. Meyer, who connects Japheth with the name Kaft, in hieroglyphic texts = Cilicia. 'Ιάπερος is a Cilician deity; see PHœNICIA, and cp CAPHTOR, §§ 3, 4.

Kaft and Asi—i.e., Cilicia and Cyprus—represented the western quarter of the world to the Egyptians. But the mutilation of Kaft into Yaft is improbable, and we expect a purely personal name. Sanskrit comparisons (Lenormant, Origines, ii. 1.191 f.) are nowadays discredited.

JAPHIA (יָפִיָּה), a border city of Zebulun, mentioned between Daberath (Dabūriyeh) and Gath-hepher (el-Meshhed); Josh. 19.12.

6's readings are φαγγα [B], ιαφαγα [A], ιαφφιε [L]; Eus. (Onom.) gives ιαφθ with an appended θ as in ελισαβθ; Jer. Iaphthie.

The pretty village of Yāfā, 1½ m. SW. of Nazareth, is its representative; the phrase 'goeth up to Japhia' is sufficiently explained by the position of Yāfā on two connected ridges, to which a ravine leads up. The one historical association to which this city can lay claim is its siege and capture by the Romans. The name which Josephus gives it is Japha (ιαφα); he calls it 'a very great village, well secured with walls and full of people' (Vit. 45). He also says that he fortified it with a double wall, and for some time made it his headquarters.

That in one passage Josephus diminishes the distance between Japha (Japhia) and Jotapata¹ is as much or as little of an objection to Robinson's identification as his patent exaggeration of the number of the inhabitants of Japha (B iii. 731). Eusebius (OS 267 f.; cp 13332) appears to hesitate between the claims of an 'ascent (still) called Joppa' and those of Sycaminon (ἵψα = Hypha).² Perhaps the village of Jāfa had almost disappeared in his day. It was in Robinson's time but a small village of about thirty houses (BR 3200). T. K. C.

JAREB (יָרֵב; יֶאֱרֵיב [BAQ*], -רֵיב [Q^a]; UL-TORRENT, -RI), the name of an Assyrian (?) king mentioned twice in Hosea (5.13 10.6) as receiving tribute from Israel. Unfortunately there is no Assyrian king contemporary with Hosea whose name bears even a distant resemblance to Jareb. Hence most critics take Jareb to be a nickname = 'the contentious' (cp Aq. δικασόμενον, 5.13, Aq., Theod., δικάζοντι, Symm. ὑπερμαχούντι, 10.6). This would be plausible only if Jareb resembled some Assyrian name, so that its reference might at once be caught. Hence the present writer proposed³ to change יָרֵב into יָרֵב, 'the Great King' (cp Ps. 48.2 [3]), or יָרֵב, 'the High King' (cp *BAQ). But since it has been shown by Winckler that references to the N. Arabian land of Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2b) underlie the traditional text of many passages in OT, and that יָרֵב has probably sometimes (by corruption) taken the place of יָרֵב, we cannot rest satisfied with this theory. Probably we should read in Hos. 5.13 and 10.6 respectively—When Ephraim saw his sickness | and Israel his wound, Then went Ephraim to Musur | and [Israel] sent to the Arabian king.

That too shall men bring to Musur | as a present to the Arabian king.

The substitution of 'Israel' for 'Judah' need not be justified here (cp HOSEA, § 4). יָרֵב should probably be יָרֵב, יָרֵב in Palestine, like mat Aribu in Assyria, was coming into use as a term for N. Arabia (cp Schr. KAT⁽²⁾, 414 = COT 2.107). The treatment of 'Jareb' in KAT⁽²⁾ 439 (= COT 2.136 f.) may also be consulted though it is necessarily incomplete. For quite recent views see note 3 below.

Müller gives the same view; he prefers, however, יָרֵב, the phrase being treated as a proper name (ZATW 334 f. [197]). Wi. (Musri, etc., 32 [198]), with great ingenuity, proposes to read יָרֵב, 'to the King of Jathrib'—i.e., mod. Medina, which seems to have been on the southern border of Musri (cp Hommel, AHT 273). An alternative is to read יָרֵב, 'Nimrod'; see SBOT 'Isa.' (Heb.) 195.

JARESIAH, RV Jaareshiah (יָרֵשִׁיָּה), § 39; meaning obscure; יֶאֱרָשִׁיָּה וְיֶאֱרָשִׁיָּה [B], יֶאֱרָשִׁיָּה וְיֶאֱרָשִׁיָּה [A], יֶאֱרָשִׁיָּה [L], b. Jeroham in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9, ii. β), 1 Ch. 8.27 f.

He is generally regarded as an Egyptian (EV)¹—the Rabbins, indeed, represent him as a proselyte. This view is of course legitimate, but considering the probable early seat of the clan Jerahmeel, it is perhaps more natural to treat יָרְחָה as meaning rather an inhabitant of the N. Arabian Musri or Musur (see MIZRAIM, § 2b).²

We cannot retain the present spelling of the name יָרְחָה. It would be plausible to read יָרְחָה or יָרְחָה (the latter a Palmyrene name), or, better still, יָרְחָה (after ḤBA'S יָרְחָה). A connection with moon-worship need not be insisted upon; perhaps the name was considered to be identical with Jerahmeel (as an abbreviated form). This would account for the presence of the ancestral list, 1 Ch. 2.34-41, in the genealogy of Jerahmeel, since it is probable that Sheshan himself was not originally Jerahmeelite. His inclusion in v. 31 (the details of which do not agree with v. 34 a) may be later. The union of the Musrite Jarha (Jerahmeel?) and Sheshan (cp the Hebronite Sheshai?) is suggestive. See HEBRON, § 1 f.; JERAHMEEL, § 2 f.; SHESHAN. S. A. C.

It is represented by the modern Khirbet el-Yarmuk, which is 16 m. W. by S. of Jerusalem, and about 8 m. N. of Beit-Jibrin. The distance from Eleutheropolis, which the Onomasticon (OS⁽²⁾ 132.31 266.38) assigns to ירמוֹת or Jermucha (10 R.m. NE.), being so nearly that of Yarmuk from Beit-Jibrin, we are justified in identifying the places. It is remarkable that the closing letter of the modern name should agree with that of the name in the Onomasticon. Such a form, however, as Jarmuk cannot well be ancient; Micah already (it may be) attests the final -uth (see MAROTH). The same prophet, too, in Mi. 1.12, if we may read ירמוֹת כרות (see MAROTH), indicates that Jarmuth was in the neighbourhood of Mareshah, or, at any rate, the assumption that a city called Jarmuth stood there enables us to attain a better text for the passage than we can secure in any other way. We have certainly no reason to suppose that the Jarmuth of the OT narratives was the Yarithuta of the Amarna Tablets (55.16, and often), the position of which is disputed (see Niebuhr, MIG 4.32 f. [196]: Flinders Petrie, Syria and Egypt, 169 f.). In Josh. 15.35 Jarmuth is mentioned with Adullam, and the other notices accord with this. There were possibly several Jarmuths. Can we thus account for the discrepant notice

JASHEN (יָשֵׁן). In 2 S. 23:32, in the list of David's thirty heroes we read (RV), 'Eliabha the Shaalbonite, the sons of Jashen, Jonathan' (אֲשָׁן [BA], ιεσσαί οἱ γουσι [L], βασαί οἱ γουσι [243, in Field]); in the parallel text (1 Ch. 11:33 f.), '... the sons of Hashem the Gizonite' (יֹנָתָן; אֲשָׁן οἱ γουσι [cp אֲשָׁן of 2 S.], אֲשָׁן οἱ γουσι). בני בני, 'sons of' is obviously wrong. It is simply dittographed from the preceding word (so Driver and most), or should יֹנָתָן be viewed as a corruption of a proper name (so H. P. Smith)? In the former case we might read, '... Jashen (or Hashem) the GUNITE' (see GUNI); in the latter יֹנָתָן would be a plausible restoration. Jonathan is generally taken as a separate hero, and connected with Shammah (v. 33) by בן (inserted from Ch.); but, as H. P. Smith points out, יֹנָתָן may be the corruption of a gentilic. Cp HASHEM. T. K. C.

JASHER RV Jashar, Book of (סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר, 'book of the upright'; cp EV^{mgk}), the title of an ancient song-book twice quoted in the OT (Josh. 10:13; אֲשָׁן om., ΒΙΒΛΙΟΝ ΤΟΥ ΕΥΘΟΥΣ [L], Liber Justorum [Vg.];]سفر الـمستقيم [Pesh.]; sifr el-mustakim [Ar.]; 2 S. 1:18; ΒΙΒΛΙΟΝ ΤΟΥ ΕΥΘΟΥΣ [BA], εὐθεῶς [L];]سفر الـمستقيم [Pesh., similarly Ar. asir], Vg. id.).

In the account of the battle of Gibeon and its sequel there occurs a memorable passage (Josh. 10:12-14) with 1. Josh. 10. a fragment of song quoted (most probably by E) from the Book of Jashar.¹

The speaker is said to be Joshua, and by a late scribe's interpolation the song is invested with the character of a prayer. In reality, the address to the sun and moon (see below) is rather a command, or perhaps a spell, than a prayer. The writer of the song no doubt thought of the sun and moon as taking Joshua's side against his (and Yahwè's) foes.² But the interpolator had a good intention, and expressed the devout feeling of the later Jews.³ The passage containing the song was evidently inserted by D₂, who at the same time introduced the explanatory words, 'In the day when ... in the sight of Israel' (v. 12), and the statement, 'So the sun rested ... for Yahwè fought for Israel' (v. 13 f.). In the circles to which D₂ belonged the primitive feeling for nature had died out.⁴

In its original form, therefore, the passage ran thus:—

 O sun! rest over Gibeon;
 O moon! stand still over Aijalon.

¹ See Ki. Hist. 1:302; We. CH 128; Sta. Gesch. 1:50; Bu. ZATW 7:146.

² See Judg. 5:20; and cp Hom. Il. 2:413 f., 18:239 f.; Od. 23:241 ff. With a touch of primitive feeling, Syrian peasants still cry in song to the sun to hasten his going down that they may rest.

⁴ This is partly admitted by Kittel (Hist. 1:304), who nevertheless thinks that 'the fact of a striking continuance of daylight remains, though we may not know the natural law through which it was brought about,' and that 'the song itself . . . proves Israel's belief that a miracle was wrought.' The former view may be defended by Hab. 3:11, Eccus. 46:4, Jos. Ant. v. 117, but seems hardly critical; the latter assumes (with Kaut., but not with Di.) that 'so the sun rested,' etc., forms part of the song-fragment, which can scarcely be admitted.

So the sun rested, and the moon stood still,
 Until Yahwè had taken vengeance on his enemies.¹
 Behold it is written in the Book of Jashar.'

The third line, however, is probably the insertion of the early narrator, from whom the passage was taken by D₂, so that the fragment quoted from the old song in the Book of Jashar consisted of the first, second, and fourth of the above lines, and for 'had taken vengeance on,' we should substitute 'takes vengeance.'

The second quotation is the lamentation for Saul and Jonathan, ascribed to David (2 S. 1:17-27), and probably early, though, it is to be feared, not 2. 2 S. 1. Davidic (see, however, DAVID, § 13).² According to a revised text,³ the passage runs thus:—

'Of David. For the sons of Jeduthun. For the Ezrahite.

* O Saul! by thy death have I been slain;
 * Alas that the heroes have fallen!

Report it not in Rehoboth!
 Declare it not in Halûzah!
 Lest the daughters of the Zarephatbites rejoice,
 Lest the daughters of the Jerahmeelites triumph.

Be thou parched, O Jerahmeel! descend not Dew or rain upon thee!
 Become desolate, ye lofty mountains!
 Let the bushes fade, deprived of fatness!

The shield of Saul has been defiled
 With the blood of those slain by the sword:
 Broken is the bow of bronze,
 Shivered is the well-sharpened sword.

The beloved, the longed-for in life—
 In death they were (still) unparted;
 They (who) were swifter than eagles,
 They (who) were stronger than lions.

Women of Israel, shed tears
 For Saul . . .
 Who gave you linen garments,
 Who decked your raiment with gold.

Alas that the heroes have fallen,
 And the strong of heart lie stiff!
 Jonathan! by thy death have I been slain;
 For thee, O my brother, I am smitten to death!

Thou wast very pleasant to me, my comrade!
 More was thy love to me than women's love.
 Alas that the heroes have fallen,
 And the strong of heart lie stiff!

The four-lined stanzas are well marked (as in the Book of Jnb).

A third quotation is to be found in a passage ascribed to Solomon, and at any rate pre-exilic. The poetical

3. 1 K. 8:12 f. words assigned to Solomon (1 K. 8:12 f.) immediately before a speech in more prosaic style, are given in another place with some variations, and in fuller form by אֲשָׁן (v. 53; G^A gives another version before v. 14), which expressly state that the words are written ἐν βιβλίῳ (βιβλίῳ), or ἐπὶ βιβλίου τῆς ψάλλης—i. e., סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר. If this title ('Book of Song,' or of 'Songs') were correct, it would suggest that the source of the quotation was a Psalter; but the words are almost certainly a slip for סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר (note that Pesh. makes a similar mistake in Josh. 10). For this fragment as emended, see CREATION, § 26.⁴

The Book of Jashar was, so far as we know, a product of the post-Solomonic age (cp St. GIT 1:50). It was

1 national song-book—the 'book of the righteous (or, possibly, brave) one,'—i. e., Israel⁵ (as if = לְיִשְׂרָאֵל, cp Nu. 23:10). Its contents were partly secular (in 2 S. 1:19 ff. there is a total

² Here again the quotation is probably due to E (or R₂), cp Cook, 'Notes on the Analysis of 2 Sam.', AJSL 16:147 [1900].

³ For details of the restoration see SAUL, § 6; Che. Crit. Bib. Cp We., Dr., HPSm., Bu., and GASm. HG 404 f. The title is of course very late; but this does not involve the lateness of the poem.

lack of religious feeling), partly religious (1 K. 8 12 f.); it refers, e.g., to the battle at Gibeon and the prowess of Saul and Jonathan, but also to the temple. Indeed, we may presume that the third of the extant passages belonged to a hymn to Yahwé. Nor could we venture to say that the Book of Jashar contained no pre-Davidic songs. Not impossibly it was similar in the width of its range to the Arabian collections of El Isfahāny or the Hamāsa. Probably the songs of which it was composed had short historical introductions, so that altogether it may have almost served as an Iliad of the Israelites. Can we form a reasonable conjecture as to its other contents? Surely such a collection must have contained David's (?) lament over Abner (2 S. 333 f.), and among earlier passages, the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5), the Song of the Well (Nu. 21 17 f., see BEER), and the Song of Triumph over Sihon (ib. v. 27 f.; but see WARS OF THE LORD, BOOK OF). One might even perhaps add the songs of the primitive history, such as we find in Gen. 4 23 f. 9 25 27 27-29 39 f. etc.). Franke (who ascribes the book to the time of Hezekiah¹) includes also Ex. 15 1-18 and Hab. 3; but see EXODUS II., § 6; MOSES, HABAKKUK, § 8 f.

In later Christian times 'the Book of Jashar' is the title of a ritualistic treatise by Jacob b. Meir (died 1171), and of one or two forgeries which are only remarkable for the undesired success they obtained; for a more detailed account of them see Kitto, Bib. Cycl., s.v. See HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 2; and POETICAL LITERATURE, § 2 (i.).

JASHOBEAM (יִשְׁבֹּעַם). 1. The name, not indeed in itself impossible but certainly corrupt, borne by one of David's chief warriors in 1 Ch. 11 11 (where he is called 'ben Hachmoni'; see HACHMONITE) and 27 2 f. (where he is styled 'ben Zabdriel'). The former passage occurs again with variations in 2 S. 238, where the name of the warrior is represented in the Hebrew text by the letters שְׁבַעֲשֵׁ—i.e., IŠBŠŠ; the appended letters נַח probably represent בְּנֵי, which should be connected with the following word הַחֲמוֹנִי (corrupt; RV 'a Tahchemonite').

For the JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH of RV (=AV 'that sat in the seat') derived from the pointed text, nothing can be said, except that it justifies the warning in RVmg. that 'the verse is probably corrupt.'

IŠBŠŠ seems to be incompletely written for IŠBBŠT; originally there may have been a mark of abbreviation after the š. This may be read either Jashibbosheth ('Bosheth brings back'), or, better, if the second B be regarded as an error, Ishbosheth ('man of Bosheth'), where Bosheth ('shame') is the well-known substitute for Baal. The final ם in ישְׁבַעֲשֵׁ is either a corruption from ך (which is palaeographically possible), or, as Marquart (Fund. 15, n. 1) supposes, an intentional alteration due to religious scruple (he compares רִבְעָם, altered perhaps from רִבְעָל; see JEROBOAM). See ISHBAAL, 2, and cp Gray, HPN 46, note 1.

Ⓞ's readings are: in 2 S. 238 εσβαθη [B], θαι [A], εσβααλ [L]; in 1 Ch. 11 11 εσεβαθα [B], εσσαι. [N], εσβααμ [A], εσεσεβααλ [L]; in 1 Ch. 27 2 εσβαλ [B], εσβααμ [A], εσβ. [L].

Bertheau, Kautzsch (doubtfully), Kittel read יִשְׁבוּ בֵית לַחֶם, 'and they returned to Bethlehem'; but the whole passage is as obscure as the 'records' themselves are said to be 'ancient.' Provisionally we might read at the beginning of the verse יִקְחוּ (יִקְחוּ) אֶת אֲנֹשֵׁי בִּבְחָא . . . אֲשֶׁר עָלוּ לְכֹאֲבָא. Ⓞ has και ἀπέστρεψεν αὐτοῖς [BA], και ἐπέστρεψαν ἑαυτοῖς λεεμ [L]; and Jerome translates 'et qui reversi sunt in Lahem [Bethlehem],' taking the words as applying to those named in the preceding clause. JASIEL (יְעִישָׂאֵל), 1 Ch. 11 47, RV JAASIEL.

JASON ([ε]ιασον [ANV], JASON, a name of Grecian origin in frequent use among the Jews, by whom it was regarded as equivalent to Joshua, Jeshua, Jesus; cp the parallel Alcimus from Eliakim, Menelaus from Menahem, Simon from Simeon, and see NAMES, § 86).

1. Of Cyrene, a Hellenistic Jew, author of a history of the times of the Maccabees down to the victory over Nicanor (175-161). Our so-called second book of Maccabees is an ἐπιτομή of this larger work, which is said to have consisted of five books (2 Macc. 2 23, cp 26). The writer probably lived in the second half of the second century B.C. See further MACCABEES, SECOND, §§ 2, 6; and cp HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 18.

2. Second son of Simon II., and brother of Onias III., the high priest, whose original name was, as Josephus (Ant. xii. 51) relates, Jesus. He represented the Hellenizing section, and was opposed to the policy of an alliance with Rome. By means of a bribe (helped also doubtless by the sons of Tobias) he managed in 175 B.C. to obtain the high-priesthood in place of his brother from Antiochus Epiphanes (see ANTIOCHUS, 2);¹ and proceeded to introduce various practices which were an 'abomination' to the Pharisaism of the time.² Another bribe procured him permission to set up a gymnasium and ephebeum below the Acropolis and hard by Mt. Zion, the consequence of which was the adoption of Greek games (see DISCUS), Greek caps (see CAP), etc. The priests themselves betook themselves eagerly to the palaestra, and being ashamed of their Jewish singularity did all they could to conceal it (1 Macc. 1 15, cp Schür. GVF 1 151, n. 24, and see CIRCUMCISION, § 8). At the same time, Jason obtained permission to register (ἀναγράφαι) the inhabitants of Jerusalem among the citizens of Antioch³ (2 Macc. 4 9), and sent a contribution to Tyre on the occasion of the festival to HERCULES [g.v.]. This, however, was so repugnant to the bearers that they used the money for the equipment of the triremes (2 Macc. 4 18-20). An obscure account of a visit of Antiochus to Jerusalem (ib. 21 1 f.) is all that is told us for the next three years, at the expiration of which time Jason was suddenly supplanted in the priesthood by MENELAUS [g.v.] and forced to flee. Menelaus, however, failed to win popularity, and the appearance of certain dread portents⁴ as well as a baseless rumour of the death of Antiochus encouraged Jason to emerge from his asylum in Ammanitis (cp 4 26). Helped by the populace, he captured the city (ca. 170 B.C.). Menelaus was compelled to take refuge in the citadel. But his success was of short duration; he missed his great object—the priesthood—and, having alienated his supporters by his vindictiveness, was forced to flee before Antiochus. From the Ammonites, he passed to Aretas, and then to Egypt; finally he crossed over to the Lacedæmonians, relying, we are told, on the kinship between them and the Jews (see SPARTA). An effective rhetorical period (5 9 f.) closes his story.

3. Son of Eleazar (cp 'Jassus, son of Sirach Eleazar,' Eccles. 50 27), sent by Judas to Rome (1 Macc. 8 17). He is probably the Jason who is mentioned as the father of ANTIPATER (q.v.) (1 Macc. 12 16 14 22).

² He is probably referred to in Dan. 9 26 11 22, where see Bevan ad loc. and cp We. JG 245, n. 1.

4. Jason of Thessalonica, who, for his hospitality to Paul and Silas, was attacked by the Jewish mob, brought before the magistrates, and bound over to be loyal (Acts 17 1-9). For a less probable view of the object of the demand of the 'security' (τὸ ἰκανόν) see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 231. He may possibly be identified with the Jason of Rom. 16 21, one of Paul's kinsmen (συγγενεῖς)—i.e., a fellow-Jew; cp ROMANS, 88 4, 10. The tradition in pseudo-Dorotheus makes Jason bishop of Tarsus. JASPER (ΙΑΣΠΙΣ, borrowed from Ass. ašpā, yašpā = 𐎠𐎢𐎽𐎢𐏁 or 𐎠𐎢𐎽𐎢𐏁). In Rev. 21 11 (cp 18 f.) the New Jerusalem is said to be irradiated by a luminary 'like a stone most precious, as if a jasper-stone, clear as crystal' (λίθω ἰάσπιδι κρυστάλλίζοντι).

The description is suggested by G's rendering of Is. 54 12 (see below), 'I will make thy battlements jasper (ἰάσπις), and thy gates stones of crystal (λίθους κρυστάλλου), and thy rampart choice stones' (λίθ. ἐκλεκτούς), where the writer of Rev. seems to have supposed that both the phrases 'stones of crystal' and 'choice stones' were synonymous with and explanatory of 'jasper' (see, however, TOPAZ).

In Ex. 28 20 39 13, 𐤎𐤍𐤏, yāšpēh (= ἰάσπις) is apparently rendered in G by όνύχιον (but see below); but the onyx, not being a clear stone, cannot be meant in Rev. 21 11. Nor can our jasper be intended, as it is not sparkling nor translucent, but an opaque, close-grained variety of quartz, variously tinted, but generally either red or brown.' It is probable, however, that the jasper of the ancients included the opal, which, by its brilliance and play of colour, has always been one of the most attractive of precious stones, and in its choicest variety (see Plin. H.N. 37 21 f.) deserves in the highest degree the description in Rev. 21 11.

This is the view of O. Fraas, who states that the modern conception of the jasper first became general in the seventeenth century, and that in the Nibelungenlied the jasper is represented as clear, and as greener than grass.

The choice opal is said to occur frequently in ancient Egyptian tombs; in particular, a splendid statuette of Isis, made of opal, is referred to.¹ This view is also favoured by the description of the divine king on his throne in Rev. 4 3 as 'like a jasper stone and a sardius,' and by the combination of 'jasper' with 'pure gold' and 'clear glass' in Rev. 21 18. (With the reference to 'jasper' as garnishing the foundation in v. 19, cp Sargon's description [Khors. 159] of the foundation of his palace on gold, silver, and ašpū stones, etc.) See PRECIOUS STONES.

The Heb. 𐤎𐤍𐤏 (= ἰάσπις) occurs in Ex. 28 20 39 13, Ezek. 28 13 f. It is not impossible that the order of the precious stones in G's text was different, and that όνύχιον was intended as the equivalent of 𐤎𐤍𐤏, yakāšōm, and ἰάσπις of 𐤎𐤍𐤏. Thus G's rendering will become consistent. In Is. 54 12 G's ἰάσπις (Symm. καρχηδόνιον) seems to be a version of 𐤎𐤍𐤏, kudhkōdh, (so Aq., Ezek. 27 16),² but it may be merely a guess, for elsewhere (Ezek. 27 16) G does not recognise this word (see CHALCEDONY, 1, end). L 7), and historically connected in 1 S. 30 27 with the period of David's outlawry (γελθθρ 3 [B]); cp IRA, 3; ITHRITES, JABEZ.

³ The γελ in 1 S. 30 29 [B] appears to be a duplicate of this corruption (cp ΗΜΤΑΗ, ΣΙΗΜΟΤΗ).

It is plain that Jattir must be the modern 'Attir (Rob. BR 2 194), which is situated on two knolls 'in an amphitheatre of brown rocky hills, studded with natural caves' (Tristram, Land of Israel, 388), and is 13 m. S. by W. from Hebron. The change of y into y in the name is not incapable of explanation; y may first have passed into z, and then z into y (Kampffmeyer, ZDPT 16 45). No doubt this is the place intended (OS 119 27 133 3 134 24 255 78 266 42 268 87) by the 'very large village Jethira, 20 R. m. SE. of Eleuthero-polis, in the interior of the Daroma hard by Malatha' (see MOLADAI). In two passages (OS 119 27 255 78) it is assigned to Simeon, perhaps by a confusion with ETHER (q.v.).

JAVAN (𐤎𐤍𐤏)—i.e., the Ionians, or the Greeks.

(a) In the Table of Peoples Javan appears as one of the sons of Japheth, and father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim or Rodanim, Gen. 10 2-11 Ch. 1 5 7 (ἰωαν [BADE], ἰωαν Gen., ἰωαν Ch. [L]). This statement comes from P; it is therefore not pre-exilic. There is in fact no pre-exilic reference to the Greeks, though see on the other side M'Curdy (Hist. Proph. Mon. 1 416), who refers to Zech. 9 13, Joel 3 [4] 4-6, and even, for a 'not obscure allusion,' to Hos. 11 10. The text of Hos. l.c., however, is not quite in order; instead of the obscure 𐤎𐤍𐤏, 'from the sea,' we should probably read 𐤎𐤍𐤏, 'from Aram' (cp c).

(b) In Joel 3 [4] 6 'the sons of the Javanites' (EV Grecians, τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν Ἑλλήνων [BNAQ]) are spoken of as purchasing Jewish captives from the Phœnicians and Philistines, but the Persian date of JOEL (q.v.) is not often disputed.

(c) In Zech. 9 13 Judah and Ephraim are represented as the instrument of Yahwè's vengeance against the 'sons of Javan' (τὰ τέκνα τῶν Ἑλλήνων [BNAQT]), who are contrasted with 'thy sons, O Zion.'

It is hard, however, to believe that the author of the prophetic composition to which Zech. 9 13 belongs (which, apart from its references to Hadrach, Hamath, etc., would at once appear to be post-exilic) would have mentioned the Greeks; this view seems hardly consistent with the archaising references. Clearly the writer wishes to produce the illusion of antiquity, and the name 'Javan' would at any rate not be conducive to this. The textual phenomena suggest that 𐤎𐤍𐤏 is either a corrupt or a mutilated name, or both; the author can scarcely have written 𐤎𐤍𐤏 and then, just after, 𐤎𐤍𐤏. The scribe who wrote the latter group of letters must have made a slip of the pen, and the true reading probably is 𐤎𐤍𐤏, 'the sons of Aram' (cp v. 1, and see HADRACH).

(d) In Ezek. 27 13 ('Ελλάς [BAQ]; Symm. 'Ιωνία) Javan is described (as in Joel) as engaged in slave-traffic in the market of Tyre; the name stands between Tarshish and Tubal, the latter in Gen. 10 2 Javan's next brother, the former in Gen. 10 4 his second son.

(e) In Is. 66 19 'Javan' ('Ελλάς [BNAQ]) occurs in a gloss enumerating the 'far-off countries' which will hear of Yahwè's future glorious manifestation.

(f) In Dan. 8 21 10 20 11 2 we hear of the 'king,' the 'prince,' and the 'kingdom of Javan' ('Ελληνες [Theod. 87]); the reference is to the Græco-Macedonian empire—an expansion of the original conception, which identified Javan with the important Ionian colonies in Asia Minor.

(g) The only remaining reference (not counting the imaginary one in Ps. 123 4) is in Ezek. 27 18 (καὶ οἶνον [BAQ; Q also has ἰωνηλ, whilst Aq. has ἰεων]), where Javan, with Dan [AV] or Vedan [RV], appears a second time among Tyre's traffickers. 'Dan' and 'Javan,' however, are both corrupt. For 𐤎𐤍𐤏 Cornill ingeniously reads 𐤎𐤍𐤏, and the passage becomes, 'wine of HELBON [q.v.], and Šimin, and Arnaban they furnished for thy traffic.' But more probably we should read, not 'and Šimin and Arnaban,' but 'and wool of Hauran' (see WOOL).

The scantiness of the extant pre-exilic literature does not permit us to deny that the Israelites may have heard of the Ionians from the Phœnicians or the Syrians in pre-exilic times. We may even admit this to be probable. The fact, however—if it is a fact—possesses very little significance, unless indeed M'Curdy's statement (Hist. Proph. Mon. 2418) can be proved, that 'Grecian immigrants had settled in Philistia' in the time of Sargon,¹ and 'formed an influential class in Ashdod.' All, however, that can safely be said is, that the adventurer called Yamani or Yatni, who displaced the king of Ashdod appointed by Sargon, came from Cyprus (see ASHDOD). The real origin of the Assyrian name for Cyprus is obscure; it seems to have been popularly explained as 'the Ionian island.' Whether the upstart who provoked Sargon's wrath was an Ionian or a Phoenician by race, we cannot tell. Still less can we assert that immigrants of the same race as Yamani had settled in Philistia. An original and ingenious view of Flinders Petrie² also deserves mention. This explorer is of opinion that between 607 and 587 B.C. there was a constant intercourse between the men of Judah and the Greek frontier garrison at Tahpanhes (Daphnae). They would thus obtain a far more vivid conception of Ionians than had formerly been possible. The view is not unpalatable, even if we cannot admit that it justifies an early date for Dan. 3.

The Ionians are only once expressly referred to in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions: Sargon calls them 'the Javanites who are in the middle of the sea' (cp הַיָּוִנִים הַיָּם, and says that he 'drew them out like fishes' (COT 163; KB 243; Del. Par. 248). It is in the cuneiform inscriptions of Darius that we find the next mention of Javan; Darius certainly means by this, not Greece proper, but the Ionian colonies of Asia Minor. The contact of Egypt with the Ionians (Yevan, Yevanu, etc.) began much earlier. The Ionians are referred to by name in the epic of Rameses II. among the allies of the Hëtä.

JAVELIN. 1. RV has improved several interesting passages by substituting 'javelin' for AV's 'spear' (e.g., Josh. 8 18 26 Job 41 29 [21]). The kidôn, קִידוֹן, kidôn, was shorter than the חַנִּית, hänith. In Eccles. 46 2 RV keeps 'sword' (δομφαλα); but a version based where possible on the Hebrew text would give 'javelin' (כִּיּוּרִין). We now know that Ben Sira quotes accurately from Josh. 8 18. Inconsistently RV gives 'spear' in Jer. 50 42; see Jer. 6 23 (and cp DAGGER, 2). Most lexicographers would support RV's statement that Goliath had 'a javelin of brass between his shoulders' (1 S. 17 6; AV 'shield'). This is really very doubtful (see 5). In Job 39 23, however, 'javelin' rightly takes the place of 'shield' (it is coupled with 'spear').

2. AV also renders חַנִּית, hänith (1 S. 18 10 f. 20 33), and רֹמַח, rōmah (Nu. 25 7), 'javelin'; but RV rightly prefers 'spear.' In Ezek. 39 9 AV reads 'javelins' for מַקְלֵל, maqḥāl, 'staff,' or rather 'stick' (see STAFF).

3. In Job 41 21 [29] AV's 'darts' (תֹּחוֹת) is better than RV's 'clubs' (σφύρα). Read תַּרְתָּחִים (tartāḥim), 'javelin' = Ass. tartāḫu, 'leichter Wurfspieß' (Del. Ass. HWB 630d). תַּרְתָּחִים, tartāḥim, should also be read in Ps. 55 22 [21] and Mic. 5 5 [6], for תַּחֲחוֹת, tāḥḥōt, and תַּחֲחִיק, tāḥḥiq, as the name of a star (Antares?) in Job 38 36.

4. In Ps. 35 3, וַיִּבְרַח (ūšēgōḥ), 'and stop the way' (EV) should most probably be וַיִּשְׁכַּח (ūšēkōḥ), 'and javelin' (cp RVmg. 'battle-axe'). Before giving up a passage like this as hopeless, or venturing on a mere makeshift, it is a duty to refer to the Assyrian vocabulary. Here we find šukudu, a synonym of tartāḫu (Del. op. cit. 630 b, 656 a). For a less plausible view see Hal. Rev. Sem. 3 47.

5. In 1 S. 17 6 Klostermann deserves credit for showing that the brazen piece of armour (MT, בִּירוֹן, ḥ āpōis?) between

² Nefeshah and Defenneh (Eg. Expl. Fund), 49 f.

³ Aquila renders בִּירוֹן ḥāpōis in Job 41 29 [21] Jer. 6 23; Symmachus in Josh. 8 18 Jer. 6 23.

Goliath's shoulders, which AV renders 'target' and RV 'javelin,' must have been for defence, not for attack. Exegetical fairness requires us either to endeavour to emend בִּירוֹן, or at least to recognise the corruption of the text by putting asterisks instead of a rendering. But בִּירוֹן (Klo.) can hardly mean an oval, concave, metal plate. Possibly בִּירוֹן should be בִּירָן, and rendered 'protection' (Ass. kidānu, 'protection'; see Del. Ass. HWB 318 a; Muss-Arnolt, Ass. Dict. 373 a).¹

JAWBONE, ASS'S. One of the exploits of Samson is connected in legend with an ass's jawbone, an extemporised weapon. Judg. 15 15 is rendered thus in RV:

And he found a new jawbone of an ass, and put forth his hand, and took it, and smote a thousand men therewith.

An old jawbone would have been too light and brittle for the purpose. Of the punning poetical speech which is attached, the following is a plausible rendering:

With the jawbone of the red one (i.e., an ass) I have reddened them;

With the jawbone of the red one I have smitten a thousand men.

Hence the legend explained the origin of the name Lehi. Criticism, however, has to go behind the legend and investigate its origin. Both LEHI (q.v.) and Onugnathus seem to presuppose a myth which was common to the Danites and the Phoenicians. This myth was probably derived from Babylonia. The mythic weapon of Marduk (a kind of spear or javelin—i.e., lightning) is described in Creation Tablet, 430 (Jensen, Kosmol. 280 f.) as kakku tā māḥra, 'peerless weapon.' The myth containing this phrase was probably preserved at the sanctuary of Šamašan (Beth-shemesh); the popular speech would easily convert it into lēhi ḥāmōr. Steinthal has already noted the stress laid on throwing the jawbone (cp Ps. 18 14 [15]) in Judg. 15 17.

In v. 16 read וַיִּבְרַח הַקְּרָקִים (so Moore; cp Ḥ). Doorninck and Budde connect the verb וַיִּבְרַח with Ar. ḥanara, in the sense of 'shave, flay.' But hanara also means 'to be red,' and this sense is supported by קִר II. (Job 16 16). So Zenger, Zt. f. kath. Theol., '88, p. 257, comparing Arabic poetical passages in We. Shizzen, 144 5 and 188 13 ('84). Moore, however, comparing וַיִּבְרַח, 'heap,' renders 'I have piled them in heaps,' or (SBOT) 'I assailed my assailants.' T. K. C.

JAZER (יָזַר, יָזַר [1 Ch. I, Ἰαζαρ], or Jaazer (Nu. 21 32 32 35 AV; in 1 Macc. 58 Ἰαζην [A] Jazar), a place E. of the Jordan, occupied by the Gadites (Nu. 32 35 Josh. 13 25 1 Ch. 6 81 [66], Γαζερ [B], Γαζηρ [A], Ἰαζεῖρον [L]), but previously by the Amorites (Nu. 21 32). It lay on the border towards the land of the Ammonites in a fertile region of pastures and vineyards called 'the land of Jazer,' and had dependent villages (Nu. 21 24 2 [Ḥ] 32 32 1 Is. 168 Jcr. 48 32³), which, like itself, were taken by Judas the Maccabee (1 Macc. 5 7 f., cp Jos. Ant. xii. 81). P idealistically reckons it among the Levitical cities (Josh. 21 39 [37]), and the Chronicler tells of Levites at Jazer in the fortieth year of the reign of David (1 Ch. 26 31 γαζερ [B]; cp 2 S. 24 5 ελιεζερ [B], ελιαζερ [A], εζεζερ [L]).

Eusebius and Jerome (OS⁽²⁾) describe it as 10 R. m. W. from Philadelphia, 15 from Heshbon, and as situated at the source of a large stream (μέγιστος ποταμός) which falls into the Jordan. Elsewhere (OS⁽²⁾ 212 27) Eusebius calls the city Azer, and makes it 8 R. m. W. from Philadelphia. A place with ruins bearing the name of Sār or Šār, which Seetzen discovered in 1808,⁴ is now usually connected with Jazer (so, e.g., Baed.⁽³⁾ 173; Ges. Lex. (13), s.v. יָזַר; Merrill, in Hastings' DI 2 553 b; cp Porter, in Kitto's Bib. Cycl.). It is on the S. of the Wādy Šir, on the road leading westward from 'Ammān. In spite of Merrill's enthusiastic description, however, the identification is to be rejected, (1) because the sibilants of Šār and Jazer do not correspond, and above all, (2) because there is no large stream, such as the statement of Eusebius requires. Hence we are led to suppose that Eusebius has confounded the Jordan with the Jabbok. Oliphant (Land of Gilead, 235 ff.) points out the ruins of a populous Roman city (which no doubt succeeded earlier cities) in the Wādy Zorbi, which falls into the Wādy Zerka (Jabbok). The place would be 8-10 R. m. N. of Philadelphia. It is called Yājūz, and is a little to the W. of el-Jubeihāt, the ancient JOGBEHAH [g.v.]. That these two places were near together is evident from Nu. 3235. In the centre of the Wādy Zorbi is a copious fountain (the 'Ain el-Ghazāl), soon after passing which the stream becomes large enough for irrigation, and so compares very favourably with the Wādy Šir. Indeed, between this point and the Zerka the country in spring is 'an expanse of waving crops,' and the wādy is well adapted for vine culture (Oliphant, 233-236). The rival combination (E. Pal. Survey, 119) with Beit Zera, not far to the NE. of Heshbon and a little beyond el-'Al (ELEALEH), is opposed not only to the statement of Eusebius, but also to Nu. 3235; nor is it really favoured by Is. 168, for יַעֲזֹר, 'as far as Jazer,' implies that Heshbon and Jazer are rather far apart.¹ Against Oliphant's alternative theory—that Yājūz may be Jahaz—see JAHAZ.

JEALOUSY, ORDEAL OF. In cases of suspected guilt which were involved in uncertainty or were of extreme gravity, means were very generally taken in antiquity to obtain a direct decision of the deity. In Europe, down to beyond the limits of the Middle Ages the custom is found to have prevailed, and even at the present day the same thing is seen in the less civilized parts of the world. In the OT we have frequent references to one means which the Hebrews adopted for this purpose, viz., the sacred lot (see URIM AND THUMMIM); but we have only one clear record that they also adopted another widely-spread custom—the ordeal. The common element in all ordeals is one of risk—e.g., of being burnt by walking over hot stones or ploughshares, or by thrusting the arms into molten lead or of receiving injury from noxious potions—and the common belief that underlies them is that the deity will preserve the innocent from the injurious effects which will befall the guilty.

The one case in which extant Hebrew law provides for a resort to the ordeal is that of a woman suspected of unfaithfulness to her husband. This procedure is described in Nu. 511-31 [P]. In spite of the uniqueness of the law and of the fact that the Hebrew narratives record no instance of its adoption, there are indications that (at least) in earlier times, ordeals were more frequent among the Hebrews. Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem. (2) 181) accounts for the origin of the names 'Ēn-Mishpāt = 'well of judgment,' and Mē Mēribah = 'waters of controversy,' by the supposition that the well at Kadesh was regularly used for purposes of the ordeal; Stade (ZATW 15178 [95]) adduces reasons for concluding that the case of suspected marital infidelity was not the only one in which 'the memorial meal offering bringing guilt to remembrance' (Nu. 515) was offered. It has been supposed that Ps. 109186 contains a reference to the water of ordeal; possibly also Prov. 627-29 refers to other forms of ordeal (note מִיָּזִיז in v. 29 and cp Nu. 519). Cp also Nu. 1616 ff.

The points to be considered are (1) the conditions of the ordeal, (2) the accompanying offering, (3) the character of the ordeal itself.

1. The ordeal is to be resorted to when a man is jealous of his wife, but is unable to produce either the witnesses required for an ordinary process at law (Dt. 1915 Nu. 3530) or other evidence of her guilt (cp Ex. 2213 [12] Dt. 2215)—vv. 12-14.

2. When the man brings his wife to the priest (v. 15) or before Yahwē (v. 30)—i.e., to the door of the tabernacle (in the case of Herod's temple, according to Sōtā 15, to the Nikanor door)—he has to bring with him an offering which is described as 'her offering for her' (קִרְבָּנָהּ עֲלֶיהָ), v. 15. This has been understood to mean that the woman makes an offering (of the nature of a trespass-offering) of material provided by her husband. This, however, is unlikely, for the offering is made before the question of the woman's guilt or innocence is decided. More probably it is the man who offers (in accordance with the general law that no one must seek Yahwē's face 'empty'—i.e., without an offering), and the above phrase means 'the offering which concerns her, is on her account.' To symbolise, however, the connection of the offering with the woman, it is placed in her hands—v. 18 (cp Lev. 827). The material of the offering is noticeable: it consists of one-tenth ephah of barley meal—the commoner and cheaper flour (2 K. 71 Rev. 66)—and is not to be mingled with either oil or frankincense (v. 15). The latter provision applies likewise to the poor man's sin-offering which also consists of the same small quantity (Lev. 511), but even in that case, as in the case of every other offering in P, barley meal is expressly excluded by the insistence on the more expensive 'fine meal.' Probably this is merely an isolated survival (which is capable of obvious explanation) in the late law-books of an earlier freedom (cp Judg. 619 1 S. 124) to use in all cases any kind of meal.

At any rate we must discard the explanation, practically endorsed by many moderns (e.g., Bähr, Keil, Winer), attributed in the Mishna to R. Gamaliel—'as her acts had been bestial, so her offering consisted of the food of beasts' (Sōtā, 21).

One other element in the ritual has been taken, and with more reason, to symbolise the woman's shame—viz., the loosening of the hair (v. 18).

3. Other ceremonies. Robertson Smith (RS (2) 181) from the Kitāb al-'Aḡānī, i. 1563 ff., where a suspected wife is carried to Mecca, to take oaths of purgation, seated on a camel between two bags of dung. According to Sōtā 15 the upper part of the woman's body was also stripped—a proceeding which could have had only one significance. On the other hand, the mere loosening of the hair (together with the wearing of black garments) was, at least somewhat later, customary on the part of persons accused before the Sanhedrin of any crime (Jos. Ant. xiv. 49; cp Zech. 33).

3. The actual ordeal consisted of drinking a specially prepared potion (vv. 17 24); if the woman be innocent, the potion is harmless, and thus proves

4. The ordeal itself. her innocence; if she be guilty, the potion causes injury to her thigh and belly—the members instrumental to her act of sin (27 f.). This potion consists of 'holy water'—i.e., water hallowed from having been standing in the sacred laver (Mishna, Targ.), rather than 'running water' (⊕) from the temple spring—with which is mingled dust from the floor of the tabernacle, and into which are washed the written words of the curse. For the risk of coming into contact with 'holy water' or receiving it into one's system, we have many parallels in the Semitic domain as well as elsewhere (WRS loc. cit.); for the use of the dust, fewer; but this also being taken from the sanctuary must be regarded as holy, and the fusion of it with the water as a means of increasing the holiness and, consequently, the efficacy of the potion. Reference is often made in this connection to Gen. 314 Is. 4923 Mic. 717 Ps. 729; but the parallels are not obviously to the point. Probably the combined use of water and dust has arisen from the fusion of two originally distinct rites; and possibly the use of the dust originated in necromantic customs. The explanation of the washing of the curse into the water must be sought in the belief in the efficacy of the oath and the independent existence of the words of it (cp OATH, and Goldziher, Abh. zur Arab. Phil. 26-41); the connection with oaths of purgation (Ex. 22:10 [9]f.) is also close. The potion has to be mixed in an earthenware vessel (v. 17), which probably had to be destroyed immediately after use (cp Lev. 6:28 [27] 11:33 15:12); cp CLEAN, § 2.

One point that is not clearly stated in the OT narrative is the time within which the potion takes effect; probably the effect was expected to be immediate—in any case, within a much shorter time than the two or even three years which the Mishna allows (Sotā, 34).

The text of the section (Nu. 5:11-31) presents difficulties which Stade (ZATW 15:166-178 [195]) has attributed to literary fusion of distinct rituals;

5. Text of but his analysis is unconvincing. The only Nu. 5:11-31. question of serious importance here is the relation of v. 24 to vv. 26b 27. The only natural view of v. 24 ff. is that the woman drinks before the offering is made (v. 26); but 26b distinctly states that she drinks afterwards. Since the assumption that she drinks twice is unnatural, our only alternatives are to follow Stade or to regard v. 24 as textually intrusive.

In their note on Nu. 5:11-31 seen since the foregoing was written, Carpenter and Harford-Battersby (Hex. 2:191 f.) adopt Stade's analysis with some modifications. According to them the section, in which 'it will be seen by the frequency of the harmonist's phrases that the fusion has been fairly complete', results from the fusion of (a) a condemnation (vv. 11 12 13a 13c 15 18 21 23 24 27b 25b 26 31) and (b) an ordeal (vv. 20 13b 30a 14b 30b 16 f. 19 f. 22 25 26b 27 28). In the case of the condemnation, the woman's 'guilt needs no demonstration, but only draws down on her the priestly doom.' But (1) according to the analysis a (see 12b 13a c) as well as b presupposes an offence unprovable by ordinary process of law, that is to say, presupposes circumstances such as those under which ordeals are generally resorted to; the crime is one which has been committed without the knowledge of the husband or any other witness. (2) The proceedings with the waters of bitterness correspond to proceedings in the case of ordeal, but have no analogy in the Hebrew law with regard to clearly proved cases of adultery, for which an entirely different punishment was provided (MARRIAGE, § 4). Into the linguistic distinctions, admirably presented by Carpenter and Harford-Battersby in their note, it is impossible to enter here; but literary analysis in the present instance, even if justifiable, appears too uncertain to be of material importance for the subject of this article.

Of the OT archaeologies see especially Nowack, 2:249-253; of the Commentaries (on Nu. 5:11 f.), Dillmann and Internal Crit. Com. On the text, etc., see Stade's article cited above. For ethnic parallels cp Taylor's article 'Ordeal' in *EB*⁹; Burckh. Bedouins and Wahabys, 1:121 f.

Theod.]), as the text stands, is the name given by David to Solomon after a visit of the prophet Nathan (2 S. 12:25). It has been remarked elsewhere, however (see BATHSHEBA, col. 503, top; DAVID, col. 1032, foot), that the narrative in 2 S. 11:1-12:25 has passed through an amplifying process in the interests of edification; originally Solomon was not represented as the son of a penitent reconciled by Nathan's instrumentality to his offended God.

In the earlier form of the story 2 S. 12:15^b must have followed 11:27 (so Schwally). The original form of vv. 24 f., however, is still undetermined (see We., Dr., Klo., Ki., Bu., Löhr, H. P. Smith). Wellhausen (cp Löhr and Bu.) thinks it enough to read יוֹשִׁיָּא or יוֹשִׁיָּא, 'and he entrusted him to the care of the prophet Nathan, and he (David) called him Jedidiah'; while Grätz and H. P. Smith prefer to connect the last two words of v. 24 with v. 25—'And Yahwè loved him, and sent by the hand of the prophet Nathan,' etc. These expedients, however, are but palliations of the evil, which needs a more radical cure. The truth seems to be that 1127a was originally followed by the naming of the son born to Bathsheba after Uriah's death. We may suppose with S. A. Cook, that 1224δ ('and he called [יְהוֹדָה] Kt.; but יְהוֹדָה Kr.) his name Solomon') once followed immediately upon 1127a,¹ and that Jedidiah, the name given by Nathan (?) to the child Solomon, was the symbolical expression of the reconciliation between David and his God. It is equally possible, however, that the words relative to the naming of the child spoken of, which originally stood in 1127, were, and he called his name Jedidiah. The words יְהוֹדָה אָהָבָה, which have puzzled critics not a little, seem to be a first miswritten and then manipulated form of the words בְּעֶבֶר יִירָדָה (again miswritten at the end of v. 25, as בעֶבֶר יְהוֹה). When the words, 'And he called his name Jedidiah,' were transposed to v. 25, they received the awkward but necessary prefix, 'And he sent by Nathan the prophet,'² the corrupt words at the end of v. 24 having already been converted into 'and Yahwè loved him.' The editor seems to suppose a second and more pleasing visit of Nathan.

² So first Thénius; cp Vg., misitque cum in manu.

If the last of the theories mentioned above be accepted, the narrative originally ran thus:—

'And when the mourning was past, David sent and fetched her to his house, and she became his wife, and bare him a son, and he called his name Jedidiah. But the thing that David had done displeased Yahwè, and Yahwè struck the child that Uriah's wife had borne to David, and it was very sick. . . . And David comforted his wife Bathsheba, . . . and she bore a son, and he called his name Shillumo³ (שִׁלְמוֹ), i.e., his compensation, because of Jedidiah.'

Now all becomes clear; the corruptions of the text are healed and accounted for, and an intelligible narrative is produced. Solomon remains Bathsheba's second son. He lacks the religious interest attaching to the son of a penitent saint, but he gains the human interest attaching to the child of a deeply afflicted father. 'He called his name "his compensation," with reference to the lost Jedidiah.' See SOLOMON.

In 2 S. 12 25^b Ⓞ and Theod. read בְּכֶרֶךְ יְהוֹה instead of יהוה בעֶבֶר which Klo., and HPSm., following Cappel (Crit. Sac. 265), adopt. The harder reading, however, should be the nearer to the original. T. K. C.

They offer as the vowel of the second syllable ε [B] or ι [AL], but cp ιδουμ (2 Ch. 35 15 Ⓞ^B), ιδουον (1 Ch. 16 38 Ⓞ^N). ou occurs only in εδουαν [A], εδουθουον [L] (1 Ch. 9 16). The renderings for the last syllable vary between -ου-, -ου-, and -ουμ, rarely -ουμ. Possibly יְדוּתָן should be restored for the surprising יְדוּתָן in the heading of Ps. 45. That the heading also refers the psalm to the Korahites is no objection (see PSALMS).

Jeduthun is no doubt the favourite form of MT, but the versions as a general rule favour 'Jedithun,' which may be correct (see below). It is the name of one of the great guilds of temple singers; its supposed founder is mentioned with ASAPH (3), and HEMAN in 1 Ch. 25 1 6 2 Ch. 5 12 35 15 (where Jeduthun is called the 'king's seer'), and with the latter alone in 1 Ch. 16 47. It is remarkable that, so regarded, he takes the place of ETHAN (q.v.). Jeduthun (Jedithun) is mentioned

2. Explanation 'לְיָד'; in 62 and 77 'לְיָד' is the form of the name.

The preposition עַל led Ewald to suppose that a peculiar musical mode was designated by Jeduthun. Robertson Smith, too, regards the name as not in any sense personal but a musical term, which by a strange transformation became the name of a chief singer (*OT/C*², 143, where the odd names given in 1 Ch. 25 4 are adduced as parallels).

It is natural to suspect a connection with הַיְהוּדָה (cp Neh. 12 8, and see CHOR, § 2),¹ but not easy to suggest a plausible etymological theory. Or one might take Jedithun to be an abbreviation of Jehudithun, an artificial form suggesting the devotion of the guild of 'Jedithun' to a specially Jewish type of music (cp Grätz's theory of 'Gitith' and see JESHURUN).

Lagarde's view, however, is more plausible than any of these hypotheses; according to this, the name is a corruption of Ethan, produced through the combination of יָד 'hands of' with the personal name Ethan (Uebers. 121).

If so, 'Jedithun' will be the correct form, and עַל not לְ the right preposition in the musical directions; עַל יְהוּדָה will be a contracted form of עַל יְהוּדָה 'to be performed (or, preserved) through (or by) the guild of Ethan.' That the editor of Chronicles, in the form in which we have it, regarded Jeduthun as a synonym of Ethan may be admitted; in other words, he did not understand the name. T. K. C.—S. A. C.

B), v. 25 (יואח [B]). The Syrian oppression brought Israel's power very low in his time ; it was left for JEROBOAM II. to repair the mischief. We may assume, however, that the success of Rammān-nirari III. against Mari', king of Damascus, was not without some good result for Israel. Whitehouse (Schr. COT 2 324), M'Curdy (Hist. Proph. Mon. 1 300), and Winckler even think that Rammān-nirari III. is the 'saviour' spoken of in 2 K. 13 5. See, however, JEROBOAM, 2.

3. JOACHAZ or JECHONIAS, 1 Esd. 1 34, יεχωνιας [B], יואחז [A] ; ZARAKES, 1 Esd. 1 38 ζαρκος [B], ζαρακης [AL]. Jehoahaz, son of Josiah, succeeded his father on the throne of Judah in 608 B.C. and reigned for three months, 2 K. 23 31-33 2 Ch. 36 1-3 (יואחז [A in 2 K. 23 34], - § [BAL in 2 Ch.]). In Jer. 22 11 he is called Shallum. This was probably his birth-name, which he exchanged for the name 'Jehoahaz' when he was anointed. It is much less natural to suppose that 'Shallum' is used ironically (like 'Zimri' in 2 K. 9 31), as if Jehoahaz were called 'the second Shallum,' one whose reign was almost as short as that of Shallum¹ (2 K. 15 13). This conclusion, however, will not justify us in following the MT of 1 Ch. 3 15, where four sons are given to Josiah, one of whom is an otherwise unknown Johanan, and another is Shallum. The Chronicler who calls Jehoahaz's successor Jehoiakim (not Eliakim) would certainly have called Jehoahaz by his crown-name, not by his (supposed) birth-name. Shallum, therefore, in

1 Ch. 3 15 is derived from Jer. 22 11 ; the Chronicler failed to see that Shallum and Jehoahaz were the same person. Johanan in 1 Ch. l.c. is miswritten for 'Jehoahaz' (cp G and see JOHANAN, 10) or else an editor has altered 'Joahaz' into 'Johanan' to cover over the Chronicler's mistake. At RIBLAH on the Orontes Jehoahaz was put in chains by Necho, and sent to Egypt. See Jer. 22 10-12 Ezek. 19 3 f., and cp JEHOIAKIM.

The nineteenth king of Judah. He succeeded his father Jehoiakim in 597 B.C. at the age of eighteen (2 K. 24 8 || 1 Esd. 1 43 JOACIM, RV JOAKIM, יואכיμ [BAL]),¹ and after a brief reign of three months ('and ten days,' 1 Esd. 1 43) surrendered to Nebuchadrezzar, by whom he was carried captive to Babylon, with his mother, his generals, and his troops, together with the artificers and other inhabitants of Jerusalem, to the number of 10,000. He remained in confinement there as long as Nebuchadrezzar lived ; but the next king, Evil-merodach, not only released him, but gave him an honourable seat at his own table, with precedence over all his royal companions in misfortune, and 'a continual provision' (2 K. 25 27-30 Jer. 52 31-34). The writer of the pathetic passage at the close of Kings evidently regards Jehoiachin as the legitimate king even in his exile ; so too does Ezekiel, who dates his great vision with reference to Jehoiachin's captivity (Ezek. 1 2), and writes in moving terms of this event (Ezek. 19 9). Cp Meyer, Entst. 78.

JEHOIADA (יְהוֹיָדָה), 'Yahwē knows' ; see JOIADA, and cp Jedaiah, Jediael, etc. ; ωδαε [BNL], ωδαδ. [A].

1. The chief priest² who (temp. Athaliah) by his promptness and energy rescued Judah from becoming a mere appendage of the northern Israelitish kingdom, directed by the dynasty of Omri, 2 K. 11 4 (יואδαε [A]) and in 127 f. 12 2 [3] f. 2 Ch. 23 f. (in 24 2 was [B* mg. b] by confusion with the preceding name in the same verse). Both our historical accounts (see JOASH i., 1) represent Jehoiada as the soul of the revolution, and we can well understand that he was virtually ruler during the minority of Joash. The king did not, however, remain the tool of his tutor ; in the twenty-third year of the reign of Joash we find the king administering a rebuke to Jehoiada and the priests (2 K. 12 7 [8], cp 2 Ch. 24 6). According to the Chronicler, Jehoiada married two wives, one of whom was JEHOAHABEATH, daughter of king Jehoram, grandfather of Joash (2 Ch. 22 11 יואדה [A], 24 3).

In a letter ascribed to a prophet named Shemaiah we find (Jer. 29 25) Zephaniah and the other priests at Jerusalem (temp. Zedekiah) represented as occupying the place of 'Jehoiada the priest,' so far as related to the supervision of persons who claimed to be prophets. The phrase reminds us of Mt. 23 2 ('the scribes . . . sit in Moses' seat') ; 'Jehoiada' represents the principle of sacerdotal superiority to prophecy.

In 1 Ch. 12 27 he is called 'leader of AARON' (γ. v., n. 1)—i.e., of the Aaronites (τωαδαι [B], -δαι [N], ιωα. [A], ωαδα [L]), cp DAVID, § 11 [iii].

JEHOIAKIM ¹ (יהויקים), 'Yahwè raiseth up,' § 31; cp JOIAKIM, JOKIM; ΙΩΔΑΚ[Ε]ΙΜ, [BNAQL], also ΙΩΚΕΙΜ [A in 2 K. 24 6], ΙΟΔΑΚΕΙΝ [L in 2 K. 24 19], ΙΕΧΟΝΙΑ [A in Jer. 22 24]), at first called ELIAKIM (γ. v. 2), eighteenth king of Judah, son of Josiah and ZEBUDAH (2 K. 23 36 2 Ch. 36 4 ff.; JOACIM, RV JOAKIM, 1 Esd. 1 37 ff.; JOACHIM, RV JOAKIM, Bar. 1 3). He succeeded his deposed brother Jehohaz as the nominee of Pharaoh-Necho, at the same time receiving the new name of Jehoiakim (probably suggested by the priests) from his suzerain (cp 2 K. 24 17). Jehoiakim showed his gratitude by pursuing an Egyptian policy as long as he could. His first object was to collect the tribute imposed by Necho (2 K. 23 35; cp 15 20). The royal treasure being probably much reduced, he had to 'exact the silver and gold of each one according to his taxation,'² which almost inevitably led to much oppression of the poor (cp HOSHEA, 1). It is surprising that Jehoiakim should, in such circumstances, have shown a passion for regal magnificence. By forced labour, as Jeremiah tells us (22 13 f.), he built a spacious bouse, ceiled with cedar and painted with vermilion, thus vying with Ahaz or with Ahab (see AHAB, § 8), according to two of the ancient readings of this difficult passage (v. 15). Of what use, cries the prophet, is this ill-gotten magnificence? Will vying with former kings be any security to him in the day of trouble? Or rather—for the text certainly needs emendation—'wilt thou continue to reign, because thou makest a nest in choice cedars?'³ And then, reverting at the close to this love of cedar-wood, he cries to the royal family in the palace (v. 23), 'Thou that dwellest in a Lebanon, that hast a nest on the cedars, how wilt thou groan when pangs come upon thee—the pangs of those who are being led into the presence of a ruthless conqueror? We have no document equally trustworthy with this prophecy for the character of Jehoiakim. That the morality of the nobles was on a par with that of the king appears from other prophecies of Jeremiah, and when a prophet named URIAH ventured to rebuke Jehoiakim, the king slew the messenger of God and dishonoured his dead body (Jer. 26 20). Jeremiah and Baruch narrowly escaped the same fate (Jer. 36 26); with horror the biographer of the prophet relates that the king cut and burned with his own hands the sacred roll of prophecy (Jer. 36 23).⁴

The chronology of the close of Jehoiakim's reign is uncertain. According to 2 K. 24 1 he paid tribute to Nebuchadrezzar for three years, and then rebelled. Since a Babylonian army did not appear before Jerusalem till after Jehoiakim's death, it has been supposed that the three years referred to are the three last of Jehoiakim's life and reign—i.e., 600-598.⁵ But there are historical difficulties, which have been forcibly urged by Winckler (AT Unt. 81 ff.). Winckler himself makes the three years of Jehoiakim's fidelity to Babylon 605-603. The Chronicler says (2 Ch. 36 6 f.) that Nebuchadrezzar carried Jehoiakim to Babylon; but according to 2 K. 24 6 he died in peace at Jerusalem and in the LXX 2 Ch.

² RV makes the tribute-money exacted 'of (from) the people of the land.' But this gives the verb שָׁנַן a third accusative.

לְהָאֵרֶץ הַזֹּאת is a gloss on the expression אֶרֶץ הָאֵרֶץ ('the land') in the same verse, and is therefore to be deleted. Cp Klo., Ki.

1. b. Ahab, king of Israel after Ahaziah (852?-842). It was in his reign that, according to 2 K. 3 5 f.,

1. Moab. the Moabites revolted from the house of Omri, and we may at any rate infer that the Moabites had during the short reign of Ahaziah taken such reprisals on the Israelites that Jehoram could not safely neglect to give Israel's former vassals a lesson. Everything seemed to favour such an enterprise. In particular, Israel's most dangerous foes, the Syrians of Damascus, were prevented by the constant danger of a fresh Assyrian attack from renewing their old hostilities against the kingdom of Samaria. We do indeed hear, in 2 K. 6 f., of a siege of Samaria by

2. Siege of Samaria. the Syrians, which the editor evidently supposes to have taken place under Jehoram. This chronological assignment, however, improbable enough (for the reason mentioned just now) in itself, is probably shown to be a mistake by the mention of BENHADAD (γ. v., § 2) as the besieger of Samaria, and by the tradition that the host of Benhadad dispersed in a panic at the supposed approach of the kings of the Hittites and of Mizraim.

The Hittites are of course those of Northern Syria, and more especially perhaps of Hamath. 'Mizraim' must either be corrupt, or must, although generally the Hebrew word for Egypt, be the name of some people and country not far removed from the Hittites. Nor can we be long in doubt which alternative to adopt. For 'Mizraim' we should, both here and in 1 K. 10 28 f., 2 Ch. 1 16 f., read Misrim,—i.e., the Misri, who, in the inscriptions of Shalmaneser I. and Tiglath-pileser I., are referred to as dwelling on the borders of Northern Syria and Cappadocia, and in Shalmaneser II.'s time were still able to send 1000 warriors to the assistance of Bir'idri (Benhadad) at Karḳar (see MIZRAIM, § 2 a, and cp CLICIA, § 2, n. 2).

Now the only time when these two kingdoms (Hamath and Muṣri) would be dangerous or at least troublesome to the Syrians of Damascus would be that immediately preceding 854 B.C., while Shalmaneser was still occupied in Mesopotamia. The normal condition of these northern states was one of mutual jealousy; but for a moment the presence of a common danger united them; they combined, as we have seen, not without some beneficial results, at Karḳar.¹

The siege of Samaria referred to in 2 K. 6 f. was therefore not an event of the reign of Jehoram, nor (as Kue. Eint. § 25, n. 12, and Ki. Hist. 2 277, maintain) of that of Jehoahaz, but probably of that of Ahab.²

The narrative itself leaves the name of the king undetermined, though the mention of Elisha as contemporary with the siege shows that the circle in which this narrative originated did not suppose the king to have been Ahab.¹ Such a mistake would have been impossible in the royal annals, but was not so in a tradition told and retold often before it was committed to writing.

¹ See Hommel, GBA 610, n. 3; Winckler, AT Unt. 172; GI 1 151 f.; M'Curdy, Hist. Proph. Mon. 1409; and cp Schrader, KGF 254 f. The view of Wellhausen (CH 287) that the Hittites and the Egyptians are mentioned by mistake for the Assyrians, must therefore be abandoned. (Since this article was written the above view of מִצְרַיִם has been adopted also by Benz. and Ki.)

² Thus we have a duplicate tradition of the siege (1 K. 20 1-22, and 2 K. 6 24-7).

We now return to Jehoram's expedition against Moab. The narrative which describes it is not taken from the annals; like that of the siege of Samaria, it proceeds from popular tradition. It is possible enough that Elisha was consulted on the occasion; but some of the details present a suspicious resemblance to those of the departure of Ahab for Ramoth-gilead (cp 2 K. 3 11 f. with 1 K. 22 7-9), though at the same time there is a difference, for Elisha receives from Jehoram much more respect than Micaiah receives from Ahab. There is also one clearly inaccurate historical statement. There can have been no king of Edom at this period to accompany Jehoram and Jehoshaphat (see 1 K. 22 [47] 48 f., and cp 2 K. 8 20; see also EDMOM, § 7). That the Israelites really adopted the means of getting water described in 2 K. 3 16 f. 20, it would be rash to deny; their leaders were doubtless as well acquainted with the ground as modern travellers (see OTJC⁽²⁾ 147, and cp ELISHA, § 5).

The account of the havoc wrought by the invaders is trustworthy (see KIR-HARESETH). Nor is it clear why Winckler (GI 207) should doubt the historicity of Mesha's sacrifice of his firstborn (2 K. 3 27). The plague or some other physical calamity which befell Israel at the close of the expedition would perpetuate the memory of the awful sacrifice which preceded it. The original tradition appears to have stated that this calamity was caused by the wrath of the god of Moab at the invasion.² Israel's courage ebbed away, while Mesha's desperate act inspired the besieged with religious enthusiasm. They sallied from the fortress and drove the Israelites away. The honour of Moab and of Mesha was saved.

The cloud which hovered over Syria at this time was favourable to another warlike project of Jehoram—the recovery of the Gileadite cities for which Ahab had so bravely, but so vainly, fought. So the king of Israel summons his kinsman Ahaziah of Judah to attend him, as Jehoshaphat had attended him before, on the field of battle. Jehoram is wounded, and returns home to Jezreel, and Ahaziah goes to visit him. Thus Jehu ben Nimshi is left alone in command of the troops. How he is encouraged to seize the crown, is told elsewhere (Jehu, § 1). Pierced by Jehu's arrow Jehoram falls.

2. Son of Jehoshaphat by Athaliah, and king of Judah (851-843 B.C.), 2 K. 8 16-24. A fragment of the

² The text in its present form simply states that there was a great outbreak of divine wrath (יָהוָה אֵתְּרָם) against Israel. The sense of this is clear, for except in Eccles. 5 17 [16] (if the text be correct) and Esth. 1 18 אֵתְּרָם is always used of divine anger; but which god is referred to? We must clearly distinguish between the original tradition and the narrative in its present form. The contemporary Jews may possibly enough (cp 1 S. 26 19) have said that Chemosh, the god of Moab, had hitherto been wrath with his people (cp inscription of Mesha, l. 5), but that now he turned his indignation against the invaders of his land. The author of the narrative in its present form, however, certainly thought that the God of Israel had the supreme power even in the land of Moab (see 2 K. 3 16-18). His natural impulse was to attribute to Yahweh the calamity which marred the success of the Israelites, and yet how could Yahweh have turned suddenly against Israel? He therefore says quite vaguely that divine wrath fell upon Israel, without mentioning the name of Yahweh.

The original tradition may have said אֵתְּרָם מֵיְהוָה, 'wrath from the presence of Chemosh.' That the wrath of Chemosh is meant is admitted by Dertheau, Bib.-lex. (Schenkel), 4 231 f., Stade, GI 1 430 536; H. Schultz, AT Theol. (8), 174; Smend, AT Rel.-gesch. 111. Wellhausen cautiously (Prol.⁽⁶⁾ 23 f.) describes this view as 'possible,' which points in the direction of such a theory as is adopted here. The language of the text is vague; its vagueness has to be accounted for. Klostermann's view (Sam. u. Kön. 400 f.) is at once too complicated and too arbitrary to be discussed here. The best conservative treatment of the question is in Küh. Bibl. Gesch. 3 335, n. 5.

royal annals tells us that in his reign the Edomites revolted from Judah, and chose themselves a king. Jehoram, however, seems to have had even less success against Edom than his Israelitish namesake had against Moab. Until the close of the campaign the N. Israelites appear to have had the advantage over Mesba; but of the southern Jehoram we are told (so far as the text can be understood) that he had the greatest difficulty in cutting his way by night through the Edomites who had surrounded him, and saving his life with a faithful few. The greater part of his army ('the people,' as 2 S. 18 1-8) had fled. Libnah, probably a Canaanitish city annexed to Judah, revolted at the same time.

Whether any grains of historical fact can be gleaned from the narrative of the Chronicler (2 Ch. 21) is more than doubtful. The temptation to enrich an empty reign with didactic details was especially strong in the present instance, Jehoram being the representative in Judah of the dangerous innovating religious policy of Ahab (2 K. 8 18). A writer who was capable of inventing (or even of accepting without criticism) a letter from Elijah to Jehoram simply to enhance the king's guilt, cannot safely be followed even in such comparative trifles as the illness which, he says, preceded Jehoram's death. To accuse Jehoram of opening his reign with a massacre (cp ATHALIAH, 1), and to burden the history with something like a repetition of the supposed invasion of Zerah (so Smith, DB⁽²⁾; Köh. Bibl. Gesch. 3 330-344; Klost. GI 203) is therefore scarcely to be called critical. See Kue. Erl. § 31, n. 3, and cp Bennett, Chronicles, 393-398.

1. King of Judah (1 K. 15 24 22 2 ff. 2 K. 3 1 ff. 2 Ch. 17 1 ff.). Probably his accession is to be placed in the eleventh year of Omri, not in the sixth year of Ahab.¹ Of the latter king he was in all probability a vassal (see AHAB, § 7, n. 3). Repeatedly (1 K. 22 4 2 K. 3 7) he takes the field with the king of Israel; his visit to Ahab in Samaria (1 K. 22 2) is no doubt a compulsory one, connected with the campaign against the Aramæans in the N. of Gilead. The marriage of his heir Jehoram with Ahab's daughter ATHALIAH (q. v.), was also a political necessity; as a vassal, Jehoshaphat took this means of lightening his burden. Nor can he protest when Ahab puts him in a false position by disguising himself as a common soldier while Jehoshaphat retains his royal insignia (1 K. 22 30). The compiler of Kings gives him a good character for piety. His piety, however, whatever it was, did not blind him to the necessity for national progress in national things. His attempt to open direct communication with the gold-country OPHIR (q. v.) is thus described in 1 K. 22 47-49. (The passage is not so obscure as it has been thought, but needs emendation; it is an old coin needing to be purified from its rust.)

¹ And he had mariners in Nēšib-ēdōm, those that wield the oar [in]ships of Tarshish, [and they undertook] to go to Ophir for gold, but they went not, for the ships were wrecked in Nēšib-ēdōm. Then Ahaziah b. Ahab said to Jehoshaphat, "Let my servants go to sea with thy servants." But Jehoshaphat consented not.²

How the Chronicler represents these facts is told elsewhere (CHRONICLES, § 8 a). The same writer omits to mention the war against Moab in which Jehoshaphat did vassal's service to Jehoram (2 K. 3; see JEHORAM, 1), and substitutes the strange narrative or rather The Valley (called) 'Jehoshaphat,' the name of the place of judgment for all nations (Joel 3 [4] 2*12*). If correctly read, it is the coinage of the prophetic writer himself; it means 'Yahwè judges,' 'for there will I sit to judge all the nations round about' (v. 12; similarly v. 2 in the Hebrew). Had the writer any definite geographical site in view? Some have thought of the valley of BERACHAH (בְּרַחָה, עֵבֶק 2 Ch. 20*26*), where Jehoshaphat is said to have gained a victory; but surely Jerusalem, not Tekoa, is to witness the judgment. Others prefer the valley of KIDRON (q.v., § 2), where there appears to have been a common graveyard in pre-exilic times (2 K. 23*6*), and where both Jews and Moslems still bury their dead in anticipation of the judgment. The tradition, however, connecting this valley with Joel's prophecy can be traced no earlier than the fourth century A.D. (see Eus. and Jer. OS 273*89* 113*13*), and has no authority; besides, the Kidron valley is called נַחַל, nahal, not עֵבֶק, 'Émek. In v. 14 Joel gives another descriptive name—עֵבֶק הַחֲרִיץ, EV 'valley of decision.' It might seem that he was thinking of Is. 28*21* f., where destruction is threatened to 'the whole earth' (or, land) in terms reminding us of Joel's second phrase, and it is said that Yahwè will arise for judgment 'as on Mt. Perazim,' and 'as in the valley (בְּנֵבֶק) by Gibeon.' Isaiah obviously refers here to the valley (בְּנֵבֶק) of REPHAIM (q.v.), SW. of Jerusalem, which was for him the typical valley of judgment. It is not impossible that Joel refers to the same site (but cp Zech. 14*4*). Elsewhere, however (Crit. Bib.), it is argued that the same corruption has occurred in both passages, and that the obscure phrases 'valley of Jehoshaphat' and 'valley of decision (?)' (or, 'of threshing,' Geneva English Bible, AV¹⁶, Calv., Credner) should be read 'valley of judgment' (יְהוֹשָׁפָט) and 'valley of judicial righteousness.'

² The received text is supposed to state that although it (Edom) had a king, yet he was merely a nominee of the king of Judah. This cannot be right. The text has, 'There was no king in Edom—a prefect king—Jehoshaphat.' Following hints of ^(B), Stade and Ki. read thus, 'In Edom there was (then) no king, [but] the prefect (or, officer) of king Jehoshaphat built,' etc. This is not at all natural. The key is furnished by Ezek. 27 29; יְצִיב עֹדֹם, Nēšib-ēdōm, 'Column of (the god) Edom,' we must hold to be the true name of the miscalled Ezion-geber.

JEHOSHAPHAT, THE VALLEY OF (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, יְהוֹשָׁפָט)

For 'valley of Jehoshaphat' ΘΒΝΑΩ gives την κοιλάδα ωσαφατ, Theod. την χώραν της κρίσεως; Tg. יְהוֹשָׁפָט פְּלוֹג יְרִימָה. Thus Theod. and Tg. favour הכְּשֵׁפֶת. For 'valley of decision (?)' Θ has τη κοιλάδι [-λη Ν'] της δίεης—i.e., העֵבֶק, but Theod. repeats της κρίσεως.

A learned (unpublished) Index of Passages bearing on the topography of Jerusalem by A. B. M'Grigor ('96) summarises the traditional statements on the valley of Jehoshaphat. The Pilgrim of Bordeaux (333 A.D.) believed that this valley was 'to the left of those going from Jerusalem to the gate which is against the E., that they may ascend Mt. Olivet.' Antoninus Martyr uses the term 'valley of Gethsemane' as synonymous with 'valley of Jehoshaphat.' Willibald says that it was near Jerusalem on the eastern side. Adamnan also knows of a 'tower of Jehoshaphat' in the same valley, not far from the Church of St. Mary. Against all this, and much more of the same kind, we may put the statement of Midrash Tillim, 'A valley called Jehoshaphat does not exist' (Neub. Géogr. 51). T. K. C.

JEHOSHEBA (יְהוֹשֶׁבֶעַ, probably for יְהוֹשָׁבֶעַ, Jehoshua; cp ELISHEBA; but cp § 33; ωααβεε [B*AL], ωααβεθ [B^{a,b} (θ superscr.)] or JEHOSHABEATH (יְהוֹשָׁבֶעַת, ωααβεθ [BL], ωααβεθ [A]), apparently an error produced by the following בַּת (so also Gray HPN 285; cp Ex. 6*23*, where the same error

JEHOVAH (יְהוָה), Gen. 2*4*, etc. See NAMES, § 109 f.

JEHOVAH-JIREH (יְהוָה יִרְאֵה), κυριος [ε]ιδεν [ADL], or rather Yahwè-yir'è, the name given by Abraham to the place on which he had offered up a ram instead of his son (Gen. 22*14*). In view of v. 8, it should mean 'Yahwè selects'; but the next words are, according to the traditional text, 'Hence it is even yet said, In the mountain where Yahwè appears,' as if this were a popular saying (cp 10*9*). We are thus face to face with an inconsistency. Probably the editor of JE, who (see ISAAC, § 2) interfered with the original story of the Elohist, vocalised differently, so as to read Yahwè-yerà'è, 'Yahwè appears' (on this spot). His object is manifest from 2 Ch. 5*1*, where the site of Solomon's temple is said to have been 'on Mt. Moriah (בְּהַר הַמֹּרְיָה), where [Yahwè] appeared (נִרְאָה) unto David his father.' The Elohist, however, must have written El-yir'è, and have explained the name as '(the place which) God selects,' or generally, 'God selects (place, victim, etc., as it pleases him).' Cp MORIAH.

What the Elohist has given us cannot, however, be the original story. Using the reinterpreted story of Beer-lahai-roi as a key (see ISAAC, § 2), we see that it is the same sacred spot, called properly Beer-Jerahmeel (or Jerahmeel), which is here referred to. To suit the new Hebrew story of the divine prohibition of human sacrifice, the name Jerahmeel was altered into El-jireh ('God provides'). In v. 14 we should probably read, for בְּהַר, 'in the mountain,' בְּאֵר, 'well'—i.e., 'according as it is still the custom to say Beer-jireh-el.' The latter name was an edifying alteration of Jerahmeel. יהוה יִרְאֵה, the first time κύριος εἶδεν, the second (ἐν τῷ ὄρει) κύριος ὤψθη. Pesh., Vet. Lat., and (after it) Vg., represent the Kāḏ both times, and agree in presupposing בְּהַר.] T. K. C.

JEHOVAH-NISSI (יְהוָה נִסִּי), κυριος καταφυγη μου, Dominus exaltatio mea), the name given to the altar built after the defeat of Amalek at Rephidim, Ex. 17*15*. EV renders 'the Lord (is) my banner,' which is in fact the usual explanation. Most compare Ps. 206 [5], and paraphrase, 'We fight in reliance on Yahwè.' The paraphrase, however, is not natural, and Ps. 205 [6] is corrupt (see ENSIGNS, § 1*b*, col. 1299).

Vg. imagines a derivation from נָסַף; Ⓢ apparently reads כְּנוֹסִי. Probably Ⓢ is right; the Pasek before נִסִּי may indicate that the text is doubtful. Verse 16 is equally uncertain (on EV see HAND, b). An inspection of the Hebrew letters suggests that both עֵלֶיכֶם and מִלְחָמָה are probably miswritten for עֵמְלָק. When the second עֵמְלָק had become corrupted into מִלְחָמָה, לְמַחְמָה had to be inserted to make sense. מִלְחָמָה (an unusual pbrase) should probably be בְּרִפְדִּים, and כִּי יִר should be הִנֵּה כִּי.

The whole passage should probably run thus:—'And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it 'Yahwè is my refuge'; he said, 'Yahwè has put Amalek to flight in Rephidim' (כִּי הִנֵּה אֲתַעְמֵלֵךְ בְּרִפְדִּים). On the name 'Amalek' see JERAHMEEL, § 4. T. K. C.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (יְהוָה שָׁלוֹם), εἰρηνη κυριος [BA], κυρ. εἰρ. [L]; Domini pax), the name of Gideon's altar at Ophrah, Judg. 6*24*.† The name probably commemorated the traditional victory of Gideon, though the narrative as it stands seems to connect it with a phrase ascribed to Yahwè—'Peace to thee' ('It is well with thee'). Cp, however, Moore, Judges, 18*9*. T. K. C.

1. ben Jehoshaphat ben Nimshi, a king of Israel, 2 K. 9 f. Hos. 1 4 𐤍𐤊𐤁 [BAQ], 2 Ch. 22 8 (841-815 B.C.; see CHRONOLOGY, §§ 28 34 f., and 1. Accession. tab. v.). Originally a member of Ahab's bodyguard,¹ he rose to the position of general under Jehoram, and was entrusted by him with the protection of the border city of RAMOTH-GILEAD (or rather, perhaps, Ramath-Šalhad), menaced by the Aramæan army. Jehoram was at the time away in Jezreel, invalided, and Jehu seized the opportunity of placing himself on the throne.

How the conspiracy was described by the historian we cannot tell; the editor has substituted an account derived from a cycle of narratives shaped by disciples of Elisha. It is, of course, not improbable that ELISHA² [g.v., § 5] favoured a change of dynasty; the editor may have justly preferred the dramatic scene in the Elisha narrative to the briefer account of the historian. The consequence of this editorial operation is that we do not know for whom Jehu's speech in 2 K. 9 15^b is intended. Probably, however, he addresses his chief supporters in the army, whose existence is implied by the word 𐤍𐤎𐤎, 'he bound himself (with others)' in v. 14a.³

The story of the slaughter of king Jehoram and his royal kinsman and vassal Ahaziah need not be related at length. Jehu poses as the champion of true Israelitish manners, and justifies his treatment of Jehoram as an act of vengeance for the judicial murder of Naboth, contemplated by the solemn declaration of Elijah. Ahaziah's race for life is referred to elsewhere (see BETH-HAGGAN; GUR). The murder of JEZEBEL [g.v.] was justified on similar grounds. That of the sons of Ahab, or rather (see 2 K. 10 2 f.) of Jehoram,⁴ however, is simply the measure constantly taken by Oriental usurpers for their own security.

The opening words of 2 K. 10 1, and also 'seventy persons' in v. 6^b are incorrect glosses; the number seventy in v. 7 is made up by including all the 'sons of the king'—i.e., all the members of the royal family, as well as the young children of Joram. 'Seventy,' however, is not to be taken literally; a similar massacre of seventy relatives of the king is mentioned in a north Syrian inscription.⁵

Two further acts of butchery are recorded. In the first, the victims are forty-two kinsmen of King Ahaziah

2. Acts of cruelty. who are on their way to visit the Israelite princes in Samaria (cp 10 12). The passage is, however, evidently in a wrong connection; the contents belong to the revolution period which is just over. The princes must have encountered Jehu to the S. of Samaria, whereas Jehu, according to 10 12, should be on his way from Jezreel in the N. to Samaria. It is not impossible that the murder may

² Another cycle of stories represented Elijah as the prophet who favoured Jehu's insurrection (1 K. 19 16, 𐤍𐤎𐤎 [A]).
³ This form occurs elsewhere only in 2 Ch. 24 25 f., of the parties to a conspiracy.

have been committed within the border of Judah, and stand in connection with an attempt on the part of Jehu to incorporate Judah, which in Ahab's time had already been reduced to vassalage, in a great Israelitish kingdom, the centre of which would be in Samaria.¹ This idea is confirmed by the co-operation which Jehu appears to have received on religious grounds from JONADAB the Rechabite; the seats of the Rechabites were surely not in the N. but in the S. of Judah.

It is not much help to say that 'the story of Jonadab is in this connection improbable' (Benz.). That the account of Jehu's meeting with Jonadab in 2 K. 10 15 f. is complete, no one would assert; and the implied view of the editor, that Jonadab rode with Jehu in his chariot into Samaria with the object of witnessing Jehu's destruction of the devotees of Baal is in the highest degree improbable. Such a course would have put all the adherents of Baal worship on their guard, and nullified Jehu's reputation for 'subtily'.² But we cannot get rid of Rechabite co-operation altogether.

The second massacre is on a vaster scale; it is nothing less than the extermination of the prophets, priests, and devotees of Baal, and the 'subtily' of Jehu consists in this—that he makes the priests and prophets the instruments of the ruin of their religion. The persons who 'sanctified a solemn assembly for Baal' (2 K. 10 20 RV), were not the courtiers of Jehu but Baal's prophets and priests (v. 19, where 'all his worshippers' is an interpolation).³ So all the Baal worshippers in the land were collected in the courts, or perhaps in the liškah or hall⁴ of the temple (presumably a large one) which Ahab had built in Samaria (1 K. 16 32). How the stern warriors of Jehu slew the robed devotees, hurled the sacred objects to the ground, pressed into the sanctuary itself, took thence the sacred pillar of Baal and broke it in pieces, pulled down the altar⁵ (cp 1 K. 16 32 f.), and finally the temple itself, is graphically told in 2 K. 10 18-27. How far it is really historical we can hardly say. The fact at any rate is certain that in the narrator's time Ahab's temple lay in ruins, and that tradition connected this with the name of the cruel king Jehu. It also appears likely enough that Jehu was not originally known as a strict worshipper of Yahwè; the hypocritical words, 'Ahab served Baal a little, but Jehu shall serve him much,' would have had no effect if Jehu had been a person like Jonadab the Rechabite. It is perfectly conceivable that a leading prophet like Elisha may have selected Jehu as the substitute for the religiously worthless Jehoram,⁶ simply on the ground of his usefulness, not for any good moral qualities which he supposed Jehu to possess (cp 1 K. 19 17). Jehu, on his side, accepted the support of Elisha, and adopted the prophetic programme,

³ So Klostermann, Benzinger, Kittel.

⁴ The correction of 'vestry' into 'hall' (see VESTRY) is a great gain to the sense.

⁵ The critical emendations of the text are nearly all due to Klostermann. Thus, for 'to the city of the House of Baal' we should read, 'even to the sanctuary' (𐤍𐤎𐤎, 𐤎𐤎 𐤎𐤎 𐤎𐤎); for 'and the guard and the captains cast (them) out,' 'hurled to the ground the Asherim' (𐤎𐤎𐤎 𐤎𐤎𐤎); for 'pillars' (𐤎𐤎𐤎), 'pillar' (𐤎𐤎𐤎); so 𐤎𐤎; omit 𐤎𐤎; for 'pillar' (v. 27), 'altar' (𐤎𐤎𐤎, so Benz.). To these add 𐤎𐤎𐤎, 'and they broke it in pieces' (v. 26) 𐤎𐤎𐤎, 'and they burned it' (Che.). Ewald (GVV 3 572, n. 2) seeks to defend 𐤎𐤎𐤎, 'the city of the house of Baal,' but admits that the 'Holy of Holies' is what is meant. The 'Holy of Holies' should be 𐤎𐤎𐤎; 𐤎 fell out owing to the preceding 𐤎. Benz. and Ki. also find 𐤎𐤎 attractive, but make no objection to 𐤎𐤎𐤎 (v. 27, EV 'a draught house'). If, however, the emendations of similar readings elsewhere (cp 𐤎𐤎𐤎) are in the highest degree probable, such conservatism is injudicious. The present writer has proposed 𐤎𐤎𐤎 (Ezk. 29 12). Perhaps the true reading was deliberately altered.

⁶ It is true that, according to 2 K. 3 2 (RV), Jehoram 'put away the pillar (𐤎𐤎𐤎, Klo. "pillars") of Baal that his father had made.' But in v. 13 Elisha expresses the utmost contempt for that king.

simply because it was convenient so to do. The great prophet Hosea saw through him, and implies that many of his contemporaries passed the same moral condemnation on 'the bloodshed of Jezreel' (Hos. 14). Unhappily 2 K. 10³⁰ (R_D) expresses a very different judgment.

The view adopted above, that Jehu's main political object was to subjugate Judah, is supported by a consideration of his relation to Syria 3. His policy. (Damascus). He was fighting against the Arameans when the chance was offered him of seizing the crown, and the history of the reign of Ahab warned him of his constant danger from Damascus. The one sure date in his reign is his payment of tribute to Shalmaneser II. in 842 B.C., which we may probably place immediately after the deeds related in 2 K. 9 f. In this year Shalmaneser once more attacked Syria, whose king, Hazael, he ultimately besieged in Damascus; Tyre and Sidon, and Yaua (Jehu) of Bit-Humri purchased the favour of the monarch by rich gifts¹ (see Ball, Light from the East, 166 f.).

The relief thus gained by Jehu was, however, only temporary. Damascus was not taken by the Assyrians, and after 839 B.C. Syria had a long period of rest. It immediately resumed the offensive against Israel. 'In those days,' says an extract from the annals, 'Yahwè began to loathe² Israel, and Hazael smote them in all Israel's borders, from Aroer which is by the valley of the Arnon to Gilead and Bashan' (2 K. 10³²).³ It was, not improbably, at this troublous period that Jericho was fortified as a protection for the Jordan valley. Jehu, not an unknown HIEL, is probably the name of the builder of the fortifications, and, somewhat as Mesha, king of Moab, sacrificed his first-born son to Chemosh when in danger from the Israelites, he sacrificed (in a peculiar way) his eldest son when he laid the foundations, and his youngest when he set up the gates. This is no doubt only a conjecture, but no other adequate explanation of 1 K. 16³⁴ appears to have been offered. Jehu's religion is elsewhere represented by the historian as of a rather low type (2 K. 10^{31b}). See HIEL, where C. Niebuhr's suggestion is adopted—that 1 K. 16³⁴ originally stood after 2 K. 10³³.

JEHUDIJAH, or rather, as in RV, 'the Jewess' (יהודיה), apparently one of the wives of MERED (q.v.) (1 Ch. 4 18 f.; αδεια [B], ιδια [A], ιοϋδαία [L]). The passage relating to Mered and his wives (?) is disfigured by several corruptions. Possibly Ha-jehudijah (so RV^{mg}) is a faulty reading for Hodiah (cp BITHIAH, JAHDAI). The children of 'the Jewess' are connected with the places Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah (see JERED, JEKUTHIEL, SOCOH).

JEHUEL (יהוואל Kt., יהוואל Kr.; ιειηλ [BAL]; JAHIEL); so RV, but AV JEHIEL. A Levite of the guild of Heman (2 Ch. 29 14 f.). The name reminds us of מְהוּאֵל (see MEHUJUEL), but though we might read Jehaw-el—i.e., 'God (El) giveth life,' the name is more probably a corruption of Jerahmeel (cp JEHALLELEL).

Apart from the indications of Jerahmeelite connections in these genealogies we might compare the Phœnician name Jehaw-melek, 'Melek giveth life' (C/S 1 no. 11.5), and parallel Assyrian and Babylonian names, such as Ašur-uballiṣ ('Ašur giveth life'), Bil-uballiṣ, Šamaⁿ-uballiṣ, Sin-muballiṣ (A/P² 2 206, 4 112 f.; Winckler, GBA 59). It will not do to read יהיאל, though Abiel in 1 S. 9 1 is the father of Kish (which might seem to suit v. 36), for 'Becher' would have a prior claim, and Gibeah (not Gibeon) was the home of the Bicrites (see GIBEAH, § 1). Read perhaps יעיאל, Jeriael, and supply the same name in 1 Ch. 8 29 (RV Jeiel). JEDIAEL (q.v.) was the brother of Becher. See GIBEON, § 3. (Jeriael = Jerahmeel.)

or founder, of the town of Zanoah in the genealogical lists of Judah (1 Ch. 4:18). Gesenius explains it 'piety towards God' (cp JAKEH); similarly the Targum on Chronicles ('trust in God'), regarding it as a title of Moses; but evidently it is closely related to JOKTHEEL (g.v.), which like Zanoah was the name of a Judahite town. Probably both Jekuthiel and Joktheel are miswritten for Eltekeh (אלתקה).

JEMIMA, RV Jemimah (יַמִּימָה), the name of Job's eldest daughter (Job 42:14†).

Learning has not succeeded in accounting for this name. Ⓞ (ἡμέρα) and Vg. No theory is free from objection. When we remember, however, the frequency of certain textual corruptions, and the popularity of the Song of Songs, we cannot hesitate to read יַימָה, 'the spotless' (cp יַיִם, Cant. 5:2-6). Observe that ה precedes.

JEMNAAN (ΙΕΜΝΑΑΝ [BA, perhaps accus. ?], -ΝΑΑ [N^{ca}], ΔΑΜΜΑ [N*]), a city on the coast of Palestine, between Ocina (Acco) and Azotus (Ashdod), which submitted to Holofernes (Judith 2:28). No doubt JABNEEL (1) is meant.

When the author of Judith wrote, Jammia was still altogether a heathen city (cp 3:68); this is a fact of importance with reference to the theory of Volkmar, who regarded the Book of Judith as a reflection of the campaign of Trajan, A.D. 118. The book must be older than Johanan ben Zakkai, who transferred the Sanhedrin to Jamnia; older too than Philo, who would not have described Jamnia as a heathen city (see JABNEEL; and cp JUDITH, BOOK OF).

1. Critical problems. deliverer of the Israelites of Gilead from the Ammonites, and their sōphēt (EV 'judge') or regent (Judg. 10:6-12; cp 1 S. 12:11). The story is as deficient in unity as that of Gideon, and presents similar problems. Only through criticism can we arrive at a definite view of what was really told by the ancient Hebrews. The last narrator, as Kittel remarks (Hist. 2:89), 'has no certain knowledge of [Jephthah's] origin and his fortunes; he has worked up what he received, but does not understand it aright.'

The prevalent critical opinion is that the story comes from a single traditional narrative, but that a great interpolation has been made (11:2-28 [or 29]), compiled from JE's narrative in Nu. 20:f. According to Wellhausen (*CH*², 228:f.), this leaves nothing definite to be told of Jephthah except the anecdote of his sacrifice of his daughter; this critic also regards 12:1-6 as a late appendix, based on a part of the story of Gideon (8:1-3). Moore (Judges, 283), also a believer in one source (cp JUDGES, § 10), disputes the necessity of this unfavourable inference; he finds more substance in Jephthah than does the great German critic.

Holzinger and Budde have struck out a new path for themselves, which still more decidedly than Moore's encourages the belief in a historical Jephthah. According to them, the existing Jephthah-story is derived from two independent sources (cp GIDEON). One of these (E) stated that the hero resided in Mizpah, made war on a foreign people which had done him some grievous injury, and gained the victory over them, but at the cost of his dearest possession—his own flesh and blood: the other (J), that, though a Gileadite, he had become a freebooter on a foreign soil, and was commissioned by the Gileadites to avenge their wrongs on their oppressors, which he accomplished, though denied the help of the tribes W. of the Jordan (cp 12:2 and 11:29). 12:1-6 also belongs to this source. In the strange mixture of references to Moab and Ammon in 11:2-28 these critics also find evidence that there were two traditions respecting the people against which Jephthah waged war, one naming the Moabites, the other the Ammonites, traditions which R_{JE} harmonised by the substitution of 'Ammon.'

Our course, however, in dealing with the existing story of Jephthah, must be somewhat different. Budde, 2. New theory. with whom we may couple Frankenberg (Comp. d. dt. Richterb. 37 [195]), is no doubt right in recognising a discrepancy between the Jephthah of Judg. 11:1-11 and the Jephthah of the anecdote in 11:34-40. When, however, he attempts to trace out the two different narratives, he fails after advancing a few steps. Failure, indeed, as he himself sees, was inevitable. Literary criticism cannot solve the problems which meet us here. Even the steps forward which Budde hopes that he has taken are by no means secure. The method adopted here is that which is followed in the case of the kindred narratives of Gideon and of Laban and Jacob elsewhere (see GIDEON, GILEAD, § 4). It endeavours to win back some parts of the two earlier stories which underlie the present narrative, not without some historical gain. The plausibility of the following restoration, the details of which have been so expressed as to minimise the need of a commentary, will, it is hoped, be manifest. Should any reader wish to substitute 'Jephthah' for 'Jair' in the first story, he is at liberty to do so. He will, however, lose what (if our readings are correct) appears to be the fullest traditional account of the origin of the HAVVOth-JAIR [g.v.].

Not improbably, we suggest, it is to JAIR (g.v.), as not only victorious over his foes, but the conqueror of the Havvoth-jair, that the first story was originally devoted. In Judg. 10:3-5 the account of this sōphēt is tantalisingly brief; he is, what Wellhausen calls Jephthah, not a form but a shadow. The second story brings us face to face with the true Jephthah.

1. Story of Jair.—It came to pass that the sons of Haurān made war against Gilead,¹ and though the

3. J: Real story of Jair. clansmen in different parts of the land withstood their oppression, it availed them not. Now there was at that time, in the land of Tubīḥi (see TOB), a valiant man, a Gileadite, Jair by name.² For some forgotten cause he had been banished from his country, and had become renowned, like David afterwards, as the leader of a band of freebooters. So the elders of Šalhad³ (the border city of Gilead), in their despair, went to this outlaw at Tubīḥi, and besought him to lead them against the men of Haurān, and, when he asked for his reward, a solemn promise was made to him before Yahwē at Mizpah (the sanctuary of Šalhad, see MIZPAH) that if he came back victorious he should be the 'head' of all the inhabitants of Gilead. Then Jair sent messengers to the king of Haurān, who said to him, 'Why hast thou come into the land of Israel? [Did not Laban, son of Haurān, make a solemn covenant with Israel, son of Isaac, not to pass beyond the border cities Šalhad and Mizpah? ⁴] Let Yahwē judge this day ⁵ between the sons of Israel and the sons of Haurān (11:27b)! But the king of Haurān hearkened not unto the words of Jair. And Yahwē delivered the men of Haurān into the hand of Jair, and he fell upon city after city, from Edrei as far as the approach to Šalhad, and as far as the district of Maachah—twenty cities.⁶ So the sons of Haurān became subject to the sons of [Gilead].⁷ But the men of Ephraim were angry because Gilead had set up an independent sovereignty. In defence of the old tribal constitution they came to Mizpah¹ (121) and fought with Jair. But the battle went against them; many of them fell, others fled to the fords of Jordan. But when the fugitives sought to pass over, their speech betrayed that they were of Ephraim, and their brethren the men of Gilead had no mercy on them. [And the cities which Jair took from the men of Haurān were called Havvoth-jair.² Afterwards they came into the possession of Geshur and Aram.³] And Jair died and was buried in Mahanaim⁴ (105).

4. E: Real story of Jephthah.

In the bitterness of his heart, and with settled purpose, Jephthah went to the sanctuary. There he vowed to Yahwē that whoever came out of the door of his house to meet him, when he returned safely from the sons of Haurān, should be Yahwē's, and that he would offer him up as a burnt offering. And Yahwē gave Jephthah the victory, and he returned home. But behold, he saw coming out to meet him, at the head of her maidens, with music and dancing, his own, his only child. He rent his garments and spoke, and the maiden answered as became a maiden of Israel. To the father it was a stunning blow; but his daughter would not add to it by reproaches or complaints. For such a victory over the foes of her house she was content to yield up her life. But she asked and obtained a respite of two months that she might go upon the mountains⁵ with her companions and bewail her maidenhood. After this Jephthah did to her what he had vowed to do; she died a virgin. And it became the custom in Israel for women to devote four days in the year to bewailing⁶ Jephthah's daughter. And Jephthah died, and was buried in his city, Šalhad (127).

The first of these stories (J), like those of Gideon and Jerubbaal, has suffered much transformation, owing partly to corruption of the text, partly to the editor's want of comprehension of Hebrew antiquity. Whoever misread גלעד, 'Gilead,' for גלח, 'Šalhad,' must have been unaware of the great part played by this border city in early Israelitish history, or he would surely have felt that a Gilead-story with no reference to Šalhad could hardly be right. The alteration of 'Jair into 'Jephthah' was deliberate; it is perhaps a sign of the editor's deep interest in the fascinating story of Jephthah's daughter. He wanted to tell more about Jephthah, and robbed Jair to fill out the meagre tradition of Jephthah. At the same time he filled up gaps in the partly illegible narrative which lay before him. Thus to account for Jephthah's (Jair's) outlawry he made him a bastard driven from his home by his brothers, and in lieu of the illegible account of Jephthah's (Jair's) message to the king of Ammon (for stood in the original story, to express the full result of the great victory. ישראל of course stands in connection with the late and incorrect insertion in v. 29. Jephthah (rather, Jair) made no attempt to get a levy of Manassites or (122) of Ephraimites.

² Possibly the uncertainty whether the HAVVOTH-JAIR (q.v.) were in Gilead or in Bashan arose from the corruption of Šalhad into Gilead. The cities referred to became by conquest cities of Šalhad, and Šalhad was on the border of Bashan and Gilead. See next note.

⁶ For חצפניה (1140) read probably לְבָבוֹת (Grü.).

so he misreads חור) he inserts a tedious historico-legal argument referring entirely to Moab, and therefore most inappropriate for a discussion with the king of Ammon. He also interpolates the central part of the touching story of Jephthah's daughter, so that the transition from Jephthah's, or rather Jair's, conquest of the twenty cities and the Ephraimite invasion is obscured.¹ Cp JAIR.

How much of the two stories is historical? The border warfare between the Hauranites and the Gileadites. The temporary subjection of cities in Haurān to the Gileadites. The importance of Šalhad and the citadel and sanctuary of Mizpah or Penuel (? see MIZPAH). The invasion of Gilead by the Ephraimites, which was an assertion of the rights of the tribal federation (see Wi. GI 151, n. 1). The offering up of a maiden as a sacrifice for Yahwē under great stress—perhaps for the last time. On the Shabboleth incident no great stress can be laid. It is plausible in the extreme (see SHIBBOLETH); but a clever narrator might easily imagine it.

We must not, however, pass over the annual mourning of the Israelitish women referred to in 1140. There is no occasion to doubt that a great Gileadite once sacrificed his daughter to Yahwē.² There are good parallels for this, not only in OT passages (see SACRIFICE), but especially in an Arabian tradition mentioned by Lyall (Anc. Arabian Poetry, Intro., p. xxxviii). 'Al-Mundhir had made a vow that on a certain day in each year he would sacrifice the first person he saw; 'Abid [a poet] came in sight on the unlucky day, and was accordingly killed, and the altar smeared with his blood.' The sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter, however, seems to have been connected, at any rate, in later times, at Mizpah and probably elsewhere, with a ceremony which consisted originally in mourning for the death of a virgin goddess. Such a ceremony (which is analogous to the well-known mourning for TAMMUZ [q.v.]) is attested by Porphyry and Pausanias as still performed in their time at Laodicea on the Phœnician coast, and as connected with the sacrifice of a stag (cp ISAAC, § 4) which was a substitute for the more ancient sacrifice of a maiden.³ The fact that the name of Jephthah's daughter was associated with such a celebration is of itself enough to refute the idea that she was not really sacrificed but only dedicated to perpetual virginity. This notion first appears, according to Moore, in the Kimchis (end of 12th cent. A. D.); the older Jewish and Christian interpreters all take the words of 1139a in their natural sense. It may be noticed that Jephthah's daughter is not referred to in the NT; Jephthah himself, however, is a hero of faith (Heb. 1132).

Jerahmeel and Caleb are genealogically spoken of as brothers (1 Ch. 2 9 42), a relation which probably began at an early date and continued until both were finally reckoned to Israel as part of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. 2).³ We must not, however, infer from the wording of 1 S. 27 10-12 that already in David's time the clans formed part of Saul's kingdom.⁴

To supplement the scanty references to Jerahmeel in the MT (but see below, § 4) it would be reasonable to assume that the clan shared throughout the course of its existence the same fortunes as CALEB: viz., that in post-exilic times it was pushed to the N. of Judah by the advancing Edomites (cp CALEB, § 4), that previous to its occupation of the Negeb it had come from the distant S. of Palestine (ib. § 2), and that together with Caleb it had joined in the wanderings from Kadesh (in the N. Arabian Musri) to Hebron (see EXODUS i., § 4 ff.; HEBRON, § 1; KADESH i., § 3). A critical inspection of the Jerahmeelite genealogical lists may perhaps be found to lend interesting support to these assumptions (which also receive independent confirmation from the inquiries summed up in NEGEB, § 2).

Turning to the genealogies in 1 Ch. 2 we find that the names in general betray an affinity with 2. Genealogies. South Palestine).

The older divisions of the tribe (v. 25) are Ram (of whose offshoots Jamin is elsewhere the name of a Simeonite clan whilst Eker reminds us of Ekron), Bunah (? 𐤁𐤍𐤏𐤕, see Ki. SBOT),⁵ Oren (cp Edomite ARAN), and OZEM (Davidic).⁶ The mention of 'another wife' (v. 26) might suggest that the clan, like Caleb, moved to a new seat (see ATARAH), in which case Atarah's son Onam (ib.) might remind us of the Benjamite BEN-ONI (g.v.). Onam, moreover, has Edomite associations, and, looking more closely at the names of the 'sons,' we observe; (a) Shammai (v. 28), also a Calebite division (v. 45); (b) Abishur and Abihah (v. 29), names with distinctly S. Arabian affinities; (c) Zaza (v. 33), perhaps the same as the Simeonite ZIZA; and finally (d) ISHI (v. 31), with Simeonite and Judean affinities.

The genealogy includes Molid and Jether (v. 29 32). One is tempted to connect these with the two place-names, MOLADAH and JATTIR, and to locate the Jerahmeelites in the district of 'Attir and Tell el-Milh, to the NW. and S. of Arad respectively. This seems to be supported by Shishak's list (EGYPT, § 63), where yu-ra-hu-mā-[el?] (no. 112) follows almost immediately upon ha-k-ru-mā 'a-ru-d-ū ru-bi-l (nos. 107-110) — 'the districts (see FIELD) of Great Arad.¹ (For other indications of the seats of this clan, see NEGEB, § 2.)

² In view of the analogy between Jerahmeel and the tribal names Ishmael, Israel, etc. (some of which may be geographical), it is unnecessary to treat Jerahmeel as a compound of יֵרַח and מֵֿל with the addition of ב as in ABIMAEI, nor could we find support for this in the name JARHA (for which 𐤍𐤓 in 1 Ch. 2 34 suggests the form 'Jarhel'), since, in common with JEROHAM, it is probably nothing more than a popular abbreviation. Sayce (who cites Jerahmeel as preserving a trace of 'mimination') points out that Yarhamu (Jeroham) has been found in contract-tablets dated in the reign of Samsu-iluna, and supposes the name to be the origin of Ovid's Orhamus (PSBA 21 23 [1900]).

For the earlier history of Jerahmeel the unique genealogy of JARHA (g.v.) in 1 Ch. 2 is highly suggestive.²

The fragment (v. 34-41) gives the descend-the thirteenth generation. Jarha (as also the lad in 1 S. 30 13) was most probably a native of the near-lying country of Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2*b*), and the obscure name Sheshan reminds us both of the Hebronite Sheshai and of the Egyptian designation šasu (strictly 𐤑𐤑𐤏) 'bedouin,' with which SHESHAI (g.v.), has been connected.³

It is worth noticing that v. 34-41 are independent of the preceding verses, and that the introduction of Sheshan in v. 31*b* is probably secondary (contrast the details with v. 34*a*). It is not certain therefore that he was a Jerahmeelite. The name of the Musrite servant, on the other hand, seems to be an eponym of the clan Jerahmeel itself. Possibly the genealogy is to be interpreted to mean that Jerahmeel moved N. from Musri and settled in the vicinity of Hebron (compare Sheshan with Sbesbai).

It has been suggested elsewhere that the oldest features of Korah's revolt (Nu. 16) belong to the tradition of a journey from the Musrite Kadesh to Judah (see EXODUS i., § 6).⁴ Now Korah, even in the earlier strands of P, is not a Levite; it is possible that he was originally a Calebite (cp KORAH i. 2). It is tempting, therefore, to associate Peleth the father of On (or Onan [𐤍𐤏], cp Onam above) with the same name in the genealogy of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2 33),⁵ and to regard the clan as participating in the revolt. (The significance of the clan-name Peleth and the traces of the northward migration or extension of the Jerahmeelites are considered elsewhere. See NEGEB, § 2.)

Among other features of interest in the genealogy of Jarha⁶ are the two names Nathan and Zabad (v. 36) who, it has sometimes been suggested, are no other than the prophet and officer (see ZABUD, 1) of the days of David and Solomon. When we consider the influence of the far S. of Palestine upon the worship of Yahwē this view cannot be pronounced altogether arbitrary. If, as has been indicated elsewhere (see GENEALOGIES, § 7 [v.]), there is evidence to show that the names of Yahwē's Levites are largely derived from the far S., surely Nathan (although not a Levite) may well have been of Jerahmeelite or even Musrite origin.⁷

Another well-known figure may perhaps have had a similar origin. Marquart (Fund. 12) has already observed that Samuel's genealogy in 1 S. 11 is two-fold, and that he is traced back to Jerahmeel (see JEROHAM, 1) and Tahath (Tohu, etc.) respectively. We might conjecture, therefore, that Samuel was a Jerahmeelite, but at a later date was represented as an Ephraimite (see TAHATH). But as an alternative suggestion it is no less possible that the Jerahmeelite notices should belong (as a marginal note) to the name of Eli who is introduced suddenly without word or comment in z. 3. This view, moreover, perhaps gains in probability when we notice (1) the un-Hebraic character of the names of Eli's descendants, which find their analogy only in Egyptian (see PHINEHAS) or South Arabian (cp ELI, HOPHNI), and (2) the presence of a tradition (a late one, it is true, see SAMUEL ii., § 4) which would seem to connect Eli's house with Moses¹ in Egypt, or perhaps, originally, in Mu'ri (I S. 2. 27).²

³ Cp the Hebronite and Geshurite TALMAL. May we further identify the Jerahmeelite name Ahban (see AHBAN) with the Hebronite Ahiman (אֲחִימָן)?

⁷ Not the prophet only; perhaps also his king (but see JUDAH). One observes how persistently tradition sends David to the S. of Judah, to wander in the wilderness of Paran, 1 S. 25 1 (on the text see H. P. Smith), or to fight against the inhabitants of the land bordering on Mizraim (Musri), ib. 27 8; see the present writer's note in AJSL, l.c.

If the suggestions made in this and certain other articles with regard to suspected corruptions of text in

MT and in G are accepted, the Jerahmeelites were a much more important tribe, or perhaps collection of tribes, than we have imagined. Under all sorts of disguises, it has been suspected, the name meets us again and again, both in narratives and in genealogies. Some of the clans or tribes of Jerahmeel evidently suffered the fate described in I S. 15, I Ch. 44: 43; others were absorbed by Judah or even by more northern Israelite tribes. The following is a list, probably incomplete, of OT names which may have been corrupted from 'Jerahmeel.'

(a) Addar and Hakkarka, Josh. 15. 3. Note that Hezron, Addar, and Hakkarka are mentioned together; Hakkarka is a dittographed 'Jerahmeel.' In Gen. 46: 12 and parallels Hezron, son of Perez, is a brother of Hamul (cp ?). This is geographically important. See HAZAR-ADDAR, KARKAA, NEGEB.

(b) Amalek. The name is unintelligible; the centre of the Amalekites must have been close to the Jerahmeelites. To admit the identity of Amalek and Jerahmeel is in accordance with many similar necessary identifications, and throws a bright light on many passages. Of course, it was only a section of the Amalekites that Saul overcame, and only with a section that David fought. See (h), and on 'mount of the Amalekites' (Judg. 12: 15), see PIRATHON.

(c) Gen. 16: 14 BEER-LAHAI-ROI (between Kadesh and Bered) should be 'Beer-jerahme'eli—i.e., 'Well of the Jerahmeelites.' The name 'Jerahmeel' is derived from 'רַחֵם יְהוָה'; 'she called the name of Yahwè El-rahamim; for she had said, Will God indeed have compassion?' (i. 13, יְרַחֵם אֱלֹהִים). Cp ISAAC.

(d) Job 32: 2, בְּרַמָּל, like Ram (cp s), is a fragment of יְרַחֵם. See JOB, BOOK OF, § 9.

(e) Probably Joash (I K. 22: 25) as well as Jerahmeel (Jer. 36: 26, see 3 below) was of Jerahmeelite extraction. 'Jerahmeel ben-hammelech' is surely absurd; 'ben-hammelech' itself comes from 'ben-jerahmeel.'

(f) The 'Carmel' of Josh. 15: 55, also called hak-Karmel (I S. 15: 12, etc.), is no doubt from 'Jerahmeel.' Was the 'Carmel' of I S. 15: 12 really the place now called el-Karmul? This is not perhaps necessary (see SAUL, § 4 ad init. n.). In I S. 15: 5 read 'cities (G) of Jerahmeel'; and cp 30: 29 (for text cp CARMEL, 2, col. 706, n. 2).

(g) 2 Ch. 26: 7. See GUR-BAAI. (h) I Ch. 4: 40, important geographically (see NEGEB) and historically. HAM (q.v. 1, end) is quite impossible. (i) Hamul b. Judah (Gen. 46: 12, etc.). Cp (a) and see HAMUL, MAHOL. (j) Jamelech, a Simeonite (I Ch. 4: 34). (k) I Ch. 2: 34 f. See JARHA, and cp above. (l) I Ch. 4: 16, 2 Ch. 29: 12. Note that 'Jehalelel' was the 'father' of Ziph; he is co-ordinated with Caleb. (m) I S. 1: 1. See JEROHAM, 1, and cp above, § 3. (n) Josh. 15: 56, I Ch. 2: 44, see JORDEAM, JORKEAM. (o) 2 K. 14: 7.

(p) Kemuel, Gen. 22: 21. Read 'Uz his first-horn, and Ahibuz, and Jerahmeel, and Abiram, and note that Ahibuz (see AHI, 1) and Michael (I Ch. 5: 13 f.) are brought into connection respectively with Salecah (miswritten Milcah in Gen. 22: 21), and with 'Gilead in Bashan' in I Ch. 5: 11-16. See ZELOPHEIAD. (q) I K. 4: 31 (5: 11). See MAHOL. (r) Michael, I Ch. 5: 13 f. See (p).

(s) Ram (see d) was brother of Jerahmeel (I Ch. 2: 9); on Job 32: 2, see JOB, BOOK OF, § 9, and note that Buz and Aram (= Ram = Jerahmeel) are brothers (Gen. 22: 21).

(t) Raham, I Ch. 2: 44. Cp (u). (u) Rekem, I Ch. 2: 43 f. In this connection note that the Targumic name for KADESH (רַקַּם or רַקַּם נִיבָה) must be a corruption of 'Jerahmeel,' and that בני רקם in Judg. 6: 33 7: 12 8: 10 and I K. 15: 10 and Job 1: 3 should most probably be בני רַקַּם, בני יְרַחֵם, בני יְרַחֵם, 'sons of Jerahmeel.'

(v) Salt, city and valley of ('ir and çā hammélat), Josh. 15: 62; 2 K. 14: 7. Kittel well points out the improbability that Joktheel in 'the valley of Petra.' It is 'Jerahmeel' in 'the valley of Jerahmeel.' See SALT, CITY OF.

(x) On the singular corruptions in the two similar passages, Nu. 21: 1 Judg. 1: 16 see NEGEB, § 2.

(y) Last of all we mention a hypothesis which in the light of (c) is so probable that it deserves more space than we can give to it. Ah-rahah is not a dialectic form of Abram or ABIRAM (q.v.), nor yet = 'the beloved father' (Harkavy), but comes from

Many springs in Palestine now bear the name of uerdeh (Conder, PELO, '78, p. 22), which is understood by the peasantry in the sense suggested above for this Jered. Cp Koran 18: 9, 'We will drive the sinners to hell as herds going to water.' T. K. C.

According to 1: 1 Jeremiah was the son of Hilkiah and belonged to a priestly family dwelling at Anathoth. Many since Clement of Alexandria and Jerome have maintained the identity of his father with the Hilkiah of 2 K. 22: 4, but on no sufficient grounds. Whether the editor thought of Jeremiah's father as the high priest, may be doubtful; probably he drew his statement from the biographical work (see next article, § 17). According to chap. 32 Jeremiah had an uncle named Shallum and a cousin named Hanamel; from 16: 1 it is to be inferred that Jeremiah was never married.

The primary sources of information respecting the prophet are his own oracles. The biographical sketches in the book that bears his name come from a 2. Life. work written a long time after his death. There is no testimony outside of the book of Jeremiah that has any independent value. The earliest references to him (2 Ch. 35: 25 36: 20 ff. Ecclus. 49: 7) come from the second century B.C. Even after criticism has done its full work, however, it remains possible with some degree of certainty to trace the general course of his career.

Jeremiah was born, it would seem, at ANATHOTH [q.v.]; perhaps about 650, for we know that he first came forward in 625. At what time of life a man might enter the priesthood in the days before D and P, is not known. The event which gave him a prophetic impulse may have been a Scytho-Chaldean invasion of Syria in the first year of Nahopolassar (43 ff.). Probably the impulse was accelerated by a vision, though the story in chap. I reflects not only his own later experiences, but also the estimate of his work in a subsequent age, based on oracles not proceeding from him. It is probable that the reform movement five years later enlisted his efforts (Duhm, Cheyne) and that he proclaimed the new law in Anathoth (111 ff.), though it is not likely that he knew how it originated or was equally interested in all its injunctions. Whether there was a local cult at Anathoth causing opposition on the part of his townsmen and such persecution as to call forth from him fierce imprecations (1121-23) must be left in doubt. He probably took up his abode at Jerusalem after 620.

Before the end of Josiah's reign Jeremiah seems to have recognised the futility of a reform carried out by the strong arm of the state (23). Hence he watched the rising Chaldean power, not as Habakkuk in the hope of deliverance from Assyrian supremacy, but as an instrument in Yahwé's hand to bring Judah to repentance or to ruin. The relative weakness of Egypt he perceived now as in the days of Zedekiah, just as Isaiah had seen that of Damascus as against Assyria. This explains the absence of any encouraging oracle before the battle of Megiddo and any lamentation after that event, a lack felt in later times and made good by ascribing to him an anonymous lament over Josiah (2 Ch. 35 25). The fall of Nineveh in 606 and Nebuchadrezzar's march upon Syria in 605 may have led Jeremiah to utter some such definite prophecy as is mentioned in 36 29, predicting the conquest of Judea by the king of Babylon. Concerning the story found in that chapter, cp the next article (§ 17). Possibly at a time when the defeat of Necho's arms had driven the people with renewed zeal to the Yahwé-cult in the temple, Jeremiah appeared with the oracle reported in 7 ff. and 26. It may have been in the years when Nebuchadrezzar was unable to follow up his victory and bring Judah to subjection that Jehoiakim was guilty of undertaking great building enterprises without paying the labourers engaged (22 13 ff.; on the text see JEHOIAKIM). Jeremiah probably concealed himself during this reign, and there seems to be no evidence that he suffered any persecution. Even though his predictions concerning Jehoiakim failed, and the king apparently died in peace and was 'joined to his fathers,' Jeremiah still looked for a Chaldean army and threatened Jehoiachin and his mother with exile (22 24-27 29: 28 is a gloss). The idea that at this time Jeremiah undertook two journeys to the Euphrates (131 ff.) cannot be seriously entertained (see EUPHRATES ii.). The word indeed denotes the Euphrates (cp Gen. 2 14), not Ephrath, or Para; but the account is probably a dramatization of a mere simile, and not historical in any sense.

At some time in the reign of Zedekiah, when the condition of affairs before the deportation of 597, for which the exiled nobility had once been held responsible, had sufficiently receded from view to appear good in comparison with present conditions, Jeremiah seems to have had a vision of two baskets of figs in front of the temple, and explained that Zedekiah and his princes and subjects were like bad figs, while Jehoiachin and the exiles were like good figs (24). A later writer, who is even familiar with an Egyptian gôlah (CAPTIVITY) (v. 8), has apparently carried the comparison beyond the point intended. Chap. 28, which probably contains a historical nucleus, is more likely to show the real attitude of the prophet at this time. HANANIAH (g.v.) prophesies that Jehoiachin and the exiles shall return with the sacred vessels in two years. Jeremiah would be glad to have Jehoiachin back; but he does not believe in a return. It is not merely the short term set by Hananiah that he objects to. He recognises as a mark of the true prophets of the past that they only announced coming judgment, and he takes his place with them. Hence he makes absolutely no suggestion of a future return of exiles, but affirms uncompromisingly the inevitable subjection of all lands to Nebuchadrezzar. Whether he actually threatened Hananiah with death within a year, may perhaps be questioned. The doctrine of the infallibility of prophecy sufficiently explains the account of Hananiah's death. The alleged epistles of Jeremiah to Babylonian Jews (in chap. 29) cannot be used as historical material, nor the story of his sending bands and yokes to various nations in chap. 27. But 23 9 ff. shows that the conspiracy in which Zedekiah became involved led Jeremiah into sharp conflicts with prophets whose convictions were different from his own. In 587, when Nebuchadrezzar temporarily raised the siege of Jerusalem, Zedekiah sent a request to Jeremiah to consult Yahwé as to the prospect, and received pressing advice to surrender (21 1-10 37 3-10). At this time Jeremiah's indignation was aroused by the reduction to slavery of freedmen solemnly emancipated at the approach of Nebuchadrezzar (34). It was only natural, after his advice just mentioned, that he should be arrested when he attempted to withdraw to Anathoth, probably with the intention of securing for himself a piece of property there (37 11-16). This land he may actually have had an opportunity of purchasing later (32). What became of the prophet when the city was taken is not known, since the special concern for his welfare on the part of Nebuchadrezzar and Nabuzaradan probably is as apocryphal as the general's pious address, 39 11 ff. 40 2-6. But a political prisoner is likely to have fared better than a rebel.

Concerning the end of the prophet's life there are many legends.

According to 2 Macc. 2 4 ff. Jeremiah carried away in safety the tabernacle, the ark, and the altar of incense, and concealed them in a hollow cave in the mountain where Moses died in Moab. It is possible that this legend found its supplement in a story of the prophet's translation in so appropriate a spot. This would account for his appearance in splendour to Judas the Maccabee (2 Macc. 15 12 ff.), his living with translated heroes like Enoch and Elijah (Sixtus Sinensis as quoted by Neumann), his expected return as a precursor of the Messiah (Mt. 16 13 f., Jn. 1 21 74) or in the last time as one of the two witnesses of Rev. 11 3 (Victorinus ad loc.). Another legend, which still found a place in an appendix to the book of Jeremiah, brought him with 'the whole remnant of Judah' to Daphnæ, there to prophesy the utter destruction of the Egyptian gôlah, 42 44. When this addition was made to the Book of Jeremiah, the story of his being stoned to death at Daphnæ (Jerome, Tert., Epiphanius) by his own people or by the Egyptians had apparently not developed. Of still later origin are other stories: Jeremiah's prediction of a saviour before whom the Egyptian idols would fall to the ground (leading to the worship of the virgin and the child: Chron. pasch. in Fabricius), the burial of the prophet ἐν τῷ πυρὶ τῆς αἰχμαλίας Φαραώ (which seems to denote a pyramid) because he saved the Egyptians from crocodiles and snakes (Epiphanius, de viis prophetarum), the visit of Alexander to the tomb of the prophet who had predicted his victories over the nations and the removal of the ashes to Alexandria (Chron. pasch.), and the influence on Greek philosophers visiting Egypt of the esoteric wisdom he had taught there (Ambrosius, Augustine, Générard). According to a legend preserved in Seder 'ôlam rabbâ, 26 77, Jeremiah was carried to Babylon with Baruch by Nebuchadrezzar after his conquest of Egypt, while Rasbi seems to imply only that Jeremiah and Baruch returned to Palestine (ad Jer. 44 14). Whether in this mass of late legends there is anywhere a grain of historic fact, cannot readily be ascertained.

The prophetic utterances of Jeremiah derive their character from his conviction that he was inspired by

3. Message. Yahwé and from his conception of Yahwé's nature, purposes and demands. Like Amos and Isaiah, he seems to have been impelled to prophesy by a series of visions. In a trance he hears Yahwé's voice bidding him speak as a prophet, and feels Yahwé's hand touching his lips consecrating them to the proclamation of Yahwé's oracles. On two subsequent occasions, when in the same condition, he saw a rod of an almond tree and a seething cauldron coming from the N. The former vision he interpreted as an assurance that Yahwé would 'watch over' (רָשָׁ; see ALMOND) his word, consequently as a pledge that the oracles would be fulfilled; the latter he understood as signifying that nations from the N. would invade Palestine. These ecstatic experiences were doubtless preceded by eager observation of the signs of the times and stifled impulses to speak. Jeremiah had in waking hours seen the movements in history of that mysterious hand which in the vision brought the cauldron from the N. and dedicated him as a prophet. A similar experience may have come in Zedekiah's reign when, hearing the murmurs of the approaching storm, and reflecting upon the degeneracy of the present generation, he had his vision of the figs (24). That Yahwè had actually revealed himself to him, he never seems to have questioned; nor that the word of judgment he announced was actually Yahwè's word. The events justified his faith. Whether the Scythian invasion passed so harmlessly by the territory over which Josiah reigned as is generally supposed, cannot, with our scanty information, be determined. There is no intimation of a disenchantment like that of Ezekiel in regard to Tyre. The capture of Jerusalem in 597 and the deportation of Jehoiachin must have been understood by Jeremiah as a vindication of Yahwè's word.

Another source of assurance was the character of the oracles he felt divinely impelled to utter. He was impressed by their similarity to the oracles of true prophets in the past. Like them he prophesied, not smooth things, but coming judgment. Like theirs, his oracles were immediate, spontaneous utterances. He contrasted them with the oracles also delivered in the name of Yahwè by the prophets opposed to him, and was struck by the difference in tone, the cheerful tenor, the failure to go to the root of the evil, the lack of originality (239 ff.). He noticed their use of popular phrases, and accused them of stealing oracles one from another (v. 30), while his own communion with Yahwè brought him ever fresh supplies of thought and speech, and prevented him from copying even the words of the earlier prophets that had come down to him. He watched their easy acceptance of the pleasures of life, while his own moral earnestness and sense of impending catastrophe enjoined upon him absolute celibacy and bade him keep aloof even from the ordinary expressions of sympathy, and he accused them of immoral conduct. His spiritual isolation in such an environment became to him an evidence of the genuineness of his experience. If he was right, his opponents were wrong; if he was inspired, they put forth false claims, proclaiming in the name of Yahwè oracles that they had themselves thought out. He even forbade the use of the word 'oracle,' אָמַר (2336; see PROPHECY). While all prophethood, even that of Jeremiah's less radical colleagues, must ultimately rest on a sense of personal communion with a divine being, this sense seems to have been specially keen in his case. The snatches of poetry, elegies, psalms, dialogues, frequently adduced to show that in this respect Jeremiah anticipated the type of piety that meets us in the Psalter, may indeed be later additions to the book; but the individualistic character of his religious life is abundantly evident.

This prophetic consciousness is influenced by, and in turn reacts upon, his conception of Yahwè. Yahwè is

4. Conception of Yahwè. Israel's god. He is Israel's father to whom the nation owes its existence, and therefore its allegiance. Like Hosea, Jeremiah also conceives of Israel as Yahwè's wife. But while Yahwè has remained faithful, the nation has broken its marriage vows. By its adultery with strangers—i. e., its worship of the gods of other nations—it has forfeited its rights. Unlike HOSEA, Jeremiah deems it impossible that the adulterous wife should be taken back again (31 ff.). The noble vine has become a degenerate plant (221). This abandonment of Yahwè is all the more amazing, as other nations remain faithful to their gods (211: הַגּוֹיִם לֹא אֱלֹהִים [211a] has the appearance of a later gloss), though these are but broken cisterns as compared with a fountain of living waters (213). However numerous these gods may be, they can give no aid in times of trouble (228). They are as impotent as their sacred symbols, the asêras and the massêbas, to which the worshippers address such endearing terms as 'my father' and 'my begetter' (227). Whether Jeremiah actually identified the gods of the nations with stocks and stones, may be doubted. But it is possible that his words paved the way for the positive and distinct utterances of 2 Isaiah (cp IDOLATRY).

Yahwè determines what shall befall his people. He has absolute power over its destiny (186). He sends the northern hordes into Palestine; he subdues the nations to Nebuchadrezzar. Yahwè is not a 'numen' limited to the neighbourhood of his shrine, but a god who can betake himself to distant places, whether in heaven or on earth, so that no man can escape from him (2323 f.). He is just in all his dealings with the nations, treating them according to their merits (187 ff.)

Yahwè's purposes are in harmony with his nature. He reveals them to his servants. 'What is Yahwè about to do?' is the question that bids the prophet's eyes pierce the darkness of the future, and makes him a soothsayer. Jeremiah's predictions were not based on shrewd political observations, but on his impressions, present with him, whether he was waking or sleeping, of what such a god as he conceived Yahwè to be would necessarily have in mind to do, when historical circumstances showed that he was ready to act. That it was Yahwè's purpose to put Judah, as well as the surrounding nations, into the hand of the growing Chaldean power, was the burden of Jeremiah's message during a period of almost forty years. But the ulterior divine motive was to him the moral reformation of the people.

Only through foreign oppression could that rebellious disposition (לִבְּיָדָיו, 724) which showed itself in idolatry and unrighteousness be overcome. This oppression must last until the reformation has taken place. Hence Jeremiah indulges in no vain speculations as to the length of the Chaldean suzerainty; hence he is absolutely convinced of the impossibility of resistance and exhorts Zedekiah and his people to willing submission; hence he lays down as a criterion of true prophethood the preaching of judgment to come with its tendency to lead men away from their evil doings (288 2322). Beyond this he seems to have had no eschatology. If the nation should repent, Yahwè would also change his treatment of the people (187 ff.). But there being as yet no evidence of repentance, the Chaldean yoke must continue and should be quietly carried rather than aggravated by rebellion. Those who by the preaching of repentance worked for the reformation of character, proved themselves in the midst of their labours to belong to the true prophetic order (288). Like his predecessors, Jeremiah believed in the power of Yahwè's judgments to touch the springs of action and lead to a change of conduct. In this he differed widely from the great writer, who might be designated a Second Jeremiah (Jer. 30 f.), who believed that the grace of Yahwè, shown in the restoration of national independence and prosperity, could alone accomplish that thorough reformation which foreign oppression and prophetic preaching had failed to effect.

Yahwè's supreme demand is purity within, a circumcision of ear and heart, a removal of the carnal disposition preventing Yahwè's voice from being heard and, his will from being understood and accepted (44 14 610). The outward forms of the cult have not been ordained by Yahwè. 'I spake not unto your fathers nor commanded them when I brought them up from the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings and sacrifices' (722). This is the prophet's declaration of independence. The law promulgated in 620 commanded in Yahwè's name numerous burnt-offerings and sacrifices. However favourably Jeremiah may have been impressed at the outset by the moral tone of the Deuteronomic law, its denunciation of idolatry, and possibly also its tendency to render the sacrifices of animals a less prominent feature of life, he did not believe that Yahwè had ordered such offerings; and when he observed the 'carnal' confidence in the possession of this law, he had no hesitation in openly denouncing it as a fraud and a forgery¹ (88). Thus the emancipation of religion from the state and the cult, prepared by the earlier prophets, was most fully carried out by Jeremiah.

The estimate of Jeremiah's character must necessarily depend on the student's critical position. Renan's harsh judgment of him as a fanatic filled with hatred of the human race is based solely on the spurious oracles against the foreign nations. Jeremiah's real attitude was one of kindly concern for the welfare of these nations and desire for their moral reformation through the pressure of the Chaldean yoke. The charges made by some writers against the prophet of cowardice and untruthfulness, vanity and vindictiveness, are largely founded on the narratives of a story-book whose accuracy is too unquestioningly recognised. Our information is too scanty to allow us to assert that he cannot have hurled intemperate curses at his opponents, particularly such prophets as Hananiah; but neither can we confidently affirm that he did. As to the contention of Maurice Vernes that a prophet who gave to his people the counsel of surrender is a historically impossible character, it arises from his failure to recognise the highest type of patriotism, and to take due account of the religious genius who subordinates all considerations of state to the absolute demands of the divinity. On the other hand, the conception of Jeremiah as the prophet of the new covenant, the foreteller of the restoration of the monarchy and the return of the exiles after seventy years, is based on oracles wrongly and inconsistently ascribed to him. The representation of him as the 'weeping prophet' is derived from the late book of Lamentations and the similar elegies interspersed by editors among his oracles.

The salient features of Jeremiah's character are his sternness and his veracity, his loyalty and his courage, his sadness and his tenderness. A hush falls on the festive assembly, the crowded mart, the king's court when this solemn figure appears. Above 'the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride,' his strident notes of warning and denunciation rise and bring presentiments of coming ill. Never a word of hope; ever the stern rebuke and the call to repentance! But this sternness is born of earnest thought and of unflinching regard for truth. If his hand seeks to rend the veil of the future, it is not to satisfy vain curiosity, but to ascertain the truth that he may proclaim it, bitter though it be, for the ultimate good of the people. As the ambassador of Yahwè, he has no fear of earth's mighty ones, whether kings, or princes, or prophets, or priests. Nor is he concerned whether his preaching may 'weaken the hands of the men of war.' His physical courage may not always be equal to his spiritual intrepidity. His sensitive nature may shrink from actual suffering, and he may at times seek his safety in flight. But when the word of Yahwè comes, he consults not with flesh and blood, but proclaims his message regardless of consequences. With no family life as a haven of rest for his storm-tossed spirit, his lot is sad. Yet his very words of resignation betray tenderness of heart. Whatever its end may have been, his life was a long and noble martyrdom.

In most MSS and printed editions of MT this book is called ירמיה.

At the time of the Chronicler (c. 200 B.C.) this form of the name seems to have been more common than the earlier ירמיהו (Neh. 10:3 [2] 12:34 1 Ch. 5:24 12:4 10 ירמיהו; only

1. Title. 1 Ch. 12:13 ירמיהו (77), although Ben-Sira still wrote ירמיהו, Ecclesi. 49:6. Our oldest MSS of C and the versions based on it give as the title a transliteration that may represent either form (ερεμιας; so also Coptic). Melito (Eus. HE 4:20) and Origen refer to the book as Ἱερεμίας, ἐν τῷ Ἱερεμιά, Ep. ad Afr. 226). Jerome uses the same title (Prot. gal. 10 2 Reg.), and ירמיהו is the designation in Bābā bathrā 14b.

The book seems once to have occupied the first place among the prophetae posteriores. A baraita in Bābā

2. Position in bathrā (14b 15a) gives the following order of these prophets: Jeremiah, Canon.

Ezekiel, Isaiah, Minor Prophets; and the Talmudic tract explains that Isaiah was placed after Jeremiah and Ezekiel because 'Kings ends in desolation, Jeremiah is all desolation, Ezekiel begins with desolation and ends with consolation, and Isaiah is all consolation. This Talmudic arrangement was followed by many copyists (20 cited by Kenn., 8 by De Rossi, 6 by Ginsb.), and also by 1 MS of the Masorah in the Palatinate Library, cp Buxtorf, Tiberias, 28b. The oldest testimony for the order, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Minor Prophets, is Jerome (l.c.). In 380 A.D., he still adhered to the arrangement found in his copy of the LXX—viz., Minor Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel (Ep. ad Paulinam). To this order Codex Alexandrinus, Cyril (Cat. 4:331) and Gregory Naz. (Op. 298) bear witness. That it was determined by chronological considerations is manifest, whilst the insertion of Daniel shows its independence of the Babylonian or Palestinian tradition preserved in the Talmud.

No conclusions can be drawn from the MSS as to the original order in LXX. Peshitta (Poc. Bodl. Lee)¹ presents the succession: Isaiah, Minor Prophets, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel; and the Ethiopic version has Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Minor Prophets. Origen's arrangement (1., Jer., Dan., Ez.) places Daniel before Ezekiel, and Melito's (1., Jer., Min. Pr., Dan., Ez.) indicates another position for Minor Prophets omitted by Origen.

There is evidence that the book at one time contained some elements now found elsewhere or lost.

As Josephus does not mention separately Lamentations in c. Ap. 18, he probably knew it only as a part of Jeremiah. The same is presum-

3. Contents. ably true of Melito. Origen distinctly states that he regarded Lamentations and the Epistle (Baruch 1-5 and 6?) as belonging to Jeremiah (l.c.). Later patristic writers, like Athanasius, Augustine, Chrysostom, Hilary, and Ambrose, regularly include Lamentations, Baruch and Epistle in Jeremiah (cp Hody, ¹ [There are of course exceptions in other MSS. The famous Cod. Ambrosianus, for example, gives this order: Isaiah, Jeremiah (with Lam., Ep. Jer., and Fpp. of Baruch), Ezekiel, Minor Prophets, Daniel (with Bel and Dragon)].

De bibl., 646 ff.). In the Ethiopic Bible the book comprises also the Paralipomena Jeremiae (Dillmann, Chrest. Aeth. 1-15; Ceriani, Monumenta, 19-18) and the fragment containing the passage quoted in Mt. 279. These works, having attached themselves to Jeremiah somewhat after the fashion of the additions to Daniel and Esther, were gradually provided with separate headings and severed from the volume.

The same is possibly the case in the seven following instances:—

(1) In 2 Ch. 35 23 an elegy on the death of Josiah is ascribed to Jeremiah. It seems to have had a place at one time among the threnodies of Lamentations (על הקינות; read with קִינָה and with הַתְּהִיבָה). See LAMENTATIONS, and cp Schmidt, Introd. to Jer.

(2) In 2 Ch. 36 22 ff. and Ezra 1-3, Is. 44 28, is distinctly quoted as a word of Jeremiah. The most natural explanation is that Is. 40 ff., being anonymous, and revealing a marked kinship to Jer. 30-33, found a temporary home in our volume before it was finally attached to Isaiah, where it may have been already established by 180 B.C. (cp Ecclus. 48 24 f.).

(3) In 2 Macc. 2 1 ff. certain statements are made on the authority of a work entitled 'Jeremiah, the Prophet.' Two views are possible. (a) I. 2 may be simply reminiscent of Jer. 10 9, and vv. 4 ff. may originally have been a haggadic annotation to Jer. 3 16, intended to explain and to soften the effect of that passage, but afterwards removed from the text; or (b) the author may have had before him the biographical work probably known by the same title. That he designates his source as 'scripture' (γραφή), would be natural on either hypothesis. It is less likely that the Paralipomena Jeremiae, though essentially of Jewish origin, already existed when 2 Macc. was written.

(4) Mt. 27 9 is quoted from 'Jeremiah the Prophet,' the term being the same as that used in Mt. 2 17. This passage is not found in our present text. Did the author of Mt. read it in his copy of Jeremiah, or in an Apocryphon Jeremiae? (Cp JUDAS ISCARIOT, § 8.)

(5) Justin, Dial. c. Tryph. 72, charges the Jews with having erased from Jer. a passage probably of Christian origin.

(6) Whether Eph. 5 14 found its way into the apocryphon from the margin of Jeremiah, or belonged to the Apocalypse of Elijah, cannot yet be determined.

(7) Lactantius (48) found in his text the words 'beatus qui erat antequam nasceretur' in Jer. 1 5. How old this gloss was is unknown. In regard to Justin's accusation against the Jews that they had erased Jer. 11 9, it is altogether probable that there was a basis of fact for the statement. Certain MSS known to Justin lacked the passage. But this may have been due in part to its (possible) absence in a copy older than that used by S , and only in part to its clumsy yet uncomfortable apologetic use by Christians. Its occurrence in all extant MSS simply shows that it finally maintained itself.

On the other hand, MT contains many elements that have been added even after the book assumed substantially its present form (see below).

It has been maintained that Josephus (Ant. x. 5 1, § 79) divided the book into two volumes, either Jeremiah and Lamentations (Venema, Meulenbelt) or Jer. 1-24 and 25-52 (Eichhorn, Bertholdt).

Ordinarily the words 'who was the first that wrote and left behind him in writing two books concerning these things' (ὁς πρῶτος περὶ τούτων δύο βιβλίου γραψάσας κατέλιπεν) are understood as referring to Ezekiel. But Ez. 1-39 and 40-48 cannot be meant (Stephen Hunt, Bertholet), as 40-48 contains no prophecy of the exile. Rather it is probable that those passages quoted from Ezekiel by Clement, Tertullian, and others (cp Fabricius, Cod. Pseudepigr. 1 117 ff.) had at the time of our glossator been severed from the canonical Ezekiel and constituted an independent volume. That the words quoted are a later gloss, seems probable; S is lacking in many MSS, and Josephus himself could scarcely have considered Ezekiel as earlier than Jeremiah.

The following are the chief schemes that have been proposed for dividing the book:—

- Écolampadius: (1) 1-31, (2) 32-39, (3) 40-52.
- Heidegger: (1) 1-86, (2) 87-44, (3) 45, (4) 46-51, (5) 52.
- H. Alting, Hottinger, Venema, Rosenmüller, De Wette, Payne Smith, Streane: (1) 1-39, (2) 40-45, (3) 46-51, (4) 52.
- Alpinus: (1) 1-20, (2) 21-39, (3) 40-42.
- J. Alting: (1) 1, (2) 2-51, (3) 52.
- Eichhorn: (1) 1-24, (2) 25-51, app. 52.
- Bertholdt: (1) 1-24, (2) 46-51, (3) 25-45, app. 52.
- Stäbelin, with (1) and (2) united, also Hävernick, Keil: (1) 1-10, (2) 11-24, (3) 25-29, (4) 30-33, (5) 34-39, (6) 40-45, (7) 46-51, app. 52.
- Movers: (1) 1-20 26 46-49, (2) 30 7 33, (3) 50 7, (4) 23 22 24, (5) 21 34 37 82 83-44, (6) 27-29.
- Schmieder: (1) 1-12, (2) 13-25, (3) 26-33, (4) 34-39, (5) 40-45, (6) 46-51, (7) 52.
- Neumann: (1) 1, (2) 2-17, (3) 18 7, (4) 20-45, (5) 46-51, (6) 52.
- Ewald: (1) 1, (2) 2-24, (3) 46-49, 25, app. 26-29, (4) 30-33, app. 34 7, (5) 36, 45, app. 50 7, and 52.
- Hitzig: (1) 1-12 6, (2) 25, (3) 26, (4) 35, (5) 36, (6) 45, (7) 46-49 and (8) 12 8-24, (9) 27-29, (10) 30-33, (11) 50 7, (12) 52.
- Scholz: (1) 1-10, (2) 11-20, (3) 21-24, (4) 25 1-14, 46-51, (5) 25 15-33, (6) 34-44, app. 45 and 52.
- Delitzsch: (1) 1-6, (2) 7-12, (3) 13-20, (4) 21-25, (5) 26-29, (6) 30-33, (7) 34-38, (8) 39-45, (9) 46-51, app. 52.

The marked differences between the various attempts clearly indicate the futility of proving a logical, any more than a chronological arrangement, either in MT or in S . Nevertheless, they have been of value in leading the way to a better understanding of the composition of the book.

It is evident that a chronological arrangement was once intended, as the order in 1-20, the headings and the general sequence of sections, especially in S , suggest. It is equally clear that, with no regard to the chronology, philippic against the reigning princes have been gathered in 21-24, attacks upon rival prophets in 26-29, promises of restoration in 30-33, and prophecies concerning the other nations in 46-51. Later accretions to collections previously arranged chronologically or according to the subject matter, as well as insertion or addition of later collections, have undoubtedly contributed to the present disorder. This is probably the element of truth in Graf's supplementary hypothesis according to which the book is 'not a collection, but rather a larger whole arising out of an originally complete work through addition and expansion.' But the fruitless endeavours to find a rational order have resulted in calling renewed attention to the headings with their time-indications, and to the groups of chapters that inevitably point to independent collections earlier than the book in its present form.

Of the superscriptions, which recur throughout the book, the most frequent is 'the word that came to

Jeremiah from Yahwè' (דבר אשר יהוה אל ירמיהו מאת יהוה) with or without superscriptions. In all these instances the title may have come from the same hand, although it is also possible that a heading used in an earlier book was imitated. That this was actually done at a late date, and with a small degree of intelligence, is shown by 40 1, which very inappropriately heads a narrative, not a prophecy. Of the same general type are the headings 25 1 26 1 27 1. Yet they bear marks of a different and later origin, such as the use of 'al' (על) for 'al' (אל) in 25 1, the absence of 'to Jeremiah' (אל ירמיהו) in 26 1 reminding us of 50 1 in its earliest form, and ירמיהו in 27 1. In 50 1 S read 'the word of Yahwè which he spoke concerning Babylon' (דבר יהוה אשר דבר על בבל), the prophecy evidently being anonymous at first. It subsequently assumed the form 'the word that Yahwè spake concerning Babylon, by Jeremiah' (דבר יהוה אשר דבר יהוה אל ירמיהו).

to, ובכל ביד ירמיהו, which 'concerning the land of the Chaldeans' was added as a gloss. In the somewhat abbreviated form 'which Yahwē spoke by Jeremiah' (אשר דבר יהוה ביד ירמיהו) this meets us again in 46:13 (G). A later editor, however, changed this into 'the word that Jeremiah the prophet spoke,' in harmony with the then prevailing view of Jeremiah as 'the prophet' נביא (אֵלֶּיךָ אֶת־אֲנִי). The same heading is found in 45:1, both in MT and G. The name of the people referred to was deemed sufficient in the case of certain anonymous prophecies against foreign nations, or the term massā (מַסָּא) was used as in the Book of Isaiah. When grouped together, the mention of Nebuchadrezzar in one of them would naturally suggest Jeremiah as the author of all; but a general superscription to this effect was thought enough and 'of Egypt' (לְמִצְרַיִם) 46:2, 'concerning the Philistines' (לְפִלְשְׁתִּים) 47:1 (G), 'of the children of Ammon' (לְבְנֵי עַמּוֹן) 49:1, 'of Edom' (לְאֲדוֹמִים) 49:7, 'of Damascus' (לְדַמָּשֶׁק) 49:23, 'of Kedar' (לְקֶדֶר) 49:28, 'concerning Elam' (לְעֵילָם) 49:34 remained, the כִּסָּם, if once there, disappearing in deference to the prophet's views on this subject, 23:33f.

The most remarkable title in the book is—אֲשֶׁר דִּבֶּר יְהוָה אֵל—ירמיהו. It occurs 14:1 46:1 49:34 and probably 1:2 as the original heading. In 14:1 בְּצִוּוֹת 14:1 (pronounce צִוּוֹת [cp Pesh., Targ., Mich. Suppl. 299], ἀβροα, siccitas), is an Aramaism, and the chapter is not an oracle; in 46:1 has been added; in 47:1 אֵל פִּלְשְׁתִּים is unnatural following ירמיהו, as is also אֵל עֵילָם in 49:34. But more suspicious still is the phrase itself. There is no parallel for it in Hebrew. Ezek. 12:25 is corrupt (cp Cornill), and Am. 5:1, also quoted by Ewald, is quite regular. When the Greek version was made, 14:1 read יְהוָה דִּבֶּר יְהוָה אֵל, 46:1 was still lacking, 47:1 read יְפִלְשְׁתִּים, 49:34 read יְהוָה דִּבֶּר יְהוָה אֵל, the last words of 25:13 having been cut loose from the nomen regens and made a title of this prophecy. This was subsequently altered into יְהוָה אֵל יְרִמְיָהוּ בְּנֵי נְבִיאֵי הַנְּבִיאִים, given as a superscription to 46:1 and 47:1, and substituted for the phrase used in 14:1. It was also employed as a title by the collector of the first book.

Chap. 12 probably read יְהוָה אֵל יְרִמְיָהוּ בִּימֵי הַדְּרוֹת, אֵלֶּיךָ יְרִמְיָהוּ. The words—אֵלֶּיךָ בֵּן אֲמֹן מֶלֶךְ יְהוּדָה בְּשִׁשֶׁת עֶשְׂרֵה שָׁנָה לְמָלוֹךְ—אֵלֶּיךָ may have been abbreviated אֵלֶּיךָ as well as simply אֵלֶּיךָ, and the former misread אֵלֶּיךָ. The reign was suggested by 36, the year was probably taken from the biographical work. A more elaborate heading would in course of time be demanded, giving information concerning the prophet. It read דִּבֶּר יְהוָה אֵל יְרִמְיָהוּ בֵּן חַלְקִיָּהוּ מִן הַכְּהֹנִים אֲשֶׁר בַּעֲנֻת דְּבָרֵי בְּנֵימִן. Cp G. The omission of הָיָה can scarcely with Giesebrecht be regarded as an infallible sign of pre-exilic authorship. It is evident that the book while it had only this heading could not have contained any oracle considered by the editor to be later than the thirteenth year of Josiah. The addition of collections bearing later dates led to the penning of z. 3. Even then there was nothing in the book that was regarded as later than the fall of Jerusalem.

The time indications are numerous, but are of uncertain value.

They are found in 1:2 (13th Jos.), 3:6 (Jos.), 14:1 (the drought), 21:1 (Zed.), 24:1 (after Jeconiah), 25:1 (4th Jeh.), 26:1 (beg. Jeh.), 27:1 (beg. Jeh.), 28:1 (4th Zed.), 29:1 (after Jec.), 32:1 (10th Zed.), 34:1 (Zed.), 34:8 (Zed.), 35:1 (Jeh.), 36:1 (Jeh.), 37:1 (Zed.), 37:11 (Zed.), 38:1 (Zed.), 39:1 f. (9th and 11th Zed.), 40:1 (after Jer.'s release by Nabuzardan), 41:1 (7th month), 42:7 (after 10 days), 45:1 (4th Jeh.), 46:2 (4th Jeh.), 47:1 (defeat of Gaza by Pharaoh), 49:34 (beg. Zed.), 51:59 (4th Zed.).

The text is not always certain.

In 27:1 G has no superscription. One editor, living later than G, assigned the prophecy to Jehoiakim's reign. So MT. He could not have done this if in the very first sentence he had read 'unto king Zedekiah' (אֵלֶּיךָ זְדַקְיָהוּ); 27:36 is therefore probably a later gloss. Another editor, noticing Zedekiah in v. 12, wrote his name in the heading. So Pesh., Ambrosianus, Ar., Oxon., Kenn. 224.

Some statements are too vague to be of much value. We do not know the date of the particular drought mentioned in 14:1, nor when Pharaoh smote Gaza (47:1). Some are demonstrably wrong, ascribing to certain occasions in the life of Jeremiah oracles not proceeding from him. Thus 25:1 46:2 47:1 49:34 51:59 are manifestly nothing but conjectures of late editors. Others are drawn from popular story books, and cannot be accorded more probably than the stories themselves, as 40:1 44:1 45:1, probably also 32:1 and 35:1.

The entire book 1-20 is evidently assigned by 1:1 f. to the reign of Josiah. This was clearly a mistake. The editor of 26 is probably right in assigning the speech of which 7:ff. gives a more extended report to the time of Jehoiakim. Editors who in some instances found niches in the life of Jeremiah for prophecies written centuries later than his time, as easily as the same service was performed by hymn collectors for David, may occasionally have displayed an admirable critical instinct; but their opinions can have no binding force.

Various introductory formulas are used which often mark off smaller independent oracles. Of these the most important are 'and the word of Yahwē came unto Jeremiah' (וַיְהִי דְבַר יְהוָה אֵל יְרִמְיָהוּ) and 'and the word of Yahwē came unto me' (וַיְהִי דְבַר יְהוָה אֵלַי). In 2:1 G probably read יְהוָה אֵלֶּיךָ אֵלֶּיךָ, and אֵלֶּיךָ אֵלֶּיךָ may have been the original, though abbreviated. In 2:1 G has only καὶ ἐμοί. In 16:1 G probably read ἰνακὴρ יהוה אֵלֶּיךָ אֵלֶּיךָ. In 24:4 Ar. read ἰνακὴρ ἰνακὴρ. In 35:12 G read ἰνακὴρ אֵלֶּיךָ, ἰνακὴρ ἰνακὴρ (in 32:6 this was the reading in Qmg.), while MT has יְרִמְיָהוּ, and likewise 36:1. This proves beyond doubt that יְרִמְיָהוּ was often abbreviated 'י' or simply 'י'. This being the case, there is no unmistakable indication anywhere whether אֵלֶּיךָ or אֵלֶּיךָ was originally written. However, phrases like בְּיַד אֲמֹן יְהוָה אֵלֶּיךָ 17:19, and הֲדַמְנִי 24:1, show that the first person was sometimes used. From the use of the first person no conclusion can of course be drawn as to the Jeremianic origin of a given oracle. Any prophet might use the same formula.

Nevertheless if these superscriptions, as the work of editors living at different periods subsequent to the time of Jeremiah, based on conjecture or doubtful tradition, neither indicate unity of composition or redaction, nor possess any intrinsic authority, they have considerable value as aids in recovering earlier collections, and in exhibiting the successive stages of redaction.

Chap. 13 furnishes positive evidence that the book at one time contained no prophecy indicated as having been spoken by Jeremiah after the fifth month of the eleventh year of Zedekiah. Consequently, 40-44 52 at any rate formed no part of the collection. There is ground for supposing that the three booklets, 25 46-51, 27-29 and 30-33, had as yet no place in the centre of this volume. Chap. 12 supplies equally convincing proof that the book once contained no section indicated as being later than the thirteenth year of Josiah. This title excludes 21-24 and 26 34-39; but it may have served as sufficient heading for 1-20 since no later king or date is mentioned in these chapters. No collector or copyist may have been familiar with the other version of 7:ff. in 26 and the date there given, or have noticed that 11 points to a time later than the discovery of the Law in the eighteenth year of Josiah, or observed that in 19:ff. the relations between Jeremiah and the rulers are more strained than in 7:ff.

6. Earlier collections. of composition or redaction, nor possess any intrinsic authority, they have considerable value as aids in recovering earlier collections, and in exhibiting the successive stages of redaction.

By the aid of the superscriptions the following collections may be recovered. 1. 1-20; 2. 21-24; 3. 25 46-51; 4. 26-29; 5. 30-33; 6. 34-39; 7. 40-44. Whilst 13 clearly shows that 40-44 once circulated separately, and the character of the narrative confirms this observation, the same cannot be affirmed concerning 34-39. In the work whence these chapters were taken 34 37-39 on the one hand, and (26) 35:ff. (45) on the other, would seem to have belonged together (Cornill). Not only by sub-headings and solemn introductory formulas, but even more by the editorial custom of prefacing an oracle with appropriate words, or of adding at the end words mostly of a consolatory nature, it is to a certain extent possible to discover the smaller collections used in making these books.

1. Chaps. 1-20. In Bk. I the two oracles, 14-19 11-19 (a), evidently form an independent section; 21-35 (b) is shown by the introduction and the heading 36 to be a separate discourse; the title, the non-Jeremianic preface, 36-42, and the new superscription 71 indicate that 36-630 (c) once formed a booklet; 7-10 (d) by its title and its long appendix, 922-1025, is similarly marked off; 11*f*: (e) is likewise distinguished by heading and appendix, 1118-1217; 13 (f) is clearly an independent fragment, 15-17 and 20-27 being probably later additions; 14-17 (g) is shown to be a collection by title, by prefaced non-Jeremianic passages, 142-6 7-9, and by numerous interpolations and the appendix, 1719-27; 18-20 (h) is separated from what precedes by a special title, and from what follows by the appended curse in imitation of Job 32*ff*. and the heading of 21.

Among these groups c and d make the strongest impression of being direct reports of oracles. A characteristic especially of g, but also of a, e, f, and h, is the use of the first person. Listening disciples may have written down from memory what the prophet related in this form. The ease, however, with which a figure of speech is transformed into a narrative of actual occurrence in 13, and the manifest later colouring in 110 and 18, warn against assuming greater accuracy in these sections on account of the form. The editor of Book 1 found these pericopes without any indication of date except in 36. It is difficult to suppose that the first book was compiled before the third century. The editor of g may indeed have been a contemporary of Nehemiah (385-373 B.C.), and the prophet's biography used to some extent in e, f, g, and h may have been written in the Persian period; but the Book of Job almost certainly belongs to the time of Ptolemaic sovereignty over Palestine, and the language of the title, 12, points to a comparatively late date.

2. Chaps. 21-24. In Bk. 2 chaps. 22-23 8 (a) form a collection of oracles against the reigning princes, distinguished by introduction, contents, and consolatory non-Jeremianic additions, 231-4 5*f*. 7*f*.; 239-40 (b) is separated by its heading; 24 (c) is of a totally different character—reminding us of 1 and 13. Stade has shown convincingly (ZATW 12277*ff*.) that 211-10 is an excerpt from a passage in the biography from which another excerpt, necessary to supplement it, was made in 374-10, and also that 2111-14 is editorial work. Phrases drawn from 488 suggest that 2111-14 may have been written late in the second century. But there is nothing to prevent 211-10 from having been prefaced and the collection made already in the previous century.

3. Chaps. 25 46-51. That the prophecies against foreign nations in Bk. 3 once circulated as a separate collection is evident from the different places they occupy in MT and \mathfrak{S} . While in \mathfrak{S} these oracles occupy a central position in the volume, like the similar prophecies in Isaiah and Ezekiel, they are in MT relegated to the end. Their place in \mathfrak{S} more exactly is between 251-13 and 15-38 of the Hebrew text. The most natural way of accounting for this is by assuming that 251-13 once formed the introduction to a smaller collection of oracles against nations likely to be affected by the northern invasion, that the additional introduction, vv. 15-38, was demanded by the accession of oracles against other nations, that \mathfrak{S} 's copy still lacked this expansion, and that it was subsequently done into Greek, and on account of its length appended rather than inserted in the margin. This would explain how the corpus could be removed in MT and yet leave the entire chap. 25 behind in its old place, and also how 2515-38, which naturally should precede the corpus, is found after it in \mathfrak{S} . On this hypothesis the similarity between the order in MT and that of the list, 2519-26, likewise finds its explanation. The additional names are probably later insertions, or possibly represent oracles removed to other collections, or lost. How extensive the first collection may have been is not easily determined. The prophecies against Elam and Babylon are certainly to be eliminated, and probably also those concerning Moab, Ammon, Damascus, and Kedar. It is possible, however, that in addition to Egypt, Philistia, and Edom, Tyre and Sidon had a place in that collection. If so, the first booklet may have been produced in the third century. But such late prophecies as those against Babylon and Moab cannot well have been written before the second half of the second century; and the apocalyptic language of the editor who wrote 2515-38 points to the same epoch for the final redaction of Bk. 3. See also below, § 11.

4. Chaps. 26-29. In Bk. 4 it is evident that 27-29 once circulated as a separate collection. This is shown by the abbreviated form of names like ירמיה, זקניה, חנניה, כנניה, the spelling נבוךרמזר for נבוךרמזר, the addition of תנבואה, and the many glosses later than \mathfrak{S} made by the same editor. As a copyist of the entire volume would not be likely to select these chapters as a special field for exhibiting all his peculiarities, it is most natural to suppose that \mathfrak{S} translated an earlier text of 27-29 than that incorporated in MT, that in \mathfrak{S} 's text 271 was contiguous with the end of the prophecy against Elam, 4939 (Movers, Hitzig), and that 26 subsequently found its way into \mathfrak{S} in the train of 2515-38. The character of 27 accounts for its being joined to the prophecies against foreign nations in Bk. 3. A later scribe probably copied from the biographical work chap. 26 as an introduction to show the wickedness of the pseudo-prophets and the divine protection enjoyed by Jeremiah, and justify his denunciation. It is reasonably certain that this book cannot have received its present form until the second half of the second century.

5. Chaps. 30-33. Bk. 5 consists of (a) 30*f*., (b) 321-15, (c) 3216-44, (d) 331-13, (e) 3314-26. Only a once circulated as a separate book; b may have been drawn from the biography; c is apparently an interpolation in situ; d was probably written by the editor of Bk. 5, who may have lived in the latter part of the second century; and e is an appendix later than \mathfrak{S} .

6. Chaps. 34-39. With the comforting outlook into the future presented by Bk. 5 the volume once closed. But the same increased interest in the prophet's life that caused the addition of chaps. 36-39 to the Book of Isaiah also led to the appending of biographical material to Jeremiah. Bk. 6 never had any separate existence. Its present disorder is best explained by the different stories having been drawn directly from the biography. It is probable that this story-book followed a certain chronological order. The seeming neglect of this in Chronicles and Daniel cannot be alleged against the supposition. The Chronicler knows well the order of Jewish kings, and that of the Persian monarchs was probably better known to him than has been supposed, while the composition of Daniel may explain the lack of chronological arrangement in that book (cp Barton, JBL 1762). It is not unlikely that in the biography 26 35 36 and possibly 45 were followed by 34 211*f*. 374-10 213-10 3711-3828*a* 391-3 14-18, though some other sections must have intervened. From 392 the general editor of 1-39 obtained his last date, 13. The interpolation, 394-13, is later than \mathfrak{S} ; but the incorporation of the chapters enumerated in the volume may have followed soon upon that of Bk. 5.

7. Chaps. 40-44. Bk. 7 was not known to the editor who wrote 13. This raises the serious question whether Bk. 7 or any section of it formed a part of the biographical work. After the awkward introduction, 401-6, an account follows, 407-41 18, which can scarcely have been drawn from that source.

Not only does Jeremiah play no role in the stirring events here narrated (it is Johanan who appears as Gedaliah's adviser), but neither he nor Baruch is mentioned among those who escaped the massacre. This strange silence concerning the prophet renders it probable that 407-41 18 is a Midrash to the book of Kings, brought over to prepare the way for 42*ff*. One is tempted to suppose that this section has taken the place of an oracle to Nabuzaradan by Jeremiah. It is difficult to imagine that an editor should have deliberately introduced a narrative in which no oracle of Jeremiah occurs, and, in fact, the prophet does not figure at all in 'the word which came to Jeremiah from Yahwé.'

In 42-44 the failure to carry the story down to the prophet's death is noticeable. It has been supposed that the veil was drawn over his tragic end by a desire not to publish the nation's shame. But there is no trace of such delicacy elsewhere in the volume. The murder of Uriah (26²³) and other prophets is freely recorded, and the tendency of this particular book to present the prophet as faithful even to the end and the people as apostates capable of any wickedness is very marked. Besides, it is far from certain that Jeremiah met with a violent death, or, if so, at the hands of his countrymen (see JEREMIAH, the Prophet, § 2). It is more likely that when this book was made it was not yet known what had become of the prophet. The biographical work naturally grew in the same way as our volume. When Bk. 6 was added to chaps. 1-33 this biography apparently lost sight of the prophet at the fall of Jerusalem. A much later hand probably led him with 'all the remnant of the people,' not without violence, into Egypt to prophesy against that kingdom and to predict the utter extinction of the Egyptian diaspora. From Nehemiah's memoirs we learn that in his time (385-373 B.C.) the Jews in Palestine were still regarded as people that had been left in the province when the exiles were carried away (cp EZRA-NEHEMIAH). The idea, diametrically opposed to this, that no Judæans were left behind in the land, does not appear until the Chronicler, who, however, knows nothing yet of a remnant escaping to Egypt (2 Ch. 36²⁰). The exuberant genealogical interest would naturally lead the Egyptian Jews to trace their pedigrees back to the exile, and the difficulty of accomplishing this feat may readily have suggested as an explanation a prophetic oracle sealing the doom of the entire remnant. In course of time the prophet would inevitably receive the martyr's crown. But whether an account of this yet found a place in the biography is doubtful. The counter-currents of interest connecting him with the Babylonian diaspora, where he would have ended his life in peace, or with Judæa, may have prevented tradition from becoming fixed on this point. Nabuzaradan's speech reminds one of utterances of pagan rulers in Daniel. The historic substitute may have been introduced at the end of the second century by the editor who appended 52.

As chap. 45 presents Baruch in a different rôle from that imputed to him in 43³, it is possible that this paragraph was taken from an earlier section of the biography and put at the end of the volume to show Jeremiah's prophetic insight and generosity, even as 39¹⁵⁻¹⁸ was appended to Bk. 6.

In regard to the biography itself, it is not improbable that it bore the title 'Jeremiah the Prophet' and that it long had a separate existence. If it was actually used by the authors of 2 Macc. and Mt., it may even have been translated into Greek. The disappearance of such a work involves no difficulty. Nor is it impossible that the original was still in existence in the days of Jerome. Until the Hebrew book shown to him shall have been found, there will be nothing to force the conclusion that it was a recent forgery or to prevent the assumption that it was the old biography from which so many abstracts had been made, though naturally not untouched by many hands that would have dealt more scrupulously with a canonical book.

Ch. 52 seems to have been drawn from 2 K. 25—a very late appendix to K. Verses 28-30, not found in K., were added later than 5, but probably from a good old source, as they contradict the conception current at the time of the translation. When that time was cannot be accurately determined. The preface to Eccles. only shows that in 132 B.C. prophetic writings had been translated, but does not indicate the extent and character of these writings. The year 114 in the epilogue to the Greek Esther is so far from fixing the lower limit of 5 that it cannot even be relied upon for determining the date of the translation of that particular book (cp Jacob, ZATW, 1890, p. 274 ff.). Nor is it likely that all parts were translated at the same time.

There appears to be nothing, however, to prevent the view that the volume had substantially assumed its present form in the reign of Alexander Jannæus (102-76 B.C.).

According to the baraita preserved in Bābā bathrā 14^b, Jeremiah was the author of the book. The super-

7. Super- scriptions in all parts of the volume (except scriptions 52) would naturally lead to this conclusion. This was no doubt the generally accepted view in the time of the Tannāim (Mishnic doctors). Whilst there is only one direct quotation in NT bearing on this point—viz. Mt. 2:18 (the other, 27⁹, being probably from the biography)—this shows that 30 ff. was regarded as a Jeremianic production, and other NT authors, notably those of Hebrews and Revelation, are likely to have regarded Jeremiah as the author on the strength of the headings. Strictly speaking, these titles, with a single exception, do not affirm that Jeremiah was the writer of the respective sections. They only state that these oracles came to Jeremiah, and it is implied that they were uttered by him, but not necessarily that he wrote them.

In 25:13 the editor's meaning is perhaps doubtful; in 29:1 the editor possibly meant to intimate that Jeremiah wrote the letter as well as sent it; in 30:2 the editor distinctly represents Yahwé as ordering the prophet to write, leaving the inference that he did so. It is significant that in all three cases the contents of the 'books' render it extremely difficult to believe that they have come, either directly or indirectly, from the hand of Jeremiah. As in 36:4 the divine command given to Jeremiah (36:2) to write in a book is carried out by dictation to Baruch, the writer of 30:2 may have thought of the same method.

Only in 51:60 is it distinctly stated that Jeremiah wrote the words against Babylon; but 50:1-51:58 is clearly un-Jeremianic. Even through the mists of tradition the fact can be discerned that there never were any Jeremianic autographs. This prophet was not a holy penman, but a preacher of righteousness (cp ISAIAH i.).

But if Jeremiah was not himself a writer, he may be the real author of many an oracle preserved in this book. That would be eminently 8. Jeremianic true, could it be proved that some of oracles. them were actually dictated by him.

But even though a closer examination should render it probable that we possess only free reproductions of discourses that lived in the memory of disciples, that would still put within our reach sentiments, thoughts, and forms of expression of which he was the author. If these should be seen to reflect historic circumstances unknown in later times, religious ideas out of harmony with those prevailing after the exile, and a unique personality not to be explained as a fictitious character that would tend to enhance their trustworthiness. It would not be strange, in view of methods in vogue elsewhere, if such genuine sayings should be found chiefly in Bks. 1 and 2, if Bks. 3 and 5 should prove to be altogether un-Jeremianic, and if the biographical sections, with all their long speeches, should furnish but scanty material.

Since Spinoza it has generally been assumed, on the basis of the narrative in 36, that the roll which Baruch wrote at the dictation of Jeremiah in the fifth year of Jehoiakim (603 B.C.) has been preserved in some part of our present volume. Spinoza regarded the '1 sections,—i.e., chiefly 1:20—and the prophecies against foreign nations, 46-51, as giving the contents of the roll. This view has met with wide approval. Even Stad thinks it 'the first duty of criticism to restore from the book this original roll.' He, indeed, rejects 46-51 with its introduction 25, removes all genuine sayings that are later than 603, and eliminates the many un-Jeremianic interpolations. But the remainder represent to him the famous roll. We have no guarantee, however, that the remnant ever had a place on Baruch's scroll. In fact, there are considerations that militate seriously against this supposition. The words directly quoted from the roll (36²⁹) are not to be found in these sections; there are no prophecies against foreign nations among them, as is demanded by v. 2; the prophecies selected do not make any such clear allusion to the Chaldeans as would scare the king or vex him, and they certainly do not make the impression of being either 'all the words that Yahwè had spoken to him' in twenty years or an intelligently arranged summary for a special purpose. The difficulty of the assumption has been felt by Grütz¹ (1874) and Cheyne (art. 'Jeremiah,' in EB⁽⁹⁾, '81; Comm. '85), who have therefore thought of chap. 25 (of course when purified from the most obvious interpolations) as the roll. But since chap. 25 is the introduction to chaps. 46-51, and all these chapters are almost certainly not Jeremician in any sense, the attempt to find Baruch's roll must be given up. As Dahler suggested, the 'book' had clearly a special purpose. Whether it was subsequently lost, or any part of it drifted into our volume, is not a matter of serious moment. Concerning no portion of our present work is it affirmed, or even intimated, that it was dictated to Baruch. The use of the first person, if original, may be a reminiscence of the actual language of the prophet, or a literary device.

It is safe to assume that among those who listened to the prophet there were no reporters taking down his words, pen in hand. Chap. 36 gives us valuable evidence of what was deemed sufficient accuracy in such matters. All the words spoken by Yahwè through his prophet in twenty years are put to writing under a sudden impulse, and this picture of past prophecy is a year later, under fresh provocation, retouched with 'many like words.' This is no doubt the story of much reporting. Freely from memory, speeches were written down that they might not be forgotten, still preserving, in spite of many like words added, somewhat of the original flavour.

It is this breath of a mighty spirit, felt particularly in the earlier parts of the volume, that forbids the theory of Havet and Vernes according to which our book is wholly pseudepigraphical and Jeremiah a fictitious character.

It is natural to ascribe such knowledge as we possess of Jeremiah's words and life to the pen of Baruch. The book itself suggests his importance.

9. Baruch's part. According to chap. 36 Baruch was the writer of the book produced in 604; he was the prophet's representative reading this book; he was as much in danger as Jeremiah and had as powerful friends among the princes; according to 43³ he was accused by the Jews of unduly influencing the prophet; according to 45⁵ he was censured by Jeremiah himself for having cherished lofty plans contrary to the prophet's ideas. Such a man might write, not only at the dictation of the prophet, but also in his name, and furnish much information concerning his life, by virtue of intimate acquaintance. The idea of a close partnership involving independent work on Baruch's part is seen unmistakably in the addition of Bar. 1-5 to Jer. without a separate title and in the appending of the Epistle of Jeremy to Bar.; and in Baruch's biographical activity in Paralipomena Jer. To Theodoret Baruch seems to have been more than a mere amanuensis.

When, in modern times, differences of style began to be observed, the frequent changes from the first to the third person were ascribed to Baruch; his hand was discovered in the later oracles; the biographical sections were assigned to him as author. The theory of two recensions had a tendency to increase his labours as an editor; he was charged with the care of the second improved edition as well as with the editio princeps.

Even after the abandonment of the two-recensions theory, the idea that large portions of our book have come from the pen of Baruch is still cherished by eminent scholars. But there is not the slightest evidence that any part of the volume was ever written by him. It does not contain a single line that even claims to have been penned by him; and the many works that purport to come from him are too palpably spurious to be used as touchstones. It remains a bare possibility that, at one time or another, Baruch wrote down abstracts of oracles delivered by Jeremiah. Among these there may have been reports of utterances made before 604 B. C. as well as after that date. But it is not likely that such memoranda were used in preparing the 'book' read to Jehoiakim. The late origin of many sections claimed for Baruch, and the manifest lack of order among the genuine fragments of Jeremician oracles, seem to preclude the supposition that he was in any sense the editor of the book.¹

Note on Jer. 36¹⁸.—The sense of קרא in this passage (read? proclaim?) is uncertain. In v. 14 קרא has clearly the sense of 'read,' as frequently elsewhere, cp Ex. 24⁷ Dt. 17¹⁹. The use of earlier collections is not in itself improbable, as Dahler has shown. But the natural impression of the text certainly is that the prophet reproduces from memory and dictates to his scribe all the words that Yahwè has spoken to him. We are not justified in minimising either the assumed extent of the Megillah or the miraculous power ascribed to the prophet. We may question the historic accuracy of the narrative.

The book appears to be the product of writers unknown to us by name. They may be divided into the following classes:—(a) reporters and collectors of oracles, (b) prophets, (c) historians, (d) poets, (e) editors and annotators.

(a) When sayings of the prophet were first put into writing we do not know. Tradition found it unnecessary to ascend higher than the year 604 B. C.; a lapse of twenty-two years was not regarded as too long for correct reproduction. It is probable, however, that the discourses referring to the Chaldeo-Scythian invasion were drawn from reports made at an earlier date. To such reports may be assigned 43-10 12-18 28-31 51-17 19 61-30 and possibly 11-2-6 9-12 (in 9 אֵלֵי אֱלֹהִים, or late, HP 229). Similar memoranda in Jehoiakim's reign may have contained 2-2-13 20-37 31-5 and 73-31 81-9 14-17 91-21. In the little book, 14-17, the genuine Jeremician fragments 14 10-16 15 1-4 16 2-13 may have been written from memory in the prophet's lifetime by some friendly listener who preserved Jeremiah's use of the first person. The essence of 1 may have come down in the same manner, while 13 is likely to be a late transformation of a parable into a narrative. 18 1-17 19 1 f. 10 f. may still be accounted for in this way, and possibly also the indictments of the kings, 22, and the prophets, 23 9 ff., and the nucleus of 24.

Many words, no doubt, were gathered from the lips of the people, by makers of collections during the Chaldean period. But as such sayings pass from man to man, they grow. In course of time the collectors would naturally find it difficult to determine whether an oracle was genuine or not. The 'color Jeremicianus' produced by unconscious or conscious imitation would readily deceive even where a definite ascription did not silence every doubt. On the other hand, the collections would furnish material for the enrichment of the stories concerning the prophet's life.

(b) In addition to the writers who have given us more or less correct reports of the oracles of Jeremiah, the book introduces us to a number of original prophetic authors living in later times.

11. Prophetic writers: chaps. 46-51. Chief among these are the writers whose productions fill Bks. 3 and 5.

Eichhorn appears to have been the first to perceive clearly the un-Jeremician character of 46-51.

Already in 1777 (Reperitorium, 1149) he declared that 'he who finds in the prophecies against foreign nations the language of Jeremiah must either have no acquaintance with Jeremiah's style or no capacity for distinguishing different modes of expression.¹ His theory then was that the works of earlier prophets had been used by Jeremiah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, a somewhat similar procedure to that often ascribed to Isaiah in the case of chap. 15 f. In his Einleitung⁽⁴⁾ (24), Eichhorn assumed that the chapters were of later origin and not edited by Jeremiah. As regards 50 f., of whose spurious character Eichhorn was most fully persuaded, practical unanimity has been reached.

The attempt of Movers, Hitzig, Schrader, Stähelin to find a Jeremicanic nucleus enthraged in the exile was effectively disposed of by Budde in his excellent monograph.

Graf and Orelli still defended the authenticity, largely on the ground of numerous Jeremicanic expressions. To explain these it is not necessary to think, with Budde, of pseudonymity, which apparently is precluded by the fact that the prophecy was not originally assigned to Jeremiah (cp 6); extensive use of writings ascribed to Jeremiah and a very small measure of originality suffice. Unmistakable dependence on Ezekiel, Is. 13 40-55 34 f., an attitude of satisfaction with Israel and of fierce hatred of Babylon, and an utter lack of sympathy with Jeremiah's point of view and of intelligent appreciation of the very phrases borrowed from him, have convinced critics of widely different schools that these chapters are not the work of Jeremiah. Eichhorn's doubts concerning 46-49 led Blau (ZDMG 1865) to seek a later occasion in Israel's history for these chapters. A story in Mas'udi of the Renu Hadir caused Eichhorn to assign the authorship to Berachia b. Zerubbabel. Many acute observations were made; but the legend is too late to be used for historical purposes.

It is, however, the merit of Schwally to have been the first to examine with critical thoroughness these prophecies (chaps. 46-51).

12. Schwally's criticism. Schwally pointed out the close relation of 48 to Is. 15 f. and 24, and of 49 f. to Obadiah, the dependence on parts of Jer. that are probably secondary, the absence of the call to repentance so characteristic of pre-exilic prophecy, and the character of Yahwé as a god of vengeance pouring his fury upon the heathen. He also directed attention to the probable identification of Elam with Persia, and he indicated the true character of 25 as an introduction to the book of oracles. His apparent contention that a pre-exilic prophet must have preached repentance and cannot have conceived of Yahwé as a god taking vengeance on the heathen nations for their treatment of Israel is not quite convincing. Habakkuk¹ and Nahum show much of this vindictive spirit, and other prophets may have excelled them. Yet so far as Jeremiah is concerned the contrast is very marked, and the oracles certainly breathe a spirit most familiar to us from extant writings of post-exilic times.

Bleeker has undertaken to do for chaps. 46-51 what Movers and Hitzig did for 50 f.

He eliminates the most objectionable features, partly on the basis of 6, partly by conjecture, attempts to show the necessity of assuming a Jeremicanic authorship in order

13. Bleeker's. to justify the references to Jeremiah as a prophet called to denounce judgment on many nations, minimises the objections drawn by Schwally from the theology of the oracles, and seeks to picture a suitable historical background in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. Even Bleeker, however, is forced to surrender the prophecy against Elam (49 34-39), is extremely doubtful about the oracle against Kedar (49 28 f.), is obliged to cut so deeply into the prophecy against Moab (48) as to leave but a few verses, removes from the prophecy against Edom (49 7-22) the embarrassing verse 49 12 in which the destruction of Jerusalem is clearly mentioned, and then bases an argument for Jeremicanic authorship on the absence of any reference to this event.

Yet even after the most radical excision these oracles remain in irreconcilable conflict with the views and sentiments that the earlier sections of the book allow us to ascribe to Jeremiah.

In 210 f. Jeremiah looks beyond the boundaries of Judah but only to point out the loyalty of other nations to their gods, in contrast with the faithlessness of Yahwé's people. If in 18 7-10 he has in mind any other people and kingdom than Judah, he holds out repentance and restitution. That is the sentiment of the universally acknowledged later additions, 46 25 48 47 49 6 39 (wanting in 6, except 49 39), not of the prophecies themselves. That chap. 1 has been retouched in view of the later contents of the volume, and that 27, drawn from the biographical work, is unhistorical, seems extremely probable. Yet even 15 and 20 do not necessarily suggest any specific oracles against nations beyond the terrible announcement in 43 f. of the subjugation of people after people by the Chaldean power; and even 27 is tinged with sympathy and concern for the nations lest they be led astray by their prophets from the path of safety. All references to Nebuchadrezzar and his time are editorial, since neither 46 26 (wanting in 6) nor 49 30 is original and there is nothing in the text to sustain these editorial conjectures.

Whilst rightly insisting upon the necessity of examining each oracle by itself, though unnecessarily justify-

14. Giesebrecht's. ing this by a reference to 36 2, in which he has an excessive confidence, Giesebrecht appreciates more fully than Bleeker the force of Schwally's arguments.

Giesebrecht perceives the impossibility of ascribing the oracles against Egypt (46 3-12 and 13-26) to Jeremiah, and correctly indicates the source of that perplexing confusion, which leaves it uncertain whether a past or a future defeat is depicted, in the dependence on literary models. If he still clings to a possible, though indefinable, Jeremicanic nucleus it is because of the knowledge on the part of the editor of a battlefield of Carchemish not known to Bérössus. Rather should the lack of confirmation render this piece of editorial wisdom suspicious. Giesebrecht also recognises the dependence of 48 on Is. 15 f. and its post-exilic character, and the secondary character of all the prophecies in 49 except that against Edom. Here a failure to perceive that all parts of Obadiah are post-exilic leads him to assume a genuine nucleus.

The only oracle which Giesebrecht would decidedly claim for Jeremiah is that against the Philistines (47). With Hitzig, Kuenen, and others he sees the impossibility of saving the heading, but finds a good historical background for the oracle in the time of Jehoiakim. It is difficult, however, to conceive of Jeremiah selecting Philistia, either in 604, or in 625 (which might also be considered), as the object of Yahwé's fury, without indicating any sin committed, and with such terrible emphasis. Close examination only tends to confirm the view of Schwally, also maintained by Stade, Wellhausen, Smend, Duhm, and Budde. As for the two introductions, Cornill sees a weighty argument in favour of the authenticity of 25 15-29 in the fact that 'the cup of the fury of Yahwé' suddenly becomes a popular expression after Jeremiah's time, as in Ezek. 23 32 Lam. 4 21 Is. 51 17 Hab. 2 16 Ps. 75 9 [8], and therefore must have been coined by Jeremiah. But these passages written in different periods do not prove a sudden popularity of the phrase, nor is it apparent why Jeremiah rather than Ezekiel should have given it this form. On the contrary, it is probable that the editor who wrote 25 15 had before him 49 12, and the thought there suggested of Israel's drinking out of Yahwé's cup of anger, expressed in Ezek. 23 32, is likely to be earlier, if it originated at all with a prophet.

In the book of consolation, chaps. 30 f., Movers, De Wette, and Hitzig noticed the close affinity to Is.

15. Ch. 30 f. 32. 40 f. R. Williams regarded these chaps. as a 'song of encouragement by some Baruch or later Isaiah far on in the exile. Stade recognized the pseudonymity. It was Smend, however, who first clearly set forth the internal evidence against the Jeremicanic authorship of both chaps. He recognised that the author lived after the exile and also after the disenchantment that had followed the rebuilding of the temple. As the author missed a prophecy of Judah's return, he assumed that there had already been a return of exiles. But the return under Cyrus is scarcely historical.

This would give added weight to Giesebrecht's objection that a promise to Israel alone would not be likely in a late writer, and a certain plausibility to his view that 31 2-6 15-20 formed a genuine nucleus afterwards enlarged by 30, were it not that the terms 'Jacob' and 'Israel' seem to have acquired a wider sense since 2 Isaiah, on whom the writer so clearly depends, and that the unity of the book, rightly emphasised by Graf, cannot well be questioned. The hope of political independence pervades the book. This is also expressed in 31 22 (where 6 gives the only satisfactory sense), which should probably be emended thus: בְּיָמֵינוּ יִהְיֶה חֵרֶשׁ בְּאָרֶץ נִקְנָה יִסְכְּבוּ נְבִירִים (עַתָּה אֲנִי אֲמַר) being a later gloss (preserved in 6) to בְּאָרֶץ נִקְנָה—the sign consists in this, that men shall walk about in a land freed from foreign rulers. This likewise removes every objection to 31 35-40; the enlargement of the capital and the extension of the kingdom by the return of exiles are the signs that Yahwè has forgiven his people, and the love thus shown will be more effective than the preaching of prophetic teachers in bringing about a willing obedience to the law. The author of the Songs of Zion, added in Palestine to 2 Isaiah, still has confidence in the missionary activity of the Yahwè-disciples; this writer despairs of all human teaching and expects reform to come as a consequence of Yahwè's deed of deliverance.

In chap. 32, not only 17-23, but the whole section 16-44 is clearly a late production, the author occasionally falling out of his rôle, as in 37 42; 6-15 may have been taken from the biography. Chap. 33 14-26, not yet found by \mathfrak{C} , is quite generally rejected. But neither is 33 1-13 likely to be genuine. The dependence on 2 Is. in v. 2, the extraordinary exhortation in v. 3, the juxtaposition of the captivity of Judah and of Israel (v. 7), the feeling of the heathen concerning restored Jerusalem (v. 9), the actual desolation of the city (v. 10), the late psalm-fragment and the praise offering (v. 11), and the dependence on 17 26 and 31 24 in vv. 12 and 13, are sufficiently convincing.

The speeches in Bks. 4, 6, and 7 must be considered in connection with the biography (see § 17).

In Bks. 1 and 2 there are, in addition to poetical and liturgical compositions and brief annotations, a series of more important insertions of late origin. 214-19 breaks the natural connection, presupposes evil treatment of the Jews by the people of Thebes and Daphnæ, breathes the spirit of 2 Isaiah's concern about the servant of Yahwè, and rebukes immigration to Egypt and Syria. That 36-42 is out of place is generally seen. Stade doubts the genuineness of 317 f. Giesebrecht rejects 314-18; Cornill 317 f. 41 f.; Kraetzschmar, 314-12. The whole section is doubtful. The looseness of construction may be explained by literary dependence on Ezek. 16, Jer. 31, and other passages. An invitation to Israel to return, even in the form of vv. 12 f., either in 625 when the Scytho-Chaldean invasion was imminent, or after the futility of Josiah's reform had become apparent (cp v. 10) and the Chaldeans again threatened the land, is difficult to understand. It is not likely that two minds independently conceived the idea of Israel's justification through Judah's greater sinfulness. The author sees both Judah and Israel coming back together to Zion (v. 18), and uses the term 'house of Israel' in a manner to suggest the whole Yahwè-worshipping people (vv. 19 f.). 924 f., though brief, is important as showing the sentiments of later scribes. It probably read originally 'Behold days come, when I will punish all who are circumcised in their foreskin (i. e., have the sign in their body though they fail to unite with Israel as proselytes)—viz. Egyptians, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites—and all the dwellers in the desert who poll their hair,' a kindred custom.

101-16 is almost universally rejected. \mathfrak{C} presents the pericope in an earlier form than MT. But even \mathfrak{C} has the late Aramaic addition, v. 11 (itself the work of two hands), and other expansions. Language and thought preclude Jeremianic origin. 1214-17, like the elegy preceding it, is evidently un-Jeremianic. The neighbouring nations have settled in Israel's land; they will be plucked up; but they will be accepted as proselytes, if they learn to swear by Yahwè. The affinity with Is. 569-12 571-13 is marked. 1614-18 is clearly a later prophecy presupposing the exile and promising a return, dependent in its phraseology somewhat on 2 Isaiah. For מונח ('their iniquity') read סוּנְחָה ('their dwelling') in v. 17, a copyist having misunderstood the tenor of the verse. 237 f. is later than 1614 f. Stade and many others rightly regard 1719-27 as a work of a later prophet. The concern here expressed for sabbath-keeping and sacrifices, making prosperity dependent upon such exercises, is contrary to Jeremiah's spirit (cp 7) and belongs to another age. Geiger (Urschrift, 83) in 1857 expressed his conviction that 235-8 was written in the Hasmonean period. Giesebrecht (Beitr. z. Jesaiakritik, 40), though maintaining the Jeremianic authorship, finely indicated that even vv. 1-3 presuppose the exile. The entire pericope, 231-8, is in all probability a product of a later age.

(c) Contemplation of a prophet's words naturally begets an interest in the historic occasions that gave rise to his utterances and the circumstances of his life. Stories concerning the remarkable epoch when Jeremiah lived and his own strange career no doubt passed from mouth to mouth for a long time before an attempt was made to fix them in writing. Adversity, repentance, reflection on Israel's sufferings such as the Servant-of-Yahwè songs reveal, would tend to bring out of obscurity and disgrace the figure of the prophet who foresaw the ruin of the state, but also to shape this figure according to the ideal. Words would suggest situations, situations words. Finally the demand for a connected biography would arise. This work would follow the prophet's career so far as the material at hand permitted. As the interest increased, the desire for more complete knowledge would grow and find its gratification. It is possible that the biography in its latest form contained some story of the prophet's death, though contradictory accounts, or other reasons, determined the final editors of the canonical book not to introduce it.

There are in our present volume historical sections that cannot have come from the biography. Already Grotius recognised that 52 is an appendix drawn from 2 K. 25, with the exception of vv. 28-30. That is now universally conceded. It has not yet been observed, but appears equally certain, that 407-4118 must have been taken from another source than the biography (cp § 6). The lifelikeness of this story is much praised, and it is generally used as an authentic account by modern historians. Literary critics are still apt to be deceived by vividness of description, local colour, names and dates, and charmed into forgetfulness of the most glaring inconsistencies and historical impossibilities. Such inconsistencies and impossibilities are not wanting in this story. A confused memory of the first Chaldean governor and of an abortive attempt by a side branch of the Davidic family to overthrow the new government, and local legends clustering about the cistern of Asa and the pool of Gibeon, may lie at its foundation; but in its present form it cannot well be earlier than the second century.

A. B. Davidson has recognised that the passage 427-22, 'on account of its rather debased style and its other peculiarities, is probably a free construction from the historian's hand.' But 431-7 presupposes this 'free construction'; 421-6 is its necessary introduction; the same 'depraved style' and other peculiarities of reproductive prophecy characterise 44, which further betrays its late origin by its assumption of a complete depopulation of Judæa and the existence of Jewish communities in all parts of Egypt. 438-13 seems to have come from the pen of a man who regarded Nebuchadrezzar as Yahwè's servant in punishing the Egyptians for their idolatry, and may have had some knowledge of his expedition against Egypt in 568. Rowland Williams, with keen insight, hinted at a later date for the 'moralising view of the conqueror as Yahwè's servant.' The address of Nabuzaradan, 402 ff., in which he speaks as if he were a disciple of Jeremiah, is, of course, a late production. The Egyptian sojourn of Jeremiah is subject to grave doubts (cp JEREMIAH i., § 2). Whether Bk. 7 was in part drawn from late additions to the biography, or was altogether a free construction, the editor who wrote 13 knew nothing about Jeremiah's subsequent fate save that he survived the fall of the city.

The stories preserved in Bks. 1-6, and in all probability taken from the biography, reveal the workmanship of many writers, and vary greatly in the degree of credibility attaching to them. Bks. 3 and 5 have each one such story. Ewald suggested and Giesebrecht has convincingly shown that 51 59-64 (cp SERAIAH) is a piece of haggadic fiction.

The historicity of 32 1-15 (cp HANAMEL) has been questioned by Pierson, who finds it improbable that a prisoner should be surrounded by people, have a secretary, and be able to make purchases. Stade, Cornill, and Giesebrecht rightly reject 1-5. In behalf of 6-15 Giesebrecht urges certain points which apparently preclude a later writer. He suggests that the story was told by Jeremiah after the fall of the city. There may be a nucleus of fact in the story. But if Jeremiah meant by this tale to keep his people quiet in the land under Chaldean sovereignty, rather than that they should emigrate, he would not have intimated (vv. 14 f.) that after a long time they would again have a chance of buying houses and fields. The miraculously bestowed fore-knowledge of Hanamel's coming, the outlook into a future beyond the long exile, the consequent purely symbolic character of the act, the amazement, common in apocalyptic literature, at the wonderful plan of future deliverance, and the vagueness of the narrative, only in part due to textual corruption, seem to indicate a later origin.

In Bk. 1, 13 1-14 may be an excerpt from the biography. The twofold journey to the Euphrates is clearly unhistorical. A saying like that of vv. 12-14 has been dramatised. The editor of the book may also have drawn from the same source the genuine parts of 18 and 19 and the possibly authentic story 20 1-6.

In Bk. 2, 21 1-10 is from the biography (cp above).

The introductory chapter, 26, to Bk. 4 contains a briefer report of the speech given, 7 f., and an apparently trustworthy account of the consequences. In the booklet 27-29, the story of the bands and yokes (27), and that of the correspondence with Babylonia (29), are scarcely historical; while the narrative of the encounter between Jeremiah and Hananiah sounds plausible, though it may have been retouched. That Hananiah was scared to death is less probable than that 28 17 was added to round off the story.

In Bk. 6 there is no valid reason to question the substantial accuracy of 34. Chap. 35, on the other hand, is subject to grave doubts. That Jeremiah should have praised for their loyalty the RECHABITES (g. v.) whose very presence in Jerusalem constituted the severest infringement of the commandment enjoined upon them by their ancestor, is quite incredible, apart from the questionable method used to test their fidelity to one of the ancestral injunctions, and the scene of this trial. A justification was probably found in this story for the elevation into some position in the lower clerus (עמור לְפָנַי) of those who had abandoned the nomadic life they were solemnly commanded to lead. Against the historical trustworthiness of chap. 36 Pierson adduced twenty-one arguments. Their summary rejection by Kuenen may have been influenced by a reluctance to surrender a narrative generally regarded as furnishing a trustworthy clue to the composition of the book. If this is seen to be illusive, it may more readily be admitted that, whilst some of these arguments are of little weight, taken as a whole they are not without a certain cumulative force. It is evidently the author's meaning that all the prophecies of Jeremiah, during a period of more than twenty years, were written by Baruch, the prophet dictating them from memory. He did not reflect on the curious effect of such a collection of miscellaneous addresses on different subjects and occasions, even if a reproduction of that kind were a possibility. That Jeremiah should send his servant with so important a mission instead of going himself is all the more strange as a long time elapses between the writing and the reading of the book. It does not seem possible to refer the explanation 'I am restrained' to political detention, since he is free to go and hide himself, nor to ceremonial uncleanness, since the command to Baruch precedes the public reading by months, nor to business, since the fast day would take precedence. But can the author really have represented his hero as held back by cowardly concern for his own safety? The collusion of the princes with Baruch and Jeremiah contrasts with their eagerness to bring the book to the king's knowledge, and this with their neglect to take with them the corpus delicti. In v. 29 is assumed a personal interview with Jehoiakim that harmonises neither with Jeremiah's detention on the fast day nor with his subsequent concealment. A possible kernel of fact is all that can be admitted. Jeremiah's feeling concerning the expected Egyptian relief corps, 37 1-10 (21 1-10), his intended departure from Jerusalem, and his imprisonment (37 11 f.), may be historical. 38 is manifestly a late legend.

The king, like Daniel's Darius, has no power to prevent the enraged nobles from slaying Jeremiah (v. 5), yet in v. 10 f. he has absolute power to save the prophet. That Jeremiah agrees to tell a lie is clear; but why it should be told and how it could satisfy the princes, is not apparent. Not only 39 4-13, still wanting in G's copy, but also 1-3 14, and the oracle, 15-18, introduced as a supplement to the legend, 33 7-13, are manifestly unhistorical.

(d) In Bk. 1 copyists and editors have introduced a number of poetical passages, psalm-fragments and 18. Poets, elegies, and gnomic poems. Some of them show striking affinities to Lamentations, also ascribed to Jeremiah. It is the merit of Stade to have recognised the secondary character of many such poetic interpolations. Had his reasons been given, the correctness of his judgment would no doubt have been more generally seen. Other passages of the same nature should probably be added.

4 19-21 breaks the textual connection, laments a destruction that has been experienced, expresses national grief (cp 'my tents,' 'my tent-covers') and shows a kinship to psalms in which the personified community speaks. 8 18-23 apparently presupposes not only the exile of the people, but also the successive disenchanting hopes for the restoration of the monarchy. Verse 18 is a quotation of Lam. 1 22; read, with Houbigant, 'my consolation is far from me' (מְבַלְיִנִי מְעַלִּי). The aphorism, 9 22 f., was also found by G in 1 S. 2 10 as a part of Hannah's song. It was evidently a homeless fragment brought first into the song and then into the prophecy. It is in the style of the later psalms.

In 10 17-25, 19-21 and 23-25 are clearly the work of a poet who looks back upon the exile of the people, the cessation of the monarchy, and the partial occupation of the land by neighbouring nations as past facts, and desires the utter annihilation of the heathen, while pleading for gentler treatment for Judah. He speaks in the name of the community; cp 'my tabernacle,' 'my tent,' 'my chords,' 'my sons,' 'my destruction.' Verses 17 f. and 22 may be reminiscences from Jeremianic oracles introduced by an editor.

In 11 15-17 we have a poem in six double lines in which Zion seems to be exhorted to remove by prayers and sacrifices the adversity that so long followed the destruction of the Judean kingdom.

There is nothing in 12 1-6 that is suggestive of Jeremiah. The speaker is the nation disturbed by the continued disfavour of Yahwé as shown in the drought and the famine, and puzzled by the prosperity of false brethren (cp Neh. 5). If this is the condition of things in times of comparative ease, what would it be if war should arise? Such seems to be the sense of the proverb, v. 5.

The elegy, 12 7-13, is clearly non-Jeremianic. Judah, the beloved, has been put into the hands of her enemies, birds of prey have come upon her, shepherds (foreign rulers) have destroyed the vineyard.

13 15-17 is a similar lamentation reminiscent in part of late psalms. The depraved style suggests to Scholz a late date for vv. 20-27. He is probably right. Verses 18 f., also rejected by Scholz, may be genuine, though there is no necessity for thinking of a particular queen mentioned in Kings. There is nothing to remind us of Jeremiah's language, style, or thought in the exquisite elegiac strains of 14 2-6. The absence of any religious suggestion precludes a prophetic source.

14 7-9 is a psalm breathing the spirit of 2 Isaiah. The phrase 'because of thy name,' the title 'hope of Israel,' the rebuke to Yahwé for leaving a place where he is not a stranger but at home, and the appeal to him on the ground that his name has been called upon the people, are not in harmony with Jeremiah's language and thought. The psalm 14:19-21 is the expression of a repentant people, recognising the sin of their fathers that brought them to ruin, looking apparently in vain for prosperity, yet justifying their hope by Yahwè's regard for his own honour, his name, his pledge (ברית; see COVENANT), his holy city, the throne of his glory. It is clearly un-Jeremianic.

A very late glossator added v. 22, introducing the theological question whether the gods of the heathen can make rain, or the heavens perchance produce it without the activity of any god.

After the genuine fragment, 15:1-4a, continuing 14:10-16 that has the true 'color Jeremianus,' there follows a passage 15:5-9 in which is described the comfortless condition of Zion subsequent to the fall of the city and the scattering of the exiles. Two glosses, 10 and 11-14 (see below), are then succeeded by the poetic effusion, 15:18, in which Zion laments her seemingly incurable wound, and prays for vengeance on the enemies that will give her the joy her piety deserves. (Read with C 'reproach from those who reject thy words,' הַרְפָּה כְּתִיבָתִי בְרִיחִי, 15:1, 16a, and 'consume them and thy word shall be,' אֶכְלֶם וְהָיָה, 16a).

15:19-21 is not a song; but it is of the same character as the sections just considered in that apparently it is the nation that is addressed. If the people will return to Palestine, Yahwè will then take them back and allow them to be his worshippers and witnesses; foreign nations will come to Zion (as proselytes), but the Judeans shall no more go to them (into exile); strong enough to resist an attack from without, they shall be delivered from all foreign oppression.

16:19 f. is clearly a psalm-fragment expressing the hope of Zion that the nations will become converts to the monotheistic faith, and as proselytes make their pilgrimages to Jerusalem; v. 21 is a later gloss expressing Yahwè's determination first to punish the heathen. 17:1-4, still wanting in C , is a late paraphrase of 15:4.

The four passages, 17:5-8, 9-11, 12 f., 14-18, by their close affinity to the psalms and the proverbs, reveal their late origin. In the last of these, the nation is the speaker.

The two poetic sections with which the first book closes, 20:7-13 and 14-18, are evidently from different hands. In the former, the liturgical formulas in v. 13, the quotation of Ps. 7:10 and late Jeremianic passages in v. 12, the appearance of Yahwè as a warrior helping to defeat a numerous pursuing enemy in vv. 10 f. (read 'let all of us who are his allies give him up [נָתַתִּי]'), the public praise (v. 9: read אֶתְקַבְּרֶנּוּ), the disillusioning experience of violent oppression, spoliation, and ridicule in place of the glowing hopes of prosperity aroused by the oracles (vv. 7-9), remind us of the Psalter and seem to point to the people as the speaker. It is doubted whether 20:14-18 is genuine, or whether the || passage in Job 3:2 f. is the original. The latter view is certainly more probable (cp JOB, BOOK OF, § 14, col. 2487 f.).

(e) Owners of MSS containing prophecies ascribed to Jeremiah, or copyists, would naturally arrange the different parts, provide them with suitable headings, and annotate them.

19. Editors. Sometimes a suggestion in the text, or a sub-heading, would furnish the material for the superscription; at other times information must have been drawn from sources unknown to us. Thus the general editor of Bk. 3 did not derive his knowledge concerning the first year of Nebuchadrezzar from 46:2 but from a better source.

While 46:2 puts Nebuchadrezzar's march against Syria in the fourth year of Jehoiakim—i.e., 604 B.C.—25:1 makes the fourth year of Jehoiakim = the first year of Nebuchadrezzar. But according to Bérössus (Jos. Ant. x. 11:1; c. Ap. 1:19) the encounter with Necho took place in the reign of Nabopolassar, consequently not later than 605, which is the last year accorded to him by Ptolemy's canon.¹ If the editor of 46:51, who wrote 25:1-13, in this case was better informed than his predecessors, it is quite likely that his statement concerning the date of the beginning of Jeremiah's career, the thirteenth year of Josiah, —i.e., the first of Nabopolassar, or 625,—was also drawn from a good source. Both notices may have been taken from the biography, or from the work whence 52:28-30 came.

The following annotations to Book 1 may be mentioned: 4:10 (Corn.) 11a (Ewald) 23-26 (Gieseb.) 27 5:10b 18:20-22 (Stade, Corn.) 23-25 26-29 8:10-12 (om. C) 11:7 f. (om. C) 13 f., 18-23 (rejected by Stade; 18 is a gloss to 9; 19 is reminiscent of Is. 53 and was still lacking in copies known to Justin ['the tree with its fruit' (so Kinchi, Scholz) is the holy nation]); 21-23 may have been taken from the biography (but possibly it is a free construction, easily accounted for if Anathoth happened to be one of the towns destroyed by the Chaldeans; 14:17 f., an editorial gloss ending in a quotation of a lament over the fallen city; 15:4b 10 a complaint that Israel is born to be an apple of discord between contending powers, though no unrighteous money transactions justify such a fate—explained in 11:14 by Yahwè's inscrutable purpose; 19:3-9 11b-13 (Gieseb.). There are many similar interpolations in the other books.

The time when the genuine Jeremianic oracles were first uttered can, in some instances, be determined with 20. Dates. a considerable degree of probability; in other cases it is only possible to give an approximately correct date. As regards the later productions, their place in the volume, and in the earlier collections, furnishes a not unimportant means of fixing their date; yet it is chiefly their historical and literary character that must be the determining factor.

i. Reign of Josiah (637-608).—Practically all interpreters are agreed that 4:3-6 (with the exceptions noted above) was spoken by Jeremiah in the thirteenth year of Josiah—probably 625 B.C. Whilst the older exegetes regarded the address as a prophecy of the Chaldean invasion, it has been customary in recent times to look upon the Scythian hordes as the enemy from the N. whose advance filled the prophet with evil forebodings. The features of the description that apparently suit the Chaldeans better are then explained as due to later retouching. It is possible, however, that the league between Nabopolassar and the king of the Umman-manda was formed already at the beginning of his reign, that a joint attack upon Syria was a part of the plan against the Assyrian empire, that Chaldean soldiers swelled the ranks of the 'ally' and 'helper,' and that the conquest of Babylon by Nabopolassar led Jeremiah to perceive the directing force behind these movements in the N. (cp SCYTHIANS). In the time of Sin-šar-iškun (circa 615), Habakkuk looked in the same direction, though in a different spirit, for a check to the reviving power of Assyria. 11:2-6 may be the substance of an address made in 620 when the Deuteronomic law was promulgated (Che.); and the return to ancient cults described in 9:12 may well have occurred in the reign of Josiah.

ii. Reign of Jehoiakim (607-597).—It is probable that 2:2-13 20:37 and 31:5 belong to the first years of the reign of Jehoiakim (Gieseb.). That 7:3-9 21 (with some exceptions) was spoken early in this reign is now generally assumed. The expectation of another impending northern invasion which has led some interpreters to think of the time of Josiah would be natural if Jeremiah had long watched those united efforts of Chaldeans and Umman-manda that led to the overthrow of Assyria in 606. 22:2-5 10-12 13-19 may belong to different parts of this reign, possibly also 18:1-17 19:1 f. 10 f. 20:1-6 (?). Of the oracle read by Baruch to his friends only 36:29b is known to us.

iii. The reign of Jehoiachin (597).—22:24-27 may have been uttered in the reign of Jehoiachin. Some interpreters ascribe to this reign chap. 13, or at least 18 f. (Gieseb.); but this is doubtful.

iv. The reign of Zedekiah (596-586).—The substance

* Translate: 'Verily, I shall root thee out (שָׁרְשִׁיתִיךָ); verily, I shall cause the enemy to fall upon thee (תִּפְּנֹתֶיךָ), cp Is. 53:6) in an evil time. The iron will be broken (עֲרֵב), the brazen citadel (מִצְדֵי הַנְּשֹׂת); thy wealth and treasures I will give for plunder . . . I will cause thee to serve' (שֶׁ, Pesh., and also 17:3 f.). I may be a gloss to יהוה מִתְּהוֹמֵי הַמִּצְדָּה; but כְּעַתָּה is another gloss.

of 21 belongs to the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah. 16₂₋₁₃ may have been spoken before the siege; 23_{9 ff.}, and possibly the substance of 28 as well as the original similes transformed in 13₁₋₁₁ 12-14, may belong to the time of the revolt. Words of Jeremiah during the siege have probably been preserved in 21₁₋₁₀ (37₁₋₁₀), when the siege was raised; in 37_{11 ff.}, at the capture and imprisonment of Jeremiah; and in 34, on the occasion of the re-enslavement of solemnly emancipated bondmen; possibly also in 32_{14 f.} Chap. 1 in its original form may also have been spoken in this reign.

v. Chaldean period (586-539).—The earliest collections of Jeremican prophecies were no doubt made in the Chaldean period; and many glosses may have been added. Some of the lamentations, like 4₁₉₋₂₁ 10₁₉₋₂₁ 23-25 15₅₋₉, may have originated in this period.

vi. Persian period (538-332).—Chaps. 30 f. were probably written on the eve of Xerxes' expedition against Greece. The gathering of tremendous armies from all lands for a decisive combat may well have struck terror into the hearts of Judeans.

The very magnitude of the preparations indicated the strength of the foe, and naturally aroused the hope that out of the turmoil there might come to Jacob independence and with it prosperity to woo the exiles back. Such prosperity, however, would not be permanent unless the restored nation ordered its conduct according to Yahwè's will. The prophetic preaching to which 2 Isaiah had given the impetus had signally failed to bring about a real reformation. That could be effected only by Yahwè's pardoning grace. But the evidences of forgiveness—viz., cessation of the Persian authority, restoration of the native monarchy, extension of the kingdom and growth of its capital—while leading men to a glad obedience to the law, would unquestionably imply a new arrangement of Yahwè with his people, based, as exilic historians had so strongly emphasised, not on Israel's faithfulness, but on Yahwè's unmerited yet unchanging love (cp COVENANT, § 6, v.).

This work (chaps. 30 f.) falls between the prophecies collected in Is. 40-55 and those found in Is. 56-66. 33₁₋₁₃ may also belong to this period.

The oracle against Elam-Persia, 49₃₄₋₃₈, was probably written at the approach of Alexander. Only the oppressions of Oechus can account for the hatred it breathes. The prophecy against the Philistines, Tyre and Sidon, 47, probably was composed at the same time, though the editor may have thought of the conquest of Gaza (defended by Demetrius) by Ptolemy in 312. It is possible that the two oracles against Egypt originated in the same epoch. The designation of the Egyptians as 'the enemies of Yahwè' is not unnatural in an age when law and liturgy alike caused the minds of men to dwell upon the oppression in Egypt and the wonderful deliverance, before the gentle rule of the Ptolemies had somewhat mollified their feelings. The conqueror described in 46₁₈ may be Alexander; another reference may be found in 50₁₆ (read $\text{וְיָבִיטֶנּוּ בְךָ}$, 'the sword of the Greek'; $\text{ἡ μάχαιρος Ἑλληνικῆς}$); 'the people of the north' is a suitable expression, though borrowed. Both oracles look for an Egyptian army marching into Syria to oppose the enemy, as so often in the past.¹ Literary dependence and final ascription to Jeremiah may be responsible for the confusion of tenses. The oracle against Edom, 49₇₋₂₂, later than Malachi (circa 400) and Obadiah, which it quotes, may still have belonged to this time. Edom would be in the conqueror's way.

It is distinctly probable that the biographical work used in the historical sections was a product of the Persian period. Even 35, though scarcely historical, may have originated then, as the reorganisation of the clerus would raise many questions of eligibility. Whether 38 was already a part of the work is more doubtful.

To this period many interpolations may belong, such as 36-42 9_{24-25a} 16₁₄₋₁₈ 17₁₉₋₂₇, and the poetical fragments, 8₁₈₋₂₃ 11₁₅₋₁₇ 12₁₋₆ 7-13 14₁₋₆ 7-9 19-21 20₇₋₁₃.

vii. Period of the Diadochi and the Lagidæ (332-198 B.C.).—The oracle against Ammon may have been occasioned by the advance of the Nabatæans, who in 312 were established in Idumæa and pushed their way into the trans-Jordan country. Although the prophecy against Kedar and the queen of Hazor (read in 49₂₈, with W. i., 'queen,' מַלְכָּה ; cp ἡ βασίλισσα) apparently did not yet have a place in the corpus found by the editorial writer of 25_{15 ff.}, it may owe its origin to the same spread of Nabatæan power in northern Arabia. There is nothing to forbid the assumption that 20₁₄₋₁₈ was added at this time.

viii. Period of the Seleucidæ (198-143 B.C.).—The oracle against Hamath, Arpad, and Daniascus, 49₂₃₋₂₇, is probably directed against Seleucia, the seat of the foreign oppressor of the time (cp Zech. 9₁₃ and We. Kl. Proph. (3) 190). It is likely to be later than the reign of Antiochus III. The prophecy against Babylon, 50-51 58, may have been written in the reign of Mithridates I., the sixth of the Arsacidæ (170-136). Having taken possession of Media and Elymais, this king attacked and finally captured Babylon (after 162). This approach of an enemy from the N. against what was still, in spite of Seleucia, one of the great centres of the empire, may have led the author, who lacks all originality, to draw upon the prophetic word for gruesome pictures of the impending destruction of the hated city. It is possible that the stories concerning an original Egyptian gōlah (CAPTIVITY) in the time of Jeremiah and his oracles regarding its future belong to this period, since the Chronicler¹ as yet knows nothing about this emigration. A passage like 2₁₄₋₁₉ may have been written in the beginning of the period of the Seleucidæ.

ix. Period of the Hasmonæans (143-63 B.C.).—It is probable that the oracle against Moab, 48, was composed in the reign of John Hyrcanus (134-104).

The author is clearly familiar with Is. 15₇, though his attitude towards Moab is different from that of the original writer of the Isaiah passage, approaching that of the editor, 16_{13 f.} This editor seems to have lived in the days of Alexander Jannæus (102-76); so Duhm, Marti. The enemy threatening Moab in Is. 15-16₁₂ is apparently the Nabatæans. Cheyne and Marti still think of the Persian period; but the kingdom seems to have been re-established in Judah, and it may therefore be best, with Duhm, to refer the poem to the Hasmonæan age.

In the time of John Hyrcanus territorial conquests smothered sympathy and revived ancient animosity. In this period the seven books received their final redaction, with many glosses and interpolations like 23₁₋₈, psalm-fragments in 17, the prayer 32_{16 ff.}, etc. In the reign of Alexander Jannæus the passages still wanting in Ḥ may have been added to the volume, though some of them may have been written earlier.

All known Hebrew MSS of Jeremiah exhibit substantially the same text. In its essential features this text may possibly be traced back to the end of the first century A.D. The differences between the Pesh. and MT may be explained partly by the peculiarities of the translator, partly by the unmistakable fact that his work was subsequently revised by one familiar with the Greek version then in use. Origen's δ Συρος seems to have been none else than the Pesh. That the Pesh. knew the Targ. is not likely. Rather is the reverse probable. In its differences from the Heb., the Targ. sometimes goes with the Pesh., sometimes with Ḥ where they differ. This may point to an acquaintance with either or with both. The slight differences between Jerome and the Heb. are accounted for by the influence of the Old Latin. Aquila adheres quite closely to the Heb. There are some indications that Theodotion was familiar with a Greek version more extensive than the LXX. The deviations of Symmachus where he does not depend on the LXX may be due to his own idiosyncrasies. It is possible that there was, as early as in the reign of Domitian, another Greek version reflecting substantially the same Hebrew text. See TEXT AND VERSIONS.

The author of Rev. 18 20 manifestly had in mind Jer. 51 48, a passage not found in \mathfrak{G} , and imitated it. The phrase βασιλεὺς τῶν αἰώνων, Rev. 15 4, is likewise an imitation of Jer. 10 7, not found in \mathfrak{G} , and the striking expression Θεὸς ζῶντων is found nowhere in OT except in that verse. The deviation from \mathfrak{G} in other NT allusions to or quotations from Jeremiah points to the same conclusion. Justin, in the important passage \mathfrak{D} 26, as well as in other places, agrees with MT against \mathfrak{G} (ἐπὶ τοῖσδ'αὖ). His agreement with the MSS assigned to the Lucianic recension is significant. Two groups of Greek MSS, one composed chiefly of 22, 23, 36, 48, 51, 231, another of xii, 88 in Holmes-Parsons, apparently have preserved much of this translation. With the former group goes Theodoret, with the latter Paul of Tella's Syriac version. The asterisks in some of the Greek MSS and in the hexaplar Syriac only indicate Origen's judgment, correct in itself, as to the limits of the earliest Greek version. \mathfrak{B} and \mathfrak{S} , which have much in common with xii and 88, may have been subjected to a more thorough critical process, cutting out the elements belonging to the later version. The existence of such a version already in the first century is only natural, since in Syria and Asia Minor the growing regard for the Hebrew text would inevitably lead to a translation of all it contained. But neither the Lucianic MSS, nor the Eusebian, nor yet the fragments of Theodotion, give us the exact form of the version used by the NT writers, Josephus, and Justin.

The relation of the Greek version to the Heb. has been the subject of much discussion. There are marked differences in arrangement and in contents. The book against foreign nations is found between 25 13 and 15; and the order is Elam, Egypt, Babylon, Philistia, Edom, Ammon, Kedar, Damascus, Moab. It has been estimated that the version has about 2700 words less, consequently is about an eighth shorter, than the MT.

This minus in \mathfrak{G} is made up in part of longer passages, such as 10 6-8 to 17 1-4 29 14 16-20 30 10 f. 33 14-26 39 4-13 48 45-47 51 45-48 52 28-30; in part of short expressions, such as יהוה אלהי ישראל (lacking more than sixty times), יהוה אלהי צבאות, יהוה אלהי תבנית, following the prophet's name and other titles and patronymics and pronouns. On the other hand, \mathfrak{G} contains a smaller number of additions composed mainly of pronouns, and words like כֹּל יהוה כל, יהוה כֹּל אֱמֹר יהוה כל. There are also important differences in the division of words and in the consonantal text.

The defence of MT at all hazards by earlier Protestant scholars was demanded by dogmatic considerations. Their Roman Catholic opponents (Morin, Cappel), though superior as textual critics, were not altogether free from attaching a fictitious canonical authority to the LXX, and from charging the Hebrews with bad faith. A distinct advance in scientific method was made when the theory of two recensions appeared. It was first suggested by Michaelis and elaborated by many others from Eichhorn to Workman. It recognised that the differences are connected with the growth of the volume, and rightly perceived that the longer text represented later expansion. Its chief defect was that it assumed that the two texts were the results of deliberate planning, of critical editing and revision—that they were recensions. When Movers recognised the impossibility of ascribing the longer text to Jeremiah or Baruch, as his predecessors had done, and assigned it to the age of Nehemiah, he prepared the way for a more correct appreciation. Since the admission that MT to any extent represented an expanded text would naturally have the tendency to render plausible the assumption that there were many later interpolations in the book, scholars like Spohn, Kueper, Hävernick, Wichelhaus, Nägelsbach, Keil, Orelli, Schneedorfer, Trochon, Kaulen, with more or less erudition, attempted to show that \mathfrak{G} was a truncated text, the translator having wilfully or carelessly cut out what seemed to him superfluous or unsuitable. The omitted passages seemed to them truly Jeremianic, as it was a peculiarity of Jeremiah to repeat himself and to quote older prophets such as Isaiah, whose book was wholly written by that prophet. The growing recognition of the late origin of the Isaianic passages quoted or alluded to would have prevented this view, so evidently born of dogmatic prepossessions, from influencing scholarly opinion, had not Graf made a bitter attack upon \mathfrak{G} , whose work he declared to be not even worthy of being called a translation. Even Graf seems unconsciously to have assumed that \mathfrak{G} must have had before him a text essentially identical with our MT. Measuring him with standards of accuracy that it would be hazardous to apply to a modern translator with the words properly divided and duly pointed, he found him guilty of ignorance, superficiality, and arbitrary dealing with the text. The reaction, led by Scholz, has tended to establish the good faith of the translator.

The translator's knowledge of Hebrew is not always adequate; his grouping of letters (written continuously) into words is sometimes incorrect, though not so often as has been supposed, the error being occasionally on the part of MT; he uses different words to render the same Hebrew term, which sometimes is a merit; he translates according to the sense where the exact meaning is known; he transliterates words known to him when they seem to him to be proper names; he follows the fashion of selecting a Greek word of a similar sound to the Hebrew; he sometimes overleaps a phrase by homœoteleuton. But the fact that through long sections he translates word for word, sometimes even slavishly following the text where he cannot make out its sense, shows his faithfulness. That it was not his principle to leave passages that were repeated in the book untranslated when they occurred a second time is evident, since out of thirty such cases he repeated all but seven, which are clearly secondary. It follows still more manifestly from the fact that he translated passages occurring in the MT twice only in the second place.

The tendency of copyists, observable elsewhere, is naturally to round off a phrase, to add a title or patronymic, and to introduce glosses and appendices. There would be a strong presumption in favour of the view that \mathfrak{G} 's original was less annotated than Heb., even if the character of the passages lacking in \mathfrak{G} did not positively demand for them a later date. If the explanation given above (§ 6) of the growth of the volume is correct, the place of 46-51 in \mathfrak{G} is likely to be more original, and the position of 25 13 ff. is accounted for, whilst the arrangement of the oracles, determined on different principles, may to some extent be more original in MT.¹

JEREMIAH, EPISTLE OF. An apocryphal composition, professing to have been written by Jeremiah to warn the Jews who were to be led captives to Babylonia against falling into idolatry. For this purpose the vanity of the idols of wood, silver, and gold is elaborately shown.

There is no logical arrangement; but we meet with something like a refrain in vv. 16 [17], 23 [24], 29 [30], 65 [66], and 69 [70], which verses serve at any rate as breaks; it may be added that another formula recurs in slightly varied forms at vv. 30 [31], 40 [41], 44, 46, 51 [52], 56.

The ideas are the commonplaces of the opponents of idolatry in post-exilic times (cp Pss. 115 4-8; 135 15-18; Is. 44 9-19; Jer. 10 3-9; Wisd. 13 10-19, 15 13-17). It is admitted, except by some Roman Catholic commentators, that the epistle was written in Greek; the few Hebraisms (e.g. ἀφομοιωθέντες ἀφομοιωθήτε [v. 4], and the use of the future for the present) are nothing uncommon in Hellenistic Greek. The imitation of Jeremiah is not very strenuous; the author has studied this book as most of the later writers have studied it, but in a very mechanical way. The statement in v. 2 [3] that the Babylonian exile is to last seven generations, altered in the Syriac into 'seventy years,' contradicts Jer. 29 10. It is hardly possible to fix the date exactly, and unsafe even to say that the epistle was written before 2 Maccabees, the supposed reference to it in 2 Macc. 3 ff. being disputed.

Ball (Var. Apocr. 200) suggests that seven generations (= 280) may seem to point to the removal of the Jews from Jerusalem to Alexandria by Ptolemy Soter (588-280=308).

The composition is not a mere scholastic exercise. It is, as Gifford truly says, 'an earnest appeal to persons actually living in the midst of heathenism, and needing to be warned and encouraged against temptations to apostasy.' In this respect it is parallel to Is. 44 9-19 and the other didactic passages mentioned above. The author may, as Fritzsche supposes, have been a Jew of Alexandria (note the somewhat turgid style); it is no objection to this view that, like the author of Is. 44 9-19, he places his work under the ægis of a writer of earlier date and established reputation. In fact, in Jer. 29 we actually hear of a letter, traditionally assigned to Jeremiah, which is addressed to those whom king Nebuchadrezzar had carried captives from Jerusalem to Babylon.

This 'epistle' (on the use of the term see EPISTOLARY LITERATURE) is included in the Greek canon, and is found in all Greek MSS of the OT except 70, 96, 229 [cursives]. In the Old Latin, the Old Syriac, and some editions of Φ , it is given as Baruch 6; and this is followed in Luther's Bible and in RV; but there is no plausible justification (see BARUCH, BOOK 6). In the Syro-Hex. the Epistle follows Lamentations.

A city, assigned to Benjamin (Josh. 18 21 21), remarkable alike from its history and its unique position. (a)

1. Meaning of Name. A plausible view explains the name as 'the fragrant' (יְרִיחוֹ); Ges. (Theol.), Wetzstein (in Del. *Jesaja*², 703), etc., and many others have acquiesced in it. The allusion on this hypothesis will be to the fragrant balsams and rose trees of Jericho. It is evident, however, that 'the fragrant,' however suitable as a title, can hardly have been the primeval name of such an important place.

(b) Following older commentators, Siegfr.-Stade (Lex.) and Sayce (Early Hist. 250) connect the name 'Jericho' with יְרִיחַ, 'the moon'; it will then be a testimony to the early prevalence of moon-worship, as BETH-SHEMESH [g.v.] testifies to that of sun-worship. (Cp Jer. OS 786, 'luna, sive odor ejus.')

(c) There is reason, however, to suspect that the true meaning of Jericho is neither 'fragrant city' nor 'moon city.' We shall see presently that the original tradition which underlies Josh. 2 related to the conquest of a different city from that commonly called Jericho, one that bore the name of which Jericho is a corruption (presumably a popular corruption), and that the true name of both places lies concealed under the incorrectly transmitted title עיר החמרים (EV 'the city of palm trees'), and is עיר יְרִיחָמֶל, 'city of Jerahmeel.' If this be admitted as probable—it would fall into line with other mutilated forms of the name Jerahmeel suggested elsewhere (see JERAHMEEL, § 4)—we must suppose that in primitive times a colony of Jerahmeelites settled in the rich plain of Jericho, and that, as elsewhere, the primitive name, in a shortened form, clung to the spot, even after another race had taken possession of it.

The title עיר החמרים occurs in four passages, but the latest of these, 2 Ch. 28 15, may safely be neglected.

2. City of Palm Trees. In Dt. 34 3 (see JORDAN, § 1) it is appended to 'Jericho' in a definition of the extent of the geographical term 'the Circle (of Jordan).' Judg. 1 16 gives a statement (see HOBAB) to the effect that the Kenites joined the men of Judah in an invasion of a southern district of Palestine; their starting-point was עיר החמרים. Although a reference to the historical Jericho would accord with the present context of Judg. 1 16 f. (see Moore), yet a comparison of Nu. 21 1-3 makes it very doubtful whether the original tradition did not mean rather a place to the S. of Judah.¹ It is natural to think of the Tamar of 1 K. 9 18 (see TAMAR), and to suppose that the full name of this place was 'city of palm trees,' and that the title being so appropriate to Jericho (see § 7), was inserted in Dt. 34 3 after this place-name. But is it really credible that palm trees anciently grew to the S. of Judah? Surely not (see NEGEB). We must therefore seek for some name or title which may have been corrupted into עיר החמרים, and can be reasonably supposed to have been suitable both for 'Jericho and for the city to the S. of Judah, of which we are in quest. There is such a name or title—עיר יְרִיחָמֶל, 'city of Jerah-meel,' otherwise in all probability called קַדֶּשׁ יְרִיחוֹ, 'Kadesh of Jerahmeel' (out of קַדֶּשׁ בַּרנֶּא, EV 'Kadesh-Barnea,' probably sprang). This theory seems to throw light on the third passage in which עֵיר הַחֲמִירִים occurs, viz., Judg. 3:13, where we read that 'Eglon gathered to him the bnē Amalek (i.e., the bnē Jerahmeel¹), and went and smote Israel, and possessed himself of עֵיר הַחֲמִירִים (i.e., Jericho, the city of Jerahmeel).' The 'Amalekites' (Jerahmeelites) naturally supported the Moabite king Eglon, because it roused their indignation to see an ancient settlement of their own occupied by the bnē Israel.

It is remarkable that no name resembling 'Jericho' should occur in the Amarna Tablets. In the Book of

3. Tangled Traditions in Josh. 2-6.

Joshua we find it mentioned as a city with a wall and a gate (2:5-15), rich² (6:24-7:21), and governed by its own king (2:3). It will be seen, however, that this tradition is of doubtful origin; we may perhaps receive further light from excavations.

The story of the capture of Jericho by the Israelites is briefly this³ (Josh. 2-6). While the Israelites were encamped at SHITTIM, on the other side of Jordan, Joshua sent two of his men to spy out the land and in the first instance Jericho. They found a lodging at Jericho in the house of one Rahab a harlot. The king, however, got news of their arrival, and sent word to Rahab to bring out her guests. But Rahab let the men down through the window, after they had guaranteed her life and that of her family, for she was aware that Jericho was doomed to fall. They fled into the mountains.⁴ Pursuers sought for them for three days in the direction of the fords of the Jordan, and then gave up their search; the two spies returned to Joshua. Thereupon the Israelites broke up their camp and moved to the Jordan. It was a bold step; for it was the flood-time, when the Zōr or wider bed of the river (see JORDAN, § 4) becomes brimful, so that the water is on a level with the banks. But Joshua knew in whom he believed, and bade the Israelites pass over. In the van he placed twelve men, each carrying a stone, next came the ark, then the tribes of Israel. Yahwē performed a wonder for his people; no sooner did they prepare to cross, than the current of the river was stayed. The host of Israel went over, and the twelve stones were set up as an 'everlasting memorial' at Gilgal, at the eastern limit of Jericho (יְרִיחוֹ בְּקֶדֶם מִקְרָה יְרִיחוֹ, Josh. 4:19). The first obstacle of Joshua's further advance was the strong city of Jericho. The 'captain of the host of Yahwē' appeared to Joshua (probably at Gilgal,⁵ cp Judg. 2:1), to make known his participation in the coming attack on Jericho, and (editorial manipulation has obscured this point) to give directions as to the course of action to be adopted.⁶ What form the earlier tradition gave to these directions we cannot venture to say. A later writer represents the capture thus. Once a day for six days Israel went round the city in procession; the vanguard first; next the priests (carrying seven trumpets of rams' horns) with the ark; then the rear-guard (cp ARK, § 4). On the seventh day the procession made its round seven times, and at the seventh time the priests blew the trumpets and the people raised the battle-cry, whereupon the walls of Jericho fell down. Then the conquered city was made hērem—i.e., all living things were killed and the spoil either burnt or dedicated to the service of Yahwē. A curse was pronounced on the man who should rebuild Jericho (see HIEL). 'But the harlot Rahab and her family—even all that belonged to her—Joshua saved alive, so that she dwells in the midst of Israel to this day' (Josh. 6:25).

In its present form the biblical narrative is composite. Successive writers have devoted themselves to the elaboration of the details. Analytic criticism has been applied to the narrative (see JOSHUA II., § 7); but its results seem to require further revision in the light of a more searching criticism of MT. Steuernagel is right in assuming the relative originality of G; but we can no more follow G implicitly as a canonical authority than MT. The text in all its forms must be subjected to a searching criticism. It will thus, for instance, become plain that Josh. 3:15-17, which the Oxford editors assign to P, is based on an earlier written source. We cannot, however, criticise the text of this most interesting and elaborate description of the stoppage of the waters of the Jordan without some guidance from outside.

Such guidance we receive from four sources: (1) From the story of Jacob (Israel); (2) From the story of Jerubbaal; (3) From Dt. 11:29 f., 27:1; and (4) From the various evidences in early tradition that the tribe of Judah came up into its settlements through the Negeb, starting from Kadesh-Jerahmeel ('Barnea').

1. Any one who approaches the story of Jacob with a fresh and open mind will be irresistibly led to suspect that the crossing of the Jordan by the Israelites under the Ephraimite Joshua was, in its original form, parallel to the migration of Jacob-Israel across the Jordan, which an early tradition placed at the point where it is met by the Jabbok.¹ 2. The twofold geographical relation of Gideon-Jerubbaal (see GIDEON) points in the same direction; it is not accidental that the name Zarethan occurs in Josh. 3:16 and a parallel form Zererab (both forms are corrupt) in Judg. 7:22. 3. It is appropriately remarked on Dt. 27:2 by the Oxford editors, 'The phraseology suggests that the stones were to be erected on the actual day of the passage of the Jordan. . . . Is the distance from the Jordan to Shechem forgotten; does the writer, "looking back to a distant past" (Driver), fail to take account of the time that must have elapsed between the crossing of the river and the arrival at Ebal; or is there a vague reminiscence in his mind of the later incident when twelve stones are taken up out of the Jordan and placed upright in the Gilgal?' Is it not rather a reminiscence, not of the 'later incident,' but of the original tradition of the crossing of the Jordan at a more northerly point than the fords of Jericho? On Dt. 11:29 f. see especially GERIZIM. 4. If Judah started from Kadesh-Jerahmeel we may analogously assume that the Joseph tribes entered W. Palestine at a point on the Jordan nearer to their ultimate possessions than Jericho.

The considerations just stated lead to the following emendation of the text of Josh. 3:16, '(it came to pass) that the water stood still; that which came down from above stood as a heap some distance (cp Gen. 21:16) from the ford of Adamah which is opposite Beth-zur'² (הַרְחֵק כַּסְפֵּיבְרָה אֲדָמָה אֲשֶׁר נֹרַ בֵּית-צוּר). The 'ford of Adamah' is to be identified with the ford of Dämieh, which is at the confluence of the Jabbok and the Jordan, 16 m. in a direct line from the fords of Jericho. Beth-zur must be the name of the fortress which already stood on the summit of Karn Şartabeh, 2227 ft. above the Jordan Valley.¹ It is probable that at the end of v. 16 the original narrative had, instead of ירוח 'opposite Jericho,' נגד בית-זור 'opposite Betb-zur.' No one can reasonably doubt that this geographical definition, so inconsistent with the references to Jericho, comes from a relatively early source. In short, according to the earlier tradition, the crossing of the Jordan by the Ephraimite Joshua and his followers took place near the point where Jacob is also said to have crossed the Jordan—i.e., near the ford of Dāmīeh. Nevertheless, the transference of the scene to Jericho is not purely arbitrary. There is evidence of a confusion of two traditions, one of which referred to the conquest by the Judahites of the city of Jerahmeel (probably Kadesh-Jerahmeel), and the other to the crossing of the Jordan near Dāmīeh by the Ephraimites. The story of the spies² and of RAHAB [g.v.] belongs properly to the former tradition. 'Rahab' (רַחַב), or rather Rechab (רַחַב), or—best of all—Heber (חֶבֶר), is certainly the representative of the Rechabites, or Heberites, a second name of the KENITES [g.v.], who, as we infer from Judg. 116, anciently dwelt in the 'city of Jerahmeel' (MT 'city of palm trees,' but see § 2), though not themselves Jerahmeelites (= Amalekites, cp 1 S. 15.16). These Rechabites³ or Kenites held the position of a protected tribe, or, putting this into symbolic phraseology, Rahab-Rechab was a 'harlot.'⁴ Now we can really profess to understand the statement in Josh. 21 that Joshua's two spies found lodging in the house of a harlot. The detail was not suggested by considerations of expediency,—'for strangers to turn into such a house would excite 'the least suspicion' (Steuernagel); it is an anticipation of the historical relation between Kain and Israel. As the narrator says, 'Rahab dwells in Israel unto this day' (Josh. 6.25), i.e., the Kenites still dwelt among the Judahites as a protected tribe in the narrator's times.

² The מַעְבְּרַת אֲדָמָה of Kt. represents מַעְבְּרַת עֵיר; עֵיר is a corruption of אֲשֶׁר; מַעְבְּרַת (for נֹרַ) arose from the proximity of צוּר; בֵּית-צוּר is certainly a corruption of בֵּית-צוּר (see ZARETAN); נֹרַ (καριαβασις) indicates a reading קָרַן, which, though defended by W. E. Stevenson, PEFQ, '96, p. 82, is certainly wrong. Cp Judg. 7:22 (emended; see ZARETAN). See also ADAM.

It is needless to ask what suggested the story of the falling down of the walls of Jericho. As Steuernagel truly says (151), the popular imagination clothed the conviction that all Israel's successes were due to Yahwē's help in the form of history. Among the instances of this he mentions the 'drying up of the Jordan' and the falling down of the walls of Jericho. For the first of these reputed wonders Steuernagel's explanation is hardly sufficient. The biblical writers show a certain economy in the distribution of wonders. It was necessary that the walls of Jericho should fall down. Only by supernatural means could the untrained host of Joshua capture a fortified city; G. A. Smith goes a little too far when he says (pp. 267 f.) that the statement in Josh. 6.20 is 'the soberest summary of all Jericho's history.' But it was not necessary that the current of the Jordan's waters should be stayed; a ford suited Jacob, and might as well have suited Joshua. There must have been some natural phenomenon—probably one which had occurred within the first narrator's knowledge—which suggested the story of the waters that stood up as a heap, and Clermont-Ganneau has brought from a Paris MS an Arabic historian's account of just such a historical phenomenon as we require for our purpose.

The statement of Nowairi (as reported by Lt.-Col. C. M. Watson in PEFQ. '95, pp. 253 f.) is that in 664 A.H. (=1266 A.D.) Bibars I., then Sultan of Egypt, caused a bridge to be built across the Jordan for strategical purposes. 'The bridge is in the neighbourhood of Dāmīeh, between it and Karāwā,⁵ and

² Cp the story of the spies in Nu. 13.
³ We postpone the question as to the right name of this tribe.
⁴ Ewald's suggestion (GV 2348, n. 1) is most unjust to the people of Jericho, and finds no support in the narrative (see Josh. 39).
⁵ The diacritical points are wanting in the MS of Nowairi; Clermont-Ganneau reads the name Karāwā. Karāwā is almost there happened in connection with it a wonderful thing, the like of which was never heard of.' When the bridge was completed, part of the piers gave way, and in the night preceding the 8th Dec. 1267 'the waters of the river ceased to flow.' The phenomenon was investigated and it appeared 'that a lofty mound which overlooked the river on the west had fallen into it and dammed it up. . . . The water was held up, and had spread itself over the valley above the dam.' It was arrested from midnight until the fourth hour of the day. Then the water prevailed over the dam and broke it up.' For Nowairi the occurrence was extraordinary indeed, but quite a natural phenomenon. The situation described can be sufficiently made out. Dāmīeh is well known, and on the west bank, just opposite Dāmīeh, there is a district called Karāwā. Formerly, however, this name was given to a town which was in the centre of a district where sugar-cane was cultivated. An examination of the ground confirms Clermont-Ganneau's view of the meaning, for a little above the ford, where the Wādī Zerkā joins the Jordan, are the remains of an old bridge which is probably the very bridge erected in 1266 A.D. by command of Bibars I.

The physical character of this phenomenon forcibly recalls that described in Joshua. Nowairi states that it occurred at a time when the Jordan was in full flood; the Hebrew narrator makes a similar statement. Nowairi, it is true, dates the event the 8th December; the Hebrew narrator specifies the time of harvest (March?); but on the essential point, as already noticed, they agree. The point where the landslip described by Nowairi took place, is one where minor landslips still occur, and a large one, such as the Arabic and the Hebrew narrators describe, might again dam up the Jordan, and let it run off into the Dead Sea, leaving the bed temporarily dry.

We have thus gained something for the traditional history of Kadesh-Jerahmeel and for that of the ford of Adāmāh; but we have lost our sole authority for the early history of the city known as Jericho. Hence the first trustworthy historical notice of Jericho is in 2 S. 10.5, where Jericho appears as a city of the realm of David. We may assume, but we do not know, that it was fortified in his time. It was at any rate either fortified or refortified by HIEL (g.v.), if we should not rather ascribe the act to Jehu, and regard it as a precaution against Aramæan invasion (1 K. 16.34; see JEHU, § 3). Judæa, as Prof. G. A. Smith remarks, could never keep Jericho. As a Benjaminite town it fell to Northern Israel, while Northern Israel lasted. In later times it fell to Bacchides and the Syrians; Bacchides fortified it against Jonathan the Maccabee (1 Macc. 9.50). The cause of this will be plain later. Here we have to add that a company of prophets made Jericho their home in the days of Elijah and Elisha (2 K. 24 f.), and that Elisha was said to have healed the water of the chief fountain of the city (v. 19 f.; cp Jos. BJ iv. 83). The fountain meant is no doubt the 'Ain es-Sultān, sometimes called Elisha's Fountain. In the great post-exilic list (Ezra 2.34 Neh. 7.36) the men of Jericho are reckoned at 345; Jericho was also represented among Nehemiah's builders at Jerusalem (Neh. 3.2). At the fortress of Dok ('Ain ed-Dūk; see DOCUS), near Jericho, that noble Maccabee, Simon, was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy (1 Macc. 16.15).

See further GASm. HG 267 f. Dean Stanley's expression, 'the key of Palestine,' applied to Jericho, is hardly accurate.

Christian tradition fixed the site of the temptation of Christ at the hill Quarantana (Jebel Karantel) to the W. of the 'Ain es-Sultān; the reputed scene of the baptism was also near Jericho (see JORDAN, § 2 [7]). The Gospels, however, have something much better to tell us. At the close of Christ's ministry, as he was leaving Jericho on his way to Jerusalem, he healed a blind man called BARTIMÆUS [g.v.]. It was necessary, as Farrar rightly says, to rest at Jericho before entering on the rough and rocky gorge which led up towards Jerusalem.

Smith's reasons for doubting (HG 353, n. 5) seem insufficient. The present writer would further identify this fertile spot with the Abēl-meholah of the OT.

but we cannot attach weight with him¹ to Macknight's suggestion that the discrepancy between Mt. and Mk. on the one hand and Lk. on the other may be met by the supposition that the scene of the occurrence lay between the two Jerichos—i.e., that according to Lk. Jesus was approaching New Jericho, while according to Mt. and Mk. he was leaving Old Jericho. A reference to Old Jericho would have been unmeaning, for it was then uninhabited, nor could 'Jericho' at this time mean anything but the city which was given by Antony to Cleopatra and redeemed by Herod the Great. The narrative is of the highest interest. It may be taken by some to confirm the historicity of the Messianic entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem, for cures of bodily evils were doubtless considered to be characteristic acts of the Messiah, and the story of Bartimæus may suggest that the movement of which we have the climax in Mk. 11-12 gathered strength in Jericho. Keim (Jesus von Naz. 352 f.) has put the case for the historicity of the Bartimæus narrative in a very attractive way (cp BARTIMÆUS, § 1); on the other hand, there are difficulties in admitting the 'triumphal entry' as a part of the most primitive tradition (see HOSANNA) which cannot but affect the historicity of the story of Bartimæus. The narrative, however, must at any rate be very early—so full is it of nature and verisimilitude, and it is 'by far the best attested of all the stories of the healing of the blind in the Gospels.' The story of Zacchæus is not less natural. Not a few 'publicans' must have been needed to secure the revenues accruing from the traffic in the famous balsam, and the murmuring of the multitude at the grace shown to a 'sinner' is easily intelligible. Still there are difficulties (see ZACCHEUS) in the way of conceding more than an ideal truth to this delightful story, of which Lk. is the only narrator. Disciples full of the spirit of Jesus might surely be able to fill up the gaps in tradition by imagining such a scene as that of the 'conversion' of Zacchæus. Should we have lost anything if documentary evidence of this almost involuntary imaginative creation could be produced? Is the story (also only reported by Lk.) of the man who 'went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves' (Lk. 10₃₀ f.) less effective or less prized because we know that it is only ideally true?

'No great man,' says Prof. G. A. Smith, 'was born in Jericho; no heroic deed was ever done in her.'² It is possible, indeed, that the most detested man in the history of Christianity was born there; the name Judas Iscariotes should perhaps be Judas Ierichotes—i.e., Judas of Jericho (unless indeed the title belongs primarily to his father; see JUDAS ISCARIOT). The chief historical name closely connected with Jericho is that of Herod, who beautified the city, and retired to it to die (Jos. Ant. xvii. 65). The place is often mentioned in the later history. Both Pompey and Vespasian took the city and fortified it, rather perhaps as a source of supplies than as a base of operations.³ Its natural wealth, chiefly owing to the precious balsam, made it a coveted possession. Herod's Roman allies sacked it (Jos. B. i. 156), and Herod himself was glad to farm Jericho and its plain from Cleopatra, to whom Anthony had assigned them (Jos. Ant. xv. 42). Here as elsewhere he proved himself a great builder—palaces and public buildings sprang up as by magic (Ant. xvi. 52; B. i. 2149; cp HEROD). After his death Simon, a former slave of Herod, aspiring to be king, burned and plundered the palace (Ant. xvii. 106), which, however, was magnificently rebuilt by Archelaus. Most important of all, Archelaus diverted water from a village called Nera, to irrigate the plain, in which he had just planted palm trees (Ant. xvii. 131). In the time of Josephus Jericho was the seat of one of the eleven toparchies or administrative districts (B. iii. 35). On the approach of Vespasian the inhabitants fled to the mountains; unopposed, he erected a citadel, and placed a garrison in it (B. iv. 8292). To a great extent, says Josephus, the city had been destroyed before the coming of the Romans (B. iv. 82). But the damage must soon have been repaired. The notices of Pliny, subsequent to the Roman war, leave no doubt as to the prosperity of Jericho, caused by its fine plantations of palm trees and balsam trees. It is also mentioned by Ptolemy and by Galen in the second century A.D., and existed in the time of Caracalla, according to a statement of Origen preserved in Eusebius.¹ In the list of the principal cities of Judæa given by Ammianus Marcellinus (end of 4th cent.) it is conspicuous by its absence. We may presume that some calamity had happened to it, and Reinach² with much probability supposes that the famous passage of Solinus (ed. Mommsen, 356)—'Judææ caput fuit Hierosolyma, sed excisa est; successit Hierichus, et hæc desivit, Artaxerxis bello subacta'—refers to a destruction of Jericho (probably by the Romans) in connection with the invasion of Syria by Artashir the founder of the Persian dynasty of the Sassanidae, who assumed the venerated name of Artaxerxes (cp ISAIAH ii. § 13, n. 2). If so, the date of the event must be placed about 230 A.D. It is probably to this event that Jerome refers in his treatise on the Site and Names of Hebrew Places; the phraseology points very strongly to this view.³

Jericho began to be resorted to by pilgrims in the fourth century, and the sacred sites sprang into view.

8. Christian traditions.

The Bordeaux Pilgrim (333 A.D.) saw the sycomore tree of Zacchæus, and the house of Rahab immediately above Elisha's Fountain. In the time of Theodosius, however (530 A.D.), the site of the latter had been shifted. Bishop Arculf (towards 700 A.D.) found the whole site of the city covered with cornfields and vineyards, without any habitations, but the walls of the 'house of Rahab' were still standing, though without a roof. Between the city and the Jordan were large groves of palm trees, interspersed with open spaces, in which were almost innumerable houses, inhabited by a diminutive sort of men of the race of Canaan. (There are still the marks of degradation in the Bedouins of Jericho.) Saewulf (1102 A.D.) speaks of Jericho as 'the garden of Abraham'; it is in a land covered with trees and producing all kinds of palms and other fruits. In the fourteenth century Sir John Maundeville speaks again of the Garden of Abraham, but places it at the foot of the Quarantana. 'Upon that bill Abraham dwelt a long while; therefore it is called Abraham's Garden.'

The Jericho of the Bordeaux Pilgrim was at the base of the mountains; he places the more ancient city at Elisha's Fountain. No doubt this view is correct. No other site would be at all probable. 'Three fine springs are found within but a small distance of one another, while the rest of the plain can show but one, and that far less considerable' (Conder). The chief of these is the 'Ain es-Sultân—a beautiful fountain of sweet, palatable water which bursts forth at the E. foot of a long tell or mound, over 1200 ft. in length from N. to S., and about 50 ft. in height. Superimposed are four other mounds (one of them a ridge) at the edges, the NW. or highest being some 90 ft. above the fountain, but not more than 60 or 70 ft. above the ground at the W. Dr. Bliss¹ offers the opinion that the tell is a mass of dbris caused by the ruin of several mud-brick towns over the first Jericho. For the remains of the second or Herodian city we must go to the S. bank of the Wady el-Kelt, nearly two miles W. of the modern village. Here there are abundant remains of an ancient city, and similar ruins N. of 'Ain es-Sultān suggest that the Herodian Jericho may have extended in this direction also, the interval between the sites being filled up with detached villas. According to Conder² the Byzantine Jericho is represented by the foundations and fragments of cornice and capital, over which the rider stumbles among the thorn-groves E. of the 'Ain es-Sultān.' The fourth Jericho—that of the Crusaders—was on the site of the present village. The square tower on the SE. of Eriha (so the village is called) is 'such a one as the Crusaders erected along their pilgrim roads,'³ though since the fifteenth century it has been said to occupy the site of the House of Zachæus.

The ancient road from Jerusalem to Jericho zigzags down the bare mountain side, close to the S. bank of the chasms in the 'ancient mountains,' so narrow that one can hardly measure twenty yards across at the bottom, so deep that one can only just see the slender torrent stream which winds along amidst canes and rank rushes to the Jordan. At last the prospect widens, and we get a complete view of the vast plain of Jericho. Half a mile from the foot of the pass we perceive an ancient reservoir, now dry, perhaps the remains of a pool constructed by Herod; for here no doubt is the site of the Herodian Jericho. Shortly afterwards we pass under a handsome aqueduct crossing the Kelt, and at this point we have our choice whether to seek out Elisha's Fountain or the squalid village of Eriha. The vegetation now becomes very luxuriant. Palm groves, balsam trees, and sugar-canes⁴ have disappeared (see BALSAM, PALM TREE), though in 1874 a solitary palm tree still grew close to the tower of Eriha, and another clump in the valley N. of Kaşr el-Hajla.⁵ Yet the few fields of wheat and Indian corn, and the few orchards of figs and pomegranates, give some idea of what the soil would yield if properly irrigated and cultivated. Josephus's picture of Jericho (B/iv. 83) well deserves reading. The site is on all accounts profoundly interesting, and Tell es-Sultān no doubt one day be excavated. Meantime the Christian traveller will delight himself with the unaltered fountain of ancient Jericho⁶ and will walk with interest on the S. bank of the Kelt where the feet of Jesus doubtless trod.⁷ Nor will the tiring excursion to the hermit's caverns on the Mountain of the Temptation be altogether unrewarded.

10. Situation Wady el-Kelt. Few mountain gorges in Western lands can compare with it. It is one of the most stupendous

'the clan is numerous'; cp the doubt as to the meaning of Hammurabi (see HAM); a play on the name seems at any rate to be proved [see REHOBOAM]; ιεροβοαμ [BAL]).

1. Jeroboam I., the first king of N. Israel (circ. 930 B.C.). Dean Stanley's sketch of this king (Smith's DB, 5.v.) was based on the separate account contained in 1 K. 12:25-39 (Lag.), or 11:43b-12:24a-f (Swete), which is Lucian's text of Θ (cp TEXT AND VERSIONS, § 52d). Recently the same line has been taken by some good critics. It conduces greatly to a genuine comprehension of Jeroboam, especially if the underlying text be first of all carefully purified from its errors. We thus arrive at the following view of the rise of Jeroboam. He was an Ephraimite of the clan of Nabat or Nabath (ναβατ, ναβαθ; cp Naboth); but his mother came from the same N. Arabian land of Musri² to which the mother of Hadad III. of Edom belonged. This half-Arabian extraction is of importance not only with reference to his name [see above], but also as illustrating the second chapter of his history. It did not lessen his Israelitish sympathy; but it gave him a second home to flee to. His abilities soon marked him out as a leader of men; Solomon, we are told, made him superintendent (αρχωντα σκατάλης = פֶּלֶא, 1 K. 12:28 BL) of the corvée imposed on the Ephraimites (cp DISTRICT). Jeroboam, no doubt, felt patriotic or tribal indignation at Solomon's despotism, and also saw in the situation great possibilities for himself. He fortified his native city (not Zereda, but Tirzah, or rather Bethzur; see TIRZAH), nominally perhaps for Solomon (12:29^{BL}), but really for himself, and, like the equally ambitious Absalom (if in 2 S. 15:1 we render 'chariots'; see 6) procured chariots and horses, a sign of his pretensions to the throne, and of his readiness for warlike operations. (The Greek actually fixes the number of the chariots at 300.) Jeroboam had not sufficiently matured his plans, however, and he escaped the punishment which Solomon designed for him only by a hasty flight to the country of his mother. There he enjoyed the protection, not of course of Shishak,¹ but of Pir'u, king of Muṣri; the statement that he married an Egyptian princess implies a confusion of his story with that of Hadad (see HADAD, 3).

On the death of Solomon, Jeroboam returned to Tirzah² (Bethzur), strong in the consciousness of his unimpaired popularity. Though he doubtless knew the incapacity of the son of Solomon, he was too wise to commit any overt act of rebellion, and suffered Rehoboam to assume the crown. If Lucian's text can be trusted, it was during this period that his son Abijah fell sick and died; it is not very likely, however, that such was the meaning of the original tradition. Another statement of Lucian's text, which apparently relates to this period, is that he fortified—i.e., still further fortified—his native city (12:39 L, 12:24 f. B). One can hardly believe even this. Rehoboam would surely not have ventured to Shechem without a bodyguard³ if his father's old enemy had made himself so strong. At any rate, Jeroboam must have arranged the details of his plot when, as Lucian's text states, he went to Shechem which is in Mount Ephraim, and assembled there all the tribes of [northern?] Israel, and Rehoboam (a N. Israelite on his mother's side; see REHOBAM), son of Solomon, went up thither (6^L, 1 K. 13:14, 6^B 12:24 n.). The heads of the tribes laid their wishes before Rehoboam; they deprecated a continuance of the old despotic policy. Rehoboam acted as Jeroboam foresaw that he would. By his arrogant answer to the tribesmen he pronounced sentence on himself and his dynasty.

Of Jeroboam's subsequent history we have only fragmentary notices. Shishak's predatory invasion extended to N. Israel (see EGYPT, § 63, and SHISHAK); did the bold usurper make no attempt to oppose it? Had the fortification of Penuel, a place on the E. of the Jordan, any connection with this raid?⁴ That Shechem also was fortified, needs, of course, no explanation. There was the possible danger of an invasion from Judah. The narrative in 1 K. 12:21-24 may perhaps be believed when it states that the Judahites on one great occasion retreated, though in its present form it is unacceptable (see Ki.); but there is no detailed statement of successes of Jeroboam, and we know that the war was handed on by Rehoboam to his successors.⁵ Jeroboam also directed his attention to religion. The redactor of Kings had before him a record of certain important changes effected by this king, who aimed, on political grounds, at severing the religious intercourse between Israel and Judah. A great yearly festival was appointed on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 'like the festival in Judah,' and two golden or gilded images in the form of bulls were placed in the sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan (see CALF, GOLDEN; IDOLATRY, § 6). These images were in the eyes of the redactor

'the sin of Jeroboam, which he made Israel to sin,'¹ and which ultimately ruined, not only the house of Jeroboam, but also the kingdom of Israel.

The three narratives in which prophets appear (1 K. 11:29-39 14:1-18 and 13:1-32) cannot be treated as historical. The last of the three expresses a purely mechanical conception of prophecy. The other two are the expressions of a faith that God directs human affairs which is religiously valuable; they are none the less idealising constructions of history. It is possible, however, that Jeroboam had friendly relations with a prophet residing at Shiloh named Ahijah (in 1 K. 11:29 for מִירְשָׁלַיִם read מִירְשָׁלַיִם² 'from Mizrim (Muṣri)'). The northern prophets were of course on Jeroboam's side. Possibly too a son of Jeroboam, named Abijah, may have fallen sick and died, though the circumstance that 6^{BL} makes Ahijah the son of Jeroboam's Egyptian wife, may suggest scepticism as to Abijah's existence. The death of Ahijah would naturally be interpreted as a sign of the divine displeasure, at any rate by those unfriendly to Jeroboam. On the criticism of the Jeroboam-narratives see Klostermann (especially on the text), Winckler (AT Untersuch. 1-15, GT 2:273), Benz. and Ki. (comm.), and Cheyne (JQR 11:556 f. [1901]).

2. Jeroboam II. ben Joash, fourth king of the line of Jehu (782-743 B.C.). The fragmentary account in 2 K. 14:23-29 permits us to see that the compiler knew more about Jeroboam than he has cared to communicate. 'The rest of the matters of Jeroboam, and his martial prowess, and how he warred'—all this has no interest for the writer, who is absorbed in the thought of the approaching captivity of Israel, and regards Jeroboam's successes against foreign foes as only a breathing-time granted to Israel in mercy (2 K. 13:23). Even what he communicates has not come down to us in a perfectly intelligible form.³ We can understand the statement in 2 K. 14:25 that Jeroboam 'recovered the territory of Israel from the approach to Hamath (the old Solomonic northern limit) as far as the sea of the Arabah' (i.e., the Dead Sea), and we can realise that this must have involved victories over Aram. When we are told, however, that 'he recovered Damascus, and Hamath [which had belonged] to Judah, for Israel' (v. 28 RV), we are perplexed. The Assyrian king Ramman-nirāri (see ASSYRIA, § 32) would never have allowed Jeroboam to conquer Damascus,⁴ and, as for Hamath, it never did belong to Judah—the supposed Assyriological evidence (see UZZIAH) having proved to be illusory. The original text must simply have said that N. Israelitish regions which had been conquered by Aram were recovered by Jeroboam, and we may perhaps discern underneath the present text the statement 'and how he recovered Manasseh and Ramoth-gilead from the hand of Benhadad son of Hazael.'⁵ Jeroboam II. was in fact the 'helper' or 'saviour' anticipated by the prophet JONAH [q.v.]. Of his other warlike enterprises, no information has reached us. Probably he continued to exercise, or at least to claim, suzerainty over Judah; at any rate Azariah does not appear to have followed the bad example of Amaziah (2 K. 14:8-14). Many scholars (e.g., Ewald) infer from 2 K. 14:25 that Jeroboam conquered the land of Moab. Certainly the description does not absolutely forbid this view, which is recommended to some by the light which it may seem to throw on the 'oracle of Moab' in Is. 15-16 12.⁶

² Cp 6^{BL} 1 K. 11:436. Klo. מִירְשָׁיִם, 'from Egypt.'

³ See Ewald, Hist. 4:124, n. 3; and especially Klo. and Benzinger, ad loc.

⁴ GASm. is content with supposing that he 'occupied at least part of the territory of Damascus' (Twelve Prophets, 1:32).

On the other hand, it is very far from certain that Is. 15-16 is a pre-exilic work (see ISAIAH ii., § 9), and we may fairly suppose that if Jeroboam had really made such an important conquest, the redactor would have referred to it in distinct terms. Enough reason, however, remains for regarding Jeroboam II. as the most successful of the N. Israelitish kings, and we may be sure that in more ideal aspects his long reign deserved to be remembered. It was probably in this period that the Elohist (E) wrote, and the prophetic ministry of Amos and Hosea certainly falls in Jeroboam's time. The records of these prophets supplement to some extent the scanty fragments of contemporary history. T. K. C.

JEROHAM (יֵרוֹחַם), 'pitied [by God], § 53; יֵרוֹחַם [AL]; but in י. at all events, Ⓞ reads 'perhaps rightly' [so Dr.] JERAHMEEL [g.v.]; 1 S. 11 יֵרֵמֶהָל [B], יֵרֵמֶהָל [L], and 1 Ch. 6 27 [12] 34 [19], יֵרֵמֶהָל [L].

1. Samuel's grandfather (1 S. 11 1 Ch. 6 27 34 [12 19], יֵרֵמֶהָל, יֵרֵמֶהָל [B], יֵרֵמֶהָל [A]). The name is more probably a gentilic and should be read Jerahmeel (cp above); it thus corresponds to the Ephraimite gentilic Tohu (= Tahan, or Tahath). The seer's ancestry appears then as a combination of two separate genealogies which trace his origin to the clans of Jerahmeel and Tahan respectively (so Marq. Fund. 12 f., cp TAHATH, TOHU). For the suggestion that 'Jerahmeel' refers really to Eli's origin see JERAHMEEL, § 3. The names Tahan, Tahath, etc. remind one of the Judaean Jahath a descendant of Shobal (also Calebite), which is possibly the parent of the name 'Samuel,' see JAHATH.
2. b. Hushim in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (§ 9, ii. B); see JQR 11 103, § 1. 1 Ch. 8 27 (יֵרֵמֶהָל [B], יֵרֵמֶהָל [L]). JEREMOTH in v. 14 is probably a corruption of the name.
3. A Benjamite, father of Ibneiah (1 Ch. 9 8, יֵרֵמֶהָל [B]).
4. Father of Adaiah, a priest of the h'ne Immer in a list of inhabitants of Jerusalem (EZRA ii., § 5[6], § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 12 (יֵרֵמֶהָל [B], יֵרֵמֶהָל [A])=Neh. 11 12 (om. B⁹, יֵרֵמֶהָל [N⁹ mg. inf.]).
5. A Benjamite of Gedor, one of David's warriors (1 Ch. 12 7, יֵרֵמֶהָל [BN]). See DAVID, § 11, c, col. 1031.

6. A Danite, father of Azareel (1 Ch. 27 22, יֵרֵמֶהָל [BA]).
7. Father of Azariah (2 Ch. 23 1, יֵרֵמֶהָל [BAL]).

JERUBBAAL (יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל), יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל [BAL]; but in Judg. 6 32 יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל [B], ΔΙΚΑΚΤΗΡΙΟΝ ΤΟΥ ΒΑΑΛ [A]; 7 1 יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל [B]; יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל [A]; 8 29 יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל [B]; 1 S. 12 11 יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל [B]; 2 S. 11 21, JERUBBESHETH, יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל [B], -אֵל [L]; cp JERUBOAM, a second name of Gideon, or perhaps the name of a second hero whose career has been fused by the narrator with that of Gideon (Judg. 6 32 7 1 etc.).

Explained in Judg. 6 32 as if 'Let Baal contend,' though the narrative itself rather implies 'He who fights against Baal.' Wellhausen (TBS, 31) suggests Jerubbaal=Jeruel=Jermejahu, —i.e., 'he whom God has founded' (founds). But JERUEL [g.v.] is very doubtful, and Jerubbaal may be=Urubaal, i.e., 'city of Baal,' or may come from Jerahmeel. Areli, or rather Uriel, was a Gadite; so perhaps was Jerubbaal. See ARELI, GIDEON, JERUBBESHETH. T. K. C.

JERUBBESHETH (יֵרֻבְבֶשֶׁת), for Ⓞ see JERUBBAAL), the form assumed by the name Jerubbaal in MT of 2 S. 11 21. Besheth is usually supposed to be=bosheth, 'shame'; Jerubbesheth, for Jerubbaal, would thus be || to Ishbosheth for Ishbaal. For Jastrow's divergent view (Bešeth = Baš, a Babylonian deity) see ISH-BOSHETH.

JERUEL (יֵרֻעַל), יֵרֻעַל [BAL], JERUEL [Vg.], Pesh. reads differently). The wilderness of Jeruel was the place where Jehoshaphat was directed by JAHAZIEL to look for the invading army. The enemy had mounted the ascent of Hazziz (see ZIZ), and reached a wady (וַדִּי), the upper part of which was 'before' this wilderness (2 Ch. 20 16).

'Jeruel' may in all probability be emended to יֵרֻעַל—i.e., 'Jezreel' in Judah—the situation of which (near Cain, Carmel, and Maon) suits the description in 2 Ch. 20. No doubt the 'watch-tower in the wilderness' (v. 24) was a well-known landmark. See JEZREEL, 2. T. K. C.

The English spelling of the name 'Jerusalem'—which is common to many modern languages—was derived by

1. The name. the AV of יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, through the Vulgate, from the Ⓞ יְרוּסָאליμ, and approximates to what was probably the earlier pronunciation in Hebrew, Yērūshālēm. Yet notice, below, the persistence with which, through Assyrian, Syriac, and Arabic, the initial syllable is given as Ur-.

The pronunciation Yērūshālāim (יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, in pause יְרוּשָׁלַיִם) was adopted by the Massoretes in conformity with the fuller spelling Yērūshālāyim (יְרוּשָׁלַיִם) which appears in five passages of the OT (or, according to Baer, in three, Jer. 26 18 Esth. 26 2 Ch. 32 9; in the other two, 1 Ch. 3 5 and 2 Ch. 25 1, Baer reads יְרוּשָׁלַיִם) as well as upon some Jewish coins, which belong either to the reign of Simon the Maccabee, 142-135 B.C., or to the revolution against Rome, 66-70 A.D. (Eckhel, Doctr. Nummorum, 3466 ff., Madden, Coins of the Jews, 66-71; cp Schür. Hist. 2 370 ff.). The termination יְרוּשָׁלַיִם has been variously explained as a dual indicative of the double city,² or as a local termination (Barth, NB § 194 c. n. 1). This fuller spelling, however, occurs only in later passages and inscriptions, and is probably due to the same attempt as was made to convert other geographical terms into a Hebrew form (cp Del. Par. 182). The earlier spelling of the consonants, the Greek transliteration, Ἱερουσαλήμ, the Aramaic Yerushlem (יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, Ezra 5 14 6 9; יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, Ezra 4 20 24 51; cp 4 12 5 2 Dan. 5 2 f.) and the Hebrew contraction יְרוּשָׁלַיִם (Ps. 78 3 Ⓞ in eiphoth),² prove that the earlier Hebrew pronunciation was Yerushalem. Cp SALEM.

In the Tell el-Amarna letters, circa 1400 B.C., the name appears as U-ru (or Uru)-sa-lim (Berlin collection, Nos. 103, 106, 109; Winckler, Thontafeln von Tell el-Am., 306, 312, 314; Sayce, RP⁽²⁾, 560 ff. 72 f.).

Compare the Syriac Urishlem, ܐܘܪܝܫܠܝܡ. On the Assyrian monuments the transliteration is Ur-sa-li-imu (Del. Par. 288, Schr. COT 2 214). [See further Haupt, Isaiah, SBOT (Heb.), appendix to note on אִירָא, Is. 29 1.]

Various etymologies have been suggested both for the Hebrew and for the cuneiform forms of the name; but the original meaning still remains uncertain.

On the supposition that the name was originally Hebrew, several derivations (besides the Rabbinic fancies, 'sight' or 'fear of peace') have been proposed: e.g., יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, 'possession of

2 Whether the narrator of Gen. 14 18 means Jerusalem by Salem, the city of Melchizedek, is still disputed, and the decision of the question is embarrassed by the uncertainty attaching to the date of his narrative. If the chapter is early, Salem can hardly mean Jerusalem; but many critics now assign to it a very late date (WRS). [Cp MELCHIZEDEK.]

peace' (Rel. and others), and ירושלים (from ירה) 'foundation of peace' or of Shalem' (Ges. Theo. s.v.; Buhl, *Lex.*¹², s.v. ירה; Grill, ZATW. 4134 ff. [84]). Sayce interprets the cuneiform U-ru-sa-lim as 'city of (the god) Salim' (*RP*² 561, Crit. Mon. 176); but his reading of a line of the letter (Berlin Coll. 106) in which he says this 'fact is plainly stated' is not confirmed by other scholars, and Zimmern (ZA. '91, p. 263) opposes his interpretation.

Later forms of the name are due to the fashion which prevailed in the Greek period for Hellenising Hebrew proper names.

This is responsible for the initial aspirate in the ἱερουσαλήμ, and for such forms as ἱεροσόλυμα 'the sacred Solyma,' Σολυμα (probably from Sbailem) having been, according to Josephus (B. vi. 101), the original name of the city.¹ Pbilos calls it ἱεροσόλις. The NT has both ἱεροουσαλήμ and ἱεροσόλυμα, the Vg. in different codd. Hierusalem and Hierosolyima, and Ierusalem and Ierrosolyima. The Greek and the Latin classical writers use ἱεροσόλυμα (e.g. Polyb. 163a), Hierosolyima (e.g. Pliny, NH 514).

When Hadrian rebuilt the city after destroying it in 135-136 A.D., he named it Ælia Capitolina (see ISRAEL, § 115).

Hence Ptolemy's Καπιτωλιας. Ælia was for long the official name (so also with Euseb. Ἀλια, and Jer. Ælia in the OS) and even passed over into Arabic as Iliya (Yāḳūt 4592). One of the Arabic forms of the

2. Name of Hadrian's city. Hebrew name preserves the first vowel of the cuneiform transliteration, Aurishalamu (Yāḳūt 386); other forms are Shalamu, Shallamu (Le Strange, Pal. under Moslems, 83). The Arabs, however, commonly designate Jerusalem by epithets expressive of its sanctity, Beit el-Makdis, el-Mukaddas, el-Mukaddis (Yāḳūt 4590; Tāj el-Arūs 4214), or in the modern vernacular, el-Kuds esh-Sherif, or more briefly el-Kuds, 'the sanctuary.' Compare the full designation on the Jewish coins cited above, ירושלים קדש, and the NT designation ἡ ἁγία πόλις, Mt. 45 2753. Modern Jews, Levantines, and native Christians use the Arabic form Yerusalem.² G. A. S.

I. SITE AND EXCAVATIONS

The history of Jerusalem exploration dates from the year 1833, when Bonomi, Catherwood, and Arundale succeeded in obtaining admission into

3. Excavations. the Haram enclosure and made the first survey of its buildings. In 1838 and 1852 the city was visited by the famous American traveller Robinson, and his bold impeachment of the traditional topography, whilst raising a storm of controversy, laid the foundation of a truer understanding of the antiquities of Jerusalem.

In 1849 Jerusalem was surveyed by Lieutenants Aldrich and Symonds of the Royal Engineers, and maps by Vandevelde, Thrupp, Barclay, and others were subsequently published. In 1860-63 De Vogüé explored the site of the temple.

All these earlier attempts were, however, superseded in 1866 by the ordnance survey executed by Captain (now Lieut.-General Sir Charles) Wilson, R.E., whose plans of the city and its environs, and of the Haram enclosure and other public buildings are the standard authorities on which all subsequent work has been based. During the years 1867-70 excavations of a most adventurous description were carried on by Captain (now Lieut.-General Sir Charles) Warren, R.E. The results, especially in the vicinity of the Haram, were of primary importance, and many stoutly contested theories have now succumbed to the testimony of the spade.

During 1872-75 some further explorations were carried on by Lieutenant (now Lieut.-Colonel) Conder, R.E. [In 1874 Mr. Henry Maudslay examined the rock cuttings and scarps W. of the Cenaculum above W. er-Rababi. Later Herr Guthe made some excavations, discovering the continuation of the wall partly laid bare by Warren to the S. of the temple Area j8 while for many years a most valuable series of observations of the levels of the rock beneath the rubbish on which the modern city stands was carried out by Herr C. inscription' was accidentally discovered near the mouth of the tunnel leading from the 'Virgin's Spring' (see CONDUIITS, § 4.). The erection of many modern buildings has led to the discovery from year to year both of original levels and of ancient structures reared upon them. Finally, from 1864 to 1867 the Palestine Exploration Fund conducted a series of underground explorations to the S. of the present city. Starting from the end of Maudslay's excavations at the Protestant Cemetery to the S. of the Cenaculum, Mr. F. J. Bliss, assisted by Mr. A. C. Dickie, laid bare a line of walls (of various dates) round the S. end of the W. hill, across the mouth of the Tyropœon and thence N. along Ophel above the Kidron valley. Their work included also excavations and the discovery of levels within this area: the recovery of a fifth-century chapel at Siloam, of the wall of Eudocia (about 450 A.D.) enclosing the Siloam pool; and of the Crusader's wall on the SW. hill, dating 1243 A.D., which enclosed the Church of the Apostles. Stairs also were found leading up the Tyropœon valley from Siloam (see Neb. 3 15); but the recovery of any very ancient walls is doubtful.]¹

The present account of the city is based on the results which have thus been obtained by actual exploration; but, although so much has been done during the last thirty years to clear up disputed questions, much still remains to be accomplished.

The geographical situation of Jerusalem (the dome of the Holy Sepulchre church) has now been determined

4. Site. by trigonometry to be 31° 46' 45" N. lat. and 35° 13' 25" long. E. of Greenwich.

i. Situation.—The city stands at the southern extremity of a plateau which shelves down SE. from the watershed ridge of Judæa (here somewhat contorted), between the ridge and the chain of Olivet.

About a mile N. of the town the ridge coming from the N. is deflected towards the W. at an elevation averaging 2600 feet above the Mediterranean, and thus passes clear of the city on its W. side. From this ridge at the point of deflexion an important spur with steep and rugged eastern slopes runs out SE. for a mile and a half, and thence southwards for a mile and a quarter more. The spur culminates in two principal summits, the most northerly 2725 feet above the sea, the second (now crowned with a village and a minaret) 2650 feet above the same level (there is a third summit or knoll on the S. terminating the spur and rising to an elevation of 2410 feet). To this chain (more especially to the central summit with the minaret on it, now called Jebel et-Tor) applies the name Olivet.

The plateau N. of Jerusalem between the Olivet chain and the main watershed ridge is drained by two flat open valley heads which form a junction about half a mile N. of the NE. angle of the modern city.

i. Boundaries of Site.—(a) The valley thus formed becomes a deep ravine, with sides steep and in places precipitous, running immediately beneath and W. of Olivet for a distance of a mile and a half from the junction mentioned above (i.) to a well called Bir Eyyüb, where the bed is 1979 feet above the Mediterranean and 430 feet below the termination of the Olivet chain. It is this valley, the 'brook' (náhal; see BROOK) Kidron, that bounds the site of Jerusalem on the E. (b) The western boundary is a second waterless valley (W. er-Rabābi) which has its head in a shallow depression NW. of the city close to the watershed. Running first S. for about half a mile, and then—rapidly deepening and flanked by low precipices—trending E. for another half mile, it joins the Kidron in an open plot close to the Bir Eyyüb mentioned above (a). The second valley thus flanking Jerusalem on the W. and S. encloses an area half a mile wide and rudely quadrangular,—the seat of the city itself whether ancient or modern. The Bir Eyyüb is probably ancient. It was rediscovered and opened by the Franks in 1184 A. D.

The site thus generally described, standing on spurs of hill surrounded on three sides by valleys 300 to 400 feet deep, is a natural fortress. Its weakness is its imperfect supply of water.

5. Geology. There is only one spring anywhere near the city, namely that in the Kidron valley, about seven hundred yards above the junction with the western ravine, now called the 'spring with steps' ('Ain Umm ed-Derej), or the 'Virgin's spring' (cp § 12, end). The scarcity of springs (see below, § 11) is explained by the geological conformation.

The vicinity of Jerusalem consists of strata of the Eocene and Chalk formations, having a general dip down from the watershed of about 10° ESE.

The action of denudation has left patches of the various strata; but generally speaking the oldest are on the W. The upper part of the Olivet chain consists of a soft white limestone, known locally as Kahābi, with fossils and flint-bands belonging to the Upper Chalk; beneath this are—first, a hard silicious chalk, Masakh, with flint bands; secondly, a soft white limestone, Melaki, much used in the ancient buildings of the city; thirdly, a hard dolomitic limestone, often pink and white, and then known as St. Croce marble. (These beds account for the natural drainage of the city, the water sinking through the porous Melaki, and issuing in a spring only where the dolomitic limestone comes towards the surface in the Kidron valley.) The underlying beds, belonging to the period of the Greensand, are not visible, the lowest strata in the Kidron precipices belonging to the Lower Chalk epoch.

The actual position of the city at various times has differed but little in comparison with other capitals.

6. Ancient levels. The outline of the small spurs concerning which so many famous controversies have arisen is now much obscured by the accumulation of rubbish, which has been increasing ever since the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 44[10]). There is an average depth of from 30 to 40 feet of this debris throughout the town, and the foundations of the modern houses often stand upon it. In the valleys there is a depth of 70 feet, and E. of the temple in one place shafts were sunk 120 feet before the rock was reached. The natural features of the ground, although unaltered and traceable to a practised eye, are thus less sharply accentuated than in the ancient period of the city's history. As, however, we have now several hundred actual observations of the rock levels in an area of 210 acres, there is no difficulty in recovering the general features of the ancient natural site of the town.

The quadrangle included between the two outer valleys described above (§ 4 ii.) is split up by a valley,

7. Heights and valleys. the Tyropœon of Josephus, into two main spurs,—that on the E. being the temple hill, that on the W. (divided in its turn into two summits) the seat of the upper city.

The Tyropœon is both shallower and broader than the boundary ravines noticed already (§ 4 ii.), its depth averaging only from 100 to 150 feet below the crests of the ridges. Its real head is immediately outside the present Damascus gate and the N. wall of the modern city, whence it runs with a curved course southwards to join the Kidron just above the junction with the western boundary valley (W. er-Rabābi), a distance of about 1600 yards. There is, however, a second affluent or head of the central Tyropœon valley on the W. side of its main course—a kind of dell or theatre-shaped depression extending westwards for more than 300 yards, and measuring not quite 200 yards N. and S.

Thus while the eastern Jerusalem ridge is unbroken, the western is divided into two summits, joined by a narrow saddle which separates the secondary head of the Tyropœon valley just described from the upper part of the western boundary valley (the W. er-Rabābi; § 4 ii.).

Of the two western hill tops, that towards the S. is the larger and more lofty.

It has a trapezoid shape, and terminates on all sides in steep slopes, sometimes precipitous, and its only connection with the watershed is by the saddle mentioned above, which is scarcely 50 yards in width. This high southern hill measures 2000 feet N. and S. by about 1300 feet E. and W. The highest part is towards the W., where the level of the flat broad summit is about 2500 feet above the Mediterranean. The smaller northern knoll or hill top, bounded on the E. by the great central (Tyropœon) valley of Jerusalem, on the S. by the theatre-shaped (branch) valley which separates it from the high southern hill, and on the W. by a small subsidiary depression running N. rises to a summit not more than 2400 feet in elevation, or 30 feet below the flat top of the larger southern hill.

The eastern ridge, on which the temple stood, has a height towards the N. of about 2500 feet; it then becomes narrower, and is artificially divided by a deep rock-cut trench running E. and W.

Its original form within the temple enclosure was that of a rounded top with a steep western slope and a more gentle gradient on the E., the level of the ridge falling from 2460 to 2300 feet in a length of about 500 yards. The S. end of this ridge is formed by a tongue of ground between the Kidron and the shallow central (Tyropœon) valley, falling rapidly southwards in 400 yards to a level only 50 feet above the valley beds.

The identity of the present Haram (or sanctuary) with the ancient temple enclosure is undisputed, the

8. The Haram. only question which has arisen being whether the present boundary walls coincide with the outer ramparts of Herod's temple enclosure. The Haram is a quadrangle containing 35 acres, the interior surface roughly levelled, partly by filling up with earth the portions where the rock is lowest, partly by means of vaulted substructures of various ages.

The most important results of Sir Charles Warren's excavations were those connected with the exploration of the rampart walls, which measure 1601 ft. on the W., 922 on the S., 1530 on the E., and 1042 ft. on the N., the SW. angle being 90° and the SE. 92° 30'. The height of the wall varies from 30 to 170 ft. On the W., on the S., and on the E. for probably 1090 ft. from the SE. corner, the masonry is all of one style, the stones being of great size with a marginal draft,—the imperfect finish of the faces in some of the lower courses apparently showing that the foundation-stones were never visible above the surface. The N. part of the E. wall consists, however, of masonry differing somewhat from the rest, the finish being rougher and the stone of inferior quality. It was found that this wall is continued for some distance beyond the NE. corner of the present area. The present N. wall is of masonry of quite a different kind, and appears to be much more recent, the substructures immediately inside being only as old as the twelfth Christian century. The NW. angle is formed by a projecting scarped block of rock measuring 350 ft. E. and W. and 50 ft. N. and S., the height above the interior court being about 30 ft. On this scarp stand the modern barracks, and a fosse 60 ft. deep and 165 ft. wide is still traceable outside the rock on the N. A valley bed 100 ft. below the level of the Haram court ran across the NE. portion of the area into the Kidron; and S. of this the remains of a scarp running E. and W. have been discovered, but are not as yet completely explored. The prolongation of this scarp eastwards cuts the E. wall of the Haram at the point, 1090 ft. from the S. angle, at which the change in the character of the masonry described above probably occurs.

The evidence thus obtained seems to indicate that an area of about seven acres and a half has been added to the ancient enclosure on the NE. to give it the present quadrangular form, and the rougher masonry on the E. appears to have belonged to the city wall constructed by Agrippa, not to the older wall of Herod's temple.

At the SW. angle of the Haram enclosure are the remains of an ancient arch (Robinson's arch), 42 feet span, belonging to a bridge across the Tyropœon, the W. pier of which Sir Charles Warren discovered, as well as the fallen voussoirs, lying on a pavement 40 ft. beneath the surface, whilst under the pavement 20 ft. lower was found the voussoir of a former bridge on the same site (cp Jos. B/i. 7.2).

At the SE. angle of the enclosure Sir Charles Warren found beneath the surface remains of an ancient wall of finely drafted masonry abutting on the E. rampart of the Haram, and here some unexplained marks in red paint and a few well-defined letters of a Semitic alphabet were discovered on the lower stones. The buried wall runs southward for 250 yards at a height of 70 ft., and is held to be part of the wall of Ophel (§ 3). The base of a great projecting tower also was laid bare, and identified by the discoverer with the tower of Neh. 3.25. Another noticeable discovery was the fact that an ancient aqueduct is intersected by the W. Haram wall, which must consequently be more recent than the rock tunnel thus destroyed.

The facts thus ascertained allow of the identification of the great walls still standing with those that supported the outer cloisters of the temple enclosure when the edifice was reconstructed by Herod, who doubled the area of the temple enclosure of Solomon (B/i. 21:).

Herod took away the ancient foundations and made a quadrangle extending from the fortress of Antonia (§ 28) to the royal cloister, to which a great bridge led from the upper city (B/vi. 6.2), whilst the eastern limit was formed by the Kidron ravine, the Ophel wall joining the plateau of the temple at the SE. angle (Ant. xv. 11.5; B/v. 4.2).

The scarp rock at the NW. angle of the Haram, with its outer fosse dividing the temple hill from Bezetha (§ 30), answers exactly to Josephus's description of the tower of Antonia (B/v. 5.8) and thus serves to identify the NW. angle of the ancient enclosure with the corresponding angle of the modern Haram. The correspondence of the SW. angles of the two areas is established by the discovery of the great bridge (above, § 8), and that of the SE. angles of the same by the exploration of the Ophel wall. The northern boundary of Herod's temple probably coincided with the scarp already described (§ 8), 1090 ft. N. of the SE. angle.

The area of the temple enclosure was thus, roughly, a quadrangle of 1000 feet side, from which the citadel of Antonia, as described by Josephus, projected on the NW. (cp B/vi. 5.4).

Outside the temple area the lines, natural and artificial, of the various city walls can now be traced with some certainty.

10. City walls. i. Upon the N. this task is rendered difficult, partly by the facts that the distinctive natural features are few, and that the ground is largely covered by buildings.

(a) The first of the three walls described by Josephus (see below), followed in its northern portion a line W. from the Temple enclosure to the N. of the western hill now called Zion. Excavations for the foundations of houses have revealed here more cliffs and steep slopes. Its NW. angle was at the present citadel, where there is a large scarp; thence it ran S. along W. er-Rabābi.

(b) Of the second wall nothing has been discovered—unless the masonry laid bare in 1883 on the rising ground to the W. of the Patriarch's Pool belonged to it [see, however, § 32].

(c) The line of the third wall coincided with certain scarps and rocks to the E. of the present Damascus gate. Robinson observed remains of it which have disappeared.

[ii. We turn now to the walls recently discovered on the S. of the city.

(a) From the fosse by the tower base found just outside the English cemetery above W. er-Rabābi, Bliss traced a line of wall SE. for 150 ft. to a corner tower and thence E. to the Jewish cemetery (see Plan). This line consists of a lower and an upper wall of two distinct periods (§§ 30, 33). The lower wall was recovered emerging from the E. side of the Jewish cemetery, and followed to a point S. of the Pool of Siloam where it forms an angle with a tower. Near this angle are the remains of a gateway, displaying proofs of three periods, with a drain that was subsequently traced below a paved street N. up the Tyropæon Valley. From the towered angle the wall—displaying like the gateway signs of three periods—was followed N. across the mouth of the Tyropæon, enclosing both the Old Pool and the Pool of Siloam, and up the ascent of Ophel; whence it seems to have been carried by Guthe's scarp to the wall traced by Warren from the SE. corner of the Temple area.

(b) SW. of the Old Pool another line of wall was observed branching NW. to the inside of the Old Pool and the Pool of Siloam.

(c) A third line of wall making use probably of Maudslay's scarp and running thence NE. was found, enclosing the top of the western hill. For other discoveries made, see above, § 3.

Bliss dates from Solomon's time Maudslay's scarp, and the earliest wall on the line round the top of the western hill. The lower wall on the long outer line from Maudslay's scarp to the angle at Siloam and thence to the SW. angle of the temple area he assigns to the later Jewish kingdom. In Herodian times he thinks this wall curved inside the Old Pool and the Pool of Siloam. At all later periods the S. wall of the city followed the line from Maudslay's scarp along the western hill—except in the time of Eudocia, who, he thinks, built the more recent wall on the longer line round by Siloam and up Ophel to the SW. corner of the Temple area (Bliss and Dickie, Excavations at Jerusalem, 1894-97, Pal. Expl. Fund, London, 1898).¹

The natural water-supply of Jerusalem is from the Virgin's Spring mentioned above (§§ 3, end; 5), which comes out from beneath the Ophel ridge in

11. Water supply. a rocky cave (12 feet deep in the eastern face of the hill) reached by flights of twenty-eight steps. The water flows intermittently, rising from beneath the lowest steps, at intervals varying, according to the season and the rainfall, from a few hours to a day or even two days. This is due to a natural syphon which connects the spring with an underground basin.

From the Virgin's Spring an aqueduct² runs south in a rock-cut tunnel 1708 feet in length, through the Ophel ridge to the Pool of Siloam³ (now Birket Silwān). The Pool of Siloam is a rock-cut reservoir with masonry retaining-walls measuring 52 feet by 18 feet (see below), having a rock-cut channel leading from it southeastwards to a larger pool (the 'Old Pool') formed by damming up the flat valley-bed with a thick wall of masonry close to the junction of the Kidron and the Tyropæon. A rock-cut passage leads from the Virgin's Spring westwards to the foot of a shaft which reaches the surface of the ground 120 feet above and 180 feet west of the spring. The rock tunnel to Siloam mentioned before was known in the seventeenth century; but the shaft (which formed a secret entrance to the one spring of Jerusalem), was discovered by Sir Charles Warren (§ 19, last note). The water of Siloam was originally sweet; but it has been fouled and made bitter since the twelfth century. From the reservoir it runs southeastwards some 450 yards to the *Bir Eyyūb*⁴ referred to already (§ 4, ii.), a well 125 feet deep. The original Pool of Siloam is now known to have been 52 feet square, and a channel led from it some 150 yards to Roman baths on the S. W. of the temple hill is an underground cave-well now called Ḥammām esh-Shefā, under the west Haram wall.

The remaining reservoirs of Jerusalem are fed by aqueducts and by the rains.

West of the city, at the head of W. er-Rabābi, is the rock-cut Māmilla Pool. Lower down Hinnom, opposite the SW. corner of the present walls, is Birket es-Sultān, constructed in the twelfth century. Since the fourteenth century these two tanks have been erroneously named the Upper and Lower Pools of Gihon; with more probability some have identified the Māmilla with the Serpent Pool of Josephus (B/v. 3.2). Inside the city, near the west, is the Patriarch's Pool (the ancient Amygdalon or 'Tower Pool' B/v. 11.4).⁵ Immediately N. of the Haram are the Twin Pools made by roofing in part of the ancient fosse, and the Birket 'Isrā'īn, measuring 360 by 130 ft., and apparently constructed after the great destruction of 70 A.D.

The Twin Pools just mentioned were identified in the fourth century with Bethesda; but since the twelfth that name has been given to the Birket 'Isrā'īn. The site of Bethesda (sometimes even supposed to be Gihon) is still doubtful.

¹ Conder is of opinion that the remains of a wall discovered by Guthe on this line on the E. of Ophel are from Byzantine and crusading periods.

² In PEFO St., '86, p. 197; '89, pp. 35 ff.; '90, p. 257, a second aqueduct is described. It is above ground, a channel cut in the rock of Ophel outside the eastern line of the ancient walls. But there is still doubt as to whether it was connected with the Virgin's Spring. Conder regards it as modern.

³ For a translation of the inscription found here in June 1880, see CONDUITS, § 5.

⁴ 'Job's' (but perhaps meant for Job's) Well, or EN-ROGEL.

⁵ בֵּרְכַת מְנוּלִיָּן Hellenised by Josephus to Ἀμυγδαλον. The modern name is Birket Ḥammām el-Batrak; a tradition without any grounds ascribes it to Hezekiah. 1

[A little to the NE., outside the city wall is the Birket Ham-mām Sitti Mariam, probably of mediæval construction.] Another fine reservoir has been found N. of Birket 'Isrā'in and W. of the Church of St. Anne. It was known in the twelfth century, when it was called the 'Inner Pool.'

There were three aqueducts to supply the many reservoirs.

One, constructed by Pilate (Ant. xviii. 82), led from the so-called pools of Solomon, 7 m. distant, to the temple, and still conveys water when in repair; its course appears on the map. The second, from the same locality, probably fed the Birket Māmīllā, but is now lost. The third, from the N., collected surface drainage and led underground to the temple enclosure (a distance of 2000 feet). The great reservoirs in this enclosure, about thirty in number, were capable of holding a total supply of ten million gallons of water. C. R. C.

II. ANCIENT JERUSALEM

[The earliest historical notice of Jerusalem appears in the Amarna Letters, circa 1400 B.C. (ISRAEL, § 6).

12. Earliest times. Seven of these (Berlin Coll. 102-106, 174, 199; Wi. Thontafeln von Tell el-Am. 179-185) are from a certain Abd-ḥiba (so Winckler; -ḥēba, Zimmern and W. Max Müller; taba or ṭob, Sayce and others), the ruler of Jerusalem and vassal of the king of Egypt. The decipherments by various Assyriologists differ in details; but with Winckler we may take the following to be the substance of what the letters say regarding Jerusalem. Abd-ḥiba speaks of the 'land of Jerusalem,' which appears to have stretched S. and SW. through part of what was afterwards Judah.

Abd-ḥiba describes himself as owing his position 'to neither father nor mother'; and the phrase has been interpreted as analogous to 'Melchizedek, King of Salem,' in Gen. 14.18. But as Abd-ḥiba also calls the territory of Jerusalem his paternal territory (Berl. Coll. 102, l. 13, according to Winckler's translation), his reiterated claim that not father or mother, but the strong arm of the king of Egypt¹ gave it to him is merely the protestation of his subjection to the latter and abjuring of all thoughts of independence.

Like other Syrian vassals of Egypt Abd-ḥiba had been slandered as disloyal. He protests that all he had said was that the king's power was certain to be overthrown, unless the king sent help to his vassals. Abd-ḥiba himself has sent tribute and begs for troops to withstand the Ḥabiri. He was unable to assist the king's caravans that had been robbed in Ajalon and is innocent in the case of certain Kašī or negro-troops of the king who have suffered. All this proves that by 1400 B.C. Jerusalem had already been for some time the fortified capital of a small territory under hereditary princes: it was possible by garrisoning it to hold that territory against invaders. It is to be noted that the garrison deemed necessary appears to be described as very small (Berl. Coll. 103, l. 4; cp WMM As. u. Eur. 276).

There are no grounds for supposing that at this time Jerusalem was famous for a shrine or oracle (see § 1; also below, footnote); it is not advantageously situated for trade, nor is the immediate neighbourhood at all fertile. In all these respects it must have been less important than its neighbours on either side,—Bethel and Bethlehem. Probably it was no more than a small mountain-fortress surrounded by a small village. These would naturally be on the E. hill, at the foot of which (see above, § 5) is found the only spring.

In the next 400 years, between Abd-ḥiba and the time of David, we have at the most one or two references to Jerusalem, and these are of

13. Next doubtful historical value. The Yahwistic narrative, in Judg. 17, relates that after his defeat and wounding by Israel (on their invasion of Western Palestine), a chief Adoni-bezek or (Josh. 10:1 E) ADONI-ZEDEK (q.v.) was brought to Jerusalem—presumably by his own people, for v. 21 (from the same source) adds that Jerusalem was not taken by Israel.¹ One of the older sections of the Elohist narrative,² Judg. 19:10f, describes the city as at that time in the hands of the Jebusites and called JEBUS [q.v.].

The Yahwist (Josh. 15:63) describes the Judahites as unable to 'dispossess the Jebusites who inhabited Jerusalem; the Jebusites live with the Judahites in Jerusalem to this day.' In drawing the boundary between Judah and Benjamin the priestly writers style either the W. or the E. hill (according as we take the valley of Hinnom to have been the W. er-Rabābi or the Tyropœon (see below, § 24) as 'the shoulder' or ridge of the Jebusite (Josh. 15:8 16), but assign Jerusalem to Benjamin, in conformity with which an editor of Judg. 1:21 has substituted 'Benjamites' for 'Judahites' in the parallel Josh. 15:63; see BENJAMIN, § 8a. The Jebusites are likewise represented in the story of David (2 S. 5:6, cp v. 8 and 24 16 18: 'Araunah the Jebusite' as in possession of Jerusalem and some territory round about—'inhabitants of the land'—till David's capture of the city.³ When the Jebusites came into possession of Jerusalem we have no means of knowing. In all probability they were one of the Canaanite and therefore Semitic tribes of Palestine. They appear in line with the others in the list of Canaanite tribes (see CANAAN, and Dr. on Dt. 7:1); JE, Gen. 10:16 15:20, Ex. 38:17 (perhaps Deuteronomist); 38:2 (?), 34:11, Nu. 13:29 (where they are assigned with Hittites and Amorites to 'the mountain,' the Canaanites dwelling by the sea and along Jordan); D, Ex. 13:5 23:23, Dt. 7:1 20:17, Josh. 3:10 9:1 11:3 12:8 24:11b, Judg. 3:5, 1 K. 9:20 (=2 Ch. 8:7); and also in Ezra 9:1, Neh. 9:8, and the Apocrypha. This constant association with other Semitic tribes (especially in JE, the writers of which lived when Jebusites were still found in Jerusalem, Josh. 15:63), and the geographical position of the tribe justify us in assuming its Semitic character. The name Adoni-zedek is also Semitic; and so too is Abd-ḥiba (see also ARAUNAH). But while the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Jerusalem were thus certainly called Jebusites, the testimony that the city itself was called Jebus is doubtful. The name is found only in Judg. 19:10f. and in 1 Ch. 11:4f. In the latter passage it has evidently been intruded. With regard to the former, we have seen that the city was called Jerusalem at least from 1400 B.C. onwards (cp Josh. 15:63=Judg. 17:21 and 2 S. 5:6); it may have had two names; and Jebus can hardly be reckoned a later insertion in Judg. 19:10f. Yet Jebus may have been a geographical designation—i.e. for the tribal territory—from which the writer wrongly transferred it to the city, or possibly it was artificially formed from Jebusite at a time when the ancient existence of the name Jerusalem was forgotten in Israel.

The exact condition of the Canaanite enclaves in the earliest centuries of Israel's occupation of the land is unknown; but probably the inhabitants lived in peaceful intercourse with their Hebrew neighbours. In any case the silence of history proves that Jerusalem remained small and unimportant.

Jerusalem lay on the highway which runs N. and S. along the backbone of the central range, but at some 14. Strategic value. distance from any of the roads crossing the range, in a comparatively unfertile and badly-watered district, and without an important shrine. These reasons as we have seen (§ 12) account for its historical insignificance at a time when its neighbours Hebron, Bethlehem, Gibeah, Bethel, and Jericho, each of which possessed one or other of the advantages it lacked, already played considerable parts in the history of the land. Probably also its insignificance was the reason of the willingness of the Israelites to leave it alone.

The one feature of political importance possessed by Jerusalem—besides its military strength—was that it lay a neutral spot on the border of two Hebrew tribes, Judah and Benjamin, destined shortly to be rivals. The keen eye of David caught this feature, and to his choice of a position so indispensable to him in the political exigencies which ensued upon his call to the kingdom of all Israel (2 S. 5:3) (and not to those fictitious virtues of position with which some scholars have invested the site), Jerusalem owes that sovereign rôle which it has played in the history of Israel and Christendom.

David's previous capital Hebron lay too far south to be a centre for all Israel. The choice of one of the historical sites in Benjamin or among the northern tribes

¹ Verse 8 which contradicts v. 21 (cp Josh. 15:63 J) is a post-cilic addition to the narrative.

² So Moore, SBOT 'Judges,' but it may be J. See, however, BENJAMIN, § 5.

³ [On the tribal character of the population of old Jerusalem cp note on text of 2 S. 5:68 in Crit. Bib.] would have aroused the jealousy of Judah. Jerusalem was neutral and without traditions. It commanded the main line of communication between N. and S., was favourably situated for the immediate military requirements of Israel against Philistia, and offered a fortress of considerable strength (cp DAVID, § 10, ISRAEL, § 17 ff.).

As history proved, Jerusalem's aloofness and dry surroundings were of advantage to the capital of a country so much in the way of foreign invasions whether of arms or of culture. The whole Judæan plateau is isolated and Jerusalem commands it; army after army of the great empires crossed the plains below and left this mountain town alone; the narrowness of the passes leading to the plateau and the scarcity of water on it held back some invaders¹ and probably repelled at least one other after he had reached the walls of Jerusalem.² 'It is very significant that neither of the two greatest invaders of Judæa, who feared a real defence of her central plateau, ventured upon this till he had mastered the rest of Palestine and occupied strongholds round the Judæan border.'³ Nor was the neighbourhood of the desert, the borders of which are hardly an hour from its gates, a disadvantage; a hand could be kept on the nomad tribes, or in case of an irresistible siege the desert would be, as it often proved, a refuge to which the garrison might cut their way. The whole land of Israel is small: Jerusalem is distant from the sea only 33 miles, from Jordan about 18, from Hebron 19, and from Samaria 34 or 35.

The Jebusite citadel was deemed impregnable, and the garrison at first laughed at their assailants (2 S. 56).

15. David. [Cp Wi. Gl 2197, and Crit. Bib.] Yet 'David took the stronghold' or 'hill-fort' (הַצִּבְרֹן) of Zion¹ and dwelt in the fort and called it 'the town' or 'burgh of David.' He carried the fortifications 'round about from the Millo inwards' (ib. 9); the description is obscure, but may refer to wider walls thrown round the town below the fort.

Within these walls David built a house for himself with the aid of Tyrian craftsmen and materials, and brought up the ark of Yahwè to a tent. Before his death, in order to build an altar to Yahwè, he purchased (2 S. 248 ff.) from a Jebusite (see ARAUNAH)—a profane Israelite and Jebusite continued to live peaceably together—a threshing floor, which became the site of the temple built by Solomon.

The site of the 'City of David' forms the fundamental question of the topography of Jerusalem.

This view, accepted by Reland and by Robinson (BR 1388 ff.), was up to the time of the latter unassailed (LBR, 206).⁵ Since the detailed English survey it has been defended chiefly by Colonel Conder (Tent Work, new. ed. 192; PEF Mem., 'Jerusalem' 95; Hastings' BD 2591),⁶ who places the fort which David took on the southern and higher end of the W. hill and even follows Josephus in identifying the Millo with the lower city on that hill to the N.

⁵ It was also accepted by Ritter, Williams, De Vogüé and Stanley.

⁶ Sir Charles Warren also placed Zion on the western hill but at the N. end (PEF Mem. 'Jerus.' 93), yet he appears now to have abandoned this view, for he says that 'it appears that to accept the Ophel spur as the city of David or Zion, and the high ground east of the Holy Sepulchre as the Millo or citadel of the ancient Jerusalem will satisfy the various data in the OT, the hooks of Maccabees and Josephus' (Hastings' BD 2387); of recent geographers Henderson (Palestine, 1884), Stewart (Land of Israel, 1899), and most maps place Zion on the W. hill.

In 1878 (PEFQ), however, Mr. W. F. Birch attacked the traditional view and reasoned for the

17. Birch's view. location of David's town on the south end of the eastern hill. In 1881 Stade¹ presented this view, and in the same year

Robertson Smith argued for it in detail and with great force. In 1883 Sayce supported Birch's opinion in two papers in the PEFQ and affirmed that 'no other is now possible.' Since then it has commanded the adherence of a majority of experts in the subject.

There can be little doubt that this view, which places the city of David on the southern part of the eastern (temple) hill, also called Ophel, is correct: for (a) it suits the natural conditions; (b) it does most justice to the language of the historical books of the OT, taken along with the archæological discoveries on Ophel; and (c) it is confirmed by the oldest post-biblical tradition.

(a) The new view suits the natural conditions. We have already seen (§ 12, end) that the early Canaanite

18. Suits natural conditions. hill-fort cannot have been raised on the W. hill, for that is far away from the only known spring of the district, the present

Virgin's Well (§ 5), anciently called Gihon, in the Kidron Valley. The fort probably rose somewhere above this spring on the E. hill. The hill has been very much altered in shape; but there appears to have risen to the S. of what afterwards became the temple plateau, an independent summit, separated from the temple site by a natural hollow in the rock. The existence of the hollow is not certain; but Guthe's excavations have rendered it probable.² The hollow seems to have run on to the Kidron Valley not far from the spring. In all probability the rock to the S. of the hollow was once higher than at present (see below, in § 27 iii., the probable occasion of its reduction); the hill sinks rapidly into the Tyropæon and almost precipitously into the Kidron valley; in front to the S. there is the long gradual slope to the Pool of Siloam.³ This height is by no means an unlikely position for a fort: the summit of the W. hill (which overtops the present summit of Ophel) is nearly 600 yards away; but above all Ophel commands the spring. The long slope, covering some 15 or 16 acres, may easily have held a large village, which could be extended into the surrounding valleys, and up their opposite slopes.

(b) This view also does most justice to the language of the historical books of the OT, taken along with the archæological discoveries on Ophel.] G. A. S.

19. Suits biblical and archæological evidence. It is necessary at the outset to clear away the popular idea that the capital of David was already a great town, occupying a site comparable in extent with that of the later city.

Certainly if all the Levites and sacred ministers mentioned in Chronicles were actually assembled at Zion in David's time, we might conclude that the town was already a capital on a grand scale. But the Chronicler constantly carries back later institutions into primitive times, and the early history, which alone can be viewed as a safe guide, gives quite another picture. Zion was merely one of the 'mountain fortresses' found all over Palestine as places of refuge in time of invasion, and was garrisoned by a handful of mercenaries (the Gibborim). The whole levy of Israel in David's time was but 30,000 men (2 S. 61; cp the 40,000 of Judg. 58), and before the development of trade among the Hebrews Jerusalem had not the natural conditions for the growth of a great city. In the first instance the town doubtless consisted mainly of the court and its dependants, with the Jebusite population, who must have been predominantly agricultural and limited in number by the limitation of their territory.

Now it is quite incredible that the temple hill was ever excluded from Zion.

Throughout the OT Zion appears as the holy mountain, the seat of the sanctuary. It is true, at the same time, that Zion and the site of Jerusalem are interchangeable ideas in Hebrew literature; but this only proves that the mountain of the sanctuary was essentially the mountain on which the city stood.¹

Further, it is clear, from 1 K. 8:1 f. 2 S. 24:18, that the temple stood above the city of David, as elsewhere in Hebrew holy places the sanctuary crowned the hill on whose slopes the town stood. Moreover, the graves of the kings, which were certainly in the city of David, encroached on the temple enclosure² (Ezek. 43:7 f.), which indeed at the time of the captivity was closely built up (ibid.), and stood in the middle of the city (Ezek. 11:23). Again, Mi. 4:8 identifies the ancient 'tower of the flock,' the original seat of the kingdom at Jerusalem, with 'Ophel of the daughter of Zion'; and Ophel is one of the few topographical names that can be traced down to the time of Josephus, whose description shows that it lay to the SE. of the temple.³ Still more precise is the determination given by references to the one fountain of Jerusalem, which, as we have seen (§ 5), springs out under the temple hill on the E. According to Neh. 3:15 12:37, the city of David was reached by a stair in the vicinity of the fountain gate and the pool of Shiloah.⁴ This ascent led up above David's palace to the water gate (see § 24), where in Nehemiah's time there was an open space in front of the temple (cp Neh. 8:16 with Ezra 10:9). Thus we see that David's palace lay between the temple and the pool of Shiloah or King's pool (Neh. 2:14).

These notices are the more important because the water system connected with the Virgin's spring forms one of the few certain parts of Jerusalem's topography. The spring itself is Gihon, which from its name must have been a true spring, whilst 2 Ch. 33:14 teaches us to look for it in the Kidron valley (גִּיחֹן). The subterranean conduit in which the famous inscription was found had for its object to conduct the water inside the city, and appears to be that constructed by Hezekiah (2 K. 20:20).⁵ In Is. 22:9 11 we read of a lower pool and an old pool (no doubt identical with the upper pool, Is. 7:3; 2 K. 18:17), whose waters were collected in the time of Hezekiah, under apprehension of siege, in a reservoir between the two walls. From this passage, compared with Neh. 3:15, we gather that Hezekiah's pool was protected by an outer line of fortification, and here lay the gate of the two walls (2 K. 25:4),⁶ with the royal

² This is not held by all who agree with Robertson Smith in placing the city of David on the eastern hill. Sayce supposes the tombs to have been hewn in the cliffs above the Pool of Siloam (PEFQ, '83, p. 219). Clermont Ganneau (Rev. Critique, '83, p. 329 ff., PEFQ, '98, p. 164 ff.) thinks that the southern curve of the Siloam tunnel was due to the necessity of avoiding the royal vaults, which ought to be found on the N. of the curve. Jewish traditions certainly placed these tombs near to the Kidron and connected them with it by a tunnel, affirming that their position was known up to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. See PEFQ '85, p. 192 f. Nehemiah (3:15 16) mentions the tombs in close connection with Siloam and apparently to the E. of it.

⁴ The fountain gate is the gate beside Shiloah, which is itself called the fountain (מִיָּחִי) by Josephus (BJ v. 4:1).

gardens beside them.¹ The supplementary notices of the conduit and the outer wall, given in Chronicles, have not the weight of contemporary history; but they show the writer to have still possessed the same tradition as to the place of the city of David, for he describes its outer wall as running along the Kidron valley W. of Gihon (i.e., so as to leave the fountain outside, 2 Ch. 33:14; cp 32:3 f.), and tells us that Hezekiah's conduit brought the water of Gihon in a westerly direction to the city of David (chap. 32:30).²

(c) Birch's view is also confirmed by the oldest post-biblical tradition. According to the First Book of

20. And early Maccabees, circa 100 B.C. (e.g., 4:37 post-biblical. 5:54 7:33), Zion was the temple hill. So also in 1 Esd. 8:81 (probably, too, Judith 9:13) and Ecclus. 24:10. It is true that Josephus, as we have seen (§ 16), identifies Zion with the Upper City of his time on the SW. hill; but his statements as to the topography of the city of David and Solomon are of no independent value; he possessed no sources except the OT (§ 27 i.). [Nor did the early Christian tradition altogether follow Josephus. Origen (ad Joan. 4:19 f.) makes Zion and the temple hill identical: and though Eusebius and Jerome in the OS place Zion on the W. hill, Jerome in his Comm. in Jes. 22:1 f., seems to take the other view. The rise of the prevalent Christian tradition would appear to have been assisted by the building of Constantine's Church of the Resurrection and Basilica on the NW. hill; just as, no doubt, the anticipation of the prevailing view by Josephus was due to the rise of Herod's palace with the great towers on the same ridge (cp Sir C. Wilson, Smith's *DB*², art. 'Jerusalem' p. 1651).]

According to the OT, then, the city of David lay on the southern part of the hill which his son crowned

21. Royal with the temple. The chief feature in the fortifications was a tower named 'the buildings. Millo' [(מִלּוֹ), probably meaning a solid, not a hollow, tower; cp ZPDV 1:226, but also MILLO]; its site is quite uncertain: modern scholars are divided between the E. and the W. hill. We have no means of determining whether David's city included more than the E. hill. If it was confined to this then the wall ran up the W. edge of Ophel above the Tyropæon valley. It is significant, however, that after careful examination, Bliss found no remains of a city wall, and such scarps as he uncovered appear to have been made only for dwellings or cisterns.³ The new wall assigned to David (1 Sam. 5:9) may have been built round an increase of his city in the Tyropæon and on the lower slopes of the W. hill;⁴ yet if the Tyropæon, as Robertson Smith argues (see § 24), was the gai of Hinnom in which the heathen sacrifices afterwards were offered and the Canaanite quarter lay, its inclusion in the city in David's time would not be possible.] The town had but little splendour. The king occupied a wooden palace, the work of foreign craftsmen; and the ark still dwelt in curtains. Under Solomon, who had the true Oriental passion for building and luxury, and squandered enormous sums on his court, great improvements were made, especially by the erection of the twin palaces 'the house of Yahwé and the house of the king,' constructed of stonework strengthened by string courses of wooden beams in the still familiar style of Arabian building. The palace, which took nearly twice as long to erect as the temple, by Bliss, who has, however, made clear the existence of a wall outside the two pools of Shiloah and probable the existence of another running inside them in agreement with the above explanation of Robertson Smith.]

² [Hezekiah's conduit is not the only rock-cut passage in Ophel in connection with the Virgin's Spring. Sir Charles Warren (see PEF Mem. 'Jerus.' 366 ff.) discovered at the end of the serpentine tunnel from which the conduit breaks off, a perpendicular shaft 44 ft. high, and above it a series of sloping passages issuing in a vault three-quarters of the way up the hill and due W. from the Virgin's Spring. consisted of a great complex of buildings and porticos, including the porch of judgment, an armoury, and the palace of the queen.

The site of the palace has been variously assigned by topographers. It lay above the old residence of David¹ (1 K. 9²⁴), and all the indications given in the OT lead us to place it quite close to the temple, with which its porticos seem to have been connected (2 K. 16:18 23:11). Wellhausen indeed, from an examination of 1 K. 6^{f.}, has made it probable that the royal buildings lay within the outer court of the temple (Wellh. CH⁽⁸⁾ 264). The clearest details are connected with a court of the palace called the prison court (Jer. 32:2), where there was a gate called the prison gate, and a great projecting tower (Neh. 3:25-27). This part of the building must have been close to the temple, for it was at the prison gate that the second choir in the procession of Neh. 12 halted and stood 'in the house of God,' meeting the other choir, which ascended from Shiloah by the stair above David's house and reached the temple at the water gate. It appears further from Neh. 3:27 that the fortifications of the prison were adjacent to Ophel, so that the palace seems to have stood about the SE. corner of the temple area.² [On the temple and the other buildings of Solomon see further Stade, GIJ 1311 ff., as well as Benzinger's HA, and Nowack's; and on the relevant text of Kings, Benzinger in the KHC, also Stade, ZATW 3:129-177 ('83).]

[The extent of Solomon's Jerusalem is quite uncertain. The rise of a considerable foreign trade, the rapid increase of wealth, the splendour of the court, the multiplication of officials, and the incursion of many foreigners must have greatly enlarged the city; but whether the new population was settled in suburbs, or the walls of the city were extended to receive them, we cannot determine. Many of those who hold that David's city was confined to the E. hill believe that Solomon threw walls (1 K. 3:1 9:15) round the W. hill (Sir C. Wilson, Smith's DB⁽²⁾, 'Jerus.' 1648; Buhl, Pal. 135). On this hill two divergent lines of fortification have been laid bare by Bliss, following the excavations of Maudslay and others. From the so-called Maudslay's scarp (see plan), which Bliss takes to be the (probable) SW. angle of Solomon's city, a line of scarp runs NE. across the brow of the SW. hill towards a rectangular line of wall on the slope of the hill above the Tyropæon. From this Bliss infers a continuation to the present S. wall of the city at Burj el-Kebrit, and so across the Tyropæon to the E. hill. If this was the line of Solomon's wall, Bliss takes the lowest strata on the other line laid bare by him SE. from Maudslay's scarp to Siloam round the S. end of the W. hill to be a farther extension of the walls made by kings after Solomon. All this is still very uncertain; and it is possible that the W. hill was not inclosed within walls before the exile (see below, § 28). G. A. S.]

by Shishak in the reign of Rehoboam, and lost the riches accumulated by Solomon. The great houses of Omri and Jehu quite overshadowed the kingdom of Judah, which forgot its weakness in the reign of Amaziah only to receive signal chastisement from Jehoash, who took Jerusalem, and partly levelled the walls (2 K. 14:8 ff.). The decline and fall of Samaria raised the relative importance of the southern capital; the writings of the prophets show that wealth had accumulated and luxury increased, and so we find King Jotham adding an upper gate in the northern or higher court of the temple (2 K. 15:35 Jer. 36:10 Ezek. 9:2), whilst Hezekiah, as we have already seen (§ 19), laboured for the improvement of the water supply, and so rendered the city more capable to resist siege. [Whatever additions had been made by this time on the W. hill, it is clear from Hezekiah's conduit in Ophel that on the latter lay still the citadel and chief part of the city.¹ The later history in Chronicles adds details of fortifications erected by Uziah and Manasseh, which probably express the oral tradition current in the author's day. In the later days of the monarchy Jerusalem had so far increased that we read of a second town or quarter (2 K. 22:14 Zeph. 1:10 Heb.; cp Neh. 3:9); see, however, HULDAH, HASENAAH, where the true title is represented to have been the 'old city.' There was also a trading quarter called the Maktêsh, inhabited by Canaanites or Tyrians (Zeph. 1:11), who still formed a large part of the mercantile population in post-exilic times (Neh. 13:16 Zech. 14:21). Maktêsh means mortar, whence we must suppose that the traders lived in a hollow valley, perhaps the upper part of the Tyropæon (but cp MAKTESH).² The main part of the town, however, was still grouped round the temple plateau, from which steep streets ran down the slope of the hill (Lam. 4:1), the houses rising tier above tier, so that the roof tops commanded a view of the environs (Is. 22:1). According to Eastern custom the handicrafts—e.g., the bakers, Jer. 37:21—had their own streets or bazaars.

[Down to the reign of Hezekiah Jerusalem had been simply one of many sanctuaries of Yahwê; although in the eyes of the Judæan prophets (Am. 1:2 Is. 6) Yahwê's dwelling-place was there, Jerusalem was ignored by the great prophets of North Israel and does not seem to have been a place of popular pilgrimage (in the pages of Amos, Bethel, Gilgal, and Beersheba are described as such, while Jerusalem is not). What hope, therefore, was there that it would survive the fate which had overtaken Samaria and all the other Syrian shrines? (cp Mic. 3:12). The extraordinary faith of Isaiah in the inviolableness of Yahwê's 'hearth,' and its wonderful rescue from the Assyrians, at the time when the rest of Judah with the local sanctuaries was overrun by them, effected a vindication of the city, and assisted a change in her religious position which was slowly becoming inevitable in the interests of the sole deity of Yahwê and of the purity of his worship (cp DEUTERONOMY, § 13). The other shrines of Israel, however consecrated by the national history, had all associations with the unpurified popular religion; and just as Jerusalem's freedom from political entanglements in the time of David had, as we have seen (§ 14), secured the choice of it as a capital for all Israel, so now its freedom from religious associations of an impure kind (Zion had never, as we have seen, been the shrine of any god before it was the resting-place of Yahwê's ark) secured the choice of it as Israel's one sanctuary: the only place where sacrifice was permitted, the shrine where Yahwê set his name and to which all Israel were commanded to make pilgrimage three times a year. That this change—rendered inevitable both by the political events and by the religious interests of the eighth and seventh centuries—was codified as law (in the Book of Deuteronomy) and carried into effect by the nation before the exilic period, was what prevented the destruction of the city and temple by Nebuchadrezzar in 586 B.C. from being regarded as final, inspired Jeremiah's prophecies of a return, and the hopes and programmes of reconstruction by Ezekiel and other priestly writers (see especially Ps. 51:18). fountain gate to the point where the temple and the palace joined one another. The western boundary of the city is particularly obscure, and its position must be determined mainly by reference to (1) the 'valley gate' (Neh. 2:13 3:13). The valley (gai) is used as a proper name, and is no doubt identical with the valley (gai) of the son of HINNON (q.v., § 4), the Kidron valley being always called nāhal (the Ital. fiumara). The common opinion makes this gai the valley to the W. of modern Jerusalem (Wādī er-Rabābi), in which case the valley gate must necessarily have occupied much the same position as the modern Jaffa (Yāfā) gate, and the whole of the later upper city on the SW. hill must already have been included within the walls. This view, however, is far from being indisputable.¹

A thousand cubits S. of the valley gate was (2) the dung gate,² the gate before which lay the rubbish heaps of the city [probably identical with the gate HARSITH].³ This, on the common theory, must have been about the SW. corner of the hill, near the present Protestant school.⁴ Between this point and (3) the *fountain gate*⁵ in the vicinity of the pool of Shiloah is nearly half-a-mile in a straight line, and the intervening wall must have been much longer if it followed the natural line of defence.⁶ Yet Nehemiah gives no account of this section of the ramparts (Neh. 3:14 f.). His record seems to imply that the fountain gate was near the dung gate; and similarly in chap. 12 the procession which went southward to the dung gate is immediately afterwards found at the fountain gate. It is hardly possible that so important a part of the circuit should be twice omitted, and in fact the vast lacuna disappears at once if we suppose that the gai is the Tyropœon, and that the upper city of Josephus on the SW. hill was not enclosed in the circuit of Nehemiah's walls.

If the gai is the Tyropœon the valley gate lay on the Tyropœon, somewhere near the SW. angle of the Haram area, and the wall ran southward along the E. side of the valley,⁷ till at the pool of Shiloah an outwork was thrown out to protect the water-supply.

⁷ [The identification of the Tyropœon with the valley of Hinnom is accepted by Prof. Sayce, PEFQ, 1884, p. 217, also by Birch, PEFQ, 1882, p. 55 ff., and Schwartz, Das Heil. Land, 190. Yet it is not altogether without objection or difficulty. In the first place, the border between Judah and BENJAMIN (§ 8) ran along Hinnom; yet the Tyropœon appears too insignificant a natural feature, in comparison with the valleys on either side of it, to form so important a boundary; especially when in the time of the Priestly Writer, who draws the boundary (Josh. 15:8 18:16), Jerusalem had perhaps grown out across it to the W. hill. Again, as we have seen (§ 21), no line of wall has ever been uncovered on the W. side of the Tyropœon or along the W. slope of Ophel (yet cp the wall described in § 10 ii. b). Moreover, it is difficult to conceive that after the reservoirs at Siloam (of which we have evidence in the time of Ahas) were finished, the W. hill could have remained unfortified. The possession of that by an enemy must have rendered the security of the reservoirs almost impossible. Besides, there is the difficulty of conceiving how the population, during the prosperous times of Solomon and Uzziab, can have been confined to the E. hill, unless, of course, we take for granted that there were large suburbs. Then there is the phrase the Second City (but cp above, § 23, first par.), which is suitable to a large extension on the W. hill (2 K. 22:14 Zeph. 1:10). All this makes it probable that in the time of the later kings the Tyropœon was inclosed in the city; but if that was the case, would the burning of children to Moloch (2 K. 23:10 Jer. 23:19 4 ff. 32:35) have been there? Of course, this difficulty would not affect Robertson Smith's theory, which holds that there was no extension of the city to the W. hill till post-exilic times; but in any case the burials may have been at the mouth of the valley below Shiloah (Jerome, Comm. in Jer. 7:31). For Sir Charles Warren's theory that Hinnom was neither the W. er-Rabābi nor the Tyropœon, but a name given to the whole Wādī en-Nār, thus including Kidron, see Hastings, BD 2 385-388.]

G. A. S.]

Besides simplifying the topographical difficulties of Neh. 3, this view has several other advantages.¹

On the received view the Tyropœon is nowhere mentioned in the OT, though it lay in the heart of the city. This difficulty is removed by the view suggested above, and the third valley (W. er-Rabābi) appears to be quite out of relation to the circuit of the biblical Jerusalem, so that one does not look for much mention of it. Again, we have seen that the Canaanite quarter of the city lay in a hollow—presumably in the Tyropœon—and it is very natural that the seat of Canaanite worship in the valley of Hinnom should be in the vicinity of this quarter. Once more, by placing the valley gate quite near the temple, we understand how it was in this neighbourhood that the sacred procession in Neh. 12 began its course. Even at a much later date the temple hill was the real stronghold of Jerusalem, which Judas and his successors were concerned to fortify with walls. It would have been folly in Nehemiah to enclose a much vaster and less defensible circuit when the inhabitants were so few that it was necessary to draft one-tenth of the whole people into the capital (Neh. 11:1).

The course of the wall N. of the valley gate must still have skirted the base of the Temple hill E. of the Tyropœon. It is not improbable that the Maktēsh or Canaanite trading quarter lay outside the fortifications, a bazaar beyond the gate being common in Eastern towns.² From the tower of furnaces (see FURNACE, § 2. OVEN) the 'broad wall' ran to the point where in the Persian time the governor of the Syrian provinces had his throne.³ The throne would stand in an open place by a gateway, and comparison of Neh. 3:7 with 12:39 shows that the gate must have been (4) that of Ephraim—i.e., the gate of the main road leading to the N., which then as now must almost of necessity have followed the upper course of the Tyropœon, and so would skirt the walls for some distance before entering the city. In fact there were 400 cubits between the gate of Ephraim and (5) the corner gate (תַּשְׁמֵחַ שֶׁ, 2 K. 14:13). The corner gate is named also the *first gate*⁴ (תַּשְׁמֵחַ שֶׁ, Zech. 14:10), and so is probably identical with the old gate of Neh. 3:6 12:39 (cp HASSENAAH). For obvious engineering reasons the eminence at the NW. of the Haram area must always have been a principal point in the fortifications, and here the old gate may very well be placed. It is indeed possible that this was the site of the ancient bastion of Millo.

From the corner gate the N. line of the wall ran by (6) the *fish gate*⁵ to the towers of HAMMEAH (q.v. on the reading) and HANANEEL, the latter of which appears in Zech. (l.c.) as the opposite extremity of the city from the royal wine vats in the gardens by Shiloah, whilst in Jer. 31:38 the line between it and the corner gate is named as the natural direction of extension for the city. The tower, therefore, must have stood very near the NE. corner of the wall, but not so far E. as the angle of the Haram area, which is here built out, disguising the natural line of the hillside. From Zech. (l.c.) we see that (7) the Benjamin gate was at the E. end of the N. wall. There was a road into Benjaminite territory over the Kidron (1 K. 2:37), and to this there was a natural descent by a small valley now nearly obliterated, having its head a little S. of the Birket Isrā'in. Here too is the direct way to Anathoth, which was through the Benjamin gate (Jer. 37:13). In Nehemiah's record (8) the sheep gate seems to have the same position.⁶ From the angle near the tower of Hananeel and the Benjamin gate the line of the hill ran

1 [The distance from the SW. angle of the Haram area to the upper pool of Shiloah in a straight line, is about 1850 ft., which, on WRS's theory that the valley gate was near the former and the dung gate near the latter, would give room for the 2000 cubits mentioned by Nehemiah as between these two gates.]

² In fact at the siege of Titus the wool and clothes market and the brassworkers' bazaar still lay in much the same quarter, in the new city, outside the old line of fortification, though within the second wall (BJ v. 8).

southwards, trending to the E. At the extreme E. point, beyond the present line of wall, and a little S. of the modern golden gate, must be placed (9) the horse gate (Jer. 31 40).¹ South of this again came the fortifications of Ophel and the upper palace, and from this point the enceinte swept round to the pool of Shiloah. The lower wall of Manasseh in 2 Ch. 33 14 is described as an outwork in the Kidron valley extending all along the eastern side of the town and round the NE. corner.

[Other city gates mentioned are:—(10) the gate of the Miphkad (מִפְקָד) שַׁעַר; miphkad perhaps = 'muster'; but cp Ezek. 43 21 [EV, appointed place], where it seems to be some locality just outside the temple, see HAMMIPHKAD, between the horse and sheep gates according to Neh. 8 31; (11) the middle gate (הַתְּיָרָה) שַׁעַר, probably on the N. wall, Jer. 39 3, by some identified with the gate of Ephraim (אֶפְרַיִם) שַׁעַר; (12) the water-gate (מַיִם) שַׁעַר is not mentioned by Nehemiah on his circuit of the walls, but appears from Neh. 12 37 (cp 8 26 8 13 16) to have been an entrance to the temple courts. Still some take it to be a city gate opening above Gihon. The other 'gates' mentioned in Kings, Chronicles, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel were temple doorways or approaches, including those of Jer. 17 19 and 20 2; with the exception of the two in 2 K. 11 6, Gate of Sur (סוּר) שַׁעַר; in 2 Ch. 23 5, הַיְסוּד, 'the foundation') and the gate of the cowries (קַרְיָיִם) שַׁעַר, both of which were connected with the palace.

Nehemiah reports the rebuilding of the whole city wall, as it had been before Nebuchadrezzar's destruction of it. The temple was rebuilt before his time (in 518-515). Nehemiah mentions for the first time the castle 'the Birah,'² for whose gates he brought timber with him (28); it lay on the N. of the temple (see below, § 28). He also mentions 'the king's house' (3 25)—i.e., Solomon's palace—but does not say what he did with it; we do not hear of it again. The house of the high priest appears to have lain to the SE. of the temple (20); those of the priests to the E. above the horse-gate (28); 'the Nethinim dwelt on Ophel' (26). David's citadel is not mentioned (but see below on the Akra, § 27 iii.). There was an 'upper tower lying out from the king's house' (25), and 'a great tower lying out' below the horse-gate (27). G. A. S.]

The long blank in the history of the Jews which follows the time of Nehemiah makes it impossible to trace the progress of Jerusalem in any detail. Under the Persian empire the Jews enjoyed little prosperity. [It is very probable that like their neighbours they suffered much violence; and upon certain ancient traditions of this the hypothesis has been raised that the temple itself was destroyed. Under Artaxerxes Ochus (about 350 B.C.) there was a widespread rebellion in Phœnicia and other western parts of the empire, which was put down with great severity. Syncellus³ records a battle between Jews and Persians, which resulted in the capture of Jericho (?) and the exile of many Jews to Hyrcania and Babylonia, whilst Josephus (Ant. xi. 71) says that Bagöses the general of 'another Artaxerxes,' on a murder being perpetrated by the high priest in the temple, made this the excuse for entering it, and thereby, in Jewish opinion, polluting its sanctuary. The revolt of the Jews, if it took place, was undoubtedly a religious revolt; and it is easy to believe that Ochus or his general Bagoas punished it, as, they punished similar revolts in Egypt and Phœnicia, by the devastation of the temple. Robertson Smith suggested that the story of Josephus about the minor defilement of the temple by Bagöses is really a pragmatismal invention designed partly to soften the catastrophe of the Jews, and partly to explain it by the sin of the high priest. This has been accepted by Cheyne, and both scholars have transferred to the campaign of Bagoas Pss. 44, 74, and 79, which describe a destruction of the temple and were generally regarded as Maccabean.⁴ The occurrence of such a catastrophe, however, is by no means certain, or accepted by all authorities.¹ It is possible that the psalms cited refer to the destruction of Jerusalem by Ptolemy Soter in 320 (see next §). (On the historical points involved, and on the reference of these Psalms and of Is. 64 10 f., cp ISAIAH ii. § 21; PSALMS.) G. A. S.]

[The Greek period of the history of Jerusalem opens with Josephus's charming story (Ant. xi. 83 ff.) of

26. Greek period.

Alexander's visit to Jerusalem after the capture of Gaza, and of the sacrifice he offered in the temple. There is nothing impossible either in the visit or (even) in the sacrifice;² still they are not mentioned by any ancient Greek author. Alexander is not likely to have turned back from Gaza on Jerusalem with Egypt still unsubdued; and, as Ewald remarks, the whole tone of Josephus's narrative is unhistorical (see ALEXANDER).

In 320, according to Appian (Syr. 50), Ptolemy Soter 'destroyed (καθάρηκει) Jerusalem. So tragic an event can scarcely have happened without some echo in Jewish literature, and it is possible that some of the Psalms usually referred to the time of Ochus or Antiochus Epiphanes date from this destruction by Ptolemy. Josephus (Ant. xii. 1; c. Ap. i. 22) quotes a confirmation of the capture of the city from Agatharchides of Cnidus (middle of 2nd cent. B.C.), who represents it as due to the unwillingness of the Jews to fight on the Sabbath, and Josephus adds that Ptolemy led a great many Jews captive into Egypt (see PTOLEMY). The subsequent struggles between Ptolemy and Antiochus for the possession of Palestine appear to have been limited to the seaboard,³ and, for Jerusalem, a long period of prosperity followed. Eccclus. 50 records a series of embellishments under Simon the Just, circa 300: the repair of the temple and the building of substructures and upper walls around it; an alteration on the brazen sea of the temple; and the strengthening of the city walls (after their destruction by Ptolemy). The city's prosperity, fostered by Ptolemy Philadelphus, culminated in the high-priesthood of Simon II. (219-199 B.C.). In 203 Palestine passed from the Ptolemies into the hands of the Seleucids; but in 199 Scopas retook Jerusalem and set an Egyptian garrison in the citadel. In 198 the Jews assisted Antiochus to expel the garrison, and by treaty with Egypt in the following year the Seleucids were confirmed in their possession. On the accession of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, vigorous measures were taken to Hellenize Judæa (ISRAEL, § 70), and after the struggles of Menelaus and Jason for the city Antiochus entered it (169 B.C.), plundered the temple, destroyed the walls, and placed a Syrian garrison in a new citadel, and an altar to Zeus on the altar of Yahwè (Dan. 11 31).]

When Judas Maccabæus reconstructed the temple (165) he also fortified the holy mountain of Zion (the temple hill) with wall and towers, 1 Macc. 4 60. Once more rased by the Greeks (6 62 9 54), the walls of the city were renewed with hewn stone by Jonathan (10 10 ff.).

It is plain from 1 Macc. 4 60 6 7 10 11 that up to this time the fortified city was still identical with the temple hill; but a new topographical problem is raised by what is related of the citadel (Akra) erected by Epiphanes to dominate the town. i. Robertson Smith's view of site. N. of temple.—The Akra is identified by the author of 1 Macc. with the city of David. It continued to be held by the Greeks after the town was fortified by the Maccabees, and indeed was ultimately reduced by the erection of a special wall cutting off the Greek garrison from access to the city and market (12 36). The natural inference from all this is that the Greek citadel lay on the temple hill, and presumably on the site of the later Antonia, N. of the temple.¹ The temple hill is certainly the Zion of 1 Macc. ; and the city of David, with which the Akra is identified, had always meant the fortress of Zion. The same result seems to follow from the language of Josephus.

27. The Akra.

When Josephus lived, Jerusalem was almost a new town. Under the Maccabees, and again under Herod, the prosperity of the Jews was greater than at any previous time. The sanctuary was a centre of pilgrimage from the most distant lands, and the sovereigns of Jerusalem had an empire greater than any of the kings after Solomon. The growth of the city must have been enormous, and the great buildings of Herod and his successors had wholly changed its aspect, especially in the quarter of the temple and on the western hill where the royal palace stood. These changes were very apt to mislead an uncritical writer with regard to the ancient topography, and in fact Josephus falls into a radical blunder by assuming that the fortress of David belonged to the upper city, like the royal castle of his own day,² and that the western hill had always been part of Jerusalem.

Of Jerusalem as he himself saw it Josephus gives a vivid description (B/v. 4.1). The city stood on two hills divided by the Tyropœon valley, into which the houses descended tier beneath tier. The higher (western) hill was called the upper market, the lower (eastern) hill across the Tyropœon was the citadel hill, and was called indifferently the Akra or the Lower City. That this Akra included the ridge S. of the temple is clear from several marks: the hill was ἀμφικυρτος, 'hog-backed'; it was cut off by ravines on the outer side, and had a continuous approach to the temple, which stood on the higher ground; finally, it extended to Shiloah at the mouth of the Tyropœon.³ Thus we see that though Josephus himself has lost the true tradition as to the city of David, he furnishes additional proof that the citadel hill, still identified with it by the author of 1 Macc., was no other than the eastern hill.

ii. Robinson's view: W. of temple.—A different view of the Akra was maintained by Robinson, and has been elaborated by Sir Charles Warren and Colonel Conder⁴ in connection with better observations as to the two heads of the Tyropœon valley. It is maintained that the Akra was a knoll, W. of the temple hill and N. of the traditional Zion, between the two heads of the Tyropœon (§ 7). To gain any show of plausibility for this view, it is necessary to lay great weight on a statement of Josephus that the temple hill was once a third eminence lower than the Akra, and divided from it by a broad ravine, and that Simon after taking the Akra destroyed the citadel, and laboured for three years to reduce its site below the level of the temple plateau and fill up the intervening hollow (B/v. 4; Ant. xiii. 66). This story is probably exaggerated, for, according to the early and trustworthy evidence of 1 Macc. 13, the Akra was not destroyed, only purged, and strengthened by additional fortifications on the sacred mountain. In any case we know that the Akra was opposite the temple, and that in the time of Josephus there was no longer a ravine between, whereas the city opposite the temple to the W. was still cut off by the deep Tyropœon (Ant. xv. 115), except where a bridge led to the palace on the western hill. Nor is it possible that the western branch of the Tyropœon can be the deep ravine which, according to Josephus, separated the upper and the lower city, for that head is the theatre-shaped basin described in Ant. xv. 115 as facing the temple across the ravine.

iii. [Third view: S. of temple.—Though the Akra proper must thus have lain on the E. hill it is by no means certain that the view expressed above by

JERUSALEM

Robertson Smith, that it lay N. of the temple on the site of the later Antonia, is correct. It may have lain to the S. of the temple,¹ on the site which, as we have seen (§ 18), must have been occupied by the old Jebusite fortress, that is to say, on the higher ground opposite the temple plateau, beyond the deep hollow in the rock described in § 18. If there be any truth in the account of Josephus, that Simon reduced the rock of the Akra to a level lower than the temple plateau, and filled up the intervening hollow, this would account for the disappearance of the conspicuous rock from this part of the hill as well as for the fact stated by Josephus, that the hollow was no more in his day (about this he cannot be in error). Further, under the Akra lay the gymnasium or 'place of exercise' which the high-priest Jason constructed (2 Macc. 4.12): for this a most likely spot would be either the Tyropœon or the Kidron Valley below the S. end of the temple plateau. It was probably on the same site that Herod built his Hippodrome, and this, according to Josephus (Ant. xvii. 102; B/v. ii. 3.1) lay to the S. Finally, notice the association of the Akra with Shiloah in B/v. 6.1. [G. A. S.]

Under the Hasmonæan dynasty we meet with the first unambiguous evidence that the city had extended to the loftier western hill, where a new palace was erected overlooking the western hill; temple (Ant. xx. 8.1). This continued to be the royal quarter, and was raised to great splendour by Herod, who covered a vast extent of ground with his palace, its courts, and its pleasure grounds. The palace of Herod embraced two edifices transcending the temple in magnificence; and the three enormous adjoining towers, Hippicus, Phasaël, and Mariamme (Ant. xvi. 5.2; B/v. 4.3), made the upper city the strongest part of Jerusalem. Here also in Herod's days stood the xystus or gymnasium, beneath the Hasmonæan palace, where a bridge spanned the Tyropœon. The bridge was already there under the later Hasmonæans, when the new quarter had as yet minor importance, and the temple hill was still the only citadel. Here the warlike high priest Hyrcanus usually dwelt in the castle (בֵּית הַמִּצְדָּה) which Herod afterwards converted into the fortress of Antonia (so called by him after Mark Antony) in the NW. corner of the enceinte of the temple (Ant. xv. 11.4; B/v. 5.8). Antonia had the form of a square keep, with loftier towers rising pinnacle-like at the corners. It commanded the temple and therefore the whole lower city, and by its two staircases the Roman soldiers descended into the porticoes of the temple to keep order among the worshippers (cp Acts 21.35). [The soldiers in Herod's palace and the towers would be only those which formed the guard of the Roman Procurator.³ Another tower built by Herod was Psephinus, § 32 iii.]

When Pompey besieged the temple hill in 65 B.C. the bridge (§ 28) was broken down, and the Tyropœon afforded a complete defence on the W. 29. Romans. Pompey's assault was made from the N., where there was a strong wall with towers and a deep fosse which was with difficulty filled up to permit the advance of Pompey's siege train.⁴ This fosse must be identified with the rock-cut trench N. of the Haram area, and from Josephus's description seems to have been still the northern limit of the town. The walls destroyed by Pompey were restored by Antipater. [In 40 B.C. occurred the Parthian occupation of Jerusalem, resulting in the flight of Herod. Three] years later the city yielded, after an obstinate resistance, to Herod and the Romans (37 B.C.).⁵ Like Pompey, Herod attacked from the N. The Baris, occupied by Antigonus, was not surrendered till the temple and the rest of the city had been carried by storm, and we now read of two walls which had to be reduced successively.

[The construction of the temple by Herod (18-16 B.C.)¹ is considered elsewhere (HEROD, § 4). He died in 4 B.C. of the usual chronology. Under Archelaus, and afterwards under the Roman procurators, nothing of structural or topographical interest happened at Jerusalem save the building by Pilate of an aqueduct from the Wady 'Arrüb to 'Solomon's Pools,' and so to the city and the temple; and the growth of the northern suburb, Bezetha.

The appearance of Jerusalem in the Gospels and Acts repeats some of the general impressions of the city's situation which we have received from the OT, presents several new features of interest, and raises one or two topographical problems.

30. The NT. The OT, presents several new features of interest, and raises one or two topographical problems. The nearness of the city to the desert is emphasised (Mt. 35 45 Acts 21 38); the mountains are about it (Mt. 24 16 etc.). As the chief actors in the story are now provincials, Jerusalem appears mainly as a place of pilgrimage (the accounts of the Passover in all the gospels; also Lk. 24 Jn. 51 7:3 10 22); it is 'the holy city' (Mt. 45 27 53). High over everything else bulks the temple, the wonder and admiration of all who visit the city (Mk. 11 11 27 etc.); beside it neither Herod's buildings nor the walls are thought worthy of notice; David's tomb is mentioned once (Acts 2 29). The Roman occupation is in evidence; the city is the residence of the Procurator with his guard (Mk. 15 6 Jn. 18 28), perhaps in the palace on the W. hill; but his judgment seat (Mt. 27 19 etc.) and a strong garrison are in the Antonia (Acts 21 34 22 24, cp above, § 28) from which stairs descend into the outer court of the temple (Acts 21 38 22 30 23 10). As the capital and centre of pilgrimage from all parts of the world, thronged by crowds of many nationalities (Lk. 23 26 Jn. 12 20 Acts 2 7-11) Jerusalem becomes the headquarters of the infant church (Acts 8 9 11 13 13 15 1-4 21 17); but its aloofness from the world and the decline of its religious supremacy are emphasised by the gradual drift of the story in the Book of Acts down the hills on which the city stood to the Maritime Plain (8 26 9 30 32 ff. 10 etc.). Even in the Gospels there is an interesting foreshadowing of this decentralisation. Often as Jesus and his disciples are described as resorting to the temple to teach the people (Lk. 21 37 Jn. 5 14 7 3 etc.), this is the only part of the city mentioned in connection with them (except the Pools of Siloam, Jn. 9 7, and Bethesda, Jn. 5 2 ff.), and we find them far oftener outside the walls. In fact almost for the first time the curtain is lifted on the environs; and we see especially Olivet (Lk. 21 37, 'at night he abode in the mount called of Olives'; 22 10, 'he came out and went as was his wont to the Mt. of Olives'; 22 39 Mt. 26 30 Mk. 14 26 Jn. 8 1 18 1, 'over the brook Kidron'), the garden there, Gethsemane; the villages Bethphage, Bethany, and Siloam (Lk. 13 4); the roads to Jericho (Lk. 10 30) and Emmaus (Lk. 24 13). The city herself is hostile to Jesus (Mt. 23 37 Lk. 19 34), and the shadow of her doom lies upon her (ibid., etc.).

The main topographical problems are few. The site of BETHESDA (Jn. 5 2, near the sheep-gate; see above, § 24, col. 2424, end) is still doubtful (see above, § 11, col. 2414, end).² On Acladama and Golgotha see the special articles; on Solomon's Porch (Jn. 10 23 Acts 5 12) and the high priest's palace see TEMPLE; and on the site of GABBATHA see PRÆTORIUM.

Under Agrippa I., the third wall, to be described immediately, was built. Agrippa II. made in the Upper

31. Agrippa I. and II. ² We. identifies with Βεζεθα (Βεθεσα, etc.) of Jos. B. ii. 19 4, etc., which is explained to mean καινοπόλις, 'new city' (i.e., בית החדשה, cp also Offerhaus: בית החדשה [sic], cited by G. Boettger, Lez.). On Bezetha see above, §§ 9, 29 (end).

garrison and led to difficulties with Festus. Under Florus the Jews destroyed the cloisters leading from the fortress to the temple (B. ii. 156); but they were rebuilt. The defeat of Cestius Gallus in 66 A.D. proved the strength of the city, and the inhospitableness of its surroundings to an invading army. G. A. S.]

The walls of the city as they stood at the time of the siege by Titus must now be described. They were three in number.

i. The first wall consisted of a rampart to the N. of Herod's palace, connecting Hippicus in the citadel of the upper city with the western porch of the temple,¹ and

32. City walls of another line skirting the face of the western hill from Hippicus southward, thence curving round beyond Shiloah, and joining the western wall of the temple enclosure at Ophel. Several traces of this wall survive. [Its course from Maudslay's scarp round the SW. hill and across the mouth of the Tyropæon was traced by Bliss in the excavations of 1894-97; and its remains, as he appears successfully to prove, are those immediately under the debris, which he assigns to the long interval between the destruction of the wall by Titus and the building of a new wall (the remains of which now lie above the said debris) on the same line by the Empress Eudocia in the fifth century.]

ii. The second wall, connecting a point in the northern line of the first wall with Antonia (§ 28), enclosed the new town or trading quarter. [By occasional excavations in recent years, recorded by Schick, the general course of this wall appears to be now beyond doubt. It must have started from Antonia, S. of the trench which separated the latter from Bezetha (B. v. cp 6 § 2, 7 § 3 and 11 § 4), and have taken at first a westward direction; but it was for long uncertain whether this direction was sustained to the N. or deflected to the S. of the site of the sepulchre church. Schick's observations appear to have proved the latter. A little N.E. of the site of the church the wall turned S. at a right angle, then about 150 yards farther on resumed at a right angle the W. direction to the S. of the site of the Church, turning once more S. on the E. of the Pool Amygdalon, and so joining the first wall at, or in the neighbourhood of, Hippicus.² Outside both these walls, on the hillside sloping southwards towards the temple, had grown up a suburb called Bezetha, which Agrippa I. in the time of Claudius Caesar began to protect with a third wall conceived on a gigantic scale, but never altogether finished. The precise compass of this wall, which began at Hippicus (§ 28), and rejoined the first wall in the Kidron valley, has been much disputed, the great tower of Psephinus, which stood on very high ground, and formed its N.W. angle, being supposed by some to have stood near the modern castle of Goliath (Kasr Jâlûd), whilst others place it as far N. as the Russian cathedral.³

The measurements by which it has been proposed to decide the northern limits of Jerusalem are the distance of 3 stadia from the city to the tomb of Queen Helena of Adiabene (commonly identified with the Tombs of the Kings, Kubûr es-Salâṭîn), and the circuit of 33 stadia assigned by Josephus to the whole city. These measurements would seem to imply that the ancient city stretched farther N. than the modern walls; but they can hardly claim to be taken as mathematically accurate; the estimates of the compass of the city vary, and Eusebius places it at 27 stadia. This again would imply a line closely coincident with the N. wall of the modern town, agreeing with the remains of ancient scarping still visible, and with the express statement of Josephus that the line of the third wall passed through the royal caves—i.e., the catacombs—the 'Cotton grotto' and 'grotto of Jeremiah' (which are separated by a kind of fosse cut through the live rock, manifestly forming part of the old wall line).

In the siege under Titus the Romans successively carried the third and second walls.⁴ They then occupied Antonia, which was levelled to facilitate the approach of the forces for the attack on the temple stronghold. The temple was opened by fire rather than force, and, the Jewish leaders having retired to the upper city, the lower town from the temple to Shiloah was burned by the Romans. The capture of the upper city was effected by a regular approach with mounds and battering-rams (September 70 A.D.), and even then the huge citadel of Herod could only have yielded to famine had it not been abandoned by the Jewish leaders in a vain attempt at escape (ISRAEL, § 106). Its three great towers, with a portion of the western wall, were left as a memorial, and of this group the so-called tower of David (Phasaël) still stands.

The rebuilding of Jerusalem by Hadrian seems to have been conceived in a spirit friendly to the Jews, and there is even some evidence that the restoration of the temple was contemplated or commenced. After the great revolt (132-135 A.D.), however, Ælia Capitolina was transformed into a purely pagan town with seven quarters and many buildings of heathen fashion.¹ [It was not nearly so large as the Jerusalem of the Herods: the SW. hill lay outside the walls (Jer. Mic. 3:12). 'The S. walls appear to have run very nearly on the lines of the present city wall.'²]

The spread of Christianity and the rise of the practice of pilgrimage gave a new importance to the city of the crucifixion and resurrection, and in the time of Constantine the 'discovery' of the Holy Sepulchre and the erection of the magnificent church of the Anastasis (dedicated 336 A.D.), made Jerusalem again a great religious centre. In the pagan reaction under Julian an attempt was made to rebuild the temple; but it was frustrated by an outburst of fire from the foundations (362). The unfortunate empress Eudocia spent her last years at Jerusalem (about 450-460), built the church of St. Stephen, founded monasteries and hospitals, enriched the churches (and above all rebuilt the walls of the city (Evagrius, HE 20-23) on the old and wider lines, especially on the S. Thus Siloam was again included, and is so described by Antoninus Martyr (25), about 560.³ It is in all probability the ruin of Eudocia's wall that Bliss found in his 'upper wall' from Maudslay's scarp to Siloam (see above, §§ 10 ii. a, 30). The next great builder was Justinian, part of whose splendid church of St. Mary perhaps still remains in, or to the E. of, the mosque el-Aksâ. In 614 Jerusalem was taken by Chosrôes, and the churches and sepulchre were burned; but the vicar of the exiled patriarch Modestus began to restore them even before the Persians retired.

In 628 Heraclius retook the city; but its Christian days were numbered. In 637 Jerusalem capitulated to the caliph Omar, who gave directions for the erection of a place of worship on the site of the 'remotest shrine'—i.e., the temple, to which Mohammed, according to Kor. 17:1, was transported from Mecca in his famous night journey. From this verse the great sanctuary of Jerusalem received the name el-Aksâ, now generally confined to the building at the S. end of the Haram. The original mosque as described by Arculpus (670) was a rude edifice of wood capable of containing 3000 worshippers; but, soon after, the sanctuary was reconstructed in a style of great magnificence by the caliph 'Abd el-Malik, whose date (72 A.H. = 691 A.D.) is still read in a Cufic inscription on the Dome of the Rock, though the name of the caliph seems to have been changed to that of el-Ma'mûn, who restored the buildings after a great earthquake, which, according to Mokaddasy, left nothing standing except the part around the mihrab or niche indicating the direction of Mecca. In their present condition the buildings of the sanctuary show features of very various styles, from the Byzantine downwards. The architectural problems which they suggest are closely connected with controversies as to the topography of the TEMPLE (q.v.) and the true site of the Holy Sepulchre (see GOLGOTHA). Apart from the question of the holy sites, the later topography of Jerusalem presents no feature that need detain us, and the subsequent fortunes of the city belong to the general history of Palestine and the crusades.

On the other hand, the name may well have been traditional, and perhaps intentionally disguised by the Chronicler (or rather by a later scribe), with the above rather weak result. JESHISHAI retains 'Jeshimon' (יְשִׁמוֹן), ἔρημος [BAFL] in Nu., τὸ [ε]ἰσοσαίμων [BA], [τὸ] ἰεσοσεμου [L] in S).

The word Jeshimon occurs frequently elsewhere as a common noun (Dt. 82 to Ps. 88 7 [8] 78 40 106 14 Is. 48 19 etc.) with allusion to the wilderness of Sinai.

The Jeshimon of Nu., which is immediately overlooked by Pisgah, is the long tract of barren land N. of the Dead Sea; that of Sami., 'before' which is the hill of Hachilah (see HACHILAH), is the eastern part of the hill-country of Judah. For a vivid sketch of the latter see GASm. HG 312 f., and cp BETH-JESHIMOTH, DESERT, § 2 (2).

JESHISHAI (יְשִׁישַׁי), 'aged' ? [εc]cαi [BA], COYCI [L], JESESI, om. Pesh.), in a genealogy of GAD (§ 13) (1 Ch. 5 14 f.). 𐤇𐤍𐤏𐤏 suggests יְשִׁישַׁי—i. e., Jesse.

JESHOSHAI (יְשׁוֹשַׁי), § 31; one might read JASHVAHIAH, 'Yahwè causes to grow,' but this is hardly worth while. The passage contains three kindred names, derived from יָשַׁע and יָשָׁר or יָשָׁר. First comes יְשׁוֹשַׁי, a corruption of יְשַׁעֲיָהּ, Maaseiah; then יְשׁוֹשַׁי, Asaiah; and lastly יְשׁוֹשַׁי, a corruption of יְשׁוֹשַׁי, Maaseid), a Simeonite, temp. JESHUA (יְשׁוּעָה), §§ 28, 84; ΙΗCOY [BNA], COYA [L]), a place in the list of towns of Judah, Neh. 11 25-30 (see v. 26), and obviously in the extreme S. towards Edom. It is mentioned just before MOLADAH (g. v.), and is obviously only another form of the SHEMA [i.] of Josh. 15 26, and the SHEBA [i.] of Josh. 19 2. 1

The most original form is doubtless Shema; m became δ, and δ became v (cp מן in Jerus. Talm. for מן; Frankel, Vorstudien, 102), and finally v was prefixed by a copyist. The form Shū'a or Shev'a lies probably at the root of the Ar. Saweh, the name of a ruined place situated on a high hill a little more than half-way between Kh. 'Attir (Jattir) and Kh. el-Milh, and due W. of Tell 'Arād. So Knobel in 1861, followed by most commentators. Conder, however, limits the identification to Jeshua (PEFM 3 409). T. K. C.

JESHUA (יְשׁוּעָה), a later form of JOSHUA [g. v.]; cp WZKA 1 4 332 f.; ΙΗCOY [BNAQTL]).

1. b. Nun; Neh. 8 17; see JOSHUA.
2. A family of the b'ne Pahath-Moab in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA II., §§ 9, 8 c.); Ezra 26 (ιησουε [BA]) = Neh. 7 11 = 1 Esd. 5 11, JESUS.

3. Father of Jozabad, a Levite, Ezra 8 33 = 1 Esd. 8 63; JESU RV JESUS (𐤇𐤍𐤏𐤏 reads Jesus Jozabad).

4. Father of EZER (ruler of Mizpah); Neh. 8 19.

5. Jeshua b. Jehozadak the high priest, who, together with Zerubbabel, is often mentioned in contemporary writings; see Hag., and Zech. 3-6, where, however, his name is uniformly written JOSHUA (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ). As in Ezra 3 2 f. 4 3, he is mentioned prominently in connection with the building of the temple; but to other questions Hag. and Zech. unfortunately give no answer. Was he one of the leaders in what is commonly called 'the Return' ? (For a discussion of the large question here suggested, see EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 7, and cp ZERUBABEL.) The 'sons of Jeshua b. Jozadak' were among those who had taken foreign wives (Ezra 10 18). His descendants are traced down to Jaddua (351-331 B.C.) in Neh. 12 10 f. In the Apocryphal books of 1 Esd. and Ecclus. (e.g., 49 12) the name appears regularly as JESUS.

6. 'The house of Jeshua' was a priestly family among whom were incorporated the b'ne Jedaiah (Ezra 2 36 = Neh. 7 39 = 1 Esd. 5 24). To show their antiquity the Chronicler mentions a Jeshua among the representatives of the twenty-four courses instituted by David (1 Ch. 24 11; AV JESHUAH); cp also 2 Ch. 31 15, where Jeshua is a priest of the time of Hezekiah.

7. The b'ne Jeshua and Kadmiel are names of levitical families, Ezra 2 40 (ιησουε [B]) = Neh. 7 43 = 1 Esd. 8 26, JESSUE, RV JESUS (ιησουε [A], -εϛ [B]); see GENEALOGIES I., § 7 (1.), and cp HODAVIAH. They both occur together as individual names in Neh. 9 4 f. and 10 9 [10] (Jeshua b. Azaniah), and Jeshua alone in 8 7.²

² In the case of Jeshua, as with so many post-exilic names, there are numerous instances where identification is out of the question. Indeed, we may plausibly suppose that such a common and reputable name may have served to fill some of the gaps in JESHUAH (יְשׁוּעָה), 1 Ch. 24 11; AV, RV JESHUA (g. v., i. [6]).

JESHURON, in Is. 44 2 AV JESURON (יְשׁוּרֹן), Ο ΗΓΑΠΗΜΕΝΟΣ [BAFL in Dt.], Ο ΗΓΑΠ. ΙCΡΑΗΛ [BNAQ], or [HP 90 144] simply ΙCΡΑΗΛ [in Is.]; the other Greek versions in Dt. ΕΥΘΗΣ [Aq., Symm., Theod.], in Is. ΕΥΘΥΤΑΤΟΣ or ΕΥΘΗΣ [Aq., Symm., Theod.]; Pesh., Tg. 'Israel'; Vg., Dt. 32 dilectus, Dt. 33 and Is. rectissimus; Ar. Walt. mauṣūn, 'praised' [Dt. 32 33 5, but in 33 26 'Israel'; Gr. Ven. ΙCΡΑΕΛΙΚΟΣ = יְשׁוּרֹן], a poetical name for the people of Israel (Dt. 32 15 33 5 26 Is. 44 2). From the lateness of the writings in which it occurs Jeshurun might be an artificial formation, designed to represent the ideal of Yahwè's people, viz., righteousness (from יָשַׁר, yāšār = upright). This view, however, is not favoured by the use of the term in the above four passages; Jeshurun (if the vowels are right) is nothing more than a synonym for Israel. Late writers had access to and sometimes utilised archaeological facts. It is possible, therefore, that there was a shortened form of the ethnic name Israel, which was not unknown as yešer, yēšer (hence the name of a son of Caleb, 1 Ch. 2 18), but was still better known as יְשׁוּרֹן (vocalised on the analogy of Zebulun, Šiyyun [Zion]) or perhaps rather יְשׁוּרֹן, Yišrôn.

The termination is probably not a diminutive (Ges., with Gr. Ven. [above]), but indicates that the bearer of the name belongs to a certain category (Kön. Lehrgeb. 2 a 405); Yišrôn will mean one who belongs to or represents the ethnic category of Yēšer. Whether Yēšer originally conveyed the idea of righteousness or (cp אֲשֶׁר) prosperity, we cannot tell. In later times it may very well have done so; the name יְשׁוּעָה, when its real origin (see JACOB, § 6) had been forgotten, may have been explained by יְשׁוּעָה, 'God's righteous one.' Jesus Christ, the author and object of the Christian faith, a Jew by race, was born in Palestine towards the end of the reign of Herod the Great (1. Summary. (CHRONOLOGY, § 57 ff.). The home of his childhood was NAZARETH, a town in the lower division of the province of GALILEE (§ 5). The family to which he belonged was of humble estate. In early youth he worked at a handicraft (see JOSEPH [husband of Mary], § 9). On arriving at mature manhood he became a public teacher, rapidly gained fame, gathered about him disciples, offended the ruling classes by free criticism of the prevailing religion, and ended a brief but extraordinary career by suffering crucifixion.

This short summary of facts is taken from those books in the NT which bear the name of Gospels, and

2. Sources. are our main source of information for the history of Jesus. These documents are of varying value from a historical point of view. Critical opinion is much divided as to the fourth, that which bears the name of John, the judgment of many critics being that it is the least trustworthy as a source whether for the words or for the acts of Jesus. By comparison, the first three, from their resemblances called synoptical, are regarded by many as possessing a considerable measure of historical worth. But even these, from a critical point of view, are not of equal value, nor do the contents of any one of them possess a uniform degree of historic probability. They present to the critic a curious, interesting, and perplexing problem still far from final solution. By their resemblances and differences, agreements and disagreements, they raise many questions as to origin, relative dates, and literary connections, which have called forth a multitude of conflicting hypotheses and a most extensive critical literature. In the present state of the inquiry a dogmatic tone is inadmissible. All that one may do with propriety is to indicate what he regards as the most plausible opinion. We are concerned with the question here only in as far as is necessary to explain and justify the method on which the public life of Jesus is dealt with in this article.

We may regard Mk. as the oldest of the synoptical Gospels, and in its leading contents the nearest to the primitive tradition. In its present form, or in an earlier shape, it appears to have been the main source of the narrative parts of the other two Gospels. In many sections the style is suggestive of an eye-witness, so as to make the reader feel that he is in contact with the ultimate source of the evangelic tradition, the oral narratives of the companions of Jesus. As reported by Eusebius (HE 3 39), Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, writing about 125 A. D., described Mark as the interpreter (ἑρμηνεύτης) of Peter, which probably means that he helped the apostle to put what he had to say into Greek or Latin.¹ Internal evidence supports the hypothesis of such a connection between much of the material in the second Gospel and one of the men who had been with Jesus, and with none of them more probably than with Peter as he is represented in the evangelic tradition. This Gospel is full of realisms. Its graphic style has often been remarked on. But it is not a question of merely pictorial narrative. The phenomena to be noted are descriptions to the life, vivid presentations of a striking personality, words and acts reported just as they must have been said and done, because they had impressed themselves indelibly on the ear and eye of the reporter. What specially makes for the hypothesis of an eye-witness, and generally for the primitive character of Mk.'s reports, is the disregard manifest in them of conventional considerations of the fitting and edifying. The influence of such considerations is traceable in the other two Synoptists, especially in Lk. In the third Gospel Jesus is the Lord (about a dozen times so named in narrative where Mt. and Mk. have Jesus), and it is never for a moment forgotten what religious decorum demands in recording the words and acts of so august a personage. For this Lk. may in part be personally responsible, but probably not altogether. The decorum of his narrative reflects the reverence of the early church for its risen and exalted Head, the writer's deference thereto showing itself in the omission of some things reported in the primitive tradition and in the putting of other things in a modified way. This reverence and its controlling influence would grow with time. The absence of that influence from Mk.'s narrative as evinced by the realism, of which examples will be given as we proceed, is an index at once of antiquity and of first-hand sources of information. Peter doubtless shared the reverence of the church for its Lord. But Peter had seen and heard, and the vivid sense of the unique reality overpowered all considerations of what was becoming, such as might naturally weigh with those who had not seen or heard but drew their information mainly from documents. And so we see in Mk., containing, according to Papias, the report of Peter's recollections, the real man Jesus, without the aureole of faith around his head, yet with a glory of truth, wisdom, and goodness the better seen on that very account.

The informant who tells of Mark's connection with Peter says, also, that Matthew wrote a book of Logia (τὰ λόγια συνεγράψατο, Eus. HE 3 39).

4. Matthew (and Luke). Most modern critics treat this statement with respect; but few identify the Logia of Papias, written (as he states) in the Hebrew tongue, with our Canonical Mt., even to the extent of seeing in the latter a simple translation into Greek of the Hebrew original. The prevailing and intrinsically reasonable opinion is that the book of the publican apostle was the source whence the author of our Mt. drew the words or discourses of Jesus so amply reported in his Gospel. He, and also the author of Lk.; for in the didactic element there is much common to the first Gospel and the third, though the latter contains a considerable amount of peculiar material which may have been derived from a different source. The common matter is given in such varied forms and connections in the two Gospels as to suggest either various redactions of the source or very free use by one or both Evangelists. How variations might arise is easily conceivable. Collections of the words of Jesus were not made in a purely historical or antiquarian spirit. They met the demand of disciples for Christian instruction, for words of the Master by which they might guide their lives. The practical aim would influence the form and the collection of the Logia as used by preachers and catechists. The words of the Lord Jesus would almost involuntarily undergo modification to suit actual circumstances. This process has gone farthest in Lk. Besides the influence of decorum already touched upon, we note in Lk.'s report of the words of Jesus, as compared with Mt.'s, a certain indifference to the historical setting, to the actual circumstances under which and with reference to which Jesus spoke, a disregard of the religious antitheses of the time, and a translation of the sayings into terms, and an ideal transposition to a time, which fit them for the present use of the Church. The 'Sermon on the Mount' in Lk.'s report is virtually a discourse of the exalted Lord to a Christian congregation, edited either by the Evangelist or by another in that view. Having regard to this broad contrast between the first Gospel and the third, we can have no difficulty in giving to the former the preference as to comparative originality. Neither may give the ipsissima verba; but on the whole Mt. comes nearer than Lk.

From the foregoing statement it follows that the narratives common to Mt., Mk., and Lk., and the discourses common to Mt. and Lk., may with a considerable measure of confidence be regarded as a trustworthy tradition concerning the ministry of Jesus. They represent the oldest, comparatively primitive, tradition, and as such must form the basis of a statement concerning that ministry professing to be guided by a critical method. They relate exclusively to the public life, passing over in silence almost unbroken the childhood and early youth.

5. Primitive tradition.

According to this primitive tradition, the public career of Jesus began when another remarkable man was performing the part of a prophet in the wilderness of Judæa: a man of austere ascetic life, symbolising the severity of his attitude as a moral critic of his time; preaching to all classes the necessity of repentance, and baptizing in the Jordan such as received his message as the voice of God—hence known as the 'Baptist' (see ISRAEL, § 92). Jesus came from Nazareth (Mk. 15) to see and hear John, and, like the others, received baptism at his hands (see JORDAN, § 2), a fact stated by Mk. without note or comment, by Mt. in a way implying that it needed explanation, by Lk. (in a participial clause) as a subordinate incident. Expositors and theologians have endeavoured to explain the significance of this event. It meant this at least: that Jesus felt a deep sympathetic interest in John's work. The visit to the Jordan helps us to look back into the silences of Nazareth; it is a window into the mind of Jesus. John, we gather, was a great man for him. So he confessed at a subsequent time (Mt. 11 11), and what he said then shows what he had thought before he left the seclusion of Nazareth. To be baptized by such a man was a suitable start for his own ministry. It was a public intimation of moral solidarity. How far his tendencies, methods, and habits agreed with or differed from those of the prophet of the wilderness would appear in due course; it was well, to begin with, that fundamental sympathy should be at once made manifest.

How long Jesus remained in the region environing the lower part of the Jordan and the Dead Sea is uncertain. Mk. states that he returned to Galilee after John had been 'delivered up' (that is, thrown into prison by Herod, tetrarch of Galilee: see Mk. 6 14-29). All three Synoptists make mention of a retirement into the remoter inhospitable wilderness of Judæa, and of an experience of moral trial there, familiarly known as the Temptation. The bare fact (intrinsically credible) is stated by Mk., without the symbolic representation given in the parallel accounts; but the impulse to this withdrawal into solitude is very realistically described by him, as a being driven by the Spirit into the desert (1 12), which, as external force is not to be thought of, speaks of intense mental preoccupation.

6. John the Baptist.

At length Jesus, with clarified vision and confirmed will, returned to Galilee, the main theatre of his future work as we know it from the oldest tradition,¹ there to enter on activities which have won for him a unique place in the history of the world. It does not clearly appear from Mk.

¹ We might say the exclusive theatre, were it not for a few incidents connected with the final journey to Jerusalem through Peræa (little children brought to Jesus, man seeking eternal life with relative conversation, two sons of Zebedee, blind man at Jericho). Mk. makes Jesus teach multitudes in Peræa (10 1); Mt. makes him heal (19 2). There are rudimentary indications of a Samaritan ministry in Lk. (in the long insertion whether he chose any particular spot as the centre from which his activity was to radiate. It is certain that Nazareth was no such centre. With the exception of an occasional visit, his native town (but see NAZARETH) was henceforth forsaken for other scenes more suitable or more sympathetic. Among these a prominent place belongs to Capernaum, a thriving populous town on the shore of the lake of Galilee.

The public ministry of Jesus presents four broad aspects: (1) a preaching ministry among the people at large; (2) a teaching ministry among disciples; (3) a healing ministry; (4) a prophetic or critical ministry antagonistic to current conceptions and embodiments of righteousness.

1. The chief scene of the first form of ministry, the κήρυγμα, was the synagogue. On his way northwards from the Jordan Jesus at length arrived at Capernaum, and 'straightway on the sabbath day he entered into the synagogue and taught'¹ (Mk. 1 21). Shortly thereafter he set out on a preaching tour through the towns of Galilee (1 39). Here one of Mk.'s realisms occurs. Jesus appears in his narrative making a flight from Capernaum in the grey dawn while all are asleep, possibly 'a flight from the unexpected reality into which his ideal conception of his calling had brought him' (Holtzmann, Handcomm. zum NT), certainly an escape from sudden entangling popularity to similar service elsewhere. 'For this end I left' (Capernaum), said Jesus simply, in self-defence, to disciples who had pursued him (1 38). In Lk.'s version flight is eliminated, and a reference to his divine mission is substituted for an apology for flight (4 43).

Of this synagogue-ministry no detailed record has been preserved. Not a single specimen of the brief striking synagogue addresses of Jesus is to be found in the Gospels—at least there is none under that name: it is possible that some discourses—e.g., the beautiful exhortation against earthly care (Mt. 6 25-34 Lk. 12 22-34)—assigned to other occasions—were really delivered in synagogues. Lk. has given us the text, and a general characterisation, of one synagogue address—that delivered in Nazareth (4 18-22). If, as without sufficient reason some suspect, his account be unhistorical, it is, to say the least, a felicitous invention. The text from the Book of Isaiah (61 1 f.) is thoroughly typical of the religious attitude and spirit of Jesus, and the expression 'words of grace' (λόγους τῆς χάριτος) is doubtless most apt, whether we take it as applying to the manner or to the substance of the discourse. Lk.'s account of the appearance of Jesus in the synagogue of Nazareth is meant, and it is fit, to be a symbolic programme of his whole preaching ministry. Mk.'s contribution to the characterisation of the synagogue-kerugma is a report of the impression made by what was probably the first appearance of Jesus as a speaker in a synagogue, that in Capernaum. They exclaimed, he tells (1 27). What is this, a new doctrine (διδαχή)? and he explains that the novelty was that Jesus spake not as the scribes, who appealed to authorities, but as himself having authority: with the confidence of personal insight and with the authority of self-evidencing truth.

Mk. makes a general preliminary statement about the preaching ministry in Galilee which may be viewed as covering the synagogue preaching: 'Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the Gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe in the Gospel' (1 14 f.). Hence it may be inferred that the constant theme of the kerugma was the kingdom of God, that the kingdom was presented as a boon rather than as a demand; as good news (εὐαγγέλιον) not as awful news—the aspect under which it appeared in the preaching of John; and that the summons of the preacher was not merely to repentance, but above all to faith—i. e., make the good news welcome. The statement is summary, and its language may be secondary, coloured somewhat by the dialect of a later time; but even in that case we are not left without a clue to the general tenor of Jesus' popular discourses. We might gather it from a saying whose authenticity is as certain as its import is significant: 'I came not to call the righteous, but sinners' (Mk. 2¹⁷ Mt. 9¹³ Lk. 5³²). The value of this declaration lies in this, that, whilst spoken with reference to a particular occasion, it indicates a habitual attitude, a fixed policy. Jesus addressed himself by preference to those who could not be regarded as in the conventional sense exemplary. The chosen audience reflects light on the nature of the message. It was good tidings even to the ignorant, the erring, the fallen, the outcast, hinting that the past might be forgiven and forgotten, and that the future offered great possibilities. What hope-inspiring ideas of God and man and their relations underlay such teaching!¹ The occasion on which the saying was uttered also throws a contributory light on the nature of the Galilean Gospel. Jesus had been eating with 'publicans and sinners,' and was on his defence for that act. In this connection the term 'call' must bear the special sense of an invitation to an entertainment. Lk.'s gloss 'to repentance' restricts and even obscures the meaning. The kingdom, as Jesus preached it, was a feast, and his call was a generous invitation to come and enjoy its good things.

9 51-18 14). The fourth Gospel makes Jerusalem and Judæa the main scene of the activity of Jesus. The Synoptists know only of one visit to Jerusalem—that during which he was crucified. How long the ministry lasted we can only conjecture. There is no chronology in the evangelic tradition. (See further, CHRONOLOGY, § 44 ff.)

In his popular addresses Jesus would make free use of parables. He spoke in parables to all classes, but especially to the people. 'Without parable he was not wont to speak to them' (Mk. 4³⁴). And of course the aim of the parabolic method of instruction, in as far as it had a conscious aim and was not the spontaneous outcome of natural genius, was to popularise the truths of religion: simplification with a view to enlightenment. In the conversation between Jesus and his disciples after the utterance of the parable of the sower, as reported by all the Synoptists, an opposite purpose, that of keeping the people in darkness, seems to be avowed by the preacher. It is not credible, however, that Jesus would either cherish or avow such an inhuman intention, though it is credible that in the bitterness of his disappointment at the meagre fruit of his popular ministry he might express himself in a way that might be misunderstood, on the principle of reading intention in the light of result.² None of the parables preserved in the Gospels is expressly connected with synagogue addresses, with the doubtful exception of the mustard seed and the leaven (Lk. 13¹⁸⁻²¹, cp v. 10). The treasure and the pearl (Mt. 13⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶) may be a pair of parabolic gems (setting forth the absolute worth of the kingdom of heaven) whose original setting was in such an address; and the exquisite parables concerning the pleasure of finding things lost (Mt. 18¹²⁻¹⁴ Lk. 15) may have been first uttered on a similar occasion, unless we suppose that the original place of these parables was in an address to the publicans gathered together in the house of Matthew (Mk. 2¹⁵⁻¹⁷, and parallels). The collection of parabolic utterances preserved in the Gospels is so large and varied that there is little room for complaint that it is not still larger; yet one cannot but reflect what a rich addition to the evangelic memorabilia a verbatim report of the parables spoken on the Galilean preaching tour would have been.

2. The teaching (διδασχῆ) or instruction given to disciples (μαθηταί).—That Jesus aimed at gathering about him a circle of disciples who

11. Teaching. should be constantly, or at least much, in his company is one of the most certain data of the primitive tradition. He began the process of selection very early (Mk. 1¹⁶⁻²⁰ Mt. 4¹⁸⁻²²), having some disciples to accompany him on his first Galilean preaching tour. He meant to make the selected ones—or at least the inner circle of them—in his own happy, unforgettable phrase, 'fishers of men,' a playful allusion to the secular occupation of those first chosen. The aim involved, of course, special instruction, and that demanded leisure. The desire of Jesus to get leisure for uninterrupted intercourse with his disciples, and more particularly with the body of twelve which, according to the testimony of all the evangelists, he formed out of a larger company of followers, is specially apparent in Mk. Through his preaching and healing ministries, the fame of Jesus rapidly rose to such a pitch that wherever he went large masses of people gathered round him, masses too large for any synagogue to hold, so that perforce he had to become a street or field preacher. The work was not uncongenial; but, in the tropical climate of the lake shore, it was fatiguing, and withal it was unsatisfactory. Much sowing, little fruit: such was the feeling of the preacher, as expressed in the parable of the Sower, which is a critical review of the early Galilean ministry. Unwearied in well-doing, Jesus yet began to feel with increasing depth of conviction that, if anything was to come of his labours, he must find time and opportunity for careful initiation of the few more intelligent and susceptible hearers, that continuing in his word they might become disciples indeed, and by insight into truth become enlightened, free, and apt to teach others. Mk. more than any other evangelist shows Jesus making repeated earnest efforts in this direction, fleeing from the crowd, as it were, in quest of rest and leisure for the higher work. The ascent to the hill-top (3¹³) was such a flight. The voyage towards the eastern shore on the day of the parabolic discourse from a boat was another. The undisguised manner in which Mk. allows this to appear in his narrative is a good instance of his realism: 'They [the disciples] take him with them, as he was in the ship' (4³⁶), sine apparatu (Bengel) and sine mora. Here was flight along the only line of retreat, the shore being besieged by the vast crowd, and not easy even along that line, some of the people having got into boats to be nearer the speaker (4³⁶). The voyage towards Bethsaida at the north-western corner of the lake, after the return of the twelve from their apprentice mission (6³²), was a third (unsuccessful) attempt at escape. The long excursions to the north, into the regions of Tyre and Sidon and Cæsarea Philippi (7²⁴⁻³⁷), were likewise flights, endeavours to escape both from friends and from foes; more successful because taking the fugitives outside the boundaries of Israel, or into a borderland where Jesus and his work were comparatively unknown.

In connection with the first and the last of these retirements some of the most important parts of the

12. The didaché of Jesus were communicated to his disciples. With the ascent to the 'Teaching on the Hill,' hill is connected the great 'Sermon on the Mount,' unreported by Mk., preserved by Mt. and Lk. in very diverse forms, yet withal so like as to leave no reason for doubt as to their identity. Which of the two reports comes nearest to the original, and whether both do not diverge therefrom widely in different directions, are questions which cannot be discussed here (see GOSPELS). The two points which we are concerned to emphasise are: (1) that the discourse was didaché, disciple-instruction, possibly with none present but disciples, though that is not made clear in either narrative, and therefore might more appropriately be called The Teaching on the Hill than The Sermon on the Mount; and (2) that this teaching was given during a season of leisure, probably lasting for days. The latter point has a most important bearing on the question of the unity of the discourse as given in Mt. If we assume that it was delivered all in one gush, and on a single theme—say the antithesis between Pharisaic righteousness and the righteousness of the kingdom as conceived by Jesus—then certain portions must be eliminated as irrelevant: e.g., The Lord's Prayer (6.9-15) and the counsel against care (6.25-34).¹ But if the teaching on the hill continued for days, with different themes for each day, then the unity must be understood in a wide sense, and Mt.'s version of the 'sermon' may be a substantially correct summary of what Jesus said on various topics not closely connected with one another.²

The teaching on the hill as reported in Mt. affords large insight into the thoughts of Jesus on the essentials of religion: God, man, the kingdom of God, the righteousness of God.

Jesus taught no abstract doctrine concerning God, or indeed on any subject. He did not say, God must be thought of as Father, and then proceed to explain what the title meant. He simply used the new name and defined as he went along by discriminating use. The title 'Father' is applied to God no less than fifteen times in the sermon, most suggestively, so as to ascribe to him by implication a universal and a special providence (5.45 6.32), benignant and magnanimous in its action, doing good even to the unthankful and the evil (5.45), a perfect ethical nature whose perfection consists in gracious unmerited love (5.46-48), a spirit delighting in mercy and ready to forgive, and desiring the same spirit to rule in the hearts of those who have the supreme honour to be called God's children (6.14 f.), an eye that carefully notes the most secret devout acts of the sincere and humble worshipper (6.14 18), an ear that hears their prayers, and a heart that is inclined to grant all the good desired or needed (7.11).

That Jesus did not employ this new name for God simply under the instinctive guidance of a happy religious genius, but with full consciousness and deliberate purpose, is intrinsically probable, and is attested by a remarkable word ascribed to him in the evangelic tradition, and preserved in substantially the same terms in the first and third Gospels: 'No one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither knoweth any one the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son is pleased to reveal him' (Mt. 11.27 Lk. 10.22). In view of the statement in Lk.'s preface as to the method on which he compiled his Gospel, a sober criticism will not readily acquiesce in the theory that the passage in which this text is embedded is a free poetical composition by the evangelist in the spirit of Paulinism, and that it was borrowed from him by the author of the canonical Mt. writing at a later date.³ It is much more probable that both evangelists found it in a common source containing a collection of the sayings of Jesus, either in the form which it assumes in extant MSS, or in that current among the gnostics: 'No one knew the Father save the Son, and the Son save the Father and he to whom the Son shall reveal.' Under either form the Logion implies a peculiar relation, if not to God, at least to the conception of God as Father, that of one who claimed to have given currency to the name.

² This view is taken by Lutteroth (Essai d'Interpretation de quelques parties de l'Évangile selon saint Matthieu). He takes καθίστατος (5.1) in the sense of camping out (camper), pointing to Acts 18.11 and Lk. 24.49 as instances of the use of the word in a kindred sense.

³ So Pfeiderer in Urchristentum.

The whole section Mt. 11.25-30 was probably a unity of which Lk. (10.21 f.) for some reason gives only a fragment. In favour of this view is the resemblance it bears to the prayer of Jesus the son of Sirach (Ecclus. 51), which, like it, begins with a prayer and ends with an invitation, in the name of wisdom, to come and receive instruction. This resemblance has been used as an argument against the genuineness of the Logion 'come unto me' (Pfeiderer, Urchrist. 513). But it is perfectly conceivable that Jesus was acquainted with Sirach, and that his utterance was coloured by the language of its closing sentences. This view meets the objection taken to the Logion on the ground of the self-eulogy in some of its expressions (Martineau, Seat of Authority in Religion, 577-585). When he says, 'I am meek and lowly,' Jesus of Nazareth speaks in the name of wisdom (one of his self-designations according to Resch, Agrapha, 273 f.), as the earlier Jesus had spoken before him.

Jesus taught his doctrine of man on the same method of incidental suggestion. He asserted the worth of man by comparisons sometimes pathetically and even humorously understating the truth, in one instance sublimely adequate. A man is better, greater, of more worth to God, and to himself, thinking rightly, than a bird (Mt. 6.26), a sheep (Mt. 12.12), yea, than the whole world (Mk. 8.36). The truth implied is that the things compared are really incommensurable. It is a Hebrew way of asserting the ideal, absolute worth of humanity, a method applied in the Epistle to the Hebrews to Christianity, which is declared to be better in various respects than the Levitical religion, when what is meant is that it is the absolute, perfect, therefore eternal, religion. Man's incomparable dignity in the teaching of Jesus rests on the fact that he is a son of God, not merely a creature, whether small as a bird or great as a world; a son indefeasibly, whether good or evil, just or unjust (Mt. 5.45). By this lofty conception of man's relation to God, rather than by expressed statement or laboured argument, Jesus brought immortality to light. 'God is not the God of the dead, but of the living,' he said (Mt. 22.32). A fortiori he would have said: 'God is not the Father of the dead, but of the living.'

14. Idea of man.

Not to be overlooked even in a summary statement of Christ's teaching concerning man is his assertion of the rights of woman, in connection with married relations (Mt. 5.31 f., cp 19.3-9 Mk. 10.2-12). The Jewish doctors of the time for the most part accepted the old Hebrew notion of a wife as property bought and sold, and to be put away at the pleasure of her husband. But they were zealous to have the bill of divorcement (Dt. 24.1) in due form, that the woman might be able to show that she was free to marry again, and doubtless they flattered themselves that they were thereby defending the rights of women. Jesus asserted a more radical right of woman—not to be put away, except when she put herself away by unfaithfulness. He thus raised anew the prophetic cry 'I hate putting away' (Mal. 2.16). It was an act of humanity of inestimable value to the highest interests of the race, as well as an act of heroic courage.

By his friendly relations with the 'publicans and sinners' Jesus gave a practical and impressive expression of his doctrine of man.

16. Outcasts.

great social gathering of the outcasts in Capernaum (Mk. 2.15-17 and parallels) brought together by Levi or Matthew, called doubtless for that immediate local service, as well as for the ulterior wider service of the apostleship, was a concrete assertion of the great truth that a man at the worst is still a man, and a son of God, and that all superficial cleavages of race, descent, colour, occupation, or even character, are of small account in comparison with that which is common to all humanity, the soul.

The so-called feast in Levi's house cannot have been merely a private entertainment given by the newly called disciple to as many of his old comrades as his dining chamber would accommodate. All the evangelists say that there were many present. Lk.'s expression is 'a great crowd' (ὄχλος πᾶντος). The meeting was probably in the court around which the buildings of an eastern house of any size are arranged, and of the dimensions of a congregation rather than of a dinner party. Jesus was the prime mover in the matter, and Levi merely his agent. It was a deliberate attempt on Christ's part to get into personal contact with the social outcasts of Capernaum.

By these kindred ideas of God and man and their relations Jesus became inevitably the founder of a universal religion, however narrow the limits within which his own ministry was restricted. Those who, like Baur¹ and Weizsäcker, have interpreted his teaching in a universal sense have most truly divined his inmost thoughts.

In setting forth the summum bonum as the kingdom of God Jesus poured his new wine into a very old

17. Kingdom of God. linguistic skin. But that the wine, the idea connected with the phrase, was new, the parables of the new wine and the new piece of cloth (Mk. 221f. and parallels) suffice to prove. The kingdom he preached was ethical, spiritual, (and therefore) universal in character: not political, theocratic, national; at least national only to those cherishing current Jewish expectations. The Beatitudes, which form the sublime introduction to the Teaching on the Hill, in either version of them, amply bear out this assertion. Obviously so in Mt.'s version, really so also, though not so obviously, in Lk.'s. Jesus may have said: 'Blessed ye poor,' as Lk. reports, and the reporter may have understood the term 'poor' chiefly in a social sense; but it does not follow that his understanding in this case, any more than in the case of the saying, 'I came not to call the righteous,' exhausted the Teacher's meaning. Jesus used words in a pregnant sense, and in his mind the natural and the spiritual lay close together: witness the saying: 'few things (dishes) are needful, or (rather) one' (thing)—i.e., the food that endures for ever—Lk. 1041f. The high ideal of man links together in his thought the social and the spiritual. The poor man passes into the blessedness of the kingdom whenever he realises what man is or may be. Poor in purse or even in character, no man is beggared who has a vision of man's chief end and good. If this be idealism, then Jesus was an idealist. He was also a poet, and words were symbols for him of thoughts which no words could adequately express. To make him the herald of a theocratic particularistic kingdom of Israel is to bring him down from these lofty regions to the low level of dull prosaic commonplace.²

The kingdom of God, or of heaven, as it is usually designated in the first Gospel, while in its ultimate significance implying a high ideal of life, sonship realised in a heroic career rife with tribulation (Mt. 510-12), is in its initial aspect, as already indicated, a boon rather than a demand. Seek ye the kingdom (as the highest good), said the Master to his disciples (Mt. 633). It is to be sought as the summum bonum, in preference to the temporal good above which Pagan aspiration rarely rises (Mt. 632). It is the bread which perisheth not, the raiment which waxeth not old, the treasure which cannot be stolen (Lk. 1233). The quest of this supreme good, in singleness of mind, is ever successful. 'Seek, and ye shall find' (Mt. 77). And the quest is the noblest of human endeavours. He who so seeks the highest good fulfils at the same time the highest duty of man. In this coincidence of the chief good with the chief end lies the unique distinction of the Christian religion as expounded by its Founder.

Jesus carefully explained his conception of the ethical ideal, both by positive statements and by keen caustic

18. Ethical ideal. criticism of the system of religion and morals prevalent among the Jews in his time. Among the statements a foremost place belongs to the golden rule; 'what you wish men to do to you do ye to them' (Mt. 712), for which analogies can be found in other religions, but with this difference, that, whilst in the teaching of Jesus the rule assumes a positive form, in all other known instances it is given negatively. So in the saying of Confucius, 'do not to others what you would not wish done to yourself' (Legge, Chinese Classics, 1191). The negative confines us to the region of justice; the positive takes us into the region of generosity; for we wish more than we can claim, or than the average man is willing to do to others. Jesus would have a disciple to be not merely δικαιος but ἀγαθός, spontaneously doing to others all that a spirit of magnanimity prompts. The golden rule covers only the duties arising out of human relations. The summary of duty,—Love God with all your heart, and your neighbour as yourself—given in answer to a question at a later time (Mk. 1228-31), covers the whole ground of obligation. Thus we have religion and morality blent in one ideal as of co-ordinate importance, a combination not lying to the hand in the OT—the two great commandments, though both in the law, are not given in one place (Dt. 64f. Lev. 1918)—and still less in accordance with the spirit of the time. In Rabbinism ritual was before morality, and the tendency was to sacrifice morality in the interest of religion. Jesus said: ethics before ritual—the essentials of true religion consist in morality—placability before sacrifice (Mt. 523), mercy before sacrifice (Mt. 913), filial affection before sacrifice (Mt. 154-6 Mk. 79-13).

² This prosaic view pervades the treatment of Christ's teaching in all the works of Dr. Bernhard Weiss.

Whilst putting morality on a level with, or even in some respects above, religion, Jesus was careful to subordinate individual interests to the universal claims of the kingdom of God: 'Seek ye his kingdom' said he to his disciples (Lk. 1231), implying if he did not say 'first' (Mt. 633), food or raiment being relegated to the second place. The 'Lord's Prayer' is constructed on the same principle of subordination. First God's glory, kingdom, and will; then, only in the second place, the temporal interest (daily bread), and even the spiritual interests (pardon and protection from temptation), of the worshipper. Jesus insisted that this subordination must be carried the length of willingness to part with life itself. First the things of God, then the things of men (Mk. 833). True to his great principle that religion and morality are one, however, Jesus gave his disciples to understand that the things of God are at the same time those of deepest concern to man. They are the true life of the spirit, for the sake of which one who understands the philosophy of life will gladly part when needful with the lower life of the body (Mk. 835).

The antithetic presentation of the moral ideal was given partly in didactic form, partly in the way of occasional polemics. For the didactic aspect, which concerns us here, we are indebted chiefly to Mt., in whose version of the Sermon on the Mount the contrast between Jesus's interpretation of the law and that current in the Rabbinical schools is worked out in a series of examples (Mt. 521-48). This section of the sermon is omitted almost entirely by Lk., whereby the small part he has retained loses much in point. The gist of the elaborate contrast is: The law as interpreted by the scribes, externalised and restricted in scope; as interpreted by Jesus, inward and infinite. Thou shalt not kill, said the scribe; thou shalt not hate or despise, said Jesus. Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and doing that thou doest enough, said (in effect) the scribe; thou shalt love all, making no distinction between fellow-countrymen or strangers, friend or foe, except as to the form love takes, said Jesus. The external is that which is seen; hence the tendency of an outward morality to become a morality of ostentation. Jesus used this morality, much in vogue in his time, to emphasise by contrast the reserved retiring character of true piety (Mt. 61-8 16-18). True goodness is in the heart, and the good man is content that it should be there, visible only to the Father in heaven.

3. The later teaching of Jesus will be referred to in another connection. We pass, therefore, from the teaching to the healing ministry. In doing so we make a transition from a subject which is universally attractive to one which is distasteful to many because of its association with the idea of miracle. The distaste is felt not only by those who do not believe in the miraculous, but also by not a few who, whilst not adherents of the naturalistic school, have no sympathy with the apologetic value attached to 'miracles' as credentials of revelation. The following statement will not bring us into collision with this feeling. The miraculousness of the healing ministry is not the point in question: what we are concerned with is the question of fact. Now, as to this, the healing ministry, judged by critical tests, stands on as firm historical ground as the best accredited parts of the teaching.

The triple tradition—i.e., the narrative common to all the three Gospels—contains no less than nine reports of healing acts, including the cases of the leper, the madman of Gergesa, and the dead daughter of Jairus. Then, in most of the reports the action of Jesus is so interwoven with unmistakably authentic words (e.g., in the case of the palsied man) that the two elements cannot be separated: we must take the story as it stands or reject it entirely. That the healing ministry was not only a fact but a great outstanding fact, is attested by the popularity of Jesus, and by the various theories which were invented to account for the remarkable phenomena. Mk. gives a realistic, lifelike description of the connection between healing acts and the fame of Jesus. The cure of a demoniac in the synagogue of Capernaum (Mk. 1.23) creates a sensation even greater than that produced by the discourse of the new preacher. They remark to one another not only on the new doctrine, but also on the authority which Jesus wields over unclean spirits (1.27). The result is that in the evening of the same Sabbath day, after sunset, the people of the town gather at the door of the house where Jesus resides, bringing their sick to be healed (1.32). So, again, on his return to Capernaum, after his preaching tour in Galilee, the report speedily spreading that he had come back, a crowd assembles so large and dense as to make access to him impossible except through the roof of the house (2.1-4). Fresh recollections of the synagogue-sermon, but still more of the Sabbath-evening cures, explain the popular enthusiasm. The theories were various and curious. The relations of Jesus had their theory, not so much indeed about the healing acts as about the healer. Mk. reports (it is one of his realisms) that they thought him out of his senses (3.21). Much benevolence had made him mad. The beneficent deeds must have been there, else the madness would not have been imputed. The Pharisees, more suo, put a less friendly construction on the puzzling phenomena, seeing in them not the acts of a man more endowed with love and with power over diseases (physical and mental) than was good for his own health of body and mind, but the acts of a man in league with the prince of darkness, an incarnation of Beelzebub (Βεελζεβούλ ἔχει, Mk. 3.22). [See BEELZEBUL.] This was a very unlikely theory, as Jesus pointed out; but the thing to be noted is the existence of the theory, showing, as it does, that there were facts imperiously demanding explanation of some sort. Yet another theory, too curious to be an invention of the evangelists who report it (Mk. 6.16 Mt. 14.2), originated in the palace of Herod the murderer of the Baptist, and in his own guilt-haunted mind. This Jesus of whose marvellous works I hear is John risen again, the mysterious powers of the other world manifesting themselves through the resurrected man. The theory is perhaps absurd, yet by its very absurdity it witnesses to extraordinary facts arresting general attention, and forcing their way, however unwelcome, into kings' houses.

The healing ministry of Jesus presents a problem at once for exegesis, for theology, and for science. The question for exegesis is, What do the reports necessarily imply? Was the leper cured, or only pronounced clean? Was the bread that fed the thousands miraculously produced, or drawn forth by the bearing of Jesus from the stores in possession of the crowd; or is the story merely a symbolic embodiment of the life-giving power of Jesus in the spiritual sphere? Was the daughter of Jairus really dead? For theology the question is, What bearing has the healing ministry on the personality of Jesus? Here is certainly something to wonder at, to start the inquiry: What manner of man is this? Is it only a question as to the manner of the man, of a man fully endowed with powers not unexampled elsewhere, at least in kind, though lying dormant in ordinary men? Or do the phenomena take us outside the human into the region of the strictly divine? For science the question is, Can the acts ascribed to Jesus be accounted for by any known laws of nature—e.g., by 'moral therapeutics,' or the emotional treatment of disease? Care must be taken in attempting to answer this question not to understate the facts. In the case of demoniacal possession, for example, it is making the problem too easy to say that that was a merely imaginary disease. The diseases to which the name is applied in the Gospels were in some cases serious enough. The 'demoniac' of Gergesa was a raving madman; the boy at the foot of the hill of Transfiguration was the victim of aggravated epilepsy. The only door of escape open for scientific scepticism in such cases is doubt as to the permanence of the alleged cure.

There is one thing about which we may have comfortable certainty. Whether miraculous or not, whether the works of a mere man, or of one who is a man and more, these healing acts are a revelation of the love of Jesus, a manifestation of his 'enthusiasm of humanity,' to be placed beside the meeting with the publicans of Capernaum as an aid to the understanding of his spirit and aims. By that meeting he showed his interest in a despised class of men; by the healing ministry he showed his interest in a despised part of human nature, the body, and so evinced the healthy catholic nature of his conception of redemption. He was minded to do all the good in the world he could. He was able to heal men's bodies as well as their souls; and he did it, thereby protesting against that pagan notion of the body, as something essentially evil and worthless, which underlies all modes of asceticism, and against a false spiritualism which regards disease of the body as essential to the health of the soul. The healing ministry shows Jesus, not as a thaumaturge bent on creating astonishment, but as in a large, grand, human way the friend of men, bearing by sympathy their sicknesses as well as their sorrows and sins as a burden in his heart.¹

4. The conflict with the religious leaders of Israel, called in the Gospels 'scribes and Pharisees,' formed a

22. Pharisaic hostility. very essential part of the public life of Jesus. It soon brought that life to a tragic end. The Gospel of Lk. by toning down that aspect, omitting much of Christ's polemic against Pharisaism, and mitigating the asperity of what is retained by representing it as uttered under the control of friendly social relations (three feasts in Pharisees' houses peculiar to this Gospel 7:36-50 11:37-44 14:1-24), makes it impossible to form a clear idea of the religious environment of Jesus, of the heroic warfare he had to wage, and of the forces that were at work, moving steadily on towards Calvary. For information on these points, we must turn to the pages of Mt. and Mk., especially of the latter, in which the course of the conflict is vividly depicted. A few anecdotes bring before us realistically Pharisaic hostility, in its rise and progress, and prepare us for the end (Mk. 2:36).

Collision was inevitable. Radical contrariety of view on the whole subject of conduct in religion and in morals was its deepest cause, and the popularity of Jesus as a preacher and a healer was a constant and increasing source of irritation.

The contrast (1 a f.) between Jesus and the scribes, in their respective styles of preaching or teaching, remarked on by the second evangelist, was not unnoticed by the people. If they did not say, How unlike the scribes! they at least showed the new teacher an amount of consideration not accorded to the scribes. Therefore, we are not surprised to learn that when Jesus returned from his preaching tour in Galilee to Capernaum the scribes were in a fault-finding mood (26). They took care, however, to conceal the cause of their chagrin, selecting as the point of assault neither the preaching nor the healing, but the 'blasphemous' word of pardon: 'Son, thy sins be forgiven thee.' The Capernaum mission to the 'publicans and sinners' (2:15-17) supplied the next occasion for offence. These classes had begun to take an interest in Jesus. 'There were many (of them there), and they began to follow him' (2:15). They had doubtless heard the story of the palsied man, and how Jesus had been sympathetic towards the sinner, and had been regarded by the scribes as a blasphemer. They naturally desired to see and hear and know the interesting blasphemer. The offence in this instance lay in eating with such people—i.e., in having comradelike relations with them. It was a complicated many-sided offence: a slight on the national feeling of Jews, who resented whatever reminded them of their political humiliation; an indirect slight on the laws which the classes fraternised with habitually neglected; it was also—though this might not be so clearly perceived—a slight on the prerogative of Israel as an elect people, an evil omen of an approaching revolution when the kingdom of God would be thrown open to all.

Next come Sabbath controversies trivial in occasion, but cutting contemporary Jewish prejudice to the quick, and greatly intensifying the exasperation (2:23-28 3:1-6). These encounters revealed a radical contrariety between Jesus and the scribes in their respective conceptions of the Sabbath. Jesus expressed the difference in a saying preserved only in Mk. (2:27): 'The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath.' The remark implied a manner of conceiving God, man, and religion, different from that in vogue, and it is not surprising that from that day forth dislike began to deepen into hatred, harbouring murderous intentions. The author of Mk. winds up his narrative of the healing of the withered hand with the significant statement: 'the Pharisees went forth and straightway, with the Herodians, took counsel against him, how they might destroy him' (3:6). The reference to the HERODIANS (q.v.), little spoken of in the Gospels, signifies that the Pharisees now began seriously to aim at the life of Jesus, and naturally felt that the assistance of persons having influence at the court would be valuable.

Hereafter the foes of Jesus come before us attacking his healing ministry on a side at which it appeared to them vulnerable. The meeting with the outcasts of Capernaum had given a choice opportunity for a calumnious assault upon his moral character, of which they seem to have taken advantage to the full extent (Mt. 11:19). The cures of demoniacs formed the basis of the attempt to rob him of the fame fairly won by his wonderful works (Mk. 3:22). The cures themselves could not be denied, nor the power they evinced; but was the power necessarily from heaven, might it not be from an opposite quarter? The men who made the malign suggestion knew better; but it was enough for them that the suggestion was plausible. Hence the solemn warning of Jesus against blasphemy—i.e., speaking evil of that which is known to be good (Mk. 3:29).

The next encounter had reference to ritual ablutions (Mk. 7:1-23 Mt. 15:1-20).¹ This time, Jesus assumed the offensive, and exposed the vices inherent

24. Ritual. in the systems represented by the scribes; declaring in effect that the hedging of the Law by the multiplied rules of legal doctors had for its result the setting of the Law aside, and giving as an example the doctrine of Corban in its bearing on the fifth commandment. This was offence enough; but Jesus added to it by an appeal to the multitude, to whom he addressed one of those great emancipating sayings which sweep away the cobwebs of artificial systems better than elaborate argument—that which defiles is not what goeth into the mouth but what cometh out of it. It was a virtual abrogation, not merely of the traditions of the Elders, but even of the ceremonial law of Moses: a proclamation of the great truth that moral defilement alone is of importance.

When it had come to this, a crisis was at hand. Jesus knew it, and retired from the scenes of strife,

25. Jesus sees the crisis. partly to escape for a while from the malice of his foes, and still more to prepare his disciples, by seasonable instructions, for the inevitable end. The time of these later instructions was that of the northerly excursions² already referred to, and their main theme was sacrifices. Jesus began to tell his disciples plainly that he himself must suffer death at the hands of the religious leaders, and that they and all faithful souls must be prepared to endure hardship for truth and righteousness (Mk. 8:30-34 Mt. 16:21-24 Lk. 9:21-23); and from this time forth he devoted much attention towards developing in the twelve the heroic temper demanded by the situation. It was no easy task; for, while the master was continually preoccupied with the cross, the disciples were often thinking vain thoughts. The contrast is depicted in a realistic manner by Mk. 'They were in the way, going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus was going before them: and they were amazed' (10:32). They could not comprehend the intense preoccupation betrayed in the master's manner. It filled them with awe. The sequel explains. The ambitious request of James and John followed soon after, as comic scenes succeed tragic ones in a drama. Hence the need for inculcating such recondit truths of the kingdom as that greatness comes by service; that childlikeness is the condition of entrance into the kingdom; that ambition aspiring to greatness and trampling on weakness is a cursed passion, deserving drowning, with a heavy millstone round the neck, in the deepest part of the sea; and that only through brotherly kindness and charity can one hope to win the favour of God (Mt. 18 Mk. 9:33-50).

² The Gospels speak of two excursions—one to the regions of Tyre and Sidon, another to the neighbourhood of Caesarea Philippi. Even so conservative a critic as Weiss is inclined to resolve the two into one by treating the second feeding as a merely literary duplicate of the first.

During the period of wandering in the north the disciple Peter, the foremost man among the twelve, and usually their spokesman on important occasions, made an eventful declaration concerning the master. Jesus had himself led up to it by introducing into their conversation, as they journeyed towards Caesarea Philippi, the topic: 'Who do men say that I am?' (Mt. 16 13-20 Mk. 8 27-30 Lk. 9 18-21).¹ That general question disposed of, there came a second: And you, who say you that I am? The answer of Peter was: Thou art the Christ (Mk. 8 29). It was apparently the answer which Jesus anticipated and wished; which would imply that he regarded himself as one in whom the Messianic hope of the Jewish people was fulfilled. Can this indeed have been so? Can such an one as Jesus, so wise and good, and so utterly out of sympathy with the religious spirit of his time, have thought himself the Messiah, or even taken any interest in the Messianic idea? It is evident that one occupying the position of Jesus as a religious teacher could not escape having some conscious attitude towards that idea, friendly or indifferent or hostile. And it is certain that he would be utterly unsympathetic towards the Messianic ideas current among the Jews of his time. Pharisaic notions of the Messianic king and kingdom would be as distasteful to him as Pharisaic notions of the Law, of righteousness, of God, and of man. His attitude towards the whole circle of ideas associated with conventional religion was, without doubt, that of a radical sceptic. But he did not live in the region of negation. His way was to discard unwelcome ideas and put better ones in their place. He did this in connection with all the other subjects above mentioned, and doubtless he acted on the same principle in connection with the Messianic hope—this all the more decisively because that hope was not rabbinical but prophetic in its origin, associated with some of the most spiritual aspirations of OT saints and seers, if also finding expression occasionally in materialistic or political representations of the good time coming. By elective affinity Jesus would choose the purest and loftiest elements in prophetic delineations, and out of these form his Messianic idea. From certain indications in the Gospels—the voice from heaven at the Baptism and the Transfiguration, the text of the discourse in the synagogue of Nazareth, the intimate connection between the confession of Peter and the first distinct intimation of the approaching Passion—it may be inferred that Deutero-Isaiah was the chief source of his conception, and that his Messiah was one endowed abundantly with the charisma of love (Is. 61), therefore well-pleasing to God (Is. 42 1), and destined to be a man of sorrow (Is. 53).

Messiah stands for an ideal, the summum bonum embodied in a person. The Jews believed that such a person would come. Jesus might very sincerely share the expectation, as the Baptist did. Could he also regard himself as the coming one? He could not, if a Messianic consciousness implied self-asserting pretensions, or, generally, states of feeling incompatible with a lowly spirit. He could, if the Messianic vocation presented itself to his mind as a duty, rather than as a dignity, as a summons to a career of suffering, a tempting to renunciation rather than to usurpation. So, in fact, it did appear to him. The man of sorrow in Is. 53 is ideal Israel; the faithful in Israel, the men who stand for God and righteousness in an evil world, conceived poetically as an individual. Jesus thought of himself as that individual, the representative of all who live sacrificial and therefore redemptive lives. See MESSIAH.

All goes to bear out this assertion—e.g. the self-designation 'Son of man,' so much used by Jesus. The meaning of this title he never defined any more than he formally defined the name 'Father' applied to God. It is doubtful if OT texts can give us much help towards fixing its import. We must watch the Son of man in the act of so designating himself, defining the name by discriminating use. Doing this, we receive the impression that the title is chosen because it is one that makes no claims. In Aramaic it means simply 'the man.' If it be Messianic, through the use made of it in Daniel and the Book of Enoch, it is furtively so, an incognito. The admiring people frequently called Him 'Son of David,' and the early Christian Church laid stress on the title as an important link in the chain of Messianic proof. Hence the genealogies in Mt. and Lk. Even Paul recognises the Davidic descent as in its own place important (Rom. 1 3). There is no evidence that Jesus repudiated the title;¹ but the title 'Son of man' does show that he regarded the other (as implying physical descent and therefore regal rights) as of little significance. Others said Son of David; he said Son of Man.² See SON OF MAN.

The message from the imprisoned Baptist to Jesus (Mt. 11 2 f. Lk. 7 18 f.) is not without significance in this connection: 'Art thou the coming one?' By some (e.g., Holtzmann in Handcomm.) the question is viewed as the utterance rather of a budding than of a waning faith. But the comments of Jesus on the message and on the man who sent it, bearing a stamp of authenticity upon them and probably taken by the two evangelists from the Book of Logia, demand the latter interpretation. 'Blessed is he who findeth no cause of stumbling in me.' John had found cause of stumbling in Jesus, in whom from the first his prophetic eye had detected an extraordinary person. John's Messiah was to be an iconoclast, a hewer down of barren trees and effete institutions, one coming in the fury of the Lord to destroy by the wind and fire of judgment. Jesus hitherto had been nothing of the kind; rather a preacher of good news, even to the immoral; a healer of disease, a teacher of wisdom, with nothing like a fan in his hand, save one of searching moral criticism on the ways of scribes and Pharisees. Therefore, John began to fear that, after all, this was not the Christ. His fear is a valuable testimony to the kind of Christ Jesus believed in and was: one seeking to save rather than to judge, and just on that account liable to be misunderstood even by a John, and to be despised and rejected by a religious but ungodly world. How far apart the two prophets were in their ideas and tendencies, may be estimated from the striking remark made by Jesus concerning the Baptist: 'the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt. 11 11).

The triumphal entry into Jerusalem by Jesus towards the close of his career may seem to conflict with the view

28. Entry into Jerusalem. set forth above, and to exhibit a Messiah parading his claims. The story belongs to the triple tradition, and must be accepted as historical (Mt. 21 1-11 Mk. 11 1-11 Lk. 19 29-44); but cp HOSANNA. Mt., after his usual manner, represents the whole transaction as happening in order that a certain prophetic oracle might be fulfilled. So he viewed it, and so he wishes his readers to view it; but it does not follow that Jesus rode into the holy city on the foal of an ass with conscious intention to fulfil prophecy. The less intention on his part, the greater the value of any uniformity between prophecy and fact. Action with intention might show that he claimed to be, not that he was, the Messiah. On the other hand, his right to be regarded as the Messiah would have stood where it was though he had entered Jerusalem on foot. The actual mode of entrance could possess at most only the value of a symbol. And Jesus seems to have been in the mood to let it have such value, and that just because it was in harmony with his habit of avoiding display and discouraging vulgar Messianic hopes. There was really no pretentiousness in riding into Jerusalem on the foal of an ass. It was rather the meek and lowly one entering in character. The symbolic act was in harmony with the use of the title 'Son of man,' shunning Messianic pretensions, yet showing himself as the true Messiah in a deeper way. Mk.'s narrative of the incident is to be preferred as preserving most of the primitive simplicity. It is only in his version that Jesus instructs his disciples to tell the man from whom the young ass is being borrowed that it will be returned when he has had his use of it (Mk. 11 3). Some modern commentators, influenced by conventional notions of dignity, will not allow even Mark to put the matter so. But he does; it is one of his realisms.¹

² The passages in which the title is used in an apocalyptic sense seem to breathe a different spirit. They cannot be discussed here.

The thoughts of Jesus, then as always, were humble; but those of his followers were more ambitious, and such as to provoke the ire of those who sought his undoing. They shouted Hosannas in his honour, as to the Son of David through whom the long hoped-for kingdom was about to come. The very children in the streets, according to Mt. (21 15), caught up the cry, to the chagrin of the guardians of conventional proprieties. The enthusiasm of the people who had come up with Jesus to keep the feast of the passover—men and women from Galilee, proud of their prophet and king—was his death-knell. He had come up to Jerusalem fully convinced that he was going to meet death. Therefore, he used his short time to bear a final testimony against plausible falsehood and sham holiness, and for truth and godliness. Many incidents and utterances are packed into that eventful week—the cleansing of the Temple, parables of judgment (Two sons, Vinedressers, Marriage of the king's son), sundry encounters with captious disputants, and a sublime anti-Pharisaic discourse in which the foibles and vices of a degenerate piety are depicted with prophetic plainness and artistic felicity (Mt. 23). During that fatal week last words had to be spoken to disciples, among which was a foreboding reference to the approaching judgment-day of Israel, accompanied by useful hints for their guidance in a perilous time (Mk. 13 Mt. 24 Lk. 21). The tender pathos of the situation is immortalised in the anointing in Bethany (Mt. 26 6-13 Mk. 14 3-9), the holy supper (Mt. 26 26-29 Mk. 14 22-25 Lk. 22 17-20), and the agony in Gethsemane (Mt. 26 36-46 Mk. 14 32-42 Lk. 22 39-46).

The story of the passion is told at great length, with much agreement, though also with many variations, in all the four Gospels, a sure index of the intense interest taken in the tragic theme within the apostolic church. This interest would not be of late growth. When the apostles began to preach Jesus crucified and risen, they would encounter the eager demand, Tell us how it happened! Faith would make three demands for information concerning its object: What did he teach? What did he do? What did he suffer? Some think that the demand for information concerning the teaching came first and was first met. But even those who, like Holtzmann, take this view regard the history of the passion as the nucleus of the narrative department of the evangelic tradition. First the logia, then the passion drama, then the anecdotes of memorable acts. Whether this was the true genetic order of the three masses of oral tradition, which in combination make up our evangelic records, may reasonably be doubted. The passion group perhaps took shape earliest. The apostles would have to tell at once what they knew,—the main facts of the case,—especially when preaching outside Jerusalem. Thus began to form itself the passion-chronicle: the main facts first, then this nucleus gradually gathering accretions of minor incidents, till by the time written records began to be compiled the collection of passion-memorabilia had assumed the form which it bears in, for example, the Gospel of Mk. The presumption is that the collection as it stands there is the truth, or at least the truth as far as it could be ascertained.

For modern criticism the story, even in its most historic version, is not pure truth, but truth mixed with doubtful legend. Still, even when it is examined with a critical microscope, as it has recently been by Dr. Brandt,¹ not a few of the relative incidents stand the test. Betrayal by one of the twelve, desertion by all of them, denial by Peter, death-sentence under the joint responsibility of Jewish rulers and Roman procurator, assistance in carrying the cross from Simon of Cyrene, crucifixion on a hill called Golgotha, the crime charged indicated by the significant inscription on the cross-beam, 'King of the Jews,'² death if not preceded by a prayer for the murderers, or by the despairing cry 'My God, my God,' at least heralded by a loud voice. In these eight particulars we have the skeleton of the story, all that is needful to give the passion its tragic interest, or even to form the basis for theological constructions. The details omitted—the process before the Sanhedrin, the interviews with Pilate and Herod, the mockery of the soldiers, the preferential release of Barabbas, the sneers of passers-by, the two thieves, the parting of the raiment, the words from the cross, the preternatural concomitants of death—are more or less of the nature of accessories, enhancing the impressiveness of the picture, suggesting additional lessons, but not changing the character of the event.

Still, even accessories are not to be lightly sacrificed. Critical estimates are to be received with caution even in a historical interest, and to measure their value it is important to have a clear idea about the nature of the interest taken by the primitive church in the story of the passion. Now, there can be no doubt that along with sympathy with the fate of a beloved Master went a theoretic or dogmatic interest, at least in a rudimentary form. There was a desire to harmonise the passion with faith in the Messiahship of Jesus. This was obviously a vital matter for disciples. They could not continue to believe in Jesus as the Christ unless they could satisfy themselves that he might be the Christ, the cross notwithstanding; nor could their faith be triumphant unless they could further satisfy themselves that he was all the more certainly the Christ just because he was crucified. The words of the Master concerning suffering as the appointed lot of all faithful souls might help them to attain this insight. With this doctrine as a key, they would see new meanings in OT texts, and gradually learn from histories, Psalms, and prophecies that the path appointed for the godly, and therefore above all for the Messiah, was a path of sacrifice. Thenceforth union between OT experiences and teaching and the incidents of the passion would become proofs of the Messiahship of Jesus. The offence of the cross would be turned into an apology for faith in the crucified.

² This points to Messianic pretensions imputed or confessed. But such pretensions had two aspects, a religious and a political. It was the religious aspect that was dealt with in the trial before the Sanhedrin as reported by the Synoptists; but of course it would be the political aspect that the Sanhedrists brought under the notice of Pilate. The Messianic idea would have no interest for him except in so far as it involved a claim to temporal power.

Were those primitive apologists content with correspondence between texts and undeniable facts? Did they invent 'facts' to suit Hebrew oracles, so as to bring out correspondence even in curious details and make the apologetic as convincing as possible? There was certainly a temptation to do so, and we are not entitled a priori to assume that they did not yield to the temptation in any instance. On the other hand, we must be on our guard against too hastily assuming the contrary. The probability is that, on the whole, facts suggested texts, instead of texts creating facts. The reasonableness of this statement may be illustrated by an example taken from the history of the infancy in Mt. The last of several prophetic citations in that chapter is, 'He shall be called a Nazarene' (223). See NAZARETH. The fact that Nazareth was the home of Jesus is independently certain. It is equally certain that, but for the fact, the supposed prophetic citation would never have occurred to any one's mind; for it is the weakest link in the chain of prophetic evidence for the Christ-hood of Jesus. This instance suggests that what faith was busy about in these early years was not the manufacturing of history, but the discovering in evagelic facts, however minute, the prophetic fulfilments which are sometimes so far-fetched as to make it inconceivable how they could ever have been thought of unless the facts had gone before. This general observation may be applied to some of the most pathetic incidents in the passion history—the prayer for forgiveness, the taunts of passers-by, the casting of lots for possession of the garments.

If legendary elements of a supernatural character found their way into the traditions, it is not to be wondered at in connection with events which appealed so powerfully to the imagination of believers. The thing to be noted is that when criticism has done its work the passion narratives remain in their main details history, not legend. A history how profoundly significant as well as moving! With its theological import we have here no concern; but we may not leave such a theme without briefly indicating its ethical lessons. The crucifixion of Jesus exhibits in a uniquely impressive manner the destiny of righteousness in this world. He was crucified not by accident, not altogether or even mainly through misunderstanding, but because his wisdom and goodness were inconvenient and troublesome. The passion history further sets before us a story not of fate merely, but of love. It is the story of one who was willing to die. He knew more or less distinctly what was to happen, consented to it, and was helped to do it by the thought that out of the wrong and evil befalling himself good to others would come. In proof of this statement, it is sufficient to point to the Lord's supper. The passion-history, finally, encourages large hope for the world.

Christianity could not have entered on its victorious career unless the followers of the Crucified had believed that he not only died but also rose again. This is acknowledged even by those who, like Dr. Ferdinand Baur, have themselves no faith in the resurrection. The primitive disciples believed that their Master rose 'on the third day,' and that he would soon come to the earth again; and this faith and hope became the common possession of the apostolic church. The faith and the hope both find support and justification in the words of Jesus as reported by the evangelists. Sad predictions of approaching doom have added to them the cheering words, 'and shall rise again' (Mk. 9₃₁ and parallels). Many sayings promise the coming of the Son of man in glory, and that speedily, even within the lifetime of the present generation. These sayings present one of the hardest problems for the student of the Gospels: on one side a critical problem which has to deal with the question how far the words of Jesus have been coloured by the hopes of the apostolic age; on another side, an exegetical one having for its task to interpret these words in harmony with others which seem to imply not only a delayed parousia (parables of the Ten Virgins, the Upper Servant playing the Tyrant, and the Unjust Judge), but also an indefinitely protracted Christian era (parables representing the kingdom as subject to the law of growth—the Sower, the Wheat and Tares, the Mustard seed, and, above all, the Seed growing gradually, peculiar to Mk. 4₂₆₋₂₉ and his most valuable distinctive contribution to the stock of evagelic traditions). Though some of the relative logia belong to the later and less accredited stratum of tradition, there is no reason to doubt their genuineness. Jesus seems to have had two ways of speaking about the future—partly because, as he himself confessed, he had no clear vision of time's course (Mk. 13₃₂); partly owing to the purpose his utterances were meant to serve. Some of them were promises meant to cheer (Mk. 9₂ and parallels); some, didactic statements bearing on the nature of the kingdom of God (Mk. 4₂₆₋₂₉). In the former the advent is appropriately represented as near; in the latter it is by tacit implication indefinitely remote.

The words of Jesus concerning the future show limitation of vision. In other directions we may discover indications that he was the child of his time and people. But his spiritual intuitions are pure truth, valid for all ages. God, man, and the moral ideal cannot be more truly or happily conceived. Far from having outgrown his thoughts on these themes, we are only beginning to perceive their true significance. How long it will be before full effect shall be given to his radical doctrine of the dignity of man! How entirely in accord with the moral order of the world, as interpreted by the whole history of mankind, his doctrine of sacrifice as at once the penalty and the power of righteousness in an evil world! The purity of the doctrine may seem to be compromised by occasional references to the reward of sacrifice, e.g., 'Great is your reward in heaven' (Mt. 5₁₂); things renounced are to be received back an hundredfold (Mk. 10₃₀). But the idea of reward cannot be eliminated from ethics. The heroic man is and must be blessed. The apocalyptic presentation of the reward in the Gospels is a matter of form. The essential truth is that it is ever well with the righteous.

JETHER (יֶתֶר; יֶתְרָה [BAL]).

1. Ex. 4₁₈ EVmg. (יֶתֶר [BAL]), another form of JETHRO (q.v.). Sam. and some MSS have יֶתֶר.
2. Gideon's first-born son (Judg. 8₂₀).
3. The father of Amasa (1 K. 2₅ 32 [om. A]) by Abigail. In 2 S. 17₂₅ (MT) he is called ITHRA (יִתְרָה; יֶתְרָה; יֶתְרָה [Jos.]); but יֶתֶר [BA; so B in 1 Ch.], and described, according to the best reading, as a Jezreelite. In 1 Ch. 2₁₇, however, he appears as an Ishmaelite; hence Thienius, Wellhausen, Driver, Klostermann, Budde, Lühr, H. P. Smith read יִתְרָה in Sam.

But the rival reading יְהִי is less likely to be a conjectural emendation (see ABIGAIL, 2; JEZREEL 1, 2).

- 4. A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch. 2:32). See JERAHMEEL, § 2.
- 5. A Judahite, 1 Ch. 4:17 (עֶשֶׂרֶי [B]).
- 6. An Asherite, 1 Ch. 7:38 (עֶשֶׂרֶי [B], עֶשֶׂרֶי [L]), see ITHRAN, 2.
- 7. See JETHETH.

JETHETH (יְהִי); Jetheth, OS⁽²⁾ 1313) one of the 'dukes' of Edom, Gen. 36:40 (יעֶשֶׂר [A], יעֶשֶׂר [D^{sil}EL]), 1 Ch. 1:51 (יעֶשֶׂר [B], -עֶש [A], -עֶר [L]).

In view of the readings of עֶש it is plausible to read יְהִי, which occurs also as a Jerahmeelite and Judahite name (see JETHER). Cp GENEALOGIES 1, § 5. S. A. C.

JETHLAH, RV ITHLAH (יְהִי־לָה; צֵי־לָהָא [B], יעֶשֶׂלָא [A], יֶֹ. [L], יעֶשֶׂלָא [OS 26878], an unidentified site in Danite territory (Josh. 19:42), associated with Zorah, Eshtaol, Bethshemesh, Aijalon, and Timnah.

JETHRO (יְתִרוֹ), Jithro, § 77; cp Sab. יְתִרוֹ; either shortened from Jithron [see ITHRAN and cp Ithra in JETHER, 3], or mispelt for Jithru [cp GASHMU]; יֶֹשֶׁר [BAL]). Father of Moses' wife, ZIPPORAH, Ex. 3:1 [but עֶֹ does not give the priest's name], 4:18 [see JETHER, 1], 18:1 ff. All these passages belong to E; the first and third of them add 'priest of Midian.' This was most probably interpolated from Ex. 2:16 (J) by the redactor (R), who also removed the discrepant name 'Hobab' from that passage, and thus produced a superficial harmony, against which, however, Nu. 10:29 and Judg. 4:11 protest (see HOBAB).

The futile attempts of the ancients to reconcile the discrepancies of the documents require no elaborate consideration. Josephus (Ant. ii. 12:1) says that Jethro was a surname of Reuel (יְהִי, 'superiority'); this seems to have influenced עֶֹ in Ex. 2:16:18. Targ. Jon. in Ex. 2:18 represents REUEL [g.v.] as Zipporah's grandfather. In the former case Hobab, in the latter both Hobab and Jethro are brothers-in-law of Moses. Apart from other considerations, the only biblical sense of יְהִי is 'father-in-law,' though יְהִי doubtless can be used in the looser sense of 'wife's relation'.¹

There is no anachronism in the description given of Jethro or Hobab in Exodus as a priest, and by implication as a sheikh of the Midianites; such dignitaries there must have been in ancient Arabia. Though we cannot adopt Hommel's statement that the ideas and language (and particularly the ritual terms) of the Priestly Code (P) are largely influenced by instruction which Moses received from the 'Köhän Midian,' there need be no a priori objection to the view that Arabian culture impressed its mark, at more than one period, on the Israelites. It is certainly remarkable that such an early record as JE represents the Midianite as Moses' instructor in the art of legislation (Ex. 18), and as having been asked by Moses to be his guide in the desert, for which a good reward is held out to him in the Promised Land (Nu. 10:29-32).² As Judg. 1:16 represents, Hobab (עֶֹ [B]) did actually accompany Moses;³ 'Hobab' has evidently dropped out of the text and should be restored, though possibly both here and in the other passages where our text has 'Hobab' we should change 'Hobab' into 'Jonadab' (see HOBAB). The clan called 'b'ne Hobab' is also designated 'Kenite'; it might, however, with sufficient accuracy have been called 'Midianite,' the line of demarcation between the tribes in S. Palestine not being very definite (see AMALEK, MIDIAN). Not impossibly, however, the original text called Jethro or Hobab a Misrite (i.e., virtually a N. Arabian); the readings of MT may be corrupt (see KENTITES). It should be observed that according to the tradition Jethro was a worshipper of Yahwè (Ex. 18:9 12 [E]).

² Ex. 18, at all events, is misplaced, Israel having already arrived at the Mount of God (cp 5:6). But the Mount of God is Horeb (Sinai) near which Jethro lived (cp 3:1), which makes the latter's request to return to his own land, vs. 6:27, unnecessary; cp similarly Nu. 10:30. See EXODUS 1, § 5.

³ See Moore and Budde. This must have been expressed in the passage which Nu. 10:29-32 represents. The redactor, to avoid inconsistency with Ex. 18:27 has stopped abruptly at v. 32.

It is interesting to notice that Sha'ib occurs as the name of a Wady on the E. of the Jordan, opposite Jericho (see Baed. 8), רֶֹ and NIMRIM); and that the diminutive Sha'ib is the name given by Mohammed to Jethro. But the name Sha'ib may after all be distinct from Hobab, and in any case the Mohammedan legends have no historical value. Cp Ew. Hist. 2:44, n. 2.

4. b. Stimel, a division of Gershonite Levites, 1 Ch. 23:10 f. (אֲשׁוּבָא [BL; once in A]); cp (1) above and see GENEALOGIES 1, § 7 [v].

5. b. Rehoboam, 2 Ch. 11:19 (אֲשׁוּבָא [B], om. A, אֲשׁוּבָא [L]).

JEUZ (יְעוּז; יְעוּז), see UZ; יַעֲוֹזָא [B], יַעֲוֹזָא [A], יַעֲוֹזָא [L], a name in a genealogy of Benjamin (g.v., § 9, ii. b); 1 Ch. 8:10 f. See JQR 11:105, § 3.

JEW (יְהוּדִי; yehūdi; Aram. יְהוּדַי, yehūdai; Ass. Ya'u-da-ai, 'Ioudaios, Judæus', i.e., a man of Yehūdāh—i.e., JUDAH, [g.v.]. JEHUDI [g.v.] and the fem. JUDITH (יְהוּדִית), yehūdith) are used as proper names; but the form Jehudijah (יְהוּדִיָּה, 1 Ch. 4:18 f.) cannot be relied upon (see JEHUDIJAH). The adj. 'Ioudaios', 'Jewish,' occurs in 2 Macc. 8:11, etc., Tit. 1:14; the adv. 'Ioudaios' in Gal. 2:14; the verb 'Ioudaizest' (in Esth. 8:17 יְהוּדַיִּים, 'became Jews'), Gal. 2:14; the substantive 'Ioudaizōs' ('religion of the Jews,' 'Jews' religion') in 2 Macc. 2:21 8:1 14:38 Gal. 1:13 f.

1. A subject of the kingdom of Judah, 2 K. 16:6 25:25 Jer. 32:12 38:19 40:12 41:3 43:9 ('Jewish men'—men of Judah); 44:1 52:28-30.

The date of the passages does not come into consideration, for the Assyrian phrase Ya'uhasi Ya'udai ('Ahaaz the Judahite') in Tiglath-pileser's inscription shows that יהוּדִי was already current in the sense of 'man of the land of Judah.' Jer. 34:9 is not included; יהוּדִי has grown out of יְהוּדִי (see Giesebr. ad loc.).

2. A Hebrew of the Babylonian or Persian province of Judah, or of the Maccabean state, Zech. 8:23 Neh. 1:2 4:1 f. [333 f.] 4:12 [6] 1 Macc. 8:20 23 etc.

3. A member of the Jewish race, broadly taken, Ezra 4:12 23 5:5 6:8 etc., Esth. 2:5 3:4 6:5 13:85 etc., Dan. 3:8.

The word is used in the NT, chiefly in the plur., to denote—

1. Jews as distinct from Gentiles or proselytes, or Samaritans, Mk. 7:3 Jn. 26:13 4:22 5:1 6:4 7:2 19:40 42 Acts 2:10 21:39 24:24 (Drusilla, a 'Jewess'). Similarly of Jewish

2. Use in NT. Christians (Acts 16:1 'a Jewess who believed'), Gal. 2:13 cp Jn. 8:31.

2. Of 'Israelites indeed'—Jews worthy of the name, Rom. 2:28 f. Rev. 2:9 3:9.

3. Of Jews, as antagonistic to Jesus or to the Gospel, Mt. 28:15 Rom. 2:17 2 Cor. 11:24 1 Thess. 2:14 and especially Jn. 6:41 52 8:48 57 9:18 10:10 11:9 37 33 36 12:9 11. Cp Zabn, Einh. 2:554. 'Jewess' occurs twice, Acts 16:1 24:24.

JEZEBEL (יְזַבְעֵל; יezabēl [BAL]. The two explanations in Ges. Thes. are 'non-habitation,' i.e., 'chaste'; and 'island of habitation'—perhaps a title of Tyre. But (against 1) a negative participle יז is unprovable [see ICHABOD, note, and cp NAMES, § 45], and (against 2) זבל in a personal name will naturally bear its well-attested sense of 'exaltation.' The first element יז should be explained as in ICHABOD, JEZER, ITHAMAR. König's explanation, 'exalted isle' [Exalt. T. 10 190 (Jan. '99)], so far as 'isle' goes, is surely wrong. So, too, is DHM's theory that זבל is an intentional alteration of the Phoen. בַּעַלְזַבְלַת (Baal exalts, or is a husband?) so that it should mean 'un-exalted.' An artificial etymology, 'what filth,' is implied in MT of 2 K. 9 37 [זבל = רימן; see below].

Daughter of Ethbaal of Tyre (see AHAB), wife of Ahab (1 K. 16 31 18 41 19 19 1 f. 21 5 ff. 2 K. 9 7 ff.). ATHALIAH (g.v.), queen of Judah, was her daughter. Nothing more clearly shows Ahab's thoroughly political instinct than his marriage with this Tyrian princess. It is not so clear, however, whether he foresaw the religious consequences of the step. Solomon had married foreign women, and erected special sanctuaries for them; but the religious influence of no one of these was supreme. Ahab was perhaps a monogamist, like Jeroboam. At any rate, Jezebel had too proud a nature to be content to worship her own god with a few Tyrian sojourners; the Tyrian Baal-worship must have equal rights with the worship of Yahwē. According to the Elijah-narratives Jezebel destroyed all the prophets of Yahwē except ELIJAH [g.v.], and even that brave prophet had to seek refuge from her in Horeb. She is made responsible for the judicial murder of NABOTH [g.v.], and Elijah's legendary biographer connects her dreadful end with a curse pronounced on her by Elijah on the occasion of Naboth's death (1 K. 21 23). The dramatic tale of Jehu's entrance into Jezreel need not be repeated (see JEHU).

It is worth while, however, to relieve the Deuteronomic compiler of Kings from the tastelessly savage words of MT of 2 K. 9 37. The true reading can probably be recovered from ⓄL (cp K^o.'s note), 'And the carcass of Jezebel shall be like the carcass of Naboth, and there shall be none to say, Woe is me.'

In Rev. 2 20 there seems to be implied a misinterpretation of words of Jehu in 2 K. 9 22. The name 'Jezebel' is given to a false prophetess,¹ who had influence in the church of Thyatira, and is accused of seducing Christians to commit fornication, and to eat things offered to idols. 'Fornication' is probably meant literally. Whether a party of false teachers is here personified, or whether (as Bousset and Schürer suppose) an individual is meant, is disputed. At any rate, the adherents of Jezebel and the NICOLAITANS (g.v.) represent the same antinomian tendency (cp 2 Pet. 2 18).

1. Originally a clan-name, analogous to Israel, Jerahmeel, Ishmael; then the name of 1 city and district; lastly, that of the long, deep vale dominated by the city of Jezreel.¹

Of the existence of the Jezreelite clan in N. Palestine, we have no direct biblical evidence; but it may be surmised that the fact recorded bonibatically in king Merneptah's famous inscription (see ISRAEL, § 7, end) was the extinction of a tribe called, not Israel, but Jezreel. Renouf's conjecture that the stele actually spoke of 'Jezreel' is not indeed confirmed (see Spiegelberg's report, and EXODUS i., § 2); but it remains possible that the spelling Isr'il (= Israel) is due to a mistake of the ear such as was, at any rate, often made by Greek scribes. The place is assigned in Josh. 19 18 (יעזרעל [B], יezpael [L]) to Issachar. We know from Judg. 5 that this tribe suffered greatly from Canaanitish preponderance (cp ISSACHAR); and since Taanach, Ibleam, and Megiddo on the one side and Beth-shean on the other are represented in Judg. 1 27 as Canaanitish enclaves, we may, for geographical reasons, assume that Jezreel, though coveted by Issachar, also long remained Canaanitish.

Josh. 17 16 probably confirms this view; we read there of the Canaanites of Beth-shean and of the עגב (emēk) of Jezreel as having formidable 'chariots of iron.'

It may be that one of the fruits of the victory commemorated in Judg. 5 was the conquest of Jezreel (Budde, Ri.-Sam. 47). In the time of Saul, at any rate, Jezreel was Israelitish; not far from it ('by the fountain [of Hārōd] which is by Jezreel') was the camp of the Israelites before the great battle in which Saul was said to be slain (1 S. 29 1; see, however, SAUL, § 4). The district of Jezreel is included in the kingdom of Ishbaal (2 S. 28 f., but the text is doubtful).² It was afterwards the residence of Ahab and, after him, of Joram; hard by was the vineyard of NABOTH (1 K. 21 1), where Joram, Ahab's second son, was slain by Jehu (2 K. 9 21 ff.). It was at the palace of Jezreel that the usurper had his famous encounter with Jezebel (2 K. 9 30-37). According to Hosea, vengeance would be taken on Jehu for the bloodshed of Jezreel, and where should this be but in the vale of Jezreel? At the same time—so Hosea interpreted to himself the divine message of which he was conscious—the guilt-laden kingdom of N. Israel would come to an end (Hos. 1 4 f.; v. 11 [2] is much later).

¹ For slightly different views of the development see We. CH 254, n. 2; Bu. Ri.-Sa. 46, n. 1. The passages quoted by We. to prove that Jezreel was originally the name of a district, not of a city, are 1 S. 29 1 11 2 S. 29 44. The inference is not justifiable; the clan of Jezreelites not merely occupied a district; they must have had one chief settlement called after their own name. That 'Jezreel' was the name of a city in David's time is certain (Bu. rightly quotes 1 S. 25 43). Both We. and Bu., however, seem to misunderstand 1 S. 29 11 δ, where, comparing Ⓞ, we should read ופל עזרה להלחם ביהודה, 'and the Philistines went up to fight against Israel'—the equivalent of the statement in 31 1 (cp. the duplicate statements in 28 4, 29 1; see GILBOA). In 2 S. 29 ואלו יהודה ('and over Jezreel') may be a corruption of ואלו גירזית ('and over the Girzites,' or 'Girshites'); see GIRZITES. In 2 S. 4 4 'Jezreel' evidently means the district of Jezreel.

The next time the place is mentioned, it is called Esdraelon (Judith 3 9 4 6 7 3), and Esdraelon is the name given by Eusebius (OS 267 52; Jer. [133 14] omits the name) to 'a very notable village in the great plain between Scythopolis and Legio'; the Jerusalem Itinerary locates it 10 R. m. from Scythopolis. In the times of the Crusaders the Franks knew it as Gerin (Gerinum; William of Tyre, 2226); in 1173 the Jewish traveller, Benjamin of Tudela, calls it Zarein. From Saladin's time onwards Zer'in has no doubt been the Arabic name of the village which has succeeded the ancient Jezreel (Zer'in for Jezreel, as Bétin for Bethel). Strange indeed it is, that a place once so important should have such a miserable modern representative! The 'tower' referred to in 2 K. 9 17, which was a part of the citadel, has long since disappeared. The ruined tower of the squalid modern village is not ancient; but the view from it compensates one to some extent for disappointments.

'Westward, the Carmel ridge may be followed until it terminates at the sea; in the distant east the Jordan line is made out easily; Gilboa seems near enough for you to strike it with a stone that the missile would rebound and reach Little Hermon before it fell. The great mountain walls of Bashan and of Eglon ('Ajlūn) rise in the far east, and seem to forbid any search beyond them' (Harper, In Scripture Lands, 285).

In fact, Jezreel itself stands high; you would hardly guess how high, as you approach it riding across the gently swelling plain of Esdraelon. Looking eastward, however, you see that there is a steep, rocky descent on that side into the valley of Gilboa, with the remains of wine-presses cut in the rock, which, with a white marble sarcophagus (found by Guérin), are the only relics of any antiquity at Zer'in.

We noticed just now (in Josh. 17 16) the phrase 'the 'emeḳ (עמק) of Jezreel'; the meaning of this has now to be stated clearly. An עמק ('emeḳ) is a

2. Vale.

'wide avenue running up into a mountainous country'; the 'emeḳ of Jezreel ought therefore to mean, not the great central plain (עמק, biḳ'āh) W. of Jezreel, the gate of which is Megiddo, but the broad deep vale E. of Jezreel (between the so-called Little Hermon and Gilboa), descending to the Jordan, the gate of which is Jezreel. It should be borne in mind that the later phrase 'the plain of Esdraelon' (Judith 18) is less correct than the early phrases 'the plain of MEGIDDO' [q. v.] and 'the Great Plain'.¹ We do not mean that the 'great plain' could not be designated the plain of Jezreel, for Jezreel looks two ways—along the 'emeḳ or 'vale' to the Jordan, and across the biḳ'āh or 'plain' to Mount Carmel. But if one place has more claim than another to give its name to the great central plain, it is Megiddo—at least if MEGIDDO [q. v.] is Lejjūn or Legio, which looks as if we were set there for the very purpose of guarding the chief entrance of the plain from Sharon. The 'Vale of Jezreel,' then, is the fit name for that broad deep vale with its gate at Jezreel, which 'three miles after it has opened round Gilboa to the south . . . suddenly drops over a bank some 300 feet high into the valley of the Jordan' (GASm. HC 357). Near the edge of this bank rises the mound which covers the ruins of Bethshean, in a position not surpassed for strength by any in Palestine. See BETH-SHEAN. T. K. C.

JIPHTAH-EL, RV IPHTAH-EL, VALLEY OF (יִפְתָּח־עֵל), cp JERUTHAH; ΓΑΙΦΑΗΛ [B], ΓΑΙ ΙΕΦΘΑΗΛ [AL], a place on the N. border of Zebulun towards Asher, Josh. 19 14 27 (ΓΑΙ ΚΑΙ ΦΘΑΙΗΛ [B], ΓΑΙ ΕΦΘΑΗΛ [L]). It has been identified with the Jotapata so well known from Josephus's account of the siege during the first Roman war (B/ iii. 7), the name of which in the Mishna is יודפת, Yodēphath (Neub. Geogr. 203; cp 193, n. 6). The names Iphtah and Yodēphath (for another form see JOTBAH) may seem dissimilar; but the old Hebrew names passed through strange vicissitudes; the transformation of Iphtah is not impossible. Jotapata is no doubt the modern Jefāt, a little to the NE. of Kānet el-Jelil, and due N. of Sepphoris. To the NW. of Jefāt lies Kabūl; see CABUL, col. 615. According to Robinson (BR 3107), the 'valley' of Iphtah-el is the great Wādy 'Abillūn, which takes its rise SW. of Jefāt; but this is not plausible. Should we not read, for י, נעק? The letters נעק may have fallen out owing to the proximity of פ. The 'round and lofty' Tell Jefāt, which 'is only connected with the hills to the N. of it by a low saddle,' would form an excellent landmark. For a less probable identification (Conder's), see DABBASHETH. T. K. C.

JOAB (יֹאָב), 'Yahwè is father'? cp JOAH, ABIJAH, ELIAB. A possible derivation from יאב must not be disregarded; cp Nö. ZDMG, '88, p. 477; ωαβ [BAL]).

1. b. ZERUIAH [q. v.], David's nephew and general (1 S. 28 6 2 S. 2 13 etc., 1 K. 1 7 etc., 1 Ch. 2 16; ωβαβ [A, Ps. 60 title], ωα [A, in 1 Ch. 11 26]). We do not know whether he, like his elder brother Abishai,¹ followed the fortunes of David from the first. We first hear of Joab in connection with the encounter between the men of Abner and Ishbaal and the men of David at Gibeon (2 S. 2 12 ff.; see HELKATH-HAZZURIM), and the vengeance which he took² upon ABNER [q. v.] for the violent death of his brother Asahel (2 S. 2 22-26) had consequences which were helpful to the claims of David, though David himself (according to 2 S. 3 31-39; cp 1 K. 2 31 ff.) did not recognise this. It was the exploit of this warrior at the capture of Zion which, according to 1 Ch. 11 4-9, was rewarded by his promotion to be a head

¹ So 1 Ch. 2 16; in 2 S. 2 18, however, he stands first.

(יִשָּׁר) and commander (צָר).¹ In 2 S. 20 23 (cp 8 16) we find him placed 'over all the host of Israel.' But through what events one who began as the mere leader of a band (cp 2 S. 3 22) rose to the generalship (20 23; cp 8 16) we are not told in 2 S., and, unlike Abishai, Joab is not referred to in the scanty notices of the war with the Philistines.

Passing over the wars of David and his complicity in the death of Uriah (2 S. 11), we meet with him next in the account of Absalom's exile and rebellion. Here he is represented as standing on terms of close intimacy with David and as prevailing on the king to recall his banished son (14 1 ff.), although it was not until Absalom had taken severe measures that he was able to procure him an interview with the king.² In the fight against Absalom (2 S. 18) a third of the people is put under his charge, although from v. 16 he would seem to have been at the head of the army. That he was directly responsible for the death of Absalom (vv. 10-14) is rendered doubtful (1) by the conflicting statement in v. 15 which ascribes the deed to his armour-bearers, (2) by his retaining influence over the king, and (3) by the remarkable fact that no allusion is made to the deed in David's final charge (1 K. 2 1 ff.) or elsewhere. But, however this may be, the king felt himself obliged to promise AMASA [q.v.] the post which Joab had held.

On the occasion of Sheba's revolt (which the MT, according to its present arrangement, places immediately after Absalom's rebellion), the command, in the absence of Amasa, was given to Abishai, the king fully realising that Joab would naturally follow his brother (2 S. 20). 'The fact that he then takes the leadership into his own hands is so much a matter of course that it does not need to be mentioned.'³ Joab finds an opportunity of ridding himself of his rival Amasa, and successfully quells the revolt.

In David's frontier wars Joab was the foremost figure; it is true he is unmentioned in the panegyric, ch. 8 1-14, but the account in ch. 10 probably gives a more historical view. The later tradition may have deepened the horrors of his campaign in Edom,⁴ but that his policy was thorough is shown by the deadly hatred which arose between Edom and Israel. An equally successful campaign was carried out against Ammon and the allied Arameans (ch. 10; see DAVID, § 8 b), and in the following year Rabbath-Ammon, the capital, with all its spoil, fell into his hands (ch. 11: 12 26-31).

In ch. 24 (a later but pre-deuteronomic narrative; cp SAMUEL II., § 6) Joab is ordered to number the people. The unwillingness he exhibits is characteristically treated in 1 Ch. 21 6, Levi and Benjamin counted he not among them, for the king's word was abominable (so EVV) to Joab.⁵

Finally, at the close of David's life, Joab sided with Adonijah in his attempt to gain the crown (1 K. 1 7 ff.), and upon the accession of Solomon was slain by Benaiah at the altar-horns and buried in his house 'in the wilderness' (1 K. 2 29 ff.). See ZERUIAH, ATROTH-BETH-JOAB.

A recollection of his name may be preserved in 2 and 3 below; otherwise he passes out of history. In the list given by BAL at the close of 1 K. 2 a certain אֲבִי (AB, but אֲבִיָּב L, cp also chap. 46) son of Joab is cited as captain of the army, ¹ The Chronicler's account of the way in which he rose to distinction ignores the important part which he played in countering Abner; the Abner episode is, in fact, omitted in Chron.

² It is difficult to place much confidence in the notice (14 22b) that two years elapsed before Absalom saw David's face. vv. 25-27 are an acknowledged gloss; but since v. 28b is an almost identical repetition of v. 24b, it is probable that v. 28 is also a gloss, and v. 29 follows immediately upon v. 24.

³ So, at any rate, Bu. (SBOT), in opposition to the almost general opinion that for 'Abishai' (v. 6) we should read 'Joab' (so Pesh.). If, as has been suggested elsewhere (see A/S/L 16 168 [1900]), the connection between the revolts of Sheba and Absalom and the story of Amasa's murder are both due to a redactor, it is probable that Pesh. is right, and that the alteration to Abishai occurred after the two narratives had been joined, and was, indeed, rendered absolutely necessary by 19 13 [14].

⁵ 1 Ch. 27 24 says that Joab 'began to number, but finished not.'

but unfortunately there is no further evidence to support this statement.¹

In reviewing Joab's history it is difficult to gain a clear insight into his relation to David. Powerful and indispensable as he was, he was replaced by Amasa at the close of Absalom's rebellion, which throws doubt upon the suggestion that the increase in Joab's influence over David dates from the episode of Uriah. If David was afraid of Joab because of his acquaintance with the true facts of Uriah's death, he could certainly have found means to get rid of him. Joab's treachery to Uriah is not too clearly stated in 2 S. 11 15 ff.,² and although Joab may have justly incurred blame, it is difficult to see why his brother Abishai (to whom David owed so much, cp, e.g., 2 S. 21 17) should be included in the invectives against the 'sons of Zeruiah' (cp 2 S. 3 39 16 10 f. [see Klo.], 19 20 [21] ff.).

There is a consensus of critics that the injunction ascribed to David in 1 K. 2 5 f. was written after his time to excuse the killing of Joab and Shimei (see DAVID, § 12). Here, as in the section 2 28-34, Joab's fate is represented as a just retribution for the murder of Abner, 'captain of the host of Israel,' and of Amasa, 'captain of the host of Judah.' The special stress laid upon the innocence of David,³ as well as the reiterated condemnation of the 'sons of Zeruiah,' reveals the tendency to idealise the character of the great national hero which characterised later ages (cp DAVID, § 9).

1. b. Ahaziah, king of Judah (B.C. 835-796), who was hidden during the usurpation of Athaliah and crowned at the age of seven (2 K. 12:2 Ch. 24).

On the two parallel accounts of the revolution which placed Joash on the throne, (a) 2 K. 11:1-12:18b-20, (b) ib. vv. 13-18a, see Stade, ZATW 5:280 f. (85), who is followed by Benzinger and Kittel. The former, which emphasizes the religious motives of the revolution, may have come from a work on the history of the temple. The account in 2 Ch. 22:10-23:21 is largely recast; but, where this is not the case, can be used as a parallel text to (a).

We know but little of Joash's long reign. Somehow the temple had been allowed to get into disrepair, and Joash made a new arrangement for the due preservation of the fabric, the priests being made responsible for this. The temple is evidently regarded as a royal possession. A statement of more historical interest (turned to his own account by the Chronicler, 1 Ch. 24:23b) is concerned with the inroad of the Syrians under Hazael, who only departed on receiving a large tribute. No doubt this inroad stands in close connection with Hazael's successful wars against Jehu or Jehoahaz. Joash met his death at the hands of assassins, which was possibly an act of private vengeance for the cruel murder of Zechariah b. Jehoiada, the priest. (This is suggested by the statement of 2 Ch. 24:25, which may be not wholly incorrect.) See ISRAEL, § 31; CHRONICLES, § 8; CHRONOLOGY, § 35.

2. b. Jehoahaz (797-783 B.C.?), king of Israel (2 K. 13:10-14 2 Ch. 25). One of the greatest of the Israelitish kings. His success over BENHADAD [q. v.] b. Hazael (which is said to have been foretold by Elisha, 2 K. 13:14 f.) and his victory over Amaziah, followed by his breaking down of the wall of Jerusalem, are the most prominent facts of his reign. That Judah was reduced to vassalage was the result, according to the narrative, of an audacious challenge of Amaziah b. Joash (1), king of Judah, which provoked the scornful and only too prophetic parable of the 'thistle and the cedar' (2 K. 14:8 f.). See AMAZIAH, 1.

3. Father of GIDEON [q. v.] (Judg. 6-8). See AMAZIAH.

JOB (יֹב; יוֹב, יוֹב), the hero of the Book of Job (cp also Ezek. 14:14 20 Jas. 5:11, on which see below), confounded in the postscript to C with 1. Name. JOBAB (q. v., 2), king of Edom (Gen. 36:33).

Though this confusion is due to a late uncritical writer, probably a Jewish Haggadist,¹ we must admit the possibility that there may be a connection between the names. Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar all have points of contact with name-lists in Genesis, and we should naturally expect this to be the case with 'Iyyōb. It is true, most critics before Dillmann have explained 'Iyyōb from the Hebrew, as if the original framer of the story of Job either coined the name or at least modified it so as to make it symbolic of his hero; the alternatives are (1) 'the pious' = Ar. 'awwāb, 'one who turns to God' (see Koran, 33:16 29:44); (2) 'the assailed, or persecuted —i.e., by God, or by Satan.' Neither is very satisfactory. The former is not definite enough in meaning, nor is the root Israelitish;² the latter implies an exceptional use of the grammatical form (cp יֹבֵר = יֹבֵר). There is no indication that the writers of Job thought of any meaning for the name.

Another problem remains—the true origin of the name. In Am. Tab. 2376:13 we find Aiab a personal name in N. Palestine (Che. Exp. os., 3).

2. Its origin. 1897, ib. p. 23; possibly Aiab = 'Iyyōb.³ In the next article (JOB, BOOK OF, § 4), the name of the hero of Job (יֹב מֵאֲבוֹתָיו) is traced to Ea-bani, the name of an ancient Babylonian hero, whose creation out of clay has been compared with the narrative in Gen. 2:7 (see CREATION, § 20, n. 4). Ea-bani seems to have been confounded with Gilgamesh, who, according to the myth, was attacked by some sore disease, and was supernaturally healed. For other legendary Hebrew names of Babylonian origin, see CAINITES, §§ 6-8, 10. On the land of Uz see Uz.

The question whether Job really lived—which is distinct from the question whether he actually said and

3. Job's character. did all that is related of him in our book —can only be answered in the affirmative if we are prepared to regard Cain, Enoch, and Noah as historical personages. The saying of Resh Lakish, 'Job existed not, and was not created, but is (only) a parable,'⁴ shows that great freedom of speech upon such matters was allowed among Jewish doctors. There has been some vagueness in the utterances of modern Christian scholars, who have not always considered that for a story to have a traditional basis is not equivalent to its being founded on fact. The moral value of the story of Job is unimpaired by the denial of its historicity; like the story of Jonah it is a parable, and the only question is—a parable of what? The ancients were struck by Job's righteousness (Ezek. 14:14 20 Eccl. 49 [Heb. text]), or by his patient endurance (Jas. 5:11). To Mohammed, too, Job was a model of piety and patience (Koran, 38.40), and the Mohammedans humorously call the camel abu Eyyüb, 'Job's father.' In Christian Egypt, too, as Amélineau remarks,¹ the story of Job was very popular, but not the speeches. The one was practical, the other appeared to be speculative. Theodore of Mopsuestia witnesses to the same preference of the story to the speeches in his time. For evidence of the further legendary development of the story of Job in the Jewish and Moslem world see D. B. Macdonald, AJSL 14:137-164 [1908]; K. Kohler, 'The Testament of Job,' Kohut Memorial Volume ('97), 264-338.

In Ecclus. 49.9 is certainly wrong in reading אִיבִיתָן for אִיבִי; the latter reading is supported both by Syr. and by our Hebrew text. The recovered Heb. text, however, must be corrupt. Smend thinks he can read אִיבִי in the MS after אִיבִי (Das hebr. Fragment, '97, p. 32). אִיבִי, however, has év ἔμπετος = אִיבִי, and this is what the copyist of our MS may have meant to give; but the word we want is אִיבִי, and in אִיבִי should be אִיבִי, and the אִיבִי of Cowley and Neubauer should be אִיבִי. The passage then becomes, 'He also mentioned Job the upright, who uttered right words' (see Job 42.7). In Jas. 5.11 Zahn (Eiml. 155) may be right in preferring the reading εὐερε (AB⁹ 1331 L. Arm.) to εὐερε (B*¹⁴ K's. vs.). The verse becomes, 'Ye have heard of the patience of Job and the end (appointed by) the Lord. See (here) that the Lord is full of compassion and pitiful.' T. K. C.

JOB, BOOK OF. The book stands third among the Ḳethüvim or Hagiographa, according to the Talmudic arrangement, but not always in the same place relatively to other books; in the Greek Bible too, there are variations in the MSS. On these points see Ryle, Canon of the OT (1892). In the Syriac Bible Job is placed between the Pentateuch and Joshua, because, according to the Jews (Bäbä bathrä, 15a), it was written by Moses (cp CANON, § 45). It may mitigate our surprise to remember that one of the fathers of modern criticism, Eichhorn, even claimed for the book a pre-Mosaic origin. We need not, however, any longer discuss the possibility of this view, since no scholar could be found to defend it. The most scientific arrangement is that which includes Job in the group of books of Wisdom (Hokmah), of which it is doubtless the greatest, and the most fraught with suggestion for the history of the Jewish religion. See WISDOM LITERATURE.

As the book now stands, it consists of five parts.
1. The Prologue, written, like the Epilogue, in prose (chap. 1f.).
2. The Colloquies of Job and his friends (chaps. 3-31).
3. The speeches of Elihu (chaps. 32-37).
4. The speeches of Yahwé out of the storm, with very brief answers of Job (chaps. 38-42).
5. The Epilogue (42.7-17).

Thus it is plain that the book of Job is deficient in literary unity. Two literary styles are represented in it —narrative prose and didactic poetry; both, however, are thoroughly artistic in character. We must not read the Prologue as a history; this would be to do injustice to a considerable epic poet. Nor must we read the Colloquies as mere specimens of Hebrew philosophy in metre. This would be to miss making the acquaintance of a powerful lyric poet who was also skilled in the delineation of varieties of character. Certainly it is not legitimate to call the book of Job a drama; a Hebrew drama, especially in post-exilic times, is inconceivable. The attitude of the Priestly Writer (P) in the Hexateuch towards the ancient Hebrew myths and legends sufficiently shows how hopeless a dramatic movement would have been, even had it been initiated. Nevertheless, the idea of inclosing a poetical debate between the two parts of a quasi-poetical tale is dramatic in tendency, and suggests that in more favourable circumstances gifted dramatists might have arisen among the Jews. In order that students may appreciate the art (not less than the meaning) of the poem and its different sections, there is one preliminary service which the textual critic must render—viz., to submit the text of Job to a careful revision.

All that can be done for exegesis from an opposite point of view has been done by Dillmann, and if Davidson cannot be mentioned as Dillmann's rival, yet every one of the too few pages that Davidson has written on Job testifies to familiarity with the available exegetical material; where either of these eminent critics has failed, it has been simply owing to the inadequacy of their critical methods. To Bickell, Siegfried, Budde, Beer, and Duhm is due the credit of having perceived that the next step forward in exegesis must be preceded by a purification of the text. The labours of these scholars and of others who have worked at the text of Job on the same lines, though less continuously, cannot be disregarded by exegetical students, and any article like the present must constantly refer not only to the Massoretic but also to an emended text.

The present writer is tied to no master, and will give the student the best that he knows. Nor can he abstain from adding that the emended text to which he will appeal is one which has partly been produced by considerations of metre. For the most necessary information on this subject he would refer to the article POETICAL LITERATURE; it is enough here to endorse the statement of Duhm, that the usual poetical form in the Colloquies of Job and his friends is the simplest metre of Hebrew prosody—viz., the stanza of four stichi, of three beats each.¹ There are also, it is true, passages of tristichs in chaps. 24 and (perhaps) 30; but these are among the later insertions. One of the clearest reasons for denying these passages to the main author of the work is the difference in their poetical form. The statement of Zener (Zt. f. Kath. Th. '99, p. 173) that the book of Job contains much more than a hundred tristichs implies far too conservative an attitude towards the traditional text.

The object of the Prologue is to show that disinterested love of God is possible, and that in the case of

2. Prologue such an one as Job, or of that quasi- and Epilogue. personal being whom Job symbolises, the terrible load of suffering has this one intelligible purpose—viz., that the perfection of his unbought piety may be exhibited before angels and men. Job is introduced to us as a rich Edomite Emeer, happy in his family and in his enormous possessions. He also knows the true God under the name Elohim, and is scrupulous in the established observances of piety. Heaven is thrown open to us that we may see what Yahwé himself thinks of Job, and how the Satan is only permitted to hurl this great and good man into an abyss of misery that his piety may come out as pure gold. The deed is done, and Job, stricken with a loathsome sickness (see PESTILENCE), withdraws to the ash-mound (marbala) of his village (cp Lam. 4.5). 'Flesh for flesh,'² the Satan had said (24); 'his dearest relations are nothing to a man, if he may but save his life.' That, however, was not the right reading of Job's character. His wife's faith indeed gave way. Loyal to her husband, but faithless to her God, she bade Job be a man, since God withheld the reward of piety, and curse his all-powerful enemy before he died. To Job, however, this was the height of folly; she who so spoke had degraded herself—had become 'one of the foolish women' (see FOOL). Not only did he 'speak no rash word' against God,³ he willingly accepted the

² Read probably בְּשֵׁן עֵדָר בְּשֵׁן עֵדָר. MT's עור בער עור, 'skin for skin,' gives no adequate sense; Schwally's explanation (ZATW 20.46f. (1900)), is only slightly more plausible than that of Merx and Budde.

³ MT in 1.22 reads וְלֹא נָתַן תְּפִלָּה לְאֱלֹהִים, 'and attributed nothing unsavoury to God,' the exact sense of which is variously given (see Schultens, Di., Bu.). Besides, however, we should read 'evil' which could not blot from his memory the 'good' of happier days. In a little while his three chief friends arrive, for the news has spread far and wide; they are doubtless Eneers like Job, and they know how true sympathy should express itself.

The prose narrative is resumed in the Epilogue. Yahwè declares that his anger is kindled against the friends of Job because they have not said of him the thing that is right, like his servant Job; he tells them to offer sacrifice, and Job shall intercede for them, 'that sudden ruin may not befall them.'¹ So Job prayed for them, and, as a public act of justification, God restored him more than his former prosperity, till at length he died, old and full of days.

As a piece of narrative the Epilogue compares very unfavourably with the Prologue. The idea that after

3. Criticism of having been proved capable of 'fearing God for naught,' Job should have to spend a hundred and forty years in the enjoyment of a commonplace prosperity will seem to most moderns so unreasonable that they probably would be glad to have reasons for cancelling it. It is not less strange that nothing should be said in the Epilogue either of Satan's loss of his wager, or of Job's recovery from his leprosy. However, to do justice to the writer we must view him, not as an artist, but as a teacher.

The Epilogue was a necessary concession to the unspiritual multitude, who had been taught even by prophets to look forward to double compensation for Israel's afflictions² (Is. 61.7 Jer. 16.14-18 Zech. 9.12). Regarding Job as a symbol of suffering Israel, Jewish readers could not but expect him to be re-endowed with sons and daughters, flocks and herds, and treasures of gold³ (cp Is. 54.1-606 f. 9). Now, too, we can see why, instead of telling us how Job recovered from his sickness, the narrator uses the vague expression שָׁבַח אֱלֹהֵי יְהוָה, which is so often used of the hoped-for restoration of the national prosperity (e.g., Ps. 147 Joel 3 [4] 1). He is thinking here, not of the legendary Job, but of his people Israel.

We next consider Prologue and Epilogue together. Can these be by the same writer as the Colloquies? (1) It must be admitted that the Colloquies in general presuppose the main facts of the story in the Prologue; on the other hand, in 19.15-17 f. (contrast 8.4 29.5) we have certain statements which are plainly inconsistent with some of those facts. (2) In Job 42.7 Job is commended for having spoken rightly of God; obviously this does not correspond with the speeches of Job in the Colloquies. (3) The Prologue ascribes the trials of Job to the Satan. Nothing is said of this in the poem; neither Job nor his friends know anything of such a being. (4) In the Prologue Job is a model of patience; in the Colloquies he is impatient. (5) The explanation of Job's sufferings given in 1.102 is unknown to the Colloquies. (6) Sacrifices are essential to piety in the prose-story of Job; they are not once mentioned in the Colloquies.

The necessary inference is that the Prologue and the Epilogue were written before the Colloquies, and since

םִּי וְלֹא בָּמָא בְּשִׁפְחוֹ לְאֵלֹהִים (cp 2.10, and especially Ps. 106.33). בָּמָא represents שִׁפְחוֹ; בָּמָא נִתְּמָה; בְּשִׁפְחוֹ from לְ. לְ was inserted by the last editor to make sense.)

² The exact doubling of Job's former possessions shows that we are not reading literal history here (Davidson, on 42.12).

42.7 implies that both Yahwè and the friends had held discourse with Job, it follows that the present Colloquies (if we may provisionally regard them as a whole) have been substituted for speeches of very different purport which came from the narrator of the prose-story, and were in perfect harmony with it.¹

The chief value of the Epilogue for us moderns (who on æsthetic and religious grounds alike are compelled to take exception to its contents) is that it enables us to reconstruct the main outlines of the original colloquy and of those portions of the story which had to be omitted together with the original colloquy. Elsewhere an attempt has been made to reconstruct what might conceivably have formed the omitted portion of the earlier book of Job.² Something of the sort can hardly be dispensed with in a full treatise on the criticism of Job, though to economise space it is not given here. The theory adopted above enables us to account (a) for the severe blame which Yahwè gives to the three friends, and for their assumed liability to some terrible calamity;³ (b) for the high praise awarded to Job; (c) in part for the expressions in the description of the suffering Servant of Yahwè in Is. 52.3-53.12; and (d) for the early view of Job, which persisted for centuries in many quarters in spite of the later insertions in the book, as a model of righteousness and patient endurance.

We must now ask, Is it possible to get behind the representation given of Job and of his misfortunes in

4. Legendary the Prologue and Epilogue? That there is a legendary basis may be assumed as on a priori grounds likely.

Even the book of Tobit has its legendary element, though the main current of the narrative is unaffected by it. Much more may we expect to find a traditional basis for the story of Job, which is of just the type in which the primitive imagination delighted; indeed, the name of its hero (in striking contrast to Tobit=Tobiah) is plainly no fiction, but a legacy from antiquity.

The prevalent view among critics is that a wise man of poetical gifts in Judæa in the post-exilic period adopted a story which had been handed on from age to age in popular tradition, and adapted it to his own didactic purposes.⁴

One of the chief points in favour of this view is the supernatural machinery of the Prologue, which has a strong quasi-mythological character. In particular, the humorousness⁵ of the dialogue between Yahwè and the Satan, which might be abundantly paralleled from Christian hagiology, evidently represents the popular, not the official religion. On the other hand, it must be remarked (1) that the Prologue is evidently constructed with a didactic object—viz., to give an adequate explanation of the sufferings of the righteous; (2) that the Epilogue is not fully intelligible unless Job be understood as a type of the people of Israel; and (3) that the Epilogue presupposes that Job and his three friends have been conversing on the subject of the divine government of the world (Job 42.7), whereas discussions on speculative subjects are uncongenial to the popular mind.

How far can this view be endorsed? So much as this appears to be certain—the story of Job is based upon a popular legend. It is probable, however, that some of the most interesting features of the Prologue are not of traditional origin, but come from a cultivated wise man who knew how to write for the people, but stood somewhat apart both from the popular and from the official religion. This wise man lived in the post-exilic period, when the belief in the Satan was becoming general. Very probably the imaginary dialogue between Yahwè and the Satan is not merely humorous but ironical. The narrator may wish to suggest a grave doubt as to the appropriateness of such a belief in Judaism; certainly he regards the Satan, like the b'ne Elōhim,⁶ as no more than a part of his poetic machinery. His main object, however, is to show (anticipating much later teaching) that the accumulated woes of Israel are but tests of the disinterestedness of Israel's love for God. It is true, the Epilogue is inconsistent with this: this wise man and artist, free-minded as he is, has to make concessions to the multitude (see § 3).

Most probably all that he adopted from the legend was (1) the name of the hero and of the land in which he lived; (2) the fact of Job's close intercourse with God; and (3) the surprising circumstance that this most righteous and divinely favoured of men was attacked by some dread disease such as leprosy, but was ultimately healed. So much as this was not improbably known to Ezekiel, who (14.14.20) mentions three men, Noah, Daniel (or rather perhaps 'Enoch'—see ENOCH), and Job as having escaped from peril of death by their righteousness. The original story was probably derived from Babylonia (cp preceding article). Eabani, the friend of the solar hero Gilgameš (see ENOCH), himself too created for Ea by the potter-goddess Aruru, was attacked by a distressing sickness, apparently the same from which Gilgameš had for a time been a sufferer. In the Babylonian legend Eabani dies, whereas Gilgameš is healed for a time by a magic potion and immersion in the fountain of life in the earthly paradise. It would seem that in Palestine one part of the story of Gilgameš dropped away from that hero and attached itself to Eabani, whose name became Hebraised into אֵבָן, out of which arose אֵיבָן, 'Iyyōb' (Job). Probably the story was brought by the Israelites from Hauran, if, as has been suggested (see HARAN), the Haran of Genesis is a distortion of Hauran. The 'land of Uz' (see UZ) was therefore probably in the NE. of Palestine, where indeed the name 'Uz' would naturally lead us to place it, but is transferred to Edom by the author of the original Book of Job, because of the traditional reputation of the Edomites for wisdom¹ (Obad. 8; cp TEMAN). This new situation suggested the mention of the Sabeans (115), and the Cushites (117; read אֲשִׁיטִים for אֲשִׁיטִים; see CUSH, § 2, z.), also the designation of Job as 'the greatest of all the sons of Jerahmeel' (13; read בְּנֵי יִרְחָמֵל for בְּנֵי יִרְחָמֵל; see JERAHMEEL, KEDEM, MAHOL) and of the friends of Job as a Temanite, a Zarhite, and a Temanite respectively (for the emendations here adopted see SHUHITE, ZOPHAR). The later wise man (once more we provisionally assume the unity of the Colloquies) who, as we have seen, discarded the original Colloquies and substituted new ones, does not seem to have altered the Prologue and Epilogue. To his work, which from the very first impressed thinkers as much as the prose narrative of Job impressed the multitude, we now direct our attention. Evidently he admired that narrative, for he has adopted it; but not less evidently he was not satisfied even by the attractive theory embodied in the Prologue, partly, we may suppose, because it depended for its efficacy on the opening of the heavens, and the admission of human listeners to the council-hall of Elōhim. For the wise men sought to connect religion as much as possible with mother-earth.

It should be noticed that there are three cycles of speeches, or colloquies, so that each friend speaks nine times (on Zophar's third speech see below), and Job answers nine times. Job also opens the colloquies by a poetic complaint.

The friends, who represent the Jewish theologians of the author's time, are about to speak. An excuse for this had to be provided. Submission to the divine will was the fundamental note of the character of Job, according to the Prologue. In order to justify argumentation, the sufferer must be seen to have lost his composure. The word 'God' occurs but twice in Job's complaint (chap. 3); he murmurs, but without accusing God of injustice. All that he craves is an explanation of this sudden catastrophe. Why was he suffered to live on when born—why must he live on, now that he is in abject misery? Piety does not forbid him to curse his natal day—the day which began with the night of his birth.

Perish the day on which I was to be born,
And the night which said, Behold,¹ a boy!
Let not God above ask after it,
Let not the moon show her splendour above it.²

Years and days are not imaginary, but have an objective existence in the unseen world. Job would fain revenge himself on this luckless day. As Moulton well says, 'All variations of darkening that fancy can suggest are invoked to blot out that day which betrayed Job into life.'³ Then Eliphaz the Temanite comes forward. He is the oldest of the party—older than Job's father (15.10). It is characteristic of him that he appeals to special revelations of his own; characteristic of Bildad that he loves to appeal to tradition; characteristic of the young and impetuous Zophar that he appeals to no authority but his own judgment, and gets irritated at any one who disputes the correctness of his theory.⁴ All are agreed that the cause of all calamity (and therefore of Job's) is sin, whereas Job himself from the first ascribes his trouble to some baffling mystery in God himself. The point which is not clear to the friends is, whether the calamity which has befallen Job is a punishment or merely an educational chastisement. They could not have hesitated to adopt the second view but for the vehemence of Job's complaint which seemed to them unbecoming in a devout man. Eliphaz gently remonstrates with his friend, and, if textual corruption be removed, his speech will not strike us as either unconnected or dictatorial. Why should Job lose heart? Who ever perished, being innocent? Job must know this; clearly Eliphaz does not expect any criticism of his statement. There is one truth, however, of which Job seems to him not fully aware; indeed Eliphaz himself had needed to have it enforced by a special, personal revelation, whispered to him by a mysterious form at night (4.17-21):—

Can mortal man be righteous before God?
Can man be pure before his maker?
Behold, he trusteth not his servants,
His holy ones are unclean before God;
How much more the dwellers in houses of clay . . .
Do they not dry up, when he bloweth upon them?
They die, but without wisdom.⁵

What, then, is man's true wisdom? It is to recognise trouble as the consequence of sin, and not to be seduced into irritating words which can only lead to the complete destruction both of the fool who utters them and of his children (5.24f.). Does Job think that there is anyone of the celestials who can be induced to help him? He will hardly indulge in this fancy after the revelation which Eliphaz has just related. For his own part, Eliphaz would rather turn trustfully to God, whose purposes are so unsearchable, but, for the righteous man, so beneficent. He concludes with an idealistic picture of the happiness in store for Job, if he will defer to the friendly advice offered to him by Eliphaz (5.17-27).

Job 48-11 and 536f. 10 are late insertions which spoil the fine rhetoric of the poet. Chap. 5 is also questioned by Siegfri., Beer, and Duhm, but seems to be protected by 4:18f. if read as emended above; indeed, 'call now,' etc. is much too vigorous an address for an ordinary glossator. Verse 7 needs correction in order to suit v. 6, but cannot be rescued for the poem, both v. 6 and v. 7 being alien to the Temanite's argument. (Verse 7 should probably be read, 'Yea, man brings forth misery, and the sons of wickedness pour forth iniquity'; irritation will pass away, and he will long to renew his intercourse with him on earth or in heaven. Thus, though Job will still have the 'anguish' of being parted from God, he will be able to wait patiently for the reawakening of his love. Will Job come to believe that this is no dream? That is the important question with which we approach the second colloquy.

Job's essential devoutness is manifest to us; but it was not so to his friends (cp 15.4). In fact, passages like those quoted above are not intended for the ears of the friends. They are lyric monologues which illustrate the dramatic process going on within the mind of Job; they form no real part of the colloquy. Job's narrow-minded friends can see his outward irreverence, but not the longing to be at peace with God which alone made such irreverence possible. Now, they think, Job reveals himself in his true character, and, their gentler treatment having failed, they proceed to try the effect of lurid pictures of the wicked man's fate,² intending that Job should see in these pictures no distant resemblance to himself. This wounding language Job meets with growing dignity. The symptoms of his sickness are becoming aggravated; death, he feels, cannot be far distant. He has already said, 'Yea, let him kill me, I will not desist.'³ Surely my ways I will defend before him' (13.15). But now his condition appears desperate;⁴ and in his loneliness he returns to the idea that God cannot be entirely his enemy.

Death, indeed, he cannot escape; he is caught in God's net, and complaints of injustice are unavailing (19.6f.). Job is now sure that he has an avenger of blood in heaven (cp Ps. 9.12 [13]); when he is dead, his cry (i.e., the appeal of his blood, which lies on the bosom of the earth) will reach the ear of the divine Love. To mother-earth he first makes his appeal; then he tells the universe of a stupendous fact of his consciousness.

O earth, cover not my blood,
And let my cry have no (resting-) place.
Yea, I know it—my piercing cry is in heaven,
And my shriek has entered the heights.

He will accept the words with which I cry,
My Blood-avenger will hear my call,
That he may decide between a man and God,
And between man and his fashioner (16.1-21).⁵

But here Job stops. It is implied that reparation will be made for Job's unjust and violent death; but no surmise is offered as to the form that this will take. The much-suffering man has advanced beyond what he said in 9.32f.; he has found a 'daysman betwixt us that might lay his hand upon us both'; the daysman's nature, if not his name, is Righteous Love. But he has not resumed the position adopted for a moment in ¹ Read רָצַח for מָצַח, both in 14.14 and in 7.1.

² There are, of course, corruptions of the text as elsewhere. For instance, 15.14-19, as they stand, are highly suspicious. It is not enough to omit vv. 14 and 17 (Bi.) as interpolations. A single stanza should take the place of vv. 14-19; the original text can easily be detected under the present much-edited text. What Eliphaz really says is, 'Ask the wise men, for they alone have unerring wisdom; they will not withhold their tōrah' (see Crit. Bib.).

בְּשֵׁמִים רְדִיתִי בְּשֵׁמִים. In line 8, for רְדִיתִי read יִצְהַר (illustrated by the argument in 10.8). 'His friend, however explained, whether as Job's friends (collectively) or as a title for God, is intolerable. For a minute, though not quite satisfactory discussion of the passage, see Budde; and on the versions see Beer.

14.13-15; he does not on this occasion specify the form which the expected reparation, or vengeance for blood, will take. It was a noble idea that he had stated; but, not being able to offer any tangible proof of its correctness, he soon falls back into his old elegiac strain, and even appeals to the friends for pity (19.21). He might as well have appealed to icebergs. From their averted faces the persecuted heretic sees that his doom is sealed. If God had not marked him out for death, they might have thought to do God service (cp 13.8) by stoning him. Job warns them of their guilt (cp 13.10f.); he does not threaten them with 'the sword,' as the faulty MT represents. First, however, he revives his own courage by giving for the third time a public expression to his unextinguished belief in his God (19.25f.). We cannot indeed venture, in deference to later Christian beliefs, to let the text of 19.25-27 pass, and assume that the passage refers either to the hope of the resurrection, or at least to the hope of conscious and continuous intercourse with God in an unbodied state of existence (cp ESCHATOLOGY). A close examination of the text shows that it has not only suffered corruption but also received interpolations, and our general experience with the ancient versions (which have often made prophets and poets give support to the later eschatology) justifies us in dealing with the MT somewhat freely. The present writer's attempt at a thoroughly critical restoration may be thus rendered,—

As for me, I know it—my Avenger lives,
And (lying) in the dust I shall receive his pledge;
Shaddai¹ will bring to pass my desire,
And as my justifier I shall see God.

*
When ye say, 'We will pursue him like a hart,
And will satisfy ourselves with his (lacerated) flesh';
Have fear for yourselves because of your words,
For those are words of iniquity (19.25-29).

So then the dream of a permanent resurrection of the old intercourse with God on earth or in heaven is not finally ratified by Job's mature thought. Still he ventures nearer to that dream than when he uttered the cry to mother-earth. He will not give up his belief in God's righteousness, and therefore declares it to be certain that God will one day publicly recognise his servant's innocence; and since on the one hand it is essential to the completeness of this reparation that Job should witness it, and on the other it is inconceivable (14.12) that man should 'awake, or be raised out of his sleep' to the old familiar life, it is the only solution which remains that the unbodied spirit of Job should for a moment be transferred to the upper world to 'see God as his justifier.' On this view great stress must be laid; no other exegesis appears possible, על-עפר, 'on the dust (of Shēōl), and מְדַרְכֵי, 'my justifier' (underlying מְבַשֵּׂר, being both apparently placed firmly in the text. That God can 'both kill and make alive' would no doubt have been granted by the poet; exceptionally a man like Enoch or Elijah might doubtless be saved either from death or out of death. But he regards his hero not as an exceptional person but as a representative of the class of righteous sufferers, and as such (so the poet thinks) Job cannot be raised from the dead.

Job, then, in some unimaginable way will for a moment be enabled to see the Light of lights—Elōāh. His desire has been to have his innocence established by the righteous Judge; that desire 'Shaddai will bring to pass.' First, the Gōēl, or Vindicator (see GōEL), will convey to Job the 'pledge' of his willingness to act as Gōēl (cp Ruth 4.7f.), then the solemn act of justification will be performed in the presence of Job. We must not be 'wise above that which is written,' and speculate with the help of later Jewish eschatology on the change which, for Job, must pass upon Shēōl when he returns thither at peace with God. Certain it is, that Job, and therefore also his poet, has broken with the conventional doctrine of She'ol, but he has not formed a new and better doctrine, capable of being presented in poetical form.

The view that Job anticipates restoration to health and prosperity in this life still finds supporters (see Bu., 110; Laue, 49f.; Beer, 127). It appears to the present writer to be connected with an a priori view of the structure of the Book of Job, and, in the case of Budde especially, with an unduly optimistic view of MT in this passage. Di. and Da. both favour the view that Job's justification will be after death; such also, in a form agreeing in essentials with that given above, is the view of We. (JG 177), Smend (Rel. Gesch. 471), and Du. 104. Of these critics, Duhm has given most attention to the text; but his retention of קִבְּשָׁי and his introduction of תָּי (which properly means a tribal or religious sign on the person [see Cross]), can by no means be justified. The restoration offered above is the writer's third experiment; it is, even if imperfect, neither hasty nor arbitrary. A few notes appear necessary. In l. 2 we should probably read וְעָרְבֵנִי as in 173 (Beer, Bu., Du.), a passage which belongs to the same group as 1925:29 i.e., it implies the idea of a division in the divine Being—the God of love over against the God of wrath. For the impossible read מִבְּשָׂרִי (Is. 508); this reading is practically certain. MT's אַחֲרוֹן is now generally explained as 'afterman' = 'vindicator' (cp Perles, Analekten, 74), which produces a good parallel to נֹאֲלֵי, but is itself unnatural. אֶלְעֵרֶךְ יָקוּם has no intelligible meaning. As Eichhorn (Allgem. Bibliothek, 1388) remarks, על, which always means 'to assail'. Unaware of Eichhorn, We. (JDT, 16556[71]) makes the same observation, and proposes to render MT, 'will arise (as witness) against dust'—i.e., against the friends (cp Job 419)! This being too artificial, either על-יְעָרְכֶךָ or יָקוּם must be read, and considering how emphatically (721) Job has mentioned his expectation of 'lying down on the dust'—i.e., on the dusty ground of She'ol (see 1716), it is the more reasonable course to emend the latter and retain על-יְעָרְכֶךָ which means '(lying) upon the dust' (2011 2126; cp 721). אַחֲרָי is an easy change; the preformatives א and י are frequently confounded. In l. 3 for נִכְפָּר read probably שָׁרֵי; שָׁרֵי אַחֲרָי is dittographed. For וְעָרְבֵנִי read וְעָרְבֵנִי אֶתְּחַיֶּה; יָקוּם fell out owing to שָׁרֵי; cp 1715 (in δ read תִּחַיֶּה). The much tortured וְנִכְפָּר is a mere editorial guess. אֲשֶׁר אֲנִי is clearly a corruption of כִּבְשָׁרִי (note the warning Passé), אַחֲרָי לִי וְעָרְבֵנִי אֶתְּחַיֶּה is a gloss on אֶלְעֵרֶךְ יָקוּם; אַחֲרָי לִי is a corruption of קִבְּשָׁי, a gloss on יָקוּם. וְעָרְבֵנִי אֶתְּחַיֶּה ('God shall arise . . . to revive me from my grave'). In l. 5f. the critics have not noticed that Job returns to his statement in v. 22; yet to a practised eye דָּבַר רַבִּי should reveal its secret. Read וְעָרְבֵנִי אֶתְּחַיֶּה וְנִכְפָּר (אֶלְעֵרֶךְ for אֶלְעֵרֶךְ, in v. 22, Reiske, Perles, Beer); וְנִכְפָּר has two beats. In l. 7f. חָרֵב is too vague, and the threat of a violent death is not in character with the Job of chaps. 3-19. Nor is there any allusion to the threat in Zophar's third speech. Read וְעָרְבֵנִי אֶתְּחַיֶּה וְנִכְפָּר אֶתְּחַיֶּה (Ges.). The last three words of v. 29 in the consonantal text (read, with Bu., [כִּי] יֵשׁ לָךְ, 'that ye may know that there is a judge') are a gloss.

Job has now taken a long step forward towards the religious solution of the problem of the suffering of the individual, and since true religion is primarily individualistic he can, if he will, afford to lay the large problem of the suffering of classes of men on one side. The importance of the deeply felt utterance of Job in 1925f. is universally admitted; yet none perhaps have realised its bearing on the structure of the poem except Meinhold¹ and Laue.² The former critic makes a new part of the poem begin at chap. 20; the latter thinks that the non-appearance of Yahweh to recognise Job's innocence has produced a radical transformation of the character of Job, who, aggrieved at his disappointment, becomes an open blasphemer, gives an unqualified denial to the divine righteousness, and, welcoming a temptation which he has twice before (92f. 1318ff.) overcome, challenges God, in language full of Titanic pride, to an investigation of his case (3135-37). The latter view is certainly inadmissible. Nothing is said in the second cycle of speeches which leads us to suppose that Job had expected God to appear for his vindication and been disappointed;¹ the account of 1925f., which this view presupposes, is that which the best recent critics of Job have rejected. Still, it remains true that the Job whom we meet with from chap. 20 onwards, lacks that tender religious undertone which surprises and delights us in the first colloquy, and we might be tempted to suppose with Meinhold that a new part of the poem begins at chap. 20. This supposition we might support by the theory that when the poet reached the end of chap. 19, he laid his work aside for a time, and that when he resumed it he was himself in a less religious and a more definitely critical frame of mind than before. This theory, however, is by no means probable. The poet would certainly have corrected his earlier work, and not have allowed such strongly contrasting works to stand side by side. We cannot help supposing that another member of the guild of wise men to which the poet belonged, took up his work and continued it, so as to embody a somewhat different conception of the hero. This view is supported by the phenomena of chaps. 29-31. Several critics have noticed that this much-admired section is deficient in unity. Chaps. 29f. are an elegy; chap. 31 is a proud self-justification. The present writer formerly thought² that the author might have written chap. 31 some time after he wrote chaps. 29f., and have placed it here by an afterthought, omitting to construct a connecting link with the preceding chapter. But there is no necessity for such an assumption here. The elegy in chaps. 29f. appears to be the original conclusion of the colloquies—the counterpart of the elegy (chap. 3) which forms the opening of the poem.

Any one who will read chaps. 19 and 29f. consecutively will be struck by the appropriateness of the arrangement. Chap. 19 itself is strongly elegiac. As Davidson says, 'He realises . . . more clearly than ever he had done before, his dreary isolation, God and men being alike estranged from him, which he laments in most pathetic words.' 'Have pity, have pity upon me, O ye my friends,' is its central passage, and when the sufferer thinks of the cruel insinuations of his friends, he warns—he does not threaten them. He speaks indeed of an Avenger of blood, but it is God, not God's misguided advocates, from whom reparation is expected, and there is an Over-God, whose nature is Love, and whom Job longs to be permitted to love. After this we are prepared to hear his sorrowful retrospect of past happiness in chap. 29, and the contrasted contemplation of his present abject condition in chap. 30. The first part is a poetic commentary on the opening verses of the prologue (11-5):—

O that I were as in months past,
As in the days when God watched over me;
When he made his lamp shine above my head,
By his light I went in darkness;
According as I fared in my (life's) way,
When God screened my tent;
When mine intimates were with me,
And my children were round about me (292-5).³

It seems far back—the time when the poor and fatherless blessed him, and when the great hushed their words at his presence. Now to those who once honoured him he is a by-word.⁴ The Providence which used to guard him is no more; God hears him not.

¹ It is true, 2313 expresses disappointment at God's evident determination not to hear Job's case, but this has no reference to the hope uttered in 1925f. Although Job's wish for an equitable discussion of his case has found repeated expression, he has never deluded himself with the fancy that his wish will be granted. He could never have said, with reference to this, אֲנִי יָדָעָה, 'I know,' 'I am sure.'

Life has ceased to be a song of joy ; he is perishing by a slow, painful death.

My skin falls, blackened, from me,
My bones are burned with heat ;
My cithern is changed to mourning,
My pipe to notes of grief (30³⁰/).

So ends the elegy according to the present text. Most probably, however, 31-4 has taken the place of two lost stanzas which formed the real conclusion ;¹ after this may have come the editorial notice, 'The words of Job are ended' (31^{40b}). That the writer intended it to be followed by the present epilogue is impossible ; neither chap. 19 nor chap. 30 could possibly have been followed by 427. Whether the writer gave an epilogue of his own, or left his work a torso, it is impossible to conjecture.²

The skilful writer who, with an object that we shall see later, undertook to continue the earlier poem, had no difficulty in adopting his predecessor's style, though he fails very much in consistent delineation of character. Zophar no doubt is still the same blunt person as before (though 20^{7a} must not be quoted as a proof of this),³ but Eliphaz too is surely blunt enough in 22²⁻²⁰. Job for his part disdains to answer such revilings. He is absorbed in the astonishing heresy (so he deems it) which he has to propound. He shrinks from it with horror, and yet ventures to state it—the divine governor of the world is non-moral. The friends may prescribe methods of operation to God which are pleasing to human minds, but God too clearly shows that they are not the methods which he himself adopts.

Not unnaturally cchap. 21 gave offence to many readers. It appears that vv. 16-18 were inserted to conform the passage to the prevalent doctrine of retribution. Though Budde and Duhm still claim for it the authorship of Job, Siegfried's view, which is here adopted, seems more probable. At any rate, dogmatic corrections have certainly been made elsewhere in this chapter. Thus, in v. 13^b MT says, that after a prosperous life the wicked man goes down 'in a moment' (בְּרֵעָה) into Sheōl. This cannot be right ; the true text probably bad בְּעֵנָה, 'in luxury.' So in v. 30^a and l לִי is an orthodox correction which makes Job say that the wicked man is reserved for the day of calamity, and led forth (?) to the day of wrath.

In v. 30^a it seems necessary to read מַאֲדִיר and in δ כִּיּוֹם (Du.). יבולו seems to be a corruption of יבול (י should also be read for יבול in v. 28). The whole description of the wicked man's career in vv. 28-33 is full of textual errors. 'Know their tokens' (v. 29^b) should be 'examine travellers' (וְאִרְחִימֵי הָלֵא). וְהִתְחַנְּנוּ (v. 32^f) are ludicrously wrong. Read probably, 'Seeing that he is escorted (in honour) to the citadel, and diligently seeks the sanctuary of God'⁴ (וְהוּא לְקִרְתָּהּ יִבְנֶה וְיִתְקַדֵּשׁ). 'אל יִשְׁחָד', 'Gold he amasses like the sand, and of his treasures there is no number' (אֵין יִצְבֹּר לוֹ כְּחֹל וְלִצְפֹּנָיו אֵין) (סכפֿר). Perhaps no passage has given more useless exercise to exegetical ingenuity than this.

That even Eliphaz should follow Zophar's example, and hurl the falsest accusations against Job, would be indeed a striking phenomenon, if the original writer were responsible for this speech. 'Surely,' he says, 'thy wickedness is great, and thine iniquities are infinite' (22⁵). Job must be a practical atheist (vv. 21-30 appear to be a later insertion,⁵ designed to mitigate the strange contrast between the Eliphaz of chap. 22,

² In its sadness the present conclusion reminds us of the close of Ps. 88—a very Job-like psalm (cp Delitzsch).

³ For l read כְּבָרוֹ (Ez. T 10³⁸²).

⁴ The sanctuary would naturally be attached to the citadel.

⁵ Note the points of contact between 22²⁴ (Eliphaz) and 21³³ (Job ; emended text). It is not likely that the chief poet himself would have fallen into such a close parallelism between Job and Eliphaz.

and the kindly speaker who opened the first colloquy). Job's next speech, in its original form, was probably intended to show that, as the wicked often enjoy a long and prosperous life, so the righteous often experience nothing but misery.¹ Such a case is his own. God's commandments have been his rule of life. If he could only find God—who ever eludes his search—and induce him to listen to his plea, his vindication would be certain. True, Job would have to make one condition with God (23⁶ ; cp 9³⁴, 13²¹). In MT the passage is strangely distorted ; most probably it should run thus—

He would remove the pressure of his hand upon me ;
Then he would use no threatening to me.²

But alas ! it has become too plain that God has resolved to destroy him (v. 13 ; read דָּוָר with Bu., Du.), though God knows full well that if he were to examine him, Job would come forth as gold (v. 10) ; and feeling himself to be the spokesman of the suffering righteous everywhere, Job goes on (so we must suppose) to produce further evidence for the awful theory of God's non-moral character. The true continuation, however, has been lost. Chap. 24, as Duhm rightly holds, is not a connected discourse, but a cycle of poems written in tristichs instead of tetrastichs.³ It is only 24²⁵ that we can safely regard as genuine ; this is the true close of Job's original speech.

How Bildad took this powerful indictment of the Governor of the world, does not appear. His third speech was lost, and a rhetorical description of the power, wisdom, and purity of God was inserted as a substitute. The second part of this description was, by a scribe's error, transposed so as to stand after 26¹⁻⁴. The latter passage is properly Job's ironical answer to this superfine but unoriginal piece of rhetoric ; it is therefore necessarily not genuine. Job's true answer to the (lost) speech of Bildad is to be found in chap. 27. It is, however, impossible to ascribe the whole of this chapter to Job ; part of it in all probability is a genuine fragment of the third speech of Zophar.⁴ The calmness of Job's dignified protest in vv. 1-6 and 12 is very noteworthy. Duhm contrasts it with the bitterness of Job's earlier speeches, and ascribes the change of tone to the intuition expressed by Job in chap. 19. The observation is just ; but the cause assigned does not seem to be the right one. As we have seen, it is a partly new conception of Job that underlies these later chapters. Job is calm because that bitter-sweet undercurrent of yearning love to God which appears again and again in chaps. 3-19 does not disturb or distract him.

If it is correct to view 27⁷⁻¹¹ 13-23 as a fragment of Zophar's last speech, the latter certainly merited the disdain with which Job treated it. It is, however, not impossible that we have here the attempt of a later orthodox writer to make the sufferer retract his heterodox statements (cp chap. 28). At any rate it has no right to appear in the last speech of Job, the true continuation of which must be sought elsewhere. We have in fact reached the great 'Oath of Clearing,'⁵ by which Job finally proves his innocence, and which represents the

² יִתְקַן יְדֵי מַעֲלֵי

וְהוּא לֹא יִיָּוֵם בִּי.

In 23⁶ Ⓢ should be read thus, εἶτα ἀπειλή ἐν ἐμοὶ οὐ χηρήσεται.

³ The tristichs in vv. 1-4 are imperfectly preserved, and the form may therefore be doubted. It does not seem likely, however, that this member of the cycle of poems would be in tetrastichs when the other members were in tristichs.

⁵ Moulton, p. 36.

high-water mark of Old Testament morality. His last words to his friends are—

Behold, ye have all seen it;
Why then do ye so vainly rage? (27 12).¹

Then, in all probability, followed an appendix, so framed as to form a parallel to chaps. 29 f. The opening words were transferred to the end, when chaps. 29 f. were removed to their present place. Let us restore 31 35-37 to its proper place at the head of the 'Oath of Clearing,'² and since it is highly corrupt, let us endeavour to amend it in accordance with Job's aspirations elsewhere.

O that he would hearken to my voice,
[And listen to the words of my complaint,]
That he would take away the insulting of mine opponent,³
That he would lay his hand upon us both!

* * * * *
Surely my concern would I present,
I would arrange arguments for him;
I would tell him the number of my steps,
My rising up and my lying down he would examine.

The usual view is that Job imagines himself approaching the Divine Judge (whom in v. 35^b he is made to call 'my adversary') with the proud self-possession of a 'prince' (נָגִיד), holding the accusation written by God and his own answer with his signature, and that Job declares that if he but possessed this accusation, he would not hide it as a thing which brought disgrace, but would parade it upon his back (!) as a distinction (cp Is. 22 22), and (or?) wear it as a diadem on his brows. All this is violently improbable, and yet this very passage is utilised in the service of the theory that Job fell away from his God (Laue, p. 96). Truly Hoffmann deserves credit for his refusal to twist the exegesis of v. 36 in order to soften the surprising character of the passage. It is God, he says, whom Job says that he will take upon his back and bind upon himself as a coronet—an 'Ungeheuerlichkeit,' says Budde; yes, indeed, but an inevitable one, if the present text is to be strictly interpreted. It is probable that the passage can be restored nearly to its original state. The most important emendations are (l. 3) וְיָשִׁיחַ יָדוֹ עַל-שִׁמְיָנוּ (l. 4) וְיִצְחָק הָרַפְתָּ אִישׁ-רֵיבִי (l. 5) אִישׁ אִישׁ אִישׁ קְלָאֲמַתִּי אִישׁ (l. 8) קָמִי וְרָבְעִי יִפְקֵד (l. 8). For the rest, see Crit. Bib.

Then this ideal righteous man tells us how he would clear himself if God were to hear his cry, and investigate his case. He goes through a catalogue of evil deeds and thoughts, and in the most solemn manner imprecates upon himself God's vengeance if he be guilty. The first two stanzas (= vv. 5-8) fit on particularly well to the last stanza of the introduction (i.e., 31 35-37); they continue the figure of the 'way.' The last stanza is by no means an equally good conclusion. Doubtless, like vv. 35-37 (which, as we have seen, should form the opening of the chapter), it has been misplaced, and probably the same fate has befallen vv. 29-34.⁴ If so, the last extant part of the monologue will be (vv. 26 f.)—

If, when I saw how the sun shone,
Or the moon walking in splendour,
My heart was secretly beguiled,
And I kissed—putting hand to mouth.

This, however, cannot be the true conclusion. Unfortunately that was lost at an early date, and the two opening stanzas were detached so as to form a conclusion.

We can now see why the second wise man undertook to continue the original colloquies. It was to complete the disproof of the current theory that suffering was always either disciplinary or educative. This wise man must have agreed with his predecessor in rejecting the Epilogue, and he would certainly not have sanctioned either the speeches of Elihu or even the grand orations of Yahwè.

¹ Read תַּחֲתֵי לִי; cp Ps. 62 11, where a similar emendation is required.

² 31 1-4 are doubtless an editorial insertion (cp v. 4 with v. 37a). They fill the place of an illegible passage.

⁴ Davidson's view of vv. 24-34 as the repudiation of another class of secret sins is hardly quite satisfactory.

To the speeches of Elihu we now turn our attention. According to Duhm Elihu is brought before us as a distinguished historical person, and so (as a 'man of family') contrasts with Job and the three friends. The truth, however, probably is that the prolixity of the description of Elihu in 32₂ is due to corruption and interpolation; Elihu was originally called simply 'the son of Jerahmeel'—i.e., the Jerahmeelite, with reference to a Jerahmeelite famous in legend for his wisdom, who appears to be mentioned in 1 K. 4 31 (on the text see JERAHMEEL, § 4).² The lateness of the prose introduction to chaps. 32-37 is shown by the use of the ethnic 'the Buzite,'³ which presupposes the corrupt traditional reading in Gen. 22 21, 'and Buz his brother' (instead of וְאַחֵיבִּזוֹ, 'and Ahibuz'; cp אַחִי).⁴ Anticipating some surprise at Elihu's appearance, the narrator states that Elihu was angry with Job because he held himself more righteous than God, and with the friends because they found no answer (to Job), and so made God seem guilty (32 2 f.). He says himself that he had waited because he was so young, and assuredly he falls into all the worst errors of juvenility. There is no intention, however, of amusing the reader; the faults of juvenility were also the faults of the narrow, orthodox school to which the writer belonged. The matter of which Elihu is so 'full' (32 18-20) is distributed over four speeches. The themes of the first three are (1) the ground and object of suffering (32 f.), (2) the righteousness of God (34), (3) the use of religion (35). These are treated in relation to the erroneous utterances of Job, whom (unlike the three friends) Elihu constantly mentions by name. Then, in his last and longest effort; Elihu unrolls before Job a picture of the divine government, in its beneficence and righteousness as well as its omnipotence, with the object of breaking down Job's pride (36 f.). It is in the second part of his last speech that Elihu exerts himself most as a poet, and it has often been suggested that the sketch of the storm in 36 29-37 5, and the accompanying appeals to Job, are preparatory to the theophany in 38 1 (so lately Moulton, xxxiii). The objection is (1) that the close of the speech of Elihu does not relate to the storm, as it ought to do, and (2) that Yahwè begins (38 2) with the declaration that the last speaker was a darkener of (the divine) counsel. We shall return to the Elihu section which is more interesting theologically than poetically; see § 12. There is much corruption and possibly some interpolation in 'Elihu.' But we shall not spend more time on this speaker, whose discourses are but a foil to the Colloquies, the speeches of Yahwè, and the Praise of Wisdom.

We now pass on to the great poetical ornament of the book. The Speeches of Yahwè (38-42 6) serve a twofold purpose. They are a link between the Colloquies (in their expanded form) and the Epilogue, and they present, if not a solution, yet a powerfully expressed substitute for a solution of the great problem of suffering. The writer had rejected the theory defended by the three friends; he also disapproved of Job's vehement censure of the divine government of the world, but not, we may suppose, of his intuition of a justification of the righteous after death. He was obliged to make Yahwè intervene in Job's lifetime, because he felt it necessary for the circulation of the book (Prologue

10. Speeches of Yahwè.

³ 'The Buzite' would of course be superfluous after 'son of Jerahmeel.' It seems to be due to a scribe who had before him the same corrupt text that we have. 'Buz' was suggested by 'Uz.'

and Colloquies) that it should be accompanied by the Epilogue, and he could not help making Yahwè pass a strong censure on Job's fault-finding propensity, partly no doubt to satisfy his own conscience, and partly also to make it possible for Yahwè in 42.7 to eulogise Job's statements respecting God (after Job had retracted all that could justly be accused of arrogance).

An editor has prefixed to these Speeches the words, 'And Yahwè answered Job out of the tempest, and said' (38.1), but it would have been more in the spirit of our poet to have quoted 1 K. 19.11b.12 (Elijah's theophany), where it is distinctly said that Yahwè was not present in the storm-wind. It is by an appeal to the reason, not by physical terror, that Yahwè seeks to work upon Job, though the awful mysteriousness of the universe, as set forth poetically by Yahwè, forces from the lips of Job the words :—

I had heard of thee by the ear,
But now mine eye has seen thee;
Therefore I must pine away,
And dissolve to dust and ashes.¹

What Job means is that his previous notions of the divine government were derived from mere doctrine, whereas now he had obtained a vivid intuition of God's working, not merely among men, but in the great and complex universe. He had in fact seen God's glory, and the strain upon his whole nature was such that he seemed about to break down. Of consciousness of moral offence on his part there is no trace; his error was of intellectual origin, and this certainly did not require him to 'repent in dust and ashes.' The only charge brought against him is that he has 'darkened (God's) counsel by words without insight' (38.2; cp 42.3). Remonstrance is the general purport of the speeches of Yahwè, and though the form of this may be humiliating to Job, yet the glorious pictures of nature which are presented cannot fail to lighten his load of grief (see Blake's beautiful thirteenth illustration of Job). Unfortunately the text of the Speeches is in some disorder. As the text stands, the Divine Speaker breaks off at 40.1f. with a searching question which elicits from Job a confession of his ignorance. This, however, cannot be right. Another question is put in 40.8f., and, as Davidson remarks, the second question is implied in the first. As Bickell and Duhm have seen, vv. 8-12 must originally have followed v. 2; the separation was consequent on the interpolation of 40.15-41.34 (Behemoth and Leviathan). The Behemoth and Leviathan passages will be considered later; other insertions are the passage on the ostrich (39.13-18), and, according to G. Hoffmann and Duhm, 38.13b.14b.15; 38.28, too, should be omitted as a tautological prose version of v. 29. The poem (for as such we may regard it) will gain much by restoration to its original form; its splendid imagery will then be seen to the best advantage.² The earth, the sea, the world under the sea (Shêöl), and the manifold wonders of the heavens are successively treated; Job is asked whether perchance he brought these into existence, or knows the secrets connected with them.³ More striking, however, are the poetical pictures of animals. Nine (excluding the ostrich) are brought before us in Yahwè's searching interrogatory; the poet enters into the habits of each, and conveys to us the fascination of which he is conscious himself.

Regretfully we abstain from dilating on these pictures; in special articles the omission is partly remedied (see, e.g.,

² The details of the poem are to some extent treated in special articles.

CREATION, § 21; HORSE; OSTRICH; MAZZAROTH; STARS, § 3; UNICORN). It may be that the pictures were originally fewer in number (⊕ is deficient in some details): if so, we need not regret the insertions.

Duhm hints a doubt respecting the raven-stanza (38.41), and adopts Wright's conjecture (לַעֲרַב 'for the evening'); cp Job and Sol. 52, n. 4. This can hardly be right. More probably לַעֲרַב is a corruption of לְוֹלַף, 'for the wolf.' The lion and the wolf are naturally mentioned together.

Our survey of Job would be most imperfect if we did not mention here at least the principal interpolations

11. Chief interpolations. (1) The poems of which 24.1-24.8 are composed are as follows :—(a) vv. 1-4, a fragment on the merciless rapacity of the wicked. Details of this sort are not characteristic of Job. The other poems spoken of being in tristichs, it is probable that (a) was also written in this form. The text, however, is in a bad condition.

For v. 1 ⊕ only gives διὰ τὸ δὲ κύριον ἔλαβον ὄρα, omitting ἄλ (the text was already corrupted, as in M.T) for dogmatic reasons; v. 2, which is also omitted, was apparently unintelligible. In fact, עָרַב and לְוֹלַף are obscure. Duhm's restoration of the imperfect tristic in v. 1 is not quite natural, and he has to change עָרַב into יָרַב. It is better to emend in such a way as to suit the sequel. רָשָׁעִי should probably be רָשָׁעִים; for the rest see Crit. Bib. The sense which we obtain is,

Why do the wicked prosper?
They grind the face of the destitute;
Bad men oppress the poor.

(b) Verses 5f. (7b?) 8 to 12, a description of an oppressed, pariah race. This should be taken with 30.2-8, which contains the sequel. Text very bad; compare or contrast ⊕.

(c) Verses 13-18a (?), a sketch of the 'rebels (?) against the light'—murderers, thieves, etc.

(d) Verses 18b (?) -24, a fragment on the end of tyrants. Text very bad.

(2) 30.2-8, more on the unhappy pariahs and troglodytes; one could almost fancy that it came from the oration of a democratic leader (cp 18b).¹

(3) 28.1-27. No earthly treasures lie too deep for human industry, but Wisdom is with God alone. By Wisdom the writer means the Reason which originated and pervades the phenomena of the world (cp Prov. 8). The poem cannot have been written to stand where it does, for it is altogether in a different style, full of imagery, and too rich for the deep but simple idea which it is meant to convey; it contains no allusion whatever to Job's problem.² An editor of the Colloquies, however, seems to have thought that it might fitly be introduced (cp Job 11.5-12), because Job, as a censor of the government of the world, had virtually questioned the existence of the Divine Wisdom (a different view of Wisdom). According to this humble-minded person all speculation was wrong,³ and he pleased himself with making Job anticipate his retractation in 40.4f. Verse 28 comes from his pen, unless, as the warning Pasek after וַיִּימָר may perhaps suggest, the interpolated verse is no longer in its original form, in which case we must be cautious how far we accuse the interpolator of narrowness of mind; it may have been a later scribe who made the best substitute he could for an indistinctly written passage.

It is the distinction of Duhm to have cleared up the exegetical problem of the opening word (וַיִּימָר, 'for'). Verse 7 is usually supposed to take up what is said in v. 6; the 'path' is the way to the place of 'sapphires' (?). But it is much more natural to suppose that the words, '(But) whence doth wisdom come, etc.', which now appear only in v. 12⁴ and v. 20, originally stood before v. 7, and if the refrain was forgotten there,⁵ we may reasonably explain the 'for' in v. 1 as referring to the same refrain, which would therefore seem to have opened each of the four stanzas of the poem.¹ Into the complicated controversy which has arisen out of this little word 'for,' it is needless to enter. Budde adheres to the ingenious but unnatural theory which he proposed in ZATW, 2 193-274 (82); he has not, however, convinced Smend (Rel.-gesch.⁽²⁾, 476), who still holds to Wellh.'s view (Bleek's Eint.⁽⁴⁾, 540 ff.) that 27 7-28 27 is of late origin.²

28 1-27, when restored to its original strophic form, is a beautiful specimen of Hebrew poetry. The corruptions of the text are not incurable (see, besides the commentaries of Budde and Duhm, the articles GOLD, LION, MINING, SAPPHIRE, TOPAZ). The naïve delight which the author takes in his knowledge of mining and of gems (cp Dante) is communicated to the reader.

(5) 40 15-24 41 9-11 (12?) 41 1-8 13-24. The description of two mythical monsters called Behemoth and Leviathan; the old mythological tradition having become pale, the poet fills up the gaps in his supposed knowledge from what he had seen or heard of the two Nile monsters—the hippopotamus and the crocodile (see BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN, HIPPOPOTAMUS). If Job was really God's equal, he could of course bring even these wondrous creatures into subjection. The seeming hyperboles in the descriptions are partly due to corruption of the text.

Thus in 40 17 'tail' and 'cedar,' in 41 31 'pot of ointment,' and in 41 32 the 'hoary' sea should disappear. In 40 17 we should perhaps read 'he cleaveth reeds as with shears; the sinews of his neck are intertwined';³ in 41 21, 'he maketh the sea like a caldron,'⁴ and in 41 32 'the bottom of the sea is his path; the dark places of the sea are his road.'⁵ For other critical emendations, see HOOK, JORDAN, SOUL, and of course such writers as Budde, Duhm, Gunkel, and Beer should be consulted. Budde and Duhm, however, start with an incorrect theory as to the meaning of the names Behemoth and Leviathan.

That the passages which we have been considering really are interpolations, can hardly be questioned except on the ground of an a priori assumption of the unity of the book. They are interpolations because their insertion in the Book of Job has involved interference with the form of the context, except where, as in the case of chap. 28 (see v. 28), the interference was confined to the inserted poem itself, and, even when beautiful in themselves, they mar the effect of the true poem of Job.

The Speeches of Elihu are somewhat differently circumstanced. It seems best to call them (with G.

12. Elihu section (resumed).

Hoffmann) a supplement to the original poem, rather than an interpolation. Their insertion (if they were inserted) has involved taking no liberty, either with the text of the speeches themselves, or with that of the Colloquies of Job and his three friends, and some writers⁶ think that they give the best solution of Job's problem that was, from the point of view of the Hebrew Wisdom, possible, and that without them the Speeches of Yahwè would be liable to the charge of using force towards Job instead of argument. This charge, however, would be valid only if the Speeches of Yahwè belong to the author or authors of the Colloquies. For certainly the Speeches of Yahwè, noble as they are in themselves, are not such as were adapted to impress the supposed auditor (see, e.g., 23 3-7). As to the high estimate of the Elihu Speeches in the writers referred to, it may be enough to say that (in spite of Elihu's assertion in 32 14b) there is hardly any argument in the Elihu section which cannot be found in the Speeches of the Friends, while the description of God's incomprehensible greatness in 36 13-37 24 appears like an inferior copy of the Speeches of Yahwè. The admiration expressed by some critics for the teaching of Elihu is certainly much exaggerated, and would not have been shared by the poet of the Colloquies, who rejects the doctrine of the Friends. Not to speak now of the poverty of the style, it may truly be said that the speaker or writer thinks far too much of his minute advances in religious theory. The only excuse for him is his marvellous naïveté. Here is one of his self-assertive utterances:—

I will fetch my knowledge from far,
And will see justice done to my Maker.
For truly my words are no lies,
One perfect in knowledge is before thee (36 3 f.).

What an over-estimate of his originality! Elihu's favourite theory of the disciplinary character of suffering (33 14-30 36 8-25) was fully stated by Eliphaz at the outset (58 ff. 17 ff.). If he ceases to advocate it, it is because Job will not allow that it applies to his case. There is only one section in which Elihu may claim some originality. He says (33 14) that God speaks to sinners in two ways; first, by alarming them with dreams (vs. 15-18), and next by sending them sicknesses which would have a fatal issue but for the intervention of a friendly angel (vs. 19-28). The central stanza of the former passage (33 15 f.) should run thus:—

By a dream, a vision of the night,
In slumberings upon the bed,
He humbers the ears of men,
And makes their flesh to tremble.¹

Here Elihu differs from Eliphaz his model by making the dream (see v. 17) a means of 'withholding a man from injustice' (קַעֲוֵי לָהּ, v. 17, Bick., Du., after ש). The most important part of the second passage (33 22-25) is very incorrectly given in MT, though the interpretation given to MT by critics (cp PARACLETE) does not seriously misrepresent the mind of the writer. Most probably we should read as follows:—

And his soul draws near to the pit,
And his life to the dark world,
Unless an angel redeem him,
One who rescues man from Abaddon,
* * * * *
And he be gracious to him, and say, 'Let him go;
I have found the ransom of his soul;
Let his flesh swell with youthful strength,
Let him return to the days of his youth.'²

Here Elihu ventures on a virtual contradiction of Eliphaz who (v. 1) denies that 'holy ones,' i.e., angels, can help a man struck by deadly sickness. He positively asserts that when a sick man seems near his end, one of those angels whom God commissions, not to lie in wait (like the Satan) for the tripping of the righteous, but to prevent the chastisement of penitent sinners from going too far, rescues him from the destroying angel who has already grasped him. The 'ransom' spoken of is probably the prayer of penitent confession (vs. 26-28). The angelology of 'Elihu' is

In l. 3 read יִגְאָלֶנּוּ מִלְּאֲדָה אֱמִי לָהּ. Note the Pasek after עליו. In l. 4 read מִצִּיל אֱדָם מִמְּבִיחֵן; אֱדָם was perhaps still in the text when the gloss להגיד ונוי was inserted. במבדון, by a little transposition and corruption, became אֱלֶף. Bu. omits מִלְּאֲדָה אֱמִי לָהּ as a gloss, which is unjustifiable. In l. 5 read פְּתָעוּהוּ (so some MSS) with Bötch., Wright, Grä., Hoffm., Bu., Du., Beer. therefore more developed than that of the Colloquies (cp Job and Sol. 44 f.).

We have on the one hand an angel of Death, and on the other an angelic redeemer. Whatever may have been popularly believed at an earlier date, it is only a late poet (later, it would seem, than those who gave the tone to the Psalter, and later also than the poem of Job) who could have authoritatively sanctioned this belief. Elihu's minute reproductions of sayings of Job (see 338 f. 345 f. 352 f.) also point to an author who had the book before him as a whole, so far as it was then extant. What he gives us is a reassertion of the doctrine of earthly retribution in what seemed to him an improved form, and he gives this reassertion greater force by leading the reader to suppose that Job was silenced by it, and that Yahwè tacitly approved it.

(a) Language.—That there are many points of contact between Elihu and the Colloquies is not denied (cp Bu., Beitr. 92-123); but there are also many words (e.g., 77) and phrases peculiar to 'Elihu' (ib. 124-146), which would hardly have been the case if 'Elihu' were written by the author of the Colloquies, considering that the circle of ideas in 'Elihu' is not very different from that in the Colloquies. It may of course be answered that an interval of some duration separates the composition of the two sections, so that we are ultimately thrown back on the question whether it is likely that the same writer would have worked up the old material again with the object of restating old solutions of Job's problem. A good deal has been said on the larger number of Aramaisms in 'Elihu' as compared with the Colloquies, and, as the text now stands, not without reason. But the text of 'Elihu' is in urgent need of critical emendation (e.g., אַחַי in Job 376 is certainly wrong).¹ So far as the present writer can see, however, the legitimate emendations of the text of 'Elihu' do not raise the Speeches of Elihu to the same plane of literary excellence as the Speeches of Job and his Friends (upon which, be it remembered, the same beneficent art of critical emendation has also to be practised). Budde, it is true, is of an opposite opinion. By the removal of corruptions and interpolations he thinks that the linguistic argument against the so-called 'genuineness' of the Elihu-section has lost its basis, and that both the form and the contents of the speeches can now be much better appreciated (Hioh, Einl., p. xx). To criticise this statement adequately would require too much space. The present writer has no disinclination to join in the effort to relieve Elihu's speeches from some of the rust which has gathered about them; but he feels sure that no restoration can make the picture a masterpiece (cp Driver, Intr.⁽⁶⁾, 429).

(b) Non-mention in Prologue and Epilogue.—There certainly ought to have been a condemnation of Elihu in the Epilogue; the non-mention of him in the Prologue we can perhaps pass over. It is absurd to speak of the harmony (?) between the Speeches of Elihu and those of Yahwè as sufficiently indicating Yahwè's approval of his youthful advocate (Stickel). Almost more reasonable is the statement in the Testament of Job (a Greek Jewish Midrash), 'And after he (Elihu) had ended, God appeared to me (Job) in a storm and in clouds, and spoke, blaming Elihu, and showing me that he who had spoken was not a man but a wild beast.'² It would, indeed, have been inhuman to harass a sufferer like Job with such feeble commonplaces!

The recognition of the fact that the Book of Job, like Homer and like the Sagas, has grown together by the combination of different elements, has an important bearing on the date of the Book. The phrase 'the Book of Job' may have two meanings: (1) the original Book of Job, so far as it is extant (11-213; 427-17), and (2) the Book of Job with the latest inserted passages. The date of the Book, in the second sense, will be that of the latest insertion; in the first sense it will be that of the writing of the Prologue and Epilogue. The latter date can easily be determined. A prominent supernatural personage in the celestial court is called 'the Satan' ('adversary,' 'accuser'). The same personage appears in his character of 'accuser' before Yahwè in Zech. 3, and it can readily be shown (see SATAN) that the conception of the Satan is more developed in Job 1 and 2 than in Zech. 3.¹ Now the date of Zech. 3 is 519 B.C.; the first Book of Job is therefore later than 519 B.C. It is no objection to this date: (a) that the picture of the life of Job in the Prologue is in harmony with the old patriarchal stories, or (b) that the author shows himself to be a gifted narrator. The Book of Ruth shows that there were highly gifted narrators in the later times, and such a writer could easily imitate the patriarchal stories. If the hēsītāh (EV piece of money) in 4211 is really copied from Gen. 3319, the writer of the original Job was only too faithful an imitator, for hēsītāh is probably a corruption of a much more intelligible and historical phrase (see KESITAH). The mention of the Chaldeans (117) as marauders has been thought to point to the period before Nabopolassar and Nebuchadrezzar. But 'Chaldeans' should probably be 'Cushites' (see CUSH, § 2, 1); the 'Cushites' and 'Sabeans' of antiquity were remembered by a late tradition (cp 2 Ch. 149).

The date of the Prologue and Epilogue is marked (1) by the double restoration of Job's property (4212; v. 106 may be a gloss),² which corresponds to a standing feature in the descriptions of glorified Israel (see Is. 617, Zech. 912, Jer. 1614-18), and (2) still more by the parallelism between the story of Job's calamity and restored prosperity and the figurative description of the vicissitudes of the Servant of Yahwè in Is. 5213-5312. The latter point requires some elucidation. Is. 5334b7 are like a poetic description of the 'stroke' of Job's sickness, of the horror of his neighbours, and of his own pious resignation; G. Hoffmann deserves special credit for pointing out the analogy of the metaphorical sickness of the Servant to the actual sickness of Job. It appears likely that Job, who in the Prologue and the Epilogue is a type of Israel, partly suggested the figurative description of the 'Servant of Yahwè'—the personification of the company of pious Israelites in the age inaugurated by Ezra which regarded itself as the true, spiritual Israel.

Reflecting on the cause of Job's misery, the writer (of Is. 53) came to the conclusion that God must have appointed this for the good of those who, unlike Job, were transgressors (cp 428), and that Job's consciousness of this must have helped him to bear his sufferings uncomplainingly.³ And taking Job to be a type of Israel, he became assured that true Israelites, who bore the sufferings brought upon them through the great national calamity as uncomplainingly as Job (i.e., the Job of the original Book), would like him be the means of salvation to others, and would thus, like him, demonstrate the possibility of disinterested piety. It must surely be admitted that the two writers (of the original Job and of the 'Servant' passages) belonged to the same period, and if so it is probable that they lived subsequently to the introduction of Ezra's lawbook, for this is the period to which the passages on the Servant of Yahwè may most plausibly be assigned (see SERVANT OF THE LORD). It is, however, not quite impossible to give both Is. 53 and the original Book of Job a somewhat earlier date, viz., somewhere about 500 B.C., which is the date to which G. Hoffmann, Hioh, 34, assigns the 'genuine Book of Job.'

It is impossible to estimate with precision the amount of linguistic evidence for the late date of Prologue, Epilogue, and Colloquies, owing to the frequent uncertainty of the text. For instance, the first three words cited by Dillmann (p. xxxi) as Aramaic probably do not belong to the true text of the Colloquies.

² But see Budde's note.

³ Jew. Rel. Life, 162.

נָקַד in 16 15 and חַח in 81 33 are corrupt; and 15 17 f., which contains חֲזֵה (a favourite word of Elihu), is a wretched distich, which has no place in this fine poem; וְאֶתְּחַי, a doubly Aramaic form, also occurs in an interpolated distich (18 17; see Bick., Du.). רָקַב, which Beer (p. 83) and Nestle (ZATW 20 172 (1900)) rightly claim as an Aram. word for ἀσκάς (so 6), 'skin-hottle,' is found again in an inserted distich (18 28; see Du.); שְׂתָרִי, 'my witness,' 16 19 and שְׂתָרָה in 28 13 (see RAHAB) are corrupt. There are, however, undoubted Aramaisms, such as כָּלֵל (5 22), כָּלֵל (8 2), כָּלֵה with plural כָּלֵה and כָּלֵיָן (8 26 12 11 13 17, and often), כָּר (13 27), כָּטָם (16 8 [1], 22 16), שְׂנָא, שְׂנָאָה (8 7 11 12 23).

Dillmann accounts for these partly as dialectal peculiarities, partly as arising from a rhythmic need of variety; but the former explanation cannot safely be pressed. As words, or senses of words, characteristic of later Hebrew (7th or 6th century) he mentions (a) קָבַל, 2 10; (b) יָדַע 'to determine' (22 28), an Aramaic usage. But Dillmann's note on 22 28 is most unsatisfactory; he is compelled to take the next word אָמַר to mean 'a thing'—a purely imaginary meaning, though one commentator after another reaffirms it. The passage is corrupt; and (תּוֹרָמָר, תּוֹרָמָר) comes from יָמַר (continue וְהִלֵּךְ); the line is copied from 11 17 (on which see Exp. T 10 381 f. [99]); it occurs in the late appendage to the third speech of Eliphaz; (c) חָתַק [Aram.], 14 20 15 24; (d) כִּנְיָה, 7 3 (a doubtful passage).¹ (e) הִחֲרִיב, 'to let loose (the hand),' 6 9. Here again the text is corrupt; we can emend with more confidence than in 7 3. Read וְיִרְעָצֵנִי, 'that he would grant my prayer and shatter me.' (f) תִּירָס, 'tyrant,' 21 28, as in Is. 13 2. The change from 'liberal, noble' to 'tyrant' is not probable (contrast Is. 32 5), and it is better to emend to בָּוֹר in both passages. (g) חֶסֶד, 'interest,' 21 21, 22 3. (h) כָּרַר, 10 22. † But Shēōl was certainly not לְאִסְתָּרִים, 'disorderly'; קָצִיר (i) צִלְמוֹת of 2 22 (doubtful passages).² לֵאמֹר (14 9, etc.). (j) שְׂעָפִים, 4 13 20 2 (doubtful passages). (k) כִּנְיָנֹת, 21 6. (l) תְּכַלִּית, 20 10. (m) תְּשִׁיבָה, 21 34. Dillmann also mentions the use of ל for the accusative, and the occasional use of the plural in יָן. He might have added that the relative שֶׁ only occurs once in the MT of the Colloquies (19 29 8); it is found, however, in Lam. 2 4 f. (see LAMENTATIONS).

On the whole, Dillmann has not been able to indicate many distinctly late Hebrew words in the Colloquies; rare words, only to be explained from the Arabic, need not necessarily be late, though the possibility of the late adoption of Arabic words in literary Hebrew cannot be denied.⁴ It would seem that if the writer is of late date (and the other arguments go far to prove that he is so) he took pains to cultivate a classic Hebrew style, and his success shows that the facilities for writing such Hebrew were great; there was probably a regular school for the practice of classic Hebrew writing. The falling off in the Hebrew of Ben Sira is very noticeable.

To place the Book of Job—whether in a larger or a narrower sense—in the age of Jeremiah (Dill., König), or more precisely not long before the siege of Jerusalem, is becoming more and more difficult. It is true, the death of Josiah, and the sad events which rapidly followed, must have prompted the question, 'Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper' (Jer. 12 1; cp Job 21 7)? Moreover, we actually find Jeremiah (20 14-18) cursing the day on which he was born. It is true, both passages are liable to grave suspicion, and may without arbitrariness be regarded as 'secondary'; even Dillmann questions 20 14-18. But even accepting provisionally Jeremiah's authorship of both passages, we cannot draw any critical inference from this. Poetry like that of Job and the Psalms represents, not the scanty band of a prophet's disciples, but that large section of the community which had at length absorbed Jeremiah's

² The scribe may have collected the singular combination of corrupt variants in v. 22 from different manuscripts.

³ See König (Eintl. 417), who, with Dillmann, reads שְׂרִי. Probably the passage is glossatorial. See also König on the variation of usage in Job between אָמַר and אָמַרְתִּי.

ideas. The probability, therefore, is that the poems which contain parallels to passages plausibly ascribed to Jeremiah were written a good while after that prophet's age. It is true the language of Job is so vigorous and, comparatively speaking, so pure (especially when a methodical textual criticism has been applied) that apart from other considerations one's first impulse might be to place such a book rather early. But very early it is impossible to place it, and a time of rapid national decline, like that of Jeremiah, is really less suitable for the composition of such a fine work than any moderately quiet part of the Persian period. As a compromise we might of course refer the work to the exilic period (see Davidson,¹ p. lxvii; Che. Job and Sol. 74). But when we take the ideas of the book into consideration, we see that it is best understood as the provisional summing up of a long period of meditation under the combination of special influences which existed in the post-exilic age and at no other period.

How much later the existing Colloquies were substituted for the original Colloquies or Colloquy, is of course uncertain. The former imply a heightened interest in the problem of suffering. The wise men tell Job that he must have been a great sinner to have been overtaken by such a calamity. So in Is. 63 17 we find the Jewish community asking why Yahwè had caused the Jews to err from his ways, and hardened their hearts so as not to fear him? The company of faithful Jews (=the Servant of Yahwè) could not remember any transgressions sufficient to account for the recent aggravation of their misery. They were 'those who worked righteousness and remembered the ways that God would have' (Is. 64 5a); yet they were compelled to suppose that Israel had somehow broken faith, and become guilty in the eyes of God, so that all their righteous deeds (which they could no more disown than Job could disown his righteousness) were as a filthy garment (Is. 64 5 [4] f.), and consequently they had to hear the weight of God's unaccountable anger. This is analogous to what the three Friends would have had Job say, and what he stoutly refused to say; there is nothing to compare with it in the section consisting of Is. 40-55 (see 40 27 49 14).

The later we bring down the date of the Colloquies the better we can understand not only the atmosphere of political and social unrest (see, e.g., 7 1) which seems to pervade them (cp 12 17-25, 14 1 f.), but also the wide intellectual interests of the author. Even if we restrict our view to Job 3-19, the extent of those interests is very striking; the earlier writer apparently had it in him to say nearly all the best that his successors have said. Apart from their particular controversy, both Job and the Friends state much that is admirable respecting God and human nature, and show an interest in the world of nature which can only be paralleled to some extent in the second part of Isaiah. The angelology and mythological allusions, too, indicate a remarkable freedom from religious scruple, such as we know to have characterised the later period.² Nor must we omit to pay homage to the purity and inwardness of the morality of Job's great self-justification (chap. 31). He may seem to be self-righteous; but this is only due to the predominance of the conception of God as a Judge. He knows equally well with the Friends that essential purity belongs to God alone, though the passage which distinctly expresses this truth (14 4) is plainly an interpolation.³ Job has never really fallen away from God. Nor are the authors of the Colloquies sceptics except as regards an antiquated orthodoxy. They are no doubt in a sense cosmopolitans. Either by hearsay or by travel (cp 6.19-21.29) they have some real acquaintance with the world outside Judæa. But to all that, from a modern Christian point of view, is fundamental in the Jewish religion Job is as loyal as Ezra himself. And what can be more truly prophetic than Job's appeal to God's love against his indiscriminating wrath? All this can hardly have been written much before the close of the Persian period.¹

The Speeches of Yahwè (38-42.6) belong to a poet of the same school as the poem on the Divine Wisdom (23.1-27); they are, however, of somewhat earlier date than that fine poem, which contains one line borrowed from the Speeches (v. 26b; cp 38.25b). The writer's interest in the problem of suffering is but slight. Nor does philosophical speculation attract him: he is an observer—a poetic observer—of nature. Chap. 28 has special affinities with the eulogies of wisdom in Prov. 3.13-20 and 8.22-31. The happy tone, the interest in nature, and in the case of chap. 28 (and parallels) the tendency to hypostatize Wisdom, suggest the bringing down of all these works to the period of widened outlook and greater freedom from anxiety at the beginning of the Greek rule. We need not, however, on this account identify חכמה, 'wisdom,' with the λόγος or the σοφία παθητικός; indeed, such a view would oblige us, with Duhm, to bring down Prov. 8.22-31 and Job 28 to the third century B.C. The Zoroastrian conception of the twofold wisdom² (heavenly and earthly) is old enough to have influenced the Jews: Persian (and Babylonian) influences continued to be felt long after the fall of the Persian Empire.

The various conflicting theories which have been offered as to the purpose of the book will now be seen to proceed from a false assumption.

15. Growth and object of Job. The book of Job has no literary unity, and cannot have had a purpose. It has grown; it has not been made. The different parts of the book, however, had their purpose, which must be sought for by an exegesis unfettered by a priori theories. The earliest writer wished to suggest that righteous Israel's sufferings were an honour, because they showed that Israel's service of God was disinterested. The next writer simply gave expression to the conflicting thoughts of his time on the great problem of suffering; he himself had no definite solution to give. A third writer could only offer the anodyne of the poetic imaginative observation of the wonders of nature. A fourth sought to undo the work of his predecessors by restating a theory which had not, he thought, been adequately represented before. The present book is heterogeneous and amorphous; it gives us, however, a picture of Jewish religious life and thought which is of priceless value. For a subtle and interesting attempt to commend a very different view see § 4 of the Introduction to Budde's commentary.

The genuine Septuagint text has been practically recovered from the Sahidic Version (Coptic of Upper Egypt) of Job published by P.

16. Versions. Agostino Ciasca in 1889; 39.6b-40.7 is the only lacuna. It is shorter than the Hebrew text by nearly 400 stichi. Origen in his Hexapla supplied its deficiencies from Theodotion, marking the insertions by asterisks, and there are still five MSS which give Origen's marks more or less completely (see Hatch, Essays on Biblical Greek, 216). Hatch in 1889 accepted the shorter Septuagint form as that of the original Book of Job, and Bickell (1892-1894), whenever his metrical theory will allow it, follows the Greek.³ Dillmann, however, in the Transactions of the Royal Prussian Academy (Textkritisches zum B.

Job, '90) has subjected Hatch's arguments to a detailed consideration, and has shown that, except in a few cases, the omissions were arbitrarily made by the Greek translator, or, as we might almost better call him, paraphrast. This does not, of course, exclude the possibility that some of the omissions may be justifiable on grounds of internal criticism, and that the translator may have been partly guided by warning signs (Paseks) in the Hebrew text indicating the non-originality of certain passages, some of which signs may easily have become misplaced. See further Budde, Hiob, Einl. xviii ff.; Beer, 'Textkritische Studien zum B. Job,' ZATW 16.297 ff. ('96), 17.97 ff. ('97), 18.257 ff. ('98). The importance of the book lies in its treatment of the text, especially in its attempt at a methodical use of the versions, not so much in its use of a theory of strophes to discover interpolations or lacunæ. P. de Lagarde, Phœnetæ Chaldaicæ, see pp. 1 f. ('72). G. Bickell, Carmina VT metricæ, 150-187 ('82), giving the text of Job arranged according to his metrical theory, marks a step forward; cp Plunk in ZKT, '82, p. 340 ff. G. H. Bateson Wright, The Book of Job, a new critically revised translation, with essays on scansion, date, etc. (intended to follow in the wake of the critical edition of A. Perhaps, however, Budde would have improved his own work by adopting more from Bickell. The theory that the poetical portions (except the eight-line speech of Yahwè and certain passages in tristichs) are composed in four-line strophes cannot be said to have been overthrown by Budde. On Bickell's view of the original Septuagint, see C. Siegfried 'Job' in SBOT (Heb.), '93; cp R. Gottheil, JQR 7.552 ff. ('94). Bickell's work was not in time to be used by Siegfried. J. In the 16th century Mercerus (1573) both for Job and for the 'Solomonic' writings did work of some permanent value. The famous passage, Job 19.25, he explains of Job's hope of a public recognition of his innocence by God in his lifetime. The first strictly philological commentary is that of Albert Schultens, Liber Jobi, 2 vols. JOBAB (יֹבָב), יוֹבָב [BADFL].

1. One of the thirteen tribes called sons of JOKTAN (Gen. 10 29, יוֹבָב [E]; 1 Ch. 1 23 om. B, ωραμ [A]). Its precise seat is unknown, but there may be an echo of the name in that of the Yuhaiab (יְהִיָּב), 1 tribe mentioned in two of Glaser's inscriptions (Skizze, 2 303), which seems to have been subject to the Sabæan king. Cp Di.'s note.

2. b. Zerah, an Edomite king whose city was Bozrah (Gen. 36 33 f., יוֹבָב [A in v. 33], יוֹבָב [E]; 1 Ch. 1 44 f., יוֹבָב [B in v. 44 only]); identified with Job in the appendix to the G version of that book (42 17 b). Cp schol. in Field's Hex. on Gen. 36 1 c.

3. King of Madon, who joined Jabin, king of Hazor, against Joshua (Josh. 11 1, יוֹבָב [L]).

The name Jobab appears twice in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (G. v., § 9, ii. β), 4. b. Shaharaim (1 Ch. 8 9) (see JQR 11 108, § 6), and 5. b. Elpaal (1 Ch. 8 18, יוֹבָב [B]) (see JQR 11 102 ff., § 1, 114, § 13).

Very possibly Jobab is not always correct. Joab or Jonadab is more probable (cp HOBAB); u is often omitted or misread.

T. K. C.

JOCHEBED (יֹכְבֵד), probably 'Yahwē is [my tribe's] glory,' cp §§ 38, 80; יוֹכְבֵד [BAFL] was, according to P, the dōdāh (דָּוָה) or aunt of Amram, who took her to wife; their children were Aaron, Moses, and Miriam (Ex. 6 20 [P], Nu. 26 59 f. [R], -Beθ [A]). The tradition (a) that the mother of Moses was a 'daughter of Levi' (i. e., a woman of the tribe of Levi) was certainly, and the tradition (b) that her name was Jochebed was possibly, earlier than P, because (1) the phrase 'daughter of Levi' is used of Moses' mother in Ex. 21 (E), and (2) names compounded with Jeho- (Jo-) were apparently regarded by P as of somewhat later origin (see Nu. 13 16). It is noteworthy, however, that the narrators nowhere call Moses and Aaron b'nē Amram; we cannot be sure that in the earlier tradition Moses was not like Mel-chizedek, ἀπάτωρ ἀμήτωρ. A son of the second Phinehas (b. Eli) was probably called Jochebed (see ICHABOD). This would hardly have been so if tradition attached the same name to Moses' mother. We may safely assume, however, that Jochebed was a name current in the family of Aaron and Moses from the Sinaitic period, and perhaps it is the long looked-for key to the mysterious name יַקֹּב (Jacob) which has doubtless been worn down in popular use from some longer name, which we need not suppose to have included the divine title el. Cp JACOB, § 1.

On the name see Nestle, Eig. 77 ff.; Gray, HPN 156, and cp NAMES, § 112. G's representation of Jochebed as Amram's cousin (Ex. 6 20) is interesting; a dōdāh could not marry her nephew, according to Lev. 18 12 20 19. But perhaps G is right: בן could easily disappear after בן. Cp KINSHIP, § 5, MARRIAGE, § 2. T. K. C.

JODA. 1. 1 Esd. 5 58 (יודא [A]) = Ezra 3 9, JUDAH (3).

2. (יודא [Ti. WH]), Lk. 3 26 RV, AV JUDA. See GENEALOGIES II., § 3 f.

JOED (יֹדֵד) [Bā., יֹדֵד [Ginsb., misprint?]; יוֹדָד [B, omitting preceding יוֹדע], יוֹדָד [AL], -אָב [N], cp on the name, Ki.'s note 2 Ch. 9 29, SBOT), a Benjamite (Neh. 11 7).

JOEL (יֹאֵל); יוֹהָא [BNAL].

1. b. Pethuel (Joel 1 1), see next art.

2. The eldest son of Samuel the prophet; see SAMUEL. In the parallel passage 1 Ch. 6 28 [13], for הַבְּכֹר יוֹאֵל וְהַבְּכֹר יוֹאֵל (AV the firstborn Vashni and Abiah) we must read יוֹאֵל וְהַבְּכֹר יוֹאֵל (cp RV 'the firstborn Joel and the second Abiah'). The comparison of the two texts illustrates, in an interesting manner, the ways in which errors have found their way into MT. According to the Chronicler (1 Ch. 6 33 [18] and 15 17), Joel is the father of the singer HEMAN (G. v.).

3. The brother of Nathan of Zobah, 1 Ch. 11 38 (so G^{AL}, but G^B in both Ch. and S., followed by Bertheau, Keil, Gesenius, 'the son of Natban') and one of David's heroes. In 2 S. 23 36 his name appears as יוֹאֵל (see IGAL). The correct reading is doubtful, since in S. G^L reads יוֹהָא (G^{BA}, however, read יוֹהָא). For ZOBAB, however, Marquart (Fund. 21) would read הַפְּזָפָה = הַפְּזָפָה in Benjamin.

4. A Simeonite prince (1 Ch. 4 35).

5. In 1 Ch. 5 4 8 Joel would seem to have dropped out of the preceding verse, or else we must insert here the name of one of the sons of Reuben. Pesh. reads here CARMi, which is probably right.

6. A Gadite chief (1 Ch. 5 12).

7. A Kehathite, 1 Ch. 6 36 [12]. In v. 24 [9] his name appears as SHAUL (G. v.). He is mentioned again in 2 Ch. 20 12. See GENEALOGIES I., § 7 (iii. c).

8. b. IZRAHIAH (G. v.), 1 Ch. 7 3 (אֶזְרָאֵל [B]).

9. A Gershonite chief (1 Ch. 15 7 11), descended from Ladan (1 Ch. 23 8). Cp 10 below.

10. b. Jehieli, a Gershonite temple treasurer (1 Ch. 26 22). 'Joel' was perhaps looked upon as a favourite Gershonite name; cp GENEALOGIES I., § 7 (iii. d. n.).

11. b. Pedaiah, a Manassite captain (1 Ch. 27 20).

12. One of the b'ne NEBO in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA I., § 5 end, Ezra 10 43 = 1 Esd. 9 35, JUEL (טוּהָא [B], טוּהָא [A]).

13. b. Zichri, in list of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerusalem (see EZRA II., § 5 b, § 15 [1 a], Neh. 11 9).

JOEL. The second book among the minor prophets is entitled 'The word of Yahwē that came to Joel the which presents several peculiarities that aggravate the difficulty always felt in interpreting an ancient book when the historical situation of the author is obscure. Most Hebrew prophecies contain pointed references to the foreign politics and social relations of the nation at the time. In the book of Joel there are only scanty allusions to Phœnicians, Philistines, Egypt, and Edom, couched in terms applicable to very different ages, while the prophet's own people are exhorted to repentance without specific reference to any of those national sins of which other prophets speak. The occasion of the prophecy, described with great force of rhetoric, is no known historical event, but a plague of locusts, perhaps repeated in successive seasons; and even here there are features in the description which have led many expositors to seek an allegorical interpretation. The most remarkable part of the book is the eschatological picture with which it closes; and the way in which the plague of locusts appears to be taken as foreshadowing the final judgment—the great day or assize of Yahwè, in which Israel's enemies are destroyed—is so unique as greatly to complicate the exegetical problem. It is not therefore surprising that the most various views are still held as to the date and meaning of the book. Allegorists and literalists still contend over the first and still more over the second chapter, and whilst the largest number of recent interpreters accept Credner's view that the prophecy was written in the reign of Joash of Judah, a rising and powerful school of critics follow the view suggested by Vatke (Bib. Theol. 462 f.), and reckon Joel among the post-exilic prophets. Other scholars give yet other dates; see the particulars in the elaborate work of Merx (see below, § 8). The followers of Credner are literalists; the opposite school of moderns includes some literalists (as Duhm), whilst others (like Hilgenfeld, and, in a modified sense, Merx) adopt the old allegorical interpretation which treats the locusts as a figure for the enemies of Jerusalem.

The reasons for placing Joel either earlier or later than the great series of prophets extending from the time when Amos first proclaimed the approach of the Assyrian down to the Babylonian exile are cogent.

2. Alternative dates.

In Joel the enemies of Israel are the nations collectively, and among those specified by name neither Assyria nor Chaldaea finds a place. This circumstance might, if it stood alone, be explained by placing Joel with Zephaniah in the brief interval between the decline of the empire of Nineveh and the advance of the Babylonians. It is further obvious, however, that Joel has no part in the internal struggle between spiritual Yahwè-worship and idolatry which occupied all the prophets from Amos to the captivity. He presupposes a nation of Yahwè-worshippers, whose religion has its centre in the temple and priesthood of Zion, which is indeed conscious of sin, and needs forgiveness and an outpouring of the spirit, but is not visibly divided, as the kingdom of Judah was, between the adherents of spiritual prophecy and a party whose national worship of Yahwè involved for them no fundamental separation from the surrounding nations.

The book, therefore, must have been written before the ethico-spiritual and the popular conceptions of Yahwè came into conscious antagonism, or else after the fall of the state and the restoration of the community of Jerusalem to religious rather than political existence had decided the contest in favour of the prophets, and of the law in which their teaching was ultimately crystallized.

The considerations which have given currency to an early date for Joel are of various kinds. The absence of all mention of the one great oppressing world-power seems most natural before the westward march of Assyria involved Israel in the general politics of Asia. The purity of the style also is urged, and a comparison of Amos 1 2 Joel 3 [4] 16, and Amos 9 13 Joel 3 [4] 18 has been taken as proving that Amos knew our book.

The last argument might be inverted with much greater probability, and numerous points of contact between Joel and other parts of the OT (e.g., Joel 2 2 Exod. 10 14 Joel 2 3 Ezek. 36 35 Joel 3 [4] 10 Mic. 4 3) make it not incredible that the purity of his style—which is rather elegant than original and strongly marked—is in large measure the fruit of literary culture. The absence of allusion to a hostile or oppressing empire may be fairly taken in connection with the fact that the prophecy gives no indication of political life at Jerusalem. When the whole people is mustered in 1 13 f., the elders or sheikhs of the municipality and the priests of the temple are the most prominent figures. The king is not mentioned,—which on Credner's view is explained by assuming that the plague fell in the minority of Joash, when the priest Jehoiada held the reins of power,—and the princes, councillors, and warriors necessary to an independent state, and so often referred to by the prophets before the Exile, are altogether lacking. The nation has only a municipal organisation with a priestly aristocracy, precisely the state of things that prevailed under the Persian empire. That the Persians do not appear as enemies of Yahwè and his people is perfectly natural. They were hard masters but not invaders, and under them the enemies of the Jews were their neighbours, just as appears in Joel.¹

Those, however, who place our prophet in the minority of King Joash, draw a special argument from the mention of Phœnicians, Philistines, and Edomites (3 [4] 4 f. 19), pointing to the revolt of Edom under Joram (2 K. 8 20), and the incursion of the Philistines in the same reign (2 Ch. 21 16 22 1). These were recent events in the time of Joash, and in like manner the Phœnician slave trade in Jewish children is carried back to an early date by the reference in Amos (1 9).

This argument is specious rather than sound. Edom's hostility to Judah was incessant, but the feud reached its full intensity only after the time of Deuteronomy (23 7 [8]), when the Edomites joined the Chaldeans, drew profit from the overthrow of the Jews, whose land they partly occupied, and exercised barbarous cruelty towards the fugitives of Jerusalem (Obad. passim, Mal. 1 2 f. Is. 63). The offence of shedding innocent blood charged on them by Joel, is natural after these events, but hardly so in connection with the revolt against Joram.

As regards the Philistines, it is impossible to lay much weight on the statement of Chronicles, unsupported as it is by the older history, and in Joel the Philistines plainly stand in one category with the Phœnicians, as slave dealers, not as armed foes. Gaza in fact was a slave emporium as early as the time of Amos (1 6), and continued so till Roman times.

Thus, if any inference as to date can be drawn from chap. 3 [4], it must rest on special features of the trade in slaves, which was always an important part of the commerce of the Levant.

In the time of Amos the slaves collected by Philistines and Tyrians were sold en masse to Edom, and presumably went to Egypt or Arabia. Joel complains that they were sold to the Grecians (Javan, Ionians).² It is probable that some Hebrew and Syrian slaves were exported to the Mediterranean coast from a very early date, and Is. 11 11 already speaks of Israelite captives in these districts as well as in Egypt, Ethiopia, and the East.

The traffic in this direction, however, hardly became extensive till a later date.

In Deut. 28 48 Egypt is still the chief goal of the maritime slave trade, and in Ezek. 27 13 Javan exports slaves to Tyre, not conversely. Thus the allusion to Javan in Joel better suits a later date, when Syrian slaves were in special request in Greece.³ The name of Javan is not found in any part of the OT certainly older than Ezekiel. In Joel it seems to stand as a general representative of the distant countries reached by the Mediterranean (in contrast with the southern Arabians, Sabaans, chap. 3 [4] 8), the furthest nation reached by the fleets of the Red Sea. This is precisely the geographical standpoint of the post-exile author of Gen. 10 4, where Javan includes Carthage and Tartessus; cp JAVAN.

Finally, the allusion to Egypt in Joel 3 [4] 19, must on Credner's theory be explained of the invasion of Shishak a century before Joash. From this time down to the last period of the Hebrew monarchy Egypt was not the enemy of Judah.

If the arguments chiefly relied on for an early date are so precarious or can even be turned against their inventors, there are others of an unambiguous kind which make for a date in the Persian period. It appears from chap. 3 1 f. that Joel wrote after the Exile.

The phrase, 'to bring back the captivity' (שוב שְׁבוּתוֹ), would not alone suffice to prove this, for it is used in a wide sense, and perhaps means rather to 'reverse the calamity';⁴ but the dispersion of Israel among the nations, and the allotment of the Holy Land to new occupants, cannot fairly be referred to any calamity less than that of the captivity.

With this the whole standpoint of the prophecy agrees. To Joel Judah and the people of Yahwè are synonyms; Northern Israel has disappeared.

Now it is true that those who take their view of the history from Chronicles, where the kingdom of Ephraim is always treated as a sect outside the true religion, can reconcile this fact with an early date. In ancient times, however, it was not so; and under Joash, the contemporary of Elisha, such a limitation of the people of Yahwè is wholly inconceivable. The earliest prophetic books have quite a different standpoint; otherwise, indeed, the books of northern prophets and historians could never have been admitted into the Jewish canon.

¹ In the AV of 2 17 it appears that subjection to a foreign power is not a present fact but a thing feared. The parallelism, however, and v. 19 justify the now prevalent rendering, 'that the heathen should make a mock of them.'

² The hypothesis of an Arabian Javan, applied to Joel 3 [4] 6 by Credner, Hitz, and others, may be viewed as exploded. See St. De Populo Javan, Giessen Programme, '80 (reprinted in Akademische Reden u. Abhandlungen, '99, 125 f.).

Again, the significant fact that there is no mention of a king and princes, but only of sheikhs and priests, has a force not to be invalidated by the ingenious reference of the book to the time of Joash's minority and the supposed regency of Jehoiaada.¹ More-over the assumption that there was a period before the prophetic conflicts of the eighth century when spiritual prophecy had unchallenged sway, when there was no gross idolatry or superstition, when the priests of Jerusalem, acting in accord with prophets like Joel, held the same place as heads of a pure worship which they occupied after the Exile (cp Ewald, Propheten, 189), is not consistent with history. It rests on the old theory of the antiquity of the Levitical legislation, so that in fact almost² all who place that legislation later than Ezekiel, are agreed that the book of Joel is also late.

In this connection one point deserves special notice. The religious significance of the plague of drought and locusts is expressed in chap. 19 in the observation that the daily meal-offering and drink-offering are cut off, and the token of new blessing is the restoration of this service, chap. 24. In other words, the daily offering is the continual symbol of gracious intercourse between Yahwè and his people and the main office of religion. This conception, which finds its parallel in Dan. 8:11 11:31 12:11, is quite in accordance with the later law (cp the importance attached to the meal-offering and burnt-offering in Neh. 10:33 [34]).

Such is the historical basis which we seem to be able to lay for the study of the exegetical problems of the book.

The style of Joel is clear, and his language presents little difficulty beyond the occurrence of several unique

5. First part. words, which in part may very well be due to errors of the text. On the other hand, the structure of the book, the symbolism, and the connection of the prophet's thoughts, have given rise to much controversy. It seems safest to start from the fact that the prophecy is divided into two well-marked sections by chap. 2:18 19a.

According to the Massoretic vocalisation, which is in harmony with the most ancient exegetical tradition as contained in G, these words are historical: 'Then Yahwè was jealous . . . and answered and said unto his people, Behold,' etc. Such is the natural meaning of the words as vocalised, and the proposal of Merx to change the vowels so as to transform the perfects into futures, and make the priests pray that Yahwè will answer, and deliver the gracious promises that fill the rest of the book, is an exegetical monstrosity not likely to find adherents.

Thus the book falls into two parts. In the first the prophet speaks in his own name, addressing himself to the people in a lively description of a present calamity caused by a terrible plague of locusts which threatens the entire destruction of the country, and appears to be the vehicle of a final consuming judgment (the day of Yahwè).

There is no hope save in repentance and prayer; and in chap. 2:12 the prophet, speaking now for the first time in Yahwè's name, calls the people to a solemn fast at the sanctuary, and invites the intercession of the priests. The calamity is described in the strongest colours of Hebrew hyperbole, and it seems arbitrary to seek too literal an interpretation of details, e.g., to lay weight on the four names of locusts (see Locust), or to take chap. 1:20 of a conflagration produced by drought, when it appears from 2:3 that the ravages of the locusts themselves are compared to those of fire.

When due allowance is made for Eastern rhetoric, there is no occasion to seek in this section anything else than literal locusts.

Nay, the allegorical interpretation, which takes the locusts to be hostile invaders, breaks through the laws of all reasonable writing; for the poetical hyperbole which compares the invading swarms to an army (2:4 f.) would be inconceivably lame if a literal army were already concealed under the figure of the locusts. Nor could the prophet so far forget himself in his allegory as to speak of a victorious host as entering the conquered city like a thief (2:9).

The second part of the book is Yahwè's answer to the people's prayer. The answer begins with a promise of

6. Second part. deliverance from famine, and of fruitful seasons compensating for the ravages of the locusts.

¹ Stade (Op. cit. 17 [Akaal. Reden, 142]) not unreasonably questions whether 2 K. 12:1-3 [2-4] implies the paramount political influence of Jehoiaada.

² Reuss (La Bible, and Gesch. Heil. Schr. AT, § 210 f.), though with hesitation, adhered to the earlier date.

In the new prosperity of the land the union of Yahwè and his people shall be sealed anew, and so Yahwè will proceed to pour down further and higher blessings. The aspiration of Moses (Num. 11:29), and the hope of earlier prophets (Is. 32:15 59:21; cp Jer. 31:33), shall be fully realised in the outpouring of the Spirit on all the Jews and even upon their servants (cp Is. 61:5 with 56:6 f.); and then the great day of judgment, which had seemed to overshadow Jerusalem in the now averted plague, shall draw near with awful tokens of blood and fire and darkness.

The terrors of that day are not for the Jews but for their enemies.

The worshippers of Yahwè on Zion shall be delivered (cp Obad. 7:17, whose words Joel expressly quotes in chap. 2:32 [35]), and it is their heathen enemies, assembled before Jerusalem to war against Yahwè, who shall be mowed down (see JEHOŠAPHAT, VALLEY OF) by no human arm, but by heavenly warriors ('thy mighty ones, O Yahwè,' 3[34] 11). Thus definitely freed from the profane foot of the stranger (cp Is. 52:1), Jerusalem shall abide a holy city for ever. The fertility of the land shall be such as was long ago predicted in Am. 9:13, and streams issuing from the temple, as Ezekiel had described in his picture of the restored Jerusalem (Ezek. 47), shall fertilise the barren Wady of Acacias (cp ABEL-SHITTIM).

Egypt and Edom, on the other hand, shall become desolate, because they have shed the blood of Yahwè's innocents. Cp the similar predictions against Edom, Is. 34:9 f. (Mal. 1:3), and against Egypt, Is. 19:5 f. Ezek. 29. Joel's eschatological picture appears indeed to be largely a combination of elements from older unfulfilled prophecies.

The central feature, the assembling of the nations to judgment, is already found in Zeph. 3:8, and in Ezekiel's prophecy concerning Gog and Magog, where the wonders of fire and blood named in Joel 2:30 [33] are also mentioned (Ezek. 38:22). The other physical features of the great day, the darkening of the lights of heaven, are a standing figure of the prophets from Amos (5:8 9) downwards. It is characteristic of the prophetic eschatology that images suggested by one prophet are adopted by his successors, and gradually become part of the permanent scenery of the last times; and it is a proof of the late date of Joel that almost his whole picture is made up of such features. In this respect there is a close parallelism, extending to minor details, between Joel and the last chapters of Zechariah.

That Joel's delineation of the final deliverance and glory attaches itself directly to the deliverance of the nation from a present calamity is quite in the manner of the prophetic perspective. On the other hand, the fact that the calamity which bulks so largely is natural, not political, is characteristic of the post-exile period.

Other prophets of the same age speak much of dearth and failure of crops, which in Palestine, then as now, were aggravated by bad government, and were far more serious to a small and isolated community than they could ever have been to the old kingdom. It was indeed by no means impossible that Jerusalem might have been altogether undone by the famine caused by the locusts; and so the conception of these visitants as the destroying army, executing Yahwè's final judgment, is really much more natural than appears to us at first sight, and does not need to be explained away by allegory.

The chief argument relied upon by those who still find allegory at least in chap. 2, is the expression

7. Verse 2:20. הַצִּפְרִי, 'the northerner,' in 2:20. In view of the other points of affinity between Joel and Ezekiel, this word inevitably suggests Gog and Magog, and it is difficult to see how a swarm of locusts could receive such a name, or if they came from the N. could perish, as the verse puts it, in the desert between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea. The verse remains a crux interpretum, and no exegesis hitherto given can be deemed thoroughly satisfactory;¹ but the interpretation of the whole book must not be made to hinge on a single word in a verse which might be altogether removed without affecting the general course of the prophet's argument.

The whole verse is perhaps the addition of an allegorising glossator. The prediction in v. 19, that the seasons shall henceforth be fruitful, is given after Yahwè has shown his zeal and pity for Israel, not of course by mere words, but by acts, as appears in v. 20 f., where the verbs are properly perfects, reording that Yahwè has already done great things, and that vegetation has already revived. In other words, the mercy already experienced in the removal of the plague is taken as a pledge of future grace not to stop short till all God's old promises are fulfilled. In this context v. 20 is out of place. Observe also that in v. 25 the locusts are spoken of in the plain language of chap. 1. JOHANNES (ΙΩΑΝΝΗΣ [A]), 1 Esd. 838 929. See JOHANAN, 815.

JOHN (ΙΩΑΝΝΗΣ [ANV, Ti. WH]; WH in Jn. 142 2115 ff. ΙΩΑΝΝΗΣ; for details, see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 1).

1. Father of Mattathias (1 Macc. 21). See MACCABEES i., § 3.

2. Surnamed Caddis or Gaddis, son of Mattathias (1 Macc. 22). See MACCABEES i., § 3.

3. Son of Acco, father of EUPOLEMUS (q.v.), 1 Macc. 817 2 Macc. 411.

4. Surnamed Hyrcanus, son of Simon (1 Macc. 1353 etc.). See MACCABEES i., § 7.

5. An envoy from the Jews to Lysias (2 Macc. 1117).

6. A member of the high-priestly family (ACTS 46) otherwise unknown. D substitutes Jonathan, that is, Jonathan (on the form of the name see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 1), son of the high priest ANNAS, and himself high priest in 36-37 A.D.; he still held a prominent position in 50-52 A.D. and was assassinated at the instigation of Felix the Roman procurator (Jos. Ant. xviii. 53 xx. 85; Bj. ii. 125 f. 133). Blass gives 'Jonathan' in the text of Acts 46, not only in his edition based upon D but also in the other edition which, according to him, was made by Luke. Thus his hypothesis (ACTS, § 17) finds no confirmation here, for it cannot be supposed that Luke would of his own proper motion have substituted a false name for the true. Yet confusion of the names through the carelessness of copyists is hardly more probable. It remains for us to suppose that perhaps a John otherwise unknown to us was really intended; in this case the insertion of Jonathan in D rests, like so much else in this codex, on learned conjecture.

7. Surnamed MARK (q.v.).

8. Father of Simon Peter (Jn. 142 2115-17 RV); AV Jona, Jonas. See BAR-JONA.

9. The 'divine'; the description of the recipient of the Revelation in the title of the Apocalypse in EV, following TR, ἀποκαλυψις Ιωαννου του θεολογου. So 14, 91. Other slightly different short descriptions occur, as well as longer ones, e.g., αποκ. Ιω. του θεολογου και εναγγελιστου (Q), and a very long eulogistic one in 7. 'The Divine,' lit. 'The Theologue,' intimates that John was specially devoted to the presentation of the Logos-doctrine. This form of the title (which is not accepted by modern editors) claims the same origin for the Apocalypse as for the Fourth Gospel, in opposition to the ancient theory of a second John (see APOCALYPSE, § 14; and on John 'the Elder,' JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE).

10 and 11. John the Baptist; and John the son of Zebedee; see below.

JOHN THE BAPTIST (ΙΩΑΝΝΗΣ Ο ΒΑΠΤΙCΤΗΣ [Ti. WH]). The forerunner of JESUS is only less interesting to biblical students than Jesus himself. Twice already his life and work have been referred to (ISRAEL, § 92; JESUS, § 6); it is our present object, to supplement these references by a more connected treatment without undue repetition.

Long before the time of John the Baptist there was a great ascetic prophet who sought his inspiration in the desert, and cried 'Repent ye' with fear-

1. Public appearance. less impartiality before kings and common men. His life was a guiding star to many in the days of John—an age not unlike his own, when alien influences again threatened to extinguish pure Hebrew religion. Not to speak of the ESSENES [7. v.], there was the hermit teacher of Josephus called Banus, who lived in the desert, covered himself with leaves, sustained life with fruits, and bathed frequently, by day and by night, in cold water for religious purity (Jos. Vit. § 2). The same historian also mentions 'John surnamed the Baptist,' who 'was a good man, and commanded the Jews to exercise virtue, both as to justice towards one another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism (βαπτισμῷ συνιέναι); for baptism (τὴν βάπτισιν) would be acceptable to God, if they made use of it, not in order to expiate some sins, but for the purification of the body, provided that the soul was thoroughly purified beforehand by righteousness' (Ant. xviii. 52). That this is a complete statement, no one can believe. The hostility of Antipas, recorded by Josephus himself, is a proof that something more dangerous to established governments than plain moral exhortations had fallen from the lips of the desert preacher. What that was, may be learned from the synoptic gospels.

Shortly before the beginning of the public ministry of Jesus, Johanan (so let us call him) appeared in the wilderness of Judæa,¹ announcing in the old prophetic phraseology the approach of the Messianic judgment and the necessity of immediate turning to God. As he moved about, the number of his followers increased, and he led them to the Jordan (cp BETHABARA), there to give them as representatives of a regenerate people the final purification which attested the reality of their inward change.² It is said to have been the opinion of doctors of the law that the waters of the Jordan were not pure enough for sacred uses.³ Johanan, however, was not to be damped by this; he was no formalist, or he would not have deserted Jerusalem, and called the Pharisees and the Sadducees 'broods of vipers.' At the same time it is worthy of remark that according to Jn. 1:28-32 Johanan had baptised converts at Bethany or Bethabara beyond Jordan—i.e., probably, at Beth-nimrah, which is 13½ m. E. of Jordan—and at Ænon, 'near Salim' (to be emended 'Jerusalem')—i.e., perhaps, 'Ain Kârim, which is a short distance W. of Jerusalem.⁴

As regards his mode of life, Johanan was an ascetic, but not such a one as the hermit Banus of whom 2. Mode of life. Josephus tells us, nor yet a preacher of Essenism (as Grätz supposes). His object was not to make mere ascetics, but to prepare as many as possible for the Messianic judgment, in which only a 'remnant' would escape. His own asceticism was a consequence of his life in the desert; he was not primarily an ascetic but a prophet after the manner of Elijah. Hence 'locusts' (or rather 'carob-beans')⁵ and wild honey were his food, and a cloak of 'camel's hair'⁶ with a broad leather waist-cloth was his dress.

¹ WH read in Mk. 14 ἐγένετο Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτίζων ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ κηρύσσων; TI. καὶ κηρύσσων; Treg. [καὶ] κηρύσσων. RV renders TI.'s text 'John came, who baptised in the wilderness and preached.' But surely the revised text is correct. ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ must go with ἐγένετο (see Mk. 9:33) which cannot mean 'came' (παρεγένετο), and the view that ὁ βαπτίζων is a synonym of ὁ βαπτιστής (Mk. 6:24 f. 823) is most improbable. The article slipped in through the influence of the familiar phrase ὁ βαπτιστής.

² No other exegesis seems reasonable; Jos., as we have seen, sanctions it. The true baptism is spiritual (Ps. 51:7[9]). But it uses an outward symbol, and Johanan, remembering Ezek. 36:25, and having prophetic authority, called those who would know themselves to be purified to baptism. It is no doubt true that baptism was regularly required of Gentile proselytes (see BAPTISM, § 1), but Johanan's baptism had no connection with ceremonial uncleanness.

³ Neub. Géogr. 31.

⁴ See BETHANY, 2; SALIM. Schick (ZDPV 22:21 ff. [190]) actually thinks that the 'wilderness of Judæa' where Johanan preached was the traditional spot, near the hermit's fountain ('Ain el-Habis). He also accepts the traditional birthplace of the Baptist (Nar zaskaryâ).

⁵ See HUSKAS.

⁶ Does 'camel's hair' mean the tough, harsh cloth woven from the rough hair of the camel (cp Jerome)? Or does τριχες, like (perhaps) τριψ in 2 K. 18, mean the skin with the hair? D in Mk.

According to Lk., he adapted, not indeed his standard, but his practical requirements, to the different classes represented in the multitude before him. Certainly the meaning of the primitive tradition was not that anyone who liked might receive the symbolic rite; a course of teaching is presupposed (cp Lk. 37). False ideas had to be corrected. The true and the false children of Abraham had to be distinguished. The true Messianic doctrine had to be made plain. The relative imperfection of the highest spiritual gifts at present attainable had to be inculcated.

The relation of Johanan's ideas to those of his time is considered elsewhere (see ISRAEL, § 92, JESUS, § 6).

3. Relation to Jesus. What we have to do now is to grasp the peculiarity of this great teacher and his relation to Jesus. On both these subjects Jesus himself will enlighten us. But something we can gather from the recorded fragments of his sermons, which all may be, and of which the most important part must be, his own; something too from the scanty details of his history. 'Fragments' is the word which criticism entitles us to use. The sermon given in Mt. 37-12 is even more devoid of unity than the Sermon on the Mount. Let us pause a moment to see where we stand. Exhortation, if not also individual teaching, must, as we have seen, have preceded the symbolic act of plunging his converts individually into the stream of Jordan. But if Matthew is to be followed, the exhortations, which follow the record of the baptisms, were addressed to 'many of the Pharisees and Sadducees' (Mt. 37); this however, is impossible.

For these reasons v. 11 (except indeed καὶ πῦρ) is out of harmony with v. 7. Verses 11 f., must once have been independent; Mk. 17 f. evidently gives a more original form. Verses 8 f. are also not free from difficulty. Verse 9 must have come from another context (cp Jn. 8:38 f.); vv. 7b 10 8 may have stood together as an address to Pharisees (cp Mt. 12:33 f.). The difficult καὶ πῦρ in v. 11 (not in Mk. 18 Acts 15) is evidently due to the assimilation of v. 11 to v. 10 and v. 12 by the editor.¹ It was found in his text of Mt. by Lk. (3:16), but this only proves the antiquity of the alteration.

Artless simplicity, then, characterised Johanan's teaching. Jesus too was simple, but in another sense; he had a natural art in the expression of his thoughts. This simplicity corresponded to the fundamental note of Johanan's character; he was too untrained to see far into the complexities of character. He knew himself to be a 'voice' of God, and this was enough; but he did not know that to represent God fully a prophet must understand human nature. Easily therefore could Johanan rise above the fear of man. He does not hesitate to exasperate the Pharisees by his plain-speaking. Was he more reticent or respectful towards Antipas? We may well doubt this. That the tetrarch considered him a dangerous demagogue (Jos. Ant. xiii. 52) was hardly the whole reason for Johanan's arrest and subsequent execution in the fortress of MACHÆRUS [7. v.]. There was probably some personal offence as well, though the story told in the primitive tradition (Mt. and Mk.)² is not free from chronological and other difficulties (see CHRONOLOGY, § 49; HERODIAN FAMILY, 2), and may be merely what a later generation (accustomed to think of Johanan as a second Elijah) substituted for history.

May we believe that Jesus of Nazareth was numbered among the disciples of Johanan? An affirmative answer has been given;³ but it is as unlikely as the connected view that the baptisms of Johanan were private ceremonial lustrations (cp Mk. 7:1-8). Primitive tradition (Mt., Mk., Lk.) said that Jesus came to Johanan for baptism. Certainly this appears plausible; if Johanan

² Mt. 14:5 and Mk. 6:20 differ. The former passage states that Antipas would have put Johanan to death, were it not that Johanan was revered by the people as a prophet; the latter, that Antipas himself revered Johanan, and was unwilling to put him to death. Mt. seems to draw from two sources.

³ Brandt, Die Evang. Gesch. 458 f.

was a true prophet, how could Jesus absent himself from the gathering of those who had turned to God and who revered his messenger? That Jesus had seen and heard Johanan is probable from the clear impression which he had of the great prophet's character and from the prophet's message of inquiry to Jesus. That Jesus, however, whose views of truth were so much deeper than Johanan's, gained any fresh insight into the will of God from his 'forerunner,' is altogether incredible.

At any rate, Jesus saw in the Baptist a great character and an unrivalled prophet. We have gained much

4. Jesus's references to him. already by limiting our view to the best attested traditional statements; we may gain still more by steeping ourselves in those sayings of Jesus which bear the most distinct marks of genuineness. The highest authority shall tell us what Johanan was, and how he stood related to Jesus.

a. Mt. 11:2-6 Lk. 7:17 ff. 23. The authenticity of this saying of Jesus is proved by Lk's failure to comprehend it (see NAIN). It is certain that Jesus claimed to be the forerunner of the kingdom of heaven; certain too that he rested his claim on such works as these—'the blind receive their sight, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf bear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the glad tidings brought to them,' and that he conceived it possible that moral marvels of this sort would not seem to all to be adequate credentials. Further, it is probable that the occasion assumed for the utterance of this speech is on the whole correct; the only strong doubt can be as to the words 'in prison' (Mt. 11:2), which imply a freedom of intercourse between Johanan and his disciples not likely to have been granted by the suspicious Antipas. If, however, we omit these words¹ (which are responsible for a good deal of erroneous speculation respecting the weakening effect of confinement upon the character), all is plain. The prophet Johanan (before his imprisonment) sends an embassy to one in whom he recognises a spiritual superior, and whose answer he will regard as final. He has heard of the wonderful works of Jesus, which mainly consist, as Jesus himself has said, in the conversion of sinners (Mt. 9:13), and asks, Does Jesus, on the ground of his unparalleled success in this holy work, claim to be the Messiah? The answer virtually is, 'I claim to be what I am; and what I am my works show.' Jesus is more anxious to 'do the works of God' than to receive any official title; he lays bare an infirmity of the time, from which even Johanan has not escaped.

The difficulty of the harmonistic point of view (which recognises all references to Johanan in our four Gospels as equally authoritative) comes out very clearly in the following passage from Bp. Ellicott:—'The exact purpose of this mission will perhaps remain to the end of time a subject of controversy, but it has ever been fairly, and, as it would seem, convincingly urged, that he whose eyes, scarce sixteen months before, had beheld the descending Spirit, whose ears had heard the voice of paternal love and benediction, and who now again had but recently been told of acts of omnipotent power, could himself have never really doubted the truth of his own declaration, that this was indeed "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world"' (Lectures on the Life of our Lord Jesus Christ, 313 f. [62]). Bp. Ellicott agrees with Cyril of Alexandria that the primary object of Johanan's mission was fully to convince his disciples of the Messiahship of Jesus.

b. Mt. 11:7-10 Lk. 7:24-27. c. Mt. 12:39-42 Lk. 11:29-32. Among those who complied with the call of Johanan were both Pharisees (Mt. 3:7) and common people. The former were repelled by Johanan's teaching and by the want of a sign in corroboration of his statement that the Messiah was at hand; the latter recognised Johanan as a prophet. So 'all the people that heard him, and the tax-collectors, recognised God's claims, being baptized with Johanan's baptism, whereas the Pharisees and men of the law frustrated the counsel of God concerning themselves, being not baptized by Johanan' (Lk. 7:29 f.).

Jesus has a telling word for both classes. To the common people he says, 'Yea, verily; ye have been rewarded. The sight of Johanan was worth a journey. Not the reed-like Jonah, but the thunder-prophet Elijah was his symbol. Yea, he is the second Elijah, the messenger who is the Lord's pioneer' (Mal. 3:1 cp 4:5 [3:23]). To the Pharisees, 'Have ye, then, seen no sign? The fault is yours; the sign, the only permitted sign, has been given. For as Jonah was a sign to the Ninevites, so shall also [Johanan] be to this generation' (Lk. 11:30, see below). 'The Ninevites will prove the guilt of this evil class—the Pharisees—for they turned to God at the preaching of Jonah, and surely a greater than Jonah is here. The queen of Sheba will prove the guilt of this evil class, for she came from afar to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and surely a greater than Solomon is here.' (The reader will be on his guard; we have had to go behind the traditional text. But even the best of the current explanations of that text [see JONAH, § 8] is not perfectly satisfactory, and there is some probability that a testimony to John has been converted by the reporters of tradition into a testimony of Jesus to himself. That 'Jonah' and 'Joannes' or Johanan may be identical, is clear from Mt. 16:17 (see BAR-JONA; also JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 1).

The special advantages of this theory—which, except the interpretation of uwa in Mt. 12:29 Lk. 11:29 is due to Brandt, Evang. Gesch. 459, n. 2—are (1) that it accounts for the reference to the Queen of Sheba as well as to the Ninevites, (2) that it makes the 'sign' a new one, and (3) that it relieves Jesus from the appearance of self-laudation. The play upon the names יוחנן Johanna and יונה Jonah is in the familiar Hebrew style. Note also that 'Jonah' and 'Solomon' in (c) correspond to the 'reed' and 'those luxuriously clad' (cp Mt. 6:29) in (b).

d. Mt. 11:11-15 Lk. 7:28 16:16. A still more decisive word on Johanan, spoken some time after his martyrdom. A prophet has hitherto been the highest style of man, and there has been no greater prophet than Johanan. Since his days, however, a change has taken place. The prophets and the law lead up to the second Elijah—Johanan; and in Johanan's person the old order of things passes away. Then comes a difficult saying—especially difficult in Mt.'s form. Already for some time the 'kingdom of heaven' has been the prize of spiritual athletes; the 'violent take it by force.'

But can Jesus have meant this? Surely not. Nor can he refer to blameworthy acts of zealots. The passage can be emended with certainty by the aid of Lk. Read, εὐαγγελίζεσθαι for βιάζεσθαι, and continue, καὶ πάντες εἰς αὐτὴν ἐλπίζουσιν (in Lk., καὶ πᾶς εἰς αὐτὴν ἐλπίζει). How the scribe's errors arose is obvious. The sense is, 'Every one hopes for a share in the Messianic blessings, but without having listened to John's call to repentance, no one will be admitted to it.'

Resch supposes that the original word was פריץ, but if so, βιασθῆναι should correspond to פריצים, and so we arrive at the sense 'the law-breakers take it by force.' Marshall (Crit. Rev. 6:48 [76]) accepts this (only Aramaizing the passage), but is it at all likely that Jesus would have been understood to mean the publicans and harlots?

e. Mt. 11:18 f. Lk. 7:33 f. Johanan kept a perpetual fast (cp Mt. 9:14 Mk. 2:18); Jesus abstained from fasting. It was said of Johanan that he had a δαιμόνιον (see DEMON), i.e., that his inspiration was of questionable origin, that he was a false prophet.

f. Mt. 17:12 Mk. 9:13. After Jesus had definitely assumed the Messianic title, he threw a fresh light on the prophecy in Mal. 4:5 by explaining Elijah to be a symbolic term for Johanan. Nor need any wonder at the abrupt termination of the second Elijah's ministry. If the 'Son of man' must suffer many things, 'as it is written of him,' the forerunner could not hope for a better fate. But his work is not yet finished. Before the 'Son of man' comes again, 'Elijah verily will come, and will restore all things.' Which Elijah? Or shall it be a greater incarnation of zeal and spiritual energy than either the first or the second? Cp Rev. 11:3 (the 'two witnesses').

g. Mt. 21:31 f. (not in Mk. or Lk.). The Pharisees paid no heed to Johanan's insistence on righteousness of life, but the tax-collectors and harlots turned to God and will enter his kingdom (cp HARLOT). Cp Lk. 7 29 f. (quoted already).

It is plain that Jesus felt a greater sympathy with Johanan than with any other of his contemporaries. The

5. Comparison with Jesus. probability is that the latter was much the older; it was therefore too much to expect that within the narrow limits allotted to the activity of each, Johanan should come over to the side of Jesus. For both, a martyr's death was indicated by circumstances. Though neither of them favoured the violent plans of zealots and revolutionists, secular rulers could not help suspecting them, and the spiritual rulers hated them for their hostility to formalism.¹ It was to each doubtless a comfort to know that the other existed and was doing the 'works of God.' Primitive tradition rightly accentuates the inferiority of Johanan to Jesus, and the later Johannine recast of tradition still further emphasises it. Between these two versions of tradition stands the beautiful narrative of Lk. 15-80, which honours the forerunner only less than the Saviour himself is honoured in the still more exquisite and infinitely suggestive story that follows it.

The study of the non-primitive traditions of the life of Johanan belongs to another department (cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 17). We should do a great injustice to the idealising historian of the Fourth Gospel if we separated his statements respecting the forerunner from the rest of his gospel, and contrasted them with earlier traditions. An idealised picture may give much food for thought, and only the coldest of rationalists could disparage it; nor need we admit any idealisation in the words of Jn. 5 35 'He was a burning and a shining lamp.' See JESUS, § 27.

We hear of disciples of John in Mt. 9 14 (Mk. 2 18 Lk. 5 33), 11 2 (Lk. 7 18 f.), 14 12 (Mk. 6 29), Jn. 3 25.

6. Disciples of John. They seem to have followed his strict mode of life, and to have been his faithful assistants, as Elisha was to Elijah. According to Jn. 3 25 RV, 'there arose a questioning on the part of John's disciples with a Jew about purifying'; but the statement is very obscure, and the text seems to be in confusion.

Bentley proposed to emend 'with a Jew' (μετὰ Ἰουδαίου) into 'with [those] of Jesus' (μετὰ τῶν Ἰησοῦ). But 'of Jesus' may more easily be obtained from 'purification' (καθαρ(ι)σμοῦ). 'A Jew about purif[ication]' (Ἰουδαίου περὶ καθαρ) is perhaps a corruption of 'beyond the Jordan' (πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου), words which intruded by accident from v. 26. If so, we should read simply, 'There arose a dispute between John's disciple and those of Jesus.' (Transposition and corruption of letters go together.)

In Acts 18 25 19 2 f. we also appear to meet with disciples of John; but they are there represented as having become believers in Jesus the Messiah (note μαθηταὶ and πιστεύσαντες). One of them is the Alexandrian Jew Apollos, and one may assume that their presence at Ephesus was connected with the arrival of Apollos at the same city. We are not told that Apollos was rebaptized by Paul's companions; but we may infer this from the fact of the rebaptism of the other Johannine Christians (if we may call them so) related in Acts 19 5. What can have led Paul to ask the strange question, 'Did ye receive the holy spirit when ye believed?' which drew the not less strange answer, 'Nay, we did not even hear that there is a "holy spirit"?' That disciples of John knew nothing of the 'holy spirit,' in the strict sense of the word, is of course impossible (see Mt. 3 11). 'Holy spirit' (πνεῦμα ἅγιον) must here be used in a 'pregnant sense,' as in Jn. 7 39; it means the abiding presence of the Spirit, which was accompanied by special gifts for the individual, and the mediation of which was an apostolic privilege (Acts 8 14-16). It is difficult not to see here a disposition on the part of the author of Acts to magnify Paul at the expense of Apollos and his companions. The original report respecting Apollos which was used in Acts 18 24-28 may have been without the closing words of Acts 18 25 ('knowing only the baptism of John'). See APOLLOS. A reference to the later sect of disciples of John is quite out of place.

Ἰωανου]; in 1 Ch. 12 12 Ἰωαν [A], Ἰωαν [B: defective]; in Ezra 8 12 Neh. 6 18 Ἰωαν [BL], in Ezra 10 6 Ἰωαν [sc. A L]; in 1 Esd. 9 1 (= Ezra 10 6) Ἰωας [B]; in 1 Esd. 8 38 [41] (= Ezra 8 12) Ἰωανης [A], Ἰωανης [B]. In Jer. in all 14 places, especially in A and Q, sometimes also in N*, Ἰωαναν, as also 47 [40] 15 Ἰωαννας [Q], 47 [40] 8 Ἰωαν [B], 50 [43] 4 Ἰωαν [N*]. In 1 Ch. 26 3 alone Ἰωαναν does not occur at all, but only Ἰωαν [A] or Ἰωας [B]; in like inanner in 1 Esd. 9 29 (= Ezra 10 28) only Ἰωανης [BA], Ἰωαν [L]. In 1 and 2 Macc. Ἰωανης is invariably found (not Ἰωας, as in B these two books are wanting).

In the NT Ἰωαναν is found in Lk. 3 27. The same name (Ἰωαν), however, underlies not only the NT Ἰωαν(υ)ης, but certainly also the Ἰωας of Mt. 16 17, since in Jn. 1 42 (or in another numeration 1 43), 21 15-17 we find Ἰωαν(υ)ης for the same person—the father of Simon Peter.

Of the various equivalents Ἰωαν comes nearest the most original form (Ἰωαναν) so far as the consonants, Ἰωας so far as the vowels are concerned, whilst the second υ has disappeared in the Græcising of the termination. The same thing has happened also in the forms Ἰωας and Ἰωα, in which, moreover, by the coalescence of the vowels the distinction between this name and that of Ἰωας=Ἰη, Jonah, has disappeared. The variant Ἰωάθας for Ἰωαν(υ)ης in D (Acts 4 6) is a transliteration of Ἰωנָתָן: Josephus gives the same name as Ἰωάθης (Ant. xiii. 1. 2. and often; cp JOHN, 6, col. 2498. Ἰωανης is in strict analogy and the form is therefore possible).

Joanēs is, however, but an artificial Græcism, and we have various indications that the Jews inclined to retain the doubled n in names derived from the root יוּחַן. So, especially, in the feminine Ἀννα (1 S. 1 2 etc.), and also in the masculine Ἀννας (Lk. 3 2 Jn. 18 13 24 Acts 4 6), for which Josephus gives Ἀνανος; also in the variants Ἰωανναν and Ἰωαννας in Jer. (the last also in TR of Lk. 3 27 and in the marginal reading of TR to Jn. 21 15-17); again, in the variant Ἀνναν which 1 Ch. 11 43 [N] Jer. 42 [35] 4 [N] and 1 Esd. 5 30 [A] (|| Ezra 2 46 Neh. 7 49) give for Ἀναν (יוּחָן), and 1 Ch. 19 1 4 [NL] 2 f. [L] for Ἀναν (יוּחָן); and, lastly, in the variant Ἀνναν which B gives in 2 S. 10 1-4 for Hanun (אַנּוּן, A, in vv. 3 f.). It is thus, to begin with, extremely improbable that the feminine Ἰωαννα of Lk. 8 3 24 10 ought to be written with a single ν as is done by WH, for the biblical יוּחָן is an abbreviation of this name (Dalman, Gramm. 142, n. 9). This consideration gives a corresponding probability to the spelling Ἰωαννης, which is found also in Jos. (Ant. x. 9 4, § 168, and often).

Dalman (l.c.) conjectures even that יוּחָן had already come to be pronounced Ἰωανναν, Johannan (cp Jerome in Jes. 8 14: Joannan). Of the shortened Aramaic form יוּחָן¹ adduced by Kautzsch (Bibl.-aram. Gramm. 10) Dalman tells us that it occurs only in the Babylonian Talmud.

A.—JOHN THE APOSTLE AND JOHN THE ELDER IN HISTORY AND IN LEGEND

The call of the two sons of Zebedee to the discipleship is related in Mk. 1 19 f. Mt. 4 21 f. Lk. 5 10 f. (GOSPELS, § 137 a); in the Fourth Gospel it is

2. John, son of Zebedee in NT. usually conjectured that John is meant by the unnamed companion of Andrew who from being a disciple of the Baptist joins the company of Jesus (1 35-40). In the Synoptics John (with his brother James) takes next to Peter the place of greatest prominence among the disciples.

These three alone are witnesses of the transfiguration of Jesus (Mk. 9 2 = Mt. 17 1 = Lk. 9 28). According to Mk. 5 37 = Lk. 8 51 at least, they alone were present at the raising of Jairus' daughter; according to Mk. 14 33 = Mt. 26 37, also, they alone were in close touch with Jesus at Gethsemane. It is only Mk. (1 29 13 3) who tells us that these three were present along with Andrew at the healing of Peter's mother-in-law, and that it was they who, as they looked at Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives, asked Jesus the question as to the time of the destruction of the temple. It is Lk. only (22 8) who relates that the arrangements for the Last Supper were entrusted to Peter and John. Mk. 10 35-41 records that the two brothers asked of Jesus that they might sit, one on his right hand and the other on his left hand, in his glory. In Mt. 20 20 this request is attributed to their mother, who is conjecturally identified with the Salome named in Mk. 15 40 16 1 (see CLOPES, § 2). In Mt. 20 24, however, the indignation of the ten is against (περὶ) the two brothers; the mother would seem therefore to have been introduced by Mt. to exonerate them. According to Mk. 9 38 = Lk. 9 49 it is John who reports to Jesus the attempt of the disciples to forbid the man who was casting out devils in the name of Jesus without being a follower. With James, according to Lk. 9 54, John would fain have called down fire from heaven upon the Samaritan village which would not receive Jesus as he was journeying to Jerusalem.

Interpreters are very ready to bring into connection with the incident in Lk. 9 54, just referred to, the name 'Sons of thunder.' According to Mk. 3 17, this name had already been given to the two brothers on their call to the discipleship. In that case, however, the bestowal of the designation would have been anticipatory, just as Simon in like manner, according to Mk. 3 16, received the name of Peter at his call, although his confession at Cæsarea Philippi offers a more fitting occasion. Mt. (16 18) alone, however, transfers it to this period, connecting it with an incident that is certainly unhistorical (GOSPELS, § 136). On the real obscurity of the designation of the sons of Zebedee see BOANERGES.

Of all the incidents in the Synoptic Gospels enumerated above, only the last three (brothers' request; man casting out devils; fire from heaven) can be regarded as throwing light on the character of John; and the third of these is recorded only by Lk., in whom some critics have been disposed to see a certain prejudice against the original apostles (GOSPELS, § 114). None of the three traits can be said, however, to be inconsistent with the most trustworthy of all the references to John which we possess. According to Gal. 2 9, John was one of the three 'pillars' of the church at Jerusalem, Peter and James the brother of Jesus being the other two. John must thus in any case be reckoned as supporting the Jewish-Christian view of things, although we have no means of knowing whether he was of the stricter school of James or of the milder one of Peter (see COUNCIL, § 3). According to Acts 3 1-11 he and Peter healed a lame man, according to 4 13 19 the same two made their defence before the synedrium, according to 8 14 they both went to Samaria to put the apostolic seal upon the mission work of Philip here. This last statement, however, as well as the healing of the lame man, is not without its difficulties (see ACTS, §§ 4, 16).

Since the time of Irenæus ecclesiastical tradition has been unanimous in holding that after Paul's departure

3. Sojourn in Ephesus. from Asia Minor John the apostle took up his abode in Ephesus, where he held a leading position throughout the whole church of Asia Minor. Irenæus himself vouches for this in many places: ii. 33 3 [22 5];¹ iii. 1 2 [1] 3 4; v. 30 1 33 3 f.; fragm. nos. 2 and 3; to be found also in Eus. HE iii. 23 3; v. 8 4-6; iv. 14 3-7; v. 24 12-17 20 4-8. In the last-cited passage (the letter to Florinus) Irenæus appeals expressly to the fact that in his youth (as παῖς; in his early youth, πρώτῃ ἡλικίᾳ, according to iii. 3 4) he had heard his teacher Polycarp in Smyrna tell much about the apostle John who in turn had been Polycarp's teacher. Besides Polycarp he names also Papias the companion (ἐταῖρος) of Polycarp as having been a hearer of the apostle.

¹ The references to Irenæus in this article are, in the first instance, to Harvey; those in square brackets are to Massuet, the edition current in Germany.

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

The same apostle is intended also by Polycrates of Ephesus when in his letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, about 196 A. D. (Eus. HE iii. 31₃ v. 24₃) he relates of John who lay on the bosom of the Lord, and wore the high-priestly petalon, that he was buried in Ephesus. Even Justin must have held the Ephesian John to be the apostle of that name if he assumed, or remembered, that the Apocalypse (which he ascribes to the apostle), must, on account of the authority over the churches of Asia Minor claimed by its author, have been written by a distinguished church-leader of that province. Yet the παρ' ἡμῶν ἀνθρ τῆς (Dial. 81) with which he introduces the apostle John designates him merely as a Christian—the contrast being with a psalmist—and implies nothing as to the place of his residence.

The testimony of Papias (see GOSPELS, §§ 67 ff.), bishop of Hierapolis in Asia is, as we understand it, this: 'But as many things also as I once well learned from the mouths of the elders and well committed to memory I shall not hesitate to set down [or commit to writing] for thee, together with the interpretations [appropriate to them], guaranteeing their truth. For I took pleasure not, as the many do, in those who speak much, but in those that teach the things that are true; nor in those who bring to remembrance the foreign commandments, but in those who bring to remembrance the commandments that were given by the Lord to faith and have come to us from the truth itself. But if anywhere anyone also should come who had companied with the elders I ascertained [first of all] the sayings of the elders [‘as to this’: not, ‘to wit’] what Andrew or what Peter had said, or what Philip or what Thomas or James or what John or Matthew or any other of the disciples of the Lord [had said] and [secondly] what Aristion and John the Elder the disciples of the Lord say. For I supposed that the things [to be derived] from books were not of such profit to me as the things [derived] from the living and abiding utterance.'

(a) According to this declaration Papias himself had once spoken with the 'elders.' Otherwise the third sentence ('But if anywhere,' etc.) would only be an otiose repetition of the first; moreover the 'from the mouths of' (παρά) in the first sentence denotes direct intercourse. Besides speaking with them he spoke also with their disciples (or the disciples of others)—at a later period, of course, when he was separated by distance from the elders themselves.

(b) The elders may indeed be officials of the church; but if they are, it is not in virtue of this attribute that they come into Papias's consideration; for their official position does not as such in any way qualify them to make valuable communications relating to events of the life of Jesus. For this function the persons best qualified would be apostles; but these are excluded. It would be arrogance on the part of Papias were he to undertake to guarantee the truth of any communications of theirs. It will be necessary, furthermore, to pay due attention to the distinction implied by Papias when he used 'he had said' (εἶπεν) in the one case and 'they say' (λέγουσιν) in the other. He means by it that of the nine persons named only the last two were still alive, the first seven, namely the apostles, were not, and this applies not merely to the time of his writing, but also to the time when he was collecting his notes (cp 'I ascertained'). Lastly, we have in Irenæus a very close analogy to guide us to what we ought here to understand by elders. Irenæus says (v. 333): quemadmodum presbyteri meminereunt qui Johannem discipulum domini viderunt;¹ v. 51 οἱ πρεσβύτεροι τῶν ἀποστόλων μαθηταί;² v. 361: presbyteri, apostolorum discipuli;² iv. 422 [271] even: quemadmodum audivi a quodam presbytero, qui audierat ab his qui apostolos viderant et ab his qui didicerant.¹ Thus 'elders' must be taken to mean persons of advanced age who may or may not have been elders of the church, but in no case were apostles, and who were a guarantee for correct tradition only in virtue of their years. Cp GOSPELS, § 71.

(c) From this it follows that the third sentence of the fragment under discussion must not be interpreted as if it meant 'I asked the companions of the elders as to the words of the elders, to wit what Andrew, etc., had said;' but: 'I inquired of them about the sayings of the elders as to what Andrew, etc., had said.' Thus we have to distinguish four steps: the apostles, the elders, the companions of the elders, Papias.

(d) John the Elder is distinguished by Papias from John the Apostle, to whom, if we are to judge by the place assigned to him in the narrative, Papias cannot have attributed any special importance. It is difficult to understand how any person can be bold enough to deny this distinction. Some indeed who formerly did so are now in point of fact beginning to see how impossible it is, but as a consequence allow themselves to be led to a step which is just as audacious,—the deletion, namely, of the words 'or what John' (ἢ τὶ Ἰωάννης). So Haussleiter (Theol. Lit.-Blatt, '96, 465-468), on the ground of a casual conjecture of Renan's (L'Antechrist, 562); Zahn (Forsch. 6145 f.) is almost inclined to agree. No plausible ground whatever can be alleged for such a step.

It is said that the three words destroy the symmetrical enumeration of the apostles in pairs. But there are only two pairs; at the beginning Andrew and Peter as being brothers, and at the end precisely John and Matthew, the 'what' (τὶ) being repeated before Ἰωάννης while it is omitted before Ἰάκωβος. Were this not so, James and John would, as being brothers, constitute a pair, and this would be again a reason why Ἰωάννης should not be regarded as breaking the symmetry. Over and above all this, however, it is by no means certain whether Papias intended to give the names in pairs at all.

(e) It is difficult to come to any satisfactory conclusion regarding this John the Elder. If 'elder' as applied to him has the same meaning as elsewhere, we should be compelled to say that he had enjoyed no personal acquaintance with Jesus; so also of Aristion, who stands in the same category with him; but this personal acquaintance is claimed for them by the added words 'the disciples of the Lord' (οἱ τοῦ κυρίου μαθηταί). This expression has been used immediately before, in the stricter sense, of the apostles; in the case of Aristion and John the Elder it is clearly used in a somewhat wider meaning, yet by no means so widely as in Acts 91, where all Christians are so called; for in that case it would be quite superfluous here. A personal yet not long-continued acquaintance with Jesus, therefore, will be what is meant. Such acquaintance would seem to be excluded if Papias as late as 140 or 145-160 A. D. (at which date according to Harnack he wrote his book; cp § 48 e) had spoken with both. This, however, he does not say; his expression may quite well be taken as referring to an earlier time. This is not precluded by the fact that he inquires of other men as to the utterances of these two also; this was only to be expected if he was no longer able to meet them personally at the later date even if he had heard them at the earlier.

It would effectually simplify matters if we might with Edwin Abbott (Exp. '95, 1333-346; previously, Renan, Antechr. 345, n. 2) read 'the disciples of the Lord's disciples' (οἱ τῶν τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν μαθηταί) or with Bacon (JBL, '98, 176-183), 'the disciples of these (οἱ τούτων μαθηταί) or if, as in GOSPELS, § 70 (3), we were to delete οἱ τοῦ κυρίου μαθηταί. Such a course, however, must be admitted to be bold, and it does not seem too difficult to suppose that Papias in his youth had spoken with two personal disciples of Jesus and yet, even while they were still alive, had received further utterances of theirs from their disciples. By this supposition we avoid conflict with the statement of Eusebius (HE iii. 397) that Papias called himself a hearer of Aristion and John the Elder, although it is permissible to doubt whether Eusebius took this piece of information from any words of Papias other than those already quoted above (GOSPELS, § 70).

² 'The elders who were disciples of the apostles.'

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

(f) On the other hand, owing to this difficulty it seems preferable to take the words ἄ τε Ἀριστίων . . . λέγουσιν as directly dependent on ἀνέκρινον, so that they do not mean 'I sought to learn of the disciples of the elders the words of the elders as to what Aristion and John the Elder said.' On this last construction we should have two intermediate links between these two men and Papias, as between the apostles and Papias. The other interpretation is therefore preferable: 'I sought to learn of the disciples of the elders the sayings of Aristion and of John the Elder which they had personally received from them.'

(g) At this point the assumption, that Papias in his youth knew the apostles also, as well as Aristion and John the Elder, becomes tempting. In that case, however, he would have referred expressly to them and not have spoken thus vaguely about 'elders.'

(h) In a MS of the Chronicle of George the Monk (= Georgios Hamartōlos) iii. 134r it is stated that 'John the apostle after he had written his gospel suffered martyrdom, for Papias in the second book of the λόγια κυριακά says that he was put to death by the Jews, thus plainly fulfilling along with his brother the prophecy of Christ regarding them and their own confession and common agreement concerning him.'¹ Mk. 10:38 f. is here intended; it is in fact cited immediately afterwards in the MS, which proceeds to state that Origen also in his commentary on Matthew says he has learned from the successors of the apostles that John had been a martyr. When this passage was first brought into notice by de Muralt in his edition of Georgios ('59, p. xvii f.) and afterwards more widely by Nolte (Tüb. Quartalschr., '62, p. 466), critics were severely censured for accepting as true a statement coming from the ninth century while they rejected so many that came from the second. The statement in the Georgios Hamartōlos MS, however, found some confirmation when the following words from an epitome, dating from the seventh or the eighth century and probably based on the Chronicle of Philip of Sidē (circa 430 A.D.), were published by de Boor (Texte u. Untersuchungen, v. 2, '88, p. 170): 'Papias says in his second book that John the Divine [i.e., the apostle] and his brother James were slain by the Jews' (Παπίας ἐν τῷ δευτέρῳ λόγῳ λέγει, ὅτι Ἰωάννης ὁ θεολόγος καὶ Ἰάκωβος ὁ ἀδελφὸς αὐτοῦ ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνῆρέθησαν).

(i) It has been attempted in a great variety of ways to weaken the force of this passage.

Lightfoot (Ess. on Supernat. Rel. 211 f.) supposed that what Georgios actually wrote may have run in the original somewhat in this way: 'Papias says that John [was condemned by the Roman emperor (and sent) to Patmos, for bearing witness (to the truth) while James] was slain by the Jews.' Harnack (Gesch. d. altchr. Litt. ii. [= Chronologie] 1 665-667) concurs: the words interpolated by Lightfoot must have been omitted by an oversight, and the mention in Georgios of the brother of John rightly suggested to some later copyist that something was missing, but he wrongly supplied the omission in the way we read in de Boor. Zahn (Forsch. 6 147-151), on the other hand, points out that in Georgios the complete passage on John's martyrdom and on Papias occurs only in a single MS: in twenty-six others its place, from the words μαρτυρίῳ κατήλωται, is taken by the expression ἐν εἰρήῃ ἀνεπαύσατο. He regards it therefore as an interpolation. Whether written by Georgios or by an interpolator, however, the exact citation of the second Book of Papias shows that there was at least some warrant in Papias for the statement. So far as Origen is concerned, the passage, it is true, is incorrect. Origen (tom. in Mt. 166, ed. Delarue, 3719 f.) does not say he has derived his information from the successors of the apostles, but only that "tradition teaches," and does not speak of the martyrdom of death but only of that of banishment. What follows from this, however, is only that this excerptor of Origen has not read accurately, not that he

on his own part cannot possibly have written anything about John's death by martyrdom. Zahn expressly concedes that the excerptors (or, if one made use of the other, the older excerptor) had found in Papias that John was put to death by the Jews; but maintains that Papias was here certainly referring to the Baptist. It must be admitted that Papias would not have used the expression 'the divine' (ὁ θεολόγος) here; according to Zahn it was not applied to the apostle earlier than the fourth century. On the other hand, it is hardly conceivable that in Papias the expression could have allowed a confusion of the Baptist with the apostle.

(k) A more serious question is this—whether Papias was speaking of John of Asia Minor or of John the apostle (if we assume the two to be distinct). Now, the tradition that John of Asia Minor did not suffer death by martyrdom becomes so firmly established soon after the time of Papias (§ 3) that it is difficult to believe Papias himself can have said the opposite. Moreover, in Ephesus the Jews could hardly have had the power and the courage to put to death a Christian bishop. It is quite another matter, however, if what Papias meant to say was that John the apostle, as distinct from the Ephesian John, was put to death by the Jews somewhere else—say, for example, in Palestine, where this would have been least difficult of accomplishment.

That the saying does not refer merely to John's brother James is made probable also by the vague expression 'by Jews' (ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων). If James alone had been in question it would more naturally have run that he was put to death by Herod Agrippa, as of the Baptist it would have been said that Herod Antipas had caused him to be put to death. The vagueness is most easily accounted for if John met his death at the hands of other Jews who could not be further specified. Papias need not have meant, of course, that John's death happened at the same time with that of his brother James.

(l) It must be conceded that the unacquaintance shown by all church fathers down to the time of Philip of Sidē (or his excerptors) with the statement of Papias now in question is very remarkable. Eusebius, however, who had read Papias with great care, may easily have set it down among the 'things strange' (or 'paradoxical, παράδοξα) and 'partaking of the legendary' (μυθικώτερα) which according to HE iii. 398¹¹ he had often discovered in him.

According to Zahn, Eusebius would hardly have allowed it to escape him, as it was fitted to be of service to him in connection with his view that the Apocalypse was written not by John the apostle but by John the Elder. But Eusebius referred the Fourth Gospel and the First Johannine Epistle also to the Ephesian John, and thus the statement in question would have been a very two-edged one if he had employed it against the apostolic origin of the Apocalypse.

Irenæus, moreover, and others were already so deeply imbued with the belief that the Ephesian John was the apostle that we may with most probability suppose them to have regarded as a mere oversight, and therefore to have passed over in silence, a contrary allegation in Papias whom they in other things valued highly.

For the same reason, we cannot follow Zahn in the further argument against the existence in Papias of the statement as to the death of the apostle—that as early as the second century the fables about the cup of poison and the bath of boiling oil (§ 8 f.) had already been invented in order to supply a fulfilment of the prophecy in Mk 10:38 f. These fables were current concerning the Ephesian John, whose peaceful death had long been accepted; it was therefore necessary that those martyrdoms by which Mk 10:38 f. might seem to have been fulfilled should not be represented as martyrdoms to the death. Thus they could not in any way have been rendered superfluous by the statement of Papias; at most, the rise of the legends might have been checked by it—only however, as has been shown, on the assumption, which will not work, that finding them in Papias led to the abandonment of the belief in the peaceful death of John the apostle who was identified with the Ephesian John.

(m) Lastly, the most serious difficulty of all is found in Jn. 21. Here in v. 23 it is presupposed that John, unlike Peter, is not to die a martyr's death. But again the question comes to be, which John is intended. If it be the case that the Ephesian John constituted the centre of the circle from which the Fourth Gospel emanated, it is only natural that in the appendix, chap. 21, his end should be referred to. What we have to ask here is merely how it could have come about that the apostle John should have been indicated in the Fourth Gospel as its guarantor. On this point see § 41.

The result obtained from Papias is strongly supported by the fact that, apart from the writers named in § 3, no ecclesiastical writer of the second century betrays any knowledge of a residence of the apostle John in Ephesus. Ignatius in his epistle to the Romans (43) mentions the apostles who had for them a special importance, viz. Peter and Paul; in that to the Ephesians (122) he names only Paul, not John. Polycarp (32 9: 113) speaks to the Philippian only of Paul and the 'other apostles,' not of his teacher John. Justin and Hegesippus in like manner tell nothing about John. In the Muratorian fragment, lines 9-16, John is found in the company of his fellow-disciples (and bishops) in writing his gospel. He thus seems to be thought of as still living in Jerusalem. In Acts 20²⁹ f. those who were to come into the church of Ephesus after Paul's departure would assuredly not have been designated as evil wolves if the apostle John had been his successor there. The passage may with confidence be taken to be a vaticinium ex eventu, and even were it not so, the author of Acts would, in his great regard for the original apostles, certainly have toned it down if he had known that one of them had succeeded Paul. Since the epistle to the Ephesians does not come from the pen of Paul, it is also important to notice that only Paul is mentioned while yet in 2^{oo} the apostles and prophets as a whole are designated as forming the foundation of the church. So also with the Pastoral Epistles, where Ephesus is touched on in 1 Tim. 13 2 Tim. 1:18, and with the epistles of Peter, of which the first is addressed to Asia Minor (11) and the second to the readers of the first (31). Special mention is due to the Gnostic Heracleon cited by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 9 71, p. 595). He says that Matthew, Philip, Thomas, Levi, and many others do not belong to the number of those who for their open profession of the Christian faith had suffered the martyr's death. The apostle John is not named here, and yet he would have been entitled to the first place in the list had Heracleon known the tradition as to his peaceful end.

Identity of name has led to confusion in other well-known cases also, with the regular result—in accordance with the tendencies of that age—that a non-apostolic person, held in high esteem in some particular locality, came to be regarded as an apostle. The Philip who had four virgin daughters endowed with the gift of prophecy is expressly designated in Acts 218 f. as an evangelist and as one of the Seven (deacons) of Acts 65. Polycrates of Ephesus (circa 196 A.D.) holds him for the apostle of that name and states that he was buried in Hierapolis (ap. Eus. HE iii. 313, v. 242). Clement of Alexandria falls into the same confusion (Strom. iii. 652, p. 535), only adding that Philip gave his daughters in marriage. Even Eusebius, who yet himself clears away the error of Irenæus that Papias had personally known John and other apostles (HE iii. 395-7), affirms in the very same chapter (§ 9) not only that this Philip was the apostle (so also iii. 312) but also, further, that Papias knew him personally (for another view see GOSPELS, § 72, n. 1). The elder whom in iv. 422 [27 1] Irenæus has designated as a disciple of the disciples of the apostles (for the text, see § 4 b) he soon afterwards (iv. 491 [321]) calls a senior, apostolorum discipulus. The James who in Acts 15:13 takes part in the Council of Jerusalem he takes to be (iii. 1218 [15]) the same as the son of Zebedee whose death has been already recorded in Acts 122. For further instances of the same sort, see § 49 b.

In view of such gross carelessness on the part of the leading authorities for ecclesiastical tradition, the less hesitation need be felt in giving expression to the result which has been gained with ever-increasing security from the continued examination of their utterances.

7. Conclusion as to John of Asia Minor.

When set forth in 1840 by Lützelberger (Die kirchliche Tradition über den Apostel Johannes), and even at a later date by Keim and Scholten, it was treated as hypercriticism and was resisted even by such critics as Hilgenfeld and Krenkel (Der Apostel Johannes, 71, 133-178). It is now maintained by Bousset (see APOCALYPSE, § 15 f., and cp Meyer's *Komm. zur Apokalypse*⁶), '06, pp. 34-48) and by Harnack (Gesch. der altchristl. Litt. ii. [= Chronologie] 1 [97] 659-662), who yet are so conservative as to attribute the contents of the Fourth Gospel, at least in part, to reports of an eye-witness, or even of the apostle John himself (§ 55 b c).

(a) There were two Johns—the apostle and the Elder. The name 'elder' attached to the person of the latter in a pre-eminent degree.¹ In the circle of his adherents he was named 'the Elder,' κατ' ἐξοχήν, perhaps so much so that his proper name, John, was even found superfluous. He was a 'disciple of the Lord' (μαθητῆς τοῦ κυρίου) in the wider sense of the word (§ 4 e). It was he who, towards the end of the first century, acquired the leading position in Ephesus of which we read, and he it was that was heard by Polycarp, who spoke of him to the youthful Irenæus. In speaking of him Polycarp was wont to call him a 'disciple of the Lord.' This is the expression which is responsible for the misunderstanding of Irenæus that he was an apostle.¹ This conjecture, however bold it may appear, is confirmed by the fact, also established by Zahn, that Irenæus regularly calls this John 'disciple of the Lord' while yet he always applies the word 'apostle' to Paul. Similarly Polycrates, the other chief witness for the Ephesian residence of the apostle John, designates the latter not as 'apostle' but only as 'witness and teacher' (μάρτυς καὶ διδάσκαλος) (cp the passages of Eusebius cited in § 3).

Eusebius in his Chronicle (ad annum Abrah. 2114; ed. Schöne, ii. p. 162) still copied the error of Irenæus, that Papias had been a disciple of the apostle John. Had he not subsequently noticed it as he was composing his Ecclesiastical History and preserved for us the most important words of Papias, we should have been for ever condemned to remain under the dominion of this mistake.

(b) Eusebius, however, did not draw the further consequence which follows for Polycarp also, from his discovery of the error of Irenæus. Irenæus calls Papias the hearer of John and companion of Polycarp. Now, as he regards Polycarp also as a hearer of the apostle, it cannot be open to doubt that he regards the two as companions for the reason that both were hearers of one and the same master. What has now been ascertained as regards Papias will in that case hold good for Polycarp also; his master was not the apostle, as Eusebius still (HE iii. 361) assumes, but the Elder.

(c) Confusion was introduced into the question by Dionysius of Alexandria, who (in Eus. HE vii. 2516) took the statement that two graves of 'John' at Ephesus were spoken of as basis for the conjecture that therefore two prominent men of the name of John had been contemporaries in that city (in reality of course there may very readily have been two places to which, according to different traditions, the grave of the one John was conjecturally assigned). By the one John he understood the apostle, by the other some John of Asia Minor. Eusebius (HE iii. 395 f.) carried the hypothesis further, that this second John was John the Elder. The conservative theologians, also, are rightly agreed in pronouncing against the contemporary presence of two Johns in Ephesus, inasmuch as the contemporary activity of two men of such outstanding rank is nowhere affirmed, and indeed is excluded by the universal tradition of one Ephesian John. All the more remarkable is their error in declaring the one Ephesian John to have been the apostle, and in eliminating the Elder alike from the words of Papias and from history. Both Johns existed; but this established fact can be harmonised with the leading position of the one in Ephesus where he brooks no rival only on the hypothesis that the apostle carried on his labours, and closed his life, elsewhere. But in this case it is by no means difficult to suppose that he died a martyr's death. As regards most of the apostles, we know nothing either of their later activities, or of the manner in which they came by their death. The sooner the veneration of the church concentrated itself upon the John of Asia Minor, all the more readily could the son of Zebedee pass into oblivion.

¹ How little need there is for scruple in attributing to Irenæus a misunderstanding even of the words of Polycarp is taught by the following circumstance: the one detail which he gives as from the mouth of Polycarp about John (the encounter of John with Cerinthus, see § 8), Irenæus on his own showing had not himself heard, but had come to know it indirectly.

In proportion as this confusion gained currency does it become easy to understand how an abundance of tradition should gather around the name of John, by which essentially the John of Ephesus was understood.

8. Other later traditions.

(a) Irenæus is our earliest authority for the statement that John lived in Ephesus down to the reign of Trajan (§ 3). He further records (iii. 84 [3], ap. Eus. HE iii. 286=iv. 146) that John, when he went to take a bath in Ephesus, and saw Cerinthus within, rushed away from the room without bathing, uttering the words 'Let us flee, lest the room should indeed fall in, for Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth, is within.' Clement of Alexandria (Quis div. salv. 4295*f.*; also ap. Eus. HE iii. 235-19) is our authority for the pretty story that John had converted a certain youth, and, after he had relapsed and become a robber, won him back by allowing himself to be made a captive by the robber-band and thus coming into touch with him again. We owe to Jerome (on Gal. 610) the story that in advanced age John was still able once and again in the congregation to say, filii, diligite alterutrum.

(b) The most important of the remaining traditions are these: John remained a virgin till his death; when he intended marrying, or when his father wished him to marry, he was warned against it by a divine voice. He was compelled to drink a cup of poison, and was plunged into a cauldron of boiling oil, but in both cases passed the ordeal unharmed. After one or other of these experiences he was banished in the reign of Domitian to the isle of Patmos; under Nerva he was allowed to return to Ephesus. A large number of miracles of most various kinds are ascribed to him. At last he caused a grave to be dug for himself, laid himself down in it and died. On the following day his body was no longer to be found.

Lipsius (Apocr. Apostelgesch. 1348-542, '83, and elsewhere) refers all the traditions enumerated in § 8 b to a work that still survives in fragments (or catholic redactions),¹ the Acta Johannis

9. Credibility of these traditions. which formed a part of the περίοδοι τῶν ἀποστόλων ('Wanderings of the apostles') ascribed to Leucius (Charinus), of Gnostic origin, and dating from somewhere between 160 and 170 A.D. Zahn, who in his edition of the Acta Johannis in 1880 had sought to establish the year 130 A.D. as its date, had already in his Gesch. d. Kanons, 2856-865, '92, accepted the view of Lipsius as to the date, and after the publication of further portions of this text² has also conceded that it had its origin in the school of the Gnostic Valentinus (Forsch. 614-18, and already in Neue kirchl. Ztschr., '99, pp. 191-218).

For the spirit in which this work is conceived we may perhaps point to the story to the effect that John once in an inn found his bed swarming with vermin. He ordered them out of the chamber for the night. To the great astonishment of his companions, who had ridiculed him, on the following morning they saw the whole band of banished inmates waiting before the chamber door till John should allow them to return.

In the case of several of the other stories the manner of their origin is very transparent. Lifelong virginity is the ideal of manhood in the Apocalypse (Rev. 144), of which 'John' is the author. A martyrdom was foretold for him as well as for his brother James by Jesus according to Mk. 1038*f.* = Mt. 2022*f.* To the figurative 'baptism' of which Jesus here speaks the baptism in boiling oil corresponds in a literal sense as exactly as possible, just as the 'cup' corresponds to the draught of poison. Of John's drinking of that cup without harm tradition preserved a precedent in what was related of Justus Barsabbas, regarding whom Papias told a like story (ap. Eus. HE iii. 399). The banishment to Patmos is open to very grave suspicion that it arose out of a misunderstanding of Rev. 19. The words 'I was on the isle of Patmos for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus' by no means necessarily imply a banishment; it is also possible that they may be intended to describe a voluntary journey either in flight after having freely declared the word of God and the testimony concerning Jesus, or for missionary purposes.

² James, Texts and Studies, v. 1, '97, pp. 1-25; cp 144-154, as also Acta apoc. ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. 1, '98, pp. 160-216.

B.—AUTHORSHIP OF THE APOCALYPSE

Coming now to the question whether the apostle John (or, on the other assumption, the Elder) was the author of all the five NT writings ascribed to John, as regards the Apocalypse we must in the first instance proceed on the assumption that the book is a unity.

(a) On this assumption the spirit of the entire book can be urged as an argument for the apostle's authorship: its eschatological contents, its Jewish-Christian character, its view of the Gentiles who are becoming Christians as proselytes who are being added to the twelve tribes of Israel (79-17) while yet the whole people of God continues to be represented as numbering twelve times twelve thousand (141), its violent irreconcilable hostility to the enemies in the outside world (1118 148-11 166 186-8) as well as to the false teachers within the churches (2614*f.* 20-22). The fiery prophetic utterance which the writer employs need not surprise us even in advanced old age, in a man who, we are to suppose, had cherished thoughts like these all his life long. Nor need we wonder at his calling himself not an apostle but only a minister of Christ and a prophet (11 229); for an apocalypse, it is only these last two attributes that come into account.

(b) On the other hand, the reference to the sojourn in Patmos (19) must not be taken as positive evidence for the apostle's authorship (§ 9). The technical erudition manifested not only in an intimate acquaintance with the contents of the OT, but also in bold applications of these to new conditions, and in an arrangement of the entire apocalyptic material in a manner which may not indeed be exempt from criticism, but yet certainly is everywhere skilful, is not easily accounted for in the case of one who had formerly been a fisherman, and who in Acts 413 is described—and certainly correctly—as 'an unlearned and ignorant man' (ἄβηρωτος ἀγράμματος καὶ ἰδιώτης).

(c) But, above all, in the case of an eye-witness of the life of Jesus one would have expected a livelier image of the personality of Christ than the Apocalypse offers.

The Apocalypse designates Jesus on the one hand, it must be conceded, in the genuine manner of primitive Christianity, as the faithful witness (15 314), which, in accordance with 213 176, we may interpret as referring to his martyr-death (cp 321), although it also remains possible that the word denotes his witness to truth by oral revelation; it calls him the Holy and True (3714 1911); it alludes to his Judaean origin and Davidic descent (55 2216); it claims for him that he has the Holy Spirit, only in the form that he possesses the seven spirits of God (31 56) into which the spirit of God is divided according to 14 45 56; and in 1414*f.* it represents him in his exalted state as an angel, not as any higher being. On the other hand, it not only ascribes divine honours to him after his exaltation (15 5814, etc.)—which need not surprise us;—not only praises him in a doxology which is comparable to those given to God (16 512*f.* 71012); it also assumes his pre-existence as a matter of course and in that pre-existence it gives him the predicate, Λ and Ω , which is given to God himself (2213, cp 117 28 as also 18 216); indeed in the very same verse (314) in which it assigns to him the humblest attribute, it also gives him the highest—that of 'the beginning of the creation of God' (ἀρχὴ τῆς κτίσεως τοῦ θεοῦ). Even if this is to be taken passively, in the sense that he is the first creature created by God, it represents a high claim; but it can also be meant in the active sense, thus designating him as a self-active principle in the creation of the world, as in 1 Cor. 86 Col. 116-18 Heb. 12 and elsewhere. The figures under which the author represents the appearance of Christ are partly taken from the OT (as 113-20), and partly dependent on NT theological theories (as 56). In order to realise how little the author was in possession of any concrete living image of the personality of Jesus we have only to look at any picture professedly based on 123-20, or try to visualise to our own imaginations what is described in 56*f.* 61*f.*—how a lamb standing as though it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, comes and takes out of the hand of God a book and opens the seals thereof.

(d) Finally, the Apocalypse speaks (18 20) of the twelve apostles in a quite objective way, without any hint that the author himself is one of them, and in 21 14 it describes them as the foundations of the Church of the latter days in a way which does not speak for the modesty of the author if he himself was of their number.

(e) Most of these difficulties, however, disappear as soon as we think of the Elder, not of the apostle, as the author of the book; and the attitude of authority towards the churches of Asia Minor assumed in 2 f. also speaks for the former—always on the assumption that it was he, not the apostle, who held this position there.

If, however, it has to be conceded that the Apocalypse is not a unity—and it is hardly likely that it will long be possible to resist this conclusion—then the question alters itself to this; whether the apostle or the Elder was the last editor of the whole book or the original author of any portion of it. Here all that can be said is that the John of Asia Minor, by whom, as we have seen, it is easier to suppose the Elder than the apostle to be meant, comes into consideration first of all as possible author of the Epistles to the Seven Churches in 2 f. These, however, have only a loose connection with what properly forms the body of the book which contains the prophecies concerning the last times (4 1-22 5); it is only with 21 1-22 5 that they show observable contact in some isolated expressions. That they should have arisen separately is hardly likely, for in that case all the seven would not have been written—as we must nevertheless suppose them to have been—in one corpus, but each one would have been addressed to its proper destination. They become more intelligible when regarded as a preliminary writing prefixed to the rest of the book after it had been completed, and designed to introduce to a particular circle of readers the more strictly apocalyptic book. If this be so, we do best in assigning them to the redactor of the whole; but in that case we must be all the more cautious how we attribute to him definite portions of the rest of the book—to attempt which, moreover, we have no means at our disposal. But, further, not even the Epistles to the Seven Churches can with certainty be ascribed to the Elder; they may have been written by another in his name.

The one question left, if we take into account what is said under APOCALYPSE, is as to whether the author of the Apocalypse may be identical with the author of the Fourth Gospel and of the Johannine Epistles. The answer to this question becomes important in our investigation of the Apocalypse if the authorship of the Gospel and Epistles is more easily determined than that of the Apocalypse, and vice versa. A glance at the four possibilities here will be instructive. Apart from theologians who feel themselves bound to the strictest conservatism, B. Weiss stands alone in attributing the Gospel and the Epistles as well as the Apocalypse to the apostle; the Gospel and the Epistles, or at least the First Epistle, but not the Apocalypse, are attributed to the apostle by the 'mediating' school, as they formerly were by the rationalists; the Apocalypse, but not the Gospel and the Epistles, by the earlier representatives of the Tübingen school down to Hilgenfeld and Krenkel (Der Apostel Johannes, '71); by all the later critics not one of the Johannine writings is given to the apostle, the Apocalypse even having been already assigned to another author before its unity had been given up. We find a critic so early a date as De Wette writing "In NT criticism nothing is more certain than that the apostle John, if he was author of the Gospel and the Epistles, did not write the Apocalypse, and conversely."

The same thing had already been argued by Dionysius of Alexandria (ap. Eus. HE 7 25) in a manner that, when we consider his time, must be regarded as notably scientific. The authorship of the Apocalypse is in this case, however, prejudged to a certain extent only when the Gospel and the Epistles are attributed to the apostle, and conversely.

The difference between the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel so far as language and style are concerned can hardly be stated too strongly.

Grammatically, the Greek of the Gospel, if not particularly good, is at least from the point of view of that period not open to positive objection; the Apocalypse on the other hand exhibits the most flagrant solecisms. For example, the apposition to any case whatever is given in the nominative,¹ and there is no hesitation in adding the article to a verbal form or in making a nominative dependent on the preposition ἀπὸ (ἀπὸ ὧν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος, 1 4). The Gospel displays a Hebraizing character only in the syntax of its sentences (simple co-ordination), the Apocalypse to a very much greater extent. As for the vocabulary we single out only a few expressions: the Gospel has ψεύστης, the Apocalypse ψεύδης; similarly the Gospel and Apocalypse have, respectively, ἰδὲ, ἰδού; κόσμος, οἰκουμένη; the Gospel has ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου or πατριάρχης for the devil, while from the detailed enumeration of all the predicates of the devil in Rev. 12 9, these two expressions are absent; the Gospel has πιστεύειν (almost 100 times) and ὁμολογεῖν, the Apocalypse ἔχει τὴν μαρτυρίαν Ἰησοῦ. Equally worthy of notice is the absence in the Apocalypse of certain particles which are of very frequent occurrence in the Gospel: καθὼς, μὲν, μέντοι, πάντοτε, ποῖποτε, ὡς in the temporal sense, γὰρ, referring back to a demonstrative (as Jn. 15 12). Withal, the difference between the spheres of thought in the two writings is vividly illustrated when it is noted how favourite ideas in the one are totally absent from the other—such ideas as 'Lord God Almighty' (κύριος, ὁ θεὸς ὁ παντοκράτωρ), or 'patience' (υπακομή) in the Gospel, φῶς in a secondary meaning, σκότια, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, ῥήματα, θεασθαι, μένειν ἐν τινι, ἀπόλλυσθαι (said of men) in the Apocalypse.

This observation, however, must be extended much more widely. Even where it cannot be traced in the mere vocabulary, the thought-substance in the two writings is in many ways fundamentally different.

(a) So, for example, in what is the main thing so far as the Apocalypse is concerned—the eschatology. It is only in isolated passages, and these moreover not free from the suspicion of interpolation, that the Gospel still shows the conception—so familiar to the Apocalypse as to the whole of primitive Christendom—of a general Judgment at the end of time, and a bodily resurrection (§ 28 f.). On the other hand, special features of the Apocalypse, such as those of the detailed events before the end of the world and those of the millennium, are in the same degree foreign to the Gospel as is the doctrine of the return of Christ with a heavenly host for the destruction of his enemies in battle (19 11-21), and the presupposition that the state of blessedness will be established upon earth—if even upon a renewed earth (Rev. 20 4-6 21 1 10)—which is directly contradicted by Jn. 14 2 f., where this state is to be looked for in heaven. The First Epistle comes a degree nearer to the expectations of primitive Christendom (§ 59); but the main idea of the Apocalypse, that a definite personality will come forward as Antichrist, is even there (1 Jn. 2 18 22 4 3) mentioned only for the purpose of saying that the prediction has been fulfilled by the rise of gnosticism, in other words the idea is gently set aside.

(b) The Universality of salvation is for the Gospel a matter of course (§ 27). In the Apocalypse, on the other hand, one can still clearly perceive how the Jewish people continues to be regarded as the chosen race, and the believing Gentiles are ranked with it, not on principle but only in consequence of their having acquitted themselves also as good Christians under persecution (7 14 f., § 10 a). 'Jew' in Rev. 2 9 3 9 is a name of honour, in the Gospel it carries some note of depreciation (§ 19).

(c) As regards the Person of Christ the metaphysical expressions cited in § 10 c approximate the point of view of the Fourth Gospel; but this approximation is not nearly so great as to amount to equivalence. The difference lies not merely, as might perhaps be suggested, in this—that the Gospel has to speak for the most part of Christ on the earth whereas the Apocalypse is speaking of him as exalted in heaven. Even as regards the pre-existence of which both speak it has to be remarked that the Apocalypse has here only adopted certain expressions without allowing them to have any very noticeable effect upon the general view of things, whilst the Gospel is completely dominated by the idea of the Logos.

¹ E.g. 2 20 3 12 9 14, 14 12. By this the Ἀντίπα of 2 13 instead of Ἀντίπας is shown to be the correct reading. Cp WH, App.

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

Great importance has been attached to the fact that in Rev. 19¹³ Christ is expressly called 'the word of God' (ὁ Λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ). Even if this fact is to be recognised we must not forget that it by no means necessarily involves full coincidence with the thought of the Gospel. Such coincidence would even in fact be very unlikely, since elsewhere in the Apocalypse we do not find the faintest trace of Alexandrian ideas. Here accordingly it might seem necessary to resort in the first instance to the explanation which we are constrained to reject in the case of the Gospel (§ 31)—namely that the expression 'the word of God' is taken from the OT or the Palestinian theology. Only, even where they were not prepared to give up the unity of the Apocalypse altogether scholars ought long ago to have perceived that 19^{13b} 'and his name is called The Word of God' is a gloss. Immediately before we are told (19¹²) that no one knoweth his name but he himself. How could the author proceed immediately to give his name? But nothing could have been more natural than that an old reader who believed himself to be in possession of the name (possibly from the Fourth Gospel) should have written the answer to the riddle on the margin; the next copyist took it for an integral part of the text that had been accidentally omitted and accordingly inserted it. Indeed, we must perhaps go even further. In 19¹¹ also we find a name of Christ: 'the Faithful and True,' in 19¹⁶ another: 'King of kings and Lord of lords'; of this last we are expressly told that it was written upon his mantle and upon his thigh. This does not harmonise with v. 12 and must probably also be regarded as an interpolation.

(d) Among the various points of connection, therefore, which in spite of all differences we are able to trace between the Apocalypse and the Gospel the use of the name 'logos' cannot be reckoned as one. Nor do those which are left by any means amount to a proof of identity of authorship. In both writings Christ appears as the lamb; but the Apocalypse invariably uses ἀρνίον, the Gospel invariably (except in 21¹⁵) ἄμνος. In the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21²⁴ 22^{1 f.} 5) bread, water, and light are mentioned as the highest blessings; in the Gospel (Jn. 6⁴⁸ 4¹⁴ 8¹²) Christ himself is represented as bread, water, and light; and so far as light is concerned Rev. 21²³ has already led the way in this. Baur found himself able to speak of the Gospel as the spiritualised Apocalypse. Thoma could call it the Anti-Apocalypse (ZWT '77, pp. 289-341). By this is not meant that the two writings as regards their inner substance are actually very near one another; the long journey that has to be travelled in clearing up the lines of connection and effecting this spiritualisation of ideas shows only how far apart the two really are.

The attempt even to carry the Gospel and the Apocalypse back to one and the same circle or one and

15. Conclusion. by the tradition which assigns them to one and the same author, is therefore a bold one. It will be much more correct to say that the author of the Gospel was acquainted with the Apocalypse and took help from it so far as was compatible with the fundamental differences in their points of view. On account of the dependence thus indicated it will be safe to assume that the Apocalypse was a valued book in the circles in which the author of the Gospel moved, and that he arose in that environment and atmosphere. So far therefore it is possible for criticism to recognise in a qualified way the justice of the tradition as to the origin of the two writings in a common source; but the complete difference in trend of thought must on no account be lost sight of.

Of those who still maintain oneness of authorship for the two, the least favourable position is taken by those who hold them to have been written more or less contemporaneously; but hardly less favourable is that of those who, in order to be able to maintain the date 95-96 A.D., assigned by Irenæus to the Apocalypse, think of the Gospel as the earlier of the two. The only relatively conceivable hypothesis is that which postulates the other order and a transition from the ideas of the Apocalypse to those of the Gospel. As, however, it is impossible to assign the Apocalypse to any date earlier than 68, the Gospel must on the assumption of apostolic authorship belong to a period after the author's sixtieth year—a period within which the acquirement of unobjectionable Greek, not to speak of so revolutionary a change in the whole world of ideas, even if conceivable in his earlier years, becomes a psychological impossibility.

C.—THE FOURTH GOSPEL

The question whether the Fourth Gospel was written by John the apostle, which we shall here, for convenience

16. Method of enquiry. phraseology, call the question of its genuineness (although the apostle's authorship is claimed for it only by tradition), cannot be determined apart from the question of its historicity. It would be utterly unscientific to begin by confining ourselves to a proof that the tradition of the Johannine authorship was not open to fatal objection and then—supposing this to be made out—forthwith to claim for the contents of the Fourth Gospel a strictly historical character throughout without further question. Even defenders of the genuineness have conceded the possibility of more or less serious lapses of memory in the aged apostle (§ 55 a). The question of the historicity, therefore, is ultimately the more important of the two, if we bear in mind what must be the final object of all enquiry into the gospels, namely the elucidation of the life of Jesus. As a matter of fact there have been scholars who have maintained that the Fourth Gospel was not the work of the apostle and yet is trustworthy throughout, or that it rests upon communications received from the apostle or some other eye-witness and therefore is partly trustworthy partly not (§ 55 b c). The question of historicity becomes, on any such hypotheses as these last, not merely an end in itself but also a means of determining the authorship. The same remark applies when the complete genuineness is under consideration. Unimportant deviations from historicity, on the view just mentioned, do not make belief in the genuineness impossible; but serious deviations do.

As regards the historicity, our most important line of research is that of comparison with the synoptists. In proportion as tradition concerning the authorship is uncertain, must we rely all the more upon this means of arriving at knowledge. Of course we must not begin by postulating for the synoptists the higher degree of historicity any more than by making a similar claim for the Fourth Gospel. The immediate object of the comparison must be to ascertain what the differences are; if any of these are found to be irreconcilable, we shall then have to ask, in the first place, which of the two representations deserves the preference, and then, next, whether the less preferable can have come from an eye-witness. At the same time, it is obvious that the comparison must not in the main deal with details merely, for in every single detail some error may well be regarded as excusable; rather must it pass in review the plan and character of the two sets of writings viewed broadly and as a whole.

Such a comparison will, at the very outset, disclose a fundamental divergence in the picture presented of one of the most prominent subordinate figures

17. The Baptist. In the gospel narrative. In the synoptists John the Baptist is a personality of real interest even quite apart from his relation to Jesus. Brief as are the synoptists' notices concerning John, they still contain a complete life-history full of dramatic crises. It is not his tragical death alone that compels the reader's sympathy; we are interested in him quite as much by reason of his uncertainty as to whether or not he ought to recognise in Jesus the Messiah (Mt. 11^{2 f.}). See JOHN THE BAPTIST. That he was reluctant to baptise Jesus is plainly an addition of Mt.

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

(314*f.*); Mk. and Lk. know nothing of it. According to Mk., John did not, even in the very act of baptising, receive any revelation of the exalted dignity of Jesus (GOSPELS, § 137*a*, end); and this is undoubtedly the true state of the case, for no one would have invented such a representation, if the descent of the Holy Spirit and the heavenly voice as described in Lk. and even in Mt. had been noticeable to every one.

In the Fourth Gospel, however, it is precisely the representation of Mt. that is fundamental; in fact it is essentially heightened. From the very first John knows not only the high dignity of Jesus and his destiny to become the redeemer of the whole world (12729), but even his pre-existence (11530). The title of Messiah is implicitly offered to him, in order that he may refuse it in the most categorical manner (119-23 328). The effect is a diminution of John's personal significance to such an extent that the only function left him is that of hearing testimony to Jesus (16-8 15 23). Even his baptising work is felt to be important, not as being of value to those who sought baptism, but as being a means of making Jesus known (12631). Of his preaching of repentance absolutely no mention at all is made. Yet in his baptism Jesus receives nothing which he did not previously possess; on the contrary, it is not related at all, and there is a good reason for the omission (§ 26). The descent of the Spirit is alone mentioned, yet not as a divine gift bestowed on Jesus but only as a token for the Baptist whereby he is able to recognise Jesus as the Messiah (132*f.*). His question at a later date, whether Jesus really be the Messiah (Mt. 112*f.*), is in the Fourth Gospel impossible. In short, in place of the personality—powerful, yet limited in its horizon and therefore exposed to tragic conflicts (and in all these respects a personality that cannot have been invented)—whom we have in the synoptists, we find in the Fourth Gospel nothing more than a subsidiary figure introduced to make known the majesty of Jesus—a figure endowed with supernatural knowledge indeed, but always monotonously the same and historically quite colourless.

Turning now to what we are told concerning Jesus himself, we are struck first by the difference between the synoptists and the Fourth Gospel as to the scene of Jesus' public activity. Whilst in the synoptists Jesus does not come to Judæa save for the Passover at which he suffered, in the Fourth Gospel Judæa is the scene of by far the greater part of his ministry. Into Galilee he makes only comparatively brief excursions (21-12 443-51 61-7 14). Indeed, according to 444, when fairly interpreted, Judæa, not Galilee, is represented as his home. If indeed, especially in view of Mt. 2337 Lk. 1334, it cannot be definitely said that the synoptists leave no room for earlier visits of Jesus to Jerusalem, what has just been stated seems to admit of the explanation that the Fourth Gospel is designed as a supplement to the synoptists. This view, however, cannot be carried out. To begin with, the Fourth Gospel does not confine itself to giving supplementary matter; it repeats synoptic narratives such as those of the Feeding of the Multitudes, the Walking on the Sea, and the Healing of the Nobleman's Son (another version of that of the servant [or son] of the centurion at Capernaum [§ 20*c*]). Further, so long a sojourn of Jesus in Judæa as is depicted in the Fourth Gospel is in no way reconcilable with the representation of the synoptists, and still less is the representation that before his last passover Jesus had stayed in Jerusalem at least from the preceding winter onwards (1022).

18. Scene of public life of Jesus.

No less divergent are the representations of the synoptists and the Fourth Gospel as to the order of the principal events in the public life of Jesus. The cleansing of the temple, which, according to the synoptists, was in his closing days, is placed in Jn. (213-22) at the beginning of his ministry. It is thus quite divested of the importance it has in the other account as bringing the hatred of the authorities to the explosive point; it has no outward consequences. Nor is the harmonistic expedient of any avail—that the cleansing happened twice and with quite opposite results on the two occasions. The conflict of Jesus with the Jews arises, it is true, in Jn. at the very beginning of his ministry; but all attempts to lay hold of him prove failures, without any explanation being given beyond the very vague and general one that his hour was not yet come (73044 82059 1039 1236). The representation, however, that thus between Jesus and the Jews—i.e., not only the ruling classes but also his ordinary Jewish audiences—a relation of complete antipathy subsisted from the outset, does not harmonise with what we gather from the synoptists. Jn. alludes to the hearers of Jesus as 'the Jews' (21820 516 641 and often) as if Jesus were not himself one sprung from their midst; he speaks of feasts of the Jews (213 51 64 72 1155); he represents Jesus as saying 'your law' (817 1034, cp 1525), as if Jesus had nothing to do with either feast or law; and as early as 111 the full condemnation of the entire people is already pronounced, and so again 82124 1238-40. Nor is this cancelled, though it is repeatedly said that many believed in him; Jesus could not otherwise have found opportunity to carry on and develop his message.

As regards Jesus' relations with his disciples, the confession of Peter (Jn. 668*f.* Mk. 829) is wholly deprived of its importance as a new discovery and as an achievement if Jesus already at the calling of the first disciples (1414549) or even earlier still by the Baptist himself (16-8 15 23 26 29-34) had been acknowledged as Son of God. Finally—to confine ourselves only to points of first importance—the Raising of Lazarus brings into the narrative of John, as compared with that of the synoptists, not only a wholly new event, but also a wholly new reason for the persecution of Jesus (1145-53) which resulted in his death. In the synoptists the immediate cause of his arrest and condemnation was his triumphal entry into Jerusalem and his cleansing of the temple.

(a) As compared with the miracle narratives of the synoptists, those of the Fourth Gospel are essentially enhanced. None of the sick mentioned by the synoptists as having been healed by Jesus is recorded to have lain under his infirmity for thirty-eight years (Jn. 55). The blind man who is healed has been blind from his birth (91). Jesus walks across the whole lake, not over a portion of it only (621). Lazarus is not raised on the day of his death, like the daughter of Jairus or the son of the widow of Nain, but after four days have elapsed.

This last point has a special significance. According to Jewish belief (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. and Wettstein [both on Jn. 1139]) the soul of the departed lingers about the body for three days, ready to return into it if possible; on the fourth day it definitely takes its departure because it sees that the countenance has wholly changed. For the same reason the identification of the body of a person whom one has known in life is held to be possible only for the first three days; after that the change is too great to admit of it. A further testimony to the prevalence of this view coming from a time very near that of Jesus, but unknown to the scholars mentioned above, will be found in the Rest of the Words of Baruch, 9.^a This is also the reason why

¹ 97-13: 'As Jeremiah was standing in the temple he became as one that gives up the ghost. Baruch and Abimelech (his companions) wept . . . and the people saw him lying dead . . . and wept bitterly. Thereupon they would have him buried, when, behold, a voice was heard, 'Bury not him who is yet alive, for his soul will again enter into his body. And . . . they remained near his body for three days while they spake of this thing, and remained in uncertainty as to the hour at which he should arise. But after three days his soul came into his body and he lifted up his voice in the midst of them all and said 'Praise ye God,' etc. Thus the Greek text in Harris (Rest of Words of Baruch, '89). The Ethiopic text (Dillm. Chrest. aeth., '66, German by Prætorius [ZWT], '72, pp. 230-247), and by König (St. u. Kr., '77, 318-338) concludes more briefly: 'they remained about him for three days until his soul returned (or, should return) into his body. And a voice was heard in the midst of them all "Praise

Jesus on receiving word of the sickness of Lazarus does not hurry to his side at once, but lingers for two whole days. Thus his love for Lazarus and the sisters of Lazarus is displayed not by the speed with which Jesus hastens to their relief, but contrariwise by the delay which gives room for the working of a special and seemingly impossible miracle.

(b) No satisfactory explanation can ever be given as to why the synoptists should have nothing to say concerning this greatest of all miracles (§ 37*a*), or yet of that which is expressly described as the first of his miracles at Cana, or of the healing of the man born blind, or of the miracle at Bethesda. The presence of all the disciples is expressly mentioned, both at Bethany and at Cana. On the other hand it is quite easy to understand why many miracles related by the synoptists are absent from the Fourth Gospel. The latter offers only one example of each class of miracle; its aim is accordingly directed towards a careful selection. Healings of demoniacs, however, are wholly left out—in other words, precisely the kind of miracle which, according to GOSPELS (§ 144), could most confidently be ascribed to Jesus and which in point of fact are alone ascribed to him by criticism.

(c) The selection of miracles, notwithstanding the fact that Jesus is stated in 2²³ 6: 7³¹ 11⁴⁷ 20³⁰ to have wrought very many miracles, becomes intelligible most easily if each of the miracles particularised be held to have a symbolical meaning. Such a meaning is expressly assigned to the raising of Lazarus (11²⁵ f.), to the healing of the man born blind (9⁵³⁹), and to the feeding of the five thousand in the elucidation in 6²⁶ f. 30-63, where it is interpreted as having a veiled reference to the eucharist. With this clue it is no longer difficult to see that the miracle of walking upon the water which comes immediately afterwards is intended to signify that exaltation of Jesus above the limitations of space which is necessary in order to render possible the presence of his glorified body at every celebration of the eucharist. That the wine of Cana as compared with the water is intended to symbolise the superiority of the new religion over the old is equally plain. The thirty-eight years of the sick man at Bethesda show that he is an emblem of the Jewish people who had to wander for thirty-eight years in the wilderness (Dt. 2¹⁴); the five porches can without difficulty be interpreted as meaning the five books of Moses. Cp § 35 b-e. Lastly, in the case of the nobleman (4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴) the symbolical meaning of the narrative becomes evident as soon as attention is directed to its divergences from the story of the centurion of Capernaum in Mt. (8⁵⁻¹³) and Lk. (7¹⁻¹⁰), which by almost universal agreement lies at its foundation (see GOSPELS, § 17 β).

The centurion of the synoptists is a Gentile who excels, and puts to shame, the Jews by his faith. The nobleman of Jn. is ye God," etc. Jeremiah's return to life is, it will be seen, not directly stated here; the words 'Praise ye God,' etc., are not, according to this account, attributed to Jeremiah but to a 'voice.' It is not till § 19 that the Ethiopic text, in agreement with the Greek, names Jeremiah as the speaker. Which of the two texts is the more original it is not quite easy to determine, because the passage beginning with the words 'Praise ye God' is, or at least contains, a Christian interpolation, whilst the rest of the book, containing as it does no Christian ideas of any kind, but on the other hand laying stress on such Judaic conceptions as the removal of non-Jewish women, and that of the sacrifice at Jerusalem, must be held to be Jewish. Yet it will not be too bold to conjecture that the Ethiopic translator would hardly have passed over the bringing back to life of Jeremiah if he had found it in the text before him, and thus we may venture to hold that here, as in other places also (Harris, 29^c), he represents the more original form. We find him, then, giving quite explicit expression to the belief that for the space of three days the return of the soul to the body was considered possible. But even the Greek text does not bear the interpretation that this limit can be exceeded. 'After three days' merely indicates the extreme limit within which the return to life could possibly be expected.

Those critics who do not regard the resurrection of Jesus as an actual fact cite 2 K. 20⁵ Hos. 6² Jon. 2¹ [1¹⁷] as explaining why the resurrection was assigned to precisely the third day after the death of Jesus. It is not impossible that these passages may have had their influence also on the Jewish belief with which we are now dealing.

in the service of Herod Antipas, and must therefore be regarded as a Jew, since the contrary is not stated. He also is distinguished by his faith, not, however, as being a heathen, but as being one who trusts the word of Jesus without looking for signs and wonders. At the outset, even he is reproached by Jesus as unable to believe without these. He has given no occasion for such a reproach. If, therefore, the reproach is not to be held to be unjust he must be taken as representing the Jewish people, who really deserve it. He clears himself, however, of the reproach. This being so, he represents, not the entire nation, but only those better members of the nation who intercede for the (spiritually) diseased portion of their people. In the days of the fourth evangelist, in which it was no longer possible with one's own eyes to see miracles wrought by Jesus, belief in the bare word of the Christian preacher came to be of the greatest importance, and an example of such belief is therefore here put forth. By the son of the centurion, then, we are to understand the spiritually and religiously diseased part of the nation. This is the reason why the sufferer is not as in Lk. called the servant (δούλος) of the intercessor, but his son—a point which had been left doubtful by the ambiguous expression (παῖς) of Mt.

(d) The individual miracles (2¹¹ 4⁵⁴ 6² 14 9¹⁶ 12¹⁸), and indeed the miracles of Jesus as a whole (2²³ 3² 7³¹ 11⁴⁷ 12³⁷), are expressly spoken of as 'signs' (σημεῖα), though the Jesus of the synoptists is represented as having declined on principle to work 'signs' (GOSPELS, § 140 f.). In Jn. 2¹⁸ 6³⁰ Jesus is asked, as in Mk. 8¹¹ and parallels, to work miracles to attest his mission; in Jn., however, he does not decline as in the other case, but on the contrary promises (2¹⁹) precisely the miracle of his resurrection. Belief that rests on mere miracles he often depreciates (4⁴⁸, etc.); but in 5³⁶ 6²⁶ 10²⁵³⁸ 14¹¹ he actually attaches to them a decisive importance.

One of the most important differences between the synoptists and Jn. is that relating to the date of the crucifixion.

(a) According to Mk. 14¹²⁻¹⁶ Mt. 26¹⁷⁻¹⁹ Lk. 22⁷⁻¹⁵ the Last Supper of Jesus was the Jewish Passover meal

21. Date of Crucifixion. which was partaken of on the evening of the 14th of Nisan. In strict Jewish reckoning this evening belongs to the 15th of Nisan with which the Feast of Unleavened Bread began. Since, however, the leaven was removed from Jewish houses during the day-time of the 14th of Nisan, we can easily understand how it is that Mk. 14¹² Mt. 26¹⁷ (cp Lk. 22⁷) have come to speak of the 14th Nisan as being the first of the days of unleavened bread. It is equally certain that, according to Jn., the Last Supper was on the 13th of Nisan (13¹ 29 18²⁸ 19¹⁴ 31). If the synoptists are to be brought into harmony with the Johannine reckoning, the day on which the paschal lamb was wont to be slaughtered (Mk. 14¹² Lk. 22⁷) must have been the 13th, not the 14th of Nisan. If on the other hand Jn. is to be brought into harmony with the synoptists, then at the eating of the Paschal lamb the feast can not yet have begun (13¹ 29) and 'to eat the passover' (18²⁸) must be taken as meaning the meals taken during the seven days to the exclusion of that at which the paschal lamb was eaten. The incredibly violent attempts that used to be made to bring about a reconciliation between the two representations no longer call for serious argument.

(b) Some notice, however, must be taken of two attempts still made by scholars of repute to maintain the Johannine reckoning while conceding its inconsistency with that of the synoptists.

According to B. Weiss and Beyschlag the date of the Last Supper was on the 13th of Nisan, but nevertheless it was held as a passover meal. It is argued that since the afternoon of the 14th of Nisan did not give time enough for the slaughter of the many lambs (in 65 A.D., according to Jos. B. vi. 9. 3, § 424, there were 256,500 of them), some portion of them were slaughtered on the afternoon of the 13th, and thus it was possible for Jesus to keep the passover a day before the regular time. This theory, however, about the slaughtering of the lambs is not only in flattest contradiction to the express words of Mk. 14¹² Lk. 22⁷, according to which there was only one day on which the lambs were slaughtered, but also rests upon pure imagination. The slaughtering of the lambs was not the business of the priests; it was the duty of the representative of each passover-guild (Philo, Vit. Mos. 320, and Decal. 30, ap. Mangey, 2¹⁶⁹ and 206). Each such representative had thus only one lamb to slaughter, and all that the priests had to do was to receive the blood in a bowl and pour it out by the altar. Moreover, time enough was secured on 14th Nisan by beginning the work of slaughtering, not towards sundown as Dt. 166 enjoined, but in the afternoon—about 2 or 3 o'clock according to Jubil. 49 10 f. 19, Jos. B. vi. 9 3, § 423, cp Ant. xiv. 4 3, § 65, or, according to later Jewish authorities, even so early as from 12.30 or 1.30. Apart from this, however, an anticipatory participation in the passover meal would have been a direct violation of the law according to which any one who was unable to take part in the feast on the appointed day was bidden postpone it till the following month (Nu. 9 10-13, cp 2 Ch. 30 1-22). So far, moreover, as Jesus is concerned, such an anticipation would be intelligible only on the assumption that he knew beforehand quite definitely that he would not live to see the legally appointed evening (cp Prot. Monatshefte, 1899, pp. 140-143).

(c) According to Spitta (Urchristenthum 1 221-228) the passage of Mk. on which the reckoning of the synoptists is based (14 12-16) is a later interpolation. According to 14 2, he contends, it was the intention of the authorities that Jesus should be made away with before the feast. As we are not told that this scheme failed, Mk. must have followed the Johannine chronology. It is, however, quite sufficient that Mk., in fact, informs us that nevertheless Jesus was not put to death before the feast. This tells us really all that Spitta finds lacking. Nor is Spitta on better ground when he urges that Mk. 14 17 does not connect itself with v. 16—that Jesus could not come with the twelve if two of them had been sent on before to make ready the passover. As a matter of fact we cannot avoid supposing that the two had in the interval returned to report that the preparations had been made. Over and above this, Spitta has to assume that the interpolation in Mk. already lay before Mt. and Lk., and further that there must have dropped out from Jn. a leaf in which the Last Supper of Jesus was described in agreement with the synoptic account (§ 23 c), and, conversely, Spitta has to set down Jn. 6 51-59 as a later insertion. So many are the changes required in order to make his hypothesis work.

As the discrepant accounts do not admit of reconciliation, it remains that we should choose between them. Now, according to the synoptists the crucifixion occurred on the first day of the seven-days' feast, and this first day was in sanctity almost equal to a Sabbath.

(a) A judicial process in solemn form involving a capital charge could not, according to the Mishna, be begun on a day before a Sabbath, and thus also could not have been begun on the 14th of Nisan, for between the first and the second sitting, if a condemnation was to be arrived at, a night had to intervene. Any formal sentence of death, however, was beyond the competency of the synedrium, as the power of life and death lay in the hands of the Roman procurator. Brandt, one of the most acute and the most learned of the opponents of the synoptic (and the Johannine) chronology, who admits as historical nothing more than the bare fact that Jesus was crucified about the passover season, has conceded in his Evangelische Geschichte (pp. 55, 303, '93) that, legally considered, the proceedings before the synedrium would be unexceptionable if they were regarded merely as a preliminary enquiry to prepare the case for Pilate's hearing. And it must further be taken into account here how urgently time pressed. The project to make away with Jesus before the feast having failed, it was all the more necessary to get rid of him at the beginning of the feast before the people should have had time and opportunity to declare in his favour. Of Pilate one could rest assured that even on the feast-day he would not hesitate to repress any tumult. If he desecrated the day by an execution, the responsibility would not lie on the synedrium.

(b) That Simon of Cyrene came 'from the country' (ἀπὸ ἀγροῦ, Mk. 15 21 Lk. 23 26) by no means implies that he had been working there. Many passover pilgrims, to the number of whom he would, as a Cyrenian, appear to have belonged, spent the night outside the city and simply came into it 'from the country.'

(c) The burial of Jesus would always have been more lawful on the 15th of Nisan than on the following Sabbath, which was held to be of superior sanctity; but in any case it was unavoidable, in accordance with Dt. 21 22 f.

(d) The prohibition against leaving the festal chamber on the night of the passover (Ex. 12 22) was, from all that we can gather (see Kcim, Gesch. Jesu von Nazara, 3 291 f.) no longer observed in Jesus' time. Very many pilgrims had their lodging during the feast outside the walls of Jerusalem. The prohibition in question therefore could no longer be enforced. With reference to certain other inconvenient passover precepts also the rabbins found a way of escape by deciding that they were enjoined only for the passover in Egypt, not for that in Palestine.

(e) That the women prepared ointments is stated only by Lk. (23 56); according to Mk. (16 1) they bought ointments only after the Sabbath was ended. Joseph, it is true, according to Mk. 15 46, bought a linen cloth. What we have to ask, however, in case such a purchase was forbidden by traditional prescription, is whether in the synoptic tradition recollection must on this account have gone wrong altogether as to the day of the death of Jesus, or whether it is not easier to suppose that a narrator who was no longer acquainted with the enactments of the law on the subject, fell into error on a single point—that of the purchase effected on a feast day.

(f) The question as regards the swords carried by the company who arrested Jesus is similar (Mk. 14 43 48 Mt. 26 47 55 Lk. 22 52). According to the Mishna (Shabbāth 6 2 4) it was unlawful to carry on the Sabbath day (and therefore, also, certainly, on the day of the passover) breastplate, helmet, greaves, sword, bow, shield (sling?) or lance. It is equally certain, however, that the exercise of police functions on Sabbath, especially among the crowds present at the passover, was not allowed to be suspended by any such prohibition. It is not said that no kind of weapon whatever was to be allowed. Here also, no doubt, Rabbinical casuistry was equal to the occasion. Is it then imperative that we should suppose the statement about the swords to be correct and therefore that about the day to be incorrect? Or is it not, in point of fact, quite easy to imagine that a narrator who was not accurately acquainted with the precepts of the Jewish law inadvertently gave to his true account of an armed company having been sent such a turn as implied that they were armed with swords?

(g) It is directly attested that the disciples of Jesus had swords among them (Mk. 14 47 Mt. 26 51 f. Lk. 22 49 f.). We may venture to suppose that they had provided themselves with these on the preceding days, already seeing cause to fear danger for Jesus and themselves. It was certainly not without reason that Jesus according to Mk. 11 19 Mt. 21 17 Lk. 21 37 passed his nights, not in the city, but (presumably) in various places outside its walls—for otherwise his betrayal by Judas would hardly have been necessary. There is nothing to surprise us if the disciples did not lay their swords aside on the day when the danger was greatest. After having learned in so many other points to claim emancipation from the law, they can hardly have felt themselves bound to follow it with slavish literality precisely on this particular occasion.

In the case of the Johannine date of the crucifixion we are in a position to give the unifying conception which underlies it. It is indicated

23. Explanation of the Johannine date.

(a) In 19 36 it is said that the reason why the bones were not broken was in order that a scripture might be fulfilled. The scripture in question (Ex. 12 46 Nu. 9 12) has reference to the paschal lamb. Jesus then is presented as the anti-type to the paschal lamb in such a manner that this precept finds literal fulfilment in him.

(b) But not this precept only. According to 19 14 Jesus is at midday still before Pilate; his death thus takes place in the afternoon, exactly at the time when (see § 21 b) the paschal lambs were wont to be slaughtered. However tempting it may be to suppose that the discrepancy with Mk. 15 25 arises from a mere oversight, the Γ of Mk., which denoted the third hour, being misread by Jn. for a F representing the number six, or conversely (GOSPELS, § 14*a*), it loses, when taken in connection with the other divergences of Jn. from the synoptists, all its attractiveness.

(c) The anointing of Jesus happened, according to Jn. 12₁, six days before the passover, according to Mk. 14₁=Mt. 26₂ at most two days before it. This discrepancy also is significant. According to Ex. 12₃ the paschal lamb must be chosen on the 10th of Nisan. The evening on which it is eaten belongs, according to Jewish reckoning, to the 15th of Nisan. The 10th of Nisan is thus the fifth day before the passover. Now, the turn of expression in Jn. 12₁ (EV, 'six days before the passover') is Roman: πρὸ ἑξ ἡμερῶν τοῦ πάσχα according to the analogy of ante diem tertium Calendas Maias. The Latin phrase of course denotes the 29th of April, both the first and the last days being included according to the Roman mode of reckoning. Applying the same principle to Jn. 12₁ we find that the 10th of Nisan is indicated. Here again, accordingly, Jesus is seen to be the antitype of the paschal lamb. For Greek examples see Winer, § 615 end.

(d) The synoptists do not mention the lance-thrust, just as they pass over the omission to break the bones of the crucified Jesus. In Jn. (19₃₄ 37) the lance thrust also is mentioned as a fulfilment of a scripture: 'they shall look on him whom they have pierced.' The meaning of the quotation is not at first sight plain, nor yet its connection with the statement that blood and water flowed from the wound. In spite of all efforts, no one has yet been able to show that blood and water actually do flow from a wound of this kind. But blood and water are mentioned together also in 1 Jn. 5₆, where it is said that Jesus Christ came by water and blood. By the water here, so far as the person of Jesus is concerned, we can hardly understand anything else than his baptism; by the blood the atoning blood which he shed on the cross. The sequel in vv. 7-9 shows, however, that what is being spoken of is not merely the experience of his own life, but also that which he brings to believers. In that case the water denotes their baptism, and the meaning of the blood is best found in Jn. 6₅₃₋₅₆. It is the eucharistic blood. Jesus comes (1 Jn. 5₆) by the two sacraments which signify, partly reception into the Christian church, partly the continual renewal of a Christian standing. Now, the reference to water does not come into connection with the idea of the paschal lamb; but that to blood does. The reference to water thus carries us beyond the suggestions connected with the paschal lamb, indeed, but only shows all the more clearly that the account of the history is here dominated throughout by ideas.

(e) That the Last Supper as related in the Fourth Gospel cannot have been a paschal meal is self-evident, and would not of itself give occasion to any doubts regarding Jn.'s chronology. Serious doubts, however, must arise when it is observed how the evangelist connects the interpretation of the Supper with his narrative of the Feeding of the Five Thousand (6₁₋₆₃) and thus makes it to have been given a year earlier than the date at which the event happened according to the synoptists.

How impossible this version of the facts is can best be seen from the attempts to render it harmless. Many deny that the eucharist is intended at all in chap. 6; but in view of the words in vv. 51-56, and of the allusion, otherwise quite pointless, to thirst as well as hunger in v. 35, such a denial is quite useless. Spitta, accordingly, would delete vv. 51-59 (§ 21*c*); but v. 35, which he leaves untouched, raises its protest against such a critical proceeding. Arthur Wright (A Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, '96) assumes that Jesus instituted the ordinance of the Supper as early as the first passover of his ministry, at the second gave the exposition now found in Jn. 6, and at the third and last only added perhaps the command to continue its celebration. This is logical enough, but so gratuitous as to require no refutation.

The next surprising thing in this connection is that Jn. reports absolutely nothing regarding the celebration at the last supper. Spitta supposes the dropping out of a leaf which contained the missing account so exactly—neither more nor less—that the hiatus arising from want of connection remained unperceived. Not only is this hypothesis very bold; it wholly fails to meet the case. One must go further, and confess that it is impossible to point to the place where the missing leaf ought to have come in. Jn. introduces in place of the celebration something quite new, namely the foot-washing. This is not accidental; it is a manifestation of love, and the action takes place in the course of the meal. The meal thus takes the character of a love-feast, an agapé, and thereby becomes an excellent substitute for the supper; in the primitive church, it is well known, agapé and Eucharist went together. When the matter is viewed in this light there is no further occasion to seek for a place in the gospel where the account of the institution of the Eucharist may originally have stood.

(f) Thus we may take as lying at the foundation of the whole representation in the Fourth Gospel the idea which is thrown out by Paul only casually (1 Cor. 5₇): 'as our passover Christ was sacrificed,' τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν ἐτύθη Χριστός. Jn. carries it out in all its details. The more completely the precepts relating to the paschal lamb could be shown to have been fulfilled in Jesus, the more perfectly could it be held to have been demonstrated that the religion which rested on the passover as its foundation had been, by the will of God, set aside and its place taken by another.

It may perhaps be matter of surprise that the 'pneumatic' evangelist should attach weight to so literal a fulfilment of the Old Testament. Yet this is what he does also elsewhere. From Ps. 22₁₉ we find that Mk. 15₂₄ Mt. 27₃₅ Lk. 23₃₄ have taken only the one detail that the soldiers divided the raiment of Jesus amongst themselves by lot. It is only Jn. (19₂₃ f.) who not only cites the passage verbatim, but also finds in the two members of the verse two separate facts,—viz., the dividing of the upper garment, and the casting of lots over the seamless undergarment. So also it is he who brings Ps. 69₂₂ into connection with the fact stated by the synoptists (Mk. 15₃₆ Mt. 27₄₈ Lk. 23₃₆) that they gave Jesus to drink on the cross, and who expressly signals the act as a fulfilment of a scripture (19₂₈).

It is he too (2₁₇) who quotes from the same Psalm—the 69th—a citation not found in any of the synoptists, claiming that it found its fulfilment in Jesus, and gives four other citations, also not met with in the synoptists—in each case, moreover, with Mt.'s formula, 'that it might be fulfilled,' etc., ἵνα πληρωθῇ κ.τ.λ. (12₃₈ 13₁₈ 15₂₅ 17₁₂), as in 19₂₄ 28. It is he, too, who (without having been preceded by the synoptists) sees a type of Christ in the Serpent in the wilderness (3₁₄), a type of the Eucharist in the manna (6₃₁ f. 49_{f.} 58), as also indeed he finds a type in Siloah (9₇), translating it by ἀπεραλειμένος (cp GOSPELS, §§ 48 56).

The position of the question, then, is this. In the ease of the synoptists no one has ever yet been able to

24. The synoptic and Johannine date confronted. suggest any reason why they should have wished to change the date of the death of Jesus. The utmost that has been said has been this—that the disciples had no longer retained a precise recollection of the day. It is difficult to understand how any one who adopts such a view can possibly attach any credence whatever to anything the synoptists say. This view, so damaging to the synoptists, is not at all the result, as such a view ought to be, of careful examination of their work or of appreciative consideration of the position of the authorities on whom they relied—on whose memories nothing surely could have imprinted itself so indelibly as the events of those last days. It owes its origin simply and solely to preference for the Fourth Gospel. Only in one case would it be compulsory to adopt it—if the synoptic date were proved to be impossible. But this it is far from being; the difficulties on which emphasis is laid are in part only seeming, and in part admit of explanation by a very excusable error of tradition (§ 22). In the Fourth Gospel on the other hand it can be shown, point by point, that the representation of the history had to be given exactly as we find it there if it was to serve to set forth the given ideas. The sole question, therefore is whether we shall make up our minds to recognise that this is what the Fourth Gospel does. This decision we must, however, make, unless the synoptic representation is to remain an insoluble riddle. Nor is such a decision, in view of the entire character of the Fourth Gospel, in the least difficult. Elsewhere also it devotes itself to the representation of ideas (see § 20 c), and as regards the date of the crucifixion the coincidences with the precepts regarding the paschal lamb are so strong that on the assumption of literal historicity the position of Hengstenberg is inevitable—that God, or Jesus, with conscious intention, so ordered the events as to make them literally correspond to those precepts.

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

The difference in character between the synoptic and the Johannine discourses of Jesus can hardly be overstated.

(a) As regards style—the synoptists give short sayings, the Fourth Gospel long expositions. The Fourth Gospel has no parables—not even in chaps. 15 or 10. In 106 the saying of Jesus is called, not a 'parable' (παράβολή), but a 'proverb' (παροιμία: see PARABLE). This is very appropriate. That Jesus should be a 'door' is an idea that it is impossible to visualise. By it is expressed—not by means of an image drawn from life, but by means of an artificial thought-allegory—the conception that Jesus, or, more strictly speaking, faith in Jesus, is the only means whereby one can enter into the Church and so into blessedness.

In the Fourth Gospel the discourses of Jesus are distinguished so little from those of the Baptist or from those of the evangelist himself that commentators on such a passage, for example, as 37-36 are utterly at variance on the question as to where the one ends and the other begins.

(b) In the synoptics the main subject of the discourses of Jesus is furnished by the question how the kingdom of God can be entered; in Jn., on the other hand, the leading theme is Jesus himself—his person and his dignity, on which in the synoptics he has extraordinarily little to say. Accordingly, in Jn., the expression 'kingdom of God' occurs only twice (33 5). In Mt. 11 25-30, it is true, it has been thought by scholars that we have one passage which partakes of the character of the Johannine discourses of Jesus, and thus guarantees the authenticity of these throughout. This, however, considering its isolated character, the passage in question could not be held to do, even if it really were Johannine in character. Moreover, such a character does not in point of fact belong to it, as becomes apparent as soon as the most ancient reading is taken into account.

All the church-fathers and heretics of the second century, of whose reading of this passage we have any knowledge at all, bear witness wholly or in part to the following text: 'All things have been delivered to me by my father, and no one hath known (ἔγνω) the father but the son, nor the son but the father and he to whomsoever the son will reveal it.' Even Irenæus, who severely censures the sect of the Marcosians on account of this reading, himself adopts it twice or (according to the Syriac translation) thrice; we must therefore suppose that so it stood written in his bible.

According to the text just quoted the knowledge of the Father by the Son is not something which is spoken of in the present tense only, so that according to the Johannine manner of thinking it could be regarded as having existed from all eternity; it is something that, as the aorist indicates, came into being at a definite moment of time, and before this particular moment did not as yet exist. This moment of time is of course to be sought for within the period of the earthly life of Jesus. Further, in the true text the first place is not assigned to the knowledge of the Son by the Father which again in the Johannine theology could be regarded as existing from all eternity; the first in order is this—that Jesus has recognised the Father in God, on which follows the second that the Father has recognised the Son. Of course, however, this does not mean here that mysterious interpenetrative knowledge which dogmatic theology ascribes to the first person of the Trinity in relation to the second; what it means is simply this: 'No one except God has hitherto known that I am the Messiah; you all have not as yet perceived it.' The same thing is very fitly expressed in the parallel text Lk.

10 22, in the words 'No one knoweth [better: 'hath known'] who the Son is,' that is, that I am the Son. And the final clause in Mt. and Lk. fits the same sense admirably, 'and he to whom the Son will reveal it.' What the Son will reveal is, according to the true reading, not at all the essence of the Father, nor yet so to say his own essence, which might again bring us back to the Johannine theology, but simply the knowledge that he is the Messiah.

Peter's confession and the answer of Jesus to it (Mt. 16 16 f. and 18) do not come into conflict with this as one might be apt to suppose. Altogether unassisted and out of his own inner consciousness merely, Peter could never have reached the intuition that Jesus was the Messiah; some hints he must have received from Jesus himself. Or, since Jesus forbade his disciples to make known the confession of Peter, it is open to us to suppose that he uttered the words of Mt. 11 27 somewhat later and in presence of another audience to which Peter did not belong.

Taken in this sense the passage not only does not contain the Johannine Christology; it is simply a purely synoptist representation of the rise of the Messianic consciousness of Jesus: in the course of his earthly development he arrived at the knowledge that God is not the austere god of the Old Testament law but a father such as is presented to us in the prophets (Is. 63 16), the psalms (Ps. 68 6 103 13), and other later writings (Ecclus. 23 4 Wisd. 2 16 11 10 14 3 etc.). In his relation to the divine Father Jesus feels himself to be a son of God,—in the first instance in the Old Testament ethical sense, inasmuch as he submits his will in all things to that of the Father. But in this respect he found himself so isolated in the circle of his contemporaries that he saw himself to be called to the responsibility of leadership. Thus it was that he felt himself to be the son κατ' ἐξοχήν.

As for the text itself, no codex, however old and good, can be a sufficient witness against the extra-canonical reading, since even the oldest of them is some two centuries younger than it. The attempt has been made to discredit the reading as being a falsification of the Gnostics, who denied that under the Old Testament men had possessed any true knowledge of God. This is certainly the view of Irenæus. That very fact, however, serves to make it intelligible how churchmen should have altered the extra-canonical reading, as seeming to favour heresy, into the canonical,—an alteration which seemed to them in point of fact to have its full warrant in the Johannine parallels and particularly in 10 15. That orthodox persons deliberately altered the NT text is expressly attested by one of the most orthodox of them all—Epiphanius (Anchoratus, 31)—who tells us that, dreading a too human view of Jesus, they deleted Lk. 22 43 f. The converse possibility is all the more improbable in proportion as the uncanonical text is seen to befit the Jesus of the synoptists better and in proportion as it does not deny to the men of the Old Testament all knowledge of God as the Father. For it was not in their case that Jesus was at all concerned to deny such knowledge; it was in the case of his contemporaries that he did so; this was sufficient foundation for the unique claim he made.

Finally, we must point out that the opening words of Mt. 11 27=Lk. 10 22 'All things . . . father' must not be explained according to Mt. 28 18. There stands expressly the word 'power.' In our present context, however, power would be quite unsuitable, for we are concerned only with the knowledge that God is a father. The yoke of Jesus in Mt. 11 29 f. is contrasted with the yoke of the Law, the yoke of the Pharisees (cp Mt. 23 4 and the expression jugum legis in the Apoc. Bar. 41 3); they are the 'wise and prudent' from whom according to 11 25 God has hidden what he has through Jesus revealed to infants, namely, the fatherhood of God. Now the doctrine of the Pharisees is called 'tradition of the elders' (παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων) in Mk. 7 8 13 etc., and in this we have explained how anything that Jesus taught was said to be delivered to him. In this way vanishes the last appearance of there being in our passage Johannine ideas.

(c) The occasion which leads to the prolongation of the discourses of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel is often some misunderstanding of his words on the part of the listeners. Such misunderstanding may sometimes seem intelligible in some degree—as for example when Jesus speaks of himself as the bread which came down from heaven (6 41 f.), or says that he will give them his flesh to eat (6 52), that Abraham had already seen him (8 56 f.), and the like. But it would be difficult to understand how Jesus by such disquisitions can have won over to himself the lowly ones among the people or comforted the weary and heavy-laden. This he did by preaching (according to the synoptics) that the divine compassion is great and that all that God demands is a pure heart, not by disquisitions of the kind referred to or metaphysical questions in a language that cannot be called popular. In other places the misunderstandings of the hearers are hardly comprehensible (see, for example, 5 19 22 27). It may, in fact, be almost generalised as a prevailing law for the Fourth Gospel that at the beginning of a discourse or a portion of a discourse Jesus utters a saying meant to be taken in a spiritual sense but expressed in an intentionally ambiguous form which is understood by the hearers in the physical and so made unintelligible (e.g. 219 33 4 to 13 f. 32 733 f. 1123 [§ 56 b] 36 [§ 26 d] 1232 147). But it is not easy to suppose that this was invariably what actually happened.

(d) Nor is there any help in the conjecture that the Fourth Gospel reproduces the style of the discourses of Jesus as they were during the later period of his ministry, the synoptics that of his earlier ones. Not only does such a theory directly conflict with the actual text, where in Jn. we have characteristic discourses which are assigned to his earliest period and in the synoptic discourses equally characteristic belonging to his latest; the discrepancy in character between the two kinds of discourse is so great, that a transition from the one to the other by the same speaker is psychologically unthinkable. A consciousness of approaching departure may very well have influenced the tone and character of the discourses of the last days; but if that had led to a sudden communication of things never treated before, surely this would at least have been made in the hearing of the disciples alone, and not, as we are expressly told, in the Fourth Gospel, in the presence of the people.

(e) One of the most striking phenomena of the discourses of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel is that their themes, which are few to begin with, are repeated on the most diverse occasions to the point of tedium. The monotony is probably felt by every reader. It is carried so far that a discourse which had been left unfinished on a certain occasion is continued on another to other hearers. In 721-24 Jesus justifies himself at the Feast of Tabernacles, in the autumn, for having healed on the Sabbath-day the sick man at the pool of Bethesda (59 16) more than half a year before, at a feast before the preceding passover (51 64). In 10 26-28 at the Feast of Dedication he continues the discourse about his sheep which he had begun at another time in 10 1-16.

The attempt has been made to account for such phenomena by supposing that the order of the several parts of the gospel had been lost by copyists; cp for example Bacon, JBL, 94, pp. 64-76, Strayer and Turner, JTh. Studies, 1900, pp. 137-140 and 141 f. Such attempts have a certain justification when they seek to remove the difficulty that after the charge (14 31) 'Arise, let us go hence' Jesus utters the discourses that fill chaps. 15-17; but even here the attempts at rearrangement are by no means convincing.

Much more hopeless are such attempts elsewhere. It has been suggested that 7 15-24 should follow directly on 5 47. But at 5 47 the subject of the Sabbath has been dropped for some time; at 5 17 f. it is passed from with a clearly marked transition ('not only . . . but also'). Immediately after 5 16, therefore, would be the place for the passage from chap. 7, and the passage must be not 7 15-24 but only 7 19-24 (so Bertling, St. Kr., '80, pp. 351-353). Even, however, if a better order were obtained at one place by transpositions we should furthermore have to inquire how the original order came to be disturbed. If one could venture to suppose that a leaf which accidentally began and ended exactly with a complete sentence became detached from the papyrus roll to which it had been fastened and was then inserted at a wrong place, the hypothesis becomes of course impossible as soon as it is found necessary to apply it to a series of cases. To obtain a better order, however, 7 33 f., e.g., should be contiguous with 13 33 36, or 7 37 f. with 4 10 14 f., or 8 12 with 12 46, or 8 15 with 12 47, whilst the intervening verses 8 13 f. are the continuation of 5 31 f. These are but a few examples out of an almost endless mass. There hardly remains anything, therefore, but to attribute this state of things to a peculiarity in the author.

The representation of Jesus throughout the entire Fourth Gospel is in harmony with the utterances of the Johannine Christ regarding his heavenly origin (§ 25 b).

26. The figure of Jesus, apart from the Prologue.

(a) His baptism is not related (1 32 f.), because it seemed to interfere with his dignity; so also his temptation in the wilderness, his prayer in Gethsemane, and his forsaken cry on the cross are passed over in silence. The place of the prayer in Gethsemane is taken by the words spoken at a much earlier period (12 27), which, however, cannot be worse misinterpreted than they are when punctuated (as in Ti., Treg., and WH): 'Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour.' To the Johannine Christ the thought of asking the father for deliverance from death could never have suggested itself; his surrender of his life is in fact voluntary (10 17 f.). The meaning accordingly is: 'Shall I, peradventure, say: Father, save me from this hour?' It is only thus that the sequel comes in with any appropriateness: 'Nay, for this cause came I unto this hour, therefore will I rather say: Father, glorify thy name'—by this, that thou sufferest me to go to my death. Cp 18 11. Some trace of a weakness in the crucified one might perhaps be discerned in the words (19 28) 'I thirst'; but it is expressly observed that they were spoken only that a scripture might be fulfilled. His prayer at the grave of Lazarus is uttered, according to 11 42, only on the people's account. He shows his omniscience in 1 48 2 24 f. 4 16-18 6 64 7 11 11-14 13 11 18. Jesus addresses to Philip the question, 'Whence shall we buy bread?' (6 5 f.) only to try him.

(b) His enemies cannot lay hands on him; as often as they set about his arrest (7 30 44 8 20 59 10 39 12 36) or seek to slay him (5 16-18 7 25 32 10 31, cp 7 19 8 37 40), the attempt fails. The expression (ἐκρύβην) which we read in 8 59 12 36 must, in view of his dignity, be interpreted not as meaning that 'he hid himself,' but as meaning that he became invisible in a supernatural way (cp GOSPELS, § 56, u. 1). At his arrest the entire Roman cohort falls to the ground (18 6). Of his own initiative he gives himself up. Judas has no need to betray him with a kiss, and stands doing nothing. Of his own initiative, by dipping the sop and giving it to Judas, Jesus had already brought it about that Satan entered into Judas, and had charged him to hasten his work (13 26 f.). Jesus acknowledged to Pilate that he was King, not of the Jews, but of something higher, of Truth (18 37). There is no need for Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross; Jesus carries it himself (19 17).

(c) Immediately after his resurrection Jesus will not allow Mary Magdalene to touch him (20 17) as she and the other Mary touch his feet in Mt. 28 9; he does not taste food as in Lk. 24 42 f. (nor yet in Jn. 21 12 f.); on the contrary, he enters by closed doors (20 19 26) and imparts the Holy Spirit (20 22), which according to Acts 2 1-13 was first poured out on the disciples at Pentecost. According to the Fourth Gospel, Jesus can impart the Holy Spirit because he and the Holy Spirit are one, because his second coming is identical with the coming of the Holy Spirit (§ 23 a), and because that coming became possible at the moment of Jesus' glorification (7 39). In short, to the Christ of the Fourth Gospel the saying of the Epistle to the Hebrews (5 8), that he learned obedience through the things that he suffered, has become inapplicable; so even that of the Epistle to the Philippians (2 7), that he emptied himself of the divine; what applies to him is the saying of the Epistle to the Colossians (2 9), that in him dwelt the whole fullness of the Godhead bodily.

(d) Over against this we find hardly any really human traits, and such as do manifest themselves are intended in another sense than at first sight appears.

What is principally relied on as evidence of truly human characteristics in the Johannine Christ is his weeping at the grave of Lazarus (11 35). From the very fact that the Jews are said to have seen in his tears a proof of his love for Lazarus, the reader might have been led to conjecture that this is not the author's view of them, for the Jews are always represented as understanding Jesus wrongly (§ 25 c). The evangelist has taken further measures, however, to obviate any such misunderstanding. Even in 2. 33 he tells us that Jesus was moved with indignation in the spirit because he saw Mary weeping and the Jews also weeping with her. And again in 2. 38 Jesus is moved with indignation in himself at the words of the Jews, 'Could this man not have caused that Lazarus also should not die?' It is clear, then, that the tears of Jesus as well as his anger were caused by the unbelief in his miraculous power.

We turn now to some leading points in the doctrine of Jesus as recorded in Jn., with a view to comparison with the synoptists. Salvation is spoken of as destined for all men (10 16 11 52, cp 3 16, κόσμος). In the

synoptists this doctrine is brought into the mouth of Jesus only by later insertions (see 27. The universality of salvation. GOSPELS, §§ 109 a b, 112 b): it was a doctrine to the defence of which even Paul had to devote the whole of his converted life. In the Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, it presents itself as a matter settled from the very beginning without possibility of dispute. Lk. had made use of the Samaritans in order to set forth the relations of Jesus with non-Jews, or, in other words (according to his view), with heathen (GOSPELS, § 109 a). Jn. not only does the like (4:42; in particular, 35-38 are not confined to Samaria); he goes farther, representing Greeks also as coming to Jesus (12:20-32). He does not state what passed at the interview, or what the result was; the narrative closes abruptly. This makes it all the more clear that the interview is simply to show that Greeks had so come; the passage thus may be regarded as pointing to the spread of the gospel among the Gentiles. The counterpart of this is that Jesus hardly at all comes into conflict with his opponents as regards the validity of the Mosaic law in any of its precepts. To him it is simply the law of the Jews (§ 19). All this shows to what a height the Johannine Christ has risen above those difficulties with which Jesus, Paul, and even the synoptists had still to contend.

(a) The Christ of the synoptists speaks of the final judgment as one completed act to take place at the end of the present dispensation; the Johannine Christ says (5:24): 'he that believeth

28. Eschatology. shall not come into judgment.' He regards the judgment, where he really speaks of it, as a process which is accomplished in the course of man's life on earth; he takes the word 'judgment' (κρίσις) in an etymological sense, according to which on the one hand it means a decision by which the individual makes his choice whether he is to choose Christ or turn away from him (3:19); on the other hand, as a separation between men who do the one thing and those who do the other (12:31; cp substantially, 1:11 f.). Whilst the Christ of the synoptists, moreover, announces in a quite literal sense his coming again with the clouds of heaven, the Johannine Christ identifies his second advent with the coming of the Holy Spirit into the hearts of believers (14:16-18 16:7 13).

(b) It must not be overlooked that alongside of this the synoptic view also is met with. Passages like 14:31 16:16-22 are capable of being so taken; and so also as regards the final judgment the synoptic representation is quite clearly expressed in 5:28 f.; only we must not regard such expressions as the decisive ones, since they can easily be merely the prolonged effect of the older view. So much is certain—that the spiritualised representation which is characteristic of the Fourth Gospel could not have been possible to the Jesus of the synoptists. So strong is the contradiction between the two that many find the only possible solution in the supposition that 5:28 f. is a gloss.

A like supposition can hardly be upheld with regard to those passages in which the second advent is described in synoptical terms. Here the only supposition open to us is that the evangelist has retained the old form of expression but imported a new meaning into it, and made the new meaning secure against misunderstanding by means of a variety of expressions in which he formulates his own view. As regards the resurrection of believers, we find it expressed in 5 (25?) 28 f. 6:39 b 40 b 44 b 54 b quite in the manner with which the synoptists have made us familiar. These passages, however, admit with particular facility the assumption that they are glosses. In their present connection they are in part superfluous, in part even disturbing to the sense, being attached to sentences that state the very opposite.

(c) Alongside of the second advent passages just referred to we find a spiritualised view, according to which resurrection is an event happening within the earthly life of the believer: 'he who believeth hath already passed (μεταβέβηκεν) from death unto life' (5:24, cp 8:51 f.). The same view is met with also among the gnostics. In 2 Tim. 2:18 we find quoted as theirs the declaration that the resurrection is past already. By this they meant that the resurrection in the case of each individual is when by the revelation of which Christ is the means he reaches the intuition that his soul is of divine origin and his body only a prison of the soul, and when, in accordance with this, as a true gnostic, he despises what is earthly and cherishes the consciousness of his divine origin. Jn. has given no specially gnostic expression to his view of the resurrection, and in the other leading passage (11:25 f.) it is possible that there is nothing more than an expression of the doctrine of immortality: 'He that believeth on me, even though he die, shall yet live, and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die.' Only, in this utterance, the last words have already ceased to speak of the physical death which is the subject of the first. That any one would escape physical death the author could not possibly affirm. Nor would the proposition have had any interest for him. What is important for him is the conception of a life which begins already upon this earth and is endowed with such intensity that it cannot be interrupted by the circumstance of physical death. If he calls it 'eternal' he means by that word not merely its endless duration, but before and above all, its inextinguishable power even already upon earth. Its opposite is a condition of the soul which is also to be met with in the course of man's earthly life—that of spiritual death. This idea of life is quite remote from the sphere of thought of the Christ of the synoptists.

(d) The fact, however, that in order to set forth the Johannine idea of 'eternal life' the raising of Lazarus from a physical death is used, was fitted to conceal the novelty of the idea from theologians. In reality the raising of Lazarus is quite unsuited to express that idea. It is not Lazarus's faith on Jesus which gives him the inward strength to continue his life in fellowship with God and with Christ; on the contrary, for his resurrection one of the most stupendous of physical miracles is required; and this resurrection itself does not guarantee to him an endless continuance of his physical life, but sooner or later he must, it need hardly be said, die a second time without the prospect of a new miraculous raising by Jesus.

(e) The Christ of the synoptists has already placed Satan over against God; but in the Fourth Gospel this antithesis is made much sharper (8:44).

29. Dualism. Moreover, it is of much wider reach. Over against one another stand the things that are above and the things that are beneath (τὰ ἄνω and τὰ κάτω, 8:23), in other words, heaven and earth (γῆ, 3:31, or κόσμος 8:23 15:19 17:14 16). The same antithesis is denoted by that between light and darkness (1:5 3:19 f.), truth and error (14:17), life and death (6:51 53 f.). It subsists accordingly, not between two personalities merely, God and the devil, but between two worlds, the higher and the lower, and in the passages quoted it is conceived as absolute. It recurs again in the world of men as the antithesis between 'spirit' (πνεῦμα) and 'flesh' (σὰρξ) (3:6). The important point to notice is that in a number of passages one class of men is regarded as belonging to the one order and the other class to the other, and a transition from the one to the other seems to be excluded. Chap. 36 has no meaning unless it is intended to convey that what is born of the flesh is and remains flesh, and what is born of the spirit is and remains spirit. In accordance with this view are the extraordinarily blunt sentences (8:43), 'Ye cannot hear my word' (because ye are of your father the devil); cp 3:27 6:44 65 12:37-40, as also 17:9: 'I pray not for the world.' If only such sentences as these were met with in the Fourth Gospel, it would be a gnostic book; for they embody the separation of mankind into two classes—the 'pneumatic' on the one hand, and the 'psychic' on the other—and the declaration, made only by the gnostics, that none but the pneumatic can attain to salvation. This view, had it gained the upper hand, would have been the death of the Christian church, for it excludes from her pale all the intellectually weak.

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

(b) In the Fourth Gospel it is not carried out with thoroughness. Side by side with it stand such utterances of a universal Christianity as (19) 'the light lighteth every man'; cp 17 315 f. or 129 633 1247 317, according to which Christ's mission is to save the world, or 1231 1611, according to which he is to overcome Satan. It is nevertheless not conceivable that such universal ideas embody the original meaning of the Johannine doctrine of Jesus. For in that case it would be incomprehensible how Jn. should ever have attributed the opposite ideas also to Jesus. The actual state of the case can only be stated thus: the gnostic ideas were the starting-point, but were not held with rigorous strictness, and were allowed to become toned down by association with those of universal Christianity. This is shown often even by the very language employed; for example, in 1519: 'because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.' If the disciples are not of the world then they are, according to the antithesis strictly taken, already of God and need not, nay, cannot, be chosen out of the world. If, however, they can, then in the second clause we find no longer the mutually exclusive antithesis between God and the world, but rather the idea of the world as denoting the sum-total of all humanity, and that a certain number out of the total are capable of arriving at eternal blessedness.

Jesus attributes to himself pre-existence in the most comprehensive manner (858): 'before Abraham came into being, I am.' The present tense expresses not only a priority to Abraham in time, but also the further idea that the condition of Jesus was at no time any other than it is at the moment of speaking—in other words, that he has existed from all eternity. Cp further, 175. In view of these utterances it is quite pointless to interpret the oneness with the Father which Jesus attributes to himself in 1030 38 149-11 1245 1721 and often, as purely a moral oneness, that is to say as depending merely on the determination of Jesus to submit his own will entirely to the will of God. A pre-existent person has clearly come into being in a way which fundamentally distinguishes him from all merely human persons. The expression 'only begotten' (μονογενής) applies to him in the quite literal sense that he is the only Son of God, begotten by God, while all men have been created not begotten by him, and therefore it must be understood in this meaning, not in the weakened sense in which a son of a human father can be called 'only begotten' if he has no brother. Herein, further, lies the reason why Jn. never, like Jesus (e.g., Mt. 59 45) and Paul (e.g., Rom. 814), speaks of men as 'sons' (υιοί), but always only as 'children' (τέκνα) of God, as in Rom. 816 f., and knows of but one 'son' (υιός) of God. 'Only begotten' (μονογενής) thus expresses more than 'own son' (ἰδίου υιός) by which expression Paul (Rom. 832) distinguishes Jesus from all men, or 'the son of his love' (ὁ υιός τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ) (Col. 113), and more than the simple 'son' (υιός) which the Epistle to the Hebrews applies, both with and without the article, to Jesus (128 etc.); for the Epistle to the Hebrews does not hesitate also at the same time to speak of men as 'sons' (υιοί) of God (210 125-8). Jesus' oneness with God would remain firmly established in virtue of his mode of origin, quite apart from the question whether he realises this oneness in the moral sphere by any determination of his own. It accords moreover with this view of his origin, that in his person upon earth God can be seen (1245 149). According to 313 he is even continually at the same time in heaven and on earth. It is in harmony too with the same view that the only demand made upon men is that they should believe in Jesus, and that it is declared that no man can come to the father but through him (146). The Christ of the synoptists never speaks thus of his own person; on the contrary, we find him declaring that blasphemy against himself can be forgiven (Mt. 1231 f. Lk. 1210; see GOSPELS, § 116 d).

In the Prologue Jesus is identified with the Logos. (a) Formerly scholars used to be generally agreed that the 31. The Logos. Logos-idea had been taken over from Philo. It was not until the Tübingen school had begun to draw from this inferences unfavourable to the genuineness of the gospel that this concession was withdrawn. It is correct to say that in the OT we can observe some tendencies to ascribe to a second divine being side by side with the supreme God a certain independent existence. To the category indicated belong the angel of Yahwè (Gen. 167-13 22 11-18 3111-13 Ex. 32-6 14 f. Judg. 611-23 Zech. 111-13 3 1 f.), the spirit of God (Gen. 12 Is. 112 Joel3: [228]), the face of God (Ex. 3314 Dt. 437), the name of God (Ex. 2321 Nu. 627 Ps. 543 Prov. 1810 Is. 3027), the glory (כבוד) of Yahwè (Ex. 2416 f. 1 K. 811), and the wisdom of God (Job 2812-28; Prov. 822-31; Bar. 328-38; Eccles. 11-10 241-12; Wisd. 722-85 949); also (but least of all) the very word of God (Gen. 136 etc., Ps. 336 Wisd. 1815 f.). In the Targums the 'Word of God,' in particular (memra), is often substituted where the original has Yahwè. All this, however, is very far indeed from sufficing really to explain the Logos-idea of the Fourth Gospel. Its foundation lies in the idea that God is unknown and must remain unknown if he is not revealed. The OT nowhere goes so far. The idea rests rather upon the dualism between God and matter which we find in Plato. The Stoics added to this the idea that the Logos, as having proceeded from God, while at the same time not in the fullest sense of the word a divine being, has for its function to exercise upon the world that operation of God which, strictly speaking, was impossible to God as the absolute good over against the world as the absolute evil. Philo appropriated this Stoical idea, and brought it into connection with some ideas of the OT. Thereby he gave it a development which, as an intermediate stage, prepared the way directly for the Fourth Gospel.

(b) If Philo had not existed, we should have been compelled to trace the Logos-idea of Jn. to the other sources we have named. In that case, however, we should have been constrained to ascribe to the evangelist a very large measure of independence. As, however, Philo was some twenty-five years older than Jesus, and his writings were already known to the author of Hebrews, if not even to Paul,¹ it is nothing less than wilful blindness to facts to deny the derivation of the Johannine Logos-idea from Philo, and to refuse to admit anything save an OT origin. Apart from this, the object in view—to avoid the necessity of deriving an idea of such importance in the NT from an extra-canonical source—is attained only if the OT Apocrypha are shut out as well as Philo; but these are precisely the writings that contain far more important and exact anticipations of the Logos-idea than any in the OT.

(c) A more serious consideration is demanded by the fact that in the Fourth Gospel the view of the universe from which the Logos-idea proceeds is not quite consistently carried out. According to that view God himself should never at all come into relations with the world without mediation of the Logos. Instead of this, we read for example in 316 that he loves the world; cp 640 1627 176. This position, however, is nothing more than a mitigation of strict philosophical dualism such as is inevitable in thought that is based at one and the same time on the OT and on Christianity; but, had it been the starting-point, it would be impossible to see how the author could ever have come to think of a Logos as needful in order to mediate between God and the world.

(d) It is quite a mistake to argue that the Fourth Gospel cannot have drawn from Philo because it represents the Logos as having been made flesh (114). It is indeed true that the Philonic Logos can never be made flesh; it is superfluous to ask whether it be a person at all, for it belongs to the essence of the Logos that at one and the same time as a power working on the world it possesses a distinct existence over against God and yet in accordance with its original meaning it remains an impersonal idea of God. When, however, the Logos-idea came to be brought into connection with Christianity it was inevitable that Jesus should be identified with the Logos; for in Christianity Jesus has the position of a revealer of God, the position which in Philo is assigned to the Logos. In this a quite fundamental modification of the Logos-idea is involved. But from this fact the proper conclusion is, not that the earlier form does not lie at the foundation of the later, but rather that there is all the less reason why we should not recognise the fact in proportion as the modification which Christianity has wrought upon the Logos-idea has been profound.

One might suppose it to be self-evident that the evangelist in his prologue had the intention of propounding the fundamental thoughts which he was about to develop in the subsequent course of his gospel. The view of Harnack (Ztschr. f. Theol. u. Kirche, 1892, pp. 189-231)—that the prologue is not the expression of the evangelist's own view but is designed merely to produce a favourable prepossession on behalf of the book in the minds of educated readers—is in itself remarkable enough. But, apart from this, Harnack, in working it out, has to interpret the Gospel itself, apart from the prologue, in a way which does not correspond with the facts. Thus, he maintains that Jesus is presented in the gospel as mainly ideally, not really pre-existent; that in so far as he is presented as really pre-existent, it is on the ground not of his being son of God but of his being Messiah; that Jesus is son of God only in the ethical, not in the metaphysical sense; the figure of Jesus presented is an expressly human one and shows at no point divine features inconsistent with this character (see, as against this, §§ 26-30). Further, he draws from the facts unsound conclusions.

Harnack rightly holds that where Jesus is represented as son of God he is not only one with God, but also subordinated to him (e.g., 14 28), but he infers from this that his sonship is to be understood in the ethical, not the metaphysical sense. To this it must be replied that even a son of God who from all eternity has been begotten in a supernatural way remains from the very nature of the case subordinate to the father. Precisely this generation before all time is held by Harnack; it is true, to be excluded by reason of the fact that it is the earthly Christ who is called 'only begotten' (μονογενής) (1 14 18 3 16 18). It is self-evident, however, that this title could not be withheld from the earthly Christ if it had belonged to him already before his earthly existence; for the earthly Christ shows in the Fourth Gospel the same attributes of Godhead as we should ascribe to him in his pre-existent state (see § 26).

Nor is it any more to the point to say that the prologue, for its part, does not intend to describe the essence of Jesus in his pre-existence, because at its conclusion it makes the transition to something lower, namely, to the historical person of the 'only begotten' (μονογενής). It is only on the assumption of Harnack alluded to above that 'only begotten' (μονογενής) is something lower than 'word' (λόγος).¹ Lastly, it is in appearance

¹ Still less would this be the case if in 1 18 'an only begotten God' (μονογενής θεός) were to be read, as in fact Harnack himself would read. The external testimony is indecisive as between this reading and 'the only begotten son' (ὁ μονογενής υἱός). On philological grounds the first reading would require at least to have the article prefixed, as indeed it has in extracts from Theodotus in Clem. Al. p. 968 in a statement about the Valentinians, in $\kappa\epsilon$ and in the minuscule codex 33, further in many (though not in all) places in Clem. Al. p. 695, ed. Potter; Orig. (489 439, ed. de la Rue); Dionys. Alex. (qu 10 contra Paul. Samosat., in Bibliotheca Bigliantiana auctarium, ed. Fronto Ducatus, I, Paris, 1624, p. 301); Didymus (de trinit., 126 25); Epiphani. merely that 1 14 'the Logos was made flesh' seems to have little importance for the author since the thought never recurs, and that the prologue thus stands apart and aloof from the proper contents of the gospel itself. The entire gospel is nothing else but an elaboration of the thought, 'we saw his glory.' Thus the incarnation of the Logos must be one of its weightiest thoughts if we are not to deny the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ to the gospel altogether.

The only fact worth noting is that pointed out by Harnack that apart from the prologue the word logos occurs in its quite usual sense, eight times of the speech of other speakers, nine times of an individual utterance of Jesus, eleven times of his preaching as a whole, in addition to the seven times where it is used in the expression 'word of God' (λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ) meaning the tidings of salvation. This also, however, admits of explanation. As soon as the narrative passes over from the pre-existent to the earthly life of Jesus the place of the title logos must be taken by those designations (Jesus, ὁ Ἰησοῦς, and the like) which are fitted to express his human manifestation. In this part of the book, therefore, it can cause but little confusion if the word logos is used in its ordinary meaning. We too are in the habit of continually using one and the same word, now in its ordinary and now in its technical sense, as soon as we are sure we shall be understood. In the Fourth Gospel no passage can be pointed out where uncertainty as to the sense in which logos is used is possible; everywhere it is made clear by some addition such as 'this' word, 'my' word, 'his' word, or the like.

The perception that the prologue is deliberately intended as a preparation for the entire contents of the gospel has reached its ultimate logical result in the proposition that the entire gospel is a conception at the root of which lies neither history nor even tradition of another kind, but solely the ideas of the prologue. Upon this proposition rests the brilliant analysis of the gospel by Baur, with which, significantly enough, theologians so strictly dogmatic as Luthardt and Hengstenberg find themselves in accord—these two, however, we must hasten to add, in the belief that the artificial arrangement which is rendered necessary by the carrying out of that central thought is at the same time in accordance with history,—God, or Christ, having so ordered the history that it should subserve the expression of those ideas. In setting forth these ideas the division into triads is used as a principal means. It manifests itself partly in single sentences such as 1 1 or 1 20 (GOSPELS, § 49), partly in the manner in which the various parts of the book are grouped as a whole. Already, however, it has come to be very generally latter place twice). Hort (Two Diss., '76) has laid no weight upon this question; nor yet has Harnack. It is nevertheless a very important one. Hort (p. 28) renders: 'An only-begotten who is God, even He who,' etc.; Harnack (Theol. Lt.-Ztg., '76, p. 545) has 'einen Gott hat Niemand je gesehen; ein eingebornen Gott . . . hat Kunde gebracht. It is not permissible, however, to supply the indefinite article to θεός here (a god), if it is remembered how often elsewhere the word, in spite of the absence of the definite article, denotes the One God. It would in the present case be equivalent to denying altogether the author's possession of the Christian belief in God, if we held that he admitted even in thought the possibility of there being other gods, and that he placed them on a level with the true God with reference to their invisibility. But even apart from this, from a linguistic point of view also, the antithesis between θεός without qualification and μονογενής θεός is quite inappropriate and unintelligible. Instead of the θεός without qualification some more precise designation was needed. Such designation, however, is not met with anywhere in the Johannine writings.

The final determination lies in the consideration that the thought of 'an only begotten God' (μονογενής θεός) is not Johannine, and that whether with or without the article. In 1 Jn. 5 20 we find 'the true God'; ὁ ἀληθινός θεός, as a designation of God (not of Christ; the meaning is: being in his son Jesus Christ, we are in the True; this [last] is the true God, etc.). To designate God, however, in contradistinction to this designation of Christ, 'the true God' (ὁ ἀληθινός θεός; 1 Jn. 5 20) would not be at all a good antithesis. Jn. 20 28 ought not to be referred to in this connection, for the reason that when Thomas there addresses Jesus with the possessive pronoun as 'My Lord and my God' the expression says much less than it would without the pronoun. Thus the highest utterance regarding Jesus to which the Fourth Gospel anywhere rises is in 1 1c 'the word was God' (θεός ἦν ὁ λόγος). But this does not mean more than that the Logos was of divine essence; the passage, therefore, gives no warrant for designating Jesus as 'only begotten God' (μονογενής θεός), by which designation he would become a 'second God' (δευτερός θεός) in the sense of the Alexandrian church-fathers.

acknowledged that it is impossible to explain in this way the arrangement of the entire gospel.

It may perhaps be enough to point out that chaps. 2-6 are arranged according to the following scheme:—chap. 2, two narratives (the miracle at Cana and the cleansing of the temple); 3:1-4:42, discourses of Jesus which serve to interpret these narratives; 4:43-5:16, two miracles of healing; 5:17-47, a discourse of Jesus on the healing of the Jewish people; 6:1-21, the feeding of the five thousand and the walking upon the water (on the connection see § 20 c); 6:22-71, the discourse relative to this on Jesus as the bread of life. In 7:28-11:44 the arrangement is in two respects the opposite of this; we have always one narrative, not two, and the interpretative discourse precedes instead of following. Thus 8:12-59 treats of Jesus as the light of the world, in chap. 9 the narrative of the healing of the man born blind follows; 10:22-42 treats of Jesus as the life of the world (cp v. 28); in 11:1-44 the raising of Lazarus follows. If we could regard as well-founded Hausrath's conjecture (NTliche Zeitgesch. iii. 603 f. 2nd ed. iv. 424), that in the place where we now find the story of the woman taken in adultery there originally stood a miraculous narrative, similar to those in chaps. 9 and 11, to which 7:28-52 was the introductory interpretation, then we should have in chaps. 7-11 a triad of narratives associated with interpretative discourses. We cannot, however, be sure of this.

Moreover, it has to be pointed out that chaps. 1:7-27 10:1-22 do not admit of being taken up into this scheme, and that a similar method of grouping is still less applicable to the other parts of the gospel. The evangelist, therefore, has at many points been working with material laid to his hand, and has utilised it to give expression to his ideas, but has not been purely creative.

A perception of this fact leads to the question how far the material which lay before the evangelist goes back to authentic tradition. If one cannot claim this for the whole of the material (see §§ 35 37), the next expedient is to search for details that are trustworthy.

34. Credibility of certain details.

(a) Sayings of Jesus such as those in 7:17 or 13:17 would cause no difficulty if we read them in the synoptic gospels. It does not necessarily follow from this, however, that they are authentic. They might also conceivably be summings up, by which the evangelist attributes to Jesus that which in reality is for himself the product of his own reflection absorbed in the contemplation of Jesus. In other passages an explanation of this kind is at once suggested by the Johannine phraseology. The Jesus of the synoptists, instead of 14:15 21:23 15:10, would be much more likely to have said 'if ye love me, keep God's commandments,' or perhaps even 'if ye love the father, keep his commandments.' It might be regarded as a real word of Jesus when he is made to say (5:30) that he can do nothing of himself or (3:35 5:20) that he has nothing save what the father has first given or shown him. This, however, can equally well be merely an expression for the metaphysical oneness between God and the Logos, and indeed the expression 'show' points directly to this. It is very conceivable that in actual fact there arrived in the life of Jesus such a moment as that described in chap. 8, when he became convinced that Jerusalem had no response to make to his demand for faith. This same thought, however, is equally inevitable if the history of Jesus be conceived of purely in accordance with Johannine ideas, for it simply carries out what is said in 1:11, and Jerusalem is of course the central point at which it had to be decided whether Jesus was to find faith or not.

(b) The supposition that precise statements about some particular event having occurred or some particular discourse having been pronounced on a definite day (1:29 35:43 2:1 4:40 43 6:22 7:14 37 12:12) or even at a definite hour (1:39 4:6) could only have come from an eye-witness is very tempting. Many scholars, therefore, give precedence to such passages in their consideration, and then propose to extend to the whole gospel the conclusion based upon these—that it is an eye-witness who is speaking throughout. After what has been said in preceding sections this is, however, indefensible. It has also to be observed, further, that the evangelist himself will sometimes be found in one place to contradict his own quite precise statements. According to 7:27 the people know whence Jesus is, according to 9:29 they do not. In 5:31 Jesus says that if he bear witness of himself his witness is not true; in 8:14 he says the opposite. In 3:26 we read that all the people flocked to Jesus, in 3:32 that no one received his testimony. According to 3:22 26 4:1 Jesus baptizes; according to 4:2 only his disciples do so. In the instances just cited we learn something of the evangelist's method of composition. What would we expect of an ordinary author who wished to avoid saying anything out of place if, when he came to write (say) 4:2, he found that in 3:22 26 he had erroneously stated that Jesus himself had baptized? Unquestionably he would go back upon these passages and alter them. This is not what Jn. does. Thus he does not attach importance to the literal exactness of what he says. In order to be able to contrast Jesus and John and compare the waxing influence of the one with the waning influence of the other he thought it fitting in 3:22-26 to represent both as baptizing.

(c) In 1:29 35 f. the mention of a particular day is coupled with the statement that the Baptist declared Jesus to be the Lamb of God that bears the sin of the world, in 1:35-42 it is coupled further with the three other statements that Andrew and another unnamed person had transferred themselves from the discipleship of John to become disciples of Jesus, that Simon was led by Andrew to Jesus, and that he forthwith received from Jesus the name of Peter. All four statements are irreconcilable with what we read in the synoptists (§ 2, Mk. 1:16-20). It cannot, therefore, be said to be too bold a conjecture if we suppose that these precise statements of day and hour were for the evangelist only a mode of representation, adopted in order to break up a narrative or discourse into connected parts, the individual parts being attached to different points of time (so, especially, 1:29 35 43 2:1 6:22 12:12 139). The sixth hour in 4:6 has perhaps a symbolical meaning (GOSPELS, § 54 7). The statement that at the time of the feeding of the five thousand the passover was at hand (6:4) was necessary in order to call attention to the fact that the interpretation of the eucharist was to be connected with this narrative. The view, therefore, that this verse is a gloss is just as mistaken as the other view that it contains an authentic statement of historical fact.

(d) How little importance the evangelist attaches to details of the sort is shown for example also in such a matter as this, that in 6:15 Jesus again goes up into the mountain which he has not left since 6:3 (the first verse corresponds to the beginning of Mt.'s second narrative of feeding, the second to the close of his first [15:29, 14:23=Mk. 6:46]), or this, that at the close of a discourse which, according to 6:24 f., was begun by the seashore (perhaps in Capernaum) and not interrupted, we are told in 6:59 that it was spoken in the synagogue at Capernaum.

Even if such detailed statements as we have had under consideration fail us on examination, it is yet held 35. 'Johannine tradition.' to be possible to discover true historical data in other portions, which, as compared with the synoptists, are either new or (even) deliberately at variance with the synoptical account.

(a) The attempt to do so may well be made, for the entire contents of the gospel do not admit of being derived from ideas alone. In that case, however, we must be specially on our guard against the error of supposing that a tradition, because different from that of the synoptists, is eo ipso historical. The true use of a recourse to Johannine tradition lies rather in this, that it may enable us to see how in the course of oral transmission the mistaken statements found in the Fourth Gospel could have arisen.

(b) Should, for example—to take the most pregnant instance—the evangelist have freely invented the whole narrative of the raising of Lazarus in order to give expression to his idea of the life-giving power of Jesus, he is by no means open indeed to the charge of unveracity in the moral sense of the expression (for his right to use an allegorical method of expressing his thoughts cannot be gainsaid when we remember the character of his writing), but certainly his procedure in this direction cannot but seem very bold. The difficulties which this view might suggest are almost completely obviated if we suppose that the story of Lazarus had taken shape in successive stages so that the evangelist himself had only a few touches left to add.

Bruno Bauer long ago perceived that the story is a development of the parable of Lazarus in Lk. 16:19-31. Following this clue we can imagine that some preacher, after relating that parable, in order to open it up to his hearers, may have added the remark: 'This Lazarus actually did rise from the dead' (cp GOSPELS, § 109*d*). A hearer of this sermon—so let us further suppose—gave the notes of it in a shorter form to a third person, who gathered from it as a statement of historical fact that Lazarus had risen. Cp LAZARUS. And so in further transmission piece after piece might be added to the narrative, until at last but little remained for the evangelist to do. Cp GOSPELS, § 59.

(c) In somewhat similar fashion we picture to ourselves the rise of the story of the sick man of Bethesda. Some preacher or other likened the Jewish people to a man who had been sick for thirty-eight years (the duration of the wandering in the wilderness, Dt. 2:14). The house in which he lay, he might add, had five porches—the five books of Moses—but healing, nevertheless, he was not able to find. As often as the water which possessed the healing virtue began to move, there was no one by to help him to go down to it, till Jesus came and asked: 'Wilt thou be made whole?'

(d) If further, a preacher was discoursing upon a healing of the blind recorded in the synoptists, and interpreted the blind as representing the Jewish nation, it could easily occur to him to say: this blind man was blind from his birth. In this very manner the discourse of Stephen in Acts 7 seeks to show that the Jewish nation from the first had misknown the will of God. A slightly inattentive hearer might readily infer from such a mode of speaking that Jesus had on some occasion literally healed a man born blind. Now, in Mk. 8:23-25 we have a narrative which tells us how a blind man was made to see by Jesus, not all at once, but gradually. In expounding this, a preacher might easily say: those who are spiritually blind come only gradually to a recognition of Jesus their healer. This thought finds its expression in Jn. 9:17:31-33:38 in this form: he who has been made whole in the first instance takes Jesus merely for a prophet and a good man sent from God, and only in the end does he reach the intuition that he is the Son of Man. A further point of connection with the narrative of Mk. 8:23-25 is to be found in the fact that in Jn. 9:6 Jesus makes use of saliva. All that is new is found in the use made of the saliva, and in the washing in the pool of Siloam.

(e) The synoptics supply us with no parallel that can be immediately taken as foundation for the narrative of the marriage at Cana. If, however, the view set forth under GOSPELS (§ 142) be upheld, that synoptical miracles can sometimes have originated in parables misunderstood, the same can, without any difficulty whatever, be also maintained here. The time of the Messiah's coming resembles a wedding (Mk. 2:19; Jn. 3:29; Rev. 19:7). At such a time there is no fasting; the Messiah brings wine instead of water (Mk. 14:23). By the wine was understood the new religion which he substituted for the old. Already in Mk. 2:22 we find it likened to new wine. Here, again, Philo (Leg. Alleg. 3:26; ed. Mangey, 1:102) presents himself most appropriately. The Logos which appears under the form of Melchizedek brings wine instead of water, and gives drink to souls so that a divine intoxication befalls them. By the mother of Jesus, on this interpretation, we may understand (in accordance with Rev. 12:5) the community of the people of God. It recognises that in the old religion it finds no wine; that is to say, that it fails in spiritual power, and, if unable itself to remedy matters, it knows at least thus much, that in such a situation it must turn to Jesus.

(f) Let us take one other example—that of the foot-washing. In Lk. 22:26*f* we read that Jesus immediately after the last supper said to his disciples, 'I am among you as he that serves.' This a preacher could very easily amplify to some such effect as this: 'Yes, Jesus did actually wait upon his disciples; instead of remaining at table as would have befitted his exalted dignity he arose and washed their feet.' The expression in such a case was meant figuratively; but the figure was particularly apt because the washing of the feet is the lowliest service. This made it all the more fitted to edify, and made it all the more easy to believe as a literal fact when someone thought he was to understand it so.

(g) In other cases the author must be assigned a larger share in the construction of his narratives (cp, e.g., § 20, c, end). It must not be forgotten, however, that even in the cases discussed in the preceding paragraphs the author of the gospel, even when a narrative of the kind had reached him in almost a finished state, always gave it its last touches and adapted it so as to subserve the expression of his thought. It will never be possible to learn with absolute certainty how far he treated materials presented to him with freedom, and how far he himself framed narratives or portions of narratives in order to give his thoughts pictorial expression. The interpretation attempted above must, however, in any case, be welcomed, if the desire is felt to avoid imputing to the author any larger degree of arbitrariness in free invention than is absolutely necessary. Do what we will it will never be possible to say these narratives were to the author not vehicles for conveying spiritual truth but unadulterated histories; indeed, how far he himself may have regarded them as narratives of actual occurrences remains one of the most difficult of questions, in fact, strictly speaking, insoluble.

(h) There remain some Johannine narratives for which we cannot indicate any basis in the synoptics. The Nathanael incident (1:45-51), that of Nicodemus (3:1-21), of the Samaritan woman (4:1-42), of the Greeks at the feast (12:20*f*), of the beloved disciple and Jesus' mother at the cross (19:26*f*), of the beloved disciple and Peter at the grave (20:2-10), not to mention less important points, are by many regarded as historical.

After so many things peculiar to the Fourth Gospel have been found to be untrustworthy, however, one should really hesitate to maintain the narratives just enumerated, all the more when they fall in with a tendency that could easily have led to their rise. Now the story about the Greeks not only contains no concrete touches, but also serves a purpose that can be recognised with great clearness. Such a purpose can be recognised also in the story of the Samaritan woman in as far as the Samaritans represent the Gentiles (§ 27). In concreteness, on the other hand, the story of the Samaritan woman is as far from being lacking as, for example, that of the raising of Lazarus. It would be a great mistake, however, to see in that a guarantee of historicity. A painter who sets himself to give expression to an idea by depicting an event is not blamed but praised when his lively imagination lays on the colours as strongly as possible. A writer who does the same will be praised in like manner; but his narrative will not on that account be regarded as historical. Nicodemus is a representative of a very large class of men. They are interested in Jesus; but their belief in him rests mainly on his wonderful works; for the deeper things he has to offer they have very little understanding. The preference given to the beloved disciple over Peter at the grave corresponds exactly with the tendency that finds further expression in 21:15-23 (§ 40). Jesus' committing to him the care of his mother serves the same purpose. The attempt to identify Nathanael with one of the twelve disciples is hardly likely to succeed. It has even been thought to find in him a veiled representation of the apostle Paul.¹ In that case proof that he is not historical would be needless. However that may be (see NATHANAEEL), it is further to be considered that the story of Nathanael is connected with an account of the call of the first disciples which cannot be harmonised with that of the synoptists (§ 34 c); and for all the narratives mentioned above it is necessary to bear in mind the significance of the silence of the synoptists. That silence will occupy our attention in a two-fold respect (§§ 36-37).

The evangelist's acquaintance with the synoptists, here presupposed, needs no proof here. Illustrative instances are given in § 34 a, d, and 36. Dependence on the synoptists. 36, 44.² It is also conceded on all hands, even by the most conservative theologians, who further declare that John's intention was to supplement the synoptists. It will be enough here to say in a single word how impossible it is to take the matter the other way. A story like that of the sick man at Bethesda, or that of the man born blind, or that of Lazarus, going so far beyond the synoptists in respect of the greatness of the miracle involved, those writers could by no possibility have passed over; just as little could they have passed over such an incident as that of the foot-washing, the theme of which is actually touched on in Lk. 22:27 (§ 35 [f]), or the scene at the cross between the beloved disciple and the mother of Jesus, or that at the grave between the beloved disciple and Peter and between Jesus and Mary Magdalene. That Jesus, too, from the very outset had been recognised as the Messiah would have been exactly what, in their veneration for Jesus, they would have wished to be able to say. The first step in this direction is, in fact, taken by Mt. himself, when he makes Jesus appear as the Messiah even before the confession of Peter (GOSPELS, § 145*k*).

The considerations just mentioned, however, carry us still further.

(a) We shall be safe in asserting not only that the synoptists cannot have been acquainted with the Fourth Gospel, but also that they were not aware of the existence of other sources, written or oral, containing all these divergences from their own account which are exhibited in this gospel.

In the case of the Lazarus-narrative, to confine ourselves here to a single instance, among the explanations of the silence of the synoptists which have been boldly offered are the following: that among the multitude of the other raisings from the dead they could easily have forgotten this one, or that they were not acute enough to perceive its outstanding importance in its bearing upon the life of Jesus, that they felt themselves wanting in the delicacy and keenness of feeling that were required for the right telling of it or that they felt themselves insufficiently informed on the details, that they kept silence out of regard to the still surviving relatives of Lazarus, that, as having happened before the arrival of the Galilean pilgrims to the feast, or as having already become in Jerusalem so well known as no longer to be talked about, they had never heard of it, that their plan of writing, apart from the events of the week of the crucifixion, allowed them to include only Galilean incidents, or even that in view of a later gospel to be written by another evangelist (John) they confined themselves to these. A glance at this series of explanations is sufficient to show how hopeless is the task of those who seek to establish the superiority of the Johannine gospel to those of the synoptists in historical accuracy.

(b) In all points, then, which in substance are common to all the four gospels, the synoptists everywhere excel in simplicity, naturalness, intelligibility. Although one might be tempted to give the preference to the fourth as regards the scene of the activity of Jesus, one is precluded from doing so as soon as it is perceived how by the action of Jesus in Jerusalem the conflict with the Jewish authorities is brought on at a much earlier period than is historically conceivable. Although, as regards the miracle-narratives, one might say on the authority of 20₃₀*f*. that Jn. seeks only to supplement those given by the synoptists, it must still be conceded that the relations of Jesus with the demoniacally-possessed—relations nowhere touched on in Jn.—are yet, historically, the best-attested of all, and enable us best to conceive how actual wonders of healing sick persons might be wrought by Jesus. Beyond all doubt, the character in which the Johannine miracles are brought forward—as signs (§ 20*d*)—would render quite impossible, if the miracles were historical, the rise of a tradition that Jesus had expressly refused to work any signs, and that he had forbidden the miracles he actually wrought to be made known (GOSPELS, §§ 140*a*, 141, 133*d*). Had Jesus really possessed that exalted consciousness of his pre-existence and divine dignity which is attributed to him in the Fourth Gospel, the declaration that blasphemy against him was capable of forgiveness (Mt. 12₃₁*f*. Lk. 12₁₀) could never have been attributed to him.

(c) As regards Jesus' discourses, nothing is more natural than that their popular character, often taking concrete shape in the form of parables, should have won for him the love of the people; on the other hand, the constant repetition of metaphysical propositions concerning his own person, of imperious demands for the faith of his hearers could never have done so, and in point of fact, according to the Fourth Gospel, they actually had the opposite effect, so that one is really at a loss to understand how, in spite of it all, so many should have turned to him—while nevertheless it is certainly historically true, as the triumphal entry into Jerusalem proves. If Jesus had actually proclaimed the universality of salvation as we find it in Jn. 3₁₆*f*. 10₁₆, it would be an insoluble mystery how any could be regarded as disciples of his who affirmed they had been forbidden by Jesus to go in the way of the Gentiles or enter a city of the Samaritans (Mt. 10₅), and who persisted in raising such formidable opposition to the mission of Paul to the Gentiles. If Jesus expressed himself in such highly spiritualised terms as we have seen (§ 28*a c*) regarding the final judgment, his own second coming, and the resurrection of his followers, we should be irresistibly forced to treat as grave errors those reports by the synoptists according to which he predicted all these things in their literal sense. So far as the date of the crucifixion is concerned, Jn. by reason of the inherent probability of his date seems to come into consideration as a witness of equal or even higher authority than the synoptists; yet even here the date he gives is explicable only as a deliberate divergence from that of the synoptists, not conversely.

But we have said enough and more than enough. A book which begins by declaring Jesus to be the logos of God and ends by representing a cohort of Roman soldiers as falling to the ground at the majesty of his appearance (186), and by representing 100 pounds of ointment as having been used at his embalming (1939), ought by these facts alone to be spared such a misunderstanding of its true character, as would be implied in supposing that it meant to be a historical work.

If Ænon, Salim (323), Sychar (45), Bethesda (52), Bethany beyond Jordan (128), etc., have never yet been satisfactorily identified (see special articles), the fact ought not to be urged as necessarily proving defective information on the part of the author.

Neither ought exception to be taken to the name Gabbatha (1913). The evangelist, too, has unquestionably given correctly (181) the name of the nahal between Jerusalem and the Mt. of Olives ('brook Kidron'; χεῖμαρος τοῦ Κεδρών) in spite of his copyists and the whole body of approved modern editors (see KIDRON). The forty and six years of 220 rest upon sound reckoning inasmuch as the building was begun by Herod the Great in 20-19 B.C. There are therefore nineteen years before and twenty-seven years after the beginning of our era. The passover at which Jesus is represented to have uttered the words in question will be, if the forty-sixth year was not yet ended, that of 27 A.D.; if it was ended, which suits the expression better, that of 28 A.D., and Jesus' death, since in the Fourth Gospel two passovers follow (64 121), at passover in 30 A.D.—a date by many supposed to be correct. Also the statement that during forty-six years the building continued in process can be justified.¹ All this, however, weighs but little against the serious mistake by which in 1149 1813 Caiaphas is called the 'high-priest of that year' (GOSPELS, § 132). This of itself betrays unfamiliarity on the part of the evangelist with the conditions subsisting in Palestine in the time of Jesus (cp § 53; also GOSPELS, § 46).

Notwithstanding this, the writer may still have been a Jew. He alone makes use of the Aramaic names Μεσσίας, Γαββαθα, etc., and rightly explains Σιλωαμ (a distortion of the Heb. שילון) as meaning ἀπεσταλμένος.

39. Nationality of the evangelist. However small the weight he attaches to the Mosaic law on its enacting side, and however depreciatory the words he attributes to Jesus in this regard (§ 19), all the more noteworthy is the deference with which he regards it as a book of prophecy. It is in this aspect that he says of it (1035) that the scripture cannot be broken; on this view of it depends his citation of predictions and types—even of such as he did not find in the synoptists (§ 23 [f])—and his declaration (539) that the scriptures testify of Jesus whilst the Jews diligently search them (ἐπευνάρε is indicative) in the belief that in them, if understood in the Jewish way, eternal life is to be found. From the historical point of view, he recognises also that salvation comes from the Jews (4:22). In this attitude—partly of acceptance, partly of rejection—towards the OT, the evangelist occupies much the same position as that of Paul or of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. A born Gentile would not easily have attached so great a value to the prophetic significance of the OT. This consideration, taken in combination with the author's defective acquaintance with the conditions in Palestine in the time of Jesus, points to the conclusion that he was by birth a Jew of the Dispersion or the son of Christian parents who had been Jews of the Dispersion.

Before passing on to the direct utterances of the author regarding himself, it will be necessary to take account of chap. 21. As 20:30 f. constitutes a formal and solemn conclusion, 21 is beyond question a later appendix. We may go on to add that it does not come from the same author with the rest of the book.

The appearance of the risen Jesus is the third (21:14) only if that to Mary Magdalene (20:11-17) is not included in the reckoning; but originally it was certainly meant to be included, the number three playing a great part in the Fourth Gospel. Further, the narrative of 21:1-14 is governed by the intention to do justice to what is said in Mt. and Mk., according to which the appearances of the risen Jesus were in Galilee. The writer of chap. 20 on the other hand is plainly, with deliberate purpose, following Lk., who restricts those appearances to Jerusalem. The phraseology indeed shows dependence on that of chaps. 1-20 at many points (as, for example, by οὐν and the asyndeta); but it shows divergences also, such as ὑπάγειν with the infinitive and ἔρχεσθαι σὺν instead of ἀκολουθεῖν and other alternative synonyms (v. 3); πρωία instead of πρωί (v. 4); παιδία for τεκνία (v. 5); ισχυεῖν for δύνασθαι (v. 6); ἐξετάζειν for ἑρωτᾶν (v. 12); ἐγερθεῖς for ἀναστᾶς (v. 14); φέρεν for ἄγειν (v. 18), and the like. Peter appears in the character of a fisherman, as in the synoptists; in 1:35-40 he is a disciple of John. Among the seven disciples who are present (v. 2) are numbered 'the (sons) of Zebedee—an expression that never occurs elsewhere in the gospel. The parousia of Jesus is, expected in v. 22 in a literal sense (as against §28*a*). That Nathanael belonged to Cana (21:2) is certainly the result of a false combination of 1:46 and 2:1. The purpose of the second half of the chapter is to bring the dignity of Peter into somewhat greater prominence than it had received in the gospel. The unnamed disciple indeed is always placed even higher than he; but the purpose of rehabilitating Peter is plain. This circumstance also makes against the identity of the author of this chapter with the author of the rest of the book.

The second half of the chapter has, however, a second main purpose—that, namely, of accrediting the gospel by v. 24 f. This cannot be an independent appendix to vv. 1-23, else these verses, until they had received this addition, would have been without any proper close. Now the testimony is given by more than one person, and must, in the eyes of the critic, for that very reason lose the importance which in the intention of its writer it is designed to have. A witness whose testimony in turn requires to be attested cannot be regarded as a very authoritative person.¹ The fact is here betrayed that doubt has been thrown on his testimony. The same thing is betrayed also in the Muratorian fragment (L. 14 f.), where it is said that, after consultation on the part of John with his fellow-disciples and bishops, and after a three days' fast together, it was revealed to Andrew that John should write the whole 'recognoscitur cunctis suo nomine.'

Chap. 21:24 f. points back (a) to 19:35. The elaborate investigations that have been made on the question whether any one can designate himself by ἐκείνος ('that') are not only indecisive as regards any secure grammatical result; they do not touch the kernel of the question at all.

41. Testimony of author of 1-20 regarding himself.

Once it has been said, 'he who saw has testified and his testimony is true,' there is nothing surprising when the sequel runs 'and that one knows that he speaks true' even when in all these words the author is meaning himself. The question that ought to have been discussed is not as to whether the author could (or would) intend to denote himself or another by ἐκείνος, but as to the person whom he intended by 'he who saw' (ὁ ἑωρακώς). If he meant himself, then the present tense would have been more appropriate than the perfect 'has testified' (ἠμαρτυρήκεν), in the sense, 'I who saw it now bear witness to it hereby; that I write it.' Yet also the perfect is defensible in the meaning 'he (i.e., I) has testified it, and with this you must rest satisfied.' It would have been appropriate also to say 'he who witnesses has seen' (ὁ μαρτυρῶν ἑώρακεν); but this was not necessary in order to express the meaning that the writer was an eye-witness. The 'knows' (οἶδεν) seems to indicate that the author really wishes to be regarded as an eye-witness, otherwise the preferable phrase would be 'and that man assures that he speaks true.' At the same time, such a mode of expression would be too tautological or even too obviously a weakening when coming immediately after the words 'and his testimony is true.'

Thus we obtain nothing from this central passage except this, that we must leave quite undecided the question whether the writer is intending to present himself or some other person as the eye-witness. Indeed, this very vagueness seems to be intentional on the author's part. We must seek to arrive at a definite conclusion by some other road. Here is one. For every one who grants that at the spear-thrust blood certainly but not water could have flowed from the pierced side, it is also firmly established that no eye-witness could actually have seen the circumstance attested. If, therefore, the author's intention is to point to himself as such a witness, he presents himself in a much less favourable light than if he were merely reproducing information derived from another which he had received in good faith. He is therefore spared a reproach if he is supposed to be reproducing. Such a reproach need not in itself hinder us from supposing him to present himself as an eye-witness; in view of the mysteriously allusive character of the entire book absolute freedom must be allowed the writer in this matter, especially as we are dealing with a point the central importance of which, in the eyes of its author, is evident from the very circumstance of his offering a special attestation of it at all.

(b) But the supposed other testimony to himself—the designation of the unnamed disciple as the disciple whom Jesus loved (13:23 19:26 20:2; cp 21:7 20:24)—speaks quite decisively against the view that it was written by the person who is intended by that expression. One can hardly understand how it is possible to have sympathy for a writer who claims for himself such a degree of superiority as is implied in this designation. The designation is quite intelligible on the other hand when coming from the pen of one of his admirers. Our research then has brought us thus far at least that there are great disadvantages in regarding the apostle as the author of the gospel. On the other hand, so far as it has gone, it has given us no assurance as to whether the actual writer intends to inform us regarding the beloved disciple and the eye-witness as if he were a third person, or whether he does not desire to produce the appearance that he himself is the person.

(c) Should this last be the actual fact, no charge of moral obliquity is involved, such as might seem to be implied if the principles of modern law as to intellectual and literary property were to be invoked. Classical antiquity furnishes us with a great number of examples of cases in which a pupil published his works not in his own name but in that of his master, and the neo-Pythagorean Iamblichus (circa 300 A.D.), to cite a single instance, expressly commends the Pythagoreans—of whose writings some sixty are still known which were falsely attributed to Pythagoras and other ancient masters of that school—in that, renouncing the desire for personal fame, they were willing that all the praise of their work should go to their master. The presbyter of Asia Minor who in the second century had composed the Acts of Paul and Thecla in Paul's name, when he was challenged for this explained that his motive was his regard for Paul (id se amore Pauli fecisse); and Tertullian's remark (de Bapt. 17) implies depreciation indeed yet no moral censure: 'quasi titulo Pauli de suo cumulans'—the reason he gives for the deposition of the author being his contradiction of 1 Cor. 14:34 in having introduced Thecla as teaching and baptizing.

¹ Although the phrase in 3 Jn. 12 is almost identical it is there not open to criticism.

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

had come from the author of the rest of the book. As we have not to suppose this, it remains open to suggest that the author of the appendix by this addition intended to go yet one step further than the author of chaps. 1-20 himself had gone. At the same time the vagueness with which the author has expressed himself in 1935 is worthy of remark. It can very well be due to the purpose of saying what was capable of more than one meaning, so that one reader might believe that the author was speaking of the eye-witness as a third person, whilst another might believe he had himself in his mind.

The fact that the name of the beloved disciple and eye-witness is not mentioned anywhere throughout the entire gospel is, on the other hand, not decisive. The suppression of his name would be just as natural as a consequence of the delicacy due to his person if the author, distinct from him, introduced him as a mysterious magnitude, as it would have been if he himself had written the book.

The external evidences for the Fourth Gospel constitute that portion of the field in which conservative theology has hitherto believed itself to have gained its securest successes. It has deemed it practicable to preclude all discussion of internal reasons against the genuineness merely by showing how early an attestation the gospel received. Careful examination shows how mistaken this belief is. As, however, a full discussion of the leading passages would carry us too far into detail, we must content ourselves here with merely giving results, on all points upon which some measure of agreement has been attained.

We must make a strict distinction between testimonies expressly favourable to the apostolic authorship and those which only vouch for the existence of the Fourth Gospel without conveying any judgment as to its authorship. The only authors belonging to the first category (apostolic authorship) down to the end of the second century (in the third century this view becomes a matter of course) are Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria (who, moreover, appeals to ὁ ἀνεκάλειν πρεσβύτεροι), Tertullian, Theophilus ad Autolyceum, and the Muratorian fragment (which still, however, deems it necessary to give a circumstantial justification for its recognition of the gospel; see § 40). Earlier than any of these church fathers, namely about 170 A.D., we must place the expression of Claudius Apollinaris in the Chronicon Paschale, στανάζειν δοκεῖ τὰ εὐαγγέλια ('the gospels seem to contradict one another'; the reference is to the date of the crucifixion; see § 54 δ). Here, although the name of John is not mentioned, we may presume that there is implied a recognition of the Fourth Gospel as being on a level with the synoptics with which it is not in agreement about the date in question, and thus as being genuine.

Coming now to testimonies to recognition of the gospel, though the author is not named, we find the Fourth Gospel taken into account in Tatian's Diatessaron (roughly, between 160 and 180 A.D.) as on a level with the synoptists. Yet this very attempt to bring together all the four gospels into a single whole even of itself shows to how small an extent each individual gospel was regarded by this author as authoritative. So also when gnostics make use of the Fourth Gospel. Moreover, it cannot be asserted of Valentinus himself (who flourished from 135 to 160) that he does so, but only of his school (so Irenæus, iii. 1110[7]). In the Philosophoumena the citation-formula is often '[he] says' (φασί); so, e.g., 634 f. 725 f. alongside 516 629 89); but it has been shown that this expression has the collective meaning and has no different force from '[they] say' (φασί).¹ Athenagoras, the epistle to the church of Lugdunum (ap. Eus. HE v. 15) (both about 178), the epistle to Diognetus (later), go, in like manner, no further. In 2 Pet. 1.14 Jn. 21 is already presupposed; but 2 Pet. cannot be dated earlier than the close of the second century, since it already reckons the Pauline Epistles as part of holy scripture (315 f.), and has no testimony to its own existence earlier than in the third century.

As for evidence to the existence of Jn., without any further judgment being pronounced, mere quotations from the Fourth Gospel are enough, if the passages are such as cannot possibly have been derived from some other source. But the two cases, in which the book is cited as an authoritative writing, as in § 43, and in which it is not cited as such, are very different. In the latter case, it is not only possible but probable that the author making the quotation did not regard the book as authoritative. The ecclesiastical writers incorporate in their writings passages from a multitude of works which never gained ecclesiastical recognition. Thus, even those works which ultimately did gain this recognition need not necessarily have already been in enjoyment of it at the time at which they were used by the writers in question.

This remark applies, according to a now fairly general consensus of opinion, to the case of Justin (circa 152). Alongside of more than one hundred quotations from the synoptists, he has only three which offer points of contact with the Fourth Gospel (for the actual words, see GOSPELS, §§ 101-104). But in no case is the verbal coincidence with it so exact as to exclude the possibility of their having emanated from another source, which, if we choose, we may suppose to have been accessible to the evangelist also. Yet, even apart from this, we cannot fail to recognise that the Fourth Gospel was by no means on the same plane with the synoptics in Justin's eyes, and that his employment of it is not only more sparing but also more circumspect. This is all the more remarkable since Justin certainly champions one of its leading conceptions (the Logos-idea), lays great weight upon the 'Memorabilia of the Apostles', and expressly designates the Apocalypse as a work of the apostle (Dial. 81, Apol. 166 f. etc.). So also with the Acta Johannis referable to Leucius (§ 8 f.), Corssen¹ sought to show that the Acta did not make use of the Fourth Gospel, but that, on the contrary, the gospel made use of the Acta or at least was acquainted with the traditions contained in it; and Hilgenfeld² inclines substantially to the same view even after James³ had published new fragments and sought to prove from these the acquaintance of the author of the Acta with the Fourth Gospel. Even if we grant this, Corssen still will be right in his assertion that the Acta diverge from the Fourth Gospel in the freest and most far-reaching manner, and thus by no means give it a position of authority.

Here also belong the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies (end of 2nd cent.) and Celsus (circa 178).

Most of the early Christian writings which were held to bear testimony to the Fourth Gospel—and of these precisely the oldest and therefore most important—in reality do not justify the claim based upon them.

(a) They show manifold agreements with Jn.; but these consist only of single, more or less characteristic words or formulas, or other coincidences which might equally well have passed into currency by the channel of oral tradition. The great number of such agreements does in very deed prove that the Johannine formulas and catch-words were very widely diffused, and that the Johannine ideas had been, so to speak, for decennia in the air. We run great danger of allowing ourselves to be misled if, however, merely because it so happens that such phrases and turns of expression first became known and familiar to ourselves through the Fourth Gospel, we were at once to conclude that the writers in question can have taken them from that source alone. The true state of the case may very easily be quite the opposite; the words and phrases circulated orally; as they circulated they received an ever more pregnant, pointed, memorable form, and the writer of the Fourth Gospel, not as the first but as the last in the series of transmitters, set them down in a form and in a connection which excelled that of the others, and thus his work came to appear as if it were the source of the others.

(b) To the class of early Christian writings here referred to belong the two epistles of Clement of Rome (the first probably 93-97 A.D., perhaps not till 112-117, at the latest 120-125; the second, roughly, 160-180), the Epistle of Barnabas (130 or 131; see ACTS, § 16), the Shepherd of Hermas (about 140), the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (between 130 and 160), the Apology of Aristides (probably under Antoninus Pius, 138-161 A.D.), as also the so-called Oxyrhynchus Logia, the Coptic Gospel-fragment discussed by Jacobi (GOSPELS, § 156, a and b), and the Gospel of Peter (see PETER).

(c) Also the seven epistles of Ignatius. The question as to the genuineness of these need not be gone into here since even Harnack (op. cit., p. 396, n. 3) does not regard it as probable that Ignatius had read the Johannine writings even though, in itself considered, the thing seems to him very easily possible.

(d) A single word of comment is required only in connection with the saying of the elders cited in Iren. v. 36: 'it was on this account that the Lord declared, "In my Father's (domains) are many places of abode"' (διὰ τοῦτο εἰρηκέναι τὸν κύριον, ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου μοναῖς εἶναι πολλὰς). Even if we abstain from remarking that here the saying is quoted in proof of the doctrine that in the state of blessedness there will be various degrees, it has at any rate to be observed that it by no means coincides verbally so closely with Jn. 14₂ as necessarily to be a quotation. But what is chiefly to be noted is that in its substance it is so well adapted as a 'winged word' to pass from mouth to mouth that we cannot refrain from thinking Harnack far too precipitate in basing upon this word alone (no other can be pointed to) the proof, regarded by him as secure, that these elders were acquainted with the Fourth Gospel (see § 48 [7]). As to who these elders were, see ibidem.

How doubtful was the recognition of the Fourth Gospel is shown with most clearness by the fact that within the church an entire school could regard it as not genuine and even attribute it to Cerinthus. Two theologians in so many other respects so divergent in their views as Zahn and Harnack are agreed that the 'Alogi,' who assigned the work to Cerinthus from 160 or 170 onwards are identical with the unnamed gainsayers of the genuineness who are mentioned in Iren. iii. 11 12 [9], and that in other respects their standpoint was a correct churchly and catholic one. On the similar attitude of Gaius of Rome as late as the beginning of the third century see GOSPELS, § 82, last footnote.

46. Denials of genuineness.

For those who hold 1 Jn. to be later than Jn. an evidence of the existence of the gospel is found where-ever the existence of the epistle can be shown. This appears to be the case in the Epistle of Polycarp (71): 'For every one who does not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is an antichrist' (πᾶς γὰρ, ὃς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι, ἀντίχριστός ἐστιν). This has points of contact with 1 Jn. 4₂ f., as also with 2 Jn. 7; in neither case, however, is the verbal coincidence so close that the passage can be regarded as an actual quotation. Immediately after the words quoted Polycarp adds two parallel sentences of his own. Here again, moreover, the expression partakes so largely of the nature of a 'winged word' that there is no necessity for regarding it as having been taken from a written source at all, not to speak of the Johannine epistles. It is certainly very significant that Eusebius notes indeed of the Epistle of Polycarp that it contains quotations from the First Epistle of Peter, but makes no similar statement regarding the Johannine epistles. This makes it all the more strange that Harnack (op. cit. 658), relying upon the fact we have mentioned, makes the claim that thereby the existence of the epistle can be securely established.

47. Polycarp as indirect witness.

He even goes so far as to say 'securely even for the close of the reign of Trajan.' In fact he assigns the epistle of Polycarp approximately to the year 115 A.D. Even should the seven Ignatian Epistles be genuine and of this date, it would by no means be thereby proved that the Epistle of Polycarp must have been written so early. According to a very probable reckoning Polycarp died on 23rd Feb. 155. Moreover the meagre, mainly ethical, character of the contents of the Epistle of Polycarp is so little in harmony with the central thought of the Ignatian Epistles—directed as these are to the glorification of martyrdom and of the episcopate, as also to the elaboration of christological ideas—that the separation of those parts of the Epistle of Polycarp in which the Ignatian epistles are recommended (chaps. 9-13 along with a few other sentences)—a separation which has been proposed from the most various quarters—seems to be in the highest degree plausible.

Here also Papias stands on the same level with Polycarp. (a) According to Eusebius (HE iii. 39 17)

48. Papias as witness.

Papias' First Epistle of John, and likewise from that of Peter' (κέχηρηται δ' αὐτὸς μαρτυρίας ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωάννου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς Πέτρου ὁμολίας). We know what 'made use of testimonies' (κέχηρηται μαρτυρίας) in Eusebius means. He uses the same expression in iv. 14₉ with reference to Polycarp's quotations from 1 Pet. In the Epistle of Polycarp we can control the statement by observing that the name of Peter is not mentioned there. We have therefore no ground for supposing that Papias used the name of John either. Moreover, we can hardly set aside the doubt whether in Papias we have to do with real quotations at all and not rather again with 'winged words,' such as have been spoken of in §§ 45_d 46, which prove nothing so far as the present question is concerned. Cp GOSPELS, § 72, n. 2.

Even assuming, however, that they prove Papias' acquaintance with 1 Jn., we must all the more on that account take exception to the proposition of Harnack (op. cit. 658), that 'Papias' acquaintance with the Fourth Gospel must be clear to every one who looks upon 1 Jn. and the gospel as a unity.' Such a statement would be justified only if the two writings in question had constituted a single book. The theory, however, that the epistle was written at the same time as the gospel and was incorporated with it as an appendix, has long since been abandoned. If the two existed only in a separate state, acquaintance with the one is no proof at all of acquaintance with the other.

(b) We have, moreover, the strongest evidence to show that Papias never wrote in his work anything with reference to the Fourth Gospel.

Eusebius (HE iii. 33) pledges himself in his history to mention without fail which of the disputed biblical writings the ecclesiastical authors of each period had made use of and what they said about the acknowledged writings and all that they said about those which were not such (for the original text, see GOSPELS, § 66). As regards the acknowledged writings—among which he reckoned the Fourth Gospel—he dispenses himself accordingly merely from the duty of collecting the quotations from them, not from that of collecting the sayings of the church fathers concerning them. This programme he has carried out with great care. In Papias, whom he read with special attention, he did not find any saying of the kind indicated either regarding Lk. or regarding Jn. But as Papias did make such a statement regarding Mt. and Mk., and as he made use of the gospels as well as of oral communications for the preparation of his work, it would be exceedingly remarkable if he had made use of Lk. and Jn. and yet nowhere expressed himself regarding their character (cp GOSPELS, §§ 67, 74, 82 [1]).

(c) The case would be different, it is true, if a Latin prologue in Wordsworth, NT Latine, 1491, were correct:

Evangelium Johannis manifestatum et datum est ecclesiis ab Johanne adhuc in corpore constituto; sicut Papias nomine, Hierapolitanus, discipulus Johannis carus, in exotericis, id est in extremis quinque libris retulit.

We may rest assured, however, that this mention of Papias proceeds upon an error; for otherwise Eusebius would certainly have told us of it.

Moreover there would still remain the question whether by the John whom he would thus have designated as the writer of the gospel we should understand John the apostle, which for the writer of the prologue was a matter of course, or the John of Asia Minor—in that case certainly John the Elder.

(d) A similar question must be raised in connection with the statements of Armenian writers to the effect that Papias was acquainted with the Fourth Gospel.

In what Conybeare cites in The Guardian of 18th July 1894 (p. 1123), Papias is expressing himself regarding the nature of the aloe; but that he is here dealing with the aloe met with in Jn. 19.39 does not appear from the words of the Armenian writer.

(e) Even if all that has been alleged as to Papias's acquaintance with the Fourth Gospel were indisputable, his testimony would not carry us beyond what has already been long known and recognised from other sources. According to a fragment published by De Boor (§ 4 h), the work of Papias contained the statement that the individuals who had been raised from the dead by Christ survived till the reign of Hadrian (ἕως Ἀδριανού ἔξω, l.c. 170). As there is no reason why the attribution of this statement to Papias should be disputed, Papias must have written it not earlier than between 140-160 (Harnack, op. cit. 357). At that date, however, the Fourth Gospel was known to other writers also, and Papias's acquaintance with it would add nothing to what we previously knew.

(f) The case would be otherwise only if Harnack were right in what he says about the 'elders' of Irenæus (op. cit. 333-340).

Harnack (1) asserts that Irenæus had not personally heard the elders whose sayings he quotes, and (2) conjectures that Irenæus had taken all of these sayings from the writing of Papias. The first assertion has a certain probability by reason of the vagueness with which Irenæus speaks of these 'elders'; the conjecture, on the other hand, is mere hypothesis. The sole passage which we can control even speaks to the contrary effect. In v. 33 3 f. Irenæus first introduces the saying about the great grape-cluster of the blessed days to come in the following terms: 'quemadmodum presbyteri meminerunt qui Joannem discipulum Domini viderunt, audisse se ab eo, quemadmodum de temporibus illis docebat dominus et dicebat.' After telling what they had said, he proceeds, 'these things, moreover, Papias also, who was a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp, a man of the older time, testifies in writing in the fourth of his books' (ταῦτα δὲ καὶ Πάπιας ὁ Ἰωάννου μὲν ἀκουστής, Πολυκάρπου δὲ ἑταίρος γεγονώς, ἀρχαῖος ἀνὴρ, ἐγγράφως ἐπιμαρτυρεῖ ἐν τῇ τετάρτῃ τῶν αὐτοῦ βιβλίων). Harnack is of opinion that the καὶ here and the ἐπι- in ἐπιμαρτυρεῖ 'certainly ought not to be pressed'; but it is not permissible, in favour of an hypothesis, to ignore the force of these words which plainly distinguish the written communication of Papias from an oral communication that had reached Irenæus. Harnack, however, pursues this forbidden path still further, and asserts that Irenæus had taken the formulæ which he uses in citing the elders verbatim from the work of Papias. By this means Harnack arrives at the result that these elders had already presented themselves to the mind of Papias as invested with those dignified attitudes of venerable antiquity which they undoubtedly had to judge by his language, for Irenæus. According to this, we should have to carry their date as far back before 140-160, the time at which Papias lived, as we should have to carry them back, according to the text of Irenæus, before 185, the approximate date of Irenæus's work.

This supposition, however, of a borrowing by Irenæus from Papias verbatim is a mere hypothesis: and yet this supposition, and its application to the presumed quotation from Jn. 14.2 (§ 45 d), is, along with what has been adduced (§ 47) from Polycarp, the sole basis on which Harnack rests his proposition (op. cit. 680) 'that the gospel was not written later than circa 110, is an assured historical truth.'

(a) If we were dealing with a book attributed to an undistinguished man, such as, for example, the epistle of Jude, it could not be held to be very surprising that proofs of acquaintance with it do not emerge until some considerable time after its production.

49. Estimate of external evidence.

The case is very different, however, with a gospel written by an eye-witness. Papias noticed defects in the gospel of Mk.; the third evangelist noticed them in the writings of all his predecessors (cp GOSPELS, §§ 65, 153). The writing of an eye-witness would immediately on its publication have been received with the keenest interest, however violently it may have conflicted with the gospels hitherto known. It would at least by these contradictions have attracted attention and necessarily have given occasion to such remarks as that 'the gospels seem to contradict one another of Claudius Apollinaris (στασιάζειν δοκεῖ τὰ εὐαγγέλια) (§ 42 and 54 b). No mention of the Fourth Gospel which we can recognise as such carries us back further than to 140 A.D. As late as 152 (Acad. 1st Feb. 1896, p. 98), Justin, who nevertheless lays so great value upon the 'Memorabilia of the Apostles,' regards Jn.—if indeed he knows it at all—with distrust and appropriates from it but a very few sayings. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that conservative theology still cherishes the belief that the external evidence supplies the best possible guarantee for the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel, we find ourselves compelled not only to recognise the justice of the remark of Reuss that 'the incredible trouble which has been taken to collect external evidences only serves to show that there are really none of the sort which were really wanted,' but also to set it up even as a fundamental principle of criticism that the production of the Fourth Gospel must be assigned to the shortest possible date before the time at which traces of acquaintance with it begin to appear. Distinct declarations as to its genuineness begin certainly not earlier than about 170 A.D. (§ 42).

(b) Furthermore, it is not usually remembered how small is the value which all such testimonies possess.

According to Irenæus (ii. 33 [225]) 'the gospel and all the elders personally acquainted with John in Asia' bore witness that Jesus, at the time of his teaching, was more than forty years old—and this as a tradition from John, some of them also giving it as a tradition from other apostles. This can rest only on Jn. 8.57. It is irreconcilable with Lk. 8.23. In iii. 3.2 [3], Irenæus asserts that Clement of Rome had enjoyed personal intercourse with the apostles, although he might have learned from Clement's own (first) epistle (44.2 f.) that the opposite was the case. In iii. 11.11 [8] Irenæus, too, finds the rationale for the 'four' gospels in the fact that there are four quarters of the globe and four winds (πνεύματα); since, further, the church extends over all the world, while its 'pillars and grounds' and spirit of life (πνεῦμα ζωῆς) are the gospel, it is fitting that she should have four pillars, breathing out (πνεύοντες) immortality on every side, and vivifying men afresh. Such is the sort of verbal trifling with which he favours his readers in place of history. The Muratorian fragment calls the book of Acts 'Acta omnium apostolorum,' and John, in respect of his seven epistles (Rev. 2 f.), the 'predecessor Paul' (ll. 34, 48). Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5.43, p. 161 f.) quotes the apostle Paul as saying: 'Take also the Greek books, read the Sibyl as she reveals one God and the future; and, taking Hystaspes, read and ye will find the son of God much more clearly described.' In Strom. v. 14.104, p. 711, Clement cites with entire belief the book of Zoroaster, in which, after his resurrection from the dead, he reports what he had learned in the underworld from the gods. Justin (Apol. i. 35.48) is able to tell his readers that the Acta Pilati contained the partition of the garment of Jesus, his healings, and his raisings of the dead. Tertullian (Apol. 21) adds to these the eclipse of the sun, the watch at the grave, the resurrection, the forty days in Galilee, and the ascension, and closes with these words: 'ea omnia super Christo Pilatus, et ipse jam pro sua conscientia Christianus, Cæsari tum Tiberio nuntiavit.' Compare § 6.

It is surely unnecessary to multiply examples. When the church fathers bring before us such statements as these, no one believes them; but when they 'attest' the genuineness of a book of the Bible, then the conservative theologians regard the fact as enough to silence all criticism. This cannot go on for ever. Instead of the constantly repeated formula that an ancient writing is 'attested' as early as by (let us say) Irenæus, Tertullian, or Clement of Alexandria, there will have to be substituted the much more modest statement that its existence (not genuineness) is attested only as late as by the writers named, and even this only if the quotations are undeniable or the title expressly mentioned.

If no trace of the Fourth Gospel can be found earlier than 140 A.D., there cannot be the slightest difficulty in doing justice to its relations with Gnosticism. According to Hegcippus (ap. Eus. HE iii. 32.7 f.) his found peace reigned in the entire church till the reign of Trajan; but after the sacred choir of the apostles had died out and the race of the immediate hearers of Christ had passed away, the godless corruption began through the deception of false teachers who now with unabashed countenance dared to set up against the preaching of truth the doctrines of gnosis falsely so called. There is no reason for disputing the date here given. A personal disciple of Jesus certainly can hardly have survived to see it. But the gospel shows clearly how profoundly the gnostic ideas had influenced its author. Neither is the position of the case as if he had started from the churchly point of view and then found himself on the road to the gnostic; on the contrary, we find him on the return path from gnosticism to the churchly view. Cp § 29 b. In addition to what is said there, attention may be called to the high value Jn. places on knowledge (173).

50. Gnosticism and the Fourth Gospel.

It might at first appear as if Jn. were not yet in open antagonism against gnosis and thus that gnosticism has not yet attained any great development. If, however, we view the matter so, we shall mistake the task which was set before him. The first epistle gave room for direct polemic against gnosis, and he uses his opportunity in the most distinct manner. But when a gospel had to be written, polemic methods could be employed only under some disguise. Nevertheless they are recognisable enough. Against the gnostic division between pneumatic and psychical persons are levelled such sentences as 816 f.; so also against the dualism between God and the world; against the one-sided emphasis laid by gnosticism on the importance of knowledge is directed the insistence upon faith; and against the doctetic view that Christ was man only in appearance stress is laid (114) on the doctrine that the Logos was made flesh and that his glory could be beheld. Indeed, the great importance given in 1935 to the attestation of the flowing of water and blood from the wounded side appears—although the water and blood have also a symbolical meaning (§ 23 d)—at the same time and indeed primarily to have its reason in the desire to combat the view that Jesus did not suffer really but only seemingly.

All that must be conceded is that no traces can as yet be found in the Fourth Gospel of the great and elaborated systems such as were developed by Valentinus and others after 140 A. D. The ideas of light, and the like, out of which those later gnostics formed their pairs and their ogdoads of æons are still touched upon in the gospel only comparatively lightly. Ch. 844 does not speak of the father of the devil, but only says, by a somewhat lax construction, that the devil is a liar and the father of (the) lie (Winer⁶), § 18, n. 30; 229 d).

With Montanism the case is otherwise. The Fourth Gospel shows an indubitable contact with it in the idea of the Paraclete. Here, however, the priority must be assigned to the gospel, since Montanism, according to one ancient source, first came to manifestation about 156 or 157, according to the other even as late as 172 (cp Harnack, op. cit. 363-379). In actuality the idea of the paraclete is further developed in Montanism than in the Fourth Gospel. In the latter the ruling conception is that Jesus is identical with the Paraclete, that is to say that his second coming consists in nothing other than the coming of the Holy Spirit into the hearts of believers (§ 26 c). In Montanism, on the other hand, a sharp distinction is drawn between the age of Christ and the age of the Holy Spirit, and a much higher value is given to the latter.

If on independent grounds some period shortly before 140 A. D. can be set down as the approximate date of the production of the gospel, then new importance attaches to one particular passage upon which, apart from this, we could not venture to base any hypothesis as to date. In 543 Jesus says: 'I am come in the name of my father and ye receive me not; if another will come in his own name, him ye will receive.' This prophecy of another Messiah was fulfilled when in 132 A. D. Barchochba arose and incited the Jews to the great revolt which in 135 ended in the complete extinction of the Jewish state. It is very tempting to think that 543 contains an allusion to this. At all events, as compared with this supposition the hypothesis of Bousset (Antichr., 1895, 108) has no superior claims—that by the pseudo-Messiah here predicted the Antichrist is meant, and this because 'thus almost all the church fathers interpret, and in this region these are the authorities from whom we have to learn.' Bousset, in conformity with this interpretation, supposes that such apocalyptic ideas had great importance for the evangelist, notwithstanding the fact that his entire book shows no trace of this, but rather the opposite (§ 28). Compare further, § 65, end.

Asia Minor is almost universally regarded as the Fourth Gospel's place of origin. It is on this assumption that we can most easily explain how the Gospel could be ascribed to the John living there, to whom the Apocalypse, or at least the seven epistles therein contained, are assigned with still greater probability. Alexandrian as well as gnostic ideas can without difficulty be traced in those regions. It has even been attempted to account for the mistake by which Caiaphas is called 'high priest for that year' (§ 38) by the fact that in Asia there was a high priest (ἀρχιερεύς) for the whole province who changed from year to year (Mommson, Röm. Gesch. 5318; ET Provinces, 1345). It must, however, be affirmed once for all that these proofs have no decisive value; but neither does the question as to place of origin possess any fundamental importance.

Very important inferences, however, can be drawn from the paschal controversies of the second century.¹

54. The Paschal Controversy. (a) In Asia Minor the celebration was always held on the 14th of Nisan by those who afterwards were called Quartodecimans; elsewhere it was celebrated on the first Sunday after the Spring equinox. The difference of usage first came to light on the occasion of a visit of Polycarp of Smyrna to Rome during the bishopric of Anicetus (therefore in 154 A. D.). On that occasion Polycarp, according to the report of Irenæus (fragm. 3, cp Eus. HE v. 2416), appealed on behalf of the Asiatic celebration to the authority of John the disciple of the Lord, and of the other apostles. Similarly, in the third stage of the controversy, Polycrates of Ephesus in his letter to the Roman bishop Victor about 196 A. D. (ibid. v. 242-8) made a like appeal to the authority of Philip, John, Polycarp, Melito, and a large number of famous names. Of the reasons for this usage we become apprised in the second stage of the controversy, about 170 A. D., in which its supporters came into conflict not with Rome but with men in Asia Minor itself.

(b) In order to escape the conclusion that the John appealed to by the Quartodecimans could not have been the writer of the Gospel, some theologians assert that the men of Asia Minor, and John among them, had observed the 14th of Nisan in commemoration of the death of Jesus. This would fit in with the Fourth Gospel admirably, only it is opposed to the express statements of Hippolytus and Apollinaris (Chron. Pasch., ed. Paris, p. 6 abd; ed. Dindorf, pp. 12 f. and 14), according to whom the commemoration intended was that of the institution of the Lord's Supper by Jesus. That this was only the opinion of a minority cannot be maintained.

(c) Others sought to attain the same result by supposing that the Quartodecimans without any reference at all to events in the life of Jesus had simply, in accordance with the Jewish calendar, observed the day upon which the Jewish passover fell. Such a mechanical conformity with the Jewish law, and such a degree of indifference towards reminiscences of occurrences in the life of Jesus, would be very remarkable if observable in any Christians, and most of all if observable in one who had actually been an eye-witness of the last days of Jesus. It is, however, expressly set aside by the statement of Apollinaris (l.c.) that the Quartodecimans claimed Mt. as on their side,—on the point, namely, that Jesus had eaten the paschal lamb with his disciples on 14th Nisan and had suffered on the 15th. Apollinaris infers from this that in their view the gospels seem to be at variance as to this (§ 42). He himself is on the side of the Fourth Gospel, and thus, as he himself admits no variance, interprets the First Gospel wrongly in the actual sense of the Fourth; the Quartodecimans, however, appealed not simply to the Jewish calendar but also to Mt., and that too to Mt. properly understood.

JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE

(d) A last resort remains,—that of Schürer, who thinks they did this only in a late stage of the controversy. This also, however, is very improbable. We shall do well to attribute to them at least enough continuity of view for them to be always aware what it was that they were maintaining.

(e) In this failure, then, of all the suggested views we have no alternative left but to acknowledge that the John to whose authority the Quartodecimans appeal cannot have been the author of the gospel. If then this John of Asia Minor was the Elder, the apostle's authorship of the gospel remains, so far as the paschal controversy is concerned, a possibility. The assumption, then, must be that the gospel was written by the apostle, though at the same time he was not head of the church at Ephesus. This assumption, however, is one that has been resorted to by but few, for the tradition says only of the Ephesian John that he wrote the gospel.

After what has been said, only a very brief recapitulation as regards the 'genuineness' will be required.

55. Conclusion as to author. (a) Even when the Apocalypse has been assigned to another writer, the apostolic authorship of the gospel remains impossible, and that not merely from the consideration that it cannot be the son of Zebedee who has introduced himself as writer in so remarkable a fashion (§ 41), but also from the consideration that it cannot be an eye-witness of the facts of the life of Jesus who has presented, as against the synoptists, an account so much less credible, nor an original apostle who has shown himself so easily accessible to Alexandrian and Gnostic ideas, nor a contemporary of Jesus who survived so late into the second century and yet was capable of composing so profound a work. On this ground are excluded not only the son of Zebedee but also every non-apostolic eye-witness, including even John the Elder, although the last-named seems to be recommended by the Asian tradition so far as this does not make for the apostle.

(b) Harnack, who holds the Elder to be the author—with incorporation also of reminiscences of the son of Zebedee in his work, so that the gospel might appropriately enough be called 'Gospel of John the Elder according to John the son of Zebedee' (εὐαγγέλιον Ἰωάννου τοῦ πρεσβυτέρου κατὰ Ἰωάννην τὸν Ζεβεδαιοῦ)—is compelled not only to place the date at a much earlier period than is justified by the evidence (§ 48 f.), but also, notwithstanding this, to understand by a 'disciple of the Lord' (which the Elder was) one who perhaps had seen Jesus only once in earliest childhood without really entering into personal relations with him; and all this over and above the further necessity for imputing so many incredibilities to the author, if the credibility of the synoptists is not to be reduced to zero. Further, Harnack's hypothesis must be characterised as incapable of being discussed so long as the continuation of his work gives him no occasion to state quite frankly whether he regards as historical such statements for example as those regarding the foot-washing, the spear-thrust, the falling to the ground of the Roman cohort in Gethsemane, and the 100 pounds of ointment at the embalming of Jesus.¹

(c) The same remark holds good as regards Bousset who (Apokalypse in Meyer's Kommentar, 5th ed. 1896, p. 33-51) maintains that the Ephesian John, that is to say, the Elder, in his youth belonged to the train of Jesus at such times as Jesus was in Jerusalem, and that from his mouth one of his scholars has given us, so far as the activity of Jesus in Jerusalem is concerned, 'an account that, as compared with the synoptists, is independent and in many points to be preferred.'

(d) To what degree the thesis of the authorship of the gospel by a son of Zebedee (or indeed any eye-witness) can be maintained only at the cost of the very credibility which yet it is proposed to support by this assumption, is well seen in what B. Weiss has to say regarding the discourses of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel.¹ He grants that the misunderstandings of these discourses by the hearers are 'often in reality merely attempts on the part of the evangelist to account for the continuance of the discussion,' that the evangelist 'is well aware that he is not giving his readers the discourses and conversations with literal accuracy,' that 'not only the original words, but also the concrete historical context of the words of Jesus are often obliterated, the evangelist concerning himself only for the enduring significance of these and their value for edification in the sense of his own conception of the person of Christ,' that even in the narrative parts 'the connections in detail have often disappeared, the historical colouring has been lost and the representation of occurrences has been manipulated in accordance with the meaning which they had acquired to the mind of this narrator.' No 'critic,' however severe, could express himself much more unfavourably with regard to the Fourth Gospel than this defender of its genuineness has done.

(e) As compared with such a line of defence, there is a positive relief from an intolerable burden as soon as the student has made up his mind to give up any such theory as that of the 'genuineness' of the gospel, as also of its authenticity in the sense of its being the work of an eye-witness who meant to record actual history. Whoever shrinks from the surrender can, in spite of all the veneration for the book which constrains him to take this course, have little joy in his choice. Instead of being able to profit by the elucidations regarding the nature and the history of Jesus promised him by the 'genuineness' theory, he finds himself at every turn laid under the necessity of meeting objections on the score of historicity, and if he has laboriously succeeded (he thinks) in silencing these, others and yet others arise tenfold increased, and in his refutation of these, even when he carries it through—and that too even, it may be, with a tone of great assurance—he yet cannot in conscientious self-examination feel any true confidence in his work.

(f) With the other view the case is quite different. We have to deal with a writer from whom we neither can demand strict historical accuracy, nor have any occasion to do so. Just in proportion as this is frankly recognised, however, we find in him a great and eminent soul, a man in whom all the ruling tendencies of his time meet and are brought together to a common focus. A philosophical book, indeed, would not have been difficult for him to write, yet would have received but little attention; for all that at that time was recognised as divine was held to be seen in the person of Jesus. Thus the task this man deemed to be laid upon him by the nature of the circumstances was that of giving expression to his deep ideas in the form of a life of Jesus. We become aware that this implied many restrictions upon his freedom, and one is astonished all the more at the ease of movement with which he has carried out his work. In short, one discerns in the gospel the ripest fruit of primitive Christianity—the ripest, if also at the same time the furthest removed from the original form. We shall return to a consideration of this subject with somewhat greater detail (§ 62) after we have glanced at the First Epistle which in this respect is closely related to the gospel.

Before proceeding to this, however, a word must be given to the 'partition'-hypotheses. (a) We have postponed notice of them until now because to have brought them up at an earlier point would have tended only to obscure the issues. A whole series of earlier 'partition'-hypotheses have shared the common fate of being withdrawn by their own promulgators. Least hopeful of all is a hypothesis of interpolations. Not that the existence of interpolations in Jn. is impossible; on the contrary, it is affirmed even by the most outspoken critical theologians (§ 28 b). But if it is proposed to eliminate every difficult passage as having been interpolated, very little indeed of the gospel will be left at the end of the process. Theoretically, the case is somewhat better with a 'sources'-hypothesis, which should maintain that the last author did not introduce mere interpolations into the exemplar before him without touching the text itself, that he dealt with it very much as the synoptists dealt with their sources. Even so, however, no great advantage is gained.

(b) To mention only the latest advocate of a hypothesis of this sort, Wendt¹ holds most of the miracle narratives, and some of the elaborations of the discourses as well as of the occasions assigned to them, to be additions of the last author. The main point, however, is that his fundamental principle—in itself worthy of all acceptance—is that passages are to be held to be later insertions, not on account of their contents, but only when they break the connection. There is much reason to fear, however, that distrust of the authenticity of the substance often causes an interruption of the connection to be imagined where in reality there is none. Many passages of the same sort as others which give Wendt occasion for the separating process, are left by him untouched, when the result would not be removal of some piece held to be open to exception in respect of its contents; the ground for exception which he actually takes, on the other hand, is often altogether non-existent.

Thus, for example, it ought not by any means to be regarded as betokening a broken connection when (11 16), at the words of Jesus, 'Let us go unto him [Lazarus],' Thomas says to his fellow-disciples: 'Let us also go that we may die with him.' That the sequence of these sentences does not demand the interpretation that Thomas wishes to die with Lazarus is self-evident, for Thomas is speaking to his fellow-disciples about a word of Jesus in which he had implicitly said that he was going to his death. It is therefore not permissible to conclude that, in the source, v. 16 followed immediately upon v. 10, and that accordingly the announcement of the raising of Lazarus contained in vv. 11-15 is an addition by the evangelist. Moreover, v. 16 in strictness fits on to v. 10 no better than it does to v. 15. In v. 40 where Jesus says to Martha, 'Said I not unto thee that if thou wouldst believe thou shouldst see the glory of God?' Wendt with justice finds a reference back to vv. 23 25 f., but considers that they rest upon a misinterpretation of these verses which speak, not of a bodily resurrection, but of the imparting by Jesus of an inward eternal life even here in this temporal sphere. This is essentially correct; but it presents only one side of the matter. The word is purposely ambiguous (§ 25 c), and in its literal sense is fulfilled by the raising of Lazarus, which nevertheless is itself only a figure for the impartation of that inward eternal life. Wendt proceeds therefore upon a misapprehension of the distinctive character of the Fourth Gospel when he comes to the conclusion that in the source all that was related was this:—'Jesus heard of the sickness of Lazarus, but, although no delay in his journey occurred, did not arrive until after his death; on his arrival he comforted Martha by pointing to that inward eternal life which can be lived in the temporal, went with her to the grave, and wept there. What availed Martha this pointing to the inward eternal life when her brother had just quitted this temporal, and what point has it in presence of the assurance of Jesus (v. 23), 'thy brother shall rise again'?' It cannot be a continuation of this assurance,—neither if with Martha we understand v. 23 to refer to the last day, nor if we interpret it in a spiritual sense; for resurrection and continuance in life are different things. That it was, on the other hand, anything higher than what is said in v. 23 is excluded by the simple fact that after the apparent death of Lazarus it was not practicable.

(c) Wendt attributes his assumed source to the apostle John. The eye-witness Peter, on whose communications in Wendt's view the gospel of Mk. rests, knows that on his last evening Jesus held the sacrament of the Supper with his disciples; John the eye-witness that he washed his disciples' feet. Peter the eye-witness knows concerning Jesus that he expected the Final Judgment on a definite day at the end of the present world, John the eye-witness knows that he spoke the words contained in 11 25 f. and 5 24, and proves by this that the representations which agree with the report of Peter (e.g., 5 28 f. and the closing words of 6 39 40 44 54 12 48) were added by the evangelist in contradiction of the source written by the eye-witness John. The eye-witness Peter transmits an account according to which Jesus had not any consciousness of his pre-existence, the eye-witness John knows that he spoke the words, 'Before Abraham came into being, I am,' 'I glorify me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was' (8 58 17 5), and he wrote the prologue with exception of the verses (6-8 15) about the Baptist.

(d) As for the miracle-narratives, according to Wendt Jesus, e.g., did not heal the man born blind but only beheld him and took him as text of his discourse on the healing of the spiritual blindness of the world; in the case of the sick man at Bethesda Jesus in healing him laid his hand upon him somewhat in the manner indicated in Mk. 7 33 § 23-25, so that the action could be regarded by the Jews as a violation of the Sabbath-law.

(e) What has been said may perhaps suffice to show how little fitted is this latest attempt at separation of sources—however superior to kindred efforts of the same sort—to supply 'a really satisfactory solution of the Johannine problem.' Its indications of difficulties in the connection are valuable; but these will have to be explained by the writer's carelessness about the matter (as has been done in § 3 4 d, c). In the end we shall have to concur in the judgment of Strauss, that the Fourth Gospel is like the seamless coat, not to be divided but to be taken as it is.

D.—FIRST EPISTLE

What distinguishes the First Epistle from the gospel most obviously is its express polemic against false

57. Polemic against false teachers.

teachers. These, to speak generally, are gnostics; this appears (24) in the expression 'he that saith, I know him (ὁ λέγων ὅτι ἔγνωκα αὐτόν)' as also in that terminus technicus of gnosticism 'seed' (σπέρμα: 39), which signifies the individual seed-grains of divine origin scattered throughout the world of matter, to wit the souls of gnostic persons, and in the declaration of these persons that they have no sin (18 10). More precisely, the false teachers disclose themselves to be docetics. Their assertion (222) that Jesus is not the Messiah finds its explanation in 4 2 f. (cp 2 Jn. 7), according to which they deny that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, and in 5 6 ('this is he that came by water and blood'). While holding this teaching they give themselves over to libertinism, according to 2 4 15 f. 3 4 10 5 17, which passages must certainly be taken as referring to them. The case is not met by supposing the reference to be to Cerinthus, the oldest of the gnostics, who with all his gnosticism was still a Jewish Christian; later forms must be intended even although we are not in a position to state more precisely what they were. The purpose of the epistle, then, is to combat this tendency with as much directness (2 26 3 7) as it is combated indirectly in the gospel (§ 50). The writing can be called a letter only in a remote sense (cp EPISTOLARY LITERATURE, § 9). The writer addresses his readers as little children, or beloved, or brethren; but in these expressions he is addressing all Christendom.

In all his controversy with gnosis the author is at the same time strongly influenced by its ideas. Like that and the world (2 16 4 5 f.), or God and the devil (3 8 10 4 4), or truth and falsehood (2 21 4 6); in analogy with Jn. 3 6 8 43, etc., in 1 Jn. 5 19 also we find the mutually exclusive alternatives that one must either be of God or of the world which 'lieth in the wicked [one]' (ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ κέεται). The claim to know, or to have known, all things is made by the writer for himself and for his readers (2 13 f. 20 f. 27 4 7) as positively as any gnostic could make it; the expression 'seed' (σπέρμα) he applies in similar manner to himself and to them, and asserts sinlessness for both (3 9 6 5 18).

58. Contact of the gospel, his thought is dominated by the great antithesis between God and the world.

In the ideas just indicated, as well as in respect of language, the agreement with the gospel seems so strong that the identity of authorship of both writings is often regarded as self-evident. Holtzmann, however (Einkl. in's NT), enumerates fifteen German theologians by whom it is denied, and he himself has elaborated the same view with the utmost care in Jahrbh. f. prot. Theol. 1881, 690-712; 1882, 128-152, 316-342, 460-485.

To begin with the vocabulary: ἀγγελία, ἐπαγγελία, διάνοια, παρουσία, ἐλπίς, ἀνομία, etc., are found only in the epistle, not in the gospel. Moreover, a somewhat different field of thought is disclosed by the use of ἰλασμός (2 2 4 10) and also of χρίσμα (2 20 27) which characterises the epistle. On the whole it is seen that the thoughts of the epistle in many ways follow the ordinary lines, above which the gospel has risen to purely spiritual conceptions. The second coming of Christ is still spoken of in 1 Jn. 2 28 as a visible individual occurrence in time; the resurrection is (3 2) looked for simply after death; the final judgment is relegated to a particular day (4 17). The more spiritual apprehension is not wholly wanting (see 3 14 24 6 11-13); but it is not prominent. In 2 1 Christ appears as the Paraclete, which finds an analogy in the gospel only in the expression 'another Paraclete' (14 10), spoken of the Holy Spirit. Redemption is wrought by Christ by means of his death (1 7 2 2 4 10),—a conception which in the gospel finds its parallel only in 1 29 36 and perhaps 11 50; 52 17 19 whilst everywhere else in the gospel his redeeming activity is for the most part sought in his message (1 9-13 8 12 17 4-8), to which, in the epistle, allusion is made only in 4 9.

Above all, in the epistle Christ is represented much less than he is in the gospel as intervening between God and men. The conception, based on the Logos-idea that it is Christ alone, not God, who can come into direct relation with the world, is absent. In the gospel the relation of God to Christ is like that of Christ to believers (10 14 f. 14 20 15 9 f.); God gives salvation to him, he imparts it to them (17 8 etc.; the only exceptions are 3 16 6 40 14 21-23 16 26 f. 17 6 23). Christ alone is the way to God (14 6 10 7 9 15 5), while in the epistle (3 21) we can have boldness directly toward God; in the gospel it is Christ who is the light (1 4 8 12), in the epistle it is God (1 5); in the one it is Christ who is the law-giver (13 34 15 12), in the other it is God (3 23); in the one it is Christ who is the hearer of prayer (14 13 f., cp 15 16 16 23 f. 26), in the other it is God (3 22 5 14 f.). These divergences are explained much more easily on the assumption that the two writings come from different writers though belonging to one and the same school of thought.

Which of the two writings was the earlier cannot be decided on general grounds. In itself considered, the more ordinary and commonplace way of 60. Priority in time. looking at things may very well be regarded as the earlier, the more spiritualised as the later; indeed on this supposition the growth of one and the same author out of the one into the other would become in some measure intelligible. We could, however, equally well imagine that the gospel had come into existence first, and that later when, from the novelty of its ideas, it met with but little approval and much opposition, another hand belonging to the same circle as the evangelist had made the attempt to give currency to the newer ideas with closer adherence to the current theological conceptions. The undertaking in this case would be analogous to the conjectured attempt mentioned in § 28, by means of later interpolations of passages implying a resurrection at a definite point in time, to avert the objections likely to be raised by the more spiritualised statement of the resurrection-idea. In imputing some such intention to the writer it is by no means necessary to assume that he set about his task merely by way of accommodation, at a sacrifice of his own convictions. It is precisely when we distinguish the author of the epistle from the author of the gospel that it becomes possible for us to suppose that in it he was giving expression solely to his own personal view.

A date later than that of the gospel is very strongly suggested by the only passage which directly indicates any time relation at all, namely 2 12-14. The three things of which the writer here begins by saying, 'I write them unto you,' he repeats with the words, 'I have written unto you.' Here he seems to be referring to the gospel. If in doing so he identifies himself with the author of the gospel, we must not judge of the fact otherwise than we do when we find the evangelist writing in the name of the apostle; fiction of this kind was regarded as perfectly permissible (§ 41 c). As to the bearing of this question of date upon the question of attestation, see § 47. External evidence does not forbid the supposition that the first epistle was written after the gospel (and that in turn after 132), provided that the epistle was written not later than about 140.

What the author seeks to establish against the false teachers is, viewed in one aspect, the creed of the church.

61. Character of polemic of epistle. Everyone who does not hold it passes with him for Antichrist. On this he is decided,—indeed, stern. Only, as a gnostic he is far too much imbued with a feeling of the necessity for working on the convictions of his readers to be able to avoid attempting to make plain from the evidence of the facts themselves the truth of his theses. This, however, he does not by any means attempt in the form of proofs properly so called; rather does he express his conviction in a simple propositional manner, in the confident expectation that it will make an impression by its own inherent force. As compared with the other NT writers who engage in polemic against false teachers, and especially the authors of the Pastoral Epistles, the Epistle of Jude, and the second Epistle of Peter—nor even to the exclusion of Paul—he must be credited with a high degree of moderation in his polemic, and avoidance of personalities in speaking of his opponents. Moreover, alongside of the church creed on which he lays weight, he also elaborates a practical Christianity. But here we reach a point at which the gospel and the epistle can be considered together.

If the worth of the Fourth Gospel does not lie in the accuracy of its separate details regarding the life of Jesus, nor yet in the character of the total picture it presents, it is the more to be found in the ideas by which in common with the epistle it is dominated.

(a) Both writings rendered an extraordinary service to their time by absorbing into Christianity, as they did, every element in the great spiritual tendencies of the age that was capable of being assimilated, and thus disarming their possible antagonism. While the oldest Christianity might seem to be a religion for the uncultured merely, the Johannine theology made it possible for educated persons also to attach themselves to it without renouncing the rest of their spiritual heritage. If the Jesus of literal history might seem to an educated Gentile merely as an individual member of the despised Jewish race, the impression must necessarily have been very different when, as now, he was presented as the Logos of God, as the world-principle which had existed long before Judaism came into being, and even upon earth was far exalted above everything Jewish. If Paul with deliberate intention had proclaimed the Gospel to be to the Gentiles foolishness (1 Cor. 1 23), the Johannine theology took account of the strivings of Gnosticism after knowledge and brought this into its own service. That between God and the world there is fixed a great gulf which strictly speaking cannot be bridged over, it frankly recognised, in order in the next place to provide a bridge in the Logos-idea—itsself borrowed from the Greek philosophy—and, in doing so, at the same time to avoid the separation (so dangerous to the existence of the Christian Church) of mankind into two eternally distinct classes. It also even prepared the way for Montanism, at least in so far as it recognised the coming of the Holy Spirit to mankind as the greatest thing of all.

(b) Of supreme value, not only for that age but for all time, is the full assurance of its faith in the truth of Christianity (4 14 8 31 f. 51 16 33 1 Jn. 5 4). The idea of God is apprehended with a depth that is nowhere approached elsewhere in the NT. A philosopher may dispute the propositions both that God is spirit and that God is love (Jn. 4 21-24 1 Jn. 4 8 16), but he cannot surpass them in simplicity of scientific expression. The first basis of the religious life, the feeling of dependence, cannot be expressed with greater depth than in the gospel (3 27), the essence of sin with greater depth than in 1 Jn. 18 to 29, prayer with greater depth than when it is represented as an asking in the name of Jesus (15 16),—which again in turn cannot be better expounded than it is in 1 Jn. 5 14 as an asking according to God's will. All objections based upon pernicious results which might be supposed to follow from the prominence given to knowledge are disarmed at the outset by the declaration, 1 Jn. 23, that the verification of knowledge lies in the keeping of the commandments of God. Truth is not only seen; it is done (Jn. 3 21 1 Jn. 16); and this doing of the truth is again made equivalent to the doing of righteousness (1 Jn. 2 29). Any one-sidedness of mere intellectualism is guarded against from the outset by the depth of the mysticism which comes to its fairest expression in the Johannine theology (14 23 15 4-7 17 23), without, however, leading to any vague idea that man must be absorbed in the divine essence. If we discern in Christ not only the historical individual but also at the same time that summing-up of all that is divine which the author of the gospel saw in his individuality, in a word, the ideal of a child of God, then, in spite of all that criticism has to say in the exercise of its own proper functions, we can still echo with full conviction the words in which the author has expressed his unique appreciation of Jesus, as in 15 5 14 6 36 or 6 68 f.

(c) The spiritualisation of the concrete conceptions of primitive Christianity has led to ideas such as it would be impossible to express in a more modern way. The person who finds himself no longer able to believe that the redemptive significance of Jesus lies only in the fact of his death finds the opposite view—according to which his work of redemption was achieved by his message and only confirmed by his death—already laid down for him in the prologue to the gospel 19-13 and also in 8 12 17 4-8, etc.

So far as this is concerned, the gospel, in virtue, so to say, of the principle that extremes meet, even comes round again to the original historical point of view such as we find it in the synoptists. Paul had transferred the redeeming significance of Jesus from his life to his death. But at the same time he had also thought of him as pre-existent. When John developed this latter thought into the Logos-idea he was compelled by the nature of it to place the redeeming work wrought by Jesus not any longer in his death, which for the Logos would only mean a return to his previous condition, and thus have value only for himself and not for mankind; he had therefore to seek it in the revealing work of Jesus, and this work Jesus could perform upon earth only by declaration of his peculiar message.

Any one who finds himself unable to accept the dogma of the Trinity here finds that which can justify him in his attitude in the declaration (7 39) that the Holy Spirit had no existence before the exaltation of Christ, being in fact according to 2 Cor. 3 17 identical with the exalted Christ (§ 26 c). Any one who finds himself unable to believe that Jesus needed to legitimise his claims by means of miracle has only to take his stand on 20 29, 'Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed.' Any one who finds himself no longer able to think of the second coming of Christ as destined to happen in bodily form finds opened for him in 14 16-18 the way by which he may think of it as spiritual. Any one who finds himself unable to think of a bodily resurrection and a final judgment once for all on the last day has only to take his stand on 11 26 5 24. Any one who finds himself unable to regard the value of the sacrament of the Eucharist as an absolute one has on his side the express utterance of Jesus (6 63): 'it is the spirit that maketh alive; the flesh profiteth nothing,'—a principle which Paul in 2 Cor. 3 6 had made use of with reference to the OT religion, but not as yet with reference to any of the positive institutions of Christianity. Indeed this fundamental principle, taken along with 13 15 and 3 34 b, is in itself a sufficient counteractive against any one-sided or exaggerated exaltation of the figure of Christ as portrayed in John. On the other hand, the Johannine theology can claim the most unreserved and absolute acceptance for the highest which it has to offer, the place which it assigns to love. This is the central idea of the first epistle (27 f. 3 23 4 7-21), and equally central is the saying in the gospel in 13 34 f. 15 12. It has indeed been the achievement of Christ to bring this new commandment of love into the world and to give the world his own example in this (13 15)—even if the foot-washing never occurred in a literal sense.

E.—SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES

The 'elect lady' (ἐκλεκτὴ κυρία) in 2 Jn. 1 is, especially in view of v. 13 and of the change between 'thy children' and 'thee' in 4 f., a church. It is designated as 'lady' perhaps because (Eph. 5 31 f.) of the marriage relation with Christ the 'lord' (κύριος); the predicate 'elect together' (συνεκλεκτή), only with the substantive 'church' (ἐκκλησία) understood, is applied also to the church in Babylon in 1 Pet. 5 13. This interpretation of 'lady' (κυρία) becomes quite obvious if 3 Jn. 9 refers back to the second letter, which is not improbable. Now, in 2 Jn. 13 the church addressed is greeted by a sister church. This sister church is, we may be sure, that to which the writer belongs. The church addressed need not, however, on this account be also an individual church; there is a possibility that any church whatever may be intended. In this case the second epistle, though individual in form, will be in reality as catholic as the first.

The case of the third epistle is different. Gaius is an individual, and neither can Diotrophes and Demetrius (22, 9 12) be divested of their individual character. One Gaius is named in Acts 19 29, a second in 20 4, a third in 1 Cor. 14 Rom. 16 23. The last-named has affinity with the Gaius of this epistle in so far as hospitality is predicated of both. That the two are identical there is nothing further to show. We may perhaps rather assume the name to have been chosen in order to recall the other hospitable Gaius.

If we direct our attention to what is most distinctively peculiar to the two epistles we shall have to say that their purpose, first and foremost, had reference to church-pölyty. The new thing in the second epistle is not a theoretical refutation of false teachers but the exhortation (v. 10 f.) not to receive such persons under one's roof and not even to salute them. Although this does not refer to the case of persons living in the same place, but only to that of passing travellers, it in any case represents an effectual step in the direction of the exclusion from church fellowship of these adversaries who in v. 9 are designated as 'progressives' (ὁ πρόδρομος), in v. 7 as doctetics.

The stringency with which this is demanded seems to find its explanation in 3 Jn. 9 f., according to which Diotrophes, an opponent of the writer, refuses to receive not only his letters but also the brethren who adhere to him, and expels from his own community those members who are willing to receive these brethren. At the same time it is perfectly plain that the cause of this reciprocal excommunication is in the third epistle different from what it is in the second. In the third there is no word of false doctrine; but great emphasis is laid upon the personal ambition of the adversary and upon the claim on the part of the writer to unconditional authority. The fact that travelling brethren are spoken of in both letters ought not to be allowed to disguise this difference. Now the directly expressed purpose of the third epistle is that Gaius should give a friendly reception to the adherents of the writer on their travels. As Demetrius is mentioned immediately before the close of the epistle, and a good testimony is expressly given with regard to him, he has been regarded as the bearer of the epistle, which thus was at the same time a letter of introduction (cp Rom. 16 1 f.). The interesting hypothesis, as to an important turning-point in the history of the most ancient form of ecclesiastical organisation, which Harnack (Texte u. Untersuch. 15 3, '97) has connected with the third epistle, will on account of its wide scope be most conveniently considered under MINISTRY (q. v.).

In this place, on the other hand, a word is still demanded by the second purpose which, over and above that of church-pölyty, underlies at least the second epistle. This epistle combines with its polemic against false teachers a recommendation of the ideas of the gospel and of the first epistle, and in this respect stands on the same level with the first epistle itself, whether it be that the second epistle is later than the first and the gospel, or whether it be that it preceded them. If the second epistle preceded, the second (and also the third epistle, in case it was contemporary with the second) would be a first attempt at giving literary currency to those ideas under the name of a known church authority; the gospel would then exemplify a further step in that it claimed to be by a still higher authority, namely the son of Zebedee.

In the second epistle the coincidence in language with the gospel and the first epistle is fairly strong; in the third it is confined to a few expressions.

65. Authors, in vv. 3 f. 6 11 f. The contents fall in and dates. profundity far behind both the larger writings. For neither of the two smaller writings can we assert more than that they move in the same spiritual sphere with the larger.

In both the author calls himself 'the Elder' (ὁ πρεσβύτερος). By this expression the authorship of an apostle is as good as excluded, unless it so happened that within the circle of his followers he had borne this name as one of special distinction. This, however, according to § 7 a, holds good rather of John the Elder, who is distinct from the apostle. The Elder seems to many to be expressly shown by the designation to have been the author. He was, however, a chief authority with Papias, and Papias was strongly inclined to chiliasm; but of chiliasm we find no trace in the epistles before us. 'The Elder' might indeed be the designation of a person quite unknown to us, if only it was understood in the circle of the recipients who was meant by it. If, however, we are right in holding that at least the second epistle is for the entire church, then the designation of the writer will also be intended for it, in other words it will denote the famous Elder—not indeed in the sense of his being the actual author, but in that of his being the author in whose name it was to run.

That both epistles are from the same hand need not be doubted, yet neither is it absolutely certain. If we must suppose from the outset, on account of the other Johannine writings, that there was a whole group of men who laboured in one and the same spirit, then there can always have been two different members of the group to whom we are indebted for these two writings which do not absolutely coincide either in language or in intention. The reference back from 3 Jn. 9 to the second epistle is by no means a conclusive proof of unity of authorship, nor yet are the limited number of expressions in which both agree, such as 'walking in truth' (περιπατεῖν ἐν ἀληθείᾳ), 2 Jn. 4 3 Jn. 3 f., or 'love and truth' in 2 Jn. 3 3 Jn. 1.

It will be seen from what has already been said how difficult it is to say almost anything as to the date of composition. The answer to the question depends on the hypotheses adopted as to purpose and author. The external attestation for the second epistle and still more for the third is much weaker than for the first. Even though this is intelligible enough in view of their brevity and of their designation of their author as Elder, it yet permits any view which may be required by the hypotheses mentioned above, especially the view which relegates them to a date appreciably later than the first.

Lüdemann (JPT, 1879, pp. 565-576) has even sought to establish a probability that the two minor epistles, which he assigns to a date earlier than that of the first epistle or of the gospel, presuppose the work of Papias and subserve the intention of substituting a different picture of John for that drawn by Papias.

We may conclude, then, by pointing out briefly that the first half of the second century suits all the references to the conditions of a later time (less precisely determinable) which we have found in the second and third epistles and in the gospel. In the second and third epistles the most important trace of this kind is the excommunication of one another by Christians and the rise of a hierarchy. In the gospel we have, corresponding to this, on the one hand, the idea of the unity of the church (here expressed quite ideally, without any hierarchical flavour: 10 16 17 11 12-23 etc.), on the other hand, the expulsion of Christians from the synagogue, which Barcochba carried out. The assigning of this in 92 to the lifetime of Jesus is certainly not historical (see GOSPELS, § 136). It is significant that 16 2 announces it for a future time. The same period fits also the tendency to detach the responsibility for the condemnation of Jesus as much as possible from the Roman government and to roll it on to the Jews, a tendency even more marked in Jn. 18 26-19 16 than in the synoptics (cp GOSPELS, § 108). Jesus acknowledges himself not as Messiah of the Jews, but as King of Truth; politically, therefore—this is the political aspect of the narrative—Christianity is not dangerous.

Of conservative works on the Johannine question that of Luthardt (Der Joh. Urspr. des 4. Ev., '74; ET by C. R. Gregory, St. John the author of the Fourth Gospel, '75, with copious bibliography), deserves special mention; of 'mediating' works, that of Beyschlag (Die Joh. Frage, '76, previously in St. Kr. '74 f.). The most important critical works are: Bretschneider, Probabilia, '20; Baur, *Tübingen theol. Baldensperger, Prolog des 4. Evang., '98 (regards polemic and apologetic against the sect of the Disciples of John as the aim of almost the whole gospel). Too late to be used in the above article appeared Kreyenühl, Das Evangelium der Wahrheit, 1. (1900). The Johannine question enters here quite a new stage. Kreyenühl regards the Fourth Gospel as a Gnostic work, and seeks to ascribe it to Menander of Antioch, a pupil of Simon Magus.

JOIADA (יְהוֹיָדָה), 'Yah knows; an abbreviation of יְהוֹיָדָה: see JEHOIADA.

- (AV JEHOIADA) b. Paseah, in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 17; EZRA ii., §§ 16 [1], 15 [1 (d)]), Neh. 36 (וְיֹאדָא [B], וְיֹאדָא [N], וְיֹאדָא [A], וְיֹאדָא [L]).
- Son of Bliashib the high priest, in pedigree of Jaddua (EZRA ii., § 6b); contemporary with Nehemiah; Neh. 12 10 f. (וְיֹאדָא [B and in v. 11 N*], וְיֹאדָא [N], וְיֹאדָא [A], וְיֹאדָא [L]), 22 (וְיֹאדָא [B N* A]), 13 28 (וְיֹאדָא [11 N], וְיֹאדָא [AL]).

- Neh. 11 10 (וְיֹרֵיב [A]) 12 6 (B N* A om.) 12 19 (B N* A om. וְיֹרֵיב [N C a mg. inf.]). See JEHOIARIB.
- A Judahite, temp. Nehemiah (Neh. 11 5, וְיֹרֵיב [N*]).

JOKEAM (יְהוֹכָאִם), יֹאֲכָאִם [B], יֹאֲכָאִם [A], יֹאֲכָאִם [L], in the hill-country of Judah, mentioned with Juttah and Jezreel (Josh. 15 56 f.). The name is probably a corruption of JORKEAM, a clan-name or place-name in 1 Ch. 24, belonging to the SW. of Hebron, and to be identified with REKEM. The place intended by Jorkeam and Rekem is probably the Judahite CARMEI (כַּרְמֵי), and the common original of all these forms is probably Jerahmeel (יִרְמְיָהוּ). The Jerahmeelites did not confine themselves to the Negeb. See JERAHMEEL, § 4. T. K. C.

JOKIM (יְהוֹכִים), § 31, a descendant of SHELAH (1 Ch. 4 22). The name might conceivably be mis-spelt for JEHOIAKIM (so C¹ AL, וְיֹאֲכִים); but cp JASHUBI-LEHEM.

JOKMEAM (יְהוֹכְמָאִם) as if = 'let the [divine] Kinsman arise'; rather, perhaps, יְהוֹכְמָאִם, 'the Kinsman (?) takes vengeance,' cp C), a 'Levitical' city in Ephraim (1 Ch. 6 68 [53], יֹאֲכָאִם [B], יֹאֲכָאִם [A], -M [L]), mentioned with Shechem, Gezer, and Beth-horon. In the parallel list of Levitical cities in Josh. 21, KIBZAIM is the name given (v. 22, καβσαιμ [A], om. B, βασειμ [L]). This form, however, seems to be an old corruption of Jokmeam (יְהוֹכְמָאִם from יְהוֹכְמָאִם [?]). Jokmeam is also mentioned in 1 K. 4 12 (λουκαμ [B; ? precedes], εκ μασ [A], ουκαμ [L]), but the reading rendered 'as far as beyond Jokmeam' (so RV, and similarly the Geneva Bible, but AV, by a printer's error, substitutes Jokneam) is probably corrupt; substitute 'as far as the ford of Meholah' (ער כַּעֲבֹר מְחֹלָה). See ZARETHAN. T. K. C.

JOKNEAM (יְהוֹכְנָאִם), rather יְהוֹכְנָאִם, 'Jikneam,' as if 'the (divine) Kinsman (?) makes, or acquires'; We. Heid. (2) 4, compares ΕΚΝΙΒΑΛΟΣ, the name of a king of Tyre, Jos. v. 1 p. 1 21; יֹאֲכָאִם [AL].¹

1. A town of Zebulun (Josh. 19 11, יֹאֲכָאִם [B]), reckoned by P as Levitical (Josh. 21 34, יֹאֲכָאִם [B], יֹאֲכָאִם [A]). It was also a royal city of the Canaanites (12 22, יֹאֲכָאִם [B], -μαμ [L], יֹאֲכָאִם [A]); Thotmes III. claims to have taken it in his victorious campaign against the 'upper Rutenu' (NVMM As. u. Eur. 393). The city was situated in the Carmel district (12 22), to the E. of a torrent-valley (נְקָה; 19 11). We may probably identify it with the CYAMON [g.v.] of Judith 7 3, and both with the Tell Kaimin, on the E. side of the Wady el-Milh, at its mouth as it enters the plain of Esdraelon, to which Eusebius and Jerome refer as καμμωνα, Cimona (see CAMON). The position is conspicuous and important, commanding the main pass from the western portion of Esdraelon to the more southern plain' (Rob.). On 'Jokneam' in 1 K. 4 12, AV, see JOKEAM.

2. The Jokneam referred to above is called by way of distinction, 'Jokneam in Carmel' (Josh. 12 22). It follows that another Jokneam must have existed elsewhere. Probably it lay in the hill country of Judah, JOKEAM [g.v.] in Josh. 15 56 (יֹאֲכָאִם [L]) being wrong in the third letter.

JOKSHAN (יְהוֹשָׁן); יֹעֲזָאִן, BD and in 1 Ch. L; in Gen. 25 2 A (see Swete); in v. 3 A^b D (יֹעֲזָאִן [A*]); יֹעֲזָאִן [A in 1 Ch.]; יֹעֲזָאִן [E and L in Gen.]; a son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25 2 f. [J], 1 Ch. 1 32).

Interpreted of a tribe Fakih in Yemen by Arabian genealogists (see Osiander, ZD.M.G. 10 31). Glaser (Skizze, 2453) compares names like Wahaša in S. Arabia. Tuch's identification with Joktan (Gen. 10 26) is attractive, but the change of ו into ש is hard to explain. F. B.

JOKTAN (יְהוֹכָתָן); יֹעֲזָאִן [AEL]=יְהוֹכָתָן, younger son of Eber, and father of thirteen sons or peoples,—Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal or Ebal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab (Gen. 10 25-30 = 1 Ch. 1 19-23). Probably there were originally only twelve in the list (cp Israel, Ishmael, and see GENEALOGIES i., col. 1661, n. 2).¹

Joktan is the assumed ancestor of the older Arabian tribes as distinguished from those later tribes which were more closely related by origin and perhaps by language to the Israelites. The Arab genealogists identify the name with that of Kahtān, an ancient southern Arabian tribe well known to themselves (see GENEALOGIES i., § 2). But this identification has no historical value. The name Joktan may indeed be simply an artificial name, devised for the younger son of Eber. When we look at the names of the Joktanites, we notice that two of them (Sheba and Havilah) occur in the list of Cushites. This simply arises from the fact that the names of the Cushites and the Joktanites come from different documents (P and J respectively), reflecting, perhaps, different political circumstances and tribal relations. It is difficult to explain all the Joktanite names. The very first (ALMODAD) is among the most obscure; the name seems Sabæan. The limits of the Joktanites (Gen. 10 30) are also matter for discussion (see MESHA, SEPHAR).

JOKTHEEL (יְהוֹכְתֵאֵל); for attempted explanations see Wetzstein in Del. Isaias (9), 703; Olsh. LB 624).

1. A city in the lowland of Judah, mentioned between Mizpeh and Lachish, Josh. 15 38; either miswritten for Eltekeh, or a corruption of Jerahmeel, from which indeed Eltekeh may also come (cp יֹאֲכָאִם [B], but AL יֹאֲכָאִם).

2. The name given by AMAZIAH (g.v.) to a place in Edom called 'the Cliff' (עֲלֵה) which he had captured, 2 K. 14 7 (καθολ [BL], καθολ [A]); it is the rock, or cliff, of Kadesh-barnea which is meant. Halévy seeks to illustrate it by 2 Ch. 25 14, where Amaziah is accused of having bowed down before the gods of Edom, and extracts from it the meaning 'Yakt is God' (Études dédiées à M. le Dr. Leemans, 134). No such Edomite deity as Yakt is, however, known. The name is corrupt. 'Joktheel' should probably be 'Jerahmeel,' for the battle was in the valley called hammelah, or rather Jerahmeel (see SALT, VALLEY OF). On the 'ragged spur of the north-easterly mountain-range,' from underneath which the fountain of Kadesh issues, there must have been a fort. This fort Amaziah captured and named Jerahmeel, because of the 'crowning mercy' which he had received. It is true, the place is commonly (see e.g. Kittel, Hist. 2 289), identified with Petra; but this must be an error, as Ki. in his commentary has shown. See SALA. T. K. C.

JONA (Ἰωάννου [WH], -ΝΝΟΥ [Ti.]), Jn. 1 42; RV John. See JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 1, and cp BAR-JONA.

JONADAB (יְהוֹנָדָב), §§ 27 44 46; Ἰωνάδᾶβ [B N A Q L], abbrev. from יְהוֹנָדָב, 'Yahwe is munificent,' cp Nedabiah, Abinadab, Amminadab.

1. Son of Shammah and nephew of David, who displayed his 'subtlety' in advising his cousin Amnon how to entrap his half-sister Tamar; 2 S. 13 3 f. (in v. 5 MT gives 'Jehonadab'; יֹנָדָב [B^a vid. b]), -am [B^b v. 3, B v. 5], in v. 3 5, יֹנָדָב [L]). See JONATHAN (4).

2. Son of Rechab and presumed author of the rules which bound the Rechabites, Jer. 35 6 f. (יֹנָדָב [N] in v. 8; יֹנָדָב [Q*] in v. 16). 'Jonadab' in MT only in v. 6 10 19; elsewhere 'Jehonadab.' It is usual to identify this Jonadab with 3. The true 'father' of the Rechabites, however, was of older date. See RECHABITES.

3. EV JEHONADAB, b. Rechab, an abettor of Jehu in his 'zeal for Yahwē'; 2 K. 10 15-23. The clasping of hands in c. 15 implies partnership in the measures which followed (see H. LAND, ib.), though there are difficulties in the narrative. See JEHU; ISRAEL, § 31; RECHABITES.

4. The name of Saul's second son, according to 1 S. 31 2 (see ARNADAB). There is a similar confusion in 6's title of Ps. 71 (6 70) (ωναδαβ [BN] αμναδαμ [R]). See JONATHAN, 1.

JONAH (יֹנָתָן), § 68, 'dove'; originally, according to Robertson Smith [J. Phil., 985], connected with totemism; but many such names in modern Syria, at all events, are certainly due to fancy, and early corruption from יהונתן is possible; ωννα [BAL], [in the title] ωννασ).

1. A prophet, son of Amittai, of GATH-HEPHER (q.v.), who prophesied the deliverance of Israel from the Syrian oppression (2 K. 14 25). The reference to Jonah in Tob. 14 48 (BA, followed by EV) is probably due to a scribe's error; N reads Ναουμ (Nahum) in v. 4. When we compare 2 K. 13 4*f.* it seems probable that Jonah delivered his prophecy in the time of Jehoahaz, the father of Jeroboam II. (Klost.). Jonah seems to have spoken of a deliverer who would bring the Israelites out of the grasp of Aram (6 καὶ ἐξήγαγεν αὐτοὺς), so that they would dwell in their tents as beforetime. The 'deliverer' is not the Assyrian king Rammān-nirari III. (Duncker; Whitehouse in COT 2 324; Wi. GI 1 154)—though as a matter of history the victory of that king over Syria must have been a great relief to Israel—but Jeroboam II. There is no probability that the Deuteronomistic writers of 2 K. 13 4-6, 14 25-27 knew anything of Rammān-nirari; but it is beyond doubt that they wished to do honour to Jeroboam. Cp Stade ZATW, '85, p. 296. Hitzig and Renan think that the prophecy of Jonah is still extant in Is. 15 f., but this is most improbable. See also JONAH [BOOK]. T. K. C.

2. Mt. 16 17. See BAR-JONA.

JONAH [BOOK]. It is by a strange inconsistency that the Book of Jonah ranks among the records of the

1. Post-exilic. Twelve Prophets, for the only oracle of Jonah which it professes to give is comprised in five words (Jon. 3 4, Heb.). Obviously it must be compared, not with the accompanying prophetic books, but with narratives of episodes in the lives of prophets, such as are found in 1 K. 17-19, 2 K. 4-6, and Is. 7 1-16, 20 36-39. The narratives referred to are based on traditional material, sometimes oral, sometimes written. Can we hope to find such in the Book of Jonah? Unfortunately we cannot. The leading fact of the story—the journey of an Israelite prophet to Nineveh—is so surprising that only on good pre-exilic testimony could we be excused for receiving it. Such testimony, however, is wanting. No part of the book is pre-exilic; indeed, except in glosses and in the psalm ascribed to Jonah there is no trace of more than one hand.²

² Linguistic and other arguments have convinced an American Rabbi that the original Book of Jonah, which he thinks that he has disengaged from the additional matter, was much shorter than the present one, and that it may have been of the age of Jeremiah (Kohler, Theol. Rev. 79, pp. 139-144). His method, however, is arbitrary, and linguistically there is no distinction between the original Book and the inserted matter. W. Böhme also denies the unity of authorship (ZATW 7 224-284 ['87]). He presents us with two distinct works on the story of Jonah, which have been combined by an editor; he further recognises the hands of a supplementer and of a glossator. Böhme's argument is much more elaborate than Kohler's, but is hypercritical. He greatly exaggerates the critical importance of the inconsistencies, which permit us to speak of glosses, but not of composite authorship (so Kue., Eint., 2 426, § 86). For an earlier attempt

1. It is certain that, though the diction of Jonah is purer than that of Esther, Chronicles, and Daniel, it has some striking Aramaisms and other late words or forms. Pusey, it is true, has endeavoured to refute this argument; but his opposition to the criticism of the other OT books prevents him from forming a just idea of the phases of linguistic development. 'The phase of Hebrew which meets us in the book of Jonah is not that of the eighth century' (König)—not that of Amos and Hosea.

One need not lay any stress on פָּנָה, which, though more Aramaic than Hebrew, might perhaps have been used by the non-maritime Israelites before the Exile; but such words and forms as these are conclusive as to the post-exilic date of the Book; — שָׁתַק (1 12); קָרָאָה (3 2); נָעַם (3 7); 'to labour' (4 10); רָבָו (4 11); בָּנָה (2 1 4 6*f.*); בָּשָׂלַי (1 7); בָּשָׂלַי (1 12); שָׁבַךְ (4 10). יַחַעֲשֵׂת (1 6) and חָרַשְׁתִּים (4 6) are designedly omitted.²

2. The writer's conception of pre-exilic prophecy is opposed to the facts of prophecy gathered from the works of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. He imagines that revelations were, to prophets of the eighth century, as objective, as external, as they were to Zechariah. Doubtless it suited his purpose (which we shall study presently) to represent Jonah as seeking to evade his mission; but he could not have done this had he lived in the age of Amos and Hosea. (The story of the disobedient prophet in 1 K. 13 is also too peculiar to be pre-exilic.) He assumes too that Jonah would have been surprised at the non-fulfilment of a prediction—a surprise which there is no reason to suppose such a result would have awakened in Hosea, though certainly that prophet would have been very much surprised at the conversion of the arrogant Assyrians.

3. The writer's explicitly universalistic conception of religion and morality (cp 4 11 with Ps. 36 6[7]) is not in harmony with the prophecy of the eighth century.

4. His imitiveness is equally striking; cp e.g. 3 9 with Joel 2 4; 4 2 with Joel 2 3 and Ex. 34 6; and the story of Jonah under the הִיכָאֵוֹן (see below, § 5) with that of Elijah under the broom-plant in the desert (1 K. 19 4*f.*).

5. The mention of Nineveh as a city of the past (יְנוֹוֹ הָיְתָה, 3 3), with details implying that the readers did not know much about it, is significant.

6. Note also the patent improbabilities of the story. A prophet of the time of Jehoahaz banishes himself from Yahwē's land in order to divest himself of his prophetic character (contrast Am. 3 8). In order to go to Tarshish he proceeds, not to Tyre, but to the comparatively unimportant seaport of Joppa. He is swallowed up by a great 'fish,' and remains three days in the fish's belly. He comes out alive (we are not told the place of his landing), and ventures among the fierce Ninevites without a companion or interpreter, believing that he will have more influence on them than their own prophets and teachers. We are not informed what the offence of the Ninevites was, nor as to the name of their king. The narrator assures us, however, that king and people turned to God (contrast Nah. 3 1 4), and so escaped the threatened destruction. Last, not least, we have the singular episode of the plant which 'came up in a night and vanished in a night' (lit. 'son of a night').

The Book of Jonah, then, being post-exilic, to what class of literature does it belong? Obviously it is a

2. Class of Literature. Midrash,—i.e., 'an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, especially a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story.'³

Tobit and Susanna are universally admitted to be such Midrashim; Jonah should be added to the list. As such it is not deprived of value for historical purposes. For, as Kuenen long ago pointed out,⁴ the Books of Jonah and Ruth are records of a current of thought among the Jews opposed to that identified with the name of Ezra. That great reformer, and the men of his school, based their system on the recognition of a real and permanent difference between Israel and the heathen, and even psalmists of the post-exilic period spoke sometimes as if the 'nations' were necessarily wicked because non-Israelites. Against this the author of Jonah enters a protest. The scene of the prophet under the הִיכָאֵוֹן is specially introduced to check Jewish

(by Nachtigall) to dissect the Book of Jonah, see Eichhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek, 9 2, 221-273; Bertholdt, Eint. 2407-2412; and cp Kleinert (Comm. 19), who is willing to admit that a later writer (temp. Ezekiel) may have based his account on two distinct traditional narratives.

² Both words are plainly corrupt. Read for the former יַחַעֲשֵׂת (or יַחַשֵׁב), and for the latter יַחַשֵׁב ('it came to pass at dawn, when the sun rose').

arrogance, and the whole course of the previous story leads to a fairer view of 'the nations.' Indeed, the writer partly explains the non-fulfilment of prophecies against the heathen (which doubtless puzzled some of his contemporaries) by the readiness of the heathen to repent. One might even infer from the story that he placed the heathen morally and religiously above his own people. Jonah begins by stifling the voice of conscience, and afterwards both expects and desires Nineveh's destruction. No epilogue tells us of any change in the prophet's feelings towards the heathen.¹ The Phœnician mariners, on the other hand, fear the great God of the Hebrews (Jon. 1.9f.), and the people of Nineveh at once repent on hearing the prophetic announcements (Jon. 3.6-9). We are reminded of Lessing's Nathan the Wise, and of a more ancient and venerable story (the Good Samaritan).

This theory has excellent points; but it does not do justice to the entire problem. If the hero of the story

3. Problems of the book. is merely a type of the too exclusive contemporaries of the writer, why is he called Jonah? why is he made a prophet? and why is he swallowed up by a fish? These questions are to a large extent answered by the symbolic theory.

1. The hero of the story is called Jonah, not primarily because an early narrative mentions a person of this name, but because a custom was springing up of calling Israel, symbolically, a dove. The earliest trace of this is in Ps. 68.13 [14], where the people of Israel, delivered by its God from the powerful kings of Canaan, and enriched with their spoil, is called a dove² 'whose wings [God] will cover with silver and her feathers with gold.'³ Elsewhere the faithful community personified wishes for itself the wings of a dove, not for their beauty, but for their swiftness and for the unerring instinct which leads the doves to their retreats (Ps. 56.6-8 [7-9]).

2. Jonah is made a prophet, because Israel was called upon to prophesy.⁴ The Prophecy of Restoration said that all Zion's children would be Yahwè's disciples—i.e. prophets (Is. 54.13; cp 50.4)—and that the duty of the prophetic 'Servant of Yahwè' was to make known the true religion to the nations (Is. 42.4-9), for which purpose he was specially endowed (Is. 49.3; cp 50.4). It is true, there was a historical Jonah who prophesied, and who, by an interesting coincidence, is called 'Yahwè's servant' (יְהוָה עַבְדּוֹ, 2 K. 14.25; cp Jon. 1.9 G, δούλος κυρίου ἐγὼ εἰμι); but this was not the fundamental point with the late narrator, whose mind was absorbed in symbolism. It is also to be observed that, according to II. Isaiah, the 'servant of Yahwè' would not 'draw back' from his work (Is. 50.5). The psalmists, too, bring Israel's deliverance into connection with the spread of true religion (see Ps. 22.26 [27].f. 96-100), and one of them makes the true Israelite promise to speak of God's precepts (like Jonah) before kings (Ps. 119.46).

3. Jonah is swallowed up by the sea because this was a common poetical phrase for the danger of destruction which repeatedly beset Israel (see Is. 43.2, Ps. 18.15 [16] 32.6-42.7 [8] 66.12 69.1 [21].f. 14 [15].f. 12.4.f. Lam. 3.54). And the purpose of the whole story, according to the symbolic theory, is, that Israel, called to preach to the nations (a touching antedating of II. Isaiah's revelation), evaded its duty, that God punished Israel by exile, but turned the punishment to Israel's good, and that Israel afterwards took up its neglected duty, but in an unloving spirit which grieved its patient teacher, the all-merciful God of the whole human race.

The theory here described is a great advance upon the preceding one, and much credit is due to Kleinert

4. The great fish. (1868) and J. S. Bloch (1876) for applying the key of symbolism to the narrative more fully than any previous writers. But the hesitation of critics to adopt it indicates that there is some serious defect in it. Where it fails is

² Symbolical designations of peoples are in the manner of this psalmist (see Ps. 63.30 [31]).

³ Point חַמָּה, and for חַמָּה בְּיָמֵינוּ read simply בְּיָמֵינוּ (Che. Ps. (2)).

⁴ In later times Jonah or 'Dove' became a standing title for Israel. Both G and Tg. recognise the people or the congregation in the נֶחֱמָה of Ps. 56.1. Cp Talm. Bab. Gittin, 45a, etc., and the Midrash on Cant. 2.14.41; also the Piṭṭim in the Jewish Passover Service, based on the midrashic explanation of the Song of Songs (especially the first, Festival Prayers, de Sola's ed., 1.97).

in its treatment of the story of the great fish. It is a mistake to say that 'Jonah's adventure in the sea is but a very subordinate feature' (Kalisch, Bible Studies, 2209). On the contrary, it is the turning point of the whole narrative; Yahwè 'prepared' the great fish to be an instrument not only of preservation but also of moral discipline to the disobedient prophet. We must therefore supplement the key of symbolism by that of mythology.

The earlier critics (e.g., Eichhorn) were not wrong in seeking for parallels where they could at the time most easily be found, viz. in Greek mythology. That Andromeda was in peril from a sea-monster on the rocks of Joppa, gives, however, no real help; the myth may rather be regarded as an ætiological one for Joppa (Joppa, § 3); and only very moderate requirements can be satisfied with the parallel of the story of Hesione. F. C. Baur went to the right quarter when he took a hint from Bérössus (Oannes); but Jonah neither was, according to the story, nor could conceivably have been, represented as a fish-god, which is also an objection to Trumbull's original use of DAGON (q.v.) and Oannes in JBL 11 (92), Pt. 1. Quite recently Ball (PSBA), König (Hastings' DB 2.747d), and some less accredited writers, have supposed a connection between the mention of the 'great fish' and the fact that the Assyrian ideogram for Nineveh implies the explanation 'fish-dwelling' (Sayce, Hibb. Lect. 57; but cp Hommel, PSBA, '99, 'Assyriological Notes', § 42).

Apart from other objections, however, (1) there is no trace of the writer of Jonah having been a man of learning, and (2) criticism should group, not isolate, narratives, phrases, or other data which may refer to folklore. We have many references to the dragon-myth in the OT, and it is quite easy to regard the 'great fish' as a degenerate dragon; whereas fish-myths are, naturally enough, unrepresented. König even illustrates the sojourn of Jonah in 'the belly of the fish' by the descent of the 'dove' Semiramis from the 'fish-woman' Atargatis or Derecto.

That critics should look everywhere except in the right place for the origin of the Jonah story is one of the many proofs that the reproaches addressed to us by Winckler are not wholly unjustified.

Tylor saw much more clearly than most contemporary critics when he pointed out that the widely-spread nature-myth of the dragon lies at the root of the apologue of Jonah.¹ But it was left for the present writer, in 1877, to combine the theory of Bloch with that of Tylor, and to show how indispensable each was to a due comprehension of the narrative. In details both theories admitted of improvement, by the help partly of biblical exegesis, partly of Assyriology. The writer also pointed out that the myth of the dragon or sea-monster is preserved, not only in the story of Jonah, but also in fragmentary allusions to Rahab, the leviathan, and the tannin in the Books of Job and the Second Isaiah (cp DRAGON). The only error (an error into which G. A. Smith seems to have fallen in Twelve Prophets, 2524) was in not distinguishing sufficiently between the dragon of the subterranean and the dragon of the heavenly ocean. It is the dragon of the subterranean ocean which (at Yahwè's command—for he has been subjugated by Yahwè) swallowed up Jonah; or, to pass from the myth to its application, it is the all-absorbing empire of Babylon which swallowed up Israel—not, however, to destroy it, but to preserve it and to give it room for repentance.

The present writer also indicated the link between the story of Jonah and the original myth.

That link is to be found in Jer. 51.34.44,—'Nehuchadrezzar king of Babylon has eaten and discomfited me (i.e., Israel); he has set me as an empty vessel, he has swallowed me up as the Dragon² (תַּנִּינִי), he has filled his belly with my dainties; he has cast me out.' 'And I will punish Bel in Babylon, and bring forth that which he has swallowed out of his mouth.' Of course, it is only a shrivelled-up myth that we have before us. Bel, who in the Babylonian story is the opponent of the dragon, has now become identified with that monster, and (as the destroying dragon) is for a time successful. Bel, or the dragon, has in fact, as we have seen already, become a symbol of the Babylonian empire and of its head Nebuchadrezzar, who thought to bring Israel under his own power, but whom Jeremiah (27 6) distinctly calls Yahwe's 'servant' (i.e., commissioned agent). For another instance of a story ultimately based on mythology, we may venture to refer to ESTHER (q.v.).

It is strange that Simpson (The Jonah Legend, '99), though he refers once to the Babylonian Tiamat legend, should so completely miss its significance as to make the stretching out of the slain monster's skin support his theory that the story of Jonah sprang out of a ceremony which was acted at a rite of initiation (perhaps into a priesthood). Criticism and archæology seem here to be parted.

The story of the wonderful plant, which contrasts with Elijah's perfectly natural desert plant in 1 K. 19 4,

5. The plant. has quite a different origin, being obviously the product of the fancy of an individual. The name קִיקְיוֹן is probably connected with the Assy. kukkânîtum (כִּכְנִי); this designates some garden-plant, the precise nature of which is unknown (for another such Assy. plant-name in Hebrew see HABAKKUK). If the mention of the 'booth' (45) belongs (as it probably does) to the original narrative, we can hardly help agreeing with Tristram that some kind of gourd is meant, gourds being commonly used for shading arbours. If, however, the narrator mentioned only the plant, we may not unreasonably fix upon the Ricinus communis, L. (see GOURD). In either case, the growth of the plant has been supernaturally fostered.

We may compare the plant with the carob-tree (see HUSKS) which bore no fruit for seventy years as a sign to Honi Hame'agel that he had really slept seventy years, and which so proved to him the credibility of Ps. 126 1 (see Talm. Bab. Ta'ânith, 23a).

On the other hand, folklore is certainly present in the story of the voyage.

Jonah, revealed by the lot as the guilty cause of the ship's danger, and thereupon thrown into the sea, is the counterpart of Mittavindaka, the son of a merchant of Benares, who is put out of the ship in which he has embarked as the spoiler of its luck, but not so roughly as Jonah.¹ He answers equally to the merchant in the Roman folk-tale of the Pot of Rue,² and the same traditional idea is at any rate presupposed in the classical passages (e.g., Horat. Od. 3 26-30) quoted by Kalisch (Bib. 57. 2 162, n. d). Primitive superstition has also supplied a detail to chap. 3. The Persians are said to have made their horses and draught-beasts join with them in the rites of mourning for Masistius (Herod. 2 24). But the Assyrians in Jonah go beyond the Persians; they make their animals abstain from food like themselves to propitiate Yahwe. This may imply the Jewish idea of the deprivation of animal nature (Gen. 6 17; cp Is. 11 6-8). For this Whitley Stokes has produced a parallel in mediæval Irish literature.³

Into the question of editorial alterations we cannot enter at length. The attempt of Böhme to distinguish four strata in the Book of Jonah has been already referred to (col. 256 1, u. 2); it carries us beyond the evidence. But a few minor interpolations or insertions may safely be allowed, in addition to the great one in 2 1-9.

That chap. 4 has been touched by scribes or editors, is obvious (see especially Wi. AOF 2 264 f.).⁴ It is not impossible that the detail of the booth (v. 5) is an addition, and that it is connected with an alteration in the prophetic announcement of Jonah (so K. Kohler). According to the MT of 3 4 Jonah 'cried and said Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.' \mathfrak{B} , however, gives three days instead of forty as the interval allowed, and though this reading may conceivably be an error produced by the mention of 'three days' journey' in v. 3, it is also possible that it may be correct. The story is constructed for effect, and the wonder of the repentance of the heathen Ninevites would be still greater if only three days were allowed as an interval than if there were forty.⁵

⁴ The compound divine name Yahwe Elohim (4 6) is due to an editor. His object was to show that the Yahwe who prepared the 'gourd' was the Elohim who prepared the worm (4 7). It is true, this was very unnecessary with the clear statement of 1 10. Cp Gen. 2 4-8 as we now have it.

⁵ Kohler, Theol. Rev., '79, pp. 140-143.

A later editor, however, might prefer forty days, and alter the text accordingly, at the same time introducing the booth (see BOOTH) as a shelter for Jonah for the remainder of his time. This suggestion will seem to most not very probable. It was at any rate an editor that inserted the psalm in chap. 2, which is largely composed of reminiscences of the canonical psalms (31 42 88 107 115 f. 120 132). It is, if faithfully interpreted, not more connected with the story of the prophet Jonah than the psalm of Hannah is with that of Hannah; for it describes how pious Israel, when in danger of extinction, struggled with its despondency. Not improbably the editor found a connection, apart from the purely external one, in the phraseology of v. 2 b ('out of the belly of Shöl', etc.). He may also have known that the Jonah of the book was, like JOB (q.v.), a שֹׁפֵט or similitude.¹

Three questions now occur. (1) Why was the book placed in the 'Twelve' (δωδεκαπρόφητων)? (2) Was it previously an independent literary work? and (3) What is its date? A brief answer must suffice. (1) The probability is that the closing words, assigned to God himself, brought the book into the prophetic canon. (2) Budde (ZATW 12 40-43, [192]) conjectures that the Book of Jonah was originally a part of the Midrash (RV 'commentary') of the Book of Kings, on which Chronicles is based (2 Ch. 24 27). The introductory 'And it came to pass' (יְהִי), and the absence of the descriptive statement 'who was of Gath-hepher' (v. 1), appeared at first sight to favour this. But the difficulty of imagining a reference to Assyria and still more to the destruction of Nineveh, has been well pointed out by Winckler (AOF 2 261), who would prefer to give the Book of Jonah a place in that Midrash where the reign of Manasseh was treated. The Midrashic narrative of Jonah explained, according to Wi., why the prophecy of Nahum was not strictly fulfilled. Wi. also thinks that the Jonah of the apologue is not the Jonah of Gath-hepher (see JONAH i. n.). (Cp Smend, AT Rel.-gesch. 409; König, Eintl. § 77, p. 379.)

(3) The book is apparently referred to in Tobit (14 8; but see JONAH, 1), and earlier still its existence is presupposed by the mention of the Twelve Prophets in Eccles. 49 10 (see the Hebrew text). The considerations mentioned above justify us in assigning the narrative, without the psalm, to the half-century which followed the arrival of Ezra. The psalm, however, was probably written much later—as late perhaps as the הִשְׁתַּחֲוֹת ('prayer') in the appendix to Ecclesiasticus (51 1-12). If so, it is an interesting fact that the symbolic interpretation of the book should have held its ground so long.

Of later references to the book three have a special claim to be mentioned, viz., two passages in the Talm. and one in the NT.

In Ta'ânith, 15a, we are told that, in times of drought, it was usual for one of the leaders of the congregation to expound the teaching of Jonah, and in Meg. 10a, that Jonah was used as a lesson for the Day of Atonement

8. Late references. (a usage which still obtains in the liturgy of the synagogue).² The growing importance of the doctrine of repentance naturally sent Jewish teachers in search of illustrations to the Book of Jonah (see Brüll, Jahrb. f. jüd. Gesch. u. Lit. 3 158). The third passage is Mt. 12 39-41, which occurs again in a simpler and more probable form³ in Lk. 11 29 f. 32. 'The sign of the prophet Jonah' means the striking fact that an Israelitish prophet proclaimed the purpose of God in a heathen city; and Jesus' statement is that the men of Nineveh will 'rise up' as witnesses (cp ἀναστάντες μάρτυρες, Ps. 85 11, \mathfrak{B}) against his own 'generation' and prove them guilty (κατακρινοῦσιν looks like an inaccurate rendering of the Aramaic equivalent of שְׁפִיטָה; cp Is. 54 17, where 'condemn' is an impossible rendering). What the Ninevites testify is that they had not been repelled by the foreign garb and manners of Jonah but had believed him and turned to God. The divine Judge will then condemn the Jewish contemporaries of Jesus because they did not repeat at a still greater 'sign'—the appearance among them of a more exalted personage than Jonah. It may be safely assumed that by the time of Jesus the symbolic character of Jonah had been as completely forgotten as that of the good Samaritan must have been by those who first pointed out the traditional site of the 'inn' of Lk. 10 34.¹

² Jonah himself too is treated in this liturgy with a view to edification. His prayer 'out of the belly of the fish' makes him an example of faith (Festival Prayers, de Sola, 5 162).

³ It may be regarded as critically certain that Mt. 12 40 is a later insertion. It is the explanatory comment of an editor who required a 'sign of Jonah' more marvellous, more overwhelming, than that which Jesus actually offered. The true 'sign of Jonah' must have been one which the Ninevites at once recognised. Cp Sanday, Bampton Lect. on Inspiration, 419 ff. 435; G. A. Smith, op. cit. 2 507 ff.

The post-biblical legends respecting Jonah are uninteresting (see ps.-Epiphanius, De Vit. Proph. 16, and cp Kalisch, Bib. St. 2:287-290). It was, however, an Jonah on the hill called the 'mound of repentance,' from which, the Moslems believe, Jonah delivered addresses to the people of Nineveh, to the E. of the probable site of that city. Nor must we omit to notice that Jonah and a fantastic monster (not a whale) occur several times in early Christian paintings in the catacombs at Rome.

For a full conspectus of works on Jonah see Kalisch, Bib. St. 2, 'The Book of Jonah,' 78; Chapman, 'Jonah,' Smith's DB(²); or König, 'Jonah,' Hastings' DB, vol. 2. Pusey's comm. should be read on the conservative side—a side which is now seldom represented. König, Eint., § 77, is of use for the linguistic argument, and his article, just referred to, comprises a rich collection of facts, though condensation would greatly have improved it. G. A. Smith, on the other hand (Twelve Prophets, 2493 ff.) gives much in a small compass, and is very judicious. On Θ 's text see Volders, ZATW 3 219 ff. 41 ff. Kleinert's contribution to Lange's Bibelwerk ('Obadiah,' 'Jonah,' etc., '68) has an interesting introduction. J. S. Bloch, St. u. Gesch. der Sammlung der Alt. Heb. Lit., '75, and Che. 'Jonah, A Study in Jewish Folklore and Religion,' in Th. Rev., 211-219 (77), are referred to above. C. H. H. Wright, Biblical Studies, '86, argues very ably for the symbolic apart from the mythical theory. Nowack, Die Alt. Proph., '07, gives a thorough exegesis, but is most unsatisfactory in his treatment of the affinities of the story (175). Winckler, AOF 2 260 ff. (critically helpful, see above). A phrase in the heading of Ps. 56, still defended by König,¹ but most probably corrupt. Emending as in analogous cases we may read: 'for the Sabbath'; 'for the sacrifices.'

על-יונתן, AV 'upon Jonath,' is probably a corruption of על-יונתן-אלם (for the Sabbath), or more strictly of the intermediate reading על-יונתן (EV 'upon Neginoth'; cp Ps. 54 f.); and רְחֹקִים אֱלִים (RV Elem-rehokim, of הַמְּזַבְּחִים ('for the sacrifices')). That לַמְּנַחֵם (EV 'for the chief musician') also = לְיוֹנָתָן, is no objection to this theory; in the headings, as elsewhere, dittography comes into play. The favourite modern view, however, is that אֱלִים should be pointed אֱלִים (so Bochart), and the phrase explained 'to the tune of "The dove of distant terebinths."' Jewish tradition (see Θ , Tg.; cp JONAH ii. § 3, 1) took the 'dove' to be the Jewish people. ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων in Θ is

There is no reference to Joppa in any early biblical writing; but we know (Am. Tab. 21 4 32 f.; cp 178 20) that an Egyptian officer guarded 'the gate

1. Earlier history. of Gaza and the gate of Joppa for Amen-hotep IV. The place occurs in the list of cities in Syria and Palestine conquered by Thotmes III. (*RP*²) 5 47, no. 62), and in the papyrus Anastasi I., where its gardens with their blooming date-palms are specially mentioned.¹ The ruse, exactly like that of Ali Baba in the Thousand and One Nights, by which an Egyptian officer was said to have taken Joppa, forms the theme of an Egyptian folk-story.² It is no sport of the fancy, however, when Sennacherib tells us that he besieged and took Joppa, then a part of the dominion of Ashkelon (KB 293). The notice is important. It is the only hint we have of the political connection of Joppa during any part of the pre-exilic period of the history of Israel. We may assume that throughout that period it was either Philistine or Phœnician. The circumstance that Joppa is nowhere mentioned in the pre-exilic biblical writings where the Philistines are referred to seems to justify us in supposing that during the flourishing period of the Phœnician cities its political connection was Phœnician, not Philistine.³ That it was ever in Israelitish hands, is not suggested even by P (Josh. 19 46); it was Jonathan, or rather Simon the Maccabee, who first incorporated Joppa into the Jewish territory. In the meantime, however, had the Israelites no access to the sea by Joppa? Did not Jonah, son of Amittai, go down to Joppa and find a ship going to Tarshish (Jon. 1 3)? The reason why pre-exilic Israelites did not 'go down' to Joppa (cp JONAH, BOOK OF) is that there was Philistine territory to be traversed before getting to Joppa. In post-exilic times, however, we do hear of timber being brought to Jerusalem from the Lebanon by ships which discharged their cargo at Joppa (Ezra 3 7), and accordingly the Chronicler (2 Ch. 2 16 [15]) changes the indefinite expression (1 K. 5 9 [23]), 'to the place that thou shalt appoint me,' into 'to Joppa.'⁴ What the place referred to indefinitely by the older writer was, is uncertain; it may have been Dor [q.v.].

In 148 B.C. Joppa was captured by Jonathan the Maccabee (1 Macc. 10 76). To keep a coast-town like this, however, was difficult, owing to the

2. Later history. mixed character of the population, and Jonathan's brother Simon had to recapture it about six years later (12 33 f.). It was felt to be an important event, for never before had the Jews possessed a harbour on the Great Sea. 'And together with all his (other) glory,' says the historian (1 Macc. 14 5), 'he took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea,'—i.e., he opened the door for commerce, and perhaps (as G. A. Smith thinks⁵) for the propagation of the Jewish religion. Simon himself took a pride in his achievement, for he caused ships to be represented on the family monument at Modin (13 29 f.).

For other references to Joppa, see 2 Macc. 12 3-7 1 Macc. 13 11. Pompey, after capturing Jerusalem (63 B.C.), re-fortified Joppa, and annexed it to the province of Syria (Jos. Ant. xiv. 4 4). Sixteen years later it was restored to Hyrcanus (ib. xiv. 10 6); next, it was united to the kingdom of Herod the Great (ib. xv. 7 3), upon whose death it passed to Archelaus (ib. xvii. 11 4). On the deposition of Archelaus (6 A.D.) it was annexed, with the rest of Palestine, to the Roman province of Syria.

Joppa is mentioned several times in the Acts of the Apostles (9 36-43, see DORCAS; 10 5 23 11 5, see CORNELIUS). No better place could be imagined for the vision assigned by the historian, rightly or wrongly, to Peter, which showed that Jews and Gentiles alike were admissible into the fold of Christ. The city, now fanatically Jewish, suffered terribly during the Roman war. It was surprised by Cestius Gallus, who massacred 8400 of its inhabitants (BJ ii. 18 10). Somewhat later, it was repaired by enemies of the Romans, and became a nest of pirates. Vespasian quickly took action, and captured and destroyed the city. The people had fled to their ships, but a 'black north wind' (μελαμβροειον; cp WIND) arose, and the ships were dashed to pieces on the rocks (ib. iii. 9 2-4).

Later Joppa rose from its ashes. In the fourth century it became the seat of a bishopric. During the Crusades it was taken and retaken by Franks and Saracens, and fell into a state of ruin. According to Bäderer (*Pal.*³) 8) the construction of the stone quay dates from the end of the seventeenth century. That may be; but Hasselquist, in 1751, found that it had lately been rebuilt by an Armenian from Constantinople, who also 'erected some stone houses and magazines on the shore.'¹ These, he adds, 'give the place an appearance from the seaside, much preferable to the miserable prospect it formerly afforded.' In 1799 it was taken by the French under Kleber. It had already been surrounded by walls.² Fortifications were erected by the English, and afterwards extended by the Turks. Under the name of Yāfā (Jaffa) it is now an important town, partly from its trade, but still more from the large number of pilgrims passing through every year to Jerusalem; the population is estimated (1897) at over 35,000.

Joppa is built on a rocky eminence 116 feet high, and its name probably means 'the conspicuous'³ (cp

3. Situation, JAPHIA); on such a level beach the small eminence is noticeable. It is etc. only with qualifications that Jaffa can be called a seaport. Josephus (BJ iii. 9 3) remarks that 'by nature Joppa is harbourless, for it ends in a rough beach, straight for the most part, but the two extremities nearly converge, and here there are steep crags and rocks that jut out into the sea.' In fact, the harbour is formed by a ridge of low and partly sunken rocks which run out at a sharp angle towards the NW. from the S. end of the town. Boats can enter it either by rounding the point or by a narrow break in the ledge, and even this by no means pleasurable entrance is often impossible, 'the haven being (with some winds) more dangerous than the open sea.' So Josephus truly states, adding that on the rocks of which he has spoken 'the chains wherewith Andromeda was bound are still shown, attesting the antiquity of that mythus.' Pliny also states that 'in front of the city lies a rock upon which they point out the vestiges of the chains by which Andromeda was bound' (HN 5 14); the skeleton of some marine monster was also shown (see JONAH ii., § 4). Certainly it is probable that the dangerous character of the haven of Joppa was accounted for in olden times by the presence of a dragon, just as a tawny fountain near Joppa was thought to derive its hue from the blood of the monster slain by Perseus.⁴ The sea seemed more alive near Joppa than elsewhere (cp Jos. BJ l.c.), and the living power in certain waters was frequently held to be derived from serpents or dragons. Some may have said that the dragon was actually slain, others that he was merely confined below the sea (cp DRAGON, § 4).

Jaffa is beautiful when viewed from the sea, beautiful also in its surroundings. The orange gardens are modern; but fruit has always been grown in abundance on this rich soil. All the Jaffa fruit has a high reputation, and, as agriculture and viticulture spread, other parts of SW. Palestine will vie with Jaffa. Antiquities are wanting. Dean Stanley's defence of the supposed house of Simon the Tanner (Sinai and Pal., 277 f.) is at least eloquent and chivalrous.

JORAH (יֹרֵחַ); Fürst, 'harvest-born,' cp יֹרֵחַ, 'early (i. e., autumn) rain'; but see below; ογρᾶ [B], ἰωραᾶ [A], -ρηε [L]), a family in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA II, § 9, § 8c), Ezra 2:18 = Neh. 7:24 (HARIPH) = 1 Esd. 5:16 (AZEPHURITH, RV ARSIPHURITH).

'Harvest-horn' (cp יֹרֵחַ, 'autumn') for Jorah and Hariph is certainly wrong. The forms are parallel to Haroeh and Hareph in 1 Ch. 2:51 f., both of which (like REAIAH and possibly ELIHOREPH) come from Jerahme'el. In ἀρσιφουρηθ [B] of 1 Esd. 5:16 (see HARIPH) ἀρσ(ε)φ(ε) = Hariph, and σφρ(ε)θ probably = Hurith, a variant to Hariph. See, however, Guthe (on Ezra-Neh.); E. Meyer, Entst. 144.

JORDAN (יַרְדֵּן; [Olsh. § 215], ἰορδάνη [G]; also -ανης, -avos], -HC -OC [Jos.]), the chief river of Palestine. (See maps to GILEAD and EPHRAIM.)

The name was felt by the Hebrews to be an appellative; hence in prose it almost always has the article.

1. Name. It is most probably of Semitic origin (though Wl. dissents), and may be connected with Syr. yardā 'a lake,' Ar. waradā 'to go down to water' (of cattle), wirādā 'watering-place'; and hence we may explain יַרְדֵּן as 'watering-place,' 'ford.'¹ ἰορδανος was a river in Crete (Hom. Il. 7:136, Od. 3:392).

See further Ew. Hist. 1:245 267; Wl. AT Unters. 186, AOF 422. Of the two traditional explanations, one—that from יַרְדֵּן, 'to descend' (cp OS 169 81 203 98)—has found much acceptance, but we should expect rather the 'swift' or 'sinuous' stream to be the title of the Jordan. The other, from יַרְדֵּן and יַרְדֵּן, as if יַרְדֵּן = יַרְדֵּן meant either 'river of Dan' or 'the river which has two sources, Jor and Dan' (Jer. on Mt. 16:13; cp DAN II, § 2), needs no refutation, though it is perhaps implied by ἰορδάνης. By a coincidence the current Arabic name of the Jordan (es-Serī'a) means 'the watering-place,' or 'the ford' (another Serī'a, from which the Jordan is sometimes distinguished by the addition of el-Kebīra 'the great,' is the Yarmūk, see § 6). The name al-Urdunn, however, is also known (see Kampffmeyer, ZDPV, '92, p. 27).

1. We now understand how P can use the expression יַרְדֵּן יַרְדֵּן, 'the Jordan of Jericho' (Nu. 22:1 26:3 34:15).

2. References. Josh. 13:2, etc.), apparently with a reminiscence of its original use as an appellative ('ford'). Probably the famous fords immediately opposite Tell es-Sultān are meant. In adopting the expression once, and once only, the Chronicler (1 Ch. 6:63 [78]) is conscious that it needs a paraphrase; he therefore adds 'on the E. of Jordan.'

¹ Since the above was written, the author has found that this explanation was first proposed by Seybold, MDPV, '96, p. 10 f. 261.

² AV gives 'Jordan by (also, near) Jericho'; RV 'the Jordan at Jericho' (cp G κατά Ἰερουσαλὴμ). Kautzsch (HS) supplies 'gegenüber' (opposite). But in Gramm. 125 h he recognises that the genitive (יַרְדֵּן) is added to indicate a particular part of the Jordan. Dillmann paraphrases 'that part of the Jordan which touches the domain of Jericho.'

2. Another expression which may now become plainer is יַרְדֵּן הַקָּטָן, EV 'the plain (lit. circle) of Jordan,' Gen. 13:10 f. (see LOT), 1 K. 7:46 (see ADAM, ZARETHAN), 2 Ch. 4:17, or simply הַקָּטָן, EV 'the plain' (Gen. 13:12 19:17 25:28 f. Dt. 34:3 2 S. 18:23), to which corresponds the phrase ἡ περὶ χωρὸς τοῦ Ἰορδάνου in the LXX and in Mt. 3:5 Lk. 3:3. The Hebrew phrase means, according to Buhl (Pal. 112), 'the middle and broader part of the Jordan valley from the S. end of the Dead Sea to about the Wādy 'Ajlūn' (see GILEAD). This view is based on a comparison of Dt. 34:3 ('the circle, even the Plain of Jericho [the city of palm-trees], as far as Zoar') with 2 S. 18:23, 1 K. 7:46. In Dt. 34:3, however, the phrase 'the Circle' (הַקָּטָן; cp PLAIN, 4) certainly appears to have a narrower reference, and the words הַקָּטָן in 2 S. 18:23 and בְּבֵר הַיַּרְדֵּן in 1 K. 7:46 are with good reason suspected of corruption (see MAHANAIM, TEBAH). The primary meaning of the phrase 'the Circle of Jordan' was probably the district between Jericho and ZOAR [q. v.]. This suits not only Dt. 34:3 but also Mt. 3:5, where the phrase 'all the region round about Jordan' (πᾶσα ἡ περὶ χ. τ. Ἰορδ.) seems to mean 'the country near Jericho and the Jordan.'¹

3. In Job 40:23 'Jordan' has been thought to be used as an appellative. Most critics (e.g., Dillmann, Davidson, Duhm) render, 'He is careless though a Jordan break forth upon his mouth,' explaining 'a Jordan' to mean 'a violent outbreak of water.' Considering that the context points to the Nile, this is hard doctrine, and if 'Jordan' were used as an appellative, it should mean 'ford.' Hence Ley and Budde propose to omit יַרְדֵּן as a gloss, and Winckler emends it into יַרְדֵּן, 'Nile' (but whence comes יַרְדֵּן?). Certainly the Nile, not the Jordan, is to be expected, and perhaps we should read thus, יַרְדֵּן כִּי יַעֲרֵב נַיִם, 'he is careless though GIHON (i. e., the Nile, || קָרָר, i. e., the Euphrates) overflow'; for v. 24 see Crit. Bib..

4. In Ps. 42:6 (7) 'from the land of Jordan and the Hermonites' is commonly thought to mean 'the neighbourhood of Dan (Tell el-Kāḏī) or Caesarea Philippi (Bāniās), where the Jordan rises from the roots of Hermon' (Kirkpatrick). This view of the text places v. 6 (7) in a very pleasing light, and adds a fresh and interesting association to the picturesque scenery of the Upper Jordan; but it is of very doubtful accuracy. See HERMONITES, MIZAR.

5. On Jer. 12:5 'the swelling' (AV RV^m, Ew.); or 'the pride' (RV) of Jordan,' see § 6 and cp FOREST, 3 (c).

6. Josh. 3:15. Whether the passage of the Jordan was represented in the earlier form of the tradition as having occurred opposite Jericho, or at a point farther N., such as the ford ed-Dāmīeh (some 16 m. above the ford near Jericho), need not be discussed again (see JERICHO, § 4, 1). The latter view fits in better with the story of Jacob's migration as it now stands (Gen. 32 f.) and with the direction given to Moses in Dt. 11:29 f. (see GERIZIM, § 1 f.). Still, whichever theory we adopt, it remains true that, if the reported passage of the Israelites occurred 'at harvest-time,' it must have synchronised with the overflow of the Jordan. The circumstance that this river overflows the narrow strip of vegetation on each side of its channel at harvest time (i. e., at the latter end of March, cp 1 Ch. 12:15, Ecclus. 24:26), is recalled to the mind of the reader that he may duly estimate the marvel which tradition has reported.²

7. Passing over the references in the lives of GIDEON, DAVID (cp FORD), ELIJAH, and ELISHA, we pause at 1 See Keim, Jesus von Naz. 1:494 (ET 2:231 f.). In Lk. 3:3, however, a wider reference is possible.

² On the legendary character of the narrative cp Wl., Gesch. 2:106 f.

the deeply interesting scene of the baptisms of John in Jordan. It was to the reed-covered banks of this river that the one religious teacher of his time whom none, as Jesus implies (Mt. 11.7), could compare to a reed, summoned his penitents. To a modern observer, indeed, the scenery of the Jordan near Jericho seems the most appropriate that could have been chosen for those solemn events.

At the same time we must not be too sure that Jesus' baptism occurred there. That John baptized at the great ford near Jericho, is likely enough. But that he also baptized at Beth-nimrah (the probable original of the readings 'Bethany' and 'Bethabara' in Jn. 1.28; see BETHANY, § 2), and 'at Aenon, near Salim' (Jn. 3.23, see SALIM), are facts by no means difficult to accept, considering that the new Elijah must have travelled about like the old. And we may reasonably suppose that the scene of Jesus' baptism was in some district more convenient than that of Jericho for Galilæan pilgrims.

Without such inquiries as these, a critical geography of Palestine is impossible; but the historical interest of the Jordan (in spite of the want of great events in political history connected with it) is not seriously affected by them. To us, as well as to Elisha, the Jordan is far more than 'Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus,' more even than 'the great river, the river Euphrates.'

T. K. C.

The physical interest of the Jordan is hardly inferior to the historical. It has been well said, 'There may be something on the surface of another planet to match the Jordan Valley: there is nothing on this. No other part of our earth, uncovered by water, sinks to 300 ft. below the level of the ocean. But here we have a rift more than 160 m. long, and from 2 to 15 broad, which falls from the sea-level to as deep as 1292 ft. below it at the coast of the Dead Sea, while the bottom of the latter is 1300 feet deeper still.'

3. Physical features. No other part of our earth, uncovered by water, sinks to 300 ft. below the level of the ocean. But here we have a rift more than 160 m. long, and from 2 to 15 broad, which falls from the sea-level to as deep as 1292 ft. below it at the coast of the Dead Sea, while the bottom of the latter is 1300 feet deeper still.¹ It was supposed by Burckhardt that the waters of the Jordan originally flowed down the whole course of the depression from the Lebanon to the Gulf of 'Akaba. This view, however, has been rejected by Lartet and disproved by Prof. Hull (see PEFQ, '86, pp. 145 ff.).

'I am disposed to think,' says this eminent geologist, 'that the fracture of the Jordan-Arabah valley and the elevation of the tableland of Edom and Moab on the E. were all the outcome of simultaneous operations and due to similar causes, namely, the tangential pressure of the earth's crust due to contraction—the contraction being in its turn due to the secular cooling of the crust.' 'As the land area was gradually rising out of the sea [at the close of the Eocene period], the table-lands of Judæa and Arabia were more and more elevated, while the crust fell in along the western side of the Jordan-Arabah fault; and this seems to have been accompanied by much crumpling and fissuring of the strata.'² From this time the basin of the Dead Sea must have been a salt lake, the level of which, however, must have varied greatly at different times. In evidence of this we find a succession of terraces of Dead Sea deposits extending around the basin of the sea and far up the Jordan valley.³ The present level of the waters of the Dead Sea having been reached at the close of the Miocene or the commencement of the Pliocene period, no material change can have occurred in the course of the Jordan during historical times. Cp DEAD SEA, § 2.

The valley of the Jordan may be naturally divided into three parts: (a) the Upper Jordan from the Hāšbāni to Lake Hūleh; (b) from Lake Hūleh to the Sea of Galilee; and (c) from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea.

4. Upper Jordan. (a) The reputed sources of great rivers in antiquity were often not the real ones. Though supposed to take its rise at Tell-el-Kādi⁴ (see DAN) and Bāniās⁵ (see CÆSAREA, § 7), the highest perennial source of the Jordan is in the bottom of a valley at the W. base of Hermon, a short distance from the small town of Hasbēyā (2295 ft.) and 12 m. N. of Tell-el-Kādi.

The fountain is in a pool at the foot of a basalt cliff; the stream from it, called Hāšbāni, flows through a narrow glen into the plain, and falls into the main stream about a mile S. of the junction of the Leddān and Bāniās. The relative size of the three streams Robinson thus estimates—'That from Bāniās is twice as large as the Hāšbāni; while the Leddān . . . is twice if not three times the size of that from Bāniās' (BR 3395).

The river then flows southward through the marshy plain for 6 m., and then into Lake Hūleh.

Besides the streams mentioned a considerable stream comes down from the plain of Ijon, W. of the Hāšbāni; and two large fountains (called Balāt, and Mellāha), burst forth from the base of the mountain-chain of Naphtali. The Birket er-Rām (i.e., the ancient Phiala), which Josephus (BJ iii. 10.7) asserts¹ to be the source of the Jordan, is at the bottom of a deep basin resembling an extinct crater. According to local tradition, it occupies the site of a village which was submerged to punish the inhabitants for their inhospitality to travellers (cp SODOM AND GOMORRAH). With regard to the morass above Lake Hūleh it is enough to refer to J. Macgregor's entertaining narrative, Rob Roy on the Jordan. That the Lake is not the Mē-Merom (Josh. 11.57), as used to be supposed, may be taken as almost certain (see ZDPV 9.259 348 f.; and cp MEROM, WATERS OF).

(b) On issuing from Lake Hūleh the river flows in a moderate current for about 2 m. On passing through

5. Middle Jordan. Jisr Benāt Ya'kūb ('bridge of Jacob's daughters,' see § 7), however, the banks suddenly contract and become steep. The river now dashes along over a rocky bed in sheets of foam.

Here and there the retreating banks have a little green meadow, with its fringe of oleanthers (a characteristic plant) all wet and glistening with spray. Thus it rushes on, in its serpentine course, till, breaking from its rocky barriers, it enters the rich plain of Baṭīḥa, where on the left bank stand the ruins of Bethsaida [BETHSAIDA]. The river now expands, averaging some 20 yards in width. Across its channel here and there extend bars of sand, at which it is easily forded. At length the turbid stream reaches the still bosom of the Sea of Galilee, where, for a considerable distance, it is still visible. This gave rise to the Jewish legend (Ber. rabba, 4) that its waters and those of the lake do not intermingle. The fall of the river between Jisr Benāt Ja'kūb and the lake (a distance of only 7 m.) is not less than 689 feet. The total length of the section between the two lakes is about 11 m. as the crow flies.

(c) The Jordan between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea flows through a deep depression (65 m. long)

6. Lower Jordan. called in Arabic the Ghōr (i.e., 'bottom, depth, cavity, valley'), the ARABAH [q.v.], of the Hebrew Bible and the ἀλλύων of Greek writers (e.g., Diod. Sic. ii. 489). The Ghōr is 3 m. wide at its northern end, but gradually expands till it attains a width of upwards of 12 m. at Jericho. Down this broad valley the Jordan has worked out for itself a bed about 20 ft. deeper at the northern end, and 200 ft. towards the Dead Sea; this bed varies from a quarter of a mile to two miles in breadth, and is known as the Zōr. Along its banks is that jungle of semi-tropical trees known in the OT as the 'Pride of Jordan.' The Ghōr itself is to a large extent of exuberant fertility.

On the E. side, N. of the Zerkā (see ЖАРКО), where streams abound, the productivity is great, and the traces of ancient canals S. of that river show that the land was in ancient times well cultivated. And why should not the desert once more 'blossom as the rose'? A number of the affluents of the Jordan would lend themselves admirably to the purposes of irrigation.² It is only at the southern end of the Ghōr, for a few miles N. of the Dead Sea, that the soil is really sterile, being covered with a white nitrous crust, like hoar frost, through which not a blade of grass can possibly spring.

The Jordan issues from the Sea of Galilee, close to the hills on the western side of the plain, sweeping round the little peninsula. The fall of the river is at first 40 ft. per m.; but on entering the plain of Beisān it becomes only 10 or 12 ft. per m.; and farther S. only 4 or 5 ft. A short distance down are the remains of a Roman bridge, whose fallen arches obstruct the stream, and make it dash through in sheets of foam. Below this, says Molyneux, who surveyed the Jordan in a boat in 1847, are several weirs, constructed of rough stones, and intended to raise the water, and turn it into canals, so as to irrigate the neighbouring plain. Five miles from the lake the Jordan receives its largest tributary, the *Serī'at el-Menādīreh*¹ (the Hieromices of Pliny, the Yarmūk of the Talmud), which drains a large section of Bashan and Gilead. This stream is 130 ft. wide at its mouth. Two miles farther is the quaint structure (Saracenic, according to Porter) of the bridge of el-Mujāmi'a. Here Molyneux found the river upwards of 100 ft. broad and 4 to 6 ft. deep.

As described by Porter, the ravine now inclines eastward to the centre of the plain, and its banks contract. Its sides are bare and white, and the chalky strata are deeply furrowed. The margin of the river has still its beautiful fringe of foliage, and the little islets which occur here and there are covered with shrubbery. Fifteen miles S. of the bridge the Wady Yābis (see JABESH-GILEAD) falls in from the E. A short distance above it a barren sandy island divides the channel, and with its bars on each side forms a ford; on the western bank, in a well-watered neighbourhood, the site of SUCCOTH [g.v.] has been placed.

About 9 m. lower down, and about half-way between the lakes, the JABBOK [g.v.], the only other considerable tributary, falls into the Jordan, coming down through a deep wild glen in the mountains of Gilead. After this the jungle of cane, willow, and tamarisk along the banks grows denser, and the plain above more dreary and desolate.

As the river approaches the Dead Sea, the mountain ranges on each side rise to a greater height, and become more rugged and desolate. The glen winds like a serpent through the centre, between two tiers of banks. The bottom is smooth, and sprinkled on the outside with stunted shrubs. The river winds in endless coils along the bottom, now touching one side and now another, with its beautiful border of green foliage, looking all the greener for contrast with the desert above. The banks are of soft clay, in places 10 ft. high; the stream varies from 80 to 150 ft. in breadth, and from 5 to 12 in depth. Near its mouth the current becomes more sluggish and the stream expands. Where the Wady Hešbān falls in, Lynch² in 1848 found the river 150 ft. wide and 11 deep, 'the current four knots.' Farther down the banks are low and sedgy; the width gradually increases to 180 yards at its mouth; but the depth is only 3 ft. Lynch adds that the extraordinary fall in the Jordan is accounted for by its tortuous course. 'In a space of 60 m. of latitude, and 4 or 5 m. of longitude, the Jordan traverses at least 200 m. . . We have plunged down twenty-seven threatening rapids, besides a great many of lesser magnitude.'

The four main affluents are the Yarmūk and the Jabbok on the E., and on the W. the Jālid passing Beisān, and the Fāri'a rising not far from Shechem. The supply of these and other perennial streams, however,

7. Affluents and fords. scarcely balances the loss from evaporation of the river. It is difficult to compute the total number of the fords. According to PEFM 279 225 385 3170 there are 50 fords in the 42 m. of stream above Jisr Dani'ah, and only 5 in the 25 m. below. Some of them have been historically important, e.g., 'Abāra near Beisān (according to Conder, the Bethabara of Origen), Dāmieh on the road from Shechem to Gilead, and the ford of el-Hajla (see below). The bridge called Jisr Benāt Y'a'qūb may also be mentioned (see § 5); it was long the leading pass from Western Palestine to Damascus.³ It is first referred to in 1450 A.D., but as early as the Crusades a

² Lieutenant Lynch made an adventurous boat-voyage in 1848 to survey the Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea.

³ Robinson, BR 2 441; GASm. HG 427 429. The origin of the name is unknown (but see Ritter, Pal. u. Syr. 260 f.). Not far off is a khān now named after the pit of Joseph.

'Ford of Jacob' (Vadum Jacob, Will. Tyr. Hist. 1813) is mentioned. The bridge was probably built during the fifteenth century, when the caravan road was constructed from Damascus to Egypt. At Makhādēt el-Hajla, opposite the Roman Jericho, the annual bathing of the pilgrims takes place (see BETH-HOGLAH and cp Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 314 ff.). There are two fords, one above and one below the bathing-place. They are much deeper than those higher up, and when the river is swollen they become impassable. On the bridges, see Merrill, PEFQ, '79, p. 138 f.

The Jordan valley is a tropical oasis sunk in the temperate zone. It is possible to pass in the depth of

8. Climate. Jerusalem to a delightful summer atmosphere (60°-80° Fahrenheit) at Jericho. In summer the heat is equatorial. The climate of the shores of the Sea of Galilee, though enervating, is less trying; Josephus's panegyric of the natural products of Gennesaret is well known (see GALILEE i., § 4, end).

Josephus, however, does not mention the graceful papyrus (Cyperus papyrus) which flourishes, not only in the marshes of the Hūleh, but also on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee. Here too we find the nakk or dōm tree (Zisypus spina christi), a tropical tree, which abounds all along the lower course of the Jordan. Below the Sea of Galilee indigo is grown, and many trees unknown elsewhere in Palestine crowd the river-banks. In the five oases of the Dead Sea region many products of the tropic zone, including the zakhām, or false balm of Gilead (Balanites Egyptiaca), the gorgeous scarlet Loranthus, the henna (see CAMPHIRE), and the Salvadora persica abound. Balsam (see BALSAM, § 2) has long since disappeared; but in the crusading age sugar was still grown at Jericho. On the 'rose of Jericho' (Anastatica) see Tristram, NHB 477. The plane does not grow any longer at Jericho, but is found at Masada.

To boat voyagers the jungle of the Jordan affords a delightful spectacle of luxuriant vegetation (see FOREST, and cp Lynch, Narrative, 211-215), varied not seldom by tokens of the presence of wild animals.

'At one place,' says Lynch, 'we saw the fresh track of a tiger on the low clayey margin (of Jordan), where he had come to drink. At another time a wild boar started with a savage grunt and dashed into the thicket; but for some moments we traced his pathway by the shaking cane and the crashing sound of breaking branches.' Evidently, however, it was a cheetah, not a tiger, that the voyager observed. The jackal, fox, hyæna, boar, ibex, leopard, and cheetah (the two latter both probably called יַרְדֵּן, see LEOPARD) may in fact easily be met with in the Jordan Valley.

How wonderful, too, is the bird-life of the Jordan Valley! One often notices there Indian, and still oftener Ethiopian species. The butterflies, too, which hover over the flowers in winter are, like the flowers themselves, many of them of Nubian and Abyssinian types. What a garden all this favoured land must have been not merely in the time of Jesus but in the more remote age when the Yahwist (J) wrote the eulogistic description in Gen. 13 10!

JOSEPH [TRIBE] (יוֹסֵף), on name see next article, § 1, one of the constituent parts of Israel in its wide sense.

1. Earliest trace of name. If Joseph was really called a tribe (Nu. 13₁₁, † P; יִשְׂרָאֵל),¹ he differed considerably from the rest of the tribes. He ranked not only with Gad and Zebulun, but also with Jacob and the other ancestral heroes of Israel; indeed he even stands apart from them. As a legendary hero, mainly, he is considered in the next article. Here Joseph is dealt with as a community.

With regard to the name something must be said on the theory of a connection with the place-name Yā-p'-a-rq,² no. 78 in Thotmes III's Rḥnu list. The question is, Can the interpretation of this as a transcription of יִשְׂרָאֵל, first brought prominently forward by Edward Meyer in 1886 (ZATW 6₁ ff.; cp 8₄₁ ff.) and by Groff (Rev. Égypt. 4₉₈ 150 f.),³ be regarded as made out? That 'a-rq may be יִשְׂרָאֵל is admitted: it is a regular and recurrent equation (e.g., no. 110; Bai-ij-ša'-rq). The difficulty, as Meyer admitted, is in the sibilant.

Egyptian š usually represents w (e.g., no. 38; Ša-na-ma = Shunem). The Semitic name would therefore be יִשְׂרָאֵל rather than יִשְׂרָאֵל. Nöldeke, accordingly, has suggested (ZATW 8₄₅ n. 3 [88]) that the Hebrew name to be compared is rather Ishph (יִשְׂפָה, 1 Ch. 8₁₆) which occurs in a genealogy of Benjamin.⁴

There has been a temptation to save the original hypothesis by adopting some conjectural explanation implying differences of pronunciation.⁵

W. Max Müller⁶ thinks it certain that the Rḥnu list embodies names which the scribe had before him in cuneiform, and suggests that although he accommodated his transcription to Canaanite pronunciation where the word or its etymology was known to him, elsewhere he wrote s for š and š for ḥ, following (probably) a northern (Mesopotamian) usage. The name we are considering might, on this theory, have been written in the source employed approximately Yā-a-si-ḥi-ili.

Notwithstanding the prevailing tendency in the contrary direction⁷ it seems for the present more prudent

² See also de Rougé, Rev. archéol., nouv. sér., 4₃₅₅₋₃₇₂ (61). Valdemar Schmidt, Assyriens og Ægyptens gamle Historie, 2₅₃₅ (77), rejects without discussion any connection with the patriarch Joseph.

³ On the view of Petrie, who adheres to š, see next article, § 1.

⁴ Such as that at the time of Thotmes III. the name was pronounced with š and that the ḥ of the Hebrew יִסְרָאֵל is due to a later peculiarity of Ephraimite pronunciation aided perhaps by the explanation from יִסְרָאֵל, יִסְרָאֵל (see next article, § 1). See, however, SHIBBOLETH.

JOSEPH [TRIBE]

to abstain from making any use of the Meyer-Groff hypothesis.¹

The next question is, To what sections of the community was the name Joseph applied, and when? That

2. Application. clear. P tells us that 'the children of Joseph were two tribes (מְנַשֶּׁה), Manasseh and Ephraim' (Josh. 14₄); and a gloss (see below) says the same in 17₁₇. That this was not merely a late notion is shown by its being assumed in the genealogies of J and E. The case of Benjamin is more ambiguous. P excludes Benjamin formally: the children of Benjamin settled between the children of Judah and the children of Joseph (Josh. 18₁₁), with which agrees the southern border assigned to the 'sons of Joseph' (16₁₋₃ P), which is repeated (with modifications) as the northern border of Benjamin (18_{12 f.}, P). That Benjamin was sometimes, however, definitely included in Joseph there can be no doubt (see BENJAMIN, § 1); and that some of the ambiguous cases also may have been meant to include it is possible.

In Josh. 24₃₂ we should probably (Kue., Di.) read not 'sons of Joseph' (MT) but, with B, 'Joseph' [Bab (mg.) AL], —i.e., the hero himself. In Josh. 17₁₄₋₁₈ 'house of Joseph' (read so also in v. 14, with Di.) is not improbably correctly interpreted by the interpolated gloss in v. 17 (om. BBA) of Ephraim and Manasseh. On the other hand, in Judg. 1_{22 f.} 35 there can be little doubt that 'house of Joseph' includes Benjamin, as it certainly does in 2 S. 19₂₀ [22]; and here perhaps would belong the 'Blessing of Jacob' if we should adopt the restoration of Gen. 49₂₂ proposed by Cheyne (PSBA 21₂₄₂ [99]): — 'Ephraim is an ornament for Joseph, Manasseh a bracelet for Israel'; for in v. 26 Joseph seems to be less than Israel—i.e., probably, N. Israel.

It was natural, however, that Joseph should give its name to the whole of the N. kingdom, as England often does to Great Britain: in Amos 5₆ 'house of Joseph' is the N. kingdom, and so in 6₆ 'Joseph.' Perhaps 1 K. 11₂₈ is similar.

In Josh. 18₅ 'house of Joseph' and 'Judah' seem between them to represent the whole of western Palestine. Similarly, in Ob. 18 'house of Joseph' is parallel to 'house of Jacob,' and in Zech. 10₆ to 'house of Judah'; compare Ps. 78₆₇, where Joseph = Ephraim—i.e., Israel. In the other passages in the Psalms the text has been questioned.² 'Remnant of Joseph' (שְׁאֵרֵי יוֹסֵף) in Amos 5₁₅ (on the late date of which see Nowack, ad loc.) reminds one of the still later idea of a Messiah ben Joseph alongside of the Messiah ben David (see EPHRAIM § 10, end, and reff. there).

There is clearly a tendency to apply the name Joseph to the whole of the northern kingdom. Winckler goes further. He holds (GI 2₆₇₋₇₇) that Joseph is not really a tribal name at all, in which capacity Joseph is represented by his son Ephraim. Joseph is a genealogical creation, a personification of the northern kingdom, and therefore older than 'Israel,' the personification of David's kingdom of 'the twelve tribes' (p. 68).³ How-

¹ This is probably now the attitude of Meyer himself (ZATW 8₄₅ n. 3 [88]); cp also W. E. Crum in Hastings, DB 1_{665a}), who mentions with approval Nöldeke's remark that there is a further difficulty in the [probable] fact that יִסְרָאֵל would be pronounced Yausif with au for o. WMM, however, cites against this (in a private letter) the Canaanitish gloss Yā š-ḥi-ili in the Amarna letters. He winds up his recent discussion of the question (i.e.) by saying that the equation Yā-p'-a-rq = יִסְרָאֵל is not proved, but 'probable.' He now says 'possible,' describing as better Winckler's identification with the old Canaanite name Yā-šub-ili (see next art., § 1), which Winckler writes with š (Wl. GI 2₆₈ n. 3).

³ Like Jacob, Joseph has also a mythological significance. As hero of Shechem he is the Baal-berith of the northern confederation, and represents the sun-god to whom the moon and the ever that may be, there is certainly a tendency to equate Joseph and the Ephraimite kingdom. The case of Benjamin, however, requires special study (cp BENJAMIN, MANASSEH). Whatever may be the real facts of the earlier history of that tribe,¹ it appears that in later times it seemed unnatural to regard it as forming part of the same whole as Ephraim and Manasseh.

If, as is frequently supposed, Joseph was an old name for all the clans that settled in EPHRAIM (q.v., i., § 1), this will account for its not being mentioned in the 'Song of Deborah': it is represented by its constituent parts. It seems not improbable that Joseph and Ephraim are simply two names, older and younger, tribal and geographical (see EPHRAIM, § 1), for the same thing (cp also RACHEL).

We have suggested that Ephraim was a younger name than Joseph; but only as the name of a people.

3. Other points. As a geographical name it may have been much older. The question arises accordingly, Were there Israelites in Ephraim before Joseph settled there? We are hardly entitled to find a hint of a theory that this was so in the story of the sons of Leah² dwelling by Shechem (Gen. 37 14b, J) or tending their flocks in the plain of Dothan (v. 17b, E) before Joseph joined them; this may as easily belong to the Joseph-tale. There is more chance of there being a legendary trace of such a theory in the story of Gen. 34 (see DINAH, SIMEON, LEVI, EPHRAIM, § 7 n.; cp Wi. GI 285).

Nor would it be safe to interpret of the tribe what we are told in J of Joseph's having an Egyptian wife.³ In this respect Joseph stands with Jacob and the other heroes of legend, in whose case also the name of the wife is given. This is so even if we should incline to follow Marquart in finding traces of Egyptian names in Josephite clans. The point that the names of Joseph's sons are bestowed not by his wife, as is the custom in the patriarch stories of J and E, but by himself (Gen. 41 51 f., E), may be taken direct from the source that both E and J used (see next article, § 4).

On the notions about the mutual relations as to dignity and status of Reuben, Joseph, and Judah (2 S. 19 43 [44]: with Thenius, read בְּרוּךְ for בְּרוּר, with ^{CH}HAL; and 1 Ch. 5 1 f.) see REUBEN. H. W. H.

JOSEPH [in OT] (יֹסֵף) §§ 53, 79, 84, 'he [i.e., the tribal god] increases,' cp the fuller form יְוֹסֵף, יוֹסֵף (passim).

I. Son of Jacob and Rachel and brother of Benjamin (Gen. 30 22-24), the eponym of the tribe of Joseph (=Manasseh and Ephraim). Tradition

1. Name. connected the name variously with the 'removing' (רָמַח) of Rachel's childlessness (so E; cp Abiasaph, Eliasaph, Asaph), and with her longing for the 'addition' (סָפַח 'let him add') of another son (so J).⁴ If 'Joseph' contains an utterance respecting God, the latter explanation approaches the truth. The multiplication will refer to all the blessings poetically described in Gen. 49 25. Names like Joseph, however, are generally shortened from theophoric names. The analogy of Ishmael and Jerahmeel suggests that 'Joseph' eleven stars bow down. On Winckler's explanation (from the calendar) of the two sons and the advancement of the younger, see MANASSEH.

² The mention of the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah as being not with the sons of Leah (B), but with Joseph, seems to be due to a late hand (Gen. 37 2). The Test. xii. Patr. makes Gad in particular take great blame to himself for ill will to Joseph.

³ For Winckler's mythological explanation, see GI 272.

was originally Joseph-el (cp Josephiah). There is a Palestinian place-name in the Karnak list of Thotmes III. (16th cent. B.C.) which in Hebrew letters might stand as יֹסֵף (popularly, Joseph-el), and which, if rightly so read (see JOSEPH i., § 1), may have been first of all a clan-name (see RP⁽²⁾ 4 48). Pinches too has discovered on a very ancient Babylonian contract-tablet the personal name Yasup-ilu (rather Yašup-ilu), which has some resemblance to Joseph-el.¹

As to Joseph-el, a final decision seems far off. See JOSEPH, i., § 1, and note that Flinders Petrie reads Yeshphar, and identifies the place with es-Sawāfir, S.E. of Ashdod (see SAPHIR), while Tomkins (Life of Joseph, 98) identifies Joseph-el with Yasuf, in a wady E. of Keir Harith and Nebi Nūn (see TIMNATH-SERAH). All most uncertain.

On the ethnic use of the name which in pre-exilic prose means the same as 'Ephraim' in prophetic language—i.e., the tribes of N. Israel² (2 S. 19 20 [21]; 1 K. 11 28), see JOSEPH i., § 2.

In Jos. c. Ap. 1 32 (290) Chaeremon, an Egyptian Greek writer, is said to have spoken of Joseph under the name Πετεσσηφ, and it is plausible to hold that Manetho simply distorts the name 'Joseph' when he speaks (Jos. c. Ap. 1 26 [238]) of the leader of the lepers (see § 11) as Οσαρσηφος or Οσαρσιφ.³ The name Osarsiph is properly a divine name (=Osar-sapi); it denotes Osiris as god of the underworld.⁴ It is possible to interpret Peteseeph 'he whom the god Seph has given,' and to suppose another distortion of Joseph. Still it is very possible that Πετεσσηφ may be a mere clerical error for Περεσσηφ, the Græcised form of the name of Joseph's father-in-law.

The traditional story of Joseph in Genesis (we omit the meagre post-exilic abstract of P) presents a very different aspect from that of Abraham,

2. Traditions. Isaac, and Jacob. The hero is no doubt idealised; but the details of his life are such as, in a more recent biography, we might accept as to some extent an approach to truth; even in such a point as the age of Joseph at his death (Gen. 50 26) the biographer does not overstep the bounds of possibility. How Joseph came to be regarded as the 'son' of Jacob, and how it was that the stream of tradition flowed so much more abundantly for biographers of Joseph than for those of the first three patriarchs, we must consider later (§ 4).

It is evident, however, that, though more credible in its details, the story of Joseph cannot be accepted as genuinely historical, since it comes to us in two forms which do not altogether agree, and neither of the two narratives can be presumed to be on the whole earlier than the ninth or eighth century B.C. It was the life of the founder of his people that the Israelite writer or writers called E had to relate; how could we expect even a moderate degree of what moderns are pleased to call historical impartiality? It would be hardly less absurd to expect a narrative of well-sifted facts from the Judahite writer or writers known as J. The working of popular prejudices, and the plastic influence of the popular imagination, which delights to find anticipations of later historical facts, can readily be discerned, and who that has any sympathy with antique modes of thought could desire it to be otherwise?

In fitting the Joseph-traditions into the general narrative, it was necessary to give some idea of the relative

3. J and E. ages of Joseph and his brethren. Two different views were taken.

It follows from E's account of the births that Joseph was born not long after the sons of Leah, and at most only twelve years after Reuben (Gen. 31 17 41). The fragments of J in Gen. 30, however, leave it open to us to suppose that the interval between the births of Joseph and Zebulun was longer than the fragments of E would incline us to suppose. At any rate, the extracts from the Joseph-section of J represent Joseph as born to Jacob in his old age (37 3 44 20). The notice that he was seventeen years old when he was sold into Egypt (37 2) comes from P, and is due to learned but not authoritative calculation.

This difference of view helps to explain the first chapter in Joseph's composite biography. The two narrators agree that Joseph's brethren conspired together to kill him; but the reason for this step given by E (37 2b 5-11) is the more intelligible the older we suppose Joseph to be. J simply states that the brethren of Joseph hated him because of the partiality for him shown by his father Israel, who had provided him with a 'long tunic with sleeves' (see TUNIC), such as befitted one born to greatness and not to hard toil (37 3, J). Thus the mischief is traced in J to an act of Jacob; but in E we find it accounted for by an act of Joseph, viz., his communication of ominous dreams. In neither case is the act blameworthy according to the writer; it conduces to the accomplishment of Yahwe's great purpose, which is the exaltation of Joseph for the good of his whole family and for that of the country where the Israelites are to sojourn.

The other differences between the two narratives in chap. 37 need not long detain us. That according to J Joseph is sent from Jacob's abode to Shechem is merely a consequence¹ of the statement in Gen. 35 16 21 (J) that Jacob had settled in the neighbourhood of Ephrath (or perhaps Beeroth; see EPHRATH); 'the vale of Hebron' (תְּרֵיבֶרֶת) 37 14, should be 'the vale (or plain) of Beeroth.' Of course, E's account is the more accurate; but J does not alter the tradition that the brothers were from DOTHAN [q.v.], N. of Shechem, on the caravan-route from Gilead to Egypt, when they got rid of their ambitious brother. Nor is the discrepancy between J and E as to the ethnic designation of the merchants who convey Joseph to Egypt (Ishmaelites from Gilead, J; Midianites, E) as important as two other differences: (1) that the spokesman of Joseph's brethren and the averter of Joseph's death is Reuben in E, but Judah in J;² and (2) that, according to E, Joseph was stolen (by the Midianites) out of the waterless cistern into which he had been cast, whilst, according to J, he was sold to the merchants (Ishmaelites) by his brethren. The difference as to the spokesman is of interest as suggesting the N. Israelitish origin of the story as given by E; J's version is, in its present form, not less distinctly of southern origin. The difference as to how the passing caravan obtained Joseph shows the superior skill of E as a narrator. It was important, he considered, to show that Joseph was not rightfully used as a slave.

Chap. 39 is mostly due to J.

Joseph is sold as a slave to an Egyptian,³ who perceives his worth and places him over his household; but his master's wife casts her eyes upon the young man, and makes proposals from which he can escape only by flight. Falsely accused to his master, he is cast into prison. Yahwe, however, gives him favour with the governor, who in his turn sets Joseph over his house.

This plain story, however, is complicated by being interwoven with passages from E. According to these, Joseph was bought by a sāvis (see EUNUCH) named Potiphar, the captain of Pharaoh's bodyguard, who entrusted him with the care of all that he had. A subsequent passage of E refers to Joseph as being in the prison, not for any real or supposed offence, but to attend on two high officers of the Pharaoh who had been confined for some fault in the prison in Potiphar's house.

Chaps. 40-42 are mainly from E. The chief butler and the chief baker in their imprisonment have strange dreams which only Joseph can interpret. Two years later the Pharaoh himself has dreams which, by divine favour, Joseph succeeds in explaining. (Dreams are frequently introduced by E, though it happens that a belief in the significance of dreams was particularly characteristic of Egypt.)¹ Seven years of great plenty are at hand, which will be followed by seven years of famine. Joseph counsels that during the years of abundance a fifth part of the grain should be exacted from the agriculturists and laid up in storehouses. The Pharaoh perceives that a divine spirit is in Joseph, makes him high steward and grand vizier,² and, among other honours, introduces him by marriage into a grand sacerdotal family. Joseph also receives an Egyptian name (41 45, J), and we shall see later (§ 11) that the three Egyptian names in 41 45 have an important bearing on criticism. To the two sons of Joseph, however, born before the famine, pure Hebrew names are given (Gen. 41 50-52).

² In 37 21 [J] 'Reuben' should of course be 'Judah.' The alteration was made by the editor. See Oxf. Hex. 2 59.

³ The words 'Potiphar, a sāvis of Pharaoh, captain of the bodyguard' (39 1), are a harmonistic insertion of R.

Soon the evil years arrive. Joseph's counsel has been carried out, and the Egyptians come to the Semitic grand vizier to buy grain, till their money is exhausted (41 56 47 15, J). By a clever contrivance (the narrative is J's) Joseph obtains for the Pharaoh the proprietorship of the whole land of Egypt, except that which belongs to the priests. Of this, more hereafter (see § 10). Suffice it to remark that though the story in 47 13-26³ can be fitted fairly well into the general narrative (by making it the sequel of the description in 41 55 f.), it shows a new side to Joseph's character which is not altogether pleasing,⁴ and contrasts with the spirit of the fine passage, 'God sent me before you to preserve life' (45 5b, E).

Now comes the true turning-point in Joseph's life. His honours were not for himself alone; they were to prepare the way for the friendly reception of his entire family in Egypt. Driven by hunger, all Joseph's brethren except Benjamin come to Egypt to buy corn, and do obedience to the grand vizier (42 5-7; E, but J at end of v. 7).

Joseph recognizes them, and remembers the dreams of his youth. He affects to regard them as spies. To prove the truth of their story, they must fetch their youngest brother to see him, Simeon remaining in bonds as surety with Joseph. They return home sadly, admitting the justice of their fate (v. 21), and with additional anxiety because the corn and the purchase-money were both unaccountably, in their sacks. They bring the bad news to their father, who querulously answers, 'Joseph is no more: Simeon is no more: it is I (not you) who suffer from these things' (42 36, E). Reuben, however, who has already deserved well by admonishing his brethren (42 22, E), pledges his word that he will bring Benjamin back in safety (v. 37, E).

It is only from a few interwoven passages in chap. 42 that we gather that J also gave a version of the same events. Nothing was said in this of the captivity of Simeon, for, at the beginning of the next long passage from J (43 1-13), it is implied that the only fresh trouble of which Jacob is aware is the necessity for parting with his darling Benjamin.

From 42 38-44 all but a few lines from E referring to Simeon belongs to J, whose dramatic presentation of facts attracted the editor. In a family council respecting the famine, Judah (as before) becomes the spokesman of the brothers. Like Reuben at an earlier point in E's account he pledges his word to his father Israel for the safety of Benjamin (43 8). Jacob gives way with an effort, and Benjamin accompanies the others to Egypt.

They bring double money, and a present for the grand vizier, who, frugally as he lived in general (see 43 16), ordered them to

² Gen. 41 40 (E) should certainly run, 'Thou shalt be over my house, and unto thee shall all my people hearken' (תִּשְׁרָבֵנִי וְכָל־עַמִּי יִשְׁרָבוּ בְךָ).

⁴ It may of course be replied that Joseph felt as a Hebrew, and expended all his generosity on his brethren.

be received hospitably. So three tables are placed, one for Joseph, one for his brethren, and one for his Egyptian guests, who must not eat with Hebrews (v. 32). Joseph lavishes attentions on Benjamin, his mother's son. Then he deliberately subjects his brethren to a fresh trial, though it is as much as he can do to restrain his emotion. To some extent indeed he has prepared them for it. For the mysterious return of the corn money on their former visit, which so much perplexed and affrighted them, was due to an order of Joseph. Once more the astute Hebrew vizier causes the money to be replaced in the sacks, and in Benjamin's sack he has his own silver divining-cup¹ deposited; by this means he seeks to awaken their consciousness of guilt (44 17, J). Then he sends after them, and on their return accuses them by his steward of theft. The riddle has now become harder than ever. Not many hours ago they had been assured by the steward that the money restored on the former occasion was a gift; indeed, even now no difficulty arises out of the replaced money, but only out of the cup. Judah, the chief of the brothers, makes no attempt at justification. 'God,' he says, 'has found out the guilt of thy servants';² but he tells Joseph how their father's life is bound up with Benjamin's, and how certainly he will die if his child does not return, and offers himself as a bondsman in place of Benjamin.

The recognition scene (45 1-15), to which E is a large contributor, need not be repeated here. Jacob is invited to come with his family and his flocks and herds to the province of GOSHEN [g.v.]. His sons, including Simeon and Benjamin, return to Canaan with rich presents, and Israel (J) at once resolves to accept the invitation. E, however, gives us a remarkable detail which is passed over by J. The road from S. Palestine to Egypt started from Beersheba, so closely connected with memories of Isaac. There, E tells us, Jacob offered sacrifices, not to Isaac himself,³ but to 'the God (elōhim) of his father Isaac' (46 1). For the present nothing more is drawn from this writer.

Naturally enough, it is J who tells that Judah was sent on in advance to give Joseph notice of the approach of his father. The Hebrew text of Gen. 46 28 is not, as it stands, quite intelligible; but with the help of G we can with some probability restore the text thus: 'And he sent Judah before him to Joseph to the land of Jarmuth.'⁴ Jarmuth (see § 11) is mentioned repeatedly in the Amarna letters; it was apparently a district in Lower Egypt, either in the Fayyūm or more probably in the E. part of the Delta, in the neighbourhood of Goshen. Here Judah found the grand vizier, who lost no time in preparing his chariot and going up to meet

¹ Apparently J does not conceive divination to be inconsistent with the worship of Yahwē. נָחַשׁ, 'to divine,' is used again by J in Gen. 30 27 (a speech of Laban). See DIVINATION, § 3 [3].

² We are not to compare Ps. 90 8 [9]. The early sin against Joseph presses on Judah's conscience.

⁴ MT has ואת־הורה שלח לפניו אליי־כֹּהֵן לְהוֹרֵת לְפָנָיו נִשְׁנָה; but, as Lagarde, Kautzsch, Socin, and Ball have seen, 'to point out before him, cannot be correct. Ball ('96) would read לְהוֹרֵת לְפָנָיו (ח) סוּסַנְתִּיָּסָא אֲדוּף; but the sentence does not tell us whom Judah was to meet, nor does נִשְׁנָה, 'to Goshen,' follow naturally. Lagarde (GGN, '90, p. 110) and, independently, the present writer (in '80) thought that instead of לְהוֹרֵת לְפָנָיו ח should read לְהוֹרֵת or the like—i.e., 'to Heroopolis.' Heroopolis, as Naville has shown, is ΠΙΘΟΜ [g.v.]; 'Heroo' may perhaps come from the Egyptian ar (= ḥq) 'storehouse' (Store city of Pithom, 7). Lagarde accepts this as the true reading; but too hastily. G's version needs a more thorough inspection. It runs thus in A, τὸν δὲ Ἰουδᾶν ἀπέστειλεν ἔμπροσθεν αὐτῶν πρὸς Ἰωσήφ σὺσαντήσῃ αὐτῷ κούφῳ καὶ Ἡρώων πόλει εἰς γῆν Ραμεσση. What is εἰς γῆν Ραμεσση? It represents γῆ in MT. נִשְׁנָה, however, is nowhere else rendered γῆ 'Paḥu. In spite of Naville's plausible theory (Goshen, 17) that γῆ 'Paḥu. may mean a larger district than Goshen, the present writer holds that G must have read something rather different from MT, viz., לְפָנָיו לְהוֹרֵת. Here לְהוֹרֵת is to be taken as a correction of לְהוֹרֵת (a miswritten fragment), the right reading and the wrong being preserved, as often, side by side. G, however, supposed לְהוֹרֵת to mean 'to Ero'—i.e., 'to Heroopolis'—and לְהוֹרֵת to be miswritten for לְהוֹרֵת—i.e., 'to (the land of) Ramesses.' The true reading of v. 28 probably is ואת־הורה שלח לפניו אליי־כֹּהֵן לְהוֹרֵת לְפָנָיו נִשְׁנָה. ואת־הורה שלח לפניו אליי־כֹּהֵן (v. 28) and נִשְׁנָה (v. 29) are also insertions. In 47 11 'the land of Ramesses' should be 'the land of Jarmuth.'

his father. The meeting is described in few but appropriate words (46 29 f., J), such as that colourless writer P could never have found. If we may give way to the spell of the narrator, and treat the events narrated as historical, we may suppose the meeting to have taken place near one of the Egyptian fortresses on the border of the desert.⁴ After this, according to J, the whole party went up to the court, and Jacob and five of his brethren were presented to the Pharaoh² (Gen. 47 2-4, J). A remarkable honour, for we have just been told (46 34) that 'every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians.'³ The Priestly Writer, generally so concise, even gives us a conversation held by Jacob with the Pharaoh (Gen. 46 7-10). The patriarch speaks in the tone of Ps. 90 10 [11],⁴ and as Jacob goes out, like a superior being, he blesses the Egyptian king.

Both J and E described the last meeting of Joseph and his father. It was specially important to record the blessing of Joseph's two sons (48 8-10, JE) and the oath exacted by Jacob from Joseph (cp STAFF) that he would bury him, not in Egypt, but in the grave which he (Jacob) had dug for himself in the land of Canaan⁵ (50 5). Jacob on his side promised that Joseph should return to Canaan and occupy the finely-situated hill of SHECHEM (48 22, E). Upon Jacob's death his son performed all the requisite funeral rites (see ABEL-MIZRAIM), both Egyptian and Hebrew, and then returned with his brethren, whom he continued to treat magnanimously till he died at the ideal age of 110 (see § 10).

We have seen that the pre-exilic story of Joseph is made up of portions of two distinct biographies which have been skillfully welded together by a redactor. This is a fact of much importance. Since there are two records, and these (as will appear) are equally accurate in their Egyptian colouring, we may assume that there was a still earlier document from which both J and E drew.

It may be asked, Can we fix the dates of J and E, looking simply at their respective lives of Joseph? (By J and E we mean here members of the schools of writing denoted respectively by the letters J and E.) We may presume that J (or better J₂) lived after the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.), for otherwise, being a Judahite writer, he would not have felt free to treat so elaborately a northern legend aiming at the glorification of Joseph. For the date of E (or E₂) we have perhaps a clue in the name Asenath, and at any rate in the name Potiphara in 41 45. Though a name of the type Potiphara has been shown to occur close upon the Hyksos period,⁶ the name referred to (Petu-baal, 'gift of Baal') is only half Egyptian, and the type first becomes frequently represented in the 26th dynasty.⁷ The name Asenath may also be explained as a specimen of a late type of name. It is generally held to be a Hebraised form of Egyptian ns-nt—i.e., 'belonging to [the Saite goddess] Neith'—and if so may indicate that the editor lived in, or shortly before, the period of the 26th or Saite dynasty.⁸ The name, however, is not doubly attested like that of Potiphara (cp 'Potiphar,' 37 36, E), and may not be the form which E₂ wrote. Let us not neglect to be warned by the wrongly read 'Egyptian' names, Anō in Ex, 1 K. 12^{24e} (Swete), and Tahpenes in MT of 1 K. 11¹⁹ (see HADAD).

⁵ Not necessarily MACHEPELAH [g.v.]; 47 30 seems to have been touched by R, to harmonise it with P (49 29-32).

If so, we have nothing to depend upon but the name Potiphra, and this is a very weak basis for a theory. There were learned scribes before as well as after the exile, and such an one may possibly have changed the original name given to Joseph's father-in-law by E₂ into a name of the type which in his own time was more fashionable in Egypt; or perhaps the text may have become indistinct, and the scribe may have corrected the older name in accordance with the fashion of the time.

Next, assuming (as we must) that J and E drew from an earlier Hebrew story, can we form an opinion as to its probable period? This Hebrew story was certainly no mere romance, the scene of which was laid in Egypt. The Egyptian colouring is too profuse, and the details too peculiar, to be altogether ascribed to a Hebrew narrator. We can imagine that a romantic story of the Egyptian sojourn of a Joseph who was merely the eponym of the Hebrew tripe of that name would have presented some Egyptian features. Such a story, however, being mainly a reflection of the fortunes of a tribe, could not have been so deeply infused with Egyptian elements as the existing Joseph-story. It is therefore a reasonable conjecture that that earlier Hebrew story of which we have spoken was based on a still more ancient Hebrew narrative which had no elements of tribal legend and related entirely to an individual, and that those elements in our existing Joseph-story which are most undeniably personal, and by which this story contrasts most strongly with the unhistorical tribal legends of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were present in a purer and of course a more complete form in that ancient Hebrew narrative.

To what extent this most ancient Hebrew tale may have suffered alteration in the course of centuries, it is impossible to say. We may conjecture, however, that it was really based upon facts which, however idealised, were yet truly historical, that it was written not many generations after the events to which it referred, and even that it was derived directly or indirectly from an Egyptian source. The number of Semites in the eastern provinces of Egypt was so large that this Egyptian origin is far from being an extravagant hypothesis. The upper limit of the period within which the Hebrew stories, which seem to have preceded J and E, have to be placed, depends on the date or dates of the events recorded idealistically by the earliest of them.¹

Let us first consider some of the most remarkable phenomena in the Joseph-story (completeness cannot be aimed at) in connection with Egyptian parallels.

5. Egyptian parallels.

a. The close parallelism between Gen. 39⁷⁻²⁰ and the Egyptian tale of Two Brothers has often been remarked. The Egyptian tale is extant in a copy which belonged to Seti II. (19th dynasty), and was probably written early in the 18th dynasty. That such a story could have arisen only in Egypt, it would be too much to assert; in fact, similar stories have been found in perfectly unrelated literatures.² Still, considering that the scene of the tale of Joseph and Potiphra's wife is laid in Egypt, and that the rest of the story of Joseph in Egypt is strongly Egyptian in colouring, it is most plausible to hold that Gen. 39⁷⁻²⁰ is based upon a parallel Egyptian story, though hardly upon the tale of the Two Brothers, for that has to do with peasant life. Such a borrowing would certainly be less surprising than the undoubted fact that in early Christian times an Egyptian monk named Visa, in writing the life of his father Shnūdi, twice imitates the story of the Two Brothers in some one of its forms.

² See A. Lang, Myth, Ritual, and Religion, 2303-308.

b. The rise of Joseph the Hebrew from low estate to the second position in the kingdom has many parallels. Semitic slaves were common at all times in the Nile Valley.¹ Often, for their capacity and fidelity, they were raised to high positions, and became naturalised Egyptians. Meri-Rē, the armour-bearer of Thotmes III., and his brother the priest User-Min, were the sons of an Amorite. We do not hear that they had been slaves; but there is nothing to prohibit the idea; and the chief point to notice in the rise of Joseph is not his having been a slave but his Hebrew origin. So, too, under the Pharaoh Merenptah the office of 'first speaker of His Majesty' was held by a Canaanite named Ben Mat'ana, and in the Amarna Tablets we meet with two Egyptian officials who appear from their names Dudu (דודו) and Yanhamu (ינחם) to be of Semitic origin.

c. That the honours conferred upon Joseph (Gen. 41 42 f.) are such as a newly appointed vizier might well have received, is undeniable. The royal 'seal-bearer' was the chief government official; he was the deputy of the Pharaoh.² The 'garments of linen' (plural), if the story is of Egyptian origin, cannot be right; the first narrator may have referred to the royal apron-garment (the so-called shendi-t) which was worn by others as well as by the king under the Middle and the New Empires.³ 'Garments of byssus' (טָטִי, see LINEN, 7) were not exceptional enough; all Egyptians of rank had to wear them. The 'golden collar' was a highly prized Egyptian decoration; Ahmes, the conqueror of Avaris, won it seven times by special acts of valour.⁴

In the Louvre there is a stele on which the investiture of a grandee with a golden collar is represented to the life. Seti I. presides over the ceremony, and while he makes a speech two officers put a magnificent collar round the neck of Hor-hem, who lifts his arms in token of joy (De Rouge, Notice sommaire, 49; cp Pierret, RP 2 105 f.). See also Brugsch, Gesch. Aeg. 426.

Still we cannot lay too much stress even upon this decoration; at any Eastern court such an honour would have been prized (cp Dan. 5 7²⁹ and see 6. Joseph's NECKLACE). What the meaning of 'he made him ride in the second chariot that he had' (Gen. 41 43) can be, no one has explained.

The text has been injured; we may with some probability restore בְּחֵרֶכֶת הַיָּרִיבִּים, 'in a chariot drawn by choice young steeds.' To both words in this phrase there may have been corresponding Egyptian terms; to the first there certainly was (na-ra-ka-bu-ti); but both were originally Semitic (see CHARIOT, § 1, and cp HORSE, § 1 [5]).

It is more important, however, to note the titles of Joseph's office. 'They cried before him, Abrech' (Gen. 41 43, J). 'He has made me an ab to Pharaoh, and adon of all his house' (45 8, J). Abrech, if the reading is correct, is possibly the Ass. abarakku, a title of a very high dignitary, which like so many other Asiatic words may have passed into Egypt (see ABRECH). More probably, however, the first three letters represent an Egyptian title—viz., friend (חֵרֶךְ)—and in 45 8 'an ab to Pharaoh' should probably be 'a friend of Pharaoh.' Brugsch, it is true, points out that the Egyptian ab meant a person who gave orders in the name of the Pharaoh.⁵ A lower dignitary would be called adon, though Brugsch has once found the title of 'an adon over the whole land' (in connection with the early life of Haremhib, afterwards king).⁶ In any case, however, we could not press this. Adon, if not also ab, is possibly a Semitic loan-word. Adōn is the natural Hebrew word for 'lord'; so also, according to the lexicons, is ab for 'vizier'.¹

For the extent of Joseph's newly given authority we may refer to the descriptions of the two Egyptian feudal lords, Ptaḥ-hotep and Reḥmerē.²

¹ If Reḥmerē does not, like Ptaḥ-hotep, bear the title of royal prince, he was perhaps of even higher rank, since he is called 'the double of the Pharaoh,' animated by his spirit, taking his place in his absence, governing all Egypt like him, addressed by the same titles, and saluted like him by the courtiers. We must not be surprised, therefore, at the royal title given to Ptaḥ-hotep; the prefect of the capital was next to the king the first person in the kingdom.²

Not less remarkable is the abject servility of the letters addressed to Dudu, a high officer of Amen-hotep IV., by Aziri, prefect of the land of the Amorites; it is not easy to decide which is greater, 'the king, my lord,' or 'my lord, my father.'³ Aziri even refers to the king and the grandes collectively as 'my gods' (ilāniya). Does not this remind us of Gen. 41 40, 'Only in the throne will I be greater than thou'?

² With the viziership Joseph combined the office of director of the granaries (Gen. 41 48 f.). This was usually distinct. It was held, e.g., by

7. Granaries. Beka (19th or 20th dynasty), whose sepulchral stele is now preserved at Turin.⁵ Kings' sons did not disdain to hold it.⁶ We know, however, that Reḥmerē (see c), who was a vizier, was superintendent of the storehouses, which from time to time he had inspected. This constant supervision is insisted upon by the real or imaginary princely sage, Ptaḥ-hotep, in his famous collection of precepts. So, too, a chief overseer of the granaries, named Am-n-teh, tells us that he never took rest from his responsibilities. Such at least was the ideal. The magazines had to be carefully guarded and replenished, for on this the life of thousands might depend.⁷ This duty, according to Gen. 41 48 f., Joseph, as an ideal vizier, discharged in person. The scene of Joseph's brethren presenting themselves at the granaries may be illustrated by a wall-painting in the tomb of Reḥmerē already referred to.⁸

We now come to the seven years of famine (Gen. 41 54 ff.). Famines were sometimes confined to Egypt.

8. Famine. On one such occasion, as the decree of Canopus mentions, the reigning Ptolemy imported grain from Syria and Phœnicia. The story of Joseph, however, refers to one which extended to all the neighbouring lands, natives of which came into Egypt to Joseph to buy corn (Gen. 41 57). It used to be thought that a pictorial record of this event was still extant. On the N. wall of the tomb of prince Chnemhotep on the steep height of Beni Ḥasan can still be seen depicted the meeting of thirty-seven Asiatics with the Egyptian prince-governor. It is not, however, a famine but trade that brings them to Egypt, and they are nomads from Arabia, headed by their prince Abesha (see ABISHAI, n. 2), bringing stibium or eye-paint (see PAINT).⁹

In another of the Beni-Ḥasan caves is the tomb of Ameni, one of the feudal princes of the Middle Empire. This magnate is made to relate the chief events of his life, and speaks thus in the conclusion.

'(When) there became years of famine . . . I made to live its inhabitants, making its provision; not became a hungry man in it. . . . When thereafter great rises of the Nile took place, producing wheat and barley, . . . not did I exact the arrears of the farm.'¹ A similar statement is made by a governor named Baba in his sepulchral inscriptions at el-Kāb (end of 17th dyn.); Baba speaks of 'a famine lasting many years,' and Brugsch has recorded his conviction² that the inscription refers to the identical famine of the Joseph-story. Baba at el-Kāb was under the native king Sāknūri III., while Joseph lived and worked, as Brugsch thinks, under one of the Hyksos kings. Of a third famine which has been brought into connection with Joseph it is enough to say that the style of the monument proves it to be not earlier than the Ptolemies. See Wiedemann, Gesch. des Alt. Ägyptens, 68.

We now pass on to the policy of Joseph (Gen. 47 13-26, composite). The statements in vv. 20-26 have some affinity to those of Herodotus (2 109) and 9. Joseph's policy.

Diodorus (1 73), and the probability is that all these stories are the attempts of later generations to account for the fact that the Egyptians handed over a fixed proportion of the harvest to the king. Erman writes thus:—

'Whatever the details may have been, we may accept as a general fact that Ta'a and A'ḥmose exterminated the old nobility very much as the Mamluks obtained the greater part of all the property in the kingdom by the confiscation of the estates of the Mamluks, so the former absorbed the property of the small princedoms. Thus arose those abnormal agrarian conditions found in later Egypt, by which all property, with the exception of the priests' fields, belonged to the Pharaoh, and was rented from the crown by a payment of 20 per cent. In Gen. 47 these conditions are declared to be due to the clever policy of Joseph.'³

The narrator in Gen. 47 is certainly accurate in one part of his statement. The land of the priests was exempt from taxation; no 'inspector of the palace' could enter the sacred domains.⁴ We do not hear, however, that the priests received special 'portions' of provisions from the king; this statement is not confirmed.

One small point alone remains—the age ascribed to Joseph at his death. 'Joseph died, being 110 years old' (Gen. 50 26, J). No Hebrew tale-writer would have written thus. To reach the age of 110 years was every good Egyptian's prayer; it was the favour desired by the high priest Bak-en-Ḥonsu (19th dynasty) when he was 86 years of age.⁵ Ptaḥ-hotep, whose collection of maxims has been called (with doubtful justice) the most ancient of books, says that his virtue has brought him to this advanced age, which few were privileged to exceed,⁶ and a strange reminiscence of this Egyptian belief meets us in the life of another Joseph (see JOSEPH iii., § 10).

10. Joseph's age.

What historical elements are there in the Joseph story? We are prepared by the preceding inquiry to find that there are some, and it will be best to go at once into the heart of the question. Let us notice, then, (1) that several names possibly of Egyptian origin occur in the families of Moses and Aaron and of Joseph. The name of Moses may possibly be analogous to Ramessu, 'child of Ra (Rē)'; the son of Eleazar, commonly called PHINEHAS (g.v.), and a son of Eli bear, according to the prevalent opinion, the same well-known Egyptian name, of which HOPHNI (g.v.) may be a corrupt variation. Eleazar's father, PUTIEL (g.v.), and the Korahite clan called Osir (MT ASSIR) also have been thought to bear, the one a partly disfigured, the other a still completely Egyptian name. HUR, too, the companion of Moses and Aaron, may also possibly be added to the list. The present writer probably stands nearly alone in looking elsewhere for the true explanations of these names. But with such an eminent authority as W. Max Müller on the other side, he will not be so discourteous as to call the above explanations impossible. Certainly, if correct, they tend to justify the theory that the tribe of Joseph and some part of the tribe of Levi once sojourned in Egypt. Whether the story of the selling of Joseph for a slave may be best regarded as an antedating of the reported subsequent oppression, or as a feature of a once extant biography of a Hebrew vizier, is an open question. It should be noticed that from Am. Tab. 55¹¹⁵ it appears that the sons and daughters of the Syrians were sometimes sent to Jarimuta to be sold for corn.¹ Not only Joseph, but in an earlier form of the story also Simeon and Benjamin seem to have been represented as sold into slavery in Egypt, and it has been already noted as perhaps significant that the name of a traditional grandson of Joseph means 'sold' (see EPHRAIM I., § 1; cp. however, MACHIR).

11. Historical elements.

Passing now to Joseph himself, we find that in Manëtho's story of the expulsion of the 'lepers' (Jos. l. Ap. 128), the leader of the 'lepers' is said to be a priest of Heliopolis named Osarsiph (see § 1). The kernel of this story, according to E. Meyer (GA 1270) and Marquart (Chronolog. Unters.), is the virtually monotheistic reform of Aḥu-n-aten (Amen-hotep IV.). A similar story is given by Chæremon (Jos. l. Ap. 132), who gives the names of the leaders of the 'unclean' as Tisithen and Peteseoph. The latter name, in one way or another, may fairly be brought into connection with Joseph (see § 1), and it should be added that Chæremon too connects the story with Amenophis (Amen-hotep).

It becomes natural, therefore, to look for light to the Amarna tablets which are concerned with the period of Amen-hotep III. and Amen-hotep IV.; and we are not disappointed. We find there an important Egyptian functionary, whose name is apparently Semitic, Yanḥamu (i.e., according to Marq. ינחם). He is a rabisu or 'general (?)' who has the control of the magazines of grain in the land of Jarimuta (see § 3), and superintends the affairs of the Egyptian dominion in Palestine.

When the Syrian chieftains and governors have a request to make of the Egyptian king they often add that he need only ask Yanḥamu, who knows the circumstances well. When Rib-Addi of Gebal has grievances against Abd-Aširti of Amurru, he refers them to Yanḥamu (as one of three, 84 34 f.), and he asks the king to say to Yanḥamu, 'Behold, Rib-Addi is in thy power, and anything which happens to him touches thee' (61 40-42). Another time Rib-Addi asks the king to bid Yanḥamu take the field at once with troops (75 59-64 87 173).

These are by no means all the references. Notice too that Yabitiri, commandant of Gaza and Joppa, speaks of having been brought by Yanḥamu to the Egyptian court while still small (214 24-26). Yabitiri seems to have been a countryman of Yanḥamu; but his name, which looks Egyptian (Ra-hotep?), may have been given to him in Egypt.

The latter circumstance is interesting because Joseph too is said to have received an Egyptian name in Egypt; Marquart thinks (677) that the name intended is Zaphtan (זפתן), and that חן represents Aten, the name of the god of the solar disk, worshipped by Aḥu-n-aten. This is not the present writer's view (see ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH); but the theory from which it springs seems to him likely to be correct. Joseph (whose Egyptian name was perhaps Pa-anḥ, or Pi-anḥ,² indicating that 'life'—anḥ—centred in the bearer of the name) is probably an imaginative version of some Semitic courtier of the reforming king Amen-hotep IV. The untranslatable passage in Gen. 41 43, יִצְחָק בְּנֵי יַעֲקֹב אֲמַר, should perhaps be read יִצְחָק בְּנֵי יַעֲקֹב אֲמַר, 'friend of Khu-en-aten' (Che. OLZ, April 1900; cp § 4), and the name of Joseph's wife may perhaps have been 'Anḥnes-aten (so Marq. 677). A daughter of Aḥu-n-aten, who had this name, was married to Tut-anḥ-Amun, the next king but one after Khu-en-aten. 'Potiphara,' too, should probably be corrected into Meri-Ré'; this was the name of the high priest of Aten at the king's new capital of Aḥt-aten (el-Amarna). We have also found reason to suspect the occurrence of another ancient Egyptian name in Genesis, viz., Jarimuta (in Gen. 46 28, see § 3). Marquart's theory that Jarimuta was in the province now called the Fayyūm—a natural depression in the Libyan hills, far more fertile anciently even than it is now—seems not quite so natural as the view which places it nearer to Palestine, in the East of the Delta.¹

² Pianḥi was a priestly name; it was current in the family of the priest-king Hri-hor.

Some such conjectures as the above seem forced upon us in the light of Egyptian history. As to the names, we must not expect too great exactness. W. Max Müller (OLZ, Oct. 1900) objects to ח as the representative of Kh. But the confusion of ח and כ is too common in Hebrew to surprise us. The ח after חן is but a scribe's second attempt to write Aten. As to the impoliteness of choosing the name Aḥu-n-aten, the objection would have more force if an Egyptian story were in question.

The ordinary view that Joseph, if historical, is to be placed in the Hyksos period, is acquiesced in by Flinders Petrie. Ebers, however, who is in agreement with Lepsius, says, 'In the whole section there is nothing which does not exactly fit a Pharaonic court in the best periods of the kingdom, while there is much which can never be reconciled with a Hyksos court, however much Egyptianised.'² A later date, too, makes it easier to believe in the existence of a true tradition as the kernel of the story. Following Marquart, whose brilliant research³ has poured a flood of light on the Joseph-story, the present writer places the great Hebrew vizier now called Joseph in the reign of Khu-en-aten or Amen-hotep IV.

We may now perhaps venture on the statement that there are five distinct elements in our present Joseph-story:—(1) the transformed tradition of a sojourn of the tribe of Joseph in Egypt; (2) the tradition, true in essentials, of a Hebrew vizier under Khu-en-aten; (3) the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, etc. (an imaginative appendage); (4) the narrative (not historical) connecting the changed agrarian law of Egypt with Khu-en-aten's vizier; (5) the narrative (also unhistorical) of the sojourn of the other 'sons' of Israel in Egypt. All these have been skillfully woven together by several Hebrew writers. There is something more, however, to be mentioned—it is the ideality of the whole narrative. None of the Old Testament biographies attracts such universal admiration as the story of Joseph.

See, in addition to the books cited already, F. Vigouroux, La Bible et les découvertes modernes (8), 1806, tom. ii. (for archæology), and the vastly superior article of Driver in Hastings' DB 2 767-775, the archæological exactness of which is not less than its careful treatment of the Hebrew text. What has been omitted here for want of space will be found in this very useful article. That there is room for considerable difference of opinion on the difficult textual and historical questions involved will be readily imagined.

JOSEPH [in NT] (ΙΩΣΗΦ [Ti. WH]). 1. Joseph of Arimathæa. The passages relative to this Joseph should first be compared.

As to his description. Matthew says (27 57), 'a rich man of (ἀπό, belonging to) Arimathæa, named Joseph, who himself had become a disciple of Jesus (ἐμαθητεύθη

1. Description. τῷ Ἰησοῦ.)' Mark (15 43), 'Joseph of Arimathæa (ὁ ἀπὸ Ἀρ.), a noble councillor (εὐσχημῶν βουλευτής), who also himself was expecting the kingdom of God.' Luke (23 50), 'a man named Joseph, who was a councillor (βουλευτής ὑπάρχων), a good and righteous man (he had not given his vote—οὐκ ἦν συνατατιθέμενος—for their counsel and deed) of Arimathæa a city of the Jews, who was expecting the kingdom of God.' John (19 38), 'Joseph of Arimathæa (ὁ ἀπὸ Ἀρ.), being a disciple of Jesus, but a secret one for fear of the Jews.' The Petrine Gospel (3), 'Joseph the friend of Pilate and of the Lord.' Tradition therefore is not entirely unanimous as to the description of Joseph.

In some respects the simplest accounts in our Gospels are those of Mt. and Jn. Both agree that Joseph belonged to the wider circle of Jesus' disciples, and Peter probably means the same thing by the peculiar phrase quoted above; and neither Mt. nor Jn. is aware that he belonged to any Jewish council. Mt. indeed says that he was a rich man, whilst Jn. is silent on this point; but the fact that, according to Jn., Joseph in the first instance undertook the whole of the arrangements for burial, and was afraid of the consequences to himself if he avowed his discipleship, proves that Jn., too, must have regarded Joseph as a rich man. The account in Jn. 19.41 f., however, presents one apparent discrepancy from that in Mt. 27 60. Apparent we call it, because it only rests on an inference; but that inference is certainly a very natural one. It appears from Jn. 19.41 f. that the body of Jesus was laid in the sepulchre adjoining the place of crucifixion only because it was 'nigh at hand'; that Joseph happened to be the owner, would be so remarkable a coincidence that the evangelist would surely have stated it. It is true, Mk. and Lk., as well as Jn., are silent as to Joseph's proprietorship of the tomb; but the presumption is that Joseph, who was evidently, according to them, a man of social standing, and would therefore certainly have prepared his own 'long home,' is to be supposed to have taken the body of Jesus to his own new tomb, which was somewhere near Jerusalem.

Is there also a discrepancy between Mk. (and Lk.) and Mt. as regards Joseph's discipleship? According to B. Weiss (Das Leben Jesu, 2. Discipleship. 2 592; Das Matthäusevangel. 574) there is. Mk. 15 43 accurately, though indirectly, states that hitherto Joseph, who was a councillor, had kept aloof from the circle of the adherents of Jesus, whereas Mt. 27 57 expressly affirms that he had become a disciple. Weiss also thinks that Mt.'s description of Joseph as a rich man was due to his desire for a fresh fulfilment of prophecy (Is. 53 9). Here, however, there appear to be several misunderstandings. (1) Joseph was of course not a close 'adherent' of Jesus; but he belonged to that wider circle of disciples which Mt., though less distinctly than Mk. and Lk., presupposes (see Keim, Jesu von Naz. 2 222 f.). (2) Joseph was scarcely a 'councillor' in the sense supposed by Weiss. (3) Neither Mt. nor any other early Christian writer thought of Is. 53 9 as a prediction of Christ's burial.

Let us pause here and ask if thus far the accounts are historical. The statements that the person who arranged

3. Historicity. for the burial of the body of Jesus was a member of the wider circle of disciples, a rich man of Arimathæa (see below, § 5), named Joseph, and that the tomb in which he placed the body of Jesus was his own, is questioned by few critics. These were points which tradition was not likely to have invented. The notion of Strauss that the story of the tomb was suggested by Is. 53 9 is refuted by the circumstance that none of the Gospels, nor any subsequent work of the early Christian period, refers to that passage, the obscurity of which evidently caused great difficulty to the ancient translators.¹ We may at any rate accept as a historical certainty the ἐτάφη ('he was buried') of 1 Cor. 15 4.

We now pass on to the statement of Mk. and Lk. that Joseph was a 'councillor.' If by 'councillor' they both mean 'member of the Sanhedrin,' we are involved in hopeless perplexity.

4. Meaning of 'councillor.' That Joseph was not deficient in courage, is shown by his application to Pilate, for the notion of Evang. Pet. 3 that he was a friend of Pilate is clearly a late fancy. If a member of the Sanhedrin, he must have attended on such an important occasion as the trial of Jesus, and must have spoken for him, and have transmitted the knowledge of this fact and of much more important facts to subsequent generations of Christians. The inevitable inference from Mk. 14 64, however, is that no member of the council was absent, and certainly no one can say that the evangelical tradition of the trial of Jesus has the appearance of exactness. Does it not seem to follow from this that Mk. did not, any more than Mt., suppose Joseph to have belonged to the Sanhedrin—in short, that Lk. must have misunderstood the meaning of βουλευτής? No one can say that the epithet εὐσχημῶν—i.e., 'noble'²—as applied to a member of the Sanhedrin, is at all natural. If, however, we interpret εὐσχ. βουλευτής from a Greek or a Roman point of view, it becomes equivalent to 'a man of high social rank' (= a noble senator), and is quite in place in a work intended mainly for Gentile Christians. Lk. and Jn., however, may easily have misunderstood it.³ John shows special thoughtfulness in dealing with it. He considered, apparently, that he had before him a twofold tradition. According to one version, Joseph of Arimathæa, a rich disciple of Jesus, paid his Master's body the last sad honours; according to another, it was a councillor named Joseph of Arimathæa who did this. He therefore combined the two traditions, only substituting 'Nicodemus' for 'Joseph' as the name of the councillor, for which he had prepared the way by the statement respecting a speech of Nicodemus in the council apparently suggested by the parenthetical remark about Joseph in Lk. 23 51. See NICODEMUS.

Opinions differ (see Keim, Jesu von Naz. 3 513 f.) as to the place intended by Arimathæa. Most probably it is the Ramathaim mentioned

5. Arimathæa. in 1 Macc. 11 34 beside Lydda. See OS 225 12 (ἀραθαίμ σειφα) and RAMAH, 2. From the fact that Joseph possessed a rock-tomb near Jerusalem, we may assume that he had taken up his abode at any rate for a time in the Holy City, and the fact that nothing is heard of him afterwards justifies the supposition that he may afterwards have left Palestine; possibly he was a merchant. It is a weakness, however, in our position, that we are compelled to speculate.

As to the deed of Joseph. As far as regards the entombment itself, not much need be added to what has incidentally been said already. The 6. Joseph's deed. simplest statement is that of Mt.; it is difficult to think that the earliest tradition referred to Joseph's purchase of 'linen' (ἀγοράσας σινδῶνα; see LINEN) for the purpose of enveloping the body. The mention of a garden in Jn. 19 41 may also be mere amplification; the Petrine Gospel (24) says that Joseph's 'own tomb' was called 'Joseph's garden'—apparently the name of a well-known locality in the time of the writer.⁴ The story of Joseph's interview with Pilate is given very simply by Mt., Lk., and Jn. Mk., in his graphic way, lays stress on the 'courage' required for Joseph's act (τολμήσας), and adds that 'Pilate marvelled if he were already dead, and calling the centurion, he asked if he had been any while dead; and when he knew it, he gave the body to Joseph' (Mk. 15.44 f.). None of the Synoptics makes any reference to the fact stated in Jn. 19.31: that the Jews had already asked Pilate that the crurifragium might be performed (see CROSS, §§ 4, 6), and that the bodies of the crucified might then be removed. Yet this certainly makes the whole occurrence more intelligible (cp Evang. Petr. 5). It was not usual, according to Roman law, to grant burial for the bodies of the crucified; hence the need of 'courage' on Joseph's part. That Pilate first of all asked Herod for the body (Evang. Petr. 3-5) is an unpalatable fancy; and the elaborate tale of the imprisonment of Joseph, of his miraculous release and of his baptism by Jesus, after which he is taken by the Lord to Arimathea, are specimens of the inventions of the Acts of Pilate (12.15).

2. Husband of Mary.—The references in the Gospels¹ must be carefully considered. (a) Seven occur in Mt.,

7. References. but all in chaps. 1 f., a section which stands apart from the rest of Mt.'s Gospel, and has nothing answering to it in Mk. or Jn. The most important is that in 1.16, because it refers to Joseph as a person well known by name to the reader as 'the husband of Mary.' In 12.46 (=Mk. 3.31) Mt. mentions the mother of Jesus, but not his father. (b) Mk. nowhere, directly or indirectly, refers to Joseph. (c) Lk. also mentions Joseph seven times, but only in chaps. 1-4. It is true that one of these references is outside chaps. 1-3, a section which (if we put aside 2.1-38 and 4.1-52, which are unique, and 3.1-22, which corresponds to Mt. 3, and is properly speaking outside the prelude of the fuller traditional Gospel) is in the main parallel to Mt. 1 f. In the two narratives which are here called unique, however, the father of Jesus is twice referred to, without being named (2.23, ὁ πατήρ αὐτοῦ, and 2.43 ὁ γονεὺς αὐτοῦ [WH, followed by RV]). The last reference (Lk. 4.22) occurs in a narrative which has evidently been expanded and is less accurate than the tradition given in Mk. 6.1-6 Mt. 13.54-58, and may perhaps be ascribed to the influence of chaps. 1-3 in which Joseph is referred to by name. 'Is not this the son of Joseph' in Lk. corresponds to 'Is not this the carpenter' in Mk., and 'Is not this the carpenter's son' in Mt. (d) In Jn., Jesus is twice referred to as the son of Joseph (1.45 f. 42), in the latter case with the addition, 'whose father and mother we know.'

Thus the evidence that primitive Christian tradition knew anything about the father of Jesus is very slight, and considering the high probability that the narratives respecting the birth of Jesus in Mt. 1 f. Lk. 1.21-39 3.23-38 are partly Haggadic or edifying tales like those in the Protevangelium Jacobi (upon which, indeed, L. Conrady thinks that the infancy narratives are based), partly the offspring of the keen interest which post-exilic Judaism displayed in real and imaginary genealogies (this applies to Mt. 1.1-17 Lk. 3.23-38), it becomes the historical student to confess that the name of the father of Jesus is, to say the least, extremely uncertain.

It would, however, be hasty to assert that there was no element of truth in the expression, 'Joseph the

8. Possible husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ' (Mt. 1.16).²
meaning of Joseph. A hint may perhaps be gained from the two references in Jn. The writer of this Gospel says nothing of the birth of Jesus at Bethlehem-

² The Syriac of the Sinaitic Palimpsest, however, gives 'Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin.' Cp. GOSPELS, § 22.

Judah, and apparently does not accept this particular tradition. He cannot, however (if we regard the gospel as a whole), have been indifferent to the earthly origin of Jesus. Though Jesus was μυογονεῖς (God's only begotten one), yet he 'abode among us,' and the evangelist makes Jesus invite inquirers to 'come and see where he dwelt' (Jn. 1.38 f.). One of these inquirers (Philip of Bethsaida) seeks out (ἐβόηκεν, i.e., finds after seeking) Nathanael, and says, 'We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph.' Elsewhere (6.41 f.) a Galilæan multitude is represented as murmuring at the great 'Rabbi' (v. 25) because he said that he had 'come down from heaven, and gave life to the world' (v. 33-35), although he was 'Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know' (v. 42). Both these passages suggest that 'Jesus bar Joseph' was a common phrase in some forms of the primitive Christian tradition, and the latter passage suggests the inquiry whether there is not a sense in which Jesus could have been the son of Joseph, although the name of the husband of Mary was unknown. The phrase 'the sons of Jacob and Joseph' (Ps. 77.15 [16]) does not mean the men called Reuben, Simeon, Manasseh, Ephraim, etc., nor does 'Shallum the son of Jabesh' (2 K. 15.16) probably mean 'Shallum, whose father, in the strictest sense, was called Jabesh.' On the analogy of such passages 'Jesus the son of Joseph' may mean 'Jesus a member of the house of Joseph' (Zech. 10.6). It is true that the Jewish belief in a Messiah ben-Joseph, the forerunner of the Messiah ben-David, did not exist as a developed scholastic doctrine in the time of Jesus (see MESSIAH), but some of the germs of it may have appeared even then. The primitive Christians certainly seem to have traced Christ's origin to Galilee (see NAZARETH), and to have quoted Is. 9. [8.23] as a prophecy of his Galilæan birth (Mt. 2.23 4.14 f.). Even in the latest of our Gospels we seem to find traces of a division among the Jews in this respect, some affirming that 'the holy one' and 'the prophet' (par excellence) could not proceed from Galilee (Jn. 1.46 7.52¹); others that Jesus was 'the Holy One,' and was spoken of in the law and the prophets, although he was υἱὸς τοῦ Ἰωσήφ, ὁ ἀπὸ Ναζαρετ (Jn. 1.45, and cp 7.52).

According to Mt. 13.55 Jesus, when on a visit to his πατρίς or fatherland (but Syr. Cur. and Lewis, 'his city'), was called ὁ τοῦ τέκτονος υἱός,

9. A carpenter? 'the carpenter's son.' It is true that this was early understood to mean 'the son of Joseph.' Not only does Lk. substitute this phrase in 4.22, but the Sinaitic Palimpsest does the same in Mt. 13.55. The phrase בְּרַ בְּנֵי, however (Bābā Bathrā, 73b), simply means 'a carpenter = בְּרַ בְּנֵי, and, as Mr. N. Herz has already suggested, the phrase, as used in the tradition, may have meant no more than this (cp SON). In this case, Jesus himself is the carpenter, a result which agrees with the statement in Mk. 6.3, and is in accordance with what we should expect and desire. The possibility must be admitted, however, that there has been a confusion between two Semitic roots נָצַר and נָסַר. Elsewhere (see GENNESARET, NAZARETH) it has been shown that a name for Galilee, or for a district in Galilee, was נָצַר or נָסַר, but that this was also written נָסַר or נָסַר. Now the Aram. נָסַר n'sar (Heb. נָסַר* ; cp קִשֹּׁר, 'a saw') means 'to saw,' so that 'Jesus the Nazarene' (Nasarene?) might be taken to mean 'Jesus, the carpenter.' Possibly, or probably, there was a play upon words. A mere carpenter, said the Jews; yes, a carpenter—one of ourselves, said Christ's poor.

10. Later views. The usual opinion that Joseph died before Jesus' ministry began seems to be based on Mk. 6.3; cp 3.31 and parallels.

1. Son of NUN [g.v.], 'attendant of Moses, and one of his young men' (Nu. 11 28; cp Josh. 1 1), traditional leader of Israel in the conquest of Canaan. He is said to have died at the same age as the tribal hero Joseph (110), and to have been buried in his inheritance at TIMNATH-SERAH (Josh. 24 29 f.)—or TIMNATH-HERES (Judg. 2 8 f.)—in the hill-country of Ephraim. In Nu. 13 8 16 he is said to have belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and to have been called Hoshea (see above), until Moses, on sending forth Hoshea among the other 'spies,' changed his name to Jehoshua. According to Budde, Judg. 1 22 states that Joshua accompanied the 'house of Joseph' in its invasion of Mt. Ephraim. Verse 19 a, however, favours MT's reading 'Yahwè,' out of which the reading 'Judah' (ἰουδας Θ AL, etc.) would easily arise. At any rate, 'Joshua,' if correct, ought in this context to be a clan-name.

1 Whence the name Jesus [g.v.]. From the time of the Maccabees onwards the purely Greek name JASON [g.v.] was commonly regarded by Hellenizing Jews as an equivalent of Joshua.

JOSHUA (BOOK)

Perhaps Joshua is another form of ABISHUA, which in 1 Ch. 6 4 Ezra 7 5 is the name of the son of Eleazar, b. Aaron. Eleazar and Joshua are associated in assigning the lands of the Israelites (Josh. 19 51), and the burial-places of the two are mentioned in the same narrative (Josh. 24 29-33), are both in Mt. Ephraim, and both probably contain the name Jerahmeel (see TIMNATH-HERES; PHINEHAS). If so, it was originally the priestly and warlike tribe of Levi that was represented by Joshua. His name is a clan-name, and should perhaps be read Josheba or Abi-sheba (cp Elishua and Elisheba), where Sheba is probably an obscure divine name (see SHEBA). This suggests a probable explanation of Joshua's patronymic. יְנוּ (NUN) may be an abridged way of writing נַחְשׁוֹן (NAHSHON), which is a Jerahmeelite name (cp Timnath-heres).

Even apart from these considerations the historical character of Joshua as an individual is doubtful. It was natural to provide Moses with attendants, and to give a name to the chief of these (Nu. 11 28), who was in training to become Moses' successor. Nor could such a successor have a more suitable name than 'Jehoshua'—cp Eliezer (Ex. 18 4), Eleazar (Ex. 6 23 Josh. 24 33), the names of a son of Moses and of a son of Aaron respectively. Naturally too he would be assigned to the tribe which had the leadership in early times, and if Joseph was originally (as Wi. maintains) a solar hero, it would not be surprising if details of solar-mythical origin attached themselves to the Joshua tradition; note in this connection the name of Joshua's 'inheritance' (see above), if this really means 'portion of the sun.'

At any rate, whether the name 'Joshua' is a pure invention or has its origin in a clan-name, the actions ascribed to Joshua are purely legendary, unless indeed the work of critics on the narratives which relate them is a failure, cp. St. GIL 1 135; We. CH 116 f., n. 1; Wi. GIL 2 96-122. See ISRAEL, § 7; ELDAD; EPHRAIM, § 6; JABIN; JERICHO; JOSHUA ii.

In the Hebrew Bible, Joshua is the first of the four historical books (Josh., Judg., S., K.) which make up the first half of the canon of the Prophets, and are hence called the Former Prophets (נביאים ראשונים).¹

In Greek manuscripts, Josh., Judg., and Ruth are frequently included with the Pentateuch in a codex (Octateuch); in the Latin Church the same books, with the omission of Ruth, are often similarly united (Heptateuch). In all these Josh. immediately follows the Pentateuch; but in the Bible of the Syrian Church this place is given to Job (as the work of Moses), and Josh. stands next in order.

The book of Joshua, in narrating the conquest and settlement of Canaan, records the fulfilment of the promises to the patriarchs and the completion of the great movement of which the Exodus is the beginning; it is thus the necessary continuation of the Pentateuch, and must once have formed part of the same historical work with the preceding five books. In recent critical investigations, therefore, the first six books of the OT (Hexateuch) are usually taken together: the separation of Josh. from the Pentateuch in the Jewish canon was due to the predominance of the legal point of view; the books of Moses were law (Torah), while Josh. was only history. It need not be assumed, however, that the Hexateuch ever formed by itself a complete historical work ending with the death of Joshua; we know it only as part of a more comprehensive history extending from the creation of the world to the destruction of Jerusalem (Gen.-2 K.), in which Josh. is hardly more closely connected with the Pentateuch than with the following books; and the similarity of the redactional phenomena in Dt., Josh., and Judg. shows that this connection is not one of mere sequence.

2. Title and contents. The opinion that Joshua is not only the hero but the author of the book²—if not merely an inference from the title—rests, presumably, upon a theory of Hebrew historiography like that set forth by Josephus (c. Ap. 18).⁴ The book of Joshua begins, immediately after the death of Moses (Dt. 34), with the command of God to Joshua, who had already been appointed Moses' successor (Dt. 31), to cross the Jordan; it relates the conquest and division of Canaan, and ends with the death of Joshua. The book falls naturally into two parts: the invasion and conquest (1-12), and the allotment of the land to the several tribes (13-24). The first part closes with a recapitulation of the Israelite conquests E. and W. of the Jordan (12); the second, with Joshua's parting charges and admonitions (23 f.).

The contents of the book may be summarised thus: crossing of the Jordan; capture of Jericho (1-6); operations against Ai (7 f.); successful ruse of the Gibeonites (9); victory over the coalition of Canaanite kings, subjugation of the South (10); campaign against the king of Hazor and his allies, subjugation of the North (11); recapitulation (12). Division of the land; the trans-Jordanic tribes (13), Caleb (14), Judah (15), Ephraim and Manasseh (16 f.); survey and allotment of the remaining territory to the other tribes, Joshua's own inheritance (18 f.); designation of cities of refuge (20); levitical cities (21); dismissal of the trans-Jordanic contingent (22); last exhortations of Joshua (23); assembly at Shechem, and covenant there; death and burial of Joshua (24).

Throughout the Pentateuch—from the first promise to Abraham down to the vision of the dying Moses on Mt. Nebo—the possession of the land of Canaan is kept steadily in view as the goal to which the history is moving. The critical analysis shows that this is true not only of the actual Pentateuch, but also of all its sources, and of every stage in the redaction.

3. Sources. Thus, in JE (J, E, and JE are all represented), Gen. 13:14-17 15:13-16 26:3 28:13-15 etc. Ex. 38:17 32:13 33:1-3 Nu. 13:17 ff. 14, also JE in Nu. 32 and Dt. 8:1; in D (incl. D₂, R₂), Dt. 8:13-6 7 f. 13 8 21 f. 28 cp also 27:1-8; in P Gen. 17:8-8 28:3 f. 35 11 f. (cp 48:4) Ex. 6:2-8 Nu. 27:18-23 33:50-54 34 f. Dt. 8:9.

It is not conceivable that any of these sources broke off with the death of Moses, at the very moment when the fulfilment of these promises and commands was about to begin; the conquest and settlement of Canaan must have been more or less fully narrated in all of them. On the other hand, the book of Joshua is connected in the closest way, both materially and formally, with the Pentateuch.

Cp Josh. 1:1-9 with Dt. 31:1-8 23; Josh. 1:12-15 with (Nu. 32) Dt. 3:18-20; Josh. 8:30-35 with Dt. 11:29 27:1-8 11-14; Josh. 13 ff. with Nu. 34; Josh. 14:6-15 with Nu. 14:24 Dt. 1:36; Josh. 17:1-6 with Nu. 27:1-11 36:1-12; Josh. 20 f. with Nu. 35 (Di.).

Since, furthermore, the book is obviously composite, it is a natural inference that Josh. was compiled (in the main) from the same sources as the five preceding books; and the critical analysis accordingly set itself to distinguish these sources.⁵ The problem has proved, however, more difficult than might have been anticipated, and upon some important points opinion is still much divided.

The book opens with a deuteronomistic introduction (1), and has a similar close (21:43 [41]-22:6 23); evidence of deuteronomistic redaction is found in both parts of the book—much more abundantly, as would be expected, in the narrative chapters (1-12) than in the statistical account of the possessions of the tribes (13 ff.).¹ It is clear, therefore, that the basis of our book is a deuteronomistic history of Joshua, as that of the following book is a deuteronomistic history of the Judges (originally including Eli and Samuel).² Indeed, the two books are connected in such a way as to suggest that, at one stage of the redaction, at least, they were united in a single work—a deuteronomistic history of Israel from the invasion of Palestine to the establishment of the kingdom.

Josh. 1-12 has come down to us substantially as it was in the deuteronomistic book; the work of the priestly editors is here limited to some minor changes in phraseology and the insertion

5. P's share. of a few verses (4:13 19 5:4-7 10-12 7:1 9:15^b 17-21), some of which may be derived from P (so probably 5:10-12 9:15^b 17-21), whilst others are additions of R₂ or later diaskeuasts. In 13-24 the share of P is much larger; the description of the territories of the several tribes in 13-19 is in great part from this source, as are also the cities of refuge (20) and the catalogue of levitical cities (21:1-42 [40]); 22:9-34 is of still later origin.³

The narrative in the deuteronomistic book is not itself deuteronomistic. As in Judg., it is taken from older sources, the hand of the compiler or editor

6. Older sources. appearing, aside from the introduction and close, chiefly in a consistent heightening of the colours, and in enlargements on the moral and religious aspects of the history.⁴ The materials incorporated by the deuteronomistic historian are not homogeneous; in 13-19 there are considerable fragments of an account of the conquest which, like Judg. 1, represented it, not as the work of Joshua at the head of all Israel, but as slowly and incompletely achieved by the several tribes; and in 1-12 (particularly in 1-9) it is possible to distinguish an older and simpler account of the invasion from a later version of the same story in which a tendency to magnify the events and exaggerate the miraculous character of the history is conspicuous. Since there is a similar relation between J and E in the history of the exodus,⁵ and since, as we have seen above, both J and E must have included the conquest of Canaan, the natural hypothesis is that in Josh. also the older version of the story is derived from J, the younger from E.⁶

To some critics, however, this presumption appears to be refuted by other considerations;⁷ E. Meyer⁸ and Stade,⁹ holding that J knew nothing of Joshua, must for this reason regard J as excluded from the greater part of Josh. 1-12. Kuenen, on the contrary, maintains that the representation of the conquest in Josh. 24:11-13 (E) differs so radically from that in 1-12 as to prevent our ascribing any considerable part of these chapters to that source.¹⁰ Kuenen also thinks that the diverse materials have been more completely fused than is common in the Pentateuch; in 2-5 they can in part be distinguished, but in 6-11 they are inseparable.

The reasons urged for the exclusion of J or E from the analysis do not outweigh the strong antecedent probability created by the relation of Josh. to the Pentateuch, and the impression which the composition of Josh. itself makes. It is no more improbable that the Judæan historians (J) should have adopted Ephraimite traditions about Joshua than that they should have incorporated the legends of the Ephraimite holy places in the patriarchal story.¹ Even if we should admit that the contradiction between Josh. 24:11-13 and the representation in 1-12 is as irreconcilable as Kuenen thinks, E is not such a homogeneous and consistent work that such a discrepancy is inconceivable in it. The question can be decided only by the analysis itself. The difficulty of the analysis arises not so much from the intimate fusion of the sources, which are not more closely united than in many parts of the Pentateuch,—the accounts of the exodus, for example,—but from the fact that the two narratives were originally so much alike, and that the younger version of the story is here dependent on the older.

In chap. 1, the deuteronomistic introduction to the book, a kernel of older narrative (E) is contained in 1. f. 10. f. The deuteronomistic element is not all from one hand;

7. Analysis—Albers ascribes 7. f. 17b 18b to D_B (the author chaps. 1-7. of Dt. 4 29. f.), the rest to D_A (author of Dt. 31-8).² The dependence of the latter element on Dt. is to be noted; 3-5a = Dt. 11 24. f.; 5b 6 9^a dep. on Dt. 31 1-8 esp. 7. f.; 12-16 conn. with Dt. 31:8-20 (not Nu. 32 JE), cp also Josh. 23.

In 2, the story of the spies, the words of Rahab 9b-11 are a deuteronomistic expansion, with reminiscences of Dt. 4:39 (cp Ex. 15) and of Dt. 2:31-3 to, cp also Josh. 5:1; 24 is also deuteronomistic. The main narrative (1-5 in part, 6 8-9a 12-14 18-21) comes from the older source (J); with this is combined a second account (1-5 in part, 7 15. f. 22. f. [E]); 17 is editorial (RJE).

8 2 seems to connect immediately with 10. f. (E); the sending of the spies stood in an earlier place, perhaps before 1 1b (Albers), or before 1 10. f. In the account of the crossing of the Jordan (3. f.), 3 7 4 14 21-24 5 1 are deuteronomistic; 4 6. f. seems to be later; a connected deuteronomistic narrative (Di.) is not to be recognised. The conflation of two sources is apparent; at 8 17 the crossing is completed, in 4 11 the narrative has only reached the same point; in 4 8 (cp 20) the stones are erected at Gilgal, whilst according to 4 9 they were piled up in the middle of the river. The fuller narrative is here from E; remains of the briefer account of J are found in 3 1* 5 10a 11* 13* 14 15b 16aa b 17* 4 3a* b (6a 7a ? RJE), 8aa b (? 17 18 20* ?). Additions to both sources and harmonistic modifications may be recognised; 4 2 3aa seem to be displaced, the words would naturally stand (in E) after 3 8.

5 2. f. 8 9 contain an account (probably from E) of the circumcision of the Israelites; 3 4-7 8a are an editorial amplification (later than G), designed to remove the natural impression of the original narrative, that this was the introduction of the rite; 10-12 is from P; 13. f. from J (the sequel, a plan for the capture of Jericho, is to be sought in G); 15 was introduced by an editor (RJE RD) from Ex. 8, 5, in conformity with the tendency at a certain stage of the redaction to make Joshua the double of Moses.

In 6, the taking of Jericho, Wellhausen's analysis, with slight modifications, is generally adopted; the shorter and simpler narrative, rightly ascribed by most critics to J, is found in (2*) 3* 4* 7 in part, 10 11* 14* 15a 16b 17a 19 20a 20b from וקלי 21 24 26. 4. The other version (E) has been heightened and embellished by later hands; to E₂ may be attributed 5 7a 8aa 20b (Albers); RJE appears in 15b, also (P or R) in 17b 18 24b; R_D in 27; the untimely horn-blowing in 8. f. 13 is probably still later, cp Judg. 7.

Traces of post-exilic hands are found in 7 1 18b 25ba (probably not from P, but merely late variants to JE). The remainder of the chapter, which comes from J, exhibits some redundancies (esp. in 15. f. 24-26, cp G); but these are probably due to repeated redaction rather than to the conflation of parallel narratives; the expansion of Joshua's prayer and the answer (7-12) is also to be ascribed to an editor.

In 8-11 the views of critics diverge even more widely than in the preceding chapters; whilst Hollenberg, 8. Chaps. 8-12. Wellhausen, Meyer, and Stade make the narrative dependent on E, nearly or quite to the exclusion of J, Kuenen and Budde derive it mainly from J (and J₂), and Dillmann, Albers, and Kittel trace both sources through the chapters.

In 81-29 the analysis has very slight clues to work with, and the results are correspondingly uncertain. The chief source seems to be J; the other (E) may be recognised in 10 (traces) 11* 12 14a 16a 17a 18* 19a 20b 24* 25 26 28. 9. The work of redactors is seen in 1. f. chiefly deuteronomistic, but not homogeneous), 7b 8a 8b 22b 24a 27 (RJE RD), 33 R_P.¹ The erection of the altar on Mt. Ebal, 8:30-35, stands in an impossible place; G_B, etc., introduce the passage after 9:2, but with no better connection; Josephus and the Samaritan Joshua (chap. 21) put this ceremony where alone it is historically conceivable, after the completed conquest. The verses are a comparatively recent deuteronomistic addition to the book; they have been enlarged and retouched by still later hands (33; 'the blessing and the curse', 34).²

In 9, the ruse of the Gibeonites, 15c 17-21 are of priestly character; a deuteronomistic hand is seen in 1. f. 9 (except the first words), 10 24. f. 27 in part. There is general agreement that the chief source is J; note the resemblance to Gen. 19:30 ff. 38 (observe esp. Josh. 9 20-27), and the relation to 1 Sam. 21. f. (J). From 10 it appears that E also related that the Gibeonites made peace with Israel; traces of this source are, therefore, perhaps to be recognised in 9 (1. f.) 3a 8 11* 15a 27*, though in themselves these verses might be editorial glosses to J.

In the history of the war in the South (chap. 10), verses 1a 8 8 12a 13a 19b 25 40-43 are deuteronomistic; slight traces of the priestly redaction are also discernible. Since in 15 the Israelite army returns to Gilgal, most critics ascribe 16-27 to another hand; Kittel and others assign 1-11 15 to E (slight contamination in 1. f. 10b), 16-27 to J; but the obvious dependence of 16-27 on 1-11 makes strongly against this partition. Wellhausen regards 16-27 as secondary in JE, Budde as tertiary in J (later than 28-39 43). It is a simpler hypothesis that 15, which should stand after 27, has been misplaced (Masius), presumably in connection with the intrusion of 12-14.⁴ Nothing then stands in the way of attributing 16-27 to the author of 1-11 (E). The poetical prayer of Joshua in 12b 13a is quoted from the old book of songs;⁵ the setting in which the lines now stand is given them by R_D, or perhaps E₂, whose fondness for poetical pièces justificatives has often been remarked; nothing points to J. Vv. 28-39, describing Joshua's further conquests in the South, are obviously secondary, and are usually ascribed to R_D, though there are no decisive indications of authorship—E₂ or RJE would be possible; an underlying source (J₂) is surmised by Kittel and others; 40-42 are a deuteronomistic general summary. J's parallel to the war with Adonizedek and his allies is preserved in an abridged form in Judg. 14-8 (cp also 9-15).

Chap. 11, a counterpart in contents and form to 10, relates the conquest of Northern Palestine. To the deuteronomistic author are attributed 2. f. 12 14. f., perhaps also 6, and touches in 8. f.; 21-23 are of later origin. The chief source in 1-9 is E; fragments of J's parallel to the war with Jabin are combined with the history of the struggle with Sisera in Judg. 4. Vv. 10-20 seem to be a secondary addition to 1-9 (as 10 28-39 is to 10 1-27), probably by E₂ or RJE, subsequently worked over, with the rest of the chapter, by R_D.

Chap. 12 is a résumé of the conquests E. and W. of the Jordan; 2-6 depend on Dt. 3:9-12 14-17 (cp 13); cp Josh. 13:8-12; the superscription of the following catalogue of cities resembles 11 17. Both parts of the chapter are late and without historical value.

In 13-19 we find some fragments of J; 13 13 15 13-19 6 3 16 10 17 11-13 14-18 19 47 (G). These are plainly

9. Chaps. 13-19. taken from a context similar to Judg. 1, and were inserted in their present connection by a late redactor.

13 1 is the introduction in JE to an allotment such as in twice redacted form we have in 18 2 ff.; 8-12 14 (cp Dt. 18 1) are deuteronomistic, cp Dt. 3 Josh. 12:1-6; the description of the unconquered territory in 2-6 is also apparently deuteronomistic, whether by the same hand as 8. f. or not (cp Judg. 3); so probably 7 (cp G). Verses 15-32 (with the title 14b G) are from P and R_P; 21-31 has been worked over. 14:1-5 is from P (cp Nu. 34, esp. 13-17), probably preceded by a general title which now stands in 18 1; the corresponding subscription is 19 51, cp 18 14b (G) 32; 6-15, in its present form deuteronomistic, and related to Dt. 1:19-36, has perhaps a basis of E; cp 15 13-19 (J).

15 1-12 defines the boundaries of the tribe of Judah, 20-62 enumerates the cities and towns in its several regions; the list is probably based on an older (JE) list, traces of which still appear here and there.

In 16. f.⁶ (the territories of Joseph), 16 10 17 11-13 14-18 are from J; 16:1-3 17 1b 2 8 9a 9b are at variance with the presumptions of P, and must in substance be derived from JE (E); the remainder is from P, with additions by R_P (16 4 17 5. f.).

The incompleteness and confusion of chaps. 16. f. compared with 15 (Judah) and 18 (Benjamin), or even with the description of the territories of the Northern Tribes (note the absence of the list of cities in Ephraim and Manasseh), must be attributed to late abridgment; similar abridgment may with good reason be suspected in the account of the conquest (2-11), where we now find nothing about the conquest of Central Palestine.¹

⁵ Budde ascribes this strand in a somewhat different analysis to J.

Chap. 18 f. contain a survey of the land and allotments to the remaining tribes.

18 1 (P or R_p) originally stood before 14 1 (see above); 2-10 (3^b 7 secondary) conflict with the presumptions of P; the obviously unhistorical character of the transaction has led some critics to ascribe the verses as a whole to R_{JE} (Kuenen) or D_A (Albers); but the representation is not D's, more probably the passage is derived substantially from E (Dillmann, Kittel, etc.); the original scene of the transaction was Shechem, which has been supplanted in 1 by P's Shiloh (cp 6 in 24 1). The idea of a division of land by lot (before the conquest) comes from J (Judg. 1, see below, § 13), and is successively heightened by E and P; it may even be conjectured that traces of J's representation have been preserved in 18 5^b; in the present form of the verses both R_{JE} and R_D may have had a hand. In what follows (18 11-19 51), the older source (E) may be recognised, especially in the titles (18 11^b 19 17, and others), further, in 19 9 and 19 49 f.; but it is not possible to partition the material in the lists between E and P, probably because P is here directly dependent upon E; it can only be said that E's description of the territories of the several tribes was in the form of a catalogue of cities (18 9 וְעָרֵיהֶן). V. 51 is P's closing formula for the whole, corresponding to 18 1.

Chaps. 20-22 are composite.

The appointment of the cities of refuge in 20 is from P, supplemented in 3* 4 f. 6a 8 by a very late hand from Dt. 44 1 f. 19; cp 6 2. Chap. 21; 42 [40], cities as-

10. Chaps. signed to the priests and Levites, is also from P; 20 and 21 1-42 [40] correspond to the two parts of Nu. 35, cp Josh. 14. V. 42-45 [41-43], D's conclusion to the occupation of the land, originally followed 19 49 f.; 22 1-6, also deuteronomistic, and dependent on Dt. 31 8-20 (cp Josh. 11 2-15), is the continuation of 21 43-45 [41-43], perhaps not wholly by the same hand; 7 f. is of much later origin.² Chap. 22 9-34 belongs to the most recent stratum in the Hexateuch; its resemblance to P₂ in Nu. 31 32 6-15 and to Judg. 20 has often been pointed out; cp also the late working over of Gen. 34 and Ex. 16.

Chap. 23 is the close of the deuteronomistic book of Joshua, and originally followed immediately on 21 43 [41]-22 6. It not only corresponds in position to the parting exhortations of Moses, Dt. 4 29 f., but so closely resembles them in thought and diction as to raise the question whether they are not by the same author; ⁴ cp also the farewell address of Samuel (1 S. 12).

Chap. 24 contains the similar conclusion to E's history of Joshua.

This conclusion has reached us only in deuteronomistic redaction, which may most certainly be recognised in 10a (cp 23 2), 13 (cp Dt. 6 10), and 31 (cp Dt. 11), and in slighter touches of deuteronomistic colour in several other verses; the seven nations in 11 are editorial (? R_{JE} or R_D); 2a 8 26a are later glosses; 9 6 10a 6a are perhaps also secondary.⁵

The chapter must have been omitted by the author of 23, and restored by a later deuteronomistic editor (cp the case of Judg. 19 17-21). Its résumé of the Elohistic history is of great value. V. 29 f. concludes E's narrative; 32 f., from the same source, is a natural appendix. 6 contains further additions; see below, § 18.

J and E appear in Josh. 1-12 to have been united, not by the deuteronomistic author (R_D) himself, but, as in the Pentateuch, by an earlier

11. Redaction. redactor (R_{JE}); it is not improbable, however, that R_D, like the author of the introduction to Dt., had E separately, and used it, to the exclusion of J, in 10-12 13 f. As in the other deuteronomistic histories, the religious comment and pragmatism which R_D introduced invited expansion by similarly-minded editors or scribes; and the presence of a secondary deuteronomistic element in the book is generally recognised, though it is not always possible to distinguish it with certainty. This secondary stratum is akin to the younger parts of Dt. (esp. 4 29 f.). A peculiar deuteronomistic colour belongs also to the very latest redaction of Josh. The union of the deuteronomistic Josh. with P was the work of R_p; nothing in the method of combination militates against the supposition that it was effected by the same hand as in Nu., though this can hardly be proved. A late addition of haggadic character cognate to Nu. 32 f. etc. is found in Josh. 22 9-34; cp 20. Still more recent, probably, is the mutilation of 16 f. To what stage in the redaction the restoration of 24 and the interpolation of the fragments of J in 13-19 belong cannot be determined. Slight additions and changes in the text continued to be made even after the time of the Greek translation.

The small fragments of P preserved in Josh. 1-12 lead us to suppose that in P the conquest of Western

12. History in P. Palestine was narrated summarily without detail, as was that of Eastern Palestine (P in Nu. 21 f.—the war with the Midianites in Nu. 31 f. is later than P); as in the history of the exodus, P supposes readers familiar with the older narratives. From 18 1 we see that the whole land has been subdued. The congregation (קָהָל) then assembles at Shiloh, and sets up the tabernacle; Eleazar and Joshua, with the heads of families, divide the land by lot to the nine tribes and a half (14 1). The boundaries of the tribal territories, beginning with Judah, are minutely defined, in dependence on an older description with which P is here combined. P's doomsday book has not been preserved intact; for Ephraim and Manasseh little more than the skeleton remains (see above, § 9). It is characteristic that the priest Eleazar everywhere takes precedence of Joshua.

The older of the two chief sources of the deuteronomistic history of the conquest (in our analysis, J) gives substantially the following representation.

13. In J. From Shittim, E. of the Jordan, Joshua sends spies to Jericho.

The spies take lodging with Rahab, who saves their lives and receives in return a pledge of protection when the city is taken. The Israelites encamp on the banks of the Jordan; Joshua orders them to purify themselves for the holy war, and predicts that Yahweh will work wonders for them. They cross the river, the waters being miraculously stayed in their course, so that they pass over on dry ground. See JERICHO, § 4. At Joshua's command they take twelve stones from the midst of the river and set them up at their first halting-place (Gilgal). Joshua has a vision of the 'Captain of Yahweh's host,' who reveals to him a plan for the capture of Jericho. The fighting men march round the city without any demonstration, and return to camp; this manoeuvre is repeated for six days; on the seventh, Joshua gives the signal for assault.

The Israelites storm the city, which is taken by surprise and falls into their hands; ⁴ they slaughter the inhabitants—sparing only RAHAB (q. v.) and her household—and burn the city.

Spies sent to Ai report that it will be easy to take the place; but the division sent against it is badly defeated; Yahweh's anger has been provoked by the Judæan Achan's appropriation of part of the spoils of Jericho, the contagious hērem has infected the whole people; the guilty man is discovered by lot and put to death.

Ai is then taken by a familiar stratagem (cp Judg. 20). The Gibeonites deceive the Israelites by pretending to come from a great distance, and secure the protection of a treaty.

Thus far, in this source, as in later representations, Israel acts as one body, under the leadership of Joshua; after the destruction of Ai the army returns to Gilgal, which is the scene of chap. 9. The remains of J in Judg. 1 (and parallels in Josh. 13 f.) represent the conquest of Canaan as the work of the several tribes independently—Judah and Simeon in the S., Joseph in the central highlands. There also, however, the tribes set out for the subjugation of the interior from the same point in the Jordan valley (Gilgal, Judg. 2 1; cp Jericho, 116); it is assumed that the region which each is to subdue has previously been determined by lot (Judg. 13), and the order in which they shall invade their several territories is decided by the oracle (Judg. 11 f.). Judg. 1 must, therefore, have been preceded by an account of the crossing of the Jordan by the united tribes and the taking of Jericho, and there is thus no conflict between the oldest narrative in Josh. 1-6 and Judg. 1. The operations against Ai (7 f.) present greater difficulty; for, as that city was in the immediate neighbourhood of Bethel, the war against it would seem properly to belong to the particular history of the conquests of Joseph (cp Judg. 122 ff.). Although, however, the historical probability that the taking of Ai was accomplished by Joseph alone must be conceded, it is a hazardous inference that our oldest source must have so narrated it; in fact, both 7 and 9 show that J represented it as the work of all Israel.

¹ Precisely the same stratagem is said to have been employed by the Roman general Domitius Calvinus at the siege of Luna, a fortified town of the Ligurians; see Frontinus, Stratagemata, 32 1.

As has been already noted, J in Judg. 1 supposes that their territories had been assigned to Judah and Joseph, at least, before the invasion; it is possible that this source originally contained a brief description of these territories; the enumeration in Judg. 1 (and parallels in Josh.) of the cities which the several tribes were unable to reduce may be thought to presume such a description. Fragments of J's account of the war (of Judah and Simeon) with the king of Jerusalem and of the war (of Zebulun and Naphtali?) with the king of Hazor are preserved in Judg. 1 and 4; the conquests and settlements of Caleb, Simeon, and the Kenites in the S., and the taking of Bethel by Joseph, are related in Judg. 1 (cp Josh. 1714-18); and it can scarcely be doubted that this source also contained at least brief and summary accounts of the movements of the northern tribes (cp Judg. 130 ff.). The narrative may have closed with a general statement of the incompleteness of the conquest such as underlies Judg. 223 32 (see JUDGES, § 5).

In Joshua, as frequently, the earliest written account has determined all the subsequent representations.

14. In E. The second chief source of the deuteronomistic history of Joshua is manifestly dependent on the older narrative, whose representation it consistently heightens.¹ Thus, the conquests of Judah and the kindred clans, and of the Galilæan tribes, are ascribed to all Israel in two great campaigns; the gradual subjugation of the Canaanites by the several tribes as it appears in J becomes the complete conquest of Western Palestine by Joshua (corresponding to that of Eastern Palestine by Moses in the same source), and—at least in the later strata of E—the annihilation of the whole native population. For the determination by lot, at Gilgal, of the region to be invaded by the several tribes (J), we have a formal survey, and division of the conquered land, at Shechem, to the seven tribes and a half.² The miraculous element in the history is exaggerated, and takes on a more magical form, as in the crossing of the Jordan (cp JORDAN, § 2 [6]), and especially in the account of the taking of Jericho, where a military stratagem is transformed into a religious procession, and the walls of the doomed city crumble into dust at the blast of the sacred trumpets and the shouts of the people (see JERICHO, § 3). The relation of the younger narrative to the older one here is entirely similar to that which we find in the history of the Egyptian plagues and the crossing of the Red Sea (see EXODUS II., § 3 [ii. iv.]); and this fact strengthens the presumption that the secondary version in Joshua also comes from E. Elements of independent historical value, derived from sources other than J, are not to be discovered in the younger narrative. The special Ephraimite interest appears in the increased prominence given to Joshua.

¹ From the point of view of historical criticism, it is therefore of no consequence whether the second source be E or J.

² It is possible that for this last also there was some point of connection in J.

The redactors naturally adopt E's conception of the history, and exaggerate its unhistorical features, the deuteronomistic author in particular never failing to emphasise the unsparing thoroughness with which Joshua obeys the command to extirpate the Canaanites. The disposition to make Joshua a double of Moses has also been noted.

Behind the oldest account of the conquest (J) lies, as in Gen. and in Ex.-Nu., not a specifically Judæan tradition, but the common Israelite tradition, the product of a fusion which 15. Ultimate sources. doubtless began in the time of the united kingdom, in which the Ephraimite element naturally preponderates over that which is distinctively of Southern origin. In Josh. 2-9 the ultimate basis is probably in large part the local tradition of Gilgal (Stade). (The particular Judæan interest is only occasionally to be discerned, as, e.g., in 1513-19). In this tradition the Ephraimite hero Joshua is the successor of Moses and the leader of Israel in the first period of the invasion; all the tribes cross the Jordan at one time and place;¹ Judah and the allied clans enter their territory from the NE.; the Galilæan tribes were perhaps thought of as following in the wake of Joseph and reaching their seats through the highlands of Ephraim.

The question how far this representation corresponds to the actual facts is one for historical criticism. It is not only antecedently more probable that Caleb and its kindred clans, as well as the Kenites, entered the country from the S.; traces of such a tradition seem to be preserved, e.g., in Nu. 13 f. Whether the same is true of Judah and Simeon (Graf, Kue., Land, Tiele, Doorn., and others) is more doubtful. The lower fords of the Jordan, opposite Jericho, may have been the place of some memorable passage by Israelite tribes; but it is in the highest degree improbable that they all crossed there. The invasion was not even in its first stage a concerted movement; it was a series of irruptions, with varying success, as the catastrophe which befell Simeon and Levi in their attempt on Shechem (Gen. 34 495-7) proves.

Thus even the oldest account of the invasion cannot be accepted without question as embodying a sound historical tradition; it shows very plainly the working of that process of 'concentration' which is observed in all legend, the tendency to ascribe to one man, one generation, one stroke of arms what was in fact the result of a long development.²

Of the age of J there are few definite indications in Josh. The curse laid by Joshua on the site of Jericho

16. Date of J. (626) is connected with something which happened (see HIEL) in the reign of Ahab (circa 875-851 B.C.; 1 K. 1634); the treaty with the Gibeonites is older than the time of Saul (2 S. 21), and may be probably referred to the period of the southward expansion of Joseph (formation of Benjamin) in the preceding century; the imposing upon Gibeon of the supply of wood for the temple—which was, we may surmise, the original meaning of 923, cp 27—would belong to the time of Solomon, who imposed various charges upon the subject Canaanites (1 K. 920-22); cp Judg. 128 30 33 35, and see GIBEON.

In striking contrast to Judg. the Book of Joshua has no chronological scheme.

We are not told how many years were consumed in the subjugation of the land, nor how long Joshua lived after the end of the wars; in both cases we read only that it was 'a long time' (11 18 28 1). From 147 9 f. it may be calculated that from the crossing of the Jordan to the assignment of Hebron to Caleb (after the conquest was completed) there had elapsed seven years; or if, with Josephus, following 6 in Josh. 55, we allow forty full years from the sending out of the spies from Kadesh-barnea to the crossing of the Jordan, five years. Other computations are based upon 1 K. 6:1 (480 years from the exodus to the building of the temple); in this way there were reckoned out for Joshua by the early Christian chronologists 27 years; in Sider Olam, 28; by Josephus, 25; by Eusebius, followed by Africanus, 30. More probably the author of 1 K. 6:1 allowed Joshua 40 years; but there is no trace of this system in Josh.

¹ This, it should be observed, was a necessary consequence of the representation in the Pentateuch, in which Moses leads all Israel to the plains of Moab.

² An instructive parallel to Josh. is found in the Greek legends of the Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus ('return of the Heraclidæ'), partition of the land by lot, etc.

The Hebrew text of Josh. is fairly well preserved. Certain consistent variations in its orthography (יהוה, יהו)

18. Text. Pent. יהוה; קיא fem., Pent. קיא¹ show that the text of Josh. was edited by different hands from the Pentateuch. The Greek version of Josh. was not made by the translators of the Pentateuch;² it is not conspicuously inferior to that of the Pentateuch either in knowledge of Hebrew or in fidelity of rendering. The Hebrew text from which G was made was not very different from MT; but it was free from some of the latest glosses in MT (cp 5:4-7 6:3-5 20:4-6), and sometimes had an intact text where there is now a lacuna in Hebrew (e.g., in 15:59, where the names of eleven cities have fallen out from Hebrew, and 21:36 f. [MT between 35 and 36] where many Hebrew codd. and edd. also insert the missing levitical cities in Reuben); in variations G not infrequently exhibits the better reading. G's additions at the end of chap. 24 are of some interest, especially the last, which seems to show that the author had a book of Judges which began with the story of Ehud (the same connection is made in the Samaritan Josh. chap. 39).³

The Samaritans possess an uncanonical Book of Joshua in Arabic, professedly translated from a Hebrew original.⁴

It begins with the consecration of Joshua as Moses' successor (Dt. 31), after which is narrated (from Numbers) the story of Balaam and the war upon the Midianites

19. Samaritan (in which Joshua is the commander of the Israelite army). Then, with a new title (Here begins the Book of Joshua the son of Nun'), it relates in its own way the conquest and division of the land, to the death of Joshua, and continues to the death of Eli. Setting aside the great interpolation (Shobek, chaps. 26-37), and the appended chapters 45-47 (Nebuchadrezzar, Alexander, Adrian), the chronicle is based solely on the biblical narrative, which it sometimes reproduces verbally, often freely embellishes, and occasionally—especially in the history of Eli and Samuel, whom it makes the arch-apostates—wholly distorts.

This Joshua is a mediæval production and its only value is to the student of the Samaritan sect under Moslem rule.

JOSIAH (יהושפט), Zech. 6:10, 'God supports' [Ges.]; [for another derivation see Hommel, AHT 83; cp Exp. T 8562 (May '97)]; יאחזבאל. The last king of Judah (639-608) before the rapid decline and fall of the state (2 K. 22-23 2 Ch. 34 f.). If the numbers in 21:19 and 22:1 are correct, he was only a boy of eight when 'the people of the land' (i.e., perhaps the men capable of bearing arms)¹ placed him on the throne in succession to his father Amon.

Of the first years of his reign we know nothing. Probably the earlier events recorded in the annals did

1. Early administration. Assyria was no longer troublesome; but we should like to have been informed as to the nature of the cultus in the temple, and as to the Scythian invasion referred to by Herodotus² (1 103-106). In the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign, however, something occurred which affected the redactor very deeply: it was not so much the attention given by the king to the fabric of the temple (the royal sanctuary; cp Am. 7:13), as the 'finding' of a book called ספר יהוה ('the book of direction') in the house of Yahvé. See DEUTERONOMY, § 2 f.

The account of this 'finding' and of the effect it produced on Josiah is very disappointing. The section, 2 K. 22:3-20, contains some passages which were certainly not, as they now stand, in the original narrative; also, it is silent as to various points about which we feel a legitimate curiosity. The next section (23:1-25), which describes the details of the reformation, is much fuller, but by no means free from difficulty. Without an elaborate investigation, we could not adopt from either section more than this—that long after Josiah's accession a recast and development of Yahwistic laws was brought from the temple to Josiah, and that the king adopted it and imposed it by force upon his people, having first of all obtained an endorsement of the authority of the book by a prophethess of high repute (see HILKIAH, 1; HULDAH).

The thirteen years which followed the reformation were monotonously peaceful. No foreign exactions hampered the industry of the subjects, and the king won the highest praise as a just and God-fearing ruler (Jer. 22:15 f.).

This prosperity, however, arose from circumstances which could not last, and in 608 a storm burst upon the little kingdom. It was the imminent

2. Foreign policy. partition of the Assyrian empire that was the cause. Neco II., the young and enterprising king of Egypt, had not forgotten the glories of Thotmes and Rameses, and started soon after his accession to reconquer Canaan, Phœnicia, and Syria. His first object was to lay his hand on the northern territories; the strong southern fortress of Jerusalem he meant to leave till his return. Josiah also, however, appears to have had political plans of a far-reaching character; he was probably not such a pure enthusiast as he is represented in the Old Testament. The mortal sickness of Assyria may have given him hopes of restoring the old Davidic kingdom; it is said that at the time of the reformation he exercised sovereign rights in Bethel and the cities of Samaria (2 K. 23:15-20). This is not impossible, though fuller evidence would be desirable. We may also presume that he was subject to a sad illusion relative to the earthly rewards of righteousness. He had the courage (alone or with allies) to meet the Egyptian king, and we have two accounts of what took place.

¹ Kittel, however (Hist. 2379), explains, 'the party of the country people'; he supposes that the murder of Amon was committed by friends of the reform movement, which ultimately produced the original Deuteronomy.

² On this subject and on the possible allusions to the Scythians in the Books of Jeremiah, Zephaniah, and Ezekiel, see JEREMIAH II., § 20 (i.); SCYTHIANS; and cp Chc. Jeremiah's Life and Times, 30-38; Guthe, GVI 215-217.

The 'father of history' tells us (from Hecataeus) that Neco 'made war by land on the Syrians and defeated them in a pitched battle at Μαγδόλος or Μαγδαλον, after which he took Kadytis, a large city of Syria' (Herod. 2.159). Herodotus must, however, have misunderstood his informants, for Magdolos is obviously the Egyptian ΜΙΓΔΟΛ [g.v.], whither Josiah is not at all likely to have gone to seek Neco. Apparently Herodotus confounds Megiddo with Magdolon, just as he confounds Cadytis-Gaza with the Syrian Cadytis-Kadesh.

The earliest Hebrew account is in 2 K. 23^{29f}. It states that Neco was on his way to meet 'the king of Assyria' (see Schr. CI 243^f.) at the Euphrates when Josiah went to meet him and fell in battle at Megiddo. The account is strangely short, and is unfortunately not free from corruption.¹ A later writer (2 Ch. 35²⁰⁻²⁵), however, gives a fuller narrative. Neco, it is said, sent an embassy to Josiah, explaining that he had no quarrel with Josiah, and that he had been directed by an oracle to go to the Euphrates to battle; Josiah's fate, if he makes opposition, will be due to his own folly. Josiah, however, was bent on war, and though Neco's words were dictated by the true God, he hearkened not to them. A battle ensued in the plain of Megiddo (Jos. Ant. x. 5. 1, says μεθρη [v.l., μηθρη]).² The archers shot at Josiah, and wounded him fatally. He was brought in his second chariot to Jerusalem.

An inspection of this narrative of the Chronicler shows that v. 21 f. (down to 'from the mouth of God') are parenthetical, and the analogy of similar passages suggests that they must have been inserted from in 2 Ch. 35²⁰⁻²⁵, another source. Was that source a trustworthy one? No; it is too clear that the insertion is midrashic and imaginative. The idea of the embassy of deprecation is taken from 2 K. 14^{9 f.; that of the oracle is characteristic of the Chronicler and his circle; that Neco should be represented as in communication with God would not be strange in an age which nourished itself on Jeremiah (cp Jer. 27⁶); but more probably Neco is supposed to have heard of a prophecy of Jeremiah (see 3 Esd. 1²⁸), just as Cyrus is supposed to have done in 2 Ch. 36²³. The speech ascribed to the wounded king is modelled on 1 K. 22³⁴ (see CHRONICLES, § 8).³}

What were the exact circumstances which seemed to justify Josiah in encountering the Egyptian army, we do not know.

W. M. Müller ventures on the conjecture that the Assyrian prefect of Phœnicia and Palestine summoned Josiah and other vassal princes to unite their contingents, and meet the Pharaoh (who had reached Philistia) N. of Carmel. But was Assyria strong enough to give such an order? It would be safer to suppose that independently several Syrian and Palestinian princes combined against Neco under the leadership of Josiah, and that on the plain of Megiddo or Esdraelon they tried their fortune. The bare possibility must, however, be allowed for, that the armies clashed at a spot nearer to Mujédil (one of the Migdals, SW. of Yafa and Nazareth), on the N. of Esdraelon, than to Lejjân (Megiddo) on the S.; Lejjân may have been the place where the hapless king died. This allows us to suppose that Herodotus was correctly informed as to the name of the place of the encounter. Reinach's view (Rev. arch. 27³⁶⁶) that the battle of Magdolon was a slightly earlier one (the opponents of the Egyptians being neither the Jews nor the Philistines, but the Συριοί [Assyrians]), which transferred the western Asiatic Empire to Egypt, and Winckler's defence (GI 1103, n. 2) of the statement of Herodotus,⁴ are on different grounds highly improbable.⁵ Whether Neco went by land or by sea to the neighbourhood of Carmel is disputed: the latter alternative has been generally adopted, but unwisely.⁶ Why Josiah encountered Neco at Megiddo also is doubtful. Probably it was because of the rapidity of Neco's movements, and because he had effected a junction with N. Palestinian allies.

² מִנְהַר of course = מִנְהַר = מִנְהַר. Josephus, therefore, had before him an incorrect Hebrew text. Cp WMM 'Studien z. Vorderasiat. Gesch.' 54, n. 1 in MVG, 98, 3.

⁴ So, too, Hommel, Gesch. des alten Morgenl. 152.

⁵ Against Winckler, see WMM Studien zur Vorderasiat. Gesch. 55 f. (98); against the latter, Prašek, Forsch. zur Gesch. des Alt. 23 f.

The scantiness of our information is to be regretted. Few equally tragic events are recorded in the history of Israel.¹ Probably there were circumstances (not those which Josephus (Ant. x. 5. 1) imagines) which cut the ancient historian to the heart to mention. Whether the 'mourning of HADADRIMMON (g.v.) in the valley of Megiddo' (Zech. 12. 11) refers to the lamentation for the death of Josiah is disputed. At any rate the Chronicler's statement that lamentations were held every year for Josiah seems to be trustworthy (cp the contrast in Jer. 22. 10. 18), even if we hesitate to believe that Jeremiah composed the first funeral dirge. See LAMENTATIONS, § 12.

2. b. Zephaniah, one of the representatives of the Babylonian Jewish communities who brought silver and gold to Jerusalem, temp. Zerubbabel (Zech. 6. 10. 14, according to necessary emendations of those texts). On the whole passage (Zech. 6. 9-15) see ZERUBBABEL.

The words, 'and come thou the same day, and go into the house of' have grown out of a single corrupt or illegible word, the original of which was doubtless וַיָּבֹאוּ. Several attempts were made to read this corrupt word; these were put together by an editor, and some apparent sense made by the insertion of 'the same day, and.' So first Wellhausen, who in Kl. Proph. (2) further tacitly eniends the name 'Josiah' into 'Joshua'. His reason must be that ben Zephaniah is obviously added to distinguish the person intended from some well-known living personage of the same name (presumably the high priest Joshua).

The sole survivor of the massacre of Jerubbaal's (or rather Gideon's) sons—of whom he was the youngest—at Ophrah (see GIDEON, § 1); author of a fable (Judg. 9. 5-21). Strictly, however, the author of the fable of the trees who sought for a king and the sole survivor of the house of Gideon are different persons, the former (of whose name we are ignorant) being more historical than the latter. The writer who first collected the historical tales about Abimelech, king of Shechem, probably knew nothing about Jotham. A subsequent editor, however, wishing to account for the calamities which befel both the people of Shechem and their king Abimelech, represented one of Gideon's sons as having escaped, and as proclaiming a parable in the hearing of the Shechemites (see GERIZIM, § 2), who had assembled to make Abimelech king. 'To this editor v. 5 (escape of Jotham), 6 (popular choice of Abimelech; superfluous after vv. 4-5a) 7-16a 19b 20 f. most probably belong.² His object was to impress upon his readers that the calamities of Abimelech and the Shechemites were a divine retribution, and this he makes still more evident by putting into the mouth of Jotham a curse upon both the guilty parties (v. 20). This done, he gets rid of Jotham by making him flee to Beer (an unknown locality) 'for fear of his (half-)brother Abimelech' (v. 21).

It is the fable which interests us; Jotham is a mere shadow. Some scholars (e.g., Moore) think that it was written by the author of vv. 7-21, with reference to the circumstances of Abimelech. The fable, however, is applicable to Abimelech only in so far as such a bad man was sure to bring misery on himself and on his subjects. To do it justice we must regard it as an independent production, and disengage it from its setting. It is no objection to this that v. 15*b* forms a somewhat abrupt conclusion (Moore). We must not expect too much harmony in a Hebrew apologue; besides, the true closing words may have been omitted. The proof, however, that the fable is not by the author of its setting is in the imperfect parallelism between v. 15*b* and the application in vv. 16*a* 19*b* 20. 'If in good faith you anoint me to be king over you, come and enjoy my protection; but if not, beware of the ruin which I shall cause you'; this is the (present) close of the fable. 'If you have acted in good faith and integrity, making Abimelech your king, much joy may you have from your compact; but if not, then beware of the ruin which Abimelech will cause you, and let him beware of the ruin which you will cause him.' The bramble-king is self-deceived; he thinks that he can protect others, and threatens traitors with punishment. Jotham, however, speaks at first ironically. He affects to believe that the Shechemites really trust Abimelech, and wishes them joy of their bargain. Then he changes his tone. He foresees that they will soon become disloyal, and threatens them with punishment, not, however, for their disloyalty, but because they conspired with Abimelech to commit murder. That the fable, moreover, is inconsistent both with 8*23* and with 9*2*, is also manifest. The idea of 8*23* is that Yahwè's kingship makes any human sovereign superfluous; that of 9*2*, that the practical alternatives are oligarchy and monarchy, and that monarchy is better. On the other hand, the idea of the fable is that kingship is a burden which no noble-minded man will accept, because it destroys individuality. Each noble-minded man is either a cedar, or a fig-tree, or a vine. By developing his natural powers in his allotted sphere he pleases 'gods and men'; it is alien to him to interfere with others.¹ Compare this fable with that of King Jehoash in 2 K. 14*9*. The only facts derived from the annals are that he built the upper gate of the temple—i.e., perhaps, the upper gate of Benjamin (cp Jer. 20*2* Ezek. 9*2*)—and that in his time 'Yahwè began to despatch against Judah Rezin king of Aram and Pekah son of Remaliah' (cp ISRAEL, § 31*f.*, ISAIAH, § 3). JUBILEE, or JUBILE, THE YEAR OF. According to Lev. 25*8-55*, at the completion of seven sabbaths of years, the trumpet of the jubilee 1. Principle (שִׁבְעַת שָׁנִים) is to be sounded and procedure.

'throughout the land,' on the tenth day of the seventh month—i.e., on the great day of atonement. The fiftieth year thus announced is to be 'hallowed,'—i.e., liberty (דְּרוֹר) is to be proclaimed everywhere to every one, and the people are to return 'every man unto his possession and unto his family.' The year in other respects is to resemble the sabbatical year; there is to be no sowing, nor reaping that which grows of itself, nor gathering of grapes (Lev. 25*8-12*). To come to fuller detail,—as regards real property (Lev. 25*13-34*), the law is that if any Hebrew under pressure of necessity shall alienate his property he is to get for it a sum of money reckoned according to the number of harvests to be reaped between the date of alienation and the first jubilee year; should he or any relation desire to redeem the property before the jubilee, this can always be done by repaying the value of the harvests between the redemption and the jubilee. The fundamental principle is that 'the land shall not be sold so as to be quite cut off, for it is mine, and ye are strangers and sojourners with me.' The same rule applies to dwelling-houses of unwallled villages. The case is different, however, as regards dwelling-houses in walled cities. These may be redeemed within a year after transfer; but if not redeemed within that period they continue permanently in possession of the purchaser. An exception to this last rule is made for the houses of the Levites in the Levitical cities. As regards property in slaves (Lev. 25*39-55*), the Hebrew whom necessity has compelled to sell himself into the service of his brother Hebrew is to be treated as a hired servant and a sojourner, and to be released absolutely at the jubilee (vv. 39-43); non-Hebrew bondmen on the other hand are to be bondmen for ever (vv. 44-46). The Hebrew, however, who has sold himself to a stranger or sojourner is entitled to freedom at the year of jubilee, and further is at any time redeemable by any of his kindred,—the redemption price being regulated by the number of years to run between the redemption and the jubilee, according to the ordinary wage of hired servants (vv.

47-55). In addition to these enactments Lev. 27¹⁷⁻²⁵ gives a supplementary law regulating the price of a piece of land that has been dedicated to God according to the distance in time between the date of the dedication and the jubilee year, and also defining the circumstances in which such a piece of land in the jubilee year either reverts to the original owner or permanently belongs to Yahwe. One further reference to the year of jubilee occurs in Nu. 36⁴ in the law as to inheritance by daughters.

As to origin, the law is plainly a growth out of the law of the Sabbath. The foundations of Lev. 25 are laid in the ancient provisions of the Book 2. Origin, date, etc. of the Covenant (Ex. 21^{2ff.} 23^{10ff.}) and in Deuteronomy. The Book of the Covenant enjoined that the land should lie fallow and Hebrew slaves be liberated in the seventh year; Dt. required in addition the remission of debts (see SABBATICAL YEAR). These regulations are in Lev. 25 carried over to the fiftieth year and amplified. The choice of the fiftieth to be the sacred year is evidently in parallelism with the feast of Pentecost which is the closing day after the seven weeks of harvest.

As to the date of the law, this much at least has to be observed, that no evidence of its existence has reached us from pre-exilic times. Certainly in Jeremiah's time the law acknowledged by the prophets was that described in Deut. 15, according to which the rights of Hebrew slave-holders over their compatriots were invariably to cease seven years after they had been acquired. This appears to follow from Jer. 34¹⁴; where note that Jeremiah uses the term שְׁנַת הַחֵרֶת (2v. 15 17, cp v. 8). Another important passage is Ezek. 46^{16ff.}, where there is indication of a law according to which 'the prince' is at liberty to alienate in perpetuity any portion of his inheritance to his sons; but if he give a gift of his inheritance to any other of his subjects, then the change of ownership holds good only till 'the year of liberty' (שְׁנַת הַחֵרֶת), after which the alienated property returns to its original possessor, the prince. Now since Jeremiah makes use of the same expression (חֵרֶת) with reference to the liberation of the slaves in the seventh year it is exceedingly probable that Ezekiel also by שְׁנַת הַחֵרֶת means the seventh year.

This view of the case gives additional probability to the conjecture of Kuenen (Hex. § 6, n. 28 d) and Wellhausen that originally Lev. 25^{8ff.} also had reference to the seventh year. For the law in its present form proves (cp Kue. l.c.) on careful examination to be a revision of an older form which probably belonged to H. Thus this last, besides the injunction about the year of fallow (Lev. 25¹⁻⁷), contained also a precept about the year of liberation (שְׁנַת הַחֵרֶת, Lev. 25^{8ff.}), by which it understood the seventh year as Jeremiah had done. That in the year of jubilee in its present form we are dealing with a purely theoretical development of the sabbath idea which was incapable of being reduced to practice becomes evident from the simple reflection that in the event of such a year being observed there would occur two consecutive years (the 49th and the 50th) in which absolutely nothing could be reaped, and a third (the 51st) in which only some summer fruits could be obtained, sowing being prohibited in the fiftieth. This difficulty, which was perceived even by the author of Leviticus 25 himself (cp v. 22), has led many scholars to make the impossible assumption that the forty-ninth year is the year of jubilee (so, e.g., Ew. Ant. Isr. 375, and Saalschütz, Arch. 2229, following older writers such as Scaliger, Petavius, and others). In order to meet the difficulty Riehm (HWB⁽²⁾, 175^{1ff.}) regards the command about the land lying fallow as one that was originally foreign to the law of the year of Jubilee and one that was never in force. This last character, however, belongs to the whole institution, not merely to this particular part of it. For the post-exilic period also we have evidence of the non-observance of the law. The Talmudists and Rabbins are unanimous that although the jubilee-years were reckoned they were not observed.

As regards the meaning of the name 'jubilee' (שְׁנַת הַחֵרֶת), or simply חֵרֶת, ἐνιαυτός ἀφέσεως or ἀφεσις, annus jubilæi or jubilæus, authorities are not agreed. According to Josephus (Ant. iii. 123), it means λευθερία; but the use of the word חֵרֶת, in Ex. 19¹³ Josh. 6⁵, makes it probable that the name is derived from the trumpet sound with which the jubilee was to be proclaimed; and it is not impossible that the old Jewish traditional view is right when it says that חֵרֶת means a ram—for which there is a probable confirmation in Phœnician—and then, by abbreviation for חֵרֶת יְרֵת, a trumpet of ram's horn. See Dillmann on Ex. 19¹³. שְׁנַת הַחֵרֶת would thus mean the year that is ushered in by the blowing of the ram's horn (Lev. 25⁹).

JUDÆA (יוּדָאָה [BNA, etc., cod. 87 V; Ti. WH]=יְהוּדָה in Ezra 12⁶ Ἰουδαία in Dan. [Theod.]; in Macc. as well as in Ezra-Neh. we find both יוּדָאָה and יוּדָא). The name of the region occupied by the reorganized Jewish community in the Persian, Greek, and Roman periods, but extended by Lk. to the whole of W. Palestine (Lk. 44 [7] 28 5 Acts 29 10 37 etc.).

The limits of Judæa as a province varied at different periods. In the time of Jonathan the Maccabee (145 B.C.) three tetrarchies of Samaria (Aphærema [see EPHRAIM, II.], LYDDA, and RAMATHAÏM) were added to Judæa (1 Macc. 10 30 38 11 34); Judas himself had already expelled the Edomites from Hebron (1 Macc. 5 65). According to Josephus (BJ iii. 3 5), Judæa extended from Anuath-Borkæos (Ἀνωάθου Βορκαίος, now Berküt; PEFQ, '81, p. 48) in the N. to a village called Jorda (Tell 'Arād?) near Arabia on the S., and from Joppa on the W. to the Jordan on the E. The sea-coast, as far as Ptolemais (Acra), with the exception of Jamnia and Joppa, belonged to Judæa, and according to Ptolemy (v. 169) some districts beyond Jordan. The latter statement, however, is not to be adduced in illustration of Mt. 19¹ ('the borders of Judæa beyond Jordan'),¹ because here Mk. 10¹ (Ti. WH) contains the obviously correct reading, καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, 'that is, [first of all] the region beyond Jordan' (cp Mk. 11¹, 'unto Jerusalem and unto Bethany'). It should be noticed, too, that Josephus mentions no trans-Jordanic toparchy. On the death of Herod, Judæa, with Samaria and Idumæa, fell to the lot of Archelaus, as ethnarch; but on Archelaus' deposition his territory was annexed to the Roman Province of Syria (see ISRAEL, § 89). In the fifth century Judæa became part of the division called Palæstina Prima.

Four of the eleven Judæan toparchies mentioned by Josephus and Eusebius are referred to in the Talmud,—Daroma, Geraritica, Gabalena, and Saronā.² Daroma, which corresponds to the biblical Negeb (see Onk. Dt. 34³), had for its centre Lod or Lydda, so that the name Daroma is often used in the Talmud instead of Lod. The Arabs limited the application to a place near GAZA (q.v.)—the Daroma of the Crusaders. The meaning of the other names is clear.

The Judæan table-land is otherwise known as the 'hill-country of Judah'; but Judæa is not confined to this high region; there are districts outside of it which can boast of more varied scenery and of hardly less historical interest.¹ There is first that wonderful depression which bounds Judæa on the E.—the lower Jordan valley and the Dead Sea, beyond which rises the precipitous wall of the mountains of Moab. The three roads into Judæa on this side start from the three oases, Jericho, 'Ain Fešha, and 'Ain Jidi.

Next, the southern border must be studied, not, however, here, but in dealing with that extensive and but lately explored region—the NEGEB (q.v.). Then, for the western boundary we have—ideally the Mediterranean—but really, except at intervals, the edge of the great plateau itself. The low hills of the Shēphūlah [lowland] are separated from the compact range to the E. by a long series of valleys running S. from Ajjalon. This is the western barrier of the hill-country. It is penetrated by a number of defiles, which provide excellent cover for defenders, and opportunity for ambushes and surprises. The importance of Beth-zur (cp BETH-ZUR, KIRJATH-SEPHER) arises from the fact that it is the one fortress on the W. flank of Judæa, S. of Ajjalon, which the physical conditions make possible. In conclusion, the last ten miles of the Judæan plateau on the north form a frontier which was the most accessible side of the Judæan territory, but was well protected by the fortresses of Benjamin. 1. Judah (Yēhūdāh), the eponym of the tribe of Judah, is represented as the fourth son of Jacob by

1. Name. Leah, born at Haran (Gen. 29³⁵). J explains the meaning thus, 'And she said, "Now will I praise Yahwē"; therefore she called his name Judah (Yehudah)'; the saying in Gen. 49⁸ starts from the same favourite Volksetymologie. We may presume, however, that the name (like Isaac, Jacob, and Israel) is a popular adaptation of some fuller form, perhaps Abihud or Ahihud (whence Ehud). It does not, so far as we know, occur in the Amarna tablets. Tiele, indeed, thought we might read it in a letter of Rib-addi of Gebal² (Am. Tab. no. 86⁴²); but Winckler reads here Jada.

One of the most striking characteristics of J is the interest which this writer, or school of writers, takes in

2. Legends in Genesis. Judah. That in J Judah takes the place assigned to his brother Reuben (closely connected with Judah, see § 3) in E in the Joseph-story, has been noticed elsewhere (see JOSEPH ii., § 3). According to Gen. 38, Judah went to Adullam (?) and married the daughter of a Canaanite (?) named Sbua (= Sheba); his three sons were called, Er, Onan, and Shelah. The first-born was married by Judah to Tamar (?); but Er and Onan were wicked, and were slain by Yahwē. As Tamar was not given to the third son Shelah, she found an expedient to become the mother of two sons, Peres (?) and Zerah, by Judah. The other legends relative to Judah (Judges, Samuel) will be most conveniently referred to in § 3. The genealogies of Judah in 1 Ch. 4:1-23 will not be considered here. There is indeed much to reward a critical examination of the puzzles which they contain; but to condense the results of the special articles in a really fruitful way would occupy too much space. See as specimens, BITHIAH, CHARASHIM, HAZELEPONI, JABEZ, JASHUBI-LEHEM, SHOBAI.

It is usually thought that by a special piece of good fortune we have in the legend of Gen. 38, 3. Origin and history. just now described, a tradition respecting the early development of the tribe of Judah. Reading the passage ethnologically we learn that Judah had established itself on the W. side of the 'Hill Country of Judah' in the district of Timnah and Adullam, that the tribe allied itself to the Canaanites, but did not flourish till it united with the tribe of Tamar, which dwelt more to the south.¹ According to Winckler,² however, the story records in legendary form the conquest of Baal-tamar, where was the sanctuary of the original tribe of Benjamin, by David, the leader of the Judahites. Baal-tamar, he thinks, was the place afterwards called, by a strange distortion of the name, Kirjath-jearim. This brings us face to face with more than one deep and difficult problem which this scholar has treated in a strikingly original manner (see KIRJATH-JEARIM, SAUL, TAMAR). We shall return to Gen. 38 later (§ 4, end); it is enough here to repeat that Tamar (תמר, a word which in some other passages too has arisen through textual corruption) as a woman's name is most probably a corruption of some popular shortened form of Jērahmē'elith, just as 'Ir hat-tēmārim (EV 'the city of palm-trees') in Judg. 1:16 is probably a corruption of 'Ir jērahmē'el (see JERICHO, § 2). It was union with the Jerahmeelites (a tribe of Edomitish affinities) that gave vigour to the clan or tribe of Judah; a similar cause seems to be assigned for the expansion of the Jacob-tribe (see JACOB, § 3), and also for the growth of the Isaac-tribe, Abraham representing the Jerahmeelites of Rehoboth, Sarah the Israelites or perhaps Jizrahelites (see JACOB, § 6). In the earliest times indeed Judah, Jerahmeel, Caleb, Kain (Kenites), and Simeon must have closely resembled each other, and probably we should add to the list Reuben, which (cp Gen. 46:12 1 Ch. 4: 5³) had clans closely connected with those of Judah. It was not therefore altogether unnatural for the editor of Judg. 1:10^{f.} to ascribe to Judah the conquest of 'Hebron' or rather REHOBOTH [q.v.] and of 'Debir' or rather Beth-zur (see KIRJATH-SEPHER); in reality these were the achievements of CALEB [q.v.], which did not become one with Judah till the time of David. (On Judg. 1:16 see KENITES.) All the tribes mentioned, including Judah, seem to have adhered for a long time to a nomadic or semi-nomadic mode of life; a large part of the Jerahmeelites remained nomads quite late (see AMALEK, HAM ii., JERAHMEEL, SAUL). It may be remarked here that Reuben (Reubel? see REUBEN) very possibly derives its name from Jerahme'el.

The leader who brought about, at least to a considerable extent, the union of these different clans (so far as

4. David. they were in his neighbourhood at the time of his operations) all of which were outside the Israelitish territory, was David. The steps by which he reached his proud position at the head of a great inland Palestinian kingdom require renewed investigation. He was himself probably a Calebite of Bethuel or Beth-zur—i.e., 'Debir' or KIRJATH-SEPHER [q.v.]. His sister Abigail bears the same name as the former wife of Nabal, which probably is really a tribal name; this might suggest that David's family was aware of a connection with another family called Abigail (or Abihail) settled near Carmel (= Jerahmeel) and Jezreel (cp DAVID, § 1, n. 2, SAUL, § 4, and see below), though it is true that Abigail and Abihail are ultimately traceable to Jerahmeel. If so, like his sister, David strengthened the connection with Jezreel by marriage (see NABAL). In spite of all this neither Caleb nor Jerahmeel supplied the name of the great tribe produced by a combination of smaller tribes—but Judah. No doubt Judah had already been extending its influence (cp Gen. 38), so that David only recognised and acted upon accomplished facts. But it was at first only a small Judah that accepted David as its leader and prince (cp 1 S. 30:26-31, where note that the conquest of 'Hebron' or rather REHOBOTH is presupposed), nor can we say with documentary precision how David became possessed of the territory between the original southern border of Benjamin and the northern limit of the Negeb (see NEGEB). We need not therefore hesitate to accept Winckler's very plausible view that the present narrative of David's adventures during his 'outlaw period' is based upon earlier traditions of a struggle on David's part for the possession of the later Judahite territory. Winckler's interpretation of the details will of course be liable to criticism, partly from the inherent difficulty of the historical problems, but chiefly from the fact that his textual criticism is not as thorough and methodical as could be wished.

According to Winckler the 'Cherethites' and 'Pelethites' are those semi-nomad gentes of the Negeb to which David by his origin belonged; their chief town was Ziklag, from which as a centre they went about making raids under David's leadership. This can hardly be accepted. Though temporarily on friendly terms with the 'Cherethites' and 'Pelethites' David (a searching textual criticism suggests) was afterwards at war with these tribes (i.e., confederations of clans); at a later time again he made friends with them (see PELETHITES). Nor does the text we adopt favour the view that 'Ziklag' was the chief town either of the 'Cherethites' or of the 'Pelethites.' Winckler is also of opinion that in the present narrative of David's earlier career (which is admittedly of composite origin) there have been brought together two widely different legends, one of which gave Adullam (a place in the later Judahite territory) as David's original base of operations, and the other 'Ziklag' in the land of Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2*b*), to which region Achish (who is represented as having been for a time David's liege lord) must also have belonged. Of these two traditions the latter, Winckler thinks, is the original and sole authentic one. Independently, the present writer has arrived at similar but much more definite conclusions on certain points, and the same method which has enabled him to reach greater definiteness on these points has led him to conclusions on points of detail which seem adverse to other parts of Winckler's theory.

As we have said, David was probably not (as Winckler represents) a Musrite, but a Calebite; not 'Ziklag' (Ḥalūṣāh), but 'Debir' (see above) was his home. We cannot put on one side the Bethlehem-tradition quite as readily as Winckler does. 'Beth-lehem' must spring from some more possible name; that name is found—it is Bethuel.

It may be left an open question, however, whether both Beth-lehem and Bethuel (or Bethel) are not broken down forms of a primitive Beth-Jerahmeel. This would account for 'Ephrathite' in 1 S. 17 12, on which name (= Jerahmeelite) see RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM.

Similarly, though 'Adullam' is certainly not David's true starting-point, the name did not spring from the brain of a tradition-monger; עַדּוּלָם, 'Adullam,' may be a corruption of כַּרְמֵל, 'Carmel.' Carmel was in a region friendly to David's family; it is surely a plausible view, that David, if he was a native of 'Debir' (Kinath-sepher), and closely allied with the clans of Jezreel and Carmel, took Carmel as his earliest base of operations. Nor is there any inconsistency between this tradition and the 'Ziklag' tradition. Until David gave practical effect to his aspiration after the imperial throne of an expanded Israel there was no reason why he should not be on the most friendly terms with the chieftains of Musrite tribes like the 'Cherethites' and 'Pelethites.' There is a striking little narrative in 1 S. 22 3-5 which throws some light on this (and so indeed, rightly understood, does the story in Gen. 38). From the fort (not cave) of Carmel (not Adullam) David, we are told, took his father and mother to 'Mizpeh of Moab' (rather to Misrephath of Mūṣur, see ZAREPHATH), and confided them to the care of the king or, as we might say, chieftain (see KING). There his parents found a safe asylum, all the time that he was in the fort of Carmel. It should be noticed that Carmel is already a Judahite place. 'Abide not in Misrephath' (read, not כְּצוּרָה, but כְּצוּרָתָא; 'depart, and get thee into the land of Judah,' says Gad the 'prophet' (see GAD ii.)). So David leaves Mūṣur, and proceeds to the fort of Carmel ('Adullam'); see HARETH.

We must now return to Gen. 38, assuming here the corruptions of the text mentioned under TAMAR. A Judahite family settles at Carmel¹ (not Adullam). A fusion with the Maonites was attempted, but had less prosperous results than a Jerahmeelite alliance. The two clans which arose in consequence were called respectively Šārēphath and Zerah. This seems to be a record of the friendly intercourse between David when at Carmel and the Musrites of Šarephath.

We conclude then that David made Carmel his base of operations for the conquest of territory for an

5. David's enlarged tribe of Judah. He established himself for a time in Keilah, but found it progress necessary to retire, first to the wilderness of Ziph, and then to that of En-kadesh (not En-gedi; see KADESH), where he was certainly in the land of Musri. From Kadesh we may presume that he made his way to REHOBOTH [q.v.], by favour of whose chieftain Achish, or perhaps rather Nahash (who, be it noted, worships Yahwē, 1 S. 29 6), he found new headquarters at Ḥalūṣāh (see ZIKLAG). It was from this place that he obtained his great warrior Benaiah (see JEKABZEEL) and raided those parts of the Negeb which did not belong to the Rehobothites and Zarephathites. Meantime the Zarephathites were doing great mischief to Saul's kingdom by their incursions (cp especially 1 S. 23 28 28 1 f.), and, if our treatment of the text is sound, Saul met his death bravely struggling with them on the ridge of hills near Carmel or Jerahmeel (see SAUL, § 4). It is possibly to the following period that David's acquisition of a chieftainship in the Carmelite district² is to be assigned; this helps to account for his elevation to a greater position at Hebron³ (the reading 'Hebron' may be safely accepted). This, however, was not agreeable to the Zarephathites, and a fierce conflict broke out between them and the new-made king. David, however, became the victor,⁴ 'Gob' and 'Gath' in 2 S. 21 15-22 being corrupt fragments of 'Rehoboth,'⁵ and 'Rephaim' and 'Baalperašim' in 2 S. 5 18 20 22 of Jerahme'elim and Baal-Šarephāthim respectively; see also Judg. 1 10. After this, the Rehobothites and the Šarephathites became David's faithful servants; in this character their names have come down to us as 'Cherethites' and 'Pelethites.' See PELETHITES, REHOBOTH, ZAREPHATH.

It required doubtless a harder struggle to overcome the resistance of Abner, the general of Ishbosheth (or rather perhaps Mahriel; see MEPHIBOSHETH, § 1), whom Winckler, perhaps rightly, regards as having been in the first instance king of 'all Israel' (2 S. 2 9). The conquest of JERUSALEM [q.v., § 13 f.] was the necessary preliminary of this. Being taken by David himself from the Jebusites, it formed originally no part of the tribe of Judah; but its possession secured the continuance of the family of David on the throne of Judah, and in Josh. 15 63 (R_{JE}) it is represented as half-Judahite, half-Jebusite. On Solomon's supposed exclusion of Judah from the departmental division of his kingdom see SOLOMON, TAXATION, and cp Kittel on 1 K. 4 9 f.

The tribe of Judah is referred to twice in the NT (Heb. 7 14 Rev. 7 5); but the references require no comment.

The isolation of Judah is its most notable geographical

² He was probably 'prince of Abihail' (1 S. 25 3, crit. emend.). See NABAL.

⁵ In this connection it may be noted that in the earlier and much briefer story on which 1 S. 17 is probably based, 'Goliath of Gath' was probably 'Goliath of Rehoboth,' 'the valley of Elah' (גֵּלְיָת) was 'the valley of Jerahmeel,' and 'Bethlehem-judah' was 'Bethel-judah.'

JUDAH

characteristic. Its boundaries are given in Josh. 15¹⁻¹² (P); but these of course have no relation to the pre-Davidic period.

6. Characteristics : geographical.

The N. boundary coincides with the S. boundary of Benjamin; only it is given with greater fullness. On the E. the boundary is the Dead Sea; on the W. the Mediterranean; on the S. a line drawn from the southern tongue of the Dead Sea to the Naḥal Mišrain (rather Mišrim; see EGYPT, BROOK OF), and passing by the ascent of Akrabim, Zin, Kadesh-barnea, and other places (consult HAZAR-ADDAR, HEZRON, KARKAA). The idealizing tendency of P comes out in his inclusion of Philistia within Judahite territory. There is an inconsistency with regard to Kirjath-jearim, which Judg. 18¹² and Josh. 15⁶⁰ make Judahite, whilst Josh. 18²⁸ apparently assigns it to Benjamin (cp KIRJATH-JEARIM); also with regard to JERUSALEM [g.v., § 13]. It should be noticed that in the earlier narratives we hear of LEVI (Judg. 15⁹) and ADULLAM (1 S. 22⁵, see above), or rather Carmel, as belonging to Judah; we also read of a Negeb of Judah (1 S. 27¹⁰; see NEGEB). The natural divisions of the territory are—the NEGEB, the SHEPHELAH, and the Wilderness of Judah (see DESERT, § 2 [3] and § 3 [3]). It is urgently necessary to get a clear idea of each of these without which the full significance of many OT passages will be missed. As to the names in Josh. 15²⁰⁻⁶² reference must also be made to special articles. Some progress has doubtless been made in settling the readings (which in MT are often incorrect), and consequently many current identifications have not improbably been criticised in the present work with effect; but much uncertainty still attaches to many of the details (see e.g. the names of places on the S. boundary).

Judab is not to be blamed for indifference to the great struggle celebrated in Judg. 5; - tribe of Judah

7. Racial. did not at that time exist. In Dt 33⁷ (in the 'Blessing of Moses'), however, we meet with a prayer that Yahwē would bring Judah 'to his people,'—i.e., that the great schism might be healed, and Judah reincorporated into the people of Israel; it is the saying of a N. Israelite. The 'Blessing of Jacob' (Gen. 49⁹⁻¹¹) celebrates the fierceness and victorious might of Judah and at the same time its appreciation of the natural advantages of its land (Judah was a vine-country; cp Joel 1⁷ ff., 3 [4] 18 2 Ch. 26¹⁰, and HEBRON, § 3). Later history exhibits this tribe as tenacious, conservative, and even fanatical—characteristics perhaps not wholly unconnected with its Edomitish and N. Arabian affinities.

The two 'Blessings' just referred to are the only pre-exilic poetical passages in which the name Yehūdāh

8. Use of name. occurs; even in the exilic and post-exilic poetry it is very rare. Among the prophets it is Jeremiah who uses the term most frequently, though the abundance of interpolations in his book makes it difficult to estimate the exact numbers. The examination of the historical books leads to some interesting results. The phrase bnē Yehūdāh occurs in Judg. 18^{f. 16} 2 S. 11⁸ 21² 1 Ch. 12²⁶ 2 Ch. 10¹⁷ 25¹² 28¹⁰ 31⁶ Neh. 11⁴ 25 13¹⁶ Dan. 16; also in Jer. 7³⁰ 32³⁰⁻³² [L. 433], Joel 3[4] 68¹⁹ Ob. 12. But some of these occurrences are of small account, being due to glosses, and 2 S. 11⁸ is strongly corrupt (see JASHER, BOOK OF, § 2). The phrase bēth Yehūdāh is not much commoner. Yehūdāh is, of course, frequent. According to Staerk,² it may be inferred from the use of 'Israel and Judah' in passages like 2 S. 3¹⁰ 11¹¹ and 1 K. 2³² that there was a sense of the inner opposition between north and south before the separation of the kingdoms.

JUDAH, HILL-COUNTRY OF (יהודה; ὄρος Ιουδα), RV Josh. 11²¹ 20⁷ 21¹¹ 2 Ch. 27⁴, and virtually Josh. 15⁴⁸ 18¹² Judg. 1⁹ 19 Jer. 32⁴⁴ 33¹³, or, OF JUDÆA (Lk. 1⁶⁵, ἡ ὄρεινὴ τῆς Ἰουδαίας), is the special term for a well-defined region to the north of what was called the NEGEB [g.v.], some 25 miles long by 12 to 17 broad, and from 2000 to 3000 feet above the sea. Under the title of Orine it forms the ninth of Pliny's Judæan toparchics.¹ It has for its centre the ancient city of HEBRON, between which and the Negeb there is a fertile plateau, 9 miles by 3, which forms a strong and agreeable contrast to the Judæan table-land in the north. It is of this table-land that travellers think when they speak of Judæa as a stony desolate region. Apart from some breaks in the plateau, which enjoy a rich vegetation, such as Bethany, the Valley of Hinnom, 'Ain Kārim, the Wady Artās (see CONDUITS, § 3), the valleys near Bethlehem, and especially Hebron, the thinly covered limestone produces a very dreary effect; one cannot help pitying the few dwarf trees which wage a doubtful struggle for existence with the boulders around them.

Nevertheless the austerity of this region was not always nearly so unmitigated; it did but call out the art and energy of man to counteract it. By a trained historic imagination we can recall some of the vanished glory, the traces of which, indeed, are multitudinous. One may wander for many miles in perfect solitude in a country of sheep and goats. But the hills are crowned with ruins, and the sides of the hills are terraced, and by the fountains are fragments of walls and heaps of stones which indicate the ancient homes of men.

The greatest elevation in the hill-country of Judab is attained by the Siret el-bella'a (3370 ft.), which terminates a mountain-ridge between Halhūl and Hebron. The chief valleys are the Wādy Halil, which is joined by the valley of Hebron, and beginning N.E. of Hebron, runs first southward, then south-westward, and finally unites with the Wādy el-Milh (coming from the east), forming the Wādy es-Seba'. WNW. from Hebron begins the Wādy el-Afranj, which runs NW. to join the Wādy es-Sanā at Ashdod. This is probably the 'valley (נַחַל) northward from Mareshah' (2 Ch. 14¹⁰; see ZEPHATHAH) where Asa is said to have defeated the 'Cushite' invaders. Farther south is the broad and fruitful Wādy es-Šūr, which first of all runs north, then turns westward, and under the name of the Wādy es-Sanā (see FLAH, VALLEY OF) cuts through the Shephelah. At Shuwēkeh (Socoh) is the point of junction of the Wādy es-Šūr and the Wādy en-Najil. This and other wadies issue in a remarkable basin about 30 miles long, which divides the mountains of Judah from the lower hills of the Shephelah. Towards the NW. this basin is drained by the broad and fertile Wādy Šarār, which near the coast assumes the name Nahr Rūbin (see JABNEEL). Not far from Tekoa is the great Wādy 'Arrūb, where is the ruin called Bereikūt, in the name of which some find an echo of the Berachah of 1 Ch. 20²⁶ (see BERACHAH, VALLEY OF).

The Hebrew text of Josh. 15⁴⁸⁻⁶⁰ reckons as belonging to this region thirty-eight cities, some of which can be identified with obvious certainty, such as Eshtemoh, Beth-Tappuah, Hebron, Maon, Carmel, Ziph, Juttah, Zanoah, Ḥalḥul, Bethzur. There are also, however, places which are omitted in MT, but have an undeniable claim to be included in the list; and G, after Josh. 15.59, actually gives eleven names which (see Di.) must have belonged to the original list. All the cities mentioned here by G lay, no doubt, immediately south of Jerusalem; among them are the well-known places Tekoa, Bethlem, 'Ain Kārim (see BETH-HACCEREM) and Bittir (see BETHUR).

This was written twice, and one of the 'Jordans' was wrongly emended into 'Judah.' For a similar case in the Gk. of Jn. 3.25 see JOHN THE BAPTIST, § 6.

Ewald (Hist. 2.291) would read יְהוּדָה הַיְרֵדָה, '(reaches) to Chinneroth of Jordan,' and interpret this phrase on the analogy of the phrase 'all Chinneroth' in 1 K. 15.20 as meaning the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee (see CHINNEROTH). The another suggestion is to emend יְהוּדָה בְּיַרְדֵּן into יְהוּדָה (to) the side of'; cp Neub. Geogr. 224. Neither is satisfactory. T. K. C.

4. Son of Simon (1 Macc. 16.2 ff.). See MACCABEES I., § 6.
5. One, evidently holding a high position in Jerusalem, who took part in sending a letter to ARISTOBULUS (q.v.) (2 Macc. 1.10). Though identified with the Essene (cp Jos. J. 1.35) he is more probably the same as no. 2.

7. Judas of James (ιούδας Ιακώβου) [Ti. WH], one of the twelve apostles according to Lk. 6.16 and Acts 1.13, though not according to the lists in Mt. and Mk., where his place is taken by Thaddæus. He is, without doubt, the 'Judas not Iscariot' of the Fourth Gospel (Jn. 14.22), who asked Jesus the question: 'Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?' The expression 'Judas of James' is most naturally and usually understood as meaning 'son of James'; but it can be interpreted as meaning 'brother of James,' and this is the sense in which it has been taken by the author of the epistle of JUDE (q.v.).

Ecclesiastical tradition very early began its attempts to harmonise the four lists of the twelve apostles, and one of the results (since Origen) was the identification of 'Judas of James' with Thaddæus; in late Syriac legend he appears as Judas Thaddæus and is the apostle of Syria and Mesopotamia, ultimately suffering martyrdom by stoning at Berytus or Aradus. The similar Armenian legend claims him also for Armenia. In the Roman Breviary (Oct. 28), Thaddæus, qui et Judas Jacobi appellatur in Evangelio, unius ex Catholicis Epistolis scriptor¹ is said to have evangelized Mesopotamia and afterwards to have accompanied Simon the Cananean into Persia where they crowned a successful ministry by suffering a glorious martyrdom together. It is worthy of particular notice, however, that the oldest Syrian (Edessene) legend, which goes back to the second (?) century, identifies Judas Jacobi with Thomas (see Eus. HE 1.13; 'After Jesus was ascended, Judas Thomas sent to him [Abgarus] Thaddæus the apostle, one of the Seventy').

Thrice in the Fourth Gospel (Jn. 6.71 13.26) Judas is called the son of Simon, which may well be a genuine tradition.

1. Name.

¹ Also ουδας 1 Macc. 13.8 [A], and ουλος 1 Macc. 4.13 [A], the latter a corruption in the Gk.

As for the name 'Iscariot' (twice applied to the father of Judas, Jn. 6.71 13.26), there is a well-supported reading in Jn., απο καρωτου, which, according to Zahn and Nestle,¹ confirms the view that ισκαριωθ and ισκαριωτης proceed from the Hebrew designation קרית קריות, 'a man of Kerioth'; cp Ισραβος, Jos.

Ant. vii. 61 = טוב ש'א, 2 S. 10.68 (G^B ειστωθ). We should, however, have expected απο κεριωθ; -ωτου suggests that the phrase in D is derived from ισκαριωτου. Not understanding κεριωθ, the scribe thought of καρωτός (φούνξ), 'a palm tree which bears dates resembling a walnut.'² Apart from this, it is a plausible view that ισκαριωτης is derived from Ish-kerioth, 'a man of Kerioth.' Such formations of names continued to be used, as Dalman shows, in spite of the predominance of Aramaic. Most scholars consider Judas to have been a native of the Kerioth mentioned in Josb. 15.25; but קריות, keriyoth, in this passage means 'group of places' (see HAZOR, 4), and the spot or district intended did not belong to Judæa.³ Keim and Wellhausen therefore prefer the Κερια (Kerioth) of Jos. Ant. xiv. 3.4, etc., which was a beautifully situated place N. of Kārn Sartabeh (see ZARETHAN). Since, however, the evangelists themselves find the name so unintelligible, how much more natural is it to suspect that it may have been incorrectly transmitted (cp Boanerges, Kananaios (?), Bar-jona).⁴ If so, we may not unreasonably conjecture that the true name is 'Ιερικωτης, 'a man of Jericho.' It would readily be remembered that one of the disciples came from Jericho. Cp JERICHO, § 7.

Of the early history of Judas nothing is told us. We know, however, that he was one of those whom the Preacher of the Kingdom of Heaven drew to himself by the power of his will to be his companions and assistants. 'And he goes up into the mountain (εις τὸ ὄρος), and calls to him whom he himself would, and they went unto him' (Mk. 3.13); the οὗς ἠθέληεν αὐτός assures us that every one of the persons named was specially chosen by Jesus. Twelve are named; three lists of the twelve are given, and in each of the three Judas stands last (Mt. 10.4 Mk. 3.19 Lk. 6.16; see APOSTLE, § 1). Mt. and Mk. add, 'who also betrayed him'; Lk. adds, 'who became traitor' (ὅς ἐγένετο προδοτής). In the lists of Mt. and of Mk. the eleventh, and in that of Lk. the tenth, is Simon called ο καναναίος or ζηλωτής. Farrar has offered the conjecture that this Simon was the father of Judas Iscariot, and it is certain that in Jn. (see § 1) Judas Iscariot is called the son of Simon. It is not likely, however, that both father and son would belong to the Twelve, and Simon was a very common name, whilst καναναίος is very possibly a corruption of καναίος ('a man of Cana'), which would make this Simon a Galilaean. All that we can say is that Simon and Judas were probably companions whenever the Twelve were sent out 'by two and two' (Mk. 6.7).

There is no list of the Twelve in the Fourth Gospel. In Jn. 6.71, however, we receive early notice that Judas

3. Notice in Jn. Iscariot was one of the Twelve, and that it was he who was destined to deliver up Jesus (Jn. 6.71).

The notice (οὗτος γὰρ ἐμέλλεν αὐτὸν παραδίδόναι, εἰς ὃν ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα) is suggested by a saying ascribed to Jesus (v. 70); 'Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil (διάβολος)?' It adds but little, however, to the historical weight of the Synoptic tradition, and the saying in v. 70 appears to be inconsistent with the equal confidence in all the disciples shown by Jesus according to the Synoptic tradition—a confidence which is maintained unbroken till the last paschal meal.

The Fourth Evangelist further tells us (Jn. 12.4-6) that the destined traitor murmured at Mary's costly gift of love at Bethany, when she took a pound of SPIKENARD [q.v.] and anointed the feet of Jesus; he also mentions as the secret cause of this murmuring of Judas that he 'was a thief, and having the box took away what was put therein.'

So at least the traditional text must be interpreted (ὅτι κλέπτης ἦν καὶ τὸ γλισσοσόκμον ἔχων⁴ τὰ βαλλόμενα ἐβάσταξεν); but the phraseology is very awkward, and it is strange that this habit of pilfering should be mentioned unless it were to account for the smallness of the sum which (Mt. at least says) tempted Judas to betray his master. It would seem that here there is a clear case of corruption, and that a very early editor of the text may have miscorrected the corrupt passage before him. Very possibly we should read, ὅτι χαλεπὸς ἦν καὶ τὸ κοινὸν βαλλάντιον ἐβόσταις,¹ 'because he was a harsh man, and used to carry the common purse' (κοιν. βαλ. as Θ, Prov. 1.14). The statement about Judas is therefore worthy of more credit than it has sometimes received from advanced critics. It may be nearer to the oldest tradition than the vaguer statement of Mt. 26.8 Mk. 14.4.²

Weiss (Leben Jesu, 2.443) cannot account for the imputation of thievish intentions to Judas in Jn. except on the theory that the apostle John had found out thefts committed by the greedy Judas, and Godet speaks of some one who has accused John of a personal hatred to Judas. The difficulties disappear if the reading proposed above is accepted.

According to Mt. 26.14-16 Mk. 14.10 f., after the anointing in Bethany 'one of the twelve called Judas

4. The chief priests and offered to betray Jesus to them. On receiving their promise of 'money' (ἀργύριον, Mk.) or 'thirty pieces of silver [shekels]' (τριάκοντα ἀργύρια, Mt.), Judas sought for an opportunity to betray him. Lk. (22.3-6) altogether disconnects the transaction from the scene of the anointing. After noticing that every night Jesus camped out (ἠγύξατο) on the Mount of Olives (21.37), which prepares the way for the notable statement in 22.39, Lk. mentions that the passover was drawing near, and that the chief priests and scribes were seeking for a way to effect the destruction of Jesus. Then 'Satan entered into Judas, called Iscariot, of the number of the twelve'; the rest of the notice agrees with that of Mt. and Mk. Evidently the assumption that Satan had entered into Judas is a humane one: treason against the Holy One was too foul a crime for a disciple in his right mind to have committed. It should also be noticed that all the Synoptists (Mt. 17.22 Mk. 9.31 Lk. 9.44) mention that after Peter's confession of Jesus' Messiahship, Jesus spoke of his being 'delivered up into the hands of men.' Mt. says that the disciples were 'very sorry'; Mk. and Lk. that they 'understood not the saying.' We should never have guessed (nor did the apostles guess) that one of them was capable of committing treason.

Quite a different account is given in Jn. (13.218-21.30). Nothing is said of the visit of Judas to the chief priests

5. Account and of the promised payment of his treason, nor of his deliberate search for an opportunity to betray Jesus. It was at the Last Supper that the hateful idea occurred to Judas, and it was inspired by the devil (13.227). Jesus openly declared (vv. 10-18) that one of his chosen ones would 'lift up his heel' against him, to fulfil the old scripture (Ps. 41.9). Yet he gave one more special proof of love to the traitor, and it was after this that Satan took full possession of his captive. 'Therefore Jesus says to him, That thou doest, do quickly'; Judas went out, 'and it was night.' It is a modification of the Synoptic tradition that we have here, though Lk. has already suggested it by his reference to Satan. It was not to any common temptation that at last Judas fell victim; he was taken by storm. How, according to Jn., the original suggestion of treason (Jn. 13.2) was made plausible, there is no direct evidence to show. From Jn. 6.60-65, however, we infer that, according to the evangelist, Judas was one of those who entertained unspiritual views of Messiahship. When the last hope that Jesus would make himself king of Israel by force had vanished, the evangelist possibly considered that the love which Judas must formerly have had for Jesus diminished, and that finally under Satanic influence it turned into its opposite—hate. Godet regards the Johanne picture as more truly historical than that given by the Synoptists, on the ground that in the former the relations between Jesus and Judas 'form an organic part of the description of the repast, and are presented under the form of a series of historical shades and gradations.'¹ A very different view is taken by Keim, and a critical student cannot fail to admit the force of Keim's arguments.

¹ Both καλεπτός and καὶ γλωσσὸ are based upon a miswritten χαλεπός; κοινὸν and ἐχὼν have come out of κοινόν, and βαλλόμενα out of βαλλάντιον. γλωσσόκομον was suggested by Jn. 13.29. βαλ. is one of Lk.'s words.

² Mt. assigns the niggardly question, 'To what purpose, etc., to the disciples; Mk. to 'some' (of the guests). Mt. is evidently right. In Lk. 7.35 ff. no mention is made of a murmuring against the lavishness of the gift of love. Certainly it would have spoiled Lk.'s narrative to have referred to this detail. Zahn (Eintl. 2.577) thinks the view that there were two anointings not impossible. It is, at any rate, more in accordance with our experience elsewhere to suppose that two divergent forms of the same tradition were in circulation.

What, then, is the Synoptic description of the repast? It is the Paschal Supper that Jesus and the Twelve are eating. Jesus has seen through

6. The paschal supper. Judas before this solemn evening, but has made no change in his demeanour towards him. Now, however, he announces the fact, 'One of you will betray me, even he that eats with me.' 'Is it I?' asks each man sorrowfully. 'It is one of the twelve, he that dips with me in the dish. Good were it for that man if he had not been born' (Mk. 14.17-21; cp Mt. 26.20-24 Lk. 22.21-23). The accounts do not entirely agree. It is only Mt. who expressly states that Judas the traitor also put the question, 'Is it I?'—and the way in which the statement is introduced suggests that it is an addition to the earlier story (Mt. 26.25). Jn., as we have seen, diverges most widely from the simple form of the Synoptic narrative.

The account of the betrayal itself also is very variously given. All the Gospels agree that it was by an armed band that Jesus was arrested, and that

7. Arrest of Jesus. Judas was its guide. Both the scene of the arrest, however, and the circumstances are different in the Synoptic Gospels and in Jn. respectively, and it is for our present purpose especially noteworthy that nothing is said in Jn. of the kiss with which according to the Synoptists Judas ventured to greet Jesus. Mk. and Lk. give the simplest narrative; Mt. (26.50) makes Jesus answer the traitor with 'Ἐταίρε, ἐφ' ὃ πᾶραι, 'Amice, ad quod venisti' (Vg.), an untranslatable phrase, while Lk. gives, 'Judas, betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss, suggesting what is probably the true reading in Mt., ὑποκρίναι, 'Thou feignest,' 'Thou actest a part,' 'Thou art no friend of mine.'² To Jn. the outward details of the act of Satanic treachery are indifferent.

The end of the traitor is told in Mt. 27.3-10 Acts 1.18-20. The discrepancies between the two accounts are remarkable, and the silence of Mk. and Jn. is also

8. Death of Judas. noteworthy. Mt. states that Judas, on finding that Jesus was condemned, was struck with remorse, and brought back the thirty shekels to the chief priests, confessing that he had 'betrayed innocent blood.' Then he hurled the 'pieces of silver into the sanctuary (εἰς τὸν ναόν), and departed'; to this is added a further statement, complete in itself, 'and he went away and hanged himself' (ἀπήγγξατο)—where, we are not told. The chief priests, however, with characteristic scrupulosity, would not put the money into the sacred treasury (κορβανᾶς), but bought with it the potter's field to bury strangers in. This field received the name, 'Field of blood,' and so a prophecy of Jeremiah (or rather Zechariah) was fulfilled.¹ Here we have Iscariot represented as a second Anithopel, who, so far as intention went, betrayed David to his enemy, and hanged himself (2 S. 17²³).

The account in Acts can be separated, with advantage to the sense, from the speech of Peter in which it occurs, and may perhaps be a later insertion. It is, however, at any rate of early date. It states that, so far from restoring the money, Judas 'acquired a field (χωριον, see FIELD, 9) with his unrighteous reward; and falling headlong (on the field)² he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out.' Hence that field was called Akeldama, or 'The field of blood' (see AKELDAMA). So, it is added, the prophecies in Ps. 69²⁵ and 109⁸ were fulfilled. Clearly here is a mere popular explanation of 'Akeldama,' and not less evidently here is the expression of the popular sense of justice as regards the end of the traitor.

A more elaborate and tasteless story is given by Papias (Fragm. III.); it seems to be an independent version of the popular legend, reminding us partly of Acts 1¹⁸, partly of the legend of the end of Antiochus Epiphanes in 2 Macc. 9^{5, 7}.

Returning to the two biblical accounts, we note that De Quincey (Works, 6²¹⁻²⁵) endeavours to remove the discrepancies, but by purely arbitrary means. This is quite needless. Both the modes of death assigned to Judas were conventionally assigned to traitors and enemies of God, and more especially that given in Acts³ to which there is a striking parallel in the story of the death of the traitor Nadan in the tale of Ahiqar. Mr. Rendel Harris suggests that the original reading in Acts 1¹⁸ may have been, not πρηνης γενόμενος, but πρησθεis, 'having swollen out'; the existing reading he accounts for by a tradition which identified Judas with a poisonous serpent, and he illustrates by 'upon thy belly shalt thou go' in Gen. 3¹⁴. See 'Did Judas commit suicide?' Amer. J. of Theol., July 1900.

The psychological attempts to explain the character of Judas so as to comprehend the crime ascribed to him are numerous. His despair has been regarded as a proof of original nobility of character (Hase); he has even been regarded as having sought the attainment of a good object by evil means (Paulus). Neander too was touched by the same generous anxiety for the misguided apostle.

'If Jesus is the Messiah,' so he considers Judas to have reasoned, 'it will not injure him to deliver him up to his enemies, for legions of angels will come to his rescue, while if he is not the Messiah, he deserves destruction.'

Thus the betrayal was merely a test, intended to clear up all doubt. Volkmar thinks that 'in the heart of the zealot who hoped to draw Jesus to battle and to victory, the greeting, so fearful to us, "Hail, Master," must have meant, "I greet thee, O king of Israel: now show thy power"' (Jesus Nazarenus [82], 121). De Quincey considers that the object of Judas was—

'audacious in a high degree, but for that very reason not treacherous at all. His hope was that, when at length actually arrested by the Jewish authorities, Christ would no longer vacillate; he would be forced into giving the signal to the populace of Jerusalem, who would then rise unanimously, for the double purpose of placing Christ at the head of an insurrectionary movement, and of throwing off the Roman yoke.'

All these theories are entirely contrary to the evangelic narratives. If we accept the tradition that Judas betrayed his Master, we cannot separate it from the statement that he did it either out of Satanic wickedness or for money.

Are critical students, then, really bound to accept the tradition as historical?

³ Cp Zeller, Die Apostelgeschichte, 81.

'The fact of the treason of Judas is so unexpected, so incredible, so terrible; it jeopardises so painfully our faith not only in human fidelity but also in the dignity

10. The story and greatness of Jesus, and his judgment, his keenness of vision, and above all, the weight of his influence and of that love of his which could melt even ice, and it is such a mark for the scoffing of enemies, beginning with the venomous Celsus,¹ that we should have to greet it as the removal of a hundred pound weight from the heart of Christendom, if the treason of Judas could be proved to have had no existence.'

The growth of the story of Judas can also be adequately explained. Supposing that the original tradition left the ease with which the capture of Jesus was effected unaccounted for, Christian ingenuity would exert itself to find an explanation. Passages in the Psalms which spoke of the Righteous Man as treated with brutal insolence by his own familiar friend (Ps. 41⁹ 55¹²⁻¹⁴) would suggest the originator of the outrage; the betrayer of Jesus must have been a faithless friend. And if an apostle, who could he have been but Judas Iscariot? For Iscariot was not a Galilean like the other apostles; he had a harsh, crabbed temper (χαλεπος), and he carried the purse of the little company. The last circumstance suggested a reminiscence of Zech. 11^{12 f.}—a mysterious passage which seemed to become intelligible for the first time if applied to Jesus. This view is not altogether new; in its earlier forms it has found little favour,² but it may nevertheless in essentials be true.

The objections to it are (1) that the story of Judas's treason has fixed itself firmly in our oldest documents, and (2) that in Acts 1 we have an account of the appointment of Matthias to the vacant apostleship. It cannot, however, be proved that Judas's treason formed part of the oldest tradition; it is separable from the surest traditions of the life of Jesus, and the appointment of Matthias may perfectly well have taken place, even if Judas did not betray Jesus. The probability is that no one knew how the emissaries of the Pharisees found Jesus so easily, and that the story of Judas's treason was a very early attempt to imagine an explanation. Probably Judas did disappear from view. We know that all the disciples 'forsook Jesus and fled' (Mt. 26⁵⁶ Mk. 14⁵⁰); Judas probably returned to his home, and never again joined the Galilean disciples, with whom he may have felt little sympathy. This view has the advantage over that still prevalent, because it does not force us to think that Jesus treated Judas worse than Peter, for whom he prayed when Satan 'had obtained him by asking, in order to sift him as wheat' (Lk. 22³¹), or that the prayer προσθεσ ημιν πιστιν (Lk. 17⁵) was unanswered in the case of Judas. That popular mythology gladly releases the traitor Judas from hell once in the year (cp Matthew Arnold, Saint Brandan), should perhaps stir the critical conscience to examine more fully into the grounds of the received opinion.

A wild Gnostic fancy may be mentioned, as a singular specimen of early speculations about Judas.

Epiphan. 38³. Some Cainites say that Judas delivered up Jesus because he regarded him as a wicked man (πονηρον), who meant to destroy the good law. Others say that he gave Jesus up just because he was a good man. The rulers knew that if Jesus were crucified, their ineffectual power would be brought to nought. Judas therefore made a mighty effort to deliver him up for the salvation of mankind, and deserves praise as an 'agent' in the events which have led to our salvation and enlightenment (ελλοι δε των αυτων, ουχι, φασιν, αλλα αγαθων αυτων οντα παρεδωκε κατὰ την επουρανιον γνωσιν. εγνωσαν γαρ, φησιν, οι αρχοντες, οτι, εαν ο χριστος παρεδοθη σταυρω, κενουται αυτων η ασθενης δυναμις, και τουτο, φησι, γνοις ο Ιουδας, εσπυσε και πάντα εκτισεν, οστε παραδοσιν αυτων, αγαθον εργον ποιησας ημιν εις σωτηριαν. και δεi ημας επαινειν και αποδιδουαι αυτω τον επαινον, οτι δι' αυτου κατασκευασθη ημιν η του σταυρου σωτηρια και η δια της τοιαυτης υποθεσεως των ανω αποκαλυψις). 10. Judas of Galilee (ΙΟΥΔΑΣ Ο ΓΑΛΙΛΑΙΟΣ [Ti. WH]), in association with a Pharisee named Sadduk, was leader of an agitation which arose in Judæa (on the death of Archelaus), when that part of Palestine in 6 or 7 A.D. was brought under Roman administration, and

¹ Orig. c. Cels. 2^{11 f.} Celsus, in the character of a Jew, scoffed at Jesus for being betrayed by one of those whom he called disciples—a proof that he was less able to attract his followers to himself than every general or brigand-chief.

² Keim, Jesus von Nazara, 3242.

Sulpicius Quirinius, the governor of Syria, instituted a census of the newly annexed district. In Gamaliel's speech in Acts 5³⁷ it is rightly stated that he 'rose up in the days of the enrolment (ἀπογραφῆ)'—the only enrolment known to Lk.—which had already been mentioned in the Third Gospel (21 f.; see QUIRINIUS).

Josephus speaks of Judas at some length in B/ii.81, Ant. xviii.116, and also makes brief reference to him in B/ii.178, vii.81, Ant. xx.52. The epithet (ὁ καλούμενος) Γαλιλαῖος or ἀπὸ Γαλιλαίας which he bestows on him, expresses clearly that he was of Galilaean origin, and had received from this circumstance the standing addition to his proper name (which was a very common one); it would be given all the more readily if his first public appearance was in Judæa, outside of his native land. Josephus (Ant. xviii.11) calls him, more precisely, a man of Gaulanitis (Γαυλανίτις ἀπὸ Γαλαμᾶ), and says that he came from Gamala. Gamala was in Gaulanitis not far from the eastern shore of the Lake of Gennesareth, and Gaulanitis could be reckoned as belonging to Galilee in the broader meaning of that word.

What Judas actually did is not quite clear from the account of Josephus. According to B/ii.178 he merely reproached the Jews with their subjection to the Romans; according to B/ii.81 he instigated them to revolt (εἰς ἀπόστασιν ἐνήγε) by his reproaches; according to B/ii.81 he persuaded 'not a few' (οὐκ ὀλίγους) to make no returns (μὴ ποιεῖσθαι τὰς ἀπογραφάς); according to Ant. xx.52 he actually caused the people to revolt against the Romans (τοὺ τὸν λαὸν ἀπὸ Ῥωμαίων ἀποστήσαντος). The expression last quoted goes too far if we take as our basis the chief passage in Josephus (Ant. xviii.11). In that passage he introduces his reference to Judas only after explaining how the Jews, yielding to the persuasions of Joazar the high priest, had submitted to the census. Judas indeed, he says, was urgent for revolt (ἠπέλεγρο ἐπὶ ἀποστάσει) and the movement went far; but he does not expressly mention any noteworthy occurrence, passing on merely to a long and vague list of evils extending in the course of time to the final destruction of Jerusalem, that had been brought upon the nation by the followers of Judas: wars, robberies, seditions, murders of principal men, famines, and the like.

In particular he designates Judas and Sadduk as the originators among the Jews of a 'fourth philosophy' (τετάρτην φιλοσοφίαν), as he does also in the other leading passage (B/ii.81), where he calls Judas a 'sophist of a sect of his own' (σοφιστῆς ἰδίας αἰρέσεως; cp ii.178 'a most cunning sophist,' σοφιστῆς δευτέρως); in both places he takes occasion to characterise the three previously existing 'philosophies' of the Jews—those, namely, of the Sadducees, the Pharisees, and the Essenes—but it is only in Ant. xviii.16 that he goes into the 'philosophy' of Judas and his companions. There he says that in every other respect the followers of Judas agree with the Pharisees, but they are distinguished by an unquenchable love of liberty—holding God alone to be ruler and lord—and by indifference to death. The party of the ZEALOTS (זְבֻלֹּת, Aram. זְבֻלֹּת; see CANANÆAN) is intended, from which party arose at a later date the Sicarii or ASSASSINS, who not only did not shrink from violence and rebellion against their enemies, but also did not scruple to exercise a reign of terror over their co-religionists by secret assassination.

It is certainly no mere coincidence that one of their most determined leaders—he who held the fortress of Masada even after Jerusalem had fallen, and with all his companions committed suicide when no longer able to keep the enemy at bay (73 A.D.; see ISRAEL, § 100)—Eleazar, son of Jairus, was a descendant of Judas of Galilee and a relation of his son Manaim (= Menahem), a ringleader at the beginning of the revolt in 66 A.D. who himself in turn fell a victim to the fanaticism of the Zealots in the same year (B/ii.178, vii.81; cp ISRAEL, § 101).

It will be observed that in Josephus no word is found of what is stated in Acts 5³⁷, that Judas perished and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered abroad. On the other hand, Josephus tells us (Ant. xx.52) that the sons of Judas (i.e., two of them), Jacob and Simon, were put to death by the procurator Alexander of Judæa (therefore about 46-48). In Lk. there is another noticeable circumstance, the fact, namely, that Judas, notwithstanding the express mention of the census of 6-7 A.D., is nevertheless represented as coming upon the scene after Theudas, whose insurrection was under the procuratorship of Cuspius Fadus (i.e., about 44-46). At the same time it has to be remarked that, as the mention of the census shows, Lk. was not in error about the period of Judas so much as about that of Theudas; whether this error justifies the conjecture that Lk. was acquainted with Josephus will be considered therefore under the latter name (see THEUDAS).

The other conjecture, that Lk. confused Judas, so far as his end was concerned, with his two sons, is certainly forcibly suggested by the fact that his fate is mentioned after that of Theudas. Krenkel (Josephus u. Lucas, '94, 168-170) has pointed out an analogous case; in 1 S. 17 Goliath is represented as having been slain by David, but in the older account (2 S. 21 15-22) this feat is given to Elhanan, while it is another giant that is encountered by David (cp ELHANAN, GOLIATH). He instances similar slips of memory in Livy (xxi. 469 f.), in Cicero (Cato Major, 23, § 83), and in Josephus himself; Josephus (B/ii.217), among the four men who were sent to Jerusalem to stir up the people against himself, names Judas the son of Jonathes, whereas in Vit. § 39 he names Jonathes himself, thus (after an interval of 25 years, it is true) making a mistake as to the name of a person with whom he had been personally in strenuous conflict. Krenkel himself adds, however, that even without confounding Judas with his sons, it was not unnatural that Lk. should assign to him the fate which, practically speaking, befell all the leaders of insurrection in those days. In any case Lk. found no warrant in Josephus for his statement that all the followers of Judas were scattered abroad.

Schürer, GVV (2) 1406 f. (ET, Div. i. vol. ii. p. 81), confidently identifies Judas of Galilee with the Judas, son of Ezekias, who after the death of Herod the Great in 4 B.C. gathered a following in the neighbourhood of Sepphoris and rendered all Galilee insecure, aiming, indeed, it would seem, even at the crown itself (B/ii.41, Ant. xvii.105). Krenkel, however (p. 163), rightly doubts this identification, inasmuch as Josephus does not give to this Judas the epithet of Galilaean, but designates him simply as son of Ezekias, and moreover expressly records the execution of this robber-chief Ezekias by Herod the Great.

P. W. S.

JUDE, THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF. The author designates himself as Judas 'a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James,' and evidently wished to pass for a brother of Jesus (see 1. General character. JUDAS, 7; JAMES). It has been conjectured that he was restrained from so calling himself outright by an exalted idea of Jesus, which did not admit of his having a human brother. He addresses his writing to 'those that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ,' thus evidently intending it for an extended circle of readers rather than for a single church. The object of the epistle is declared to be an exhortation to the readers to 'contend earnestly for the faith' on account of certain ungodly men whose lives are reprehensible, and whose teaching is a denial of 'the only Ruler and our Lord, Jesus Christ.' Examples of the destruction by divine judgment of those whose belief and life were false are adduced from the OT and Jewish apocalyptic, and directions are given as to the proper department of believers toward such persons. The epistle closes with a doxology.

The point of view of the writer is indicated in v. 17, as that of one who looked back upon the apostolic age ('Remember ye the words which have been spoken before by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ'), and the prophecies referred to in v. 18 have so close a resemblance to the post-apostolic 1 Tim. 4 1 and 2 Tim. 3 1 f. 4 3 as to favour the hypothesis of a dependence upon these epistles. Accords with the Pauline writings are at least probable in v. 12 (cp 1 Cor. 11 20), v. 20 (cp Rom. 8 20), v. 10 and 19 (cp 1 Cor. 2 14 f.), and v. 22 (cp 1 Cor. 3 15).

The occasion of the epistle was evidently the author's lively concern about certain ungodly men (ἀσεβείς, v. 4) who had 'stolen in' (παρεισέδυσαν), and who were 'turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Ruler and our Lord, Jesus Christ.' He regards their influence both in doctrine and in practice as a menace to the well-being of the church, and he not only sounds a note of warning against them, but also points out the punishment reserved for such as they.

Not only did they deny Christ and God as the only Ruler (τὸν μόνον δεσπότην) and thus act the part of 'liars' according to 1 Jn. 2:22 (cp Enoch 45:10), but they 'set at nought dominion (κυριότητα), and raised at dignities (δόξας, v. 8)'. They are licentious revellers, stains (σπυλᾶδες, v. 12) in the Christian love-feasts, and mockers at sacred things.

Although the examples of divine judgment relate to wrong conduct, these dangerous persons are not simply men of loose morals whose life is a peril to the church—according to Schwegler's opinion (Nachap. Zeitalter, 1518 f.) and Ritschl's ingenious argument marred by a somewhat strained grammatical interpretation (St. Kr., '61, p. 103 f.)—but also false teachers, as is evident from their 'denying,' from the reference to the divine judgment on those who 'believed not,' and from the exhortation to 'contend earnestly for the faith' (v. 3).

The data for a precise determination of their doctrines amidst the many so-called heresies of the early church are wanting, and expositors differ widely upon the matter. Renan stands alone in the opinion that the epistle was directed against Paul. Other scholars are divided as to whether it assails Jewish false teachers, hyper-Paulinians, Nicolaitans, Gnostics of the second century in general, or the Carpocratian Gnosticism of Alexandria in particular.

The character and practices of the persons in question resemble very closely those of the Gnostics as described by Epiphanius (Hær. 26:11). We know that these denied that God was the 'only Ruler'—that is, the creator and governor of the world—and held very lax views as to the divinity of Christ (Iren. Hær. 1:25 f.). Out of the dualism of their system sprang an indifference to all relations to the flesh; and hence such moral looseness as is described in the Epistle appeared in some quarters.

So close is the resemblance of the persons here censured to the Carpocratians who flourished in Alexandria toward the middle of the second century, that Clement believed Jude to have written prophetically of them (Strom. 3:2 f.). It is, accordingly, not improbable that the writer had them in mind as his contemporaries. His denunciations are quite applicable to a sect who had established upon lust a 'cult of righteousness.' With the late date of the epistle which must be assumed from this point of view corresponds the author's apprehension of Christian 'faith' as a system of doctrine or a fixed confession (v. 3).

The writer uses apocryphal apocalyptic works such as the Ascensio Moysis in which Origen (De Princip. 3:2) found the legend concerning Michael (see APOCALYPTIC, § 59), and the book of Enoch (6 and 10), from which he doubtless derived the story of the fallen angels substantially in the form in which he gives it. With reference to v. 14 see also Enoch 60 (cp APOCALYPTIC, § 19). No certain conclusion as to the date of the Epistle can, however, be drawn from the citation of these writings.

It has been argued that the author was an Alexandrian Jewish Christian from the fact that he attaches to the apocryphal books referred to, an equal authority with the OT—that is, regards them as belonging to the later additions to the canon.

The epistle was probably used by the writer of 2 Peter, though opinions are divided as to priority. It is not surprising that, on account of its brevity and the fact that it is not of doctrinal importance, to say nothing of its making no claim to apostolical authorship, it did not receive early recognition.

Jude is referred to by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 3:2 11) as a 'catholic Epistle' written by Jude, 'frater filiorum Joseph exstans.' Origen (In Mt. 10:17 23:27) mentions it as the work of Judas the brother of James; but except in the parts of his works which survive only in a Latin translation he does not designate the author as an 'apostle.' Tertullian, on the other hand, calls the writer 'Jude the apostle' (De cult. fem. 1:3). The Muratorian fragment makes mention of it in a somewhat doubtful text as the work of Jude without designating him either an apostle or the brother of James. Eusebius (HE 3:25) places it among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, and says that 'not many of the ancients have made mention of it.' Jerome (De vir. ill. 4) calls the author of the epistle 'the brother of James,' and attributes its rejection by many to its citation of Enoch. Epiphanius (Hær. 76) speaks of its author as ὁ ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου καὶ κυρίου, but according to the Canon of Athanasius all the seven catholic epistles were written by 'apostles.' The wavering and uncertain character of all this 'testimony' is evident. The epistle is not included in the Peshitta, although Ephrem acknowledged it as apostolic. It is not mentioned by Justin, Theophilus, and Irenæus. [The text of the Epistle of Jude, like that of 2 Peter, has more than probably suffered in transmission, as the variant readings sufficiently warn us. See Hort's remarks in Notes on Select Passages, NT 2:106. There are, no doubt, more discoveries to be made by a practised critic. Even Hort, for example, has not said all that might be said on the corruptions of v. 5. Probably we should read, not εἰδὼτας ἀπαξ πάντα ὅτι κύριος λαὸν κ.τ.λ. but εἰδὼτας πάντας ὅτι Ἰησοῦς ἀπαξ λαὸν κ.τ.λ.—the position of ἀπαξ in accordance with κ and several Church Fathers and Versions; Ἰησοῦς (a corruption acc. to WH), with AB minusc. JUDEA (ἸΟΥΔΑΙΑ [Ald.]), in Judith 3:9, a false reading for ΔΩΤΑΙΑ (ΔΩΤΑΙΑC' [BN]). -ΤΕΑC [A]. See DOTHAN.

Dotæa is defined as situated over against the great strait (RV 'ridge') of Judea (ἰθ. τοῦ ῥιπίου τοῦ μεγάλου τῆς ἰουδαίας; similarly Syr.): the Gr. translator read רָצַח, 'a saw,' instead of רָצַח, 'plain' (Reland). This same plain is referred to in 4:6 (om. N).

JUDGE. The words for 'judge' will reward investigation.

1. שֹׁפֵט, šōphēt (Phœn. שפּש, Lat. suſetes [pl.]; Ass. šapātu; κριτής, δικαστής). See below (JUDGES, BOOK OF, § 1); also LAW AND JUSTICE, § 9 f., GOVERNMENT, § 17, ISRAEL, § 8 f., and cp COVENANT, § 4. Other words rendered 'judge' are —

2. רָצַח, rāṣṣān, 1 S. 24:15 [16], Ps. 68:5 [6] (?), Ezra 7:25f (|| 1 Esd. 8:23, κριτὰς καὶ δικαστὰς, EV 'judges and justices').

3. פָּלִיט, pālīt, Ex. 21:22 Dt. 32:31 Job 31:11 (all these passages are insecure; see Ges.-Buhl).

4. אֱלֹהִים, elōhim, Ex. 21:6 22:8 [7] f., 28 [27], where AV 'the judges' (mg. of 22:8); 1 S. 2:25, where AV 'the judge'; in all these cases RV 'God.' Other passages have been similarly interpreted; e.g., Judg. 5:8 (EV 'new gods'); Ps. 82:1 [2]. The explanation is old (cp Ex. 21:6, τὸ κριτήριον τοῦ θεοῦ; so Pesh.). Dillmann (Ex., ad loc.) thinks that judges were called Elōhim, because they gave sentence at holy places; hut Samaritan Tg. and Pent., Jerome, and probably Vet. Lat. (Ex. 22:8 [7] f.), followed by Graf and Kuenen, think that one of the sanctuaries of Yahwē is meant, where the priests gave divinely sanctioned judgments. Eerdmans (Tk. T. '94, p. 283) and Marti (Gesch. 29) think that the household god is referred to as Elōhim; and this view is archæologically the most probable. On Ps. 82:1 see ANGELS, § 4.

5. רָצַח, rāṣṣin, Prov. 6:7 RVmg. (AV 'Guide,' RV 'Chief'). In spite of Toy's defence, Bickell's objections to the passage appear to be valid. It is unmetrical, and does not fit in well with what follows. It is probably an editor's attempt to make sense of a variant form of v. 6 which had become indistinct. The absence of any reference to Prov. 6:7 in ANT (g.v.) is fully justified.

6. The רָצַח of Dan. 3:2 f. (EV 'judges') is rendered in RVmg. 'chief-soothsayer'; but it is 'probably the Pers. endarsgar, "counsellor," a title which was still in use under the Sasanians (Nöld. Tabari, 462 n.), and the resemblance with רָצַח [27] is therefore accidental' (Bevan, ad loc.; cp Marti's Aram. Gr. [Glossary]).

7. 8. In NT κριτής (Mt. 5:25), δικαστής (Lk. 12:14, see Ti.). Perfectly synonymous (see Θ, 1 S. 24:15 [16]). T. K. C.

The title Judges is a translation of the Hebrew name of the book, דִּבְרֵי שִׁפְתֵי ¹ ($\text{ΚΡΙΤΑΙ, Η ΤΩΝ ΚΡΙΤΩΝ ΒΙΒΛΟΣ}$;²

Liber Judicum), which is given to it because it contains the history of certain Israelite leaders and champions who in the book itself (e.g., 2 16-18) and elsewhere in the OT (2 S. 7 7 11 2 K. 23 22 Ecclus. 46 11, etc.) are called 'Judges' (šiphētim).

Those who gave the book this title probably thought of the Judges as divinely appointed rulers, forming a continuous succession, and wielding over all Israel an authority which differed from that of the kings who followed them chiefly in that it was not hereditary (see Judg. 10 2 f. 12 7 f. 11 13 16 20 1 S. 4 18 7 15).³ The word šiphētim sometimes occurs in synonymous parallelism with mēlek, 'king' (Hos. 7 7 Ps. 2 10); among the Phoenicians in an interregnum the supreme power was committed to a δικαστής (doubtless שִׁפְהֵי , šiphēti);⁴ in Carthage and other Punic cities the šufetes were the chief magistrates, corresponding to the Roman consuls.

The verb שָׁפַט , however, means also 'vindicate,' and thus 'champion, deliverer,' synonymous with עֲוֹרֵה (Judg. 2 16 18 3 9 f. cp 1 S. 8 20 Neh. 9 27); and the title could therefore be interpreted, Book of the Deliverers of Israel (Ephr. Syrus).

In the Hebrew Canon, Judges is the second of the Former Prophets, standing between Joshua and Samuel; in \mathfrak{C} (followed by Vg. and modern versions), Ruth, a story of the times of the judges (1 1), is appended to Judges and sometimes reckoned part of it.⁵

The Book begins with a brief account of the invasion of the interior of Western Palestine by the several

2. Contents. tribes, their conquests and settlements, the names of the cities which remained in the hands of their old inhabitants (1); the disobedience of the Israelites in making peace with the Canaanites is rebuked by the Messenger of Yahwè (2 1-5). Ch. 2 6-10 takes up the narrative at the point which has been reached in Jos. 24 27; the verses are substantially identical with Jos. 24 28-31. This introduces a general description of the period of the judges as a recurring cycle of apostasy from the religion of Yahwè to Canaanite heathenism, divine judgment inflicted by the hand of the neighbouring peoples, and signal deliverance by a champion whom Yahwè raised up to save them from their enemies; closing with a catalogue of the nations of Palestine whom Yahwè, for the sins of Israel (or as a test of its loyalty), left unsubdued (2 11-3 6). The history of the several judges is presented in a scheme corresponding to 2 11-19.

Thus 3 7-11: 'The Israelites offended Yahwè . . . and he was incensed against Israel and sold them into the power of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Syria, . . . for eight years. Then the Israelites cried for help to Yahwè, and he raised them up a deliverer, Othniel ben-Kenaz. (Here follows the account of the judge's exploits.) And the land enjoyed security for forty years.'

With other names and numbers, and variations of phraseology, a similar setting is given to the stories of the succeeding judges.

Israel is oppressed by the Moabites; Ehud kills the king of Moab, Eglon, and sets his country free (3 12-30); Shamgar makes a slaughter among the Philistines (3 31); the Canaanites under their king, Jabin of Hazor, and his general Sisera, oppress Israel; at the instance of the prophetess Deborah, Barak raises the tribes, defeats Sisera, and delivers Israel (4); the victory is celebrated in a triumphal ode (5); the Midianites and their Bedawin allies harry and devastate the land; Gideon by a stratagem throws their camp into a panic, pursues, and destroys them (6-8); Abimelech, a son of Gideon, becomes king of Shechem; the Shechemites revolt and are punished; Abimelech is killed while besieging Thebez (9); Tola and Jair judge Israel (10 1-5); the Ammonites oppress the Israelites in Gilead; Jephthah conquers them (10 6-12 7); Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon judge Israel (12 8-15); the Philistines are the masters of Israel; Samson inflicts many injuries upon them (13-16).

Chapters 17-21 contain two stories of the times of the judges: the first (17 f.) tells of the migration of the Danites and the establishment of the sanctuary at Dan; the second (19-21), of an outrage committed upon a traveller by the Benjamites of Gibeah and of the sanguinary vengeance taken upon the tribe.

The preceding synopsis of its contents shows that the book in its present form consists of three parts:

3. Sources. 1. 1 1-2 5, a brief history of the conquest and settlement of Canaan in some way parallel to Josh.

2. 2 6-16 31, the history of Israel in Canaan from the death of Joshua to the death of Samson, set in the framework of a consistent religious interpretation and a continuous chronology.

3. 17-21, an appendix narrating other events of the same period, but containing the name of no judge and exhibiting no trace of the distinctive religious point of view observed in the preceding chapters.

A. Deuteronomistic Book of Judges.—Our inquiry must begin with the body of the book, 2 6-16 31.

The introduction (2 6-3 6) as a whole is unmistakably deuteronomistic.

The sweeping condemnation of the whole period—Israel forsook its own God, Yahwè, and worshipped the Baals and Astartes of Canaan—and the religious pragmatism which makes unfaithfulness to Yahwè the one unfailing cause of national calamity and return to him the signal for deliverance, are characteristic of the historiography of the end of the seventh century and in still more marked degree of the sixth century, under the influence of Deuteronomy, the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the Exile itself.¹

The same pragmatism appears, as we have noted above, in the short particular introductions to the stories of the several judges (3 12-15 4 1 ff. 13 1; more fully in 3 7-11 6 1-10 10 6-16), but not in chap. 1 nor in 17-21. Judg. 2 6-16 31 may therefore properly be called the Deuteronomistic Book of Judges.

The deuteronomistic element is confined, however, to the introduction and the setting of the stories; the stories themselves (except that of Othniel, 3 7-11) are not of deuteronomistic conception, and, except on the margins where they are joined to the pragmatic introductions and conclusions, show no signs of deuteronomistic redaction.

ii. Pre-deuteronomistic editor.—As in Josh. 1-12, the deuteronomistic author manifestly took his narrative material from an older written source without to any considerable extent recasting it.

In the history of Gideon (6-8) and Abimelech (9) it is plain that two accounts have been combined in the same way in which parallel narratives are so often united in the Pentateuch and Joshua. More or less convincing evidence of the composite character of the text is discovered in other stories also (Ehud, Deborah and Barak, Jephthah; see below, § 4 ff.). The history of the judges was, therefore, related in at least two older books.

These sources were united, not by the deuteronomistic author of Judg. 2 6-16 31, but by an earlier compiler,² as is evident from the following considerations:—

First, in the seams of the composite narrative no trace of the distinctive deuteronomistic manner can be detected.

Second, the union of the two strands in 9 and in 17 f. (19-21), which chapters were not included in the deuteronomistic Judges (see below, § 14), is entirely similar to that in 6-8.

Third, in the introductions and conclusions of the stories there are indications of an underlying editorial schematism different from that of Rd.

iii. His two sources.—The pre-deuteronomistic history from which the deuteronomistic author took his material was itself made up of two main strands of narrative united by a redactor. The case is thus precisely similar to that in Josh. 1-12 (see JOSHUA, § 6); and since in Josh. we have found reason to believe that the two sources are the continuations respectively of those which in the Pentateuch are distinguished by the symbols J and E, and that they were united by a pre-deuteronomistic redactor (R_{JE}),¹ a presumption arises that this is true in Judges also, and this presumption has furnished the working hypothesis of recent criticism.

It is indeed true that the history of the period of the judges is not the necessary sequel of Josh. in the same way that the history of the conquest and settlement of Canaan is the necessary sequel of the promises to the patriarchs and the history of the exodus in J and E; it is conceivable that an historian should close a work with the occupation of the promised land, as P seems to have done.² This is hardly probable, however, in early historians, who commonly propose to bring the history down to their own time; and, antecedent probability aside, it can be shown that neither I nor E comes to an end in Joshua.³ In Josh. 24, E not only glances back over the preceding history (idolatry of the forefathers; God's deliverance), but by its earnest warnings of the consequences of falling away from Yahweh and worshipping other gods (19 f. 22) looks forward to the subsequent narration of such apostasy and its results, just as 1 S. 12 looks back over the period of the judges and forward over that of the kings. The suitable sequel of these verses in Josh. 24 is Judg. 2:13-20 f. (cp. 7 = Josh. 24:31 D), which in turn lead over to the stories in Judg. J also, whose account of the conquest is preserved in fragmentary form in Judg. 1:1-25 (with parallels in Joshua), cannot have ended his history with this incomplete occupation of the land of promise: the very form of the chapter fairly presumes the intention to tell how in after times these cities came into the hands of the Israelites; and Judg. 2:23a, 3:2a, which are recognised by most recent critics as the continuation of J in Judg. 1, actually lead over to the relation of the wars which Israel had to wage with these nations in the period of the judges.

The affinity of parts of Judg. to E and J respectively has long been observed.

Stade found E, not only (with E. Meyer, l.c.) in parts of 2:6-3:6, but also in 10:6-16, which is clearly dependent on Josh. 24;⁴ Böhme pointed out the striking resemblances to J in 6:11-24 and 13:2-24;⁵ Budde carried the analysis through the entire book,⁶ Winckler, Holzinger, and Moore have worked upon the same hypothesis.⁷

Other scholars, while not denying the existence of more than one source in Judges, think that there are not sufficient grounds for identifying these sources with the J and E of the Hexateuch.⁸ For this division of opinion a different definition of the problem and a different approach to it are in part responsible.

Kittel and those who occupy his position frame the question in some such way as this: Did the author who wrote the Yahwistic part of the primeval history and the patriarchal stories in Genesis also write, say, the stories of Samson, or the part of the story of Gideon ascribed by Budde and others to J? and they find the resemblance in style and diction insufficient to establish identity of authorship in this sense. But the unity of J in this sense is not affirmed by the critics on the other side. Believing that the writing of history began in Israel in the days of David or Solomon with the recent past, the events which led to the founding of the kingdom, and ascended thence to remoter times, they recognise that in the first comprehensive history of Israel from the earliest times to the days of the kingdom there were included not only materials of very diverse character, but materials which had been previously reduced to writing by different hands.⁹ The existence of different elements of this kind in J even in Genesis itself is generally recognised.

What the critics mean, who ascribe portions of Judges or Samuel to J is, not that these portions necessarily received their literary form from the same hand as the stories of the patriarchs or the narrative of the exodus, but that they formed part of the same comprehensive historical work in which the Yahwistic parts of Genesis and Exodus were included; and that they were written in general in the same age and surroundings, and in the same spirit.

² P, however, it is to be observed, is an archaeology rather than a history.

⁹ See HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 1 f.

It is manifest also that the problem should methodically be approached, not, as is generally done, from the analysis of Genesis, but from that of Josh. 1-12, where the nature of the sources is more nearly the same and their relation to the deuteronomistic element similar. When we come at it from this side, there appears to be no greater difficulty in the discrimination and identification of the sources in Judges than in Joshua, where J and E are generally recognised. There is general agreement that Judg. 1 gives us J's account of the conquest, much abridged and glossed by later hands.

B. Additional chapters.—Ch. 17 f. and 19-21 contain no deuteronomistic element. In both, two strands of narrative seem to be combined; the character of the two versions and the nature of the composition make it a reasonable presumption that the sources are the same as in the preceding chapters; in 19-21, the presence of a third element complicates the problem (see below, § 13).

Chap. 1:1-25 is in the main from J, and contains an abridgment or epitome of the oldest account of the conquest.

1:2 (corresponding to Josh. 1:12) was added by the last editor, making the only possible connection—though a false one—with the preceding book. The hand of the post-exilic editor is to be recognised also in 4:8-9 f. Chap. 1:1-25, (ascribing to Judah the conquests of Caleb, cp. 20 f.) 18, and in various minor glosses; 2:12 connects with 5b, the intervening verses, containing the reproof administered by the Messenger of Yahweh to Israel for making peace with the Canaanites, are the addition of a redactor, probably R_P; the passage is a cento of reminiscences from the Pentateuch.

In 2:6-36, the Introduction to the Book of Judges 5. Chap. 2:6-3:11, proper, the text is plainly not homogeneous; but repeated redaction has made the problem presented to criticism very difficult.

Vv. 6-10, which connect immediately with Josh. 24:27 and continue the history from that point (= Josh. 24:28-31), are from E; only 7 (= Josh. 24:31, cp. 2) is from a deuteronomistic hand. The sequel to this appears to be 13:20 f., and perhaps 3:4.¹ The introduction of the deuteronomistic author is contained in 11 f. 14-19; but 17 and perhaps 16 also is a later addition (R_P). V. 23a and perhaps 23b (reading Israel instead of Joshua) is from J, to which also 3:2a belongs, the original continuation of the account of the conquest in ch. 1; 3:12 3, and perhaps 4, are from a deuteronomistic hand; 5 is probably wholly redactional (R_{JE}); the provenience of 2:22 is not clear; the glosses in 3:1b 2b are late.²

Chap. 3:7-11 (Othniel) is deuteronomistic throughout, a typical example of the historical scheme set forth in

6. Chap. 3:12-31. 2:11 ff. The story of Ehud has a deuteronomistic introduction (12-15)—the concrete facts in which, such as the Moabite occupation of Jericho (13b), the sending of tribute (15b), etc. are of course derived from the original beginning of the narrative—and a deuteronomistic close (29 f.).

In the story itself are some doublets; most clearly in the account of the audience (19:20), perhaps also in that of the escape (26a:26b), and the Israelite attack on the Moabites (27 f.). The attempt of Winckler to separate two strands in the narrative is not convincing.³ Perhaps the doublets should be regarded as evidence, not of the existence of a second source, but of the conflation of variants in the same source. The story (or the main narrative) comes from the oldest collection. Ch. 3:31 (Shamgar) must have been introduced here by a very late hand; at an earlier stage in the redaction it stood after 16:31, where it is still found in several recensions of 2.

The deuteronomistic introduction is easily recognised in 4:1-4; the corresponding close is divided between

7. Chaps. 4 4:23 f. and 5:31 b; materials from the story itself are incorporated, especially in 4:3 f., and traces of an older setting and Barak. seem to be preserved. The main narrative relates a conflict with Sisera, his defeat and death; as in 5, Sisera appears in it as an independent and powerful prince. A pre-deuteronomistic redactor, for reasons which can only be uncertainly conjectured, connected this story with the account of an Israelite victory over Jabin, king of Hazor, superficially harmonising the two by making Sisera Jabin's general (27; 17b also is harmonistic).

The account of the war (? of Zebulun and Naphtali) with Jabin, which is the basis of Josh. 11 1 ff. also, seems to be derived from the same source as the victory of Judah and Simeon over Adonibezek (Judg. 15 ff., cp Josh. 10), i.e., J; in that case it was probably quite brief. Contamination from the story of Jabin may be suspected in the mention of Kedesh of Naphtali as the home of Barak and the rendezvous of the tribes (6 10), and the locating of Jael's tent in the same vicinity (11 17), far away from the field of battle in the Great Plain; but the premises of this story are so imperfectly preserved that we cannot be certain. The story of Sisera is not improbably from E; but there are no decisive grounds for the attribution. v. 17b is at least redactional; 5 is a late addition (RP).

Chap. 5 is a triumphal ode, celebrating the victory over Sisera. The title (1) was probably prefixed by the editor who introduced the poem into the historical context (cp Exod. 15 1); 31b is D's standing formula; 2 is thought by some to be misplaced or editorial; to others 2 f. appears to be an invitational; in the manner of the liturgical psalms; 31a is also questioned (see Budde Ri.). Whether the ode was included in one of the collections of old Hebrew poetry such as the Book of Jashar, and whether it was found in one of the sources of Judges (? J), are questions which can hardly be answered with any confidence. See further, DEBORAH, § 3.

The usual deuteronomistic introduction is found in 6 1-6, embodying material from JE, and glossed by later hands; the close in 8 28; 8 33-35 is a

8. Chaps. 6-8. brief substitute for 9, which was not included in the deuteronomistic Judges. Gideon, Abimelech. The composite character of 6-8 was early recognised (Studer)—8 4 ff. cannot be the sequel of 7 22-8 3; but the problem in 6 f. is extremely complicated, and a complete solution is scarcely to be expected. See GIDEON.

Judg. 6 8-10, the prophet's reproof, is akin to Josh. 24 1 S. 7 10 17 ff. 12; the resemblance may point to identity of source or to dependence, and the verses may be ascribed accordingly to E₂ or to a late editor;¹ the fact that the speech is broken off may be urged for the former hypothesis (Budde). The call of Gideon, 11-24, is from J (Böhmé and most recent critics); many glosses, probably by more than one hand, in 13b 14 16 17b 18a 20 21b anticipate Gideon's recognition of his visitor, and convert his hospitality into a sacrifice: it is not necessary to suppose contamination from a second source; 25-32 is cognate to 7-11, and presumably from the same source (E₂); late glosses in 28b 31aβ 32b 33; 36-40 are with much probability ascribed to E; 34 is from J; 35a 7-8 is an addition attributed to RJE (Moore, SBOT) or to a post-exilic hand (Budde); 6 35b is a still later exaggeration.

Chap. 7 9-15 is ascribed by Budde to E, by Moore and Holzinger to J. In the description of the night attack on the Midianite camp (16-22) two stratagems have been combined—a clear analysis is impossible. The horns are probably from E (cp Josh. 6), the jars and torches then from J; Winckler with considerable probability surmises that the latter originally belonged to the account of the attack E. of the Jordan (8 11);² it would follow that 8 4 ff. was omitted by the redactor who fused the two versions in 7 16 ff. Chap. 7 24 f. 8 1-3, form the conclusion of E's narrative (harmonistic gloss in 7 25b).

Chap. 8 4-21, with the exception of glosses and retouches in 10b 16, is from the oldest source (J); it presumes a personal grievance which is not mentioned in 6 1-8 3. Chap. 8 22 f., the rejection of the kingdom, stands on the same plane with 1 S. 8 10 17 ff. 12; the question whether we have to do with a late addition to E or with a deuteronomistic hand is of import chiefly for the history of the redaction. The setting up of the 'Ephod' at Ophrah (24-27a) is from J (glosses in 26), the comment thereupon (27b) deuteronomistic; 28 33-35 is R_D's close; 30-32 were inserted by R_P (cp 11 2) when he restored 9 to its original place in the book.³

Chap. 9, Abimelech. The chapter exhibits no trace of deuteronomistic redaction; but it is plainly composite. Two accounts of the disfigurement of the Shechemites stand side by side in 34 ff. and 42 ff.; the antecedents of both may be traced in the earlier part of the chapter.

³ See § 14.

Both sources must have narrated how Abimelech became king; but 1-6 seems to be homogeneous. The story of Gaal (26-40 [47]) is, in the main, from J;¹ Jotham's apologue (7-21) from E (16b-19a not improbably secondary); 22-25 E (+R₁E), from which 42-45 also are derived; 46-55 are ascribed by Moore to E (cp 41), by Budde to J (41=R₁E); 56 f. may be from E or R₁E.

The brief notices of the 'minor judges' differ in both form and content from the stories in the midst of which they stand.

They speak neither of oppression nor of deliverance; the stereotyped formula is, After him N N judged Israel . . . years . . . And N N died and 128-15 : Minor was buried in such and such a place. The Judges. years of rule (2, 22, 7, 10, 8) differ noticeably from the symmetrical numbers of R_D's chronology (40, 20, 80).

The names of several of these 'judges' are otherwise known as names of clans, and what is told of their numerous posterity, possessions, and matrimonial alliances seems to be the legendary reflection of clan history.

Many scholars therefore think that these notices were made up by a late redactor to round out the number of twelve judges.² In confirmation of this view it was pointed out that the sum of the years of their rule (70) is almost exactly that of the periods of oppression (71) in R_D's introductions to the stories of the judges; the post-exilic editor made the succession continuous, reckoning the years of foreign domination (in the intention of R_D, interregna) in the rule of the succeeding judge.³ The framework in which these names and numbers are set is an imitation of R_D. Others, observing that the formula of the minor judges occurs also at the close of the story of Jephthah (12 7, note also the stx years of his rule cp 15 20 1 S. 4 18 7 15), believe that the minor judges were contained in JE, and were taken thence without change by R_D; the set phrases of R_D are an amplification of those of his predecessor.⁴

The arguments from the number twelve and from the chronology are not conclusive, and even if it were certain that the minor judges were not contained in the deuteronomistic book, it would still be possible that R_P did not invent them, but simply restored them from JE; that the names are really those of clans is not proof of late origin, as we may see from Gen. 38, for example.

The introduction to the story of Jephthah, 10 6-16, is much longer than usual, and appears on close examination not to be homogeneous.

In 6-9 the set formulas of R_D have been expanded by subsequent editors (especially in 6aβ 8b 9a); 10-16 is cognate with 6 8-10; it looks as if a redactor had combined an

10. Chap. 10 6- introduction to the Philistine oppression in 12 7 : Jephthah. the days of Eli with that to the Ammonite oppression (cp 7); 17 f. belongs to the deuteronomistic introduction, the material being taken from the following story; the closing formulas are found in 11 33 12 7 (perhaps pre-deuteronomistic); in 11 f. we have editorial amplification

In 10 17-12 7, the long diplomatic representation to the king of Ammon, 11 12-28, is foreign to the main narrative; it has in reality nothing to do with the Ammonites; the argument is drawn entirely from the history of Israel's relations to Moab. The passage is therefore generally regarded as an editorial addition (? R₁E).

Holzinger, followed by Budde (KHC, Richter, 80-82), conjectures that two stories (J and E) about Jephthah have been combined, much as are the two stories about Gideon in 6-8. An outlawed freebooter recalled from banishment by the Gileadites (11 1-10 in the main; 2 is a late interpolation); after seeking aid in vain from the tribes west of the Jordan (cp 12 2, and 11 29), he marches against the Ammonites and defeats them; the Ephraimites who come against him seeking trouble are severely punished (12 1-6). In the other (E) he was represented as dwelling at Mizpah; the enemy is Moab (11 12 ff., harmonised by R₁E by the substitution of the name Ammon); the victory is purchased by the vow which cost the life of the hero's daughter (11 30-40).⁵

In the story of Samson the brief deuteronomistic formulas are found in 13 1 15 20 16 31.

11. Chaps. 13- The stories, which are not all of the same antiquity, were in all probability found in J; composition or contamination from E is not demonstrable; in some cases a later Yahwistic variant has been united with the older story (Budde); in 14 an editor has made numerous changes, the tendency of which is to remove the offence of Samson's marriage into a Philistine family.¹

As has been noted above (§ 3, ii.), chaps. 17 f. exhibit no signs of deuteronomistic redaction. The repetitions

12. Chaps. 17 f. which abound in the story have been ascribed to interpolation by an editor
Migration of Danites.² whose aim was to throw contumely on the famous sanctuary at Dan;³ more probably they are due to the union of two closely parallel versions.⁴

The main narrative is from J; the second version may be traced in 17 2-4 7* 11b 12a 18 3 4*, in one strand running through 18 7-10 15 31 (or 30). The hands of both R_{JE} and R_P may be recognised; the former in harmonistic adjustments, the latter chiefly in archæological notes.

In chapters 19-21 there is a stratum which in spirit and language is akin to the youngest additions to the Hexateuch and to the historical midrash in Chron. To 13. Chaps. 19-21: the late stratum belong 20 1 2* 9-13 (remains of the older text in 14 19 29, considerable part of 36-41, 44a 47), 21 2-14 in the main, 16 19b 20a 22* 24. The older narrative was itself composite, as appears most clearly in 19. The main source is J, contamination from a second version is to be recognised especially in 19 6b-8 10* 13 15a; a complete separation of the two closely parallel and intimately welded accounts is not feasible. In 21 the rape of the Shilohite maidens (15 17-19a 21-23, excluding glosses in 22) comes from the oldest source; the remainder is not homogeneous; Budde finds (in 1 6-8 10a 12* 13 14* 24b) E's account of the expedition to Jabesh combined with the post-exilic version of the same; others ascribe the repetition and confusion to very late interpolation (especially in 4 f.), evidence of which is found in 20 also (11 18 23 f. 27 f. etc.). The midrash seems to have been united to JE by a redactor; see § 14.

Redaction.—i. Pre-deuteronomistic (R_{JE}).—As in Josh. 1-12, the deuteronomistic author of Judg. found J and

14. Redaction. E already united by an earlier redactor (R_{JE}); there is no evidence that he had J or E separately. The earlier redaction was primarily harmonistic; it laboured with more or less skill to make one continuous narrative out of two. Its religious standpoint was that of the prophetic period; the moral and religious lessons of the history are emphasised, as they were also in the younger stratum of E; it is not improbable that the beginnings of a pragmatism akin to that of R_D were found in R_{JE}. The historical standpoint is that of a united nation, and it was natural that the redactor should see in the invasions of particular regions and the deliverances wrought by local champions the oppression and liberation of all Israel, thus also preparing the way for R_D.

ii. Deuteronomistic (R_D).—The aim of the deuteronomistic author, as has been observed above, was religious rather than historical; the experience of Israel in the days of the judges is used to enforce for his own generation the lesson that unfaithfulness to Yahwè is always punished by national calamity, but that repentance brings deliverance. This lesson is set forth in the introductions to the whole book, and to the history of the several judges; the redactor hardly touched the stories themselves. He freely omitted, however, what did not readily lend itself to his purpose; chaps. 1 9 (for which 8 33-35 is a substitute) 17 f. 19-21, and perhaps the end of Samson's career, 16 (note the close 15 20). Later deuteronomistic editors may have added some verses, especially in the longer introductions (26-36 61-10 106-18).⁵

It is not probable that the deuteronomistic Book of Judges ended with 16 31 (or 15 20); the Philistine oppression was not at an end with the death of Samson. We should expect the author to include the whole period of the judges down to the establishment of the kingdom, and, at least, he can hardly have failed to record the deliverance from the Philistines. Confirmation of this antecedent probability is found in 1 S. 1-12.

At the close of the life of Eli (1 S. 4 18) we read the formula, 'He judged Israel forty years,' precisely corresponding to Judg. 16 31 (cp 12 7 10 2 f. 12 9 11 14); Samuel also is represented as a great deliverer, under whom the Philistines suffered such a repulse 'that they were subdued and no more invaded the territory of Israel; the hand of Yahwè was against the Philistines as long as Samuel lived' (1 S. 7 13; cp Judg. 2 18 Josh. 1 5 Judg. 3 31 4 23 f. 8 28 11 33); of Samuel also it is said, 'He judged Israel as long as he lived' (1 S. 7 15).

We should expect also that the author of the deuteronomistic Judges would bring his book to a close by repeating and enforcing the religious lessons he had so much at heart, just as the deuteronomistic history of Moses closes with his solemn parting admonitions (Dt. 4 29 f.), and the deuteronomistic history of Joshua with similar exhortations from the leader of the conquest (Josh. 23). The farewell address of Samuel, the last of the judges, in 1 S. 12, with its historical retrospect and its solemn warnings for the future, so evidently marking the boundary between the history of the judges and the kings, is just such a close as we should look for from the author of Judg. 26-36 (or 21 f.). The alternative is to suppose that the passages cited from Samuel belong exclusively to a pre-deuteronomistic editor; which would compel us to suppose (with Budde) that the original conclusion of the deuteronomistic Judges was omitted by the post-exilic redaction (R_P).

iii. Post-exilic (R_P).—In Judg., as in Josh. 13 f., it seems that JE was in the hands of the post-exilic redactor, who restored from it the chapters which R_D omitted (19 17-21). The splitting of the deuteronomistic formula in 4 24 and 5 31b, suggests the possibility that 5 also was inserted by a post-exilic hand. The last redactor also introduced the midrashic version of the war on Benjamin in 19-21; many minor additions and changes in the text of other chapters are to be ascribed to this redactor or to still later editors and scribes. To R_P many scholars attribute also the 'minor judges' (10 1-5 12 8-15); see above, § 9. It is generally agreed that Shamgar in 3 31 belongs to one of the latest stages of the redaction. The history of the text shows that the verse once stood after 16 31 (following Samson), where the Philistine slayer is in place, and was introduced by the usual formula of the minor judges. The character and form of the notice remind us strongly of the exploits of David's heroes (2 S. 23, cp especially Shammah ben Agee, 11 f.). Corruption of the name to Shamgar (5 6) led to the insertion of the verse before 4 *f.*¹ It is quite possible that the verse in its original form stood in JE after Samson.

In 1 K. 6 1 the deuteronomistic author makes the time from the Exodus to the founding of the temple in the 15. Chronology.² fourth year of Solomon 480 years. This is manifestly computed on the basis of twelve generations of forty years.³

The chronology of R_D in Judg. belongs to the same system. Othniel's victory secured peace for 40 years; Ehud's, 80; Barak's, 40; Gideon's, 40; Samson judged Israel 20 years. By the side of these round numbers appear others which do not seem to be systematic; for the rule of the 'minor judges' (23, 22, 7, 10, 8), Jephthah (6), Abimelech (3), and for most of the periods of oppression (8, 18, 20, 7, 18, 40). The sum of all these numbers, together with the times of Moses (40), Joshua, Eli (40, 20), Samuel, Saul, David (40), greatly exceeds 480, and various hypotheses have been proposed to bring the data into agreement. The most probable is that the years of foreign domination are not to be counted separately, but to be included in the rule of the judges, which are thus continuous. We thus obtain: Moses, 40; Joshua, x; Othniel, 40; Ehud, 80; Barak, 40; Gideon, 40; Minor Judges with Jephthah, 76; Samson, 20; Eli, 40; Samuel, y; Saul, z; David, 40; Solomon (to the founding of the temple), 4; total 420 + x + y + z, which leaves us 60 (or if with 20 we give only 20 years to Eli, 80) years for

JUDGES (BOOK)

Joshua, Samuel, and Saul. Substantially the same result is reached by those who reckon in the periods of oppression and exclude the 'minor judges' as a later addition (see § 9).

The oldest written history of the period of the judges drew its materials from the local traditions; the story of Ehud is connected with Gilgal; 16. Ultimate sources. Gideon and Abimelech with Ophrah and Shechem; Jephthah with Mizpeh in Gilead; Deborah and Barak belong apparently to the tribes N. of the Great Plain (though Deborah may have been early appropriated by Ephraim). The subject of these traditions was naturally the daring deed by which an Israelite hero discomfited the enemy and delivered his countrymen; of the situation only enough was recalled to make the achievement the more glorious; there was no motive for preserving the memory of the misfortunes of the Israelites in war, or the way in which their neighbours got the upper hand of them. We may be sure that if the deuteronomistic author had found any such details in his sources he would have made the most of them.

Chaps. 13-16 are of a different character. They contain a life of Samson from the announcement of his birth to his death, and narrate, not one signal act of deliverance, but a series of exploits in which the hero, a man of gigantic strength, in his own cause, single-handed, inflicts many injuries upon the Philistines. The stories may reflect a historical situation, the Danite Hercules may have been a historical person; but it is evident that we have in these chapters not historical traditions, in the sense in which we may use those words of the stories of Ehud, Gideon, Abimelech, and others, but popular tales, in which, as usual, elements of widely diverse origin—in part, perhaps, mythical—have been united in the imagination of the people.¹ It is noteworthy, and not without historical significance, that these are the only stories in the book which come from the south.

Chapters 17 f., which have for subject the migration of the Danites, the origin of the idol and the priesthood at Dan, are probably derived from the traditions of that sanctuary. Of the history of the war over Gibeah (chap. 19 f.), we can only say that it seems to be from an Ephraimite source.

In estimating the historical value of the Book of Judges, we must bear in mind that the stories of the deliverers of Israel represent only 17. Historical value. certain glorious moments in the history of these centuries; of their manifold vicissitudes of fortune tradition has preserved but fragmentary memories, and of the long, slow process by which the nomadic Israelite tribes established themselves in Canaan and adopted the agriculture and arts of the older inhabitants, we learn only from the glimpses which the stories incidentally afford us.

The chronological scheme of R_D is late and systematic; we cannot be sure that the order in which the stories were arranged in JE was chronological. In the stories themselves a legendary admixture cannot be denied; this has been successively heightened by later authors and editors; the union of parallel accounts by R_{JE} has, in more than one case, wrought an intricate confusion which baffles the keenest analytic criticism.

When all this is recognised, however, it remains true that the picture which the book gives us of the social and religious conditions of the period which preceded the establishment of the kingdom is of the highest historical value. It is manifest that the traditions contained in it were fixed in writing before the momentous changes which the kingdom wrought had had time to make such a state of things as is represented in Judg. unintelligible or unsympathetic.

We fortunately possess one contemporary monument, the Song of Deborah;² and its description of the great struggle with the Canaanites confirms the impression that the picture of the times which the stories draw for us is as faithful as it is vivid.¹

The Hebrew text of Judges is unusually well preserved. Only in parts of the Song of Deborah does

18. Text. any considerable passage seem to be beyond critical remedy. In other difficult places unskilful redaction, rather than faulty transmission, seems to be responsible for the obscurity.

There are two distinct, if not wholly independent, Greek translations of the book; one found in the great mass of manuscripts (A, etc.), and rendered by most of the secondary versions, of which Lagarde's edition may be taken as a fair representative; the other in B, a group of minuscules, and the Sahidic version. The latter, which is the younger of the two, abberes closely to MT, and is consequently of relatively little value for the emendation of the text.²

JUDITH, THE BOOK OF (ΙΟΥΔΕΙΘ [BNA], i.e., יהודית), one of the Books of the APOCRYPHA [§ 5, 4], has

1. Two versions come down to us in a shorter and a longer form, and the text of the latter in a variety of recensions.

The various texts belonging to the longer (the canonical) recension show much more pronounced differences than are found in those belonging to the other. Even Jerome speaks of the number and variety of the MSS of the Judith legend which had been seen by him.

The two forms of the story are quite different in tendency and in historical background. The contents, which though similar are not absolutely identical, are therefore summarised here separately, as comparison of the two forms of the story may enable us to arrive at sure conclusions as to the date and origin of the book.³

² On the text see Moore, Judges, xliii f., and in addition to the authors there cited, Mez, Die Bibel des Josephus, '95; cp Moore's critical edition of the text in SBOT Heb., 1900.

³ The line here taken renders it unnecessary to discuss other critical theories, which, resting on mere conjecture, were only provisionally useful. They are briefly referred to by König in his Eintl., and discussed at length by Ball in his commentary. [Ball himself refers Judith to the time of queen Salome-

JUDITH (BOOK)

The longer form of the story is as follows:—Arphaxad, king of Ecbatana, fortifies his city. Nabuchodonosor 2. Longer (Nebuchadrezzar), king of the Assyrians in Nineveh, makes war against him and story (A): summons the dwellers in all the lands between Persia and Memphis to his aid. They refuse. Vowing vengeance against them, he marches alone to battle with ARPHAXAD (q.v., 2), and destroys him. After an interval he appoints Holofernes general over his army, and sends him against those nations which had refused their aid, with orders to spare none who should offer resistance, or should refuse to recognise and worship Nebuchadrezzar as a god.

Holofernes occupies all the places along the sea coast, and destroys all their gods so that 'all the nations should worship Nabuchodonosor only, and that all their tongues and their tribes should call upon him as god' (38). The 'children of Israel that dwelt in Judæa,' terrified at his approach, fortify their hills. Joakim the high priest charges the people of Bethulia and Betomesthaim to guard the passes to the hill-country, while all the inhabitants of Judæa and Jerusalem betake themselves to fasting and prayer.

Achior, the leader of the children of Ammon, tells Holofernes who the Jews are and warns him not to attack them, for if there is no iniquity among them their Lord will defend them and their God be for them. Holofernes and his followers are incensed against Achior, and rebuke him, telling him that there is no God but Nabuchodonosor, who has decreed the utter destruction of the Jews. Achior will be destroyed with them. Having thus spoken Holofernes causes Achior to be cast down and left at the foot of the hill near Bethulia. He is rescued by the Jews, who, after the words of Holofernes have been reported to them, fall down and worship God, saying: 'O Lord God of heaven, behold their arrogance, and pity the low estate of our race, and look upon the face of those that are sanctified unto thee (or, thy sanctuary [Syr.]) this day' (6 19).

Holofernes lays siege to Bethulia and stops the water supply. The people lose heart and press Ozias and the rulers to give way; these promise to do so, if no help arise before five days have passed. Now in those days there lived a widow, named Judith, of rare piety and beauty. She fasted all the days of her widowhood save the eves of the Sabbath, and the Sabbaths, the eves of the new moons and the new moons, and the feasts and solemn days of the house of Israel. She blames Ozias and the rulers for thinking of submission, and points out to them that as they are now worshipping none other but the true God—and no one among them worships gods made with hands as had aforesaid been the case—they may safely put their trust in God that he will not despise them nor any of their race. The rulers excuse themselves, and Judith promises to do for them something that shall go down to all generations. When left alone she falls on her face, and at the time when incense is being offered in the temple in Jerusalem she prays God to help her in her undertaking, recalling the deliverances wrought in the time of the Maccabæan revolt and on other occasions when God had signally discomfited the plans of their enemies for the destruction of the Jewish nation. She then decks herself bravely and goes to the camp of Holofernes accompanied by her maid, who carries a bottle of wine, a cruse of oil, a bag filled with parched corn and fine bread (and cheese [It. Syr. Vg.]). Arrived at the camp, she is brought before Holofernes, who asks her wherefore she has come.

She tells him that her nation cannot be punished, neither can the sword prevail against them, except they sin against their God, but that now they are about to eat all those things which God charged them by his laws that they should not eat, and that they will therefore be delivered into his hands. She will show him the way to the town, and will lead him until he comes to Jerusalem. Holofernes is highly pleased, and bids that his people should prepare for her of his own meats and that she should drink of his own wine. This she refuses; but in the morning she asks and receives permission to go forth into the valley of Bethulia for prayer; on three successive nights accordingly she goes forth and washes herself in a fountain by the camp.

Alexandra (79-70 B.C.), and G. Klein (Actes du 1^{er} Congrès internat. des Orientalistes, sect. sémit. 287-295, Leyden, 193), reviving a theory of Hitzig, to the period of the revolt of Bar-Cochba (131-135 A.D.)]

On the fourth day Holofernes who wishes to 'deceive' Judith sends BAGOAS (q.v.) the eunuch to invite her to a banquet. She accepts. He drinks deeply and is left alone with her. Praying God for strength she smites off, with his own scimitar, the head of Holofernes, and putting it into her bag of victuals, hastens to Bethulia. All the people run together on hearing her voice, and seeing the head of Holofernes, give praise to God, who has not taken away his mercy from Israel. The next morning they fall upon the besiegers, who, finding their leader dead, lose heart and flee in wild disorder.

The Jews spoil the camp for thirty days, and Judith after singing a song of praise and thanksgiving to God accompanies the victors to Jerusalem, where the rejoicings before the sanctuary continue for the space of three months. After a great and glorious life she dies at the age of one hundred and five years, and is buried in Bethulia in the cave of her husband Manasseh. 'And there was none that made the children of Israel any more afraid in the days of Judith, nor a long time after her death' (16 25). (Vg. adds: 'but the day of the festival of this victory is received by the Hebrews in the number of the holy days, and is observed by the Jews from that time unto the present day.')

The shorter form is as follows:—Seleucus besieged Jerusalem. The Israelites were fasting and praying.

3. Shorter story (B). Among them was a beautiful maiden, Judith the daughter of Ahitob. God inspired her with the thought that a miracle would be wrought through her. So she set out from Jerusalem with her maid and went to the camp of Seleucus, where she told the king that having heard that the town was sure to fall into his hands, she had come out first that she might find favour in his eyes. The king, struck by her beauty, desired to have her company. She declared herself willing to satisfy him, but as she was in her impurity, so she told him, she asked his permission to go out unmolested in the middle of the night to the fountain of water to make her ablutions. The king granted her request. At the banquet he drank much wine and was afterwards left alone with her. Taking his falchion she cut off his head and hastened with it to Jerusalem, passing unmolested through the camp. The Israelites seeing this unexpected deliverance rejoiced greatly, and going forth routed their enemies. They established this day as a day of feasting. It fell on the eighteenth day of Adar, and was observed as a day on which mourning and fasting were forbidden.

Of the two tales the shorter seems to retain the true original character most. There is nothing improbable in a story of the kind. The names are

4. Date of B. historical, and the besieged place is Jerusalem. The mention of the day on which the memory of the achievement was celebrated points to the fact that we have here a fragment of the Maccabæan calendar, which was abrogated officially in the middle of the third century of our era, but had fallen into desuetude long before. The narrative is probably the record of an occurrence during the wars of the Maccabees. There is not a single reference in it to ceremonial observances, nor any allusion to sin and its consequences for the political future of the nation, through forfeiture of the grace and mercy of God by transgression, and by the worship of false gods. The reason for the visit to the fountain is made perfectly obvious, whilst in the other recension it is anything but clear.

The longer tale differs completely in style, tendency, and conception. A simple incident in a war of antiquity and the heroism of a Jewish maiden are only the warp upon which a later writer has woven his richly embroidered tale. He has transformed it into a tale of comfort and encouragement.

From the leading features of the story as epitomised above, it is evident that the author of the romance laid the greatest possible stress upon strict observance of all the religious ceremonial in vogue in his time. He manifests his strong belief that God is sure to grant his aid to those who have not sinned. He takes the greatest care to emphasize the ruin that is sure to follow upon any meddling with the tithes or other sacred things, he abhors all ceremonial defilement, and dwells upon the efficacy of prayer; the prayer of the righteous and pure widow is sure to be heard, and her intercession saves the Jewish race. Judith scrupulously abstains from touching any of the food of the heathen. She fasts all the days of her widowhood, except on certain feast days and their eves.

All these details show that the author of the longer story was a Pharisee. One might feel inclined to think of him as one of the ASSIDÆANS (q. v.) from the very great stress he lays on the regular ablution before prayer, which is nowhere else heard of.

A reminiscence of the old original survives in 129 where we read that 'She came in clean,' but in what respect is not mentioned. We are to understand that the whole rabbinical ceremonial law has been observed with great minuteness by Judith, in full agreement with the decisions arrived at in the controversy between the school of Shammai and that of Hillel. This is equally clear in the matter of food (wine, oil, and bread) and in that of the tithes which it is not lawful for any of the people so much as to touch with their hands (11 13).

These rigorous prescriptions point to the end of the first century B. C.

A further study of the additional elements in the longer version (A) may enable us to fix its date with still greater precision. The chief ruler of the nation is the high priest; no mention is made of a king. Nebuchadrezzar has killed Arphaxad.

It is easily seen that these names, borrowed from ancient history, stand for more modern ones, and have been chosen for the purpose of giving the book an air of antiquity, since otherwise it would defeat its own ends. Unless put forth as a tale of ancient deliverance it would miss the popular effect it was intended to have in times of danger and distress.

The book also mentions Achior, the chief of the house of Ammon, as friendly to the Jews (5 5 6 2 ff.). A great danger threatens the people.

They are uncertain of the issue, but are convinced that God will not deliver them into the hands of their enemies if only they do what is right and live piously. It appears that they are suffering from great drought or scarcity of water.

Taking these and other data (see, e. g., JEMNAAN) together, we shall find but one period which the author can have had before him—the time, namely, of the approach of Pompey to Jerusalem (B. C. 63).

Aristobulus II. had commenced a war against his brother Hyrcanus II. Scarus (Holofernes), the Roman general in Syria, took the part of Aristobulus. Pompey, before coming to Palestine, had a war with Mithridates, whom he overthrew and slew, exactly as Nabuchodonosor smote Arphaxad. Aretas, king of the Nabatæans, assisted Hyrcanus at the instigation of Antipater the Idumæan. When hostilities commenced between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, a certain holy man, Onias by name (= Joakim), prayed that the great drought might cease (Jos. Ant. xiv. 21). Pompey, taking the side of Hyrcanus, deposed Aristobulus and appointed Hyrcanus high priest.

Here we find all the leading elements in the tale in correspondence with the historical events. BETHULIA (q. v.) is thus seen to be equivalent to ביתחאל: the House of God, Jerusalem. This hypothesis is corroborated and strengthened if we compare the book with another product of exactly the same period, viz., the Psalms of Solomon, written shortly after this date, when Pompey had already met his death in Egypt.

The situation as viewed by the two authors is almost identical, and the Psalms furnish a number of parallels to the leading views expressed by the author of Judith. He too knows of a high priest only. He too lays preponderant stress on the observance of ceremonial law (38-10) and on prayer (24 etc.); the prayer of the righteous is heard (15 1). He too dwells on ceremonial pollution and its purification (22 f. 8 12 f. 17 25-33); God blesses pious conduct (12 87) (see Kyle and James, Psalms of the Pharisees, xlviii f. [91]). Besides, the tone which pervades the prayers of Judith and her last song finds its absolute counterpart in those Psalms. Both reflect the same period, viz., circa 50 B. C.

The ceremonial prescriptions mentioned in Judith render any earlier date impossible; and at any later date the book would have lost its value and importance, as being too transparent a fiction.

Winckler has given an analysis of the sources with new views on Holofernes and Judith (AF 2 266 ff.). He derives the name Judith from the Babylonian Ištar.

* See Schürer, Hist. 1 318.

According to Willrich (Judaica, 33 [1900]), the book was written in the quiet period between 157 and 153 B. C. The author is one of the Assidæans (hasidim) who welcomed Alcimus. He holds that it was not the Maccabees who rescued the Jewish people, but Yahwè alone and his instrument Judith. Ozias (= Jonathan) plays quite a secondary role. The name Holofernes is suggested by Odoares, Arphaxad by Artaxias, Bethulia by Bethalagan (see, however, HOLOFERNES, BETHULIA, BETH-BASI).

If the book was meant to be accepted as an old book, and if it was the work of a Pharisee or Assidæan, it could only have been written in the original language of the people—viz., either in Aramaic or (what is more probable¹) in Hebrew. Jerome mentions Hebrew MSS, and the addition which appears at the end of his translation only proves him to have had access to a text which stood in some relation to the more complete Hebrew text of what is now the short recension (B). In these alone do we find an allusion to the observance of the day as a festival.

1. Of the long recension (A) no old Hebrew text has, thus far, been critically edited. Jellinek has merely reprinted a later version Hemdaith ha-yamini, 2 f. 62b-65c (Constantinople, 1737) = Bet ha-miarasch, 2 12-22.

7. Editions. A better text is one that has hitherto remained unnoticed (Ozar ha-Kodesh, 6b-12a; Lemberg [Amsterdam], '51). A very old version, older at least than the twelfth century if not of even much greater antiquity, has been discovered by Dr. Gaster in the Chronicle of Jerahmeel (see The Chronicles of Jerahmeel, 99). Both of these agree with Jerome and have the same ending. For other allusions to the story of Judith in Hebrew literature see Zunz (Gottesdienstl. Vortr. 131, n. d). The relation between these texts and that of Jerome requires further study.

The Greek versions have come down in three recensions, one of which forms the LXX text (best ed., O. F. Fritzsche, Lib. Apocr. Vel. Test. Græce, 165-203). The second, more akin to the Lat. and Syr., is found in a MS (cod. 58 Holmes and Parsons), and a third in a group of MSS not very different from the latter. The Latin versions are: (a) Vetus, ed. Sabatier, Bibl. sac. Lat. verss. antiq. 1 744-790 (1743), from five codices; (b) Jerome's Vulgata. The Syriac is given in Lagarde, Lib. vel. Test. Apocr. Syriace, 104-126 ('61). For further bibliography (Gr., Lat., and Syr. versions, etc.) see Schürer, GJV 2 599-603. See also Wi. AF 2 266 ff.

JULIA (יווליא [Ti. WH]), is saluted in Rom. 16 15 in conjunction with PHILOLOGUS (q. v.), who was doubtless her husband (cp ROMANS, §§ 4 10). She may have been a freedwoman of some member of the gens Julia; the name is, at all events, exceedingly common.

JULIUS (יווליוס [Ti. WH]), the centurion of the Augustan band (see ARMY, § 10), who had charge of Paul when he was sent to Rome (Acts 27 1 3).

JUNIAS (so RV, but RV^{mg.} and AV have Junia, assuming with Chrysostom and other ancient interpreters a feminine nominative for ΙΟΥΝΙΑΝ [Ti. WH]), which, however, more probably represents a nominative ΙΟΥΝΙΑC, an abbreviated form of Junianus) is mentioned in Rom. 16 7 along with Andronicus as being an apostle, as a kinsman and fellow-prisoner of Paul, and as having been 'in Christ' before him (cp ROMANS, §§ 4 10). It has been conjectured from the name that he may have been originally a slave; the word 'kinsman' seems to suggest that he was of Jewish birth.

See, further, ANDRONICUS. In the list of the seventy by Pseudo-Dorotheus (A) Junias figures as bishop of Apamea in Syria.

JUNIPER (דןן, rôthem, 1 K. 19 4 f. Job 30 4 Ps. 120 4†) should be 'broom' (so Job 30 4 RV, 1 K. 19 4 RVmg, Ps. 1204 RVmg), except, probably, in 1 K. 194.¹

The Heb. word puzzled the LXX translators, who render by φυτόν in 1 K. 195 and by ἐρημικότης in Ps. 1204, while in Job 304 the translator shortens his text (Bab mg. וְיָאֵל הָיָה עֵצָא). Pesb. has 'terebinth' in 1 K. 19, and 'oak' in Ps. 120. Aq. rendered 'juniper' (ἀρκευθίναις, ἀρκευθίναι, ραβαμιν) in 1 K. and in the Psalm; this is also in Vg., which as usual follows Jewish tradition. Symm. has σκέπης, ἐστρωβασμίνων, ξύλων, ἀγρίων.

In spite of the versions Ar. ratam certainly means 'broom' (cp Löw, 366). The particular species is probably Genista Ratam, Forsk., which, according to Robinson (BR 1203), is 'the largest and most conspicuous shrub' in the deserts S. of Palestine.

a. 1 K. 195 can be explained by another quotation from the same source. 'Our Arabs always selected the place of encampment (if possible) in a spot where it grew, in order to be sheltered by it at night from the wind; and during the day, when they often went on in advance of the camels, we found them not unfrequently sitting or sleeping under a bush of Retem to protect them from the sun.'

b. Ps. 1204 is a more doubtful passage. RV renders thus, 'What shall be given unto thee, O thou deceitful tongue? Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper.' The mode of expression, however, is 'somewhat artificial, not to say affected' (Duhm). The tongue is itself an 'arrow'; bow can 'arrows' be given to it, and bow can arrows be united with 'coals'? Travellers tell us, no doubt, that 'coals of broom' emit an intense heat (see COAL, § 2, col. 854). This illustrates the phrase, but not its figurative application in this context. Hupfeld has already seen that 'coals' (עֵצָא) should be 'tents' (אֶתֶר). This at once gives a new aspect to the passage; but it creates a new riddle which only a more thorough investigation of the text can solve. Probably, for רַחֲמֵי, we should read רַחֲמֵי, and render v. 4b (emended text) thus, 'Arrows of a warrior are the tongues of the people of the tents of Mīsrām' (see MIZRAIM, § 2 [6]).

c. Job 304 RV, 'and the roots of the broom are their meat' (רַחֲמֵי), supposing that these roots were sometimes eaten by famine-stricken men. Many critics, however, find this supposition difficult, and propose to read רַחֲמֵי or רַחֲמֵי assuming that fires of rothem branches are referred to (so RVmg, 'to warm them'). Both רַחֲמֵי and רַחֲמֵי are unsatisfactory.² It must be רַחֲמֵי, 'purslain' (see PURSLAIN), that is referred to; רַחֲמֵי should be רַחֲמֵי; v. 3 is a collection of misread duplications and the last two words a glossatorial comment on the corrupt רַחֲמֵי. Light and sense are thus restored to an almost desperate passage. Read—

'Who pluck mallow and the leaves (עֵצָא, G. Beer) of the Shah,
Who gnaw the broom-plant and the purslain.'

Thus only two passages with רַחֲמֵי can be vindicated. But we need not doubt the word on this account. Cp RITHMAH, T. K. C.

JUPITER (Greek ΖΕΥΣ ΠΑΤΗΡ = Sanscr. Djāus pitar; from √ΔΙF 'shining,' seen in dies), the supreme deity of the Greeks, the conception of whom arose from the contemplation of the clear sky (cp Holm, Greek Hist., ET 124 f.). In Acts 1935, therefore, the words τῷ διοπετοῦς ('the image which fell down from Jupiter,' AV; so also RV, with marg. 'heaven') should be rendered 'the image that fell from the bright sky.'

So Euripides rightly explains the same epithet in speaking of the image of the Tauric Artemis (Iph. T. 977, διοπετές ἀγάλμα: cp v. 1384, ὄβρανῶ πέσμα). [For parallels in Hebrew cp Gen. 1924, 'brimstone and fire from Yahwē, from heaven' (מֵאֵת הַשָּׁמַיִם); Mic. 5716 'a dew from Yahwē' (טֶל מֵאֵת יְהוָה).]

The title Olympian (Ὀλύμπιος) was in general use throughout Greece as marking the supremacy of Zeus, owing to the influence of the Homeric poems, in which the abode of the gods was localised upon the summit of Mt. Olympus (cp Farnell, Cults of the Greek States, I. iv.).

As the god of hospitality and the protector of strangers he was everywhere worshipped as Zeus Xenios. In

² The use of rothem-branches for fuel would hardly be characteristic of the poorest class.

168 B.C. Antiochus Epiphanes (see ANTIOCHUS 2) established the worship of the Olympian Zeus in the Temple at Jerusalem (2 Macc. 62; on the Syriac equivalent of Διὸς Ὀλυμπίου, see col. 23 top, and on Dan. 1131 and 1211 see col. 22), and that of Zeus Xenios on Mt. Gerizim. It was this Antiochus who resumed the building of the greatest temple of Olympian Zeus, that at Athens, fifteen columns of which still remain: Peisistratos had laid the foundations; but the completion of the work was reserved for Hadrian (130 A.D.).

The Jupiter of Lystra (Acts 1412) is not the Greek Zeus, but the native Lycaonian deity identified by the Greek-speaking section of the population with the supreme god of the Greek pantheon; but we have no right to draw inferences as to the character of the cult from such identification, for identity of name by no means implied identity in character (e.g. the Artemis of Ephesus was very different from the Artemis of Delos). This caution applies also to the use of the name Hermes in this passage of Acts. Ramsay (Church in R. Emp. (5) 57, n.) acutely remarks that 'true to the Oriental character, the Lycaonians regarded the active and energetic preacher (Paul) as the inferior, and the more silent and statuesque figure (Barnabas) as the leader and principal.'¹ The idea that the deities manifested themselves on earth seems to have been prominent in central Asia Minor. Ovid (Metam. 862r) relates the Phrygian legend of the entertainment unawares of Zeus and Hermes by the poor couple Baucis and Philemon² (the legend was localised perhaps near Tyriaion, near Iconium: see Ramsay, Church in R. Emp. 58 n., and Comm. on Gal. 225, where he refers also to Phrygian inscriptions with the words τὸν ἐπιφανέστατον θεόν, 'the most manifest god').

In Acts 1413 (τοῦ Διὸς τοῦ ὄντος πρὸ τῆς πόλεως, 'Jupiter, which was before their city,' AV; 'whose temple was before the city,' RV), Codex Bezae reads τὸν ὄντος Διὸς πρὸ πόλεως (or better Προπόλεως, as one word), 'of Zeus who is (called) Zeus-before-the-City,' i.e., Zeus Propoleos. This is preferable.³ Ramsay (Church in R. Emp. 51) compares an inscription of Claudiopolis of Isauria, to the SE. of Lystra, recording a dedication αὐτῷ Προαστίῳ, 'to Zeus-before-the-Town.' Independent proof of the existence of the temple would probably be the first-fruits of excavation on the site of Lystra.

JUSHAB-HESED (יְהוֹשָׁבֵעַ), 'kindness is required,' § 23; אַרְבָּאֶסֶק [B], אַרְבָּאֶסֶל [A], יֹאֶסֶבֶעַ [L]), a son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 320f). The name seems improbable; it follows Hasadiah, and is of a type which is unusual in Hebrew proper names.

ἄ suggests יהושבֵעַ Jehosheba, of which 'Jushab' would be a corrupt fragment, and 'hesed' a fragment of a duplicated Hasadiah. Cp the corrupt names Giddalti, Romanti-ezer, etc. (see HEMAN, TOB-ADONIJAH). T. K. C.

JUSTICE (Administration of). See LAW AND JUSTICE.

JUSTUS (ΙΟΥΣΤΟΣ), under the form Justā, Justī, was a common name among the Jews. Josephus mentions three persons of the name, including a son of his own. Bar-Kappara, denouncing the practice of taking Roman names, says, 'They did not call Reuben Rufus, Judah Julianus, Benjamin Alexander, Joseph Justus.'⁴ We need hardly suppose that he is attacking the

¹ [In Acts 1412 in its present form, two reasons for the prominence of Barnabas seem to be combined: (1) that he was of imposing stature (contrast Paul, Acta Pauli et Thecla, 3), and (2) that he was not forward to speak, like Paul. Ἐπειδὴ κ.τ.λ. ('because he was the chief speaker,' EV) may perhaps be an early addition (the Fleury palimpsest omits). On the source of Acts 13f. cp ACTS, § 10.—Ed.]

JUSTUS

Alexander and Rufus of Mk. 15²¹, and the Joseph-Justus of Acts 1²³, but the coincidence of the names is remarkable.

1. Joseph Barsabas, 'surnamed Justus,' Acts 1²³; see BAR-SABAS, § 2.

2. Jesus, Justus, a Jewish Christian who, unlike most who were 'of the circumcision,' was a comfort to Paul, Col. 4¹¹. Theophylact identifies him with 3 below. According to a late tradition he became bishop of Eleutheropolis.

3. Titius Justus, see below.

JUSTUS (AB₂D*, etc.), or (RV) TITUS JUSTUS (NE) or Titius Justus (ΤΙΤΙΟΣ ΙΟΥΣΤΟΣ [Ti. WH], B*, Vg., Memph., Arm.), a proselyte (σεβωμενος τον θεον), whose house adjoined the synagogue, and who received the apostle Paul at a critical period during his first visit to Corinth (Acts 18⁷). As Ramsay points out,¹ he was evidently one of the coloni of the colony Corinth; the adhesion of a Roman citizen would be a great help to a Christian missionary. When the Christians left the synagogue, the house of Justus provided a convenient meeting-place. The exact name of Paul's friend, however, is disputed. Tregelles inclined to 'Justus' (AV); Ti., WH, and Blass adopt 'Titius Justus'; Wieseler, on doubtful grounds, prefers 'Titus Justus' (RV). The decision may perhaps be given by Paul himself, who, as Weizsäcker notes, (in the present text) makes no reference to his Corinthian entertainer. Probably not one of the forms given above, to which may be added the bare Titus (Pesh., Theb.), is correct.

KADESH

Probably the true name is Tertius Justus, 'Titius' being a corruption of 'Tertius.' The Roman Christian who had received Paul during his first visit to Corinth was of course still his intimate friend during his second visit, and as such was proud to discharge the important duties of a secretary. 'I, Tertius, who write this epistle . . . ' (Rom. 16²²). T. K. C.

JUTTAH (יִטָּח); Josh. 21¹⁶: ΤΑΝΥ [B], om. A, ΙΕΤΤΑ [L]; ΙΕΤΑ, or Jutah (יִטָּח); Josh. 15⁵⁵ RV; ΙΤΑΝ [B], ΙΕΤΤΑ [AL], a place in the hill-country of Judah, a Levitical city according to the Priestly Writer.

By mistake (notice the number in v. 60) Jutah is omitted in MT of 1 Ch. 6⁵⁹ [44]; it is restored by Be. and Ki., who have not noticed, however, that Ἰετ (arrav, Iota) had preceded them.¹

Eusebius and Jerome describe Juttah as a large village, 18 R. m. to the S. of Eleutheropolis (Onom. 266⁴⁹; 133¹⁰). This exactly agrees with the distance to the SE. from Beit Jibrin of the modern Yaffā, which lies very high on the S. slopes of a mountain, 5½ m. S. by W. from Hebron (Rob. BR 262⁸: Guérin, Judee, 3²⁰⁵; PEFAI 33¹⁰).

Rejand, Robinson, Renan, and Smend have identified it with the city referred to in Lk. 1³⁹ (εις πόλιν ιουδα [Ti. WH]), but 'Judah' there seems to be parallel to 'the hill-country' (cp v. 65), so that no particular city is specified, and, as Guérin points out (Judee, 188), the attested Greek form of Juttah has a τ not a δ. See also Schick, ZDPV 22⁸¹ ff. ('99). On the transition from the Hebrew to the Arabic form, see Kampffmeyer, ZDPV 16⁴²¹. T. K. C.

K

KAB (כַּב), 2 K. 6²⁵ RV, AV CAB (q.v.).

KABZEEL (כַּבְּזֵעַל, 'whom] God collects'), a city of Judah on the border of Edom, the native town of BENAIAH (1).

Josh. 15²¹ (καὶ βασιτεηλ [B], κασθηλ [A], καβθηλ [L]); 2 S. 23²⁰ (καβσηη [B*A], καταβεθηηλ [B*MG], γαβασσηλ [L]); 1 Ch. 11²² (καβασσηλ [BA], βασσηλ [Nvid], καβσηηλ [L]).

In Neh. 11²⁵ the name appears as JEKABZEEL (כַּבְּזֵעַל; om. BN*A, καβσηηλ [N^{ca}MG-L]). Most probably it is a corruption of Jehalše'e'l (יְהִלְשֵׁעַל), Halše'e'l (יְהִלְשֵׁעַל)—i.e. the important town elsewhere miscalled Ziklag, on the site of Ḥalasa, SW. of Beersheba, towards Ruḥibeh (Rehoboth). David's close connection, probably by birth and certainly by fortunes, with the Negeb, and the fact that Benaiah was the commander of the Cherethites (Rehobothites) and Pelethites (Zarephathites), strongly favours this view. See JUDAH.

It must be admitted that Jakabzeel, Kabzeel are in themselves likely forms; the present writer has therefore been reluctant to resort to emendation. Winckler's treatment of the Kērēthi and Pēlēthi (GI ii. 184 ff.), however, so nearly approaches that proposed in this and other articles (especially PELETHITES, REHOBOTH, ZAREPHATH), and adds so much force to the argument for deriving David's bodyguard from the Negeb (see NEGEB), that it would be misplaced hesitation to withhold this conjecture, which is in fact not very much less probable than the restoration of Ḥalusaḥ for Ziklag. See ZIKLAG, and cp HAZELEPONI. T. K. C.

KADESH (קַדֵּשׁ), 'holy,' § 98; קַדְשֵׁי [BAL]).

1. Also called Kadesh-Barnea (קַדְשֵׁי בַרְנֵה), peculiar to D (R_n) and P, κ. βαρνη [BAFL], once κ. του β. Num. 34 [BAFL], on the Targ. קְדֵי for Kadesh.

1. Situation. see JERAHMEEL, § 4), one of the most important places in the history of Israel previous to the 'conquest,' is now identified with Ain-Ḳadis, 50 m. S. of Beersheba. From its situation it is plain that it must always have been a central spot, and Trumbull, with whom Guthe (ZDPV 8 182 ff.) in all essentials agrees, has shown that the biblical references to Kadesh are best satisfied by identifying it with 'Ain Ḳadis (see NEGEB, and [on the confusion between Kadesh and Petra] SELA). In the OT it appears as the frontier-city of Edom (Nu. 20¹⁶), and in P and Ezek. as part of the southernmost border of Palestine (Nu. 34⁴ Ezek. 47¹⁹ [καθημ B] 48²⁸). The surrounding district is once called 'the desert of Kadesh' (Ps. 29⁸), and was perhaps identical with that of Beersheba (Gen. 21¹⁴).² Its name, however, is given by P as PARAN (Nu. 13³⁶), and by another writer of the same age as ŠIN (EV ZIN).³ It is by no means improbable that the district coincided with the N. Arabian Mušri mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions, see MIZRAIM, § 2 b.

The significance of the name Kadesh fully accords with all we know of the whole district. In the old patriarchal legends the district of Kadesh

2. Sanctity. (see BERED, BEER-LAHAI-ROI, SHUR), enters into the stories of ABRAHAM, HAGAR, and ISHMAEL,⁴ its prominence being no doubt derived from its association with the early life of Israel after the Exodus, the old accounts (JE) of which make Kadesh the goal on leaving Egypt, and the centre of the forty years' wanderings; see WANDERINGS, §§ 3 ff. The events related of Meribath-Kadesh (see MASSAH AND MERIBATH), and the evidence of the name 'Well of Judgment' as applied to Kadesh (קַדְשֵׁי יַם, Gen. 14⁷;⁵ cp Nu. 33³⁶ [L]), suggest that Kadesh was renowned both

² According to Eusebius the 'desert of Kadesh' extends to Petra, and includes Hazazon-Tamar, Hormah, and enna (see ZIN); but the statement requires criticism.

⁴ The instances where 'Mizraim' in these narratives refers to the N. Arabian Mušri are to be specially noted (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b).

for a theophany (cp also Gen. 16.7 ff.) and for some divinely given decision or legislation.¹ These, unfortunately, are not directly mentioned; but it is not impossible that they may be found buried away under a mass of redactional matter in Ex. 33 f.,² the antiquity of the main part of which chapters is generally admitted; see EXODUS i., § 6.

The covenant in Ex. 34 is admittedly older than either the Decalogue, or the code in 20 ff.; and the 3. 'Exodus' theophany (33.18 ff. 34.5) in which Yahweh reveals his name and manifests his presence is not only superfluous after the preceding history of the Exodus given by J, but is in a marked degree cruder and more anthropomorphic than the similar theophany in Ex. 3 f. (see esp. 33.20-23).³ The conjecture that Kadesh was the scene of what might appear to be the first manifestation of Yahweh to Moses, explains the words of Hobab in Nu. 10.30 ('I will depart to my own land and to my kindred') which, on the usual assumption that the scene is laid in Horeb, hard by Hobab's home (Ex. 3.1), are somewhat unnatural. Moreover, this new importance of Kadesh makes it probable that it is to be connected with a specific tradition, certain traces of which are to be found imbedded in JE's account of the wanderings. It has been shown elsewhere that the details of the journey from Egypt to Sinai are borrowed from a later stage of the wanderings (EXODUS i., §§ 5 ff.). Traces of a similar tradition following the departure from Kadesh may perhaps be discovered in Nu. 21.1-3, where the wanderers have proceeded N. to HORMAH (q.v.), and the continuation of the march (in the same direction) finds them in Beer (21.16-18a, i.e. Beersheba to the N. of Hormah, or Beer-lahai-roi?).⁴ The rest of this narrative is not directly recoverable; its historical value will depend upon the view taken of the origin of the tribe of JUDAH (q.v.).

Accepting Schiele's view that the 'city of palm trees' (Judg. 1.16) is to be located in the extreme S. of Judah (cp the name TAMAR)—its identification with Jericho being due to mistaken glosses—we may be justified in emending the unknown דרך הארזים ('way of Atharim', Nu. 21.1), on the road to Hormah, into עיר התארים ('the city of palm trees').⁵ To the journeying referred to above, which started from Kadesh, we may possibly assign the capture and occupation of Hebron and the surrounding districts (see HEBRON, § 1, JERAHMEEL, § 2). It may be conjectured further that the journey from Kadesh northwards to Judah is a 'levitical' tradition. In support of this it may be noticed that tradition seems to associate the 'Levites' with Kadesh (see LEVITES), and a close inspection of their name-lists makes it highly probable that previous to their diffusion throughout Israel they had come from the south. The same evidences show that 'Levite' is no ethnic, but a class-name (Hommel perhaps correctly connects with the S. Arab. labiw, 'temple-servant', AHT 278 ff.) applied to special members of several closely related clans and families. See GENEALOGIES i., § 7 [v.].

In view of this relation between Kadesh and Judah, it may be noticed that tradition sends David himself to the wilderness of Paran (1 S. 25.1, see PARAN), perhaps his original home, and that, as Prof. Cheyne suggests, 'En-gedi' (עין גדי), in 1 S. 23.29 24.1, as well as in Josh. 15.62, 2 Ch. 20.2, should, under the circumstances, probably be emended to עין גדי, cp En-mishpat (§ 2 above); see also A/S/L, 1900, p. 177 n. [See further JERICO, JUDAH, § 5, NEGEB, PARAN, SODOM, ZAREPHATH.]

² The necessity for any renewal of the covenant (as these chapters have been at times explained) disappears when it is realised that the story of the calf-worship belongs to E.

³ Verse 20 can scarcely be explained after such passages as 24.10 f., etc.

⁴ The wilderness in v. 18b 19 is that of Arnon in v. 13. Verse 18b follows immediately upon v. 15.

the walls of the Ramesseum at Thebes, and the heroic deeds of Rameses II. before the city form the subject of a well-known epic.¹ No reference to it occurs in the Assyrian inscriptions; apparently it had been destroyed by the Syrians of Damascus. According to some critics it is mentioned in the OT, in the account of David's numbering of the people, 2 S. 24.6 (see TAHTIM-HODSHI). If this view were correct, it would show that the Hittites still held Kadesh in the time of David. It has also been found by critical conjecture in Judg. 4.2 13.16 (see HAROSHETH), and in Judg. 5.21 f., underlying the corrupt text of which we may probably detect something like this:—

Then fought the Kidsonim;
Kidson—its mighty ones were stunned.
The Kidsonim dyed the torrent Kishon,
The Hadrakkim dyed it like wool.²

The form Gadašuna may have belonged properly to the people of Kadesh; it occurs in a corrupt form in the epic of Pentaur and in the treaty between Rameses II. and the Hittites.³ The men of Kadesh (the place of residence of Sisera, Judg. 4) and of Hadrach fought in the army of Sisera against the Israelites. See also EZRA 3.9 (on which see EZRA), and Neh. 12.824. In the last-cited passage, 'the son of Kadmiel' should be 'Binnui (or Bani) Kadmiel' (see BINNUI, 2). The name should perhaps be read in 1 Ch. 27.17 for KEMUEL (3); see GENEALOGIES i., § 7 [i.]. Both names may come from Jerahme'el (Che.).

KADMONITES (קַדְמוֹנִיִּים)—i.e., 'men of the east,' ΚΕΛΜΩΝ. [sic D], ΚΕΛΜΩΝΑΙΟΥΣ [L]). Inhabitants of the Syrian desert, like the b'ne Kedem (see EAST, CHILDREN OF THE), Gen. 15.19f, R. Cp KEDEMAH (קַדְמָה), a 'son of Ishmael.

Not improbably, however, 'Kadmonite' is a corruption of Jerahmeelite (cp REKEM). This suits their position next to the Kenizites, and, if correct, favours the view that the 'Hittites' of Palestine are the 'Rehobothites' (a textual corruption; see REHOBOTH).

KAIN (קַיִן), Nu. 24.22 RV; RV^{mg.} and AV, 'the Kenite(s)'. See AMALEK, § 6 f.; CAIN, § 5; KENITES.

KALLAI (קַלַּי), ΚΑΛΛΑΙ [N^{c.}amg.int.], BN*A om., ΚΑΛΛΑΙ [L]), a priest in Joiakim's time (see EZRA ii., §§ 6b 11), Neh. 12.20. Cp SALLAI.

KAMON (קַמּוֹן), Judg. 10.5 RV; AV CAMON.

KANAH (קַנָּה), ΚΑΝΘΑΝ [B], ΚΑΝΑ [A], ΚΑΝΑΕΙ [L]), a place on the boundary of Asher (Josh. 19.28). At first sight it appears as if Kanah should be near Zidon, but the description probably means only that from the former place the border stretches northward to Zidon; and that no places requiring to be mentioned in ² See Che. JQR 10.536 (98). vv. 21 and 22 are transposed. Read לחמו נלחמו. הלכו עם עקבי עם. The above is a modification of Ruben's קרבותים (=קרבותים). The above is a modification of Ruben's very acute restoration in JQR 10.552 f. (98). Ruben reads קַדְמִיֵּאל, 'men of Kadesh,' in l. 3 above, but misses the point in lines 1 and 2. He detected 'הדרקית', 'the Hadrakkite' in 'הדרקית', and 'נכסית', 'like wool' (Ass. nabāšūš, 'like red-coloured wool', Del. Ass. HWB 445b; cp ASUR-BANI-PAL, § 6, n. 2), in 'נכסית'; נכסית (rather נכסית) he explained from the Ass. inscriptions as meaning 'dyed it' (כ, suff. of 3rd sing. masc.). The poem was written by some one who had Babylonian culture. Note דלל דלל, perhaps 'a bowl of bronze' (Ass. urudū), v. 25b. See JAEI.

³ See As. u. Eur. 335, cp 94 104 (cited by Ruben).

this part of the border occur to the writer (so Di.). Kanah may therefore be the modern village of Kānā, 7 m. SE. of Tyre.

Kanah was identified by Eus. and Jer. (OS) with CANA OF GALILEE.

KANAH (קָנָה), 'reeds' (?), the name of a torrent and wādy (וָדִי), AV 'river', RV 'brook' mentioned in the definition of the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 168 179). The same form Kanu appears as that of a principality in the Am. Tab. 251.

Ⓞ's readings are, ἐπὶ χελκῶνα, ἐπὶ φάραγγα κανα [B], ἐπὶ χειμάρρου κανα, ἐπὶ φάραγγα κανα [A], ἐπὶ χειμάρρου κανα, ἐπὶ φάραγγα [ἐπὶ λίβα κατὰ φάραγγα καιρ] [L], in vallem arundineti.

The border of Ephraim 'goes out from Tappuah westward to the torrent Kanah, and ends at the sea' (168), while that of Manasseh 'descends to the torrent Kanah, southward of the torrent' (179). Similarity of sound at once suggests that the torrent Kanah may be the Wādy Kānah, SW. of Shechem, which, passing into the W. Ishkar, joins the 'Aujā, and so reaches the sea. There is indeed one phonetic difficulty (k is distinct from ḥ); but on the whole this theory (which has been adopted by Conder) suits the other topographical indications best. On the other hand, apart from these indications, a plausible case is made out by Guérin for the Nahr el-Fālik, a little to the N. of Arsūf, the Rochetaillie beside which the English crusaders under Richard I. tarried on 6th September 1191. 'It is bordered,' Guérin says, 'and even filled with a forest of reeds of different kinds,' and he goes on to identify this river with the Nahr el-Ḳasab ('stream of reeds') of the Moslem historian Bahā ed-Din. The latter river, however, is rather that now known as the Nahr el-Mefjir, which reaches the sea about 13 m. N. of the Nahr el-Fālik, and therefore cannot be the torrent Kanah. And even the Nahr el-Fālik can be identified with the torrent Kanah only if En-tappuah is placed where Guérin places it, to the NE. of Shechem.

KAREAH (קָרְיָה), 'bald,' § 66; cp KORAH), father of JOHANAN (q.v., 9); Jer. 40 8 ff. 41 11 ff. 42 18 43 24 f. (ΚΑΡΗΕ [BNAQ]); also 2 K. 25 23 (AV CAREAH; ΚΑΡΗΘ [BA], ΚΑΡΗΕ [L]).

For another possible Kareah, restored in Judg. 10 1 by Holtenberg, see Moore's note ad loc. Cp ISSACHAR, col. 2293, n. 4.

KAREM (ΚΑΡΕΜ [BAL]), in the bill-country of Judah, mentioned only by Ⓞ (Josh. 15 59). It is no doubt the modern 'Ain Kārim, W. of Jerusalem, identified elsewhere with Aenon (see SALIM), BETH-CAR, BETH-HACCEREM. Its ancient name ('Vineyard') was well justified.

KARIATHIARIUS (ΚΑΡΙΑΘΙΑΡΙΟΣ [A]), 1 Esd. 5 19 RV, AV KIRIATHIARIUS.

KARKAA, or (RV) Karka (קָרְקָא), with art. and the locative ending; ΤΗΝ ΚΑΤΑ ΔΥΣΜΑΧ ΚΑΔΗΘ [BAL]), apparently a place on the S. border of Judah (Josh. 15 3). According to Wetzstein (Del. Gen. (4) 586) the Makrab-plateau is meant (see NEGEB). The fact, however, that the || passage (Nu. 34 4) says nothing of 'the Karka', and the oddness of the expression קָרְקָא means 'ground,' 'pavement,' 'bottom' provokes criticism. For a probable emendation see HAZAR-ADDAR, JERAH-MEEL, § 4.

KARKOR (קָרְקֹר; ΚΑΡΚΑ [A], -ρ [BL]), the place to which Zebah and Zalmunna had fled from Gideon, and where they were surprised by him (Judg. 8 10 f.). It is the Kārkār, S. of Hamath, mentioned by Shalmaneser II. (KB 1173). See GIDEON, § 2, and cp Niebuhr, Studien, 120.

KARTAH (קָרְתָּה), given as a levitical city in Zebulun, Josh. 21 34, but according to most only a variant of KATTATH (q.v.). Kartah, however, may be another form of KARTAN (q.v.). Ⓞ^B reads καδης—i.e., Kadesh (ΚΑΡΘΑ [A], ΚΑΡΙΘΑ [L]).

KEDESH

KARTAN (קָרְתָּן), a city in Naphtali (Josh. 21 34 f.; ΘΕΜΜΑΩΝ [B*], ΤΕ. [Bab^{vid}], ΤΗΝ ΝΟΕ. [A], ΤΗΝ ΚΑΡΘΑΝ [L]), called Kiriathaim in 1 Ch. 6 76 [61]. It has been overlooked that both names may be and probably are corruptions of קָרְתָּן—i.e., the ancient city of CHINNERETH [q.v.], perhaps the later Chorazin (see GENNESARET). The name Kartan does not occur in the list of Naphtalite cities in Josh. 19 32-38, where Chinnereth is found. See KARTAH. T. K. C.

KATTATH (קָטָת; ΚΑΤΑΝΑΘ [B], ΚΑΤΤΑΘ [A], ΚΟΤ. [L]), a town in Zebulun (Josh. 19 15).

A Talmudic statement (Talm. J. Meg. 1 r) identifies it with the later Ketūth, which is probably the modern Kufeinich, W. of the Merj-ibn-ʿAmir. This identification, however, does not meet the requirements of the list in Joshua. Kattath should be near Shimron (Semūniyeh). Judg. 130 suggests that Kattath = ΚΙΤΡΟΝ (q.v.). T. K. C.

KEDAR (קָדָר; ΚΗΔΑΡ [BNADL]), a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25 13 1 Ch. 1 29), appears as a representative Eastern people, Jer. 2 10 (opposed to Chittim), as flock-owning, Is. 60 7 (|| Nebaiōth), Ezek. 27 21 (|| כְּרָבִי), and tent-dwelling, Jer. 49 28 (cp v. 29); hence its קָדָרִי, Is. 42 11, are probably encampments; and the tents of Kedar are used in figures, Ps. 120 5 (with Meshech) Cant. 1 5. Only in Is. 21 16 f. (see ISAIAH ii., § 8 [7]; a fragment of doubtful date) are the men of Kedar spoken of as warriors; here, too, the tribe of Dedan, in contrast to Gen. 10 7 and 25 3, is reckoned as part of Kedar. In later times the name seems to have been used so as to include all the wild tribes of the desert, who were naturally disliked by the peace-loving Judæans, and thus Kedar quite usurped the place of Ishmael. See further ISHMAEL, § 4 (2).

KEDEMAH (קָדְמָה, 'east'; ΚΕΔΜΑ [BAL]), an Ishmaelite tribal name, Gen. 25 15 [P] (ΚΕΔΜΑΝ [D], ΚΕΔΕΜΑ [L]), 1 Ch. 1 31 (ΚΕΔΑΜ [A]). Possibly a corruption. Cp KADMONITES.

To compare the Kdm or Kdma of the story of Sanehat with Maspero (PSBA 18 106 [96]), is rash, for Kdm, whither the wandering Egyptian betakes himself, is clearly a general term for the region in the SE. or E. of the Dead Sea. T. K. C.

KEDEMOTH (קְדֵמוֹת), a town which gave its name to the wilderness whence Israel sent messengers to Sihon, king of Heshbon (Dt. 2 26 ΚΕΔ[Δ]ΜΩΘ [BAFL]). It was probably situated on the upper Arnon at the northern extremity of the wilderness, a more westerly position being unsuitable since Israel did not enter Moab (cp Nu. 21 13, Dr. Deut., ad loc.).

The account of the sending of the messengers in Nu. 21 21 f. finds a close parallel in the embassy to Edom, Nu. 20 14 f., where the scene is laid at Kadesh. Are the two accounts derived from one (and ψ are easily confused)? Elsewhere Kedemoth is found only in P, as a city given to the Reubenites (Josh. 13 18, βακεθωθ [B], κεδημοθ [A], κα. [L]), and as a levitical city (Josh. 21 37, δεκμων [B], γεδσωθ [A], κ. [L])= 1 Ch. 6 79 [64], καδαμωθ [B], καμηθωθ [A], κεδημοθ [L]). It has been conjecturally identified with Umm-er-resās, whose ruins prove it to have been at one time a place of some importance (cp Baed. (8) 177). See JAHAZ. S. A. C.

KEDESH (קָדֵשׁ; for meaning cp KADESH).

1. (καδης [B], kedes [AL]), a city on the extreme southern border of Judah (Josh. 15 23). It is perhaps the same as Kadesh-barnea¹ (see WANDERINGS, WILDERNESS OF), which will otherwise have been omitted from the list. Dillmann, however, identifies it with the Kādūs of Mukaddasi, one day S. of Hebron. Hebron, Kādūs, and Zoar were, in Mukaddasi's time, stations on the S. caravan-route. Wetzstein (Del. Gen. (4) 574 f.) wrongly identified Kādūs with Kadesh-Barnea.

2. (kedes [BL], keēe [A]) in 1 Ch. 6 72 [57], a levitical city in Issachar. The parallel passage in Josh. 21 28 (cp Josh. 19 20) has Kishion; the name Kidšun (if the view taken in KISHION is correct) accounts for both forms. Conder identifies this Kedesh with Tell Abu Kades, near Lejjūn (PEFM 2 69), and a critical conjecture of Wellhausen's depends on its existence (see DEBORAH, § 2).

3. (καδης [B], kedes [AVL]), an ancient sanctuary which preserved its rights of asylum

KEDESHAH

(see KB 540* [Index]; and cp Pap. Anast. i. 191; RP 1109; As. u. Eur. 213 n.).

It is usually called simply 'Kedesh' (Josh. 12.22 'the king of Kedesh', 1937 καδες [B], Judg. 4.9 καδες [A], καδης [L], 4.10 κεδες [A], 4.11 κεδες [B], 2 K. 15.29 κενες [BAL], 1 Macc. 11.63 κηδες [AN] 73), but occasionally also Kedesh-Naphtali (Judg. 4.6 καδης [L], Tob. 12 κιδιως [BN], κιδιων [A]), or Kedesh in Galilee (Josh. 21.32 καδες [B], 1 Ch. 6.61 [76] κεδες [B] καδης [L], and once 'Kadesh in Galilee, in the hill-country of Naphtali' (Josh. 20.7). On the geographical definition in Judg. 4.11, see BEZAANANNIM.

It was the home of Barak (see DEBORAH, § 2), and apparently the rallying-place from which the war of liberation was fought. Lying as it did on the northern frontier of Palestine (cp TAHTIM-HODSHI), it had to bear the brunt of the first incursion of the Assyrians, and with other neighbouring places (see ABEL-BETH-MAACAH, etc.) it was in 734 B.C. captured by Tiglath-pileser, its inhabitants being carried away to Assyria (2 K. 15.29). It is twice mentioned (1 Macc. 11.63 73) in connection with the defeat of Jonathan the Maccabee near Hazor, and Josephus, who calls it καδασα, κεδασα, κεδεσα, κυδασα, κυδισα, describes it as 'between the land of the Tyrians and Galilee' (Ant. xiii. 5.6), as 'belonging to the Tyrians' (Bf ii. 181), or as 'a populous and well-fortified inland village of the Tyrians' (Bf iv. 23) which was the scene of various warlike incidents in his own time. Eus. (OS 271.55) describes κιδισσος as situated 20 m. from Tyre, near Paneas. In the twelfth century Benjamin of Tudela visited Kedesh, and found there the tomb of Barak and several Jewish saints (Early Travels in Pal. 89).

Kedesh still retains its ancient name (Kades). J. L. Porter (Kitto, Bib. Cycl. s.v.) well describes it: 'High up among the mountains of Naphtali is a little green plain, embosomed in wooded hill-tops. On its western side is a rounded tell, on which the modern village stands. From the tell a low, narrow ridge projects into the plain, with flat top and steep sides, covered with rank vegetation. Both ridge and tell are strewn with ruins. In the plain, at the northern base of the ridge, round a little fountain, lie the most interesting remains of Kedesh. A number of sarcophagi serve the purpose of water-troughs. Near these are the ruins of two beautiful buildings, but whether mausoleums, temples, or synagogues, it is difficult to determine. Between them is a very remarkable group of sarcophagi standing on a massive platform of solid masonry. These are doubtless the tombs of which Benjamin of Tudela and Brocardus speak (chap. 7.173); and they show that down to a comparatively late period the Jews still regarded Kedesh as a sanctuary. The plain beside Kedes and the surrounding hills is thickly covered with terebinth and oak forests, among which the writer saw at several places the black tents of a nomad tribe which frequents this region.'

KEHELATHAH (כְּהֵלֶתָאֵה; μακελλαθ [B], -ελαθ [AF], -αδ [L]; Nu. 33.22 f.). See WANDERINGS, WILDERNESS OF.

KEILAH (כְּיֵלָה; κειλα [BNA], κειλα [L]; but κειλαμ in Josh. [B], κειλαια in Neh. 3.17 [N]), one of the towns 'in the Shēphēlah' of Judah (Josh. 15.44). It was an important place in the fifteenth century B.C., being several times mentioned as Kilti in the Amarna tablets. David found a temporary shelter within its 'gates and bars' (1 S. 23.1 f.). After the Exile it gave its name to an administrative district mentioned after Beth-zur (Neh. 3.17 f.). The Chronicler, after his fashion, introduces the 'father of Keilah' (whom he connects with the clan called the GARMITE) into a genealogy in conjunction with Eshtemoa (1 Ch. 4.19).

KEMUEL

Eusebius and Jerome (OS 270.33 109.19) identify Keilah with the village of Kela, situated 8 (the Greek text by an error has 17) m. from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Hebron, which is no doubt the modern Beit Kāhīl, about 4 m. N.N.E. of Ḥālḥūl. This place, however, is situated on a steep mountain, where there is no arable land, and so cannot be the Keilah of 1 S. 23. There is also a ruined village called Kīlā (cp the κίλλα of Jos. Ant. vi. 131), 7 m. E. of Beit Jibrin and about 7 m. NE. of Ḥālḥūl, which is not quite so deep in the mountains as Beit Kāhīl and is identified with Keilah by Guérin (Judée, 3351). The only objection to it is drawn from Josh. 15.44, where Keilah stands almost at the end of a long list of 'cities' in the Shēphēlah. Dillmann and Mühlau consider this so serious that they are led to reject this identification. It is to be noted, however, that not far from Kīlā we find Beit Naṣīb, which must be the ancient Neziḥ, and Mareshah (Mer'ash) is already pretty far to the E. Evidently the Shēphēlah is to be distinguished from the maritime plain which it adjoined (GASm. HG 202). This is one of the cases in which travel appears to throw great light on the old Hebrew narratives. The terraced sides of the hill of Kīlā are even to-day covered with corn, and their luxuriance must have been greater still when the terraces were cared for. No wonder that the Philistine raiders (or, as we should perhaps read, 'the Pelethites' — i.e., the Zarephathites; see ZAREPHATH) swarmed up the Wādī eṣ-Sūr to rob the threshing-floors. The citizens of Keilah were powerless to drive them away, and were even poor-spirited enough to plan the surrender of David, their deliverer, to Saul. Ahithophel (Ahipelet?) may perhaps have been the man who facilitated David's escape. See GILOH, DAVID, § 4, JUDAH.

It is doubtful whether the 'springs of water,' etc., of Josh. 15.19 Judg. 1.15 are really proper names (see GOLATH-MAIM). Since the names cannot properly be translated as Hebrew, they are supposed to be pre-Israelitish. More probably the text is corrupt. The passage contains a statement that the land of the Achsah clan being barren (כְּבֵדָה), Caleb granted it דְּבִיר וְבֵית תַּפְּוּא, 'Keilah and Beth-Tappuah.' DEBIR probably lay between these two places, which were subject to it. See Che. Crit. Bib.

'Golath' (sing.) is attested by Pesh., by γολαθα of Eus. (OS 245.34), Golathamaim of Jer. (ib. 127.27), and Ḥ in Josh. γολαθμαιμ. . . γολαθ την κάτω [A], γολαθμαιμ. . . γολαθμαιμ την άνω κ. την γολαθμαιμ τ. κ. [L]; την βοθθανεις. . . γοαθλαιν. . . γοαθλαιν τ. κ. [B].¹ T. KELAIAH (כְּלַיָּאֵה; § 33, cp KOLAIAH [Ḥ readings]) is mentioned, with the note 'the same is Kelita,' among the Levites in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5 end), Ezra 10.23 (κωλεια αὐτός κωλιεν [BN*], κωλαα αὐτός κωλιτας [A], κωλεια αὐτός κωλιταν [N* vid.], κωλιτας αὐτός κωλιετα [L]) = 1 Esd. 9.23, 'COLIUS who was called CALITAS' (κωλιος οὗτος καλιεταίς [B], κωλιος οὐδ' ἐστιν καλιτας [A], κωλιτας οὗτος καλιτας [L]). See KELITA.

KELITA (כְּלַיָּתָא; 'dwarf'?) καλλιτα [L], a Levite signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7), Neb. 10.10 [11] (καυτα [B], καυθαν [N*], καλιτα [N* a], ν [A]), mentioned also in MT among the expounders of the law (see EZRA ii., § 13 [14]; cp i. § 8, ii. § 16 [5], § 15 [1] c) Neb. 8.7; BNA om. = 1 Esd. 9.48, CALITAS (καλιετας [BA]). In Ezra 10.23 Kelita (= Calitas, 1 Esd. 9.23) is identified with KELAIAH.

KEMUEL (כְּמוּעֵל; καμοουηλ [BAFL]).

1. Son of Nabor by Milcah, and father of Aram (Gen. 22.21, J), a statement at variance with that in 10.22 f. (P), and in itself most improbable. Di. is content with pointing out that Aram seems to have a narrower reference here. Gen. 22.21, however, is corrupt and should run, 'Uz his firstborn and Ahibuz, and Jerahmeel, and Abiram.' See JERAHMEEL, § 4, and note that Ahibuz (see ANI, i.) and Michael (a corruption of 'Jerahmeel') are brought into connection with Salecah (miswritten 'Milcah' in Gen. 22.20), and with 'Gilead in Bashan' (= Ṣāḥad; see MILCAH, SALECAH) in 1 Ch. 5.11 16. Observe, too, that Abiram is a Reubenite name (Nu. 16.1), and that Reuben was a trans-Jordanic tribe.

2. 'Prince' of the tribe of Ephraim, temp. Moses; Nu. 34.24 [P].

KENAN

3. Father of Hashabiah who was over the tribe of Levi, temp. David; 1 Ch. 27 17 (σμουνηλ [B], κεμ. [L],  [Pesh.]). See KADMIEL (end). T. K. C.

KENAN (קנן), 1 Ch. 12; also Gen. 59, RV; AV CAINAN.

KENATH (קנת), ΚΑΝΑΘ [A]; in Ch., ΚΑΝΑΘ [B], ΚΑΝΑΘ [AL]; in Nu. ΚΑΘ [B], ΚΑΝΑΘ [L]. A place on the other side of the Jordan, also called NOBAH (g.v.) after the clan so named (Nu. 32 42). In 1 Ch. 2 23† it is stated¹ that 'Geshur and Aram took the Havvoth-Jair with Kenath and its dependencies' from the Israelites. Eusebius and Jerome (OS 269 15 109 1) identify Kenath with Canatha (καναθα), which is described by them as a still existing 'village' of Arabia in Trachonitis, not far from Bostra, and probably this place is meant when the Talmud includes Kenath among the frontier cities of Palestine.²

In Jos. B. i. 19 2 Kenath is reckoned to Coeslyria, while Ptol. (v. 15 23) and Plin. (HN v. 18 7 4) reckon it to the DECAPOLIS (g.v., § 2). For its history, see Schürer (GV 295-97).

Canatha is the modern Kanawāt, on the W. slope of the Jebel Haurān, 4068 ft. above the sea-level, and 16 or 17 m. NNE. from Bostra on the Roman road to Damascus. The ruins are among the most important in Eastern Palestine (see plan in Baed. Pal.⁽⁸⁾ 194). From the point of view adopted in JAIR, JEPHTHAH, NOBAH, there is no hindrance to identifying this interesting spot with the biblical Kenath.³ See, however, G. F. Moore on Judg. 8 11. T. K. C.

KENAZ (קנז; ΚΕΝΕΖ [BADEL]), the original pronunciation being probably Kiniz figures in the genealogy of the Edomites as a clan belonging to them—Gen. 36 11 (ΚΕΝΕΖ [D]) = 1 Ch. 1 36 (ΚΕΖΕΖ [A]) 15 42 (ΚΕΝΕΚ [L]) = 1 Ch. 1 53. On the other hand the Judæan hero Caleb, who is said to have obtained possession of Hebron the capital of Judah but in reality is the personification of a family originally distinct from the Judæans (see 1 S. 30 14 Josb. 15 13, and cp 1 S. 25 3), appears as a Kenizite (RV, AV Kenizite; קנזי, ὁ κενεζαῖος [BAL]; Nu. 32 12 ὁ διακεχωρισμένος [BAL], Josb. 14 6 14). Moreover, Caleb's mythical son-in-law OTHNIEL (g.v.) is a son of Kenaz: Josb. 15 17 (= Judg. 1 13 κενεχ [A]) Judg. 39 11 1 Ch. 4 13. Again, in 1 Ch. 4 15 Kenaz is apparently a grandson of Caleb. From all this we may conclude either that Kenaz was originally an independent tribe, of which one portion became incorporated with the Edomites and another portion with the neighbouring Judæans, or else that a part of the old Edomite tribe Kenaz settled among the Judæans at a very early period. In any case it is tolerably clear that Kenaz and Caleb were at first strangers in Judah, afterwards became close allies, and finally were absorbed in the surrounding population. Such changes have been by no means rare (see EDOM, § 3).

In Gen. 15 19-21 an attempt is made to enumerate the various peoples who inhabited Palestine before the Israelite invasion; that the Kenizites are included in the list serves to show that their foreign origin had not yet been forgotten. Cp CALEB, § 2. T. N.

KENITES (קנזי), οἱ κενιζαῖοι or ο-οκ [BAL]; Gen. 15 19 (οἱ κεναιοι [D], καιν. [L]), Nu. 24 21 (ὁ κεναιος [B], ο κεναιος [A], -αιος [L]), 1 S. 15 6 a (β?) but קנזי in 1 S. 27 10 (ὁ κηνει [A]) should perhaps be קנזי (ὁ κενεζαῖος [BL]); קנזי, Judg. 1 16, should be קנזי followed by קנז (see JETHRO); pl. קנזים, 1 Ch. 2 55 (οἱ κεναιοι). Also קנז, Nu. 24 22, and perhaps 1 S. 15 6 b [We., crit. emend.].

A nomadic tribe, allied to the Kenizzites (Gen. 15 19) is very unsatisfactory.

¹ The treatment of this passage by Bertheau, Chron.⁽⁸⁾ (73), is very unsatisfactory.

KENITES

and to Amalek—i.e., JERAHMEEL (1 S. 15 6), and personified as Kain (cp CAIN, § 5). They entered Canaan (more strictly, the Negeb) with the men of Judah (see JERICHO, § 2). In all probability they have left a trace of their name in KINAH (g.v.).

See Judg. 1 16, where MT wrongly states that the Kenites 'went and dwelt among the people, as if the Israelitish people were meant—an impossible view doubtless. An important group of the MSS of Q (Moore's N), with the Sahidic version, adds αμαληκ; probably, therefore, we should read 'among the Amalekites.'¹ See also Nu. 24 21 f., where the Kenites appear in close proximity to the Amalekites (Jerahmeelites).

Against the supposed connection of the Kenites and the Midianites, see Moore, Judges, 34, note. It may be noted, however, that in the opinion of the present writer מדין (Midian), in Ex. 2 15 f. 3 1 18 1, should most probably be מצור=מצור, and מדין in Nu. 10 29 should probably be מצרי; in other words, Hobab was at once a Kenite and a Musrite (cp MIZRAIM, § 2 b).

Residing between the Judahite and the Jerahmeelite portions of the Negeb, the Kenites are equally in touch with the bne Judah and with the Jerahmeelites (see NEGEB). It is strange, therefore, to find them, in Judg. 4 11, in the N. of Canaan; cp, however, Judg. 12 15 (?), and observe that Musur (the region of Kadesh?) is cursed in Judg. 5 23 (read, not מצור, but מצר; see MEROZ) for not helping the Israelites. W. M. Müller's explanation of 'Heber the Kenite' (ὁ κεναιος, L om.) is plausible, but no more. We must at any rate admit that the narrative as it stands assumes that Heber was not a town-dweller, but a nomad (see HEBER, 1).

Another explanation is that of Sayce—that the Kenites were a tribe of wandering smiths, who were chiefly in the S. of Palestine, but might be led by their art into northern regions (against this view, repeated in Hastings' DB 283 4, see AMALEK, § 7).

Saul's relation to the Kenites is interesting. He recognises the old bond between them and Israel, and therefore is not offended at their relation to the Jerahmeelites; but he wishes them to remove from that section of the Jerahmeelites which was hostile to Israel (see SAUL). From 1 Ch. 2 55 (see HEMATH) it appears that either a section of the Kenites or the Kenite tribe as a whole also bore the name of RECHABITES (g.v.; if we should not rather read 'Heberites').² It is at any rate possible that 'Jonadab' should be read instead of 'HOBAB' [g.v.] as the name of the ancestor of the Kenites whose connection with Moses is asserted by a trustworthy tradition (Judg. 1 16, cp Nu. 10 29). In Nu. 24 21 a Hebrew poet plays on the name of 'Kenite' (Kain) which he connects with קנ, 'nest.'

Apparently he anticipates their destruction by the Assyrians, for in v. 22 (RV) he continues,

Nevertheless, Kain shall be wasted,
Until Asshur shall carry thee away captive.

The marg. of RV, however, warns us that the text is grammatically obscure. Besides, Assyria had nobler prey to clutch than the Kenites. Hence the couplet needs some emendation.³

It was pointed out above that in the Song of Deborah the Musrites, with whom the Kenites were closely linked, are 'cursed' for not coming to the help of Yahwe's worshippers the Israelites (Judg. 5 23). This confirms a view which has long been considered critically probable that the Kenites and the Israelites were conscious of the identity of their early religion, and that the Kenites were indirectly at least the teachers of the Israelites. So, before Stade, Tiele maintained (Vergel. Geschied. 559 [72]; cp Che. EB⁽⁸⁾ 790 [76]).⁴ The progress of critical study of the documents since 1872 has in fact added considerably to the probability of this

Identified by Seetzen with Kuraiyāt, at the W. end of Mt. Atrath ('Attārūs). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. 269:10 108:27) call this place καριαθα, Coraitha, and place it 10 R. m. from Medeba, but identify it wrongly with KIRJATHAIM [g. v. 1]. See Nöldeke (Inscr. Mesa, 25). Others (cp Driver on Am. 2:2) think that AR-MOAB and Kerioth were two names for the same city. More plausibly Buhl (Pal. 270) identifies Kerioth with Kir of Moab (i. e., Kerak); indeed, if Kir-heres (undeniably=Kir of Moab) was really named Kiriath-hadashath (see KIR-HERES) this appears a still more probable view. KESITAH (קִישִׁיָּה), a word recorded in RV^{mg.} of Gen. 33:19 [Josh. 24:32], Job 42:11; EV 'piece of money.' ⚡ Onk. Vg. render 'lambs,' 'a lamb' (Tg. Jon. 'pearls'). It has been suggested that ἐκατόν ἀμῶν in ⚡ of Gen. 33:19 was originally ἐκ. μῶν (100 minæ). But since ⚡ gives ἀμῶν in Josh. 24:32, and ἀμῶν in Job 42:11, Schleusner (Lex. in Vet. Test. 1:191) feels obliged to reject the hypothesis. Nevertheless it appears that ⚡ is nearer the truth than the critics who adhere to MT. In Gen. 31:41 ⚡'s δέκα ἀμῶν corresponds to מֵינָה פְּנִים; surely ⚡ read פְּנִים, 'minæ.' Possibly, too, in Gen. 33:19 μῶν stood in the original ⚡ as the equivalent of פְּנִים. Looking closely at 33:19 we can divine that the text originally ran, כִּי־בְנֵי הַחֹמֶר, 'at the hand of the sons of Hamor for a mina of Carchemish,' and so too in 23:15, where Abraham's purchase of Machpelah is described, we should read אַרְבַּע וְאַתְּנָה פְּרָקְמִישׁ, 'four Carchemish minæ,' and in v. 16 the same once more with the addition of חָרָוֶן ' (in) gold.'

In 33:19 שָׁכַם אֲבִי שָׁכַם and in 23:16 שָׁקַל בַּסֶּף עֶבֶר are, all of them, attempts to make sense of dislocated fragments of פרְקְמִישׁ; כְּרַמְשִׁי comes from חָרָוֶן.

The same emendation is to be made in Josh. 24:3 (harmonised in the received text with Gen. 33:19). Probably also in Job 42:11 אַחַד וְאֶחָד אֶחָד אֶחָד אֶחָד has taken the place of פְּרָקְמִישׁ אֶחָד, 'one Carchemish

* Comparing 2 Ch. 9:16 (on text, see top of next col.).

mina of gold.' Duhm truly remarks that a little piece of money and a nose-ring or ear-ring from each of Job's friends would not do much to restore his fortune. Yet the context (see v. 12) is most intelligible if we suppose that they did each make a considerable present; the ring (נֶסֶךְ) can well be spared!

Note that 2 Ch. 9:16 gives קֶמָוֶה (read קֶמָוֶה) where 1 K. 10:17 has כַּנִּים. This supplies an analogy for the emendation of קֶמָוֶה in Gen. 33:19 into קֶמָוֶה. We are thus relieved from the necessity of connecting קֶמָוֶה with Ar. ḥāzif, 'a balance,' which is unknown in N. Semitic,¹ and forcing a sense out of עֶבֶר לְמֶקֶר.

Dt. 9:22. It has already been noticed that Taberah (Nu. 11:1-3) does not occur in the list of stations in Nu. 33, and Dillmann rightly holds that the account of Taberah in E's narrative corresponded to the account of Kibroth-hattaavah in J's. We must, however, go further. Taberah (תְּבֵרָה) and Hattaavah (הַתְּאָוָה) presumably represent the same word in the original story, and the real name of the locality referred to was probably Kibroth-tab'erah—i. e., Graves of Taberah. Taberah (of which Hattaavah will be a corruption) is probably the name of a hill or mountain, and the graves are pre-Israelitish cairns or stone circles, which either had, or were supposed to have, a sepulchral purpose. In the Desert of the Tih such primitive stone monuments abound on the hill-sides.

They are sometimes called nawāmīs, and the current story is that they were built by the Israelites as a protection against a plague of mosquitoes (E. H. Palmer). See NEGEB, § 6: WANDERINGS. T. K. C.

KIDRON, THE BROOK, once in AV CEDRON [Jn. 18 1; RVmg. 'of the Cedars' (נַחַל קִדְרוֹן); ὁ χεῖμαρρος (τῶν) κεδρών [BAL]; in Jer. 31 40 ναχαλ κ. [B⁹]. χ. κεδρών [AQ]; Vg. torrens Cedron (but convallis in 2 K. 18 6).

NT, Jn. 18 1 ὁ χεῖμαρρος τῶν κεδρών (N^c BCLY, Treg., WH), τὸν κεδρών (A^Δ; Vg. τὸν κεδρών [D Tisch.]; Cedri a. b.; Theb., Memph.; Lachm., Lightf., Weiss). Probably τὸν κεδρών is the correct reading; being misunderstood, it would easily be corrected into τὸν κέδρου or τῶν κεδρών.

Gesenius derives from קרר, 'black, turbid,' cp Job 6 16. But נהל and קררון are certainly in apposition; it is the ravine which is called Kidron. 'Black ravine'

1. Etymology. would not be a probable explanation; hence Hort ('Notes on Select Readings,' NT 2 90) suggests 'ravine of the dark [trees],' taking קררון to be 'an archaic (? Canaanite) plural of קרר.' He even suggests that κεδρός may be of Phœnician origin—comparing קררון in Buxtorf, 1976—and adds (cp Plummer, St. John, 318), that 'patches of cedar-forest may have survived from prehistoric times in sheltered spots.' This is most improbable. Even in a ravine which is quite dry in summer we do not expect to hear of cedars; the cedars on the Mount of Olives (Ta'anith, 44) give no support to the theory. The form too is perfectly good Hebrew; it describes that which belongs to or is connected with קרר (whatever קרר may be). More probably קררון is a phonetic variation of קררון, 'a spot with enclosures for cattle'; cp GEDERAH, 4, where it is suggested that κεδρών in 1 Macc. corresponds to the קררון of Josh. 15 36 and to the modern Kaṭra. It will be noticed that there is at one point of the Kidron valley (where it joins the valley of Hinnom) a level tract now devoted to the cultivation of fruit and vegetables. Here we can imagine that in remote times there were enclosures for cattle. May not Kedar (קֶדָר, Ass. kidri) have a similar origin?

The remarkable depression on the E. of Jerusalem (see JERUSALEM, § 3) is referred to in 2 S. 15 23 1 K. 2 37 15 13 2 K. 23 4 6 12 Jer. 31 40 2 Ch. 15 16 29 16

2. Biblical references. 30 14, and twice in the short title הַנַּחַל הַרְבִּי, 'the ravine,' 2 Ch. 33 14 Neh. 2 15.

Josephus twice calls it ἡ φάραγγις κεδρών (Ant. ix. 7 3 B/ v. 6 1); in B/ v. 2 3 he refers to its great depth.

In 2 K. 23 4 Jer. 31 40 (K^r) we hear, according to the ordinary view, of the 'fields' (שָׂדֵיכוֹן); Ⓞ^B σαλημαθ, Ⓞ^A σαδημαθ, in Jer. Ⓞ follows Ktb) of Kidron, which might refer to the fertile tract in the S. of the valley (see below), where of old was the 'King's garden' (Neh. 3 15). But the word שָׂדֵיכוֹן being most probably corrupt elsewhere (see GRAPE, 3), it seems better to read כְּשִׁפְרוֹת (Ⓞ^L ἐν τῷ ἐμπεροσμοσῷ τοῦ χεῖμαρρος κεδρών)—i.e., furnaces for making lime, or for smelting (Klo.). 'The fields of Kidron,' is, in fact, hardly a sufficiently clear phrase to have been used, especially in this context.

It is in the touching account of David's flight that we are first introduced to the 'Brook Kidron'; and we hear of it for the last time in a still more pathetic NT narrative. King David 'stood (read עָקַר with We., H. P. Smith, and most critics) by the ravine Kidron, while all the people passed over before him' (2 S. 15 23); and Jesus 'went forth with his disciples over the ravine (RVmg.) Kidron, where was a garden' (Jn. 18 1; but see § 3). The other references to Kidron (except those in the topographical passages, 2 Ch. 33 14 Neh. 2 15) occur in accounts of the destruction of idolatrous objects at the mouth of Hinnom (see history of Asa, Hezekiah, Josiah), and 1 K. 2 37, where Shimei, that violent partisan of Saul's house, is forbidden by Solomon (as the text now stands) to cross Kidron. This is one of the many cases where commentators have been satisfied with a plausible but not quite satisfactory explanation, instead of questioning the correctness of the text. It is said, e.g., by Benzinger, that Kidron is mentioned because Solomon thinks it most probable that Shimei would seek to cross the eastern boundary of the city on a visit to his home at Bahurim. But something more would certainly have been added to make this clear, and, just before, the phrase used is perfectly vague, אָנָּה וְאָנָּה, 'any whither.' The true reading is surely פָּקְדֵי יָדָךְ, 'by any road.'

The designation 'Valley of Jehoshaphat' dates back to the fourth century A.D. It also appears in OS 273 89 111 13. It is based on Joel 3 [4] 2 12, but the expression עֵקֶץ (which means a deep but broad valley, like those of Rephaim and Elah, see VALE, 1), is sufficient proof that the interpretation of that difficult passage (see JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF) is erroneous. The constant term for the Kidron valley in the OT is נַחַל, a wady or ravine. Popular tradition, however, takes no account of such minor matters. It is the greatest boon that a dying Jew can ask to be buried in the Valley of Jehoshaphat—i.e., of Kidron, because he believes that this ravine will be the scene of the great judgment. The whole of the left bank of the Kidron opposite the Haram, far up the W. side of the Mount of Olives, is covered with the white tombstones of the Jews; the burial-place of the Moslems is on the E. side of the mount. At the resurrection, the valley is expected to receive an expansion by the moving farther apart of the opposite sides.

The Valley of Kidron is now called Wady Sitti Maryam, or Wady of the Lady Mary. It contains the

3. Topography. bed of a streamlet; but during the whole summer and most of the winter, it is perfectly dry; in fact, no water runs in it except when heavy rains are falling on the mountains round Jerusalem.

On the broad summit of the mountain ridge of Judæa, a mile and a quarter NW. of Jerusalem, is a slight depression; this is the head of the wady, which runs on for about half a mile towards the city. It then bends eastward, and in another half-mile is crossed by the great northern road coming down from the hill Scopus. On the E. side of the road, and the S. bank of the wady, are the celebrated 'Tombs of the Kings.' The channel is here about half a mile due N. of the city gate. It continues in the same course about a quarter of a mile farther, and then, turning S., opens into a wide basin containing cultivated fields and olives. Here it is crossed diagonally by the road from Jerusalem to Anathoth. As it advances southward, the right bank, forming the side of the hill Bezetha, becomes higher and steeper, with occasional precipices of rock, on which may be seen a few fragments of the ancient city wall; while, on the left, the base of Olivet projects, greatly narrowing the valley. Opposite St. Stephen's gate the depth is fully 100 feet, and the breadth not more than 400 feet. The olive trees in the bottom are so thickly clustered as to form a shady grove; and their massive trunks and gnarled boughs give evidence of great age. This spot is shut out from the city, from the view of public roads, and from the notice and interruptions of wayfarers. If Gethsemane was really in the wady, it would be better to place it here than on the more public traditional site some distance farther down. From Mk. 14 32, however, compared with v. 26, we should rather suppose that it was somewhere on the W. slope of the Mount of Olives. (See Keim, Jesus von Naz. 3 299, but cp Weiss, note on John 18 1, and see GETHSEMANE, § 2.) But we must not linger on this disputed point. A zigzag path descends the steep bank from St. Stephen's gate, crosses the bed of the valley by an old bridge, and then divides. One branch leads direct over the top of Olivet (cp 2 S. 15 23). See OLIVES, MOUNT OF. Another branch runs round the southern shoulder of the hill to Bethany, and has a deep and sacred interest, for it is the road of Jesus Christ's last entry (Mt. 21 1 ff. Lk. 19 37). Below the bridge the wady becomes still narrower, and 1 Pāsēk after וְיָהִי indicates a doubtful text. קִדְרוֹן was first of all corrupted into קֶדָר; then כְּרָר easily became נַחַל (אֶת־נַחַל). The best part of the emendation belongs to Klo., who suggests אֶת־כָּל־דְּרִיכוֹת, 'anyone of all the roads'—a needlessly elaborate phrase.

bere traces of a torrent bed first begin to appear. Three hundred yards farther down, the hills on each side rise precipitously from the torrent bed, which is spanned by a single arch. On the left bank is a singular group of tombs, comprising those of Absalom, Jebosbaphat, and St. James (now so called); whilst on the right, 150 feet overhead, towers the south-eastern angle of the temple wall. The ravine runs on, narrow and rocky, for 500 yards more; there, on its right bank, in a cave, is the fountain of the Virgin; and higher up on the left, perched on the side of the naked cliffs, the ancient village of Siloam. A short distance farther down, the valley of the Tyropœon falls in from the right, descending in terraced slopes, fresh and green, from the waters of the Pool of Siloam. The ravine of Kidron here expands, affording a level tract for cultivation (see above), which extends down to the mouth of Hinnom, and is about 200 yards wide. A short distance below the junction of Hinnom and the Kidron is the fountain of Bir Eyyüb, 'the Well of Job' (see EN-ROGEL). The length of the valley from its head to En-rogel is 2½ m., and here the historic Kidron may be said to terminate.

The Kidron Valley was first described accurately by Robinson; but in recent years fresh points of interest have come to light. Such, for instance, are the true bed of the Kidron (38½ ft. below the present channel), and the great rock-cut aqueduct in the Kidron-valley, south of Bir Eyyüb, both found in '68-'69 by Sir C. Warren (Recovery of Jerusalem, 135 ff. 256 ff.).

KING (מֶלֶךְ, βασιλεως). The term mélek 'king' has a somewhat wide range of meaning. We find it in the description of the old condition of things in Canaan, when many of the cities were in the enjoyment of relative independence under 'kings' or princes of their own (see, e.g., Gen. 14 2 20 2 Josh. 10 1 11 1 Judg. 5 19). Winckler has pointed out that in Tiglath-pileser's time the Syrian 'kingdoms' were more like German Graf-schaften (AOF 1 19); we might also compare the petty Syrian kings with the Indian rājas or the Italian dukes of the Middle Ages. This remark may illustrate Is. 10 8, where the king of Assyria ironically asks, 'Are not my generals (מְלָכִים) altogether kings (מְלָכִים)', perhaps alluding partly to the fact that many petty vassal kings served under his orders at the head of their respective contingents. As late as the Book of Job we find מֶלֶךְ used in the limited sense of 'chieftain' (Job 19 25, but hardly 15 24 [ὁ στρατηγός] which seems to be corrupt). From the etymology of the term (Ass. and Aram., 'to counsel, decree') we may infer that the king was originally the most gifted and powerful member of a council of chiefs or elders (cp Mic. 4 9 'king' || 'counsellor'). The term preferred by the Babylonians and Assyrians was šarru (= Heb. מֶלֶךְ), which is used both for the divine 'king of the gods,' and for the 'great king' of Assyria (or Babylon); see PRINCE, 3. Possibly this term (√ šarāru 'to be radiant,' like a star) was chosen in preference to maliku or malū (= Heb. מַלְכִי, Ar. malik^m) to indicate pre-eminence among kings, though maliku is explained in the syllabaries by šarru. It is worth noticing that 'princes (מְלָכִים) of Midian' in Judg. 7 25 and 8 3, corresponds to 'kings (מְלָכִים) of Midian' in Judg. 8 5 (cp GIDEON). On the history of Hebrew royalty see

Chronology (§ 4).	Judaean narrative (§ 9).
Religious principle (§ 5 a).	Literature (§ 11).

The books of Kings, which form the last part of the series of OT histories known as the Earlier Prophets, were originally reckoned as a single book (cp CANON, § 13).

Modern Hebrew Bibles follow the bipartition which we have derived from Θ , where they are called the third and the fourth books of kingdoms (βασιλειῶν), the first and the second being our books of Samuel.

The division into two books is not felicitous. Even the old Hebrew separation between Kings and Samuel must not be taken to mean that the history from the birth of Samuel to the Exile was treated by two distinct authors in independent volumes. We cannot speak of the author of Kings or of Samuel, but only of an editor or successive editors whose main work was to arrange in a continuous form extracts or abstracts from earlier books. The introduction of a chronological scheme and a series of editorial comments and additions, chiefly designed to enforce the religious meaning of the history, gives to the book of Kings as we now read it a kind of unity; but beneath this we can still distinguish a variety of documents, which, though sometimes mutilated in the process of piecing them together, retain sufficient individuality of style and colour to prove their original independence. Of these documents one of the best defined is the vivid and exact picture of David's court at Jerusalem (2 S. 9-20), of which the first two chapters of 1 K. are manifestly an integral part.¹ As it would be unreasonable to suppose that the editor of the history of David closed his work abruptly before the death of the king, breaking off in the middle of a valuable memoir which lay before him, this observation leads us to conclude that the books of Samuel and of Kings are not independent histories. They have at least one source in common, and a single editorial hand was at work on both. The division, however, which makes the commencement of Solomon's reign the beginning of a new book is certainly ancient; it must be older than the insertion of the appendix 2 S. 21-24, which now breaks the continuity of the original history of David's court.

From a historical point of view the division is very convenient. The subject of the book of Samuel is the creation of a united Israel by Samuel, Saul, and David. Under Solomon the creative impulse has already died away; the kingship is divorced from the sympathies of the nation; and the way is prepared for the formation of the two kingdoms of Ephraim and Judah, the fortunes of which, down to their extinction by the great empires of the East, form the main subject of the book of Kings.

It is probable, however, that the editor who made the division had another reason for disconnecting

2. Successive redactions. Solomon from David and treating his reign as a new departure. The most notable feature in the extant redaction of the book is the strong interest shown in the deuterio-

nomic 'Law of Moses,' and especially in the centralization of worship in the temple on Zion as prescribed in Deuteronomy and enforced by Josiah. This interest was unknown to ancient Israel, and is quite foreign to the older memoirs incorporated in the book; amidst the great variety in style and manner which marks the several parts of the history the interest in question is expressed always in the same stereotyped phrases and unvarying style; in brief, it belongs to the editorial comments, not to the original sources of the history. To the deuteronomistic editor, then, the foundation of the temple, which is treated as the central event of Solomon's reign, is a religious epoch of prime importance (see especially his remarks in 1 K. 32 f.), and on this ground alone he would naturally make Solomon's reign commence a new book—the history of Israel under the one true sanctuary.¹ [Burney (Hastings' DB 2859 f.) gives a careful list of deuteronomistic phrases and expressions wholly or nearly peculiar to the editor of Kings.]

When we say in general that the book of Kings was thrown into its present form by a deuteronomistic redactor we do not affirm that he was the first who digested the sources of the history into a continuous work. Indeed the selection of materials, especially in the earlier parts of the narrative, has been thought to point to an opposite conclusion. Nor, on the other hand, must we ascribe absolute finality to his work. He gave the book a definite shape and character; but the recognized methods of Hebrew literature left it open to additions and modifications by later hands. Even the redaction in the spirit of Deuteronomy seems itself to have had more than one stage, as Ewald and other critics recognize. The book was not closed till far on in the Exile, after the death of Nebuchadrezzar and Jehoiachin (2 K. 2527 f.). The fact that it closes with the pardon, not with the death, of Jehoiachin is very well explained by Meyer (Enst. 78) as being due to the narrator's looking upon the king's elevation as the first step towards the realization of the Messianic hopes; and the fall of the kingdom of Judah is presupposed in such passages as 1 K. 844 51 91-9 2 K. 17 19 f. [21 7-15 22 15-20]² 2326 f. These passages, however, are mere interjected remarks, which seem to be added to adapt the context to the situation of the Jews in captivity. The main redaction, though subsequent to the reformation of Josiah, which supplied the standard applied to all previous kings ('the high places were not removed'), does not point to the time of the captivity. Thus, for example, the words 'unto this day' in 2 K. 822 147 166 are part of the 'epitome' composed by the main redactor (see below, § 7), and imply that he wrote before the destruction of the Judean state.

Even the second redaction (see § 2) did not absolutely fix a single authoritative recension of the book, as appears in detail from a comparison of \mathfrak{C} with the Hebrew text.

The LXX—i.e., \mathfrak{C}^{BL} (\mathfrak{C}^{A} follows MT closely, and is perhaps based upon Origen's recension [so Silberstein, ZATW 131 f. 141 f.])—of Kings is not a corrupt reproduction of the Hebrew receptus; it represents another recension. Neither recension can claim absolute superiority. The defects of \mathfrak{C} lie on the surface, and are greatly aggravated by the condition of the Greek text, which has suffered much in transmission, and particularly has in many places been corrected after the later Greek versions that express the Hebrew receptus of the second century of our era. Still \mathfrak{C} not only preserves many good readings in detail, but also throws much ¹ With this it agrees that the later appendix 2 S. 21-24 does not seem to have passed under the hand of the deuteronomistic redaction. See We. CH(2) 302.

² [The following passages also may safely be assigned to the second—i.e. to the exilic or post-exilic—deuteronomist (=D₂): 1 K. 8 315 64 [18] f. 61 119b to 16 12 f. 2 K. 17 7-17 29-34a 24 2-12 15-25; perhaps too all those chronological notices which aim at establishing a synchronism between the kings of Judah and those of Israel.]

light on the long-continued process of redaction (at the hand of successive editors or copyists) of which the extant Hebrew of Kings is the outcome. Even the false readings of the Greek are instructive, for both recensions were exposed to corrupting influences of precisely the same kind. The following examples will serve to illustrate the treatment through which the book has passed.

1. Minor detached notices such as we should put in foot-notes or appendices are inserted so as to disturb the natural context.

Thus 1 K. 427 [57] must be taken continuously with 419, and so \mathfrak{C}^{BL} (inserting between them v. 17) actually reads. In like manner \mathfrak{C}^{BL} omits 1 K. 611-14, which breaks the context of the description of the temple. Again, in \mathfrak{C}^{BL} , 1 K. 926 follows on v. 14, so that Solomon's dealings with Hiram are recorded continuously. The notices intervening in vv. 15-25 (in a very unnatural order) belong to a class of floating notes about Solomon and his kingdom which seem to have got stranded almost by chance at different points in the two recensions.

2. There are direct or indirect indications of transpositions and insertions on a larger scale.

Thus in \mathfrak{C}^{BL} the history of Naboth (1 K. 21) precedes chap. 20, and in fact chaps. 20 and 22 are parts of one narrative, obviously quite distinct from the history of Elijah. Again, the story of Abijah's sickness and Ahijah's prophecy is not found in \mathfrak{C}^{BL} at 1 K. 141-20¹; at 1224 appears another version of the same narrative, in which there is no reference to a previous promise to Jeroboam through Ahijah, and the prophet is introduced as a new character. This version (1224), which places the prophecy of the destruction of Jeroboam's house between his return from Egypt and his elevation to the throne, is no doubt a mere legend; but it goes to prove that there was once a version of the history of Jeroboam in which 11 29-39 had no place. In truth, after 11 26-28 there must once have stood some account of a rebellion in which Jeroboam 'lifted up his hand' against king Solomon. To such an account (not to the incident of Ahijah and the cloak related in vv. 29-39), v. 40 is the natural sequel. Thus all that is related of Ahijah falls under suspicion of being foreign to the original history. Compare ЈЕРОБОАМ 1. It is noteworthy that in a passage peculiar to \mathfrak{C}^{BL} [in the ed. of Swete 1 K. 1224 a-2] the incident of the tearing of the cloak is related of Shemaiah and placed at the convention at Shechem, showing how much fluctuation there was in the tradition. In 2 K. 1322 \mathfrak{C}^{L} has an addition which affects both history and geography (see APHEK, § 3 a, HAZAEI) on the conquests of Hazael. According to Kittel (Kön. p. vi) such passages have been inserted by later editors from older sources which were still accessible to them in their completeness.

These instances show that there was a certain want of definiteness about the redaction. The mass of disjointed materials, not always free from inconsistencies, which lay before the editor in separate documents or in excerpts already partially arranged by an earlier hand, could not have been reduced to real unity without critical sifting, and an entire recasting of the narrative, in a way foreign to the ideas and literary habits of the Hebrews. The unity which the editor aimed at was limited to chronological continuity in the events recorded, and a certain uniformity in the treatment of the religious meaning of the narrative. Even this could not be perfectly attained in the circumstances, and the links of the history were not firmly enough riveted to prevent disarrangement or rearrangement of details by later scribes.

The continued efforts of successive redactors can be traced in the chronology of the book. The chronological

4. Chronological methods. clearly in the history after Solomon, where the events of each king's reign are thrown into a kind of stereotyped framework of this type:—

¹ In the twentieth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, Asa began to reign over Judah, and reigned in Jerusalem forty-one years. . . . In the third year of Asa, king of Judah, Baasha began to reign over Israel, and he reigned in Tirzah twenty-four years.

The history moves between Judah and Israel according to the date of each accession; as soon as a new king has been introduced everything that happened in his reign is discussed, and wound up by another stereotyped formula as to the death and burial of the sovereign; and to this mechanical arrangement the natural connection of events is often sacrificed. In this scheme the elaborate synchronisms between contemporary monarchs in his architectural schemes and in the commercial enterprises which procured the funds for such costly works (chap. 5 [5:15-32] and chap. 9 to f.). On each side of this context lies a complex of various narratives and notices illustrating Solomon's wisdom and greatness, but also, in chap. 11, his weakness and the incipient decay of his kingdom. It is evident that the rise of the adversaries who, according to 11:25, troubled Solomon through all his reign cannot originally have been related as the punishment of the sins of his old age. The pragmatism as usual belongs to the redactor (11:4). We have seen that there was once another version of the history of Jeroboam. On 1 K. 11:1-8, cp further SOLOMON, § 8, and see the commentaries of Benzinger and Kittel.

(3) For the history of the divided kingdom the redactor, as we have seen, follows a fixed scheme determined by the order of accessions, 7. 1 K. 12-2 K. and gives a short epitome of the chief facts about each king, with an estimate of his religious character, which for the schismatic north is always unfavourable. The epitome, as the religious standpoint shows, belongs to the same hand throughout—i.e., to D; but so much of it as relates to Judah is plainly based on good written sources, which from the nature of the particulars recorded may be identified with the book of Royal Chronicles referred to under each reign, which seems to have been a digest of official notices. [A reference to the 'Book of the History of the Kings of Judah' (or, Israel) is wanting only in the cases of Ahaziah, of Jehoahaz, of Jehoiahin, and of Zedekiah among the kings of Judah, and in that of Joram and Hoshea among those of Israel. Both the Judahite and the Israelite work (unless with Reuss we are to suppose a single work, cited by different titles) were evidently compilations of private origin, prepared shortly before the exile on the basis of older chronicles and special treatises.]

If the chronicle named for the kings of Israel actually lay before the editor he at least did not make such excerpts from it as we find in the Judæan history, for the epitome for Ephraim is very bare of concrete details.

Besides the epitome and the short excerpts from the Judæan chronicles which go with it, the history includes a variety of longer narratives, which alike in their subject-matter and in their treatment are plainly distinct from the somewhat dry bones of the properly historical records. The northern narratives are all distinguished in a greater or less degree by the prominence assigned to prophets. In the southern kingdom we hear less of the prophets, with the great exception of Isaiah; but the temple occupies a very prominent place.

The narrative of the man of God from Judah (1 K. 13) is indubitably of Judæan origin. Its attitude to the altar at Bethel—the golden calf does not appear as the ground of offence—is diverse not only from that of Elijah and Elisha, but even from that of Hosea.¹ The other narratives that deal with the history of Ephraim are all by northern authors (see, for example, 1 K. 19:3-2 K. 9:6), and have their centre in the events of the Syrian wars and in the persons of Elijah and Elisha. They are not all, however, of one origin, as appears most clearly by comparing the account of the death of Naboth in the history of Elijah, 1 K. 21, and in the history of Elisha and Jehu, 2 K. 9. In the latter narrative Naboth's 'field' lies a little way from Jezreel, in the former it is close to Ahab's palace (? in Samaria, see v. 18 and variants of Ⓞ in v. 1), and is described as a vineyard. The 'burden' quoted by Jehu is not in the words of 1 K. 21, and mentions the additional fact that Naboth's sons were killed.¹ In other words, the history of Jehu presupposes events recorded in the extant accounts of Elijah, but not these accounts themselves. Moreover, the narrative in 2 K. seems to be the more accurate; it contains precise details lacking in the other.

Now it is plain that 1 K. 21 belongs to the same history of Elijah with chaps. 17-19. The figure of the prophet is displayed in the same weird grandeur, and his words (with the omission of the addition already noted in vv. 20b-21) have the same original and impressive force. This history, a work of the highest literary art, has come down to us as a fragment. For in 1 K. 19:15 Elijah is commanded to take the desert route to Damascus—i.e., the route E. of the Jordan. He could not, therefore, reach Abel-meholah in the Jordan valley, near Bethshean, when he 'departed thence' (v. 19), if 'thence' means from Horeb. The journey to Damascus, the anointing of Hazael and Jehu, must once have intervened; but they have been omitted because another account ascribed these acts to Elisha (2 K. 8:7-9). Cp SHAPHAT. Now there is no question that we possess an accurate historical account of the anointing of Jehu. Elisha, long in opposition to the reigning dynasty (2 K. 3:13), and always keeping alive the remembrance of the murder of Naboth and his sons (6:32), waited his moment to effect a revolution. It is true that the prime impulse in this revolution came from Elijah; but, when the history in 1 K. represents Elijah as personally commissioned to inaugurate it by anointing Jehu and Hazael as well as Elisha, we see that the author's design is to gather up the whole contest between Yahweh and Baal in an ideal picture of Elijah and his work. No doubt this record is of younger date than the more photographic picture of the accession of Jehu, though prior to the rise of the new prophecy under Amos and Hosea.² [For the later criticism of the Elijah-narratives, see ELIJAH, § 4, also Ki. Kön. 159-162, appendix on chaps. 17-19 21.]

The episode of Elijah and Ahaziah, 2 K. 1, is certainly by a different hand, as is seen even from the new feature of revelation through an angel; and the ascension of Elijah, 2 K. 2, is related as the introduction to the prophetic work of Elisha.

The narratives about Elisha are not all by one hand; for example, 4:1-7 is separated from the immediately subsequent history by a sharply marked grammatical peculiarity (the suffix י); moreover, the order is not chronological, for 6:24 cannot be the sequel to 6:23; and in general those narratives in which the prophet appears as on friendly terms with the king, and possessed of influence at court (e.g., 4:13-6:9 compared with 13:14), plainly belong to the time of Jehu's dynasty, though they are related before the fall of the house of Omri. In this disorder we can distinguish portions of an historical narrative which speaks of Elisha in connection with events of public interest, without making him the central figure, and a series of anecdotes of properly biographical character. The historical narrative embraced 2 K. 3:6-24-7:20 9:1-10:28—in fact, the whole account of the reign of Joram and the revolution under Jehu; and, as 2 K. 3 has much affinity to the history of Ahab and Jehoshaphat in 1 K. 22, we may add the earlier history of the Syrian wars (1 K. 20 22) to the series. The evidence of style is hardly sufficient to assign all these chapters to a single hand (for example, in רכב is a single chariot in the history of Jehu, but in 1 K. 20 a collective, the single chariot being מרכבת); but they are all full of fresh detail and vivid description, and their sympathy with the prophets of the opposition, Micaiah and Elisha, and with the king of Judah, who takes the prophets' part, does not exclude a genuine interest in Ahab and Joram, who are painted in very human colours, and excite our pity and respect. To the historian these chapters are the most valuable part of the northern history.

¹ The standing phrases common to 1 K. 21:20b-21 2 K. 9:7-10a belong to the redaction, as is plain in the latter case from 9:3.

² Some expressions that point to a later date are certainly added by another hand—e.g., the last part of 18:18. In old Israel, up to the time of Hosea, the Baalim (pl.) are the golden calves, which have no place in this context. A late insertion also is the definition of time by the stated oblation in the temple at Jerusalem, 18:29-36. At v. 36 this is lacking in Ⓞ; at v. 29 the insertion of Ⓞ reveals the motive for the interpolation—viz., to assimilate Elijah's sacrifice to the legal service.

In the more biographical narratives about Elisha we may distinguish one circle connected with Gilgal, Jericho, and the Jordan valley to which Abel-meholah belongs (41-7 ? 38-44; chap. 5 ? 61-7). Here Elisha appears as the head of the prophetic guilds, having his fixed residence at Gilgal. Another circle, which presupposes the accession of the house of Jehu, places him at Dothan or Carmel, and represents him as a personage of almost superhuman dignity. Here there is an obvious parallelism with the history of Elijah, especially with his ascension (compare 2 K. 6 17 with 2 11, 13 14 with 2 12); and it is to this group of narratives that the ascension of Elijah forms the introduction.

Of the Judæan narratives there is none to rival the northern histories in picturesque and popular power.

9. Judæan narrative. The history of Joash, 2 K. 11 f., of Ahaz's innovations, 16 10 f., and of Josiah's reformation, 22 3-23 25, have their common centre in the temple on Zion, and may with great probability be referred to a single source. The details suggest that this source was based on official documents. Besides these we have a full history of Hezekiah and Sennacherib and of Hezekiah's sickness, 18 13-20 19, repeated in a somewhat varying text in Is. 36-39 (cp ISAIAH i. § 6, ii. § 15). The history of Amaziah and Joash in 2 K. 14 8-14 with the characteristic parable from vegetable life, may possibly be of northern origin.¹

When we survey these narratives as a whole we receive an increased impression of the merely mechanical character of the redaction by which they are united. Though editors have added something of their own in almost every chapter, generally from the standpoint of religious pragmatism, there is not the least attempt to work the materials into a history in our sense of the word; and in particular the northern and southern histories are practically independent, being merely pieced together in a sort of mosaic in consonance with the chronological system, which we have seen to be really later than the main redaction. It is very possible that the order of the pieces was considerably readjusted by the author of the chronology; of this indeed $\text{\textcircled{C}}$ still shows traces. With all its imperfections, however, as judged from a modern standpoint, the redaction has the great merit of preserving the older narratives in their original colour, and bringing us much nearer to the actual life of the old kingdom than any history written throughout from the standpoint of the exile could possibly have done.

10. Advantage of mechanical redaction. Since Ewald's History, vols. 1 and 3, and Kuenen's Ond. (2) 1 332 f., the most thorough and original investigation of the structure of the book is that in Wellhausen's fourth (not in the fifth and sixth) edition of Bleek's Einl. (78)

KINSHIP. The bond by which the social and political units of the Hebrews—their clans and their tribes—were held together in the older historical period was neither more nor less than a genuine and operative feeling of kinship (see GOVERNMENT, § 2 ff.). Hebrew theorists, like Arab genealogists, understood this kinship in the same sense as we understand it,—as due to derivation from a common ancestor; a tribe consisted entirely of blood relations (see GENEALOGIES i., § 2).

At the very outset this theory requires at least some modification; for even in historical times physical descent was not the only way in which blood relationship could be constituted. Adoption was equally effective. So also was the method of blood covenant. Not individuals only, but whole clans could in this way enter into a lasting union and become fused into a single community. The various ceremonies observed in making such a covenant (cp COVENANT, § 3, and Robertson Smith's excellent exposition in Kin. 47 ff. 261 f., Rel. Sem. (2) 314 f.) have all one meaning; they were originally intended to create a physical and literal community of blood, or, in accordance with later ideas, they were intended, at least symbolically, to represent the creation of such a bond. This shows itself with unmistakable clearness when, for example, two men actually open their veins and mix their blood, or when the protected smears with his blood the tent-pole of his protector; but it is still discernible, though in a more disguised form, in the rule of hospitality by which even now the person of the guest who has eaten with a host remains inviolable for at least a certain time—the time, to wit, during which the meal of which they have together partaken is supposed to be still sustaining them. In the Hebrew domain compare the covenant described in Ex. 24, where the people and the altar of Yahwè are sprinkled with the same blood.

There is another point in which the old Semitic conceptions of blood relationship differ from those of modern times: there was no gradation of relationship. We take account of the degrees by which relations are removed from the common ancestor; in the Semitic field relationship is absolute: a man either belongs to a given family circle, or he does not. Relationship is participation in the common blood which flows with equal fullness in the veins of every member of that circle; on this idea rest all the rights and obligations between the individual and his clansmen. There can therefore be no such thing as aristocracy of birth in our sense of the expression. Within the gens none are high-born, none are low-born; there is no blue blood. This is clearly shown in the law of blood revenge (WRS Kin. 22 f., and elsewhere). The duty falls on every member of the clan to which the murdered person belonged, and their vengeance seeks every member alike of the murderer's clan.

This said, it must not be denied that a feeling of relationship in our closer sense of the word also began to show itself from a comparatively early period. Indeed, the Hebrews from the earliest times to which our historical records carry us may be said to have been distinguished by the energy of their 'family' feeling. As the limits of society extended, the primitive conception of blood-kinship described above would naturally grow weaker; that of near kinship in our sense of the word can retain its vigour and efficiency only within the narrower circle. Within the larger federation of tribes (the people or nation of Israel) the feeling was never very strong; bloody wars between individual tribes were not unknown, and it was long before the sense of oneness had thoroughly pervaded all portions of the body politic. In the end it was not by the conception of blood kinship but by the political organisation of the monarchy that this sense was called into being and maintained.

The question as to what constituted national kinship was answered by the genealogists. Each individual tribe was held to be derived from an ancestor whose descendants bore his name as their tribal name; the mutual relations of the tribe and the various clans comprising it were determined by the relationship of the ancestor of each clan to the patriarch from whom all alike claimed descent. In other words, the formation and development of tribes were held to have taken place under the dominion of the patriarchal system (GENEALOGIES i., § 2). Moreover, it is an actual fact that so far as our knowledge goes the patriarchal system was prevalent among the Hebrews from the earliest historical times. The head of the family is the man; the woman passes over to the clan and tribe of her husband, who is master both of herself and of her children (FAMILY, § 3*ff.*; MARRIAGE, § 4*ff.*). Kinship, tribe-connection, inheritance, are determined by the man.

Robertson Smith (Kinship, passim), however, has incontrovertibly shown that among the Semites as well as many other widely separated peoples matriarchy must at one time have prevailed. By this expression, as distinguished from patriarchy, is meant not the dominion of the woman in the household, but rather that arrangement of family- and clan-relations in accordance with which the relation of the children to the mother was regarded as by far the more important, that to the father being of quite subordinate moment. It is the mother who determines the kinship. The children belong to the mother's clan, not to the father's. The wife is not under the power of the husband, but under the guardianship of her male relations. The head of the family is not the father but the maternal uncle, who has supreme authority over the mother and her children. Inheritance is not from father to son, but from brother to brother, from (maternal) uncle to nephew.

The existence of this matriarchy among the Semites is shown (among other proofs) by the existence of ancient words, common to various branches of the Semitic family, denoting relationship derived from the mother. In like manner there are feminine tribal names, and tribal heroines pointing to the same inference. With the Arabs down even to the days of Mohammed a kind of marriage (see below) was still kept up which entirely belonged to the matriarchal system.

For details as to matriarchy among the Semites in general the discussions of Robertson Smith,¹ Wellhausen,² and Wilken³ must be referred to. What specially interests us here is the fact that in the OT also traces of the existence of this institution among the Hebrews can still be found. Even if these were not absolutely convincing in themselves, they would become so after the demonstration of the existence of the institution among the Arah and other Semitic peoples. Alongside of the masculine tribal names we have a series of feminine ones:—Hagar, Keturah, Leah, Rachel, Bilhah, Zilpah. Stade conjectures that at one time there was a genealogical system according to which the tribes were all of them wives of Jacob (G11 146). Such feminine names at all events cannot be regarded as mere poetical adornments of the legends to which they belong; they must originally have been integral parts of the genealogical system.

Marriages of brother and sister, that is to say between children of different mothers, had nothing offensive to the moral sense of the older period (see MARRIAGE, § 2); it is a relic of the times when relationship was determined not by the blood of the father but by that of the mother, and when accordingly community of descent on the mother's side was the only bar to marriage. This explains also the possibility of the custom according to which the son could marry the stepmother, the father the daughter-in-law (see MARRIAGE, § 2). Notwithstanding the express prohibition of such unions they seem to have been not unknown down to a time as late as that of Ezekiel, although, on the other hand, marriages between maternal relations, between father and stepdaughter, father and daughter, mother and son were from the first regarded with horror (cp Gen. 19 30 ff.); in D express prohibition is not deemed necessary.

How deeply rooted was the view that relationship was constituted through the mother is shown by passages such as Gen. 42 38 43 29 44 20 27 ff.

6. Meaning of 'brother.' Judg. 8 19 9 3, where the designation of brother in the full sense of the word is reserved for sons of the same mother; as also by such narratives as that of Judg. 9 2 f., where Ahimelech is regarded by his mother's relations, the Shechemites, as one of themselves, and his maternal uncles are his natural allies. The prevalence of the same view is seen also in the practice of adoption by the mother (not the father) (Gen. 30 3), in the right of inheritance through the mother, as implied in Gen. 21 10 ('the son of this handmaid shall not inherit with my son'), in the right of the mother to give the name as shown in the older sources of the Pentateuch, though in P it is always the father who does so. In Eliezer's negotiations for Rebekah it is not her father Bethuel ('and Bethuel,' Gen. 24 50, is a late redactional insertion) but her brother who is her guardian and carries on the transaction.

Another characteristic feature of matriarchal marriage is that it is not the woman who enters the man's tribe but the man who enters the woman's; she

7. Tribal relations. continues to belong to her own tribe. This also can be shown to have been the case in the Hebrew domain. Too much stress indeed must not be laid on the expression וַיֵּלֶךְ אִתּוֹ, 'to go in unto,' the usual phrase in Hebrew and Arahic for the consummation of a marriage; but it is certain that among the Hebrews, as with the Arah, the woman always figures in particularly close connection with the tent, and frequently as its mistress. In such cases as Gen. 24 67, indeed, we may be in the presence only of a custom which, in the case of wealthy people, allowed each wife (as with a rich sheikh at present) to have a separate tent. The narrative of Judg. 4 17 ff. (cp 5 24 ff.), however, is clear enough; it is Jael who owns the tent, who receives the fugitive into it, and who accords to him its protection. This is in exact accord with the present rights of Arah women as regards fugitives seeking protection. The story of Eliezer's wooing of Rebekah also assumes the possibility that the girl may not consent to leave her home, but may insist that her future husband should marry into her own tribe and clan (Gen. 24 5). Similarly Jacob fears lest Laban should refuse to let his daughters go, but should insist—in accordance with his undoubted right—on their staying at home; hence his secret flight (Gen. 31 31). The phrase, 'shall leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife,' in Gen. 24 may be an old saying dating from remote times when the husband went to the house (tent) of the wife, and joined her clan. Still the passage may be merely the narrator's remark, and even if it be an old proverb, we cannot be sure that it really carries us so far back in antiquity.

Another instance of a matriarchal marriage requires notice: that of Samson (Judg. 14). The case is

8. 'Beena'- thoroughly exceptional; it is exogamy, but reversing the relations. The husband marriage. is the alien, and visits his wife, who remains in her own home, and it is in the house of her relations that the marriage feast is held. Samson himself indeed does not become a Philistine; but neither does his wife become Israelite; the intention is that they shall meet only from time to time. Parallels are not wanting in pre-Islamic Arab history; as already said, such marriages were nothing out of the common up to the period immediately preceding that of Mohammed. The important point lies here:—the wife continues to belong to her own tribe, and the children, naturally, so belong also. It is thus the mother's blood that is the determining factor. This kind of marriage, it is plain, could originally have arisen only under the influence of matriarchal institutions.

From the facts adduced Robertson Smith draws the conclusion that this kind of marriage—which (after J. F. M'Lennan) he proposes to call beena-marriage (from the Singhalese)—had been the form universally prevalent among the Semites in the period before the separation of the tribes. After the separation, the Hebrews from the same starting-point arrived at monandrous baal-marriage (cp MARRIAGE, § 2) long before the Arabs did.

Such an inference, however, would be too sweeping. Robertson Smith himself regarded it as not improbable

9. 'Baal'- primitive Semitic times (Kin. 178); and marriage. Wellhausen (op. cit. 479) has proved it. The existence of such old Semitic words as ham for wife's father-in-law (see HAMU, NAMES WITH) and kalla for the daughter-in-law is, with other cases that might be adduced, conclusive. Wellhausen calls special attention to the fact that in the word 'amm, Arab., Heb., Syr., and Sab., unite the senses of 'people' and 'relations on the father's side' (see AMNI, NAMES WITH). 'Whatever the time and place of origin of this mode of speech, the father's relations must also have been the political ones when it arose.'

Robertson Smith's concession, it is true, is limited to polyandrous baal-marriage—a form of patriarchal marriage which is well attested for the old Arabians (Strab. xvi. 4 25; cp WRS Kin. 133 f., We. op. cit. 460 ff.). In this description of marriage a group of brothers or nearly related men had the wife in common; the children belonged to the tribe of the fathers. Smith

10. Levirate. finds a trace of this form of polyandry still surviving in the levirate marriage of the Hebrews (see MARRIAGE, § 7 f.). The duty of inheriting the wife is originally a right, which, as Smith thinks, must have had its origin in an original community of possession. Wellhausen (op. cit. 461) remarks further that the beginning of the law on the subject in D (Dt. 25 5 'if brethren dwell together') finds no explanation in the present context, but would fit in well with the explanation suggested by Smith. Hebrew levirate marriage, however, admits of sufficient explanation from the simple fact that in Hebrew baal-marriage wives in general are property that can be inherited. The right of inheriting became a duty in this one special case as soon as the first son of such a marriage came to be regarded as son of the deceased husband, and this last finds its explanation in the Hebrew view of the evils of childlessness (cp MARRIAGE, § 5 ff.).

Obviously the form of marriage just described must be older than monandrous baal-marriage; indeed there

11. Earliest is not in the nature of things any reason practice. for regarding it as more recent than even the earliest form of matriarchal marriage.

Baal-polyandry was originally in any case marriage by capture. As such it is hardly likely to have been a development of a form of marriage in which the husband married as an alien into the tribe of the wife. It may therefore be best to abandon all attempt to make out a genetic connection or evolutionary relation between the various kinds of marriage, and to concede that marriage by capture as well as matriarchal polyandry (which, strictly speaking, cannot be distinguished from absolute promiscuity) may date from the most remote times. One tribe might count kin from the mother, being endogamous, or else marrying its young women to men of alien tribe only when the men consented to join the tribe of the wife and the children remained with the mother. Another tribe counted kin from the father and therefore sought for its wives, so far as these could not be found within the tribe, by capture of such welcome additions from other tribes.

KIR-HERES

etc.] αὐχμοῦ in Jer. In 2 K. 3 does not recognize any place-name (see note 2). Tg., Is. 151, renders Kir-Moab, כִּרְמֹאב, Kirakkā of Moab, and Kir-hareseth, כִּרְךְ תִּקְפֹּהוּ, 'their strong city'; Ptolemy (v. 175) has χαράκωμα; Steph. Byzant. Καρακώμα.

That the three names given above (to which we may perhaps add KERIOTH, KIRJATH-HUZOTH) represent the same place, is undeniable. When Jehoram of Israel invaded Moab, Kir-hareseth (so MT) was the only city which held out against the Israelites (2 K. 325-27); obviously it was the capital, i.e., Kir Moab.¹ It was famous for its vines. In Is. 167 mourning is anticipated 'for the grape-clusters of Kir-hareseth' (see FLAGON, § 3); and in 2 K. 325, after the description of the stopping up of the fountains and the felling of the fruit trees, we should probably read, 'until there remained not a cluster of its grapes in Kir-hareseth'² (see Crit. Bib.), or, if the above reading of the name is correct,

2. Situation. 'in Kiriath Hadāshath.' It stood near the S. frontier of Moab;³ the Arabic geographers knew it under the name Kerak. Commanding as it did the caravan route from Syria to Egypt and Arabia, its possession was hotly disputed by the Franks and the Saracens. The former held it from 1167 to 1188, when Saladin became master of both Kerak and Shōbek (6½ hrs. from Petra). They mistook Kerak for Petra, and established a bishop's see there under the title of 'Petra deserti.' At an earlier time Kerak had been the seat of a bishopric in the province of Palastina Tertia (Reland, 705).

El-Kerak (see fig. in SBOT 'Isa.', 169) is placed on an extremely steep rocky hill, surrounded on all sides by deep ravines. It is about ten miles from the south-east corner of the Dead Sea, and some 3370 feet above sea-level. To the N. and S. it is protected by the mountains, which are passable only on the N. by descending the Mōjib (the great gorge of the Arnon), which runs E. and W., and on the S. by the wild gorge called the Wādī Kerak. To the W. there is the Dead Sea, since 1897 navigated by a mail steamer which plies from the N. bank to el-Lisān (see DEAD SEA, § 5), whence a carriage road is to be constructed (1897) to Kerak. The city is still partly enclosed by a wall with five towers. Originally there were but two entrances, both consisting of tunnels in the rock. On the southern side stands the citadel, a strong building separated from the adjoining hill by a deep moat hewn in the rock. It is a fine specimen of a Crusader's castle. Beneath it is a chapel, with traces of rude frescoes. The present population of Kerak numbers from 20,000 to 22,000, of whom about one-fourth are Greek Christians. Their strong position, numbers, and daring character made them till a few years ago practically independent of the Turkish government. Here Burckhardt was plundered, De Saulcy held to ransom, and Tristram greatly harassed; Gray Hill's account of his own detention is vivid.

² Read עַר לֹא הִשָּׂאָר אֶשְׁבֵּל עֲנָבֵיהָ בְּקִיר חֲרִישָׁתָהּ (GL and Tg. Jon.). Klo. suggests כִּי אִם אֲנִשָּׂאָר, a weak reading, nor could MT's ח' אֲנִיָּה אֲנִיָּה easily have arisen out of it. MT gives עַד־הִשָּׂאָר אֶשְׁבֵּל בְּקִיר חֲרִישָׁתָהּ—i.e., 'until one left its stones in the wall as potsherd' (Gi. has חֲרִישָׁתָהּ; but what could this mean?). ³ ἕως τοῦ καταλιπεῖν τοὺς λίθους τοῦ τοίχου καθηρμένους (GL^A reads καταλιπεῖν, καθηρμένους); GL^B ἕως τ. μὴ καταλιπεῖν λίθον ἐν τοίχῳ τεκτονικῆς. KIRJATH, RV KIRIATH (קִּרְיָת), an imperfect place-name in Josh. 1828. Di. reads קִרְיָת־יְעָרִים, Kirjath-jearim (אֲרֵעִיμ [B], και πολεις αρειουμ [AL]); but see KIRJATH-JEARIM, § 1 (a).

KIRJATHAIM,¹ RV KIRIATHAIM (קִּרְיָתַיִם), 'two cities,' or 'place of a city'; on form of name see NAMES, § 107; καριαθαιμ [BAFQL].

1. A town on the Moabite plateau mentioned in Nu. 32 37 (καριαθαμ [B], -αθεμ [L]) and Josh. 1319, as having lain within the former dominions of Sihon, and as having been assigned by Moses to Reuben. Meshah, in his inscription (l. 10), calls it קרית, and says that he 'built' or fortified it; it is represented as Moabite also in Jer. 48 (Jer. 481 καρθαιμ [N*], καριαθαμ [N^{c-a} (9)], 23 καριαθεν [N]) and by Ezekiel (Ezek. 25 9, πόλις παραθαλασσίας [BAQ]). In OS (108 27, 269 10) it is described as a Christian village called Coraitha or καριαθα 10 R. m. W. of Mādēbā. This is no doubt the modern Kuraiyā, but whether Coraitha is not rather KERIOTH (g.v.) is disputed. Kiriathaim gave its name to Shaveh-kirjathaim or the 'plain of Kiriathaim' (Gen. 145). See MOAB.

2. See KARTAN.

KIRJATH-ARBA (קִּרְיָת אַרְבַּע), RV KIRIATH-ARBA, Josh. 1415 etc., an earlier name of HEBRON (g.v., § 1).

According to Winckler (GI ii. 39), Kirjath-arba means 'city of the god Arba'; some god is intended whose name was written with the cuneiform sign for 'four' (analogously Beer-sheba = 'well of the god Sheba'). Long before him, Tomkins had proposed the same view (Life of Abraham). Winckler brings these names into connection with a lunar myth of Abraham and Jacob (GI 2 48 57). The original Kirjath-arba, according to him, was not Hebron, but at or near Dan—i.e., in the far north (41, 49). If, however, חֲרֹון in Gen. 37 14 is an error for חֲרֹון in Gen. 28 2 may be an error (of P?) for רְהוֹת. It was probably Rehohoth that was the 'city of four' (see REHOBOTH), at least if אַרְבַּע, 'four,' is correct and is not really a corruption of רְהוֹת, 'REHOBOTH.' T. K. C.

KIRJATH-HUZOTH, RV KIRIATH-HUZOTH (קִּרְיָת חֻצוֹת; πολεις επαγλων [BAFL])—i.e., Kerioth Hazeroth, 'cities of villages'), the place to which Balak took Balaam first of all on his arrival in Moab, according to the Yahwist (J), and where this writer probably made him deliver his first prophecy, Nu. 2239 (with which v. 40 [E] plainly conflicts).

The name ('city of streets' or of 'bazaars'), if correctly read in MT, indicates a place of importance. Very possibly the Yahwist means the city called in Am. 22 Jer. 4824 41 Kerioth. Note that Amos speaks of the 'palaces' of Kerioth. The Elohist has instead 'the city of Moab, at the farthest border' (v. 36).

KIRJATH-JEARIM (קִּרְיָת־יְעָרִים), 'city of dense copse'—καριαθιαρ[ε]ιμ [BAL]), a city of Judah, in the Gibeonite group (Josh. 9 17).

1 In the list of towns in Palestine against which Šošenq (Shishak) warred, occurs the name ḫadm. Müller (As. u. Eur. 166 n. 3) would emend this to ḫartm (ך and י being as easily interchanged in Eg. as in Heb.), and identify with the Moabite Kirjathaim.

The earliest record of the name (if we suppose it to have been correctly transmitted) is probably Judg. 18.12. See also Jer.

26 20 (καριαθαειρεμ [κθ]), Josh. 9.17 (πολεις ιαρειμ [B]), π. μ [AFL] 18.14 f. (v. 14 καριαθαειρεμ [B]), 1 Ch. 2.50 52 f. (v. 53 πολεις ιαειρ [B], καριαθαειρ

[A], om. L) 135 (πολεις ιαρειμ [BNA]), 2 Ch. 14. Ezra 2.25 . . . (KIRJATH-ARIM [RV KIRIATH-ARIM, καριαθαροιμ (B)] should be 'Kirjath-jearim'; Neh. 7.29 (καριαθαειρεμ [B]). Kirjath-Baal (קִרְיַת בְּעַל; καριαθβααλ [BAL]), and Baalah, with the explanation, 'that is, Kirjath-jearim,' occur in Josh. 18.14; Josh. 15.96; 1 Ch. 13.6 (εις πόλιν δαυειδ, BNA). Baalah alone in Josh. 15.10 (here and in v. 9, Ⓞ has 'Baal' except in v. 10 Ⓞβ εβααλ). 'Baale-Judah,' without explanation, occurs in 2 S. 6.2 (on Ⓞ see below); but Dozy, Kuenen, We., Dr., Ki. read 'Baal'; Klo., Bu. 'Baalath-'

Evidently the earliest name of the place included the divine name Baal; but how came the same place to be afterwards called Kirjath-jearim? It is not a superfluous inquiry. The most obvious explanation—viz., that, in the course of religious progress, 'Baal' came to be discredited as a divine name—is insufficient. We should have expected some better divine name to be substituted for 'Baal,' not the reconstruction of the place-name on an entirely different plan. Moreover, we do not find that Baal was entirely removed from the southern place-names (Baalah, Josh. 15.29; Bealoth, Josh. 15.24, both in P). The first step towards a solution of the problem is to show (a) that the original name of the place was Baal- or Baalath- (hag) gibeah—i. e., 'Baal of the hill,'—and (b) that the full name under which the Deity was worshipped in this Gibeah ('hill') may have been Baal-yarib ('Baal contends').

(a) In 1 S. 7.1 (EV) the ark is said to have been brought into 'the house of Abinadab in the hill' (בֵּית אֲבִינָדָב); cp the same phrase in 2 S. 6.3 RV (AV RVmg. have 'in Gibeah'). It looks as if, in the original writing, גִּבְעָה, 'Gibeah,' was the name of the town where Abinadab lived; but the description 'on the hill' refers to 'the hill on which the town was built' (H. P. Smith), is surely improbable. Near the latter of these passages (2 S. 6.2) Ⓞ has the strange rendering ἀπὸ τῶν ἀρχόντων Ιουδα ἐν [τῇ] ἀναβάσει. [τοῦ θουνοῦ]; two readings are combined, viz., יְהוָה and מַלְאָכָיו, the latter of which is misrendered, and really means 'to Baalath of the hill.' Probably the latter reading is the original one (see Klo. on 2 S. 6.2); observe the Pasek after יְהוָה, which warns us that the text is doubtful. Nor must we overlook the close of the list of the cities of Judah in Josh. 18.28, which runs thus in AV, 'and Jebusi, which is Jerusalem, Gibeah, (and) Kirjath [RV KIRIATH].' The current opinion is that 'Gibeath' means 'Gibeah of Saul,' and that 'Kirjath' is an error for 'Kirjath-jearim.' But it is more in accordance with the analogy of textual errors elsewhere to suppose that 'Kirjath' is an editor's correction of Gibeath, and that the original reading was 'Gibeath-jearim,' though 'jearim' itself may turn out to be incorrect.

(b) We have reached the conclusion that an early name for the place afterwards called (at any rate by scribes) Kirjath-jearim was 'Baal of the hill.' Analogy entitles us to assume that the local Baal had a fuller title describing his chief attribute; cp Baal-hanan, El-iashih, etc. The second part of this title ought to underlie the second part of the name Kirjath-jearim, for of course such a name as Baal-jearim (Baal of the woods) would be contrary to analogy. We can hardly doubt what that second part was; it was either jarim (yārīm) or (more probably) jarib (yārīb). δ and m are interchangeable; cp ιαρειμ (Ⓞβ Hos. 5.13 106) for the Heb. יָרֵב, yārīb. 'Baal contends' was the name; cp יהוֹיָרֵב, Jehoiarib, and בַּל יָרֵב, 'Let the Baal contend with him,' Judg. 6.32. Our further conclusion is that Kirjath-jearim is a late distortion of an older name, Gibeath-baal-yarib, which was current side by side with Baal hag-gibeah. It is hardly necessary to suppose that Har-jearim (Josh. 15.10) is a distortion of Har-baal-jarib; but this is of course a possible view.

According to Winckler (G² 2.104), 'Kirjath-jearim,' or 'city of forests,' is 'nothing but a half-suggesting, half-concealing re-production' of the name Baal-Tamar (Judg. 20.23), which name (of mythological origin) was, he thinks, converted into Baal(e)-Judah (2 S. 6.2) in the time of David, when this locality ceased to be Benjamitish, and became Judahite. See, however, JUDAH, § 3, TAMAR.

In identifying the place which we may conventionally call Kirjath-jearim, we must be careful not to lay equal stress on all the biblical data. We must not, for instance, be too confident that Kirjath-jearim and Beth-sbemes

2. Identifications.

¹ The name was corrupted into יהב, the y having dropped out; this became indistinct, and was misread יהרה, to which v was prefixed by conjecture.

were near one another. The description of Jos. (Ant. vi. 14, Niese), γελτονα πόλιν τῆς Βῆθης κώμης (Naber, τοῖς Βηθσαμῆταις), appears to be suggested by the narrative in 1 S. 6.f., as it now stands, and cannot be treated as authoritative; Josephus was not writing a handbook of geography. Nor is it at all necessary that the site of Kirjath-jearim should be in a wooded or bushy neighbourhood, jearim being probably only an artificial distortion of 'jarib.' The clearest and most certain of all the data is the statement in Josh. 9.17, that the dependent cities of the Gibeonites were Cbephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim. Now GIBEON, CHEPHIRAH, and BEEROTH (qq.v.) are securely identified, and Kirjath-jearim must not be placed too far off from the other members of the group. If in addition to this we require a city on the border of Judah and Benjamin, there is, it would seem, only one site which is available, and that is el-Karya or *Karyet el-'Enab*¹ (city of grapes). Eusebius places καριαθαειρεμ at the ninth milestone from Jerusalem towards Diospolis or Lydda. This suits the position of Karyet el-'Enab, which is about three hours from Lydda. The high authority of Robinson supports this view. The nearness of the mountain Neby Samwil (see MIZPEH), which Eusebius expressly states (*OS*² 278.96; cp 138.13) to be near Kirjath-jearim, is no slight confirmation. The village of el-Karya is but a poor one; there is a Latin church of great interest dedicated originally to St. Jeremiah, owing to a mistaken identification of the place with Anathoth: Prof. G. A. Smith (HG 225 f.) speaks with somewhat more hesitation than the present writer thinks necessary. For the rival site (Kh. 'Ermā) near Bēt 'Aṭāb, the principal argument is its greater nearness to Beth-shemesh ('Erma is about 4 miles E. of 'Ain Shems). This, however, is hardly an argument for critics to use (see ARK, § 5), and, on the other hand, Kh. 'Ermā is too near Zorah and Eshtaol to suit the narrative in Judg. 18.11 f.,² and also in the wrong direction (S. of Keslā). Moreover, for el-Karya it may be urged (but without laying much stress upon it) that this village marks the point of departure of the rough bushy country³ (γρ, see FOREST, 3); hence the later name, 'city of dense copse,' was not an inappropriate one. That it fits the position of Kirjath-jearim on the N. border of Judah and Benjamin, is also beyond refutation, though different views as to the line of demarcation are no doubt tenable.

'The surrounding hills are more thickly clothed, even at the present day, with dense copse, than is any part of the district in which the town can be sought. The ruin is situated on the southern brink of the great valley which broadens into the valley of Sorek, and it is about four miles E. of the site of Beth-shemesh, thus agreeing with the words of Josephus.' According to Conder the boundary line W. of 'Ermā can be drawn in a satisfactory manner (see PEFQ, '79, p. 98 f., and cp Henderson, '78, p. 106 ff.).

When Kirjath-jearim became an Israelitish city is uncertain. It must, however, have been at least partly inhabited by Judahites in the time of

3. Biblical references. David (2 S. 6.2 ff.; cp ARK, § 5). In later times it produced a prophet in the style of Jeremiah, who fell a victim to Jehoiakim's tyranny

¹ The latter name is said to occur first in the fifteenth century. A still more modern name is Abū Gōsh (from a sheikh so called, who lived at the beginning of this century, and left a name of fear). In support of this identification cp Clermont-Ganneau, Archaeological Researches, ii. ('99).

³ There are waars on every side almost, and some very impracticable ones N. and SW. of it (Thomson, LB, ed. '94, p. 666). (Jer. 26²⁰⁻²⁴; see URIJAH). One can imagine that the name of the city (was it Kirjath-jarib, 'city of the [divine] adversary?') was not without its influence on Urijah's sensitive mind. Another apparent reference is a purely imaginary one. Though Wellhausen and Duhm render, in Ps. 132⁶—

We have heard that it is in Ephrathah,
In the Field of Jaar we found it,— and explain the 'Field of Jaar' as 'the country district near Kirjath-jearim' (We.), or as a synonym for that place-name (Du.), a close examination of the text shows that this interpretation is improbable (see Che. Ps. ⁽²⁾). It is true, however, that a recollection of the story of the fortunes of the ark, and of a passage in Chronicles (1 Ch. 2⁵⁰), according to which that town was founded by descendants of Ephrathah, the wife of Caleb, enabled a late editor to draw a semblance of meaning from an indistinctly written and corrupt passage. On the obscure notice of Kirjath-jearim in 1 Ch. 2⁵⁰ 52 f., see SHOBAL.

KIRJATH-SANNAH (קִרְיַת־סֶנְנָה; ΠΟΛΙΣ ΓΡΑΜΜΑΤΩΝ [BAL]; مَدِينَةُ السَّنَا; CARIATHSENNÄ), called also Debir (Josh. 15⁴⁹), is a most problematical name.

There is no satisfactory explanation of the name סֶנְנָה, and no apparent reason why an old Canaanite name distinct from Kirjath-sepher should be mentioned in the list. Since סֶנְנָה precedes it is natural to suppose that סֶנְנָה is a scribal error for סֶפֶר, and that we should restore KIRJATH-SEPPER (cp 6 Pesh.). Sayce explains 'city of instruction,' and identifies with Bit'sāni, said to be mentioned on the Amarna tablets (Sayce, RP⁽²⁾ 5 73, Crit. Mon. 54 n.), and situated W. of Gath. Wi., however, gives bit(?)-sa-a-ni, and leaves it untranslated. See EPHRAIM, § 7, n. 4.

T. K. C.

KIRJATH-SEPPER (קִרְיַת־סֶפֶר, as if 'house of books'; ΠΟΛΙΣ [των] ΓΡΑΜΜΑΤΩΝ [BAL] Josh. 15¹⁵ f.; καρία-σφάρ, ΠΟΛΙΣ ΓΡΑΜΜΑΤΩΝ [B], ΠΟΛ. γρ. ΑΛΛ.] Judg. 1¹¹; also called KIRJATH-SANNAH (קִרְיַת־סֶנְנָה, ΠΟΛΙΣ ΓΡΑΜΜΑΤΩΝ [BAL]), Josh. 15⁴⁹, and DEBIR (דְּבִיר [Judg. 1 Ch.], דְּבִיר, δαβειρ [BAL]), Josh. 15⁴⁹.

A place in the hill-country of Judah, mentioned between Dannah and Anab (Josh. 15⁴⁹), formerly inhabited by Anakim (Josh. 11²¹), and the seat of a king (Josh. 10³⁹ 12¹³). In Josh. 15¹⁷ and Judg. 1¹³ its conquest is ascribed to OTHNIEL [g. v.], in Josh. 10³⁸ f. to Joshua. P includes it among the cities of refuge (Josh. 21¹⁵ 1 Ch. 6⁵⁸).

It has often been assumed (e.g., by Quatremère, 1842) that the name implies the presence of a library of some kind in the place (cp the Babylonian city Sippara¹ [?]). According to Sayce, it was 'the literary centre of the Canaanites in the S. of Palestine,' whilst Debir, —i.e., 'the sanctuary,' was 'the temple wherein its library was established' (Pat. Pal. 220 f.). As Sayce himself, however, following Max Müller (As. u. Eur. 174), records, the form attested by the Papyrus Anastasi I. is Baj-ti-tu-pa-irā, perhaps = קִרְיַת־סֶפֶר, i.e., 'House of the scribe.' That the Canaanitish archives were centralized at Debir is most improbable. If this were the case, Debir must have been the religious capital of Canaan; but of this we have no evidence whatever. Its name may be wrongly vocalized;² 'sanctuary' is not a probable name for a city. Kirjath-sepher may be an alteration of some half-Hebrew name, such as Kirjath-sephār, 'enclosed city'³ (cp ERECH).

Various identifications have been proposed, but only one has much plausibility. First proposed by Knobel (note on Josh. 15¹⁵ 49), it has been warmly advocated by Conder (PEFC, 75, p. 53), who says that the modern ed-Doheryeh (or rather ed-Dāhariyeh), a village four or five hours SW. of Hebron, is the only site which fulfils all the biblical requirements. The objections are three in number. (1) Petrie (according to Sayce,

² Moore (Proc. Am. Or. Soc., Oct. '90, p. lxx) proposed קִרְיַת־סֶפֶר, 'frontier-town,' but he has now withdrawn this (Judg. 27). Geographically, such a name would have been very suitable.

³ Ass. siphru = 'an enclosure with walls.'

in Hastings' DB 1 578a) found no traces at ed-Dāhariyeh of anything older than the Roman period. (2) The equivalence of the names Dāhariyeh and Debir (as if 'the back side') supposed by Knobel and Conder is fanciful in the extreme. (3) The passage (Judg. 1 11-15 Josh. 15 15-19) on which most reliance is placed, because it may seem to point to the beautiful springs about 7 miles N. of ed-Dāhariyeh (see ACHSAH), is partly corrupt. See KEILAH.

The question now presents itself whether not only Kirjath-sepher but also Debir may not be incorrect. Place-names are liable to suffer both by corruption and by abbreviation. May not דְּבִיר, Debir, be a corruption of תָּבוֹר 'Tabor,'¹ and this, like the same word in Judg. 8 18 (cp also THEBEZ in Judg. 9 50), be a corruption of Beth-sur? That such an important city as 'Debir, that is, Kirjath-sepher,' must have been, should be nowhere referred to in subsequent history, is scarcely credible. We know that it was situated in a dry spot, and that it was not far from Hebron. This description applies to the famous city of BETH-ZUR [g. v.] which occupies an impregnable position on a Tell 4½ m. N. from Hebron. It is also in favour of Beth-zur that it stands between Keilah and Beth-tappuah, the two places which (if the suggestion made under KEILAH is correct) Caleb presented to his daughter-in-law Achsah. That Kirjath-sepher is the true name of the city so-called is difficult to believe. It is possible, however, that Debir, or perhaps rather Beth-zur, had an additional descriptive title, Kirjath-sephūr, 'enclosed city.' It is no objection to this theory that the names Debir and Beth-zur both occur in the list in Josh. 15; such double mentions occur elsewhere in P's geographical lists. See also JABEZ.

The Anab of Josh. 15⁴⁹ now becomes more uncertain. W. M. Müller's suggestion of 'Anabeh, SW. of Lydda, the Betoannabe of the Onom., deserves consideration. T. K. C.

KISH (כִּישׁ), 'lord, husband'?² cp KISHON, KUSHAIAH; κ(ε)ΙC [BAL].

1. b. Abiel, a Benjamite of the clan of Becher (1 S. 10²¹, crit. emend., see BECHER, MATRI, and cp BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. [B]), the father of Saul (1 S. 9 1, etc., in 1 Ch. 9 36 N reads κισ; Acts 13 21, AV CIS). In MT of 2 S. 21 14 his home is placed at ZELA, but the text is plainly corrupt. The clan of Becher (the Bircites) appear to have lived at Gibeah of Benjamin (see GIBEAH i., 2). Kish's brother, Ner, the father of Abner (1 S. 14 50 f., but see NER) is strangely represented in 1 Ch. 8 33 (= 9 39) as his father, but the text is in disorder; 'Ner' should probably be 'Nadab' = Abinadab, which appears to be a second name of the father of Kish, a rival of 'Abiel' or 'Abibaal'³ (see NER). The names may have been already mutilated and corrupt in the (late) document upon which the Chronicler is dependent. We meet with Saul's father again in the fictitious genealogy of the Benjamite Mordecai, Esth. 2 5 (κ[ε]ισαίου [BNA]) 11 2 (CISAI, RV KISEUS; id. BNALAB). See GENEALOGIES i., § 6; MORDECAI; and cp ESTHER, § 1, end.

2. The occurrence of the name in Levitical genealogies is of no historical interest. Kish b. Mahli represents an important subdivision of the Merarite Levites (1 Ch. 23 21 f. 24 29); Kishi b. Abdi is the father of the famous Merarite ETHAN (1 Ch. 6 44 29); see also KUSHAIAH, and the same designation attaches to

¹ The phonetic interchange of γ and η is not unexampled; cp the variant readings ηγ and ην in Ezek. 22 4, ηαη and ηαη in Is. 66 17.

² [The interpretation suggested follows RS⁽²⁾ 170, n. 4, and Wi. AS⁽²⁾ 62, n. 1. The name is probably the same as the old Ar. divine name K'ais (Nab. קִישַׁא, קִישַׁא, which is found in Ar. proper names, either alone (cp We. Heid.⁽²⁾ 67), also Sin. (קִישַׁא) or in compounds (e.g., the well-known Imraul'kais). It is plausible to connect the name with the first element of the Ass. compound K'u-u-su-ia-da' on a contract tablet (Peiser, ZATW 17 348 f. [97]), perhaps also with the Edomite Kaus, κ(α) (see EDOM, § 12). Peiser (i.e.) identifies קִישַׁא with the second element in Elkosh (see ELKOSHITE). S. A. C.]

³ That Abiel (1 S. 9 1) is an alteration of Abibaal is pointed out by Marq. (Fund. 15), who refers to the fragmentary name 'Baal' in 1 Ch. 8 30 (9 36). Cp BEELADA, ELIADA.

KISHI

a prominent Merarite of the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29 12). Evidently the names Kish and Abdi are derived from names in 1 Ch. 8 30 (9 36). We need not correct Abdi into Abinadab; the Chronicler may already have found the corrupt form Abdon, whence Abdi, in his document (see above). T. K. C.

KISHI (כִּישִׁי), 1 Ch. 6 44 [29], see KISH, 2; KUSH-AIAH.

KISHION (כִּישִׁיּוֹן), cp כִּישִׁי, and see KISHON, end; ΚΕΙCΩΝ [B], ΚΕCΙΩΝ, ΚΙCΙΩΝ [A] ΚΕCΙΩΝ [L]), a Levitical city in the territory of Issachar (Josh. 19 20 21 28 [where AV 'Kishon']). The parallel passage 1 Ch. 6 57 [72] has KEDESH (כְּדֵשׁ), which most critics (e.g., Kittel) treat as a corruption of Kishion.

The true reading, however, in Josh. and Ch. must surely be כִּישִׁיּוֹן. Whether this Kīdšun is an echo of Gadašuna, which is the name of a principality mentioned in Am. Tab. 267, and therefore of the Kītsuna of the Palestinian name-list of Thotmes III,¹ may be left open.

Mithlau identifies Kishion (Kīdšun) with Tell Keisān, 6 m. SE. of Acre. Kishion being in Issachar, we shall do better to adopt Conder's identification of Kedesh (Kīdšun) with Tell Abū Kudēs (see KEDESH, 2).

T. K. C.

KISHON (כִּישׁוֹן); ΚΕ[Ι]CΩΝ [BNARTL]), a torrent famous as the scene of the overthrow of the Canaanite coalition under Sisera (Judg. 4 7 5 21; 2 cp Ps. 83 9 [16], AV Kison; ΚΙCΩ [A]), and also of the destruction of the prophets of Baal by Elijah (1 K. 18 40). It is also called the 'waters of Megiddo' (Judg. 5 19).

The Kishon (mod. el-Mukattā', 'cut') flows through the plain of Jezreel, nearly due NW. between Samaria and Galilee, and enters the Mediterranean in the lower extremity of the bay of 'Akkā, on the E. of Haifa. It is fed by the waters coming from Carmel, Gilboa, Hermon, and Tabor. Its exact source is uncertain; according to some it rises on the W. side of Mt. Tabor (cp Jer. OS² 110 22, who speaks of its being near Tabor), whilst others prefer to place it near Jenin (see ENGANNIM).

The battle in which Sisera was defeated must have taken place in the winter. In summer the Kishon is a diminutive and insignificant stream, but in winter it overflows, and floods the surrounding country, turning it into a morass. The fate of Sisera's army finds a parallel in the battle between the French and Turks near Tabor on April 16th, 1799, when many of the latter were drowned while attempting to pass the morass in their flight (cp Burck. Syr. 339).

The district of the Kishon in olden times enjoyed an especial reputation for sanctity. North of it flowed the rivers Adonis (Nahr Ibrāhīm) and Belus (Nahr Na'mān), both famous for their sacred character; and Mt. Carmel itself was a sacred mountain. Hence, just as the above-mentioned rivers are named after gods, it is very probably that the Kishon may derive its name, not from its

² In Judg. 5 21 the phrase 'the torrent Kishon' is followed immediately by the difficult words כִּישִׁיּוֹן קְדֵשׁ. According to an improbable, but well-supported, ancient view, it was the name of a torrent distinct from the Kishon (χειμάρρους καθήσε[ε]μ [A Theod., perhaps thinking of Kedesh in Issachar, cp 'waters of Megiddo,' v. 19; so Klo. Gesch. 123, adopts כִּישִׁיּוֹן, i.e., the planet-gods viewed as givers of rain); καθήσεμ [L]; torrentes Cadumini [Vg.], cp Pesh. and Ar.; καουσων [Aq. see Field, ad loc.]. Among modern explanations may be mentioned (1) 'Stream of antiquity' (EV, Bachmann, cp Φ^{B} χ' ἀρχαίων, and the paraphrase of Targ.); (2) 'Onward-rushing stream' (G. A. Cooke, Hist. and Song of Deborah, 48; Ew., 'stream of boldness in attack'—a primitive personification); (3) 'stream of encounters' (Briggs, Kohler, after Abulw.); (4) 'stream of the holy (i.e., divine, ones)' (Klost., Marq., cp. Symm. ἀγίων φάραγ). For a fifth view, for which Φ^{A} καθήσεμ may also be referred to, see KADESH, 2. Of these (1), (3), and (5) may be classed as historical, the plain of the Kishon having been a great battlefield, from the time of Thotmes III. onwards, whilst (2) and (5) have such appropriateness as is involved in a reference to the circumstances of this battle, in the one case to the swollen condition of the torrent, in the other to the bloodshed which dyed the waters.

KITRON (כִּיֵּרֹן; κελρων [BL], χεB. [A]), an unidentified place in the nominal territory of Zebulun, tributary to Israel (Judg. 1 30). From a comparison with Josh. 19 15, it appears that KATTATH (rather perhaps Katrath) was the same place as Kitron. See KARTAH.

A Talmudic doctor (Meg. 6 a) identifies Kitron with Zippori, i.e., Sepphoris (the modern Safuriyeh?), and the etymological Midrash attached to the latter name gives no adequate reason for rejecting this view, which may be correct. At any rate, there is no finer site than Sepphoris in the neighbourhood marked out by the context (see Rob. BR 3 201; Baed. (2) 276).

One of the sons of Javan (Gen. 10 4 1 Ch. 1 7). Also in six other passages—none of them very early (on Is. 23 12 see GEOGRAPHY, § 14). In Ezek. 27 6 we find כִּיֵּתִים כתי—i.e., Cyprus and other islands of the Mediterranean, among the traders of Tyre. The identification with Cyprus in all these is satisfactory (see CYPRUS). The name Kittim is usually derived from the Phoenician city Kition (Larnāka), on the SE. shore of the island. According to Max Müller, however (As. u. Eur. 345), it is a loan-word, originally = Ghattites, K'hattites = Hattē, Hittites. From this the city Kit(t)ion is supposed to have derived its name; this implies that Kit(t)ion was not a Phoenician city.

There is a strange reference to Kittim in Nu. 24 24 (not very early; see BALAAM, § 6). In Jer. 2 10 כִּיֵּתִים כתי is used for the western regions in general (opposed to Kedar the East), and כִּיֵּתִים in Dan. 11 30 (see Bevan) has a specific reference to the Romans (Φ καὶ ἕθονι ῥωμαίοι [87]), as in 1 Macc. 1 1 (AV CHETTIM, RV CHITTIM) 8 5 (AV CITTIM) it is explicitly used of the Macedonians. KNIFE. Five words are rendered 'knife' in EV. 1. כַּיִּישׁ, ma'ākīleth (μάχαίρα [AD], ρούφαία [B], but in P¹rv.

τοις [BC], στοις [BA], Gen. 22:6 to Judg. 19:29 Prov. 30:14†, in Gen. and Judg. in the special sense of a sacrificial knife. The root כרת means not only 'to eat,' but 'to tear in pieces'; 1 cp Ass. akatu, whence makaltu, 'an instrument chiefly used by Magians' (Del. Litt. III B 56 a).

2. כרת, hōreb, so in Josh. 5:2 1 K. 18:28, where implements of cutting are meant. SWORD [g.v.] or 'dagger' is the usual rendering. Cp WEAPONS.

3. אר, tār (Jer. 30:23). The tār (ξυρόν) of the scribe here spoken of is elsewhere rendered 'razor' (see BEARD).

4. סבב, sabbin (an Aramaic word), Prov. 23:2a, but the text is corrupt. Read probably סבב, sabbin, 'for thou wilt endanger thyself by thy folly' (Che.).

5. מלח, mālāḥim (Ezra 1:9†). The traditional Jewish interpretation is 'knives' (so Middoth 4:7; Rashi; Saadia, so Vg.). This is suggested by Syr. hēlāphā, 'knife,' but is unknown to G (παρηλακμένα [A], μένα [L], παρηγμένα [B]) and to 1 Esd. 2:13 (θυσκαί=θυσκαί; EV 'censers'), and is against the context. The true reading must be מלח, 'dishes' (Che.; cp 2 Ch. 35:13); the corruption was produced by assimilation to the preceding סבב, cp Syr. of 1 Esd.

Thus, of the above words, two are corruptions, one (3) refers to the sharp cutting instrument of the barber or the writer, and one (2) is confined to ritual (and to warlike) uses. The remaining word (1) may be used either generally or in a special sense. The ritual knives spoken of in Josh. 5:2 were 'knives of flint' (כרתי, see AV¹⁰ and RV, and cp ר, 'the flint,' Ex. 4:25), and knowing how conservative of old forms ritual is, we may safely assume that the flint or other hard mineral (obsidian perhaps?) used for ritual purposes was in more remote ages in general use for cutting. To have used metal knives, in sacred functions, would have seemed irreverent (cp HANDICRAFTS, § 2). It is noteworthy, however, that, from motives of ceremony, flint knives continued to be used in daily life in Egypt long after 2000 B.C. (see EGYPT, § 36).

Some idea of the various forms of knives used by the Hebrews may be gathered from Bliss's sketches of the flint implements found at Tell el-Hesi (Mound of Many Cities, 37, 124) and from the specimens of cutting instruments of the ancients which are still preserved, or are figured on the monuments. See the Roman and Egyptian instruments in Kitto (s.v. 'Knife,' nos. 1 and 2), and Rich, Dict., s.v. 'cultur,' 'cultellus,' and cp SICKLE, PRUNING HOOK.

That knives were used by the Hebrews during a meal has been inferred from Prov. 23:2 (cp MEALS, § 10); but this passage, being very probably corrupt (see above, 4), cannot safely be appealed to. The food perhaps was brought to table already cut up; the flat cakes of bread were not cut but broken (Is. 58:7, etc.). Herod, however, we are told, was wont to use a knife to pare an apple (Jos. BJ i. 33:7; Ant. xvii. 7:1).

KOA (קוֹא); γχογε [B, Symm., Theod.; † precedes], λογλ [A], κογε [Q]; אב; Vg. principes [cp Aq. κορυφαίον], a people mentioned with Pekod and Shoa as contributing warriors to the Babylonian army (Ezek. 23:23). Identified by Delitzsch (Par. 236) with the Kutu (or Ku, whence the Hebrew form), a nomadic people E. of the Tigris but N. of Elam. Very early mention occurs of a 'mighty king of Gutī' (see TIDAL), and some scholars think that Gutī or Gutium (which represents the same name) has found its way in a mutilated form into Gen. 14:1 (see GOTHM, but cp SODOM). Levites (Gen. 46:11 Ex. 6:19 etc.; only in P and Ch.); see GERSHON, MERARI. To the KOHATHITES (קֹהַתִּי, ōkaath[e]i [BAFL] Nu. 26:57) belonged Aaron, and hence the Kohathites are sometimes subdivided into 'the children of Aaron the priest,' and 'the rest of the children of Kohath' (cp Josh. 21:4*f.*). They were intrusted with the care of the sanctuary during the wanderings in the wilderness (Nu. 4:15 7:9), and their cities are placed in Ephraim, Dan, and half Manasseh (Josh. l.c. 20-26). The Korahites (see KORAH, i. 3) were also reckoned in this division. See GENEALOGIES i., § 7 (iii. c).

KOHELETH, the Hebrew title of Ecclesiastes, and according to MT the name of the supposed speaker of the monologues in that book. Elsewhere (see ECCLESIASTES, § 1) the word is treated on the assumption that MT is correct. The word, however, is admittedly so difficult, and so very unlikely as a designation of a king of Israel, and the textual errors in Ecclesiastes are so serious, that the time seems to have come for raising the question whether the reading is correct. Must it not be due to an early editor's attempt to extract some meaning out of a corrupt text?

קהלת (hak-kōhēleth)—for this (see 7:27 [crit. emend.] 128), not kōhēleth, is the earlier form of the wrong reading of MT—may be the result of a series of changes; it is plausible to hold that ultimately it springs from the faulty repetition of four words in 1:2. The book originally began thus, 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity (הכל הבלים הכל הבל); the two last Hebrew words הכל הבל were miswritten by the next scribe in such a way as to suggest קהלת. To this the editor prefixed קהלת, 'saith.' Interpolation propagated the error (1:12 7:27 12:8, but in 1:12 fell off); then the writer of 12:9*f.* in the Epilogue, and the scribe who prefixed the title, adopted it (without initial ה). It is an extremely plausible view that hak-kōhēleth was also adopted by the editor who prefixed the title to the strange little poem in Prov. 30:16-4, which title must originally have run thus—or very nearly thus,—

'The words of the guilty man Hak-kōhēleth to those that believe in God.'

That the poem which follows is controverted in vs. 5*f.* is an old and reasonable opinion.

Thus the mysterious 'Agur, son of Jakeh,' and 'Ithiel and Ucal' disappear, nor can we lift up a lamentation for them. See Critica Biblica. T. K. C.

KONZE (κωνζα [B], -C [N^c-A], κωλα [N*]), substituted by RV for AV's 'the villages' (κωμας [243, 248, 249; Compl. Ald.]; τας κωμας [58]. in castella et vicis [Vet. Lat.]), in the description of the defensive measures of the Jews against Holofernes (Judith 4:4).

Konvas and κωμας must be corrupt; two MSS (19 108) read κεῖλα, which is but a poor conjecture. Almost certainly the correct reading is κωνα [B], = κωνα = κωνά. Cyamon occurs again in 7:3, together with Bel-men = Belmalm. (Syr. reads 'and to the towns of Bethoron,' omitting the second 'and' again—almost all the Greek MSS.) T. K. C.

KORAH (קֹרַח), hardly 'ice'; cp rather KAREAH and Sin. קרה, קרהו; קרה [B¹AL]).

1. An Edomite clan (so in Gen. 36:5 14 18, which belong to one of the latest sections of the Pentateuch); in 1 Ch. 1:35 their ancestor is said to have been a son of Esau, or, in Gen. 36:16, a son of Eliphaz, son of Esau, though this last passage is wanting in the Samaritan text.

2. The 'son' of Hebron, 1 Ch. 2:43 (κορηε [B], καρηε [1]). The clan claimed descent from Caleb, who in turn belonged to the Edomite clan Kenaz (Judg. 1:13 etc.), and is incorporated with Judah.

3. The legendary progenitor of a levitical guild, the KORAHITES (קֹרַחִי, 1 Ch. 9:19 31 126 [AV KORHITES]; οἱ κορηῖται [BNA], οἱ κορηνοὶ [L]), employed as door-keepers or porters in the temple (Ex. 6:21 24 1 Ch. 6:22 [71 9 19]). Probably the b'nē Korah, a guild of singers or musicians mentioned in the titles of Pss. 42 44-49 84*f.* 87*f.*, were a subdivision of this guild. See WRS OTC (2) 204*f.*; Meyer, Entst. 162 181.

There is no reason for separating the above three names. Not only do we find that the evidence of the levitical names points to a S. Palestinian origin, and that a close relationship subsisted between Edom, Judah, and other tribes and clans of the S., but it is important to note that the levitizing of the clan of Korah, and its enrolment in the great levitical division of Kehath, represent later stages in the history of the clan (see GENEALOGIES i., §§ 5 [cp n.], 7 [li. v]).¹ See art. below.

1 קֹרַח הַיִּזְעֵם הַקְּהֵלֶת

KORAH, REVOLT OF. In the preceding article it has been seen that the Korahites, as known in the history of Israel, were either Edomites incorporated with Judah or a division of the Levites. This double use of the name has an important bearing on the story of Korah's rebellion as told in Nu. 16 f., which is the subject of the present article.

This story comes, at least in the main, from the school of the priestly writer (P), though, as has been shown in a previous article (see 1. Present text. DATHAN AND ABIRAM), the account of Korah's rebellion against the priestly prerogative of the Levites has been mixed up with an older and quite independent account of the resistance made by Dathan and Abiram to the civil authority of Moses. Here, however, an important question arises. P is not an inventive or original writer so far as historical incidents are concerned. Legislation is the sphere in which he finds himself at home, and with regard to narrative he is usually content to borrow and modify the material supplied by his predecessors. It is not therefore unreasonable to ask whether P did not adapt the story of Korah's revolt from some older source, and whether any fragments of the story in this primitive form remain in Nu. 16. Bacon (Triple Tradition of Exodus, 190), developing a hint of Dillmann's, has contended with no small ingenuity but hardly with success that we have before us the fragments of such a narrative by the Yahwist.

He attributes to him a few words in 16 1-3, the whole of 13-15 27b-31 33a, so producing the simple story that when Korah the Edomite and On the Philistine would fain intrude into the sanctuary, Moses withstood them, and the earth swallowed them up. Apart from other equally decisive arguments, it cannot be regarded as certain or even probable that PELETH (g.v.) has any connection with the Philistines.

We may now give the substance of the priestly narrative in its original form. It is contained in 16 1a 2b-

2. P's original form. 7a 18-24 27a 32b 35 41-50 [17 6-15] 17 and runs thus. Korah at the head of 250 princes of the congregation protested against the exclusive rights of the Levitical tribe as represented by Moses and Aaron, and declared that the whole congregation was holy. It is quite possible that Korah, in the intention of the priestly writer, belonged to the tribe of Judah, and it is certain that his confederates were by no means exclusively Levites. They were 'princes of the congregation' as a whole, and in 27 3 (P) it is clearly implied that, e.g., Manassites might be found in his company. Moses invites them to establish their claim by taking their censers and offering incense at the sanctuary. This they do: the people are warned to withdraw from the tabernacle,² and the rebels are consumed by fire from Yahwè. Next day the people murmur because the 'people of Yahwè' (not, observe, 'our brethren the Levites') have been destroyed. But for the intercession of Moses, and the fact that Aaron stands with his censor 'between the living and the dead,' Israel would have been swept away by the divine wrath. Even as it is, 14,700 perish by the plague. Afterwards rods inscribed with the names of princes representing each tribe are laid in the sanctuary. The rod inscribed with the name of Aaron, and that alone, buds and bears ripe almonds.

¹ By the Korahites of 1 Ch. 12 6 it is uncertain whether the Chronicler is referring to Levites or to Edomites who had become incorporated in the tribe of Judah; cp DAVID, § 11 [a ii.].

² The word קָטַן is never used in prose of a human habitation, and, in 27. 24 27, the original reading seems to have been 'the tabernacle of Yahwè.' See Dr. Introd. 61.

The account which we have examined hitherto, comes from the priestly legislator, as is plain from its literary style. True, it does not confirm the fav-

3. Later account. Ourite and characteristic point of the priestly legislation,—viz., the essential difference between the priests, the sons of Aaron, and mere Levites. But of course the priestly code also emphasises the general distinction between the clergy of whatever rank on the one hand and the laity on the other. Here the priestly legislator is content to advocate the claims of the levitical tribe as a whole. However, a later writer of the same school was not satisfied to stop here. Moved, perhaps, by the remembrance that there was a levitical guild known as 'sons of Korah,' he made various alterations in the text and added 7b-11 16f. 36-40 [17 1-5]. In this second stratum Korah is unmistakably a Levite, and not only so, his whole company are Levites, and their sin consists in a sacrilegious claim to act as priests. The censers of these 'sinners against their own lives' are by divine command beaten into plates and used as a covering for the altar. They are to be a perpetual memorial that no one who is not of Aaron's seed may dare to offer incense. In 26 9-11, a very late passage—for it must have been added by some one who had read 16 and 17 as they stand in our present Hebrew text—we are told that the 'sons of Korah' did not perish with their father and his band. The author felt that he had to explain the continued existence of the Kohathite guild in the temple.

The NT mentions Korah only once, viz. in Jude 11 where Korah is the type of Gnostic heretics who 'set at nought dominion, and rail at dignities.' The author of 2 Tim. 2 16 f. had Korah in view; at least v. 19 is derived from Num. 16 5 26 in G.

The division of documents advocated in this article is that of Kue. Th. T. 12 139, and Hex. §§ 6 n. 37, 16 n. 12, to which Wellhausen now adheres. It is also adopted by Kittel (with a little hesitation), by Baudissin (Priesterthum), and by Dr., Introd. 65. Nor does the view of Dillmann differ materially here, except with regard to the point mentioned at the end of the article DATHAN AND ABIRAM. W. E. A.

KORE (כֹּרֵה; κωρη [BA], κορη [L]). A door-keeper, or guild of doorkeepers, of the b'ne Asaph, assigned to the Korahites (see GENEALOGIES i., § 7, ii.).

The name is given to the father of Shallum (1 Ch. 9 19, κωρηβ [B], χωρη [A]), or Meshemiah (1 Ch. 26 1, κωρηε [A]). In 2 Ch. 31 14 Kore (κωρη [L]) appears as the son of Imnah (יִמְנָה), but the latter may be nothing more than a slip for Heman (חֲמַן; cp G^B), who was actually associated with Korahites and doorkeepers; see GENEALOGIES i., § 7, iii. c.

KULON (κουλον [BA], -Δμ [L]), a city in the hill country of Judah mentioned by G only (Josh. 15 59). An identification with Kulōniyeh, NW. of Jerusalem (see EMMAUS, 2), is inadmissible, since this name is derived from 'colonia' (cp Buhl, Pal. 166).

KUSHAIAH (כּוּשֵׁי־יָהוּ; § 27; hardly 'Yahwè's bow'; Peiser [ZATW 17 348 f. (97)], explains 'Kuš is Yahwè'; cp Edomite divine name Kauš, and Gottheil, JBL 17 109-202 (98), but is there a parallel for such a name in the OT?),¹ father of Ethan, a Merarite; 1 Ch. 15 17 (κ[ε]ισαίου [B^{AL}]). The readings of G presuppose קישיו קישיו? Ki. SBOT), with which agrees the other form of the name, viz. KISHI (כִּישִׁי 1 Ch. 6 44 [29], κεισαι [B], -σαν [A], κουσαι [L], i.e., perhaps קישִׁי). The form Kishi, which Gray (HPN 297) prefers, is, according to Gottheil, an abbreviated form (כִּישִׁי, i.e. קישִׁי). See KISH.
