The quarrel between Mehemet Ali and the Sultan, it has been justly observed, is today no longer a family dispute to be settled between themselves through the fate of pute to be settled between themselves through the fate of arms. The offensive and defensive treaty of alliance struck between Russia and the Sultan, placing the former sinder the obligation of supplying the latter with every assistance the exigence of events may accessitate, imposes upon thuse Powers which have deemed expedient to protect against the right of conceive interference in the affairs of Turkey which Russia arrogated to herself, the inscessity of coming to decision. England, thanks to the indonstee, in-ensibility, and erroneous policy of her Ministry in eas te a affairs, is now compelled (if she yet attaches important tance to national character, to political and commercial interest) to take an ective and leading part in the contest. It is therefore of importance to call public stitution to the confidention of this question, and since proper accesses to place, it will sink be out of season to acquaint you with the
