Of Mr. Willard's home life here in Montpelier, among his neighbors and friends, we need not speak. He was known of his townsmen, and many more had personal knowledge of his straightforward kindness than the casual observer of his reserved ways would ever suspect. He was a member of the Bethany Congregational church. In 1855, he married Miss Emily Doane, daughter of Hezekiah H. Reed. Mrs. Willard has left with her four children: Miss Mary, Ashton R. (who graduated at Dartmouth last year), Eliza May, and Charles Wesley. Mr. Willard leaves a brother, A. J. Willard, of St. Johnsbury, and a sister, Mrs. Hannah Flint, of Concord, N. H., surviving him.

To say the things that should be said of Mr. Willard, we are not able. To say the truth, and not to say that which to those who did not know him might seem to come from affection instead of judgment, from the heart and not from the head, is a hard task. But the people of Vermont, and especially those who for so many years knew through the columns of this paper Mr. Willard's every day thoughts, will make no mistake in this matter. They will know that when it is said he was the "first citizen of the State," the words are words of truth and soberness, and not those of over-zealous friendship.

He had their well-deserved esteem, confidence, and indeed affection. The qualities that gave these to him were not those of the "magnetic" order. He captivated by no studied arts, by no assumed effusiveness of manner, but rather in spite of the total lack of those too common attributes. He was refined, scholarly; in manner as in mind, he was the gentleman.

Mr. Willard had this good judgment of his fellow-citizens, and with it their affection, as any one may find who will go among the people of the State in the villages and on the farms, because of the honesty of his purpose and of his act, because of his fearlessness in maintaining what he thought was right and because of the strength which was in his fearless blow. A private citizen in after years, and holding to life by the lightest thread, he was looked to for counsel by those in the full strength of manhood, and honored by a following of his thought which fails to come to most of those in high places. His later life taught well the lesson that "the post of honor is the private station."

To give even the briefest history of Mr. Willard's work would require much time and labor. To give even what he did while in congress the merest mention would require time and space and study that are not at command. He was a careful legislator, and one whose counsel bore fruit in the halls of legislation when given.

When he spoke, he spoke for effect on legislation, and that, at times, he was overborne because he stood up against friend and foe when he thought what they wanted was wrong. Had he always thought with his party, had he always consented to costly schemes which fellow-members urged, instead of always standing for what he believed was right, and trying to head off unnecessary appropriations, he might have been more popular in congress—he could not have been more useful. But he did as he did, and he did well. For it is better to have lived as he lived, to leave as he left a good name, that will for many a year be held as the synonym of that which is pure, right and devoid of fear or shadow of turning—a name that represents an ideal manhood—than to have had continuance in or accession of public station. His life was an honor to his State and a good to those who knew him.

in every sense of the word a Vermonter, was born in Bridport in 1797, his life thus dating back almost to the birth of the State. He came to Montpelier in 1826, and went into the employ of Watson Jones, who was then running a line of stages between Montpelier and Burlington. At that time the line between Montpelier and Royalton was opened by Ira Day, of Barre, and Samuel Blodgett, of Royalton. Day and Cottrill soon bought out Jones, and together established what became the great central stage route through the State, and the main thoroughfare for travel between Montreal and Boston, and continued such until the advent of railroads in this part of the State. He was an extensive mail contractor, favorably known at the Post-office Department at Washington. While engaged in the stage business, he purchased the Pavilion hotel at Montpelier, which he kept until 1856, when he sold it to Col. Boutwell. Mr. Cottrill then purchased the residence next east of the Pavilion, which he owned at the time of his decease, and where he resided until 1861, when he, in company with other gentlemen, contracted to carry the United States mail from Kansas City to Santa Fe. He was at Kansas City, Mo., in the active superintendence of this line of stages, when he was attacked by a remittant fever, which terminated fatally, Oct. 1864.

He married in 1822, Catherine Couch of Bath, N. H., a lady possessing in a remarkable degree the administrative ability which made her celebrated as a hostess, to which she added a frankness and heartiness of manner, which seemed to have no disguises, to despise pretence, and to be open as the day. She died at Montpelier in 1861.

Mr. Cottrill was a successful man, and a person of superior common sense. Whatever he did, he did well, and had not much patience with one whose work was not done thoroughly and on time, and yet, never hurrying, never appearing anxious or excited—a reticent, self-reliant man.

As host of the Pavilion he was best known, both in and out of the State, far and wide, as the prince of landlords, and whose hotel was the traveler's as well as the sojourner's home. He seemed like a gentleman of the olden time, stately, yet not even cold in aspect, of unruffled temper and wonderful self-possession. He made for the Pavilion a most excellent character, and he got for himself, by his connection with it, a respect wider than the State, and eminently deserved.

In Montpelier he was much esteemed. Almost the whole of his active life was passed here, and he was identified with all the interests which have aided to make the town what it is. His means, which his business sagacity and ability enabled him to accumulate, were spent liberally. He gave generously, but without ostentation, to every deserving charity, and to all benevolent and religious institutions; and he was a ready helper of all public improvements.

JED. P. C. COTTRILL, son of Mahlon Cottrill, born in Montpelier, graduated at Burlington College in 1857. He now lives in Milwaukee; his profession, the law. Of him the Milwaukee News says, "he confessedly stands among the foremost at the bar of Milwaukee County." And he was "at the 13th annual communication of the Grand Lodge of Free Masons of Wisconsin, June 9, 1874, elected Grand Master." The productions from his pen, in the reports of the committee on foreign correspondence of the Grand Chapter of Wisconsin, are among the ablest and best in American Masonic literature.

The other children of Mr. Cottrill are William, a famous hotel-keeper in the west; George, a lawyer in New York city; Lyman and Charles.

COL. LEVI BOUTWELL

was born in Barre, Feb. 5, 1802. He was early in life thrown upon his own resources, and thus acquired self-reliance, energy and perseverance. Having learned the spinner's trade, he followed it in Hartland and afterwards in Strafford. Then going to Thetford, he bought an interest in a carding and cloth-dressing establishment, the buildings of which were swept away by a great freshet in 1828, leaving him penniless. From 1830 to 1837, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits in West Fairlee. Meeting with poor success he tried hotel keeping, first in Lebanon, N. H., later in Chelsea, where he remained 5 years. He came to Montpelier in 1846, and leased the Union House, which stood on ground now occupied by the Church of the Messiah. Ten years later he became proprietor of the Pavilion, and for about 12 years served as its landlord. Then he rented it to others; but it remained in his possession till his death, March 27, 1874.

Saml Boutwell

His first wife was Miss Jerusha Peabody of Reading, by whom he had three children, two of whom are now living,—Harry Sylvester, and Elizabeth Jane, the wife of Hon. T. R. Merrill. His second wife, married a short time before he came to Montpelier, was Miss Eliza Burbank, a sister of the late Silas Burbank of this place. She is yet living.

For nearly a generation Col. Boutwell was actively and prominently identified with the interests of Montpelier. His position as landlord of the leading hotel brought him into contact with large numbers of influential men; and his physical and mental characteristics were so striking that those who met him once were not likely to forget him. For almost half a century he was connected with the Masonic Order, and he held many positions of honor in that fraternity. From his youth he was an outspoken Universalist, although not trained in that faith; and after having for many years assisted in the maintenance of churches not of his choice, he rejoiced in the opportunity of joining with others in organizing the Church of the Messiah, in Montpelier, of which he continued to be, during the rest of his life, one of its most enthusiastic and generous supporters. Goddard Seminary, in Barre, was largely indebted to his munificence. The Vermont Conference Seminary in Montpelier came in for a share of his benefactions. His hopefulness and energy, and resolution, did much to make the Wells River Railroad an assured fact. He was a man of remarkable force, both mental and physical; he belonged to the class of inspiring men, men who communicate their own strength to others; he was a man "born to command," a fact recognized in his election to the colonelcy of a regiment of militia. In him we saw that paradox in humanity, a young old man, whose three score and twelve years strove in vain to quench the fire of his youth; for, though for a year he had been somewhat enfeebled, still he kept about his business till within some two weeks of his death, and did not take his bed till his last day.

He was a man in whom there was no lukewarmness; he was always either cold or hot,—a hearty hater and an ardent lover, a man of impulse, intensity, impetuosity, a man of head-long self-forgetting generosity, a quick-responding friend of the poor and needy, always vulnerable in his sympathies, a hater of cant, and shams, knaveries and deceptions, quick-witted and keen; often coarse of speech, but kind of heart; as one said of him, "made up rough side out;"—a man whose deed was frequently better than his word. In truth his word sometimes repelled men. He was often more forcible than polite, and no doubtfulness of mind, or fear of man ever led him to stop the current of his vehement speech till he could substitute a smooth phrase for the rough one that was on his tongue's tip. But those who knew him well discerned the man through the manner, and honored the rugged honesty, the bluff benevolence, the thorough-going truthfulness, the unawed independence, and the deep tenderness, too, which characterized him.

GOV. ASAHIEL PECK, A. M., LL. D.

He was descended from Joseph Peck, who was in the twenty-first generation from John Peck of Bolton, Yorkshire county, England. Thus the genealogy of the Pecks has been traced as far back as, and probably farther than, that of any other Vermont family. Joseph Peck, the American ancestor of the subject of our notice, came from Hingham, England, to Hingham, Mass., in 1638. Asahel, third son of Squire Peck and Elizabeth Goddard, was born at Royalston, Mass., in Sept., 1803, and brought by his parents about 1806 to Montpelier, who settled in what is known as East Montpelier. Receiving the discipline of a farm until he was of age, the benefit of the common school, and fitting for college at Washington County Grammar School, he entered the University of Vermont, but in his senior term left college for a course of study in the French language in Canada. The incipient eminent judge and governor entered then upon the study of the law with his oldest brother, Nahum Peck, of Hinesburgh. Asahel Peck's name as attorney, at Hinesburgh, appears in Walton's Register for 1833, when he was thirty years of age. In that year he removed to Burlington, where all his professional life was spent. Doubtless his progress at the bar was slow, as he was not a man to push his way, but to honestly win it by merit. Indeed, a characteristic of him is that he was slow in everything, but in the end he was almost always sure to be right, and that he regarded as the only point worth gaining. He was a thorough and patient student, and a conscientious lawyer and judge. Possessing a tenacious memory, he held all that he had secured in years of study, and could instantly bring his great store of learning to bear upon any legal question presented to him. Touching his abilities as a lawyer, we cite an incident that occurred several years ago: The late Rufus Choate, who will be remembered as one of the most eloquent and eminent lawyers of Massachusetts, met Mr. Peck as an antagonist at the trial of an important case, and at its conclusion Mr. Choate was so astonished to find such a lawyer in Vermont, that he went to Mr. Peck and urged him vehemently to remove to Boston, assuring him that he would win fame and fortune. No inducement, however, could move Mr. Peck; having once made up his mind, nothing could change it. Burlington he had selected as the place to practice his profession, and Burlington it must and should be, and was. Of his reputation as a lawyer and judge, an eminent member of the bar declares that no man in New England since Judge Story has equalled Judge Peck in his knowledge of the common law of England and the law of equity. As Governor, we can bear testimony that he was one of the very best that Vermont has ever had—thoroughly independent, prudent in every act, and carefully inspecting the minutest detail of everything presented for his official approval. Mr. Peck was a judge of the Circuit Court from 1851 until it ceased in Dec., 1857, and of the Supreme Court from 1860 until 1874, when, it being understood that he had retired from the bench to a farm in Jericho, to renew the employments of his youth, he was elected Governor for the term 1874–1876. He was never married. Since leaving the executive chair, he has been often employed as counsel in important cases; and doubtless, had his life been spared, would for some years more have shown himself as a grand master of the law. In speaking of the probable action of the Republican state convention of 1874, at which Judge Peck was nominated for Governor, the WATCHMAN spoke of him in the following terms, which his course while in the gubernatorial chair fully vindicates: "The State would be honored by his selection for it. So long as Vermont designates such men as he is for its highest offices, it is not liable to the old Tory reproach against Republican government, which condemned republics 'not because the people elected their officers, but because they elected unworthy and ignoble men to office.' He would be a worthy successor in the executive chair of Moses Robinson, Galusha, Palmer, Tichenor, Skinner, Williams, Van Ness, Royce and Hall, who were his predecessors on the bench. His name will evidently harmonize the diverse interests of the Republican party, and will reconcile all differences. It is not merely unobjectionable. It is in every respect honorable and fit to be made. His nomination would be followed by a triumphant election."

Gov. Peck was a citizen of Montpelier 1855 to 1875, and from that time resided on his farm in Jericho, where he died May 18, 1879.

Hon. E. P. WALTON: Dear Sir—I thank you for the interest you are taking for the memory of my late brother, Gov. Peck. And withal you will recollect that he had A. M. added or prefixed to his name by the University of Vermont, and LL. D. by Middlebury College, and which is written on his $700 granite monument at Hinesburgh, and whose attachment to the people of Montpelier was never abated or withdrawn. Yours Truly, NAHUM PECK.

Abner Peck

CARLOS BANCROFT.

[From the obituaries in the Argus and the Watchman at the time of his death.]

Mr. Bancroft, who contributed much to make the town of Montpelier everywhere honored and honorable in business and financial circles, was born in Plainfield, this county, Mar. 20, 1809. At three years of age he lost both of his parents, and was brought up by Arthur Daggett of East Montpelier. He went to Massachusetts at 16 years and learned the stone-cutter's trade; worked in the Navy Yard at Charlestown; went to Norfolk, Va. Navy Yard and worked for a time, and returned to Montpelier. He engaged with his brother, Watrous, on the stone work of the second state house, afterward burned. Much of that exceptionally fine work, which was so much admired, was wrought by his hand. After this, he formed a partnership with Geo. P. Ricker, and after the death of Mr. Ricker with E. C. Holmes, terminating after 25 years by the death of Mr. Holmes in 1870. The firm has since been C. Bancroft & Son—Arthur D., the oldest son, being the partner. In 1839, Mr. Bancroft married a daughter of Col. Cyrus Johnson of Berlin, who was the mother of his children, and died Sept. 15, 1856. Feb. 3, 1858, he married Margaret Wallace, widow of John McLean, Esq., of Cabot, and sister of Dr. M. P. Wallace, who survives him. Of his 6 children but one survived, Frederick W.; of the others, but two reached the age of maturity, his daughter Jennie, who married a Mr. Scott and died about two years after her marriage, and his oldest son, Arthur D.

From his youth up, Carlos Bancroft was one of the leaders of the Democratic party here. Besides repeatedly filling various town offices, selectman, &c., he had, for many years, been an acting director and vice-president of the Farmers' Insurance Co., and a director of the Montpelier National Bank; both were benefited largely by his prudent counsel and sound judgment. Though entirely successful in business, he never accumulated a dollar but by honorable dealing. His word was never called in question, and his opinion in matters of business generally put an end to all controversy. He was one of the building committee of Christ Church, where he attended worship. In one word, as a citizen, neighbor, and friend, he was a man of large worth.

He died of the insidious, slow old-fashioned consumption; so insidious that none suspected the familiar face of one so universally known and respected would be so soon removed from our thoroughfares and business places. Monday evening, he retired apparently in his usual health, for the last few months not his former robust health, a state of increasing feebleness, but which did not debar him from attention to his business. Early the next morning, he had a coughing fit in which he ruptured a blood-vessel; hemorrhage ensued and before the physician could be summoned he was dead. Age 67, Oct. 24, 1876.

ARTHUR DAGGETT BANCROFT, son of Carlos, who had all the traits of his father, inherited consumption and died at 37. He was one of the selectmen of the town, much esteemed by his townsmen in life, and left a very handsome estate. He married Juliette, daughter of Algernon S. Camp, formerly of Montpelier, now of Chicago. They had children, who with his widow reside at Montpelier.

WATROUS FAMILY IN MONTPELIER.

Some sixty years ago Erastus Watrous, the hatter, lived on Main street, a very intelligent man, who worked quietly away at his trade many years, died Dec. 16, 1828, aged 54, and was buried in Elm street cemetery.

Mrs. ERASTUS WATROUS was a lady of much natural talent, and handsome personal appearance. At the visit of Gen. Lafayette to Montpelier, in 1825, she was selected and made the welcome address to the French general in behalf of the ladies of Montpelier. She died July 4, 1832, aged 40.

CHARLES WATROUS, a son of the hatter, born in Montpelier, graduated at Middlebury in the class of 1817. He read theology in Montpelier for a year after, and then learned the printer's trade of Walton; but soon after went South, where he taught for a short time, and then relinquishing teaching, worked at his trade for short intervals in different States. He at length became deranged, or partially so. While insane, he wrote and published in Troy, N. Y., a book on the craft and dangers of masonry.—For title of his work see Montpelier bibliography by Gilman, page —. Soon after the issue of his book, he returned to Montpelier, where he stayed only a few months, and went to Concord, N. H., where he died, about 1835, by his own hand.

ERASTUS B., son of Erastus, Sen., a stirring character, went to New Mexico and became immensely rich. He is supposed to be still living.

SOPHIA WATROUS, daughter of the hatter, was born in Montpelier, and resided here till her marriage with Mr. Bemis, when she removed to Northfield, where she resided the last twenty years or more of her life. She embraced the Spiritualist belief some years before her death. She and her husband have both been deceased some years, now, and are buried at Northfield. Before her marriage, while she resided at Montpelier, she published a small volume of her poems, which had the honor at least of being the first volume of poems written and published in the county. From Mrs. Sophia Watrous Bemis' little book, "The Gift," and the prettiest lines, we think, she ever wrote, a mortuary poem:

THE IMBECILE.

Child of misfortune, few have shared
Such love as was thine own;
And all along thy rayless path
A guiding star, it shone.
Affection changeless in excess
When love and pity meet;
And find on earth a resting place,
A mother's breast the seat.

It asks no aid of outward charms
Nor e'en the light of mind;
It then becomes a holy thing;
But few the pearl can find.

Such love was thine, and earth is poor
The precious gift to buy;
It woke with thy young dawning life
And caught thy dying sigh.

And tender lives thy cherished thought
Within that mother's breast;
Affection marked thy course on earth,
Heaven guard thy peaceful rest.

The imbecile was her brother. We are told the family were all odd or singular in their ways; yet streaked with talent.

They are all gone and have left no descendants but Erastus B. ED.

HON. GEORGE WORTHINGTON,

a native of Connecticut, came to Montpelier at an early day, married the youngest daughter of Col. Jacob Davis, and engaged in the hatting business with Erastus Watrous. He became a prominent man; was high sheriff in 1814, representative, 1819, councillor, 1827 to 1831, and judge of probate, 1840. Retiring from the hatting business to agriculture, on the farm now largely occupied by State, High and Middlesex streets, and residing in the present dwelling of Charles A. Reed, he was largely employed in the settlement of estates. He was a deacon of the First Congregational [Bethany] church from Feb. 7, 1812, for about half a century, when he removed to Irasburgh, where he died, and also his two sons, John and Hon. George, Jr., who was representative and senator from Orleans County.

REV. ELISHA BROWN,

formerly a member of the New Hampshire Conference, was born in Gloucester, R. I., May 14, 1802, and died in Montpelier, Feb. 11, 1881, in his 79th year. When about ten years old, his father moved to Sutton, Vt., where he lived until he was about thirty years of age. Early converted, in default of any Methodist society in his immediate community, he was for a season a member of the Freewill Baptist communion. His religious views, however, being Methodistic, of the most pronounced type, he subsequently connected himself with the Methodist church, and after spending several years in teaching, entered the itinerant ministry of that denomination, joining the New Hampshire Conference at a time when it included all the territory of Vermont east of the Green Mountains.

During the earlier period of his ministry he preached at Greensboro, Troy, Westfield, Walden, Cabot and East St. Johnsbury, touching, meantime, the top and bottom of the toils and trials, joys and triumphs, of the itinerancy in very difficult fields at that early day. About forty years ago he moved, with his family, to Newbury, to give his children the benefit of the old Newbury Seminary. During his residence of fifteen years, or more, at that place, he supplied several churches in the vicinity of Newbury, also devoting much time to teaching. In the year 1855 he removed to Montpelier, and for several years supplied churches at East Montpelier, Wright's Mills and Berlin. He was the "stated supply" of the latter charge, indeed, for nine consecutive years, during much of that time occupying, with his venerable mother, the old parsonage, and performing most acceptably all the duties of the pastorate. During the past ten or twelve years he has spent many months, from time to time, in the family of his son-in-law, the writer, and will be well remembered at Monson, Brookfield, Danvers, and especially at Milford—supplying with great acceptance, during the writer's pastorate at the latter place, the adjacent Mendon charge for the space of one year. For the last four or five years of his life, "in age and feebleness extreme," he "halted feebly to the tomb," tenderly cherished and cared for in the home of his son, Col. A. C. Brown, Montpelier.

Of the life, gifts and activities of Father Brown, much might be said. He was an instructive, sensible, and sympathetic preacher, and a most successful pastor. Very tall, and large and massive physically, his personal appearance, with his flowing, patriarchal beard, was very impressive. Exemplary in all his walk and character, and always ready for every good work in the interest of religion and humanity, being particularly ardent and active on temperance lines, he commanded the universal and affectionate esteem of all classes of citizens in the several communities where he labored. No teacher, or preacher, perhaps, was ever more fondly regarded or tenderly remembered. Hence his services to preside at weddings and on funeral occasions were in constant requisition. The aged were wont to seek his companionship, while the young and those in middle life looked to him for counsel; and even little children always had a glad word and a pleasant smile for Father Brown, cheering his last days by gifts of flowers, not more fresh and fragrant than the innocence and love of their sweet young lives that prompted these gifts. He warmly appreciated and very gratefully remembered all the kind and thoughtful attentions of neighbors and friends during his declining years.

Though his life of nearly fourscore years brought to him his full share of burden-bearing, and responsibility, and physical suffering, and sorrow, he never wavered in his convictions, or shrank from any post of duty when clearly presented to him. Not only so, but endowed by nature with a fine vein of humor, his strong religious trust conspired with his very genial temperament to enable him, in the midst of all his troubles and sorrows, to maintain an untroubled serenity and cheerfulness. He was one of the sunniest and most kindly of men. Father B. was a great Bible reader, having, in the course of his life, read the Sacred Volume through scores of times. His favorite text, and one which in his later days he has been often heard, and with great fervor, to repeat, was: "I have been young, and now am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."—Ps. 37:25.

Over a quarter of a century ago Mr. Brown buried the companion of his youth. Three out of five children survive him. In the weakness of his last days he was constantly "waiting and watching" for the moment that should announce his happy release. Very quietly at last, as if he had laid him down to sleep, he entered into his final rest. Rev. N. Fellows, his pastor, on the occasion of his funeral, which was very largely attended, gave a very comprehensive, appropriate and impressive review of Mr. Brown's life and character, earnestly recommending to the church of which he was a member, and to all who knew him, to follow the example of his consecrated life.

R. H. H.

Mr. Brown was a member of the Masonic fraternity, and had taken the several degrees up to and including the Knights Templar. He was a member of Aurora Lodge, No. 22, from the records of which we take the following :

MAJ. A. L. CARLTON.

Alfred Lathrop Carlton was born in Morristown, Lamoille County, in 1829. His father, Benjamin Franklin, and mother, Betsey Lathrop, a cousin of Daniel Webster, were married in Waterbury in 1826. Mr. Carlton was the eldest of four sons, of whom but one survives. His mother is still living, being 84 years of age. He obtained an excellent education, and was for some years a teacher. In 1854, he married Margaret, eldest daughter of Hon. Clark Fisk, of Eden, and removed to Montpelier, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits, which he steadily and successfully followed until the day of his death, with the exception of a few years' absence in obeying the call of his country.

In the summer of 1862, Mr. Carlton enlisted in the Eleventh Regiment, in camp at Brattleboro, and was soon commissioned by Gov. Holbrook as quartermaster of the regiment. This regiment, it will be remembered, was for some time employed in the defenses of Washington. While thus engaged, Lieut. Carlton was promoted to the responsible position of commissary of subsistence, with the rank of captain. Exceedingly capable and faithful as an officer, his field of duty was rapidly enlarged, until the immense work of furnishing supplies and cattle to the Army of the Potomac fell upon his shoulders.

In a single trip to Western Pennsylvania, for the purchase of cattle, he took out half a million of dollars, and drew on government for another half million. To discharge promptly and efficiently the duties of his position, he required the assistance of from one hundred to two hundred faithful men, and often a detailed escort of as many more in taking herds to the front, and yet, so well organized was his department, so systematically conducted, and so well kept constantly in hand, that he might defy even the exigencies of war to find his account in an unsettled or unsatisfactory condition. Indeed, so enviable was his reputation as an officer, that when Senator Collamer, through whose kindness he received his promotion, inquired at the headquarters in Washington after the standing of his appointee, the reply was, "He is a model officer. His capacity, integrity, efficiency and invariable habit of closing up his affairs every day, are worthy of all praise." Mr. Carlton was also detailed for similar service in New York city, and at some southern points, being retained in service nearly a year after the general mustering out took place. Many were the bribes he refused during these years, saying, "I rather go home with a clear conscience." He was twice very dangerously ill; once with his regiment, and again at Aquia Creek. As an attestation of his honorable record as an officer, he was made Major by brevet before leaving the service, and that without any agency or knowledge on his part.

Like hundreds of thousands of his associates, Mr. Carlton returned from the field of strife to assume the avocations and responsibilities of a good citizen. Soon after his return, he made a public profession of his faith in Christ, which he had long cherished, and united with Bethany church. From that time he was an active and influential member, holding various positions of honor and trust in both the church and society, and particularly in the Sabbath-school. He was a man of deep convictions and strong prejudices, and he would far sooner endure a sharp controversy than yield a point which he believed to be right. His natural frankness and freedom of speech was augmented by an instructive and overwhelming detestation of hypocrisy and duplicity. He was an earnest worker in temperance and all moral reforms. The same qualities which constituted his superiority as an officer in the army, marked his discharge of the various official trusts committed to him both in the church and community. Capacity, integrity, system and promptness in undertaking and completing a given duty, were his prominent traits. He was a strong power for good in the community in which he lived. He died in Montpelier, May 29, 1874.

was the son of John Whittier and Sally Edgerton, of Cabot, was born in that town June 16, 1822, and died at Montpelier Feb. 13, 1879. At the age of 21 years he came to Montpelier, under the friendly agency of the late Schuyler Phelps, Esq., of Berlin, and entered the service of the late William S. Smith, who for many years conducted a meat market in this village. After spending three or four years in this position, he went for a brief period to Boston, and then returned to Vermont and opened a meat market in St. Johnsbury. After the expiration of about a year, and upon the death of Mr. Phelps, the friend and patron of his youth, Mr. Whittier was married to his daughter, Susan C., and removed to the Phelps homestead, in Berlin, where he remained for seven or eight years. In 1858, he came to Montpelier and bought out the old and popular meat market of the late William B. Hubbard, "on the corner," which business he successfully and honorably conducted until the day of his death. The character of his business was such as to bring him a very extended acquaintance, and his proverbially genial nature and buoyant spirits made friends of all who knew him—inasmuch that the business men of the town are few who were so extensively known or whose death would be so seriously felt. In the death of Mr. Whittier the community has lost a public spirited citizen, whose shoulders were always ready for his share of the burdens; the poor a generous friend, the extent of whose quiet charities will never be revealed in time; the church of his choice a habitual attendant, and appreciative listener and a ready and cheerful supporter; his family the kindest of husbands and fathers. Mr. Whittier leaves a widow and son, who share the heartiest sympathy of the entire community. The funeral was observed on Saturday, Rev. Mr. Hincks, of Bethany church, officiating. A large concourse of people were in attendance, as were the Masonic fraternity in a body.

THE DODGE FAMILY.

In 1811 two brothers, Jared and Thomas Dodge, who were born in New Hampshire, came from Barre to this town. Jared, the eldest of the two, early became a member of the Congregational church, and was a devoted member until his death. He married Naomi Olcott, of Keene, N. H., and reared a family of 6 sons and 3 daughters, another daughter dying in infancy. Mary, the eldest, married for her first husband a Mr. Wallace, and for her second, William Storrs, for many years a merchant in town, who died in March, 1870. She was a Spartan mother, for she gave her two only sons to the late war, who were both sacrificed upon the altar of their country. (See the town military record.) Of the other daughters, Angelina and Abigail died when in their teens. Almira married, and is yet living. Of the sons, Theodore A., the eldest, was a very eccentric man. When the rebellion broke out, he offered his services to his country, but for age and disability was rejected. We give an extract from one of his poetic effusions, to the tune, "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled":

THE VERMONT VOLUNTEER.

Who for Freedom's cause and law,
Freedom's sword of Justice draw,
For the hope that sages saw,
"Let him follow me."

By the blood our fathers shed,
Reeking in a gory bed,
By the great Immortal dead,
On to victory!

Be this Freedom's call to earth,
Mindless of whate'er their birth,
Let all people shout it forth,
Rouse the world to arms!

Here hath Freedom's sun arose,
On the hearth-stone 'mid its foes,
Flashing bright on ceaseless blows,
Conflict and alarms.

Blades are crossed and red with gore,
Let us rise as those of yore,
From the mountain and the shore,
And reight their brands.

Heroes sleeping 'neath the sod,
Shall time waken unto God,
When 'tis only His the rod,
Then shall right abide.

He died in 1879, aged 65. Eleazer went to California at an early day, where he yet resides. Gilman B. has been for many years janitor of Bethany church.

Richard S. is the veteran of two wars. (See town military record of Mexican War and Rebellion.) At the battle of Chepultepec, Mexico, he was complimented by his officers for bravery in the storming of the fort. He was the first man to scale the walls, and when handing down the enemy's flag, received a bayonet wound in the face, which scar he carries to this day, as he does also several others received in action. When a boy he was dubbed with the title of "Shack," which he is familiarly known by to this day. To give all of the narrow escapes which he has passed through would fill a volume. He was never "dared" but what he made the "attempt," regardless of the result. The other two, Wm. and Joel, also reside in town. Jared died Mar. 1, 1859, in his 82d year, and his wife in Aug. 1877, in her 92d year.

Thomas married twice; had 4 children by his first marriage—1 son and 3 daughters,—Job Dodge, the son, died a year since, in Illinois, leaving a large estate;—his second wife was Abby S. (Cady) Grant, by whom he had two daughters. He was for several years a partner with Silas C.

French, in the boot and shoe business. He died March 31, 1867, aged 78. His wife is now living, at the age of 79. He is credited as being the author of the quotation of "A long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether." We are informed that the late U. S. Senator Jacob Collamer being informed of this, asked him for his picture, which upon receiving, had a portrait painted from it, and placed it in the National Art Gallery at Washington, D. C.

GEORGE LANGDON,

fourth son of Col. James H. Langdon, was born in Montpelier in 1815, and died there Nov. 10, 1870, aged 55 years. Educated in the schools of Montpelier, and having received a handsome patrimony, he early in life married Miss Sarah Sumner, oldest daughter of Senator William Upham. Mrs. Langdon inherited the remarkable graces of her mother, and from the moment Mr. and Mrs. Langdon established themselves in a home, their gracious hospitality at once attracted the best society, not only of Montpelier but of the State, and from other States. Mrs. Langdon had the advantage of experiences in the best society in the national capital, and thus with her qualities was admirably fitted to shine socially. But it was not in polite society alone that Mr. Langdon was distinguished. He had a genial and generous heart, and knew the blessedness of giving to the poor. The late Rev. Dr. Lord wrote of him as follows:

There are few of the prominent public men of Vermont who will not recall his genial presence and his modest and generous courtesy and kindness. Placed by inherited wealth above the necessity of toil, and beyond anxiety, he has made the pleasant amenities and courtesies and hospitalities of life his business. He was as kind to the poor as he was hospitable to his own class associates. We have known him to drive in a cold, stormy day in winter, six miles, to carry to a desolate and aged widow, whose situation accidentally became known to him, a load of provisions suited to her necessities. His heart was ever overflowing with neighborly kindness, and his hand ever quick to assist in any of the troubles of those around him. Few men will be more missed from our social life.

George Langdon

The tidings of his death will carry sorrow to many hearts, and few who knew him will not give the tribute of a warm and honest tear to his memory. The places that knew him will miss his accustomed face, and will mourn for one of their most gentle and welcome visitants, and his many friends and associates will never forget that presence, now made sacred by death, which always brought with it a most agreeable and genial atmosphere.

MRS. JAMES R. LANGDON.

[A brief of her funeral sermon by Dr. Lord, as the sweetest description that could be given, from this the sweetest of his printed sermons. We regret we have not space for the beautiful discourse entire.—ED.]

"She hath done what she could."—Mark 14:3. It is a beautiful tribute to an affectionate woman. It was the simple acceptance by the Son of God of a humble and fragrant nature which had bloomed out in hearty love for her Divine Lord. . . . In this memorial service for one who has been the companion of "honorable women not a few" in this church and community, I may with propriety select these blessed words of our Saviour as most accurately descriptive of her character and work in life. I love not to lose from my sight the faces of my dear friends and parishioners. I love not to bid farewell to those endeared to me by a long and gentle ministrations of kindness and help; but if I must, . . . it is with delight I may think and speak of them in such words as were consecrated by our Saviour to be the perpetual memorial . . . of those noble women who, however reserved and quiet and domestic, . . . have yet in their place . . . earned for themselves, by their sweet and patient devotion, the generous applause of the Son of God: "they have done what they could." . . . What is the work of women in this world as servants of the blessed Jesus? Have they influence peculiarly their own? . . . If they are unfaithful is any one else able to take their place, and make our societies, our homes, our churches more and more like Heaven? . . . When I look upon such pure, gentle, unostentatious women as Mrs. Langdon was; upon those beautiful, honorable Christian women, not a few, who have lived among us, . . . I cannot doubt how such questions will have their answer. Such women as have lived in this village as Christian mothers, wives and sisters, . . . whose names are embalmed with the spices of their own modesty and purity and love, with the fragrance of their own faith and charities, give us some idea of the saintly work which Christ has given to women to do in this world, and of their surprising fitness to do it; both to soften its asperities, to subdue its roughest and worst characters, and to carry the self-sacrificing ministry of the Son of Man into all of our human abodes. . . . I love to think that our Saviour places the seal of his benison . . . on the qualities of spiritual sincerity and gentleness; on the possible graces of a quiet Christian life; on the offerings of self-denying love. She hath done what she could. She hath adorned her station with the precious graces of tenderness and love. This is the central and most decisive test of the excellence of all character, especially of those whose lives seem, but seem only, to be confined to a narrower sphere than pertains to manly life, secluded within the walls of domestic care and duty and love. . . . We all know how great loveliness and sweetness there are in personal offices of love. We are familiar with the . . . supremacy of personal relationship and bonds. The personality of affection just suits itself to our natural wants. A religion that did not provide for the exercise of the domestic and personal offices of love would lack hold on our human sympathies, and Christ has blessed the sex with which his incarnated human life was alone positively affiliated and related, by bestowing a peculiar honor upon the quiet duties of personal love. . . . The kindness which watches over our earliest steps, the voice which directs our first prayers and songs, the love which surrounds home with the charms of a regained Paradise, and fills the air of the household with the scent of violets and lilies, and with the perfume of personal service to the sick, the dying and the dead: these are the qualities and offices that meet the full benediction of Christ's word.

Our Saviour had a very blessed personal relation with many noble women when he was here. His personal influence on the womanly hearts around him can be clearly traced as His work went on. She whom all the generations will call blessed, who is the only human medium of the assumption of our nature by the Infinite God, gave Him his first caress and received his last words of human love. What a wonderful relation! In which her heart glowed with incomparable love, adding the sacredness of a religious feeling to the wealth of a mother's affection; in which his heart beat with an unwonted pulse, adding the tenderness of human dependence, gratitude and trust, to the sentiments of celestial pity and love. Sacred type of all blessed maternal and filial love; which is ever divested of all the usual qualities of human passion and selfishness, and blends everything that is best and purest in the human with everything that is sweetest and holiest in the Divine. What her happiness must have been in the more than thirty years in which she had Him to herself as a deep wellspring of delight, watching over Him, waiting on Him, beholding His glory and believing that glad, prophetic hymn which her own lips had sung before He was born, as to "how her soul rejoiced in God her Saviour." And what a happiness there must have been in his long troubled heart for her sake, we have some glimpses in the words which broke from his dying lips to the dearest disciple and the legacy He gives to the beloved John, "Son, behold thy mother." The domestic life of Christ is veiled, but if that veil were lifted, doubtless we should see how much his pure heart was strengthened by a ministry more sympathetic than that of the angels, how much a woman's hand soothed his spirit, and a mother's love solaced and helped his sorrows. We should see some of the blessed interchanges between the human mother and the Divine Son.

But not from her alone did He have the ministry of personal kindness. A few devoted, grateful women waited upon Him all through his journeys. They gave him their enthusiastic sympathy in his work until the close of his life, and when He finished his suffering career on the cross, "Many women were there beholding and ministering unto Him." . . . Blessed were those daughters of Jerusalem, . . . who bewailed their King as he trod the wine-press alone. But did these women alone have the honor? The service of Christ was not their monopoly. They were the first fruits; they were examples . . . not to be envied; but to be imitated, by all their sisters who desire to know the unspeakable joy of Christian service, and they have been imitated. Faith works by love, . . . and its power has not failed since "Holy women," . . . in all the relations of life, in the lowly offices of Christian ministrations, have filled the houses which they adorned as wives, mothers and sisters, with the outpoured fragrance of the graces of Christ, . . . and refreshed the hearts that trusted in them. Many sons have crowned their heads with blessings. Their husbands have praised them in the gates of the city. They have made the deserts of this rough and arid life green as the land of Elim, and woven their precious golden threads through the whole fabric of society till it has brightened with the warmest and deepest colors. Eternity alone can measure the influence of a virtuous woman; a true-hearted daughter; a loving sister; a faithful wife; a devoted mother. Her price is above rubies. The heart of her husband safely trusts in her. She stretcheth her hand to the poor. . . .

I need not say the memories I cherish of Mrs. Langdon have colored and impressed all these thoughts which I have spoken to-day. . . . She was a Christian wife and mother, who consecrated her life to her holy domestic mission. . . . She made her home fragrant with the perfume of piety and love. . . . The thanks of the poor she has blessed; the tributes of the sick she has visited; the sweetness of the charities she has bestowed throng to make the fading light of her evening tranquil and beautiful.

Mrs. Langdon has resided here 38 years. She was the daughter of Mr. Charles Bowen, of Middlebury, whose life has not been unknown to us, and who, at his great age, remains to mourn over his daughter, and to look for the welcome she will give him to his long looked for home. She was married Dec. 22, 1836. Not long after, she united with the church whose welfare she has never for a moment forgotten. . . . To those who die in the Lord, death is only the gate; its iron side turned toward us, its golden side turned the other way. W. H. L.

Mrs. Langdon was Lucy Pomeroy Bowen, born Sept. 29, 1814, at Northfield, Mass., and died Aug. 1, 1873. Her children were: Lucy Robbins, born Apr. 10, 1841; Harriet Frances, February 2, 1845; Elizabeth Whitcomb, Apr. 6, 1847; James Henry, Apr. 9, 1851.

THE GEORGE W. BAILEY FAMILY.

I think no couple have ever contributed to Montpelier more stalwart, energetic, successful and popular men than did the late Hon. Geo. W. Bailey and his wife, a sister of Hon. Abel K. Warren of Berlin. They were both natives of Berlin, but spent most of their active life in Elmore, where their children were born, but, until the senior Bailey's death, resided in Middlesex, on the border of Montpelier.

GEORGE W. BAILEY, JR., was the first to depart, in early manhood. He had adopted the law as his profession, was Secretary of State for four years, which attested his fidelity in that office, married Georgiana, daughter of the late Col. Thomas Reed, but was soon stricken down by consumption, dying in Montpelier, July 13, 1864.

CHARLES W. BAILEY was one of the firm of Bailey Brothers, active and shrewd business men of Montpelier, engaged mainly in furnishing horses, cattle and sheep to Boston markets, where his attendance was regular, and by his fine personal presence and bluff but genial manners he was a favorite. While attending personally to the care of sheep on a freight train at Essex Junction, he was instantly killed, Sept. 23, 1876. More than a thousand people honored him, when his remains were brought to Montpelier to be borne to his home. Mr. Bailey left a widow, two sons and a daughter. His age was 45.

J. WARREN BAILEY, the oldest of the brothers, was also a member of the firm, for several years, and was also largely employed in civil offices in the town, in which, as in his own business, he was very efficient. He died of a brief illness, April 21, 1880, aged 56. He left a widow and two daughters.

The Boston Journal said:

He was a brother of T. O. Bailey of the Pavilion, a member of the firm of Bailey, Bullock & Co., commission merchants, Chicago, and of V. W. Bullock & Co., Burlington, Iowa, grain dealers. Mr. Bailey was in the grain business at Montpelier, a Director in the savings bank, and has held several town offices. He was universally liked and was very liberal in the use of his large property. He was the eldest of six brothers, three of whom now survive him, and was widely known.

The Watchman & State Journal said:

Born in Elmore May 1, 1824, he was near the completion of his 56th year. About 25 years ago he came to Montpelier and engaged with John Peck in a general produce business in the store west of the "arch." The following year Mr. Peck withdrew, and the firm of Bailey Brothers was formed by the admission of Charles Bailey,—a partnership that was destined to achieve a widespread reputation for the extent and fearlessness of its operations and the combination of business acumen and high sense of commercial honor it displayed. In 1846, the brothers gave up the store and confined their operations to a general live-stock business. At the dissolution of the partnership in 1872, each continued to employ in distinct operations the comfortable fortunes their united efforts had secured. Five years ago Mr. Bailey engaged with V. W. Bullock, Esq., in the grain business at Burlington, Iowa, and about a year ago his operations in that direction led to the formation of the firm of Bailey, Bullock & Co., in Chicago, his brother, E. W. Bailey, Esq., of Montpelier, moving to Chicago to assume the active management of the business of this company. In 1855, Mr. Bailey was married to Miss Harriet Guyer of Wolcott, who survives him with the daughters, Misses Ella and Clara. The funeral was largely attended on Saturday, the citizens, representing every class of the community, forming an honorary escort to the cemetery. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. H. Hincks, assisted by Rev. N. Fellows of Trinity church. Among the mourning relatives was the venerable mother of the deceased, now verging on four score years, who has survived to follow to the grave the three eldest of her six sons, each dying under peculiarly afflicting circumstances. Mr. Bailey was distinguished for the native keenness and precision of his judgment in business transactions. It was eminently speculative, but tempered with an element of caution, that taught him to shun hazardous ventures. In this community and among his former associates his bluff ways and ready humor will be greatly missed; and his name will long survive in local anecdotes, illustrating his readiness at repartee and power of pungent expression. In the loss of their natural guardian and protector, the widow and daughters will have the unfeigned sympathy of this community, which will also extend to the aged mother, and to the surviving sister and brothers the assurance of its participation in their sorrow.

A fact but little known is that Warren and Charles Bailey furnished the United States with horses for a regiment in the war for the Union. It was a gift worthy of millionaires, but they were not that, though wealthy, patriotic and generous.

Both Warren and Charles also very largely aided their brother, THON O. BAILEY, in constructing and furnishing the Pavilion, which has won rank among the very best hotels in New England, has made himself thereby widely famous.

The other brothers are Doct. James, residing in Ticonderoga, N. Y., and Edward, who while retaining his business interests in Montpelier, is largely engaged in the western states. A sister and the aged mother still reside in Elmore. E.P.W.

CHARLES GAMAGE EASTMAN,

born at Fryeburgh, Me., was brought to Barnard, the home of his father, at an early age, where amid the rural scenes of a town beautiful in mountain scenery, his early years were mostly passed.

"His mother, Rebecca Gamage of Fryeburgh, was a woman beautiful in mind, person and affections," in all which the son strongly resembled his mother.

Born to dependence, chiefly upon his own resources, Charles Gamage worked his way through the district schools and neighboring academies up to college, completing his preparation at the academy in Meriden, N. H.; he entered Burlington College, the University of Vermont, when about 18 years of age. Here he wrote for the old Burlington Sentinel first, and succeeding to the admiration of his party—he was a Democrat from his earliest years; "always a Democrat and never anything but a Democrat"—he soon was contributing to the other Democratic papers of the State. His articles for the newspapers winning immediate appreciation most flattering to a young author, his mind was soon turned to the after profession of his life, that of an editor, which he left college before graduating to adopt.

His first enterprise in opening his profession was the starting of a small journal in the interest of the Democratic party at Johnson, Lamoille Co., which obtained considerable attention, and was regarded a credit to the young editor, but not proving a money success, was relinquished, and in 1840, the no way discouraged editor established himself at Woodstock, the county town of old Windsor, and inaugurated "The Spirit of the Age," and his journal at once assumed a high position among the Democratic organs of the State. The earnest, skillful editor, still in flush of early manhood, confident of the strength of his principles, entered like an athlete the newspaper arena, giving battle with vigor in all the political contests on the tapis, and consequently soon became "a leader in the councils of his party throughout the State," and duly "a prominent director of its policy in national affairs."

In 1846, he sold out The Spirit of the Age at Woodstock, and came to Montpelier and bought out the Vermont Patriot, of which he continued the editor and publisher for the remainder of his life. At the same time that he established himself in Montpelier, he established for himself also, a home—how happily, he himself teaches in song. He married a daughter of Dr. John D. Powers of Woodstock, Mrs. Susan S. Havens, whose fairest praise is in that song from their domestic hearth:

I touch my harp for one to me
Of all the world most dear,
Whose heart is like the golden sheaves
That crown the ripened year;
Whose cheek is fairer than the sky
When 't blushes into morn,
Whose voice was in the summer night
Of silver streamlets born;—

To one whose eye the brightest star
Might for a sister own,
Upon whose lip the honey-bee
Might build her waxen throne;
Whose breath is like the air that woos
The buds in April hours,
That stirs within the dreamy heart
A sense of opening flowers.

I touch my harp for one to me
Of all the world most dear,
Whose heart is like the clustering vine
That crowns the ripened year;
Whose love is like the living springs
The mountain travellers taste,
That stormy winter cannot chill,
Nor thirsty summer waste.

They had 2 sons and one daughter, all born in Montpelier.

Eastman to his sleeping child:

SWEETLY SHE SLEEPS.

Sweetly she sleeps! her cheek so fair
Soft on the pillow pressed.
Sweetly, see! while her Saxon hair
Watches her heaving breast.
Hush! all low, thou moving breeze,
Breathe through her curtain white;
Golden birds, on the maple trees,
Let her sleep while her dreams are light.
Sweetly she sleeps, her cheek so fair
Soft on her white arm pressed.
Sweetly, see! and her childish care
Flies from her quiet rest.
Hush! the earliest rays of light
Their wings in the blue sea dip.
Let her sleep, sweet child, with her dreams so bright,
And the smile that bewilders her lip.

Charles G. Eastman

Mr. Eastman continued to prosper in his newspaper and political affairs. His paper was the leading Democratic organ of the State. We quote from the George R. Thompson and Gilman biography, prefacing the last volume of his poems (1880.)

It is as the conductor of this journal that he is the most widely remembered among politicians; and he managed it with an ability and faithfulness that secured it a reputation and influence seldom possessed by a country newspaper. His writings in this paper were in accordance with the character of the man,—direct, incisive, and earnest. He never hesitated to say whatever was true, if it were proper to be said; and in his exposures of the errors or frauds of his opponents he employed intellectual weapons of the sharpest and most cutting kind. His arguments were convincing, his logic clear, and his convictions were stamped with truth. His paper was not in any way pre-eminent as a literary one. It might be supposed, judging from his almost idolatrous love of literary pursuits, that his journal would have been more prominent in that respect; but he never seemed ambitious to make it so. These inclinations were gratified in another way. Though a member of a political party never in the ascendancy in Vermont, he occupied many influential official positions. He was a leading member of the Democratic National Conventions of 1848, '52, '56 and '60, and at the time of his death was a prominent member of the National Democratic Committee.

In 1852, '53, he was a senator of Washington County; "a laborious and useful one," and twice candidate of his party for a member of Congress, and postmaster of Montpelier about 6 years.

In person, he was inclined to be large—not too large,—very handsomely formed, with open, magnetic, beautiful countenance, that drew almost at will hosts of friends to his cordial heart. The idol of his party, he had a multitude of friends, also out of it. True to a poet nature, abstracted, rapt, fitful, sombre at times, even; now and then November,—probably, at a December tide—the height of the weird, when he traced that "scene in a Vermont winter," that "fearful night in the winter time, as cold as it ever can be"—when "the moon is full but the wings of the furious blast dash out her light."

"All day had the snows come down—all day,"

"The fence was lost and the wall of stone."

----- "on the mountain peak

How the old trees writhe and shriek."

"Such a night as this to be found abroad." The "shivering dog" "by the road." "See him crouch and growl" "and shut his eyes with a dismal howl." "And old man from the town to-night," that "lost the travelled way." "The midnight past," "the moon looks out," the Morgan mare "that at last o'er a log had floundered down," the old traveller "in coat and buffalo," stark and stiff in his sleigh in the snow-piled mountain hollow!

But an occasional mood; he had the heart of June in his nature—the spirit of spring in his spirit—whose verse oftener trailed over, one line blossoming into another, like a trailing arbutus in May woods. The old liked him. He was so genial; young men and women liked him; little children loved him. Long by those who were children in Montpelier in his time, will "his contagious laugh be remembered," and the charming hilarity with which he would push forward their innocent sports. It is said of him that no young man ever sought encouragement from him in vain. He had wide and generous views of life, an ample charity for thoughtlessness or "repented erring." As the head of a family, we may quote the words of Dr. Lord to his mourning family at his funeral:

You will remember him first and longest for what he was to you personally,—for what he was in his domestic and social relations. You will not forget the kindness of his heart, the amenity and cheerfulness of his manners, the liveliness of fancy and wit with which he cheered the household. . . . You will not lose the recollection of his kind words, of his considerate attentions, of his fatherly acts and affections. You will remember the melody of his flute as it led the voices of his children in their songs and hymns; the written prayers, which I am told he composed for them, to be used morning and evening in their devotions. And so long as love has a place in your hearts, this household will not cease to have a shrine where his memory shall be kept green and sacred.

The favorite of his party, as a politician, a lovely family and society man, it is still as a poet that Eastman has been the widest known and his memory will be most perennial. Fluent in composing, laborious in revision—from his college days, or a little before, he wrote and pruned, and pruned and rewrought, and pruned again, refining and changing almost ad infinitum till the day of his death. The result: "As a lyrical poet there is no American writer who can be called his superior." He was the first American poet named with praise in the Edinburgh Review; the old Scotchman, wary of American poets, broke through the ice and praised Eastman handsomely over 20 years since, while he yet lived to catch the beautiful over-the-ocean-glow coming from the fire he had kindled. Facile, agreeable, amusing, as a poet, but not confident. Strange! Did he not know his own powers? It seems he did not;—"sensitive and doubtful as to their reception"—when his poems were committed to the press, when his book appeared and was winning golden laurels, "almost sorry he had published it." The writer remembers to have heard him say, he had made up his mind, he believed, to never publish any poem until it had been written seven years and he had revised it every year.

Mr. Eastman brought out his first volume of poems in 1848; from which he contributed with manifold retouchings, to the poems, ten pages to Miss Hemenway's First Edition of the Poets and Poetry of Vermont in 1858, including: "A Picture."

The farmer sat in his easy chair
Smoking his pipe of clay—, Eastman's "Dirge":

"Softly!
She is lying
With her lips apart;
Softly!
She is dying
Of a broken heart."

"I see her not"—"Uncle Jerry," and other pieces; and in the same work, revised and enlarged, "A scene in the Vermont Winter," specially for the volume, and other poems; as many pages in this second volume as in the first.

Mr. Eastman's health began steadily to fail from May, 1860. "An obstinate and painful disease burdened his spirit and wasted his frame." Never man needed rest more; "but his pride and sympathies were enlisted in the business of his party," and too faithful to the complicated responsibilities identified with and accumulated upon him, he unwisely, but most unselfishly, (says Mr. Thompson in his sketch), made secondary his own interest of health and life. "But he was at home in the bosom of his family when his eyes closed to the scenes he loved so well; and his last moments, painless and calm, were brightened by the love of family and friends, and cheered with the substantial hope of eternal happiness and joy." He died at his residence in Montpelier, Sept. 16, 1860.

MARY AVERY EASTMAN, the last and only living descendant, was born in Montpelier, in 1849. She married, 1872, Eldin J. Hartshorn, son of Hon. John W. Hartshorn of this State, and now resides at Emmetsburg, Iowa, where her husband is practicing his profession of the law; has been State Senator, &c.

JOHN G. EASTMAN, eldest son of Chas. G., died in Montpelier in his 20th year, May 30, 1870.

EDWARD S., second son of Charles G., died in Montpelier in his 19th year, Oct. 2, 1875.

Mrs. Eastman, for several years after her husband's decease, until after the death of her two sons, continued to reside at Montpelier, spending a part of each year with her daughter at the West; but within a few years has again taken up her residence in Woodstock.

To the first and sweetest of our Poets—pre-eminently our State bard, we must—we could not satisfy Montpelier otherwise, nor yet ourself, though crowding to a close—make space for yet a cluster from his poems to lay at the foot of his biography at the Capital:

THE FIRST SETTLER.

His hair is white as the winter snow,
His years are many, as you may know,—
Some eighty-two or three;
Yet a hale old man, still strong and stout,
And able when 'tis fair to go out
His friends in the street to see;
And all who see his face still pray
That for many a long and quiet day
He may live, by the Lord's mercy.

He came to the State when the town was new,
When the lordly pine and the hemlock grew

In the place where the court house stands;
When the stunted ash and the alder black,
The slender fir and the tamarack,

Stood thick on the meadow lands;
And the brook, that now so feebly flows,
Covered the soil where the farmer hoed
The corn with his hardy hands.

He built in the town the first log hut;
And he is the man, they say, who cut
The first old forest oak;

His axe was the first, with its echoes rude,
To startle the ear of the solitude,
With its steady and rapid stroke.

From his high log-leap through the trees arose,
First, on the hills, mid the winter snows,
The fire and the curling smoke.

On the land he cleared the first hard year,
When he trapped the beaver and shot the deer,
Swings the sign of the great hotel;
By the path where he drove his ox to drink
The mill-dam roars and the hammers clink,
And the factory rings its bell.

And where the main street comes up from the south
Was the road he "blazed" from the river's mouth,
As the books of the town will tell.

In the village, here, where the trees are seen,
Creeping 'round the beautiful Green,
He planted his hills of corn;

And there, where you see that long brick row,
Swelling with silk and calico,
Stood the hut he built one morn;

Old Central street was his pasture lane,
And down by the church he will put his eane
On the spot where his boys were born.

For many an hour I have heard him tell
Of the time, he says, he remembers well,

When high on the rock he stood,
And nothing met his wandering eye
Above, but the clouds and the broad blue sky.

And below, the waving wood;
And how, at night, the wolf would howl
Round his huge log fire, and the panther growl,
And the black fox bark by the road.

He looks with pride on the village grown
So large on the land that he used to own;

And still as he sees the wall
Of huge blocks built, in less than the time
It took, when he was fresh in his prime,
To gather his crops in the fall;

He thinks, with the work that, somehow, he Is identified, and must oversee
And superintend it all.

His hair is white as the winter snow,
And his years are many, as you may know,—
Some eighty-two or three;

Yet all who see his face will pray,
For many a long and quiet day

By the Lord's good grace, that he May be left in the land, still hale and stout,
And able still when 'tis fair, to go out
His friends in the street to see.

THE BATTLE OF PLATTSBURGH.

He who has still left of his two hands but one,
With that let him grapple a sword;
And he who has two, let him handle a gun;
And forward, boys! forward! the word.

The murmuring sound of the fierce battle-tide
Already resounds from afar;
Forward, boys! forward, on every side,
For Vermont and her glittering star!

Who lingers behind when the word has passed down
That the enemy swarm o'er the line?

When he knows in the heart of a North border town
Their glittering bayonets shine?

Push on to the North! the fierce battle-tide
Already resounds from afar;
Push on to the North from every side,
For Vermont and her glittering star!

Forward! the State that was first in the fight
When Allen and Warner were here,
Should not be the last now to strike for the right,
Should never be found in the rear!

Then, on to the North! the fierce battle-tide
Already resounds from afar;

Push on to the North from every side,
For Vermont and her glittering star!

Hark! booms from the lake, and resounds from the land,

The roar of the conflict. Push on!
Push on to the North! on every hand

Our boys to the rescue have gone;
Forward! the State that was first in the fight

When Allen and Warner were here,
Should not be the last now to strike for the right,
Should never be found in the rear.

OF LOVE AND WINE.

Of love and wine old poets sung,
Old poets rich and rare,—
Of wine with red and ruby heart,
And love with golden hair;
Of wine that winged the poet's thought,
And woke the slumbering lyre;
Of love that through the poet's line
Ran like a flash of fire.

But wine, when those old poets sung
Its praises long ago,
Was something subtler than the bards
Of modern ages know;—

Ay, wine was wine when Teian girls,
Flushed with the rosy dew,
To old Anacreon's fiery strains
Through wanton dances flew.

And love, when those old poets sung
Its praises long ago,

Was something warmer than the bards
Of modern ages know;—

Ay, love was love when Teian girls,
Flushed with the melting fire,
With roses crowned Anacreon's brow,
With kisses paid his lyre.

PURER THAN SNOW.

Purer than snow
Is a girl I know;
Purer than snow is she;
Her heart is light,
And her cheek is bright,—
Ah! who do you think she can be?

I know very well,
But I never shall tell,
'Twould spoil all the fun, you see;
Her eye is blue;
And her lip, like dew,
And red as a mulberry.

THE APPLE BLOSSOM.

Here's an apple blossom, Mary;
See how delicate and fair!
Here's an apple blossom, Mary;
Let me weave it in your hair!

Ah! thy hair is raven, Mary,
And the curls are thick and bright;
And this apple blossom, Mary,
Is so beautifully white!

There! the apple blossom, Mary,
Looks so sweet among your curls!
And the apple blossom, Mary,
Crowns the sweetest of the girls.

But the apple blossom, Mary,
You must have a little care
Not to tell your mother, Mary,
That I wove it in your hair!

HON. RAWSEL R. KEITH, oldest son of Hon. Chapin Keith, born in Uxbridge, Mass., Nov. 21, 1790, died in Montpelier Oct. 25, 1874. Coming to Barre with his father in 1793, he remained there until 1817, when he came to Montpelier as deputy sheriff, and held that office and the shrievalty until 1831. He was Judge of Probate 1833 to 36, and long a director and finally president of the Bank of Montpelier, retiring voluntarily from these positions. He was a man of firmness and integrity, and highly esteemed by his fellow citizens. He married Mary T. Wheeler of Barre, who bore him 2 sons; R. D. W. Keith, now of Chicago, and Alonzo T. Keith, now of Montpelier.

LUTHER NEWCOMB, ESQ.

BY H. A. HUBE.

Luther Newcomb, for many years the county clerk of Washington County, was born in Derby, Apr. 10, 1826, and died from Bright's disease, at his home in Montpelier, Jan. 2, 1876. His father was Dr. Luther Newcomb, whose wife was Lucretia Martin. Dr. Newcomb was the first physician to locate in that part of northern Vermont, and was eminent in his profession; among his students was Dr. Colby, the father of Stoddard B. Colby. Dr. Newcomb died when Luther was 5 years old, and the boy remained with his mother 6 years after his father's death.

The family was intimate with Hon. Isaac F. Redfield, and when Luther was 11 years old, he came to Montpelier and became the same as a member of Judge Redfield's family. He studied under the direction of the Judge and entered Wash. Co. Grammar School, where he pursued his studies until prepared to enter college. He then read law under the direction of Judge Redfield, and was for a time a student in the office of O. H. Smith, Esq. Though fitted for admission to the bar, he did not apply for it, but receiving an appointment in the customs service he was 2 years a revenue officer on Lake Champlain.

Jan. 1, 1849, he was appointed Deputy Clerk of Wash. Co. Court under Shubael Wheeler. He was in Dec., 1857, appointed Clerk and held the position during the rest of his life. He was a model officer, and had not only the respect and affection of the Washington County bar and the court, but as the general term of the Supreme Court was held here, that of members of the bar of the whole State.

Mr. Newcomb married June 25, 1857, Amanda Thomas, only daughter of Gen. Stephen Thomas. His wife and 3 sons, Charles, Luther, and Stephen T., survive him.

Mr. J. W. Wheelock, who died the month after Mr. Newcomb, on the death of the latter wrote for his paper, from his own sick bed, a few words concerning his old friend, and among them were the following:

He was in many respects a remarkable man. Beneath a business-like and, to the casual observer, almost stern exterior, was hidden a heart tender as that of a woman, and one ever prompting him to those kindly thoughts and acts which so ennoble and exalt human nature. Unobtrusive, and apparently concerned only about the proper performance of his duties as clerk of the court, he yet possessed so comprehensive and discriminating powers of mind that he took in almost intuitively the bearings and consequences of matters brought before him; and many a sentence of crisp brevity has contained, as in a nut-shell, the law and wisdom of it, and the decision at which the learned judge arrives after a most elaborate and exhaustive review. . . . He was always ready to aid and encourage the inexperienced or timid, and many a success has been achieved through a timely word of advice and aid from him. He was judicious as a counsellor, valuable and safe as an adviser, and faithful, even unto death, in his friendships.

The funeral of Mr. Newcomb was in the Court House, Rev. J. E. Wright conducting the services, and Hon. Charles W. Willard making an address. Mr. Willard in his address spoke not only as the representative of the bar, but, indeed, as the nearest friend, and said that the friendship of Luther Newcomb had been the friendship of his manhood and his life.

CHARLES CLARK, M. D.,

son of Nathaniel and Lucy (Perry) Clark, was born in what is now known as East Montpelier, Jan. 31, 1800. His parents were among the early settlers of the town, and had come from Rochester, Mass. It is claimed by some members of the Clark family still residing in Rochester, that they are descended from Thomas Clark, mate on the Mayflower, who returned on the brig Anne, and settled in the Plymouth colony in 1623. One of the oldest stones in the cemetery at Plymouth bears the name of Nathaniel Clark, who died in 1714, at 74.

Charles was the second son in a family of 6 children. An injury of his left knee, in his fourth year, caused its amputation 3 years after. This was before the day of anæsthetics. As illustrative of the spirit of the boy, when the surgeon, Dr. Nathan Smith of Hanover, proposed to bind him, as was usual in such cases, the child refused, placed himself on the table, submitted to the painful operation without the quivering of a muscle, without a word or any sign of pain.

His father died when he was but 10 years of age, and from that time on, with an indomitable courage characteristic of his whole life, he supported himself by his own labor.

The record of the next 20 years is a story of trials and privations, which a less brave spirit would not have overcome. His educational advantages were limited to the common school and a few terms in the Washington County Grammar School. He studied his profession with Dr. Edward Lamb, of Montpelier, and as early as 1819, attended lectures at Castleton Medical College. He began the practice of medicine with Dr. N. C. King, of North Montpelier, in 1821, and removed to Calais 2 years later, where he purchased a small farm of 20 acres, and set up for himself. He was soon after married to Clarissa Boyden, daughter of Darius Boyden, Esq., of Montpelier, where he resided 14 years. In speaking of these early days he used to say, "Medical practice in these days of warm wraps and nice robes is quite another thing from my experience in the dead of winter on horseback, or at best in a bare sleigh, with insufficient clothing."

In 1837, he removed to Montpelier, purchasing the Boyden homestead, where he resided for 12 years, securing an extensive practice not only in Montpelier, but in surrounding towns, winning public confidence and affection wherever known.

In 1849, he moved into the village of Montpelier, both for the better education of his children and the more convenient practice of his profession, in which he continued actively engaged till 1865, when he met with an accident resulting in a severe and protracted illness, from which he never wholly recovered. After this, he retired from general practice, retaining only office and consultation business. In 1868, he was again severely injured by being thrown from his carriage. From this he had partially recovered, when a year later he was stricken with paralysis. With patient endurance he lingered through 5 years more of suffering and prostration till his death, June 21, 1874.

Dr. Clark was a man of more than ordinary natural gifts, or he would never have accomplished what he did—left poor in this world's goods, crippled by his physical infirmity, and with but very limited opportunities of education. In person he was 6 feet of stature and fine presence and great physical endurance. He was remarkable for his keen observation of men and things, and was rarely mistaken in his judgment. His genial manners, generous sympathies, and fund of anecdote, made him always welcome at the bedside of his patients, and contributed not a little to his success. He was thoroughly devoted to his profession, kept himself well informed of the progress of the science through standard medical journals, and was always ready to accept and try new methods. But his own experience and observation served him better than books. He compounded his medicines with little regard to received formulas, and more from his judgment in each particular case. Those best acquainted with him, greatly regret that he did not write out for the benefit of the profession the results of his large and varied experience.

As a man and a citizen, it is not too much to say that he was universally esteemed—a man of public spirit, interested in every movement and enterprise that looked to the welfare of society. Though not a professor of religion till late in life, he started and superintended a Sabbath-school during his short residence at North Montpelier, was one of the earliest and staunchest advocates of temperance, and was always urging improvements in methods and opportunities of education. He spared no self-denial and sacrifice to give his own children advantages which were denied to himself, and in the same generous spirit sought the welfare of others. He was for 12 years president of the board of trustees and chairman of the prudential committee of the Washington County Grammar School, and for many years treasurer of the Vermont Medical Society, of which he was an active member. He was too much given to his own special work to engage in political life, yet he yielded to the wishes of his friends, and served as representative of Montpelier in the Legislature in 1846, '47. He was not a public speaker, as he felt the need of proper culture for this, but was esteemed as a very useful working man on committees. His judgment was always valued in practical questions of politics. One incident, however, he was wont to recall with a good deal of satisfaction in later years. A bill for a license law was being pushed through the legislature, and was likely to pass, greatly to the regret of friends of temperance. Just at the last moment when an amendment was possible, Dr. Clark rose to his place without previous consultation with others, presented a brief amendment, urged it home with a few chosen words, and secured its prompt passage by the House. A leading politician who had been interested in carrying the measure, rushed across the hall at once, and said to him with much excitement, "Your amendment has killed the bill." "Just what I intended," was the reply. He was warmly congratulated by friends of temperance at once and for years after on the defeat of a measure which he felt would have been attended with serious injury to the best interests of the State.

The following tribute was rendered him by his pastor, the Rev. Dr. Lord: "His life began with suffering, it closed in suffering, but its long intermediate years were filled with hard work, with brave labors, irradiated by a warm, genial spirit, by devotion to the best interests of his fellow-men, with zeal for education, good morals and religion, by professional skill, fidelity and enthusiasm. He received, as he eminently merited, the respect, confidence and love of all who knew him."

—From the Family.

DEA. CONSTANT W. STORRS

was born in Royalton in 1801, came to Montpelier in 1822, and from that time until his death was engaged in merchandise—more than half a century. In 1831, he became a member of the First Congregational Church, and in 1835 was elected one of its deacons—an office which he tried to magnify as long as he lived. For 22 years he was treasurer of the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society. He was greatly interested in religious matters, and labored incessantly in season and out of season. Early in life he married a daughter of Wyllis I. Cadwell, who bore him two sons and a daughter, the beautiful daughter dying when about to reach maturity. The widow and son survive. Dea. Storrs died Mar. 23, 1872.

Paul A. Reid

HON. CHARLES REED.

BY REV. J. EDWARD WRIGHT.

Charles Reed was born in Thetford, Nov. 24, 1814, and died in Montpelier, after a sickness of less than three days, Mar. 7, 1873. He was the oldest child of Hon. Joseph Reed, and his second wife, Elizabeth Burnap, daughter of Rev. Jacob Burnap, of Merrimac, N. H., and sister of the scholarly Unitarian minister long settled in Baltimore, Md., Rev. George W. Burnap, D. D. Montpelier was Mr. Reed's home from 1827, when his father came here to reside. He pursued his preparatory studies at the Washington County Grammar School, entered Dartmouth College, and graduated in 1835. Among his classmates and intimate friends there was the late Governor Peter T. Washburn. He studied law in Montpelier, in the office of Hon. William Upham, and afterwards for 2 years in the Dane Law School, Harvard University, where he received the degree of LL.B. in 1839. He was admitted to the Washington County Bar in 1838, and in Sept., 1839, formed a partnership with Hon. Homer W. Heaton, which continued for a third of a century without change in the location of the office, being only dissolved by Mr. Reed's death. He married Emily Eliza, eldest daughter of Hon. Daniel Baldwin of Montpelier, June 5, 1842, by whom he had five children; two of whom, Elizabeth Burnap, wife of Col. J. H. Lucia of Vergennes, and Maria G., with their mother, survived him. (Mrs. Lucia died, leaving husband and 3 children, Jan. 5, 1881.)

From time to time Mr. Reed's fellow citizens honored themselves in honoring him with positions of trust. He was chosen justice of the peace for a number of years; was elected state's attorney in 1847, and again in 1848, and was appointed register of probate in the latter year,—performing the duties of the office by deputy. For some 5 years he was one of the selectmen of Montpelier. In 1858, he was chosen trustee and librarian of the State library, and also a member of the Vt. Historical Society, in whose work he was deeply interested, serving as one of its curators, and publishing committee, and also as its librarian. He represented Montpelier in the Legislatures of 1862 and 1863, and for the three following years occupied a seat in the Senate chamber. While in the Senate, he interested himself ardently in the institution of the Vermont Reform School, now located in Vergennes, and became chairman of its first board of trustees, which position he retained till his death. At the establishment of Green Mount Cemetery in Montpelier, Mr. Reed was chosen one of its commissioners, and was re-elected to that trust, which he had held for many years, on the last day of his active business life. He was one of the four far-sighted men who advocated and secured that change in the school system of Montpelier, which brought the Washington County Grammar School and the district schools into harmonious relations under the same board of management and in the same building; and he was repeatedly elected chairman of the united committees. In 1869, he was chosen a member of the Council of Censors, and in that capacity advocated extending the right of suffrage to women. Politically he was a democrat in early life, but from the breaking out of the rebellion, he took sides with the republican party. His last illness was occasioned by a cold taken in the chilly air of the unwarmed State Library, while he was investigating some historical topic. This was increased by exposure a few days later, at the March meeting, which his interest in Temperance Reform led him to attend; and thus were developed, in a constitution originally strong, but weakened by overwork, the pleuro-pneumonia and congestion which ended his earthly career.

Mr. Reed was, first of all, a man of integrity. This appeared in his business relations with others, and won for him their utmost confidence; and it was shown also in his faithfulness to his own convictions. He never seemed to stop to ask if the course contemplated would gain for him profit and applause or involve loss and unpopularity. Among those of a different faith, he adhered steadfastly to the Unitarian views with which he was imbued in his childhood; and, when opportunity offered, entered zealously into the work of establishing in Montpelier a church that should represent what he thought to be the truth in religious doctrine. He was among the foremost in the organization of the Church of the Messiah, and was indefatigable in laboring to promote its interests. He acted with like decision, energy, and straight-forwardness in regard to the Temperance agitation, and the Woman Suffrage Reform.

He was also a man of marked public spirit. With private cares that were by no means small, he undertook a great variety and amount of work for the general welfare—work for which he received little or no remuneration, direct or indirect. The value of the services he rendered to his town and State, in his devotion to educational interests, the Reform School, the State Library, and the Historical Society, cannot be estimated in money, and can be appreciated in its full extent by very few. Rarely, indeed, does any philanthropist contribute so freely from his purse to charitable objects, as did Mr. Reed lavish from the wealth of his time, and physical and mental strength, for the public good.

Further, he was ever loyal to his native State. In the words of another, "As a Vermont, believing in Vermont and the genuine Vermont character, deeply interested in the past history of the State, and its present prosperity, Mr. Reed will be much missed. He was one of the noblest and truest of loyal Vermonters. As an officer of the State Historical Society he rendered invaluable service in getting up and putting in form for preservation much of the early history. . . . The State has not another—if we except those who have been associated with him in this work, Hons. Hiland Hall and E. P. Walton—to fill his place."

In his chosen profession, Mr. Reed reached a proud eminence, (yet singularly without pride,) and gained a handsome property. H. A. Huse, Esq., a fellow-member of the bar, at one time his assistant, and later his successor in the charge of the State Library, said of him, in a memorial sketch read before the Vermont Historical Society, "Charles Reed was a true lawyer, taking pride in his profession, and loving the law as a science wherein reason has her most perfect work, and because his knowledge of it enabled him to be truly a counsellor to those in trouble. Grounded by severe study in the foundation principles, his directness and the impatience with which he viewed worthless and irrelevant matter made him a good pleader. His papers always gave him a standing in court. . . . Mr. Reed, on trial of a case, presented clearly to court or jury the facts proved and the law applicable to them. This was done not by the use of rounded periods, impassioned gesture, or appeal to the emotional nature. His imagination supplied him neither with facts not in the case, nor with the coloring and magnifying power which often distorts things from their true relation, and gives what is unimportant undue prominence. But it was, I think, in the court of chancery, and perhaps still more in the supreme court, that Mr. Reed showed the qualities most clearly that stamped him as one of the leaders of the bar. In the court of last resort the premises were fixed and unchanging, and from them he worked most unerringly to the conclusion. The brief method of statement, the condensed argument, had there their true sphere and always their due weight. While it was not given to him to charm by silvery speech, it was given him to convince by the closeness of his logic. The clear-cut intellect, trained by careful study, made him invaluable as a legislator. During his term of service the laws passed received more careful scrutiny, and were more carefully framed from the very fact of his presence; and much of the intelligible legislation of the last few years owes its shape to his skill, as well since as during his occupancy of a seat in the law-making body.

"In yet another direction was his ability as a lawyer called into activity. Before 1858, the State Library was a mass of legislative documents without form, and void of any use. A few law reports were intermingled, and formed a stock from which impecunious and conscience-lacking men plundered at will. To make this one of the best libraries in the Union in the Department of American Law, without large expense to the State, was a labor of years with Mr. Reed. His success, with the means at his command, has, I am sure, not been paralleled. The bar and bench of the county and State owe a great debt to him for the thoroughness of the work."

Charles Reed was no courtier, nor trimmer. He could not cajole, he could not flatter, he could not fawn and curry favor. His sincerity appeared often as bluntness, and sometimes gave offence. But those who were acquainted with him had in their minds an ever ready explanation of his occasional roughness of speech and manner, in the knowledge that they were dealing with an upright, downright honest man, who, under an exterior somewhat hard, carried a heart throbbing with devotion to the welfare of all, a man of Roman firmness, and of Jacksonian willingness to assume the responsibility in an emergency; a man whose record, whether public or private, had always been singularly free from stain; a man whose very presence strengthened the worthy purposes of the timid and hesitating about him, a man whose son of Micah French, of Barre, was born in Peru, N. Y., in 1824, and died in Montpelier, suddenly, Aug. 8, 1878. Employed for a while as a clerk, he opened a clothing store in Montpelier, in which he was quite successful. He was postmaster 8 years under President Lincoln, and subsequently entered into the construction of the Montpelier & Wells River Railroad. He was also very energetic, and even daring, in real estate operations, and to him, more than to any one man, Montpelier owes the construction of its spacious and elegant stores. Mr. French married a daughter of the late Joel Goldsbury, of Barre, and she, with an only daughter, Mrs. W. T. Dewey, survive him.

. . . "Daily prayer, far better understood
In acts than words, was simply doing good."

JAMES G. FRENCH,

LUTHER CROSS,

born in Swanzev, N. H., 1802, established himself in mercantile business in Montpelier in 1827. In the same year he married Miss Polly M. Day, of Woodstock, who bore him four children: Gustavus T., who died March 13, 1867, aged 33 years; Luther Burnell, now of Montpelier; Royal D., now in the West; and Lucia D., now wife of Marcus A. Farwell, of Chicago. Mr. Cross was interested in politics, and personally very popular; hence he was often the Whig candidate for representative in the old town of Montpelier, and always received more than his party vote; but the town was so strongly Democratic that success was impossible. He was, however, a magistrate many years in succession, and by the Legislature was repeatedly elected sergeant-at-arms. He built three brick dwellings, which were the best in Montpelier in his day, and two of them are the best of the brick houses now. The three are the two houses on State street now occupied by Hons. John A. Page and B. F. Fifield, and the Cross homestead on Elm street. He also built the "Willard block" on Main, at the head of State street. He died, suddenly, Mar. 9, 1873, aged 71 years.

CHARLES AND TIMOTHY CROSS

came to Montpelier about the time of the advent of Richard W. Hyde, and with him started the first bakery in town.

CHARLES CROSS was born in Tilton, N. H., Feb. 13, 1812, and his wife was born an hour or two before him. He is highly esteemed, a staunch Methodist, and a liberal contributor to that church and its educational institution on Seminary Hill. He is still engaged in a large bakery and confectionary business with his eldest and well-known son, Levi Bartlett Cross.

TIMOTHY CROSS died some years ago. His house was destroyed in the last great fire, and his widow and children removed to Cambridgeport, Mass.

[To Charles Cross the Methodist church are also indebted chiefly for the fine wood engraving of their church building.—ED.]

DANIEL BALDWIN

Was born in Norwich, Vt., July 21, 1792, and died in Montpelier, Aug. 3, 1881. He was the youngest of the seven children of Daniel and Hannah (Havens) Baldwin. His mother was a daughter of Robert Havens, of Royalton, whose house was the first entered by the Indians when Royalton was burned. He was orphaned before he was two years old, and the destitute brood was scattered. He came to Montpelier in 1806, and remained till he was of age under the guardianship of his older brother, Sylvanus, a man of prominence and marked ability. With him he learned the carpenter's trade, availing himself also of some brief opportunities for attending school; but, from the time of attaining his majority for many years, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits, with gratifying success. He relinquished these in 1848, to devote himself more exclusively to his duties as president of the Vt. Mutual Fire Insurance Co., of which he was the original projector, and in which he took the first policy, March 31, 1828. He was president of this Company from 1841 to 1874, and regarded with a well-grounded satisfaction the remarkable prosperity and growth of the Company during his administration. While cautious and conservative, he was eminently progressive both early and late in life. In 1827, he led in the effort to establish salt works in Montpelier. "He was called again and again into the direction of the Bank of Montpelier and the Montpelier National Bank, and was a director in the latter at the time of his decease. He was among the first to advocate and further the building of the Vermont Central Railroad, and agitated the subject from 1830 until the desired end was attained. . . . He was also one of the first board of directors of the Vermont Central, but retained that position only a year, having always strenuously maintained, in opposition to the Northfield interest which prevailed, that the route should be by way of the Williamstown Gulf. As long ago as 1850, he was one of a committee of eight, of which the Hon. J. A. Wing was chairman, who raised a subscription, and procured at considerable expense to themselves a survey of a route for a railroad from Montpelier to Wells River."* He was also one of the originators and the general manager, during the early years of its existence, of the Montpelier Gaslight Co. "He was town treasurer in 1828, and then again for 11 consecutive years from 1835. . . . From 1837 to 1847 he was trustee of the 'Surplus Fund.' For many years from and after 1837, he was the chief engineer of the fire department. During the years 1846 and 1847, he occupied the bench as associate judge of the Washington County Court, but from 1850 on, with the exception of one year's service as lister, he uniformly avoided public office."* In early life he held high position in the Masonic Order. "He was connected with the Vermont Colonization Society during all its active existence, a large part of the time as its treasurer, and then as its president."* In politics he was a democrat—during the rebellion a "war democrat," voting more than once for the republican candidate—and in religion he was emphatically a "liberal Christian," avowing deep interest in "Spiritualism," but contributing generously to churches of various creeds, and joining most heartily with Unitarians and Universalists in the organization and support of the Montpelier Independent Meeting-House Society, of whose board of trustees he was chairman from the establishment of the board in 1866 to the day of his death. In his will he manifested his undying interest in Montpelier, by bequeathing $2,000, to be used under certain conditions in securing a suitable water supply for the village.

He married, in 1820, Emily Wheelock, grand-daughter of the first president of Dartmouth College. She died in 1872. A son and four daughters were born to them, all of whom reached maturity and were married; but only two, the first and second daughters, Mrs. Charles Reed and Mrs. Marcus D. Gilman, have survived their parents. The society of their six grand-children was a delight to Judge

Baldwin during the last summer of his life.

He was a man extensively known in the State, and universally esteemed for his probity, his sound judgment, his public spirit and his benevolence. Deliberate in planning and moderate in moving, he was yet positive in his decisions and energetic in his actions. A man of a peculiarly placid and even temper, and sustained by a Christian trust, he bore earth's trials with great calmness, and his declining years furnished the community an impressive illustration of what it is to "grow old beautifully." Though not free from all the infirmities which commonly attend old age, he was wonderfully vigorous in mind and body, and found life enjoyable down to his last day; when suddenly his powers all collapsed, and with a brief struggle he passed on, leaving an honored name and a blessed memory. It is rare that a life is more entirely successful in both its material and moral aspects. J. E. W.

From the records of Aurora Lodge, No. 22, F. & A. M., we take the following:

IN MEMORIAM.

BRO. DANIEL BALDWIN,

Born in Norwich, Vt., July 21, 1792,
Died at Montpelier, Vt., August 3, 1881;
Aged 89 years and 13 days.

Initiated in Aurora Lodge, No. 9, at Montpelier, January 3, 1814;
Passed January 31, 1814;
Raised in Columbian Lodge, Boston, Mass.,
May 14, 1814.
Affiliated with Aurora Lodge, No. 22,
July 11, 1881.

BRO. BALDWIN was an old time Mason, one of those who passed through the fiery trials of the anti-masonic period, and that he was unyielding in his devotion to the fraternity is evinced by the fact that he and Wor. Bro. Joseph Howes opposed to the bitter end the surrender of the charter of old Aurora Lodge, No. 9. In this, however, he was unsuccessful, and the Lodge succumbed to what was probably inevitable, and it was voted, Sept. 19, 1814, to surrender the charter.

He successively filled all the offices of the Lodge from that of Tyler to Worshipful Master, to which latter office he was elected June 26, 1820.

He was also a prominent officer in King Solomon R. A. Chapter, No. 5, and a member of Montpelier Council, R. & S. M.

BRO. BALDWIN was a just and upright Mason, ever generous and liberal in dispensing Masonic charity, and was always ready to whisper good counsel in the ear of a brother.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

Of the Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

At the first meeting of the directors of the Vt. Mu. Fire Ins. Co. after the death of Mr. Baldwin, Aug. 3, 1881, the President offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved. That we have learned with profound regret of the death of Hon. Daniel Baldwin, so long connected with this Company, and identified with the best interests of the town for three fourths of a century. We duly appreciate his eminent services as an officer of this company, and his usefulness as a citizen.

Resolved. That we extend to his family the sympathy of this Board in the loss of one who has so long been a kind friend and able counselor.

And a committee was chosen to prepare a memorial address to be read at the Annual Meeting of the Company, which was prepared and read by Dr. HIRAM A. CUTTING, of Lunenburg.

"The Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance Company" is a name so familiar to every Vermonter, in fact, so woven into the affairs and interests of the people of this State, that when its originator, Daniel Baldwin, died upon the 3d day of August, in his 90th year, it sent a thrill of sorrow through the hearts of thousands. It was his foresight which planned a system of insurance that recommended itself for its cheapness, and won for itself golden opinions, supplying, as it did, the unfortunate with means to reconstruct their homes promptly when the fire-fiend had swept them away. Rightly has it been said of this company, "That it has clothed the naked, fed the hungry and supplied the destitute," and just was the sorrow for the departed man, for he was both the father and patron of this most beneficial association in our State. It was a happy inspiration which induced George Bliss, a canvasser for the Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, about the year 1818, to call upon Daniel Baldwin, who was temporarily stopping in Boston, for the purpose of soliciting his insurance. Mr. Baldwin was at that time a prosperous young merchant. He investigated the subject carefully, was pleased with the idea, had his property insured, and accepted the agency of the company for this section, which he retained for 2 years, receiving premiums to the amount of over $4,000, with only $2,000 in losses. It was during this period that the idea of cheaper insurance, based upon the mutual plan, suggested itself to Mr. Baldwin. He counseled with a number of the business men of that day, but could get little encouragement from any, with the exception of Thomas Reed, Jr., James H. Langdon, Joshua Y. Vail, and Chester Hubbard. With these coadjutors, at a second trial, Nov. 10, 1827, the Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance Company was chartered; yet not without great opposition. The member from Middlebury, one of its opposers, moved an amendment of the bill, granting a charter, requiring the company to pay 6 per cent. of the profits into the State treasury annually. This shows that that member of our Legislature, at least, knew little of mutual insurance.

Under this grant the company was organized, Jan. 21, 1828. As Daniel Baldwin originated the charter, he was elected president of the meeting, but declined, and J. H. Langdon was elected in his stead. There were but six persons present. A board of directors was chosen, and that board, of which Hon. Mr. Baldwin was an active member, elected Chapin Keith of Barre, president, J. Y. Vail, secretary, and George Worthington treasurer, both of Montpelier. Their first policy was issued in March, 1828, to Daniel Baldwin.

In October, 1828, the directors reported 186 policies issued, and that the company was gaining in strength and popularity. A small beginning, truly, for a company that now issues between 5,000 and 6,000 policies annually.

Mr. Keith was succeeded at the end of the year by Israel P. Dana of Danville, as president, who held the office until 1838, to be followed by John Spalding of Montpelier, who held the office until 1841, when the subject of this sketch was elected, holding office as president for 33 years. During this time, he administered the affairs of the corporation as its head. He had around him trusty men, tried and true; yet he has probably traveled more miles on insurance business, and talked insurance with more persons than any other 50 men in the State. His heart and soul were in the work, and with him that meant success. He understood the principles and rules of insurance as few ever do. He adjusted equitable rates for various classes of property with a truly wonderful precision. His devotion to the duties of his office were both conscientious and enthusiastic. As an adjustor, he was almost without an equal; while he settled closely and economically for the company, he gained the respect and good will of the insured, for he was frank and honest, dealing as he would have others deal with him. Few, if any, ever felt aggrieved, and many were the testimonials showered upon him in later years, for his honest dealing with them, when they through loss were rendered almost powerless to contest the validity of their insurance, had they been forced so to do.

The prosperity of the Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance Company is the proudest testimonial he can have of his zeal and well-directed services, and those who partake of the benefits of that organization cannot fail to gratefully remember the man, who more than any other one has made the strong and reliable concern what it is. That its progress may be the more evident, I would say that the number of policies in force in 1831 was 1,869; in 1841, 12,012; in 1851, 11,790; in 1861, 22,237; in 1871, 27,488; and in 1881, 29,413. Such an increase in business is without precedent in any mutual company in our Union, and shows definitely that the true and unwavering course of all connected with it, has gained the confidence of the people, and the company is an honor to our State, and it is fitting that we should honor the man who originated the philanthropic scheme, and with untiring zeal pushed it to so grand success.

Age creeps stealthily on us all, and as Judge Baldwin felt the pressure upon him, and looked with a just pride upon an institution, almost his own; and surrounded by helpers in the insurance business which he had himself educated, he thought that they had better allow him to retire; and so after his election as president for the 31st year, he sent in the following resignation, in March, 1871:

To the Directors of the Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance Company:

GENTLEMEN:—Owing to infirmities in consequence of old age, I do not feel competent to discharge the duties of president of this company as they should be, and therefore resign the office, to take place as soon as some person shall be elected to fill the responsible place I have so long occupied.

D. BALDWIN.

No action was, however, taken upon this, and he was again re-elected in October. He immediately resigned, but was over-persuaded, and consented to serve one year more by having a Vice President to relieve him of some of the duties which now rested quite heavily upon him. James T. Thurston was elected Vice President, and thus he was continued until Oct. 14, 1874, when Mr. Thurston was elected President; but Hon. Mr. Baldwin was retained as director, so that his counsel and advice might rightly be available. Judge Baldwin, however, soon withdrew almost wholly from the office, but still retaining his mental faculties in a remarkable degree up to the day of his death.

All honor to the departed, and may his valuable counsels and noble example live with the company; and his original and true principles of insurance be carried out by the insurer, and the household word of Vermont continue to be the "Old Vermont Mutual." Let us here to-day, as officers of this company, pledge ourselves anew to the duties, and thus we may hope to retain with our prosperity, which seems assured, the good will and honor of our patrons, that we may, in part, share in the tributes of praise so justly given to the departed.

HIRAM A. CUTTING, } Com.

ABRAHAM G. D. TUTHILL was born at Oyster Pond, Long Island, and in due time chose to become an artist. To perfect himself, he spent seven years as a pupil of the great painter, Benjamin West, in London, and one year in Paris. Returning to this country, he spent a few years in Montpelier, where a sister resided, and where now there are to be found many beautiful specimens of his work. His artist life was mainly spent at Buffalo, Detroit, and other western cities; but he returned to Montpelier, and died there, June 12, 1843, aged 67.

JOSHUA Y. VAIL

was one of the very early lawyers of Montpelier. He served awhile as Preceptor of Washington County Grammar School, and was County Clerk 1819–1839, 18 years. He was also Secretary of the Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance Company from the organization in 1828 until 1850, and member and Secretary of the Council of Censors in 1820. His wife was a devoted christian mother, Mary M., sister of the artist Tuthill, and all of her children have been well connected. Two of her sons, Solon J. Y. and Oscar J., still reside in Montpelier, and two daughters survive, one at Newbury and one in the West—four out of nine children. Mr. Vail died in 1854, in his 70th year; and his wife in 1876, aged 90. Both were born on Long Island.

THE WOOD FAMILY.

Late in the last century three brothers were born in Leominster, Mass., the eldest of whom spent half of his life in Montpelier, and the others much the largest part. They were Cyrus, John, and Zenas Wood. They were all of Puritan stock, and members of the first Congregational church in Montpelier.

CYRUS WOOD settled in Lebanon, N. H., about 1809, taking his brother John with him, who was then about 20 years of age. In 1814, both came to Montpelier and entered into partnership in the cabinet-making business, which was continued until the death of Cyrus, Nov. 25, 1840.

JOHN WOOD, born July 20, 1788, married Miss Mary Waterman, of Lebanon, N. H., who was truly a helpmeet for him, an industrious, pious and prudent woman. Bearing his share in the military burdens of his time, he became captain of Washington Artillery, which was a high honor. But it was in the churches that he was most conspicuous. Long a deacon in the first Congregational church, he went to the Free church on its organization, and on its dissolution, to the Methodist church. In all he was an earnest worker, instant and earnest in prayer and exhortation, and his pure, honest and loving life attested the sincerity of his religious convictions. He died Jan. 14, 1872, in his 84th year, leaving a son and daughter, the son being Thomas W. Wood, the now highly distinguished artist.

ZENAS WOOD, born Jan. 1, 1793, came to Montpelier at a somewhat later date, and engaged in the stove and tin-ware business, in which he was quite successful. He had all the excellent characteristics of his brother John, but was somewhat less demonstrative. He sympathized keenly with the sick and suffering, as the writer of this note had occasion to know by personal experience. Mr. Wood was a prudent business man, and for some years was a director in the old Bank of Montpelier. In the last great fire here his real estate was destroyed, and he went, a lone and sad man, to his affectionate daughters in St. Johnsbury, where he died Oct. 29, 1876, in his 84th year. E. P. W.

C. DE F. B.

ANECDOTES AND INCIDENTS OF MONTPELIER SOLDIERS.

The first man to offer his services to his country from Montpelier was Robert J. Coffey, who at the age of 19 years enlisted in Co. F, 1st Vt. regt., which was mustered into service May 2, 1861. Five more boys from the town responded to the call and enlisted in the same company within a few hours after. On being mustered out with the regiment, Aug. 15, 1861, Sergt. Coffey enlisted Sept. 5, 1861, in Co. K, 4th regiment. At the battle of Banks' Ford, Va., May 2, 1863, one incident occurred, it being the next day after the 6th Army Corps had charged and captured Mary's Heights. During the battle, Co. K, 4th regiment was deployed as skirmishers. After making a charge and capturing a number of prisoners, and withdrawing back towards the rear, 1st Lieut. Chas. Carter who was in the command of the company, shouted "come on boys; we will get more of them yet." Sergt. Coffey went forward with the lieutenant a short distance, when spying a rebel taking aim at the lieutenant from behind a tree, he fired, the ball taking effect in the rebel's arm, when he advanced and gave himself up a prisoner, and was sent to the rear. They then advanced to the brow of a small hill. The bullets coming thick, they crawled behind an old tree-top for protection. Sergt. Coffey reloaded his rifle here, an Enfield, and as they were rising up to take their departure,—things getting a little warm there—when they were fronted by three rebels, an officer and two men, who upon the demand made by the sergeant and lieutenant, surrendered and threw down their arms. As Lieut. Carter started with the prisoners to the rear, Sergt. Coffey heard the clanking of a sword, and ran around the tree-top, and was met by a large, fine looking rebel officer. The reply to the demand of surrender made by Sergt. Coffey was a blow across the sergeant's bayonet from the sword of the officer, which was parried off. As the rebel drew his revolver to fire, the sergeant discharged his rifle at him from a position of charge bayonets. The officer fell dead, being shot through the head. At this moment Lieut. Carter called on Sergt. Coffey to come back with him. As the sergeant started to go, he saw a rebel captain and six men just below him, which was on the bank of a small stream. At this moment, when the captain was giving an order to his men, the sergeant pointed his empty rifle into his face and ordered him to surrender. The captain thinking that they were surrounded exclaimed, "don't shoot," and ordered his men, who were in the rear of him several feet, to surrender. The captain gave himself up; the other six men came upon the bank, five of them privates, all armed with Enfield rifles, and the other, a lieutenant, also well armed. Dropping their guns, the sergeant threw them into the stream below. As they advanced towards where the captain stood, the lieutenant says to the captain, "what are we a doing here? he is all alone." The sergeant pointed his rifle into the lieutenant's face and cocked it, and told him to march on. As they advanced a squad of Co. A boys, who were forming a skirmish line on the right, came in sight; the sergeant called on them for assistance, as they were but a few rods off; which call they responded to by coming. Taking the swords from the captain and lieutenant, the sergeant marched them in the direction of his regiment, which had just formed a line of battle on a little rise of ground several rods in the rear. The sergeant delivered them over to Col. Stoughton in the presence of the regiment. The colonel directed him to take them to the rear and deliver them to the provost guard. On their way the rebel captain informed Sergt. Coffey that his name was Carpenter, and that he was captain of a company in the 21st North Carolina regiment, that the lieutenant belonged to the same regiment, and also that the officer whom he killed, was a major of the same regiment. The five privates belonged to the 8th Louisiana regiment. There being no vacancy for promotion at that time, Sergt. Coffey was detailed with six other deserving men to go to Vermont and assist in making out the draft. Six days after he rejoined his regiment; he was wounded at Fairfax Court house, Va., in such a manner as to further disable him for service in the war. The above narration is authenticated by several comrades of his regiment as a true narrative.

In addition to this narrative might be added many more of the daring deeds performed by Montpelier "boys" in the army. Among them that performed by private Wallace W. Noyes of Co. F, 2d regiment, who received special mention from the commanding officer at the battle of Spottsylvania, May 12, 1864. He mounted the enemy's breast works and fired some 30 rifles down into the enemy in rapid succession, they being loaded and passed up to him by his comrades from below; the bullets passing like rain above him, but he escaped unhurt, although a bullet passed through his cap and was knocked off; he was afterwards severely wounded, but recovered, and now resides in Montpelier.

Another deed which is credited in history from his commanding officer, was by Corporal William L. Washburn of the 3d Vt. battery, at the engagement before Petersburg, Va., in April, 1865. At one stage in the engagement, the severe firing from the enemy's guns compelled the 3d battery boys to leave their guns and retire behind some breast-works in the rear. Corp. Washburn remained by his gun, a 12 pounder, and loaded and fired alone, that the battery might not be silenced. There he continued until the "boys" returned to the guns. He escaped without a scratch.

Philip Sprague, son of the Hon. Wooster Sprague, who was president of the horticultural society of Boston, died Aug. 6, 1874, aged 44.

Isaiah Silver, for many years a leading merchant in town, died May 5, 1865, aged 74, leaving five sons, George, William, Albert, Charles E., and Henry D., a sergt. of Co. F of 1st U. S. artillery, who had the honor of planting the American flag on the bloody hill of Cerro Gordo, in the Mexican war. He died at San Juan de Ulloa, Mexico, June 7, 1848.

William S. Smith came in 1841; was engaged in the produce business until his death, Mar. 19, 1870, aged 62, leaving one son, Carlos L., and two daughters, one, now wife of Wm. O. Standish, all of Montpelier.

Peter G. Smith, colored, came to Montpelier in 1832, and opened hair-dressing rooms, which business he continued in until death; was a citizen of the highest character, respected by all of his townsmen. He died Dec. 7, 1878, aged 71.

Wm. S. Storrs came in 1823, was engaged in business many years, and died Mar. 5, 1870, aged 65. His two sons were killed in the Rebellion. (See war record, page 350.)

Josiah Town came in 1810, and commenced business, which he continued until his death, March 30, 1826, aged 49, leaving two sons, Josiah, who died Sept. 20, 1832, aged 31, and Ira S., a jeweler of this village.

Preston Trow came in 1830, was engaged in house building, and accumulated a handsome property. He died Oct. 1, 1879, aged 69.

Dr. B. O. Tyler came to Montpelier in 1852, and engaged in the druggist business for some years; died May 21, 1878, aged 80.

Elisha Town, an inventor of considerable note, taking out several patents, died Apr. 12, 1844, aged 63, leaving five sons, Snow, Samuel, Benjamin, Barnard, and a physician residing in Marshfield. The first four, whose ages are from 60 to 76, all reside in town, within a few rods of where they were born, each being a few rods from each other.

John Taplin, Esq., one of the first and leading settlers of the town of Berlin, (see Berlin,) but residing the last years of his life in Montpelier with his children, was married twice. By his first wife he had 12 children; by his second, 9, all but one living—that being accidentally scalded in infancy—to maturity, marrying, and settling down as the heads of families, thus furnishing an instance of family fruitfulness and health which perhaps never had a parallel in the State of Vermont. He died Nov. 1835, aged 87.

Jackson A. Vail, Esq., son of Joshua Y. Vail, represented the town in the Legislature, (see Washington Co. Bar,) and died Apr. 16, 1871, aged 56.

Col. Asahel Washburn, a highly esteemed citizen, being the originator of Sunday-schools in Vermont, died Apr. 9, 1856, aged 84.

Gamaliel Washburn, for upwards of 30 years a worthy resident of Montpelier, and for several holding the office of sheriff and jailor, was a Mason of the highest degrees in the Masonic order. He died Dec. 28, 1868, aged 66, leaving three sons, Miles, now of Boston; Geo. C., a physician of Waterbury; and Justus W. F., of Montpelier; and two daughters, Mrs. D. S. Wheatley, of this town, and Mrs. Emory Bailey, of Boston.

Chas. Wood, son of Cyrus Wood, engaged in the tin business several years, and died Feb. 5, 1864, aged 54, leaving one son, Charles E.

Jonathan E. Wright, a most esteemed citizen, son of Rev. Chester Wright, was several years engaged in business in town, removed to Boston, where he continued in business about 20 years, and returned to Montpelier, where he died, May 9, 1872, aged 61, leaving one son, Rev. J. Edward Wright, pastor of the Church of the Messiah, Fanny, a daughter, having deceased some years since.

C. DE F. BANCROFT.

GREEN MOUNT CEMETERY.

History from: Services at the Dedication of Green Mount Cemetery, Montpelier, Vt., Sept. 15, 1855. Published by order of the Commissioners. Montpelier: E. P. Walton, Jr., printer, 1855.

CALVIN J. KEITH, (see page 47) who died in 1853, left a bequest of $1000 in his will for "purchasing a suitable place for a burying-ground in Montpelier, and inclosing and planting trees in the same," and named Constant W. Storrs with the trustees of his estate to "lay out the ground into lots and dispose of the same at a reasonable price, reserving a portion to be given gratuitously to the poor. The amount received for lots to be used by said trustees in improving said ground and in planting the same thickly with trees." To the liberality and public spirit of this gift, "the town responded equally liberal, and at the next annual meeting appointed Hezekiah H. Reed, James T. Thurston and Stoddard B. Colby a committee to act on the behalf of the town" with the trustees. The joint committee purchased of Isaiah Silver at a cost of $2210 about 40 acres, which are now inclosed and constitute Green Mount Cemetery, work on which was commenced in the Autumn of 1854. By act of the Legislature that same year, the whole management was vested in five commissioners to be chosen by the town; Elisha P. Jewett, Hezekiah H. Reed, Charles Reed, James T. Thurston and George Langdon were elected at the annual March meeting 1855, the first board of commissioners. The town at the same time placing at their disposal to defray the expenses of the Cemetery $5000. The grounds were so far completed as to be dedicated with the usual forms and exercises Sept. 15, 1855.

Dedication Services.—Chant, written for the occasion, by Col. H. D. Hopkins, performed by the Union Choir Association, words, Psalm 90, adapted; reading of the Scriptures by Rev. F. D. Hemmenway:

Man that is born of a woman is of few days and full of trouble. He cometh forth as a flower and is cut down.—Job. . . .
 And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying: I am a stranger and a sojourner with you, give me a possession of a burying-place, that I may bury my dead. . . .
 And the field of Ephron, . . . the field and the cave which was therein and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about were made sure unto Abraham for a possession in the presence of the children of Heth.—Genesis. . . Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. In a moment in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump.—1st Cor.

Prayer—By Rev. Wm. H. Lord:

Almighty and most merciful God, the Father of our spirits and Framer of our bodies: it becometh us to recognize Thee at this time, and adore thy glorious Majesty. Thou hast formed us out of the dust of the earth, and passed upon us the irreversible sentence of Thy holiness; dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return. We acknowledge the justice of the decree which consigns these earthly tabernacles of our spirits to the darkness and silence of the grave. And as we contemplate the multitudes of successive generations, who have all returned to the earth from whence they sprang, our hearts are impressed with the reality of Thy government over us, and with the solemnity of our present condition and future destiny. And most Holy Father, as we are now assembled in this place, to consecrate to our own use, and to the use of the generations that shall follow us, this burial place for the dead, we beseech Thee, that serious thoughts of the greatness and majesty of Thine administration, and of our own weakness and frailty, may take possession of us. Remind us, we pray Thee, of our personal relations to thy moral law, and to the future before us. Let not the ceremony, in which we engage, be merely listless and formal; but enlisting our minds and hearts, may it send them forth to the contemplation of that promised inheritance of Thy people, where there is neither death nor the grave, and where no funeral monument and no consecrated sepulchre shall ever be seen to indicate the mortality and to mark the corruption of its inhabitants. For however beautiful and attractive we may make this place of sepulture, we yet confess, Great God, that it is, in all its parts, significant of our transitory and perishing estate, and that its various attractions cannot conceal from our thoughts the solemn use to which it is devoted, and the still more solemn fact that makes its use imperative. We beseech Thee, that as often as we visit this spot, it may suggest the most serious and salutary reflections, and lead to the most earnest and holy purposes. And while we may here attest our considerate and generous affection for the dead, let this common home of us all, teach us most impressively our duties to the living. As we here discover the certain destination to which we are all tending, may we learn wisdom to guide us amid the various relations of life, and find fresh and strong incentives to the performance of every duty, and to the cultivation of every grace. May we look to Him, Who, from out of the darkness of the grave, has brought life and immortality to light, and in His gospel spoken to us of a resurrection from the dust of the earth. May we here learn to cherish and to value the hope of a better life, revealed in Thy Word, and to believe heartily in Him, Who will soon destroy death and rob the grave of its victims. And when we commit the bodies of our friends to this consecrated earth, may it be with the lively and assured hope, that through the blood of Jesus Christ, appropriated by faith, we may all be reunited in Thy kingdom of blessedness, to go no more out forever.

Hear this our prayer, and unto Thy name, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, be everlasting praises; Amen.

Address—By Rev. F. W. Shelton:

We stand upon a hill-side which, almost yesterday, lay unreclaimed in its original wildness, and now already it begins to look like an embellished garden. Art has redeemed it from its rude estate, with an almost magic transformation. It has its winding walks, and will have its shady avenues. It is the most choice position in this valley, and its natural surface presents the charm of great variety. There is no stretch of landscape, in this neighborhood, around the abodes of the living, which can vie in beauty with this Paradise which you now dedicate, as the resting place of your beloved dead. And it is easy to predict what its aspect will be in a few years, when its remaining roughness shall have been assuaged; when every returning summer shall bring with it a richer shadow, and an added bloom;—when affection shall have beautified it in every nook, and watered its flowers with tears.

On this occasion, so fraught with solemn, yet not unpleasing suggestion, your thoughts will naturally recur to one whose hand was always open with a generous largess, and who devised a portion of his wealth for so benevolent an end. The heart is cold in death which lately throbbed with sympathy for the living, but if no chiselled shaft should rise in gratitude upon the height to bear the record of his virtues, this spot shall be his noblest monument. Peace to his ashes.

You, too, have done well, and have responded to a true sentiment in consecrating these acres to a purpose so hallowed. Here, indeed, the husbandman shall not put in the grain, nor shall the plough-boy carol, nor shall the waving corn be seen upon these hills. They shall receive the germs of a richer harvest in their bosom. This land shall not change hands. It is the inalienable heritage of the dead forever. It is their riches, their right, their possession;—theirs, with all its abundant variety of hill and dale, and rocks, and flowing water;—a little dust, but it is enough to satisfy the wants of many. It will be protected with a jealous care, and none will be so rude in instinct as to pluck a flower. The winds alone shall rifle the buds which grow in this garden, and the frosts of heaven shall nip their heads. The laws which truly guard it, are not the statutes inscribed on pillars; they are those which are graven deep in human nature: and the sentinels which keep watch over the tomb, are the most delicate sensibilities of the heart. Thus shall it descend as a burial place from generation to generation, till it shall become so rich and holy with beloved dust, that all the treasures upon earth would not wrest it from your possession. It is now offered, with all its boundaries which lie beneath these skies. The deeds will be presented by your commissioners.

“This fairest spot of hill and glade,
Where blooms the flower and waves the tree,
And silver streams delight the shade,
We consecrate, O Death, to Thee.”

An innate sentiment teaches us to have respect to the ashes of the departed. Thus when the spark of life is fled, the mourner stands long to gaze upon the casket which contained the jewel. Tenderly does he close the eyes which shall know no more “their wonted fires,” and imprints a last kiss on the lips which Death has sealed. He scatters flowers upon the silent bosom. He enrobes the form of the sleeper in fair and white habiliments, and at last in silence and in sorrow commits it to the purifying mould;—earth to earth,—ashes to ashes,—dust to dust. Nor does he rest contented when he has put it from his sight with the latest ceremonials which decency requires. He guards the sacred spot from each profane intrusion, and there he lingers long, if he has loved well.

We find a care for sepulture existing by the proof of earliest records.

“ABRAHAM stood up, and bowed himself to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth. And he communed with them, saying, ‘If it be your mind that I should bury my dead out of my sight, hear me, and intreat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar, that he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth he shall give it me, for a possession of a burial place among you.’”—Gen. 23, 7-9.

All people have exhibited the like trait of humanity. The dreamy Turk will leave the living crowd which is by the Bosphorus, and sit all day beside the graves of his kindred. The red man of the forest cherishes within him the same germ and attribute of a higher civilization: for as a hard fate drives the tribes still onward to the “Father of Waters,” the last thoughts of their hearts is directed towards the spots where rest the bones of their fathers.

He who does violence to such a sentiment, lacks even the refinement of the savage. It is the tendency of the age to disregard in some things that which the past held sacred, and to bear them down in a vast development of physical means and physical energy. That utility is short-sighted which shall ever trample on the dictates of a genuine decency. The pyramids still rise sublime, with no better base than the sands of the desert; but we must only look for ruins where Mammon builds his altars on a dead man's bones.

When we gaze upon this crowd, in connection with the object which has brought them here, and consider how large a part of it shall, at some time or other, be dissolved and mingle with this surrounding dust, it awakens a throb of feeling to which words cannot do justice. There is a poetry, it is true, connected with the cultivation of rural cemeteries; but I trust that it is something better than the sentimentalism which is without depth and vapid. For it is not the charm, which we may throw around these melancholy places, that can deprive death of its sting, or soften one shadow on the brow of the King of Terrors. It is not that the darkness of the grave can be mitigated, because the outside of it is beautified like a garden, nor that the sleeper will rest more softly on a bed which is perfumed with violets. It will be as cold and hard and dark beneath the clod, as if no garlands were above it. But the teachings of a holy faith can give a meaning to such adornments, and surround them with a tender solace, as the emblems of an immortal bloom.

It is because of the effect which they will have upon ourselves, and not for any good which they will do the silent sleepers. To be occupied in such pious rites, is to disengage us a little from the world's incrustations; to break asunder from the bonds of a prevailing selfishness; to pay that which is due to memory, and raise our eyes to the halo which invests the future. It is to gain strength for ourselves to look down fearlessly into the portals of the solemn tomb; to pay in thought, and study, and reflection, something of what we owe to the characters of the good and noble. We know that man but poorly, whom we have only known when he was living. The best may be said only to begin to live when the grave has closed upon them. I speak not this of their own destiny, but their major influence is given forth, only when they have ceased to be. It is the memory of their lives, more than their very lives, which can sink at last into our hearts, or fully exhibit their own. They are like those things which we might not have noticed, if they had not passed by. So, the river rolls on over an arid landscape, but when its chiefest volume has left the banks, then the vegetation springs up. It is from the past, the past, that we gather all our wisdom, and live a thousand years in a day. Thus we see that it springs from a refined motive, and that its tendency is salutary, when we seek to adorn a spot like this. It is to cherish the memory of those who have gone before us, and to show that love is not an empty name.

"How sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod."

In surveying this spot, and the uses for which it is designed, some might be disposed to inquire—what need of these extensive domains? At a little distance from where we are now standing, among these wild Green Mountains, there is a humble village in the valley. It is full of thrift and industry, yet when centuries shall have passed away,—from its location by nature, it will be only a village still.

This place shall be a city; the youngest here present may live to see how it shall outstrip the other, in the number of its inhabitants. There will be no such compact masses and ranks of men in yonder streets as shall be assembled here. Thus death gains upon life in all places, until life shall gain the final victory over death.

On the border of that village there is already a cemetery of the dead, but it would soon be overcrowded. It clamors already for a larger domain. Thus necessity itself has coincided with feeling in selecting a more ample and eligible place. There are many tender and touching associations, no doubt, connected with that spot, for its consecration is coeval with the settlement of this village. How many tears have fallen on its hitherto untroubled and quiet graves. There the child slumbers, and the young man, cut down in the nobility of his strength; there the blossoms of the almond tree have fallen; there the lovely daughter has been borne away, when bursting into the grace of womanhood, and when

Consumption, like a worm in the bud,
Preyed on her damask cheek."

There, truly, are deposited the richest treasures which you had on earth.

But if in love and tenderness you shall disturb those ashes, to bring them here, it will be only as when one shall rearrange a couch, that they may rest more sweetly and securely and quietly forever. Here you will come afterward to smooth their narrow bed, to recall their virtues, to renew your vows of constancy, and to say,—
"My Father! my Mother! my Brother!
my Sister! my Child! forget thee!—
NEVER."

Hither will you come with every changing season of the year to renew your pilgrimage. Hither, when the winter is past, when the rain is over and gone, when the flowers appear on the earth, and the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; hither, when the autumn dyes the foliage with mellow tints and hectic colors; and you will reflect upon it without a pang, and you yourselves will covet no better lot than at last to lie down with these sleepers.

Who ever thought these rocks and jagged hills, which Nature fashioned in her wildest moods, should so suggest the idea of quiet? No love of sordid wealth could have accomplished that which you have this day achieved by your affection. Well may yon Mount,* which towers sublime, remove the blue veil from before his eyes, to gaze on this assembled multitude. Here shall the rough rocks be transformed to snowy marble; but if no sculpture memorized the dead, these glorious hills would be a monument. Yon silver stream shall chant a constant requiem. What spot more silent and select than this among the gorgeous scenery of the mountains, where Summer paints her richest contrasts, and Winter strews her costliest jewelry around the realms of Death! There is an Echo here which mocks the ear, but wakes up sympathies within the heart. The haunting voices and the rich harmonic chords, which just went up into the open sky, returned in undulations, fainter still to mortal sense, but never obsolete. Even now comes stealing back the soul of wild flowers on the soft, Septembral breeze. It is Death alone which dies. This is the Christian's solace. This shall cheer the mourning crowds which wind through yonder gateway, when they come to lay beneath the turf the loved and lost. All who are in the grave shall come forth, for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on IMMORTALITY.

* Camel's Hump.

Presentation of the title deeds by H. H. Reed, Esq., in behalf of the commissioners.

Dedication.—By Rev. Dr. Lord.

SIR: We receive these Title Deeds as representing and describing these beautiful and extensive grounds, which have been selected with so much taste, and enclosed and arranged with so great propriety and beauty, for the purpose of a burial place for our dead. The munificent provision of one of our citizens, together with the unusual and noble liberality of the town, in furnishing the large means to procure and embellish such a spot as this, have been equalled only by the energy, the economy and discretion with which you have applied them. In reaching the close of your labors, you have far exceeded our anticipations; and now present to us a lot, in itself, and in all its arrangements, perfectly adapted to the use for which it was designed, and most fit to be consecrated forever to the purpose of christian sepulture.

It has ever been the practice, both of humanity and of religion, to commemorate the dead by material monuments, and to regard the spot, which furnished a resting place for their bodies, as peculiarly sacred. The enclosures wherein the spirit of love and mourning has perpetuated, by the planted flower, by the rude cross, by the simple stone, by the marble shaft, or by the magnificent massive monument, some traces of the affection of children, of parents and of friends, and which recall the images of youth and beauty, of wisdom and goodness, and relate their worth and varied excellence; are ever hallowed in the minds of men. We do, then, give utterance to the common sentiments of human nature, when we comply with your request, and formally consecrate and set apart, to its designed and appropriate uses, this Cemetery.

We do now, therefore, dedicate all this ground, herein described, stretching from its rocky battlements on the east to its flinty ramparts on the west; from its lofty northern boundary, along down its sloping sides; with its central mounds, its alluvial heart, and its interval reaching near to the banks of the beautiful river that flows at its base; with all its trees and rocks, its valleys and hills, its springs and ravines; with all its arranged and still unfinished lots; to be a perpetual possession unto us and to our children, as a place where we may piously bury our dead, and rear over their ashes the symbols of our affection, and the mementoes of their worth. We dedicate it, as a place of reverent and mournful, yet sweet recollections, of the departed; of high and solemn contemplation upon the uncertainty of human life and its certain destiny; of serious purposes of holy living and preparation for death; of cheerful and glorious anticipations of that time when the graves shall be opened, and the dead, both small and great, shall come forth to the promised resurrection, and renew, amid scenes far brighter than these, the holy affections and the pious friendships of their primeval abode. And while we consecrate it to the dead, we commit it also to the generous care of the living; with the hope, that it may be preserved in its present loveliness; with the prayer, that whenever its turf may be broken, it shall be but to receive to its keeping the body of one who believes in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, as the Resurrection and the Life.

Hymn—By Charles G. Eastman.

This fairest spot of hill and glade,
Where blooms the flower and waves the tree,
And silver streams delight the shade,
We consecrate, O Death, to thee.

Here all the months the year may know
Shall watch this "Elen of the Dead,"
To wreath with flowers or crown with snow
The dreamless sleeper's narrow bed.

And when above its graves we kneel,
Resigning to the mouldering urn
The friends whose silent hearts shall feel
No balmy summer's glad return;

Each marble shaft our hands may rear,
To mark where dust to dust is given,
Shall lift its chiselled column, here,
To point our tearful eyes to Heaven.

Benediction—By Rev. F. D. Hemmenway.

Thus was this most beautiful inclosure dedicated to Montpelier's dead, just 27 years ago this fall. The number of interments to date, Dec. 24, 1881, is 999, Simeon Lyman, a merchant, buried Oct. 3, 1855, aged 45 years, being the first.

A thousand times the turf has already been broken in Green Mount to receive the household props of this people, the treasures of its happy homes. We see on this spot how death takes toll. How many sleep around the monument of the beneficent Keith, upon every side, who assisted in the beautiful consecration just portrayed: Constant W. Storrs, among the first, and all the commissioners, but one, who selected and prepared the grounds are here. The Pastor who offered the first prayer on this spot—by the side of his little Bessie. The Poet who wrote its hymn of beauty, the Poet of this cemetery still. Shelton of the lovely address, every paragraph like a cluster of precious stones, sleeps, also—in the bosom of the neighboring State upon the West.

Here are the graves of Thompson, Eastman, Lord, Samuel Goss, Daniel Baldwin, Charles Reed, Samuel Wells and a few others whose names are identified with our early acquaintance at Montpelier. Most of those whose biographies are written in this book rest here; even some buried in old Elm Street Cemetery with their old sexton, have been brought up and re-interred here; whose histories have been so studied, though otherwise unknown, the names on the headstones look like old friends. It is but our second visit, and yet we cannot feel quite like a stranger here. What Vermonter could by Thompson's grave? by his grave as yet without monument or stone! the author of the Green Mountain Boys has built himself his own monument more enduring than of marble—"Pete Jones" is his monument more resonant than brass; "May Martin," a fairer headstone than another could raise. It is not doubted this grave will yet have the due commemorative stone. Only, we miss it here now—"D. P. Thompson" was so well known and endeared to the people of the State; in Montpelier so long-time and honorable a resident—her pleasant historian. An early friend to our Gazetteer; he was first engaged to write for it the chapters of Montpelier History; a few months before his death finding he would not be able, wrote "take therefore, anything I have ever written for Montpelier, or for Washington County, or for the State, whether printed or in manuscript, the whole or in part, as you would if it were your own, for I shall not be able to do as I had intended; and I would name to you the Hon. E. P. Walton, as the man the best qualified to aid you and to write the history of Montpelier." Having been so successful in the history of Montpelier, nearing its close, pleasant to-day is the remembrance of his intention—the thoughtful kindness of his last letter; and we shall be very happy if we may see, as we may if contributed by his friends, his portrait stand with his biography in this County volume, for which he would, no doubt, have written so much and so well, had he lived to this day; and where it may stand in the one town which has a prior claim, his own beloved Berlin, adjoining Montpelier on the pleasant south, where was his father's old farm, where he was born, just over the river.

A handsome monumental pile!—worthy the Sleeper below. A name in the marble, by author, man or woman, never forgotten—the first literary benefactor—the handsome and the gracious patron, who pruned till they gleamed almost like fresh poems, and sent his beautiful contributions with words of confidence to your first book in press, and when it came gave it notice through his newspaper at the capital, and sold many copies in his old book-store on State Street, and advised and contributed to its successor. The sight of this beautiful tomb swells our heart full;—glad for as proud of his fame, —talented, bland, witty, generous Eastman; the vigor, point, beauty and mazy grace of his poetry all seem concentrated and perpetuated here.

A granite stone; the tenant here that bluff, iron-framed, but golden-hearted old made President of the Society the same day—so whole and genially, it wiped away in one moment, gracefully, all the exclusiveness of the past. For its being an honor received in Montpelier, pardon, the personal relation; as Montpelier is one of the few towns of the State which have given us more roses than thorns, let us toy with one.

The resting-place of one of the patriarchs of the village. On one of the sultriest days of a sultry summer—the oppressive noon—winding out from the street of the Capital, down by the river—a vein of delicious coolness by the roadside—a gentle south breath from over the river, brushing softly aside the heated atmosphere that beat down from above—the funeral of the man who had lived the most years in Montpelier came to Green Mount, gradually ascending the hill-side to the shade of trees into which the carriages wound and stood while the venerable old man was laid in the evergreen-lined grave. The coffin resting deep down on the mosses at the bottom, the breath of the mourners and of all the crowd stilled to listen to the service; all hearts touched to sympathy with the cool, sweet pulse of nature here, we thought, and it seemed the whole crowd thought with us, more beautiful is the garden of the dead than the home of the living; and a place not to lose its attractions, how many will follow, drawn on, attracted while they know not how. Where the old man and the young man lie down together, beautiful encampment-ground!—to-day, and what may it be a hundred years from to-day? The descendants of the people of Montpelier no doubt may in a hundred years make this place more beautiful than now. He who may then come up to these grounds may find the entrance, upon the south by the river, the same as now, but an inclosure extended northward and eastward and westward—a city of the departed instead of a garden; walls in inscriptions, ornamentations, mossings. The ponderous gate lettered on the iron in bronze “WHERE THE WEARY ARE AT REST.” Within, near the gate where the mourners go by a colossal cross from the granite of our mountains, in raised letters upon the body—“JESUS CHRIST DIED FOR ALL.” All the streets longer—more streets, more graves in all the streets, and over every walk and grave, the beauty of age in nature. Nature never loses in beauty;—more leaves, more flowers, more tints, more mosses, richer painted rocks. How beautiful the rocks grow old; softened, garnitured with moss, vine and flower, more and more every lapsing year. Man lives for a hundred years, nature for a hundred hundred. How beautiful in marble, too, its visitor may find this city, one hundred years more past.

And on the boldest cliff
Of these expanded grounds, swelling mountainward—
If we may look through the haze of future years—
What statue, grander than living man,
Stands, counting the multitude, slumbering
So long at his feet—trumpet in hand,
Waiting to summon up these long sleepers?

I note the change, as the years ran on
And art with the people grew, how the crevices
In this hillside showed, until this Eden
Of the dear departed was so fair and famed,
The traveller from over the seas called
It ‘The Art Garden of the Departed’
Of this land; in every rural recess,
Scripture history was so pnt in marble:
So fair upon the hills and mounds and plains,
Within the dales and rocks and caves and woods
And lawns, beside the river and the rills—
Beseeming the cemeteries of the dead
In the capital of a State where the rocks
Are marble—the statues of the native sculptors:

Fair as the white rose growing by the grave,
The Ruler's daughter, standing by her couch,
Just risen—the dear Master of Life,
Holding the little daisy by the hand,
Over whose face new breath and beauty breaking.

Eastward—“In the rocky battlements,” that eave
By tall trees, half-embowered, Lazarus statue,
Or figure, grave-swathed, coming forth—there!

Where the sun touches first the grave,
All shrubs and flowers of fragraney crowding
To deplet that garden of the resurrection—
Jesus Christ and Magdalene standing within.

The marble shaft, the massive monument,
The simple stone, shrubby so surrounding,—tree
And flower and vine adorning,—each did seem,
As the eye gathered it in, more beautiful:
The chiseled column—the planted flower,
Rivalled by the pure lilies on the stone,—
The rose in the foliated marble:
The oldest stone, most mossed, most beautiful;
As the ancient rocky rampart, the brown moss
Clinging to, the golden moss, th' gray wand-moss
In every crumbling fissure, scarlet tipped.

Most fair country: for all the people thought
Affection could not make too fair the Eden
Of their Dead—deposited in hope.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF LIVING PERSONS.

TIMOTHY PARKER REDFIELD,

(BY B. F. FIFIELD, ESQ.)

the son of Dr. Peleg and Hannah (Parker) Redfield, was born at Coventry, Nov. 3, 1812. The father was born of sturdy English stock at Killingworth, Conn., the grandson of Capt. Peleg Redfield, who bravely fought through the revolutionary war. The mother was the daughter of Isaac and Bridget (Fletcher) Parker, born at Westford, Mass., in Nov., 1785, and married at Weathersfield, Vt., in March, 1803. They removed to Coventry, Vt., with two children, in the fall of 1807, and raised a family of 6 sons and 6 daughters, amid the perils and hardships of frontier life. [See Coventry, Vol. II, this work.] The subject of this sketch had the usual experience of Vermont boys born and brought up on a farm, but here were laid the rudiments of that industry, self-reliance, and independence, which have so much distinguished him and which is peculiar to the stock. At Dartmouth College he ranked among the first of his class, was elected a member of the Phi Beta Kappa Society, and graduated with high honors in the class of 1836. He immediately commenced the study of the law in the office of his brother, the Hon. Isaac F. Redfield, was admitted to the bar in Orleans county in 1838, began the practice of his profession at Irasburgh, and continued it there until his removal to Montpelier in 1848. He was senator from Orleans county in 1848. He practiced his profession at Montpelier from 1848 to 1870, when he was elected Judge of the Supreme Court, and has received successive elections from that time to the present, 1881. He was married to Helen W. Grannis of Stanstead, Province of Quebec, Feb. 6, 1840, by which marriage he had 4 children, three of whom sleep in Green Mount Cemetery at Montpelier, and the only surviving child, Alice, the wife of Andrew J. Phillips, now resides at St. Louis, Mo.

While in the practice of his profession at Montpelier, he became widely known through the State as one of the most reliable, painstaking and thoroughly well-read lawyers in the profession. From 1856, to the time of his elevation to the bench he was a constant attendant upon the courts in Orleans, Caledonia and Washington counties, and it is no disparagement to others to say that he had no superiors either in the knowledge of the law, or its practical adaptation to the complicated affairs of life. His sturdy independence, elevated character and fine legal attainments, commanded respect and admiration from all who knew him, and a man who was once his client was always his client.

In 1870, a vacancy occurred on the supreme court bench. Mr. Redfield had always been a democrat in politics, but his fitness for the position was so generally acknowledged that he was elected to the place by a legislature overwhelmingly republican, and against numerous competitors. His dignified judicial bearing and acknowledged impartiality made him at once a general favorite with the public, the bar and his associates. His fame may and will justly rest upon his judicial life.

His brother, Isaac F. Redfield, occupied a seat upon the bench of Vermont for 25 years, and he left it in 1860 only to extend his fame and establish it as one of the foremost jurists of the age, whether English or American.

In each of the brothers is found in like degree that quality of all others the most rare, the judicial temperament, and in each is also found the intellectual grasp on the one hand and fine sense of justice on the other hand which is so essential to the just administration of the law.

Judge Redfield is an excellent scholar, and while his bearing is reserved and dignified, such as becomes his position, yet in social life he is one of the most charming of companions. His reminiscences of the old bar and his fund of anecdotes are the delight of those who enjoy his friendship, and will be long remembered by those who come after him. He is a member of the Episcopal church and a devoted christian, not only in profession but also in practice.

Geo. P. Kenfield

In short, Judge Redfield is a model in all that constitutes a conscientious, christian gentleman, and an able, upright, impartial judge.

To speak thus of his record is but the "just meed of praise to acknowledged worth," and "to keep the memory of such men green is but to strengthen and stimulate public virtue."

HON. ELIAKIM PERSONS WALTON.

Eliakim Persons Walton was born in Montpelier, Feb. 17, 1812, and was the first-born son of the late Gen. Ezekiel Parker Walton and Prussia Persons. On the Walton side the genealogy goes back with almost absolute certainty, through Ezekiel P.'s father, who was the late Geo. Walton, of Peacham, born at New Market, N. H., in 1762, and married Mary Parker, of New Hampshire, to George Walton, a Quaker born in England, in whose house at Newcastle, N. H., in June, 1682, occurred the best authenticated case of witchcraft which has ever been recorded in New England. See Mather's Magnalia Christi Americana, edition of 1820, vol. 2, p. 393, and Brewster's Rambles about Portsmouth, second series, pp. 343-354. On the Persons side, all that can be asserted is that Eliakim Davis Persons was a native of Long Island, and his wife, Rebecca Dodge, was of Massachusetts, probably Northfield, who had numerous relatives, (one of them intermarried with a Houghton, uncle of the late Mrs. Samuel Prentiss, of Montpelier,) residing near the south-eastern line of Vermont. Her father and two of her brothers, Asa and John, settled in Barre, Vt., and a third, Daniel, in Northern Vermont. They have numerous descendants at this day in Eastern and Western Vermont, and in the Western States. It was and is a race of sterling virtues. The particular subject of this notice was educated first by his mother in letters and reading the notes of music; second, by an occasional attendance at the district school, in which he was specially noted for his habit of running away on every possible occasion; third, by many terms in Washington County Grammar School, in which he was fitted for college by one of the best principals that school ever had, the late Jonathan C. Southmayd. But the young E. P. was not permitted to go to college, and thereupon entered the law office of Samuel and Samuel B. Prentiss, when Judge Prentiss was in the United States Senate. Here he obtained the elements of the law, and moreover an insight into national politics, through the books and documents received by Judge Prentiss as senator. But largely he was educated in his father's printing office, and an excellent school every printing office is to any boy or girl who has obtained the elements of an English education, and will improve the opportunities of the office. From the time the lad was "knee-high to a toad," and had to stand in a chair to get up to the "case," this boy was put into the office, and kept there in vacations from schools. Another very useful school was the old Montpelier Lyceum, with its written essays and extemporaneous debates. In 1826-'7 he spent a year in Essex, N. Y., and there edited and printed his first newspaper, a single issue of the Essex County Republican. The editors and publishers were away, and had suspended publication for a week; but the young and ardent politician could not have it so. Without any authority from his masters, he got up a paper full of editorial matter—part of it written and part of it composed at the case—and took proof-sheets. The question, Shall it be printed? was a doubtful one. The proof-sheets were thereupon submitted to the late Gen. Henry H. Ross, of Essex, then a member of Congress, and a zealous Adams man. Bringing back the proof-sheets, the General came with his face beaming with smiles, put both hands on the boy's shoulders, and said, "Print it, boy! print it!" From that moment, though preferring the law, the business of printer and editor seemed to have been ordained for him. On becoming of age, in 1833, he became a partner with his father in the publication of the Vermont Watchman and State Gazette. Gen. Walton wrote occasionally for that paper, but other branches of a very extensive business demanded his attention, and the newspaper and printing department were in the charge of E. P. Walton, Jr., as his signature commonly was during the life of his father, although not correct except when the initials of it were given. In 1853, the paper, then the Vermont Watchman and State Journal, came into his possession exclusively, and so continued until the sale to the Messrs. Poland, in 1868.

During all this period the editorship of Walton's Vermont Register was in his charge, as it still is in all except the Business Directory. The Vermont Capitol, 1857, consisted mainly of his reports; volume two of the collections of the Vermont Historical Society was edited by him; and also the eight volumes of the Records of the Governor and Council, together with documents touching the early history of the State. Although an active and zealous politician from his youth, and helping many men to high offices, he never sought offices for himself. Nevertheless in 1853 he was elected representative of Montpelier; and in 1856, greatly to his surprise, he was called upon by the late Senator Foot, and another member of the Vermont delegation still living, to become a candidate for Congress in the first congressional district, on the grounds that a change was absolutely necessary, and that the member then to be elected, according to the usual courtesy in such cases, should come from Washington County. Under the very delicate circumstances of the case, Mr. Walton was unwilling to be a candidate, and urged the late Ferrand F. Merrill to stand in his stead. Mr. Merrill refused, and ultimately Mr. Walton was nominated and received three elections, after which he declined further service. In 1870 he was the delegate of Montpelier in the Constitutional Convention; and he was also senator for Washington County, 1874 until 1878. The honorary degree of Master of Arts has been conferred upon Mr. Walton by the University of Vermont, and also by Middlebury College. He has been president of the Publishers' and Editors' Association of Vermont from its organization until 1881, and also of the Vermont Historical Society since the Rev. Dr. Lord retired. Mr. Walton married, June 6, 1836, Sarah Sophia, second daughter of the late Hon. Joseph Howes, of Montpelier, who died Sept. 3, 1880.

For a list of Mr. Walton's publications, see ante, BIBLIOGRAPHY OF MONTPELIER.

In addition to those referred to there are the following printed papers by Mr. Walton:

Oration delivered at Northfield, July 4, 1837, and printed in the Watchman and Journal of July 24, by request of Charles Paine, chairman of the committee of arrangements.

Remarks on the death of Charles Paine, delivered at Northfield, July 29, 1853. Printed in the Watchman and Journal of Aug. 4, and also in pamphlet form.

Speech delivered on the battle-field at Hubbardton, July 7, 1859, on the inauguration of the battle monument. Printed in the Watchman and Journal as an editorial, and reprinted in pamphlet form at Rutland.

Address on Hon. Nathaniel Chipman, delivered on the unveiling of his monument at Tinmouth, Oct. 2, 1873. Printed in some of the Rutland, Burlington and Montpelier newspapers.

Letter to Hon. Geo. F. Edmunds, Jan. 1872, with elaborate and carefully prepared tables on the apportionment of members of Congress on the census of 1870. Printed by order of the United States Senate.

The apportionment by the old rule under the census of 1860 gave Vermont two members of the House instead of three. Mr. Walton had no personal interest in the matter, as his last term in Congress was covered by the old apportionment; but he had a deep interest for his native State, which he dearly loved and had long tried to serve. Both houses had passed a bill reducing Vermont to two members, when Mr. Walton carefully examined the subject, and demonstrated that the bill did not fairly observe the national constitution and was unjust to eight states. He then explained the matter to Senator Colman, and under his lead the Senate passed a supplementary bill, and the result was that Vermont and the other seven states got the additional member. Under the census of 1870, precisely the same process was repeated. Mr. Walton again interfered, and Senators Edmunds of Vermont and Thurman of Ohio carried an amendment to the House bill, which saved the suffering states. It is but justice to say that Vermont is very largely indebted to Mr. Walton for saving her third member of Congress for twenty years.

HOMER WALLACE HEATON,

a member of the Washington County Bar, and now, and since 1832, a resident of Montpelier, was born in the adjoining town of Berlin, Aug. 25, 1811. His parents were Dr. Gershom Heaton and Polly Wallace, daughter of Matthew Wallace, one of the early settlers of Berlin.

Mr. Heaton's educational advantages were the common school, one year at the St. Lawrence Academy of Potsdam, N. Y., and two years at the Washington County Grammar School at Montpelier, of which J. C. Southmayd was the excellent principal.

In Aug. 1832, Mr. Heaton commenced the study of the law with Col. Jonathan P. Miller and Nicholas Baylies, Jr., of Montpelier, and was admitted to the bar of the Washington County Court, at the Nov. Term, 1835, when he commenced practice in company with Colonel Miller, and so continued until 1839, when from failing health Colonel Miller retired. In Sept. 1839, Mr. Heaton and Charles Reed entered into partnership for the practice of the law, as Heaton & Reed, which was continued until the death of Mr. Reed, Mar. 7, 1873. (See plate, p. 356.)

Mr. Heaton was the treasurer of the Vt. Mutual Fire Insurance Company for 2 years—1837 and 1838; and was state's attorney for Washington County 4 years—was elected by the Legislature at the October sessions, 1839 and 1841, and the annual Sept. elections in 1860 and 1861. Upon the retirement of Joshua Y. Vail, a long time county clerk, the office was tendered Mr. Heaton by Judge Isaac F. Redfield and the county Judges, which was declined.

July 1, 1841, Mr. Heaton married Miss Harriet Stearns, daughter of John Stearns, of Boston, Mass. She died April 26, 1859, at the age of 42 years. Of this marriage three sons are now living, Charles H., James S., and Homer W.

Mr. Heaton was the representative of the original town of Montpelier in the Legislature, at the October session, 1848, when the town was divided, and the towns of Montpelier and East Montpelier created. At that session Mr. Heaton was the candidate of the Democratic party for Speaker; there being three parties—the Whig, Democratic and Free Soil—and neither in a majority: there resulted a dead lock, which continued through four days' session, when the Whig candidate was elected on the 46th ballot.

At this session the National Life Ins. Co. was chartered. The bill for that purpose being referred to a select committee of three members—Mr. Heaton being one—was reported favorably and passed. Mr. Heaton was one of the directors of this company and a member of its finance committee for several years. He, at the same session, introduced a bill for the incorporation of the Vermont Bank, which was passed, and Mr. Heaton was one of its directors during its existence as a State Bank, and for 2 years its president.

Since the organization of the Montpelier Savings Bank & Trust Company in 1871, Mr. Heaton has been one of its trustees and the president.

In politics, he has always been a Democrat, having cast his first presidential vote for Andrew Jackson at his second election.

Mr. Heaton was the Democratic candidate for governor at the annual election in 1869, and the first biennial election in 1870. He was the Democratic candidate for member of Congress from the first District at the elections in 1872 and 1874. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention at Baltimore in 1872, when Horace Greeley was nominated for President. He has also been a candidate of his party for Presidential Elector.

JAMES ROBBINS LANGDON,

third son of Col. James H. and Nabby Robbins Langdon, born Oct. 3, 1813, was educated in Washington County Grammar School, and then from choice entered his father's grist-mill, and applied himself to learn the miller's trade and the way to manage the business of a flouring-mill. This was in fact the turning point in his business life, but his father did not approve, and tempted him to leave the mill by offering to furnish capital and share the profits with his son in a promising speculation. At 15, then, the lad started out to scour New England and New York, and purchase Spanish coin, and sell it in Canada at a moderate profit. Persisting in this business until Spanish coin became scarce, he retired with a net profit of $3,400, which was divided between father and son. Spending a short time at Derby Line as a clerk, he, at 17, busied himself in settling his father's estate, and, after receiving his patrimony, invested part of it in a store at Greensboro; but the store and goods were soon burned, and then he entered upon his long and very successful career as flour merchant and manufacturer, in which, by doing an immense business at a small profit, he accumulated a very large fortune for a country merchant. Indeed, it is certain that no merchant of Montpelier has ever handled property to so great an amount as he has done, or with such uniform success. His rule has been to keep accurate accounts of every branch of his business, and to understand it all thoroughly, even to the smallest detail. Hence, by his sagacity and this perfect knowledge, success was unavoidable. But the profits of this large and successful business figure only as a part of his present fortune. Mr. Langdon has ever been a sagacious, prudent and fortunate financier. The profits of mercantile business have been invested in the stock of sound banks, not one of which ever failed or proved unfortunate, and in United States bonds. At 20 he was elected a director in the old Bank of Montpelier, and for 48 years he has been director, and for many years president, in three successive banks in Montpelier.

In another field, however, Mr. Langdon has rendered, and is still rendering, very important services: in the Vermont Central Railroad, and the succeeding Central Vermont Railroad. In preceding pages, 304-'5, Mr. Langdon's work for the Central road has been noted, but it is to be added that he was a director for the first 2 years. In 1873, he entered the Central Vermont road, and has been made vice president and chairman of the finance committee. In the last position he assumed a responsibility which few private citizens are ever called to; but nobody doubts his ability and his will to discharge it wisely and well.

Although Mr. Langdon has opinions of his own on the current political questions of the day, he has never put himself forward as a politician, or a candidate for office. There was, however, an unwise and long-continued division among the Republicans of the town in 1868, which was, by common consent, settled by the election of Mr. Langdon as representative, and he was re-elected in 1869, doing good service, especially in financial matters.

In early life Mr. Langdon was by an accident disabled sufficiently to discourage most men from personal labors; but he has been content to do, patiently and persistently, greater work than most thoroughly endowed men, physically, are able to accomplish.

Mr. Langdon has two children: Lucy, formerly Mrs. Mansfield, of Nyack, N. Y., and now the wife of Mr. Schroeder, of Brooklyn, N. Y., first superintendent of the Astor Library; and Elizabeth W. The latter received a shock some years ago, which has ever since made her an object of the tenderest solicitude and care, and nobly is her father doing his part. E. P. W.

HON. NICHOLAS BAYLIES resided here 25 years, 1810-1835, see, also, page 314, when he removed from Montpelier. We regret that we have no further notice of the Judge for these pages.

JOSEPH ADDISON WING, son of Josiah and Polly (Gray) Wing, was born in the part of this town now known as East Montpelier, Dec. 26, 1810. He opened a law office one year before his admission to the bar, May 13, 1835, in Plainfield, this County, where he remained until June, 1838, when he moved to Montpelier village, where he has lived ever since. He married, Jan. 1, 1840, Samantha E. Webster, of Cabot, daughter of Jesse Webster, of that town. Mr. Wing has two sons, Geo. W., the eldest, a practicing attorney in the same office with himself on State street, and John G., his youngest son, also a lawyer in his office, and four daughters, Florence A., Annette M., Alice M. and Elizabeth B. Mr. Wing has for many years handled the pen, writing for the newspapers, paying to incidents and occasions of public interest the tribute of his verse, and in 1878, brought out a small 12 mo. vol. of 252 pp., printed in this village, of no little interest to the many friends to whom it was thus presented.

A few extracts from Mr. Wing's book, which is the second volume of poems published by a native of the town :

"Go forth my little book, devoid of pride;

Go like the brooks that through the valleys glide,
And greener make the verdure by their side;
Go like the dew that silently doth fall
When o'er the earth night spreads her sable pall;
Go you, and zealously mankind entice
To seek for virtue and to flee from vice."

EXTRACTS FROM "PLUCK."

(Without pluck.)

"See yonder man with downcast look pass by,
Mark you his face—no fire is in his eye;
His coat is soedy, and his hat is old,
His pockets empty of both bills and gold,
Silent he passes through the busy throng;
No friend doth cheer him as he goes along,
No one is there that old man's hand to clasp
And warm his heart with friendship's kindly grasp Onward, unnoticed, to his cot he goes,
Where from the world he burles all his woes;
There will he dwell unnoted and unknown
Till death's cold hand shall claim him as his own."

(With pluck.)

"Next view the great Napoleon,
When in its zenith glowed his sun;
Napoleon wore as sweet a smile
When banished to fair Elba's isle,
As when in Russia's northern sky
He saw his eagles proudly fly."

WHAT SHALL WE DO ?

What shall I do? what shall I do?
'Tis truth I can't decide,
So many smiling maids I view,
Which I shall make my bride.

I can't decide, I can't decide—
There's Ann, so gay and witty,
And lovely Sue, the village pride,
And Mary, young and pretty.

There's blooming Helen, Fan, and Prue,
With fairy forms and features,
And Lydla, Betsey, Esther too,
All lovely, charming creatures.

I can't decide, I can't decide,
'Mid eyes of every hue,
From Melvill's of the glistening black
To Kate's of melting blue.

A WAIL.

A wall is on the southern air,
A wall across the sea;
A rebel wall the breezes bear,
A wall of woe and fell despair
Wherever traitors be

A wall of fear, of want and pain,
A wall of grief and care;
It sweeps along each Southern plain,
'Tis heard from o'er the stormy main
From every traitor there.

It comes from Georgia's fertile land,
Where her broad rivers flow,
Where Sherman's gallant vet'ran band
Before Savannah made a stand
And humbled the proud foe.

'Tis heard from Charleston's burning halls,
Which late the world defied,
And from Columbia's blackened walls,
Where Sherman's host the foe appals
And spreads destruction wide.

It comes from Carolina's shore
As mourners at the grave;
The pride of Wilmington is o'er
The stripes and stars forevermore
Above her towers shall wave.

It comes from Richmond's crowded street,
Where Dav's regins in pride;
Where want and woe you constant meet,
And starving women oft entreat
With bread to be supplied.

But louder still that wall shall be
That floats along the air,
Until the starry flag you see
Float o'er a land from slavery free
And find no traitors there.

April 2, 1865.

Obit:—MRS. SARAH ELIZABETH BANCROFT, Mar.
16, 1859.

Upon her silent tomb
The sweetest flowers shall bloom
Of early spring;
The willow's branch shall wave,
And birds around her grave
Their matins sing.

CHARLES G. EASTMAN.

WRITTEN AT HIS GRAVE IN GREEN MOUNT CEMETERY, MONTPELIER, VT., 1860.

There is a void in bower and hall
And grief obscures the day,
A loved one from the drear small
Hath passed from earth away.

Death garnered here no whitened sheaf
Ripe for the sickle keen,
Be garnered here no bud or leaf
From Spring's fair fields so green.

A noble oak lies prostrate now,
It fell in all its pride;
Its trunk was sound and green each bough,
But still, alas! it died.

Ah, Eastman, ever kind and true,
Lies buried 'neath this sod;
His soul, we trust, in garments new
Has flown to meet his God.

He had not reached the noon of life,
His sun knew no decline;
His path of life was rendered gay
By fairest flower and vine.

His lyre, that late the soul could move
To smiles and tears at will
And warp the heart to faith and love,
Is tuneless now and still.

Now here within this sacred ground
He rests in death's cold sleep,
And often on this humble mound
His wife and children weep.

Bring flowers upon his grave to place,
And set the trees around;
He loved the flowers in all their grace—
He chose this sacred ground.

Here let him rest where first the sun
Its morning beams illumine,
And when its glorious race is run
Last shines on Eastman's tomb.

NELSON A. CHASE

was born in Petersham, Mass., Feb. 18, 1802, and brought to Calais, Vt., in 1804. Dec. 13, 1827, he married Clarissa, daughter of Gideon Hicks, Esq., town clerk of Calais almost time out of mind. Mr. Chase was town clerk of Calais 16 years, town representative 2 years, and delegate to two Constitutional Conventions. He removed to Montpelier in 1836, and has resided here since, except Sept. 1841 to Sept. 1865, when he was again in Calais. He has been town clerk of Montpelier 3 years, Judge of Probate 2 years, Register of Probate 20 years, County Commissioner 3 years, and is widely known as a land-surveyor. He is highly esteemed for his capability and honesty.

HON. RODERICK RICHARDSON

(BY HON. T. P. REDFIELD.)

Was born at Stafford, Conn., Aug. 7, 1807. He was the second son of Roderick and Anna (Davis) Richardson; came to Waitsfield, Vt., with his parents, when 2 years old. When a boy he went into mercantile business with his father, and when 17 years of age, went to Boston, to do the routine duties of a country merchant. It was so well done, that he continued to do all that important and responsible business while thus connected with his father. When of full age, he went into business for himself, and continued in general and extensive business at Waitsfield until he removed to Montpelier in 1855. While at Waitsfield, he was elected for 5 successive years representative for said town in the legislature of the State, and for 4 years senator for the County; also associate judge of the County Court for one term, and declined a re-election. In all these various and responsible public trusts he was vigilant, influential and respected. While in the legislature, he was efficient in procuring the charter of the Vermont Bank at Montpelier; was a director of the bank from its organization; was the chosen agent of the bank to procure the re-organization, under the National Bank System; was president of said bank for several years. Thus while at Waitsfield, he became largely interested in the public affairs of the County and the State, and the local public interests of Montpelier, and had the full confidence of his associates. After he came to Montpelier, his interest in all that concerned the public weal, not only continued, but was enlarged. Schools at Montpelier had become neglected, and all interest in them, seemingly, supplanted by other matters that engrossed public attention. Judge Richardson, with his accustomed energy, entered upon the plan of re-organizing the schools in Montpelier, and devoted more than 2 years of gratuitous, hard labor to the building of the new school-house for the graded school. And as a consequence of the effort and interest enlisted at that time, the whole school system at Montpelier has become revolutionized, and educational interests have become cardinal.

He was a member of the Episcopal church, and was active and efficient in all the affairs of the diocese. He was three times elected from this diocese delegate to the National Triennial Conventions in New York city and Philadelphia, and one of the standing committee continuously until his removal to Boston. By his liberality, and two years of gratuitous personal labor, Christ church, Montpelier, was built. The obstacles in his way were many, and to the ordinary man, formidable; but his zeal did not flag until the capstone of the spire, in solid granite, had crowned his labor.

He was married to Harriet E. Taylor, Feb. 28, 1839. They had 4 sons; 3 of whom survive, are married, and in business. Mrs. Richardson still survives, and, in vigorous health, graces their hospitable mansion at Newton Highlands, Mass.

The subject of this sketch descended from vigorous Puritan stock. His ancestor, Amos Richardson, was resident and householder on Washington street, Boston, just north of the Old South Church, in 1640; removed to Stonington, Conn., in 1666, and was there elected representative to the General Court, and was the agent of Gov. Winthrop for New England. He will be remembered, and valued, not for any brilliant speech he has made, or for any beautiful scrap of poetry he has written; but as a man of affairs, of keen perception, and just discrimination, and of judgment so well balanced, and of such unfaltering energy of character, that in whatever he engaged, he enlisted his whole soul, and overcame all impediment; nor could subtlety delude or deceive him. In whatever undertaking, he is, therefore, necessarily, successful. And it will justly be said of him, that the world is better that he has lived; and for that he will be remembered.

The graded school system for which Mr. Richardson labored so well has been very successful in this place; combined with the old Washington County Grammar School, they take the children from the a b c up to prepared for college; on the tax of the grand list, every citizen's boy or girl may have a solid education.

Mr. Walton gives the first schoolhouse, on page 262,—a log-house, the second, a year or two after, 1793 or '4, a frame-house was "on the road to the hills on the Branch Falls, near the spot now occupied by the old burying-ground. The school in this house was taught by Abel Knapp, afterwards Judge Knapp of Berlin. In a few years this house was burned, and another was built near where the Methodist chapel now stands."—(Thompson, 1860.)

The act of the incorporation of the Washington County Grammar School was procured by the Hon. David Wing, Jr. Mr. Thompson says in 1800, (a print mistake). Mr. Walton's date, page 290, is correct. The first board of trustees, when incorporated, were Col. Jacob Davis, Hon. Charles Bulkeley, David Wing, Jerahmel B. Wheeler and Thomas West, Jr. "In 1800-1-2, the school districts in town received a remodelling," and were then ten in number, four of which were formed into the present Union and Graded School, 1858-9, leaving 6 districts.

The number of scholars in town in 1802, was about 400—the present number 1882, about — was born at Haverhill, N. H., June 17, 1814, son of Gov. John Page and Hannah Merrill Page. Receiving an education at Haverhill, he at 15 became clerk in a dry goods store, and at 17 engaged in a wholesale dry goods store in Portland, Me., and was speedily put in charge of the counting-room, and made confidential and financial clerk. In 1832, in his 19th year, he accepted a partnership in a well established mercantile firm in Haverhill, N. H. In the spring of 1837, his business was closed and he intended to go to the West, but he accepted the cashiership of the Grafton Bank in Haverhill, which he held until the expiration of the charter, when he took the cashiership of the Caledonia Bank in Danville, Vt., and in September, 1848, was elected representative of Danville in the Legislature. While in that office he was prevailed upon by Gov. Erastus Fairbanks to become Financial Agent of the Passumpsic and Connecticut Rivers Railroad Co., and removed to Newbury. In March, 1849, he accepted the cashiership of the "Vermont Bank," and removed to Montpelier, where he has since resided. This brief resume of Mr. Page's experience and success as a financier sufficiently shows that he is admirably qualified for the positions of still higher responsibility, to which he was speedily called. In the autumn of 1853, he was elected State Treasurer by the Joint Assembly, there having been no election by the people. Mr. Page affiliated with the Democratic party, as his father had long done, and in 1854, he was superseded in the treasurer's office by the first treasurer elected by the Republican party. On the organization of the First National Bank of Montpelier, in 1865, Mr. Page was elected a director and president, and still holds these positions. In 1866 he was elected State Treasurer, and has been subsequently re-elected at every election. Mr. Page has been for several years an active member and deacon in Bethany Church, and a liberal supporter of it, and of kindred institutions, such as the Sabbath school, Bible Society, Foreign and Domestic Missionary Societies, &c. FIRE DEPARTMENT.

In 1814, the first fire company was organized in town, the sum of $380 raised by subscription among the citizens of the village for the purpose, and an engine and hose purchased. In 1835, another company was formed, and a second engine purchased. And in 1837, a third engine was purchased, with about 800 feet of hose; and a third company was organized to man it, with a hook and ladder company to act generally. About this time the whole fire department was re-organized, and placed under the direction of the Hon. Daniel Baldwin, who was appointed chief engineer. Mr. Baldwin acted in this capacity many years, and, at length resigning the responsible post, was succeeded by Carlos Bancroft, who, in 1852, was succeeded by Capt. Almon A. Mead, who has ever since been the efficient chief engineer of the department. In January, 1860, "two large Button engines were purchased," the fire department having been re-organized in December, and companies organized to manage them. No. 4 engine arrived in February, and No. 5 in April. The Chief Engineers of the department from 1859 were Capt. A. A. Mead, from 1852 to '66; Samuel Wells 2 years from 1866; Jas. W. Brock, 2 years to 1870; Geo. C. Clark in 1871, and Gen. P. P. Pitkin from that date, 10 years, and now continues to hold the office.

The Foremen of the several companies from the same date, are: No. 4, John W. Clark, 1860, '61, '62; Levi Pierce in 1863, who died in January, 1864; Denison Dewey in 1864; Edwin C. Lewis in 1866, who died in 1867; Freeman Bixby, 1867, '68; Lewis Wood, 1869, '70, '71, '76; now resides in Taunton, Mass.; Alex. Jangraw, 1872 to '77; Chas. F. Collins, 1877 to '81, inclusive. No. 5.—Henry Barnes, three mos. in 1860, now resides in Waveland, Iowa; Horace F. Crossman, the remaining 9 months of 1860. He died in Washington, D. C., about 1867. Geo. S. Robinson, 1861, '62; Oliver R. Dutton in 1863, now resides in Ohio; Robert J. Hargin in 1864; Geo. C. Clark, 1865 to '71. He died in Holland, Mich., Apr. 22, 1878. Isaac M. Wright, 1871, '72; A. O. Seabury, 1873, '74, '75, now resides in Boston; John W. Page, in 1876, now resides in Nebraska; Robert J. Coffey, 1877, '78, now resides in Richmond, Vt.; Chas. C. Ramsdell, 1879, '80, '81.

Hook and Ladder Co. No. 1: Geo. S. Hubbard in 1860; Adams Kellogg, 1861, '62; now resides in Louisiana. Isaac A. Lathrop in 1863; Curtis S. Newcomb, 1864, '65. He died in Springfield, Mass. in 1867. Lewis B. Huntington, 1866, '67; Andrew J. Howe, 1868, '69; John L. Tuttle, 1870, '71; Moses Kane, 1872 to '80. He died Oct. 2, 1881. Horace Mills in 1880; Joseph B. Morse, 1881.

No. 2 was re-organized and was disbanded in December, 1875. Foremen: Lewis Wood, 1868; Samuel Wells, 1869; he died Jan. 1878; Wm. O. Standish, 1870 to '74; Geo. P. Foster in 1874—he died Jan. 1, 1881. Charles H. Carter, in 1875. All the ex-foremen of the companies are residing in town at the present date—Dec. 24, 1881, but those given as residing elsewhere.

The fire department of this village has been eminently successful, and has unquestionably already been instrumental in saving hundreds of thousands of dollars of property. And now, with its 5 engines, nearly 2000 feet of hose, ladders, and all other needful equipments, and with its almost three hundred firemen to work and manage them, is probably the best and most efficient fire-department in the State.

There are now three companies in this village, officered for 1882 as follows:

Hook and Ladder Company—H. C. Lull, foreman; Wm. Goodwin, 1st assistant; John Portal, 2d assistant; M. C. Kinson, clerk; L. Rodney, steward.

Engine Company, No. 4—Chas. F. Collins, foreman; Samuel Luke, 1st assistant; Ed. Donwoodie, 2d assistant; C. W. Guernsey, clerk and collector; Hiram Atkins, treasurer; Otis G. Miles, steward.

Engine Company, No. 5—Moses Pearson, foreman; Janus Crossett, 1st assistant; Marcus Lynch, foreman of hose; Charles D. F. Bancroft, secretary and collector; Robert J. Hargin, treasurer; Lucius S. Goodwin, steward.

The Hook and Ladder has 60 men; No. 4, 70 men; No. 5, 75 men. There are three other engines that have no company; but are never needed now as the village has four pumps. Theron O. Bailey's steam pump at the Pavilion, Edwin W. Bailey's mill-pump, water-power, the cab shop pump, by water power and the Lane Manufacturing Co. pump by water power, and these pumps are so situated as to be sufficient, with the present companies, in all cases of fire that may occur here.

A very handsome cart, cost about $1000, was purchased for the Hook and Ladder Company some 12 years since. The fire companies are all volunteer companies, exempt from poll taxes for fire services; have a good business account, and were never in better condition than at the present.

UNION MUTUAL FIRE INS. CO.

Mr. Walton's history of Montpelier was written nearly a dozen years ago, before the above-named company was organized, and in hastily making it out that company was accidentally omitted. It commenced business July 28, 1875, and Aug. 1, 1881, it had $2,716,590.50 insured, with premium notes to the amount of $163,105.82. The officers are W. G. Ferrin, Pres., J. W. Brock, Vice Pres., A. C. Brown, Sec., W. F. Braman, Treas.

PIONEER ABOLITIONISTS.

The first antislavery votes for President ever cast in Montpelier, were given to James G. Birney in 1840, and the honor belongs to Zenas Wood, John Wood, Henry Y. Barnes, Hezekiah Ward and Joseph Somerby. The whole number cast in the State was 319.

GRADUATES OF MONTPELIER.

Some of the graduates of Montpelier, to which further additions can be made in this work, in a supplementary form. From PRESIDENT BUCKHAM, of BURLINGTON COLLEGE, we have received the following account for this town of

GRADUATES FROM THE VT. UNIVERSITY:
LIBRARY, UNIVERSITY OF VT., }
BURLINGTON, Nov. 24, 1881. }

To President Buckham:

My Dear Sir.—I beg to hand you below the information which I understood you to desire yesterday, regarding the graduates of the University who have entered from Montpelier. This list is necessarily very imperfect, from the fact that no annual catalogues were issued before 1808; and the further fact that we possess no copies of those of the following years: 1809 to 1821, 1824 to 1833, 1864 to 1865.

In 1824, George Washington Houghton was graduated; in 1827, Nicholas Baylies; 1838, George Washington Reed; 1840, James Reed Spalding; 1844, Carlos Allen Sprague; 1845, Charles Dewey and Nathaniel George Clark; 1846, James Prentiss and Jonathan Allen Wainwright; 1847, George Washington Cottrill; 1848, Edward Bingham Chamberlain and Geo. Sennott; 1847, Charles Carroll Spalding; 1849, Charles Loomis; 1852, Jedd Philo Clark Cottrill; 1853, George Robinson Thompson; 1856, Charles Colburn Prentiss, Geo. Bailey Spalding and Henry Lingan Lamb; 1858, Alfred Bowers Thompson; 1860, James Stevens Peck; 1861, John Pushee Demeritt and John Wright Norton; 1862, James Wilson Davis and J. Monroe Poland.

Besides these, I find record of William K. Upham as a sophomore in 1834 and Theodore Prentiss in 1839; John Barnard and George Bradshaw as juniors in 1840; Henry Lee Dodge, a senior in 1845; Alfred Washburn Pitkin, sophomore in 1843; Oscar Silver, freshman in 1842; Samuel Mosely Walton, sophomore in 1843; Timothy Abbott and Charles Warren Badger, freshmen in 1844.

From East Montpelier.—Lewis Larned Coburn and Milo Latimer Templeton in 1859; Salvin Collins Clark, freshmen in 1854.

If Montpelier is credited with A. B. Thompson, (1858,) I see not why Charles Wheeler Thompson, (1854,) should not be set down to the same town—though in point of fact both of them came from the same house on the Berlin side of the Winooski river, and C. W. T. called himself of Berlin, as he truly was. So, too, J. W. Norton, if I rightly recollect, was not really from Montpelier, but from Berlin or Middlesex.

The above is the best showing I can make, by reason of our lack of over 30 annual catalogues. J. E. G.

(Gov.) Asabel Peck was in college at Burlington in his senior term, and Charles G. Eastman entered and was for a time there, and Dr. Julius Y. Dewey graduated at the medical department in 1823. E. P. Walton and Hon. S. S. Kelton also, give as graduates at this college from Montpelier: David M. Camp, 1810; Charles Strong Smith, and Thomas Davis Strong, 1848; Charles H. Heath, 1854; Benjamin Franklin Fifield, 1855; Charles Daley Swazey, 1859, of Montpelier, and Geo. B. Nichols, now of Chicago; Henry Dodge, now in California; C. A. Sprague now in Watertown, Wis.; ——— Hollister, of East Montpelier.

He taught at Morrisville 2 years; was head of the high school at Taunton, Mass., 5 years; removed to Chelsea Mass., in 1854. He married Caroline M., dau. of Wm. Muenschler, of Taunton, Mar. 1852.—Alumni tablet.

Class of 1851.—CHARLES WESLEY WILARD, page 492.

Class of 1854.—CHARLES FRANKLIN SMITH, the son of Oramel Hopkins and Mary (Goss) Smith, was born at Montpelier, about 1833, and died at Hancock, Mich., Apr. 23, 1864, aged 31. He read law with his father; went into practice at Chicago, Ill., but removed to Hancock, 2 or 3 years prior to his death.—Alumni tablet.

Class of 1862.—CHAUNCEY WARRINER TOWN, the son of Ira Strong and Frances Miretta (Witherell) Town, was born at Montpelier, July 4, 1840. He read law, and has opened an office in New York city.—Alumni tablet.

Class of 1865.—HIRAM AUGUSTUS HUSE, the son of Hiram S. and Emily M. (Blodgett) Huse, was born at Randolph, Jan. 17, 1843; resident lawyer at Montpelier, and present librarian of the Vt. St. Hist. Society; contributor for Randolph in vol. 11. this work, and to the present volume.

Class of 1866.—CHESTER W. MERRILL, the son of Ferrand Fassett and Eliza Maria (Wright) Merrill, was born at Montpelier, Apr. 23, 1846. He has been an Assistant at the New Ipswich Academy.—Alumni tablet.

Mr. Merrill is now Librarian of the Cincinnati Free Public Library.

Class of 1866.—GEORGE WASHINGTON WING, the son of Joseph Addison and Samantha Elizabeth (Webster) Wing, was born at Plainfield, Oct. 22, 1843.—Alumni tablet. [See next page]

Class of 1867.—HOWARD F. HILL, the son of John M'Clary and Elizabeth Lord (Chase) Hill, was born at Concord, N. H., July 21, 1846.—Alumni tablet.

Mr. Hill is now Rector of Christ Church, Montpelier.

THOMAS W. WOOD, only son of the late John Wood, is also a son of Montpelier, of whom her people are very justly and highly proud. With a natural genius for sketching and painting, he has persevered until, by his long experience and correct taste, he has become one of the best realistic and portrait painters in the country, and has so commanded the admiration and respect of his brother artists that he is honored with the office of President of an association of artists in New York city. Mr. Wood's winter studio is in New York city, but his summers are generally spent in Vermont, at "Athenwood," an unique and beautiful cottage in a mountain gorge, which, however, overlooks the village of Montpelier. He is not merely a very successful artist, but a gentleman who is highly esteemed by all who know him. We have hoped to receive data for a more detailed notice, but are obliged to go to press with this imperfect one.

ORIGIN OF THE CHRISTIAN MESSENGER.

A recent visit to the rooms of the New England Methodist Historical Society in Boston, has given us an opportunity to find the files of the early issues of the "Vermont Christian Messenger," and from them we have the following definite information regarding its origin. The first number was issued under date of Mar. 12, 1847, at Newbury, Rev. S. P. Williams being the publisher; Rev. Wm. W. Willett and Rev. E. J. Scott, editors; N. Granger agent, and L. J. McIndoe printer. Mr. Williams (then presiding elder of Danville District) retired from the publishing interest as announced in the issue of July 16, 1847, and Messrs. Willett & Scott became the proprietors as well as editors. On Jan. 1, 1848, the "Messenger" was removed to Montpelier, and on March 11, of the same year, Rev. E. J. Scott became the sole proprietor and chief editor, with Rev. J. T. Peck, A. M., (now Bishop Peck) as the corresponding editor. On Sept. 6, 1848, Rev. A. Webster became joint proprietor with Mr. Scott, and on Mar. 6, 1850, the names of E. J. Scott and A. J. Copeland appeared as proprietors. On Nov. 6, 1850, Mr. Scott was announced as sole proprietor, and on Jan. 1, 1851, as sole editor also. We have not been able to find the files of the succeeding years to 1861, and will be very grateful for information which will give us access to any which may be in existence.

GOLDEN WEDDINGS.

Mr. and Mrs. Capt. Joseph Somerby, celebrated the first golden wedding in Montpelier village many years ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Worcester Sprague, celebrated their golden wedding Mar. 11, 1878.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Nutt, celebrated their golden wedding June 18, 1878. All of this village.

THE 4TH OF JULY, 1807.

Well does the writer remember the appearance of the village the first time he entered it, which was on the fourth of July, 1807. State street had then been surveyed, but not opened. There had been before one bridge across the Branch, and that was at the Union House; but even that had been carried away, we think, by the flood of the previous spring. At all events, no bridge was there then. The men and women rode through the stream on horses, or in carts and wagons, and we boys rolled up our trowsers over our knees and waded across, not one in ten of us being cumbered with either stockings or shoes. The point of attraction was the new State House grounds, and our way led along the old road down the river, under the hill, where the back street now extends from the Union House to the Catholic Church. All on our left, after passing the Colonel Davis establishment, and one or two small houses on the bank to the east of it, was a smooth, broad, well-tilled meadow, covered with waving green corn. Two lines of stakes running east and west could be traced through the midst of the meadow.

"What in the world are all those stakes for, setting up so straight and curious, all in a row there?" asked one of the older, out of town boys. "Those stakes? Why they are to show where we are to have a new handsome street from the new State House right across the Branch, with a fine, elegant new bridge," replied a village boy, pricking up with pride at the thought. "A street," rejoined the other, "well, I wonder where they expect to find houses to put upon it. It appears to me you village folks are trying to grow grand all at once. When you get the new State House up, I expect we shan't be able to touch you with a rod pole."

This natural little bout of words among the boys of that time, showed two things better than a page of elucidation;—first, the extent of the important changes and improvements in contemplation for the village, and second, the starting points of the simultaneous growth of that village pride and country jealousy, which, probably, are ever in a greater or less degree to be found, wherever villages exist, to crow and affect superiority, and country towns to build up and sustain them.

When we reached the place where the then novelty of our national jubilee was to be celebrated, we found the exercises of the day were to be performed on the ground-work of the new State House, the foundation walls of which were all up, the sills and flooring timbers framed together, and roughly floored over, and the plates and some other of the heavy upper timbers ranged round the borders of this ground frame-work. Near the centre of the area thus formed, was erected a broad platform, on which was placed a table and several chairs for the orator of the day and those who assisted in the usual services; while around it, on the borders of the whole area, were erected bushes, or rather small trees, freshly cut and brought from the adjoining woods on the hill, to serve for shade for the speaker and audience. The orator was Paul Dean, a Universalist minister, who resided in Boston, but who about that time preached for some small period in different parts of Montpelier.

This was the first general public celebration of the Fourth of July ever held in Montpelier. A small village celebration was, however, held the preceding summer, in a booth, built in a meadow near the Davis mills on the Branch, and Dr. Edward Lamb wrote and delivered the oration.—Thompson.

GEN. PERLEY P. PITKIN

was born in Marshfield, son of Truman Pitkin, and grandson of Hon. Stephen of Marshfield, and Gen. Parley Davis of Montpelier. His father removed to what is now East Montpelier, and shortly his mother died, leaving three young children. Perley P. was brought up under the eye of Gen. Davis, married in East Montpelier, represented that town 2 years, and resided there until the breaking out of the rebellion. June 6, 1861, he was commissioned Quarter Master of the 2d Regt. of Vermont Volunteers, and went to the front. The writer of this notice was then in Washington, and well remembers the astonishment of the red-tape gentlemen of the War Department at the promptitude of Q. M. Pitkin in the discharge of his duties, and the vim with which he demanded supplies. His controlling idea was that Vermont boys must be taken care of, and they were, as well as an efficient officer could do it. His valuable qualities were soon discovered, and in less than a year he was promoted to the rank of Captain, and not long after to that of Colonel and head of the Depot Department of the army of the Potomac. He returned to Montpelier, where his family was located, and entered into business with Dennis Lane and J. W. Brock in the manufacture of saw-mills, which now have a wide reputation; and this has been developed into the Lane Manufacturing Company, which now has the largest and most successful business which any manufacturing concern in Montpelier has ever had. He resigned his colonelcy and was elected Quarter-Master General of the State, and having charge of the State Arsenal, and military supplies far beyond the wants of the State, he succeeded in making sales to foreign governments, which materially aided the State treasury and reduced the burden of taxation of the people. He represented Montpelier in the legislature 1874-5, and since his residence has almost constantly been employed in town and village offices.

FIRST ELECTION DAY IN MONTPELIER.

By the terms of the act, locating the seat of government at Montpelier, the State House was to be completed by the first of September, 1808. It was done; and great were the preparations made among the villagers, and great the anticipations raised among them and through all the surrounding community, in view of the advent of the new and important day of "Election." Streets were cleared of lumber and rubbish, side-walks prepared of plank or gravel, houses painted, new suits of clothes purchased, and everything made to assume the sprucest appearance. A fine artillery company uniformed throughout with plumed Bonaparte hats and the dress of field officers in all except the epaulette on the privates, was organized from among the first citizens of this and the neighboring towns, to serve as the governor's guard, and be in special attendance on Election days. Of this company Isaac Putnam, a man nearly six feet high, weighing over two hundred pounds, well proportioned, and as noble in soul as in body, had the honor of being chosen the first captain, and no one of those present now living can fail to recall his fine and commanding military appearance on those occasions as he stood up between his soldiers and the encircling crowd, like Saul among the people. An iron six-pounder field piece had been procured; and a thrill of excitement ran through the excited hearts of all the boys of the community at the news, that when the election of State officers was declared on Election day, "a cannon, a great cannon, was to be fired in Montpelier Hollow!"

The eventful day at length came, and with it two-thirds of the population of all the neighboring country, 15 or 20 miles around, came pouring into the village. But instead of attempting any further general description of the then entire novelties of the day and their effect on the multitude, we will, at the risk of the imputation of losing our dignity as a historian, again have recourse to the reminiscences of our boyhood. We were, of course, there on that day among the throngs of excited boys, congregated from all quarters, to witness the various sights and performances expected on that important occasion. A showy procession had been formed in the fore part of the day, led by the military in all the marching pomp of flying colors and rattling drums, and followed by the State officers, members of the legislature and a concourse of citizens, and the Election sermon had been preached by the Rev. Sylvanus Haynes, pastor of the Baptist Church of Middletown. The House of Representatives had been organized by the election of Dudley Chase, Esq., of Randolph, Speaker; and a canvassing committee appointed still earlier in the day and put to work in counting the votes for State officers. And as the hour of sunset approached, and as there had been for some hours no public demonstrations to be witnessed, a great proportion of the crowd was scattered all over the village. We and a lot of other boys were standing in the street somewhere against our present Court House, when, sudden as the bursting of a thunder clap, the whole village shook with the explosion of the cannon on the State House common. We all instantly ran at the top of our speed for the spot. When we had got about half way there, we met a gang of other boys from one of the back towns, who, taken by surprise and seized with panic at the stunning shock, were fleeing for their lives in the opposite direction; but gaining a little assurance from seeing us rushing toward the scene of their fright, one, braver than the rest, stopped short, boldly faced about and exclaimed, "Hoo! I an't a n'atom afraid!" and all now joining in the race, we were, in another minute, within a few rods of the smoking gun, which had been discharged on the announcement of the election of Isaac Tichenor as Governor. The next moment our attention was attracted by the voice of Israel P. Dana, sheriff of the county, standing on the upper terrace of the State House, and loudly proclaiming—"Hear ye! hear ye! hear ye! the Honorable Paul Brigham has been elected Lieutenant Governor, in and over the State of Vermont, by the suffrages of the freemen. God save the people!" Then another discharge of the piece saluted our recolling ears and sent its sharp echoes from side to side between the encircling hills. Then came the announcement of the election of Benjamin Swan as Treasurer, followed by a third gun; then the last announcement of the election of Councilors, followed by a fourth gun; and then, without further official announcements, the salute of guns was continued till one for each of the states had been fired.

Such were the performances on the first Election day in Montpelier, and such the interest and excitement they created among the multitude.—Thompson.

HON. JOSEPH POLAND,

second son of the late Dea. Luther and Nancy (Potter) Poland, was born in Underhill, Mar. 14, 1818; removed with his father in 1821 to Coit's Gore, now Waterville, and worked on a farm till 1835, when he came as an apprentice to the Montpelier Watchman office, and remained until 1839. January 1, 1839, he commenced the publication of the Voice of Freedom, but in less than a year sold out on account of ill health. In June, 1840, he started the Lamoille Whig at Johnson, and continued it 3 years. In 1844, he returned to Montpelier, and established the Green Mountain Freeman, and continued it until Dec. 1848. In 1868, in connection with his son, J. Monroe, he purchased the Watchman and Journal, of which he is still in charge. It is probable that no editor in Vermont, now in the harness, has had Mr. Poland's experience of 25 years in connection with the public press.

Mr. Poland has held numerous public offices, the duties of all having been faithfully performed: In 1842, assistant clerk of the House of Representatives; 1852-'3, judge of probate for Washington County; 1858-'60, state Senator; 1870-'71, town representative; 1861-'68, collector of U. S. internal revenue for the first Congressional District; 1849-1881, secretary and director of The Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company—offices which he has held ever since the organization of the company, and to which he has been annually elected by unanimous votes.

Mr. Poland may well be ranked as a veteran in the celebrated anti-slavery movement which has now become historical, having enlisted in 1843, and conducted the organ of the party in Vermont, and served as chairman of its State Committee, for many years; so that he may now properly indulge in the double boast of both him that girdeth on the harness and he that putteth it off—having lived to see American slavery not only forever extinguished by the organic law of the land, but remembered only with such detestation that history blushes at the record.

In 1840 Mr. Poland married Mary Ann, daughter of the late Joseph Rowell. They had 7 children, of whom 5 have died: 3 in infancy, Clara A., a beautiful daughter, in 1865, and Charles F., when developing into a promising manhood, in 1875. Two sons survive, J. Monroe and Edward R. Mrs. Poland died in 1862, and in 1873 Mr. P. married Miss Julia M. Harvey, daughter of James K. Harvey, of Barnet, deceased.

Mr. Poland joined the first Congregational (Bethany) church in 1839, and for several years he has been one of its deacons, an earnest worker in its Sabbath-school, and a promoter of all reformatory and Christian enterprises. He is favorably known in the churches of Vermont, and is now publisher of two religious newspapers, the Vermont Chronicle and the New Hampshire Journal. E. P. W.

The oldest woman residing in town is Mrs. Lucy Mead, born July 23, 1789; has been a resident of the village since 1813.

The oldest person living in the village, and born in the limits of the old town, is Orin Cummins, born Feb. 23, 1801.

The oldest person living in the village, born in the limits of the new town, is John Q. A. Peck, born in 1808.

The oldest person living in town and born in the village limits, is Snow Town, born in 1806.

The oldest person living in the village, and born in the village, is Wm. Nelson Peck, born Sept. 18, 1811.

The oldest resident of the village is Hon. Elijah Paine Jewett, who has resided here since 1805, and is 80 years of age.

The oldest French resident of the town is Joseph Wood, who came in 1831, and is now 85 years of age.

The oldest Irish resident in town is James McLaughlin, who came in 1832, and is now 80 years of age. Mr. John Murphy came in 1834, and is now 86 years of age.

WILLIAM W. CADWELL.

Among the very old and worthy citizens of Montpelier was William W. Cadwell, who was born in Hatfield, Mass., May 12, 1799, and in the same year was brought to Montpelier by his father, Wyllis I. Cadwell. He succeeded his father in trade for many years, and on retiring was employed as town clerk, magistrate, overseer of the poor, &c. He was esteemed as an honest man, always having the interests of the town at heart. He died suddenly in 1877, aged 78 years.

The above was not written in time to appear with the biographies of deceased citizens of Montpelier. E. P. W.

[We had filed and overlooked till now.]

MRS. GOVERNOR RANSOM,

a native of Montpelier, and a sister of William W. Cadwell, Esq., who died at the residence of her son-in-law in Fort Scott, Kansas, Nov. 17, 1877. She was for many years a resident of Michigan, of which state her husband was both governor and chief justice. Mrs. Ransom's name before marriage was Almira Cadwell.

The home of the Cadwells was in the old house still standing at the head of State Street. Mrs. Constant W. Storrs and Mrs. Geo. P. Ricker are the only representatives of the old family left here, now. Almira Cadwell, it is said, was a beautiful girl. The old house was considered the only house in Montpelier worthy to receive Lafayette in, on his visit to the capital of the State of the Green Mountain Boys, for whom the great French General always had a particular admiration.

MRS. SARAH SPALDING, widow of the late Hon. John Spalding, who was for many years the treasurer of the State of Vermont, died at her home in Montpelier Jan. 19, 1874, in her 83d year. Mrs. Spalding, a virtuous and excellent woman, was a great sufferer for many years previous to her death, and an invalid for over 40 years. A few days before her death, she had a second paralytic shock, after which she was never able to speak. She was the mother of 8 children, among whom was a graduate of Burlington College, see page ——"Charles Spalding was first civil engineer for a time. In 1849, when the California gold fever broke out, he was among the pioneers who sought that auriferous land, making the passage in a sailing vessel around Cape Horn. His success at mining was indifferent. Returning home via the Pacific coast and the Gulf of Mexico, he spent about a year in Montpelier, when he went to New York and entered the service of Harnden & Co. as express messenger between New York and Boston. Soon going West, he engaged in surveying and railroad engineering in Ohio, Illinois and Kentucky. At the time of the establishment of Kansas as a territory, he was living in one of the border counties of Missouri, where he married a Missouri lady. He took part in the establishment of its territorial government, making preliminary surveys and encouraging immigration by writing special letters to the New York Tribune, which attracted no little attention in the East. He published a paper in Lawrence, Kansas, and was elected an alderman, and was for a short time mayor of the city. He took the democratic side on the outbreak of the Kansas war, and soon after left the state. He afterwards taught school, and at the breaking out of the war returned to the East, enlisting in the 6th Vermont Regiment, served 2 years, came home and started the Newport News, at Newport, Vt. This he sold, and went to Boston in 1866, and took a position on the Boston Post. In 1869, he became connected with the Boston Herald, and remained with that paper up to the time of his decease. He had been suffering from a complication of diseases, and his death was not unexpected.—Burlington Free Press.

He was perhaps best known to the public through the police court column of this journal, which he has written almost continuously for several years past. The humor, the philosophy, the philanthropy, which he has there introduced into his homilies upon the doings of the criminal classes of this Metropolis, have endeared him in the hearts of thousands of people who knew him not personally, and who will regret sincerely his demise.—Rutland Herald.

of the class of 1840, died at Dover, N. H., early in October, 1872, in the fiftieth year of his age. He was a native of Montpelier, and chose journalism as his profession, soon after his graduation. He first gained reputation as the chief editorial writer of the New York Courier and Enquirer, during the last year of its existence. From that paper he went to the New York World, which he was interested in establishing as a religious, rather than a political newspaper; but the experiment soon failed in that form, and when Mr. Marble got possession of the paper, and turned it into a democratic organ, Mr. Spalding left it and went upon the Times, where he remained many years and did his best work. His daily leader—generally upon a political subject—was uniformly the best piece of writing upon the editorial page, uniting vigor with finish, full knowledge of his theme, and a statesman's grasp of its relations. He had his first attack of paralysis before the death of Mr. Raymond, and retired to the country, but for some months, at least, kept up his constant contributions to the editorial department of the paper. He was a man of high literary attainments and was an essayist rather than an editor. To a moral character of great purity was added the fervor of Christian faith, which did not find utterance in noisy declaration, but shone luminously in the simplicity of his manners, and the consecration of his splendid powers to the advocacy of such principles as he deemed best calculated to benefit mankind. The disease which impaired his powers in later life and eventually caused his death was apoplectic paralysis. One of his finest public efforts was an oration delivered at the semi-centennial celebration of the foundation of this University, in 1854.—U. V. M. Obituary.

Mr. Spalding was brother of Rev. George B. Spalding of Dover, N. H., editor of the New Hampshire Journal, and son of Dr. James Spalding—p. 445. Dr. James and Hon. John Spalding, father of Charles Carrol, were brothers.

MARCUS D. GILMAN,

born in Calais, Jan. 28, 1820, came to Montpelier in 1835, and was engaged in merchandise there and at Northfield until 1845, when he started out on a tour in search of a favorable place in which to locate. This tour embraced the Atlantic cities from Boston to Baltimore, and the western cities and promising towns to the Mississippi river. He was greatly impressed by Chicago, then a fresh city of about 8000 inhabitants, among whom were many Vermonters. Having in the meantime married Maria Malleville, daughter of Hon. Daniel Baldwin, of Montpelier, he left that town in June, 1845, with his wife and his few effects, for Chicago, and in less than a week after his arrival formed a co-partnership with Charles Follansbee for a general mercantile business, wholesale and retail. At the end of the first year he purchased the entire stock, and from that time, either alone or with different partners, Mr. Gilman prosecuted his business, for most of the time in two wholesale establishments—one of dry goods and the other of groceries—and so successfully prosecuted it, that he was content to retire in 1868, when for two years he with his family resided at Riverside, Newton, Mass., and then returned to the old homestead and the scenes of their childhood and youth, at Montpelier, where their beautiful home still is.

Politically Mr. Gilman has been from youth a Democrat, and his familiar acquaintance with and friendship for "The Little Giant," Stephen A. Douglas, inspired in him a zeal that has never flagged. He has been the candidate of his party for Mayor, and also Treasurer of Chicago; and he was tendered the candidacy for State Treasurer of Illinois, which he declined. He was the representative of Montpelier, 1874-'5, and the only man ever elected as a Democrat since the division of the old town; but a Republican legislature had so high an appreciation of his integrity and business qualities that he was elected a Director of the State Prison. He was Librarian of the Vermont Historical Society, 1874-1881, and has rendered the Society and the State invaluable services, and his declination of further service is a great loss. His taste is for antiquities, history and biography, and his private library in these lines is probably more extensive and valuable than any other in the State. He is an honorary or corresponding member of various historical and other organizations. He is President of the Vermont Numismatical Society, and will ere long appear as author of a Bibliography of Vermont, which he has been industriously preparing for several years.

Mr. Gilman's political record to this date cannot be completed without adding that he was chairman of the Vermont delegation in the National Democratic Convention of 1876, and voted for Samuel J. Tilden every time. His democracy is certainly both unimpeachable and unappeasable.

For additional notices of Mr. Gilman and his family, see ante, pages 155-157.

A SOLDIER'S LETTER—WAR OF '61.

Extract:—CURTIS A. COBURN was appointed regimental postmaster at Brattleboro, Vt., and also brigade postmaster while in camp near Washington; we all liked him much. He was always very anxious that we should get our mails promptly and daily, if it was to be got at. He was transferred to the Signal Corps in August last, and was captured by the rebels while on our retreat from Culpepper to Bull Run, in October.

Sergt. HIRAM M. PIERCE, (in whom I feel more particularly interested, he always being with the Company,) has been a good soldier and done his duty well in every spot and place, and by his good conduct won the esteem of every member in the company; always cheerful and happy. While a detachment of Cos. B, G, and K, were doing picket duty at Conrad's Ferry, Md., one year ago, he was detailed as acting quartermaster and also sergt.-major of the detachment, and in those positions he was found fully competent. By his gallantry at the battle of Orange Grove, he proved himself to be an earnest, brave and noble champion to the cause of humanity, liberty and his country. In the progress of that battle as we were ordered to fix bayonets and charge, on approaching the rail fence he spoke so loud that he was heard by every one in the company, "Come on Co. B," and was one of the first to climb the fence. He had been over but a moment when I heard him exclaim—"I am wounded, my arm is broken." The next time I saw him was at Brandy Station, Va., several days afterwards; as soon as I heard that the wounded had arrived, I went down to see them, and I found Sergt. Pierce; he appeared quite glad to see me, as I was to see him, but I felt very sorry to see him with but one arm, (his left arm was taken off above the elbow). He told me that it had been very painful, for on account of the hasty retreat of the medical corps from the field in light marching order, his arm was not attended to until two or three days after the battle.

Lieut. STETSON, who had been in command of the company most of the time since we have been in the service, drew my attention at the battle of Orange Grove. He stood bravely at his post, remarking "boys, keep cool, and do not shoot until you can see something to shoot at!" Lieut. Abbott of Co. D, (then acting as 1st Lieut. of Co. B,) was doing all all he could to keep a good line, and also to preserve good order in the company. After Gilman Storrs was shot, a boy that we have missed very much, Lieut. Stetson (whom you all know is not very easily scared), grasped a musket, and asking the boys if they had any ammunition for him, I gave him some caps, and some one else some cartridges, when he loaded and fired as fast as he could, remarking that "he hoped that each bullet would do good execution, for they had killed his boy Gim." Lieut. Abbott came out with us as orderly sergeant, and after he was promoted to 2d lieut. of Co. D, the company very generously presented him a sword, belt and shoulder-straps, costing about $50, as a testimony of their regard for him.—Watchman.

Curtis Coburn, who enlisted from Montpelier, learned the printer's trade at the Repository office, of Mr. Charles H. Severance, now of the Watchman office. Coburn died in New Orleans; see page 523. Lieutenants Abbott and Stetson, see page 522.

CHARLES W. LYMAN,

[To whom we find the following tribute in the Baltimore American.]

Died, Oct. 10, 1866, in Shelby, Ohio, after a short illness, C. W. Lyman, formerly of Montpelier, leaving a young wife, child and numerous friends to mourn his untimely end.

He was among the foremost who rallied to his country's defense when the tocsin of war sounded, serving faithfully and gallantly as a line officer in the "Wallace Zouaves" of Indiana. Subsequently he was promoted to a position of great responsibility in the Southwest, where, for ability, integrity and honor, he won the highest encomiums from such men as "Grant, Sherman and McPherson"—men whom the nation loves to honor. As a man and a friend he was generous to a fault, and few can boast of more sincere friendship or warmer admirers. As a father and husband he was all that love and fidelity could make him; young and full of ambitious hopes, he passed from our midst a bright example to all who love the generous and the good.—Watchman.

His remains were brought to Montpelier and interred in Green Mount.

CENTRAL VERMONT DEPOT AT MONTPELIER.

Coming up from Montpelier Junction, some less than 2 miles below, we arrive at the Montpelier station in about five minutes' ride from the Junction. The cars stop at the new Central depot, which the eye strikes but a moment before landing—almost the same instant the State House, on the street beyond, on higher ground, and the principal part of State St. running along the river side, opens up a pleasant view of the village of the Green Mountain Capital on the first approach to it by railroad from St. Albans and Burlington way. The first railroad depot building, which stood upon the same site, was erected in 1850—a brick structure, 150 x 50 feet, creditable for the time, and a beginning; but a better building being desired in which to receive the Legislature, and more suitable to the place, the present commodious brick depot was erected, being completed September 1880. We have the view of the exterior; the interior is well and conveniently finished for the Capital depot; a very wide central hall—wide enough for the town representatives of several of the smaller counties of the State to walk through abreast—gentlemen and ladies' waiting rooms upon the left, baggage room, telegraph and express offices upon the right. The whole building, warmed by steam, with all modern conveniences.

The first train of cars entered Montpelier, June 20, 1849. The travelling public found accommodations a few months until the first depot house was built, in a freight house, first built, just over the track south.

At this point in our description, failing to find exact data to continue, we wrote to J. W. Hobart, Gen. Supt. of the Cen. Vt. R. R. at St. Albans, that we had the engraving of the depot, were preparing a sketch, and asking for such data and information as he could give, who has sent the following descriptive letter, which, finding so interesting, we have concluded to give entire:

MR. HOBART'S LETTER.

ST. ALBANS, Vt., Jan. 2, 1882.

MISS HEMENWAY:

Madam:—Your favor of the 31st ult. came duly to hand, and I feel much interest in the subject of your enquiries. Probably there is no one living who is more familiar with the early history of the railroad in Montpelier than myself. The advent of the cars into that beautiful town occurred on the 4th of July, 1849, and the first train consisted of ten platform cars, loaded with 100 bbls: of flour each, and covered with a with his force was removed to that station, and Mr. J. Edwards Wright was made the first permanent station agent at Montpelier, where he remained until Aug. 1851, resigning his position at that time to engage in the purchase of wool in Ohio. A. V. H. Carpenter, now the General Passenger Agent of the Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R., succeeded Mr. Wright, and remained in that position until June, 1862, at which time he was relieved to take another position, and J. W. Hobart was installed as the agent. Up to that time Mr. Hobart had been a clerk for both Mr. Wright and Mr. Carpenter.

As you are aware, Montpelier is at the terminus of a branch of one and one-fourth of a mile in length, and up to October of that year, all the trains passed in and out over the branch. In October they discontinued running the main line trains into Montpelier, but in place established a branch train, consisting simply of a small engine, fitted up with seats each side of the tender.

This engine was called the "Abigail Adams." It was determined in the course of a very few days that it would be impossible to do the business of the Capital with the facilities then provided. So the President, Gov. Paine, ordered a small car built, as the engine had not sufficient capacity to handle a large car, except under the most favorable circumstances.

Meantime, however, a large car was provided, and when the business required it, the car was attached to this miniature engine, which in many instances proved unequal to the task, and the conductor, who was none other than the agent at Montpelier, the cars of the branch trains having been added to his duties, the baggage master, and many times the engineer, were compelled to push in aiding the engine the whole distance, and it was not unfrequently the case, that the passengers themselves, in response to a request, would aid in furnishing power to move the train.

I cannot now give you the name of the first engineer of this little engine, but one of the engineers who is now there, came soon afterwards. (I refer to Mr. James Bowers, and I have no doubt he will give you the name.)

In due time the small car was finished, and we had less trouble. This car proved quite a novelty, it having been finished like an omnibus, with seats upon the side.

new white cheese canvas over each car. The train was drawn by engine Winooski. John Danforth was engineer, and the writer of this was the conductor. Later in the day, passenger trains ran in charge of the same persons, and well do I remember the interest manifested and the commotion created among the people who came in from the surrounding country. There being a circus upon the meadow near Mrs. Nicholas' house, on the Berlin side, which taken together with the usual 4th of July as a holiday, the town was packed, and we were compelled to send men in advance to clear the way for the train. Every building from which the cars could be seen was covered, every available window occupied, the tops of buildings were covered if possible, and even the tree-tops were alive with people.

Warner Hine, who was then master of transportation, was the acting agent at that station during the summer of 1849. In the autumn of that year the road was completed to Waterbury, and Mr. Hine

This condition, however, did not last long, as it was found and admitted by the officers, who, by the way, were not over and above friendly to Montpelier, that the facilities were entirely inadequate; so a full and quite a respectable train was provided, consisting of an engine called the "Flying Dutchman," a baggage and a first-class passenger car. Soon after the management changed from Northfield to St. Albans, and Montpelier was evidently improved by the change. James Bowers, who is still there, was one of the engineers who ran the "Flying Dutchman." J. W. Hobart remained there until March, 1859, and was succeeded by the present incumbent, S. L.

Howe, Esq., who was for some time previous the assistant of Mr. Hobart. I am very nearly as familiar with the history of the railroad interest of Montpelier since this period, but as it covers a period of about 22 years, and my time is limited, I leave it for others, Mr. Howe and many others in Montpelier being perfectly familiar with affairs since the above date of 1859. It gives me much pleasure to communicate these facts, and if they are of any value to you in making up the history of the best town in the State, I shall certainly be very well paid. I know very well all the gentlemen whose portraits you have, and they certainly will prove a very valuable accession to your history.

I intended to have mentioned earlier in my letter that our Vice President, Mr. James R. Langdon, is perhaps more familiar with the history of our road than any gentleman in Montpelier. He, I think, was one of the original board of directors, with Gov. Paine as President. If at any time you should desire to make any further enquiry, it will give me pleasure to give you such information as I may have. Hoping you will continue to be as successful as you have been in the past, in the progress and completion of your work, and extending the compliments of the season,

I remain very truly and Respectfully yours,

J. W. HOBART.

Mr. Bowers gives the engineers: Wm. Patterson, James Bowers, Henry Wallace, William Greenleaf, Fred Webster, Henry Buckley, Ed. Eaustice, Chas. Greenleaf, Wm. Dolloff, B. F. Merrill, William Gould, Robert Gregg, David Daniels, A. S. Caswell.

[PAVILION HOTEL, OPPOSITE CENTRAL VERMONT DEPOT.]

Through the hall of the Central depot you pass on a broad pavement of brick over to State street and the Pavilion hotel, from the steps of which you look back and have a good view of the depot. The view was taken from the steps of the Pavilion. It is at the Pavilion the Governors always stop during the sessions of the Legislature.

The baggage masters have been: Z. R. True, Gamaliel Washburn, S. E. Bailey, C. T. Hobart, H. W. Drew, T. W. Bailey, E. W. Thompson, W. H. Pingree, James Finn. The station agent was conductor on the Branch till the Barre road opened, since which T. W. Bailey has been conductor. S. L. Howe is the present station agent.

The Telegraph and Express Office.—The Vermont and Boston Telegraph Company was incorporated by the October Session of the Legislature, 1848, and a station established at Montpelier in connection with an express office of Cheney & Co., of Boston, opened in 1849. The express office was first kept, until the opening of the passenger depot, here, in the Hubbard building. Col. H. D. Hopkins was the first manager of both the telegraph and express office, and for 24 years after — Bigelow was the first telegraph operator. Mr. H. W. Drew, who succeeded Col. Hopkins, is the present express agent and manager of the telegraph office; Mr. A. G. Trulan, operator.

The next building of like public interest, after the Central depot, is the depot of the MONTPELIER AND WELLS RIVER R. R., run under W. A. Stowell's administration since this road was opened, Nov. 24, 1873; J. G. Farwell station agent to the present. The conductors from here to Wells River have been, H. S. Boutwell, son of Colonel Levi Boutwell, of Montpelier, George Smith, of this village, Henry Whitcomb, of Jonesville, Charles Ferrin, of this village, and Eugene Rand, present conductor.

Supt.—W. A. Stowell; Cashier and Gen'l Passenger Agent, Fred. W. Morse; Train Master, Henry W. Whitcomb.

Engineers and firemen.—John Carter, James Hadlock, Charles Field, James Boutwell, George Cummings, Geo. Morse, Charles Noyes, W. S. Keeler, Herbert Lawrence and Harvey Ederly.

[WATCHMAN & JOURNAL BUILDING, STATE ST.]

ANECDOTES OF LEVI BOUTWELL.

BY COL. H. D. HOPKINS.

Col. Boutwell,—there was not in all the wide circle of his acquaintance a person who had seen another like him. His face was singularly expressive. He could look savage enough to chill you with fear, or kindly enough to inspire the confidence of the most doubting and timid. He said in his life-time a thousand things which for genuine originality and severity were worthy of a professional satirist. Many a time have we seen in town or village meeting a prosy debate cut short, and the vote reached by one of his brief, gruff speeches, as in the meeting of the Wells River railroad company in Jan., 1874. The meeting was about to ballot for directors, when one gentleman suggested that the Board should consist of five instead of nine, as heretofore. Another suggested seven; still others were on their feet ready to make some motion or suggestion, or engage in a little speech, when the sturdy old Colonel sprang nervously up, and said, "I think, Mr. Chairman, we will have it nine. I want some to watch, as well as others to pray." This speech was the end of the debate on that subject. The nine directors were immediately ordered, and the election made.

Once he was sitting in the bar-room of the "Pavilion," with his knees well spread before that familiar old fireplace, while he looked intently on the burning pile before him. His face bore a specially stern look. Some one came in, and saluted him with, "How are you, Colonel?" His reply was as apt as original. "Well," he said: "I manage to keep tolerably even tempered, thank ye; mad as the devil clear through all the time."

[WASHINGTON COUNTY COURT HOUSE, STATE STREET.]

Col. Boutwell was a supporter of the "Church of the Messiah"—Unitarian—and a faithful attendant upon its services. Two or three years ago, in the summer season, some little boys of the neighborhood got in the way of loitering about the door and vestibule of the church during service hours Sunday evenings. As they became familiar, they become also bold and somewhat noisy. At length they got so curious as to go up and push the door to the audience room a little open, and look in. Then if somebody in the audience changed position a little, so that they apprehended danger, they would "cut and run"; but presently, when all was quiet again, they would repeat the experiment. At length Col. Boutwell became much disturbed, and felt he could stand the uncivil conduct of the lads no longer. So he went out to rectify things, and give the lads some lessons in morals and good manners. The boys left the house by the shortest way, and run, some up street, some down, and some across. The Col. pursued hotly in one direction. Leaving his hat in the church, he soon lost also his wig. But without stopping to replace that, he followed on. At length he closed in with one of the intruders, and shaking him and cuffing him in a way more frightening than damaging, and heading him toward the church, he said, "what are you about here, you little cuss, you? Why ain't you up in there getting some religion, as you ought to be, instead of being out here raising the devil in this way?"

The Colonel was uncommonly bald, and without his heavy dark wig looked not a bit like himself. Once he was in the wash room of the Pavilion, and for convenience in his ablutions had laid his wig aside. Presently a young, spruce feeling chap, with extremely red hair, came in too. Noticing the Colonel's nude head, he inquired, "well, Uncle, why don't you have some hair on your head?" It was an impudent question, and the Colonel knew it. Looking savagely on the red head of the saucy young stranger, he replied, "When they made me, and had me all finished except my hair, they told me that they had nothing left except red hair. I told them, then, 'I gad,' I wouldn't have any. I had rather go without. They might save that for impudent young popinjays and fools." The young inquisitive and joker was perfectly willing to drop the subject.

[ARGUS & PATRIOT BUILDING, MAIN STREET]

PRESIDENT MONROE'S VISIT.

(FROM "THE PRESIDENT'S TOUR," By S. Putnam Waldo, published at Hartford, Ct., 1819.)

"At 10 (A. M.) he was met and welcomed by the committee of arrangements, at Mr. Stiles', in Berlin. The procession was then formed, under direction of the marshals, and proceeded to Montpelier.

A little before 11, a discharge of artillery announced the near approach of the Chief Magistrate of the nation. On entering the village, he alighted from his carriage, and proceeded with the cavalcade, on horseback, to the Academy, through the Main street, lined on each side by citizens, under direction of Joseph Howes, Esq. Returning to the head of State street, the President dismounted, was received by the 'First Light Company,' commanded by Lieut. E. P. Walton, and conducted to the State House under a national salute from the 'Washington Artillery.'

In front of the State House, between three and four hundred masters and misses, students of the Academy and members of the schools in the village, dressed in a neat uniform, each tastefully decorated with garlands from the field of nature, were arranged in two lines facing each other, in perfect order. Previous to the arrival of the escort, the two companies of Cavalry, with an expedition and regularity which did them honor, had placed themselves at a proper and convenient distance on the left of the juvenile procession.

The President walked through this assemblage of youth, uncovering his head, and bowing as he passed, entered the State House under a fanciful arch of evergreens, emblematic, we trust, of the duration of our liberties, on one side of which were these words: 'July 4, 1776;' on the other, 'Trenton, Dec. 26, 1776.' When in front of the house, in the portico of the second story, the Hon. James Fisk, chairman of the committee of arrangements, in presence of the military and a great concourse of assembled citizens, delivered the following address:

To the President of the United States:—

"SIR:—The citizens of Montpelier and its vicinity have directed their committee to present you their respectful salutations, and bid you a cordial welcome.

The infancy of our settlements places our progress in the arts and sciences something behind most of our sister states; but we shall not be denied some claim in a share of that ardent love of liberty, and the rights of man, that attachment to the honor and interest of our country, which now so distinguish the American character; while the fields of Hubbardton, the heights of Walloomsack, and the plains of Plattsburgh, are admitted to witness in our favor.

Many of those we now represent, ventured their lives in the Revolutionary contest, and permit us, sir, to say, the value of this opportunity is greatly enhanced by the consideration, that we now tender our respects to one who shared in all the hardships and dangers of that eventful period, which gave liberty and independence to our country; nor are we unmindful that from that period until now, every public act of your life evinces an unalterable attachment to the principles for which you then contended.

With such pledges, we feel an unlimited confidence, that should your measures fulfil your intentions, your administration under the guidance of Divine Providence, will be as prosperous and happy as its commencement is tranquil and promising; and that the honor, the rights and interests of the nation will pass from your hands unimpaired.

JAMES FISK,

For the Committee.

"To this address the President made an affectionate and appropriate reply, which was received with three times three animated cheers by the citizens.

The President then, with his suite, committee, marshals and clergy, visited the schools in the Representatives' room, which was adorned with maps and globes drawn by the scholars; while the front of the gallery and chandelier displayed a beautiful variety of vines and ornaments. The scholars received him by rising, and Mr. Hill, the preceptor of the Academy, by saying, 'I present to Your Excellency the finest blossoms and fairest flowers that our climate produces'—he replied, 'They are the finest nature can produce.' After after taking an affectionate leave of the committee of arrangements, ascended his carriage, and resumed his journey to Burlington."

GEORGE W. BARKER.

BY COL. H. D. HOPKINS.

Mr. Barker was at one time postmaster of Montpelier, and then high sheriff of the County, and at the time of his death, a well-known railroad contractor at Manitowoc, Wis. For many years he was, in

Vermont, a leading man at the Capital, and exerted a strong influence in shaping the action of the democratic party, both personally and through the Vermont Patriot, with which he was for a time connected. When the Vt. Central railroad was building, he was one of the contractors, and made about $10,000—a handsome amount for the time. He subsequently took a contract on the New York end of the Rutland and Washington railroad, but when a crash came in the affairs of that road, he, with others, was obliged to succumb and go down. His loss was a heavy one, and involved others than himself, notably the late Hon. R. R. Keith, who suffered to the amount of $15,000. Mr. Barker's next venture was at Paineville, Ohio, and would have resulted favorably to him but for the fact that the company proved to be insolvent. His next move was Manitowoc above named. Judge Keith, who knew Mr. Barker better than any other man in Montpelier, though he lost by him, always had confidence in his capacity and integrity. Mr. B. was a genial man, a kind neighbor, and especially delighted to speak encouraging words to young men, and the results of some of his endeavors in this line happen to be known to the writer of this brief notice. inspecting the maps and globes, with approbation, he retired; was received at the door by the 'Washington Artillery,' commanded by Capt. Timothy Hubbard, and escorted through a line of citizens extending from the State House to the dwelling of Wyllis I. Cadwell, Esq., where he partook of a cold collation served up with admirable taste and elegance.

The schools then formed a procession, preceded by the 'First Light Company,' with instrumental music, and moved to the Academy. In passing the President's quarters they saluted him; the masters, by uncovering their heads; the misses, by lowering their parasols.

The President having signified his pleasure to dispense with the escort of cavalry,

Barker was a man not to be forgotten. In stature, he was very large, and in manner, exceptionally genial. Though a man of position and well-formed opinions, he could tenaciously maintain his own view of a question without wounding the feelings of another. Mr. Barker was very fond of church music—especially of the fugue tunes in vogue in the early years of the present century, and he, Ferrand F. Merrill, Capt. A. A. Sweet and Dr. Gustavus H. Loomis, all of whom were as fond of that style of music as Mr. Barker was, used to have many a pleasant sit-down together, rehearsing them, and deploring their departure from the choirs and the choir repertoires. Of these four gentlemen, only Capt. Sweet is living at this present writing, Jan. 1882.

RESIDENCE OF GEORGE C. SHEPARD, MAIN STREET.

GEORGE C. SHEPARD, youngest son of the late Jonathan Shepard, was born in Montpelier, Aug. 26, 1820, and has been eminently a Montpelier man, not only spending his life here, but bringing a wife here, who is a grand-daughter of one of the earliest citizens of Montpelier, Thomas Brooks, and daughter of Joseph Brooks, who was a native of Montpelier; and he brought her to a beautiful Montpelier home, in the dwelling of the late Hon. Samuel Prentiss, which has been remodelled and improved so as to become as charming a home as the town can boast of. Mr. Shepard availed himself so well of our schools and Academy, that he has been able to discharge successfully every public duty. He is prominent socially, politically and financially. For some years he was Director, Vice-President and President of the old Bank of Montpelier, and he has been Director and Vice-President of the Montpelier National Bank. He represented the town in the Legislatures of 1862 and '63, and has also represented his Congressional District in a National Convention of the Republican party.

COL. ABEL CARTER,

who during the last days of his life occupied the house now owned and occupied by Col. Fred E. Smith, on Elm street, was a man to be remembered.

He was by trade a saddler and harness-maker, and a man of very positive feelings and opinions, especially in politics. As an abolitionist, he was outspoken, even to bitterness, and delighted to get into an argument with a conservative whig, that he might ply him with hard questions. His hatred of slavery, slave-holders and their apologists—Northern dough-faces, as he delighted to call them, was most intense. He was sheriff of Washington Co. from 1833 to 1837, and held the office of Sergeant-at-Arms at the State House one year, 1837 to '38.

Another prominent and well-known citizen of Montpelier for many years previous to 1868, was

who occupied a small cottage house on Elm street, opposite the old cemetery. He was for many years jailor, and also janitor in the old Brick Church, and his polite attentions to the needs of all worshippers there, are well remembered. He was a prominent Mason, and as such was highly respected. Two lodges of the order are named in honor of his memory, one at Danville, and another in Montpelier. He died in Dec. 1868.

THE OLD BRICK CHURCH.

BY COL. H. D. HOPKINS.

[From a full account of the "Old Brick" and the new "Bethany" church in files of the Argus & Patriot.]

Appreciating the uses of Christian worship, the fathers of the town began in 1817 to discuss the propriety and necessity of a house for this purpose. The first act was the forming of the "Montpelier Meeting-

Wiggins, Joseph Howes "to view the sites proposed, ascertain prices and conveniences of each." Nov. 12, "committee on plan" made their report, not accepted; were instructed to furnish a plan with steeple or cupola.

Nov. 24th, it was voted the house should be for the use of the First Congregationalist Society in Montpelier, under the control of the proprietors; the sale of pews to commence at the State House, Nov. 29th; every note for the purchase of a pew should be payable to the society, and divided into three equal annual payments, one-half in neat stock or grain, and one-half in money; and the house was to be 60 x 70 feet, "exclusive of cupola or steeple," with 122 pews.

Three lots were sharply contested for, one the site of the old brick house back of Mrs. Hyde's; one the lot of Mrs. Joseph Reed, opposite the State House, and the other that on which the Brick church was built. They had to resort to the ballot, taken at the State House, Dec. 10th, which resulted for the Houghton "spot." The house cost over $6,000. We cannot state when it was ready for occupancy, but its use was tendered to the General Assembly for house Society, consisting of 62 gentlemen at first, and which list embraces, we judge, all the then prominent men of Montpelier: Samuel Prentiss, Samuel Goss, E. P. Walton, Geo. Worthington, Nicholas Baylies, Sylvanus Baldwin, Daniel Baldwin, Holden Putnam, Jonathan Shepard, and others. In Dec. 1820, the list was augmented by 25 names more. Of these active men none are now living.

The society at its first meeting, Nov. 4, 1817, voted to build a house, Sylvanus Baldwin, Jeduthan Loomis, Samuel Goss, Calvin Winslow and J. H. Langdon to report a plan; Lovell Warren, Joseph the Election Sermon on the 2d Thursday, Oct. 1820, and to the Masonic Society the day previous, and Dec. 29th, 105 pews had been sold for $7,620, of which Calvin Winslow, the contractor, received $7,000. The highest price paid for a pew was $151, by Joseph Howes. Richard Wilkins, Jeduthan Loomis and Samuel Goss paid $150 each for a pew; Chester Houghton, $140; Jonathan Shepard, $120; Salvin Collins, $117. . . . And the old Brick church remained the Sabbath home of this society for more than 45 years. The last service in it was Sunday, May 6, 1866. In a few days the walls of the old church and the Masonic hall were leveled to the ground, and the present Bethany church occupies the site.

Bethany exterior, 124 x 72, height of nave, 65 feet; Gothic architecture; tower height, 68 feet, 21 x 21; chapel, 50 x 35; ridge, 36 feet from ground; church and tower, walls and buttresses, dark red stone: arches, mouldings, etc., dark blue stone; chapel walls, Burlington stone, almost white, with warm flush of rose; trimmings, of dark red stone; at eastern vestibule, with wide corridor and three porches, with

Choir and organ in the chancel, separated from the pulpit by columns and interlacing arches. The blue ceiling here has crimson and buff borders, panels with ornaments in color and panels with medallions. The walls of the chancel are maroon, border of crimson and buff, vine of oak leaves in blue; chancel windows, stained glass, bordered in blue, each with medallion in crimson; purple wall below each window, border of olive, white and green, with two panels with Gothic heads and spandrels filled with ornaments. The whole coloring of the interior is exceedingly rich and chaste, over nave and aisles, as well as chancel. The compartments formed in the blue ceiling by the roof timbers, have wide, rich borders—diagonal bands of crimson and buff. The roof timbers are a rich maroon, flecked with orange, yellow, and a stellar pattern in lighter maroon; the shields on the ends of hammer-beams, a white ground with crimson border and scroll ornaments; "walls and columns below, neutral gray; shafts, colors of the stained glass in the whole interior, chancel, side walls, clere-story, exceedingly beautiful. The chancel windows and large rose windows are especially rich," with a declaration of the Most Holy Trinity in the centre light of the great rose window.

Our view represents the Interior of this church. For the history of Bethany, see Mr. Walton's paper, page 288; also 396-407. For the historian who writes up the history of the next hundred years of Montpelier, this handsome edifice of stone will remain perfect, as now; to the old which has already passed away, we therefore give the more space and the more care to gather up its fragments now, before irrevocably lost.

BAPTIST CHURCH, SCHOOL STREET.

The organ is superbly pleasing to the eye, harmonizes admirably with the interior of the church, and for general quality of tone, and characteristic voicing of individual stops, we have never heard excelled: The clarionette seems like the veritable instrument itself, the oboe approximates more nearly to the true imitation than any stop we have ever heard called by its name—the vox humana—people hearing it are actually deceived by it, and look around to see who is singing. We have many times heard it pronounced second to no instrument in the country of its size, and are not prepared to deny the statement. Its first concert was the evening before the dedication of Bethany.

AN OLD-TIME SINGING-MASTER,
Col. H. D. HOPKINS, who for 35 years knew all that was going on in all the choirs around; knew all the leading singers; kept singing-school; conducted musical conventions, and for 27 years conducted the music in "Brick" and "Bethany" churches, and so on; who knew the leaders in the "Old Brick" from the first day to the end, and who ought to have been asked for a paper on this subject, and would have been, had the Compiler been aware of his relations to these matters in time. Moses E. Cheney, of Barnard, the old popular singing-master of the State, says, "Brother Hopkins must be remembered when you notice the churches, certainly. He has done more free labor in Montpelier than any other man, and that so well."

The first transient singing-master that ever taught here, says Mr. Hopkins, was Joseph Wilder, from Derby, Vt., and the early choristers of the Brick church were Hon. Joseph Howes, O. H. Smith, Esq., several years, Dr. Gustavus Loomis, Chas. W. Badger, and Moses E. Cheney, who May, 1839, and was attended by townspeople not only, but by clergymen and lawyers from all parts of the State. The facts relating to this convention should not go unmentioned, and the honor of it should be placed where it belongs, with Moses E. Cheney, the true Vermonter and antiquarian.

John H. Paddock was the first organist here. George W. Wilder, who is in business now at the head of State street, an esteemed citizen of Montpelier at the present time, was another organist at the old Brick, also Miss Hosford and a Mrs. Bigelow; and John and Zenas Wood were leading singers at the "Old Brick" in its palmy days, and perhaps others—doubtless.

Mr. H. assisted at, and reported for all the musical conventions held at Montpelier for more than 20 years, in which he says, in report of the Annual Central Vermont

Musical Convention, held at Washington Hall, in this village, Jan. '67—four days. Mr. Phillips, of St. Albans, elicited the first hearty applause, and Professor N. L. Phillips, of Barre, the man who perhaps has taught more singers than any other in Central Vermont, appeared in a superb solo. We are always astonished at the vigor and force of that voice, a grand type of what we led the singing of the old Brick church about 1840, for 3 years, and did much to inspire the service of song with new life. He, also, was the projector and conductor of the first musical convention ever held in Vermont, and it is believed in America. It has been so stated in the public prints, and has never been denied. The convention was held in the old Brick church, wish all voices might be at sixty. The 5th and 6th same annual conventions Mr. Hopkins directed.

His first letter to the Boston Journal was written in 1859, and until the failing of his health, in 1875, he was the only regular Vermont correspondent of that paper. He has also written quite extensively for the Montpelier and other State papers. For some few years he has been too much of an invalid for business labor, but occasionally now writes a good article for press. We have been indebted on these last pages to his present pen and huge old scrap-book for several articles. As a specimen of the Colonel's humorous vein, we purloin the following:

TO MY OLD BOOTS.

BY SOME ONE.

For three full years, and something more,
You've served me a faithful "pair";
I therefore don't wonder that, all things considered,
You're looking "the worse for the wear."

RESIDENCE OF MR. M. D. GILMAN, BALDWIN ST., NEXT DOOR WEST OF THE STATE CAPITOL.

Your "bottons" and "uppers" were "A number one,"
And fitting so snugly about,

Have made a good place to keep "a foot in,"
While the damp and the cold you kept out.

Yes, "A number one!" I wear nothing else;
Double soles—oak-tanned and French calf,
Albert Old Crispin, with impertinence, said,
"You wear number nine and a half."

'Twas a way you had, much to your credit.
In parting, permit me to say,
Of being quite constantly "round under foot,"
And yet, not much in the way.

In bidding you now a long adieu,
And remembering the good you have done,
I give you permission, if the d—I don't get you,
To say that your "soles are your own."

And if in the place where you finally stop,
There should chance to be paper and quill,
Please write me a letter, and tell me if They permit you to "go it boots" still.

SONG OF THE DYING YEAR.

BY JOSEPHINE M. SWEET.

In the race that thou hast run,
In this cycle of the sun,
Hast thou in life's battle won?
What hast thou done?
What hast thou done?

When fears shadowed o'er the field,
In temptation didst thou yield?
Or hast thou in life's battle won?
What hast thou done?
What hast thou done?

Hast thou fainted by the way,
'Neath the burden of noon-day?
Or hast thou in life's battle won?
What hast thou done?
What hast thou done?

LAMENTATION,

[Written soon after the adjournment of the Vermont Legislature, Nov. 1826.]

Montpelier mourns—her streets are still,
Save when the street-yarn ladies spin;
And scarce a stranger's seen at Mann's,
Or Campbell's, or at Cottrill's Inn.

The guardians of the people's rights
Have done their work, gone home to prove it—
And let the State-house stand, because Barnum and Bailey could not move it.

But though the building stands secure,
And long may stand the village boast,
The villagers are called to mourn
The comforts and the friends they've lost.

Their Buller's gone, their Baker, too;
Their Clarks have fed as Swift as thought;
Their Barber's left their chins unshaved,
And e'en their Potter's gone to pot.

Their Walkers limply walked away,
Their Mason and their Smiths are still;
Their Carpenters lay down their tools,
Their honest Miller leaves his mill.

Their skillful Fisher-man has gone
With Bates to lure and Spear to strike;
With him are fled the Finney tribe,
But more especially the Pike.

The Swan they dearly loved to pluck,
Has flown, with plumage bright as gold;
Their Buck has bounded o'er the hills,
Their playful Lamb has broke his fold.

The Noble and the Young have gone,
The Rich have left them to despair;
Their Gay, their Best attire is lost,
And not a Spencer's left to wear.

Their learned Proctor, pious Dean,
And holy Palmer in the lurch,
Have left their flocks, and left them, too,
Without a Temple, Bell or Church.

And those who loved the mazy dance,
Enjoy no more the lively Ball;
They've lost, alas! their pleasure House,
And miss their richly-furnished Hall.

STATE CAPITOL.

They once could boast a pleasant Hill,
Dellightful Rhodes, a charming Lane,
A Warren, Bridge, and Shedd and Barnes,
That they may never see again.

Their Forrest and their Woods are felled,
The Major who their forces led,
Has broken up his glittering Camp,
And friendly Scott and French are fled.

All's lost! the men have lost their Crafts,
They've lost their Ambler and their Wheeler,
Have lost their Steele, their Peck, their Rice;
And, oh! their women have lost their Keeler.

Yes, all is lost, and those who've gone,
Have long ere now, perchance, forgot 'em;
They lost their Solace, lost their Child,
And lost their Pride, and Hyde, and Bottum.

SONS AND CITIZENS OF MONTPELIER ABROAD.

We have not yet obtained a satisfactory list. We will mention here briefly the few not already included in a family notice in these pages, that have been furnished to us chiefly by Chas. De F. Bancroft and Mr. Walton, and will be pleased if a more extensive list may be given for the County volume.—ED.

L. L. WALBRIDGE, a native of Montpelier, has been reporter for the Boston Journal, and city editor of the St. Louis Democrat; is one of the best short-hand writers in the country; was one of the witnesses on the impeachment trial of President Johnson.

WM. PITT KELLOGG, present U. S. Senator from Louisiana, the son of Rev. Sherman Kellogg, we counted once as a "Montpelier boy;" also, HENRY C. NUTT, son of Henry Nutt, of this town, now President of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad; JOEL MEAD, a wealthy lumber merchant in Sheboygan, Wis.; JAMES MEAD, his brother, a leading banker in Oshkosh, Wis. Their aged mother still resides with us; WM. P. STRONG, son of the old hotel-keeper here. President of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, a brother of his in Faribault, Minn., and another, a prominent business man in Beloit, Wis.; EDWIN S. MERRILL, son of the late Timothy Merrill, in Winchendon, Mass.; GEORGE SILVER, son of Isaiah Silver, in Tivola, N. Y.; JAMES DAVIS, son of Anson Davis, and great-grandson of Col. Jacob Davis, Professor in an Institution in New York City; DODGE W. KEITH, son of Hon. R. W. Keith, who gives his father's portrait to the work, a successful merchant in Chicago; HAROLD SPRAGUE, a merchant in Chicago; R. J. RICHARDSON, of Des Moines, Iowa, a grain merchant; JAMES and FRANK MULDOON were born poor boys, now successful traders in Wisconsin; HENRY L. LAMB, in Troy, inspector of banks, has been editor on the Troy Times; Col. E. M. BROWN, editor of the New Orleans Delta during Butler's administration; AZEL SPALDING, a member of the Kansas House of Representatives in 1861; Hon. A. W. SPALDING, son of Azel, Senator of Jefferson County, Kansas, in 1862; FRED. T. BICKFORD, who has been Superintendent of the U. S. Telegraph Co. at Pittsburg, Pa., and Superintendent of the Russian Extension Telegraph Co's. line in Siberia, now at Washington, D. C., we think; and many others whom the old friends at home would be pleased to see enrolled on their list of sons and citizens abroad.

EAST MONTPELIER.

BY HON. S. S. KELTON.

The town of East Montpelier was organized Jan. 1, 1849, having been set off from Montpelier by the General Assembly at their session in 1848, on the petition of citizens of Montpelier village. The meeting for organization was called by Addison Peck, a justice of the peace, on the petition of 6 freeholders to him directed for that purpose.

The officers elected at this first meeting were: Mod. Addison Peck; town clerk, Royal Wheeler; selectmen, Stephen F. Stevens, Isaac Cate, J. C. Nichols; treas., A. Peck; overseer of poor, A. Peck; constable, J. P. W. Vincent.

The first child born in town, after organization, was Clara Davis, daughter of Pearly and Cynthia Davis, Jan. 19, 1849. The first marriage was Rodney G. Bassett and L. Amelia Willard, Jan. 21, 1849, by Charles Sibley, justice of peace.

The town is bounded northerly by Calais, easterly by Plainfield and a small part of Marshfield, southerly by Berlin, from which it is separated by the Winooski river and a part of Barre, and westerly by Montpelier and Middlesex, and contains 18,670 acres; population in 1880, 972; grand list in 1881, $9,251.

The township is watered by the Winooski river, which runs through the southerly corner, and along the southerly boundary, by Kingsbury Branch, which, after draining the numerous ponds in Woodbury and Calais, crosses the northeasterly corner of the town, and enters the Winooski; (its name was derived from that of an early settler living near the stream,) and by numerous small streams, affording many excellent mill-sites. The surface of the town is uneven, but the soil is good and productive, and there is scarcely any waste land in town. The prevailing character of the rocks is slate and lime, with granite boulders scattered in the easterly part. Of timber, the sugar maple, beech, spruce and hemlock largely predominate, with a great variety in less quantity.

There are some very fine sugar orchards in this town; that of Cyrus Morse numbers 2,750 trees, all supplied with tin tubs, the sugar-house and fixtures being fully equal to the requirements of so large a number of trees. In a good season they make 10,000 lbs. of sugar, for which there is a ready sale, rendering it one of the best industries of a large farm.

The industries of East Montpelier are chiefly, almost exclusively, agricultural; the farms are of medium size, generally containing from 75 to 150 acres, some of 200 to 300, and a few as large as 400 acres, devoted to a mixed husbandry, the dairy decidedly taking the lead; some attention is given to the rearing of blood stock,—of horses, cattle, sheep and swine.

There are two small villages in town, situated on the Winooski, containing a meeting-house, school-house, store, tavern, post-office, established about 1825, a grist-mill, saw-mill with planer, two carpenters and joiners and blacksmith shop.

This village has suffered great loss by fires: 1817, or thereabouts, a hulling mill was burned; 1825, or '26, a blacksmith shop; 1847, the tavern-house, store, two barns and all the out buildings,—property of John Mellen; 1852, the Union store and goods; 1859, the blacksmith shop of G. W. Lewis; 1868, the store and goods of C. H. Stevens, together with the barn of C. C. Willard; 1869, the store of J. C. Nichols, with the goods, the property of Col. Randall; also in the immediate neighborhood, 1857, the house of Norman French; 1866, the house of George Daggett, one of the best houses ever built in town—struck by lightning; 1871, the barns of C. A. Tabor, together with all the farm produce, tools, and four horses.

[Store and tavern since burned.—ED.]

situated on Kingsbury branch, contains a post-office, store, grist-mill, saw-mill, woolen-factory, boot and shoe-shop, blacksmith shop, and the manufacture of musical instruments by E. D. & G. G. Nye. The water power in this place is very excellent.

There are ten school districts in town, each supplied with a good, well-finished school-house, where a school is kept from 6 to 9 months each year, besides four fractional districts, where the scholars attend school in adjacent towns.

LIBRARIES.

In 1794, a circulating library was established at the center of the town, in the house of Pearley Davis,—he being librarian,—containing 200 volumes, made up of history, travels, biography, and works of scientific, philosophic or moral character. These books were freely circulated through the town for a long period of years. The ladies' circulating library was established in East village in 1859, containing 223 vols. A Sunday school library of 290 vols. in 1850: one at North Montpelier of 160 vols. in 1867. In 1861, an agricultural library was organized at East village of 116 vols., which was burned in C. H. Stevens' store, in 1868.

CHURCH EDIFICES.

There are four meeting-houses in town; that belonging to the Society of Friends was first used as such, in 1802, having previously been used as the store of Col. Robbins. The Union Meeting-house at the center of the town was built in 1823, and is also used as a town-house.

At east village is a Universalist house, built in 1833, the Rev. John E. Palmer, of Barre, preaching the dedication sermon, Jan. 8, 1834.

At North Montpelier a Universalist house was built in 1867. This is much the best house, in the belfry of which is one of the best bells in the vicinity.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

In 1793, there was a religious society of Friends organized in the east part of the town, who for many years assembled themselves together regularly twice a week, a meek and contrite people, under the preaching of Clark Stevens. It was their custom to hold silent meetings, when the spirit of the Lord did not move them to speak.

FREEWILL BAPTISTS.

There was a Freewill Baptist church organized in the east part of the town at an early day, and a great awakening in the religious cause, under the efficient labors of Elder Benjamin Page. They held their meetings in barns, dwelling-houses, or anywhere where the way was open for them. Subsequently there was a church organized by the same denomination in the north part of the town, under the preaching of Elder Paul Holbrook.

UNIVERSALISTS OF EAST MONTPELIER.

Two of the most active pioneers of this society were the late Gen. Parley Davis of Montpelier Center, and Arthur Daggett, who lived and died near the East village. These first settlers in town had preaching of the faith they cherished, at an early day. Rev. William Farwell, Hosea Ballou, Paul Dean and John E. Palmer were the first ministers. Their society here was organized Feb. 8, 1834. The cause prospered until there was more of this faith in town than any other. The resident pastors of "The Universalist Society" were Rev. Tracy R. Spencer, R. M. Byram, Simeon Goodenough and Lester Warren. Rev. Mr. Warren, now living in town, says he was employed for this society by Parley Davis, Arthur Daggett and others, in May, 1838. He preached once or twice a month, in the Center and at the East village, for 9 years. And now he has "vesper service" in the new church at the North village, once in two weeks. The meetings are well attended, as are also a "course of lectures" arranged by "The Prudential committee" of "The Lyceum." Rev. E. Ballou also preached alternately with Mr. W. for several years, until the settlement of the late Rev. T. R. Spencer.

EPISCOPAL METHODISTS.

Rev. Jesse Lec, who was the pioneer of Methodism in New England, first preached in this town in 1795, and formed the first society. He was succeeded by Rev. Ralph Williston, Nicholas Sneathen, Gideon Draper, and others.

Alexander Parker, his wife and two or three of their daughters, Enoch Cate and wife, Sylvanus Morse and wife, David Persons and wife, John Stevens and wife, Joseph and James Gould and their wives, were among the early Methodists of the town.

Since the organization of the society they have, like most institutions, experienced at intervals seasons of prosperity and decline.

THE CHRISTIANS.

There was a society of Christians organized in this town a few years since, who supported preaching a portion of the time.

EPIDEMICS.

Of epidemics, only 4 deserving the name have occurred from the first settlement of the town to the present day. The first of these was the dysentery, which fatally prevailed in the summer and fall of 1802. The second was the typhus fever, which prevailed to considerable extent in the summer of 1806. The third, that fearful disease known by the name of spotted fever, which suddenly made its appearance in the winter of 1811. In the fall and winter of 1813, the typhus fever again very fatally prevailed. The number of deaths from this disease in the whole (old) town, was 78: much the larger number of which were outside the present limits of East Montpelier.

The town is believed to be one of the healthiest in the State; the average number of deaths for the last 20 years has been 17; the largest number in 1862, being 29; the smallest number in 1867, only 7.

The oldest person living in town is Anna Gould, born at Sutton, Mass., Aug. 12, 1787; came to this town in 1803; is the widow of Simeon Gould, who died in 1879, aged 98 years, by whom she had 9 children, of whom 7 are now living at this writing, (Sept. 1881). Mr. and Mrs. Gould's marriage life was 70 years.

The oldest person who was born in town is Mrs. Paulina Davis, widow of the late Timothy Davis, and daughter of Clark Stevens, born Sept. 15, 1795. (Oct. 1, '81.)

Mrs. Harriet Goodwin, widow of Hon. Israel Goodwin, and daughter of Capt. Isaac Putnam, born July 29, 1796.

The oldest inhabitant of the town is Mrs. Sally Vincent, widow of Capt. Isaac Vincent, and daughter of Darius Boyden, Esq., born at Worcester, Mass., July 4, 1793; came to East Montpelier early in 1794, and has lived in town continuously since, 87 years, 7 months.

The oldest person who ever lived in town was Mrs. Molly Gould, who died in 1851, aged 102 years, 1 month. Mrs. Gould was born at Sutton, Mass., in 1749; married John Gould of the same town in 1768; raising a large family of children; came to this town in 1811.

THE EARLY SETTLEMENT.

It is by no means certain, who cut the first tree, or built the first house. Gen. Pearley Davis undoubtedly made the first pitch, being two lots of the first division, at the center of the town, of which he received a deed from Jacob Davis, May 28, 1788, the consideration being "eighty pounds, lawful money." He made a beginning soon after, putting up a log-house and barn that season, but returned to Massachusetts to teach school the following winter. He cut and stacked the hay on a beaver meadow in the north part of the town, (now owned by E. H. Vincent) that season, which was mostly drawn to Col. Jacob Davis' the following winter, he falling short of fodder for his teams, and those of new settlers who would stop for a time with him on their arrival.

In June, 1788, John Templeton and Solomon Dodge came to East Montpelier, from Peterboro, N. H., and commenced felling the forest on their respective lots, (being adjacent) preparatory to establishing their new homes, returning to New Hampshire to do their haying, after which, they worked the remainder of the season, clearing their land, and building each a log-house. The following spring, 1789, in March, they returned with their families for a permanent settlement, accompanied by their father-in-law, James Taggart. After stopping about three weeks with Col. Jacob Davis, they proceeded to their new homes, 5 miles distant, the snow at this time being 2 feet deep. On arriving at Mr. Templeton's house, the roof having been covered with bark, a part of which had blown off, they found the snow nearly as deep inside the house as out. This had a decided cool look, but there was no backing down, the snow was shoveled out, a fire built, and they spent the remainder of their days on that farm, which is still owned and occupied by their grandson, Austin Templeton.

Mr. Dodge and wife lived and died on their adjacent farm, where their youngest daughter still resides, the wife of J. R. Young. These were the first families that moved into the town of East Montpelier.

During the first season all their grain had to be brought from Brookfield, (getting it ground at Williamstown) a distance of 20 miles,—on a man's back.

In the fall of this year, (1789) as their first crops were harvested, Col. Davis' mill on North Branch was ready to do the grinding, and save the Brookfield tramp.

Mrs. Templeton was accustomed to say in her later years, that she did not see a woman, except her two sisters, (Jenna Taggart who lived with her and Mrs. Dodge,) for a year, lacking one day, and that no family (except as above) lived nearer than Col. Jacob Davis', being 5 miles. Mr. Templeton died May 18, 1813, aged 48 years.

The third family that moved into town, was Jonathan Snow and wife, in March, 1790,—Mr. Snow having been here and made a small beginning the summer before, in the east part of the town. They stopped several days with Mr. Templeton on their way. After living on their land two or three years, Mr. Snow sold out to his father-in-law, Barnabas Hammett, and lived a year or two below Montpelier village, returning to an adjacent lot of his first beginning, now owned and occupied by his youngest son, Alonzo Snow, where he continued to reside. Mr. Snow was born at Rochester, Mass., July 12, 1768, married Lydia Hammett Feb. 11, 1790, and came to this town by the then express train, an ox team; after rearing a large family, died Mar. 31, 1846.

During 1790, quite a large addition was made to the population, for we find that March 29, 1791, at the organization of the old town, of the 27 voters present, 24 were residents of East Montpelier, viz: Benjamin I. Wheeler, David Parsons, Pearley Davis, Ebenezer Dodge, Solomon Dodge, Nathaniel Peck, David Wing, Lemuel Brooks, Clark Stevens, Jonathan Snow, Hiram Peck, James Taggart, John Templeton, Elisha Cummins, Jonathan Cutler, Charles McCloud, Isaac Putnam, Nathaniel Davis, Jerahmel Wheeler, Smith Stevens, Charles Stevens, Edmund Doty, Duncan Young. The last survivor of this pioneer band, was Elisha Cummins, who died Nov. 21, 1860, aged 93 years.

The first child born in town was James Dodge, son of Solomon Dodge, Apr. 5, 1790; the first female child born was Mary Templeton, daughter of John Templeton, May 3, 1791. The first death was that of Betsey Cate, a child of Enoch Cate, 8 months old. The first resident of East Montpelier who was married was Clark Stevens, with Huldah Foster of Rochester, Mass., Dec. 30, 1792. The first meeting-house was a log-house, built by Clark Stevens and Caleb Bennett, (Friends), on the highway near the line of their farms, in 1793, and used as such till 1802. This is believed to be the first meeting-house ever built in Washington County.

Dr. Philip Vincent was the first physician who came into town; he came from New Braintree, Mass., in February, 1795, and settled where his grandson, Horace M. Vincent, now resides; died in 1813, aged 54 years. The first merchant was Col. David Robbins, who built and began trade in what is now the Quaker meeting-house, in 1796. The first tavern kept in town was by Freeman Snow, opened in 1798 or '99, near where George Davis now lives. The first saw-mill was built by Pearley Davis, on the brook at the N. W. corner of lot no. 45, 1st div., in 1792, he having bought 2 acres of land for that purpose, of Caleb Bennett, for which he paid "three pounds, lawful money."

The first grist-mill was built by Samuel Rich, in 1795, on Kingsbury Branch, where the mill of M. V. B. Hollister now stands.

SAMUEL RICH

was born at Sutton, Mass., Feb. 24, 1769. He came to this town in 1792; was married to Margaret McCloud Dec. 1, 1796. Besides doing an extensive farming business, (owning 700 acres of land) he built and run a grist-mill, a saw-mill, a carding-machine, a fulling-mill, a brick-yard and distillery; he also kept a tavern for a number of years subsequently to 1805.

In 1805, he built a very nice, large dwelling-house, said to have been the best house in the County at that time. The place was known for a long term of years, as Rich's Hollow, so largely did his business predominate over that of all others. He was a carpenter by trade, and built the large barn (80x32 feet) for Nathaniel Davis, in 1793, being the first barn of any magnitude ever built in this town. He died in 1827, leaving 10 sons and daughters, one of whom, Jacob Rich Esq., resided at the old homestead at the time of his death, in 1878.

BENJAMIN I. WHEELER.

Born at Rehoboth, Mass., Sept. 19, 1766; settled at an early date in Montpelier, now East Montpelier, on the farm where he lived until his death. In the spring of 1793, he married Huldah French, of Attleboro, Mass. At the organization of the town of Montpelier, in 1791, he was elected one of the listers and one of the highway surveyors, and the same year town grand juror. In 1792, he was elected selectman, and held that office 16 years previous to 1818. He died March 7, 1845.

JERAHMEL B. WHEELER.

Born at Rehoboth, Mass.; settled in Montpelier, now East Montpelier, at an early date, on the farm where he lived till his death. He married Sybil French, of Attleboro, Mass. In 1792, he was elected first constable, and that year warned the first freemen's meeting ever held in that town. Afterwards, between 1806 and 1813, he held the office of selectman 5 years, and was justice of the peace several years. He died in the spring of 1835.

MAJ. NATHANIEL DAVIS.

Among the men of business prominence in the early history of the town, none were more conspicuous than Nathaniel Davis. He was born at Oxford, Mass., Nov. 25, 1769; in 1789, he came to Montpelier and purchased a tract of land in the north-east part of the town, and commenced a clearing at once, there being but two families in what is now East Montpelier at that time. In 1792, having married Miss Dolly Davis of his native town, he commenced house-keeping, and doing business on a large scale. The following year, he built a saw-mill on his farm, having turned a brook a mile above him to obtain sufficient water to run the mill. In addition to clearing up his farm very rapidly, in 1793, or '94, he built a barn 80x32 feet; in '95, he built a two-story house 42x32 feet,—the same being occupied by his son Col. Nathaniel Davis, at the time of his death, in 1879; this is the oldest house in town at this writing, 1881. Before the year 1800, he built a potash and store, and did an extensive and successful mercantile business for about 25 years.

Soon after 1810, Mr. Davis commenced what is now the village of East Calais, by building at that place, a grist-mill, saw-mill, nail factory, a scythe factory, and opening a store; subsequently this property was surrendered to 2 of his daughters, having married the Hon. Shubael Wheeler and Samuel Rich, Jr. Esq. Another daughter, who married N. C. King, Esq., was equally as well provided for.

In 1825, Mr. Davis having closed his mercantile business, and disposed of his outside property, as above, in connection with his son commenced doing a more extensive farming business, by buying farm after farm, till they were able to sell more than 100 head of beef cattle per annum.

In 1838, they built the large woolen factory at North Montpelier, which, in consequence of an unfortunate partnership, entered into at the completion of the building, was a very disastrous enterprise. He died in 1843, aged 74 years.

(From Thompson's History of Montpelier.)

a son of Nathaniel and Sarah Davis, was born in Oxford, (in the part afterwards becoming Charlton,) Mass., Mar. 31, 1766, and, after receiving rather an unusually good English education, at the then new academy in the neighboring town of Leicester, including a knowledge of surveying, he came into town with Col. Davis, bringing his set of surveyor's instruments.

and at once engaging in the original surveys of the township, first as an assistant and finally as a principal surveyor of the town and county.

It was while thus employed, as he once told the writer of this sketch, that, coming on to the splendid swell of forest land then crowning the elevation at the center of the town, he was so struck with the general indications of the soil and the natural beauty of the location, as seen beneath the growth of stately maples, cumbered with little underbrush, that he resolved he would here make his pitch, feeling confident that this must be the seat of town business, and then believing even that it would become the site of its most populous village.

The mistake of Gen. Davis, so far as regarded the growing up of much of a village on the highlands of the town, appears to have been quite a common one with our early settlers. Impressed at first, as he was, with the inviting appearance of the higher parts of their respective townships, when contrasted with the forbidding aspect of the dark and tangled valleys, the most able and enterprising of them, for a general thing, made their pitches accordingly, as in the instances of the settlements of Randolph, Danville, and dozens of other towns in this State. But they soon found their anticipated villages slipping down into the valleys, to leave them, in that respect, high and dry on the hills, with the most traveled roads all winding along the streams. First, there must be mills; then a place near to shoe horses; then a place for refreshment of both man and horse; and while all this is going on, it is a convenience and a saving of time to be able to purchase a few family necessities; thence, to meet these calls, first comes the blacksmith's shop, then the tavern, then the store; and you have the nucleus of a continually growing village already formed; while people soon find out it is easier going round a hill than over it, and build their roads accordingly.

So far, however, as regarded the seat of town business, Gen. Davis' predictions were fulfilled; for he, having pitched on a tract of 300 acres of land at the center, and built a commodious house, had the satisfaction of seeing it the receptacle of all town meetings till a public house was erected; and the latter was the place of such meetings, either for the whole town or his part of it, up to the day of his death. At all these town meetings he was always an active and influential participator. And in looking over the records of the town for the first half century of its corporate existence, we can scarcely find a page on which his name does not appear coupled with some of its most important trusts or offices.

In 1794, he was elected captain of the first military company ever organized in town; and before the year had closed he was promoted to the office of major of the regiment formed from the companies of the different towns in this section. In 1798, he was elected a colonel of the regiment; and in 1799, he was still further promoted to the prominent post of general. In 1799, he was also honored by his townsmen with a seat in the legislature, and received from them 2 elections as their representative in the General Assembly.

In 1794, Gen. Davis married Miss Rebecca Peabody, daughter of Col. Stephen Peabody of Amherst, N. H., the lady of whose medical skill and general usefulness we have particularly spoken while treating of the incidents and characters of the early settlement. From this union sprang 7 daughters, most of whom lived to connect themselves with the best families of this or other towns; and one of them, (now deceased,) Mrs. Truman Pitkin, whose family occupy the old homestead, was the mother of Perley P. Pitkin, Esq., the present representative of East Montpelier; while of the surviving, one, endowed with high gifts of poesy, is the widow of the late Hon. S. Pitkin, and another the wife of the Hon. Royal Wheeler.

Gen. Davis, in the expanded benevolence of his mind, appeared to take an interest in the welfare of all his fellow-men, and particularly so of the young, for whose improvement in knowledge he labored earnestly and always. He was one of the most active and liberal in establishing a Town Library. He was ever anxious to see our common schools supplied with competent teachers; and in subscriptions, and in the education of his daughters, he largely patronized our academy. He was one of the most pleasant, animated and instructive of companions, one of the best of neighbors, and one of the most public spirited and useful of citizens. In short, with his strong, massive person, prepossessing face, intelligent eye, genial and hearty manner, and earnest tone of conversation, he was one whom the world would unite in calling a grand old fellow, and as such he will be remembered till the last of the generation who knew him shall have followed him to the grave.

He died April 14, 1848, at the age of a little over 82 years. His relict, Mrs. Rebecca Peabody Davis, died Feb. 5, 1854, aged about 83 years and 6 months.

CLARK STEVENS

was born in Rochester, Mass., Nov. 15, 1764. At the age of 18, he was drafted as Lebarck Stevens is my name

From youth to age its been the same

a soldier, and served in that capacity several months during one of the last years of the American Revolution. After leaving the army, he engaged himself as a seaman at the neighboring port of New Bedford, and spent several years in the ventures of the ocean. But the perils he had here encountered in the whaling and coasting trade, not only revived the religious impressions formerly experienced, but led him to resolve on the quiet pursuits of husbandry, and to remove, with that object in view, to the new town of Montpelier in Vermont. Accordingly he immigrated into this town in 1790, in company with David Wing, the elder, and his sons, purchased and at once began to clear up the valuable farm near Montpelier East village, which has ever since been the family homestead. After effecting a considerable opening in the wilderness, and building the customary log-house and barn, he returned to the land of his fathers, and, Dec. 13, 1792, married Miss Huldah Foster of his native Rochester; brought her immediately on and installed her as the mistress of his heart and household.

Soon after his marriage, Mr. Stevens appears to have been more deeply than ever exercised with his religious convictions; when soon, by the aid of some neighbors who, like himself, had previously united themselves with the Society of Friends or Quakers, he built a log-meeting-house on the bank of a little brook a short distance to the north-west of his dwelling. And here, under his lead, that little band of congenial worshipers established in the wilderness the first altar for the worship of the living God ever erected in Washington County. Subsequently this band was received into membership with the New York Society of Friends, who held monthly meetings in Danby, in the south-western part of Vermont, which meetings were eventually established at Starksboro, in this State. Of the latter, he became a regular monthly attendant, and in 1815, having, besides being the leader and teacher of his Society at home, travelled, each year, hundreds of miles to attend monthly, quarterly and yearly meetings in Vermont, New York, and in the different States of New England, and everywhere evinced his faithfulness as a laborer, and his ability as a religious speaker and teacher, he was publicly acknowledged by the Starksboro Association as a regular and accepted minister of the gospel. Years before this, through his instrumentality, and that of his worthy and perhaps most energetic fellow-laborer in the cause, the late Caleb Bennett, his Society at home had been considerably enlarged, and a commodious meeting-house erected a half mile or more distant from the first primitive one above mentioned.

But if Clark Stevens was a man of the intelligence and virtue which caused him to be placed in such a prominent position in his religious connections, why was he not, as well as other citizens of his town of the same grade of capacity, promoted to posts of civil trusts, or other wordly honors? It was because, after having been made the second town clerk of the town, and reluctantly consented to serve in that capacity one year—it was simply because he ever uniformly declined to accept them. Time and again would the town gladly have made him their representative in the Legislature. But all movements of that kind were by him promptly discouraged and stopped at the outset. On the organization of the new county of Jefferson, in such high esteem were his worth and abilities held by the leading men of the county at large that, on their united recommendation, he was, without his knowledge or consent, appointed by the Legislature to the more important and tempting office of a judge of the court. But this he also promptly declined, and gave the public to understand that civil honors had so few charms for him that it would thereafter be in vain for them to offer them for his acceptance.

Thus, "he had wrought out his work, and wrought it well." Thus he lived, and thus, at the ripe age of nearly ninety, he peacefully passed away, at his old residence, on the 20th of December, 1853, with the characteristic words on his lips: "I have endeavored to do what I apprehended was required of me. I have nought but feelings of love for all mankind; and my hope of salvation is based on the mercy of God through his Son Jesus Christ."

Personally, Clark Stevens was one of the finest looking men of his times. Full 6 feet high, and nobly proportioned, with a shapely contour of head and features, dark eyes and a sedate, thoughtful countenance, his presence was unusually imposing and dignified. He was a prince in appearance, but a child in humility. He was unquestionably a man of superior intellect, and that intellect was, in all its traits, peculiarly well balanced. But it was his great and good heart which shown out the most conspicuously through all the actions of his long and beneficent life. In fine, Clark Stevens, in the truest sense of the term, was a great man. D. P. T.

"Goodness without greatness
Is but an empty show;
But, O, how rich and beautiful!
When they together grow."

ISAAC GRAY

died in East Montpelier, Oct. 7, 1874, aged 97 years, 2 months, 16 days. He was the oldest man in the county at the time of his death, having resided in the town where he died one day over 80 years. He was born in Rochester, Mass., July 22, 1777. John and May Gray, his parents, started with their 9 children for Vermont, Sept. 14, 1794, and arrived at Caleb Bennett's, in Montpelier—now East Montpelier—Oct. 6, following, having been 22 days on the road, their only means of conveyance of family and goods having been an ox-cart drawn by two pairs of oxen. Mr. Bennett had come from New Bedford, Mass., two or three years earlier, and with him Mr. Gray and family, being old acquaintances, stopped a number of days, as did Thomas Allen and family, who had traveled with the Grays from the old Bay State; this made a pretty thick-settled family, but large houses were not such a necessity then as now.

SAMUEL TEMPLETON,

born at Peterboro, N. H., Nov. 15, 1788, came to East Montpelier in March, 1789. He was at the time of his death one of the oldest residents of East Montpelier,—aged 89 years, 7 months, 15 days. When the deceased was but 4 months old, his father, John Templeton, in company with Solomon Dodge, removed to East Montpelier from Peterboro, N. H., at that time there being no families in that locality, and but one, Col. Jacob Davis, in the then limits of Montpelier. On their arrival here the snow was so deep that they were unable to proceed further, and were compelled to stop with Col. Davis a week. Reaching their new home, they discovered that the roofs of the rude shanties which they had erected the year previous had been blown off, and the snow was as deep in their houses as on the ground, they being compelled to shovel the snow out, and make their beds as best they could. The two men had married sisters, named Taggart, and cleared farms adjoining, that on which Sam'l Templeton died being the one cleared by his father, while a daughter of Mr. Solomon Dodge, Mrs. John R. Young, resides on the one which her father cleared. The deceased was a good, reliable citizen, and leaves one son and a daughter—Austin Templeton, of East Montpelier, and Mrs. James M. Howland, of Montpelier. Although Mr. Templeton had always lived on the same place, yet he has resided in four counties and two towns, and paid taxes in three counties.

DR. NATHANIEL CLARK KING,

came to Montpelier, now East Montpelier, about 1812. He was born in Rochester, Mass., July 19, 1789, being one of five brothers, and the third son of Jonathan King and Mary Clark King.

In his boyhood he attended district school until fifteen years old, when his father gave him his time, and he was to provide for himself. He immediately entered a private school to fit himself for teaching, and the study of medicine. He studied the languages, Greek and Latin, and made such progress that he taught school the winter after he was sixteen, and began to read medicine in 1808; and continued to teach, and read, until the fall of 1811. Having studied, mixed medicines, and visited patients more or less with Dr. Foster of Rochester for 3 years, he attended medical lectures at Hanover, N. H., Dr. Nathan Smith being at the head of the medical department of Dartmouth College at that time.

He began practice at North Montpelier about 1812, having a sister residing in that vicinity, and in 1814, at the call for volunteers he went, as surgeon, with others, to Plattsburgh when the British invaded that place. In 1817, he married Miss Fanny, second daughter of Maj. Nath. Davis, one of the foremost settlers in town, engaged in mercantile pursuits. About this time his father-in-law Davis offered him a good chance to go into trade, which he accepted, and gradually ceased to visit the sick generally, prescribing for and visiting only those who were especially anxious for his counsel. After years of trade and careful investment of savings, he became perhaps the wealthiest resident in East Montpelier. In 1849 and 1850, he represented the town in the legislature, and for many years did a large justice business; many sought his advice in matters important to them, and being a well-informed, social man, of large acquaintance, many couples formerly applied to him to join them in marriage.

Between 1818 and 1835, six children were born to him, only three of whom reached maturity, and are living at the present time—two of them at Montpelier, with one of whom he now resides at the age of 92, and until within a few months retaining his faculties in a remarkable degree. Naturally a man of strong mind, capable, honest and conscientious, yet full of pleasantry and anecdote, he has endured with fortitude and even cheerfulness whatever misfortunes came upon him, and in the course of a long life has made numerous friends, many of the younger class of whom yet often call to see him, while few or none of his earlier associates now remain.

Although his father was an orthodox deacon, and his oldest brother a clergyman of the same denomination, views broader and more hopeful have ever found a place in his heart.

A very remarkable instance of longevity, is, of a Mrs. Betsy Carroll and her three daughters of this town. Mrs. Carroll died at the age of 99 years; one daughter, Mrs. Lucinda Cutler at the age of 93; the second, Mrs. Abigail Cutler at the age of 91, and the other now living in town, Mrs. Polly Gould at the age of 90 years.

SUICIDES AND CASUALTIES

Within the present limits of East Montpelier from its settlement to Dec., 1881.

BY TRUMAN C. KELTON, TOWN CLERK.

A little girl, daughter of B. Nash, was killed by a falling tree in the east part of the town previous to 1800.

A man by the name of Chamberlin, about 21 years of age, was killed by a falling tree during the year 1801, near the center of the town, and another the following year by the name of Robinson, in the north part of the town.

The wife of John Cutler hung herself in 1801.

The foregoing are taken from D. P. Thompson's History of Montpelier.

A man by the name of Alonzo Kingsley was killed by a tree on the farm now owned by George H. Chase, about 1800; and Daniel Blanchard was killed by a falling tree Sept., 1803, near the site of No. 5, or four corners school house.

A child of Jonathan Edwards fell from a raft and drowned in the lower pond of N. Montpelier, about 1825.

Charles Plumb was drowned while bathing, about 1819, just below the Clark Stevens bridge, aged 16 years.

Nancy Waugh committed suicide by drowning in the brook east of George Davis' residence, about 1829.

Elisha Gray, aged about 28, drowned or died in a fit occasioned by plunging in the water when over-heated, Aug. 19, 1831. A child of Heman Powers was drowned by falling from a raft, at East village mill-pond.

The wife of Henry French committed suicide with the razor, near East Village.

Also a man by the name of Ladd. William Stoddard committed suicide by hanging, at the present residence of Aro P. Slayton.

A child of Theophilus Clark died from being scalded by sitting into a pail of hot water.

William Alger died from a gun shot wound, (accident) April 5, 1844, on the farm now known as the Norcross farm.

Charles Pitkin died at A. J. Hollister's from accidental gun shot wound.

Dec. 22, 1857, George W. Jacobs died from poison by taking a solution of corrosive sublimate by mistake.

June 25, 1860, Abner Chapman, aged 13 years, and Herbert L. Nye, aged 7 years, son of George G. Nye, were drowned while bathing in the Branch below N. Montpelier.

July 5, 1862, Nathan Parker, aged 72, died from being gored by a bull.

Oct. 31, 1863, Ellison Albee, aged 26, fell from a loaded wagon and was run over and killed, while at work for Elon O. Hammond.

Feb. 15, 1866, Eustice Morris, aged 53, was killed by a falling tree while chopping for T. C. Kelton.

July 13, 1868, Zadock H. Hubbard, aged 25, died from sun-stroke, while at work for Charles A. Tabor.

Nov. 9, 1873, Pliny P. Pearsons, aged 34, died from a cut on the head by a circular saw, while working under the mill at N. Montpelier.

Nov. 22, 1875, Bessie K. Lord, aged 5, daughter of Rev. W. H. Lord, of Montpelier, was thrown from a carriage and killed in the west part of the town.

Arbuckle murder.—Hiram W. Arbuckle, aged 27, living with his mother at East Village, April 13, 1877, shot George Shortt, a young man of 16, who was sitting on a bench by the stove in the grist-mill. The ball striking the breast bone, glanced down to the left side. Shortt starting to leave by a back door was hit in the arm above the elbow by a second ball, after its passing through the stove-pipe, he at the same time stumbling over some wood on the floor. The appearance was that the last shot was fatal. Arbuckle immediately left the mill and went to the black-smith shop of his brother-in-law, George W. Bancroft, and shot him twice and then returned back near the mill. About that time, Bancroft came out of the shop and started for his house. Arbuckle seeing him, ran after him and chased him round some lumber near the road. Bancroft then changed his course and ran for the mill, followed by Arbuckle, who fired again just as he was entering the mill door, he falling dead on the floor. Arbuckle then went to his home and remained there until the arrival of the constable, George Howland, who had been sent for about a mile distant, when he stepped out at a back door and shot himself, falling dead instantly. The situation of the mill, shop and house are is about like the points of a triangle, 12 rods apart, and Bancroft's house next to the other house. The young man, Shortt, strange to say, was not fatally hit, the ball of the first shot was taken out on the outside of the left ribs, some 8 or 10 inches from where it struck him. At the time of the shooting, the miller, Mr. Clifford, and two other neighbors were in the mill, and no one except Bancroft was in the shop. No cause can be assigned for the shooting, except an unpleasantness with Shortt, growing out of a collision of teams some time previous at a ride, and the dissipation of Bancroft and treatment to his wife, who was the sister of Arbuckle.

July 18, 1878, Henry R. Campbell fell from a load of hay and was killed.

Dec. 20, 1878, Bert R. Macomber, aged 17, committed suicide by shooting.

Nov. 30, 1879, Doct. John H. Peck died from over dose of chloroform.

April 24, 1880, Byron Eastman, aged 20, was drowned by the upsetting of a boat at North Montpelier.

SYLVANUS SHEPHERD

is remembered by the citizens of Montpelier as an odd character about town in its early days. His brother, Willard Shepherd, was one of the early settlers of East Montpelier, and became an opulent farmer. The old two-story brick house he built near the line of East Montpelier and Plainfield is occupied by his descendants. He was the author of "The Phoenix Chronicle." The word Phoenix signifies arising out of its own ashes. The Bonfire in which 450 books were burnt: A view of Montpelier and all the country places in the State, &c. &c. By Sylvanus Shephard. Printed for the author. 1825, 8vo. pp. 18.—Gilman's Bibliography.

THE STEP-MOTHER.

Lines written by CLARK STEVENS in his 80th year, to a lady who was a second wife.

A step-mother's lot is one that 's hard—
She need be constant on her guard;
There are so many minds to please,
She should be often on her knees,
To pray for grace her path to tread,
And by her Saviour's will be led;
For what suits one will not another,
So I do pity the step-mother.

See biography of Clark Stevens, page 581. In his old age he often amused himself with rhyming tributes for his friends, acrostics largely. This, just given, is taken from a quarto blank book, 84 pages, all written after he was 85 years of age.

NOTE TO THE PORTRAITS.—Those of Col. Langdon and wife, and Gen. Walton and wife, were painted by Tuthill, (a pupil of Benjamin West); those of Mahlon Cottrill and wife, by Mason, and all when the parties were so young, their portraits will be recognized by only a few persons. The same is true to some extent of the portraits of Gen. Parley Davis and Mrs. Upham. The signature of Prussia Walton was written at the age of 82.

FINIS.

MONTPELIER, thou hast won my heart
 By all thy generous ways;
 It is my joy, my pride, thy noble men,
 Thy matrons beauteous in their days—
 To praise.

And I would write thy happy name
 On the historic page,
 In letters as of gold, to hand
 Down to the future age—

MONTPELIER.

MORETOWN.

"The township was chartered June 7, 1763, the grant to contain 6 square miles to be divided into 71 shares; one-eighth to each of the 64 proprietors; each drawing one lot out of each division, there being three divisions." The charter says, before any division of land be made to proprietors, a tract of land as near the center of the town as the land will admit shall be reserved and marked out for town lots, one of which shall be allotted to each proprietor, of the contents of 1 acre—they paying as rent therefor for the term of 10 years, one ear of Indian corn, on the 25th of Dec. annually, if lawfully demanded, and said rent to commence Dec. 25, 1762. Also each proprietor was to pay one shilling proclamation money on every 100 acres of land. After the town was organized, it passed a vote to "quiet" those who had previously selected and were occupying lots, in lieu of drawing by lot as specified in the grant. By "quiet" it is presumed was meant to let them hold the lots selected. Moretown was settled prior to 1790; for in 1790, Ebenezer Haseltine came to the N. W. part, and commenced to clear a farm about a mile and a half from Duxbury line. It was on Winooski or Onion river, and the place where his son, Ebenezer Haseltine, now resides. But it appears that Seth Munson was living near where Mr. Haseltine made a pitch, when Mr. H. arrived—so it is evident a few settlers had made a beginning prior to 1790. At this date, 1790, there were only a few houses in Montpelier, and these were log; and it is said that Mr. H. helped cut the first bay ever cut in Montpelier, and on the spot where the Vermont Watchman office now stands. When the Indians were on their way to burn Royalton, they camped on the meadow owned by Mr. Haseltine. Arrow heads and stone hatchets have been found on this farm. The first school district in town was formed in this neighborhood. Mrs. Ebenezer Haseltine and Aunt Judith Haseltine used to gather sap on snow-shoes, and catch cart loads of trout from Onion river. Aunt Judith H. died in Aug. 1876, aged more than 95 years. In those early days the settlers went to Burlington to mill. In canoes, carrying the canoe and grist around the falls in Bolton. Sometimes they would make "plumping mills," by making a hole in a large stump to hold the grain, and bending a sapling over, fasten to it a chunk of wood to pound the corn with. Of this no one need be ashamed, for one of our presidents ground corn in the same way. Bears and wolves disturbed the people to some extent, frequently coming out in the daytime. Three wolves came one night and put their paws on the yard fence of Abner Child, on Moretown Common, but went back to the mountains and howled. The next day, about 2 P. M., a deer came and jumped into the same yard, being driven in by the wolves, it was thought. The deer soon left, and wolves' tracks were afterward seen in connection with its tracks toward the river.

A young lady was riding on horseback from the Common toward the Hollow, and met a bear. She turned back, told her story, and some men rallied, pursued and killed the bear. It was distributed between persons, many wanting a piece. The head was taken by one man, and the next day or two the jaw of the bear was put on the table whole, the teeth all in.

A few years since, as Rev. Mr. Powers was returning from Northfield to this town, he met a bear, which he treed and watched while his boy went to the village and rallied some men, who came and killed the bear. It was voted to give Mr. P. the bear. The bears have not all left town, but the most of those remaining are biped.

Mar. 9, 1792, Joseph Haseltine, Seth Munson, David Parcher and Ebenezer Haseltine petitioned Richard Holden, a justice of the peace of Waterbury, to call a town meeting of inhabitants of Moretown, to meet at Jos. Haseltine's, Mar. 22, 1792, to elect town officers.

Met agreeable to warning and chose Daniel Parcher, moderator; and chose Seth Munson, town clerk; chose as selectmen, Joseph Haseltine, Daniel Parcher and John Heaton; chose Philip Bartlett, treasurer; chose Joseph Haseltine, constable; chose John Heaton and Ebenezer Haseltine, listers; chose Joseph Haseltine, collector of town rates; and Joseph Parcher, highway surveyor. Voted to dissolve the meeting. Attest, SETH MUNSON, Town Clerk.

Up to 1832, the town meetings were held on Moretown Common. At that date an article in the "warning" for town meeting called the voters together under great excitement. Much confusion prevailed, until it was ordered to call every voter into the house, and appoint a talisman to notice each man and record "yes" or "no" as he should pass out, voting on the article.

The article was to see if the legal voters would remove the town meeting from the Common to the Hollow. The majority voted "yes." Since that date the town meetings have been held at the Hollow. The present town house was then started by subscription.—Written in 1876.

[Among the papers of the late Henry Stevens, Antiquarian of Vermont, we copied the following heads of papers in his collections: "Surveys in Moretown," "A vendue pitch for Nathaniel Chipman," containing 360 acres, No. 83, signed Wm. Sawyer. In the office of Robert Temple, Rutland County Court, "Copies of Ira Allen's sales in Moretown"; complete, I think. "Copy of Smith's deed of land in Moretown"; "Copy of Sawyer's deed to Lovell"; "Ira Allen and Fiske's agreement selecting lands in Moretown"; "Agreement concerning land in Moretown between Ira Allen, and James Mowry, of Corinth"; "Ira Allen and Thomas Mead's land in Moretown"; "Colchester, June 25, 1790, Deed to Col. Ira Allen of 500 acres of land in Moretown, by Samuel Allen."]

By searching the old records, it is found proprietor's meetings were held for some years after the town was organized.

Among the prominent men of the present century may be named Abner Child, who was one of the earlier settlers, Harvey W. Carpenter, Alpheus C. Noble, Hon. Joseph Sawyer, Rufus Clapp and Calvin Kingsley, M. D., town clerk for 44 years, or since 1832. He is now partially retired to enjoy a competency gained in his profession. The others have nearly, if not all, died, and some of them were of the principal men from 1830 to 1850.

The Dr. has also represented the town several times in the State Legislature.

Judge Sawyer has a widow and 2 sons residing in town. One of those sons has a "bull's eye" watch which the Judge used to carry, and which had not been cleaned and run for 40 years until recently; it is said to be 150 years old. The same son has a clock 100 years old.

A very serious calamity occurred in 1830—the greatest freshet ever known in Mad River Valley. It raised the river until nearly all the street was covered. Miss Harriet Taylor, of Waitsfield, (now Mrs. Hon. Roderick Richardson, of Boston, Mass.,) was teaching school in our village at the time of the freshet. She boarded with a family living where Mr. Freeman now resides. The water drove them, in the night, to the chamber of the house, and they could, in the darkness, hear the splashing of the water and the thumping of floating chairs and tables against the chamber floor—to which the water had risen. To add to their distress the cries of a sick child were constantly calling their attention. Toward morning the cellar wall under a part of the house, fell in with a splash, causing new fright which led the inmates of the chamber to pray to God, the Father of Him who once said to the winds and waves, "Be still." The next morning the family and teacher were floated away to safety on a barn door. The sick child died in a few hours after the rescue. Henry Carpenter, residing further down the river, started with his wife and boy, the boy walking between them, with hands in theirs, to go to a neighbor's. They intended to keep the road, wading through the water; but coming to deeper water Mrs. Carpenter let go the boy's hand and probably became strangled. Mr. C. called in the darkness but no voice replied. The boy swam back to the house. The father in sadness rallied some neighbors, and the next day the mother and wife was found on the meadow below, cold in death.

One family fled to the hills and stayed out all night in the rain, holding a little babe in their arms. Who the little babe was let grandmother tell.

This newspaper record sent to us, we think, by Rev. Seldon B. Currier, we will interrupt here to give.

THE BURSTING OF A CLOUD OVER JONES'S BROOK IN MORÉTOWN.
BY HON. D. P. THOMPSON.

I have used the term, bursting of a cloud, as the caption of this article, because it is expressive of a popular notion, and not because it is either philosophical or correct. It has long been a prevalent belief, that in cases of extraordinary falls of water over particular localities, clouds, like old leather bottles, suddenly burst and let the water they contain fall to the earth almost in a body, like rivers falling over precipices in cataracts; whereas nothing could be more unscientific or farther from the truth. No collected body of water, not even to the amount of a quart, could remain suspended in a cloud a single second, but would instantly fall to the earth from the force of the universal law of gravitation. The great deluging torrents of rain that occasionally occur, simply proceed from unusual thickness, or upward extent of the cloud. This will be more readily understood, perhaps, when we consider, that if a cloud half a mile thick discharges from its gathering mists a heavy rain, one of a mile thick would produce a rain doubly heavy, and so on, in the same proportion, with every additional thickness of cloud, till that thickness, as has been known sometimes to be the case, extends upwards to the distance of 5 or 6 miles, when from the whole mass the water reaches the earth less in the form of rain, indeed, than the pouring of a cataract.

The most remarkable instance of these great falls of water, which was ever known in this region, occurred about 30 years ago, round the sources of Jones's Brook, a small mill stream that rises in Moretown mountains and empties into the Winooski river 3 miles below Montpelier. The mountains round the source of this stream rise to the height of about 2000 feet, with unusual abruptness, and, at the same time, so curve round as to leave the intermediate space in the form of a deep, half-basin, down the precipitous sides of which a sudden shower descends almost as rapidly as water strolling down the steepest roof of a house, and collecting at the bottom, pours, in a raging river, down the valley to the outlet of the stream. It was over this mountain-rimmed basin that burst the extraordinary thunder-storm which I have undertaken to describe, and which passed among the inhabitants under the name of the bursting of a cloud.

On the day and hour this storm occurred, I chanced to be on a high hill, east of Montpelier village, which afforded a plain view of the whole range of the Moretown mountains. It was a still, sultry, mid-summer day, when my attention being attracted by the sudden obscuration of the sun, I looked toward the west, and saw the unusual spectacle of two heavy clouds rapidly rolling toward each other, in the line of the range just named, from diametrically opposite directions, the point where the collision must occur being evidently at the natural basin already particularized, or on the high mountain above it. These strangely moving clouds I watched with intense interest. On, on they rolled toward each other, with their long, streaming columns and menacing fronts, like two opposing, hostile lines of cavalry rushing together for deadly conflict. As anticipated, the collision occurred directly over the basin and on the sides of the adjoining mountains, and there, the opposing currents being of equal strength, the intermingling clouds came to a dead stand. Presently, however, the colliding masses began to rise upward and double over and over till they had swelled into a huge, dome-like figure, shooting up miles into the darkened heavens, and here commenced a startling display of the electric phenomenon. With the short, sharp and quickly repeating peals of thunder, the fierce streams of lightning were seen bursting in rapid succession from every part of the surcharged cloud, like some hotly worked battery of artillery from a smoke-enveloped field of battle. But soon the expanding cloud shut out the basin and valley from sight; and, being unable to see more, I returned home, and, with much interest, waited to hear the result of the fearful elemental exhibition I had been witnessing.

The news of the remarkable, and in one instance, fatal effects of that storm, in the disastrous flooding of Jones's Brook, at length reached us. The inhabitants of the basin, when the storm burst upon them so suddenly and unexpectedly, were struck with astonishment and alarm at the unwanted quantities of water that descended upon them from the seemingly flooded heavens. A settler who lived nearest the foot of the mountain described the rain as "coming down in bucketsful." I was in a field a short distance from my house when it struck, and was so astonished at first I knew not what to do. But the rain, if it could be called rain, coming thicker and faster, I ran with all my might for the house, but was almost drowned before I got there, and then it was only to find the water gushing into the house on all sides till it was nearly knee-deep on the floor." And so with all the inhabitants of the basin. No place afforded them any protection; rivers were in all their houses within, and rivers, rising into seas, were all around them without; and they looked on with mute consternation at that tremendous outpouring of the clouds. But they were the first to be relieved. The rain, after the brief duration of less than half an hour, ceased as suddenly as it came; and the inhabitants ran out of their drenched houses just in time to behold the numerous uniting streams, that had come pouring down from the encircling mountain, gathering into a mighty river that swept away shanties, fences, old trees, logs, lumber and everything in its path, and bearing them in wild confusion on its surface, went foaming, tumbling and roaring, like a cataract, with amazing force, down the valley toward the outlet, three or four miles below.

But the principal scene arising from the destructive and fatal progress occurred at a saw-mill, owned by Mr. Oren Clark, and situated about a mile from the mouth of the stream. When the storm was spending its force on the sides of the mountain and the basin beneath, Mr. Clark was at work in a field near the mill with his hired man, Ebenezer Eastman. And being apprised by the great volume and blackness of the clouds hanging over the mountain at the west, that an unusual shower was falling round the sources of the stream, they proceeded at once to the mill and commenced such temporary repairs of the dam and flume as would, they believed, secure them against the rush of water, which, in greater or less quantities, they knew would soon be down upon them. While deeply engrossed in hurrying forward the contemplated repairs, they were aroused by a deafening roar that burst suddenly upon their ears from the stream but a short distance above the mill; when looking up they beheld to their astonishment and alarm, a wild, tumultuous sea of conningling flood-wood and turbid waters, with a wall-like front ten feet high, tumbling and rolling down upon them with furious uproar, and with the speed of the wind. Knowing that the mill could not stand before such an avalanche of water, and beginning to be specially alarmed for their personal safety, they attempted to secure a retreat over the log-way which extended from the mill to the high grounds five or six rods distant. Over this they made their way with all possible speed. But such was the velocity of the on-rushing torrent that they had not proceeded half way before the mill building came down with a crash behind them, the log-way was swept from beneath their feet, and the next moment they were struggling for their lives in a flood a dozen feet deep, foaming, boiling, and so filled with trees, timber and all sorts of ruins, that it did not seem possible for a human being to be borne along in the frightfully whirling mass and live a single minute.

"I saw Eastman once," said Mr. Clark in describing to me this, the most terrible scene of his life. "It was when I rose to the surface after the first plunge. He was struggling desperately to get his head above the flood-wood. But I saw him no more; for the next moment, I was borne down beneath the surface by a raft of logs that swept over me. From that time I was whirled onward with my head sometimes below, and sometimes above the water, till I found myself nearing the wooded bank on the opposite side of the stream, when I soon came within reach of a small tree, which I grasped and held on to, till I began to count myself saved. But the tree quickly came up by the roots and I was again plunged into the flood. But, though now nearly in despair, I struggled on, and soon was fortunate enough to grasp another sapling by means of which I at length drew myself ashore and fell down half drowned and half dead from bruises and exhaustion. It was now nearly dark. After rallying my strength a little, I commenced crawling and stumbling through the tangled thickets along up the stream till, after a struggle of seeming hours, I at last reached a point opposite my house, where, by loud hallooing, I rallied my family, who believed me lost, and informed them I would proceed on to the next house, on that side, stay all night and cross the next morning. This I did, and the next morning reached home, where I was received as one risen from the dead."

The remains of Eastman were found the next day washed up near the mouth of the stream on the meadow of Samuel Jones, who was injured in the loss of crops, the covering of his lands by flood-wood and washing away the soil, to the amount of $300. Whether Eastman was drowned, or killed by being crushed among the logs, was never known. Either cause was sufficient to have produced his death.

Such were the leading events attending the memorable thunder-storm on Jones's Brook.

The Mad river affords some of the best water privileges found in the State, and should the inhabitants of Moretown induce some moneyed firm to put in a large manufacturing house here, thus utilizing more of the water power, and urge the building of a contemplated railroad, which has already been surveyed through the town, it would greatly develop the resources of and build up our town.

Moretown is considerably broken in surface, but is romantic, and affords much to please and profit the student of nature. Camel's Hump is seen from various points, and is only a few miles distant from Moretown. Mineral springs are found here, which by puffing and patronizing, would be quite equal to many, no better, but celebrated ones.

It is quite a dairy town, some farmers having 20 or more cows, and many others 10 to 20.

There are now 3 stores, 3 blacksmith shops, two saw-mills, 2 clapboard, 2 shingle and 2 planing-machines in the village; also 1 hotel, 1 harness-shop, employing several workmen, 2 carriage and sleigh-shops, 1 grist-mill, 1 sash, door and blind-shop, near by a dressmaker, 2 milliners, 1 goldsmith and 1 tinman.

We have also a very excellent high school, taught by Miss Folsom.

Polly Phemia Munson was probably the first child born in Moretown, and Paul Knapp the first person who died in town. He was killed by the fall of a tree.

The first school-house in this town was within the limits of the present village of Moretown. In the first settlement of the town there were three lots set off for the first minister. Rev. Mr. Brown, Universalist, the first minister settled, deeded the land to the town for the benefit of schools. There are 14 school districts in town now, and we had three schools in the village last winter (1869), and for several years we have had a select school every spring and fall. Our population in 1860 was a little over 1400. There has not been any state prison candidate from this place to this date—1870.

Our first representative of the town, Luther Moseley, was chosen by 7 voters.

The first store was opened here by Winship & Thornton, 1815. The first load of goods was bought in Burlington, and brought into town by Cephas Carpenter. Winship was a butcher from that place.

In 1822, Mr. Stevens commenced trade here. He built a distillery to make whisky, and died about 2 years after. His death was a great loss to the town. A starch factory was built in 1833, by Martin L. Lovell and Francis Liscomb, and run about 5 years, after which it was bought by Jesse Johnson, and used for a tannery from 3 to 5 years, when it was burned.

The first and only hotel to the present, was built and kept by Joseph Sawyer, in 1835. There are some stores of the olden time here.

Nearly 50 years since, Nathan Wheeler (I think his name was Nathan), 5 years old, son of Ira Wheeler, was lost on his way home from school. The news spread. The farmers left their hay down, and came from Waterbury, Northfield, Duxbury, Waitsfield, nearly 1500 men, and joined in the search for the lost boy. After a three days' diligent hunt the boy was found in Duxbury. It rained very hard when he was found, and the little fellow was trudging on; he said he was going home. Capt. Barnard said if the boy should work hard all of his life and be prospered, he never could pay all for their trouble in finding him; but when we realize the sympathy and good feelings manifested, he felt that they were all well paid. The boy grew to be a man, became a good soldier and died for his country, and so, well paid.

COL. EZEKIEL CLAPP,

a farmer and prominent citizen of Moretown, was a whole-souled man, much esteemed by his neighbors. About the time he was appointed Colonel, Capt. Rufus Barnard, Capt. Orson Skinner, Maj. Elias Taylor and Col. Clapp attended a military meeting at Waterbury one evening, and after the meeting, it being 10 o'clock P. M., it was agreed they would all go to Major Taylor's, in Waitsfield, to see a large catamount that had been killed on the East Mountain. The company filled 2 sleighs. It was very cold, but they reached Waitsfield, and actually saw a large dead catamount. The company did not get back to Moretown till the next morning.

Many years before this, Mr. Clapp was carrying an iron kettle he had borrowed of a neighbor, home on his head. He lived at this time on Mad river, about a mile above Moretown village. Being tired, he sat down to rest, and soon saw a bear seated a little distant, suspiciously regarding him and his kettle. Clapp sprang forward, and cast his kettle at the bear. The bear not liking the sound of the kettle as it fell, rushed away, and Clapp picking up the kettle, made his best way home. Mr. Clapp died about 2 years since (1868). The record of him is, "a man truthful and upright in all his dealings."

Samuel Pierce, who settled here from Berlin many years since, tells of several deer having been killed in Moretown soon after he came. They were shot when they came down from the mountain to drink. He and Burr Freeman killed one, and he had the skin tanned and made into gloves, and for a long time after boasted of having a pair of Vermont deer-skin gloves. Mr. Pierce is now (1870), about 70 years of age.

DR. STEPHEN PIERCE,

from Massachusetts, was the first physician that settled in town. He lived on the farm now occupied by Mr. Bisbee. He was a good doctor, upright in all his practice, and made himself honored and useful in his chosen field of labor. He died in Barnard about 1864. Soon after he came to Moretown, one man remarked that the Doctor had a very good theory of physic, but he lacked the practice. Soon after this Mr. A. March had a sick child. He went to the Doctor and wanted to get some theory of physic for his child. The Doctor gave him some, and often spoke of the joke to his friends.

DR. LESTER KINGSLEY

came to this town in Feb. 1827, and has been in practice here now over 40 years. He has many friends, and is now (1870), the town clerk. Dr. Calderwood came to assist Dr. K. in his practice in May of this year. [Dr. Kingsley was town clerk from March 1832 to March 1880, annually elected, holding the office 48 years, and about 10 months to the time of his death. He was postmaster from 1837 to '62—25 years, and represented Moretown in the Legislature in 1841, '42, and was actively engaged in his profession here 52 years, till within 2 years of his death, Jan. 4, 1881, aged 76.]

homœopathist, has been here 2 years, from 1868. He, too, has been successful and won many friends, and his wife has also made herself welcome among us, by teaching music.

There are three merchants in town: C. Lovejoy, James Evans, Nathan Spaulding. Mr. Evans commenced trade May, 1862 [removed to Boston since]. Mr. Spaulding commenced about 1858, and has charge of the post-office [gone to Burlington]. His father, now deceased, was a highly esteemed Methodist minister. He was buried here.

There is one grist-mill in town [two now], owned by a Mr. Robinson; 1 sash and blind factory, owned by Geo. Bulkley and Geo. Thornton, [which is now Mr. Fassett's grist and saw-mill, tub factory and planing-machine matcher,] four saw-mills, three owned by David T. Jeff. Belding, one on the river by Lorenzo Wells's; 3 blacksmith's shops, carried on by Curt. Carpenter & Co., Calvin Foster, and M. Taylor; Calvin Foster's carriage shop, where he has done a good business a great many years; Towle & Lovejoy's wheelwright shop, where a good business has been done; [given up and turned into the blacksmith shop of Wallings & Spaulding]; Collins built another shop and continued business as before; William Sawyer's harness shop employs several men, [has removed into a larger shop, with his son, partner]; Mr. Towle's harness shop [he has left town, and the shop is now closed]; and we have also 2 shoemakers.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

[FROM MRS. SMITH.]

The original members of the First Congregational Church in Moretown were—Reuben Hastings, John Stockwell, Samuel Eaton, Mrs. Eleazer Wells, and Mrs. Stockwell. The meeting for the organization was in the first log school-house.

Mrs. Smith gives from the records the following account of the second organization:

“The Congregational Church in Moretown and Duxbury met this day at the house of Dea. Benton in said Moretown, for the purpose of taking into consideration the disorganization of the said church in Moretown and Duxbury, organized church. The subject had been previously presented to these churches, and the above named meeting of the two churches was duly warned. The meeting was organized by choosing the Rev. Samuel G. Tenney of Waitsfield, moderator, and the Rev. Lyndon S. French of Fayston, co-minister commissioned by the Vt. Dom. Society to labor in the church of Fayston and Moretown, scribe. After due consideration it appeared that the church in Moretown was not prepared for the new organization. It was accordingly voted to adjourn the meeting until the 18th day of January, 1836, to be held at the same place, and that previous to the new organization, each church, separately, should hold a meeting to pass a vote that the new organization should be the dissolving of the two former churches in said Moretown and Duxbury.

Signed SAMUEL G. TENNEY, LYNDON S. FRENCH.

Moretown, Jan. 18, 1836.”

The church in Moretown and Duxbury met agreeably to agreement, having, as was voted at the first meeting, each of them voted to disorganize the old church by organizing a new one. The moderator then called for those members in those two churches who wished to unite in a new church, to present themselves. The following members came forward from Moretown: Nathan Benton, Eunice, his wife, Abraham Spofford and Sarah, his wife, H. Spaulding and Mary, his wife. From Duxbury: Reuben Munson and Mary, his wife, Earl Ward, and Mrs. Fanny Avery.”

RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

[BY C. A. SMITH.]

The first church organized in town was a Congregational church. Deacon Nathan Benton and Philemon Ashley were among its early and prominent members. The school-house, and afterward the town house at the village, were used as places of worship. Public worship was maintained until about 1840, when the membership being quite small, the church was merged in the Congregational church at S. Duxbury, the services at first being held at Moretown and Duxbury alternately, but afterward at S. Duxbury alone.

The Congregational Church at S. Duxbury was founded at an early period. Among its first members were Reuben Munson, Hezekiah Ward, and Earl Ward, his son. Messrs. Seeley and Pomeroy were the earliest pastors. This church is the only church in Duxbury, the people of N. Duxbury being better accommodated at Waterbury. It has never had a large membership. Its relations with the M. E. church at Moretown are of the most cordial character, and for several years the pastor of the M. E. church at Moretown has been the acting pastor of the Congregational church at S. Duxbury.

Amasa Cole was probably the first Methodist preacher in Moretown. He was a local preacher living near Middlesex. Soon after, in 1809, Joshua Luce, a local preacher from Pittsfield, Mass., settled in town. He, with his wife and daughter Roxana, were probably the first Methodists in town. By their efforts a Methodist church was soon organized, and Moretown became a part of the old Barre Circuit, Vermont District and New England Conference of the M. E. Church, a circuit embracing Barre, Montpelier, Middlesex, Moretown, Waitsfield and Warren.

In the town clerk's office there is a record of the certificate of the ordination of Amasa Cole as a deacon by Bishop McKendree, at Durham, Me., June 4, 1814, also of that of Leonard Foster, by Bishop Asbury, June 10, 1818. Zadoc Hubbard, Ebenezer Johnson, Calvin Clark, Barnabas Mayo and William Harris were among the leading members prior to 1820.

The first church edifice was built in 1832, at the Common. This was occupied for 22 years, until in 1854, the present church at the village was erected. The old church still stands, though unoccupied. Messrs. Frost, Newell, Steele, Peirce and Haskell were among the earliest itinerants on this circuit, while Bishop George, Wilbur Fisk and Elijah Hedding (afterward Bishop) have officiated here.

Rev. Justin Spaulding was born in this town in 1802. He was for some years a missionary in South America, afterward a presiding elder in New Hampshire Conference. His health failing, he returned to his native town and resided here until his death.

Rev. Nathan B. Spaulding was born in Moretown; entered the Methodist ministry from this town. He belonged successively to the New England and to the New Hampshire Conferences, in which he held a prominent position. A partial failure of health necessitated a retirement from the itinerancy in middle life. He located in his native town, and continued to preach occasionally as health and opportunity permitted until his death in 1863.

The topography of this town is such that the inhabitants of large portions of its territory can more conveniently attend church at Northfield, Montpelier, Middlesex and Waterbury than at Moretown village. The M. E. church is the only Protestant church in town. At some periods of its history its membership has been much larger than at present; but its condition and prospects are very hopeful.

Mrs. Smith says in her paper, "the first Methodist meeting was held in Mr. Slayton's barn." It is probable, says our record, that we credit to Rev. Mr. Currier, that Mr. Cole was the first Methodist preacher in town. He resided near Middlesex, and was accustomed to walk from home to the Common, preach, and return without dinner for the reason that "Jack did not eat his supper,"—none was offered him to eat. In the winter season this walk and work must have been very fatiguing, especially when he brock his own path through the snow, often knee deep.

When the people of Moretown heard the cannon's roar at Plattsburg, the townsmen met at the tavern kept by Joshua Luce, on the farm where Alvin Pierce now resides, to see who would volunteer to go to Plattsburg to repulse the British. This was in 1812. Both the local preachers were present and heartily encouraged the men.

Mr. Luce was a local preacher, but farming was his main occupation. He preached on the Common, in the dwelling house of Ebenezer Johnson, and in the school house.

Among the prominent members of the Methodist Church in 1820, and for some years subsequent, were Ebenezer Johnson—who was town clerk prior, for some years, to 1832, when Dr. Kingsley succeeded him—Calvin Clark and Barnabas Mayo—whose names are among the substantial and influential members of the Methodist family of that date.

William Harris and his excellent wife, known as "Aunt Ruth," were noted for their generosity, keeping what was called a Methodist tavern, and many a weary itinerant found shelter and food and rest in the home of "Aunt Ruth."

In 1832, the first Methodist meeting house in town was built on the Common, and for 22 years it was occupied in regular meetings. But in 1854, Moretown Hollow—now village proper—built the house now used for worship. For some years before the church building was erected at the Hollow, the Methodists worshipped in the town-house in the village or Hollow, and at the Common alternately. Soon after the church was built in the village the Common meetings were nearly abandoned, and meetings held at the new house only.

Three prominent men—who became ministers of the Gospel—had their origin in this town. Rev. Justin Spaulding, son of Levi and Thankful Spaulding. [See paper before.] His widow and several children are now residing in Moretown and vicinity.

Rev. Newell Spaulding, brother of the last named, is now living, and resides in New York city.

Rev. Nathan B. Spaulding [see, also, page before.]

When the Barre circuit included the 6 towns, before named, and the meetings were sometimes held in Wm. Harris' barn, when the quarterly meetings were held here, as many as 80 teams have been counted around the barn from the other towns of the circuit, which centered around.

The Methodists of Moretown and the Congregationalists of South Duxbury have alternate meetings at present, and have but one pastor. They have a good congregation and an excellent Sabbath School. If any one who may read this listened to a concert by the South Duxbury Sabbath School on the first Sabbath of October, 1876, they will doubtless bear testimony to the truthfulness of the above statement, in calling the school an excellent one.

For the present prosperity of the Methodist Church in Moretown, any one desiring can see the Annual Minutes of Conference, 1876. The parsonage buildings have been repaired and neatly fitted up this year.

MINISTERS FROM 1860 TO 1881.

1860, J. W. Bemis; 1862, J. Gill; 1863-4, P. N. Granger; 1865-6, L. C. Powers; 1867-8, W. B. Howard; 1869-70, D. Willis; 1871-2, J. S. Spinney; 1873, H. G. Day; 1874-5, D. Willis; 1876-7, C. S. Buswell; 1878-9, C. A. Smith; 1880-81, S. B. Currier.

REV. LEMUEL C. POWERS,

(BY A. S. COOPER.)

whose life was marked with uniform consistency and faithfulness, was born in Rochester, this State, August, 1828. He made a Christian profession at the age of 13, and commenced his labors as a Methodist preacher when about 30. His fields were first as a local preacher on Bethel Lympus charge two years; after as Conference preacher there 2 years; next at Topsham 2 years, and then at Moretown in 1864, '66. The first was a dry year, but he labored on earnestly, especially in the Sunday school, and in his second year just as he was prostrated by disease, he was cheered by 12 or 15 persons at North Fayston, embraced in his charge, professing conversion and wishing to receive baptism from his hands; but his work was done, and he received his discharge on the eve of the holy Sabbath—Nov. 18, 1866. To an only brother who watched by his bedside while he was dying, he said: "I am realizing now how

'Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are';

and passed without a struggle or groan to his rest.

He left a wife and 4 children. Revs. Gill and Spaulding attended his funeral. After his brethren in the ministry and others bore his body to the grave, the citizens assembled and passed resolutions of respect for his memory and sympathy for his family.—[For further mention see the place of his birth—Rochester, in next volume.]

CATHOLIC CHURCH IN MORETOWN.

Those of this faith are almost entirely Irish. The first settlers were Daniel Murray, John Hogan, Patrick Calvy, Patrick Farral and Daniel Divine. They purchased lands on what is called South hill. Most of them commenced with very limited means, but by industry have generally prospered, and will now average with others of the town in wealth. There is one school district almost all Irish pupils.

There are now 90 who have grand lists, and probably 75 voters. Among the prominent men of the present are Andrew Murray, Daniel Hassett, Patrick Lynch, Thomas and Charles McCarty, and the three Kerin brothers. Moretown is now a central point for the Catholic population of South Duxbury, Fayston, Waitsfield and Warren. The first priest officiating here was Father Jeremiah O'Callaghan, who, if we are correctly informed, was the first Catholic priest in Vermont.

[The first resident Irish priest, but not the first Catholic priest in Vermont. There was a resident priest, undoubtedly, at the old French Mission of St. Catherine, in Wells, at the Isle La Motte Mission of St. Anne (see vol. II. page 558), and the French Mission in Swanton, some interesting account of which will be given in the history of the late Rev. John B. Perry, of Swanton, to be embraced in this work—of any of which missions we would be particularly pleased to receive any information that any person may be able to communicate, however trifling apparently. Every little link helps in putting together the broken chain that binds us to the early days. Our histories are very obscure so far back; the least little incident is the little track to the explorer that leads to the clue. There have been also missionary priests earlier than Father O'Callaghan, as Rev. James Fulton, the venerable pastor now of the Church of the Holy Redeemer, East Boston, who was an early missionary in Vermont. See his "Early History of the Catholic Church in New England."—Ed.]

"He resided in Burlington, officiating there and in this town, and probably in other places. Father O'Callaghan was also an author, and wrote five volumes on different subjects. The second priest officiating here was Father Drolet, the third, Father Druon, the fourth, Father Duglue, the fifth, Father Galligan, who resides at Waterbury, officiating there, in this town, and in Northfield.

The land for building a church on, and also for a burial ground, was given to the Catholic society by Col. Miller of Montpelier, in 1841. In 1858, the society built their present church building on South hill, which is a little more than a mile from the village, nearly east. They contemplate building a new church edifice in the village, at no very distant future.—News-paper Record, 1879.

The Rev. Fathers O'Callaghan, Daly, Drolet, Maloney and Coopman, O. M. J.,

visited occasionally this mission, before Rev. Z. Druon built the Church (St. Patrick's) in 1860. The lot upon which the church stands had been given many years before by three members, to be used partly as a burying ground. The number of Catholic families in this mission is about 40; mostly farmers. They are attended now by Rev. Thomas Galligan, from Waterbury, and were previously, after the departure of Father Druon, attended from Montpelier by his successor there, Rev. Joseph Duglue, who had the pastoral care of them for a few years.

REV. Z. DRUON.

Aug. 21, 1876."

"The document sent you by Father Druon is, I think, quite correct. The lot on which the church stands was donated in 1855 by Frank Lee, Peter Lee, and J. Miller. I copy from the deed itself.

LOUIS BP. OF BURLINGTON.

PROMINENT SONS OR CITIZENS.

Among the men of note who were born or have lived in Moretown, in the early part of their lives, is Rev. ELAND FOSTER, a preacher and author. He has held many good appointments in and around New York city. Mr. Foster married the daughter of Dr. Palmer, of New York. He with his wife are great revival workers. [What has Rev. Mr. Foster published? titles of his works asked for, not yet received—Ed.]

Rev. WILLIAM HIGH may also be named as one who was brought up, if not born, in our town, and who is well known as quite a noted pulpit orator.

Also, Rev. E. C. BASS, now of New Hampshire Conference, is a native of Moretown, and graduate of the Vermont University.

MATTHEW HALE CARPENTER was born in Moretown, Dec. 22, 1824, and died at Washington, D. C., Feb. 24, 1881, while serving as United States Senator from the State of Wisconsin. His parents named him Decatur Merritt Harmon Carpenter; how and why his name was changed will appear further on.

His grandfather, Col. Cephas Carpenter, was long a resident of Moretown—a man of strong intellect and marked characteristics. For years he was a justice of the peace, and as such presided in the trial of cases almost without number. When a trial was had before another justice, he was usually found acting as counsel for one of the parties, in which capacity he was quite the equal of most of the practicing attorneys of his day. It has been truly said of him that “he was a lawyer, though not a member of any bar.”

His father was Ira Carpenter, who was born in Moretown, and resided there until well advanced in life, when he removed to Warren. He was a particularly fine-looking man, easy in manner, social in his habits, and a favorite among his acquaintances. For more than twenty years he held the office of deputy sheriff, and was frequently constable of the town. In discharging the duties of these offices he was thrown much into the company of Hon. Paul Dillingham, a lawyer residing in Waterbury, but having a large practice in the Mad River Valley. Such close business relations soon made them fast friends, and Mr. Carpenter's house became Mr. Dillingham's habitual stopping-place when at Moretown. During these visits “Merritt,” as the boy was then called, attracted the attention of the genial attorney from Waterbury, who frequently bantered him about coming to live with him, promising to make a lawyer of him. On the occasion of a certain trip to Moretown, while passing over the height of land midway between the latter village and Waterbury, Mr. Dillingham was surprised to meet young Carpenter, then a lad of 14, trudging along on foot with all his worldly effects in a small bundle. When asked where he was going, the boy replied, “To Waterbury, to live with you and be a lawyer.” ‘Squire Dillingham, as he was then popularly called, finding his former proposals thus unexpectedly accepted, directed the lad to go ahead, report to Mrs. Dillingham, and await his return at night. Mrs. Dillingham was greatly pleased with her youthful visitor, who made such good use of his undeveloped arts as an advocate that when Mr. Dillingham returned, he found an entente cordiale had already been established between his wife and the boy. And this is how young Carpenter became a protege, though never a formally adopted son of Hon. Paul Dillingham, whose house thereafter was the only home he had until he entered upon the practice of his profession, and had made one for himself in the West.

In 1843, through the influence of Mr. Dillingham, he was appointed a cadet in the Military School at West Point, in which institution he pursued his studies for 2 years. Having no taste for military life, but desiring above all things else to be a lawyer, he at the end of that time tendered his resignation. This was accepted, and he immediately returned to Waterbury, and entered Mr. Dillingham's office as a student. In Nov. 1847, he was admitted to the Washington County Bar; but conscientiously refused to practice without further preparation. He went to Boston, where he was generously taken into the office of Rufus Choate. He soon won, not only the good opinion of that great man, but his admiration and unbounded confidence. Mr. Choate assisted him in selecting a library suitable to his needs, and advanced the money to pay for the same. Equipped with this, he removed to Beloit, Wis., in the year 1848.

At this time he was tall and handsome of figure, with a noble head and winning blue eyes, with a voice of sympathetic quality, and with a manner of mingled frankness and almost boyish roguishness. His prospect was full of promise, when, after a few months' residence in Beloit, he was suddenly and unaccountably afflicted with a disease of the eyes, which resulted for several months in total blindness. For 18 months he was under treatment in New York, poor, almost hopeless of cure, and with no other than his constant friends, Mr. Dillingham and Rufus Choate. Nearly 3 years were thus lost--so far as professional advancement was concerned--before he was able to return and resume the practice of his profession in Beloit. Poor as he then was, he managed to collect what was then the best law library in the county, and from the first developed that thoroughness of "working out" cases which ever since characterized him. Then, as since, he was very fond of literary studies. The poets he had almost by heart, and his studies of the historical, philosophical and political classics of England and America were unceasing. Politically, he was a democrat of the most decided cast. Going to Beloit just as the "free-soil" movement was carrying all before it, he had to breast the almost unanimous political sentiment of a county and town invincibly whig before, then "free-soil," and since republican. Still, he assailed his opponents in their stronghold with so much fearlessness, wit, logic, constitutional learning and unflinching bonhomie, that only his few enemies were vexed at his personal popularity.

Still democratic on his return to Beloit, he became known more widely by occasional speeches in various parts of the state, while his professional success grew with steadiness. So strong had he become in a few years in his own county, that in 1852 he received the legal majority of votes cast for district attorney, although his party was beaten by over 1500 votes. His opponent received the certificate, owing to the diversity in the use of the numerous initials of his name on the ballots cast by his supporters, but Mr. Carpenter appealed to the court, and vindicated both his right and legal ability before the supreme tribunal of the state with equal success. It was in consequence of this experience that he obtained legislative sanction to the name, Matthew Hale Carpenter, by which he had become to be called by his admirers in a spirit of pleasant recognition of his splendid legal abilities.

From this time until 1869, he never held an office, nor was he a candidate for one. He devoted himself to the study and practice of the law with an enthusiasm which knew no bounds, and had a large and lucrative practice.

In 1856, he was the leading counsel for the respondent in the remarkable proceedings by quo warranto, to try the title to the office of governor of Wisconsin between the relator Bashford and the incumbent Barstow.

In 1859, he removed to Milwaukee, and formed, by invitation, a law partnership with Hon. E. G. Ryan, then the acknowledged leader of the Wisconsin Bar, and afterwards Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of that state.

Two such natural leaders of men could not long remain partners, and this partnership was soon dissolved. Mr. Carpenter opened an office for himself, and was constantly crowded with business. From 1860 to 1867 his time was almost constantly occupied with litigation connected with the railroads of the state, and which was finally carried to the supreme court of the United States, where upon his first appearance he won the rare honor of a highly complimentary notice from that grave tribunal.

"Meanwhile, the outbreak of armed rebellion gave Carpenter the opportunity to lead in politics as in law. Having been a devoted Douglas Democrat, a believer in the constitution, and a stalwart defender of the Union, he burst the bonds of party allegiance, as soon as the democratic party South openly carried out its plans. No voice in Wisconsin, at the outset of the war, was so clear, electric and thrilling as his, when the First Wisconsin regiment was sent to the front. His speech was a trumpet blast that was worth an army corps to the cause that inspired him with the courage of an apostle and the prescience of a prophet. It came from his heart and went to the hearts of the people. It anticipated the necessity of emancipation and filled the souls of old anti-slavery leaders with apprehensions of its untimeliness. In all the subsequent phases of the war he was constantly in the lead, but never had to go beyond the doctrines and sentiments of the speech that made him the foremost republican leader, in the hearts of the people."

During the dark days of 1863 and 1864, Mr. Carpenter supported the government by public speeches and printed arguments, in which he took the most advanced position as to the war powers of the government outside the constitution when the life of the nation was in peril. His powerful arguments, maintaining the measures of the government, attracted universal attention. So great, indeed, had his reputation become as a constitutional lawyer, that in 1867, when the famous McArdle case was coming on for argument before the Supreme Court of the United States, Secretary Stanton engaged Mr. Carpenter to make the principal argument for the government. His argument in that case, it may be safely said, will rank with the greatest efforts ever made before that or any other judicial tribunal. After the completion of his brief, he submitted it to Secretary Stanton, who cordially approved it, but added that William M. Meredith, of Philadelphia, was the king of American lawyers, and that before the argument was made he desired to have his judgment as to its soundness. Provided with a note of introduction from the Secretary and a $1000 retainer, Mr. Carpenter went to Philadelphia, and submitted his argument to Mr. Meredith. A whole day was spent at the latter's residence in a very thorough examination of it. At the conclusion Mr. Meredith wrote Secretary Stanton in these words: "I have carefully examined the argument of Mr. Carpenter in the matter of McArdle. To it I cannot add a word; from it I would not subtract one."

This case, though fully argued, was never decided, the court holding that it had no jurisdiction; but the National Legislature endorsed the soundness of Mr. Carpenter's views by subsequently enacting laws for the reconstruction of the Southern States, which were founded upon the principles maintained by him in this argument.

In 1869, he was elected United States Senator by the republicans of Wisconsin. During his service he bore a conspicuous part in the debates, and increased his reputation as an orator and constitutional lawyer. In March 1873, he was elected President pro tempore of the Senate, which position he held until the expiration of his term in 1875. At this time he was the choice of the republicans of his state as his own successor, but the democrats were then engaged in defeating regular nominations through a coalition with disappointed republicans. By a combination of this kind, largely composed of democrats, Mr. Carpenter was defeated.

During the next 4 years he remained in Washington, constantly employed in important causes. Among these was the impeachment trial of Secretary Belknap, in which he appeared for the defendant. He also appeared for Mr. Tilden before the electoral commission, and displayed rare knowledge of state and national laws.

In 1879, he was again elected a senator from the State of Wisconsin to succeed Timothy O. Howe, which office he held at the time of his death.

During all the time he was in the Senate he continued the practice of the law, mostly in the Supreme Court of the United States. His cases embraced almost every question that could be raised under the Reconstruction Acts of Congress, the 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments to the Constitution, as well as the numerous questions constantly growing out of great business transactions. Upon his ability and acquirements as a lawyer and an advocate his reputation will rest.

His devotion to the law led him to look for the principle underlying every measure requiring his action, and unless such measure seemed to be founded upon sound principles, it failed of his support. Hence he often differed in opinion with his political associates who had gained reputations as statesmen. Upon one of these occasions, being taunted with the fact, he exclaimed, "I am a lawyer, not a statesman."

To be a good lawyer was his ambition and pride, and in the midst of his political career, when opposition newspapers were pouring abuse upon him without stint or mercy, he found consolation in the fact that none of them had charged him "with being a poor lawyer."

Ex-Attorney-General Jesse Black, who had much professional intercourse with Mr. Carpenter, said of him after his death :

"The American bar has not often suffered so great a misfortune as the death of Mr. Carpenter. He was cut off when he was rising as rapidly as at any previous period. In the noontide of his labors the night came, wherein no man can work. To what height his career might have reached if he had lived and kept his health another score of years, can now be only a speculative question. But when we think of his great wisdom and his wonderful skill in the forensic use of it, together with his other qualities of mind and heart, we cannot doubt that in his left hand would have been uncounted riches and abundant honor if only length of days had been given to his right. As it was, he distanced his contemporaries, and became the peer of the greatest among those who had started long before him. The intellectual character of no professional man is harder to analyze than his. He was gifted with an eloquence sui generis. It consisted of free and fearless thought, borne upon expression powerful and perfect. It was not fine rhetoric, for he seldom resorted to poetic illustration; nor did he make a parade of clinching his facts. He often warmed with feeling, but no bursts of passion deformed the symmetry of his argument. The flow of his speech was steady and strong—as the current of a great river. Every sentence was perfect; every word was fitly spoken; each apple of gold was set in its picture of silver. This singular faculty of saying everything just as it ought to be said, was not displayed only in the Senate and in the courts; everywhere, in public and private, on his legs, in his chair, and even lying on his bed, he always 'talked like a book.'

In personal appearance, Mr. Carpenter was striking and distinguished. He was above the average stature, broad shouldered and well proportioned. His head was large, well set and finely formed. His hair grew in profusion, and formed a fine setting for a countenance which was always strong and winning, but which was inexpressibly sad or characteristically bright and cheery—just as the mood happened to be in which one found him.

In temperament, he was buoyant, enthusiastic, energetic and kind. His buoyancy never left him, his sparkle (and it was his alone), never ceased, his energy never diminished, his industry never wearied, and his generosity and kindness, always large, only grew larger and more comprehensive as life went on.

His services as a speaker were sought on all occasions where public joy or public sorrow sought expression. The following extract from one of his addresses will give an idea of his style :

"The loves and friendships of individuals partake of the frail character of human life; are brief and uncertain. The experiences of human life may be shortly summed up: a little loving and a great deal of sorrowing; some bright hopes and many bitter disappointments; some gorgeous Thursdays, when the skies are bright and the heavens blue, when Providence, bending over us in blessings, glads the heart almost to madness; many dismal Fridays, when the smoke of torment beclouds the mind, and undying sorrows gnaw upon the heart; some high ambitions and many Waterloo defeats, until the heart becomes like a charnel-house, filled with dead affections, embalmed in holy but sorrowful memories; and then the cord is loosened, the golden bowl is broken, the individual life—a cloud, a vapor—passeth away."

Mr. Carpenter was a profound believer in the inspiration of the Scriptures—of which he was a close and appreciative student—and of the divinity of Christ. One of his reasons for this belief may be found in the following extract from a letter written by him to Prof. David Swing :

"Whoever will read Cicero's Twilight

Speculations about Duty and the Future Life, remembering that perhaps he was the fullest man of an antiquity, the ripest scholar and student of the highest period of Roman civilization, and remembering that from the birth of Cæsar to the birth of Christ the only change that came to civilization was a decline, and that Jesus belonged to an out-of-the-way people—a people apart from the high tides of human greatness—and then will read the Sermon on the Mount, I cannot comprehend how he can escape the conclusion that the difference is not one of degree, but of kind. That Jesus, surrounded as he was, could have promulgated a system of morals embodying all that is most valuable in the prior life of the world, and to which nineteen centuries of civilization have been unable to add a thought or impart an ornament, is a fact not to be explained by any ridicule."

At the time of his death, his law library alone had cost him more than $40,000, and his library of miscellaneous works numbered about 10,000 vols.

He was married to Caroline, daughter of Hon. Paul Dillingham, of Waterbury, Nov. 27, 1855. Four children were born to them, of whom two—daughters—died in infancy. Of the two now living, Lillian Carpenter, now a young lady, is the eldest; the other, Paul Dillingham Carpenter, is a lad of 14 years. Mrs. Carpenter, with her son and daughter, now reside in the city of Milwaukee.

MRS. HOPY HOLT,

aged over 94 years, is the oldest person we have any record of now living in Moretown. She was born in New Bedford, Mass. Her parents were Abraham and Mary (White) Howland. Her mother lived to nearly 82 years. Mrs. Holt was the wife of Amos Holt, who died in Moretown some 38 years since, and the mother of 10 children, 9 of whom lived to settle in life as heads of families; 7 now living; 3 over 70: Amos Holt, of Berkshire, age 77, Sept. last; Hopy, aged 74, June '81—Mrs. Hopy Holt Hartwell, now of Montpelier, widow 17 years of William Hartwell, who died aged 59, in Berlin; and Mrs. Mary Goodspeed, who lives in Northern New York, aged 72.

Mrs. Hopy Holt, in her life of almost a century, has lived in Montpelier, Calais and Moretown, and perhaps in one or two other towns in this county.

She remembers when Montpelier river was of the size of a large brook. She says when young she was spry, and could jump as far as any one; that with a long pole she could have reached into the middle of the stream, and jumped over. Now at 95, she can drop down on her feet upon the hearth, at the fire-place, light her pipe sitting on her feet, and spring up lightly again without touching a hand down; a feat not half of the women of 40 can accomplish. She states her little house where she lived in Montpelier, stood upon ground covered now by the mill-pond near the Arch-bridge, near the centre of the present pond. That there were but two framed houses in Montpelier village when she removed to Calais. Her present home is with her son, G. H. Holt of Moretown. We saw the mother of 94 and daughter of 74, together the past summer. It seemed quite a sight, a mother with a daughter of 74 years by her side; and the mother in appearance bid fair to outlive the daughter.

Since the above was in type we have learned that Mrs. Hopy Holt died Dec. 12, 1881, aged 94 years, 3 mos. 24 days.

TO MY GRANDFATHER.

BY MRS. CELIA BAXTER BRIGHAM.

The weight of years is on thy brow,

And age has dimmed thine eye,

Thy step falls not as lightly now,

As in the years gone by;

Yet is thy brow serene and calm,

Thine eye uplifted still;

Thy trust in God's protecting arm

Old age can never chill.

I look far back through years on years,

Before thy locks were gray,

And see the smile that soothed my fears,

And cheered my infant play.

Those mild blue eyes—they kindly beam

On all around thee yet;

So like my mother's own they seem,

I never can forget.

The music of thy deep-toned voice,
Attuned in sacred song,
Oft made my raptured heart rejoice,
When days were bright and long;
And now, when short and sadder all
The fleeting days have given,
Kind memory loveth to recall
Each spirit-thrilling tone.

I know that Time's relentless hand
Is laid upon thy head;
Thee gilding to the shadowy land,
With still, unflinching tread,
Yet hath he gently dealt with thee,
Since thou, through smiles and tears,
With retrospective glance canst see
The graves of eighty years.

I know the tide that bears thee on Hath no returning wave,
Yet down its current One hath gone
Far mightier than the grave,
And He, who conquered every foe
On Adam's race that wails,
Will guide thee, when the waves o'erflow,
Within the Eternal gates.

Abner Child of Moretown, to whom the above lines were written, died in 1854, aged 87.

THE LAKE OF THE CLOUDS.

BY CORNELIA J. CHILD.

Aye! Others may wander 'neath far distant skies,
For the beauties of scenery not granted us here,
And when suns o'er a classical land shall arise,
May forget all the beauties that blossom more near;
But the glories of Nature, whatever they are,
Can never be elsewhere more dear than my own,
And no magical eye-glass can render more fair
A bright distant scene, than a bright one at home.

There's a rapture of feeling that swells to the soul,
When we gaze on a land that is hallowed in song;
But a deeper soul-worship, beyond our control,
When the glories we love, to our own land belong.
Then when weary of bright skies and Alpine delights,
The grandeur of home on thy memory crowds,
Come back and ascend to Mansfield's proud heights,
To bathe the tired limbs in the "Lake of the Clouds."

There are broader expanses of water and wave,
Where gems at the bottom in sunshine lie sparkling,
But we can imagine as much in the wave [darkling;
Where the shades of the wood and the steep rock lie
And never did light glimmer down from the moon,
And o'er a dark wave more enchantingly play,
Than there, where baptized in the depths of the flood,
The bright stars lie watching the sleep of the day.

Oh, Lake of the Clouds! oft my bright fancy takes me
On fairy-like wings to thy home in the air,
And cooling my lips in the waves of thy fountain,
I fancy a charm talismanic lies there;
That never shall mortal that's tasted thy waters,
Or had them wept o'er him in dew from the skies,
Fall to honor his country with love patriotic,
And leave a warm prayer for her weal when he dies.

But whenever a son of the ever-green Mountains
Shall feel Freedom's fire less ardently burn, [him,
Thy waves will all spring to the clouds to rain o'er
And the Genius of Contry replenish the urn.

Then though there's no bright spell of Illstroy east o'er
To kindle the mind and wake intellect's joys, [thee
A classical charm shall be thine yet in story. [boys.
For thy waves have been parted by Green Mountain

A body of water on Mansfield Mountain, familarly known to sportsmen as the "Lake of the Clouds."

NORTHFIELD.

BY REV. JOHN GREGORY.

[Compiled from his History of Northfield, published in 1878.]

This town is situated in the southern part of Washington County, 10 miles from Montpelier, lat. 44° 8', long. 4° 25'; and very near the center of the town is the geographical center of the State. The original town was chartered Aug. 10, 1781, to Maj. Joel Matthews and his associates, and contained 18,518 acres. A tract of land from the east part of Waitsfield, containing 6000 acres, was annexed to Northfield Nov. 7, 1822. Five equal shares or rights were reserved to the use of the public, and the grants were conditioned that each proprietor should, "within the term of three years next after the circumstances of the war will admit of it with safety," "plant and cultivate 5 acres of land, and build a house at least 18 foot square on the floor, or have one family settled on each right, on pain of forfeiture of his share."

The first proprietors' meeting was held in Hartford, Vt., Nov. 11, 1783. The proprietors met at different times at Windsor, Hartland and Pomfret, also, till 1794, when the town had sufficient settlers to take care of itself at home.

The township appears to have been first surveyed by Marston Cabot, from the vote at one of the proprietors' meetings.

Voted that Mr. Marston Cabot be allowed 27 days in surveying Northfield.

The first land cleared in town was by Elijah Paine, some time previous to the first settlement, which was made in May, 1785, by Amos Robinson and others from Westminster, Vt.

THE FIRST TOWN MEETING was called by petition from a number of respectable inhabitants of Northfield, by Cornelius Lynde, Esq., of Williamstown, to meet at the house of Dr. Nathaniel Robinson, who lived a little N. W. of what is now the poor-farm. Said meeting was holden March 12, 1794, Cornelius Lynde Esq. moderator, at which the following first board of town officers were chosen; Nathaniel Robinson, town clerk; Stanton Richardson, Amos Robinson, Ezekiel Robinson, selectmen; David Denny, constable; William Ashcroft, Stanton Richardson, Ezekiel Robinson, listers; David Tenny, collector of taxes; Aquillo Jones, Samuel Richardson, highway surveyors.

EARLY HARMONY IN POLITICS.

The first votes were cast in Northfield for Governor, Isaac Tichenor, Lieut. Governor, Paul Brigham, treasurer, Samuel Mattocks, and 12 councillors, Samuel Spafford and others, in 1800, for each one, 12 votes, which must have been near the number if not all the legal voters at that time in town.

In 1801, three school districts made returns of the number of scholars that attended school within their limits. In No. 1, the Loomis district now, Ebenezer Fox sent 1, John Coales 1, James Paul 3, David Hedges 2, Ithamer Allen 6, Ezekiel Pierce 4, William Tubbs 3.

In district No. 2, in the Robinson neighborhood,—the principal part of the town at that early day—John Kathan sent 1, William Coales 2, Aquillo Jones 2, Amos Robinson 6, Ezekiel Robinson 5, Nathaniel Robinson 6, Abraham Shipman 3, Oliver Cobleigh 2, John Emerson 3, Abel Keyes 3, William Ashcroft 5, Justus Burnham 2.

In district No. 3,—the school-house being on the main road to South Village, near where Mr. Guild now lives—Stanton Richardson sent 5, Samuel Richardson 5, Eliphaz Shipman 5, Isaac Lynde 4, Isaiah Bacon 5, Amos Starkweather 3, Thomas French 2, Justus Burnham 2, Roswell Carpenter 1, Elisha Brown 1, and two years later, in district No. 4,—what is called South Village—Isaac Lynde sent 5 scholars, Eliphaz Shipman 5, Amos Starkweather 2, David Denny 5, Justus Burnham 4, Elisha Brown 1, being a return of 118 scholars in these 4 districts; and showing besides, who were early settlers in these neighborhoods; and all these men were laborers, and earnest laborers, and happy withal. The noble men of that day knew they could not grow rich without industry, and valiantly did they make the wilderness resound with the echoes of toil, as the tall old trees came crashing down upon the right hand and left, laid low by the sturdy woodman's axe! Even with their privations, they were measurably comfortable and happy.

TOWN OFFICERS, MAR. 7, 1826.

Amos Robinson, moderator; voted that the meeting be opened with prayer; Elijah Smith, Jr., town clerk; Elijah Burnham, John Mead, Charles Paine, selectmen; Albigeance Ainsworth, Elijah Smith, Jr., Jesse Averill, Harry Ainsworth, listers; John Starkweather, constable and collector of taxes; John Fiske, grand juror; William Jones, Amos Robinson, Joel Winch, Michael Shaw, Wm. THE PAPER CARRIER.

Henry Dewey, of Randolph, was the first regular paper carrier for this town, by bringing the weekly news, and Ambrose Nichols, the second. The paper carrier was always a welcome visitor. When the tin horn sounded his approach, the children were on tip-toe, and would rush out to the highway to get their papers, which were read with great avidity. A paper once a week was considered a very great blessing.

NORTHFIELD IN THOMPSON'S GAZETTEER, (1824.)

There were considerable revivals of religion here in 1802, 1807, 1811 and 1821. There are three ordained preachers: Elder Joel Winch and Nathan B. Ashcroft, Methodists, and Elder James Morgan, Freewill Baptist. The epidemic of 1811-'12 was very mortal here, and the dysentery swept off about 30 children in this town in the fall of 1823. The physicians are Benjamin Porter and Julius Easterbrook. The principal stream in this town is Dog river, which runs through it in a northerly direction, and affords a great number of valuable mill-privileges. A range of argillaceous slate passes through the township from south to north. The surface is considerably uneven, but it forms a convenient centre, in which is a small village, containing a meeting-house, one tavern, two stores, one saddler, one hatter, two blacksmith shops, one physician, one tannery, and 17 dwelling-houses. This is a place of some business, and is rapidly increasing. The second house was erected in this village in 1814. There is a small village $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of the one above mentioned, containing 2 saw-mills, 1 grist and 1 fulling-mill, 1 carding-machine, 1 cider-mill and several machine-shops. One mile north of the meeting-house (Depot Village) is an extensive woolen-factory, containing 230 spindles and 8 looms. There are also here some other mills and machinery. There are in town 9 school-districts, 7 school-houses, 1 company of militia, 1 of artillery, 8 saw, 3 grist and 2 fulling-mills, 1 carding-machine, 1 woolen-factory, 2 stores, 2 taverns, 2 tanneries and 4 blacksmith shops.

BRIEF BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES of the first settlers and most prominent citizens of Northfield, from 1785 to 1878, condensed from Mr. Gregory's History, page 58 to 251, inclusive. Mr. Gregory's volume is 8vo. pp. 319. The preceding part of this paper is the summary of the town history contained in its first 57 pages.

JOHN GREGORY'S TOAST

at the Northfield centennial day dinner. The 4th of July, 1876:

The early settlers of Northfield:— Prompted by their love of freedom, strong in the ambition of their manhood, and clad in the garb of truth and morality, they sought amid the wilds of Vermont a home for themselves, and for those who should come after them. Through their efforts the wilderness was made to blossom as the rose, and the fruits of their labors are to us a priceless inheritance.

AMOS ROBINSON,

born in Providence, R. I., Aug. 19, 1762; next to Elijah Paine, was the most influential man of that early day; made the first settlement, May, 1785, where his son, Hon. Moses Robinson, now lives (1878). He was the first representative of the town, re-elected 13 successive years, with the exception of 1810; justice of the peace many years, and was a large-hearted, honorable man, well-qualified for a leader in a new settlement. He induced a number of his relatives and friends to move from Westminster, Vt. to this town. He married for his first wife Batheny Jones, children: Polly, b 1786; Kezia, b 1787; Amos, b 1789; Patty, b 1791; Alman, b 1794; Judge, b 1795; Loreta, b 1796; Elijah, b 1799. He married for his second wife Mrs. Submit Holden; children: Moses, b 1804; Sophronia, b 1810; Caroline, b 1815. Mr. Robinson died Mar. 13, 1840.

KEZIA ROBINSON, daughter of Amos and Batheny, was the first child born in Northfield. She married Ira Sherman, of Waterbury, and died in 1877.

Hon. MOSES ROBINSON, son of Amos, who lived on the old homestead, held many town offices, and was State Senator in 1846-7. He died Apr. 22, 1881.

JUDGE ROBINSON, another son of Amos, settled near the Roxbury line; was a farmer.

COL. EZEKIEL ROBINSON,

brother of Amos, born in Providence, R. I., July 15, 1764, came from Westminster, May, 1785, nearly 10 years before the town was organized, and settled on the farm now occupied by John Henry, on the East Hill. He was moderator, selectman, collector, &c. He married Dinah Doubleday, born in Palmer, Mass., April 28, 1764. Mrs. Erastus Parker, a daughter of Col. Ezekiel, of Waterbury, says, "I have heard father and mother tell much about their living in a log house without a board or door about it, until they had 2 children; when the first was born, Jan. 26, 1788, father went over the hills of deep snow, with snow shoes and a hand sled, almost down to Farewell village, 9 miles, to get a midwife. She went home with him, some of the way on a sled, and some on foot."

"I was quite young, but remember the talk about father being called a 'Fed,' and Uncle Amos Robinson a 'Whig.' Father held the common offices in town, and was a surveyor through all its early history. He used to take large pieces of peeled hemlock bark for his bed, and make a rousing fire to keep the wolves off—they used to follow him home many a time close to his horse's heels. The bears were kept from the cabin the same way, by great fires."

They had 7 children: Lucinda, b 1788; Daniel, b 1789; Reuben, b 1791; Sylvanus, b 1793; Anna, b 1796; David, b 1799; Weltha, b 1806. All born in Northfield.

Mr. Robinson died in 1834; Mrs. Robinson died in 1851.

brother of Amos, came to Northfield soon after him, and settled on East Hill. The first town meeting, and town meetings frequently after, were held at his house. He was a very good physician, and the first one that practiced in town; and first town clerk, and held the office until he died, and was frequently elected to other offices, and decidedly popular with the people. He married Lucy Cushman; they had 8 children: Lydia, b 1784; Peggy, b 1786; Betsey, b 1789; Nathaniel, b 1791; Lucy, b 1794; Philetus, b 1797; Weltha, b 1800; Adaline, b 1802. All born in Northfield, except Lydia and Peggy, in Westminster. Mr. Robinson died in 1813, with the measles.

DAVID ROBINSON,

son of Col. Ezekiel, born in 1799. Beginning life as a farmer, with comparatively nothing, his industry and economy led him to engage in the first manufacturing interests of the Falls Village, with James Gould, Walter Little, and David Fletcher, about 1835. They made woolen goods. The business was a success, when he died, at the age of 42. He was in independent circumstances, and honored as a man of sterling integrity. He married Sarah Denny of Northfield, in 1820. They had 10 children: George, Mary, Ezekiel, Charles, John, Martin, Ezekiel 2d, Franklin, Sarah Ellen and David.

GEORGE, son of David, was for a time in trade with Joseph Denny, at the Centre Village, later carried on himself the same business there and at the Depot Village. He was agent and one of the company of the Brookfield Fork Factory. Mrs. Robinson died in 1866. Mr. Robinson moved in 1867, and now resides, with his daughters, in Fairbault, Minn., and is engaged in the grain trade.

THOMAS AVERILL, SR.,

born in Westminster, 1745, and his wife, Elizabeth, a sister of Amos Robinson, came from Westminster here, with his two sons, Jesse and John, in 1805. Oliver, another son, came 2 years later. They settled on the East Hill, the only part of the town much settled, but a little distance from the first clearing, and were all enterprising farmers. Mr. Averill was a man well calculated for a pioneer settlement, but terribly afflicted with that awful disease cancer, which shortened his days. His house was used occasionally for town meetings.

Children: John, b 1775; Betsey, b 1777; Amos, b 1779; Oliver, b 1782; Nabbie, b 1784; Jesse, b 1786; Lucy, b 1788; Lavinia, b 1790; John, b 1794; Keziah, b 1798.

Mr. Averill died in 1823, aged 78 years; Mrs. Averill in 1840, aged 88.

COL. OLIVER AVERILL,

after living on the East Hill a number of years, farming and blacksmithing, removed to the Center village, engaging in the same business. He was a public spirited man, and received many town offices. He was town treasurer many times, and such was the unbounded confidence his fellow townsmen reposed in him that they did not require a bondsman. He was postmaster also many years, holding the office until 1842.

He was a characteristic man, of a nervous temperament, and very decisive. He did not wait for others to form an opinion before he expressed his on politics or any particular subject; but he was a man of whom it might be said, "in him there was no guile;" and in his old age was remarkably active, and retained his natural buoyancy of spirit almost to the close of his life. He married Polly Hopkins, born Mar. 7, 1780; they had 4 children. Their son, Volney H., was many years town clerk. His children were: Volney H., b 1804, died 1871; Riley, b 1807, died 1863; Rolan, b 1813; Mary, b 1824; all in Northfield, except Volney H., in Westminster. Mr. Averill died Apr. 11, 1870, aged 88; Mrs. Averill Oct. 5, 1847, aged 67.

CAPTAIN JESSE AVERILL.

No man in this town had more to do with its public business from 1815 to 1840. He held almost every office that the town could confer upon him, selectman, representative, justice of the peace, lister, moderator, school committee, &c. He commenced his public career when quite young, and was deservedly popular with both political parties. His sound judgment and quiet, unostentatious manner endeared him to the people, and his sterling honesty and firmness of mind, always seeking to do right, and particularly being the friend of the poor and unfortunate, led him to be appointed administrator in the settling of many estates.

He was one who never sought office, but office would seek him, and when the voters had a severe contest over some candidate, and found they could not elect him, they would say, "Let's send Captain Jesse; we can elect him!"

He married Polly Loomis, of Hinsdale, Mass., born Nov. 28, 1783, sister to Eleazer and Dyer Loomis; children, all born in Northfield, Clark, 1812; Maria P., 1814; Russell, 1816; Thomas, 1820; David T., 1823.

Mr. Averill died July 25, 1860, aged 74; Mrs. Averill Oct. 17, 1855, aged 72.

JOHN AVERILL,

youngest brother of Amos, Oliver and Jesse, carried on blacksmithing with farming on the East Hill. He bought 100 acres of land formerly owned by Judge Paine, including the first clearing. He was representative, selectman, lister, justice of the peace, and overseer of the poor, honoring his trusts. He lives [1878] near the Center village, at the age of 84, having sold his farm a number of years ago to his nephew, D. T. Averill. He has probably seen more years in Northfield, with the exception of one or two, than any man now living. His recollection of past events is very good, and I am indebted to him for many reminiscences in the lives of the early settlers; more than to any other man.

Mr. Averill remembers when a lad of attending the raising of Judge Paine's factory, in the Factory Village, and it is vivid in his memory that they had pork and beans for dinner, cooked in a five-pail-kettle.

He married Loretta, daughter of Amos Robinson; children: Albert J., 1819; Charles, 1823; George, 1827, died 1856; Loretta C., 1831; Edwin, 1835, dead; Henry, 1837; all in Northfield. Mr. Averill died in 1881.

ELIJAH SMITH

and wife, Polly (Nichols) born in Putney, 1763, 1764, married in Northfield, 1785; lived in Putney until 1803, when they returned here and spent the remainder of their lives; had 8 children: Polly, Sally, Susanna, Elijah, David, Betsey, Fanny, Emily.

Mr. Smith died in 1840, age 77; Mrs. Smith in 1844, age 80.

ELIJAH SMITH, JR.,

born in Putney, 1795; came to Northfield with his father, in 1803; married Anna, daughter of Col. Ezekiel Robinson, Dec., 1818; had 10 children: Edward A., Julia A., Louisa, Amanda, Ann Maria, Charles E., Frederick E., Caroline M., Erastus P., John E., all in Northfield.

Mr. Smith died July 7, 1863, aged 68; Mrs. Smith July 27, 1875, aged 79.

Mr. Smith was of tall, commanding figure, manly and dignified in deportment. He was for many years Governor Paine's chief clerk, and enjoyed the respect and esteem of all who knew him. He succeeded Gilbert Hatch as town clerk, and held the office a number of years. His elegant, precise penmanship stands out in bold relief all through the town records during the years he was town clerk. He was an obliging man, and the writer has been pleased to notice the reverence and respect our citizens have for his memory. The prominent characteristic of his life, and which gave him success, was his high sense of public virtue, his irreproachable integrity. The tongue of calumny never dared to whisper a suspicion of him. Through all his private and public life there shone the luster of a noble manhood, and a pure, unsullied name.

GILBERT HATCH,

born in Preston, Conn., Aug 14, 1764; married Sally Nichols, born Jan. 22, 1767, and came to Northfield between 1790 and 1800, and settled on the William Gold farm. He was town clerk from 1813, when Dr. Robinson died, many years, and held other town offices; children by his first wife: Polly, b. 1801; Sarah, 1802; Amos S., 1803; Elizabeth, 1805; Edward N., 1806; Sidney S., 1808; Sarah Ann, 1810; by his second wife, Martha Royce;—his first died in 1817,—he had Sidney, b. 1818; Gilbert M., 1822; Marion F., 1824; all born in Northfield. He died in 1835.

ELEAZER LOOMIS,

and his brother Dyer, at 19 and 17 years, came and settled on the mountain near where Hopson Barker now resides. Eleazer was born in Hinsdale, Mass., 1785 and married Polly Buck, who was born in Connecticut in 1787. They had good success in wheat, raising one year 300 bushels. Living opposite where our railroad depot now stands, they could look down into the valley of Dog River, where not a stick of timber had been cut.

They had many struggles for a foothold in the forest, but, like other early settlers with brave hearts and willing hands, success crowned their labors. At times the howling of wild beasts, as they often said, made their hair stand on end; for the country abounded with bears, wolves and catamounts. One morning Eleazer went out to a corn-crib, made of rails, back of his house, to get some corn for his hens, when a huge bear, that had been helping himself, jumped down from the crib, which so alarmed the young man he ran round on the other side and Bruin and he met face to face, and both being more frightened ran round again, both trying to escape.

After a few years, the brothers moved to the east side of the mountain, to what is called the "North Corner," where Eleazer's son, William H. Loomis, now resides. Eleazer held a number of town offices; was a hard working man, and well liked. His children were Roxanna, Eleazer, Louisa, Cynthia, William, Mariette, Adaline; all born in Northfield. He married for his second wife Louisa Bullock, of Berlin. He died in 1866; Mrs. Loomis in 1835.

AQUILLO JONES,

born in Westminster, 1745, came to this town soon after Esquire Amos Robinson. He married Prudence Wise, and they settled on the farm known afterwards as the "Bennett place." Mrs. Jones came to Northfield on horseback, using for a riding stick a twig of a "Balm of Gilead," which she stuck into the ground by her log-house, and it became a great tree. She was a help-meet to her husband, and could turn her hand to the cradle, the loom, the sugar-place, and the barn-yard. It was said by those who worked for them that she would get up mornings, in the spring of the year, by two or three o'clock, and go to the barn to see if the cows were cared for, and in judging of the value of neat stock Esquire Amos Robinson used to say he would give more for her judgment in that direction than for any man's in Northfield.

At one time the saw-mill stopped, the saw breaking, and the men were so busy in their farming operations that they could not go to Westminster for another, Mrs. Jones volunteered and brought it in her arms, riding on horseback. A feat to test the patience and strength of a stout man.

Aquillo was troubled about what would become of his earthly tabernacle after he had "shuffled it off," he declared often he would not be buried on "Cobble Hill," a little burying-ground near where he lived, "it looked so cold and dreary." Being questioned about his son Charles buying a farm in Randolph (where they were all going to live) he guessed he had not got cheated, for they had a good burying-ground in that town.

Children of Aquillo and Prudence: William, Charles, Polly, Nancy, Sally. He died in 1830, age 82, and his wife in 1824, age 82.

WILLIAM came with his father, and, after a few years, settled on Judge Paine's turnpike, near the toll-gate, and commenced keeping tavern in 1811 on the farm now occupied by Timothy Holland. This was quite a public place of resort in those early days of staging; horses used on the through line to Boston were changed here.

Mr. Jones married Sally Babbitt, and they had 13 children, born in Northfield: Charles, Lucy, Louisa, Emery, William, William, Jr., Lamira, Sarah, Rebecca, Prudence, Seth, Harriet, Luther. Mr. Jones died in 1840, aged 63; Mrs. Jones in 1829, aged 44.

CHARLES JONES settled on the old homestead, and built the two-story house near "Bennett's Pond," now owned by Edward Howes. He married Lucinda, daughter of Col. Ezekiel Robinson; children: Alba, Daniel, Lucinda, Caroline, Daniel 2d, and Weltha. Mr. Jones died at Menasha, Wis., in 1871, where he located in 1855, age 91.

ABRAHAM SHIPMAN

came from Westminster at a very early day, and was quite a prominent man in the settlement. He was a selectman 8 years, and represented the town in the legislature. His first wife's name was Annis Rice; his children were Azubah, Hiram, Orran, Ophir, Orphia, Sardis. She died in 1809, and Mr. Shipman married Peggy, daughter of Doctor Nathaniel Robinson, who had two children: Annis R. and Phidelia C.

A story is told of "Uncle Abraham." One April, nearly 52 years since, when our townsman, David T. Averill, was in small clothes, his father, Captain Jesse, started for the cows near evening, not knowing the little fellow was following him. After his return he learned the boy was missing. Great alarm prevailed for fear he would wander into the woods near by, and perish before morning, and search was commenced. At "Uncle Abraham's" the lights were burning; all but the old people had retired; they, as usual, smoking, preparatory to going to bed, when a noise was heard at the window, and two little hands came pat upon the panes of glass. Aunt Peggy was alarmed; the fire flew from her pipe across the room; but Uncle Abraham went out, and brought in the lost child, and he was stripped of his wet clothes, wrapped in a warm blanket and fell asleep. The shell was sounded, the news flew along the line where the men were in search. Col. Geo. K. Cobleigh, quite excited, who had been riding up and down the road some time, hearing the good news, cried out with a stentorian voice, "The child is found; he is safe in Abraham's bosom!"

ELIPHUS SHIPMAN, brother of Abraham, settled about the same time. He lived and died in a little log-house near where James Morse, Esq., now lives, and married one of the four sisters (Sally Double-day,) who came to this town together, being the first women seeking a new home in the wilderness here; their children were: Phebe, Electa, Caleb, Levi, Daniel, Edmund, Cynthia, and Polly.

ELEAZER NICHOLS, SR., born in Putney, 1762; married Betsey Goodwin, of Putney, and settled here in 1809. Their children were: Ambrose, Eleazer, Jr., James, Patty, Polly, William, Betsey, John G., Lucy, Laura. Mr. Nichols died in 1831, and Mrs. Nichols in 1853.

AMBROSE NICHOLS,

born in Putney, 1791, came to Northfield in 1809. He married Sally Hutchinson, of Braintree, and located upon the farm afterwards owned by Moses Lane. He built the "Red House," now occupied by Miss Maria Howes, which was the second house erected on the road leading from the Center to the "Factory village." He was many years, and until his death, the "Postman" of this section. His route included the towns of Berlin, Barre, Williamstown, Brookfield, Randolph, Braintree, Roxbury, and Northfield. The well known sound of "Uncle Armus'" horn, calling his patrons to the road-side for their weekly news, was always welcomed.

Mr. and Mrs. Nichols had 3 children: Ambrose, Jr., Sarah, and George A. Mr. Nichols died in 1835, and his widow in 1853.

came at sixteen to Northfield with his father. He is now [1878] in his 85th year. Though feeble, his mind retains its memory to a good degree. He has until lately had in his possession the ballot box used at the first town meeting held in Northfield, Mar. 25, 1794, said to have been made by Seth Smith; 5 inches long inside, and 2 wide, and 2½ deep, dug out of a pine block. It has been presented to the town for safe keeping.

He married Mrs. Orra Starkweather White, mother of George J. and John A. S. White, Oct., 1822, and they lived for more than 50 years on the farm where the Adams Slate quarry is now yielding beautiful material for roofing. Their children were all born in this town: Mary Ann, Orra E., Olivia C., Dudley C., Emma. Mrs. Nichols died in 1877, born in Putney, 1796, came to Northfield in 1809. He learned the carpenter and joiner's trade soon after, which he industriously pursued till compelled by the infirmities of age to retire from the more active pursuits of life. He married Annis A. Dole, of Danville, Jan. 1, 1826; they had two children: George, b 1827; Annis, 1830. Mrs. Nichols died in 1830, and Mr. Nichols married for his second wife Harriet West, May 1, 1831; their children are: James C., Jane E., John W., Mary E. Mr. Nichols died in 1873; Mrs. Nichols died in 1876.

JAMES NICHOLS,

WILLIAM NICHOLS, .

born in Putney, 1802, married Roxanna Herrick, of Barre, and settled on the farm now owned by Harvey R. Keyes, and where Mrs. Nichols still resides. The house they first occupied was the first one erected on Main street, between the two villages, and was built by Justus Burnham. Mr. Nichols acquired, through an honest industry, a handsome property, and died in 1863, lamented by a large circle of acquaintances.

IIION. GEORGE NICHOLS, son of James and Annis A. Nichols, was born in Northfield, Apr. 17, 1827. He married Ellen Maria, daughter of Abijah and Maria B. Blake, of Vergennes, Apr. 8, 1852, who was born in New Haven, Apr. 1, 1832. To them were born Alice Margaret in 1853, and a son in 1858, both of whom died in infancy.

Dr. Nichols was educated at the common school and Newbury Seminary, fitted for college, but never entered, having determined to study medicine, and could not see the way clear to pursue both courses. He commenced teaching school previous to his 15th birthday. In 1848, he was appointed State Librarian by Governor Coolidge, and received successive annual elections till 1853. He studied medicine with Dr. S. W. Thayer; graduated at the Vermont Medical College at Woodstock in 1851; commenced business in his native town, combining with it that of apothecary and druggist in 1854, which latter business he still retains, and continued in the practice of his profession with eminent success till his return from the army in 1863, having served as surgeon of the 13th Reg., Vt. Vols. In 1865, he was appointed Secretary of State by Governor Smith, which office he has since continuously held. In 1870, was a member and President of the Constitutional Convention; in 1872, a delegate to the National Republican Convention, and made a member of the National Republican Committee, and has been a member and Secretary of the Republican State Committee since that year. In 1868, he was elected director, and in 1874, president, of the Northfield National Bank; in 1872, chairman of the board of commissioners to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of the Central Vermont Railroad Company, and has been clerk of the same since its organization. The Doctor has been repeatedly honored in elections to the various municipal offices of trust and responsibility, and, what may be worthy of mention, with the exceptions of 1856-58-59-63 and 66, has been moderator of the annual town meetings since 1854.

JOSEPH NICHOLS,

a brother of Eleazer Nichols, Sr., came from Putney, about 1805; was a carpenter, and assisted in building Judge Paine's dwelling-house in Williamstown, on the turnpike; was selectman, &c. His children were Sally, Leonard, Martin, Louisa, Harrison.

JASON WINCH,

born in Framingham, Mass., Sept. 2, 1746, settled, in 1813, on the farm now owned by his grand-son, Joel Winch. He married Abigail Howe, of Dorchester, Mass. Their children were Asa, Joel, Hannah, Abigail, Thomas.

REV. JOEL WINCH

married Anna Kezar in 1808, and came to Northfield in 1815, living on what is now called the "Joel Winch farm." Their children were: Joel, Jr., Enoch, Anna, Elijah, Isaac, Benjamin P., and Mary.

Mr. Winch was an eccentric, remarkable man, a Methodist preacher, joined the conference at 19; was ordained by Bishop Asbury in Boston, June 4, 1807. As a preacher, he was full of wit and pleasantry, and sent home his arguments with great pathos and power.

He was a staunch Mason. When many were going back on their principles, he remained firm, glorying in the sentiments George Washington had honored, and which had comforted and elevated millions of our race. No place seemed dearer to him than the lodge room; surrounded by the fraternity, he was happy, and he made others so around him. Masonry was his great theme while among the brethren; almost single handed he fought for it in Northfield, and lived to see the order again respected and beloved. He could say:

"A sacred burden is this life ye bear;
Look on it, lift it, bear it solemnly.
Stand up and walk beneath it steadfastly,
Faint not for sorrow, falter not for sin,
But onward, upward, till the goal ye win."

Elder Winch died in 1854.

ARIEL EGERTON,

born in Norwich, Conn., June 8, 1789, moved with his father's family in 1796 to Brookfield, Vt., from whence he came to Northfield in the fall of 1811. The following winter he taught school on the east hill. Of the scholars that winter, only one, John Averill, is known to be living in town. The winter following he taught near Judge Paine's factory, and in 1815, built a house and store at the Center village. His store was the first building erected in that village for business purposes. He continued there in trade until 1819; in 1824, bought from Judge Paine the grist-mill on the east hill, which he carried on about 5 years; in 1829, bought a large building at the South village, and started a chair-factory, which he kept in operation about 5 years, and then removed from Northfield.

Mr. Egerton was among the first in this vicinity to observe the injurious effects arising from the use of liquors, and very early became active in the cause of temperance. In the winter of 1826, he invited the people living in his neighborhood to meet at their school-house and listen to some statements with regard to the use and abuse of intoxicating drinks. About 40 were present, and that was, as we believe, the first attempt in the State, aside from pulpit addresses, to present the temperance question in a public lecture. In 1828, about 20 of the citizens of the town united to form a temperance society. Mr. Egerton was elected its first president;

Orange Hovey, secretary. Mr. Egerton delivered an address in the Center meeting-house, which was published in the Montpelier Watchman and other papers in the State.

Mr. Egerton died in Quechee, in 1859. His wife survives him (1878), living with her oldest son, Hon. Charles B. Egerton, at Ironton, Ohio. Her maiden name was Abigail P. Keyes, only daughter of Capt. Abel Keyes, of Putney, born Aug. 11, 1796. They had 8 children: Almira E., Laura E., Olive S., Cynthia M., Abby S., Charles B., John S., Joseph K.; all born in Northfield, and four now living.

JOSEPH KEYES EGERTON

lived in Quechee until the death of his father, when he moved to Norwich, where he resided 15 years, and came to Northfield, March, 1877. He married Sarah F. Tyler, of Claremont, N. H., in 1856, and had two children, Edith K. and Fred T.

Mr. Egerton was clerk in J. C. Brooks' store in Hartford 4 years, 1 year in Cleveland's at Brookfield, and 1 year with Camp & Thayer in Northfield. He was post-master at Quechee from 1853 to 1861, when he removed to Northfield; he was town agent, town treasurer and justice of the peace; joined the Odd Fellows in Northfield in 1852; joined the Masons in 1854, and was Grand Lecturer of the Grand Lodge of Vermont 3 years, from 1867 to 1870.

I am under great obligation to Mr. Egerton for his valuable assistance in working up the history of his ancestors, his father, and the Keyes' who built so extensively in Northfield.

WILLIAM AND TAMASIN ASHCROFT, from Connecticut, had 11 children; one of them, Lois, was born in Judge Paine's grist-mill, and was the second child born in town. Mr. Ashcroft took part in the first meetings that were held here. He settled on what is now the poor farm. He held town offices; children: Daniel, Sarah, Abigail, Tamasin, John D., Lydia, Eliza T., Nathan B., Lois, William, Lucy.

REV. NATILAN BROWN ASHCROFT, son of William, born in Brookline, Conn., in 1787, and came to Northfield with his father. He was a preacher of the Methodist order, ordained by Bishop Kendrick as an Elder, in Bristol, R. I., Sept. 5, 1822, and was one of the first ministers in this section. In his latter days also he not only looked after the spiritual wants of the people, but attended to their physical ailments, dealing in "roots and herbs" after the Thompsonian plan.

Mr. Ashcroft married Betsy Lawrence, in Plainfield, in 1812. Their children were: Hester Ann R., Nathan Sias, John Wesley, Eliza Ann. Mr. Ashcroft died in 1857; Mrs. Ashcroft in 1872.

JOEL SIMONDS

settled on the mountain where Mr. Annis used to live, in 1816, but afterwards moved to a farm in the N. E. corner of the town. He married Lydia Brailey, of Hartford. They had 13 children: Daniel, Polly, Joel, Horace, Albert Clark, Charles, Rufus, Seth, John, Lydia, Harriet, John; all but two born in Northfield.

Rev. JOEL SIMONDS, his son, resides at the Center village, and still owns the farm where his father lived. He married Olive Pitkin, in 1844.

JAMES and ELETIEN PAUL were early settlers on the Berlin road, near the north corner; children: Lucy, Mary, Benjamin, Belinda, Daniel J., Hosea, all born here.

LEBBEUS BENNETT,

born in Connecticut, 1777, settled on the "Bennett place," a well-to-do farmer; married Elizabeth Millington; children: Melinda, Ambrose, Gamaliel, Seymour, Rial, Joseph, Lucinda.

AMOS HOWES,

born in Windham, Conn., 1792, married Melinda, daughter of Lebbeus Bennett. Their children were: Augustus, Harriet, Fanny, Lucinda, Maria M., Elizabeth, Seymour, Adelia L., Edward H., Lebbeus A., all born in Chelsea, and all living now (1878), in Northfield, but two.

ANANIAS TUBBS

came from Gilsum, N. H., to Northfield in 1806, and settled in the Loomis neighborhood. He married Hannah Hill. Their children were: Jeremiah, Sally, Patty, Annie, Elizabeth, William, Julia, Polly and Solomon. He died in 1828, aged 84; his wife in 1832, aged 80.

He was a soldier of the Revolutionary War; enlisted under Benedict Arnold, and marched under his command through the wilderness of Maine; was wounded and taken prisoner at Quebec. He had orders after enlisting to march in two days, and a pair of pants must be had. His wife took her shears, cut the wool from two sheep, one white and one black, which she carded together, and with the assistance of a neighbor, spun, wove, and made a pair of pants before she slept, and they were ready at the time they were wanted.

DAVID HEDGES

was born on Long Island, where both his parents died before he was a year old. Most of his early life was spent in Connecticut. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary War; married Hannah Shaw; came to Randolph in 1784; one of the first settlers of that town; came to Northfield in 1794, with 12 children; was the 17th family here; children: Jeremiah, Daniel, Hannah, Phebe, Matthew, Esther, David, Stephen, Jerusha, Lewis, Richard, and Elijah. He lived at the North Corner. His son Stephen died at 26; the rest of his children all settled in life; one in Ohio, one in Western New York, and the others in Vermont, several living in this town a while. The three youngest died in Northfield. Mr. Hedges died in 1829, aged 94; Mrs. Hedges in 1830, aged 81.

RICHARD, son of David, born in Randolph, 1785; when a lad went to hunt up cattle, when all was a wilderness in Dog River valley; with no building except Stanton Richardson's log-house. In 1810, he married Rhoda, daughter of Joel Reed, of Williamstown, and settled on the East-Hill, the first farm west of Judge Paine's grist-mill, where he lived 43 years. His first wife died in 1819, leaving two daughters, Louisa M., and Cynthia. Mr. Hedges married for his second wife, Julia, daughter of Ananias Tubbs; children: Daniel, Gilbert, Rhoda, Betsey E., Julia, Matthew M., John, Francis A.; all born in Northfield. Mr. Hedges died in 1872, age 97. Mrs. Hedges in 1872, age 83.

THOMAS SLADE,

from Alstead, N. H., appears on the records as an early settler. He was quite a noted schoolmaster. His son Thomas, the miller, who followed in the footsteps of his father, says, "He taught school in Amos Robinson's district 6 or 8 terms, boarding at home," where Herbert Glidden now lives. He also taught school in Chelsea and Brookfield, and was a surveyor many years in this town. He married Clarissa Burroughs; children: Howard, Lavinna, Calista, Clarissa, Allen, Thomas, Jr., Anna, William; all but Howard born in Northfield. Mr. Slade moved to Montpelier in 1823, and died in 1829.

PARLEY TYLER

was born in Connecticut in 1779, and soon after coming to Northfield bought of Judge Paine 100 acres, on what was known afterward as Tyler Hill. He married Betsey Rood, of Brookfield. Their children were Martin P., Matilda, Juliet, Squire, Daniel, Royal, Edward, Jason, Louisa, Jason C., John A. Mr. Tyler died in 1855; Mrs. Tyler in 1849.

Daniel Tyler relates a story of one Bean, the first known thief convicted in Northfield. He broke into Judge Paine's factory one Sunday afternoon, and took out 25 rolls of cloth, and hid them under a hemlock tree-top, 40 rods back of the factory. The next day all hands turned out to look for the stolen goods and the thief. Bean took one roll on his back and made for the East Hill, and went across Mr. Tyler's farm, and left it in the woods, going to the house and asking for breakfast. Mrs. Tyler told him he had better wait until dinner, it being then 11 o'clock, but he said that he was out surveying land, and some bread and cheese would answer.

The news soon reached the East Hill a theft had been committed, and search was made, and not far from noon Bean returned to Tyler's house, and suspecting that he was the guilty one, Mr. Tyler asked him if he had seen any cattle in his travels, when he answered he had not; said

"Daniel: 'Father approached him, getting nearer and nearer by slow advances, when he sprung upon him and took him down, when he told me to yank off that roll of cloth upon his back, which I did very easily, as it was tied on with listing, although I was only 9 years of age. Soon Bean gave up, and said he would go where we wanted he should. We fastened him with a rope and led him into the house, when he said, 'Well, mother, I have come back to dinner.' It was but a little while before all the villagers, headed by Judge Paine, Amos Robinson, and John Starkweather, had arrived, when he had a preliminary trial before Esquire Robinson. I can well remember how Starkweather's hands shook when he read the warrant as constable, it being new business to him. This was the first man convicted of stealing and sent to the State prison from Northfield.'" born in Windsor, Jan. 7, 1774, one of the earliest settlers in Northfield, was a collector of taxes, and held a number of town offices. He located on the hill, near the South village, where his grandson David now resides. The numerous family of Dennys in Northfield are his descendants. He married Betsey Spooner; their children: Paul S., Asenath, Adolphus, Amasa, Sally, Samuel, Harriet, Eliza, Joseph. Mr. Denny died in 1821.

ADOLPHUS DENNY, born in 1796, lived and died at the old homestead of his father. He married Eliza Frizzel, born in 1804; their children were: David, Sarah, Katherine, George, Mary, Katherine. Mrs. Denny died in 1864. Mr. Denny married 2d, Mrs. Electa, widow of Col. George K. Cobleigh, and died in 1873.

Dea. SAMUEL DENNY, son of David, was a farmer, and a respected officer of the Congregational church. No man attended public worship with more fidelity than he did, and he raised up a family of industrious and respected children, all in good circumstances. He married Prudence Ellis, of Berlin, Sept. 1828; children: Harriet E., Andrew E., Addison W., Leland H., George B., Amasa M., Prudence J. He died in Lowell, Mass., in 1874.

JOSEPH, son of David, was but 10 years old when his father died. At 19 he left home, with just 25 cents to commence life for himself. He labored in Randolph 1 year, went to Berlin, and worked upon a farm 4 years; commenced the tannery business at Berlin Corners, exchanged for the hotel there, and also bought his first farm, which occupation he always followed in connection with his other pursuits; about 1841, entered into the mercantile business, continued in Berlin till 1847, when he moved his goods to Northfield Center, and continued in business 5 or 6 years, when he sold out, and turned his attention more particularly to farming. He came here and engaged in mercantile business in 1847; in 1856 formed a partnership in tailoring with J. C. B. Thayer, and also with Geo. H. Crane in general merchandise some 3 years, and with his oldest son in 1860, till his removal to Worcester, Mass.; when he took the next son into business, with the style of C. Denny & Co.

OLIVER COBLEIGH

came here from Westminster in 1796. He married Abiah Doubleday, one of the four sisters who came from that town, and were the foremost women to take up their residence in this wilderness country; Dinah, Ezekiel Robinson's wife, Anna, Stanton Richardson's wife, and Sally, Eliphus Shipman's wife, all extraordinary, courageous women. Mr. Cobleigh's children were: Dinah, George K. and Harriet.

GEORGE K., son of Oliver, held a number of town offices; made a good officer in the militia, and rose to the rank of Colonel. He lived many years at the South village, where he died. He married Electa, daughter of Eben Frizzel. Children: Caroline, George, Martin, Dennison and Charles H.

MARTIN COBLEIGH, son of George, lives at South Northfield, and is engaged in the sash, door and blind business.

JOSEPH SMITH, JR.,

born in Putney, in 1775. In 1807, influenced by his brother-in-law, Capt. Abel Keyes, came to Northfield, bought two lots of land from David Denny, Esq., built a house near where E. K. Jones' store now stands, in the south village, and opposite his house built a store, 16x25, the first in town, and filled it with goods; but in 1809, he sold out to C. W. Houghton, of Montpelier, and the next year returned to Putney.

SOLOMON DUNHAM

lived at an early day not far from Judge Paine's grist-mill, on the East Hill; was a clothier and carried on that business there. He removed to the south village afterwards, and worked at the same trade. He married Experience Smith; children: Experience, Mary, Sally, William H. H., Albert, all born in Northfield.

Mr. Dunham had three wives; by his third, Harriet, daughter of David Denny, he had two sons: Franklin and George.

ION. NATHAN MORSE, of the south village, was born in Fitzwilliam, N. H., and came here from Roxbury in 1838. He held a number of offices in town; was representative and also assistant judge in the Washington County Court. He married for his first wife Polly, daughter of John Hutchinson, Esq., of Braintree; children: Nathan, Polly, Betsey, Lucy H. Mrs. Morse died in 1845, and he married Martha Abbott of Williamstown; they had one son, James. Judge Morse died in 1862. Mrs. Morse died in 1875.

LUCIUS EDSON,

born in Wheatley, Mass., 1798; married Matilda Ainsworth of Brookfield, and came to Northfield in 1822. He and Arba Crane bought out Solomon Dunham, in the cloth-dressing business near Judge Paine's grist-mill, where they worked two falls, and Mr. Edson went to the South village, where he added wool-carding to cloth-dressing. He had 4 children: Marshall L., Alice J., E. Annette, Walter A.; all born in Northfield.

ANSON ADAMS

came from East Roxbury about 1816, and settled in the "Winch neighborhood." A log house was his dwelling-place, without doors or windows, using quilts in their stead. Crockery and other household goods were brought in the arms of the family, through snow banks and by marked trees, making life real if not pleasant.

Mr. A. came originally from Connecticut to Vermont; married Sukey Gold, sister of Deacon William Gold; children: Adaline, Elvira, Emily, Susan, Avaline M., Harriet S., Charlotte, Ursula, Roswell, Sophronia, Anson, George W., Fanny H., all but two born in Northfield.

born in Brookfield, Oct. 1796, married Harriet Cobleigh, July 1828, and settled in Northfield. He was a believer in the doctrine of the restitution of all things, a good Mason, and died as he had lived, strong in his faith. His wife died in 1849. Four of his children are now living: John Quincy, Harriet M., Abbie A., Laura W., all born in Northfield.

Mr. Adams died at the home of his oldest daughter, in Revere, Mass., Dec. 1877, aged 81. He was brought to Northfield, and buried at the Center cemetery, with Masonic honors, having made his arrangements for the last great change, and requesting his old friend, Rev. John Gregory, to attend his last service.

JOHN EMERSON,

a blacksmith, lived at an early day on the East Hill, in the Averill neighborhood. He came to Northfield from Norwich, and was a brother of Harry Emerson, the latter, who carried on that business at the Center village.

ETHAN ALLEN.

We had an Ethan Allen in that early period of the town's history. Not the renowned hero of Ticonderoga, but an Ethan Allen who run Judge Paine's grist-mill several years.

SHERMAN GOLD,

born in 1813, deacon of the Universalist church, for many years carried on the sash, blind and door business at the South village—a sincere, conscientious man, generally respected. Died in 1873.

JAMES LATHAM, SR.,

born 1750, came here from Chesterfield, N. H., at an early day. He married Susannah Brit, born in 1752. Their children were:

JAMES LATHAM, JR., settled in the Shaw neighborhood. He married Polly, daughter of Amos Robinson, Esq., and they had 15 children: Bathany, Leonard, Nancy, Patty R., Hollis, Arvilla, Susanna, Eli, Nancy L., Almon, Loran, Seth W., Marshall, Cynthia, Mary A.

EZRA LATHAM, married Polly, daughter of Aquillo Jones; children: Ezra, Jr., Orrin, Harvey, Daniel.

CAPT. JOHN STARKWEATHER, born in Norwich, 1790, married Cynthia Nichols, step-daughter of Capt. Abel Keyes, Dec. 1809. Sept. 1811, he took the freeman's oath, and thereafter during his life was almost continually in town and other public offices: lister, grand jurymen, moderator of town meetings, justice of the peace, deputy sheriff, high sheriff of the county, representative, and captain of a military company 2 years, and several years kept tavern at the Center village. He was a friendly, familiar man, and before 40 years old, children called him "Uncle John." He was quite popular as an officer. He died in 1841.

DEA. REUBEN SMITH,

a beloved member of the Baptist church, came from Tunbridge to Northfield, and settled in the South village in 1826. He married Molly Mudgett; children: Polly, Apha, William, Tabitha, Reuben, Josiah and Anna.

WILLIAM KEYES, ESQ.,

born in Putney, 1766, removed to Northfield in 1799, located on East Hill, and bought his farm of his brother, Abel Keyes; in 1804, sold, and bought near where the Center hotel stands; his nearest neighbor, Stanton Richardson, west of the river nearly half a mile. He sold at the Center about 1810, and his farm was soon after sold for building lots. In 1816, he bought the farm next south of the Stanton Richardson place, and for several years carried on brick-making. His daughter, Mrs. Lucy Knapp, now living in Northfield, relates that in 1818 there was a great deal of sickness. Dr. Porter's bill for medical services in her father's family that year was large enough to pay for all the brick used in building his house. Mr. Keyes was one of the earliest Methodists, active in organizing their church in this town, and for more than 50 years a class-leader therein. He married Betsey Nichols, of Putney; children: Polly, Jacob, William, Lucy, Sewall, Eliza, Abel, Sally, Emeline. Mr. Keyes died Dec. 1849.

born in Putney, Sept. 11, 1773. In the summer of 1790, while prospecting for a new home, came to Northfield, and in view of its water-power, believing it would become a great manufacturing town, decided to locate here. The next spring he bought of Judge Paine the mills and 100 acres on East Hill, there being the first settlement in town. He lived there about 5 years, improved the mills, and then sold the farm to his brother William, and the mill property to Judge Paine. In 1804, his daughter, Mrs. A. P. Egerton, relates her father made a journey to Putney, on horseback, taking her with him on the same horse, she being 8 years old, it being to induce some of his friends to come to Northfield to live. In 1807, Captain Keyes purchased of David Denny, a saw-mill and few acres of land in what is now called South Northfield. The saw-mill he enlarged and improved, built a grist-mill, potash, and several dwelling-houses, and in 3 years, mainly through his influence and labors, "Slab City," as it was long called, had become a lively village. His wife's brother, Joseph Smth, Jr., had a store there, the first store in Northfield. In 1810, Captain Keyes sold his mills to C. W. Houghton, of Montpelier, and in 1812, the rest of his property in that village, and removed to the Factory, where Judge Paine had just begun to build a village. He remained there one year, living in the "Old Abbey," a house that stood where George C. Randall's house now is, and afterwards built for Judge Paine the two houses that now stand near the bridge. In 1814, he purchased several lots of land where the Center village now is. The next year, with his son, Joseph, he built several dwelling-houses, a machine-shop, and a potash; in 1818, the Center Village Hotel, which they kept about 5 years; in 1819, the church known as the old yellow meeting-house.

In 1824, they sold all their property at the Center, and bought that Capt. Keyes had formerly owned at Slab City; rebuilt the mills; lived there 3 years; sold, moved to the Falls, now Gouldsville, and on the site where Gould's factory now stands built a saw and grist-mill. Capt. Keyes lived there till 1838, his son Joseph having sold out there some years previously. He then bought a saw-mill up the river, a grist-mill and a dwelling-house; lived there till 1839, and move^d to Illinois, and one year after to Lake Mills, Wis., where he died in 1848, aged 75. There are now standing in this town about 40 buildings erected by Capt. Abel Keyes and his son Joseph. The Captain was one of the most enterprising men of the town during all his stay in it. He held various offices, was lister in 1798, Captain of a military company, justice of the peace many years, selectman and representative. He possessed robust health, ceaseless activity, could do everything but persevere and wait. He could prepare his land, plant and hoe, but could not wait for the corn to ripen. The framing, raising and enclosing a building were just to his taste; he could plan for and direct a multitude of men, but the quiet work of finishing the structure must be left to more patient workers, and became a proverb, "Capt. Abel always moves just before harvest." Industrious and honest, his success in life was limited only by his habit of leaving to others the pleasant task of reaping the reward of his labors. He married Mrs. Esther Nichols, in 1793. They had two children, Joseph and Abigail P., and Mrs. Keyes had a daughter by her first husband.

CAPT. JOSEPH KEYES,

born in 1795; married Zeruah Eggleston in 1816, who had 2 children, Simon and Cynthia. He married a second wife, Olive Williams; children: Abel, Catharine W., Elisha W., Oliver A., Emily O. Mr. Keyes died at Menasha, Wis., Sept. 17, 1874. He followed his trade as millwright in Wisconsin, after his removal with his father to that state, and was very successful.

Many of our citizens remember he built a machine shop at the Center village, on the east side of the common, run by steam, the first motive power by steam in Northfield, and a great curiosity at that day. On its sides were painted the words "Machine Shop." The Wisconsin Journal says of Mr. Keyes:

As the crisis which came upon the country in 1837 was approaching, finding it difficult to proceed with his extensive business, he made disposition of it in the spring of 1836, and little left but his head and hands, backed up by most indomitable courage, energy, and a powerful constitution, he struck out to seek his fortune in a new country, and landed in Milwaukee June, 1836. Wisconsin at that time was an inviting field for men of his type. It needed intelligent, enterprising, hard working men to develop its immense resources. He being one of that class, found a cordial welcome to the territory by the few bold spirits who had preceded him, and an ample scope of country in which to operate. In 1837, he and his family removed to Lake Mills, being the first white settlers in that town. He proceeded to the erection of a grist and saw-mill, that proved of vast advantage to the settlement, and very soon laid out the village of Lake Mills, being its original founder. Here, he erected the first school-house in the town, and employed the first teacher, a Miss Catlin of Cottage Grove, in this county, all with his individual means—an act, of itself, which is a proud monument to his name and fame, and proves his life has not been a failure.

For over 50 years he was a prominent Mason. He loved the order, and was one of its most honored and respected members. The golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Keyes was celebrated in 1871, surrounded by children, grand-children, and great-grand-children; children: Abel Keyes, now of Menasha, Hon. E. W. Keyes, postmaster of Madison, Oliver Keyes, now of Hudson, and Mrs. H. D. Fisher, of Menasha. Mrs. Olive Williams, relict of Capt Joseph Keyes, departed this life at Menasha, Feb. 18, 1878, in her 78th year. In all positions in life she was honored for her many virtues.

HON. ELISHA W. KEYES, son of Joseph, born in Northfield, Jan. 23, 1828, left Northfield with his father's family, May 1837, for Milwaukee, Wis., thence to Lake Mills. In early life he was first in his classes at school, and in sports and games; following in the wake of his father and grandfather, he led the van. He was admitted to the Bar in Madison at 23, and soon acquired an extensive and lucrative practice; was District Attorney of Dane County in 1858, '59; in 1861, was appointed postmaster of the city of Madison, which office he still holds (1878); was mayor of Madison in 1865 and '66; in 1867, Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee; for 10 years he conducted the affairs of the republican party of the State with such strength and power of organization as to earn for him the now widely-known title of "The Bismarck" of Western politics. In 1872 and '76, was a delegate to and Chairman of the Wisconsin Delegation in the National Republican Conventions; now as "Boss Keyes, of Wisconsin," he is familiarly known in every state in the Union. In 1877, he declined a re-election as Chairman of the State Republican Committee, and resumed an active practice of law. He is one of the Regents of the State University of Wisconsin.

Mr. Keyes is of a stout, compact build, has a strong constitution and good health. He is esteemed a good hater, a firm friend, and one whom men at large instinctively recognize as a leader. He has been twice married; children: five.

ALVAH HENRY, son of Hiram, born in Alstead, N. H., 1799, was killed in Northfield June 28, 1831, by the fall of a tree.

EDMOND SHIPMAN and wife Betsey, (Nichols) had 13 children. He was a blacksmith by trade, and worked at the Centre village.

REV. HOSEA CLARK,

a preacher of the Methodist church enjoyed the reputation of being a devoted man; was elected a justice of the peace, and had a way of administering the law in a forcible manner, sometimes to the discomfiture of the legal profession; and was not afraid of expressing his opinion on any subject that came before him for consideration. He married Mrs. John Richardson; they had two children, Lucia Ann and Stephen Alonzo; born in Northfield.

ELIJAH BURNHAM, ESQ.,

born in Brookfield 1795, came to Northfield, in 1819. He married Maria Simons, of Williamstown; had 13 children. After two previous settlements they kept tavern at the Falls village, where John Fisk formerly did, and finally settled near the Depot village. Mr. Burnham was a prominent man in the early days; was selectman 10 years, justice of the peace, lister, and held other offices. He was a skillful veterinarian, and frequently sent for in different parts of the town to relieve the animal creation of their ailments. He died here March, 1873. Mrs. Burnham lives with a daughter in Williamstown, at the age of 84 (1878); children: Laura, Mary, Aaron M., Marshall D., Philanda, Philura, Sophronia, Dennison S., Joshua J., Emily, Ellen, George M.

JOEL BROWN,

born in Old Deerfield, Mass., 1799, came with his father to Williamstown, and when the Indians returned from the burning of Royalton, was with others taken captive and carried to Montreal, and lodged in jail, but through one Zadock Steel and others, they liberated themselves, and picked their way back to their homes. [See History of Randolph, vol. 11 of this work, page 978.] When quite a lad Joel was frequently sent to Royalton to mill, by marked trees, and heard the howling of wolves.

Mr. Brown at 21 came to Northfield, and cut the first tree in what is now the Center village, very near the old machine shop, where he subsequently lived. But few buildings were then erected on Dog river. Stanton Richardson's log-house, where the late John H. Richardson lived, was the only one accessible, and here Mr. Brown boarded, crossing the river on a tree that had fallen over it. Mr. Brown built a shanty very near the old town-house, to shelter himself in rainy days. It was his intention of making a permanent home at the Center, but his intended being in poor health, and her friends objecting to her coming into this new country, caused him to return to Brookfield, and he did not return until 1828, when he located on the road from the Center to Roxbury. He did teaming to Burlington, bringing back flour and other staple goods, which he disposed of. He married 1st, Anna

Edson, of Brookfield, in 1801, and they had one daughter, Rebecca. He married 2d, Dorcas Nichols, and they had 8 children; Daniel, Anna, Isaac W., Susan, Eliza, Ruth, Joel, Jr., D. Amanda. Mrs. Brown died in 1863; Mr. Brown in 1869.

ISAAC W. BROWN

bought out his father in the hotel business at the Center in 1837, and for a number of years carried it on, a wide-awake, obliging landlord; in 1855, moved to the Depot village, built some eight buildings there, among them the first Odd Fellows Hall, on Central street; was selectman, lister, constable, deputy and high sheriff, serving in some capacity as an officer for 34 years; was a director in the Wells River Railroad in 1872, and an agent for the Central Vermont Railroad. He married Sylva Elvira Partridge in 1835, who died in 1863; children: Jane and George W. He married Janette Taylor, who died in 1865; moved to Montpelier in 1866; married Mrs. Carrie W. Camp in 1868, who died in 1873. He moved to Boston, and married Mrs. Sarah A. Warren for his fourth wife, in 1874, and died in Northfield, Aug. 10, 1875.

Dr. CLIFTON CLAGGETT, born in Merrimack, N. H., 1808, came to Northfield in 1832, and located in the Center village to practice. He married Catherine, daughter of Harry Emerson, and has two sons, Charles C., William C.; born in Northfield.

HARRY EMERSON, born in Norwich, 1781, came to Northfield in 1821, when about 40 years of age, and located in the Center village. He was a hatter by trade; married Dorcas Demmon, and had 9 children.

ALBIJENCE AINSWORTH, a merchant in the Center village, in the store on the corner adjoining the brick dwelling of Col. Oliver Averill. He built the brick house in that village where Elijah Winch lives. His father kept the well-known "Ainsworth Tavern," on the hill road to Cleaveland village. Mr. Ainsworth married Emily, daughter of Rev. Mr. Lyman of Brookfield; children: Mary J., Annette.

STANTON RICHARDSON,

born in Haddam, Conn., 1755; came to Northfield about 1785; was a prominent man; held a number of town offices, being the first selectman chosen, and finally settled on the farm near the Depot village, where his descendant, John H. Richardson, lived and died. He married Anna Doubleday; children: Nathaniel, Sarah, Samuel, Ezra T., John, Anna, Sarah, Sylvanus, Horace, Prudence, Chauncey, all but two born in Northfield.

The wife of Stanton Richardson made once a journey to Westminster, on horseback, with a small child in her arms, carrying her eatables in a pair of saddle-bags.

Mr. Richardson having caught a bear with a pair of cubs, tamed the young ones, and they became interesting acquisitions, making themselves at times familiar without invitation. The family lived in a log-house with an old-fashioned chimney, inside of which you could sit, and, looking up, see stars in the evening. One night, when Mrs. Richardson had retired with Ezra T., an infant, one of the young bruins crawled upon the roof, came down the chimney, worked his way into the bed, nestling down between Mrs. Richardson and her babe. The child remonstrated, when the mother, seeing the kind of company she had, took the bear by the nape of his neck, and tumbled him on to the floor.

One thanksgiving day Mrs. Richardson invited all the people in Williamstown and Northfield to be present. They came, and had for dinner boiled victuals, roast pig, beans, and baked Indian pudding, and a jolly good time. For extension tables, they took the doors off their wooden hinges, and used them.

Mr. Richardson presented the town land for the first burying ground, near the Center, on "Richardson meadow," now owned by Mr. Gallup.

JOHN, son of Stanton, lived and died on the farm of his father, near the Depot village. He was a prominent farmer, and raised 7 children: Sarah S., George M., John Harris, Marshall H., George S., Mary J., Daniel W., all born in Northfield. Mr. Richardson died in 1834. His first son was drowned in Dog river, opposite the house, when about 3 years old, and the father afterwards took the precaution to build a yard-fence to keep his little ones in; but even this did not prevent another son, George S., from meeting with as sad a fate; he was drowned in a wash-tub; pulling himself up by it, lost his balance and fell in.

NATHANIEL, son of Stanton, was a millwright; held offices in town; went to Canada to live; returned; built the two-story brick house beyond the Center village, where Israel Avery now resides; also a house and saw-mill about half way to Roxbury; married Nabby Bosworth, of Berlin; children: Nathaniel B., Abigail, Caroline M., Sarah Ann, Melissa, Alonzo, Adelia. Mr. R. died at 76; his wife at 86 years.

SAMUEL RICHARDSON, born in Haddam, Conn., 1742, a shoemaker, was another early settler. "Uncle Sam Richardson" was a great story-teller, hammering out soles for the understandings of his customers, he would indulge in stories, not always careful to see how they would come out; and he was a devout man, also.

It is related, Judge Paine had loaned his trusty old horse to a woman who worked for him, to go to the South village to do a little trading, the Judge requesting her to stop at Mr. Richardson's and do an errand: on her return asked her why she was gone so long? She said, when she arrived she heard the old gentleman praying, and waited till he got through. The Judge said, "Well, what did the old horse say about it?" Her reply came quick, "Your horse did not say anything about it. Judge, for he had never heard one before."

Samuel Richardson and wife Clarissa had two children: Hannah and Jonathan. Jonathan was the owner of the dog that Thompson in his Gazetteer refers to—that the river was named after. While out hunting, the dog attacked a large moose, and was drowned, in what is known as the moose hole in the river. It was in the spring the moose broke through the ice, and dog and moose both went under.

Jonathan was a noted hunter, and killed 10 wolves in one day.

Samuel Richardson married for his second wife Jerusha Royce: children: Stanton, Lemuel B., Clarissa, Prudence, Aræ, Amisa, Martha, Jerusha. Mr. Richardson lived to 90 years, his wife to 85.

JOHN HILDRETH BUCK, ESQ.,

son of John L. Buck [Simon Smith was the first lawyer in Northfield, but only remained for a few months and left. The second was John L. Buck, for whose biography see Reading, volume to follow.] was born in Northfield, and grew to his majority among the Green Mountains. He graduated from the University of Vermont in the class of 1850, and returned to Northfield, where he remained in the office of his father until February, 1851, when he removed to Lockport, N. Y., his present home. Feb. 1854, he was admitted to the Bar of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. Aug. 1854, he married Harriet M. Fletcher, daughter of Hon. Paris Fletcher, of Bridport. In 1874, he was elected mayor of his adopted city, and served one term, declining a renomination.

DR. BENJAMIN PORTER,

born in Old Volentown, Conn., 1788, lived with his father, a Congregational clergyman, and settled in Plainfield, N. H., until he was 12 years of age. He attended the academy at Meriden, studied for the medical profession, graduating at Dartmouth. This town was his first settlement as a physician. On his first visit, passing by where the Episcopal church now stands, he saw Judge Paine and John Green sowing wheat on newly-cleared land, and inquired of the Judge if this town would be a good place for a physician to locate. The reply was it would, if a man had a strong constitution, and was willing to work hard for poor pay.

The Doctor settled on the East Hill in 1816, boarding 3 years with Captain Jesse Averill, and moved to the "Post farm," where he remained 4 years, and went to the Center village; built the two-story brick house where he lived and died. He married Sophia Fullerton; children: Elizabeth, Edward, Edwin, Benjamin F.

The Doctor had quite a practice, being the first physician in town after Nathaniel Robinson and Jephtha White; was good in fevers; he died Feb. 21, 1876.

Dr. EDWIN PORTER is the only practicing physician here, born in Northfield; a graduate of the Vermont University in 1850. He studied medicine with his father, was a private student of Prof. Peaslee, of Dartmouth; attended three courses of lectures, and graduated in the Medical Department in 1853; in 1854, combined the drug business with his practice, with Geo. Tucker one year; has carried on the business alone since. He married Carrie S. daughter of Hon. Heman Carpenter, in 1867.

ROSWELL DEWEY, P. M. 6 years, has been surveyor, constable, justice of the peace, and an excellent teacher of sacred music 30 years.

DR. JEPHTHA WHITE

lived on a farm near the Center village. He married Orra Starkweather, and had two children: George J. and John A. S., to the latter of whom credit is due for remembering in his will the old cemetery at the Center village, whereby it has been beautified and improved by a nice granite wall in front. He was a prominent merchant, and had great influence with his party.

DR. WILLIAM J. SAWIN, son of Levi S., studied medicine with Dr. Claggett, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1854, and began the practice of his profession in Watertown, Wis., the same year; March, 1861, removed to Chicopee Falls, Mass.; the following June, enlisted as a private soldier; in September, transferred to 3d Vt. Reg. as hospital steward; served as physician in the 3d, 4th and 5th Vt. Reg. Oct. '61 to June, '62; promoted to surgeon in 2d Vt. brigade in 1862, and to surgeon-in-chief of brigade in 1862; was discharged with the 10th Massachusetts regiment at the expiration of his term of service in 1864, and returned to Chicopee Falls. On the evening of Dec. 3, 1875, in the Asylum of Springfield Commandery of Knight Templars, while in the act of clothing himself in the regalia of his office, preparatory to being installed as Eminent Commander of that body, and in the presence of a large number of his brethren, William J. Sawin, an honored Past Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, was stricken down by apoplexy and died instantly.

JOHN P. DAVIS, from Barnard, born 1819, has been in the mercantile business at the Center village since 1850.

Rev. SAMUEL WHITTEN, an early settler, at one time owned all the land at the Center village, before it was cleared. He was a farmer and Baptist preacher. He had nine children, Samuel, Woodbury, Joseph, Mercy, Rebecca, Clarissa, Caroline and Julia. He moved to Malone, N. Y., where he died.

DAVID M. LANE, born in Hampton, N. H., Mar. 29, 1793, came here from Strafford in 1820. He was a surveyor, and the country being new, and property changing, his services were greatly needed. The writer has frequently heard him mentioned as a very promising man; but he was cut down at the early age of 37. He built the first brick building in town, the old school-house at the Center, making the brick himself, burning the lime, and doing most of the carpenter work with his own hands. He bought 100 acres of timber land, and was a very industrious man, beloved by the community, and left a wife and 4 daughters.

JOSHUA LANE, brother of David M., born in Chichester, N. H., Nov. 1798, moved here from Strafford in 1821, one of the most enterprising citizens of that day. His first move in building was on the Patterson farm, used lately for slate purposes. He bought and erected dwellings in a number of places, living in the winter in a house he built at the Center. Among his largest purchases, with his brother David, was the farm on the mountain, and it is thought, he cleared with his help around him some 300 acres of timber land. He finally settled in West Berlin. "Lanesville" was named after him. He was an enthusiastic Mason, and was buried with its honors. He died at 79, and left one son, Moses Lane.

Josiah and Moses, brothers of David and Joshua, also settled in this town.

MOSES LANE, C. E., son of Joshua, graduated at the University of Vermont in 1845. By Gov. Paine was appointed assistant engineer, Aug. 1845, for the location and construction of the Vermont Central Railroad; was employed as a civil engineer on this and other railroads in New England till 1849; was Principal of an academy in Springfield, N. Y., 3 years: was engaged a short time as resident engineer on the construction of the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad at Albany; 1856, was appointed to the position of principal assistant engineer for the construction of the Brooklyn water-works, and has been constantly employed the past 22 years as a hydraulic engineer: was 13 years on the water-works of Brooklyn, 6 as principal assistant, and 7 as chief engineer; had charge of the construction of the Milwaukee water-works as chief engineer, where he was employed 7 years, and has been connected with other important public works as chief or consulting engineer. He married the daughter of the late Dr. Varney Ingalls, of Erie County, N. Y., in 1851; has 4 children, and now resides in Milwaukee, Wis.

HON. ALVIN BRALEY.

[See History of Hartford and Roxbury for early history.] After he came to Northfield, was bank director, justice of the peace, village trustee, and interested in manufactures, and in 1868, was made President of the National Bank, which office he filled until his death. His demise was a loss to our town, for he was not only able but willing to assist in the establishment of such institutions as promised to build up the place.

FISK BROTHERS,

Benjamin, John, Nathaniel and David, all stalwart men, of whom it may be said, "and there were giants," came from Williamstown.

BENJAMIN was a storekeeper in the South village about 1816; married Hannah Herrick; they had 7 children; Delphine, Philander, Caroline, Dennison, Sophia, Rosina, John D.

JOHN, born in Williamstown, 1783, kept tavern in the Falls village about 1825, quite a noted place for trainings. He married Betsey Martin, and they had 13 children: Olive, Betsey, Siloma, John, Lydia M., Melinda, Eunice, Azro J., Sarah, Lucinda, Maria L., Mary, Hannah.

NATHANIEL came in 1819, and died in 1861, age 87. He raised 8 children.

DAVID married Sarah Reed; they had 7 children: Sarah Ann, David R., Harvey R., Ann Eliza, George M., Fanny C., Van Loren M. Mr. Fisk died in 1864; Mrs. Fisk in 1865.

GEORGE M. FISK, son of David, born in Wolcott, June 7, 1830. He studied law with Hon. Heiman Carpenter; was admitted to the Bar of Washington County in 1854; the Supreme Court in 1856; the United States Court in 1874; in 1854, went to Prof. John W. Fowler's law school in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. In 1863, represented the town in the Legislature; was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention in St. Louis, in 1876. In 1864, he built the two factories in the Depot village now run by Mr. Howarth, and put in the machinery now in use, had a large interest in the lumber business at Granville, Vt., sold the Union Slate Quarry, and other quarries of slate in town, is now [1878] President of the Northfield Savings Bank. He married Jane E., daughter of James Nichols, in 1856.

DANIEL WORTHINGTON,

born in 1775. He came from Williamstown, and located on the Garfield place in 1818. Afterwards he went to the Falls village, and bought the saw-mill of Freedom Edson and built a house, when there were but one or two log-houses on the east side of the river. Under-brush and huckleberry bushes covered the land now spread over with buildings. He married Polly Fisk, born in 1780, and raised 11 children: Huldah, Elijah, Sophia, Lyman, Mary, Rhoda, Daniel, David, Theodore S., Elias, Francis. Mrs. W. died in 1851, and he in 1866.

COL. CHARLES H. JOYCE,

the present Member of Congress from the First District of Vermont, came to Northfield in 1850, and commenced reading law at the Center, with John L. Buck, Esq.,

read with him one year, then with F. V. Randall, Esq., at Northfield Falls, one year, and then with F. F. Merrill, Esq., at Montpelier, one year, when he was admitted to the Bar of Washington County, at the September term, 1852. In 1853, Mr. Joyce entered into co-partnership in the practice of law at Northfield with C. N. Carpenter, Esq., and subsequently with F. V. Randall. In Dec. 1855, he opened a law office in Northfield. In 1856, he was elected State's Attorney, and was re-elected to the same office in 1857.

As soon as Mr. Joyce was elected State's Attorney, his practice of law began to increase, and in Mar. 1861, he had a fine docket, and did a good business. When President Lincoln issued his call for 75,000 men, he was at Montpelier attending court. He immediately returned home to Northfield, and with the aid of some others, raised a company of men which tried to get into the 1st Regiment, commanded by Gen. Phelps. He did not succeed in this, but Gov. Fairbanks tendered him the position of Major in the 2d Regiment, which he accepted, and on the 7th of June, 1862, was promoted Lieutenant-Colonel of his regiment. He remained in the service until Jan. 1863, when he was compelled to resign his position, on account of poor health.

After returning from the army, and partially recovering his health, he located in Rutland, resuming the practice of law in company with C. C. Dewey, Esq. The partnership continued until the spring of 1866, when it was dissolved, and he carried on business on his own account. In 1869, he was elected to the House of Representatives from Rutland, and again in 1870-71. The last 2 years he was elected Speaker, which office he conducted in a manner that pleased all parties, and made him decidedly popular.

Mr. Joyce took a lively interest in the campaign of 1868, stumping his own State, and making many speeches both in New York and New Hampshire. In 1874, he was nominated as the successor of Hon. C. W. Willard, and elected to the Forty-fourth Congress, and re-elected in 1876, '78. In the campaign of 1876, he made speeches in Vermont, New Hampshire, New York, Connecticut and Indiana, for Hayes and Wheeler.

Speeches of Mr. Joyce.—In the Forty-fourth Congress the first eulogy on the death of Henry Wilson; speech on the currency, in favor of honest money; a speech on the presentation of the statue of Ethan Allen, to be placed in Memorial Hall in the National Capital; a speech on the Centennial Exposition to be held at Philadelphia in 1876; a speech in confirmation of certain land claims in the Territory of New Mexico; a speech on the counting of the electoral vote of Louisiana, and one on counting the electoral vote of Vermont.

In the Forty-fifth Congress, speeches.—One on the contested election case of Patterson against Belford, from Colorado; one in the contested election case of Acklen against Darrell, of Louisiana; a speech on the "Resumption act, and the remonetization of silver;" a speech on a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relating to the election of President and Vice-President, and also relating to the Civil Service of the government; a speech on the Mexican Pension Bill, against restoring to the pension-roll the names of those which had been stricken off for participation in the rebellion, and a speech on the Tariff.

In addition, the Colonel has delivered speeches and orations on nearly every Fourth of July and on nearly every "Decoration Day" since the war. His magnetic, forcible way of stating his arguments makes him popular with the masses, and we predict for him a still more brilliant future.

Mr. Joyce married Rowena M. Randall, and they have had three children: Inez R., Grace R. and Charlie R.

REV. JOHN GREGORY,

born in Norwalk, Conn., Nov. 18, 1810; went to New York State when quite young, and served an apprenticeship of seven years at fancy painting, in the city of Albany. When 21 years of age, he commenced studying for the ministry in the Universalist denomination. He was ordained in Salisbury, Herkimer county, N. Y., where he made his first settlement in 1832. After two years' labor in this town he removed to Burlington, Vt., where he preached 1 year; from there he went to Woburn, Mass., and preached 2 years, and after a year's labor in Vermont, went to Charleston, S. C., where he edited the Southern Evangelist, and supplied the pulpit of the Universalist church in that city 1 year. From Charleston, the climate not agreeing with him, he returned to Vermont, and preached in Montpelier, Berlin, Williamstown and Northfield 1 year, when he received a call to settle in Quincy, Mass., where he remained 3 years.

In 1842 Mr. Gregory was elected representative to the general court from Quincy, and from there went to Fall River, Mass., where he preached 2 years, and then came back to Vermont, and preached 3 years in Williston. In 1850, he came to Northfield and settled on a farm on the West Hill, thinking with St Paul it was no disgrace for a minister to labor with his hands, and engaged in stock raising. For 25 years, he was connected with the Vermont State Agricultural Society; claims to have been one of the originators of that society; was director of it during that time, and president of it 2 years, and some years had as great a variety of choice animals at the Fair as any other man. He was prominent in the raising of Morgan horses, French Merino sheep, Hereford, Devon, Ayrshire and Shorthorn Durham cattle, paying $400 for one French Merino sheep that was raised in the vicinity of Paris, all of which were brought to Northfield to improve the stock of farmers. He assisted in establishing the very successful "Dog River Valley" Association, and served as president of it three years, having during that time fairs that were not excelled by any in the State.

For the last quarter of a century he has preached as opportunity presented in the "region round about" Northfield. In 1850, he was representative to the Legislature from Northfield; in 1856, was elected senator from Washington county, and re-elected in 1857. He received the appointment of assistant assessor in the revenue department under Abraham Lincoln; was re-appointed by Andrew Johnson, and continued in the service 10½ years.

Mr. Gregory desires to put on record his fidelity to the two great reforms that have agitated the country during the last 40 years, "Human Freedom" and "Temperance." Nov. 8, 1844, the following vote was passed and published in the Boston Trumpet: "UNIVERSALISTS ON SLAVERY." At the recent annual meeting of the Old Colony Association at New Bedford, Mass., the following resolution, offered by the Rev. John Gregory, of Fall River, was adopted:

Resolved, That as Slavery has been voted by this body to be "in everlasting hostility to the true spirit of Jesus Christ," we here pledge ourselves to discountenance this evil in all possible ways and forms; and will agitate the question in our several societies, and endeavor to diffuse abroad an honest moral sentiment on the subject.

While in the Senate Mr. Gregory delivered a speech on "Suffering Kansas," that was instrumental in a vote being passed directing the governor to appropriate $20,000 for the relief of the people in Kansas, should he ascertain they were in a suffering condition. He has delivered a large number of addresses in Massachusetts and Vermont on those reforms, and always without compensation.

Mr. Gregory resides in Northfield (Depot Village), on Main street, in the only brick house in that part of the town, it being the third house built on that street. (1878).

Rev. JOHN GREGORY died suddenly of apoplexy at his residence in Northfield, Sept. 25, 1881.

ORVIS DARWIN EDGERTON, born in Potsdam, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1821, was the second child of a family of 7 children. His father, James Harvey Edgerton, was among the early settlers of that county, from Brookfield, in this State. The minority of Mr. Edgerton was passed going to a district school, working on a farm, and at mechanical business, teaching school, etc., with a few terms at the St. Lawrence academy.

In the spring of 1843, he went to Ohio, which was then considered "far West." For 3 years from the spring of 1846, was with F. & T. R. Taylor, building a fork-factory at Brasher Falls, N. Y., putting in the machinery, and making and selling forks and hoes, and Jan. 1849 was married to Roxana Sophia Taylor, daughter of the senior member of the firm. The next spring he purchased a stock of drugs, medicines, groceries, dry goods, etc., and engaged in business with others, and in outside operations of butter, cattle, horses, etc.; in 1856 sold out to his partners, and for 10 years kept an office as justice of the peace, and business connected with the office; held several town offices; was post-master during President Fillmore's administration, and was 4 years justice of the sessions, or assistant judge for the county; in 1856 he sold his interest in Brasher, and removed to Northfield; formed a partnership with his brother, C. A. Edgerton, in the mercantile business, and has since resided here; has been village and town treasurer, 2 years one of the selectmen; 4 years one of the trustees of the savings bank, and as a business man has been successful. He is in religion, a Congregationalist. He has one son, Charles Darwin Edgerton, a graduate of Dartmouth, class of 1878.

CHARLES A. EDGERTON, ESQ.,

born in Potsdam, N. Y., son of James H. Edgerton, came to Northfield in the Spring of 1847, and worked at the mechanical business several years. In 1855, the Union Store Division, No. 678, was organized, and he was appointed agent, and managed it until it closed in 1857. In the Spring of 1858, he commenced mercantile business in Union Block, with L. H. King, the firm, Edgerton & King, doing a good business in a general way until the summer of 1860, when they dissolved, Mr. King taking a store in the new block east of the Universalist Church, and Mr. Edgerton keeping the store in Union Block until 1866, when he formed a partnership with his brother, O. D. Edgerton, who moved to Northfield from Brasher Falls, N. Y., the firm being known as Edgerton Brothers, who continue to do business at the present time.

Mr. Edgerton was town clerk 1865-75; several years treasurer of the Vt. Mfg. Co., treasurer and superintendent till the company's shops were burned, Dec., 1876, and has been a director of the Northfield National Bank since Jan. 13, 1874, and Vice President since Jan. 9, 1877, and has been a director in the graded and high school since its present organization, 1873.

He married Harriet A. Newcomb, of Waitsfield, and has 2 children.

HALSEY R. BROWN,

born in Burke, taught school winters from the age of 15 to 21, when he went to Beloit, Wis. for 1 year; returned to Burke, and engaged in merchandise 11 years; then farmed 2 seasons; was representative 1866-7, receiving all the votes cast but one; filled a number of offices in town; came to Northfield in 1868; was with Rufus Young 3 years in the Paine Block, in the grocery and dry goods business, after, went into company with Andrew Denny, now carrying on an extensive business of store-keeping, tannery, milling, and in the lumber trade, one of our most prosperous firms in Northfield. He has been 8 years a steward in the Methodist Church here, and since the demise of Joseph Gould, superintendent of the Sunday School. Before leaving Burke, he was without exception selected to conduct funerals, and is employed frequently in the same business in Northfield.

LESTER MARTYN,

now living at the Depot village, [1878] retains his recollection of the early history of Northfield to a good degree. He taught school when a young man, was of industrious habits, and well liked as a citizen and neighbor. He remembers hearing the report of the big guns at Plattsburgh, Sept. 11, 1814. News came that volunteers were wanted, as the British were out in great force, and a number of men from Northfield, like Cincinnatus of old, left their business at home and hastened to Burlington, where they were to cross the Lake, but before they arrived information was received the battle had gone in favor of the Americans, and they returned to their homes rejoicing.

He married Mrs. Mary Flint, of Williamstown; they had one child, Emma O., and one adopted son, James R., who gave his life for his country. He was born in Williamstown in 1840, enlisted in 1861 in Company J., 5th Vt. Vols., and was mortally wounded in the battle of the wilderness. He came home to Northfield, lived near 7 months, and died in 1864.

DEA. NATHANIEL JONES,

from Claremont, N. H., built the two-story house on Water street now owned by John Willey. He was a justice of the peace, man of good abilities. He raised 7 children: Roys, George, Elisha, Henry, Cynthia, Nathaniel, Orena.

JAMES N. JOHNSON, ESQ.,

born in Northfield, Sept. 4, 1833; developed scholarly tastes when quite young, and a fondness for politics and public speaking. His advantages for an education were limited to a few terms of district school, and about a year at Northfield Academy, in 1851-52. He taught school with good success a few years, studied law with F. V. Randall, at Northfield; was admitted to the bar of Washington county in 1854; went to Chicago in 1856, and engaged in the law and collection business with Cornell & Jameson, till into 1860; returned to Northfield; has since resided here, practicing his profession.

HON. PHILANDER D. BRADFORD was born in Randolph, Apr. 11, 1811. His father, John Bradford, was a native of Kingston, Mass., born Dec. 26, 1765. In early life he removed to Alstead, N. H., where he married Miss Lucy Brooks, Jan. 9, 1799. Subsequently he came to Randolph, where he resided until his death, Nov. 19, 1814. Four years later, upon the death of Mrs. Lucy Brooks Bradford, Philander D., the youngest of 6 children, went to Alstead, N. H., to live with relatives of his mother, but at 15 returned to Randolph, and entered the Orange County Grammar School, where he received his education preparatory to the study of the medical profession. At 20 he commenced the study of medicine with his brother, Dr. Austin Bradford; in 1833, graduated at the Woodstock Medical School, then a branch of Middlebury College, and in 1850, received the degree of A. M. from the University of Vermont. He practiced his profession in Braintree, Randolph and Bethel, until 1854, when he removed to Northfield, where he has since resided, with a good practice.

In 1853 and 1854, Dr. Bradford was elected to the State Legislature by the Free-soil party of Randolph, and was a prominent member of that party when in its infancy. And when others forsook their free principles and joined those who elected Robinson and Kidder, Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, Dr. Bradford remained true to his convictions, and labored zealously for the cause of human freedom. In 1854, he was elected commissioner of insane, and re-elected in 1855. In 1857, he was elected Professor of physiology and pathology in Castleton Medical College, and continued with the same until its suspension in 1862. In Dec., 1862, he was commissioned by Governor Holbrook, Surgeon of the 5th Regt. Vt. vols., but was compelled by ill-health to resign his commission in March following. In 1862, '63 he was elected a member of the Vermont Senate, also President of the Vermont Medical Society in '63. In 1860, he was elected Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, I. O. O. F., of Vermont, and in 1861, was at the head of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance of Vermont. He was elected trustee, also Professor of Physiology, in Norwich University in 1867; and was a member of the Right Worthy Grand Lodge of the United States, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in 1875-76. He early threw the weight of his influence into the scale of Temperance—is a worthy "Good Templar," and foremost in everything that promises blessings on our race. He is a capital presiding officer, and by his good humor and happy adaptation to circumstances, makes even a crowded assembly orderly and attentive. Dr. Bradford was married to Miss Susan H. Edson, daughter of John Edson, M. D., of Randolph, in 1835, by whom he had one daughter, Miss Ellen E., now the wife of George W. Soper, Esq., of Northfield, who is postal agent over the Central Vermont railroad.

Mrs. Susan H. Bradford died Oct. 15,

1865, and in May, 1867, the Doctor married Mrs. O. W. Moore, widow of the late Hiram Moore, Esq., of Sharon.

HON. JASPER H. ORCUTT, seventh son of Samuel M. and Mary B. Orcutt, born in Roxbury; moved to Northfield, March, 1849, and from 1848 to '58 was most of the time in the employ of the Vt. Cen. R. R., constructing buildings and in other mechanical work.

In 1858 he entered the mercantile business with Freeman Page. In 1864, bought out Mr. Page, and carried on the business about a year alone; then was in trade with A. E. Denny 4 years; they built the store where Denney & Brown are in business; in 1870, sold out with Mr. Denney and bought an interest in the Paine Factory property; from that time has been engaged in manufacturing slate, lumber and strawboard, is now interested in the Adams Slate and Tile company; clerk and superintendent. Mr. Orcutt was village trustee several years, deputy sheriff six years, constable and collector of taxes 2 years, high sheriff of Washington county 2 years; representative 2 years, county senator 3 years; has been selectman, auditor, justice of the peace, enrolling officer during the rebellion, is one of the trustees of the Northfield savings bank, postmaster from 1869 to —; and was chairman of the building committee of the Graded School Academy. He has been twice married, and has two children. His mother is living in Northfield, with her sons, and is the oldest inhabitant, being in her 96th year. (1878.)

HON. HEMAN CARPENTER,

born in Middlesex, July 10, 1811, was fitted for college at the Washington County Grammar School at Montpelier, studied law with the Hon. Wm. Upham, and was admitted to the bar at the November Term of the Washington County Court, 1836, and came to the "Factory Village," Northfield, the first of December following, and commenced the practice of law. He was admitted to the Supreme Court of Vermont two years after, and to the District Court of the United States in 1842; was State Librarian 4 years, from 1832 till '37, and removed the State Library from the "old State House" to the new, numbering and cataloguing all the books therein. He was superintendent of schools, and devoted from 10 to 25 days in examining teachers and visiting schools each year, giving his services to the town, and held other minor offices. He was elected to the legislature for 1847-48, and introduced the "Homestead Bill" for the first time, and pursued that measure until it was enacted into a law. He was made judge of probate for 1849-50; appointed on Gov. Eaton's staff in 1847, with the rank of colonel; was selectman for 1852-53; appointed receiver of the South Royalton Bank in 1857; was State's attorney for Washington County for 1865-66; was trustee for the United States deposit money for 1851-52, and elected to the State Senate for 1870-72.

He procured the charter for the "Northfield Academy" in 1846, raised the subscription for building it, paying more than any other man except Gov. Paine, was secretary, treasurer and trustee of the institution, was one of the executive committee from its organization down to Apr. 18, 1868, when he resigned all of said offices, having completed the education of his children at said school; was a prominent man in his denomination, president of Goddard Seminary from 1868 to '76, when, by reason of poor health, he resigned that office, having paid liberally and generously for its establishment, and on resigning the office of president, received from the trustees a very complimentary resolution.

He was foremost in establishing the graded school in Northfield, gave liberally towards Norwich University, and educated his children in a manner creditable to himself and advantageous to them. In 1860, the University of Vermont conferred upon him the honorary degree of Master of Arts.

He became a voter in 1832, and identified himself with the "National Republican" party, and has remained faithful to its principles ever since. He has attended 45 State Conventions of his party, 40 of which he attended in 39 successive years. He was a delegate from Vermont to the Republican Convention at Philadelphia in 1856, which nominated John C. Fremont. He attended the two National Conventions which nominated Gen. Grant. He was the marshal for Washington County at the "Log Cabin" Convention at Burlington in 1840, and president of the State Convention at Rutland in 1870 which nominated Gen. P. T. Washburn for Governor. Being a positive man, he was never in doubt as to his support of men or measures.

He also taught school in the Center Village in the winters of 1833, '34, being hired by Mr. Dryer by reason of ability to govern a turbulent school that had been very disorderly for a few winters, and the scholars were brought into good subjection and discipline by him, so that for many years the school felt the influence of his teaching and government.

Mr. Carpenter is a firm believer in the final restoration of all human intelligence to holiness and happiness in God's own good time. He has been a delegate, vice president and president of the Universalist State Convention for many years, and in 1877 it passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the Hon. Heman Carpenter for the able and efficient manner in which he has executed the office of president of this Convention for several years past, and for the urbanity and good spirit he has manifested toward all the members of that Convention.

When Mr. Carpenter came to Northfield there were but 14 houses in the "Factory Village." He has borne his part manfully in all the positions he has filled by the suffrages of his fellow citizens, bearing always his share of the burdens.

Mr. Carpenter married Harriet S. Gilchrist, of Chelsea, Feb. 14, 1838, who was born in Goffstown, N. H., Dec. 24, 1816. They had 4 children: George Nathaniel, Caroline Sophronia, Jason Heman, Abigail Fidelia.

Mrs. Carpenter died June 21, 1865, and Judge Carpenter married his present wife, Mrs. Betsey S. Edgerton, Oct. 16, 1866, at Burlington. She was born in Berlin, July 20, 1822, and was the widow of John H. Edgerton, and daughter of Solomon Nye.

JAMES CARY BARREL THAYER, born in Braintree, Aug. 10, 1824; fourth son of Dr. Samuel W. Thayer, came to Northfield, and became clerk for George B. Pierce about 1840, and has since, except a few months in 1848, been a resident of this town. In 1848, he became clerk for H. H. Camp; was in partnership with him 1 year, and went into the clothing business, which he has since followed, and has been treasurer of the Northfield savings bank since it commenced operations in 1869; in religion is an Episcopalian; has been twice married; has 4 children, REUBEN M. MCINTOSH, born in Bethel, 1823; was brought up a farmer, but when of age learned the daguerrean art, and practiced in and about his native town. In 1853, he moved to Northfield, and worked in the first daguerrean saloon established in this place. From that time to within a few years he worked at making pictures in the daguerrean, ambrotype, and photograph process with marked success. Latterly he has made a specialty of taking stereoscopic views, and among the noted places he has visited are the Ausable Chasm, Mount Mansfield, and Black River Falls in Cavendish, taking a great variety of scenes that commend themselves.

ROSWELL CARPENTER came to Northfield when the country was very new, not far from 1787. He was from Charlestown, N. H., married Louisa Larkins of Rockingham. They had four children: Elvira, Louisa, Roswell, Ursula; all born in Northfield.

Mr. Carpenter, it is said, was a good dancer. So Col. George Cobleigh and Adolphus Denney, Esq., loved to "trip the light fantastic toe in the mazy dance," and took great delight in parties. Probably there was no scientific violining in those days, but a good deal of fiddling.

Dr. MATTHEW MCCLEARN, born in Nova Scotia, 1824, came here from Boston and commenced the practice of medicine in 1855. He came for the benefit of his health, and remained 2 years; is one of the charter members of the Vermont State Eclectic Medical Society, was its treasurer 27 years, its president 1 year, and is also a member of the National Eclectic Medical Association. He is married, and has 4 children.

SIMON EGGLESTON, born in Middletown, N. Y., came here in 1793. He worked for Judge Paine in his factory 21 years, and for the Governor 16—a boss-spinner much of the time, but during his last years a sorter of wool, and a more faithful man to his employers, perhaps never lived.

ALMON WEATHERBEE

moved from Moretown to Northfield in 1845; worked for Governor Paine in his factory and grist-mill. He built the house where his family now live—the first house on that hill. He was killed Dec. 11, 1867, in the terrible railroad disaster at Harlow Bridge. He was an industrious and good citizen, and his sad death was lamented by his fellow townsmen. He left a wife and 3 children.

SILAS SHELDON,

born in Dorset, Jan. 25, 1794, came to Northfield in 1816. He married Sarah Richardson, Jan. 25, 1818, for his first wife, and Anna Richardson for his second, Dec. 30, 1821, twin daughters of Stanton and Anna Richardson. The first wife died Dec. 1, 1818, leaving twins, Silas Harmon and Samuel Richardson, when 5 days old. The second wife had: Chauncey D., Martin B., Chauncey G.

DEA. CALVIN CADY,

born in Pomfret, Conn., 1786, located in Berlin, this County, and worked for Porter Perrin for $12 a month in haying, he agreeing to do all the pitching both ways. He and the hands would work until 8 o'clock at night, then milk the cows, eat break and milk, and go to bed. He lived at one time at Lanesville, and attended a saw-mill. It is said, one night he was standing on the carriage of the mill that ran out over the end of the mill, and falling partially asleep, stepped off, and fell some 20 feet, where it was rocks below; but there happened to be a slab which stood one end against the mill and the other on the rock, and he struck that on his back, and bounded off to his feet, and was not hurt. He removed to Northfield in 1828, and by working hard keeping Judge Paine's boarding-house, he succeeded in getting into comfortable circumstances. He took a great interest in his children as long as he lived, and made it a point to get them together as often as he could, especially on thanksgivings. He was one of the deacons of the Congregational church here, and had the esteem and confidence both of his church and townsmen. He married Betsey Merrill, May, 1809, who was born in 1785. Their children were: Almira, Abigail, Calvin, Jr., George, Eliza, Laura, Luther, Lyman, Mary A. Mr. Cady died in 1867; Mrs. Cady in 1858.

ITHAMAR ALLEN, JR., born in 1778, came here from Gill, Mass., with his father at a very early day, and they settled near the north corner. Ithamar, Jr., married Nancy, daughter of Aquillo Jones, and moved to the Falls village, and located on the farm now owned by his son William, where his father lived and died. At that time the whole valley north of our Depot village was all a wilderness, and Aquillo bought this farm, together with the Burnham place, for almost a song, and gave the former land to his daughter Nancy. Their children were: Elijah, William, Charles, Sally, Chloe, Amanda, Edna, Warren, Adaline, born in Northfield. Mr. Allen died in 1861, aged 83 years.

ABIJAH HOWE, born in Middleton, Mass., 1788, married Martha Bridgman, of Hanover, N. H., and came to Northfield in 1834, and settled on the farm where Walter Bowman now lives. Mr. Howe graduated at Dartmouth in 1810. They had 7 children:

Theoda, Asa, Martha A., Sophia D., Hannah S., Isaac B., Miraett. Mr. Howe died in 1872, aged 83; Mrs. Howe in 1865, aged 76 years.

ISAAC B. HOWE, ESQ., came to Northfield, with his father, when about 7 years old, where his boyhood days were passed on a farm. At the age of 18 he commenced teaching school, but abandoned this in 2 years for civil engineering on the Vermont Central railroad. He was employed on that road and the Vermont and Canada about 12 years, having charge of the civil engineering and road repairs. He is now a resident of Clinton, Iowa. He has at various times made valuable improvements now in general use on railroads, although but few of them have been secured by letters patent. He also introduced several novel and useful improvements in the construction of the city water works while president of the Clinton Water Works Company.

In the spring of 1861, Mr. Howe went to Iowa, to take the position of chief engineer and assistant superintendent of the railway from Clinton to Council Bluffs. The next season he was appointed superintendent of the 350 miles of railroad from Clinton to the Missouri river at Omaha, which position he held until the summer of 1872, when ill health compelled him to withdraw from active railway service.

For several years Mr. Howe has been extensively engaged in operating stone and marble quarries in Iowa and Illinois, and with his banking business keeps him in constant employment. He is one of that kind of men who prefer to "wear rather than rust out."

Mr. Howe was representative of Northfield in 1857-58, and received other marks of appreciation during his citizenship among us. To show his love for the town of his adoption is as strong as ever, an extract from a letter is given:

This proposed history will not only be of great interest to us who are now here, but it will have a greater interest to those who are to succeed us. My little "Hawkeye" son delights in hearing me tell of what I did when I was a little boy, and I derive pleasure from the recital, as the dream-like memories of the olden time almost bring back the perfume of the wild flowers and fruits I gathered when a little barefooted boy, forty years ago! Your history of Northfield would be to me what my early history is to my children. It is almost 17 years since I left Vermont, but my interest in the State and in good old Northfield remains as strong as ever, and it gratifies me to know that I am not yet quite forgotten, but may still claim citizenship in your hearts, if not in your elections.

The family monument is in the Northfield cemetery, a portico monument of the Doric order; base 7 x 12 feet from the ground to the top of the pediments; of Vermont granite. The urn was executed by J. S. Collins, of Barre; all other work by Jones Trow, of Berlin; original designs by Isaac B. Howe.

JUSTUS BURNHAM, ESQ., came here from Hardwick, Mass., quite early, and worked at the carpenter trade, building, with John Green, the first house on Main street, where Mrs. William Nichols resides. His children were: Betsey, Anna, Hannah, Asa, Isabella, Arbijah, Rhoda, David, Lydia, Violet.

LUTHER S. BURNHAM, born in Brookfield, Feb. 18, 1797, came to Northfield in 1840, and settled on a farm at the Falls village; and was a man respected and beloved. He married Lucy Nelson, of Orange, 1798, and they had 6 children: James H., Harris, David N., Elosia, Lucy Ann, Helen M.

REV. JAMES HARVEY BURNHAM at an early age evinced a remarkable aptitude for study, especially for theology. As he grew up, he wished to enter the ministry of the Universalist denomination, and his whole soul seemed bent in that direction. His parents did not much favor the idea, but at last consented. He attended Newbury Seminary a few terms; taught school with very good success, and after a while commenced preaching in Irasburgh, Barton and Coventry. His sermons, like his uniform bearing, were noted for clearness, candor, and marked conscientiousness, rather than lively imagination, love of sensation, or effort for popularity. Soon after he married Ann P. Alexander, of Northfield, and settled as a Universalist minister in Troy, Vt. Here his health failed him, and he returned to this town, and engaged in trade at the Center village. His wife died of consumption in 1848. After her death Mr. Burnham resumed preaching and settled in Sacrappa, Me.; in 1850, married Mary A. Barnard, of Southbridge, Mass., and became a partner of Rev. Eli Ballou, at Montpelier, in the book business and publishing of the "Christian Repository," where he remained till his death, Sept. 11, 1853, in the full prime of his manhood, of consumption, a loss to the denomination of which he was a worthy member.

MARVIN SIMONS, born in Williamstown, 1804, and his wife, Olive Fisk, born Dec. 1806, moved here in March, 1829, and died Dec. 1870, age 66. He was one of the oldest and best citizens of the town, had resided here 40 years, was justice of the peace 19 years, selectman 12, and during his life held many large trusts. He never sought preferment, but his fellow citizens, without distinction of party, relying on his good judgment and integrity, kept him in service. His children were: Marcellus M., Lycurgus L., Darrion A., Cordelia J., Olive M., Alma A., Willie G.

WILLIAM R. TUCKER, who was born in Norwich, 1812, and came to this town in 1835, at one time owned 650 acres in the town.

JAMES GOULD, born in Amesbury, Mass., 1803; married Rebecca Morrill; their children were: Mary E., Harriet B., Hannah R., James P.

About 1835, Mr. Gould came to Northfield, and, in company with Walter Little, established a potato starch factory at Falls village, which they successfully operated a few years, until it was destroyed by fire. He then engaged in woolen manufacturing, a part of the time with Erastus Palmer, extending and enlarging as increasing business warranted, until failing health forced him to withdraw from business, when he sold to his brother Joseph, and passed much of his time with his children in Wisconsin and Iowa, until 1867, when he removed to Wisconsin, and in company with his son engaged in the lumber business, etc. Under the pressure of business his health again failed. He died at Janesville, May, 1877.

Shrewd in business, but more anxious to do justice to others than to exact the same; foremost in worthy enterprises; never seeking to make himself conspicuous, accepting office only when forced upon him; diffident, tender-hearted as a child, his highest ambition seemed to be to do good and make others happy. By his will, his remains were brought back for burial in our cemetery, and his last resting-place is marked with a shaft of granite from the green hills of the State he loved so dearly.

JOSEPH GOULD,

born in 1809; came to this town with his brother James in 1835. In 1857, he purchased the woolen factory at Gouldsville, which was consumed by fire Jan. 31, 1873. On the 23d of June next, he commenced to rebuild on the old site, and in March, 1875, put in operation a first-class mill. For 12 years previous to his death his son Joseph W., had been in partnership with him in the manufacturing business. He married twice, and had 3 children: Joseph W., Hannah C., Alice M. He united with the Methodist church in 1863; was a leading member here. The pipe organ in his church at Northfield stands as a monument of his beneficence.

WALTER LITTLE,

born in Haverhill, Mass., in 1797; in 1813 was drafted as a soldier and stationed at Portsmouth, and after his discharge worked in the factory at Salisbury, Mass. He came to Vermont in 1820, and worked for Judge Paine in his factory 3 years. In 1823, he went back to Salisbury, and worked at his trade till 1830, when he returned to Northfield, brought his carding machinery with him, and set it up at the Falls village. James Gould, with 8 horses, moved him from Salisbury, and bought out Joseph Keyes' half interest in the grist, saw and cloth-mills which they were running. Mr. Little and Joseph Keyes commenced the first building for a mill in 1824, at the Falls; James Gould going into partnership with Mr. Little in 1831. In 1832 Messrs. Little & Co. built the starch mill; 1837, they dissolved partnership, Mr. Gould taking the custom-mill, and Mr. Little the starch-mill. In 1847, Mr. Little went to Barre, remaining 2 years, thence to North Montpelier and engaged in woolen manufacturing, where he died in 1859. He married Jerusha, daughter of Samuel Richardson, in 1824, and they had children: Hazen A., Sarah H., Walter S. He was a successful business man, and Northfield is indebted to him for starting manufactures at the Falls village. He gave employment to many laboring men and women, and with his genial good nature contributed much to the enjoyment of those around him. He liked a good joke and a good story, and knew when to make business pleasant and agreeable; and was a leading and faithful mason.

WEST HILL, NORTHFIELD.

A number of inhabitants settled here at an early day on land belonging to the town of Waitsfield, but in 1822 four tier of lots were by act of the Legislature annexed to Northfield.

WILLIAM COCHRAN,

from Hanover, N. H., made the beginning there in 1798. He married Polly Graves. Their son Stephen was the first child born in that part of the town. Their children were: William G., Lyman, Welta, Stephen, Washington, Edmund, Polly, James.

STEPHEN COCHRAN

resides at the Center village, is a tailor by trade, and well respected.

DEA. DANIEL PARKER,

from Jaffrey, N. H., a year later than Mr. Cochran, located on West Hill. He married Jennia Cochran, of Peterboro, N. H., and had 5 children.

Daniel Jr. graduated, called the best scholar of his class, at Burlington college.

Afterward was ordained a Congregational minister, preached some 3 or 4 years in Craftsbury; came back to South Northfield, where he lived on the Kathan farm; from there went to Brookfield, and published a book called "The Constitutional Instructor," designed for colleges and common schools; while canvassing for this work he visited Glover, and while there, died at the house of Rev. Levi H. Stone. He left a son who is now a physician of considerable note in Texas. The Doctor contributed from his father's papers two articles for Mr. Gregory's book. Extracts:

THE DYE-TUB.

How bright is the picture of ehildish emotion,
When memory paints what I used to enjoy—
The frolic and fun, and each curious notion,
And all the droll capers I cut when a boy!
The wide-spreading fire-place, and pile of wood by it,
The pot-hook and candlestick hung on a wire,
The porridge-pot, kettle, and frying pan nigh I,
And e'en the old dye-tub that stood by the fire;
That old wooden dye-tub, the wooden-hooped dye-tub,
The blue begrimed dye-tub that stood by the fire.

"I saw the stately towering trees,
I felt the soft and fragrant breeze,
A wild, romantic boy;
I heard the robin's early song,
I heard the warbling rills,—
With vast delight I roamed along O'er Northfield's rural hills."

"When with a heart with care oppressed,
Wandering I seek a place of rest,
In which to find repose,
Where I in friendship's bowers reelined,
Enjoying rural bliss, may find Oblivion for my woes.
From fancy's visionary flight,
O'er distant woods and rills.
Pleased with the well-known scenes I light
On Northfield's rural hills."

CAPT. HENRY KNAPP,

born in Claremont, N. H., Nov. 1787, came to Northfield in 1808, and with Harry Jones and Silas Rice, Jr., young men about his age, commenced clearing land around the four corners on West Hill, where Mr. Knapp finally made for himself a good home. These young men built a shanty, took hemlock boughs for bedding, got bread baked at Deacon Parker's, and spent a few summers in clearing land; in the fall migrating South to Claremont, and returning with the spring. It was a happy day for Mr. Knapp when he succeeded in clearing an acre of land, and getting it well sown with rye, because it was his, and the result of his labors, though they were obliged to go to Waitsfield to get their potatoes at this time.

Years after, when Mr. Knapp had prospered, he conceived the idea of building a large barn, and after cutting the timber and preparing it by the old rule, the question was how to raise it. The inhabitants were few and greatly scattered, but at the end of three days' hard labor from all that could be induced to lend a helping hand from the towns of Northfield, Waitsfield and Roxbury, the barn was raised, and stands to-day upon the old foundation.

Living on the main road from West Roxbury to the "north neighborhood" in Northfield, he often had new-comers locating farms call on him, and to his credit always had his "latch string out," and assisted to his ability those who after became substantial citizens of our growing and prosperous town.

George Henry Lucy, daughter of William Keyes, in 1818, born in Northfield in 1798, now living (1878), in the Depot village, with her children.

George Henry died in Libby Prison, Richmond, Va., in 1864; was a soldier from Minnesota, and taken prisoner by the rebels.

SAMUEL U. RICHMOND, ESQ.,

born in 1803, came to Northfield with his father in 1823. He was a prominent man in the Methodist church, and a leader in the Democratic party. No man was ever turned hungry from his door. He was prompt, industrious, well regulated, and his word was as good as his bond. He moved to the Depot village in 1867, and died very suddenly in 1873. He married Sophia, daughter of Capt. Henry Knapp; children: Samuel A., Henry C., Carlos S., Lucy S., George H.

DR. N. W. GILBERT.

Norman W. Gilbert, born in Morris-town, 1830, married Sarah Atwell, of Waterbury, 1854; studied dentistry in Lowell, Mass.; 1858, settled in Northfield; 1867, removed to Montpelier; 1873, to Boston, where, Jan. 1877, Mrs. Gilbert died, and soon after the Doctor returned to Northfield. He is a graduate of the Boston Dental College.

HON. DAVID W. HADLEY,

resides on the same place where his father located. At the age of 16, on the death of his father, he took charge of the farm and family. He has been representative and selectman—see town list for—and assistant judge for Washington county in 1850, '51. Judge Hadley has the honor of owning the lot, by actual calculation of General Jackman, is not only the center of Northfield, but the center of Vermont; lot 9, range 5, and originally belonged to Peres Gallup. [This center of the State honor is claimed by three towns, or more. See Waitsfield to follow.—Ed.] Judge Hadley married Louisa Brown of Williston, and has 8 children.

GURDON RANDALL,

born in Scotland, Conn., in 1795; when 8 years old came to Northfield with his father, who settled in "Connecticut Corner." Mr. Randall was a carpenter and joiner, and followed that business as long as he lived. He married Laura S. Warner of Putney, born in 1803; they had 9 children: Gurdon Paine, Francis Voltaire, Laura T., Jean J. R., Minerva, Rouena M., Edward H. Citizen Frances Voltaire, Charles Rush.

ALLEN BALCH,

born in Old Topsham, Mass., 1791, came here in 1829, and settled on West Hill, where John Plastridge lives. He started out in the month of March, for his new home, moving his family and effects with a yoke of oxen on a sled. Getting as far as Springfield, he found the snow so deep he hired a stage-driver to take his family to Northfield; but found them a few days after at Mr. Sampson's in Roxbury, the driver not being able to go any further with his team. Journeying along up through the west part of the town, they stopped over night at Capt. Henry Knapp's. The women on the next morning had to wade through the snow to get to their log-house. He married Hephsebah Dodge of N. H.; 9 children; died in 1881.

ADIN SMITH,

born in Monkton, 1794, came from Roxbury to Northfield, and settled on the West Hill in 1835. He married Lydia Waterman, born in Brookfield, 1792; children: Alvin F., Elvira E., John W., b 1819; Levi, b 1821; Danforth A., b 1825; Fanny B., Gilbert O., b 1830; Mary L., Wm. M. Adin Smith and wife made the greatest sacrifice of any of our citizens, in consenting that four of their sons, Levi, Danforth, John and Gilbert, might enlist to assist in putting down the rebellion, all of whom gave their lives to this end, ex-John, who returned.

WILLIAM A. GALLUP,

born in Hartland, May, 1795, came to Northfield in 1817, and began a clearing, boarding with David Denny and Isaiah Shaw. Growing homesick, he went back to Hartland. He was quite a military man, and received a commission as lieutenant of light artillery, from Gov. C. P. Van Ness, in 1825. He married Betsey Dodge, of Mass., and in 1828, came back to Northfield to stay, settling in the N. W. part of the town, where his son, Jonathan C. Gallup, until lately resided; children: J. C., Wm. W., Roderick O. Mrs. Gallup died Mar. 1859, and Mr. G. Apr. 1868.

J. C. GALLUP, son of Wm. A., came to Northfield with his father, was very successful, and possessed one of the largest tracts of land in Northfield. At the time he sold his West Hill farm it contained 930 acres. He moved into the depot village in 1866, and bought the fine residence formerly owned by Perley Belknap, commanding one of the best views of the village. He has been a lister, 1864-5-6, and in 1874-8; was director and president of the chair manufacturing company; is director in the Northfield National Bank; has a wife and 3 children.

SEWALL DAVIS,

born in Charlestown, N. H., in 1791, settled in the west part of the town. Their children were: Howard, Louisa, William, Hannah. At the burning of Charlestown, his Bible, while all the other books in the book-case were burned, even those that laid on the Bible, was preserved from destruction; had only one cover somewhat charred.

JONATHAN BRIGGS, from Putney, about 1817, settled, after living a while in the Center village, on the farm on West Hill where his son Harvey now resides. He was a constable here a few years, and gave the land where the yellow meeting-house stood, on condition it should revert back to his heirs should it not be used for such a purpose, which was done accordingly after its removal. He had 2 wives and 11 children.

JAMES STEELE, born in Antrim, N. H., 1793, married Esther Smith, in East Roxbury, 1815, born in Randolph, 1798. They had 6 children. Mr. Steele died at the old homestead, in 1869, and Mrs. Steele in 1875.

Mr. Steele bought his farm of Nathan Morse in 1829, for \$3,700, but $\frac{1}{2}$ acre cleared, and moved on about April, drawing his goods on a hand-sled about 2 miles, as there were no roads. His small log-house was covered with hemlock bark, and he had to build a fire on the ground in the center of the house, the smoke going up through a hole left open in the roof; oiled paper was put up to slits in the logs to admit light, and a blanket hung up for a door. They had 3 children at the time. He came from Brookfield to Northfield.

WARREN RICE, born in Claremont, N. H., Dec. 24, 1794, married Judith Johnson, in Cornish, and moved to Northfield in 1821; children: Ruhanna P., Almira T., Ariel K., Willard A. Mr. Rice died Nov. 29, 1845.

Edward Ingalls, writing in the Argus and Patriot of this family, says:

Mrs. Rice's mother lived to be 98 years old, and could read without spectacles at that age. At one time the men folks were all gone, and Mrs. Rice was left alone with Mr. Rice's father and mother, they being infirm and unable to do anything for themselves, and an invalid son of her own, who was also helpless. The wind was blowing strong from the north-west at the time. Mrs. Rice thought she heard a crackling like fire. Looking about to see what it was, she found the roof of the house in flames, and burning smartly. She carried water quite a distance into the attic, and put the fire out in the inside so she could open the scuttle, when she climbed out on the roof and put it out there also.

DAVID R. TILDEN, writer of a "chronicle on the war made on Gov. Paine and the friends of the projected railroad route through Northfield," published in the Montpelier Watchman—see Mr. Gregory's for pages 161-164.—He was born in Williamstown in 1800, resided some years in this town, had three wives, one son Ai N., by his first, 5 children by his second, and two by his third. He died in Plattsburgh, N. Y., in 1847.

FRANK PLUMLEY, born in Eden, was reared on a farm, and had no other advantages than farming boys generally have; for several years taught school in districts and academies both East and West; in 1866, entered the law office of Powers & Glead, at Morrisville; in 1867, the Law Department of Michigan University, and also pursued a selected course of the Literary Department of that University, and in 1869, was admitted to practice law at the Lamoille County Court; June following, came to Northfield, and entered the law office of Hon. Heman Carpenter; Jan. 1870, the firm of Carpenter & Plumley was formed; dissolved by limitation in 1876; Dec. 1877, became senior partner of the firm of Plumley & Johnson. In 1871, Mr. Plumley married Lamina L. Fletcher, of Eden, then preceptress of Northfield Graded School, and they have 2 children, Charles Albert and Theodora May.

[Mr. Plumley prepared the history of Eden for vol. II of the Gazetteer.]

SOME OF THE EARLY ANECDOTES OF THE TOWN.

BY HON. HEMAN CARPENTER.

Capt. Henry Knapp, one of the early settlers in the southwest part of Northfield, that part set from Waitsfield, was a well-to-do farmer, just in all his dealings, wanting just what belonged to him, and with a due regard to the rights of others. This trait of his character was well brought out by a little incident that occurred about 40 years ago. His farm lying near the base of the mountain between Waitsfield and Northfield, the sheep-pastures and folds were liable to be visited by bears which some seasons were very destructive to the sheep in that neighborhood. About 1839, or near that time, a great hunt was planned. The inhabitants of Roxbury, Warren, Waitsfield and Northfield were to assemble under their respective commanders. The Roxbury forces under the command of Esquire Orcutt; Warren forces under Capt. Sargent; Waitsfield forces under Capt. Campbell, and Northfield forces under the leadership of Capt. Samuel Duns-moor. The preliminaries being previously settled, the forces took up the line of march at a given hour. It was a bright October day. Capt. Knapp put up teams in his stable, and went to the hunt. Heman Carpenter, a Mr. Timothy, and Mr. Glazier put up their teams in the Captain's stable. After a tiresome day, climbing precipices and crossing ravines, they reached Capt. Knapp's home just at dusk, tired and hungry as bears, but "nary" a bear was seen that day. The three gentlemen above named, called at the house of Capt. Knapp, just as the family were about to sit down to their supper. Mr. C. inquired of the Captain if he and his friends might sup with them, assuring him that he should be paid. "O, yes," said the Captain, "certainly." They sat down; there was a plentiful supply of fried pork, potatoes, brown bread and new cider, and better justice was never done to the eatables. Supper over, Mr. Carpenter says to the Captain, "what is to pay?" The Captain replied, "that he should charge 12½ cents for each horse, and should charge Mr. C. 12½ for his supper, and the other gentlemen 10 cents each for their supper," adding, "I think Mr. C., you eat a little more than they did." Mr. C. thanked him for his kindness, acknowledged the justice and reasonableness of the demand, paid the bill and departed for home. In 1847 and 1848, Mr. C. represented the town in the legislature, and received the cordial support of the Captain, and in consideration of the fitness and qualifications of the Captain, Mr. C. appointed him justice of the peace for those 2 years.

Northfield, was a man of strong build and dark complexion. He began his "clearing" near the east line of the town next to Williamstown, and as was the custom in those days, a bell was hung with a strap around the cow's neck, and the cow turned into the woods to browse. One night his cow did not come up, and he could not find her. The next morning he renewed the search, and finding her trail, followed it through the woods, and in the afternoon came into a clearing in the town of Washington. He was discovered by the owner of the clearing, and taken for an Indian, the man in great fright ran for his log-cabin, screaming, "The Injuns are coming!" "The Injuns are coming!" Mr. Robinson followed to the cabin door, however, and succeeded in satisfying the inmates he was no "Injun," but an honest settler of Northfield in pursuit of a stray cow, and finding it, he returned home through the woods, a distance of about 8 miles, contented that no worse thing had befallen him than to have been taken for an Indian.

Rev. Joel Winch [see biography, page 622], was a very shrewd, jovial, homespun kind of a man, full of fun and anecdote. He was a good farmer, and a pretty good preacher. He would work the six days, and on Sundays preach in school-houses in the surrounding neighborhoods. On one occasion he was holding forth in the school-house near the head of Berlin pond. It was haying time, and the sturdy tillers of the soil filled the house, and being wearied through the labors of the week, and having confidence in the good elder at the helm, his congregation had mostly reclined their heads to take a gentle snooze. The Elder, discoursing upon the fall of Adam, described in the 3d chapter of Genesis, stopping short, and casting his eyes deliberately over the sleepy congregation, taking in the situation, cried out at the top of his voice, "Adam, where art thou?" The sleepers awoke, surprised and astonished, looking at each other with amazement. The preacher resumed, and there was no more snoozing in the congregation that day.

About 1833 or '4, the Congregational society in town had arranged to settle a young minister by the name of Fergusson, and it was said their purpose was to appropriate the ministerial lands in town to the use of their denomination. To head off this arrangement, and to secure the lands to the use of schools, it was arranged to settle Elder Winch over the Universalist society, and for him to deed the lands to the town for the use of schools. Accordingly, Elder Winch was installed over the Universalist society according to the usages of that denomination, and he deeded the lands to the town, for the use of the common schools.

The Elder for several succeeding Sundays preached to his new society in the "old yellow meeting-house" at the Center village, on the east side of what is now the "burying-ground." On one of these Sabbaths the Elder was discoursing with great earnestness and eloquence upon the degeneracy of the race and the hypocrisy of the times, when he rounded off a climax by saying: "My Christian friends, I tell you there is more church lumber than church member in this sinful world." This utterance was characteristic of the Elder, and was original with him.

[The newspapers had out a few years since another Northfield anecdote. A farmer in Moretown, it seems, took his fatted hog after slaughtered to Northfield to sell. The Northfield butcher in a fit of generosity patronizingly said the hog being such a fine one, he would make him a present of the head, which he accordingly did, then weighed the hog minus the head and paid for it. It took the unsophisticated seller a number of days before he could settle it in his head how the butcher could keep his usual health under such a chronic attack of generosity, but he saw the point at last, and found he had not only sold pork, but himself a little, also.]

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.
FROM DON. JOHN GREGORY.

To show how the different societies in Northfield stood as to numbers when the law required the legal voters to express their preference where the ministerial money should be distributed, from the town records the report of the committee:

June 3, 1823, division of ministerial money as follows:

Methodist Society	$12 83
Congregationalist Society.....	8 42
Restorationist Society.....	17 24
Free Will Baptist Society.....	13 23
Christian Society.....	5 61

Division for 1825, as follows:

Free Will Baptist Society.....	$7 62
Congregationalist Society.....	6 11
Restorationist Society.....	14 33
Christian Society.....	4 27
Methodist Society.....	25 00

Oliver Averill, Nathan Green, Virgil Washburn, Joel Winch, Harry Emerson, committee; Elijah Smith, town clerk.

THE UNION MEETING-HOUSE, at the Center village, was the first one built in this town, and was completed in 1820; building committee: Amos Robinson, Charles Jones, Freedom Edson, Nathaniel Jones and Oliver Averill.

At a meeting of the proprietors, Apr. 6, 1820, for selling the pews, it was voted one-fourth the value be paid in money, and the other three-fourths in stock or grain, and that the house should be completed by the first day of November, and at that time a payment of money and stock to be made. The whole number of pews, 50, were all sold at public auction save 12, for $760.

The division of time for each denomination reported by the committee was as follows:

The Methodist Society, first Sabbath in each month except February and March; the Restorationist Society, the third Sabbath in each month and fifth in August; the Congregational Society, fourth Sabbath in each month except March and August; the remainder to the Free Will Baptist Society.

Josiah B. Strong, Oliver Averill, Nathaniel Jones, Joel Winch, committee.

This first house built in Northfield for religious worship was of humble pretensions, painted yellow, and there being no steeple or cupola upon it, it resembled a barn very much, and hence became a by-word, and was called by the irreligious "God's yellow barn." In process of time other churches, more expensive and desirable, were built in town, and this plain but comfortable old-fashioned meeting-house was sold to the Catholics, and placed upon the land in the Depot village given them by Gov. Paine, where with some new improvements it made a respectable appearance.

[Whereupon some Catholic wag of the day wrote:]

AN IMPROMPTU: "GOD'S YELLOW BARN."

It had the hue of gold in its color in the earlier day,
And it was named in rather of an irreligious way;
The wicked Protestant boys called it a house for cattle,
That is, called it barn! what a barn 's for certain—naughty tattle!

And God's! who did at length, it seems, vindicate his claim—

So it had a regeneration and bears, at last, a Catholic name.

Ah! little did he know who painted it—that odd fellow,
It had the teint of the Pope, Pat,—the Pope's flag is yellow.

Was it prophetic? the Puritan's brush made it goldenly so;

That beautiful, radiant, peerless color of the sun!
Instead of some dull and clod-like, and pitiful dun;
Only He who sees the "beginning and end may know;"
He did know; but it "looks respectable" now, says Gregory, John;

Removed from "ye old grounds," "some new improvements made upon."

[“The little old yellow meeting-house,” that was, soon however, was burned—by lightning, whereupon the joke seemed to return upon the author of the impromptu—who it seems took it silently. See Catholic record, later.]

METHODISM IN NORTHFIELD.

BY REV. A. C. STEVENS.

Northfield was first settled on East Hill in 1785, by Amos and Ezekiel Robinson and Stanton Richardson. One of these, at least, Stanton Richardson, belonged to the Methodist church. It was not however till some few years later that the first Methodist class was formed. The first class-leader was William Keyes. The names of those who were members of this class, as near as can now be ascertained, were—William Keyes, leader, Stanton Richardson, Elijah Smith, Joseph Nichols, and their wives.

The first Methodist preacher formally appointed to Vermont was Nicholas Snethen, in 1796, to what was then known as Vershire Circuit. It is probable, however, that the Methodist itinerant had before this date preached the word of life within the bounds of this State. The General Conference of 1800 placed the whole of Vermont, New Hampshire, Canada, much of Connecticut, and all of New York east of the Hudson, in the New York Conference. This large territory was divided into districts. Pittsfield District embraced New York city, the whole of Long Island, extended northward, embracing Vermont, and stretching far into Canada. It was, however, not till about 1804 that regular Methodist preaching was sustained in Northfield, when the Barre circuit was formed, embracing some dozen towns, of which Northfield was one. The first regular Methodist preachers in the town were Elijah Hedding and Dan Young; but little is recorded of the latter; One, however, who remembers him, speaks of him as "tall and slim in person, full of zeal for the Master, much like Stonewall Jackson in appearance." The other, Elijah Hedding, became afterwards well known as one of the bishops of the M. E. Church. The preaching service was held in the barns and log-houses of the people. The preachers would come around once in two or four weeks, as the extent of the circuit would admit. It was not till 1820, the first meeting-house was erected in town, a "Union Church," built at the Center village—"the old Yellow Meeting-house." The Methodists had the privilege of occupying it a part of the time. The names of but few of the preachers to 1820 can now be recalled by the older inhabitants of the town.

Soon after Hedding and Young left the circuit, Eleazer Wells and Warren Bannister were preaching to the scattered flock in demonstration of the Spirit and with power. Elder Beals and the eccentric and stirring Joel Winch were preachers of that early day. Elder Branch, David Kilborn and Elder Streeter, Rev. Mr. Southerland, also, a good preacher from or near Boston, came up into the wilderness to seek the lost sheep. The Union church was completed in 1820. About this time, Elder J. F. Adams was on the circuit. Under his labors there was a sweeping revival, —whole families were converted.

From 1820 to 1830, the preachers on the circuit, as far as now can be ascertained, were: 1823, Wilder Mack and Elder Mahew; 1824-5, John Lord and David Lesley. Lesley was a massive built man, height some 6 feet, 4 inches,—A man of faith and zeal. Horace Spaulding also preached here before 1830.

In 1827, C. D. Cahoon and Chester Levings were on the circuit. Then followed William McCoy, C. R. Harding and Eleazer Jordan. Most of these devoted men have gone home. 1830-40, John Nason and F. T. Dailey traveled the circuit. John Nason is spoken of as a "powerful man, burning with zeal, who had warm friends and bitter enemies." Under his labors another revival swept over Northfield. About this time, the name of Elisha J. Scott appears as one of the ministers on the circuit, a young man of earnestness and piety, and this being his first appointment. The names of Haynes Johnson, then a young man, Washington Wilcox, Ariel Fay, a great worker, Moses Sander-son, J. A. Scarritt and Samuel Richardson appear among those stationed here; and Elder Cowen, and about 1835, John Smith, more widely known as "Happy John," then a young man, preached on the circuit. Few who have seen or heard "Happy John" will ever forget him. He was a man of medium height, compactly built, with a bright eye, and a voice as clear and ringing as a trumpet. At camp meetings he was in his element. He was not a great preacher, but frequently one of the most powerful men in prayer and exhortation that Vermont Methodism has known.

In this decade Northfield is put down in the Minutes as a station by itself, able to support a minister all the time—with a membership between 300 and 400.

1840-50: From 1820 to 1842, the Methodist church in Northfield worshipped in the "Union meeting-house," or in private houses. In 1842, Gov. Paine, who had built a church at the "Depot Village" for the accommodation of the workmen in his factory, gave the Methodists the privilege of occupying this house as their place of worship. A. T. Bullard, one of the fathers in the Vermont Conference, was the stationed preacher that year. During the decade the following ministers were stationed at Northfield: A. T. Bullard, John Currier, J. H. Patterson, A. Webster, A. G. Button, John G. Dow. The most of these men are now living. They have done noble service, and their names will be inseparably connected with the history of Vermont Methodism.

1850-60: At the beginning of this decade H. P. Cushing was stationed at Northfield. During his pastorate the "Paine meeting-house" became too small to accommodate the worshippers, and was enlarged. W. J. Kidder succeeded Mr. Cushing. The sudden death of Governor Paine occurred in 1853. His church was thrown into the market and sold at public auction, and bought by the Congregational Society, and the Methodist Society lost their place of worship. But their courage was equal to the demands of the hour. Cheered and led on in the work by their earnest and wide-awake pastor, W. J. Kidder, the foundation of a new church was laid on Main street, during the month of May, 1854; and dedicated to the worship of Almighty God in December of the same year. The ministers who followed Mr. Kidder to 1860, were E. A. Rice, W. D. Malcom and I. McAnn.

1860-70: The pastors of the church during this decade were A. L. Cooper, J. A. Sherburn, S. H. Colburn, J. Gill, and R. Morgan. During Mr. Morgan's pastorate the church was enlarged and beautified, rendering it now one of the best churches in the Vermont Conference.

The next decade (1870) opens with the pastorate of A. C. Stevens, the present pastor of the church. During the entire history of the M. E. Church in Northfield a revival spirit has prevailed among both pastors and members. It has now a membership of between 200 and 300, a church valued at $12,000, a parsonage valued at $2,000.

The officers of the church now are: Pas-

METHODIST RECORD, 1870-1878.

BY REV. W. J. KIDDER.

A. C. Stevens, pastor 1870-71-72; W. R. Puffer, 1873; W. D. Malcom, 1874; A. B. Truax, 1875-76-77; O. M. Boutwell, 1878.

For many years there has been a flourishing Sunday-school connected with the church. H. R. Brown is superintendent, with 23 officers and teachers, 200 scholars, and 300 vols. in the library. The present membership of the church is: Probationers, 24; in full membership, 320; total, 344.

Several ministers have been raised up here, prominent among whom was Paul C. Richmond, many years a member of the Maine Conference, who, after a long and successful ministry, a few years since crossed the dark river, and went triumphantly to his reward; and others are still in the field gathering sheaves for their Master in the Vermont, New England and Providence Conferences. In the year 1870 a perpetual lease of a piece of ground was secured for camp-meetings, and by an act of the Legislature, the Central Vermont Camp-Meeting Association was incorporated, with power to hold all the property necessary for the purpose of holding camp-meetings, or any other meetings of a religious character, Sunday-schools, picnics, or temperance meetings, and all such property to the amount of $10,000 is to be free from taxation. This ground has been fitted up at an expense of some $2,000. Several cottages have been erected thereon by the different societies of the Montpelier district, and by private individuals as family residences, and camp-meetings have been held on the ground annually, we think with good success.

H. W. Worthen was pastor in 1879, 80, 81. In 1879, the members residing in Roxbury were organized into a Society, and their connection with the Northfield church ceased.

The present membership of the church is as follows: probationers, 42; in full membership, 185; total, 227.

Northfield, Jan. 19, 1882.

UNIVERSALISM IN NORTHFIELD.

FROM REV. JOHN GREGORY'S BOOK.

At an early day many prominent men manifested a desire to have Universalist meetings in town, and consequently an occasional meeting was held, as a preacher of that faith came along and desired to address the people. School-houses, private houses, barns and groves were used by the early pioneers of Universalism, the friends feeling it a blessed privilege to occupy such humble places, where they could listen to the preached words. Timothy Bigelow was the first man we have any account of addressing the citizens of Northfield, on the subject of Universalism. We learn by the town records that he was ordained in Barnard, Sept. 21, 1809, by the Universalist Convention, Thomas Barnes being moderator, and Hosea Ballou, clerk. He commenced preaching in Northfield about that time, and there are those now living who remember him.

No record has been preserved of the Universalist preachers who labored in this section up to 1821, when the union meeting-house was built in the Center village, and the members of that order, by contributing to its erection, claimed as large, if not the largest portion of it for holding their public ministrations. We learn that Father Palmer, who had formerly been connected with the Christian denomination, became a believer in "the restitution of all things," and preached with great unction and power in different parts of this town. Father Farwell, of Barre, a devout man, preached as opportunity presented in Northfield and vicinity, and had great success in making proselytes to that faith. On dwelling on the love of God, he would frequently be so carried away with his feelings that he would cry and laugh at the same time, and men and women of other names were led to admit that he was honest in his feelings; that he believed his doctrine was the power of God unto salvation.

The Universalist church in the Center village was built in the summer of 1841, Jesse Averill, Harvey Tilden and Joel Parker being the building committee. Fathers Streeter, Palmer, Sampson, E. Ballou, A. Scott, and other Universalist clergymen took part in the dedicatory services. For a time it was quite a substantial building, and although up to this day a majority of the pews are held by this order, others of weaker means are allowed to use it for funeral occasions, and occasionally on the Sabbath, without charge. But time, the great leveller, has written decay upon its walls, and soon it will be numbered with the things that were.

Rev. L. H. Tabor was the first preacher employed after this house was built, and he labored here but half the time, being engaged the other half at Plainfield. Rev. Alanson Scott followed him in 1843, and was the first clergyman of that order who resided here. Rev. R. S. Sanborn succeeded him, preaching a short time, and since him other preachers supplied the desk one-half or one quarter of the time, until the new church was built at the Depot village, when the old one was abandoned entirely by those who built it.

Among the prominent Universalists who contributed liberally to the erection of one or both churches at the Center village, were Amos Robinson, Jesse and Oliver Averill, Lebbeus Bennett, Elijah Burnham, Isaac P. Jenks, John West, John Starkweather, Heman Carpenter, Roswell Carpenter, Judge Robinson, David R. Tilden, Thomas S. Mayo, Samuel Fisk, Sidney Hatch, Moses Robinson, Sherman Gold, Harvey Tilden, I. W. Brown, Lewis Hassam, Volney H. Averill, Joel Parker, Elijah Pride, William Wales, Mrs. Hurlburt, and others.

After repeated efforts to get a vote to build a new church in the Depot village, for the railroad was drawing business, the post-office and a majority of the citizens to that place, a vote was passed to take measures to purchase the land and proceed with the building. In November, 1858, at a society meeting, 51 votes were cast to locate said church on the H. M. Bates lot, north of the common, and H. Tenney, T. A. Miles, J. C. Gault, Sherman Gold and John Gregory were appointed a building committee. The church was completed the following summer, dedicated to God in the usual form December, 1859, and Rev. O. H. Tillotson selected as pastor, and commenced his labors the first Sunday in January, 1860, at a salary of $1,000 per year. The society prospered under his ministration, for he was well liked, honoring his profession as he did by a well-ordered life. He died in Northfield in 1863, aged 47 years, lamented by a large parish, leaving a wife and one son. Of him it might have been said: "A good man has fallen."

His remains were interred in our beautiful Elmwood, and many a tear has fallen upon his grave, at the recollection of his manly bearing and Christian usefulness.

Rev. Eli Ballou supplied the pulpit until the Rev. C. W. Emerson was settled as pastor, who labored with them 3 years. Then followed the Rev. Stacy Haines Matlack, an excellent young brother, who, in feeble health, preached to the society nearly one year, but was compelled to resign his pastorate, and died at the home of his parents, in Eaton, O., Apr. 15, 1870, age 30 years. He was a graduate of St. Lawrence University at Canton, N. Y., of the class of '71, and Northfield was his first charge.

The Rev. R. A. Green followed Mr. Matlack, remaining 5 years. Since then the hard times and the removal of many friends, have greatly embarrassed the society. Rev. W. M. Kimmell, of Ohio, commenced his labors as pastor the first Sunday in May, 1878.

FREE WILL BAPTIST CHURCH.

This denomination had quite a good society in 1823, so that they drew more public money than the Methodists that year. But schism got in among them, they died out, and have no longer a name to live in Northfield. Elder Nathaniel King was their prominent preacher. . . .

Sylvanus, son of Col. Ezekiel Robinson, was ordained as a Baptist Elder, by the laying on of hands, by Elders James Morgan, George Hackett, and Ziba Pope, Feb. 27, 1821, and preached here and elsewhere as opportunity presented.

James Morgan was ordained as a Baptist Elder, June, 1822, by Elders Daniel Batchelder and Thomas Moxley, and preached considerable in Northfield. Many years have passed since the Baptists gave up their organization, and the writer has not been able to find one of that order that can give him a history of the rise and decline of this once prominent society. Deacon Nathaniel Jones was its principal lay member, and his zealous advocacy of Millerism not only tended to break up the Baptist society, but injured him in point of property. JOHN GREGORY.

REV. NATHANIEL KING.

From an obituary by Elder Henderson, who preached his funeral sermon:

Died in Northfield, Oct. 18, 1852, Elder Nathaniel King, aged 85½ years. He was born in Hampstead, N. H.; at 8 years, his father removed to Sutton, N. H., where he resided until 21 years of age. At 22, he visited Tunbridge, Vt., which was new and but sparsely settled, purchased a tract of land and commenced making improvements. In 1794 he married Miss Lydia Noyce, which relation was sustained with honor and fidelity 58 years. He was permitted to see an interesting family gathered around him. In 1799, he indulged a hope in Christ, and in 1802, was publicly consecrated to the work of the gospel ministry. His ministerial labors will live in grateful remembrance while his remains moulder in the dust. He felt deeply interested for the heathen in his blindness, the slave in his chains, and the poor around him.

He contributed $100 for the endowment of the Free Will Baptist Biblical School at Whitestown, N. Y., $150 for the Bible cause, $350 for the Mission cause, and other benevolent enterprises shared in his liberal contributions.

Of his useful life, 42 years were spent in Tunbridge and Randolph, and 14 years in Northfield. In each of these towns he secured the confidence and esteem of his townsmen, and as a token of their esteem and confidence he was appointed to offices of trust, and for 13 years represented the town of Tunbridge in the Legislature.

Elder King, as a husband and parent, was kind and affectionate; as a citizen, upright and patriotic; as a Christian, humble, faithful and consistent; as a minister, in his public ministrations plain, direct and fearless,—in labors untiring, and successful. He was long spared to bless the church and the world.

His sickness was protracted and distressing; but he repeatedly assured his friends that the doctrine he had preached for more than half a century sustained him in the time of trial. His end was calm and triumphant. In his removal, one of the strong men and faithful watchmen of Zion has fallen. M. C. HENDERSON.

OBITUARY OF MRS. NATHANIEL KING.

Lydia, widow of the late Rev. Nathaniel King, died in Middlesex, Feb. 5, aged 90 years, 6 months. She was born in Bow, N. H., and when quite young, removed to Tunbridge, Vt., where she resided many years. In 1794, she married the man whose relation was enjoyed for 58 years. She indulged a hope in Christ in 1799, and soon after received baptism and united with the F. Baptist church in Tunbridge. During the 50 years' ministry of her husband, she ever encouraged him in his work, and enjoyed the satisfaction of having contributed much to the cause of Christ. Her interest was identified with the denomination for 70 years, and in advanced age, her attachment was not allowed to decline.

A family of 5 sons and 8 daughters gathered around her. Nine remain to mourn her departure, and cherish her memory. She lived to see a numerous posterity extending to the fourth generation. Her last 10 years were pleasantly passed in the family of Stephen Herrick, Esq., (Mrs. H. a daughter,) where she received the kindest attention. On the 10th, funeral services were conducted by the writer, after which her remains were brought to Northfield, and laid by the side of those of her husband. The occasion was solemn and interesting.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

had something of a following in 1823, but was the smallest of all, as we learn by the amount of public money they drew. After the yellow meeting house was removed from the Center, they ceased holding meetings, and became extinct as a religious society. Efforts have been made to find some one that would give a brief account of this order in Northfield, but in vain.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH IN NORTHFIELD.

BY REV. WM. S. HAZEN.

Most of the first settlers of Northfield were Universalists, and for a number of years that was the prevailing religious influence in town. Then a Methodist church and a Free Will Baptist church were organized; and as the population of the town increased, a number of families were found who preferred the "Congregational Way."

Virgil Washburn, a devoted Christian, who came from Randolph, was especially active among them. Occasionally meetings were held in private houses or barns. Sometimes they had preaching by clergymen from neighboring towns. The professing Christians among this company, after consultation as to how they could best promote their own spiritual interests and those of their friends, decided to form a church. The meeting was called and the church organized in "the little yellow meeting-house" at the Center Village. The first record of the church reads:

Northfield, May 27, 1822. This day was organized the first Congregational church of Christ in this town. Composed of the following persons, viz: Josiah B. Strong, Virgil Washburn, Moses R. Dole, Samuel Whitney, Thomas Whitney, Lucy Whitney, Clarissa Strong, Rizzpah Whitney and Betsey Houghton, by professing their faith in Christ, and entering into covenant bonds with God and each other. They then proceeded to choose Brother Josiah B. Strong Moderator, Brother Samuel Whitney clerk, and Dea. Virgil Washburn Deacon.

Attest,
ELIJAH LYMAN, } Ministers of AMMI NICHOLS, } the Gospel.

June 17, 1822, there is this record:

This day held a church meeting according to appointment. Voted to hold open communion with all regularly organized Christian churches.

The feelings of these nine Christian men and women as they stood up and entered into covenant with one another and the Lord, can be better imagined than described. It was a step on their part taken after much deliberation and prayer. They felt the importance of the movement, and the responsibility resting upon them individually. They were in earnest in seeking the honor and glory of God, and the spiritual good of their friends and neighbors. To secure for themselves and children religious privileges, they were willing to bear heavy burdens, to practice great self-denial. Thus this small company were organized into a church and ready for Christian work; but their condition and prospects, humanly speaking, were not flattering; they had no home. The only right they had in any house of worship, was in the small meeting-house in which the church was organized. This they could occupy the fifth Sabbath of every month in which there were five Sabbaths. They had not the means with which to provide themselves a home. They were not able, even, to support regular preaching; occasionally they had preaching, and the ordinances were administered by the pastors of neighboring churches: Revs. Elijah Lyman, Ammi Nichols, James Hobart, Salmon Hurlburt, E. B. Baxter, Joel Davis, Amariah Chandler, Henry Jones, A. C. Washburn, F. Reynolds and others; such was the distrust of their success, many whose sympathies were with Congregationalism stood aloof even during a very extensive revival about 1825; the converts who would naturally have united with this church, turned from it because they thought it would prove a failure. The first addition to the church was Sarah Shipman, Feb. 23, 1823. During the first 10 years there were 19 admissions and 2 dismissals by letter. I have no record of deaths. If none, the church when 10 years old numbered only 26, These were years of struggling for very existence. When the church had increased in strength and influence, so that it was thought advisable to hold public services every Sabbath, a school-house in the Depot village was occupied. Shut out of this house by vote of the district, a large room in Gov. Paine's woolen factory was used. During the winter of 1835, a subscription paper was started to raise funds to build a church, but Gov. Paine forestalled the necessity by building a house and inviting the church to worship in it, and it was dedicated to "The Father, Son and Holy Ghost," Dec. 1, 1836, Rev. J. K. Converse of Burlington, preaching the sermon, and offering the dedicatory prayer. This house was occupied for about 6 years, when the church decided to build a house at the Center for itself, of which it would have the entire control.

The edifice was erected and dedicated Aug. 3, 1843; thus when 21 years old the church had a habitation of its own as well as a name. The church continued to worship in this house, till the railroad having been built and business so centered in the Depot village it seemed desirable the church should be there, and Dec. 1854, it was decided to change back from the Center, and the house built by Gov. Paine formerly used, was bought of the heirs, enlarged, repaired, and has been the home of the church since.

The first 10 years the church could not hold meetings regularly on the Sabbath, but the last years "reading meetings" were held, which Dea. Cady usually conducted, Gov. Paine frequently reading the sermon.

In Sept. 1833, Mr. James Ferguson, a young man, commenced laboring with the church. He was called to be its pastor, but died the very day he was to have been ordained and installed.

On the last Sabbath in May, 1834, Rev. Calvin Granger preached for the church, and arrangements were made with him for "stated supply." June 4, 1836, the church voted to give Rev. Calvin Granger a call to become the pastor, with a salary from the church and society of $200, the remainder of the salary to be supplied by the Home Missionary Society.

Dec. 1, 1836, Mr. Granger was installed, and was pastor till Dec. 1842, when he was dismissed by advice of a council.

After this I find no record of any action of the church in regard to ministers until Sept. 12, 1843, when Rev. Thos. S. Hubbard was invited to become pastor, who declined, and Nov. 25th, after, the church voted to hire Rev. Wm. Claggett one year, whose services were retained till the end of 1845.

Again, no record of action in regard to a minister till Sept. 19, 1846; the church voted to employ Rev. J. H. Benton one year. March 24, 1847, he was installed, and was pastor till Sept. 7, 1849, when dismissed by advice of a council. The reasons given were, "inadequate support, a call received from a church in Michigan, and circumstances growing out of that call."

In Jan. 1850, Mr. Ambrose Smith was acting pastor; July 9, 1850, ordained; dismissed Apr. 24, 1853, and soon after Rev. C. B. Tracy became acting pastor. He received a unanimous call to become pastor. There is no record of the acceptance of this call, but he remained acting pastor till the close of 1855.

Dec. 27, 1855, Rev. L. H. Stone was voted a call to become pastor. His labors commenced the first of April, but there is no record of the acceptance of this call, and Mr. Stone was not installed, but continued acting pastor till the first of Apr. 1863, when Mr. C. W. Thompson supplied till the first of Sept. after, when the ministry of the present pastor, Rev. Wm. S. Hazen, commenced, who was ordained pastor Oct. 12, 1864.

The first deacon was Virgil Washburn, who held the office from the day of organization till Apr. 1, 1832, when at his own request he was dismissed, and recommended to the fellowship of the church in Randolph. Aug. 11, 1832, Caleb Winch and Calvin Cady were chosen deacons, and continued in office until their death; the first, Apr. 27, 1843; the last, Apr. 12, 1864. There is no record of the election of Chas. C. Closson and Samuel Denny, but it must have been during 1843. They served till their dismissal by letter; the one in 1848, to the church in Worcester, in which he held the same office a number of years, and died in 1872; the other to the church in Thetford. Dea. Denny, after his return to this church in Aug. 1850, served for some time. Wm. Winch was chosen July, 1848, and is now the senior deacon of the church. There is no record of the election of Leonard Harrington, who served several years previous to his removal to the church in Waitsfield. Lorenzo Belknap was elected Aug. 8, 1864, and Daniel Chandler, at present one of the acting deacons, July, 1880.

Clerks of the Church.—Samuel Whitney, Chas. C. Closson, John L. Buck, Calvin Granger, John L. Buck, J. H. Benton, Truman S. Kellogg, Ambrose Smith, Samuel Denny, Wm. S. Hazen, M. McClearn, J. H. Orcutt.

The church has enjoyed only two extensive revivals; one during the winter of 1835-36, which resulted in more than doubling the membership, the other in the winters of 1841, '2. The total membership is 372; present membership, 126.

Though there had been something of a Sabbath-school, or better, perhaps, Bible classes, connected with the church for several years, the school was not regularly organized until Dec. 1836, when Samuel Denny was chosen superintendent, since which the school has been well sustained, but never was more flourishing than now, when it numbers 156; and at least three who here first professed their faith in Christ, have become ministers of the Gospel: Rev. Daniel Parker [see page 644], Rev. C. M. Winch, who is now pastor of the church at Hartland, and Rev. Geo. W. Winch, pastor of the Congregational church in Enfield, Conn., and two others who united with this church by letter, have become clergymen, and are laboring in the West. This church was formerly aided by the Vt. D. M. S., the last record of such aid being in Nov. 1855.

This review may at first present something of discouragement; to some it may seem as though Christian effort here has been useless, or at least very inefficient; that after 60 years of labor there is so small a church numerically to show. It must be remembered that the fruits of any moral or religious undertaking are never all to be seen. "One soweth and another reapeth." Aside from the influence on this community in sustaining a Christian church 60 years, the full value of which eternity alone will reveal, the church has been continually exerting a wider influence in sending forth to other parts of the land those nurtured in its bosom. Who will attempt to estimate the good it has thus been continually doing? Such country churches as this, gaining slowly if at all, yet constantly holding on, are like those mountain springs which are continually sending forth their sparkling streams to irrigate and fertilize the valleys below, thus making, what would otherwise be a barren waste, a fruitful garden. No cause of discouragement here, then, but rather of devout gratitude that this church is as strong as it is to-day, while it has done what it has for others.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

BY REV. FRANKLIN W. BARTLETT.

The Parish of St. Mary's was first organized in 1851, under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Josiah Perry, who died after four or five months of faithful service. We ascertain from the records that an association was created April 10, 1851, to form a parish in Northfield, for the purpose of supporting the gospel ministry and maintaining public worship, in conformity with the constitution and canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Vermont. The name adopted was St. Mary's Parish, Northfield. The Articles of Association were signed by Samuel W. Thayer, Jr., Edward H. Williams, H. H. Camp, James C. B. Thayer, F. E. Smith, E. G. Babcock, W. H. Cornwell, Perley Belknap, James Moore, H. L. Briggs, Isaiah Shaw, J. H. Glennie, Benj. Cridland, J. N. Mack, Riverius Camp, Jr., Ozro Foster, O. H. Finley, Peyton Booth, John Pollock and D. P. Burns. Nearly all of these have since removed, or are deceased.

The first service was conducted in a private school-house, at present occupied as Judge Carpenter's office. The parish organization was maintained; but after Dr. Perry's death no services were held until the winter of 1856-7, when clergymen from different parts of the State officiated, and worship was conducted at the Center village. There were then but four communicants. The summer following a change was made to the Depot village, and to the edifice ever since occupied. It had formerly belonged to the Congregationalists, but was purchased for its present purpose and removed from the Center village to its present eligible site at the corner of Main and Elm streets. After its removal, it was opened for divine service on Christmas day, 1857, by the Rt. Rev. John Henry Hopkins, D. D., LL. D., assisted by the Rector of Montpelier, who came accompanied with his choir and about 30 of his congregation. On the following day, (Saturday) the house was solemnly consecrated. The Rev. Messrs. F. W. Shelton, Josiah Swett, Gemont Graves, and Wm. C. Hopkins participated in the service. Toward the parish Mr. Swett had evinced great interest and zeal, and had raised money for it in other parts of the diocese. The Vestry subsequently passed a resolution acknowledging their obligations to him. From this time the church was served by the 4 clergymen just named and by the Rev. Messrs. C. R. Bachelder, A. Oliver, M. A. Herrick, and T. L. Randolph. A Sunday School was organized by the last named, in Jan. 1858. The Church had been hitherto under the general supervision of the Clerical Convocation of Vermont, but on Feb. 17, 1858, a call was extended by the Vestry to the Rev. Wm. C. Hopkins, a deacon, the youngest son of the Bishop. The latter, as his ecclesiastical superior, having given his consent, Mr. H. entered on his duties, Easter day, Apr. 5, 1858. The free seat system was advocated by him, and on May 23, the Vestry passed a resolution declaring it desirable, but it was not then made the rule. Mr. Hopkins was ordained a priest Sept. 30, 1858. On New Year's day, 1862, the Vestry made the pews unconditionally free, and have never since rented them. On Sept. 25, 1862, the Governor appointed Mr. Hopkins chaplain in the army. The Vestry passed resolutions of congratulation, and consented to part with him for a time, but asked him to continue their rector. It was so arranged. The Rev. J. Isham Bliss (now professor in the University of Vermont and officiating in mission stations,) conducted services for the next 6 months. Meantime, the Rector wrote from Pensacola, Fla., under date of Feb. 27, 1863, resigning the rectorship, but the Vestry declined to accept the resignation. The Rev. Gemont Graves (now of Burlington) became minister-in-charge in May, 1863, and continued such one year. Charles Fay, D. D. (now of Chicago, then of St. Albans,) officiated on Sundays in the following summer, and services were thereafter conducted by Danforth H. Brown, as lay reader. The resignation of Mr. Hopkins as rector was accepted Nov. 27, 1864, with expressions of great regret. He had been an active and laborious pastor, and was greatly beloved. During his absence from his charge he had continued to manifest his interest by sending gifts of money for the church from himself and his regiment, the 7th of Vt. Vols. The Presbyterian John B. Pitman, formerly of Fishkill, N. Y., (now of Malone, N. Y.,) became rector in the spring of 1865. His resignation was accepted Nov. 13, 1866. The able and learned Edward Bourns, LL. D., the President of Norwich University, was engaged to conduct services until a rector could be procured. He was made minister-in-charge Easter, 1867, and continued his official relations until Roger S. Howard, D. D., previously of St. James, Woodstock, became rector, in the summer of 1869. Dr. Howard was at the same time President of the University.

During this period a chancel was added to the church at considerable cost, in fulfillment of assurances made Dr. H. before his acceptance. A very handsome stained glass window was placed over the altar by Mr. J. C. B. Thayer as a memorial to his deceased wife. Dr. Howard resigned the rectorship, May, 1872. The Rev. Amos D. McCoy, a clergyman of fine talents and a remarkably good reader, officiated for a short time, but his state of health did not admit of protracted mental exertion. He retired, and a vacancy followed. Dr. Malcolm Douglass, who had succeeded Dr. Howard, as President of the University, frequently officiated at St. Mary's. The Rev. G. C. V. Eastman was next elected rector, and entered upon his duties, Jan. 30, 1873. He resigned Apr. 5, 1875. Dr. P. D. Bradford and Dr. George Nichols conducted the services, as lay readers until the appointment of the Rev. Wm. Lloyd Himes, deacon, in the spring of 1876, who resigned the parish to take effect Easter 1877, having meantime been advanced to the sacred order of priests. There followed an interval of several months lay-reading. The present Rector, Franklin Weston Bartlett, formerly of the diocese of Pennsylvania, entered upon the charge Christmas day, 1877, just 20 years since the church was opened by Bishop Hopkins. The interior of the church has been recently improved, and some gifts have been made for the chancel by individuals. Among these is an altar cross to the memory of the late Gen. Alonzo Jackman, who was a faithful and devout Christian, and for several years senior warden of St. Mary's.

CATHOLIC CHURCH IN NORTHFIELD.

BY REV. Z. DRUON, V. G.

This place received occasional visits from the Rev. Fathers O'Callaghan, Daly, Drolet, Maloney and Coopman, O. M. I., before any permanent mission was established. Father R. J. Maloney purchased an old meeting-house in 1855—the old Yellow Union Meeting-house—which was the first meeting-house built in the town. See page 649. He had it removed to a lot which had been given by the late Gov. Paine for the benefit of the Catholics, and which has been and still is used as a burying-ground. Rev. Z. Druon, then of Montpelier, attended this parish every other Sunday from 1856 till 1864. Father Druon commenced remodeling extensively the old church in 1863, which was finished by Rev. F. Clavier, and dedicated in Oct. 1870, under the patronage of St. John the Baptist. This church was burned by lightning—entirely consumed, July, 1876; the loss, however, mostly covered by insurance. Father Clavier also purchased, immediately after his appointment as pastor of Northfield Catholic parish, a fine residence, on which, in 1875, he built a large chapel adjoining his own house for week day services. It is used now on Sundays as a temporary church till the new church can be erected. REV. Z. DRUON.

Aug. 21, 1876.

The Bishop of Burlington writes: "The present pastor of Northfield, Rev. John Galligan, came to reside in that village Oct. 1876, and the present handsome church edifice which he erected was blessed on Oct. 24, 1877."

The newspaper record of the time: "The Catholic church, of wood, 51½ x 125; a 125-foot spire; which will seat about 600; cost about $10,000; upon Vine street; was blessed according to the Roman ritual; high mass by Father Casey, of St. Albans. Te Deum by choir, and sermon by Rev. Father Cunningham, of Middlebury, his text being from Psalms: 'I love the house of God and the place where his glory dwelleth.' A collection of $300 was then taken. A large number of prominent clergymen were present from various parts of the State. The church numbers from 600 to 700 communicants, and is in charge of the Rev. John Gallagher, for 10 years priest of the parish at Waterbury.

JUDGE ELIJAH AND GOV. CHARLES PAINE, who were not Northfield men by birth, and one not even by residence, but who did more for the town in its early settlement and aftergrowth than any other citizens. Judge Elijah Paine, the leading spirit among all the settlers in this vicinity, did not live in our town, but on our very borders, just over in Williamstown, which town has already the honor of having his biography—written up by the Paine family, recorded upon her page of history in this work, vol. II, p. 1150—but it is our privilege, and a very pleasant duty, to record his interests, and his heart was always largely with Northfield. He built the first grist and saw-mill and factory in this town. Full of energy and enterprise, just the man to clear up a new country, he had much to do with the beginnings of Northfield, and induced many others, sturdy and responsible settlers, to come into this town. His factory, says Mr. Gregory, which he built in Northfield when a wilderness, 180 x 42 feet, with 6 sets of woolen machinery, cost $50,000; employed from 175 to 200 workmen, and indirectly several hundred more.

The proprietors of Northfield, at a meeting held at Burch's Inn, in Hartford, Vt., 2d Tues. of Nov. 1784, voted he should have the privilege of pitching 200 or 400 acres of land in Northfield at his option, on condition he would build a good saw-mill in said Northfield within 18 months, and a grist-mill in a year. He built the mills, in what is now called the mill woods on the road to Williamstown, and the remains are lying in the water near the bridge that crosses over to the poor farm. The ravine is one of the wildest and most romantic places we know of, and the very last place (with our abundance of water-power), that would be selected at the present day for that purpose. For many years this place was the only one in town where milling was done. Customers who came quite a distance frequently brought their grists upon their backs, or on horseback. Vehicles were few in those days. Occasionally a "one-horse shay" was seen, and the early settlers did not think it beneath their dignity to go to mill or meeting in an ox-cart.

Judge Paine cleared the first land in Northfield, near his mills, which was subsequently owned and occupied many years by John Averill, and then by D. T. Averill.

The Judge had rare executive ability, and could manage a gang of men with success, making everything count to his advantage and profit. He kept from 1400 to 1500 sheep, and worked his wool into flannel and broadcloths. In the haying season it was no uncommon thing to see

30 or 40 men in the field, all steady at work, for the owner was around with his eyes open, seeing that they earned their wages. Many clever anecdotes are told of him. His punctuality was proverbial. On a time when the inmates of his house had all retired, he remembered he had not paid a note due Mr. Ainsworth, of Williamstown, on that day, and going to the chamber door he cried out, "John, John, get up and harness my horse." Before twelve at midnight the note was paid. Upon Mr. Ainsworth's saying, "You need not have taken the trouble to come to-night, to-morrow would have answered," the Judge replied, in his quick, nervous style, "Did I not promise to pay it to-day?"

Hon. Daniel Baldwin lived in Berlin, on Dog river, when a lad, and went to mill on horseback in the "Mill woods," when but few buildings had been erected on the route. When he had become a merchant in Montpelier, Judge Paine called upon him for the loan of $1,000 for a few days. He said that amount was due him at Washington for his services as United States Judge, and he had expected it every day for some time, and would return it as soon as he could get it from the government. Baldwin told him he would loan it to him if he could be sure and have it at a given time, as he should then want it to buy goods with in Boston. The Judge promised that he should have it, and received it, but not hearing anything from him up to the day previous, Baldwin made arrangements to go after his goods, thinking he would call on the Judge on his way, and get his money. But as he was about taking the stage, he looked out of his store, and saw the Judge hurrying along to be "on time." He had the money, and made explanation: He had waited for it until the day before, but not receiving it, as expected, he went to Woodstock some 40 miles and obtained it. He paid Baldwin according to agreement by going without sleep, riding all night, traveling not far from 80 miles in order to keep his word good, so punctual was he in his business transactions.

Men are now living in Northfield who can well remember the time when a log cabin was put on wheels, improvised by Gov. Paine, and drawn to Burlington, July 12, 1840, in the days of "Tippecanoe and Tyler too." It was a unique affair, and attracted immense attention by its novelty, and one of our most esteemed citizens remembers tapping a barrel of cider and dispensing it to the distinguished crowd who rode inside of this rustic vehicle. We take an extract from an article written by De Witt C. Clark, editor of the Burlington Times, giving a graphic description of the celebration. He says:

But what attracted most our attention, next to the imposing display of numbers, was a beautiful log cabin from Northfield, mounted on wheels and drawn by 12 superb grays, decorated with flags and festoons. This team, we are told, belongs to an honest yeoman in Brookfield, and is ordinarily engaged in transporting produce to Boston; but, said the patriotic owner, this is the proudest load that ever my team was attached to, and to the country the most profitable. Without rein or check, these noble steeds promptly responded to the "Gee up!" "Whoa, Dobbin!" of the brave mountaineer who directed them, and when we saw them proudly treading our streets and doubling the shortest corners, with a rural tenement large enough for a country school-house, we could not help exclaiming, in the language of the old song:

I've often thought, if I were asked
 Whose lot I envied most,
 What one I thought most lightly tasked,
 Of man's unnumbered host,
 I'd say I'd be a mountain boy,
 And drive a noble team, wo-hoy!
 Wo-hoy! I'd cry.
 Now by you sky
 I'd sooner drive those steeds
 Than win renown,
 Or wear a crown,
 Won by victorious deeds.

The cabin itself was a very fine one, constructed of peeled logs, 20 x 10 feet, covered with bark, fitted up with paper curtains, a rough door, and a leather string, which hung out. The antlers of a noble stag graced one peak, while the outer covering of some unlucky coon stretched upon the gable bespoke the fate of sub-treasurers and cornfield poachers. This tenement, too, was well filled with the early tenants of log cabins, and bore this significant motto: "The people are coming!" Exclamations were heard from every rank by the surrounding thousands, with three times three for old Washington, Paine and the Northfield cabin.

GOV. CHARLES PAINE.

[For his early life see Williamstown, in vol. II.]

[From Mr. Gregory's History of Northfield.]

"To Hon. Charles Paine we are indebted, first, for our beautiful Depot village, which was the center of the first railroad projection in our Green Mountain State. This being the headquarters for the "Vermont Central," the shops were here located by his influence, and had Providence lengthened his life to this day, we can imagine what great prosperity would have blessed our town. Well may Northfield consider Charles Paine her great benefactor. No other man in Vermont could have interested, like him, Peter C. Brooks, Harrison Gray Otis, and others, men of great wealth, to favor the project of building a railroad in this Mountain State at that time. Having been the Chief Magistrate of Vermont, and becoming acquainted with these leading minds, while in college, he carried an influence that but few, if any, could, and which brought him directly into intimate relations with the best men in New England, and the road was built.

Many citizens of Northfield will remember with what rejoicing ground was broken near the depot by Gov. Paine, for the Vt. Central Railroad, the spade he used being still preserved by the railroad officials. This was Jan. 8, 1847, and the first train came into Northfield depot, Oct. 11, 1848, at 20 minutes past 9 o'clock, P. M., conducted by Charles Paine Kimball.

[Nov. 4, 1848. The Governor made the first excursion on his new railroad, which is thus described in a letter to his wife the next day by Gen. D. W. C. Clarke:

An hour ago I returned from Northfield, from the excursion on the Central Railroad, yesterday. We left Montpelier—the Governor, and about 200 members of the Legislature, Secretary of State, and other dignitaries—a few minutes after 7 o'clock, yesterday morning, and at half-past nine left Northfield, in a special train for Lebanon, 53 miles—the whole length of the Central road now opened. In two hours, ten minutes, we found ourselves at Lebanon. We remained a little more than an hour, undergoing the hospitality of Mr. Campbell,—the great Bridge-Making Engineer, who built the bridge across the Hudson at Troy—and arrived at Northfield, again, a little after 3 o'clock, P. M., having travelled from Montpelier about 116 miles.

Truly yours

No persons were admitted to the special train provided by the Governor for this Legislative excursion, excepting specially invited; and very few special invitations were extended. Ex-Governor Eaton, Professor Benedict, Mr. Brainerd of St. Albans, Mr. Upham, and a few others. There were about 250 on the train, and probably, two-thirds of them had never before seen a railroad. This class of legislators (?) was very inquisitive about the whole matter, asking a thousand questions that a well-informed boy might as well have answered. . . . But I only want to tell you about my participation in the excursion: In the cars between Northfield and Bethel, I wrote off a song for the occasion, which, for its local allusions and hits, was received with great good feeling, and which Mr. Houghton, Mr. Shafter and I had to sing, tolerably often, before we got back again. I really don't think it worthy of publishing abroad. But Fred Houghton made a copy which will probably appear in the Tuesday's Boston Atlas. I say this to you, . . . to invoke your charity for me, and my vanity, or good nature in consenting to have it printed. But I did, and "there is the end on't."

Caroline (the Governor's sister,) is now on a visit to the Governor's. . . . She wanted to go with us on our excursion over the road, but as there were no other ladies on the train, she declined.

A long and glowing description of the new railroad, and the first great excursion ride of the Vermont Legislature upon it, appeared in the Thursday issue of the Boston Argus; following, if we rightly remember, filling a page or more of the Argus, and with the impromptu song born of the ride—which it was stated in the paper was sung some thirty times aboard the train, going and returning, at the flush feast of Belknap—his grand dinner to the Legislature—which was sung more and more uproariously as on waxed the hour.

“THE RAILROAD SONG.

WRITTEN BY GEN. CLARKE ABOARD THE CARS BETWEEN NORTHFIELD AND BETHEL.

Tune—“DEAREST MAE.”

We took an early start to-day,
And braved a rough old ride,
To reach the place where PAINE, they say,
Wins people to his side;
The iron-horse was breathing gas
In the “sequestered vale,”
And every one ambitious was
To ride upon a rail!

Hurrah! Hurrah!
For Governor PAINE, the Rail-er!
He builds his roads o'er rocks and hills,
AND GOES FOR GENERAL TAYLOR!

Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah!
If it don't beat all natnr!
To see the “wisdom and the vtrtu”
Of our great Legislatur'
A riding through the hills and vales,
From Northfield to the river,
On Governor Paine's new-fashioned rails!
I never! did you ever?

Hurrah! Hurrah! &c.

I tell you what it is, old boys,
This ride we are not loth to,
Especially when we do the thing
Free gratis and for nothin'
And when, besides, the dinner comes
On just such terms agaln,
I'd like to know who will not sing,
Hurrah for Governor PAINE!

Hurrah! Hurrah! &c.

I wish to introduce a bill—
I offer it quite humbly,
And move its passage through these ears,
By this 'ere J'nt Assembly:—
Section 1 provides that PAINE
Shall have the right to go
With his old Railroad where he will;
He'll do it whether or no!

Hurrah! Hurrah! &c.

The 2d section has a clause,
As sharp as any eat's,
That when old BELKNAP comes along,
We'll raise our cotton hats,—

Because he has a rough old way
In that old pate, 'tis said,
Of doing things when he takes hold;
They call it “GOING AHEAD!”
Hurrah! Hurrah!

For BELKNAP, high and low!
He goes ahead because, you see,
He's got a head to go!

In section 3, it is declared,
That that 'ere long man, MOORE,
Who straddles this old iron horse,
And brings us through secure,
Shall be the Chief old Engineer,
By special legislation,
Of this 'ere J'nt Assembly here,—
As ZACH shall of the nation!

Hurrah! Hurrah!
Let's make the echoes roar!
Though other roads are safe enough,
The Central Road is MOORE!

In section 4, it is set down,
That 'mong these mountain ridges,
The name of CAMPBELL shall resound:
The HERO OF THE BRIDGES!
And that the man to carry out
A project very mighty,
And show that “It is bound to go,”
Is that 'ere same “OLD WHITEY!”
Hurrah! Hurrah!
Let's keep the chorus humming!
For word has passed along the line—
That same old “Campbell's coming!”

As an amendment to the bill
It's moved to add a section,
Which has a tendency to raise
A rather sad reflection:—
It is that Governor PAINE do seek—(Why, what's the man about?)
To keep the family on earth—
The race must not run out!

Hurrah! Hurrah!
For PAINE, the bachelor!
The wonder groweth every day,
What's he unmarried for?

Amendment 2d is proposed:—
It is to make provision
That shall our thanks to CAMPBELL show
With very nice precision.
He has a head that's great to plan,
A will that never flinches to plan,
We wish you'd find a bigger man
Than CAMPBELL, of his inches.
Hurrah! Hurrah!
For “Whitey,” brave and true!
His heart goes fitly with his head?
So say I—what say YOU?

Now if the President will rise,
And put the thing to vote,
I'd like to know your sentiments
Upon this bill I've wrote;
And so, to end the matter well,
Before we take a glass,
I hope you all will answer “AYE!”
And let the old bill pass.

Hurrah! Hurrah!
Please put this vote again;
All you who are affirmative,
Hurrah for Governor PAINE!

I think I may declare the vote—
 I'll do it if you will,
 And now announce to this J^{nt} House
 The passage of the bill;
 It is before the Governor—
 We care for no Veto—
 If Governor PAINE won't sign the act,
 Our COOLIDGE will, we know!
 Hurrah! Hurrah! &c.

It now is moved that we adjourn,
 And in the usual way;
 For plain it is, at this late hour,
 We break up "without day;"
 And when we reach our homes again,
 We'll tell the wondrous tale,
 How PAINE has rode this J^{nt}
 Assembly on a rail!
 Hurrah! Hurrah! &c.

As for the title of our bill,
 It is decreed to be:—
 "An act to lighten public cares,
 And aid festivity."
 So now farewell to GOVERNOR PAINE,
 To BELKNAP, CAMPBELL, MOORE!
 This J^{nt} Assembly is dissolved;
 'Twas liquorified before!
 Farewell! Farewell!

Gov Paine felt an interest in education and religion. He donated the land on which was built our Academy, and $500 in money, and gave the institution an excellent apparatus. His executors donated (that is he gave in his will), the Catholic church the land for their church and cemetery. He gave the land for Elmwood cemetery, according to his expressed desire before he went to Texas, and he built the church in the Depot village, now occupied by the Congregational society, from his own funds, wishing to have a convenient place for the people to attend meeting. By all which we see the desire of his heart for the welfare of his race.

The Rev. Ezra Gannett, D. D., of Boston, remarked, in preaching his funeral sermon:

The early life of Charles Paine was passed under circumstances suited to prepare him for the part he afterwards filled. Born almost on the commencement of a century remarkable for its control of mechanical agencies, and the development of popular institutions, he entered on the period of his vigor at a time for the favorable exercise of his peculiar abilities. His father, the late Judge Paine, was one of the most honorable citizens of the State, and merited the respect which was awarded him. The influence of his home doubtless laid the foundation of that character which in subsequent life raised the son to a not less conspicuous position. Amidst the green hills of his birthplace he breathed the air of a manly freedom and a virtuous energy. Nature spoke to him in her clear and sweet tone, and he listened in the uncorrupted delight of youth. Surrounded by a yeomanry that have ever maintained a frank independence, in union with honest industry, intelligent, brave and hospitable, free from the vices of suburban communities, and strong in their local attachments, he acquired the traits which ripened into a wise and noble manhood. The love of his native State, the inborn passion of every son of Vermont, lost none of its fervor as his judgment grew more mature. He loved her mountains and her streams, her history and her people! At the age of 17 he became a member of Harvard college. It was there my acquaintance with him began, and there that the bonds of friendship, which 4 years of various fortunes served but to strengthen, were knit between him and his fellow-students! Among them was not one who regarded him with any other feelings than those of respect and esteem. Thirty-five years after," added Mr. Gannett, "they first met in the halls of Cambridge; nearly one-half of the surviving members of his class were assembled, by his invitation, around the board, which was spread with an ample hospitality. I recall that scene with special interest, for it shows me the host and friend happy in the sympathy of an occasion which he made delightful to others. I see his erect form, his open face, his princely demeanor. I hear his words of cordial greeting, and feel no painful obligation, since I am sure of his enjoyment of the re-union, for which we were indebted to him, whose hand we shall never grasp again, for the ineffable recollections of that day.

Governor Paine was not a man of professions. His words were not many, and they never were uttered to secure admiration or to forestall an impartial judgment. It is not strange, therefore, that he said little on the subject of religion. But such actions as speak more loudly than words attest both the reality and the character of his faith. This edifice is a memorial of the value he set on the institution of public worship, and an unsectarian administration of religious truth. On this point he was strenuous and consistent. The most emphatic disapproval of dogmatic exclusiveness which he could have left, as well as the most decisive testimony to his faith in the great Christian truths, is given in the paper by which he makes a final disposition of his property.

This remarkable document contains also unimpeachable proof of that disinterested concern for the good of others, and that desire to see all classes of the people enjoying the means of knowledge, virtue and happiness, which I think gave to his character its largest claim on our fond remembrance. As a testamentary provision, I should not be surprised to learn that it is without a parallel. Brief but distinct in its language, it is as peculiar for the modesty as for the liberality which it evinces. Leaving all details to the friends in whom he reposes the utmost confidence, and avoiding any suggestion that might have the effect of connecting his name with the uses to which his bequests may be put, he only requires of those whom he appoints as trustees that, after assisting such persons as they may think have any claim arising from consanguinity, friendship, or obligation incurred by him, they 'use and appropriate whatever property he may die possessed of for the best good and welfare of his fellow-men, to assist in the improvement of mankind; recommending that they do it without sectarianism or bigotry, according to the intention of that God whose will is found in the law of the Christian religion, in which,' he adds, 'I believe and trust.' What could be more characteristic or admirable?

The manuscript from which I have quoted bears a date somewhat distant from the present time. But if evidence were needed that he retained the same feelings to the close of his life, it is furnished, to say nothing of other facts, by an incident which I am permitted to relate. A short time before his departure for Texas, Mr. Paine was reminded by a friend that he had never made an explicit declaration of his religious belief, and was requested to say what doctrinal tenets he had adopted. After a moment's hesitation, he took from his pocket a slip of paper bearing the stains of age and use, which he gave to his friend, and said, 'There is my creed.'

"About Ben Adhem—may his tribe increase—
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold,
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head."

"And with a look made all of sweet accord, Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men.'
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blest,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

This admirable sermon concludes: "A gloom hangs over the village in the warm summer's day. The sky is clear, and the air is healthful; yet every aspect of nature is sad, and the scene around us impresses us like a funeral monument. And such it is. Our hearts cast their own shadows upon the landscape. We have come to lay the remains of him whom we loved in the grave. He died far away from us, and far from the spots that were dear to him, but we could not leave his dust in that distant land. The hope, tenderly expressed in their first anguish of bereavement, is realized:

That noble form, so proud, so calmly bold,
Shall make its last sad resting place auld
The scenes he long had loved and cherished,
Within the State o'er which he was a Ruler.

Here will we lay his mortal frame in the grave which he would have chosen, in front of the temple which he built to the glory of God, and in the midst of the proofs of what he had done for man. The associations of this hour shall henceforth invest the spot. Business and travel shall own its sanctity, and time shall guard it with watchful reverence."

Hon. Heman Carpenter said in his eulogy on him, at a meeting of the citizens of Northfield, upon receiving intelligence of his death;

"By his influence and his energy the charter of the Vermont Central Railroad was obtained, and to him we are indebted for the accomplishment of this stupendous work! There is his Monument! And when we are dead and forgotten, then fresh in the memory of the future will be his name, as long as the iron horse shall traverse our State, his name will be cherished by the honest and hardy sons of the Green Mountain State. He also gave an impetus to other railroads.

"To me" (said Mr. Carpenter) "this dispensation of Providence is overwhelming. Language fails to express the deep emotions that thrill through every nerve. He was my friend when I needed a friend. For 17 years I enjoyed his intimate and uninterrupted acquaintance and confidence. I see him now as I last saw him, when a few friends took him by the hand and bade him good bye, with tears in their eyes, as he left the station here in the cars for his journey South. The words of one of the friends, as the train left, have made an impression upon my mind that time will never efface. 'That car carries more men from Northfield than it will ever bring back.' That was the fearful belief of us all when he left, and sadly true it has proved indeed. It carried the living man, it can only bring back his earthly remains. It carried him in whom human nature can stand up before all the world, and say 'He was a man!'"

Hon. John Wheeler, of Burlington, formerly President of the University, said of Gov. Paine :

“On his return from college he showed no inclination for professional study, but asked to enter upon the employment of practical life, both to lessen the labors of his father, and to advance his interests. This he was allowed, without much thought that he would do otherwise than soon grow weary of it, and call for a different mode of employment. ‘I was greatly surprised,’ said his father, ‘at the readiness with which he took hold of labor, the energy with which he followed it, and the capacity and completeness with which he finished it. I found he could do as much and as well as I could in my best days.’ Those of us who live in Vermont know that such a parent could scarcely give higher praise.”

Charles Paine was elected Governor of Vermont in 1841 and 1842,—in the language of Hon. E. P. Walton :

“The youngest man, I think, in the gubernatorial office in the State, I am sure there never was any man who more highly esteemed the claims of age and wisdom and experience, or was more ready to distinguish and encourage whoever among the young gave hopeful promise of an honorable and successful public career.

“What, then, shall I say to you who have known him; to you, who have been the witnesses of his life; to you, who have esteemed him beyond all other men; to you, who feel that you have lost more than a father or a friend—both—lost all? I can only say it is right now for you to weep. Grief is the necessary burden of this day, and of many days to you; but when the fountain of your tears shall fail, when you shall become weary and worn, because of your great grief, then will it be fit for you to rejoice that one has lived so briefly, yet so well, and so honorably, so unremittingly, and so successfully labored in important services for his neighborhood, his State and his country—that you feel his death is an irreparable loss, and a public calamity. Weep now. It is good to weep.

“His ambition in that great undertaking, (building the Vermont Central Railroad) was of a character which the world justly esteems to be noble; he aimed to win for himself an honorable public name, by rendering a great public service. However much of direct personal advantage he naturally and properly may have expected from it, I am sure his chief purpose was to win an honorable name. In the brightest days, he looked joyfully to this reward, and in the darkest, when every other hope seemed to fail, this remained to solace him. It was on one of these darkest days, and at a time when courage, hope and health were all failing, that he said to me, in his familiar mode of conversation, ‘Well, Walton, whatever may become of the corporation, they cannot rob us of the road! It is done; it will be run; and the people will, at any rate, reap the blessings which we designed. Oh! if it were not for that, I really believe I should die.’”

In Governor Paine’s first message to the General Assembly, in 1841, there is one topic presented for their consideration that I wish to preserve. (Mr. Gregory.)

“Education is a subject which cannot fail to command your earnest attention. It is true that no community can boast of more widely and universally diffused instruction than ours, and it might therefore appear useless to urge the topic upon your consideration. But we must continually bear in mind that it is not the result of accident that the people of this State, with so few exceptions, can all read and write, and have enjoyed the benefit of at least a good English education. They owe their happy and enviable condition in this respect entirely to the unceasing solicitude and wise legislation of our forefathers. While our State was yet almost a wilderness, those who themselves felt the want of education were most careful that their children should not be grown up in ignorance, and the efforts they made to establish and support common schools and seminaries for the higher branches of learning, must forever command our gratitude and admiration.”

Such sentiments are “like apples of gold in pictures of silver,” and show the character of the man. He took an interest in the education of all our people, and did not fail to speak an encouraging word when it would do good. He took an interest also in agriculture. Desiring to improve the stock of cattle in this vicinity, he imported a full blood Durham into town, and for many years the milking qualities of the dairy were improved to a good degree. It was by his influence that the Washington County Agricultural Fair was held one year in Northfield, on what is now called Central street; and it was one of the most successful fairs ever held in this county. He loved good cattle, and good horses.

He built and kept in good order a fish pond near his hotel, where he lived, and took great delight in feeding the fish from his hand. Gov. Paine's celebrated fish pond, 10 x 8 rods, was one of the curiosities of the Depot village.

He built the hotel in the Depot village, and before its alteration the cars came across the common from both directions, and would stop at the south end of the building for refreshments. In the days of William Rogers and E. A. Webb it was a popular resort, and in good times, when the Vermont Central and Northfield were in their days of prosperity, it was no uncommon thing to have from 50 to 100 guests at this house at a time.

VERMONT CENTRAL RAILROAD Co.,
IN DIRECTORS' MEETING, Aug. 25, 1853. }

Resolved, That this Board has with deep sorrow received intelligence of the death of the Hon. Charles Paine, late President of this Company, and in consideration of his indefatigable and important services in originating and sustaining the corporation, and of his honorable character as its chief officer, we deem the event a suitable one for the official action of the Board.

Resolved, That in token of our individual respect and regard, and the high estimation in which we hold the character and memory of the deceased, we will in a body attend his funeral obsequies.

Resolved, That the President be empowered and requested to furnish free passes to the relatives and friends of the deceased, for the purpose of attending his funeral at Northfield, on the 1st inst.

E. P. WALTON, Jr., Clerk.

The following were the committee for Gov. Paine's funeral: Samuel W. Thayer, Jr., John Gregory, Moses Robinson, Heman Carpenter, Perley Belknap, Elijah Smith, Jr., Northfield, Dec. 16, 1853.

A handsome granite monument was placed over the Governor's remains in our beautiful Elmwood, by the generosity and munificence of his friend, Benjamin P. Cheney, Esq., of Boston, at a cost of $1,000, on which we read the following epitaph:

"Happy in his parentage, a youth of preparation
Was followed by an early maturity of usefulness,
Invigorated by many virtues, and adorned
By many manly acts;
Devoted to his native State, he applied
His talents, his wealth, and his strength to the Advancement of her great public works,
And the encouragement of her institutions of learning.
Having bestowed upon Vermont benefits of which
The value cannot yet be justly appreciated,
He considered the wants of the world and the age,
And, while seeking a path which should unite
The Atlantic with the Pacific coast, he died
In a distant land, far from those who loved him.
Having merited well of the Commonwealth
And his kind, his remains were here interred, Hallowed by public honors, and private tears."

[Gov. Paine, after a sickness of 26 days, died at Waco, Texas, July 6, 1853, age 54.

ELMWOOD CEMETERY.

BY DR. PHILANDER D. BRADFORD.

Within the corporate limits of the village of Northfield, just north of the same, upon a beautiful piece of table land, is situated Elmwood Cemetery.

The ground originally comprised an area of 6 acres and 36 rods, and was donated to the people of Northfield by their late benefactor, ex-Governor Charles Paine.

April 1, 1854, many of the citizens of the town met in the office of Hon. Heman Carpenter, to effect an organization under the general statutes, subsequently known as "The Northfield Cemetery Association." Hon. Heman Carpenter was chairman, and George Nichols clerk.

A committee of five were appointed to prepare articles of agreement, and a code of by-laws. At an adjourned meeting, April 8, the committee presented a code of by-laws, which were adopted, and an organization was per-fectuated by electing a president, clerk, treasurer, and five curators.

Governor Paine having deceased, his administrators, James C. Dunn, of Boston, and Miss Caroline Paine, of New York, agreeable to his expressed wish, executed a deed of the above mentioned land to the Northfield Cemetery Association. The deed contains the following words: "In consideration of one dollar and good will paid to our full satisfaction, we grant, confirm, and convey to the Northfield Cemetery Association the following described land, etc., for the burial of the dead, and for no other purpose." The curators proceeded at once to inclose the grounds, lay out lots, avenues, walks, and open areas, causing the lots to be numbered, and a chart to be made of the same. But death was faster than they, on the 26th of the same month, even before the grounds were inclosed, the remains of Daniel Stevens were buried there, his being the first grave in the cemetery. In October, 1855, an act was passed by the Legislature of Vermont incorporating the Northfield Cemetery Association. The act provided that the affairs of the Association should be managed by trustees in number not less than five, nor more than seven, and that they should elect from their number a president, clerk, and treasurer. The corporation were: Royce Jones, William Rogers, H. M. Bates, William C. Woodbury, George Nichols, J. C. Cady, P. D. Bradford, J. C. B. Thayer, Perley Belknap, Heman Carpenter, E. A. Webb, E. G. Babcock, G. N. Cady, Calvin Cady, and W. F. Woodworth. In November, 1866, the Legislature passed an act in amendment of an act of 1855, "called an act incorporating the Northfield Cemetery Association," authorizing the Association formed under the General Statutes to accept the charter passed at the session of 1856, and that all rights, both in law and equity, be secured to and enjoyed by the association formed under the General Statutes that are secured to and enjoyed by the members of the association formed under the act aforesaid. Aug. 12, 1857, the association voted to accept the charter and amendment, and organized under the act of 1855, by electing five trustees, viz: William C. Woodbury, E. A. Webb, George Nichols, L. D. Gilchrist, and Jefferson Marsh. E. A.

Webb was elected president, George Nichols, clerk and treasurer.

In November, 1867, an act was passed by the Legislature in amendment of an act passed November, 1855, changing the name of the Northfield Cemetery Association to "Elmwood Cemetery"; also authorizing the trustees to contract with individuals for the perpetual care and improvement of any lot or lots in said cemetery. In November, 1876, the Legislature passed an act in amendment of the foregoing, giving full power and control to the trustees as to the burial of the dead; also full power to control and prevent the burial and removal of bodies buried in said cemetery, as fully and to the same extent that selectmen have in the burial grounds of the State, and to the extent necessary to protect said cemetery from encroachment or trespass by any person or persons. The cemetery contains at the present time (1878) the remains of 575 persons. It has long been apparent that the grounds were not adequate to the increasing and prospective wants of the community, and the trustees added to the same in 1877 by the purchase of additional land.

The site selected for this cemetery is beautifully adapted for that purpose, and shows the good judgment and taste of the donor. It is withdrawn a little distance from the busy thoroughfare, yet easy of access, and affords a pleasant walk, which appears a favorite one with citizens and strangers. If the character of a people for refinement and religion is indicated by the care of and taste displayed in beautifying the burial places of the dead, it is a matter of congratulation that our cemetery, with its beautiful monuments, its mementoes of affection, and numerous emblems of the Christian hope lighting up the darkness of this world, contrasts so strongly with the cheerless and unattractive burial grounds of 50 years ago. If this cemetery shall be beautified in years to come as it may be beautified, if art shall vie with nature in adding to its attractions, if affection, not avarice, take the lead in questions of expenditures, it will soon become one of the most attractive spots within the limits of our Green Mountain State.

The Association at its annual meeting, the first Tuesday in May, 1878, re-elected the former trustees, viz.: P. D. Bradford, J. H. Orcutt, C. D. Williams, J. C. Gallup, and E. G. Pierce, who subsequently elected P. D. Bradford, president, C. D. Williams, clerk and treasurer, G. B. B. Denny, auditor, and James Evans, sexton.

In connection with and belonging to said cemetery, is a substantial and commodious tomb, mention of which should not be omitted. At the annual town meeting in the spring of 1867, the selectmen were instructed by a vote of the town to build a tomb for temporary deposit of the dead, to be located at such place as would best accommodate the town. During the following summer the selectmen, (Marvin Simons, William Winch, and Dr. Samuel Keith,) agreeable to instructions, caused said tomb to be constructed at an expense of $1,200, and located it within the cemetery grounds, the Association donating the site. The front of the tomb is of hewn granite from Berlin quarry, and panels of serpentine from Roxbury quarry, donated by the late Thomas L. Salisbury. It is surmounted by a heavy marble cross, (the emblem of the Christian's faith,) upon which is the monogram I. H. S.

This tomb, bordering upon the highway at the head of North street, has been found of great convenience in the winter season, and for both usefulness and artistic beauty reflects great credit upon the town, and especially upon the member of the Board (Dr. Keith) who had charge of its construction.

CENTER CEMETERY.

Sept. 18, 1823, Ezekiel Robinson, Oliver Averill, Joseph Keyes, Harry Emerson, and Nathan Green bought of E. Taylor, Jr., and G. R. Spalding 1 acre of land west of where the yellow meeting house stood for a burying-ground, paying \$60. It was laid out in lots $11\frac{1}{2} \times 25$ feet, with a drive-way running through from east to west. The lots were sold at 75 cents each, and in 1829, had all been disposed of except two lots in the southwest corner, which were reserved as a burial place for strangers.

Several additions have been made to the lot; that of Jonathan Briggs on the east, where the first meeting house was built, and last on the west one acre and 127 rods bought of Timothy Reed, Sept. 30, 1874, for $204.45.

Soon after this cemetery was ready, the dead buried on "Richardson's Meadow," west of the railroad, were taken up and interred here. From 1811 to 1823, Richardson's meadow was the general burial place in the vicinity. Some few were carried to the East Hill burying ground, and some to the west of Depot village, in a burial place near F. A. Preston's farm.

Nature has done much to make this ground "beautiful for situation." The improvement began in the front part of the cemetery is praiseworthy, and it is hoped will be continued until the whole enclosure shall present an agreeable appearance.

HON. MOSES ROBINSON,

A son of one of the first settlers—see page 617 for biography of himself and the Robinson family, and page 646 of early anecdotes. His father opened a lot on his land for the first burying ground in town, as we understand, without charge for burial to any one.

EAST HILL CEMETERY is situated at the four corners on the East Hill, near the first settlement of the town, in what is called the Robinson district. It was the first burying ground in Northfield, and for a number of years the only one. The land belonged to the farm of Amos Robinson, and no organization as we can learn was ever formed to control it. All who desired it for the burial of their friends had the privilege, and here many of the early settlers rest from their labors. Among the prominent men that are here interred are Amos Robinson, Nathaniel Robinson, Abraham Shipman, Thomas Averill, and

GOULDSVILLE CEMETERY.

This burying ground, located in the center of the village, shows care and attention in the laying out of the lots, and keeping them clear from weeds and briars. A distinguished traveler once remarked: "Show me the cemeteries and churches of a town, and I will tell you the character of the people."

The Falls village burial ground association was organized according to chapter 81 of Revised Statutes. The first meeting was held at the school-house in district No. 13, December, 1848, at which a constitution was adopted, A. S. Braman, moderator; Marvin Simons, clerk; Leander Foster, James Gould, Samuel Smith, Lotan Libbey, Anson Munson, executive committee. The land for the cemetery formerly belonged to the farm of Luther S. Burnham; was bought and laid out in 79 lots, sold at $4 each. The grounds have since been enlarged by about half an acre.

Ord. Sergt. Luke W. Kendall, Co. F, 4th Vt., was shot through the head in the battle of the Wilderness. His regiment had never fought without him, and he never received a scratch until his fatal wound. He had re-enlisted for 3 years; left a wife.

Edmund Pope, Jr., enlisted in 1861; taken prisoner at Wilson's Raid, June 19, 64; died in Dec., on board a transport, on his way home.

LEWIS COLLEGE.

NORWICH UNIVERSITY.

BY REV. F. W. BARTLETT.

The early history since its foundation in 1834, may be found in the history of Norwich, where it was located until after the burning of the "South Barracks" in the spring of 1866. The next fall it removed to Northfield, the citizens thereof having raised $16,500 for the purpose. Rev. Edward Bourns, LL. D., had been president for 15 years.

On removal, the institution first occupied the upper part of Paine's building, i. e., from Sept. 13, 1866, to the Commencement in July, 1868. Capt. S. W. Shattuck became president pro tempore in 1866, Dr. Bourns remaining as professor of languages until his death, in July, 1871. Maj. Thomas W. Walker, U. S. A., became president in 1867, Rev. R. S. Howard, D. D., in 1869, Rev. Malcolm Douglass, D. D., in 1872, Rev. Josiah Swett, D. D., in 1875, Capt. Chas. A. Curtis, U. S. A., in 1877, Hon. Geo. Nichols, M. D., in 1880. Dec. 31, 1880, the trustees, having been empowered by the Legislature, changed the name to LEWIS COLLEGE.

This was done chiefly in recognition of the offer of Col. Chas. H. Lewis, LL. D., of Boston, an alumnus, to render it the needed financial support, on certain conditions, which were accepted by the trustees. With no endowment, there had been of late years a long-continued struggle for existence. Col. Lewis was at the same time elected president, and Dr. Clarence L. Hathaway, M. S., vice president.

The college has conferred the following degrees since its foundation: Bachelor of Arts, 111; Bachelor of Science, 140; Bachelor of Philosophy, 2; Civil Engineer, 3; Master of Arts, 80; Master of Civil Engineering, 13; Doctor of Medicine, 3; Doctor of Divinity, 16; Doctor of Laws, 14; Doctor of Philosophy, 2.

The faculty of professors and instructors have numbered 60, of which there graduated from Bowdoin College, 1; Brown University, 1; Cambridge, Eng., 1; Columbia, 2; Dartmouth, 2; Harvard, 1; Michigan, 1; Middlebury, 1; N. Y. City College, 1; Norwich University, 29; Trinity, Dublin, 2; Union, 1; University of Vermont, 1; Upsala, Sweden, 1; U. S. Military Academy, 2; Williams, 1.

Under the presidency of Col. Lewis there have been the following professors besides the lecturers: Clarence L. Hathaway, M. S., M. D., Prof. of Anatomy, Physiology and Hygiene; Charles Dole, A. M., English, History and Political Science; William M. Rumbaugh, C. E., Drawing, Architecture, Civil and Topographical Engineering; Franklin W. Bartlett, A. M., Latin and Greek; John B. Johnson, A. B., Mathematics, Mining and Mechanical Engineering; Frederick W. Grube, A. M., Modern Languages; Asa Howe, C. E., M. D., Engineering, Field Work.

Military science has been taught and military discipline enforced from the outset; and accordingly many graduates and past cadets have entered the army in time of war, and not a few have risen to distinction as officers or engineers. The roll of honor includes the names of 12 general officers, 40 colonels and a great number of other officers, among whom some shed their blood for their country.

Recently efforts have been made to bring the college more prominently before the public as a school of practical science. The publication of the old college paper, The Revueille, has lately been revived by the cadets. The number of students is increasing.

REV. EDWARD BOURNS, LL. D.

BY REV. MALCOLM DOUGLASS, D. D.

Edward Bourns was born in Dublin, Ireland, Oct. 29, 1801. His father's ancestor was a Scotchman, whose name was thought to have been originally Burns, who went to Ireland about the time of James I., and settled in Derry. His mother bore the name of King. His two grandmothers were sisters, Medlicott, by name; and his great grandmother was a Kirkpatrick from Scotland. He was educated by Dr. Miller, of Armagh, entered Trinity College, Dublin, and won his degree of B. A. July 9, 1833. He passed the theological examinations, June, 1834. Both before and after this date he was engaged as a writer and reviewer by the well known publishers, Thomas Tegg & Son, Cheapside, London. He did not at once take orders, but engaged as tutor in a private family in England. In August, 1837, he landed in this country. He soon after opened an English and Classical School in Philadelphia, where he became acquainted with the Rev. Dr. William H. DeLancey, Provost of the Pennsylvania University. After the consecration of Dr. DeLancey as Bishop of Western New York, and his removal to Geneva, in 1838, Edward Bourns was attracted to Geneva. In 1839, he received the degree of M. A. from Geneva College, then presided over by the Rev. Dr. Benjamin Hale. In the same year, he was made adjunct professor of the Latin and Greek languages. In 1841, he received the degree of LL. D. from the same college. In the same year on the 7th of March, in Trinity Church, Geneva, he was ordained Deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church; and in the year following, March 12, at Zion Church, Palmyra, N. Y., he was ordained Priest. In 1845, he resigned the Professorship and went to Brooklyn, L. I., where he continued to give instruction in the languages, until he was called, in Sept. 1850, to the Presidency of Norwich University, Vt. He held this office until 1865; and from 1850, discharged also the duties of Professor of Latin and Greek until shortly before his death, which was caused by paralysis and occurred July 14, 1871.

Dr. Edward Bourns was no ordinary man. In the midst of pressing cares, frequent infirmities, and peculiar embarrassments, the intrinsic force, native shrewdness and genial kindness of his nature, notwithstanding a vein of constitutional caution and reserve, made him felt and respected and greatly endeared to many. The trials of Norwich University in his time were peculiar, and arose chiefly from the lack of an early and wise plan of foundation by generous endowments. Yet perseveringly and staunchly he stood by, through evil report and good report. He braved with wonderful elasticity and spirit the frosts and freshets and droughts of neglect and almost literary banishment and pecuniary hardship. In the most loyal, unselfish spirit, he resigned his Presidency of N. U., after 15 years of service, and still faithfully continued in her service, endured her transplanting from Norwich to Northfield, and became rooted in the new place, winning the esteem and confidence of all the people on every hand. Against increasing infirmities his well-proved spirit bore up to the last, scorning the thought of surrender; bearing him up by the long training of habit to give instruction, and to sacrifice himself, and to rally his powers, when it was marvelous that he could even prolong existence. He died in harness.

Let us draw an illustration of his character from the trees of a forest. There, in the admirable variety of nature, there are certain types and characteristics which distinguish one tree from another, and in which their respective excellences and good qualities lie. So it is also with men, and it was eminently so with this man. His character, like that of certain grand families of trees, was conspicuous amongst the many men of ability, education and practical sense with whom he constantly mingled. It was moulded and grew up under a combination of influences which helped to make the man. On his father's and his mother's mother's side he might be said to have inherited the characteristics of the Scottish Larch, which now clothes the heathery Scottish highlands and rugged hills. In hardihood under adverse storms, in patient endurance against the wintry sleet and driving hail, in the qualities which fit that tree to bear transplanting, to redeem the sterile, rocky wastes, and give them a new value; in these respects, this representative tree may well illustrate some of the marked characteristics of this man. He came in the prime of his young manhood to a country before unknown to him and strange, and was transplanted into its soil. As he stood upon the deck of the vessel which bore him from his native shores, he resolved at once and always to lay aside in obscurity the traditions of his native land, and accept in good faith and generously the traditions of the land of which he intended to be an acknowledged citizen. And under difficulties which few can understand, he succeeded in making himself useful and a blessing, and in moulding for good the character of many American youth, who now live to remember him with pleasure and gratitude.

But, again, on his mother's father's side he inherited also something of the capacity, strength and robustness of the Irish oak. This is a tree distinguished for its genuine toughness of grain, and practical power; and its ability to furnish sound timber for traffic, constructions, and the welfare of men and communities. And this tree may also represent in some sort the characteristics of this man. If you regard him as to his physical mould, it is easy to see that if he had been brought up to cultivate chiefly his bodily powers, he would have been gigantic even amongst our most powerful men. He was somewhat bent from long sedentary life, but when standing fully erect his height was but little short of six feet and three inches, with a framework—a breadth of shoulder, a development of muscle, and massive loins—in equal proportion. His physical courage was perfect. For although diffident to an extreme, and reluctant to a fault to display himself, no truer, braver heart could anywhere be found when the time for action came: no sympathy more ready than his with the oppressed, no freer outspokening of views than his, no contempt of humbug and pretension—of mere glitter and show—more thorough than his. Take him all in all as he was, even as developed by purely literary and professional pursuits, by the life and service of the parish minister, by the trials of the academic professor and president, by the confinement of books and writings, and the intercourse of educated men; notwithstanding, mentally and physically, the Scottish larch and the Irish oak will not badly represent him.

Dr. Bourns was a man of learning and acumen. His Alma Mater, Trinity College, Dublin, was second to none in the United Kingdom in scholarly training and classical learning. Here he won honorable prizes, and in his library were books marked with the printed seal of the college recording the occasions upon which he won them in scholastic competitions.

He earned by long practice a right to speak and to teach as it were ex cathedra. He was also a voluminous, careful and exhaustive reader. Yet never at any time in his sermons or addresses, in conversation or in discussions, did he ever betray the consequence of the pedant, or assume to be other than a sincere enquirer after truth. He was fond of accuracy; willing to be restrained by well-grounded principles and laws; ready to surrender cheerfully his opinions and theories, if found to be untenable, but not otherwise. No man could discern better than he the weak points of a coxcomb or hypocrite; and no man could with keener humor and presence of mind foil the advances of intrusive persons and turn the tables upon them. Yet, with a facility of extempore speech, and a native readiness that but for his diffidence and physical hindrances would have placed him amongst our foremost public speakers, and with a keen and humorous mother-wit sufficient for three ordinary men, he guarded the portals of his lips with the extremest care from hasty, unbecoming, or careless words. He never passed the bounds of perfect propriety, modesty and good sense, in public or in private. He sometimes felt himself obliged to show a presuming, pertinacious or priggish person that he had the advantage of him and would keep it. But he never told tales out of school, or treated the character and actions of any scholar or any person but with the most delicate reserve. He stood in all these respects upon his sacred honor. His reticence under the most trying circumstances and in regard to those who had caused him great anxiety, was marvellous and instructive.

Would that our limits permitted us to illustrate that readiness and keenness of humor which those who knew him will easily remember. We heard him once make the following characteristic speech, on a certain commencement evening at Norwich; when the cadets were assembled with a serenading band of music, and the Doctor was importuned for a speech. He opened the window and was heard to say: "Young gentlemen, I thank you for this admirable music. I have heard you praised greatly this day by our accomplished visitors, and I think myself that you have done very well indeed. I cannot help thinking that if you are such fine birds now when you are half-fledged, what will you be when you are in full feather!" When the clergy of the diocese of Vermont, after the death of Bishop Hopkins, held a preliminary meeting to review the names of candidates to fill the vacancy, the Doctor while praising highly the timber of Vermont, ingeniously argued that a Vermont sapling, which had been transplanted, developed and finished under other and most favorable skies, was ceteris paribus better furnished than one could otherwise be for this responsible service.

Dr. Bourns worked faithfully in his clerical life. He was an excellent sermonizer, and extemporized passages and paragraphs with the greatest facility as he was preaching. It may be remembered that at a certain Convocation of the clergy in Rutland years ago, the question under discussion was, How may sermons be made more effective in drawing the laity? The Doctor, when asked his opinion, answered that the clergy "should prepare better sermons." "They should use more art," he said; "not art in the sense of artifice, but high, sacred art in building up, constructing, the sermon, and preaching it."

As a theologian, he was no mere theorist, but sound, practical, consistent, and conservative. He was not by nature enthusiastic; and he sometimes distrusted those who were, if he failed to discern the stability of the foundation upon which they built. He deeply felt the value of energy and practical common sense in carrying out the great work of the Church, and showed his sincere missionary spirit by doing under great disadvantages what he could in the paths of clerical work. Before he went to Norwich many clergyman received his assistance in the pulpit. In Norwich he held service in the chapel, afterwards in a parish church. For 16 years he crossed the Connecticut River weekly to minister to the little parish in Hanover, without other compensation than the small means of the Diocesan Board of Missions could furnish him. At Northfield, he served for several years as rector of St. Mary's Parish. In the beautiful cemetery of that village will be found his monument and his grave.

When one, a professor in the University, and one of its first two graduates; one who had become endeared to Dr. Bourns by the mutual trials and sympathies of many years of academic life together; when this good and true man, this Christian brother, Gen. Alonzo Jackman, approached him a few days before his death, and asked the question, "Is the sky all clear between you and your God?" "Yes," was the emphatic response; and after a pause, "yes, it is clear."

GEN. ALONZO JACKMAN, LL. D.

BY REV. FRANKLIN W. HARTLETT.

The name of Alonzo Jackman occupies an illustrious place in the annals of Vermont, and on account of his distinguished services, as an educator and a soldier, as well as his virtues as a man, he deserves a longer biographical notice than our limits permit. He was born in Thetford, Mar. 20, 1809, the second son of Joseph and Sarah (Warner) Jackman, who were industrious and worthy people. When nearly 3 years old, his father, a farmer, died of an injury, and his mother was left in straightened circumstances, with three children, Enoch, Alonzo and Joseph. Shortly after that, they removed to Stratford, and the next year, 1813, to New Boston, in the town of Norwich; and that summer, the young lad commenced attending school. One day, he had a narrow escape from drowning in the swollen brook near by. The same year, he was very low of a fever, and not expected to live. He had early religious impressions; for when he was only 5 years old, he believed he saw a vision of the Lord walking on the sky. In 1814, while his mother was at Enfield, N. H., a few weeks, to learn the art of making oil-cloth, he was placed in the care of a Mrs. Sawyer, who instilled into his young mind a knowledge of the Bible. Many years afterwards, the mature man looked back to that period as having had an important influence on his subsequent life. In 1815, he lived in the same house with a Smith family; and their boy, Joseph, who afterwards became the Mormon Prophet, was his play-fellow. In 1816, Mrs. Jackman was married to Eli Clark, who took a farm to carry on by the halves, and the two older boys worked as steadily on it as if hired men. Alonzo cut wood for the family bare-footed, with a warmed board between his feet and the snow. One day when Enoch and he were cutting from the same log, the latter sat down to rest, when Enoch's axe glanced and cut his brotherslightly, nearly from hip to knee.

In 1820, these two boys left home, never to return again, except on a visit, their mother having given them the parting admonition, "Go for yourselves and remember there is a God." Alonzo went to work with a farmer, James Powell, for board, clothing and schooling. He remained one year. While there he heard much religious discussion, and commenced reading the Bible through by course, in order to know the truth more perfectly. In 1821, he commenced work for another farmer, about half a mile from his birth-place. Here he was to have board, clothing and 3 months at school. He did his part faithfully, but was unjustly treated, and some of the winters was allowed but little time at school, a disadvantage in early years, which he always afterwards felt. Having worked here 6 years, he left with $4, and two days provisions. His brother Enoch accompanied him, and the two, with $12.47 between them, went on foot down the Connecticut river until they reached Middletown, Mar. 16, with 25 cents left. They crossed over to Chatham, now Portland, where they secured work in the sandstone quarries, near which his brother still resides. He attended school in the winter.

In 1828, young Jackman went to New York and engaged as seaman before the mast, on a new ship, the St. John, bound for Mobile, and from there, as he supposed, to Liverpool. This expectation was not realized, and he returned by another ship to New York and thence to Portland, where he worked in the quarry during the season, and then went to Vermont, where he visited and helped his mother, spending the winter at school. In the spring of 1830, he was again at work in the quarry, and the next winter attended the high school at Portland. About this time he decided to be a Christian. One wakeful night he revolved the subject in his mind and firmly resolved to give himself wholly to the service of God. He joined the Methodist class in March, 1831, and the following summer was baptized by immersion. The year 1831 was employed like the year before, partly in the quarry and partly at school.

In 1832, the two brothers left Portland for Ohio; but Enoch, when they had reached Troy, N. Y., could be persuaded to go no further. After a few weeks in the stone cutter's business, they left for New York, where they got employment on a steamboat for a short time, and then returned to the quarries. Alonzo, however, did not abandon the idea of going west to settle. In October, he left for Ohio. He traveled in various parts of the state, looking for a farm; but he finally shipped on a steamboat, engaged in the iron trade, between Cincinnati and Wyandotte, Va. He was next employed on a New Orleans and Mobile boat. In May, 1833, he again went to work in the Portland quarry.

The scanty opportunities which he had snatched for reading, and his short seasons of school life had given him a desire to pursue a regular course of study. He considered whether to accept an agency for a line of steamers, go to farming in Ohio, or to get an education. He decided, left Portland, and about Dec. 1, 1833, entered Franklin Seminary at Norwich, Vt. The next year, the principal, Mr. Buck, removed his school to New Market, N. H., and young Jackman went with him, and, while prosecuting his studies, rendered assistance in teaching mathematics, his favorite branch. In the summer of 1835, he taught the same branch while pursuing his studies in an academy at Kingston, N. H., and also on its removal in the autumn to Rochester, N. H. Norwich University had, in the meantime, been chartered and opened. He decided to enter it, and did so in December of that year, having passed his examination for admission to the Senior class. He graduated at the first commencement, Aug., 1836, with the degree of B. A. Being the only graduate that year he stands at the head of the alumni. Soon afterwards he was elected to the chair of mathematics. In the next summer vacation, he visited in New England, New York and Canada. In 1838, on account of the uneasiness caused by the projected Canada rebellion, he was employed to drill troops at Enosburgh, Berkshire and Sheldon. On returning to open the spring term of 1839, Zerah Colburn, Professor of Languages, had died, and the charge of the whole institution rested upon Captain Partridge and himself. In Feb., 1840, Josiah Swett, who had been Jackman's room-mate and graduated a year after him, became professor of ancient languages, and that summer these two professors established a paper at Norwich, devoted to military science, national defence, and the interests of the militia. It did not prove a financial success; and one reason may have been that it stood aloof from politics during the great excitement of the presidential campaign of that year. Professor Jackman contributed a series of articles on tactics valuable for their clearness and precision. Some time during the publication of this paper, both editors resigned their professorships and removed to Windsor, where they opened a school, which they called the New England Seminary. They were both Methodists, but after much reading and discussion concluded to enter the communion of the Episcopal church, and received confirmation from Bp. Hopkins, in 1843.

While at Windsor, Jackman had a mathematical treatise printed on the subject of "Series," in which his investigations were carried beyond the ability of the ordinary student. Having conducted the school for 3 years, he and his friend Swett returned by invitation, in 1844, to the University, and resumed their professorships under the new president, Gen. T.

B. Ransom. After the commencement of 1845, the two friends left for Claremont, N. H., proposing to set up a school; but finding the project unpromising, they abandoned it. Jackman, at the solicitation of the president and the trustees of N. U., again went on duty in the fall term.

In 1846, he wrote and published an article on the subject of an oceanic magnetic telegraph. He gave in detail plans for the construction, materials and manner of laying a telegraphic cable across the Atlantic. In lecturing to his school on magnetism, he had expressed the belief that if the necessary expense could be met, a telegraph might be thus extended across the ocean. In 1846, the Hon. Amos Kendall, then president of a Telegraph Co., at Washington, D. C., communicated to a Philadelphia paper the difficulties of crossing, with the telegraph, large bodies of water. Prof. Jackman, happening to see this article, wrote Mr. Kendall, and explained how the difficulties could be surmounted. Receiving no reply, he was induced to write out for publication the article to which we have referred, that no other person might have the credit of solving the problem which he had worked out in this field of science. Accordingly, he wrote a paper, answering all objections, providing against all the difficulties, and including all the necessary particulars of construction and the method of laying an oceanic telegraphic cable. This was about 12 years before the first Atlantic cable was successfully laid. He sent the article to periodicals in Washington, New York, Philadelphia and Boston; but editors refused it, considering the plan visionary. He then sent it to the Vermont Mercury of Woodstock, where it appeared in the number dated Aug. 14, 1846. He forwarded copies to prominent men in the United States, England, Canada and France. It seems, therefore, that the credit is due him of having matured a successful plan for this gigantic enterprise. The cable as it was laid was of the same general description with that which he had proposed, differing in some minor details, among which was the use of gutta-percha instead of india rubber for the purpose of insulation.

Prof. Jackman was well versed in tactics, and had a reputation as an excellent drill-master. This led to his being appointed Brigade drill master by the Governor of New Hampshire, with the rank of Major. He drilled the officers of the brigades of that state at certain times in 1847, '48.

Returning to Norwich from a drill, he had held at Exeter, N. H., he suffered from a severe attack of typhoid fever, from which he narrowly escaped death. This is one of the many times when he was near death, either by accident or sickness.

In Aug., 1849, he obtained 3 years leave of absence from the University, and in October, sailed from Boston for California by way of Cape Horn. His object was to see the country and to add to his resources. He reached San Francisco March 13, 1850. Within a few weeks he took out a claim in the gold region. The prospect seemed fair; but it was desirable to turn the course of the river, and Jackman was elected the Engineer. He was 100 miles from a civilized center, and had to work at a disadvantage; but his ingenuity and acquirements came to his aid. He accomplished the work he had undertaken, and Californians pronounced it the greatest achievement in engineering in the state. He did not find much gold, however. When the rainy season was approaching, he sold out, and the same autumn went to Oregon, and took out a claim of 320 acres, not far from Pacific city, now included in Washington Territory. When Pacific County was organized, June 2, 1851, and county officers elected, Mr. Jackman was made Probate Judge and School Superintendent. In December, he quit Oregon, with some of his farm products on board a bark bound for San Francisco, expecting to realize a goodly sum of money for them. The passage was rough, and his property was rendered worthless by leakage of the vessel. While in this city, he learned that a large amount of gold had been realized from his old mining claim since he left it.

He returned to Norwich Apr. 10, 1852, intending to settle up his affairs and return to his western farm. Dr. Bourns, at this time President of N. U., induced him to teach until the next commencement. Meantime, the reports he heard from the West dissuaded him from returning thither, and he consented to remain with Dr. Bourns and assist him not only in teaching, but in paying the indebtedness of the institution. In 1857, the N. U. cadets were organized under the militia law, as an infantry company, and Prof. Jackman was commissioned Captain, and in 1859, when officers of the 2d Regt. were ordered to meet at White River Junction for choice of regimental officers, he was chosen and commissioned Colonel. The next fall, he held an officers' drill there, and a regimental muster at Bradford. The same year the Vermont militia were consolidated into one brigade and Col. Jackman was made Brigadier General. He was very painstaking and thorough in his instructions and drills; and was himself skilled in the use of fife or drum.

At the beginning of our late civil war, he received a telegram from Gov. Fairbanks, summoning him to meet him at St. Johnsbury with Gens. Baxter and Davis. The Secretary of War had called for troops. A long consultation was held, and an extra session of the legislature was called. Several companies were detailed and equipped. The governor offered the general any position in his power to grant, if he wished to go to the front; but expressed the preference that he should remain where he was, and qualify men for duty. He rendered service as an officer during this period; inspected and got in readiness the old militia, organized new companies and regiments; sent out cadets to drill companies in different parts of the State, as he was notified of their formation, and regimental officers from different States went to him for instruction at Norwich. At the time of the raid on St. Albans, he took the cadet corps to Derby Line, in response to an order from the governor, with authority to take command of any forces he might find, and to organize more if needed. As no danger had been apprehended the militia had been disbanded; but the cadets were always ready, and were en route by rail 2 hours after the order was received.

Honor is due the general for the results of his work on behalf of his State and the Union during these years; his industry was untiring; and his clear, precise, thorough instructions to officers and men were of great value to them in the service.

On March 13, 1866, the N. U. "South Barracks" building was burned, whereby Drs. Bourns and Jackman, who had paid up the indebtedness, lost heavily. The latter now thought of leaving to seek a support elsewhere; but the friends of the institution were anxious that he should remain to aid in establishing it in a new place, and to this he consented, with the understanding that he should not be responsible for its finances or government; and he removed with it to its new location in Northfield, and remained connected with it until his death Feb. 24, 1879. He had attended to his duties as professor the previous week, and been at church the day before. He died from an affection of the heart.

He had been a close student, often so absorbed when studying as to be oblivious of what was passing. His delight was in mathematics, in which he excelled, and he was conversant with natural science. His culture lay mostly in these channels and in military science. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him in 1862. He wrote some mathematical works which he never published, and demonstrated the problem of squaring the circle to his own satisfaction and to that of some other eminent professors—that old problem which had vexed mathematicians for centuries.

In person, Gen. Jackman was of sturdy compact frame, though of somewhat less than medium height; his complexion slightly dark, his eye, dark grey and keen; the countenance indicating both benevolence and decision of character. He was very methodical, earnest, and honest; had great endurance and strength of body, and mind; under the trials of life was submissive and patient, and was a devout and faithful Christian, and in this respect has left an example which will not soon be forgotten. For several years he was Senior Warden of St. Mary's church, Northfield; and bequeathed at his death his small estate to the poor.

He was married to Miss Charlotte Sawyer of Royalton, Jan. 1, 1856. They had two children: Alonzo, born in 1857, and died 1859; Helen, born 1860, and died 1877; Mrs. Jackman died 1874.

NORTHFIELD GRADED AND HIGH SCHOOL.

DESCRIPTION BY JAMES N. JOHNSON, ESQ.

The Northfield graded and high school, the most important public school in the valley of Dog river, was established nearly in its present form in 1870. The high school is the successor of the Northfield institution formerly the Northfield academy—chartered by the Legislature in 1846. Previous there had been no regular high school in this valley. Gov. Paine donated the grounds for the academy site in 1850, upon an eminence between the river and the Central Vermont railroad, and not far from the geographical center of the village of Northfield.

Through the exertions of Gov. Paine, Heman Carpenter, John L. Buck, James

Palmer, George R. Cobleigh, Benjamin Porter, Leander Foster, and quite a number of other public-spirited citizens, a subscription of about $2,400 was raised for erecting the school-building, and another to pay for furniture and apparatus. About a hundred men signed the main subscription, Gov. Paine giving $500; Heman Carpenter, $100; Wm. Nichols and James Palmer, $75, each; H. H. Camp, James Moore, H. R. Campbell, P. Belknap & Co., N. C. & C. S. Munson, Dr. S. W. Thayer, George M. Cady, James Gould, Thomas Connor, R. H. Little, $50, each; J. C. Cady, $40; William Rogers, $35; E. A. Webb, $30; N. W. Lincoln, Elijah Smith, Stephen Cochran, A. Wetherbee, G. P.

Randall, C. S. Dole, Leander Foster, $25, each; George K. Cobleigh, William R. Tucker, A. S. Braman, H. Nye, Theophilus Cass, $20, each; H. L. Briggs, $12.50.

At the first meeting of the trustees, Mar. 6, 1847, Charles Paine, John L. Buck, Leander Foster, James Gould, Jas. Palmer and Heman Carpenter present, John L. Buck, Esq., was chosen president, James Gould vice president, and Heman Carpenter secretary and treasurer. Judge Carpenter filled his offices till 1868. The building was erected in 1851, by Wm. H. H. Dunham and E. K. Jones; cost about $2,600; dedicated and school opened Sept. 1851, with C. C. Webster, A. M., principal. It flourished well, Rev. R. M. Manly succeeding as principal in 1852-3. In 1854, the name of the school was changed by the Legislature to Northfield Institution. The principals since have been John H. Graham, A. R. Bissell, George Brooks, J. G. McIntire, George F. Beard and Charles G. Tarbell, able teachers, and the school well patronized in their time. Having no separate fund, it deteriorated somewhat during the War of the Rebellion.

After the decease of Northfield's benefactor, Governor Charles Paine, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Board of Trustees, Jan. 30, 1854:

WHEREAS, The Trustees of Northfield Academy have heard with deep grief the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Hon. Charles Paine, one of the Trustees of this Institution

Resolved, That in his death this Institution has lost one of its first friends, and one whose aid contributed largely to the establishment and success of the same.

Resolved, That the friends of this Institution will ever hold in grateful remembrance the many public and private virtues of our deceased friend, and the services he has rendered the cause of education in our midst, and the advancement of the growth and prosperity of our State.

This Institution will perpetuate its organization, the following named gentlemen being the present Trustees: P. D. Bradford, president; Lorenzo Belknap, vice president; J. H. Orcutt, secretary and treasurer; P. D. Bradford, George Nichols, J. H. Orcutt, L. Belknap, George M. Fisk, executive committee.

Perley Belknap, P. D. Bradford, J. C. Cady, Lorenzo Belknap, George Nichols, J. H. Orcutt, W. S. Hazen, E. K. Jones, J. C. B. Thayer, George M. Fisk, Charles Dole.

In 1870, the village school district made a permanent arrangement with the trustees of the institution to repair the building, and occupy it for a graded and high school, free for all pupils of the village, which was accomplished through the friends of popular education, notably: Hon. Heman Carpenter, James N. Johnson, Rev. William S. Hazen, Thomas L. Salisbury, A. S. Braman and J. H. Richardson. The school opened in Sept. 1870, with 331 pupils, Marshal R. Peck, A. B., principal. He remained 2 years, and should ever be gratefully remembered. Principals since have been, A. R. Savage, Eben C. Smith, A. W. Blair and W. W. Prescott, all efficient, as also, many lady teachers in the graded departments. It received its charter from the Legislature in 1872.

The old building was accidentally burned Jan. 13, 1876, and the following season the present building, 60 x 90 feet, with 7 main rooms, was erected, at a cost of about $11,000, by J. C. Rice, upon the same site.

The school at present stands well among similar institutions of the State. It costs from $2,500 to $3,000 a year to run it.

Directors for 1882.—P. D. Bradford, president, Chas. A. Edgerton, secretary, Geo. H. Crane, William B. Mayo, H. L. Kenyon.

MASONIC.

The first record of DE WITT CLINTON LODGE, No. 15, F. & A. M., was Nov. 8, 1848, working under a dispensation from the Grand Lodge of Vermont. This record does not show where they met, but it is believed they held their meetings in I. W. Brown's hall at the Center village. The officers were: Joel Winch, W. M.; H. W. Carpenter, S. W.; Walter Little, J. W.; Elijah Smith, Jr., Secretary. Date of Charter, Jan. 18, 1849.

Charter Members.—H. W. Carpenter, Joel Winch, Samuel L. Adams, Oramel Williams, Walter Little, Joshua Lane, Joseph Bean, John Fisk, Zeno Crocker, S. B. Holden, Philip Staples, John Leonard, and Jesse Averill.

Rev. John Gregory received the first degree in August, 1849.

Past Masters.—Joel Winch, Joel Winch, Jr., A. V. N. Carpenter, A. H. Proctor, David L. Howe, E. G. Babcock, C. N. Carpenter, James-P. Warner, J. G. Somerville, Geo. W. Kingsbury, Henry Ferris, J. L. Mack.

Officers for 1882.—W. M. Rumbaugh, W. M.; L. A. Howes, S. W.; Ozro

Winch, J. W.; J. C. B. Thayer, trea.; H. L. Kenyon, sec.; W. O. Whitmarsh, S. D.; G. C. Bates, J. D.; E. Ingalls, S. S.; Wm. Luther, J. S.; D. Thomas, Marshal; A. McGillvary, Tyler.

MOUNT ZION COMMANDERY, No. 9, Knight Templars. A dispensation was granted by the Right Eminent Grand Commander to the following Sir Knights: J. L. Mack, Joel Winch, Henry D. Bean, Stephen Thomas, Frank H. Bascom, L. Bart Cross, Emory Towne, G. C. V. Eastman, George W. Tilden, Charles E. Abbott, J. M. Poland, and Allen McGillvary, to open a Commandery of Knights Templars at Northfield, and to confer the orders of knighthood.

The first meeting under this dispensation was held Apr. 9, 1873, A. O. 755, and the following officers were appointed: Jona L. Mack, Eminent Commander; Henry D. Bean, Generalissimo; Frank H. Bascom, Captain General; George C. V. Eastman, Prelate; Charles E. Abbott, Senior Warden; Allen McGillvary, Junior Warden; Joel Winch, Treasurer; J. Munroe Poland, Recorder; Emory Towne, Standard Bearer; L. Bart Cross, Sword Bearer; George W. Tilden, Warder.

A charter was granted them by the Grand Commandery, June 10, A. D., 1873, A. O. 755, and Aug. 27, of the same year, they were formally constituted with appropriate ceremonies by the Right Eminent Grand Commander, Joseph L. Perkins, and other grand officers. This interesting occasion was graced by the presence of Burlington Commandery, No. 2, and the street parade of the two commanderies is remembered as beautiful and imposing.

LILY OF THE VALLEY, Conclave No. 5, Knights of the Red Cross of Constantine. A charter having been granted to Henry D. Bean, George C. V. Eastman, Joel Winch, George W. Kingsbury, Charles E. Abbott and Allen McGilvery, by the Grand Imperial Council of the State of Michigan, to form and hold a Conclave of the Red Cross and Appendant Orders at Northfield, in the State of Vermont, the above-named Sir Knights on the ninth day of April, A. D., 1875, A. O. 1562, organized Lily of the Valley, Conclave No. 21, Knights of the Red Cross of Constantine, by electing Henry D. Bean, M. P., sovereign; George C. V. Eastman, viceroy; Allen McGilvery, sir general; Chas. E. Abbott, Jr., general; Joel Winch, treasurer; George W. Kingsbury, recorder.

A convention of the several Conclaves of the Order in this State met at Burlington, Apr. 30, 1875, and organized the Grand Imperial Council of Vermont under the direction of Sir D. Burnham Tracy, 33°, Grand Sovereign of Michigan. The organization being completed, the above-named charter, No. 21, issued by the Grand Imperial Council of Michigan, was surrendered for endorsement, and was re-issued by the new Grand Council as No. 5 on its roll of subordinates, by the authority of which charter Lily of the Valley Conclave has continued to convene regularly for the transaction of the business of the Order until the present time.

MASONIC RELIEF ASSOCIATION of VT., established in Northfield, its principal officers citizens of this town, was organized in Feb. 1875, Hon. George Nichols, president; J. L. Mack, vice president; G. B. B. Denny, secretary, and J. C. B. Thayer, treasurer, and the same gentlemen continue to hold these several offices at the present time (1878.)

ODD FELLOWSHIP.

In the fall or winter of 1849 and '50, Brothers Dr. Samuel W. Thayer, J. C. B. Thayer, Dr. Edward A. Williams, Isaac L. Stevens, and Thomas J. Nutter sent a petition to the Grand Master, asking to be instituted as a Lodge, which request was granted, and Mar., 1850, the grand officers visited Northfield, and instituted the Lodge, with the above named brethren as charter members, and the same evening T. A. C. Beard, S. S. Cady, James Palmer, and J. S. Abbott also became members, making 10 in all. The first Noble Grand was Dr. S. W. Thayer, and the first Vice Grand J. C. B. Thayer, and Dr. Edward H. Williams the first Secretary.

Prosperity attended the Lodge, and at the end of three months they had 30, and at the end of two years 60 members, with but one death; but in May, 1852, their hall was burned, with all their books and Lodge property, except the secretary's book; loss in regalia, library, &c. was $350; no insurance, and a debt of $150, without a penny to pay; no Lodge room, and members scattered, and had it not been for the faithfulness of those who loved Odd Fellowship, it must have gone down never to rise again.

The first meeting after the fire was held in the hall of the Northfield House. After a time a hall was procured on Central Street; the next hall was in Union Block.

Prosperity again dawned, Jan. 1, 1859, they had in the treasury $508.29, free from debt; but sickness and death made inroads upon them soon again, and their treasury was depleted; and about this time the railroad works were removed to St. Albans, and as a matter of course many of the members went with them; those left became disheartened, and the good work ceased for the time, after paying all their debts.

But in the summer of 1871, Past Grand Master, P. D. Bradford, proposed a meeting of the faithful at his office, when a paper was drawn up, signed by a goodly number, petitioning the Grand Master to be again recognized. The request was granted; on the evening of Aug. 1, 1871, the grand officers came to Northfield, and restored the Lodge to life. After a few months they began to recuperate, and have gained steadily in funds and members until the present time, with a good working Lodge, and a determination to make it a success. So that to-day [1878] they have 100 members, $1200 in the treasury, free from debt.

The amount of relief paid by the Lodge cannot be told, as the records were burned. But since 1871, they have paid $150 for funeral expenses, have buried 5 brothers, and 200 have been admitted to this institution since its first organization.—[J. G. 1878.]

Present Officers, 1882.—P. D. Bradford, N. G.; O. D. Edgerton, V. G.; J. K. Edgerton, S.; E. Huntley, T.

EUREKA ENCAMPMENT of the Patriarchal Branch of Independent Order Odd Fellows was instituted Jan. 7, 1874, and now numbers 32 members, have $100 in bank, with good furniture and fixtures, and are free from debt. They meet first and third Mondays of each month, at 7.30 P. M.

ODD FELLOWS RELIEF ASSOCIATION—organized in Northfield, Feb. 2, 1875. Hon. P. D. Bradford was elected president, and O. D. Edgerton, Esq., clerk. Since then 188 have become members, and it is permanently established as one of the institutions of Northfield that is destined to do great good. Its principles are the same as those of the Masonic Relief Association, and we refer the reader to the comments made upon the latter institution as appropriate for both. [1878.] No change. [1882.]

COL. ALBERT STEVENS.
(FROM REV. MR. BARTLETT.)

Albert Stevens, son of Daniel Stevens, was born in Hartland, Apr. 23, 1804. He lived there till 1820, when father and son left to find a lot of wild land owned by the former in Northfield. On the way they met, in a chaise, the late Judge Paine, dressed in old English style, with knee-breeches. They built a shanty far in the woods, and cut away the timber. In the fall they built a large log-house, with boards laid on to keep off the storm till it could be finished. One morning when Albert awoke, he found the snow had drifted heavily over his bed, and on it were the tracks of animals, such as sables and weazels. Trees were marked by the axe to help find the way, and when belated at night one of these had to be found in the dark. Then one of the party would remain at it till some other should be found nearer home. Once a pair of oxen strayed away, and Albert traveled a month in search, going first to Hartland, where they were bought. They were found in Calais, where they had been raised. Mrs. Stevens visited the family in the fall, bringing her own handiwork in winter clothing. She came to remain in 1821. There was a hollow trec on the land 27 feet in circumference, into which Mrs. S. took six ladies who came to take tea with her. It was afterwards used as a stable for young cattle, etc. Albert worked hard, and helped to clear about 25 acres. He left in 1823, and went to Warren for about 2 years, then returned and settled on 50 acres adjoining his father's lot. While there he husked corn for Judge Paine where the fountain now is on the common. It was all forest where Central street now is, only one house between the Factory village (now Depot village), and the Center, which was then mostly woods. Only one house was on Cady hill, that of Nathan Green, one on Water street, and none in Factory village except those connected with the factory. A small store was at the Center. Worship was held only at two farm-houses. There was no meeting-house till a year or two later, this name being then exclusively given to all places of worship except Roman Catholic and Episcopal churches.

Mr. Stevens chopped wood for 25 cts. a cord, and hewed timber 8x8, which he sold, delivered, for a cent a foot running measure. In 1826, he was married to Dorothy Stevens, of Warren: lived on clearing till 1829, when he removed to Eden and worked 8 years as carpenter and millwright; built a meeting-house in Eden, and one in Potton, P. Q. About 1832, became sergeant of militia in Lamoille County, and was afterwards promoted through other offices till he was made colonel. He went to Plattsburgh, N. Y., in 1842. When work commenced on the Vermont Central R. R., he returned to Northfield, where he has lived since. He has been bookseller since 1857. When 73 years old, he was asked and consented to do a difficult job of "setting out" for a new building in Sutton, P. Q., which the carpenters of the place were unable to do. Col. Stevens has had three children: William A., born 1827, died 1855; Mary Ann, born 1829, married 1849, and died 1869; Edwin, born 1837, died 1863; wife died 1841.

DOG RIVER VALLEY ASSOCIATION.

In the summer of 1873, a meeting was called to take into consideration the propriety of forming an association to benefit the farmers of Northfield, and it resulted in the formation of the above named society. Oct. 1st and 2d of the same season, the first fair was held, on Frank W. Gold's trotting park, known as the "Dog River Valley Fair," which was so great a success that they have been continued each year since. It proved that the resources of Northfield and vicinity were equal to the occasion. Calling in the aid of Williams-town, Brookfield, Braintree, Roxbury and

Berlin, the Fair was as good as any ever held in the County. Every department was well represented, and Floral Hall was the center of attraction not surpassed by any in the State, and elicited applause from thousands of people.

The officers were: John Gregory, president; Frank W. Gold, Northfield, Geo. Crane, Williamstown, W. C. Clark, Brookfield, William Orcutt, Roxbury, and C. E. Andrews, Berlin, vice presidents; James Morse, secretary; J. F. Davis, auditor; William Winch, treasurer.

After serving as president three years, Mr. Gregory declined a re-election, and J.

H. Orcutt was chosen to fill that position, which he has creditably held since. C. D. Williams is now the acting secretary.

Present Officers.—Royal W. Clark, president; George Denny, vice president; J. K. Edgerton, secretary; Christopher Dole, treasurer.

*Yours very truly,
Geo. Nichols.*

BANKS.

THE NORTHFIELD BANK was chartered by an act of the Legislature, Nov. 23, 1854, with a capital of $100,000. The first meeting for the election of officers was held Jan. 9, 1855; directors: Calvin Ainsworth, Perley Belknap, Reuben Peck, John B. Hutchinson and Alvin Braley. The same day Calvin Ainsworth was elected president by the directors, and H. M. Bates, cashier.

In 1865, at a stockholders' meeting, it was voted to organize the Northfield National Bank, under the laws of the United States. H. C. Ely was appointed assistant cashier in Nov. 1864.

1878, Jan. 8, at the annual meeting, Geo. Nichols, John Lamson, Charles A. Edgerton, J. C. Gallup and J. C. Cady secretary; board of directors, Orvis D. Edgerton, Jasper H. Orcutt, Andrew E. Denny, John P. Davis, Edwin K. Jones. Amount of deposits, $151,861.17.

[From Mr. Gregory's account in 1878. For sketch of Mr. G., see page 622.]

Banks—completed by Joseph K. Edgerton.

NORTHFIELD BANK was organized in 1852, under the general banking law of the State, but did not go into business until after it had, in 1853, received a charter from the Legislature. Its first president was Calvin Ainsworth; second, Perley Belknap; third, Alvin Braley; fourth, Geo. Nichols. The first cashier was H. M. Bates; second, John B. Hutchinson; third, Arthur Ropes; fourth, Henry G. Ely, Fred L. Ely; fifth, Charles A. Edgerton, Jr.

were elected directors, and George Nichols, president; since then, F. L. Ely, cashier, having deceased, Chas. A. Edgerton, Jr., was appointed in his place.

The NORTHFIELD SAVINGS BANK was incorporated in 1867. By close attention to its interests, and an economical administration of its affairs, in 11 years it vies in importance and stability with older institutions in our State. Officers for 1877-78: George M. Fisk, president; George H. Crane, vice president; Jas. C. B. Thayer, trea.; Carlos D. Williams,

GOOD TEMPLARS.

GOULDSVILLE LODGE, No. 166.—The pioneer Lodge of the town, formed Dec. 20, 1871, with 13 charter members, the number just sufficient to obtain a charter. July 31, 1872, the Lodge had a membership of 100. Oct. 11, 1872, notice of the death of Charles Grant,—the first death of a member. Mar. 18, 1873, E. N. Chandler was instantly killed by an engine; also died the same month, Sherman Gold, a charter member, a life-long temperance man; and the same spring, Myra Bowen, a worthy member, died; Jan. 1876, Joseph Gould, an esteemed charter member; December, Ella Simons and Mrs. Harriet Thrasher, sisters.

The highest number of members at any one time has been 139; the lowest since the first quarter 68; and the present membership is 74, in good standing, doing a good work. The Lodge is free from debt, and money in the treasury. As an auxiliary of the Lodge, there is a Juvenile Temple, of over 40 members, mostly children between the ages of 5 and 16, doing a good work for temperance, and in connection with the Lodge, may be considered one of the permanent institutions of the place.

List of Past Worthy Good Templars.—H. H. Perkins, George Carter, A. F. Andrews, Charles F. Beard, H. S. Thrasher, D. R. Fisk, Charles McIntosh, H. L. Rich, E. F. Sisco, H. P. Flint, D. R. Fisk, A. Rich, S. F. Gibbs, Charles Benedict.

MOUNTAIN GEM LODGE, Independent Order of Good Templars, organized Mar. 20, 1873, at South Northfield, the second Lodge of Good Templars in the town; has numbered among its members the best citizens of that part of the town, and has always exerted a good, general moral influence with temperance sentiments. It started with 28 charter members; officers: W. W. Holden, worthy chief templar; Dora L. Holden, worthy vice templar; E. K. Jones, worthy secretary; Harriet E. Jones, worthy assistant secretary; Geo. H. Denny, worthy financial secretary; Martin Cobleigh, worthy treasurer; Wm. Slade, worthy chaplain; Frank S. Mead, past worthy chief templar; F. A. Jones, worthy marshal; Olive A. Howe, worthy deputy marshal; Matilda J. Howe, worthy right hand supporter; Delia Mead, worthy left hand supporter; Elra M. Slade, worthy guard; O. A. Slade, worthy sentinel.

The Worthy Chief Templars since the organization of the Lodge: W. W. Holden, Thomas Slade, E. K. Jones, Martin Cobleigh, E. Kimball, Allen Slade, Herman T. J. Howe, Dan. Derby, Frank W. Gold, Fred A. Jones, Jeff. E. House, Albert Steele, Elra M. Slade, S. P. Orcutt and F. E. Steele.

Worthy Vice Templars, Dora L. Holden, Elva M. Steele, Harriet E. Jones, Carrie Cobleigh, Celia Gold, Nellie Kimball, Emma A. Wright, Aurora M. Edson, Clara Cobleigh, Anna Fuller, Etta Briggs, Susie Jones, Abbie Kimball, Anna Jones and Roxana Orcutt.

The Lodge deputies have been: Thos. Slade, W. W. Holden, S. P. Orcutt and Dan. Derby.

The following have been delegates to the Grand Lodge: W. W. Holden, E. K. Jones, S. P. Orcutt, Thomas Slade and Dan. Derby.

The Lodge now numbers about 50 members. It is numerically the smallest Lodge of the town, but it has always numbered among its members more of the eligible inhabitants of its jurisdiction than either of the other Lodges; and, although its field of labor has not been as hard as the others, yet it has done a good work.

SONS OF TEMPERANCE. Central Division, No. 80, instituted Feb. 16, 1858, had its day of working good in Northfield in the cause of temperance. The best minds in this town were its warmest supporters, but, like other benevolent associations for the suppression of vice, it declined, and gave way to more preferable organizations, but its existence was a blessing to many, and it deserves honorable mention in our temperance record. It died out.

CARSWELL TEMPLE OF HONOR, was instituted Dec. 28, 1868; the expense of running it seemed too high for those in moderate circumstances.

NORTHFIELD LODGE, No. 175, Independent Order of Good Templars, was organized in the village of Northfield, at Concert Hall, Apr. 3, 1873, by Col. John B. Mead, of Randolph, Grand Worthy Chief Templar, assisted by Rev. E. Folsom, Deputy Grand Worthy Chief Templar for Washington County, and by large delegations from the Lodges at Gouldsville and the South Village.

Over 100 names were on the application for a charter, and 80 presented themselves for initiation on the evening of institution. Starting with so large a membership, comprising many of our best citizens and representing all branches of industry, it stepped at once into the front ranks among the lodges of the State, and in Jan. 1875, it had a membership of 201, making it the banner lodge of the County and of the State, which position it has since held.

The largest membership was in Aug. 1877, when it numbered 290 members in good standing. At the occasion of its fifth anniversary the report shows that there had been initiated into the lodge over 500 members. One-half that number have severed their connection with the lodge by removals, withdrawals, etc., leaving the present number 250. In Jan. 1875, this lodge, assisted by the cotemporary lodges of the town, entertained the Grand Lodge of the State, and in January, 1879, will again have the same pleasure. The officers at the organization of the lodge were: Frank Plumley, worthy chief templar; Altha Dutton, worthy vice templar; Ladoit Derby, worthy secretary; Mrs. L. W. Avery, worthy financial secretary; L. W. Avery, worthy treasurer; J. F. Davis, worthy chaplain;

S. B. Spaulding, worthy marshal; Hattie Clifford, worthy deputy marshal; Lizzie Knapp, worthy guard; H. W. Davis, worthy sentinel; Mrs. L. L. Plumley, worthy right hand supporter; Clara Maxham, worthy left hand supporter; A. R. Savage, lodge deputy.

Succeeding Worthy Chief Templars.—Rev. R. A. Greene, Frank Plumley, J. F. Davis, O. D. Edgerton, Dr. P. D. Bradford, L. W. Avery, W. H. H. Claffin, Dr. W. H. Bryant, C. M. Johnston and F. R. Bates.

Representatives to Grand Lodge—1874, A. R. Savage, Frank Plumley; 1875, W. H. H. Claffin, Ella Dutton; 1876, O. D. Edgerton, Mrs. L. W. Avery, Washington Coburn; 1877, J. F. Davis, C. M. Johnston, Mrs. Carrie Smith; 1878, Rev. A. B. Truax, Dr. W. H. Bryant, Mrs. W. H. H. Claffin.

Members of the Lodge honored by the Grand Lodge—1874, F. Plumley, alternate delegate to right worthy grand lodge; 1874, A. R. Savage, district deputy for Washington County; 1875 and since, F. Plumley, grand worthy secretary, by annual elections; Mrs. F. Plumley, assistant grand secretary two years; 1876, O. D. Edgerton, member finance committee 3 years; 1876, Mrs. L. W. Avery, delegate to right worthy grand lodge; 1877, C. M. Johnston, assistant grand secretary; 1877, O. D. Edgerton, delegate to right worthy grand lodge; 1877, J. F. Davis and Dr. P. D. Bradford, state deputies; 1878, O. D. Edgerton, state deputy; 1878, Rev. A. B. Truax, grand worthy chaplain; 1878, Frank Plumley, chairman; and O. D. Edgerton, served upon special mission committee.

Without giving this lodge more credit than is its due, it may justly be said it has done and is doing a good work in the temperance reformation of the town. The lodge and its members very properly feel a just pride in the position it has taken in the councils of the Grand Lodge, where its influence is by no means inconsiderable.

THE DEGREE TEMPLE, Independent Order of Good Templars.—In 1873, the Degree members of Gouldsville, Mountain Gem, Roxbury, Brookfield and Northfield Lodges organized Union Degree Temple, No. 12, with the following officers: A. R. Savage, degree templar; Helen Flint, degree vice templar; L. N. Miller, degree secretary; Mrs. L. W. Avery, degree financial secretary; J. F. Davis, degree treasurer; A. W. Edson, degree chaplain; H. A. Vose, degree Marshal; Mary Donovan, degree guard; C. Simonds, degree sentinel; Mrs. L. N. Miller, degree assistant secretary; Clara Havens, degree deputy marshal; Mrs. L. W. Avery, degree right hand supporter; Mrs. I. G. Foster, degree left hand supporter.

For a time the meetings were held alternately with the five lodges joined in its institution, but after a while, owing to the inconvenience of traveling, its meetings were permanently established at Good Templars' Hall with Northfield Lodge. On account of the same reasons for the change of place of meetings, most of the members of the other lodges withdrew, and the Temple is now confined largely to Northfield Lodge. There have been about 150 members in all, of which there now remains about 60. The Temple is intermediate between the subordinate and Grand Lodges, and when well sustained and worked, it is quite as enjoyable as anything in Good Templary.

NORTHFIELD JUVENILE TEMPLE, NO. 1.—Not least among our valuable institutions, and means of doing good, is Northfield Juvenile Temple, No. 1. Some of our people, realizing the benefit of a thorough temperance education for our children, met Apr. 3, 1875, in Good Templar's Hall, with Miss Lucy Bradshaw, of Montpelier, then State Superintendent of Juvenile Temple, who organized the first Temple in the State, with 53 members, 15 honorary and 38 children. Rev. R. A. Greene was chosen Superintendent, and held that office nearly 2 years, as long as he remained in town, when Mrs. L. E. Pope was appointed, and served 5 months, until she resigned. Mrs. C. M. Persons was appointed, and has held the office the last year, and is doing a noble work. Their pledge is: "I do most solemnly promise that I will never, so long as I live make, buy, sell, or use as a beverage, any spirituous or malt liquors, wine, beer or cider. I also promise to abstain from the use of tobacco in any form. I also promise that I will never take the name of God in vain, or use profane or wicked words. I also promise to do all I can to honor this pledge by a good example, and that I will obey the laws of the Juvenile Templars.

This Temple has increased in numbers and usefulness, and now has more than 150 members, working zealously for Temperance.—J. Gregory, 1878.

1875-80, F. Plumley, G. W. Sec. of Gr. Lodge of Vt., delegate from Gr. Lodge to R. W. Gr. Lodge, New York, 1880, and Topeka, Kan., 1881. 1882, Dr. N. W. Gilbert, W. C. T. of Northfield Lodge, and A. F. Andrews, of Gouldsville Lodge. Mt. Gem lodge is dead.—F. Plumley.

GEOLOGY.

[A paper on the Geology of this town, by Professor Jackman, late of the Norwich University, from John Gregory's History of Northfield—the portrait to accompany it in this work being contributed by Mr. Atkins of the Argus.]

REMARK.—In accordance with the character of this book as a history of Northfield, the following article is presented in historical form. It, therefore, enters into the bearings of the subject through the successive periods of remote years, and at the same time whatever is introduced pertains to Northfield. For the chronological order, reference will be made to Dana's Geology.

From a long series of critical observations upon the stratified rocks of the earth's crust, and a close study concerning their contained fossils, geologists have pretty uniformly come to the following conclusion, viz. :

That there was a time when no living substance existed upon the globe; when all the earth was under water; and, during ages of this chaos, the oceanic currents at some places wore away the earth's crust, and the resulting detritus, mixed with volcanic discharges, was spread out at other places upon the ocean bed, thereby forming immense stratified deposits to unknown depths. This duration of time is called the Azoic Period, toward the close of which the dry land began to appear, as "mere islets in the great continental sea." (Dana, p. 77.) After this there was a time when life, in its simplest forms, began in the great deep. And during the progress of ages the ocean became filled with animal life, as radiates, mollusks, articulates, and vertebrates. and, in the same manner as above stated, vast stratified deposits, including fossils, accumulated to the depth of some seven miles. (Dana, p. 144.) Further, the earth rose gradually above the water, the dry land became covered with vegetation, and animal life every where abounded. This portion of time is called the Paleozoic Period. After this there was a Mesozoic Period, whose deposits are some 2 miles deep. (Dana, p. 198.) And after this there was a Conozoic Period, whose deposits are some 1½ miles deep. (Dana, p. 244.) And then came the Age of Man, which is now in progress.

During the time pertaining to each of the above grand periods, the earth was many times convulsed, when its crust in some places was raised to mountain masses, and at other places depressed to sea-basins, thus, in a manner, separating those grand periods into several sub-divisions; but the grand divisions, at their closing epochs, were more emphatically marked, as if disturbed by special upheavals of such magnitude that at each time nearly all animal life upon the globe became extinct, then the following period received a new order of beings upon a higher scale of life. In this manner the earth progressed, upward to the Age of Man, and onward to the condition in which we behold it. (Dana.)

At the times and places of these terrestrial disturbances, mentioned above, the volcanic heat became so intense as to metamorphose those stratified deposits: the sand into granite, the clay into roofing slate, and the coral-reefs and shell-banks into marble, etc. (Dana, p. 312.) Further, when these deposits were being broken up by upheavals, the oceanic currents, charged with gravel-drift, ground off their ragged edges, and moved the detritus to other places of deposit. Thus, the continents, from period to period, rose gradually above the water. And now we see the earth with its stratified, out-cropping rocks, well water-worn, even to the top of our highest mountains.

Large portions of the earth's surface are observed to be covered with unstratified deposits, which are confusedly mingled with gravel and boulders; and, sometimes, these deposits are in hillocks of small water-worn stones; as may be seen in Depot village, in the vicinity of School street. Also, on the tops of our highest mountain-peaks, we often see large granite boulders, and other rocks, which must have come from great distances; and, apparently, at a time not very remote in the past. Now the "Glacier theory" fails to account, consistently, for all these appearances; for, were there, west of the Green Mountains, a glacier, or ice-flow, from the North, it would naturally pass through the Hudson Valley opening; but, to suppose that this glacier would turn eastward, climb the western front of the Green Mountains, and, as the "drift marks" indicate, cross Vermont the rough way over hills and valleys, in nearly a horizontal path, is to suppose what involves a dynamical absurdity. If, now, we try the theory that there was a flood like the one described in Genesis (Chap. vii), all appearances at once wheel into a consistent line of argument and are compatible with a complete solution of the mysterious problem; for such a flood would in the polar regions raise from their ancient beds large masses of ice, which had received from mountain ravines gravel and boulders, by means of thaws and glaciers. Also, from the frozen tops of mountains, the ancient masses of accumulated ice would float, thereby tearing off their rocky scalps. These icebergs, moved by wind and current, would drift toward the equator, and on the thawing passage drop their rocky freight upon the submerged land. Further, icebergs, drawing a greater depth of water, would lodge on submerged mountain ridges, and there remain until sufficiently reduced to be pushed over by the elements, thereby making, in their rocky tops, the "drift marks," which are distinctly seen on the heights about Northfield. As our admitted flood should subside, hillocks of water-worn stones would be formed by the thawing of stranded icebergs. Also, sandy terraces, similar to those near the Methodist camp-ground, the fair-ground, and the cemetery, would be formed. (Such terraces have hitherto been placed by geologists in a "Champlain Period.") In fact, to account for the appearances every where seen upon the earth's surface, it seemingly requires what is identically the "flood." But whence came the water to make such a flood? It came in from the ocean, when "all the fountains of the great deep were broken up," as a consequent result of the ocean bed being upheaved and the dry land depressed. Thus the whole earth became again submerged, as it was in the Azoic Period. Further, the subsidence of the flood was caused by the same agency, in returning the continents and ocean beds—possibly in part—to their former conditions. And all this is in complete accordance with admitted principles in the science of Geology.

The "mere islets" of the Azoic Period in the ancient ages of the world, were the first dry land, (Dana, p 77), but the next land which rose out of the sea was the Green Mountains, (Dana, p 92), which is, therefore, about the oldest dry land upon the globe. When the Green Mountains began to show themselves above the water, the Paleozoic formation had in its structure only the Potsdam and Trenton deposits, (Dana, p 80, 91), which now rest on the mountain. As ages advanced the mountains gradually rose out of the ocean to completion, thereby bringing to the surface, in the order of their formation, the successive Paleozoic strata, thus causing an increase of dry land. Hence, from the mountain top eastward, these successive strata have an eastern dip, a western outcrop, and a strike generally parallel to the Green Mountain range. These several outcrops, in the order of their formations, have those of the upper formations considerably to the east of those belonging to the lower formations. Further, in the process of their rising, the Green Mountains were so irregularly pushed up that their stratified structure received many cross-breaks and contortions. The ocean currents then scooped out these cross-breaks and wore off their rough projections, thus grinding down Vermont into a grand system of high mountains and deep valleys. In this condition the Green Mountains finally came up out of the sea, and now present themselves as a kind of High Backbone Ridge, with large vertebral knobs, and long rib-like spurs, extending eastward to the Connecticut valley, and between these spurs flow the vein-like streams, as Black river, Quechee river, White river, etc.

To get a better idea of the stratified formations in the Green Mountain structure, conceive an explorer to walk from the mountain top eastward through Northfield, and to observe the rocks he passes. This person would first walk on the upper surface of some Paleozoic formation, down its dipping slope into Mad River valley, near Waitsfield. Here he would meet the high, out-cropping front of the next formation above, which he would climb and having arrived at its top, where it is called "Bald Mountain," he would find himself 2636 feet above tide-water; but, on Waitsfield Mountain, at the highest point in the road between Waitsfield and Northfield, he would stand 2135 feet above tide-water, and upon a slaty formation of hard greenish stone highly charged with quartz. He would next, on the upper surface of this formation, pass down its dipping slope into Dog River valley at Northfield, where he would find himself 728 feet above tidewater, and 638 feet above the surface of Lake Champlain. The hill north-west of Elmwood Cemetery, 1359 feet, and that just south of South village, 1900 feet above tide-water. Also, he would notice a stratum of light-greenish, talcose slate-rock, well charged with quartz grit, and locally called "jenkstone." It splits freely into desirable thicknesses, breaks handsomely into rectangular forms, and is doubtless a good building stone. For proof see Mr. Jenks' dwelling-house. Next in order he would notice a stratum of lightish-gray micaceous sandstone, locally called "whetstone ledge," from which whetstones, hones, and the like, are manufactured by Wood & Son, and they are said to be good. Proceeding onward, he would meet the high, out-cropping front of the famous slate formation, from which the noted roofing slate are taken by Adams & Co. Having climbed this high front—called Paine mountain—and standing on its top, he would find himself 2435 feet above tide-water, or 1707 feet above the depot, and he would also get a magnificent view with a clear sweep around the whole circumference of the distant horizon. Thence, proceeding onward upon the upper surface of this formation, he would pass down its dipping slope into Berlin Pond valley, where he would meet the out-cropping front of a dark slaty limestone formation. Thence, proceeding over this elevation, he would descend into Williamstown valley, and so on he could travel up and down to the Connecticut valley, and to the sea.

At first sight this traveler would think that the rocky stratification over which he passed stood nearly perpendicular to the horizon; but, on closer inspection, he would discover that what he took for stratification was the slaty cleavage of the rock, which is always nearly perpendicular to the bed of stratification. (Dana, p. 36.)

Now the town of Northfield is on an eastern spur of the Green Mountains, and at the centre of the State; for, by actual estimation, from maps and various surveys, the center of the town and the center of the State are both found to be upon the same town lot. (Lot No. 9 in range 5.

See town map.) The town being thus on the Green Mountains, Northfield farmers cultivate about the oldest land in the world where terrestrial life first began. In fact,

"The dust we tread upon was once alive."—Byron.

Dog river runs through the eastern part of the town in a direction a little east of north, taking in on both sides quite respectable tributaries, which drain the several minor valleys of the town. Thus, by the river, its tributaries, and their great number of feeding springs, the town is well watered. Instead of the surface soil rising abruptly from the banks of the river and brooks, these streams are skirted by handsome narrow meadows and terraced flats, from whose outer limits the ground rises into the highlands in such manner that nearly all the surface, even to the tops of the highest hills, is susceptible of cultivation. There is very little waste land in Northfield. On the river the soil is generally light and sandy, but back from the river, on the upland, the soil is dark, strong and good, suitable for all the crops generally raised in the State. The native timber growth of the town consists of fir, spruce, hemlock, maple, birch, ash, elm, and the like.

BUSINESS IN NORTHFIELD—1882.

BY JOSEPH K. EGERTON.

Dog River runs through the town in a northerly direction, affording many valuable water privileges, most of which are now improved. The East Branch runs from Bennett's Pond, which is on the highland near the Williamstown line. From this pond, when the water is high, a stream runs north to Berlin Pond. Just below the eastern outlet Mr. Edward H. Howes has a saw-mill. The first mill built on that site was put up by Aquillo Jones; soon after Judge Paine built the first mill in town, which was on the same stream, about one mile below. About 2 miles further east, and near South Northfield, this stream unites with a brook which runs from a large pond in East Roxbury. A few rods north of this junction, Geo. H. Fisher has a shingle mill and carriage-shop, and Warren C. Briggs has a blacksmith shop and knife factory, both deriving power from the same water-wheel. About 20 rods north of these shops is a large building occupied by Martin Cobleigh and Geo. W. Kingsbury, for the manufacture of doors, sash and blinds, they having also, across the road, another large building used, in connection with this, as a paint-shop. A few rods further down the stream is a two story building, about 40x60, occupied by L. N. Howe as a chair factory; adjoining this is the grist-mill of Thomas Slade; further down the stream, a few rods, is a small factory used by S. D. Dodge for cloth-dressing and wool-carding, and a little below, W. W. Holden has a shop for the manufacture of coffins, caskets and chairs, the aforesaid comprising all manufacturing establishments now in operation at So. Northfield.

About one mile from the South village, N. W., the east branch unites with the river, the main branch of which runs from Stump Pond, which is partly in Roxbury and part in Northfield. Just below the outlet of this pond, G. B. Andrews has a grist-mill, to which a large part of the inhabitants of Roxbury, and many of Northfield, carry their grain to be ground. A few rods north, Joseph C. Rice has a saw-mill, and just below that stands the carriage-shop of Gilbert R. Andrews. About half way from Andrews' mill to the Harlow Bridge are the ruins of a saw-mill, where in former years, a large amount of lumber was manufactured. No further use is made of the river as motive power till we reach, nearly 4 miles further north, the location of Judge Paine's first woolen factory. The brick building now standing there is occupied by A. F. Spalding as a machine-shop and for the manufacture of pumps; by Newell & Colby for the manufacture of chair stock and fork handles; by Henry R. Bean for the manufacture of fork and broom handles; and by Brown, Denny & Harris for the manufacture of lumber, they having, also, a grist-mill and saw-mill in an adjoining building; about 30 feet north is a large building used for the manufacture of slate, power being carried thereto from the brick building, above named, by belting. About $\frac{1}{4}$ mile further down the stream is the woolen factory built in 1864, by George M. Fisk, now occupied by A. Howarth & Son as a flannel factory, employing about 30 hands; adjoining this, and using the same power, is the extensive machine-shop and foundry, built in — by Perley Belknap, and now occupied by the Ely Foundry Co., and giving employment to about 30 men; about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile further on is the grist-mill of Lewis Wood & Son; a half-mile below we find the ruins of a mill, and near to that the first-class brick building owned by Joseph W. Gould, and occupied by him for the manufacture of woolen flannels. Mr. Gould has one of the very finest establishments of the kind to be found in the county, and gives employment to about 100 people. On Cox brook, which runs into Dog River at Gouldsville, is a very fine saw-mill, owned by John Hornbrook; on Jones Brook, which runs in further up the river, H. M. Cutler has a large lumber mill; on Stevens Brook W. A. Rice has a saw-mill; and on Rocky Brook, Geo. F. Glidden has a large saw-mill. By steam, the Ely Foundry run their machinery in low water times, and the Adams Slate Co. run a derrick by steam-power, for raising stone from their quarry.

has also a steam engine, used for power to run his printing presses, and to heat the building occupied by him. Mr. Richmond publishes The Northfield News, a paper started by him in 1878, now having a circulation of 1200, and also The Vermont Farmer, circulating 2400 copies weekly, which was removed to Northfield from Montpelier in 1881. He prints, also, The Reveille, a monthly periodical, published by the cadets of Lewis College; and The Monthly Reporter, published by C. F. Buswell of Montpelier. In the same building is "The Northfield Insurance Agency," managed by Joseph K. Egerton. Just south of the News Block, above mentioned, is the extensive marble works of F. L. Howe & Co.; 30 feet further south is Central Block, now occupied by Boynton & Moseley, for the sale of meat & provisions; George Nichols, drugs & medicines; A. E. Denny, groceries & hardware; C. Denny & Co., dry goods; Stebbins & Richmond, groceries & provision; G. H. Crane, dry goods; Fred Downing, saloon; Edwin Porter, drugs & medicines; S. P. Grow, boots & shoes; J. N. Johnson, lawyer; F. R. Bates & F. Plumley, lawyers; C. W. Locklin, dentist; the third story of the building in two very fine halls, is occupied by the Masons and the Odd Fellows. West of Central block is Concert hall, capable of seating 500, and over that the Universalist church; further west, a few feet, is Eagle block, occupied by Geo. B. B. Denny, for the sale of clothing; W. A. Blake, groceries; Kenyon & Soper, groceries, crockery & fancy goods; S. F. Judd, groceries; E. O. Thurston, watches & jewelry; D. Bacon, flour, meal & groceries; Hazleton, Kimball & Deering, meat & produce; Mrs. Jones, millinery; W. C. Woodbury & F. N. Carpenter, barbers. Union block, just opposite on the south, is occupied by J. C. B. Thayer, for the sale of clothing; by the Northfield Savings Bank, of which J. C. B. Thayer is Treasurer; Edgerton Brothers, for the sale of merchandize of every description; E. G. Pierce, groceries; Geo. M. Fisk, lawyer; O. S. Cook, leggins & mittens; L. S. Wellington & D. P. Holt, boots & shoes. East of Union Block is R. M. McIntosh, photographic rooms, occupied also by N. W. Gilbert, dentist. West of Union Block is Stevens Block, occupied by A. Stevens, for the sale of books & stationery; T. C. Patterson, boots & shoes; Rene S. Fletcher, millinery; north of Stevens Block is the R. R. Depot, one room of which is occupied by the Northfield National Bank; another room by E. G. Sanborn, for a boot & shoe store; and one by Mrs. M. S. Gilchrist, for the sale of millinery goods; also, the express & telegraph office, by C. A. Webb.

Opposite the Depot, east across the public square, which is about 200x400 feet, is the Northfield House, built by George M. Fisk about 2 years since, on a part of the ground covered by the hotel burned in 1879. It is now kept by W. H. Morris, who keeps also a livery stable; and adjoining this hotel, on the south, is the post-office. A few rods south, on main street, is the Avery Hotel and Livery Stable, kept by L. W. Avery; about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile further south is the tannery owned and occupied by Denny & Smith; a little further south, in what was formerly the Center village of the town, is the general store of John P. Davis, and a blacksmith shop and carriage shop run by R. T. Eastman; and a broom factory by Thomas Averill. On the west side of the river, opposite the Depot, is the C. O. D. store by Darius Thomas; a blacksmith shop by A. Fuller; a coffin and carriage-shop, owned and occupied by G. W. Maxham. A short distance west is the carriage and machine shop of D. Bacon; easterly across the R. R. track, is the carriage shop of A. Mead; the blacksmith shop of A. Gosley & Son; the carriage shop of A. O. Chase; the paint shop of W. R. Bean; and the blacksmith shop of Ai Smith. South a short distance, is the carriage shop of J. B. Shortridge; across the river, is the harness shop of C. B. Gold; and further on a few feet, is Paine's block, occupied by S. W. Steele & Son, tinware & stoves; J. G. Curn, harnesses; E. Huntley, paints & paper; J. L. Abbott, coffins and caskets; N. Huntley, tinware & stoves. The upper part of the building in two large halls, is occupied by the Good Templars and the New England Guards. A little further east, is the paint shop of S. F. Gibbs; the blacksmith shop of J. R. Davis; and the carriage shop of A. C. Chase.

Yours Truly

At Gouldsville is the general store of A. F. Andrews; the grocery and provision store of C. F. Hurley; harness shop of A. H. Brown; and blacksmith shop of Greenwood; a considerable business is done in the manufacture of whetstones by L. Wood & Son and by Geo. S. Richards.

Northfield Circulating Library contains about 1,000 volumes.

There are in town two well equipped Fire Engine companies, of 50 men each, and a Hook & Ladder company of 20 men.

In the quarrying and manufacture of slate stone a very large amount of money was formerly invested. Eleven quarries were opened, at an expense of more than $200,000, nearly all of which would now with good management yield large profits to the manufacturers. The supply of slate is inexhaustible, and in quality equal to the best in the world.

The Adams Slate Co. have been working their quarry successfully since 1869; in 1881, employing 40 men and sending out of town 100 car loads of slate. At the present time, this Co. is at work in the Morris quarry, and expect in 1882, to double the amount of their business.

There is in town a very extensive granite ledge, which was formerly worked in a small way. It is very favorably located for quarrying, but wholly neglected.

There have been 17 saw-mills in Northfield. Of this number 7 are now in operation. At different times 9 grist-mills have been run, and there are now 4 in town. Of woolen factories the town has had 5, of these 3 are now at work. Of wood-shops the town has had a large number, the largest of which, that of the Vt. Manufacturing Co., which had been successfully engaged in the manufacture of chairs for years, was burned in 1877.

Brick-making was formerly an important branch of industry in Northfield, but although there is a plentiful supply of material, very favorably located for the business, nothing has been done in that line for many years.

THEODA P. HOWE

was born in Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 20, 1813. Her parents removed to Norwich, Vt., when she was quite young, and to Northfield in 1835, where she was married to Wm. R. Tucker. She died in 1845, leaving a son and daughter, both residing now (1882), in Washington, D. C. Her first articles for publication were written at Norwich when she was only a child, for the Vermont Enquirer, a paper published at that place. For several years she was a contributor to various Vermont and Boston journals. As her writings were never collected in book form, this piece given is the only one at hand, and is hardly a fair specimen of her poetry: [See Poets and Poetry of Vermont, where the same is published.]

TO AN AUTUMN BOUGH.

Bright autumn leaves, when you I see,
No visions dread my bosom swell;
You wake no sudden thoughts for me,
Though my sad fate you seem to tell.

But late I saw the forest green
Slight waving in the summer air,
But now the changing tints are seen,
Which only autumn forests wear.

And you have faded not more fast
Than she who loved sweet autumn's gloom;
Her moments here will soon be past,
With you she soon will find a tomb.

This bough by some kind hand was sought,
To soothe her on her couch of pain,
And from the favorite grove was brought,
Which she can never see again.

Now would she rest mid sylvan bowers,
Where murm'ring pines their branches wave;
Better are withered leaves than flowers
To strew upon her early grave. T. P. H.

PERLEY BELKNAP.

Simeon Belknap, a native of Connecticut, who had purchased a tract of land in Randolph, returning from which to his former home, was one of those who was so unfortunate as to be taken and carried away captive from the sacking and burning of Royalton, by Lieutenant Horton of the British army, in 1780. He was taken to Canada and held a prisoner of war for 2 years, when he, with some of his companions, managed to escape and return to the States; after which he settled on his Randolph estate, where his son Perley was born in 1807.

Perley married Huldah, daughter of Dr. John Edson of that town, and while still engaged in the foundry business there, at the earnest solicitation of Gov. Paine, embarked in a similar enterprise in Northfield, in connection with some other parties, whose interests in the business he soon purchased, however, and removed to this town for permanent residence about the year 1849. He bought the water power below the old Paine factory, where he established his foundry, and afterwards a machine shop, and taking into partnership his brother-in-law, John H. Edson, they employed from 30 to 50 men for many years. The business of the machine shop was largely the manufacture of water wheels and circular saw and clapboard mills, which were sold in large numbers, and sent to all parts of this country, and some to foreign lands. He also had a grist-mill, built a woolen-mill for other parties to operate, wherein the spindles and shuttles are still running at the present time.

Mr. Belknap was a director in the Northfield Bank from the time of its incorporation until he was elected its President, a position to which he was successively re-elected for 12 or 15 years. He has never held any important civil office, having steadily declined to put himself in the way of political preferment, which used sometimes to be suggested to him by his friends. He has been a large owner of, and dealer in, real estate, consisting of business blocks, mills, houses, farms, &c., some of which are still in his possession, though he has partially retired from active business life.

Mr. Belknap is a very genial, companionable man.

The above was contributed by Dr. Gilbert.

LITERARY CLUBS—1882.

There have been several Shaksperian clubs within the last 12 years. The most recently organized and the only one now holding meetings is called the Salvini Shaksperian Club. It has 16 members; Rev. F. W. Bartlett, president. Meetings, fortnightly.

The Conversational Club is also now in operation, for social and intellectual improvement, and discourses on practical, literary and scientific subjects; membership limited to sixteen. Rev. F. W. Bartlett is president; Rev. Wm. S. Hazen, vice president; C. A. Edgerton, Jr., secretary; Professor Charles Dole, treasurer. Meetings, every two weeks.

The Northfield Debating Club holds also its sessions every week, the members presiding in rotation; secretary, W. F. Baker: 12 members.

THE HEALING WATERS.

BY F. W. BARTLETT.

[The following song, to the air of "Sparkling and Bright," was composed when on a visit to a mineral spring in Northern Vt.]

Come let us abide near the fountain side,
The streamlet of health and beauty,
Where the spring sprites dwell in the charming dell
To dispense their golden booty;
For the precious grains, from the earth's rich veins,
Crown with gems, bright in their glory,
The goblet of health, and of joy and wealth,
Never dreamed of in mythic story.
CHORUS.—Then here's to thee, so true and free,
THY HEALTH—for ours is owing
To the magic grains, which, in our veins,
Are all of thine own bestowing.

Let the Bacchanal dare to love the glare
Of his fire-water, red and glowing,
Where the pale fiend lurks, and his mischief works,
In the seeds of death he is sowing;
But give us the joy without alloy,
Which flows from the cup of healing,
As with finger of light, the spring fay bright
Is the pathway of hope revealing.
CHORUS.—Then here's to thee, etc.

PLUMLEY: additional and correction of page 646, not received in time, by our going to press a day before the time named. First, the name of Mr. Plumley's wife before marriage was Lavinia L. Fletcher; and not Lamina, as before printed from the Northfield History of '78.

In 1876, Mr. Plumley was elected State's attorney for Washington County on the Republican ticket, and again in 1878, holding the office 4 years, and during that time successfully prosecuting many important State cases; among others, Royal W. Carr, and Almon and Emeline Meeker for murder.

VERMONT IN THE REVOLUTION.

BY DR. N. W. GILBERT.

"Glorious old Vermont! she stands
Where freedom's star has never set;
Though dim its light on other lands,
It shines upon her mountains yet."
Thus sang the bard, and thus I sing,
In this my humble offering.

And yet it has been charged that she,
When war his deadly witch broth brewed—
When states were struggling to be free—
Assumed a threatening attitude;
An attitude, in fact, which was Unfriendly to the patriot cause.

But what is patriotism, if
'Tis not persistent, bold defence
Of native mountain, plain and cliff,
By beating back and driving thence,
Each foreign or domestic foe,
Who would our freedom overthrow?

And when the States "cried havoc, and Let slip the cruel dogs of war,"
Vermont's devoted, patriot band,
Already was contending for
That which was vital and supreme—
For principles she could but deem
As far superior to those Which caused the hearts of men to thrill,
Who fought against invading foes,
At Lexington and Bunker Hill,
As were our mountains higher than
Was Bunker Hill, when war began.

For they were fighting to resist
A trilling tax, which was assessed
Upon them, and here lust
They were not hopelessly oppressed;
Save in a moral sense, which must,
Or may, their cause have rendered just.

Our fathers, on the other hand,
A demon's clutches would unclasp;
For roof and altar, house and land,
Were being wrested from their grasp;
And by the self-same parties who
Have conjured up this bugaboo

Of lack of loyalty; who claim
Our fathers would to us bequeath
A traitor's heritage of shame.
I hurl the falsehood in their teeth,
And brand it as alike untrue,
Unjust and most ungenerous too.

Vermont disloyal yet withstand
The shock of many a ponderous blow
From either side; on either hand
A wily and inveterate foe;
The British lion's lordly roar
Resounding through her northern shore,
While from the west and south there came
A horde of thieves and plunderers,
With only their highwayman's claim,
"Your money or your life, good sirs!"—
And Congress, too—from which should come
Relief—to her was deaf and dumb.

What marvel she should entertain—
Before her waning sun should set—
From Hatfield and Lord Germain,
Proposals of armistice? Yet

'Twas nothing but a truce, as she
Was still determined to be free.

On either hand an enemy,
Refusing still her rights to yield,
Her prowess and diplomacy
Were seen and felt in court and field,
While thus alone, in sovereign sway,
She stood, and held the world at bay.

Not only so, with towering crest,
Her narrow boundaries she increased,
By making conquests on the west,
And conquests also in the east;
And these were won without the aid
Of musket or of glistening blade.

Her court at Charlestown being held—
Her western boundary near Malone—
Her foes were thus at length compelled
Her power, if not her rights, to own;
A power too which she dared maintain
Until her rights she should regain.

Nor was she false to freedom when Herself the hunted, threatened prey
Of freedom's friends; for, even then,
She was not idle in the fray;
But points to deeds of valor done
At old "Fort Ti," and Bennington.

My native State! thy history is
To me a heritage of pride—
Which is not dimmed by rivalries—
Whose lustre may not be denied;
For he who runs so plainly reads
The tale of thy heroic deeds.

I sit beneath thy mountains' shades,
And muse upon thy glories now;
I wander through thy glens and glades,
Or stand upon Algonquin's brow,
And look around on shore and wave,
Where never trod the foot of slave.

And on thy verdant slopes I see
The stamp of freedom still impressed—
A prophecy of what shall be
When human nature has been blest
With deeds of love, whose shimmering sheen
No mortal yet has ever seen.

Dr. NORMAN W. GILBERT, born in Morristown, 1830, married Sarah Atwell, of Waterbury, 1854, studied dentistry in Lowell, Mass.; 1858 settled in Northfield;
1867 removed to Montpelier; 1873 to Boston, where, in January, 1877, Mrs. Gilbert died, and soon after the doctor returned to Northfield. He is a graduate of the Boston Dental College.

UNIVERSALIST CHURCH RECORD CON-TINUED.

BY CHARLES DOLE.

Mr. Matlack was followed by the Rev.
R. A. Greene, who remained with the society 5 years, doing good and acceptable work, when, receiving a call from Lowell, Mass., the society reluctantly consented to his removal to what seemed to be a wider field of usefulness. The year succeeding Mr. Greene's departure the society was without a regular pastor. During this year the Rev. John Gregory preached for a few months. The remaining part of the year the services were conducted by clergymen from neighboring societies.

Rev. Wm. M. Kimmell, of Ohio, a young man of Christian worth, was then invited to become the pastor of the church. He accepted, and for 2 years did good and faithful service, closing his labors March 1, 1880.

The church was at this period encumbered with quite a large debt, which had been accumulating for a number of years.
It was not only a source of much trouble, but seriously impaired the usefulness of its work, and its removal became a question of serious importance. This was by the Rev. Walter Dole, who gave his services for one year, that all the money paid in during the year might apply on the church debt. Mr. Dole was a graduate of Norwich University and the Meadville Theological School. This was his first year of active service in the work of the Christian ministry preparatory to ordination. At the end of the year, he was regularly ordained, and accepted a call from the Universalist church at Enfield, N. H.
During this year's work he had removed the debt that had been the source of much trouble, and thus merited and received the sincere thanks and good will of all members of the church and society.

At this date, Jan. 1882, the society is in a prosperous condition, with the Rev. I.
P. Booth as its pastor, who succeeded the Rev. Walter Dole, May 1, 1881.

THE HARLOW BRIDGE TRAGEDY.

Never was there a tragedy in Vermont which equaled the one that took place
Dec. 11, 1867, at "Harlow Bridge." It occurred just after noon, and sent a thrill of horror over the land. About 100 mechanics and laborers employed in rebuilding the "Harlow Bridge" on the Vermont Central railroad, about 2 miles from the depot, were boarding at the Northfield

House. That day they took their dinner there as usual, and this repast finished, the last meal that many of them were ever again to partake, about 60 of them got into a passenger car, and started back for their work. The train, consisting of one car and locomotive and tender, was in charge of Francis B. Abbott, for 15 years a faithful hand in the employ of the road. He was requested to hurry up, so as to get back and take the others, and the train started, backing up. Intent only upon obeying orders, and forgetting all else, he ran at a speed reprehensible under the circumstances. A number on the train felt that they were going to destruction, but nothing was done to stop it, and then came the culmination of this horrid disaster, which carried mourning and desolation into so many families. It is said that the fireman spoke to the engineer about slackening his speed, and at last hurled a stick of wood at his head, to awake him from his reverie, telling him to reverse his engine, which he did, but too late. The passenger car first plunged into the frightful abyss. Going down about 25 feet it struck upon the bank, which projected something like a shelf, and then broke, one part of it stopping there, and one going to the bottom, over 60 feet further. The tender followed, crushing in among those who remained with that portion of the car which lodged on the bank, where the greatest mortality occurred, those going to the bottom escaping comparatively easy. Across those on the shelf a large timber had fallen, and on this the tender, pinning them to the earth and crushing out their very life. The reversing the engine suddenly prevented that from following, although it had gone so far that a perpendicular line dropped from the flange of the driver, carried it 4 feet beyond the abutment. Affrighted, the engineer jumped from his post, but seeing his engine did not go over he at once regained his position, and thus prevented the machine from tearing down the road with the velocity of a scared bird, with no one to control it.

Killed: Almon Wetherbee, foreman of bridge gang; Christopher Devine, laborer; Patrick Garvin, laborer; Edward Sweeney, trackman; Timothy McCarty, trackman; Louis Rock, bridge builder, citizens of Northfield, and 9 others killed, most of whom lived in Canada.

Wounded: George Randall, telegraphist; Horace Kingsbury and J. Mulcahey, citizens of Northfield, and 35 from this State and Canada.

COL. FRANCIS V. RANDALL was born in Braintree, in Orange County, Feb. 13, 1824. His father, Gurdon Randall, was of English origin, born in Connecticut, and emigrated with his father's family to the new State of Vermont in 1803, when about 9 years old; was reputed a man of excellent parts, and succeeded in acquiring more than an ordinary education for those times, and studied medicine, which, however, he never practiced, it not being congenial to his tastes. He had a natural aptitude for mechanics, and had the reputation of building as good grist and saw-mills as the best. He moved from Braintree to Northfield in 1832, where he lived mostly until he died in 1861. [See page 645.]

Col. Randall's mother was Laura Scott Warner, the daughter of Luther Warner, a near relative of Col. Seth Warner. She was born in Putney, and moved to Braintree with her father's family when a small girl. She died in Northfield in 1880. No more need be said of her than that she raised a large family of children under somewhat adverse circumstances, and did it well. She was emphatically a good wife and mother.

Col. F. V. Randall was the second of a family of 9 children, and being thus one of the oldest, in those rugged times had to lend a hand in assisting in the support of the family, and at 20 years had had no school opportunities beyond the district school, with such additional aid as his father could find occasional opportunities to give. At his 20th birthday his father informed him that his means would not admit of his helping him to obtain an education, and that all he could do would be to give him the year of his unexpired minority, which he did. From that time he worked and kept school a few months at a time until he had earned money to take him through a term at the academy, expended it for that purpose, and then earned more, and so on, as many another boy has done before and since.

At about the same time, he entered as a student at law in the office of the Hon. Heman Carpenter, of Northfield, and improved all of his vacations in this way. While studying with Judge Carpenter, he boarded in his family, and a part of the time did chores to pay for his board. In 1847, being 23 years old, he was admitted to Washington County Bar, and went immediately into a large and successful practice, which he only abandoned to go into the army at the outbreak of the Rebellion. I think Washington County Court docket shows that but one or two lawyers in the county had a larger practice than he did at that time.

He first commenced practice in Northfield, where he remained until 1857. From 1853 to 1857 he was postmaster there. While in practice there, Albert V. H. Carpenter was his law partner for awhile, and afterwards Col. Chas. H. Joyce. In 1857, he sold out at Northfield with the intention of moving West, and moved to Roxbury, where he had some real estate interest, intending to remain long enough to close his business preparatory to going West.

Just before the fall election it was proposed to him by leading members of the Democratic party, to which he belonged, to run for town representative. He informed them that his residence in town had hardly been a year, the constitutional time required, and that if elected he probably could not hold his seat. The town was very closely divided in its vote politically, and it was thought as things then stood that he was the only Democrat who could win, and that it would be more gratifying to succeed at the polls than to be defeated, even if his seat should be successfully contested, and so he was nominated. The first ballot showed a tie between him and his whig opponent, but on a subsequent ballot he was declared elected, and received his credentials and took his seat. It was however contested, and having retained it in the controversy till toward the close of the session, he was ousted. During this time he was on several important standing and other committees; was the Democratic candidate for Speaker, running against Senator Edmunds. The next year, having remained in Roxbury, he was again elected representative by a large majority, and his seat was not contested. In 1860 he moved to Montpelier, the better to pursue his largely increasing law practice.

In 1858, the legislature having organized a militia brigade in the State, consisting of a regiment from each congressional district, Gen. Alonzo Jackman was appointed Brigadier General, and in making up his staff, Col. Randall was made Brigade Judge Advocate, and in that year the brigade mustered at Montpelier, and Col. Randall was present in his official capacity. When three years after the town of Montpelier raised a company for the 2d Vt. Regt. in the Rebellion, this was remembered by some, and after, at a war meeting during the extra session of the legislature, it was found that more than enough men for the company had enlisted in a single evening. Col. R. was asked to take charge of and drill them. He reluctantly consented to do so, and when finally on the organization of the company, he received every vote for captain, he was persuaded to accept the position, with the expectation and belief that the war would not continue 6 weeks. With that company he served as captain, having been with it at the first Bull Run battle, and all the battles that followed till the close of McClellan's Peninsula Campaign, when he was made Col. of the 13th Regt., and served with that during its term of service. The Governor then offered him the command of the 17th Regt., then being recruited, which he accepted, assisting in filling up the regiment, and serving with it to the end of the war. Col. Randall was the only man from the State who was colonel of two regiments.

In the winter of 1863-'4, after the President's call for 300,000 men, known as the call of October 17, 1863, at the request of Gen. Washburn, then Adjutant General, and charged with the raising of men, Col. Randall was detailed to assist by addressing war meetings in different parts of the State, his appointments to speak being made by Gen. Washburn in those localities where recruiting was hardest and where they were most behind. Many amusing anecdotes are told of the shifts which the Colonel made to induce men to enlist, which space will not permit us to insert. But during that winter he spoke at about 50 war meetings all over the State, and at no place where he spoke did they fail to fill their quota, and generally before the meeting was closed.

At the close of the war he returned to Montpelier, where for about 6 or 8 years he pursued his law practice with much success; but the interruption of the 4 or 5 years that he was out of practice during the war diminished his interest in his profession, and for several years he has not made it a leading business, having done very little at the law, but has cultivated his farm without engaging much in other business.

PAPER ON EARLY METHODISM IN NORTH-FIELD.

BY REV. J. R. BARTLETT.

The earliest records now known on the history of Methodism in this section, are those of the Barre Circuit from 1804; quite incomplete, but show the class in Northfield possessed some 20 or more members at that time. The list reads: William Keyes, Betsey Keyes, William Ashcroft, William Smith, Abel Keyes, Esther Keyes, Mary Smith, Susanna Latham, Joseph Nichols, Weltha Nichols, Lydia Robinson, Betsey Robinson, Cynthia Nichols, Polly Smith, Isaiah Bacon, Ruth Bacon, Ananias Tubbs, Hannah Tubbs, Simeon Fisk, Betsey Fisk. In 1812, three classes were reported. Jason Winch leader of one with 9 members, William Keyes leader of another with 23; and the third having no stated leader, but 6 members, and two on trial; Asa Winch recorded as an "exhorter" and resident at Northfield. This town was included in Barre circuit until 1826, when Brookfield circuit was organized, including Brookfield, Northfield, Williamstown, Roxbury and Randolph.

Doubtless all the preachers appointed on Vershire circuit from 1796 to 1803, inclusive, and on Barre circuit from 1804 to 1825, visited Northfield in the course of their labors at stated intervals to preach; and quarterly meetings, which in the early days were attended from all parts of the circuit, were held here from time to time. The first one recorded here was May 23, 1807; the collections reported $78.48 for the quarter, and the summary for the year $148.45. This was disbursed: to E. Sabin, presiding Elder, $24.72; for communion wine, $4.68; to Philip Munger, $54.67; for his expenses, $3.82; and the same to Jonathan Cheney, do. The preachers afterwards received (during the remainder of the Conference year) $13.35 additional, in which was included a note from the class in Orange for one dollar. Following the organization of Brookfield circuit in 1826, this town remained therein until it became an appointment by itself. The Vermont Annual Conference has held its sessions here; June 24, 1852, the 8th annual session, Bishop Levi Scott presiding; Apr. 16, 1862, the 18th annual session, Bishop O. C. Baker presiding; Apr. 20, 1871, the 27th annual session, Bishop E. S. Janes presiding.

THE OLD YELLOW MEETING-HOUSE, (page 649 and 658), seems to be the butt for joke and mistake, though passed out of existence. First, page 649, a superfluous "was" crept in, and did not get excluded. Line 2d, inclosed paragraph after "Impromptu" should read: "that was soon however burned." Again, the old yellow meeting-house was not burned at all. Father Druon has just sifted the conflicting accounts, and given us the reliable one. "Gov. Paine had given land to the Catholics for a church if occupied; if not, they lost it; hence, when they bought the old meeting-house, they had to move it 1½ mile to the given site, which so racked the frame, and it was so much too small, though they remodeled it and got along with it some 3 years, Father Druon then commenced to build a new church directly in front of the old, and the new frame, partly inclosing in the rear the old one; which as the new progressed was cut away part at a time, and when the new one was finished, the last fragment of the old house had been removed, and so no part of it was in fact burned; but the new one, which was the second church, was burned by lightning in 1876.

*Respectfully,
N. Carpenter.*

NATHANIEL CARPENTER, OF MIDDLESEX.
BY HON. HEMAN CARPENTER, OF NORTHFIELD.

Nathaniel Carpenter, one of the early settlers of Middlesex, was born in Coventry, Conn., Sept. 20, 1766. He was one of a family of 12 children. His father and family moved to Sharon, Vt., about 1775. His oldest brother, Jonas Carpenter, was in the American army, and was at the taking of Cornwallis at Yorktown. He married for his first wife Susanna Shepherd, of Sharon, and by this marriage had 3 children: Lavinia was born June 21, 1788, and died Aug. 21, 1865; Stephen was born May 23, 1790, and died Dec. 30, 1803; Alanson was born Jan. 30, 1793, and is now living in Fremont, Ohio. Their mother died May 29, 1794. Said Nathaniel married for his second wife, Abigail (Morse) Waterman, March 26, 1797. They had by their marriage 9 children: Christopher, Susan, Wooster, Nathaniel M., Don P., Heman, Otis H., Fidelia, and Albert V. H., four of which are now living—Alanson, Nathaniel M., Heman, and Albert V. H. The father of these children held many prominent offices in said town of Middlesex, and he and his son Alanson were in the battle of Plattsburg in the war of 1812.

Nathaniel Carpenter died at Middlesex, Nov. 25, 1840; his wife Abigail, Sept. 21, 1842, and is buried in Middlesex, aged 65 years, 9 months, and 19 days.

The mother of these 9 children was born in Royalton, daughter of Nathaniel Morse. At the burning of Royalton by the Indians, her mother was fleeing on horseback from the invaders, with her in her arms, and was captured and seated on a log, the Indians brandishing their tomahawks over their heads. They left them, but took the horse, burning their house and barns, and the contents, including several fat oxen in the barns.

Alanson, the youngest by the first wife, read law and located at Chateaugay, Franklin Co., N. Y. He was custom-house officer at that place for many years. He now resides in Fremont, Ohio.

Christopher studied medicine, and graduated at the medical school in Burlington, and located at Bangor, N. Y., where he died. He had a very extensive ride, and was very successful in his practice.

Wooster studied medicine with his brother, and graduated at Burlington or Castleton medical college, and located at Lisbon, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y. He had a large and successful practice, but died poor, having become involved in debt in his efforts to build and complete a stone church in the small village where he resided, which was dedicated to "The Church," as he called it, of which he was a zealous communicant.

Don P. was a farmer, but held many offices in his native town; was a member of the Legislature in 1848, and twice elected side judge of the county court.

Nathaniel M. was a farmer, and now lives in Middlesex.

Otis H. was a blacksmith by trade, and at the breaking out of the gold fever in California, he with a party went over land to the gold regions of that State, and on the way suffered all but death. Having gathered a competence, he returned and settled in Manitowoc, Min., where he died.

Albert V. H. fitted for college at the Washington Co. Grammar School, read law in the office of his brother in Northfield; set up in Strafford, Orange Co., where he remained two or three years, and returned to Northfield. He was a well-read lawyer, and a good advocate, but if beaten in a case that he thought he ought to have won, he became disgusted with the profession, for the lack of "pluck," and turned his attention to railroading. He was station agent at Rouses Point a while, and at Montpelier, and at Toledo, Ohio, and is now, and for nearly twenty years has been general ticket agent of the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway, embracing nearly 4,000 miles of road. His residence is at Milwaukee, Wis. He is well known throughout the North West, and many Vermonters will remember the kind greeting they have received from him, and the friendly aid he has extended to them.

PERRY MARSH

was born in Petersham, Mass. Aug. 7, 1796. His parents removed to Calais, Vt., when he was about 4 years old, drawing the subject of our sketch on a hand-sled from Montpelier to their new home in that town. When Perry was still a boy, he enlisted as a fifer in the war of 1812. At the close of the war he returned to his home and to civil pursuits, residing in Calais until 1836, when he came to Montpelier and engaged to some extent in the manufacture of pianos, which he continued several years, and then removed to Stowe; from which place, near 20 years ago, he came to Northfield. He was then approaching his three score years and ten, and has passed here, in a quiet, unobtrusive fashion, his declining years, during which he has become widely known through his favorite pastime of playing his fife. He was a good player of some other wind instruments, but especially attached to this, an account of which, immediately after his death, Sunday, Feb. 4, 1882, Dr. Gilbert wrote the following tribute to:

THE OLD FIFER.

BY DR. N. W. GILBERT.

Did ever you hear the old fifer play
The martial music he loved so much—
The shrill notes which, for many a day,
Have answered oft to the magic touch
Of his wrinkled fingers, long and lean,
Yet losing none of their old-time skill
In conjuring up from the realms unseen
The fairy forms of the master's will?
I say that his fingers were lean and long,
But the finger of time had made them so,
As they were supple, and full and strong
In the halcyon days of the long ago;
For now it is three score years and ten—
The time allotted to human life—
Since Uncle Perry—a stripling then—
Began to play the inspiring fife,
Or rather, since he, at about sixteen—
Already well tutored and drilled therefor—
His knapsack on, with his tin canteen,
Marched off to play in impending war.
His tin canteen, but he never would sip
From the poisonous fluid the government then Unwisely held to the thirsting lip,
And the hungry palate, of brave young men.
Where strife was raging and hearts beat high,
With dauntless courage that would not yield,
He helped to win, on the fourth of July,
The bloody encounter on Chippewa's field;
Then chasing the foe to Niagara's shore,
He there still mingled his patriot strain
With the booming of guns and the catracts' roar,
At the subsequent battle of Landy's Lane.
When war was over, the fifer returned
From scenes of carnage and scenes of strife,
But still in his bosom there glowed and burned
A quenchless love for his martial life.
In age or in youth it was ever the same—
He awaited the ears in his rustic seat,
To Carol his welcome to all who came,
And repeated his airs in the neighboring street.

On an empty box by the grocery store
 He sat in the sun and fided away,
 As if he imagined himself once more
 Encouraging men to the deadly fray;
 Or as if, perchance, in a milder mood,
 He wondered if ever grim war would cease;
 And whether his art would still be wooed
 In the tranquil reign of the Prince of Peace.

When age and feebleness held him fast,
 Three days before the grim visitor came
 To bring him the summons which comes at last,
 He called for his life, as the fleeking flame
 Flashed up once more, and his heart grew strong,
 His fingers resumed their cunning and skill,
 The notes were clear, which he couldn't prolong,
 And now they are silent; his pulse is still.

The railroad vehicles come and go,
 The old sledge hammer still sounds the wheels,
 But Uncle Perry sleeps under the snow;
 And the heart instinctively, pensively feels
 The force of the truth that 'tis all men's doom
 That mortals approach to the "farther shore;"
 The spring shall come and the flowers shall bloom,
 But the merry old fifer may come no more.

MAJOR CHARLES A. WEBB, U. S. A., son of Edward A. Webb, now of Chicago, Ill., born in Montpelier, Dec. 29, 1838, was removed to Northfield at 10 years of age. He assisted his father in his store and tin-ware business, and later in the management of the "Northfield House," of which his father was proprietor. He joined the old New England Guards, commanded by Capt. S. G. Patterson, at its organization, and in April, 1861, entered the service as 1st Lieut. Co. F, 1st Vt. Reg., 3 months; was commissioned, Aug. '61, Capt. 13th Reg. Inf.—Gen. Sherman's old regiment—and for gallant conduct at Vicksburg, breveted Major, Sept. 21, '66; transferred to 22d Reg. Inf., and commissioned Major of the 16th Inf. Mar. 4, '79.

Following close the termination of the rebellion, he was for a time engaged in the campaigns against the Indians. Recalled to garrison life, was stationed at several Eastern forts, Fort Mackinaw, on Lake Superior, Fort Wayne, etc. Upon the breaking out of disturbances in the Ute reservation, resulting in the "Meeker massacre," he was ordered from Fort Riley, Kansas, to the scene of hostilities, and from there transferred to Texas. His long experience in Indian warfare peculiarly fitted him for border service. As a military officer he exhibited marked ability.

In 1879, while stationed at Fort Mackinaw, he married Mrs. Rose Disbrow, a lady of culture and social accomplishments, who, with an infant daughter of four months, survives him. He died from congestion of the lungs, at Fort McKavett, Texas, at midnight, Jan. 31, 1882, in his 44th year.

Many in Northfield and vicinity will remember Charley Webb, and regret his very unexpected death. Under a southern sky, away from friends and all the loved places of his youth, he finds his last resting-place.—Northfield News.

DR. BRADFORD'S CABINET.

This is one of the most unique private cabinets in the State. First, here is the ballot-box used at the first town meeting in Northfield, and the communion table of "the Old Yellow Meeting-house" (See page 648, 654), oval, one-leaf, of cherry; and two turn-up tables—a chair and table combined—in vogue some 60 to 70 years ago, a convenient and pretty piece of furniture; as a chair, the oval-board of your centre-table, when you have finished your tea and want the room it occupies, turned back, forms a stout warm back to a comfortable chair, that under the board of the table has been doing the office of supporting your supper table till you were ready for your rest by the evening hearth. We rather coveted one of the Doctor's turn-up tables. It is the first thing we should pick from his "antiquettes," unless it were some of the old painted deft and china with which one of the "turn-ups" is loaded down—odd pitchers, quaint little cups, cunning creamers, teapots, and sugar-bowls; plates—pewter, wood and earthen. We pass the good show of pewter—platter, porringer and tankard for white earthen—once was—a greenish-yellow white now, very old plate with perforated rim, various-shaped little holes four or five deep in the rim, running around it in a wreath; or for one of the pretty pitchers, with raised groups of figures on either side. Many a little bric-a-brac lies on these and the tables around the room—a mouse-trap, half the size of a woman's hand, averred "200 years old, and caught the first mouse that ever lived in Connecticut," antique wedding slippers—the Doctor's mother's, 80 years old and more; knee-buckles, button-moulds, spoon-moulds, the great horn-spoon; Mrs. John Averill's wrinkled, old 3-quart wooden pail—crackly paint—faded, crinkled, wood beginning to crumble, "200 years old; the old earthen pepper-box, with cork in the bottom and top, that does not fall off; a small reed for weaving hair-sieves; a minute hair-sieve. Ah, me! the little necessities once, a few years ago the "nothings of the garret," the pet of the cabinet now. "That old flint gun went through 1812;" that drum was "captured from the British in the battle of Bunker Hill, went through the Revolutionary war, the war of 1812, and the last war, and good for another fight."

There are three cases of minerals; one large case of lovely specimens in coral from the West Indies; one or more tables with West India curiosities; carved sailer-work in wood, done at sea, etc.; foreign curiosities, loaned or placed in the cabinet by Mrs. H. H. Walling, the Doctor's step-daughter; sea-feathers or ferns—of coral—sea-spiders clinging to, on the walls; centre-table of the cabinet laid with old blue and parti-colored crockery, Chinese umbrella over—on, old tin candelabra, with eleven candles; opposite wall with hanging cupboard; bottled curiosities—horrible lizards! a tape-worm 110 feet—It is a Doctor's cabinet—a hideous young alligator under the table; yonder, far more agreeable drawers, with about 700 Indian relics, arrow-heads, spear-heads, gouges, battle-axe, etc., from Orange Co. mostly, and from Michigan; belt of wampum in the window; not to mention spinning-wheels, cards, and the necessary implements for home manufacture of wool and flax.

I also noticed a piece of old English plate and-glass, a table-castor, its base decorated with pretty raised flowers in the silver, that belonged to the late Rev. Dr. Edward Bourns—was his mother's; a West India sword of intermingled shark-teeth and fibre of wood; wooden trenchers, tin dinner-horn, large ball-head andirons, the pleasantly-remembered, old, perforated tin lantern swinging overhead, like one my father carried when I was a child. We have no more time to rummage, but I wish every town in the State had some cabinet for both its natural and its old-time curiosities.

MOSES LANE—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 633.

From 1878 to 1881, he was Engineer in charge of constructing the new system of water supply for New Orleans, the sewerage system of Buffalo, of Pittsfield, Mass.; was a member of the commission appointed by the city of Memphis after the yellow fever scourge, to perfect the drainage. The whole city sewerage plan was changed, and Memphis, in the opinion of eminent engineers, made one of the healthiest cities of the Union. He was consulting engineer for St. Louis and Boston; in Boston the originator of the great plan of sewerage being perfected there, which has attracted the attention of eminent engineers throughout the world. Mr. Davis, assistant to Mr. Lane, made out the plans, but for the grand idea was indebted to Mr. Lane. He suffered an apoplectic stroke, and died two weeks after, Jan. 25, 1882. He leaves a widow, three daughters and one son. He was a natural gentleman, always courteous and agreeable, and one of the oldest, best known and esteemed members of the American Society of Civil Engineers.—Milwaukee and Republican News.

PLAINFIELD.

BY DUDLEY B. SMITH, M. D.

Plainfield is a small township, which contained, before the annexation of Goshen Gore, about 9,600 acres. Its surface was uneven, but no more so than the average of Eastern Vermont. It contained but little waste land, and was upon the whole a productive township.

Goshen Gore, by Plainfield, was about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles long by $1\frac{1}{2}$ wide, lying east of Plainfield, and containing 3,000 acres. But very little of it is suitable for tillage. At one time it contained several families, but now has none. It formed a part of the town of Goshen until 1854.

It was annexed to Plainfield in 1874. It was embraced in the Yorkist town of Truro, and its highest mountain, which is called from that circumstance Mt. Truro, was measured by the writer, and found to be 2,229 feet above Plainfield station, or about 2,984 feet above the sea.

Winooski river flows about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile through the north-western corner of the town. Soon after it passes the line into Plainfield, it runs through and over a ledge of rocks, making an excellent mill privilege, around which has grown up the village of Plainfield.

The Great Brook rises in the eastern part of the town, and in Harris Gore, passes into Orange and returns, flowing northerly through the town, and enters the Winooski in Plainfield village. Gunner's Brook is a small stream, that rises in the southern part of the town, and empties into Stevens' Branch in Barre village.

In the southern part of the town on the banks of the Great Brook, is a medicinal spring, which is very efficacious in the cure of cutaneous and other diseases. Its virtues are largely owing to the presence of sulphuretted hydrogen gas.

The town of Truro, which was chartered by New York, contained 22,000 acres. Its form resembled a carpenter's square, each limb being a little over 3 miles wide, and on its outer or longest side, nearly 6 miles long. The northern part of what is now Barre formed the southern limb. The eastern part of Plainfield, with a corner of Orange, the eastern or northern limb. The western part of Plainfield, with Montpelier and East Montpelier, was embraced in the town of Kingsboro, and contained 30,000 acres, and was chartered to John Morin Scott.

In 1773, Samuel Gale commenced the survey of one or both of these townships, and this was the first party of white men known to have passed through Plainfield. [For a biography of Gale see Hall's History of Eastern Vermont, p. 643.] In Ira Allen's History of Vermont he says: "In the summer of 1773, Ira Allen, learning that the land jobbers of New York were engaged in surveying near the head of Onion River, started with a party from Colchester in pursuit of them. He passed through Middlesex, Kingsboro and Moretown to Haverhill, when learning of the whereabouts of the surveyor, he returned and found his lines, which he followed to near the north-east corner of Montpelier, where he found the surveyor had just decamped, having been warned, he supposed, by a hunter Allen had met. According to Allen's field book the surveyor's camp was on a meadow near the north-east corner of the old town of Montpelier. Kingsboro was the Yorkist name for Washington. Moretown, or Moortown, is now Bradford, and not the present town of that name.

Allen then passed through Barre and Washington to Bradford, and returning with a knowledge of where the surveyor was to be found, passed through Plainfield on his return. As the line between Truro and Kingsboro passed nearly through the center of Plainfield, a large part of Gale's surveys must have been in this town. John Morin Scott, the grantee of Kingsboro, was a member of the New York

Legislature in the Revolution, and on account of his ownership of this town, was made a member of the New York council of safety, to represent this section of Vermont. He received $49.91 of the $30,000 which was paid by Vermont to New York to indemnify the New York claimants.

In Aug. 1788, James Whitelaw, of Ryegate, James Savage, of New York, and William Coit, of Burlington, caused the tract of land lying between Barre and Marshfield, Montpelier and Goshen Gore, to be measured and the bounds marked, and at that time or before, it received the name of St. Andrew's Gore.

They also measured a gore near Cambridge, of 10,000 acres, one near Caldersburg, now Morgan, of 1,500 acres, some islands in Lake Champlain, containing 1,500 acres, also islands in Otter Creek, containing 30 acres, making 23,030 acres, or about the usual size of a township, St. Andrew's Gore being reckoned at 10,000 acres. These tracts were never incorporated into a town; like Goshen, which was composed of widely separated portions. The different parts of Whitelaw's grant, as it was called, had no connection with each other.

The charter of these lands was granted Oct. 23, 1788. In 1788, '90 and '92, Whitelaw, Savage and Coit deeded their claims to Ira Allen, of Colchester, brother of Ethan, and to Gamaliel Painter, of Middlebury, the chief founder of Middlebury College. Allen and Painter gave a verbal agency to Col. Jacob Davis, of Montpelier, who, upon this authority, in May, 1793, began giving warrantee deeds of these lands in his own name. The following letter is recorded in the Plainfield land records:

MIDDLEBURY, Apr. 5, 1795.

Sir:—On my return from your home, I called on General Allen. He seems to think that it would be altogether guess-work to divide the land without seeing of it, but agreed that I might sell adjoining to the land sold sufficient to make up my part reckoning of it in quantity and quality. And I wish you to sell to any person that wants to purchase and make good pay. You know my want in regard to pay better than I can write, and for your trouble in the matter, I will make you satisfaction.

I am, sir, Your most obedient,
Humble servant,
GAMA. PAINTER.

This letter proves that Allen and Painter then recognized Davis as their agent to sell and to convey; for no deeds had then been given by Allen or Painter to any one, under their own signature and seal. One of the old settlers claimed that once when Ira Allen was in Plainfield, he asked him to give him a deed of a lot that he had bargained for of Davis, and that Allen said, "Let Davis give the deed, he has the rest."

At last differences arose between Davis and Allen, and in 1799, Davis ceased to act as their agent, and sued Allen before the county court at Danville, and in 1804, recovered $2,500 on this suit, and a part of the town was set off to him on this execution, and Davis from Burlington jail-yard conveyed it over again to those to whom he had previously given deeds. About the same time the University of Vermont recovered $15,000 of Ira Allen, and the remainder of the town was set off to them. To strengthen their title, Davis and the settlers twice allowed nearly all of the town to be sold for taxes, once on a State tax, and once on a U. S. tax, each man bidding off his own farm.

In 1802, Ira Allen quit-claimed his rights in this town to Heman Allen, of Colchester. This was some 2 years before the lands were set off to Davis and the University on executions against Ira Allen. Davis and the settlers held their own against Heman Allen until Aug. 31, 1807, when Allen purchased the claim of the University, and five days after, deeded the whole to James Savage, of Plattsburg, N. Y. Three days after this, Savage gave Allen a power of attorney to dispose of these lands. This gave Allen, in the name of Savage, an opportunity to commence suits of ejectment against the settlers before the U. S. Courts at Windsor and Rutland. For, by the constitution, citizens of one state may sue citizens of another in the U. S. Courts. Probably the transfer to Savage of this claim was a sham, to enable Allen to bring his suits where the court, and especially the jury, would not have so much sympathy for the settlers as they would in the county where they resided. This trick, if trick it was, decided the contest. In 1808, Allen, in the name of Savage, got a decision of the circuit court in his favor. By a law of 1785, a person making improvements on lands to which he supposed he had good title, had a claim for his betterments, and for one-half of the rise in value of the property while in his possession, that there would have been had there been no improvements. The settlers, therefore, did not have to pay very much more for their lands the second than the first time of purchase; often not more than one-fourth of its value at that time. The price paid to Davis for land from 1793 to 1799 averaged about $1.25 per acre. The price paid to Allen in 1808, for the second purchase, averaged a little less than $3 per acre.

Davis died within the limits of Burlington jail-yard in 1814, having been sent there for debt about the year 1802. As this was several years before the Plainfield suits were decided, it could not have been on account of them that he was sent there.

It is the opinion of Hon. C. H. Heath and others who have investigated the matter, that as the laws are now administered, the settlers would have saved their lands by a suit in chancery; but at that time very little was done in this court, the powers of which have now grown to be so extensive.

It is a singular coincidence, perhaps an example of retributive justice, that in the same year that Jacob Davis died in the jail-yard at Burlington, Ira Allen died in poverty at Philadelphia, where he had gone to escape being imprisoned for debt in the same jail.

In the autumn of 1791, Seth Freeman, of Weldon, N. H., and Isaac Washburn, of the adjoining town of Croydon, came into town by the way of the East Hill in Montpelier. When they came to what is now the Four Corners near L. Cheney Batchelder's house, Washburn decided that there should be his pitch. They camped for the night by the side of a hemlock log in the hollow between the south district school-house and Lewis Durfee's. Freeman chose this location. The next year they returned and made these pitches. When a man made a clearing before the land was surveyed, it was usual when the lines were run to survey him out a farm that would include all of his clearing without regard to the regular lot lines, and such a piece of land was called a "pitch."

Before the town was surveyed by Jacob Davis in the spring of 1793, there were five such pitches made. They were Hezekiah Davis' pitch, 304 rods long, 31 wide, which adjoined his farm in Montpelier. Joseph Batchelder's pitch of 650 acres, mostly lying in the S. W. corner of the town, Theodore Perkins' pitch of 100 acres, Isaac Washburn's pitch, 320 acres, Seth Freeman's pitch, 300 acres.

There was also a gore between Freeman's pitch and the 5th range of lots, 34 to 40 rods wide. They all lay in the S. W. corner of the town. The clearings of 1792 were made by men living in shanties, who abandoned the town in the fall. In 1793 they returned, and perhaps some of them brought their families; but they all removed in the fall excepting the family of Theodore Perkins, and Alden Freeman, a widower, who boarded with them.

Theodore Perkins and his wife, Martha Conant, were from Bridgewater, Mass. They removed to Pomfret, Vt., and from there to Plainfield, Mar. 10, 1793, on to a clearing said to have been begun by Benjamin Nash. The town being surveyed soon after, this clearing received the name of Perkins' pitch. July 8, Perkins built a log-barn; but his house seems to have been built before he moved into town. In Dec. 1793, Alfred Perkins was born—the first birth in town. The last that was known of him he was living in the State of New York.

In the spring of 1794, Isaac Washburn's family moved into town, bringing with them Polly Reed, who afterwards married Benjamin Niles, and was grandmother to the present Geo. Niles. She went over to Perkins' house, and was the first woman Mrs. Perkins had seen for several months. Whatever scandalous stories may have been told by or of the fair sex of Plainfield since that time, that winter it was certainly free from gossiping and tattling.

Nov. 1794, Perkins sold his claim to Joshua Lawrence, who procured a deed of it from Jacob Davis. Perkins removed to Montpelier, and in 1798 went to Kentucky to look after a tract of several thousand acres of land that had fallen to him. He wrote home that his title was good, and that he was coming after his family. Nothing more was ever heard from him. His friends think he was murdered. His widow removed to Lyme, N. H., in 1800.

Theodore Perkins left four sons and one daughter: Thomas, who died at Lyme, N. H., in 1871; Martin P., who lived at Shipton, Canada; Elinas P., lived in Scituate, Mass.—one of his sons, Thomas Henry, is a broker in Boston. The wife of Rev. A. S. Swift, formerly in charge of the Congregational church in Plainfield, was Theodore Perkins' granddaughter.

The Perkins house was on the flat, east of the Joshua Lawrence house, and south of the present road.

Seth Freeman made a pitch of 300 acres, and purchased lot No. 1, in the fourth range, which made him a farm of 430 acres. This he divided among his brothers, apparently as he thought they needed and deserved. He was one of the two men who purchased their land of Davis, who did not have to buy it again of Allen, having gained it by possession, and was for a time called rich, but became poor and moved away before his death.

He was not the oldest of the family, but like Abraham was the head of it. Unlike that patriarch, however, he cannot be the founder of a nation, for he left no children. His father, Ebenezer, lived with him.

Alden Freeman was the oldest of the family. He married for his second wife, Precilla, daughter of Isaac Washburn, which was the first marriage in town. He lived at first on the Courtland Perry place, (lot 1, range 4,) but removed to the N.

W. corner of Freeman's pitch, where he built the Thompson house, now in ruins and owned by Alonzo Batchelder.

He had a large family; Sally, widow of Thompson and of Larabee, of Barre, and Lucy, widow of Lawson, of Barre, and mother of George Lawson, were his daughters.

Ebenezer Freeman Jr. lived on the Courtland Perry farm. In his barn was kept one of the first schools in town,—perhaps quite the first. He was the father of the late Mrs. Freeman Landers.

Edmund Freeman lived on the S. W. corner of Freeman's pitch,—the farm now owned by his son Edmund.

Isaac Freeman built the house now owned by Elias Gladding, in 1806. It is on the N. W. corner of the Freeman lot (No. 1, range 4). He taught the first school in town. Mrs. Daniel A. Perry is his daughter. He died in 1813, and his widow married his brother Nathan, who owned the S. E. corner of Freeman's pitch, next to Barre line, and to J. Wesley Batchelder's farm. Isaac Freeman, Mrs. N. W. Keith, and Mrs. Carrol Flood are his children.

The Batchelder brothers, Joseph, Moulton and Nathaniel, came from Lyndeboro, N. H. Nathaniel lived and died in Barre, and was the grandfather of the late J. Wesley Batchelder, of Plainfield. Lieut. Joseph Batchelder, then 42 years of age, commenced his clearing in the S. W. corner of the town, in 1792, and moved his family permanently on to it in 1794.

Nathaniel Clark had commenced a clearing in Montpelier, on the farm lately owned by his son George. Neither knew of the neighborhood of the other until Clark one day, hearing the sound of chopping, started toward it, and found Batchelder with a company of stalwart boys, who had already made a large slash.

Lieut. Joseph Batchelder had two daughters, of whom Mary or Polly was born in Plainfield, July 26, 1795, and was the first girl and the second child born in town. She married Henry Parker, of Elmore. The other daughter, Nabby or Abigail, married Joseph Glidden, of Barre.

The Lieutenant's sons were: Nathaniel, Isaac, Joseph, Jr., Alpheus, William and Josiah. Of these Nathaniel lived for a time on Batchelder's pitch, near the Four Corners, next to Montpelier. He afterwards lived on the spruce flats in East Montpelier, but died at Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1843. The late Mark Batchelder and Mrs. Sally McClure were his children.

Alpheus lived near his father. Ambrose Batchelder, now of Barre, is his grandson.

Isaac also lived on Batchelder's pitch for a time, and had a son, Josiah, 2d, who was the father of the late Harvey Batchelder, of Plainfield.

William forged a note, intending to take it up before it became due, but failed to do so. He was arrested, and when the officers were taking him to Barre, cut his throat at Joseph Glidden's, and only lived a few days after. I should not have mentioned this, had not the family been so numerous that the disgrace if divided among them will not be much for each one to carry.

Josiah is said to have been the first man in Plainfield who paid taxes on interest money. He got thoroughly rid of that incumbrance, however. He was the "Siah" Batchelder who lived and died at Daniel Lampson's.

Joseph Batchelder, Jr., lived for a time on that part of Batchelder's pitch afterwards owned by Abram Mann. His children were: Alice, wife of Stephen, and mother of H. Quincy Perry; Joseph Batchelder, the 3d; Nancy, wife of Levi Bartlett; Fanny, wife of Jonathan Blaisdell, of Albany; Abigail, wife of Asa Foster, of Marshfield; Judith, wife of Wm. B. Foss, and Elijah A. Joseph, the 3d, was killed by his horse running away on the Lampson Hill, in 1841. He was living at that time on the Ebenezer Freeman place. His children were: Elvira (Mrs. Arouette Gunnison), Charles T., L. Cheney, Erastus B., Adeline (Mrs. K. P. Kidder, of Burlington), Sewell, killed by accident in 1856, near the place where his father was, Alpheus, Harriet (Mrs. Ira Nichols), and Wheeler J.

The Lieutenant's brother, Moulton Batchelder, about the year 1795 settled upon that portion of Batchelder's pitch now owned by the family of Wm. B. Foss. He began work upon it in 1794, his family living in the Wheaton district in Barre, and he, passing to and fro by the guidance of marked trees. His children were: Nathaniel, called the Captain; James, born in Barre, but at his death the oldest resident, but not the oldest person in Plainfield; Jeremiah, called Jerry, of Barre; Jonathan M., called Jack, who died on the old farm; Olena, wife of Sewell Sturtevant, the veteran schoolmaster of Plainfield and Barre.

Capt. Nathaniel had three children, now residents of Plainfield: Alonzo J., Elvira (Mrs. Mack), and Bridgman.

James had 3 children: James Merrill, Daniel, and Mariam, (Mrs. Boyce, of Waitsfield.)

Jonathan's children were: Ira, Harrison, Adeline (Mrs. Levi Martin), Susan (Mrs. Arthur Colburn), Mary (Mrs. Wheeler), and Moulton, now of Lowell, Mass.

Isaac Washburn had one daughter, Precilla, and 4 sons: Isaac, Jr., Miles, Asa and Ephraim.

Isaac, Jr., lived with his father, and opened the first tavern in town. It stood at the Four Corners, near L. C. Batchelder's present residence, and was a large, two-story house, never entirely finished.

Asa lived north of his father's, at the top of the hill, on the place now owned by Nathan Skinner. It was the northern part of the Washburn pitch. He married Polly, daughter of Esek Howland.

Miles first settled on lands of his own in 1798, when he bought of Esek Howland the southern part of lot 3, range 2, where he built the first blacksmith shop in town. It stood near the angle of the road that now leads from Willard Harris' to the Barre road. In 1803, he sold this farm and built a house and shop in the village, on the north bank of the Great Brook, near the present tannery. This was the first shop in the village. Gamaliel Washburn, of Montpelier, was his son. Miles died at New Bedford in 1823. He was for many years constable of the town.

Ephraim built a barn west of his father's, towards East Montpelier. He was engaged to be married to a daughter of Esek Howland. To get money to build a house, he went to sea, and the ship was never heard from. It was supposed to have been wrecked, and that all on board perished.

The Washburns were not able to pay for their lands twice, perhaps not once, and in 1812, Isaac, Jr., and his father sold their farm and went to Lisle, N. Y., and from thence to Indiana, but never again possessed much property. Asa Washburn followed them soon after. Of the four families who commenced the settlement of the town, Perkins soon moved away; but some member or members of each of the others came to be a public charge.

Elijah Perry, of Middleboro, Mass., bought 100 acres of Batchelder's pitch next to lot 1, range 3. June, 1823, his daughter, Sally, committed suicide by hanging, the only suicide ever committed in town. He was a brother of Elder James Perry. His son Daniel was the father of John Perry, of Rosette, wife of Charles T. Batchelder, and Harriet, wife of Daniel Batchelder.

The five pitches of the town all lie in its south-western corner. The remainder of the town was divided by the survey of 1793 into 9 ranges—the first range lying next to Montpelier. Each range is 160 rods wide excepting the 9th, which is next to Goshen Gore, and is about 90 rods wide. The first four ranges being shortened by the pitches, contain but 6 lots each, lots No. 1 in these ranges lying next to the pitches, their south-western lines are irregular. No two lots in town whose number is one, are of the same size. In range 5 they commence to narrow, until in the 9th they come to a point at the corner of the town. All the lots adjoining Marshfield are 110 rods wide.

THE ORIGINAL SETTLERS

upon each lot in town; also the present owner of a part of the same, not with the same, bounds then as now, for the farm of

Allen Martin was the last one in town, sold before 1800, that preserved its boundaries unchanged.

Lots in Range 1.—No. 1 was first owned by SAMUEL NYE, of Falmouth, who sold the southern portion to HEZEKIAH DAVIS. It is now owned by Nathaniel M. Clark, whose wife is a grand-daughter of Davis.

ELIJAH NYE, of Falmouth, Ms., settled upon No. 2. He sold to John Chapman in 1808 and moved to Calais. His daughter Nabby, born Sept. 28, 1796, was the 3d child born in town. This lot was divided into the Thomas Whittrege or Dennis Vincent farm, and the Holmes or Dix farm.

Lot No. 3 was purchased by JOHN CHAPMAN, of Montpelier. When St. Andrew's Gore was incorporated into a town, he gave a set of record books to the town to have the name changed to Plainfield. He was originally from a town of that name. The northern part of this lot he sold to Benjamin Niles, Jr., father of Albert, and grandfather of George Niles.

The southern part Chapman sold to Levi Willey, of Deerfield, Mass. This is the lower, or old Ozias Dix farm.

About 1811, Willey, after a visit to Montreal, was taken sick with the small pox, of which he died. His attendants buried him near the top of the hill, close to a large stone near Montpelier line; then killed his dog, and the alarm in time abated.

The southern part of No. 4, now owned by Ira Grey, was cleared by BENJAMIN WHIPPLE. He was town representative, and held other offices in town, and was much respected. He removed to Middlesex, Vt.

JOHN MELLETT cleared portions of lots 4, 5 and 6, including the meadow now owned by Prentiss Shepard; but he lived on the eastern part of these lots, where Willard S. Martin now lives. The late John Mellen was his son.

Benjamin Lyon settled in the corner of the town, on portions of lots 5 and 6, which is now called W. S. Martin's Enoch Cate place.

Range 2—lot 1 was nearly obliterated by Washburn's pitch, and was never by itself a farm. Its form is like a Carpenter's square, each limb being about 30 rods wide and half a mile long.

Lot 2, now owned by Mrs. Bridgman Batchelder, was settled by Thomas Vincent, of New Bedford, in 1796. He was a prominent business man, was the 1st town clerk, 4 years representative, and became the richest man in town. He was a very zealous member of the Methodist church. He died in 1848, aged 79.

Lot 3. The southern part was settled by Esek Howland, in 1797, who built a log-house, but was unable to pay for it, and sold the next year to Miles Washburn. When Harvey Bancroft was fatally injured, Howland was with him, and carried him on his back 100 rods to the house. Mrs. William C. Bartlett is his granddaughter. The northern part was settled in 1801, by EBENEZER BENNETT. He established the first tannery in town, between the Ezekiel Skinner house and the little rivulet, now often dry, just north of it.

Lot 4 clearing was begun by ASA COBURN, who sold to JOHN and THOMAS VINCENT, and removed to Cabot, but had to pay Allen for it in 1808. John was a less active business man than his brother, but was much respected, and was 3 years representative. His children were: John, Dennis, Stephen, of Chelsea, and Desire (Mrs. Coolidge Taylor.)

Lot 5. The south-western part was first owned by Chester House, then by Benjamin P. Lampson, who built what is now S. B. Gale's farm-house. Charles McCloud settled upon what was recently Allen Martin's farm. His house was in the pasture north of Martin's house. This is the north-western part of lots 5 and 6.

ROBERT MELLE was a brother of the first John Mellen. He owned the eastern part of lot 6; also lot 6 in the 3d range, and in fact nearly all of what is now Plainfield village. In Sept. 1805, as he was riding home from North Montpelier, he fell from his horse, near the present residence of Alvin Cate, badly injuring his ankle. As they were carrying him home on a litter made of a straw bed, he said, "You will have to bring me back in a few days," and they did so, burying him in the graveyard there. The Mellens were from the old town of Derry, N. H., and they were one of the Scotch Irish families who came from Londonderry, in Ireland. Robert Mellen's house was where the Methodist parsonage now is, and his log-house was the first house built in the village.

Range 3—lot 1 was first owned by Lieut. JOSEPH BATCHELDER, but was first settled upon by JONATHAN WHITE, of Montpelier, who afterwards lived in various parts of the town. It is now owned by Nathan Skinner.

Lot 2 was first settled by CORNELIUS YOUNG, near where Willard Harris now lives. His father, Ebenezer Young, broke into a store at North Montpelier, and was sent to the state prison at Windsor.

At the time of the Plattsburg invasion, Cornelius borrowed a famous fleet horse of Willard Shepard, Esq., and passing everything on the road, was present at the battle. When the British retreated, he followed after, and seeing three of them leave their horses, he dashed in among them, pistols in hand, and compelled the whole three to surrender to him alone. At least one of them was an officer, and his sword, brought home by Young, is now in the possession of Dudley Perkins.

His last days were less glorious. He was appointed a custom house officer, and had various encounters with smugglers, in one of which at Cabot, vitriol was thrown upon him, spoiling his clothes, but not injuring his person. His ignorance of the law caused him to commit some illegal acts in the discharge of his duties, and the resulting lawsuits ruined him pecuniarily and morally. He removed to the State of New York, and for some felony was sent to Clinton prison.

Lot 3. The south part was first purchased by JOSIAH FREEMAN, and is now owned by Elijah A. Batchelder. The north part was first leased by James Perry; now by Daniel Batchelder.

Lot 4 was settled by Dea. NEHEMIAH MACK, whose house was in Ira F. Page's pasture, east of his house now occupied by his son Dan. Page. Russell Young, brother of Cornelius, owned 45 acres next to Lampson's. He went to New York, and was drowned in North river when trying to escape from the police.

Lot 5. The western part was settled by JOSEPH LAMPSON, who was for many years constable of the town. He was a weaver, a large part of the cotton cloth used in town being woven by him. Daniel and Benjamin P. were his sons; Mrs. James Batchelder and Mrs. Jeremiah Batchelder his daughters. His farm is now owned by Charles Bancroft.

Lot 6 is in the village, and was purchased of Robert Mellen by CHARLES MCCLLOUD, 2d, and mills erected in 1798, which were burned the same year, and rebuilt by McCloud. The first framed house in the village was built by him, where the Methodist church now stands, and is the old house back of it now owned by Wm. Bartlett.

The first store was a small one, opened by JOSEPH KILBURN, in 1803 or '4, on the Silas Willis place, near the Great Brook. The building was owned by ELIAS KINGSLEY, the miller, and when sold to Ira Day, of Barre, in 1807, there was a kiln for making earthen ware between that and the brook. The next store was opened by Philip Sparrow about 1804, upon the place where Andrew Wheatley built the large brick store on the north side of the Methodist church common.

SILAS WILLIAMS built and opened the first tavern in the village, which is now the southern part of S. B. Gale's house.

SHUBAEL WALES, from Randolph, father of George C. Wales, built the first clothing works, below the mills, in 1805 or '6.

AMASA BANCROFT, in 1809, built the first trip-hammer, south of the Great Brook and just above the present tannery. He was a son of Lieut. John Bancroft, an officer in the Revolution.

There have been three distilleries in the village—one on School street, in Mrs. Chamberlain's garden, one on High street, in Wm. Park's garden, and one east of S. B. Gale's house.

The cemetery in the village was at first just S. W. of the railroad station. Among those buried there was Parnel, daughter of Joseph Lampson. She was the betrothed of Geo. Rich, who disliked the place, and gave the land for the present cemetery, and those interred in the old one were removed in 1814.

Range 4—lot 1, was settled by the Freemans, as mentioned.

Lot 2. Clearing began by John Nye, of Falmouth, but first settled upon by Richard Kendrick. The eastern part is now owned by H. Q. Perry; the western by Hartwell Skinner and Enos P. Colby's estate.

Lot 3. The southern part was settled by David Kinney, and is now owned by Edward Bartlett. The northern part at a later date was settled by Jonathan White, and is now occupied by Solomon Bartlett.

Lot 4, now owned by Curtis Bartlett, was settled by WILLARD SHEPARD, of Sharon, about 1796. The first spring he had a yoke of oxen and was out of hay. He took his oxen and sled, went to the Four Corners near Freeman's, thence to Montpelier, and up Worcester Branch 2 miles, where he got a load of Col. Davis. By the time he got home nearly one-half of it had been shaken and pulled off by the bushes, which so disgusted him with that business that during his long life he never after bought a load of hay.

He had a small flock of sheep which he kept near the house for safety. One night he heard the wolves howling, and in the morning found they had killed every sheep.

He took a prominent part in town affairs, and did a large part of the business of justice of the peace. He removed to the farm partly in East Montpelier, now owned by his son Prentice, where he died.

Lot 5 is divided by the Great Brook. The eastern portion was settled by Nathan Jones. The lot is now partly owned by N. C. Page and George Huntoon.

Lot 6, now owned by Orrin Cree, was cleared by John Chase, who, unable to pay for it the second time, went West, but returned and died in Calais.

Range 5—lots 1 and 2, were settled by Judge BRADFORD KINNE, about 1795. The northern part he deeded to Philoman and Stephen Perkins in 1803, but they occupied it in 1801. This part is now owned by A. Gunnison; the southern by J. Batchelder. Judge Kinne was born in Preston, Conn., but moved here from Royalton, Vt. He was the most prominent man in town, and with good advantages might have become a distinguished lawyer. The story is well known of his defending Fisher in the suit of Cairnes v. Fisher, for assault, at the Caledonia County Court, where he directed his client to cry, when he himself did. Kinne made a pathetic appeal to the jury in favor of his client, who was a poor man, assuring them that "every dollar they took from him, they took from the mouths of babes and sucklings," at which dismal prospect Kinne burst into tears, and was followed by such a tremendous boo-hoo from Fisher, that the damages were assessed at a trifling sum, although the assault was a severe one. He removed on to the Washburn pitch in 1812, where he died in 1828, aged 64. Bradford Kinne Pierce, the distinguished Methodist clergyman, is his grandson.

Lot 3 was settled by James Perry. He was one of the first deacons of the Congregational church, but became a Methodist preacher. His farm is now owned by his grandson, Daniel A. Perry. The northern part of this lot was settled by Jacob Perkins, about 1799. It is now owned by Emmons Taft, who married his daughter.

Capt. JONATHAN KINNE was born in Preston, Conn., where he married, and moved to Bethel, Vt. He lived there 10 years. In 1793, he commenced clearing lot No. 4, living in a shanty through the week and going to Seth Freeman's on Sundays. He lived thus for two summers, and built a framed house in 1794, the first in town, which stood nearly opposite to H. Q. Perry's present residence. He moved his family here in Feb., 1795. The death of their little boy, Justus, Mar. 6, 1796, was the first death in town. He was the first minister in town, and preached for the Congregational church many years. He died at Berlin, in 1838. His son, Dea. Justus Kinne, lives upon this farm.

No. 5, is lease land. The southern 50 acres was leased by Dea. GEORGE AYERS, who was the progenitor of all of that family in this town. This place is now occupied by Ira Stone. The middle 50 acres of this lot was first leased by Elder James Perry's son, Elijah. The northern 50 acres was leased by Aaron Whittlesey. The last two portions are now leased by Levi Bartlett's estate.

Lot 6 is lease land. The eastern portion was first leased by John Moore, now by Hiram G. Moore. The western portion was first leased by Levi Bartlett, now in part by Lee Batchelder.

The southern 100 acres of lot 7 was settled by ASA BANCROFT, of Warmouth, Mass., about 1797. About the year 1801, as he and his wife were coming home, one evening, from Jeremy Stone's the wolves began to assemble in their rear. His wife was on a horse carrying their infant son, Tyler. They hurried on as fast as possible, but the wolves came so near, that they abandoned to them a piece of fresh meat that Mrs. Stone had given them, and reached home safely, the wolves howling about the house as soon as they entered it. Mr. Bancroft was frequently elected to town offices, and died in 1856, aged 87. His children were, Tyler, William, John, Eunice (Mrs. Ira F. Page) and Mrs. Reuben Huntoon. When it began to be rumored that the settlers' titles were not good, he went to Jacob Davis', who gave him security on other property, and sent word by him to the other settlers, that if they were frightened he would secure them. This quieted their fears, and only one or two went.

No. 8 was settled by JOHN MOORE. His son, Heman Allen Moore, born here, was elected a representative to congress from Ohio, in 1844, but died the next year. Wm. Huntoon now owns this farm.

Range 6, lots 1, 2 and 3, were settled by JOSEPH NYE, of Falmouth, Mass. Several members of this family settled in Plainfield, or owned land in it. They were of Welch descent, and when they first came to Falmouth wrote their name Noye. Joseph Nye was representative 5 years, justice of the peace a long time, &c. His son, Vinal, died many years since, leaving several children, Irving, George, Alanson, and Mary, wife of Edward Bartlett. Joseph's daughter, Sally, married Nathaniel Townshend, Cynthia, Daniel Gunnison, Augusta, Elijah A. Batchelder. Lots 1 and 2 are mostly owned by Dudley B. Smith. Seth F. Page lives upon No. 3.

No. 4 was settled by Elder James Perry's son Stephen, in 1818, who built the plastered house standing upon it, now owned by Alba F. Martyn.

No. 5, the southern part now owned by A. F. Martyn, was settled by Joseph F. Ayers, who moved to Thetford, and thence to Manchester, N. H. The northern part, now owned by Nathaniel Townsend, was settled by Gideon Huntington, father of Amasa, and of Mrs. Leonard Moore, and uncle to David and Samuel Huntington, of Marshfield.

No. 6 was settled by Frank Crane and Joseph Deering. It is now mostly owned by N. Townsend.

HARVEY BANCROFT, from Ware, now Auburn, Mass., settled upon lot 7, in the 6th range, part of lot 7 in the 7th range, and a part of lot 6 in the 8th range, next to the Bancroft pond. He was clerk under the attempted organization of St. Andrews Gore as a town. His house was opposite to the burying-ground near Newcomb Kinney's. While clearing some land, about 20 rods easterly of Benjamin F. Moor's present residence, he fell a tree upon a small one, which fell across another. The small one flew up striking him on the chest. He died July 8, 1797, a few days after the injury, aged 27. He left a wife and two small children. One died young, the other was Dr. Nathaniel Bancroft. His widow, Polly Carrol, married Sanford Kinne, a brother of Jonathan and of Bradford Kinne. Sanford purchased nearly all the land formerly owned by Harvey Bancroft, but upon the death of his wife, in 1814, he went West, and his fate is unknown. Newcomb Kinney is his son.

No. 8 was settled by Ezra Bancroft, father of Horace Bancroft, now of Barre, but it was first owned by his brother, Aaron, of Boston. It is now occupied by Duron Norcross.

Range 7, lots 1, 2, 3 and 4, were purchased of Davis by Enos Colby, of Hawk, N. H. He made a clearing and built a house in 1800, some fourth of a mile west of the Great Brook, on land now owned by C. H. Heath. He stayed in it one night, and then went back to N. H., leaving it in care of Moulton Batchelder. One Currier without leave moved into the house, and was sued off by Heman Allen, who found when too late that Currier was not holding under Colby, who thereby got it by possession against Allen. Lots 1 and 2 are now mostly owned by his grandson, Moses Colby. No. 1 is only 20 rods wide; 3 and 4 are partly owned by Henry Camp, whose wife is Colby's granddaughter.

Lot 5 is mostly lease land, and portions of it were rented to Eli Boyd, Isaac Perry, James Perry, Jr., and the N. E. corner next to Moses Bancroft's was sold to Patrick Reed. It is now leased to Nathan Hill, Seneca S. Bemis and Lyman Moore.

No. 6 was probably first owned by Harvey Bancroft. It was on the north-east corner of this lot that he was at work when fatally injured. It is now owned by Joel Sherburn, Baxter Bancroft and Henry Moore.

No. 7 was first owned by Harvey Bancroft and Charles Bancroft. Lee Martin's farm is a part of it.

No. 8 was settled by ZOPHER STURTEVANT, of Worcester, Mass. He was persuaded by his friend Harvey Bancroft to come up and buy a farm next to him. He returned to Mass. to earn money to pay for it, and while there heard of Bancroft's death. Sewell Sturtevant was his son. It is now occupied by Newcomb Kinney.

Range 8—lots 1 and 2, were purchased and settled by STEPHEN PERKINS, who built a saw-mill in 1812-'13. He also had one set of mill-stones. In the summer of 1857, the banks by the side of the dam gave way, and the pond of about 7 acres was discharged in a short time, carrying off every bridge on the Great Brook. It was repaired, but gave way again before the pond was quite filled. It was again repaired more thoroughly, and held until a heavy rain in the spring of 1869 carried off the new dam and all the bridges below. It was repaired, and when the pond was about half filled it burst through the quicksands under the dam, and no more efforts to repair it were made. R. L. Martin then put in a steam-mill, which was burned in 1871, and he removed the remains of it to Harris Gore. Dudley Perkins and Silas Worthen occupy portions of these lots.

No. 3 was settled by Ralph Chamberlain, of Hanover, N. H., and is now owned by his grandson, Jeremy Stone Chamberlain. Plainfield Sulphur Springs are on this lot.

No. 4 was settled by David Benedict, of Randolph, who sold the southern part, now owned by Scott and Smith, to Amasa Bancroft, and the northern part, now owned by Goodrich, to Robert Carson. Feb. 29, 1816, an old house on this lot, occupied by Moses Reed, and used for a school-house, caught fire, and a little son of Reed was burned to death. David, Patrick and Woodman Reed were his sons; Joanna (Mrs. William Parks) his daughter.

No. 5 was settled by Charles R. Woolson, who sold the northern part to his wife's father, Moses Bancroft, of Ward, Mass., in Nov. 1796. Woolson was not able or willing to pay for his land the second time, and removed to New York, where he became rich. His son Ephraim getting homesick, returned, and bought back the old farm, on which he died. It is now owned by Erastus Batchelder. Mary, wife of S. O. Goodrich, and Sarah, wife of Joseph Lane, are Ephraim's daughters.

Moses Bancroft had 4 sons: John, Charles, Chester and Baxter. John had 2 sons: Lewis, of Calais, and Preston, of Marshfield. Charles had a son Charles, and Mrs. Wm. Skinner and Mrs. Lewis Wood are his daughters. Baxter had but one child, Moses.

Baxter has resided in Plainfield longer than any other person—84 years. He says that as late as Oct. 1804, neither his father nor any of the neighbors had chimneys to their houses. Stones were laid up into some form of a chimney for a few feet, and the smoke allowed to go out, if it would, through a hole in the roof. The roof for years was made of large pieces of elm bark, tied on with strings of the same. Sometimes a storm in the night would blow off these pieces, and his father would get up and tie them on again. It would often get on fire, and once the house burned down.

One summer they had nothing to eat but milk for a long time, until Willard Shephard gave them a bushel of rye very badly sprouted, but some of this ground and cooked tasted the best of anything he ever ate.

The senior Moses had a brother, Lieut. John Bancroft, a Revolutionary soldier, who began a clearing on Prentice Shephard's farm (lot 5, range 1), but soon removed to the village. Amasa Bancroft was his son. C. Watrous and Carlos Bancroft, of Montpelier, were his sons.

No. 6 contains the Bancroft Pond, and was purchased by Harvey Bancroft.

No. 7 was settled by Charles Bancroft, and is now owned by Gardner Heath.

No. 8 is mostly a swamp.

Range 9. Lot 1 is 110 rods long, and 7 rods wide at one end, and a point at the other. It was never sold by the original proprietors.

No. 2 was a part of Stephen Perkins' purchase, and is now owned by his grandson, Emory F. Perkins.

No. 3 was settled by David Reed, of Hanover, N. H., in 1809, and is now owned by David Perkins.

David Reed and Ralph Chamberlain married sisters of Israel Goodwin, who lived many years in this town, but removed to East Montpelier. T. Goodwin Reed is David's son.

No. 4, now owned by Erastus Batchelder, was settled in 1796, by James Boutwell, of Barre, a relative of Col. Levi Boutwell, of Montpelier.

Oct. 9, 1804, snow fell to a great depth, some 3 or 4 feet. One Richardson, of Orange, started a bear out of his cornfield, and followed it to Capt. Boutwell's and returned. Boutwell, Robert Carson, and Jeremy Stone, pursued it to the round mountain, north or east of Pigeon pond, where they treed her. Boutwell fired, wounding it in the neck, it ran by Carson who fired and missed. Stone followed after with an ax, having no gun, setting on the dogs. Stone soon saw the bear returning, perhaps to defend her cubs, and got upon a rock, and when the bear attempted to get on, tried to split its head open with the ax, but the bear instantly knocked it from his hand, mounted the rock, pushed Stone off from it into the snow, and then over on to his back, getting top of him. Stone put up his hand to push its head away from his, when his little finger went into the bear's mouth, which began to chew it. At this moment, Boutwell, who had reloaded and come up, fired, the bear's head being only a few inches from Stone's, and bruin fell dead.

Another time Boutwell went up on to the high, round topped hill north-east of his house, after partridges. He found a bear up a tree. His gun was loaded with shot and he had no ball. He drew the shot and whittled a beach plug, with the end pointed, and loaded with this. The first shot had no effect, but the second killed the bear.

He was captain of the first militia company in town; was one of the selectmen from 1799, until his death, in 1813, of typhoid fever, at that time very prevalent and fatal. He was a man whose character was almost above reproach; but his dog was even more strict in his faith and practice than his master. The dog had learned to observe the Sablath, as intelligent dogs in Christian families often do, and never attempted to follow his master on that day. Once when Boutwell was on his way to church, he met a party in pursuit of a bear, and they wished for the dog, which was a famous hunter. Boutwell went back with them to the house, and ordered the dog to follow them, but it refused. He called it to follow him, but it would not. He then took off his Sunday clothes and put a gun on his shoulder, when the dog, probably thinking that it was not Sunday after all, followed. Boutwell was justly punished for his duplicity by not getting the bear. The dog afterward followed a deer into the woods, and was never seen again.

Lot 5 was first purchased of Heman Allen by Eathan Powers, who hired men to cut and burn wood for the ashes. Sylvester Grinnel, a quaker, first resided upon it.

Lot 6 was settled by Moses Bancroft's son, John. Charles Morse owns a portion of it.

No. 7 was settled by JEREMY STONE, of Ward, Mass., in 1796. He chose this place because he expected it would be near a good road. The legislature, in 1797, appointed a committee to work a road from Chelsea court house to Danville court house. This committee reported to the county court at Chelsea, in 1799, that they had built the road through Washington and Orange. A little work was done on it in Goshen gore, near Plainfield line, and the work abandoned. Ira Stone, Rev. Jesse Stone of Maine, and Jeremy Stone are his sons; Mrs. Hial P. Chamberlain and Mrs. Marian Stone Tarbell, his daughters. His farm is now owned by Ira Robinson.

Lot 8 was settled by Daniel Rice, of Barre, in 1825. Dudley Marshall now resides upon it.

According to Thompson's Gazetteer, the town was organized Apr. 4, 1796, under the name of St. Andrew's gore, and Harvey Bancroft elected town clerk. This is probably true, but it was illegal, a gore not having the power to form a town organization. Nov. 6, 1797, the gore was incorporated into a town by the name of Plainfield, and the town meeting held at James Perry's, in Mar., 1798, is the first of which there is now any record, but was not the first, because called by Joshua Lawrence, James Perry, Moulton Batchelder, as selectmen of Plainfield. At this meeting, Thomas Vincent was elected town clerk. Town meetings after this were held at Capt. Jonathan Kinn's, until 1823, when they were held in the village.

In 1798, '99 and 1800, the road tax voted was 4 days work for each poll. In 1798, the General Assembly, at the request of the town, voted a tax of one cent per acre, which was to be used to build roads. In 1807, another of three cents per acre was laid upon Plainfield. At that time, improved lands were listed at $1.75 per acre, unimproved not at all. Polls at $20, a yoke of oxen $10, houses worth less than $1000, 2 per cent, over $1000, 3 per cent. Interest money 6 per cent.

The first road in town was worked from Seth Freeman's north westerly to Hezekiah Davis' in Montpelier, as early as 1794, but no highways were laid out until June, 1799, when this and several others were laid.

In 1798 and 99, the town sent no representative, probably because a town with a grand list of less than $3,200 was not "doomed" to pay a state tax, if it sent no representative.

Thomas Vincent was a federalist. All the other representatives were republicans, until the reorganization of the parties under Jackson and Adams. After that they were all democrats except John Vincent, antimason, until the formation of the antislavery party, which elected D. A. Perry. Frank Hall was the only whig.

In Sept. 1801, Isaac Tichenor received 10 votes for governor—all that were cast. In 1802, Isaac Tichenor had 25, Jonas Galusha 23, which was the largest vote cast for several years.

PHYSICIANS.

The first physician in town was AMHERST SIMONS, from Windham, Ct. He studied with Dr. Glysson, of Williams-town, and came to Plainfield in 1801. For many of the last years of his life he was blind.

Dr. EBENEZER CONANT studied with Dr. Robert Paddock, of Barre, and came to Plainfield in 1809. In 1832 he removed into Marshfield, about 2 miles from Plainfield village, near Perkins' mill, but returned to Plainfield after a few years, where he died.

Dr. NATHANIEL BANCROFT was brought to Plainfield by his father, Harvey Bancroft, from Ward, Mass., when an infant.

When 12 years old he went to Montpelier, where he attended school, and at last studied medicine with Dr. Lamb. About 1822, he came to Plainfield to practice, where he remained until 1851, when he went to Ohio, where he stayed 2 years, thence to Belvidere, Ill. His pungent and witty sayings are still often quoted by his old friends in Plainfield.

Dr. DANIEL KELLOGG came to Plainfield in 1834, and built the brick house east of the hotel. His health failing he removed to Berlin in 1836, where he soon died.

Dr. JARED BASSETT came to Plainfield in 1839, and removed to Northfield in 1843, and thence to Chicago.

Dr. DANIEL BATES was here from 1845 to 1851.

Dr. STEPHEN BENNETT from 1851 to 1856, when he removed to Ohio.

Dr. PHINEAS KELLOGG, of Brookfield, commenced practice here in 1851. He died of diphtheria Apr. 10, 1862, age 39.

Dr. WALTER S. VINCENT, of Chelsea, now of Burlington, had his residence here for several years, but a large part of the time he was surgeon in the Union army in the war of the rebellion.

Dr. DUDLEY B. SMITH, of Williams-town, came to Plainfield in 1856, and Dr. W. F. LAZELL, of Brookfield, came in the fall of 1867. They remain here now.

LAWYERS.

The first lawyer in town was CHARLES ROBY, who came about the year 1812—not long after the result of the Allen lawsuit had put a mortgage on nearly every farm in town. Probably the people had no desire or money for any more lawsuits at that time, as he left soon.

In 1828, AZEL SPALDING, of Montpelier, now of Kansas, was here one year.

In 1833, SYLVESTER EATON, of Calais, came and stayed until 1838.

STILLMAN H. CURTIS was here from 1838 to 1843.

J. A. WING was here from 1836 to 1852, when he went on to his farm on Maple Hill, in Marshfield, where he stayed about 3 years, then moved to Plainfield, and from here to Montpelier in 1857.

In 1843 LEWIS CHAMBERLAIN came. He died in Aug. 1863, of dysentery, which was very prevalent and fatal at that time, there being 18 deaths from that disease, 16 of which were within or near the village.

CHARLES H. HEATH came here in 1859, and removed to Montpelier in 1872.

S. C. SHURTLEFF commenced the practice of law here in 1864, and removed to Montpelier in 1877.

O. L. HOYT came here in 1873, and still remains.

THE FIRST CHURCH was organized Nov. 13, 1799, at Jonathan Kinne's, under the name of

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST IN PLAINFIELD.

The council called to organize this church was composed of Rev. Richard Ransom of Woodstock, Rev. John Ransom of Rochester, Rev. James Hobart of Berlin, Dea. William Wood of Woodstock, Capt. Peter Salter of Orange. Dea. Judah Willey, Henry Taft and Joseph Sterling, of Barre, were invited to join the council. The members embodied into a church were only six: Capt. Jonathan Kinne, James Perry, James Boutwell, Mrs. Esther Perry, Deborah Boutwell, Judith Batchelder. Others joined soon after. In June, 1801, they passed this vote:

"Whereas some members of the church are dissatisfied with the articles of faith, Therefore, Voted that the aggrieved members have liberty to select such articles as they are satisfied with, which when selected shall be considered the church articles of faith, not to prevent any from believing them as they now are."

This compromise did not prevent the Methodist portion of the church from seceding in June, 1802, and forming another church. Those who left to join the Methodist were, Dea. James Perry, Esther Perry, Bradford Kinne, Ebenezer Freeman, Esther Freeman, John Chase, and Richard Kendrick. Those who remained with the original church were, Dea. Nehemiah Mack, Moses Bancroft, Sally Bancroft, James Boutwell, Deborah Boutwell, Jonathan Kinne, Lydia Kinne, Sanford

Kinne, Polly Kinne, Zopher Sturtevant, Polly Sturtevant, David Bancroft.

The same year Charles R. Woolson was unanimously expelled from the church for "neglect of family prayer, and public worship on Sunday and church meetings." Moulton Batchelder having joined the Methodists, on Sunday, Jan. 22, 1816, the following sentence of excommunication was read before the assembled congregation:

"Whereas our brother, Moulton Batchelder, has violated his solemn covenant obligations by neglecting the stated meetings of the church on the Sabbath and at other times, and going after, as we think, false teachers, and embracing dangerous errors and sentiments, derogatory to the character of an infinitely wise and holy God, We now, under the pressing obligation of duty we owe to our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, have undertaken this painful and bitter labor, and we hope in faithfulness and prayer, but without success. Therefore, according to the rule of Christ's family, we are under the painful necessity of saying unto you, and that in this public manner, that for these reasons, the door of our fellowship and communion is closed against you, and you are no longer to be considered of this church and body; but as an unprofitable branch, and therefore are now severed from this body. It is our humble prayer, that God will bless this our unpleasant, but plain duty to you, and open your understanding that you may see your error, and give you repentance, that you may enjoy his favor at last, and be gathered with all of the redeemed from among men, to inhabit the new Jerusalem, where Jesus Christ is the joy and the light thereof."

I do not give these facts to increase the self-complacency of those at the present time, who are inclined to plume themselves upon their own superior liberality, and tolerance of differences of opinions. Such should consider, that people who thought their peculiar tenets of such vital importance, that they incurred the dangers and hardships of a settlement in New England to establish them, could not be expected to see the result of their labors impaired or destroyed, with indifference or equanimity.

Jonathan Kinne preached to the church until 1826; but was not ordained because he disbelieved in infant baptism.

Nathaniel Hurd was the acting pastor in 1826. [For his biography see Tinmouth, vol. III.] He was succeeded by John F. Stone.

In 1829, Joseph Thatcher became the first settled minister. He removed to Barre in 1834, and was succeeded by Mr. Hadley in 1836, by John Orr in 1839, Samuel Marsh in 1842, Calvin Granger in 1846, and A. S. Swift in 1849,—none of whom were settled ministers, however.

Rev. Joel Fisk was settled as pastor in May, 1855, and died Dec. 16, 1856. Soon after Rev. Horace Herrick became acting pastor, who was succeeded in 1861, by Rev. C. M. Winch, who remained until Nov., 1868, when he was succeeded by Horace Pratt, who removed in 1871.

After an interval of nearly 2 years, Charles Redfield became acting pastor, and in 1877, C. E. Ferrin was settled, and remained until his death, in 1881.

The deacons have been James Perry, Nehemiah Mack, George Ayers, Dan. Storrs, Justus Kinney, Emmons Taft.

Their first meeting-house was built in 1819, the second, on the same site, in 1854. Until the building of a church their meetings were usually held at the dwelling house of Jonathan Kinne.

THE METHODIST CHURCH

has no early records in Plainfield, and I am obliged to glean this account from various sources. The first Methodist sermon preached in Plainfield was by the Rev. Nicholas Sneathen— or “Suethen,” as his family write it—a very able man, who was chaplain of Congress in 1812. He came to Seth Freeman’s, made known his name and occupation, and succeeded in attaching nearly all of the people in the southern part of the town to the Methodist church, including Dea. James Perry, who afterwards became a Methodist preacher, the first probably that resided in town.

A church was organized in 1801, or ’2. It formed a part of Barre circuit. The first Methodist minister stationed at Plainfield that I can learn of was David Kilburn, who was here in 1812 and 1825.

Rev. Thomas C. Pierce, who was married to Judge Kinne’s daughter, Sally, lived upon the Asa Washburn place in 1820. This, with 15 acres of land, was given to the Methodist church for a parsonage by Judge Kinne. It was afterwards sold and the parsonage in the village bought.

Rev. John Lord was stationed here in 1823; — Harvey in 1827, ’28; R. H. Deming, ’30, ’31; John Nason, ’33, ’34; N. Stone, ’35; David Wilcox, ’36, ’37; Jacob Boyce, ’38; Daniel Field, ’39; J. L. Slason, ’40; John W. Wheeler, ’41; Richard Newell, ’42, ’43; Otis M. Legate, ’44; H. P. Cushing, ’45, ’46; J. W. Perkins, ’47, ’48; Homer T. Jones, ’49, ’50; Mulfred Bullard, ’51; Peter Merrill, ’52, ’53; Alonzo Hitchcock, ’54, ’55, ’62, ’63; W. J. Kidder, ’56, ’57; Edmund Copeland, ’58, ’59, ’69, ’70; P. P. Ray, ’60, ’61; Joshua Gill, ’64, ’65; S. B. Currier, ’66, ’67; Andes T. Bullard, ’68; Thomas Trevillian, ’71; Joseph Hamilton, ’72, ’73, ’74; Joseph O. Sherburn, ’75, ’76; W. H. Dean, ’77, ’78; Elihu Snow, ’79, ’80, ’81.

Before the erection of a church their meetings were usually held at Elder James Perry’s, or at Lieut. Joseph Batchelder’s. In 1819 a house was built for the Methodist society in the village, with an agreement that when they had no preacher, “any other Christian denomination, such as Calvinists, Anti-Baptists, Freewill Baptists, Friends, so called, Universalists, etc., who had a preacher, might occupy it.”

The following is a list of the contributors to the building of this church:

Thomas Vincent, $100; Moulton Batchelder, $100; Harvey Pitkin, $75; John Vincent, $60; Seth Cook, $50; Bradford Kinne, $50; Amherst Simons, $50; Seth Freeman, $50; Asa Bancroft, $50; Eben Dodge, Jr., $25; John Moors, $25; Ebenezer Lyon, $25; Matthew Jack, $25; Nathan Freeman, $25; Benjamin F. Lampson, $25; Laomi Cree, $25; Enoch Cate, $25; Ebenezer Freeman, $20; Samuel Wilson, Jr., $20; Benjamin Whipple, $20; Earl Cate, $15; James Batchelder, $15; Joseph P. Page, $12; William Moors, $10; Friend M. Morse, $10; Solomon Bartlett, $10; Duron Whittlesey, $10; Andrew Jack, $10; Nehemiah Mack, Jr., $5; Charles

Patterson, $5; Allen Martin, $5; Eben Martin, $5; Richard Kendrick, $3; Elisba Mack, $2; total, $947. $100 was paid for the site, leaving the cost of the house about $850.

In 1852, this was sold to the Baptists and removed, and another built at a cost of a little less than $1,600.

The Vermont Annual Conference was held at Plainfield in 1855, Bishop Edward R. Ames presiding.

The present number in full membership, 132; probationers, 14.

FROM REV. J. R. BARTLETT, OF BARRE.

Rev. Nicholas Snethen, who is mentioned as the first Methodist preacher who visited Plainfield, was the pioneer Methodist preacher in this State. His appointment to Vermont was in 1796, and as he labored in this State but one year, it must have been at that time that he appeared in Plainfield. The records of "Vershire circuit," which was the name of the appointment in the earliest days, are probably not now in existence; but those of "Barre circuit," formed in 1804, are still preserved, and state that the first "quarterly meeting" for Barre circuit was held in Plainfield, Aug. 4th and 5th, 1864, and in Plainfield a little later. The records give Bradford Kinne, Richard Kendrick and Ebenezer Freeman as leaders, 17, 16 and 11 members, respectively, and four "on trial." Mr. Kinne was also a local preacher, and a very active man in the church, and the Rev. Bradford Kinne Pierce, D. D., now the editor of Zion's Herald, published in Boston, was named for him, being the son of Rev. Thomas C. Pierce, and therefore the grandson of Mr. Kinne, who is mentioned in the foregoing sketch as "Judge" Kinne.

This town was included in Barre circuit until 1838, and hence was visited by the appointees to that circuit at stated intervals as a regular preaching place. The names given in the foregoing sketch as Methodist preachers stationed here, are, in several instances at least, of appointees to Barre circuit, there being each year two or three such appointees, and one of them usually resident at Plainfield. On and after the conference of 1838, this station lost its identity with Barre circuit, and the preachers were appointed directly to Plainfield. The complete list of Methodist preachers on Vershire circuit to 1804, and on Barre circuit from that time to 1838, may be found in the history of Barre. The condition of this church has been particularly prosperous during the last three years, about one-third of its present membership having been added during that time.

Barre, Feb. 3, 1882.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH

was organized Oct. 17, 1809, at the school-house near Dea. James Perry's (South district.) The members were: James Boutwell and wife, who withdrew from the Congregationalist church for that purpose, Jacob Perkins, Stephen Perkins and his wife Nancy, John Bancroft and his wife Phœbe. Elder Jabez Cottle and Elder Elijah Huntington were the clergymen present.

At the next meeting Philip Wheeler made a profession of religion, and joined the church. He became pastor afterwards, living near the center of Montpelier, but in 1826, sold his farm, and a house was built for him near the Plainfield Springs. In a few years after this, Stephen Perkins refused to commune, for the reason that Elder Wheeler had said that "he would not baptize a person that he knew intended to join another church." Soon after this, he and his brother Jonathan withdrew from the church. The result of this dissension was, that Elder Wheeler soon closed his pastoral labor with this church, and removed into Marshfield, one half mile east of Plainfield village, where he died.

After Elder Wheeler's dismissal, they were supplied at intervals by different clergymen, none of them living in town except Rev. Friend Blood.

In 1852, the Baptist churches in Plainfield and Marshfield united, and Abraham Bedel became their pastor, residing in Plainfield. The Methodist church was purchased, removed and repaired. Mr.

Bedel was succeeded in 1858 by Mr. Kelton, he in 1859 by S. A. Blake, and he in 1860 by N. W. Smith, who removed in 1862. After that they had only occasional preaching, and in 1871 their church was sold and converted into stores.

THE RESTORATIONIST SOCIETY

was organized in 1820, but had only occasional preaching until in 1840, Rev. L. H. Tabor came to Plainfield, and a church was erected costing $1,770 above the foundations, exclusive of furniture and the bell, the whole amounting to about $2,300.

Mr. Tabor remained 3 years only. The pulpit was afterwards supplied a part of the time by Mark M. Powers, of Washington, and Rufus S. Sanborn, of Barre. They were succeeded in 1854 by William Sias, who remained one or two years.

Rev. Joseph Sargent resided here in 1858 and 1859, Rev. Thomas Walton in 1860 and 1861, after which they had no stated preaching until in 1872, Rev. Lester Warren commenced to preach one half of the time. He was succeeded by Rev. George Forbes the next year. In 1876 L. S. Crossly removed here, and remained one year, since which they have been supplied a part of the time by non-resident preachers.

SCHOOLS.

In 1787, the General Assembly enacted a school law that authorized towns and school districts to build school-houses and support schools by a tax on the grand list. A majority of a town might do this, but it required a two-thirds vote of a school district, and neither a town or school district could tax the property of non-residents for this purpose. This law provided that schools might be supported by subscription, and the district collector had the same power and duties in collecting a subscription that he had in collecting a tax.

In 1803, Plainfield was divided into 5 school districts. The town never voted a tax for schools, and probably none of the districts did for several years. The north-west, or village, district schools were supported by subscription until 1809. They commenced to build a school-house in 1803, finishing it in 1804. It stood just east of the present hotel, in James Martin's garden. This was the first built in town, and was paid for by a tax, one-third payable in money and two-thirds in wheat. This house having been burned in the winter of 1806-7, another was built in 1807, over by the present residence of Geo. C. Wales, near the railroad bridge. In 1826, this district formed a unison with an adjoining district in Marshfield, and a school-house was built near Marshfield line north of the river. In 1866, this district built another school-house near the old one, at a cost of $6,000, exclusive of the site.

The South, or Freeman, district did not have the first school-house in town; but they had the first school-house quarrel. It had been decided to build a school-house at the Four Corners, east of Seth Freeman's, to which the Freemans were opposed. The boys of Elder James Perry and of Philemon Perkins, and others, made arrangements to raise it secretly at midnight. The Freemans learned of the plot, and appeared to help uninvited; but they spelled the word vaze. The result was, nothing was done at that time, but afterwards, in the fall of 1805, the house was built there.

Plainfield village is at the extreme northern part of the town, and as incorporated in 1867, includes a portion of the town of Marshfield. In 1812, it contained about a dozen families, in 1881 about 80.

The first mills were burned the same year they were built. The village suffered no more serious loss by fire until May 16, 1877, when the saw and grist-mills, 4 dwelling-houses, 2 shops and 4 barns were burned. James Richards was convicted of being the incendiary, and is now in prison.

The great freshet of Oct. 1869, carried off the saw and grist-mills, the clothing-works, machine-shop, blacksmith-shop, etc.

Railroad trains commenced to run from Montpelier to Plainfield for traffic, Sept. 17, 1873; to Wells River, Nov. 24, 1873.

It is said that a mail route was established from Montpelier to Danville, via Plainfield, in 1808, and a post-office was probably established at Plainfield at that time; but so little did it affect the daily life of the people, that no one knows who was the first postmaster.

As late as 1823, the fees of the postmaster at Plainfield were only $10.76; at Marshfield, $3.48; Cabot, $6.81; at Montpelier, $138.81. As postage was then very high, and the fees of the small offices about one-half of the gross income, the amount of mail matter must have been small. The mail was carried on horseback until 1827, then in a wagon until 1830, when a coach was put on, which was almost as much an object of curiosity and pride as was the advent of the cars in 1873.

TOWN REPRESENTATIVES.

MASONIC.

RURAL LODGE.—The records of this Lodge having been lost or destroyed, no extended history can be written of it or of its early members. The only authentic papers belonging to it are the original by-laws in manuscript form, from which we learn that a charter was granted by the Grand Lodge at its annual session in Montpelier, Oct. 12, 1825.

The organization of the Lodge was kept up, and some work done, until the annual session of the Grand Lodge in 1830, when they are supposed to have surrendered their charter. Only two of the charter members are known to be living, Daniel Spencer of Plainfield, at the advanced age of 91 years, and Nathaniel C. King, of Montpelier.

WYOMING LODGE, No. 80.—Wyoming Lodge, F. & A. M., No. 80, was chartered by the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Vermont, June 11, A. D. 1868.

Charter Members.—Charles H. Heath, Leroy H. Hooker, Stephen C. Shurtleff, Nathan Skinner, Dudley B. Smith, Jas. M. Perry, Channing Hazeltine, J. M. Richards, William Armstrong, A. H. Whitcomb, Walter B. Page, Mark M. Page, R. H. Christy, Byron Goodwin, Fitch E. Willard, W. S. Little, Ezekiel Skinner, Samuel Simpson, Martin V. B. Hollister, D. M. Gilman, Nathaniel Sherman, Daniel Spencer, Nathaniel Davis, Horace H. Hollister, Nathaniel C. Page, C. W. H. Dwinell, E. O. Hammond, Eben D. Stevens.

First officers: Charles H. Heath, W. M.; Loren H. Hooker, S. W.; Stephen C. Shurtleff, J. W.

Officers for 1881-2: W. R. Gove, W. M.; John W. Fowler, S. W.; Dan. W. Moses, J. W.

REV. C. E. FERRIN, D. D.

CLARK E. FERRIN was born in Holland, Vt., July 20, 1818. He grew up there on the farm with his father till he was of age, teaching a common school in the winter from the time he was 17, and aiding his father in the support of the family. In the fall after he had attained his majority he went to Brownington Academy, of which Rev. A. C. Twilight was preceptor, and began fitting for college. At Brownington he not only set his face collegeward but heavenward, experiencing that change of which our Lord said to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Remaining at Browington about a year, he went to Derby, finished his preparation and entered the University at Burlington in the class of 1841. Though at a disadvantage by lack of early opportunities, by diligent application he gained upon the class during the course, and graduated in 1845, with the last third. The fall after he taught the Academy at Marshfield, and from thence went to Macon, Ga., where he taught for 2 years. From Macon he went to the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., completing the course in the class of 1850. The spring before he graduated at Andover he visited Barton, Vt., preaching there, and receiving a call to the pastorate of the Congregational church. Accepting this call, he was ordained and installed at Barton, in 1857, Rev. O. T. Lamphear, a college classmate, then at Derby, preaching the installation sermon from Exodus IV:14, "I know that he can speak well." Another, a seminary classmate, Rev. Mr. Dean, gave the charge to the people. Zealous and faithful at Barton, he was after nearly 3 years attacked with that facial neuralgia, which rendered his after life one of almost continued pain, and often for months and years at a time one of intense suffering. His enemy compelled him to suspend his ministry at Barton and seek dismissal from his charge. This was granted by council. Dismissed, he sought for a time renewed health and strength in farm labors. As soon as health permitted, he took up the ministry again, received a call, and was installed pastor of the Congregational church in Hinesburgh in 1855. At this second installation, another of his classmates, Rev. N. G. Clark, then professor in the University at Burlington, preached the sermon, and another classmate, Rev. A. D. Barber, of Williston, gave the Right Hand of Fellowship. Here, after no very long time, he began to suffer again from the assaults of his adversary, neuralgia, but for long years, though in real suffering and much of the time in keen distress by day and by night, he persisted in doing a manly work, building with one hand for Christ and his church, and resisting the enemy of his peace and strength with the other. Here, indeed, he fought a good fight, yielding only after many years. In the winter of 1874 he went to Philadelphia, and submitted to the severe surgical operation of removing a part of the facial nerve. This gave only partial relief. In the fall of 1875 he took a voyage to Europe, visiting London and Paris, seeking aid, but finding little. Having failed now for some time in strength, but not in heart to labor, he resigned his pastorate. His resignation was after long waiting and hope of the church and parish for his recovery, accepted, and he was dismissed, having been pastor about 24 years. Remaining in the parsonage at Hinesburgh, and experiencing some relief with returning strength, he was able at length to take up again the work he loved so well. This he did at Plainfield, where he was installed pastor Feb. 13, 1878, Rev. W. S. Hazen, of Northfield, preaching the sermon, from I. Cor. 1:23, "We preach Christ and Him crucified," one of his classmates, again a member of the Council, presided and offered the installing prayer. In this his third and last pastorate, our brother labored continuously and successfully, though his old enemy still pursued him. He ceased his labors and entered into rest, after a sickness entirely prostrating him of about 5 weeks, June, 1881. His experience during this last trial was full of the peace of God. "I am surprised," he wrote, telling us the result of the first council of physicians called to consider his case. "The fullness with which I can say, 'Thy will, not mine,' surprises, almost troubles me."

Mr. Ferrin left a wife, 3 sons and 2 daughters; all fitted for usefulness, and of fine promise; all were present at the time of his death. His oldest son, reaching home but a few days before, is Professor William Ferrin, of Pacific University, at Forest Grove, Oregon. The oldest daughter is the wife of Rev. John Cowan, of Essex.

At the funeral, ten neighboring ministers were present, the deacons of the church from Williston and Montpelier, and a good delegation from Hinesburgh and other towns. His children conducted the services at the house, Prof. Ferrin reading select passages of Scripture, Rev. Mr. Cowan offering prayer, and all the family uniting in singing the hymn, "Rock of ages cleft for me." The service was beautiful, tender and touching. The casket was borne by his brother ministers. At the church, Rev. C. S. Smith read the Scripture, Rev. J. H. Hincks offered prayer, his two classmates, Rev. J. G. Hale and A. D. Barber, spoke; Mr. Hale, of Mr. Ferrin as a man, of his place in college and in the ministry, and Mr. Barber of him as a Christian pastor.

Mr. Ferrin, besides his work as minister, was a most respected and highly useful citizen. He represented the town of Hinesburgh in the legislature one or two sessions, was a faithful and influential member of the corporation of the University for more than 20 years. He received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from Middlebury College at the commencement, a year ago, and was a man such that the family, the church and the State can alike trust.

[Mr. Ferrin compiled from the papers of the venerable Erastus Bostwick the history of Hinesburgh for Vol. I. in this work, and in Vol. III. wrote the biographical sketch of the Rev. O. T. Lamphear in the history of Orleans County.]

FUNERAL HYMN FOR GARFIELD.

BY MRS. E. E. YAW.

(Written for the memorial services at Plainfield, Sept. 21, 1881.)

Years a-gone, a cry of woe
Rose to Heaven an April day,
As beneath a murderer's hand
Our martyred Lincoln bleeding lay.
Revive the story of that crime,
How all nations mourned with us,
Bowing with uncovered heads,
Weeping o'er his honored dust.

And to-day, in grief again—
Lord of nations, Lord of might—
We come to thee with cries of pain;
Shine upon our dreary night.
Ah, our tears they fall like rain
That the honor nobly gave,
Placing Garfield at the nation's head,
Led so close beside a grave.

Lay him softly in his narrow bed,
Cover him with garlands fair,
Gentle zephyrs, requiems slung;
Angels watch—leave him there.

The services were in charge of the pastor.
Remarks were made by O. L. Hoyt, E. N. Morse, Dr. D. B. Smith, Godwin Reed, Ira Stone, Joseph Bartlett, Allan Ferrin and H. O. Perry.

Mary E. Davis, also, born in this town, has published a book of verse, of which, had a volume been placed at our command, in time, we should have given a review.

ROXBURY.

BY MRS. SARAH BRIGHAM MANSFIELD.

Located in the south part of Washington County, 17 miles south-westerly from Montpelier; bounded N. by Northfield, E. by Brookfield, S. by Braintree and Granville, and W. by Warren; was granted Nov. 6, 1780, and chartered to Hon. Benjamin Emmonds and others August 6, 1781; 23,040 acres, situated on the height of the land between Winooski and White rivers. The village is at the summit, the highest point of land on the Central Vt. R. R. There are no large streams. Three branches of Dog river flow north into the Winooski; one rising on the East Hill, flows south, passing a branch of Dog river at the Summit, one running north, the other south, the latter into White river.

Many years ago, one Capt. Ford, who owned a manufacturing establishment at Randolph, and wished a greater supply of water, came to the Summit, and turned the course of the stream going north into the one flowing south, deriving great benefit therefrom, but of short duration. The trick was detected by mill-owners north, and he was obliged to undo his work, and let the river take its natural course.

There are two natural ponds in town, one just south of the village and one on East Hill. Both have at one time been homes for the "beaver," where they built dams and carried on business beaver style; but long ago they deserted their old haunts, and the pond that once reached to where the village now is, is fast disappearing, and a few years hence will no doubt be terra firma.

The surface is uneven, but the soil is fertile. There are some fine dairy farms along the river, and the hill farms are well adapted to wheat raising. The timber is mostly hard wood, with some spruce, hemlock and fir. Rocks, argillaceous slate, soapstone and marble.

There were three divisions of land in this township; the 1st div., the north half of that portion of the town lying east of this valley; the 2d div., the south half; the 3d div., the western side of the town.

The 1st and 2d contain 100 acres; the 3d, 136.

The first road laid in town was in 1799, from Warren line down to the first branch of White River, to the north line of Kingston (now Granville). Next, on the hill west of said branch, from Kingston, until it joins the branch road toward Warren. The third road led from Samuel Richardson's house by John Stafford's and Wilcox's to Warren; Samson Nichols surveyor. In 1802, the road through the middle of the town, from Northfield to Brookfield, was laid out, 6 rods wide. A road was surveyed from Northfield to Brookfield through the east part of the town, in 1802. In 1806, the road was laid from Samuel Smith's on East Hill, by Wm. Gold's to east part of the town. These are a few of the first roads surveyed in town.

The first town meeting was held at the house of Jedediah Huntington; the warning was dated at Williamstown, Mar. 12, 1796, signed by Joseph Crane, justice of the peace, and the meeting was held Mar. 25, 1796; when following the town officers were elected in Roxbury: Joseph Crane, moderator; Thomas Huntington, clerk; Samuel Richardson, Isaac Lewis, Jedediah Huntington, selectmen; David Cram, treasurer; Jonathan Huntington, constable; David Cram and Thomas Huntington, listers; Samuel Richardson and Christopher Huntington, highway surveyors. The sum total of the grand list at this time was £165 and 15s. Zebediah Butler was first town representative; he resided south of what is known as E. K. Young's place.

The first warning for freeman's meeting was in 1797.

Record of the meeting: The freemen of Roxbury, all to a man, met at the house of Jedediah Huntington, in said town, according to warning, when the freeman's oath was duly administered by the town clerk to the following men: Christopher Huntington, Roswell Adams, Isaac Lewis, David Cram, John Stafford, Benoni Webster, Jedediah Huntington, Perus Huntington, Benjamin Hunter, Jr., Daniel Corbin, Chester Batchelder.

The freemen voted as follows: For Gov.,

Isaac Tichenor 9, Nathaniel Niles 4, Paul Brigham 1; Lieut. Gov., Paul Brigham 10, Nathaniel Niles 3; Treas., Samuel Mattocks 14; for counsellors, Elisha Allen 11, Cornelius Lynde 10, Elias Stevens 9, Jonas Galusha 2, Joel Marsh 9, Reuben Hatch 2, Martin Chittenden 2, Joseph Hubbard 1, Ebenezer Walbridge 4, John French 6.

Thomas Huntington, town clerk.

Freeman's oath had previously been administered to Samuel Richardson, Thomas and Jonathan Huntington. There were just 14 voters in town, at that time. In Mar., 1799, voted that from Apr. 1 to May 20, it shall not be lawful for sheep or swine to run at large on the commons or highways, and if willfully or negligently allowed to run, the owners thereof shall pay double damages. When there were neither highways or commons, even passable for swine or sheep! They also voted, at the same time, that Joseph Newton should have approbation to retail liquors to travellers the ensuing year. For all their privations or hard struggles, these early settlers seemed to have a vein of drollery and fun underlying all. In 1802, they called a meeting to see if the town would vote to set the small pox in town. Not wanting it, voted to dissolve the meeting. Sept. 12, 1803, called a meeting to see if the town would vote to set up inoculation of small pox in town; did not want it, and dissolved the meeting. In 1806, voted to raise 7 mills on a dollar for the purpose of buying surveying implements. Chose Samuel Robertson surveyor for the town—to have the use of the instruments for doing the surveying for said town. A compass and chain was bought, a very good one for those times, and is still the property of the town. In 1811, voted to set off the east part of the town to Brookfield. Voted to petition the general assembly at their next session to be annexed to Jefferson Co., (now Washington). To be stingy and small with their neighbors did not seem to be a fault with them.

On record, Jan. 26, 1799, "I, Samuel Richardson, in consideration of the love and good will I bear to my well respected friend, Polly Corbin, gave her a deed of 20 acres of land."

First land tax in town: Petitioned to the legislature for a land tax in 1796. The legislature, then in session at Windsor, raised a tax of one cent on an acre of land in said town. The "delinquents" lands to be sold the 8th day of May, 1798, at David Cram's dwelling-house, by David Cram, constable.

July 31, '98, vendue sale of lands at Jedediah Huntington's, by Abel Lyman, collector.

First deed upon the land records: from Asa Huntington to Daniel Kingsbury, dated at Brookfield, Sept. 3, 1794, recorded Mar. 24, 1796.

In June, 1812, called a meeting to see if the town would provide arms, ammunition and equipments for the soldiers who have this day volunteered in the service of their country as minute men. Voted that the monthly pay of each minute man should be raised three dollars per month, while in actual service, payable in grain or neat stock. Voted to deposit magazine and public arms at the dwelling-house of Elijah Ellis, the town having received gun powder and lead. In 1816, voted to set off 4 tiers of lots on east side of town, to form a separate town with part of Brookfield. Passed the same vote in 1827, and seems to have been dropped there, as there is no farther record of the matter.

Christopher Huntington was the first settler. He came to the east part of the town, and built the first house, where O. A. Thayer now lives. He came from Mansfield, Conn., where his children were born, but had resided in Norwich a short time before coming here. He also preached the first sermon in town, to a small but no doubt appreciative audience. He was a Universalist minister, and as the town became settled, preached in various places.

Mr. Huntington drew his goods into town on a hand-sled on bare ground, and with the other early settlers, endured privations hard to realize from the standpoint of to-day. His daughter, Lydia, died Jan. 23, 1792, at the age of 17, the first death in town. Mr. Huntington removed to Canada in 1804. The Mr. Huntington who recently died in Canada, bequeathing $25,000 to the State of Vermont, is said to be one of his sons. Another son was several years a Baptist preacher in Braintree.

SAMUEL RICHARDSON

was the first to settle in the west part of the town. He was born in Stafford, Conn., June 13, 1750, and was a veteran of the Revolutionary War, having "been out" nearly half the war. His wife, Susanna Pinney, was born July, 1749. After their marriage, they came to Randolph and settled. When the Indians burned Royalton, they passed through Randolph and burned the house next to theirs, but it being somewhat retired, they probably did not discern it. Mr. R. came to this town in 1790, and built a small log-house near where the watch factory now stands, and returned home to come back again in the early spring with his son, Uriah, whom tradition has it, brought a five-pail iron-kettle on his back through the deep snow, with marked trees for roads. A niece of his has injured the story, by declaring her ancestor to have been a brave lad and a willing one, but that he was not a Hercules, and it was really a seven-pail brass-kettle. Well, even that seems almost incredible, considering the distance, and roads. After the sugar-making was well begun, Mr. Richardson returned to Randolph, leaving his son alone in the wilderness for 6 weeks. No one to speak to, no daily or weekly paper; but the solemn hoot of the owl, the lonesome winds through the trees, the howling of the hungry wolves about his cabin, as he said, made weird music, not exactly conducive to sleep. But his father came with the rest of the family as soon as snow was gone. There are said to have been several reasons why Mr. Richardson moved into this wilderness. One, he was greatly averse to his children marrying, and his sons were becoming sturdy young men, and his daughters tall and handsome. And he was not the only one who seemed to realize the fact. Beaux would drop in of an evening; the little by-play on the old settle by the fireplace—naming the rosy-cheeked apples, and comparing them to the not less rosy cheeks of the maidens, going on under pater familias' eye, not unnoticed; no sympathetic chord in his heart vibrating to the echo of "long ago," when he leaned over the gate, and made love to the fair Susanna after escorting her home from spelling-school, away down in old Connecticut. To keep the necks of his offspring out of the "noose," he reflected the surest way was to get them where beaux and belles were not, and removed his family to the wilderness; but even there, four of them out-generalled him at last. His eldest daughter, Sarah, and Chester Batchelder, Jan. 27, 1799, by Israel Converse, justice of the peace, were made one, and this was the first marriage in town. Hannah, taking courage from the example of her elder sister, married Peter S. P. Staples. Lydia married Charles Cotton, hesitatingly, not swiftly, as lovely maidens should be expected to wed—her lithe form had lost some of its willowy grace, her cheek its first youthful bloom; she was a bride of 45 summers. Samuel married Sally Ellis. Half his children were gone, but by the care and admonitions of this tender sire, half his family were still preserved, four perpetually saved from marriage fate.

That the "females" of this unmated half of the Richardson family were able to care for themselves, and give a helping hand to the weak of the stronger sex, the following proveth: "Tim" Emerson had a large amount of grain to be harvested, and no help to be had at any price; it was already over-ripe; Susan and Mary Richardson, who were noted for thrift, and disliked to see anything go to waste, offered, if their brother would accompany them, to give the poor man a lift. The men folk smiled as the resolute damsels came into the field, but as the golden grain fell before their gleaming sickles, and was dexterously bound and placed in stooks by their deft hands, the men hung their diminished heads, and the perspiration coursed down their brown cheeks as they vainly strove to keep pace with their fair reapers. Before night tradition saith each masculine had fallen meekly to the rear. Mary and Susan sheared their own sheep, and if occasion required, could chop off a 2 foot log as soon as most men.

woods. She heard a strange cry as of some one in distress. It was growing dusk, the sound came nearer and nearer; she could see it was gaining upon her at every step. She was a very courageous person, not easily scared, but as those quick, sharp screams fell upon her ears, the grass didn't grow under her feet until she reached the clearing; but, once out of the woods, she gathered her sheep into a place of safety before she sought shelter for herself. It was found, the next day, a catamount had followed her; his tracks were plainly visible in the soft earth. It had followed her to the edge of the woods, which reached nearly to her house. At another time, she, with a friend who was visiting her, went to a neighbor's for an "afternoon tea." It was late before they got started for home, and all the way through the woods. They heard the dismal howling of wolves. Susan knew the sound very well, but her friend, unused to pioneer life, had no idea, and wondered, as Susan took her babe from her arms and hurried rapidly forward. When they reached the clearing, and Susan had gathered in her sheep, and they were safe in the house, she told her friend it was wolves they had heard, and they would surely have got her baby had they not quickened their pace.

A grand-daughter of Mrs. Richardson's told me another little incident that occurred when she was a child of twelve. Herself and a younger brother were in the woods gathering flowers, they had wandered some ways farther than they were aware, the sister was wakened to a realizing sense of it when she spied, but a few feet from them, a large white-faced bear, erect on his hind paws, coming towards them. Not wishing to frighten her brother, who was very timid, and fearing he would be overcome with terror, she took him by the hand and strove to hurry him away; but no, just a few more flowers, he said. He was determined not to go home. "See there," said she, pointing to the bear, who stood contemplating the situation. The boy beheld, and gave so terrific a scream, that the bear turned and fled as fast as his clumsy limbs could carry him, preferring to go without his supper to making it off a boy who could scream so loud.

Another reason given (to return to Mr. Richardson's reasons for coming to this town), was that when the bass viol was carried into church at Randolph, it was more than his orthodox nerves could stand, and he preferred the primeval forest, "God's own temple," with the birds to sing anthems of praise, and no profane, new-fangled instrument, made by the hand of man, with which to worship God for him. He was a Congregationalist deacon, and his wife was a member of the Baptist church. They lived in their log-house only about a year, and then moved farther up, where they built the first framed house in town—where Julius Kent now lives—many years afterwards sold to Jonathan Burroughs, and moved near the village, and is the frame of Mrs. Martell's house.

Mr. Richardson built a saw and grist-mill above where Mr. Kent now lives, and a larger house leading to the S. E. Spaulding place. A grand-daughter of theirs, who is now 79 years of age, and who spent much of her childhood with them, tells me Mr. Pinney, the father of her grandmother Richardson, was high in the esteem of King George, and was commissioned by him to attend to a great deal of business for His Majesty in New England.

GEORGE the Third, by the Grace of GOD of Great Britain, France and Ireland, KING, Defender of the Faith, &c.

To all to whom these Presents shall come,
GREETING.

KNOW YE, That We have assigned, constituted and appointed, and by these Presents do assign, constitute and appoint Our trusty and well beloved Subject, Isaac Pinney, Esq., to be Judge of Our Court of Probate, to be holden within the District of Stafford, in our Colony of Connecticut, in New England, with the Assistance of a Clerk, to hold our said Court of Probate of Wills, granting of Administration, appointing and allowing of Guardians, with full Power to act in all Matters proper for a prerogative Court.

In Testimony whereof, We have caused the Seal of Our said Colony to be hereunto affixed. Witness, Jonathan Trumbull, Esq., Governor of our said Colony of Connecticut, and with the Consent of the General Assembly of the same in Hartford, this first Day of June, in the 13th Year of Our Reign, Annoué Domini, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-three. By His Honor's Command,

At one time he received important messages from the King, and although he had six clerks, he took his daughter, afterward Mrs. R., from school as his private secretary. His daughters were all taught the science of medicine, and Mrs. R. attended to the sick in this town before other physicians came in, and some afterwards, going about on horseback, with a heavy riding dress for unpleasant weather. She never shrank where duty called, and not expecting other recompense than the gratitude of those she served; for in those primitive days the few inhabitants were not burdened with riches, and were neighborly to each other.

One fall, seeing the destitution around them, Mr. R. took a yoke of oxen to Williamstown, exchanged them for potatoes, and divided them among the destitute, taking his pay in work as they could do it. Mrs. Richardson at this time gave her family two meals per day, with a cup of milk for supper, giving what they saved by so doing to the needy ones.

Living on the road that crossed the mountain to Warren, the glimmer of light from their windows was often a most welcome sight to the benighted traveler. A man overtaken by night, with intense cold and darkness, crawled on his hands and knees for miles, fearing he should lose the track that led to their house, knowing if he did he must perish. Large, warm hearts these people had, with a hand ever out reached to help any poorer than themselves. Their noble charities, their exemplary Christian characters amid all the struggles and hardships of pioneer life, are most worthy of imitation. They, with their children, all of whom reached maturity, now rest in the old burying-ground, near the residence of O. A. Staples.

DAVID CRAM,

one of the next to come into town, was from Lyndsboro, N. H. His son, Philip, born Mar. 18, 1795, was the first male child born in town. Lydia Huntington, daughter of Jedediah H., got four days start of him, so the honor of being the first child born in town rests upon her. Whether she is living, I am unable to say; but Philip Cram married Abigail Heath, of Randolph, and is now living in Brookfield.

Daniel Corbin came from Randolph about this time, and Isaac Lewis, David, Robert and Jonathan Cram located on farms now owned by Messrs. Chatterton, Bowman and Orra Boyce.

Benoni Webster came, in 1798, I think, from Connecticut, and located on the place now occupied by James Steele. Mr. Webster came from Connecticut with an ox-team, rather a slow mode of conveyance for the distance, but "patience and perseverance" were household words in those days. The "blue laws" did not allow people to be moving on Sunday in the old state, and Mr. Webster was stopped in a small village to give an account of himself. He declared it was against his principles to be traveling on the Sabbath, but his wife had been exposed to the small pox, and he was in great haste to get to his journey's end. He was allowed to pass on. His oldest son, Charles, born in Connecticut, married Eleanor P. Ryder, and settled in the east part of this town, where his second son, Aaron, now resides, and is the only one of the family in the State.

Charles Webster was killed by being thrown from his carriage in 1834. Benoni Webster, the youngest of the family, is still living, at an advanced age, in Northfield. He was born in a barn, not a modern affair, but an old log-barn. Whether he was cradled in a manger, tradition saith not. One of the children being so ill he could endure no noise, to secure him the quiet needed to save his life, the rest of the family moved into the barn, with the exception of one to nurse the sick child, and there they remained until he was restored to health, which was over a year.

JOEL HILDRETH

came to this township in the autumn of 1797, from Cornish, N. H., and boarded with a family who lived on the farm now owned by G. L. Walbridge, while he built his log-house on the place now owned by Mr. George Williams, who purchased of Mr. Hildreth's grand-son, Samuel A. Hildreth, a few years since. One morning soon after Mr. Hildreth was settled in his cabin, he heard a rooster crow to the eastward, and as the ringing notes came across the wooded valley, it fell upon his ears like music. He followed that "crow" for four or five miles, and at last found his new neighbors in Northfield, near where William Winch now resides.

Mr. Hildreth, with his trusty rifle, was a terror to the denizens of the forest, having, to use his own words, "unbuttoned many a bear's shirt collar." Upon one occasion returning late in the evening from his day's work, he heard a bear clambering down a tree close at hand. He could hear his claws clinging in the bark, and could just discern in the darkness the dim outlines of his unwieldy figure. He was alone in the forest, a great ways from home; thoughts of the dear ones there awaiting him nerved his arm. He dealt the bear a powerful blow with his ax, and fled. Returning next morning to the "scene of carnage," they found he had decapitated a huge hedge-hog, and pinned him to the tree with his ax. Mr. Hildreth resided on the place he had cleared up until his death in 1844.

known as Deacon Gold, came to town with Samuel Robertson, and after working for him one year, bought a piece of land, a mile east of Dog river, and built a log-cabin. This is where he had a famous bear fight. The bears had been making havoc with the Deacon's cornfield, and he swore a "pious oath" [made a pious resolve would be better for a deacon], the thieves should be captured. A trap was devised that none but a very wise bear would fail of walking straight into, for a taste of the tempting bait. The bear that came was not a wise one, for when the Deacon appeared on the ground next morning, bright and early, sure enough there was a great surly fellow, with one of his hind paws fast in the trap. The Deacon seized a club and rushed forward, old bruin equally ready and delighted with an interview, striking the club from his hand like a flash, cordially clasped the Deacon in his furry arms, and had about squeezed the life out of him, when the hired man, Paddleford, came to the rescue with an axe. "Don't cut the hide!" gasped the Deacon, as bruin clasped him in a still more fervid embrace. The hide was cut in several places before the poor Deacon was released, who, though "pure grit," came out of the combat in a sadly demolished condition, and carried the marks of bear teeth and claws to his grave.

From John Gregory's History of Northfield.

DEA. WILLIAM GOLD,

born in Springfield, Mass., Oct. 30, 1780; came to Roxbury in 1801, and settled upon one of the highest mountains in that town. He was a deacon of the Baptist church. Any one at this day looking the mountain land over where he located, can see under what discouraging circumstances this early settler was placed.

In 1847, he removed to Northfield. He married Annevera Dewey, who was born in 1780; had 7 children: Annevera, William, Sherman, Buel, Joseph, Mary, Sophia, all born in Roxbury. Deacon Gold died in 1859; Mrs. Gold in 1856.

JOHN B. CRANDALL.

moved into town in 1804; was eccentric, quite a pettifogger, and always called "Judge." One time, having a lawsuit, he became disgusted with his counsel, considered an able lawyer, paid him off and dismissed him before the suit was fairly commenced, plead his own case, and won it. Another time he went to Waitsfield to take charge of a lawsuit. Knowing his opponent, an attorney from Montpelier, to be extremely fastidious in his tastes and manner of dress, he chose the other extreme, an awfully shabby coat, and trowsers that suggested the idea that some time in an earlier stage of existence they had been the property of a Methodist preacher—they had certainly done a great deal of knee service—a dilapidated hat, a boot on one foot, an old shoe on the other, completed his outfit. The fine gentleman strutting back and forth in dignity, wondered why Mr. Crandall did not arrive, when some one turning to Mr. C., introduced them. The Montpelier attorney looked at Mr. C., surprise and contempt expressed in every feature. "What, that creature!" he at last blurted out; "why, he don't know enough to say boo to a goose." The "Judge" drew his grotesque figure to its full height, made a low bow, and said "boo!" very emphatically in the face of the offended lawyer, which brought down the house, and the sleek gentleman was yet more discomfited when he lost his case, and the "Judge" won the laurels he had anticipated.

Mr. Crandall's widow married Jonathan Lamson, of Fayston, where she died a few years since, at the advanced age of 108. (See History of Fayston.)

came to town in 1810, and settled on the farm now occupied by his son, Lewis. He was a man of peculiarities, but sterling worth. He, like many of the early settlers, had a hard struggle to feed and clothe his family. One winter he fortunately captured a huge bear, whose meat and lard kept grim want from the door till spring. He made a business of hop raising the last 40 years, and through industry and frugality, acquired a competence. He died in 1880, aged 94.

BILLA WOODARD

came from Tolland, Conn., in 1802; settled on East Hill, and was for many years engaged in the manufacture of saddle-trees, and the only one in New England for a long time in that business.

HON. CHARLES SAMSON

came here in 1810. Z. S. Stanton, in his Historical Centennial Address, thus speaks of him:

He accompanied his father, Benjamin Franklin, who was a veteran of the Revolution, and participated in the battle of Lexington and Bunker Hill.

Mr. Samson bought the place where L. A. Rood now lives. The previous occupant was Dr. Stafford, who kept a tavern, and the first in town. Charles Samson settled where Mr. Wetmore lives. He has been closely identified with the affairs of this town ever since, and is still permitted to be with us. He has represented the town in the legislature of the State for 13 sessions, and has held many other important positions in the town and county. It was owing to his exertions that Roxbury was transferred from Orange to Washington County, in 1820. In those days the main road through the west part of the town, which was also the stage road, led from where A. J. Averill now lives past where the residences of W. I. Simonds and S. G. Stanton now are, and intercepted the mountain road near where Mrs. Brackett now lives, thence up where the present road is as far as the old mill above Royal Batchelder's house, and then past the present residence of O. A. Staples, down to the "Branch road," where Samuel Edwards now lives. From here it followed its present course. There was also a road through the eastern part of the town, and also the central part, where E. K. Young now resides. Elijah Ellis lived where Mrs. Brackett now does. He built the house at this place, and it was the first house built in town that was arranged for the use of stoves, I am informed. He had no fireplace or "stack of chimneys," as they were called, and people thought it a great departure from the old ways. He built the first clover-mill that was erected in this town, on the site now occupied by S. N. Miller's carriage-shop. He also erected a saw-mill at this place.

BENONI WEBSTER,

(BY A. WEBSTER.)

A native of Connecticut, brought his family to Roxbury in the spring of 1797. He had previously lived in Hartland, Vt., a few years.

He settled in the N. E. part of the town on lot No. 3, of the 1st range, now owned by James Steele, which he had bought in 1796, then an unbroken wilderness. His first house was logs, roofed with bark, and floored with split basswood, smoothed with an axe. In 1810, he built a large framed-house, making the rooms about 2 feet higher than it was usual to make them at that time, so that "Uncle Sam Metcalf (of Royalton), could stand up in them with his hat on." The doors were also made unusually high, so that his wife's tall relations could come in without stooping, as he said. He was the first to plant fruit trees in town, a large apple orchard, and pear and plum trees in the garden being among his earlier improvements.

It is said that at the time of the memorable great November snow-storm, the effects of which may still be seen in our forests in bent and distorted trees, while the family were at dinner, the young apple trees were discovered to be breaking down beneath the fast accumulating snow, and the boys left their bowls of "hominy and milk" to shake the apple trees, which were saved only by repeating the shaking at short intervals through the afternoon and evening.

In 1804, his entire stock of cattle, consisting of a yoke of 4-years-old oxen and of 2 cows, were bitten by a mad dog that came along, and all died and were buried in one hole together.

Mr. Webster died Jan. 8, 1823, aged 60 years, 9 months, 21 days, leaving a wife, who died in 1838, aged 66 years, and 6 sons and 4 daughters, all of whom lived to have families of their own. Of these but two, Edmund Webster, of Randolph, and Benoni Webster, of Northfield, are known to be now living; but the descendants of the third and fourth generations are widely scattered through the country from New Hampshire in the East to California in the West, and from Minnesota in the north to Texas in the South; but one family, that of the writer, being left in Roxbury.

CHARLES WEBSTER.

BY A. WEBSTER.

Charles, oldest son of Benoni and Sally Metcalf Webster, was born June 5, 1790, at Lebanon Parish, Conn., and came to Roxbury with his father when 7 years old, and was educated in the common schools of district No. 1 and the home college by his father's hearth, reading by the light of the open fire during the autumn and winter evenings. It was his custom to keep a supply of birch bark to furnish light when the usual fire was insufficient.

Being the oldest boy and large of his age, he was his father's chief assistant in clearing away the forest and making a cultivated farm. One of his recreations at this time was fishing in the stream that runs through the valley half a mile north of his father's farm, where the brook trout were so abundant that he often hired one of the Adams boys to help him carry his fish up the hill, home.

The wolves made havoc with the sheep of the neighborhood, and he and the Gallup boys devised a plan to capture them. They built a conical pen of saplings, about 6 feet high, and placed in it a couple of lambs to entice the wolves into the trap, shrewdly calculating while it would be easy for the wolves to run up the inclined sides and leap down into the pen, it would not be so easy for them, after gorging with mutton, to leap out.

Sanguine of success, they visited the trap every morning, expecting to find a large pack of fierce wolves safely corraled and howling with rage. This for several mornings. At length, one morning when they came to inspect, beginning to wonder why the wolves were so slow in getting in; the trap seemed to be empty. No lambs appeared skipping around within, and after a close examination, there appeared only a few bones and shreds of wool. The wolves had doubtless climbed upon the shoulders of each other and got out. Their two lambs were gone for nought. Not to be foiled in this way, the boys immediately built a much stronger and higher pen, but the wolves were not heard from afterwards, and it was supposed they left the place in disgust.

He commenced teaching school when quite young, and followed it for fourteen winters, acquiring such a reputation as a teacher and disciplinarian that his services were often sought for in schools where other teachers had failed.

On one occasion, it is said that some large boys burned his ferule, and made other preparations for carrying him out, as they had a previous teacher. The game commenced promptly, but a leg hastily wrenched from a bench did such effective service that there was no further use for instruments of discipline during that term.

In Aug. 1823, he married Eleanor P. Ryder, and settled on his farm in East Roxbury, half a mile below the mills where his son, Aaron, now resides, where he lived till the next spring, when, having bought a part of the farm of his father's estate, he moved on to it, and lived there until the spring of 1830, when he returned to his first farm, where he lived until his death, Nov. 5, 1834.

About 1830, he raised from his famous "Wild Air" mare twin colts, of which he was proud; but one of which, a noble and powerful animal, but skittish and uncontrollable when frightened, was the occasion of his instantaneous death, by being thrown from his wagon in the night, near the Peck farm in Brookfield. He had often expressed a presentiment that he should die by accident, and was the last of three cousins, the oldest sons of three sisters, to be killed instantly by accident.

SPAULDING FAMILY.

Darius Spaulding was from Plainfield, Conn., married Hannah Ingraham from Providence, R. I. They had a number of children when they came here, in 1799. Mr. Spaulding came in the fall, slashed a piece, built a log-house, and moved his family the next spring. Nearly, and perhaps all the Spauldings in town at the present day, and they are very numerous, are descendants of Darius and Hannah Spaulding. They reared a family of 8 sons and 3 daughters.

Gilbert, the eldest, married Renda McClure, moved to New York, and died at the ripe age of 90. He was a great chopper, even for those days, when all were supposed to know how to wield an ax. It is said 8 cords only made him a fair day's work, nothing at all to boast of.

Darius Jr. married Betsey Spaulding, and they lived and died at a good old age, in Roxbury. Two of their sons still live in town, Charles and Samuel.

John, the 3d son of Darius Sen., married Betsey McClure, of Stafford, Conn. They commenced keeping hotel in 1822, near where Julius Kent now lives. They had also a saw and grist-mill.

Mr. Burnham, merchant at Roxbury village, says, when a small boy, he went there with his grist, and Mrs. Spaulding who was an energetic little woman, took his grain, carried it into the mill, ground it and brought it back to him.

Mr. Spaulding built the Summit House in 1830, where he remained until a few years previous to his death, in 1864. His widow is still living, hale and happy, loved and respected. Her friends celebrated her 90th birth-day the 9th of last Sept. [1881.] She has had 5 children, all of whom are living, Erastus N. Billings, Mrs. P. Wiley, Mrs. Brackett and Mrs. A. N. Tilden. All living in their native town, clustered about their aged mother.

Philip married Polly Nichols, of Northfield, is now living in Hermon, N. Y., 84 years of age.

Erastus, the 4th son, built the house where Dea. Edwards now lives, and kept a hotel there several years. He married a widow, Whitcomb, by name, from Waitsfield. They removed to DeKalb, N. Y., where he died a short time since, at an advanced age.

Allen was their first child, born in this town in 1804, and married Hannah Samson in 1828; moved on to the Rood place, and kept a small store 3 years; then built a store in the village, which he occupied for 10 years, near the R. R. crossing, where Geo. Butterfield now resides. He represented the town 4 years. He enlisted, in '61, in Co. H, 6 Vt. Reg., as major; was appointed sergeant with captain's pay.

At one time during the war, he was ordered to take a small squad of men, and go in search of cattle for beef, as it had been a long time the regiment had subsisted on salt meat and "hard tack." They travelled till nearly night before they got track of what they were in quest of, and they found themselves 25 miles from camp in the enemy's territory. Being told a woman near by owned a fine flock of sheep, he took a couple of men and called on her. She with her two daughters sat on a rustic seat in a beautiful garden, surrounded with the appearances of wealth and luxury. He made known his errand, when out of her mouth poured a torrent of oaths and the coarsest invectives that he had ever heard a woman utter, abusing him and the Union army in general. A servant rode up on an elegant horse, and dismounting, asked his mistress "if she knew she was addressing Union officers?" She said she knew it very well. The Major informed her he came to buy her sheep, but as she had none to sell to "Union men," he should take them without if they suited him, and ordering one of his men to mount the horse her servant had just dismounted from, they rode off, amid the hysterical screams of the mother and daughters. They camped for the night on an old plantation, about 2 miles from there, but had pickets out to keep an eye on the movements of the enemy. After all was quiet at the plantation, 200 mounted darkies came, and attempted to retake the widow's property, but at the first crack of a rifle, they "skedaddled." The Major got back to camp with 25 head of fat cattle, and presented the beautiful pony to the Colonel.

At another time there were 100 men sick, and the surgeon said they would all die unless they had milk. The Major was ordered to take 10 men and go and buy milk for the sick. They went to a plantation where 100 cows were kept, just as they were coming off the ranche to be milked. They asked to buy milk for sick soldiers. The surly old fellow said he had "no milk to sell Union soldiers." The Major went back, got a permit from the Provost Marshal, and was there early the next morning; selected 10 fine cows, and in spite of the old gentleman's protesting, drove them to camp. The sick had milk freely, and when they were ordered to Florida, in 6 weeks from that time, every man but one was able to go. The Major turned over his dairy to the Provost Marshal, according to army regulations, and the surly old fellow who would not sell milk to sick soldiers, never recovered his lost kine.

So carefully did Major Spaulding look after the interests of the soldiers, he was called the father of the regiment. He is now living, hale and hearty, at the age of 77, and the oldest person living but one who was born in town, and has lived there the most part of his life.

SAMUEL ROBERTSON,
(BY ORAMEL RICHARDSON.)

Son of Patrick and Elizabeth Robertson, natives of Scotland, was born in New London, Ct., Aug. 18, 1775. He lost his father when quite young. His mother married again, and lived in Stafford, Ct., where he lived till he came to this town. Aug. 1801, he married Persis Richardson, of Tolland, Ct., and the next March they moved here, on to the place now owned by John Cumins, on East Hill. Their first business after getting settled was sugaring. They made 16 pounds, their stock of sugar for that year.

There were only five or six families in that part of the town. Mr. Samuel Richardson had a few years before begun a settlement in the extreme west part of the town, and that at this time was the "center" of civilization, and here Mr. Robertson taught a school during the winter of 1802 and '3. The school-house was the first framed building in town, and stood very nearly where the Royal Batchelder house now does. He had 68 scholars, and the room being small, they were packed like "herrings in a box," and came from five or six miles around in different directions. He lived some 3 miles distant, and walked to and from his school each day through the deep snows, with no track most of the way except what he made himself. He taught here two or three succeeding winters, and during the time moved into the school-house he had occupied, and lived there a few years, when he bought the land now owned by Hira G. Ellis, and made a permanent settlement, clearing up the forests and erecting comfortable buildings. His house was on the old road leading by where Dea. W. I. Simonds and S. G. Stanton now live. He moved his buildings, about 1834, down on to the county road, where they now stand. Here he lived until within 12 years of his death.

He possessed a vigorous mind, and was very fond of investigation and argument, especially on religious subjects. His house was known far and wide as the "minister's tavern," and ministers of all "evangelical sects" usually made it their home when in that vicinity, and nothing suited him better than to have some stiff Baptist or Calvinist stop over night. On all such occasions, as soon as supper was over, chores done and candles lighted, the gauntlet was sure to be thrown down, and then came the "tug of war"—generally the old clock in the "square room" struck twelve before the battle ceased, and then only from exhaustion, and never because either party considered themselves vanquished. He was a great reader, and never failed or feared to express his opinion on any subject up for public discussion, and never failed to cast his vote every year after he attained his majority until his death. He was once in the state of New York, teaching, when an election occurred, and altho' but a temporary resident of the state, so great was his interest in the election, he purchased a piece of land for the sole purpose of being qualified to vote (a property qualification being then necessary in that state).

He held many town offices in the early part of his life, but was rather too pronounced and positive in his opinions of men and measures to be "popular" in political circles. He took an active part in the first temperance movement which agitated New England. He had previous to that time been a temperate user of ardent spirits, but when the subject was presented to him, he at once gave it his unqualified support, and conferring "not with flesh and blood," he banished every drop from his house, and going farther, he abandoned the use of tobacco, breaking a habit of 30 years standing.

There is an anecdote about his using tobacco: Some 60 years ago, Moses Claf-lin, a simple man who lived in this town, who occasionally made his home with Mr. R., one evening sat by the fire in a "brown study," and Esq. Roberston sat opposite, quietly chewing, and now and then spitting into the broad fireplace. At last Moses looked up and asked, "Squire, what did you learn to chew tobaker for?" Mr. Roberston replied, "Oh, so's to be a gentleman." Moses studied the matter a moment and with great gravity replied, "Wal, ye did'nt make out, did ye?"

Mrs. Roberston died Dec., 1859, after a married life of almost 60 years, during which she had borne her full share of the duties and cares of their lot.

Twice after they came to Vermont she made the journey to the home of her youth in Connecticut on horseback, a feat our lady equestrians of to-day would hardly care to undertake.

Ever after the death of his wife, Mr. R. seemed to lose his hold of things earthly, and to be quietly waiting for the realization of the faith which had been an anchor to him and his companion during their long pilgrimage together. He was a lifelong Christian. He maintained his mental faculties to a remarkable degree up to within a few weeks of his death, and was during his latter years very cheerful, very grateful for kindnesses he received, and at last passed away as an infant sinks to slumber, beloved by all who knew him, Sept. 6, 1872, aged 97 years, 19 days.

SETH RICHARDSON came here in 1802; settled near Braintree, in the south part of the town; died May 25, 1829, and Sarah, his wife, died July 1, 1836. Their children were: Phila, Hannah, Joel, Alva.

JOSHUA SHAW came to town in 1800; lived in the East part, and was quite a prominent man. Henry Boyce, son of Dr. Boyce, was also a prominent man in the East part of the town. He died in 1860.

JONATHAN F. RUGGLES was a resident of the east part of the town, and perhaps no man enjoyed in a greater degree the confidence of his fellow-townsmen, there being no office of importance but he had at some time filled. He died in Northfield.

ALVIN BRIGHAM

came here when a young man, about the year 1823, from Fayston. He was born in Old Marlborough, Mass., and a brother of Elisha Brigham (for whose biographical sketch see Fayston, this vol.) Alvin Brigham married Flora Baxter, of Fayston. They moved on to the present Wetmore place. He was a man scrupulously honest, a leader in the church, and for many years leader of the choir. They had 9 children.

The eldest son, Ozro, fell in the last war. Don, the youngest son, served through the rebellion, but died a short time after his return. Bravely like a true soldier he yielded up his young life without a murmur, when life was fairest; ere the clouds had dimmed the horizon of his sky, bade them all—his dear ones—a smiling “good-bye,” and went out into the great “unknown.”

Two other children died during an epidemic of fever—Flora Ann, 18, and Alphonso, 14 years of age. One son and three daughters now reside in Lowell, Mass., and the second son, William, lives in the edge of Northfield. Mr. Brigham was a great sufferer for several years before his death. When the summons came, and told he might live an hour, he said, “O! can I wait so long before I shall be with my Father?” He died in 1871; his wife survived him only a few months.

EBENEZER L. WATERMAN

is one of the early—not earliest—settlers. He came from Connecticut, as did most of them, but when he was very small. He has been a great musician in his day, and people are scarce in Central Vermont who have not heard of “Uncle Eb.” Waterman and his violin. And even now, when he is between 80 and 90 years of age, the young people delight to gather in “Uncle Eb.’s” ample kitchen, and “trip the light fantastic toe,” or listen to the still sweet strains of his old violin. At the age of 45 he married a wife of 18. They had 6 children.

BERT WATERMAN, leader of the Howard Opera House Orchestra at Burlington, is his only living son, and probably has not his peer in the State as violin player.

ORCUTT FAMILY.

Capt. Job came from Stafford, Conn., in 1803; was a carpenter by trade. He settled on the high lands then, and for many years, the centre of the town. He had 7 sons and 4 daughters.

Samuel M. Orcutt, with whom he spent his declining years, was one of the stirring business men of those times, holding various important offices from time to time. He was town clerk for 20 years, and town meetings were held at his house for a long time. At the time of the “invasion” at Plattsburgh in 1812, he went out as Captain of Roxbury Co. (said company including every man in town excepting Samuel Richardson, who much regretted that he was too aged, and Job Orcutt, a lame man.) Capt. Samuel Orcutt married Mary Buel, of Lebanon, Conn., and the bride came to her new home on horseback. They reared a family of 7 boys and 2 girls. The eldest daughter married Wm. Gold, of Northfield, where she now resides.

Samuel A. received an injury while assisting at a “raising,” from a falling timber, from which he never recovered. He died in 1835.

Benjamin F. went to Michigan just previous to the Mexican war; enlisted and served through the war; returned to Kalamazoo, Mich., where he was elected county sheriff, and filled that office many years. When the rebellion broke out, he again enlisted, and went out as Lieut. Col. of the 25th Mich. Reg’t., serving under Gen. Sherman until the war was over, when he returned to Kalamazoo, and was again elected high sheriff, and Dec. 12, 1867, was fatally shot, while on official duty, by a desperado who was trying to assist prisoners to escape from the jail. He died in the prime of a noble manhood, aged 53. James, 3d son, died when quite young.

Orrin has lived in town most of the time since his birth. He has been sheriff and deputy 25 years; postmaster 26 years, occupying that position at the present time.

Wm. B. has always resided in his native town; has 3 times represented the town in the legislature, and 2 years been county judge.

Stephen P. remained at the old family homestead many years, but now resides in Northfield. The aged mother spent her last days with him, dying, at the age of 96, in 1879. Jasper H. was the 7th son. He moved to Northfield.

SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

No. 1 district, in the east part of the town, was set off in 1801, then known as Daniel Kingsbury district, afterwards as Wales district, No. 1. In 1802 a district was set off in the N. W. part of the town, where Samuel Richardson now lives, known as N. West district, No. 2. In 1805, another district was formed in the S. E. part of the town, known as David Cram's district, No. 3. The same year it was voted all the inhabitants not in regular districts should form one district, No. 4. There have been alterations from year to year and new districts organized. There are now 11 districts and 10 good school-houses in town.

The number of scholars in 1807 were 108; 1811, 104; 1816, 157; 1831, 431; 1849, 418; 1850, 351; 1860, 336; 1880, 251; the average since 1816 to 1881, 340 scholars yearly.

EARLY TAVERNS AND LATER HOTELS.

The first tavern in town was where Conway now lives, what is known as the "Rood place," John Stafford, proprietor. The next was kept by Darius Spaulding, where Frank Snow now lives. John Spaulding kept the third hotel, opposite where Mr. Pearsons now lives, on the mountain road.

In East Roxbury, Stillman Ruggles, E. B. Pride, Samuel P. Wales, Shubael Wales, Alpheus Kendall, kept a public house on the Samuel Edwards place.

The Summit House, built in 1822, by John Spaulding, and occupied by him, has been kept by Stephen Fuller, Chester Clark, Page J. C. Rice, E. G. Sanborn, Van Ness Spaulding, Edwin Ferris, James P. Warner, Thomas Wilson, E. N. Spaulding, Spaulding & Colby, Spaulding & Nichols, Warner & Spaulding, Mrs. J. P. Warner, present proprietor, and D. A. Spaulding.

EARLY MERCHANTS.

The first in town was Asa Taylor, near where E. N. Spaulding's steam-mill stands.

The next was Robertson & Orcutt, who also had a potash run, and manufactured salts. Allen Spaulding, Orrin Orcutt, were the next in order among the first settlers. Partridge built the store where the post-office now is, and occupied it for several years. Then Brackett & Thorp, E. N. Spaulding, Benjamin Spear, Seth Holman and J. A. White, Union Store.

CEMETERIES.

In 1804, the town laid out three burying-grounds; one in the west part of the town, on Uriah Richardson's farm, near where O. A. Staples now lives; one in the east part of the town, on the road from Roxbury to Braintree, near where Mr. Bowman now lives, and one in the centre of the town, on the Billa Woodard farm. Some years later another was located on the Haynes farm—the lot given by the Haynes family, and the only one in use at the present time in the west part of the town. There was also one laid out in the east part of the town, near the Henry Boyce place, about the same time. Albert Averill has been sexton for many years.

EPIDEMICS.

This has ever been called a healthful locality, and with good reason, yet at different times it has been visited by epidemics. The dysentery swept through the town, carrying off many victims, in 1823. The diphtheria has appeared at different times in epidemic form, and desolated many homes.

PHYSICIANS

who have lived here: John Stafford was the first. How well versed in the science of medicine he may have been there is no record; but there is no doubt but he dealt out "pills and potions" to the early settlers with a generous hand, to say nothing of cupping, blistering and bleeding.

Next came Dr. David McClure, from Stafford, Conn., the father of Mrs. John Spaulding, who remained in town during the rest of his life.

Dr. Hunter lived several years where E. L. Waterman now lives, and was considered a skillful physician, as was Dr. Boyce, of the East part, who practiced there at the same time.

For several years there was no physician in town. Dr. White came for a few months, in 1868, and Dr. S. N. Welch in 1870, and remained a few years, building the house where Mr. Frink now lives, and he had a very good practice.

Dr. George Maloy, of Montpelier, was the next. He was a student of Dr. Woodard, of Montpelier, but remained only a few months.

Dr. Ira H. Fiske came from Hardwick in 1878, and is the only physician in town at the present time, and is the only homœopathic physician that ever settled in town, and has been very successful.

MANUFACTORIES.

Samuel Richardson built the first saw and grist-mill in town, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the village, on the Warren road. He afterwards built another on the west branch of Dog River, about half a mile from the village. Elijah Ellis built a saw and clover-mill in 1818, where S. N. Miller's carriage shop now is. The clover-mill was swept away by freshet in 1830; the saw-mill had the same fate in 1832; latter was rebuilt.

John McNeal erected a frame for a saw-mill in the "four mile woods," on a branch of Dog River, in 1825, Samuel Orcutt finished it, and it done good business until 1830; it was swept away by a freshet, which seemed the common fate of mills of those days. David Wellington built a saw-mill in 1825, near where E. N. Spaulding's steam-mill now stands.

Charles Colton put a grist-mill into the same building shortly afterwards. Amos Wellington built a saw-mill on the West hill in 1839, now owned by Asahel Flint. Josiah Shaw built a clover-mill on east branch of Dog River, in the East part of the town.

John M. Spaulding, in 1822, built a saw-mill near the Richardson grist-mill, and another, several years afterwards, in the village, now owned by J. G. Hall.

John Prince built a saw-mill, in 1849, near where Spaulding's mill now stands, and also manufactured butter-tubs, now owned by E. P. Burnham for a clap-board mill.

Samuel Robertson and Leicester Davis

erected a building in 1820, on the farm where W. I. Simonds now lives, for the purpose of manufacturing wooden bowls and plates. But it did not prove a success and was given up in a few years. Jotham Ellis built a mill in 18— for manufacturing wooden boxes, clothes-pins, turning bed-posts, &c. Later it was used by Siloam Spaulding for a carriage shop, and by Philander Wiley for turning, &c.

Stillman Ruggles built a carriage shop in the east part of the town in 1830, and carried on the carriage business until 1850. Samuel Ruggles and S. N. Miller carried on the same business there afterwards.

S. N. Miller commenced carriage-making near the Elijah Ellis saw-mill in 1860, and still continues at the business there.

Howard Warriner had a cabinet-shop in the south-east part of the town, and Mr. Wright built a saw-mill on the same stream west of Warriner's shop.

Luther and David Ellis built a saw-mill on the middle branch of Dog river in 1850; Laban Webster & F. A. Wiley on middle branch of Dog river in 1869; Ebenezer Brackett in the south part of the town in 1848; sold to Thomas Cushing, of Dover, N. H. A vast amount of bridge timber, plank and ties were sawed here for the Vt. Central when being built. E. N. Spaulding and Samuel R. Batchelder built a steam-mill in the south-west part of the town in 1849. Henry Smith built a saw-mill on "Tracy Hill" in 1823; burned in 1835; Joseph Wardner a saw and grist-mill in the east part of the town, now owned by Jacob Wardner, and Bezaleel Spaulding a saw-mill on his farm in 1848.

Benjamin H. Warriner built a shop near the "old Hutchinson place" in 1829, for the manufacture of sleighs, chairs and furniture of all kinds, and in 1835 put in machinery for manufacturing window-sash, blinds, etc.

James Cram built a saw-mill on the brook above the Hutchinson place in 1830.

Daniel Kingsley commenced wool carding in 1800, in the east part of the town.

Harrison and Charles Fields built a steam saw-mill about a mile below E. N. Spaulding's in —, and after carrying on an extensive business for two years, moved it to Richmond.

E. N. Spaulding's steam saw-mill, built in 1866, has turned off yearly an average of 1,500,000 feet of lumber. He has also manufactured croquet to a considerable extent.

William Bruce & Sons built a steam-mill in the south part of the town in 1877. It was burned in 1880, and rebuilt. This mill, as well as E. N. Spaulding's, has furnished employment for a great many hands. Ira Williams & Victor Spear are now erecting a steam saw-mill in the south-east part of the town.

Dan Tarbell erected a steam saw-mill near the railroad crossing in the village in 1881, not yet thoroughly completed.

Charles Samson owned a distillery and manufactured potato whisky on the west hill, near what is now called "Wetmore place."

Billa Woodard manufactured saddletrees several years, and Eleazer Woodard later carried on the same business.

Ephraim Morris & Nathan Kendall owned a tannery at the foot of East Hill, on land now owned by Wm. B. Orcutt. They carried on the business only a few years.

In 1853, immense veins of

VERD ANTIQUE MARBLE

were discovered. A large building was erected, with steam power for working the marble. It was found to be very beautiful, and capable of receiving a high polish. Monuments, tables, mantels, etc., manufactured were extremely beautiful, but the company became involved in debt, and the property was sold in 1856, to pay liabilities. It was purchased by an association under the name of "Verd Antique Marble Company," for the amount previously expended. It was then managed by a joint stock company, but finally suspended business in 1857.

THE WATCH FACTORY

was built in 1867. It is located in a lovely and picturesque place, a short distance west from the depot. 12 hands are now employed there. Aug. 1, 1879, a partnership was formed, under the title, "J. G.

Hall Mfg. Co.," between J. G. Hall and his son, F. W. Hall, for the manufacture of watchmakers' tools, principally a "Staking Tool," the invention of J. G. Hall, which meets with a ready sale, owing to the very fine workmanship and correctness exercised in their manufacture, they being worthless unless exact. These tools are in use in nearly every State in the Union, and also in Canada, France and England. They also manufacture a variety of small tools for watch-repairers' use. The Co. had a sample of their tools on exhibition at the State Fair in 1880, receiving the only gold medal awarded in Mechanics' Hall.

THE FIRST MAIL ROUTE

through Roxbury was up the first branch of White river from W. Randolph, through Braintree and Kingston (now Granville), up the old road to John Spaulding's hotel, near the Royal Batchelder place. John Spaulding was postmaster. Guy Edson carried the first mail in 1826. It being known the mail was to arrive at such a time, there was a great gathering and rejoicing, and a little new rum as a matter of course. The route continued down the old road east to Elijah Ellis' (now Mrs. Brackett's), thence north by the old Joseph Hixon place, Samuel Robertson's, John Paine's, Nathan Haynes', and then on to the hill near where Clark Wiley now lives, to Northfield. The mail run that way until about 1830. In 1828, the county road from Northfield line to Granville, through Roxbury village, was surveyed by David M. Lane, county surveyor. In 1830, John Spaulding having built the Summit House, where the village now is, the mail commenced running on that road, with a daily stage of 4 or 6-horse coach for some years; then the stage and mail went from West Randolph through East Roxbury to Northfield, and the mail was carried to West Randolph and back with a horse and gig until the railroad was built in 1848. The cars came to Roxbury 40 days before the road was completed to Northfield, making it a very lively business place. Teams from as far as Burlington for freight, 6 and 8-horse teams, making it very profitable for inn-keepers those days.

OUR LARGE CATAMOUNT.

A large catamount was killed in town in 1823. Allen Spaulding gives this account. He had been calling on his sweetheart, who lived near the "Leonard place." The fair Hattie was the best of company, and he could hardly credit his senses when he started for home and saw the rosy morning peeping over the eastern hills. As he was making rapid strides on, he noticed the huge track of some animal in the new snow, and the track seemed a new one. He examined it closely, and came to the conclusion it was a bear track, and thought he would get help and capture him. Joseph Batchelder and himself followed the trail all day, but without once getting a glimpse of "the bear," and Batchelder gave it up in disgust. Spaulding, however, renewed the pursuit the next morning, accompanied by Capt. Young, who had quite an exalted opinion of his own prowess and skill in hunting, of bears, especially. They struck a new track in the light snow, and followed it to a ledge opposite the old steam-mill. Matters were becoming quite interesting, but "Capt. Sip." declared "by the gods he never was afraid of a bear, and if Spaulding would go one way he would go the other, and start him out," but he took another look at the huge track, and his ardor cooled a little. He concluded they had better keep together. They had not proceeded far when they heard a fierce growl and a bound, and saw the leaves flying in every direction, but by the time they had got around the ledge, the animal was out of sight, making 20 feet at a leap. Spaulding thought it could never be a bear, but "by the gods it is," persisted Capt. Sip., "and a regular old long fellow, too." They followed on till dusk, and gave up the chase for that day. The next morning tracks were seen near Billa Woodard's, on East Hill, and James McNeil, Charles Ellis, Ira Spaulding and Orrin Orcutt started in pursuit. Charles Ellis getting a glimpse of the hunted animal's tawny coat, declared, "the dog had a fox up a tree." They soon found they had a rather different foe to meet, and that without rifles. They had only shot-guns loaded with slugs to contend with a huge catamount, but they gave him a salute from two or three, breaking his shoulder, and down the fierce animal came, about 20 feet, caught on a limb, ran up again, turning on his pursuers with open mouth, preparing for a spring. One of the party gave him a charge of "chain-links" in the open mouth, when he turned and jumped the other way, tearing huge splinters from a fallen tree and the earth up around him in every direction in his death agonies. He was the largest catamount ever killed in the State previous to the one killed in Barnard the present season. They were of the same length and height, but the last killed was several pounds heavier. He was sold at auction to Orrin Orcutt, prepared for and kept on exhibition until every one had seen him in this vicinity, and then sold to Mr. Ralph, of Warren, a man in poor health and indigent circumstances, who made quite a fortune taking him about the country.

About this time there was also a moose killed near the old pond, the man who was so fortunate being very destitute. The meat (he was a large fellow), was a perfect "God-send" to his family.

CHURCH HISTORY

is very meagre here. There have been no records kept of the early churches. The Methodist and Calvinist Baptist seem to have been first organized. The first minister publicly ordained in town was

OPHIR SHIPMAN.

The charter of the town allowed the first ordained minister a lot of land, and Rev. Lyman Culver was privately ordained, and claimed the lot, it is said, but there was great dissatisfaction. Mr. O. Richardson says they came to his uncle, Samuel Robertson, in the night to let him know it, and he went to Northfield after 12 o'clock at night, and the next day Rev. Ophir Shipman was ordained.

BAPTISTS.

Rev. Lyman Culver was one of the earliest Baptist preachers (probably the first), and resided in town several years. Friend Blood and Jehial Claffin preached considerably from 1835 to '45. A good old Baptist lady was "churched" for communing with the Methodists, and she with several others joined the Congregationalists about this time.

There was a Calvinistic Baptist church in town many years, but I find no record of it now. Mrs. Woodard is the only member of the Baptist church left in town. A great revival was brought about in that church in this manner. A little girl overheard her mother and a neighbor talking of the necessity for a Christian life, and the beauty and purity of a true Christian character, and was so deeply impressed that she went to praying earnestly in secret, and came out a shining light, leading others of her companions to do likewise, until it spread into the most extended revival ever in town.

METHODISTS IN ROXBURY.

As early as 1813, how much earlier I am unable to say, the Methodists held their meetings at Eleazer Woodard's and David Young's. Benjamin F. Hoyt preached in 1813, Joel Winch from 1820 to '30, E. J. Scott in 1830, '33, John Smith, called Happy John, in 1834, and Hollis Kendall, a native of Roxbury, preached here several years. He moved to Maine, and died there a few years since. Ariel Fay and John Mason preached here at different times. None of these, with the exception of Hollis Kendall, lived in town. Those early Methodists are nearly all gone to their reward. Phineas Wiley, or "Father" Wiley, as he was called for years, died in 1881. I think he was the last member of the first Methodist church formed in town. The first meeting house was built in 1837, a union church.

CONGREGATIONALISTS.

Of the Congregationalist ministers who preached here in the early times were Rev. Mr. Hobart, of Berlin, Elijah Lyman, of Brookfield, Ammi Nichols, of Braintree, as early as 1814, and meetings were held at Samuel Robertson's and at the old school-house that stood north of where O. A. Staples now lives.

THE FREE CONGREGATIONALIST CHURCH was organized about 1837, by Rev. Ammi Nichols, of Braintree, and what remained of the Methodists and most of the Baptist church joined with them, but they never had a settled minister until 1865, when Rev. A. Ladd was ordained and installed pastor, and remained here until the autumn of 1879. They built a pleasant and convenient house of worship in 1871. Samuel Edwards and W. I. Simonds are the only deacons ever chosen, both of whom now officiate.

A CHRISTIAN CHURCH was organized in the east part of the town in 1868. Rev. Henry Howard is present pastor (1882).

Rev. EDWARD BROWN, Universalist, lived in town several years, where John Baird now resides, and preached a part of the time.

The different religious organizations of this town have been: Congregationalist, Methodist, Episcopal, Free Will Baptist, Calvinist Baptist, Christian, Universalist and Spiritualist.

GOLDEN WEDDINGS.—I learn of two having been celebrated in this town, that of Mr. and Mrs. James Wiley, in 1871, and Mr. and Mrs. Otis Batchelder in 1880.

ACCIDENTAL AND SUDDEN DEATHS AND SUICIDES.

BY ZED. S. STANTON, ESQ.

Joseph Batchelder drowned July 14, 1822.

Uriah Richardson died from injuries received while chopping, Jan. 21, 1831.

Alvah Henry, killed by the fall of a tree June 28, 1831.

Mrs. Belcher, suicide by hanging, about 1831.

Charles Webster, killed by being thrown from a wagon, Nov. 5, 1834.

Shubael Wales, suicide by shooting, Mar. 18, 1843.

David Dexter, supposed to have wandered away in a state of insanity and died of exposure, about 1843.

Royal Flint, frozen to death, Jan. 22, 1846.

A man named Jackson was killed by the premature discharge of a blast, at the time the Central Vermont Railroad was in process of construction, Jan. 25, 1846.

An Irishman, name unknown, died of exposure in the summer of 1847.

A young man, name unknown, was drowned in what is now known as Hall's Pond, about 1848.

ROXBURY BOYS ABROAD.

Andrew Stanton, a graduate of Tufts College, is now "principal" in the academy at Stoughton, Mass. Will Snow graduated at Hanover, and is now a civil engineer in Montana.

There are a good many graduates of the Normal school in town, Will Simonds was one, who is now teaching near Chicago, Ill.

Lucius Jenney went from this town, about 20 years ago, to Middlesex, and from there to Omaha, Neb., and now occupies the position of R. R. Master on the Union Pacific R. R.

Benj. J. Ellis went from here when a very young man, enlisted and served through the Mexican war; after its close went to Chicago, Ill., and took up the profession of law. He has assisted in organizing and sustaining several mission schools, some of them now flourishing churches, and he often supplies the pulpit, as well as pleads at the Bar.

S. G. Stanton went to Nebraska in 1879, and is engaged in building a railroad on the Union Pacific. Mr. Stanton was an active business man.

Mr. O. Richardson moved to Bellingham, Mass., in '78. Is engaged in the mercantile business. He had been organist and leader of the choir at the Union church for 20 years when he left town. He was an adopted son of Samuel Richardson, with whom Mr. R. spent his declining years.

John Webster, of east part of town, went to California in '57, has been successful in business, and amassed quite a fortune.

Z. S. S.

Will R. Mansfield, at the age of 20, took his small valise in hand and started for the "far west." He stopped a few weeks in Nebraska as telegraph operator on the B. & M. R. R. He then accepted the position of baggage-master and telegraph operator on a new branch of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe R. R., through New Mexico, and served 2 months, when he was invited to dine with an old Spaniard at Los Vegas, for whom he had done some slight service, and started to return to Grenada, Col. in the caboose that was sent ahead of President Hayes and his escort, on their way from California, to see that the road was clear. The party in the "caboose" had been "looking upon the wine when it was red," and when the "caboose" gave a great bound, and any sober person must have known there was some obstruction, they declared there was "nothing wrong," nor would they stop to see whether there was or not. So this Vermont boy turned the brake, caught a lantern and jumped off, and upon examination, several feet of rails were gone, and he had nothing to do there in the wilds of N. M. but wait for the train, and this was not a pleasant task as the coyotes began to gather from every direction. This was his first experience of the kind, and grim terror seized him, quick as a flash, he sprang up a telegraph-pole close at hand, and sitting astride the cross-bar, watched the howling pack, thinking all the while what an excellent mark he would be for an Indian, and it was far from being an agreeable thought. At last the train came up and he clambered down from his perch, gave a great shout at the wolves and swung his lantern to stop the train. The wolves scattered, and the train had to stop for repairs. For this act of faithfulness, he was promoted at once to conductor, and has occupied that position until the present time.

ROXBURY'S MILITARY RECORD.

BY ZED S. STANTON, ESQ.

Among the early settlers of Roxbury were doubtless several who served during the Revolutionary War, but just what number it is impossible to determine. Samuel Richardson, the first settler in the westerly part of this town, was a veteran of that war, having served one-half the time during the entire contest. He came to Roxbury in 1790. Mr. Richardson was born at Stafford, Conn., June 15, 1750, and died at Roxbury, in 1822.

Capt. Benjamin Samson, who came here in 1810, was also a Revolutionary soldier, and participated in the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill. He rang the church bell to arouse the minute men on Lexington green, on the memorable 19th of April, 1775.

BATTLE OF PLATTSBURG.

On the morning of Saturday, Sept. 10, 1814, a company, consisting of all the able-bodied men in town, under command of Capt. Samuel M. Orcutt, left Roxbury for the purpose of assisting in repelling the British invasion of our Northern borders. All the following Sunday those who were left at home heard the distant roar of cannon, and supposed that their loved ones were engaged in battle with the foreign foe. But the men of Roxbury did not arrive at Plattsburg until Monday evening, Sept. 12, and the fighting was then over. They returned to their homes Friday, Sept. 16, 1814.

ROXBURY COMPANY FOR PLATTSBURG.

Capt. Samuel M. Orcutt; Lieut. Gilbert R. Spalding; Ensign Billa Woodard; Sergeants Joel Hildreth, Enos Young, Jonathan Cram, Charles Samson; Corporals James Woolfe, Philip Cram, Dan Lord, John Paine; Drummer Jonathan Nutting; Fifer Bezalleel Spalding.

Privates Benj. Samson, Darius Spalding, Robert Cram, Samuel Ford, Alding Loomis, Ambrose Hutchinson, John Baldwin, Truman Peterson, John M. Spalding, Gideon Flint, Peter S. P. Staples, Abraham Z. Haynes, John Wilcox, Timothy Emerson, Joseph Hixon, Samuel Robertson, Darius Spalding, Elisha Wilcox, Elijah Ellis.

There is on file in the Adjutant's General's office at Montpelier an affidavit made by the captain and ensign of said company, Mar. 6, 1850, stating the main facts in regard to the company going to Plattsburg, and also that parties from other towns joined their company, and that none of the officers or men of said company ever, to the knowledge of the said captain or ensign, received any compensation for their services on that occasion. Of this company of men only one is now living (Feb. 6, 1882), that one being Philip Cram, who resides in Brookfield.

POSTMASTERS.

First postmaster, John M. Spaulding, from 1826 to '49; O. W. Orcutt, 1849 to '53; Billings Spaulding and A. N. Tilden, 1861 to '63; Julius Spaulding, 1865 to '66; Orin W. Orcutt, 1866 to the present time.

EAST ROXBURY.—Shubael Wales, 1830 to '42; Stillman Ruggles, 1841 to '43; Samuel Ruggles, 1843 to '52; Jacob Gardner, in 1852, and present incumbent.

Merchants.—Among others beside what I have previously named, I remember Woodward, Thresher, A. N. Tilden, Ed. Ferris, J. Riford, Mansfield, I. Brigham, E. P. Burnham, A. N. Tilden & Son, the two last firms at present doing good business. Asa Taylor was the first to keep store in town.

E. N. Spaulding's steam-mill burned down in November, since I wrote up the manufacturing business, and another one was well under way here when I came from Roxbury. Stephen Butterfield has been station agent and telegraph operator nearly the whole time since the railroad came to Roxbury. E. N. Spalding is a prominent business man, dealing heavily in lumber. Will Spalding, his son, is now "dispatcher" in an office in Boston.

THANKS are especially due O. W. Orcutt, Aaron Webster and Zed Stanton, Esq. I have received considerable information from three grand-daughters of Samuel Richardson—Mrs. York, Mrs. Woodard and Mrs. Youngs; also from O. Richardson, a former resident of this town. Many have no doubt felt interested who have devoted no time, therefore much will be left out, inevitably, which cannot fail of being a source of regret to their posterity; for, however this may seem to us of to-day, to whom much of this history is familiar, future generations will peruse it with the greatest interest, and every incident of the hardships, privations and heroism of the pioneers, related at many firesides by our children's children. S. B. M.

ROXBURY CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The day chosen for the Celebration fell on Tuesday, fair and fine as one could wish. The procession of citizens and visitors formed at the town-house, and led by Northfield Cornet Band, drum corps, militia, old folks' temperance organization, grange and civilians, marched to a charming little grove near the depot, where a stand had been erected for music and speakers, tables laid for an old-fashioned dinner in a little vale just below, tended by young ladies, picturesque in short waists, enormous puffed sleeves and narrow gored skirts, guiltless of trimmings. Among the visitors who were assigned seats of honor upon the stand were Philip Cram, the first child born in Roxbury, from Brookfield; Mrs. Orcutt, widow of Samuel Orcutt, and mother of those residing in Roxbury and Northfield of that name, the oldest person present, being 94 years of age. There were 39 persons over 70, 30 of them being over 80.

HISTORICAL ADDRESS,

(BY Z. S. STANTON, ESQ.)

Delivered at Roxbury, Aug. 22, 1876, Maj. Allen Spaulding, president of the occasion; a large concourse of citizens and visitors present; from which we extract the portions pertaining strictly to the history of the town not already covered by the papers of Mrs. Mansfield, given :

“Many of the early settlers of this township were veterans of the Revolution. Doubtless the tract of land now known as the town of Roxbury was never the permanent home of the Indians. Yet it may be inferred from the geographical position of this portion of our State, that the Indians, in their predatory excursions against the colonial settlements of New England, passed through here. The Iroquois, Cossuck and St. Francis tribes frequented this portion of our State at various times while on their hunting excursions, and doubtless the smoke of their camp-fires wended up from this little valley many times. In the fall of 1780, the town of Royalton was pillaged and burned by a band of Indians from Canada, who on their return passed through the west part of Brookfield, and probably the east part of this town. Arrow-heads and other relics have been found here at various times, which prove conclusively that the red man was here at a time previous to any white man's emigration to this township. Nov. 6, 1780, this township was granted, and it was chartered by the Governor, Council and General Assembly of the State, Aug. 5, 1781, to Benjamin Emmons and 64 others, nearly all of whom were residents of Windsor County. I think two of these persons afterwards resided in this town. Among the names of those to whom this township was chartered, I find those of Thomas Chittenden, Paul Spooner, and others prominent in the early history of Vermont. Besides the land chartered to those men, there was chartered one right for the use of a seminary or college, one for the use of a county grammar school, one for the purpose of the settlement of a minister of the gospel, one for the support of the social worship of God, and one for the support of an English school or schools in this town. The proprietors of this township held their first meeting at the house of Benjamin Burtch, an innholder in Hartford, County of Windsor, Nov. 20, 1783; Hon. Paul Spooner, moderator, and Briant Brown, clerk. A committee, consisting of Briant Brown, Esq., Capt. John Strong, Elisha Gallup, Abel Lyman and Asa Taylor were chosen to examine this township, and to lay out 100 acres to each proprietor as a first division, with the allowance of five per cent. for highways. They were also instructed to procure a surveyor, chainmen and provisions. They held an adjourned meeting Dec. 25 the same year, and voted to lay a tax of 10 s. lawful money, on each proprietor's right or share of land, for the purpose of paying the expenses of surveying. This tax was to be paid in money, wheat, beef or pork, at cash price. They chose Capt. John Strong collector, and Major Joel Mathews, treasurer. They also voted a tax of 2 s. lawful money, on each proprietor's right or share of land in this township, for the purpose of defraying charges that had arisen in procuring the charter. It is impossible to ascertain just how many meetings were held by the proprietors of this township, or when the survey was made. I think, however, that the survey was not made at this time, and possibly not until several years later. There was a proprietors' meeting held at the house of Asa Edgerton, in Randolph, Aug. 6, 1788; Major Elijah Paine, moderator, and Deacon David Bates, clerk. A vote similar to the one taken at Hartford, with the addition of another division, was passed. It is possible that the survey of the township was made previous to this time, but I have no authority for saying so. Each proprietor had one lot in each division. On the 21st day of May, 1789, the first settlement was made in this township.

Mr. Huntington, the first settler, was an elderly man, and was accompanied by several children, some of whom had arrived at maturity at that time. Three of his sons, Jedediah, Thomas and Jonathan were quite prominent in town affairs when the town was organized. I am not able to say who the next settlers of this township were, but soon after Huntington and Richardson came here, Mr. Isaac Lewis settled in this town-ship, and Messrs. David, Robert and Jonathan Cram located on the farms now owned and occupied by Messrs. Chatterton, Bowman and Clough. [See previous account of.]

Jacob Wardner came to this town in 1801, and built a log house on the farm now owned by H. A. Thayer. The next year he moved his family to this place. He was a German, and was born on board a vessel while his parents were emigrating to this country, and he used to boast that he 'never was born on the face of God's earth.'

Samuel Robinson and Samuel M. Orcutt were at one time associated in mercantile business, and occupied the room now used by J. F. Pearson as a harness shop. This was the second store kept in town. They did a good business, and to use my informant's own words, 'There was not so many Bostons then as now; then the Granger did not trouble the merchant, and the potato bug did not bother the Granger; then the merchants drew their molasses without the help of patent gates, and sold new rum without a license.'

Elijah Ellis lived where Mrs. Brackett now does. He built the house at this place, and it was the first house built in town that was arranged for the use of stoves, I am informed. He had no fireplace or 'stack of chimneys,' as they were called, and people thought it a great departure from the old ways. Ellis also built the first clover-mill in town. [See Mrs. Mansfield's record.]

About this time Moses Woodard lived where Peter Gilbert now does, whose son was the noted manufacturer of the frames of saddles. There was a tavern kept here for some time, and the place was known as the center of the town. Below Woodard's, on the road leading to where the village now is, lived James Bancroft, who was for many years town clerk, and has left upon the town records some splendid specimens of penmanship, that might well serve for copies for many at this day. There were in 1810 but three houses where the village now is—the house of Mr. Burroughs, near where Mrs. Martell lives, and two others, near where Charles Leonard now resides. At this time, 1810, there was a considerable portion of the town settled.

After the return of our volunteers from Plattsburgh, with the exception of town meetings and trainings, the town was comparatively quiet. These trainings were held at various places, sometimes at Billa Woodard's and Capt. Orcutt's, on the east hill, and often near the tavern of John M. Spaulding. Mr. Spaulding kept this tavern, and was also proprietor of a saw-mill and grist-mill at this place. Then one day in each week was set apart for the grinding of salt. Coarse salt was the only kind of that commodity that could be obtained, and as the thrifty housewives then, as now, took great pride in making good butter, they had of necessity to grind their salt at the grist-mill. Mr. Spaulding built the hotel in the village in 1830. He was an energetic business man, and accumulated a handsome property for those honest days. For many years the town meetings were held at dwellings in various parts of the town. I find by consulting the town records that these meetings were held at the houses of the following-named gentlemen, in the order that they occur: Jedediah Huntington, Samuel Richardson, Christopher Huntington, Lemuel Smith, Ichabod Munsel, Billa Woodard, Samuel M. Orcutt and Luther Ainsworth. After this they were held at the village, in the meeting-house and hotel hall, until the town-house was built, in 1854.

The verd antique marble was discovered in Roxbury, 1833, by a gentlemen named McCain.

No State in the Union has a better record in connection with the war of the rebellion than Vermont—and no town in the State has a better one than Roxbury. With a population of 1060, Roxbury gave the Union army 95 brave soldiers, 8 of whom re-enlisted. Co. H, 6th Vt. Regt., under command of Capt. D. B. Davenport, was recruited in this town in the fall of 1861. Besides this company there were residents of this town in many other regiments. Twenty-six of these died in the service of their country.

Besides these, there were of those who enlisted from other places, but who were residents of this town, two that died—Homer Pearson in a rebel prison, at Salisbury, N. C., and Samuel Shepherd, who was a member of a Massachusetts regiment, in the service. In all, 29 men of this town fell in the defense of human liberty. I wish that this town might imitate the action of other towns, and erect a monument to the memory of these martyrs.

So far as manufacturing is concerned, Roxbury has done but little, and doubtless the wealth that is obtained here must come through the hard hand of the farmer. Mr. Shubal Wales, who kept tavern at East Roxbury many years ago, was also proprietor of clothing works at that place, but it was not a very extensive concern.

The people here have to a considerable extent, been dependent upon itinerant preachers. After Mr. Huntington removed to Canada, the settlers at East Roxbury secured the services of Elder Seaver, of Williamstown, and meetings were held in the school house. Elder Hovey also held meetings there, and soon after a Calvinist Baptist church was formed. There has been, I think, a church organization there ever since. Their present church, the First Christian, was organized in Feb., 1863. Rev. Henry Howard is now their pastor. The union house of worship was built in this village in 1839. Previous to this, the meetings were held in school houses, and sometimes in barns. Considerable excitement was occasioned at the time the first minister in town was ordained. In those days, there were many lay preachers, and one of these, a man named Culver, was privately ordained and laid claim to this lot, together with all the improvements that had been made upon it. The selectmen of the town objected to this, but Culver would not yield, and then they endeavored to have a preacher named Smith, better known as "Happy John," ordained. He declined, and Ophir Shipman was next appealed to. He consented, and was the first regularly ordained minister in Roxbury. He held the value of the land without improvements. The result of this strife was the destroying of the Baptist church at this place.

My fellow townsmen, in conclusion, let me say that I would that this task of chronicling a history of our town might have been performed by abler hands than mine. With the short time allotted me I could, of course, give nothing but a rough sketch of those incidents brought most vividly to my notice. I trust they are in the main correct. My thanks are due those who have so kindly furnished me with material, and I hope the day is not far distant when a fuller and more complete history may be written. If you derive half the pleasure in listening to this that I have in learning of those pioneers in our town, I shall be satisfied. I think we are too apt in this fast age not to look back to the lives and deeds of those who have gone before. Said Edmund Burke, "A people who do not look back to their ancestors will not look forward to their posterity," and still there are many to-day if called upon to give the maiden name of their grandmother would be unable to do so. To know more of those whose places we now fill, to learn of their virtues, to know wherein they erred, is our right and duty. In our little mountain town, away up among the Green Mountains, we have no great history to write of, no mighty deeds of valiant men to chronicle, no biography of some brilliant person who has gone from here and startled the world with his genius, for no native of Roxbury has been, to my knowledge, a member of Congress or of the State Prison either, but simply a story of hardy men and brave women seeking and making their homes among these hills. There are times when, perhaps, we may wish for a more genial clime and a more fertile soil, but none of us after living here a series of years will fail to love these hills, for it is our home. When we consider the changes that have been wrought in our State and nation during the past century, we know that our little town has kept pace with the rest. How different the scene of to-day and the one Samuel Richardson gazed on when first he came here. At our feet still murmurs that little mountain stream that sparkled in the autumn sunlight of 86 years ago, but how changed is the rest. Then it was an unbroken forest, with naught but wild beasts for inmates; now it is teeming with the marks of improvement. The iron horse is going at lightning speed through our valley; step to yonder telegraph office and in a moment's time a thought of yours may be flashed to the Golden Gates of the Pacific, or, sent beneath the ocean's bed, may be heard on another continent; on our hillsides are evidences of great improvements, machinery supplants labor, and the products of other climes may be ours at prices almost nominal. Forth from these hillsides come a thousand sparkling streams with water pure and clear as our lives should be; across these hills the strong, invigorating air is ever waving, giving health and happiness, and here in our peaceful homes ought to be found hearts grateful to the Giver of all these blessings. But the tottering forms of these aged ones who have assembled here to-day, tell us plainly that it is but a brief happiness we have to enjoy here, and that with each return of this golden harvest time, new mounds will have been made in our valleys and on our hillsides, marking the spot where some one is resting from his labors, and may God grant that when the last summons shall come, and the places we now occupy shall know us no more, that our lives shall have been such as to bear well the scrutiny of the Great Hereafter.

A CENTURY OLD STORY.

BY MRS. SARAH BRIGHAM MANSFIELD.
(Read at the Roxbury Centennial.)

Ah! what more inspiring theme
For poet's pen or poet's dream
Than to go back an hundred years—
To dream of all the hopes and fears,
The heart-throbs and the pain
Of those who lived, and loved, and died—
Who felled the forests, dark and wide—
Who, with unswerving, constant toil,
Cleared these broad acres, tilled the soil,
Themselves a home to gain.

A hundred years, or less, ago
Deep waters had their ebb and flow;
The willow bowed its graceful head
Above the water-lily's bed,
Where stands this village now.
The bear and wolf roamed without fear,
With now and then a moose or deer,
And the primeval forests rang
With shrieks of panther—the birds sang
Their loftiest, sweetest strains, I trow.

The red man oft-times wandered through
These dim old woods; ah! brave and true
Were they who mid th' green hills of Vermont
Sought and found homes; my word upon't,
A nobler, truer race

Than those old yeomen ne'er were seen;
 Though brown of cheek, nor graceful mien
 Had they, their record shows
 A list of deeds that brighter glows
 As years come on apace.

In a sweet glade, beside a wood,
 A century gone, a cabin stood;
 A purling brook trilled joyously along,
 And bird-notes echoed back the song,
 While little children fair
 Joined in the chorus at their play:
 What wonder that their hearts were gay—
 From the dread war papa had come,
 To spend his days in peace at home;
 How light seemed every care!

'Twas springtime; adder-tongues were up;
 Neath the dry leaves the arbutus' cup;
 Rude troughs still caught the flowing sweet
 From the rock maple; thy feet
 Made fairy footprints all around.
 One little lad, with crisp brown curls,
 And full white brow, fair as a girl's,
 With dusk-bright eyes, brim full of glee,
 Pet of that humble home was he—
 Humble, yet with love crowned.

"O, let me mind the fire," he cried, "to-day,
 And watch the sap, to see it boll away;
 You go to dinner, one and all—
 Please let me stay; I'm not so very small,
 I'll have you all to know;
 I'm a big boy, 'most eight years old,
 And not a bit afraid; now do not scold,
 For won't I make the kettle slug!—
 And don't forget my lunch to bring—
 I'm starved almost!—now go."

And so they left him, bright-eyed Ned;
 "He'll keep all right, we know," they said,
 "And feel as proud as any king—
 The little, pompous, silly thing,
 To think such work is play."
 And while they dined, the mother brought
 A dainty lunch of trout they'd caught,
 And good sweet bread, both brown and white:
 "Now haste thee, husband, from my sight,
 Nor linger by the way;
 "My heart is sad—oh! strangely sad—
 For fear of harm to the dear lad;
 I know he's brave—as brave as good—
 But wild beasts lurk in the deep wood—
 Oh! haste thee to our child."
 "Fie! fie! upon thy woman's fears;
 The boy is safe—dry up thy tears;
 And when he comes with me to-night,
 Thou'lt smile upon this foolish fright—
 He loves the deep woods wild."

Yet, as his hurried steps drew near,
 Why blanched his cheek with sudden fear?
 Ah! what was there his keen eye scanned?
 Prints of moccasined feet on every hand,
 With the bare ones of little Ned;
 An arrow and a wooden spoon—
 But where the boy they left at noon?
 The frantic father called in vain;
 Sad echo answered back the strain—
 Forever lost! it said.

On through the forest, dark and wild,
 The frenzied father sought his child;
 Through mountain gorge, o'er hill and dale,
 Till steps grew slow, cheeks wan and pale,
 He sought, but never found.

Spring, summer, waned, and autumn came,
 Rich with ripe fruits and golden grain;
 But from that pleasant cabin home
 The light and joy for aye had flown—
 No little narrow mound,

Rose-strews, where they could go and weep,
 And know their darling was asleep
 Beneath the flowers; no such relief
 Had those poor hearts; in silent grief
 They passed each weary day.
 White grew the mother's raven hair,
 Deep care lines on the brow once fair,
 Watching and waiting all in vain;
 The dear one came not back again—
 He was lost to them for aye.

—The stolen child was a grand-uncle of the writer.

OUR ROXBURY VISIT.

When in print so far as with Middlesex, we had no certain historian for Roxbury engaged, but learning by chance correspondence that Mrs. Sarah Brigham Mansfield was residing at Roxbury, made her a visit with much confidence, we had found the best person in the town to write out the historic record of Roxbury. While visiting Mrs. Mansfield, we also made a little trip into the Mad River Valley, that we had never dreamed of as so pretty; heard Rev. P. B. Fisk in his address at the Fair at Waitsfield, and visited the birth-town of the Brigham family and Mrs. Laura Brigham Boyce. Mr. and Mrs. Mansfield pointed out many an old site named in our Fayston history, fresh from the press; now Mr. M., the old home site of his father, which strangely the writer had somehow overlooked.

RILEY MANSFIELD, born in Winchendon, Mass., came from there when 19 years old, with an ox-team, by marked trees, through the heart of the Vermont wilderness, and located in the valley of Fayston, clearing himself a farm and rolling up the logs for his first log-house. He lived in this town till his death, and raised a large family, and was one of the principal landholders of his day, as the Fayston records attest. His farms and mortgages on farms covered much of the territory of the town; but he was no oppressor. A neighbor under embarrassment came to him one day, and said, "I want you to buy that 50-acre lot of mine. If I can turn it into money, I can save my farm and myself from ruin." "I will take it," said Mr. M., and paid him his price for the land. The man afterwards said to him, "You saved me and my family from utter failure." A little later, hard times again came, and the neighbor was again in deep gloom. How he could meet his taxes he did not know. He had some fine sheep, but sheep were down in the market; no one wanted to buy for half their worth. The melancholy man came down one afternoon to see if Mr. M. would not buy his sheep. Mr. M. was absent. He told his story to Mrs. M., and said he knew of no one else who would give him the worth of his sheep, but he thought that Mr. M. might, and let him have the money. Mrs. M., sorry for the man, and knowing the neighborly spirit of her husband, told him that she thought Mr. M. might buy the sheep, and she would tell him when he came home, and she thought he would be up there that night. The man left a little encouraged. Mr. M. did not return till late. Mrs. M. told him, but it was 10 o'clock before he had his chores done, and he put off going up till the next morning. He went up then, but the man had hung himself in the night. His wife said to Mr. M., "Had you come up last night, it would have saved his life." Mr. M., although no ways obligated, always regretted that he had not gone up that night, late as it was.

He brought apple-seeds from New Hampshire, and planted orchards around his old homestead 63 years ago; trees yet remain there that sprang from the seed he planted then. Mr. M. removed from where he first settled to a farm on Mill brook, where he made his home the last 25 years of his life. His first home was adjoining the old Brigham farm on Fayston hill. His house was within 20 rods of where George Boyce now lives. He sold to Mr. Brigham and Mr. Griggs a part of their farms (old Stephen R. Griggs was the one who committed suicide).

From Obituary.—"Riley Mansfield, of Fayston, died Jan. 14, —, aged nearly 77 years; another of our oldest and most respected citizens is gone, almost the last of the pioneer men who came to our town in its early settlement, or before it had become largely settled or improved. He came 56 years ago, and helped by his life-long industry to make the wilderness to blossom as a garden. At 23, he was converted at a camp-meeting, and united with the Methodist church, of which he was a member at time of his death. In 1822 he married Betsey Chase, who died Mar. 11, '73. Of a large family, but one son, Martin Mansfield, is now living. He was respected for his sterling worth; there lives no man who will say, 'Uncle Riley,' as he was called by all his neighbors, ever knowingly cheated him one cent. Of his sudden death he seemed to have a premonition. He began to feel unwell Wednesday afternoon, and died on Friday near midnight. About an hour before he died, he dressed himself and laid down again on his bed, apparently comfortable, and died as an infant hushed to sleep in its mother's arms."

After his death it was found he had written in his diary the Sabbath evening before, the following:

"JAN. 9, SABBATH EVENING.

Now we know not what is before us; we frequently hear of people being found dead, and as you all, my dear children, are away from me, the thought came to me that I might never see any of you again. Oh, what a feeling came over me! I felt that I could not go to bed without writing a few words of entreaty that you would not let the busy scenes and cares of this life hinder you from preparing for the life to come. Oh, do think of the life that never, never ends! Think what folly it is to make overmuch provision for the flesh only to be enjoyed a few days! It is the height of folly for people to live as most do, and for professors of religion to live as all the world do, laying up treasures on earth. What I wrote on the other page (of this diary), was after I was ready to go to bed, but after these thoughts came to me, I made another fire and sat down and wrote this, hoping you might find it, and hoping it might have some influence on your lives. It may be your loving father's last request."

It was his last request to his children, for he never beheld their faces again, his death on the next Friday night being so unexpected, they were not sent for until all was over.

BETSEY CHASE,

who lived on Waitsfield Mountain, mother of Mrs. Riley Mansfield, of Fayston (see previous, page —), used to tell many tales of almost incredible hardships and privations. Her husband, Thomas Chase, served in the Revolutionary War, and she cared for her little family as best she could, as they were very poor, in the springtime subsisting upon milk and leeks (wild onions), and such small game as she could get, being an adept in the use of a rifle or shot-gun. At one time, when the army was in desperate need of recruits, and they were pressed into the service with but very little ceremony. When it was known officers were in town for that purpose, many poor fellows, who much preferred to remain by their own firesides to enduring the perils of war, would hide until the enlisting officers had left town. They, learning this, devised a plan to catch them by letting loose their cattle in the night, and concealing themselves to watch for the men to come out and care for them. Several times one night Mrs. Chase heard the tinkling of her old cow-bell in her cornfield, and each time marched resolutely out and drove old "Crumpie" into the yard, making all fast, and returned to the house, to have the same repeated, until the recruiting officer and men with him wearied out (at last,) made themselves and their errand known, and when told her husband was already in the service, were somewhat chop-fallen, but declared she was a brave woman, fit to be a soldier's wife. She was a strong, robust woman, and never seemed to know the meaning of the word fear. She often said she would as soon meet the devil in the dark as a man. Whether this was a bit of sarcasm on the "sterner sex" she never explained. Some of her superstitious neighbors called her a "witch," for her prophecies often came true, and they feared nothing so much as her displeasure, "lest some evil should come upon them." This rather pleased her than otherwise, as in this way she kept some disorderly neighbors very submissive. She died in Waitsfield, April, 1852, aged over 90 years.

The account of Riley Mansfield and Thomas and Betsey Chase belong to the towns of Fayston and Waitsfield, but having been overlooked at home, we include them with this near neighboring town, and the more easily, as Mrs. Mansfield has most cordially and permanently connected herself here as the historian of the town, though the family have now all removed from Roxbury and reside at Fairhaven.

MR. BURNHAM'S REMINISCENCES.

Deer.—Mr. E. P. Burnham, merchant at the village, told us he can remember some 50 years ago, when the deer used to herd together in spruce thickets on these mountains in the winter, and when the snow melted in the March days, and froze at night, making a crust, the hunters would be out the next morning for the deer. He says he has been on these mountains many times when the deer were so thick you could not count their tracks—the tracks were like a thousand sheep in the snow. The hunters frequently shot and brought in several deer at a time. He distinctly remembers when they brought in five at one time.

He was graphic in his remembrances of Crandall, of whom Mrs. Mansfield has some anecdotes on the foregoing pages.

"Some 50 years ago," says Mr. B., "there lived in this town a man by the name of John B. Crandall, but who was named and called by all his townsmen Judge Crandall, a drinking, miserable being, but a man with natural talent. He would get into debt and get sued, and defend himself in the courts. He managed his own case and plead his own cause before the jury, and usually with success. Judge Weston brought a suit for debt against him one time, however, in Randolph, when Crandall thought he would have some help, and engaged one of Judge Weston's students to help defend him. When the cause came on, the student arose to argue Crandall's case, but, awed by the presence of his master, began to hesitate. Crandall stood it for a moment. He had an inveterate habit of spitting when excited. For a moment he sat spitting, when, arising, drawing his ragged, slightly liquorified form up to its full height, he spit once, twice, thrice. Said he, 'Sit down! sit down! You are afraid of the d—d cuss; let me try him!' He did try him, and won his case out and out with the jury, to the great amusement of all who heard the defense. He had a family. His own boys took after him in drinking, but had none of his power of wit and argument. I think they were more like their mother, who was a famous talker, but not well balanced. Some neighbors in of an evening, the old lady would sit and tell over her wise things; the old man, under the influence of liquor, in his chair sit and doze, and when she had chatted away and told her long yarns till late, arouse himself up and say, 'A dumb fool always knows the most.'

The poor old man, of marked ability, but a wreck from his bad habit, died at last, and his curious old wife and his uneducated sons following in his steps, that never were any benefit to the community; but in the third generation, under the influence of a better education, the ability of the grandfather again cropped markedly out. His grandsons have the strong natural ability without the dissipation of their grandfather or fathers, and make fine men.

THE 90TH BIRTHDAY PARTY

of Mrs. Betsey C. Spalding, of which Mrs. Mansfield has briefly spoken, was, indeed, a very unique and pleasant gathering, and as the oldest birthday party ever celebrated in Roxbury, should perhaps have a little more notice. Her five children, all living, were present: Erastus N., Billings, Mrs. Brackett, Mrs. P. Wiley, Mrs. A. N. Thompson, her daughter-in-law and her sons-in-law, and the grandchildren in part: Mrs. L. P. Thompson, from Clarence, Ia.; Mrs. Arthur Bradley, of Malden, Mass.; William Wiley, of White River Junction; Charles, of St. Albans; Edwin and Delia Wiley, Clinton Brackett, George Tilden, with their husbands and wives and four great-grandchildren, "uncles, cousins and aunts." Over the front door was "Welcome!" in cedar; within, the mammoth cake on the table, "a pyramid of snowy whiteness, crowned with an exquisite white rose with silver leaves," a rose-pyramid rising beside, the gift of the great-grandchildren, of ninety rosebuds, rare specimens, just bursting into beauty, that filled the room with their delicious perfume; over the wall above, "1791 and 1891;" another table—an elegant bouquet of hot-house flowers from St. Albans friends, a mound of asters, artistically arranged, very handsome, from Mrs. E. P. Burnham, with letters of regret from friends who could not come, on the table. The photographer was there, and views taken of the family gathered about the aged mother in front of her house. Then there was the bountiful supper in the town-hall, five long tables, the central one laid with the mother's old-fashioned mulberry ware and silver of "ye olden" solidity and style; and after, the birthday address by Rev. Eli Ballou, of Bethel, who referred to Mrs. Spalding's coming to Roxbury when the town was but a wilderness, being one of the first settlers. He spoke feelingly of the kind, loving mother she had been, how deserving of all their love and respect; this occasion would remain a bright spot in their memories. Mrs. S. was born in Strafford, Ct., married John Spalding at 20, and came to Roxbury.

NORA, BLOSSOM OF THE MAY.

BY A. WEBSTER.

Where departed kindred sleep,
And the living come and weep,
Laid we, on a vernal day,
Nora, blossom of the May.

Seven summers' suns and flowers,
Seven autumns' russet bowers,
Eight sweet springtimes, fair and gay,
Saw our blossom of the May.

Mild was she, and sweetly fair,
Azure eyes and nut-brown hair;
Voice that rivaled warblers' lay,
Had our blossom of the May.

Earth is sad now she is gone,
Heaven another charm has won;
Where to meet, we hope and pray,
Nora, blossom of the May.

Rest, sweet blossom, rest in peace,
Where all pains and sorrows cease;
In our hearts shall ne'er decay,
Nora, blossom of the May.

Nora, blossom of the May,
Pride of her parental spray,
Sweetly bloomed and passed away,
Nora, blossom of the May.

WAITSFIELD.

BY REV. P. B. FISK.

[NOTE.—The writer desires at the outset, to acknowledge gratefully the assistance he has received from several of his fellow-townsmen, and especially to give the credit due to the late Jennison Jones, Esq., for his MS., in which most of the facts and dates prior to 1850, were faithfully recorded.]

The township owes its name to Gen. Benjamin Wait—the first settler and leading proprietor of the town. It is situated in the south-western part of Washington Co., bounded by Moretown, Northfield, Warren, and Fayston. Its post-office is 20 miles (more or less) from the capital of the State, and lies snugly embedded just in the "Fork of the Y" of the Green Mountain range. The valley of the Mad river, running from south-west to north-east intersects it, the serpentine course of the stream both beautifying the scenery, and enriching and devouring by turns the meadows through which it winds its way. At the bottom of the deeply cut channel of the river may be seen the trunks of old trees, partly washed out, projecting from the banks, which must have been a hundred years old before they were overthrown. They are buried at a depth of about 10 feet in pebbles, gravel, and surface soil. Moreover, 60 years ago there was a heavy growth of timber standing on this soil. Probably this original forest was overthrown by the river, and the soil afterwards deposited, for the channel of the stream is by no means permanent. Since the remembrance of the writer it has worn to the east or west as many as 15 rods. The uplands are under cultivation as well as the interval land, and though broken are strong; for the most part, they make ample returns to the dairyman and the shepherd. In spite of all these drawbacks the land is so productive that real estate brings a high price; and it was well said by Mr. Jones in his sketch, that the township was capable of supporting a much larger population than it has ever seen. No better crops are produced than by these farmers of Waitsfield, who take proper pains with their work. The forests which remain are a mixture of hard and soft wood, maple and spruce predominating.

The landscape is set off finely with a scalloped border, by the line of green hills, which completely inclose it as far as the eye can see; leaving, apparently, no outlet even for the river; and a few points, like those of "Bald" mountains and "Old Scrag," on the east and south; Lincoln, with its slides, and Camel's Hump on the west, and Mansfield far in the north.

On either side of this valley several fair sized brooks flow down from the hillsides, turning, or capable of turning, many busy wheels as they go. Of these the largest are Mill and Shepard's brooks on the west, and Pine brook on the east side of the river. White cottages are to be seen on either side the valley, and about there plenty of the evidences of thrift and comfort—often of taste and refinement; and the roads at all seasons are remarkably good through this whole valley. The landscape is pronounced, even by strangers, to be picturesque and charming beyond many others in Vermont, none of which are wanting in rural attractions.

Mad river received its name doubtless from the fact that—the mountain slopes being so near and steep—the surplus water is almost immediately thrown off into the brooks, and by them poured out into the river, which of course rises like sudden anger overflowing its banks, and devouring them at will.

Waitsfield is almost precisely at the geographical center of the State of Vermont, and tradition has it that the commissioners to locate the State Capital "stuck their stake" almost precisely where the village now stands. But Gen. Wait declared "he wouldn't have his meadow cut up," and so he saved the town from that honor.

INCORPORATION.

The charter is dated Feb. 25, 1782, or 5 years after Vermont declared herself a free and independent State, signed by the venerable Thomas Chittenden, governor at the time. It was then a part of Chittenden County until 1811, when embraced in the new county called Jefferson, formed afterwards, called Washington. The township was supposed to include a tract of 23,030 acres. In 1788, it was found to contain 13,850 acres, or plus 840 acres. The description in the charter runs :

6 miles, 126 chains on the northerly side ; 5 miles, 27 chains on the easterly side ; 6 miles on the southerly side ; 6 miles, 67 chains on the westerly side.

PROPRIETORS AND THEIR DOINGS.

The grant of the township was made "to Benjamin Wait, Roger Enos, and their associates, to the number of seventy." It was designed to have been divided into 75 equal shares (five of which were to be set apart for public use), containing 318 acres each—two lots of 150 acres each in the 1st division, and one lot of 18 acres in the 2d division. The survey of the 1st division, viz. : of that part lying west of the mountain, was made in 1788, and this survey and plot was accepted by the proprietors. But as the lots began to be taken up and cleared, it was found the survey was very inaccurate. The 2d range of lots from the Moretown line are actually 180 rods wide ; the 5th range only about 120 rods wide ; the 6th range 180 rods, again ; also measuring the other way, there is a discrepancy, so that, for example, lot No. 107, first occupied by Mr. Salma Rider, contains 200 acres ; lot No. 127, first occupied by Mr. John Burdick, only 115 acres.

This inaccuracy in the 1st division made trouble in the survey of the 2d division, which was to consist of 70 lots, of 18 acres each. This survey was made by Stephen Maine in 1795, and the work—as far as he was really responsible for it—was done well ; but the gore proved to be about twice as wide as Mr. Strong had put it down. Mr. Maine relied implicitly on the field-book and plot of Mr. Strong, and made out his plot of the small lots before he entered upon the survey, and actually surveyed and marked the bounds of nearly half the lots before he discovered the mistake.

Gen. Wait, one of the commissioners, was then consulted, and he was ordered to proceed with his work as he had begun, which he accordingly did, and the lots contain about 36 acres instead of 18. The errors of Mr. Strong's survey were at the time charged against his chain-men ; but Mr. Jonathan Marshal, late of Bethel, one of the party, relates that "they kept their big jug near Mad river, and carried a small jug with them on their routes. In surveying the 4th range, the small jug gave out, and they, having run back 20 rods to avoid an impassable ledge, forgot to make allowance for it in their haste to get back again." So, probably "strong water" was the cause of the discrepancy.

Five shares were granted for public purposes ; one each to the University of Vermont, the County Grammar School, the town schools, the support of preaching, and the first settled minister.

SUBTRACTIONS.—In 1822, "four tier of lots, including the small lots of the 2d division, on the easterly side of the town," were set off to Northfield by the Legislature. The tract lay on the Northfield side of the mountain, and in all business matters, except town business, the inhabitants naturally gravitated toward that village. In 1846, 6 lots more, aggregating 2,400 acres, making in all 8,310 acres taken from the original grant, were added to Northfield, leaving a trifle more than two-thirds of the original 36 square miles to Waitsfield. The line between the two towns is now placed as near the top of the mountain as it could be without dividing lots.

The first proprietors' meeting was held in Windsor, June 30, 1788, adjourned to meet at Timothy Lull's, in Hartland, Nov. 4, 1788. It is probable that the adjourned meeting was held, but the record does not decide it so. The next date upon the records is "Woodstock, June 2, 1789," when a tax was voted to defray the expenses of obtaining the charter and making the survey. The names of those who voted the tax are given, together with the number of "rights" which each represented :

Zebulon Lee, 17 rights ; Benjamin Wait, 5 ; Joel Matthews, 3 ; John Marsh, 5 ; Ezra Jones, 3 ; Wm. Sweetzer, 3 ; Anthony Morss, 1 ; Reuben Skinner, 3 ; or eight men representing 40 shares out of the 70. The remaining 30 shares were sold Sept.

23, 1789, for taxes, at auction, bringing "£1, 10s. per lot." The most of them were bid off by Gen. Wait, who seems to have become from that time the "majority" of the proprietors. The records of the proprietors are exceedingly meagre, and most likely inaccurate, perhaps owing to the custom of "adjourning 15 minutes to meet at this place," just after organization, the interval being long enough to allow the clerk (to say nothing of the rest of the assembly), time to muddle his brains with toddy.

In 1790, a petition was presented to the Legislature "for a tax of 2d. per acre," to be expended in building roads, bridges and mills in the town. This being granted, it was equally divided between the mills on the one hand, and the roads and bridges on the other. In consequence, a saw-mill and grist-mill were speedily put in running order at the south-west corner of the town, by John Heaton, known as "Green's Mills," or the "Mill Village," and later as "Irasville." Before this the people had a large birch stump which they used for a mortar to pound hominy in, and were obliged to carry their wheat as far as Hancock to reach a regular grist-mill.

THE FIRST ACTUAL SETTLEMENT

was made by Gen. Wait and family, in 1789. His house was erected on the meadow near the spot where his remains are buried. At that time, there was no other dwelling within 10 or 12 miles in any direction. Northfield already had a small settlement. Roxbury was occupied the same year, and Moretown the next. Fayston was an unbroken wilderness for more than 7 years after Gen. Wait came to Waitsfield. The town was not formally organized until 5 years afterward, or in 1794.

In 1795, the first representative was elected, there being then 27 legal voters in town. This representative was naturally of whom personally a few words ought to be spoken at this point. He was a native of Sudbury, Mass., being born Feb. 13, 1736. In the language of "Thompson's Vermont" (p. 178): "He possessed a firm and vigorous constitution, and early manifested a disposition and talent for military enterprise. At the age of 18, he entered the service of his country under the brave Gen. Amherst. In 1756, he was taken by the French, carried to Quebec, and from thence sent as a prisoner to France. On the coast of France, he was retaken by the British, and carried to England. In the spring of 1757, he returned to America, and in 1758, assisted in the capture of Louisburgh. During the two succeeding years, he aided in the reduction of Canada. After the submission of Canada, he was sent, by the commandant of Detroit, to Illinois to bring in the French garrisons included in the capitulation. He performed this difficult service with singular perseverance and success. At 25 years of age, he had been engaged in 40 battles and skirmishes, and his clothes were several times perforated with musket balls, but he never received a wound. In 1767, he removed to Windsor, in this State, and constituted the third family in the township. He acted a decided and conspicuous part in favor of Vermont in the controversy with New York. In 1776, he entered the service of the United States as captain, and fought under the banners of Washington till the close of the war, during which time he had been raised to the rank of colonel. After this he was made a brigadier general of militia, and was for 7 years high sheriff of the county of Windsor.

After he came to Waitsfield, he made profession of religion, and lived an exemplary life to the last.

He is said to have been of more than medium height, stout, of very light complexion, and until the day of his death, singularly erect, whether sitting, standing or riding. One incident will illustrate something of his usual manner. His son, at that time a man of middle age, having been bitten by a rabid dog, was urged in vain by his friends to go at once to a competent physician. His delay was occasioned by the pressure of his work, and the distance which he must put between himself and home. At that time there was no reliable physician nearer than Woodstock. The father becoming very anxious about his son, appeared on horse-back, and with another horse saddled, at his son's house, without previous notice, and said, "Young man! mount this horse and go to Woodstock with me! There is a man to take care of your farm," pointing to a man who came with him. The son obeyed without argument, and was rescued, though not without plain symptoms of hydrophobia, and a tedious summer of practical imprisonment, from which he once broke away, but was persuaded and carried back by his resolute father, who did not leave him alone much of the time.

Gen. Wait lived to the age of 86 years. His death occurred suddenly and unexpectedly, at the house of a friend, June 28, 1822. He started out that morning, saying that he had business to do, which would take him to the Center and around by the lower bridge. That after doing this, he intended to call at John Burdick's, and that after this journey was finished he should be ready to go. Arriving at the latter place, he complained of feeling unwell, and expired before his family could be notified. His remains were deposited in the grave-yard on the meadow just back of the village school-house. A marble monument marks the spot, which was paid for by subscription of the citizens, but which never satisfied them and ought never to have been accepted. Of his descendants, only a grand-daughter, Mrs. Harriet Carpenter, and some of her children and grandchildren remain in town.

In 1797, the number of legal voters had increased from 27 to 61. The check list of that year having been preserved, we are able to state that only three of these were living in 1850, while the number of inhabitants had increased to 1048, the remainder after a large district had been set off to Northfield. The vote for governor that year amounted to 182. The grand list was $2691.68. In 1869, there were 1005 inhabitants; the vote for governor was 186; the grand list is $3536.63; but the basis of the grand list having been materially modified, these figures do not properly indicate the growth of the town. Previous to 1842, land was listed at 6 per cent.; buildings at 4 per cent., and stock at rates according to age and value. Now the whole property is listed at one per cent. Only 10 of the family names mentioned in the voting list of 1797 are now to be found in town; five of these in the north district. In 1850, there were living 21 men and several women, whose ages ranged from 78 to 88 years. Of these only 11 family names remain. The names which for many years predominated were Joslin and Jones, the former from Weathersfield, the latter from Claremont, N. H., with a liberal seasoning also of Smiths, Stoddards and Barnards, natives of Shelburne and Deerfield, Mass. At the present time (1869,) the Vt. Register represents Waitsfield as having 1 attorney, 4 physicians, 2 clergymen, 8 merchants, 1 hotel-keeper, 1 artist, 9 manufacturers of all crafts.

The chief business of the townspeople is farming. The chief products or exports are butter and cheese, maple sugar, (100,800 lbs. of sugar were made in 1868,) wood, good horses, and cattle. There are two villages in the town, one of which monopolizes about all the mercantile business, being so situated as to make itself the natural center, not only of Waitsfield but of Fayston, and to a considerable extent of Warren. They have a daily mail from Middlesex, and several teams are running continually to and from the railroad, carrying lumber and bringing merchandise.

The Congregational church stands on an eminence neither out of nor in the village. The old brick church is the only church edifice in the village proper. The Methodist society propose to erect a new church by its side in due time.

The Hon. Roderick Richardson once offered the town a beautiful piece of land fronting on both the principal streets, for a public park and village-hall site, if they would improve it suitably. But with the same foresight which characterized Gen. Wait in refusing the State house when offered, the town let the opportunity pass, and a dwelling-house and garden now occupy the situation. May the time come when the citizens of this town shall have higher and more tasteful ideas than to say, as one once said to the writer, "I had rather see a hill of potatoes in my front yard, any time, than a bunch of flowers."

There are no men of immense fortunes in town, but a number who have become wealthy in the popular, Vermont sense, by cultivating their farms, and by mercantile employments. There are scarcely any families who are not able to live comfortably.

WAR RECORD.

In the "memorial record of Waitsfield," prepared with great care by Rev. A. B. Dascomb, the number of our soldiers stands as follows: No. credited to the town by government, 95. No. of different individuals who served, 87. Died from sickness, 10. Killed in action, 8. Several died after discharge from disease contracted and wounds received in service.

The record of the standing of these men at their discharge or death is as follows:

The list of their names in the order of enlistment, with their ages and rank at discharge, is as follows:

Captains, 4; 2d lieutenants, 2; sergeants, 3; corporals, 11; privates, 50; sharp shooters, 7; cavalry men, 4; battery men, 2; Signal corps, 1; surgeon, 1; hospital steward, 1; musicians, 1; in the navy, 1.

Of those who were natives of this town, who went into the army from other places, there are, 2 1st lieutenants, 1 cavalryman, and 12 privates.

Most of these belonged to the famous "Vermont Brigade" of the "6th corps," who have received from a grateful country the honor which they thoroughly earned in many a march and battle.

The amount of money expended by the town in procuring men for the army service: Paid for bounty to nine months' men, $575; to 1 year's men, $2,700; to 3 years' men, $6,202; to substitutes, $700; subsistence for volunteers, $18.10; transportation for same, $38.50; services of selectmen and agents, $199.53; total, $10,433.13.

The history of the 13th regiment (of 9 months' men) who did good service in guarding the Occoquan during the winter of '62-'63, and also at the battle of Gettysburg, where they constituted part of Gen. Stannard's command, has been pleasantly told by Lieut. E. F. Palmer, in a neat little work entitled, "Camp Life."

TEMPERANCE.

Though it deserves to be said that the early settlers of Waitsfield were remarkably moral, and many of them pious men, yet they were accustomed to partake of the intoxicating cup at will, and some of them a great deal too freely to be called at that time temperate men, and accidents resulting from intoxication and brawls were of altogether too frequent occurrence, and those who sold grew rich, while those who drank, many of them, "ran down."

In 1821, at a "raising," one of the men, Wheeler by name, became intoxicated, and in wrestling, or "trying tricks," fell, and was carried home insensible, and found upon examination, to have expired, after being laid on his bed.

This accident startled the whole community, and the faithful pastor improved it by preaching a bold tectotal sermon at his funeral, from the text, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

Soon after, Dea. Moses Fisk sent out invitations to the raising of a barn, with the proviso that no liquor would be furnished. There was, of course, a large gathering, with the ill-concealed design of forcing the Deacon "to cave in." Matters proceeded as usual in such cases, until the moment for raising the ridge-pole, or "rum-pole," as it was called. The order was given to take it up. The men bent to the task, but strange to say, suddenly found themselves devoid of all strength, and after several trials, and much sham accusation of each other for not lifting, gave it up, saying they could do nothing more until strengthened by liquor. It was late in the afternoon, and the master-workman became so nervous that he finally begged of the Deacon to allow him, at his own expense, to provide a treat. This was refused, and the Deacon, a man of candor and decision worthy of a pioneer, made a short address, thanking his neighbors for what they had done, repeating his conviction that drinking was altogether a sin and an injury to the whole community, referring, with emotion, to Wheeler's death, and then saying, "It will be a serious inconvenience to me if this barn is not finished. I cannot, however, do what my conscience forbids me to do, and if this frame cannot go up without rum, every stick of the timber shall rot on the ground where it lies."

After a moment's pause, some one said, "The deacon is a good fellow, and lets up with it," and they went ahead with such eagerness that in a short time the work was done, without any accident or broil, and the people went home all of them well satisfied, and the most of them convinced. Though it is true that afterwards several "raisings" were scenes of riot and accident, yet many were tectotal gatherings. Some who were weakly on the right side were strengthened, and those who did provide rum for such occasions, only aided the temperance movement by furnishing further demonstration, that the use of rum was evil, and only evil. The earliest movement looking towards organization was the formation of a temperance society about 1828; the members of which pledged themselves "to report faithfully every month what kind and quantities of liquors they drank, with the dates and the company." This became at least the occasion of a reform in a few men, while others even withdrew from the society, loving darkness rather than light. A member of that society who "never had anything to report from first to last," said to the writer: "At that time I would no more have signed a teetotal pledge than I would have sold myself for a slave." A teetotal pledge was, however, signed by a number of the people, and a society maintained for some time before the "Washingtonians" appeared, and the people as a majority have adhered to the subsequent measures of reform which have been inaugurated in the State, the old license and late prohibition statutes. The Good Templars have dealt with rumsellers with a spirit worthy of the children of those who sleep in the old cemetery on the hill.

SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

The inhabitants of Waitsfield—though for the most part uncultivated men and women—were by no means people of grovelling ideas. They understood the advantages of free schools, and soon after the organization of the town, four school districts were laid out, in which (at least in a few years) schools were regularly maintained. These were the North (No. 1). The East and Center together, the village, and one mill-village district. At the present time the number of districts is seven, though they at one time numbered ten. The diminution is owing mainly to the union of districts, the village now sustaining a graded school. The number of scholars is far less now than it must have been 30 years ago. The early settlers and their children, too, raised up large families, and were a good example of those spoken of by one of the sons of Waitsfield:

"For, in their sweet simplicity, they hold
A child is better than a bag of gold."

At the present time there are but the fewest few of large families, and these are become a by-word.

Several noted men, among whom is President Kitchell of Middlebury, began their public career as teachers in these district schools. It has been customary also for many years to secure an undergraduate of some college as teacher of a "fall school"; but those who would obtain a classical education are obliged to go out of town for it.

In the records of the North district, (No. 1,) we find some curious specimens of voting and recording, which serve at once as exponents of the parliamentary training of the clerk—of the poverty and trials of the people—and for the diversion of those who have enjoyed the better advantages for which the untaught fathers laid the foundation:

Dec. 22, 1797. Article 2d was put to vote to see if the District would hire Mr. S. Smith, to keep school, and engage him 10 bushels of wheat, and passed in the negative.

Sept. 25, 1812. Voted to have three months schooling the ensuing winter, and that the committee be instructed to procure a teacher capable of teaching reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar and geography, provided such an one can be got for any other pay than money. (This was during the "second war," so styled.)

The school-house, where this business was transacted, was built of logs, badly lighted, and with a huge old fireplace at one end, in which to consume enormous quantities of green wood during the cold winter days without much hope of giving an even temperature to the room. Often 30 cords of wood were burned in a single winter. Yet here were trained up a company of men and women who have nobly served their generation. They had no mathematics beyond the four fundamental rules and the "rule of three," yet some of them became by their own native wit leaders in public business, and teachers of considerable merit. One of them pressed on until, in middle age, by the light of a chip fire, he had mastered Cicero and Virgil, having no Lexicon but that in the old Latin Reader, and no teacher except occasionally the "master" who came from college to teach the winter school. It should be said, however, that he had text books that were half "pony" at least.

This man (Ithamar Smith, now deceased) was especially thorough in his explanations to his pupils when a teacher. One of these explanations was so simple and perfect, that we must not pass it by. He studied intensely one evening to find some actual demonstration of the rule that "the area of a circle is equal to that of a parallelogram, the length of which is equal to half the circumference, and the width to half the diameter of the circle." He finally hit upon this. Taking a pie to school for his dinner and cutting it fine, he laid the pieces together "crust to point." The reader will perceive that one half the crusts made the length of the parallelogram, the width of which was the length of a piece of pie, or half the diameter of the pie. No better demonstration could be made than this.

Another of these almost self-taught men was once assisting a company of surveyors, and when they ran off the lots in diamond form, "because the lay of the land made it easier to do so," he declared they were cheating the owner. They looked down upon him from their scientific heights, and haughtily demanded the proof. He quietly took a straw, and bending it into a square—having hold of the opposite corners—said "call that a square lot." Then drawing out a little on the corners, which he held, so as to make a diamond of it, he said, "you say there is just as much land there now?" They replied "of course there is." Drawing it up until there was nothing left, he asked triumphantly, "now is there?"

There have been too many instances of rebellion among scholars, and dismissal of teachers who lacked muscle; and in a proportion with the frequency of these things, a lower grade of scholarship in all the schools.

INCIDENTS.

Many of the early inhabitants were certainly very credulous and superstitious. A daughter of Mr. Samuel S. Savage, "dreamed three nights in succession, that there was a large pot of Captain Kidd's money buried near a ledge of rocks, a few rods east of the house." This occurred not far from the year 1800. It never entered the heads of any of the family, or their neighbors, to ask how Capt. Kidd should chance to be burying money 200 miles and more inland, when only savages inhabited all the wilderness; but they "had heard it said that whatever was dreamed three nights in succession always came to pass," and so Mr. S. commenced digging for the money. The same tradition enjoined—as indispensable to success—that no word should be spoken during the process, and that some one should sit by and read the Bible all the while. So Nancy sat on the rock reading, and Sam, the son, was sometimes with them. After digging several days, "in stabbing down his crowbar, he hit the identical pot. He distinctly heard the money chink, held his bar on it that it might not escape him, and beckoned to Sam to come and dig it out." Unfortunately, however, he could not make Sam understand, and at length Sam spoke! Instantly the pot of money moved away, and he could never find it again. The most ridiculous part of the matter, is the fact well attested, that Mr. Savage believed all this, as long as he lived, and was never ridiculed out of it.

Somewhat in the same line (though more successful) was the dream, thrice repeated the same night, of a Mr. Rice (late Dea. Rice of Granville,) then in the employ of Gen. Wait, (not far from 1795,) that he went to "the cove," (now part of the mill pond at the village,) and saw a moose, which he shot and killed, and that a man came along just then with a sled, and carried the game in for him. When he arose, having told this to the family, Mrs. Wait took down the old "Queen's arm" and handed it to him with the powder-horn and bullet pouch, when he repaired to the spot, saw the moose, brought him down with a single bullet, and returned with his booty on the sled of the man from Warren, all according to programme. This large story is too well attested to leave any room for contradiction.

The writer has many an instance in mind of the scrupulous care with which these grandmothers made sure of the "signs" in all important domestic matters, such as picking the geese and "setting" all sorts of bipeds, making soap, butchering, taking a journey, commencing a piece of work, and one even believed "it would spoil a hasty pudding to stir it against the sun."

It seems strange that sturdy men and women, who were not afraid of bears and wolves, and who could ride on horseback "double," and each carry a child to meetings—who were possessed of such sterling common sense in most matters—should be so completely under the powers of such petty superstitions.

ACCIDENTS.

It is sometimes remarked that "dead trees fall silently and in still weather."

This was illustrated in the case of Wm. Joiner in 1805. He was riding on horseback through a piece of woods near the house now owned by Dea. David Phelps, when the trunk of a decayed tree fell across his path in such a way as to scratch the pommel of his saddle, and instantly kill his horse, while he remained entirely uninjured. There have been 15 cases of accidental deaths since the organization of the town:

In 1810, Lewis Taylor, age 10, was drowned in the flume of a grist-mill; Enos Wilder, age 35, killed by a falling tree, and Gilbert Wait, Jr., age 3, killed by falling through an aperture in the chamber floor.

In 1815, a child of Daniel Skinner was smothered in bed.

In 1820, a child of Ezra Jones fell from the arms of a girl who was tossing it in sport, and was killed.

In 1821, Wm. Wheeler, age 55, was killed by "trying tricks" at a raising.

In 1822, Joseph L. Carpenter, age 14, was killed by the falling of a tree.

In 1830, John Kimball, age 3, was drowned in a channel washed out by the flood, which had previously swept away the dwelling; Eliza A. Stoddard, age 6, killed by the kick of a horse.

In 1833, Mrs. Simeon Pratt, age 38, supposed to have died in a fit.

In 1836, Luther Fairbanks, age 30, drowned while bathing.

In 1842, child of C. Joyce, smothered in the bed.

In 1848, John O. Shaw, age 11, was hung in a school-house window when trying to climb in.

In 1850, James D. Bushnell, age 21, drowned while bathing.

In 1865, Howard Bruce, age 4, drowned in a spring.

There have also been several cases of sudden deaths from occult diseases, and 4 cases of suicide.

RELICS OF INDIANS.

This territory was once occupied as hunting grounds by a portion of the "St. Francis" tribe of Indians, if the traditions of a relic of the tribe can be relied upon. Many traces have been discovered of their occupancy, which seem to show that they had vacated the valley only a few years before the coming of Gen. Wait.

In 1808, Samuel Barnard, while at work in his sugar-place, found a two-gallon brass kettle turned upside down on a rock. The kettle only a few years ago was in use in his family. Another was found not long after on the lot lying east of Mr. Barnard's, and not very far from the spot where the first one was found.

In 1822, as Ebenezer Barnard (son of Samuel), and Rufus Childs, were clearing a part of this same sugar-place, they found a gun and pistol, tomahawk, and about a quart of beads, made of something resembling brown earthen ware. The stocks of the gun and pistol were rotten, but the barrels, though rusty, were good, and have done good service since. The gun was found sticking out of the ground, and in digging to see if some chief had been buried there, the pistol and beads were found at a depth of about 2 feet.

GAME.

For many years after the settlement of the town, the deer were quite plenty in the forests, as well as trout in the streams. The bears and wolves proved a serious annoyance to the settlers. Neither fields of grain nor flocks of sheep were safe unless watched continually. But bruin soon became very cautious.

In the year 1804, Dea. Moses Fisk shot and killed a large bear Sabbath night, that was about to spring at one of his sheep, in a pasture very near his house. It was jokingly said that "the bear had too much confidence in the Deacon to suppose he would shoot him Sunday, and so exposed himself carelessly." The Deacon was an excellent shot, and it is said that he brought down six bears—several of them under hazardous circumstances, and that he never missed but one that he fired at. He also killed many deer, one of them with an axe, at a time when the snow was very deep, with a little crust on the top, and the writer has the antlers upon his carving knife and fork. His wife, also, shot an insatiable hawk, that "did not come when the Deacon was at home," and it is probable that both did no more than their share, but other facts and names are lost.

In 1797, the wife of Dr. Pierce, living near Moretown line, saw a deer pursued by the hunters approaching the house. Judging that he would pass through a narrow gap between the fence and the house, she caught up an axe and stationed herself by the corner of the house, and when the deer made its appearance, actually inflicted a mortal wound upon him; but as soon as she had done so, became affrighted and fled to her chamber, "and almost went into hysterics."

In the spring of 1821, a wolf was discovered near the house of James Joslin, and was turned back into a strip of woods, where he was speedily surrounded by the yeomanry, who rallied at short notice, and at length shot by Dea. Moses Fisk. The bounty of $20 was given to the minister, Rev. A. Chandler, and with it he made himself a life member of the Bible Society.

In March, 1855, another wolf was surrounded and killed in the same forest. The writer was one of the boys who waded through the deep snow to assist in his capture, and had the privilege of sending one bullet after him, with perfect safety to the wolf. He was first discovered by Pardon Bushnell, Esq., making for the East mountain, and first surrounded in the piece of woods lying between the river and the old common. It is not a little remarkable that, after breaking out of this ring, he should have been secured at all, and that in less than four hours after; weight, 87 lbs. Several marksmen lay claim to the honor of bringing him down. It probably belongs to Cheney Prentice, Esq. It was sold for $5, and bounty, at auction, and the same distributed (by vote of the captors), to the poor of the town.

FIRES.

There have been 15 fires in town which amounted to total loss of the buildings, and in most cases an almost total loss of contents. They may be classified thus: distilleries, 2, prior to 1818; stores, 1; shops, 4; barns, 2; dwellings, 6. Of the causes of fire, it may be said that the store was set on fire late in the evening, while the clerk was drawing some alcohol to cook eggs with, for a few select companions. In several cases the dwellings were set on fire from ashes left in wooden vessels; in others, the cause remains unknown. One barn was burned by lightning. Only once (1846), have two such casualties occurred the same year.

The first fire of all occurred in 1794, and in the coldest of the winter. It was the dwelling-house of Daniel Taylor, the Elder, and was situated on the meadow now owned by Comstock Prentice, Esq. The story of the fire is so pleasantly told in rhyme by Mr. Smirh before mentioned, that we give it entire, only adding that the settlers did all they could for the families, while one went to Shelburne, Mass., and procured supplies which could not be had nearer, and which were gladly given by the former neighbors of the two families :

THE BURNING HOUSE.

Among the many fictions new
This story old is strictly true;
To snatch it, fading, if I can,
From dark oblivion, is my plan.

When Waitsfield mostly was a wild,
As I—an aged man—a child,
When woods were 'round the dwelling near,
And huntsmen shot the bounding deer,
When flowed Mad River full of trout,
And boys could fish a plenty out,
My father left a distant town
To settle near the river down.
No land had he but forest wild,
No home to shelter wife or child:
My Uncle Taylor kindly shared
With us the house he had prepared;
Two rooms, with roof of bark, it had,
And sheltered cousins very glad;
Nine little children were we all,
The oldest being only small.
Our happy quiet did not last
Till the first Sabbath eve was past;
The men that evening were away,
The children mostly sleeping lay;
Some flax, in bundles very dry,
Was o'er the entry lying high;
My mother near with candle came,
And lucklessly it caught the flame;
Her shriek I still remember well,
Such shrieks as sudden panic tell.
In vain she tried to stop the fire;
She only made it blaze the higher.
The rapid flames began to pour
Bright blazes on the entry floor,
And through that fiery entry lay
The only chance to flee away.
Just time the mothers had to throw
Their naked children on the snow,
Then count them rescued o'er and o'er,
Lest there were mislaid one or more—
When did a mother ever yet,
In fright or haste, her child forget?—
Poor "Penny" met a harder doom,
And pass within that burning room.
Without intent were blankets four Snatched with the children; nothing more.
Their garments all were left to share
The fate of other comforts there.
The absent fathers saw the flame,
And with some neighbors, breathless came—
Too late,—they sped but to behold,
With joy, the children in the cold.
Stay, reader! hear my story through,
Since all I have to tell is true!
While high the fire terrific blazed,
The people o'er the river gazed,—
"What could that light, portentous, mean, Above the trees at distance seen?"
Off sped the men the cause to see,
And offer aid if need should be;
The women grouped and talked with fear,
Expecting direful news to hear.
"His children left alone," they said,
"Have fired the house above their head,"
But when my sorrowing mother came,

And not a child was left in flame,
Although in bitterness she cried,
And seemed as if she might have died,
They thought the trouble very small,
Since house was nothing—life was all!

Now let us make the moral out
(For facts their moral have, no doubt);
Think, when misfortune gives you pain,
It might be worse, and not complain.

FLOODS.

In July, 1830, the rivers overflowed the whole valley, sweeping away every bridge in town, and doing incalculable damage to the crops, and not a little to the mills. The grist-mill was left on an island, by the gulling of the flood. The dwelling of a Mr. Kimball was swept away, but the family escaped. This house stood on the bank. Mr. K. had lately buried his brother, with whom he was in company. He used to say, that in the night he awoke and listened to the roar of the water, and the thought once arose that he ought to get up and see if all was safe; but he had so little apprehension that he did not arise. In a few moments, he saw his brother standing by the side of the bed, and bidding him get up and flee. He declared he was wide awake, and saw the form vanish away. He arose, and finding there was danger, removed his family; and as he stepped out on the door-stone, last of all, the house began to settle away, and in a moment or two, went over into the flood.

In July, 1850, another flood swept through the valley, doing not so much damage as before, yet enough to make it remembered well. In July, 1858, there was another of a singular character, as all the damage was done by the brooks on the west side, or by the river swollen by their torrents. It would seem as if a huge cloud must have emptied itself all at once upon the hills of Fayston, although there were, indeed, heavy rains at the same time in the east part of the town. The thunder-shower (for such it was,) lasted only a few hours. It was the 21st birthday of the writer, and he remembers very well how, for over half an hour, a sheet of water poured from the roof breaking into drops, or pailfulls, about one foot below the ends of the shingles. "Shepard's Brook" (the most northerly of the streams having its rise in Fayston,) swept out for itself various new passages, and, in one case, uprooted and pushed for over a mile into the river and across it, upon the meadow nearly half an acre of heavy timber. A Mr. Learned, living near the mouth of the brook was reading his paper in the evening, when he "heard something bumping against the floor," and on going to the cellar found it to be his meat-barrel floating about. The water was then running across his lower doorstep, and the roaring of the brook showed its fury, while examination proved that there was no way of escape from the house. Though several buildings were swept away, this house the most beleaguered of all, was spared.

Dea. Parker relates that at 5 o'clock there was not a foot of water in the brook, and at 10 o'clock he stood and saw his barn carried away by the flood. A number of farms suffered severely by the washing away of the soil.

In October, 1869, another flood swept through this valley, reaching within a little over a foot of the high water mark of 1830. The town were obliged to raise an extra tax of 60 cents on the dollar to meet the damages. The crops of corn which were not already housed were swept away, and the breaking out of the river at the west end of the dam above the grist mill seriously endangered the village, and carried away a shop belonging to J. W. Richardson, Esq. It will be remembered that the water rose at three separate times, being highest on Monday, the 4th of Oct., but nearly as high on Monday the 11th, and high enough to awaken much anxiety on Wednesday, the 13th. Pine brook made a clean sweep of her 7 bridges, and many other bridges in the town followed suit. This high water was predicted by astronomers in the month of June, and their calculations did not fail except by less than 24 hours.

Also quite frequently, when the river breaks up in the spring, the ice will clog up, and the meadows will be flooded, washing away fences and sometimes the soil itself. And the poorer class of bridges, built in an early day, were often carried off in this way, but for many years no river bridge has been thus lost. Mad river without this turbulence, would be like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out.

ECCLESIASTICAL.

In 1794, a town committee was appointed to "lay out a meeting-house and yard." The site chosen was what is still known as "the common"—an elevated plain near the center of the original township. It consisted of about 9 acres, and the title was conveyed to the town in 1796. Five acres was the gift of Ezra Jones, Esq., on condition that, "if the town moved the centre (?) from that place" the title should be void. As soon, therefore, as the "new meeting-house" at the river village was occupied, and the town voted to hold town-meetings at the river, the heirs took possession of their portion. The remaining four acres, purchased for "£1, 10s.," of a Mr. Savage, are still common. The forest which covered this lot was chopped by a "Bee," in 1797, and the ground was then let out in parcels to be cleared, each workman having the right to take two crops of grass for his remuneration upon the lot set apart as a common. The burial ground was not fenced until 1809.

The first proposal as to building a house of worship, was to erect one jointly with the school-district on the east side of the common, with the understanding that when both parties were better able, the district should buy out the town, and the town should build a regular church edifice. After the frame was up and partly covered, the district receded from the engagement; and in due time, the frame was removed to the valley, where it has been used as store and dwelling-house until the present time—known as the "Lewis Holden" house.

This apparent drawback was after all a stimulous to the religious interests of the town. It hastened the erection of a suitable meeting-house—an imposing structure of the olden style, bearing date 1807, altogether innocent of paint inside, and for some years of stoves; but extravagant in the amount of 7x9 glass, which rattled away at every suggestion of a breeze. It had the usual high pulpit, towering over the "deacon's seat,"—the capacious gallery, and for many years the ample sabbath assembly. On the Society's record, we read among other recommendations of a committee, that a certain proportion of the money derived from the sale of the pews should be paid at the beginning, as it would be needed for nails, glass, "and rum for the raising."

CONGREGATIONAL.

The Congregational church, which controlled this house, was organized with 11 members in 1796. Rev. Ebenezer Kingsbury, of Jericho, officiating. Others were gradually added to it, and it became strong enough in 1801 to settle a pastor; and from that time has been the strongest religious body in the town.

Rev. William Saulsbury, the first pastor, was a young man, well educated, and able in the pulpit, but singularly wanting in those qualities which secure the respect and affection of the people when outside the pulpit. He received the "minister's lot" as a settlement portion, and $166.67 the first year, it being agreed that the salary should be increased as fast as the grand list on the society's roll increased, until it should amount to $266.66. The ordination services took place in a booth built for the occasion, on the site chosen for the meeting-house, Rev. Mr. Lyman, of Brookfield, preaching the sermon from I. Tim. 4: 16.

During the 68 years since the ordination of Mr. Saulsbury, 19 ministers have at different times had charge of this church. Of these, the longest pastorate was that of Rev. Mr. Chandler, 20 years; the next longest, that of Rev. Charles Duren, 10 years, and next, that of Mr. Saulsbury, 9 years.

LIST OF MINISTERS.

Rev. William Saulsbury, 1801-'9; Amariah Chandler, 1810-'30; Guy Sampson, 1831-'31; Joseph Marsh, 1832-'34; B. F. Read, 1835-'35; S. G. Tenney, 1835-'37; A. Flemming, 1837-'38; Preston Taylor, 1839-'42; Calvin Selden, 1843-'4; James Hobart, 1845-'49; Charles Duren, 1849-'54; L. H. Stone, 1855-'56; Andrew Royce, 1856-'57; C. W. Piper, 1857-'57; C. S. Smith, 1858-'58; Robert Stuart, 1858-'59; Mr. George Pierson, 1859-'60; Rev. A. B. Dascomb, 1860-'67; J. H. Babbitt, 1868.

Five men have commenced their ministry with this people. None have finished their ministry here. But the impression of the character and doctrine of Mr. Chandler is not yet obliterated. A fact which shows how good it is for a people to keep a good and faithful pastor, and that the length and the success of a pastorate bear some relation to each other.

THE DEACONS OF THE CHURCH.

John Barnard, 1796-'13; Moses Fisk, 1801-'47; David Phelps, 1813-'23; Jedediah Bushnell, 1825-'66; Ithamer Smith, 1830-'48; Isaac Hawley, 1836-'48; Lyman Fisk, 1844—; David M. Phelps, 1866-'69; Henry N. Bushnell, 1866—; Edward A. Fisk, 1866—.

There have been several seasons of revival among this people,—the most marked (considering their permanent fruits,) being that in 1817-18, under Mr. Chandler's preaching, and that in 1865-6, under Mr. Dascomb's. In each case 35 members at one time,—and most of them by profession, and others at intervals afterwards. It deserves to be said that, while this church may not have accomplished more than the average of country churches, it has done much good in training up those who have labored much in other places. Those who have gone out as laymen to strengthen other churches would make, in point of numbers, a large parish, and in point of influence a strong one, while it can show a longer roll of professional men—nearly all ministers—than the majority of Congregational churches in Vermont. Its membership from the first until now amounts to 500. The Congregational Society was formed under the old law. All the voters in town were members of it, unless they individually withdrew, by certifying to the town clerk "that they did not agree in religious opinion with a majority of the society." This statute was repealed at Woodstock in 1807, and in consequence, the society dissolved and formed a voluntary association, assuming all the rights and immunities of the old one. In 1845, a new meeting-house was built in the outskirts of the village, and dedicated, Rev. Mr. Gridley of Montpelier, preaching the sermon from Haggai 2 : 9.

The question, whether to "repair or build at the river," was one that divided the feelings of the people seriously. By vote of the society, it was at length submitted to the judgment of three men, viz : John L. Buck, and two others, beside.

the agreement being that their decision should be accepted as final. They decided naturally enough that the society "should build at the river." The results of this difficulty were that the new house was located just out of the village instead of in it, on elevated ground, toward the old common; so that the people who have to walk to church, find it quite a task to climb up from the village, and on week days, men drive by to the grist-mill and the postoffice, not always getting back to the meeting they should attend, or at least not until late, and evening meetings must go begging at private houses.

This partiality for the consecrated spot also led at length to the building of a small edifice out of the ruins of the old one, as a sort of union house, "to be used for funerals, evening services, &c."

After the building of the new church, the society became greatly reduced. For various causes, one after another withdrew their names from the roll; preaching was sustained by subscription only, and there were only about 12 men who could be depended upon to bring up arrears. These were obliged to pay a sum equal to five times all their other taxes combined, for years. It is needless to say that these were earnest and pious men; and it is pleasant to record the fact at length they have seen better times. Much credit is due to Rev. A. B. Dascomb for his patient continuance with this people in times when it was exceedingly difficult to raise a salary, he having come to them when they were lowest, and by the blessing of God, leaving them in 6 years, able and willing to give a pastor a good support.

METHODIST.

The first Methodist preaching in the town was probably about 1804, and doubtless a class was formed soon after. The town was first embraced in the Montpelier circuit, as were also the towns of Middlesex, Moretown, Warren and Fayston. Their first church edifice was erected in the mill village in 1833, was remodeled, a spire added, and painted in 1852. In 1845, the circuit was abolished, and Waitsfield and Warren became a station. In 1868, Waitsfield became a separate charge. The names of those who have been preachers, with the dates of their pastorate, as far as they can be ascertained,* are as follows :

Rev. Wilder Mack, Abel Heath, John Cummings, Nathan Howe; John Nason, 1835; Moses Sanderson, I. D. Rust, Cyrus Liscomb, H. J. Wooley, Wm. Blake, O. M. Legate, Harvey Hitchcock, H. T. Jones, D. Willis, P. N. Granger, A. J. Copeland, C. W. Kellogg, W. J. Kidder, P. Merrill, N. W. Scott, H. Webster, C. S. Buswell, L. Hill, B. P. Spaulding; N. M. Granger, 1868; F. M. Miller, 1869. The present number of members is 62, and probationers 8.

A good little anecdote is told of the times of Elder Mack. There was strong prejudice at that time in all the land against this denomination, over and above the objection that it was dividing the feelings and interests of the people. One Sabbath, Dr. Stoddard and wife, who lived at the extreme south of the valley, were unable to attend meeting. The children, however, went, and learning before they arrived at home that Elder Mack was going to preach at the school-house in their neighborhood, they roughly reported to their parents that "there was to be a lecture at the school-house that evening." So the mother (who would not have countenanced a Methodist meeting by any means), went with the children to the lecture. Finding it was not their own minister, but supposing it was some one with whom he had exchanged, she became intensely interested in the discourse. On their return, the eldest son asked, "Mother, what ism do you call that, Congregationalism or Methodism, or what?" "I call it 'gospelism,'" was her frank reply; and then she was informed that she had listened to Elder Mack. Of course the son was rebuked for concealing the fact, but whether it tended to relieve her of her prejudices, or not, we do not know. Her husband, however, though a most exemplary and strict man, lived and died believing himself "a reprobate"—a belief that Methodism might probably have corrected, had it been understood.

There have been several religious awakenings in the history of this church, the most marked of which was in 1835, when many were numbered as believers. Of this class, one has become a useful minister of the Gospel (Alonzo Hitchcock), and several others were most exemplary Christians while they lived.

UNIVERSALIST.

This society was formed Dec. 30, 1830. Quite a number of the prominent men in town entertained this doctrinal belief, and soon after the dismissal of Rev. Mr. Chandler from the pastorate of the Congregational church, they organized by electing Roderick Richardson, moderator; Cyron Burdick, clerk; R. Richardson, Daniel Thayer and Matthias S. Jones, prudential committee.

Rev. Mr. Fuller was their first preacher, and his first services were held as early as 1826. They were held in school-houses, barns, or wherever it seemed best or was necessary to hold them. It was claimed once (though some of the leading Universalists did not countenance it), that they had a right to the use of the Congregational meeting-house at least one-fourth of the time. This caused considerable discussion and trouble, and at length brought about an arbitration, in which several distinguished lawyers were employed and several days consumed. Their decision was emphatically against the claim of the Universalists, who abided by it like men. Six years later, the society (in connection with the Baptists), erected the brick church in the village, a good substantial structure with about 250 sittings. Of this the society owned nearly three-fourths, but the agreement was that every man who owned a pew would occupy the house one Sabbath in the year for such religious worship as was agreeable to himself.

The names of the different preachers were as follows: Rev. John E. Palmer, 1826-1837, (occasionally); Rev. Edward Brown, 1838-1840 (statedly); Rev. John E. Palmer, 1844-1848 (pastor); Rev. T. C. Eaton, Rev. G. S. Gurnsey, 1844-1856 (occasionally); Rev. C. C. Thornton, 1856-1862 (pastor); Rev. John Gregory, 1862-1869 (occasionally).

During the pastorate of Mr. Thornton, a Sunday school and Bible class was sustained, and the congregation was comparatively large.

BAPTIST.

A Baptist church of 11 members was organized May, 1835, Rev. John Ide, of Waterbury, assisted at its formation, the Methodists opening their meeting-house for the services. He also preached during that year one fourth of the time. Rev. Wm. M. Guilford preached over half the time during 1836, and after an interval, Rev. Friend Blood became pastor. His term commenced in 1838, or 1839, and continued until Rev. P. Amsden afterwards preached, and the church attained considerable strength, but declined, and was practically broken up in the exciting times of Millerism.

The records were unfortunately lost in the burning of the house of Roswell Richardson, who was clerk of the church from its organization to its extinction. Quite a number of the members afterwards joined both the Congregational and Methodist churches.

It is said of Rev. Mr. Blood, that in preaching, he was very dull for the first two hours, but eloquent and powerful for the third hour.

EPISCOPAL.

In 1853, while the Universalists were not occupying their house of worship, an effort was made by Hon. R. Richardson, Jr., and others, to establish Episcopal worship, which resulted in the repair of the house, the formation of a church of 52 members, and the installation of Rev. John E. Johnston as pastor. These services were continued until 1855, when Mr. Johnston removed, and Mr. Richardson took up his residence in Montpelier.

Rev. J. H. Hopkins, Jr., afterwards endeavored to look up the lost sheep, and Rev. Mr. Hazzard labored earnestly with them for a time; but the society has now very few members remaining, and no stated services. It depends upon the Northfield rector for occasional ministrations.

WESLEYAN.

In 1853, Rev. Lyman Prindle came into town, and preached at the Union house, on the old common. In a short time, a society was formed, and he was engaged as its pastor. His labors were continued without interruption until 1860, when he was succeeded by Rev. L. C. Partridge, who supplied until 1861, when he was succeeded by Rev. John Dolph, 1862; then Mr. Prindle returned and preached until 1864.

The church at first consisted of 10 members. In 1854, 16 were added. In 1855, 15. The whole number was 44. An interesting Sabbath school was maintained during all this time, and the average congregation was about 100.

The organization is still maintained, but no Sabbath services are held by it. "The distinctive features (in the words of a member) were to take higher and more radical ground on the reforms of the day—slavery, temperance, and secret-oath-bound societies."

PROMINENT MEN.

JENNISON JONES, Esq., was born in Claremont, N. H., Jan. 1, 1777, and removed in early life to Waitsfield, where he resided until his death. He enjoyed only the common school advantages of those days, but was one of those "self-made men" for which this country has been noted. As a young man he was a very successful teacher. He filled nearly every town office with perfect acceptance when in the prime of life, represented the town in 1827-'28, and was especially interested in the history of the town, and accurate in dates and figures. This sketch of Waitsfield (as will be seen from the introductory note), has been prepared with ease by reason of his labors and writings. He married, Dec. 26, 1802, Miss Philany Holmes, and reared a large family. He died Dec. 22, 1852, at the age of 75.

ITHAMER SMITH, Esq., was born in Shelburne, Mass., June 6, 1787, and came with his parents to Waitsfield in 1803. Allusion to his talents and a specimen of his poetry appears elsewhere in these pages. He was a leading anti-slavery man, and his experience was that of too many who so early espoused the cause of justice and humanity. Good men did not see as he saw, and were tardy to come up to his ground, and designing men scorned him and his cause, which made him sometimes almost bitter against them all. He removed to New York State in 1856, and died at the residence of his daughter, in Feb. 1862.

Among his children (who all obtained at least an average education), we notice Chauncey, an attorney, and once partner of Hon. Edward Everett, in Boston.

Luther L., a successful teacher in the southern part of Massachusetts, and now a resident of New York.

Frank B., a graduate of U. V. M. in the class of '63, now a civil engineer in the interior; and Abigail H., wife of Rev. Chas. Cavern, of Lake Mills, Wis.

Hon. JASON CARPENTER was born Aug. 15, 1772, at Coventry, Ct. Like many of his contemporaries, his school days were few, but his education practical. He came to Waitsfield in 1818, and was identified with its business and interests for the rest of his active life. He served as judge of probate for the County 2 years, and as representative from 1829 to '31, and from '34 to '36, inclusive. He married, ——— 18—, Miss Betsey Ingraham, by whom he had 6 children, of whom one finds mention in another place, the wife of Hon. Hiram Jones; while the record of another, Charles, as a most successful teacher, though cut off in the midst of his usefulness; and of another, George H., as a successful business man in Racine, Wis., must not be passed in silence.

MATTHIAS S. JONES, Esq., was born in Claremont, N. H., Apr. 12, 1778, and removed to Waitsfield at an early date. He was one of the more prominent men of the town, filling in turn the most important offices in the gift of his townsmen; was justice of the peace more than 30 years, and town clerk for half that period, and represented the town in 1825, '26, '27. He was twice married—Aug. 28, 1807, to Miss Betsey Joyslin, of Waitsfield, and May 26, 1836, to Miss Mary Prentice, of Weathersfield. His death occurred June 25, 1851. He reared a comparatively large family—all children of the first marriage—of whom are L. W. Jones, Esq., a successful merchant of Waitsfield, and a man of decided public spirit.

EDWIN JONES, M. D., who was born June 3, 1825, at Waitsfield, studied for a time with Dr. D. C. Joslin, of Waitsfield, and attended one course of lectures at Woodstock, graduating at length at Pittsfield, Mass., and practicing at Orange, Vt., for three months, and at Vershire and Stratford the remainder of his life. He married, Oct. 18, 1852, Miss Mary A., dau. of Rev. Elisha Brown, of Montpelier, and precisely 2 years later died at Strafford, a bereavement not only to those who knew him as a relative and friend, but to those who had learned to know him as a beloved physician.

Hon. HIRAM JONES, another son, who was born June 26, 1808, and whose opportunities for acquiring an education were confined to the common schools of his native town, and who made such improvements of these scanty means, that he was called into places of public trust at an unusually early age. Besides almost continually serving as justice of the peace, and frequently holding other offices of public trust, he represented the town in 1840, '41-'42, and was assistant judge of the county court from 1855 to 1857. (Died in 1872.) He married Oct. 6, 1835, Laura L., daughter of Hon. Jason Carpenter. Six children were the issue of this marriage, of whom Walter A., is a resident physician of his native town, and George M. lost his life in the first battle of the Wilderness,—the only one in which he was engaged. His enlistment was just at the time Gen. Grant took command in the 2d Reg. U. S. S.

Hon. RODERICK RICHARDSON, Sr., was born in Tolland, Conn., in 1779, and in early life removed to Waitsfield. By trade he was a saddler. He was for many years postmaster of the town, and the owner of the principal store; was assistant judge of Washington Co. court 2 years. The date of his marriage to Miss Anna Davis we are unable to ascertain. Two sons and two daughters were born to him, the youngest, Hon. RODERICK RICHARDSON, Jr., who as a man of enterprise and wealth was for many years a leader in the business of Waitsfield. He was born Aug. 7, 1807, at Hartford, Conn., but obtained all his schooling at the common school in Waitsfield; was representative in 1837-38, '39, 50-51, and senator from Washington county 4 years; assistant judge of Washington county for one year; elected by the joint assembly, and declined a re-election. He is an earnest Episcopalian, having united with that church not far from 1853; at the present time is senior warden of Christ Church in Montpelier; one of the standing committee of the diocese of Vermont, and a delegate to the Triennial Convention of the Episcopal church of the United States at the sessions of 1862, '65, '68. [See Montpelier, 546.]

RODERICK JULIUS RICHARDSON, son of the above, was born in Waitsfield, May 31, 1840; graduated at Norwich University, and was made paymaster in the U. S. Navy, Sept. 1861. Being ordered to the "Harriet Lane," he was captured with the remainder of her crew off Galveston, Tex., Jan. 10, 1863; was paroled that spring, and participated in the capture of New Orleans, the first siege of Vicksburg; went through the Mississippi River Campaign; was in the "South Atlantic Squadron" at Charleston, S. C., and in the "North Atlantic Squadron" on board the Steamer "Wabash" before the Wilmington fight, and participated in search for the "Alabama" and "Florida." In 1865, he received his discharge, and was elected cashier of the First National Bank, Montpelier, and is now a commission merchant in Boston. He was married Jan. 5, 1865, to Miss Faddie Ware, of Boston.

B. H. ADAMS, Esq., was born in Tunbridge, in 1810, and after receiving the usual common school education, studied law, and opened an office in Waitsfield, where he practiced until his death, which occurred in Oct. 1849. The writer remembers him as he appeared at leisure in the store a year or so before his death. He was a man of medium height and rather robust in appearance, of light complexion and pleasing address. It is said that he never made a plea of any extended length, but rarely failed to make a deep impression on all those who heard him. "He was a rare man," says one who was conversant with him, "gifted, eloquent, persuasive, powerful, genial, generous, benevolent to a fault, the best advocate I ever saw or heard." A full history of the man would of course present other than the professional side of his character, and would be obliged to state what we are sorry to say is too common in the history of talented men, that while they rule their fellowmen by their great abilities, they are too often the slaves of intemperance or gaming. The ready wit with which he sometimes secured a favorable verdict when he had by far the hardest side, is well remembered, and could we afford space for story-telling of this kind, we should provoke many a hearty laugh from the reader.

ORANGE SMITH, M. D., was born Jan. 27, 1796, at Brookfield. He was a graduate of Randolph Academy, and of the medical department of the U. V. M. He also studied medicine with Daniel Washburn, M. D., and attended lectures for some length of time at Dartmouth. He commenced at Starksboro; soon removed to Williston, and after one year of practice there removed to Waitsfield, and continued in practice there until near the time of his death, in 1863. Besides being a good physician, he was a very public spirited man, and one whose influence, especially in religious matters was not small. He entered into the practice of Dr. Miner, who was about to remove from town, and for some time lived on the farm now owned by T. G. W. Farr, Esq., but subsequently removed to the village. He married (Mar. 2, 1825,) Miss Lucy Hatch of Brookfield, by whom he had three children, only one of whom (Charles D. Smith, Esq.,) is now living.

MEETING AT WAITSFIELD ON THE ADMISSION OF TEXAS.

"The undersigned respectfully request all the inhabitants of Waitsfield to meet at the brick Meeting house on Thursday, the 17th day of August inst., at three o'clock P. M., for the purpose of expressing their views in relation to the propriety of having Texas annexed to the United States as a slave holding territory. We consider this a subject of great importance, and earnestly invite a general attendance.

Waitsfield, August 7th, 1837.

R. Richardson, Jr.,	Charles Jones.

Resolved, That a copy of the preamble and Resolutions together with the proceedings of this meeting, signed by the chairman and Sec., be forwarded to each of the pol. presses at Mont. for publication, also to each of our Senators and Reps. in Congress.

Whereas, it is the privilege of the citizens of a republican government to assemble together for the purpose of expressing their sentiments on all subjects in which they are interested, and it becomes their duty so to do, when questions of great moment are proposed, especially when in the decision of those questions the rights and liberties of American citizens are involved. And whereas slavery, in the language of a distinguished senator from Virginia, is a "moral and political evil, an evil in the eye of religion, philanthropy and reason," and is opposed to both the letter and spirit of the Declaration, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and is a gross violation of that divine law which commands "whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so to them." And whereas, the annexation of Texas to this country would have a tendency to perpetuate the system of slavery, and endanger the liberties of our country by subjecting us to discord at home and conflict abroad:

Therefore resolved, that however much we may differ with regard to the immediate abolition of slavery now existing in the United States, we are of one mind on the question of adding thereto by annexing Texas or any other slave holding territory to our Government.

Resolved, That we are opposed to the annexation of Texas to the United States at the present time, under any circumstances whatever, and that we will use our utmost exertion in a lawful and constitutional manner, to prevent such a result.

Resolved, That we are in favor of equal rights, and would gladly welcome the time when the enjoyment of political, civil and religious liberty shall be co-extensive with the vast family of man.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the press to advocate and contend for the doctrine of equal rights, and oppose the association with our government of any territory whose constitution, or constitutions, are based upon any other principle.

Resolved, That every consistent person that is opposed to slavery in the abstract, must necessarily be opposed to annexing Texas to this government, and that it should be the study of the American people how best to rid themselves of the evil under which they are now labouring, instead of making addition thereto.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to oppose to the utmost of their power, every attempt to annex Texas to the United States."

[The foregoing was contributed by Chas. A. Smith, of Barre, a grandson of Orange Smith, of Waitsfield. Orange Smith drafted the above resolutions.]

DAVID CARLISLE JOYSLIN, M. D., was born at Springfield, Vt., May 15, 1799, pursued a classical course at Randolph Grammar School; graduated at Castleton Medical College in —; commenced practice in Waitsfield in 18—. His practice has been extensive and successful, not in Waitsfield only but also largely in Warren and Fayston. At present he has laid aside the regular practice of his profession, and is more engaged in practical farming. He married Oct. 26, 1852, Miss Jane E. Carpenter, a great grand-daughter of Gen. Wait, by whom he has had three children, of whom only one is now living. Dr. Joyclin died in 1874.

Hon. IRA RICHARDSON was born in Waitsfield Oct. 6, 1816, and enjoyed the usual advantages of its common schools; represented the town in 1856, and again in 1866, and served as assistant judge of Washington county in 1868-'69. For many years his health was exceedingly poor, yet he has done a great deal for the business of the town by engaging in mercantile and manufacturing pursuits, as well as farming. He is the owner of mills that turn off a large quantity of lumber, chiefly clapboards, and of a tannery. He married April 6, 1843, Harriet F. Chapman, and has raised up a family of sons who are now in active business.

Hon. JONATHAN HAMMOND HASTINGS, was born in Waitsfield, Feb. 12, 1824, and has been a resident of the town until the present time, and for many years entrusted with a portion of the town business. He filled the office of deputy sheriff and constable for 10 years from 1846, to the entire satisfaction of the people; in 1856-'7 was high sheriff of the county; represented the town in general assembly in 1862-'63, and was elected senator in 1869. He has also been connected with the Waterbury bank as director for 13 years. He married Nov. 1, 1848, Miss Ellen M. Merriam of Johnson, by whom he has had 6 children.

EDWIN F. PALMER, ESQ.,

of Waterbury, was born in Waitsfield, Jan. 22, 1836. In his boyhood, he exhibited more than usual capacity as a scholar, and began a course of classical study while still a youth, reciting to Rev. Charles Duran, pastor of the Congregational church, and afterwards pursuing his course at the Northfield Institute; and graduating with honor at Dartmouth, in 1862; and becoming a member of the college church during his course of study. He then studied law with Hon. Paul Dillingham, and has practiced in Waterbury since, with the exception of 6 months service in the custom-house at Island Pond, and 9 months service as 2d Lieut of Co. B, 13th Vt.; during which time he kept a diary, and on his return, published a neat little work entitled "Camp Life," which is prized by his comrades and their friends, as an accurate and pleasant history of their campaign. He was married June 15, 1865, to Miss Addie D. Hartshorn.

REV. AMARIAH CHANDLER, was a native of Shelburne, Mass., a graduate of U. V. M., and a theological pupil of Rev. Dr. Packard of Shelburne, Mass. He was settled in Waitsfield in 1810, and dismissed in 1830. During all this time, he was a faithful pastor, a kind sympathizing friend, and a man of courage and power in every direction. Several times in this sketch, we have had occasion to refer to him, and the savor of his name is still sweet in all this region. He was both eloquent and witty, but he used the latter mainly as a weapon of defense. Woe to the man that attempted to oppose or entrap him in any matter, a very few measured words would shut his month. His gentleness could not be exceeded, but he had the most perfect contempt for all display. He was short and stout in person, and in habits quite refreshingly rustic. The best picture that could be made of him, would be a delineation of that scene at his own door, (after he had removed to Greenfield, and received rather thanklessly the degree of D. D.) when a dapper young man approached him, as he was washing his bare feet at the pump after a morning's labor in his field, and inquired for "Mr. Chandler." "I am Mr. Chandler," was his quiet reply. "But I mean Rev. Mr. Chandler," said the stranger. "Yes, sir, that is my name." But still obtuse, the young theologian persisted in saying, "but I mean Rev. Amariah Chandler, D. D." "Yes, sir, they sometimes call me all that," said the doctor, quietly enjoying the discomfort of one who mistook him for a boor.

The writer remembers of his rising to preach, (when on a visit to his daughter only a few years ago,) and saying measuredly, "The sermon I am about to preach will perhaps be remembered by some of you who are here to-day. If you do not remember it, it will make no difference to you. If you do, it will make a great difference with me, for I shall be glad to know that you remember so well."

In his later days, he preached a sermon in which he acknowledged some change of views on doctrinal subjects. This sermon the writer has not been able to lay hold of now, but from his recollections of it, (having read it when a boy) he believes it to have shown Mr. Chandler to be precisely with the majority of Congregational ministers at the present time; and though it created some discussion, and met with disapproval from some of his people whom he had trained so well to think and judge for themselves, yet we suspect it would prove to be a crowning glory to him, as showing that he was an inquirer after truth, even at three-score-and-ten, and certainly the humility and candor of it, in frankly expressing his almost lifelong mistake as he then thought it, was noble.

When he reached his 70th birth-day, he resigned his pastoral charge, saying to his people, that he did not intend to leave them, and was ready to minister to them still, but he meant to put it out of his power to pastor them when he should become childish. Thus the matter stood until his death. It would probably have been hard to have convinced his people that there was any danger of his getting childish after that.

We cannot help saying, O that he had remained in Waitsfield, while he lived! The people were very loth to part with him in 1830, but they did not fully realize what they were losing, or they would have utterly refused to let him go, and resisted until they had compelled him to remain.

Rev. PERRIN B. FISK, son of Moses, was born July 6, 1792, and in youth and early manhood followed the trade of a saddler, residing at Montpelier, where he married (May, 1815), Miss Azuba Blaisdell. His talents were rather above the point of mediocrity, but he had small opportunities for study. After his conversion he became very anxious to do more good, and in a short time was led to change his views upon the subject of baptism, in consequence to leave the Congregational for the Baptist church, by which order he was immediately licensed to preach, and was at length settled in Wardsboro, as pastor of the Baptist church. The late Rev. P. H. White was at this time one of the young men who sat under his preaching. His remembrance of the man, as given to the writer, was of a corpulent and jolly man, who enjoyed to sit on the store steps and smoke and tell stories, both of which he could do well. As a preacher, he was able to compare fairly with the average men of his denomination. He was the father of three children, two of whom were sons. Moses, the eldest, was a shrewd and smart, but unprincipled young man, who lived fast, and died early, leaving a young widow and babe, both of whom are now dead, and Thomas was sheriff in Washington Co., N. Y., from the time he was 21 until he led his men through the bloody campaigns of the Potomac as lieutenant and captain of artillery.

Rev. JOEL FISK, brother of the above, was born Oct. 26, 1796, and lived at Waitsfield until the age of 20, when, becoming pious, he gave himself up to the work of the ministry, and at length graduated at Middlebury, in 1825; studied theology with Rev. Charles Walker, of Pittsford, and at the age of 30, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Monkton. He was almost reprimanded while in college for his persistence in revival work, and this fact is a true exponent of his whole professional life. He labored successively and successfully in the following places, viz.: New Haven, Vt., Essex, N. Y., Montreal and Phillipsburgh, C. E. (as it then was), Irasburgh and Plainfield, Vt., where he died Dec. 16, 1856. He was devoted to his work, searching in his style, and a man of decided literary taste. He married, Oct. 15, 1826, Miss Clarinda Chapman, by whom he had 7 children, of whom are Harvey, of the celebrated firm of Fisk and Hatch, in New York City, and Pliny, president of the American Pottery Co., of Trenton, N. J.

Rev. HARVEY FISK, brother of the two last noticed, was born Apr. 12, 1799, and had in early life the reputation of being a smart, wild, but very truthful boy. At the age of 14 he was apprenticed to the late Gen. E. P. Walton, of Montpelier, to learn the printer's trade. Here he made friends and acquired much useful knowledge, but withal, had such a vein of fun and frolic and an aptness at practical joking in him, that he provoked the momentary indignation, as well as the regard, of those who knew him. Having become a Christian here, he gave himself up to the work of the ministry, graduating at Hamilton College in the class of '26, and at Princeton Theological Sem. Subsequently, during his studies, he worked his way with the composing stick, and was the compiler, and for some time the publisher, of the "American Sunday-School Union," and the compiler and publisher of the "Union Question Books" for Sunday-schools. He died very suddenly at New York City, after less than a year of ministerial labor. He married, Feb. 17, 1829, Anna M. Plumb, by whom he had one son, Harvey Jonathan, who is at present an accountant in Detroit, Mich., thus maintaining his widowed mother.

Rev. PLINY FISK BARNARD was born in Waitsfield, Nov. 9, 1820; pursued a course of classical study at Jericho and Montpelier; graduated at Dartmouth in 1843; at Bangor Theological Seminary in 1846; was settled over the Congregational church in Richmond, Me., in 1847, and after a pastorate of 9 years, removed to Williamstown, Vt., where he continues to exercise the pastoral office with much acceptance. He married, Nov. 4, 1846, Julia, daughter of Rev. James Hobart, of Berlin, by whom he has had 7 children.

Rev. PERRIN B. FISK, son of Deacon Lyman, and grandson of Deacon Moses, was born July 3, 1837; studied at Barre Academy and at Bangor Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1863, and was immediately settled as pastor of the Congregational church at West Dracut, Mass; in 1865 was dismissed, and removed to Rockport, where he supplied the First church during the European tour of Rev. W. H. Dunning, the pastor; 1866, was settled as pastor of the Congregational church in Peacham, Vt., where he still resides; served as chaplain of the Senate of Vermont in 1869; otherwise chiefly distinguished as the author of this sketch of Waitsfield. In 1863, he was married to Miss Harriet L. Bigelow, of Waitsfield, a great-great-grand-daughter of Gen. Wait.

Rev. ALONZO HITCHCOCK was born at Waitsfield, Nov. 29, 1814; pursued his studies mainly with a resident clergyman, and has been stationed in the following M. E. churches, viz.: Albany, St. Johnsbury, East Walden, Bethel, Gaysville, Randolph, Corinth, Bradford, Proctorsville, Plainfield, Cabot, E. Burke, Middlesex, and is now acting as agent of the Methodist Conference Sem. at Montpelier.

MATTHIAS JOSLIN was born in Waitsfield, Aug. 19, 1806, and finished his limited education at Royalton. In 1830, he entered upon missionary work as a teacher among the Choctaws. He had charge of the boys' school at Mayhew until the removal of the tribe by government to the new country assigned them west of the Mississippi, which took place in 1832. Mr. Joslin then returned to Waitsfield, and remained during the summer and fall. In September he married Miss Sophia M. Palmer, and with her returned to the Indian country, residing at Dwight among the Cherokees, and when he was about to return to his contemplated field among the Choctaws, was removed by death, Nov. 21, 1833, after an illness of only 11 days. He was a good man and his end was peace. [Mr. Joslin's widow married a Mr. Newton, and is now living at San Antonio, Texas.—E. A. F.]

IRA BUSHNELL, son of Dea. Jedediah Bushnell, was born June 11, 1826; fitted for college at Johnson, and graduated in Burlington in 1856. He was a young man of deep piety, and of much promise, who had consecrated himself to the work of the ministry. But being not the readiest, though one of the most persistent of students, and a very athletic young man, who had been accustomed to labor on a farm, his health during his college course was undermined. Soon after he graduated, he was attacked with hemorrhage of the lungs, and gradually wasted away until June 16, 1858, when he died.

GURLEY A. PHELPS, M. D., was born in Waitsfield, June 30, 1822; pursued a course of classical study at Montpelier and of professional study at Castleton, and the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York. Took up his residence in Jaffrey, N. H., where he has had an extensive practice, and attained a wide reputation as a skillful physician. He married April 10, 1851, Miss Adaliza Cutter, who deserves mention as a poetess of much merit. Some time after her death he was married again (Nov. 3, 1858,) to Miss Nancy P. Stoughton. He united at an early date with the Congregational church, and the testimony of those who know him best is, that he is both the Christian gentleman and the beloved physician.

There are quite a number of other noted men who were reared in this town; educated in her common schools and whose purposes for life were undoubtedly formed for the most part while residents, a part of whom entered into their business or began to study their profession while here. We are able in this number to mention Hon. GEO. N. DALE, at present president pro tem. of the Vermont senate, and Col. C. H. JOYCE of Rutland, both of whom grew up to manhood in Waitsfield; NORMAN DURANT, Esq., whose promising life was lost in the search for gold in California in 1850, and LUTHER L. DURANT, (brother of the above,) at the age of 8 years became a resident of Waitsfield, and may, therefore be said to have received his early education in that town. And this with an occasional term at the select school comprised all his course of general study. At his majority he entered the office of B. H. Adams, Esq., of Waitsfield, and commenced the study of the law, completing his course with C. W. Upham of Barre. He then practiced at Waitsfield from 1852 to October, 1855, when he was invited by Hon. Paul Dillingham to enter into partnership at Waterbury for 5 years, and at its close had hardly opened an office himself before the same offer was repeated and accepted, which being fulfilled in December, 1866, he removed to Montpelier and formed partnership with Col. F. V. Randall. The court docket shows that their practice must now be very extensive, indeed. Reference to his initials will bear out the pleasantry that he has the title as well as the practice; while at Waitsfield (viz., in 1853) he married Miss Julia M. Tenney of Dalton, N. H., with whom he still lives, and by whom he had 2 children.

The father of these two successful men passed away in 1868; a much esteemed citizen and devoted Christian, and a genial and intelligent man. The mother still resides at Waitsfield.

We may also mention Hon. G. D. RICE, of Wisconsin, and Hon. EDMUND RICE, both of whom were reared and had engaged in business in Waitsfield before they became pioneers in the West, and whose subsequent record we have much reason to be proud of, and Hon. WM. PINGRY, who spent a number of his best years in town as an attorney, and who had a commanding influence in the town while he remained.

We must crave the forbearance of our friends in advance, on account of the almost certainty that some names which ought to be noticed will be overlooked, and defend ourself slightly by remarking that quite a number of the circulars we sent out to obtain accurate information have not come back to us again. We have no reason to suppose that our work will amount to more than a beginning, for the history of Waitsfield is making yet, and in closing this sketch, which, though more laborious than we anticipated, has yet afforded us much pleasure, as treasuring up much that ought to be saved, but that would in a few years have been lost. We ask our young friends especially to make such use of the means of education, take such a stand on all the questions of the day, and ground themselves upon such noble principles, that whoever takes up the historic pen we are now about to lay down, shall be able to say at least that the old stock has not degenerated. In some particulars it will be difficult indeed for them to obtain a better record than that.

WAITSFIELD, 1869-1882.

BY DEA. E. A. FISK.

In the preceding pages, Rev. P. B. Fisk has brought the history of Waitsfield down to 1869.

Since that date, events have occurred which ought not to be left unrecorded.—Two tasteful and commodious churches have been erected in our village; the fire-fund has broken loose and destroyed more property than during all the previous history of the town; a radical change has been made in our common school system, and there are many minor events which should not be omitted.

CHURCHES.

In 1870, the Methodist church was built at a cost of about $7500. On the basement floor, is a large room for Sabbath schools, lectures, &c., besides smaller rooms for other purposes; while above, is the audience room, capable of seating about 300 persons. It is a good church, tasteful and convenient, and reflects great credit upon the builders, who overcame many difficulties in its erection.

It was dedicated in Feb., 1871. The following is a list of the pastors of the M. E. church since 1869: Rev. J. Hamilton, 1870-71; Rev. E. Folsom, 1871-74; Rev. J. A. Sherburne, 1874-77; Rev. C. H. Leverton, 1877-78; Rev. Geo. L. Wells, 1878-81; Rev. C. P. Taplin, 1881 to the present time.

In 1874, the Congregational church, which stood upon the edge of a plateau, east of the village, was taken down, and a new church built in the village, using the materials of the old as far as practicable.

Rev. J. H. Babbitt pastor of the church, was the architect, and every part of the structure bears witness of the care and skill with which his labors were performed. Several good judges have said that there are very few churches in the rural towns of Vermont that will compare with it. This church, likewise, has its audience room above, and convenient rooms, for other purposes, on the ground floor. Cost about $8600, exclusive of several hundred dollars in gratuitous labor. The building committee were able to report every dollar of expenses provided for soon after the dedication of the church in July, 1875; and what is better, the building of this church was not the cause of the least division or hard feeling among the members of the society, as is too often the case.

Rev. J. H. Babbitt continued to be the pastor of the Congregational church till Dec., 1876, when, much to the regret of his parishioners, he resigned, and was succeeded by Rev. Stephen H. Robinson, who was ordained in Sept., 1877, and is the pastor at the present time.

In Sept., 1881, Pliny B. Fisk, a member of this church, who graduated at U. V. M., and studied at Yale Theo. Sem., was ordained here as an evangelist to labor on our Western frontier.

UNIVERSALIST.

This society has had occasional preaching since 1869, and for a year or two previous to 1875 they held regular services, Rev. John Gregory, of Northfield, and Rev. W. H. Walbridge, occupying the pulpit on alternate Sabbaths. Some time in 1874, Mr. Walbridge was ordained here, but at the close of the year, removed to Stowe.

SCHOOLS.

The legislature of 1870, passed an act enabling a town to abolish its school districts, and bring the schools under the direct supervision of the town. In accordance with this act, Waitsfield, at its annual meeting in 1871, voted to adopt the town system of schools. It was a new measure in this State, and was regarded by many of its friends as an experiment, which they undertook with many fears, and in the face of a strong opposition. Two years later, the town voted to continue it by a very small majority; but after ten years of trial, its success was such, that when the proposition was made to return to the district system, nearly three fourths of the votes cast were against it. Schools are maintained in the same places as formerly, with the exception of a very small one which has been dropped from the list.

The school year, however, has been lengthened from two terms, or 24 weeks, to 3 terms, or 30 weeks in all. There has also been greater permanence of teachers, and the school-houses are much improved. It is but just to add that the efficient supervision of Dr. W. A. Jones, for 7 years past the chairman of the board of school directors, has done much toward the prosperity of our schools.

TEMPERANCE.

A Good Templars Lodge was organized in 1868, and has held weekly meetings to the present time. By this means, some who were intemperate have reformed; many young persons have become thoroughly established in temperance principles, and public sentiment on the subject has greatly improved.

FIRES.

It is mentioned by Rev. P. B. Fisk, that from the settlement of the town to the time of writing his history, 15 fires had occurred; but from that date to the present time there have been 12 fires of considerable dimensions, besides two cooper-shops and several sugar-houses. In three cases an entire set of farm buildings were destroyed; in one, a house and small barn in the village; in four or five cases houses were burned, and on four occasions a barn or barns were consumed, and in two of these, cattle were burned.

As early as 1877, it began to be suspected that all these fires were not accidental. In April of that year, unoccupied buildings belonging to Mr. John Towle were burned, and this was followed in about a month by the destruction of Geo. Folsom's barns and 18 cows, and the next night L. K. Hooker's house and barns were burned. The latter could be accounted for, but the others could not.

Next in October, 1878, Mr. T. G. W. Farr's house and barns were burned under circumstances that were very mysterious, to say the least. There appeared to be no way to account for it except as the work of an incendiary, and yet it hardly seemed possible that any one could be so bold as to set a fire early in a moonlight evening, in the position where it was first observed.

In October, 1879, on the exact anniversary of the fire at Mr. Farr's, another large fire occurred which was equally inexplicable. Several barns belonging to Mr. L. R. Joslyn were burned. A pair of 4-years old oxen weighing over 4,000 pounds, and that had just taken the first premium at the State Fair, were also destroyed. This fire was the scene of desperate but successful effort to save Mr. Joslyn's house and other buildings. After exhausting the supplies of water near at hand, a line of men was formed reaching to the river a third of a mile away, and thus buckets of water came to hand so rapidly that by the aid of a small force-pump and a favorable wind the fire was stayed. About a week after this Mr. R. H. Barnard's barns were burned early one morning. It then seemed certain that some one living among us was the author of this destruction, but the evidence against any one was so meagre that no arrests were made. The next week, however, occurred the largest fire of all, and it proved to be the final one of this series.

All of Mr. E. W. Bisbee's buildings (just in the edge of Morctown,) were destroyed, and a man was seen running away from the barn just before the fire broke out. A court of investigation was held, and the evidence pointed in a certain direction so strongly that the person implicated finally confessed to having set six fires during two or three years previous. We will not attempt to immortalize his name by recording it here, but will simply say that he is now serving out a sentence of 25 years at Windsor.

Since then we have had no fires of any importance, but those times of excitement and fear made so strong an impression upon the people of Waitsfield that even at the present time they can scarcely be recalled without a shudder.

It is sometimes said that lightning never strikes twice in the same spot, but Mr. O. H. Joslin had a barn burned by lightning in 1868, and again in 1876 another built upon the site of the old one was burned by the same cause, and a year or two after a tree very near where these barns were burned was struck, and a cow standing under it knocked down; also a tree standing in Mr. Joslin's pasture has been twice struck by lightning, it being set on fire the last time.

There has been a very noticeable improvement in the character of farm buildings in this town during the last few years. One large barn is now the order of the day, instead of the cluster of small ones that one used to see. This plan has been followed almost without exception where barns have been burned, thus giving us an example of the way in which good may come out of evil. And many others are rebuilding upon the same plan, so that according to present appearances it will take but a few years longer to work a complete revolution in the appearance of barns in this town.

INSTANCES OF LONGEVITY.

The records show the death of so many aged persons in town since 1867, that some statement in regard to it seems to be demanded. During that period 33 persons have died at an age exceeding 80 years. Of this number, 18 were more than 85, and 8 more than 90 years old. The names and ages of the latter are as follows:

Henry Dewey, aged 96, died in 1875; Mrs. Elizabeth Barrett, 94, in 1873; Job House, 94, 1874; Miss Charlotte Smith, 93, in 1882; Thomas Prentiss, 92, 1877; Daniel Skinner, 91, 1877; Avery Sherman, 99, 1873; Michael Ryle, 90, 1880.

Mr. Thomas Prentiss, whose name appears in this list, was a great reader, and until a short time before his death there were very few persons in town who kept themselves better informed concerning the events of the times, political and general, or whose opinions in regard to the same were more intelligent and discriminating.

PHYSICIANS.

Dr. D. C. Joslin died in 1874; Dr. E. G. Hooker remained here till 1881, and acquired an extensive practice, but has removed to Waterbury; Dr. C. F. Camp came here in 1881; Dr. J. M. VanDeusen (homœopathist), is still with us.

LAWYERS.

Hiram Carleton removed in 1876, and John W. Gregory came here in 1879.

MEMBERS OF LEGISLATURE.

Representatives.—1870, Hiram Carleton, chosen by a unanimous vote of the town; 1872, H. N. Bushnell; 1874, M. E. Hadley; 1876, '78, L. M. Tyler; 1880, W. A. Jones.

Senators.—J. H. Hastings, of this town, was State Senator in 1869 and 1870, and Ira Richardson in 1876, the latter dying during his term of office.

R. J. Gleason has been town clerk for more than 25 years, and postmaster since the first election of Lincoln.

TOWN CLERKS.

Moses Heaton, from March, 1794, to March, 1796; Benjamin Wait, Jr., 1796 to 1802; Salah Smith, 1802 to '4, '5 to '7; Ezra Jones, 1804 to '5, '7 to '10; Edmund Rice, 1810 to '16, '26 to '27; Matthias S. Jones, 1816 to '26; Jennison Jones, 1827 to '28; Lewis Holden, 1828 to '36; Wm. M. Pingry, 1836 to '41; Orange Smith, 1841, '43, '45 to '46; Jonathan Morse, 1843 to '45; Cyrus Joslin, 1846 to '48; Cyrus Skinner, 1848 to the time of his death in 1855; R. J. Gleason, June 22, 1855, to March, 1882. Mr. Gleason was appointed by the selectmen to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Skinner, and has been elected by the town at every annual meeting since that time.

ACCIDENTAL DEATHS.

At least two have occurred since Rev. Mr. Fisk made out his list in 1869.

Mary Ann Riley, a child of James Riley, aged 4 years, was killed by a cart-body falling over upon her, Sept. 16, 1876.

Seth Chase, aged 10 years, a son of Timothy Chase, who was living at Thomas Poland's, was drowned in Mad River while bathing, June 5, 1881.

REV. PLINY FISK BARNARD.

Mr. Barnard was dismissed from the church in Williamstown in 1870, and was soon settled over the Congregational church in Westhampton, Mass., where he remained 3 years, when he was dismissed, and after a few months became acting pastor of the Congregational church in Westminister, where he remained till 1880, when he removed to Ashburnham, Mass., where he resides at the present time, (1882) but has preached for the past year at South Royalston, Mass.

REV. PERRIN B. FISK, was dismissed from the Congregational church in Peacham in 1870, and removed to Lyndonville, where he remained until Dec., 1874. During his ministry at that place, a church was organized, and a house of worship and a parsonage built. The plans for these buildings originated largely with Mr. Fisk, and his cares were greatly increased by his supervision of their building, but when completed they were very highly spoken of by the best judges.

After leaving Lyndonville, Mr. Fisk removed to Springfield, this State, and remained as pastor of the Congregational church in that place 2 years, when he was dismissed and accepted a call to the Congregational church in Lake City, Minn., where he now resides.

REV HENRY PARKER

(BY C. J. SARGENT, OF WARREN.)

was born in Waitsfield. His parents were Stephen C. and Angeline Parker. In his younger days he was a clerk in stores at Warren, Brookfield and in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and from there he went to Meadville College, Penn., in 1874, where he graduated in 1877, and then went to Quincy, Mass., and to other places preaching on trial, and finally settled in Nashua, N. H., with a large salary. He is a fine speaker and a deep thinker, of the Unitarian theology.

ELLEN H. SAMPSON, daughter of Rev. Guy C. Sampson, was born in this town, as she wrote the Compiler, from Lapeer, Mich., in 1858. Miss S. has been many years a poetical correspondent for several of the current papers and magazines. Her father, a well-known anti-slavery and temperance editor and lecturer, died in the West some years since. He edited a temperance paper for some time, published at Woodstock, which town will doubtless have some more definite account of him and his family.

From the Vermont Record.

AMARIAH CHANDLER was born in Deerfield, Mass., Oct. 27, 1782, the youngest, and last survivor, of 9 children of Moses and Persis (Harris) Chandler, both of them natives of Lancaster, Mass. When about 5 years of age he removed to Shelburne, Mass., where he lived till manhood. He fitted for college with Rev. Theophilus Packard, of Shelburne, entered the junior class in the University of Vermont in 1805, and was graduated in 1807. At the time of his death he was the oldest alumnus of the University.

He read theology with Rev. Theophilus Packard about a year, was licensed by the North Hampshire (now Franklin) Association, Nov. 8, 1808, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Waitsfield, Vt., Feb. 7, 1810. Rev. Elijah Lyman, of Brookfield, preached the sermon, from Luke 2:34. He was dismissed Feb. 3, 1830, and became stated supply of the Second Congregational church in Hardwick, to which he preached nearly 10 years. During that time a revival took place, and 40 were added to the church. He was installed pastor of the First Congregational church in Greenfield, Mass., Oct. 25, 1832. Rev. Bancroft Foster preached the sermon. In 1846, he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Vermont. In 1853, he was a member of the Constitutional Convention of Massachusetts. His sermon before the Legislature of Vermont in 1824, was published, as were also several others of his occasional sermons and some miscellaneous pamphlets. They are evidently the productions of a mind of great native strength. He died in Greenfield, Oct. 20, 1864.

He married, Oct. 2, 1808, Abigail Whitney, of Shelburne, Mass., by whom he had 4 sons and 4 daughters. She died June 19, 1833, and he married, Nov. 17, 1840, Mary (Nims) Roberts, widow of Horace Roberts, Esq., of Whitingham, Vt. She died Mar. 1, 1852, and he married, Oct. 2, 1855, Mrs. Eliza (Bixby) Gleason, widow of Solomon Gleason, of Coleraine, Mass.

P. II. W.

Coventry, Vt., Nov. 26, 1864.

ROSWELL G. HORR,

Congressman, was born in Waitsfield, but left when about 2 years old. He is now serving his second term at Washington, as member of the House of Representatives from Michigan, and has the name of being the "wittiest" man in Congress. During the campaign of 1880, he re-visited Waitsfield, and made an address at short notice, which was enthusiastically received.

MILITARY, CONCLUDED FROM PAGE 778.

The Memorial Record of Waitsfield, Vt., prepared by Rev. A. B. Dascomb. Published by vote of the town. Montpelier: Printed at the Freeman Steam Printing Establishment, 1867.

[Extract from, of interesting facts not given in Mr. Fisk's paper:]

Luther Ainsworth enlisted August 14, 1861, in Co. H, 6th Vt. Reg.; mustered in 2d Lt.; promoted Feb. 18, '62, to 1st Lt.; Sept. 20, '62, Capt.; killed May 4, '63, near Fredericksburg, Va., while leading his men in a charge upon the enemy.

He was shot through the abdomen, dying a few hours after he was wounded. His homeless, orphaned children draw a pension of $20 per month.

Albert D. Barnard enlisted in Co. B, 13th Reg., Aug. 25, '62; mustered in Oct. 10, '62; discharged with his company at Brattleboro, July 21, '63, in a state of exhaustion; fever set in; died Aug. 12, '63, aged 21 years.

Mitchell Basconner enlisted Aug. 14, '61, in Co. H, 6th Reg.; mustered Oct. 15, '61; killed at Lee's Mills, Apr. 16, '62.

Charles M. Benedict enlisted May 7, '61, in Co. F, 2d Reg.; mustered in June 20, '61; deserted Aug. 30, '62.

Leonard C. Berry enlisted in Co. H, 2d U. S. Sharpshooters, Dec. 14, '63; mustered in Dec. 18, '63; was in hospital at Washington 3 months with a wound; transferred to Co. H, 4th Reg., Feb. 25, '65; mustered out July 13, '65; wounded June 16, '64, in the arm.

Henry N. Bushnell enlisted Aug. 14, '61, as a member of Co. H, 6th Reg.; mustered in as Sergt., Oct. 15, '61; received a commission as 2d Lieut., May 4, '63; as 1st Lieut., May 15, '64; as Captain, Oct. 29, '64; on detached service in Division Sharpshooters 4 months; 5 months served as 1st Lieut. Co. C, 6th Reg. With others of his company from this town, he was in all the battles in which the regiment was engaged—about 25 engagements—covering 50 days' fighting; in his 4 years' service was sick less than a week, and never wounded, save very slightly; mustered out June 26, '65.

Bertram D. Campbell enlisted in Co. H, 3d Reg. June 3, '61; mustered out Aug., '61; enlisted again in Co. H, 6th Reg.; thrown out by the surg.; re-enlisted in Co. G, mustered in Oct. 15, 1862. Toward the close of the summer campaign, sent to hospital at Philadelphia; discharged honorably Oct. 22, '62, receiving a pension of $6 per month. Aug. 9, '64, again enlisted for the town of Barton, in Co. C, 1st Vt. Cav.; mustered in Aug. 11, '64. In the battle at Winchester, Sept. 19, '64, shot through the abdomen and died in a few moments.

He was buried near a white church, 1½ mile east of Winchester.

Oliver C. Campbell, brother of Bertram D., enlisted in Co. I, 9th Reg., June 9, '62; promoted 2d Lieut. July 9, '62; taken prisoner with his Regiment at Harper's Ferry, Sept. 14, '62; paroled, was sent to Chicago; Dec. 1, resigned his commission; re-enlisted July 9, '63, in the Veteran Reserve Corps; promoted 1st serg. at the organization of the company, and served at Rutland, Concord, N. H., Boston, Ms., till Nov. 15, '65, was discharged.

Wesley E. Dana enlisted in Co. F, 17th Reg., Jan. 2, '64; discharged July 17, '65; was wounded at Spottsylvania by a ball passing through the neck.

Foster S. Dana, brother of the above, enlisted July 2, '61, in Co. H, 3d Reg.; mustered in July 16, '61; mustered out July 27, '64; was on duty every day of his 3 years' service, though twice wounded, once at Lee's Mills, and again at Spottsylvania, Va.

Three other brothers of the above, C. S., Edwin H., and S. J. Dana, enlisted and served in the army. All six returned safely, after being honorably discharged, having performed 12 years of service.

Albee H. Dewey enlisted in Co. B, 13th Reg., Aug. 25, '62; was mustered in as Sergt., Oct. 10, '62; re-enlisted in the Signal Corps, Oct. 23, '63; Jan. 1, '64, sent to Newbern, N. C.; soon after placed in command of a signal station at Fort Gaston; Sept. 26, attacked by yellow fever; died the 28th, aged 32; buried in the Soldiers' Cemetery at Newbern.

Hiram F. Dike enlisted Aug. 14, '61, in Co. H, 7th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 15, '61; promoted Corp., Mar. 12, '62; missed in action at Banks' Ford, May 4, '63; supposed to be dead.

Alba B. Durkee enlisted in Co. I, 9th Reg., Dec. 21, '63; mustered in Jan. 6, '64; died Sept. 25, '64.

Isaac H. Elliot enlisted in Co. I, 9th Reg., June 26, '62; mustered in July 9, '62; taken prisoner at Winchester, Sept. 3, '62; held by the enemy 20 days; discharged Sept. 25, '62, by reason of ill-health.

Edward A. Fisk enlisted Aug. 21, '62, in Co. B, 13th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 10, '62; mustered out July 21, '63.

Heman R. French enlisted June 23, '62, in Co. I, 9th Reg.; mustered in July 9, '62; taken prisoner with his regiment at Harper's Ferry, Sept. 14, '62; promoted hospital steward, Feb. 4, '65; mustered out June 13, '65.

Ephraim H. Fuller enlisted in Co. H, 6th Reg., Aug. 14, '61; mustered in Oct. 15, '61, as corporal; discharged Oct. 28, '64; wounded at Lee's Mills, Va., Apr. 16, '62, in both thighs; draws a pension of $4 per month.

William H. H. Greenslit enlisted June 20, '62, in Co. I, 9th Reg.; mustered in July 9, '62; committed suicide Aug. 21, '62, at Winchester, Va.

Manley N. Hoyt enlisted in Co. G, 6th Reg., Oct. 7, '61; mustered in Oct. 15, '61; died July 18, '62, at Philadelphia, of chronic diarrhea, aged 31 years.

George M. Jones enlisted in the 2d Reg. U. S. S. S., Co. H, Nov. 28, '63; mustered in Dec. 18, '63; killed at the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, '64, while assisting a wounded comrade from the field. He, like the others from this town killed in that battle, was struck in the head and killed instantly.

John F. Jones enlisted Sept. 10, '61, in Co. G, 6th Reg.; mustered in as Sergt., Oct. 15, '61; discharged Apr. 17, '63, on account of sickness; re-enlisted in Massachusetts; after a few months' service, sickened, and died Nov. 28, '64.

Eugene E. Joslin enlisted in the 2d Reg. of U. S. S. S., Co. H, Nov. 28, '63; mustered in Dec. 18, '63; promoted Corp., Nov. 1, '64; afterwards Sergt.; transferred to Co. H, 4th Reg., Feb. 25, '65; discharged July 13, '65; wounded in the shoulder at the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, '64.

Seymour L. Kneeland enlisted Nov. 28, '63, in 1st Cav. Reg., Co. C; mustered in Dec. 25, '63; transferred to Co. A, June 21, '65; mustered out Aug. 9, '65; taken prisoner Dec. 19, '64, on picket duty near Woodstock, Va., by scouts of the 12th Va. Cav.; kept at Staunton, Va., 12 days; taken to Richmond and confined in Libb Prison. His food was the usual scant allowance of corn bread and poor bacon—just enough to hold flesh and spirit together; was paroled Mar. 9, '65; exchanged about a month after.

James L. Maynard enlisted in Co. H, 2d Reg., U. S. S. S., Nov. 28, '63; mustered in Dec. 18, '63; killed May 6, '64, at the battle of the Wilderness; shot through the head. Like the others from this town killed in that battle, his body was not recovered.

Ziba H. McAllister enlisted Aug. 25, '62, in Co. B, 13th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 10, '62; mustered out July 21, '63; re-enlisted in Co. C, 1st Vt. Cav., Nov. 30, '63; mustered in Dec. 25, '63; mustered out Aug. 9, '65, having been transferred to Co. A, June 21, '65; wounded Oct. 7, '64, in the side and back, while on duty in the Shenandoah Valley, Va.

Irenas P. Newcomb enlisted in Co. H, 6th Reg., Aug. 14, '61; mustered in Oct. 15, '61; died at Hampton, Va., of typhoid pneumonia, Apr. 9, '62, aged 18 years and 8 months; buried there.

Edwin F. Palmer enlisted Aug. 25, '62, in Co. B, 13th Reg.; mustered in as Sergt., Oct. 10, '62; promoted 2d Lieut., Nov. 4, '62; mustered out July 21, '63. Lieut. Palmer kept a record of his army life, and has since published it in a neat book form, entitled "Camp Life," containing 224 pp. The book is a history of his company, in which there were 23 men from this town; also of the 13th Reg. and 2d Brig. It is a graphic portrayal of the discomforts, weariness, danger, with the occasional relief of comfort, rest and pleasure, incident to soldiers' life.

Dexter Parker enlisted Aug. 25, '62, in Co. B, 13th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 10, '62; in the battle of Gettysburg was severely wounded in the hand; mustered out July 21, '63; draws a pension of $4 per month.

Lorin B. Reed enlisted Aug. 25, '62; in Co. B, 13th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 10, '62; musician in the brigade band; died of measles in hospital at Wolf Run Shoals, May 30, '63, aged 21 years, 11 months.

Oscar C. Reed enlisted Aug. 25, '62, in Co. B, 13th Reg.; died of fever in hospital near Fairfax, Va., Dec. 26, '62, aged 24. His body, and that of his cousin, Lorin B. Reed, were brought home for burial.

Edwin R. Richardson enlisted in Co. H, 6th Reg., Aug. 14, '61; mustered in Oct. 15, '61; promoted Corp., Feb. 8, '62; promoted Sergt., July 10, '63; 1st Sergt., June 5, '64; re-enlisted Dec. 15, '63; killed at Charlestown, Va., Aug. 21, '64; shot through the head, and died immediately. His body was brought home for burial.

Loren S. Richardson enlisted Nov. 28, '63; mustered in as a recruit in Co. H, 2d Reg. of U. S. S. S., Dec. 18, '63; transferred to Co. H, 4th Reg., Feb. 25, '65; mustered out July 14, '65; wounded severely in the shoulder, at Cold Harbor, June 10, '64.

Lucius D. Savage enlisted in Co. F, 2d Reg., May 20, '61; in the battle of Savage Station, June 29, '62, wounded and permanently disabled in the right knee, and taken prisoner; released July 25, '62; discharged Nov. 29, '62; receives a half pension, $4 per month.

Dr. Henry C. Shaw went out from this town as Assistant Surgeon of the 2d N. H. Reg.; serving out his time, 3 months, returned as Assistant Surgeon in 5th Vt. Reg.; died of fever at Alexandria, Va., Sept. 7, '62, aged 30. His remains were brought home for interment.

Lucius S. Shaw, Esq., brother of Dr. Henry C., while practicing law in Lawrence, Kansas, enlisted in the 2d Kansas Reg.; was promoted Lieut., and killed Sept. 3, '61, aged 31, by an accident on the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, caused by the burning of a bridge. His body lies beside that of his brother.

Daniel P. Shepard enlisted Aug. 14, '61, in Co. H, 6th Reg.; mustered Corp., Oct. 15, '61; afterwards served as teamster; re-enlisted Dec. 15, '63; mustered out June 26, '65; wounded in the leg at Lee's Mills, Va., Apr. 16, '62.

Mason C. Shepard, brother of Daniel P., enlisted Aug. 14, '61, in Co. H, 6th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 15, '61; re-enlisted Dec. 15, '63; transferred to Co. G, Jan. 1, '65; transferred back May 18, '65; in hospital several months; mustered out June 26, '65; wounded in the breast and face at Lee's Mills, April 16, '62.

Lewis M. Spaulding enlisted Aug. 14, '61, in Co. H, 6th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 15, '61; re-enlisted Dec. 15, '63; killed at the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, '64. A ball pierced his head while charging the enemy with the Vermont troops, and he died instantly.

Solon S. Spaulding, brother of Lewis M., enlisted Aug. 14, '61, in Co. H, 6th Reg.; mustered in Oct. 15, '61; promoted Corp.; re-enlisted Dec. 15, '63; discharged June 12, '65, with health impaired by long-continued sickness.

Harlan P. Stoddard enlisted in Co. E, 2d Reg., May 1, '61; in the battle at Savage Station, wounded by the passage of a ball through the pelvis, and taken prisoner; discharged July 30, '63. His wound he will probably never recover from. He receives a full pension, $15 per month. Three of his brothers followed him into the U. S. service.

Horace B. Stoddard enlisted in Co. F, 2d Reg., Sept. '61; a few months before the expiration of his time of service, while at his post in the battle of the Wilderness, was struck by a ball in the head, and it is supposed died instantly. His body, and that of his brother, L. Thompson Stoddard, were not recovered.

L. Thompson Stoddard enlisted in Co. B, 13th Reg., Aug. 25, '62; mustered out July 21, '63; re-enlisted in Co. C, 17th Reg., Jan. 5, '63; mustered in Corp.; carried the State colors till cut and torn in pieces by shot and shell; at the time of the explosion of the mine at Petersburg, was wounded in the shoulder while trying to get back to the Union lines, and taken prisoner; spared the horrors of long confinement in Southern prisons; died 8 days after the explosion, Aug. 7, '64, while in the hands of the enemy.

Lyman Stoddard enlisted Sept. 20, '61; mustered in Oct. 15, '61, as a member of Co. G, 6th Reg.; re-enlisted Dec. 15, '63; mustered out June 26, '65; two brothers also served in the army for other towns, Daniel and Franklin Stoddard.

Cyron G. Thayer enlisted Aug. 25, '62, in Co. B, 13th Reg.; died May 20, '63, of measles, age 21.

James M. Thayer, brother of Cyron G., enlisted; mustered into the same company at the same time; discharged for sickness Jan. 22, '63; has since died.

Orcus C. Wilder enlisted Aug. 25, '62, in Co. B, 13th Reg.; mustered Capt. Oct. 10, '62; mustered out July 21, '63. Capt. Wilder and the 20 men or more in his company from Waitsfield, were hotly engaged in the battle of Gettysburg, though none were killed. This was all the fighting they saw during their 9 months' service.

OUR ENLISTMENTS IN OTHER TOWNS.

Young men who grew up among us and are known to all.

Matthias J. Bushnell, age 26, enlisted in 1st Wis. Cav., Co. B, Aug. 24, '61; mustered in Corp.; killed in a small engagement with the rebels, near Madison, Ark., Aug. 3, '62, while guarding a wagon train. All who were with him were killed or taken prisoners.

Hiland G. Campbell, age 26, enlisted for the town of Warren, as a recruit for the 3d Vt. Battery. In Oct. kicked by a horse, and injured in the thigh; remained in hospital; discharged; receives a pension of $8 per month; bounty $733.34, Government and town.

Israel Childs, a former resident of the town for many years, enlisted early in the war, in the 30th Wis. Reg., and served 3 years, a part of the time in the frontier service.

Chester S. Dana, age 33, enlisted for Fayston; bounty $200, from Government.

Edwin H. Dana, age 32, enlisted for Waterbury; was wounded at the battle of Cold Harbor, June 3, '64; draws a pension of $6 per month; bounty, $300 government, and $300 town.

Samuel J. Dana, age 29, brother of Edwin H. and the three before named, enlisted for Fayston; wounded by a shell at Gettysburg; bounty from government $25.

William W. McAllister, age 20, enlisted Aug. 8, '64, in 3d Vt. Light Artill., on detached service at Rutland, Vt., and Fairhaven, Ct., 6 months, the remainder of the time at Petersburg, Va.: discharged June 15, '65; bounty, $500.

Harlen G. Newcomb, age 24, enlisted Aug. 19, '62, in Co. K, 145th N. Y. Vols.; mustered in on Staten Island; fall of the next year, while in hospital, detailed as nurse; Mar., '64, transferred to Co. I, 107th N. Y. Vols.; next month joined the company at Shelbyville, Tenn., detailed at Div. Head Quarters, Sept., '64, after surrender of Atlanta; rejoined his company, May 23, '65; discharged June 19, '65; bounty, $175, from government, state, and town.

Daniel Russ, age 29, enlisted June 23, '62, in Co. I, 9th Reg. Vt. Vols.; taken prisoner and paroled at the surrender of Harper's Ferry, Sept. 15, '62; detailed as clerk in dispensary, April 15, '63; in hospital from Sept. '63, till Jan. 12, '64, when he rejoined his company; promoted Sergt. Mar. 26, '64; 1st Sergt., Mar. '65; discharged by order of the President, June 8, '65, at Manchester, Va.: bounty, $100.

James C. Russ, brother of Daniel, enlisted in Co. A, 42d Wis. Vols.; discharged June 28, '65.

Frank E. Spaulding, aged 26, enlisted in Sheldon, Sept. 61, in Co. K, 6th Reg. Vt. Vols.; discharged June 30, '62, for disability.

George E. Spaulding, aged 18, brother of Frank E., Solon S. and Lewis M., enlisted in Co. G, 10th N. Y. Vols. for Albany; served from April till Aug. '65; bounty, $600, from town.

Charles D. Tewksbury, aged 23, enlisted Sept. 17, '61, in Co. B, 52d Ill. Vols. Inf.; mustered in at Geneva, Ill., Oct. 25, '61, as Corp.; promoted Sergt., May 16, '62; re-enlisted as veteran Dec. 25, '63; promoted 1st Sergt. Apr. '64; mustered out July 6, '65, at Louisville, Ky., receiving a lieutenant's commission; received $502 bounty from government, and $1 from Bureau Co., Ill.; was wounded at the battle of Shiloh in the head; in hospital only long enough to have his wound dressed during his 4 years' service; traveled with his regiment over 6,000 miles, 1,600 of which he marched on foot; after that, started off under Gen. Sherman, and marched around to Savannah, and up to Washington.

Isaac Norton Tewksbury, uncle of Chas. D., native of Waitsfield, and more than 20 years resident, served in a Mich. Reg.; killed in the battle of Pittsburg Landing, aged 52.

Other persons, natives of Waitsfield, have doubtless served in the army, but the compiler has failed to learn the facts in regard to them.

AFTER THE CRUCIFIXION.

BY MRS. T. E. FISHER.

"Jesus has died upon the cross!"
Oh how the tidings fell
With stunning weight on those who loved
The "Hope of Israel!"

A few had owned Him as the Christ.
The "very Christ," and they Had left their all to follow Him
Upon His blessed way.

But Oh, they had not understood
How dark that way must be,
They knew not that the Son of God
Could die upon the tree.

And when they saw Him on the cross,
Hope was not wholly gone,
They thought by some mysterious power
God might save His Son.

But when He bowed His godlike head
And yielded up the ghost,
When He had died as dies mere man,
They gave up all for lost.

Oh, who can paint the bitter grief
That wrung their hearts that hour,
The deep, unutterable despair
That crushed them with its power.

Had He deceived them? Could it be
The Shiloh had not come?
Their brows were pale with grief and dread,
Their ashy lips were dumb.

Three days His body, cold and still,
Within the grave had lain,
When thrilled their hearts the joyful words,
"Jesus has risen again!"

Jesus has risen again; no more
Anguish and doubts and fears,
Glad joy lights up the wondering eyes
So lately dimmed by tears.

He is the Lord! the mighty God!
The Jesus, the Saviour lives!
And O, new proof, He is the same,
Their unbelief forgives.

Jesus has risen from the dead!
No more we fear to die,
Because Thou livest we shall live,
O, Son of God Most High.

WARREN.

BY CHARLES W. HEMENWAY, OF LUDLOW.

This township lies in lat. 44°, 6'; long. 40°, 11', in the south-west of Washington Co. The town formerly belonged to Addison Co., and was annexed to Washington Co. by an act of the Legislature, Oct. 28, 1829. The charter was granted Nov. 9, 1780, to John Throop and associates.

GRANTEES AS DRAWN WITH NO. OF LOT.

John Marcy, Jr., lot 21; Oliver Barker, 19; Stephen Marcy, 17; Nathaniel and Elisha Frisbee, 15; Oliver Farnsworth, 13; Nathan Hale, 11; Seth Austin, 9; Ruggles Kent, 7; Joseph Marcy, 5; Joel Roberts, 3; Abraham Baldwin, 1; Loudan Gallop, 2; Hezekiah Spencer, 4; Jonas Fay, 6; Jonathan Bruce, 8; William Gallop, 10; Elisha Hawley, 14; Benijah Child, 16; Stephen Jacobs, 18; Timothy Andrus, 20; Miles Beach, 22; Jonathan Pierce, 23; Bartholomew Durkee, 27; Wm. Strong, 29; Wm. Ripley, 31; First settled minister, 12; English school, 25; Asa Whitcomb, 33; Uriah Tracy, 35; Lemuel Hopkins and Oliver Wolcott, Jr., 37; Noah Hatch, 39; Moses Seymour and Alex. Catline, 49; Thomas Chamberlin, 41; Chauncey Smith, 44; Elihu Kent, 42; John Jacob, 40; George Swan, 38; Benjamin Kent, 36; Gurshon Olds, 34; Thaddeus Leavitt, 32; Thaddeus King, 30; Wm. Roberts, 28; William Marsley, 26; John Throop, 24; Joseph Kimball, 45; John Whitcomb, 47; Parmela Jacobs, 49; Chapman Whitcomb, 51; County Grammar School, 53; Asahel Smith, 55; Anthony Whitcomb, 57; Timothy Child, 59; Chauncey Goodrich, 61; Jedediah Strong, 62; Daniel Adams, 63; David Fuller, 60; Thomas Tolman, 58; support of the ministry, 56; Wm. Lyon, 54; David Wilcox, 52; John Trumbull, 50; Thomas Branard, 48; James Thomson, 64; Joel Ballou, 65; Ebenezer Swan, 66; College right, 67; George Dunkins, 68; Samuel Marcy, 69; Dudley Baldwin, 70; seventy division lots; lotted, Nov. 4, 1789.

The lots were drawn by 70 slips numbered from 1 to 70, put into a hat, with 70 other slips with the names of one of the grantees, or of a public right, to be drawn, on each, put into another hat, and both hats shook to the satisfaction of all present, when a paper was first drawn from the hat with names, and then a paper from the hat with the number of the lots. The town is bounded N. by Waitsfield and Fayston, E. by Roxbury, S. by Granville, Addison Co., and W. by Lincoln, Addison Co. By act of Legislature, 1824, four tiers of lots were set off from Lincoln to Warren. There were two divisions of land in town of 70 lots each.

The soil of the township is very good, and the most part of it quite free from stone. It is well adapted to raising corn, potatoes and English grain. The face of the land is rather hilly. The ledges are chiefly a sort of mica slate. There is some limestone, but it is not plenty. There have never been but two kilns burned in town—those at a somewhat remote period, the ruins of which are still seen. There are, also, some fine specimens of crystal quartz here.

Mad river runs nearly through the centre of the town, and has several tributaries. Stetson brook runs through Stetson Hollow, and empties into Mad river about 2 miles above Warren village. Lincoln brook heads on Lincoln mountain, and runs through Warren South Hollow, and empties into Mad river about half a mile above the village. Minor brook rises on Roxbury mountain, flows westerly, and empties into Mad river at the village. Ford brook, from Lincoln mountain, flows easterly, and empties into the river at the lower end of the village. Clay brook, heading on Lincoln mountain, runs easterly through Grand Hollow, and empties into the river some 2 miles below the village. Shepherd brook, from Roxbury mountain, runs westerly, and empties into the river 2 miles below the village. Thus, the town is well watered, and these streams abound with trout. There are many good mill privileges also on these streams.

The town was organized Sept. 20, 1798, Ezra Miller, moderator; Samuel Laird, first town clerk; Ruel Sherman, Joseph Raymond, Seth Leavett, selectmen; Samuel Laird, John Sherman, Joseph Raymond, listers; Ruel Sherman, collector; John Woodard, grand juryman; and Joseph W. Eldridge was the first representative in 1810. The first physician was Dr. Fish; the first merchant, Watrous Mather; first lawyer, A. P. Huntoon; and the first tavern-keeper, Amos Rising.

It is quite impossible at the present day to form a just conception of the labor and hardships these earlier settlers encountered, leaving the comforts and conveniences of older towns, and moving with their families into a mountain, wilderness town, and into houses that were insufficient to protect them from the winds of winter, and with but scanty fare for large families; but with untiring zeal they felled the dense forest trees. The grand old maples and hemlocks frowned beneath the woodman's axe, and they soon had sufficient land cleared to raise the grain for their families, and before this was done, they must have made long foot-journeys, or on horseback, to distant towns for grain—to Waitsfield, over the Roxbury mountain to Roxbury, and thence to Randolph, some 30 miles distant, and even at times to Windsor, some 65 miles distant, and that by bridle-path and marked trees, fording streams.

Seth Leavett chopped, cleared and cultivated the first acre in town. The first house was built on the farm now owned by Judge Upham.

Cynthia, daughter of Ruel and Olive Sherman, was the first child born in town, Oct. 17, 1797. She married Robert Leach, and was living in Randolph in 1870.

Lucius Leavett was the first male child born in town, Mar. 5, 1798. The first marriage was that of John Wilcox, of Roxbury, and Abigail Steel, of Warren. The first person buried in town was Chloe Sherman, wife of Ruel Sherman. The graveyard at the river was laid out Apr. 1, 1826; children of Oliver Porter were the first buried in it.

David Ralph built the first house on the river at the village, where Morris Sterling now lives, and I think that a part of the old house is now standing. A man by the name of Stetson built the second house, near where George Bragg now lives. Richard Sterling built the first tavern, Isaac Ralph built the first store, and Otis Wilson carried on the first tannery. The first school-house was built in 1805, in district No. 1, where the school-house now stands. There are 9 school districts, and most of the school-houses are very good. The average term of school is 6 months a year.

At the freeman's meeting, Sept. 2, 1800, 12 took the freeman's oath. The first vote for governor stood for Isaac Tichenor, 12 votes, and for lieut. governor, Paul Brigham, 13; Samuel Mattocks, treasurer; councillors: Benj. Swan, 1 vote; Stephen Bradley, 10 votes; Nathaniel Niles, 10; John Burnham, 10; Samuel Safford, 10; John Willard, 10; Jonas Galusha, 10; Stephen Paul, 10; Peter Olcott, 10; John White, 10; Daniel Wright, 10; Oliver Gallop, 10; Timothy Stanley, 10.

AARON RISING GOING TO MILL.

Mr. Rising related to me that when 16 years old, the family having had nothing to eat but pumpkin and potatoes with milk for 2 weeks, they made some salts, and sent him to Randolph for grain. His brother gave him 25 cts. to buy his dinner. He went to Waitsfield, and crossed the mountain to Roxbury. The road through the woods was a bridle-path, and the roots of the trees so thick the horse had to step pretty long sometimes. He stopped at Roxbury for dinner, but finding they had nothing to eat but potatoes and milk there, and that he would have to wait for the potatoes to be cooked, he pushed on to Braintree, finding nothing but potatoes and milk there again, and deferred dining until he should reach Randolph. Having arrived, he went straight to the mill. The miller weighed his salts, and let him have 3 bushels of grain, and paid him the balance due in money. He would not let him have more grain, saying that he must divide among the people or they would starve.

Our "boy sent to mill," said he turned out his horse to feed while his grist was being ground. They had plenty to eat there, but he was so bashful he did not dare to ask for anything. He was very hungry, but hoped when he got back to Braintree he could get some potatoes and milk, at least. He reached Braintree, and then concluded to go on to Roxbury, as he could stay there over night, and by starting early in the morning, reach home in time for the family to bake for breakfast; but when he arrived at Roxbury, the inhabitants had gone to bed, and not seeing any lights, it made him homesick, and he concluded to go on a little farther to a Mr. Sampson's, who lived up close under the mountain. When he got up to Sampson's, it was so dark there he could not stay there possibly, and he kept on. He was very tired and hungry, but he led the old mare along with the 3 bushels of meal on her back. When he got about half way up the mountain, he heard a wolf howl behind him, and pretty soon, another one answer ahead of him; soon, another one in the north, then in the south. He stopped to rest the old mare and himself. He was so hungry and tired, he thought that if he had got to live to be an old man, and always fare as hard as now, that he did not much care if the wolves did take him; that they would tear him to pieces in about two minutes, he considered, and it would be over with; but he started along pretty soon. He could hear the wolves in the bushes close by. They did not howl now, for they could see him, and were only watching when to spring upon him. He scrambled up on to the old mare's back. He thought that he would let them take her first. It soon began to grow a little light. He kept urging the old mare along, and when he got out of the woods, it was so light the wolves left him. He got home about sunrise. He dragged the meal into the house, and went up stairs to bed, so tired and exhausted that he could hardly get up there. When breakfast was ready, he was called up, but when they gave him a piece of bread only about half as large as his hand, and a small quantity of milk, he said the tears rolled down his cheeks, and it was harder than all he had endured; but they told him that it was more than the "galls" had, and that they must be very saving, for they did not know when they should get any more.

Mr. Rising lived to become quite wealthy, but was blind for the last few years of his life. He narrated these facts to us in his 85th year. He was blind at this time, but his memory was very good.

WARREN BOYS AND THE BEARS.

Some over 40 years since, Christopher Moore, 17 years of age, and De Estings Billings, about the same age, set a bear-trap some 3 miles from the village, on the farm now owned by Milo Bucklin; and on going to the spot the next day, found a two-year old bear in the trap. Thinking it would be nice to take the bear down to the village alive, they each cut a good switch, and gave the bear, who was first disposed to fight, such a thorough whipping he curled down. They did not release him from the trap and so run the risk of losing him, but one took up the bear in his arms and the other the trap, and both together they carried the bear and trap about half a mile to the road, where they had a cart in waiting; but they had to lay the bear down several times and repeat the whipping before they got to the cart, and they got their faces and arms scratched some; but they took him to the village alive.

Warren can boast of strong men. One, Oliver Slack, used to gather his sap here by hand with a hoop, with two five-pail iron kettles, one in each hand.

REV. NATHANIEL STEARNS,

a Methodist, was the first minister settled in town. Rev. Mr. Wheelock, Congregationalist, was expecting to be settled first, but the Methodists, thinking that the privilege equally belonged to them to settle the first pastor, and thereby to obtain for their minister the right of land by charter to the first clergyman settled, went in the night for Elder Stearns, and installed him first. He was secured a salary of $100 a year, paid in grain.

WARREN RIVER MEETING HOUSE SOCIETY, was organized Jan. 19, 1838, and a committee chosen to build the house, 40x50 ft., of fair proportion, finished plain but well; Daniel Ralph built the house, Rev. E. Scott, M. E., from Montpelier, preached the dedication sermon, and the M. E. Conference sent ministers here for several years. The house is a union building, and the different denominations have had stated times to preach: the Episcopal Methodist, the 1st Sabbath in every month and every other 2d Sabbath; the Universalist the 3d Sabbath in every month; the Protestant Methodist, the 4th Sabbath in the first 9 months in the year; the other denominations to occupy the remainder of the time. The other denominations in this vicinity are Baptist, Congregationalist, Adventist, Seventh day Adventist, and Spiritualists. Much of the time no regular preaching has been sustained in the union meeting house.

Rev. J. Waldron came here in 1871, to preach for a year, and staid 2 years. He was from St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., and was liked very much. Rev. Mr. Burgin, the next pastor, came from Lincoln, and staid 2 years.

The church at East Warren was built in 1834. It is also a union building, but the people are mostly Methodists in that vicinity; and there is a M. E. Church, a branch of the church at Waitsfield, here. Rev. J. Boyce, from Waitsfield, preached here half of the time, for there has never been a settled minister there. I have tried to find the church records, but cannot.

REV. JOSHUA TUCKER, was born in Salem, Mass., June 14, 1800. In 1826, he married Anna S. Cook, of Chelsea, Mass. He received his theological education in New Hampshire, and commenced to preach at the age of 28. In 1830, he was ordained at Washington, and was pastor of Washington and of Vershire until 1833, when he removed to Chelsea, but remained pastor of Washington, Vershire and Williamstown until 1839. He then removed to Warren, where he preached 2 years. Since then he has lived at different times in the towns of Lincoln, Washington, Huntington, Starksboro, Middlesex, Northfield and Hydepark; from Hydepark he removed for the third time to Starksboro, where he now resides. He gave up preaching about a year ago from ill health. He preached the gospel 50 years, had 11 children, 7 now living; died in Lincoln, aged 78. His wife is now (1881) living in Starksboro.

REV. JAIRIUS EATON, came to this town from Enosburgh, in 1854, and preached here ever after part of the time, until his death, Dec. 25, 1861. He was a Wesleyan Methodist.

JOSEPH W. ELDRIDGE, ESQ.,

born in Stonington, Ct., May 17, 1777, married at Brooklyn, Ct., Jan. 30, 1804, to Betsy Tyler, daughter of William Tyler, and grand-daughter of Gen. Putnam. Mr. Eldridge moved into town early; was town clerk 14 years, and the first post master, which office he held 30 years. He was the first representative from this town to the legislature, and married the first couple in town. He came into town himself before he was married, and went back to Connecticut after his wife. Mrs. Eldridge made her bridal-journey to her new home in the wilderness of Warren, on horse back. She was a member of the Congregational church, and an exemplary Christian. Their door and purse were always open for the benefit of the gospel. The ministers always found a home with them. He had nearly lived man's allotted time when he was suddenly called. He stepped out to speak to a neighbor passing his house, tripped on a small stick, fell upon his hands and knees, broke a blood vessel in falling, and lived only 36 hours after; aged 65 years, 1842. Mr. Eldridge's first wife died in 1831; in 1833, he married Mrs. Deborah Durkee, who died in 1869.

DEACON JAMES ALLEN,

born in Walpole, N. H., May 28, 1787, married Achsah, daughter of David and Effie Young, in 1807, and moved into this town, on the farm now owned by John Cardell, in 1810. He soon bought the farm now owned by Sylvester Wheeler. It was a wilderness farm then, and there was only a path by marked trees by which he went to his land to chop. He was a very industrious man, and when it was not weather to work out doors, he made spinning-wheels for the wives and daughters of the settlers. Mrs. Allen had a great fear of the Indians, although she had never seen one. One day, when Mr. Allen was out at work, near night a ragged, rough-looking man came into the house, set down his gun, and told her he wanted some supper and to stay all night. She said he could have some supper, but she could not keep him over night. She says she flew around pretty lively, thinking this was an Indian, any way, and that her time had come. Mr. Allen came in soon, and told the man he would show him where to go to find lodging. As they started out, Mrs. Allen took her babe in her arms and followed at a distance, fearing the supposed Indian would kill her husband; but the man proved to be a Mr. Atwood, from Hancock, who had been out hunting and lost his way.

Mrs. Allen united with the Baptist church when only 16, and has lived a praiseworthy life. Soon after Mr. Allen came into town he was chosen deacon of the Baptist church at Waitsfield, which had a branch in Warren, and held the office till his death in 1876, aged 89.

JOSEPH A. CURTIS,

born in Hanover, N. H., Nov. 1787, was married in 1807 to Amelia Bissell, and moved to this town. Soon after he was appointed judge in the county court, and has been State senator. He was reputed here a very good scholar. He died in 1867.

WILLIAM CARDELL,

born in Southwick, Mass., May 3, 1788, removed to Munroe, N. Y.; was married Sept. 23, 1810, to Elizabeth, daughter of John and Elizabeth Peers. He came into the east part of the town and settled in 1817, but soon sold out his land for store goods, in which he was unfortunate, and lost nearly all his property. He then bought a tract of land in that part of the town called South Hollow, comprising several farms now. He was a great worker, cleared many acres of land, and made the mountain road to Lincoln for 50 cts. per rod. While making the road, he had a cabin built on runners, in which to cook and sleep, that he moved along as fast as the road was completed.

He also kept a tavern and toll-gate several years, and was a merchant some time. When he came into town he had about $1,000, but owing to his misfortune, had only about $200 when he bought in South Hollow, and by his unremitting toil and economy, amassed a large property, and was the wealthiest man in town at his death. He has three sons living in town, and one in Boston, Mass., all being wealthy. He sold his farm in South Hollow at length, and moved into the village, where he died Nov. 2, 1870, aged 82 years. He was many years a member of the M. E. church.

COL. STEPHEN L. SARGENT,

born in Windsor, Jan. 19, 1789, came to this town with his father, Moses Sargent, when 13 years of age. There were only 12 families in town when he came. He lived on the same farm that his father settled on, and married Bridget Shaw, of Hartland. They have 3 sons and 2 daughters. Col. Sargent went with some 20 volunteers to Plattsburgh, N. Y., but did not arrive until the battle was over. In 1820, he was commissioned lieut. colonel; in 1822, colonel of the 4th reg. 1st brigade, 4th division of Vt. militia. He was a prompt, faithful officer. He gave me these facts when past 85 years of age, and his mind at this time was remarkably clear. I am indebted to him for more information about the early settlers than any one else in town. He was the oldest Free Mason in town; was a member over 50 years, and was buried under the Masonic order.

DENSLOW UPHAM,

born in Weathersfield in 1800, moved into town in 1818. He married, Aug. 1823, Ada H. Richardson, daughter of James Richardson. Mr. Upham is a man of good education and sound judgment. He surveyed and lotted the 2d division of land in town, and was appointed a judge of the county court in 1853-'54; elected State senator in 1864-'65. Mr. Upham has a very pleasant family, and whoever calls there is always treated very hospitably.

RICHARD STERLING

moved from South Woodstock, Feb. 22, 1823. He lived on the place now owned by G. W. Cardell, 14 years; kept tavern 4 years of the time, then moved to Grand Hollow. He was born in Lyme, Ct., Dec. 21, 1777. At the age of 5 years his father removed to South Woodstock, Vt. When Richard Sterling came to Warren, there were but three houses in the village. He kept the first tavern, was never absent from a town meeting, and voted for every President after he was 21. He died July 23, 1872, aged 94 years, 7 mos. 2 days.

HIRAM BRADLEY,

came from Pomfret here in 1824. He was an educated man, and a teacher in his early life, but was very much broken down in his old age. Mrs. Bradley, his wife, is one of those old ladies, we seldom meet, so pleasant and so social, with a well cultivated mind; though over 70 when we last saw her, she conversed upon any subject introduced, with ease.

AMOS RISING,

born in Southwick, Massachusetts, 1769, moved to Warren in 1799; had 3 children; his oldest daughter now living in Warren, aged 86; his son is a lawyer in the West. She now lives on her father's old place, where he first settled, her name is Mrs. Lorenzo Nichols. He died 1845, aged 65.

His brother, Tehan Rising, came to Warren in 1800. He had 6 children, only one lived to grow up. Aaron Rising came to Warren in 1802. They were all influential men, and helped build up the town.

LONGEVITY OF WARREN TO JAN. 1877.

In Warren, Sept. 17, Mrs. Hannah Billings, wife of Mr. Rufus Billings, aged 80 years. Mr. and Mrs. Billings lived together nearly 60 years, and in the community where she died, 38. She was the mother of 14 children, 12 of whom lived to have families, 9 survived her, and 7 attended her funeral. She could number 65 grand-children and 20 great-grand-children.

MANUFACTURES.

Warren Wooden Bowl and Chair Stock Factory, situated on Mad river, at the further south end of the village, was built by Carlos Sargent, in 1809, who put in a forge and manufactured edge tools several years, and sold to Thomas Heyward, who manufactured wooden bowls, fork-stails and hoe-handles till the fall of 1868, when R. N. and D. D. Hemenway, of Ludlow, bought the shop, and commenced there, Nov. 20, that season, the turning of wooden bowls, with whom, Apr. 1, 1869, C. W. Hemenway, another brother, bought in an equal share, and helped to manufacture bowls and chair-stock until Apr. 1, 1874, when he sold to R. N. and D. D., and returned to farming in Ludlow, and the brothers, R. N. and D. D., continued the business until the fall of 1878, when the shop was burned, after which they sold the privilege to John Bradley, who has since built a shop on the old foundation.

Henry Austin manufactured clapboards on Mad river, about 3 miles above the village, for several years, and then sold out and went West. Alex. Stetson and a Mr. Hanks manufactured clothes-pins a short time; then Mr. Hanks started a shop of his own, but did not run it long. Geo. S. Hanks built a shop also at the north end of the village, on Ford brook at the falls, for the manufacture of rolling-pins, clothes-pins and clapboards for a time, and Walter Bagley manufactured clapboards in South Hollow several years.

Samuel Austin run a distillery many years since in town. His customers would carry their molasses (maple) and get their rum. One day a government officer visited him, and finding that he had no license, it cost his brother, Daniel Austin, $150.00 to settle. The old still in now in Christopher Moore's possession.

VILLAGE.

Warren has quite a village. There are some 50 dwelling-houses, 1 church, 1 school-house, a very good one; 3 stores, 2 boot and shoe shops, 1 tannery, 5 blacksmith shops, 2 clap-board mills, 2 saw-mills, 1 grist-mill, 3 carriage shops, 1 harness-shop, 1 tin-shop, 2 cooper-shops, 2 clothes-pins shops, 1 gunsmith, 1 millinery shop, a tavern and post-office.

Mad River runs through the village. The water-power here is very good. A stage runs to Roxbury, 7 miles, the nearest railroad station, and back 3 times a week. [Data of 1877; there is now, 1881, a daily stage from Warren to Roxbury.] In other parts of the town, there are 2 carriage-shops, 2 saw-mills, 1 clap-board mill, a shingle factory, 1 black smith shop, and several cooper shops.

EDWARD ELDRIDGE, son of Joseph W., is quite a prominent man in Warren; is in very good circumstances; owns several farms, and has held most of the town offices. He had a son killed in the late war by the name of Joseph Eldridge; also a son-in-law, Benjamin Edgerton.

Potato Hill, as it generally stands on the maps, is the high peak between Warren and Lincoln, the highest point being in Lincoln, but not far from the Warren line. It is a little south of Lincoln mountain, at about the same height from the sea level.

MT. ALGONQUIN.

BY D. C. GEER.

Around this mountain hangs a legend,
 Hangs a legend old and wild,
 Of the bright-eyed Watometta,
 An Algonquin's only child.

How an Iroquois warrior
 Wooed and won "the dusky dove;"
 How his father, the great sachem,
 Did not of their love approve;

How he spurned his father's counsel,
 And increased his savage ire—
 Left the Iroquois' wigwam,
 Sat beside Algonquin's fire;

How one day his father found him
 Hunting on yon mountain's side,
 And in wrath the chief commanded
 Him to leave his gentle bride;

How the son opposed in anger;
 How the father drew his knife,
 And as speeds the feathery arrow,
 Sped the young Iroquois' life.

On this mountain watched the maiden,
 For her brave, now cold and dead,
 Keeping there her lonely vigil,
 With the same rock for her bed.

Still she waited—yet he came not—
 Until winter's icy hand
 Chilled the current of her young life,
 Bore her to the hunting land,

Where they roam the fields Elysian,
 Where they climb the mountains fair,
 Where they fish in shining rivers,
 Where they hunt the elk and hare.

This is what tradition teaches
 Of this mountain, old and wild;
 Of the bright-eyed Watometta,
 An Algonquin's lovely child.

As a tribute to this maiden,
 Sleeping in oblivion's night;
 Shall we not point westward, saying,
 That's Algonquin's dizzy height?

THE LAST BEAR seen in Warren was a huge one, shot the past summer,—almost as much a trophy, not quite, as the Barnard catamount.

In Jan. 1824, Mrs. Hiram Bradley and a Mrs. Howe were coming from Pomfret, where they had been on a visit, and as they came into Granville wood, found the water had flooded the road. They drove into the water and upset. Mrs. Howe told Mrs. Bradley to throw her little son of 2 years out, that he could swim like a duck; but Mrs. B. declined, and Mrs. Howe went back to Mr. Rice's after help. Mrs. Bradley got her horse out where it could stand, and held her child in her arms from 2 o'clock in the afternoon until 9 P. M., when a man came along with a team and took her in. Her clothes were frozen on her, and she came very near dying from the effect.

Mrs. C. E. Greenslit tells one of her father's stories—written for one of her boys to speak at school :

MY MOTHER'S TRAY.

BY MRS. CARRIE E. GREENSLIT.

Long years ago, when the land was new,
And good things scarce and nice things few,
Among the treasures of that early day,
My mother had an old-fashioned tray,
Red outside, but as clean within
As the heart of man when cleansed from sin.

Week by week, and day by day,
The children were fed from that very tray;
The great brown loaves were mixed in that,
And the butter received its salt and spat;
But grief will come to all some day,
And it came at last to my mother's tray.

"Boys," she called, "come in here, now,
And take this mess to the sheep and eow."
'Twas steep and slippery down to the barn,
And I left her twisting her stocking-yarn.
"Now," thinks I, "I will have some fun,
For I shall ride and you shall run."

So I seated myself in the famous tray,
And very soon we were on our way:
Faster and faster the stamps went by;
Steer or stop it? no, not I;
Over the wall in my Gilpin flight—
And I split the tray from left to right.

Quick as a wink, I rulsed the tray,
For well I knew what my mother'd say;
All out of breath, with my ride and run—
"Mother, just see what the buck has done!"
"Confound that buck!" my mother said;
"I wish to the land the thing was dead!"

Well, she never knew till I grew a man,
For boys can keep secret, I know they can;
And she missed and mourned for many a day
The loss and use of her cherished tray;
And I got me a sled to slide down hill,
Something that would not split and spill.

WARREN PAPERS.

BY C. J. SARGENT.

In the year 1800, 12 men took the free-man's oath here: Simeon Wilcox, Ruel Dolbear, John Sherman, Joshua Richardson, James Richardson, Amos Rising, Jonathan Shattuck, Wm. Kent and Jonas Rice.

FIRST SELECTMEN.

Simeon Wilcox, 1800; Paul Sherman, 1801, '02, '03; James Richardson, 1804, '06; Timothy Dolbear, 1807, '08, '10; Joseph Raymond, 1809; Joseph Eldridge, 1811, '12, '13, '16, '17, '23, '28, '29; Amos Rising, 1814, '15; Calvin Gilbert, 1818, '19; Wm. Kent, 1820; Benjamin Buck, 1821; Joseph Hyzer, 1822, '27; Winan Gleason, 1824; Zerah Munsil, 1825, '26; Joseph Curtis, 1830; Asahel Miner, 1831; Wm. Bragg, 1832, '33; Franklin Wright, 1834, '35, '36; Moses Ordway, 1837; Benjamin Souther, 1838; Wm. B. Tyler, 1839; A. Cushman, 1840, 41; D. Upham, 1842, '43; Pierce Spaulding, 1844; H. Kimball, 1845; Lewis Cardell, 1846; Moses Shurtliff, 1847; Azariah Hanks, 1848, '49, '57, '58; H. Gleason, 1850, '52, '53; Daniel Ralph, 1854, '55; Gideon Goodspeed, 1856; Jarius Eaton, 1857; Wm. Kelsey, 1859; Charles Green, 1860; Charles Pike, 1861, '62, '66-70; Huzzial Gleason, 1863, '64; H. W. Lyford, 1865; H. G. Van Deusen, 1870; N. L. Dickenson, 1871-76, '78; James G. Sargent, 1876, '77; L. E. Hanks, 1879, '80, '81.

TOWN TREASURERS.

Thomas Jerrolds, 1800; Samuel Laird, 1801; James Richardson, 1802, '3, '4, '15, '16, '17; Jonathan Shattuck, 1805-13; Wm. B. Tyler, 1813, '14, '41-46; Joseph Eldridge, 1818, '19, '35-40; William Bragg, 1820-24; William Kent, 1824-30; Franklin Wright, 1830-35; Ashel Kendrick, 1846; Denslow Upham, 1847-51; Nathan Kimball, 1851, '53, '54; Lorenzo Nichols, 1852; Cephas Ransom, 1855; Daniel Ralph, 1856, '57, '63-74; Sylvester Banister, 1874-81.

THE TURNPIKE from Warren to Lincoln, over Lincoln mountain, was for 10 to 15 years kept with toll-gates; 12½c. for passing with a team, 25c. for round trip.

ACCIDENTAL DEATHS.

Dennison Sargent, from Woodstock, in the employ of William Cardell, went into the mill where employed, one morning, and down below to cut the ice from the water-wheel. Some one raised the gate while he was there, and he was carried under the wheel, down the raceway, and under the ice below the mill. Mr. Cardell wondered where Sargent was during the day, and some one looked below the mill, and discovered the body in the ice.

Lewis Sargent, of East Warren, while shingling a building in Roxbury, fell from the roof to the ground, and injured his spine. He lingered several months, and then died.

Oliver Porter, living in the west part of the town, fell from the high beams in his barn on to a flax hatchel, and it injured him so he died in a few days.

Ira Whitcomb, while in the employ of Christopher Moore, was kicked in the bowels by a colt he was leading to water, and died in a few days.

Aurin Ralph, while at work on the roof of his mill, in the south part of the town, fell to the rocks below the mill, and was instantly killed.

Dana Davis, while at work in Fayston chopping in the woods, felled a tree, and it lodged on another one, and while chopping that, he was caught when it fell, and one leg was smashed. Efforts were made in vain to staunch the blood, but he bled to death in about 20 hours.

Horace Poland, while at work in the woods, broke one leg, and was injured other ways. He lived several weeks and then died.

Stephen Sterling was sawing clapboards in Lincoln, and went out into the mill-yard to roll down some logs; they lodged, and he went in front to start them, but before he could step out, was caught and crushed by the logs rolling on to him. He was a native of Warren, and was buried here.

Victor Mix went to Canaan to lumber, and while rafting logs on the pond, slipped between them and was drowned.

Mr. Pelton, living near the town line between Waitsfield and Warren, felt so bad when the high water cut through his meadow, that he committed suicide.

Otis Bucklin died very suddenly of heart disease. He ate his supper as usual, and went out in the dooryard, and was giving his hired man some orders about the work, and dropped dead.

THE NATURAL BRIDGE OF WARREN is a very interesting natural curiosity. It is in the south part of the village, on the premises of Don C. Geer. It is a natural bridge of stone, about 20 feet in height, with an arch 12 feet in height, and artists have taken views of it that have been sold through the country.

PATENTS.—Don C. Geer obtained a patent on a knob latch in Sept. 3, 1878. It is called "Geer's Patent Reversible Gravitating Knob Latch." It is a great improvement on spring latches. Clark E. Billings, born in Warren, is a natural mechanic, and does various kinds of work on wood and iron; is a first-class gunsmith, and has obtained patents on a number of carpenters' tools, and on several tools combined in one; also a patent on an apple-quarterer, and on a double-acting knob latch.

SONS OF WARREN—CYRUS ROYCE graduated at the Unitarian College in Meadville, Penn., and is a Unitarian preacher in Massachusetts. HARTWELL DAVIS went to Minnesota, and succeeded well as a railroad man and business manager, and amassed quite a fortune.

JOHN SENTER is a self-made man. He has obtained his education almost wholly by himself; studied law and been admitted to the bar, and makes a success of his business. He is on the Board of Education, and holds other offices.

CLARENCE J. SARGENT, son of Jonas G. Sargent, who came from Randolph to Warren in 1844, is also noted as a successful music-teacher, having given over 10,000 lessons on the piano, organ and in harmony during the last 8 years; at present, 1882, has a class of 108 scholars, in his little territory embracing several counties.

WATERBURY.

BY REV. C. C. PARKER.

THE EARLY HISTORY OF WATERBURY. A Discourse delivered Feb. 10th, 1867, by Rev. C. C. Parker, Pastor of Congregational Church. Waterbury: Waterbury Job Printing Establishment, 1867.

Ps. 77th, —5th.—I have considered the days of old, the years of Ancient time.

There are few sentiments more universal and rational, than that which manifests itself in a desire to know the past and especially the history of the persons and places with which we are or have been intimately connected. To gratify this sentiment, your attention is asked to the following Sketch of the Early History of Waterbury.

There is no evidence that the Indian ever made his home within the borders of our town. The first settlers found no indications of clearings or dwellings, and the relics of the Indians found here have been few. But though the Red Man probably never dwelt here, (1) our valley lay in his great thoroughfare from the valley of the Champlain to the valley of the Connecticut, and indeed from the valley of the St. Lawrence to the shores of the Atlantic. As powerful tribes, hostile to each other, dwelt on either side, doubtless many a war party went forth to fight, passing through our valley, and returned, exulting with victory, or sullen with defeat. Doubtless these hills have echoed the warwhoop of many such a party, and the song of their wardance. It is certain that the 300 French and Indians under De Rouville, who destroyed Deerfield, Mass., in March, 1704, passed through this valley, both when they went on their bloody errand, and when they returned with their 112 captives. It may add somewhat to our interest, as we read the sad, thrilling story of the sufferings and adventures of the Rev. Mr. Williams and his captive associates, to remember that they made their forlorn and gloomy journey to their long captivity, over the spot where we now cultivate our beautiful fields and dwell in our quiet homes. Through this valley also passed and repassed the Indians who burnt Royalton, and took its inhabitants captive in 1780. The hill in the north part of the town, over which ran the old road to Stowe, was originally called Indian Hill, some say because the Indians who burnt Royalton camped there for a short time.

(2) The falls in the Winooski were called Indian Falls by the early settlers: tradition here, as in so many other like localities, saying that a disappointed Indian maiden, in her despair, threw herself from the highest point of the rocks to the chasm below. Though the Indian never dwelt here, the whole region unquestionably, was familiar to him, not only as lying in his great war-path, but as favorite ground for hunting and fishing.

The town was chartered by Benning Wentworth, Gov. of New Hampshire, June 7, 1763. The war between the English and French was just ended, and the Canadas had become a part of the British possessions. Vermont ceased to be border-war territory, and the obstacle to its settlement was removed. Numerous towns in this part of the State were chartered about the same time with Waterbury,—Burlington, Colchester, Essex, Williston, Bolton, Duxbury, Moretown and Charlotte, were chartered the same day,—Jericho, Underhill, Middlesex and Berlin the day following. But as nearly the whole of Vermont was then an unbroken wilderness, few settlements were made, so far north as these towns, before the Revolution. The few that were made were then broken up, and were not recommenced until the war closed.—This accounts for the wide space between the charter and first settlement of nearly all the towns in this part of the State.

Waterbury was chartered to several individuals in Connecticut and New Jersey. It quite probably took its name from Waterbury, Conn., as many of the proprietors lived in that vicinity, and as these two are the only towns of that name to be found, so far as I know. The first meeting of the proprietors was held in New Milford, Conn., in 1770—some of the subsequent meetings were held at Newark, N. J.

The notes in this paper are marked by figures, viz., (1), (2), (3) &c. See Appendix.

After the Revolution the meetings were held in Sunderland, Arlington, and Bennington of this State. The warrant for the meeting in Bennington was issued by Isaac Tichenor, then justice of the peace—subsequently, so long governor of the State.

The town was not surveyed until about 1782. At that time Col. Partridge Thatcher, of New Milford, Ct., one of the proprietors, and the moderator of their first meeting, and also of the meeting in Arlington, came on with surveyors and ran out the town. They built their camp a few rods to the rear of Messrs. Case & Thomas' steam-mill, between the railroad and brook. This, without doubt, was the first tenement for a human being built in Waterbury. From Col. Thatcher the stream that enters the river near where his camp stood, was called Thatcher Branch. As we always desire to know the end of those in any important sense identified with the place where we live, I will add that it is said that Col. Thatcher contracted a disease from his exposures in the forests of our town, from which he died soon after returning to Connecticut.

The first settler of Waterbury was James Marsh, a native of Canaan, Ct. He had been a soldier in the French war. In the early part of the Revolutionary war he sold his place in Canaan and moved to Cornwall, Ct. Soon after this he was drafted as a soldier in the Revolution. Having a large family of small children, and his wife being very feeble, he hired a young man as a substitute, paying him $100. To pay this sum, and with the hope of escaping service as a minute man, to which he had been enrolled, he sold his place in Cornwall and bought a right of land in Bath, N. H., and one in Waterbury. The right in Waterbury was purchased of a Mr. Steele, of New Milford, and deeded in 1780. Soon after this he moved to Bath and commenced a settlement, in the meantime having buried his wife and married again. After living there some 2 years, he found the title to his land in Bath was bad, and he resolved to begin a settlement in Waterbury, having the assurance that several others would begin settlements about the same time. In the spring of 1783 he came on, selected his right, which covered much of the site of the present village (3)—cleared a small piece of land between the graveyard and the river, and having planted it with corn, returned. In the fall he came and harvested his crop, putting it into a rude crib for next year's use. The next spring he came with his family to the old fort in Corinth, where he left his wife and five of his eight children, and came on to Waterbury with the remaining three, viz.: Elias, James and Irene, making the journey on snowshoes, and drawing his provisions and effects on a hand-sled. He took possession of the surveyors' cabin.

To his dismay he found the corn, so carefully stored the fall before, was nearly all gone. Bears, Indians or travelers, had taken well nigh the whole. We can hardly conceive a condition more sad and dismal. Relying upon his supply of corn, he had taken little provision with him, and there was none in the shape of grain short of a return to Corinth. Hunting and fishing were his only resource. The last of May, having made an additional clearing, and nearly finished planting his corn, he left his children and returned to Corinth for the remainder of his family, expecting to be absent one week, and leaving provision barely for that time. The children, as I have remarked, were Elias, a lad of about 15 years, and who subsequently owned the place where Miss Electa Corse now resides, and whose remains lie unmarked in our graveyard; Irene, a girl about 12 years old, who married a Mr. Coleman, of Underhill, and who died there in 1826, and James, a small boy, who lived for many years in the south part of Jericho, and who died there, Feb., 1865, nearly 90 years old. After their father had left, the children found they must put themselves on short allowance to bring the week through. The week ended, and so did their provisions, but the father did not return. Their only reliable means of subsistence then was the wild onions or leeks which grew in abundance on the intervale. To relieve themselves, they resolved to go down to the Falls to catch fish, having been told they were abundant there. In attempting to cross Waterbury river on a button-wood pole, the only means of crossing then, the sister fell into the stream, and came near being drowned. After rescuing her, they returned to their desolate cabin, and to the sorry food of wild onions. Thus they passed another week, but no father came. Thinking they must certainly perish if they remained longer, they left for their nearest neighbor, Mr. Jesse McFairlane, who had settled that spring on the Jones farm in Richmond. On their way down, a huge bear met them near the present residence of Capt. H. Sherman, but their hunting dog, which had been left with them, soon worried him up the side of the mountain, and they passed on in safety to Mr. McFairlane's, where they were most kindly received and cared for. They were so nearly starved, that it was some time before it was safe for them to eat a full meal.

After about three weeks' unavoidable absence, the father, with the mother and the rest of the family, returned. Driven almost to desperation by his delays, and filled with the deepest anxiety, he thinks his worst fears are realized as he enters his cabin and finds it desolate, and the cold, gray ashes on the rude hearth tell him it has been desolate for several days. Surely his children have perished in the woods or have been devoured by the wild beasts. A young man who had accompanied them from Corinth was immediately sent to Mr. McFairlane's to see if the children were there. They were found, and before night the family were all together again. The son James, who so long survived the rest of the family, and from whom these particulars were learned, said the meeting of the family was one never to be forgotten. The father had been up the stream to look at his traps, at the beaver-dams, of which he said there were then three between the river and the site of the present mills. Returning, he met his son, bounding with boyish glee through the woods to meet him. Claspng him in his arms, with tears streaming from his eyes, he exclaimed, "Bless the Lord! my children are alive—my children are alive!" and such was his excess of joy at seeing them alive, that it was many hours before he could cease weeping.

During this first summer, this family lived many weeks on wild onions, cooked in the milk of their one cow, the father often gone for many days, in the fruitless endeavor to procure provision. The only occasional relief they had until their corn was harvested, was in the killing of a moose or bear, which in summer could rarely be done. That summer Mr. Marsh built his log-house on his clearing, a little to the west of the graveyard hill, and moved into it. His crop of corn raised near the river was fine, but after he had secured some 20 bushels of it, a flood came and destroyed the remainder. So that for nearly 2 years they lived much of the time on the flesh of the moose, deer and bear. Much of the little grain they had, which was procured in the settlements in Richmond, Williston and Jericho, and brought home on the back, was paid for with the skins of these animals and those of the beaver.

In the spring of 1785, Mr. Marsh was made glad by the coming of the second settler, Ezra Butler. But as Mr. Butler left in the fall and did not return until the next spring, for nearly 2 years Mr. Marsh with his family was alone in this wilderness. After the arrival of Mr. Butler with his family, a year and a half more elapsed before another settler came. March 29, 1788, Mr. Marsh went to Richmond to meet and conduct to Waterbury its third settler, Caleb Munson. In the afternoon he crossed the river to Mr. Brownson's, to run some pewter spoons. Before he had finished his work it began to be dark, and as the weather was mild and the river beginning to break up, he was urged to remain for the night. But he expressed a strong desire to spend the evening with the family who were to be his new neighbors, and taking a long pole, he started to return. A cry of distress was soon heard at the river, but before help could arrive, he had disappeared under the ice. His pole was lying across the hole into which he had fallen, but somehow his grasp upon it was lost, and the current being strong, he was carried down the river, and his body was not found until several days after. He was buried at Richmond—only two of the family, the oldest son and daughter, could attend the funeral. Their neighbor, Mr. Butler, accompanied them, and it is said, he and the son alternated in carrying the daughter much of the way on their backs, the snow being too deep for her to walk.

The whole story of Mr. Marsh is a sadly interesting one. On account of pecuniary misfortunes elsewhere, he came into the wilderness of our town with a large family, and almost destitute of any means of support, except such as his hands could supply from day to day from the forests and the streams. Here they lived for two years, with no family nearer than 10 miles down the river and about 7 miles up the river (Thomas Mead's, in Middlesex.) Hardly can privations and hardships surpass what they endured, especially during the dreary winters of these two years. Often they were so near starving, that when the children saw their father returning from his long hunt, with a quarter of moose or deer on his shoulder, with knife in hand they would rush to meet him, and each slashing a slice for himself, and casting it on the coals for a moment, would eat it as in the desperation of starvation. He came to his mournful end just as settlers were beginning to come into town, and his own privations were giving place to the comforts of home. He seems to have been a hardy, resolute man. Bravely bearing up against a host of difficulties, and yet at times well nigh crushed beneath their burden, tears often starting from his eyes as he looked upon his family and thought of their desperate, forlorn condition. Though he was removed, his family was cared for, his children becoming respectable, and some of them influential members of society in this and neighboring towns.

After contemplating so long this gloomy picture, it is pleasant to turn to a brighter page. The second settler of Waterbury, as has been already remarked, was afterwards so well known as a minister of the Gospel; a judge on the bench, and as the governor of the State.

Mr. Butler was the son of Asaph Butler, and was born in Lancaster, Worcester Co. Mass., Sept. 24, 1763. He was the fifth of seven children, four sons and three daughters. In his 7th year, his father moved to West Windsor, Vt., where his mother, whose maiden name was Jane McAllister, soon died, and where he spent the next 7 or 8 years, mainly in the family of his elder brother, Joel Butler. When about 14 years of age, he went to live with Dr. Stearns, of Claremont, N. H., as a laborer on his farm, and with the exception of 6 months in his 17th year, when he was a soldier in the army of the Revolution, he continued in the service of Dr. S., having almost the entire management of his farm, until he was of age. In 1785, having spent a few months previous in Weathersfield, he came to Waterbury in company with his brother Asaph, next older than himself. They came to Judge Paine's, in Williamstown, with an ox-team. The rest of the way they came on snow-shoes, drawing their effects on a hand-sled, the snow being 3 or 4 feet deep, and reached W. the 20th of March. It must have been a joyful day to the Marsh family when these two young men, with their hand-sled, hauled up before their door. Their loneliness, in part at least, was ended. Mr. Butler and his brother immediately made their pitch, near where Mr. C. C. Corse now resides, and made a small clearing, planted it to corn, and returned to Weathersfield, where in June of that year, Mr. Butler was married to Miss Tryphena Diggins. He soon returned, and finding the title to the land on which he had pitched, bad, he selected another right a little below the village, made a clearing, built a log-house very near the present residence of Deacon Parker, and in September of 1786, moved into it with his wife and child, and on that place (now mainly owned by the State for the Reform School), he spent the remainder of his eventful life. He and his wife made their journey from Weathersfield on horseback, much of the way by a bridle-path, and in this way brought some of their effects deemed most necessary in the matter of housekeeping. The brother who first came with him settled in Richmond, and twenty or thirty years after moved to the West.

Mr. Marsh had subsisted his family, to a great extent, by hunting and fishing, and into this pioneer life, Mr. Butler was soon initiated. Their meat was that of the moose, the deer and the bear, and in their pursuit they were often led far from home, into the wilderness of neighboring towns and far up the mountain sides, not unfrequently camping out, the cold winter nights, to renew the chase in the morning. If faint with weariness and hunger, they were ready to despair, and to return with empty hands, the thought of a starving wife and children put new vigor into their limbs, new resolves into their hearts, and nerved them with the energy of desperation. Food they must have or perish in its pursuit. It was a battle for life for themselves and their families, and bravely they fought it. It was a life full of thrilling incidents and adventures, with which, had the story of them been treasured, a volume might be filled. By these hardships the constitution of Mr. Butler was seriously impaired before he was 30 years old.

As Mr. Marsh was drowned before the next settler arrived, Mr. Butler was properly regarded as the pioneer man of the town. Though a young man, he took a prominent part in all private enterprises and public movements. He built the first framed house in the town—so long occupied by his son, Russell Butler, now owned by Deacon Erastus Parker. To him was issued the warrant to call a meeting of the freemen of Waterbury, in 1790, to organize the town, and at that meeting he was chosen town clerk. From this time the official life of Mr. Butler was a remarkable one. From this humble beginning he went through almost every grade to the chief magistracy of the State.

From 1794 to 1805, with the exception of 1798, he represented the town in the General Assembly. In 1807, he was chosen both as a representative and as a member of the Council; and by the record of votes, seems to have acted part of the time in one body and a part in the other.

(4) In 1808, he was again elected to the Council, and with the exception of 1813 and 1814, when he was in Congress, he was annually re-elected to this body until 1826. In 1803, he was elected assistant judge of Chittenden County Court, Waterbury at that time belonging to that county, and was re-elected to that office the two following years. In 1806, he was elected chief judge of that court, and continued to hold that office until 1811. In 1811, Jefferson, now Washington County, was organized, and Judge Butler was elected chief judge of that County court and except the 2 years when in Congress (1813 and '14) and 1818, he held that office until 1825, when the judicial system of the State was changed to substantially its present form, when Judge Butler was chosen first assistant judge of the court. In 1806, he was chosen a member of the Council of Censors, and in 1822, a member of the Constitutional Convention. In 1804, and again in 1820, a presidential elector. In 1812, he was elected a member of Congress on the Republican general ticket along with James Fisk, Wm. Strong, Wm. C. Bradley, Richard Skinner and Charles Rich. In 1814, the candidates of the Federal party were elected, entirely changing the delegation of Vermont. In 1826, he was elected Governor of the State, and re-elected the following year, and each time without an organized opposition. Immediately after his second election, he declined another election, and at the close of that term, retired from official life, having been in office without interruption, from the organization of the town in 1790, often holding two or more important offices at the same time.

In addition to these civil and political offices, he was a committee with Elijah

Paine and James Whitelaw, to fix the site for the first State House in Montpelier,—a commissioner in 1807, with Samuel Shaw, John Cameron, Josiah Wright and Elihu Luce to determine the place and plan for the State Prison, and subsequently a commissioner to locate the State Arsenal. He was a trustee of the University of Vermont, from 1810 to 1816. Indeed, there was hardly an office of honor or trust in the gift of the people or Legislature that he did not fill. In this respect, the career of Gov. Butler from an unlettered pioneer—(his schooling was limited to 6 months in his boyhood,)—from a hunter and trapper up through almost every grade of office to the chief magistracy of the State, is a remarkable one and has few parallels in history. These honors and trusts he won by his sterling sense and honesty; and by his great energy and strength of will. Everybody felt that whatever trusts were reposed in him were safe—that whatever was given him to do, would be done, and so they always found it.

Mr. Butler had a religious as well as political history, and the former was as marked and positive as the latter. When he came to Waterbury, he was an irreligious and profane young man, and not a little disposed to quarrel with certain great doctrines; and so he continued for some 3 or 4 years. The story of his conviction and conversion is an exceedingly interesting one. At a time of the profoundest indifference in regard to religious things, when he did not know of a religious man in town, and before there had been a gospel sermon preached in it, his attention was called to the subject of personal religion in the following singular manner. I give it substantially in the words of one who received it from his lips:—"Being obliged to work hard during the week, and there being no public worship in town which he could attend, if he desired, he was in the habit of spending much of the Sabbath in sleep. On a certain Sabbath, awaking from his sleep, he found his wife reading a pamphlet, and proposed to read it aloud for the benefit of both. The beginning and end of the pamphlet were gone, and he never knew whence it came, what was its title, or who its author. But he found it treated of a subject which in former times had given him great perplexity, viz. :—how a man could be blameable for a disposition which he did not create. He would admit the justice of God in punishing overt acts, but not wrong propensities. The author he was reading made it appear that we are justly condemned for wrong dispositions, as well as wrong actions. After reading awhile, he exclaimed to his wife, 'If this is true, we are undone.' In a moment all the convictions he had formerly had returned upon him and he was cast into the deepest anxiety. After days of profoundest darkness and sharpest distress, bordering on despair, he was brought into the clear light and liberty of the Gospel. His feet having been set in the way of life, he walked circumspectly in that way to the end." His was the first conversion in Waterbury. A few days after his conversion, Rev. Mr. Call, a Baptist clergyman from Woodstock, came along and preached the first sermon preached in Waterbury. About a year after this he was baptized by the Rev. Mr. Call, and united with the Baptist church in Bolton. At the organization of the Baptist church in Waterbury, in 1800, or 1801, Mr. Butler was ordained as its pastor, and amid the multitude of his civil offices, he continued to discharge the duties of this office until within a few years of his death, and that without salary or remuneration. In all the conflicts of party politics and all the labors and perplexities of official life, it is said the meekness, dignity and propriety of the gospel ministry never forsook him. He walked uprightly and with a serious Christian deportment amid them all. Well may his children venerate his name and the community hold it in lasting remembrance.

His form was slightly stooping, his complexion dark and sallow, and his whole appearance quite unprepossessing; but his penetrating black eye and the calm tones of his voice quickly told of intellect and will of no common order. He died July 12, 1838, in the 75th year of his age.

The third settler was Caleb Munson

He moved from Torrington, Ct., in the spring of 1788, and settled up the river, near where Mrs. Amy Woodward resides. He subsequently moved across the river. About the same time Mr. Richard Holden settled on the place where Dr. Fales resides; Amos Waters on the interval now owned by Sylvester Henry, and Reuben Wells on the street near the present residence of Mr. Bebee. In 1788, Mr. Stiles Sherman and Jonathan Wright came into town. Mr. Sherman, from Hoosic, N. Y., made his pitch and built a log cabin on the place where he so long lived—the place recently owned by Mr. L. Bebee, now owned by Messrs. Thompson—and the next year moved on with his family. In 1790, March 2d, Jason Cady moved into town from Shelburn, Mass., and settled near the arch bridge. He and Mr. Sherman soon opened their log-houses for the entertainment of travelers (5). About this time or earlier, Dr. Daniel Bliss, the first physician, settled near Waterbury river bridge. The same year, Jona. Wright, (6) from Williamstown, Mass., built a house near the residence of Albert Dillingham, being the first that settled away from the river, unless a Mr. Smith had settled earlier on the hill near the residence of Geo. Stearns. In 1791, there were 93 inhabitants in town. In 1793, when Ebenezer Corse, father of E. W. Corse, moved into Duxbury, there were 15 families in Waterbury. In addition to those above named, Mr. John Craig had settled near where Mr. Remington lives—the farm owned by Geo. W. Randall and occupied by Wm. Humphrey. Col. Kennan, who became one of the prominent men of the town, had made an opening and built a house where Mr. E. Moody now resides—a Mr. Isaac Wilson was living near the site of the Waterbury hotel. Elias Marsh was married and lived, as has been remarked, near the residence of Miss E. Corse. Philip Bartlett, who had married the widow of Mr. Marsh, was living on the Hawley place, now, October, 1867, owned by Mr. H. Carter. The road, which originally ran across the interval near the river, had been opened substantially on the present line of Main street.

Dr. Daniel Bliss, the first physician of the town, and represented as an excellent man, was the first representative.

From about 1793, the town was settled very rapidly, so that in 1800 it had 644 inhabitants, having gained 551 in the previous 9 years. Among those who came into the town during this period, were Dea. Asaph Allen and Mr. David Austin, both coming in 1796. Dea. Allen was a native of Bernardstown, Mass. He settled on the stream a little east of the Centre, where Mr. Demeritt now lives, where he spent the remainder of his long life, being one of the first to settle in that part of the town. Mr. Austin came from Connecticut, and settled on the place now owned by Mrs. Job Dillingham. Previous to this time, though the town had been settled more than 10 years, and the inhabitants had now become quite numerous, there had been no regular meetings on the Sabbath; indeed, no meetings at all, except as a missionary or minister passing through might preach an occasional sermon. These two men, having had their discipline in the straight and orderly ways of Connecticut and Western Massachusetts, could not consent to live and bring up their families in this semi-heathen way. They immediately set themselves to work, in connection with a few others of like mind, and soon established regular meetings on the Sabbath, and from that time, so far as I can learn, there has been no interruption of public worship on the Sabbath to the present day.

In the year 1800, in connection with the labors of Rev. Jedediah Bushnell, then a Missionary from Connecticut, subsequently for many years pastor of the Congregational church in Cornwall, Vt., and of others, occurred the first general revival in town. As the result of this and at nearly the same time, the Congregationalists, Baptists and Methodists organized churches. The Congregational church was organized by Mr. Bushnell, July 10th, 1801. Not far from that time, probably a little earlier, Gov. Butler was ordained as a gospel minister and chosen pastor of the Baptist church. As the early records of that church and also of the Methodist church are not to be found, little can now be learned of their early history.* At the organization of the Congregational church, the following persons constituted its members: Asaph Allen, David Austin, Hugh Blair, Edward Bates, Moses Bates, David Town, Amos Slate, Samuel Slate, Thomas Kennan, Zebulon Allen, Mary Austin, Jane Blair, Ruth Rich, Lydia Town, Esther Slate and Bathsheba Slate,—10 males and 6 females. Thomas Kennan and David Town were received on profession and were baptized. The organization was completed by choosing Asaph Allan moderator, and Thomas Kennan clerk. In November following, Mr. Allen, who had been a deacon in his native town, was elected the first deacon of the church, and in December David Austin was elected as the second deacon.

December 22, 1802, the church voted to call Rev. Jonathan Hovey to settle over them in the gospel ministry. On account of certain difficulties raised by the town with reference to the minister's right of land, Mr. Hovey was not ordained until September 1, 1803. Mr. Lyman of Brookfield preached the sermon, the services being held in a building erected for a county grammar school, and which stood a little back of the Congregational church. Mr. Hovey labored with the church, before and after his ordination, about 5 years. He was dismissed for want of adequate support, Dec. 31, 1807. Mr. Hovey was born in Mansfield, Ct., 1756. His first profession was the law, which he practiced a while in his native town and then in Randolph, Vt. He was nearly 40 years old when he entered the ministry. His first settlement was at Waterbury. After leaving Waterbury he was settled in Piermont, N. H., where he remained until 1817; his last labors were in Wolcott, N. Y., where he died in 1827, aged 71 years. He possessed a clear, strong mind, —was more remarkable for sternness and rigor, than for benignity and affability,— had more power to convince than to win,—to gain respect than affection. While in Waterbury, he lived mainly in the Kneeland district in the house where Mr. A. Murray now resides, which house he built. His meetings were alternately in his own neighborhood, in barns and private houses and in the school-house at the Street, or "at the River," as the village was then termed. From the dismissal of Mr. Hovey, for the space of 18 years, the Congregational church was destitute of a pastor and of the stated preaching of the gospel. During this time, meetings were regularly held on the Sabbath, Dea. Allen taking the charge and Gen. Peck, a prominent citizen of the town, father of the late Hon. L. B. Peck, ordinarily reading the sermons. Thus the fire was kept alive on the altar through all those long dreary years, until a better day dawned.

In 1802, the first successful merchant of Waterbury, Mr. Amasa Pride, established himself in the place and opened a store. A Mr. Farnsworth and a Mr. Yeomans, the latter from Alstead, N. H., and who died in this place in 1803 or 4, had opened small stores, but had done little business. Mr. Pride was a native of Newington, Ct., but was then from Brookfield, Vt. He was a young man almost destitute of means; but by his good sense, energy, enterprise and integrity, he became for wealth, character, public spirit and influence, a leading man in the community. He outlived for many years nearly all his associates, and died August, 1872, aged 86 years. In 1805, Dan Carpenter, a young lawyer from Norwich, opened the first law-office in town. Mr. Carpenter immediately became a prominent citizen in the town and a leading lawyer and a prominent man in all the region. He was identified with the history of the village and town for nearly 50 years. There was hardly an honor which his fellow citizens could bestow or a trust they could repose, which he did not receive at their hands. For 14 or 15 years he represented the town in the legislature, and for many years was a judge of the County court. Judge Carpenter died December, 1852, aged 77 years.

About the same time that Judge Carpenter came, Mr. Roswell and Mr. Cephas Wells took up their residence in town, and were numbered among its valuable citizens. About the same time Mr. Paul Dillingham, father of Gov. Dillingham, settled near the Center. (8) But time would fail in mentioning names worthy of record. At this time the town was settled, more or less, through nearly its whole extent. Mr. Bickford was the first settler on Indian Hill, followed soon after by Mr. Isaac Parker, father of Dea. E. Parker. Mr. Silas Loomis was the first on Loomis Hill. He commenced where his son Elam now lives, in 1797, having resided in the south part of the town one season previous. (9)

The first school house was built at a very early day, and stood near where the railroad crosses Stowe Street,—and in this house nearly all the meetings of the Village were held.—About 1801, a building for a County grammar school, to which allusion has been made, was put up and covered,—the expense being defrayed by private subscription;—but the town declining to do anything, as a town, to aid in its completion, the building was sold, moved across the street and turned into a hotel, which was subsequently burned. Regarded from our present point of view, the action of the town in refusing to aid this enterprise, whatever may have been its immediate cause, was most unfortunate. The influence for good upon all the best interests of the town, which such a school as was contemplated would have had, can hardly be overestimated. From nothing has the town suffered more, for the last 40 years, than from the want of such a school. It is now its great imperative want. Surely, in its short sighted action, the town knew not what it did—what a power for good it was putting from it.

The first school taught in town was a private school, taught by the daughters of Mr. Reuben Wells. They were very small in stature, and though young ladies, were sometimes mistaken, by strangers, for children, of which amusing incidents are told. Their father was the first tanner in town. Seth Chandler, brother-in-law of

Dr. Bliss, was the first blacksmith; he lived near the present residence of C. Haskins, and was killed by the fall of a tree, while clearing land near his house. A Mr. Warren, grand-father of Rev. Daniel Warren, is said to have done the first carpenter work in town. A grist and saw-mill were put up about 1792, by Mr. John Carpenter, from New Milford, Ct., Mr. Munson, Mr. Cady, and Mr. Knapp doing the work. Mr. Mason was the first miller. These mills were on or very near the site of the saw-mill in Mill Village. Polly Butler, eldest daughter of Gov. Butler, born Oct. 23, 1788, was doubtless the first person born in town. The first male child was probably Tilman Wright, who died in 1842. The first marriage was that of Mr. Philip Bartlett and Mrs. Marsh. Dr. Seth Cole, who so long practiced in Richmond, was the second physician in town.* Richard Holden, Caleb Munson and E. Butler were the first selectmen—Caleb Munson first treasurer—Elias Marsh first constable—Phineas Waters first highway surveyor and fence viewer.

It is a remarkable fact in the history of the town that it had no meeting-house until 1824. Considering the importance and population of the town, and the fact that 3 churches, with such fair promise, were organized so early, probably a parallel to it cannot be found in the State. Ordinarily in the history of New England towns, one of the earliest facts recorded is that of building a house for the worship of God. The history of Waterbury in this respect is peculiar. For 40 years after the settlement of the town, and for 23 after the organization of its 3 churches, the Ark of God had no resting-place. The meetings were held in school-houses, private houses and barns. Several efforts were made to build a union house, and committees were appointed to locate it. Twice the stake was stuck—once on the brow of the hill near Lucius Marshall's; once near the east store at the Centre—but for some cause, both projects fell through.

On a certain day in the spring of 1823, Judge Carpenter and Mr. Pride met, and their conversation turned upon the matter of a meeting-house. They had taken active parts in the previous undertakings, and felt that it was a great reproach to the town and a sad detriment that it had no place for public worship; they resolved that it should be so no longer, though neither of them, then, was a professor of religion. That day they laid the matter before their neighbor, Roswell Wells, and found from him a hearty response, and before the day closed, these three men had combined together, and the matter of building a meeting-house was settled. If need be, they had resolved to do it at their own expense (10).

The house was erected and finished in 1824, and was dedicated to the worship of God near the close of that year, Mr. Chandler, of Waitsfield, preaching the sermon.

The building of this house marks an era in the history of the Congregational church and of the town. All honor to the memory of the men who set the work forward, and with resolute hearts and open hands carried it to completion.

The house thus built was not long unoccupied. Soon after its dedication, a young man, just graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary, stopped for the night at the hotel, then kept by Mr. Pride. Learning that Rev. Mr. Blodgett, of Jericho, with whom he had been acquainted, was to preach on the ensuing Sabbath, he concluded to stop and hear him. Mr. Blodgett did not come, and the young man was asked to supply the pulpit. He consented, and thus the Rev. Daniel Warren preached his first sermon, and began his 13 years' work in Waterbury. All were pleased. He was asked to remain, and in a few months he had a unanimous call to settle over them, and was ordained pastor of the church Dec. 7, 1825. From that period everything has worn a new aspect in town. Mr. Warren was dismissed June 26, 1838 (11). There were two revivals during his ministry, extending through the town—one in 1826-'7; the other in 1835-'6 (12). In 1832 and 1833, the Baptists and Methodists built meeting-houses at the Center. During this period, in 1836, the Methodist church at the village was organized. Their house of worship was erected in 1841. The Free-Will Baptists built their house on Waterbury river 5 or 6 years later.

With the building of the houses of worship we cease to have to do with early settlement and settlers of Waterbury, and the work we proposed is done. I have spoken of the sufferings of the first settler and his family. They were peculiar, but all the early settlers endured hardships difficult for us to conceive. The labor of clearing the forests from the hills and meadows, now so smooth and easily tilled, was immense. Their houses were rude log-cabins, often with hewn plank floors and windows equally primitive; their furniture was the rudest and scantiest. Their roads were rough, unwrought paths, the natural obstacles very great. They had no mills; the nearest for several years were in Jericho, some 15 miles away, to which often they carried their grists on their backs. Much of the corn used was ground in what were called plumping-mills, a contrivance made by burning and cutting a hole into a solid stump, and pounding it there with a weight attached to a spring pole, arranged after the fashion of a well-sweep. At the close of the day, it is said, the sound of these mills could often be heard through the whole settlement, preparing for the meals of the coming day. Their food always was the plainest and simplest; often for the want of this with their large families they suffered exceedingly.

As from year to year, with glad, if not thankful hearts, we come around the festive board, it may interest us and do us good to know how the first Thanksgiving was kept in Waterbury. On that day, 1786, the year that Mr. Butler moved into town, he called on Mr. Marsh, and said to him, "This is Thanksgiving day; how shall we keep it?" Mr. Marsh, in his wilderness life, had lost the run of such days, and this was news to him. He replied that his family were almost destitute of food, and he was in a sad condition to keep such a day. Mr. Butler proposed that they try their fortune at moose-hunting. For such an enterprise Mr. Marsh was always ready. After a few hours' hunt, a moose was found cropping the wild grass near Alder brook, the stream that runs from the Center and empties into Waterbury river. He was quickly dispatched, and each with a quarter on his shoulder made haste to his home, and that night, with their households, they ate a most bounteous, joyful Thanksgiving supper. With all our abundance and variety in our pleasant, cheerful homes, it is doubtful whether this day has ever been kept, with truer joy or more unfeigned thankfulness, than in these log-cabins, on this moose meat, it was first kept by these hardy pioneers of the wilderness.

Amid countless hardships and privations the first settlers laid the foundations of this community. It was not all done as we could have wished—not all with the wisest forecast of the future. But they did, nevertheless, a great and stern work; into that work we have entered. They sowed, often in sadness; we reap in joy. Their work is done; ours is yet on our hands. These hills and these valleys, the fertile soil of which they laid open to the sun, with the river that winds among them and the grand settings of the mountains, were beautiful to them. They are beautiful, exceedingly beautiful to us. Verily the lines are fallen to us in pleasant places. We have a goodly heritage. As we consider the days of old, and talk of the years of ancient times, and of what our fathers did, let it be our purpose, our high resolve, by fostering every worthy interest and enterprise, and by the exercise of every manly and Christian virtue, to transmit the heritage we have received, enhanced and beautified with every excellence, to the generations to come. The task God has given us will be quickly done. Let us do it with fidelity, that God may be honored, the community benefited, and our names held in affectionate remembrance.

[Mr. Parker's excellent little pamphlet is still extant. We obtained a fresh one (complimentary), from Russell Butler, Esq., but this week.—ED.]

MR. JANES' PAPER.

[The following supplementary to and continuation of Mr. Parker's "Early History" was written principally by the late Hon. H. F. Janes, by request, about the year 1872, and consequently cannot apply to the last decade of our town's history which since the death of Mr. Janes must be supplied by others. R. BUTLER.]

In February, 1867, the Rev. C. C. Parker, pastor of the Congregational church, delivered an interesting discourse to his society on the early history of Waterbury, in which the hardships and the privations of the pioneers, who penetrated so far into the wilderness, and successfully opened a way for the advance of civilization, was graphically delineated. It did not, however, purport to be a complete history of the town. It is much to be regretted that he could not have completed the work, but on account of his removal from the State and his duties as a minister of the gospel, he could not with propriety undertake the task of finishing the work so ably begun; thus leaving with others, less competent, the duty of adding a few things deemed necessary for a more full history of the place.

The town of Waterbury is pleasantly situated in the valley between the Green Mountain range on the west and a spur of that mountain called the Hog Backs, on the east, and embraces nearly all the settleable land between those two elevations. There is not a lot of land but that is or may be profitably cultivated, and the soil on the upland is excellent for grazing and grain. The extensive intervals on the Winooski and other streams are not surpassed by any in the State. The rivers and their tributaries afford privileges for numerous mills and manufactories, and an abundance of water for domestic and agricultural purposes. It is in lat. 44° 23' and long. 4° 17', bounded N. by Stowe, E. by Middlesex, S. by the Winooski River, which separates it from Duxbury and part of Moretown, and W. by Bolton, and is 12 miles west from Montpelier and 24 S. E. from Burlington.

The charter is dated June 7, 1763, and was granted by Gov. Wentworth of New Hampshire, to Joseph Abbott, John Dickinson, Hezekiah Thompson, Joseph Osborn, James Scudder, James Corey, Nathl. Salmon, Daniel Lacey, Jonathan Stiles, Prtridge Thatcher, Daniel Bedford, Isaac Ball, Lopher Squire, John Marsh, 3d, Isaac Woodrough, Wm. Connet, Nathl. Wade, James Osborn, Samuel Ballard, Hon. James Neven, Esq., Benj. Williams, Ezekiel Worthen, Barnardus Van Neste, David Meeker, Jr., Heron Ball, John Boyles, John Mills, John Stiles, Esq., W. Pierson, Nathl. Bond, Esq., Meseck Ware, Esq., Ichabod Dean, Joseph Badgeley, Joseph Neomoseck, Esq., David Ball, John Page, Esq., Willard Mills, Jeremiah Pangborn, David Potter, Ebner Frost, Thomas Gardner, Ebenezer Price, Keneday Vance, Charles Gillhouse, Thomas Miller, Thomas Willis, Nathaniel Potter, Jonathan Crane, Esq., Elias Bedford, Jesse Clark, Therry Baker, Joseph Meeker, David Baker, Wm. Pierson, Jr., Jesse Morse, Nathl. Baker, Job Nixon, Joseph Crane, William Wilcox, Jeremiah Mulford, David Baker, James Puffasey, Manning Fores, and Jonathan Dayton.

The charter limits were 6 miles square, containing 23,040 acres, but it has since been considerably enlarged by territory annexed from Middlesex on the east and Bolton on the west; was laid out and surveyed in three divisions. The 1st division lots contained 100 acres, the 2d, 31, and the 3d, 124; leaving undivided, 47 acres to each right. The intention of the proprietors evidently was to give each share 31 acres of interval on the Winooski river, and for that purpose commenced the survey of the first division, on what then was supposed to be the east line of Bolton, far enough north to leave on the river side of the base line of that division sufficient land for that object. But afterwards, on running out the 2d division, it was found insufficient, and the balance of the small lots was laid in the central part of the town. The 3d division was laid north of the 1st, extending nearly to Stowe line. The Governor's right of 500 acres was surveyed in the S. E. corner of the town. Part of the undivided was situated between the 3d division and the south line of Stowe, and the balance adjoined the Governor's right. Subsequently it was ascertained that the surveyor of the 1st division made a mistake in his starting point, and run the width of two lots in Middlesex. The error was corrected, and these lots were subsequently plotted on the true line of Bolton. Winooski Falls are on this territory, but as they were then supposed to be in Bolton, they were called Bolton Falls, a name they still retain in many historical publications, though situated some distance within the geographical boundaries of Waterbury.

FORMATION OF THE VALLEYS—LAND SURFACE, GEOLOGY.

Judge Thompson, in his history of Montpelier, with much plausibility maintains that at a time not very remote the altitude of Lake Champlain was considerably higher than at present. "That there was a branch lake extending from Middlesex Narrows upwards, covering all the lowlands of that and the surrounding towns, and that there was an intermediate lake, covering the lower grounds of Waterbury, parts of those of Duxbury, Middlesex and Moretown, and settling up the valley of Mad river into Waitsfield, making this lake at Waterbury somewhat deeper than the one above, as may, indeed, be found indicated by the greater height of the sand-hills east of Waterbury village." Without entering into the speculations of geologists and others on that subject, it may with seeming propriety here be stated some "testimony of the rocks," tending strongly to establish the theory of Mr. Thompson. In many places, high up on ledges, are grooves or indentations, evidently made by the action of water. They all are on the western dip of the ledges, are regular in cut and very smooth. But a case more striking and almost irresistible in proof is that of a pot hole in the solid rock, some hundred feet above the bed of the river, on the sharp ridge of a high ledge, directly in the line of the farms of S. Henry and H. F. Janes. This excavation is round and regular in shape, is 30 inches deep, and nearly the same in diameter, and so like a cooking utensil that it is often called the "Indians' Pot." The ledge on the western side is nearly perpendicular, and at its base stands an ash tree, 40 to 50 feet high, the top of which does not reach to this excavation. In ages past there must have been at this place a great rush of water and splendid falls.

Not many townships in Vermont are so peculiar in formation as Waterbury. The central part and more than half of the entire surface is comparatively level; a little dishing,—on the east and western borders rising gradually, and resembling in profile an amphitheater. The farms on these elevations afford a fair view of nearly the whole town, presenting a landscape beautiful and charming, especially in early summer when the fields are fresh and in bloom, and in autumn when ripe and "white unto the harvest."

With few exceptions, the geological formations are not dissimilar to surrounding towns. Pres. Hitchcock, State geologist, in his report of October, 1859, states that "there are out-crops of copper, but that they have not been fully developed by mining, but thinks it not improbable that mines in the town may become sources of wealth from the amount of copper obtained therefrom." He also states that "there are several small deposits of soapstone, but none sufficiently extensive to induce a great investment of capital to work them." In the same report interesting facts are given in relation to the alluvial terraces upon the Winooski and other streams. When making the railroad through the Hog Backs, some exceedingly handsome specimens of quartz crystals were found imbedded in the rocks near the dividing line between this and the town of Middlesex. Probably more could be obtained by a small outlay in blasting the ledge.

RIVERS AND STREAMS.

Winooski River, the largest stream and the southern boundary of the town, has a smooth current from Middlesex narrows to the falls three miles below the village. In Thompson's Gazetteer of Vermont, the following description of the falls and the place is given: "The stream has worn a channel through the rocks, which in times past, undoubtedly formed a cataract of no ordinary height below, and a considerable lake above. The chasm is at present about 100 feet wide and nearly as deep. On one side the rocks are nearly perpendicular, some of which have fallen across the bed of the stream in such a manner as to form a bridge, passable, however, only at low-water. On the same side the rocks which appear to have been loosened and moved by the water, have again rested and become fixed in such a position as to form several caverns or caves—some of which have the appearance of rooms fitted for the convenience of man. Several musket balls and flints were found in the extreme part of this cavern, a few years since, which make it evident that it was known to the early hunters." On the upper section of these falls, Benjamin Palmer, soon after the commencement of settling of the town, constructed a dam across the river and erected a saw-mill; but in a few years they were carried away in a freshet and never rebuilt. The main water power has not yet been brought into use. The place is much visited by admirers of grand scenery.

WATERBURY RIVER, the second in magnitude, has its source in Morrystown, and takes a southerly direction through Stowe and the westerly part of this town, and enters the Winooski about a mile below the village. On this river is much good interval land, several mill privileges, and a number of valuable farms. Upon the borders of this stream and on the surrounding hills, lay the principal hunting ground of the pioneers of the town. There they shot the deer and the moose, and there also they trapped the beaver. The former they killed only out of necessity, their flesh for food, their hides for the making of moccasins and thongs to string their snow shoes. The latter were trapped for their skins,—the fur of beaver, at that time, constituting the only article of traffic which brought its equivalent in cash. They slew no innoxious animal wantonly for mere sport.

The third stream in size, called THATCH-

ERS BRANCH, rises in Stowe, and runs through the town near its center, and falls into the Winooski at the lower end of the village. This stream, though not large, has on it a number of falls affording good mill privileges, most of which are occupied, and a large part of the manufacturing done in town by water-power is on this branch. On it many of the early settlers located, and all the farms by them started in the wilderness are now valuable and in a high state of cultivation.

ALDER BROOK also has its source in Stowe, and runs along the center of the town into the Waterbury River, near the Free Will Baptist meeting-house. On it, Stephen Jones, one of the early settlers, built a saw-mill more than 50 years ago. The falls are rather picturesque. Leander Hutchins formerly had a starch factory here. The ownership of the saw-mill was changed from time to time, but continued up to the present. The road to Stowe crosses the pond just above the mill. The land above the falls is mostly level, good and very handsome; below more uneven, but productive. On the west side of Waterbury River are two streams, on each of which are several mill privileges. Cotton Brook, the upper one, rises on the high land in Bolton, and enters Waterbury River near D. Conant's; on this brook is one saw-mill. The other comes from Ricker mountain, and falls into the river about a mile above Randall's mill; on this brook are two saw-mills.

HUNTERS' STORIES.

Many a winter evening has been made interesting to the young by the stories of the old in the "winter of their years" of the hunting excursions in these then "wild woods," but now "teeming fields," so vivid and lifelike in description, that the listener could but enter into its spirit and see, or seem to see, how carefully and with the utmost secrecy he set his traps for the beaver, even to the washing away his footprints in the sand. How cautiously he wended his way through the tangled woods, his trusty dog close behind (the hunting in those days being still, and not in the noisy chase), peering in all directions for game. How when nearing the more common haunts of the deer, some accidental noise, perhaps, only the breaking of a dry twig, starts him from his lair, but too late for escape, as his first movement was seen by the quick eye of the hunter—a sharp crack of his gun, and the deer fell lifeless.

On one occasion, the hunter became so excited when aiming at a moose, that the report of his rifle was not heeded, and he thought it had missed fire, and in his vexation at the supposed result, was tempted to break the old thing on a tree by which he stood. He was happy, however, on examination, to find that his gun was true as ever, that it did not miss fire, but had done good execution; the moose had received a mortal wound, and expired after running but a few rods.

ROADS.

The town is intersected by a good many roads and cross-roads requiring rather a heavy tax to make and repair, and to build bridges over the various streams. The first road, or rather an apology for one, built through the town, was on the river through the Hog Backs to Middlesex. This, probably, was never traveled with a wheel carriage, but answered for single horses or, perhaps a yoke of oxen, to drag their grain to mill on their primitive drags, rudely constructed out of a crooked crotched tree. That part of this road or pathway lying above the present village was soon discontinued and the travel turned to the other side of the river. As settlers increased, and of necessity obliged to go further back into the woods, paths had to be cut out for their accommodation in various directions. Many of these paths, ultimately, were recognized as highways, though not the most judiciously located for the public to travel. The old hill road was the first made through to the northern settlements, and a long time the only one much traveled to Stowe and on to Lamoyille River. The land on this road is very good, and every lot was taken up and settled upon it at an early day. But in consequence of a far more level one east, and leading through the center village, the hill road now is but little traveled except by those living on it. The road up Waterbury River to Stowe on the path of the old hunters, was made as settlers advanced up the stream. The number of bridges and the gullies occasioned by the strong and rapid current of the river, make this road rather an expensive one to keep in repair. Within a few years past, travel on it, both for business and pleasure, has greatly increased.

HIGHWAY, PLANK ROAD AND RAILROAD.

The most important and most traveled highway through the town is the stage road from the depot in the village by the center to Hydepark. On this the U. S. mail is transported once a day each way, and the numerous excursionists to Mt. Mansfield and other summer resorts, requiring extra stages much of the time. The large amount of merchandise for the towns of Lamoille Co. is mostly freighted over this road. There are branch roads to all parts of the town, and several out of it. One in the east to Stowe, one through the notch to Middlesex, and good farms on each. The roads crossing the Winooski on the two arch bridges, one up to Moretown, one down to Richmond, and one south through Duxbury to Waitsfield, are a good deal traveled, the latter especially, and is second in travel and freight only to the mail route to Hydepark—Morristown, 1882. A few years since, a charter was obtained for a plank-road to Stowe. The stockholders made the road, and it was traveled 2 or 3 years, but it proved unremunerative to the owners, and they surrendered it to the towns. The railroad enters the town on the border of Middlesex, passes through the village, and a mile below, crosses on the long bridge into Duxbury. It is so located that business and intercourse among neighbors is attended with but little inconvenience; the deep cut at the crossing of the Stowe road is bridged, but not so high as to make a hard draft over it. The bridge over Thatcher's branch is elevated sufficiently for an under one for common use. Just below the channel of the river was turned for some distance, at great expense, and a half mile down is the long bridge over which the road leaves the town. The citizens of the place subscribed liberally for stock, but it proved almost an entire loss, except to those owning real estate, which was enhanced in value by the completion of the road.

TURNPIKE, AND WHAT BECAME OF IT.

In the year 1805, the Legislature granted a charter for a turnpike from Montpelier to Burlington. The stock was taken and the road built. It entered the town of Waterbury at the upper end of the village, and thence through the town to Bolton. The great freshet in the summer of 1830, swept away all the bridges on the road and otherwise very much damaged it; so much so that the proprietors hesitated about repairing it, as it never paid large dividends. Thomas and Hezekiah Reed, brothers, and enterprising young men of Montpelier, offered the nominal sum of $10 the share, which cost originally $175. Their offer was accepted; they rebuilt the bridges and put the road in good repair. Before the canal was made, opening a water communication by the way of the Hudson river to Lake Champlain, goods from Boston and other Atlantic towns were nearly all brought to this place with ox or horse-teams, by way of Montpelier, each team drawing but little over half a ton, and requiring from two to three weeks to make a trip. But afterwards, at a cheaper rate, freight took the water route by way of Burlington, throwing a large additional amount of teaming and travel on to the turnpike, rendering it profitable to the Reeds. The Vermont Central Railroad, by its charter, was obligated to pay the owners of the turnpike for their franchise. They compromised, took the turnpike and applied the tolls to its own benefit, but when the cars commenced running, it was abandoned to the towns. The somewhat increased highway taxes of Waterbury were compensated for, however, by having a free road.

EARLY OCCUPIED FARMS.

Much the largest part of business done in the town is farming, the land being well adapted to that purpose, the meadows for growing corn, oats and grass, the upland for wheat and grazing. Within the past 20 or 30 years, agriculture has greatly improved, and many young men who started poor, by industry and good management, have paid for their land, and now have large and valuable farms, are entirely clear from debt, and possess sufficient personal property to support them through life. It has previously been stated that on the rivers and their tributaries are many excellent farms, but little or nothing relating to their location, their present owners, or who began them. A short historical account of a few of the earliest started, can hardly be otherwise than interesting to many, especially to those of an antiquarian cast of mind. On the meadow above the Winooski falls, JOHN CRAIG, about 1788, commenced clearing, and erected a humble residence. In a few years, he sold his possession and moved to Ohio. It was purchased with considerable surrounding land, by Joseph Palmer, an energetic business man, and somewhat noted in his day as a skillful bridge builder. After the death of Palmer, it was divided up, and the three valuable farms now owned by Luther Davis, Joel Remington and Geo. W. Randall were made of this tract of land. On the tract of land above Randall, Stiles Sherman located on coming to town, and resided the remainder of his lifetime, where for many years he kept a house of entertainment for travelers, where he reared a large family of children, and where he died at a ripe old age, much respected. Part of the farm is now owned by his son, Heman Sherman—1870, but the larger part of it by Joseph Thompson.

At the mouth of Waterbury river, on the east side, is the place where Dr. Daniel Bliss, the first physician, and the first representative of the town, resided, and where Seth Chandler, the first blacksmith, had his shop, and where not a long time after, he was killed by the fall of a tree. The farm is now owned by Mr. McAllister. The next east is where Amos Waters commenced as early as 1788. It soon passed into the hands of Sylvester Henry, Esq., deceased. Mr. Henry added considerable land, and at his death it was a large and valuable farm. By will he divided it with his four sons, James M., Sylvester, Jr., Samuel and Luther. Most of it at the present time is owned and occupied by Sylvester.

Adjoining, and within the boundaries of the village, is the old Gov. Butler place, of between 200 and 300 acres, about 130 acres of which constitute the farm of the State Reform School. Seven acres with the old house, the first framed one in the town, is now owned by Mr. Colby, of the United States Navy. Some 4 acres at the mouth of Thatcher's branch, on which stood the surveyor's camp, built as early as 1782, is owned by Russell Butler, the youngest son of Gov. Butler. The balance, with the exception of a few acres of wood land on the northern part, constitute a part of the farm of H. F. Janes.

The tract of land pitched, and a short time occupied by James Marsh, and on which he erected his cabin, has been much divided—part taken for the village cemetery and building purposes. Much so with the Cephas Wells farm. The low and rich meadow, in about equal parts, is owned at the present time by Elisha Moody and Geo. W. Randall.

But a small part of the large farm, so long owned and occupied by the late Amasa Pride, is now in his family. The homestead, and 30 to 40 acres of land, are yet owned by his widow, and Mr. Caldwell, who married the daughter and only surviving child of Mr. Pride. This residence is pleasantly situated directly in front of the depot common.

The large hotel, the railroad buildings, the foundry, several stores, the stage office, a number of mechanic shops and dwelling-houses are on a part of the original farm.

The tract of land on which Gov. Butler and his brother, Asaph, first commenced work in town is in the upper part of the village. The Butlers, after occupying it a short time, gave it up, and it was taken by Richard Holden, who resided on it several years. Holden sold the farm to the late Judge Dan. Carpenter, and Carpenter to Gen. John Peck. By additions and improvement, it was, at the death of Mr. Peck, the largest and most valuable one in town. The administrator of Peck sold the place to D. G. Shipley, recently deceased. The elegant mansion and part of the farm are now owned and occupied by Dr. H. Fales, who married the only daughter of Mr. Shipley. The farm of C. C. Shipley is part of the original. The balance, with the exception of what has been taken for building purposes, is a part of the farm of J. Batchelder. On the large meadow above the village, Caleb Munson, the third settler, made his pitch. He was soon succeeded by Amasa Marshall. Since the death of Mr. Marshall, it has passed through several hands and been much split up. The railroad passes through this meadow. The farm on Thatcher's branch, at the present time owned by Eugene Moody, was begun by Oliver C. Rood. Soon after the first settlement in the town, he came, young, vigorous, and of great physical endurance, and at the time very useful in clearing up land, in building bridges, in making roads, and in the performance of all kinds of work requiring skill and energy,—at an early day built the grist mill afterward rebuilt by W. W. Wells. Rood lived on the farm many years. It passed from him to his son-in-law, Albro Atkins, from Atkins to the late Judge E. S. Newcomb, and from him to the present owner.

JONATHAN WRIGHT, in 1788, on the same stream above the Rood place, built his cabin and cut the first tree on the excellent tract of land he had selected for a farm. Here, himself and his wife resided the remainder of their long lives. Their son, Tilman, said to have been the first male child born in town, succeeded his father in the ownership and occupancy of the farm during his life, and by his administrator it was sold to the Hon. James Green, deceased. It is yet in the family of Mr. Green, and has been much improved. Stephen Guptil's farm was owned and occupied by the late Jared George, probably as far back as 1798. In the barn of Mr. George religious meetings were occasionally held during several years. The good farm of Levi Graves was made up of portions taken from others, and first commenced by the late Samuel Dutton.

It is difficult at this time to ascertain with certainty who was the first beginner on the farm of Harvey Eddy. It is safe to say, however, that it was one of the first started in that part of the town, and has been owned by many different individuals; a long time by David Adams, and by Wm. Eddy, who conveyed it to his son, Harvey Eddy. On it is considerable fertile meadow, and is quite pleasant in location. Some miles further up the branch is situated the handsome and productive farm on which, as before stated, Dea. Asaph Allen, in 1796, began his residence in town. It passed into the hands of his son, Eliakim Allen, who, after occupying several years, conveyed it away, and it is now out of the Allen family.

In town are many more farms nearly or quite as productive as those named. Most of them are on the upland, and were commenced at a later date. For the raising of stock and for dairy business, they yield a profit that ought to be satisfactory to the owners. But few of them are now in the hands of beginners or of their descendants. The only exception, probably, is that of Silas Loomis, yet owned and occupied by his son, Elam Loomis. The Clough place, on what is called Indian Hill, and where Isaac Parker began, is one of the best grazing farms in the vicinity. The farm of Raymond Huse, on Alder brook below the falls, is a valuable one. As early as 1794 or '5, Joseph Fisk began a clearing on the south part, and his son, Benjamin, a while after on the west part of it. West, and adjoining, is the place where Joshua Hill, about 1791, began his farm, and on which he lived many years. Hill kept tavern here some years, when the principal travel north was over the hill road. On this road, near the south line of Waterbury, Colonel George Kennan kept a tavern some years. The buildings are gone, and there is nothing remaining to determine its precise location. Nearly all the farms off from the rivers have large maple orchards, from the sap of which sugar and syrup are made sufficient for family use, and much for exportation.

LAND TITLES.

But little litigation, growing out of original titles, has occurred in this town. It does not appear that any of the grantees or their heirs settled on their lands. But in most cases there is no trouble in tracing titles back to the original proprietors. A few may rest on veddue sales for non-payment of taxes or the statute of limitation: If sold for taxes, they were generally redeemed; one event in redeeming, so brave, that it will bear relating here:

Col. Sumner, of New Hampshire, owned several lots of land which had been sold for taxes, and the time of redemption was nearly out. David H., his son, a lad then about 14 years of age, was furnished with a purse of hard money, put on the back of his trusty old mare, and sent to redeem his land. The distance was some 75 miles, most of the way through woods almost pathless. The boy arrived at Col. Davis', in Montpelier, just as the sun was setting. After baiting his horse, he remounted, and proceeded down the river for Waterbury. It had become dark, and the road or pathway difficult to travel. At the foot of rock bridge, so called (the place described by Mr. Thompson in his history of Montpelier, where Thomas Davis, a boy of 16, so heroically got down the first wagon that entered that town), David's horse suddenly stopped. He could not urge it forward. It was very dark, but carefully looking ahead, he saw a large bear standing erect in the middle of the path. Though courageous, he was frightened. What boy or man would not have been? He considered, however, his safety was in sticking to the back of his trusty mare. The bear, after sufficiently examining them, left for the more thick woods, and his mare then willingly ascended the ledge, and they passed on to the fording place in the river, crossed it, and arrived at Mr. Holden's, the collector, near the middle of the night, and just in time to redeem the land. One hour more would have been too late. This boy lived to a great age, and, as was reasonably expected, became an energetic business man, highly respected, and of much influence.

FLOODS.

There have been but few floods since the settlement, raising the water much above the ordinary spring and fall freshets. That of July, 1830, was much the largest that has occurred. The rain, for nearly two days preceding, fell in torrents, and the adjacent highlands being mostly cleared and turfed with grass, the water flowed into the streams with but little absorption in the soil. The Winooski, with additions from tributaries, accumulated a volume of power sufficient to take in its course large trees, logs, bridges and floating field crops, so obstructing the passage through the falls, causing the water to set back, and forming quite a lake above, all of ten feet higher than any former flood. Most of the streets at this time were under water, which at no other time has occurred. The damage in the aggregate was considerable, but not heavy individually. D. G. Shipley probably suffered the most, having had, in addition to his crops, a barn full of hay carried away, and his meadow injured by detrition of soil. Occasionally the lowest terraces have been overflowed in the summer season by heavy rain; but the fertilizing deposits were equivalent to the waste of the growing crops. Bridges have been carried away at different times, owing rather to want of thoroughness in construction than to the floods. The villages are so elevated that the highest rise of water seldom reach the streets.

SCHOOLS.

The town in its corporate capacity, has never granted any money for the support of schools. In the second warning for the annual March meeting, 1791, there was an article inserted, "To see if the town would take any measures for the promotion of schools." Committee, John Craig, Reuben Wells and Caleb Munson, appointed to divide the town into two districts, for the benefit of schools. At the next meeting held in April of same year, Waterbury River was made the dividing line of the two districts. The only action upon that article at the meeting was to divide the town into two school districts, leaving it to them to manage the subject as they should deem advisable. Subsequently, from time to time, the districts have been divided and sub-divided so that at the present time there are 18 school-districts in town, and as many school-houses. The town has a small fund, or annual income arising from rents on public lands, interest on the U. S. surplus money, and the State school tax, total between $1000 and $1100, which is divided to the several districts, a small amount for each, and necessarily requiring a heavy additional tax for the building of school houses and paying teachers. The district in the principal village has lately established a graded school, and voted a tax of 50 cents on the dollar of their grand list for its support. It is now in operation in a good house, and under competent teachers.

WATERBURY CENTER VILLAGE.

The Village at the Center, divided by Alder brook near the middle, is pleasant and beautiful in all its surroundings. On the north side are several handsome dwellings, the Methodist chapel, in the hall of which town meetings are holden alternate years, 1 store, the district school house, 1 tavern, a blacksmith shop and a few other shops. The Center burying ground is on this side of the stream. On the east side are more private dwellings, all neat and comely in appearance. Also, the Baptist meeting house, of wood in good taste, 1 store, in which the town clerk's office and the Center post office are kept, and two or three mechanic's establishments.

THE GREEN MOUNTAIN SEMINARY,

a Freewill Baptist institution, is located at the Center village, on the east side. It was chartered Oct., 1862, to D. L. Frost and other 12 corporators. The trustees were authorized to confer "degrees on male and female pupils as are usually conferred by the best Colleges, Academies and Seminaries; also, on male pupils a diploma of honor." The corporation had no endowment to start upon, and were under the necessity of relying entirely on private subscriptions for the means to erect their seminary building, and to provide a suitable apparatus. By the energy and perseverance of the trustees, and the liberality of the citizens of the vicinity, they succeeded. It is truly said in their first report that their "Seminary building is one of the finest structures in the State, and surrounded by natural scenery unsurpassed in its magnificence and grandeur. Mount Mansfield, Camel's Hump, and all the spurs of the Green Mountains, from Addison; through Chittenden, Washington and Lamoille counties, stand out in bold relief in full view from the Seminary."

VILLAGES—BUSINESS IN R. R. VILLAGE.

In the town are two large villages and three small ones. Much the largest one is on the Winooski river, nearly midway between Middlesex and Bolton. It is more than a mile in length east and west, and north on the Stowe road; half that distance in width, not including Mill village. Mr. Marsh and Mr. Butler, the first and second settlers, commenced here, and laid the foundation of a community, which, ever since, has had a steady, prosperous and healthy growth. It now (1870), has a population of about 800, and a grand list of $4,000. Has four churches, in each of which are regular services. The largest and first built, in 1824, is the Congregational; the second, of brick, is the Methodist, built in 1841; the third, the Second Advent chapel; the fourth, the Roman Catholic. In this village is Waterbury First National Bank, two hotels, one commodious and handsome, on the site of the one previously burned, owned and kept by W. H. Skinner; the other, owned and occupied by J. Brown. There is also M. E. Smilie's large brick foundry, built by D. Adams on the site of his wooden one, there recently burned; Geo. C. Arms' extensive marble works, and three large brick stores—one on the corner of Stowe and Main street, built by Leander Hutchins, now owned by his son-in-law, C. N. Arms, and occupied by Wyman and Smith, merchants. The other two are on the opposite side of Main street—one erected by Wm. Carpenter, in which two of his sons are dealing in crockery.

BUSINESS FIRMS.—"Ready-made clothing, medicines, &c.," Geo. W. Kennedy's office and the village library are in this store.

A three-story building, erected by the late A. S. Richardson, owned by Clough and Randall. In it is the law office of Palmer and Clough, a tailor's and jeweler's shops; a grocery in the basement, and a family living in the upper part.

The large wooden block on the corner, opposite C. N. Arms' brick store; built by I. G. Stimson (the larger part), and C. Graves, on the foundation of Stimson's store burned a few months before. The part of the block built by Stimson, owned by L. H. Haines, contains the store of Richardson and Fullerton, of Arms and Haines, traders in flour, grain, nails, tea, etc.; the post-office, Moody's book and stationary store, and the Young Men's Christian Association reading-room. The part built by Mr. Graves is owned by him, in which he manufactures tinware, and has a stove and hardware store.

On the other side of the street is the cabinet-shop of George W. Atherton, the fine store of M. M. Knight, rebuilt a few years since by J. B. Christy on the same spot where stood his former one, there recently burned; the furniture shop of A. A. Atherton and Son; in the same building the groceries of F. Taylor and W. Ashley; and adjoining, the apothecary store of Frink and Remington.

Brown and Atkins, successors of I. C. and S. Brown, wholesale and retail dealers in grain, general groceries, etc., are doing an extensive business near the depot [Arms & Haines, successors].

MANUFACTORIES.

The village has a supply of such mechanics as are commonly found in country towns. L. Parmely, on Main Street, opposite of the bank, for a number of years has been engaged in the shoe trade; and Geo. W. Lease in harness-making. Waterbury Manufacturing Co., successors of Case & Thomas, is opposite of the State Reform School. It was incorporated in 1869, with a working capital of $30,000. The business of the company is mostly making cane-seated chairs, doors, window-sash and blinds. They also do a large amount of planing, wood-turning and scroll-sawing. They employ about 30 hands, and occasionally a number of the Reform School [1870] boys in addition. The Company deal to some extent in pine lumber.

MILL VILLAGE

took its name from its being the location of the first grist and saw-mills built in town. It is situated on the Stowe road, at the lower falls on Thatcher's Branch. There is here, within the distance of a fourth of a mile, a succession of falls, affording three good mill privileges, all of which are occupied. At the first is the large brick grist-mill, built a few years since by the late Wm. W. Wells, Esq., and now owned by his heirs. It stands on or near the spot of the one built in 1792. It has always done a large custom business. A few rods up stream, A. H. Selleck & Co. have a woolen factory, where they card wool and manufacture to some extent. They have recently put in machinery for turning small boxes. At this place were the first clothing works in town; owned and operated by sundry individuals and companies; at a very early day by Jotham Robbins, subsequently a short time by JARED PERKINS, who became a Methodist preacher, a presiding elder and member of Congress from New Hampshire. Since Perkins, by Thomas and Thompson, by Thompson, Seabury and Blanchard, and others constantly until it came into the hands of the Sellecks.

A short distance above the factory, is the saw-mill and mechanics shop owned by N. A. Rhoades. There has been at this place a saw-mill ever since the first settlement of the town. Over 40 years ago, P. Brown, a tanner, built at these falls a mill for grinding bark, and put in a few vats for tanning, in connection with his principal yard in the other village. Here, too, Thomas, Thompson and Seabury formerly had a woolen factory, burned some years past and never rebuilt.

At the south end of Mill Village on the west side of the stream, Samuel Dutton many years since started a tannery on a small scale, intended principally for his own convenience in his trade as shoemaker. It passed from him to his sons, Thomas, David, and Harper, and from them to Wm. W. Wells, who greatly enlarged and improved the works; Wells sold to R. Blush, and in a few years, while owned by Blush, the works were burned. The real estate and few out-buildings not consumed by fire, were purchased by Sylvester Henry, who, with his son, rebuilt on the old site extensive works, making it one of the largest and best establishments of the kind in the State. The tannery is rented for a term of years by C. C. Warren, who works it mostly by steam, and in the amount of tanning he is exceeded by few, and by none with the same number of hands employed, in the State of Vermont.

COLBYVILLE is in the same school district as Mill Village, the school-house being midway between the two. This village is sufficiently elevated to give a fine surrounding view, and is really a pleasant location. On the lower fall, Enoch Bean, near the beginning of the present century, put in operation a carding-machine, and a number of years carded the wool for nearly all the people in this and the surrounding towns. About the same time, O. C. Rood put up here a potato whisky distillery, and run it as long as self interest or a true sense of moral propriety, in his judgment, rendered it advisable. In 1855, E. P. Butler and E. Parker purchased the place, and on the same falls erected a factory and commenced making starch from potatoes. On the upper falls Mr. Butler built a saw-mill, which to the present time has been in operation. Grow Butler, son of the owner, was drowned in the flume of the mill while helping his father in making some repairs, and George Rood, son of O. C. Rood, was instantly killed here by a log rolling on him when unloading a sled. After Butler and Parker discontinued making starch, the building was used by S. S. Spicer as a tannery, but only for a short time, as it was soon burned and tanning never resumed here. The village at this time has about a dozen dwelling-houses and a few mechanics' shops. The beautiful mansion of George J. Colby, probably is the best arranged and most tasteful in finish of any one, outside of Montpelier, within in the county. But what gave name and prominence to the village was the manufacturing establishment of Colby Brothers and Co.

The business of the Colby Brothers, established in 1857, in its various branches embracing the growing and peeling of willows, and the manufacturing them into various useful wares; the making of the machines for peeling, and also clothes wringers. Children's cabs, etc., in all the branches of their business, was a new enterprise for this part of the country, and is entitled to special notice, for its important effect on the prosperity of the place for several years. But for a material financial error involved in an expensive lawsuit, and the unequal railroad exactions for freight, this business might have continued to contribute to the prosperity and welfare of the town.

Colby Brothers & Co., manufacturers of children's carriages, velocipedes and Colby's patent wringers, afford an example of what may be done by persistent effort and enterprise, with little capital or encouragement.

In 1856, the older brothers, George J. and Edwin A. Colby, came from Bolton and purchased a shop and about 30 acres of land, on which 2 or 3 acres of willows had been planted by Dea. E. Parker, the former owner. The shop was furnished with machinery, and for a year or two the Colbys hired this. The senior brother was 23, and the other 21, and the only business with which they were familiar was farming. They peeled their first crop of willows in 1857, and at once began making custom work and machines invented by George for peeling willows. Next year they employed a first-class willow-worker, Mr. Laudt, who is now a stockholder with them, and began making willow cabs. At first they bought the wheels in Massachusetts, but soon manufactured them themselves.

In 1860, through new partners, the capital was increased to $11,000, and the firm became Howden, Colby & Co. The same year they began the manufacture of clothes wringers, also an invention of the senior brother. These are said to be the first made with frames of galvanized iron, and were almost the first to find extensive sale. In 1864, with additional partners, the capital was increased to $28,000, and the name of the firm was Colby Bros. & Co. 1865, a joint stock company was formed, and the capital increased to $75,000. The firm have now (1871), a capital of $86,000, with 15 buildings, extending over 40,000 sq. ft. Besides, the Company have purchased and built some dozen houses for dwellings. Over $50,000 of the capital is employed in the cab manufacture, and about $30,000 in making wringers. About 50 hands are required on the cabs, which have a market value of nearly $100,000, and vary in price from $3 to $100. They go to all parts of this country and to foreign lands, and are not surpassed in beauty of finish and in durability.

FIRE DISTRICT.

In 1855, the selectmen, on application of the required number of freeholders, laid out a fire district of a square mile, comprising most of the River Village and a part of Mill Village; organized Aug. 14. Before this, there had been no systematic organization of a fire department in the place. The citizens had voluntarily associated, and by subscription purchased a medium sized engine and a limited supply of hose. This engine not being sufficient, directly after the great fire of 1858, the district voted a tax of 100 per cent. on their grand list, and purchased, at the cost of $1500, exclusive of hose, a second and larger one. The district has 2 engines, about 1000 feet of hose, and a fire company of 50 men, and the old engine-house being too small, was disposed of and a new one built the past year, [1871] 60 by 40 feet, two-story, with a hall in the upper story, 50 by 40 feet, for lectures, concerts and purposes not inconsistent to good morals. The building with the ground on which it stands, cost $3600.

FIRES.

The first building burned is believed to have been a tan-shop of Cephas Wells, opposite Fireman's Hall. The school-house in the first school district was burned about 1810, and in 1816 the dwelling-house of D. C. Deming.

In the Spring of 1822, the large hotel of Amasa Pride, on the corner of Stowe and Main Street, where Col. Geo. Kennon, at an early day, commenced keeping tavern, was burned. It was a heavy loss to Mr. Pride, but he immediately rebuilt. Sayles Hawley and others succeeded as proprietors. It was kept as a public house until after the building of the railroad.

The tan works of M. and J. H. Lathrop, back of Luther Davis' house, were burned in 1834, never rebuilt; also in 1838, the woolen factory of Thompson and Seabury, in Mill Village, not rebuilt; and none of the foregoing were insured. In 1840, or '41, the large store of J. B. Christy, and in 1856, that of J. G. Stimson, were burned, and both immediately rebuilt. Their losses were partly covered by insurance.

The largest and most destructive fire in town was that of Oct., 1858, at which time was burned the spacious hotel of E. and W. Moody, in one wing of which was the Bank of Waterbury; the stores of Wm. W. Wells, and that of D. M. Knights; the large grocery establishment of I. C. and S. Brown; the stage barns and the livery stables of Bruce and Ladd; and some other less valuable buildings,—whole amount $30,000, but partially insured. The place has since been rebuilt, enlarged and improved.

D. Adams' foundry and the Railroad depot were burned a year or two since, and have been rebuilt, enlarged and greatly improved. There has also been some other fires in different parts of the town of a later date. Two or three old saw-mills, a few dwelling-houses and shops have been burned, but none of great value.

FATAL CASUALTIES

have been numerous. In 1788, James

Marsh, the first settler, was drowned, as see before. In 1806, Seth Chandler was killed by the fall of a tree; later a son of Joel Rice by the kick of a horse; the father of Mr. Rice several years previous had been killed in Claremont, N. H., under circumstances most heartrending. He went out to stir up his burning log-piles, where he was clearing land, and was caught between two logs that held him fast in the burning heap. He succeeded in alarming his wife, but she was unable to extricate him, and he perished in the flames before her eyes.

Lemuel Atherton was killed in moving a building not far from the time of Joel Rice.

In the summer of 1822 Henry Ricker, a young man, was drowned while bathing in the river.

In 1837, George Rood was killed by a log rolling on him while unloading a sled in the mill-yard of E. P. Butler.

Grow Butler was drowned about 1847, in the flume of this mill. Joseph Otis, a man over 70, was killed at Fall's hill a few years since by the upsetting of his wagon loaded with lumber. Ira and George Sherman, father and son, were both killed, but at different times, by railroad trains. W. S. Frink in 1865, was killed by fall of a tree.

Over thirty years ago, the two only children of the late Deacon U. Thomas were killed, one by the kick of a horse, and the other by scalding. Three, all the sons of R. Thorndike, George, the oldest, in the spring of 1868, by fracture of skull while coasting; William and Henry, the other two, both drowned in the spring of 1871, by upsetting a boat. Other accidental deaths have occurred, mostly of children, and so remote as to be indistinctly remembered. A child of Col. H. Peck drowned many years since. A little boy of H. Sherman was scalded, and one of A. Atkins killed by the kick of a horse. Several men and boys not named, also, have been killed by railroad trains, nearly all the employes of the road.

FIRST APPENDIX.

WATERBURY, Vt., March 4, 1867.

Rev. C. C. PARKER, Dear Sir:—We, the undersigned, Citizens of Waterbury, interested in preserving everything that will throw light upon the early History of our Forefathers—everything that will tend to perpetuate the Memories of those Heroic Men—having heard your very able discourse on the Early History of this Town, and wishing to preserve it, for while it rescues from oblivion the works of others, at the same time it shall stand a memento to remind us of your own long and successful labors among us, do hereby request you to prepare it for publication.

H. F. Janes, M. E. Smilie, Paul Dillingham, Erastus Parker, C. N. Arms, E. F. Palmer, William Carpenter, Russell Butler, L. Hutchins, Cecil Graves, Francis Graves, O. W. Drew.

WATERBURY, March 5, 1867.

GENTLEMEN:—The Discourse on the Early History of Waterbury, which you ask for publication, will be put at your disposal. If it shall save from oblivion any important name or event, the main purpose of its preparation will have been answered. It will be an additional gratification, that thus my name will be associated with yours and with the place where so many of the pleasantest years of my life have been spent.

With sincerest regards, I am
Most truly yours,

C. C. PARKER.

Messrs. Janes, Hutchins, Drew, Carpenter, Parker, Dillingham, Arms, Smilie, Palmer, C. Graves, F. Graves, and R. Butler.

NOTE.—The publication of this discourse has been delayed by the author's change of residence and occupation, leaving no time for its revision, till recently; and by the introduction of new matter, which had to be submitted to his approval by correspondence.

(1) The once famous Capt. Joe and his spouse Molly, two Indians of the Coosuck tribe, and of whom Thompson, in his "Civil History of Vt." gives an interesting account, once made a visit or stop of some weeks in this town. This was probably in 1787 or 8, and the place very near where T. Wade now lives. Only two, and those very rude habitations of civilization, existed in town at that period. Joe and Molly called several times, at the cabin of Mr. Butler, for cooking utensils and for some kinds of food, for which they expressed their gratitude. Joe died in Newbury, Vt., in 1819, after having been some years a pensioner of the State.

(2) The fact of tapped maple trees, being found on this hill, is supposed to be the only evidence of Indians having camped here. The trees were not tapped at the season of the year the Royalton raid occurred, which was in October. If the trees were tapped by Indians, it was doubtless at some other, and probably earlier period.

(3) This statement is probably according to the family tradition, but is believed to be incorrect, as Mr. Marsh, a son of the pioneer, some 20 years ago asserted a claim to a large part of this village, founded on this alleged right of his father. But after examination of the records by the lawyers, the claim was abandoned, though at first it caused quite a sensation among the citizens.

(4) The Councilors being elected by general ticket, and the votes for Councilors being counted by committee of the General Assembly, Mr. B. might have acted in the Assembly till the official announcement of his election to the Council—probably not after.

(5) Mr. Sherman was not only one of the worthy pioneers, but was esteemed one of the most enterprising, public-spirited, substantial citizens. Having built a suitable house, and for that time a large one, he opened it as a tavern, and kept it open to entertain travelers, many years. He died at a ripe old age, on the same farm which he took in the state of natural forest, and left in a good state of improvement. By their kind and unwearied attentions to the sick and the needy, Mr. and Mrs. Sherman rendered inestimable services to their widely-dispersed neighbors. Long may they be held in grateful remembrance.

(6) Mr. J. Wright, a brother-in-law of Mr. Sherman, another of the pioneers coming into Waterbury the same year, was one of those sturdy, resolute men of whom not a few followed in the early years of our town. He also was a man of considerable note in his time; lived to an advanced age, and died where he first settled some half century prior. Mr. Sherman and Mr. Wright were the fourth and fifth in the order of time, to seek their fortune and homes for life, in this particular and delightful vale of the Winooski.

(7) Gen. Peck came from Calais, after a short residence there, to Waterbury, but was a native of Massachusetts. His intelligence and good common sense, and his social, genial and dignified manner, soon secured him the esteem of all, as a man the people would honor. Many of the offices of the town were conferred on him. He was twice elected its representative. In 1818, he was elected chief judge of the County court. He was high sheriff several years. In 1818, his name was placed on the general ticket for members of Congress, nominated by the legislative caucus, but, through the powerful but personal opposition of Mr. Van Ness, who supported Ezra Meach, Gen. Peck was defeated. He held the office of assessor of U. S. taxes, an appointment by the U. S. government. As Brig. Gen. of Vt. Militia, he was with his command at the battle of Plattsburgh, Sept. 11, 1814.

He was elected to the State Council in 1826, served through the session of that year, and died December following, aged 55, at Burlington, Mass. Having been to Boston on business, and returning home he was suddenly prostrated by sickness and died before any of his family could see and minister to him. His funeral was attended in Waterbury by a large concourse of people, anxious to testify their respect to the remains of him whom they had honored while living.

(8) Dea. Paul Dillingham, a native of Worcester Co., Mass., born Oct., 1759, served 3½ years in the war of the Revolution, afterwards settled and lived in Shutesbury, Mass., from which town he came to Waterbury, arriving Mar. 5, 1805, and settled a little north-east the Center Village. He continued on the same farm to the time of his death, July, 1848, at the age of nearly 80 years. Dea. D. reared a large family of children, of whom 8 were living when he moved into W. Three sons, Gov. Dillingham, (then in his 6th year,) Holton and Geo. W., are now living. Job, an elder brother, a highly esteemed citizen, and long an exemplary member of the church of which his father was a worthy deacon, and of which his brother George was also deacon at a later period, died Nov., 1866, aged 81 years.

(9) Mr. James Bryant commenced on the farm now owned by Lewis Clark, north-east the Centre Chapel, in 1793; Stephen Jones settling 3 or 4 years later on a lot next north of his. Mr. Geo. Scagel began in 1794, where Noah Robinson resides, and lived there to the time of his death at an advanced age. Capt. Jones also lived to an advanced age. Both these last named were many years influential members of the Methodist church and well known citizens. Mr. Bryant died many years previous.

Joshua Hill, one of the first to settle in town, began on that place long known by his name, probably in 1791; lived there more than 30 years, but moved to another part of the town some years before his death, at a rare old age. Mr. Basford was probably the first to settle on Waterbury river, in that beautiful vale above the mills. He was succeeded by Mr. Calkins, the father of a large family, the most of his children being sons, several of whom built tenements around the mills which were originally built by one of them, Rev. Chas. Calkins. These mills were built about 45 years ago, or about 30 years subsequent to the first saw and grist-mill on Thatcher's brook, (the name by which this stream was known as early as 1795,) on which Mill Village now stands.

About 1802 or 1803, Timothy Clafin, from Croyden, N. H., moved on to the farm north of the Loomis farm, now owned by Geo. Miles. About 1805 or 6, Abel DeWolf, from Conway, Mass., moved on to the farm now owned by Daniel Stevens. In 1807 or 8, Capt. John DeWolf moved on to farm now owned by Alfred Demerit, built a log-house and a very nice framed barn, which is now standing. Daniel H. Nelson made a beginning on the north lot in Waterbury, in 1798. Simeon Woolson commenced on the farm now owned by C. S. Wrisley, next south of the Loomis farm, about 1798. Stanton Frink commenced on the farm where his daughter, Mrs. Smith, now lives, about 1798. David Atkins commenced on the farm now owned in part by Wm. Kneeland, in 1796. Israel Thatcher commenced on the Godfrey place, so called, about the year 1808, and removed to western New York about 1812. There had been a small improvement on the Broderick farm previous to 1808, when Robert Broderick moved there and lived there till Aug., 1866, when he died. Solomon Newcomb moved on to the farm now owned by Joseph Wheeler, Feb., 1809, and lived there till his death in 1845; there were no buildings of any kind on the farm nor any land cleared. Otis Whitney commenced on the Colby place, so called, in 1807 or 8. Robert Parcher commenced on the farm now owned by C. C. Robinson, the first in that region.

(10) The following, mainly copied from attested records, will give the reader a satisfactory understanding of the public proceedings leading to the building of the first meeting-house in Waterbury.

A form of agreement for a building association was drafted by H. F. Janes, Esq., and was signed by 38 substantial citizens—among them were men of various creeds. As the result of this association was important, marking an era in the history of the town, a copy of this agreement and the signatures is given as follows:

"We, the subscribers, inhabitants of Waterbury and vicinity, do hereby voluntarily associate and agree to form a society by the name of Waterbury Meeting House Society, in Waterbury, for the purpose of building a Meeting House in said town of W., according to the first section of an Act entitled an Act for the support of the Gospel, passed Oct. 26, 1798. And it is hereby expressly understood that no tax or assessment is to be imposed on the list of the polls and ratable estate of the persons hereby associating, nor any member of said Society be compelled to pay any more towards the building of said Meeting House than he voluntarily consents to.

In Witness whereof we have hereunto severally set our names.

Dated Waterbury, this 4th day of April, A. D., 1823.

Stiles Sherman, Enoch Bean, Amos Deming, Roswell Wells, Heman Sherman, Sylvester Henry, James Smalley, Henry F. Janes, Samuel Dutton, Amasa Pride, Samuel Parcher, Horace Atkins, William Eddy, Mason Carpenter, Samuel Bryant, Purchis Brown, Nathan T. Barron, Leander Hutchins, David Dutton, Ezra P. Butler, Oliver Strickland, Chas. R. Cleaves, George Atkins, Asa Austin, O. W. Drew, Henry Atkins, Cephas Wells, Jotham Robbins, Avery Sherman, Jesse Calkins, Jason Cady, Jr., Dan Carpenter, O. C. Rood, Warren Murray, James Richardson, Jared George, Sales Hawley, Seth Munson.

WATERBURY, May 5, 1823.

Waterbury Meeting House Society met, agreeable to previous notice, at the School House in the first School District in Waterbury, and proceeded to choose Dan Carpenter, moderator; Henry F. Janes, clerk; and P. Dillingham, Jr., clerk pro tem.

On motion, Henry F. Janes and O. W. Drew were appointed a committee to report By-Laws for the Society by the next meeting of the same.

On motion, Resolved that a Committee of five be appointed to examine the places in contemplation for setting the Meeting House, the sum for which the land can be obtained, to make a plan of a house, the probable expense of building the same and the terms and manner of payment, and make report to this Society at their next meeting.

And on nomination, Amasa Pride, Sylvester Heury, Horace Atkins, Roswell Wells and Dan Carpenter were appointed a Committee for the purpose aforesaid. When on motion voted that this meeting stand adjourned to Thursday, the 15th day of instant May, at this place on 6 o'clock P. M. A true record of the proceedings. Attest, H. F. JANES, Clerk.

At the next meeting of the Society, the Committee reported By-Laws, after designating the name of the Society, the Officers and their duties. Article 6th reads as follows:

The First Congregational Society in the town of Waterbury shall have the right to the use and occupancy of the Meeting House when built, in all cases when wanted by said Society for religious meetings. But when not wanted by said Society for the purpose aforesaid, any other Christian Denomination shall have right to occupy said house for social worship, by making application to some person to be appointed by the Society for that purpose, in said Waterbury, and when more than one denomination shall apply for the use of said house at the same time, the first applying shall have the first right.

Article 7th. The Meeting House shall be opened for Funerals at all times, both on the Sabbath and other days, and the friends of the deceased shall have liberty to invite a minister of any denomination to attend and preach on such funeral occasion as they may think proper. These articles were adopted.

At this meeting, held May 15, 1823, the plan of the house reported by the Committee was adopted; also the location, though that was afterwards changed by general consent.

The terms of payment for pews were also adopted at this meeting, and a vote passed to proceed immediately to the sale, by bidding for choice of pews, the appraised price having been previously affixed to each one on the plan. The names of purchasers were then written on each as sold. At the next meeting of the Society, held June 3d, 1823, Roswell Wells was chosen Treasurer. Voted to choose a committee of three to superintend the building: Amasa Pride, Roswell Wells and Dan Carpenter were chosen said committee. The sale of pews was then proceeded with in the same manner as at the previous meeting. There was another meeting for the sale of pews, June 17, 1823.

After these several sales, five or six pews remained unsold, the appraised value of which amounted to between $280 and $290. These pews the committee took at their appraisal, in addition to those they had individually bought. Mr. Pride deeded the land for site in consideration of $150. He also deeded a piece of land near to this for a mere nominal sum, to enlarge the burying-ground.

After the dedication of the house, Rev. Charles Calkins supplied the pulpit most of the time previous to Mr. Warren's coming into town.

(11) Rev. J. F. Stone was installed Jan. 6, 1839; dismissed June 9, 1847. Rev. A. G. Pease began to labor with the church the first of Aug. 1847; was installed Sept. 5, 1849; dismissed Jan. 26, 1853. Rev. C. C. Parker began his labors the first Sabbath in June, 1853; was installed Jan. 7, 1854; dismissed Jan. 16, 1867, the dismissal taking effect after the second Sabbath in March following.

(12) These were probably the most general and extensive revivals, particularly the last, in the history of the town, and their results, both as respects the number of individuals, and the marked and permanent influence upon the character of the subjects, and their influence on community generally, are widely felt to this day. Different denominations united in frequent meetings in harmony and communion of Christian fellowship, each receiving considerable accessions to their numbers. In the last-mentioned revival the village was chiefly interested, Elders Pier and Foster taking a prominent part in the services of the large meetings held on almost every evening of the week.

METHODIST CHURCH.

This church was organized by Elder Stebbins, it is said, about the year 1800, consisting of the following-named individuals: Thomas Guptil, first class-leader, and wife, John Henderson and wife, Timothy Parcher and wife, John Jones, David Straw and wife, John Hudson and wife, Joseph Fiske & wife and Simcon Woolson & wife. The year following, Stephen Jones and wife, George Scagel (subsequently many years class-leader), and wife, and Lemuel Lyon and wife were added to the class. These last three men were long-time, prominent members. At later periods, Moses Nelson, Nathan Nelson, Samuel Bryant, Benjamin Fiske and others united and became active members. This church has given to the ministry of the denomination four of its young men, two of whom, Orrin Gregg and Araunah Lyon, are now in the ministry; Chester Lyon is not living. In 1836 a new church was formed in the village; among the first and prominent members may be named: John Lathrop, Paul Dillingham, C. C. Arms, Wm. Carpenter, A. A. Atherton and A. S. Richardson.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH,

formed in 1800, was constituted of few members. The following are the names of some of them: Ezra Butler and wife, Mrs. Densmore, Mrs. Silas Loomis. Dea. David Atkins, Edmund Town, Orrin Atkins and Mercy Nelson (afterwards Mrs. Green), Mrs. E. Town, Mrs. Atkins and Mr. Densmore soon after united. At later periods, Deacon Paul Dillingham, Deacon Chester Whitney and Guild Newcomb joined. But in 1819, Aug. 6, the church was re-organized, or a new one formed, consisting of the following-named members: Ezra Butler, pastor; Paul Dillingham and Chester Whitney, deacons; Tryphena Butler, Polly W. Whitney, Anna Peck, Isaac Stevens, Richard Kneeland, Guild Newcomb, E. Town, Robert Broderick, John Atkins, Temperance Atkins, Mercy Green, Mary Hart, Hannah Dillingham, Sally Broderick, Betsey Parcher, Silena Brown. In the year following, 1820, 22 members were added. Among them the names of the following male members appear: Job Dillingham, Seth Town, Isaac Marshall, Jr., Arad Worcester, C. C. P. Crosby and William Smith. The house of worship built in 1832 was removed, and a new one built in 1859 or 1860.

THE FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH was organized about the year 1817 or '18, and included the following named, and perhaps other individuals: Samuel Lord, Deacon Conant, S. Gaskell, Asa Town and wife, Ira Town and wife, Deacon Abner Fuller, John Cotton and wife, and Elisha Town. Elder Bowles took part in the services. Elder Lord was ordained at this time, or soon after, pastor. Elder Lord was born in Barnsted, N. H., 1779; began to preach when quite young in his native town; afterwards moved to Vermont, living several years in Walden, and from that place came to Waterbury in 1811, where he spent the remainder of his life of 70 years. Unassuming in his deportment, he was more desirous of doing good than gaining applause.

THE ADVENT CHURCH

was formed in May, 1858; about 40 united in this organization. The services were conducted by Elder Joshua V. Himes, who had previously held a series of meetings, continuing several weeks, in the hall of the Washington House. The Advent meeting-house was dedicated in the winter of 1859.

 PAPERS FURNISHED BY RUSSELL BUTLER, ESQ.
 LEADING TOPICS FIFTY YEARS AGO.

Upon the review of the events of about half a century ago, we find some remarkable coincidences. Within a very few years before, and subsequent, was a time of extensive religious revivals in many parts of our country and in this town. At about the same time, temperance, anti-slavery, and anti-masonry became subjects of great public interest, and whether these were all kindred in character with the religious movement or not, they all seemed to be supported on the principle of public morals. Each had its period of novelty and excitement, each its time of calm discussion, and each its decline in the public interest. What is most remarkable is their near contemporariness. Perhaps no time in history before or since, have all these subjects simultaneously so deeply engaged the public mind, nor is it probable they will ever again so occupy the public mind of our community, till some generations have passed away and new combinations of circumstances occur. The public mind acting as a whole is subject to the same laws as the individual mind; when it has thoroughly canvassed a subject and formed a deliberate decision, it is disposed to rest in that decision as entirely satisfactory, if no new, valid opposite evidence is adduced. The man who has viewed the temperance or the slavery question in their different aspects, and made his verdict deliberately, does not care to review or pass through his experiences a second time.

R. B.

ANTI-SLAVERY.

The New England Anti-Slavery movement, led by William Lloyd Garrison, was formally organized in Boston, Jan. 6, 1832, and followed by a National Anti-Slavery Society in Philadelphia, December 1833. Anti-slavery principles soon found friends and advocates in Waterbury, and by the circulation of papers and the labors of lecturers, became a strong moral force in the community. The movement was opposed for a time as a disturbing element in politics, though not then a party organization, as it became to some extent, later. As evidence of the zeal and liberality of Waterbury Abolitionists, it may be stated that upon a call of the State Society for pecuniary aid, in 1839, one of the delegates pledged $100 from Waterbury and Duxbury, to be raised within the year. This, was one twentieth of the amount asked from the State, and was the highest sum pledged by any town. When the paper was circulated in Waterbury, two individuals subscribed $100 each, while smaller contributions in both towns increased the sum to nearly $500, more than one-fifth of the entire sum called for. At that time $100 contributed for the sole purpose of helping to create public sentiment in behalf of a philanthropic cause, was a large sum; and the citizens whose liberality deserves mention in a history of these times are Amasa Pride and Erastus Parker. They were men ever ready to help a cause that they believed worthy of support.

All the subscriptions were paid.

ANTI-MASONRY.

After a lapse of 50 years since the origin of Anti-masonry, and 40 years since its disappearance in political discussions, most people of the present time are little acquainted with its history. With no purpose of discussing its merits, or demerits, we cannot as chroniclers of the town do less than to refer to this chapter of its political history, no more to be suppressed or omitted than any other matter equally potent in its influence on the public mind.

Anti-masonry as a question of morals, human rights, or political expediency, had no little influence upon the affairs of its period. So long time has passed, that the reader will wish for some account of its rise, growth and decadence.

Anti-masonry, as known in this century and in this country, originated in Western New York, in the autumn of 1826. It was currently reported in the summer of that year, that William Morgan of Batavia, a brick-layer and stone mason, in conjunction with David C. Miller, a printer of the same place, was about to publish a book disclosing the secrets of the Masonic Order. It was well known that Morgan was a Mason. These reports caused an immediate excitement among the Masons, and an effort was made to suppress the book, first by an unsuccessful attempt to obtain the manuscript. Following this, the printing office took fire in a way indicating the work of an incendiary. Miller was arrested Sept. 12, on a warrant issued by a justice in Le Roy; and on the night of the same day, after 9 o'clock, Morgan disappeared. He has not been seen by family or friends since. Many circumstances of his abduction, and the route over which he was taken, have been proved in courts of justice, but with no positive evidence of his final disposal. The general belief is that no mortal man has seen him alive since the night of Sept. 19, 1826.

When the fact and these circumstances of his abduction became known, the excitement was intense. As there had long been among the uninitiated a sort of mysterious awe of the Order numbering in its ranks so many eminent men, these startling developments, following in close succession, tended still further to increase the mystery. The governor of New York, if not the official head, was of high rank in the Order; and as the investigation proceeded, it was found that most of the important offices of counties and towns were filled by masons. Judges, sheriffs and justices of peace had in a manner control of courts. These disclosures intensified the excitement where it began, and extended it far and wide in other states.

The extent and power of the Anti-Masonic party can hardly be realized by those who have not seen the public mind aroused upon a subject affecting the vital interests of the people.

We have given this summary sketch of the formation of the Anti-Masonic party, avoiding all particulars not essential for an understanding of the public mind. There were suspicions and even charges that the secrets of the order interfered with the purposes of justice. If this were true, the remedy lay in selecting others than Masons to make and administer the laws.

We may presume this to be the fundamental idea of political Anti-Masonry.

If the exclusion of Masons from office were necessary to secure justice in what was known as the Morgan trials, it was thought that similar cases might exist outside of the "infected district" of New York. This principle of excluding Masons from office was naturally denounced as illiberal and proscriptive; but Anti-Masons met this charge with the statement that all parties are in their nature proscriptive. They became powerful in many States, and in our own State and town were dominant for several years. The reader is referred to the history of several northern States from 1828 to 1835; to legislation upon extra judicial oaths; and the action of various Masonic bodies; for the action of the order in this county, to the recent history of Montpelier.

Comparing it with the present condition of masonry, he will wonder at its recuperative power, and find the event worthy his study.

MILLERISM.

About 1839, William Miller, the great preacher of the Second Coming of Christ, delivered a course of lectures in Waterbury. From diligent study of the Scriptures, particularly of Daniel and the Revelations, he became convinced that Christ's second coming and the end of the world would occur in 1843.

Mr. Miller appeared to be a man of extensive reading, at least in matters relating to his subject; and his zeal and apparent candor gave weight to his arguments. The subject was not a new one to careful readers of the Bible; but his presentation of it, with a definite time for its occurrence, was both new and startling. Multitudes flocked to hear him. The train of his reasoning was unusual, and few men were prepared to meet him on ground with which he was so familiar. [Ludlow history has an interesting paper on two of its citizens who took up his challenge for public discussion and met him; see hereafter in the Windsor County Vol.—ED.] Mr. Miller's hearers were numbered by thousands, and he gained many followers. Though the great event predicted so confidently did not occur, his presentation of Adventism did not pass away without influence upon the evangelical churches of that or the present day. Many good church members, shaken in their former faith and disappointed in their expectations, sought a substitute as best they might. Few, if any, lapsed into unbelief, though without doubt the religious views of many were greatly modified. To us, a history of Waterbury would seem incomplete without recognition of the Second Advent movement and its effect.

The preaching and publication of Mr. Miller's views had been so wide-spread, that large numbers of believers were looking for the great event. In Waterbury, scores watched and waited for the second coming of the Lord. We are not surprised at the excitement that attends the burning of a vessel, a theatre, or a city; yet many cannot realize how large numbers of people should be so intensely wrought upon by the expectation of an event of whose approach there were no visible signs. After the lapse of forty years, when nearly all of those who were so moved by Mr. Miller have passed away, many may wonder at the credulity of sensible and intelligent persons who accepted his interpretation of prophecy. It is, however, a matter of history.

LYCEUM AND LIBRARY.

The coming of the Colby family into town was an acquisition to society in other than business relations. The senior brother immediately became interested in planning a lyceum for the entertainment and culture of the young. He was seconded by the active labors of his mother, sister, and brothers. Their efforts resulted in large and enthusiastic gatherings, with many participants in the exercises which were so varied as to sustain a constant interest in their weekly meetings. There were occasional lectures from entertaining and competent speakers; carefully prepared debates, declamations by the youngsters; and most interesting of all, the papers which were supported by contributions from all, and read by ladies.

The lyceum became a complete success, and continued so several years. One or two seasons created such a furore scribendi, and such a demand for reading, that an association was formed, and a selection of books made by a competent committee. About 500 vols. were purchased. At the end of 2 years, the lyceum celebrated its success by a public entertainment and picnic on the banks of the Winooski, marching to the ground in a grand procession, with an array of banners, bearing the assumed names of the principal writers for the paper. Among the exercises was the reading of one of Julia Wallace Hutchins' poems by Rev. C. C. Parker, of blessed memory, not long since passed to his reward of heavenly rest.

The library was increased to over 600 volumes, and for 10 or 12 years was highly esteemed; but after the novelty of the first few years had worn away, the very inexpensiveness of its advantages seemed to diminish its usefulness, since some estimate value only by cost. Yet even now after 25 years, there are several hundred of the books in the care of George W. Kennedy as assistant librarian. This, together with the Agricultural Library, aided by the town or public-spirited individuals, might form the basis of a new one which would be of great value to the town.

This much for the lyceum and library of a quarter of a century ago. The writer feels that their influence on the intelligence and culture of our people should not be forgotten.

[JULIA WALLACE, author of "Earth's Angels," written some 25 or 30 years since, often reprinted, a favorite with the public, is a native of Duxbury, which adjoins Waterbury. The years of her childhood were spent at the paternal home, on an isolated mountain, afar from neighbors, very solitary.

Bred with the elements, in her first poetry—for a Montpelier paper—she sings of sunset skies, "painted and gilded," "the broad arch where starry armies throng"—she tells us what she "loves"—

"The lightning's flash, its dazzling chain
When the black thunder cloud is rent in twain;
The storm's dark drapery in sombre fold
Glittering with sparkles of electric gold.
The vivid flash, the broad bright flash, I love
Showing the earth beneath, the heavens above,
As if the flame-winged messengers of power
Glance on their errands through the tempest-hour."

We heard her recite this old, old poem. We heard her describe this mountain home most graphically a few days since: "No Duxbury house in sight, but over the river, Waterbury village beyond, that looked like a Paradise; Governor Butler's house and farms; Governor Dillingham's residence; the beautiful cemetery; all distinctly seen from our little house on the Duxbury mountain. You must have my "Earth's Angels" for Duxbury,—that belongs to Duxbury, which has her history,—though no one has yet arisen to write it; but there will."

By our author's rule, "Athenwood" belongs to Waterbury. It was written here, read at that old Lyceum so pleasantly described by our venerable historian, Mr. Butler, and we think we must break in on his pages and lay it here at the foot of the old "Lyceum and Library.]"

ATHENWOOD.

A LEGEND OF ST. MINNIE.

Were you ever in Montpellier?
Not that fine old town of France,
But a fair Green Mountain village,
Young for legend or romance.
Brave and hardy are the people
Of our Northern State frontier:
So affirmed a bold invader,*
And the knowledge cost him dear.
Firm in Dore strength and beauty
Stands their Capitol; its dome
Looking down upon a river
Something like the stream of Rome.
Winding through the verdant valley,
Like a shaken silver chain,
Flows the mountain-born Winooski
To the beautiful Champlain.
But we follow not his current,
For the theme will bid us stay
'Mong the hills that nurse his torrent,
Near the Capitol, to-day.
Just across the sparkling river,
Where yon hill-road winds away,
Lightly lifts the graceful elm-tree
Many a slender, waving spray.
Where the tiny song-birds rally,
Chirping from their leafy screen,
And the mountain breezes dally,
Coming down a bright ravine.
There, above the village murmur,
And the din of mill and forge,
Stands an artist's quiet dwelling,
In the green and narrow gorge.
On a sultry day of summer
Sank beneath the wayside tree,
One who sighed, in foreign accent,
"Mary Mother, pity me!"
'Twas a sad and weary woman,
With a child of tender years;
On her feet the soil of travel,
On her face the stain of tears.
Surely she can toll no farther
'Neath the bright, un pitying sky;
But for that sweet, patient infant,
It were well that she should die!
Hers had been a happy bridal
In a distant father-land;
Hers a husband, brave and noble,
Firm, yet gentle, hopeful bland.
Tyranny proclaimed him rebel,
For a patriot heart had he;
They, in want, had fled from peril—
He was buried in the sea.

* Sir John Burgoyne.

In her land of cross and convent,
Sweet Madonna, pale and fair,
Shrine of saint or tomb of martyr,
Whis the stricken soul to prayer.

Now she seems that peaceful cottage—
Gray its walls and sloping eaves—
Lifting up its modest gables,
Carved in pendant oaken leaves;

Rustle poreh, with open portal.
Arched windows, diamond pane—
Sure it bore no slight resemblance
To some humble rural fane.

Was it not a wayside chapel,
Built in form of holy cross?
Was it hermitage? or dwelling?
Long she mused, and much at loss,

Till an organ-tone came swelling
On the silent summer air;
Quick she mounts the rocky terrace,
Lifts her child from stair to stair.

In the softly shaded parlor
Minnie had sat down to play
Hopeful hymns that cheered her husband—
These should while the hours away.

On she played and sang, unheeding
Her who on the threshold stood,
Dreaming of an old cathedral
Far beyond the ocean-flood.

Through the curtain came the sunlight
With a crimson-tinted ray;
So it fell, from storied window,
Where in youth she kneeled to pray.

Near her stood a slender table,
Fair the Parian vase upon't,
Quantly carved from antique sculpture—
Was it not a marble font?

On the walls hung glowing pictures—
"Autumn scenery," richly wrought,
Gracful forms and gentle features—
Not the haloed head she sought.

When the soaring anthem ended,
Timidly she moved to say,
"Lady, please, is it a chapel?
I have need to rest and pray."

Oh, not utterly mistaken
Was that simple, fervent heart;
Less than only Heaven's own altar
Is the shrine of Love and Art.

Minnie placed a couch with pillows,
Offering rest and sweet relief;
Spoke as woman speaks to woman
In her trial-hour of grief.

Bringing food, the cup of water,
Covering for the sunburned child,
Laughed the winsome little creature—
Sweet the wayworn pilgrim smiled.

"Now my weny heart is lighter;
Mary Mother heard my plaint—
If I found no priestly altar,
Surely I've not missed a saint."

BIOGRAPHICAL LETTER FROM A. G. PEASE.

Born at Canaan, Conn., February, 1811; the family moved to Charlotte, Vt. Nov., 1826: My father, Salmon Pease, was born at Norfolk, Conn., June 14, 1783. My mother, Matilda Huntington, was born at Ashford, Conn., Dec. 30, 1780; there were 9 sons and one daughter, four of the sons and the daughter still living. I graduated at the University of Vermont in 1837; at Andover, 1841; ordained and settled at Pittsford, June, 1842; married to Anne Page, daughter of Dea. William Page of Rutland, Oct. 18, 1842; went to Waterbury, July, 1847; installed 1849; went to Norwich, July, 1853; installed January, 1855; I supplied at Poultney and Royalton, from October, 1845, when I left Pittsford, until going to Waterbury. After leaving Waterbury, I preached 3 months by invitation in the first Congregational church in Quincy, Ill.

My health failed the summer of 1855, and I have had no charge since. We have had 5 daughters, of whom 3 are living, and 3 sons, all living.

Rutland, Sept. 17, 1876.

BIOGRAPHICAL LETTER FROM REV. CHAS. CARROLL PARKER.

Was born in Underhill, Sept. 26, 1814; son of Edmond (b. in Richmond, N. H.), son of Reuben, son of Benjamin, son of John, son of John, son of Dea. Thomas Parker, who settled in Reading, Mass., about 1635, where the four preceding were born; name of mother, Hepzibah Curtis, daughter of John Curtis, of Dudley, Mass.; lived with father until nearly twenty-one, working on his and neighboring farms; went to school 3 months in summer from five to nine, and 3 months in winter, from seven to eighteen; began to teach school at nineteen, and taught the 8 following winters; fitted for college at Jericho Academy, Bradford Academy, and under the private instruction of Rev. Samuel Kingsbury, then acting pastor of the Congregational church in Underhill; entered college in 1837; graduated Aug. 4, 1841, with no pecuniary help from first to last; was principal of the boys' high school in Burlington

2 years after graduating; united with Congregational church, Burlington, Jan. 1, 1843; entered Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., fall of 1843, and remained 1 year; was again principal of boys' high school until fall of 1845; was then agent of the University in raising the $50,000 fund until the spring of 1847; resumed study of theology in Burlington, and was licensed to preach the Gospel by Winooski Association at Williston, Oct. 11, 1847; preached my first sermon in native parish at Underhill, first Sabbath in November following; began to preach in Tinmouth in January, 1848; was ordained, and installed pastor of that church October 4th, following.

In the spring of 1853, I received an invitation to preach in Waterbury; was dismissed from the church in Tinmouth, May 18, 1853; was installed pastor of Congregational church in Waterbury, June 7, 1854. In June, 1863, I was elected Corresponding Secretary of Vermont Domestic Missionary Society, but the Council declined to advise my dismissal that I might accept the office. In the fall of 1866, was elected principal of the Ladies' Seminary in Gorham, Me., and was dismissed by Council, Jan. 16, 1867, and accepted the position at Gorham.

In June, 1868, I resigned the place in the seminary, and accepted a call to the pastorate of a Congregational church in Gorham, and was installed Aug. 19, 1868; resigned the pastorate in Gorham, July, 1871, and was dismissed Sept. 22. In Nov. 1871, I received a call to the pastorate of the Congregational church in Orient, L. I.; also to that of the Presbyterian church in Passippamy, N. J., and accepted the latter; was installed by Presbytery of Morris and Orange, Mar. 27, 1872, in which office I still remain (1876).

Was married Nov. 28, 1844, to Elizabeth McNeil Fleming, of Burlington, and have one son and three daughters. My pastoral and ministerial relations have been very pleasant and so remain. I have been a corporator of the University of Vermont since 1862.

REV. JONATHAN COPELAND, was born in Smithville, Chenango Co., N. Y., Feb. 20, 1816; the eldest of 9 children, 4 sons and 5 daughters. His father, David Copeland, was a native of Brooklyn, Conn.; his mother, Martha Shepard, of Pittsfield, Mass. After their marriage, they remained some time in Smithville, then returned to Brooklyn, and soon afterwards became residents of Norwich, Conn., where they lived until 1825, when they removed to Rochester, where they are still living, at a very advanced age. The father, a mason by trade, his family dependent upon his daily toil, was able to give his children but a limited common school education, and the sons were set at work with their father as soon as they were able to use the tools.

Jonathan was converted in his 18th year, and united with the church with which his parents were connected, the Presbyterian, and soon after was impressed to become a minister of the gospel. His father, unable to help him to an education, did not encourage it, but his pastor did, and he laid down his tools to study, resuming them at vacations; and by his trade, teaching school some, and by his musical talent, carried himself through preparation for college, (Union college,) which he entered in 1837, and to the close of his last year in the Theological Seminary, which he entered 3 months before graduating at college. At the end of 2 years in the Seminary, he was licensed to preach by the Cayuga Presbytery, and called to the Presbyterian church in Holley, Orleans Co., N. Y., where he preached his first sermon May 14, 1843, and was installed in November. This large and flourishing field he held 15½ years, when against the wishes of his people, he was dismissed to take charge of the Presbyterian church of Champlain, N. Y., where he was installed Feb., 1859; dismissed Oct., 1866, remained another year. The year previous, 107 new members were added to this church, and this last year there were frequent additions.

In Oct., 1867, he accepted a call from the Congregational church of Waterbury, and soon afterwards removed here. He was twice solicited to be installed pastor, but declined from personal preferences. Though coming from the Presbyterians, among whom he was converted, educated, licensed and installed, and with whom he had labored for more than 20 years, he very readily conformed to Congregational usages, found a pleasant home, cordial relations with the ministers and churches, and ever labored harmoniously and heartily with them; and had Providence so ordered, would have spent his remaining days happily in that connection. While in Waterbury, a parsonage was purchased by the society, the house of worship twice improved and beautified, and the communicants increased; the number being larger, notwithstanding numerous removals, at the close than at the beginning of his labors with the church. He at present resides in Rochester, N. Y., and is regularly employed in preaching in that vicinity.

He was married Jan. 30, 1844, to Kezia, daughter of John and Kezia Clark, of Niskayuna, Schenectady Co., N. Y. They have had three sons, Clark, Edward and William, all now in business, and four daughters, three now living, and their children are all members of the church.

CALKINS FAMILY.

John P. Calkins, of New London, Conn., moved to Canaan, N. H.; and from there came to Waterbury, and settled on the River about 1796. He had 8 sons and 3 daughters. The facts in this notice the writer has from a descendant, who with nearly all of the Calkins name, went to the older Western states, where several have won distinction in educational, professional, and business positions.

Sarah, eldest daughter of the family, married Rev. Thomas Kennan.

Hubbard, the eldest son, died in Ohio, about 40 years ago.

Harris, second son, settled in Waterbury, where he died, leaving two sons and a daughter. The younger son, Dr. Calkins of Boston, and the daughter are living.

Clarissa died in Ohio, at the age of 89.

Charles, born in New London, had 6 children, 5 of whom were living in 1879.

It is from the oldest son that we have the principal facts relating to the family. His father was briefly noticed in Mr. Parker's Early History, as supplying the pulpit of the first meeting-house in Waterbury several months after its dedication, and previous to the coming of Rev. Dr. Warren.

Mr. Calkins died near Cleveland, Ohio, in 1877, aged 94; Mrs. Calkins, who belonged to the New Hampshire family of Gilmans, a few years before her husband, at the age of 86. Charles G. Calkins, the eldest son, has given many interesting details of his own family and that of his sister Eliza, Mrs. Winchester of Detroit, who has 9 grown-up children living. Of his own family, one son has served as an officer in U. S. Navy, another as editor of a daily paper in Covington, Ky. George, the son next younger than Charles, living in 1879, in Elyria, Ohio, blind and deaf, has a son who is a wealthy resident of Cincinnati.

William was a teacher in Waterbury, and we think in Burlington, about 25 years ago. The writer remembers him well. A son of his has long been a prominent citizen of Ticonderoga, N. Y.; another son is a successful lumber merchant.

Charles Gilman Calkins, son of Rev. Charles Calkins, after giving brief notices of each of his father's brothers and sisters (as above related) so far as known to him at the time of his writing, April, 1879, concludes his account, thus: "So there are living, George, aged 92, Jesse 84, and Jedediah 82, and his wife; and but few years ago, Clarisa died aged 89, Charles 94, and my mother 86. Six in all had lived many more years together, or not far separated than is usual in families. Indeed, I have been disposed sometimes to prepare a sketch styling them the Centennial family. The descendants are numerous and far scattered, and I know but few of them recently. They are mainly outside of Congress and of the State prison. The name is becoming numerous and far spread. They all so far as I can learn have many of the traits of our family. Of personal resemblances there have been several striking instances. Longevity, large families, muscular vigor, while there has been a large tendency to clerical and professional occupations."

KENNAN FAMILY.

Among the early settlers we must not omit to notice was the family of George Kennan, whose name appears as one of the town officers as early as 1794, when he served as moderator and selectman, and again in 1797 and 1804, and was justice of the peace many years. His son George was constable in 1802; and selectman in 1809.

Thomas, another son, assisted in the organization of the first Congregational church as clerk of the meeting; afterwards became a minister of that denomination. He married Sarah, eldest daughter of John P. Calkins.

Another son of this family was Jairus, who fell an early victim to his love of knowledge a few years after his graduation in 1804, as a member of the first class of the University of Vermont. At the semi-centennial anniversary of the University in 1854, the late Charles Adams, Esq., of Burlington, paid the following tribute to his memory, in response to the sentiment, "The First Graduating Class of 50 years ago": "There were four of us who graduated fifty years ago. Three are present on this occasion. The joy of our meeting is chastened by the reflection that our other classmate, Jairus Kennan, is no more. He was feeble while in college, and having long struggled with disease, has gone, as we trust, to a higher and a better world. Jairus Kennan was not an ordinary man. He loved knowledge, and nothing could repress his ardor in the pursuit. His intellectual powers were of a high order, and he cultivated them with untiring devotion. He was distinguished for warmth of feeling and kindness of manner, and had he lived, would have taken high rank as a philanthropist. Poor in purse and poorer in health, he was above adverse circumstances, and alone and unaided pursued a quiet course to the highest development of mind and heart. He was a bright example of what energy and ambition may accomplish."

JOSEPH WARREN,

editor of the Buffalo Courier, died—, 18—, in that city, of congestion of the lungs, after an illness of only one day. Mr. Warren was born in Waterbury, July 24, 1829, and graduated at the University of Vermont, in the class of 1851. He immediately entered the profession of journalism, as assistant editor of the Country Gentleman, at Albany, N. Y. In 1853, he became associate editor of the Buffalo Courier, becoming its editor-in-chief in 1858, and retaining that position until his death. Since the death of Dean Richmond, in 1866, Mr. Warren had been the recognized leader of the Democratic party in Erie county, and leader and counsellor of that party in Western New York and the State. Through his efforts the State Asylum for the insane was located at Buffalo, and he served on its board of managers and as chairman of the executive committee till within a month of his death. He was a member of the committee on location of the State Normal School at Buffalo, and a member of the board of trustees. He was one of the projectors of the Buffalo fine arts academy, and was largely interested in the project of the Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia Railroad. He was a former president of the Buffalo Young Men's Association, and a member of the council of the Medical department of the University of Buffalo for the last 6 years. He was president of the New York State Associated Press at the time of his death. He was long a member of Ancient Land Mark Lodge of Masons. He leaves a wife and one son.—Burlington Free Press.

DAN CARPENTER,

(BY HON. PAUL DILLINGHAM.)

son of Simeon Carpenter and Anna Burton, was born in Norwich, Vt., Nov. 21, 1776, where he lived, was educated, studied law, and was admitted to the Bar, in Windsor County, in the spring of 1804. During the summer of that year he came into what is now Washington County, and settled at Waterbury. At that time the towns in Mad River valley together with Duxbury, Waterbury, Stowe and Mansfield belonged to Chittenden County; there was no lawyer in either of them, and none nearer than Williston. Mr. Carpenter's choice was a fortunate one for him, for there had been for several years a growing desire that a reliable lawyer should settle in that vicinity, and he opened his office for business as early as Oct. 1, 1804. He was a sound lawyer—a man of most excellent practical judgment, and he proved almost at once that he was a safe adviser. Having fixed upon Waterbury as his future home, he at once became identified with all its interests, and was soon a leading man in all its affairs. At Norwich, Jan. 27, 1805, he was married to Betsey Partridge, daughter of Elisha Partridge and Margaret Murdock, born Jan. 23, 1783. They commenced housekeeping in the spring following, in a one-storied house, convenient for a small family, and in the year 1815, built and finished the two-story front, where his grandson, Frank Carpenter, now lives. They had 8 children, four of whom died in early infancy—and four lived to be settled in life, one son, William, born Oct. 25, 1805, and three daughters, Sarah P., born May 18, 1807; Eliza, born Dec. 11, 1810, and Julia, born Dec. 3, 1812; Julia, the wife of Paul Dillingham, is now the sole survivor; they were married Sept. 5, 1832. Sarah P. Carpenter Dillingham, died Sept. 20, 1831.

When Mr. Carpenter began business in Waterbury, justice's jurisdiction was only $13; this threw a heavy business on to the County courts, and his income was large for quite a number of years. He had no competition till 1817, when Henry F. Janes came into the town. Mr. Carpenter had a fine person, nearly six feet high, slim, straight as an arrow, and lithe, and graceful in every movement; in manner he was of the old school, respectful, courteous and kind to every one. He rapidly grew into favor, and strong attachments grew up between him and a great porportion of his townsmen. He was a conscientious man, very kind to the poor, and forbearing to his every debtor. The estimation in which he stood in town, county and state, is best evidenced by the following facts: In his town he was chosen town clerk in March, 1808, and held that office by successive elections, (save one year) till 1829, when he declined to hold that office longer. He was first selectman during most of the same years. In 1817, he was chosen representative to the General Assembly, and with the exception of 1818, he represented the town till 1827. In the fall of 1827, he was chosen first assistant judge of Washington County Court, and held that office by successive elections for 8 years, when he declined further service. In 1824, he was one of the State electors of president and vice president, and by his associates was deputed to carry and deliver the votes of the State in the City of Washington. From April, 1823, he had a junior partner in his law business, Paul Dillingham, Jr. The firm was Carpenter & Dillingham, and continued till he became judge, when the business was given to Mr. Dillingham. From 1820, he had a mercantile interest in Waterbury, in company with Charles R. Cleaves. In February, 1824, he purchased Mr. Cleaves' interest in this business, together with all his real estate, and his son William Carpenter, became his partner. During the summer of 1834, they erected the brick store, where his grandson, W. E. Carpenter, now lives and does business. He retired from active business, and devoted the remainder of his life to the care of the property he had accumulated.

He died Dec. 2, 1852. His memory is cherished by many now living. His wife survived him many years, living to the age of 92. William Carpenter died March 17, 1881.

PAPER FROM HON. PAUL DILLINGHAM.

HON. WILLIAM WELLINGTON WELLS, son of Roswell and Pamela White Wells, was born in Waterbury, Oct. 28, 1805, and died at the same place, April 9, 1869. He graduated from the University of Vermont in the class of 1824, and read law in the office of the late Charles Adams, Esq., in Burlington. He was admitted to practice at the Chittenden County Bar, but before he began the practice of his profession (for which he was thought to be particularly well suited both by nature and education,) owing to the death of his father, he was obliged to return to Waterbury and administer the estate of the deceased. He soon became so much interested in business pursuits that he abandoned the idea of a professional life, and identified himself with the interests of both his family and his town. For several years he had a large interest in a prominent dry-goods house in Burlington. He was afterward a member of the firm of Hutchins, Wells & Co., at Waterbury. At the latter place, he also erected a tannery, and for many years carried on an extensive business. Later on, he came into the ownership of the grist-mill just north of Waterbury village, (and near the tannery before mentioned,) and converted it into a first-class flouring mill, when for many years he carried on an extensive business. He also carried on a dry goods store at Waterbury Center, several years.

Wm. H. Wells

Mr. Wells represented Waterbury in the Legislature in 1840, '63 and '64, where he took an active part in legislative matters. He was a member of the Eleventh Council of Censors in 1855, and town treasurer and selectman several years.

He was a valuable member of the community in which he lived. A ripe scholar himself, he was deeply interested in the schools of the town,—feeling that in them was to be acquired such knowledge and discipline as should fit the young for intelligent and useful lives.

He was equally interested in whatever was for the general interests of the town—and in furthering these he was not wont to inquire what his share of the expenditure should be, but rather how much was necessary to effect the purpose, and this much he contributed most gladly.

From his youth up he was a radical temperance man. He was Grand Scribe of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance in Vermont for 8 years, and also Grand Worthy Patriarch of the Sons of Temperance of Vermont for some time. He worked ardently to accomplish every purpose he determined upon, contributing liberally both of time and money to anything of a public nature. He was no office seeker or office shunner, but was careful to honor any office which he held. He was deeply interested in the welfare of the country, and when the late rebellion broke out, and during its continuance, he gave himself almost entirely to the country's service, with an enthusiasm and hopefulness that was an inspiration to all around him. As chairman of the board of selectmen during the greater part, if not all, of its continuance, he was the strongest among the strong. There was no call for soldiers but what was filled promptly. He fully believed that it was for the town's best interest to "pay as it went," and was such a strengthener to the weak, that Waterbury was substantially free from debt at the close of the war.

Mr. Wells lived in the faith that work was honorable, and his whole life conformed to his faith; his boys, too, having been reared in it, have cheerfully and faithfully followed him in his faith and practice.

Mr. Wells was married to Miss Eliza Carpenter, second daughter of Judge Dan Carpenter, Jan. 13, 1831. This choice of a wife was a most fortunate one for him, as his subsequent life demonstrated. They buried two children in infancy, but reared 7 sons and 1 daughter. Four of the sons were engaged more or less in the conflict for the Union, and one of them, William, attained the rank of Brevet Major General of Volunteers. Roswell, the eldest, is in business at Waupun, Wis. William is Collector of Customs for the District of Vermont, residing at Burlington. Curtis is Cashier of the Waterbury National Bank. Edward, Henry and Fred are members of the firm of Wells, Richardson & Co., of Burlington, (wholesale dealers in drugs and medicines). Charles is employed in the Customs Department of the Government, residing at St. Albans, and Sarah C., is the wife of James W. Brock of Montpelier, (1882). During the war and since, these sons of Mr. Wells have demonstrated the great truth that intelligent labor faithfully pursued, wins.

Mr. Wells' impulses were generally working good results. He was an honest man in all his relations to life. Hating dishonesty, despising cant and abhorring hypocrisy, he passed a life which left evidences that our little part of the world was better for his having lived. He died respected by all, and mourned by many.

Mrs. Wells died Aug. 5, 1873. She was a member of the Congregational church, Waterbury.

[We asked Gen. Wells for his war record for Waterbury in our Gazetteer in 1876, choosing it from his own pen. The following brief paper is his return]:

William Wells, born in Waterbury, Vt., Dec. 14, 1837, entered the service as a private soldier in Co. C, 1st Regiment Vermont Cavalry, in 1861; was promoted to 1st Lieutenant, Captain, Major, Colonel, Brev. Brig. General, Brig. Gen. and Brev. Maj. Gen. Vols.; was mustered out of service Jan. 16, 1866; represented Waterbury in the Legislature 1865 and 1866; was Adjutant and Inspector General of Vermont from the 1st of Oct. 1866, to May 1, 1872, when he was appointed Collector of Customs for the District of Vt., which position he now holds. From the Burlington Free Press, 1872.

Gen. WELLS, born in 1837, had been engaged in business with his father, till shortly before the war broke out. He went into the service as 1st Lieutenant of Co. C, of the 1st Vermont Cavalry, was promoted to be Captain before the regiment reached the field, and was made Major, Oct. 30, 1862. He was wounded in action, at Hagerstown, Md., July 6, 1863, and Sept. 13, 1863, at Culpepper, by the explosion of a shell, which also wounded Gen. Custer. He was promoted to the Colonelcy of the regiment, in June, 1864, commanded and fought the regiment during its arduous service in the Shenandoah Valley during that summer and fall, till he was placed in command of a brigade of Cavalry. February 22, 1865, he was promoted Brigadier General for gallant and meritorious service, and May 19, 1865, was appointed Brigadier General.

He commanded a cavalry brigade at Winchester and at Cedar Creek, in which battle his old regiment, the 1st Vermont, took 23 pieces of artillery—the heaviest capture ever made by one regiment in the war—and was in command under Sheridan throughout the rest of the war, up to the surrender of Lee at Appomattox Court House. After that he was in command of a division near Washington, till mustered out of the service. He came home a Brevet Major General of Volunteers, and with as clean and honorable a record as any soldier that Vermont sent to the war.

In 1866, Gen. Wells was elected Adjutant and Inspector General of Vermont, succeeding Gen. P. T. Washburn in that office, which he has held up to his present appointment,—[Collector of Customs for the District of Vermont at Burlington.] For several years past Gen. Wells has been a resident of this city, Burlington, and a member of the firm of Henry & Co., wholesale drug merchants. His personal standing is high, as a man of integrity, good sense, correct habits, and unblemished character, and his appointment will be generally accepted, throughout the State, as one eminently "fit to be made."

The General holds the honor of having received the greatest number of promotions of any Vermont officer during the war. He enlisted from his native town, Waterbury.

LOCATION OF THE REFORM SCHOOL.

[Reasons for the location at Waterbury—from the First Reform School Report.]

Omitting details and particulars, it is sufficient to say that we found the conditions we had prescribed for a location, best answered at Waterbury, on the spot where the institution stands.

These conditions were, first, not far from 100 acres of good land suitably divided as desirable into about equal parts of tillage, meadow, pasture and woodland. Next, that the farm should all be in sight of the house, and be taken in at a glance from any point within it, a very important condition, which is perfectly answered in the spot we have chosen. The boys wherever they are at work on the farm, are never out of sight or hearing. As a matter of security, convenience and advantage for an establishment like ours, the value of this feature can hardly be overestimated. Besides the utility and practical advantage, it adds very much to the beauty of the situation, imparting a sense of unity and completeness, and more of the feeling of home, We did not overlook the influence of natural security in fixing upon the spot we were to call our home. We rejected situations, whatever might be their advantages in other respects, that were desolate, isolate, distant, cut off from human society and neighborhood, easy access of friends and visitors, and from the free, warm and strong pulsations of the great social heart; we resolved if possible to place ourselves in a situation where nature and man could exert their best influence upon us.

Hence as a third condition, we determined that our location be near the railroad, and not more than one mile from a depot, and we concluded that a thriving business village, and a live depot, were much to be preferred to a place of little business, and a depot where ready conveyance for visitors could not be found. We thought it very desirable, (and have found it so) that we should be within easy walk of the station, and the churches and business centre of the town. Finally, if the place answering these conditions should be near the centre of the State it would be so much the better for that.

These conditions we found more nearly fulfilled in our present site than any other that was brought to our notice. The scenery is beautiful, the land fertile and easy of cultivation and of access in all parts. There is also an abundant supply of water brought from the hill in the rear by an aqueduct to the house and barn. In these respects, the site is unequalled, and its relation to the road, the depot and the village is all that could be desired. It has besides, the advantage of centrality in the State.

HANNAH GALE,

daughter of Peter and Hannah Gale, was born in Waterbury, Dec. 28, 1824. She was married to Samuel S. Luce, of Stowe, in 1847. In 1857, they removed from Waterbury to Galesville, Wis., where Mr. Luce, carpenter and architect, superintended the building of the University. In 1860, he began to publish and edit The Galesville Transcript. Mr. and Mrs. Luce are both good writers of prose and poetry. They have three children. R. BUTLER.

Mr. and Mrs. Luce have published together a volume, small 12 mo.. 208 pp.

OUR OWN GREEN HILLS.

BY HANNAH GALE LUCE.

The Switzer loves those Alpine peaks,
Where sweep the clouds along,—
So worship we our own green hills,
And cherish them in song.

And were I in a foreign land,
'Mid classic halls of Rome,
I'd turn from all to fondly gaze
Upon my mountain home.

I'd see among my native hills
The cottage 'neath the trees—
The tall elms waving gracefully
To music in the breeze.

The bright Winoski flowing near,
Through waving meadows green—
The lilacs where the robins sing,
When earliest flowers are seen.

The distant church spire bathed in light,
Like shaft of burnished gold—
The green where roseate children play,
As in the days of old.

Old Mansfield rears his rugged face,
Uprturned to meet the sky;
And south, the "Couching Lion" lifts
His beetling crags on high.

Full many an ancient legend wild
I've heard the aged tell,
Of precious ores in caverns hid,
And kept by mystic spell.

An Allen's dust reposes now,
Near by the quiet lake;
No more those brave "Green Mountain boys"
The forest echoes wake.

But treasured be, in every heart,
The love it bears for them—
Each mountain seems their monument—
The winds, their requiem.

Yes, dear to us our mountains green—
The home of virtues rare—
And dear their noble-hearted sons,
And daughters good and fair.

When my freed spirit seeks a home
Above all earthly ills,
Here may my humble grave be found,
Amid our verdant hills!

THE VILLAGE DOCTOR.

BY SAMUEL SLAYTON LUCE.

I see him still, as erst of yore,
With furrowed cheek, and whitened brow;
Though he's been dead of years a score,
I see him stand before me now.

I seem to see his withered form
Bstride his faithful white-faced mare,
With old brown saddle-bags behind,
Whose odor 'twas a grief to bear.

With chronic cough I hear him pass—
He digs his stoed with vigorous heel,
Whose callous sides, from daily thumps,
Had long since lost the power to feel.

The constant grin upon his face—
His light "te he!" at human pain,
As oft he wrenched the offending tooth,
Our memory ever will retain.

But deeply down within his breast,
 Beneath a mail like Milan steel,
 'Twas said by those who knew him best,
 "The doctor has a heart to feel."

'Twas in the old Green Mountain State,
 'Mid deep, dread winter's drifting snow,
 The evening hour was waxing late,
 Some forty years or more ago.

We sat around the ample hearth,
 Where maple logs were blazing bright;
 Glad songs arose, and social mirth,
 Upon that dismal winter night.

The storm-cloud hung on Mansfield's brow—
 The wind blew piercingly and chill;
 Glad songs arose, and social mirth,
 Pierced through the leafless branches shrieked,
 And roared along the fir-clad hill,

The deep'ning snow, that all day long
 Had fallen silently and fast,
 Now densely filled the frosty air,
 And piled in drifts before the blast.

And still we sat—the hours sped—
 The storm increased with fearful might;—
 "I hope," our tender mother said,
 "No one's abroad this dreadful night."

Our mother's voice had hardly ceased,
 When sudden through the opening door,
 O'er drifts, the quaint old doctor sprang,
 And forward fell upon the floor.

His brow was crusted o'er with ice,
 And crisp and frozen was his cheek;
 His limbs were paralyzed with cold;
 For once, the doctor could not speak.

With genial warmth, and tender care,
 He soon revived, and said: "Come, Bill,
 Be kind enough to get my mare,—
 I must reach Martin's, on the hill."

Then on again, o'er trackless snow,
 Against the biting winter blast,
 Without the hope of worldly gain,
 Through mountain drifts, the doctor passed.

Far up the winding mountain road,
 Through forest dark and blinding snow,
 He reached the desolate abode
 Of sickness, poverty and woe.

Long years have passed; yet oft I ask,
 As howls the tempest in its might,
 While sitting by the evening fire,
 "What faithful doctor rides to-night?"

Yes, faithful; though full well I know
 The world is sparing of its praise;
 And these self-sacrificing men
 But seldom tempt the poet's lays.

And yet, I trust, when at the last
 They leave the world of human strife,
 Like him "who loved his fellow-men,"
 Their names shall grace the "Book of Life."

[The original of "The Village Doctor" was Dr. T. B. Downer, who for many years practiced in Stowe; but in middle life removed to Waterbury Centre, and practiced a number of years after. He held several town offices, and was well known in Waterbury forty years ago. I knew him well forty and fifty years ago.]

HON. HENRY F. JANES.

BY EDWIN F. PALMER, ESQ.

Mr. Janes was born at Brimfield, Mass., Oct. 18, 1792, and died at Waterbury, June 6, 1879. He was the third son of Solomon and Beulah Fisk Janes, whose family consisted of 4 boys and 4 girls, he surviving them all, although the others lived to a great age. In early childhood he moved with his father's family to Calais, this State, where his boyhood was passed; and which town was represented in the Legislature for several years by his brother, Pardon. The Janeses were among the pioneers of Vermont.

Jonathan Janes, an uncle of Henry F., was prominent in the organization of the town of Richford, March 30, 1799, and elected its first representative, and three times after in succession; and was also judge in Franklin County. Hon. Henry F. Janes studied law at Montpelier. While living there he went with the company from that town to the battle of Plattsburgh. He commenced the practice of his profession at Waterbury in 1817, where he lived 62 years; without avarice acquired a competent fortune; and without lust for power, or a resort to sinister means, but solely through the solidity of his judgment and the unquestioned probity of his character early attained a commanding influence in his town, his county and State. He was married in 1826, to Miss Fanny Butler, a daughter of Gov. Butler. Mrs. Janes, in whom was the gentlest refinement without the least affectation, or love of display, inheriting the religious traits of her father, was greatly beloved and esteemed by all who knew her. She was born in the year 1800, and survived her husband 2 years and a few months.

Soon after settling in Waterbury, Mr. Janes was appointed postmaster, and continued to hold this position till about 1829. He was one of the State councillors, 5 years, commencing 1830; a member of Congress, 3 years, commencing 1834; State treasurer, 3 years, commencing 1838; one of the Council of Censors in 1848; and was elected several times to the Legislature, his first election being in 1854.

Mr. Janes was far removed both by nature and the whole education of his long life from those well described by the phrase, "potius callidi quam sapientes,"—crafty, not wise; nor did he belong to that class of public men well delineated by Burns in his poem on Charles James Fox,

"How wisdom and folly meet, mix, and mull;
How virtue and vice blend their black and their white."

No man ever saw more clearly than he, that in the very nature of God's moral government nothing is, or can be even expedient, that is not intrinsically just; and no man ever pursued more willingly or tenaciously what his conscience, illumined by a powerful judgment, taught him was just.

DR. HENRY JANES, was born in this town Jan. 24, 1832. He is the son of the late Hon. Henry F. Janes, and on his mother's side, a grandson of Gov. Butler.

We find the following truthful sketch of Dr. Janes in the "Biographies of the members of the Rocky Mountain Medical Association," published at Washington, D. C., 1877:—condensed.

The Doctor received his academical education at Morrisville and at St. Johnsbury academies, [etc]. His medical studies were commenced in 1852, at Waterbury, under Dr. J. B. Woodward. He attended his first course of medical lectures at Woodstock College, in 1852, and two courses subsequently at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, in New York, where he graduated M. D., in 1855, and was appointed assistant, and afterwards house physician in Bellevue Hospital, New York City. In 1856, he went into practice at Chelsea, Mass.; in 1857, he returned to Waterbury, where he soon acquired a good professional business; in 1861, entered the army, Surgeon of the 3d Vt. Regt.; 1863, commissioned Surgeon, U. S. Army; 1865, breveted Lieut. Col.; the greater part of his military service spent in hospital duty; the fall of '62, in charge of a hospital at Burkettsville; in 1863, in the winter, at Frederick, Md.; in the spring, of the hospitals of the 6th Army Corps; summer and fall, of the army hospitals in and about Gettysburg, and the Letterman General Hospital, in which were about 2000 severely wounded, from the Gettysburg battle-field, with a view of studying the results of treatment of fracture and amputations; winter and spring of 1864, of South Street General Hospital, Phila.; summer of '64, in charge of the hospital steamer, (of Maine); fall of '64, till the close of the war, in charge of Sloan General Hospital, at Montpelier; and left the army in 1866, after spending the remainder of the year in New York, making a special study of injuries to the bones and brain, and returned, in '67, to Waterbury, where he has been actively engaged in practice until the present time, excepting in '74, a portion of which he was traveling in Europe. His practice is large in the treatment of nervous diseases, surgery, and consultations with neighboring physicians. In '69 and '70 he published, in the Transactions of Vermont Medical Society, a paper on the treatment of gunshot-fracture, especially of the femur. In '71, '72, '73, papers on some of the incidents following amputations; in '74, amputations at the knee-joint; in '77, wrote a paper on spinal hemiplegia. He is a member of the Washington County Medical Society, and of the American Medical Association; of the Vermont State Medical Society, of which he was president in 1870, and which he represented at the meetings of the American Medical Association in '60, '66, '71, '80; of the Massachusetts Medical Society, and an honorary member of the California State Medical Society.

In 1880, when the Legislature was about to elect trustees of the University of Vermont, the members of the medical profession, among them Dr. Carpenter of Burlington, insisted they were entitled to be represented on that board with the other professions. They put forward Dr. Janes; and he was elected unanimously to that position. He is also at this time one of the medical committee of the Mary Fletcher Hospital, Burlington—and it is no exaggeration to say, no man in this State stands higher in his profession to-day than Dr. Janes.

DR. HORACE FALES.

Dr. Fales, born in Sharon, Feb. 16, 1823, received his education at Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, N. H.; graduated at Woodstock Medical College, 1848, and the same year located to practice in this town. In 1851, he was married to Miss Henrietta A. Sheple, daughter of David A. Sheple. During these 34 years, he has had a large and lucrative practice, and is exceedingly skilful. He brings to bear with rare tact the learning of the books to a given case; and few doctors ever approached the sick room whose manner and words were better adapted to inspire courage in the invalid, and to divert for the time his mind from his own aches and pains. In his long practice he has won many warm friends here.

MR. RUSSELL BUTLER,

the youngest of Gov. Butler's family, was born Feb. 17, 1807, in this town; and has resided here for the greater part of his life. He was fitted for college at the academy at Montpelier, and entered the University of Vermont in 1825. He was compelled to quit the University after 2 years, on account of ill health; but he has been a student and a great lover of books from his youth. Although Mr. Butler has ever peremptorily refused political honor, which his friends would willingly have conferred on him, he has always taken a deep interest in the welfare of the country and this community; and his influence has ever been on the side of the right, good government, education and religion. The purity of his life, his morals, or even his motives, we have never heard questioned. E. F. P.

MR. BUTLER'S PAPERS—CONTINUED.

HENRY FAMILY.

SYLVESTER HENRY came to this town early in the present century, and for many years held a prominent position. He was several years one of the board of selectmen, represented the town in the General Assembly 2 years, and was several years justice of peace. He was a man of much reading for the times, and of excellent judgment, particularly in property values. At his decease, he left a large landed estate.

Mrs. Henry's maiden name was Sybil Proctor. She was a woman of usefulness; all the neighborhood, in sickness or distress, appreciated her skillful nursing and helpful hand.

This couple, together with their 4 sons and 4 daughters, made up a family in respect to family coincidents, remarkable.

Two of the sons reared families of the same number, one having the same proportion of sons and daughters.

JAMES M., the eldest son, was born in Waterbury in 1809; attended school in his native district; but an unusually strong desire for knowledge led him to read much and closely observe men and things. He was eminently qualified to judge human character. Such a mind, schooled in the rough experiences of life, led him to accept men as they were, without attempting the herculean task of making them what they should be. To this may be attributed his peculiar influence on the opinions of men, especially in politics. If he entered the domain of religion or morals, it was the better to enforce his public policy. The interests of one's country are certainly higher than those of individuals, or even the local affairs of a community.

He did not find the severe labors of the farm sufficiently remunerative to make the business attractive. He thought that it was the work of the brain that achieved success and fortune. After some years of reverses and unsettled habits, he happily fell in with the temperance reformers, and brighter prospects dawned on his future. At this time better influences took possession of his nature, gained the mastery over the power of habit, and asserted the power of the will. It is a critical, but a grand period in life when a noble manhood triumphs once for all over a habit which has long seemed an invincible foe. A good degree of success attended his business enterprises. He was twice elected to the General Assembly, and had previously been justice of peace several years. He died, aged about 55.

Gen. W. W. HENRY, eldest son of James Henry, is U. S. Marshal for the District of Vt., and years ago represented, first, Washington, then Chittenden Co., in the Vt. Senate, and was 2 years president of the board of aldermen in Burlington.

JOHN F. HENRY, of Brooklyn, N. Y., from a moderate beginning in Waterbury, has grown into a very extensive trade in drugs and medicines. He has once or twice run for the office of mayor of the city, and is said to have run above the party strength.

SYLVESTER, 2d son of Sylvester, had 6 sons and 2 daughters—a family the same number as his father's and brother's. He accumulated a large property; was several times elected constable; three of his sons served in the army. He died in 1871, aged about 58.

LUTHER, 4th son of Sylvester, was born in Waterbury in 1826. At the age of 14, his father died, in his will having appointed the selectmen as guardians of this son, thus showing his confidence in their integrity and capability.

He completed his school life at Newbury Seminary; when about 21, is said to have entered into some speculations in patent rights which proved very unsuccessful; about this time, began the study of law with Hon. Paul Dillingham; was admitted to the Washington Co. Bar in May, 1849; not discouraged by his first financial venture, he had learned caution and wisdom. Of his professional capabilities, said L. L. Durant, in an address before the Washington Co. Bar:

“As a lawyer, he was never deemed learned in the books; but in a knowledge of men and things, he was not to be excelled. With keen discrimination and quick discernment, he readily grasped the strong points of a case, and bringing all his efforts to bear upon them, could not easily be led away. He was, so to speak, a natural lawyer, as all who entered the lists with him can testify.”

Mr. Henry took an active interest in building the bridge that connects Waterbury and Duxbury, and in opening a new street to it. He also made strenuous efforts to get the Newbury Seminary removed to Waterbury, and made an able argument in favor of the measure.

He was twice married; the first time to Flora Taplin; the second, to Katherine E. Royce. Three children survive him. He died Jan. 1, 1867, aged 40.

LEANDER HUTCHINS

was born in Montpelier, June 27, 1798, where he lived till 21, after which he passed some 3 years in the Western and Southern States, engaged in trade, and in 1822, came to Waterbury, and entered into partnership with Amasa Pride and Roswell Wells, under the name of L. Hutchins & Co. The firm began business on the corner now occupied by C. E. Wyman, in a small wooden building, which Mr. Hutchins replaced about 12 years later by the one now standing. He put up in 1826 a dwelling-house adjoining Knight's Block on the east. In that year, the firm was changed to Hutchins & Pride; and later, to Hutchins, Wells and Co. In 1835, it became L. & Geo. W. Hutchins. Some 3 years after the name of Geo. W. Hutchins appears alone. About 1845, Mr. Hutchins built and stocked a starch-factory near the Centre Village; burned, not rebuilt; [see fires.] Previous with the late Hon. H. F. Janes, he bought the extensive wild lands of Vermont owned by the Boardman Bros. of New York, for whom he had been agent; much of this land was not disposed of at the decease of the purchasers. For a few years he owned and personally managed a farm on the old hill road to Stowe, a mile or two from Waterbury village.

He married Jan. 30, 1826, Martha Pride, who died in December, 1834, leaving two daughters, Mrs. C. W. Arms and Mrs. Dr. Woodward, who survive both parents. In 1837, he married Martha W. Atkins, who is now living.

Mr. Hutchins died Feb. 17, 1879, aged 80 years. After a residence of nearly 60 years in Waterbury, actively engaged in business dealings with its citizens, his record is that of a prudent, reliable business man, and valuable, discreet friend, conservative on all subjects of public interest, whether politics, morals or religion. He united with the Congregational church in 1835 or '36, and during the later years of his life was one of its principal supporters, as he was one of its wealthiest members. Somewhat reserved in manner, he was genial with his friends, and often indulged in sallies of humor. He had a great aversion to display and ostentation, as shown in his whole manner of life, and seemed to have no particular taste or fancy for political preference, though far from indifferent to the character and principles of those who controlled and directed public affairs; and for some 12 years, he performed the duties of treasurer to the town, and when the bank of Waterbury was organized, he was chosen president, for which position he was eminently qualified, and held this office 20 years or more, when he requested to be relieved from its responsibility.

MOODY FAMILY.

From a sketch in the "Watchman."

JOSEPH MOODY and his wife Avis, came to Waterbury from Vershire in 1834, with 6 sons and 3 daughters: Daniel is now 79; Nathaniel, 75; William, died in 1865, age 57; Elisha, 68; Joseph, 67; George W., 59; Betsey, 71; Avis, died in 1843, at 24; Angelina is 54. The present average height of the brothers is 6 ft. 1 inch, weight 225 pounds. Joseph Moody Sr., weighed 308 pounds, his wife 228. Joseph Moody, Jr., was State Senator in 1853, went West in '54; located at St. Anthony, and subsequently at Sauk Rapids, Minn., where he is a successful operator in real estate, and is a county justice. The other brothers have remained residents of Waterbury. Joseph Moody, Sr., and after him his sons, were well known in the State as stock or cattle buyers, and have been active farmers and operators where money was to be made. Reminiscences of their trading days are a constant source of entertainment at the village rendezvous. George, by virtue of his imposing corporation, is titular governor, and Elisha the wag of the town. Politically, Nathaniel is the only republican among the brothers; the others were war democrats, and now affiliate with the democratic party; but politics are not always inherited, the sons of the brothers are republicans. Justin W., a son of William, has been for a long time the efficient postmaster, and Eugene, son of George, an active worker in the party, as well as one of the most thriving young farmers in the town or county.

DR. OLIVER W. DREW

came to Waterbury about 1820, from South Woodstock, where his father was a physician. He lived and practiced medicine here about 55 years, after which he and Mrs. Drew went to live with their only daughter, who had married a clergyman and lived in Acton, Mass.

As a man, a physician, a citizen, a friend, and a professor of religion, he was sensible and practical, trustworthy and conscientious in all duties. He was three times married; first to Miss Arms, by whom he had two children, a daughter who died young and suddenly, and Frederick, who became a doctor and settled at Ft. Riley. His second wife, Miss Woodward, was a sister of the late Dr. Woodward of Montpelier, formerly of Waterbury. His third wife survives him. Dr. Drew died in Massachusetts about 1878, and his remains were brought to Waterbury for burial.

RICHARD HOLDEN.

Prominent among the very early settlers of the town, as early as 1788, was Richard Holden. He was moderator of the meeting when the town was organized (1790); chosen first selectman at this meeting, as he was in 1791 and several years after [see list of selectmen], and for many years held the office of justice of peace; and 1793, was sent to the Constitutional Convention. His family occupied a respectable position in the social circles of that period. The sons and daughters were well educated for the times, limited as were the opportunities of education. The oldest son, Guy C., was a teacher of the district school in 1810, '12. The writer has seen a receipt of payment as teacher, signed by him and bearing the last above date. Two years after, Holden, with a group of small boys, was listening on the hill side to hear the cannon the day before the battle of Plattsburgh, but on the day of the battle, Sunday, Sept. 11, 1814, there was no need of listening to hear the broadside discharges of artillery in the lake action, to which a hundred of Waterbury boys were witnesses. In 1794, the representative to the General Assembly of Vt., took with him this rather singular certificate :

“WATERBURY, Oct. 6, 1794.

This may certify that Mr. Ezra Butler, who was duly elected as member to attend the General Assembly for the town of Waterbury for the year ensuing, has for about three years made a profession of religion, and therefore has declined taking an oath in the common form, but chosens whenever that he was elected into any town office, to take the affirmation.

RICHARD HOLDEN,
Justice of Peace.”

Some 62, possibly 64 years ago, the Holden family migrated to Northern New York. Giles H., the 2d son, and most of the family, settled at the mouth of the Genesee river, a post of entry 6 miles north of Rochester, Holden being collector and keeper of the lighthouse in 1829, as he had been some years before and was after that date some years. At the date named they were comfortably situated, and it is believed were some time after.

PAUL DILLINGHAM.
BY B. F. FIFIELD, ESQ.

Paul Dillingham, son of Paul and Hannah (Smith) Dillingham, was born in Shutesbury, Mass., Aug. 10, 1799. His father served the country in the Revolutionary War, first in the Mass. militia 6 months, then in the Continental Army 3 years, June, 1777, to 1780, his regiment being connected with that part of the army which was under the more immediate command of Gen. Washington. His grandfather, John Dillingham, served in the “Old French War,” and was killed in September, 1759, in the battle preceding the surrender of Quebec to Wolfe. He was thus descended from brave and patriotic ancestors, and as it will be seen, presently, transmitted the same noble qualities to his sons.

When about 6 years old, he removed with his parents to Waterbury, which has ever since been his home. In 1818, '19, he attended the Washington County Grammar School at Montpelier, then under the tuition of Seneca White, a recent graduate of Dartmouth; and in 1820, commenced the study of law with Hon. Dan Carpenter of Waterbury. He was admitted to the Washington County Bar at the September term, 1824, and from that date was in the active practice of his profession until 1875. As a jury lawyer, he long stood among the first in Vermont.

He was town clerk of Waterbury from 1829 to '44; representative to the Legislature in 1833, '34, '37, '38, '39; State's attorney for Washington County in 1835, '36, '37; a member of the Constitutional Convention 1836, '57, '70; State Senator of Washington County 1841, '42, '61; and in 1843, was elected member of Congress, where he served two terms, and was on the committee on the Judiciary. In 1862, '63, '64, he was Lieutenant Governor, and in 1865, '66, Governor of the State.

Mr. Dillingham was a Democrat by birth and education, and always acted with the democratic party; not, however, without many inward and some outward protests against its subserviency to slavery. But after the attack on Fort Sumter, he knew no party but the country, nor did he spare any exertion in the maintenance of the country's cause. During the presidential campaign of 1864, he was a frequent speaker at popular meetings, not only in Vermont, but in New Hampshire and New York. He gave two sons to fight, one of them to die, for the country. Charles, his oldest son, recruited Co. D. of the 2d Regt., in May, 1861, and was in the service till the winter of 1863, '64, when he was honorably discharged, being then Lieutenant Colonel of the 8th Regt. Edwin, his second son, [See sketch of Major Edwin Dillingham in paper that follows.]

The Governor reared a family of 7 children, 3 daughters and 4 sons. One of the daughters, wife of J. F. Lamson, Esq., of Boston, died in 1875. One remains unmarried, and the other was the wife of Senator Carpenter of Wis.; his son, Wm. P. Dillingham, is practicing law in this county, and is developing many of the traits of character which have rendered his father so distinguished. Charles resides at New Orleans, La., and Frank at Milwaukee, Wis.

The many public positions held by Mr. Dillingham, both by the choice of his neighbors, as well as of the whole people of the State, indicate the confidence the public have had in his integrity, as well as his ability, and that it was well deserved is proved by this fact alone; for while the State is sparsely populated, and the people as a rule are poor, or simply independent, they are intelligent, exceedingly jealous of their rights and proud of their publicmen, and thus it has seldom happened that high public places have been unworthily conferred.

But Mr. Dillingham's fame rests yet more in his professional life. I first knew him in 1856. He was then in the very vigor of manhood and in the full tide of professional success, and his reputation was that of the very first jury advocate in the State.

At this time, Lucius B. Peck, Timothy P. Redfield and Stoddard B. Colby, to say nothing of numerous other lawyers of superior ability, were in full practice at Washington County Bar, and it can easily be seen how a natural rivalry among men of so much talent, not unfrequently brought out exhibitions of eloquence and intellectual strength, which gave to this bar a position equal, if not superior, to any other in the State.

Often at this time was the court house packed, and an interested and appreciative audience would stay for hours to listen to the grapple of these men in legal debate. The great reputation that Mr. Dillingham then had as a jury advocate, of course made him the subject of general observation, and particularly was this so among students and the younger members of the bar; but it is quite difficult to present any picture of him that will do him adequate justice. He must have been seen and heard when his blood was young, to be appreciated, and yet they who saw and heard him were often sorely puzzled to find out or account for that mysterious power which gave him such wonderful mastery in jury advocacy, that the traditions of his great efforts, evanescent as such things are, will last for half a century. Among the things which certainly contributed to it, was an exceedingly fine presence. He was fully 6 feet in height, and weighed perhaps, something over 200 pounds. Physically, well rounded, though not corpulent, his step was elastic and his bearing kindly, warm-hearted, frank and manly, and his intercourse with his fellow-men carried with it that insinuating address which invited respectful familiarity and cordial friendship. There was nothing of the aristocrat about him; nothing distant or reserved, and yet there was a dignified simplicity which always commanded respect. His dark hazel eyes, too, beamed with sympathy and kindliness, and his gestures, movements and address were natural, easy and unaffected; and above all was his voice, musical and sweet as a flute in its lower cadences; but in passion or excitement, rising in its notes clear and ringing, it resounded like the music of the bugle.

In addition to these things, he was in the enjoyment of excellent health and a happy, genial temperament, which made everything sunshine about him. All these advantages were nature's gifts, and they were never tampered with or impaired by any vice or bad habit. And these gifts, too, are not, and cannot be acquired. He who is so fortunate as to possess them, must thank his Maker, not himself. With these gifts he coupled an instructive knowledge of the human heart, acquired by long experience at the bar, and familiar intercourse and sympathy with his fellow-men. He never was a law student in the highest sense of the term; never the mere book-worm which David Paul Brown pronounces "a mere donkey;" never dealt with the sharp analysis and the keen intellectual dissection of great subjects, but his mind teemed with brilliant conceptions, glittering generalities, happy conceits, apt illustrations and appropriate anecdotes, which were interspersed so ingeniously through the argument as the discussion went on, that great audiences have stood upon their feet by the hour to listen to the magic of his eloquence.

The writer of this sketch once heard him in a pauper case, where the question of legal settlement turned upon the apparently insignificant fact whether a family removed in the spring or autumn of 1816 from one town to another; and one witness, an old lady, remembered it was in autumn, because the family went on foot, the children were barefooted, the ground was frozen, and their feet bled by contact with the hard earth. She remembered, too, that they cracked butternuts which lay under the trees at this time of the year. Seizing upon these incidents as a text, his vivid imagination quickly sketched a picture of the privations and suffering of the early pioneers in the State, so full of tenderness and pathos, that when he dropped back into his seat, panting with emotion, there was scarcely a dry eye in the jury-box, and when the jury went out, it took them less than ten minutes to vindicate the testimony of the old lady who remembered the frozen ground and the little children with their bleeding feet.

It may be thought that in this he was simply acting. But it was not so. It was genius, a native instinct which directed him as certainly to the incidents and characteristics of a case which could be used for effect as the magnetic needle is directed toward the pole. He made his client's case his own, and threw into it all the zeal and earnestness of his nature.

In every controversy there is something of right on each side, and to a person of his natural genius and emotional nature, it was not difficult to quickly convince himself that the right always largely predominated on his side, so that his advocacy always had the appearance of the utmost sincerity, the utmost candor. Himself a member of the Methodist church, and a careful student of biblical history, there was an undertone of moral sentiment continually cropping out and constantly returning, illustrated and enforced by apt quotations from the Scriptures, and this, coupled with his high reputation for integrity, gave his utterances extraordinary weight and effect.

When in his best mood, he played upon the strings of men's hearts with the facility that a skilled musician plays upon the strings of a guitar, and made them respond to emotions of laughter, anger, sympathy or sorrow whenever he pleased and as best suited the purposes of his case. By pure animal magnetism, he subjected inferior wills to the superior strength and power of his own, and having control, he moulded and shaped them to his wishes with the ease that the potter moulds the clay. And this was just as likely to arise in a small case as in a large one. It was antagonism that roused him. It was when his brother Colby had ridiculed his case, and convulsed the jury with laughter by the hour, that all his faculties were brought into full play, and then it was an intellectual treat to see him recapture the jury and win back the lost cause, and revel in the victory with the gaiety of a troubadour.

Mr. Dillingham never by a professional act degraded his profession. He loved it, and practiced it because he loved it. He withdrew from practice about 1875, after a period of professional labors of half a century. He is now in the 83d year of his age, and is exceedingly well preserved for such advanced years. An hour with him now in social intercourse is a rare enjoyment. With nothing to regret in the past, and a Christian's hope of the future, his present condition exhibits a restfulness and placidity which fittingly crowns a life of labor not spent in vain.

From Chaplain E. M. Hayes' History of the Tenth Regiment, (1870).

MAJOR EDWIN DILLINGHAM,

second son of Hon. Paul Dillingham and Julia Carpenter, was born in Waterbury, May 13, 1839. The first years of his life were passed at the home of his parents, amidst some of the most delightful natural scenery in the State. Here the mountains are ever green in their towering magnificence to the sky. Almost every field is laced and ribboned by tireless, sparkling streams; the soil, rich and stubborn in its fertility, yields its fruits only to the steady persistence of a hardy race; and here, almost in sight of the State Capitol, and within the immediate circle of its legislative and social influences, and always under the more refining elements of a Christian home, the years of boyhood and youth were numbered. Like other boys, we presume he passed them quietly, not varying much from the round of sports and duties of New England's revered manual for the training of her sons, although other homes have not been so richly endowed by Christian example. His opportunities for an education, we are informed, were respectable and diligently improved. Always found at his task, he won the admiration of his teachers; ever kind and of a happy spirit, he was loved by his fellow-students. Enjoying the highest advantages afforded by the common schools and academies of his native State, he here received all the instruction deemed absolutely essential to entering successfully upon his professional studies. He chose the profession of the law, and commenced his preparation for the bar in 1858, in the office of his brother-in-law, the Hon. Matthew H. Carpenter, now a senator in Congress, in the city of Milwaukee, Wis., where, however, he remained but a few months. Upon leaving the office of Mr. Carpenter, he entered the Law School at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he graduated with honor in the autumn of 1859. He finally finished his law studies, preparatory, in the office of Dillingham and Durant, in his native town, his father being the senior member of the firm, and then Lieutenant Governor, and afterwards Governor of the State. In Sept. 1860, he was admitted to practice at the Washington County bar; and it is said, "though the youngest," was considered "one of its most promising members." Subsequently, he became the law partner of his father, and thus established in his profession, and thus associated, he continued until July, 1862. We have often heard him speak of this arrangement as one most suited to his tastes, and doubt not that it was one of great promise and profit. It may be that he had expected to reap much from the great ability, experience and wide reputation of his father as an advocate and statesman, and so enrich his own mind for the largest duties of his calling, either in its immediate sphere, or else fit himself for the demands of a wider field, and prepare to win the honor to which the young ambition may justly aspire. But whatever schemes of this kind he might have entertained, they were not destined to be realized; even if they did float dimly, yet with golden wings, before his mind, his nature was not one to remain undisturbed by the dark war-cloud that had for two terrible years stretched from the Gulf to the northern boundaries of his native State. Its mutterings, mingling with the cries of the slain of his own kinsmen and companions in peace, were notes of summons. Though the silver lining of other dark clouds had betokened promise, this had turned to blood, and he would go and do battle for his country. Forgetting party affinities, and severing dearer and sweeter ties, he, with thousands more, would make the sacrifice of his young life upon the nation's altar. But to write all that was noble of this officer, would be but to repeat what has been in a thousand instances already made historic, and for him, we, his compatriots and subordinates in rank, because he has taken a higher commission, have but to record the epitaphs of the brave!

Upon the President's call for 300,000 troops, issued in July, 1862, he actively engaged in recruiting a company in the western part of Washington County, of which he was unanimously chosen captain. These recruits finally became Co. B, of the 10th Reg. Vt. Vols., and were really the first raised for that regiment; but in consequence of a company organization then existing, though formerly designed for the 9th Regiment, he was obliged to take this position in the 10th. Soon after the regiment was fairly in the field, he was detailed as Assistant Inspector General on the staff of Brigadier General Morris, then commanding the 1st Brigade, 3d Division, 3d Army Corps, Army of the Potomac. He acted in the capacity of aid-de-camp to this officer during the battle of Locust Grove, Nov. 27, 1863, and while carrying an order to his own regiment, his horse was shot under him and he was taken prisoner. Then he was marched most of the way to Richmond and incarcerated in Libby prison, where he was kept for four long months in durance vilest. In March following, he was paroled and soon exchanged, when he immediately returned to the field and to his old command. Gen. Grant was at this time making his celebrated campaign from the Rapidan to Petersburg, and consequently rendered approach to the immediate scene of operations extremely difficult. Still, troops of every arm of the service were being hurried forward, and Capt. Dillingham was put in command of a battalion of exchanged prisoners and enlisted men, which he led to the front, fighting some of the way. He dismissed his men to their respective commands, and reported for duty at Cold Harbor, June 3, 1864.

Col. Jewett had resigned. Lieut. Col. Henry and Major Chandler had been promoted respectively to the first ranks in the command. Capt. Frost, the ranking line officer, was breathing his last the hour he arrived; one-third of the regiment were lying dead on the field and wounded in the hospital, and the rest, begrimed with dirt and powder, within close range of the enemy, were looking down into the Chickahominy swamp, within steeple view of Richmond. Col. Henry had been wounded on the first instant, and Lieut. Col. Chandler soon afterwards became sick, and Capt. Dillingham took command of the regiment, although he held it but a short time, Lieut. Col. Chandler returning to duty. The remaining awful days until the 12th, was his second battle with his regiment. June 17, 1864, he was commissioned Major, and went with the troops to James river and Bermuda Hundreds, where, with a large part of the corps, they were ordered into action by Gen. Butler. But Gen. Wright delayed obedience to the order, and his corps was finally extricated by Gen. Meade, after remaining under a most distressing artillery fire from the enemy's battery for several hours. From this time until his death he was constantly with the regiment, and some of the time in command.

July 6, 1864, the 3d Division of the 6th Corps was detached from the Army of the Potomac, and the two remaining divisions soon afterwards, and were sent into the Shenandoah Valley, under Gen. Sheridan. Arriving at Frederick City, Maryland, on the 8th, he was second in command at the battle of Monocacy, fought on the 9th, Lieut. Col. Chandler being detailed to command the skirmish line, and Colonel Henry in command of the regiment. After marching untold leagues from Frederick to the Relay House, to Washington, up the Potomac to Leesburg, over into the Shenandoah Valley, through Snicker's Gap, where we had a skirmish with the enemy over and in the river on the 18th, back to Georgetown by way of Chain Bridge, again up the Potomac as far as the mouth of the Monacacy, thence to Frederick, Harper's Ferry, Winchester and Strasburg, back to Harper's Ferry, by way of Charleston—over 600 miles since we had set foot in Maryland, July 21. It was now Aug. 22. On the 21st, the whole corps was attacked vigorously by the enemy, drawing in the pickets in front of the 2d Division, while the troops were lying quietly in camp or preparing for Sunday morning inspection. Here, for the first time, young Dillingham was ordered to lead his command to battle. The regiment, however, was not prominently engaged, and he had no opportunity to distinguish himself. When asked how he felt, invested with the full command at such a time, he replied: "I felt as if we should make a good fight, but I rather wished that Henry had been there." From this time he commanded the regiment until he fell at the glorious field of Winchester, Sept. 4, 1864.

We may not here describe that battle. It was a decisive victory for our arms and the country. It was a golden victory. It lifted higher the national banner than any other battle of the year north of Atlanta. But the eye of prescience could have discerned a thousand emblems of mourning stretched beneath its starry folds, and seen the tears of as many Northern homes falling for their dead, yet re-consecrating the flag! One was mourned in Waterbury! Major Dillingham had fallen!

Washington County Court was in session, and attorneys were contending by peaceful process for the civil rights of a few clients. In Virginia, its youngest and most promising member, who had thrown his sword into the vaster scale of justice, was contending for the civil rights of the nation. Under orders to charge the enemy, whose front was ablaze with cannon and abatised with fixed bayonets, he was firmly pacing back and forth along his battle line, steadying its formation and awaiting the final signal to advance. Those who saw him say that he heeded not the the missiles of death that fell thick around him and his brave men. Keenly he eyed the foe—anxiously he awaited the onset. To him it never came. About noon, while in this position, he was struck by a solid twelve-pound shot on the left thigh, and borne bleeding and dying to the rear. In two hours he was no more. The regiment charged and nobly avenged the death of its Major, but he had gone another way. Though he never recovered from the nervous shock produced by this wound, he did not lose consciousness until his noble spirit departed. He conversed occasionally with those around him. Among his last words was the utterance: "I have fallen for my country. I am not afraid to die." The first were inspired by patriotism, the last by Christianity! His remains were borne to Waterbury and interred, where the spirit of honor watches over the treasured dust; and when the history of Vermont's noble men is written, the names of her heroes fairly recorded, we shall read high upon the scroll the name of Major Edwin Dillingham. E. M. II.

A member of the "Tenth," from the battle field writes: "While the fight was still roaring up over the hill he died, and this was the end of a beautiful, harmonious life. Young, handsome, brilliant, brave amid trials, cheerful amid discouragements, upright, and with that kindness of heart which ever characterized the true gentleman, blended with firmness and energy as a commander, he was ever respected by all of his command, and loved by all of his companions.

"A fairer and a lovelier gentleman
The spurious world cannot again afford."

We shall long mourn him in our camp."

He fell, as a soldier should fall,
At the head of his own gallant band;
He died, as a soldier should die,
In defence of his own native land.

He fell 'mid the battle's loud roar,
Where the stars and the stripes proud did fly:
His life to his country he gave—
" 'Tis sweet for one's country to die."

He fell in the springtime of life,
His country from traitors to save,
While the bugle, the drum and the fife
Fired the hearts of the true and the brave.

He died while the victor's shout
Rang clear on the mountain air,
While the foe in disordered rout
Were fleeing in wildest despair.

Vermont her proud record shall make,
And add to her long roll of fame,
With the Allens and Warners she'll place
Young Dillingham's glorious name.

The closing tribute to our young hero is from the pen of J. A. Wing, Esq., of Montpelier.

One of the largest and most beautiful monuments of the State, in which elegance and simplicity combined, has been erected by the Governor at the grave of his son. It is of the Sutherland Falls quarry, finest Vermont marble, the cutting and erecting by a townsman, Geo. C. Arms, of Waterbury.

PHILANDER A. PRESTON, born in Waterbury, Nov. 27, 1833, enlisted in the Vt. Cav., Sept. 1, '61; with his regiment till July 6, '63, when wounded and in hospital till December; returned to duty; Jan. '64, re-enlisted; taken prisoner June 27, at Stony Creek Station, Weldon R. R.; taken to Andersonville, Sept. 10; removed to Charlestown; then to Florence, where he was literally starved to death; died Jan. or Feb. '65, aged 32; left a wife and one son.

The eighth annual re-union of the Tenth Vermont Regimental Association was held at Waterbury, Sept. 4, 1873. The association went in procession to the cemetery to pay honors to Maj. Dillingham, Thompson, and other Waterbury patriots there interred.

SOLDIERS BURIED IN TOWN.

BY HON. WM. P. DILLINGHAM.

Revolutionary Soldiers who are buried in Waterbury:—Capt. Thomas Jones, Aaron Wilder, Ezra Butler, Zachariah Bassett, Moses Nelson, David Town, John Hudson, D. Sloan, Benjamin Conant, Paul Dillingham, Asaph Allen, Isaac Marshall, Thomas Eddy, Alphas Sheldon, Joseph Hubbard, Stephen Jones, Asa Poland, George Kennan.

NOTE.—This list is made from consultation with aged persons. In regard to those of 1812, any list I could make would be so defective as to mislead rather than be a help. More than 40 men went out and most of them are buried here, and yet I have obtained only a dozen of the names.

Soldiers in the War of 1861 who are buried at Waterbury:—Major Edwin Dillingham, Capt. Lucien D. Thompson, Lieut. J. Edwin Henry, Lieut. Dow E. Stone, Surgeon James B. Woodward, Alba Dutton, C. E. L. Hills, Almon C. Thomas, Tilton Sleeper, Carlos Prescott, Charles Lee, Henry Lee, Joseph B. Conant, Clarence K. Mansfield, Wm. Wallace Whitney, Frank Stearns, Henry Dillingham, H. R. Bickford, Tabor H. Parcher, Ira S. Woodward, George S. Woodward, H. S. Burleigh, Augustus Steady.

NOTE.—This list is not complete, but as nearly so as time will permit us to make.

[This list was only asked from Mr. Dillingham two days before going into print. We had overlooked not having it. ED.]

ORIGIN OF THE REFORM SCHOOL.

Gov. Dillingham in his first annual message to the Legislature, that of 1865, recommended the establishment of a State Reform School. On this suggestion an act was passed at the session of that year to establish the Vermont Reform School, that authorized the governor to appoint a board of three commissioners to purchase a farm not exceeding 200 acres of land.

The governor appointed Rev. A. G. Pease, Rev. L. A. Dunn, and Charles Reed, Esq., members of the Legislature that year. They received their commissions Nov. 24, and entered on the preliminary duties of such a board, visiting reformatories in other States to acquire needful information relating to requisitions and management of such institutions. This was also preparatory to selecting a suitable location for a reform school. In their report the next year to the governor, they relate their proceedings and conclusions on the subjects of their inquiries; also the requisitions in the location, and the reasons which determined them in favor of locating in Waterbury, which have been already stated in these papers, page 854.

THE BURNING OF THE REFORM SCHOOL building Dec. 12, 1874, was a calamity to many individuals, and in some respects, to the public. The loss of public and private property was large; while 160 inmates escaped with little but their lives in the dead of a December night, from their comfortable home to undergo months of deprivation of their former comforts.

The loss of personal property in the building was little known; and probably few ever knew the loss of the State, in other ways than the cost of the building. It is well known to the tax-payers of the State that the fire led to the removal to Vergennes. However much the citizens of that ancient city may congratulate themselves upon the event, and the maneuvers leading to it, few disinterested persons have ever had reason to be proud of the success of the means that led to its accomplishment. The careful examinations of reformatories in other States, and inquiries into the necessary requisitions in choosing the location of such institutions, were narrated in the first annual report of the trustees; and their reasons for the selection of the site of the first location of the school in Waterbury, are believed to have been satisfactory to the great majority of the people of the State. If those reasons were good then, they were no less forcible after the fire, but rather more so, the surroundings being the same, and in addition, the foundation and much available material remaining which could be appropriated to the rebuilding, a foundation already being laid; a large outlay for that purpose would have been avoided. But whatever reasons might be assigned for rebuilding on the old site, the Legislature, especially the lower house, seemed indisposed to regard them, while the senate by a very small majority concurred in the removal, even after the passage of the act authorizing the governor to purchase certain designated real estate in Vergennes for the locating the reform school, it was reported he had serious doubts of the propriety of doing what the act authorized for purchase of that real estate.—R. BUTLER.

CATHOLIC CHURCH IN WATERBURY.

1876.—This mission, before it became a parish with a residing pastor, was attended occasionally, first by Father O'Callaghan from Burlington, then successively by Rev. J. Daly, Rev. Father Drolet, the Reverend Oblate Fathers, from Burlington, Rev. Z. Druon and Rev. Joseph Duglue, the two last clergymen living then at Montpelier. It was in 1857, that the old church, dedicated to St. Vincent Ferrier, was built on the hill on the east side of the railroad, at a little distance from the depot. It was enlarged about 10 years afterwards by Father Duglue. The present pastor, the Rev. John Galligan was appointed to take charge of his congregation in the year 1869. He soon purchased a fine residence in Winooski turnpike street, and this year (1876,) he bought the adjoining lot where stands the Adventist meeting-house, which he is now enlarging and converting into a church. Rev. Z. DRUON.

1882.—The Church of Waterbury was dedicated to Almighty God under the vocable of St. Andrew, the Apostle, Nov. 30, 1876. Waterbury is now attended regularly on every other Sunday by Rev. J. Galligan. Bishop DE GOESBRIAND.

Patrick Bryan, the first Catholic in town, a tailor, came from Burlington from 1815 to '20; settled and worked at his trade. He had a large family, and brought another tailor from Burlington here, Michael Connor, a Catholic; both spent their lives here. Mr. Connor had several sons in the war. R. BUTLER.

SOME DAY.

There will be a hush in a darkened room
Where, heeding not the stilly gloom,
A pallid form will lowly lie,
Beneath the folds of snowy drapery,
Pale hands clasped o'er a pulseless breast,
Cold white lips in silence pressed,
Eyes—that have closed in sleep for aye;
There will be footsteps' muffled tread,
And voices whisper, "she is dead,"
Some day.

Others tears and others woes
Shall not disturb my deep repose;
Perhaps some loving hand may press
My marble form in tenderness,
And twine the myrtle with flowers fair,
To deck my rest, as I slumber there.
But naught to me will that pressure be,
Of beauty, or fragrance of rarest flowers,
The light or shadows of passing hours—
Some day.

I shall not heed as they bear me on,
With solemn tread, to the churchyard lone;
Or hear the tone of the deep-toned ocell,
Breaking with mournful ebb and swell;
As they lower me down, I shall feel no fear,
The requiem's strains I shall not hear,—
Or even the shock of the yellow clay,
As with hollow sound on my coffin lid,
It falls and covers my narrow bed,
Some day.

Summer and winter will come and go,
With their floral wreath and robes of snow,
And the phantom train of years go by,
But I shall not heed them where I lie.
The violet there, with its eyes of blue,
May weep o'er my grave its tears of dew,
The wild bird sing his sweetest lay,
Yet the heart beneath the cold and still;
Will not respond with its wonted thrill,
Some day.

Only a lock of silken hair,
Little mementoes here and there,
Only a ceasing of care and strife,
Alas! alas! is it all of life?
Ah, no! there is somewhere a fairer shore,
Where friends long parted shall meet once more,
A bounteous land in the far away,
Where light and joy will ever remain,
And the soul its long-lost treasure regain,
Some day.

Then why should we fear, Oh Death, thy clasp,
Or shrink at the touch of thy icy grasp?
Since thou art the angel that opens the gate
Of that city bright where our loved ones dwell.
We will place these hands, without one thrill,
Into thine own, so cold and chill;
Come lead us to that realm of day,
Where never a sigh is heard, or knell,
But where the pure and beautiful dwell Forever.

Waterbury, Vt., March, 1872.

M. M. N.

[A poem we clipped from the Burlington Free Press ten years since, and reserved till we might reach the history of Waterbury, not anticipating any difficulty in finding the author; but our inquiry is to-day, who wrote it?

DR. C. C. ARMS,

[From the Vermont Watchman.]

was a physician here 20 years. He came from Stowe, where he first practiced his profession a short time. He was married not long before coming here, Nov. 16, 1833, to Lucia Mills, born in Windsor, Dec. 5, 1805. They had two daughters and one son, one daughter died in childhood, one in young womanhood. Dr. Arms, Sr., died Apr. 15, 1854, age 51; Mrs. Arms Mar. 20, 1882. Mrs. Arms spent the most of her days after her husband's death in Waterbury, and left behind her a life marked by a quiet but positive exercise of the cardinal virtues of womanhood. Her only son, Dr. Charles Carroll Arms, encouraged by his resolute mother, made his way through college, graduating at Dartmouth in the class of '65, acquired his profession, and now in Cleveland, Ohio, sustains a good reputation as a man and a physician. It was his privilege to be with his mother at her death.

DR. F. P. DREW,

Only son of Dr. Oliver W. Drew—see page 860—born in Waterbury, pursued classical studies in the University at Burlington, and his professional studies in the Medical College at Woodstock, and in the College of Surgeons of New York, where he graduated in the spring of 1857, and in the summer of that year entered upon his profession in Attica, Fountain Co., Ind.; in the fall of 1859 moved to Junction City, Kansas, and continued the practice of his profession nearly 2 years; was appointed Post Surgeon at Fort Riley, in the discharge of which office he continued until his death from pneumonia during the war, we believe, at the age of 35, leaving a young widow. He married Dec., 1861, to Nelly Chaney, of Attica, Ind. The Republican Union, Junction, Kansas, said of him at the time of his death: "By several years of medical practice in the vicinity of Junction City and Fort Riley, and as army surgeon at the Fort, he had acquired a high and increasing reputation. To a mind well disciplined by scientific culture, he added the gentle culture and the kind sympathy which flow from a generous heart. His own ease, his health, even, were of no account compared to what he esteemed the claims of duty to the suffering."

His father's death did not occur till some years after that of his son. The father had three wives; first, Lucretia Arms, second, Margaret Woodward, third, Olivia L. B. Atherton. The first was the mother of his two children. The family are all now, but the third Mrs. Drew and daughter, Mrs. Wood, dead.

EARLY FAMILIES.

We have briefly sketched three or four early families of our town; if space permitted, we might notice some others, perhaps as worthy of such distinction in the Gazetteer. Without attempting particulars in regard to most of them, Stiles Sherman had a family of 12 children, several of them died young; only one survives, Mrs. Bebee of Burlington; she was the youngest daughter. Seth Chandler Sherman was the youngest son. He took the honors of the graduating class of 1829, in the Vt. University. A few years after he settled in Quincy, Ill., and lived there many years, and was much respected. He died two or three years since, and with his companion was buried in the same grave. The oldest brother, when young, settled in Central New York. Heman, the next older brother of Chandler, died a few years since in Ogdensburgh, N. Y., and was buried in this, his native town. An older sister married Elam, a brother of the late Judge Dan Carpenter. He died young, and his widow afterwards married Luther Cleaves. This family consisting of a son, Sherman Carpenter, and two sisters with their parents, moved West many years ago, and lived in, or in the vicinity of St. Louis, where Mrs. Cleaves died perhaps 20 years ago, having lived some years in her second widowhood. Thus might other similarly interesting sketches of families be made. We will only give the names of many, as they occur in our recollection. There were Wilsons, Perrys, Hills, Parchers, Guptils, Atkins, several families, Cadys, Wrights, Fisks, Hawleys, Roods, Robbins, Stevens, Austins, Allens, Scagels, Jones, Parkers, Murrays, Woodward, several large families, Greggs, three families, Smiths, two of Pecks, John and Hiram, Henrys, several Shermans, Kneeland, Palmers, Thompsons, Richardsons, Georges, Eddys, Bryants, Towns and Demmons, and still others whose names were familiar as household words 50 years ago. Of the recent names of business men or others, there are, omitting professionals, Seabury, Selleck, Knight, Wyman, Richardson and Fullerton, Arms, Haines, Bruce, Warren, Randall, Brown, Hopkins, Clark and Freeman, Stockwell, Davis, Cooley, Crossetts, Remington, Cole, Atherton, Muzzey, King, Morse, Picketts, Moodys, Evans, Taylors, Griggs, Watts, Collins, Foster, Jackman, and others.

LARGE MEN.

Some half century and more since, our town could boast of numbering among its inhabitants several families whose name stood high in the alphabet. but who, in their corporal dimensions, stood quite as high, and in their circular measurements quite respectable; indeed, they would hardly fall short of the more recent Moody families. The Atkinses were numerous as well as of powerful frames, altitude over 6 feet, weight over 200, and some of them were men of wit, as most were of genial humor and good mental endowments. Any jokes at Henry's or Albro's expense were sure to be promptly paid in ready coin.

Horace and Henry were carpenters and joiners, and the builders of the first meeting house in town. Capt. George, the militia captain, was with his company at the battle of Plattsburgh. David was one of the town officers in early days, and, as well, a good deacon, I doubt not, as he married my father's sister, and belonged to his church. John was a man of some peculiarities; it was said gathered sap with one pail only, most sugar makers use two if without a team.

JERUM ATKINS, his son, has a biography we would take pleasure in giving the reader were it possible to do justice in the brief space allotted to this closing part of the history. Suffice it to say of him, from mere childhood he had a remarkable inclination for mechanism, and soon after developed an inventive genius of superior order. He worked with Henry Carter, a millwright, some years, and went West at about the age of 19, where he became somewhat famous as the inventor of the first grain-raker attachment to McCormick's celebrated reaper. This was an important invention, to the great grain growing region, especially, but owing to want of means, and want of health, he was obliged to divide the value of his invention with some one able to manufacture and introduce the raker into market. By injudicious management, after many had been disposed of, a change of manufacturer ruined the credit of the article, and others took advantage of this mismanagement of his manufacturer and reaped the profits of the invention. The history of Mr. Atkins is too long for these pages, and many interesting particulars must be omitted.

GEORGE W. RANDALL, was born in Waterbury in 1826. Few men have had more varied experiences, and the events of his youth, and adventures in two trips to California have trained him to self-reliance and readiness in emergency. From poverty he has risen to wealth, and conducts an extensive business with little help from clerks. His farming and lumbering enterprises give employment to many; and some of his feats in filling orders for dimension timber upon short notice, are surprising. His bills of lumber sent to several different States, amount to many thousands of dollars annually.

OUR MERCHANT FIRMS

have not very much changed in the last 10 years. In the ten preceding there were more changes in manufacturing, business and merchant firms. The Colby business, somewhat divided up, a part going to Montpelier, a part to the state of Michigan, and a part remaining. Mr. B. F. Goss, who had been a merchant here 20 or 30 years, moved to Vergennes, Mr. J. G. Stimson, who commenced trade here in 1844, went to Norwich, his native town, we think. Both these men were prominent in business, in politics, and in church, and will long be remembered by our older citizens. Mr. Goss became very successful in his new business, the manufacture of kaolin, in a town adjoining Vergennes. [See Montpelier, p. 471.] Of business changes at the Centre, we note that of Mr. Stockwell succeeding Mr. Hayes; Clark and Freeman continue. William Cooley continues his creamery.

It would seem hardly excusable in us to pass the names of Messrs. Goss and Stimson, after their long residence here, and having such social and business relations with us as they had, without somewhat more notice. Both Mr. and Mrs. Goss [Frank Goss, see family of Samuel Goss, history of Montpelier.] were genial in their manners, public spirited, sympathizing in all the vicissitudes of life and liberal to all benevolent enterprises.

Mr. Stimson was with us a man thoroughly schooled in business; he was in early life, we think, in partnership in trade with Senator Morrill. His oldest son, William, served in the recent war, and has since been in mercantile business in New York. His second son is a doctor in Connecticut; third, probably with his parents. The youngest is a missionary in some foreign land, and is a graduate of Dartmouth; also a theological graduate.

Mr. Stimson has built two stores here, and given much for benevolent objects and the church of which he was a member.

THE LAST FIRE IN THIS PLACE, of considerable account, was in the night, of July 27, 1878, in a central part of the village, when 4 stores, some of them, in part, occupied as dwellings, were consumed. The owners were M. M. Knight, J. A. Burleigh, F. B. Taylor and M. O. Evans. In the first was a large stock of dry goods; total losses about $25,000, insured about two-thirds or three-fourths. These stores in 1879 were all replaced by two brick blocks, creditable to the builders and to the village.

One of the heaviest individual losses by fire, that ever occurred in our town, was that of Dr. Fales, May 15, 1877. The fire was not discovered till several barns and sheds, with ten or a dozen head of cattle and three or four horses, were past being rescued. The fire rapidly approached the house, and the firemen were unable to save it on account of the insufficient supply of water. This house which had been, for sixty years, one of the most conspicuous in town, has since been replaced by a much more valuable one of brick. Dr. Fales was insured to considerable amount.

LONGEVITY.

The widow of Judge Carpenter died aged 93; a Mrs. Woodward, about 95; Elizabeth Corlis, 94; Mr. Heaton, 96; Daniel Stowell, about 92; John Montgomery, living, 85; Enoch Coffran, living, 87; Moses Nelson, living, 85; Nancy Frink, 86; Mrs. Daniels, 89 or 90; Mr. Janes died aged 87½; Mrs. Janes, 3 months of 82 years; John Scabury, 87; L. Hutchins, about 80.

1880.—Zenas Watts, who has been enquiring after the ages of the old people in town, says he has learned of 41 persons whose average age is over 83 years. Of this number 5 are females over 90 years. Governor Dillingham is 83; John Mellen, 86; Elias Parcher, 86; Mrs. Spelacy, 86; Betsey Brown, 86; Jerry Brown, 82.

TOWN CLERKS.

Ezra Butler, 1790-97, 98, 99, 1800; Ebenezer Reed, 1797; Roswell Wells, 1801-6; Abel Dewolf, 1806; Dan Carpenter, 1807-10-12-29; John Peck, 1810, 11; Paul Dillingham, 1829-44; William Carpenter, 1844-51; John D. Smith, 1851-74; Frank N. Smith, 1874-82.

THE BANK OF WATERBURY.

The act of the Legislature chartering the Bank of Waterbury, was approved Dec. 5, 1853, and the commissioners appointed were: Wm. W. Wells, Paul Dillingham, W. H. H. Bingham, V. W. Waterman, T. P. Redfield, Rolla Gleason and Dan. Richardson. The bank commenced business Apr. 18, 1854, with the following directors: Leander Hutchins, Paul Dillingham, Wm. W. Wells, Orrin Perkins and V. W. Waterman; Leander Hutchins, president, and Samuel H. Stowell, cashier; paid up capital, $80,000. At different times the following persons were elected directors to succeed others resigned, etc.: Samuel Merriam, B. F. Goss, J. H. Hastings, A. R. Camp, H. A. Hodges, O. W. Drew, C. N. Arms and Healy Cady. Benj. H. Dewey succeeded S. H. Stowell as cashier, Mar. 6, 1856, and served until May 1, 1865, when James K. Fullerton was appointed. Sept. 1, 1865, the bank re-organized under the National Bank Act as the Waterbury National Bank, with a paid up capital of $100,000, divided into 2,500 shares of $40 each. Officers: Leander Hutchins, president; James K. Fullerton, cashier; directors, Leander Hutchins, Paul Dillingham, O. W. Drew, J. H. Hastings, H. A. Hodges, C. N. Arms and Healy Cady. Mr. Hutchins served as president until Jan. 13, 1874, when, declining a further election, Paul Dillingham was chosen. Mr. Fullerton was cashier until Apr. 1, 1870, when Curtis Wells was appointed. At different elections the following persons were chosen to fill vacancies in the board of directors: Nathaniel Moody, Wm. P. Dillingham and W. H. H. Bingham, and Jan. 9, 1877, Wm. P. Dillingham was elected vice president. At the present time the capital of the bank is $100,000; surplus fund, $30,000; number of stockholders, 138.

W. P. DILLINGHAM.

WATERBURY MEN ABROAD.

Waterbury has sent many of her sons, or of her former residents, to other states. A few of them merit some mention. Two assisted in forming the constitution of Wisconsin, George Scagel and George Gale, both natives of this town. Mr. Gale founded a village and a university, and was a judge of one of the higher courts.

S. C. Sherman was many years a prominent citizen of Quincy, Ill. Several have been among the comparatively early citizens of Chicago, and some have long been residents in Louisiana. Our boys may be found in various parts of New York state and in the city, in most, or all of the New England states, in Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, California, and other states in every direction, many of them being successful farmers, merchants, doctors, ministers, lawyers, editors, inventors and manufacturers, and, indeed, in most avocations of life, Waterbury is represented creditably abroad as well as at home.

MRS. FANNIE BUTLER JANES, widow of the late Hon. Henry F. Janes, died in Waterbury, Nov. 5, 1881. She was the daughter of Governor Ezra Butler, the first permanent settler in Waterbury, born Feb. 1, 1800, in the house on the Burlington road, now occupied by E. H. Wells. There in her childhood days she had given refreshment to the soldiers going to the battle of Plattsburg, and her ears had listened to the cannon thunder of that combat. Before her father's door Governor Van Ness had halted to introduce LaFayette. In 1826, she married Mr. Janes. In sight of her birthplace, beneath the shade of the two great elms on the site of her son's new residence, their married life was wholly spent. The great elms were little trees then, a child could clasp them. She passed her declining years peacefully with her son, Dr. Henry Janes, and a brother, Russell Butler, Esq., survives her. In these centennial years we think our nation is growing old until we stand by the graves of the aged; then we are impressed with our country's youth, for how much of its history one such life can span!

THE STAR OF NATIONS,

Is the title to an unfinished religious poem of length, that Mrs. Julia Wallace Hutchins has long had under way:

O, Morning Star, in the Old World's east,
 Beyond the storm-cloud's wreath,
 When the thunder lowers on the Himalay,
 And the earthquake sleeps beneath,
 How dark would be the coming hour,
 Thy single ray withdrawn,
 Till the thunder wake, till the tempest break,
 In the day of Esdrelon;
 Till the rocks be rent, and the wrath is spent,
 O, Star of Hope, shine on. J. M. W.

The space is filled left for Waterbury, it was thought we would only have material for, when our compositors had set all the copy in, and had to enter Woodbury; but we will give, in 3d appendix later, a few more papers received since, than can be entered here.

WOODBURY.

BY HON. FERNANDO C. PUTNAM.

The early history of Woodbury is somewhat obscure from the absence of any record of its organization. In 1804, there was a deed recorded by Wm. West, town clerk, by which it may be inferred that the town had been organized.

First settlement was commenced in the east part of the town, and settlements were continued to the east and southern parts of the town several years,—or until 1809 or 10, when Nehemiah and Nathan Jackson, two strong, athletic men, moved from Randolph, and settled on the west side of the mountain. The first saw-mill was built in the south part of the town, near the Sabin pond, on a stream running from Dog pond. Soon after, there was a saw and grist-mill built half a mile south of the Center, on a stream running from Long pond.

Polly Sabin was the first female child born in town, Frederick Ainsworth the first male child. Wm. West was doubtless the first town clerk, and one of the first justices of the peace; Elisha Benjamin the first representative.

COMFORT WHEELER, settler and Revolutionary soldier, little is known of his early life, or when he was engaged in the service of his country; but it is told of him when recruiting service was going on in Massachusetts, he was considered quite too small to enter the army, but securing a block, he placed himself in the midst of the crowd on this, and when the recruiting officer observed him, he said of the boy, if he had so much energy as that, he would take him. His last years were made comfortable by a pension.

Capt. JOEL CELLEY among the early settlers, a man of energy and persevering effort, did much to give character to the town; was representative several years, and held many town offices. He was a shrewd farmer, and was reported to have one of the best farms in the county.

JABEZ TOWN came here when the town was yet young, and resided for years in a log-house, and maintained his family by hard labor; was a shoemaker, and made boots of a superior quality, which afforded him some income; but after the invention of a last-machine by his son, Abner Town, yet a minor, the sales of his lasts gave him a good income, which furnished him ample means for the remainder of his life.

CHARTER.

August 16, 1781, the Legislature of Vermont granted a charter of the town of Woodbury to William Lyman, Esq., and Col. Ebenezer Wood, and their associates as follows:

Joshua L. Woodbridge, Seth Murray, Elihu Murray, Israel Chapin, John Stone, Benjamin Sheldon, Samuel Cooke, Elisha Porter, John C. Williams, Thomas Hunt, Nathaniel Edwards, Ezra Phillips, Nahum Edgar, Asahel Pomeroy, Park Woodward, John Woodward, Asa Woodward, William Potter, Benedict Eggleston, Thos. Woodward, Joseph Clark, Henry Champion, Jr., Epaphroditus Champion, Thomas Miller, Joel Day, Anne Hathaway, William Gould, Nathaniel Chipman, Stephen Pearl, Joseph Jay, Thomas Tolman, Oliver Wright, Daniel Wright, Samuel Clark, Stephen Jenkins, Zebina Curtiss, Abel Adams, Moses Gifford, Thomas Chittenden, Timothy Brownson, John Fassett, Jr., Noble Everett, Jonathan Brace, Gustavus Walbridge, Rodolphus Walbridge, Caleb Benjamin, John Knickerbocker, Daniel Benjamin, Howel Woodbridge, Samuel Bishop, Noah Smith, Daniel Smith, Israel Smith, Chloe Smith, Simeon Hathaway, Shadrack Hathaway, Jale Hathaway, Jonathan Burrill, Enoch Woodbridge, John Burnham, Timothy Follett, Silas Robinson.

A copy of the charter and original grantees was obtained from the State records as recorded in the first Book of Charters of Lands, pages 166, 169, dated at Montpelier, "31st day of May, A. D. 1805." Signed by David Wing, Jr., Secretary of State.

Certified as follows:

"This may certify that the above and foregoing is a true Copy of the Original Charter of Woodbury.

Attest, ELIPH. HUNTINGTON, Proprietors' Clerk."

This town was called Woodbury, for the name of Col. Ebenezer Wood, one of the original proprietors.

The first action of the original proprietors was to lay out the town into three divisions, of which there is no record of the time, or by whom it was done, as will appear, as the notice of the first meeting of the proprietors was signed by Reuben Blanchard, a justice of the peace of Peacham, dated Aug. 8, 1804, to be held at the dwelling-house of Daniel Smith, in Woodbury, Oct. 8th, after. At said meeting Daniel Smith was chosen proprietors' clerk, and it was voted to lay out the whole of the undivided lands into lots of 100 acres each, in the same form in which the first division was laid, and John W. Chandler and James Whitelaw were chosen a committee to make said allotment. The above meeting was adjourned to Nov. 20, and again adjourned to May 25, 1805, when Eliphalet Huntington was chosen proprietors' clerk; Daniel Smith having previously moved out of town; and it was voted to accept the plan and field book of the westerly part of the town reported by their committee, and it was voted to assess a tax of $2.60 on the 2d and 3d division rights, to defray the expenses of surveying and lotting the 2d and 3d division of said town, and other incidental expenses, and Jonathan Elkins, Esq., was chosen collector. This meeting adjourned to June 4th, following. At this time the allotment of the 2d and 3d division having been completed, Mary Kenaston, an indifferent person, was chosen to draw the lots of said divisions; James Whitelaw, Esq., was chosen a committee to look up and procure the records of the former proceedings of the proprietors of Woodbury relative to their former divisions. Notice of the next meeting was signed by Jabez Bigelow, a justice of the peace of Ryegate, dated July 26, 1805, to be holden on the first day of October, following; at said meeting, the proprietors' clerk reported that the original plan and draft of the first division of lots in the town of Woodbury cannot be found, though considerable pains had been taken to obtain the same, and a new one was submitted and accepted, and it was voted "that it shall hereafter ever be considered the draft of the said first division as before stated." Jonathan Elkins, Esq., of Peacham, was appointed collector to collect the $2.60 on each right of the 2d and 3d division, unless paid immediately to him at Peacham, the same would be sold at public auction for said tax and costs, which sale was at the dwelling-house of Joshua Kenaston's in Woodbury. on the first day of October, A. D. 1805; attested by Jonathan Elkins, Jr., collector. At this sale John W. Chandler of Peacham, purchased about 50 lots for the sum of $3.32 per lot, being the amount of the tax and costs which he and his heirs have since sold from $50 to $200 per lot; the aforesaid first division was surveyed by one Chamberlain into lots of 100 acres each, being in all 91 lots, commencing to number at the S. E. corner of the town, counting east and west, each lot being known by its number and survey. The balance of said town was surveyed by Nathan Janes, being designated as "Janes' survey," containing 133 lots of 100 acres, each commencing to number at the S. E. corner of the 2d and 3d division, counting east and west, same as in the first division.

The first settler in the town was Gideon Sabin, who located in the east part, in the year 1795, or '96, and was followed the same year by Joseph Carr, and soon after by William West, all locating in the easterly part of the town; and according to the best information to be obtained, the next who located in town was in the year 1801, when Benjamin Ainsworth and John Bettis located in the south part of the town. The first 12 settlers are as follows: Gideon Sabin, Joseph Carr, Wm. West, Benjamin Ainsworth, John Bettis, Ephraim Ainsworth, Thomas Ainsworth, Ezekiel Ball, Daniel Rugg, Ferdinand Perry, Daniel Smith, and Samuel Mackres.

The first town meeting on record was Mar. 4, 1806, when said officers were chosen: moderator, Samuel Mackres; Wm. West, town clerk and treasurer; selectmen, Samuel Mackres, Joshua Kenaston, and Smith Ainsworth; constable, Benjamin Ainsworth; listers, David Rugg, Joshua Kenaston and Smith Ainsworth; grand-juror, Joshua Kenaston. At a subsequent meeting, there was a committee appointed to look up the early records of the town; but their labors were unavailing, and they were discharged. The oldest deed now on our records is dated Oct. 10, 1804, attested by Wm. West, town clerk.

The first birth in Woodbury was Polly Sabin; the second, Timothy Thomas; the third, Peter Sabin. The first death, that of an infant child of Gideon Sabin. The first grown person dying in town was the wife of Ezekiel Ball. The first marriage was John Thomas to Ruamy Ainsworth, married by William West, Esq., justice of the peace.

MILLS.

The first settlements being made on the east side of the town, adjoining Cabot, the inhabitants went there to get their logs sawed and grain ground, and also their store goods and mail, and which has been continued to the present time, it being their nearest business place; but soon after settlements were commenced in the south part of the town. In 1806, Anthony Burgess built a saw-mill on a stream which has its rise, or is the outlet of Dog pond, and empties into Sabin's pond, this mill being near the pond. This stream is about 3 miles in length. For many years there has been 4 saw-mills on it, all kept in running order. In 1818, Phineas K. Dow built a saw and grist-mill near the center of the town, on a stream which has its rise in Long pond, emptying into the Sabin pond, near the other, which mill under his supervision did a fair business many years. He also built, soon after, a saw-mill on a stream running from East Long pond into Nichols pond. Some portion of the time since there has been 10 saw-mills, which number is now reduced to 6, three of them recently built on improved plans. There is one grist-mill, which is located at South Woodbury. There are in town a wheelwright shop, which has an enviable reputation, doing a successful business, sales amounting to near $10,000 per annum; a sash, blind and door shop, and a last-factory, the latter having been established nearly 50 years, is now doing a good business—the best ever done, employing both steam and water power. There are also 3 lumber mills, which do an extensive business, one at the Centre, one at South Woodbury village, and one in the east part of the town; also, at So. Woodbury there is a machine shop, which manufactures J. W. Town's patent last-machines, also job work on a small scale.

SCHOOLS.

The first school taught in the town of Woodbury was by Sally White, in the year 1808.

The first record we find was in 1812, when three districts, which had been formed out of the new territory, and were designated as the northwest, southeast, and northeast school districts; but there had been short terms of school before this date in all of these districts, commencing at the northeast district, now No. 1; this portion of the town being first settled; next southeast, No. 2; northwest, No. 4. There was in 1812, in district 3, 73 scholars; in 1820, dist. 6, 176; 1830, dist. 9, 299; 1840, dist. 11, 363; 1850, dist. 11½, (fractional dist.,) 350; 1860, dist. 11, 330; 1870, dist. 10, 308.

Six of the districts have good school-houses built upon improved plans; some very recently, others have have been repaired, so that they are comfortable.

SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS.

F. C. Putnam, Jason Hatch, A. W. Nelson, Sidney O. Wells, Hiram Wells, Albert P. Town, Rufus Lawson.

REPRESENTATIVES.

Elisha Benjamin, 1812; no record in town or House Journal, 1813; John Bruce, 1814, 15, 16; Nathan B. Harvey, 1817; Benjamin Fowler, 1818, 19, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28; Joel Celley, 1820, 21, 22, 26, 29, 30; Ebenezer Bruce, 1831 to 35, 38; Luther Morse, 1835; Asaph Town, 1836, 37, 55; Abner Town, 1839, 40, 45; Ira McCloud, 1841, to 45, 46, 52; Michael Jackson, 1847, 48; Benjamin Wells, 1849, 50; Stephen C. Burnham, 1851, 53; Isaac Wells, Jr., 1854, 56; Hiram Putnam, 1857, 58; Orson Putnam, 1859, 60; J. W. Town, 1861, 62; Allen W. Nelson, 1863, 64; Joel C. Harvey, 1865; Roland B. Bruce, 1866; Alpheus S. Wheatley, 1867, 68; Nathaniel C. McKnight, 1869, 70, 71; Sidney O. Wells, 1872, 73.

TOWN CLERKS FROM 1806 to 1872.

William West, 1806-10; Joshua Kenaston, 1810, 11, 13, 14; Elisha Benjamin, 1812, 15; Jabez Town, 1816, 17, 18, 19-23, 25-32; Nathan B. Harvey, 1818; Joel Celley, 1823, 24; Asaph Town, 1832-49; William McGregor, 1849-52; Allen W. Nelson, 1852 to the present time, Dec., 1872.

FIRST JUSTICES OF THE PEACE: William West, Daniel Smith, Samuel Mackers.

POSTMASTERS.

Woodbury: Daniel Poor, Elias S. Drew, John B. Bliss, Asa Preston, William B. McGregor, Abner Town, A. W. Nelson, Ethan N. Ainsworth and Albert P. Town.

South Woodbury: Joel W. Celley and Orwell D. Town.

COUNTY OFFICERS.

Ebenezer Bruce, assistant judge, W. Co. Court, 1844, 45; Ira McLoud, high sheriff, W. Co. Court, 1849, 51; Asaph Town, senator, W. Co., 1851, 52; Fernando C. Putnam, assistant justice, W. Co. Court, 1867, 68.

In Jan., 1876, there was formed a Congregational church of 28 members, the present membership of which is 54. It seems to promise well for the future, and there is a flourishing Sabbath school connected with it. At South Woodbury there has been a union church built, an elegant building, but the same difficulty hangs over this that has troubled the builders of other churches, there remains a troublesome debt on the builders.

There is no library in town, but the town has paid considerable attention to education. There are many good school-houses, and teachers of the better class are generally employed.

Three young men have graduated from Burlington: Hon. Charles H. Heath, a lawyer in Montpelier, and Ernest C. Benjamin, a teacher of the high school in Barton. Geo. W. Kenaston, who graduated at Dartmouth, is in Ohio, engaged in teaching.

FREEWILL BAPTISTS.

It appears the first settlers were Freewill Baptists, and were connected with a church in Cabot until 1820, or 22, when through the efforts of Elder Ziba Woodworth, of Montpelier, they had a church formed in town. David Herrick and wife, Elisha Benjamin and wife, Mrs. Robert Bradish, Gideon Burnham and wife, Thomas Ainsworth and wife, John Bettis and wife, Mrs. John Thomas, Nathan Jackson and wife, and Nehemiah Jackson and wife were the principal members, located in different parts of the town. There were two deacons, David Herrick and Nehemiah Jackson. The church was re-organized about 1850; most of the old members having now died or moved away. Elder Isaac Swan was settled as their pastor. I will mention here the names of Elder Gideon Sabin and Elder Ephraim Ainsworth, who are said to have been of that faith; but Elder Sabin never united with the church, and Elder Ainsworth died before the church was organized. Elder Sabin was the first settler and first preacher. Elder Ainsworth was well advanced in life when he came; but both lived out their allotted time, and died in the town.

METHODISTS.

In 1816 there was a class formed by Elder Amasa Cole; John Goodell and wife, Capt. Joel Celley and wife, Anna Goodell, and Squire Jennings and wife were some of the members; but the first record proof is found in 1847, when the first class numbered 26 members; the West Woodbury class, 10. John Tibbetts was leader, and Asaph Town, Esq., steward, which office he held until his death, in Jan. 1871.

CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

The first church of this order in these parts seems to have been composed of members from four towns, Cabot, Marshfield, Calais and Woodbury, and was organized about 1820, with 40 or 50 members, and in a few years run up to 60 or 70. Meetings were held a share of the time in Woodbury, Elder John Capron, of Marshfield, J. R. Pettengill and R. Thompson being the first preachers. Subsequently, through the efforts of Elder Samuel Thurber, a church was formed in town whose members exceed that of either of the other churches. The meetings of the first church were held at the dwelling-house of Thos. Harvey, he and his wife being prominent members; afterwards, meetings were held at the Harvey school-house, which is in the east part of the town, and where the members nearly all resided. Elder Orrin Davis, of Calais, has preached a portion of the time for several years since to this society; also Elder Silas Wheelock, of the same town, has supplied the desk some, but for the last 4 years, Elder Jerome D. Bailey, resident of this town, has preached at the town-house and Harvey school-house from one-fourth to three-fourths of the time.

In 1826, the Freewill Baptists numbered at least 40 members, and at the same time the Methodists numbered about half the above numbers.

Within the recollection of the writer, there have been four distinct organizations of religious societies in town, viz.: Christians, Freewill Baptists, Methodists and Universalists.

In 1810, there was a revival in this town, but no very definite information can be obtained in regard to its extent. In 1821, or 1822, there was a general revival, prayer-meetings being held in nearly every house in town. Again in 1826, of some magnitude, and in 1842 and '43, a very general one spread over this town, as it did all over this section of the State. The exact number of converts at any of the above revivals is not known to the writer.

SABBATH-SCHOOLS.

The first was organized in 1842, with a library of 124 volumes, and Asaph Town was the first superintendent; Arad Jackson, John Voodry, Willard Streeter, Eliza Town, Phebe Town, Betsey Herrick, Dorcas A. Lyford, first teachers, with 36 scholars; Asaph Town, chairman, David Herrick, Jr., secretary, Curtis Osgood, treasurer.

A Sabbath-school was organized at the center of the town in 1848; Albert P. Town, present superintendent; volumes in library, 200; 6 teachers and 30 scholars.

The first Sabbath-school at East Woodbury was organized in 1838; Wm. Harvey superintendent, until his death in 1843. It was re-organized in 1865; Lewis Hopkins superintendent. The school has continued until the present time, '71, with an average of 35 to 40 scholars, the present superintendent being Thomas Harvey, Jr.

But little, however, will be said of churches, as I have no records to refer to, and the history of church edifices in this town does not embrace a very remote period. From the early days, meetings have been held here in school-houses, four or five of which were quite commodious. In the year 1840, the town built a town-hall or town-house, which has been used for holding meetings up to the present time. In 1870, the people here thought well to erect a church, and through the influence of several of our best inhabitants, a subscription paper was circulated, and a Union church society formed, with F. C. Putnam president, and S. O. Wells secretary, and a capital stock of $5,000.

At the first society meeting, Henry C. Wells, Ira G. Jewell and Edmund E. Ball were chosen building committee, and in the spring of 1871, work was commenced on the church, which is now completed, at a cost of $6,000. In size the church is 44x60, with projections in front and rear for spire and pulpit, and is finished inside with ash and black walnut, the 54 slips, circular, radiating from the pulpit, and will seat 324 persons. The spire is 120 feet high, surmounted by cardinal points and vane. The edifice is called one of the best wooden churches of its size in the State. It has also a vestry, with chairs to seat 300 persons, and seats that will swell the amount to probably 500 persons. It is located in the village of South Woodbury, and makes a very respectable addition to the appearance of this quiet village.

The township is diversified and somewhat broken. In the western part there is a mountain range, commencing in Calais, extending through the town, and ending near the Lamoille river in Hardwick. On the western slope of this mountain there are many productive farms. The soil is good, and produces excellent crops of hay and all the small grasses and corn in favorable seasons.

There is a beauty in this mountain range which attracts the notice of the passing stranger; some, if report be true, who have traveled in Europe say there is a striking resemblance to Switzerland scenery. The mountain is not so high as to make it difficult of ascent, yet sufficiently high to show what mighty throes there must have been in the bowels of the earth to cast up such vast piles of massive rocks. In winter, the evergreens standing in mantle of snow, give it a sombre appearance; in summer, the green verdure, stretching out green branches by interlocking them, seem to strive to cover up the craggy rocks; but when autumn comes, and frosts nip the verdure, and the mountain's brow is resplendant in a pleasing variety of colors, who has a taste for the beautiful cannot fail of emotions of pleasure; but where this beauty is mirrored by a pond, sleeping in quiet at its base, it is delightful, and the longer any one gazes, in a clear, autumnal day, the more he is enchanted; few objects in nature can surpass the beauty of this.

Two miles east of this range, there is another mountain standing alone, called Robinson mountain, and sometimes Foster mountain, because an enterprising farmer of that name felled the huge trees which covered it, and converted it into a luxurious pasture. This mountain is rich in granite and talcose slate, the granite prepondering. For centuries has the gray old mountain rested in quiet, but it is expected the quiet will soon be disturbed by the rattle of the machinery hammers of the workmen, who have begun the business of reducing some of this vast pile of rocks to such forms as are required for monuments and other purposes for which granite is used. The quality of the granite has been ascertained to be superior, as it is free from all foreign substances which causes some of the State granite to change its color when exposed to atmospheric influence and moisture. From the base of the mountain are scattered for miles around large and small boulders with the corners worn off, exhibiting the mighty force which must have been in exercise to have tumbled them along, and an annoyance to the ploughman; but the land makes excellent and enduring pasturage, as well as producing abundant crops of hay. In some sections of the town there is good and productive land, which well repays the tillers' toil, and those owning these lands have generally secured an ample supply of this world's goods.

There are some 23 ponds, large and small, in this township, most of which were well supplied with trout, which were the first settlers' pork barrel. And when they wearied of trout, the deer and moose offered an agreeable change, or an occasional round of bear meet; for bears, too, would sometimes come forth from their retreats to feast on the yellow corn and fat mutton. Bears love good mutton, but frequently they paid for the temerity by stepping into a huge steel trap which was sure to hold them, or coming in range of a gun so placed when they came in contact with a line attached, it would explode, and instead of a square meal of corn, the brute, unconscious of his danger, would yield his flesh and pelt to repay the debt he owed for corn. And about these ponds and streams there was then an abundance of animals whose pelts were secured for furs. Col. Jonathan Elkins, mentioned in the history of Peacham, and the famous Indian Joe, spoken of in the history of some of the towns, were often hunting on these grounds for beaver, otter, mink, muskrat, sable, and an animal called by the inhabitants fisher-master, or black cat, from its color. Those employed in building dams, might take a lesson from our beaver dams, some of them still standing, notwithstanding the ingenious builders have long since ceased to make repairs.

The first settlers in town were: JOSEPH CARR and GIDEON SABIN. Reports vary as to this, some saying they came together; others, that Joseph Carr came first, felled the first trees, and was subsequently joined by Gideon Sabin, who was a mighty hunter, before whose unerring aim the game was quite sure to fall. His was a complex character, composed of the qualities of hunter, preacher and farmer. The early settlers have often heard his stentorian voice when he called his faithful dogs. Hunting was his delight as long as he was able to pursue. Reynard, deer and bear have often been bagged by him.

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

There were three Revolutionary soldiers who made their homes here, whose last years were made comfortable from the pension bestowed on them by government, which were richly deserved for the toils and sufferings of those early days, for which they were paid in continental money which became worthless.

JOSEPH BLANCHARD

was born in Concord, N. H., where his ancestors resided, and where, when the dark clouds of despotism were hanging like a gathering storm over this country, the patriotism of young Blanchard compelled him to enter the ranks of those who went forth to protect their dearest rights from being snatched from them. He was for years in those stirring scenes which called for men of true worth to fight the battles of liberty, and his mind formed in the positive school of the times, when a tory was the object of extreme hatred, led him to be most decided in his likes and dislikes. He was a fast friend or a bitter foe; a man of a large heart and a quiet disposition, but when roused by opposition to some of his cherished views, the spirit of early life developed itself strongly. He left a numerous progeny, a very large proportion of whom have well sustained the character of their progenitors in integrity and uprightness.

DAVID RUGG

came into town when it was yet almost an unbroken wilderness, and made a home for himself and family. He also went forth early at his country's call, and continued during the war of the Revolution. He was at the battle of Bunker Hill, and among those behind the breastwork made of rail fence and newly-mown grass. He said he was near Gen. Putnam during the fight, who encouraged his men by some of his off-hand speeches, and they, partaking of his spirit, fought with desperation. When Washington took command of the forces, he was still in the service, and when Arnold was about to betray West Point, he was called with a few others to skirmish with the vessel which brought Andre on his mission to purchase West Point of the traitor Arnold, and when they were about to fire from the ship, he, with his fellows, retreated behind a large pine tree standing on the shore. On that cold, stormy night, when Washington and his division were enabled to cross the Delaware and march to Trenton, Mr. Rugg was among his soldiers who went forth from their gloomy abodes to victory; and when the storm of war was gathering about Yorktown, he was still in the army of Washington, and witnessed his final departure from his disbanded army, and returned to Massachusetts, and gave his last $70 of the depreciated currency of the time for a mug of flip. His pension came just in time to save him, whose early life had been devoted to the service of his country, from a pauper's home, and saw him standing in all the dignity of the true patriot and conqueror.

PAID COMMUTATION.—Geo. C. Bemis, Augustus A. Bliss, Edwin Bruce, Roland B. Bruce, Alonzo A. Clark, Samuel Daniels, John A. Goodell, Ira G. Jewell, Stephen Leavitt, Martin Lyford, Corliss G. Osgood, Benjamin F. Rideout, Willard Strague, True A. Town, Vergil B. Webster, Sidney O. Wells, George White, Augustus O. Wilber.

This town not only furnished more men than required to fill its quota without any public meetings to stimulate enlistments, and without paying any of the large bounties which most of the towns in the State were compelled to, but furnished several men for Hardwick, Cabot, Marshfield, Calais, East Montpelier, Elmore and a few other towns. We claim for Woodbury an excellent and honorable war record. I think it will be found that there were more men went to the war from here than any town in the State with the same number of inhabitants. I have not recorded any more on this list which we are not entitled to, and none but what at the time of their enlistment were residents of our town.

By the request of Hon. F. C. Putnam, I have given this list.

O. D. T.

JOSHUA M. DANA, was born Dec. 12, 1805, at West Lebanon, N. H. ; he was the grandson of William Dana, one of the first settlers of Lebanon, and son of Wm. Dana, Jr. He lived at Lebanon till he was about 12 years old ; then his father moved to Montpelier, where he lived a few years, and after moved to Calais. He spent most of the time in Montpelier and Calais, for several years. About 1856, he bought land in Woodbury, and began clearing it ; built a house, barn, etc. In September, 1858, he was married to Miss C. C. Bennett, daughter of Mr.

Nicholas Bennett of East Montpelier, and went to Woodbury for a permanent home, where he resided until his death, July 3, 1878.

His widow and son, Charles H. Dana, are still living on the farm he cleared for their home. He was an honest man, a good citizen, and beloved by his friends.

His remains were interred in the "Cutler burying ground," at East Montpelier.

H. M. D.

[He was a somewhat extensive contributor for the Montpelier papers. In the Watchman I find papers on farming, in the Argus and Patriot, "Early Incidents in the history of Lebanon," (N. H.)—"An Indian Scare," etc.,—so traditionally good and well told, we regret the history of both Calais and Woodbury had not been written up while he was alive to have assisted. Woodbury is 15 miles from Montpelier; Mr. Dana would come out a-foot to his sister's here, and return again on foot to the last year of his life. On one of these visits, Thanksgiving, 1876, his sister, Miss Hannah M. Dana, who lives in the first cottage under the cliff, Elm Street, gave him a gold pen he was to use in writing to her, and he writes: "Jan. first, eighteen hundred seventy-six." We glean from to keep a picture, of this old and quaint Washington County writer's Woodbury home, as drawn by himself.]

(When he got home.)

The boy had been good
And fed all the stock,
Had brought in all the wood,
And wound up the clock.

Three cows that are good,
Three heifers the same—
Three steers to draw wood,
And four calves that are tame ;

Two sheep we can boast,
Two leaders, with others behind;
To bake, boil, or roast,
Or for wool they'r the kind.

And then Charley's hens
The corn they devour;
Makes them look like fat Cochins—
Fit to eat any hour !

Threescore and ten!
Only think of my age,
In the tramps I have been
I shall no more engage.

WORCESTER.

BY CHARLES C. ABBOTT.

This town in the N. W. of Washington Co., lat. 44° 24', long. 4° 25', is bounded N. and W. by Elmore and Stowe, in Lamoille Co., S. by Middlesex, and E. by Calais. Who were the first white men that visited the town is unknown. The French and Indians passing from Canada to the older settlements on the Connecticut river, are said to have had their trail through this town, but have left no record of their names or of the place where.

The town, with its present name and limits, was chartered June 8, 1763, by Gov. Wentworth of N. H., to grantees: Joshua Mason, Thomas Burgee, Robert Burgee, John Davidson, Robert Davidson, Samuel Halstead, Joshua Halstead, Wm. Davidson, Benjamin Betts, Samuel Betts, Abraham Betts, Ichabod Betts, John Betts, Grant Striker, Henry Dickinson, Anthony Baker, Joshua Hutchins, Samuel Dodge, Job Bacon, Wm. Gibbons, Wm. Pusey, James Gibbons, Wm. Ashbridge, David Bacon, Manning Bull, Thomas Shroves, Joseph De Camp, Lambert DeCamp, John Hand, Robert Stanbury, Joshua Underhill, Samuel De Camp, John Nefus, Josiah Stanbury, Moses Little, Wm. Trundenborough, Ephraim Cutler, John DeCamp, Ebenezer Cutler, Joseph Young, David Cutler, David DeCamp, Daniel Marsh, Isaac Burger, Jacob Noe, Isaac Noe, Jr., John Turner, George Woods, John Gifford, Benjamin Ogden, Crowley Barrow, Thomas Young, Wm. Mitchel, Charles Wiggins, John Hofnall, John Cockle, Henry Franklin, Hon. James Nevin, Nathaniel Barrell, Esq., Joseph Newmarsh, Esq., Col. Samuel Barr, and Maj. Joseph Blanchard. The charter was for 6 miles square, to be divided into 69 rights, or lots of 4 divisions each. The 1st division 1 acre, the 2d div. 3 acres, the 3d div. 38 acres, the 4th 7 acres. The 1 acre lots were laid out in the center of the town and are comprised in the farm now owned by Wm. H. Kellogg; the 7 acre lots, around this one, mostly on the west; the 38 acre lots on the west side of the town, adjoining Stowe. The Governor's right in the S. W. corner, and the 300 acre lots comprised the rest of the town. There is now no record of any meeting of the original grantees to be found, nor any conveyances from them; and there was much litigation in regard to land titles in the early history of the town. Much of the land is now held under titles from "tax collectors," having been sold for taxes.

The surface of the town is very uneven, and the western part is intersected by the eastern range of the Green Mountains. There are four principal peaks in this town, from which are extensive and very fine views of the surrounding country and villages, especially from Mount Hunger, in the S. W. part of the township, the summit of which is rocky and almost entirely devoid of vegetation, and permits an unobstructed prospect in all directions. [For its history, see Middlesex, 229-231.]

The meadows on the North Branch, and on the larger brooks, are fertile and easy of cultivation. The uplands are well adapted to stock raising and dairy purposes, to which a large share of the farmers give their attention.

The town is watered by the North Branch, a mill stream from Elmore, flowing southerly through the length of the town, emptying into the Winooski in Montpelier. There are also large brooks, some of which serve for mill purposes; the largest, Minister brook, was named from its mouth being in the lot granted to the first settled minister. But one natural pond is in the town limits, Worcester pond, near the eastern line and "Eagle Ledge" road. It contains some 8 acres, and has furnished many pickerel and trout to the settlers. The streams all furnished at an early day an abundance of trout, and are still the yearly resort of the disciples of "Izaak Walton" from neighboring towns, who eagerly explore every stream where a "speckled beauty" is supposed to lurk. A deep pool, that is worn in the rock by action of a waterfall, in a rocky ravine just above the house of Thomas Reed, has long been a favorite resort for trying to ensnare some of the large trout which make the pool their home. Now and then one is captured, but generally the wary fish is not lured from its lurking place, and the fisher, sometimes spending hours in his labor, leaves the spot with his basket as light as when he came; but perhaps thinking himself repaid for his visit by a view of the wild and beautiful scenery of the place.

Gold has been found in some localities, more especially in the bed of Minister brook. A few years since a stock company was formed under a State charter, called the Minister Brook Mining Company, and the bed of the brook and lands bordering on it were leased. Other companies have at intervals "prospected" the brook since, with just what results is not generally known.

FIRST SETTLEMENTS.

The first settlers of the town were John Ridlon and George Martin, who came from Kennebec, Me., in 1797, and commenced a settlement on the 1-acre lot, laid out in the center of the town on "Hampshire hill." They erected a house of split bass-wood logs, and cleared some 10 or 12 acres. It is said they soon left, and the farm where they first commenced was not permanently settled until several years after. They must have come back again soon and settled on the Branch, where L. M. Hutchinson now lives, as both tradition and the land records indicate they lived there in 1803, and made the first permanent settlement there.

Ridlon was elected to the Constitutional Convention in 1814, and perhaps died in this town. It is not certain what became of Martin. The oldest inhabitants have no knowledge of him. We find in 1805, John Ridlon conveyed a portion of this land to Ansel Bates, by whom it was afterward conveyed to Cyrus Brigham, who lived on it many years. The records show Martin in connection with Ridlon, and Benjamin Saunders held an interest in the place, as a quit-claim deed from John Fay, of Burlington, to Samuel B. Stone, who lived here in 1805, dated Feb. 7, 1802, specifies, "Mr. Stone is to indemnify said Fay against all claim which said Ridley, Geo. Martin and Benjamin Saunders may have in the land by reason of a former deed of the same." Ridlon's name is on the record, as also Ridler and Ridley. It must be that the first land records were lost or burned with the town records, as these deeds referred to are not found on the record now in the town clerk's office. There must have been several families in town in 1800, as "Deming's Catalogue" gives 25 inhabitants that year.

Matthias Ridlon, son of John, owned a lot of land soon after this in the eastern part of the town, where Elias Bascom afterward settled. He probably did not live on it, but with his father; in 1812, they lived where Henry E. Hunt now lives. Matthias enlisted in the war of 1812, and died at home soon after he came from the army; Guy, son of Carpus Clark, also enlisted in that war and died in the army.

The town was in 1797 an evergreen forest, interspersed with hard timber on the lower lands. But openings soon appeared, as other settlers followed close after Ridlon and Martin.

The town was organized Mar. 3, 1803. Duncan Young with his family, himself, wife, 2 daughters, 2 sons, Daniel and John, came from Calais in 1802, and settled on right No. 13, where S. M. Seaver now lives, but stayed only two or three years, and removed to Montpelier. His oldest son, David, was a resident of this town in after years, and was the father of J. M. and P. D. Young, who yet live here, and Mrs. Martin C. Brown. From 1802 to '12, we find from the land records, residents: Henry Goodale, James Green from Waterbury, Carpus Clark, Elisha B. Green, (who built the first saw-mill on the present site of H. T. Clark's mill,) Daniel Colby, Uriah Stone, and Amasa Brown.

John Young, son of Duncan, was the first town clerk; James Green, representative in 1808; other town officers unknown, as the town records before 1816 (when it lost its organization,) were deposited for safe keeping at Burlington, where they were burned. The land records go back to 1803; from them and tradition we have gathered this period of our history.

The first deed on record is from Joseph and William Hutchins to John Shurtleff, all of Montpelier, in the County of Caledonia, June 4, 1803, claiming the right of John Turner (original proprietor,) which embraced the 300-acre lot No. 14, on the branch, adjoining Middlesex line. A few years after the same was sold for taxes, and Cyrus Brigham bought the part where L. M. Hutchinson now lives. At the date of the first deed, Worcester was in Chittenden Co.; at the time of the tax sale in Jefferson Co.; the first deed on record to a resident, is from Ebenr. Rice of Montpelier, to John Young, July 8, 1803, conveying a part of the land now the farm of S. M. Seaver. In 1805, a large number of rights were sold for a tax by the Legislature to build roads and bridges, and 25 rights unredeemed, were conveyed by the collector, Charles Bulkley, to the highest bidder, to be sold in the same way in 1809, and 1812. The land records the first 10 years are largely made up of these "tax sales." In 1813, public notice was given of a land tax by Carpus Clark, 1st constable; in 1811, his name is on the record as justice of the peace, and of Carpus Clark, John Ridlon and Elisha Green, as commissioners to lay out a road tax, and in 1812 Carpus Clark and Daniel Colby were selectmen, appears from record of a lease of the minister land by them to Elisha B. Green for $5 annual rent till a minister should be settled. (See lists of town officers.) These with the town clerks are all the officers we can trace to 1821.

Most of the settlers, without much means, who came because land was cheap, till they could make a clearing and raise a crop, had to make "many a shift" for the bare necessities of life. Some left, and but few came in to take their places. However, those who remained paved somewhat the way for those who should come after, and kept up their courage with hopes of better times till 1812 to 16, when they had to encounter several cold summers, frosts cutting off their crops and discouraging the bravest hearts, till the summer of 1816 came, so cold as some who were children then, say, "as to freeze their steer's horns off." There were frosts every month through that summer. That season, utterly discouraged, most of the inhabitants left the town. No town meeting was held, and Worcester lost its organization.

In 1818, there was but one family, that of Amasa Brown, Esq., left in town. It was a standing jest for some years, that Mr. Brown threw his family on the town at this time, for their support. Wild game was plenty, deer abundant, bears frequently seen; the latter have strayed this way in later years; they have been "wary bears," it is not known that more than two or three were ever killed here. Three moose were shot here in the early days; one, where the Methodist meeting-house stands, by Micah Hatch of Middlesex, which was sent to Boston Museum, where its skin probably remains to this day. Another was killed on the old Templeton farm, and one on the Thomas Reed farm.

A once large, deserted beaver settlement was seen a few years ago, on the meadow now covered by the mill-pond of Moses P. Wheeler.

On the first road, from Middlesex Center over "Hampshire Hill" to Elmore, and known then as the smugglers' road, was the clearing on the one acre lots, and the first basswood log-house, used by the smugglers of those days as a rendezvous for their cattle and horses. In 1812, there was no other road through the town, and but a pathway had been marked and cut from Montpelier, penetrating the southern part of the town near the branch; comfortable roads were reserved for later times, and milling done at Montpelier, or in some of the older settlements south of us. The town contained neither store or tavern during its first organization.

Mr. Brown having, perhaps, more means than his neighbors, remained in town, himself and wife and 4 sons and 7 daughters. His sons were Milton, Amasa, Jr., Cyrus and Martin Chittenden, the last receiving his name from having been born on the same day that Martin Chittenden was elected governor, Oct. 21, 1813. His birth, also, is the first recorded in town, and he is still living here.

Milton Brown was the first constable under the second organization, a justice of the peace many years, town representative 7 years, a councillor in 1835, and superintendent of the Vermont State Prison 4 years.

In 1850, he removed to Montpelier; was admitted to the Washington County Bar, and died July 3, 1852. Amasa, the second son, studied theology at Newton, Mass., Theo. Sem., and is a Baptist minister, residing at Newton, N. H. Cyrus, the other son, is a lawyer and resides in this town, being the only member of the bar ever residing here.

One of the daughters married Oliver Watson, May 29, 1817, the first recorded marriage in town. Judge Edwin C. Watson, of Hartford, and Dr. Oliver L. Watson, of West Topsham, are their sons, born in Worcester. Mr. Watson and wife celebrated their golden wedding.

Between 1818 and 1820, Wm. Arbuckle, Thayer Townsend, Job Hill and Jesse Flint came into the town. Mr. Arbuckle lived in a small log house on Amasa Brown's land. Mr. Townsend settled on the hill on the "Closson" farm, where Wm. Bruce, Jr., now lives; Job Hill, on the place where Leonard Hamblet lives. In the fall of 1820, Allen Vail prepared a place for his family; also Thomas Reed, Jr., from Londonderry. Mr. Reed moved his family to Middlesex early in 1820, to Mr. Benjamin Baldwin's, Mrs. Reed's father, who lived near Christopher C. Putnam's present residence. Mr. B. had at this time built a saw-mill where Putnam's mill now is, the second in town. Reckoning from the time Mr. Reed commenced work on his farm, his was the third or fourth family here.

One or two others must have come the same year, but I have not learned who they were. Mr. Vail had 2 sons and 6 daughters. He settled where H. A. Hancock now lives, but soon on the next lot north, and built a saw-mill where Mr. Putnam's "Worcester" mill stands. Mr. Reed built on the farm on which himself and wife still live, it being nearly 58 years since. They must be by far the most permanent residents of the town. During the next 3 years the population increased quite fast, and some commenced building frame-houses. The lumber for the first ones was sawed at the mill of Mr. Baldwin, in Middlesex, by which it seems the first mill built where Clark's mill now is must have fallen into disuse, but mills were soon put in operation here. At the close of 1821, there were three frame-houses—Thayer Townsend's, the first on the hill near Calais line, where he first settled, Dodge Hayward's, on the Dea. Poor place, where Cyrus Brown now lives, and Thomas Reed's, where he still resides.

Others who came to town from 1820 to '23 or '24, were David Poor, Capt. Artemas Richardson and wife, Franklin Johnson, Oramel L. Smith, Cyrus Crocker, J. P. B. Ladd, Jonas and Nathan Abbott, Ebenezer S. Kellogg and wife, Joel H. Templeton and family, Eleazer Hutchinson and family, from Norwich; Dea. Matthias Folsom and wife and David Folsom and Amos Rice and wife, from Dover, Vt.; Leonard Hamblet, from Dracut, Mass., found mentioned in the town records, with others whose names we have not learned. All named were prominent citizens and have died in town, except Jonas Abbott, who is still living, and Mr. Kellogg, who died the present year (1871), in Hanover, N. H.

We have now come to where we have the town records for a guide. March 14, 1821, a call for a meeting of the legal voters was made by Joseph Wing, justice of the peace of Montpelier; held at the dwelling-house of Amasa Brown, March 28, 1821, Allen Vail moderator, and Amasa Brown town clerk; who was sworn to the faithful discharge of the duties of said office in the presence of the meeting by Joseph Wing, Esq. Allen Vail, Amasa Brown, Job Hill, were chosen selectmen; Allen Vail, treasurer; Milton Brown, first constable and collector of taxes; Allen Vail, Amasa Brown, Jesse Flint, listers; Job Hill, grand juror; Jesse Flint, highway surveyor; Abraham V. Smith, Wm.

Arbuckle, Jesse Flint, fence viewers; Amasa Brown, pound keeper.

Voted, that Mr. Brown's barn be considered as the Pound; made choice of Job Hill, sealer of weights and measures; Hezekiah Mills, hay ward; Oliver Watson, committee to settle with the treasurer; Abraham V. Smith, school trustee.

We cannot forbear pausing to wonder if Mr. Watson found the duties of his office very burdensome? As there was no overseer of the poor chosen at that meeting, Apr. 20, another meeting was held, at which it was Voted, to raise 8 mills on the dollar on the list to defray the necessary expenses of the town; and to form the town into one school district; and raise one cent on the dollar of the list for the support of schools for the year ensuing; and to have a highway tax assessed on the list, to be made the year ensuing, and that 9 hours be considered as a day's work.

Worcester was ahead of the ten-hour law.

There are those still living in town who attended the first school, in the winter of 1821 and 22, Allen L. Vail, Cyrus and Martin C. Brown, Mrs. Olive Brown Johnson, and perhaps one or two others, who remember that school in the old log-house on the Hutchinson farm, near Mr. Phineas A. Kemp's present residence. Job Hill was the teacher, and the school was much larger in proportion to the number of families than are the present schools. The next school was taught by Betsey Cutler, in a log dwelling-house near where S. M. Seaver now lives. The first school-house was built about this time, of logs, near the late Samuel Andrews' house.

From 1823, the increase of population was more rapid than it had been the two or three years preceding. The openings in the forest became more numerous; the fields of grass, grain and potatoes more widely extended; the cattle and sheep increased, and the first comers could begin to realize some of the hopes which had sustained them through years of privation.

In 1823, a road was surveyed and worked up the Branch through the town, so as to be passable. Its survey was by Jesse Elmon and Danforth Stiles, a committee authorized by the Legislature of 1822, the first road recorded in town. Others soon began to branch off. Up Minister brook, up the brook towards Calais, on to the hills where the settlers had built their dwellings, on Hampshire hill; and new dwellings were built, and from what can be learned of the older citizens, it would seem that the social nature of the early inhabitants was better cultivated and developed than it is at the present day. Neighborly visits were prized in proportion to the difficulties in making them. People seemed more dependent on each other for those necessities to make life pleasant. Meetings also were better attended, and generally much more highly prized than now; and much of the restraints of social intercourse, under which the people of this day labor, was then unknown. All were poor; and all were ready and willing to help each other.

From the second organization of the town until 1835, town meetings were held at Amasa Brown's (afterwards at Milton Brown's) house, except two in 1823, which were held, by vote of the town, in Mr. Brown's shop. At a meeting called for the purpose, held Mar. 26, 1834, it was Voted, that town meetings in future be held at the Plastered School-house, nigh Milton Brown's in said Worcester.

The next and subsequent meetings were held at that place. (Dis. No. 2,) until 1841; a vote being taken in March, 1840, to hold them hereafter in the school-house in district No. 1. That house was at the "corner," and stood on the spot where Ferris Leonard's house was lately burned. The old school-house now stands nearly opposite the present town clerk's office, and is used for a blacksmith shop. When the first meeting-house was built, a hall was built in the basement, which the town bought for a town hall; and Jan. 26, 1846, it was "Voted, That town meetings hereafter shall be held at the new town house in Worcester," which was built in 1845, and since that time town meetings have been held in the spacious town hall under the Congregational meeting-house.

SCHOOLS.

We have no records of before the second organization. After that, the people at once gave the subject their earnest attention. It was "Voted, in April, 1821, to have one school-district"; March, 1823, to divide the town into three school districts; and March, 1824, a committee of three was appointed to re-district the town, and the same day the town was divided into four school districts:

District No. 1: Eleazer Hutchinson, David Poor, J. P. B. Ladd, Artemas Richardson, — Hammet, (probably Leonard Hamblet) J. Hubbard, O. L. Smith, Oliver Watson, Hezekiah Mills, — Porter, Wm. Arbuckle, W. Foster, J. Hill, Jonas Abbott.

District No. 2: A. Rice, Amasa Brown, J. Robinson, Allen Vail, Eben. S. Kellogg, Ophir Leonard, John Clark, Franklin Johnson, Ashley Collins, A. V. Smith.

District No. 3: — Benson. A. A. Brown, — Hinkson, (probably Wm.,) Thomas Reed, Jr., Tristram Worthen.

District No. 4.—Jesse Flint, Matthias Folsom, Samuel Upham, J. Griffin, E. Clough, Nathan Abbott, Wm. Bennett, A. Bennett, Flint Gove, Frizzle Perrin, David Folsom. The report was signed by Amasa Brown for committee.

The first record of number of families and scholars was made March, 1829, and returned by the district clerks were: District No. 1, 13 families, 33 scholars; district No. 2, 9 families, 22 scholars; district 3, 6 families, 18 scholars; district 4, 15 families, 41 scholars; not in limits of any district, 1 family and 4 scholars; total, 44 families and 118 scholars.

At the present time there are 9 districts and one fractional, belonging to a Middlesex district. The last returns were Apr. 1, 1878; families, 191; scholars, 271.

There are 9 school-houses in town, in which are schools from 10 to 12 weeks, summer and winter.

POUNDS.

The town has owned two Pounds. The first, a log one, built according to a vote of the town, 1822, "That a pound be built by every man turning out the 15th of June next." It was located on the east side of the road, on the meadow south of Henry E. Hunt's barn. The story is told that this pound after awhile got out of repair and the gate fallen down, so there was free ingress and egress; and the cattle of the neighborhood, taking advantage of the situation, found a warm yard in which they could lie. In course of time, the ground within the enclosure became enriched, and Mr. C., who lived near by, thinking it would bear good corn, ploughed up the enclosure, planted it and fenced up the gateway. The corn grew, and there was a prospect of a big yield; but his hopes were destined to be blasted. When it was just right to roast, somebody (supposed to be the "hatters") harvested it in the night, leaving Mr. C. nothing for his pains.

The second was built in 1836, the town appropriating $30. It was walled with stone, hewed timbers on the top; a little south of the first, on the other side of the road, near the "town brook." It was used occasionally, as was the first, to get up quarrels and lawsuits among the neighbors until about 1850; the stone of which it was made was used to repair the highway.

Since that time, various barnyards have been constituted pounds from year to year, by vote of the town, but no case of impounding an animal has occurred for many years.

March 2, 1847, the town was called on to vote license or no license, and in that year and three following years, the vote stood: 1847, license, 55, no license, 29; 1848, yea, 58, nay, 40; 1849, yea, 28, nay, 53; 1850, yea 51, nay, 38.

At a meeting of the selectmen of Worcester, Mar. 15, 1851,

Voted, to license Henry B. Brown to sell pure alcohol, brandy and wine, for the time of one year from this date, under the following restrictions, viz.: 1st, the said Brown shall at all times keep a just and accurate account of all purchases and sales. 2d, to sell only as a medicine. 3d, to sell none to be drank in or about the store. 4th, allowed to sell to none who are in the habit of using it as a beverage, without a certificate from a physician. Edwin C. Watson, Abel Whitney, Horace Carpenter, selectmen.

At a meeting of the board of selectmen of Worcester, Mar. 19, 1852, Voted, to grant Cyrus Brown license to keep a public inn and sell therein victuals, all kinds of fruits, small beer and cider for the term of one year from this date. Franklin Johnson, Samuel P. Alexander, Joseph Ford, selectmen.

Tithingmen were occasionally chosen at the early town meetings, David Poor in 1822, but they soon appear to have gone out of fashion.

The first, or old burying-ground was across the road from the present one. There is no record of the old ground. The second one was laid out under a vote of the town passed in March, 1831; 1 acre; surveyed by Milton Brown. The first bodies buried in it were those removed from the old ground.

In 1873, the town purchased about 3½ acres of P. A. Kemp, Esq., for $300, enclosing the old ground on three sides, which was surveyed and laid in lots and driveways by James K. Tobey, Esq., of Calais. It contains in all 303 lots, and the whole together makes a commodious and beautiful cemetery, of which the town may justly be proud.

March, 1831, the town voted not to tax Abner Dugar for the time being, he being blind.

Before the farms were cleared, lumbering and shingle-making were much in vogue, but the land, as soon as cleared and planted, produced large crops of potatoes; so it used to be said, with the Worcester people, lumber, shingles and potatoes were considered as "legal tender." Since the early saw-mills were built, there have been several in operation during the whole time. The old "up and down" saws have all given place to the improved "circular" mills, of which the town now has five, with several others just over the border.

Immense quantities of logs are cut in Worcester every year, which are sawed, planed and matched for market. At first there was an abundance of pine trees, which have disappeared, and spruce, hemlock and several kinds of hard wood now furnish the material for lumber.

It is related of some of the earlier inhabitants, when the town was in large part owned by non-residents, they were in the habit of buying of the proprietors, for a trifle, the pine trees which had fallen down on their lands, and getting them manufactured into lumber, or making shingles for sale. To make the business more profitable, it is said that some felled such fine trees as they wished to buy, and suffering them to lie a year or two, included them in the windfalls, and sometimes did not even wait for the trees to grow old before hauling them to mill. At one period, a large portion of the lands were held by Alex. Ladd, who lived in New Hampshire, and titles being uncertain, other parties sought to acquire a right in the same lands by "squatting," which led to much litigation in regard to the possession. A large portion of the inhabitants were at one time engaged for one party or the other in their endeavors to hold the land. The controversy culminated in what is known as the lumber war.

As the story is told by those conversant with the matter, some parties had bought the pine trees on a portion of the disputed territory in the north part of the town, and commenced to cut and draw. The agents for the other parties claiming the lands, set to work to prevent this. They felled trees across the roads, cut up the logs, and used all means, except personal violence, in their power to hinder the work. One man is said to have ruined a nice ax in cutting out the iron pins of a sled during the darkness of the night, and as the excitement increased, the friends of either party came to their assistance, until quite a company was arrayed on either side. They held the ground night and day for several days, and there was much hard words and loud talk. But during the whole excitement, it is said, there was only one clinch, and in that struggle, the man who came uppermost in the fall was compelled to call lustily to his friends to "take that man off from him," while himself was yet at the top. The first party succeeded in getting out a portion of their logs, and the dispute was eventually settled by the courts. The lumbering job was, however, done at a loss in a pecuniary view to those engaged in it.

Mr. Ladd, by his agent, Judge Loomis, of Montpelier, had put one Gilman Parmenter on to the lot of land in the S. E. corner of the town, where James M. Gould now lives, to hold possession against a Mr. Spear, who also claimed it. Mr. Parmenter built a log shanty, and moved in before he had put the roof on it. One day, when Mr. Parmenter was gone from home, leaving his wife to keep possession, some of Mr. Spear's agents attempted to get possession by climbing into the enclosure, but Mrs. Parmenter, comprehending the responsibility resting on her, was equal to the emergency. Hastily placing a ladder against the wall, she seized the tea-kettle, which was full of boiling water, and with this weapon ascended the ladder, and made such good use of it, that the intruders were compelled to hastily retreat, leaving the plucky woman in possession of the premises. The matter of title to this, as well as the aforementioned lands, was finally settled by the courts in Mr. Ladd's favor.

HAT MANUFACTORY.

When the town was new and fur-bearing animals plenty, a hat manufactory was established, and the business of hat-making carried on several years. The building was on the farm now owned and occupied by George D. Tewksbury. Hat-making was carried on several years by Edmund Blood, who came from Bolton, Mass., went into the heart of the wilderness, off from any road, put up a factory, boarding-house, and other necessary buildings, gathered his help, some say from 75 to 100, and went to work making hats for the gentry. The road at this time was over the river west from the building. Judging from the stories told, we think his hands employed were a great element in the social part of community and in town-meetings.

Just what year Mr. Blood came here, we do not know, but find he purchased the land in 1828. He died previous to Apr. 1831, as we find by the records, and the hat business was not continued long afterwards. The old hat factory was taken down in 1849 by A. L. Vail, and the materials used in the erection of a dwelling house in the village. Mr. Andrew A. Sweet, of Montpelier, could probably tell the story of the hat business better than any other man living.

Tanning was carried on several years. In 1849, Ebenezer Frizzell came from Berlin, and bought of John Clark the mill and water privilege where H. T. Clark's mill now stands, and built a tannery. Edwin C. Watson was associated with Mr. Frizzell a short time in the business, which they afterward sold to Simon Wheeler, of Plainfield. During quite a number of years, Mr. Wheeler and Nathan W. Frye, from Woburn, Mass., carried on the business, employing several hands. About 1861, the tannery was burned, and was never rebuilt.

The knitting business was a source of considerable income to many families for several years. It was commenced by Mrs. Artemas Richardson, and when she moved away, was continued by Mrs. Frances E. Celley, chiefly for the firm of H. B. Claffin & Co., of New York, and kept many women and children industrious, returning an income of several thousands of dollars.

Exporting raspberries was for a few seasons carried on quite extensively. From 1866 to about '74, it was an income to the women and children. From 2 to 8 tons per season were shipped from here to the Boston market, mostly by Templeton & Vail, merchants, for 4 to 6 cents per lb.

There are (1878) in town some 170 dwelling-houses, 2 meeting-houses, 1 store, 1 hotel, the Worcester House, 5 saw-mills, 3 blacksmith-shops, 1 grist-mill, 9 school-houses, 1 post-office, a town clerk's office and town hall. There are also a "Grand Army Post," a "Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry," and a "Lodge of Good Templars." The village has some forty dwelling-houses.

POST OFFICE,

for statistics, we are indebted to Hon. Charles Lyman, formerly of Montpelier, and for many years chief of the dead letter department of the P. O. Department, Washington. An office was established here Jan. 5, 1828. The inhabitants had before procured, what little mail matter they received, at Montpelier.

Amos Rice was appointed first postmaster, Jan. 5, 1828; Amos Rice, Jr., Mar. 5, 1828; Rufus Reed, Jr., Jan. 31, 1831; Samuel Andrews, Nov. 2, 1832; Jonas Abbott, April 1, 1847; Oliver A. Stone, Sept. 18, 1853; Thaddeus B. Ladd, Aug. 25, 1854; Charles C. Abbott, April 13, 1861, who is the present incumbent—1879.

John Rice, son of Amos Rice, was the first mail carrier; and it has been stated that at the first he carried the mail in his hat—now there are some 300 copies of newspapers and magazines taken in town. After a good road was worked through the town to Elmore, the mail was carried through here to the towns north; and subsequently the route from Montpelier and the south, to St. Albans, was through this town, and continued so until the Central Vt. R. R. was built. We now have a daily mail (Sunday excepted,) by stage from Montpelier to and from Morrisville.

TOWN CLERKS.

John Young, 1803, 4; Samuel B. Stone, 1805; Carpus Clark, 1806-10, also 1812 and part 1813; Cyrus Brigham, 1811; part 1813, all 1814-15; none 1816 to 20; Amasa Brown, 1821, 2d organization; Artemas Richardson, 1822; Ebenezer S. Kellogg, 1823, 4, 5; Ophir Leonard, 1826, 7, 8; Nathan Adams, 1829, 30; Amos Rice, 1831-40, 1842-46, 15 years; Daniel Adams, 1841; Samuel Andrews, 1847-54; Thaddeus B. Ladd, 1855-60; Job E. Macomber, 1861-64, part 1865; Charles C. Abbott, since Nov. 4, 1865, deceased in 1881.

TOWN REPRESENTATIVES.

James Green, 1808; Carpus Clark, 1809-11, 13; Elisha B. Green, 1812; Cyrus Brigham, 1814, 15; none, 1816-22; Allen Vail, 1822, 3; Amos Rice, 1824; Samuel Hubbard, 1825; none, 1826; Nathan Adams, 1827, 8; Milton Brown, 1829-32, 34, 37, 50; Daniel Adams, 1833; Joel Newton, 1835, 6; Jacob Cushman, 1838, 9; Farris Leonard, 1840, 1; Moses Folsom, 1842, 3; none, 1844, 5; Allen L. Vail, 1846, 72, 73; none, 1847; George W. Leavitt, 1848; Nathaniel A. Kelley, 1851, 2; Phineas A. Kemp, 1853, 69-72; none, 1854; Rodney Jones, 1855; Chauncey Hunt, 1856, 7; Horatio Templeton, 1858, 9; Thomas Hutchinson, 1860, 61; Edwin C. Watson, 1862, 3; Job E. Macomber, 1864, 5; Mark P. Ladd, 1866; Heman A. Hancock, 1867, 8; none, 1874, 5; Horace P. Darling, 1876, 7; Augustus A. Bliss, 1878, 9.

There have been many exciting contests over the election of representative; but probably only one "contested" in the Legislature, which was in 1814 or 1815. The story of that is thus told: Early in the season a careful canvass, probably not made public at the time, showed that there were just 9 voters in town. At freeman's meeting two candidates were presented, Cyrus Brigham and Amasa Brown. A short time previous to the first Tuesday in September, however, two brothers named Goodell had signified their intention of going West, and actually did leave the town, as was supposed by some for good. They were strong Brigham men, and their absence was viewed with much complacency by Mr. Brown and his friends. Freeman's meeting day came, the voting commenced, and the appearances were that Mr. Brown would win; until, unexpectedly to some, the Messrs. Goodell appeared on the scene, having come from Stowe, over the mountain through the forest, and offered their votes. The constable, who was a "Brown man," refused to receive their votes, however, claiming as they had left town they were not legal voters. Mr. Brigham took their votes and put them in his pocket. Counting them, Mr. Brigham had 5 votes and Mr. Brown 4. If they were rejected, Mr. Brown had a majority. Both men made their appearance at the Legislature when it convened, and the matter was left to that body for a decision. Mr. Brigham held his seat.

PHYSICIANS.

The first resident physician was Dr. JAMES S. SKINNER. Just when he came we do not know; probably about 1830. The records show he bought a place there. Jan. 1833, he was married to Julia Ann, daughter of Allen Vail, Esq., and soon after removed to Michigan, where he still resides. He was succeeded by Dr. IRA R. ROOD, who had lived here several years before studying medicine. Dr. Rood married Jane, daughter of Samuel and Jane Andrews, Sept. 7, 1834. He practiced his profession here until 1846, when he removed to Wisconsin and died there. Dr. BUCKLEY O. TYLER was the next, coming in 1848 or '9. During the interval between Dr. Rood and Dr. Tyler the people were obliged to go to Montpelier for a physician, as they also had been previous to Dr. Skinner's coming to town.

Dr. THADDEUS B. LADD bought out Dr. Tyler in 1851. He was born in town, being a son of J. P. B. Ladd, and graduated at Woodstock in 1850, in the same class with Dr. George Nichols, present Secretary of State.

Dr. Ladd was a man of excellent judgment, and bid fair to rise to eminence in his chosen profession during the few years of his active labor. In 1854, a spinal difficulty developed itself, and for seven long years he was a great sufferer from that disease, which brought him to his grave. He was postmaster and town clerk several years; was born Aug. 9, 1826; married Harriet N., daughter of Rev. Carey Russell, December 5, 1850, and died December 13, 1861.

LUCIAN VAIL ABBOTT, son of Deacon Jonas Abbott, was born May 24, 1832. At 19, he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Ladd, and graduated at Woodstock, June, 1854, with the highest honors of his class. He did not live to practice his profession, consumption claiming him as a victim. He died May 26, 1855.

Dr. JOB E. MACOMBER, a graduate of Castleton, commenced here in 1856, and practiced 10 years in this town. He was born in East Montpelier; married Marsell L., youngest daughter of J. P. B. Ladd, June 12, 1858; removed to Montpelier in 1866, where he still resides.

Dr. OLIVER L. WATSON, son of Oliver Watson, born in this town May 1, 1828, succeeded Dr. Macomber, continuing only part of a year, when he sold out to Dr. Harris. Dr. Watson married Nancy L., daughter of Leonard Darling, Aug. 18, 1852. He now resides in West Topsham.

Dr. N. M. HARRIS was a son of Daniel Harris, one of the first settlers of the east part of this town, and was born in Calais, coming to this town with his father when quite young. He married Mary E. Frink, of Milford, Mass., and they are now (1879) living on the same place where his father first settled in town. In 1876, he sold his practice to Dr. CHAUNCEY N. HUNT, who is the now practicing physician. Dr. Hunt is a son of Chauncey Hunt; born in this town Apr. 17, 1851; graduated at Burlington, 1875, and was married to Jennie F., daughter of A. S. Emery, Sept. 28, 1875. Dr. Watson and Dr. Harris both also graduated at Burlington.

NEIGHBORHOODS.

Hampshire Hill, so called, being mostly settled from New Hampshire—many from Acworth and Alstead. It is the geographical center of the town, at the foot of the mountain range, and comprises school district No. 8, with a few families in No. 2. The first beginning was made on the south end by Artemas Richardson, F. Johnson and E. S. Kellogg. Before 1830, the New Hampshire people came, and the hill was settled as far north as it ever has been. Joel Newton, John Brigham, Wm. H. and John H. Cooper, Daniel A. and David L. Frost, Daniel Adams, Aaron Kemp, Joseph Evans, Ophir Leonard, Nath'l. S. Morley, Alex. Dingwall and Horace H. Collier, and perhaps others we do not remember, were the first to make permanent homes on the hill; substantial, honored citizens. A few of their descendants still live on the places their fathers cleared.

"MINISTER BROOK," now school district No. 4, was early settled from various localities. O. L. Smith, Cyrus Crocker, Jonas Abbott, Matthias Folsom, Daniel and Richard Colby, Samuel Upham, Edward and John Clough, Joel H. Templeton, Abraham, Ephraim and Jesse Abbott, Luther Hunt and others were among its early settlers.

WEST HILL, district No. 7, had David Folsom, B. F. Stone, William and Samuel Hall and others. The east part of the town from Putnam's Mills to Calais; and so north, had for early settlers: Gilmore Parmenter, Caleb Ormsby, Elias Bascom, Asa Fisher, Glad Dugar, Thayer Townshend, Benj. Lathrop, Daniel Harris, J. P. B. Ladd, Jacob Baldwin and others.

Wm. Hinkson and Tristram Worthen, with their families of 6 children each, settled in the extreme north part of the town. There were probably many among the early inhabitants whose names we have not learned. Those who came before Amasa Brown, from 1797, and left before 1818 or '19, as far as we know, never returned. Mrs. Olive Brown Johnson, a daughter of Amasa Brown, who came here with her father in 1812, has given the writer some information in regard to those who came here during the first organization, and where they were located previous to their leaving town. According to her recollection, Cyrus Brigham then lived on the Whitney farm, where L. M. Hutchinson now lives, a man named Farnsworth on the Leonard Hamblet place, Daniel Colby where Mr. Seaver now resides. The Dea. Poor place was then called the Lyon place, but no one lived there. Two families by the name of Green (Elisha and James, probably) lived on the place where P. A. Kemp now lives, Carpus Clark on a part of the Brown farm now owned by Chauncey Hunt, John Ridlon where Henry E. Hunt resides, and Henry Goodell on Mr. H. A. Hancock's farm, and in 1818-'19, Mr. Brown's family had no neighbors nearer than the Stiles' place in Middlesex, where C. L. Hunt now lives.

Ohio was being opened up to settlers, and the good stories coming from there induced those discouraged here to seek that more favored region. Nearly all mentioned as living here at that time emigrated to Ohio.

Mr. Brown was born in Templeton, Mass., Apr. 23, 1770; about 1792, was married to Sybil Stoddard, of Winchendon, Mass.; born June 20, 1772. Feb. 1807, they removed from Massachusetts to Montpelier, residing there until April, 1812, when they came to Worcester, and settled on the place where they continued as long as they lived. When they settled here, a clearing of some 10 or 12 acres had been made and a log-house built. The house had one glass window only at this time, and stood where the ell part of the present house stands.

Mr. Brown purchased his place of Elisha B. Green. There were then no bridges across the river between Montpelier and Worcester, and as the road then went, it crossed the river twice near where Leonard Hamblet lives, so people had to cross on the ice in winter and ford the stream in the summer. Mrs. Johnson says, when she was about 9 years of age, in March, 1815, her father went to Montpelier with a horse and sleigh, taking her with him. After transacting his business, he started to return home, and it being a thawing time, the river had become swollen so the water ran over the ice at the crossings. They made the first crossing, but when they came to the second, the water was running so deeply and swiftly above the ice it seemed impossible to cross. Mr. Brown told his little daughter he saw no way except to commend themselves to the care of God and make the attempt. It was just as unsafe to try to return, and telling her to cling tight to the sleigh, he went up the stream as far as possible and plunged in. The current was so strong, the sleigh was carried down below the horse, which compelled him to keep his head nearly up the stream, the water filling the sleigh. When they reached the other shore they were some rods farther down the stream than where they entered it. When again on firm ground, Mr. Brown stopped and thanked God that they had been preserved, and then proceeded homeward.

When Mr. Brown was left by all his neighbors in full possession of the town, he took advantage of the situation to improve his own pecuniary interests. He had at this time a few sheep, a yoke of oxen and three cows. Having the whole range of the cleared land on which to keep his stock, he went to Montpelier and hired four or five more cows, for which he paid $4 per year each beside their keeping, and together with his own turned them on the town. He found a ready sale for all his butter among the families in Montpelier at 13 c. per pound; fed the milk to his hogs, raising pork for sale, and so prospered in worldly affairs, turning the misfortunes of his less enduring neighbors to his own benefit. In 1818 or 19, Mrs. Brown's father died in Massachusetts, and Mr. Brown was sent for to help in settling the estate. He made the journey on horseback, of which he said, when traveling through New Hampshire, he stopped over night at a tavern where quite a company was collected. During the evening as the different persons were engaged in telling stories in regard to their several localities, Mr. Brown sat and listened without saying anything, until some one of the company turned to him with the remark, that he believed they had all told where they belonged but him. He replied that he lived in Worcester, Vermont. Oh! said the other, I have heard of Worcester. I have heard that all the inhabitants of that town except a Mr. Brown left the place, and that he has thrown his family on the town. The story you have heard is true, said Mr. B. My name is Brown, and there is no other family living in Worcester but my own. As Mr. Brown's place was about half way from Montpelier to Elmore, he had frequent applications from travellers for refreshments. These applications became so numerous, that in 1815 or 16, according to the recollections of Mrs. Johnson, he concluded to open a tavern, and entertain travellers. Accordingly, to give notice to the public, he put up a "sign," and opened the first tavern ever kept in Worcester. His sign was a smooth board, on which he marked in large letters with red chulk, "Good Cider For Sale Here," and he nailed it up in front of his log house. Travellers were entertained in this log tavern until 1824 or 25, when he built a large two-story house, the one now standing, for a tavern.

In February, 1817, Benjamin Upton and wife of Bakersfield, came to visit Mr. Brown's family, Mrs. U. being Mr. B.'s sister. It was an almost unbroken forest between Elmore and Worcester, the road barely passable with teams; most of the travel being on horseback. Mr. Upton and wife arrived at Mr. Olmstead's in Elmore, near noon, where they stopped to refresh themselves and horse, and inquire about the road. They were told that they could probably go through without trouble, and started about 3 o'clock, P. M. The road was quite good for a mile or two, where some of the inhabitants had been drawing wood, but they soon came where there was no track, and it became impossible to proceed except by Mr. Upton's treading down the snow ahead, and then leading on the horse, making very slow progress. As night approached, Mr. Upton and his horse became weary; the prospect of getting through the woods that night grew less and less. They thought they had got about half way. Mr. Upton told his wife he saw no way but to leave her with the team, while he would go through to Mr. Brown's for help to break the road. She consented, and her husband wrapped her up as well as he could, taking off his overcoat and putting it on her, and wrapping a bed-quilt they had for a sleigh robe about her, he bade her good night and started. He reached Mr. Brown's about midnight, almost completely exhausted; aroused them, and made known the situation. Mr. Brown, his two boys, and Oliver Watson, who soon after married Mr. Brown's daughter, started out. They turned out the oxen and some young cattle, put a boy on the horse, and proceeded to break a path, driving the oxen unyoked, and the young cattle before them, the boy and horse bringing up the rear. About daylight, Mr. Brown, who was ahead, came in sight of the horse and sleigh with Mrs. Upton sitting upright as Mr. Upton had left her the night before. He spoke to her but received no answer; again, no response; becoming alarmed, went up close to the sleigh, and put his hand on her shoulder, calling her by name. This started her up. She was asleep; she was told help was at hand. She had slept most of the night. Finding they were only a little way in the woods, they took the team back to Mr. Olmstead's, so Mr. Brown and Mrs. Upton returned there, she staying until the next day, the interval being spent by Mr. Brown's folks in breaking out the road. Early next morning, Mr. B. and his sister again started from Elmore, and about 3 o'clock P. M., arrived at Mr. Brown's house, finding Mr. Upton recovered from his exhaustion and glad to receive his wife safe again. They doubtless remembered their visit that winter to Worcester as long as they lived.

Mr. Brown and wife both died comparatively young, on the same place on which they first settled. She died March 6, 1826, aged 54 years, and he June 1, 1827, aged 57.

FRANKLIN JOHNSON,

born in Leominster, Mass., 1797, came from there Apr., 1820, in company with Capt. Artemus Richardson and Amos Merriam; and the three together purchased the 300 acre lot, No. 31, situated on the south end of Hampshire hill, and reaching Minister brook. They divided the right, Mr. Merriam taking the north, known afterwards as the "Adams farm," Mr. Richardson the middle lot, known as the Farris Leonard farm, and Mr. Johnson the south lot, where he continued to reside until his death. That spring, they each chopped 5 acres on his lot. In June, Mr. Richardson and Mr. Merriam returned to Massachusetts, and left Mr. Johnson to see to the land. He stayed through the summer, and burned the choppings on all three places; then worked at clearing his own, and building him a log shanty. Just before "Thanksgiving," he returned to Massachusetts and spent the winter. In April, 1821, he came back to Worcester. Mr. J. started Fast day, and arrived in W. Fast day also, being just one week on the road. When he left Leominster, the farmers were plowing and sowing their fields; when he arrived in Worcester, the snow was 4 feet deep. As soon as the snow was gone, he commenced work on his land, and also built him a larger log-house. Mr. Richardson came back soon after Mr. Johnson, bringing his wife with him, but Mr. Merriam did not return, having sold his land to Ebenezer S. Kellogg of Brookfield. Mr. Johnson said, when building his house that summer, he got in a great hurry to complete it, and when shingling thought he would not stop for Sunday, as there were no neighbors near enough to be disturbed. In the morning, he went to work, and laid 10 or 12 shingles, but said "such echoes as the hammer awoke I never heard. It seemed as if the sound must be heard all over town; and I concluded to wait until Monday before I shingled any more." During this summer, Mr. Kellogg worked on his land, and as his family were in Brookfield, he stayed with Mr. Johnson. Mr. J. was courting Pamela Brown, and would sometimes be gone evenings, leaving Mr. K. to keep house alone, and he being naturally timid, did not like this arrangement. One Sunday night, Mr. Johnson went to Mr. Brown's, leaving Mr. Kellogg alone. About 10 o'clock, Johnson hearing a loud hallooing in the woods, went out to see what was the matter. Mr. K. soon emerged above the house, swinging a fire brand. He had heard a bear about the shanty, and was not going to stay there alone. Mr. Johnson said when he first came to Worcester, the trout were so plenty he could catch enough in the brook in ten minutes any day to make a good meal. He cleared up his land, made improvements in building, raised up his family, and ended his days there. He married Pamela Brown, Sept. 8, 1822, who died Jan. 23, 1834; and he married 2d, Jan. 4, 1835, Olive Brown, a sister of his first wife, who is still living on the same farm. Mr. Johnson united with the Congregational church in 1826. He bore his share in the toils of the new settlement, and in the town business; was a good neighbor and citizen, and died respected by his townsmen, Dec. 8, 1868, aged 71 years.

ORAMEL L. SMITH,

a brother of Col. Harvey Smith of Thetford, and uncle to Hon. O. H. Smith of Montpelier, was born in 1783, where, I am unable to state, but he lived in Thetford while quite young, the writer's father and Mr. Smith being boys together there. He was married at Thetford to Polly, daughter of Thaddeus Ladd, who had a large family, mostly girls.

The story is told, that when some two or three of Mr. Ladd's girls had been married, Mrs. Smith being among the number, a neighbor, who was not on very good terms with Mr. Smith and one or two other men who had married the Ladd girls, made the remark that he thought the devil had a grudge against Mr. Ladd and was paying him in sons-in-law. Mr. Smith and his wife came to Worcester in 1822 or 23, and commenced a settlement on the Minister brook, west of the "corner," and lived and died there. They had 3 girls, the two oldest, Mary and Jemima, born in Thetford, the youngest, Frances, in Worcester. The eldest died unmarried, Jemima married Herman Foster, and Mr. and Mrs. Smith lived with them at the time of their death. The youngest was the wife of Capt. Edward Hall of the 8th Vt. Regt., wounded at Cedar Creek, Oct., '64, who died of his wounds at Winchester a few days after. The daughters are all now dead.

Uncle Lyman, as Mr. Smith was familiarly called, was an active man in his day, and somewhat given to the use of intoxicating drink; his naturally irritable disposition was made more irritable, and he had very much trouble with his neighbors; for a series of years was almost constantly involved in law-suits. Probably he was plaintiff or defendant in more law cases than many others together in town; and almost always was on the losing side. He was harassed by creditors almost constantly. It is said he concluded after awhile he could not afford to quarrel so much, and was more peaceably inclined in his later years.

Mr. Hutchinson's place joined his on the north, Mr. H. having another lot a mile or so south they were clearing, and to cross Mr. Smith's farm to reach the south lot, Mr. S. had a log-bridge across the brook south of his house; Mr. Hutchinson's folks availed themselves of it going to and from work. Uncle Lyman, not feeling friendly at that time, forbade their passing over the bridge. One morning old Mr. Hutchinson and one of the boys started for the south lot to work, intending to cross the bridge; but Mr. Smith came hurriedly out as the others were crossing, and succeeded in pitching the elder Mr. H. into the brook. A lawsuit resulted, in which Uncle Lyman was beat as usual. During his later years, he gave up his business cares to his children, and lived more quiet. Mrs. Smith, the opposite of her husband, was a kind neighbor and excellent nurse, and often was called up by her neighbors in sickness; and in those years when there was no physician in town, she practiced midwifery, and even after a regular physician had located here, she was called upon for that service. Both Mr. S. and wife died at the age of 71; he in 1854, she in 1858.

JOHN AND DODGE HAYWARD,

formerly of Thetford, commenced a settlement on Minister brook in 1821, where Joel H. Templeton afterwards lived and died; but Dodge soon after went to the Dea. Poor place, and both soon left the town.

OLIVER WATSON,

born in 1786, came here from Montpelier; was a joiner by trade, and an extra workman, making that his life business. He married Esther, oldest daughter of Amasa Brown, May 29, 1817; this is the first recorded marriage in town. Their oldest son represented the town and was assistant judge of the County court 2 years. Mr. W. was for many years very deaf. He died in 1870, at 84 years. His widow went to live with her son, Judge E. C. Watson of Hartford, and died there, but was brought to Worcester for burial.

JESSE FLINT,

of Montpelier, bought a lot here in 1815, but I do not know that he came here to live before 1820 or 21. He lived for a short time in a log-house, or shop, which had been used for a comb shop, near S. M. Seaver's present residence, until he could build a shanty on his own land. His land was on the hill where F. C. Harriman now lives. Mr. Flint was prominent in town matters, but probably moved away about 1830, (as we find by the land records, he sold his farm then) and went to Middlesex to reside. He has children now living there. At the time of Mr. Flint's settlement, he cut a road through the woods from the Branch road, commencing near where William Maxham now lives, going up the hill by W. P. Gould's, and so on, probably where the road now goes, to his log-house on the hill. Mr. Jacob Baldwin, who then lived with his father, Benjamin Baldwin, near "Putnam's mill" in Middlesex, and who now lives in the State of Illinois, in a recent letter says, "In June, 1822, in company with Silas Baldwin, I went up to the place where Joel Templeton died. The branch road did not go where it now does, but farther west, and up a very steep hill, and came into the present road a little north from the Maxham road. Flint had begun up there, and cut a road from the foot of the hill west across the flat, up the hill by where J. P. B. Ladd began afterwards; and on to his place at the end of the road. He was the first man on the hill; had his pick, and settled on the poorest farm there. From Flint's, we went by marked trees to Jesse Abbott's, (where Harrington now lives) and down to the brook where John and Dodge (Hayward) had begun, and Joel H. Templeton afterwards lived and died. There was no road in there, only one from Mr. Amasa Brown's log-house, west up by where Artemas Richardson had begun. Mr. Franklin Johnson went up the same road to his place, on which he had built a log-house."

Richard and Daniel Colby, Mr. B. says, had come in and cut down a small piece, built a small shanty, planted a few potatoes, and were lazying round, smoking their pipes; had killed an owl or two. They probably did not stay many years; "lazying round" did not procure a very good living in those times.

Samuel Upham from Brookfield, bought the place where the Haywards commenced, and moved there in 1823. He was a blacksmith, built a shop on his place, and did what work he could get. Some think this was the first blacksmith shop in town. Mr. Upham moved away in 1825, having sold his place to Joel H. Templeton. Judge Zenas Upham of Brookfield is a son of Samuel Upham.

THE ABBOTTS.

During the early years there were on Minister brook and west of it seven men named Abbott. Jesse, Abraham, Ephraim, Asa and Titus, five brothers; Nathan and Jonas, also brothers, and cousins of the former. Jesse, Abraham and Ephraim Abbott married three sisters, named Buzzell. There were nine of the Buzzell girls, and beside those who married the Abbotts, two married Levi and Silas Pratt, two brothers; two, also, David and Calvin Pratt, brothers, and cousins to Levi and Silas; one married James Philbrick and one Major Goodwin.

THOMAS HUTCHINSON,

with his father and brothers came from Norwich, and settled near the mouth of Minister brook, where he continued to reside until 1867, when he removed to the place where his son, L. M. Hutchinson, now lives. Mr. H. by industry and economy made for himself and family a good home. He was for years a member of the Congregational church, but in some of the church's action in regard to certain members—being dissatisfied with the course taken, he withdrew for a time from the meetings; for this he was dropped from the church roll. He afterwards came back and became an active supporter himself with it again as a member of the church, though never connecting. July 2, 1835, he was united in marriage to Almira Sumner, and together they traveled life's pathway 41 years. Mr. Hutchinson was a man of great energy and perseverance in carrying out his plans, and as his views of town matters did not always coincide with others, there would sometimes come a struggle, which did not always tend to promote friendly feeling.

He bore his share of public burdens, and performed all his duties faithfully; was representative 2 years. Mr. Hutchinson died Oct. 4, 1876, age 64, and his wife Sept. 30, 1877, age 60.

The northeast part of the town was settled last. An effort was often made for a road through that part of the town from Moses P. Wheeler's mill, north through the eastern part of Elmore to Wolcott village. A petition was made for a court's committee; the result only a large bill of costs for the petitioners to pay. The road was opposed by the central and western part of both Elmore and Worcester on account of the expense, and it would divert travel from the old county road. But about 1860 another petition to the court obtained a committee to examine the premises again, and the road known as the Eagle Ledge road was made, which opened the way for many settlers in that part of the town, and some good farms have been cleared; and a more easy access to large tracts of timber lands, and a considerable portion of the inhabitants in that section depend on the lumber business for their livelihood. "Wheeler's mill" in Worcester, and "Slayton's," just in Elmore, annually cut out large quantities of lumber.

A NIGHT'S EXPERIENCE.

Mrs. Alma P. Howieson, wife of James Howieson, who lived in this section, relates to us: "In the spring of 1864, myself and family came to Vermont first, where we had one family of relations, a brother of my husband, living in Worcester. We came to this place, and purchased a piece of wild land, and commenced a farm, intending to settle permanently, but 2 year's later my husband's brother, a "millwright," hired with a company in New York to go south and build a mill in Georgia. He went, and came North for more efficient laborers; and with others took my husband and three sons, leaving me to look after things at home; I had two little girls and my eldest son's wife with two small children, in my family. My men folks left the 11th of Oct. One week after, my little

8-year old girl fell and broke her arm, which kept me pretty closely confined some time; but I had a short web of flannel I wanted to get wove, and had heard of a woman in Calais, living near Mr. Snow's, who was a weaver; so thought to go over and get my work done. The weather had been rough, but cleared, leaving about 2 inches of snow on the ground. It was the 4th of Dec.; the sun shone pleasantly for that time of year. I took my youngest little girl with me and started by a cut across the woods into Calais, to Mr. Elias Snow's place, intending to make a short visit there and return in the evening by the road; it was 3 miles round; but "over the hill," only $\frac{3}{4}$ ths of a mile. Having been this way several times, I had no difficulty in finding my way, besides a slight path, now mostly blotted out with leaves, there was a line spotted through on the trees, any one at all versed in wood craft, could follow. I left home about 10 o'clock, A. M., telling my daughter-in-law I would be back before dark; she was timid and did not like to stay alone. I had a pleasant walk through the woods, accompanied by my "house-dog" and large black cat, which persisted in following, in spite of my efforts to scold him back. He followed until I came into Mr. Snow's clearing, when he retreated into the sugar-house at the edge of the woods. I found the old people well, and arranged with them to get their neighbor to do my work, and after resting awhile was about to return, but the old people proposed I should remain until 3 o'clock, when the boys would be back from their work, and one of them would go and help me up the hill with my little one. As the hill was steep and long, I was willing to accept their offer. The kind old lady filled a three-quart pail with milk to take to the little folks at home. Thinking I would have time to get home after 3 o'clock, I was willing to wait, but it had been thawing all day, and when the sky overspread with clouds and a drizzling rain commenced, conscious it would be dark early, I did not dare wait longer for the boys, and taking the pail in one hand and the little one in my arms, I set out for home. I had not climbed more than half way up the hill before the rain changed to sleet, and the wind rising drove the storm sharply into my face. Taking off my veil I tied it over my little one's face, and hugging her close, toiled up the steep hill in the storm, which increased every moment. On the summit I rested against a tree to regain strength. My path was entirely effaced by the thaw and storm; but I found the spotted line, and soon started as the night was fast closing in. Pressing forward, I thought in a few minutes to be clear of the woods, but after proceeding quite a distance came to a tree directly across my path; and looking about, I had missed the way. I went back to where I first found the line, and setting down the pail of milk, which had become burdensome, made another trial to follow the marked trees; it was getting too dark for that, and I took as straight a course as I could, hoping to come into the clearing somewhere, knowing I could then find my way in the darkness, even. The storm now ceased suddenly as it had commenced, but the wind increased to a perfect hurricane, blowing down trees, the limbs falling in showers about me in a manner I never before witnessed, nor since; and this with the coming darkness increased my anxiety to get clear of the woods. I urged myself on, I rushed through the underbrush, over the trunks of old fallen trees, tearing my clothes, and lacerating my hands and face, on and on in my endeavors to gain the clearing. From the inclemency of the weather at this season, I supposed I must perish if I remained in the woods such a night; but at last I sank exhausted on the trunk of a fallen tree, crying aloud, lost! lost! without a ray of hope, hearing, which my little girl, Carrie, commenced to cry to go home; which once more aroused me, I must not give up. Carrie needed my care; the little sick girl at home needed me; their father and brothers 1500 miles away and my daughter-in-law who could not speak one word of English, she too, depended on me. I must make one more effort to preserve my life, if possible. I took in the situation.

It was a matter of endurance; could I bear up under the strain of walking all night, and carrying that child in my arms without getting tired out, and freezing to death? I must make the trial. In the dim twilight I could see a little ways around me. I selected "a beat." My first care was for my little one, and taking of a flannel under-skirt, I wrapped it carefully around her. The wind lulled and went moaning away over the hills; the rain again descended in torrents. It was a perfect down-pour. I was soon drenched to the skin, although I had a double woolen shawl and a worsted hood on. Sometimes I would sit down for a little while on a moss-covered log at one end of my beat, but would commence to grow chilly, which warned me to be moving. Let me tell you whence my strength came: I had invoked the aid of my Heavenly Father to support me through this trying ordeal, and quick as thought the answer came, "Be not dismayed; Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end." Before I had been all excitement; not afraid of wild beasts, or anything the woods contained, but of the cold and fatigue the long night held in store. Now this vanished; my nerves became steady; my strength seemed renewed; I walked my lonely beat with as firm a tread as any sentinel could while guarding his army against the foe. The rain continued what seemed a very long time; though it ceased about midnight; then it grew still colder and commenced snowing, and my little dog gave vent to his anger or distrust by barking vehemently. I tried to quiet him, seating myself for a moment on my log seat, with my babe on my lap, one hand hanging beside me; a fuzzy head thrust up against my hand frightened me. I attempted to rise, but the animal pounced upon my lap pressing its wet back against my face. The night dark as Erebos, I could see nothing, but immediately knew my cat, which followed me. He stopped about an hour longer; then left for home. The weary night came to a close at last. I could see in what direction to go, and steering straight for Worcester mountains, knowing it would bring me to some clearing where I could shape my course. I had just fairly come out of the woods when I was met by one of my nephews, who took the little girl. I attempted to follow him to a house near by; my strength failed me and I had to be supported by another person. My will-power deserted me as human aid came to my rescue. But about noon, I was able to walk home, and soon recovered from my hard night's work. My son's wife finding I did not come, at 8 o'clock lighted her lantern and leaving her children asleep, told the sick girl she was going to find mother. She went to my brother's, and made them understand I was in the woods. My brother was away from home, but two of the boys took a lantern and started for Mr. Snow's to see if I had left there. But the trees falling so fast and their lantern having been blown out, they beat a hasty retreat, telling my son's wife they would go in the morning. She returned to her children, and spent the night in weeping, expecting, as she often tells me, I should be found dead in the woods. My brother's wife sent one of her boys "as soon as peep of day," to use her words, to Mr. Snow's; who, finding the pail of milk, knew I must be lost, and gave the alarm, and before I got clear of the woods the whole neighborhood were out hunting for me.

I was 47 years old that month, and the child I carried in my arms for over 14 hours, was 2½ years old that day; but that child was the magnet that held me to life. To this day I look back with a shudder to that dismal vigil in the woods, and thank my Father in Heaven, who gave me strength to bear up and save my own life and that of my child.

CASUALTIES.

For some of these we are indebted to a "Record of Births, Marriages and Deaths, by Simon C. Abbott;" published in 1858 by the town.

A youth named Martin was drowned at an early day, while attempting to cross the river, on the farm where L. M. Hutchinson now lives. He was probably a son of George Martin, one of the first settlers who lived there. This death is thought to be the first in town. It is quite likely he was buried on the high knoll west of Mr. Hutchinson's house, as were some others, there being some graves to be seen there, when Mr. Abel Whitney lived there.

A son of S. P. Alexander, of 6 years, was drowned Sept. 1849, on the farm of S. M. Seaver. His father being at work over the river, his boy set out to go in search of him, and when missed by the family, search was made, and he was found in the river.

George C. Hancock, son of Crismon Hancock, was drowned in the "Branch," July 31, 1857, aged 14.

Charles Hall, a son of Samuel Hall, was drowned in "Minister Brook," July, 186-, by the washing away of a bridge on which he was standing, caused by a sudden rise of the water during a thunder-storm.

Moses Rood, 3d, son of Moses Rood, Jr., formerly of Barre, Jan. 27, 1829, had his thigh fractured by the fall of a tree. Feb. 2, mortification ensued, rendering amputation necessary, under which he died.

Asel Bradstreet, a child of 2 years of J. P. B. Ladd, was scalded by the overturning of a kettle of hot water upon him, and lived three weeks after the accident.

Jedediah P. B. Ladd, the father, received his death-blow by falling from a bridge near his residence. He was crowded off by an ox-team he was driving over the bridge while repairing it, and fell 22 feet, striking upon a solid rock. His thigh was badly fractured, and he sustained internal injuries of so serious a nature, though assistance was at once rendered and medical aid procured, and it was hoped he might recover, after lingering in great pain until the third day, surrounded by his weeping family, death closed his mortal career. Mr. Ladd came to Worcester about 1823, with Jonas Abbott, from Thetford. He married Eliza Baldwin, daughter of Benjamin Baldwin, and a sister of Mrs. Thomas Reed. Mr. Ladd was a brother of Mrs. O. L. Smith, and first settled on the hill near Jesse Flint's, and where Willis P. Gould now lives, making the first clearing there about 1825. He removed to the eastern part of the town, and commenced anew again on the place where Ira W. Brown now lives; from there, removed in 1833 to the place first settled by Allen Vail, Esq., where he resided at the time of his death. The wife of the writer of this is a daughter of Mr. Ladd. He died Sept. 19, 1844, at 42 years of age.

Sept. 19, 1833, Elisha Hutchinson, son of Eleazer, a citizen of Worcester, was killed in Montpelier by a stone thrown from a blast on the site of the State House; age 33 years.

James, son of Thomas Reed, a boy of 14, was killed June 30, 1844, while peeling hemlock bark with his father and brother on the farm. A tree which had been peeled started to slide down the hill, and caught the boy between itself and another log, crushing out his life on the spot.

Lewis Wright died Oct. 14, 1868, aged 63. He fell in a barn on which he was at work, on the S. M. Seaver place. He was an upright Christian man, much respected by all who knew him.

Joel H. Templeton was thrown from his wagon when near his home, and received injuries from which he died in about a week, Sept. 18, 1852, aged 62. He came to Worcester from East Montpelier in 1825, and was a prominent man in town affairs for many years. He was the father of Horatio Templeton, Esq., his widow, Mrs. Abigail Templeton, still residing in town, upwards of 80 years of age (1871).

Isaac Spofford, while wrestling, had a bone fractured in his neck, which caused paralysis below the point of fracture, and resulted in his death. He lived 30 days after the accident, unable to move himself, and died Aug. 25, 1851, aged 30 years.

Jan. 21, 1876, Joel O. Durfey, son of Rev. Milo Durfey, while drawing logs and rolling them on the bank of the river near Edmund Utton's, was caught under a log and crushed to death.

At an early day, a man and his wife named Culver, traveling through the town, stopped on Clapp hill to feed their horses. The man went to the back side of the wagon for some grain, the horses becoming frightened, ran violently down the hill, and the woman was thrown out and her neck broken.

Levi Worthen, son of Tristram Worthen, one of the first settlers in the north part of the town, went to York State hunting deer. One day he was out with a companion in the forest, and in their wanderings became separated. His companion saw him through the bushes, and, mistaking him for a deer, fired, and Mr. Worthen was killed. His body was brought to Worcester for burial.

1865, a child of B. F. Johnson was scalded by sitting down in a pail of hot water.

Oct. 14, 1868, Lewis Wright, while at work on a barn for Mr. D. H. Massey, fell some 8 or 10 feet to the ground, striking on his head, and causing his death in four or five days, aged 63 years.

Alonzo Jones, Jr., accidentally shot himself while out hunting, and died Oct. 25, 1854, a day or two after the accident, aged 16 years.

MURDERS.

About 1862 or '63, a young married woman named Loomis was murdered on the Eagle Ledge road, her body being found in the woods a little way from the house of her husband's brother. Circumstances led to the arrest of this man, Austin Loomis, and also of Royal Carr, a neighbor. After a long and tedious trial, Mr. Loomis was acquitted, and Mr. Carr convicted of manslaughter, and was sentenced to the state prison for 10 years. After serving about 9 years, he was released, having gained one year by good conduct in the prison. In December of the present year (1878) Carr was again arrested for the murder of a half-breed Indian, Wm. W. Murcommock, in the edge of Calais, with whom he was hunting, and is now lodged in jail at Montpelier awaiting his trial for that offence. [Since executed at Windsor, Apr. 29, 1881.]

Apr. 24, 1867, Patrick Fitzgibbons, a resident of this town, was stabbed and instantly killed in Montpelier by some unknown person.

SUICIDES.

The following persons, citizens of this town, have committed suicide by hanging: Ophir Leonard, Mar. 1841, aged 68 years; David Foster, Dec. 1849, aged 69; Mark P. Ladd, Aug. 1867, aged 50 (died in Richmond); Russell Collier, Dec. 1866, aged 40 (in Calais); Samuel Kelley, Apr. 1871, aged 78; M. Newell Kent, Oct. 1876, aged 37.

OLD PEOPLE.

Mr. Howe Wheeler and his wife Ama moved into this town from Calais, and died here; he, Feb. 18, 1870, aged 92 years, 1 month, 19 days; she, Mar. 3, 1870, aged 91 years, 7 months, 10 days. They had been married over 70 years. The oldest person now living in town is Mrs. Esther Hamblet, widow of Jonathan Hamblet, and mother of Leonard and Edward M., who now live in this town. She came with her husband from Dracut, Mass., about 1823, and has lived here since that time. [Has since died, aged 96 years and 3 days.] Of those in this town 80 years of age and over at the time of their death, were:

Caleb Barnum, 80 yrs, died Mar. 1, 1843.
 Lemuel Blanchard, 92, Sept. 3, 1855.
 Mehitable Spear, 83, Aug. 9, 1846.
 Jonathan Hamblet, 86, March 3, 1859.
 Allen Vail, 80, May 22, 1860.
 Peter Seaver, 81, June 23, 1860.
 Aaron Kemp, 80, Oct. 2, 1864.
 Martha Rice, 87, Aug. 12, 1865.
 Gload Dugar, 90, Oct. 16, 1865.
 Norah Butler, 80, Dec. 12, 1867.
 Howe Wheeler, 92, Feb. 18, 1870.
 Ama Wheeler, 91, March 3, 1870.
 Oliver Watson, 84, Sept. 1870.
 Thomas McCurdy, 81, May 18, 1870.
 Lydia Richardson, 92, June, 1871.
 Daniel Abbott, 82, March 27, 1872.
 Stephen Harrington, 80, Sept. 7, 1873.
 Philip Hardy, 87, Jan. 30, 1874.
 John Brigham, 82, June 29, 1875.
 George Gould, 85, July, 1876.
 Silas Fifield, 87, Dec. 14, 1876.

Oct. 7, 1868, the wife of Martin Costello gave birth to three children, two boys and a girl. All lived until Apr. 18, 1869, when the girl died.

CENSUS.—1800, 25; 1810, 41; 1820, 44; 1830, 432; 1840, 587; 1850, 702; 1860, 685; 1870, 775.

BEARS

have been seen in town even within a few years, yet it is not known that more than two or three were ever killed. Since the writer moved here (in 1849) there have been several "bear hunts," but bruin has always come out ahead of the hunters. Some stories of them have been handed down. John M. Young, now living here, a nephew of the hero of the story, relates: John Young, the first town clerk, while living in this town, where Mr. Seaver now lives, who had a nice pig in a log-pen near his house, one day, working in his clearing near, heard an outcry from his pig-pen, and hastening to see what was up, found a large bear within after his porker. Not choosing to lose his winter meat, he charged the intruder with a heavy lever, with which he had been at work, when the bear put himself on his haunches in the most approved attitude of self defence, and when Mr. Young, a very muscular, powerful man, delivered a blow aimed at his head, by a dexterous swing of his paw, caught the weapon, and hurled it some distance away; and then thinking "discretion is the better part of valor," beat a hasty retreat to the woods, and Mr. Young saved his pig.

On the present premises of Henry E. Hunt, in the early day, when neighbors were few and the man away from home, a bear came one time to survey the place. The first the family knew of his presence, he placed his fore-paws on the window sill and thrust his nose in to see what was inside. The woman and children were badly frightened, but bruin, after leisurely surveying the room, withdrew, doing no other damage.

Mr. N. S. Morley, who settled on Hampshire Hill in 1829 or 30, watched with his neighbors several nights for a large bear that visited his cornfield, and at last shot him.

Mr. Jacob Baldwin, in the account of his visit on Minister Brook in June, 1822, said: "The Haywards (John and Dodge) had begun there and chopped a piece the year before and built a log shanty. When they burned their chopping, they also burned their house. When I was there, their pork barrel and sugar barrel stood in the small brook which runs by the place. They had put up some posts, laid on some poles and covered it with bark, and had a fire against a log to cook by. They had a straw bed on a bedstead, and three of us slept on the bed. John slept on the soft side of a spruce board on the ground before the fire. One night a bear came along, and one of the dogs put after him; the other did not dare leave the shanty, but barked so we could not sleep. The old hound was out most all night after the bear."

CHURCHES.

Who preached the first sermon in town is not now known. Rev. James Hobart and Rev. Chester Wright, of Montpelier, held meetings here at an early date. Mr. Hobart told the later inhabitants that he preached the funeral sermon of the Martin boy who was drowned soon after the town was settled.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

was formed in 1824. The original members were: Ebenezer S. Kellogg and wife Roxana, Wm. T. Hutchinson, Mary Hutchinson, Jonas Abbott, Allen Vail, David Poor and wife Abigail, Artemas Richardson and wife Eliza S., Amos Rice and wife Martha.

The church was organized by Rev. Jas. Hobart, and he was by a vote of the church chosen moderator, holding that place for several years afterwards. The first meeting after organizing was Feb. 29, 1824, when Artemas Richardson and Eliza Richardson were baptized by Mr. Hobart. From this time Rev. Mr. Hobart, and Rev. Chester Wright, of Montpelier, preached for the church occasionally, as also did Rev. Geo. Freeman, Rev. Mr. Stewart, Rev. Mr. Thompson, Rev. Mr. Wheelock, whose names we find on the records to 1839, and when there was no minister, some one of the brothers would read a sermon.

Additions were made to the church from time to time, Jan. 8, 1832, 30 uniting with it. The articles of faith and covenant were revised in 1831, and again in 1848. Rev. John Foster was settled as first pastor Nov. 13, 1839. Ordaining council, Rev. A. Hazen, Berlin; Rev. P. Taylor, Waitsfield; Rev. B. W. Smith, 1st church, Montpelier; Rev. S. Kellogg, 2d church, Montpelier; Rev. J. F. Stone, Waterbury; Rev. S. Delano, Sec. Vt. D. M. Society; A Hazen, moderator; J. F. Stone, scribe. While the settlement of Mr. Foster was negotiated, the subject of temperance arose, and the church came near being divided. Mr. Foster refused to be settled unless the church would declare in favor of temperance, and a council was called Oct. 31, 1839, to organize a temperance church. The council met Nov. 6, and investigating the matter, gave the church some good advice, recommending it to declare itself a strict temperance church, and deciding the petition asking to be organized again that way, ought not to be granted. The church adopted the recommendation, and Mr. Foster was ordained.

He was required to quit-claim to the town for the use of schools the lot of land set to the first settled minister, which had long before this been leased by the town, and was improved land. A large minority of the church, still dissatisfied in regard to the temperance matter, kept agitating it, and trouble ensued. Mr. Foster sent in his resignation as pastor, and a council met March 18, 1840, which voted unanimously, "That unless by 9 o'clock tomorrow morning a number of the church sufficient to sustain the pastor shall be found prepared to take such ground in relation to those subjects upon which the church is divided, as shall in the judgment of the council render it practicable for the pastor to continue his labors in this place with the prospect of usefulness and comfort, the following shall be the result:" This was, that the pastoral relation should be dissolved. The church voted to meet, and did meet; next morning, 21 of the male members united in an agreement "to stand by the pastor," and declared their adhesion to the principles upon the subject of temperance expressed in the recommendation of the council of Nov. 6, 1839, two before having voted to rescind the temperance resolution. Since that time the church has been a temperance church. Mr. Foster withdrew his resignation, and continued pastor until from ill health he resigned; dismissed by a council, July 6, 1841. Until 1844, the church was without a regular minister, but continued to hold "reading" meetings.

In 1844, Rev. Carey Russell came from Hartford, and preached here, except one year, until 1852, and a meeting-house was built, the location of which again divided the church, and a large number left its communion; were cut off, and a bitter feeling was engendered, which did not wholly subside for years. Council after council was called to settle difficulties and advise on the location of the house.

The records of this period are largely made up of the doings of these councils. The church voted, June 28, 1844, "to build a house of worship," and a subscription was started. July 6, "voted to locate the house on the west side of the road near the burying-ground." The meetings were held at this time in the school-house in district No. 2, just north of the present Methodist meeting-house. From this time there appears to have been continual strife, until at length the matter was for a time compromised by the Methodists, by the erection of a union house at the "Corner," March 25, 1846, when the church "voted to hold their meetings in the meeting-house so much of the time as the Congregationalists own in said house, not to exceed one-half of the time."

Those members living in the northerly part of the town, however, feeling their interests were not properly regarded, soon asked for a council, the recommendation of which was, "That the church secure a house to be controlled exclusively by themselves, which led to their buying out other parties in the union house. Still those in the north part of the town were no better off, and several withdrew from the meetings, and united with others in forming a Methodist church. Some years later, mutual confessions were made, they were restored to the church, and took letters to the Methodist church, thus establishing ecclesiastical relations between the churches.

After buying the meeting-house, the church and society were heavily in debt, and Feb. 28, 1848, they "voted that Rev. C. Russell should visit other churches and solicit aid in paying for the church," which he did, and procured $291.97, and the house was paid for, and the church have since occupied it as a place of public worship.

Rev. C. M. Winch commenced preaching for the church Mar. 3, 1853, and was ordained pastor June 28, and dismissed Sept. 26, 1861, since which the ministers have been: Rev. J. F. Stone, part of one year; Rev. David Perry, 40 years; Rev. A. F. Shattuck, 1 year; Rev. Mason Moore, 1 year; Rev. Wm. Schofield, third pastor, from June 1873 to May 1876; ordained Feb. 24, 1874; dismissed May 2, 1876; Rev. R. D. Metcalf, 1½ year; and since Jan. 1878, Rev. P. H. Carpenter, who united by letter from the Methodist church in this town. Jan. 21, 1879, a council convened, and Rev. Mr. Carpenter was installed pastor of the church, he being the fourth pastor. Besides these stated ministers, students from theological seminaries have supplied this church under the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society, which has always helped sustain preaching here. The society have had two bells in their meeting-house, both procured by subscription. The first, through Dea. C. C. Closson, cost $125; broken, about 1865; the present one from the foundry of Jones & Co., Troy, N. Y.; weight, 646 lbs.; cost, $287.00. Hon. T. Fairbanks, of St. Johnsbury, and Capt. A. Richardson's family, of Brooklyn, N. Y., contributed to procure with some in Montpelier.

Original members, 12; admitted by profession since —, 145; by letter, 61; whole No. 218; dismissed by letter, 97; died, 52; excommunicated, 28; dropped, 3; restored on confession, 12; present no. 50; non-residents, 22; Dec. 1878, resident members, 28.

NOTICES OF DEACONS AND ORIGINAL MEMBERS.

Deacons.—Ebenezer S. Kellogg, chosen Feb. 28, 1824; Allen Vail, David Poor, Mar. 9, 1826; David Poor, Nathan Adams, Jonas Abbott, Oct. 7, 1835; Charles C. Closson, July 5, 1851; Samuel Andrews, April 23, 1871; Ebenezer R. Kellogg, Sept. 6, 1872.

EBENEZER S. KELLOGG

came from Brookfield in the spring of 1822, and bought the place of Amos Merriam, on Hampshire hill, now occupied by Mr. Lawrence. He sold here and bought on Minister brook, where he cleared up a farm and raised a large family of children, some of which are yet living in town.

About 1859, he sold his second farm and removed to the village, and kept a hotel for awhile. He lived in Worcester until 1868, when he went to Hanover, N. H., to live with his youngest son, Ebenezer R. Kellogg, where he died in 1872. Mrs. Roxana Reed Kellogg, his widow, still lives there with her son.

DEA. ALLEN VAIL,

says his obituary, "died in Worcester, May 22, 1860, aged 81 years. He was born in Lynn, Conn., 1779; moved with his father to Pomfret, Vt., in 1782, where he lived much respected till 1821, when he came to Worcester with a large family. There were only five families in town when he came here, and up to this time there had been no religious meetings on the Sabbath here, or district school. He immediately conferred with some two or three others, and they commenced meetings on the Sabbath, in the barn of Amasa Brown, in the spring of 1822, by singing, prayer, and reading of sermons, and the people all turned out to meetings in the winter, coming in with their families on ox teams. In early childhood, the deacon had a faithful and pious mother, and in 1807, was led to seek his soul's salvation. As an officer in the church, he never refused to bear his own burdens nor the burdens of the church. No matter the weather or his business, he was always ready to serve the church business or devotion. He was repeatedly sent by the citizens of the town, also, as their representative to the Legislature. He remained a model member of this church up to May 30, 1847, when he removed his relation to the church in Montpelier, of which he was an honored member at his death."

He lived in Montpelier from 1847 until just previous to his death, he came back to Worcester to the residence of his eldest son, Allen, where he died.

ALLEN L. VAIL, his eldest son, has been representative of his town, also a constable 26 consecutive years; and one of his daughters married Dr. Skinner, the first physician here, and now lives in Michigan.

DAVID POOR

and his wife Abigail, came from Berlin and settled in this town in 1822, first occupying the same farm on which he lived for many years afterward. His land comprised the greater part of the territory on which the village now stands, and which he sold in small parcels as were wanted for building lots. He was one of the first deacons of the Congregational church, and, except a few years when he returned to Berlin to live, 1832 till the spring of 1835, continued in the office until his death in 1863, age 65. Dea. Poor was a man of firm religious principles, honest in his dealings with his neighbors, and gave liberally of his substance for the support of his church and charitable purposes. Dea. Poor had two wives; he married second, Miss Clara Carpenter, who died in 1865.

DEA. JONAS ABBOTT,

born in Henniker, N. H., Feb. 11, 1802, removed with his father to Thetford, Vt., in 1803; lived there until of age, and became interested in religion under the preaching of Rev. Asa Burton, D. D., pastor there. He came to Worcester with J. P. B. Ladd early in 1823, and settled on the Minister brook about one mile from the "Corner." He resided on his farm until 1844, when he moved to the "Corner," kept a small store, and did shoemaking many years. In his later years he was more engaged in mercantile business, in which he failed. Jan. 16, 1826, he married Minerva E. Vail, daughter of Allen Vail, Esq., who is yet living. Dea. Abbott died Apr. 5, 1875, aged 73.

DEA. NATHAN ADAMS

came here in 1824, from Alstead, N. H.; bought his land of E. S. Kellogg, and was one of the first permanent settlers on Hampshire Hill. He removed from town, near 1844, to the "West."

DEA. CHARLES C. CLOSSON,

born in Thetford, Oct. 15, 1799, when a young man went to Northfield and cleared a farm, and acquired a considerable property. In March, 1848, he moved here on to the Closson farm, living there until 1867, and was one of the largest paying members of the church for many years. He was one of a family of 13 children, 12 of whom lived to have families of their own, and all but one, members of Congregational churches, that one being a deacon of a Baptist church. One sister, wife of Daniel Abbott, and the writer's mother, lived in this town many years, and died here.

Dea. Closson had three wives; his first, a Miss Davis, of Fairlee; the second, Marcia Gurley, of Berlin; the third, Mrs. Harriet Dunham, of Northfield, who still survives him. In 1867, he removed to a place he bought of E. C. Watson, near Clark's mill; lived there some 4 years, and then where S. M. Seaver now lives, where he died Mar. 10, 1872, aged 72.

DEA. SAMUEL ANDREWS,

born in New Hampshire about 1797, married Jane Blanchard in 1818, and resided in New Boston, N. H., till he came here. He first lived on the brook between A. P. Slayton's mill and Wm. P. Moore's present residence about 3 years, when he bought Rufus Reed's place near the village, and went to blacksmithing, and was many years the only blacksmith in town; but for the last 20 years of his life, labored when able on his small farm. He was postmaster and town clerk several years; also a justice of the peace. Conscientious in all his dealings, firm in what he believed to be right, constant in all his duties both to the public and to the church, of which he was a member from 1832 to his death, Oct. 8, 1878, at 81 years. He and his wife lived together upwards of 60 years.

DEA. EBENEZER R. KELLOGG, born in this town Dec. 31, 1830, son of E. S. Kellogg, now resides at Hanover, N. H.

WILLIAM T. HUTCHINSON came with his father from Norwich about 1822 or '23, and settled on the farm where Phineas A. Kemp now lives. He removed to the West about 1846. Artemas Richardson and wife, Eliza S., came from Leominster, Mass., and made a settlement on Hampshire Hill, on the Farris Leonard farm, in 1821. Mr. R. came the year before and located his land, and chopped a few acres, returning to Massachusetts to spend the winter. He was born Feb. 1790; was a combmaker by trade, and worked at that business many years. When quite young, he was chosen captain in the militia, and was ever known in this town as "Captain" Richardson. He was one of the first abolitionists in the community, and never swerved for office; thus was not so often on the winning side in political matters as some of his neighbors of the dominant parties, but lived to see his principles adopted by the nation. He was a genial companion, and loved to tell a good story, although it was not always of his own triumph. Mrs. Richardson carried on the knitting and crocheting business several years, making a large amount of work for the women and children in this and neighboring towns. She has been one of the most active and consistent members of the church. She and Mrs. Kellogg are the only survivors of the original members. Mr. Richardson died here in 1865, aged 75. Mrs. R. lives with her children in Brooklyn, N. Y.

Amos and Martha Rice came from Dover about 1823. He purchased some land, which he cleared, and by the hard labor of many years, made into one of the best farms in town. He died here, and his son-in-law, Crismon Hancock, resided here many years. Mr. Rice was town clerk, justice of the peace, the first postmaster, etc. He died Oct. 20, 1854, at 75 years. Mrs. Rice died Aug. 12, 1865, aged 87.

A FREEWILL BAPTIST CHURCH was organized June 15, 1826, by Elders Ziba Woodworth and Josiah Weatherly.

First members.—David Folsom, Matthias Folsom, Wm. Bennett, Lydia Bennett, Polly Smith, Jesse Abbott, Sarah Abbott, Levi Pratt, Edward Clough, Jr., Wm. Arbuckle, Polly Arbuckle, Abraham Abbott, Abigail Abbott, Ruth Clough, 2d, Abigail Bussell, Nathan Abbott, Eliza Folsom, Ruth Clough, Fanny Flint, Clarissa Peck, Lucy Clough, Mehitable Folsom, Barney Sanders, Betsey Sanders, Ephraim Abbott, Susan Abbott, Jane Hunt, Catharine Abbott, Rachel Pratt. Matthias Flint was deacon, and Wm. Bennett church clerk; and meetings were held in Jesse Flint's house and O. L. Smith's house, and also in the school-house in Dis. No. 4, which was then on the farm now owned by Horatio Templeton. Mr. Woodworth and a Mr. Chatterton from Middlesex, preached for them some, and May, 29, 1840, Elder Moses Folsom became their pastor, during which time previous differences arose; the church preferred charges against their pastor, "for consenting to conversation upon subjects unprofitable" before a committee from the Congregational church. Elder Folsom was dismissed June 3, 1846. After him, Rev. Lucius F. Harris was pastor for 2 years, or until 1848. "Sister Ruth Clough" was the first person added to this church after its organization, July 9. Its whole number of members was 93. It lost its organization soon after Elder Harris ended his ministrations; and but one now of its members is living in town, and who has not united with any other church, Mrs. Elizabeth Folsom, widow of Dea. Folsom, who lives with her son-in-law, Horatio Templeton, and is upwards of 80; and it cannot be now easily known, the records do not know, where the organization was. According to the recollections of some, it was in the old block school-house. Meetings were held there, also at the house of Oramel L. Smith, whose wife was one of its first members; also were held in the Templeton school-house, and at other private houses on Minister brook.

DEA. MATTHIAS FOLSOM, born in Gilmanton, N. H., Oct. 4, 1791. In 1792, removed with his parents to Tunbridge, Vt., and lived there until 31 years of age, when he came to Worcester, Oct., 1822. He was in the war of 1812-15, and near its close came home to Tunbridge, where he was married to Elizabeth Stevens, Feb. 5, 1815. He moved with his family into a small shanty on the farm of Jesse Flint, till he could make a home for them, where he had bought on the Minister brook, where he lived till he removed to a place near the village, where he spent the remainder of his days. He was a man faithful in the discharge of all his religious obligations.

He had a habit of using quaint, or odd expressions, which were sometimes very amusing to those who heard them. It is said he was one winter hired to teach school, and on commencing his school, the opening address was, "Boys and girls, I have come to keep school. Silver and gold have I none, but I have an abundance of learning, and such as I have give I thee," and as he was in earnest, he probably succeeded in imparting to his pupils of his "abundance."

He was an active member of the church while its meetings were sustained; and when they were discontinued he became a constant attendant of the Congregational church, not only on the Sabbath, but at the prayer-meetings also, helped by his presence and prayers; and thus continued as long as his health permitted. His last sickness was short, and his end peaceful. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

A PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH

was organized in 1832, but soon became extinct. Rev. Mark P. Ladd, for many years a resident of the town, was a minister of that denomination, and combined farming and preaching in his life.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

in Worcester was formed from 1841-'46. The names of the first members I have not been able to ascertain. The society was formed Mar. 17, 1848. The meeting at which it was organized was held at the school-house in district No. 2, and was signed by A. M. Kelley, Crismon Hancock, Amos Rice, Leonard Hamblet, Daniel A. Frost, John Clark, David Hancock, Alex. Dingwall, 2d, John Brigham, Alex. Dingwall, 1st, Abel Whitney, Aaron Kemp, Milton Brown, David L. Frost, William H. Cooper, Farris Leonard.

At the annual meeting, Jan. 28, 1847, it was "voted to instruct the committee to hire preaching after the expiration of Rev. Mr. Guernsey's time" (Mr. Guernsey died Mar. 17, 1847), and to hold the meetings at the usual place. After Mr. Guernsey's death, Rev. Sumner Tarbell was hired, and preached some 2 years.

Mar. 1848, a church society was formed, with the powers and privilege by chap. 81, of the Revised Statutes of Vermont, officers of which were: Milton Brown, president; Wm. H. Cooper, secretary; John Clark, collector; Abel Whitney, John Brigham, Crismon Hancock, trustees; John Brigham, Milton Brown, Abel Whitney, standing committee.

Several meetings were held previous to March, 1850, to devise ways to finish paying for the meeting-house and furnishing the same, which was finally accomplished. The church has continued to hold its meetings in this house since its completion.

The names of those admitted in full in 1848 were: Wm. H. Cooper, Abigail L. Cooper, Aaron Kemp, Dolly Kemp, Betsey Kemp, Elvira A. Frost, John Brigham and Eunice Brigham. There have been several revivals in this church since its formation, and many have been added to it. It now has 98 members. Many have gone out from this, as well as from the other churches, to other places, and especially to the West. Rev. Sumner Tarbell closed his labors with this church in the spring of 1850, and was succeeded by Rev. Harvey Webster, who labored here two years. Since, the ministers have been: Lorenzo B. Pettengill, 1 year; Daniel A. Mack, 1 year; Aaron Ball, 1 year and part of another; Joseph House, 2 years and part of another; Freedom Hill, 1 year;

Ira Lebaron, 1 year; Geo. F. Wells, 1 year; Reuben W. Harlow, 2 years; C. P. Taplin, 2 years; James S. Spinney, 2 years; A. Z. Wade, 2 years; P. H. Carpenter, 3 years; Dyer Willis, 1 year; James S. Spinney, second time, 2 years; Geo. L. Wells, 3 years; J. M. Rich, present pastor.

JOHN BRIGHAM

was born at Alstead, N. H., Apr. 1793, and came to Worcester when a young man, being one of the first permanent settlers on Hampshire Hill. His wife was Eunice (Clark) Hutchinson, to whom he was married July 22, 1835, by Rev. Chester Wright, of Montpelier. After their marriage, they always resided on the "Hill," and Mr. B. cleared up a farm, bearing all the toils and privations incident to new settlements. They were members of the Congregational church many years. Withdrawing from that in consequence of internal difficulties in it, they were among the founders of the Methodist church, and were of its most constant and active members. Mrs. Brigham died in Worcester, Mass., Mar. 13, 1860, where she had gone to visit a daughter. Mr. Brigham died at his home in this town, June 29, 1875, coming to his grave "In a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season."

The Methodist society have a good metal bell on their meeting-house, and also own a parsonage.

SIMON C. ABBOTT,

the compiler of "A Record of the Births and Deaths in Worcester," published in pamphlet by the town, was born in Thetford, May 28, 1826, and from his youth evinced a fondness for study. At twenty, he entered a printing-office, and was in that business till compelled by sickness to relinquish it. J. W. Wheelock, then of the Freeman, in a notice of him after his death, says:

He was by trade a printer; served his apprenticeship in the office of the old Family Gazette, at Bradford; worked at several places in this State and Massachusetts, spending those intervals of time in which feeble health unfitted him for labor, at his home in Worcester. No serious alarm was felt concerning him until last summer (1857), when he returned from Massachusetts, to die at home. Theseeds of disease, long since sown, had ripened into consumption. He was a young man of more than ordinary intellectual attainments, possessed of an uncommonly retentive memory, and books and papers were his constant companions. His contributions to the press ever evinced sound common sense, and a deep research into the thoughts of others. His character was unsullied, and so mild and urbane in his disposition, it is doubted whether he had an enemy in the whole world.

MILITARY.

In its early militia affairs, Worcester and Middlesex were combined, there not being enough men of military age in this town to form a full company. Eliab Ripley and Wm. H. Cooper, of this town, and Christopher C. Putnam, Esq., of Middlesex, were elected captains. The June trainings were held alternately in each town about 30 years ago (now over 40). Several cases of delinquencies in equipments having been reported by the captain to the judge advocate, William Upham, Esq., a young lawyer then of Montpelier, accompanied by Justice Ware, came to Worcester to investigate the matter. The delinquents were summoned to appear before the justice at the inn of Milton Brown, at which place the court was to be held. They accordingly appeared, with Homer W. Heaton, Esq., and Milton Brown, Esq., as counsel, and when the court was opened, a jury was asked for by the defendants, and of course granted. Two panels of jury were summoned, and for some three days they sat, calling one case after another. When one case was given to the jury, the other panel was called, until all the 17 cases were disposed of. Defendants and spectators seemed to consider the whole matter as a source of fun, and the juries did not pay very strict heed to the charges of the justice, and were frequently sent out to change their verdict. Judge Ware was also annoyed by the noise made by the spectators, many of whom were boys; and once when he called to the officer to still the noise, that functionary proceeded to the open window, and gravely commanded a flock of geese underneath the window to stop their noise, as they were disturbing the court. The trials were finally ended, all the defendants except one being declared innocent of the charges against them. Judge Ware said he was going into another town to see what they would do there, but he had one compliment to leave for the people of Worcester, which was, that they had managed this thing the d——d'st of anything he ever saw.

SOLDIERS' RECORD.

This town was not settled at the time of the Revolutionary War, and no soldiers went from this town to the War of 1812; but some who enlisted and served in it have been for many years residents. Samuel Andrews, now living here, served in the army one year at the first of the war, and again enlisted during the war. Samuel Kelley, Matthias Folsom, Joel H. Templeton, Jasper Stoddard are such, and perhaps others of whom we have not known. All of them are dead except Mr. Stoddard.

THY WILL BE DONE.

BY MRS. E. D. GRAY.

[Mrs. Gray is a daughter of the late Ebenezer S. Kellogg; born in this town, June 9, 1840. She has been afflicted by a rheumatic difficulty which has made her nearly helpless for some years.]

O! Thou, before whose chastening rod I bow,
 May I a humble suppliant come before thy throne,
 And may these lessons, sent in pitying love,
 Teach me to say, Thy will, not mine, be done.

The way seems dark, and rough and long,
 And I would gladly lay this burden down;
 This weary frame would seek a refuge in the grave;
 Help me to say, Thy will, not mine, be done.

Clouds in my path have risen one by one,
 And like a shroud have wrapped me in their gloom;
 I've looked, aye, looked in vain, for one that's silver lined—
 Oh! can I say, Thy will, not mine, be done?

Yes, trusting, my appointed time I'll wait,
 Patient until the summons calls me home;
 Ready to do, or suffer, as Thou seest best,
 And saying, not my will, but thine, be done.

We give the following notice of our historian, by his pastor, somewhat condensed :

CHARLES C. ABBOTT

was born in Thetford, July 27, 1831, and died in Worcester, Feb. 18, 1881, in his 50th year. He was son of Daniel and Hannah (Closson) Abbott, the 5th in a family of 7 children, but two of whom survive. He came to Worcester with his father's family in 1848; in 1852, married Miss Marcia E. Ladd, who, with 7 children, survives him. He was for 25 years a great sufferer from spinal and rheumatic complaint much of the time, not being able to go about without the aid of a crutch and cane; but notwithstanding his bodily affliction, had a clear, well-disciplined mind, which fitted him for usefulness, and was noted for thorough integrity in all business affairs, and held many offices in town; was postmaster his last 20 years of life, and town clerk 15 years, to the great satisfaction of the people, and was a member of the Congregational church 25 years, in whom the Christian graces were developed in a marked degree. For some years before his death, one could not long be in his presence without feeling they were in the presence of a godly man, rich in humility of spirit and patience in affliction; and in all the trials and cares to which his business life exposed him, he was charitable to all, and adopted a system of benevolence, giving the tenth of his small income for the support of the Gospel and for benevolent purposes. It was his theory that the Lord could make ninety cents go as far as a dollar, and he rested in the promises of the Gospel with great peace of mind. Truly, "The memory of the just is blessed." P. H. CARPENTER.

TOWN OFFICERS 1879-'81.

Clerk, Treasurer, Postmaster.—Charles C. Abbott, 1879-'80; Rev. P. H. Carpenter, town clerk, 1881; H. D. Vail, treasurer, and postmistress, Maria E. Abbott.

Selectmen.—1879, J. A. Kelton, D. H. Massey, Aden Miles; 1880, '81, M. M. Harris, F. E. Templeton, L. M. Hutchinson.

Constable.—A. A. Bliss, 1879; H. Templeton, 1880, '81.

Overseer of Poor and Town Agent.—E. M. Hamblet, 1879-'81.

Superintendent of Schools.—Rev. P. H. Carpenter, 1879, '80, and H. W. Collier, 1881.

Merchant.—H. D. Vail.

Clergy.—Congregational, Rev. P. H. Carpenter; Methodist, Rev. J. M. Rich, 1879, Rev. A. W. Ford, 1880, '81.

[Francis Wooster, with E. L. Hall, an old California miner, commenced gold mining in Worcester in 1875, on a small stream called Minister Brook, and took about $700 worth of gold from this mine, enough to pay their expenses, besides building a 1000 feet of sluice-boxes and in other ways preparing for 1876. During the past winter they have formed a company for carrying on their work more extensively, and will employ a large number of hands. They have leased nine farms lying on the same stream, for ten years.

—Watchman, 1875.

We would like for our general supplement volume a complete history of Worcester gold mining, Winooski river pearls, etc.—ED.

WORCESTER item in the papers during the war:

Charles Kent has sent ten sons and sons-in-law into the army. One of them fell bravely fighting at Petersburg, one of them died in hospital, one is in Sloan hospital, and the rest are now at the front. What father can boast of more patriotic sons?]

ADDITIONAL ITEM FOR WOODBURY.

Hon. F. C. Putnam furnishes the following from the town records:

CALEDONIA Co., ss. }
Woodbury, Oct. 5th, 1809. }

The respondent, David Carr, son of Joseph and Mary Carr, now in court, pleads guilty to the indictment: It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged that he be taken forthwith to a suitable place, and there be tied up and receive ten stripes on his naked back, and pay costs of prosecution; and that he be recorded in the town records a thief. And it was done on the same day and date above mentioned.

Attest, WM. WEST, Town Clerk.

COUNTY PAPERS AND ITEMS.

Waterbury Appendix Third.

EZRA BUTLER'S ORDINATION.

At an ecclesiastical council held at Waterbury Feb. 18, 1801, at the request of the church of Bolton, by their letters missive for the purpose of counseling or assisting them in setting apart Brother Ezra Butler to the work of the ministry.

Churches present · Monkton, Elder Isaac Sawyer, Ashbel Fuller, Asa Moore; Cornwall, Elder Ephraim Sawyer; Amos Marsh; Westford, Elder Thomas Brown, Libbeus Burdick; Fairfax, Elder Joseph Call.

Opened by prayer.

1. Chose Elder E. Sawyer, Moderator.
2. Chose Elder Call, Scribe.
3. Invited and received brethren into Council, viz: Samuel Webster, Reuben Smith, Hubbard Burdick and John Hoyt.
4. Examined into the state of and standing of the Church, together with the reasons of their desiring Brother Butler to be set apart; having received satisfactory answers proceeded,
5. To call on Brother Butler to relate the reasons of his hope, second his call to the ministry, thirdly his ideas of doctrine and church discipline; after deliberate consultation,
6. Voted a good degree of satisfaction, and conclude it duty to proceed to ordain; the order of the day as follows: Elder Ephraim Sawyer to preach the sermon; Elder Isaac Sawyer to make the ordaining prayer; Elder Call to give the charge; Elder Brown to give the right hand of fellowship.

EPHRAIM SAWYER, Moderator,
JOSEPH CALL, Clerk.

This was the first ordination of any minister in Waterbury. He was also the first convert, [see his biography previous] and Elder Call preached the first sermon in this town.

PECK FAMILY.

In another part of this Waterbury history there is honorable mention of Gen. John Peck, but nothing of his family. A man so prominent and popular might be expected to have family relations of whom the reader may be pleased to know something, though it be but little. Mrs. Peck, whose maiden name was Anna Benedict, was worthy any man's affectionate esteem, and this was mutually cherished beyond a doubt. She was no less a remarkable woman than he was remarkable as a man and citizen. They had one daughter, who died quite young. Their oldest son, Lucius B., who was born in Waterbury, Nov. 17, 1802, was widely known in the maturity of manhood throughout the State as an eminent lawyer, advocate and member of Congress. He was mainly educated and his character formed in this his native town. He was known here as a boy, sober, thoughtful as a youth, rarely engaging in the sports and usual vivacious activities of boyhood. This sedate, composed and contemplative manner of deportment adhered to him through life. There was next to nothing of playful activity and wide awakefulness which characterized his only brother, Cassius. Their temperaments were widely different, as their destinies in life. Their purpose and pursuits different as fame and wealth. If eminence at the bar was the aim of one, the visions of wealth were that of the other. Cassius was 4 years younger than Lucius; established himself in the retail dry goods trade in the city of New York about 1831, and after a few years' business, died. His death was sudden, and what is remarkable, this was the case of the deaths of all the family, none of them living to old age. Mr. and Mrs. Peck both died a little over 50 years, Lucius, 64, and Cassius, not much over 30 years.

RICHARD KNEELAND,

who was favorably known to our residents in the second and third decades of the century, in early life lived in Boston, where he learned his trade of joiner by the long apprenticeship then necessary to entitle to a trade reputation, when a trade was something of a service. Mr. Kneeland reared a family of some 8 or 10 children. Two of the sons have represented other towns in the Legislature, one, we believe, the youngest, received a collegiate and medical education, but lived to practice his profession only a few years, dying young. The oldest daughter, a very estimable woman, never married, but at least three we can recollect were well married, and two are now living, also two sons. Mr. Kneeland land lived to the age of 90, and died in this town, 1867. He was always called squire, was a man of extensive reading, and had a peculiar cast of mind, and was peculiar in his religious views.

OLIVER ROOD.

Cotemporary with Squire Kneeland was Oliver Cromwell Rood, a man of remarkable physical energy and executive talent in matters he engaged in. He married a daughter of George Kennan, elsewhere mentioned in this history. Mr. Rood had perhaps a half dozen children, several of whom we remember as good scholars in the old schooldays of our youth. Mr. Rood had a rather varied fortune in life, and one habit, almost universally prevalent in his day, he lived to overcome, much to the comfort of his later years. His children, so far as recollected, became respectable in life. One of them, George, came to an untimely death, as before noted.

FROM MRS. JULIA WALLACE HUTCHINS.

TO A ROBIN BUILDING ON A PORTICO OF A CHAPEL.

Bird of the air, why comest thou here
With thy wild and timid heart,
Thy nest to build, and thy young to rear,
With the sculpture-work of art?

The orchard tree is with blossoms white,
'Twere a fragrant spot to rest;
And the locust leaves from the passers' sight
Would shelter thy radiant breast.

The willows, bending low to sercen
The flash of a thousand rills,
And the matted boughs of the evergreen
Are forever on our hills.

The maple leaves are broad and bright,
And they yield a grateful shade;
Then why on this sunlit wall so white
Is thy love-wrought dwelling made?

I know to me it is not clear
Who shall thy instinct scan,
But I smile to see thou hast no fear
Of the lordly creature—man.

When the peal of the Sabbath bell
Calls human hearts to prayer,
Thou hoverest still o'er thy chosen cell,
Though gathering steps are there.

Bird of the spring, thou hast sought our fane,
But darker wings than thine
Are waving where time hath left a sting
On altar, and tomb and shrine.

For the bittern calls from the stagnant marsh
Where once ran a sparkling flood,
And the owl and the raven, with voices harsh,
Where the ancient idols stood.

But ours is a brighter faith than theirs,
Who kneelt at the idol shrine;
And our math hymns should swell with praise,
Bird of the air, like thine.

A blessing on these hallowed walls
Where thou hast sought to rest;
May peace be shed like the dew that falls
On Hermon's mountain crest.

Should worldly thought on our worship jar,
Or cares disturb our bliss;
Should pride arise with its blight to mar,
May we remember this—

Earth had a Heavenly Wanderer once,
And pensively He said,
The birds of the air had nests,
"But He not where to lay His head."

From the Vermont Watchman, with items from his daughter, Mrs. Henry:

REV. ANDREW ROYCE, was born in Marlow, N. H., June 2, 1805. At the age of 27, was admitted to the bar, but soon gave up the practice of law, studied theology and was ordained as an evangelist, Nov. 23, 1836. He preached first at Williamstown, Vt. He was installed pastor of the Congregational church at Barre, Feb. 22, 1841, where he remained 16 years, eminently successful, and receiving into the church 104 members by profession and 28 by letter, and as a citizen was identified in all movements for the popular good.

Through his untiring efforts the Academy in Barre was erected, and the subsequent prosperity of the village is owing in a great measure to the flourishing school of which he may truly be called the founder. But his arduous and unceasing labors proved too heavy; in 1858, he had a stroke of paralysis, and had to suspend his labor for some months; partially recovered, he commenced to labor in Shelburne and Ferrisburgh for a time, and then undertook the charge of the small parish at Greensboro, laboring there less than 2 years, when being attacked with paralysis, he removed to Waterbury and spent the last few months of his life. He died in this village Oct. 15, 1864, just entering upon his 60th year; when many look forward to vigorous action, he has passed away.

But his life work was well done, though finished at an earlier hour than those that labor less heartily; and he has left behind him a good name and useful life as a lasting monument in the hearts of the many who knew and loved him. He left a widow and 8 children; but two of the daughters died the following year.

WINOOSKI RIVER FALLS IN WATERBURY.

A description of the same from The Rural Magazine or Vermont Repository, Vol. I, page 199, of Samuel Williams, of Rutland, January, 1795. See also description from Zadock Thompson's Gazetteer, p. 825.

Observations made on the Falls of Onion River, at Waterbury, commonly called Button Falls, May 12, 1793, by the Hon. S. Hitchcock and Col. Davis.

The river above the falls is about 15 rods wide, and flows along very pleasant banks on both sides. On these banks are large intervals. In a very short distance the river contracts or narrows to about 20 feet. For about 6 or 7 rods the whole of the water falls with great velocity along the rocks, in romantic meanderings, into a kind of basin formed by rocks on every side. The falls in this distance are about 10 or 12 feet. From the basin the water disappears, and flows under the rocks to the distance of about 60 feet, and then gushes out with great violence. From the head of the falls to the bottom is about 16 rods, on each side of which the channel is bounded by a solid rock, and appears to have been worn out of the rock by the water. This channel is from 40 to 50 feet in width. The height of the bank on the south side, computed from low water, is about 150 feet; on the north side it was estimated at about 90. The falls along the channel are about 25 or 30 feet.

In some part of the falls, where the water in high floods has worn over the rocks, are seen large basins curiously formed in the solid rocks, of 10 or 12 feet in depth, and of three or four feet in diameter. The height of the waters, from the appearance of the timber lodged on the sides of the rocks, must formerly have been 50 feet higher than what it now is. At the bottom of the falls the river immediately widens to about 25 or 30 rods, and flows gently on in a beautiful stream.

DR. CHARLES C. ARMS

was the third son of Jesse Arms, an early settler of Duxbury, one of the foremost men of that town, as Dea. Ira Arms, the eldest son, was after him for many years.

A part of the time of his practice here he was a partner with Dr. Drew, his brother-in-law. He attained a high reputation as a skillful surgeon. He built the house now occupied by Dr. Washburne, which some 30 years ago or more was considered one of the best in the village. [See page 869.]

Correction for page 868: My recollection of Mr. Bryan's coming into town is it was between the years 1815 and 20, more definitely perhaps, 1816 to 1818. I have no recollection from what town in America he came to this place, but presume he had been but a short time in the country when he came to Waterbury. He immediately opened a tailor's shop, and a Miss Scagel, of a Methodist family, whom he afterwards married, worked in the shop, either as apprentice or assistant. Many years after, when he had been married and settled on a farm near the center of the town, and had given up his trade or partially so, he introduced Mr. O'Conner, a tailor from Burlington, to business in this village, O'Conner then being a young man. He did a good business at his trade many years, and finally died in the place. Some time not distant from O'Conner's coming, either before or after, I have no definite dates, an Irishman and Catholic, by the name of Clarke, came to town next; these were the first three Catholics of whom I have recollection as residents. After these, and especially after the building the railroad commenced, they came in large numbers. Father O'Calligan, the priest, visited these families occasionally, probably more than 40 years ago. And it was said that he gave Clarke a cow, or money to buy one, as he was in very destitute circumstances. R. B.

[Since the foregoing was in type we have the following information from a son of Patrick Bryan, the only representative of the family living now in Waterbury: "My father was born in London, and learned his trade there. His parents were Irish, as his name indicates. He came from London to Quebec, and from there directly to Waterbury about 1814 or '15. His family were 6 sons and two daughters. The daughters, in succession, married the same man, a son of one of the large Atkins families. Neither of them lived more than a few years after marriage." "I did not particularly inquire after the brothers (says my informant, who reports to me from the son at Waterbury), but my impression is, two of them went West and one to Canada, perhaps 15 to 20 years ago, and one of them died here a few years since. The father and mother and one or two, if not all of the children who have died here, were buried in Burlington. Mr. Bryan did not remain at the village long. He soon purchased and moved to a farm near the Centre. Many years ago his house was a resort for Irishmen, and Catholic meetings were held there; but after the coming of Mr. O'Connor to the village, meetings were held at his house part of the time. I think none of the O'Connor boys were enlisted in the war from this town, but they very likely may have been in the war, having enlisted for other towns.]

CASUALTIES CONTINUED.

Among which may be reckoned the singular occurrence at the liquor agency several years ago. Two intoxicated men demanded liquor, and threatened the agent who was in feeble health. It became necessary to call the aid of a neighbor to remove the principal offender. Though this was done with the least possible violence, the man died in a few minutes, as if in a fit. Great excitement followed among the man's friends; and finally the man who had the offender in hand at the time of his death, demanded the disinterment of his body, and that a post mortem examination should be had. The result proved the man free of any blame for rough handling the deceased.

THE MEAKER MURDER.

About 2 years ago, Apr. 27, 1880, a most cruel murder was perpetrated in Waterbury, though none concerned in the crime, nor the victim, were residents of this town. It was planned in Duxbury, at the home of criminals, but executed in our town. In the arrangements, some originality of invention is seen, but it involves too many details and too much exposure to observation, to make it easy of concealment.

Little Alice Meaker, the victim, was, if we remember aright, a half-sister of Mr. Meaker, an orphan, or half orphan, and a pauper in another town, the overseer of which had agreed to pay a certain sum in money to Meaker to take Alice to support during her minority. Mrs. Meaker disliked, or had become tired of the child, and planned to get rid of her by a cruel crime. She and her son got a team at Mr. Bates' stable in Waterbury, and a supply of poison of Mr. Carpenter, a druggist here. The Meaker mother and son, and Alice, left Waterbury village between 9 and 10 in the evening, to go some 5 or 6 miles up Waterbury River, and on their way administered the poison, probably finding compulsion necessary.

If particulars are here omitted, the reader may imagine how they proceeded and some of the incidents of that awful ride. By some means, the child came to her death, was concealed in a hole in the ground partly filled with water, dug probably by road makers, and being ready made, was taken by the Meakers. The disappearance of the child immediately raised suspicion in the neighborhood; the result was Sheriff Atherton succeeded in drawing out from young Meaker the fact of the child, and the disclosure of the place of concealment, which was verified by Atherton and Meaker going to the place and finding the body, and their taking it to Meaker's house, the young man telling his mother he had told the story, to the consternation of the mother. The result is they are now under sentence of death, from which they can have little hope of escape.

Errata.—Page 850, middle of 2d column, 25 years ago should read 1821, and same paragraph, after merchant, should read merchant of Chicago; near the top same column, Rev. Dr. Warren should be Rev. Mr.; and at the foot of the Moody column, page 860, should have been added CALVIN B. MOODY, youngest son of George, is a graduate of Middlebury college, and now a Congregational minister. R. B.

EARLY PATENTS.—The Mirror of the Patent Office in the United States, quarterly, vol. 1, No. 1, that gives the patents taken out in 1827, gives 22 states represented, Vermont standing the 10th in the largest number, viz.: 10 patents in the State in 1827, and total to 1828, 18 patents on record in the patent office at Washington, of which four were taken in Addison Co., five in Windham Co., three in Washington Co., two in Windsor Co., etc.: "Building bridges, patent for, to Naphthalia Bishop, Barre, Vt., Jan. 11, 1819;" "Cotton, etc., machine for spinning. G. Brewster, G. Trumbull and J. Matthews, Barre, Vt., Jan. 16, 1812;" "Cheese-press, J. Bigelow, Montpelier, Vt., Jan. 25, 1816."

THE WHEAT AND THE TARES.

Composed upwards of fifty years ago by Rev. Wm. Farwell, of Barre, a Universalist clergyman of some distinction at that time, and who was a pupil of the pioneer of that faith, the Rev. John Murray. The copy was made by a son of the writer of the verses, Col. Lemuel Farwell, of Barre, who died many years ago in that town. They were written by him from memory, and given to Edmund Doty, of Montpelier, in 1821, from whose daughter I received them 20 years ago. They are purely of Vermont origin, originally intended for a hymn, and though I have not heard the tune for a great number of years, it is as familiar to my ear as any in the Psalter.—[Vermont Record of 20 years since.]

'Twas on the green banks of Euphrates's stream
 Jehovah, omniscient, all-wise and supreme,
 First stationed our Father in Eden's green bower,
 And Eve, his companion, a delicate flower;
 He sow'd their young bosoms with seed in their youth,
 With reason, benevolence, virtue and truth, [sown,
 And on the same ground where the eldritch wheat was
 The tare by the tongue of the serpent was thrown.

'Tis plain to be seen thins the heart is the ground
 Where truth and deception are both to be found;
 These are the two seeds which the human heart bears,
 And all that is meant by the Wheat and the Tares.
 The servants of old saw not in their day,
 How God his great goodness to man would convey;
 They saw not the depth of that wondrous Plan
 Which wisdom hath drawn for the welfare of man.

The servant saw tares with the wheat bearing fruit,
 Said, Let us go pull up each Tare by the root;—
 The mild voice of wisdom said, no, forbear,
 Lest that, by so doing, the wheat you impair:
 Let both grow together till thine in the field,
 That man may partake of the fruits they both yield,
 That by their effects he may well ascertain [pain,
 That truth yields him pleasure, while falsehood yields

Man early imbibed false notions of God;
 Supposed him a tyrant, and vengeful his rod;
 The hand of tradition, e'er since man begun
 Hath borne the delusion from father to son:
 The Father of Mercy His bosom unfurled,
 Sent Christ to bear witness of Him to the world;
 Invested with virtue and wisdom to prove
 That God is eternal, unchangeable love.

The Jews disbelieved and quickly began
 To seek the sweet life of that innocent Man;
 Condemned him unjustly to hang on the tree,
 And bear the keen anguish of death's agony;
 The earth was convulsed, her bosom distressed,
 The Heavens in mourning appeared to be dress'd
 The Stars and palama, and Sol's rolling flame,
 All sank from beholding the death of the Lamb.

His healing the sick, his raising the dead,
 His feeding the hungry with meat, drink and bread,
 His casting out devils, restoring the blind,
 All prove Him who sent him a Friend to mankind;
 The love that inspired him, whilst he was on Earth,
 Was stronger, ten thousand times stronger than death;

Love prompted to finish the task that was given,
 Raised from the dead to the mansions of heaven.

By this we discover that mankind shall have
 A lasting existence beyond the cold grave;
 Removed from a state of corruption like this,
 To dwell in perfection's soft bosom of bliss,—
 The Old Dispensation pass'd off and the New Unveiled a scene of bright glory to view;
 The banner, bright banner, of truth was unfurled,
 The Ensign of Peace and good will to the World.

The harvest appeared, the fields were all white,
 The reapers came forth at the first dawn of Light;
 The reapers are those whom our God doth inspire,
 To gather up falsehood and burn it with fire:
 The Spirit of Truth is the sleke so keen,
 The luminous flame is the fire which we mean;
 The temple of friendship and love is the place
 For the mind, when refined, of the whole human race.

[We have but a few papers more in hand as yet for this town. We have requested a full second chapter for Barre, especially in regard to the early settlers, and think to have it for the supplementary part of our next volume; and there will also be space in the supplement for matters of interest in other towns of this County, not yet included; and every party who may have such facts or papers to contribute are invited to send them in, either through their town historian, or directly to the editor in the course of the next few months. We have arranged our papers beyond for this volume. We can only now fill a few more pages: but anon, if, as we look for, we are helped to complete our record for the Gazetteer, we will have the history of the Barre circuit and the Methodist church promised by Rev. J. R. Bartlett; and papers for other towns.]

BERLIN.—A song found in the carpet-bag of the late Maj. R. B. Crandall. It is a piece of more than usual merit, and the premonition of his own death in the last verse, must be touching to all the friends of this gallant and accomplished officer :

THE WHITE-CROSS BANNER.

BY MAJ. R. B. CRANDALL.

Huzza for the Banner that bears the White Cross!
Huzza for the Flag ever foremost in fight!
On the storm-tide of battle it ever shall toss,
Till the foes who oppose it are scattered in flight.

The soldiers who follow the Banner of Light
Are true in devotion and strangers to fear;
For God and for Country, for Union and Right,
They will fight to the last, and then die with a cheer.

Oh! many's the time in the good days of yore
When the Cross, all resplendent in glory, hath shone,
But never since Christ lit to Calvary bore,
Hath it emblemed a cause more true than our own.

Young sister, art thou, O, Banner, war-born,
To our country's proud ensign, the cherished star-flag;
Our affection for both is only less warm
Than the hate that we feel for the South's dastard rag.

Brigade of Vermont, dost remember the day
When on Marye's stern heights, through smoke and the gloom,
How the Cross, on its bright field of blue, flashed its way—
Our hope amid death, but to traitors a doom.

Brave sons of New York, and ye strong men of Maine,
How many a dying eye has been turned From your ranks to that flag which, through glory and palm,
You followed, tho' lightnings of death 'round you blazed.

Oh! patriot hearts, that have throbb'd by our side,
As we've followed that flag on fierce fields full a score!

Oh! glorious hearts, that have bled and then died,
Your comrades are bearing that flag as of yore.

Oh! cause, that is worthy of lives such as these,
Oh! cause, that is worthy of all we can give,
We swear to uphold thee; tho' rivers and seas
Shall pour from our veins, the Republic shall live.

Then anew gl'd your loins, shake out to the sun
The bonnie blue flag, the White Cross adorning;
Sound the clarions of war, be the battle begun,
And the night of our land shall be changed into morning.

But, oh! if I fall in a cause so sublime,
I shall join the brave souls that already have bled;
Tell parents and friends to let the bells chime
In slow, plaintive strains for her sons that are dead, Brandy Station, Mar. 7, 1864.

[The battle-flag of the 2d division, 6th corps, the field is of blue, with a white cross in the center.]

[The Song was set to music by N. L. Phillips of Barre, some 16 or 18 yrs. since. Mr. Phillips, noticed in Montpelier history, page 591, is a musical composer; has written several songs and ballads, no notice of whom in Barre, this volume, is one of the omissions there to be yet redcmcd.]

CABOT.—The following legacies have been left to the Congregational church in this town for the support of preaching and incidental expenses: 1866, Nathaniel Coburn, $500; 1867, John R. Putnam, $100, Dea. Edward G. Haines, $200, A. P. Perry, $400, Ira Fisher, $600.

CALAIS POEMS.

INCIDENTS IN THE HISTORY OF VERMONT.

Written, and sung by J. M. DANA, a long time resident of this town, before the Freeman of Calais, Sept. 1, 1840.

AIR:—"We'll settle on the Banks of the Ohio."

When our fathers left their native climes and came among these hills,
They were pleased with these green mountains with the valleys and the rills;
They began to settle here, a hundred years ago or more,
Yes, Fort Dummer sure was built in seventeen hundred and twenty four.
In seventeen hundred and twenty four,
Fort Dummer was the door;
Vermont was not then known in seventeen hundred and twenty four.

To these hills so green and pretty, New Hampshire laid a claim;
And she made large grants of land to the settlers of the same,
But New York conceiving she had the better right to sell,
Began contending with New Hampshire, and the issue is to tell.
Yes, the story is to tell—
How the savages did yell—
And how many lives they took where we peaceably now dwell.

To the English crown the parties referred the case for time,
Decision formed York East unto the Connecticut line
But New York was still dissatisfied and called out her men—
And the future State turned out under ETHAN AL-LEN then,
Under Ethan Allen then,
They would face the Lion's den;
The green mountain boys were noted for their strength and courage then.

I, Ethan Allen, ask of you Ticonderoga's Fort,
'By what authority your claim,' to him was the report;
'In the name of the Great Jehovah and of Congress' I am sent,
We surrender then to you and our massacre prevent,
Yes, our massacre prevent.
Not because our powder 's spent,
But because of those green-mountain boys that Congress has you sent.

In seventeen hundred eighty, three hundred persons mostly blacked

Commenced the work of plunder and Royaltion attacked.—

They killed all their cattle, with all their sheep and hogs,

Burnt buildings and made captives,—Oh, what cruel, saucy dogs!

Yes, what cruel saucy dogs,

Vermont has no such rogues,

But we met the same at Plattsburgh and they're all beneath the sods.

They had no form of government among the hills of yore,

But the hard fists of the yankees which their foes could never bear;

In seventeen hundred seventy seven their first convention cut

An Independent government, and made their first debut,

Yes, they made their first debut,

Called New Connecticut,

And sometimes it's called Vermont from the green hills and the hut.

The green mountain State Vermont had four claims upon it now,

Massachusetts and New Hampshire said she must unto them bow;

New York also said then her claim should not abate,
But Vermonters said unto New York we think you'd better wait,—

Yes, we think you'd better wait

And secure a better fate,

Than to meet old Ethan Allen here, for then 'twill be too late.

'He's the bravest of the brave,—he asks nothing but the right,

And if refused his honest claim, he's ready then to fight;'

While thus he aided government, green-mountain boys were true,

They were fighting some at Guilford and at Bennington for you,—

Yes, at Bennington from you

The British soldiers flew,

These green mountain boys there beat them, and 700 of them slew.

In seventeen hundred eighty, an attempt was made to bring

Vermonters to the British rule and subject to the king,
While Allen, joined with Warner, negotiated well,

How these heroes cheated Briton then remains as yet to tell,—

But I'm now about to tell

When my Lord Cornwallis fell,

These hill-boys thought their home-made laws would suit them quite as well.

Have you ever seen the man who drew his goods himself by hand,

From Montpeller into Calais and the first beginning planned,

He still resides in town much respected by us all,
His name Abijah Wheelock the first settler we call,—

The first settler we call,

But this is not quite all,—

An honest man we think he is as any since the fall.

His wife came in on snow-shoes eleven miles or more,
The snow from two to three feet deep, and some say even four,

With an infant in her arms and some other luggage too,
A task which few young women now in town have strength to do,

No, they have not strength to do

What their mothers did pursue

In the good old fashioned days of yore which time takes our view.

In seventeen hundred eighty nine new Vermont agreed to pay,

Thirty thousand dollars cash from New York to get away;

She became an Independent State, our Union then began,

She was voted such by Congress seventeen hundred ninety one—

In seventeen hundred ninety one,

With Chittenden her son,

Vermont assumed her place in seventeen hundred ninety one.

In seventeen hundred and ninety one the roads were very poor,

Thro' the woods on foot we traveled with our marked trees on before,

But when winters's snows came on, say four feet or more it fell,

Such music with the deer we had as no one now can tell,—

No there's no one now can tell,

How the hounds would scream and yell,

When they drove their game up to us and at our feet it fell.

Vermont's first inhabitants a hardy set of men,
Hewed the lofty maples down with some fighting now and then;

Their wives would use the sickle and the rake when in the field,

And the husbands oftentimes to the women had to yield,—

Yes, the husbands had to yield.

(Not for work done in the field,)

But the number of the skeins of yarn their wives quite often reeled.

In the good old days of pumpkin pies and checkered aprons too,

The farmers wore their home-spun coats, and linen frocks would do,

The women made their cloth so stout 'twas not called poor or thin,

And 'twas really entertaining, to see them card and spin,—

Yes, to see them card and spin,

Mid their weaving, warping din,

O! tho' times gone by have charmed me, so I wish they'd come again.

Great Britain's on our north, yet we never mean to fear,

On the East a sister State known as Granite New Hampshire,

On the South is Massachusetts and New York is on the West,

But of all the States around her Vermont is still the best,—

Yes, Vermont is still the best,

For in evergreen she's drest,

Like the country maid with milk, green becomes us much the best.

Sir Geo. Prevost at Plattsburgh, tho' in a sister state,
Said Vermont has sent her boys to fight, defeat is sure our fate,

To his fourteen thousand men he said we leave this ground of Platts,
Don't you see them Vermont boys have come with green sprigs in their hats,—
With green sprigs in their hats,
They're ready for combats,
I had rather fight the devil than these Vermont democrats.

Commodore Downie now came up for battle but in vain,
McDonough whipped him well on our little Lake
Champlain,
He made for home 'tis hoped and has not again been seen,
Since the eleventh of September, eighteen hundred and fourteen,—
In eighteen hundred and fourteen,
A treaty made between,
Stop'd our fighting on the water and our merchantmen are seen.

The many ponds in Vermont are well stored with fish,
You can take the salmon trout or the pickerel if you wish,
Should you prefer the scaly perch, the sucker or the dace,
You can take a back-load of them out almost at any place,—
Yes, almost at any place,
If you've the fishing grace
If not you may not have a bite 'twill alter some the case.

Our farmers cultivate the soil not as they did of old,
For then they could not get such plows as in Vermont are sold,
The hoe, the horse-rake, spring-steel fork, the scythe,
the snath, the ax,
We have, and when we use them well a good round price we tax,—
Yes, a good round price we tax,
For to none we turn our backs,
In the chopping, mowing, pitching line, we're speaking now of facts.

Just one word more we wish to say should you pass
thro' the State,
You'll find these tough Vermonters work both early,
sure and late,
But if one calls to see our friends from distance or near home,
The best they have enough of it—you're welcome when you come.
Yes, you're welcome when you come,
We're not disposed to gum,
We'll take some good old cider now—my friend, won't you have some?

The happiest people in the world on Vermont hills are found,
Their charity begins at home, extends to all around,
[Should fortune smile or even frown or trouble ere confront,]
On these green hills there is a balm you'll find it in Vermont,
You'll find it in Vermont,
The green mountain state Vermont,
Spontaneously it grows among the green hills of Vermont.

MEMORIAL.

BY MRS. IRENE D. DWINELL.

An elegy on the death of Sergeant WY-MAN R. BURNAP, who died of wounds received in battle, Sept. 21, 1864.

To free our country from the tyrant's thrall,
We mourn to-day a patriot brave;
To lift from off her face that dark'ning pall,
Has made for him that soldier's grave.

Full oft that voice in "gone-by" days
Has thrilled the sense to concord sweet;
Those brightened hours, in after lays,
The soldier's tent no more may greet.

To thee, dear Lord, the costly sacrifice,
We yield our brother, child and friend;
Where "dust to dust" now sleeping lies,
Let holy angels guard and tend.

East Calais, Jan. 1, 1865.

ABIJAH WHEELOCK,

[BY JULIUS S. WHEELOCK, OF BERLIN.]

was born in Charlton, Mass., in 1764. He was a son of David Wheelock, who was one of the original proprietors of Calais.
He gave his son Abijah a deed of lot
No. 1, in the second division of the township of Calais, dated Charlton, Mass., April 17, 1788. David Wheelock was a son of Benjamin, son of Benjamin, son of Ralph, who was born in Wales County,
Salop, in 1600; was educated at Cambridge University, where he took his degrees in 1626 and 31; came to this country in 1637; first located at Watertown,
Mass., but removed in 1638 to that part of Dedham which became Medfield. He represented Dedham in 1639 and 40; was made clerk of the court in 1642, in place of Edward Allyn, deceased; was the first representative of Medfield, in 1653, 63, 4, and 6; was the father of Benjamin, Samuel, Record, Experience, Gersham and Eleazar, and perhaps others. He died Jan.
11, 1684.

Eleazar was the father of the 2d Ralph, born in 1682, who was the father of Rev.
Eleazar, founder and first president of Dartmouth college. Ralph Wheelock was the father of the race of that name in this country, as there is no record of any other one coming to this country between 1620 and 1693, when emigration to New England stopped, when William and Mary ascended to the throne of England.

MISS ELLEN O. PECK,

"daughter of the late Addison Peck, of East Montpelier, has become an industrious contributor to the 'Cottage Hearth,' Boston, 'New England Journal of Education,' 'Mrs. Slade's Magazine' and 'Good Times.' Among her press articles may be named 'The Early Home of Governor Peck,' and of her poems, her poetical address read before the alumni of the Vermont Methodist Seminary, 1876." We hope to receive "The Early Home of Gov. Peck," etc., with other papers from East Montpelier, for the general supplement.—ED.

SEPTEMBER SUNSET.

BY MISS MARY E. DAVIS.

Lo! the evening spreads her banners
In the far and radiant west,
Where the crimson feet of sunset
Linger o'er the mountain's crest;
While the sun, that shining monarch,
Of the fast departing day,
Gathers up his robe of glory
While he passes thus away.

Back upon the sky of azure
Steals a bright and rosy hue,
Fringing all those clouds of purple,
Sailing through the boundless blue;
And far east, where blushing morning
Breaks the silver glow of night,
Even there the snow-white cloudlets
Catch the melting, trembling light.

While o'er plain and wood majestic,
Touched with Autumn's "mellow beam,"
And the hills, still bright with verdure,
Rising 'mid the vales serene.

As I watch the radiance glowing
All around my cherished home,
Thoughts of wonder, thoughts adoring,
Thrilling o'er my spirit come.
Oh if earth may wear such beauty—
Earth so stained with crime and sin,
What must be that glorious City,
Where no sin can enter in.

Miss Davis was born in Plainfield, this county, but now, and has for many years past resided at East Montpelier, and we reserved, when we compiled the paper for the Montpeliers, a notice of her and her poetical volume, except the brief notice in Mr. Gilman's bibliography for Montpelier, for Plainfield, which in making up Plainfield we overlooked till too late, but for a closing note. The above lines, sent to us some years since by the author, are all that we now have in hand of her writings.—ED.

UNDER THE APPLE BOUGHS.

BY EDNA M. SNOWS.

He lies 'neath the spreading apple boughs,
My little brother Jim;
No care from the busy world around
Casts its shadow over him.
The golden sheen of his tangled curls
'Mid the clover blossoms gleams;
He is floating out, on the tide of sleep,
To the happy sea of dreams.

Dreaming there, with his bare, brow feet
Kissed by the August sun;
I think of the brave and earnest paths
Our little boy may run—
Tollsome and rough to the idle throng
Who shrink from the summer's heat;
Of noble toil for those who tread
With true and patient feet.

I know there are snares for heedless steps
In the luring haunts of sin;
There's fruit so fair to the passing gaze,
But ashes and dust within.
And I kiss the sleeper's trustful lips,
With a swift and silent prayer
That the God of his childhood's love and faith
Be his leader everywhere.

—From "The Little Corporal."

EMERY G. JUDKINS, M. D.,

[FROM OBITUARY BY S. A. SABIN.]

Died in Waitsfield, June 29, of diphtheria, after a sickness of but 5 days, aged 33. He was born in Unity, N. H., received his early education in this town, was appointed at 19 to the United States Coast Survey, and served one year under Capt. Cram. He studied medicine with Dr. Nathaniel Tolls, of this town, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1852, one of the first in his class. He immediately received an appointment in the Hospital at Blackwell's Island, where he remained one year, when he returned to this town, and entered upon the practice of his profession; in 1861, was appointed acting assistant surgeon in the United States Navy, and served in that capacity until the spring of 1862, when he removed to Waitsfield, where he had an extensive practice and many friends, and will be remembered by many. Having known Dr. Judkins from early youth, and having been for several years most intimately connected, the writer feels by his death he has lost a valuable friend, and the medical profession an honorable member. He leaves a young wife.

MEMORIES.

BY MRS. LAURA BRIGHAM BOYCE.

From our historian of Fayston to her sister, Mrs. Sarah Brigham Mansfield, our historian of Roxbury, on the occasion of her silver wedding, celebrated at Roxbury a few years since. Mrs. Boyce and Mrs. Mansfield being the only two sister historians in the Gazetteer, we will thus give to them the compliment of the closing column in this County.

Are you thinking to-night, O sister mine,
Of the years so long ago?
Of the visions that danced in your merry head
As we lay at night in the trundle bed?
Of the tales we told as we sank to rest,
With our heads upon our pillow pressed,
In such rest as children know:

Are you thinking to-night, O sister mine,
Of the old white rock on the lea?
Where we "kept house" in the summer days,—
Went "visiting" with such old, old ways,
One would have deemed we were grand-dames sure,
With faces drawn in such look demure,
While eyes danced in hidden glee.

Are you thinking to-night, O sister mine,
Of the orchard, and its spring,
With its sparkling water pure and cold?
The mossy green that its banks enfold,
And the "spring tree" bending o'er it too,
As if its shadow it loved to view,
Like a vain and girlish thing.

Are you thinking to-night, O sister mine,
Of the happy autumn days?
When we gathered apples in merry glee
From the spreading boughs of the white "full tree,"
'Neath the old "stoop-tree" that bent so low,
And that was Sarah's tree, you know;
While only a little ways

Above it stood our "Mother's tree";
The white "full tree" is living to-day,
And "Mother's tree" will blossom in May?
But where are now that merry band,
Who gathered fruit with dextrous hand,
And laughed in their childish glee?

Scattered and Sundered far and wide
Broad lakes and prairies lie between,
Those wanderers and the mountains green,
And in the churchyard 'neath the hill
Others are lying pale and still
In their cold graves side by side.

And now of all that merry crew
We three, alas! are left here alone;
And we so staid and sober have grown,
That we scarce remember the wild ways
We had in our childhood's olden days,
Nor half of the pranks we knew.

Ah well! time flees! proverbial of truth;
And twenty-five years have borne away
Some friends who loved us in youth's bright day;
Summer is ne'er what the springtime seemed—
The hopes we cherished, the dreams we dreamed,
Are gone with our vanished youth.

We are growing old, O sister mine!
There are lines of care on cheek and brow,
And children who call us mother now
Are more like the selves we used to be Twenty-five years ago, than you or me
As we are to-day in look or sign.

How the time goes on! but yesterday
As it seems to me since you were wed—
'Tis twenty-five years! where have they fled?
We have hardly marked them in their flight,
Yet by this festive scene to-night
We know they have passed away.

And so the years must still go on,
And may your years that lie before
Have joy and love and peace in store;
May Heaven's rich blessings on you rest,
And all your coming years be blest
Till your last year is done.

REV. WILLIAM SCALES, died in Lyndon, Jan. 24, 1864, aged 58 years, 3 months and 27 days. He was a son of William and Rebecca (Smith) Scales, and was born in Lebanon, N. H., Sept. 28, 1805. In early life he removed to Cabot, and was there brought up. He was graduated at Middlebury in 1832, and immediately entered the Seminary at Andover, but in 1835, he left, on account of ill health, and spent about two years principally in teaching; then returning to the Seminary, he was graduated in 1837.

His first settlement was at Lyndon, where he was ordained pastor Dec. 27, 1837. Rev. Chester Wright of Hardwick, preached the sermon. He was dismissed June 16, 1841, and went immediately to Rochester, where, after two years of service as stated supply, he was installed July 12, 1843. Rev. James Meacham of New Haven, who had been his classmate at Middlebury, preached the sermon. From this pastorate he was dismissed Aug. 3, 1847. He then became stated supply of the Congregational Church in Brownington, being at the same time preceptor of the academy at that place. Here he remained 4 years. In the fall of 1851, he removed to Conneaut, Ohio, and there remained, sometimes teaching and sometimes preaching, till May, 1855, when he returned to Lyndon, and became stated supply. He continued in that relation till his death, with an interruption of 2 or 3 years by protracted ill health. The last sermon he delivered was from Deut. 30: 19; a text which his subsequent short sickness and death rendered singularly appropriate. P. H. W.

A SUPPLEMENT TO PRECEDING COUNTIES.

THE HISTORY OF THE TOWN OF SWANTON

IN FRANKLIN COUNTY,

BY GEORGE BARNEY.

With Introductory Papers on the Early Indian and French History of this place,

By Rev. Prof. JOHN B. PERRY.

[Some 20 years since a gentleman of Swanton sent to us a letter offering to contribute the history of this town to the Gazetteer and three days later the Rev. John B. Perry, pastor then at this place made the same offer by letter. Both wrote particularly neat, sensible letters, attractive round-hand penmanship, plain as print; something in the concise sentences, bit of covert originality, peculiarly unique style of Mr. P's penned word that rather inclined us to the second application, and not liking to pass the first applicant, and no further acquainted with either party, we waited before deciding which historian to accept for the town till we should see and advise with President Torrey, of Burlington College, who said instantly, take Mr. Perry's offer. You need have no fear for the success of your work so long as such men as Mr. Perry volunteer to contribute to it. We soon found Mr. Perry stood very high in the regards of all the faculty of Vermont University. In a few days after Henry Stevens, the antiquarian, who then resided at Burlington, a good, old father to us in our early labors, introduced us in his house to Perry, who was one of his particular favorites. Mr. Perry not only entered heartily upon this work for Swanton, but also prepared for the opening of our 2d volume the extensive chapter on the Geology and Natural History of Chittenden, Franklin, Grand Isle and Orleans Counties, etc.

Before we had finished printing the histories of St. Albans and Sheldon, which Swanton should have followed in order in volume II, Rev. Mr. Perry sent to us 150 note pages of manuscript, for this part of his intended history of Swanton, the mss. as far as he had finished it, engaging to keep ahead, which papers were sent to parties printing then for us, and were lost by them for 2 1-2 years, falling behind a drawer in their safe. The volume was finished two years before they were found, and Mr. Perry who wrote he had no other copy whatever of them—no notes to make one, having used his first draft, in abbreviated hand, mostly, with added parts, occasionally, in full hand, pasted over the same;—that he could not undertake to reproduce it. We endeavored to persuade him when the loss was first discovered (hoping the papers would be found at the office where we knew they had been sent, before we should finish) to first give the history of the present Swanton, and leave the natural history of the place with the early Indian and French accounts for a closing chapter; but he had got his plan mapped out, which follows, and could not change. He died before his manuscript were found in their safe by the Claremont Manufacturing Company, and thus the writing up of the present history of Swanton fell to George Barney, a man of venerable and well-informed years, a life-long resident of the town, and who has given so careful and extensive an account of Swanton, from its first permanent settlement to the present day, we must concede the long entangled way has come out well. We have the part by Mr. Perry that Swanton has never had any other man who could or would have so well written up, and the part by Mr. Barney that by his personal knowledge he was better qualified to furnish and the two combined give only the more satisfactory history of this town.]

When the lands lying adjacent to the navigable waters of the Missisquoi river, were first discovered and visited by whites, is not fully determined. Jacques Cartier, a merchant from St. Malo in France, entered the gulf, and beheld the outlet of the river, called by him the St. Lawrence, Aug. 11, 1534. The next year he sailed up this noble stream to Hochelaga, an Indian village, the site of the lower part of the present Montreal. For some time after this, the French made fewer voyages than for years before, while the English entered this field with renewed energy, and many vessels from England visited the northeastern coast of this country, and it need not surprise us if we sometime learn new facts respecting the extensive explorations made, and the great hardships endured by men so noted for daring enterprise as the early English navigators. We should not marvel, were we any day to read in some old narrative of sailors who, while the ships in which they crossed the Atlantic were lying at anchor, went ashore, and having wandered into the interior, were left behind by accident or necessity, and perhaps were never afterwards heard of. It would rather be a matter for wonder, if portions of some such crew, as led by love of novelty, had not penetrated far inland, exploring the native wilds.

REMARKABLE DISCOVERY.

In entire consistency with this natural conjecture, and as confirmatory of whatever of probability may be involved in it, the following remarkable discovery is deserving of particular notice. In December, 1853, a singular record, or certificate, was found on the left bank of the Missisquoi, half a mile or so south of the village at Swanton Falls. It was enclosed in a lead tube, about 5 inches long, and rather irregular in structure, the cavity being somewhat eccentric. Both ends were an inch and a half in diameter, filled with a substance which seemed to be very brittle, and quite disposed to crumble.

The following is an exact copy of the manuscript:

“Nov. 29 A D 1564.

This is the solme day I must now die this is the 90th day since we lef the Ship all have Parishd and on the Banks of this River I die to farewelle may future Posterity know our end.

JOHNE GRAYE”

By making the requisite addition of 10 days for the change of old style into new, the date would read Dec. 9, 1564. Deducting 90 days, we have Sept. 10th, new style, or Aug. 31st, old style, as the time when John Gray and his adventurous companions left the ship and came inland, according to this marvellous document. But a more particular account of this discovery is needed. The lead tube, containing this curious manuscript, and in which it was enclosed when first discovered, was found by Orlando Green, who was accompanied by P. R. Ripley. The discovery was made in connection with the digging of sand for the marble mills at Swanton Falls. It lay a little beneath the vegetable mould, from 6 inches to a foot, below the surface of the ground. As the sand was removed, the sod was undermined, and the lead rolled down into the pit some 4 or 5 feet deep in which the work was going on. The cavity in the sand, in which the tube had lain, was very distinct, while there was no indication, as the discoverer testified, that the soil had been disturbed. The lead seemed to be much oxidized, and had the appearance—so I have been informed by Mr. Green and several others who saw it shortly after its removal—of having been long buried. The substance, with which the opening at the ends of the tube were stopped, though looking like decayed wood, proved to be some kind of gum, or wax. On rubbing, it had very much the aspect of dry putty, or perhaps of a gum in a disintegrating condition. This wax-like substance, having to a great extent lost its tenacity, and being thus in a crumbling state, was for the most part destroyed and lost. Such is the testimony derived from eye-witnesses.

CONFIRMATORY EVIDENCE.

Now is there any historical evidence of any kind, able to confirm this record, or to throw any light upon it, and to strengthen the conjecture with which we began? In the narratives of the early navigators, I find in the folio edition of Hakluyt, printed in London, A. D. 1600, several curious sketches of Frobisher's voyages made with a view to discover a northwest passage to China. The following extracts contain the title of an account of his earliest cruise, and such parts of it as are pertinent to the matter in hand :

The first voyage of M. Martine Frobisher, to the northwest, for the search of the straight or passage to China, written by Christopher Hall, master of the Gabriel, and made in the "yeere of our Lord, 1576." The 7th of June being Thursday, the two Barks, the Gabriel, and the Michael, and our Pinnesse set sail at Ratcliff, and bare down to Detford, and there we anchored. They weighed at Burcher's Island on the 18th of August; on the 19th, as the writer continued, "the captain and I went ashore, and found people. They be like to Tartars, with long black haire, broad faces, and flatte noses, and tawnie in colour, wearing scale skinnners, and so doe the wömen."

The 20th day we wayed, and went to the east side of this Island, and I and the captaine, with foure men more went on shoare, and there we sawe their houses, and the people espying us, came rowing towards our boate; where upon we plied toward our boate; and wee being in our boate and they ashöare, they called us, and we rowed to them, and one of their company came into our boate, and we carried him a board, and gave him a Bell, and a knife: so the Captaine and I willed five of our men to set him a shoare at a rocke, and not among the company, which they came from, but their wilfulnesse was such, that they would go to them, and so were taken themselves and our boate lost. The next day in the morning, we stooede in neare the shoare, and shotte off a fancouete, and sounded our trumpet, but we could heare nothing of our men; this sound [of water] wee called the five men's sound, and plied out of it, but anchored againe in thirtie fathome, and oaze: and riding there all night, in the morning the snow lay a foote thicke upon our hatches. The 22. day in the evening we wayed, and went againe to the place where we lost our men and our boate. We had sight of fourteene boates, and some came neare us, but we could learne nothing of our men: among the rest, we inticed one [man with his] boate to our ships side, with a Bell, and in giving him the Bell, we took him, and his boate, and so kept him, and rowed downe to Thomas Williams Island, and there ankered all night.

The 26. day we wayed to come home-ward, and by 12. of the clocke at noone, we were thwart of Trumpets Island. The next day we came thwart of Gabriels Island, and 8. of the clock at night we had the Cape of Labrador as we supposed west from us, ten leagues.—Richard Hakluyt: Voyages, A. D. 1600, London, pp. 29-32.

It appears the 5 persons went ashore on the northeastern coast of North America, on Wednesday, Aug. 1st, O. S., or Aug. 11th, N. S., 1576, of whom no definite information was afterward received. Were the date a little earlier than that of the Ms. in question, we should be strongly disposed to believe the John Graye was one of those who left the ship Gabriel and finally reached the valley of the Missisquoi. Standing, as it does, it is simply illustrative, indeed. This extended account is given, not that it has any direct connection with John Graye, but simply as serving to show by an actual occurrence, that the supposed transaction before us, of which we have little definite information, may have actually taken place. But there is an account of another voyage, the date of which is in closer agreement with that of the manuscript before us. The late Rev. Dr. Wheeler, who with several others gave some attention to this matter, at the time the document was discovered, informed me that he found evidence of a transaction on the northeastern coast very closely resembling the purported one now under consideration. Having forgotten the name of the work to which he referred, or the source from which he derived his information, though I have ransacked many old volumes in my search for the narrative, I have as yet failed to find it. The following, however, is the substance of what the Doctor told me: "There was an English vessel on the northeast coast, from which several persons departed, who were never afterward heard from. The time of their leaving the ship, as historically given, exactly corresponded, according to one and an allowable mode of reckoning, with the month and day of departure indicated by the manuscript as to the year, however, there was a difference. The ship referred to was on the American coast in 1566, two years later than the date borne by the certificate of John Graye. The coincidence, though not exact, is yet very striking; it wakens in our minds a conviction of the probable truth of the manuscript, and a desire to know more of the trials and hardships, of the dangers and hair-breadth escapes, of those who first visited the valley of the Missisquoi. We cannot well fail to feel, in view of what has been presented, that facts are often stranger than fiction, and that we should doubtless have a memorable tale, were we acquainted with all the adventures of John Graye, on the supposition that this extraordinary manuscript is genuine."

OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

Some have questioned the genuineness of the document before us. We proceed to examine objections urged: First, the discrepance in time. In writing a date at the present day, a mistake as to one year is no unusual thing. Many communications, if judged by their superscriptions, would appear to be a year or two older than they really are. This being so, need we be surprised that such may have been the case with a relation made by a common sailor in the 16th century, when writing was far more rare than now. Even a letter in my possession, which was written in respect to this very manuscript, is misdated, and would have permanently misled me as to the year of its discovery, had I found no other means of fixing the date, so little trustworthy are mere figures in determining an isolated event when all verifying circumstances are wanting. Be this as it may, the exact coincidence as to the month and day is certainly remarkable, and may well make us cautious not to condemn a thing as a forgery without good evidence against it.

It has been intimated that writing materials could scarcely have been in the possession of sailors in the position of John Graye and his compeers. At first sight this seems to be a valid objection; but as we come to understand the circumstances of early navigators more fully, its plausibility diminishes and finally disappears entirely. Most of the naval explorations in the sixteenth century to the west of Europe, while they were ostensibly directed with the view of finding a short passage to Cathay and other parts of the eastern shores of Asia, really had as their prominent aim the discovery of gold. Such was certainly the case in the voyages undertaken by Frobisher in 1577 and '78, if not in his first one in 1576. In the account of them, which was drawn up by Master Dionise Settle, distinct reference is made to these points in terms very explicit and free from ambiguity; also to the fact that the Esquimaux, by coming into contact with sailors, had become familiar with the utensils employed by Europeans in writing. Indeed, we read in that part of Settle's narrative which describes the second voyage of Frobisher, that some of his crew who were sent ashore, in hope that information might reach the lost men and word be brought back, were directed to "leave behind them a letter, pen, yncke and paper, whereby our men whom the captaine lost the yere before and in that people's custody, might (if any of them were alive), be advertised of our pretence and being there." Other voyagers, no doubt, were abundantly furnished with like provisions, and had similar aims in respect to the discovery of gold. They would thus carry with them instruments of various kinds, such as were needful both in making a test of minerals and in recording the results. Writing materials and implements for the rude assaying of metals are accordingly just what, under the circumstances of the case, we may reasonably suppose they carried with them on all their excursions. This view of the matter, therefore, enables us readily to explain the fact that John Graye had not only writing utensils, but also the lead tube, which at the first blush might appear to be a useless incumbrance.

Once more, some have inferred that an occurrence of this kind could not have taken place at so early a day. But here it should be distinctly borne in mind that, while this singular document purports to have been written in December, 1564, this was only a few months previous to the founding of St. Augustine by the Spanish, and that it was more than 30 years subsequent to Cartier's visit to Montreal. It was also only 12 or 15 years earlier than Frobisher's voyages, in one or more of which he seems to have penetrated to Hudson's Bay. The early date, therefore, should appear to be no serious objection. This is especially evident, when we remember that in 1539, 25 years earlier, De Soto passed through the southern portion of the country from Florida to the Mississippi, traveling in all some 3,000 miles; and surely 90 days, during the latter part of which the streams were probably frozen, must have given John Graye and his associates abundance of time to pass from the river St. Lawrence, or even from the seaboard to the valley of the Missisquoi.

It has also been thought improbable that death should have overtaken these adventurers on the shores of Lake Champlain, at least from cold or hunger. The manuscript does not say that any died from such a cause, but only that the writer's companions having perished previously, his turn had at length come; the time had arrived—it was the "solemn day" when he, too, must die, on the banks of the river he had reached. Still, some such causes, perhaps, as those referred to, are implied. In respect, then, to exposure and want of sustenance, it should be remembered that in this climate, cold weather usually sets in long before the 9th of December in good earnest. At that time the streams have ordinarily become frozen, and the ground is covered with snow. Under such circumstances, the difficulties in the way of supporting life very long must have been great. That one so situated might survive is indeed possible, but, where one survived, many would be likely to perish. Add to this that the valley of the Missisquoi, as being intermediate ground, was probably entirely, or for the most part, uninhabited, owing to the feuds between the Indian tribes at the period referred to, and we see little improbability in a person perishing, either from lack of food or from exposure to the inclemency of the season.

Objections have been urged against the lead tube and the manuscript itself. It has been said that John Graye could not have made the tube on the spot, and many have wondered that he should have any such thing in his possession. As to a use to which this tube may have been put, sufficient reference has been already made in the remarks respecting the early navigators' possession of writing utensils. That the tube is not of recent construction, seemed at the same time to be very plain. It is evident that it must have been long buried. The discoverers of it say, from the situation in which they found it, they believe that it could not have been placed there recently. The strata were not disturbed, so its appearance when first removed from the soil, according to the testimony of eyewitnesses, tends to the same conclusion. It was surrounded, when found, by a white incrustation. This remained upon it for some time, though it was at length, to a considerable extent, worn off by handling. Of this incrustation, Dr. A. A. Hayes, of Boston, State Assayer of Massachusetts, says: "This substance which adheres to the tube in the cavities is carbonate of lead, such as would form in case the lead were exposed in the soil."

As to the paper, I well remember that Dr. Wheeler remarked to me somewhat as follows: "To the best of my judgment it is such as was for the most part employed in the sixteenth century in commercial affairs." Confirmatory of this statement is the following language of Dr. Hayes: "This paper is identical with such as is often used by the manufacturers of hardware. It is oiled in the process of manufacture, and for the purpose of increasing its protection of hardware from moisture." "It yields to alkali, an oily body appearing like linseed oil. The fibre is of rope, either flax or hemp; it is a laid paper well filled."

Of the ink it has been remarked, by way of objection, that it is "as bright and shining black as Harrison's Columbian."

On this point, also, I quote the testimony of the distinguished assayer already named, "The ink is a true galiate or tannate of iron. Its appearance, like that of a pigment, is owing to its being dried on an oiled paper."

But another point, connected with the objections in question, demands particular notice. All the results of chemical analysis thus far referred to have seemed favorable to the genuineness of the document before us. When, however, the paper was critically examined, there was found upon it a semi-transparent or wafer-like substance, which was regarded as conclusive evidence against the supposed age of the manuscript. "The translucent matter like wax," says Mr. Hayes, "is composed of flour and colored by a pigment like a wafer. So little is this substance decomposed, that it yields starch, which gives with iodine water the usual color." Such is the conclusion reached by the assayer; what his opinion was as to its bearing on the manuscript, I am ignorant. But whatever it may have been, most of this chemical test seemed to be decisive. As wafers did not come into use until a period much later than claimed for the paper, and as the portion of the one found upon it was not changed in its character, the whole matter was generally regarded as a sham, and was thus at the time supposed to be finally put to rest. And the objection is certainly plausible, and, were the paper no older than the wafer, would be fatal. But this objection is entirely rebutted by a counter fact, which should be additionally stated. A wafer was made use of in fastening the manuscript upon the wall of the office, in which it was for a while exhibited shortly after it was found, that all might see it without handling. On this point I have the explicit testimony of several credible witnesses.

A few words are perhaps also required respecting the chirography, spelling and style of this document. It may be observed that there are no marks to indicate pauses in this singular writing, a period after the abbreviated form of November being the only point which it contains.

This use of the period is of frequent occurrence in manuscript of the sixteenth century, and the absence of punctuation marks is by no means rare. As to the handwriting, little need be said. From this alone it is difficult, if not impossible, to come to any definite and satisfactory conclusion, there is such a variety in this particular amongst different individuals living even in the same period. So far, however, as I can judge, though I am poorly qualified for the task, the chirography of this specimen is for the most part characteristic of the olden time in England. The spelling closely resembles that which prevailed in the age to which the manuscript purports to belong. There is, I believe, in the manuscript no more exact discrimination between the letters I and J than was usual in most writers of the sixteenth century. The final e, which with us is generally silent, is used about the same as in the narratives of the old English voyages, John being spelled I or J-o-h-n-e. The definite article the being written out in full, is regarded by some as a suspicious circumstance. It is, however, so written, even in Wickliff, who flourished in the fourteenth century, and in many other writers of an earlier day than the presumed age of the manuscript. It is true that the contracted form for th, resembling our y, and now often erroneously pronounced like it, was also common at the time in question. Both forms of writing may be continually met with in the same passage in the translation of the Bible of 1551. The objection, then, to the old form is not here employed, and is of little, if any weight. U and V are also used interchangeably, as was customary in the sixteenth century. As to the style, it is just that which we might naturally look for in a sailor of the period, or perhaps in any one not much used to composing. This is clearly indicated by the short and unconnected sentences, as well as by the redundant expression, "future posteritye."

But it may be asked, was not all this devised by the reported discoverer of the manuscript, or by others acting in connivance with them? It should be remembered that the persons referred to were not scholars, that they were in no wise well read in the old records of English navigation and discovery—nay, more, that they had probably never before heard of works of this kind. They were consequently wholly unqualified, had they been ever so much disposed, to prepare a document having so much internal evidence in its favor. Of them, Dr. G. M. Hall, who knew both well, testified, soon after the discovery of the manuscript, "I am confident that the finders could not have originated this matter." They also bore witness themselves at the time, and have repeatedly done the same at a more recent date, that they were not only innocent of fraud themselves, but also were ignorant of fraud on the part of others. This, with their attestation, that the strata of sand in which the manuscript was found were undisturbed, should have no small weight, especially when viewed in relation to all the other corroborative facts which have been mentioned. It should, perhaps, be likewise stated in connection with what has been said, that not many persons in any of our country towns are capable of such a forgery. While a few are doubtless in some one point competent to perpetrate a literary fraud of this kind, how small is the number of those who would be sufficient to guard against difficulties in such a variety of points, and to accomplish the whole work in so masterly a way. Had almost any one undertaken it, having considerable skill in such things, he would no doubt have made the doings of John Graye synchronize exactly with some known event. To a course of this kind I now fail to remember a single exception, amidst the innumerable counterfeits which have been palmed upon the world during the different periods of its literary history. In the case before us, however, no exact synchronism has been discovered or suggested. In due time, also, the perpetrator of such an act would have probably intimated, in one way or another, where the coincidence could be found, if it remained for a while undetected, whereas no intimation of this sort, so far as I can learn, has been ever made. Again, few, if any, get up such a matter as a hoax without revealing the secret themselves after a short delay, that they may exhibit their own skill, or make sport of the dupes of their craft. But in the present instance, nothing of the kind has come to light; nearly 16 years have now elapsed; such as were at the time suspected of playing a game, have since and repeatedly testified to their entire ignorance of any deceit in the matter; while the whole thing is as much a mystery to-day, if it be not deserving of credit, as it was at the start. Still more, the fabricator of a record of this character would have been hardly satisfied with one so simple and unpretending as the present. He would not, doubtless, have been content to leave John Graye no better known, or to have designated him by an unrecognizable appellative, when he might have just as well chosen a name for his idea hero from some of the lists of sailors which have come down to us in the old English narratives. So, too, he would have been likely to describe at some length the sufferings and hardships of his imaginary explorer, and not allow us to remain ignorant of his antecedents; also totally in the dark whether his companions perished from hunger or cold, or the torture of the savage; and whether he expected a like death himself. On the other hand, however, how natural it is for a seaman, when his life is threatened by danger or starvation, to prepare a brief account of the fate that awaits him. And this he would do, having formed the habit, as soon on the land as on the stormy ocean. These considerations, and especially the fact that the date does not exactly agree with that of any known event of a like kind, all tend to waken the conviction that there has been no conniving, and that thus it is not unreasonable to regard the manuscript as authentic.

Such are the main objections which have been urged against the document before us. In reviewing them, the aim has been not to cast them aside as the mere result of prejudice, but so to sift and examine them as to get at the truth. In view of this investigation, the conviction is awakened that there is really nothing against the manuscript in question; also, that all the matter involved in the several objections may be explained in entire consistency with the supposition that the record of John Graye is just what its simple purport indicates. While, indeed, there is no evidence, absolutely exact and positive, to establish the genuineness of this manuscript, there are many accompanying facts and points which are hard to reconcile, if we adopt the assumption that it is spurious. It should likewise seem that any one, though only slightly conversant with early English literature, and particularly with the narratives of the earlier English voyagers, must be led to feel, on a careful scrutiny of the manuscript in question, in connection with all the attendant circumstances, the extreme difficulty in the way of a successful forgery of this description, and the almost insuperable obstacles which stare him in the face, if he treat it as spurious without more evidence against it than has yet come to light. Positive proof in its favor is, it is true, for the present, and perhaps must always be wanting; but this is by no means a sufficient reason for rejecting what on other grounds appears to be valid, and which if rejected must render many things inexplicable. Accordingly, the suggestions which have been made, while they do not pretend to decide the matter beyond all question, may yet help to remove a class of difficulties which naturally rise in the enquirer's mind, and in thus negatively establishing the genuineness of this remarkable document, may serve to shield it from undeserved reproach, and to enable us to receive it with becoming courtesy, until there be reason for the contrary, and unless some positive objection be urged against it on valid ground.

CONCLUSION REACHED.

Such is the earliest known record pertaining to the banks of the Missisquoi; such the strong presumptive evidence in favor of its genuineness; and such the sad end of John Graye, its supposed author. It should thus seem probable that a portion of Western Vermont was visited by men of English extraction, long previously to a single discovery made in the neighborhood by the French, or any other nation of European descent. And here it may be remarked, that these supposed adventures and the time of their occurrence, serve to invest the early history of Swanton with a romance, which perhaps belongs to no other township in the State, even if we fail to satisfy ourselves that John Graye and his unfortunate compeers came from any of the ships already referred to. We can not doubt, but know from express testimony, that not a few vessels from the British Isles were along the north-eastern coast of America, during the 16th century, in the memorable search both for mineral wealth and for a northwest passage to India. There were, no doubt, countless adventurers whose names never have reached us,—adventurers, who either for such reasons as have been mentioned, or as in quest of a fitting place for settlement, undertook long voyages, endured terrible hardships, and encountered sad reverses, of whom no certificate has come down, signed, as in the present instance, by the last survivor.

It is, indeed, in perfect keeping with the daring enterprise of the early English navigators, aye, and with the romance of the time, that some of the many individuals, who were led on by thirst of gold, or others it may be, with equal probability, by love of wild adventure, should have an experience of just the kind narrated. In fact, it is by no means unreasonable to suppose that there were persons of this character, who actually reached the interior of the country; that one after another perished; and that finally the last may have met an untimely end, like that suggested, with none left to chronicle it, and thus, as he supposed, to fulfil the prayer that it might be known to "future posterity." Some such perhaps were the companions of John Graye, who left their ship off the coast of Labrador, or in the River St. Lawrence; proceeded inland, either in a skiff or on foot, and explored the region to this place. Thus advancing, they would be the first whites to look upon the waters of the Lake, at that time possibly known as the Petawabouque, and only long after as the Champlain. It might also be their part and lot to discover the valley and to die on the banks of the Missisquoi—a valley now noted for its fertility and loveliness, for its charming intervalles and uplands on either side of the stream, and for its picturesque union of hill and dale to the east—a valley, which was then clothed with primeval forests, robed through the year by thrifty growth of evergreens, thus protected in winter, and adorned all summer long in a dress of enchanting richness, and of unrivalled beauty.

THE PRIMITIVE INHABITANTS OF THE REGION, WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE ST. FRANCIS TRIBE.

The discovery of two Indian nations and the nominal occupation of the soil.

A brief account of Champlain's discoveries are needful, as the grant, made by the French Crown at a later date, of lands constituting the banks of the Missisquoi, was considered to rest on his early occupation; and as his observations throws light on the great Indian nations which inhabited this region during the period in question.

Long subsequent to the voyages of Jacques Cartier, and about half a century after the supposed adventures of John Graye, the Sieur Champlain ascended the St. Lawrence. This was in 1603, under the direction of DeChatte. At that time, he went as far as the Island of Montreal, the old Indian village of Hochelaga then having been for some time destroyed.

A few years later, but before Hendrick Hudson's discovery and ascent of the North River, though during the early part of the same season, also 11 years prior to the founding of the Plymouth Colony, Champlain, having established a settlement at Quebec the preceding autumn, spent the spring and summer of 1609 in making an exploration of the wilderness to the south of the St. Lawrence. He ascended the Sorelle, or Richlieu, and the waters of the Lake, which has since borne his name. The voyage of discovery seems to have extended as far as Crown Point, and perhaps a little farther southward.

With a view to entering upon this bold enterprise, he had, before setting out, procured the assistance of a large number of Indians, who were then living in the vicinity of Montreal. These were Algonquins, and as knowing the country to the south, were to proceed with him on his adventurous undertaking. The Algonquins were one of the great races of red men in this country—and were made up of numerous tribes, at that time occupying the territory of what is now the whole of New England to the east of the Green Mountains, most of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, nearly all of Lower Canada, and much of the country between the Delaware River and the Mississippi. According to J. Fenimore Cooper, "the generic name of this people was the Wapanachki. They were fond, however, of calling themselves the 'Leni Lenape,' which of itself signifies an 'unmixed people.'"^{*}

As Champlain made his way along up the River and Lake, he gradually entered an inland region, in which the Algonquins who accompanied him were evidently less at home. They were continually on the lookout, lest they should be suddenly surprised by the "Iroquois," who also claimed this territory, and were hostile to the Algonquins. The name they gave themselves was Kayingehaga—Possessors of the flint. They belonged to a great confederacy and were often known as the Konoskioni—the cabin-builders. By their neighbors they were sometimes termed the Mengwe. They were one of the grand divisions of Indians in North America, and often styled the Five Nations, consisting of the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Senecas, the Cayugas and the Onondagas, all the deadly enemies of the Algonquins. Another tribe, the Tuscaroras, having been added to the confederacy at a more recent day (in 1714,) these several great families as leagued together, have been since more generally known as the Six Nations. Their present representatives are the Caughnawhagahs. "The oldest United Republics of which the history of North America furnishes any evidence." They inhabited what is now the state of New York, with much territory to the west of it. Also considerable portions of the western part of the present State of Vermont.

The latter is evident from the account by Champlain, that he learned from the companions of his voyage, describing his passage up the lower waters of the Lake, which bears his name.

"I saw four beautiful islands, 10, 12 and 15 leagues in length, formerly inhabited, as well as the Iroquois river, by Indians, but abandoned since they (the Algonquins and Iroquois) have been at war the one with the other. Continuing our route along the west side of the Lake, viewing the country, I saw on the east side very high mountains capped with snow. I asked the Indians if those parts were inhabited. They answered me, yes, and that they belonged to the Iroquois and that there were in those parts beautiful vallies, and fertile fields bearing as good corn as any I had eaten in the country, with an infinitude of other fruits."

Thus in the first place it is evident that by the Iroquois river we are to understand the Sorelle. The name certainly indicates that the banks, or at least a portion of them, belonged to the Iroquois, or were once inhabited by them. Again, it appears that much of Vermont, probably all its western slope, belonged to the same nation. Still again, it is said that portions of this region had been for some time abandoned, because of the wars between the Algonquins and their foes. Once more "mountains capped with snow" in June may suggest that there has been some change in the climate, and especially in the length of the seasons, since that time. Owing to the clearing up of the forests, and other causes. It is certain such has been the case. It is true that the appearance described by Champlain may be regarded as an illusion, since the reflection of light from the rocks on the western slope of Mansfield, often in mid summer, from certain points of view, gives the mountain the aspect of being crowned with snow—when none is present. Still there seems to be no good reason to doubt that the statement made by Champlain was accordingly a fact, especially as John A. Graham, writing in 1796, says that snow on the high parts of the Green Mountains lies until May, and sometimes until July.*

It is clear from this account that corn and other fruits at that time grew in the fertile vales lying between the Green Mountains and the Lake; when Champlain ascended the Lake, what is now western Vermont, was in the possession of the Iroquois. Their claim to this land, was probably acceded to by the Algonquins; to say, c'est des Iroquois, it belongs to the Iroquois. Though the interpretation may be put on the words that the region was in the possession of these Indians, undoubtedly correct, so far as it goes. And without proof to the contrary, it is no more than fair to suppose they had some title to the lands either by conquest or otherwise, and to which they have continued to assert their claim. In simple conformity with such a right, their surviving representatives, the Caughnawhagahs, have, from time to time, since 1798 up to a comparatively recent day, presented petitions to the Legislature of Vermont for compensation for these lands. That they actually held this region, when it was visited by Champlain, is evident from his language; that it was not then so much occupied by them as at an earlier day is possible, if not probable; while from other sources of information it seems to be certain that they inhabited it still less in subsequent years, until they finally abandoned it altogether. Meanwhile it is equally clear that far to the east, and to the north in Canada, the Algonquins were then dwelling. This would leave the territory along the northern part of the Lake in the vicinity of the Missisquoi river and bay, as well as the lands on the Sorelle, tho' claimed by the Iroquois, yet for the most part, if not entirely, unoccupied when Champlain made his explorations. Such, perhaps, was the case when the region is supposed to have been visited by John Graye and his companions, while doubtless long after this it continued to be a sort of intermediate ground—a common battle-field—lying between the two great Indian nations already named.

It should thus seem plain that a fair interpretation must concede that the Iroquois not only occupied parts of western Vermont but had some right to the soil in this neighborhood, at the period in question. Be this, as it may, Champlain took possession of all this territory in the name of the King of France, in this wise laying the foundation, as it was supposed, of the wide extension of the French dominion.

ORIGIN OF THE ST. FRANCIS INDIANS AND THEIR SETTLEMENT ON THE MISSISQUOI.

As the lower falls on the Missisquoi River, and the lands above, adjacent and below, were inhabited by Red men, whose descendants lived here at the comparatively early day, when the first settlements were made; as this neighborhood continued to be one of their principal places of abode for many years after the settlement of the whites; as they have been associated in name with the falls of the river above referred to, they have especial claim to notice in a history of the town, as the earliest inhabitants living on the banks of the Missisquoi of whom we have any definite knowledge—not to the original inhabitants of the country, absolutely considered, of whom we know almost nothing, but to the Indians who were dwelling here when most of the earlier settlements were made in this region by whites.

Before Champlain's discovery, the banks of the Missisquoi were claimed by the Iroquois, and undoubtedly in some sense belonged to them. But though the Iroquois once had some claim to the Missisquoi valley, I know of no certain, or even probable evidence that they ever dwelt on the precise ground finally occupied by the St. Francis tribe. As the Iroquois gradually retired to the west of Lake Champlain, or perhaps after they had entirely removed to territory now comprised in the state of New York, the more northern lands in that part of the valley which lies on the east side of the Lake, among others those near the mouths of the Missisquoi River, began to be occupied by a portion of the Algonquin race. The Indian relics, indicative of settlements both here and farther to the south, on the river Lamoille and the Winooski, also in several portions of Addison County, are probably in part the relics of Red men belonging to this great family. They are also perhaps partly the remains of the Iroquois; and in part they may be, doubtless are, all that is left to tell us of a great nation who dwelt in this region, at a far earlier day than the one in which Algonquins and Iroquois flourished. When the Iroquois finally came into possession of these lands, they used and claimed them as their own. So, too, on their retirement, the Algonquins, whether they ever held the region before or not, then took possession of it; and they have continued, at a later day, both to assert their right to the soil and to occupy it to some extent.

This portion of the Algonquins, in this valley, were sometimes called the Zoquageers, a tribe of the Abenaki, one main division of the powerful Algonquin nation, occasionally designated as the Zoquageers, and originally dwelt in what is now a part of Maine, New Hampshire, and perhaps of Massachusetts. A portion of this tribe finally settled in the Coos country, on the upper waters of the Connecticut. It also appears that some of them afterward, and at a still later day, established themselves both on the Missisquoi River and a short distance to the north of it in Canada. Those on the river last mentioned, in records of a more recent date, are often spoken of as the Abenakis at Missisquoi. They were thus designated from the fact that they were a portion of the Abenakis settled in a village called Missisquoi. The latter name the tribe probably gave to the river on the banks of which their settlement was situated. According to one authority, the name Missisquoi was originally applied only to the lower part of the stream, and not to the whole of it, until a much later day. In either case the term is distinctive of that portion of the tribe which was located on the waters in question. At last, however, the Abenakis on the Connecticut, on the Missisquoi, and in Canada, were known by a new name. As they sustained relations one to an other, they came to be alike called the St. Francis Indians. They probably received this designation from the fact that they were all more or less brought under the influence of the followers of St. Francis of Sales, or this appellation may have been given to them because a majority of their number were perhaps at one time located at the village of St. Francis, on a river of the same name in Canada, both the village and the river no doubt being so called, directly or indirectly, in honor of the celebrated founder of the order of Franciscans. Confirmatory of this is a remark made by M. de Denouville in 1690: "Of all the Indian nations, the Abenaki is the most inclined to christianity."* And large numbers of them having readily come under the Franciscan influence, we can at once see, how naturally they would all, at the three places specified, in time be called by pre-eminence the St. Francis Indians.

In regard to the exact time when the Abenakis settled on the Missisquoi river, there is considerable certainty, according to Mr. Hoskins, (See his History of Vermont,) they were first established on the River St. Lawrence in the year 1703. This date is probably too late by a considerable number of years. Indeed, that they were located on the St. Lawrence before this is certain. The French gentleman, quoted above, writing in 1689 (or '90,) says: "I saw 600 Abenakis arrive on the St. Lawrence from the vicinity of Boston." Whether they took up their abode on the banks of the Missisquoi at an earlier day than on those of the river St. Francis, I have as yet found no certain means of determining. As, however, the tribe with which they were all connected, originally resided to the east or southeast—as also the party just referred to came from the direction of Massachusetts Bay, it is not at all unlikely that those belonging to this division established themselves on the shores of Lake Champlain soon after the retirement of the Iroquois, as has been already intimated. A few years later many of them, if not a majority in this locality, as well as considerable numbers in other quarters, may have been induced by considerations and influences unknown to us, to locate at St. Francis. Coming from the east and passing up the Connecticut, they would be likely first to establish themselves at Coos; others following up the White river would naturally settle in the valley of Lake Champlain; thence some might pass on into Canada, or still more probably, a portion, proceeding from the Coos country down the St. Francis river, would readily locate near its mouth or on the St. Lawrence. Some such view of the matter is needful and deserving of consideration, since it serves to reconcile many points which must else remain full of difficulties, while without it all is confusion, if not self-contradiction. And it may be remarked that the view above suggested is in entire consistency with the representation made by Father Ducreux. On the maps accompanying his history of Canada, which extends down to the year 1656 and was published about the same time, Lake Champlain marks the western limits of the territory of the Abenakis. If we may take this authority we may, so long as we find no good reason to doubt it, we are authorized to look for the settlements of these Indians in the valley of the Missisquoi at a date certainly as early as about 1650.

THE RELICS OF THE ST. FRANCIS INDIANS, AND THOSE OF THEIR PREDECESSORS.

The origin of the Red Men who bore the name of St. Francis, and their settlement on the border of Lake Champlain, having been noticed, brief reference should be made to such remains as have come to light from time to time, and serve to acquaint us with their history. Many Indian relics of the kind referred to have been met with on the lands adjacent to the lower waters of the Missisquoi. These have been often found lying on the surface of the ground, or they have been accidentally burned up in the cultivation of the soil. They have also been discovered amidst the ruins of old wigwams, and in places of burial. They consist of implements of which the Algonquins made use in hunting and fishing, in agriculture, and perhaps in a rude kind of weaving or netting; likewise of weapons of war, and of religious emblems. They are of special interest as indicating the degree of advancement to which these children of the forest had attained.

There are, in the neighborhood, under consideration, the remains of two Indian burial places. These are of very different ages. The first claiming our notice is situated about 2 miles below the lower falls of the Missisquoi, on land owned by A. A. Brooks. It occupies a portion of a sandy terrace of considerable thickness, which rests on underlying clay. It is near the Missisquoi River, and undoubtedly belonged to the St. Francis tribe, a branch of the great Algonquin race, inhabiting this portion of north-western Vermont, which was first settled by whites. The burial place was apparently connected with an old Indian village in the neighborhood which consisted at an early day of about 50 huts, and was called Missisquoi, after the estuary or stream, on the banks of which it stood. It was unquestionably used as a place for the interment of the dead, at a comparatively recent date; still some circumstances have led me to suspect that a portion of it served the same purpose, at a much more ancient period, and long before it was thus employed by the St. Francis tribe. Its main features, however, clearly refer it to the last named Indians. On this ground have been discovered in abundance implements made of stone, both hatchets and axes, spear and arrow-heads, gouges and chisels; also rude specimens of earthen-ware of several descriptions, with various trinkets, as beads and other articles of adornment. In times of high water, when the river is swollen, human bones have been often washed out of the bank, on which this old burying ground is situated. Among these it is said that bones, in a few instances, have been met with, of such size, as to indicate that the individuals to whom they belonged must have been of extraordinary stature.

Though it be by no means certain, still it is possible, that these were the remains of a more ancient people, that inhabited the country at a far earlier day.

This conjecture leads me to notice the other burial place already referred to. It is situated on what is called, in the neighborhood, the "old hemp-yard." This is about 2 miles north of the lower falls of the Missisquoi, it is not very far from the line which separates the township of Swanton from that of Highgate. The above cited name was given to this locality, not, as is often affirmed, because hemp was formerly raised on the ground, but because when the first settlement were effected, it was densely covered with thrifty Norway pines, which, as the tradition had it, grew as thick and straight as hemp.

One of the oldest inhabitants in this vicinity, one who was born in the neighborhood, and has always lived in it, informed me that he never knew any hemp to be raised on the grounds in question; and he was here long before the forests were removed. The soil is sandy and very dry, peculiarly well adapted to the purpose for which it was employed.

This latter place of sepulchre is of great antiquity. It belonged to a race, long ago extinct, a race which inhabited the country before either the Iroquois or the Algonquins—the two great contemporaneous nations of Red men in the region—came upon the stage of action. Of the origin of this burial ground, and of the people whose remains were here entombed, the St. Francis Indians, as I am credibly informed, knew nothing. Respecting them, they even had no tradition, as I was once told by one of the few surviving members of the tribe. Upon the graves the largest trees were in full vigor, or already waning—and we are ignorant how many had previously matured, and gone to decay—when the region was first settled by whites. Indian relics are now often found directly beneath large stumps, which still remain as a witness of the trees which must have taken root, flourished for centuries, and grown old on the resting place, and since the disappearance, of this more ancient people. From these graves I have collected pieces of earthen-ware, adorned with curious hieroglyphics, of undoubted antiquity, and which to my mind give almost unmistakable evidence, if not of Asiatic origin, at least of a people closely allied in their sentiments and habits to the nations of the East.

Reference is now more particularly made to earthen tubes, somewhat in the shape of a flute or pipe, from an inch to an inch and a half in diameter, and from about 15 inches to 2 feet in length, ornamented with hieroglyphics of a moral or religious character. These symbols, so far as I can make them out, are closely akin to those employed as well in the Eleusinian rites, as in the old Cyriabaic mysteries of Samothrace. Amongst these remains there are also specimens which might seem at once to hint at the Noachian deluge, and to symbolize the deliverance from it. A canoe, with what appears to be a bird, perhaps a dove, wrought in stone, is one of the emblems referred to. This, when compared with some of the Mexican antiquities, interpreted as having such a signification, seems certainly with as much clearness as they to point to the flood associated with the name of Noah. Some of the arrow-heads found in this burial place were made of a stone different from any, so far as I am aware, found in the region. It is of a fine grain, and very compact, and might be wrought by the lapidary. A few ornamental pieces, also discovered in the same place, were wrought from a limestone closely resembling the Rutland marble. The human bones exhumed from these old graves are in most cases more decayed than those which are with considerable certainty regarded as the remains of St. Francis Indians. Paints are frequently discovered in connection with the other relics, and what appear to be pieces of antique cloth are occasionally met with. Shell beads, and short tubes of copper, which were probably once strung together, and formed either wampum, a species of necklace, or some other such ornament, are of very ordinary occurrence, while no beads like those used by the St. Francis

Indians, at a much later day, are ever met with in this more ancient repository of the dead. It is accordingly my impression—I may say, indeed, that an examination of many of these relics has awakened in me the conviction—that this ancient people, though more aboriginal, were in many respects, especially in cultivation and refinement, much farther advanced than the later inhabitants of the forest. The utensils found in their graves are usually of a finer finish, evincing far greater skill in the execution, and a much higher degree of artistic taste, than has usually appeared among the more recent Indians.

But at various other points in the immediate vicinity—in many localities, indeed, besides the two places of interment just noticed—Indian relics have been found. Hatchets, arrow-heads, chisels and divers other implements have been picked up on the surface of the soil, and often brought to light by the plow. Chips of chert or flint, as I well remember, are met with at one place in considerable abundance, although the only rock of a like kind in its natural position, known to occur in the whole region, is several miles away. These fragments I have been inclined to consider as the refuse material left by the Indians in making their spear and arrow-heads. In several places, also, urns or vases of different kinds have been discovered. So vessels made of steatite or soap-stone, and suited to be used over a fire, as a pot or kettle, have been discovered from time to time, and are occasionally met with. These I have been disposed to regard, on account of their superior finish, as the workmanship of the more ancient inhabitants of the country. Col. Cornelius Stilphen informed me that about 40 years ago, while he and two of his neighbors, Benoni Lake and a Mr. Bullock, were at work constructing or repairing a road near what is called the Rolling Bank, they found a human skeleton of gigantic size. It lay about midway between the base and the summit of the sand-hill, and was uncovered by the scraper with which they were removing the soil. The skull was of such dimensions that Mr. Lake, although himself a man of large proportions, readily placed it on his head. The bones, or a portion of them, were examined by a physician, and according to his estimate, were such as to indicate that the individual to whom they belonged must have been from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 8 feet in height. These, perhaps, were likewise the remains of one of those more ancient people who once inhabited the region, and of whom it may be fitly said, "There were giants in the earth in those days."

Such are a few points, which I trust will interest others as much as they have interested me, respecting this old home of portions of at least two successive aboriginal races of the continent. Time fails me to give additional details.

THE CONDITION OF ST. FRANCIS INDIANS AND THEIR MODE OF LIVING.

Having noticed some of the more prominent relics of the aborigines who lived on the Missisquoi, we are able to draw a few conclusions respecting their actual state, their habits, and way of procuring a livelihood. The few particulars already given are, to some extent, illustrative as well of their social condition as of the degree of their advancement in the arts of life. Indeed, the best knowledge of these Red men is secured by a study of such articles of industry and implements of divers sorts, as, having survived the ravages of time, have come down to us as chronicles of the past. Of the earlier Indians, I do not propose now to speak, and only a few words respecting such of the St. Francis tribe as were settled on the Missisquoi will here find place. It will accordingly be necessary for us to discriminate, so far as we may be able, between their remains and those of the more ancient people who once dwelt in this neighborhood.

That the St. Francis Indians were in some measure above the lowest rank of barbarians, there is abundant proof. While they were certainly in a degraded condition, they had at the same time, in many respects, made somewhat of progress in the so-called arts of savage life. This is evident from their location taken in connection with the implements of various kinds which have been already mentioned.

These Indians, like the rest of their nation, evidently gained a subsistence by fishing, hunting, and a rude species of husbandry. In view of fishing, the Red man usually established himself on some river, or body of water. He at the same time had his eye upon a locality in which land animals and fowls were found in abundance. The banks of the Missisquoi united in a peculiar manner all of these desirable points. Indeed, the name itself, which is taken from the Abenaki dialect, indicates something of this kind. According to Prof. Thompson, it is a compound, meaning much grass, or much water-fowl. It was doubtless given in view of the extensive marsh, abounding in grass, to which wild geese, ducks and the like would resort, as well as various land animals. And that the waters of the river teemed with fish, we may infer from what is a fact at the present day, and from the traditions which have come down from the past. Spear and arrow-heads, and hooked instruments made of bone, indicate that the Indians were thus engaged in hunting and fishing. We may also presume that they were supplied with boats for the same and other purposes. So far as I can learn, their canoes were of two sorts; one kind was of bark formed around a tight frame-work; the other consisted of a single log of white fir or pine, hollowed out on one side. According to Kalm, the latter was sometimes called by the early settlers a "dug-out." Many of the stone hatchets seem to be exactly fitted for peeling the bark from trees, and for the scooping out of canoes, in connection with repeated charrings of the wood by fire. We are also to presume that these Indians gave attention to agriculture, that the soil in Western Vermont was somewhat cultivated by the Iroquois, and we may infer that the same would be true of the Abenaki, is evident from the language of Champlain. Probably corn and many other fruits here grew to a considerable extent spontaneously, while besides they were doubtless cultivated in a limited measure. This should be clear from the occasional discovery of what appear to be implements of husbandry, and from the existence of the famous old Indian cornfield. This, of which so much has been said, consisted of the low intervale grounds down the river. We are told that their beautiful fields, long before any white settlement was affected in the neighborhood, extended four miles along the stream. Thus we see the position of these Indians was well adapted to hunting, fishing, and a rude species of agriculture. Doubtless no region better could have been found for these pursuits than the one in which they probably located themselves from choice when first they came this side of the Green Mountains.

But, after all, the great business and diversion of the St. Francis tribe, as of other red men, was war. Instruments of strife and bloodshed are the prominent kinds met with in their graves. These Indians, like their neighbors, were in the habit of hunting and fishing, and compelling their squaws to cultivate the soil, that they might live; still these occupations, and all kindred labors, were in some respects made subordinate to their aims to protect themselves against their insidious foes, the Iroquois. On the Missisquoi at some distance below the Lower Falls, and not far from the burial place already mentioned, they had a castle, which is represented on some of the old French and English maps which I have had occasion to consult. According to the survey of Lake Champlain, made under the direction of Lord Amherst in 1762, this castle was situated about a quarter of a mile above the point where Maquam Creek is connected with the Missisquoi River. When this stronghold was erected I have been unable to learn. Of it, indeed, in any essential point, beyond its bare existence and locality, I have failed to get any exact information. The following extract from Dr. Samuel Williams may serve in a general way to indicate its purpose: "To defend themselves against the enemy, they [the Indians] have no other fortification but an irregular kind of fortress, which they call a castle or fort. It consisted of a square without bastions, surrounded by palisadoes. This was erected where the most considerable number of the tribe resided, and was designed as an asylum for their old men, their women and children, while the rest of the tribe were gone out to war."* Also respecting the moral and religious sentiments of these Indians before they came into contact with Europeans. We know little beyond what may be inferred from relics which have come down to us, and from what we have been told was true of other tribes. Reference has been already made to emblems of a sacred character, but these probably for the most part belonged to Indians of an earlier day. Among these remains, the specimens which have been thought by some to point to the Noachian deluge, are of special interest. There were also, many tumuli or artificial mounds existing in this vicinity when first visited by whites. These were doubtless erected in honor of the dead, and had connected with them ceremonies and rites, which would bespeak the existence of some religious sentiment. How many of these were the work of the St. Francis Indians, it is now impossible to tell: that some were, appears to be probable, from the fact that one at least was of recent construction. When those pioneers came on, who were the first after the close of the American Revolution to settle down in this neighborhood, very many of the mounds of this description were still to be met with; but they have since all been leveled, and little trace of them is now to be found. One grave in particular attracted the attention of the early inhabitants. It was that of a young chieftain, being enclosed by 16 small pines set in oval form, about four feet apart. This would make the circumference of the mound some 60 feet. In 1795, these trees, according to the statement of Mr. John Pratt, were only 8 or 9 inches in diameter. They were thus of recent growth. But they soon disappeared; some were peeled; others in various ways mutilated; and anon they were to be seen no more. Alas! that these, like so many other relics of the past, should have been destroyed by a vandalism, which often appears where we should least look for it, and that now no vestige of them remains. Were these trees still in existence, and had this mound and other similar works remained undisturbed until to-day, they would now be objects of interest and a centre of attraction, in some respects perhaps unsurpassed by anything else in the region. It is much to be regretted,—as one of our worthy citizens, Mr. George Barney, has suggested, and I can heartily join him in saying it is greatly to be deplored—that these trees could not have been left to stand, both as an ornament to the place, and as a memorial of the tribe that planted them in token of their affection for the dead.

THE ANNALS OF THE INDIANS AT MISSISQUOI DOWN TO 1730

will form a fitting conclusion of this part of the subject. There is no evidence, so far as I am aware, that Red men of Algonquin descent were settled on the Missisquoi before 1650. During most of the preceding hundred years, or from the supposed visit of John Graye in 1564, down to about the middle of the 17th century, it is presumed that the lands in this vicinity were wholly, or to a great extent, unoccupied. Taking for granted that the Abenaki located themselves here in considerable number as early as 1650, I proceed to give some incidents which I have been able to glean respecting them, from that date down to about the year 1730. These are necessarily few, especially during the early portion of the period; and they are in a large measure disconnected. That these Indians were engaged, during the period referred to, in many excursions and expeditions, that they then had not a few experiences similar in their character to those of a later day of which we have definite knowledge, we cannot doubt, though they have in greater part now passed into oblivion.

One of the incidents, which perhaps belongs to this early time, is the following: It comes to us in the form of a tradition, current, as I understand, among the St. Francis Tribe, that very many years ago a bloody battle was fought on the Missisquoi River, near the head of what is now called Rood's Island. This account is confirmed, as I have been told, by the finding of many spear—and arrow-heads in the vicinity of what is supposed to be the old battleground. The above mentioned island is situated just below the site of the famous old Indian Castle, of which mention has been made. Whether the castle were then in existence is uncertain, and must probably remain a matter of doubt. If tradition be trustworthy, we are almost forced to infer that the conflict was between the Abenaki in defence of their homes, and the Iroquois, their sworn and deadly enemies. That it was favorable to the former we may also conclude, since they continued to hold their lands in subsequent years.

We learn from Powers' History of the Coos Country, page 40, that a close relation was maintained between the Cosucks and the several branches of the St. Francis tribe. If this were so in the later times to which Mr. Powers prominently referred, it was undoubtedly the case at an earlier day. We may accordingly well suppose that the Abenaki, who were at Missisquoi no less than those at Coos, were allies of King Philip in the war of 1675. We have no direct testimony to this effect—no positive evidence that the Red Men on the border of Lake Champlain were thus engaged. Still the fact that the portion of these Indians, then residing on the upper waters of the Connecticut, was thus associated with Philip, renders the above conjecture probable, especially when viewed in connection with the warlike character of the whole tribe.

The Abenaki Indians at Missisquoi, no less than the Algonquins generally, were from first to last in close sympathy with the French. This sympathy was perhaps begun, as it was certainly increased, by the efforts put forth among them, and for their good, by the Jesuits.—[By the Franciscian missionaries, first, and afterwards the Jesuits—See the late histories of O Shea and Parkman on Early Catholic missions in Canada and this country.—ED.] Being thus brought into cordial alliance with the French colonies, they would be very ready, under the direction of the governors of the province of New France, to set out on expeditions against the English settlements lying to the south when ever desired. This was virtually the position of all these Indians on the breaking out of the war between France and England, commonly called King William's war, which lasted from 1690 to 1697, and doubtless led to many forays and not a little blood-shed on the part of the St. Francis tribe.

It is highly probable that the Abenaki at Missisquoi were engaged in the expedition which resulted in the destruction of Schenectady in 1690. Some of the St. Francis Indians were certainly connected with the undertaking, and as the advance was made by the way of Lake Champlain such of the tribe as had their homes on the route taken by the main party would be likely to enter heartily into the enterprise.

So, too, it is reasonable to suppose for the same and for similar reasons, that the Indians at Missisquoi accompanied Count Frontenac, in 1695, when he made his celebrated descent upon the Mohawks. This is all the more probable since the blow was aimed at a common foe.

Whether any of the St. Francis Indians from the vicinity of Lake Champlain participated in the attack on Haverhill in the winter of 1697 is doubtful, and perhaps can never be decided. Be this as it may, hostilities for a while ceased, and the Red men were once more quiet, as soon as the peace of Ryswic became generally known.

But the peace was of short duration. Another war speedily broke out between England and France, usually known as Queen Anne's war. Continuing as it did continue from 1702 to 1713, it afforded an extended field for Indian barbarities. The position of things, so far as it related to the portion of the Abenaki tribe at Missisquoi, was no doubt substantially the same as in the preceding conflict.

The St. Francis Indians were probably represented among the 300, who, under the inhuman De Rouville, made a notorious descent into the Provinces of Massachusetts, in the winter of 1704. All are familiar with the fact of their ascending Lake Champlain to the mouth of the Winooski, then passing up that river and down to the Connecticut, thence descending by the same stream, making an attack upon Deerfield and destroying it. It seems almost certain that on their way back, those of the party who were from the Province of Quebec, stopped for a while to rest with their brethren in the vicinity of Missisquoi. The Rev. John Williams, who was taken on to Montreal as a captive, says in the narrative of his captivity, after passing on the ice some distance down the Lake, from the mouth of the Winooski River, "we went a day's journey from the Lake to a company of Indians. These in all probability were the Abenaki on the Missisquoi River. "We stayed at a branch of the Lake," he continues, "and feasted two or three days on geese killed there." The 'branch of the Lake' was doubtless Missisquoi Bay, and the geese were very likely killed in the marsh below the old Indian encampment, waterfowl being wont to resort to this place even at the present time. "After another day's travel," so he writes, "came to a river where the ice was thawed." This was beyond doubt the Sorelle, the ice in its vicinity being almost always the first in the Lake to fail.*

In 1712 several incursions were made upon the New England settlements by the French and Indians from the north. With some of these forays, if not with them all the Abenaki of Missisquoi were doubtless associated.

Peace having been established in 1713, tranquility prevailed for a short time. Meanwhile we fail to learn anything special of the St. Francis tribe.

From 1720 to '25, the frontier settlements of the English were greatly harassed by the frequent inroads of the Indians. And the St. Francis Indians on the Missisquoi bore, as there is good reason to believe, a conspicuous part.

Thus the Abenaki, so far as I can learn from the scanty evidence at my command, continued to live on the banks of the Missisquoi, and from time to time, as opportunities favored, to go forth on their expeditions against the new settlements situated to the south, until about 1730, as Ira Allen informs us, their village, which he speaks of as being at that time a "large Indian town," became greatly depopulated by a mortal sickness which raged among the inhabitants. In consequence of this fatal malady, if we may follow the tradition of the savages, they evacuated the place, and settled on the River St. Francis, to get rid of Hoggomog (the devil,) thus forsaking their beautiful and extensive fields which lay along either bank of the stream, leaving them for the west part, or entirely to go to waste.*

Most that pertains to them at a later day will come out more properly in connection with the grants and settlements made successively by the French and English, during the several periods which follow in the early history of Swanton.

THE FIRST CONCESSION OF THE LAND WITH ITS EARLY SETTLEMENT BY THE FRENCH.

The old French Grant.—Champlain having made a partial ascent of the Lake, and taken nominal possession of the lands bordering on its waters, in behalf of his Sovereign, a sufficient basis was established for further operations. Although there be no evidence, or perhaps not even the slightest probability that he entered the Missisquoi Bay or River, a foundation was none the less laid, on which it was deemed valid for the King of France to grant lands in this neighborhood to such as should be willing to settle there as a part of the French dominion. As would be natural under their circumstances, power was in due time given by the French crown to the Governor of the Province of New France, as it was called, to make grants, and some were issued at a very early day. The charters were made out and signed at Quebec; and the lands were regarded as a part of New France, or of the territory belonging to that part of the French dominion in North America, of which Quebec was the capital. As we learn from M. Bouchette's Topographical Description of the British Dominions in North America, (see vol. I, p. 560), both Upper and Lower Canada, previous to 1791, were denominated the Province of Quebec, and all titles to such possessions were held under the authority of the Provincial government, styled the Province of Quebec or of New France.

And there were not only many concessions of territory between Nova Scotia and the upper waters of the Mississippi, but also in the neighborhood of Lake Champlain. Among which, a grant was made of lands beginning about the mouths and along up both banks of the Missisquoi River, which covered most of the territory since included and some besides that which is now comprised, in the township of Swanton. The following points may be of interest in connection with this matter, derived from O'Callaghan's Documentary History of New York; and a work published in Quebec by the Legislative Assembly of Canada, called Titles and Documents relating to the "Seniorial Tenure."

May 20, 1676, the King of France gave an order, authorizing the granting of lands in the Province of Quebec. July 6, 1711, directions were issued, that the lands must be to some extent settled by inhabitants and cultivated, otherwise they would revert to the crown.

July 20, 1734, there was made to Sieur de Bauvais, Jr., a grant "two leagues in front by three leagues in depth, on Lake Champlain, together with the peninsular which is found to be in front of said land." This grant will be at once recognized as covering a considerable portion of the present township of Swanton, including the delta on the west. The northern boundary line, as represented on the old maps, ran from near the most eastern of the mouths of the Missisquoi River, 9 miles due east, if we reckon 3 miles to a league. The southern boundary was parallel to the northern, beginning (according to the above mode of reckoning) 6 miles from it. It should be borne in mind, that in France the legal league is about 2.4 statute miles. Should this estimate be followed, the extent east and west would of course be little more than 7 miles, and that north and south nearly 5 miles. This grant consequently covered the lands lying on both sides of the lower portion of the Missisquoi, and extending from the Lake to a considerable distance beyond the lower falls of the river.

It may be added by way of illustration, and as a matter of general interest, that besides this grant there were several other concessions of considerable extent, both on the west and on the east side of the Lake. From a large number of such conveyances I cite the following:

Land was granted on Otter Creek, July 7, 1734; at the outlet of the Winooski River during the latter part of the same month; a considerable tract, called Caldwell's Manor, a part being now in Canada, and another part forming a tongue which extends into the Lake and includes the present township of Alburgh, was conceded about the same time; also land comprising a portion of what to-day constitutes the township of Georgia, Oct. 8, 1737.

These lands, as has been hinted, were so conveyed as to be subject of forfeiture, if certain express conditions were not duly complied with. Accordingly, by an ordinance of the Governor and Intendant of New France, issued May 10, 1741, they were all declared to be reunited, and caused to revert to the King's demense, unless reason should be shown for the contrary. Such reason was in some cases certainly, in others in all probability, given. In most instances, the reasons urged were deemed insufficient by the government. The excuse tendered in the case of Caldwell's manor was regarded as satisfactory, and the original grantee allowed to retain his lands. That portion of the latter which is north of the 45th parallel of latitude, still holds good, it being said that the old French grant is the original of all the existing titles. Whether such reason were urged in respect to the grant on the Missisquoi River I have been unable to learn, though I have made diligent enquiry, and ransacked many of the old manuscript documents of the period, no record of it has come to light; indeed, not so much as a reference to it has fallen under my notice.

The grant of a signiory to M. de Beauvais, Jr., is laid down on a chart, reproduced in the Documentary History of New York, [this may be seen by turning to vol. 1, p. 358] is styled a "Map of Lake Champlain, from Fort Chambly to Fort St. Frederic or Crown Point, surveyed by Mr. Anger, King's surveyor, in 1732, made at Quebec, the 10th of Oct., 1748, signed De Long."

In the State Department at Albany, there is a map, which I examined some years ago, accompanying and representing such French grants as were made south of the 45° of north latitude, previously to 1760. On this map, the territory now comprising the western part of Franklin Co., and extending from the present Canada line so far south as about the middle of the existing township of St. Albans, is put down as belonging to the "heirs of William MacKensie & Co."

This should seem to indicate that the old grants of 1734 and thereabout having been restored, afterward went into other hands. It is possible that a new grant was made, though this supposition seems improbable, since the territory represented as belonging to the heirs of Wm. Mackensie & Co., is too large for any single grant. It would be very natural for one person to purchase several concessions, and for these afterward to go in his name, especially when his estate came to be settled.

It thus appears that land on the Missisquoi river was granted by the French crown in 1734, and that as late as 1760, this with other adjoining land was represented as belonging to the heirs of Wm. Mackensie & Co. Such was the grant, though it should be at the same time borne in mind that the English claimed all these lands by virtue of their purchase from the Indians. Accordingly the French, in making this grant and others like it, were regarded as encroaching upon the territory of the English colonies. But however true this may be, and whatever validity may have belonged to the English claim, such grants were actually made and settlements effected by the French, and there was a time when the lands in this neighborhood on which we now live, did, whether rightly or not, actually constitute, to all intents and purposes, a part of New France.

AN OLD FRENCH MISSION

was established here by the Jesuits at an early day. In making his voyage of discovery, Champlain had in view not only the interests of France, but also those of Rome. He took possession of such lands as he discovered, both in the name of the French crown and in behalf of his church. It was supposed a sufficiently broad basis was furnished the French, not only for granting lands, but also for "the propagation of the faith" amongst the natives in this part of the country, and missionaries were speedily sent out among the Indians generally; that at an early day such efforts in behalf of the poor were made to the Red Men on the banks of the Missisquoi is well authenticated. These missionaries were of the order of Jesus, often as distinguished for their scientific attainments and literary culture as for their subordination to their superiors, and their willingness to undergo great self denial in achieving the end of their mission, and labored amidst great obstacles to promote the welfare of the natives, can hardly be questioned, and that they also accomplished good in various ways, none it is presumed would be disposed to deny.

The exact year when the first missionary or missionaries settled at Missisquoi, I have as yet been unable to learn. One or more of them would doubtless be established here not very many years after the beginning of the work at St. Francis. It should seem from the language of M. De Denouville that efforts were commenced in behalf of the Abenaki, on the St. Lawrence, before 1790. On quitting Canada, thus he writes in the year just mentioned: "I left a very good disposition to convert to Christianity the greatest portion of the Abenaki Indians who inhabit the forests in the neighborhood of Boston. For that purpose they must be attracted to the mission recently established."* By Indians living in the vicinity of Boston, he probably means those dwelling in that direction from the St. Lawrence. And with a view to attract them to the north, what method involves more of promise, and would, therefore, be more likely to be followed than the one suggested, namely: the putting forth of efforts for the conversion of the Red Men where they were. For these reasons, and especially from the fact that there was a close connection between the Indians at St. Francis and those at Missisquoi, we readily see that not more than 10 or 20 years, if so many, would probably elapse before the extension of missionary labors from the former to the latter field.

That efforts of this kind had been made in behalf of the Indians established at Missisquoi long previously to the plague which caused them to abandon their farms and their hunting-grounds, about 1730, should thus seem very probable. Looking at the matter in the light of the language used by Denouville, we readily infer that it may not be far from the truth to suppose that even when the plague broke out, the Indians were induced for a while to leave their fields, partly through the influence exerted by the missionaries to attract them to the establishment on the St. Lawrence.

I have thus far sought in vain for any definite information respecting the religious labors put forth at Missisquoi. The names of the missionaries are probably unknown. [a.] Even of those who were located at St. Francis, it is impossible to learn much. In the Documentary History of New York,* I met with the name of the Rev. Leon Basile Roubault, who "was established at St. Francis, and is represented as having arrived in Canada in 1742, and remained there until 1764." This language leads me to remark that the Jesuits all came from France, and after laboring for a number of years in this country, usually returned to their native land. [b.]

As to the influence exerted by the Jesuits on the Indians at Missisquoi a few words are required in this place. That it was very great in many points is abundantly apparent, especially as it exhibited itself in their whole bearing in later years. This point cannot be better illustrated than by a quotation from Peter Kalm, the Swedish Naturalist, who passed through Lake Champlain and Canada in 1749: "They are evidently very learned Jesuits, and are very civil and agreeable in company. [c.] . . . They do not care to become preachers to a congregation in the town, but leave these places to others. All their business here is to convert the heathen, and their missionaries are scattered over every part of this country. Near every town and village peopled by converted Indians are one or two Jesuits, who take great care that they may not return to Paganism, but live as Christians ought to do. . . . There are likewise Jesuit missionaries with those who are not converted, so that there is commonly a Jesuit in every village belonging to the Indians."

THE OLD FRENCH SETTLEMENT.

That a French settlement was made on the Missisquoi river at an early day there is no doubt. To this fact the Indian traditions bear ample testimony. It is also confirmed by the accounts of the early settlers, who received their information from those who were well acquainted with the efforts of the French in this vicinity, and by the reports of soldiers who passed through here during the old French and Indian war. So much concurrent evidence removes all doubt on the point in question.

The determination, however, of the time when this settlement was effected, is a more difficult matter. As to its actual origin, a veil of obscurity rests no less on the movement which resulted in a settlement, than in that which led to the establishment of a mission in this place. The exact date of this I have wholly failed to determine, though I have searched old records in Quebec, Montreal and elsewhere. While many things indicate the existence of French operations on the Missisquoi very long ago, there is, in short, nothing whatever, so far as I can learn, which serves to fix with exactness the beginning of the enterprise. Whether, indeed, the missionary work and the settlement were synchronous is unknown, though the former would be more likely to be the starting point of the latter. It is, however, hardly probable that they would be widely separated. Whether, again, a settlement were begun previously to, or only after, the formal granting of the land by the French government, cannot be with certainty determined. But the fact of early missionary efforts, to which tradition bears abundant witness, should seem to render it likely that the beginning of a settlement by whites were made at a comparatively early day. A trading post may have been at first established, for the procuring of furs from the Indians in exchange for barter. Something of this kind taking place near the commencement of the operations of the Jesuits, the establishment may have continued for some years; this in the end would naturally lead to a formal application to the government for a grant of lands in the vicinity.

But the plague which prevailed about the time the grant was made, caused all to retire to St. Francis. This, of course, must leave the neighborhood for the time deserted and desolate. During this interval, whatever may have been done before, the village would go to ruin, and no new improvements would be undertaken. Thus the place might, and probably did, remain for the most part, or wholly unoccupied, while the original grantee may have become discouraged as to any successful results. Under such circumstances a rescinding of the charter would very naturally follow, according to the ordinance of 1711, providing that the lands if not occupied and improved, should revert to the crown. As there was a neglect to settle and improve, or an entire ceasing to occupy and cultivate these lands after the grant was made in 1734, this step, at least in its initiatory stages, was actually taken. By the decree issued May 10, 1741, the tract of land granted to Sieur de Bauvais, Jr., was declared to be forfeited, and about to revert to the government, unless reason be shown for the contrary. As no evidence appears to indicate that such reason was given, it is to be presumed that these lands were actually reunited to the King's domain. There was the promise, however, of a new patent, should improvements be made within a year. Accordingly, shortly after this, the charter was undoubtedly restored, or a new one given. At any rate we have evidence that not far from this time a settlement was in existence. The Indians had returned to their old home, and French pioneers were associated with them. This must have taken place during, or not very long subsequent to 1741.

We thus see that a settlement was made on the Missisquoi river at an early day. According to the view presented above, its commencement may have been effected several, it was possibly many years previous to 1730; afterward, as already indicated, it was discontinued for a while on account of the plague. This being the case, it was perhaps one of the first settlements, if not the very earliest settlement effected by Europeans within the present limits of Vermont. The inference drawn is, of course, based upon a supposition, and too great prominence should not be given to it without further and more ample investigation. But whether this indication be valid or not, operations were certainly begun at Missisquoi long before the old French and Indian war, since things were at that time in a condition to show that the village under consideration had then been for a long while in existence, or perhaps it should rather be said that such was the state of the villages at that day; for there were, if not at first, yet in process of time, two settlements effected on this river. The upper one was at the Falls; the lower one some 2 miles down the river, on the east bank, and probably a little above the old Indian Castle. Prof. Thompson, in his Gazetteer, or the one who compiled the article on Swanton for him, and some other authorities, erroneously place the entire settlement at the Falls.

It accordingly appears that there were already, at a very early period, works commenced at two points, which were under the influence and management of the French, near the head of the navigable waters of the Missisquoi river. That these were begun at the earliest time suggested, though by no means certain, is not at all improbable. There being a considerable body of water at hand, and the place being at the same time more secure because of its distance from the Lake, it was just such a location as the Indian naturally selects for his permanent abode, and the Jesuit missionary was sure to go with the Gospel wherever the Red man was to be found. So the lover of gain, with more or less of the arts of civilization, was quite likely to wend his way to the quarter, and establish his post on the spot where he could find most profit from traffic with the savage. Thus we might naturally expect that the servant of the Cross and the trader would secure a very early foothold on the banks of the Missisquoi; that a settlement would at length begin; that in due time, perhaps, the first would be succeeded by another, and that in this wise improvements of various kinds would gradually follow, each stage of progress leading to a succeeding one as the years advanced.

THE OLD FRENCH IMPROVEMENTS are accordingly suggested as the next topic for consideration. In process of time various betterments would come. The missionaries, in laboring for the religious welfare of the natives, undoubtedly introduced many habits, and brought into use some utensils characteristic of civilized life. Those who turned their attention to trade, buying furs of the Indians, would give articles in exchange, both indicative of a higher state of society, and tending to elevate and refine the natives. Such, also, as engaged in divers employments, with the hope of livelihood and gain, must have brought knowledge among the Red men, and made them acquainted with species of manufactures calculated to be for their profit.

The whites being French Jesuits and laymen, who acted under the cross, doubtless regarded the propagation of their religion as one of the prominent aims of their lives. They were thus led to put forth efforts in almost every way they could for the conversion of the natives. And that they were successful, so far at least as to induce them to make an outward profession of Christianity, is very certain. The whole tribe became nominally, and it is to be hoped many were made really Christians. To such an extent, at least, was this the case, that the devotedness of the St. Francis Indians to the faith which they professed, almost passed into a proverb.

What to us is one evidence of improvement, that a house for religious worship was built at Missisquoi. This was doubtless the first edifice erected exclusively for such a purpose within the territory now known as Vermont. The year of its erection I cannot learn. The earliest trustworthy account of it which I have been able to find, as tending to fix its date, shows that it was standing in 1759. This, in connection with other facts, naturally leads us to suppose that it had been for a long time in existence. Joseph Powers, who passed the last part of his life in Ferrisburgh, Vt., and finally died there, was present at the surrender of Quebec, Sept. 18, 1759. On returning shortly after to his home, the party to which he belonged, according to his testimony, came by the way of the Missisquoi river, and then found on its banks a flourishing settlement, with a French church and a large body of Indians.

This house of worship stood some two miles below the Falls, on the east bank of the river, not very far from the old burial place of the St. Francis tribe. The building was of stone. It is said that the blocks of which this edifice was constructed were brought hither from some distant place in bark canoes. Such may have been the case, though it seems hardly probable, since a great abundance of good building stone occurring in the immediate vicinity, there was no necessity for such an expenditure of labor. It is more natural to suppose, and the supposition accounts for the main features in the tradition, that the Indians transported the blocks of stone in their canoes, simply from some locality in the neighborhood. According to my present recollection, I have heard it stated that the early settlers found one point, not far from the Missisquoi river, at which the "dove marble" had been somewhat quarried previously to their coming into this vicinity. There is also a tradition that this house of worship was furnished with a bell. This is not at all improbable, as we are aware that the Indians, on returning from the destruction of Deerfield in 1704, brought with them a bell, which was afterward known as the "bell of St. Regis." As they were at the time unable to carry it farther, they buried it for security in the land on the Winooski river, from which place, it is said, they removed it the next year to Canada. This fact makes plain the possibility of there being a bell in the old French church at Missisquoi. There is one tradition that it was brought from the Coos country, on saplings so lashed together as to form a kind of jumper or dray, which could be readily drawn by a single horse. If this be a correct account, the bell was not probably brought here until after 1760, and thus many years subsequent, as we may infer, to the erection of the edifice. [d.]

Improvements were also made, without doubt, in farming. Many things go to confirm the conjecture that agriculture was somewhat heeded. Even in their missionary efforts, the French probably had in view, as they well might, the gain to be secured by the establishment of industrial pursuits, and especially from the cultivation of the soil. The Indians, who had before lived by hunting and fishing, by what they could gather from the spontaneous productions of nature, and from the most imperfect kinds of husbandry, would thus have their attention turned to useful employments. Efforts were, therefore, probably made in process of time to introduce some knowledge of agriculture. And there seems to be evidence, there are certainly traditions, that the natives learned to cultivate the soil with a limited degree of success. When the early settlers came on, they found two or three apple trees still standing at the Falls—the remains, doubtless, of efforts of the French and Indians to cultivate fruit. An old inhabitant tells me that in 1795 these trees appeared to be 50 or 60 years old. From Dr. Belknap's History of New Hampshire we learn that, in 1755, the Indians in the vicinity of Missisquoi were in the habit of tapping the maples in spring, and making sugar. This perhaps was no more than they had been accustomed to do for many years. Be this, however, as it may (as we should naturally expect), their mode of culture was no doubt always more or less rude, and only to be regarded as primitive attempts to turn the soil to account. To how great an extent habits of labor, frugality and thrift were introduced and established amongst them in the direction indicated, must doubtless remain, for the most part, a matter of conjecture.

As another indication that something was done by the French in the way of improvements, which would tend to the temporal elevation of the natives, it may be stated that a saw-mill was erected at the Falls at a very early day. This was not accomplished without considerable effort. Instead of damming the river, which was rather wide, they resorted to the following expedient. The descent of the stream being considerable for a comparatively short distance above the Falls, they cut a channel about a rod and a half in width, through the soil of the low bank which overlies slate rock, and probably in some places through the rock itself, beginning at some distance above the proposed site of the mill. Drawing off from the river through this artificial channel a sufficient amount of water to turn their wheel, they avoided all necessity for a dam across the stream. This old cut, though long since partly filled, is still easily traced on the right bank of the river just above the Falls. The mill itself probably stood near the site, perhaps a little to the south-east of the large flouring establishment at the end of the present dam, and thus on the lowest ground below the dwelling-house of Alfred Forbes. According to tradition, it was not a large mill, there being only a single saw, and this, undoubtedly, was sufficient to furnish all the lumber that was then needed.

The purpose of the French in erecting this mill was probably in unison with all their aims, to push their interests and maintain their hold of the lands toward the south, so far as circumstances would allow. In order to effect settlements to the greatest advantage, and to protect them most efficiently when established, they must have batteaux. Hence their early need of a saw-mill, a need which began to show itself from the time the first grants of land were made by the French on Lake Champlain. And for this no better place could be chosen than the Lower Falls of the Missisquoi, the banks of the river being covered with the best of timber; there being also at this point a fine water power, located at such a distance from the Lake as to escape observation. and be comparatively secure from any vessels which the English might build; at the same time so situated that the sawed lumber could be easily floated to the mouth of the river, and thence transported to any part of the Lake. And the erection of such a mill at a very early day evinces as clearly as almost any thing else, the far-seeing policy of those who were engaged in the project, whether it was carried out by individual enterprise or under the direct management of the government. This structure was probably the first of its kind to be put up on the borders of Lake Champlain. It was apparently, only at a much later day, and probably in the carrying out of the same aim, that the French, as will be noticed in the sequel, built several similar mills at different points. There is, accordingly, reason to suppose, that most of the lumber which they used in the construction of the earlier vessels they had on the Lake, was manufactured on the Missisquoi. And this mill having been thus built, probably at a time so much anterior to that of other similar structures in the neighborhood, was doubtless continued in operation for a considerable number of years. As a protection to this mill, and to the settlement generally, it is said that a fortification was built at the Falls, probably not far from the time of the erection of the saw-mill. This was a stockade fort, and stood on the brow of the hill, just in the rear of the ground now occupied by Col. Jewett's brick store. The stockades were of cedar, and the remains of them were still to be seen since the beginning of the present century. The building of this fort, as well as of the saw-mill, was effected, as it appeared, with as much quickness as possible, that the English colonies situated at the south might be kept in ignorance of the encroachments made by their neighbors on the north.

But, however quietly this project may have been carried forward, the English at length learned that the French had a saw-mill in operation on the Missisquoi River. That they might impede their advancement, and especially that they might deprive them of the means of building batteaux, a plan was devised, and at last set on foot, which finally led to the destruction of this mill, near the beginning of the old French and Indian war. For this purpose a party of five men was sent from a fort situated at a considerable distance to the South. This fort was probably located in what is now either North-western Massachusetts, or in the neighboring limits of Eastern New York. As the story goes, the men were to follow an old Indian path along the western base of the first prominent range of hills a few miles distant from the lake, until they should reach a point where the uplift suddenly turns to the east. This place occurs in what is to-day known as the township of St. Albans. Thence they were to follow the path northward until they should come to a large rock covered with spruce. From this waymark they were to go westward to the river, on the eastern bank of which they would find the mill. Having proceeded, as directed, they came to the rock referred to, a huge boulder about a rod in length, and something like a dozen feet in width and height, which is still to be seen a little north of what is now called Swanton Centre, near the house of Mr. Moses Collins, on the east side of the road between St. Albans and Highgate Falls. They there passed the night, and set out the next morning on the execution of their mission, having agreed to meet in the same place after burning the mill. Accordingly proceeding to the river, they passed along its western bank, until they reached the point opposite the settlement. Here they reconnoitered, lurking about in the thicket until they saw the workmen go to dinner. The cabins occupied by the sawyers were on the hill to the east, and near to the stockade fort. Seizing the favorable moment, they crossed the rapids on foot, it being the season of low water, and set fire to the mill by the use of dry bark which they carried with them for the purpose. They then hastily withdrew, recrossing the stream, and retreating into the dense forest. The sentry at the fort accidentally noticing the fire, and at the same time getting a glimpse of some of the men—one tradition says, three of them—as they passed up the opposite bank of the river, immediately gave the alarm. Such of the Indians as were near at once rallied, and set out in pursuit. One of the party as he was hurrying around the bow of the river, being closely followed, stumbled over a fallen tree. Fearing that he should be overtaken, he quickly concealed himself beneath it. The Indians soon passed near his hiding-place, even stepped over one end of the very log which served as a shelter, and finally returned by the same path, without discovering him. In due time he made his way to the boulder, already mentioned as the place of rendezvous, where he was speedily rejoined by another of the party. The remaining three were never afterward heard from. It was generally supposed that they were taken or killed by the Indians. In case only three were seen to pass up the west bank of the river, the Red men probably kept up the pursuit, until they had captured that number, and then returned. The two members of the party who escaped unharmed, found their way back to the fort from which they set out, and survived many years, the one who was so hotly pursued by the Indians being the person to hand down this account substantially as here given.

THE ANNALS OF THE INDIANS AT MISSISQUOI DOWN TO 1763,

may form a fitting close to this part of our history. The inhabitants of this neighborhood (Missisquoi), having retired to St. Francis because of the plague, resided there for some time after 1730. During the several years of their abode in Canada, they were in the habit of coming to their old grounds for a few weeks each year, on excursions for hunting and fishing. I can find no evidence of their spending much time in this vicinity, otherwise than as above indicated, until about 1741, sometime that year, or the next, or at least not far from that epoch, they began to return to their deserted fields, and again to raise and repair their dilapidated or fallen wigwams. Once more they might be seen on the banks of the Missisquoi, engaged in their sports, or occupied with hunting and fishing, as well as with their rude efforts to cultivate the soil.

In a French record contained in the Colonial History of New York, (vol. ix, p. 1110,) express reference is made to the Abenaki as residing at Missisquoi in 1744. During the same year was begun what is commonly known as "King George's War," which lasted until 1748. Previously to this time there had been a long peace between England and France. The commencement of this struggle was the occasion for the St. Francis Indians to renew their barbarities against the English colonies and infant settlements to the south.

Perhaps the best view I can give of their doings will be in the form of a few citations from an old French record kept at the time. They are as follows :

March 16, 1746, the Abenaki Indians went towards Boston, and "returned with some scalps and prisoners."

Apr. 26th, party of 20 Abenakis of Missisquoi set out towards Boston, and brought in some prisoners and scalps.

May 24th, a party of 8 Abenakis of Missisquoi has been fitted out, who have been in the direction of Corlard, and have returned with some prisoners and scalps.

May 28th, a party of Abenakis of Missisquoi, struck a blow towards Orange and Corlard, and brought in some prisoners and scalps.

Equipped a party of 10 Iroquois and Abenakis who joined together to strike a blow towards Boston, and returned with some scalps.

June 12th, equipped a party of 10 Abenakis Indians, who made an attack in the direction of Boston.

June 17th, equipped a party of 10 Abenakis, who went to make an attack at the river Kakiconte, [Boscawan] and were defeated near a fort; their chief, Cadenaret, a famous warrior, has been killed; the remainder returned with some scalps, and left others which they were not able to bring away, the dead having remained too near the fort.

Aug. 3d, one Abenakis killed in an attack on a fort on River Kakekonte. Sixty Abenakis belonging to this force, went after the fight to lie in wait for 20 Englishmen, who were to come to the said fort, according to the report of the prisoners; but not having met them, went farther, and some returned with seven scalps, one Englishman and one negro.*

The above is a brief diary, which happens to be preserved, of the doings of the Abenaki Indians, as led on by the French against the northern New England colonies during a few months. And I am ignorant of any good reason for supposing their forays at other times during the war were any less frequent. It is probable that the St. Francis tribe was represented amongst the 900 French and Indians who attacked Hoosic Fort in Williamstown, Mass., Aug. 20, 1746, with the results of this attack every reader of our colonial history is familiar. They were also very likely connected with the 400 French and Indians who, April 4, 1747, made an attack on the fort at No. 4, which was so valiantly defended by Capt. Phinchas Stevens. Indeed, throughout this war, the St. Francis Indians bore a conspicuous part in the forays, in which they were almost constantly engaged, until the establishment of peace by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, in 1748. But this peace was of short duration. The French and English colonies were again in conflict in 1754, and finally in 1756, war was formally declared in Europe, which continued to 1763, being in this country commonly known as the "French and Indian War."

* See Colonial History of New York, vol. x, p. 32-35, and elsewhere.

In this conflict, as we should naturally suppose, the St. Francis Indians at Missisquoi were by no means idle. We are indeed prepared to learn that they made many insidious assaults on the defenceless inhabitants of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and what is now south-eastern Vermont. As thus incited by the French and led on by them in some instances, they attempted in particular to destroy the frontier settlements on the Connecticut River. In one of these incursions, they took Mrs. Jemima Howe captive, also her children, one of whom was retained for some time prisoner at Missisquoi, [as will appear in the History of Vernon in Windham Co.]

I have had many conversations, on these and on various kindred points, with Capt. John Pratt, one of the early settlers of Swanton, who was, when a young man, living in a township adjoining Vernon. Learning the low price and the desirableness of land, in what is now Franklin County, he visited "Mrs. Howe," at Walpole, N. H., where she was then living with her third husband, and received from her a full description of what she had seen of this section of the country, particularly of the River and Falls, and of the Cove where the Indians lived, with whom she found her infant child. Capt. Pratt having come on and settled here in 1794, found every thing substantially as described by Mrs. Tute, even the Cove which he subsequently visited, where the frames of the two wigwams already referred to were still standing, though the roofs had then decayed and fallen in. The place occupied by the Indian family, in which the captive child was kept for a while, and now known as the Cove, is situated about two miles above the Falls, just beyond what is called Bow of the River. It is on the left bank of the Missisquoi, to the east of its greatest bend, and not far from the high terrace of sand which extends southward from the Falls, on the west side of the stream. In this locality, since to this day the ground has never been disturbed by cultivation, there still may be seen the remains of embankments, on which one can trace a few vestiges of old Indian huts, perhaps of the very cabins for some time occupied by Mrs. Howe and her infant child.

At last, however, Ticonderoga and Crown Point fell into the hands of the English. This change in the tide of war gave a different face to all matters on Lake Champlain, and by no means least to the condition of the Red Men at Missisquoi.

Pursuant to the order of Lord Amherst, "toward the forepart of October," 1759, an expedition was undertaken against the St. Francis Indians by the celebrated ranger, Major Robert Rogers,* "with a detachment of about 200 men. This expedition was filled out at Crown Point. Major Rogers, having proceeded to Missisquoi Bay, and entered the river of the same name, concealed his boats under the thick clumps of bushes which overhung the stream. These boats contained all his surplus provisions—enough, as was supposed, for the supply of his men on their way back to Crown Point. Having thus left with a small guard what he did not for the present need, he advanced with his main force by land into Canada. His transports, however, and provisions were soon discovered and taken by a party of French and Indians in the neighborhood. These were undoubtedly a company of those who were then living at Missisquoi village, some 3 or 4 miles above the mouth of the river. Although Major Rogers soon learned the fate of his vessels, he did not turn back, but pressed onward to St. Francis, which was regarded as the capitol and the rallying-place of all of Abenaki descent. By a sudden, and an altogether unexpectedly attack, made on the 5th of October, he destroyed the whole village, (for a detailed account of this expedition of Major Rogers, see the Caledonia County chapter by the late Rev. Thomas Goodwillie—vol. 1, page 263, 265 of this work,) and nearly every inhabitant. He then set out at once on his return to Crown Point, by the round-about way of the Connecticut River, experiencing on the route many difficulties, and undergoing almost incredible hardships. But the main aim of his expedition was accomplished. By the heavy blow struck by Rogers, the power of the Abenaki was broken. The destruction of life thus effected was the precursor of their downfall, perhaps of their final extermination. From the terrible effects of that hard stroke they have never recovered; a sad destiny served to overtake them as the fatal recoil of their long-cherished thirst for blood, and the prospect ever since has been that the time is not distant when the last of the Abenaki will be no more.

But I must not anticipate. We are now brought to the close of the French dominion at Missisquoi. September 8th, 1760, Canada was surrendered to the British: and February 10th, 1763, a treaty of peace was formally signed between England and France, by which all the northeastern possessions of the French in America were ceded to the English. In consequence of this, the St. Francis Indians at Missisquoi, who had invariably sided with the French in the many struggles of the past, suddenly found themselves dispossessed of their lands in this region, and virtually left without a home.

THE INDIAN CONVEYANCE OF THE LAND.

Near the close of the old French and Indian war, in 1760, when the claim of France to the soil was surrendered, the greater part of the French withdrew. But the Indians in large number still made this vicinity their home. For some time after Roger's destructive blow, there were probably more of them here than at St. Francis. And with them many of the old improvements were allowed to remain. Among these the house of worship, which had been long previously erected, and was used for many succeeding years, a part of the time for which it was originally built.

For a while after 1760, there was probably no priest located at Missisquoi village. Whether during these few years the Indians, who had been before under the instruction of the Jesuits and still remained in the place, engaged at all in public worship, I have found no means of determining. That they would in some measure attempt to carry out in private the rites and forms of service which they had been taught to observe, seems very natural.

At a somewhat later day, probably after a settlement was effected by whites, it appears that a priest was residing at Missisquoi. Whether he was here continuously for several successive years, or only at stated periods, or whether different individuals were in the habit of coming to this neighborhood on missionary tours and remaining for a few months at a time, is by no means certain. A man at that time belonging to one of the English settlements, who was occasionally through this region before the American revolution, and afterward settled down in this vicinity, used to tell of the religious services held here, at the period referred to. Among other things, that the bell belonging to the church was rung every morning and evening for devotional exercises, according to his account. All, as thus summoned, were accustomed to gather themselves together, for matins and vespers. That the Indians, at this period, very generally adopted some of the forms of the Catholic Church, the names which occur in the old documents found, which contain the names of Indians concerned in given transactions, show that most of them had assumed Christian appellations, and thus probably had been baptised, and received into the church. Among these names are John, Joseph, Peter, Daniel, Baptist, Francis, Cecile, Theresa, Marianne, and the like.

It is, however, most probable that Christianity prevailed amongst these children of the forest, to a much greater extent, nominally than as a reality. One may bear a Christian name, and still be a savage. Of course it is possible for matins to be attended from day to day, and vespers sung year after year, while the large proportion of those who engage in such exercises have little lively sympathy with the spirit of the gospel. This is well illustrated by the words which Kalm employs in speaking of the French at Fort St. Frederic.

He describes them as paying more or less respect to the externals of Christianity, though giving little evidence that they were enlivened by its ennobling power. We should not, however, be led to deny the presence of a Christian spirit in many hearts, because we fail to find evidence of its existence in all. Charity ought surely to prevail no less, when we look at the poor Indian who, in his savage state came under the influence of the gospel, than when we regard any other men under unfavorable relations in life. So far as Christianity is vitally received, no matter when or by whom, it works as a might calculated to elevate, ennoble and humanize. [See notes at the close.]

is deserving of some consideration, in connection with the first settlement effected under the English government at Missisquoi. After the surrender of their possessions in 1760, and the ratification of the treaty of '63, all the region in the northeastern part of America, which the French had before claimed, came under the control of England. Previously to this, the British Crown had generally granted power to the governors of the different colonies, to make concessions of territory, to all who should wish to settle within their respective jurisdictions. Such a privilege was conferred on Governor Wentworth, who accordingly in 1763 granted lands on the Missisquoi river, which were regarded as a part of New Hampshire. This early English grant was, probably, at that day—perhaps it remained long subsequently—entirely unknown to the Indians. It consequently had, so far as we know, little, perhaps no practical effect on the settlement and tenure of the lands granted, until many years after the time now under consideration. This being the case, and the fact having been simply stated, the concession in question need receive no further attention for the present.

Though the St. Francis Indians no doubt had, at least by possession, a fair right to the soil, they yet by being the allies of the French in one sense at least lost their title when the latter were defeated and yielded the whole of their vast claims in this portion of the country to the English. For all this, the Red men continued certainly, to some extent, to hold the lands at Missisquoi, and to assert their right to them long after the dominion of the French in this part of the continent had ceased. In consonance with this, they made an extensive lease of lands in this neighborhood to a wealthy trader, who for some time resided in St. Johns. As this contract stands intimately connected with a prominent period in the history of the place, it may be well that it be here cited entire. The following is an exact transcript of a copy of this instrument, kindly furnished by Henry Stevens. The copy was originally taken for Ira Allen, by James Whitelaw, from the certified record in the Register's office in Quebec.

Know all men by these presents, that we, Daniel Poorneuf, Francois Abernard, Francois Joseph, Jean Baptiste, Jeanoses, Charlotte, widow of the late chief of the Abenackque nation at Missisque, Mariane Poorneuf, Theresa, daughter of Joseph Michel, Magdaline Abenard, and Joseph Abomsawin, for themselves, their heirs, assigns and administrators, do sell, let, and concede unto Mr. James Robertson, merchant of St. Jean, his heirs, assigns and administrators, for the space of ninety-one years from the twenty eighth day of May, 1765, a certain tract of land lying and being situated as follows, viz: being in the bay of Missisque on a certain point of land, which runs out into the said bay and the river of Missisque, running from the mouth up said river near east, one league and a half, and in depth north and south running from each side of the river sixty arpents, bounded on the bank of the aforesaid bay &c., and at the end of the said league and a half to lands belonging to Indians joining to a tree marked on the south side of the river, said land belonging to old Abernard; and on the north side of said river to lands belonging to old Whitehead; retaining and reserving to the proprietors hereafter mentioned, to wit: on the north side of said river five farms belonging to Pierre Peckenowax, Francois Nichowizet, Annus Jean, Baptiste Momtock, Joseph Compient, and on the south side of said river seven farms belonging to Towgishcat, Cecile, Annome Quisse, Jemonganz, Willsomquax, Jean Baptiste the Whitehead, and old Etienne, for them and their heirs, said farms contain two arpents in front nearly, and sixty in depth.

Now the condition of this lease is, that if the aforesaid James Robertson, himself, his heirs, and assigns or administrators, do pay and accomplish unto the aforesaid Daniel Poorneuf, Francois Abernard, Francois Joseph, Jean Baptiste Jeanoses, Charlotte, the widow of the late chief of said nation of Abenackques at Missisque, and Mariane Poorneuf, Theresa, daughter of Joseph Michel, Magdaline Abernard, and Joseph Abomsawin, their heirs, or assigns and administrators, a yearly rent of fourteen Spanish dollars, two bushels of Indian corn, and one gallon of rum, and to plow as much land for each of the above persons as shall be sufficient for them to plant their Indian corn every year, not exceeding more than will serve to plant one quarter of a bushel of corn for each family, to them and their heirs and assigns; for which and every said article well and truly accomplished the said James Robertson is to have and to hold for the aforesaid space of time, for himself, his heirs, assigns and administrators, the aforesaid tract of land as mentioned aforesaid, to build thereon and establish the same for his use, and to concede to inhabitants, make plantations, cut timber of what sort or kind he shall think proper for his use or the use of his heirs, assigns and administrators, and for the true performance of all and every [article of] the said covenant and agreement either of the said parties bindeth himself unto the other firmly by these presents. In witness whereof we have interchangeably set our hands and seals hereunto this 13th day of June, in the 5th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord, George the Third, King of Great Britain, France and Ireland &c., and in the year of our Lord, 1765.

Sept. 20, 1765, Richard M'Carty personally appeared before Thomas Brashay, J. P., and made oath on the holy evangelists that this instrument was signed as above indicated, and duly delivered to James Robertson.

George Pownell, Secretary and Register, certified "the foregoing to be a true copy as recorded in the English Register, letter A, folio 179, in the Register's office of enrollments for the Province of Quebec."

Such is the document, and it contains several points deserving of attention. In the first place, it appears that certain of the St. Francis Indians at Missisquoi, June 13, 1765, thus, after the treaty between France and England, and probably in view of their early title to the soil, made a lease of a considerable tract of land lying on both sides of the Missisquoi river to "James Robertson, merchant of St. Jean." Mr. Robertson was undoubtedly of English extraction, as his name indicates. It is said that he originally resided in Quebec, and afterward established himself as a merchant at St. Johns, where he was extensively engaged in trade at the time he obtained this lease. He was thus living under the English government, and the instrument was properly authenticated and recorded in the office of registry. The lease which was duly executed was to run 91 years from the 25th day of May, 1765.

Again, the boundaries of the land conveyed require a moment's notice. The land in question is described as beginning at the mouth, and extending up the channel of the Missisquoi river nearly east one league and a half, and as being in depth north and south, from each side of the river, 60 arpents. Whether the reckoning in this measurement were according to the French or the English league is doubtful. That the standard of England was followed, though it be not certain, may seem to be probable, since the territory was no longer under the dominion of France. Were we to take the French standard, and reckon the league as 2.42 English miles, we should have less than 4 English miles as the extent of this land from the mouth of the river east; but adopting the English league as the basis of measurement, we have about 4½ miles. The arpent mentioned in this deed is evidently French, and should be estimated accordingly. Kalm tells us that 84 arpents equal one French league; one arpent is equivalent to 126 English feet. [An arpent, according to the Domesday Book, equals 100 French perches, and a perch, as I learn from a note in Kalm, contains 22 French feet. The French foot being to the English as 1440 to 1352, an arpent is about 2346 English feet. The translator of Kalm, commenting on the statement of his author, says that 84 arpents equal a French league, and that the arpents of Louis XIV is equivalent to 2200 Paris feet.—Kalm, vol. II, pp. 194-'5.] Consequently the width of this land each way from the river was not far from a mile and a half, and the entire width something less than 3 miles.

Such is the whole extent of the territory described in the lease. The width is plain, while the length east and west is uncertain. According to the French measure, Mr. Robertson's purchase would hardly reach up the river to the neighborhood of the old Indian Castle, though, according to the English standard league, it would undoubtedly do so, and possibly even include the fortification and the village which lay just above it.

It is also worthy of note that specified parcels of ground were not included in the lease. In behalf of several proprietors certain lands, lying within the bounds as just given, were expressly reserved. These reservations were as follows, viz.: on the north side of the river, 5 farms, and on the south side 7 farms, the said farms being nearly 2 arpants in width. This reserve probably comprised all, or nearly all, the cultivated fields which were to be found within the above-mentioned limits. If the soil on which the Indian village stood lay within this area, it was thus doubtless reserved, and so the grounds occupied by their castle and burial-place, if they were included in it, though it is barely possible that they were situated above.

As a compensation for these lands, it was stipulated that James Robertson, his heirs and assigns, or administrators, should pay a yearly rent of 14 Spanish dollars, two bushels of Indian corn and one gallon of rum, and plow as much land for the several leasers, or their heirs, as would be sufficient for the planting of a peck of corn for each family.

In consideration of this payment, James Robertson and his heirs were to hold the land in question for the period specified, with the privilege of building upon it, of making concessions to new inhabitants, of establishing plantations, and cutting timber of every sort they pleased.

Such are the main terms and characteristic features of this old Indian lease. It should seem from the language used, that its eastern limits must have been some way below the Falls. It is indeed possible that the league and a half from the Lake were to be measured due east. Were this the case the land must have extended much farther up the river than already supposed. But this, while possible, is hardly probable. There is, however, reason to presume that there were other leases in addition to the document now before us, which have been lost. This appears pretty plain from the fact, that the lease in question, which was found among Ira Allen's papers relating to Indian claims at Missisquoi, is marked "No. 5." Still more—it may be added, that James Robertson was without doubt actually settled at Missisquoi Falls a few years later. From this circumstance it should seem likely that he made other contracts with the Indians for such lands as he proceeded to occupy and turn to account.

THE FIRST ENGLISH SETTLEMENT UNDER AN INDIAN LEASE.

As James Robertson secured his title to a certain tract of land from the St. Francis Indians at Missisquoi, his relation to them was very different, so far as we can judge, from that of the French settlers in the same place at an earlier day. We have no evidence that their supposed right to the soil was derived from the Indians. They obtained a grant of territory from the Governor of New France, and consequently effected their settlement under the protection and guarantee of French authority.

Mr. Robertson made his purchase and acquired his title from the Red Men, both parties acknowledging, under the English government, his papers, so far as appears, being duly made out and recorded, according to English precedent. Being an energetic business man, as we may infer from several facts, it is probable that soon after getting his lease he made arrangements for the occupation and improvement of his newly-acquired property. It does not, however, appear that he immediately settled himself on the banks of the Missisquoi. He may have done so, though, as I think, the probabilities are the other way. He doubtless at once went forward in person to superintend matters, and took on with him an individual who either acted as his agent or to whom he rented a portion of his right.

I have an indistinct recollection that some one with whom I have conversed on this subject, I cannot now remember who, said that the name of this person was Thomas Metcalf. He doubtless established himself on the Missisquoi river about 1765. According to one report he was a native of old France, whence at an early day he came to Quebec, and thence to this place. In some respects this account seems improbable, especially as his name is not French. Another and more trustworthy, if not more plausible tradition, makes him to have been of English extraction; indeed, this account has very much of likelihood in its favor. So, too, his settlement here has been sometimes confounded with the old efforts made by the French in this vicinity previously to 1760. The connection which existed, according to current traditions, between Metcalf and the early pioneers at Newbury, on the Connecticut river, indicates that he probably belonged to a later day than that of the old French settlement on the Missisquoi. Operations were not commenced by the whites at Newbury until about 1761. The relations, likewise, which it is said that Metcalf sustained to the first settlers on the Connecticut, on the one hand, and on the other to individuals in St. Johns, go to show that he was closely allied to persons who certainly belonged to the early English colonies. It is currently reported, even to this day, that messengers were occasionally sent, and that among others Metcalf was in an instance or two despatched, on business from Gen. Bailey, of Newbury, to St. Johns and Montreal. It is also said that such messengers as had occasion to pass over this route at a little later date were always in the habit of stopping with one Metcalf at a settlement on the Missisquoi river, with whom they ever found hospitable entertainment.

Metcalf probably made his first beginning in this neighborhood as a trader. Having met Mr. Robertson in St. Johns, he may have been employed by him as already suggested. Their fur trade was a very prominent line of business on the Missisquoi, even during the colonial period of our country. The marsh was resorted to in winter for the sake of peltry, as the most famous hunting-ground in all this region. And in this particular it has not yet entirely lost its reputation. Though beaver, and other animals equally valuable for their furs, have for the most part disappeared from the country, the musk-rat is still to be seen in the marsh, which occupies considerable space in the township. Entirely consonant with the suggestion to Metcalf, who was first engaged as a merchant, is an old tradition still current among the more aged inhabitants. It is as follows: A man called Metcalf, or Medkiff, as the name is often pronounced, if not spelled, located himself on an island at the mouth of the Missisquoi river, and sold goods to the Indians, receiving furs in exchange. This account finds confirmation in the fact that the island is still known as Metcalf's Island. All this appears very natural, on the supposition that Metcalf was acting as the agent of James Robertson, who was an extensive trader, and still had the main part of his business at St. Johns. The mouth of the river is a spot which he would be likely to select at the very start as a business locality, both because of its proximity to the Indians, and because it was nearer St. Johns than any other part of the land of which Mr. Robertson, so far as we know, held a lease.

But it was not long before operations were commenced under other relations, and at a different point. There was beginning to be a greater demand for lumber, especially at St. Johns, and the older settlements to the north. This led to the erection of a mill at the Lower Falls on the Missisquoi. The building was put up by Mr. Metcalf, not probably on his own responsibility, but as the agent of Mr. Robertson. Metcalf was himself a sawyer, and the lumber trade may have been one prominent aim of his establishing himself in this neighborhood. Mr. Robertson shortly after erected a house, and came with his family to reside at the Falls. There is no evidence, so far as I am aware, that traffic with the Indians was given up, when the station at the mouth of the river was forsaken. Everything of a business character was probably then located at the Falls, and trade carried on with the natives more extensively than ever. The lumber business also required a large number of men. There was a time after the close of the old French war, and before the breaking out of hostilities against England in 1776, when some 50 workmen were employed here at once. These were mostly of French descent, and probably many of them had families which were settled in the neighborhood. This information I obtained from Mr. John Pratt, who says he received it from an old man who lived here, in the employ of Mr. Robertson, for many years before the American Revolution.

It thus appears that an English settlement was effected on the Missisquoi river not far from 1765, and that it soon went into successful operation. Considerable business was probably done here in the way of trade with the Indians, and in the manufacture of lumber. The number of whites must have been considerable. If we reckon that 25 of the 50 workmen had families, and allow four as the average size of each family, we shall have 125, without including the households of Mr. Robertson and Mr. Metcalf. This may be too large an estimate; at any rate it is not probable that so many were here continuously. And yet, when we remember what is stated to be a fact, that no horses or oxen were used, and that all the logs were removed by hand, being cut above the Falls, rolled to the bank of the river, and thence floated down to the mill, we see that a great many workmen would be needed.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE SETTLEMENT.

Although the French for the most part, if not entirely, took their departure from Missisquoi shortly after 1760, the improvements which they had introduced were not all removed. Many of the Indians remained behind, and doubtless continued to live more or less as they had been wont while the French were present. The house of worship, which had been erected long before, was, as we have seen, still standing, and undoubtedly some of the cabins put up by the old French inhabitants were also in existence. Hunting and fishing were followed, as they had been of old, and no doubt some attention was given to the cultivation of the soil, which recalls a matter that may be more fully described than in the preceding location of the old Indian farms. From the lease already cited, I have been able to get a clue to the relative position which some of them probably occupied. They were arranged and portioned out by actual survey, according to the old French mode—one which may be observed, even to the present time, in Lower Canada—each having a narrow front, and extending back to a great distance. Farms of a like description, which were laid out and presented at an early day to the disabled soldiers who were dismissed from the French service, were, according to an author already quoted, usually 40 arpents long, and 3 broad. Similar lots in Canada were 40 arpents long and three in breadth. [Kalm, vol. II, pp. 194 and 215.] We have mention of 14 Indian farms on the Missisquoi, the dimensions of 12 of which are given. They are described as lying along the river, and being nearly 2 arpents in front and 60 in depth. This would make each farm to be about 252 feet, or 84 yards wide, and almost a mile and a half in length.

Such was the size of these farms in 1765, and it is probable that they were thus laid out many years before by the French. The diagram gives the relative position of the fields in question. Commencing up stream, and following down the right bank, we have first the farm of Old Whitehead, succeeded by 5 similar parcels of land. Beginning up the stream, on the left bank, we have the farm of Old Abenard, followed by the farms belonging to 7 other individuals.

1, Old Whitehead; 2, Joseph Compient; 3, Baptiste Momtock; 4, Annus Jean; 5, Francois Nichowizet; 6, Pierre Peckenowax; 7, Old Abenard; 8, Old Etienne; 9, Jean Baptiste the Whitehead; 10, Willsomquax; 11, Jemonganz; 12, Annome Quisse; 13, Cecile; 14, Togisheat.

[A map accompanies this, of which having no cut, we cannot give; a map representing the Missisquoi river running so crookedly from north-east to south-east as to nearly form a half circle. On the river, from the west, Maquam Creek; a little below, on the east bank, the Castle, with Indian Village below, and yet further below, Missisquoi Falls, with village both upon the east and west bank. There are also marked on the map two seals of the cross, topped with an arrow, the top pointing to an N, marking the point of compass, there being an E. and W. for the end of each arm of the cross, and an S. at the foot.]

It has been already remarked that a mill was erected by Metcalf, and probably under the direction of James Robertson. This was doubtless done, with a view to supply the advancing demand for lumber in settlements lying to the north. The exact time of its erection is not known. It was most probably built and put in operation some time between the years 1765 and 1768. Other mills were going up not far from this time along the margin of Lake Champlain at various points. In 1766 or '67, Charles de Fredenburgh started a mill on the river Saranac; this was burned near the beginning of the American Revolution. [Palmer's History of Lake Champlain.] A mill was likewise erected at the Lower Falls on Otter Creek in 1769. Shortly after this, Logan and Pottier were living in Shelburne, and engaged in getting out lumber for the Canadian market. Wm. Gilliland also put up a saw-mill at an early day on the river Bouquet [Palmer].

In regard to the erection of the mill at Missisquoi Falls by Metcalf, there seems to be no reasonable ground for doubt. This was the second saw-mill built at the same place, and that it is thus to be distinguished from the old French structure, which was destroyed during the French and Indian war, also seems certain, if tradition be allowed any weight. Two series of accounts have come down to us from the past, often more or less blended, still very unlike in their essential features. Of these two mills the reported dimensions are widely different. The earlier structure was small; the latter large, considering the time of its erection. In the first, there was only a single saw; the second had both a single saw, and a gang consisting of 4 or 5 saws. At the early day, when the French mill was erected, there could hardly have been occasion for so extensive a work as that put up under the direction of James Robertson; but, when the latter was built, the demand for lumber was beginning to advance, and the erection of a building upon an enlarged scale would be indeed, under the circumstances, by no means improbable, but just what we should naturally look for. In fact, it is only on the supposition, that there were 2 mills in operation at different times and under very unlike auspices that it becomes easy to harmonize the many traditions, respecting the sawing of lumber on the Missisquoi river.

The mill erected by Metcalf, probably, occupied about the same site as the old one built by the French. Water was also, without doubt, obtained for turning the wheel through the artificial channel which had been excavated many years before. The irons for this mill, according to tradition, were brought from Newbury by Mr. Metcalf, on a species of sledge or jumper so constructed, that the runners would by their pliability readily yield to obstructions, and thus meet with little impediment in passing over rocks, fallen trees and uneven ground. According to Mr. Powers, Newbury was settled in 1761, and a saw-mill erected in Haverhill during the next year. It would thus be very natural, that Metcalf, having originally come into the Missisquoi valley from the Coos County, should, on being engaged some years later in building a mill on this side of the mountain, return to Haverhill for such irons as he could there procure. In confirmation of this, it is said that in passing over the mountain Metcalf spent a night in what is now the township of Fletcher, and by the side of a small body of water which from this fact has since been known as Metcalf's pond. To this tradition it has been objected, that no person with a load would take the route. This may be very true; but it should be remembered that Metcalf probably traversed the region between Newbury and Missisquoi several times. When he brought the mill-irons, he would be likely to choose an easier and more circuitous way. On some other occasion he may have gone through Fletcher, and encamped by the pond, which perhaps from the circumstances received and has since continued to bear his name. In connection with this incident, it may be added that the single saw in the mill belonged, as I have been informed, to Metcalf, while the gang of saws was the property of the principal proprietor. Mr. Robertson would be most likely to procure his irons from Montreal, while Mr. Metcalf, perhaps owning sawing utensils in Newbury, or for some other reason, may have gone there for them.

It has been already remarked, the mill in question was a large one. This fact is attested by living witnesses. The foundation of the more recently erected building was visible, not only when the first settlers after the Revolution came here, but also during the earlier portion of the present century. Logs, indeed, nearly imbedded in the soil, were for many years pointed out as the remains of this structure, and occupying the spot assigned to it by tradition. When the present grist-mill was erected in 1833, the removal of decayed rubbish brought to light the underpinning of the old building which was put up long before by Metcalf. The sills, which were somewhat charred, were still sound, and gave evidence that they had been framed in a workmanlike manner. They were also of a length and size to indicate that they belonged to a very large structure. Such is the testimony of several of the oldest inhabitants.

Reference has been likewise made to the fact that Mr. Robertson built a dwelling-house here, in which he resided with his family. This building was very large on the ground, and was 2 stories in height. It stood on the bank of the river, some rods S. E. of the saw-mill. According to all accounts, it must have been also, for that early day, very richly furnished. This appears from the testimony of Thomas Butterfield, who said that he had frequently been in it, he having passed through this region, several times before the American Revolution. I received this statement from one, who knew Mr. Butterfield and who also adds of himself that when a boy in digging angle-worms on the bank of the river where the house stood, he had found pieces of very fine crockery in great abundance. It is probable that the messengers sent by Gen. Bailey to Montreal, who often spoke of the sumptuous entertainment they always had at Missisquoi, were more usually the guests of Mr. Robertson. Metcalf's house was no doubt in the neighborhood, though I have failed to learn its exact position. It was perhaps of humble dimensions, and in no respect deserving of particular consideration. The dwellings, occupied by the sawyers were doubtless rude cabins, made of unsubstantial material, hastily thrown together—in a word, they were structures which, if for a short time neglected, would speedily go to decay. Such, perhaps, were the principal buildings, and such no doubt the manner in which people were living at the Lower Falls on the Missisquoi, nearly a century ago.

But a change at last occurred. The saw-mill was burnt just before, or soon after, the spring of the American Revolution. As one account has it, the work of destruction was effected by a few soldiers who were sent on to burn the mill, that the English might have as few facilities as possible in constructing vessels of war on Lake Champlain. According to another version of the matter, the act was not connected with hostilities against the mother country. Those, or a portion of those, who held the grant of the township already referred to as issued by Gov. Wentworth, resided either in what is now Connecticut, or in the southern part of Vermont. Perhaps, most, who then owned rights under the New Hampshire grant, lived in Bennington, or its vicinity. Unwilling that the timber should be cut off, and desiring in order to prevent the removal of the lumber, to eject those who were settled on the soil, it is said that they employed two men to repair to this place and burn the mill. But a change at last occurred. The saw-mill was burnt just before or soon after the opening of the American Revolution. As one account has it, the work of destruction took place at the earlier time mentioned, and was effected under the direction of those who held the grant of the township already referred to as issued by Governor Wentworth. These grantees, or a portion of them, then resided either within the limits of the Colony of Connecticut, or in the southern part of what is now Vermont. Perhaps most of those who then owned the rights under the New Hampshire grant, then lived in Bennington, or its immediate vicinity. Unwilling that the best timber should be cut off, and desiring, in order to prevent the removal of the timber, as well as for other reasons, to eject those who were settled on the soil, it is said that they employed two men to repair to the place and burn the mill. Those thus employed, as the report goes, accordingly came on with this design. Having lain about in the woods for two or three days, they finally, watching their chance, crossed over from the west side of the stream, and applied the torch. They then retired with all haste, returning to Bennington. Both the mill and the fine dwelling which stood near it were burnt. It is said, though for the truth of the statement I cannot vouch, that Thomas Butterfield was one of the men engaged in this transaction. As the tradition runs, he was then a young man, and in the employ of the Allens, who had already bought up most of the rights of the land under the New Hampshire grant. Being energetic and resolute, he was ready to come on, as above intimated, and actually assisted in burning the saw-mill and a house which stood near it. And with this conflagration, if the tradition be trustworthy, ended the first settlement effected, under English auspices, on the banks of the Missisquoi. Thus the hopes excited, and the aspirations raised, by this individual enterprise, were reduced to ashes only to prepare the way for another settlement, destined to originate a few years later in an utterly dissimilar manner, and to go on toward its consummation, according to entirely different principles, after the great struggle for and achievement of American Independence.

INDIANS AT MISSISQUIOI DOWN TO 1776.

On the reduction of Canada, after the seizure of Lake Champlain by the English, in 1760, many of the Indians began gradually to retire from those parts of Vermont which they had occupied. Their departure from Missisquoi, however, was slower than from other quarters. They still lingered in considerable number at this place for many years, though they were all the while in close connection with those of their kindred whose abode was on the southern bank of the St. Lawrence, and elsewhere in Canada. Such of them as no longer lived in the Missisquoi valley, often came to this neighborhood that they might pass the winter in hunting; and they all continued, whether they were residing here or at St. Francis, for the most part to act in concert.

But during the several years now under review, we find no mention of their committing depredations to any great extent. They had been to much humbled for any such undertakings. Many of their bravest warriors had fallen; their power was almost gone; it was, also, a time of peace. Besides, they no longer had the French as their allies to incite them to acts of hostility against the English settlements. The number of their forays, between 1763 and the breaking out of the American Revolution, must therefore have been very small. That they engaged in some incursions there is no reason to doubt; still they probably lived on in comparative quiet, occupied, as was their wont, in hunting and fishing, and made during this time very few hostile attacks upon the new formed settlements lying to the south.

The account already given of the destructive work supposed to have been effected with the view of ejecting the settlers from the lands bordering the Lower Falls of the Missisquoi, seems to be well sustained by external evidence and internal probability. Still, as there is a different tradition which comes to us from another and an independent source, I proceed to give it in what appears to be its proper connection, leaving others to judge of it in the best light they can secure. The account which follows, Mr. Harmon Northrop, of Fairfield, was so kind as to obtain for me from Mr. Philip Bailey of the same township. Mr. Bailey, as I understand, received his information many years ago direct from Mr. Robert Coffrin, a revolutionary soldier and one of the reputed actors in the transaction recorded.

According to this account, the burning of the mill was something more than a private adventure, or the enterprise of a few land-owners. It was connected with hostilities against the mother country, and took place after the breaking out of the war for Independence. As the tradition runs, several soldiers, among whom was Robert Coffrin, were sent on to the Lower Falls of the Missisquoi with orders to burn a saw-mill at that place, that the British might not avail themselves of its use. On reaching Missisquoi, they knocked at the door of a house which seemed to be tenanted. This was, as I infer from another authority, a block-house erected several years earlier as a means of defense. A woman obeyed the summons. On asking for the man of the house, Mr. Metcalf came forward, to whom they made known their errand. He entreated them not to burn the mill, alleging that there was no necessity for such a step, and pleading that it was impossible for the English to make any use of it in constructing vessels of war on the Lake. Coffrin, in the name of his comrades, replied that they dare not go back without doing as they were ordered. The Indians being entirely, or for the most part absent, and there being few if any workmen present, at that time, Metcalf was powerless to prevent the act. Coffrin accordingly set fire to the mill, and saw it in flames, before he left the spot. He and his companions then returned, according to one tradition, to Bennington; according to another, to a Fort situated near the site of the present city of Vergennes, whence, it is said, they had set out. Such is substantially the account, as it originally came into my hands, and has been confirmed by several different narrators. Whether it be another version of the transaction already recorded, whether the former narrative be a somewhat altered recital of a later event, or whether there were two distinct missions of the kinds and for the purposes indicated, I have been unable to make out. All things considered, it seems very probable, that one and the same event is referred to in these accounts, each having been somewhat garnished with slight additions, and modified by minor changes, as they naturally would have been, in coming down from the past through two distinct channels. In one version Thomas Butterfield is a leading character, in the other Robert Coffrin, according to the supposition just made; they were both undoubtedly prominent; they may have been the sole actors in the transaction.

Be this however as it may, the settlement effected by James Robertson no doubt had an end, either just before, or not very long after, the beginning of the American Revolution. Of Mr. Robertson I get no later tidings. With Mr. Metcalf the case is different. According to a current report, he went to Canada immediately after the burning of the mill, and thence shortly to France, whence it is said he originally came. To this version of the story I have been indisposed, for various reasons, to give much credit. There is another account, however, according to which he returned to the Coos Country, making his home at Gen. Jacob Bailey's. This view of the matter has much probability in its favor, since he undoubtedly lived for a while on the Connecticut, before going to the Missisquoi. In confirmation of this view I may add that Mr. Powers in referring to an effort to take Gen. Bailey in 1782, while Col. Thomas Johnson was at home on parole, mentions Thomas Metcalf. He speaks of him, among others, as belonging to the guard which was stationed at the house of Gen. Bailey. If this account be correct, and the Thomas Metcalf mentioned be the one who figured some years earlier at Missisquoi, and there appears to be good reason to suppose such to be the case. Mr. Metcalf evidently lived at least near the close of the Revolution on the upper waters of the Connecticut. It is of course possible to conjecture that Mr. Metcalf proceeded first to Canada, afterwards to the Coos Country, and finally to Old France, and thus to introduce apparent harmony amongst the various accounts respecting him which have been handed down. Having, however, no precise information on these points, I leave them, as I find them, undecided.

THE FIRST PERMANENT SETTLEMENT.

Although much had been done at Missisquoi at a very early day, much by James Robertson at a somewhat later period, little or nothing of these improvements remain at the present time. So, too, a few English settlers had located themselves in other parts of the region now known as Northwestern Vermont, just before the breaking out of hostilities between the colonies and the mother country; but these all withdrew when the war fairly commenced, and the lands remained without civilized occupants. This was probably the case at Missisquoi after the burning of the mill. The soil was no doubt left vacant, and continued to be unoccupied by whites until the first permanent settlement in the neighborhood had its singular inception. This was the beginning of improvements which still exist—of improvements, the end of which is not yet—a beginning which was doubtless made during the American Revolution, the results of which have come down to us, and have contributed their quota toward the state of things as they are in the present. Reference is made to the settlement which was finally effected on the left bank of the Missisquoi a while after the removal of James Robertson.

After a thorough examination of the matter, I am led to believe that the first white man to establish himself, after the beginning of the American Revolution, in what is now Franklin County, was John Hilliker. He was, so far as I can learn, the earliest permanent settler in this region, and undoubtedly the first, after the time named, to come into this neighborhood and locate himself in what is to-day the township of Swanton. This he made his home during the remainder of his life, and left behind him a posterity, a portion of which may still be found in the neighborhood. While his settlement in the place was no doubt some time after the retirement of Mr. Robertson and Mr. Metcalf, it was certainly, according to the testimony of his eldest son, long before the withdrawal of the larger part of the St. Francis Indians.

A few words respecting Mr. Hilliker before he came into this vicinity, may be here in place. He was of Dutch descent, and born at White Plains, N. Y., Mar. 10, 1745. After attaining to his majority, he went to La Chine, in Upper Canada, as that province was long designated. On the breaking out of the American Revolution, he became a soldier in the employment of the English government. In this service he continued during the earlier part of the struggle, being for a few months at Quebec; also for a while at other points in Canada. On leaving the army, he went to Sorcelle, a village situated near the mouth of a river of the same name, a few miles below Montreal. While there he married Mary, daughter of William and Rebecca Lehigh, who had recently moved to that place from New York. Soon after his marriage, he left Sorelle, and came with his wife to this place, probably during the latter part of the Revolutionary War, and settled on what is now known as the Vernal place, 2 miles or so below the Falls, on the south side of the river. A year or two after Mr. Hilliker's settlement on the Missisquoi, John Hilliker, Jr., was born, who still survives, and from whom I have received a portion of this account. Though much past the prime of life, he is yet hale and vigorous. Early in June, 1862, I found him engaged in ploughing, when he informed me that he should be 81 years old on the 17th of the coming July. According to this, he must have been born in the year 1781, or, as he said, about 2 years after his father came into this neighborhood.

It should thus appear that John Hilliker, Sr., settled on the Missisquoi river about 1779, thus as early as the middle, or possibly some time during the last half of the Revolutionary War. There is a current account, according to which he came into this region near or just after the close of the war, say in 1783 or '84. The latter date, coming in the form of a vague tradition, may be received as a near approach to the truth; while the former reckoning seems to be perfectly trustworthy and accurate, as it rests on the explicit testimony of the son.

For several years after Mr. Hilliker's settlement in this neighborhood, no additional families came here to live. During all this time he had no neighbors in what are now the adjoining townships of Franklin County. Indeed, for several years after he located himself on the Missisquoi river, the only tenement between his home and Burlington was on Colchester Point. This was a log-cabin roofed with bark. At the period of his settlement, the Jesuit chapel and the Indian village were still in existence. The bell used to be rung daily, morning and evening, for prayers. Previously to that time, however, the saw-mill at the Falls had been destroyed.

Mr. Hilliker passed the remainder of his days in this vicinity, continuing to occupy the land on which he originally settled, finally dying Sept. 11, 1828, at the advanced age of 82 years. Tradition says that his sympathies were ever with the English government; that he was engaged in their service after he located himself in this neighborhood; that he often acted in their behalf as a pilot and as a scout; and that he sometimes accompanied the Indians in their forays, in several instances going with them as far south as Albany and Schenectady.

THE OLD INDIAN LEASE OF LAND on which the first permanent settlement was effected: Although Gov. Wentworth issued a grant of the lands lying on the lower waters of the Missisquoi as early as 1763, it does not appear that the grantees made any effective arrangements for their settlement until after the close of the American Revolution. It accordingly happened that the improvements initiated by James Robertson remained intact until about the beginning of the war between England and her American colonies. A few Indians also continued to live at Missisquoi village, and to occupy the adjoining lands, even up to a more recent day. The very existence of the English grant may have been altogether, or for the most part, unknown in the region. Or, if the Indians were aware of it, they practically paid to it little attention, inasmuch as they claimed the lands as their own. For various reasons of these and of other kinds, the different settlements effected on the Missisquoi rested on very unlike grounds.

With these facts before us, we shall readily understand the basis on which Mr. Hilliker's improvements rested. On his coming into the region, he leased land of the Indians—the same farm that he afterward owned, and on which he passed the remainder of his days—agreeing to pay them annual rent. The lease was during life. According to the stipulation, he was to give them a crown a year for 100 acres, or for a proposed area which was found to be so much on subsequent measurement.

Such is substantially the lease on which Mr. Hilliker's settlement was effected, the particulars of which I received from his son. Whether it were ever reduced to writing or not, and, if it were, whether a copy be still in existence, I have been unable to learn. It should be added, that when a survey was finally made, or rather when the results of the survey came to be known, it was found that a part of Mr. Hilliker's farm was in what was laid out as Swanton, and a part in what then, and for a while afterward was Highgate. A change having been subsequently made in the township lines, the whole farm is now, and has been for many years, in Swanton.

THE ANNALS OF THE INDIANS AT MISSIS-QUOI DOWN TO 1783,

may comprise all that remains to be said of the occurrences in this neighborhood during the American Revolution. When the Colonies rose against the Mother Country, the aid of these and of other Indians were diligently sought in favor of the English government by General Carleton, who was then Governor of Canada. But the Indians of the St. Francis tribe, like the Canadian French, had never been favorable to the British dominion. They were accordingly slow, at this time, to take part with England against the Colonies. At last, however, some of the Abenaki were enlisted in the struggle, and led to act with the British forces. These Indians were no doubt present in most of the transactions, mention of which will now be made, if not in them all, as well as in many affrays of which we have less definite knowledge.

In Sept., 1775, Gens. Schuyler and Montgomery advanced down Lake Champlain with a view to take the British fort at St. Johns. As they proceeded through the woods, after landing toward the lower part of the Lake, they were attacked by a body of Indians, and had three killed and eight wounded. These Indians, who were speedily repulsed with considerable loss, were probably Abenaki. [See Palmer. History of Lake Champlain, p. 94.]

Sept. 6, 1776, while Arnold was lying off Wind-mill Point, a few miles south of the station of the British fleet, some of his men having gone ashore in small boats, were assailed by a party of Indians, of the St. Francis tribe as may be inferred, who lay concealed in the adjoining woods; three of Arnold's men were killed and six wounded before they could escape. The Indians, however, at once fled, a broadside being poured into their ranks from the vessels.

A little later the same year, we get an other glimpse of the Indians, who were probably from Missisquoi. While Arnold's fleet was coming to anchor, Sept. 19, a little north of Cumberland Head, a Canadian on the shore desired to be taken aboard. Several men having gone cautiously toward the land in a small boat, with swivels pointed and muskets ready in case of necessity, the Canadian waded into the water a few feet, and endeavored to decoy them in. Failing in this, he gave a signal, when some 300 Canadians and Indians, concealed in the bushes, made their appearance, and firing into the boat wounded three. The fire being returned from the boat and from a schooner, the assailants retreated with apparent loss.

As the British force moved up the Lake, it was accompanied by a party of Abenaki Indians. These were present at the battle of Valcour Island, which occurred Oct. 11, of the same year. Having landed on the main land and on the island, they kept up an incessant fire on Arnold's fleet, which was in the channel, while it was assailed by the English vessels lying in front and on the south. In this way considerable injury was done by the Indians..

When General Carleton advanced in pursuit of Arnold, he was still accompanied by the same Indians. On establishing himself, for a while, at Crown Point, he there made use of them in reconnoitering and in some skirmishes which occurred in connection with his contemplated attack on Ticonderoga.

Early in June, 1777, General Burgoyne set out from St. Johns, on his celebrated expedition up Lake Champlain. Having halted near the mouth of the Bouquet River, he was joined by 400 Indians, consisting in part of Abenaki. On the 21st of June, he gave them a war-feast, for the purpose of inciting their courage, and of binding them to the British interest. In justice to General Burgoyne it should be added, that in his war-speech to them, on the occasion in question, he endeavored to dissuade them from barbarity, saying, "You shall receive compensation for the prisoners you take, but you shall be called to account for scalps." To this they readily assented, but with how little practical effect the sequel sadly declared.

The use, however, to which Burgoyne was disposed to turn these Indians is made very clear by the proclamation which he issued, June 30th, from Crown Point. Against such as should not bow to the British rule he threatened the merciless vengeance of the whole Indian force under his command. [See Palmer, History of Lake Champlain, pp. 105-'6; p. 109; p. 114: pp. 117-'8; p. 120.]

As Burgoyne, during the following autumn, began to experience disasters, the Indians gradually fell off, until nearly all had deserted him. They either returned home, making their way back to Missisquoi, St. Francis, and their other places of abode, or joined the Continental Army.

Sometime during the same year, a party of these Indians visited Brandon. Having killed two men, and taken most of the other inhabitants prisoners, they burned the dwellings and a saw-mill which had been recently erected. [See history of Brandon, vol. 11.]

About this time, though I have not been able to learn the exact date, an assault was made upon Bridport by Indians who probably came from Missisquoi.

In most of the cases cited, the woman and children were not injured, as they had been during the earlier wars. This was possibly owing to the influence exerted by the English; perhaps it was in part due to the disabled condition of the tribe, [perhaps, more probable] it may be in a measure referable to causes with which we are not acquainted. But while the women and children were usually left unharmed, the houses were generally plundered, and the men when it was possible, were ordinarily taken prisoners. Whether the latter course was at all the result of Gen. Burgoyne's instructions, and if so to what extent, it is now difficult to decide.

For some time after the occurrences cited, the Indians, so far as appears, were more quiet. During the latter part of the war, however, they engaged once more in depredations, proceeding up Lake Champlain, and assailing the unfortunate settlers on the frontier.

In this manner 21 Indians, Aug. 9, 1780, visited the village of Barnard. They there took several prisoners, whom they conveyed to Canada. Although the captives suffered considerably, they all lived to return to their homes.

During the following October, some two or three hundred Indians, belonging for the most part, as it appears, to the St. Francis tribe, enacted one of the most tragic scenes witnessed in this region during the American Revolution. Led on by one Horton and a number of refugees, they passed up the Winooski river, and made an assault upon Royalton. [An account of which will be given in the history of that town.—ED.]

Such are a few of the more prominent transactions, in which the St. Francis Indians appear to have been engaged during the protracted war of the colonies for independence. Although the acts of barbarity may not have been so great as some of those of an earlier day, there yet was enough to evince the bloodthirsty spirit of the Red men, and to show that the English no less than the French—that the liege servants of a nominally Protestant government equally with the followers of St. Francis—had thus far signally failed to raise them much above their savage state. So true is it, that Christianity, in order to vindicate its real worth, must be—not a mere thing of profession, but—a life revealing itself at once in the hearts and understandings, as well as in the outward bearing of the people.

COMPILER'S NOTES ON THE GIVEN PAPER.

[Omissions:—In quotations from Kalm, page 954, instead of points should read :

In their whole deportment there is something pleasing. It is no wonder that they captivate the minds of the people. They seldom speak of religious matters and if it happens, they generally avoid disputes. They are very ready to do any one a service ; and when they see that their assistance is wanted, they hardly give one time to speak of it ; falling to work immediately to bring about what is required of them. Their conversation is very entertaining and learned, so that one cannot be tired of their company. Among all the Jesuits I have conversed with, I have not found one who was not possessed of this quality in a very eminent degree.

And where second points are in the same paragraph : " There is a Jesuit in every village belonging to the Indians whom he endeavors on all occasions to convert. In winter he goes on their great hunts, where he is frequently obliged to suffer all imaginable inconveniences ; such as walking in the snow all day ; lying in the open air all winter ; being out in both good and bad weather ; lying in the Indian hut which often swarm with fleas and other vermin. The Jesuits undergo all these hardships for the sake of converting the Indians, and likewise for political reasons. The Jesuits are of a great use to their king ; for they are frequently able to persuade the Indians to break their treaty with the English, to make war upon them, to bring their furs to the French, and not to permit the English to come amongst them. These words, from one who knew the Jesuits well, may serve to suggest more forcibly than any language of mine, the vast influence they probably exerted on the Red men at Missisquoi. While, however, their agency was very potent, it is still very difficult to tell to precisely what extent the Indians were really brought under the power of the gospel. Undoubtedly some light was introduced. At the same time, it would have been surprising, if their old ways and habits had not continued to maintain considerable sway. That this was in fact the case, we we well know, from what we can gather from authentic sources of their relations earlier to the English colonies. There is, certainly, a sense in which they may have been rendered even more savage and ferocious by their perversion of the gospel, they being led to think that in exterminating the heretics they were doing God's service. Indeed, their opposition to the English as apostates from what they regarded to be the true faith, doubtless led to many of those forays against the settlers in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, which occurred between 1690 and 1760, and in which the Abenaki of Missisquoi bore a prominent part. And this might all take place without their being directly taught any such thing. That they adopted the forms of worship set before them by the Jesuits, seems certain. This is confirmed by various circumstances. Among others that it is said that many of the graves of the St. Francis Indians contain such beads as Roman Catholics are wont to make use of as an assistance to the more ignorant in worship. As we cannot tell how far the French in distinction from or in connection with the Indians had to do with the burial ground in question, the fact just mentioned of course furnishes no certain evidence of the extent to which the Red men adopted the teachings of the Jesuits—much less of the degree in which they became animated by Christian sentiments. However this may be, some of them were really made better, need not be doubted.

Author's Reflections :—"Kalm who knew the Jesuits well." Kalm's admissions : "They seldom speak of religious matters." Query ; how well a transient guest could know the motives of men who "seldom," perhaps never, spoke to him of the grand object of their lives, with whom from courtesy to their scientific guest, regarded as much a naturalist in his religion, as in his science, "they seldom speak of religious matters, if it happens, they usually avoid disputes."

On the same sheet, after reflections on Kalm's informations, a preamble, as evident to the opening of the next page :

"The Old French Settlement :—Comes in now for a share of our attention.—That establishment of a missionary station at Missisquoi would soon suggest the importance of other operations at the same place ; this we should reasonably expect, since many things of a temporal kind are needful in order to the successful prosecution of the great work of the herald of the cross. It would also be the case especially from the fact, that one prominent aim of the French Jesuits, if they be not misrepresented, was the commencement of settlements which would extend the power, and make sure the dominion of France in this country, we shall accordingly not be likely to err very much, if we connect more or less closely the old French settlement with the religious enterprise which has been already noticed.

Page 974, 4 lines, reserved, the summary of the burning of Royalton. We can't let this Franklin County historian come into our old Windsor County and skim the early cream.

"The Fair Captive," page 960, several pages of manuscript omitted, wholly—Mrs. Howe's captivity, even to Mrs. Tute's second marriage after her return from her captivity and the epitaph on her grave down in old Windham County. Mrs. (Howe) Tute was born, married, and lived in Windham County all her life, except the brief period of her captivity; and her history is all written up in the papers of this county and in our hands awaiting publication. We cannot allow our fine old Windham County records to be plundered of their most interesting history before their time comes to be published in the same work.

To these papers descriptive of one of the earliest and most interesting historical fields in our state, for their own interest and from sentiments of esteem for an early and favorite contributor, we have allowed large space in this work where papers must usually be so condensed; and have thought well to give them thus fully, so to redeem the more carefully the trust left in our hands—the writings of the dead—to publish them substantially as the writer left them; though there are a number of things in them, we cannot approve: one, a partiality for the English, a prejudice against the French. It may be natural, inherent, as in this case the writer was English in lineage on both sides, with pretty clear English blood in our veins, this we can understand. It may account somewhat for his partiality; but a historian must not know nationality, when he takes up his pen for another party or nation. He should be as true an historian when he essays to write their history, as for his own side when writing for that, give their facts as fully and explicitly, and where their history is unknown, or obscure, be as charitable in surmise or suppositions as he would upon the side where his sympathies are enlisted. Mr. Perry assumes the ground of an historian for Swanton, for its old Indian and French settlements while his knowledge, researches, and constructions seem mostly drawn from "English" and colonial history—that is from the other and wrong side from this for which he is writing. He gives a considerable list, evidently all he could find at the time, of the forays, and attacks of the French and Indians upon the English settlements, where the St. Francis Indians are, in any way mentioned, either as warriors, or guides, or but proved as of the war-parties of the Huron, Iroquois, and tribes going and returning from Montreal and above; evidently all, or we may infer all, as not only are all the above included as participants, where an Indian of the tribe is named, but in one or more bloody massacres called to mind, where the writer admits he can find no proof of their presence, he "supposes it reasonable to think they may have been there," a kind of suppository evidence not allowable in courts, and does not weigh heavy in history; and in which we credit Mr. Perry too keen a man to have clogged his paper with but for a felt lack of provable testimony. It may, however, wholly or partly have been entered to show his St. Francis Indians as very formidable, a branch of the fierce Abenaki among the warlike, cruel Huron, and treacherous, bloody Iroquois, rather than with any view to exaggerate their particular barbarism and atrocities; as one might mistake on the first face, and which he might have avoided, and have been only the more just to the party he serves as an historian for in their special field, had he also, after, before, or with his list of attacks of the French and Indians upon the English, have given as fully the attacks of the English upon them. It should not be overlooked in the writer for a party when he does not do it. p. 539.

Again there might also have been a more clear presentation of the French record and view of the matter. It might have been said Canada and the Champlain Lake regions did belong to the French by the right of discovery, at that time; a right acceded to by all the Sovereigns of Europe. The colonial English pitted against the French were at that time children of the English Court—subjects of the English government. Some English traders, jealous of the success of the fur-trade of the French with the Indians, intruded upon the French traders and settlers and first kindled the war; and having made this fair statement might have given a list of the battles on both sides, the assaults they had to bear, the massacres they had to suffer. When had he thought to have so done, instead of leaving his savages and French with the odium of being guilty of the most bloodshed, he might have made some little question whether the vanquished or the victors would “probably” shed the most blood—? Both doubtless with a terrible will shed what they could. It was on both sides a war for territory—which should possess this country, we feel a pride in the English having won—don’t let us diminish the magnitude of our victory by charging our foes with having done the sharpest fighting. Credit them with having fought as hotly and well; they deserve it, but not with having suffered the most from the war—not with having suffered the most blood-shedding and barbarities, from French or savage, when they wiped out all these fighting French “warlike and cruel Hurons,” “traitorous, blood-thirsty Iroquois” and “fierce Abenaki” of whom the St. Francis Indians were—a branch. Those old Yankee warriors or British soldiers would not have us wring out any sympathy for them as having suffered any more than they made their foes to. They claim the victory of conquerors and not the sympathy we give the conquered.

The writer does not show there was a single Christian Indian in any of these forays of the St. Francis tribe. He admits he cannot point his finger at one and say there he is—that “nominal” Christian that goes to war with a tomahawk! but he thinks it very “probable.” I have no more doubt than he there were some there. There have always been Christian soldiers. It don’t usually make one unpatriotic to be a Christian,—and, did they fall in with their leaders and war after the custom of their nation or tribe? And why not Indian ones do the same? Or is the deadly emboweling of a bayonet-charge of a regiment any more refined and Christian than a flourish of scalping-knives? Whether the Jesuit missionaries did excite the Indians to fight against the English, our historian confesses a lack of proof here, too, but supposes it not in their human nature not to have so done, nor yet against their religion. In case they did, did our Massachusetts and Connecticut ministers keep still during this war in their pulpits? Did they ever in any war in which their people were engaged? the Revolution? 1812? in the last war? Do we demand it of them? would we have them? Or have we ever charged the doings of our scouting parties to our religion—I speak for our English side.

There was a night, our scouts were on the path; the midnight moon and stars looked in stillness down upon a hundred, perhaps, silent wigwams, far away in Canada—the little “St. Francis Capitol.” or village, where the women and children, the aged and the sick slept in supposed security: their men were on the war-path; not a warrior left behind to guard the helpless. How stealthily they come—that old Rogers and his scouts; not a twig must break; they are hunting Indians now; a reconnoitering spy has whispered the unconscious, helpless state, a ring is formed around that little Indian village, torch after torch silently applied till each wigwam rose up to light at once in flame. The infirm and papoose perished in the flames within, the screeching squaws rushed at the door of their wigwams, upon the bayonet, or were beaten to death by the breeches of the soldiers’ guns. “Nearly every inhabitant of that village,”—page 960—was war-murdered on that night; but who ever charged it to the religion of Rogers or his band? Who amongst us would allow it fair to charge this barbarity of burning old men—too old to fight, and defenceless women and children in the absence of all their warriors to the spirit of the religion generally professed in the colonies, and we fail to find it any more fair to charge the cruelty of French and Indian war-parties to their religion. We do not think there is much of the best spirit of any religion in any war; but it seems scant justice or charity to criticise on one side, and not as much on the other.

a. We do not mean to say that Mr. Perry is silent on the French having discovered both Canada and Vermont, p. 934, 41, 42; but as he usually re-states considerably any point he appears to wish to prove, this right of discovery, it would have been well to have remembered, particularly, in connection with the opening and progress of that old French and Indian war:

Motives of the colonization of the French, in this country; argument: It was all a concerted move to convert this country to their religion, page 955-6:

“The whites being French Jesuits and laymen, who acted under the cross, doubtless regarded the propagation of their religion as one of the prominent aims of their lives. They were thus led to put forth efforts in almost every way they could for the conversion of the natives.”

It is clearly shown, we believe, in any French history of their settlements in this country, and in several American ones, that the French fur-traders were the earliest settlers here, and colonists came in for trade and because land for homes was a gift, not as laymen to the missionaries, though mostly, really or “nominally” of the same faith. There is not a shadow of evidence they considered themselves enlisting to help convert the Indians any more than the French emigrants from Montreal that come into the States to-day, come here and dwell among us for such a purpose. We should smile to see it gravely put forth in any history. It might be just as truly; and that to propagate their religion, is one of the motives of the Irish, German, or Chinese immigration to our shores; and the scandals among too many of these immigrants who came only for gain was the greatest stumbling-block the missionaries found in their path in the conversions of the Indians has been their report, whom our author inclines to put in for his coadjutors. See also page 962.

Again :—The Indians sided with the French in the war—consequence, page 961. The St. Francis Indians lost their homes at Missisquoi. Query: how much longer would they probably have retained them had they sided with the English; “The Indians preferred the French to the English for friends”—could the English settlers ever, have they ever, adapted themselves as easily to the ways of the Indians as the French settlers? “The Indians preferred the religion of the French to the religion of the English,” was that a fault of the poor Indian that they embraced the first Christian religion brought to them? And would it have been more noble in them to have dropped back into heathen Indians to have secured the English for friends, or more Christian to have rejected the only religion they knew and in which they saw such examples in their missionaries for a religion they knew not. It may not be a surprise even, if Catholic Indians did not choose to come under English rule when their religion was a proscribed one, when told the colonists had their ropes laid up for it—all but Rhode Island.

The Abenaki New Named, page 944:

“At last the Abenaki on the Connecticut and on the Missisquoi were known by a new name—or they sustained relations one to another they came to be called the St. Francis Indians—from the fact they were all more or less brought under the influence of the followers of St. Francis de Sales, [!] “or this appellation may have been given to them because a majority of their number were perhaps at one time, located at the village of St. Francis, both the village and the river no doubt being called in honor of the celebrated founder of the order of the Franciscans [!] . . . Large numbers of them having readily come under the Franciscan influence” [!] “we can see how naturally they would all, at the three places specified, in time be called the St. Francis Indians.”

St. Francis de Sales: a strange personage here. A missionary in Switzerland, (by title, Bishop of Geneva) who brought back to his church after the Luther Reformation in the 16th century hosts of Calvinists, but who never founded any religious order but "the sisters of the Visitation." It cannot be our writer thought these cloistered nuns were sent as missionaries to this race of savages, and were so successful in converting them all. But he says they were no doubt called after the Founder of the Franciscans. That was St. Francis of Assisum, born in Umbria, Italy, in 1211, over 400 years before. It may have been a slip of the pen, both being a St. Francis. But rather too bad, for our scholarly writer, both were such distinctive, world-renowned characters; one as the champion of poverty, founder of mendicant friars—poor Claras—the other for his elegance, learning, generally, by English scholars, we think, the best liked ascetic writer after Thomas A. Kempis. It is not strange our writer had heard about him, he is so often alluded to in current literature, but we cannot surmise how his imaginative mind should have placed him over 400 years back in those "dark centuries." Though it is no more of a mistake, than hundreds of other theorists have made guessing about things of which they do not know, and getting so in the habit that they write their speculations and that of others on the page of sober history as facts, or probabilities.

The writer supposed all the missionaries to have been Jesuits. He appears confused on the subject, page 953. The Recollects, a branch of the Franciscan order, were the missionaries here till 1625, when the Jesuits were called into this field; but they made few converts, and they gave no name, as we know, to any mission.—Francis de Sales may have been the patron saint of the St. Francis Indians, we admit, and in that sense they may be called his sons; but the manner of our writer's speaking of only Jesuit missionaries in these fields, would imply, either the Franciscans and Jesuits to be but one order, or another inference that might be made in his cloud of mist around these missionaries, that St. Francis de Sales was founder of the Jesuits also.

The graves of the Indians in Swanton and what was found in them: A very interesting topic, well-written up. p. 944-49. It might have been added, that the cabinet in the State House at Montpelier is greatly enriched by these Indian relics, from the graves and mounds and fields of Swanton. "The beads" found in the St. Francis Indians' graves, such as used by Catholics—"the clock of the rosary," a favorite devotion in the church "used by the more ignorant"—by that "Bishop of Geneva," whom our writer supposes to have been either the Founder of the Franciscans or of the Jesuits. Our writer don't seem to be "au courant" at all on these subjects. It has been said on the part of the Catholics, "No Protestant can write correctly on Catholic subjects." Be that as it may, we think it very hard for a minister to, on the other side from that which he is bound, more than any other man, to defend, and in the habit of, by preaching. This is the first paper entered in this work where the writer has been allowed any criticism upon any religion but his own, and a privilege we hope to never be asked to extend again, it being the law of concord and equity for this history that it shall be for all parties and against none in religion or politics, etc., in which each are expected to write up their own records and to respect the same privilege allowed to others, avoiding all that may be, or seem like criticism upon others, in a work for the whole people, and not a partisan one, has been our strenuous aim; and we have been seconded in it, strong, by pastors and people of every order in our State, nearly a hundred contributors among, for it, to one against, on the average, we believe. It would have been more agreeable to us to have corrected the mistakes made in persons of history, so far as we knew before in print, and to have omitted all reflections on religious ceremonies, devotions or sentiments which the writer had never been in a position to understand, and which have conferred no information and rather confuse the subject; but as the author, living, preferred we should note objections rather than eliminate so much as a line, of his papers, and his preference, to save collusion with a writer we so much prized, was allowed, and he cannot now change his verdict, though we think he might had he lived till to-day—have withdrawn some of his statements—and modified others, but, as we under all the circumstances, feel not the liberty, we have thought it best to stand by the old arrangement. Though having neglected our part, not till very late intending to enter the Swanton papers in this volume; with several swift compositors closing in upon us now with the last pages of this manuscript, and on our notes, there are other things we might have said, other objections marked, we pass and hasten rather to a close, and perhaps as well or better. There is an old proverb, “where doctors disagree, disciples may.” We will note but briefly a few more points and give such little information as we have at hand on them.

Claims of the French settlers:—“We have no evidence that their supposed right to the soil was derived from the Indians.” It is evident they must have had some claims, or made none to have lived in a settlement with the Indians; or if they had none, how could the Indians lose their old claim by a treaty of the French and English by themselves, on the subject of claims that neither of the treating parties had obtained from the original owners of the soil. p.—

Beginning of the Missionaries at Missisquoi, page 953:—“One or more of them will be established here after the beginning of the work at St. Francis.” . . . “Efforts were commenced on the St. Lawrence before 1790. That efforts had been made long before the plague about 1730, should seem probable.”

Again, page 953:—“I have thus far sought in vain for any definite information respecting the religious labor put forth at Missisquoi. The names of the missionaries are probably unknown.”

We do not suppose that any of these names are lost. The annals of the Jesuits can doubtless supply them with a sketch of all that is most important in their missions, true dates, and much interesting information in regard to the Indian nations. It is from the records of these Jesuits on the spot, and who wrote at the time, that the most information was drawn for “Ingraham’s Jesuits in America.” Parkman’s more recent and extensive, History of the Jesuit Mission in North America, etc.

“The Jesuits all came from France,” page 953. Elsewhere the writer as Kalm also, quoted, speaks of them as all Frenchmen: The founder of the order was a Spaniard, born at Guipuzoca, a province in Cantabria, and of his first nine companions Bobadilla and Salmeron were at least Spanish, as their names indicate, and Rodergues, Portugeuse and Claudius Janius, Italian. I think six of the first nine belonged to these nations here named. This is as we remember. It can be easily ascertained by turning to a life of St. Ignatius that can be found in almost any Catholic parish library: The head-house of the order has been at one time in Spain, I think at another in France, again in Rome, if our memory of Catholic history serves us right, and in one time we know of at least Germans, Russians, Irish and Italians as well as French Jesuits in this country. The above paper might lead some to erroneously suppose that the order was confined to the French nations. It is not, though there may have been more French Jesuits than those of other nationality—we do not know as to that, but so suppose.

[b] page 953. "All came from France, and after laboring a few years in this country, usually returned to their native land."

"Most of them, too, were martyrs to their faith." (Preface to Ingraham's Jesuit Missions). How few of their number died the common death of all men, or slept at last in the grounds their Church had consecrated. But . . . the sons of Loyola never retreated, the mission they founded in a tribe ended only with the extinction of the tribe itself. Though sorrowing for the dead, they pressed forward at once to occupy their places, or if need be share their fate. "Nothing," wrote Father Petit, after describing the martyrdom of two of his brethren, "nothing has happened to these two excellent missionaries, for which they were not prepared when they gave themselves to the Indian mission . . . each one indeed felt that . . . his own blood poured out would bring down greater blessings on those for whom he died, than he could win for them by the labors of a life. He realized that he was appointed unto death. Ibo et non redibo."

Says Ingraham:

"The wild hunter, the adventurous traveller, who penetrating the forests came to new and strange tribes often found that years before the disciple of Loyola had preceded him in that wilderness." "All were to be forgotten by these stern and high-wrought men, and they were often to go forth into the wilderness, without an adviser on their way, save their God."

Some Information on their labors: From J. Gilmary Shea, in his recent History on New France, in 6 vols.

M. Garneau ("Histoire du Canada") places the Algonquins on the St. Lawrence a little below Quebec to the St. Maurice, with one tribe at Montreal and the Montagnais a branch of the Algonquins on the Sagauney and Lake St. John. The Abbe Ferland (Coursel Histoire, p. 91.) puts the Algonquins around Quebec and up the St. Lawrence and the Montagnais on the Sagauney and on two or three other rivers.

"According to de Laet, the Indians from the Gulf of the St. Lawrence were the Canadians. Les Carbox calls them Canadocoa. Sagard in his "Histoire du Canada" and Champlain in his voyages 1632, places the Canadians there." Father Masse who labored at Quebec and Champlain gives Montagnais prayers by him. None of these early writers speak of Algonquins near Quebec or Three Rivers, except as camping for a time. Brobert Relation des Hurons says they were clearly on the Ottawa, the great river of the Algonquins. They comprised the Iroquet petite nation and the Algonquins of the Isle.

1609, Champlain joins a party of Huron, Algonquin and Montagnais in an expedition against the Iroquois to bind these neighboring Indians closer to the French. Father Isaac Jouges named Lake St. George, Lac St. Sacrament.

Champlain in his battle at Crown Point (1809,) says he and his Frenchmen were each in a canoe of the Montagnais. The allies parted company at Chambly Rapids, the Algonquins and Hurons going to their own country and Champlain returning with the Montagnais, the Montagnais paused when they reached the mouth of the Sorel river.

The first Missionaries.

1611, the King's death; Champlain returns to France; sends a French priest back with the Hurons to learn their language.

1614 to 15. Champlain feeling no doubt for his colony, now obtained four Recollects, Fathers Dennis Jamay, John de Olbean, Joseph Le Caron and Bro. Pacificus du Plessis, which he himself took to Quebec. They left Honifleur, April 24, and arrived May 25, 1615. Sagard's Histoire du Canada pp. 12, 36, Le Clerque, v. 1., p. 56, Canada Doc. Series 2, v. 1., p. 2.

Father Le Caron went up ahead of Champlain to Rivieres des Prairies and said the first mass offered in Canada, June 24, 1616.

Father Joseph Caron had been from village to village learning the Huron language. July 11, 1616, Champlain, Father Caron and the superior of the Missions (Father Jamay) return to France; only Father Olbean and Bro. Pacificus, who had been up to teach the children of the French and Indians at Three Rivers, remain.

1620: The Iroquois appear armed to destroy the colony. Recollect, Father Wm. Poulan captured; just about to be burned, exchanged for an Iroquois chief captured by the Hurons. Champlain in his voyages says when he left Quebec in 1624, it had (his colony) only 51 souls.

Sagard historian, Bro. Gabriel Sagard Theodet, also writer of the "Grand voyage du Pais des Hurons (Paris 1632, 1665.) He left Paris with Father Viel, March 18, 1624, and reached in June 28. He collected materials and began the work. Voyages, 1632. Father Nicholas Viel, and Bro. Sagard were sent to the Hurons. Father Caron was already there.

In 1625. The Recollects having just proposed it, the first Jesuit missionaries were sent to this country: Lallement, Masse and Brebeuf. The Recollects received them to their house about 1-4 of a league from the town on St. Charles River. Father Viel, (Recollect) was the first martyr, drowned by the Indians. 1626: three more Jesuits arrived: Fathers Noyrot, Noue and a Brother; Fathers de Brebeuf, de Noue, and de le Roche went to the Hurons. Sagard and Noue penetrated to the Neutes on both sides of the Niagara, Father Masse who had great experience and talent for a new settlement, worked on the St. Lawrence. "All the country of the great River and the streams emptying into it their mission ground."

1633: Mission increases greatly, Recollects had baptised during their stay but a few. Fathers Brebeuf and de Noue had made but few converts. In less than 15 years there were 15 priests and three or four lay brothers at work. The College of the Jesuits was founded at Quebec in 1634-36. Fathers Germain, Chastelaine, and others, came in 1838-9.

In 1638: The mission was commenced among the Montagnis. The first Iroquois christian, 1639: Father Lallement on the Ottawa River and with the Algonquins.

1640: Father Chas. Tursis in Isle of Miscou baptised but one child in two years there. Fathers Julian Perraults and Martin —, in their neighborhoods 1640, the Iroquois beg to get a priest. Algonquin mission commenced fervently about 1644.

After the Jesuits were called in the missions in this country rested entirely with them. The centre of their missions was among the Hurons, probably in Canada all through the intermediate grounds to the Algonquins or other tribes, and drew Algonquins . . . eventually.

Father Cholonec, (a Jesuit,) in a letter dated August, 1715, . . . gives an account of the mission of St. Francis Xavier du Saulte; see Ingraham, p. 83, 115, 119, 120.

Abenakis, the meaning of this Indian name is "men of the East" and it was formerly given to all the tribes on the Eastern coast of the continent, but afterwards restricted to those in Nova Scotia. The territory of the present State of Maine and a part of Canada. "Francis life of Kale" note to the early Jesuite missions in North America, by Rev. William Ingraham, K. I. P., M. A., a Protestant author and corresponding member of the Few York Historical Society.

In Rev. C. I. White's appendix to Darra's History of the Catholic Church, see account in 1646, of Father Deuisllettes among the Abenaki from 1640, for about 30 years.

A letter "from Father Robaud, missionary among the Abenakis," dated "at St. Francis, the 21st of October, 1757," "that gives us for the first time an account of the expedition of Montcalm by an eye-witness." throws not a little light on many points in regard to the Abenakis and their missionary in 1757.

Letter of Father Rale "missionary to the Abanaki, Algonquins, Hurons and Illinois" to his brother:

"AT NANRANTSOUAK, this 12th of }
October, 1723. }

MONSIEUR, MY DEAR BROTHER,

*The Peace of our Lord be with you:—*I cannot longer resist the kind entreaties, . . . I would inform you a little in detail with regard to my occupations and the character of the Indian tribes among which Providence has so long cast my lot . . . It was on the 23d day of July in the year 1689, that I embarked at Rochelle, and after a pleasant voyage arrived at Quebec on the 13th of October. . . I at once applied myself to learn the language of our Indians. I then went to live in a village of the Abenakis nation, situated in a forest which is but three leagues from Quebec. This village was inhabited by 200 Indians, almost all of whom were christians.

Father Chaumont, who had lived 50 years among the Hurons has composed a grammar which is very useful to those who have newly arrived in this mission. Nevertheless a missionary is fortunate if after 10 years of constant toil, he is able to express himself elegantly in their language.

If the Missisquoi Indians belonged to the Abenaki of Maine family they were the sons of Father Rale, as has been quite generally supposed, and as Mr. Perry supposes, as we understand.

“Denouville in 1690: ‘Of all the Indian nations, the Abenaki is the most inclined to Christianity.’”

The date of Father Rale 1689, is 20 years earlier than the date of Kalm, and — years earlier than the date of Robault, p. 953, which is the first certain information of the Jesuits that Mr. Perry gives in his papers; and the information of Father Rale that Father Chaumont had been in his mission 50 years then, is a record of 76 years earlier than Kalm, and 69 years earlier than Robault. We borrow the copy of Mr. Ingraham’s translation of Father Rale’s letter.

Rale written Rasles by Charlevoix; Ralle by the New England historians, but Rale by the missionary, himself. We should have thought Mr. Perry would have found at least the name while at Boston and Harvard of this old missionary to the Abenaki. There is said to be a letter of Father Rale in the manuscript collection of the Mass. Hist. Society,—we should have supposed some of his historical friends there would have referred him to it.

From Shea’s History published in 1855:

Father Rale, long the terror of the New Englanders, is the best known of these [Abenaki missionaries.] Stationed first at the Chaudiere village, we find him from 1695 at Norridgewalk engaged in duties which were his only thought, till his death satisfied a political hatred. The site of his mission, now called Indian Old Point, is a sequestered spot on the Kennebec, where nature, in all her charms, still arrests the attention of the traveller. Rale is not the apostle of the Kennebec. At his arrival the Abenakis were almost, if not quite, all converted, and had a small but well-built church. For a part of the year, the missionary and his flock remained at the village; but when the crops had been sown, they repaired to the seacoast to fish: a travelling tent, like Israel’s tabernacle, being their chapel on the way, and a bark cabin receiving it on the shore. In like manner the winter was spent in hunting, either on the coast or in the mountains.

Soon after beginning his labors here, Rale beheld a new tribe approach his mission. The Amalingans came to ascertain the truth of what they had heard. They listened to his teaching, and embraced the faith and the next season, he visited their camp. Thenceforth they and the Abnakis seem to have coalesced.

Peace was spoken by the English in 1724, but before concluding it, they resolved to make a last effort on the life of Father Rale. Aug. 23, 1724, a small force of English and Mohawks suddenly emerged from the thick copse which surrounded the undefended village. . . . The devoted missionary came forth, hoping by the sacrifice of his own life to save his flock. He reached the mission cross, a shout arose, a volley laid him dead at the foot of that symbol of redemption. Seven chiefs who had gathered around him shared his fate . . . and the church was fired.

Father Rale was greatly beloved among the Indians and it was long before this was forgotten in the English by his Abenaki. Alas! there were barbarites on both sides.

But altogether, these papers of Mr. Perry are valuable, and the Catholic church and the Jesuits are both indebted to him for having given to them the honor in this town of Swanton, of having erected the first Christian church probably in Vermont.

[FROM THE CONGREGATIONAL QUARTERLY.]

JOHN BULKLEY PERRY.

It is manifestly the special function of the Christian preacher to unfold the doctrines concerning the nature and character of God. The atheistic and pantheistic tendencies of the times demand that he shall make known God in creation. There is no better lesson-book outside the Bible, than the earth covered with the tracings of God’s finger. The preacher should be thoroughly acquainted with the word of God, and also a student of his works. We have professors to expound the doctrines of the inspired word; why may we not, in addition, have professors who shall make known the latest and accumulated results arrived at by scientific investigators, so that each student shall be a theologian in the broadest sense—a student of the word and works of God. But one theological school has met this demand. The only endowed professorship of science in our theological schools is that of Oberlin. One person only has occupied that chair. We refer to Prof. Perry. We look upon him as a scientist and preacher.

John Bulkley Perry was born in Richmond, Mass., Dec. 12, 1825; eldest son of Daniel, and grandson of the Rev. David Perry, pastor of the church in the same town about 50 years. His mother was Catharine, youngest daughter of William Aylesworth, of Canaan, N. Y. Both families are of English descent.

When John B. was 6 years of age, his father removed with his family to Burlington, Vt., which place became thenceforth his home. He fitted for college in the old Burlington Academy; entered the University of Vermont in 1843; was graduated in 1847; the same year, united with the First Congregational church in Burlington; soon after visited the Southern States, on account of ill-health brought on by hard study; remained some 3 years, teaching 10 months in Garlandville, Miss.; entered Andover Theo. Sem. in 1850; in Apr. 1853, received approbation to preach from the Andover Association; was graduated Sept. 1857; 1854, became stated supply of the First Presbyterian church, Sandlake, N. Y., 7 months, declining to become pastor; spent a few months as stated supply in Hinesburg, Vt.; accepted a call over the Congregational church in Swanton; ordained and installed Dec. 12, 1855, as pastor; remained 11 years; during the latter part of the great conflict, spent some time in the army—as a delegate in the service of the Christian Commission; afterwards as chaplain of the 20th Vt. Reg.; was present at the taking of Petersburg and at the surrender of Gen. Lee. At the close of his pastorate in Swanton, supplied the church in Wilmington 1 year; declined the pastorate.

June, 1867, desiring to continue his studies, came to Boston, occupying different pulpits until the next autumn; towards the close of 1867, received through Prof. Agassiz an invitation to a position in the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Harvard College, Cambridge, of which he was the director; having accepted, took charge, under Prof. Agassiz, of the department of paleontology; during 1871, accepted his appointment as Professor of Science and Theology in Oberlin College, O., devoting five months to the duties of his professorship, still holding his position with Prof. Agassiz, and giving the rest of the year to the duties growing out of his connection with the Museum.

He married Lucretia Leavenworth Willson, only daughter of Hon. Francis and Mrs. R. L. Willson, of Hinesburg, Mar. 5, 1856, who died Mar. 28, 1857, leaving an infant son, yet living, Francis Willson Perry. Mr. Perry married his second wife, Mrs. Sophia Harmon Wright, daughter of the late Dr. Ezekiel and Mrs. Sophia Smith Harmon, of Clarkson, N. Y., at South Bend, Ind., May 27, 1867, who survives him.

From his youth one strong purpose marked his every endeavor. Whatever he undertook he did well. He worked well, and in what little time he gave to relaxation, he played well. He was in college alike champion of the ball-ground and of the subtler metaphysics. He exercised with vigor that he might study the more, and robbed the play-ground that he might be at his work, and he never outgrew this habit.

The Rev. Mr. Ferrin says of his collegiate life: "He was known as a very sedate, studious man. . . His standing as a scholar was good, his deportment always correct. His more intimate associates were the Christian men of the college." His tendencies were towards metaphysics, which branch of study doubtless had much to do in forming his style of thought and language. During the last 2 years of his college course he was especially interested in the subject of geology. A thousand men may have a purpose, while only one of the number can carry it out. System is required. One may be ambitious, yet never realize his desires. Mr. Perry systematically pursued his purpose. As an example of his method, we find in his diary the plan to which he adhered the year after leaving college :

From five to five three-quarters A. M., study of Scripture, reflection and devotion.

From five three-quarters to six and a half A. M., German.

From eight to ten A. M., Natural Sciences.

From ten to ten and a half A. M., French.

From ten and a half to eleven and a half A. M., Greek.

From eleven and a half A. M. to twelve M., Latin.

From two to three P. M., History, Politics, etc.

From three to four P. M., English Poetry.

From four to five P. M., German.

From five to six P. M., Philosophy.

From nine to nine and a half P. M., Bible, devotions, etc.

A system thorough as the above he carried out through life in everything which he undertook. He says: "I do not wish to enter upon the practice of any profession until I am about 30 years old." He was ordained and installed for his great work upon his 30th birthday. He says: "If I should live thus long, I would spend the time until then in preparing myself for the full performance of the duties of life. I would then devote myself entirely to the good of my fellows for 15 or 20 years; and then . . . I would withdraw from the public, and endeavor to become better prepared for death. Of course one should be prepared for death at all times, yet it seems peculiarly fitting to spend the close of one's life in closer communion with one's Maker."

We pass back again to his diary on his birthday:

"I trust I may some day be able to reconcile the sciences with each other, and especially with religion. I am beginning to look upon that as the great work of my life. It is more than has yet been fairly accomplished, so far as I know, and more than I can hope to do satisfactorily. I would direct all my efforts to the unfolding of my own powers, so as to be able to understand the Scriptures, and be able to justify the ways of God to man. I have for a long time felt in this way; and O! that I may have strength to accomplish it, if it will tend at all to the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom."

Theology and science; the Scriptures and nature; the inspired revelation and the direct work of God! With a faith undaunted he took up the problem. He held most tenaciously to the Scriptures, and all the great Evangelical doctrines. It may also be as truly said, he honored the works of God, inasmuch as they revealed to him the excellencies of the Divine nature. As a friend says:

"If he exalted the works, putting them and the word of God nearer side by side than other men had done, it was because he had studied the works more than other men, thought upon them more, and saw more of God in them. He believed that the two, as revelations of God and from God, supplemented each the other, never opposed or denied each other. He hesitated to interpret nature so that it would seem to deny what he believed was taught in the Bible. So, too, he hesitated to interpret the Bible so that it would deny what he believed to be taught in nature. This position certainly made Mr. Perry a devout student of the word of God, and not only an enthusiastic but also a devout student of the works of God."

This idea of his youth he carried out. All through his ministry he recreated where he might find the most of nature. The first place of his ministry, Swanton, was washed by the waters of Lake Champlain. Always faithful to his people, he yet found time to explore most fully the geologic formations of the region.

In 1860, the celebrated geologist, Prof. Jules Marcou, came from Zurich, Switzerland. Soon after his arrival he received a letter from Mr. Berrand, Prague, Austria, requesting him to inquire concerning the geologic formation of Vermont; for, said Mr. Berrand, the state report is not accurate. The report had said that the eastern and western shores of Lake Champlain were composed of the same strata. The views of Mr. Berrand agreed with those of the late Dr. Emmons, of New York, namely, that the rocks upon the eastern side of the lake are Taconic, while those of the western shore are Silurian.

While engaged in his researches in the town of Georgia, Prof. Marcou was met by a farmer, who suggested the Rev. Mr. Perry, of Swanton, some 10 miles distant, was well acquainted with the strata of the whole region. No further introduction was needed. Prof. Marcou at once sought his acquaintance, and was agreeably surprised to find him fully settled upon the same theory as that of Mr. Berrand. No amount of persuasion could turn the inflexible parson from the idea, although at that time he stood almost alone in his belief, no geologist in this country supporting him. The admiration of Prof. Marcou (now a resident of Cambridge) was enlisted because of such original and fearless research, and this friendship, so strongly cemented by a common taste, was perhaps the great turning-point in Mr. Perry's future. His was then a comparatively common knowledge, yet, by arduous exertions, in 5 years he was fitted to take the highest position in the country as a paleontologist.

He was pastor, also school superintendent. It was not uncommon for him to examine a class in reading or grammar, while the handle of his hammer protruded from the satchel suspended at his side. A few in the parish thought their pastor should be engaged in something better than "cracking rocks"; he kept on "cracking," they filled up the chinks of their walls with the pieces he had thrown aside; he traversed every meadow, field and forest.

He exemplified his idea, was preacher and scientist; it is difficult to speak of him in either distinct capacity. His mind was truly metaphysical. He was subtle in argument, but clear and decisive in stating his points. He never spared an opponent what he termed the truth. He elaborated every point, allowing no hearer to take or receive an unexplained suggestion. This may have been regarded as his chief fault. Some might have said he explained too much. But this characteristic, if a fault in his preaching, was a crowning excellence in his demonstrations of science.

Men have thought more in theology than in science; hence, while the preacher, as a teacher of religion, is to address his congregation as learners, there are yet certain ideas they have thought out, which he need not explain. But where a thousand are somewhat conversant with theology, not more than one has investigated the laws of nature; therefore, from the very structure of his mind, and from his conviction of the needs of his audiences, he was more brilliant in the discussions of science than of theology.

During all his ministry he gave occasional lectures on his favorite themes at Brattleboro, Bennington, North Adams, Mass., Mount Vernon Church, Boston, etc. His lectures in Wilmington, during his residence there, created such an enthusiasm as is seldom seen; while, at the same time, both church and Sabbath school grew from 40 to 250 in a year's time.

In the "Congregational Quarterly" of April, 1870, Mr. Perry discussed "Sundry Objections to Geology" with the hand and brain of a master. In a foot-note he suggested a want greatly felt in our theological seminaries: A distinct department having for its aim the relation of the sciences to the Bible. So pervaded with piety and rich with learning was the whole article, so manifest the suggested demand, in a few months, he was appointed a professor of such a department, in Oberlin Theo. Sem. and so was the dream of his youth fulfilled; at his death he stood alone in a sphere destined to widen with the years.

So clear was his conception of his duties at the Museum, in Cambridge, Prof. Agassiz says he should have regarded it an intrusion, had he asked him what his labors were. He labored there but 5 years; so long as the museum stands, will his work be carried on as himself had planned it. He had classified the fossils of the ancient geologic formations; had nearly completed a classification of the fossils of the tertiary period; had published several treatises in pamphlet form, besides contributing a large number of articles to various magazines and papers.

Prof. Agassiz has given the order in which his collected writings should be arranged. 1. Theological Geology. 2. Tertiaries; 3. The Lake Champlain Series; 4. Massachusetts Geology; 5. Glacial Phenomena; 6. Paleozoic Corals; 7. Foliated Rocks; 8. Change of Level of Continents.

Dec. 18, 1867, the "Boston Society of Natural History," were convened at their rooms. A stranger to the large majority, read a paper: "Queries on the Red Sandstone of Vermont." As he advanced in his theory, Prof. Agassiz inquired his name. It was the Rev. Mr. Perry of Vermont. At the close of the article the Professor arose, and spoke of his interest both in the theme and the essayist. He said he had, from time to time, heard geologists discuss this same topic, "but now," said he, "I know who furnished them with the materials which they used." At the close of the proceedings, he invited Mr. Perry to come to the museum at a certain date; and then and there offered him the place, which he, having accepted, held until his death. The mutual interest of the two in the studies of science was only equalled by their mutual friendship.

"The only fault I have ever seen in him," says the great naturalist, "was his propensity to overwork. I sent him South thinking the excursion would give him recreation, but he worked the more; and when his call came to accept a professorship in Oberlin, I said, Go! it will be a means of rest. But the recreation brought only a larger amount of labor."

The resolutions passed by the Oberlin Faculty, and the letters of President Fairchild and Professor Mead, disclose his success there. Prof. Mead says: "Prof. Perry was very successful in exciting in the students a deep interest in the study of the natural sciences. His letters were acknowledged to be very able; his own enthusiasm for his favorite department stirred up a like enthusiasm in his pupils. At the Theological Institute at the close of the summer term he was to discuss Darwinianism. A large audience, clergymen and others, had gathered, from interest both in the subject and in the speaker. For more than an hour and a half he held the undivided attention of his audience to a carefully stated presentation of the whole matter, in which he so thoroughly handled the subject as to elicit from all expressions of the greatest satisfaction. Rev. Dr. Gulliver, President of Knox College, our guest, on returning home remarked, 'That was a wonderful discussion of the subject.'"

Says the same authority: "Professor Perry was more than a scientific man—he was one of the most earnest of Christians. It was a matter of common remark that science to him was religion itself. All nature was bathed in the light of Divine love, and he had none of the difficulties which so many scientific men have, of looking through nature up to nature's God."

While in the seminary at Andover, encouraged by the late Prof. Bela B. Edwards, he studied several Semitic languages, and such was his proficiency, in the venerated professor's estimation, for a time he continued his studies in this direction with a view to a professorship in Hebrew or Oriental literature. Soon, however, he gave up the idea, and bent every endeavor to his preparation for his chosen work, the ministry. He was conversant with 12 languages. "I have hardly known which to admire most," says Prof. Agassiz, "his thorough understanding of his profession, or his broad culture. He seemed at home in every department of literature."

"There are four things," writes another, "which impressed me the more, the more I knew him; these were, his sincere goodness, his intellectual ability and culture, his great devotion to the cause of science and religion, and his remarkable modesty." The above seems to us a clear analysis of his character.

His five last months of labor were in Oberlin. At the close of his duties there he visited Dubuque, Iowa; with a party explored a cave near the city, entered it at 6 o'clock Saturday evening, intending to spend but 4 hours in inspection; advancing, when any other position became impossible, upon his hands and knees, found new specimens of a Father's handiwork, came forth at 2 o'clock Sunday morning, but not until the work of death was begun within him. He preached twice that day in Dubuque, the lamp burning brightly, notwithstanding his weakness, from over-exertion, and the incipient illness begun; continued his explorations another week, when the Sabbath found him at Humboldt College, Springvale, Iowa. Twice he preached before the College that day, his theme, "God in Creation," but when he laid aside his "brief" that night, his work as a preacher was done. The next Sabbath he was at his home in Cambridge,—only to die. The typhoid, which had been upon him for several days, had become more violent. The light of the lamp began to flicker. In his sickness, as in health, in the delirium of fever he was preacher and scientist still; would examine specimens, lay them by, and the next moment was in the place of prayer, urging the claims of the Bible, persuading some doubter to come to the Saviour.

Having rested for a season, his face suddenly lighted with joy, he exclaimed, "Enchantingly! Entrancingly!" Struck by the expression of his face Mrs. Perry asked, "What is so beautiful?" "O! all about us." To a kind watcher, he said "You cannot help me; the physician cannot; but Christ can." "Is Christ very near you?" "Most certainly." The evening before he died, he said to his wife and his brother, "Stand up! stand up!" They raised him in the bed, with hands extended he slowly and reverently pronounced the benediction, his last spoken words. May that benediction rest upon all who knew him! A cloudless morning, Oct. 3, 1872, he sweetly fell asleep. The lamp ceased to burn.

He was a faithful minister; he was an honored scientist; and he will always be remembered as an expounder of the relations between the two—an interpreter of the word and works of God.

WORDS OF REV. A. P. PEABODY, D. D., OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY AT HIS FUNERAL.

In an age when scepticism and bigotry have conspired to divorce what God has joined, all honor to the man of science who will not forsake his place at the Saviour's feet,—to the Christian who is not afraid of the truth of God wherever embodied and however manifested. This honor belongs with a peculiar fitness to our friend, than whom we have known no more intrepid disciple of science, no closer or more loving follower of the Lord Jesus.

It is a touching and a significant reminiscence of our friend's last hours, that science and religion were blended in the febrile wanderings of his mind, his thoughts alternating between the prayer-meeting and the lecture room.

May not this double yearning of the intellect, bewildered, yet not obscured, have had an onward pointing to the heavenly life on which he has entered, where in the "tree of life which had twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month," we have typified for us the boundless diversity of pursuits in which ransomed souls may glorify God? We cannot doubt that it is his blessedness now, in clearer light and with keener vision, to continue the research into the wonders and glories of the creation which had been his chosen work on earth, in ever new forms and aspects of the Divine handiwork to trace the Maker's signature which he here so loved to read in the fossil records and types of animated nature.

The following is a list of Prof. Perry's publications:—1857. A discourse on "Rejoicing in Christ." 1861. "Four Discourses of Life and Death; or, the Recompense of the Righteous and of the Wicked on Earth,"—part of a series on "The Penalty of Sin." 1861. "Two Discourses on Justification before God by Faith in Christ." 1862. A paper in Secretary Adam's Annual Report (Vermont,) p. 87 and seq., entitled, "Geology in our Common Schools." [Marred by typographical errors.] 1864. A Discourse on "The Resurrection." From time to time, various translations, more especially from the French and the German, which were published without signature.

During the last 20 years, in various different publications, a considerable number of original papers, usually printed as anonymous contributions.

1868. "Queries on the Red Sandstone of Vermont, and its relation to other Rocks."—Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist. vol. xi., Dec. 1867. 1870. "A discussion of Sundry Objections to Geology." 1871. "The Eozoon Limestones of Eastern Massachusetts."—From the Proceedings of the Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist. April 19, 1871. 1872. "A Review of Sir Charles Lyell's Students' Elements of Geology."—From the Bibliotheca Sacra for July, 1872. 1872, Jan. "Hints Towards the Post-Tertiary History of New England, from Personal Study of the Rocks," with strictures on Dana's "Geology of the New Haven Region."

PREFATORY.

Before giving the history of Swanton to the public, I deem it proper to make a brief statement of how I came to be connected with it.

About the year 1860, I was requested to deliver a lecture before the Lyceum at Swanton Falls. I chose for my subject the history of Swanton, and prepared a lecture as full and accurate as the limited time would allow. Soon after this the Rev. J. B. Perry, the then minister of the Congregational church in Swanton, commenced to write a history of the town, with the view of its being published. To assist him in this work he had the free use of my lecture, to which he made considerable additions, especially to that part treating of the early history, and this he prepared complete for the press down to about 1780.

Previous to the publication of the volume of the Gazetteer which was to embrace the towns of this county, Mr. Perry removed from Swanton and became professor in Harvard University. His time then being fully occupied, he failed from that, or some other cause, to complete the history later than about 1780. And soon after this, he was stricken by the hand of death, and cut off in the midst of his years and usefulness, as shown in his given biography, and at the earnest solicitation of those interested in the work, and feeling there should be a history of the town written before all the old land-marks were removed, and no one else seeming disposed to undertake the work, were considerations sufficient to induce me to assume the task, which has been performed under serious disadvantages, having many men in my employ, and a large marble business, which has required my personal and almost constant attention during all the time this work has been on my hands, which with advancing years must be my apology, if any is needed, for the imperfections that may be found in the work.

I would here acknowledge my indebtedness to Mrs. J. B. Perry, for furnishing me, at my request, with the material procured for this work by her husband before his decease, which was very valuable, but a very small portion of it, however, was prepared for the press.

I would further state, that the people of the town of Swanton are under deep and lasting obligation to Mr. Perry for the unwearied pains he took to obtain correct information regarding its history, and especially that part prepared by him and printed under his name.

Taking into account the circumstances under which I have labored in writing this history, the task has been severe, and I look for and expect no other reward than the consciousness of having done something which may be beneficial, and I hope give interest and pleasure to the people of Swanton when I shall have passed "To that bourne from whence no traveller returns."

GEORGE BARNEY.

CIVIL HISTORY.

The charter of the town of Swanton was granted A. D. 1763, from which we make a few extracts :

Province of New Hampshire, George the 3d, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. To all persons to whom these presents shall come. Greeting: Know ye that of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion for the due encouragement of settling a new plantation within our said Province, by and with the advise of our trusty and well beloved Benning Wentworth, Esq., our Governor and commander in chief of our said Province, have upon the conditions given, granted and by these presents do give and grant in equal shares unto our loving subjects, inhabitants of our said province of New Hampshire . . . their heirs and assigns forever, whose names are entered on this Grant . . . to be divided to and among them into seventy equal shares, all that tract or parcel of land lying, etc.

It then gives the boundaries "containing 2,340 acres, which is hereby incorporated into a township by the name of Swanton." The grantees were to hold the lands on certain conditions, some of which I will mention :

1st. They must plant and cultivate 5 acres of land within 5 years, for every 50 acres that they possess.

2d. That all white and other pine trees within said township fit for masting "Our Royal Navy," be carefully preserved for that use, and none to be felled without our special license on pain of forfeiture and other penalties.

3d. A tract of land as near the centre as the land will admit to be laid out for town lots. One of an acre each to be allotted to each grantee.

4th. Yielding and paying to us, our heirs, &c., for the space of 10 years, to be computed from the date hereof. The rent of one ear of Indian corn only on the 25th day of December, annually.

5th. After the expiration of 10 years they were to pay forever one shilling, proclamation money, for every 100 acres, on the 25th day of December annually, commencing 1773.

According to Williams' History of Vermont, page 230, "One shilling proclamation money," which was the annual rent reserved to the crown on every hundred acres, was equal in value to nine pence sterling, or about 18 cents. Different dates have been assigned to this charter in different historical works, it may therefore be well to give an exact transcript of the concluding part.

In testimony whereof we have caused the seal of our said province to be affixed. Witness, Benning Wentworth, Esqr., our governor and commander in chief of our said province, the 17th day of August, in the year of our Lord Christ, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, and in the 3d year of our reign.

B. WENTWORTH.

By his excellency's command, with advice of council.

T. ATCHINSON, Junior, Sec'y.

Province of New Hampshire, Aug. 17th, 1763, recorded in the 3d book of charters, page 10 and 11.

P. S. ATKINSON, Jun., Sec'y.

On reading the charter a few thoughts suggest themselves: 1st, "Our Royal Navy," for which the pines were reserved, seemed to have been then as it is at present, the pride of the British nation, and their peculiar care for that seemed to extend to all their transactions. 2d, the term, "Our loving subjects," was not probably much used by the King after 1776.

3d, The disposition to hold the soil in fee by requiring an annual rent.

4th, Christianity is recognized by the reservation of lands for its propagation, and for its ministers.

The far-seeing statesmen of those days saw clearly that the Christian religion must be at the foundation of all social order, and that all laws should be based upon it to insure the safety, happiness and tranquility of society.

It is to be remarked, that there are on the back of the charter the names of Josiah Goodrich and 63 others, who were original grantees, to which were conceded 64 shares of land. There is also on the back, a plan of the township, with one part marked B. W. This plan is a square, excepting one side which is irregular and represented as washed by the Lake. On the back of the charter there are likewise found the following reserves:

Two shares, of 500 acres, marked B. W. as the Governor's right, and to be accounted as two of the within shares; one share as the right of the incorporated society in Great Britain for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts; one share as a glebe or right for the church of England established by law; one share or right of land in fee for the first settled minister of the Gospel; and one share for the support of schools, "a right for the benefit of a school in said town forever." There also occurs on the back of the charter the following: "Surveyor General's office, state of Vt., Sept. 2, 1782. Recorded in the first book of charters, New Hampshire Grants, pages 45, 46 and 47. I. Allen, Surveyor General.

We here give a list of the names of

GEOGRAPHY AND NAME OF SWANTON.

The Missisquoi river, which, in all its windings, is said to be 75 miles or more in length, empties into a bay of the same name. It has 3 principal mouths, called the South, Middle and East branches, through which the water flows at all times, and there are three or four other outlets during high water, at which time it usually overflows its banks. Some three or four miles from its mouth, the waters of the western bank finding their way into Maquam bay by way of a creek of that name, and also into Charcoal creek, which is some three-fourths of a mile south of, and running nearly parallel with the river. The waters of the east bank find their way through Dead creek into Goose bay. The river is navigable for canal boats and sloops during the early part of the season, when the waters of the lake set back to the falls. When the lake is low it prevents large vessels from ascending the river on account of the bar at its mouth. The river enters Swanton from the east, about 2 miles from the village, after making a detour called the Bow, encircling three or four square miles, including the village on its east bank, it strikes the line of Highgate again about 2 miles below the village; at the north, and from this point to its mouth, separates Swanton from Highgate.

Missisquoi, according to tradition, means "much grass," or "much water-fowl," either name being expressive of a marked characteristic of the low marshy lands near its mouth, and between it and Maquam bay.

The name of Swanton, it is said, was given to the town in honor of an officer in the British service, Capt. Wm. Swanton. He was a soldier in the French war, and had served in the reduction of Louisburgh in 1758. In 1762, he took up his residence in Bath, Me., where he passed the remainder of his days. He was a ship-builder and skilled in his trade.—Coolidge & Mansfield's History and Description of New England General and Local.

The township, as laid out, is very irregular in its shape, though, according to the charter, one would suppose it was intended to be nearly square. Its greatest length from N. W. to S. E. is about 20 miles. In the last-mentioned corner of the town there is a high elevation known as Swanton Hill. The lower lands to the north and west of this hill are designated as East Swanton. A north and south ridge, some two miles farther to the west, is called Swanton Center. This is on the direct road from St. Albans to Highgate Falls. The lower falls in the river being some 6 miles from its mouth, with the lands adjacent, is called Swanton Falls. The delta on the west is sometimes known as West Swanton. It was an island, but can now hardly claim that appellation, as the sand on the Maquam shore has completely filled the mouth of Maquam creek, which, being thus filled, prevents that part formerly known as the Island from being completely surrounded by water, except a small portion of the year. In the survey of Wm. Brasier, made in 1762, Maquam creek is called Missisquoi rivulet, and the portion of the delta to the west, which was then an island, was designated as Missisquoi island. From an early date the name most frequently applied is the vulgar one of Hog island, and like other vulgar names when once fastened, it is hard to change for something better. The writer can well remember hearing when a boy, people say this name was given because it was customary at a very early day to drive hogs there, and let them remain during a full season or more to fatten upon the butter-nuts, beechnuts, walnuts and acorns, all of which were very plentiful. The most appropriate name is West Swanton, and by this name it is to be hoped it will hereafter be known.

The waters of Maquam bay wash the southerly shore of West Swanton. On Claude Joseph Southers' map of 1779, it was called East bay. North-easterly of this bay is a large marsh. This marsh is said to have been produced by an earthquake in 1755, an account of which may be found in the narrative of Jemima Howe. It is called the Pitch-Pine marsh, as it is, or has been mostly covered with that kind of timber. It affords also a great abundance of huckleberries or blueberries, which are gathered almost every year and taken away by wagon-loads.

THE CHANGE OF PROPRIETORSHIP.

It does not appear that any of the original grantees ever settled in Swanton, or even visited the lands which were so generously conceded to them. The time was not long before changes began to occur in the titles of the lands. One sold his right and another, until in the end the whole township had passed into other hands. The first change of this kind on record is the following :

August 12, 1776, James Stoadley, Esq., of Portsmouth in the Province of New Hampshire, as an original proprietor in Swanton "in consideration of forty Spanish milled dollars," deeded to Giles Alexander, "yeoman of Boston" his share of land in Swanton.

Another transfer soon followed dated Sept. 1, 1766, Giles Alexander "for and in consideration of 60 pounds lawful money," deeded to Stephen Keys of Pomfret, Co. of Windham and colony of Conn., merchant, all his right and title to lands in Swanton.

Several other original proprietors soon sold out their rights which passed into the hands of Israel Dickinson, one of the original grantees, who also in turn disposed of his claims in Swanton. Thus we find that June 9th, 1773, "Israel Dickinson of Pittsford, in the County of Berkshire and Province of Massachusetts Bay in New England, Gentleman, for the consideration of 20 pounds lawful money," deeded to Levi Allen of Salisbury, in Litchfield Co., and colony of Conn., in New England, merchant, his right and title to "one fifth part of the township of Swanton, excepting the governor's lot and six others."

Other grantees had likewise disposed of their rights or shares in the township. The purchasers were Samuel Hunt, Arad Hunt, Jona. Hunt, Jos. Stebbins, Wm. Symes and Elisha Hunt, not one of them being an original proprietor. At different times during the year 1773, the last mentioned persons deeded to Levi Allen all their rights and titles to lands in Swanton. It also appears during the same year, 19 grantees besides, all, or nearly all there were left, deeded their shares of lands in this town to Levi Allen. Mr. Allen thus became the owner of nearly all the land in Swanton.

PROPRIETORS' MEETINGS PRIOR TO 1790.

According to the charter the grantees were to hold their first meeting for the choice of town officers, Tuesday, June 20, 1763. The governor having appointed Capt. Samuel Hunt to give due notice, and to act as moderator of the meeting. It was probably duly held, though there is no record to be found of its proceedings.

March 23d, 1774. "The proprietors of the township of Swanton, a township lately granted under the great seal of N. H., now in the Province of N. Y., met according to a legal warning in the 'Courant,' Conn. at the dwelling house of Capt. Saml. Moon, Inn holder in Salisbury, in Litchfield Co. and colony of Conn."

Such was the language of their record. It might here be remarked that in deeds, and in the various proceedings of proprietors from July 20, 1764, until the declaration of Independence on the part of Vermont in 1777, Swanton is spoken of as in the Province of N. Y. Heman Allen was made moderator of this meeting, and Ira Allen was chosen "Proprietors' clerk for said township. They agreed to lay out the town and voted that each proprietor may, at his own cost and charge, lay out his right as soon as he shall think proper."

They authorized the clerk to record all deeds of sales and survey bills, if he were paid a reasonable sum for the recording, when they were brought to hand, and decided that all survey bills should be recorded as received without regard to dates, and that those first recorded should be good. They adjourned to meet Oct. 3, 1774, at "Fort Frederick in Colchester, on Onion River." This Fort Frederick was at Winooski Falls, where Ira Allen then resided. There was also a meeting at the same place, May 1, 1775. No business of importance was done at either of these meetings. The next meeting was in Sunderland, at the house of Brig.-Gen'l. Ethan Allen. It was "voted that His Excellency, Thomas Chittenden, be moderator of the meeting," and "that Col. Ira Allen be proprietors' clerk of Swanton" and treasurer. On examining the former proceedings of the proprietors, it was "voted, that considering the situation of the town, considering that the New Hampshire grants are claimed by New York, considering the expense of defending and settling them, and considering the proceedings of the people of the New Hampshire grants before the late revolution, we do hereby ratify and confirm all the votes and proceedings of the several proprietors' meetings, as heretofore recorded in this book respecting the division of lands, recording of survey bills and every other matter and thing, as fully and amply as though said proprietors' meetings had been held under the present laws and customs of this State."

SHERIFF'S SALE.

Nov. 24, 1784. "I Abraham Ives, sheriff of the County of Rutland, and Collector of the land tax granted by the General Assembly of the State of Vermont in Oct. 1783, for the town of Swanton, in the County of Rutland, aforesaid, by virtue of a certain statute law of this State, entitled an act for the purpose of levying the respective taxes therein contained and regulating the mode for collecting the same for the purpose of raising so much money as had remained unpaid of said tax in said town of Swanton, until the sale hereinafter mentioned, and attending charges, for and in consideration of one pound and nineteen shillings, lawful money to me in hand paid by Ira Allen, of Sunderland, in County of Bennington, and State of Vermont, have given, granted, bargained and sold and by these presents do . . . to Ira Allen, . . . one whole right or share of land in the town of Swanton, aforesaid, Israel Dickinson being the original grantee.

There are fifty-seven deeds of this kind to Ira Allen, signed and sealed at the date above given, all signed by Abraham Ives, sheriff and collector and witnessed by Levi Allen and N. Chipman, and acknowledged before Obadiah Noble, Justice of the Peace.

By this transaction it appears that most if not all the land in Swanton, belonging to Levi Allen, was sold for taxes in 1784, and purchased by Ira Allen. This is what is known as the Ives vendue sale, and it is probable—from the face of the transaction—that an arrangement was made between the two Allen brothers, that this course should be resorted to in order to confirm the titles to the land. There was also conveyed to Ira Allen by deeds from Nathaniel Chipman, two original rights or shares of lands in Swanton. One deed dated Jan. 30, 1786, the other Oct. 31, 1786. It thus appears that in 1786, the title of at least 59 shares of Swanton lands, was vested in Ira Allen. From some cause not easily explained at this day, Mr. Allen suffered these same lands to be again sold for taxes by vendue sale, and bid them in again himself, receiving deeds for 59 original shares from Noah Chittenden, sheriff and collector, there are ten of these deeds, all dated Sept. 4, 1789, M. Chittenden and Bill Bartlett being witnesses, and all acknowledged Feb. 9, 1792, before Martin Chittenden, justice of the peace.

By this it appears that Ira Allen got his title to Swanton lands, confirmed by repurchasing at a second vendue sale. Having thus become principle proprietor, he accordingly took measures to promote the settlement of the town.

SETTLEMENT AT THE FALLS UNDER NEW HAMPSHIRE GRANTS.

The war of the American Revolution at length came to a close, and with it were introduced many changes. A definitive treaty was signed at Paris, Sept. 3, 1783, in which the English relinquished their claims to lands in this vicinity lying South of 45 degrees of North latitude. They thus recognized the independence of the people of the United States of America, and of course at the same time that of those inhabiting the State, then known as New Connecticut, alias Vermont.

The most of the lands in the town of Swanton having become the property of Ira Allen, as we have seen, he made speedy efforts to avail himself of the valuable water-power furnished at the lower falls, on the Missisquoi river. Preparations were undoubtedly made by him to improve the water-power, and effect the settlement of the town, shortly after the close of the Revolutionary war. In harmony with this is a letter of his to Samuel Whitelaw, dated 1785, containing directions in respect to the survey of lands in this vicinity, probably a more specific survey and laying out of lots than had heretofore been made. Winter is designated as the time, as the marsh would then be frozen. In the year 1786, Mr. Allen employed Mr. Thomas Butterfield as his agent, to come on here and make a beginning. He made his way from Burlington or Colchester, where he had been residing for a while, to Swanton, through the woods guided by blazed trees. There were at that time at the Falls only a few Indians and a Dutchman whose house with the wigwams of the Indians were located on the flat land on east side of the river, some 30 rods above the present dam. During the latter part of this year or early the next, Mr. Butterfield brought his family to Swanton. This was no easy task at that day; there being no roads, he walked himself while his wife rode on horse back. Only a few articles could be taken, and these of the simplest kind. They were lashed to the saddle or otherwise fastened to the horse. Such was the manner in which the pioneers moved their families and effects at that early day. Not far from this time Jonathan Butterfield, a brother of the preceding, made his way through the woods and located at the Falls. Settlers also began to come in to different parts of the town.

About this time, viz., 1787, the first to locate in the neighborhood of Mr. Hilliker, before mentioned, was Mr. John Wagoner. He was of low Dutch extraction, came with his family from the South, probably by boat or on ice, and settled about 2 miles below the falls, on the southerly side of the river, and directly opposite the former Indian village and church before spoken of, the place at this time (1882) being owned by a son of Rufus Barney. The next to settle in this vicinity was Adam Millis. He also came from the south, bringing his wife and children, and located about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile further up the river on the same side. Orange Smith was next to arrive, bringing with him his wife and one child. He was soon followed by Michael Lampman, John Hogle, Stephen Lampman and Henry Lampman. The last-mentioned lived on what is now known as the Rood place, some half mile below where Wagoner first settled. About this time (1789), also, Conrad Asselstyne settled on land south of where Wagoner located, on the road crossing from the river to Maquam bay.

Such is the order in which the above settlers located, according to the recollection of Mr. John Hilliker. The land on which a part of them settled was within the limits of what was at that time a part of Highgate, subsequently annexed to Swanton. Most of these settlers, probably all, came previous to 1790. John Wagoner's name is attached to a writing which indicates he was living on the Missisquoi river in 1787. Conrad Asselstyne was selectman in 1790, while Stephen Lampman was chosen moderator of the town meeting, and 1st selectman in 1791, offices which would hardly be conferred upon them the first year after their settlement.

We next notice the settlements on what is generally known as the West road, it being the direct road from St. Albans to Swanton Falls. Among the first, and probably the first to establish themselves on this road, was Asa Abell. He settled on the land on which there is at present a large lime kiln, and has been for some years known as the Gadcomb farm. The deed to his land was from Silas Hathaway, and was the original right of Theodore Atkinson, Jr., dated Oct. 10, 1788. His house, which was the first built in this part of the town, stood a little to the east from the present lime-kiln.

On Mr. Abell's arrival, he camped for the night under the western base of the ledge which crops out just to the west of the lime-kiln. Having built a fire against the ledge, he was getting comfortably arranged, when he heard a rustling noise overhead. On looking up, he saw a huge bear on the edge of the overhanging rocks peering down upon him. The discovery being thus timely made, he was able to make himself secure against the intrusion of such an unwelcome acquaintance at such an unseasonable hour.

Some time during the years of 1777 or '78, Lemuel Lasell came to Swanton from Lanesboro, Mass. A man by the name of Bowen came with him, and lived with him for several years. There being as yet no roads from St. Albans to Swanton, they found their way, like their predecessors, by means of marked trees. Mr. Lasell made his claim to the farm at present (1882) owned by C. H. Mead, Esq. His house, which was the second erected in this neighborhood, was on the ground nearly opposite to where the shop stood for many years owned by C. H. Bullard, and used as a carriage shop, but is at this date demolished. Mr. Lasell was unmarried when he came to Swanton, and during the first two years of his residence here he kept "bachelor's hall." Mr. Abell and Mr. Lasell, as it is said, were the first settlers between St. Albans and Swanton Falls. The house of Mr. Lasell was only a few rods north of the geographical center of the town.

Very nearly the same time, though a little later, Mr. Franklin Palmer came and settled on land known of late years as the Widow Lasell place, owned now (1882), by Dennison Dorman, Esq., being the place immediately south of where the road leading to Sheldon intersects the west road. He soon after died of consumption, being the first of the recent settlers, so far as is now known, to die in Swanton. He was buried near where he lived, and it is said that the west road runs over the exact spot. His remains were afterward removed to the graveyard which was finally laid out in the neighborhood.

Another settler, whose name cannot now be ascertained, died in the same vicinity; for his coffin a log was used, it being first split in equal parts, and each hollowed out so as to receive the body. This was done, it is said, in conformity with his directions previous to his death.

The writer was informed by Mr. John Pratt, previous to his death, that he, Pratt, was confident that John Nokes was the first regular inhabitant, aside from Indians, of that part of the town known as West Swanton. He with his wife and five children came all the way from Whitehall in a canoe, about the year 1787, and landed on Hog Island, now known as West Swanton, near its southern extremity, and made his claim to the land heretofore known as the Richard Moore farm, and erected his dwelling there. He was of Dutch extraction. At one time his provision being nearly exhausted, his family was nearly at the point of starvation, when a fine large moose came running past the house from the woods and plunged into the lake. He at once pursued him with his canoe, and soon overtook and butchered him in the water, and brought him to the shore; he considered the occurrence providential, and that by it their lives were saved. Some time after this, when he had been there two years or more, he heard hounds bark, and the next day went in that direction, when he came upon the tracks of two men; these tracks he followed till he came to the Falls, about 5 miles, where he found Jonathan and Thomas Butterfield, who had been out hunting the day previous. This was the first that Mr. Nokes knew of there being any other persons than himself and family in town, and it may well be imagined that he was overjoyed at finding neighbors so near. He after this cut a path and came often to the falls to visit his new neighbors. This account Mr. Pratt told the writer he had from Mr. Nokes' own lips.

About three years after the arrival of Mr. Nokes, Thomas Clark settled on the west shore of the island, about a mile west of Mr. Nokes. According to the recollection of Mr. John Hilliker, he brought with him a wife and one or two children. The writer can well recollect hearing Thomas Clark, Jr., dwell most eloquently on the degeneracy and effeminacy of the present generation, and hold them up in contrast with the early settlers, and tell of the times when they were obliged to drink birch bark tea to keep soul and body together; and grind their corn in a plumping mill, which was simply a hard wood stump, hollowed out, making a large mortar, in which they placed the corn, and then pounded it with a pestle made of a log properly rounded and attached to a spring-pole, pins being driven in each side of the pestle, by which the operator worked it up and down on the corn, and in this way cracked it to the desirable fineness.

Asa Lewis came on not long after Mr. Clark, and settled to the north of him. Joseph Sumerix arrived about this time but never owned any land. Mr. Daniel Beagle also came at a very early day, but the year is not known; he lived for many years at the north end of the island, and died there but a few years since.

From the foregoing it appears there were four or five points in town where settlers began to locate and make claims for themselves previous to 1790. The first was along the river in the neighborhood of the Indian settlement, the 2d in West Swanton, known as Hog Island; the 3d at the Falls, the 4th near and in the neighborhood of the geographical centre of the town on the direct road from the Falls to St. Albans. These early settlers were composed of two classes of persons differing somewhat in race, manners and customs, whose antecedents had been very unlike. The most of those in the west part of the town were of Dutch decent, and it has been said, and probably with more or less of truth, that the most of them had during our Revolutionary war been loyal to the British and at its close found their location somewhat uncomfortable and they therefore left with the view of making their future home in the King's dominions, and that nearly all of that class that settled in this town and Highgate, supposed they had got north of latitude 45 degrees, but on finding their mistake afterwards, concluded to remain where they were, inasmuch as they found themselves not badly treated. Those that settled about the Falls and eastwardly from it were mostly of the Yankee type, firm believers in popular government and democratic in their political views. The two classes being thus connected will in the end doubtless subserve the best interests of both, if indeed it has not done so already.

ORGANIZATION AND FURTHER SETTLEMENT.

At the beginning of the year 1790, the subject of a town organization was much agitated. It was deemed desirable and important on many accounts. To effect this result, the following warning was issued, which we find recorded in 1st vol. and 1st page of town records:

Whereas application has been made to me by a number of the inhabitants of the Township of Swanton to warn a Town Meeting. These are, therefore, to warn those of said town who have a right by law to vote in Town Meeting to meet at the dwelling-house of Jonathan Butterfield, in said Swanton, on the 23d of inst. March, at 10 o'clock in the morning, then and there first to choose a moderator to govern said meeting; secondly, to choose a town clerk and all other officers necessary for the ensuing year as the law directs.

Dated at Georgia, this fifth day of March, A. D., 1790.

DANIEL STANNARD,
Justice of the Peace.

SWANTON, March 23d, 1790.

According to the foregoing warning, this meeting was opened.

1st, made choice of Jonathan Butterfield moderator to govern said meeting.

2d, made choice of Thomas Butterfield for town clerk.

3d, made choice of John Asseltyne constable.

4th, made choice of Conrad Asseltyne, John Knox and Jonathan Butterfield, selectmen.

5th, voted that this meeting be dissolved.

THOMAS BUTTERFIELD, Town Clerk.

The John Knox mentioned as being chosen 2d selectman, was doubtless the John Nokes before mentioned that settled on the Island some years previous.

Mar. 31, 1791, the town meeting met at the house of Stephen Lampman, he being moderator; Thos. Butterfield, town clerk; Joseph Janner, constable; Stephen Lampman, Wm. Green and Asa Lewis, selectmen; Thos. Butterfield, treasurer.

The meeting of 1792 was at the house of Lemuel Lasell, he being moderator; Thos.

Butterfield, town clerk; Lemuel Lasell, constable; Wm. Green, Asa Abell and Asa Lewis, selectmen; Israel Roberson, Thomas Butterfield and Asa Lewis, listers; Thos. Butterfield, treasurer.

The meeting of 1793, Wm. Green chosen moderator; Thos. Butterfield, town clerk; Asa Abell, Wm. Green, Israel Roberson, selectmen; Thos. Butterfield, treasurer; Lemuel Lasell, constable and collector; Wm. Green, Thos. Butterfield, Winthrop Hoyt, listers; Thos. Moore, leather-sealer; John Hult, grand jurymen; Thos. Annis, tythingman; James Tracey, Lemuel Lasell and Asa Green, hog-haywards; Asa Abell, fence-viewer; George Hall, Winthrop Hoyt, Asa Abell and Thos. Butterfield, path-masters; William Connell, sealer of weights and measures; Winthrop Hoyt, John B. Armes, trustees to take care of the public lands in the town of Swanton; Thos. Butterfield and Winthrop Hoyt's yards for town pounds; voted that the town clerk make immediate demand for the proprietors' record for the town of Swanton.

I have condensed the record of the first four town meetings to show who were the men that took the lead in town affairs at that early day. It will be noticed that at the first meeting only 5 offices were filled: Town clerk, constable and three selectmen, and that the town offices multiplied from year to year, as was doubtless found necessary from the increased number of inhabitants, and it may be here remarked that there was a vast tide of emigration sitting toward the northern part of the State from 1791 to 1800, and Swanton received its full share, so that the increase between these two dates was no less than 784. The settlements during this decade will now claim our attention, and we will first notice the

THE SETTLEMENT OF THE EASTERN PART OF THE TOWN.

It is believed there were no permanent settlements of this part of the town previous to 1790, and that Israel Robinson, whose father came from Providence, R. I., and settled in Clarendon, Vt., was the pioneer. He came on with his family from Clarendon, and began to clear his land in February of that year. During the spring of the same year two brothers, Asa and Wm. Green, followed. They came at first without their families, and remained most of the warm season, engaged in clearing up their lands.

In Feb. 1791, Wm. Green returned, bringing his family with him, and for the time they lived in the same house with Mr. Robinson. In the spring, however, he moved into a dwelling he had recently erected, and became permanently located on the land which he had begun to clear. One or two years after, Asa Green also brought on his family, and established himself on the land he had before commenced clearing. At about the same time, Thomas Armes located in the same neighborhood. John Adams, Isaac Lackey and George Hall, with their families, settled in this part of the town about the year 1793. They all stopped with Wm. Green until they could erect their log-houses for the accommodation of their families. Stephen Robinson located in the same neighborhood about the year 1794. During the same year, Joshua Calkins also came in, and settled near by. To these we add the names of Benj. Brown, Noah Brown, Moses McClure, Otis Freeman, John Brown and James Tracy, who were among the early settlers.

It is a noticeable fact that each of these settlers up to this time, as he moved in and passed northwardly from the St. Albans town line, was obliged to clear his own road to the land on which he located.

In the year 1797, Mr. Schofield moved into the neighborhood. Maj. George W. Foster settled here during the same year. At the same time, also, Mr. Tracy established himself in this part of the town. About the year 1798, Daniel Ingalls and Thomas Moore moved into the neighborhood, and they were soon followed by many others.

Mr. John Adams, mentioned as among the first settlers, brought with him his family, consisting of Aaron, Asa, John, Abel, Amasa, Matilda, Deborah, Azuba. Abel was 8 years of age when he came to town, and at that age often took a grist 18 miles to mill at Fairfax. He in after years became the husband of Miss Sally Stone, of Berkshire. They lived in Richford a while, and after this settled in Canada and did a large and flourishing business at Pigeon's Hill, and raised their family there, consisting of Nelson, George, John and Virtue. Mr. J. Adams, Sr., died in 1849, at Pigeon's Hill. Nelson, his son, died at Bedford, P. Q., 1870, leaving a wife and two children, Abel and Mary. George, son of Abel, Sr., is yet living at Adamsville, P. Q., having given his name to the place. His mother, 87 years of age, is now (1882) making her home with him. John, the youngest son of Abel, Sr., was cruelly murdered by rebel guerrillas in West Virginia, in 1864. His wife afterward became the second wife of the writer, Virtue, the daughter of Abel Sr., died in early womanhood.

EARLY SETTLERS ON THE MIDDLE ROAD, as it is called, from information from Mr. Bronson and B. Warner and others. Beginning at the St. Albans line and proceeding northward, John Baker is the first. He came as early as 1795, and settled on land afterward owned by Bronson Warner. Ezekiel O. Goodrich, a few years later, settled about 90 rods to the north of Baker; Ephraim Smith still further north, about 80 rods, on the easterly side of the road; a tailor by trade. Daniel Geer lived near by, on the west side of the road. Silas Robinson was the next one north, on the east side of the road. Benjamin Bowers established himself on land afterward owned by Mr. Bradbury. Joshua Calkins lived on the east side of the road north of Mr. Bowers. Capt. Wheeler Branch, the father of Dr. Branch, of St. Albans, located on land which was after owned by D. M. Walker. All these, according to Mr. Warner, came in and made their location between 1792 and 1800.

Not far from the year 1798, Nehemiah Ordway, Asa Wilson and John Crawford moved with their families to what has since been known as Swanton Hill.

It is remarkable that the early settlers in the east part of the town were, at least in one respect, in the same predicament of Mr. John Nokes, heretofore mentioned, in the west part, and that was, they were here two or three years before they knew they had neighbors in town a few miles west of them. The town, indeed, was organized a few months after Israel Robinson's settlement, without his having any knowledge of the fact. The first intimation they had that others were in their vicinity was on this wise: In 1793, Joseph McClure, who lived at Mr. Wait's, heard the sound of axes. Going in that direction, in search of the choppers, he came upon the Greens and others at work clearing up their land. Otis Freeman and Luther Aldrich came a little later than the Greens and Mr. Lackey; Capt. Wait, Calvin Aldrich, about the same time.

On the west road, as it is called, there were also a large number of additional families located during this decade, as well as on the lake shore, and as early records show, the most of the principal roads or highways in town were laid out previous to 1800. The names of many of those who came into town between the years 1790 and 1800, we shall have occasion to mention in notices we may make of the early settlers.

The affidavit of John Wagoner and William Tichout regarding the claims of some Indians, and the correspondence of Ira Allen with Lord Dorchester upon the subject, which came into my hands with other of Mr. Perry's papers:

John Wagoner and William Tichout both of lawful age Testify and say that in the Month of Oct last an Indian known by the name of capt Louis and about twenty more supposed to be of the St. Francanay Tribe come to the town of Swanton and Highgate on the River Masisque in the state of Vt and Histed a flag on a pole drew their knives threatened several of the inhabitants in a Hostile manner obliged the inhabitants to provide a dinner for them, claimed a right to the lands, and took, in a hostile manner, Ten Bushels of Indian corn from John Wagoner and about fifteen bushels of potatoes from Wm Tichout. The Indians also burnt and destroyed some fences in sd town. That in the month of April last the same Indians came to said town again and threatened to dispossess the subscriber John Wagoner unless he would pay them a fourth of all he raised on said lands as Rent to them.

Justice of y^e Peace.

His excellency The Right Honorable Guy Lord Dorchester Commander-in-chief of his Province of Quebec, &c. &c. &c.

My Lord: The deposition herewith exhibited will show the reason of this address and I further beg leave to inform your Lordship, that about four years since some of the St. Franconay Indians committed nearly similar outrages in the town of Swanton and Highgate, and the inhabitants of the neighboring vicinity were then as they now are so exasperated that they were about to expell the Indians by force, which I requested might be suppressed till I could inform his excellency Gen. Haldimand thereof, as I thought it improper to begin a controversy with the St. Franconay Indians about lands which if ever they had any right to they lost in the war between Great Britain and France, and the land was granted by his excellency Gov. Wentworth, Gov. of the colony of N. Hampshire, in 1763. A state of these matters was laid before Gen. Haldimand, and he issued such orders that said Indians behaved very well till about one year ago. I thought it my duty to give your Lordship a concise state of these matters, in hopes that some measures might be adopted to prevent any disputes between the subjects of Great Britain and citizens of Vermont, which is humbly submitted to your Lordship by your most obedient and humble servant,

IRA ALLEN.

July 16th, 1788.

Montreall, 5th Sept. 1788

Sir: In consequence of depositions of John Wagoner and William Tichout of the towns of Swanton and Highgate, on the River Missisque, in the state of Vt.. taken before John Butterfield, Justice of the Peace, on the 21st June, 1788, and exhibited to his excellency Lord Dorchester at Quebec, the 16th day of July, 1788, by Ira Allen, setting forth that a Capt. Louis and 26 more Indians supposed to be all of the village of St. Francois, came in the month of Oct. last to the town of Swanton and Highgate, there hoisted a flag on a pole, drew their knives, threatened several of the inhabitants in a hostile manner and obliged them to give them a dinner, claimed a right to the lands and took in a hostile manner Ten bushels of Indian corn from John Wagoner and about fifteen bushels of Potatoes from Wm. Tichout, that the Indians also burnt and destroyed some fences in said towns, and that in the month of April last, the same Indians came to said towns again and threatened to dispossess the said John Wagoner unless he would pay them one fourth of all he raised on said lands as rent for them, which affidavit and exhibition you put into my hands for the information of his Excellency Lord Dorchester, the 20th of July last.

Please to know that I lost no time in calling before me the accused Indians, who acknowledged to have been in the months of October and April last on Missisque Bay in search of their livelihood by Fishing and Fowling the time set forth in the aforesaid affidavit, that they always travel with their colors and display them at their encampment wherever they may hapen to be as a mark of their attachment to their Great Father, the King of England, that was the case on these occasions, and that they had the mortification to find the above named Wagoner and Tichout in possession of part of the lands handed down to them by their Predecessors, who were the proprietors of the same long before the French came to Canada, that they neither drew their knives nor committed any of the irregularities they are charged with, confident that their Father would do them justice thereon, that they were bnt 9 men, a boy and 11 women and 8 children on the breast in number, all which they appeal to John Hilliker, neighbor to the above named Wagoner and Tichout, who served as Interpreter on the occasion, and that to ascertain the truth of this affair I judged it necessary to see the parties face to face, to effect which I did appoint the Indians to meet with me at St. Johns the 12th of last month, which they punctually observed, accordingly they proceeded with me up the south river, and while at this side of Isle aux Noix towards the landing place between that and Missisque Bay, that on the way there, to forward my instructions. I dispatched the already mentioned Capt. Louis with a light canoe and a couple of young men to desire in the civilist manner the above named Wagoner and Tichout with the Interpreter to meet at the same Landing, to inform me of their cause of complaint against the said Indians and I arrived there the next day, the 14th, nearly about the time that the said Capt. Louis promised to meet me there, with the above named Wagoner and Tichout and Interpreter, but were not then arrived and I remained there several hours with the Indians interested and no appearance yet of them, and I walked two miles upon the carrying place in hopes of meeting them, where I stayed a couple of hours, and receiving no tidings of those I went to meet with, I returned to the landing place, when I acquainted the Indians there that having neither corn nor provisions for myself and Boatmen, I was under the necessity of returning to St. Johns, that, if the said Capt. Louis, Wagoner, Tichout and the Interpreter came up there that evening, to acquaint them of the same and that I would wait there for them the next day the 15th, recommending them to be as diligent as possible; I waited there next day, allowing them a sufficiency of time to overtake me, and despairing of their coming at all, I returned to this place, leaving word for them at St. Johns to follow me here, if they did come, which did not happen.

Therefore do presume to think unfavorably of the cause of Wagoner and Tichout for having declined this meeting, as in my opinion a decision on their complaint cannot take place until this happens.

I herewith inclose the papers you gave me with a letter to me from Ira Allen. I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,
(signed) JOHN CAMPBELL.
Lt. Col. I. a. P. Quebec.

To Sir JOHN JOHNSON, Bart.,
Superintendent & Inspector General
Indian affairs.

QUEBEC, 11th Oct. 1788.

Sir:

I am commanded by His Excellency, Lord Dorchester, to inclose you a copy of a letter from Lt. Col. Campbell to Superintendent General of Indian affairs, dated 5th Sept., with the purport of a declaration made by Louis the Abenaki chief on the 11th of the same month, being the result of the inquiries made in consequence of your application to this Lordship respecting certain complaints against the Saint Francois Indians by some people of Misiskoui Bay. I am Sir,

Your most obedient Humble servant,
HENRY MOTZ.

IRA ALLEN, Esq.

This correspondence doubtless had a good effect, as it gave the Indians to understand that their claim to those lands would be contested, and that they could not intrude upon the rights of those who had settled there, with impunity, and we presume this to be the reason that we learn nothing after of the settlers being seriously disturbed by the Indians. The close of the American Revolution had an influence no less on the Indians who were residing on the Missisquoi than on the whites. Many of the Dutch were friendly to the English cause, left their home and emigrated to Canada. Many of them, supposing themselves to have settled in Canada, found themselves south of latitude 45 when that line was seen, as has been previously mentioned. The proprietors of the lands in this section made vigorous efforts to settle their lands, and held out strong inducements, and as a consequence the town was rapidly filling up.

It accordingly happened not long after the close of the War of the Revolution, that the Indians, like many others who had favored the English cause, began to remove to Canada, for their sympathies were with the British rather than with the American government. They also had a strong attachment to the religion they had received from the Jesuits, and doubtless regarded the Protestant settlers who were surrounding them as heretics and infidels. It is not, therefore, surprising, under such circumstances, they should wish to remove and carry with them every relic of their religious faith and worship; consequently, on retiring, they took down the edifice which had for many years served them as their sanctuary. The stones of which it was built, and probably the bell, were removed to Moscow, a village known as St. Hyacinth, on the Yamaska river, in Canada. The writer was informed by John Pratt, who was among the first settlers, that all those stones were transported by the Indians in their bark canoes, and were again used in the construction of a house of worship. Thus the Indians began to disappear. They were, however, slow in withdrawing. Although the most of them gradually removed, yet a few lingered, and held possession of their hunting-grounds and fisheries, or at least revisited them from year to year. The large majority of them, however, retired probably at the time the church was removed, leaving the lands which the tribe had had possession of for more than a century.

According to Mr. Pratt, before mentioned, there were about 70 Indians here in 1793, who were a source of disquietude to the inhabitants, as they uniformly claimed the land as theirs, and often threatened the new comers, especially when they had been taking strong drink. They continued to leave, one after another, until 1798 or '9, when they all departed. Since then a few have returned at long intervals for a short time. About the year 1825 there came some four or five families, and put up as many wigwams on the land owned by the late Rufus L. Barney, about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile below the village. They remained a year or two, obtaining their livelihood by hunting, fishing and basket-making. They claimed the lands, as the Indians have done from the first; yet, although they claimed them, it would seem they cared but little for them, thinking, doubtless, that land that required so much hard labor to get a living from, was scarcely worth the having.

Thus ends the account of the St. Francis Indians, the remnant of a great tribe and of a very powerful nation, who played a conspicuous part in the early history of New England, and in the wild and stirring scenes enacted in Vermont at an early day, and whose story is closely connected with the hills and valleys, with the rivers and streams of our own town, and especially with the village known long ago as Missisquoi. Of those who gave name to our beautiful river, we are now almost, within a few years we may, alas! be wholly able to say, with literal exactness:

"They have all passed away,
The noble and the brave;
Their light canoes have vanished
From off the crested wave.

But, their name is on our waters,
We may not wash it out."

STATE OF SOCIETY.

Before entering into the 19th century, let us look at the state of society as the 18th was closing. A single family constituted the society here on its first settlement; when this was the case, the government and every form of social life and industry was cultured in the family. Soon, however, other families appeared, but even then, nearly the same continued to be true. All departments of industry, to which attention was given, were successively engaged in by the same person, or at least by the most. Every man cleared away the forest, cultivated the soil, was his own blacksmith, cooper, carpenter, in fact would turn his hand to all crafts. The women also could turn their hand to almost any form of industry. But as population increased, it became necessary not merely to live under the law of equity, but to organize a form of government for the town, to advance thereby the public good. In noticing the early state of society, many things need to be taken into consideration. The circumstances of a people in a new settlement make many things necessary and others excusable which would not be tolerated under different relations.

The pioneers subjected themselves to many inconveniences. They often left homes of comfort and quiet to come out into the wilderness, where they must fell the trees, clear the ground, erect log-cabins, pass through trackless forests, ford rivers, climb mountains, penetrate swamps, endure the rigor of northern winters in cabins destitute of many comforts, and often suffer from fatigue, from want of food as well as clothing. Added to this, the forest abounded with wild animals, ever ready to commit depredations, from which they must be ever on their guard; and a yet further cause of anxiety and alarm with the early settlers of this town, was that the Indians claimed the lands, and regarded the new settlers as intruders, often using threatening language, and we may form some faint estimate of the difficulties and dangers to which our fathers were exposed, and which they underwent for our sakes. No one could retire at night and be free from all solicitude of what might be awaiting him or his family from the wild animals and the little less wild savage. They must protect themselves, their families and their crops from injuries to which they were constantly exposed.

But all these toils and hardships only made social enjoyments and amusements the more to be desired and relished. The love of home was fostered, warm attachments sprang up, and as is usually the case in a new settlement, great cordiality prevailed. To see and entertain a traveller was a privilege which those can scarcely appreciate who have never lived in a retired and unfrequented portion of the country. Being dependent upon one another, they became attached. As they were ordinarily much alone they were full of hearty and gladsome feeling when they met, and they had their times for relaxation and amusement. We learn from some of the earliest settlers that Saturday was usually considered a holiday, and most of the men collected at the public house for a gala time. Ball-playing was one of their favorite amusements. They generally chose sides, it being expected that the defeated party would bring on the liquor. When one round was completed and they had drank to the health of their companions and friends, another round followed, and another, until night would put an end to their play. Under such circumstances it is no wonder that drunkenness and excesses often prevailed.

The pitching of quoits was also a favorite amusement, and was indulged in to a large extent at an early day. Running and jumping were also much practiced, and trials of skill in the use of firearms were much more common with the early settlers than at the present day. Most were good marksmen, from the very necessity of their position. Wrestling was also an amusement much engaged in on their holidays. A ring was formed, and when one was thrown, he had the privilege of selecting a wrestler from the crowd to take his place; or, as it used to be termed, "bringing in his man." The one who maintained his stand until the end was the acknowledged "bully of the ring." Mugs of flip, and often stronger drink, were frequently put up as bets on the wrestlers.

It was no unusual thing at that early day for the women to walk several miles to make a visit, and frequently through the woods, without roads, being guided by blazed trees, and they would often carry a child in their arms on such visits.

Their living was, of course, of the plainest kind. Wild meats and fish were generally abundant, and they were not often without pork. Shortcake, raised with cob ashes, was regarded as a luxury. Rum when it could be had was almost always used before meals, frequently made pleasantly bitter with a little tansy. I am indebted for this description chiefly to John Pratt, Esq., previous to his death.

The earliest marriage in the town, according to the records, was that of "Wm. Crocker and Percis Hardley, by Asa Hologate, J. Peace, Jan. 12th, 1796."

Some of the earlier births of those of American descent were: Laban Lasell, born in 1791, died in infancy; George W. Green, born Mar. 15, 1791, was, so far as is known, the first to live. He was the son of Wm. Green. Allen Pratt was also born the same year, son of Capt. John Pratt. According to town records, Calvin Arnold was born March 26, 1793; Asa Arnold, March 1, 1795; Nathan Arnold, March 20, 1797; Stephen Arnold, Oct. 31, 1799; children of Randall and Eunice Arnold. Oramel Griffin was born March 26, 1794; Betsy Graham, Sept. 9, 1795; Jos. B. Hungerford, Nov. 18, 1795. It is said the first female child born in town of Yankee parentage was the daughter of Thos. Butterfield. She became the wife of Wm. Keyes, and the mother of Wm. Keyes, Jr.

Weller, 33.00; Lt. John Wood, 59.00; Benjamin Weed, 57.50; Eli Weed, 20.00; John Wood, 125.00. Total amount of grand list for 1800, $9,187.41; 160 names.

The above amount is largely made up of the polls which were then set in grand list at $20 each. It seems that the property that was then set for taxation went in at remarkably low rates: Improved lands, $1.75 per acre, wild lands not being taxed; 1 horse, $13.50; cow, $6.50; yoke of oxen, $20; 2-year-old colts, $6.50; 2-year-old cattle, $5; 1-year-old colt, $2. There was doubtless some debts due and money on hand not placed in the list.

I find that but two persons gave in as high as 40 acres of improved land, viz.: Asa Green and Wm. Green. One only gave 30 acres, viz.: Israel Robinson; Isaac Lackey, 28 acres. Five gave in 25 acres each, viz.: John Adams, Constant Baker, John Nokes, John Wood, Leonard Robinson. Two gave in 20 acres each, viz.: Clark Hubbard, Levi Hathaway. The most of the others who gave in land at all had set to their names from one to ten acres.

It will be seen that there was comparatively little land brought under improvement in this town at the opening of the present century, the most of the town lands at that time being almost an unbroken wilderness. Roads had, however, been laid out and opened, and were, we may suppose, in tolerable passable condition, particularly those roads leading from St. Albans through to Highgate and Swanton Falls.

The grand list for 1804, as recorded, foots up as follows:

Polls at $20 each	$3900 00
Acres of improved land, at $1.55 per acre	1872 00
Houses assessed in the whole..	70 00
Other property and assessments	4793 66
	$10635 66

Militia polls as exempted, $20 each	2000 00
Horses of the cavalry exempted, $13.50 each.....	81 00
	$8554 66
Signed, JAMES BROWN, BENJAMIN FAY, JOHN H. BENTON, } Listers.
The footing of the grand list of 1800, as given above.....	$9187 41
If we make the same deduction as is made on the list of 1804 for exempting.....	2081 00

It leaves the amount..... $7106 41

So we see in the four first years of this century that the value of property given in for taxation increased in value only to the amount of some $1,500; but as the price set in the list is but about one-third, or perhaps one-half its value, the real increase in the value of property in these four years was probably from $3,000 to $4,000.

In the list of 1801 there is but one watch, and that is placed to the name of Silas Hathaway. This appears to be the first watch in town placed in the list for taxation. The second that appears is in the list of 1804, set to the name of Shadrach Hathaway. It would seem from the scarcity of watches on the grand list that they were an article of luxury that the people generally at that day could not indulge in. Our inference is that they had all they could do to secure the essentials of life, without giving much attention to its superfluities.

Some time during the year 1800 the census was taken, from which it appears that the population of Swanton at that time was 858. There must have been a very rapid increase since 1791, when the entire white population was only 74. During this time, and for some years after, lands were rapidly taken up, and a beginning made in clearing away the forests, and preparations made for an advancing civilization, and some progress made in this direction. New settlers came in and located in different parts of the town, the most with a view to agricultural pursuits.

The grand list of 1798, which is the first recorded, amounted to $8,208.50.

The largest individual list was Asa Holgate's, $723; John Nokes', $300; Orange Smith's, $233. In Williams' history we find the following: There was no grand list of Swanton reported to the General Assembly until the year 1806, when it amounted to $11,491. The lists given by the several towns to the General Assembly was in conformity to an act of the Legislature, and in computing the value, the prices of some of the principal articles were given to the assembly: Improved land, 10 shillings per acre, or $1.67; neat cattle, 1 yr. old, 15s per head, or $2.50; 2 years old, 30 s per head, or $5; 3 years old, 40 s per head, or $6.67; an ox, 4 years old, £3, or $10; horses, 3 years old, £4, or $13.34.

In the year 1803 there was a call for a proprietors' meeting, emanating from Seth Pomeroy, justice of the peace of St. Albans. He issued a warning, dated St. Albans, Aug. 8, 1803, and the meeting was held Oct. 17, 1803, in Swanton, at the dwelling-house of Silas Hathaway, Levi Hathaway being chosen moderator, and Shadrach Hathaway, proprietors' clerk. After meeting at the house the meeting was adjourned, to be held at the store of Silas Hathaway at 1 P. M.

It was voted, there be laid to each original right or share one acre as a town plat, agreeable to the charter as the first division. 2d, on motion, voted, there be three lots each, of one hundred three acres to each original right or share as a second, third and fourth division. 3d, on motion, voted, there be a committee of three to make a survey and lay out the aforesaid several lots, and return a plan thereof to the proprietors. The committee appointed consisted of Amasa Howe and Joseph Robinson. At an adjourned meeting, Oct. 26, Peter Savage was added, and at another meeting, Nov. 7, Benjamin Wead and Levi Hathaway. This meeting was adjourned from time to time till Mar. 10, 1804. The committee appointed for the purpose having made a survey and plan of a town plat, and a survey and plan of 204 lots of 103 acres each, being three lots to each right or share, and returned the same to the proprietors, it was voted that the survey and plans be accepted and recorded agreeable to law. Meeting adjourned to Jan. 3, 1805, then to June 26, 1805, when it was voted that Eleazer Goodrich, being a distinguished person, be appointed to draw the numbers of the town plat. There were 68 of these, the right of governor being dropped, one for incorporated society, glebe, 1st minister and school being retained. June 27, 1805, voted that the proprietors will proceed to grant any settler, at his request, the lot he lives on in the second, third and fourth division, in lieu of his draught. Voted that the residue of the lots not quieted be drawn for agreeable to law. Voted, Eleazer Goodrich be appointed as a disinterested person to draw the numbers for the 2d, 3d and 4th divisions. July 13, 1805, the following accounts were presented, viz.:

Benjamin Wead, services as committee and carrying chain, $53.64; Levi Hathaway, services as committee and 17 days as moderator, $68.34; Amasa Howe, services as committee, surveying, $14. Silas Hathaway's items as follows: To paying for book for records, $4; to paying Ira Allen for William Coit's surveying the town of Swanton in 1787, $400; to paying for a farm advertisements, $7; sundry items, $52; total, $463.

Shadrach Hathaway, for 21 days attending as clerk and recording proceedings, $30. Voted, there be a rate or tax of $9.84½ on each right or share of land in said Swanton (public lands excepted), for the purpose of defraying the foregoing expenses. Silas Hathaway voted for the above on forty-eight rights or shares. John H. Burton was appointed to collect this tax, and took the collector's oath.

From the above account of Silas Hathaway, it seems that the town was surveyed in 1787, by Wm. Coit, employed by Ira Allen, and that the committee appointed to survey the town plat by the proprietors, Oct. 17, 1803, were to make a re-survey, in order to make the former survey legal and re-establish former claims.

May 3, 1803, Silas Hathaway conveyed by deed 5,000 acres to Elijah and Jonathan Ferris, of the city of New York, for $5,000, the boundaries of which took in the whole of what is known as Swanton Falls; but this deed we do not suppose affected the validity of the deeds of lands before conveyed by said Hathaway within the described bounds of the 5,000 acres.

The causes which led to non-intercourse with England and the embargo act laid the foundation for a great deal of disturbance in many of the towns in Vermont lying near the Canada line. The smuggling of English merchandise into the State, and articles of home manufacture into Canada, became a very extensive and lucrative business. Scarcely any town along the border was more largely affected by these movements than Swanton, since this was the great thoroughfare at the time between Montreal, Burlington and New York. Many were led to take sides in this matter. No doubt some were actuated by high and praiseworthy intentions; others, however, and perhaps the most, had their eye fixed on gain. Great profits were secured on either side. Such as could elude observation would reap a rich harvest. Those who were opposed to the business, and endeavored to carry out the orders of government, would also be greatly benefited if they could detect any engaged in the unlawful traffic, and thus secure the large rewards offered by government for the detection of those who were thus engaged.

During the embargo times there was much excitement among all classes, and many engaged in the acts of smuggling, and on the other hand the officers of government were vigilant, keeping out their deputies on every cross road, lane and creek; in fact, everywhere that it was suspected that goods might be smuggled, and this espionage was continued day and night for weeks and months together.

All sorts of devices were resorted to by those engaged in the unlawful traffic to elude the vigilance of the government officers, such as false sleigh, wagon and trunk bottoms, and not unfrequently when in danger of being arrested, resort was had to force, but notwithstanding the efforts of the smugglers, they were frequently taken and their goods confiscated. The creeks and marshes on either side of the Missisquoi river, between the lower, or Swanton Falls and the Lake, where it empties into Missisquoi bay, a short distance from Canada line, offered extraordinary facilities for smuggling by boats, and eluding the government officers. In the summer of 1808, a boat was fitted up for this purpose by Doct. J. Stoddard, a merchant at St. Albans, called the "Black Snake," and manned by Samuel I. Mott, of Alburgh; Wm. Noaks, Slocum Clark and Truman Mudgett, of Highgate; Cyrus B. Dean and Josiah Pease, of Swanton; David Sheffield, of Colchester, and Francis Ledyard, of Milton, Mudgett being the captain. This boat had made a number of successful trips, their route being from Maquam bay through Maquam creek to Charcoal creek, or to Missisquoi river. These creeks and river near its mouth are bordered by large marshes and forests. The government officers obtaining information regarding this boat, determined to put a stop to her operations. A force was detached from the command of Major Williams, then stationed at Windmill Point, Alburgh, which were placed on board the U. S. Revenue Cutter, "Fly." They soon got on the track of the "Black Snake," and pursued it up the Onion river, when a fight ensued, and three men of the government party were killed. The smugglers were arrested, and Dean sentenced to be hung, and others to be whipped at the public whipping post and sent to State prison, while some were acquitted. A full and circumstantial account of this transaction may be found in the 2d vol. of Miss Hemenway's Gazetteer, commencing at page 342, in the history of St. Albans.

In 1808, some soldiers were stationed in Swanton, commanded by Major C. K. Williams, since governor of Vermont. This was a militia company drafted in Pittsford, June 1, 1808, and discharged at Swanton, Sept. 4, 1808.

It is said there was about this time some potash-making at the Falls, and as the process went on, the guard were constantly watching. About the time it was completed and in readiness to be taken away, there was an alarm given. The guard were at once on the alert and started off to learn the trouble, but when they returned, the potash was missing. This ruse, with others of a similar kind, was often resorted to, to call off the attention of the guard and afford owners the opportunity to smuggle their goods over the line.

The then custom house officer, Doct.

Penniman, was accused by his political opponents of conniving at some of the smuggling operations (though probably without just grounds). It is said when this guard were on duty one night among the marshes near the mouth of the river, they heard a deep, sonorous bass voice (from one of the largest kind of frogs), "All smugglers! All smugglers!" This was followed (by a little frog), on a high key, "Piniman too! Piniman too!" Those who have heard the croaking of frogs, can easily imagine how a man of some humor could make them seem to express the words above given.

There is one thing may be said, that however reckless the men of that day may have been, and however many the devices they may have resorted to for smuggling, that we learn nothing of women taking advantage of their dress and sex to carry on that kind of business, as it is said is quite extensively practiced at the present day.

1810 TO 1820.

The course of things for a few years had been tending to concentrate business of certain kinds in Swanton. Smuggling had been, and continued to be carried on to a large extent. Lumbering was also prosecuted very considerably. The population increased, and many, at least for a time, made this their home. The custom house business was large. The census returns show in 1810 the number of inhabitants was 1687, almost twice as many as in 1800. It is probable the number continued to increase in about the same ratio for the next four or five years.

In 1810, a good many troops were stationed here in connection with the custom house, to enforce observance of the laws. A still larger number were stationed here in 1811 for the same purpose. Swanton Falls at that time was the headquarters for all the main movements connected with the custom house department in this vicinity. The force here at this time consisted of drafted militia.

It was not until 1812, that barracks were erected here for the accomodation of troops. At that time, most of the buildings of the village were on the outer border of the elevated plateau on the west side of the present park,—then called the green—and on the river side of Canada Street. On the east side of the green there were but two or three houses. The barracks were of wood and situated on the high ground eastwardly from the green, and westwardly some 10 or 20 rods from a small stream which flows through a shallow ravine south-eastwardly from the village. The barracks were arranged in the form of a crescent, beginning near where the house of Col. Kidder now stands, extending eastward near where Chester Lawrence now lives, thence northwardly toward the present dwelling of H. Asselstyne. The parade ground was the area in front and to the north-west of the crescent-shaped barracks. It was the most elevated land of the village, extending from near the residence of the late Joseph Blake on the south, to the dwelling of F. H. Barney on the north; this ridge was known for many years after the soldiers left as the old parade ground, and was at that time covered thickly with large pine stumps, dug out, and the land graded to some extent by the soldiers. This work was done, we are informed, by the soldiers as a penalty for drunkenness. The soldiers also dug most of the stumps from the green, or present park, being hired by the people for a very trifling consideration.

July 12, 1812, the first Regt. of Vt. militia was stationed at Swanton Falls; it was under command of Col.—Williams, a native of Charlotte; Shadrack Hathaway, of this place, was major. There were 8 companies in this regiment, of which the captains were: Matthew Philips, from New Haven, Stephen Pettis, Grand Isle, James Taylor, Cambridge; Conrad Saxe, Highgate; Geo. W. Kendall, Enosburgh; —Barnes, Charlotte; A. Saville, Rifle Co. from south part of the State; Cavalry Co., name of captain not ascertained. Azriah Lasell served in this regiment as a substitute for Azriah Gray. These troops remained here until Dec. 8th, when they were discharged.

Shortly after this, Col.—Fifield's regiment was ordered hither. The Colonel was from Washington Co., and the companies were from the east side of the mountain. For some reason, not to be explained at this late day, at the end of 5 or 6 weeks this body of soldiers also left. After a short absence, however, they returned and were quartered here during the winter of 1812 and 13. Early the next summer, all that were able to bear arms were ordered away, six or eight only were left, and these being sick the government stores were left unprotected.

A British force of about 1400 landed at Plattsburgh July 30, 1813, and destroyed the American barracks located there and other property valued at over $25,000; they thence proceeded to Burlington, but failing to accomplish anything, retired down the lake, sending a detachment about 600 strong to destroy the government property at Swanton, every thing at that time being in a defenceless state. This detachment landed at Maquam Bay, Aug. 6, 1813, near what was then known as the Manzer farm; a part of their force was left in charge of their boats. Compelling old Mr. Manzer to act as a guide, the remainder set out for the falls. The old gentleman told them there were two ways they could take to get to the falls. One, a very good wagon road, around by the river, which was nearly double the distance of the other road, which led through some distance of very wet swamp land, and had not yet been opened for travel, the trees had only been felled. This road, then only cut through, is now the direct road from the falls to the lake. They decided to take the short cut, and proceeded, the old gentleman leading the way. This swamp being very soft they were compelled to walk as much as possible on the fallen trees; not being used to this way of travel, they found themselves often tumbling from the fallen tree trunks and floundering in the bogs and mire. The Colonel began to suspect his guide of treachery, and to fear that he was leading them into this place that they might fall an easy prey to their enemies. Accordingly, he drew his pistol and threatened the old man with instant death if he should lead them into danger. With much ado they finally got through without serious injury, and came to the ferry, which was then kept by Joel Carley, some 30 rods above the dam. They hailed the ferryman, who was then crossing with his ferry scow at the usual place, desiring him to come further up the stream and take them over, as they did not think it safe to cross so near the dam. He disregarded their request; upon this they fired upon him, but without doing him any injury. They finally came to the ferrying place, and a portion of them were carried over safely. Only one scow load, it is said, crossed the river, those that remained on the west shore loitered about until their comrades returned. Those that crossed the river, proceeded at once to burn the barracks, which being of combustible material were quickly consumed. They also destroyed whatever other U. S. property they could find, such as provisions, and other articles stored here for the use of the army. In this work of ruin, they in some instances, it is said, compelled the citizens to take part. Yet it seems to have been the aim of the officers to do as little injury to individuals as possible. With private property, indeed, they did not intend to interfere, as it was one prominent purpose with them to conciliate as many of the citizens as they could, and bring them into sympathy with the measures of the British government. There was a large lot of government stores in the building known as the "old brick store," standing at the northerly corner of Canada Street where it connects with the common. This building they were about to set fire to, but being informed by Augustus Burt, Esq., that the building was private property, and that the government stores had been forcibly deposited there, they desisted and caused the stores to be removed and burnt, leaving the building uninjured. Having destroyed whatever they could find of government property, they recrossed the river and were soon on their way to the lake. They manifested no desire to prolong their stay longer than was absolutely necessary, for the reason, it is said, they were apprehensive that they might be surprised or way-laid. They arrived, accomplished their purpose and departed, within a few hours—one said, two or three. In returning, they all took up their march together, and bearing in mind the old adage that "the farthest way round was the safest way home," went back by the wagon road before spoken of by the way of the river, about two miles, then taking a cross road about one mile, it brought them out near the Manzer place, where their boats were.

Such, in brief, was the incursion made by the British into Franklin County for the purpose of destroying the government property at Swanton Falls. That they did this effectually, no one can deny, neither can it be denied that there were individual cases of an outrageous character on the part of the soldiers, and in some instances, if accounts be true, went beyond all bounds of decency and propriety. As evidence, we quote the following, part of a paragraph published in a paper at the time:

We have the depositions of several persons respecting the enormities of the British at Swanton, Vt., on private property, and all the horrors and wantonness of destruction which prevailed. They stole anything and everything, leaving many houses destitute of every necessary or convenience of life.

Those desiring to enter more fully into this subject, are referred to Niles' Weekly Register, vol. IV, p. 419.

While outrages were doubtless committed by the soldiers, it is quite evident that they did not in every case pass unnoticed or unrebuked, or without correction. We have reason to believe that whatever of outrages or wantonness was committed, it was in direct violation of the orders of the commanding officer. The following instances, confirmatory of this point, were related to the writer by his father-in-law, Capt. E. O. Goodrich, who was then living but a few rods below the ferry, on the west side of the river. As the detachment arrived at the Falls, and were loitering around waiting for the ferry scow, two or three of the soldiers jumped over the garden fence, and pulled up a large number of onions.

When Capt. Goodrich saw what they were about to do, he remonstrated, and told them he would report them to the officer in command, but they persisted. He at once went to the officer in command, and informed him of the outrage. The officer said they were violating strict orders, and at once set a guard to prevent any further trouble of the kind.

I have also often heard him tell the following: As they were about to take up their march on their return, a young man by the name of Sowles was among the crowd, probably from motives of curiosity. He having a watch, a soldier stepped up and relieved him of it, putting it in his own pocket. Sowles remonstrated, but in vain. Not having a favorable opportunity to make his grievance known to the commander, he followed on, keeping his eye on the thieving soldier until they arrived at the Lake, when he had an opportunity to make his complaint to the officer in command. The officer at once ordered the watch restored and twenty lashes applied to the soldier, which orders were executed at once.

In 1812, according to town records, Leonard Robinson was allowed $2 "for melting bullets;" also "John R. Phelps, for going with baggage wagon to Burlington, $23.71;" "Benj. Fay, for pork and camp utensils, $5.18;" "Dan. B. Meigs, do., $3."

Sept. 13, 1813, a regiment was called out, which was commanded by Col. Luther Dixon, Shadrach Hathaway, of Swanton, belonging to the staff. One company of this regiment was raised in Swanton and vicinity, Ezekiel O. Goodrich, orderly sergeant, by whom the requisitions for rations, etc., were made, as he has often related to the writer. They went at first to Burlington. After remaining there a month or so, they were ordered into the State of New York, and were stationed most of the time at Cumberland Head. They were discharged Nov. 10, of the same year. Among those from Swanton were: Amasa I. Brown, Stephen S. Brown, Ira Church, Rufus L. Barney, Samuel Emery, Abraham Manser, John Pratt.

In 1814, the famous Battle of Plattsburgh was fought. A few days previous to its taking place, a number of the citizens of Swanton volunteered to take part in the conflict, the names of whom we give, so far as they have come to our knowledge, viz.: Amasa I. Brown, Capt. James Brown, Horace R. Roberts, Levi Hathaway, Ira Church, Benj. Bowers, Jared Spaulding, Charles Durkey, Simeon Hathaway, Josiah H. Hathaway, Lemuel Barney, Oliver Potter, Stephen S. Brown, Geo. W. Foster, Daniel Sabin, Jos. Weeks, Chas. Stilphen, Cornelius Stilphen, Oliver Swanton, Enos E. Brown, Augustus C. Wright, Samuel Webster, Reuben Morgan, Levi Scott, Isaac Manzer, Leonard Cummings.

The years of 1815 and '16, known as the scarce years, the inhabitants of Swanton suffered in common with the whole country for the necessaries of life, and though the crops were cut off for the most part in this region, yet fish were plenty. Probably never before or since were there so many fish caught in the river in the same length of time as in those two scarce years. There were probably not less than ten fishing-grounds between the Falls and Lake, where large seines were drawn and kept in continual operation day and night during the fishing season. People in large numbers would come from the eastern towns with articles of barter of almost every description, to exchange for fish, prominent among which was maple sugar. This for fish was considered a legal tender. In previous years the people from the east when they came to buy fish, would frequently make an excuse that it was not out of real necessity that they came to get fish, but they were convenient to have in the house, as it served to lengthen out the pork. As the story goes, there came a man from the east during these scarce years with a load of barter to exchange for fish. As he had been there in former years, he was well known. So when he drove up to a fishing shanty, one of his old acquaintances accosted him: "Well, friend, how are ye, down agin to git a few fish to lengthen out the pork? Eh?" The man replied, "Not this time to lengthen out pork, but to lengthen out life."

1820 to 1830.

After the close of the war with England there was a little falling off in business activity here. The Keyeses who had been for many years extensively engaged in the lumber and other business at the Falls removed to Highgate Falls, in 1819. They took with them a good many of their workmen and this diminished the population and somewhat the business of the place. In 1820, the inhabitants were only 1607, less than in 1810; but about this time the northern canal was opened which gave a fresh impetus to the lumber and marble business, boat building and other branches of industry. A new forge for manufacturing blown iron was built by Elisha Barney and R. Foster about this time, and in the year 1822 and 3, the brick meeting house was built by Elisha Barney, now occupied by the Congregationalists, all this giving fresh activity to business.

The following extract from an article written, about 1824, signed L. C. F. (which we take to be L. C. Ferris,) will give very correctly the condition of things in town at that time:

The village at the Falls contains a meeting house, 2 school houses, 3 taverns, 5 stores, 1 grist mill, 5 saw mills, 2 fulling mills, 2 woolen factories, 4 mills for the manufacture of marble, 1 forge, and about 75 dwellings. There are in the whole town 6 school districts, and as many school houses, 6 stores, 6 taverns, 2 distilleries, 2 tanneries, and 1 pottery, besides the mills and other machinery mentioned above.

According to town records a committee was appointed in 1828, to meet a similar committee from St. Albans, also from Fairfield, to straighten the lines between the respective towns. This committee reporting the desirableness of a change between Swanton and Fairfield, their doings was sanctioned by the town, and Oct. 19, 1829, a part of Fairfield was annexed to Swanton by an act of the Legislature, and a similar tract of Swanton was annexed to Fairfield. The land annexed to Swanton greatly exceeds in value the land annexed to Fairfield. The change however does not really straighten the line, but has just the opposite effect. The eastern boundary of Swanton was originally a straight line running nearly N. W. to S. E., thus extending the town line almost to the present center of Fairfield. By the change a triangular tract was cut off from the south east part of Swanton, and to the north eastern sides, a similar tract was added from Fairfield.

On examining the census for 1830, we find that during the preceding 10 years there was in Swanton an increase of 551 in population; about the beginning of this period immigration was resuming its accustomed flow, and with all there was much to favor the prosperity and increase of the place.

1830 TO 1840.

In 1830, the population of Swanton was 2158. The preceding ten years witnessed a gain, though on the whole it was not very marked. The advancement continued until about 1826, and from that time for a few years things became almost stationary. The effect of the removal of the Keyeses came to be more visible. Their presence was lost as a positive influence to build up, while they naturally took with, and drew after them, business which would else have centered and remained here. The mail stage which had from a very early day run daily from Burlington to Montreal, had up to about 1830 passed from St. Albans through Swanton, and vice versa, and a daily mail stage in those days was considered of much importance to the business and prosperity of a place. About that time the Keyeses, having large political influence at Washington, secured the stage, to be run by way of Highgate Falls instead of Swanton Falls, and it continued to be run on that route until railroads superseded the stage coach altogether. The business men of Swanton did not yield this advantage to the Keyeses without a protest, and strenuous efforts were made use of to prevent this loss to the place, but all were unavailing. Mr. S. S. Keyes, some time previous to his death, informed the writer that this matter of securing the stage to run through Highgate, was the hardest political battle he ever fought.

Efforts were made by Mr. Thomas Clark and others for some years to have the island known as West Swanton organized into a town by itself. As there was a failure in this, proposals were finally made to have that part of the island which then belonged to Highgate annexed to Swanton. This arrangement was looked upon generally with favor, for the reason that the inhabitants of the island did their business for the most part at Swanton Falls. Accordingly, an act of the legislature was secured Nov. 3, 1836, annexing that part of Highgate below Swanton Falls which lay west of the channel of Missisquoi river to Swanton. The rents, however, of such school lands as had been previously located in this portion of the town, continued to be paid for the benefit of schools in Highgate.

The great commercial crisis of 1837 brought disaster to thousands, and the business of Swanton felt the shock severely. Most of the business men became embarrassed, and many failed outright. The marble business particularly, which had previous to this time been carried on extensively, was by some abandoned entirely, and it never since has recovered its former prosperity.

The people of Swanton were also greatly agitated over the Radical War, or more properly the Canadian Rebellion, in 1837 and '39. The Patriots, as they were then called, making Swanton a sort of headquarters, very naturally led people to become excited over political matters rather than their legitimate business. In looking back over the past 10 years, we find that increase in population in town was small, amounting to only 154, which, considering the state of things, is not surprising. Business having slackened at home, many turned to new fields, and the tide was westward.

FROM 1840 TO 1850.

In 1844 there were in town eight stores, the capital invested being $8,920. The amount invested in manufacturing interests was $34,800. The number of schools,

16, with 945 pupils. [Hakell & Smith's Gazetteer of U. S. A., p. 646, pub. 1844.]

The census returns for 1840 indicate a population of 2312, showing a slight increase during the preceding 10 years, after deducting the number brought in by the annexation of that part of Highgate lying west of Missisquoi river.

1850 TO 1860.

The population of Swanton in 1850 was 2824, the increase during the preceding decade being 512. During the 10 years preceding 1860, the town suffered a net loss in population of 146, the number of inhabitants in 1860 being 2678. At the taking of the census of 1850, the Vt. & Canada R. R. was in process of construction through Swanton. The laborers employed on this work, with their families, were doubtless enrolled on the census lists, thus giving a larger return for Swanton than was strictly her due. Again, emigration was more rapid than during the decade which preceded it. During the early part of this decade the Vt. & Canada R. R. was opened, being the first railroad that ever passed through the town. Its opening created much stir, but it did not have the beneficial effect on the business of the town that many of its friends anticipated.

1860 TO 1870.

The great event during this decade, not only to the town of Swanton, but to the nation at large, was the inauguration of the Southern Rebellion in 1861, the severe contest which ensued, and the final subjugation of those in rebellion in 1865 by the surrender of Gen. Lee at Appomattox Court House. During nearly all this time the people of Swanton, in common with other towns in Vermont, were in a fever of excitement. During the political excitement immediately previous to the breaking out of hostilities, the general feeling among the people was, that the Southerners could not be so foolhardy as to take up arms against the general government, but when they saw it to be a fact, there was great unanimity of feeling that the rebellion should be subdued. War meetings were held, and the all-absorbing subject was discussed freely in public and private circles. The "Green Mountain Guards," an independent military company, organized but a few years previous, were all well drilled and equipped, and well prepared and ready to take part in the conflict. The offer of their services was accepted by the Governor, and to this company belongs the honor of being the first in the State enrolled for the suppression of the great rebellion. They were mustered in Co. A, on the right of the 1st Reg., May 2, 1861. When the call was made for more men by the President, Swanton was prompt to respond. Col. A. B. Jewett having served his 3 months under the first call for men, as lieutenant in the company of "Green Mountain Guards," after returning, became one of the most active and efficient recruiting officers in the State. (For more definite account, see article on "Military Organizations.")

There was considerable excitement also in town during this decade as to the propriety of bonding the town to the amount of $75,000, to aid in the construction of the Lamoille Valley R. R. There was a strong opposition to the town taking stock in this enterprise, and numerous meetings were held, which finally resulted in a clear vote of the town to issue its bonds for the amount above named. (See the article on Railroads; also an article, page 1184, 2d Vol. Vt. Hist. Gazetteer, by the Editor.)

The population of Swanton, at taking of census for 1870, was 2866, being a gain in this decade of 188. The grand list of 1860 was $5,789.18; that of 1870, $8,113.36, which is an increase during this decade of $2,324.18, which is a very fair showing, considering the large number of the producing class that were called to the war for full one-third of the time, and the heavy drafts upon the people for bounty and taxes, together with the great depression of business during the first years of the war. How much of this increase in the grand list is attributable to the enhanced price of property consequent upon the war, we are not prepared to decide.

It is, however, our impression that the appraisers of property for taxation have not put it in at a much higher value than previous to the war.

1870 TO 1880.

This decade has brought with it some important events. Fires more extensive and destructive than ever before known in town have taken place. And the "burnt district" has been rebuilt to a great extent with elegant buildings of which the town may justly be proud.

A munificent gift has been received by the town by the will of the late R. L. Barney.

The St. Johnsbury and Lake Champlain R. R. has been completed and opened to traffic, which several events will be further spoken of under their respective heads.

The population of the town in 1870 was 2866, in 1880 it was 3079, an increase of 213, which indicates growth though but slowly. Grand list of 1870 was $8,113.36; of 1880, $8,339.11; not a large advance for 3 years, surely. I find the grand list of the town for 1877 was $878,2.20 which leads to the question why should the list be less in 1880 than in '77? The best answer that can be made that I know of, is that on account of the great injury to the business of the village caused by the fires of 1877-'78. The listers made the assessment of property in the village much lighter in 1880 than in 1877.

St. Johnsbury & Lake Champlain R. R., formerly "Lamoille Valley." The last rail was laid, the last spike driven, and the first locomotive with the first train of cars passed over the road from St. Johnsbury to Swanton on Tuesday the 17th day of July, 1877, which was the consummation and realization of "hope deferred" for long, long years by the projectors and promoters of this enterprise. As the laying of "the last rail" was of considerable interest as well as of importance to the people here, it may be well to speak somewhat more in detail regarding the doings on that occasion. A train of platform cars seated for the occasion, left the Grand Avenue crossing on the easterly side of the river in the early morning, with a large company both of ladies and gentlemen for the scene where was to be witnessed the laying of the last rail that was to make the connection and give a continuous and unbroken track from Portland on the east to Lake Champlain on the west. The company increased at every station. The road being unbalasted and rough, the train had to run slowly, so that it did not reach the place for laying the "last rail" till nearly noon. Workmen were then fitting the rails to make the connection. It was nearly 1 P. M., when the train with several passenger cars arrived from the east, having on board Gov. Fairbanks, Judge Poland, Col. Jewett, and many other distinguished personages. The passengers from the two trains than alighted to witness the laying of the rails which had been previously fitted and taken up, to assist the coming of the last train.

The rails were put in place by the steady workmen, and the spikes driven all but the last, when Col. Jewett, of Swanton, who has been identified with the interests of the road from the start, and was then its Superintendent, stepped forward and made a neat speech directing his remarks to Gov. Fairbanks. The Colonel congratulated the Governor on the completion of the great work which had engaged their best energies for so many years, and then invited the Governor to drive the last spike which was a silver one, at least, so called. The Governor made a few remarks appropriate to the occasion and then with the sledge drove home the "last spike," immediately after which the company sung, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," after which were given three rousing cheers. There was some more of speech making by Judge Poland, Ex-Gov. Hendee, and other distinguished men present. This closed the ceremony of laying the "last rail."

The passengers were soon on board and the trains now become one, was moving toward Swanton. It commenced raining soon after, and the passengers that were unluckily compelled to take the platform cars got a severe drenching; nevertheless all seemed happy. The train arrived at Swanton, crossing for the first time the new bridge above the Falls, and coming in at the depot on the west side of the river about 4 P. M., where were teams in waiting for the ladies, the gentlemen went over on foot to the Central house, where the whole company partook of a sumptuous repast provided at the expense of the people of Swanton.

It was intended that the dinner should have been served on the park in front of the hotel, and tables were all arranged for 200 guests or more, but the severe rain prevented carrying out this part of the programme. Soon after completing their dinner the party from the east returned to the cars about 6 P. M., and left for St. Johnsbury, where it was said they arrived about 1 o'clock that night.

Shortly after the laying of the "last rail," the road was completed from the village of Swanton Falls to Maquam Bay, about 2 miles, where docks and warehouses have been built. The first freight train passed over this part of the road, Aug. 23, 1877, loaded with coal for Messrs. Fairbanks; and the first passenger train from the lake to the East in July, 1877. The train which took the first canal boat load of marble from the Falls to load a boat at Maquam, was shipped by the writer; its destination Washington, D. C., and was for the floors of the state, war, and navy department building. The business of the road has largely increased since its opening, and extensive docks have been added which now afford good facilities for the transfer of merchandise. Immense quantities of coal and iron from the South arrive here by boats, and are reshipped on cars to their destination eastward.

The United States government has made large appropriations from time to time for a break-water to improve the harbor. During the most part of the season of navigation passenger trains run daily to Maquam, connecting with an elegant steamer which makes regular daily trips to Plattsburgh, and other ports on Lake Champlain. A fine hotel of modern style has been erected at convenient distance from the docks, and given the name of "Hotel Champlain," which is extensively patronized by parties of pleasure during the warm season.

This being the terminus of a railroad which connects Lake Champlain with the seaboard, cannot fail to become a place of of much importance, and by many it is thought, that the time is not distant when it will rival some of the most important ports on Lake Champlain.

R. H. Scott, Esq., became station agent for this road at its opening, and held it until about the spring of 1881, when he resigned. Mr. J. F. Pierce now (March, 1882,) fills that place.

THE R. L. BARNEY FUND.

The history of the town would be incomplete if I failed to give a brief account of the settlement and confirmation of the will of my brother, R. L. Barney, by which the town became the recipient of $20,000. He died Feb. 26, 1874, and left a will which provides that the town of Swanton should have $20,000. His nephews, J. A. Barney and Miles R. Barney, the rents on two lots of land, amounting to about $150 each annually. E. H. Richardson, a man who had been in his employ more or less for many years previous, about $1600. The Home for destitute children at Burlington, $500. His nephew, R. Lester Barney, the homestead where he now resides. The residue of his property was willed to Geo. Barney (the writer) and R. Lester Barney, (his son) on which they were to pay yearly to Mrs. L. D. Clark of Vineland, and her daughter, Lillie E. Clark, $250 each during their natural lives, payments then to cease. He also made Geo. Barney, R. Lester Barney and Miles R. Barney executors of his will. The only heir of R. L. Barney was Mrs. Clark, wife of L. D. Clark of Vineland, N. J. All that he had given her does not appear in the will, and to correct any impression that may have got abroad that my brother did not do justice to his own daughter in the disposal of his property, I would here state: that many years ago, he gave some $2000 to her, or her husband. Some years after, when they had concluded to go to Vineland, he gave them

$6,000, and took their writing that this should be in full for all claim they would ever make on his estate. He, however, seems to have changed his mind somewhat, and previous to his death, agreed they should have $3,000 more, which was duly paid over to them by the executors after his decease. The above items, with the $500 annuity, would seem to show pretty conclusively that my brother had a due regard for the welfare of his daughter, notwithstanding the aspersions on his character that have been made in that regard.

Mr. Clark was much dissatisfied with the will, and gave the executors notice he intended to break it. This led the executors to retain the three lawyers in the village, while Mr. Clark went to St. Albans for council. Matters for a while promised well for a big lawsuit, at least to the lawyers. At length Mr. Clark agreed that if the executors would pay him $1,000, he would withdraw all opposition to the confirmation of the will. The executors sought the advice of selectman H. M. Stone, Esq., the town agent, V. S. Ferris, Esq., and it was their opinion, as well as that of the lawyers, that it would be a wise thing to settle it on the terms proposed, the selectman and town agent both saying the town would no doubt be willing to lose their fair proportion of the amount and expense required to get the will established.

On these grounds the executors went forward and paid over the money to Mr. Clark, taking his writing to make no further opposition to the confirming of the will. The town appointed at their next meeting, Mar. 1875, H. M. Stone, Fletcher Tarbell and John Barney, trustees of the R. L. Barney fund (as it was called), and to settle with the executors. They met some few days after at the office of G. Barney, when the executors brought the matter of the expense of getting the will established before them, and insisted that they should settle with them and pay these expenses before they, the executors, should be required to pay over the $20,000 to the town. They, the trustees, took a different view, saying they thought they were only authorized to receive the funds. The executors hesitated, for fear if the town once got the funds into its hands it would be loth to do them justice, and this view was very clearly expressed to the trustees at the time. To induce the executors to settle and pay over the funds, Mr. Tarbell and Mr. Stone said they thought the claim just, and they would in their report to next town meeting recommend the town to pay over the claim. Mr. John Barney, the other trustee, said he would sign no report, but had no objections to the others making such a report, and also said he thought the town ought to pay something, but would not say how much. At the next March meeting the trustees made the report as promised. That part relating to this subject is as follows :

We, the undersigned, further report that we find a suit at law was threatened by the only heir of the late Rufus L. Barney, to break the will, soon after his death.

We also find said will did contain some objectionable expressions and omissions, and also the circumstances under which it was executed, were such that we considered would make a suit at law dangerous to the interests of the town, and, in order to avoid litigation, and to establish and confirm said will, the executors, with the advice of the town agent, V. S. Ferris, Esq., and one of the selectmen, H. M. Stone, (and with the assurance on their part that they would recommend that the town should bear an equitable portion of the expense of confirming said will,) went forward and settled with the said heir.

The whole amount of expense incurred by the executors in establishing the will with interest on the same up to the time the fund was placed in our hands, was nearly $1400, viz :

March 24, 1874, p'd Clark and wife
$1,000, int. on same 1 year, $60,	$1060.00
Do. p'd H. A. Burt, $125.00, int.
on same 1 year, $3.75,	128.75
Do. p'd Bryant Hall, $100.00, int.
on same 4 months, $2.00,	102.00
Do. p'd R. O. Sturtevant,	100.00

Total, $1,390.75

In view of the above facts, and also the fact that the expenses thus incurred did establish the will whereby the town became the undisputed recipient of this large sum, as a free gift (in conjunction with the other legatees) and therefore the town in equity should bear a portion of that expense.

Therefore we would recommend that the town pay said executors the sum of $600 as a just and equitable portion of the aforesaid expenses. And we further recommend that the town appoint a committee of three to confer with the executors, and that said committee be authorized to expend a sum of money, not to exceed $300 for the purpose of defraying a part of the expense in the erection of a monument to the memory of the late Rufus L. Barney, with suitable inscriptions.

Can the town afford to do less than this for the man that has so generously given us the use of a fund, which will give the town of Swanton $100 a month for all time to come? If we should refuse this small token of acknowledgment to the giver, would not a stigma rest upon the intelligence and sense of justice of the citizens of Swanton? Can we afford to receive so great a gift, and not write our thanks upon marble to the giver? There is now a fund of more than $21,200 in the hands of the trustees for the town of Swanton, for the benefit of all our citizens, by the generosity of our late townsman, Rufus L. Barney, costing us nothing and always accruing for our benefit, and we believe the citizens of Swanton will not only be willing but anxious to express their thanks in this small token of respect to the memory of one who has so generously donated to us this constant large sum for our benefit.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

H. M. STONE, } Trustees.
F. TARSELL, }

Swanton, Mar. 7, 1876.

After the reading of this report and some little discussion, the town in a very summary manner dismissed the whole subject, giving all right-minded people to think there is very little sense of justice in a crowd at town meeting.

It may, however, be said, in justice to the town, that, on sober second thought, at a subsequent meeting, Mar. 1877, they voted, "That the town pay Geo. & R. L. Barney, $600 and interest one year, to reimburse them in part for the expense incurred by them in getting the will of the late R. L. Barney confirmed and established."

This sum of $600 being the amount recommended in the last March town meeting by Messrs. Stone and Tarbell, trustees of the R. L. Barney fund, as being in their judgment an equitable share of said expenses which the town had ought to pay.

The town, however, has never yet seen fit to carry out the recommendation in said report, relating to the monument, doubtless coming to the conclusion that they can afford "to receive so great a gift, and not write their thanks on marble to the giver."

MANUFACTURAL.

That the Indians did something in this line is evident from the utensils and relics that have been found. [See Mr. Perry's paper, page 945.] They certainly made rude implements of husbandry, weapons for war and hunting, while the traces of the old saw-mill, in the days of the French settlement, attest their efforts.

The early English settlers later had for years as much as they could do to obtain a support for their families. Hard labor, many deprivations, constant anxieties were their lot. If they procured the necessaries of life they felt that they were doing well. But gradually they turned their hands to the manufacture of what they needed, and of articles that might be sent to market in exchange for what they needed from abroad; and more recently, many kinds of manufactures have been carried on here, owing in part at least, to the facilities furnished by the fine water power.

The lumber sawn in the old French mill was probably mostly pine. It was for the supply of the Quebec market, and taken there on rafts; little was needed in this vicinity, as there were no white inhabitants aside from those in this settlement, in a long distance. According to one of the earliest settlers, the pine timber, which grew upon the plain now occupied by the present village, also most that was found on the intervalles above the Falls, as being thus easily hauled to the river and floated down to the mill, was cut off by the French, and reduced to dimensions to suit the demands of the market. When workmen came on under Allen, they found more than 1000 pine saw-logs in large piles above the Falls, and on both sides of the river in the vicinity of the bow. Many of these were still undecayed, though they were fallen many years before. They were undoubtedly cut for manufacture into boards and the like, and were never sawed on account of the destruction of the mill. From this time onward, the French sawed no more lumber at this place.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE WATER-POWER.

In the year 1789, the dam across our river was commenced under the direction of Thomas Butterfield, then acting as agent for Ira Allen, the owner of the Falls. When nearly completed, this dam was swept off by a flood, and the work suspended until the next year, when the contract for building it was let by Butterfield to Lemuel and Elias Lasell, brothers, and they completed it in 1790. I fix this date from the recollection of Azriah Lasell, son of Lemuel, one of the contractors. Mr. John Pratt came here at the age of 8 years, in 1793, and this date of building the dam is according to his recollection. I further learn from Mr. Elias Truax, a man now (1874) living at Franklin, 102 years of age, that he was here at the time the dam was being built, and gives this as the date.

Mr. Allen caused a saw and grist-mill to be put in operation on the east side of the river the next year after the completion of the dam. Soon after this, another saw-mill was erected at the west end of the dam, employed mostly at first in manufacturing lumber for home use. These mills were a great convenience to the early settlers, as they could get lumber of first quality in any quantity and at low prices. A few years later there was another saw-mill put up at the west end of the dam, outside of the one first mentioned, owned for many years by Oliver Potter. About the year 1806, a mill was erected on west side of the river, by Elisha Barney, on the spot now occupied by the brick wagon shop of the Messrs. Bullard. Some years after this, about 1818, two more saw-mills were put up by Amasa Clark, on Lemuel Barney's privilege, just below the last mentioned. Afterward, this privilege was occupied by a marble factory belonging to H. B. Farrar. The site is now vacant.

In 1824 or '5, the Farrars (Wm. & H. B.) and Stockwell, built what was known as the Stockwell mill. It was placed on the out or stream side of the first mill built by Allen on east side of river. After having been for many years in operation, they both were removed to make place for the large brick grist-mill which was built in 1833.

About the year 1828, Elisha Barney built a saw-mill on the site now occupied by Eli Richardson's shop, at the west end, and below the bridge. The two mills at first built at the west end of the dam were carried off by a flood in Jan. 1832. Two more were erected in their place the next year; one by I. A. Pratt; the other by Geo. Barney. These mills did a good business for more than 30 years. One has been suffered to go down. On the site of the other there has been erected a new and improved mill, with circular saw, now (1882), owned and carried on by A. K. Wanzer. In the year 1834, R. L. & H. W. Barney built a substantial saw-mill near the old forge. This mill did a large business for some 35 years; is now (1882), removed, no building occupying its site.

A two gang mill was built about 1838, by I. A. Pratt, G. Green & Joseph Blake, at the lower end of the long flume, on the east side of the river, and another on the outside of the same flume, just above what was known as the old brick factory, by the writer, Geo. Barney, on contract for V. S. Ferris & Co. in 1833. All the saw-mills on the easterly side of the river have long since gone out of existence, and there is now (1874), no saw-mill doing business in the place except the circular saw-mill owned by Mr. Wanzer, this result being due to the scarcity of timber which now is only sufficient to afford lumber for one mill.

From about the year 1806 to 1818, the principal business of the saw mills was to make 3 inch plank or "deal," as they were called, for the Quebec market, there being no market south, as the northern canal was not yet completed. The great quantity of pine timber furnished abundant material for these mills; and immense rafts were sent yearly to Quebec and from thence to Europe.

This kind of business was carried on most largely by S. W. & S. S. Keyes. They for the most part either contracted with the mill owners, to supply them, or hired them to saw the logs which they themselves furnished. Masts and spars, in immense quantities, and for many years, were taken from the vast forests of pine, and drawn to the river and floated. Mr. John Pratt (now, 1874, dead,) was then young, and an adept in this kind of business. He some years since informed me that he drew masts and spars for 12 years in succession for the Keyeses. He drew one winter 500 spars from a space not to exceed one and half acres. This shows the immense burden of pine timber on those lands at that time. When they took masts from lands belonging to Mr. Ferris, the uniform price was $5 per tree, which must have afforded a large revenue.

The Keyeses also manufactured a large amount of those plank at Highgate Falls; and in order to get them below the Falls at Swanton, the constructed an apron, or slide, to the dam here, joining it to the top, and running an inclined plane some 60 or 70 feet to the rocks below. This being well planked over, left a smooth descent for the water. The lumber was rafted at Highgate a short distance below the Falls in strong cribs, about 40 by 50 feet square and from 2 to 3 feet thick, well bound together with long "floats" at the bottom, on which the plank were laid, and "travis poles" on top connecting with the "floats" by means of "pickets," which bound all securely together. Twenty of these cribs, more or less constituted a raft; these were then floated as the river runs about 6 miles to Swanton, and fastened to the shore 100 rods, or so, above the Falls. When the water in the river become sufficiently high, a crib at a time was taken from the raft by 8 or 10 men, and by means of large oars and poles, and a large long boom running from the east side of the slide to the shore, they were guided, and run over on the slide, and then plunged into the foaming current below, being thus often covered with 3 or 4 feet of water. On the rising of the raft or crib to the surface, the men were all on the alert, some seizing their long oars, others their setting poles, in order to bring their charge into the eddy below. This they usually effected, tho' sometimes they found themselves carried far down the stream before they could bring their crib to the shore. Well does the writer remember that those occasions were times of great excitement, both to the actors and the spectators, of the scene. Here was the sublimity of nature, in the ceaseless rush and flow of the swollen current. There the danger, the daring, and the skill of man; here also a throng of excited and anxious spectators, their loud hurrah! mingling with the roar of the waters when the raftsmen were successful in their task.

These cribs being lashed together, formed long rafts, on which were comfortable houses or shanties built, in which the men were to board and lodge while taking the rafts to Quebec. The men having the rafts in charge floated them with the current down the river into the lake; there being but little current in the lake, they had to depend mainly upon favorable winds to move them forward, being guided in their course mainly by huge oars, operated by three or four men each. The course of these rafts was down the Missisquoi from the Falls to the Lake, about 7 miles, in a northerly direction, thence by the Lake in a southerly direction to the southerly point of Alburgh, known as the "point of the tongue," about 10 miles, thence northerly in the Lake until they entered the Sorelle River, continuing in this until they entered the River St. Lawrence, thence onward until they arrived at Quebec. Men leaving Swanton on these rafts did not generally return in less than two or three months.

After the completion of the northern canal connecting Lake Champlain with the Hudson, about the year 1822, there was an entire change in the lumber business. No lumber was sent to Quebec, but all was prepared for a southern market. The pine timber then remaining after so heavy previous drafts upon it, was mostly sawn in plank, 1½ inch thick, and into one inch boards. About the spring of 1822, the Keyeses made an immense raft of this kind of lumber, which was sent southward by the Lake and canal. It having been much injured by the muddy waters of the canal, did not prove a profitable enterprise. From this time forward, no more rafts were run over the slip, and no more lumber in rafts sent to market, but was sent in boats. After the Keyeses left and transferred their lumbering to Highgate, Messrs. W. & H. B. Farrar engaged in the business most largely for some years. Owing the Stockwell mill, they kept it in operation, having other mills, and buying lumber from other mill owners, they thereby obtained large quantities, all of which was sent by boats to the southern market. About the year 1825, Doct. Jonathan Berry commenced trade here in the old brick store, and bought the Potter mill, and for a few years done a large business at lumbering. Up to about the year 1828, the lumber manufactured here was mostly pine. At this time, it began sensibly to diminish, and the attention of mill owners was directed more to the making of hemlock boards and joist; but as the pine diminished in this immediate vicinity, it was sought at greater distances.

The winter of 1829, 30, Elisha Barney, father of the writer, commenced lumbering in Canada, cutting pine logs, floating them down Pike River in the spring, rafting them in cribs at the mouth of Pike River, floating them across Missisquoi Bay, 6 miles, to the mouth of Missisquoi River, thence up to the Falls. These were the first logs brought from Canada to be sawed in Swanton. This business was attended with great risk, as the logs when in the river were liable to be driven into the Lake by floods, and when rafted in the Lake were exposed to high winds, and the rafts broken and logs scattered for miles along the shore. But though the risk was great, different persons engaged in it for some years, the last rafts of any amount being brought from Canada to Swanton about the year 1836. A few large rafts of pine logs were brought here from Alburgh, about 1834 and '5. Messrs. Green & Blake commenced the manufacture of spruce lumber for the southern market, about 1839, procuring their logs near the head waters of the Mississiquoi; floating them down when the water was at its highest point in the spring. They were sawed mostly in the two gang mill, on the east side of the river. These logs as they were floated down the river were guided by a boom, and run in between the shore and Little Island, about a mile above the Falls, at the lower end of which they were stopped by a boom, and afterward brought down to the Falls as wanted. This, too, was a business of much risk, as booms were liable to give way at every flood and let the logs go over the Falls and be scattered on the shores of the Lake. This business continued for a few years only. During the years from about 1830 to 1850, there was more or less of hemlock sawed for the southern market, some years in large quantities, but on account of the extreme low price for which it was sold never was a source of much profit. Very little, if any lumber of any kind, has been sent to the southern market since 1855, and the mills one after another have been suffered to go to decay, or put to other uses, until but one remains that is now doing business [1875]. Instead of exporting lumber as in past years, we are now importing. H. M. Stone, Esq., is now [1874] doing a large business importing by the car-load for the home market. a. (See Appendix.)

The writer commenced his business life in the lumber business connected with merchandise, and from 1832 to '43, sent considerable quantities of hemlock to the Southern market. He is now (1875) buying the same article by the car-load, imported from the forests of New York State, paying from one to two hundred per cent. more than the price he once sold for, so great is the change in the lumber business in Swanton.

THE PLUMPING MILLS.

An article of prime necessity among the early settlers, as they were termed, were much in vogue at an early day, before the flouring mills. One of these was usually the first thing constructed out of doors or within the cabins, after a temporary shelter had been erected. In a large stump at the top, or a log of wood, a hole was chipped or charred out with fire, until it would hold a few quarts of corn, when a spring-pole was attached by one end to the side of the house, or some other weight sufficient to hold it to the ground, and so the other end would be directly over the charred bowl or mortar, to the upper end of which pole was attached a heavy piece of wood called "plunger," or plumper, which served as a pestle. By moving the spring-pole up and down, and guiding thus the direction of the plumper, corn enough for a meal was speedily broken and prepared.

FLOURING MILLS.

The first grist-mill at the Falls was erected by Ira Allen, in 1791. This mill stood on the site now occupied by T. B. Marvin's sash, door and blind factory, directly below and on the opposite side of the bridge from the present large grist-mill. About the year 1804, or '5, another grist-mill was built by Isaac Hull on the west side of the river, a few rods below the brick wagon-shop belonging to James Bullard, on the ledge of rocks, at the head of the Island. This mill was carried off by the flood about the year 1813. A large spar coming down the rapids, went directly into the lower part of the mill frame, the upper end of the spar swinging round with the strong current, wrenched the lower posts from their places, which let the mill tumble over into the stream, and it was carried bodily far down the river. The brick and stone building which was occupied for many years by the Platts as a woolen-factory, and more recently by Mr. Meigs for the same purpose, and now (1882) a part of the tannery, was originally built for a grist-mill in the year 1816, and was run as such for many years, attended by John Dunbar and his sons, until the completion of the large mill in 1833, when it was appropriated by Thomas Webster to the grinding of plaster and making of shingle until 1844, after which it was converted into a woolen-factory.

The large brick grist-mill, near the east end of the dam, was erected and put in operation by the Messrs. J. A., V. S. & E. M. Ferris, under the firm name of V. S. Ferris & Co., in 1833. No expense was spared by these gentlemen to make this a first-class mill: and at its completion it doubtless was the best mill in the State. The great improvement since that day in water wheels and mill machinery, has led the owners to change the old wheels for a more improved sort, and alterations have been made in other parts of its machinery. It has done a large business from the time of its completion to the present, and is at this date (1882,) doubtless doing as large and as profitable business as at any time in its past history. It has been owned by H. P. Hickok, Moses Catlin, Fletcher Tarbell, and R. H. Hoyt, Elias Burnell, Joseph Blake and Norman Laselle, Hiram Platt and Edgar Bullard, and is owned at the present time, 1874, by the Messrs. Hawleys, who soon after sold to James Delaney. It is now (1882) being run by Major Bullard and G. Dunbar. Another was erected about 1863, by Lorenzo Laselle, and has been owned and carried on by him to about 1876, doing custom work mostly, and has given good satisfaction, and been profitable doubtless to the owners. It was sold by Mr. Laselle to Mr. Dunbar, who carried it on a year or two, when he sold to Mr. A. Laselle, who has carried it on with great energy and acceptance to the public. He has but recently sold out to Mr. Carman (March, 1882), he taking Mr. Carman's farm in Highgate, and Mr. Carman taking the mill. There was a grist-mill standing on the site of the upper end of the present new tannery, but I fail to find when or by whom it was built. It was known as the "Little Mill," and was attended by a man by the name of Wagoner, who was killed by the bursting of a mill-stone, when running at a very high speed, probably about the year 1807 or '8. This mill, it is said, was burnt, and if so, it must have been about 1809, as I learn from V. S. Ferris, Esq., that his father erected on this site, then vacant, a building for wool-carding and cloth-dressing in 1810.

After the grinding of grain, the next business of importance engaged in at the Falls, was

THE MANUFACTURE OF IRON.

Among those who came to town in 1800 was Elisha Barney and family, the father of the writer, who, with his brother, originated the iron business here, and perhaps we cannot convey a better idea of the condition of things at that time than to give the account as related to the writer by his mother in the year 1866, she being then in her 90th year, and her mind but little if any impaired, and she having resided here during all this time, with the exception of a year or two. The narrative as taken in substance from her own lips, though somewhat circumstantial, we will give as the value of details increase as years multiply.

She was married to Elisha Barney in Taunton, Mass., in 1794. His brother Rufus, considerably older than himself, had several years before moved to Bennington, Vt., to whom they made a visit in 1796, and they at that time determined to leave their native town, and move to Bennington the next year, and bargained for a farm; but when they arrived to take possession of the farm the next year, the owner refused to sell on the terms previously agreed upon, giving as his reason that Mr. Barney was two or three days later than as agreed. This disappointment to Mr. Barney, from what may be deemed a trivial cause, changed the whole course of his after life, and decided the location of his posterity in the north, instead of the south part of the State.

Representations had been made to his brother, Capt. Rufus Barney, by those who had been north, that in Swanton or Highgate there was great water power on the Missisquoi river, and iron ore in abundance at convenient distances, with plenty of timber for making coal, all of which combined, afforded advantages for establishing the iron business seldom offered. My father, being disappointed in obtaining the farm before mentioned, was induced by his brother to come with him north on a tour of inspection.

They left Bennington in the fall of 1798, came north, and first made an effort to purchase the water-power in Highgate now known as Keyes' Falls, then owned by a man by the name of Potter, and then called Potter's Falls; but he refused to sell, and they then concluded to purchase from Silas Hathaway the undivided half of 200 acres (Simeon Hathaway, Jr., owning the other half of the 200 acres), on the westerly side of the river at Swanton Falls, which took in all the water-power below the dam on the west side of the river. After closing their trade, Feb. 23, 1799, they returned to Bennington, and my father from thence to Taunton, Mass. In the spring, Elisha Barney employed a man by name of Ricord to come to Swanton and build a small house, and assist in preparing for the erection of a forge. He also furnished a span of horses, and hired Mr. John Dunbar to go to Swanton with them and take his family with him. As Dunbar was a bloomer by trade, it was designed he should work at making iron as soon as the forge was completed. Capt. Rufus came from Bennington with Dunbar to Swanton, and remained during the season, boarding at the widow Holgate's, the only tavern then in the place. He superintended building the forge, forge-dam and long flume from the main dam to the forge-pond. They had to dig a channel where the forge-pond now is, then covered with a heavy growth of pine. This was in 1799, and they built a small frame-house, at that time connected with the forge privilege, on "the Island"—the first frame-house on the west side of the river, about 6 rods to the west of the house now owned by Geo. Bullard, 2d. This house was demolished years ago. Having given a careful oversight to these operations during the season, Capt. Rufus returned to Bennington, Elisha having remained in Taunton during the year. At length, Feb. 20, 1800, he, with wife and two children, Rufus and Evaline, left Taunton with horses and sleigh for Swanton, by way of Bennington, arriving there in 5 days. Leaving there the next Wednesday morning, they proceeded on their way toward

Swanton. There came on a severe storm, and snow fell very deep and hindered them much. On the third day, near night, the sleigh turned over, and all were buried in snow. It being near night, and no tavern near, they sought lodging at a private dwelling near. The people received them kindly, but could not lodge them, so they took their own bed from the sleigh, and made it on the floor, and passed the night very comfortably. They arrived in Swanton on the Tuesday night after leaving Bennington, and lodged at the house of Levi Hathaway, a log-house which stood on or near the place where C. H. Bullard carried on the manufacture of wagons and sleighs many years. There is now no building on the spot. The next morning they took breakfast at Holgate's. There were then large stumps on the green, and they nearly covered with snow. They crossed the river on the ice, and took up their residence in the small frame-house built the season previous. It was, however, already occupied by two families, James Hoard and wife and Asa Witherell and wife and some 4 children. Their domicile was not very airy, but they were young and could endure privations, looking forward for better days. At that time the west side of the river was covered with the forest nearly to the river. A spot had been cleared on what is known as Willow Point, near the mouth of the Forge brook. On this spot there was a little grass, but in no other place nearer than about a mile below the Falls, on a plat now covered by a beautiful grove of pine trees, which have come up and grown since that time. There were a few farms cleared by the Indians, two or three miles below the Falls, one in particular where the Indian village formerly stood, now the farm owned by Asa Brooks. There was also the Wagoner farm, with Rood's and Hilliker's, already mentioned. There was one saw-mill only on the west side of the river, that was at the west end of the dam owned by Hathaway. This saw-mill, with the house they moved into, and a log-house on the site of the one now owned by the Scott family, and occupied at the time by John Dunbar and family, were all the buildings on the west side of the river at the time of their arrival about two months after, the beginning of the present century.

On the east side of the river there were 9 families: Joseph Robinson, living in a house near where Nelson Bullard now resides; Levi Hungerford and Dr. Smith, both families in one house, on the flat ground near the old tannery below the hill, in rear of the old stone house; Thos. Butterfield, on summit of hill near where the old stone house now stands; Orange Smith, house near where the Ferris house now stands; Widow Holgate, whose husband, Asa Holgate, died about one year previous, house near where Lorenzo Lasell's now stands; Joseph Clark, house below the hill near the residence of A. Forbes; Old Spoor, as he was called, house on hillside near the present site of bank; Jonathan Butterfield, house near the old ferry.

There were no goods kept in the place for sale, nor were any to be had nearer than St. Albans Bay. There was also a house standing on land now owned by Geo. M. Kidder, near the hollow east of the village, in which Alex. Ferguson soon after kept a small assortment of goods for sale.

John B. Joyal, who lived to a great age, as will be noticed in another place, then lived at, and kept a ferry about one mile south of the village, and some time after assisted in building and kept a toll-bridge near where the ferry was kept, which ever after went by the name of Old John's bridge. Levi Scott, who married Silence, the daughter of Capt. Rufus Barney, at Bennington, made his arrangements to leave Bennington with Elisha Barney, but did not in consequence of the severe storm, but waited a few days, and arrived in Swanton about one week after. He moved into one part of the log house occupied by John Dunbar. The Scott family have ever since retained the land on which this first house on the west side of the river was built. Scott took a part of Capt. Rufus Barney's interest in the forge. He, Rufus, came on about the month of May, bringing with him his Uncle Jonathan and his two sons, who all labored during the season on the forge and improvements connected therewith. In the meantime, wood was prepared and set together in large heaps, and a covering of straw and earth placed over them. These heaps were called coal pits, a name not very appropriate, as a pit denotes a hollow or depression, while these were exactly the reverse. These pits were set on fire at the top, and the fire regulated by vents made through the earth covering, and thus slowly burned to charcoal. A number of these were burned during this season, Asa Witherell, an old man, being the collier. Bog ore was dug from the wet land about a half mile east of the village, and was then known as the ore swamp. This kind of ore was formed by being deposited from water, highly impregnated with iron, which stood on the surface of the swamp nearly or quite the year around. It was shoveled from the surface of the ground, the water generally covering it, the workmen standing in the water. After much of labor and delays, they got the forge completed, and commenced making iron in Nov. 1800, this being the first wrought iron made in this section of country. The business was discontinued during the winter, and resumed in the spring of 1801. To Seth Pollard belongs the distinction of making the first iron in Swanton. According to the recollection of my mother, he waited here a long time for the completion of the forge, before leaving for Bennington, which he did soon after making the first iron. John Dunbar also worked at the business, from the start, or nearly so, he probably being what was known as the "hammersman," or the man that forged the iron under the hammer.

There were a number of iron workers, or bloomers, ready for work on the completion of the forge, among the names remembered by my mother are Major Keep, Isaac Williams, Job Spinks, and a collier by the name of Heddel.

About the time of the completion of the forge, perhaps a little before, Lemuel Barney, son of Capt. Rufus, arrived and stayed some two months, when he left for Canaan, Conn., where he had previously married Anna Hinman. He returned to Swanton the winter following, but did not bring his wife. She, however, came in the spring of 1801, and they began keeping house on the east side of the river, remaining there about four months, when they moved into the house occupied by Elisha Barney, taking the part which Witherell had previously vacated. After Lemuel arrived with his wife, his father, Capt. Rufus Barney, in 1803, gave up his interest in the iron business to him, and Levi Scott, his son-in-law; they then (1803) owning one-half, and Elisha Barney owning the part if not all of the other half.

After this Capt. Rufus took no direct interest in the business, but came up from Bennington every year for many years after, to see how his brother and children were doing.

This first forge was erected on what is known as the forge privilege, at the easterly end of the forge dam.

Iron was made in considerable quantities from year to year, and was sold principally to blacksmiths from the neighboring towns, much of it was made into tire-iron, sleigh-shoes, mill-irons, plow-shares, etc. The price of common bar-iron was $7 per 100 lbs., (gross,) and remained so more than 20 years.

About 1816, this forge was burnt in the night. When on fire, a timber burnt off and fell on the gate-lever, raised the gate and set the large hammer in motion, which striking the solid anvil very fast, made a loud noise, and roused many from their slumbers. It was rebuilt and carried on mostly by Lemuel Barney, until about 1821, when the old building having become dilapidated, its use was discontinued and a new forge built on the westerly side of it, by Elisha Barney and Robert Foster, his son-in-law, in 1821; carried on by them until 1824, when it was purchased by R. L. & H. W. Barney, who carried on the business for many years.

This building becoming old, was removed and a new one erected in its place, in the summer of 1849, by Friend H. Barney, son of Lemuel, H. W. Barney, son of Elisha, W. S. Thayer, son of Amherst, and E. S. Meigs, son of Benjamin. This forge for making iron was a great improvement on the old one. This company operated the forge only a few years. After this, Mr. F. H. Barney continued the business, manufacturing mostly "blooms," for the southern market, until about 1868. Since which, there has been no iron manufactured in the place, and the forge suffered to go to decay, when in 1872, it was entirely removed and a fine lumber circular saw-mill erected in its place, owned [1882] and carried on by A. J. Barney, son of H. W., built about 1875.

Thus after 68 years from its commencement the business has gone down; the causes are not a mystery; bog ore that was abundant, and could be had for the shoveling from the surface of the ground, since about 1835 became scarce by the lands that produced it being drained; coal which for many years was cheap, after wood had been cut off and become valuable, became dear, and it became impossible to compete with works in more favored regions.

Mr. C. H. Mead tells me he has heard his father, Caleb Mead, say that about 1810, he dug bog ore from land directly in front of where the present residence of Deacon Harvey Stone now stands, and drew what he could with a horse-team to Sheldon furnace all of one winter.

POTASH.

The first settlers in clearing their lands, made large quantities of ashes, and many of them procured potash kettles, and commenced manufacturing potash, which was sold to merchants, or sent direct to the Montreal market. It was about the only article they could then produce and turn to cash. I remember once hearing a manufacturer say about 1826, the most of the farmers relied on their ashes to get money to pay their taxes.

Aside from the farmers who made potash on a small scale, were the merchants also that produced it in larger quantities. There was an establishment for making it on the easterly bank of the river, about 50 rods below Barney's marble mill, a little above the present "brick yard." This was built, it is thought, by A. Bostwick in 1808 or '9, as it is known that he built one about that time. There was also another on the east bank about 20 rods above the dam, owned by W. & H. B. Farrar; this they removed about the year 1825, [because complaint was made that the refuse ashes filled up the flume,] and built another some 60 rods above. The Farrars did a large business in this line, from about 1823 to 1838, keeping two or more teams constantly on the road, gathering ashes from the farmers of this and neighboring towns. Nothing of any amount in this line has been done in town for many years.

LIME

was made here in considerable quantities, probably before 1800. The writer can well remember over 60 years ago there was a lime kiln at the ledge near the entrance of the old covered "John's Bridge"; Benj. Joyal carried it on for years; later, another on a large scale was built by the Ferrises, known as "the big lime kiln," near the old Underhill and Ferris quarry, on the ledge about 20 rods westerly of Grand Avenue, and about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile from the falls. Improved kilns were afterward built by C. W. Rich, Esq., in the southerly part of the town, on the line of the Vt. & Canada R. R., about 1850, from which great quantities have been made and shipped almost continuously for the past 30 years to all parts, and is still successfully carried on. Some $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of C. W. Rich's works on the same railroad is the extensive kilns of C. H. Fonda. This kiln is near what is called the Gadcomb cut, and is on the same ledge, on the western side of which Asa Abels encamped the first night he came into town, about 1790, and encountered the bear spoken of in another place. In March, 1878, Messrs. E. W. Jewett & Co., commenced the burning of lime in a kiln about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the village, a side track from the St. J. & L. C. R. R. is extended to the works, and there is every indication that the business is carried on successfully. It is known in market as the "Champlain Lime," and stands among the first as to purity and strength. All these different ledges are of about the same nature, and all make excellent lime.

WOOLEN MILLS.

Luther Drury, the father of Mrs. Elcazer Goodrich, was the first, it is said, to put up a carding machine at Swanton Falls. Connected with this was a cloth-dressing establishment, he started in 1806, in a part of the building, erected for a grist mill, on the west side of the river. About 1803, a building was erected just above what is now the west end of the bridge, by Heman Hopkins, used at first for cloth-dressing alone, to which, perhaps about 1808, wool-carding was added. It was afterwards carried on by Hopkins & Robinson in 1815, and later. Another shop for wool-carding and cloth-dressing was put up by Jona. Ferris, Esq., on the east side of the river, where the tannery now stands; in 1810, it was leased to Mr. Reed, and in 1811 to Elijah Jackson, who carried it on until it was burned in 1813. In 1815 Capt. James Platt, commenced carding and cloth-dressing on the west side of the river. In 1820, the establishment originally owned by Capt. H. Hopkins, was taken and carried on by Warren Ives, and John Carlton. About 1825, Messrs. Higgins and Twitchell, two young men from Middlebury, took the concern and managed it for awhile with energy. Mr. Twitchell having died in 1828, Mr. Higgins removed to Sheldon, where he died soon after. The works were next leased and carried on by Mr. Orlin Converse about 2 years. Mr. Jedediah Tuttle bought the property in 1829 or '30, and carried it on as was thought with profit. He finally sold out to A. D. Story, who carried it on until about the year 1845, when it was discontinued. In 1832, Capt. Platt, finding his premises too small, removed the building before used, and erected a large one on the same site now occupied (1874) by Geo. Barney & Sons, as a marble shop. He continued to carry on the manufacture of woolen here until 1841. He then left the west side of the river, and occupied the building at the east end of the bridge where the tannery now is, for wool-carding and other like purposes. Capt. Platt, having in 1844 purchased the building on the east side of the river, first a grist mill, and having mostly rebuilt it, converted it in 1846 into a WOOLEN FACTORY.

As such it was used until about 1872. In 1845, Messrs. A. D. Story and Alanson Platt purchased the machinery belonging to the Heman Hopkins' mill, and manufactured woolens for a while. The new firm of "Jas. Platt & Co." having been formed in 1848, prosecuted the business on the east side of the river. In 1851, Hiram Platt took the establishment, and continued to carry it on alone until 1864, when he went into company with A. D. Smith, they having enlarged and extended their works. After the dissolution of this company, Hiram Platt carried on the business for some years, when he sold to Mr. E. S. Meigs, who run it for a few years, and discontinued it in 1872, when, from the high price of wool, it could not be made profitable. The building has since become a part of the new tannery. There is now (1874) no woolen factory in the place, and but one carding machine, which is kept by Mr. Lorenzo Laselle, for doing custom work, in a building opposite his grist mill below the bridge. To the business of lumber, iron and potash that have failed to be remunerative, we have to add the manufacture of woolen goods, which for many years was prosecuted with advantage, and it is hoped may be renewed with like results at no distant day.

MARBLE BUSINESS.

To Joseph Atkinson belongs the distinction of being the first to erect mills, and engage in the business of marble sawing, in this section of the country. He took a lease of a water privilege on the east side of the river, from Jonathan and Elijah Ferris, Oct. 12, 1811, and erected a mill in the year 1812 on the same. The site of this mill is now covered by the new tannery.

Mr. Atkinson took in two partners in 1813, and from the records it appears that they sold out the mill, and stock of marble then on hand, to S. W. & S. S. Keyes, in 1814. As there is no trace of a record of conveyance from the Keyeses, it is probable the mill and privilege reverted to the lessor for non-payment of rent; as it is known to the writer that the mill was in possession of the Ferrises in 1820.

The next mill was built by John Ferris, of New York, in 1815, at east end of the dam. These mills produced little else but grave-stones, and these were mostly sawed 2 inches thick, and sufficiently long to set in the ground. But few, if any, grave-stones were set in bases in those days in this section. The marble blocks sawed in these mills were taken from a quarry, about half mile eastwardly from the Falls, and is known as the dove marble. It is a strong and durable marble, and susceptible of a high polish. Grave-stones may be seen made from this marble in nearly all the burial-places in Northwestern Vermont, and seem as firm as when first set. Those quarries have not been worked for many years; the chief cause being that it is not as easily worked, as most other marbles, consequently cannot be produced at a price to successfully compete with them.

About 1820, in anticipation of the opening of the northern canal, Messrs. Underhill & Ferris, of New York, erected a very large mill, where Lasell's grist mill now stands, with eight gangs for sawing and other machinery for moulding, turning and polishing marble for mantles, and other furniture for the New York market. They employed a large number of men, and finished mantles, and other marble ready to set up, all from the dove marble. They being Quakers, the color of the marble corresponded precisely to what they considered the color of marble should be, and doubtless they thought themselves in duty bound to introduce it, wherever they could, especially if it paid well. There are doubtless hundreds of these old-fashioned mantles now standing in buildings in the older portions of the city of New York. Vessels came up the river and loaded marble at the mill, and took it through direct to New York. The first vessel that came up the river to load marble was not, however, a canal boat, but a small sloop, in 1822 or 3, called the "Jane of Georgia," Thomas Clark being her captain.

Samuel Hoffman was sent here in 1820, by Underhill & Ferris, to superintend their business, and kept goods. For some cause this branch of the marble business did not prove successful, and after a few years was discontinued, and the mills were suffered to go to decay,

About 1822 a black marble ledge was discovered in Canada, just over the line, on or near the farm then owned by Thomas Best. Measures were at once taken to develop it; large blocks were drawn to Swanton, and sawing it for market commenced. It was sent to New York unfinished, or as it came from the saw. The persons most largely engaged in this business were Julius H. Rice, Allen & Ezekiel Pratt and Joseph Tillison. This marble was sawn mostly in the old mill built by John Ferris in 1815, that stood immediately below the eastern end of the dam. This marble from the Canada quarry proved objectionable, on account of the expensiveness of quarrying, and the distance of hauling to the mills, but chiefly on account of its containing iron pyrites, which gave it the appearance, when polished, of having small brassy spots on the surface.

About 1823, Julius H. Rice erected a marble mill, which is the same building now (1882,) owned by the estate of T. B. Marvin, and is used as a door, sash and blind factory, and stands on the site of the old first grist mill erected by Ira Allen. About the time of the erection of this mill, there was another black marble quarry discovered on Isle La Motte, in Lake Champlain, about 15 miles from Swanton. This was known as the Clark quarry. This was superior to the Canada marble, as it was free from iron pyrites and produced blocks in better shape, which could be boated from the quarry to within a short distance of the mills. After running his mill for a few months on the Canada marble, Mr. Rice commenced sawing from blocks from the Clark quarry, which soon superseded the Canada marble in market, and the making of that was discontinued. After a few years there arose a misunderstanding between the Clarks, who owned the quarry, and Rice, and he resolved on finding black marble in some other place, to enable him to supply the market without being compelled to buy his blocks from them. He accordingly found a ledge on South Island which promised well, but after spending a large sum in opening the quarry it proved worthless. Not to be foiled he continued his search, and at length, about 1832, discovered a superior black marble at Glens Falls, N. Y. He caused some blocks to be quarried, and brought them to Swanton to be sawn and tested. Being satisfied that the article was of superior quality he secured the quarry and a fine water privilege at Glens Falls near the quarry, and erected extensive mills there about 1833 or '4, abandoning the business in Swanton. The business of manufacturing the Clark quarry marble was engaged in by several others previous to Mr. Rice's leaving, and was continued for some years after.

A mill was set in operation for marble sawing by Seth Edson in 1825, at the east end of the bridge, the site of which is now covered by the upper end of the tannery. It was carried on for several years by Mr. Edson, and was burned about 1831. Another mill was erected on the same site by V. S. Ferris & Co., the same year. The large mill erected by Underhill & Ferris, before spoken of, which had become somewhat dilapidated, was repaired and put in running order by Messrs. V. S. Ferris & Co., in the year 1833. The old mill mentioned as erected by John Ferris in 1815, near the end of the dam, was rebuilt about the year 1825 by Pratt & Tillison.

A mill was also set in operation on the west side of the river by Elisha Barney, about 1829. This afterward came into possession of F. V. Goodrich, Esq., and was known as the Goodrich mill, and another was built about 1835 for Lucius N. Rice, which was run mostly on grave-stones. This was near the place now occupied by

E. H. Richardson's shop, at the west end of the bridge. These mills, containing in all some 25 gangs, after being put in proper condition, run for the most part day and night on the Isle La Motte polishing marble, from the Clark quarry mostly, though there was considerable made from another similar quarry, known as the Hill quarry. There was also considerable quantities of what was called hearth-marble, manufactured into hearths. This was distinguished from the kind known as the polishing marble, from the fact it did not take as fine a polish, but was equally as good for hearths, and could be made cheaper. The hearth-marble blocks are procured mostly from the Fisk & Barney quarry, which has become noted, as from it were procured blocks in immense quantities for the piers of the Victoria Bridge across the St. Lawrence at Montreal. The men most largely engaged in the marble business from about 1825 to 1837 were: V. S. Ferris & Co., Dr. H. H. Brayton, Pratt & Tillison, F. V. Goodrich, J. H. Rice, Lucius N. Rice.

The year 1837 was disastrous to almost all kinds of business, and the marble business shared in the general ruin. Many, if not most of the marble dealers in New York failed, and their notes held by the manufacturers here failed to be paid, which brought embarrassment to most who had been engaged in the business. The discouraging financial aspect, together with the introduction of the Glens Falls black marble into market, and the favor with which it was generally received, caused the most of those who had been largely engaged in the business to abandon it, and most of the mills that had been making marble for years were suffered to go to decay, or were appropriated to other uses.

During the years 1838 and '9, but little marble was sawed in Swanton, and this was made into hearths, in the Goodrich mill mostly. A few gravestones were made in the L. N. Rice mill, below the west end of the bridge. Mr. L. N. Rice, in 1839, leased from John Ferris the old Atkinson mill, and having repaired the same, set it running on gravestones mostly.

After the year 1837, there was no further demand for the Clark or Hill quarry marble, and but little was made, but there was for the next few years a gradually increasing demand for hearths, which were extensively used for the mantles made of Glens Falls marble. This led George Barney (the writer), to erect a mill with 6 gangs, about 60 feet below the west end of the bridge, in the year 1840. He confined his business for the first few years exclusively to the manufacture of hearths.

About 1843, Mr. H. B. Farrar erected a mill with 4 gangs, on the west side of the river, on the privilege where once stood the lumber saw-mill owned by Lemuel Barney. This mill was also confined to the hearth business. About 1844, Mr. I. A. & W. D. Vanduzee having purchased the Atkinson mill, commenced also the making of hearths. At that time, 1844, there were engaged in making hearths: F. V. Goodrich, George Barney, H. B. Farrar and I. A. & W. D. Vanduzee. The custom at that time was to saw out 1, 2 or 3 canal boat-loads, of about 75 tons each, and send them on to New York, and meet them there and sell the marble to the dealers from the dock, which would take from 2 to 4 or 5 weeks, depending somewhat upon the amount to be sold and the state of the market.

The writer commenced selling in this way in the spring of 1840, and continued going to New York to sell marble, spring and fall, and sometimes oftener, until 1867, without missing a single year, and has been often since, but not so regular. The sale of marble has changed within the last 15 or 20 years, and it is now (1882) sold at the mills, generally being ordered by dealers in cities or elsewhere.

In 1845, F. V. Goodrich having determined to go to Dubuque, Iowa, to engage in mercantile business with his brother; sold out his mill and interest in the marble business to E. S. Meigs, who continued it until 1847, when he, in turn, sold the same to Geo. Barney. The Vanduzees also sold their mill and business on the east side of the river to the writer, in 1850, thus putting him in possession of all the marble business in Swanton, except the interest of H. B. Farrar.

In 1852, two other mills were started, sawing hearths; one built by Lorenzo Perry, on the lower side of the bridge, opposite L. Lasell's grist-mill, and another, by H. & H. M. Stone, in the same building, formerly built by J. H. Rice for a marble mill, but which had ceased to be used for that purpose for many years. The demand for hearths had already diminished to a large extent, and the increased amount thrown upon the market in consequence of starting two new mills, completely broke it down. The proprietors of these two mills, after running them a year or two, discontinued the business, and one of the buildings was converted to other uses. Mr. Farrar, however, who had bought the Perry mill, continued to do a limited business until 1864, when the writer bought from him all the stock he then had, and one of the Farrar mills has since gone to decay, and the other, which was the Perry mill, is used for other purposes.

The question very naturally suggests itself, why has the demand for black marble hearths so diminished? The answer is briefly this: Up to about the year 1848, nearly all the mantles made in New York were of black marble, or black and gold, as it was called—worked in with the Glens Falls black. The Glens Falls Co. had a monopoly of the market, and so took advantage of it, as to make it oppressive to the dealers, or at least, they thought so. This monopoly produced much dissatisfaction among the dealers, generally, and they encouraged the importation of Italian marble, by purchasing largely, and working it into mantles from the cheapest to the most expensive kind. The marble dealers recommended it to their customers, as being all the fashion—a fashion which of course they themselves had created—and from this time, white and the light colored marbles became all the rage, and the demand for the Glens Falls black marble nearly ceased, but few mantles comparatively being made from it. The consequence was, black hearths were not wanted, or at least the number was comparatively small. Such is the explanation given the writer by the marble dealers themselves. The demand for hearths becoming very limited, it became necessary to either abandon the marble sawing for the Southern market entirely, or else to find something that would take the place of hearths. Fortunately a new article of marble was thought of about the time the demand for hearths began to decline, and this was

MARBLE FLOOR TILE.

Previous to 1846, Italian tile of light and dark blue were the only tile used for flooring. About that time, the writer, with Mr. Joseph Blake, a merchant of Swanton, was stopping at the Pacific hotel, New York, which had a floor of Italian tile. I remarked to him that our black marble ought to be used for floors in New York, instead of the dark Italian. He replied, "That is so, and you are the man to introduce them." This little talk led me to bring the subject before the principal dealers. All spoke discouragingly on the ground. I could not make them at a price to successfully compete with the Italian. After having repeatedly called the attention of the dealers to this matter, I succeeded in the spring of 1848, in getting an order from Fisher & Bird for 2000 12½ inch square tile, finished for laying. Measures were at once taken to put in the proper machinery, and in due time this order was filled, which gave good satisfaction. These were the first black marble tile ever finished and sent to market in this country. They were laid in the then new Free Masons' Hall, Grand street, N. Y.

The demand has increased slowly and steadily from year to year, until they are now introduced into every principal city of the U. S. and Canada, and most of the large villages, and are laid with Italian or Vermont white marble, in most of the large hotels, and other public buildings throughout the country.

In 1860, Job D. Perry, having bought the building and privilege known as the Platt factory privilege, on the west side of the river from Rufus L. and Geo. Barney, established himself in the grave-stone and monument business, making a large addition to the already large building, putting in two gangs for sawing marble. He confined his business exclusively to monuments, grave-stones and cemetery work, and carried on a large and successful business in this line until his death by consumption, May 20, 1867. In June, 1869, this establishment was purchased by R. Lester Barney, (son of the writer) who continued this branch of business for three or four years. It afterwards came into the possession of the writer and is at this date (1875) carried on with other marble mills by himself and son. Now, (1882,) carried on by Calvin Hogle.

In 1860, Geo. Barney, having sold the mill purchased by him from I. A. & W. D. Vanduzee, to Nelson Gallup, to make place for extension of tannery, bought the large saw mill and privilege below what was then known as the old brick factory, together with the building erected on the premises for a foundry, which he enlarged and put in new machinery for sawing marble. This has great advantages over others as a marble mill, for the reason that large vessels can come direct to the mill loaded with blocks, which are unloaded with derricks, by means of water power, and the blocks run on cars into the mill. Boats can also be loaded at the mill, with sawed marble which can be transported to New York or Philadelphia without breaking bulk.

In February, 1866, V. G. Barney, son of the writer, having served in the army during the whole war of the Rebellion, —a large portion of the time as Lt. Col. of the 9th Vt. Reg't., returning, became partner in the marble business with the writer, under the firm name of G. & V. G. Barney. He continued in the business until failing health admonished him of the propriety of closing his business and seeking a climate better suited to a constitution seriously impaired by the hardships of the war. His interest in the concern was therefore purchased by the father in 1869, and he, with his family, removed to Minneapolis, Minn., where he resided about 2 years, and then removed to Charles City,

Iowa, where with health somewhat improved he now resides, (March, 1882.)

From February, 1869, to February, 1873, the writer carried on the tile and hearth business alone, on the east side of the river, while at the same time his son, R. Lester Barney, carried on the grave-stone and monument business on the west side of the river. In February, 1873, the writer with his son-in-law, E. P. Parsons, and his son, R. Lester Barney, formed a partnership under the firm name of Geo. Barney & Sons, and they have prosecuted both branches of business on both sides of the river until 1875, when they dissolved, and the writer continued the business alone until 1879, when his son came in and the business is now, (March, 1882,) conducted under the firm name of Geo. & R. L. Barney.

A variety of marble, known as the "Winooski," was discovered in this town by the writer in 1839. As he was on his way home from St. Albans, and while watering his horse near the ledge where some stone had been taken out for a culvert for the railroad, he noticed its peculiar appearance, and placed a stone in his buggy, which, on reaching his home, he had finished up, and found it to be marble of superior quality. He soon after procured a large block, sawed the same, and sent it to New York, where it was regarded with much favor. It was the first of the kind that was sent to market from this section, and was considered by dealers who had used it as superior to other fancy marbles, with the exception that it was very hard to work. Blocks from this ledge, near the water-trough on Samuel Bullard's farm, were taken out in limited quantities from year to year, sawed into slabs, and sold as the market demanded until the writer discovered another variety in 1870, in a ledge about a half mile west of the first, near and south from the railroad junction, since which there have been no blocks quarried from the ledge first mentioned. The texture of this marble is very fine and hard, the color of a light reddish chocolate, blended with still lighter colors of nearly all shades, and these all intermingled with clear white spots and veins.

The name "Winooski marble" is a general name given by Mr. Hagar, the State Geologist, to all and every variety of this kind of reddish variegated marble which crops out occasionally all the way from near Burlington to Canada. The Boston dealers have given this variety the name of "Lyonnaise," as it closely resembles a foreign marble of that name.

The firm of G. Barney & Sons furnished a large quantity of flooring tile from this marble in the year 1873, for the new post-office and sub-treasury building, Boston, Mass.; also a large hotel floor for the Montreal House, Montreal, P. Q.; and more recently for the Patent Office, Washington, D. C.

In taking a retrospective view of the marble business, there may be discovered five distinct periods, in each of which the manufacture of a particular kind has predominated: 1st, from 1812 to 1825, dove marble, from quarries near the Falls; 2d, from 1825 to 1837, black polishing, from Canada and the Clark and Hill quarries, Isle La Motte; 3d, from 1837 to 1853, hearth marble, from Fisk's and other quarries, Isle La Motte; 4th, from 1853 to 1863, black marble tile; 5th, from 1863 to 1882, black, white and red-white vein tile. Of course there is an overlapping and blending, more or less, of one kind into the other, and gravestones and monuments, to a greater or less extent, run through the whole series, as also black marble hearths, from 1837 to the present time, though at times in very limited quantities. The men most largely engaged in these several periods were: 1st, Joseph Atkinson, Atkinson & Hoyt, John Ferris, Seth Edson, I. A. Pratt, Joseph Tillison; 2d, Julius H. Rice, Samuel Hoffman, Underhill & Ferris, Pratt & Tillison, John A., V. S. and E. M. Ferris, and their brother-in-law, Dr. H. H. Brayton, F. V. Goodrich; 3d, F. V. Goodrich, H. B. Farrar, I. A. Vanduzee & Geo. Barney, L. N. Rice; 4th, George Barney; 5th, George Barney, G. & V. G. Barney, Geo. Barney & Sons, Geo. & R. L. Barney.

TANNING OF LEATHER

was engaged in at the Falls by Henry Steinhour, which he continued in for many years, abandoning the business about 1823, and going to Highgate Falls, where he kept a hotel for many years. The tannery was on the flat, in the rear of the store now occupied by Blake & Lawrence, —the old Keyes stand. After this, Thos. Brown carried on a tannery 4 years, till 1832, when he died of consumption, July 21. Mr. Brown built a mill to grind bark about 1830, where the present tannery building stands. Before this the bark had been ground by horse-power.

Nothing more of account was done in this line at the Falls till Mr. E. W. Babcock came here from New Hampshire. He purchased the tannery from Mr. Steinhour, made repairs, and carried on a good business many years.

About 1843, he and his hired man were engaged one evening in some work connected with the steam apparatus, when, from its bursting or some other cause, they were at once enveloped in steam and severely scalded, so much so that their lives were despaired of for weeks. They, however, recovered, though not without permanent injury, especially to Mr. Babcock. He continued the business until 1851, or about that time, when he formed a partnership with Adrian D. Story, under the firm name of Babcock & Story; and they purchased the building at the easterly end of the bridge, then owned and occupied by James Platt as a woolen factory, and the old bark-mill adjoining, and re-modeled the whole for a tannery, putting in vats and improved machinery. They also erected a store building near by, of 2 stories and basement, and continued their business until about 1853 or '4, when they dissolved, Mr. Babcock soon after going West, and buying a large tract of new land in the vicinity of Cedar Falls, Iowa. It is said he succeeded in having the new town where his land was located named "Swanton," in honor of the old Swanton where he had so long resided. Mr. Story, also, about the same time, left Swanton, going to Alburgh, having exchanged his property here with Judge W. L. Sowles, for a portion of his property there. Judge Sowles afterward disposed of this purchase to Messrs. N. & H. Gallup about 1856, who prosecuted the business about 2 years, when H. Gallup retired, and Mr. Nelson Gallup continued it until 1867 or '8. During the time Mr. N. Gallup was engaged in the business he made extensive repairs, and erected the large chimney near by. Mr. Gallup sold out the establishment to Gates & Skinner in 1868 or '9. They continued the business a year or two, when the concern again came into the possession of Mr. Gallup, who sold it in 1871 or '2, to A. M. & P. D. Moore of Plattsburgh, N. Y., who, not residing in town, employed Richard Skinner to superintend the establishment, who so did until a short time before his death, by consumption, in 1872. After the death of Mr. Skinner, Mr. H. F. Martin, from Peru, N. Y., became a partner in the business, which was carried on under the firm name of Moores & Martin. The business was progressing in the most satisfactory manner, when on Feb. 7th, the tannery building took fire, and that with the two-story store building, were entirely consumed. [See notice on fires].

A few months after a stock company was formed under the name of the "Swanton Tanning Co.," with a capital of some $25,000, who, with a view to enlarge the business, added to the premises of the old tannery that was burned, the woolen factory building belonging to E. S. Meigs, and some 35 feet of land between that and the former tannery building, which gives the tannery company all the space between the large flume and the bank from the bridge to Barney's marble mill, covering all the former sites of the old marble mill, immediately below the bridge, afterward Platt's woolen factory, the bark mill, which stood immediately below, also the old Atkinson marble mill of 1812, and the right of way to a saw-mill, which formerly stood outside the flume, already included above. A substantial brick-building was erected in the summer of 1874, extending from the bridge to the Meigs factory, with improved apparatus for generating steam, and other improvements. March, 1882, this tannery has been in operation most of the time since it was built, and has benefited the place by giving employment to 30 or 40 men; yet it has not paid large dividends to its stockholders.

Early, about 1815, Frederick Gove commenced tanning leather on a small scale, on the west road, opposite and a little south of the brick house, known as the Daniel Bullard place, now occupied by Mr. Dorman. This tannery was kept up until about 1840 or '45; but the house, a comfortable one, where Mr. Gove lived many years, and the tannery near by, have long since been taken down. Mr. Gove was regarded as a very honest man, and it is said that the leather tanned by him was of superior quality.

Another tannery in which considerable business has been done, is on a small stream 50 rods or so north of the Bullard watering trough, on the road leading to St. Albans. It was started about 1846, by Mr. Daniel Dean. The firm afterward became Dean & Malony; succeeded by James Malony about 1854, who continued the business about 10 years, when it came into the hands of Elias Burnell, who continued it until about 1866, when it came into the hands of R. T. Wood, who is carrying on the same at the present time, (1875). B. D. Wood commenced a tannery about 1862, at the corner where the Sheldon road intersects the west road, and has continued it, we believe, to the present time, (1875).

BUILDING OF VESSELS.

A large first-class sloop was built here by S. W. & S. S. Keyes, about 1820. The place of building was on the west side of the river, on land now owned by Geo. Bullard, 2d, near the line which separates it from land owned by Miles R. Barney. There was a very large temporary building erected over it for shelter from the weather. Many men were employed in its construction, and it was on the stocks, according to the recollection of the writer, part of 2 years, and launched in the time of high water, I think in the spring of 1821. There was great excitement among the people as the launching drew near. All classes came from far and near, and when all was ready, the prop that held it was removed, and she started slowly on her way, toward her destined element, but, having moved a few feet, she came to a full stop, and those who had waited for hours with great anxiety to see the launch, were grievously disappointed. It soon, however, became understood among the multitude that there would be efforts made to move her into the water. A large hawser was thrown around the bow, the ends of which led off on either side of the vessel, and all hands were requested to take hold of the hawser and pull. A great number at once laid hold, and when the word was given, they pulled with a will, and she soon started; slowly at first, but with gradually increasing speed, slid gracefully at last on her way into the river. Just as she entered the water, amid the loud cheering of the multitude, a man standing on the bow broke a large bottle upon the capstan, and with a loud, ringing voice, gave the name "Montgomery." This sloop was employed for many years to transport lumber from Keyes' dock in Highgate to Whitehall, the lumber being manufactured by the Keyeses at their mills at Highgate Falls, and drawn some 3 miles or more to their dock. After the completion of the sloop, the Keyeses built 3 or 4 large scow boats, each of about 50 tons' capacity.

The next large vessel built was a first-class canal boat, schooner rigged, about 1823; place of construction, on the easterly side of the river, at the mouth of the ravine some 50 rods below Barney's marble mill. The capital for the building of this vessel was furnished mostly by Julius H. Rice, Samuel Hoffman and Thos. Clark, the latter superintending the work. He having had long experience as captain of vessels sailing the Lake, it was designed from the start that he should run the vessel, which he did for many years. She, also, like the sloop above mentioned, stuck on her ways in launching, and was with much difficulty got into the water. She was named the "Washington." After having done a large business for some 20 years or more, she came into the possession of Thos. Webster, who rebuilt and enlarged her, after which she was commanded by Geo. W. Webster, son of Thomas, and did a good business for many years.

After the building of the "Washington," the next canal boat built was the "Royal Oak," by Samuel Bullard, in 1825, on land now owned by Miles R. Barney, some 30 rods above the mouth of the forge brook. She was at that day considered a first-class vessel, of about 80 tons burthen.

These canal boats were so constructed that their masts could be taken down at Whitehall, and after passing through the canal, could be raised again, and the vessel sail down the Hudson. Latterly it has been the custom for boats to leave their masts, sails, etc., at Whitehall, and be towed by steam tug boats on the North River.

BOATING.

After the opening of the northern canal there was large quantities of pine lumber shipped from Swanton for several years. Boats in the Spring of the year would come up the river to the Falls, and go out full loaded, and it was no unusual thing to see two, three, or more loading at one time. When the water became low in the lake, in the summer and fall, the lumber was mostly floated in rafts to the mouth of the river and was loaded there. After about 1832, there was very little, if any, pine lumber exported, but spruce and hemlock were sent off in considerable quantities until about 1848. We are now importing the same kinds of lumber which we have heretofore imprudently and lavishly sent off and paying full double the price for which we sold.

It has been the practice to bring marble blocks here by boats from Isle La Motte for about 50 years. There has not been probably during all this time any one year, except 1879, that there has not been more or less boated in this way. The few first, and indeed for many years, boats would bring up blocks on their decks, "called a deck-load," in high water, and dump them in the water, as near the shore as possible;

then, when the water went down, several ox-teams would be used to get them where a large cart could be got over them, and in this way they would be drawn to the mill. The manner of getting blocks from the boat to the mill has been much improved, as there are now derricks, near the mills, run by water power, to which boats can come full loaded, and be unloaded in a short time, and with great ease compared with the former method. Marble sawed from these blocks may be loaded at or near the mills when water is high in the river, and transported without transshipment to New York, and there has hardly been a year for the last 50 that there has not been from 1 to 10 or 15 canal boatloads sent to New York, with the exception of one or two of the first years of the war, and also the year 1874. The railroads now transport the marble made here to different points much more than in former years, while the boats do less of this business. Iron in former years also in considerable quantities, made by F. H. Barney, has been exported by boats to Troy, in the shape known as half blooms. Boats have also taken brick from the brick yard, owned by M. H. Bullard, on the easterly bank of the river, some 80 rods below the marble mills.

BALED HAY.

The firm of Jewett & Rich commenced the business of baling and shipping hay in Sept, 1872. They erected for this purpose a very large barn at the station, on westerly side of the river, and have shipped immense quantities from year to year almost every year since. Messrs. Rood & Kidder have also shipped large quantities. This business is no doubt profitable to the buyers and shippers, and the farmers selling no doubt derive a temporary benefit, but whether the farms will not suffer for the want of the "farm food" thus sent off, is a problem yet to be solved.

MERCHANTS.

Undoubtedly a fur trade was carried on by the French, they receiving furs in exchange for goods. Metcalf, before spoken of, was also engaged in a similar way on the island that bears his name, at the mouth of the river. The mercantile business at the Falls is, and from the commencement has been, much greater than in any other part of the town. From the best data at our command, we conclude ALEXANDER FERGUSON was the first to keep goods for sale at the Falls, and he commenced the sale in the latter part of the year 1800, at his residence, a small frame-house near the hollow east of the village, on land now owned by Colonel George M. Kidder. The house was removed many years since. In my father's old ledger I find goods credited to A. Ferguson, Feb. 1801.

EZRA JONES commenced keeping goods here about 1802, possibly the latter part of 1801.

SILAS HATHAWAY sold goods in Swanton in 1802 and '3.

ANDREW BOSTWICK built the old brick store standing on the northerly corner of Canada street, as it intersects the common, in the year 1806. It was the first building in the place erected for that purpose. It is now (1882) owned by Fletcher Tarbell, and is occupied by Harvey Lyon. Bostwick sold goods for some years.

SPRAGUE & KEYES commenced selling goods about 1809, in the store at present (1874) occupied by Blake & Lawrence. At that time it stood side to the street, and was but one story high.

S. W. & S. S. KEYES afterward took the business and prosecuted it, in connection with lumbering, with great energy. H. B. Farrar began with them as clerk in 1815.

W. & H. B. FARRAR began in 1823, and did a large goods business in connection with the lumber trade and the manufacture of potash until about the year 1832, when William Farrar sold out and went to St. Albans.

H. B. FARRAR remained in the goods business, adding to it the marble business, and continued for many years in this trade until about 1858, when he discontinued the marble business, but continued to sell goods in limited quantities until he was admonished by the infirmities of age to retire from active life, which he did about 1865, having continued in the mercantile business about 40 years, which is much longer than any other merchant that has ever traded in the place. He after this gave his attention mostly to farming, and died Oct. 10, 1873, aged 73.

I. A. VANDUZEE commenced trade here in 1820, in the store afterward occupied for many years by Dea. A. S. Farrar; now (1874) the building is used as a meat market. Mr. Vanduzee was for a while in partnership with W. & H. B. Farrar, and after this was in trade with F. V. Goodrich. He went to Dubuque, Ia., about 1850, and from thence to Minneapolis, Minn.

A. G. BROWN, son of James Brown, occupied the same building, and traded from about 1827 to 1829 or '30.

ARNOLD S. FARRAR began to sell goods about 1827 in building now ('74) occupied by S. S. Morey; remained there about 2 years, and then took the store that had previously been occupied by A. G. Brown, and continued to trade there until his death, in 1854.

AMASA I. BROWN traded in the brick store from about 1815 to '19. He went West a few years after, and died at Gouverneur, N. Y., June 23, 1855.

G. W. & F. V. GOODRICH opened a store in the wing of the house where Geo. Barney now resides, about 1825. They traded there about 2 years. F. V. Goodrich having built the store on the opposite side of the common, now (1874) owned and occupied by C. Long, took in his brother, C. W. Goodrich, as a partner, and commenced trading there under the firm name of F. V. Goodrich & Co., and continued there about 2 years, and

R. F. FLETCHER commenced trading in the same store in 1830, and remained there about 2 years, when he moved his goods into the store on the corner where the the Dorman block now stands, and continued to trade there until about 1835, when he removed to Ludlow, Windsor Co., and after this did a wholesale grocery business in Boston.

F. V. GOODRICH and GEORGE BARNEY commenced trading, under the firm name of Goodrich & Barney, in the fall of 1831, and dissolved in 1832, when

F. V. GOODRICH and H. K. HOPKINS commenced trade in the old Keyes store, now (1874) occupied by Blake & Lawrence, in 1832, after which they removed their goods into the store in which Mr. Fletcher had been trading. They continued their business until 1835, when Hopkins retired, and the firm name was changed to F. V. Goodrich & Co., the company consisting of F. V. Goodrich, his brother, J. R. Goodrich, and his brother-in-law, Geo. Barney. They continued together about 2 years, when F. V. Goodrich bought out the junior partners, J. R. Goodrich leaving for Illinois in 1838. F. V. Goodrich continued the trade several years, and left for Dubuque, Ia., in 1845, where he and his brother did a very successful mercantile business for years.

GILBERT WILKINSON kept the first store on the west side of the river, in the house on the corner now occupied by A. K. Wanzer, about the years 1810 to '12.

JOHN BARNEY sold goods in the building at the west end of the bridge (now owned by Fletcher Tarbell), in 1825, '6.

LEMUEL BARNEY sold goods a while in one part of his dwelling-house, about 1823 or '4, doing considerable in the lumbering business. His house stood near where Enos Aselstync now resides (1874).

HEMAN HOPKINS, at an early day, traded in a store that stood near the one now occupied by S. S. Morey. This building was burned about 1817, being at the time occupied by Freeman Currier as a saddler's shop.

SAMUEL HOFFMAN came here from New York in 1820 to superintend the extensive marble works of Underhill & Ferris, of New York. He commenced the sale of goods about 1821 in the building standing on the corner opposite the old brick store, where the Dorman block now stands. He occupied the large corner room as a store, and the other part of the building as a dwelling. He traded here until about 1828, when he returned to New York.

A. M. HOFFMAN, brother of Samuel, came here about the same time and engaged in trade, leaving a while after his brother did. He traded in a small building built for the purpose, adjoining the east end of the house now owned by A. L. Wright, Esq.

A. M. CLARK and THEODORE SMITH traded in 1836 and '7, in the store formerly occupied by Samuel Hoffman, after which Clark continued alone for a few months.

V. S. FERRIS & CO. sold goods in the wing of their dwelling-house from about 1833 to 1837, during which time they built the large grist-mill.

WM. M. KEYES sold goods in the store now occupied by S. S. Morey, from about 1815 to 1824. He was also postmaster for several years, and died Dec. 9, 1825, at the age of 57.

G. W. FOSTER began trade in the brick store, about 1822. He soon after formed a partnership with Ethan A. Allen, and continued to trade until about 1825, when the business was discontinued, Mr. Allen going to the Southern States, and it is understood died there. A few years later, Mr. Foster turned his attention to the study of law, and became eminent in his profession.

DOCT. JONATHAN BERRY then took the brick store about 1825, and did a large business in connection with lumber for about 3 years, when he went west, and after this the building remained unoccupied for many years.

GARDNER GREEN and WM. H. BLAKE, the firm being Green & Blake, took this stand in 1835, and carried on the mercantile business until 1837, when W. H. Blake withdrew from the firm, and Joseph Blake, his brother, became the partner of Green, continuing in the same place until 1841, when Mr. Green assumed the business and prosecuted it until 1843, when Mr. F. W. Spear came in with him as partner and remained until 1846. From this time Mr. Green continued the business alone, until 1851, when he sold out to Adams & Cushman.

JULIUS H. RICE and JOHN S. FOSTER began to sell goods about the year 1823, in connection with the marble business, in the building opposite the bank, now occupied by Mr. DeNoel as a grocery, to which he has made a large addition the present year, 1875. This building was erected by J. H. Rice about 1823. Rice & Foster continued the business until about 1831, when they dissolved, Rice going to Glens Falls, and engaging in the marble business there about the year 1834, and Foster going into business at St. Albans.

WM. H. BLAKE, 1st, having bought the building above mentioned, commenced the sale of goods there about 1840, continuing about 2 years, when Mr. Joseph Blake, his brother, became a partner with him in the business under the firm name of J. & W. H. Blake, and continued the business for several years.

GEO. BARNEY was a partner in the firm of F. V. Goodrich & Co., in the mercantile and lumber business, from 1835 to '37. He commenced the business of selling goods in 1839, in connection with the manufacture of marble. In 1853, he bought out the firm of J. & W. H. Blake, and continued to sell goods about one year, when Wm. H. Blake became his partner, the firm name being Blake & Barney, connecting the sale of goods with the marble business. This firm continued to do business about 3 years, since which neither of them have done anything in the way of selling goods. Mr. Blake for many years since has held the office of deputy collector, while Mr. Barney has confined himself mainly to the marble business.

GREEN & LAWRENCE. After Gardner Green had sold to Adams & Cushman, he and Stephen R. Lawrence formed a co-partnership. They began trade in the store near the tannery—since burnt, and not rebuilt—and continued trading about 2 years. Mr. Green having sold out to Lawrence, the latter continued the business about a year, when he took his brother William as partner, and commenced doing business in the store under the bank, and after about one year discontinued it. William died soon after of consumption, Stephen going to New York, connecting himself with a wholesale house there.

DORMAN & BLAKE. Orrin Dorman began the business of selling goods here in the fall of 1851, occupying the building known as the Keyes stand. He continued alone in the business until the fall of 1859, when Mr. George G. Blake became his partner, until the fall of 1862, when Mr. Blake retired from the firm, and James Dorman, Esq., brother of Orrin, who had been in the wholesale business in Boston, became the partner of Orrin, the firm being J. W. & O. Dorman. This firm traded at the old stand until 1864, when the firm was changed to Dorman, Gould & Co., the partners being J. W. Dorman, Orrin Dorman, and J. Azro Gould, who had for years previous been clerk in the establishment. This firm was dissolved in 1868, the Dormans retiring, and G. W. Squiers, who had for some years been clerk, came in as partner of J. A. Gould, the firm being Gould & Squiers. They continued the business at the old store until 1870. In the mean time J. W. & O. Dorman erected the large brick block, on the corner opposite the old brick store, known as the Dorman block. In the fall of 1870, a new firm was formed, consisting of J. W. and O. Dorman, J. Azro Gould, G. W. Squiers and Arthur W. Asselstyn, a former clerk, under the firm name of Dorman, Gould & Co., and commenced business in the new block, occupying two large and deep rooms of the first floor, together with one above, and the basement. This firm continued a prosperous business until the fall of 1872, when it was dissolved, the Dormans and Asselstyn retiring, Gould & Squiers taking the business up to Sept. 1, 1875, when Mr. Gould retired and went into business at Rutland, Mr. Squiers assuming the business here and carrying it on ever since on the cash down system, (March, 1882.)

ARTHUR ASSELSTYNE on retiring from the firm of Dorman, Gould & Co., engaged in the boot and shoe trade, and continued the same until he sold out to H. A. Lawrence, in October, 1878. Since which Mr. Lawrence has carried on the trade until the present March, 1882. He sold out to Mr. A. B. Smith, who now assumes the business.

ADAMS & CUSHMAN, having bought out G. Green, commenced trade in the brick store in 1851, and continued until 1853. N. & G. Adams then took the stand and continued until 1855, when John Adams took the stand and sold goods about one year. He then went to West Virginia, and was there brutally murdered in 1864 by rebel guerrillas, on account of his Union sentiments. Z. Fisk & J. A. Vail traded from the spring of 1848 to December, 1850, in the store now (74) owned and occupied by W. H. Blake, 2d. R. S. Page began trade in the old Goodrich store, owned now by C. Long, about 1841, connecting the sale of goods with tin-ware. R. S. Page, Geo. Sanborn & Co., in 1845, began to trade in the same store, continuing it about two years. Sanborn & Catlin continued the same trade from 1847 to 1853.

A. A. BROOKS, having been in the grocer business in a building fronting the grist mill from about 1845, took the establishment formerly carried on by Sanborn & Catlin, about 1853, and continued it until 1860, when he took in a partner, L. D. Brooks, who after continuing in business about 2 years, went to the war, was a Capt. of Company F. in the 7th Vt. Regt. and was killed in battle. After L. D. Brooks left, Mr. T. B. Marvin became the partner of Mr. A. A. Brooks, and continued the business until 1865, when Mr. Brooks retired, giving his attention to farming.

T. B. MARVIN & SON continued to carry on the business at the old stand until 1868, when it went into the hands of Long & Blake. After about one year, Blake & Wilson took the establishment, confining their trade mostly to hardware, stoves and tin. About one year after this, W. H. Blake 2d, took the business, and has carried it on to the present time, having a few years since changed his place of business, and is now (1882) occupying one of the large stores in "Blak Block" on the site of the old W. & H. B. Farrar store.

HARVEY STONE and his son, Henry M. Stone, sold goods from about 1852 to '56 in the old W. & H. B. Farrar store, and were also engaged in the manufacture of marble.

BRADFORD WILLIAMS began to sell goods in the white store, which he built in 1851, near the depot—now owned by R. Lester Barney, about the year 1852, and traded about one year.

A. B. JEWETT commenced the mercantile business in 1850, in the building now ('74) owned by T. Manahan, and kept as a billiard saloon. In 1853 he built the brick store, now occupied by O. K. Brown & Co. At this stand he continued the business until 1854, when his brother Jason P. became his partner, and the business was carried on under the firm name of A. B. & J. P. Jewett, for about 2 years, when Jason P. retired from the firm, and A. D. Smith took his place, the firm then being Jewett & Smith. This firm continued about one year, after which the business was continued by A. B. Jewett until 1859, when Elisha L. Barney,—son of the writer, became his partner, the firm name being Jewett & Barney. The business was prosecuted by them for about 3 years. The war having commenced, it was thought proper to dissolve, both the partners going into the war. Mr. Jewett afterwards became Colonel of the 10th Regiment, and Barney Colonel of the 6th Regiment, and was mortally wounded in the battle of the Wilderness in May, 1864, and died at Fredricksburgh, Va., May 10th, 1864.

After Jewett & Barney dissolved, Mr. S. S. Morcy became the partner of Col. Jewett. Mr. Morcy kept up the business during most of the time the Colonel was absent in the war. This company dissolved about the year 1865. Col. Janes became the partner of Col. Jewett for about one year, when he retired. Col. Jewett continued the business until 1871, when he sold out his goods and rented the store to O. K. Brown & Co., who are now (1874,) doing business at the old stand. Since this was burned in 1878, he has done business a year or two in one of the Tarbell stores, and continues it now (1882,) in the Tarbell & Farrar block. Since selling out Col. Jewett has devoted the most of his time to the interests of the Lamoille Valley R. R., of which he is a director. He became superintendent of this R. R. about the year 1877, and has continued such to the present time ('82).

J. P. JEWETT commenced the grain business in the store under the Bank in 1855, continued it about 2 years, when he sold out to his brother—

JESSE A. JEWETT, who continued the business until about 1860, when he went into the army, where he lost his health from hardship and exposure, and died soon after his return from the war. He was Capt. of Co. K, 5th Vt. Regt.

E. S. MEIGS commenced keeping drugs and medicines in the store now occupied by Barnes & Matthewson, in 1856; continued there until 1862, when he removed to the store under the bank, continuing in the business until 1868, selling out to D. J. MORRILL, who removed the goods back to the former stand, and continued it until he sold out to DUTCHER & NEVILLE in 1873, who carried on the business for a while in the Dorman block, when Mr. Dutcher took the business; Mr. Carpenter, his nephew, became the manager, who after a few years bought the goods, and is now, 1882, doing business in the Bullard block.

A. D. SMITH, after dissolving with A. B. Jewett, began trading in the old brick store in 1860; after trading here a year or two, he removed to the store afterward occupied by C. S. Hogle & R. D. Marvin, and traded there until he sold out to Hogle & Sowles about 1865—Hogle having been clerk for Smith. Hogle & Sowles continued the business in the same stand until 1867, when Mr. Sowles retired from trade to serve as cashier in the bank.

HOGLE & MARVIN, after this, carried on the business until 1876, when Hogle sold his interest to R. D. Marvin. R. D. MARVIN continued the goods and ready-made clothing trade till 1880.

BARNES & MATTHEWSON commenced the grocer, crockery and fruit business at this place the fall of 1874, in the store previously occupied by Dutcher & Neville as a drug store. Matthewson retired from the business in a year or two, after which Mr. H. C. Barnes has continued the business in the old brick store, and intends to remove to his new store, April 1, 1882.

B. F. ARSENAULT, who has for many years been engaged in the manufacture and sale of boots and shoes, removed his establishment in 1868 or '9, to the store under the bank, when he added the sale of goods to the boot and shoe business, and continued the same until the fall of 1874, when he removed his business to his own building near by, which had been built over, enlarged and fitted up for the purpose. He is now [1882] retired from business and the store unoccupied.

B. C. SHELDON came here a young man from Morrisville, and bought from O. D. Mason the drug store, which had formerly carried on by T. Neville, about 1878. He has since married, and is doing apparently a good business to the present date, 1882.

D. SALTER, jeweler, came here January 20, 1869, and opened a store, and has ever since carried on his branch of business.

H. F. MARTIN came to Swanton, April 7, 1873, as partner in tannery of firm of Moores & Martin; tannery was burned Feb. 7, 1874; rebuilt in summer of 1874; business resumed Oct. 16, 1874, as "Swanton Tanning Co.," for whom Mr. Martin was agent until Aug. 1, 1879, after which he commenced the hardware trade, Mar. 1, 1879, and has continued in that business to the present time, 1882, his store being the northerly one in the Farrar-Tarbell block.

C. HAMILTON BLAKE, son of Wm. H. Blake, 1st, began to trade in groceries Nov. 27, 1877, in the Bullard block, and has continued to the present day (March, 1882).

H. A. COLLINS started trade in the ready-made clothing line in the northerly store in the stone block, Apr. 1, 1880, and continues to the present time (1882).

WHITE BROS. & Co. opened a grocery and provision store in Tarbell block, Jan. 17, 1881, connecting an eating saloon with it; are now in that business (1882).

B. B. BLAKE commenced selling goods in 1871, in the store before occupied by Gould & Squiers; in 1874, took in Henry Lawrence as partner 2 years, when Mr. Lawrence retired, Mr. Blake assuming the business, and carrying it on until burned out in 1877, after which he opened his store in the Bell building, on the hillside near the grist-mill, and continued to trade there until the Blake block was completed, when he commenced trade in the large, middle store in that block, and continues to this date (Mar. 1882).

Mrs. C. H. WAKEFIELD commenced the sale of millinery and fancy goods in one of the Tarbell stores, May 1, 1878, and continues (1882).

MERCHANTS OF EAST SWANTON.

John Brown, from about 1800 to 1815 or '16; Wm. Green, from 1814-'16; George Green, son of William, took his father's place, and traded from about 1816-'27; Gardner Green took his brother George's stand in 1827, and continued to 1834; A. Green & W. H. Blake traded here in 1834, after which Alonzo Green took the establishment, and carried it on from 1835-'44.

MERCHANTS AT SWANTON CENTRE.

Ora Willard, from about 1812-'18; D. B. Meigs & Dr. J. Berry, from about 1820-'24; Ruluff W. Green, from about 1828-'31; Union store, 1835, '36 and '53.

PROVISIONS FOR PUBLIC CONVENIENCE.

The Union Bank was chartered 1850, with a capital of $75,000, went into operation 1851. The first president was Geo. W. Green, Esq., who soon after resigned, when Joseph Blake was made president, and continued to hold the office from 1851 until Feb. 15, 1866, when the name of the bank was changed to the National Union Bank, and on the resignation of Mr. Blake the Hon. Wm. L. Sowles was chosen president, and has continued such to the present [Feb., '75.] The cashiers have been E. A. Kendrick, from 1851 to '53; V. P. Noyes, '53 to '54; Thos. M. Benton, '54 to '55; N. A. Lasell, from July 29, '55 to Jan. 12, 1869, when E. M. Sowles was appointed and held the office until January, 1872; after which G. W. Beebe was chosen, and continues to hold the office at this date [1882]. The operations of the bank compare favorably with those of the most successful in the State.

Inns.—The first house for the accomodation of travellers was kept by Asa Holgate at the Falls, and stood where L. Lasell now resides. It was opened for the reception of guests in 1793. His barn, it is said, stood not far from the center of the present park.

A tavern was also opened by Levi Hathaway on what is called the Westroad. It stood near the spot which was once occupied by Mr. C. H. Bullard's wagon-shop. It was customary for the citizens to meet at these houses every Saturday to learn the news, to spend time in frolic and sport, to transact business, and, too often, simply to have a day of dissipation.

Public Houses in Swanton.—On the East Road: William Green, (about) 1796 to 1802 or 3; Nathan Scofield, 1803; Paul E. Jackson, (began) 1827-29; Joseph Butler, 1829-31; Asa Ordway, 1831-33; Geo. Green, 1833-35.

On the Middle Road: Clark Hubbard, (about) 1798; Jarib Jackson, 1801-7 or 8; Ora Willard, 1815-20; David Chappell, 1818-25; Daniel B. Meigs, 1825-27; Seth W. Hathaway, 1827-31.

On the West road, near where C. H. Bullard's wagon shop stood: Levi Hathaway, as early as 1797 or 8; Nathaniel Stearns; John R. Phelps; Adam Andros; John R. Keep, about the years 1822, 3, 4.

Stone Tavern on West road: Samuel Bullard, 1819-25; Widow Bullard and her son, Charles Bullard, 1825-32.

At the Falls, the stand where L. Lasell now lives: Asa Holgate, 1793-98 or 9; Widow Holgate, 1898-1802; Theophilus Mansfield, 1802 to about 1821; John R. Phelps, about the year 1822;—Capron, 1823; Harrison Stevens, 1824 or 25; Thos. Webster, 1826.

The Old Stearns Stand, which once stood near the large house built by C. H. Bullard; Ezra Jones commenced about 1805 or 6 to 1812; Nathaniel Stearns, from about 1812 to 25; James Brown, from about 1825 to 26;—Rice, from about 1826 to 28; Nelson Bullard, 1828-32; Calvin Perry, 1832-37; Wm. Cain, 1837-41; Nelson Bullard, 1841-48; L. D.

Turrill, 1848-58; was burned in 1858, while being kept by L. D. Turrill.

At the Falls. Eagle Hotel, where the Central now stands: Thomas Webster, about 1825; James Brown, about 1827; Samuel Curtis, about 1830; Mrs. Samuel Stevens, about 1831; Lorenzo Perry, about 1833; Daniel B. Marvin, about 1835; Thomas Dimon, about 1835; Wm. Keyes, 1836; Samuel Stevens, 1837; Harry Asselstyne, 1838-41; William Cain, about 1842; Homer E. Loveland, 1844-46; Mrs. Samuel Stevens, 1847; Ward Barney, 1848; Stiles Faxon, 1851; Wm. Keyes, 1852; Horace Stearns, 1853; Wm. Keyes; name changed to "Central;" Erastus C. Jennison, 1856-66; Widow Jennison & Sons, 1866-69;—Briggs, 1869-70; C. F. Smith commenced keeping this hotel about 1870, and continued until Jan. 15, 1880, during which time he made additions to the wings and added another story; sold out to Mr. J. C. Babbitt, who has laid out a large amount on it, particularly for barns and sheds. The great improvements made on this old established stand will prove a great convenience to the public.

At the Falls, on West side of river: Ira and Erastus Church, 1823; Ira Church, 1851-53; Mrs. Ira Church, 1854; Stiles Faxon,——; William Keyes, 1856-65;——Hammond, about 1865-69; Wm. Keyes, 1869-72; J. I. Gibbs, 1872-74; Nov. 9, 1874, R. Lester Barney bought the stand, moved back the old building and put on large additions, making it all over new and naming it the "Barney House." He not long after sold out to Chas. and Wm. Pease, May 19, 1876. They in turn sold out to A. Kellogg in 1878. The stand at length came into possession of Hon. E. A. Sowles, who, in the fall of 1881, improved it by the addition of a 3d story. The name was changed to "The American," and is kept now, Mar., 1882, by J. F. Kelly.

BURIAL-PLACES.

In September, 1795, the town appointed a committee with the selectmen to pitch burial-places, one at the Falls, and on the west road. There is one record of a deed for burying-ground from Benjamin Weed. The town in 1801 "made choice of Wm. Green, Israel Robinson and Joshua Calkins for a committee to lay out burying-yard in the east part of this town."

In 1807 it was "voted the selectmen be a committee to purchase a burying-ground on the middle road in Swanton," probably never done. There are now 5 burial-places in town: the 1st at the Falls, 2d, on the west road, and 3d, on the east road, near the Baptist church; another at Maquam, and the Catholic one, contiguous to their church.

In the warning for town meeting, Mar. 1875, there was an article "To see if the town will vote to raise money to purchase land for a burying-ground in or near the village of Swanton." The action taken was, "That the purchasing of land for a burying-ground be left discretionary with the selectmen." As there is no further record of any doings of the town upon this subject, it would seem in the judgment of the selectmen, there was no need of more land for this purpose at that time, but the time is not distant when there will be an imperious necessity for a new cemetery lot.

THE PLACES FOR TOWN MEETINGS

for several years were the house of a prominent citizen or the inn at the Falls or Centre; afterwards the meeting-house at the Centre and the Falls. After many efforts, a town-house was built. In 1846 the freeholders "voted to build a town-house, and raise $250 if individuals would raise as much more, and furnish the ground at the Falls for it." The first town building having been destroyed by fire, it was "voted to raise $600 and build a town-hall." In connection with the trustees of the Swanton Falls Academy, the building cost something more than the amount first raised. It continues to be the place for holding town meetings (1882).

Roads.—When roads were first opened little more was done than to blaze the trees, and remove some of the more prominent obstructions. There are 7 principal roads in town, all of which pass through or nearly so, north and south; the "east road" leading north, passing the Baptist meeting-house in the east part of the town; west, the road passing Horace B. Foster's; then the "middle road" leading from St. Albans direct to Highgate Falls, and next the "west road" which is the direct road from St. Albans to Swanton Falls. The name when given at a very early day was appropriate, as there was no road of importance west of it in town, but now when there are other roads still west of it, the name seems rather improper. [Call it "the Old West Road."—Ed.]

We then come to the "county road" leading from the Falls south to St. Albans Bay. The section through which a portion of this road passes was known in early day as the "light swamp" and for years was considered of little value. There was much opposition by other parts of the town to building this road, and it was accomplished by long and persistent effort. About 1850, the friends of the road succeeded in getting an order from the court for its construction. The value of the lands through which it passes, was much enhanced by it. Next west of this is the "Maquam road," leading from the Falls to St. Albans Point; then the "lake shore road" leading along the shores of the lake, south to the Old Manzer place, thence to the river intersecting it about 2 miles below the Falls, and there are the north and south road of West Swanton, and there are cross roads intersecting these all through the town. The first roads opened were doubtless the middle and west roads leading to Highgate and Swanton Falls.

BRIDGES AND FERRIES.

Probably in 1794 or 5, a permanent ferry was established across the Missisquoi river, one mile south of the Falls, about 20 rods above the present covered bridge. Respecting this ferry, the town records for one year, 1795, contain the following curious entry: "Voted that John Battaes (John B. Joyal) should not have more than 2 d for crossing a man, or a horse, or other grown cattle; and sheep and hogs to be ferried for one penny." This regulation had reference to travelers and such as crossed only occasionally. Those living in the immediate neighborhood sustained the ferry by a yearly subscription, which entitled them to a pass without additional fee. A ferry boat continued to be plied at this place until 1811.

About this time the river was spanned by a bridge, where the present one stands. It was commenced in 1810, and finished the next year by Joseph Palmer, of Waterbury, for Dr. Peniman, Judge Brayton, Benjamin Fay and Thos. Mears, a company to whom had been granted the privilege of a toll-bridge. During the war of 1812-'15, it is said the general government paid about $1000 for its use. It was familiarly known as the "Old John s bridge." John B. Joyal, who was otherwise and more commonly called John Battaes, was for many years the toll receiver. In 1823 it was partly broken down and repaired by Amasa Clark. In 1825 it was purchased by Benjamin Robinson, who after holding it a year or two sold it to the town, when it became a public bridge. It finally gave way one morning, the first Sabbath of May, 1833, as a drove of cattle was passing it on their way from Milton to Canada.

The bridge had previously been condemned as unsafe, and a town meeting was called in Nov. 1832, to see if the town would rebuild the bridge, and choose a committee to draw a plan and make an estimate of cost. The plan of the present covered bridge was finally adopted, and in 1834 it was erected on the old site by Allen Pratt and Eleazer Jewett. It was town property, and has ever since been known as the "covered bridge," it having been the only one of the kind in the township to 1869, when one was built at the Falls. Having been somewhat repaired a few years since, it is still in good condition.

In 1805 it was "voted that there be a ferry established at the Lower Falls in Swanton, under the regulation of the selectmen and civil authority." By Lower Falls are meant those nearest the mouth of the Missisquoi river, in distinction from what at an early day was called the Upper Falls, on the same stream, situated in Highgate. This ferry was at the point of the river, a few rods above Andrew M. Thayer's dwelling-house, and was continued in operation until the building of a bridge, and at various intervals in later years a ferry was maintained here during the absence of a bridge. The first bridge immediately above the dam was built at the ferrying-place, by Conrad Shultz. This was what is usually called a trestle bridge, being supported by trestle-work. It was erected in 1812, and in the spring of 1813 two lengths of it near the middle, and one trestle, were carried off. It was repaired the ensuing season, but the whole structure was swept away by high water in the spring of 1814.

During 1816 a second bridge was put up at the Falls by Mr. John Averill, who for many years in his old age lived near Highgate Springs. It was a little below the dam, where the present bridge stands, but remained only about a year. In 1821 another bridge was built in the same place by Samuel Parsons, often afterwards called "Parsons' bridge," and being private property was long known as the "toll-bridge." Alfred Forbes, Esq., was for many years the proprietor and keeper, who sold out to Mr. Thomas Dimond. In Jan. 1832, high water carried off the west end, with the toll-house. It was rebuilt the next spring by Mr. C. Barber, employed by Mr. Dimond. Mr. Barber was killed by the falling of some timbers on the work, Mar. 20; age, 30 years. It was at length proved that a toll-bridge was injurious to the business of the place. In order to escape the toll, many avoided the village. The writer circulated the subscription for the purchase of this bridge when about 24 years of age. In 1836 the property was purchased by a number of individuals, and arrangements immediately made by which it passed into the hands of the town, and was henceforth held as a public bridge. Having become unsafe, a special town meeting was called Dec. 1839, when it was voted that the town would borrow of the surplus revenue a sum not over $3,000 to build a bridge at Swanton Falls. Feb. 24, 1840, the old bridge was in part carried away by a freshet, as if in anticipation of the will of the people, and the ensuing season the new bridge was built in its place by Allen Pratt and J. Tillison, probably the most substantial bridge ever built in Swanton up to that time, which, with occasional repairs, did good service to 1867 or '8, when a large marble block on a heavy block-wagon, with two men, passing over it, it broke down, and men, wagon, block, horses, planks and broken timber were precipitated together some 20 feet to the rocks below. Fortunately, the water in the river was low at the time, and the rocks quite dry, which made the fall less dangerous than it would have been with a heavy current of water flowing over the rocks. One man and a horse were considerably injured; the others but slightly. The town soon after took measures to have a new bridge, which is covered, and a decided improvement on the old one; completed in 1869; cost, $5,000; doing good service, Mar. 1882.

TELEGRAPH.

The "Vermont and Boston Telegraph Line" was extended through Swanton along the railroad in 1851. Arrangements having been made that an office should be established here if subscriptions to a given amount were taken, the sum was subscribed. Oct. 7, 1851, is the first entry of a telegraph to this place.

Operators at Swanton office opened in the spring of 1851, A. J. Sampson began Oct. 7, 1851; L. F. Blackman April 15, '52; H. N. Drury July, '54; W. S. Johnson May, '58; D. J. Morrill Jan. 1, '59; E. S. Meigs April, '59; Romeo Scott from November 22, 1862, to March 18, 1874; H. N. Leach, March 18, 1874. A telegraph line was established eastward on the uncompleted line of the Portland & Ogdensburgh R. R. about 1870; D. J. Morrill operator to about 1873; T. Neville occupies that position, (1875); Rollin Smith, operator at Swanton Junction for several years. At present, (Mar., 1882,) B. C. Sheldon is operator for the Western Union; J. F. Pierce for St. Johnsbury & Lake Champlain Railroad; D. J. Morrill, Central Vt. R. R.

RAILWAY.

The Vt. & C. R. R., leased to and run by C. V. R. R., is of great advantage to Swanton. The road was made through here in 1849 and '50. Dec. 11, 1850, the first passenger train passed through Swanton. This was rather an excursion to try the road and view the bridge across Missisquoi Bay which was then nearly if not quite completed. From about that time to the present, cars have run over the road daily. The first ticket agent at this place was Bradford Scott, who went into the employ of the company in 1850, and began to act as ticket agent in June, '51.

W. & A. Thayer's shop was first used as a ticket office; next a small building, which stood nearly opposite. The present station house was built in 1852. The principal station in Swanton is at the falls, on the west side of the river on the road leading direct from St. Albans to Rouses Point. Another railroad was opened about the year 1863, leading from St. Albans to Montreal, the junction of which with the Vt. and Canada leading from St. Albans to Rouses Point is in Swanton, about 4 miles south of the falls. This Montreal road passes on the east side of the village about half a mile from the village square, the depot being where the road leading to Highgate Falls crosses the railroad.

Work was commenced in this town on the Lamoille Valley R. R. in 1870; that year and the next pushed with considerable vigor; the road was so far completed between this and Highgate Falls, that cars passed over it. Much of the grading has also been done on the line of this road in the towns east of this, but the work on this end of the line has not been prosecuted with much energy of late. From present indications it would seem to be the policy of the managers of this enterprise to work and open their road from the east westward. They have been vigorously at work during the latter part of the year 1874 to get the road opened from the east to the town of Johnson.

There has, however, been something done in Swanton during the past year. The piers and abutments have been laid of solid masonry to receive the bridge, which is to cross the river some 60 rods above the dam, and the bridge is ready framed for the piers, and the road graded to Maquam bay, where there has been considerable improvement going on the past year by the U. S. government putting in a break-water to improve the harbor. It is designed to have the railroad, when completed, connect with steamers on Lake Champlain at this place. [See St. Johnsbury & Lake Champlain R. R., page 1012.]

CARE OF THE POOR.

One prominent mode at an early day by which a burden of this kind was in a measure avoided was to warn them out of town after such a time. The town records show a very frequent resort to this measure.

In 1817, it was proposed "to see if the town will take some method to provide a poor-house for the better regulation of the poor of said town." This article was then "passed over." At a later day, arrangements were made by which several towns joined together in their support of the indigent. Thus in 1830, it was "voted that we will unite with the towns of Highgate, St. Albans and Georgia, for the purpose of purchasing or erecting a work-house for the reception of the poor." Finally in 1834, we find that Swanton united with several neighboring towns in establishing a poor-house, each town which entered into the arrangement having a director. In the records for 1846, there is a reference to a poor-farm, and several towns joining in managing it. A farm in Sheldon was bought and the poor of the town have been sent there, with few exceptions. The towns uniting in this arrangement for the support of the poor have found it a great saving in the expense; and withal, it is thought the poor are made more comfortable than under the old system. This arrangement continues [1875] and is likely to for years to come. The towns comprising at this time what is known as the Poor House Association, are Berkshire, Enosburgh, Fairfield, Franklin, Highgate, Swanton, St. Albans and Sheldon. The whole expense of the Association for the year ending Jan. 1, 1876, was $2,541.90; the share for Swanton to pay was $329.80. The report of the superintendents goes on to say the cost of boarding and clothing each pauper has been 98 cents per week. Swanton had 11 paupers there on Jan. 1, 1876.

The poor house report for the year ending Jan. 1, 1877, shows that Swanton's share of the expenses for this year was $403.11. The cost of board and clothing for each pauper was reduced this year to 79 cents per week.

FIRES.

A house built in 1804, by Ezekiel O. Goodrich, on the west side of the river, standing near and in rear of the present dwelling of David Lawrence, Esq., when nearly completed, the oldest boy, some 5 years of age, in the absence of the rest of the family, set fire to the shavings on the floor, and the house was soon burned to ashes.

A clothier shop, belonging to Capt. Heman Hopkins, standing at the west end above the bridge, was burned, probably about 1807 or '8.

A clothing mill, on the ground now occupied by the upper end of the present tannery (1875), which was owned by Jona. Ferris, and leased at the time to Elijah Jackson, was burned about 1813, with considerable corn which was stored in the loft. A grist mill was also burned on the same site about 4 or 5 years previous.

A marble mill, occupying the same ground of the clothing mill above mentioned, belonging to the Ferrises, leased to Seth Edson, was consumed by fire in 1825 or '6, another marble mill being soon after built in its place.

A woolen factory, standing where G. Barney & Sons monumental marble works now are, on west side of the river, burned about 1814.

A saw mill belonging to Elisha Barney, on the site of the present brick wagon shop, owned by James Bullard, lost by fire about 1819. A forge, some 50 rods below the preceding, was burned about the year 1816.

A saddler's shop belonging to Freeman

Carrier, standing about where the old red store now stands, between the store of Blake & Lawrence and S. S. Morey, was burned about 1817. A house on the brow of the hill, south of Col. Kidder's, was burned at an early day.

Elizur Goodrich's house, on the site of George Barney's present residence, was burned about 1822. Goodrich built another on the same site the next year, now owned by the writer.

Judge James Fisk's house, which stood where Judge Sowles now resides, was burned about 1823. He at once put up a one-story house on the site which afterward became the property of A. D. Story, who put on a second story about 1840.

Samuel Farrar's house, standing where Judge Ferris now resides, was burned on a cold winter night about 1830 or '31, the family barely escaping with their lives. The present edifice, now owned by Judge Ferris, was built by A. D. Story some years after.

Dea. Arnold S. Farrar's house, which stood near the place now occupied by the dwelling of G. M. Kidder, was burned June 16, 1849.

The hotel of L. D. Turrill, Esq., and kept by him, was burned April 2, 1858, Fast Day; also the day of the funeral of Mrs. Ferris, mother of the Hon. V. S. Ferris. The fire broke out about the time the people were assembling at the church, and the most of them turned their attention to the burning building. There were plenty of men to help, but the house being large, together with the outbuildings and barn, were all consumed, and the fire endangered many other buildings in the village. This was a great loss, not only to Mr. Turrill, but to the place, as Mr. Turrill did not open another house, which was cause of regret, as he had kept an excellent house, and both himself and wife were highly esteemed in the community.

The Catholic church was burned in 1856 [see record of same in their church history later]; also the Academy and town hall in 1851 [see paper on Education].

On the west side of the river, a dwelling-house of James Platt, standing on the site of Thayer's brick blacksmith shop, was burned about 1835.

At Swanton Center, Feb. 11, 1849, the house of E. B. Rounds, and in 1858 a house belonging to S. M. Bradbury were burned, and in 1862, Judge George Green had a barn burned in the east part of the town. A barn was burned on Goose island, belonging to Almon C. Dunbar. Noble Kittle's house was burned Nov. 1861; E. W. Babcock's barn, on lake shore, in 1848 or '9; a dwelling-house standing just north of Mr. Tuller's, June 1, 1854, with all its contents and about $210 in cash, and Franklin Hoadly's house, standing on the east side of the middle road, in 1841; the railroad bridge over Charcoal creek partially destroyed by fire in 1856.

In Feb. 1845, a grocery store on the site now of Hiram Platt's store, belonging to Hugh Dunning, was burned; on the same site a store built by James Platt, Esq., with a considerable stock of goods, together with the shoe store standing near it on the south, belonging to B. F. Arsenault, Esq., Oct. 14, 1853.

After the burning of Turrill's hotel, the village of Swanton Falls was fortunately exempt from fires of much consequence (except the wood-shed and wood at depot), until Feb. 8, 1874, when the tannery, together with a building near it which had been occupied as a grocery store, were entirely consumed. On the alarm of fire, a telegram was sent to the fire company at St. Albans, 9 miles distant, for assistance, a train bringing them here within half an hour. The fire had in a measure subsided when they arrived, but they did good service in preserving the vats and the leather in an unfinished state. This was a large fire, and the buildings surrounding it were for a time in great danger, and some took fire and were severely scorched, but through the efforts of those present they were saved. The people contributed $75 the next day, which was presented to the St. Albans Fire Co., to show that their services were appreciated. The fire also had the effect to arouse the people to the importance of having a fire-engine. A subscription was started, and funds raised to secure a good engine with ample hose, which it is hoped may prevent serious loss from fire hereafter.

The wood shed, with a large lot of wood at the railroad station at this place, took fire from sparks of the locomotive, and were burned about the year 1869.

Dec. 2, 1873, a barn belonging to John Smith, near his residence in the east part of the town, was burned, together with a large number of cattle, sheep and hay. Mr. Smith, endeavoring to save his cattle, lost his own life by continuing too long in the burning building. He was a highly-esteemed citizen, and his sad fate produced a shock throughout the community.

The dwelling-house of Alfred Greenough was also burned Feb. 9, 1875, on Ferris street, about half a mile south of the village; but the furniture was saved and the building insured.

The "old brick store," built by Andrew Bostwick, in 1806, took fire in the early morning of Jan. 11, 1877, and all but its heavy brick walls was entirely consumed, together with the wooden dwelling house, octagon in form, built by John Adams, owned at the time by Major Edgar Bullard. The store was owned by Fletcher Tarbell, at the time, and was rebuilt on the old walls, an addition being made in the rear. The post-office was kept in this store by Jason P. Jewett, Esq., who suffered a severe loss by the fire. Mr. Edgar Bullard did not build again on the same site, but sold to his brother Merton, who not long after erected there a substantial and handsome brick building, finished for two large stores in the first story, the second story in one large room, designed for a public hall, which is known as Bullard's hall. Mr. Edgar Bullard built an elegant dwelling house for himself, a few rods further to the east.

The people in this village were hardly quieted in regard to this last fire, before the alarm of fire again startled them from their beds at dead of night, the weather severely cold, to witness one of the most destructive conflagrations that had ever taken place in our village, and by which nearly one-half of the then business portion of our village was destroyed, Feb. 9, 1877. It commenced in the rear of the store built by F. V. Goodrich, owned at this time by C. C. Long, Esq., and occupied by D. Brundage, as a crockery and fruit store; from this point it spread to the north, burning the store traded in by S. W. & S. S. Keyes about 1810 to '20, at the time occupied as a dry goods store by B. B. Blake; and the building next on the north,—the old red store in which H. B. Farrar traded many years, the next to take; the next building on the north, some little distance from the old red store, by great exertion was prevented from taking fire, and the fire on the north extended no further; but on the south of where the fire took the first building it seized was the harness shop of O. D. Mason, and the store of W. H. Blake, 2d, the old store built by W. & H. B. Farrar, and traded in by them for many years; and then the building occupied by Chas. Hogle, as a store on the north side, and by H. C. Barnes and the post-office on south side, which was originally built for a tavern by E. O. Goodrich and his brother, Capt. Valentine Goodrich, and stood a little to the rear: and which after keeping tavern became unprofitable, was used some years by I. A. Vanduzee as a dwelling-house, which, after he sold out and went West, was moved to the front, bricked up and made into two commodious stores; the upper story being used as a Free Mason's lodge.

The insatiable fire fiend not seeming yet satisfied with the eating up of a large part of the business portion of our village, in less than 18 months commenced again. July 25, 1878, about half past 3 o'clock in the morning, a fire was discovered in the rear of the old meat market building, built at an early day, where A. S. Farrar traded several years. The flames spread from this combustible old building rapidly on the south, consuming the store of Col. A. B. Jewett, and the store of Hotia Farrar. The building on the south of this having been built of brick the previous year with heavy walls, prevented the flames making further headway in that direction. On the north, the building belonging to Eugene Denoel was the first to take. This was the store built by Julius H. Rice about 1825. The Manahan building, built by E. S. Meigs, Esq., about 1850, was the next; soon the building north of this of Freeborn Bell, Esq., not long built, and the old grocery store occupied by Mr. Ransom, were burning. The dwelling-house of Mr. Forbes near by was severely scorched, but by great exertion saved. This last fire completely destroyed the whole of what was known as Merchants' Row.

The origin of these fires has never been known. The large amount of property destroyed, it would be supposed, would have been a serious injury to the best interests of the place, but the result has proved quite the contrary. It doubtless bore hard in some individual cases, but the majority of the sufferers were very fairly insured, which enabled them not only to continue their business, but to erect splendid buildings in place of the old ones, except in two or three instances, where as yet they have not been rebuilt. These new and handsome stores have greatly improved the appearance of the business portion of the place, and have no doubt had a tendency to enhance the value of the real estate in this vicinity. To preserve the old land-marks we will state, Mr. Ransom's new and fine building opposite the grist mill occupies the old site of the Lorenzo Perry grocery, of former days; the Tarbell and Farrar block, the old store site, formerly owned by Col. Jewett, and the site of the old store of H. B. Farrar, Esq. The stone block on the south of this adjoining, occupies the space between Farrar's old store and the old red store of H. B. Farrar, and also the old site of the old red store. The next on the south is the Tarbell wooden building of two stories on the old original site, where the Keyses traded in very early days, in the first store on that side of the square, owned many years by Charles Bullard, Esq., and where the writer with his brother-in-law commenced trade in 1831. The Dormans owned and traded in the old store many years. Next south, the Blake block, which has three spacious stores on the first floor, on the site of the old store, built and occupied several years by F. V. Goodrich; also the site of the building owned by O. D. Mason, used as a harness shop; also the site of the old store originally built by William and his brother Horatio B. Farrar, and in which they traded many years, and in later years by H. & H. M. Stone. South of this there has been no new building erected until the present winter (1882); there is now a large and fine building going up, to be known as the Barnes' block, built by Mr. H. C. Barnes, merchant, which is on the site of the old tavern building, "moved to the front."

A dwelling-house, owned by Mrs. Mary Brannan, on Canada street, about half a mile north of the village, was burned in 1879 or '80. Another new two-story dwelling-house, built and owned and occupied by Ezra Beebe and family, on the west side of the river, a few rods below the present Barney saw mill, took fire when the family were absent on a visit, and was burned to ashes. March 1, 1882, the large sheds at Jewett's lime-kiln took fire, in which was stored a large quantity of lime. The fire took, it is said, in consequence of the severe storm of the day before swelling the small stream near by, so that the water came on to the lime, causing it to heat and set fire to the sheds; loss about $1400.

CASUALTIES.—SUDDEN DEATHS.

Drowned.—A son of Joseph Wright, about 1817; a son of Elisha Rood, about 1818; a son of Calvin Perry, about 1839; a son of Thomas Dimond, about 1836; a son of B. F. Arseneault, about 1862.

John Curry was drowned in the flume on the west side of the river in 1859.

Harry Donaldson was drowned about the year 1854.

James M. and Ellen Brown, the former aged 43 years, and the latter 4 years, were drowned at the Covered Bridge.

Samuel Stevens was drowned about 1830. Daniel B. Marvin, while attempting to swim across the river, a mile or two below the Falls, about 1850.

A young man, a Canadian, about 1850, while assisting to make a boom secure to one of the piers of the bridge, was thrown into the foaming current by the upsetting of the boat he was in, and soon drowned.

A son of C. H. Mead, about 16 years of age, was drowned at the bow of the river, Jan. 2, 1866.

Burned to death.—John Smith, while endeavoring to remove his cattle from his burning barn, Dec. 2, 1873, aged 49 yrs.

Mrs. Elijah Jackson, Sept. 14, 1843, a very aged lady, living in a house having a large old fashioned fire-place, being left alone, it was supposed became unconscious in a fit, and fell on the fire.

Mrs. Narina Barney, wife of Ward Barney, being alone, in a fit as was supposed, fell helpless on a fire and died in consequence.

John Wagoner, a miller, killed by the bursting of a mill-stone, who was running his mill at the time at very high speed, about 1807 or '8. There is a story related to the writer by V. S. Ferris, Esq., (son of Jonathan) in connection with the death of Mr. Wagoner, I deem worthy of preservation. Jonathan Ferris was a member of the Society of Friends, and settled here with his family in 1807. His Quaker friends from New York came here a while after to make him a visit. Among them was the then celebrated Elizabeth Walker, the recognized leader of the Orthodox part of that sect. A meeting was held at the school-house on the west side of the river, and the time mostly improved by this Quaker lady. After having finished her discourse, there was a time of silence, which after a while was broken by this lady saying, "She was deeply impressed that there was one present that in a very few days would lose his life by a fatal accident, and she would exhort him by saying, 'Prepare to meet thy God.'" Mr. Wagoner was present at the meeting, and but three days after lost his life as above related. Several years after this Mr. Ferris was in New York, and saw Mrs. Walker, and asked her if she remembered the meeting in Swanton, and the prediction she made. She replied, "Yes, distinctly," and added, "Did the poor man repent?" and went on to say that the impression on her mind was so distinct at the time that she could have put her hand upon the man's head who was so soon to lose his life.

A sad incident of recent occurrence.—The only son of the Hon. V. S. Ferris of this village, tenderly reared, with pleasant surroundings, highly educated, and a young man of much promise, being somewhat inclined to adventure, left his home several years since, residing in different localities in the Western States until last fall, when he became connected with a party of buffalo hunters, who had determined upon this adventurous and dangerous sport in the vicinity of Denver, Col. The evening previous to the day on which the party left Denver on their perilous enterprise, in November last, Mr. Ferris spent with Albert Blake, a young man from this town, now a resident of Denver. They had been brought up and were school fellows together, and the evening was passed in the most agreeable manner.

The party of hunters left the next day, Mr. Ferris among them; not many days after which Mr. Blake received the intelligence that his friend had perished in a storm on the plains, under circumstances the most painful. The sad story, as we gather from Mr. Blake's letters, is that the party had encamped some 70 or 80 miles N. E. of Denver, and left their camp in the morning in pursuit of a herd of buffaloes, and had killed one or more of the number; a severe storm of wind and snow had in the meantime come upon them. The weather being pleasant when they left camp, Mr. Ferris took no extra clothing, and as the storm continued, he became chilled, and was advised by his comrades to return to the camp, which was some two or three miles distant, and prepare a fire and make things comfortable, while they would remain and dress their game before returning. He left in the direction of the camp but, sad to say, never to meet them again in this life. On the return of the party to camp, he was not there; they searched diligently for days, but he was not to be found; when they, or a portion of them, returned to Denver, bearing the sorrowful tidings to his friend Blake, who at once wrote the facts to the father here. Mr. Blake evidently thinking all had not been done that might have been, engaged a hunter to make thorough search, offering a large reward for the discovery of his friend whether living or dead. The body of Ferris was at length found by the hunter some 10 or more miles from the spot where he had left his companions, in a ravine, lying on its back, having some willow sticks in the hand. The corpse was conveyed to Denver, where it was placed in a suitable burial casket well encased, and from thence forwarded by express to Swanton, where it arrived Mar. 3, 1882, and was borne to the residence of the grief-stricken father, and the next day after a suitable and solemn discourse by Rev. Mr. Wranslow, was carried to the burial ground by former friends, and deposited by the side of the mother that had passed away several years ago. The people of our village all deeply sympathize with the father who has been called to give up an only son under circumstances so peculiarly sad.

On Wednesday night, March 1, 1882, a sad accident occurred on the Central Vt. R. R. within a few rods of the line dividing the farms of Asa Asselstyne and Geo. Barney, by which a man by the name of Alfred Duel lost his life. The severe rains of the previous day had washed the dirt from the culvert in such a manner as to leave a simple shell of earth below the rails. The night freight train was on its way north on which Duel was the fireman. The night was dark and very foggy. The engineer says they were moving with great caution and very slowly, when of a sudden the engine sank into the sand some 6 feet. He, the engineer, escaped by jumping from the cab window, but Duel was caught fast by both legs between the tender and the fire-door. The base of the whistle rested against the top of the cab, from which the steam poured out, scalding the victim in a horrible manner. He lived but a few minutes after. He was about 24 years of age, and leaves a young wife to whom he had been married but a few months.

MEMBERS OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION.

The number of lawyers resident and practicing in Swanton during the whole period of its history is considerable. At an early day a good deal of business was done here, more comparatively, than at the present, and at such times the number of attorneys was rather large. It is said that there were no less than eight doing business here at one epoch after the organization of the town, during the first quarter of the present century. Lumbering was carried on here extensively, as well as many other kinds of manufacturing, which, with goods sold to carry them on, and the credit and barter system then in vogue, made room for much litigation. The town also being near the Canada line, and the great thoroughfare from Montreal to Burlington, and southward, passing through it, a large amount of business must have resulted in connection with the collection of duties, especially about the time of our last war with Great Britain. One need not, therefore, be surprised to learn that at one period the justice courts were regularly held each month, and these were usually crowded with cases, a hundred justice suits having occurred under such circumstances in a single day.

The names of attorneys which follow, with the time of their practice in Swanton, is thought to be nearly complete, and for the most part accurate. A few incidents, so far as they have been within the reach of the writer, have been carefully gathered, and some points not directly relating to this town, but indirectly, have been added. The time of commencing practice in Swanton determine the order of arrangement for the greater part.

SHADRACH HATHAWAY,

born in Bennington in 1778; in 1800, he went to St. Albans, and in 1803 came to Swanton. Mr. Hathaway acted a prominent part in Swanton during the earlier part of the present century. When young he was considered a man of superior ability by the members of the bar. One remarks "that he used the English language with considerable skill and accuracy." His address was fine, and his appearance before a court unusually good. He resided in this town 55 years, and during the most of this time he was justice of the peace. For many years he held a large landed estate here, but becoming involved in law with Elijah Paine, he at length lost it all. He left this place in 1858, and went to live with his near relatives in Iowa.

THEOPHILUS MANSFIELD

studied law with Levi House, Esq., and was admitted to the bar in St. Albans at the March term of 1802. He came to this place about that time, and married Mrs. Holgate. After her death he married Mrs. House, who had become a widow. He was town representative in 1811, and continued to reside here until about 1821.

DAVID M. CAMP

was admitted to the Franklin County bar at the August term of 1812; was collector here during the war of 1812; as a lawyer stood well. In 1826, he was deputy collector in Derby, and was elected lieutenant-governor in 1836.

STEPHEN S. BROWN

was admitted to the bar in Franklin Co., at the January term, 1812. He came to Swanton in 1808. His colloquial powers were fine, and as a companion or in the social circle he was remarkably genial, and as a citizen active and persevering. He was regarded a superior advocate, and his services as such were much sought. He was familiar with history, something of a poet, and somewhat inclined to philosophical investigations. He married the widow of Samuel R. Bascom, Sept. 15, 1814, by whom he had two sons, Stephen D. and George, the latter dying at the South of consumption when about 22 years of age. The former has been for many years a distinguished minister of the M. E. church, and is now, 1874, presiding elder in the city of New York. He died at an advanced age in the town of Underhill a few years since, where he had made it his home for several years previous to his death, deeming the climate and water of that town better suited to his health than those towns nearer the lake. He was chosen to represent Swanton in the Legislature in 1825 and also in 1829, and held other responsible offices.

JAMES FISK

was born in Greenwich, Mass., Oct. 4, 1763. His father died when he was 2 years old, leaving him without means. In 1779, he being 16 years of age, enlisted in the American army and served for about 3 years in the Revolutionary war, after the close of which he went to work on a farm in his native town, and was married about this time to Miss Priscilla West, who died Aug. 19, 1840, aged 77 years. When 22 years old he was elected and sent as a representative to the general assembly of Massachusetts. Not far from this time he began to preach as a Universalist minister. In 1798 he removed to Barre, and continued to preach occasionally. He here commenced clearing a new farm, and it was while thus employed he studied law and commenced the practice of his profession. In 1806 or '8 he was elected to Congress; was a member in 1812, and voted for the declaration of war with Great Britain. In 1815 or '16 was appointed Judge of the Supreme Court, and in 1817 was elected U. S. senator. In 1818 he resigned the senatorship, having received the appointment of collector, which office he held for 8 years. In January, 1819, he moved with his family from Barre to Swanton, where he resided for the most part during the remainder of his life. He was a man of unusual ability. The members of the bar regarded him as possessed of a good mind and sound judgment, as having a clear head and being a consecutive reasoner. [See p. 28 this Vol.] One who knew him well remarks that he was a man of great integrity, and would not defraud though sure of not being detected. The same person further adds, he was one of the few men who held positions of trust, though he never sought them. As a man he was remarkably kind of heart and genial in all his relations of life. In 1812 he was appointed governor of the territory of Indiana by President Madison, but the strenuous opposition of his friends to his leaving the State induced him not to accept the appointment.

On coming home from Washington, Senator Fisk was asked in regard to some prominent men. He replied that they appeared greatest when farthest off, that when one got near them they were a good deal like other men.

In describing the speakers present at a great war meeting in Washington in 1812, Mr. Thompson says, "On the one side sat the small-sized, keen-eyed, ready-witted and really talented James Fisk of Barre, who was then a member of Congress, and who had now come on to act as the champion speaker of the democrats at this meeting." Hist. Vert. p. 116.

His conversational powers were excellent, and those who had the pleasure of his company, even when advanced in years, seldom failed of being entertained as well as instructed. He had 3 sons and several daughters, one of whom became the wife of P. Keyes, another of Franklin Bradley, M. D., another of Orlando Stevens, Esq. He died in Swanton, Nov. 17, 1844.

WILLIAM BRAYTON

was admitted to Franklin County bar at the February term, 1807. He soon after came to Swanton and commenced the practice of his profession, and continued it for many years. He married Hortentia, daughter of Dr. Jabez Penniman, Aug. 2, 1812. In 1817 he was chosen town representative, and became county judge in 1818 and '19. He was afterward made judge of the supreme court, and held the office 3 or 4 years. On his appointment to the supreme bench, he left Swanton about 1820, and became a resident of St. Albans, and after leaving the bench removed to Burlington where he practiced his profession until his death, about 1825.

His daughter Cornelia became the wife of the Hon. V. S. Ferris of this place. She was of exceedingly amiable disposition, and died of consumption about 1855.

ORLANDO STEVENS

was admitted to Franklin County bar at November term, 1821, and for a while lived and practiced in St. Albans. Having been appointed deputy collector by the Hon. James Fisk, whose daughter he married, he removed to Swanton about 1823, where he attended to the duties of his office, and practiced law. Having afterwards gone to Hyde's Falls, in Highgate, where he was engaged in the lumber business for two or three years; he removed to St. Albans, and there practiced law for some 15 or 20 years. Thence he went to Minnesota; having lost his wife and daughter, and becoming himself disabled by paralysis, he went to live with his brother in Highgate.

ANSON SOULE

born in Fairfax, studied law in St. Albans, and was admitted to the bar, September term, 1825; he established himself at Swanton, and was here in 1827 and '8. He, however, remained here but a short time, when he returned to practice the duties of his profession in his native town.

ROBERT L. PADDOCK,

a native of Barre, admitted to the bar in Washington County, established himself in Highgate, and married there a Miss Freileigh, sister of Mrs. Gardner Green, and after this came to Swanton in 1824, and went into partnership with Judge Fisk. In 1827 he was appointed deputy collector for Highgate, when he returned there and practiced law until 1846, and thence went to the State of New York, having returned to Swanton in 1849, and remained here until 1853. He died in the autumn of 1861.

GEO. W. FOSTER

was born about 1794. He was brother of Timothy and John S. Foster, and commenced his business life here as a merchant, and was for some years a partner of Capt. Ethan A. Allen, son of Ethan. Having been unsuccessful in business, he entered upon the study of law, and was nominally a student in the office of B. H. Smalley, Esq., in St. Albans. Having been admitted to the bar in Franklin County, in 1827, he began the practice of his profession in Swanton, and continued to do so until his death, Oct. 12, 1848, aged 54 years; he left a widow and several children. He was a man of more than ordinary ability; offices of trust were frequently conferred upon him. He was town Representative in 1837, and County Senator in 1846-'7. It is said that while Senator, it was through his influence that the charter of the Vermont and Canada railroad was so amended by the insertion of a very few words, as to allow the road to cross the Lake at Swanton, which right would not probably have been granted had it not been for his management and skill in legislation. In politics he was a decided whig, and was rather distinguished as an adroit leader of that party.

NORMAN L. WHITTEMORE, born in St. Albans, studied law with Judge Aldis, and was admitted to the bar in Franklin County, September, 1825. Soon after his admission to the bar he commenced the practice of law in this place and continued it until about 1851, when he became a contractor in the construction of the Vt. & C. R. R., giving up his law business to a considerable extent. It is understood that his contracts proved quite profitable, which led him with his brother and others connected with them to go to Ohio, and engage there in railroad construction. This enterprise did not prove as successful as anticipated, and it is said he lost heavily. In 1857 he removed with his family to Oshkosh, Wis., and commenced practicing law there with much success. He died a few years after at that place, where it is understood his family yet reside. His wife was the daughter of Capt. Hollenbeck. He held the office of deputy collector many years, but lost it on the accession of Harrison to the presidency. On the organization of the free soil party, he became identified with it. In his religious views, he was inclined to be deistical, but was often quite unsettled. At one time, soon after commencing practice here, there was considerable excitement in the community upon religious subjects, and Whittemore had given the subject more than usual attention, and did not hesitate to express himself openly as being almost persuaded to become a Christian. The writer of this was present at his office one evening, when Uncle James Brown, one of his associates, who had formerly been in agreement with him in religious opinion, came in. Whittemore opened the conversation at once, by saying: "Well, Uncle Jim, I think I shall have to leave you and become a Christian." "Uncle Jim" seemed a little irritated, and said, "the Bible is like an old fiddle, they can play any tune they please on it." To which Whittemore replied "yes, I know, Uncle Jim, they can play a good many tunes on it, but they can't play a bad one." Although he could make use of strong arguments in favor of Christianity, yet he never professed it, at least not while residing in Swanton.

For many years he and G. W. Foster, Esq., were the two most prominent lawyers of the place; both were men of more than ordinary ability. In their religious views they were—so far as is known—not much dissimilar, but in almost all other respects they were opposed to each other. Their offices were on opposite sides of the village square. In all law suits in the place they were on opposite sides. In politics Foster was a whig, Whittemore a democrat, both leaders of their respective parties in town.

AUGUSTUS BURT,

son of Joseph Burt, was born in Westmoreland, N. H., Jan. 30, 1781. From 1805 to '8, he was engaged in teaching and in the study of law in Newfane. He also studied for a short time with Ebenezer Marvin in Sheldon, and was admitted to the Franklin County bar at the August term in 1808, and returned to Newfane, Windham county, where he resided until 1811, when he went to Fairfield, this county, and remained 2 years in practice of law, and came here in 1813, where he lived until 1815; removed to St. Albans, and was there 2 years; was again in Fairfield from 1817 to '19; during the latter year removed to Sheldon, and continued to practice there until Oct., 1854, when he retired from business, and after this made his home in Highgate. He married Loretta Sanderson, of Bellows Falls, for his first wife, and for his second wife Mary Lafferty, of Williston.

ISRAEL P. RICHARDSON

practiced law in Swanton in 1826, but remained for only a few years. He was for some time custom house officer in Alburgh. When in Alburgh, he pursued a smuggler, and, while following him in a boat, the smuggler threw him into the lake, and he had to swim for his life. He afterward practiced law in Fairfield for several years, and then in St. Albans; thence went to Burlington, and a few years since removed West to live with one of his sons. He is represented as a man of considerable ability and learning. Israel P. Richardson, Jr., was his son, who died at Sharpsburgh, Md., Nov. 3, 1862, from wounds received at the battle of Antietam. [For military record of son, see Franklin Co. military chapter of Gazetteer, vol. 2, and for notice of the father, reminiscences of Gamaliel B. Sawyer, familiarly called "Gam. Sawyer," in Burlington History, vol. 1, of this work.—Ed.]

H. F. REDFIELD

was admitted to the Franklin County bar at the Sept. term, 1829. He practiced law but a short time in Swanton, and then went West.

CHARLES PERRIGO,

a son of Dr. Perrigo, of Burlington, who died about 1825, having studied law with Judge Farrand in his native place, and being admitted to the bar, came to Swanton about 1825. He remained here for several years; thence went to Grand Isle county, where he practiced from 1831 to '37, and then returned to Swanton. About 1854, he left Swanton for Dubuque, Iowa, where he remained until his death in 1862. He entered the University of Vermont at an early age, and was graduated at Union College. Having given his notes for a near relative, he became involved, which was doubtless a great hindrance to his success in life. He was never married.

BENJ. H. SMALLEY

was born in Middlebury, May 18, 1797, and came to Franklin County in 1812, resided a while in Franklin; was with the garrison in Burlington in 1812 and '13, which consisted of about 2000 men. Jan. 8, 1818, he went to St. Albans, and entered upon the study of law with Bates Turner, Esq., and continued with him until Nov. 4 of the same year. At this time he went to Alburgh, where he resided until Sept. 20, 1820, when he was admitted to the bar at Grand Isle. He then established himself at St. Albans, entering into partnership with Judge Turner, and continued with him for 5 years. In July, 1821, he was united in marriage with Miss Ann Sowles, of Alburgh. In 1825 he formed a partnership with Henry Adams, Esq., which continued until 1857. For his second wife he married Julia, daughter of Ebenezer Marvin, Esq., late of Hammond, St. Lawrence County, N. Y. He continued the practice of law in St. Albans until the failure of his health. Since Nov., 1851, he has resided in Swanton. In 1854 he opened an office at Swanton Falls, which he continued for a while for the convenience of his son. Mr. Smalley is still living (1874,) enjoying a green old age on his extensive farm about 2 miles south of the Falls, and to a considerable extent has ceased to take an active interest in public affairs. As he is yet living it would perhaps be premature to sum up his character, or speak of his ability as a lawyer, but if permitted to do so, we may be allowed to say it would not suffer in comparison with others of his profession.

The foregoing was written at the time above indicated, and submitted to Mr. Smalley's inspection, and approved by him, or at least he made no objection to its statements. It now remains to say, he departed this life June 15, 1877, in Canada. He was a man of fine personal appearance, about the ordinary height, genial, companionable and social in his disposition; of fine conversational powers, and was listened to with interest; was well informed on almost every subject. In politics a democrat of the old school, and in his prime a recognized leader of his party. In religion he was a Roman Catholic—with his wife he connected himself with that church many years ago. From the little conversation had with him by the writer upon religious subjects, I should judge him to be liberal in his religious views. As a lawyer, in his prime, he was among those that stood at the head of Franklin County bar. He was a good and safe counsellor, and his services as an advocate were in much demand. It is safe to say he was a man of much more than ordinary ability.

BENJAMIN PEEK

was admitted to Franklin Co. bar Sept. 1837; practiced law at Highgate for several years; came to Swanton about 1853; served during the late war as a soldier in 5th Vt. Reg't., since which he has given up the practice of law. At this time (1874), we understand he is residing in Virginia.

HENRY A. BURT, son of Augustus Burt, was born in Shelton, Feb. 10, 1828; fitted for college in St. Albans and Bakersfield; entered U. V. M. in 1845; was graduated in 1849; had charge of Franklin Co. Grammar School in 1849, '50, one year; was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, December term, 1852; commenced practicing his profession at once in Fairfield; came to Swanton, Oct. 1853; has held the office of State's attorney, and been the town representative for the years 1865, '66 and '69, and senator for 1867 and '68; is at present (1882) with Bryant Hall, Esq., practicing his profession in this town under the firm name of Burt & Hall.

MARTIN B. RUGG

was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, Sept. term, 1858; established himself at Swanton, and soon after, on the call for 3 months men at the commencement of the late war, he enlisted in the company raised at Swanton, and served as corporal. His health began to fail previous to the expiration of the time of the service of the company. When the time expired he was able to accompany his comrades as far as Brattleboro on their way home, where he died a few days later. [Martin Bushnell Rugg was one of the earliest friends to this publication in Swanton; one of the first volunteer subscribers, and not content therewith, found and set a local agent at work therein for our first Nos. on vol. 1. He had some poetical talent, and saw and appreciated at once the benefit of such a work to the people of the State, and needed no urging to help. as able, toward its support. The kindly friend of our publication, whom, having never seen, we have reason to honor. His name will always remain connected pleasantly with the memory of this fine old town; with the names of Perry, Barney, Smalley, Ferris, Brayton, Blake, Hall, Janes, and a few others, shines that of Rugg, the young lawyer and soldier.]

E. MARVIN SMALLEY,

son of Benj. H. Smalley, was born Nov. 5, 1831; entered U. V. M., Sept. 1849; left college in the spring of 1853; married, Oct. 12, 1853, Sarah Adams; studied law in St. Albans, and also with his father in Swanton from June to Dec. 1854, and was admitted to the bar in 1855. He practiced in St. Albans until the fall of 1857, when he engaged in farming until Nov. 1859; during which time it is understood he wrote several articles of much merit for agricultural papers. He then became junior editor and proprietor of the Burlington Sentinel, and continued such until March, 1861. For the next five months he was correspondent for city papers. Nov. 1861, he began to do law business at Swanton Falls, and continued it for several years, when he went West and located in Chicago, where he yet resides (1874).

[Marvin E. Smalley has since died in St. Albans, in the summer of 1877. He was rarely gifted as a humorist writer. At one time he was contributor for Harpers' Magazine drawer, for which he wrote spicily; with a brilliant humor, his pen spoke so rapidly and pat, it was a regret among his admirers he did not more devote himself to this beautiful, volatile gift that flourishes only on the spot where born—bears no transplanting. He left a widow and two sons. The oldest son is now an engineer in California; the youngest with his mother in Chicago. The spring of '81 we visited Mrs. Smalley in her pleasant new house on a pleasant street in the great Western city. She had gathered to her there her aged widowed mother from "the Island," her old Vermont home, and Mrs. Fay, her sister, and her husband made with her a home. After the storm, after the early sorrows, all seemed to rest in the great sunset West. Mrs. Julia C. Smalley, widow of Benj. H., alone remains at the old farm in Swanton.—ED.]

HENRY ADAMS

was born at Grand Isle, July, 1795. His preparatory course of training was under Rev. Asa Lyon, who "always spoke of him with admiration and praise." He commenced his collegiate course at the University of Vt. in Burlington, and completed it at Dartmouth College. After this he spent 2 years in the Southern States, devoting himself to observation and the study of our national character. He studied law in the office of Judge Royce, of this county, and entered upon the practice of the legal profession in St. Albans in 1825, having been admitted to the bar that year. He continued to practice in St. Albans until 1847, when he removed to Swanton, where he continued to live the rest of his life. He died Feb. 3, 1854, of consumption. He was a man of fine mind, which was well cultivated. In his habits he was very scholarly. His range of reading was wide, though he was more particularly conversant with the principles of law. Says a contemporary: "He sustained the highest character for integrity, truthfulness and fair dealing.—Franklin Co. Herald, Feb. 18, 1854.

HENRY C. ADAMS

was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, December term, 1854. He opened a law office in Swanton, but soon closed his business there and went to Alburgh.

SOLOMON S. BURLISON studied law in Swanton, and was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, June term, 1855.

CHARLES STEVENS was in Swanton in 1824.

—— DANIELS was in Swanton in 1834.

ROBERT S. M. BOUCHETTE was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, Apr. 1839.

ALEXANDER W. CHILTON was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, Apr. term, 1862.

ISAAC B. BOWDISH,

born in Fairfield, Oct. 3, 1818. studied law with N. L. Whittemore in Swanton; was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, Sept. term of 1838. For a while he was connected with N. L. Whittemore in the law business. He received the appointment of deputy collector in 1843, and held it several years. He afterward, in 1857, became district collector, and after this resided in Burlington.

LUCIUS E. CHITTENDEN

studied law at the office of N. L. Whittemore, in Swanton, and was admitted to Franklin Co. bar, Sept. term, 1844, after which he established himself in the practice of law in Burlington, where he obtained an extensive practice. He continued to reside there until he received the appointment of Register of the Treasury of the U. S. soon after the commencement of the late war, when he then removed to Washington to engage in the duties of his office, a part of which was to sign the "greenbacks" issued by the government. His name may be seen on all those bills issued during the years that he held the office. He is now a lawyer in the city of New York.

BRYANT HALL

was born in Berkshire, Feb. 13, 1814. He resided and labored upon the farm where he was born until 1835. The education he received was limited to 3 months in summer and as many in winter until the age of 10 years at the district school kept in a log school-house, after which a single term at the St. Albans Academy completed his educational advantages until he left the old homestead to engage in life's battle. Having studied law with Jasper Rand, Esq., at West Berkshire, he was admitted to the Franklin County bar in September, 1843, with the class of students consisting of

John G. Saxe, the poet, Lorenzo A. Babcock, brother of Gen. Babcock, and H. B. Smith, Esq., of Milton. He commenced to practice his profession in Sheldon, January, 1844, and continued there until February, 1862, when he removed to St. Albans and continued to practice there about 3 years and then removed to Swanton in the spring of 1865, where he has since resided.

He was united in marriage with Miss Eunice Pearsons in February, 1843, by the Rev. Barnes M. Hall at West Berkshire, she dying May 25, 1854; he was again married to his present wife September, 1856. He embraced religion at Sheldon in March, 1851, under the preaching of the late Rev. Stephen D. Brown, then presiding elder on St. Albans district. He immediately united with the M. E. church, and has remained a consistent and respected member of the same until the present time; nearly all this time holding some official relation to the church. For several years previous to 1881 he practiced as a lawyer in St. Albans; on Feb. 1, of that year he became associated in the law business with the Hon. Henry A. Burt, under the firm name of Burt & Hall, continuing as such to the present, March, 1882.

D. G. FREEMAN,

a young man, came to Swanton to practice his profession May 9, 1878. On Sept. 8, 1880, he married Miss Lydia M. Best of Highgate.

RALPH O. STURTEVANT

was born in Weybridge in 1840, studied law with Judge Wilson of Bakersfield, and finished his course with E. A. Sowles, Esq., of St. Albans, and was admitted to Franklin County bar in 1867. After having practiced his profession a while at St. Albans he came to Swanton November, 1869, where he still continues to reside, assiduously pursuing the business of his profession.

He married the daughter of E. Burgess, Esq., of St. Albans, in September, 1869. He is a prominent member of the order of Good Templars, and was with others chosen as delegate from the United States to the delegated convention of the order in England in 1873. He made the trip to England for this purpose, being absent most of the season. He is now (1882,) practicing as a lawyer in this place, and retains to the present his position as a leading member of the order of Good Templars.

PHYSICIANS WHO HAVE PRACTICED IN SWANTON.

Arranged in the order in which they began, as near as can be ascertained.

Eli S. Smith,—was living at the Falls in 1797; he was probably the first physician there.

Brigham Lasell,—came here at a very early day, probably about 1794; settled on the farm lying at the corner where the Sheldon road intersects the West road, known to this day as the "Widow Lasell place." He died in Swanton, Aug. 30, 1819, aged 44 years. His wife, Anna, who outlived him, died Dec. 10, 1859.

Jabez Penniman,—was custom house officer from 1801 to 1812; he, however, practiced as a physician here somewhat during those years. His daughter married Wm. Brayton, Esq., in 1812.

Charles Hall,—was here from 1810—19. [For notice, see paper later by his son, Horace P. Hall, M. D., of St. Albans.]

Jonathan Berry,—came to this town about 1819, commenced practice at the Centre. He married for his 2d wife Eliza Cornell, daughter of Heman Hopkins, Jan. 16, 1825. He came to the Falls about 1825, engaged in trade a year or two and went West about 1828 or '9. He had a son Lucian that became president of a western college.

Chas. Parsons,—came to Swanton Falls about 1819, and died there, March 15, 1828, at the age of 34.

Franklin Bradley,—studied medicine with Dr. Chas. Hall, in St. Albans, and commenced practice at Swanton Falls about 1822. He married Virsa, daughter of the Hon. James Fisk; soon after coming here March 9, 1823, he left for Highgate about 1824 or '5, and there engaged in the mercantile and marble business for a few years.

Lewis Janes,—was born in Northampton, Mass., Aug. 27, 1795, commenced practice in Fairfield in 1817; also practiced in Stanbridge, P. Q., about 1820 and '21. He came to Swanton and established himself at the Centre, about 1823, and has ever after resided there. He was a good physician and a highly esteemed citizen, and held from time to time many important offices. He died July 11, 1874.

Isaac N. Foster,—began practice here about 1824, and left 1827.

James Farnsworth,—commenced practice in Swanton; afterwards went to Fairfax.

Hosea P. Cobb,—began here about 1826 and continued about 3 or 4 years. On leaving Swanton he went to Europe with Mr. Deming, of Burlington. He was practicing in Detroit 1838, the writer when on a western tour called upon him there at that time. It is said that after this he was in Danville, this State, and was preparing to publish a work entitled, "The Physician's Sure Guide." He was a man of very studious habits.

Dr. Daniels,—practiced here about the year 1833.

Horatio H. Brayton,—commenced practicing medicine here about 1828, and was united in marriage with Helen A. oldest daughter of Jonathan Ferris, March 23, 1831. In the spring of 1834, he engaged in the marble business, carrying it on quite extensively for a few years. He afterwards went to New York, and engaged in the sale of drugs and medicines; after closing his business in New York, he went to California where he died. He was a man of more than ordinary ability.

Harding C. Whittemore,—came here and commenced practice about 1830; continued until about 1835, and then went to reside on his farm in Sheldon.

Ira Hatch,—came here about 1840, and practiced several years; died in Swanton, March 12, 1845, aged 47 years.

D. P. Bennett,—a botanic physician, practiced here from about 1840 to '57, when he went to Canada.

A. W. Saxe,—son of Jacob Saxe, of Sheldon, began practice here about 1845, and continued until about 1850, when he went to California, and is still living and practicing his profession at Santa Clara, in that State (1875).

Leander L. Cushman,—studied his profession in his father's office, at Berkshire; attended lectures at Castleton; practiced a while in Berkshire, and after in Fairfield; came to Swanton in 1852; went into trade here as partner with his brother-in-law, John Adams; represented the town in the legislature in 1852-'3, and after this became dep'y collector of customs at Rouses' Point, and is now (1875) living in East Highgate, his sister being the present wife of the writer.

John Warner,—who was a captain in the Revolutionary war, came from Bennington to St. Albans, settling near the Swanton line in 1792; practiced medicine in the east part of the town for many years; was somewhat noted as the first to manufacture and vend pills in this section, and for the saying, that "If my pills don't do you any good they won't hurt you," which is more than can be said of many pills that are sold at the present day.

Truman Warner,—was born in Bennington Dec. 6, 1778, and at the age of 14 came here with his father, Capt. John Warner, from Bennington, driving an ox-team. They settled in St. Albans near the line dividing St. Albans from Swanton.

He married Miss Polly Caulkins in 1798 [whose father, Joshua Caulkins, was one of the first settlers of the town south of the Center] and that year moved to Dunham, Canada, where his son Bronson was born Oct. 1, 1801, who is yet living. After enduring severe privations incident to all new settlements, he left Dunham and returned to St. Albans in 1806, with health seriously impaired. He at once commenced the study of medicine with his father known as the "botanic system," and in due time commenced practice with marked success. He located in Swanton in March, 1811, on the same place now occupied by his son, Bronson, and continued the practice of his profession until his death, May 15, 1822. His years, doubtless, might have been much prolonged but for the excessive demands made upon him in the practice of his profession. Having to ride long distances, with constant exposure, it operated to break down his constitution and laid him in an early grave. He held the office of deputy collector of customs in 1812 and '13.

John B. Cilley began practice here about the year 1835, and died here about 1840.

George S. Howe practiced here a while about the year 1839 or '40.

C. H. O. Cote,—was the son of Charles Claude Carr Cote, Esq., of Napierville, Canada, who was 82 years old when his house was burnt. He was imprisoned and finally being released, went to Montreal, where he died May 10, 1839. The son, the subject of this sketch, was outlawed by the Canadian government, on account of the part he took in the Canada Rebellion. He practiced as a physician here from November, 1838, to August, 1841. He also contributed largely for the North American newspaper published here, and added much to the interest of that paper, though he was not editor according to the recollection of the writer. Dr. Cote after this became religious, connecting himself with the Baptist church, and took a warm interest in the Protestant missions in Canada. It is thought he died about 1854.

Dr. Pixley,—practiced here awhile about the year 1844.

Newton Ballou,—practiced among the soldiers here during the Patriot war in 1838.

Dr. Birdsall,—was a surgeon in the U. S. Army, and attended calls by the inhabitants during the Patriot war in 1838.

Dr. George M. Hall,—[See biographical notice by his brother, Dr. Horace P. Hall, of St. Albans, after the papers for Swanton given by Mr. Barney.—ED.]

Dr. Hall was a man of more than ordinary ability. He ranked high in his profession and loved it. He was once asked by the writer, if he had his life to live over, if he would choose the same profession. His answer was a decided "Yes, no other would suit me so well." He delighted in the study of scientific subjects, especially of geology, and made some discoveries in that department which have been noticed by eminent geologists as being very important, particularly in the discovery of fossils, which determined the location in the geological series of the kind of rocks seen near Highgate Springs, which before had been in doubt by the scientific world.

He and the late Mr. Perry, who commenced the history of Swanton, made many excursions over the rocks and ledges of Franklin County with their hammers and specimen bags. Both held advanced opinions, both with regard to scientific and religious subjects, and were disposed to call in question the old interpretation given to the Bible account of creation and the resurrection of the identical matter composing our bodies that at death are laid in the grave. Both are now in the spirit land, and doubtless know for a certainty with regard to those unseen and spiritual matters that they have so often discussed.

The death of Dr. Hall has left a blank in the community and in the medical profession which will be hard to fill. To a fine personal appearance he added a pleasant, genial manner, which with good conversational powers made him an agreeable companion and acceptable in all circles. He was popular with the masses, and was chosen to represent the town in the Legislature several years, and was also called to fill many other responsible offices.

D. J. Morrill,—came here in 1857, and has continued to reside here to the present time. He has practiced his profession to some extent, but in the main has given his attention to other business a large part of the time. He has kept a drug store, and also held the office of sheriff and other important offices, and at present (1882) station agent of Central Vt. R. R.

J. B. Morgan,—commenced practice here in 1859, giving very general satisfaction. He married Ellen M., daughter of the writer. He continued to practice here until about 1863, when he removed to Johnson, where he still (1875) continues the practice of his profession. Since that date his family has been broken up, and he is now (1882) practicing in Cambridge.

Horatio A. Gates,—son of Horace and Lucinda Gates, formerly of Franklin, came here about 1845, and remained until 1848. He died at Panama, on his way to California.

O. F. Fassett,—practiced here a while in 1854 or '5.

Dr. Seth W. Langdon,—began practice in Swanton in 1853, and left in '54, to go to Sheldon.

Dr. A. P. L. Consigny,—was a Canadian by birth, and was among those who were forced to leave Canada on account of the political troubles of 1838. He married Lucy L. Goodrich, June 21, 1840. He practiced medicine here for a while, and then removed to St. Ce Saire, P. Q., where he practiced many years, and died about 1858.

Dr. W. S. Johnson,—was here in 1858, and kept a drug store.

Dr. S. E. Parke,—came here in 1862 or '3, and died about 1864.

Dr. Wm. Bourdon,—began practice here in 1865, and continued to the time of his death, July 22, 1881.

Dr. Wm. Thibault,—came here in 1865, practiced about 2 years, and went to St. Albans.

Dr. Emory Kimpton,—commenced practice here in 1869, remained here about 2 years, and then went to New Jersey, deeming the change essential to his health.

Dr. H. R. Wilder,—began the practice of medicine here in 1872, and has continued to the present time (1882), and has many friends.

Dr. C. S. L. Leach,—came from Highgate, and established himself here in 1874, since the death of Dr. Hall. He has since become the husband of Mrs. C. H. Hogle, whose husband, Mr. Hogle, was formerly a merchant here.

Dr. Farley,—came here in the spring of 1879, and commenced the practice of medicine on the homœopathic system. He doubtless thinking he could better himself, left here in July, 1881.

Dr. C. A. Gee,—practicing on the same plan of Dr. Farley, came here soon after Dr. Farley; left Aug. 1, 1879.

Dr. Prime,—came here in the fall of '81.

MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS AND HISTORY.

To Lemuel Lasell belongs the honor of being the first captain of the first military company in town; this we learn from his children. From reliable documents, we also learn that Clark Hubbard was captain in 1807. There is a record showing that Heman Hopkins was captain, Leonard Cummings lieutenant, and V. R. Goodrich ensign, in 1808; also that Shadrach Hathaway, Jr. was captain the same year; probably of the company in the easterly part of the town. Samuel Bullard was captain in 1812; probably of the company of the west part of the town, while Newcomb Tompkins, Jr. was captain of the company in the east part, the same year; no military records from 1812 to 1821 are to be found.

The recollection of the writer goes back to years 1817 or '18, at which time Ezekiel O. Goodrich was captain, Jonathan Manzer lieutenant. They then wore the old style Napoleon military hats and heavy epaulets and made a more imposing appearance to my boyish fancy than officers of modern date. We find a record that, in 1821, James Platt was captain, Rufus L. Barney lieutenant, Charles Stilphen ensign, of the company at the Falls.

In 1821 and '2 Eli Carroll, captain, Benj. H. Pitcher, lieutenant, Reuben Warren, ensign, 4th company, belonging mostly in the east part of the town.

In 1821 and '2 Ira A. Pratt, captain, Daniel Wood, lieutenant, Orrin Wood, ensign, 2d company, mostly in middle of the town. About the year 1822 the company under Capt. Platt at the Falls was disbanded, and all those in the west part of the town, liable to military duty, were required to go to the old meeting house on the middle road, to perform military duty. We find by the record that

In 1826 Reuben Warner was captain, Cary Clark, lieutenant, Alanson Chapin, ensign.

In 1827 Reuben Warner, captain, Alanson Chapin, lieutenant, 4th company. The company at this time was very large, having 192 on the roll, this and the fact that the west part of the town had ever been greatly dissatisfied with the arrangement that required them to go so far from their homes for military duty, led to the adoption of measures for re-organization of a company at the Falls, which we shall speak of presently.

In 1829 and '30 Warren Robinson, captain, Smyrna Brown, lieutenant of 3d company, 1st Regt., 3d brigade, and Luther Latham, ensign.

In 1834 Edward Baker, captain, D. B. Marvin, lieutenant of 3d company, 1st Regt., 3d brigade, and S. Baker, ensign.

In 1835 Edward Baker, captain, Schuiler Baker, lieutenant of 3d company, 1st Regt., 3d brigade, and S. S. Robinson, ensign.

E. B. Rounds was captain, G. W. Foster, 2d lieutenant, W. Robinson, 1st sergeant, J. W. Spaulding, 3d sergeant of 2d company in the east part of the town in 1839, and were called out in April of that year to keep order and "preserve neutrality" on the frontier,

In 1827, there was an order issued by Brig. Gen. James Farnsworth to Heman Hopkins to bring together all persons liable to military duty living on and west of the stage road leading from St. Albans to Johns bridge, and all north and west of said bridge, to appear on the public square in front of the dwelling-house of Nelson Bullard, on the 9th day of September, to elect officers for the 6th company of Infantry in 1st regt. 3d brigade, 3d division of Vt. militia.

The muster roll shows that at this meeting Heman Hopkins was elected captain, I. A. Vanduzee 1st lieutenant, Albert G. Brown 2d lieutenant. 70 men, including officers, on the roll.

In 1828, I. A. Vanduzee became captain, Albert G. Brown 1st lieutenant, Bradford Scott 2d lieutenant. In 1830, Bradford Scott became captain, Simon Kellogg 1st lieutenant, David Sanborn 2d lieutenant. In 1832, Simon Kellogg became captain, John B. Dunbar 1st lieutenant, David Sanborn 2d lieutenant. In 1833, Simon Kellogg became captain, John B. Dunbar, 1st lieutenant, Luther Lasell 2d lieutenant. In 1834, David O. Potter became captain, Abram Hogle 1st lieutenant, David Wood 2d lieutenant. In 1837, Abram Hogle became captain, David Wood 1st lieutenant, Geo. Barney 2d lieutenant. In 1839, 40, 41, 42, Geo. Barney was captain, John Asselstyne 1st lieutenant, Andrew M. Thayer 2d lieutenant.

In 1843, James M. Tabor became captain, according to the recollection of the writer. The company was not called out for drill, but for the inspection of arms only. In 1844, a law was passed abolishing all military organizations.

In 1829 or 30, there was organized at the Falls a rifle company, under the name of "The Swanton Independent Grays," Stephen B. Hoffman captain, F. V. Goodrich 1st lieutenant, A. S. Farrar ensign. This company kept up its organization for two or three years and then disbanded, for the reason, it was said, that so many of the members failed to procure uniforms.

ENROLLMENT OF CAPT. JAMES PLATT'S
U. S. VOL. CO., SWANTON, FEB. 1838.

Captain.—James Platt.

Lieutenants.—1st, Bradford Scott; 2d, Geo. Barney.

Sergeants.—1st, H. K. Hopkins; 2d, A. B. Manzer; 3d, N. L. Whittemore; 4th, Joseph Tillison.

Corporals.—1st, A. D. Story; 2d, M. Manzer; 3d, Allen Phelps; 4th, Thomas Cain.

Fifer.—Charles Kane.

Drummers.—Ira Church, H. N. Wilkinson.

Privates.—Jas. Anderson, Henry Asselstyne, Frederick Arsino, N. L. Burdick, Daniel Bullard, Jr., Lemuel Barney, Jr., Wm. Cain, A. M. Clark, Rufus B. Downes, Nelson Dunbar, Harry Donaldson, Alfred Forbes, John Freemore, John Foster, John B. Flint, Mason Fitch, V. S. Ferris, Patrick Gribbon, Hiram Gove, Collins W. Goodrich, Heman K. Hopkins, John Hogarth, Charles W. Heald, John A. Heald, Alexander Keenan, Perry Lake, Francis LaClare, Jas. Murphy, John McGregor, Stephen R. Manzer, Jas. McNally, Joseph Marrino, Peter Micah, Gideon Nokes, John O'Neal, Alanson Platt, Barney Patten, Peter P. Payne, Curtis P. Pratt, Charles Roby, L. N. Rice, Asa Rood, 2d, Josiah A. Squiers, Wm. F. Steinhour, William Slammon, Edward Treudo, Josiah Tibbits, Thomas Webster, Grove Wright.

The above company was enlisted by Lieut. Miller, of the U. S. Army, under the directions of Gen. Wool, who was sent to the frontier to see that the neutrality laws were enforced, and to preserve order during the great excitement consequent on the expectation that the "Patriots," as they were then called, were about to rise and overthrow the British rule in Canada. This company was raised to assist Gen. Wool in the endeavor, and though the most who enlisted were friendly to the cause of the Patriots, the majority no doubt thought that if in case of their failure to accomplish their purpose it would be better that they should fall into the hands of friends rather than enemies. Though friendly, there was no design on their part to take any unlawful measures to assist those engaged in endeavoring to overthrow the Canadian Government. When Dr. Nelson surrendered his force to General Wool at the line, near Caldwell's manor, this company was formed in open ranks, and the Patriot force marched between, when they laid down their arms, which were loaded into sleighs and sent to St. Albans with some of the leaders of the Patriots that night, this company being the military guard. It was in service about 20 days.

PAY-ROLL OF CAPT. GOODRICH'S COMPANY of Swanton, 11th regiment, from July 15 to Dec. 8, 1813, who were in action at the battle of Lundy's Lane:

Captain.—Valentine R. Goodrich.

Privates.—Daniel Crawford, Thomas Lackey, Stephen Howard, William Black, Austin Root, L. G. Palmer, Elisha Hoyt, Samuel Story, A. Lyon, David Moody, Dwight Marsh, Richard Eustace, Ezra Estus, Clinton George, Rufus Austin, John Russell, F. Burnham, Timothy Burdick, Orson Brush, George Beals, Jacob Bowker, James Collins, Joseph Clark, Edward Cary, E. Chapman, Thomas Dickinson, John Fox, A. Follett, William Goddard, Peter Jessemore, John Lamphere, Robert Miller, John Martin, Guy Perry, Thomas Reed, O. Hoyt.

Capt. Valentine R. Goodrich was killed in the battle of Lundy's Lane. His niece, Eunice Goodrich Barney, was the mother of Col. Elisha L. Barney of the 6th regiment, who was mortally wounded in the battle of the Wilderness; and is also the mother of Col. Valentine G. Barney of the 9th regiment in service during the war of 1861. It may further be said of Capt. Goodrich that, in the same battle which cost him his life, he was at first severely wounded in or near the knee, and might have withdrawn from the action with honor, but this neither his sense of duty nor his military ardor would permit him to do. He, therefore, retired from the action behind a stump, and tied his handkerchief around the wounded limb, and was again with his men on the field; not long after which a ball struck his watch, making a deep indentation in the case, glancing inward it entered his body and lodged there, which soon after caused his death.

Capt. Goodrich was greatly beloved by the men of his command, and could lead them anywhere, and the few that returned to Swanton after the war were ever lavish in his praise.

SWANTON SOLDIERS AT PLATTSBURGH, who volunteered from Swanton, and were at the battle of Plattsburgh, Sept. 11, 1814.

Captain.—Amasa I. Brown.

Privates.—Enos E. Brown, Lemuel Barney, Oliver Potter, L. Cummings, Jeremiah Potter, John Denio, Burton Freeman, George W. Foster, Jules Keep.

SWANTON COMPANY OF 1839.

The roll of the Swanton Co., 11th Reg. Vt. Militia, in service on the northern frontier April, 1839, is as follows; time of service 13 days:

Captain.—E. B. Rounds.

Lieutenant.—George W. Foster.

Sergeants.—William Robinson, J. W. Spaulding.

Privates.—Chas. Conger, A. B. Pierce, C. P. Pratt, A. H. Mason, Wm. Lackey, C. H. Mead, Wm. Merrick, Amos Skeels, Jr., Harry Bullard, Wm. Lawrence, Lorenzo Laselle, Chas. Pierce, Dwight Dorman, U. C. Wright, F. E. Hoadley, Jesse

A. B. Sewell

COL. 10TH VT. VOL'S

Barber, E. C. Wait, James Smith, Lorenzo Kenney, S. W. Newton, C. H. Bullard, J. J. Warner, J. W. Green, Norman Barker, Silas Lackey, Joseph Burnell, Martin Holyoke, Dennison Dorman, A. S. Mears.

SWANTON IN THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

The part taken by Swanton in the late war being a very important item in its military history, I have thought proper to copy in detail its record as given in the Franklin County Military Chapter, compiled by Warren Gibbs, Esq., of St. Albans, and published in Vol. II. of Vt. Hist. Gazetteer:

[The consequent of allowing one enterprising writer to dip into the history of some good town, capable of taking care of itself, and giving a portion of its best history in his paper before we reach the town, whose right to its own history we must in justice acknowledge and see rendered back, at the expense of publishing the same article twice in the work, a thing we would never otherwise from good taste do—publish over in one volume what has been given in another volume.—ED.]

“Swanton was the first . . . to move to the rescue of a war threatened to the country in 1861. With a few other towns in the State, this town had kept alive the military spirit of the people of earlier days, and the Rebellion found the ‘Green Mountain Guards,’ an independent company well organized and disciplined for the contest. The echoes of the thunders around Sumpter had scarcely died away when this company was in readiness to be mustered into the service of the United States. It was the first company in the State to be inscribed upon the rolls of honor, and was mustered in, the right of the 1st Reg., Co. A, May 2, 1861. The first citizens of Swanton and Highgate, and a few from other towns, were numbered within the ranks, and figured very conspicuously in the service afterwards. Every commissioned officer re-entered service, and all were rewarded with promotions. Every sergeant was afterwards commissioned, and some of them were high in rank. One corporal became a major, and a number of privates line officers. Twelve commissioned officers from Swanton re-entered service from this company and three from Highgate. Swanton furnished 21 commissioned officers in the civil war of 1861, viz.:

Col. ALBERT B. JEWETT, of the 10th Reg., served first as 1st lieut. in Co. A, 1st Reg., during its term of service. He was mustered in colonel of the 10th Reg., Sept. 1, 1862, and continued in command until Apr. 25, 1864, when he resigned.

Capt. ELISHA L. BARNEY, of the 6th regiment, when the war broke out was a merchant doing business in Swanton, and was associated in trade with Col. Albert B. Jewett, under the firm name of Jewett & Barney. He was mustered into service captain of Co. K, 6th Reg., Oct. 15, 1861; wounded Sept. 14, '62; promoted major Oct. 15, '62; lieut.-col. Dec. 18, '62, and colonel of the regiment March 18, '63. In the terrible battle of the Wilderness, where the greatest havoc of the war was made in the “Old Vermont Brigade,” while gallantly leading his regiment against the enemy May 5, Col. Barney was wounded and died of his wounds at Fredericksburg, Va., May 10, '64.

Many other officers and men from Vermont have distinguished themselves in the service, but few have written their names so high upon the scroll of fame. Colonel Barney was an honor to his State; jealous of her good name, he honored his commission, and was the pride of the “Old Brigade.”

He was a good disciplinarian, a soldier of undoubted courage and discretion, a Christian gentleman; the men of his command honored and respected him. His remains were brought to Swanton for interment, and the citizens testified their high respect for his memory in the largest funeral gathering ever assembled in town. Col. Barney was 32 years of age at his death.

Lieut.-Col. VALENTINE G. BARNEY, 9th regiment, was mustered into service with the regiment Capt. of Co. A, July 9, '62; promoted lieut.-col. of the regiment July 1, '63, and mustered out of service June 13, 1865.

Maj. EDGAR N. BULLARD, of the 7th regiment, was mustered into service with the regiment 1st Lieut. of Co. F, Feb. 12, '62; promoted captain Aug. 28, '62; major of the regiment Aug. 29, '65; lieut.-col., Sept. 1st, '65, but not mustered as such; mustered out of service as major April 17, '66. Major Bullard was retained in service as mustering officer one month beyond the muster out of the regiment.

Capt. LAWRENCE D. CLARK, Co. A, 1st Reg., was mustered into service with the regiment May 2, '61, and out with the same Aug. 15, '61. He was afterwards major of the 13th regiment on the roll from town of Highgate.

Capt. JOHN D. SHERIDEN, Capt. Co. C, 5th regiment, was mustered in captain of the company Sept. 16, '61, and resigned July 10, '62. He first entered the service as 2d Lieut. of Co. A, 1st Reg., and served during its term. After he resigned his connection with the 5th regiment he was mustered in a recruit private in Co. F, 11th Reg. Jan. 4, '64; promoted sergt. June 8, '64; 2d Lieut. Co. M, Oct. 12, '64; 1st lieut. Co. L, June 6, '65; transferred to Co. A, June 24, '65, and was mustered out of service Aug. 25, '65.

Capt. LORENZO D. BROOKS, recruited company F, 7th regiment, at Swanton, and was mustered into service captain of the company, Feb. 12, '62. He accompanied the regiment to Ship Island, thence to New Orleans and Baton Rouge. In command of his company he was killed in action July 23, '62, on board the steamer "Ceres," opposite Warrenton, Miss., a few miles below Vicksburgh. The following article is furnished by his mother:

Capt. Lorenzo D. Brooks, son of Alonzo and Martha Brooks, of St. Albans Bay, was born Apr. 20, '33, in that part of the town known as St. Albans Point. In January, '62, he was a merchant doing business in Swanton; he heard our country's call "to arms," and speedily closing up his business, offered his services to the government, and went forth to its rescue.

For many years previously, business had called him much away from his native state. He went West in '54; returning in '56, embarked with friends and relatives for California; spent 3 years in the gold regions, where he realized many of his anticipations; returned home and went into trade with his uncle at Swanton, and had been there 2 years when he so willingly left all behind to go forth to battle for the right; we know not with what high ambitions filling his bosom he marched forward, but we do know before victory was won or his hopes realized how he was stricken down in his manly glory. He was beloved by the officers and men of his whole regiment and kind friends at home. The fatal ball that caused his life-blood to ebb away pierced equally a mother's heart.

Capt. FRIEND H. BARNEY, of company C, 5th regiment, was mustered into service 1st lieutenant of the company, Sept. 16, '61; promoted capt. July 17, '62; wounded at the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, '64; mustered out of service Sept. 15, '64.

Capt. HIRAM PLATT, company F, 10th regiment, was mustered into service captain of the company Sept. 1, '62, and resigned April 1, '64.

Capt. GEORGE G. BLAKE, company K, 13th regiment, was mustered into service with the regiment Oct. 10, '62, and mustered out with the same July 21, '63.

Capt. JESSE A. JEWETT, company K, 5th regiment, was mustered into service 2d lieutenant of company C, Sept. 16, '61, promoted 1st lieutenant Dec. 10, '62, captain company K, Mar. 21, '63; resigned May 29, '63.

Capt. STEVEN F. BROWN, company A, 17th regiment, was mustered into service captain of the company Jan. 5, '64, received severe wounds at the battle of the Wilderness May 6, '64, was honorably discharged for this reason Aug. 22, '64; previous to his serving in the 17th, he was 1st lieutenant of company K, 13th regiment, during its term of service.

Capt. ALEXANDER W. CHILTON, of Co. K, 10th Regt., was mustered into service with the regiment, 2d lieutenant of Co. F, Sept. 1, '62; promoted 1st lieut. Co. I, Jan. 1, '63; capt. Co. K, Aug. 27, '64, and was mustered out of service June 22, '65.

Adj. EUGENE CONSIGNÉY, of the Cav. Regt., was mustered into service sergeant in company M, Dec. 31, '62; promoted 1st serg. Nov. 11, '64; 1st lieu. May 16, '65; adjutant, June 4, '65, and mustered out of service Aug. 9, '65,

Lieut. BRADFORD S. MURPHY, 1st lieu. Co. K, 6th Regt., was mustered into service sergt. in the company, Oct. 15, '61; promoted sergt. major June 24, '62, 2d lieu. Dec. 28, '62; 1st lieu., Mar. 18, '63; dismissed the service Oct. 8, '63; he served afterward in Co. F, 7th Regt.

Lieut. SAMUEL G. BROWN, JR., 1st lieu. Co. A, 17th Regt., was mustered into service Jan. 5, '64, and died July 5, '64, at Washington, D. C., of typhoid fever.

Lieut. EDWARD VINLETTE, 1st lieu. of Co. K, 10th Regt., was mustered into service in Co. F, Sept. 1, '62; promoted 1st sergt. Jan. 1, '64, 2d lieu. Co. K, Feb. 9, '65; 1st lieu. Mar. 22, '65, and was mustered out of service June 29, '65.

Lieut. HENRY G. STEARNS, 2d lieu. Co. F, 7th Regt., was mustered into service 1st sergt. of the company Feb. 12, '62; promoted 2d lieu. Aug. 28, '62, and resigned Jan. 27, '63. He afterwards served in Co. E, 11th Regt.

Lieut. SIDNEY S. MOREY, 2d lieu. of Co. E, 13th Regt., was mustered into service with the regiment 1st sergt. of the company Oct. 10, '62; promoted 2d lieu. June 4, '63, and mustered out of service with the regiment July 21, '63.

Rev. VOLNEY M. SIMONS, Methodist, chaplain of the 5th regiment, was mustered into service with the regiment Sept. 16, '61, and resigned in the month of March, '63.

Rev. JOHN B. PERRY, Congregational, chaplain of the 10th Regt., was mustered into service Apr. 14, '65, and was mustered out the 7th of July following; had been for many years the settled pastor of the Congregational church at Swanton Falls, and returned to his charge at the close of the war.

Sergt. HORACE A. HYDE, was mustered into service sergt. Co. B, Cav. Regt. Nov.

19, '61; promoted 1st sergt. Feb. 19, '63; 2d lieutenant Apr. 1, '63; 1st lieu. Nov. 19, '64, but was not mustered upon his commission. He was taken prisoner in action, Oct. 11, '63, at Brandy Station, Va., and with many other cavalry boys were conducted to the Rebel prison pens at Andersonville, Ga. His commissioned rank was not revealed to the rebels until the following summer, and he was only known as a sergeant meantime. Exposed to the inclemency of the weather, with miserable and scanty food, filthy camp and foul water, the strongest constitutions were made to yield to the rebels' most powerful ally, death. It became apparent that Lieut. Hyde's name was also enrolled with the battalions that were fast passing away, when he at length yielded to the earnest entreaties of some of his company companions, and his commissioned rank became known to the enemy in order that he might perchance be removed to some more healthy locality. The Union officers in prison were kept separate from the rank and file, and Lieut. Hyde, weakened by disease until he knelt at the altar of death, was removed from the pen to die elsewhere. The parting on that summer afternoon in 1864 between himself and comrades was final; some of them were permitted to breathe the sweet air of freedom again in their Northern homes, but these are the last tidings they brought from the dying Lieutenant. We have since ascertained that he died in Macon, Ga., Sept. 27, 1864. He was a man of ability, loyal, true, and brave, genial and generous; his memory is dear to his former companions in arms.

'SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

In memory of the soldiers from Swanton, who laid down their lives in the civil war of 1861, the town, in accordance with the decision of a large majority of voters in town-meeting assembled, have erected a beautiful monument at a cost of about $2,000. The original appropriation was $1,500, and Hon. Wm. H. Blake, one of the selectmen of the town, was authorized to make the purchase. A committee, consisting of Dr. G. M. Hall, Hon. Wm. H.

Blake and C. W. Rich, was appointed by the town to accept and locate the monument, and the site was selected in the village park of Swanton Falls. The monument was placed in position in the fall of 1868. The design is a Grecian "Goddess of Liberty," figure and dress. She stands in a contemplative mood, her countenance representing an expression subdued and sad, but at the same time one of exultation over the great results of the sacrifice for liberty. The base upon which the whole rests is a large block of marble taken from the quarries of Fisk and Barney, of the Isle La Motte, beautifully dressed. It is 5 feet, 6 inches square, and 2 feet, 6 inches high. Upon this base rests an upper base, taken from the same quarry, and made more ornamental, and upon this rests the die. The upper base is 4 feet, 3 inches square and 18 inches high. The die was taken from the Isle La Motte polishing marble quarry, and is more highly wrought and elaborately finished. It measures 2 feet, 8 inches on either face, and is 4 feet high. Upon the sides of the die facing the south-east and west are sculptured the names of the 29 resident soldiers from Swanton who died in the service of the United States. Their names appear according to rank; also the number of the regiment in which they were serving at the time of their death, whether killed upon the battle-field or died of wounds or disease in hospital, or otherwise, together with the name of battle-field or hospital and date of death. On the north face of the die is the following inscription:

ERECTED BY THE TOWN OF SWANTON in memory of
HER PATRIOT SOLDIERS who fell in the WAR OF THE REBELLION.

Upon the die rests the cap or capital. The same is wrought in Grecian moulding, is one foot thick, and surmounted with the figure. The statue is of pure white marble from the Rutland quarries. The whole height of the monument is 20 feet, and the cost, when the grading and fencing is completed, will be about $2,000. The work was executed by Daniel J. Perry, a young man, a native of Swanton. This was his first effort of this magnitude, and is a success even beyond the most sanguine expectation of his friends. He was occupied upon the work about a year and a half, with other workmen to assist him on the bases and die, etc. This work does great credit both to the kindly and patriotic feeling of the people of Swanton, and in this respect the town stands alone among the towns of the county.

POLITICAL ORGANIZATIONS.

There have been two parties in Swanton almost from the first—Democrats and Federalist and Republican, Whig and Tory, etc. Parties have usually been pretty evenly divided, and perhaps it has been well that such has been the case. One party has served as a check upon the other, tending to preserve each from dangerous extremes. Political differences were strongly marked as early as 1804. The parties then existing were Federalists and Democrats. The fact that they were pretty evenly divided led each party to exert itself to the utmost in order to carry the day. Party spirit has often run very high, and it has been in some instances with good feeling. This, it is said, was particularly the case with Mr. James Brown and Mr. Samuel Keyes. They would each work with their might in opposition to each other, and after election would sit down and talk the matter over with the best of feelings.

It is told of one of the candidates for representative (Jas. Brown): The Hog Islanders being generally opposed to him, he tied up a bundle election morning, and started off for Hog island, enquiring of those he met who were on their way to election which road would be the better for him to take in going over into New York State. "What!" they said, "are you going away to-day? It is election day." "Yes, I am going over to York State; the election has been put off till next week." By this means the voters (Mr. Keyes' friends) were kept at home, and he by a roundabout way returned to the Falls and secured his election.

During the time of the embargo, and especially during the last war with England, party spirit ran high. It even extended itself into social relations. It is said that in some cases ladies refused to receive attentions from gentlemen simply on the ground of difference in political sentiments. In one instance, as it is credibly reported, a marriage engagement was broken up for this reason alone. It is said that politicians would sometimes take such as were likely to be easily induced to vote for the one who would furnish the most liquor, and get them intoxicated, keeping them so for days. When the time for voting came they would lead them well protected to the ballot-box from the place in which they had kept them confined, in order that they might secure their votes.

During the last war with England, Democrats were politically opposed to smuggling, and usually did what they could to detect instances of it. Political interests have ever been predominant in this town. So much has this been the case that it is said that a schoolboy, being asked by his teacher what was the principal employment of the people of Swanton, very innocently answered, "Talking politics, sir."

THE PATRIOT WAR

(Written by Rev. J. B. Perry, which I copy from papers which came into my hands after his decease.)

As it is commonly called, had no small influence upon the citizens of Vermont all along the frontier, and more especially upon those of the towns of much consideration. Swanton Falls was a position, central, in all this vicinity, as respects the struggle which was then going on, and a rallying point for the Canadians who were this side of the line. Hence, this conflict becomes in an important sense a part of the history of Swanton, for it continued during the rebellion to be the rendezvous of the refugees.

This outbreak occurred in the autumn of 1837. As it was preceded by much dissatisfaction, we will look at some of the causes which finally led to it, before noticing what transpired in this place and the immediate vicinity. For many preceding years the Canadians had endeavored to obtain a redress of the wrongs which they continued to think they were suffering from the English government. Having failed in most of their efforts, they became very much dissatisfied with their position. There was in Montreal a celebrated meeting of those who were called radicals as early as Dec. 13, 1827. Their grievances, as they thought, continued to augment, and then came a corresponding increase of their dissatisfaction with the Provincial government as it was administered.

In February, 1834, the famous "92 Resolutions" were passed by the House of Assembly. These, however, failed to secure relief, or to produce the desired effect. Another measure was accordingly tried. In 183—, the House of Assembly voted only 8 months' allowance for the carrying on of the government. This, instead of bringing relief, only led the Provincial governor to borrow from the public chest.

Matters went on in this way until meetings began to be called for the consideration of the state of the country; also for the devising of means of redress by a legitimate and constitutional course, as they maintained, if it could be made to succeed, otherwise by a resort ultimately to arms. A meeting of this kind was held at Napierville, in the county of La Cadie, in the summer of 1836. On the following March, 1837, Lord John Russell's coercive resolutions were passed. These refusing to make the reforms which were demanded, only tended to increase the exasperation and add fuel to the already existing flame of discontent. October 23 and 24, 1837, occurred the great meeting of the disaffected Canadians at St. Charles. At this meeting certain resolutions, setting forth their grievances and aims, were adopted and addresses were made by Papineau and others. Five counties were at length united in opposition to the government. La Cadie being soon after added, there were 6 counties in the league.

November 4, (5) arrangements were made, by which there was a meeting of both parties at St. Athanase. Compromises attempted without effect. On the 6th of Nov. a skirmish occurred at La Colle Mills, a place lying between Chambly and Longuille. The English troops made an attack Nov. 23 on St. Dennis. This place was bravely defended by Dr. Wolfred Nelson, the government forces being defeated by his strenuous exertions.

November 25, occurred the great fight at St. Charles, and the rout of the patriots. Upon this defeat, they fled in all directions, many of them seeking refuge in the United States. Soon after this, several of the leading radicals came to Swanton, and made in part, or altogether, this place their head-quarters when they were this side of the line. Among others were Dr. Robert Nelson, Dr. Cote, S. M. R. Bouchette, Col. Gagnou, and A. Drolet.

They came in part, perhaps to avoid arrest, and escape the other dangers, to which they would be exposed if they remained at home. No doubt they also had in view another aim. They tried to awaken, so far as possible, amongst the States' people, an interest in their cause. There is no question that the citizens of Swanton and of the neighboring towns, almost universally sympathized with the Canadian radicals at the time. Upon there taking refuge here, they doubtless gave them all the help and encouragement they could. Several meetings were held in this place, which were affecting, and calculated to awaken sympathy, and while they were here, they were for the most part kept and cared for by the citizens, arms were procured for them from various quarters. Occasionally there were as many as 150 refugees here at a time, tho' ordinarily the number was smaller. There was, however, no formal organization amongst them while here, so far as I have been able to learn.

THE AFFRAY AT MOORE'S CORNER.

There was thus a large number of Canadian refugees at Swanton Falls. Some had come from sheer fear, and to escape danger, others were truly devoted to the cause, which they had espoused, and had made this their present abode, as a convenient rallying place. Those belonging to the latter class were anxious to make an early descent into Canada. Mr. Papineau arrived in Swanton, Nov. 29, and formed the contemplated movement. But the number of patriots here, who were ready for such an undertaking, was too small. Accordingly on the 30th of November, Col. Julius Gagnou, who had been stopping for some time in this place, was sent with two others to the county of La Cadie, in Canada, for recruits, to assist such in the States as should be disposed to make an entry into the British province. Col. Gagnou, having fulfilled his mission, returned to Swanton Dec. 5, with [84 men] such men as he hastily collected in the county of La Cadie, and these were added to the patriots already assembled. E. Malhoit, Esq., having been previously appointed by the patriots to take command of this expedition, three officers were chosen to act under him, these were R. S. M. Bouchette, Esq., Julius Gagnou, Esq. and Mr. Jacot Bouchard, of St. Marguerite-de-Blairfindie. Having received arms at Swanton, and being prepared to move, they were found to number about 200.

It has been said that there was really no organization of them while in Swanton. This perhaps is not strictly true, though the organization was very superficial.

They had, according to Dr. Cote, 112 guns, many of which were unfit for use, 6000 cartridges, 2 small kegs of grape shot, 3 kegs of cannon powder made into cartridges, 14 iron pikes with wooden handles, 1 3-pounder in bad order, and a 4-pounder not quite so bad; the whole accompanied by 2 beautiful flags, which had been worked by the patriotic and generous-hearted young ladies of S—, and on which were inscribed the Canadian emblems, in the handsomest and most beautiful manner. This force left Swanton Falls about 2 o'clock on the afternoon of Dec. 6, with the intention of remaining on the Vermont side of the line until the next morning.

It was well known on the other side of the line that an inroad into the Province was contemplated by Canadian refugees in the States. The loyalists of the counties of Stanstead, Shefford, Missisquoi, had accordingly mustered what force they could, and were in expectation of arms from Montreal. These had been sent to Isle aux Noix, and thence to Philipsburgh. Capt. Kemp, a loyalist of Freleighsburgh, was at the head of some volunteers in wagons on the morning of the very day the Canadians collected by Col. Gagnou crossed the line in going to Swanton. By the exercise of a little care and adroitness, the patriots had been able to avoid the notice of the volunteers under Capt. Kemp. On reaching the Bay, however, he soon learned through British emissaries from Swanton, in regard to the whole matter—the strength of the patriot force, and the amount of their equipments, and that they were intending on the afternoon of the same day, Dec. 6, to pass back into Canada, reinforced by patriots at Swanton. Accordingly, rallying all the volunteers he could, who were then gathering in and about the Bay, and equipping them with the arms which had just arrived, having been sent on from Isle aux Noix with all dispatch, he had a force of about 600 men. With these he decided to lay an ambuscade for the patriot force, as they made the attempt to cross the line into Canada. When the patriots arrived at Saxe's Mills, in the north part of Highgate, and about 3 miles from Missisquoi Bay, they learned for the first time that there was a large number of tory volunteers at the Bay, well armed and prepared to meet them; they were then at some loss what course to take. Upon this, one of the patriots informed the commander that he knew of a road by which they could enter Canada and avoid the British. After some deliberation, the officers concluded to take this road, and enter the Province that night. Orders were accordingly given to march by the road indicated, which leads across the line to Moore's Corner, and so on north. The tories having learned through their spies the course taken by the patriots, left a small force at the Bay, and proceeded at once with the main body to Moore's Corner, posting themselves on a high ledge to the N. W. of the Corner, where they would be well protected themselves, and at the same time have a fair view and complete range of the refugees as they passed.

The radicals, having no suspicion of an ambuscade, or of any other hindrance at that time of night, marched on in a careless manner until they reached the Corner, when they were suddenly saluted by a discharge of muskets from the ledge of rocks, on and behind which the British volunteers were posted. Taken thus by surprise, the commander labored at great disadvantage; his men being divided into 3 divisions and not well disciplined, in the darkness could not be readily formed into a regular line.

Mr. Bouchette, having harangued the troops, was stationed with those under his direction near Mr. Moore's house, and a well-directed fire was begun upon the assailants. He was himself soon entirely disabled by a ball which struck him in the ankle. His division, however, kept up the fire after he fell. Col. Gagnou, as he came up, took a firm stand with his men as directed, and returned the fire of the tories. After receiving two severe wounds he was carried from the field of action. The captain who had charge of the artillery, it is said, missing from the very beginning of the engagement. Because of his absence, there was great embarrassment in that department to which he belonged. This occasioned much confusion, and an almost entire failure of aid to the other divisions from the artillery. Col. Malhoit was wounded in the early part of the engagement. Observing that a baggage wagon was so much in advance that it would be likely to be lost in case of a retreat, he went forward to order it into the rear. When in this exposed situation a ball struck him in the leg. [One of the horses attached to this wagon being soon after shot, the contents finally fell into the hands of the tories.] The firing was kept up incessantly for 15 or 20 minutes. Col. Malhoit soon finding the assailants had greatly the advantage in position, that many of his men had disappeared, that only a few stood firm at their posts, and being himself wholly unacquainted with the ground in that neighborhood, concluded that it would be utterly useless for him to prolong the engagement under such circumstances. He accordingly ordered a retreat, upon which the patriots made their way as best they could for the line. Joseph Duquette was one of the last to leave the ground, displaying a coolness and bravery admired by all who witnessed his demeanor. Three prisoners fell into the hands of the British, also a few guns, about 2,000 cartridges, 2 barrels of cannon powder, 14 iron pikes, 2 cannon and the patriot colors. Among the prisoners was Mr. Bouchette. He was left on the field, not being missed by his companions until it was too late to remove him. Being soon after discovered by the loyalists, he was taken a prisoner, conducted to Missisquoi bay, thence on the morrow to Isle aux Noix, where he was confined for a while. While here it is said that he suffered much, though his sufferings were much alleviated by the kind treatment which he received from Mr. John Johnson, the son of an officer, who sent him food and wines from his own table. Being unable to walk, he was taken to St. Johns in a carriage, and thence removed to the city jail in Montreal.

A young man, by the name of Herbert

Pattenaude, of the first Grand Ligne, in the county of L'Acadie, was the only one killed on the patriot side. Whether the tories met with any loss of life is not with any certainty known.

Cols. Malhoit and Gagnou, though in a measure disabled, proceeded after this disaster, with most of the other patriots, thence to Swanton, where they were kindly received and entertained. There was one, however, who was not so fortunate: Andre Hebert, from that part of Riche-lieu which lies between St. Johns and Pointe-a-la-nule. While fighting bravely in the battle of the 6th, he was wounded by a musket ball in the knee joint. Thus disabled, he crept to a small brook in the vicinity, and secreted himself beneath the bridge which spanned it. Weakened by loss of blood, he was soon rendered senseless. The next morning, on recovering his senses, he found that the water, which had risen during the night, was completely overflowing him, except his face. After very great difficulty he succeeded in extricating himself from this part of his perilous position. Having, however, more fear of falling into the hands of the tories than of death, his situation was still very trying. He at last succeeded in crawling through an immense thicket of thorn bushes, when he discovered some houses near by, but dared not approach them or make himself known, lest he should fall into unmerciful hands. He accordingly passed a second December night without food, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather. Another day having come, the pain from his wound, his weakness from loss of blood, and his long want of food, were more than he could well bear without an effort to obtain relief. Having, accordingly, made his way with difficulty to the nearest dwelling, he was refused admittance, and cruelly repulsed by a woman, who seemed to be the mistress. Constrained to seek relief, he continued his painful course to the next house, where he was received by the inmates with kindness. Being put to bed, his wound was dressed, and warm drinks administered, and such care bestowed as at length began to restore the circulation of his blood, which had almost ceased to circulate. A messenger was speedily sent to his friends at Swanton, who forthwith despatched a vehicle, by which he was conveyed to the Falls, and restored to the main body of his refugee countrymen. After much nursing and kind attention, he finally recovered his health to a great extent, though he was doomed to remain a cripple for the rest of his days.

Though the patriots met with some discouragements, they were on the other hand cheered by many expressions of public sympathy. In various parts of the country meetings were held, at which resolutions were adopted condemning the government of Canada, the outrages committed, as well as the efforts made by the U. S. government and citizens to preserve order, and holding out encouragement to the patriots to persevere in their undertakings. Expressions of this kind were made in Montpelier, Burlington, Vergennes, Middlebury, Essex, Cambridge, Johnson, St. Albans, Swanton and other places. Of these meetings and those in this neighborhood, a few only can be noticed, and them briefly. The meeting at Johnson was held Jan. 4, 1838. At this meeting, of which Hon. David P. Noyes was president, several enthusiastic speeches were made, and a long series of resolutions were drafted and adopted, as expressions of the citizens, and calculated to encourage the Canadians. January 5, an adjourned public meeting was held in St. Albans, to take into consideration the state of things on the frontier, and to petition Congress for the repeal of the neutrality act. Of this meeting, Jephtha Bradley was chosen president, G. W. Brown and I. B. Bowditch secretaries. Resolutions were adopted and a memorial to Congress. This memorial was signed by many prominent citizens, whose names are before me as I write. Here, perhaps, it should be added that Gen. Scott, having arrived in town during the sessions of the meeting, was waited upon by a committee and invited to speak. In accepting the invitation, he referred to the public sentiment as honorable, where rightly directed, but as in danger of over-riding all constitutional restraints, and went on to vindicate the policy of the government. His remarks, however, met with little favor.

In the latter part of the same day, a meeting was also held in Swanton, being called to order by Bradford Scott. Hon. Jas. Fisk was chosen president, and H. K. Hopkins, Esq. and T. B. Cilley, M. D., were appointed secretaries. A long list of resolutions were adopted, and spirited speeches were made by G. W. Foster, N. L. Whittemore and Judge Fisk. It was also voted that a subscription paper be circulated for the purpose of procuring arms. [Another meeting on the 12th.] Such was the expression of public sentiment. While a calm and orderly course was followed and recommended by some, a large majority were in an excited state. Under these circumstances, it is no wonder that the work went on.

Shortly after this time, (Dec. 12, 1837,) a memorial was drawn up, and signed by 23 individuals in Burlington, and addressed to Gov. Jennison. This paper set forth regret at the course taken by many, in favoring the cause of the Canadian patriots, and called upon the Governor to use such means as will be most efficient, in keeping our citizens from taking part in the rebellion, and thus in maintaining the neutrality law inviolate. The next day, Dec. 13, 1837, his excellency, S. H. Jennison, governor of Vermont, issued a proclamation for the preservation of order on the northern borders. Referring to the fact, that we are at peace with Great Britain, to the representation that in a few instances arms had been furnished and hostile forces organized within the State, and to the breach of neutrality, implied in such a course, he cautions his fellow citizens "against all acts that may subject them to penalties, or in any way compromise the government." Not far from the same time, though probably a little later in the month, a call was extended to the patriots, to meet at Middlebury on the 31st of December. The purpose of this meeting was a free deliberation amongst the refugees, and the devising of plans in respect to their future course. A large number responded to the call. Mr. Papineau, who had then been residing for some time in Albany, was also present. It was finally decided that they should again take the field, under the guidance of experienced officers. The Canadians maintained, (with how much truth I know not) that sympathy had been extended and encouragement given to them by able men in the United States, and even officers belonging the army. With these inducements before them, they were emboldened, it is said, to adopt such policy as they did at this meeting, and with a very flattering prospect, as they thought, of ultimate success. When, however, Mr. Papineau returned to Albany, he learned that most of the aid, on which the patriots had relied from the States, would fail to be secured. It became evident that the general government was determined to enforce the neutrality laws, and so far as possible to dissuade all citizens from active sympathy with the radicals. Generals Scott, Wool, and Brady, were ordered by the President to repair to the frontier, for the prevention of all violation of law and order, and the due preservation of peace. Gen. Wool was especially instructed to act under the direction of Gov. Jennison, and in concert with him, in maintaining quiet in this vicinity. Because of this failure of sympathy and help from those in authority, the zeal of many patriots waxed cold. Under these circumstances, and from this cause, or from some other, Mr. Papineau, from this time forth, took no active part with his countrymen.

The work went on according to the plans adopted at the meeting in Middlebury. On the failure of Mr. Papineau to act, Dr. Robert Nelson, who was then stopping in St. Albans and Swanton, was earnestly solicited to take upon himself the management of the affair, and at length consented to do so. Under his direction preparations were begun and vigorously carried forward, and speedily matured. After some preliminary arrangements had been entered into with Mr. Mackenzie, of the Upper Province, Dr. Nelson decided that an entry should be soon made into Lower Canada on the part of the refugees. This was to take place on the 28th of February, and without any organization of themselves in the limit of the United States. With this plan in view, the patriots who were in the State of New York, and who had remained entirely unorganized, were directed to repair to Vermont in the expectation that Missisquoi bay, or Caldwell's manor, would be the rallying point where all might meet, organize, and once more raise the standard of liberty. Such was the policy of the patriots at this time. Under the guidance of Dr. Nelson, everything seemed to go on well. The refugees were assembling from all quarters, and preparations were made for their proper equipment. Assistance was obtained from various sources, and many assurances of help held out, which continued to inspire the radicals with confidence. Meanwhile there was no lack of vigilance on the part of those appointed to secure quiet on the borders. In the month of February, 1838, under the direction of Gen. Wool, a company of volunteers was raised in Swanton. This step, undertaken on the part of the government, was for the preservation of the neutrality of the citizens, for the maintenance of good order, and professedly for the security and welfare of all concerned. At the same time, however, it was tacitly understood by most of the volunteers that they were to do nothing to hinder or imperil the cause of the refugees; that while they were enrolled as United States troops, it was, at most, a formal compliance with the direction of the president. Then there was a force raised for the suppression of all outbursts which might be made in behalf of the radicals, while yet the sympathy of a large majority of the citizens of this place and of adjoining towns was doubtless with the patriots. Almost all were disposed to aid them so far as they could in whatever was regarded as their laudable efforts to redress what wrongs they were suffering, and to gain their independence of the British power.

Gen. Wool, however, and the Governor of Vermont, whatever may have been the sympathies of the people at large, were intent on the enforcement of the neutrality law. A sharp lookout was consequently maintained, and an effort made to intercept arms intended for the refugees, and to frustrate their plans so far as they were inconsistent with the strictest neutrality. Gen. Wool accordingly sent direct Lieut. Scott, of this place, with a number of men, to Troy, Vt., while he ordered Capt. Platt to repair with the remains of the force to Alburgh [as Mr. Perry has not got the facts in this place exactly as they were, I would correct them by saying that Lieut. Scott was sent with men to North Troy some 2 weeks previous to Capt. Platt being ordered to Alburgh. The writer, also, who was 2d lieutenant, was sent with a squad of men to Highgate Falls a day or two previous, to intercept any military stores which might be on their way to the radical camp. Both detachments were recalled, and joined the company of Capt. Platt at Swanton previous to its being ordered to Alburgh. The company remained at Alburgh city, as it is called, that night, and the next day was ordered to the line, where they received the Canadian patriots, as they were then called, when they gave themselves up to the United States authorities—G. BARNEY], that they might more closely observe the movements of the patriots and seize ammunition and arms, as well as prevent every unlawful gathering this side of the line. Most of the military stores of the radicals were seized, or at least failed to reach their place of destination. The men also were captured or turned back from their undertaking. Col. Chas. G. Bryant, while on his way from Maine to Canada, was arrested at Chazy Landing, N. Y., and the arms which he was carrying to the patriots were taken from him. He, however, made his escape, and at last found his way to the camp of the patriots in the Province, and so it was with a large part of them who attempted to reach Caldwell's manor. It accordingly resulted that only about 100 men succeeded in eluding the U. S. force and crossing the line. On the last of February the greatest part of their military stores at that time or previously had been intercepted by the U. S. authorities. No sooner had the few who had avoided seizure established themselves at Caldwell's manor, than Gen. Wool so arranged the guards along the line as to cut off all communication between the camps of the radicals and the U. S. territory. This rendered their situation anything but pleasant. They were separated from their sympathizers south of the line. The ammunition and guns on which they relied had been for the most part seized. Their friends in the States could not come to their relief. It was at the same time impossible for them to turn back without a surrendering of themselves and of their cause.

Their position, however, was more unfavorable on the Canada side. On consenting to take the lead of the patriots, Dr. Nelson issued two proclamations. In the first he set forth the cause of their dissatisfaction with the English government, and the great aim they had in view in their declaration of independence. In the manifesto he appealed to the Canadians to take up arms in favor of the government, which it was proposed to establish. Many listened gladly to these proclamations, and repaired to the appointed place of meeting. When, however, they came in and failed to find their expected generals in camp, they were disappointed, learning that most of the munitions of war expected from the States had been seized, and that their comrades had turned back, they were filled with chagrin, and on looking about and seeing the unpropitious situation of their affairs, they lost heart, and returned to their homes.

But their condition became still more perilous in view of the provincial government army, which was coming even then. On the 1st of March, the day after they had taken their stand at Caldwell's manor, the troops under the English commander made their appearance. This was a strong force, well armed and equipped, and many times their superiors in numbers. Thus situated, only a handful of men with few arms, and scantily provisioned, without other necessaries, with the U. S. force in their rear, the trained soldiers of the British in their front, they were truly in a hazardous state. As if to dampen their last hope and drive them to desperation, bad news was at that moment brought into camp from the most reliable intelligence, that the effort of Mackenzie opposite Kingston had proved a failure.

Under these circumstances, only one course not utterly ruinous, seemed to be left; they could surrender to Gen. Wool. He had before informed them that if they engaged with the British and retreated into Vermont, he should deem it his duty to fire upon them. Accordingly consulting prudence, which is often the better part of valor, they decided to recross the line, lay down their arms, and give themselves up to the authorities of the U. S. government, which were in readiness to receive them. This they did on the afternoon of the same day, with no little chagrin and grief, that the cause in which most of them had embarked, no doubt sincerely, though with misguided zeal, should thus come to naught. By order of Gen. Wool, Drs. Nelson and Cote were put under military arrest. Having been taken to St. Albans, they were bailed to appear at Windsor, Vt., and answer to the charge of breach of neutrality. Accordingly, on the 21st of the ensuing May, at the next session of the court, they made their appearance, and after a patient investigation of the case, they were both honorably discharged. Such was the termination of the first rebellion in Canada—a struggle which brought suffering and sorrow and woe on thousands, which hurried not a few to an untimely end, and failed to bring relief to the many, for whose sakes wisely or imprudently they had been willing to peril their lives and their all.

THE SECOND REBELLION IN CANADA.

The Canadians being much dissatisfied with Lord John Russell's coercion measures of March, 1837, to which the Parliament of Great Britain at that time assented, and proving restive under them, the ministers in the month of February, 1838, passed a bill to respect the constitution of Lower Canada, and govern that province by a governor and special council. Sir John Colborne, not having succeeded in his efforts to carry out the coercion measures satisfactorily, was removed from the head of Provincial administration, and March 31 of the same year, Lord Durham was appointed Gov. General and High Commissioner of British North America.

Lord Durham having arrived at Quebec on May 28, there was hope that he would be disposed to release all those confined in prison. He having got 8 to make a petition to himself, in which were some concessions made with a view to the liberation of all the prisoners, he took advantage of those concessions, and by his special council ordered those who had made them to be transported to Bermuda without a trial by their peers, as the magna charta guarantees. These were Wolfred Nelson, Robt. S. M. Bouchette, T. H. Goddec, Simeon Narchesseault, Bonaventure Viger, Henri Alphonse, Garvin Luc H. Masson, Rodolph Des Riviers. Sixteen others were banished to the United States without trial or examination. These were L. J. Papineau, speaker of the assembly, R. Nelson, M. P. P., E. E. Rodier, M. P. P., E. B. O'Callaghan, M. P. P., L. Duvernay, M. P. P., C. H. O. Cote, M. P. P., J. Gagnou, T. S. Brown, E. Chartier, priest, G. Cartier, lawyer, L. Perreault, proprietor of the Vindicator, J. Ryan, Sen., P. P. Demaray, N. P., Dr. J. F. Davignon, and S. Gauthier. Both the latter and the Bermuda exiles were informed that death awaited them should they return to the Province. He then proclaimed a general amnesty, excluding from the benefits of it 10 political prisoners.

That Lord Durham's course was open to exception is evident from the fact that when his edicts were published in England, being brought before the House of Lords by Lord Brougham, and likewise before the House of Commons, were censured, and a bill of indemnity was at once passed by both houses of Parliament, and sanctioned by them. Filled with chagrin at this, he abandoned his post as governor early in Nov., 1838, and retired to England, where he soon after died.

J. B. P.

Mr. Perry, doubtless, when he commenced the history of the 2d Rebellion, intended to give it in full as he has the first, but for some reason seems to have went no further, at least no continuous history is to be found among his papers. I have therefore given a brief sketch of the leading events so far as regards Swanton, from the time when Mr. Perry left it.

G. B.

Notwithstanding the reverses suffered by the radicals, as they were called, measures were taken to prosecute their cause, and early in the summer of 1838 rumors were afloat that another effort was about to be made to retrieve their falling fortunes. We shall not attempt to give a history of what is termed the second Canadian rebellion, but simply speak of it so far as Swanton was affected. Our government soon became informed of the designs of the patriots, and Lieut. Freeman was ordered here in the summer of '38 with a detachment of regular U. S. soldiers, after which another detachment of regulars were sent by Gov. Jennison under the command of Capt. Porter. They staid until winter, being quartered in the old Keyes store, now, 1875, occupied by Blake & Lawrence. Leaving here sometime in December, they went to Alburgh, where they remained during the winter. Capt. Porter returned here in 1839, and was here in all about one year.

The people of Swanton, though friendly to the patriot cause, did not become so much excited in their favor as they had been during the previous year. The U. S. troops being stationed here may have had something to do with this, but it is more likely that most of the people had lost faith in their cause. The rising took place at Napierville about Nov. 3, 1838; there was also a battle fought at Oldtown Nov. 9, the radicals being defeated at all points, and many prisoners taken by the British troops, some of which were hanged, and many others transported to the penal colonies of the home government.

The troubles along the frontier, however, did not cease. Many buildings were burned (it was supposed by loyalists) along the line in Alburgh and Highgate during the spring of 1839. Finding that affairs were assuming a threatening aspect, Brigadier-Gen. Nason promptly repaired to the frontier and called out the militia to guard against this vandal incendiarism. Capt. Hogle of the militia company of the west part of the town, and Capt. Rounds of the east part, were both ordered with their commands to the line, or near there. They at once responded to the call.

The people finally settled down to their accustomed pursuits, and many doubtless regretted that they had expressed so much sympathy for a cause which turned out so disastrously.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES AND ORGANIZATIONS.

The earliest religious services within the borders of this town was undoubtedly performed by the French Jesuits, and of the Indians with whom they were established.

At the later settlement of the town, the first instance of religious service, beyond that of family worship, of which we have evidence, took place without doubt at or about the time of the organization of the Baptist church in the east part of the town in 1796. The next was on the West road, in 1798. This meeting was held in a barn belonging to Levi Hathaway, on the place occupied in after years by C. H. Bullard as a wagon-shop, it being on the West road, so called, a few rods south of the brick house built by Daniel Bullard, Sr., now occupied by Mr. Dorman. The following are reported to have taken part in the exercises, viz: Levi Hathaway, Thomas Best, Father Austin, and Amasa Howe. [John Pratt is our authority, he being then 14 years old.] Of the above named, Thomas Best was a Methodist, then living in Highgate; the others seem to have been Congregationalists, as they with others were organized into a Congregational church not long after, Jan. 1801.

There was for years here, as in other towns, a question as to whom the land for the first settled minister, the propagation right, &c., properly belonged. The following, among many other references to it, are found on the town records. In the warning for a meeting held Sept. 7, 1802, "To see if the town will agree to divide the minister's right of land between the two societies, to wit: the standing order and the Baptist," it is to be observed, that this was a year or more after the organization of the Congregational church, and about 6 years after the establishment of the Baptist society. It appears there was no action taken on this article.

In 1805, we find this article, "To see if the town will agree to divide the ministerial right of land with the Baptist society." This was dismissed.

In 1824, it was "Voted that the selectmen be a committee to make an arrangement with the agent of the Episcopalian society respecting the lands in Swanton, called propagation rights."

Again, also, in Jan., 1825, a town meeting was called, at the request of Stephen S. Brown, Jas. Brown, Cornelius Wood, and Elisha Barney, "To see if the town will make any, and, if any, what, disposition of the ministerial right of land in said town."

The matter was finally settled by dividing the property equally between the Congregationalist, Baptist, and Methodist societies this very year.

It is somewhat interesting to trace the effect of early influences in the formation of society and especially in giving its religious coloring. The eastern part of the town was settled at an early day by people of Baptist proclivities, so when they began to feel the need of a religious teacher, they very naturally called a Baptist; the effect has been to make more Baptists in this than other parts of the town.

So those inclined to Congregationalism settled on the middle and west roads to a considerable extent, and their descendants mostly follow in the footsteps of their predecessors, or at least, incline that way.

Those west of the Falls seem to have had little or no religious bias, and the influence of Methodist efforts being first brought to bear on them, have made this part of the town more prolific of adherents to their peculiar doctrines and usages than in other sections. While at the Falls, where all sorts are mixed, there may not be traced the distinction as closely as in other parts.

There is, probably, as much of a disposition as ever before to adhere to denominational lines; but I think I am fully warranted in saying, that with one or two exceptions, there was never before, among the leading religious denominations in this section, so little of bigotry and intolerance as at the present time; each in the spirit of harmony and brotherly love seems intent on carrying forward the good work of making the world better in their own peculiar way, content, if others, not their immediate followers, are but casting out devils, to bid them God speed.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH IN SWANTON.
BY REV. E. J. RANSLOW, PASTOR.
1801 TO 1874.

This church was organized Sunday, Jan. 4, 1801. The following persons united at that time:

Levi Hathaway, Esther Hathaway, John Austin, Esther Austin, Ephraim Owen, May Owen, Jonathan Brooks, Hannah Brooks, Asa Abell, Amasa Howe.

Amasa Howe was chosen church clerk. In the following April the church directed a committee to write to Rev. David Huntington, but it seems that nothing came of it, as we have no record that he even preached to the people a single Sabbath. For the first 16 years of this church's history there does not seem to have been made a very vigorous effort for the support of a settled pastor. That old pioneer, Rev. Father Wooster of Fairfield, came often, and not only stirred up the gifts of the church, but also presided at their business meetings. Besides him, we find that small sums were paid at different times to Rev. Calvin Ingalls, Rev. Alvin Sanderson and Rev. Mr. Marshall. It is evident, however, that a calm, decided man was sadly needed during these 16 years for the pilotage of this little Christian band. Never has the church made so much history in so short a time. In their zeal to promote orthodoxy, the members spent days and weeks in the trial of those who were supposed to be guilty of some breach of covenant. We may well conclude, from the nature of the evidence in more than one case, individuals paid off private wrongs through the tribunal of the church. At all events it was a most stormy period, and could not have been very productive in Christian charity. During this early period also there was no building for religious purposes in the town. Services were held irregularly at school houses, and business meetings frequently at the private residences of members.

In 1816-'17 the old church edifice was erected at the Center, and in 1822-'23 the brick church at the Falls. We have now come to the first period in which the church made earnest effort to obtain a continual Sabbath service. March, 1817, a committee was appointed to confer with the Congregational church of Highgate to see if they would agree to call Rev. Benjamin Wooster, of Fairfield, to become pastor of the two societies. This effort failed, and Mr. Wooster remained in Fairfield. In July, 1819, a committee waited on Rev. Phineas Kingsley, who had preached in Swanton a few weeks, and he was engaged to supply the church one-half the time, at an annual salary of $225. The remainder of his time was spent in Highgate. Mr. Kingsley was thus employed till near the end of 1823.

The church was then without a pastor till the last part of the year 1824, when a call was extended to Rev. Eben. H. Dorman, then preaching at Georgia. He accepted, and was installed its first settled pastor Jan. 13, 1825. At this time the brick church at the Falls was finished, and was owned jointly by Quakers, Congregationalists, Methodists and Episcopalians. The house at the Center was the property of Baptists and Congregationalists. Both, however, in time became the sole property of the Congregational church.

In 1844 a petition was presented asking for the dismissal of members and the formation of a second church at Swanton Falls. A committee reported against this, and the matter was not pressed. Rev. Mr. Dorman continued pastor till Dec. 11, 1855, when he was dismissed with the title of senior pastor. On the same day Rev. J. B. Perry was installed as active pastor of the church. He was dismissed Dec. 5, 1865. Rev. A. T. Deming was installed Oct. 9, 1866, and dismissed Oct. 21, 1868. In June, 1869, Rev. E. J. Ranslow, the present acting pastor (Oct. 1874), began his labors with this people.

The deacons of this church and the time of their consecration are as follows:

Amasa Howe, Jan., 1802; Levi Hathaway, elected Jan. 7, 1809, but never ordained.

Elias Olds, Amos Skeeles, Benjamin Fay, Dec. 27, 1815.

Alonzo Green, Chas. Smith, Nov. 6, '42.

Roswell Mears, May 10, 1846.

Hervey Stone, Wm. Hickok, Jan. 6, '55.

Harlan P. Bullard, March 6, 1864.

Geo. G. Blake, Jan. 7, 1866.

Elliott Frink, Jan. 5, 1868.

C. F. Lawrence, Feb. 28, 1874.

The whole number of names on the church record is not far from 450. This church has enjoyed very few marked revivals. The largest number uniting in one year was in 1831, under Rev. Mr. Dorman, when 38 were received. Only in two other years has there been a number added nearly as large as this; but on the other hand, so far as we can learn, no year has passed without some additions. The present membership is 142. The services which formerly were divided between the Center and the Falls are now held exclusively at the Falls.

Since 1869 a parsonage has been built at an expense of $3000, and the old brick church rebuilt at a cost of nearly $12,000. There is at present harmonious feeling in the church and a spirit of kindness toward other denominations. With the material prosperity which is enjoyed and the strength of members given by the blessing of God, there is no apparent reason why this church should not be a power for good.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, 1874-1882.

BY REV. J. H. BABBITT.

During the winter of 1874-'5 there was a revival, which resulted in an addition to the church roll of 36 members on profession of faith.

Mr. Ranslow closed his labor here in Oct. 1875. He was immediately succeeded in November by Rev. John Rogers, who died, after a brief illness, Feb. 20, 1876. Mr. Rogers, in his short stay, greatly endeared himself to the people.

The church was supplied a few months of 1876 by Mr. N. T. Dyer.

Rev. J. H. Babbitt, the present acting pastor, commenced service for the church Jan. 1, 1877. Repairs were made on the parsonage and church building during the summer following, at an expense of about $450. Early in 1879 the first bell was procured for the church, weighing 1,000 pounds. Each of these later years has witnessed some material improvement to the church property and a good degree of benevolent work. The present membership of the church, as recorded, is 174. H. F. Martin was made deacon Feb. 27, 1875; Francis Smith, Mar. 3, 1877; C. C. Long, Dec. 31, 1881.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF REV. C. H. DORMAN.

BY THE REV. J. B. PERRY.

I copy this as I find it among the papers that came into my hands as written out. G. B.

The Rev. Eben Hills Dorman was born in Charlotte, Aug. 23, 1790. When about 16 years of age, he became hopefully interested in the subject of religion, under the ministrations of the Rev. Mr. Baldwin, and made a public profession of religion, uniting with the Congregational church in his native town. Desiring to become an ambassador of Christ, he soon after commenced study, with the ministry of reconciliation in view. In this, he met with many discouragements. There was a lack of good schools in his neighborhood at the time, besides his means were limited. He met all these obstacles bravely, engaged at times in teaching, and resorting to other expedients to eke out his scanty resources. He continued thus to do, availing himself of the best schools within his reach, until it was thought advisable for him to enter upon the study of theology. About 1812, he put himself under the instruction of Rev. Holland Weeks, of Pittsford, in this State. After studying with him a while, he resorted to Rev. Lemuel Haynes of West Rutland, for further instruction. He also studied for a while, as I understood him to say, with Rev. John Dennison of Jericho.

Having thus gone through the then usual course of studies preparatory to the ministry, he received approbation to preach from the Rutland association, May 30, 1814, (not Sept. 1813). Soon after this, he went to Cambridge, where he continued until 1815. While he was laboring in Cambridge, he was invited to become the pastor of the Congregational churches in Fairfax and Georgia. Having accepted this call, he was duly ordained and installed pastor of the two churches, Nov. 15, 1815, the exercises being in Georgia, and Rev. Samuel Austin, D. D., at that time president of the University of Vermont, preaching the ordination sermon. Jan. 16, 1816, Mr. Dorman was joined in marriage to Mrs. Lucretia, widow of Rev. John Dennison of Jericho, and daughter of Hon. Amos Kellogg of Pittsford.

In both Fairfax and Georgia he enjoyed precious seasons of revival. At such times, as he once informed me, he was in the habit of visiting from house to house through a neighborhood during the day, giving out an appointment for prayer-meeting or preaching in the school-house in the evening.

The people in Georgia having become able to sustain preaching the whole time, desired his undivided labors. He having accordingly resigned his pastoral office in Fairfax, a council was called, and he was dismissed from that charge, Dec. 22, 1823. It is to be added that the people of Fairfax entertained a strong affection for Mr. Dorman until the last, and were reluctant to dispense with his labors.

From this time on for about a year his labors were wholly confined to Georgia. He finally, after many doubts, decided in his own mind that it was best that he should be relieved of his remaining charge. He accordingly applied for a council. This the majority of the church at first firmly opposed. Having, however, finally consented to his leaving, a council was convened and he was duly dismissed Nov. 15, 1824, just 9 years to a day from his settlement, though something more than 9 years since the commencement of his labors in Georgia. Late in the autumn or early in the winter of the same year, Mr. Dorman came to Swanton, where he had preached, as he informed me, for one or two Sabbaths in 1815 or '16. On the following January a call was extended to him here to become pastor. He was duly installed Feb. 9, 1825.

The church having a claim on two houses of worship in the town, Mr. Dorman labored in each alternately, until ill health compelled him to forego all ministerial duties. Take him all in all, he was a man of no ordinary ability. He was possessed of a good mind, of sound judgment, and of a warm Christian heart. As a preacher, he was plain and pungent; as a pastor, faithful and kind; as a counsellor reliable and judicious. Being very generally respected as a man and as a Christian, he exerted a decided and healthful influence, not only in his own parish but throughout the county.

Of him more particularly it is needless for me to speak, as his praise is in all the churches.

J. B. P.

[From a copy of resolutions adopted doubtless by his congregation, found by Mr. Barney among the papers left by Mr. Perry, we select the following:]

Resolved, That in the death of Mr. Dorman we are called to mourn the loss of a father, pastor and friend—of a revered Father in Israel, to whom we learned in childhood to look up to with affectionate confidence and respect—of a faithful pastor, who broke for us the bread of Life, joined us together in marriage, baptised our children, and buried our dead—of a devoted friend and instructor, by whose teaching we were led into the truth as it is in Jesus, from whose lips we received blessed words of consolation, and to whom under God we are largely indebted for our religious nurture:

Resolved, also, That we cordially tender our sympathy to the faithful companion who, having been the sharer of the sorrows and joys of his whole ministry, still survives; to the several members and different branches of the family bereft of its patriarchal head; as well as to the large circle of relatives and friends, now called to mourn his departure:

Resolved, moreover, That we proffer our sincere thanks to Rev. Dr. Parmelee for his instructive and interesting funeral discourse, commemorative of the labors, services and virtues of the deceased:

Resolved, finally, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mrs. Dorman and family, as a testimonial of our respect for departed worth; also a copy to the editors of the Vermont Chronicle and of the Franklin county papers for publication.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN SWANTON.

The Baptist church was organized in the east part of the town in 1796, and the Congregationalist on the Middle road, so called, in 1801. But we have no evidence to show that there had been any religious meetings at the Falls until the Rev. Reuben Harris, a Methodist minister, made an appointment to preach in the school-house on the west side of the river in 1806. From Elisha Rood, who was a Methodist at that time, or became one soon after, I learned many years ago, that R. Harris was the first Methodist minister that ever preached at Swanton Falls, and to ascertain the year, in the published minutes of the M. E. Church I find that R. Harris was the stationed preacher on Fletcher and Dunham circuit in 1806. That circuit then took in many of the frontier towns in Canada, and extended south, probably as far as Burlington. We see by the minutes, that in the years previous, and for years after, that Mr. Harris had no appointment to any circuit in this northern section. Hence we conclude that 1806 was the time of his making this appointment.

When it became known among the people that there was such an appointment, some were not disposed to hear him. Accordingly five persons who regarded themselves as respectable, being most of them heads of families, went to the place before the hour of service, with a bottle of rum and a pack of cards, and commenced playing, and were so engaged when Mr. Harris arrived. They affected great politeness, and invited him to take a seat at the table with them. At this juncture Mr. Levi Scott came in, and being incensed at the course of his neighbors, invited the minister to his house, where he preached his first sermon. After the service, Mr. Scott and others having invited him to continue his appointments, he did so, and no further opposition was made to his occupying the school-house. One of the five persons above mentioned became a few years after an influential member of the M. E. church, and continued such until his death some 40 years after. These facts I have from E. O. Goodrich, who became after this occurrence one of the members of the church on its organization.

From the time Mr. Harris ceased to preach at the Falls, there seems to have been no religious services for several years, until the Rev. Geo. Powers commenced holding meetings about 1815. He having been admitted to the New York Conference in 1805, and having filled several Conference appointments, became a local preacher, and settled on a small farm near St. Albans Point about the year 1808, and held meetings, as occasion seemed to demand, along the Maquam shore, and occasionally at Father Rood's, on the Missisquoi river.

He at length sold out on St. Albans Point and removed to Swanton, locating on a small farm on the Maquam road, about half mile south of the Falls, at present owned by T. B. Marvin. This was in 1812, after which he enlisted in the U. S. army, doing service there about 2 years. On returning home he commenced holding meetings at the school-house, on west side of the river, and a deep religious feeling was awakened in the neighborhood; and, although there had not as yet been any Methodist church organized in town, there were a number of persons that belonged to that church, as early as 1805 or '6, and were probably connected with the church at St. Albans Point, organized by Laban

Clark in 1801. Their names, so far as can be recollected, are Mr. & Mrs. Moses Hicks, Mr. & Mrs. Martin Manzer, Mr. & Mrs. John Dunbar, Mr. & Mrs. Elisha Rood. These facts I have obtained from Mr. Justus Powers, son of Geo. Powers above mentioned, who has been a member of the church from nearly the time of its organization, and is now one of the oldest members and is highly respected.

This was about the religious condition of things at the Falls when the Rev. Almon Dunbar, being the regular appointed circuit preacher on St. Albans circuit, commenced preaching here regularly, once in four weeks, perhaps oftener. The religious awakening became general, and resulted in the formation of a church here in the year 1816. The records being lost, or at least, not to be had, there has been some doubt as to the year in which this took place, and our reasons for fixing this as the date are as follows: all agree that Rev. Almon Dunbar organized the church. He was appointed to St. Albans charge, to which Swanton was attached, in 1815 and '16. Conference sitting in May, he could not well have got on to his circuit—being a four weeks one—and done much service at the Falls until late in the year, and doubtless before the church was formed; the time had run over to '1816, and we think it could not have been later than '16, as I find mention made among the papers left by my father, that in 1817 there was great religious declension, which would not have been a fitting time for the organization of a church. For these reasons, and the fact that the aged members used to fix it as early as 1816, we conclude this must be the date. It probably took place in the early months of the year, when the evenings were favorable for religious meetings.

The members composing the first class were, Elisha Barney, Ezekiel O. Goodrich and wife, Mrs. Dr. Charles Hall, and Miss Zelinda Jackson, who afterward became the wife of Benj. Meigs, Esq. Elisha Barney was appointed the leader, and continued such for many years, which I learn from his papers left in my hands. My mother, Mrs. Mehetable Barney, with many others, united with the church a short time after.

In the summer of 1819, J. B. Stratton being presiding elder, and Buel Goodsell and James Covell the circuit preachers, the first Methodist quarterly meeting in Swanton was held in a large building on the hill north of where the forge once stood, belonging to Elisha Barney, part of which was used as a wood-house, and the other part as a wagon and lumber house, and the upper floor was used as a granery. Before such a meeting was contemplated, about 15 cords of wood had been stored in the lower part of the building, all of which, after the meeting was determined upon, had to be removed. After this was accomplished, a part of the upper floor was removed, leaving the floor remaining on either side, which when seated answered as a gallery. A temporary pulpit was erected, which for the occasion answered well the purposes for a meeting of this kind.

The writer of this was then about 8 years old, and on him was imposed the task of removing the wood. Having some weeks in which to perform this work, and obtaining what help he could from neighboring boys, he had the work accomplished in time for the meeting. This was his first real work for the M. E. church, but by no means the last, and although the task then performed could hardly be said to be a labor of love, but rather compulsory, yet, although young, he was so much pleased with the meeting, and it made so pleasant and favorable impression on his mind, that to the present day he has not ceased to feel a warm interest in and desire for the prosperity of the M. E. church; and can at this time. (March, 1882) now some 62 years from that day, look with much satisfaction at the contrast between the condition of the church then and now.

The quarterly meetings in those days were deemed of considerable importance, and were looked forward to by the membership with much interest, and they came long distances to have a good time, and generally had it. At this meeting the building was filled to overflowing, and much good was apparently the result.

Not long after the organization of the church at the Falls there were meetings established at the school-house at Maquam, about 3 miles south of the Falls, and a class formed there, and for many years this was a strong and efficient society. The Free Will Baptists also held meetings at the same place, and had a large society. For many years there would be one or more services of the Baptists and one or more of the Methodists every Sabbath, both generally cordially uniting in their religious services. Time has, however, worked its changes. The generation then active have mostly passed away, with many of their children. Many have removed to other parts, and but few have come in to take their places. The small farms, one after another, have been absorbed into the larger ones, and that section of the town which once had a population sufficient to fill the large school-house there, can now hardly get enough together for a respectable meeting, and for many years past the meetings of both the Baptists and Methodists have been discontinued there, and the few who are disposed to give attention to religious matters come to the Falls to attend religious services.

On the south part of the Island, or West Swanton, there was also a class formed at an early day, about 1820 or before, and meetings were kept up there for years, and much good accomplished, but now that part of the Island is comparatively depopulated, and meetings have long since been abandoned. As the meetings were given up at the south end, they were commenced at the north part of the Island; and this has been a regular preaching place for many years, and a respectable society has been maintained there to the present day.

The Methodists at the Falls continued to hold regular meetings at the school-house for the most part until the completion of the old Brick meeting-house as it is called. This house was built by Elisha Barney, and the original design was, that it should be a pewed house, the pulpit-right to be owned equally by four denominations: Congregationalists, Methodist, Episcopalians and Quakers. The house seldom being wanted by the two latter, it was left for the use of the two former, and was used by each for years every alternate Sabbath. For many years the Methodist arrangement was for the preacher to preach and meet the class at Swanton in the forenoon, then go to Maquam and do the same there, and generally attend a third appointment at the Island, or at Father Rood's, on Missisquoi river, about 2 miles below the Falls. This state of things continued without marked change for years.

The people in the village and vicinity claimed to be Universalists in sentiment; had for several years considered themselves entitled to a share in the pulpit-right of the meeting-house; entertaining these views, they thought it no injustice to occupy it a portion of the time, and accordingly made an appointment for preaching by a minister of that persuasion on the same day and at the same time of the regular appointment for Methodist preaching. This was several years after the settlement of the controversy between the Universalists and Congregationalists with regard to the house. This coming to the knowledge of the Methodists, they held their services at the time at the old brick school-house, and continued to do so for some time, until at length, the subject of building a church for their exclusive use became agitated, and as the community generally seemed to favor the enterprise, it was undertaken, and a brick house of fair proportions, with a good bell, favorably located, was erected in 1847 and completed in 1848.

At the commencement of regular preaching in 1815, Swanton, with Highgate and other towns was a part of St. Albans circuit, and there was circuit preaching but once in four weeks. In a few years, however, two preachers were placed upon the circuit, when we had preaching every two weeks, alternately, by the two preachers. This arrangement continued until 1828, when the circuit was divided, and Swanton and Highgate became a circuit with one minister only. His family lived in Highgate, at the parsonage near the old yellow meeting-house—as it was called—some 3 or 4 miles north of the Falls. Here the membership from Swanton often met with those of Highgate at quarterly and other meetings; here they listened to the "preached word" from voices long since silent in death. The old meeting-house with the parsonage disappeared long ago. As the writer makes this record, a thousand pleasant memories are awakened and cluster around the once hallowed place where the purest pleasures earth afford have been enjoyed, where many have sought and found the pearl of great price, and commenced a new and pure life, and where ties have been formed that death cannot sever. With the house the generation that worshipped there have nearly all passed away, and those that have succeeded them have now a new and beautiful house of worship at the Falls with a comfortable parsonage. Highgate and Swanton continued as one charge until about the time of the completion of the church at Swanton Falls, when they became separate charges, Swanton becoming a station with a minister residing there, and preaching every Sabbath.

During the pastorate of Orin Gregg, in 1852, there was awakened a great religious interest, the influence of which is apparent to this day, and will never cease to be felt. Many who had been indifferent to religious subjects and some that opposed religion became devoted Christians, among them no less than four young men that afterwards became useful ministers of the gospel, and are now occupying important stations in the Methodist ministry. A few years later there was a religious revival at West Swanton, and among those whose hearts were renewed were two young men, who became devoted and efficient ministers.

The M. E. church in Swanton may be proud of the record she has made in furnishing young men to minister at her altars. Among them may be mentioned

Rev. JAMES R. GOODRICH, who was born about 1806, and become connected with the New York Conference in 1828, and was appointed that year to Pittsford circuit, Vt., as junior preacher, Salmon Stebbins being the preacher in charge. He continued to fill the appointments made him to various stations from year to year until, his health failing, he took a supernumerary relation, and desisted from preaching for about two years, when, on finding his health improved, he took a transfer in 1837 to the Illinois Conference, and was appointed missionary to the Indians at Green Bay and vicinity, visiting the tribes on the borders of Lake Superior. He afterward became presiding elder on Chicago district. His health partially failing, he to some extent desisted from preaching, and became a partner with his brother in the mercantile business in Dubuque, Iowa. Having acquired a competence, he retired from business, and is at this time [1882] living in feeble health in Dubuque.

Rev. STEPHEN D. BROWN, son of Hon. Stephen S. Brown, was born in Swanton about 1815. His school days were passed here until about the age of 15, when he with his father's family removed to St. Albans. A few years later he became a professed disciple of the Saviour. He studied the profession of law in his father's office, and for a few years engaged in its practice. Not being satisfied with his calling, and feeling impelled by a sense of duty, he desisted from the practice of the legal profession, and became a minister of the gospel. Becoming a member of the Troy Conference in 1837, he was that year appointed to Wilmington circuit, N. Y., and from that time to the present he has been in the itinerant ranks. He has held some of the most important appointments both in the Troy and New York Conferences. As a preacher and pastor he ranks among the first, and has ever been popular among the people. His record is so well known in all this region that it would perhaps be superfluous to extend this sketch further than to say that he is now the presiding elder of New York City district.

Since the foregoing was written, we learn with great sorrow that this good and useful man died in Yorkville, near New York City, Feb. 19, 1875.

Rev. HUBBARD C. FARRAR, son of H. B. Farrar, Esq., born in Swanton about 1836, became a professed Christian and united with the M. E. church in 1852, when about 17 years of age; not long after, believing himself divinely called to the work of the ministry, he at once took measures to qualify himself for this important work, and entered the Vermont University at Burlington, from which he was graduated with honor, and soon after became a member of the Troy Conference. He has since taken and successfully filled his appointments from year to year, some of which have been important—and is now, March, (1882.) about closing a 3 years' pastorate at Gloversville, N. Y., a village of some 7000 inhabitants, and as I see in the last No. of the Christian Advocate, he leaves the church there with an addition of 75 probationers and with general prosperity in all its departments. He is an energetic, hard-working, successful popular minister.

Rev. A. B. TRUAX was born in Swanton, Feb. 28, 1834; professed conversion in 1852; entered the traveling ministry 1858; has commanded good appointments and been an efficient worker in his Master's vineyard; is now in the prime of life, and now, 1882, stationed at Brattleboro.

Rev. W. C. ROBINSON, born at Russelltown, P. Q., June 24, 1831. He was teaching school in Swanton at the time the series of meetings were being held in 1852 by Rev. O. Gregg, when his mind was attracted to the subject of religion, and after long reflection and a severe struggle with himself, he fully decided to become a Christian, and connected himself with the M. E. church. He entered the traveling ministry in 1859 and has done good service thus far in the cause of his Master.

Rev. SYLVESTER DONALDSON was born in Alburgh, July 8, 1837, but Swanton has been his home from childhood. He made a profession of religion at an early age, and soon after felt himself called to the work of the ministry, and took measures to prepare himself for its responsible duties by attending the Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H. He entered the traveling ministry, uniting with the Vt. Conference in 1864. He is a working minister, intent on doing good, and has been acceptable to the people where he has been appointed to labor, and is a good preacher. Now, (1882) laboring at Essex.

Rev. CHURCH TABOR was born in South Hero, July 25, 1835. With his parents he came to Swanton when a child. When about 17 or 18 years of age he became pious, and from a sense of duty felt impelled to preach the Gospel. He therefore attended the Biblical Institute in Concord for the requisite length of time, and entered the ministry in 1863, and became connected with the Vt. Conference in 1866. His preaching talent is good, and his labors have been successful. He is now, (1882,) presiding elder in Montpelier district.

Rev. MILES R. BARNEY, son of H. W. Barney, Esq., and nephew of the writer, born in Swanton, Oct. 11th, 1836. He awoke to a new and spiritual life at a camp-meeting in Alburgh, September, 1856, from which time his purpose seemed to be, not merely to enjoy religion, but to spread it and induce his fellowmen to obtain it. He entered the Biblical Institute, and after remaining there the time required, he entered the ministry, joining the New England Conference, and received appointments in Massachusetts for several years, until the failing health of his father induced him to take a local relation, and return to Swanton. After the death of his father he was appointed to Highgate charge, and is now (1874) in his 3d year there, and at this time, we learn, doing efficient work in the vineyard there, (1882.) He has since taken a local relation, and is residing at Swanton Falls.

ASAHEL HONSINGER, son of Michael Honsinger, was converted about 1840, when but a youth living at his home on the Island. He was very zealous to promote the cause of religion, and soon felt divinely called to give himself to the ministry of the word. He took pains to educate himself, and commenced his work as a traveling preacher in the M. E. church, joining the Troy Conference. After laboring acceptably to the people of the various charges to which he was appointed, his health in a manner failed, and he became a local preacher, and has his residence now in the vicinity of Saratoga Springs.

Such is the record that Swanton shows of the men she has produced, who have been, and now are, laboring for the elevation of mankind.

During the year 1867, the Rev. H. F. Austin being appointed that year to this charge, the meeting house was much enlarged and otherwise improved.

In the spring of 1868 the Vermont Conference held its session here, the people of all denominations opening their doors to entertain the ministers. It was an occasion of rare interest to the people generally, and many doubtless were profited. The next spring there was more than usual attention given to the subject of religion. Meetings were kept up every evening for several weeks, and about 40 professed conversion, and many of them became members of the church.

METHODIST PREACHERS AT SWANTON.

The following are the ministers of the M. E. church that have been regularly appointed by the proper authorities to this charge and others connected with it, and have preached here at the times indicated by the figures after their names. The appointments are made generally in April or May, making the time of one Conference year a part of two calendar years:

Reuben Harris, 1806; Almon Dunbar, 1815-16; J. McDaniel, 1817; J. B. Stratton and Buel Goodsell, 1818; Buel Goodsell and James Covell, 1819; Nicholas White and Seymour Landon, 1820; Almon Dunbar and James Covell, 1821; Almon Dunbar and Cyrus Prindle, 1822; James Quinlan and Lucius Baldwin, 1823; John J. Matthias and Samuel Covell, 1824; Phineas Doan and Lorin Clark, 1825; Salmon Stebbins and Orin Pier, 1826-27; St. Albans circuit, divided in 1828, and Swanton and Highgate formed into one circuit; Samuel Weaver, 1828-29; Dillon Stephens, 1830-31; Jacob Leonard, 1832-33; William Richards, 1834; John Graves and James R. Goodrich, [supernumerary], 1835; Chester Chamberlin and J. R. Goodrich, [sup.]

1836; A. Lyon, 1837-39; O. E. Spicer, 1839-40; Alexander Dickson 1840, '42; John Seage, 1843-45; Charles Leonard, 1845-47; John D. White, 1848-49; Z. H. Brown, 1849-50; Orin Gregg, 1851, '53; William Miller, Horace Warner and A. Carroll, 1853-54; S. W. Clemens, 1854-55; S. S. Merrill, 1855-56; W. W. Bakewell, 1856-57; Manly Witherell, 1857, '59; V. M. Simons, 1859-60; John M. Weaver, 1860-61; V. M. Simons, May, 1861 to September, '61; G. A. Silverstein, Sept., '61, to May, '62; William R. Puffer, 1862-63; J. S. Mott, 1863, '65; B. F. Livingston, 1865, '67; H. F. Austin, 1867, '69; James Robinson, 1869-70; S. D. Elkins, 1870, '72; W. Underwood, 1872-73; J. D. Beeman, 1874-75; N. W. Wilder, 1875-76; W. H. Hyde, 1876-79; J. D. Beeman, 1879-82.

PRESIDING ELDERS APPOINTED TO THIS DISTRICT.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

BY MEMBERS OF THAT CHURCH.

When the subject of building a meeting-house at Swanton Falls was agitated in 1822, Mr. Samuel Hoffman having come with his family a year or two previously from New York, being a member of the Protestant Episcopal church, he claimed that this denomination should have a share in the house. The articles of agreement therefore under which the house was built provided that the pulpit-right should belong equally to four denominations, viz.: Congregationalist, Methodist, Episcopalian, and Quaker. After the completion of the house in 1824, the Episcopalians held services there occasionally for a few years, Bishop Hopkins coming from Burlington once or twice a year and preaching to the people. The writer well remembers his preaching a sermon about 1829, giving expression to very decided Armenian views, which gave offence to some persons holding the opposite or Calvinistic doctrines.

About the year 1828 or '9, Mr. Hoffman, who had been one of the most prominent members of this church, left the place for New York; after which, according to the recollection of the writer, services of this denomination were not often held, their right to the house passing (it was claimed) into the hands of the Congregationalists.

In the summer of 1867 the Rev. J. B. Pitman commenced holding services at Swanton and Highgate. The idea of establishing the services of the church permanently was not then entertained by the people; even some friendly to the church regarded the idea as Utopian, and when suggested met it with much indifference.

There were living at Swanton at that time the following confirmed members of the church: Hon. V. S. Ferris, Wm. L. Sowles (member of Methodist church) and his wife, Mrs. Dr. Saxton, Mrs. Dr. W. Bourdon, Mrs. H. M. Stone, and Colonel Kidder. Baptised members, viz.: Mrs. W. W. Keyes, Mrs. Agnes Hatch, Mrs. Dr. D. J. Morrill, Dr. G. M. Hall, Dr. O. Saxton, and the Hon. Henry A. Burt.

Nov. 1, 1867, at an informal meeting at the Bank, it was resolved to take immediate steps to organize a parish. The Sunday following, the Rev. Mr. Pitman gave notice that a meeting for organizing a parish would be held in the Academy hall on Monday evening. The meeting was held according to notice, and a parish organized under the name of "The Parish of the Holy Trinity," the name being adopted at the suggestion of Dr. G. M. Hall. The following gentlemen were elected wardens and vestrymen: Judge V. S. Ferris, senior warden; Hon. H. A. Burt, junior warden; Dr. G. M. Hall, Norman Laselle, Col. A. B. Jewett, Henry M. Stone, and Dr. D. J. Morrill, vestrymen. Thus "The Parish of the Holy Trinity" was duly organized, and entered on its work in due and regular form. According to appointment, Bishop Bissell visited Swanton July 4th. Sunday, July 5, morning service, sermon, and the holy communion was enjoyed. Services were again held at 4 o'clock, P. M., and a class of 21 adults was presented by the rector to the bishop and the church to receive the sacred rite of confirmation. The services were held all day in the Methodist house of worship, and a resolution of thanks was passed by the vestry, and presented to the M. E. church and their pastor, the Rev. H. F. Austin.

About the time of, or soon after, the organization of the parish, the church made purchase of a house and lot formerly belonging to Dea. A. S. Farrar, which is a few rods easterly of the Congregational meeting-house, and adjoining said meeting-house lot. This was purchased for a parsonage, and was occupied as such by the pastor, Mr. Pitman, during his pastorate. A further object had in view in this purchase was to secure the vacant space on the corner of said lot, opposite the residence of Judge Sowles, for a church lot, on which they could build a church when circumstances should favor the undertaking.

Mr. Pitman closed his pastorate here June 15, 1872, and went to Malone, N. Y., after which for a time lay services only were held, the Hon. V. S. Ferris officiating. The time was not long, however, before the services of Dr. Josiah Swett, of Fairfax, were secured. He commenced his labors as rector of the parish in July, 1872, holding services every alternate Sunday in the Academy hall, until the fall of 1876, when a chapel, capable of seating 150 persons, and costing about $2000, was erected on the church lot, and an organ which had been donated to the parish during the rectorship of Rev. J. B. Pitman, by the church of Woodstock, but for want of a place to set it had not been put in repair, was now repaired for $150, and placed in the new chapel. The parish now possessed a very convenient and pleasant place of worship and was free from debt. At this time the congregation was materially increased.

On the first Sunday after Easter, 1877, the Rev. Dr. Swett ended his pastorate of Holy Trinity church. From this time until July lay services were held.

In July Rev. Thomas W. Haskins, rector of St. Luke's church, St. Albans, commenced holding services every Sunday afternoon, continuing them until Oct. 1878, when he resigned.

Lay services were again held until Jan. 1st, 1879, when the Rev. J. I. Bliss, of Burlington, was engaged as rector. Alternate Sundays, both morning and evening, he preached, on other Sundays lay services being held. During the rectorship of Mr. Haskins and of Mr. Bliss, the attendance of public worship was considerably increased, the chapel generally being filled.

Soon after the close of the labors of Mr. Bliss in Nov. 1880, Rev. Thomas Burgess of St. Albans, was appointed rector of the parish. To the present time Mr. Burgess has continued in that capacity to hold services every Sunday afternoon. Although the church from its beginning has in numbers considerably increased, yet the death of many of the most able and prominent members has left her financially but little, if any stronger, than was her condition years ago.

CATHOLIC CHURCH IN SWANTON.

BY MRS. JULIA C. SMALLEY.

There were but few Catholic families in Swanton when Rev. J. O'Callaghan came to Burlington in 1830. In common with all the villages of Northern Vermont, Swanton received occasional visits from that devoted and untiring missionary. The Very Rev. Father Mignault from Chambly, Vicar General of the Diocese of Boston, came also from time to time to minister to the Canadians in all that region.

When Rev. G. A. Hamilton was placed at St. Albans, in 1847, the number of Catholics in Swanton had increased sufficiently to warrant an attempt to build a church for their use. Measures to that effect were immediately set on foot, and by the most self-sacrificing efforts and generous zeal on the part of the people, a comfortable brick edifice was erected on ground given by James McNalley for that purpose. Swanton was visited by the priest from St. Albans until the fall of 1854, when Rev. J. L. Lionnett was appointed its pastor, and remained in charge of the parish until he was succeeded by Rev. L. Cam, the present pastor, in 18—.

At the midnight mass of Christmas, in 1858, the church edifice, which had cost the people such severe efforts to build, took fire, and was soon in ruins. Some of the altar furniture and pictures were saved. Without delay, Father Cam began courageously his preparations for building a new church across the street from the site of the former one. He prosecuted the work with such diligent exertions and marvelous energy, in the face of appalling difficulties from limited means and the scanty help his congregation, large in numbers but extremely meagre as to resources, were able to render, that on the feast of All Saints, the first day of the following Nov., mass was offered within its walls for a people whose hearts were overflowing with gratitude to the Giver of all good for this great blessing, and for the faithful pastor His Providence had placed over them.

When the building was completed and the debt paid, it was solemnly dedicated for the worship of God, in honor of the blessed Virgin Mary.

As we write of those times and events, what a "cloud of witnesses" seem to surround us, whose familiar faces were never missing from the holy services of the sanctuary, and whose hands were ever ready to aid and contribute to all good works, as far as their means would allow, until we laid them to their final sleep within the sacred enclosure surrounding the church they loved so well. May they rest in peace!

They are many interesting circumstances connected with the church history of Swanton, which set a distinctive mark upon its record. Evidences are not wanting to prove that it was one of the earliest stations established within the borders of Vermont by the zealous missionary Fathers of the Jesuit and Recollet orders in Canada, for the conversion of the natives.

In the early part of this century, the St. Regis Indians still held a tradition of the first visit of a priest in the summer of 1613, to Swanton, and thence to all the scattered encampments along the eastern shores of the placid lake discovered four years earlier by Samuel Champlain, to which he gave his name.

It is pleasant to think of that humble chapel near the old "Indian corn field" on the east side of Missisquoi river in Swanton, and of the venerable "Black Gown" surrounded by the converted "children of larger growth"—first fruits of his labor—who had erected it, and who continued to occupy it for their worship until they discovered it was not within the original territory of "New France," when they removed the very stones of the walls so sacred to them beyond the limits of the English colonies—probably to Missisquoi Bay. As we call up these scenes in the wilderness, on the banks of the beautiful Missisquoi, and contemplate in fancy's mirror the devoted missionary giving his earnest and plain instructions and explanations of the Christian doctrine to his flock, the simple children of that wilderness; their dusky faces all upturned to him, and their ears drinking with rapt attention the message of the "Great Spirit" delivered by His servant; when we see them in child-like faith accepting that message, renouncing with prompt docility those habitudes of their savage life, inconsistent with its precepts, to conform themselves diligently to these precepts, so contrary to all the impulses of the savage nature, we must unhesitatingly confess that the "Finger of God was there."

It seems mysterious that a work so happily originated and successfully carried on for a series of years in that vicinity, should at length have disappeared so silently, entirely and for so long an interval, that only the faintest marks of its former existence can now be traced.

LAURA POMEROY SMALLEY.

BY E. MARVIN SMALLEY.

This lady after a life of activity and usefulness, died at Swanton, July 21, 1863, in her 70th year, leaving many friends in the community where she lived so long. She was born in Middlebury, in 1793; and while quite young, was removed (with her father's family) to the eastern part of this county, while it was yet comparatively new and unsettled. In consequence she was permitted to enjoy few advantages for even the rudest education. Such, however, were the qualities of her mind, that she acquired an education much above the average afforded in those days, owing to her perseverance and natural love of study. She was endowed with acute powers of perception, which, coupled with an ambitious energy, laid a strong grasp upon the slender opportunities which lay within her reach and bent them to her purpose of self-cultivation. With occasional aid from her elder brother, the late Zerah Smalley, M. D., (who was liberally educated, and a man of scholastic attainments,) and profiting by access to a few well-selected books loaned by sympathizing and appreciative friends, she found herself arrived at womanhood, possessed of attainments by no means contemptible. For some time she gave herself up to teaching—an avocation she was fond and proud of—and there are left many people in the eastern parts of this and Chittenden counties, who retain grateful memories of her faithful tuition. After long and laborious service, broken in upon by many sore trials and domestic afflictions, she came to St. Albans with impaired health, to reside with her younger brother, B. H. Smalley, Esq., (now of Swanton) a little more than 25 years ago. Her natural vigor of constitution was shattered, and for the next 10 or 12 years she experienced a great deal of sickness. Ultimately, however, she was so far restored as to enjoy comparatively firm and comfortable health, until August, 1861, when she was first stricken with paralysis, from the effects of which she never fully recovered; remaining an invalid and more or less helpless at times until her death. In 1847, Miss Smalley was admitted into the communion of the Roman Catholic Church at St. Albans—then under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Geo. A. Hamilton—and ever after remained a firm and devoted adherent to that faith. Her character was what is styled an "original" one. She was gifted with a vivid imagination and a very retentive memory; and her stores of legends, old stories, historical romances and quaint songs (sung in her own peculiarly melodious voice) made her the acceptable companion, as her genial manners and conversation made her the welcome guest, at many a fireside, and the particular favorite of young people and children. In the interchange of witty repartee she had few equals; and they were rash who ventured to excite her just indignation. There was a point, and an emphasis to her expressions, which left no doubt as to their meaning and application, and shamed the discomfited person who would cast ridicule upon anything that was dear to her—and she, like all persons of a positive character, had many objects and subjects to which she was fondly attached. Perhaps one trait in her character which endeared her to her neighbors and acquaintances as much as any of her peculiarities, was her unwearied kindness at the bedside of the sick and the abode of poverty. In assiduity in ministering to the sick and afflicted, she found her pleasure, as long as her strength lasted, and "Aunt Laura" will long be remembered among the poor with a blessing upon her memory. Her sympathies were easily wrought upon, and very strong when excited; so that her bitterest enemy (so far as she could have any) would turn her resentment into compassion upon an appeal to her charity of disposition.

Thus she lived among mankind, mingling much in her earlier years with the busy world; sorely tried by sorrows and afflictions, but passing the down-hill of life by easy steps and among pleasant surroundings, and laying down quietly at the end, resting in the luxurious enjoyment of a religious faith which made her every hope and aspiration peaceful. (1863.)

LAURA'S LAMENT FOR HER NIECE.

BY L. P. S.

'Tis ever thus—oh! ever thus,
The blossoms of to-day,
The loved, the bright, the beautiful,
Are first to fade away.
Oh! why, All Righteous Father, why?
Wake "the unconscious dust!"
Why raise our expectations high,
Then disappoint our trust?

Was it in mercy, or in wrath,
This transient flower was lent
To shed its fragrance o'er our path,
Then leave us to lament?
Oh! better far without the ray
Of joy that ends in pain!
Of hopes that blossom for a day,
Then turn to dust again!

But, hush! rebellious heart be still!
Be every thought subdued,
Submissive to His holy will,
The only—wise and good!
The Father chastens whom He loves,
He takes what He has given;
The children whom he most approves
He earliest marks for Heaven.

[Miss Laura Smalley we knew, pleasantly, some 20 years ago. E. Marvin was the great pet of Aunt Laura, and wrote from his heart her obituary, whom he could sometimes tease rarely—in that dear old past. Says the Burlington Free Press, in a notice of his death:

He was for a time a student of the U. V. M., class of '54, but left before graduation; studied law and practiced in this city, St. Albans, Swanton and Chicago; published for some time the Burlington Sentinel, and for the last few years had been connected editorially with the Chicago Railway Review.

He "died of dropsy" in the summer of the year, in the very summer of life, but as one who knew the natural, large, warm heart of his and his faith, might have expected, like a sweet, penitent child, gathered in the tender arms of the last sacraments of his church to her bosom. He was buried from St. Mary's Catholic church, St. Albans, and sleeps in the family burial-plot in St. Albans' old cemetery.

The niece whom Aunt Laura laments in her scarcely reconciled verse was the only daughter of her brother, Benjamin H., Esq., in whose family she resided; who died in her beauty and sweetness, at 17. The greedy, insatiable consumer of youth and beauty, that devoured slowly, irremediably at St. Albans that lovely sister-stalk in Judge Aldis's house, a similar three-fold stalk of rare flowers in Bradley Barlow's home, and so many other opening roses of young womanhood in St. Albans, Swanton—along these lake-shore towns—gathered an opening bud of much preciousness from the Smalley family, Mar. 2, 1853. Cynthia Smalley, this sweet girl, was a companion of the Aldis and Barlow girls, of the charming Fay girls, of St. Albans, who still fragrantly remember her. Miss Melusina Fay ———, the accomplished writer, was one of her young girl-companions. Mrs. Smalley, we think, has never entirely ceased to mourn this painful bereavement.

MRS. JULIA C. SMALLEY.

To Swanton also belongs the honor of being the home of the author of the first book written in Franklin Co.: "The Young Converts," 12 mo. 263 pp., by Mrs. Smalley, published by P. O'Shea, New York; revised by Mrs. Smalley, by request, and republished by Rev. Z. Druon, of St. Albans, in 1861. This second edition, which was mostly confined to the letters of those young ladies, was not by any means so happy a book as the first edition, but made a neat and suitable prize book for the convent schools, for which we think it was chiefly intended. The original book, however, which all antiquarians take most pride in, "Memoirs of the Three Sisters," a true story, told with much freshness and that sweet fervor that takes any heart, was not only a favorite with converts both East and West, but widely, for a Catholic book, read and admired by Protestants as well.

Mrs. Smalley has not written largely, at all, but well, whatever she has written. She wrote the Catholic church paper in this work for St. Albans, she has written it, also, for this history of Swanton. She wrote the biographical sketch for the Hon.

Stephen Royce, of Berkshire, in vol. II. She has published a number of interesting papers in the "Catholic World Magazine," New York, as "Incidents of the Reign of Terror" (a story of French refugees), "Traces of an Indian Legend," "Progress versus Grooves," "One Hundred Years Ago," etc. More seldom, but occasionally, she has written in verse. We find among our papers from her pen:

TO MY FRIEND IN AFFLICTION.

BY JULIA C. SMALLEY.

Do you remember, dearest,
How, many years ago,
We laid a lovely little flower
Beneath the frost and snow?
And how it chilled our hearts, my love,
In those wintry days of old,
To think our little darling lay
Out in the cold!

Again, when eighteen years had joined
That saddened year before,
On such another wintry day
Another flower we bore,
And with it laid our fondest hopes
Beside that grave of old,
Leaving our broken hearts with them,
Out in the cold!

The storms how wildly round us now,
And life's stern winter sheds,
'Mid driving blasts, its frost and snow
On our defenceless heads.
But we'll think of that fair Home in which
Our flowers their sweets unfold,
And hope it may receive us soon,
Out of the cold!

LINES

written on the fly-leaf of a copy of the "Young Converts," presented to a very dear young convert in Ohio:

As ocean's faithful shell, how'er remote,
Or long absented from the sounding shore,
Still holds the echo of each ocean-note
Imprisoned deep within its bosom's core!
So, deep within our living human hearts
The voices of the past are echoing still,
And as each loved one from the earth departs,
The swelling eudence owns a deeper thrill;
And Heaven's own symphonies pervade the cell,
Emptied of earth, that angels there may dwell!

J. C. S.

[The young lady referred to above, Miss Mary Libbie Smalley, of Jefferson, Ohio, a niece of Mr. Smalley's,—Benj. H., Esq.]

I have no permission to publish these names. It is more interesting and valuable in history to have names and authority for everything. Folks must keep the knowledge of anything that adds a new tint of color to a fact away from a historiographer, I believe, if they would not have it used. I am so happy as to be very well acquainted with Mrs. Smalley, and the largest fault I know in this lady, she has buried her talent too much—a Catholic virtue, I know; but so her friends mostly feel; for I know not another woman of more deep and sweet culture in the State.—ED.]

THE BAPTIST CHURCH IN SWANTON.

March 12, 1796, an ecclesiastical council was called to organize a Baptist church in Swanton, which was composed of Elder William Marsh, Dea. Simon Huntington, and Ezekiel Sears from the church at Caldwell Manor, P. Q., and Dea. John Cressey from Fairfax. There were 11 members present at the council, which constituted the church at its organization. Daniel Rowley and John Calkins were chosen deacons. In two years they had 17 members, and Elder Thomas Brown was called and ordained Jan. 16, 1798. One of the present leading members, Mr. Jonas Brown, thinks Elder Thomas Brown was the father of the late Hon. S. S. Brown. Elder Brown continued his ministrations about two years.

A Baptist society was formed in the east part of the town in 1803. At that time, application was made to the town for the privilege of holding a Baptist society meeting on the east road, to choose a moderator, society clerk, and other officers. The meeting was held, and the Baptist society organized, by the choice of Jno. Baker moderator, Wm. Green clerk, Stephen Robinson treasurer, Israel Robinson collector, Joshua Calkins, Wm. Green, Jno. Baker, committee; Asa Green, Isaac Lackey and Otis Freeman, assessors (1st town book, p. 119). Several of these were not members of the church, some of these were Congregationalists, there being no Congregational church near. The organization continued for many years. Preaching was supported on the grand list.

In 1802 Elder Josiah Orcutt was employed to preach, but his term of service seems to have been short, as Elder Jesse Smith commenced preaching for them in 1803, and in June 1804 was regularly settled as pastor.

In 1808 ELDER JOSIAH ORCUTT was again employed, and continued to supply the pulpit until 1811 or '12, soon after which his death occurred.

ELDER PHINEAS CULVER began to preach for the Baptist church and society in Swanton June 25, 1814, and continued to act as pastor until 1818, when

ELDER ROSELL MEARS was employed as pastor. His labors were continued until 1829. At this time arrangements were made by which Elder Culver was to supply the pulpit one half of the time, and Elder Mears the other half. This arrangement continued until 1831, when ELDER DANIEL SABIN commenced to supply the pulpit one half of the time, and continued to do so until 1841. Under his labors in 1840, there was an unusual religious interest manifested and 35 were received into church fellowship.

REV. JAMES M. BEEMAN began his ministrations May 1841, and continued one year. From this time to 1846 it does not appear that the church was served with regular preaching, when the Rev. N. Clark commenced and continued until '47. After this

Rev. P. CRESSEY became pastor, serving some years until Rev. Palmer C. Himes began in Sept. 1852, and continued until April 1853, when the students from Fairfax supplied the pulpit one year. Rev. G. W. Bixby became pastor and served until 1860. The students then supplied the pulpit for two or three years. After which in 1865, H. C. Leavitt assumed the pastorate, and continued until 1868, when Rev. E. P. Merrifield became pastor one year. Then A. L. Gilbert 3 years, when, about 1872, Rev. A. L. Armes became pastor and served 1 1-2 years. Between 1816 and '20 the Baptist and Congregational churches built the meeting-house at Swanton Center. Jan. 1, 1850, the Baptists dedicated their house of worship at East Swanton, Rev. P. Cressey being then pastor.

The whole number of persons who have been members of the Baptist church up to 1860 is 518, 180 males, 338 females; of these there were received by baptism 126 males and 266 females. Since 1860 there have been 26 members added. The present number of the membership is 68.

REV. PHINEAS CULVER, [found among the papers of Mr. Perry that came into my hands; it is not in his hand writing but was doubtless written at his request by some Baptist clergyman, or other friend of Mr. Culver about the year 1861. G. B.] a clergyman of the Baptist denomination, removed from Champlain, N. Y. to Swanton in 1814. He was settled as pastor over the Baptist church in the latter place and continued in that relation from 1814 to 1818. This church at the time of his settlement was in a low and feeble state. His pastoral labors were every way successful, additions to their numbers began with the labors of "Elder Culver," and the year 1816 witnessed an unprecedented revival of religion. Nearly 100 persons were baptized into the church, among these were the Hon. George Green, Rev. F. W. Emerson, Ezra Lathrop and others. Through the efforts of Mr. Culver, seconded by those of Capt. Hubbard, a wealthy farmer of Swanton Center, the first meeting-house in the town was built. This was in 1816 Capt. Hubbard donated the land. One half of the house belonged to the Baptists, and the other was controlled by a society called the "Friendly Society."

Sectarian feelings ran high in those days. Mr. Culver was a thorough biblical expositor, possessed a powerful memory, had the Bible nearly at his tongue's end, was an acute reasoner and a hard theological antagonist to encounter. Polemics in theology in those days were in much higher vogue than now. There are some octogenarians yet in Swanton and vicinity, who can call to mind the invitations to a public discussion of their respective creeds, and that passed from Elder Culver to Revs. Mr. Wooster, of Fairfield, Mr. Dorman, of Georgia, and Mr. Cheney, of Milton. None of the invitations were accepted. Mr. Culver's views of the Jewish and Christian Sabbath were some 50 years in advance of his denomination and of the theology of his day. He believed that the Christian Sabbath rested on very different authority from that for the Jewish Sabbath, that the latter with the rest of the Jewish rituals was abrogated; while the authority for the former was found not in any positive precept, but in the example and practice of the Apostles and early Christians, coupled with the fitness and appropriateness of the day as commemorative of the resurrection of Christ. His views exposed him to the severest theological denunciations. They were the theme of religious discussions for years in Swanton and vicinity. Two councils of his own denomination were called "to put him down for heresy," as it was then styled. But the ability and good temper with which he defended his views and positions, together with the firm support given him by his church, enabled him to triumph over his enemies. His labors were greatly blessed in after years.

He died in 1834, leaving 9 children, among whom are E. D. Culver, of Brooklyn, N. Y., well known to the people of Vermont, and James D. Culver, late Mayor of Ogdensburgh, N. Y. There are many yet living in Swanton who remember Elder Culver with lasting affection.

The foregoing was all written previous to 1876. On the call of Miss Hemenway for the "History" to date, I addressed a letter to the pastor of this church, but have failed to get a reply.—G. B., March, 1882.

FREE WILL BAPTISTS.

At an early day it is believed there were several families of this denomination settled at Maquam, and in that vicinity. It is thought they had no regular preaching there until about the year 1825, when two ministers from New Hampshire came there in company. One, whose name was Hazleton, was a Free Will Baptist, and the other, whose name was Boston, is understood to have belonged to the denomination called "Christians." They commenced holding meetings, and labored harmoniously together. Their labors resulted in a very general spiritual awakening, and many persons connected themselves with that denomination. The Methodists, who had had a society in that part of the town for several years previous, also shared in the fruits of this revival. Attention was given to religion by the people in this section in a marked degree for several years.

According to the recollection of the writer, Messrs. Hazleton and Boston remained and labored there about two years. After they left, Elder Hall and Elder Kilburn served the society a while, after which a minister by the name of Elder Ewers commenced to preach to the people there. During his pastorate of some 5 years, the subject of baptism was much agitated, the people in that section being pretty evenly divided in opinion upon the subject.—About 1828 or '9, the Rev. John Clark, presiding elder of the Methodist Episcopal church, preached a sermon at the school-house there upon this subject, taking the pedo-baptist view, and going over the whole ground. This caused great excitement and discussion, and though the sermon probably made no converts from the Baptist church, yet it had the effect to confirm the Methodists in their faith, and probably saved the church there from disintegration.

Mr. Ewers left about 1833, but previous to leaving became a convert of the Universalist faith. He moved to Canada, and it is believed died in that faith.

The Baptists had other ministers in after years preaching at times at Maquam, and at a neighborhood called the city, but the the society, like the Methodist in that section, gradually declined until neither they or the Methodists have had regular preaching in that part of the town for many years.

UNIVERSALISTS.

There were persons in town at an early period who professed to be Universalists in sentiment, but no effort was made to secure the services of a minister of that denomination until about the year 1830 or '31, at which time, according to the recollection of the writer, a request was made of the Congregational church, by one or more persons professing Universalism, to permit a Universalist minister to preach in the meeting-house on the day they worshipped there. This request was refused. Several that took sides with the Universalists were owners of slips in the house, and felt it unjust to be excluded from a place of worship which they had helped to build, and as the consent of the Congregational church could not be obtained to allow a minister of the Universalist faith to occupy the pulpit, it was resolved to occupy it without their consent. An appointment was therefore made that a Universalist minister, the Rev. Mr. Wright, would preach in the meeting-house at the same hour that the Congregationalists had held their stated service there. The house was well filled some little time previous to the usual hour of opening service by the adherents of both parties. Mr. Wright had taken his place in the pulpit, and commenced the reading of the opening hymn on time, perhaps a little before, and while he was thus engaged, Mr. E. H. Dorman, who was then the pastor of the Congregational church, entered the house, passing down the aisle and up the stairs into the pulpit. He, as pastor, demanded the pulpit. Mr. Wright continued the reading of his hymn without giving the slightest attention to the demands made; whereupon Mr. Dorman turned and said that his congregation would find him at the school-house, some 50 rods distant. He with his congregation then left the house. There was intense excitement, but the scene passed without violence, which some had apprehended. The Congregationalists brought a suit against the leaders for the recovery of their house, they very naturally feeling that they had suffered great injustice in consequence of their refusing what they could not conscientiously grant, and feeling that though people might hold pew property who differed from them in their religious views, yet they had no right to the control of the pulpit. This suit, though brought before the courts, was been put over from time to time, for the reason, it was said, that the court had a great reluctance to deciding a controversy of this kind. The suit was finally, about 1840 or '41, taken out of court, each party paying their own costs, with the tacit understanding that the Congregationalists might occupy the meeting-house as they had done previous to the controversy, without being molested.

A Universalist society was formed about 1832, and proper officers chosen. (The writer has made efforts to obtain the records of the society, but has been unsuccessful, and is therefore compelled to depend on his recollection and that of others for the brief history here given.) Rev. Eli Ballou is believed to be the first minister of that denomination to hold regular stated services. He came here about 1833, and remained until about 1837, or '38. Some time previous to Mr. Ballou leaving, the Rev. Joseph Baker came here to reside, and taught school a while, and after Mr. Ballou left, served the society as their minister, remaining until 1839 or 40. (In 1843, he was preaching in St. Albans.) It is believed the society had no regular preaching from 1840 to 1846 or '7, about which time the Rev. W. J. Goss commenced to preach regularly once in two or four weeks, and continued his ministrations a year or two. After which we find (by the Vermont Register) that Rev. D. Mott served as their minister in 1851 or '2, since which it is thought there has been no stated preaching in the place by clergymen of that denomination. Mr. Ballou has, however, been occasionally sent for to Montpelier to preach on funeral occasions.

EDUCATION.

In the original charter of this town granted by Gov. Wentworth, the usual provision was made for education. To the lands so set apart, one finds frequent reference in the early records of the town. Votes were occasionally passed at the annual town meetings, respecting the application of the proceeds from the school lands. A committee of 9 was appointed in March, 1797, to divide the town into districts, for each of which a trustee was appointed at a town meeting in April, the same year. These districts were from time to time divided, and subdivided, as we find in 1804, that it was "voted to divide the first district into two, and 2 years later to set off a new district in the northeast part of the town."

In 1812, the town consisted of 11 districts. They probably continued without much variation for many years, for in 1830 the districts did not exceed 12. In 1831, they were increased to 14; and in 1838, a new district was formed "down the river." In 1848, district No. 9 was "authorized to divide into two districts." This decision being carried into effect the next year, the town at this time consisted of 17 districts.

In 1853, there was a "new district." This consisted in the alteration and more definite determination of some boundaries, without change in the number of districts, which has continued the same to the present.

The school lands it would seem from various town votes respecting them, were early laid out. In 1802, it was "voted that the selectmen be empowered to give leases of the public lands or school lands" in Swanton. It seems from the records, that there was occasionally some difficulty in the management of these lands, for in 1815, we find S. Hathaway chosen to prosecute for, or defend, the title of the public school lands. Probably the proceeds of these lands were in the early years of the town sometimes devoted to other than school purposes. This would seem evident from the fact, that in 1810 it was voted that the rents and profits of the public school lots in Swanton be appropriated to the use of schools. A similar vote was taken in 1812.

The desire for free schools did not prevail so widely at an early day as at present. One of the articles inserted in the warning for a town meeting in 1805, was, "To see if the town will raise a sum of money on the grand list for the support of schools for one year." This article was dismissed.

It is interesting to note the gradual advancement in public sentiment on many points connected with education, as exhibited by the records of the town or of school districts, through a long series of years. On many points, respecting which a general apathy prevailed 50 years ago, there is now a lively interest. Districts which were then strongly opposed to raising the salary of teachers on the grand list, are to-day defraying the whole expense of education in this way.

In 1803, according to the recollection of my mother, Miss Lydia Hyde taught the first school in town in a corn-house belonging to Mr. Levi Scott, on the west side of the river. Soon after this in the same year, or possibly the year after, a school was taught by Lydia Dewey, in a shop belonging to Capt. Heman Hopkins. It was then the custom that those sending children to school should board the teacher, and this custom prevailed for nearly 30 years after.

I find on my father's old book where he gives Heman Hopkins credit for boarding both Lydia Hyde and Lydia Dewey, three weeks, at one dollar per week, under date of 1803. From this it seems he employed Hopkins to board the teacher, instead of boarding her at his own residence, which was an arrangement often made between neighbors respecting the board of the teacher.

The first school-house built in town was on the west side of the river. It stood on the hill occupying the ground just in front of the present school-house. It was erected in the year 1805 or '6. Edward Coit taught school here in the winter 1807 and '8. Bradford Scott attended that school. Mr. Ira Hill was employed in 1815 or '16 as teacher, receiving for his services $500. He had as an assistant Miss Almira Pomeroy. The number of pupils was about 100. There was a temporary addition built to the house to accommodate the large number of scholars. Of this school some of the older citizens used to speak with much praise and enthusiasm.

The second school-house at Swanton Falls was built about the year 1816, and stood about 4 or 5 rods east of where the present Congregational church now stands and occupied the northern extremity of the lot now owned by the Episcopal church.

We look with interest upon the names of those who took an active part in education at an early day. It is with such a feeling that we learn who were appointed Trustees of the several districts formed. In 1797, according to the town records, the first trustees of school districts were Isaac Aselstyne, John Pratt, Amasa Howe, Dr. Ela Smith, Joshua Calkins, Israel Robinson and Asa Lewis. These seem to have held their offices from year to year. New ones being appointed only in cases of resignation, or removal from the district or other like reasons. In 1828 we find the first record of the appointment of a superintending committee of common schools. This consisted of Rev. E. H. Dorman, Lewis James, Stephen S. Brown, George Green, Arison Soule, Cornelius Wood and Geo. W. Foster. There are records of appointment of such committee for six successive years, (1828 to '33 inclusive,) Rev. Mr. Dorman being one of the number for the whole period.

The first mention of "Town Superintendent of Common Schools" occurs in the record of 1846. For that year Warren Robinson was appointed; the next year Chas. W. Rich. Warren Robinson again in 1848, Jno. Barney '49 and Rev. A. J. Sampson for 1850. During the next 3 years no appointments were made. C. B. Hurlburt served in 1856; W. C. Sanford, '55, Rev. H. J. Moore, '56, Rev. J. B. Perry from 1857 to 1862.

SWANTON FALLS ACADEMY.

In 1846, a movement was made towards the building of an academy. The building was erected by Nelson Bullard, about the year 1846. The basement being designed for a town hall, and upper story for academical purposes.

The first principal was H. R. Stebbings, who taught one year, and was succeeded by Rev. A. J. Sampson, who began in March, 1849, and continued to May, 1850 (5 terms).

Samuel Case was the next principal, in connection with whose exertions a good apparatus, illustrative of Natural Philosophy, was added. The school about this time was incorporated as an academy. In 1851, unfortunately for the town and for all the interests of education, the edifice was destroyed by fire; but through the activity of Mr. Case and others who co-operated with him, a new building more commodious than the first was erected in 1852; the lower portion of which, like that of the former edifice, was intended for a town hall, while the second story was divided into school and recitation rooms.

Mr. Case was succeeded by Henry C. Adams, whose health failing, Mr. McLaughlin taught for a few months. Calvin B. Hurlburt was the next principal. Wm. C. Sanford followed Mr. Hurlburt. The Rev. H. J. Moore, assisted by Mrs. Moore and others, was principal for two years, about the years 1856, '7. C. J. S. Wells took charge of the school in Sept., 1857, and continued until the summer of '60, usually employing an assistant during the fall term. Since that time, Mr. Ayer has taught one term; Mr. James one term; Mr. Hyde taught in 1861.

The number of pupils in the academy has varied very much at different periods. There has been times when the number of pupils here in the fall term has been about 100, indeed for several years they ranged from 50 to 100.

GRADED UNION SCHOOL.

During the autumn of 1860, attention was more than usual turned toward the subject of common schools. There had been previously some that thought of placing the academy on the basis of a common school, which should be open to all. Each of the two districts on the east side of the river had far too many children for a single school, and it seemed desirable to adopt a plan which should be at once economical and efficient in bringing the means of instruction within the reach of all, and a graded union school was fixed upon as the most feasible plan. In Jan., 1861, a union district was formed, and a committee appointed to secure the passage of a bill so to enlarge the powers of the union district as to allow the comparing and grading of the schools to any desirable extent. Such a bill having been passed by the legislature, was adopted by the union district in Nov., 1861. The children were at once divided into three grades, and three schools established. These three grades forming the nucleus of a primary, intermediate and high-school. The district having power to divide each grade into two or more graded departments as occasion might require.

Fortunately for the district, the services of Prof. C. D. Mead was secured as principal of this school, who organized it on the basis contemplated, having two or more subordinate teachers, and continued his services in this capacity, with great acceptance to the community, until 1871. After which Mr. Mead became principal of the high school at Johnson for about a year, and after this teacher in a high school connected with Middlebury College, retaining that position at the present (1882).

On the retirement of Mr. Mead as principal at Swanton, Prof. T. W. Huntington assumed that relation, and retained it until about the first of 1873, giving very general satisfaction. He is now engaged in the study of medicine in the medical department of Harvard University.

During the year 1873 and part of '74, Prof. W. A. Learned was principal, and was regarded an excellent teacher.

In the fall of 1874, Prof. W. N. Phelps became principal, and remained as such until the winter of 1877, when he left.

Prof. H. Hill, of Isle La Motte, a graduate of the University of Vermont, took the school after Prof. Phelps had left, and commenced in March, 1877. He was a young man of good ability, well cultivated, and gave very general satisfaction. He left in the spring of 1879 to become the principal of the academy at Chateaugay, N. Y., and soon after became the husband of the daughter of Francis Smith, Esq., of this village.

Prof. H. B. Chittenden took the place of Mr. Hill as principal of our high school. He commenced Sept. 1, 1879, and continues his services to the present time (March, 1882), having continuously with him three other teachers, to whom he gives a general oversight. His services have been very acceptable to the people generally.

LYCEUMS.

FROM MR. PERRY'S MSS.

In this town, as in many others, lyceums and debating societies have been from time to time established and for a while sustained. These, no doubt, when properly conducted, contribute to increase intelligence and to awaken many to habits of thoughtfulness whose minds might otherwise have remained unaffected.

There was a lyceum or literary society established here about 1850 in connection with the Academy. Occasionally lectures were delivered, though ordinarily the exercises were confined to debates. This continued with varying success for several years, say to 1857, and was no doubt a means of improvement to the students in the school, as well as to such citizens as participated in the exercises.

Several feeling the need of something which should foster scientific inquiry in themselves, and tend to awaken an interest in the community, called a meeting of all interested in literary and scientific investigation, which resulted in the organization of an association called the "Citizens' Lyceum." The leading exercise was to be a lecture, usually on some scientific subject, ordinarily occupying from 30 minutes to an hour, after which the subject came before the body for discussion. No regular disputants were to be chosen or appointed, for the reason that ordinarily the taking of sides and simply endeavoring to maintain them, leads to narrow and contracted views, each ignoring all truth not favorable to his own position. Thus a broader field was open for inquiry, and the utmost freedom allowed to the discussion, which tends to bring the truth to light in its manifold and diversified phases.

From this association, the meetings of which were weekly and continued from 4 to 5 months in the year, great and perceptible good has resulted. Light was brought to bear on many minds on a thousand points which would else have remained in darkness. Broader views were entertained by all who were in the habit of participating in the discussions.

The lectures were usually prepared by citizens, though occasionally the lyceum was favored by a speaker from abroad. Thus much has been said on this point that it may incite people generally in our State to engage in literary and scientific investigations.

J. B. P.

The community is greatly indebted to Mr. Perry for the prominent part he took in organizing, encouraging and sustaining the association spoken of. He with his coadjutor, Dr. G. M. Hall, favored the lyceums with frequent lectures, taking advanced views upon all subjects discussed. This association was kept up and made interesting mainly by the influence and exertion of these two men until a short time previous to Mr. Perry's leaving, since which time there have been but few meetings, and but few persons seem to be interested in the matter.

Mr. Perry also deserves much credit for the part he took in changing the Academy into a graded school of a high order, he being at the time town superintendent of common schools.

NEWSPAPERS.

Several efforts have been made to sustain papers here, but never with marked success. Those that have been established have usually continued only for a few months, or at most for a few years, often, though perhaps not always, with loss to the proprietors. This, however, is only the history of a large proportion of the papers throughout the State, indeed I may add through the whole country.

The North American was started in 1838, the first number being issued April 10, and continued in weekly numbers to Aug. 12, 1841. It was published at first by H. P. Thomas, and edited by Canadians and Americans, the Canadians being here as refugees during the rebellion, or the so-called "Patriot war" of Canada. It was of course designed to advocate what was called the cause of freedom, and to uphold the course of those who had come out as radicals against the English government. The last year or more it was published by J. B. Ryan.

The Loco Foco was the name of a small sheet issued at Swanton for a few weeks in the autumn of 1839. Its name indicates its political views which it was its aim to advocate. The first number bears date Aug. 15, 1839. A lawyer who was opposed to the views it advocated, called it "a scurrilous little sheet."

The Swanton Herald.—Messrs. Ripley & Chamberlain commenced the publication of this paper in 1852; continued until the spring of '53, when Rev. A. J. Sampson began to publish and edit the paper, and continued one year.

The Franklin County Herald was the next paper issued at Swanton Falls. The first number appeared Nov. 5, 1853, under the management of Drury Brothers, Lucius H. Drury being editor. This was intended to support politically the democratic party. It was continued until some time in the winter of 1855.

The American Journal.—The first number of this paper was issued March 10, 1855, H. N. Drury being the publisher, Revs. Wm. A. Miller and A. J. Sampson editors. Their motto was "Independent in all things, neutral in nothing." It was in reality published by an association of the citizens of Swanton for the express purpose of establishing a good family paper, sound in its morals, and calculated to benefit the community. In these respects it was not a failure, but the cause of its failure lay rather in the want of a sufficient financial basis, with perhaps a little more energy by those having the matter in hand. Messrs. Miller and Sampson ceased to act as editors March 14, 1856. After this, Albert Sowles became editor, and H. N. Drury publisher. The 51st and last number of the 2d volume appeared March 27, 1857.

The Swanton Journal, was the next paper issued in this place. The first number appeared May 15, 1857, under the direction of H. N. Drury, as editor and proprietor. It continued until Nov. 6, 1857, when it was discontinued, and Mr. Drury went to Burlington to reside.

The Synchronist.—Is the euphonious title of the next paper established in Swanton, indicating that the editor meant to be up with the times. It was edited and published by John Sawyer, Jr. At first it was a bi-weekly, afterward a weekly. The first number appeared in Sept. 1859, the last in 1860. Mr. Sawyer was a native of Franklin, was graduated at Burlington August, 1859, and went into the army with the 1st regiment.

The Franklin County Herald and Swanton Advertiser was started in 1862, the 1st number being issued Mar. 7, by J. Ketchum Averill, editor and proprietor. This was continued in Swanton until August of the same year, when it was removed to St. Albans, where its publication continued under the name of the Franklin County Herald. It was not, however, continued for a great length of time. It was severe in its criticisms on the administration of Mr. Lincoln and the conduct of the war. The owners of the press at Swanton, on which the paper was printed, not relishing the idea of furnishing a press to sustain a policy they could not approve, remonstrated. This led to the removal of the paper to St. Albans. Mr. Averill soon after the discontinuance of his paper, went into the army with the 7th New York volunteers, and died at Morris Island, S. C., December, 1863.

Franklin Journal. The publication of this paper was commenced February, 1870, by A. N. Merchant, who was both publisher and proprietor. After about one year, the press on which it was printed was removed from Swanton, and the paper continued to be issued from another place. It was one of that class of papers whose outside is printed in one place, and the inside in another. It afforded much good reading for a family, but did not prove as beneficial to the business community as it would have been had its issue been continued from the press in Swanton. It continued to be issued under the above name for about 4 years, when it was purchased by C. S. Kinsley & Co., of Burlington, Vt., and has continued to be issued at Burlington up to the present time, January 1875, the name changed to the The Franklin County Journal. It is a good paper, but the people in Swanton and vicinity, especially the business portion, do not feel the interest in, or give it the encouragement they would by advertising, etc., had it been issued from a press in town.

This paper was not long after this discontinued, or at least it was not taken by the people in this section.

There was no newspaper published in town for several years, when Mr. T. M. Tobin started a paper called the "Swanton Courier," issuing the first number March 10, 1877. This, though not a large sheet, has been made interesting on account of the great variety of local items with which it supplies the people in its weekly visits. It has also been a benefit as a medium for advertising. The office of the "Courier" is at present (March, 1882), in the Blake block.

A newspaper called "The Vermont Sentry" was established in the village in the month of Jan. 1882. It is an eight-page paper, with patent outsides, has a good proportion of reading matter, well selected, and is well supplied with local items. With some it is matter of doubt if two newspapers can be sustained here, but the doubters should remember we are growing.

TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

At an early day, almost every one in town was in the habit of using ardent spirits. This was more particularly the case on public days, and usually every Saturday there was a gathering of the people at the public houses. They seldom thus met without many becoming the worse for drinking. At elections this was especially noticeable. Ordinarily for a day or two before such an occurrence, it was customary for each party to get such as they could under the influence of liquor that they might secure their vote. Total abstinence, to use the language of another, was not regarded as one of the cardinal virtues by the early inhabitants. Rum was thought a necessity. Rum must be had at raisings, at haying bees, and at logging and chopping bees. Rum must be had at huskings, sheep washings and quiltings. Rum must be had when one was born, and while he lived and when he died. It must be had when they met and when they parted. It must be had in hot weather to make them cool, and in cold weather to make them warm; at trainings, at shows, at elections, at horse racing, and at card playing. It must be had when sick to restore health, and in health to prevent sickness. And so on to the end of the chapter, it was rum, rum, rum, at all times and on all occasions. Such was the state of things for years. Nearly all drank ardent spirits, and had the liquors of those days been drugged as they are at the present day, many more would doubtless have destroyed themselves as drunkards, not living out half their days. Professors of religion, almost without exceptions, were in the habit of drinking occasionally though as is quaintly remarked by one, "it was not considered hardly Christian-like to get staggering drunk." Business was of course often neglected, much time and money wasted, health impaired, suffering endured, families broken up, credit ruined, crimes perpetrated, and not unfrequently miserable lives ended by delirium tremens. The writer can call to mind at least a round dozen since his remembrance, that have gone down to drunkards' graves, and nearly all by delirium tremens. A committee appointed about the year 1847, to learn the effects of intemperance, among other things reported "that nearly every farm on the road leading from the Falls to Maquam, and nearly every one there, was lost to the first owners from this cause alone." And it was not much better, it is to be feared, on the Island, and in some other parts of the town.

Mr. Elisha Barney, father of the writer, is entitled to the credit of being the first to raise any building of importance without furnishing spirituous liquors for the occasion. This was a saw-mill, put up in 1828, at the west end of the bridge, where the shop of E. H. Richardson now stands. He had a hard time of it, but by hiring some and coaxing others, he finally after two or three days succeeded in getting it up, costing doubtless ten times as much as it would had he furnished the liquor; but it was a matter of principle, and he would not yield.

About this time, 1827 or '8, the subject of temperance began to receive more attention, and temperance meetings were held in various parts of the country. In Swanton, Elisha Barney took an active and leading part. He prepared the first temperance pledge, and presented it first for signatures at a school-meeting, held on the west side of the river, in the year 1828 or '9. The writer was present and signed the pledge at that time, and several others, among whom was Bradford Scott. This was a temperance, not a total abstinence pledge, as it did not prohibit the drinking of wine or cider. This, it was afterward found, did not go far enough, and that the only cure for those addicted to habits of intemperance was total abstinence from all that can intoxicate, and this pledge, with the agitation accompanying it, has worked wonders.

In those early days of the temperance reform there was much agitation of the subject and many temperance meetings held. The writer well remembers a stirring address upon the subject, delivered by the Hon. Stephen S. Brown, at the old brick school-house, about 1831. Many who had previously been engaged in the sale of liquors abandoned it, but after a few years of agitation the cause was suffered to decline, until about 1840 the Washingtonian movement commenced, and speakers were employed to rouse the country to action.

Jan. 2, 1842, a Mr. Pease from Starksboro, who had been employed in the Washingtonian movement, and a Mr. Henry, of Waterbury, a reformed man, held a meeting at the Falls, and made stirring speeches in favor of the pledge of total abstinence, and a pledge of this kind was that evening circulated, and 47 names procured.

This meeting adjourned to the 10th inst. An address was then delivered by Rev. Mr. Dixon, and 52 names secured. At this meeting it was resolved to organize a temperance society, and a committee was appointed, consisting of Rev. Mr.

Dixon, Geo. Barney, I. A. Vanduzee, V. S. Ferris and O. F. Lamphere to draft a constitution, and report to the next meeting, to be held on the 17th inst. This committee reported a constitution at the time, which was adopted, and I. A. Vanduzee was chosen president, Geo. Barney vice-president, and Franklin V. Goodrich secretary. There was also a large visiting committee chosen, and provision made for the holding annual meetings for the election of officers. The pledge was circulated and 33 names obtained.

The meeting adjourned to Feb. 8, was addressed by O. F. Lamphere, and 10 names secured, and again adjourned to Feb. 21, at which time it was addressed by Rev. Mr. Beeman, and 20 names obtained, making up to this time 266 names.

Meetings were held weekly in different parts of the town until the 5th of April. The meetings were then discontinued until Dec. 3, 1842. Mr. Hyde, a reformed man, who had been a hard drinker, then held a meeting and delivered an excellent address. Having a miniature distillery with him, he extracted alcohol from what was said to be the pure juice of the grape, in presence of the audience. Space forbids our giving the doings of the meetings of this society. Suffice it to say they were kept up from year to year for about 15 years, and generally met every week during the winter months, and speakers procured at home or from abroad to deliver addresses, the good effects of which can scarcely be computed. The continuous agitation of the subject produced a healthy public sentiment, so that the large majority of the town became opposed to the vending or drinking of spirituous liquors, inasmuch, that we find by the records that in 1847 there were votes in town cast for license, 33; against, 159. 1848, for license, 41; against, 128. 1849, for license, 38; against, 196. The votes for the "the liquor law, passed Nov. 1852," were 189; against it, 96.

SWANTON TEMPERANCE SOC'Y OFFICERS.

Those who have held the prominent offices in the temperance society here for a succession of years :

1842, I. A. Vanduzee, president; Geo. Barney, vice-president; Franklin V. Goodrich, secretary.

1843, Harvey Stone, president; V. S. Ferris, vice-president; A. M. Clark, secretary.

1844, N. L. Whittemore, president; A. S. Farrar, vice-president; Wm. H. Blake, secretary.

1845, Rufus L. Barney, president; I. A. Vanduzee, vice-president; E. S. Meigs, secretary.

1846, George Barney, president; A. D. Story, vice-president; W. D. Vanduzee, secretary.

1847, Joseph Blake, president; Harry Asselstyne, vice-president; A. W. Saxe, secretary.

1848, H. Asselstyne, president; H. Gates, vice-president; N. J. Marvin, secretary.

1849, W. H. Blake, president; A. W. Saxe, vice-president; L. D. Clark, secretary.

1850, Rev. Z. H. Brown, president; Rev. A. J. Sampson, vice-president; Chas. J. Ferris, secretary.

1851, Rev. A. J. Sampson, president; Wm. Lawrence, vice-president; George W. Rowell, secretary.

The records of meetings after this are not to be found, but the organization was kept up several years and meetings maintained; but after the passage of the prohibitory liquor law, as it is called, there was not the enthusiasm manifested or the same effort put forth as previously, nearly all the friends of temperance doubtless feeling that the law would accomplish the extirpation of intemperance without their further effort, which they have found to be a great mistake. The law, without doubt, has been, and is at present, of great benefit to this town; yet we are constrained to say it has not accomplished all the good it might had the friends earnestly pressed its enforcement. We are aware there are those who affect to believe, and possibly are sincere in the belief, that there are more spirituous liquors drunk now than under the old license system, but to those who, with the writer, have seen the evils of rumselling and drinking under the old license system in days of yore, it needs no argument to satisfy them that the state of things under the present law, although not all that could be desired, yet are a vast improvement on the old system.

About the year 1850 there was an "Order of Rechabites" organized here, and for a time their efforts seemed to accomplish much good. Many hard drinkers reformed; and for a while every thing appeared promising, but the order soon broke up, it being the result of internal dissensions. From what is known it would seem that admission could be obtained at too cheap a rate, and that there was not sufficient care used in the admission of members. The consequence was, too large an element found admission not controlled by sound temperance principles, and purposely, it is said, broke up the organization.

The order of "Sons of Temperance" was established here about 1858, and for a while their efforts were productive of good; but in two or three years it was suffered to die out, more on account of the indifference of its members, than for any other cause.

After this, about the year 1870, the "Good Templars" organized, and have thus far been efficient and the results have been good. They have rented and fitted up in the most inviting manner a spacious room in the Dorman block, and have held their weekly meetings for years, and the evidences of vitality and efficiency are as good now as when the order was established. And it is to be hoped it will not follow in the footsteps of its "Illustrious predecessors," but rather live, and grow, and flourish until there shall be no more need of temperance organizations.

Spirituos liquors are now, 1874, doubtless illegally and clandestinely sold to some extent, but we think we are fully warranted in saying that in comparison to the amount once sold, it is exceedingly small.

March, 1882, the Good Templars "still live," and it is hoped are a power for good; indeed we have good reason to believe it is so. They have encouraged lecturers to come and agitate the subject, and in this way keep before the people the evils of intemperance. In the winter and spring of 1878, Mr. Wm. Maxwell, an eloquent temperance lecturer, came here and delivered a series of stirring lectures upon the subject, and secured the pledges of a great number of persons to the total abstainer's pledge, among which were many that had been hard drinkers. After he left, the interest in a measure died away, yet we have reason to believe that good was accomplished. We have from time to time a lecture upon the subject, and there are frequent suits brought against the violators of the law, and there is no spirituous liquors sold openly in the place except at the Town Agency, and there only in limited quantities.

PROMINENT CITIZENS, OTHER THAN PROFESSIONAL.

In each different period of the history of this town as well as of others, there have been some who have stood forth more prominent than others, and who demand a passing word. These were the first settlers and those who have taken a more active part in the welfare and public business of the town. The earliest settler of a place always deserve a passing notice, and there are many citizens as the years run on, not connected with any profession, who deserve to be remembered as public benefactors in their immediate vicinity, and more or less abroad, the biography of which we shall sketch briefly. There may be many, however, that are equally deserving a memorial sketch, that are not mentioned for want of space, or more generally for needful information.

The reader should bear in mind that nearly all of the following biographical sketches were written in 1874 or '5, when the immediate publication of this history was contemplated. The date of the writing of those since is given with the sketch.

SILAS HATHAWAY,

at one time the proprietor of nearly all the lands in the town of Swanton, came to reside here about the year 1800, was town representative in 1802; kept goods for sale, and remained for a few years, when he removed to St. Albans. He not only held the title to the most of the lands in Swanton, but was an extensive owner in other towns, and it is said, and probably with truth, that at one time he could travel from Canada line to Burlington on his own land. But notwithstanding his extensive landed estate he died leaving but little property to his family. It is but a short time since that even a stone marked his grave, which was furnished the present year (1874) from the marble establishment of G. Barney & Sons. For further account, reference is had to the history of St. Albans vol. II, Vermont Historical Gazetteer. [The 2d volume of this work.—ED.]

JONATHAN FERRIS

was born at West Chester, N. Y., Dec. 15, 1765, and died in Swanton, Oct. 1, 1829. He, with his brother, Elijah Ferris, bought from Silas Hathaway a tract of land, as appears from indenture dated May 3, 1803, which in brief was bounded as follows:

Commenced where the then Highgate line intersected Maquam Creek, thence following the creek to Maquam Bay; thence southerly following the shore of the Lake one and a half miles; thence south-easterly parallel with Highgate line, three miles; thence north-easterly until it meets the Highgate line; thence on Highgate line to place of beginning. So running as to include 5000 acres of land, no more and no less, exclusive of such lands as have heretofore been conveyed by said Hathaway.

This tract, as may readily be seen, includes all the Falls with all the land on which the village now stands, and all the land included within the bend of the river, from where the Highgate line intersects the river eastwardly from the Falls to where the river intersects said Highgate line northwardly from the Falls, together with a large amount not embraced within the bend of the river. The consideration set up in the deed to this tract of land is $40,000; but I am informed by V. S. Ferris, Esq., son of Jonathan, that the actual amount paid was $22,000 only. He came here to reside with his family in 1807, and for the first few years occupied a house then standing near the site of the house where Col. Jewett now resides. In 1810, he entered the large brick house standing at the northerly end of the village square, and occupied it until his death.

He contributed much in various ways to the prosperity of the town; and to him we are indebted for the laying out of our village, for its ample building lots, and its regular, straight and broad streets, and the whole plan of the village does credit to its author. In his religious belief and by profession he belonged to the "Society of Friends."

He married Ursula Catlin, born in Litchfield, Ct., May 27, 1780. Mrs. Ferris was a woman of unusual excellence of character. With great modesty, she united remarkable firmness. She survived her husband nearly 30 years. She became a member of the Congregational church April 8, 1832. For many years previous she had indulged a hope, and continued through life to adorn the doctrine which she professed, dying Mar. 31, 1858. Their children were Helen A., married Dr. H. H. Brayton Mar. 23, 1831, who died in California; J. Alexander, now residing in California; Lynde C., became a physician and practiced several years in New York, dying at the residence of his brother, near Boston, in 1874; Valentine S., married for his first wife the daughter of Judge Wm. Brayton; she dying about '55, he married Mrs. Emma Everest Gates, widow of Dr. Horatio Gates, is now residing in Swanton; Maria A., married R. F. Fletcher, Esq., who died in Minnesota, she afterward dying in Paris, France; Edwin M., married Miss Catharine Everest; he died about 1858; his wife is still living; Almira E., married P. T. Washburn, Esq., who afterward became adjutant general and governor of the State of Vermont. [See history of Ludlow for dates. ED.] Mortimer C., went to Boston in early life, where he married and engaged in mercantile pursuits, and became very wealthy; Charles J., died at sea while on his way to California.

LEMUEL LASELL

was born in Lanesboro, Mass., June 24, 1760. He came from his native place to Swanton, 1788, a single man. Having made claim to land on which C. H. Meade now lives, he commenced clearing it, and in the autumn returned to Lanesboro. Leaving there the next spring with a yoke of oxen for Swanton, he was accompanied a part of the way by Ezra Meach, after of Shelburne, and a member of Congress, [see vol. Shelburne history in this work] who was then a lad of 14 years of age, and brought the traps on his back for the purpose of trapping, in which business he engaged to some extent. The following incident related to the writer by Mr. Uriah Lasell, (son of Lemuel) previous to his death is deserving of preservation. As the two (Meach and Lasell) journeyed toward Swanton they arrived at night, weary with the day's walking, at the hut of Adonijah Brooks, in the town of Keene, this side of Whitehall. They got permission to remain there over night, but Mr. Brooks was unable to afford them the most luxurious entertainment, as his house had been burned but a short time previous by the Indians, and if they remained over the night the condition was they should sleep on the floor, to which the tired travellers gladly assented.

Mr. Brooks had a daughter some 14 yrs. of age, who had but a short time previous gathered what was then known as cat-tail from the swamps in quantity sufficient to make herself a bed. This she made up that night for the weary travellers, and they enjoyed much their night's rest. When on their journey the next day, young Meach, speaking of their excellent reception of the night previous, observed to his companion, that is fine girl, to give up her own bed for our accommodation and comfort. Yes, replied Lasell, she is so, and her father is coming to our part of the country soon to settle, and I shall take her, if I can get her, for my wife. Some 2 years after this Mr. Brooks settled on St. Albans Point, the acquaintance was renewed, and the girl that kindly furnished her own bed for the comfort of the tired travellers, became the wife of Mr. Lasell, a numerous posterity being the result of this union.

I was informed by Uriah, also, that the dam across the river here was commenced in 1789, and partially completed, when it was swept off by a flood, and that Thomas Butterfield, agent for Ira Allen, then let the contract to his father Lemuel and his Uncle Elias Lasell to rebuild the dam, and they completed it in 1790.

Mrs. N. Bullard, a daughter of Mr. Lasell, informs me that she had often heard it said that when her father and his brother commenced to build the dam, there were but 3 axes in town. Mr. Lasell continued to live on the Mead farm on which he first settled until 1802, when he removed to St. Albans Point, where he passed the remainder of his days. He was the first militia captain in town, and was also chosen to fill other town offices.

CONRAD ASELTINE,

one of the first settlers west of the Falls, came on here with three of his sons from Claverick, N.Y., in 1788. He returned the same year leaving one son behind, and the next year, 1789, moved his family to town, coming all the way from Whitehall on the ice to Maquam Bay, and from thence through what is known as the Aseltine marsh to the Wagoner place (now the Barney farm) on the river. He settled the same year on the place where Truman E. Mead now resides, on the road leading across from the river to Maquam Bay. He raised apple trees from seed brought with him, and set out a fine orchard, which yielded fruit in abundance for many years. The trees are nearly all gone to decay, a few only of the old trunks now remaining.

He was the father of 8 children: Isaac, John, Henry, Peter, Andrew; Jane, who married Matthew Lampman, Lydia, who married Andrew Decker, Margaret, who married William Emery.

At the time of his coming to Swanton there were no mills at the Falls, and he was compelled to get his milling done at Saxe's mills in Highgate, going and returning by water, in a canoe.

DANIEL B. MEIGS, was born in Guilford, Windham County, in 1762. When about 20 years of age he settled in Sunderland, Bennington County. In 1784, he with one Bradley, a kinsman, left Sunderland on a trip, the design of which was to explore the town of Georgia and St. Albans, with a view to settlement. They went on foot to Whitehall, when they found passage in a batteaux to the outlet of Lake George. They thence proceeded in a canoe and on foot as far as Onion River [the Winooski River]. Mr. Bradley being discouraged, they turned back to Sunderland. Mr. Meigs, however, not to be thwarted in his desire of exploring these northern towns, started out again the next year, 1785. This time he went alone. He came on horse-back as far as Ira Allen's in Colchester, where he left his horse and proceeded on foot, accompanied by a Mr. Hitchcock of Colchester; there was no road to speak of; they were guided by blazed trees. Having missed their way, they were compelled to remain out over night, but finally reached St. Albans where they found Mr. Weldon, who had himself just returned to take possession of lands which he had taken up before the Revolution, and which had remained unoccupied during the war. No lot lines were then run. Mr. Meigs having "made a pitch," returned to Sunderland. During the next winter, 1786, he moved his family, a wife and one child, to St. Albans; after reaching Whitehall, he took the ice and proceeded by the lake to Georgia. At that time, he says, there were only two houses in Burlington. In March, 1786, he erected a rude dwelling about 3 miles from St. Albans Bay, and some $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile eastwardly from where the village of St. Albans is now located. During the spring he cleared about 2 acres of land, which he sowed with grain. During the autumn of the same year, 19 Indians came out from St. Francis. They were ostensibly occupied in digging ginseng. The whites, as there were then only five or six of them in the neighborhood, were apprehensive of danger. The Indians, however, offered no violence, and in about a month returned to their homes, greatly to the relief of the new settlers.

Mr. Meigs finding he had not made the best selection of land, sold his improvements and made another "pitch" about 100 rods north of the first. The ensuing spring, by changing work with his neighbor Brooks, he cleared 5 acres of land on his new farm without a team. The first year his crops failed; the next year they were good, and ever after he enjoyed a good degree of prosperity.

In October, 1785, his second child was born, being the first known in the town of St. Albans. In April, 1800, he bought of Silas Hathaway a lot of 100 acres of land in Swanton, and located here about that time and passed the remainder of his days. He died Dec. 19, 1849, in his 88th year, and was interred in the burial-place on "the west road." An anecdote told of him by Mr. Houghton, who formerly lived in Guilford, illustrates the summary way of obtaining justice sometimes resorted to at that day. While residing in Guilford, Mr. Meigs sold a man a yoke of oxen for $60, agreeing to wait two months for the pay. When it became due he called on him for it, but the man refused to pay, denying that he owed him. Mr. Meigs told him he would allow a week's grace, and if he did not pay for the oxen then, he would slap him. At the expiration of the time he went, as proposed, for his pay. It was again refused, upon which young Meigs, who was very large and athletic, took the man by the nape of the neck, drew him across his knees, and gave him three smart slaps with his hand; the man groaned for pain. Meigs asked if he would pay, but received no, for reply. He then made another application of three slaps, more severely than at first, when the man gave another groan. On being asked again if he would pay, answered, yes. He then paid Meigs to his satisfaction. This affair rendered Meigs famous in the place, while the other man was glad to leave for parts unknown.

Another anecdote is related that is connected with Mr. Meigs' political life. Some years after becoming a resident of Swanton, when there was much excitement on politics, he was up as a candidate for town representative. As the voting was going on, Meigs' friends came to him greatly excited, saying: "Uncle Dan, your opposers are lying about you, and you must go and contradict them." "Lying, are they," said Meigs, "well, let them lie, they can't hurt me in that way; it's the truth I'm afraid of."

Mr. Meigs was a prominent citizen both in St. Albans and Swanton; in the latter place he for many years took a prominent part in town business, and was placed in positions of trust. He was constable in St. Albans from 1788 to '91; also for the year 1794. In 1803 and '27, he was one of the listers in Swanton, grand juror in 1828, first constable in 1811, selectman 1805 to '10 inclusive, 1812, 1818 to 1821 inclusive, and in 1832. In 1820, he represented the town in the Legislature.

Two more anecdotes of Meigs told the writer later:

Mr. Meigs had a brother-in-law, Capt. Hollenbeck, well known as a man of strong will, and of very decided political and religious views. The two were in accord as to religion, both being strong Universalists, but squarely opposed to each other in politics, Meigs being a democrat of the old school, while Hollenbeck was a whig. At a certain time Meigs thought to visit his son, Bronson, then living some distance in Canada, and invited Hollenbeck to ride there with him in his sleigh. The invitation was accepted, and all went well for a few hours, when unfortunately they got to discussing political matters, and both became much excited; finally Hollenbeck called Meigs a fool. This was too much for Meigs in his then heated condition, and he at once said to Hollenbeck, "Get out of my sleigh." No sooner said than Hollenbeck was out of the sleigh. Meigs drove on alone, leaving Hollenbeck to plod his way through the snow on foot as best he could. On arriving at his son's, Meigs told him how matters were, when the son took a team and went after Hollenbeck and brought him in; but the blood of both was up, and it is said they did not speak to each other while there, which it would seem must have detracted somewhat from the pleasure of their visit.

To show that Hollenbeck had confidence in Meigs' religious views, and in his ability to defend them, the following is told: On a certain occasion they were both at a tavern, and with others conversing upon the topics of the day, when a man came in and introduced the subject of religion, strongly opposing the Universalist doctrine. Hollenbeck at length began to walk the floor, saying nothing, but being apparently much excited, until at length he said with great earnestness, "Take him, Dan, I can't stand it any longer!"

RUFUS BARNEY, SR.,

son of Elisha, Sr., was born in Taunton, Mass. He settled in Bennington, Vt., where he acquired a competency, and became the father of several sons and daughters, some of whom arrived at adult age, his son Lemuel having attained nearly to his majority, and his daughter Silence marrying Levi Scott, his brother Elisha (father of the writer), being much younger. He (Rufus), in order it would seem to give his brother and sons a fair start in life, determined on securing some favorable location in the then northern wilds of Vermont, where they might settle and engage in the manufacture of iron or some other business.

Elisha being on a visit to his brother in 1798, a visit to Northern Vermont was determined upon [as see previous]. When they came to Swanton, and, as before told, purchased of Silas Hathaway the equal undivided half of 200 acres of land on the west side of the river, being 200 rods wide from the dam down the stream, and from the center of the river half a mile back, the deed bearing date Feb. 23, 1799. The other half of this tract was owned by Simeon Hathaway, of Bennington. This tract, as will at once be seen, takes in all the falls and water privilege on west side of the river. In the after division of the water privilege there was a line drawn from about where the north corner of the large house belonging to Fletcher Tarbell now stands almost directly east, perhaps a little south, running to the center of the river so as to pass the point of rocks at the head of the island about 5 rods to the south. Above this line was to belong to Simeon Hathaway, and below this to the Barneys, which was then known as the forge privilege.

Capt. Rufus, as he was called, came on here in the spring of 1799, as aforesaid, and commenced the forge flume, which extended from the dam to the forge pond, about on the line of the present Wing dam. The space now covered by the forge pond was then covered with heavy timber. A channel had to be dug through and the forge dam built, and the place where the forge brook now runs channeled through. At that time and under the circumstances this was considered an immense work. It was but partially completed the first year. He returned to Bennington in the fall of 1799, and about the month of May, 1800, came on here again, bringing men with him. His brother Elisha and family having preceded him, as before related, and also his son-in-law, Levi Scott, having arrived the March previous, all hands resumed work, and the forge was started in the fall of 1800. Capt. Rufus returned in the fall to Bennington, but came up the next year and the year after to give proper direction to the business, and when he saw (it is to be presumed) that they could get along without his aid, he, in 1803, gave up the concern into the hands of his brother and sons, taking no farther interest in the business only to come up to see how they were doing every two or three years until about 1814, when he made his last visit to Swanton.

I have been the more particular in this sketch for the reason that without the pecuniary aid of Capt. Rufus and the energy he brought to bear upon this undertaking, the west side of the river would doubtless have remained undeveloped for many years, and the iron business at Swanton possibly would never have been thought of, or at the most would not have taken the shape it did, and probably the Barneys, now so plenty in Swanton, would have peopled some other region. From what I have learned from those who were acquainted with Capt. Rufus, I conclude he was a man of broad views, intelligent, of kindly feelings, strong will and much force of character, with considerable dignity of bearing.

JOHN DUNBAR, SR.,

was born about the year 1769, and died in Swanton, Dec. 7, 1846. He left Taunton, Mass., with his family in the spring of 1799. His was the first family to settle on the west side of the river at the Falls. They moved into a log-house, standing near or on the place now owned and occupied by the Widow B. Scott. Mr. Dunbar assisted in building the first forge, and after its completion made iron in the same. A few years after he became the miller of the place, and attended the old brick grist-mill (now, 1875, a part of the new tannery) for very many years.

He raised a large family of sons and daughters. The oldest son, John, is now living, an aged man and quite feeble, in Richford. The youngest, Almon C., is now the only one of the family living in this place. He has followed the occupation of his father, and attended one or the other of the grist-mills here for many years.

Mr. Dunbar was respected as a temperate, industrious and honest man. Lucinda, his wife, outlived him several years, dying in Swanton, Feb. 28, 1861, aged 91 years.

ELISHA BARNEY,

son of Elisha Barney, the father of the writer, was one of the early settlers at Swanton Falls; was born in Taunton, Mass., July 17, 1776, and united in marriage to Mchitable Leonard, daughter of Rufus Leonard, of Taunton, Mass., May 15, 1795. The fruit of this union was 7 children, 3 dying in childhood, viz.: Eveline, Seth W. and James Alanson. The remaining daughter married Robert Foster, July 22, 1818. Her death occurred Jan. 19, 1835. My father died November, 1, 1837. My mother survived him more than 30 years, dying June 5, 1871, aged 95 years. Horatio W., one of the three sons in this family who survived their father, died July 19, 1872; another, Rufus L., the eldest, died Feb. 26, 1874. George, the youngest of the family, is the only survivor, and sadly makes the record that of the group composing once a happy family he is now the only one living.

My father's first visit to Swanton was made as recorded in the previous notice of his brother, in the autumn of 1798, and he made his first purchase here, in company with his brother Rufus, as described in the sketch of Rufus Barney of the water privilege on the west side of the river of Silas Hathaway in Feb. 1798. [For his success in the business of making iron here, see page previous.]

About the year 1803 he erected a frame dwelling-house where now stands the two-story brick house eastwardly from the Vt. and Canada R. R. depot, owned and occupied by his son, the late R. L. Barney, for a number of years previous to his decease, now occupied by Rufus Lester Barney, son of the writer. Some few years after this my father purchased a piece of land and house situated some 30 rods north of the old forge, where he resided most of his days. The old house is now demolished, and a new one occupies its site.

About the year 1806 he built a saw-mill where the Bullard carriage-shop now stands. In March, 1811, he removed to Sutton, P. Q., engaging there in the iron business, but the troubles between this and the mother country coming on, he thought proper to break up his business there and return to Swanton the next year. In 1821 he, in company with his son-in-law, Robert Foster, built a new forge near the old one. In 1823 and '24 he built the old brick meeting-house at much pecuniary loss. In 1827 he, with his two sons, Horatio and George, went to erect a forge in the wilds of Venango Co., Penn., near the Alleghany river, some 30 miles above Oil creek. Oil then bubbled up and came to the surface of the Alleghany river where we frequently had to cross it. Little was dreamed at that day of the vast amount of oil and consequent wealth that would at this day be developed by boring of those rocks.

Returning to Swanton in the fall of 1827, he commenced work upon a saw-mill erected at the west end of the bridge, on the site now (1874) occupied by E. Richardson's shop. About the year 1823

he caused the west side of the river at the Falls to be laid out in regular village lots, and the plan was a good one, but at that day it was not appreciated, and there was such a diversity of interests, and the importance of having lots and streets in regular order seemed so small to those who should have been most interested, that but little attention was paid to it.

From the papers of Mr. Perry we extract the following:

Mr. Barney was an active business man and labored to promote the welfare of the town. Being honest, temperate and industrious, he was very generally respected. For many years he served as justice of the peace, and enjoyed the confidence of the community. He was also for more than 20 years a leading and honored member of the M. E. church in this place, and died as such, sustained by the comforts of the Gospel.

To this we add, from papers he left we learn he became a class-leader on the organization of the first Methodist class formed in town in 1816. His papers also inform us that in early life he was disposed to be religious, but after the commencement of his business life, he openly opposed experimental religion, and became an avowed deist, and held these views until about 35 years of age. About this time he had a warm discussion with a religious man, he endeavoring to sustain his deistical views and opposing religion, when at length each had exhausted his arguments in support of their peculiar views, and they were about to separate, his friend remarked, "Well, Uncle Elisha, if religion does us no good, it can do us no harm." This remark made a sudden, deep and lasting impression. He at once said to himself, what a fool I am to oppose what can do me no harm. He immediately decided to cease his opposition to religion, and investigate its merits, and the consequence was he at length embraced it with all his heart, and ever after led a devoted, consistent Christian life, often making large sacrifices of his time and money to advance the cause of true religion. He sympathized with those in trouble, and was ever ready to assist them; in fact his disposition to help those that applied to him for assistance often brought upon himself pecuniary embarrassment, and he suffered great losses by placing undue confidence in the undeserving.

He was a warm friend of temperance, and to him belongs the distinction of drawing up and circulating the first temperance pledge in town as before stated. To him also belongs the honor of raising the first building in town, without any kind of spirituous liquors as before mentioned.

In his domestic relations he was affectionate and kind, having a great regard for the welfare of his children; in his business, honest, energetic and persevering. In religious matters, sincere, devoted and self-sacrificing.

As a fitting close of this sketch we copy a record which we find on a blank leaf of the old family Bible, in his own hand writing. "Dec. 16, 1835, this day I have read the old Testament through 22 times by course, and the new Testament as many times, except I have overlooked and made some mistake in chapters or verses which may be the case." There is also a record dated Jan. 28, 1837, a few months previous to his death, showing he had at that date read through the old testament twice after the previous date; 24 times through in a life-time is a handsome record for Biblical reading.

LEMUEL BARNEY,

son of Rufus Barney of Bennington, was born at Bennington, 1779, and died in Swanton, June 10, 1861, in his 82d year. He married Miss Anna Hinman in Caanan, Conn., 1799, who survived him a short time, dying in Swanton April 29, 1863. The circumstances connected with his coming to Swanton are mentioned in connection with the history of the manufacture of iron, previous. He erected a large house some 20 rods west of the forge about the year 1807, where he resided most of his days, and raised a family of 9 children: Sally, John, Charles, Rufus, Friend, Jane, Ward, Mary-Ann, and Anna.

He was one of the company that commenced the manufacture of iron in Swanton, and retained an interest in the business for many years. He afterward came into possession of a saw-mill, which was then standing a little below where the Bullard carriage shop now stands. He carried on lumber business for several years, and in connection with it kept goods. He was hard of hearing, and inclined to be reticent in his manner; was a man of decided views, particularly in regard to politics, being a democrat of the old school. An anecdote is told of him which will give a pretty good idea of his strong political bias.

For many years after the organization of the town, the office of town clerk was held by persons in different parts of the town, but a large share of the time by those residing in the eastern part. About the year 1844, when party lines were closely drawn between whigs and democrats, the voters at the Falls and in its vicinity determined for the time being to give up their party preference and all unite in electing a man living at the Falls for town clerk. The candidate selected, and one which it was thought would command most votes, was a whig, W. S. Thayer, Esq., the democrats about the Falls and west very generally gave him their support. Mr. I. B. Bowdish, one of the leading men of that party, being quite anxious to secure the office of town clerk at the Falls, and suspecting "Uncle Lem," as he was then called, of want of interest in the matter, went to him and told him that just for this time they had concluded to give up party preferences and vote for a whig, so as to have that office where it would accommodate most of the people. "Uncle Lem" quietly heard his arguments, and seemed to be convinced that they were of some weight. He sat thoughtfully for some length of time, when he beckoned to Bowdish, who at once gave him his attention. He then very deliberately and positively said, "go on and elect Thayer if you can, I won't vote against him, but I can't vote for him, for I never want it said when I come to die that Lem. Barney ever voted for a whig."

Thayer was elected, and has retained the office from that to the present day [1875]. He was one of the number from this place which volunteered to go to Plattsburgh under the command of Capt. Amasa I.

Brown, and participated in that battle Sept. 11, 1814.

LEVI SCOTT

was born about 1773, and died in Swanton, July 7, 1828, aged 55 years. He married Silence, the daughter of Rufus Barney, of Bennington, and came to Swanton soon after, in the year 1800, and was one of the company engaged in starting the forge and in the manufacture of iron. He, however, continued in that business but a few years, and then gave his attention almost exclusively to farming.

He continued to reside on the place where he first settled on the west side of the river, which remains in possession of his descendants to the present time. His farm, however, lay about a mile west of the Falls, on the road to the Lake. In order to get a road through direct to the Lake, and which would prove a great convenience in getting to his farm, he took the contract about the year 1812 from the town of cutting the road through the swamp, and making what is known as a corduroy road, which is a bridge of logs over a swamp. About the year 1823 he built a substantial house on his place at the Falls, some 20 rods west of the west end of the bridge.

He had but one son who arrived at adult age, whose name was Bradford, and to him the father left a very respectable property.

Capt. Scott, as he was called, was regarded by the community generally as a safe and reliable man. As such he was entrusted with various town offices, and was ever found faithful in the discharge of the duties those offices imposed. He was not a professedly religious man, but by his influence and example labored to promote and sustain good morals in the community. His wife survived him many years, dying Nov. 6, 1861, in her 81st year.

OLIVER POTTER

was among the early settlers on the west side of the river at the Falls, coming here in the year 1803, from Clarendon. He was born Mar. 7, 1781, and died at Swanton, Aug. 19, 1861. Soon after coming here he bought a saw-mill of Seth Warner at the west end of the dam, the date of the deed being July 26, 1804. He carried on the lumber business, giving to it his personal supervision for the most of the time until Sept. 1826, when, thinking the pine timber was about used up, and that the lumber business could not be pursued profitably much longer, he sold his mill to Dr. Jonathan Berry, and retired to his farm at Maquam, about 3 miles south of the Falls. He, however, late in life moved to another farm of his, about one mile west of the Falls, now owned by Enos Asselstyne. Mr. Potter was a man of firmness of purpose and integrity of character, and very decided in his views, especially upon political and religious subjects. In his religious views he was a Universalist, and in politics many years a democrat, but broke from them and became a free soil democrat when that party came into existence, being convinced, as he avowed, mainly by the arguments presented in the Tribune that they were right. He was rather slow of speech, but precise and positive and very fond of conversation, and would at times become so absorbed in conversation upon some favorite topic as to forget all else for the time being. Illustrative of his character in this respect, when engaged in lumbering he had several men at work cutting saw-logs some 2 miles from the Falls, to whom he promised when they left in the morning he would bring their dinner at noon. He had the dinner cooked, and started in good time with a pail on his arm well filled with provision, but unfortunately for the workmen his course lay past the store, where were sitting several of his intimate associates, who, when they saw him coming with the pail on his arm, said one to the other, now let us see how long we can keep Potter here talking. As he approached, one started a subject which he supposed would be interesting, and Potter soon became somewhat absorbed in it, yet he kept his pail on his arm, and would occasionally make an effort to break away, and would turn to start, when another of the friends would put some question or start some other topic, to which, of course, due attention must be given, when he would turn again to leave, and another friend must be informed on some other question. This went on, it is said, until about 4 o'clock, P. M., when he tore himself away and hurried on, to find his men half starved. What they said when the dinner arrived may be imagined; to give it, perhaps, would not look well in print.

Mr. Potter was married to Sophia, daughter of Abel Davis. Jan. 1, 1807, who was the mother of his 8 children: David O., John A., Augusta E., Louisa, Noel J., Maranda S., Allen P. and Matilda.

The place owned by Mr. Potter, and on which he resided for many years previous to his leaving the Falls, is now owned by the oldest son, David O., but the old house was taken down some years since and another has taken its place. Mr. Potter was skilled in surveying, and made himself useful in that line to the early settlers. He was also one to go with several others from the place to meet the foe at the memorable battle of Plattsburgh.

EZEKIEL O. GOODRICH was born in Richmond, Mass., Oct. 1, 1773, and died in Swanton, Feb. 8, 1865, in his 92d year. When but a boy, his father having died, his mother became a convert to the doctrines of the Shaking Quakers, and united with them, taking him with other of the children along with her. His father's farm also went into the establishment, and some of the principal buildings of the Shakers in Richmond, Mass., were built upon it. He remained with them for a few years, but not being satisfied either with their doctrines or practices, left them when about 18 years of age. His mother, however, with two uncles and one sister, remained in full fellowship with them during their lives.

He always thought that the Shakers became possessed of his father's farm, and much other property, by unfair, if not dishonest means. After he left them with his brother, Elizer, a little younger than himself, they took legal counsel and were advised to go and demand the property, which they proceeded to do. The Shakers however, when they made the demand, thought no doubt to teach them a lesson, and undertook to shut them up in their smoke-house. Whereupon, his brother Elizer, grasping a sled-stake knocked one of the ringleaders down. This soon brought a large company together, their uncle being among them, who quieted the disturbance, and made fair promises to the boys, accepting which they concluded to leave, with the hope of future adjustment, which hope however was never realized.

Mr. Goodrich married Lucy Cook, in Granville, N. Y., about the year 1798. In 1801 he left Granville with wife and one child for Swanton, coming by way of Whitehall, from which place they came all the way to St. Albans bay, by a batteau. On arriving there, he secured the services of Mr. Hayward, living near by, with an ox-team and cart, upon which the baggage and furniture was loaded, and in this way they moved to a log-house which he had previously caused to be built on the middle road, a short distance north of St. Albans line. Not being satisfied with his location, he sold his place in 1804, and bought a lot of several acres at the Falls, on the west side of the river some 30 rods above the dam, being the same place now owned and occupied by Mr. David Lawrence. The place at that time was but partially cleared. He built a small frame-house, which when nearly completed took fire from shavings left on the floor, kindled by their small boy who had been left alone in the house. Lumber was easily obtained, and another house was soon put up and ready for occupancy, and the family moved into it in 1804. This house stood nearly where Mr. Lawrence's barn now stands, near the present railroad track. In after years, about 1824, he erected the two-story dwelling, now occupied by Mr. Lawrence.

His wife, an invalid for years, died Apr. 28, 1835, aged 55. He afterwards married Mrs. Anna Lasell, widow of Dr. Lasell, which did not prove a happy union, but led to divorce about 1840.

Mr. Goodrich was a carpenter and joiner, and assisted by his brother, Valentine, put up the large hotel building on the site of the present dwelling-house of Lorenzo Lasell, which was kept for years as a public house; also the large building which stood on or near the site of the dwelling-house of Mrs. C. H. Bullard, which was kept by Mr. Turrill as a hotel, and destroyed by fire. He also assisted, in 1806, in doing the wood work on the old brick store.

He was elected to the office of 2d constable for 1810 and '11, and to the office of 1st constable and collector in 1816 and '17, and again in 1819 to '29. About 1812, he started the business of making cut nails. We find in nearly or quite all the old buildings that have been taken down, which were erected previous to this time, that wrought nails were used in the construction. From old blacksmiths' books we find the cost was from 17 to 20 cents per pound. The nails he made were cut by a machine worked by hand, the nail plate being heated red-hot to make the cutting easy. The nails were all taken up singly and placed in a machine for the purpose, and headed by hand. These nails were sold by count, at a certain price per 100 nails. He used to say that the name of 4-penny, 6-penny, etc., was given when nails were sold by the hundred, the smaller size being 4d per 100, the next larger 6d, and so on; the cost of the nails finally came to indicate its size, and the cost of the different sizes became the name.

He was fond of society, a good story teller, and would often draw a crowd around him to listen to his anecdotes and humorous sayings. To those complaining of life's burdens and trials he would occasionally tell the following: "When he was a boy his father kept tavern in Richmond, Mass., in the vicinity of the Stockbridge Indians, many of whom were addicted to strong drink. Among them was a squaw named Sal, who was very fond of cider, and would hang around the bar-room often for a long time to get an occasional drink of her favorite beverage, which was generally given her by those that were fond of hearing her talk when she became a little 'boozy.' One question they would often put to her was, 'Well, Sal, this is a troublesome world; I suppose you find it so?' Her invariable answer was, 'Yes, yes, a troublesome world! A troublesome world! But there's a great deal of good cider in it.'" Moral: People are too much inclined to dwell upon life's evils without appreciating its enjoyments.

He was the father of Collins W., Franklin V., James R., Eunice D., Lucy L., Mary A.; all of whom are living, (Jan., 1875) except Eunice D., who died Aug. 5, 1865. About 1816, he with his wife became members of the M. E. church, they being two of the five persons who constituted the first class at its organization at Swanton Falls, in which he remained a faithful member until death. He was an excellent singer, and assisted much in the singing of sacred songs in social meetings up to an advanced age. For the last 20 years of his life, he was a member of the family of the writer, dying at the age of 92.

ELISHA ROOD,

was born in Bennington, March 1, 1767; leaving Bennington he came to St. Albans where he resided a few years, and came to Swanton in 1800, and settled on what is known as the Rood place, on the westerly bank of the river about 2 miles below the Falls, on land which before the Revolution was claimed and occupied by Indians. July 19, 1801, he married Mrs. Polly Roswell, who died about 1830, and he was again married, in 1832, to Miss Betsey Higgins of Newfane, a lady of good ability. He passed his remaining days in great peace and tranquility. At a very early day, he became a member of the M. E. church, (some time previous to its organization at the Falls) and ever led a consistent Christian life, and enjoyed the confidence of all that knew him, so that those that had no regard for religion would often say, if anybody was a Christian, Uncle Elisha Rood was one. He was one of the youngest of a large family. Two elder brothers were engaged in the battle of Bennington, and were both killed. Being then 10 years of age, the battle made a deep impression upon his mind, and he retained through life a lively recollection of it. He departed this life Nov. 26, 1847. Mrs. Rood and an only son are still living (1874). She lives on the homestead farm, and he on the farm adjoining, carrying on both, and caring for his mother, now over 80 years of age.

CAPT. JOHN PRATT, 1ST.,

born in Hardwick, Mass., died in Swanton, Oct. 11, 1814, age 66 years. At an early day he went to Chesterfield, N. H., and was among the first settlers of that town. He came to Swanton in 1793 or 4, with his wife and 6 children. His son, John, was at that time 8 years of age. There were also 4 older sisters of John 2d, and a younger brother, Ira Allen Pratt, who was about 5 months old at the time of their arrival. Capt. Pratt having come to this neighborhood to look at the lands, met Ira Allen. Being much pleased with Mr. Allen, he told him he should name a son after him. Upon this Mr. Allen told him if he would settle in Swanton, he would give him the best 100 acres he could pick out. This, however, was never fulfilled, as Mr. Allen was sometime after involved, which rendered it impossible, or at least inconvenient, to carry out his promise. Capt. Pratt at first settled on the place where Charles Bullard (1874) now resides, and continued there 7 or 8 years, and then removed to the place where Mr. Cushman now resides, (1874) where he died. His eldest daughter was the mother of Eleazer Jewett, Esq.

JOHN PRATT, 2D.,

son of the foregoing, was born about 1785, and died in 1869. He came to this town in 1793, when about 8 years of age, and resided here until his death, and to him we are indebted for many facts concerning the early history of the town gathered previous to his death. In early life, he delighted in the hard rough labor of lumbering, and was an adept for getting whole pine trees for masts and spars from the forests, where they grew to the river where they could be floated to their destination. After the pine forests had been swept off, he made farming his business mostly, until the infirmities of age coming on, he gave up his farm to his children, and went to live with his son, Hiram C., and continued to reside there until the close of his life. He was for many years an esteemed member of the Congregational church in town.

JOHN B. JOYAL,

Jean Baptiste Joyal, the super-centenarian, commonly known as John Bettis, was born at St. Francis, L. C., (now P. Q.) On marrying, he went to Bellisle, and was there on the breaking out of the Revolutionary war. When Col. Arnold, after passing through the wilderness of Maine, up the Kennebec, across and down the Chaudiere river, arrived in Canada, in the autumn of 1775, Mr. Joyal joined the Continental army. Having gone on to Quebec, he was taken prisoner on the memorable 31st of December, when Montgomery fell in his attempt to scale the citadel. His farm was afterward confiscated by the English Government, while he himself was at length sent to St. Johns, and thence to Isle aux Noix, where he remained a prisoner until about the close of 1777, (vide N. American 2 vol., p. 36.) during the latter part of the time he was allowed some liberty, being permitted to walk about with a cannon-ball chained to his ankle.

At length he took an oath not to fight against the British Government, and was released in 1778 on parole. The next 2 years he passed in boating between Chambly and Isle aux Noix. He left in 1780, and went to Hudson, where he resided the 3 ensuing years. Thence he went to New York, making that his home until 1786, when he returned to Hudson. About the year 1788 or 9, he removed with his family to Hungerford, (now Sheldon,) where he remained some 2 years, and cleared up a piece of land near the present railroad. He then came to Swanton Falls. After he had been here a year or so, his youngest son, Joseph Benjamin Joyal, was born Mar. 6, 1792. From him and from papers of his father's in his possession, the most of these particulars have been gleaned. In 1794 or 5, Mr. Joyal purchased a farm on the east side of the river, about a mile southerly from the Falls, at the place known in early days as the John's Bridge place. The farm is now, (1874,) owned by Hotia Farrar. On this farm he continued to reside many years. He kept a ferry until the building of the bridge at that place. He was married 3 times; his first wife died at the age of 82 years. When he married his last wife he was about 100 years of age. He drew a pension from the government from June 12, 1834, until his death, which took place December, 1848, being 113 years of age. The length of his life has commonly been estimated at 108 years. His son, however, believes, and an examination of his papers indicates, that he must have been 113 years old at the time of his death.

JAMES PLATT,

born in Clarendon, died in Swanton, Apr. 20, 1873. He came to this place in 1815, and engaged in wool-carding and cloth dressing. [See paper on manufactures.] He was married to Elizabeth Root, daughter of Benj. Root of Rutland, a woman of very amiable disposition, who died May 14, 1823. He afterward married Miss Louisa Conant, about 1824, who is now living. He was the father of 5 children, two by the first wife, Alanson and Louisa, and three by the second: Hiram, Daniel and George. Alanson married the daughter of the Hon. Geo. W. Foster, and is living near Highgate Springs. Louisa married Adrian D. Story, Esq., who carried on the cloth-dressing business in this place many years, after which he went to Alburgh, about 1853, and engaged in mercantile business, and died Dec. 28, 1869, aged 58 years; wife yet living in Alburgh. Hiram married Abigail, daughter of Nelson Bullard, Esq., and is now residing in this place. Daniel and George are in Wisconsin or Iowa.

In early days, when farmers' wives and daughters spun the wool and wove the cloth for themselves and their fathers and brothers, and usually an overplus to sell, Mr. Platt had an extensive circle of customers, not only from this and adjoining towns, but from the islands and Alburgh. When machinery became so far improved for manufacturing cloth that people could buy their cloth cheaper than they could make it, Mr. Platt engaged in that branch of business, and prosecuted it successfully for many years.

Mr. Platt was a man of good business ability, and was regarded honorable in his dealings. In the prime of life, he was honored with many offices of trust and responsibility, being elected to represent the town in the Legislature in 1826 and again in 1830. He was a free mason, and strongly attached to that fraternity, and was buried according to the rites of the order.

SAMUEL BULLARD,

born in Barre, Mass., Nov. 9, 1776, died in Swanton, Aug. 3, 1825. He came to this town about 1800, and at first settled on the farm where Harlan P. Bullard now resides. He afterwards purchased the farm now owned by his grandson Samuel, and built the large stone house there about the year 1819, and kept a tavern there from 1820 until his death, after which his widow and eldest son, Charles, came into possession of the homestead, and continued to keep public house until about 1832, some time after which his son Samuel took the place, and continues to reside there.

But a short time previous to his death Mr. Bullard built the canal boat called the "Royal Oak," on the Island below the Falls, at a place known as "Willow Point." He married a sister of Levi Scott, who was a woman of much decision of character, and had the reputation of being an excellent landlady.

His son Charles, who for many years occupied the homestead, was born Oct. 18, 1801, and died Jan. 14, 1875. The second son, Nelson, was for more than 40 years a resident at the Falls. He died Mar. 19, 1882. Notice of his death appeared in the Swanton Courier of that week, from which we extract:

In the death of Nelson Bullard, which occurred last Saturday evening, another landmark is lost to our town. The deceased was about the street the day before he died, though suffering with a cold that seemed to settle upon his lungs. Saturday he rapidly grew worse, and died about 10 o'clock in the evening. Mr. Bullard was born in this town May 10, 1804—age 78. He always resided here, and was identified with the growth and prosperity of Swanton. For nearly 30 years he kept a hotel where the house of W. H. Blake, 2d, now stands. Mrs. Bullard died 7 years since, and a little over a year ago a son, Merton, was suddenly taken away. Four children are living, E. N. and Charles Bullard and Mrs. Hiram Platt residing here, and Mrs. Sanford Jennison, of Wentworth, Iowa. The deceased was of genial temperament, kind and generous. His pleasant face and kindly salutation will be greatly missed. The funeral was largely attended from the house, Rev. Mr. Swett officiating, performing the impressive service of the Episcopal church.

Harry, the youngest of the brothers, died many years since.

MERTON H. BULLARD, son of Nelson Bullard, born in Swanton, May 11, 1830, died Nov. 16, 1880, suddenly, of apoplexy. From the Courier:

He ate a hearty dinner; went about the streets as usual: a little after 3 o'clock went up to his father's, to assist him in some work; suddenly taken with a terrible pain in the head, went into the house and told his father to go for the doctor. These were the last words he spoke, he remaining unconscious from then up to the time of death. He left a wife and one daughter, Fannie.

AMHERST THAYER

was born about 1773, and came to Swanton in 1800, or early in 1801, and engaged in blacksmithing soon after, and continued it during his life time. His shop stood a few rods west of the school-house, on the west side of the river, and his dwelling-house near by, a few rods further west. He was twice married. By his first wife he had one daughter, Millicent, who became the wife of Simon Kellogg. By his second marriage he had 4 children; Amherst, now in Michigan, Wheelock S., who has for many years been our town clerk, Andrew M., living here, a farmer, Lucy, living in the place.

Mr. Thayer had the reputation of being a man square in his dealings, prudent and saving. He owned a farm about half a mile west of the Falls, which is inherited by his children. He died July 27, 1837, aged 64 years.

HEMAN HOPKINS

came to this place from White Creek, N. Y., in the early part of 1801, and put up a small frame-house on or near the site of the residence of E. H. Richardson, on west side of the river. He soon after, about 1802 or 3, put up a shop for dressing cloth and a fulling mill a few rods above the west end of the bridge. A few years after this, he enlarged the business, adding wool-carding, etc., and carried it on for several years. He after this, became connected with Leonard Robinson in the business. He also engaged in mercantile business for a few years. He in early days, about 1808, became captain of the militia, and was known as Capt. Hopkins ever after.

He was an intelligent, fair minded man, and was honored with many offices of responsibility. About the year 1816 he made a public profession of religion, and united with the M. E. church soon after its organization at the Falls, together with his wife and two eldest daughters, who all, it is believed, remained devoted and consistent members while they lived. His children were: Rhoda, who died about 1818, Eliza, who married Mr. Cornell, and after his death, Dr. Jonathan Berry, and went to Illinois about 1828 or '9, Heman K., who died at Glens Falls, Socrates, who went to California about 1862, died there, Charles, who also went to California and died there about 1870. Angelia, who married Mr. Hardy of Joliet, Ill., and is living there (1875), Almira P., who became the 2d wife of Gov. P. T. Washburn, Hassan A., is at present residing in Hyde Park, Ill., near Chicago. Having been seriously injured by a railroad accident some years since, Capt. Hopkins left here and moved to Glens Falls about 1842, where he sustained an honorable social position until his death, in the fall of 1855.

GEORGE GREEN

was the son of Wm. Green, who settled in the east part of the town in 1790, being among the first to locate there. The subject, George, was born about 1791, the first male child born in town of civilized parents, so far as known. In the year 1811 he married Miss Polly Bloys, who is still living, being now about 85 years of age. They lived together more than 60 years, and raised a large family of children. They both became members of the Baptist church in the east part of the town at an early day. He remained an honored and influential member while he lived.

Judge Green, as he was familiarly called, had the confidence of his fellow-townsmen, and was honored with many offices of trust and responsibility. He represented the town in the Legislature in 1832 and '3; was councillor, 1834 and '5; senator, 1843 and '44; and again in 1851. He was also elected County Judge, in all 8 years. Few men have been more faithful to the trusts reposed in them. He died May 5, 1871.

DANIEL BULLARD,

born in Barre, Mass., married Acsah Hammond about 1800, and soon after came to reside in this town, having purchased a place on the west road, about 3 miles south of the Falls. He engaged in the manufacture of cabinet ware about 15 years, when he added the making of wagons and sleighs, and soon acquired a reputation for thorough and honest workmanship. He became the father of three sons, Daniel, Jr., George, Charles H.; and two daughters, Lucy, who became the wife of Dwight Dorman; Caroline, who became the wife of Wm. Robinson. The sons are dead, but the daughters still live.

He became a member of the Congregational church at an early day, and was a worthy and esteemed member until his death, which occurred about 1872, probably the oldest person in town at that time.

C. H. BULLARD,

son of Daniel, born in Swanton, having married Polly, daughter of John Pratt, they went to reside in the brick house built by his father on the west road, where they lived many years to care for and comfort his aged parents. For many years he continued the business of carriage and sleigh-making, commenced by his father at the stand occupying the site of the old Levi

Hathaway tavern, being the first on that road. About the year 1868 or '9 he built an elegant house at the Falls, near the place where the Turrill hotel stood before being burned, and moved his family into the same in 1870. He lived to enjoy his new residence, however, but a short time, dying Aug. 1, 1871. He was a devoted member of the Congregational church, and rendered efficient aid in repairing and remodeling their house of worship at the Falls, and ever contributed liberally to sustain the Gospel.

JAREB JACKSON

came with his family about 1797, from Chesterfield, N. H., and settled in the easterly part of the town and engaged in farming. In the grand list of 1800 there is set to him 5 acres of land under cultivation. He seems to have been a man who at once secured the confidence of his fellow-townsmen, as he was elected to the office of town clerk in March, 1798, which office he retained for many years; also held many other town offices; was town representative.

His 6 children were: 3 born in Chesterfield and 3 in Swanton, Rufus W., Jan. 19, 1793; Lydia, Nov. 3, 1794; Paul E., July 5, 1796; Polly, July 23, 1803; Eleazer P., Apr. 6, 1807; Fanny P., Aug. 29, 1809.

Polly married Robert Dean, Dec. 25, 1823; now (1875) the only living child of the family; resides at East Fairfield.

His wife Polly died in Swanton, Nov. 25, 1826, aged 56 years. He was a man much respected, and bore a prominent part in town affairs during the first years of the present century. He died May 29, 1833, aged 67 years.

CLARK HUBBARD,

born in Holden, Mass., May 10, 1765, came to Swanton about 1797; returning the same year, he married in 1798 Miss Arethusa Atherton, of Chesterfield, N. H., born in that town Jan. 5, 1778. They settled at Swanton Centre the same year, and kept a public house for several years. There children were: Clark Jr., b. Feb. 27, 1799; Betsey, b. Jan. 28, 1801, who became the wife of N. E. Jennison, Sarah, b. Jan. 24, 1803, who became the wife of H. B. Farrar, Esq., and the mother of the Rev. H. C. Farrar, a popular M. E. clergyman; she was a devoted member of the Congregational church and an exceedingly amiable woman; Harriet, b. April 7, 1805. Mrs. Hubbard dying May 20, 1806, Mr. Hubbard married a 2d wife; their children were: Lucy, b. Dec. 20, 1809; Curtis, b. March 2, 1812; Clark, b. July 5, 1818; George F., b. Aug. 17, 1820. The 2d wife of Capt. Hubbard died Oct. 19, 1820, aged 41 years.

Capt. Hubbard had the respect of the community generally, and was often made an office bearer in town affairs. By a paper which has been handed us by a son of his, we discover that he issued a warning as captain to Levi Scott as corporal, Aug. 17, 1807, to warn Samuel W. Keyes, Elijah Rood, Samuel R. Bascom, Simeon Hathway and others to appear on parade opposite the Court house, in St. Albans, Tuesday, August 25, at 9 o'clock in the morning, complete in arms as the law directs, etc.

He was also a man of considerable public spirit and donated the land on which the first meeting-house was built in town, it being at the Center, and built about 1816; known for years as the yellow meeting-house. Capt. Hubbard died Apr. 27, 1826.

THE JENNISON FAMILY.

All the Jennisons in this country are descendants of Robert Jennison, who came from England, and settled in Watertown, Mass., in 1636. Silas H. Jennison, former governor of Vermont, was of this family.

ISRAEL JENNISON, a descendant of Robert, was born about 1713, and married Oct. 10, 1738; their children: Mary, born Aug. 5, 1739; Sarah, b. April 13, 1742; Abigail, b. July 30, 1744; Samuel, b. Dec. 24, 1745; John, b. July 30, 1747; Faith, b. Aug. 20, 1751; Relief, b. Nov. 7, 1754; William, b. April 12, 1758; Betsey, b. Jan. 22, 1764.

WILLIAM JENNISON, youngest son of Israel, was married to Sarah Sumner, Oct. 31, 1788, aged 25, daughter of Rev. Joseph Sumner of Shrewsbury, Mass. They came to Swanton in September, 1803, and settled in the east part of the town near where the Baptist church now stands, and resided there the remainder of their days, he dying July 19, 1819, and Mrs. Jennison Feb. 1, 1832. Their children were:

Elizabeth, b. July 24, 1789, who married Paul Robinson.

Joseph S., b. March 15, 1791, married Theda Barber March 8, 1819.

Nahum E., b. April 25, 1793.

Charles H., b. March 2, 1796, married March 13, 1826, Widow Olive (Wait) Herrick.

William D., b. Sept. 10, 1793, married Mary Vallentine of Hopkinton, Mass., Dec. 15, 1823.

Israel S., b. May 24, 1801, married Phebe Clark, Jan. 1, 1832.

Sarah S., b. June 6, 1803, married Stephen P. Hollenbeck.

Samuel W., b. Aug. 2, 1807, died July 29, 1827.

Erastus G., b. March 1, 1810, married Mary Ann Hollenbeck Oct. 14, 1841.

NAHUM E. JENNISON, (second son of William) Jan. 5, 1824, married Betsey Hubbard, born Jan. 28, 1801, who died May 18, 1851, aged 50 years. Their children were:

William Hubbard, b. Dec. 24, 1824, married Oct. 7, 1856, Sarah J. Walker.

Arathusa Atherton, b. March 31, 1827, married George C. Mason.

Clark Sumner, b. Oct. 21, 1828, married Frances Louisa Farrar, who died Dec. 26, 1858, and he afterward married Sarah, daughter of Rev. E. H. Dorman.

Albert Godfrey, b. May 17, 1830, married Harriet L. Wood, Jan. 1, 1855.

Sanford, b. June 1, 1833, who May 22, 1859, married Mariette Bullard, daughter of Nelson Bullard, Esq.

Morton, b. Oct. 10, 1835, died June 16, 1854.

Harriet Elizabeth, b. Aug. 10, 1839, married Harlan P. Bullard, Jan. 21, 1862.

George Henry, b. April 10, 1842.

George H., b. Nov. 7, 1837, died April 11, 1838.

Mr. N. E. Jennison resided on the middle road near the Center. He was highly esteemed as a man of probity. Town offices were often conferred upon him. Feeling a warm interest for the success of the Congregational church, of which he was a highly respected member, he became active and efficient in the building of their meeting-house at the Centre about 1844 or '5. He was genial in his manner, and the writer once heard his pastor, Rev. Mr. Dorman, say that Mr. Jennison possessed just the qualities to circulate a subscription paper successfully, as he invariably produced and left a good impression. He died greatly lamented Aug. 8, 1849.

HON. JOSEPH BLAKE,

born in 1806, died in Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 16, 1873. About 1829 he engaged in the mercantile business at Malone, N. Y.; was married to Minerva Green, a sister of the Hon. Geo. Green, Nov. 11, 1830; came to Swanton Falls, and became the business partner of his brother-in-law, Mr. Gardner Green, about 1837; did an extensive business in the sale of goods and manufacturing lumber several years. After his dissolution with Mr. Green he became a partner with his brother, William, about 1842, under the firm name of J. & W. H. Blake, who continued to do a large goods business until 1852, when Mr. J. Blake having been chosen president of the Union bank in 1851, the partnership was dissolved; was president of the bank until 1866, when he resigned, the Hon. Wm. L. Sowles succeeding him.

During the time he was president, the bank was managed with much prudence and in a manner to give satisfaction to the stockholders. He had the reputation of being a safe, sagacious business man, and enjoyed the confidence of the community generally, which was testified to by his being chosen to fill important town offices for many successive years. He was town representative in 1838, and a member of the constitutional convention in 1843.

At the time of his death he was and had been a member of the Congregational church for many years. In his religious character he was not demonstrative, rather unassuming, but this may be said of his general character. In religious, temperance, political and business circles, he was a man who exerted a marked influence.

His children are Wm. H., 2d, a hardware merchant at Swanton; George G., farmer, was captain in 13th regiment in the late war; Albert H. engaged in literary pursuits in Denver, Col.; Bradley B., merchant at Swanton; Martha, 2d wife of Col. E. L. Barney; Alice, wife of E. M. Sowles, late cashier of our bank.

BRADFORD SCOTT, son of Levi, born in Swanton about 1805, died in Swanton, Feb. 19, 1870, all his days a resident of this town, living in the house built by his father in 1823. He married Suffronia, daughter of Elijah Jackson, about 1824. She was sister to Mrs. Benj. Mcigs, and Mrs. Harrison Stevens of Montreal. They had several children, all living except the oldest, Thomas, who died West about 1860. The 2d son, Romeo H., has been many years station agent at the Falls, a part of the time in connection with his father. Bradford Scott was in early manhood chosen constable for the town, and held the office many years. He was also chosen a representative to the Legislature in 1835 and '6, and held other town offices. He was a man of decided views, outspoken in his preferences as to men and measures, a positive democrat, and for many years was the acknowledged leader of that party in town.

On the completion of the Vermont and Canada R. R., he became station agent here, and from this time was not as active in public and political life as formerly, but gave his time and attention mostly to the interests of the road, and ever retained the confidence of its managers in the position of station agent until a short time before his death.

RUFUS BARNEY,

son of Lemuel and grandson of Capt. Rufus of Bennington, and 2d cousin of Rufus L. Barney, was born in Swanton about 1807, or '8. He pursued in early life the business of manufacturing iron, and while thus engaged in Connecticut, he married there. After which he remained there a few years, when he returned to Swanton and purchased a farm some 2 miles below the Falls, on the west bank of the river, where he resided until his death, Nov. 23, 1869. He reared a family of several sons and daughters, all of whom are living. (1875). He was a man noted for peaceable and quiet demeanor and sterling integrity.

HORATIO W. BARNEY,

second son of Elisha Barney, born in Swanton April 30, 1802, died in Swanton July 19, 1872, aged 70 years. He in his early life manifested a proclivity for mechanical pursuits and frequently while other boys were amusing themselves in their accustomed sports, he would go into the shop where his father carried on the blacksmith business and forge out some instrument. He served no time in learning any particular trade, but could work at several, and whatever he undertook to do he performed in a workmanlike manner, giving the lie to the old adage, "Jack at all trades and master of none." He was, indeed, a "natural mechanic," and it is worthy of note that he built an excellent saw-mill, taking the material from a state of nature both of the iron and wood. That is, for the frame-work and all the wood gearing he took the timber from the stump, and for the iron work, took the ore from the swamp, known as "bog ore," making the charcoal from wood with which to make the iron. After making the iron, he forged it into the various articles required for a saw-mill, together with the wood gearing, putting the whole together in a superior manner for the times in which it was built (1834.) By many this is supposed to be a feat which can be performed by few, if any persons, in the State, or even in the United States.

He was married to Betsey Foster, Feb. 20, 1829. Their children were 4 boys, two of whom, Goodsill and Edgar, died in early life. James A. resides with his mother at the homestead, and was chosen in 1874 as town Representative. The other son, Miles R., is an able minister of the M. E. church.

Mr. Barney was intelligent, temperate, industrious and economical, and withal blameless in his moral department and had the confidence of the community, was chosen town Representative in 1847, and was honored with other town offices.

From 1822, when he commenced business, to 1836, he was co-partner with his older brother, Rufus L., in the iron and lumber business, together with farming. He acquired a very respectable property which was left to the widow and the two surviving sons. Mrs. Barney died Feb. 1, 1875.

RUFUS L. BARNEY,

eldest son of Elisha Barney, was born in Taunton, Mass., Dec. 15, 1796, and died in Swanton, Feb. 26, 1874, in his 78th year. He came to this town with his parents in March, 1800, and has resided here ever since. His continuous residence in town at the time of his death was longer probably than any other person at that time living.

Early in life he acquired habits of industry and economy which he ever afterward practiced, and which laid the foundation of the competency he afterward possessed. Among his papers we find the following, which it would be well for the young men of the present day to consider: "I worked as hard for my parents until the age of 21 as any boy ever did, and don't remember of ever having 25 cents for spending money up to that time."

On attaining his majority he engaged in the lumber business for a few years. In 1822 he and his brother Horatio bought the homestead farm lying north of the forge, and became partners in business, under the firm name of R. L. & H. W. Barney, carrying on farming and lumbering. Having purchased the forge of their brother-in-law, Robert Foster, in March, 1824, they commenced the iron business, which they carried on with considerable energy and not without profit for many years. In the year 1834 they built the stone-dam and saw-mill on the Island side of the forge privilege. After a partnership of some 14 years a dissolution took place in 1836, the saw-mill and homestead farm in the division coming into possession of Rufus L. The saw-mill he gave to two of his nephews, V. G. and R. Lester Barney, about 1868. The homestead farm he retained while he lived. He was fond of farming and kept his farm in fine condition, and it may with much propriety be said he was a model farmer. He was a man of much force of character and strong will; while he scrupulously rendered to every man his due, he exacted the same in turn. He enjoyed the confidence of his fellow-townsmen and held many town offices.

About 1825 he married Hannah S. Ring, by whom he had two daughters, one dying in childhood. The other married Major L. D. Clark, and is now living in Vineland, N. J. The union, however, proved to be an unhappy one, which finally led to separation and divorce.

Rufus L. Barney's temperance habits and principles were strong and decided, and he was ever ready with his money and influence to aid the cause. The poor whom he considered deserving ever had his sympathy and assistance. In all business matters he wished to have everything clearly understood, and then that the parties live up to their agreement. As to litigation he abhorred it, and though doing considerable business for many years, it is not known that he ever had a disputable lawsuit.

Some time previous to his death, being admonished by advancing years and failing health that he held life by a very precarious tenure, he had all his business matters arranged, so far as it could be done, so that his friends might have the least trouble possible in closing his affairs after his decease. The disposal of his property he thought best to keep a profound secret, even from his nearest friends, no one knowing the purport of his will, except the one who wrote it, until it was opened after his death. His will when opened revealed the fact that he had willed the town of Swanton $20,000, and to the "Home of the Friendless" at Burlington, $500. He had not long before his death paid off a debt for the Methodist church in this place, which was held against the parsonage, of over $600. The balance of his property was left to his near relatives.

The structure of his mind was such that he could not accept as true many minor matters of Christian belief, on evidence which to others might be deemed conclusive. He would, therefore, often put the question, "How do you know?" to those who advanced some opinion or dogma that he could not readily accept. But though inclined to question many of the religious tenets held by the churches at the present day, he ever had a profound respect for the Bible and professed to believe its truths.

His belief in the Bible led him to practice its teaching, and in particular with respect to usury, which he considered unlawful interest, and although for many years he loaned money in considerably large sums, he would never receive more than 6 per cent. per annum, frequently giving as a reason (aside from the Bible teaching) that as a general rule no one could afford to pay a larger amount for the use of money.

GEORGE BULLARD,

son of Daniel and Acsah Bullard, born June 2, 1806, and died July 16, 1874. He was married to Mary Ann Skeels June 6, 1832, whose death occurred Sept. 4, 1845. The children were: Gardner W., born May 13, 1833; Harlan P., b. June 10, 1837; Lucy, Sept. 24, 1842, died Jan. 14, 1843.

For his second wife he married Susan A. Cook, Jan. 18, 1846; children: Acsah, b. Nov. 28, 1846; Elsie, b. Jan. 1, 1852, died Jan. 18, 1853.

Mr. Bullard in early life engaged in the business of making wagons and sleighs, which was continued several years, after which he gave his attention almost exclusively to farming. His son Harlan now occupies the homestead. Mr. B. was for many years town clerk, and was representative in the legislature in 1849.

HON. WM. L. SOWLES

departed this life May 28, 1878. From a brief sketch of his life that appeared in the Swanton Courier a few days after the funeral:

We regret to announce the death of Wm. L. Sowles, an old and prominent citizen of this town, which occurred last Tuesday, after an illness of 10 days. Though in his 78th year, he had been about the streets as usual until within a few days of his death. He had been gradually failing for some time past. The funeral was held at the house Thursday, at ten o'clock, Rev. Mr. Hyde and Rev. Mr. Spencer of St. Albans conducting the exercises. The arrangements for the funeral were admirably carried out by Judge Blake. The three sons, Merritt, Edward, and Albert Sowles, Dr. Leach, G. W. Beebe and C. H. Reynolds acted as pall-bearers. Wm. L. Sowles was born in Alburgh, in 1800; was the son of Lewis Sowles, one of the sturdy pioneers of that town, and one of a family of 14 children. For many years, he was engaged in an active business life in Alburgh, both as tradesman and farmer.

In 1828 and 9, he represented Alburgh in the Legislature, and in 1841 & 2, Grand Isle county in the State senate. In 1849, he was a delegate to the constitutional convention, and again in 1856. In 1850 and '51, he was judge of the county court.

For the past 24 years, the Judge has been a resident of this town, moving here in 1854. Until he became president of the Union Bank, he was engaged in farming pursuits, and tilled many a broad acre on the large estates near the Lake. In 1856, he went to the Philadelphia convention as a delegate; in 1864, he was chosen president of the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Montpelier, and acceptably filled that office for 10 consecutive years. While living in Alburgh, he was confirmed in the Episcopal church at Clarenceville, P. Q. He afterward united with the Methodist church, of which he was a member at the time of his death. He was a large, strong man, of excellent business ability, and amassed a large property. One only of the family of fourteen remains, Mrs. Jane Weeks of St. Albans. The Judge left 3 sons and 2 daughters. His was a successful and well-spent life, and he died both respected and honored.

HON. VALENTINE S. FERRIS.

[From the Swanton Courier.]

The people of our community are in sorrow; from among them, one who for long years has had their respect and esteem and has been associated with them in the various relations of life, has been removed by death. The Hon. V. S. Ferris departed this life Sunday morning, Dec. 21, 1879, in his 71st year. He was born in this village and this has ever been his home. In his school days, he was noted among his associates for his kindly disposition. For his first wife, he married Cornelia, daughter of Judge Wm. Brayton, who died in 1855. He afterward married Mrs. Emma Everest Gates, widow of Dr. Horatio Gates, who died February, 1878. In company with his two brothers in early life, he engaged in business and took measures to develop the water-power at this place. They were then the owners of nearly all the water-power on the easterly side of the river. They erected the large brick grist-mill in 1833, and also large marble and lumber mills, and for a time were engaged quite extensively in the marble business. They finally disposed of their interest in mills and water-power and engaged in other pursuits. The Judge, as he is familiarly called, from this time gave his attention largely to the management of real estate in which he was interested. It is thought his name occurs more times as the conveyer of real estate, on the records of the town, than that of any other man. From his early manhood he took a lively interest in all matters connected with the general welfare, especially in town matters, and he has been honored with nearly every office in the gift of the town as well as other important offices of honor and trust, and has ever faithfully and acceptably discharged the duties of the same. For many years Judge Ferris was an acceptable and consistent member of the Protestant Episcopal church. This was the church of his choice, yet he was exceedingly liberal and tolerant toward other denominations, and often united with them in their religious worship, with apparently as much freedom and comfort as when with his own. For some weeks before his departure he seemed conscious of the decay of his vital powers, and at one time remarked to the writer, that in view of his approaching end, he had arranged his worldly affairs so that they were in as good condition for him to leave as they could be, and as to his spiritual interest he was perfectly resigned to the Divine will, and much more to the same effect. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace."—Ps. xxxvii: 37. G. B.

The funeral of Judge Ferris was quite largely attended at the deceased's late residence, Rev. Mr. Bliss of Burlington officiating. Among the guests from out of town were J. Gregory Smith and wife of St. Albans, they coming out by special train for that purpose.

JOHN BARNEY, ESQ.

(From the Swanton Courier.)

With the death of John Barney, one of Swanton's old citizen landmarks has passed away. His death took place Saturday evening, Oct. 9, 1879, at 9 o'clock, of paralysis, after a week's confinement to his bed. Mr. Barney was born in Bennington, Mar. 18, 1804. His father was Lemuel Barney and his mother's maiden name was Anna Henmon. The deceased was one of a family of 10 children, 4 girls and 6 boys, the former, Mrs. Gray of Burlington, Mrs. Bliss of Keeseville, and Mrs. Cole and Mrs. Nokes of Swanton, are still living. Of the boys only Friend and Lemuel are living. Lemuel Barney moved to Swanton early in the present century. What little education the deceased had was acquired here in the old district school, where the red school-house now stands, on the west side of the river. He never learned a trade, but Uncle Harry Aseltine tells us Mr. Barney worked for a time in a blacksmith shop with him. May 10, 1826, Mr. Barney married Esther Hathaway, who survives him, they having lived together 53 years. The fruit of the marriage was 5 children, only 3 of whom are living, Byron, John, and Mrs. Goeslin. With the exception of a few years in trade in a store at the west end of the bridge, Mr. Barney devoted his life to farming, in which he was quite successful in all his business transactions, being prudent, careful and of good judgment. Probably there are few men in the State that have been more honored by town offices than Mr. Barney. Almost continuously for over 40 years he has held some office. In 1838 he was elected constable, an office which he held for 7 consecutive years. In the years of '41, '42 and '43 he represented the town at the State Capital. In 1847 he was elected town treasurer, and held that office eleven years; in 1849 and '50 was high bailiff of Franklin county; at various periods since 1859 was selectman, and served 12 years as deputy sheriff. The fact that the deceased acted as a public servant for so many years gives evidence that he was a faithful officer and enjoyed the fullest confidence of the people. He was a Republican and notably partisan in his views. Among the many efficient town officers Swanton has been fortunate in possessing, probably not one of them took a greater interest in the affairs of the town, and its interests were identical with his own and looked after fully as close. If he had a fault as a public officer it was his rigid economy, which some perhaps considered too severe sometimes for the best good of the town. Of one thing the citizens of Swanton were assured of when John Barney had his say, that not a penny should go out of the treasury except what was actually necessary to properly run affairs. Not a bad quality after all in a public officer. He has had great influence in local politics, was a good and safe counsellor, and often has been turned to by other towns for advice. For many years he has been familiarly known as "Uncle Jack," a title he seemed to enjoy.

The funeral was very largely attended at the deceased's late residence, Monday afternoon, Rev. J. H. Babbitt preaching the funeral sermon. . . .

ELI H. RICHARDSON

died at his residence Mar. 20, 1882, aged 51 years. He was born in the town of Fairfax, but came to this town about 25 years ago. In 1862, he enlisted in one of the 9 months' regiments, and remained in the service during that period. After his return, he commenced the manufacture and sale of furniture in this village, and continued in that business for some 15 years, when that fatal disease, consumption, marked him as its victim. He leaves a wife and an adopted daughter. Mr. Richardson was a devoted member of the

COLONEL BARNEY.

WRITTEN BY THE REV. J. B. PERRY.

Col. Elisha L. Barney died at Fredericksburgh, Va., May 10, 1864, aged 32 years. The deceased was the eldest son of Geo. Barney, of Swanton, and the grandson of Elisha Barney, who was born in Taunton, Mass., July 17, 1776, and came to Swanton in 1799. His mother was the daughter of Ezekiel O. Goodrich, a native of Richmond, Mass., who settled in Swanton in 1801.

Elisha L. was born in Swanton, April 13, 1832, and passed his childhood and youth in the same town. As a boy he was amiable in disposition and unassuming in deportment. He made good use of the advantages for intellectual improvement furnished by the common school and academy of his native village. His parents being professors of religion, he early came under Christian influence, and no doubt received from it a bias which he never lost. He is spoken of as one who was ever an obedient son, as a kindly and confiding companion, and as respectful and obliging under all the relations of life.

In 1851, when 19 years of age, he went to Dubuque, Iowa, and became a clerk in the store of two uncles, who were at that time dry goods merchants in that city. He continued to be thus employed until 1855, when he entered the same business as principal, becoming one of the firm of Barney, Scott & Co. The next spring he was joined in marriage to Miss Sarah A. Burton, born in Lewis, Sussex Co., Delaware, June 12, 1833.

The religious interest which prevailed very extensively throughout the country in the winter of 1857 and '8 did not leave Mr. and Mrs. Barney unaffected. As the work advanced in Dubuque, they both became deeply enlisted, and seeking the spiritual welfare of their souls, soon found peace in believing, and shortly afterward united with the Methodist church.

A year or two later Mrs. Barney's health began to fail, and Mr. Barney closed his business in Dubuque in the spring of 1859, and returned to his native place, hoping a change of climate might prove beneficial to her, and to enable her, should she not recover, to be nearer her Eastern friends. She continued to sink during the coming summer, and early in autumn she died, Oct. 9, 1859. She left an infant son, who has ever since been a precious care and solace to his grand-parents in Swanton.

On Mr. Barney's return to New England he established himself as a merchant in his native town, under the firm of Jewett & Barney, and thus continued in business until the autumn of 1861. His partner, who was connected with the 1st Vermont regiment, having returned home, and there being at the time a pressing demand for men, Mr. Barney felt impelled to enlist as a volunteer in the service of his country. He was chosen captain of a company which he assisted in raising. This was Co. K of the 6th Vermont regiment. His commission bears date Oct. 15, 1861.

During the following winter, the regiment was stationed in the vicinity of Washington. It will of course be impossible to notice all the movements of the regiment while our lamented friend was connected with it. Little more is here expected than a brief reference to the several engagements at which he was present. The winter being passed, and the spring being opened, the service began in earnest. The first conflict in which Capt. Barney and his company were engaged, was at Lee's Mills, April 16, 1862. In an attempt to cross Warwick Creek and take the earthworks on the other side, they had a contest with the enemy. Being exposed to a galling fire they were forced to abandon the project.

They were next engaged in a skirmish at Williamsburgh. In this they were for some time exposed to a hot fire from the confederate forces. This occurred May 4th. We find them soon after occupied in the eventful seven days' fight and retreat on the peninsula. They were engaged on the 27th of June in reconnoitering. While they were at Golden's Farm, they were compelled to give way and finally retire on account of the shells of the enemy. Two days later, June 29, they participated in a severe engagement at Savage Station. The rebels made an attack about 6 o'clock P. M., and continued to fight until dark, when the Union forces were obliged to retreat. The day following, June 30, the enemy opened upon them while they were at White Oak Swamp. They were under the heavy fire of confederate artillery for four or five hours. September 17 of the same year we find Capt. Barney and his company at South Mountain. The rebels occupied its summit. It was desirable to dislodge them. Capt. Barney and his command were called out in advance. In the very beginning of the engagement he was severely wounded in the right temple by a minie ball. Presuming that his end was near, he said to a soldier who stood by, "If you see any of my friends tell them I died at my post." Fortunately his wound was not so dangerous as at first supposed. He was, however, unfitted for present duty, and thus unable to be with his company at the battle of Antietam, which occurred Sept. 11.

Receiving favorable medical treatment, and making a visit home, he rapidly recovered and was soon able to join his command. Previously, however, to his return to the army, Oct. 14, 1862, he was united in marriage to Miss Martha M. Blake, the eldest daughter of Joseph Blake, Esq., of Swanton. On the 15th of the same month, he was advanced to the Majorate of the regiment to which he belonged. It is worthy to be remarked that though he was the junior captain of the regiment, he was the first to be promoted when a vacancy occurred.

The 13th of the following December he witnessed the battle of Fredericksburg, in which he was engaged. The fighting was most on the skirmish line. He had the good fortune to be made Lieut.-Col. on the 18th of the same month. March 18, 1863, he was advanced to the colonelcy of the regiment. On the 3d of May following he was engaged in a second conflict at Fredericksburg. This was a fierce struggle, in which the Heights were stormed, the enemy driven back, and some of them taken prisoners. The next day, May 4, Col. Barney and his regiment were in an engagement at Banks' Ford. In this engagement, he took a prominent part. He ordered his men, who were occupying a depression, to cast themselves flat on their faces for protection. They hugged the ground so closely that the rebels who came over the summit of an adjacent eminence, noticed only their knapsacks. Upon this the Confederate officer shouted to his men, "See there your d—d Yankee knapsacks; seize your prey!" Rushing forward to get possession of the coveted spoils, they came within some 20 feet, when Col. Barney ordered his men to rise, and fire. They then charged fiercely upon the advancing foe, driving all before them, until the order came to fall back. In this battle they took about 300 rebel prisoners. It is said that the captured nearly equalled the captors in number. Among the prisoners were a colonel, a lieut.-colonel, and major, and 10 other commissioned officers. Colonel Lewis, of the 7th Louisiana Regiment, on surrendering to Col. Barney tendered to him his sword. This was sent home as a trophy of victory—a memorial of the brilliant success of that eventful day. The combat at Banks' Ford, as the Colonel recently remarked to the writer, was the severest one in which he was engaged.

The affair at Franklin's Crossing, in which he also took part, occurred June 5. The river was forded, and the confederates were driven from their rifle-pits. Colonel Barney and his regiment were likewise present at the memorable battle of Gettysburg, which raged from the 1st to 3d of July. They were stationed on the extreme left wing as a reserve. Although not actual participants in the terrible conflict, they were most of the time under a heavy artillery fire. They were very actively engaged during the greater part of July 10, in skirmishes at Funkstown. This was previous to the recrossing of the Potomac by Gen. Lee.

We find Col. Barney next bearing a prominent part in the fight which came off at Buckland's Mills on the 19th of October; he had been ordered out with his regiment on picket duty. As the 1st Vermont Cavalry was retreating, Col. Barney very timely came up, checked the retreat, and saved the regiment from imminent peril. In this action he performed very important service.

On the 24th of the same month, he returned to Vermont to assist in raising recruits. In company with others, he held war meetings, as it was thought with favorable results, in a number of towns in the northern part of the State. This occupied his attention till about Jan. 4, 1864. Having returned to the army soon after this, he found considerable religious interest prevailing in camp. This seemed to give him great delight. During the continuance of this interest, as well as at other times, he labored for the spiritual welfare of the soldiers. The chaplain writes that Col. Barney was ready to do all in his power to give character and efficiency to the religious exercises. On the opening of the campaign in the spring of 1864, we find him at his post. He was connected with the movement made under Gen. Grant toward Richmond. When they entered what is called the Wilderness, his regiment was so stationed as to be very much exposed in case they moved forward, if we may judge from what ensued. Having been occupied a part of May 5th in throwing up breast-works, he and his men were resting when the order came to advance. Proceeding forward, they no sooner reached the crest of a hill than they were unexpectedly fired upon by the enemy who were lying in ambush completely concealed by a ravine on the other side. Col. Barney fell, having received a mortal wound from a minie ball, which struck on the right side of his head. This was on the first day's fight, at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Col. Barney was carried to the rear, and thence he was borne by soldiers for about a mile through the woods. An ambulance being at last procured, he was conveyed in it to the hospital. He lay the greater part of the time in a state of stupor. When roused to consciousness by special effort, he answered questions correctly. On the evening of the 6th, he asked the surgeon who was trying to remove the ball from his head, what he thought of his recovery. On the doctor's replying that there was little hope, he remarked, "When hit, I expected to die immediately, but felt that it was all right; that I had a Saviour, and was prepared to go." Just before the engagement he had written to his wife. Among his last words to her are these, "My hope and trust are firm in my Saviour, and I feel strong to go forth. It may be my lot to fall, but I thank God that Christ has died for me, and if I am never again permitted to return to my home and those I love, I believe we shall meet in the bright world above."

After the removal of the ball, he was taken to Fredericksburg. This was a hard jaunt, as he was compelled to ride some 48 hours in a mule wagon, and over rough roads. Although inclined to stupor, he occasionally roused himself and spoke of the pain from his wound. On the morning of the 8th, he appeared to be better, and hopes were entertained of his recovery. He said if he could only go to Washington, and be at the house of an old friend of his there, and have his wife come and nurse him, he might yet get well. But the hopes wakened were of short duration, and he soon began to fail. Fever set in; he continued to grow worse. During this time, he was for the most part unconscious. He lay in this state until Tuesday morning, May 10th, when he was freed from pain of body, and the spirit went back to God who gave it. His remains were embalmed and sent home for burial. They reached the railway station of his native town, Swanton, Saturday evening, May 13. Their arrival was awaited by a large concourse of citizens, who accompanied them to his father's house, at the hour of twilight, amid the tolling of the bell, the peal of the cannon, and the beat of the muffled drum. The funeral exercises were held in the open air on Wednesday, the 18th. The body was borne to the park, that all who wished might once more look upon the face of the deceased. The national flag shrouded the coffin, and upon the stars and stripes rested the sword of Col. Lewis, the memorial of the battle in the rear of Fredericksburgh.

Citizens assembled in large numbers from Swanton, and the neighboring towns, to pay the last rites of respect to the departed. Rev. D. U. Dayton preached a discourse commemorative of the virtues of the deceased, founded on the words: "How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle." A funeral procession was then formed, consisting of the large assembly, followed by the pall-bearers, several clergymen, the mourners and the members of the Sabbath-school. The body was borne to the place of burial, and after the singing of the song, "Wrap the flag around me, boys," the coffin was lowered, and dust consigned to dust.

Col. Barney's term of service was comparatively brief, still he had become a "veteran." The battle of the Wilderness, in which he received his mortal wound, was the fifteenth at which he had been present. By Col. Barney's death, one was removed who was missed both on the tented field and at the quiet fireside. One went who was respected and beloved in the army, and whose death was deplored by the regiment which he commanded; one was taken who had many friends at home, . . . to lament the loss they experienced in his early departure. One was snatched away, who to a fine personal form added excellent qualities of mind and heart; one who in his impulses was noble, generous and brave. . . . Be it the aim of the living to cherish the memory and practice the virtues of the departed.

CAPT. STEPHEN F. BROWN, of Chicago, who lost an arm while serving his country as an officer in the 17th Vt., was a son of Swanton. Brown went into the battle of Gettysburg (while a lieutenant of the 13th Vt.) under arrest, and deprived of his sword for having helped himself and several privates to some water, against orders, a few days previous while on the march. He carried a hatchet in the battle until he captured the sword of a rebel officer, and it is needless to add that by this act he also won his own. The Captain is a rising lawyer of Chicago.

CAPT. LUCIUS H. DRURY, formerly from Swanton, was dangerously wounded in the late war, in a reconnoissance in force by Gen. Van Cleve's division, about 14 miles from Chattanooga. Capt. Drury commanded the 3d Wisconsin Battery, and was Chief of Artillery in Van Cleve's division. He was struck by a bullet in the breast which went through him, coming out near the back-bone, but nevertheless survived.

YANKEE CHARACTERISTICS.

By M. B. RUGG, Esq., (page 1063).

You may ask a Yankee questions,
And ask them as you may,
You will find that his inventions
Will ask you more in pay;
For every question that you ask
Gives him sufficient cause
Some twenty-fold. He'll take the task,
Thus one some twenty draws.

An answer that a Yankee 'll give
Is hardly ever yes;
He'd rather ask you where you live,
Or something more or less.
Just ask a Yankee what you may,
'Tis neither yes nor no—
You must find out some other way,
Or let the subject go.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

March, 1882.

That Swanton has natural advantages superior to most of the towns in the State is conceded by every one who is in any measure acquainted with them. The water-power here, if properly improved and judiciously applied, might be made to move profitable machinery sufficient to employ a thousand or more operatives the most part of the year, and at least 500 in times of the greatest scarcity of water. At such times the power should be applied to propelling that kind of machinery that requires the smallest amount of power to the largest number of operatives, and when water is abundant, which is generally 9 or 10 months in the year, and often the year around, then apply the additional power to machinery for the manufacture of articles requiring more water to the number of workmen than in the former case.

Instead of importing cotton and woolen goods, with boots, shoes, hats and caps; also farm implements, such as mowing-machines, hay-rakes, tedders, pitchforks, shovels, hoes and nameless other implements; also carriages, wagons and sleighs, together with all kinds of iron machinery, all should be manufactured here, not only to supply the demand at home, which would be considerable, but they should be exported north, south, east and west, and there is no reason obvious to the writer why all these articles, and more, might not be made here, certainly as cheap, and probably cheaper, than in most other places.

But a result so desirable cannot be accomplished under the present condition of things. There is now too great a diversity of interests. Therefore, the first step in the way of progress should be to bring the whole water-power under one management, the next to secure capital sufficient to work the full amount of power in the most profitable manner, which we doubt not could be speedily accomplished could sufficient energy and enterprise be brought to bear upon the subject. To induce capitalists to invest, it would only be needful to show them the amount of water-power, with a reservoir or pond the width of the river and full 6 miles in length, and the lay of the land on both sides of the river being so favorable for building sites and getting to and from the mills; then the fact that boats can come loaded direct to the Falls all the early months of the season, and reload and leave for New York or Philadelphia and deliver their cargoes without breaking bulk, there also being a port at Maquam bay, only about 2 miles from the Falls, where the largest vessels may load and discharge their cargo at all times during the season of navigation. Then there is the fact that the railroad from Boston to Ogdensburgh (C. V. R. R.) passes our village on the west border, and the railroad from Boston to Montreal on the east border, the junction of the two being about 4 miles south. We have also direct railroad communication with Portland, cars running daily. Another advantage, and not a small one, is the fact that we are in close proximity to Canada, which furnishes a vast amount of the labor for the factories in Massachusetts, and operatives could be procured from that and other quarters to work in mills at this place, probably cheaper than at any other point in the Northern States.

These advantages combined afford an argument which, if properly presented, it is believed capitalists would be slow to resist. A company having sufficient capital, with the enterprise exhibited in some of our Western cities, would in a very few years build up a manufacturing interest which would place Swanton foremost among the manufacturing towns of the State.

As regards the financial condition of the community generally we may say business of nearly all kinds in Swanton seems to be in a healthy condition. Merchants were probably never in better standing, and in no period previous to the war was the mercantile business as good as it has been since, and this may be said of most other kinds of business. The people also who depend upon manual labor for their living were never before as well fed and clothed, or had homes so comfortable. True, there are some cases of destitution, but such can be traced in nearly every case directly either to idleness, improvidence, profligacy or intemperance, generally in a measure to all:

The farming community were never before as independent and prosperous, and mortgages on real estate never before so few or small, or dwellings so good and well furnished. We hear complaints, however, even now of hard times, but to those who, with the writer, can remember 40 or 50 years back, when farmers would get in debt during the year, and then have to pay in wheat at 75 c to $1 per bushel, corn 50 c, oats 25, butter 10 to 12 c per pound, the complaint seems groundless, and the improvement on former times very great.

As to the morals of the town it may with truth, I think, be said that it will compare favorably with other New England towns of the same population and kinds of business carried on. There is but little, if any, drunkenness visible in our streets, and the law and public sentiment are a great restraint on intemperance; yet there is sufficient of it to seriously counteract every effort to improve the morals of the people. The outlook is not entirely discouraging. As a whole we are confident the masses are improving, and we hope at no distant day that the Christian religion will bring all under its benign and healthful influence.

As I bring my writings of Swanton and its people to a close, thoughts almost speaking say, others of whom you have been writing have passed away; you have chronicled their doings; some friendly hand may in the near future do the same by you; soon with them you shall take your final rest in the graveyard.

"Then when the turmoil is no more,
And all our powers decay,
Our cold remains in solitude
Shall sleep the years away.

Our labors done, securely laid
In this our last retreat,
Unheeded o'er our sleight dust
The storms of earth may beat.

Yet not thus buried or extinct
The vital spark shall lie;
For o'er life's wreck that spark shall rise
To seek its kindred sky."

APPENDIX.—PAPER ON SOLDIERS' MONUMENT. (Page 1064.)

(The following addition to the Paper on the Soldiers' Monument was not received in season to be inserted in its proper place.)

It is but due to history to say that though the town in its final action gave a good majority in favor of the monument, yet on the first presentation of the subject it was not so. The article was placed in the warning by some one unknown to the writer. He was at the town meeting when the article was brought up for action. A motion was made to dismiss it, and was carried in a very summary manner. After which the writer obtained a hearing, and moved a reconsideration, which was at once seconded by Col. A. B. Jewett, and after some discussion the motion was carried. There were then short speeches by several in favor of the monument, which turned the sentiment almost entirely in its favor, and it was voted to appropriate $1,500 for the erection of the same.

Goodrich, 1810, 11; W. Northrop, 1812; Daniel B. Marvin, 1829; John S. Foster, 1837; A. G. Bennett, 1843.

First constables have invariably acted as collectors, with the exception of John Warner in 1798, who, being 2d constable, was appointed collector.

Town Representatives.—Daniel Stannard, 1790; none chosen 1791; Thomas Butterfield, 1792-4; Asa Holgate, 1795; John Pratt, 1796-98; James Brown, 1799; John Pratt, 1800; James Brown, 1801; Silas Hathaway, 1802; Ezra Jones, 1803; Joseph Robinson, 1804-5; James Brown, 1806-7; George W. Foster, 1808-9; Benjamin Fay, 1810; Theophilus Mansfield, 1811; Jarib Jackson, 1812-15; James Brown, 1816; William Brayton, 1817; James Brown, 1818-19; Daniel B. Meigs, 1820; Timothy Foster, 1821; Jonathan Berry, 1822-24; Stephen S. Brown, 1825; James Platt, 1826; Timothy Foster, 1827-28; Stephen S. Brown, 1829; James Platt, 1830; R. W. Green, 1831; George W. Green, 1832-33; Lewis Janes, 1834; Bradford Scott, 1835-36; George W. Foster, 1837; Joseph Blake, 1838; John S. Foster, 1839-40; John Barney, 1841, 43; John S. Foster, 1844; 1845, no choice; James Platt, 1846; Horatio W. Barney, 1847; 1848, no choice; George Bullard, 1849; Isaac B. Bowditch, 1850-51; Leander L. Cushman, 1852-53; Jesse Barber, 1854-55; Edmond C. Wait, 1856-57; George M. Hall, 1858-59; A. A. Brooks, 1860-61; E. B. Rounds, 1862; Dennison Dorman, 1863-64; Henry A. Burt, 1865-66; Moses Catlin, 1867-68; Henry A. Burt, 1869; George M. Hall, 1870; Dana J. Morrill, 1872; James A. Barney, 1874; David O. Potter, 1876; Edgar M. Bullard, 1878; Hiram Platt, 1880.

Justices of the Peace.—Thomas Butterfield, 1793, 4; Asa Holgate, 1795, 6; Joshua Caulkins, 1796-8; John Pratt, 1796; Levi Hathaway, 1797, 9, 1800, 17-19; Orange Smith, 1797-1802; Jarib Jackson, 1800-12, 15, 20-23, 30-32; Jos. Robinson, 1802; Wathan Crary, 1803; Shadrack Hatheway, Jr., 1803-5, 7-12, 15, 17-30, 34-36, 38, 39, 42, 43, 45-55; Ezra Jones, 1804-6; William Green, 1806-10; Luther Drury, 1807-8; Theophilus Mansfield, 1808-11, 20; Geo. W. Foster, 1809, 19-29, 37-40, 43-47; Levi Scott, 1810, 12, 17; Benj. Fay, 1811, 30; Timothy Foster, 1811, 12, 15, 17, 18, 20, 27, 35, 36; Heman Hopkins, 1811, 28, 29, 35-40; 1813, 14, no record to be found; Amasa I. CHARLES HALL, M. D.

BY HORACE P. HALL, M. D.

Charles Hall was born at Cornish, N. H., Feb. 2, 1786; the third son of Benjamin and Elizabeth (Mosely) Hall. Having received a good English education and a fair knowledge of Greek and Latin, he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Badger, at Westminster, Vt., and much of the time was a student in the office of Dr. Nathan Smith, one of New England's brightest medical stars, for many years professor of surgery in Dartmouth College. He received his diploma and settled at Swanton Falls in 1811, and remained there several years, pursuing his profession with untiring zeal. He was well liked by the community, and considered a man of fine medical acquirements and strictly honest in word and action.

In 1813 he joined the Franklin County Medical Society, and was one of the first to give it prosperity. For 20 years after, he held various offices in the society, and was their president 10 years.

July 18, 1813, he married Eliza Brayton, daughter of Judge William Brayton, of Swanton. They had 3 children: Charles H., who died in infancy (1816); Harriet B., who died Dec. 1, 1840, aged 23, and wife of Dr. N. H. Ballou, formerly of St. Albans, now of Mechanicsville, N. Y. Charles Henry left a successful medical practice in Burlington during the year 1848 for a chance in the gold regions of California, where he died in 1850.

While living at Swanton, Dr. Hall held various town offices, and among the rest that of justice of the peace; and although faithful in the discharge of its duties, we incline to the opinion that his intense love for the profession of medicine made him rather cruelly hasty at times in getting over some of the minor duties of the office. For instance (report doth say), a couple came to him to be married, and happening to present themselves early in the morning, while the doctor was out in the yard drawing a pail of water for his horse, preparatory to an early drive in the country, he enquired if they really loved each other, and meeting with a quick and affirmative response from the blushing pair, told them to wait a few minutes and he would be out with a paper that would make them man and wife.

Dr. Hall left Swanton in 1820 and located at St. Albans, where he pursued a successful practice of medicine and surgery until the spring of 1842, when he removed to Burlington. His first wife died in May, 1822. In May, 1827, he married Charlotte Jane Hubbard, daughter of Judge Jonathan Janes, of St. Albans, and by her had 5 children, three of whom are now living.

George M., married, and is now (1870) practicing medicine at Swanton Falls.

Francis E., married and is now (1870) living at Appleton, Wis.

Horace P., married, and is now practicing medicine at St. Albans.

Julia M. H. Hall, married Horace P. Janes, second son of Dea. Horace Janes, of St. Albans, April 14, 1852, and died in San Francisco, Cal., Sept. 18, 1853; aged 21 years.

Eliza Jane Hall, the youngest daughter, died at St. Albans, April 18, 1854; aged 19 years.

Mrs. Charlotte Jane Hall, died at St. Albans, Aug. 15, 1871, aged 64 years, a kind hearted, affectionate mother—

Who dearly lov'd us,
Willingly left us
To walk with her God,
To that land of the blest.

On reaching Burlington, the doctor grappled at once with epidemic erysipelas, then pervading the country with fearful fatality, and during his first year's residence there his work was almost incessant. Indeed, so prevalent was the disease in all conditions of life, the duty of the hour seemed to be unremitting toil. He met with good success in practice generally, and particularly in erysipelas, owing no doubt, in a great degree, to the close attention he was in the habit of bestowing upon his patients.

As a surgeon perhaps the doctor more particularly distinguished himself, and ever was ready to meet any condition requiring surgical aid. He was very prudent, however, and if a shattered limb could by any possible means be saved to the patient, he preserved it, feeling sure a bad limb saved was far better surgery than the simple operation of amputation. However, he used the knife a good deal, and was generally successful.

To illustrate that his patients were ever uppermost in his mind: Soon after locating at Burlington, the doctor was besought by the leading citizens to deliver a lecture on temperance, not only for the local good then desired, but to aid in establishing the "Maine liquor law" in the State of Vermont. He prepared an article and the time arrived for its recital, which was to take place in the old court house, where a large and enthusiastic audience had assembled to give him a hearty greeting, when, lo! the doctor was out on a sick call, and something over an hour elapsed before he put in an appearance. Finally, however, in he came with hat and manuscript in hand, almost out of breath from the hurry and excitement of the hour, and mounted the rostrum. After a little respite to collect his breath and recover somewhat from the embarrassment of the occasion, he commenced his address, a well-prepared article, and which progressed smoothly enough until nearly completed, when suddenly a messenger opened the court room door, and called in a loud and excited manner for Dr. Hall! Dr. Hall is wanted! Down dropped the manuscript, and in the twinkling of an eye the doctor started for the door, hat in hand, and not without quite a little commotion was he returned to finish his address. This is but mentioned to show his intense love for his profession and his readiness to obey the calls of humanity in this line of duty.

Dr. Hall was rather a stern man, and by some was called cross; on the contrary, he was a very kind-hearted man, affable, and enjoyed a joke as well as the next one. True, he was possessed of a large share of self confidence, and when he prescribed for a patient, for instance, he wanted his directions carried out to the letter, and neglect in this respect greatly provoked him, and frequently it was even stormy in that house.

He was a particular friend to young practitioners, and courteous to all physicians as a medical counsellor unless unreasonably opposed, when he would stand for a well-founded opinion to the last. He was frank and honest in his intercourse with all, and expected the same in return.

Dr. Hall wrote a good deal on medical and other topics, but through diffidence on his part, only a few of the articles were published. Among such might be mentioned his "Essay on Epidemic Erysipelas," and a long and able article on "Fevers of the Champlain Valley." From the former of these works, published about the year 1843, and critically reviewed by the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences," our standard medical authors upon the subject of erysipelas, have liberally quoted, both in this country and Great Britain, evincing their appreciation of Dr. Hall's skill as an observer, as well as of his truthfulness as a theoretical writer.

Such an honorable mention of his "word spoken in due season," was not surmised in the slightest degree by the doctor when living, for such was his extreme diffidence in appearing before the public as a medical writer, that it was with great difficulty that he could be prevailed upon to publish the work from which these quotations were made, and which have done so much honor to his memory as a medical observer.

He continued to work hard in his profession until cut down, apparently in his greatest usefulness, by typhus fever (ship fever so called), Dec. 3, 1847, in his 63d year. This fever had prevailed that year very extensively and with great fatality, and at the time of the doctor's sickness, there was scarcely a physician in Burlington who had not been sick with the disease, four of whom had been his patients, and were just convalescing when the doctor was first attacked, and one of the number, Dr. George Ward, was only "just able," as he said, "to crawl up and see his old friend before he died." Many others called, and the tears that bedewed each eye told plainly how highly they esteemed the dying man. Dr. Hall prescribed for patients some days after the first symptoms of fever began to show themselves, and removed a tumor from the left temple of a child brought in from one of the adjoining towns, after he was confined to his room and a good deal prostrated by the fever, which was his last act as a surgeon, and his work was well done.

In fact it may truly be said, that a ruling passion was never more manifest in a death struggle than in this instance,—continuing, as he did, to prescribe for the anxious few that found their way into his sick chamber, until the poison of the fever finally paralyzed his willing hand, and in the delirium that followed, it was work—work, in the same line of thought, until his spirit took its flight to the God who gave it.

The doctor was a member of the Protestant Episcopal church at the time of his death. He was always liberal in his views on religious subjects, believing that a contrite heart and an exemplary deportment through life was more essential in accomplishing the great end in view than any particular form of worship.

At his own request, the doctor's remains were taken to St. Albans, and buried in the cemetery at that place by the side of various members of his family who had preceded him, where they will remain

Until the last of earth shall rise.

GEORGE MORTIMER HALL, M. D.

BY HORACE P. HALL, M. D.

In attempting a sketch of my brother's life, I am mindful the task should fall to one more experienced in writing generally, and the drafting of biographical sketches particularly. I am conscious, such pictured sketches are apt to be overdrawn. Such faults may be deemed pardonable, since nothing should be said in such productions to detract from what should make the ashes of the dead ever sacred in their last resting-place and keep their memories green among the living. To say a man was born, lived, died, said but little and (by a natural inference) thought less, would hardly be a just obituary of any human being who has paid his last earthly penalty in casting off the guise of mortality for the mysterious and sacred vesture of immortality. The most misguided of earth's subjects should receive at least one tear of pity from all who view their burial mounds, for let us remember that the rosebud blossoms with equal beauty over the graves of all.

George Hall was born at St. Albans, Feb. 4, 1825, the eldest son of Charles Hall, M. D., by his second wife, Charlotte Jane Hubbard. When a mere child he manifested a fondness for reading, and having a father only too anxious, perhaps, to indulge him in this pleasant habit, he became at an early age a good and intelligent reader; and in school kept well up with the usual studies, and in 1842 entered the University of Vermont, where he was graduated in 1846, with a brilliant record.

Our friend George H. Bigelow of Burlington in an article referring to my brother, says, "His class contained many notable fellows: among whom were Isaac Belcher, of Col.; President Marsh of the University of Oregon; Hon. John W. May, of Boston; Thomas L. Nelson, of Worcester, Mass.; Wm. A. Dodge, now a banker in New York city; Henry O. Houghton, of Cambridge, Mass., the renowned printer and publisher; Judge Jameson, of Chicago; the late Hon. James Prentiss, of Wisconsin, and Rev. Jonathan A. Wainwright, a well known Episcopal clergyman."

Dr. Hall entered the 'LAMBDA IOTA,' or 'Owl Society' in 1844, and was through his college course one of its most active members and choicest spirits, and continued to take a deep and abiding interest therein until the day of his death."

When a father is earnest and enthusiastic in a given line of toil through life, whatever it may be, the sons are very apt to catch the inspiration. So in this instance: they all became physicians. George M., commenced reading medicine during the last year of his college course, and graduated at the Berkshire Medical college of Pittsfield, Mass., in the fall of 1848, with an excellent record. He began to practice with his father at Burlington one year before he graduated, to assist him in the unusually arduous duties of his profession during that year of the famine and great immigration from Ireland. Through overwork and exposure during the prevalence of the ship fever, he was stricken with the disease, and for several days it was thought would surely die. Fortunately he survived the attack, but soon after his convalescence, his father contracted the disease and died, thus leaving a large practice to be retained and carried on by his two sons, Charles Henry, by a first wife, and George M. Here it would seem they should have remained; but the former left for California soon after his father's death, and George M., after continuing in practice there until 1850, sold his interests to Dr. A. P. Barber, and went on a tour of observation through the far West; but after looking well into the merits and demerits of our great country, finally retraced his steps to Vermont, and located at Swanton Falls, where his father commenced practice in 1811. Dr. George always regretted having left Burlington, and probably it would have been much to his advantage, in many respects, had he remained there among his many intelligent personal friends, and where he might have been greatly benefited, thus early in life, by the numerous friends and supporters of his father. Thus would a young man instead of a local fame win a world-wide reputation, let him enter in the outset the broadest field open of action.

The Doctor was twice married: first to Sarah Ann Farrar, Dec. 11, 1853, by whom he had two children, a son, Charles Prescott, who entered the University of Vt. September, 1874, in his 18th year, bidding fair to follow in his father's footsteps, in the U. V. M.; a daughter, Jennie Frances, who married F. J. Hawley of Swanton Falls, where they now reside. The first Mrs. Hall died Dec. 16, 1858. Oct. 10, 1859, he married Charlotte A. Farrar, sister to his first wife, both daughters of the late Horatio B. Farrar, Esq., of Swanton. There are no children by his second wife.

As a physician, Dr. Hall was beloved by his patients. He was very tender hearted and sympathetic,—elements in the character of a physician always comforting in the sick room, an excess of which, however, in the surgeon, is not quite so acceptable, as we shall presently discover. In the early part of his practice, he performed several capital operations, all fully successful in their result, and it appeared as if he would eventually become distinguished as a surgeon. But he soon began to dread that phase in the life of a country doctor, until finally the sight of a bloody arm or hand would make him almost sick. But in the fevers peculiar to the Champlaine valley, he was particularly successful. I think he told me, during the last 15 years of his practice he lost but two or three cases, and I am cognizant of his having treated very many severe forms of fever within that period. He seemed to have an almost intuitive conception, as it were, of diseased action, and possessed a peculiar aptitude in devising means to meet emergencies. He was by no means blind to the kind efforts of nature—who is doctor-in-chief—and with aptitude to co-operate with her recuperative tendency, he was remarkably successful through life. He early joined the state and county medical societies, and was always an active supporter of each. He loved his profession, but was accustomed to put out occasionally, as cultured minds will do, into other channels of thought, and was successful in storing well regulated knowledge in whatever subject or branch he selected. Thus in geology, he soon became quite familiar with the subject, particularly in that of his own county, so much so that few in his own section could travel with him socially, for any distance, in this rocky theme. He wrote an article upon the geology of Franklin Co., which he read before the county medical society, which all present pronounced a most able production, and all the more to be prized, it being the only one extant referring particularly to this county. Prof. Jules Marcou, of Cambridge, Mass., says of Dr. Hall: "He was an excellent practical geologist, and although he did not publish any of his numerous observations, he was better acquainted with the geology of North Western Vermont than anybody else. His researches extended into Canada and a great part of the state of New York. The geology of the vicinity of Swanton, and of Highgate and Philipsburgh, is very complicated and extremely difficult; in fact, it is one of the most difficult spots on the whole North American continent; and Dr. Hall arrived by his own observations at a very just and clear appreciation of the whole structure, and of the geological age of the different groups of rocks which exist there. He discovered a number of rare fossils, and among them a very rare trilobite, which has been called in his honor Ampyx Halli. The late Rev. John B. Perry, who died a few years ago at Cambridge, where he was an assistant to Prof Agassiz, was Dr. Hall's pupil."

My brother referred frequently to Prof. Marcou during his last illness; often spoke of the many pleasant rambles over the fields with him in search of still further knowledge upon this highly interesting subject.

I might mention in this connection that Dr. George never quite recovered from the shock produced on his return from a sick call late one day, and learning that Prof. Marcou, or Prof. Hungerford, of Burlington (am not quite sure which), had during his absence discovered that his cabinet of curiosities was in his horse barn in the greatest possible state of confusion. This unexpected visit, we may say, was the commencement of a reformation in regard to the order of things in general, but especially in the arrangement of geological specimens. It aroused him to the reality that his fame as a geologist was extending, and that he was liable to a repetition of like surprises by visits from other geological celebrities. The mere mention of this circumstance would always produce a blush upon his countenance that told too plainly how keenly he appreciated the picture.

Dr. Hall was always very diffident, and this is probably the main reason why he never wrote more for publication, more concerning his observations as a geological explorer, which would have extended his reputation very considerably. My brother was naturally, I think, one of the most bashful men I ever knew, and thoroughly unselfish. To illustrate: Sometime during his sophomore year in college, a party of young ladies and gentlemen assembled at our home one evening, and among the ladies were two from Montreal, with one of whom our father was especially pleased, and I doubt not would have become still more so could he eventually have called her a daughter-in-law. George up to this time had scarcely been known to take a part in entertaining even so small an assemblage—no slight task, even, for one experienced in such matters, as we all well know. Well, my brother was finally approached upon the subject, but, as usual, objected, which so provoked my father that he threatened that he would pay no more college bills for him unless George would prepare himself, come into the room, and take part in rendering the evening a pleasant one. My brother finally yielded, and was formally introduced. But alas, alas! ere he had scarcely completed the circle, he began to look extremely red in the face, and throwing a few hurried glances about the room, soon made a successful exit, and was lost to sight. On my father's return from a sick call, later in the evening, he was informed as to the situation of things, and looking for our hero, where do you think he found him?—Snugly in bed, pretending to be sick! The picture was altogether too ridiculous for further action, and the poor victim was allowed to enjoy a good night's rest. He was also very bashful in his associations with mankind generally, and this was quite noticeable until within the last few years of his life, by which time, through more frequent participation in lyceums, lecture-halls, etc., he had comparatively overcome this almost weakness of his nature, we are inclined to say, and could deliver his always well-written productions with far more dignity and ease than in the earlier years of his career. Although his extreme diffidence prevented him from ever appearing before a public audience to full advantage, yet, "where two or three were gathered together" in social converse, was his real worth more fully appreciated. His conversation was always of a high order, and no person could indulge in an hour's friendly chat with Dr. George M. Hall without feeling benefited thereby, gaining new ideas upon whatever theme might be introduced.

But if there was ever one thing he loved outside of his home and profession, it was the Ancient and Honorable Order of Freemasonry, in which he might be called a most brilliant light. This, we may say, was his religion, the Masonic Lodge his place of worship, and the Supreme Architect of the Universe his God, and presently we shall see how it prepared him for death. In conversation with a brother of this order a short time since,—one high in office as such, bright in his masonic as in his professional position as a lawyer, and therefore the better qualified to give an unbiased opinion of another,—I asked of him this question: At a national convocation of the brotherhood, where important business was to be transacted, how would George M. Hall compare with the stars of the order that would naturally congregate upon such an occasion? He unhesitatingly answered me that "There is no man in the United States, and perhaps in the world, that would surpass him in intelligence upon all that relates to Freemasonry, in the wisdom of his counsel in such matters, or in the morality of his nature. George M. Hall," said he, "was truly a bright and shining light,—of massive and active brain, he could fathom the vital points of any subject. We all revered him, and his loss will be keenly felt by the whole fraternity."

My brother was naturally very serious minded, and I think as moving a prayer as I ever listened to came from his lips; I can, therefore, the more readily appreciate what I have so often been told, that in some of the higher degrees of masonry, where the heart and soul of a man should be most sincerely enlisted, George M. Hall, at times, was truly sublime in the discharge of the duties of his office. To illustrate: upon one occasion an enthusiastic religionist presented himself at the door of the Encampment to be made a templar. This man had always been something of a sceptic in masonic matters, which characteristic we may say traveled with him, to some extent, until he reached the room in which were to be disclosed to his still somewhat clouded vision some of the more solemn beauties of masonry. It happened that my brother officiated upon this occasion, and after most of the ceremonies had been gone through with to make the applicant a templar in regular standing, the latter could not longer resist the pressure within him to call God to witness that all his hitherto doubts and forebodings as to pure heart-felt Christianity in masonry, were that moment dispelled! "for naught," said he, "but the spirit of a great Jehovah could conduct any ceremony with such sublime solemnity!" Dr. Geo. M. Hall died a true mason, and it is our opinion that no sweeter requiem could be pronounced over the grave of any man.

The Doctor was a Bible reader, and became very familiar with its sacred pages; and well versed in both sacred and profane history, remembering with great clearness historical events and incidents in the lives of great lights of past ages. He could always call up very readily a passage of Scripture as occasion required; although he seldom resorted to the Bible to establish a point merely for argument's sake, especially upon secular subjects, for he seemed to have too great a reverence for those sacred pages to thus seemingly misuse them. And truly, what savors more of ignorance and ungodliness in a man, than to hear him upon all occasions reverting to the Bible to carry a point, merely to establish an argument? The various poets did not escape the Doctor's perusal. Shakespere, Milton, Scott, Byron, Pope, and last, but not least, Moore and Burns were his delight. Scott's "Lady of the Lake" was a great favorite with him, and at one time he could repeat the couplet to any line one would read him from this poem. The same was true as to Pope's "Essay on Man"; he could almost repeat it from beginning to end. He was equally familiar with many parts of Shakespere; Moore's Melodies, and particularly Burns, whose lines he loved and read so much; reading Scottish poems he rendered them particularly interesting, from being able to properly pronounce and explain the Scotch dialect. As a reader of these peculiar poems, we will say, Dr. George had few equals. He was especially familiar with all the best odes of Horace, and could repeat many of them from memory; and in the Greek he was an accomplished and critical scholar, retaining his familiarity with its classic authors during his whole post-college life. Dr. George was guilty of writing poetry himself occasionally, but I hardly think he would thank me for alluding to this fact in a sketch of his life! I think I am the only one who was ever permitted to read any of his poetical effusions, and therefore must be the only witness as to their excellence and real merit. He wrote one on "Hope," that I should be proud to introduce in this connection, if I had it in my possession. Only a few years ago I espied this gem among some of his papers, and tried to force a chance at its possession and reperusal, but he objected, perhaps on the plea that poetical doctors were not just the thing, and I presume he afterwards committed it to the flames, a fate most probably meted out to all of these poetic effusions.

The Doctor was a ready writer, and seldom re-wrote an article, or interlined alterations, however deep the subject. He has written upon various themes during the past 20 years. Many articles relating to Freemasonry, "Physiological Lectures," "Truth in Nature," "The Unity of the Life Principle," etc., but few of which, however, have found their way to the printers. He was very fond of writing upon abstract subjects. I was present upon one occasion when he read his article on the Unity of the Life Principle, which was well written and delivered,—a master production, in short,—and to one who has given the subject of life any attention, was highly instructive; but to a comparatively "untutored mind," would fall like the Greek upon a dull ear. At the conclusion of the meeting, a physician walked up to George, and taking him by the hand said—"Well, Doctor, allow me to congratulate you upon writing and delivering a lecture that I did not understand one word of from its beginning to the end!" "Then you are certainly to be pitied," said Dr. George, jocosely, "and fully deserve the sympathy of all the members present."

In politics he originally belonged to the Jackson and Madison school of democracy; and through the late American Rebellion he was what might properly be called a "Union war democrat," i. e., I conclude, one who at the outset most sincerely deplored the necessity of resorting to arms to carry a point, but who, nevertheless, would save that Union intact at whatever cost. He was one of the Board of three for examining recruits and drafted men for the district in which he lived, and discharged the duties of his office faithfully.

As a neighbor he was kind and obliging; as a citizen, public spirited and ever ready to work for the welfare of the community in which he lived. He held numerous town offices, and represented the town of Swanton twice, I believe. "As a statesman," says one writer, in alluding to my brother, "he had few equals; having carefully examined the politics of the world, his good judgment enabled him to see their adaptation to every class. A safe man in any emergency." While at the legislature he was acknowledged to be a man of sound judgment—a "practical and influential member." He held the office of first selectman at the time of the struggle over the "bonding act," so called, in aid of Portland and Ogdensburgh railroad, and was quite active in the matter, and successfully so. But that hallowed room in which the Doctor so patiently passed the last few weeks of his life was where the elements of his real manhood more distinctly manifested themselves; at that time when the soul of a man is thoroughly tested, and he must give a reason for the hope within him. I say hallowed room, for I believe when a person dies in the full faith of Christ, looking calmly upon death as if it were merely a happy sleep, from which to awaken in the continued sunshine and splendor of a life beyond the grave, as only a thoughtful, conscientious Christian can do, such a spot—the place of his demise—is always rendered holy. Dr. Geo. was never a very regular churchgoer, which resulted in part, I presume, from professional duties as a physician; but I assure you he was always a most serious thinker in all that pertains to the subjects considered in church, and exemplary in his daily round of life, practicing a religion which he seldom or never said but little about. Some few years ago he united with the Protestant Episcopal church, and was still a member at the time of his death.

I have frequently heard people talk of him in connection with modern spiritualism, as if he believed in such stuff. Have heard people call him skeptical in religious matters. He did believe in a "natural" and a "spiritual" body, and that the spirits of our deceased friends hovered about us in some form—a most happy thought; but this table tipping, materializing jugglery of the present day as a link of communication between Heaven and earth, he most emphatically denounced, and always asserted that those who are usually engaged in such enterprises would be hardly the subjects, in most instances, through which to transmit messages from the the Spirit Land. In relation to his skepticism in religious matters, we might end the debate by asserting most sincerely our belief that such an idea never entered the mind of any well balanced and truly cultivated man or woman. If there are honest and persistent skeptics in matters pertaining to the soul's salvation, our sincere belief is that their insanity, or eccentricity, as it is sometimes called, may accurately be measured by the degree to which their skepticism exists. In relation to my brother's supposed skepticism, the idea originated with many, no doubt, from having listened to some of his lectures relating to the mysteries of nature, since to a mind untrained in this line of research, his words and ideas might seem to savor somewhat of such notions. But by the scholar who can trace the atom in its round of life, and thereby show just how the physical part of our bodies goes to dust and back again to the air we breathe, they would be very differently interpreted.

The spiritual part of our existence is, of course, beyond human power to fathom. No, the Doctor acknowledged God in all things, as did the poet:

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

Such was my brother's favorite theme of thought, and his greatest delight was to watch the bud and finally the blossoming of a beautiful flower; to note the delicate painting of the lily. He would say, Who but a great God could originate for the pleasure of his people such a wondrous spectacle as the thousand flowers of the field in every variety of tint and depths of color?

In my brother's article on Truth in Nature, he gives a key, as it were, to his idea of religion and a true Christian life: "A man's religion is the chief part in regard to him. Not his mere church creed, or articles of faith, but the thing that man doth practically lay to heart and know for certain concerning his vital relations to this mysterious universe, and his duty and destiny therein, is in all cases the primary thing for him, and creatively determines all the rest." Again he says, "whence cometh it and whither does it tend? All alike point to the paternal care and regard of the divine Father, and suggests to his mind thoughts of worship and adoration, which is the respect for the higher than himself that dwells in every human heart that has sought after truth in nature." In continuation of this subject he says, "Is it, then, a matter of great wonder that those higher and better truths which are manifested in a Christian-like life should take such a deep hold of humanity, and find such a response in its heart? He recognizes it because of its simplicity, and because of its analogies in nature in the respect for the higher. And the desire for intimate communion with the higher, is the basis from which have sprung the beautiful truths of Christianity. The teachings, then, of the Man of Nazareth of spiritual communion with the Father will find a response in every human heart that has been true to nature. Not nature in any fallen sense, for that would not be nature truthfully; but rather in its higher and holier sense, a sense in which the divine and human are in harmony. And hence man, as he is led to contemplate the probability of an immortal existence from the analogies of "nature, learns at length that the throwing off this mortal coil is but a birth of the spirit, as it were, whose life is to know no end."

"From these thoughts," he says, "one learns that the elements of his mortal body are composed of the earth, and back to earth they must surely return for still further uses in nature. But that the spirit, which is in every true sense the man, no longer requiring the gross material of the natural body for its development, assumes its immortal relations as naturally and as truthfully as 'One who gathers the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.'

A more truthful picture of the last few hours of George M. Hall's life could not be painted by mortal artist. In his life his ambition was to study nature truthfully; and this happy theme of thought enabled him to finally take to his death-bed with a resignation most beautiful to behold. I can truly say that I never witnessed so happy a death-bed scene,—so cheerful, so calm, as only one can experience who has trained his mind to truly believe in a glorious future beyond the grave. On the morning of the day he died, I said to him that it seemed really hard to see him thus cut down in the full bloom of his life and usefulness. "Ah, no," said he, "I would live for my friends and the community at large, but my earthly career is evidently about to be terminated, and I shall soon be called to a higher sphere of action. I assure you the picture is a pleasant one, and if I incline to doubt, in the smallest degree, as to the authorship of so bright a vision, the word TRUST in golden letters is immediately before me. I could scarcely believe, without this happy experience, that one could close his eyes so resignedly against the many beauties of earth. No, weep not for me; I am truly happy in the thought of death."

Such were almost the last words with my deeply lamented brother. They struck deep in my heart. I thought if all could die thus truly happy, death would be completely robbed of its terror. On the morning of Aug. 24, 1874, the soul of George M. Hall peacefully took its flight, to assume its immortal relations.

His funeral was largely attended by the community in which he lived, and by his masonic and medical friends throughout the State, and the silent tears upon the cheeks of many of his more intimate acquaintances told in language stronger than the pen can write how sincerely he was lamented.

But the lid must now close
Forever o'er so sad a scene,
Until the last of earth shall rise,
And with glad chorus fill the skies,
Forgetting all earthly woes.

IN THE LAST CORNER OF SWANTON: having no further copy from our Contributors for this town with which to fill our "form" viz: by this and the next page, we can only fill up and end here in the pressure at the office, by some additional biography for Mr. Smalley found among our "clippings," after his notice on page 1052, had gone to press. A paragraph or two of appendix omitted by mistake, an errata for our own notes for the Perry Papers, and the names of the portrait donors, if not then full down our closing page for this fine and dear old town—yes, dear, a town so well written up, and withal including so much interesting and unique in detail, cannot but be precious with a historiographer, but:

FROM AN OBITUARY OF BENJ. H. SMALLEY, at the time of his death in the County paper:

This well-known citizen of Vermont died at Frelighsburg, P. Q., on the 15th inst., at the advanced age of 80 years. Mr. Smalley received merely a common school education preparatory to the study of the law, which he entered upon at an early day, and practiced in Franklin and Grand Isle counties, particularly, for more than 40 years. In 1820, he was appointed a collector of customs at Alburgh, where he became acquainted with his first wife, Anna, daughter of the late Hon. Lewis Sowles, of Alburgh, for many years the presiding judge of Grand Isle county court.

Mr. Smalley moved to St. Albans, and engaged in the practice of his profession in company with the late Hon. Henry Adams, constituting a firm of rare legal and literary attainments. Besides their professional practice, they entered largely into agricultural pursuits and into the introduction of blooded stock, which became widely known throughout this portion of the country. Shortly after making St. Albans his residence, Mr. Smalley lost his wife and afterwards married Julia Marvin. They had a son, E. Marvin Smalley, and a daughter, Cynthia Smalley. . . . Mr. Smalley left the practice of law in 1858, shortly after the death of his first wife, and settled on his farm in Swanton, where he remained until a few months since, when he and his wife went to reside for a time with [a nephew of Mrs. Smalley] G. R. Marvin, in Frelighsburg. While on the farm, he constantly improved the face of nature, making two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before, and he departed from one of the finest farms in Franklin county, . . . it is a monument to testify that the world was better for his having lived in it. While there, engaged in those congenial pursuits, he kept up his reading, mainly in literature and somewhat in law, but never "dabbled with practice," as he sometimes expressed himself, save in a few cases that particularly interested him. His last appearance was in the Swanton bonding case. He was also counsel in the celebrated Catholic church case in Highgate, and earlier in his career he was connected with the more famous smuggling case that grew out of the Patriot War and held a place in court for sixteen years. In fact, when we go back to that time and look through the Vermont Reports we find that Smalley & Adams were on one side or the other of nearly every important case in this part of Vermont. Mr. Smalley was particularly noted in his profession as an advocate, and his partner was equally noted as a counsellor. Mr. Smalley was not an office seeker, hence seldom held public trust. During President Pierce's administration his name was prominently mentioned in connection with the office of U. S. District Judge, but he gracefully retired in favor of his nephew, Hon. D. A. Smalley, his former pupil and his life-long friend. Mr. Smalley died in the Roman Catholic faith, having been a member of that church for about 30 years.

His funeral took place at St. Mary's church St. Albans, High Mass by the pastor, Vicar General Druon, two Bishops present in the sanctuary, Bishop de Goesbriand and Bishop Rappe. Bishop de Goesbriand pronounced the funeral address in which he eulogized the character of the deceased as a man, a lawyer, a true friend of his country and a Christian. The bearers were Hons. J. Rand, J. J. Deavitt, and Victor Atwood, and Messrs. Orange Adams, B. Paul and A. S. Hyde. There was a large attendance of lawyers and others—18 June '77, St. Albans Messenger.

ADDENDA—to appendix on page 1132:

It was also voted that in erecting the soldiers' monument at Swanton the selectmen should select the place on which said monument shall stand. The selectmen that year were W. H. Blake, A. B. Jewett and John Smith, and I find no record of any other committee to locate the monument.

ERRATA.—Compilers' notes, 975—1st col. 2d paragraph, 21st line, "would not permit the English to come amongst them," quotation omitted, which ends the account from Kalm; page 980, 2d col. 12 lines from the bottom, The head-house of the order has been in Spain, I think—not in France—as one omitted comma makes it now read; same paragraph, 9 lines from the bottom, and in one time should read, and in our time; page 981, 1st col. 4th paragraph, 1st line, should read, Histoire du Canada; 982, 1st col. 2d paragraph, 1st line, The Recollects having just proposed it, should read, having first proposed it; same column, 3d paragraph, last line, 1838 to 39 should be 1638-9; 2d col. same page, 1st and 2d line, should read, and drew the Algonquins eventually; same column, Father Deuislottes should be Druislottes; 983, 1st col. 8th line, not Denouville but Denonville; 2d col. same page, 2d line, cost should read coast.

DONORS OF PORTRAITS: George Barney, two portraits; Mrs. J. B. Perry, George Barney and others, portrait of Rev. Mr. Perry; Dorman Family, Rev. Mr. Dorman; Dr. H. P. Hall—Hall portraits: Col. Jewett, portrait; Ferris Family, Judge Ferris.

THE HISTORY OF THE TOWN OF GROTON, IN CALEDONIA COUNTY.

BY GEN. A. HARLEIGH HILL.

This town was chartered Oct. 20, 1789, by his Excellency, Thomas Chittenden. I copy from the charter :

The Governor, Council and General Assembly of the State of Vermont. To all People to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting: Know ye, that whereas Lieutenant Thomas Butterfield and his associates have by petition, requested a Grant of a tract of unappropriated lands within this State in order for settling a New Plantation to be erected into a Township. We have therefore thought fit for the due encouragement of their laudable desires, and for other valuable causes, and considerations, us hereunto moving, and do by these Presents, in the name and by the authority of the Freemen of the State of Vermont, Give, and Grant, the Tract of land hereafter described and bounded unto the said Lieutenant Thomas Butterfield and the several Persons hereafter named, his associates in equal shares, viz, Nehemiah Lovell, James Whitlaw, Elijah Galusha, Noah Chittenden, Jedediah Hyde, Ethan Allen, Benjamin Sumner, Jonathan Fassett, Moses Robinson, David Fassett, Robert Johnson, Sarah Chittenden, James Abbott, Polly Fay, Joseph Fay, Jonathan Arnold, Oliver Ashley, Thomas Chittenden, and Sixty one others.

Said Township to contain twenty eight thousand acres. And that the same be and hereby is incorporated into a Township, by the name of Groton, &c., . . . To have and to hold said granted Premises, as above expressed.

Upon the following conditions and reservations namely: That each Proprietor of the Town of Groton aforesaid, his Heirs or assigns, shall plant and cultivate five acres of land, and build a House at least eighteen feet square on the floor, or have one family on each respective Right, within the term of three years next after the bounds of said Township shall be fully ascertained and known, on penalty of the forfeiture of each respective Right, or share of land in said Township, not so improved, or settled, and the same to revert to the Freemen of this State, to be by their Representatives, Regranted, to such Persons, as shall appear to settle and cultivate the same. In testimony whereof, we have hereunto caused the seal of this State to be affixed this 20th day of October in the year of our Lord, 1789,

By his Excellency's command.

THOMAS CHITTENDEN.

JOSEPH FAY, Secretary.

Groton is bounded N. by Peacham, E. by Ryegate, S. by Topsham and W. by Harris and Goshen Gores, which separate it from Plainfield. It contains 38,300 acres. Groton with the other towns in the county were first in Gloucester county, New York, then in the shire of Newbury and County of Cumberland, Vt., afterwards in Orange county, and now in Caledonia county. There is no authentic record showing the origin of the name which it bears; but there is a tradition, handed down from its early settlers and those first born in town, that it received the name of Groton, through the influence of its earliest settlers who were born in Groton, Mass., and others who were natives of that town. This may or may not be susceptible of proof, although it seems highly probable. The surface of the town is hilly and uneven, but the soil is fertile and well adapted to agricultural pursuits.

The rock being almost exclusively granite, renders the western part difficult of cultivation. Wells River flows through the town from N. W. to S. E., affording many excellent water privileges for machinery, together with its tributaries. It rises in Groton Pond, which is situated in the north western part of the town, and is a beautiful sheet of water, one mile in length, and one half mile in breadth. A few rods north of Groton Pond is situated Long Pond, which is 4 miles in length, by one half to one mile in breadth. A river connecting those two lakes flowing into Groton Pond, affords an excellent water privilege, on which is established a lumber manufactory. These lakes both being within the limits of Groton, cover an area of 2,880 acres, and are at an elevation of 1083 feet above the level of the ocean. But as it is not my purpose to write an extended history of the town, as a general description has been given in the first volume of the Historical Gazetteer, including its church histories, etc., it need not be repeated here. My space only admitting of a brief sketch of the public life of its early settlers, I shall be able to touch merely some of the most interesting points in their history.

CAPTAIN EDMUND MORSE, son of Thomas Morse of Reading, Mass., was born in Groton, Mass., in 1764. He was a descendant of Anthony Morse, who was born at Marlboro, Wiltshire, England, May, 1606, and migrated to this country and settled at Newbury, Mass., 1635, and died there, Oct. 12, 1686. Captain Edmund Morse resided in Haverhill, N. H. a number of years. He married Sally, daughter of Captain Ephraim Wesson, then of Haverhill, and came to Groton, Vt., about the year 1783 or 1784. He was the first settler of Groton. He built the first saw and grist mill in town, at the outlet of Groton Pond, also the first saw mill on North branch—a tributary of Wells River. He also built the first framed house in town, and the first hill of corn in town was raised on his farm by Israel Bailey, who also came from Haverhill with Dea. James Abbott and Jonathan James. These four pioneers were the first to make even a temporary residence in Groton. They settled in the N. E. corner of the town. Capt. Morse purchasing lots Nos. 3 and 4, first division, Abbott, No. 1, and James No. 2.

We cannot determine the precise date of the arrival of Capt. Edmund Morse, Abbott and James in Groton, but the records of Cumberland county, in the "Shire of Newbury," show a deed of land in Groton, dated Sept. 6, 1783, from Jacob Bailey to James Abbott, and it is reasonable to suppose that the settlement commenced near that date.

Capt. Morse was the first blacksmith, the first military captain, commanding as lieutenant or captain 10 years. Groton and Newbury at that date composed one military company. He was proprietors' clerk for non-resident land proprietors for many years; was a most active and energetic man, first to move in all matters of improvement that related to the new settlement, especially public roads. He was liberal and generous, devoting his time and means to the welfare of the settlement, and to the poor and needy the "string of his door latch was never pulled in." To give an idea of the state of affairs at that period an anecdote is related: At that time there were no mills for grinding grain nearer than Newbury, a distance of 10 miles or more, and the settlers were obliged to carry their grain on their backs to be ground, their path being marked by spotted trees. While so engaged, one of the settlers met a resident of an adjoining town with his plough irons on his back, who inquired the direction to the residence of Capt. Morse, the blacksmith; and was answered, "If it is Capt. Morse's blacksmith shop that you want, you are in his shop now, but his anvil is 10 miles from here." The facts being that his "anvil" was on a stump, and the only covering for his "blacksmith tools," being the "blue canopy above." Capt. Morse was an exemplary and worthy member of the Calvinistic Baptist church from its organization in town. He was honored with many positions of trust during his active life, and possessed the respect and esteem of his townsmen in a high degree. He was a prominent citizen, liberal and generous, almost to a fault. It is related of him that his services as proprietors' clerk were always free, and without compensation, and his house was always open and free to all. Nothing but good will ever be associated with his memory. He had 3 sons and 7 daughters: Sally, born Sept. 2, 1789—the first born in Groton, Peter, Betsy, Polly, Hannah, Lydia, Edmund, Susan, Lucinda and Isaac. After a long life of usefulness he died on the farm on which he first commenced here, Sept. 13, 1843, aged 78 yrs., 10 mos., at peace with the world, and in the full assurance of a life eternal. His wife survived him only 2 months, dying here Nov. 12, 1843, aged 79 yrs.

Much might be written illustrating the trials and privations of that period; of the sacrifices and discomforts, which was the common lot of the pioneers; and it is with reluctance that I close the page in this brief notice of one of its worthy citizens and most devoted benefactors in "bygone days," Capt. Edmund Morse.

JAMES ABBOTT

came from Haverhill, N. H., with Captain Edmund Morse. He was a member of the Congregational church in Peacham from its first organization in 1794. He resided on lot No. 1, the N. E. corner lot in Groton. He died in 1815. On the death of Dea. James Abbott, Ephraim Wesson, son of Capt. Ephraim Wesson, purchased the farm on which he resided until his death at an advanced age. Jonathan James, who came from Haverhill also with Morse and Abbott, resided on lot No. 2 with his family many years; the exact date of his death we cannot determine. Jacob Jenness, a relative of Capt. Edmund Morse, resided many years on lot No. 3, the north lot of the Morse farm, and was the first settler of that lot, clearing the first land on the same. Jacob Jenness in after years removed to Craftsbury, and resided there until his death in 1857, aged 93 years.

Lot No. 5 was first settled by Peter Wesson, son of Capt. Ephraim Wesson; deed from Jabez Bigelow, then of Newbury, to Peter Wesson, dated Sept. 14, 1789. Peter Wesson died in 1791, after which the farm was purchased by Enoch Manchester, on which he resided many years with his family.

Lot No. 6 was first settled by John Phelps. He was of African descent. It is said of him that his peculiar habit of "borrowing" his neighbors' property often "borrowing" at the "noon of night," which property he invariably forgot to return, caused much trouble and litigation in the settlement. After his removal from the town, the farm was owned and occupied by Capt. Ephraim Gary. Samuel Bacon, an early settler, came from Connecticut. His residence was on the Captain Morse farm.

Jonathan Macomber also resided on the Capt. Morse farm, on the "Old County Road," so called, which leads from Peachamby the Massey hotel and store (since the Rillsbury farm), thence through the Morse farm westward to Orange, &c. This was the only thoroughfare from Peacham in that direction. Jonathan Macomber was of Irish descent, of fine personal appearance, kind, obliging, and well informed on all subjects of interest at that date. He was the first representative to the Legislature of the State from Groton, being elected in 1803, without opposition. There were not two political parties at that election, denominated "Grayhegans and Kennebunkers," as erroneously stated in the early part of the Historical Gazeteer in 1862. No such rallying was raised at any election. Though blessed with but little of this world's goods, he was by unanimous consent the best informed, most capable, and consequently was elected.

At the close of a beautiful day, "in the leafy month of June," 1799, might be seen on the "Old County Road," west of the Captain Morse dwelling-house, a young man traveling toward the dwelling aforesaid. On his back he carried a saddle, and by his side walked a young lady, elegantly attired. Both seemed to be of the higher walks of life. No one knew from whence they came, or whither going. Halting a few moments at the captain's residence, they informed the inmates that their horse, a valuable one, could be found at the confines of the Morse farm, on the "Old County Road," at a cassy, so termed, at which place they had abandoned him, with a broken leg, offering the horse to any one who would go to its assistance. The settlers repaired at once to the place designated. The horse was given to Jonathan Macomber, by common consent, who in process of time restored the animal to soundness, and it remained in his possession until it died of old age. On this horse Jonathan Macomber rode "horse back," to the Legislature of the State, on his first election.

An anecdote is related, showing that "the wisdom of the State" were not exempt from criticism, even in that Puritan age, and fortunate indeed, would be the legislators of the present age, were they subjects of no greater criticism. Representative Macomber not being able to procure a watch, Capt. Morse assisted the representative in his dilemma to a silver watch, with a remarkably long chain. On the return of Macomber from the legislature, it was observed and remarked by many of his townsmen, that the "watch chain aforesaid, had evidently grown in his absence several inches." Mr. Macomber, after some years residence in town, removed with his family to the shores of Lake Champlain. The date of his death we cannot determine.

Nathaniel Knights was born Feb. 28, 1761. He married Hannah Smith, who was born May 26, 1768, and died May 13, 1843. He came from Connecticut to Groton, at an early period in the settlement, and built a residence also on the Capt. Morse farm near the south line, in which he lived during his residence in Groton. He was the first town clerk in Groton, being elected March 28, 1797.

At this meeting, which was the first regular organization of the town, Samuel Bacon was chosen moderator; Samuel Bacon, Nathaniel Knight, and James Abbott, selectmen; Jonathan James, treasurer; William Frost, constable and collector; Dominicus Gray, town grand juror; Israel Bailey and Edmund Morse, tithingmen; Aaron Hosmer, Jr., and Silas Lund, highway surveyors; Robards Darling, surveyor of lumber; William Frost, sealer of weights and measures; Jeremiah Bach-elder and Samuel Darling, hog-reeves; James Hooper, fence viewer.

Nathaniel Knight was also the first school teacher, teaching ten winters in succession in the first settlement, and the most of the time in a part of the dwelling-house of James Abbott. He enjoyed the confidence of the people in a marked degree, holding the office of justice of the peace, selectman, &c., for many years. He was a prominent citizen, gentlemanly and courteous, and very exact in all his business transactions. After residing in Groton several years, he purchased a lot of land in Ryegate, joining the Capt. Morse and the Peter Wesson farms, on their east line, and removed with his family to Ryegate, in which town he resided until his death. He died in Ryegate, May 18, 1843, aged 82 years.

SALLY HILL,

daughter of Capt. Edmund Morse, was born in Groton, Sept. 2, 1787, and was the first child born in the town. And here allow me to correct an error in Thompson's Gazetteer of Vermont, which names "a son of James Abbott, as the first child." The facts are that the child in question was born in Haverhill, N. H., and came to Groton with its parents. Near that period Capt. Morse built the first saw-mill at the outlet of Groton Pond, or, more properly speaking, the head of Wells River. His family resided with him in a rude shanty near the pond while constructing the mills. There being no bridge across the river, the laborers carried the child, observing that "Sally Morse was the first child that ever crossed Wells River." She seemed destined to a life of toil from early youth, being industrious and capable beyond her years. A case in point is related. In the year 1799, it being the day of the annual parade and drill of Capt. Morse's military company some miles from his residence, where his wife lay sick of fever, with Sally, then only 12 years of age, her only attendant. At 11 o'clock, A. M., Jonathan Macomber, the captain's confidential friend, appeared, "with orders from the captain" to lay the cloth for 40 guests, who would dine with him that day at 1 o'clock, P. M.

Nothing daunted, Sally at once pressed Macomber into service, as a "chopper of wood and drawer of water," and when the hour appointed arrived, bringing the captain and his 40 military guests, the order was obeyed to the letter. Among his guests were many of the most influential citizens of Peacham, and not the least conspicuous was Gen. John Mattocks, then only a field officer of the regiment, donning the captain's cocked hat and sword, which was not "a rusty old scythe," as erroneously stated by the historian of Groton, in the Gazetteer in 1862, but a sword purchased of Gen. Whitlaw, of Ryegate, and by him brought from Scotland.

The appearance of Gen. Mattocks on that occasion created no little mirth, while marshaling the guests around the beautiful board, as the General was slim and small in stature in his youth. The hour was spent, as on all such occasions, with mirth and sentiment, and many compliments to their "little hostess," who bore her honors meekly. Such scenes are fresh in the memory of many now on the stage of life. In the year 1803, Sally Morse was married to John Hill, by the Rev. David Southerland, which was the first couple married by him after his arrival in this country from Scotland. There are but few women of the present age whose fortune has been so varied, or that have performed an equal amount of labor. Possessed of a strong constitution and a hopeful spirit, she surmounted obstacles that would seem almost incredible at the present date. Her memory was truly remarkable. Failure in memory, in the last years of a protracted life, is the general doom of the human race, but she was not a subject of this common fate. Even in her last days she could relate with minute exactness the occurrence of events in her childhood. Her generosity and liberality were unbounded. She inherited in a high degree the kind and tender feelings, the goodness of heart, and compassion for the poor and needy, which were the distinguishing traits in the character of her parents. The sick and destitute were the special objects of her care. In her family relations she was a kind and devoted mother, with a strong attachment to her home and her native town.

To the scenes of her childhood she loved to revert, and seemed never weary in relating events of the past. At that early period in the settlement, the wolf, undisturbed by the encroachments of civilization, still continued its nightly howling. To the settlers, nothing could be more startling than the night cry of the wolves, that "doleful music of the wilderness" often rendering the long nights hideous around their rude dwellings, especially when the settlers were watching their coal-pits by night, or burning their log-piles in process of clearing, which always stirred up the ferocity of the hungry wolves. The little flocks of the settlers were always in peril, the wolves often entering the sheep enclosures in quest of their prey.

One instance she would relate of the sagacity of a huge bear, which in broad day came near their dwelling in quest of a dinner of mutton. The tactics of bruin were particularly noticeable on that occasion. He would circle around the frightened flock, seeking a weak point of attack, who would assemble in close column, facing outward, and await the attack of the enemy, bruin, the meanwhile, manœuvring around his prey, often charging furiously. The column, unlike the "Imperial Guard" of the great Napoleon, would as often "break ranks" and "deploy" in all directions. Seeing this unequal warfare, Sally, then a young girl, in company with a daughter of Phelps, the inveterate "borrower," went into the enclosure in defence of the flock, and by the energetic waving of their aprons, succeeded in driving bruin into the forest.

The cares and hardships of a farmer's life she shared cheerfully with her stirring and untiring companion, whom she lived to follow to the grave, and also 5 of the 8 children that composed her family. She removed in 1857 from the farm on which she was born. She died at St. Johnsbury, Dec. 1, 1864, aged 77½ years, and was buried in the old burying-ground in Groton, where rest the ashes of her companion and children who had gone before. "She rests from her labors, but her works do follow her."

JOHN HILL,

son of Joseph Hill, of Berwick, Me., was born at Berwick, Me., April 15, 1770. The father of Joseph Hill came from England, to Kittery, Me., where he resided till his death. The parents of John Hill and all members of his father's family were members of the society of "Friends," or Quakers, which is a characteristic of the Hills, and also of the Breeds, to this day. The mother of John Hill was Mary Breed, daughter of Jabez Breed. She was born on "Breed's Hill," in Charlestown, where was fought the battle of "Bunker's Hill," which land was the property of her ancestors who came from England, and from whom "Breed's Hill" took its name. John Hill came to Groton in 1794 or 1795, from Berwick, Me., shortly after the arrival of Foxwell Whitcher, Capt. Ephraim Gary, and Capt. William Frost, who came from Sanford, Me., and all of whom married sisters of John Hill. He purchased in the northeast part of Groton lots Nos. 8 and 9, first division, as by his deed signed by Oliver Ashley, Nov. 21, 1795. After a few years of hard labor on his farm, and probably missing the melancholy music of the "deep blue sea," he sold his farm to Moses Plummer, from Sanford, Me., taking his "promise to pay," $1500 in whiskey, at 4s per gallon. In two or three years, the whiskey not being forthcoming, he returned to the "new state," so called, again took possession of his farm, and Plummer in turn, longing, undoubtedly for a sight of the "dazzling land-locked sea," returned to the Bay State, after a residence in Groton of about 3 years.

In the year 1803, John Hill purchased of Gov. Robinson, at Bennington, the lot of land opposite his dwelling, it being lot No. 24, and again commenced the life of a farmer in earnest. To illustrate, he fell 50 acres of trees on said lot, in one piece, and had it all in crop the year following. His fruit orchard was composed of 1200 apple trees. His farm contained 350 acres, mostly covered with rock maple, beech and birch, which was the timber of the forests in their original grandeur, then existing on all the farms in the north east part of the town. Nothing could be more beautiful than these farms before the woodman's axe echoed through their stately groves. He was for many years one of the most important, and one of the most active, energetic and untiring workers of that period. It is related of him that few men of that "iron edge" were capable of performing his accustomed daily labor, even for a single day. He had the first painted house in town, the first wheeled carriage, and kept the first shop of goods for sale. He married Sally Morse, as before stated, in 1803. His family consisted of 8 children, namely: Charlotte, Nathan Breed, Lydia, Mary, Eliza, Roxana, Albert, Harleigh, Peter Morse, and Benjamin Franklin Hill. He seemed to be the favored child of fortune for many years. In an evil hour, he endorsed heavily for a brother-in-law, in consequence of which he lost the most of his property, from which misfortune he never recovered. He died at Groton, on the farm which he commenced, July 11, 1840, aged 70 1-4 years.

CAPT. EPHRAIM WESSON.

Capt. Ephraim Wesson, son of Stephen Wesson, was born in Groton, Mass., in 1721. His ancestors came from England to this country. Capt. Wesson married early in life Sarah Proctor, and at the time he joined the "Provincial army," under Gen. Johnson, in 1755, he was residing with his family in Pepperell, Mass. Early in the spring of 1755, the colonies planned an expedition against "Crown Point," among other expeditions. The expedition against Crown Point was led by Gen. William Johnson of New York. History records that near the south end of Lake George, Gen. Johnson met and defeated a force of French and Indians under Baron Dieskau. Satisfied with this success, Johnson wasted the autumn in erecting "Fort William Henry" near the battle ground, &c. Capt. Ephraim Wesson, enlisted and entered the provincial army under Johnson. His "Enlisting orders," from Gov. Shirley to raise soldiers for that expedition bear date March 29, 1755. In August, 1755, another engagement took place between Gen. Johnson's and the Baron Dieskau's forces, who were then marching toward Fort Edward. The detachment sent out by Gen. Johnson to intercept the French and save the fort were surprised and routed with fearful slaughter. The Baron Dieskau pursued and made an attack on Gen. Johnson's camp in turn. Here the English were victorious. The French were defeated, and Baron Dieskau was wounded and taken prisoner by the English. We find Capt. Ephraim Wesson in 1755 in the towns of Groton, Pepperell, Dunstable, &c., enlisting volunteers, armed with authority from Gov. Shirley as follows :

PROVINCE OF THE MASSACHUSETTS BAY.

By his Excellency the Governor.

I do hereby authorize and empower Ephraim Wesson to beat his drums anywhere within this Province, for enlisting volunteers for his Majesty's service, in a Regiment of foot to be forthwith raised for an expedition to Crown Point, and the lake of the Iroquois Indians, of which Regiment Moses Titcome is Colonel. And the Colonels, with the other Officers of the Regiments within this Province are hereby commanded not to give the said Ephraim Wesson, any obstruction, or molestation herein ; but on the contrary to afford him all the necessary encouragement and assistance, for which this is a sufficient warrant. Given under my hand at Boston the 29th day of March, 1755, in the 28th year of his Majesty's Reign.

WILLIAM SHIRLEY.

As additional authority we find with his "Army Rolls," "Reports of Battles," "Orders of the Day," "Quarter Masters' accounts," "Lists of dead and wounded," etc., which compose the "Capt. Wesson war papers" at different camps, "Crown Point, "Lake George," "Halfway Brook," "Camp at Albany," "Camp at Ticonderoga," "Fort Edward," "Louisburg," etc., which papers we regret our inability to print, certain proclamations setting forth the objects of the expeditions.

"By his Excellency, William Shirley Esq. Captain-General, and Governor in chief, in, and over his Majesty's Province of the Massachusetts Bay in New England.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the several governments of the Massachusetts Bay, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, being apprehensive of the great danger to which his Majesty's colonies are exposed by the encroachments made by the French, on his Majesty's lands upon this continent, and being desirous of securing his Majesty's dominions from any further invasion of his just rights in these parts, have determined that it is necessary forthwith to raise such a united force as by the blessings of Almighty God, may be sufficient for that purpose ; and in a particular manner, have proposed the erecting of a strong fortress, within the limits of his Majesty's territories to the northward of the province of New York ; and the several governments of New York, New Jersey, & Pennsylvania, have been desired to join in said Enterprise ; and it is expected will offered their assistance therein. I do therefore upon the special request of the Council, and House of Representatives of this Province, for the encouragement of such persons as shall be willing to engage in this service, hereby publish and declare, the several articles which have been agreed upon and voted by the General Court, for promoting this expedition, which articles are as follows viz. That each able bodied effective man, who shall enlist, shall have a good blanket given him at the time of his enlistment, and shall be allowed twenty-six shillings and eight pence per month wages, during the service, and shall be exempted from impress for three years after his discharge.

That such persons as shall be provided with sufficient arms, shall be allowed a dollar over and above their wages, to be paid them at their first muster. That the pay of the Officers shall be the same with that of the officers in the late expedition to Kennebeck River. And I do hereby promise in behalf of his Majesty's said province of Massachusetts Bay, that there shall be full compliance with the encouragement made by each, and every of the articles aforesaid. Given under my hand at Boston the 26th day of March 1755, and in the 28th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord, George the second, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France & Ireland, King, Defender of the faith, &c.

W. SHIRLEY.

By his Excellency's command }
I Willard secretary. }

God save the King."

After enlisting many volunteers for that expedition, Ephraim Wesson entered the army as first lieutenant in Capt. Eliphalet

Taylor's company, Col. Moses Titcomb's regiment, Gen. William Johnson commanding, as by date of his commission Apr. 5, 1755, signed by Gov. Shirley. As an additional encouragement we find the following:

"By the Honourable"

Spencer Phips, Esq.; Lieutenant-Governor and Commander in chief in and over His Majesty's Province of the Massachusetts-Bay in New-England.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, the great and General Court or assembly of this Province have, for the further encouragement of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers enlisting for the expedition to Crown Point, Voted, that four dollars shall be paid to each able-bodied man immediately upon his enlistment, and two dollars more upon his producing sufficient fire arms at the time of the muster, to be inclusive of the Grant, or Bounty already voted by Government; and that the pay or wages shall commence at the time of enlisting; and the subsistence at the time of marching from their place of dwelling to the place of Rendezvous; and that no deduction shall be made out of their pay for any bounty they may so receive.

I do therefore hereby promise in behalf of the said Great and General Court, that there shall be a full compliance with the articles above mentioned, for the encouragement of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers aforesaid. Given at Boston, the 25th day of April, 1755, and in the 28th year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord George the second, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, defender of the faith, &c.

S. PHIPS.

By his Honour's command. }

I. Willard, secretary. }

God save the King.

Capt. Ephraim Wesson served under Gen. Johnson, also in the expedition under Maj. Gen. Abercrombie. To give an idea of the style of military documents, I copy from the army records:

CAMP AT LAKE GEORGE,

September 5, 1755.

Colonel Pomroye, Field officer for the day.

Parole, Lyman.

Rounds went as usual, nothing remarkable, but all is well.

EPHRAIM WESSON,
Captain of the Quarter guard.

In 1758, the colonies proposed three expeditions. The first against Louisburg; the second against Ticonderoga, &c. The expedition against Ticonderoga was conducted by the inefficient Gen. Abercrombie, who was commander-in-chief. Capt. Wesson also joined this expedition under Maj. Gen. Abercrombie, and served as captain in Colonel Nichols' regiment. He was also at the siege of Louisburg, which surrendered to Gen. Amherst, July 27, 1758, with 6000 prisoners and large munitions of war. Gen. Abercrombie embarked at Fort William Henry with an army of 15,000 men, passed down Lake George, and landing, marched against Ticonderoga, which garrison was defended by the brave Montcalm. Gen. Abercrombie, without waiting for his artillery, rashly commenced the assault. After a bloody struggle in which he lost in killed and wounded 2000 men, he made a precipitate retreat. Capt. Ephraim Wesson was in all the engagements of note at that period. On the death of Capt. Thomas Lawrence, who fell in battle, he was appointed captain of his company.

In after years he related many interesting incidents connected with his campaigns. One in particular, at the Surrender of Louisburg, illustrating the fact that in his case, at least, the demoralizing effects of army life had not entirely obliterated his tender feelings and goodness of heart. At the siege of Louisburg, by the English army, after the close of the battle, Captain Wesson, while procuring water for his thirsty and weary soldiers, an aged lady emerged from her dwelling and insisted that the soldiers should accept of her scanty store of beer, which she served to each soldier in person, expressing her thanks to the Captain that the battle had ended, and the place surrendered, "as he had vena most shot her head off a number of times." This little incident, the Captain relates, affected him extremely: to see this aged woman, returning good for evil, and as it were, caressing the hand that had so cruelly smote them! Captain Wesson was a conscientious and moral citizen, and a strict Puritan in all his principles. I again copy from the war records:

LAKE GEORGE, August y^e 19, 1758, }
Parole New London. }

For the day tomorrow, Colonel Haviland, Colonel Bayley, Field Officer for the Piquet this night.

Colonel Massey, and Major Day. O. C. Mackfield of the 44th Regiment, tried at the late Court Martial for stealing, and was sentenced to receive one thousand lashes. Major General Abercrombie approves of the sentence, and orders it put into execution."

"Ordered"

That Captain Ephraim Wesson, act as Captain in Colonel Ebenezer Nichols Regiment, in the room of Thomas Lawrence killed by the enemy on the 20th day of July last, and that he be obeyed as such. Given under my hand this 21st of July 1758.

JEDEDIAH PREBBLE.

Commanding Officer of the Massachusetts Provincials.

"Regimental Orders."

Orders from Colonel Nichols to his Regiment, now in Camp, that the quarter guard consisting of one sub., one sergt., one Corporal, and twenty four privates to continue till further orders. That the officers of the guard daily keep good sentrys, and to see that there be no disturbance after 9 o'clock in the camp, and sentaries posted as usual, and be releaved as usual, not less than five on the breast.

Colonel Nichols has been pleased to appoint the following officers in his Regiment with the consent of Major General Abercrombie, and Col. Prebble, viz., Ephraim Wesson, Captain, in the room of Thomas Lawrence, Deceased, and Joseph Foxwell 2d Lieut., and Henry Woods, Ensign under him. Isaac Osgood, Captain in the room of Ebenezer Jones, Deceased, and Ebenezer Jones 1st Lieut., and Samuel Thompson 2d Lieut., and Joseph Holt, Ensign under him. John Chapham Capt. in the room of Captain Samuel Daken, Dec^d and Joseph Stratton 2^d Lieut., and John Dunlap Ensign under him. Enoch Poor, Adjutant for the Regiment. The above said officers to be obeyed as such."

"The Oath of Fidelity." "I swear to be true to our Sovereign Lord King George, and to serve him honestly and faithfully, in defence of his person, crown, and dignity, against all his enemies or opposers whatsoever; and to observe and obey His Majesty's orders, and the orders of the Generals and Officers set over me by his Majesty."

LAKE GEORGE, August y^e 23d—1758, }
Parole Hallifax. }

William Moorar, John Anderson, John Harris, and Thomas Vincent, in Colonel Gage's Regiment, of Light Infantry tryed at the late court martial, of which Colonel Haveland was President for desertion, to suffer death. Major General Abercrombie approves the sentence.

The following letter from the father of Captain Ephraim Wesson, to his sons in the army shows the style of correspondence in y^e olden time :

WILMINGTON, Mass., dated August }
y^e 8th, 1758. }

To Ephraim Wesson, my son. After my tender regards and love for you, hoping that these lines may find you in good health, I, your Mother, Brothers and sisters are in measures of health, at this time. I would inform you that we have heard of the sorrowful news of the engagement near the "Half way Brook"; of Captain Jones, Captain Lawrence, &c. that they are killed. It is a time for great concern for y^e army. Sorrowful from time to time is y^e news. But I hope you will put your trust in God. I hope he will be your shield and preserver. Give my service to Colonel Nichols an Mr. Morrill. I leave you in the hands of God. So I remain your compassionate Father.

STEPHEN WESSON.

The following to Nathan, brother to Captain Ephraim Wesson, who was also in the army :

DATED AT WILMINGTON, July y^e }
30th, 1758. }

Nathan my Son, after my love to you, hoping that these lines may find you in health, as I, your Mother, Brothers and Sisters are at this time. Your Brother in his letter dated y^e 7th of July, wrote that you were then well, for which I bless God. Give God all the praise, and glory for all his goodness, to you. Let the fear of God, be always before your eyes. Pray to him, and put your whole trust in him. Shun bad company and bad language. Keep God's commands. Obey your superior Officers. Take good care that you do not expose your life to danger needlessly. So I remain your loving Father.

STEPHEN WESSON.

In a letter from Stephen Wesson to his sons in the army dated July y^e 30th, 1758, he writes :

These lines I must confess, I write with an aching heart, full of deep concern for my children, friends and acquaintance, but I commit them all to the care of God. I would inform you that we have heard of the lamentable defeat at Ticonderoga. I am full of concern for this Western army, what the success may be. We have heard that near 1600 went over the lake in high spirits and landed safe. You inform me that you are stationed at Fort Miller, very contrary to your mind. Submit with patience to the will of God. Be not hasty in rushing forward, but let it be your main care that the favor and presence of God, may be with you, &c.

CAMP AT LAKE GEORGE, August y^e }
11th, 1758, Parole Darby. }

The General, having intelligence of spies being about the camp, advises the officers if they meet with any people that cannot give an account of themselves to send them to headquarters, to be examined, and that they would observe the following description of a particular person, viz: 5 feet 10 inches high, a likely fellow, red complexion, red hair, speaks French, English and Indian. . . . The whole army to keep their breast-work in good order, and to widen and keep the ditches clean. The Provost martial to go his rounds as formerly, and to take his executioner with him as formerly ordered; he is to take up all persons found firing around the camp, and give each 500 lashes on y^e spot. The General returns his thanks to the officers and men, who were out with Major Rogers, and Major Putnam, Captain Deed, and Captain Doleed, for their good behavior on that occasion, and hopes they are fully satisfied that the enemy are a despicable enemy, against men who will do their duty.

It will be remembered that the "Major Rogers," of whom the General makes "Honorable mention," in the above "orders of the day," was the same brave Robert Rogers who, in the year following General Amherst, then commanding at "Crown Point," on Sept. 13, 1759, despatched with 200 men, to the headquarters of the St. Francis tribe of Indians in Canada, which force utterly destroyed the Indian village of St. Francis, killing 200 savages on the spot, and taking 20 prisoners; of Major Rogers' return by way of the Passumpsic river in October, the disaster which attended his men, many of whom died on the way with hunger, and at the mouth of the Passumpsic river, and on the meadows below in the town of Barnet, where human bones were found in different places; Major Rogers' final arrival at "No. 4," now Charlestown, N. H.; of his arrival at "Crown Point" Dec. 7, 1759, with the remnant of his force, having lost, after leaving the smoking ruins of St. Francis, three lieutenants and 46 sergents and privates. Some of the St. Francis tribe of Indians after the destruction of their village by Major Rogers returned to the Coos meadows in Newbury and Haverhill, where they lived and died, and their families became extinct.

"Captain Joe" was one of the St. Francis tribe of Indians. He hated the British, and was a firm friend of the colonics. In after years, with his wife "Molly," he spent much of his time hunting and fishing around the ponds in Groton and vicinity. His name was given to "Joe's Pond," in Danville, and that of "Molly" to "Molly's Pond," in Cabot [pages —, —, —]. When he became old, and unable to trap the wild game of the forests, the Legislature of Vermont granted him a pension of $70 annually. It is related of "Molly" that whenever she had imbibed too freely of "fire water," she would bewail the death of "Toomelick," their son, which took place at Haverhill. Always on such occasions Captain Joe would quiet the grief of Molly with these words, pointing upwards in solemn awe, "Molly, one God! one God!"

The following memorandum will convey an idea of the style of y^e olden times:

DATED AT FLAT BUSH, }
June y^e 13th, 1758. }

CAMP AT ALBANY, }
Sept. 15, 1758. }

Sir.—Please to deliver John Irwin, Groton, of my company, in Colonel Nichols' Regiment, to the value of two shillings and eight pence, lawful money, which I promise to stop out of his pay on the rolls for you, for which this shall be your voucher. EPIHRAIM WESSON, Captain.

To SAMUEL BLODGET, Q. M.

CAMP AT LAKE GEORGE, }
October y^e 14th, 1758. }

Then received of Captain Ephraim Wesson ten guns and five bayonets, which I have returned in to the King's stores.

EBENEZER NICHOLS, Colonel.

From Ensign Woods, in Captain Wesson's company, to Captain Wesson:

To Captain Ephraim Wesson, Groton, in the Bay Government:—

CAMP AT TICONDEROGA, }
August y^e 12th, 1759. }

Sir.—These with my regards to you and yours, are to let you know that I am in good health.

Sir.—To my great joy I received your letter, which informed me that you and all my friends were well; also that Oliver Larkin was returned from captivity, and the remarkable account of his getting home from the enemy. Give my compliments to said Oliver, and tell him that we are paying them for their old tricks. As for the affairs among us, our employ is chiefly fatigue duty. Part of the army is at Crown Point, and part is at this place. We are repairing this Fort with all expedition, and the rest of the army are building a new Fort at Crown Point. We hear that there is a party of men gone to lay out a road to No. 4 (now Charlestown, N. H.) The army is very healthy, and our company are well that are at this place. So I conclude, and subscribe myself your well-wishing friend.

HENRY WOODS.

Captain Ephraim Wesson removed to Haverhill, N. H., some years prior to the war of the Revolution. The exact date is not specified. Here he resided with his family until he removed to Groton. His family consisted of 5 sons and 2 daughters: Aaron, James, Ephraim, Peter, Samuel, Sally and Elizabeth. He was a very prominent citizen during his residence in Haverhill, and was appointed to many offices of honor and trust by the citizens of that part of New Hampshire. During the Revolution he enjoyed the confidence of the people in a high degree. He was appointed "committee of safety" and "committee of correspondence," etc. He was elected selectman of Haverhill, and held various other offices several years. He was appointed "Delegate to y^e Provincial Congress" at Exeter, and figured conspicuously in all public transactions with General Bailey, Colonel Johnston, and others, of Haverhill and Newbury, at that exciting period. His mode of traveling to the Provincial Congress was riding horseback, with saddle-bags, the usual way at that time. He was a special delegate at different times to the Congress to procure arms and ammunition for the settlement at Haverhill and vicinity.

HAVERHILL, April 26th, 1775.

To the Committee of Correspondence at Poursmouth:

Gentlemen: We, the committee of Correspondence, convened at Haverhill in New Hampshire, agreeable to the recommendations of the Continental Congress, when convened at Philadelphia on their session, recommended to the several Provinces to prepare and hold themselves in preparation for defence against an enemy. We the committee for inspection, legally chosen by the said town of Haverhill, having examined into the true state and condition of the inhabitants of our said town of Haverhill, do find them destitute, a large number of them, of arms and ammunition sufficient to defend themselves and property against the invasion of an enemy. The number which we suppose to be wanting, is to the best of our calculation, the number of fifty small arms, and we also want two barrels of powder, four hundred weight of balls, or lead, and six hundred flints, which number of arms, and quantity of ammunition, Gentlemen: if you can supply us with, and deliver the same unto Captain Ephraim Wesson, whom we send as our agent, to procure the above on our behalf, he being the bearer thereof, We the committee of Inspection and Correspondence, for our town of Haverhill aforesaid, do promise to answer the same, in behalf of the town of Haverhill aforesaid, and his receipt shall be your sufficient warrant. Given under our hands at Haverhill, the day and date above written.

To Captain Ephraim Wesson, at Exeter, with speed,

Haverhill, May 13th, 1775.

Captain Wesson.

Sir: We have wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee, Mr. J. Wentworth, Esq., and as you are one of the selectmen of this our Town of Haverhill, we desire of you to represent this our town at the Provincial Congress. And sir, as you are well knowing to the circumstances and condition of our Town, we would recommend to you, that you will use your influence and exert your abilities for the good of the Town, and represent our situation in every particular. We have sent to Montreal, a scouting party, who marched the last Sabbath.

You will apply to Mr. Wentworth, the chairman, to whom we have written concerning you. Sir, your compliance will oblige your humble servants,

JAMES BAILEY,

CHARLES JOHNSTON.

Haverhill, July 1st, 1776. Capt. Ephraim Wesson, comety man for Haverhill, Dr. to Ezekiel Wheeler, to piloting a Skouting party in the woods, to five days, at six shillings per day.

Capt. Wesson resided in Haverhill during the Revolution. He came to Groton from Haverhill shortly after the arrival of Capt. Morse and his associates. After residing in Groton a few years, he finally settled on a border lot in Peacham, it being the southeast corner lot in Peacham, joining the farm of Dea. James Abbott in Groton; as by deed from John and Elizabeth Massey to Ephraim Wesson of the south part of the Governor's farm, dated April 14, 1797, "commencing at a beach tree, at the corner of Peacham, Groton, Barnet and Ryegate," &c. Here he resided. Aaron Wesson, son of Capt. Wesson, settled on the next farm joining, in the town of Barnet, on the lot once occupied by Jonathan Fowler, the father of Barnet Fowler, the first born in Barnet. James, another son, settled in Stanstead, Canada. Sally, as before stated, married Capt. Edmund Morse. Elizabeth married Edward Clark of Bradford, Mass., who settled in Peacham, and was noted in his day as a carpenter and builder, and as performing many dangerous feats, such as descending from the top of the spire of the "old meeting house" in Peacham to the ground by the lightning rod, which meeting-house was built by said Clark. Stephen Wesson, father of Capt. Ephraim Wesson, died at Wilmington, Mass., about the year 1777. I copy from his last will and testament, as follows:

In the name of God, Amen, the 26th day of February, 1774. I Stephen Wesson, of Willmington, in the County of Middlesex and State of Massachusetts Bay in New England Yeoman, being of sound mind and memory, blessed be God therefore, do make and ordain this my last Will and Testament, namely, Principly and first, I give and recommend my soul into the hands of God who gave it, hoping through the merits, death and passion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to obtain full and free pardon of all my sins, and to inherit everlasting life. And as for my Body, I recommend it to Earth, to be decently buried, at the discretion of my Executor, nothing doubting but at the general Resurrection I shall receive the same again by the mighty power of God. And as touching such worldly goods, or estate, as it has pleased God to bestow me with, in this life, I give and dispose of them in the following manner and form namely: Item, &c.

After a long life of usefulness, beloved and respected by all, Captain Ephraim Wesson died March, 1814, at the advanced age of ninety-three years. His remains were buried in the "Old Burying Ground," in the corner of Groton and Peacham, near his dwelling-place, which burying-ground was formed of land belonging to him and his son. It is with much difficulty that his grave at this day can be pointed out, as no monument marks his "last resting-place!"

"He sleeps his last sleep, he has fought his last battle; No sound shall awake him to glory again."

The next settlers who came to Groton after Captain Morse and his associates, Abbott and James, were John Darling and his sons, Robards, Samuel and Moses, who came from Plaistow, N. H., and from whom descended the present race of Darlings in Groton. Other settlers were:

Jesse Heath, who was elected town clerk, town representative, etc. He had formerly been a soldier in the Revolution.

Dominicus Gray came from Sanford, Maine, and purchased the farm on which Timothy Townsend first commenced. He died in Groton in 1829, aged 71 years.

James Hooper came to Groton from South Berwick, Maine. Charles Emery and John Emery came to Groton from Shapleigh, Maine.

Edmund Welch and his brother Jonathan came to Groton from Kennebunk, Me., Kennebunk and Wells, Me., being one town until 1820.

The ancestors of Edmund Welch and his brother Jonathan emigrated to Kennebunk from Ireland in 1720; also, at the same time "Robert Page came from Donathkeedy, Ireland, to Kennebunk."

The records show that Edmund Welch enlisted in Captain Sawyer's company at Wells, Me., in the fall of 1775, for "eight months," and was stationed at Cambridge, Mass., during his eight months' service. At the expiration of that time he left the service and returned to Kennebunk, and in process of time came to Groton.

Aaron Hosmer, Jr., came to this town from Newbury, Vt., where his father resided at that time. Aaron Hosmer, Sr., was not "one of the first settlers." He never made even a temporary residence in town, or cleared a rod of land. He was at that time a resident of Newbury, hunting constantly with the Indians of Newbury and Haverhill.

In his hunting excursions with the Indians, he frequently visited the ponds in Groton, Peacham, Cabot, etc., following up the Wells River and encamping on their shores. Tradition points out the place where he and his Indian associates once encamped on the meadows now owned by Orison Ricker. As well might it be said that the untamed Indians who chased the timid deer through her trackless forests were its "first settlers." Gen. Whitelaw and John Allen, the agents of the "Scotch American Company," who came to Ryegate in 1773, report "Aaron Hosmer," then residing in a "rude shanty on the Connecticut river in Ryegate, with his family, about 2 miles north of the Wells River." Other authorities place him at a later date in Newbury. He was never "a resident of Groton." Aaron Hosmer, Jr., who came to Groton at an early period, resided in the town until his death.

DEA. JOSIAH PAUL

came from Sanford, Me., and purchased a part of the Capt. Morse farm, on which he resided until his death, July 19, 1842, aged 75 years. Foxwell Whitcher, Captain Ephraim Gary and Captain William Frost, all enterprising farmers in their day, came also from Sanford, Me., some years earlier. They were prominent and active citizens.

CAPT. EPHRAIM GARY

was the second military captain elected in town; was a very active, energetic farmer. He was a man of good sound judgment, possessing rare business qualifications at that period, and was a prominent citizen in town. He died Oct. 2, 1847, aged 77 years.

CAPT. WILLIAM FROST

was also a military captain in town; was the first constable that was elected in Groton. He died in Groton, on the farm on which he first commenced, at about the age of 65 years.

FOXWELL WHITCHER,

the father of the present race of Whitchers in Groton, was a prominent farmer in his day. He was endowed with a good share of intellectual ability, and possessed faculties which would have given him a prominent place in life had he kept the physical man in subjection. He was noted for his physical strength. He was tall, robust, and a most untiring worker. Having a great command of language and a wonderful memory, he was strong in argument and a most formidable opponent on almost any subject he chose to advocate. Few men at the present age are blessed with such a constitution. He died at Groton in 1837, aged 70 years.

REUBEN WHITCHER, son of Foxwell Whitcher, also resided at Groton. He was a noted carpenter and builder, and a most industrious, exemplary citizen. He was a military captain in town, and enjoyed the confidence and respect of his townsmen. He was a man of sound moral principles, a reliable, active and successful farmer. He died in Groton in 1874, aged 90 years.

JOSEPH RICKER,

who came from Newbury, was the first of that name in Groton. In the early settlement of Wells River village in Newbury he had the first store in the place, and was the first trader. He came to Groton in after years with his family, and resided in the town till his death at an advanced age. From him descended the present race of Rickers in Groton, who are active business men.

MOSES AND SAMUEL PLUMMER, sons of Moses Plummer, of Sanford, Me., who was town clerk in Groton in 1803, came to Groton in 1810, and resided. Moses Plummer died at Groton in 1867, aged 79 years, 9 months.

JEREMIAH HIDDEN

was also an early settler in Groton. We have the impression that he came from Connecticut with Nathaniel Knight, although this may not be the fact, yet he was associated closely with said Knight in all his endeavors to improve the morals of the people. Jeremiah Hidden was a man of the utmost integrity, honest, faithful, true and reliable in his professions of friendship. Nature had endowed him with more than common intellectual power. He was elected to many positions of trust and honor during his short life. He was elected town clerk in Groton in 1812 and in 1813. He represented the town in the Legislature of the State in 1809 and in 1810. He was justice of the peace during the time of his residence in town, and was respected and honored in a marked degree. He died in Groton, near the year 1814, in the enjoyment of the love of his people, and in the prime of life, and his memory was cherished by his generation, who felt his loss with unfeigned sorrow.

CAPT. ANDREW MCLARY

resided in Groton, and was a prominent and worthy citizen. He married a daughter of Joseph Ricker, from Newbury, and resided in town many years with his family. He was a military captain, a most superior officer, and held various prominent positions in town. He was a man of high moral principles, conscientious, courteous and honest in all business relations. He removed to Peacham with his family, where he resided until his death. No man in town was more respected or had fewer enemies, and his removal from Groton was a loss to the community long realized.

PETER MCLAUGHLIN

was born at Perthshire, Scotland, Mar. 10, 1774. His father, Archibald McLaughlin, came to Barnet in 1776, with his family, and purchased of Col. Harvey a tract of land in the southeast corner of the "Harvey tract." He subsequently moved to Peacham. Peter McLaughlin came to Groton from Peacham soon after the year 1796, as by deed of a lot of land in Groton given to him by his father, dated June, 1796. The lot aforesaid joined the James Abbott farm on its west line, and on the south line of Peacham. Each son of Archibald McLaughlin was presented with a lot of land by his father. Peter's lot falling in Groton. He first opened a store of goods in a part of Capt. Morse's dwelling-house, being the second store started in town.

Not succeeding as a merchant, after residing with Capt. Morse a year or two, he again commenced a farmer's life. He married, in 1808, the daughter of William Nelson of Ryegate, and moved on to the farm on which he resided until his death. Peter McLaughlin was truly a "gentleman of the old school," being well informed. Having had the advantages of the academy at Peacham, he prepared himself to enter college. Not prosecuting his studies further, he came to Groton, and was long a most worthy and influential citizen. He was elected town clerk in 1808, and held the office 8 years; was justice of the peace, and held various other offices in town for many years.

He represented the town in the Legislature of the State in 1813, in all, 8 years. He was a Puritan in all his principles; of the utmost integrity; was a worthy and consistent member of the Presbyterian church, and most truly "a worthy son of a worthy sire." He died at Groton, Mar. 21, 1852, aged 78 years.

WILLIAM AND ROBERT TAISEY, from Scotland, sons of Wm. Taisey, settled in Groton, as by deed to William Taisey of the farm, now the homestead of the Hon. Isaac N. Hall, dated July 17, 1801. William Taisey was probably the most wealthy farmer in the town in his time. He was born in Scotland Sept. 3, 1777. He married Judith Darling, daughter of Robards Darling, Aug. 2, 1808. She was born at Groton Nov. 16, 1787, and died Aug. 5, 1851. William Taisey died at Groton Jan. 23, 1813. The deed to Robert Taisey of the farm where he resided with his family is dated July 14, 1801, on which farm he resided until a few years before his death at an advanced age. John Taisey, son of Robert Taisey, was born in Scotland Jan. 11, 1791. He came to Groton with his parents at 4 years of age, and resided in the town until his death, Aug. 5, 1872. He was an active business man, had strong convictions of right, and in all his business transactions was impartial and knew no difference in parties. He held many important offices in town; was elected constable and collector for many years, and performed the duties of his various offices with the utmost fidelity. Though plain-hearted, his word was unimpeachable. He was through life an enterprising and successful farmer.

MOSES BURNHAM,

born at Rumney, N. H., Nov. 19, 1795, he came to Groton in January, 1825, with his family, which consisted of his mother, wife and two sons, George W. and Thomas Jefferson Burnham.

THE OLDEST PERSON IN TOWN.

LYDIA, whose maiden name was Bradley, the mother of Moses Burnham, was born in Haverhill, Mass., May 17, 1747. She was a descendant of the Bradley woman who was taken captive by the Indians near Haverhill, Mass., an account of which will be found in the early histories of the country. She died at Groton, Feb. 12, 1852, at the advanced age of 104 years, 9 months, the oldest person that ever lived in town. Moses Burnham was long a noted carpenter and builder, a most active, industrious and courteous citizen. He died at Groton, Sept. 30, 1861.

HON. ISAAC N. HALL,

nephew of Moses Burnham, was born at Rumney, N. H., June 3, 1808, and came to Groton in May, 1825, and has resided in Groton since his first arrival. It can be truly said of him that he is the "architect of his own fortune." By industry, perseverance and strict integrity, he has attained a position in the estimation of the people of the town and State that few men possess at the present time. He has enjoyed the confidence of the people in a remarkable degree, and has been elected to more offices of honor and trust than falls to the share of most men of his time. He married early in life, Elizabeth Taisey, daughter of William Taisey of Groton. He has held the office of justice of the peace nearly every year since 1836; was elected town clerk from 1840 to 1859; represented the town in the legislature of the State in 1835 and 1836, again in 1839 and 1840, and in 1867 and 1868. Was elected one of the assistant judges of the Caledonia county court in 1842 and 1844, and in 1845. Was elected one of the county senators in 1848 and in 1860, and again in 1861, being the first senator ever elected from Groton. He was also elected by the State legislature one of the State prison directors in 1868 and in 1869, and is at the present time one of the directors of the bank of Newbury at Wells River, having held the office since 1857. He was appointed United States assistant assessor of the second district of the State of Vermont, his commission being dated March 14, 1870, holding the office until the collection districts were consolidated. He was a delegate to the Constitutional convention held at Montpelier in 1850. He was one of the first men in the projecting and building the Montpelier and Wells River Railroad; was one of the directors of said railroad from its organization in 1869 to 1877, when the road went into the hands of the bondholders, and was president of the road from 1873 to 1877. His agency and usefulness in all matters of public interest will be discovered in all that relates to the growth and prosperity of the town for the last 50 years. There is no man who has exerted a greater influence for good, or that has advanced the interests and morals of the town in a greater degree. He has long been an exemplary and a consistent member of the Methodist church, and well might be called its main pillar. Time has dealt kindly with him. Although now over 70 years of age, he retains the activity of most men of one-half that age. Long may he live to enjoy his well-earned reputation.

JOHN DARLING,

son of Robards Darling, was born at Groton, Oct. 14, 1789. In his youth he was remarkably studious and industrious, manly in his deportment, honorable and correct in his conduct. He was a great reader, and perhaps there was no man of his time in Groton better versed in history, both ancient and modern. To illustrate the industry of his youthful days, his father's farm adjoined farmer Hill's, of whom he would contract to clear land at different times. After laboring through the day faithfully on his father's farm, he would fulfil his contract by clearing land for Hill, which labor he would do wholly in the night. Some acres of land were cleared by him for the father of the writer in this manner. The youth was truly a "type of the man" in his case. In mature age, his habits of industry were the same; he was the same incorruptible, faithful servant of right and duty. He was long a prominent citizen in town, and was elected to various offices, the duties of which he discharged with the utmost impartiality. In his political principles, he was established, firm and unchangeable. "Policy," and "availability," had no place in his creed. Under no considerations would he countenance, or allow "office seeking" in his behalf. No considerations could have tempted him to change his course from the path of rectitude and honor. On this principle he acted through life. He had a high sense of honor, and was capable, reliable, and a most worthy citizen.

We feel it a duty not to suffer the name of a worthy man, whose sense of honor precluded him from making any overt demonstrations among his fellow men for office and preferment to be lost from the records of time. He was elected town clerk in 1822, and was elected every year in succession to the year 1837. He also represented the town in the legislature of the State in 1834, and in 1837 and again in 1838. He held the office of justice of the peace, and selectman for many years, and various other offices, the duties of which he discharged with honor to himself and strictly in accordance with the principles of law and justice. He married a daughter of John Brock, of Barnet, a companion eminently qualified for the position. In the enjoyment of the respect and confidence of all, he died at Groton in 1855. His "mantle" has seemed to fall in a measure upon his son, who has held the office of town clerk and treasurer since 1860 to the present time. He has held the office of justice of the peace, selectman, and various other offices in town many years. He was elected one of the assistant judges of the Caledonia county court in 1869, and in 1870, for 2 years. He represented the town in the legislature of the State in 1857 and in 1858, and is one of the most active business men of the town. He was also State Senator from Caledonia county in 1880.

JONATHAN R. DARLING,

ROBERTS FAMILY.

Daniel Roberts and John Roberts, sons of Capt. Stephen Roberts, who came from Sanford, Me., at an early period, have also made their mark in town, and enjoyed the respect and confidence of their townsmen from early youth.

DANIEL ROBERTS, born at Groton in 1801, has held the office of justice of the peace every year in succession since 1835 to the present time. He has been elected to various offices in his long and active life, and is one of the most prominent, energetic and exemplary citizens of the town. Although at this time over 75 years of age, he preserves his youthful vigor in a remarkable degree. It is related of him that he could have performed a favorite feat on his 70th birthday with ease, namely: to climb a tree, the distance of 30 or 40 feet, without the aid of limbs, turn on the trunk of the tree and descend to the ground with his head downwards! His energy and constitution through life have been remarkable.

JOHN ROBERTS was born at Groton in 1803. He has held many prominent positions in town, being often elected constable and collector, selectman, and has held various other offices in town, always performing the duties of his office with the utmost fidelity. He has been through life an industrious and successful farmer, and a most reliable, honest business man.

DAVID VANCE

came to Groton from Newbury. He was long a prominent citizen in town. He was of Irish parentage, was an industrious and worthy citizen, and was many years the most wealthy farmer in the west part of the town in which he resided. He represented the town in the legislature of the State in 1821, in all 8 years; was a military captain, and also held other important offices in town, in which he resided until his death.

ARCHIE MCLAUGHLIN.

There have been some inhabitants of the town that were prodigies of strength and endurance. I will mention one only, Archie McLaughlin, or, as he was generally called, Archie McLaughlin, brother to Peter McLaughlin. Although the peer of Peter in education and ability, it could not be said that he followed the good example at all times of Peter aforesaid. He was emphatically the strongest man in Groton in his time, and in courage and daring a second Putnam. He has been known to place himself beneath the axle of an ox-cart, on which was loaded 1500 of hay, which he would raise from the ground with all ease. When at the age of 15 years, it is related of him: Late in the autumn, there being a few inches of snow upon the ground, Farmer John Hill at early dawn missed from his herd one of his largest "porkers." In searching for the missing "porker" around the fences of the inclosure, he nearly stumbled over an enormous sized bear that was making a breakfast of pork at Hill's expense. Not feeling inclined to accept the friendly embrace of bruin, and refusing his offered paw as a morning greeting, he succeeded in driving his eminence into the forest. A company was immediately raised, and bruin was pursued with clubs and dogs to the wilderness around the Wells River pond, where he was despatched. On dressing the animal it was found to weigh 400 pounds. While chasing the bear aforesaid, the company came upon tracks of wolves, which were followed to a large fallen pine tree, which was hollow a considerable distance of its immense trunk. Remains and bones of different animals around the fallen tree convinced the party that wolves were denned within.

After dividing the flesh of bruin among the company the next day, the company started on the trail of wolves, providing themselves with axes and long ropes, and last, though not least, with "Little Archie McLaughlin," without whose services the play would have been like "Hamlet," with Hamlet left out. Arriving at the fallen pine, they tied a rope to the feet of Archie and with a long pole sent him into the hollow tree to "punch up the game." Putnam-like, Archie would stir up the game, and as long as they could hear a growl they would fire into their midst. After all was still within the log, Archie would enter the hollow tree, grapple a wolf, and his comrades would draw him out with his game, until five dead young wolves were taken from the fallen tree. While securing the young wolves, the mother appeared which was also shot. The State at that time paid $10 bounty on all full grown wolves, and $5 on all young wolves, which were killed; but "Little Archie" received nothing for his services, but the honor of the achievement, which would seem to be the height of ingratitude. Archibald McLaughlin in after years was truly an inventive genius. He invented a loom on which his wife wove a coat of silk, whole and without a seam, "cuffs" "pocket-lids" and even a substitute for buttons.

The coat was taken to Washington by Gen. Mattocks, then a member of Congress and exhibited. Congress presented Archie with $50 as a present for his ingenuity, not deeming the invention of sufficient importance as an "improvement" to grant a patent. He would relate the singular fulfillment of a dream while constructing the loom. At one stage in its manufacture, Archie became nonplussed, and had nearly concluded to abandon the invention, when one night he had a dream that if he would add a certain number of pieces constructed of leather, that the invention would work without further difficulty. He awoke and related the dream to his wife. The next day he added the pieces as instructed in his dream and the loom was a success.

Many anecdotes might be related illustrating his daring feats, and wonderful escapes from volleys fired by platoons of United States troops, then stationed at Derby, in the war of 1812, who had Archie a prisoner, in the guard-house, at the barracks for some alleged insult to the collector of customs; of his overpowering the guard an final escape from "durance vile." After residing in Groton until about the year 1837, Archibald McLaughlin removed with his family to the "far West."

MILITARY CAPTAINS IN TOWN SINCE ITS SETTLEMENT.

Cpts. Edmund Morse, Ephraim Gary, Stephen Roberts, Wm. Frost, Norris Marshall, David Vance, Reuben Whitcher, Andrew McLary, Sam'l Glover, Bradley Morrison, Isaac N. Hall, Jona. Welch, A. Welch, John Hooper, William Marshall, Isaac Morse (son of Captain Edmund Morse).

The State Legislature at this time disbanded the "enrolled militia" of the State, leaving only the "Active" or "Uniformed Militia" in force.

The "40th Company of Riflemen," "Green Mountain Rangers," were organized in Groton, Feb. 9, 1850, by the election of Albert Harleigh Hill, captain. In 1854, he was elected major of the 19th regiment, and Robert T. Heath was elected captain, to fill the vacancy caused by his promotion. A. Harleigh Hill was afterwards appointed brigade major and brigade inspector of the 7th brigade, and was elected by the Legislature of the State, Oct. 14, 1856, Judge Advocate General of the State of Vermont, with the rank of brigadier general, and was commissioned by Gov. Ryland Fletcher, Nov. 6, 1856. The 4th company of riflemen disbanded soon after the election of Captain Robert T. Heath.

Also, the name of Frederick Glover should be added to the soldiers of Groton in the war with the South, who was in the Massachusetts "Bloody Sixth,"—in the fight at Baltimore with that regiment.

GROTON IN 1877.

In passing over the Montpelier and Wells River railroad, 10 miles from the junction at Wells River, we arrive at Groton. A few rods from the station is situated the pleasant village, with its neat white buildings stretched along the valley of the Wells River, and nestled at the base of a range of protecting hills. Its tasty church edifices, and commodious graded school building standing out conspicuously, renders the view from this standpoint pleasing and picturesque in the extreme. A near approach to this busy little village, with its mills, shops and lumber manufactories, which is a destined center of business for the adjoining towns, and where activity seems to be the general order of life, the industry and thrift of its business men and its citizens generally is apparent in all its surroundings.

The town of Groton at the present time in its capacity for business, the morality and temperance of its people, the intelligence and industry of its farming community, stands second to none in the county of its population. The subject of education has always received earnest attention, and the common schools compare favorably with towns more fortunate in the institutions of learning. Within a few years a commodious and elegant graded school building, including a fine hall, has been erected in the village, at a cost of $6,000, by its enterprising citizens.

There is yet a large tract of valuable timber land, through which passes the Montpelier and Wells River railroad, in its course from southeast to northwest through the town, which has been the means of developing her lumber interests, no small item in the business of the road. To-day, where a few short years ago solitude reigned supreme, broken only by the hungry cry of some wild animal, the shrill whistle of the "iron horse" and the busy hum of machinery is heard. The forests are fast receding, and shops and mills for the manufacture of lumber have been established at several points. Lumber manufactories have sprung up. As by magic an embryo village, with its post-office, lumber-mill, school, etc., now stands at the head of Groton pond, where, in the memory of a generation but just departed, "Captain Joe" and his "Molly" were "monarchs of all they surveyed," roaming o'er the trackless forests, or gliding swiftly in their light canoes over the placid waters of the lakes, with no "pale face" intruders to mar their happiness, or to break the enchantment of the scene, little dreaming what changes a few short years would bring forth. But now all things have changed. Change is, indeed, the great law of nature. The sound of the beatings of the shuttle and the loom, the echo of the break and flail have long since ceased. The music of the spinning-wheel has given place to the organ and piano. Then the loom was in nearly every house, and the daughters were taught to prepare themselves for usefulness and enjoyment as wives and mothers by the manufacture of the homespun articles then required; although we miss those social, friendly evening visits, ending only with a bountiful repast; the friendly gatherings of uncles, aunts and cousins, and a return to the parental roof, of the absent ones, on that truly sacred occasion, Thanksgiving Eve, where slander and gossip formed no part of the evening's entertainment. We miss the great stone fireplace and its ample hearth; the huge "back-log" and its cheerful fires. We miss the "old armed-chair" and its occupant, the gray-haired sire, around whom we loved to gather, and listen to the tales of "days gone by"—of the early settlers, of their hardships and many trials, of their wonderful escapes from the wild animals of the forest—the panther and the wolf. We miss the humble, simple church, which is succeeded by costly edifices, where gathered all classes and denominations, the males on the right and females on the left, where we met to worship in our youthful days, unmindful of style or dress. We miss the annual visits of the cobbler and tailor, who were wont to go from house to house gladdening the hearts of the juvenile community, and invariably parting with them on a better understanding. For that pity, that reverence for the aged, that cordiality and confidence between man and man, we look in vain. Yet we would not recall those happy days, long since passed and gone, when our wants were few. We would not "roll back the wheels of time," but would so regulate our lives that the future historian, as he searches among the records of the past, shall find a record of our deeds befitting this, a superior age.

THE METHODIST CHURCH IN GROTON.

BY REV. J. A. SHREBURN.

The rise of Methodism in Groton was quite like what it was in many other places in days gone by; the outgrowth of the circuit system as worked by an itinerant ministry, which system paid but little regard to town, county or State lines. The name of a circuit gave no idea of the number of towns embraced within its limits. A given town may, at different times have been embraced in a different Conference, a different district and a different circuit.

Groton first belonged to the New England Conference, then to the New Hampshire Conference, and is now a part of the Vermont Conference. It was within the bounds of the Vermont district, then of the Plymouth district, then of Danville district, then St. Johnsbury district, and now belongs to the Montpelier district. It belonged to the Newbury circuit, perhaps to the Bradford and Newbury, and in 1835 was made a separate pastoral charge embracing parts of Newbury, Ryegate and Topsham, as well as all of Groton.

So far as we are able to learn, Paul Richmond and Wm. Peck were the first Methodist preachers which labored in Groton. This was in 1828. They were successful in their labors, and formed a class or classes. Methodism has been an important religious factor in the town of Groton ever since. The first class was composed of the following persons, and perhaps others: Job. Welton, Mrs. Job

Welton, Isaac N. Hall, Geo. F. Crosby, Elizabeth Taisey (Mrs. I. N. Hall), Lydia Taisey (Mrs. Orson Ricker), Eliza Hosmer, Judith Hosmer, Polly Lowe and Phebe Stanley, and Job Welton, leader. The meetings were held in the village school-house, in the town-house, and sometimes in Samuel Clark's barn, which was situated in the south part of the village, and is still standing: For a time their social meetings were held in a fulling-mill.

The first Sunday-school held in town, though not denominational, is thought to have been the nucleus of the Methodist Sunday-school. It was under the direction of Mrs. Susan Hall, mother of Hon. I. N. Hall, and Miss Chloe Melvin, a pious school-teacher, and was held in the town-house Sunday mornings before preaching service. Some of the members of that school were Charlotte Hosmer, Hannah Hosmer, Elizabeth Taisey and Emily Darling. Some good people were afraid of the Sunday-school, fearing that it was a Popish measure designed to subvert the liberties of our country.

In 1835, Groton became a separate pastoral charge, Rev. Newell Culver being pastor. The society feeling the need of a house of worship, the pastor circulated a subscription paper to secure funds for building one. It was to be a pewed house, and the subscription was for pews. It was to be a Methodist house, and to be used by that society according to Methodist usage, with the provision that when not occupied by them it should be free to be occupied by any evangelical minister who should be in good and regular standing in his own denomination, according to their usage for the time being. The subscriptions were to be paid, one-half in money, and one-half in grain, or such other produce as the parties might agree upon.

The subscription was raised and the society proceeded to build. A board of trust was incorporated, consisting of Moses Plummer, John Bailey, 2d, H. W. Heath, Nathaniel Perkins and Isaac N. Hall. The site, in consideration of one cent paid to Moses Burnham, was by him deeded to the trustees, Jan. 25, 1836. The building committee were: Moses Burnham, Wm. Wheeler, I. N. Hall, Orson Ricker and Bradley Morrison. The job to build the house was let to Ephraim Lowe, for the sum of $1050, Bradley Morrison being surety for him. The whole cost of the house was $1,241.30. The house being built, and being accepted by the building committee, the pews were sold to the subscribers, May 4, 1837, and the house was dedicated the following day.

In 1863 or '4, during the pastorate of Rev. G. H. Bickford, the church was moved a short distance to its present location, remodeled and repaired, making it the inviting place of worship which it now is. In 1869, under the pastorate of Rev. H. A. Spencer, an excellent-toned bell, weighing about 1000 pounds, was hung in the tower of this church, at an expense for the bell of $204.69. Some time during the pastorate of Rev. J. C. W. Coxe, which embraced the years of 1865, '6 and '7, the present conveniently located parsonage was purchased of E. M. Gates, which was the first one owned by the society.

The following ministers, so far as ascertained, have served the church in Groton, while a part of Newbury circuit, beginning in 1828: Paul Richmond, Wm. Peck, preachers. During 1829, '30, we have no record; but it is remembered that about this time Rev. Russel H. Spaulding lived in town and preached there, he being the first resident Methodist minister in town. In 1831 the conference was called the Vt. and N. H. Conference, having been set off from the N. E. Conference in 1830, the district, Plymouth, J. W. Hardy, P. E. Newbury circuit had for preachers: W. D. Cass and F. F. Daily; 1832, N. H. Carr; Danville district, B. R. Hoyt, P. E.; Newbury circuit, C. Cowen, W. Nelson, preachers; 1833, Vt. dis. B. R. Hoyt, P. E.; Newbury circuit, R. Newhall, C. Cowen, preachers; 1834, Vt. dis. G. W. Fairbank, P. E.; N. O. Way and S. Kelley were the preachers. In 1835, Groton became a separate charge, G. W. Fairbank still P. E., and Newell Culver, pastor. At the close of this year is a record of the following Sabbath-school report, viz.: 3 schools, 3 superintendents, 15 teachers and 85 scholars; 100 vols. in library; $9 raised for books; $7.50 for missionary purposes. 1836, Ira Beard, pastor; 1837, Samuel G. Scott; 1838, W. M. Mann; 1839 and '40, E. G. Page; 1841, James Smith; 1842 and '3, Benj. Burnham; 1844, J. S. Spinney; 1845, M. A. Herrick; 1846, J. Whitney; 1847, S. S. Cooke; 1848, J. Gale; 1849, Norman Webster; 1850, '51, '52, '53, '54, '55, supplied; 1856 and '7 it was connected with Peacham, N. W. Aspenwall pastor; 1858, supplied; 1859, R. Harlow; 1860, supplied; 1861 and '2, K. Hadley; 1863 and '4, G. H. Bickford; 1865, '6, '7, J. C. W. Coxe; 1868, H. A. Spencer; 1869, '70, '71, H. F. Forrest; 1872, '3, '4, Lewis Hill; 1875 and '6, J. Hamilton; 1877 and '8, C. P. Taplin; 1879, '80, '81, J. A. Sherburn; 1882, J. S. Little.

The first record which we find of church membership was in 1838, when the number was 107. The present number is 123, in full membership, and 28 probationary. In 1839, we find a record of the following resolutions which were adopted by the Quarterly Conference:

1st. Resolved, That Slavery as it exists in the U. S. A., is under all circumstances a sin against God, and contrary to the rights of our fellowmen enslaved.

2d. Resolved, That it is the duty of every Christian, philanthropist and republican, to use all lawful means for the peaceful emancipation of all the enslaved of our land.

3d. That we claim it as our right to petition Congress for the immediate emancipation of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories.

Also, the following on temperance:

Resolved 1st. That the manufacture and vending of intoxicating drinks for a beverage is an immorality.

2d. That it is inconsistent with christian principles and growth in grace to use intoxicating drinks as a beverage.

3d. That by precept and example we will discourage the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage.

This church has been almost constantly giving its members to other sections of the church, and has received but few in return; notwithstanding this, she has held her own, and all things considered, has seldom been stronger or more hopeful than to-day. The present board of stewards are, I. N. Hall, Orson Ricker, T. H. Taisey, Samuel Darling, Wm. Morrison, M. H. Whitehill, A. P. Whitehill and Alexander Cochran.

Of the many members of whom honorable mention might be made, we can speak of only a few.—Mrs. Susan Hall, mother of I. N. Hall, at first belonging to the Baptist church in Rumney, N. H., some time after coming to Groton, connected herself with the Methodist church, which was then in its infancy. She was truly a mother in Israel. She lived to an advanced age, and not only her son, an only child, “rises up and calls her blessed,” but to many others her name is as “ointment poured forth.”

Rev. Benjamin Burnham, brother of Mrs. Hall, and once a pastor here, when he retired from the active ministry made his home in this place, and though dead he yet speaks.

Hon. I. N. Hall having been a member from the organization of the church, has been closely identified with all of its interests, and has given to it his hearty co-operation and support. In turn the church has honored him as well as herself, by committing many of its trusts to his hands. Nearly every office she can give to a layman has been given to him. For 47 consecutive years he has been the recording steward of the Groton church, which office he still holds. The Electoral Conference of the Vermont Annual Conference elected him one of the lay delegates to the General Conference of 1880.

Mrs. Orson Ricker, so far as we know the only surviving member of the first class except Mr. Hall, having held on her way all these years, lives to love the church, and support it still.

From the roll of this little church many have gone forth to bless the world; many are numbered with the sainted dead; some have made shipwreck of faith and pierced themselves through with many sorrows, and a goodly number remain to hold up the standard of the cross in the sphere in which God has placed them, and so hasten the coming kingdom of our Lord.

BARRE, June 9, 1882.

EDITOR'S CORNER.—The sketch by Gen. Hill of the Early Settlers of Groton, was written in 1877, of which in closing he gives us the status of Groton at this time. We saw Groton 24 years ago this coming autumn. It was an autumn in which the leaves ripened and died without frost—before the frost appeared that fall. We, as others in this State, had never seen our hardwood forest leaves so ripen and die before—never saw so painted before the leaves upon the maples, the birches, the beaches. On those Caledonia hills, rounded with verdure—to the top—there is scarcely an acre of waste land—scarcely a hill that would not bear cultivation to the crown, where the hard-wood trees grow to the summit. It was a gorgeous sight—that richest Indian summer forest, whose picture has never died in memory,—the day we came to Groton on our visit that fall to every town in this county, from Ryegate, we believe, to Groton through a four-mile wood. How, still, secluded, small it was, this Groton then, through which the railroad passes now, which to us, looking at General Hill's description seems to have sprang up almost by magic. Perhaps there is not a town in the State that has grown so rapidly during the last thirteen years.

We are pleased, also, to have received from Rev. Mr. Sherburn his model church history, to follow the paper of Gen. Hill, and would have been pleased to have received the record of the Baptist church in Groton, of which report speaks well at present, the Rev. Dr. Joseph Freeman, one of the most scholarly Baptist clergymen in the State, being pastor there.

PORTRAITS.—We have also the portrait of Gen. Hill, and that of his mother to accompany the Author's sketch of the early settlers of this town; a new feature upon our pages, unique and pleasing—the historian and his mother—the first-born child in the town. This is the first town in the State that has given to the history of her town the portrait of her first-born. Groton gives the picture of her eldest daughter and her son, the historian. What other town can duplicate this?

ADDITIONAL HISTORY OF HUBBARDTON, RUTLAND COUNTY.

BY E. H. ST. JOHNS.

THE JENNINGS AND BALIS FAMILIES

were closely related, and came from Lanesborough, Mass., but of the time and order of their coming it would, perhaps, be impossible to speak with certainty. Of their earlier representatives little is to be learned, but from uncertain tradition and the tombstones of their dead. By these last it would appear that Joseph Jennings settled on the homestead occupied by himself and steadily retained in the hands of his descendants for more than ninety years, some time before the year 1789; as in the old Hubbardton burying-ground, beneath a double headstone, his remains repose beside those of his wife, Faith, who died on the 8th of August in that year, in the 35th year of her age. By the marriage, thus dissolved, there were children who grew to womanhood, but of whom little more is known than of the young wife and mother who, coming hither with her husband to establish a home, found an early grave.

Mr. Jennings subsequently married a second wife, of the Selleck family, with whom, it is said, the good man led a stormy life of it. She died, I think, in Lanesborough, where she had gone on a visit some time before her husband, who, himself an esteemed citizen and neighbor, but of whom tradition has preserved few incidents, died of the epidemic of 1813, March, aged 55 years, leaving by his last wife two sons, Ira and Justin, in the 18th and 16th years of their age.

The lads, thrown thus early on their own responsibilities and resources, with a very moderate competence, soon developed traits of mind and character which won the esteem and confidence of their townsmen in an eminent degree. Both, almost so long as they continued with us, which the younger did until his death, were intimately connected with the municipal administration and general affairs of the town. Connecting themselves with opposite political parties, they were often opposing candidates to the Legislature, to which Ira was early elected, as was Justin in 1849 and '50, more from the respect in which he was held personally than any esteem for his political creed, which was Democratic, but two others of that party having ever been elected to that position from the place, viz.: Stephen J. Bradley, in 1853, and Cyrus Jennings in 1876.

The boys remained for a time on the property left by their father, with an elder half sister who had been taken into the family of the writer's grandfather soon after her father's second marriage, and who now kept their house for some years, until the youths, now young men, equitably divided the estate, and Ira married Betsey, a daughter of Wm. Rumsey. He built the house now standing on the homestead. He emigrated to Michigan in 1834 or '5, and settled at or near Ann Arbor, where he died about 1861. He was a man grave and thoughtful, and of courteous demeanor.

Justin, a bold and rather wild lad, was seized with the patriotic spirit of the time, and sought permission of his sister Sally, alluded to above, to enlist in the war of 1812. On his death-bed their father had called his sons to his side, and consigned them to her care, and enjoined on them that obedience to her they had ever given to him. Recalling the scene to his mind, she, in his father's name, solemnly refused her consent, and the youth submitted. Upon attaining his majority he sought and found employment in the service of Sam. Walker, Esq., a man of some note in those days, a farmer, merchant and manufacturer of potash. It was a son of this man, Martin J., who first established a line of stages across the plains to California. Here, as man of all work, it was his business to buy and cart ashes for the potash. He afterward followed other avocations no less humble and laborious, boating on the canal and peddling. With the means thus acquired he began to follow the occupation of a drover. His operations soon became extensive, reaching from the St. Lawrence to Boston, and under the cognomen of "Capt. Tobe" he was known far and near as one of the shrewdest, most original and successful men of the county at that time, noted alike for his salty humor and bluff manner as for his sage wisdom. Thus by industry and economy, without parsimony, he laid the foundations of an estate which, considering its beginnings, the means employed and his opportunities, was enormous, the amount of which, estimated by some who claiming to possess the information at least ought to know, at nearly half a million, might be safely expressed once or twice by six figures on the left hand of a decimal point.

Of one so recently deceased, and before many witnesses, it is both easy and difficult to speak. His was one of those natures, strong, yet so simple as to be read of all men; self-taught, a man of much information, acquired in the school of life; of indomitable will, sometimes profane when enraged, but not destitute of a native courtesy and dignity of demeanor, he was one to please the common people while he enjoyed the respect of all. Adopting an opinion, he seldom changed it. His political views he sometimes frankly expressed, but never obtruded them on the notice of any, but adhered to his party through its evil as well as its good report; yet toward the last he was heard to say that, "while he voted the regular ticket himself as a personal and imprescriptible right acquired by long practice, he looked on any additions to the fold as knaves or fools, wanting either in common sense or common honesty, if not in both."

With the rising generation, and the ideas beginning to prevail in the land, he was in ill accord; holding the purse-strings, he may have punished the first severely; yet a hoarder and changer of money, many have been indebted to him for assistance or advice; both often sought in climbing the world's ladder. Tolerably well read in law, and dealing with many people, he might if he wished have boasted that he was never but once a defender or prosecutor in any suit. With temperance lecturers and abolition agitators he had little sympathy; perhaps not disagreeing with the principles of either in the abstract. A fine gentleman of the old school, tenacious of old manners and customs, but a lover of the bottle, he cared not to have the extreme views of the first thrust down his throat. The second, so far as their views were received, he considered as dangerous to the public peace. In the great uprising of '61 he therefore had little sympathy, but at length suffered himself to be drawn into it. He plainly foresaw the issues to arise from the war, whether successful or unsuccessful, and which now agitate the land. On hearing of the outbreak he said to the writer, "we have both lived to see the beginning, you may live to see the end; I shall not." He was one whose virtues and faults stand out in bold relief—the first, the love of money might tarnish, but not obliterate; the second were rather distorted virtues. His word, never thoughtlessly given, was a bond forever; yet he was a character rather to be studied than to be imitated. At his death it might have been said, "a great man and a prince is fallen;" neither shall we ever see his like again.

For the last 30 years of his life he was engaged in no active business, but confined his attention to his financial affairs and farming; "the good man who held his own plough," noted for his hospitality and good cheer, he perhaps more than maintained his simplicity to the end, as in his later years a cloud if not a change came over him.

About 1830, he married Harriet Hill, a descendant of Wm. Spaulding, an estimable woman. She bore him 5 sons, two only of whom live to survive him. Her death in January, 1866, was to him an irreparable loss. With much of his earlier spirit strong within him, he continued a few years at the dilapidated homestead, until a short time before his death, Mar. 1, 1873, aged 75.

At funerals, if the weather was bad, or the people poor, he was invariably present. At his own funeral, being religiously as well as politically democratic, the Rev. Kittredge Haven, then over 80 years of age, officiated, the last services he ever conducted in the place.

Reuben Balis, the protege of Joseph Jennings, his maternal uncle, was born in Lanesboro, Mass., October, 1785. When 4 years of age he lost his father, John Bates, who was killed by the kick of a young colt, leaving his wife, Eunice, his son, Reuben, and two younger sisters, Anna and Abigail—the last probably born after the death of her father. Reuben was taken by his uncle to Vermont when 6 years old. The rest of the family are supposed to have come later. He was a frolicsome and rather a masterful child, strong and ruddy, fond of athletic sport, and at school apt to laugh aloud; so said Mr. Amos Churchill, the teacher, who one day, annoyed by his mirth, ordered a recess, that he with the rest of the school might indulge in this necessary merriment, but on calling the school to order, Reuben was not to be found, and on enquiry it appeared that he had removed a slab on the roof and "gone out." The school-house, built of logs, then stood on the hill south of the present one, in district No. 2, and the second one, a frame-house, some 60 or 70 rods east.

In snowballing, some of the younger ones were often hurt; carrying home their complaints, they were brought to the notice of the teacher, who one noon called the boys together, little and big, and laying the matter before them, turned them into a log-yard or pen, wishing them a merry time and snowballing enough to last the rest of the winter, Mr. C. and an older boy looking on to see fair play. After some time, when some were worsted and others tired of the sport, he asked them severally if they were willing to leave it off. All assented but little baffle-headed Reuben, who stoutly kept it up: with his face red as a peony and his hair bristling with sweat and snow-water, he promptly answered, No! upon which the teacher's companion suggested that he should take Reuben in hand himself.

The child, on coming to manhood, became grave, careful in his speech, thoughtful and resolute. Soon after his majority he married Charlotte Stanley, and occupied the homestead first purchased by his mother and a maiden aunt of a Mr. Thurber, where himself or some of his family resided for about 60 years. The aunt, Abigail Jennings, died in 1826, aged 76; his mother in 1830, aged 78.

To this industrious and thrifty couple were born 4 sons and 6 daughters, all of whom grew to adult age and inherited the sterling qualities of their parents; married and for the most part settled on farms adjoining, or in close proximity to the parental homestead, and for many a year on Thanksgiving day were all severally gathered under the paternal roof of a family singularly united in its pursuits and friendships, occupying an irregular tract of land, 3 miles or more in length by 2 miles in breadth, in the towns of Hubbardton and Benson, acquired almost wholly by their own industry, some of the older settlers making room for the sons and daughters of this growing household. Among those who removed were the Pardees in 1833, who settled in Ohio, and a Mr. Eddy in 1834, who removed to Pennsylvania. He was a quaint and thrifty farmer, whose yearly store of 24 barrels of cider—one-half to drink and the rest distilled into brandy—with $50 worth of tobacco, sufficed for home consumption. Of the last, he added by way of reflection, "If the town of Hubbardton were compelled to raise the money on a tax it would groan terribly."

But to return to my subject, it was unfortunate for the state of things above described that among the sons-in-law there had obtruded themselves one schoolmaster and a sea captain—under the last a party sailed to California in January, 1849, including another son-in-law, and the third son, William, a youth of 19. The party was in good part unfortunate. In 1850, Capt. Hale was drowned in descending a mountain stream; the son returned after an absence of nearly 7 years. In 1854, the school-teacher, Mr. F. Pollard, a man of some local reputation, removed to Dupage Co., Ill., where in the course of 20 years all the living sons and daughters followed, and on the heavy failure of his eldest son, John, in 1874, the exodus was completed. Three or four branches of the family, but none bearing the name of Balis, remain. The old patriarch himself, who in his tender childhood had been brought to Vermont, now in his old age, at fourscore, with his wife followed the fortunes of his sons, and with his son William, who for 10 years had occupied the homestead, removed to Illinois, September, 1866.

He died at Napiersville, in the 87th year of his age, having survived his wife some 2 years. To his sturdy and settled habits his family owed much of its prosperity, there never having been but one failure among them. He was many years a member of the Baptist church, to which most members of the family who made a religious profession, belonged. He was usually entrusted with a share of the town's offices, representing it in the Legislature of 1845 and '6; as did also his son William in 1863 and '4. Intimately acquainted with the first settlers and the general transactions of the neighborhood, he often related many a pleasing or touching incident, of which I will preserve the following: In building a highway east of the present dwelling of Stephen Bradley, some rods north of the present road, a large pine stub was cut down, on the top of which, where they had lain for years, a saddle and bridle were found. Utterly ignorant of what incident or crime was connected with them, or why they were hidden in so strange a place, after some deliberation those present sagely concluded they were left there by crows.

Like other young men of his time, his opportunities for instruction and improvement in learning were few, and himself with some others in the neighborhood, to obtain a better knowledge of arithmetic, sought the assistance of the writer's grandfather, who was looked upon as a prodigy "in figures," the compensation being an extra supply of fine roots for the kitchen fire. One evening, the good housewife having retired, their studies seemed to her more prolonged and silent than usual, and she was curious enough to peep through the door of her room, to the consternation of the party, who were playing cards, my grandfather sagely looking on. It is needless to add that the "game was up."

Of his sisters, Anna married Samuel Rumsey; died in January, 1840, of cancer, after a lingering and painful illness, aged 51. Abigail married, late in life, Ichabod Higgins, of Orwell; survived her husband some years, and died April, 1853, aged 63.

NORMAN JONES, ESQ.,

was born in Castleton in 1790. At 10 years of age he came to Hubbardton, where he died at the age of 83. In his youth he was hired out by his father as a farm laborer, at $6 per month. A knowledge of the value of money thus early engraved on an inflexible and rock-like character was never forgotten. He afterward learned the trade of a cabinet-maker, at which he occasionally labored during the rest of his life; as much noted for finish and durability of his work as for the exactness of his dealings. He was at one time a merchant, but was for the most of his life engaged in farming, and amassed a very considerable estate.

He was a man of some reading, reverential in his deportment, with a certain native dignity of character; honest and severe in his honesty, with a frugality carried to parsimony. He was held in a certain degree of respect by his townsmen without being popular. In his old age, at more than 80, returning alone from a distant journey, he toward nightfall found himself at the Bomoseen house in the town of Castleton, too late to proceed homeward on foot some miles. He had either to hire a horse at the livery or stay over night; he chose the latter alternative. On the following morning, among the guests an old man was seen drinking a cup of coffee, and eating a few crackers which he took from a small traveling-bag. One present who knew him well, remarked to the landlord, that one as rich might be charged extra for so frugal a breakfast. The host replied, that he was forestalled from any such action, as the price and nature of his entertainment was a matter of agreement the night previous. Yet, said the Rutland Herald, from which I take the account, this old man was worth in U. S. bonds and securities $40,000; yet, notwithstanding such traits, his purse was not always closed when conscience or duty required. For perhaps a quarter of a century before his death he dispensed the greater portion of legal justice which our usually law-abiding people required; otherwise he had little to do with the town affairs. He married in 1816, Betsey, a daughter of Jacob Gibbs, who died Jan. 16, 1864, and afterward Sally, widow of Seth St. John. By his first marriage were born a numerous family, 8 sons and 2 daughters. Of one of the first as illustrating a family trait, I will relate an incident: He might have been an urchin of 10 years old, and going to school was, on the first day, as is the custom, asked his name. He promptly gave it. The next day the question was repeated again. He replied, "Theron Jones, Sir, the same to-day it was yesterday; the same it is every day."

THE ST. JOHNS.

Of these there were two families, both from Connecticut. Nehemiah St. John, with Ruth, his wife, came from Redding, in that State, about 1786, accompanied by their only child, Seth, a youth of 16. His genealogy has been traced for me with considerable accuracy to that Matthias St. John, who, with his three sons, came from England to Boston in 1630, and was made a freeman at Dorchester, Mass., Sept. 3, 1634, and from whom the St. Johns of this country are all descended. Tradition has spoken of Nehemiah as the praying Saint; I trust without irreverence, but for his piety and a simple faith which in these materialistic days might provoke a smile in the supposed efficacy of his prayers. He died July 23, 1803, aged 61; his wife, Aug. 15, 1804.

Seth married Rebecca Foster in 1793. To them were born in the following order: Samuel W., 1795; Ruth, 1797; Levi, 1799; Seth, 1801; Nehemiah, 1805, all of whom first settled in Hubbardton, and afterward, with the exception of Seth and Ruth, the last of whom settled in St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., removed to Wisconsin. The elder Seth died Aug. 8, 1846. His son remained in town until his death, which was caused by an internal cancer, June 8, 1853. He is recollected as a person noted, as I believe were his brothers, for his activity, acuteness and energy, a leader in society, and in faith a Universalist. He represented the town in the General Assembly in 1837 and '38.

TIMOTHY ST. JOHN was of a numerous family, and born in Norwalk, Conn., May 3, 1857. He came to this town with Joseph Rumsey, his brother-in-law, before 1789, as in that year he built the first frame building west of the saw-mill, near the turnpike; married Rachel Curtis in 1794, and died Dec. 25, 1831. His wife died June 6, 1837. Of their children, two sons, Ezekiel and Reuben, and three daughters survived them. The first-named settled in St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., where he was killed by the fall of a tree December, 1840; the second, the only living member of his father's family, residing on the homestead (1881) from his birth. The daughters settled in the State of New York.

THE PARSONS FAMILY.

Mr. Samuel Parsons, a worthy citizen, came to Hubbardton from Redding, Conn., of which place he was a native; settled on the homestead still occupied by his descendants, and died May 27, 1846, aged 80 years. He married Esther Selleck. Of this union were born a daughter, Betsy, settled in Western New York, and a son, Aaron, born Aug. 7, 1800, who died Mar. 16, 1862.

Aaron, from his eccentric peculiarities, was what might be termed a character; of much shrewdness and thrift, but a hard drinker. He scandalized the predictions of temperance, as well as other people, by keeping his patrimony and amassing a considerable estate, which he left to his children. Usually known as old Cuff, he followed the business of a drover. Considering "all flesh as grass, he spoke of himself as one of the best judges of women and cattle." He said, they both think me of but little account. However that may have been, when sober he seldom mistook his man, whom he read at a glance. In his latter years he was lame and infirm, yet much abroad in an antiquated farm wagon or sleigh, clad, if the weather were cold, in a coat covered with the skins of the woodchuck.

Sharp and caustic in speech he was to his hired men, who were usually coming and going, somewhat froggy, expecting them to understand orders at half a word. Said he one morning, after a stiff glass of grog, to his favorite man, Peter McQ., "Peter, h'm! h'm! I trust we are adequate—h'm! go to"—said he, naming the place, "and cut some wood; cut everything clean; every green thing." Peter proceeded; on the spot were some choice second-growth pines. He hesitated but a moment. His orders were peremptory, and they were soon cut into fuel. Great was the chagrin of Mr. P. on seeing the havoc, but he said nothing. Peter had obeyed orders, asked no questions, and had proved himself "adequate."

A person wished to help him in haying. "What do you ask per day," said he? "$1.25," said the applicant. "Yes," he replied, "but the place is a little farther on."

A representative of the "Green Isle" coming on the same errand, seemed about to close a bargain, when he was abruptly asked if he could eat hay. "What," said the thick-headed Irishman, scratching his head, "I ate hay?" "Yes," said Mr. P., "you will eat hay with the rest of them" (his men were well fed and promptly paid). "I'll ate none of it," and Patrick went on his way muttering, "The auld d—l, to think I would ate his hay!"

DAVID BARBER,

born in West Salisbury, Ct., Mar. 15, 1770, died in Hubbardton, June 11, 1860. He removed with his parents to Castleton in 1783; to Hubbardton in 1784, where he lived with an uncle on the Christy place, now owned by S. W. St. John. He married Clarissa, daughter of James Whelpley, Esq., in 1792. To them were born: Horatio, May 24, 1794, died Sept. 12, 1859; James W., July 3, 1797, died Aug. 20, 1875; Levi, July 7, 1799, died Mar. 23, 1869; Milton G., Apr. 10, 1801, yet living in Rutland, where he removed in the spring of 1873; Tryphena, Mar. 24, 1803, and Eliza, Feb. 22, 1808; died Nov. 24, 1875.

In after life, on the death of his first wife, Mr. Barber married a second wife, the widow of Judge Rich, of Shoreham, who survived him.

This family, by their native intelligence and high character, exercised a marked influence on the society and local politics of the place, and were intimately connected with the administration of its public affairs, filling such offices as were in the gift of their townsmen with honor and credit. The father was in the Legislature in 1813, 14, 15, 16, 25, 26, 35, 36; James W. in 1843, 44, 1867; Milton G., 1860, 61. With the exception of Levi and his sons, they were mostly Universalists, and in politics stalwart whigs, and being much united, they excited the jealousy of their fellow-townsmen, which found expression in 1849, by the choice of Justin Jennings, Democrat, to the Legislature. A family of thrifty farmers' sons and grandsons, they have been removed by death and emigration until but one male representative remains.

ASAHEL WRIGHT,

a native of Lennox, Mass., came here as early as 1774, located a homestead, and built his log-house. He remained but one year, as on the breaking out of the war he returned to Massachusetts and served with the minute men for a while, and then enlisted in the army and served for 6 years. He returned to his claim in 1787, two of his sons, Asahel and Isaac, aged 12 and 10 years, driving an ox team, while three other sons, Amzie, William and Justus—the last a year old—accompanied them. Two children, Lois and Reuben, were born after his coming. Mr. Wright died on the farm where he first located, at the age of 97, a resident of Hubbardton for 61 years. Justus, his son, succeeded him in the property. He married Pamela, only daughter of Dr. Theophilus Flagg. He died Apr. 2, 1865, aged 79; his wife, Sept. 14, 1867. Two daughters survive them.

The other children of Mr. Wright, on coming to manhood, sought and found settlements abroad, some of them in Western New York.

James, the only son of Dr. Theophilus Flagg, born in 1789, died Jan. 1, 1873; married Sophia Brayton. They had 8 sons and 2 daughters, of whom but 2 of the first remain. He was an influential citizen, firm in his religious convictions, twice a member of the Legislature, and for many years a deacon of the church. He removed to Castleton about 1853, but returned to Hubbardton a year or two before his death. He left his widow by a second marriage in receipt of a pension, he having been one of the Plattsburgh volunteers. His first wife died Nov. 23, 1867.

THE RESSEGNE FAMILY

came from Connecticut about 1789. James, the father, married Sarah Rumsey. Of their children, Abram and Isaac only attained to middle age. The two brothers established themselves on adjoining homesteads near the centre of the town north of the present parsonage; there built their dwellings, and were once known as prosperous farmers. Abram removed to Wisconsin in 1834. Isaac remained in town until his death, Mar. 11, 1864, being in the 92d year of his age; when 24 he married Mary Dewey, who survived him 2 years, dying Mar. 13, 1866, in her 95th year. He was for many years deacon of the Congregational church. The later years of the aged couple were spent in great bereavement and affliction; but one son of several children survived them. On their decease the property passed away from the family, and the dilapidated farms of the two brothers, Abram and Isaac, have been for some years owned by non-residents.

DAVID DAVIS,

born in Sheffield, Mass., 1785, died in Hubbardton, Jan. 17, 1860. His father, David, married Martha, a daughter of Wm. Spaulding. She was a lass of some 13 years old at the battle in Hubbardton, of which she retained in her old age some vivid recollections. The family came to Hubbardton probably soon after the birth of David. The father dying, Mrs. Davis married Wm. Hill. Of the children by this marriage was Harriet, wife of Justin Jennings. The subject of our sketch, usually known as Major Davis, was by trade a wheelwright, and after 20 years is remembered for his quaint humor and imperturbable drollery. He sometimes, but seldom, gave it a practical turn. His work like his wit was noted for its easy fitness, and he boasted that he only once did a thoroughly honest piece of work. Said the Major, mournfully, "I did once make a thoroughly honest wagon for Squire Bill Rumsey, not daring to put a poor stick in it." Once haggled on the price of a wagon by one Proctor, the Major at last consented to make him one on his own terms, as he said he wanted a cheap one. So it was made, painted and delivered, and put to use. Being loaded with wool, it had gone but a little way on a rough road when it began to give way with a crash, but without a snap. The wheels were of pine.

He had established himself in a wild glen on the old turnpike road. Some strangers passing by, one remarked on the difficulty of procuring a livelihood in such a place. "They must be very poor," said another. The indubitable Major, who was at work in his shop unobserved, now came to the front, too polite to contradict, but unwilling to be thought poor. He merely said, "Not so poor, good people, as you may suppose; I own but one acre." The latter years of his life were spent in West Haven. A man of good natural ability, he degraded himself by intemperance. His sons, four in number, rising above the weakness of their father, sought and found homes in other states.

Among several who from small beginnings, by honest industry, much consideration, perseverance and self-denial, with perhaps a little necessary contumely, have risen above surrounding circumstances to respectability and affluence, was Perry, a son of Frederic Dikeman, captain of the militia, and town representative in 1851 and '52; died Aug. 14, 1871, aged 83.

There may or may not be an antagonism between the world of spirit and the world of matter. If such there be, then for certain the wisdom of these men was little better than that of one to whom it was said, "thou fool!" Yet while human society is constituted as it now is, and the pursuits of human life are what they now are and are ever likely to be, their talents and sterling qualities will command the respect of the thoughtful mind as the soil they tilled is gradually appropriated by the humble foreigner.

WALTER HOLMES

settled in town at an early day, and was the head of a numerous and respected family (three sons and four daughters), of which but one male representative, a youth, remains, while their lands and possessions have been alienated, the grandsons seeking homes far away, with uncertain and varied fortune. Of his three sons, Horace died in 1836; Harvey, Nov. 25, 1862; Pliny, who removed to Sudbury, in 1854; represented the town in 1847 and '8, as did subsequently his two sons, Fayette, in 1856, '7; Franklin, 1864 and '5; Daniel, the son of Harvey, in 1865 and '6.

JOSEPH SELLECK

was one of those diminutive little men whom nature sometimes endows with a larger measure of vim and spirit as a compensation for the smallness of their stature. He was fond of cattle and a great teamster, as were most of his race, while to control his off ox he might stand on tip-toe. Having entered a fine pair of working oxen for a premium at one of our county fairs, it was after a trial of strength awarded to a rival pair. Mr. S. was indignant. Said he, "Just hitch your cattle to one end of the load; I will take the other, and draw the load and your cattle backwards, or any other yoke on the ground," a challenge his more successful competitor did not care to accept, to the amusement of the crowd and the infinite disgust of honest "Uncle Joe." He died Dec. 7, 1836, aged 71. Three children survived him. Luman, who followed the occupation of a farmer and drover, failed in business in the winter of 1841 and '2; removed to Illinois the last-named year; two daughters, Huldah and Wealthy; the first married Matthew Whitlock; the second, Amasa Jordan.

RUFUS GRISWOLD,

a native of Connecticut, came to Vermont in early life with his brother Samuel, and settled in Orwell, but removed to Benson, and after came to Hubbardton, about 1818, following for a few years the business of a tanner, and then settled on the small farm where he died. Before attaining his majority he married Deborah Waas, a native of Martha's Vineyard, a woman of much fortitude, industry and native intelligence. Of their 14 children, 12 attained to adult age, the 9 sons early going abroad. As a family, the children were more noted for the versatility of their minds than a disposition to acquire worldly pelf. But three of the family are supposed to be living. The eldest daughter died in Benson in 1880, aged 83; the father, August, 1862, aged 89; the mother, July 3, 1860, aged 85.

PHILIP BRADLEY,

a native of Redding, Conn., came to Hubbardton from Whitchall, N. Y., about 1814, his only living child, Stephen J., being about 6 weeks old. Mr. B. was by occupation a miller, wheelwright and farmer, a man of grave and pleasing demeanor, very deaf, of considerable reading and general intelligence. He died September, 1861, aged 83; his wife, Ellen Mecker, survived him more than 14 years, dying Dec. 13, 1875, aged 96.

THE CALDWELLS

came from Worcester, Mass. Benjamin Caldwell died Feb. 29, 1852, aged 88; Sarah his wife, April 14, 1867, aged 100 years, 4 months. Their children were six sons and daughters; in Hubbardton are buried: Tyler C., who died when on a visit to Hubbardton, Jan. 18, 1861; Sally died Nov. 27, 1876, aged 87; Lavina, wife of Asa Taft, Feb. 2, 1878, aged 75; of the others, but one is living (1881) Mrs. Pliny Holmes of Sudbury.

Samuel Wier died March 11, 1867, aged 87; Esther Holmes, his wife, Nov. 18, 1863, aged 72.

Joseph Rumsey, Aug. 3, 1805, aged 60 years; Rachel St. John, his wife, 1813, aged —

Hezekiah, a brother of William and Joseph, died Dec. 20, 1831, aged 76; Althea, his wife, Feb. 27, 1850, aged 89; their two sons, Hezekiah and Samuel, the first died in Pennsylvania, the second in Hubbardton, Feb. 17, 1861, aged 75; Anna, his wife, Jan. 23, 1840, in her 52d year; of the daughters, five in number, all died in Hubbardton, the last, Althea, July 26, 1879, aged 79. These all died in the house of their father, passed middle age, the youngest being 60.

Phinchas Rouch, many years a resident of the place, died Feb. 2, 1868, aged 93.

Philo Selleck, Oct. 2, 1831, aged 68.

Ithamar Hibbard, born in Windham, Conn., 1745, June 18, died in Hubbardton, March 2, 1802; for further notice see the preceding account in our own and Poultney history, vol. III. page 758.

Timothy Walker, died Jan. 20, 1855, aged 54.

CHRISTOPHER BRESEE

was, if I mistake not, born in Pittsford, one of a family of 10 sons and 4 daughters.

He married Clarissa Ashley, and first located on the place long known as the Jonathan Pollard farm, now owned by a Mr. Walsh, on which he remained 24 years, when he purchased in 1837 the farm previously owned by William Rumsey, where he died in March 31, 1867, and his wife, March 13, 1869, both aged respectively 79 years. Albert, one of their two surviving sons, originated the "Early Rose"; a careful and prosperous farmer.

FREDERIC DIKEMAN,

a soldier of the Revolution, as before stated, was a native of the city of Boston. After the close of that war he lived for a time in Redding, Conn., and removed thence to Ballston, Saratoga Co., N. Y., and from there to Hubbardton, in 1797. Opening a farm on a road now discontinued, north of the residence of Charles Flagg. He lived afterward for a time in Pittsford, but returned to Hubbardton, where he remained until his death May 17, 1848. His sons in order of birth were Perry, of whom we have spoken, Azim, long a resident of Rutland, where he died, and Uriah, who died in Hubbardton in 1880, aged 89. They were all men of careful, prudent and thrifty habits.

William Rumsey, a native of Connecticut, settled on the farm occupied by the Breeses since 1837, where he died a short time before, Feb. 22, 1836, aged 85. His sons were Walker, Henry, William, Joel, and Chauncy S., and his two daughters, Betsey and Nancy. Betsey married Ira Jennings and Nancy, Elijah Herrick. Of the sons, the four first, I believe, settled in Michigan; the last, removed to Castleton a few years since having been with us one of our most honored and esteemed citizens. We close these articles with a few obituary notices:

Zalman Whitlock died Jan. 28, 1862, aged 82; his wife, Azubah Whitlock, in 1803, aged 34.

AN EPISODE.

It was the 20th of June, 1862, that the present writer found himself an atom in that mass of humanity which, at last emerging from the swamps and woods of the Peninsula under McClellan were arrayed before the city of Richmond, its lines of entrenchments extending in the form of a crescent 15 miles, or more than 20 miles (as we accept the statement of one or two eminent cotemporary historians,) astride of the Chickahominy, entangled in swamps and morasses. The pulse of the North beat high with expectation, while it seemed that one of those great events were about to occur which mark at distant periods an epoch on the great horologe of time. Two nations were about to close in a death grapple; the one to maintain its unity, the other its independence. While the Confederate chiefs with a spirit not devoid of grandeur and dignity, had resolved to conquer or perish in the defence of their capital city. They had quietly withdrawn their army at Corinth from before Halleck without loss, and unobserved, an event greeted at the North with triumphant rejoicing, but pregnant of nothing but disaster to the Union arms. Halleck after his exploit was called to Washington to superintend in safe and undisturbed quiet the operations of the generals in the field, and particularly those of the army of the Potomac. On the 24th of June, McClellan deemed his situation before the city no longer tenable, and issued his orders for that ever memorable retreat toward the James, and on the morning of the 26th, commenced that series of battles beginning on the right flank, which on the morning of the 28th, found itself transferred with terrible loss to the right bank of the Chickahominy (if the reader considers himself facing the mouth of the stream, he will understand the terms right and left,) in the rear of that part of the army stationed at Golding's farm, including the Vermont troops, with whom I now take my station behind breastworks and two redoubts, manned by Mott's & Ayer's batteries.

It was not until the evening of the 26th that the noise of the battle reached our ears through the rare and heated atmosphere, while the earth trembled beneath the rapid discharge of the far-off artillery. Of the bloody action at Gaines Mills we were not aware, while shells were seen to shimmer in the air from the entrenchments before the city.

At evening roll-call, on Friday, the 27th, as the drummer boy was retiring to his tent, a shell came bounding along, tearing through his drum, which he had just lain down. Hitherto all had been quiet at our particular place of encampment. A brisk cannonade was now begun by the rebels, to which our batteries did not reply. Falling flat on our faces, it seemed for a time as if the shells would scrape the dust from our backs, until taking advantage of a cull, we moved without loss to the shelter of a bluff in our rear. The enemy, composed of some Georgia troops, Col. Toombs, now commenced an attack with infantry. In the melee that ensued, the 5th Vermont found itself briskly engaged and the enemy repulsed, but renewed the attack on the following morning, with the loss of their colonel killed, and the lieutenant colonel a prisoner. The brigade now broke up its camp the morning of the 28th, and Co. B, of the 2d Vt., was detailed to assist in cutting a slash in front, while behind us, far into the following night, passed in sad review the army trains of baggage and artillery, whose heavy tread seemed sufficient to crush the Rebellion. Of the mournful cortege of ambulances, the wounded, with crushed and bleeding limbs, we were in a measure spared the sight. This day the enemy was mainly quiet, burying his dead and licking his wounds, perhaps puzzled by the retrograde movement of the Union troops, as were the troops themselves. At evening the sky was lit up by the conflagration of the stores at White House, while during the day, clouds of dust revealed the movement of the enemy's troops on the left bank of the river, here an inconsiderable stream flowing in a deep but narrow channel. On Sunday morning, the 29th, the elastic and motley throng had passed by toward White Oak Swamp, and at early dawn our brigade took up a devious line of march toward Savage Station, through a cultivated country, the Chickahominy (name of evil memory) to our left in a wooded valley.

About noon the troops making a halt, one Capt. Reed, well mounted on a bay horse, rode down alone to the river, over which, I believe, there was a bridge. He had passed some of the enemy's scouts without observing them; when meeting others in front, he instantly turned about, and in less time than it has taken me to write it, escaped unhurt from the fire of nearly a dozen muskets concealed on either side of the way. The horse, a noble animal, was shot through the body and turned loose to die. The morning had been cloudy and threatened rain; but the burning sun now shone from a cloudless sky. It was, perhaps, two o'clock, P. M., when we arrived at Savage Station, where large stores of grain and provision were burning, and our minds filled with forebodings of evil. Of the battle in the forenoon we were ignorant, as well as of the approach of the coming engagement. The brigade had tarried some three hours in the vicinity when it took up its line of march, to what point we know not, more than that it was toward the river. Soldiers soon learn to ask no questions, and to perform their duties like the horse and mule, with mechanical obedience. Emerging from the woods where we lay, a question arose among the colonels of the brigade as to who should take precedence in the line of march. Said Col. Lord, of the 9th, to Col. Whiting, of the 2d, "You proceed, and I will follow." "Follow me," said Col. Whiting dryly, "and you will be in a bad way soon." On such fortuitous incidents do men's fortunes and lives depend. The brigade had marched on its way perhaps an hour, when orders came to hasten back. The fifth now in front, soon found itself face to face with the enemy, while a random fire from one or two companies on the right of the second galled it severely. To check this, a Capt. Tracy, drawing a pistol, swore he would shoot the first man dead who fired a gun without orders. It was after nightfall that the battle ended. The ill-fated fifth emerged from it, with scarcely men enough to form a company. Here five brothers, named Cumming, one of them an acquaintance of the writer, and a cousin of the same name, were killed. Abandoning our wounded to the merciless foe, then began that race with the rebels to the bridge at White Oak Swamp; the men who kept their ranks doing so with difficulty, their numbers nearly equalled by those who dropped down on either side. The whole of this mighty army was now like a writhing, mangled and bleeding serpent, whose body the exultant and desperate Rebels proposed on the morrow to sever in twain by one dexterous and relentless blow.

On the following day the sun shone out from a cloudless sky in fiery splendor. In the light of the morning stars the "old brigade" crossed the swamp on plank laid upon cross-ties, supported on stakes driven into the soft and yielding earth. Through the swamp ran a small creek, which a boy might leap, running into the Chickahominy. At what time the army and its trains had crossed this creek, our authors disagree, one placing it at daybreak, another fixing on 8 o'clock as the hour before the last wagon and the last cannon had plashed through the mud and water of the swamp, while hundreds of exhausted men threw themselves on the ground to slake in the limpid stream the burning thirst which consumed them.

The engagement which now ensued, although far less bloody than one of the preceding, or than that of the following day, was from the critical situation of the Union army, the strategy of the Rebel chiefs, the valor, fortitude and endurance of the Union troops, its varied incidents and wonderful vicissitudes one of the most remarkable of any in those five days of fearful battle. It was one which contemporary historians have described in words of burning eloquence, and by as many different historians designated by the several names of "Glendale," "Frazer's farm," and "New Market cross roads," but which by those who were present and fought in it, will never be known by any other than that of "White Oak Swamp," a name to be forever associated in their minds with all that is fearful, grand and terrible. If we suppress dates and names, there would be little to lead the reader to accept their several accounts as descriptions of similar events, much less of the same action. Why is this? Was there here, as at Pittsburgh Landing, to which this battle in its beginning and ending bore a strong resemblance, something which the general officers of the Union army in their reports suppressed for prudential reasons; a state of affairs which it was shameful to confess, yet impossible to deny; palpably plain to those who bore the first brunt of the enemies' tremendous assault, and by one eminent historian (Dr. Smucker) not wholly ignored, and whom I propose to quote, as his narrative is more in accord with the writer's own experience and observation, which was of course limited: "Soon after crossing the creek, the Federal generals formed their new line of battle with great energy and promptness. The chief of these officers were Heintzelman, Sumner, Kearney, Porter and Hancock. The new position of the Federal forces extended about four miles in length. On the extreme right wing Gen. Hancock was posted with his brigade; next to him were the troops of Brooks and Davidson—the batteries of this division were commanded by Capt. Ayres; then came the divisions of Sumner, Heintzelman and Porter, extending to the left, the extreme of which rested upon the James river." Dr. Abbott says that Gen. Franklin was here posted on the right, with Richardson's division and Naglee's brigade added to his own corps, to guard the passage of the bridge, which had been destroyed.

Such was the position of the Union troops as history has recorded it. I now describe it from my own standpoint. On crossing the swamp our eyes were surprised by the appearance of newly erected earthworks on the bluffs above. About sunrise the brigade was marched upon an open plateau, the general contour of which somewhat resembles a flat-iron, the base resting on a forest, the point to the north, and surrounded by the swamp on every side but the south; it contained several hundred acres and three farm-houses. Here were posted the Divisions of Generals Smith and Richardson, with Naglee's brigade to guard the passage of the swamp. Here in Smith's division were the Vermont troops under Brooks. But there was here no order of battle, but a halt in the march and a massing of the troops, in the midst of which a large baggage-train was fixed as immovable as if planted in the earth; a halt of five or six hours, the officers and men alike in quiet repose; none of the first or their aids were seen on horseback, or giving orders, our own brigade as quiet as sheep on their native hills, while around them were impacted, probably not much less than 20,000 men if they did not exceed that number.

It was now 11 o'clock A. M. in the house of a Mr. Britton; Gen. Smith was arranging his toilette, and if we accept the report of the Congressional Committee, General McClellan was reposing on a gunboat, while the greater part of the artillery were packed on the distant Malvern Hills, when the present writer left his company for water at a farm-house near by. At the well were two Germans, artillery men, one scanning with a field-glass the amphitheatre of rising woodland, circling the swamps for miles; their looks were sad and anxious, and their words ominous of evil, expressing the greatest concern in regard to the stupidity of the situation. Asking them what they saw, I was courteously handed the glass, and pointed to the landscape beyond the swamp, which to the unaided eye presented nothing but the repose of nature, but through the glass at an opening in the woods, scarcely visible, the enemy could be seen moving in squads of twos and threes, and presently a cannon was seen moving across my sight to the left; returning the glass, I went back to my regiment to eat my lunch and be ready for what might come, yet half wondering what to expect from an enemy so far off; but one which knew neither repose or slumber, and had in the morning's light marched an hundred and sixteen regiments from the lately beleaguered city, and who had now unobserved, commanding our position, planted his batteries, twenty in number, in secrecy and silence.

Scarcely was I seated on the ground, when like a clap of thunder from a clear sky a shell came hurtling over our heads, and instantly from the serried host a wild shout went up like the roaring of a wild beast, while officers and men were driven like dry leaves of the forest before a hurricane. Nothing was thought of but to get out of the way. One of the first shots passed through the house where General Smith was making his toilette not yet completed, cutting in two the body of Mr. Britton. The General rushed to the door and mounted his horse to follow the wild chaotic throng whose course it would have been as impossible to stay as that of a mad bull; all order and discipline for a time were lost. Through the forest was an open way toward which they were pressing, when a voice from one with a half slung knapsack, bade them shun the road into which the shot were now pouring, and the troops divided on either side.

The baggage now began to move. A colored teamster would have cut the traces of his mules, when a sergeant with his sword struck him on the back of his neck, and his half severed head fell upon his breast, and the train was soon out of sight. There was but one known road to the river; chaos, tumult and ruin were everywhere; 2500 head of cattle were driven on in one herd, and the wounded dragged themselves on in the burning sun. Our flight continued over something less than 2 miles through the woods, when taking advantage of some lower and cleared ground, officers and men began to rally, companies and regiments began to knit together; but the Twentieth New York, a large double regiment of stalwart Germans broke up their guns in rage and disgust, (can I call it cowardice?) scattered in every direction, and with other stragglers proceeded to the river, where all were put under arrest; but none to my knowledge were ever punished.

Having formed our ranks of those who saw safety and hope only in facing the enemy, we were now marched back through the woods, through which a solitary cannonier mounted on a limberchest, came galloping down. "Where are you going," said Gen. Brooks, drawing his sword, 'for ammunition,' said he. 'You will find it to the front,' said the bluff General, and the man turned back and disappeared. The enemy's fire was now abated of its first fury, but still vigorously kept up on our position in the edge of the forest. Company B ———— 2d Vermont, with a company of Berdan's sharpshooters, was now ordered to occupy the plateau from which we were first driven. To our astonishment, no dead or wounded were to be seen; the deflection of the enemy's guns, but half a hair's breadth, had strewn those fields with our corpses. It was now high noon, the enemy had not yet attempted the passage of the swamp, and nothing was to be seen but two burning farm-houses and a few bursting shells; their attack was being concentrated to our left, and was confined to the artillery to which our own began to respond with some effect; although at the first one of our batteries, Capt. Mott's, was shattered in pieces and his caisson blown up. Ere long, the enemy in force attempted the passage. The attack was met by General Smith, whose fire of infantry extended along whole columns; the sound of the battle was now like the roaring of a mighty tempest, surging from the right to the left, and from the left to the right, now near and now far again, above which was heard the shouts of the Rebel captains, urging on their men to certain death at the mouth of the Federal guns, while about fifty in number replied to twice that number of the enemy, until a cheer along our lines announced the foe's repulse, but who did not desist from the attack; yet, finding it impossible to cross in front now, sent a powerful detachment 4 miles south to Chas. City cross-roads to interpose between the Federal forces and the James river, cutting off their retreat. The position they proposed to reach was within a mile and a half of Turkey Bend on that river, and had they succeeded in their attempt, the ruin of the grand army had been complete.

Fortunately, information of this movement was obtained in time by Gens. Porter and Keyes, who so marshaled their wearied troops as to prevent its achievement. They reached the advancing columns of the enemy at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when the Rebel artillery made dreadful havoc in the Federal ranks. The latter were half dead with heat and exhaustion, and so little discipline remained that a portion of those regiments nearest the river broke their ranks, rushed to its shores, plunged into its waters, and after slaking the thirst which consumed them, returned to their colors and resumed the fight.

But the resistance of the Federal troops became gradually weaker, as there is a limit to the endurance of human nature. Fresh masses of exultant Rebels continued to press forward with great resolution, and an overwhelming victory seemed about to crown their efforts, when a new element appeared in the contest, and from our point of observation at 5 o'clock the western sky was flecked with clouds of bursting thunder.

I will now give some account of the movements of the enemy, who in two columns, by two different routes, followed the retreating army. The first was under Jackson, who followed with the purpose of outflanking or gaining the rear of the Union troops. It was his fortune to lose his way. At daybreak he found himself at Grape-vine bridge, on the Chickahominy. This he repaired, and crossing the river, was by sunrise at Savage Station, and followed us on the direct route through the swamp, commencing the race after we had nearly won it. This delay was the salvation of the Federal army.

Since that battle 19 years have passed away, and in the light of all accessible accounts it is yet an unsolved enigma, that a race was run with the Rebels to gain the passage of the White Oak Creek, our wearied limbs as well as the statements of history bore witness. It is said that to prevent the junction of Jackson's troops with the other divisions of the Rebel army was McClellan's first concern. If this statement is not a mere gloss, McClellan must have expected Jackson elsewhere than where he appeared. What measures did he take to prevent it? The left bank of the creek, long before 9 o'clock in the morning, was wholly abandoned to the enemy. As it is said with truth that Jackson lost both his way and the cause of the Confederates forever, I venture to solve the problem on the conjecture that it was, or should have been, his purpose to have crossed the Chickahominy at some point, probably below the mouth of the Creek, to have enclosed with Longstreet the centre of the Union army as in a vise, cut off the right wing, and compelled its surrender. As it was, although he fell upon us like a thunderbolt, he has been considered by those historians who have taken Glendale as their standpoint of observation as a useless factor in the engagement, while he supported with Huger's troops the Confederates at that point as stated above.

The divisions of Hill and Longstreet formed the second column, Hill upon the left, both under Longstreet. In their van rode Gen. Lee and Jefferson Davis. It had made the detour of the swamp, and at 3 P. M. found itself in front of the Union army, which Longstreet, who it is said had not heard from Jackson albeit he had for hours been thundering on our lines, determined to attack. Here took place the battle called Glendale.

I return to my position at the Swamp, where it was my lot to be an almost passive spectator of the scenes around me. A few shots were passed with the enemy's sharpshooters. In their vicinity appeared a man in Union blue, pacing to and fro under a tree. A troop of horsemen ascended the bluff, near a burning house, in our uniform. We suspected them to be enemies, who had resorted to this dastardly artifice, often practiced, but they were suffered to pass, and the plateau where the battle opened was not otherwise occupied by either party. I said it was 5 o'clock; deliverance had appeared, although we knew not whence it came. We knew not of our nearness to the river, and that here, as at Pittsburgh Landing, the gallant navy had come to save the land forces from ruin and capitulation. The whole extent of the enemy's lines could now be spanned by the arc of one circling shell, while beneath the recoil of their ponderous guns. the decks of the Galena, the Aroostook and Jacob Bell careened to the water's edge. These vessels were anchored at Turkey Bend; the loud detonation of their guns drowned the noise of all the artillery and small arms of the pandemonium on the land, as their colossal shells, 20 inches in length and 8 in diameter, fell among the Rebel masses, which quailed at last before this new and formidable antagonist, while their flying fragments, scattering in every direction, caused fearful havoc. Whole ranks were beaten down, confusion and terror now prevailed through their columns, and they who a few moments before were confident of driving the Federal army into the river, or compelling its surrender, themselves began to give way.

Encouraged by the evident effect of the gunboats, the Federal commanders, of whom, perhaps, the most distinguished was Gen. Heintzelman, determined to retrieve the fortunes of the day by one combined and desperate attack. "The gunboats were signalled to suspend their fire, and the great-hearted veteran named, galloped from column to column to announce the purpose in brief but stirring words. He then returned to his position, and passed from right to left the stern order to advance. The bugles sounded, and like a mighty deluge long compressed in narrow limits, that mass of enduring heroes caught new energy from reviving hope, and moved forward to the assault."

"Here under Grover were the steady men of Massachusetts, the fierce and fiery Irish brigades, under Meagher and Sickles, the well-drilled soldiers of Hooker and Kearney, with his Jersey Blues, with others no less gallant." The enemy met the assault at first with firmness, but eventually fled in confusion.

At Glendale the battle commenced at 3 o'clock, P. M., when the thunders of war burst upon Gen. Slocum's left, the Rebels sweeping a path before them with shot and shell, until after a space of two hours they withdrew before the deadly storm which infantry and artillery poured in upon them. They then formed a wedge-shaped column, and came rushing forward in a storm of canister which ploughed great gaps in their ranks, which they closed up, and on the full run eddied around and enveloped Randall's battery, which was captured by the 55th and 60th Virginia regiments, and most of the 4th regiment of Pennsylvania Reserves were swept away in the flood, and Gen. McCall, was a prisoner. His division of raw levies, reduced in the previous battles to 6,000 men, had now long resisted the two ablest divisions of the Rebel army, numbering not less than 20,000 men, under Hill and Longstreet, and his left began to give way. The movement, had it not been compulsory, would have been a piece of superb strategy.

The Confederates following up their success, were taken by a flank fire from Hooker, drawing them across Sumner's front and upon McCall's centre, which remained unshaken. Hooker and Kearney now advancing, recovered part of the lost ground, and the farther attempts of the enemy were repulsed, although continued until a late hour of the night.

Such were some of the events of that terrible day, which can never be fully known. To give to the several generals and their commands the measure and due proportion of their action would be extremely difficult. Of the defects in my own account I am painfully sensible. In the entire engagement at White Oak Swamp, the Federal loss in killed and wounded was no less than 3,500 men. Many guns had been taken by the Rebels, belonging to Randall, Mott & Ayres. The enemy's loss was no less, perhaps much greater. It was a day of peril greater than any the nation ever knew, but the contest saved the Union army from ruin or capitulation, and should cover the soldiers and generals who fought with enduring renown. In vain had the Rebel generals put in practice their favorite tactics. The goal was reached, and the placid waters of the James had greeted the eyes of the Union troops.

The Vt. brigade was called off the field at about 10 o'clock, and a single gun was rapidly firing. It commenced its march at first through burning woods, and then in darkness through scenes more harrowing than those of the previous night, among other troops exhausted, straggling, and growing fierce with hunger. In the morning we found ourselves apparently in proximity to the river, and during the day, which was cloudy, we awaited an attack of the enemy, while unknown to ourselves the battle at Malvern hills was being fought, under circumstances more favorable to the Union troops.

Upon hearing the result McClellan sent his memorable despatch to the Capital: "If the enemy attacks on the morrow, necessity will compel me to consider the terms of surrender"; yet that battle was a victory. The order to fall back that very night was received by many officers with indignation, and words of treason and cowardice were muttered, and by Martindale and Kearney openly spoken; the first shed tears of shame, but the order was finally obeyed, and the wounded were left to perish.

On the morrow's morn we took up our line of march to the river; the rain fell in torrents, as if nature would wash out the foul stains on her bosom. Serried columns in line of battle drawn up with mathematical exactness, with frowning cannon were left behind us in position; heavy guns attended our progress, dragged in the mud by exhausted horses; but the river was reached about noon; the baggage did not all arrive until the following day; it would have filled any road in a line 40 miles long. We were eventually posted on the left bank of Herron's creek. On our way thither, the 3d of July, we were drawn up by Gen. Brooks in line of battle; said he: "I have brought you here where I think there is no danger. They told me you would run like sheep. I told them they lied.

But if I see a man skulking in those woods I will hang him, if I can find a rope to hang him with—keep your ranks; they can't hit a line." This speech interpolated with oaths was the only one he perhaps ever made to his brigade, of which he was secretly proud, and by which he was usually liked, although stigmatized as the cornstalk militia.

Little of interest now occurred; the men grew weak and enervated in that deadly clime. Massive earthworks were erected, which were evacuated on the 16th of August. Leaving them behind with the unknown graves of our dead, among them the noblest and bravest of the land whose glory and misfortune it was to have perished in the army of the Peninsula.

ADDENDA TO TOWN OFFICERS OF SWANTON,

*and citizens who have held other County, State or U. S. Government offices,

TOWN GOVERNMENT AND OFFICERS.

One of the first things after a considerable number of inhabitants had settled in this neighborhood was to make application to a justice of the peace to call a meeting of freeholders, for the purpose of organizing themselves into a community, under a regularly constituted form of town government.

This meeting was warned to be held at the house of Jonathan Butterfield, March 23, 1790; signed by Daniel Stannard, justice of the peace, and dated at Georgia, Mar. 5, 1790.

At the time and place appointed the meeting was opened. Jonathan Butterfield was chosen moderator and Thomas Butterfield, town clerk; also John Asselstyne, constable; Conrad Asselstyne, John Knox and Jonathan Butterfield, selectmen.

The October following, Daniel Stannard went to Castleton (the Legislature meeting there that year) as representative from Swanton, he having either settled here as a citizen, or else having been appointed to make all necessary arrangements for the due recognition of Swanton as an organized town.

TOWN CLERKS OF SWANTON.

These have been chosen at the March meetings in the years set to their respective names:

Thomas Butterfield, 1790-92, 94; Asa Holgate, 1795; Amasa Howe, 1796, 97; Jareb Jackson, 1798-1815; Charles Hall, 1816-19; Cornelius Wood, 1820-28; Ira A. Vanduzee, 1829, 30; George Bullard, 1831, 33-41, 43; Richard F. Fletcher, 1832; Zoroaster Fisk, 1842; W. S. Thayer; 1844-1877, continuously; H. A. Lawrence, 1878; Rigney D. Marvin, 1879-82.

THE TOWN TREASURERS OF SWANTON

have been: Thomas Butterfield, 1791-95;

Israel Roberson, 1795; Amasa Howe, 1796, 97; Jareb Jackson, 1798-1806; Joseph Robinson, 1806-09; Shadrach Hathaway, 1810, 14-17; Benj. Fay, 1812, 13, 27, 28; Charles Hall, 1818, 19; Clark Hubbard, 1820, 21; Daniel Bullard, 1822-27; Geo. Green, 1829-31, 36-38; James Fisk, 1832; William Farrar, 1833; Timothy Foster, 1834, 35; Lewis Janes, 1839-41, 43; Horatio W. Barney, 1842, 44; E. B. Rounds, 1845, 46; John Barney, 1847-1859; N. A. Lasell, 1860-64; Joseph Blake, 1864-66; Fletcher Tarble, 1867-68; Richard Marvin, 1869-71; Wm. H. Blake, 1872-1882; J. W. Dorman, 1878.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—Thus closes this excellent record from Swanton, there may be a few Author's mistakes, find us any history entirely free from them, or any compiler's work made quite perfect,—Scott was not quite satisfied with his successes, Irving in his latter days would have re-written all his books. All literature is an art, capable of higher perfection, historical literature emphatically so; the longer one works in the field, the more are they so impressed. With this general acknowledgement, known of all who pause to think, we regard Swanton a very good general and local history, not only, but remarkably so. We are not wont in our pages to compare respective papers, but think well to commend this to the notice of the towns who have yet histories to be finished for this work. Give us facts with condensation. Swanton has more space for issuing jointly with us a town volume. H.

SIMPSON STEWART

came to Berlin from Jeffrey, Mass., previous to 1800, and settled near Irish Hill. He was an energetic farmer, and took an active part in organizing and running the business matters of the town; died in 1841, aged 92.

Capt. John Stewart, son of Simpson, born in Amherst, N. H., came with his father, assisted in clearing the land, and occupied the same until his death, caused by a fall from an apple tree in 1847, aged 73.

RICHARD BAILEY,

born in Massachusetts, lived near Boston, was a minute-man, and kept his gun and knapsack hung up near his bed, and when the rations became stale they were changed for fresh, so when the news came that the British troops had left Boston for a raid through Cambridge and Lexington, he started for the scene of action, and "didn't stop to shake the dirt out of his shoes." He afterwards served as a soldier in the army of his country, and settled on a farm in the northeast part of the town; died in 1825, aged 84.

JOSEPH GOODENOW,

born in East Sudbury, Mass., was orderly sergeant and paymaster in the British army, but at the breaking out of the war of the Revolution, joined the little handful of men under Allen and Warner, and assisted in taking Ticonderoga and Crown Point, May 10, 1775; was a soldier under Stark, and remained in the army a number of years. He made a home on a farm on the Winooski, near the northeast corner of the town. He died in 1820, aged 77.

WEST BERLIN CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was formed Feb. 16, 1865; 11 members, 4 males and 7 females, Rev. John F. Stone being acting pastor. Daniel Chandler, Jr., and John H. Kimball were elected deacons. Mr. Stone remained pastor until 1876. From 1876 to September, 1879, Rev. Wm. Schofield was acting pastor, since which time to 1882, Rev. Alden Ladd has officiated as pastor; present number of members, 22.

In 1857 the people of West Berlin, Congregationalists, Methodists, Baptists and others, erected a small, convenient church building, which was used alternately by each society until 1870, when the Methodists built a church near by, since which time the house has been occupied almost entirely as a Congregational church.

A union meeting-house was built at the head of the pond in 1837, mostly by Methodists and Universalists, and was occupied as a church more or less until 1858, when it was purchased by Almon Poor, and moved on to his farm near by and converted into a dwelling-house.

Errata.—The article in the history of Berlin, entitled "Berlin Pond and Benjamin Falls," was written by Mrs. Joel Foster, of Montpelier, and should be so accredited.

On page 60, Col. James Johnson should read Col. Cyrus Johnston.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—These papers for Berlin, not coming into our hands until after we had closed the Washington County volume, the best we could do was to enter them at the first opening in this volume. See Berlin, page 52.

ANALYSIS OF VOTE IN THE HOUSE.

BY M. D. GILMAN, LIB. ST. HIST. SOC'Y.

For the resolution—Republicans, 109; Democrats, 12; Independents and Greenbackers, 2. Total, 123.

Against—Republicans, 34; Democrats, 16; Independents and Greenbackers, 7. Total, 57.

Not voting—Republicans, 28; Democrats, 19; Independents and Greenbackers, 5. Total, 52.

The vote by counties was as follows:

	For	Against	Not voting.
Addison,	16	2	4
Bennington,	3	7	7
Caledonia,	9	5	2
Chittenden,	11	2	3
Essex,	5	3	4
Franklin,	4	7	4
Grand Isle,		1	4
Lamoille,	7	3
Orange,	9	1	5
Orleans,	12	5	2
Rutland,	11	4	10
Washington,	7	8	2
Windham,	14	4	3
Windsor,	15	5	2
	123	57	52

We cannot account for the light support given from Washington county for this measure, except upon the ground of a refined sense of delicacy felt by the members as to voting in favor of the interests of their own county, at the expense of some other parts of the State; they could not have opposed the measure on account of the burden of taxation imposed upon their respective towns, as the amount required is less than one fifth of one per cent on the grand list.

The town of Middlesex, the first settled in the county, has an interesting history already prepared, for which the town will pay towards the printing of a thousand copies about six-tenths of a cent per copy. We trust that the member from Middlesex, in voting solidly against this measure, did not represent his intelligent constituents; and we trust that such is the case in the other towns in the county whose members saw fit to vote against the measure. An examination shows that the opposition to this measure, as a rule, came from the small, back towns, where the cost will not be more than from one to two cents to each voter, towards the printing of a thousand copies of their history; and the history of most of these towns possesses an interest to the State at large, if it does not to the inhabitants of the towns directly interested. We hope the towns that voted against the measure will furnish as complete histories as possible, so as to get the worth of their money.

M. D. G.

TOWNS THAT VOTED IN MARCH, 1879.

At the following March meeting, to subscribe for the 3 Vols. of the Gazetteer owned in Vermont, as the Joint Resolution provided for:

Andover,	Cavendish,	Rockingham,
Baltimore,	Dummerston,	Salem,
Bethel,	Essex,	Tinmouth,
Brookline,	Ludlow,	Wardsboro,
Calais,	Marshfield,	Weston,
	West Windsor.

For the same and to buy the balance of the whole work:

Benson,	Rupert,	Vernon,
Hancock,	St. Albans,	Westminster.
Pittsfield,	Thetford,

Whose representatives were made substitutes:

Addison,	Manchester,	Highgate,
Athens,	Lowell,	Montgomery.
Elmore,	Hardwick,

Whose town clerks were made substitutes:

Fairfax,	Morrisville,	Guilford,
	East Montpelier.

Whose historians were made substitutes:

Barre,	Clarendon,	Middlesex,
Berlin,	Lunenburg,	Woodbury.

Where given or left to a Library in the town:

Burlington,	Greensboro,	Ryegate,
	Springfield.

Other persons made substitutes by the Publisher, under the provision of the joint resolutions substituted for towns that voted not to take the work, and furnished no substitutes in the town:

Rev. Amos Foster, of Putney, Congregational pastor, there for 40 years, and historian for the town; L. Howard Kellogg, Esq., of Benson, a contributor; Mrs. Matilda A. Crosby, Pres. of Ladies' Temperance Society, St. Albans; the Library of the Ladies' School, St. Joseph's Parish, Burlington; H. S. Root, Esq., of Newport, Orleans Co. Swanton voted to leave it to the selectmen.

Bethel was the first town to reach the Publisher with the report of its vote, by mail to Burlington, the same afternoon; Ludlow, our native town, who waited for mailing till morning, was the second town, and good old Cavendish, who has always, from the early day, dwelt very neighborly by the side of Ludlow on the east, came in with her yea vote, third.

In all, to the towns and substitutes in accordance with the Joint Resolution passed by over a two-thirds majority of the Legislature, 112 vols. had been delivered, and the part due from towns and substitutes paid and accounts sent in to the State Auditor when first the Publisher was informed the Auditor had discovered the way in which Vermont had been paying appropriations for a hundred years without requiring the Governor's signature, when given by a Joint Resolution of the Legislature, was illegal, and that of the five Joint Resolutions given by the Legislature of 1878, none of the accounts would be audited.

The Publisher wrote to the Governor, who, after seeing the Auditor concerning the given resolutions, advised that all the parties wait till the next Legislature, get their bills passed and signed by the Governor, and thus placed above all question, expressing his sympathy exceptionally in regard to her bill, but encouraging her, whose work had so many friends in Vermont, to have no fear but that the next Legislature would do her justice. The work which had been heartily begun at considerable outlay, had to be again suspended in press for two years more, at a large additional sacrifice to the Compiler and Publisher; but was done, and again brought before the Legislature of 1880.

THE COMPILER'S LAST NOTE.—Thus ends Vol. iv. May our mistakes be excused. We entered press with it a year ago to-day, June 14th. It has been a heavy work to carry through in a twelve-month, and we lie it at the feet of our people very glad of its accomplishment. We have not done in all things as we would, but as we could under the circumstances by which surrounded. We have reached the first 1200-page mile-stone marked by the Legislatures, with but one, we think, intention unfulfilled: We have only—giving the more complete history for the Capital of the State, whose glory is the glory of the State, at home or abroad, which could not be anticipated, but came upon us, and whose history we could not sacrifice or suppress without diminishing the interest and value of the whole work—we have not covered as much ground as intended in the volume; but in the torrent of new material that rolled in as we progressed, from Montpelier and from her bordering towns, in the limited time, and the strong wish of the towns in this part of the State for full histories, and their willingness to help on the publication costs, but for which this volume could not have lived through the press; therefore have we, with the burden no one may ever count, upon us, taken the road into which the Providence that shapes the end, opened and swept it, with the assured belief that the chief thing our State looks for, expects and wishes from us, is the completion of the work in that manner to most enhance its interest to the people of the State in the present, and its value in the future, whether it contains one volume more or less.

HISTORICAL RECOGNITIONS.

The work cannot fail to become the standard early history of Vermont.—Boston Correspondent.

I hope your work will grow to series. Send us every volume. But we don't see how you can do printing so cheap up there in Vermont; we can't.—Librarian of Boston Athenaeum Library.

You are doing a great and most excellent work for your State.—New Hampshire Antiquarian Society.

In my judgment it is the most complete and thorough of the many State histories published.—L. E. Chittenden, Esq., New York.

Vermont will never give you anything for your valuable work. If you only belonged to our State you would not want for means to glorify your State to your content.—New York State Librarian.

It should be the pride, to say nothing of the duty, of every Vermonter to sustain it.—Benson J. Lawson, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

I am a perennial subscriber.—B. H. Hall, Author of Hall's History of Eastern Vermont, Troy, N. Y.

The subjects treated of in this publication are so exactly to my taste that I sympathize with you entirely in your pursuit; * * * and, although I never saw, and can never expect to see, your gallant State, I do nevertheless cherish in my Pennsylvania home a profound regard for all that belongs to Vermont and to her romantic History.—The late Dr. Wm. Darlington, Ex-M. C.

When you visit our city you shall have a welcome in our Antiquarian Hall.—Pennsylvania Historical Society, Philadelphia.

The State of Vermont has, in many particulars, won an honored place in the constellation of our great Federal Republic, and well merits to be better known in the detail of its local history, which you are so successfully collecting.—Historical Society, Chicago.

Miss Hemenway's Gazetteer of Vermont is the best local History in the United States.—Librarian of Chicago Historical Society.

Your Gazetteer is a marvellous work. We are astonished at the amount of local history and statistics. Every one wonders at the magnitude of the work that sees the volumes, and at its completeness.—The Wisconsin State Historical Society.

We have seen your excellent work in the Michigan State Library. Send a set of volumes published to us, and enter us as through subscribers.—Detroit Free Library.

Your work increases in interest. It will be a pleasant triumph to have excelled all the land, perhaps every land, in displaying the semi-civil period of your native State.—Philip Battell, Sec. of Addison County Historical Society.

If I live till you get around to Bennington County Supplement, I will do all I can to help you.—(Hon.) Hiland Hall.

I think your work admirable and worthy of all your energies.—Rev. Edward T. Fairbanks, Caledonia Co.

Forty men would have dropped this work before this time, and given it up discouraged. It is well, I have often said, that it fell into the hands it did, of one who would devote her life to it before she would give it up.—The late Hon. David Read, Chittenden County Historian.

There has never been any work published in the State in which prominent Vermonters have taken the interest they do in this, at home and abroad.—Hiram A. Cutting, State Geologist, of Essex Co.

My pen is at your service for anything I can do for your valuable work for St. Albans.—Mrs. John G. Smith, of Franklin County.

I will see Isle La Motte history is written up as you want it to be, and do anything I can to help the work.—Hon. Senator Goodsell, of Grand Isle Co.

I will see you have everything of interest for Cambridge.—Rev. Edwin Wheelock, of Lamoille County.

I can hardly wait to see the history of this County in press.—Judge Jas. Phelps, of Windham County.

I will do anything I can to aid your work.—Gov. Roswell Farnham.

There has never been a work published in the State in which we have taken the interest we have in this.—Mrs. (Gov.) Farnham, of Orange County.

Vermont cannot afford to not see this work completed.—Judge Thompson, of Orleans County (on the floor of the House, 1880).

Hon. Isaac F. Redfield left a provision in his will to give his portrait to the Windsor volume. I am his executor, and will see you have it. I find your work has many friends.—Ex-Gov. Proctor, of Rutland County.

I think Washington County will be very thoroughly written up. Miss Hemenway is entitled to the unlimited gratitude of all Vermonters.—Hon. M. D. Gilman, Librarian of Vt. Historical Society, of Washington County.

I feel immensely proud of our County. Wait till you get round to our County—Hiran Powers, Horace Webster, Geo. P. Marsh, Norman C. Williams, Jacob Col-lamer, Charles G. Eastman. We Windsor County men will make it shine for you.—The late Amos Deane, President of the Albany Law School.

THE PRESS OF VERMONT.

No. I, Vol. I. This work and this number is unique. No other number can have such an interest for this county, if for the State, beginning as it does at Addison on the Lake with the oldest settlement as it is claimed by Judge Strong, in Vermont, (etc.) —Middlebury Register.

No. II. We are proud of our Bennington Number, with our Bennington History by Governor Hall. Bennington it will be seen does not fall behind Addison. —Bennington Banner.

No. III. This number opens with a full and able County chapter by Rev. Thomas Goodwillie, a new and interesting feature in the work, which it is presumed will be followed by other counties. Lyndon, a particularly well written history is commenced in this number, by Hon. Geo. C. Cahoon. We are happy to see the work is well sustained in our County. —The Caledonian.

No. IV. This Chittenden County Number is the most interesting of the series, containing as it does biographical sketches of the Allen family, and other men prominent in the early history of the State. It numbers among its contributors many of the best writers and antiquarians in the State. —Woodstock Standard.

(Vol. I being completed.)

This Gazetteer does not like Thompson ignore our County. Essex County is dealt fairly by herein, and this work deserves well of every citizen of Essex County. —Essex County Paper.

Vol. II. Franklin, Grand Isle, Lamoille!

The channel is bridged. Friends of this work have looked forward with anxiety. It was comparatively easy, so regarded, to bring out successfully the older counties, Addison, Bennington, Chittenden, richer in historical material; but here lay a line of newer counties, supposed to be almost without histories, would not the work break down here on our ground? We watched for it, and own to be happily disappointed. The busy genius who presides over the work seems only to have struck a new and fuller vein. There is almost too much spontaneity, an unmasterful current stirred. We feel it most emphatically the history of the people by the people. Never any work before so bore the impress of the Vermont character impressed upon it. It has passed its rubicon. It is the history of the people and the people feel it is.—Geo. F. Houghton, Esq., in the journals of the day and Historical Magazine (N. Y.)

We are delighted with the history of our County in this volume. Spunky Lamoille never fell behind in anything for her County, or her honor in the State. —Lamoille Newsdealer.

ORANGE COUNTY PAPERS no less welcomed her County history at home, and other County papers congratulated her most appreciatingly, especially the Free Press.—See "Press Notices," close of Vol. III.

(Volume III being completed.)

We are glad to welcome Vol. III. * * It forms a reservoir of authentic, historical and personal information of the utmost value to Vermonters. We urge Vermonters once more to supply themselves with these volumes while they are obtainable. Thompson's Vermont has long been out of print, and is now scarce. In a very few years Miss Hemenway's Gazetteer will be all in private hands, and procurable only upon lucky chances and at high prices. —Burlington Free Press and Times.

(Volume IV, No. I.)

The Gazetteer is a valuable work, not only for reference, but for general reading, as it contains so much information concerning men and things connected with each town in Vermont. Everybody who wants to be well posted in the history of this State should have the Gazetteer. —The Caledonian, St. Johnsbury.

(Number 2.)

This work is a great undertaking on the part of Miss Hemenway, and of inestimable value to the people of Vermont, both in their individual and collective capacity. No citizen of Vermont who desires to secure for himself or his family such information as will give an intelligent comprehension of the surroundings in which we live and move and have our being, can afford to ignore such an opportunity as is here presented to obtain information. It is to be hoped that the people will so appreciate this undertaking as to give the publisher a liberal patronage and secure a large edition of the work, as the number to be printed will correspond to the orders secured by the publisher.

—Green Mountain Freeman.

No. 3, Vol. iv, contains, on the part of Montpelier, the history of the town from its earliest settlement to the present time, by Hon. E. P. Walton, full accounts of the insurance companies, banking business, a record of all the merchants, firms, etc., the railroad history of Vermont, the newspaper record, the bibliography of Montpelier, by M. D. Gilman, and other interesting papers; is illustrated by fine views of Bethany church and Christ church. No. 4 will contain the history of all the religious denominations, the longevity of the town from 1825, a soldier record—no such . . . as ever before published by Montpelier, giving, as it does, the name of every man from Montpelier who enlisted in the late war. Montpelier history embraces numerous biographies of prominent citizens deceased, with views of many prominent buildings of the village, etc.

As a compendious local history it has no equal in Vermont, and the latter part of the State, yet to come, is rich in local history, it being first settled. For the supplement there is much matter already prepared, and Brandon and other towns in Rutland County will be represented in these pages.

LETTER OF THE LATE JUDGE SHORT OF THETFORD.

Miss Hemenway:

DEAR MADAM:—Your kind note of July is received, and from a remark in it . . . I thought it probable that it might not be too late to substitute the accompanying sketch of Dr. Hovey for the one I sent you. That was written in haste just as I was recovering from a long sickness, and on reviewing it, I do not quite like it. I very well know that in the great pressure upon your mind, changes must be unpleasant, and I will not ask it in this case if not perfectly convenient. In a recent letter from Dr. Hovey, he intimated that he would address you personally on the subject of your great work; so that if you have not already heard from him, you may expect to soon. I fully appreciate the intense care and anxiety you must have in carrying forward your noble enterprise, and will cheerfully render you any aid in my power. The work when completed will be an honor to our State and nation, and a crown of glory to yourself.

With great respect,

Very truly yours,

S. SHORT.
