in Europe. The days when mankind revelled in childlike pleasures had vanished; those beautiful times were irrevocably lost. We may remember them with pain and longing, as SCHILLER turns back to the Gods of Greece; but all our longing will never bring them back. Beethoven, having eaten from the tree of knowledge, being a son of the 19th century, could not content himself with the subordinate position of Haydn and Mozart, to make music for the pleasure of an aristocratic mob. Proud of his dignity as an artist, he felt himself the equal of the princes and the powerful in his intercourse with them, just as Handel before him with the English aristocracy. Add to this "crime" that B. did not prefer to die as a young man, after creating his 2d symphony, but rather write a number of his principal works in the mature age of manhood. Every old maid of rank would have celebrated B. as the universal heir and successor of Mozart, somewhat eccentric, to be sure, but amiable. B. preferred to live and to rise by the strength of his own genius in the full power of manhood.

We pass by the interesting account Marx gives of B.'s young years at Bonn. His star was destined to rise at Vienna over the pure spring of Haydn and Mozart. In our statement of B.'s relations to his predecessors we merely endeavored to reflect the ideas of Marx. BACH and HANDEL, on the contrary, had but a limited influence on his development. As to BACH "B. was influenced by him as by HANDEL. He absorbed as much of them as his own individual nature might. He never studied them with a view of appropriating them or fashioning himself after them (Marx I. p. 55)." CHERUBINI's operas and MEHLER's "Joseph," the latter we rate higher though than Marx — certainly exerted only a superficial influence. In instrumentation and harmonization and harmonization especially, a relation between B. and Cherubini cannot at all be assumed.

The number of works B. wrote in his youth is very small. All developed, like Pallas Athene, he presented himself to the nation, though not at first as colossal in size as in the Missa solemnis and the Ninth Symphony, Marx enumerates (p. 65) quite a number of smaller works, which B. probably wrote in the time from 1783—1795. With the works, which, according to Marx's view, appear small when measured by B.'s standard, and are like a combination of the works of his youth are to be classed: the Variations on a theme in F, op. 34, and the Variations on a theme — or, rather, two themes — from the Finale of the Eroica, with a fugue, op. 35. With all due deference to the judgment of Marx, we think these variations deserve a higher place. Just in these variations the great tone-poet takes his ideas from the innermost depths of his soul, he shows that if he did not exhaust the theme, in itself not at all grand, in the Eroica, a theme which occurs in the ballet "Prometheus" likewise, he did it only with reference to the limitations of form. If we hear these variations played by an inspired artist, of the orchestral power of H. v. BULOW, we cannot help liking and admiring them. The two small Sonatas in G minor and major, op. 49 certainly belong to a very early period. They are insignificant to be sure. But how much do they not impress children, who generally are first introduced by them to B.! The writer remembers the time with pleasure when a world of rapture and joy arose before him from the Andante in G minor, little as it is. Marx fitly calls all these smaller works connecting links between the genius and the public.

B. was despised on the one hand and excommunicated on the other for his revolutionizing the musical form of those times. Marx proves incontrovertibly that B. emancipated himself from traditional forms without becoming formless. The subjects of his poems demanded another form. Such is always created by a genius who makes an epoch in art.

"Beethoven is not placed high enough by those who consider this exceeding the old limits of forms as a dominant feature. To relinquish forms may be the result of arbitrariness or striving for originality, or ignorance and want of skill in the handling of forms. This relinquishing of forms taken by itself is not therefore freedom, not proof of an artist nature. Beethoven had to carry out a higher destiny. As a true, cultivated and faithful artist he entered into the forms created before him and completed them, filling them with his whole energy. But where they did not correspond to the idea of his work, he went beyond them, enlarging or creating new forms." (Maax I. 85.)

The form not being an external necessity, but like the human face, the mirror of the soul, it is inadmissible to assume different levels in the development of B.'s three successive styles. B.'s mind grows: as long as the old form is sufficient for his mind, he puts forth his blossoms within its limits. When it grows too narrow for him, he bursts it, creating a form of his own. This continuous growth of B.'s mind, LISZT beautifully and ingeniously described in a letter to LENZ written in 1852. We cannot refrain from quoting the principal passage from the document as communicated by Lenz (Marx 85):

"The solution I arrived at with reference to this question (namely, how far traditional forms necessarily determine the organization of the musical idea) such as it manifests itself in Beethoven's works themselves, would lead me to divide them not into three styles but into two classes. The first being that where the traditional and conventional form contains and determines the idea of the master; and the second that, where the idea expands, breaks, re-creates and shapes the form and the style according to his wants and his inspirations," &c.

We will ask now, could Haydn's charming Symphonie militaire, this delineation of a harmless citizen looking on comfortably and enjoying the rounds of blind cartridges, have the same form, the same proportions as B.'s Eroica, the first movement of which appears to us like the bringing up of Jupiter amidst the din and clangor of the hammer of the Cyclops? Or had not B. to create his form himself for a poem, which before him no one could write.

Under the lead of our guide we now enter the temple of Beethoven's art itself. Here we are convinced at once that B. opened in his compositions for the piano an entirely new unknown domain to art. HAYDN and MOZART do not, with the exception of a few works, make use of the piano as an instrument for its own sake, but as the most convenient organ, "to pronounce musical ideas" (Marx I. p. 103).

(To be continued.)

(From the Monthly Religious Magazine.)

History of the Oxford Singing-School.

BY REV. E. H. SEARS.

(Concluded from page 332.)

The next thing was the choice of a leading chorister, for Mr. Solomon Huntington's term was drawing to its close. The "traps" of course went for Timothy Case, and the "locks" went for Peter Bettis. There was, however, a third party, which represented young Oxford, and which held the balance of power. They were mostly "traps" in principle, though they did not make that the most important plank in their platform. Peter Bettis, however, was chosen by a decided majority, for he rallied around him the kindly disposed of all parties, who would not see him rudely thrust from his place. He rose, with a good deal of emotion; his words were few, but to the point:—

"I thank you, my friends, for this honor, but I must decline. I will never sing with the choir huddled together like a flock of sheep."

Of course the reader will excuse him for drawing his imagery from his own bucolical reminiscences. The third party rallied its forces. They put forward as their representative, a young blade by the name of Seth Hubbard.

Seth lived in a remote part of the town, but he was one of the rising lights of Oxford. He was fond of singing, fond of dancing, fond of female society, and female society was generally fond of him. He was engaged to two young ladies at the same time, and would have been to a third had not "circumstances prevented." There was a girl of smart, queenly appearance, that came up from Mr. Thomas Cleveland's dairy-farm, and sat and sang in the quadrangle. Ellen Cleveland was among the best specimens of honest country life. Strength of muscle, mind, and heart had come to her from the work of the dairy-room. She had large black eyes, her cheeks were like two baldwins, and her ruby lips poured forth strains which could always be heard, clear as a lark's, in the highest and most tumultuous flights of the quadrangle. Her vocabulary was very limited, especially in the direction of polite phrases, and she cut short with the word "gammon" a great deal of the general nonsense at the country parties. It was currently reported and believed that Seth had tried to engage himself to Ellen Cleveland, than she cut him short with "gammon," that she applied her palms to his ears in such wise that fuguing tunes sang through his brain spontaneously for several hours, and that she set him whirling like one of her own chesses till his face subsided into a homeward direction. This, however, had been hushed up, and Seth had come clear shining out of any little clouds of this sort. Every Sunday he came with his gilt buttons gleaming in the distance. As far as you could see Seth, so far you could see the row of metal on him, shining in the sun. Even the clouds of dust which the carriages raised along the road seldom shut out entirely the glimmer of the fourteen buttons as they hove in sight. You might say of Seth then, when on his way to church, more truly than Goethe does of the loved one,—

"I see thee, if far up the pathway yonder,
The dust be stirred."

Seth was chosen first chorister by a triumphant majority. He was a decided "trap," and some of that party having formed a coalition with young Oxford, carried the day. Almost all the older singers, who had given dignity and character to the quadrangle, went below into their pews. They were not going up into that pigeon-loft, let Grandville and all the world do as it might. Peter Bettis never sang any more. His mouth came closer and closer together, till he occupied the extreme left of the "locks," and when the orchestra party prevailed, it shut entirely, and he went below.

Great preparations had been made for the first Sunday after the reorganization of the choir. Mr. Solomon Huntington has closed his school and gone. The choir have met every evening in the week to practise under the new chorister, and it is expected there will be an uncommon blaze of harmony from the pigeon-loft on Sunday. Something must be done to shame the conservatives, and convince the "old fogies" of the quadrangle that theirs was not the music of the spheres.

Sunday comes; the choir are in their new seats, Seth Hubbard shines in front in his twice sevenfold metallic brilliancy. During prayer time and sermon time there is much bustling and rustling and turning of leaves; at other times—but the reader must not expect me to describe the torrents of psalmody that rolled down from the pigeon-loft into the aisles. The grand effort, however, was reserved for the close. After the last prayer in the afternoon, Parson Harrison rose, and announced to the audience that the services would close with a voluntary. Thereupon Seth Hubbard left the pigeon-loft and went below. The people stared and stretched their necks as he came wending up the broad aisle, flinging the golden sheen around him, till he stood in front of the deacon's seats, below the pulpit. Then the strophes and anti-strophes broke forth as follows:

CHOIR (in the loft.)
Come, pilgrim, come away,
C-o-m-e, p-i-l-g-r-i-m, c-o-m-e a-w-a-y,
Come, come, come, come, come, come,
Come, pilgrim, come away,
C-o-m-e a-w-a-y.

SETH (below, solus).
I hear the voice of angels
They cry C-o-m-e a-w-a-y,
C-o-m-e a-w-a-y, c-o-m-e a-w-a-y.

CHOIR.
C-o-m-e a-w-a-y, c-o-m-e a-w-a-y,
Come, pilgrim, come away,
Come, come, come, come, come, come,
C-o-m-e a-w-a-y.

SETH.
They cry C-o-m-e a-w-a-y.

SECOND TREBLE.
Come, pilgrim, come away.

BASS.
Come, pilgrim, come away.

TENOR.
Come, pilgrim, come away.
OMNES.
Come, pilgrim, come away.
Come, come, come, come, come, come, come
Come, pilgrim, come away,
Come away—come away—come away—come away,
C—o—m—e a—w—ay—y.
SETH.
They cry, C—o—m—e a—w—ay,
Co—me a—way,
Co—me a—way,
A—w—ay—y.

All party distinctions in the choir seemed to have disappeared for the moment. Even the "locks" opened their mouths, and leaned forward from the loft in a perfect deluge of harmony, and it was some time after the last lingering "Come away" had crept off through the vacuum of the "old maid's pew," and vanished before the congregation came back to themselves. I watched Parson Harrison. He looked very solemn, and kept stroking the top of his head. I could understand why he should do it now to prevent his hair from rising up, though I do not know this was his real motive.

"How did you like the singing?" was on everybody's lips as we came out of church. I was non-committal, for I really did not know what to say. My thoughts had taken a sort of spiral motion, and I preferred waiting till they subsided into their old channel. I saw the Clevelands walking ahead of me, and quickened my pace and came up with Ellen.

"I did n't hear your voice in the choir to-day."
"No. I sat below."
"You don't approve of the new arrangement?"
"O, I don't care a fig where the singers sit. 'T is n't of so much consequence where the seats are as who fills them."
"I expected to hear you to-day, as I understand you belong to the 'traps.'"
"Well,—I mean to open my mouth so as to let the words come out without hitting, when there's anything to come out."
"That singing this afternoon I consider rather remarkable."
"Gammon."

The same performance was repeated two or three Sundays, after which the chorister sent notice to the pulpit that another voluntary was to come off. Parson Harrison was one of the best of men, though when he had something disagreeable to say, or something which required more moral courage than usual, he never looked his audience in the face, but always looked straight at old Dick's pew. I have heard him preach some exceedingly pungent sermons, but he always poured them all in upon the negroes. Once, I remember, he preached a sermon against dancing, all of which went straight as an arrow at old Dick, though the poor old cripple could n't dance a step to save his life. The minister, in this new emergency, after the last prayer, made a pause, stroked the top of his head, which he seldom did in the pulpit, and looked at old Dick, from which I knew he was going to say something that gave him pain.

"The voluntary can be omitted. Shall we receive the Divine blessing?" And the congregation were dismissed.

Father Harrison had told some one that he thought the voluntary dissipated the solemn impression which he wanted the sermon to leave upon the minds of the people, and he felt obliged to leave it out.

We have come now to what may be called the "Decline and Fall" in the History of the Oxford singing-school, if not of the Oxford parish itself. The next Sunday both the quadrangle and the pigeon-loft were deserted and desolate. The hymns were given out, but nobody responded. I knew how deeply the minister felt it, for he looked under the stairs and preached at old Dick all day. In the afternoon, however, he gave out "Hymn 148," which in Dwight's edition of Watts, you will see, if you turn to it, is preserved in its original beauty, having not yet been tinkered for the modern compilations. There was a subdued pleading in the voice of the venerable man, which was very tender and touching, as he read these stanzas:—

"Come, ye that love the Lord,
And let our joys be known,
Join in a song of sweet accord,
And thus surround the throne.

"Let those refuse to sing
That never knew our God
But favorites of the Heavenly King
May speak their joys abroad."

The pastor sat down after reading the hymn, and stroked the top of his head three times, as if waiting for a response. I could not see how the old singers below would resist the appealing pathos of his voice, as it quivered through the stanzas. I thought Peter Bettis would certainly open his mouth. But it had closed forever on the melodies and shut them in. The pastor was just taking up his notes when a female voice broke forth, at first subdued and almost choked with emotion, but finally it soared clear and bird-like, scaling the empty pigeon-loft and waking its echoes. It was Ellen Cleveland's. One voice after another dropped in as the strain went on. Even old Dick and black Phillis opened their mouths, and Cornelius responded from under the opposite stairs; and the last stanzas of the hymn went up from every part of the house, with an unctious I have seldom witnessed:

"The hill of Zion yields
A thousand sacred sweets
Before we reach the heavenly fields
And walk the golden streets."

It went up from the congregation as if a mighty wind had come suddenly and swept them like so many human lyres, and rolled away in a soothing and billowy motion through the arches. It seemed to be alive and have a soul in it. People looked towards the Cleveland pew. Ellen's voice ruled the whole, and when the strain closed, her eyes were swimming in tears.

This went on for several Sundays, when lo! Seth Hubbard and his compcers reappeared in the pigeon-loft. They were determined, they said, to break up this screeching from all over the church. It was disgraceful. It was barbarous. They would see whether the pews would sing down the gallery. Fortunately they did not try. The pews became mute as the pigeon-loft became vocal. The pigeon-loft, however, were never after edified by the prayers and sermons, and they regarded their own performances the only ones which it was not a waste of time to hear. They spent the time between the singing in eating pea-nuts, reading newspapers, or making arrangements for the next hall, and thus they managed to fill up the hour at church rather pleasantly, notwithstanding the dull sermons and prayers.

Here my personal knowledge ceases, and I must write from hearsay the closing chapter of the history of the Oxford singing-school. I left the good old town to be educated somewhere else, and only came back to get short glimpses of the ancient church and its mutilated galleries. Good Mr. Harrison had left,—the kind-hearted old pastor, whose smooth, white hair was the silvery shine of the heavenly purities which he approached so near. The Scrape-wells turned against him. "Squeaking Tim" went to the Baptists. Young Oxford thought they ought to have a minister who had some taste for music, and who kept up with the times. Jesse O. Whitney and his brother-in-law joined the Methodists, that their fuguing faculties might have unobstructed swing. Seth Hubbard, notwithstanding his metallic splendors, disappeared under a cloud which the reader will excuse me from describing. Old Dick had sunk into his grave,—not, I trust, without sanctifying grace, considering all the orthodox sermons which had been piled upon his head. Ellen Cleveland was there,—no longer a tenant of the Cleveland pew, but of Esquire Brown's, whose daughter-in-law she was, and she had brought up already three cottage flowers to be sprinkled with baptismal waters. There was no settled pastor; a preacher was "supplying," and the church was about half full. A new set had succeeded to the pigeon-loft, assisted by a flute and a violin. There was nothing in its performances to blame, and not much to praise; but it made me sigh for the golden days of Peter Bettis.

I by no means affirm that the singing-school was the cause of all this decline. I only aim to give its beginning, its middle and its end. Certain I am that things went rapidly down as soon as the quadrangle was broken up. Certain I am, too, that they went rapidly up again in the short interval when Ellen Cleveland led off the congregation; and we came out of the church with our hearts brimming over with devotional rapture, and our souls melting together in brotherly and sisterly love. And I brought away from the church these two ideas,—and have carried them with me these thirty years, all after experience so confirming them that the Smithfield fires could not melt them out of me,—that the Divine influx comes with special power and fulness into congregational singing, and that singing-schools are a curse to human society.

MR. SEGUIN.—A son of the late Edward Seguin, the famous basso of the troupe which bore his name, has arrived in this country. He is said to possess an excellent baritone voice and a fine style, cultivated in the Paris Conservatoire. On dit, that he purposes organizing an English Opera Troupe for the production of Balfe's "Rose of Castile," Wallace's "Lurline," and other operas, new to the American public.—Amateur's Guide.

Music Abroad.

Music in Italy.

LA SCALA, MILAN. At this leading Italian opera house, the season has opened brilliantly, Verdi's grand opera of Attila having a brilliant run. The basso, Dalla Costa, takes the part of "Attila," in which he is described as very fine. The part of "Odabella," the heroine of the opera is sustained by Mme. Borsi-Deleurie, the wife of Mr. Louis Deleurie, who has lately established himself in Philadelphia as a teacher of singing. We have before us three Milan papers devoted to Music and the Drama. One of these, "L'Amico degli Artisti," says of the performance of Attila: "La Borsi-Deleurie well sustained herself in the good opinion of the public, by her fine soprano voice, of great compass, clear in the low as well as in the high notes, and by her bold and expressive acting. It is much to be desired that she be heard in some other opera, where her talents will be much better displayed." Another of these papers, Don Marzio, says: "The first applause was given to the Signora Giulietta Borsi Deleurie, who, in her grand cavatina, displayed all those rare gifts that are so much appreciated in our theatre. La Deleurie is a fine artist, and as such we have already applauded her on the stage of the Carcano theatre, in the early days of her career. Indeed, she enjoys an established reputation, acquired in the principal Italian and foreign theatres, and most recently in the San Carlo, of Naples, and the Principale of Barcelona; so that on our stage she could not fail to be deservedly honored with the title of an experienced artist. Her voice is a true soprano, sympathetic, extensive and spontaneous; her acting is correct and spirited; besides which she is a complete mistress of the stage, and has the gift of a handsome face." Another journal, Il Trouvatore, says: "The two artists who best sustained themselves in the favor of the public, were the Signora Borsi-Deleurie, and the basso Dalla Costa—a brave Amazon, and a most respectable King of the Huns. Signora Borsi-Deleurie, with her voice of extraordinary extent and volume, with her energetic singing and animated acting, had a general ovation in the andante, and in the caballetta of her cavatina, receiving most prolonged applause. She may be proud of her success, as she had to conquer so much opposition, and present herself in a theatre where bad humor is always ready to explode like a mine." It is to be hoped that the success of Mr. Deleurie as a teacher of singing, in which he has no superior in this country, may be such as to induce him to reside here permanently, in which case his talented wife may be heard in our Academy of Music.

TURIN.—At the Carignano Theatre, Verdi's Luisa Miller has been brought out, with Mme. Angelica Moro as the prima donna, and Melzi as the baritone.

TRIESTE.—Bellini's Somnambula has been produced, with Tiberini and his wife, (late Ortolani) in the leading parts, and their success has been immense.

PIACENZA.—Rossini's Cenerentola is the popular opera in this city. Mme. Brambilla-Marnili, the buffo Bottero, the tenor Vistarini, and the barytone Giannini being the principal artists.

PALERMO.—Verdi's opera of Stiffelio has been produced with success, a tenor named Mazzoleni creating a genuine furor. The prima donna was Mad. Boccherini, and the barytone Pizzigati.

ROME.—Pacini's new opera, Gianni di Nisida, continues to be popular.

NAPLES.—The San Carlo was opened on the 29th of November, with Mercadante's opera of Il Giuramento, which had great success. A new singer, Signor Limberti, was much applauded.

GENOA.—The opera of Vittore Pisani and Linda were played lately for the benefit of the prima donna, Mme. Branzanti.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

VIENNA, NOV. 15, 1860.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The rehearsals of Rubinstein's opera, Les Enfants des Landes, has been suddenly discontinued. It appears the tenor Wachtel is in litigation with the direction of the court theatre at Hesse Cassel, having failed to fulfil his engagement last year for some cause, whether sufficient or otherwise, to be decided by the lawyers. An official request has been made by the legal authorities of Prussia, that Wachtel, pendente lite, should not be allowed to sing in Vienna, which request has been acceded to by the Austrian Government, and Rubenstein's opera postponed in consequence. It is a question whether Wachtel's salary will be suspended, but I should hardly suppose the Viennese authorities will so far take part in a quarrel, in which others only are concerned. It is bad enough that they have prevented his appearing, and acted courteously to a neighbor to the detriment of an artist. Refusal of payment would be the most unjustifiable and discreditable proceeding, as evincing decided partiality in a dispute, the rights of which have yet to be determined.—Ibid.

MADRID.—In a recent number of the Madrid Correo there appears the following critique respecting the début of an artist who for some years held an honorable position in the Royal Italian Opera Company:—"The great novelty of the evening was Mad. de Mérie Lablache, who was making her début in our theatre. Every one was anxious to see and hear the celebrated contralto, who had sung for ten consecutive seasons at the Imperial Theatre of St. Petersburg, and has been so well received in all the capitals where she has appeared. Expectation was not disappointed; and the part of Orsino was sung by Mad. de Mérie in a style thoroughly worthy of an artist of her reputation. She possesses a magnificent and fresh contralto voice, an excellent method of singing, and a fine presence. She acts with consummate talent, and is, in fact, gifted with all the qualities which may be expected from an artist of her reputation. Our public saw immediately what kind of lady had to be judged, and soon pronounced in favor of the talented and comely contralto, covering her with applause both in the course of the opera and in the well-known brindisi. This last Mad. de Mérie sang in the best style possible, giving proofs of a rare talent, and that exquisite taste which is peculiar to great singers. Mad. de Mérie dresses with such gracefulness and propriety that she won for herself general approval, and she wears the male attire in a fine and very engaging manner. The reception which this artist met at the hands of the public could not be more brilliant; it was, in fact, in keeping with her merit. From this great success we are led to look forward with much pleasure to further performances, such as Arasco and others of the same kind, wherein Mad. de Mérie will have an opportunity of displaying all her powers. M. Bagier, the manager, could not have secured a better artist, and we congratulate him with as much warmth as several of our contemporaries have done before us."—Ibid.

Paris.

The correspondent of the N. O. Picayune, relates an anecdote apropos of Wagner's Tannhäuser, of a French literary adventurer, who had been long entertained at Parisian cafés by a travelling Englishman, for the pleasure of his company. He says:

Fast as time flew away, nevertheless the Englishman could not forget when the term of weeks he had allotted to his sojourn here had expired, that he must return to London. One night, after a dinner which had been watered most abundantly with the most generous vintages of Bordeaux, the islander announced to his companion their last repast together had been eaten. The Frenchman grieved more than I can easily express to you, as I am sure you are unable to conceive the heaviness of heart with which one descends from the luxurious table of the Café Anglais to the bread and cheese of a heggar's garret. His gaiety entirely abandoned him, and energetically as the Englishman plied him with wines, he failed to rally the fallen spirits of the former. While the Frenchman the next morning was gazing at the morsel of bread and cheese he had purchased for breakfast, but was as yet unable to touch, his viscera still being in too deep mourning for the Café Anglais, a knock at the door roused him from his contemplations. He found at the door a porter and a fine dog. The porter bore a letter from the Englishman asking the Frenchman to accept for a souvenir of their common hours the dog the latter had so often admired. The Frenchman, who had found providing his own mouth with food a task frequently attended with insuperable obstacles, could not undertake to supply another mouth with aliment. But having heard the Opera was in quest of dogs to appear on the stage when Herr Wagner's "Tannhäuser" is played, he led the dog to the opera house and offered him for a candidate in the canine chorus. He applied too late. All the places had been filled. Nevertheless his walk to the opera house turned out to his advantage, as he met, soon after he quitted the court yard of the opera house, an acquaintance, who being struck by the extreme depression depicted in every line of the poor devil's face, asked the cause of it. Being told how the manager of the opera had refused the dog without so much as listening to an enumeration of his talents, the acquaintance inquired into them, and finding the animal a beast of parts, which the dog's face avouched were really in his possession, that is, if the rules of physiognomy be grounded on accurate observation, he purchased the dog. Although he paid five hundred francs for him, he has had no reason to regret his choice. The first use the vendor made of the money was to return to the Café Anglais and take one—a last—good breakfast; which meal being ended, he was heard to exclaim as he stepped out on the boulevard—"I had no idea dog meat was so good."

I believe it is no news to you that a pack of hounds is to figure in "Tannhäuser," I sometime ago mentioned it. There is quite a rage now for the introduction of live animals upon the stages of the town, perhaps in consequence of the success which has attended the introduction of live rats upon the opera stage. They are introduced into every ballet, and upon ballet nights it is impossible to procure a seat there. A goat, as you know, plays the leading part in Mons. Meyerbeer's "Parlon de Ploërmel." Next week we are to have sure enough camels at the Cirque—which, despite its name, is a theatre, not a ring. These novel performers really throw a good many families into distress. It requires a very decided "turn" and a long practice to become even tolerably expert as an animal, to move the feet in brute rhythm, and balance the body with beastly elegance, and give life to the painted pasteboard. It takes at the least six months for a fellow to make a decent jackass. You can scarcely believe it from what you hear every day on the street! It is considered very fortunate that managers have hitherto been unable to introduce the natural agitation of the ocean on the stage, as a great many "waves of the sea" have large families to support and would be reduced to starvation if they were thrown out of employment. The introduction of animals on the stage gives them great uneasiness and many sleepless nights, and I have heard whispered they think of deputing the highest "wave of the sea" in their fraternity as a committee to beseech the Emperor to frame stringent laws prohibiting managers from introducing beasts upon the stage. They contend that as the Government has protected Corneille, Racine and Molière from burlesque writers, protection should be likewise extended to them, and further, because animals may be salted down or eaten fresh, or, if they be unfit for these uses, may be skinned and the skin sold, whereas men cannot be sold for more than 25f., even when corpses are most scarce at the hospitals, and the damage done by the suicidal act which must precede every such sale would reduce even this paltry price, as such damage would render them to some degree improper to figure in anatomical museums.

A new and important phase in the musical pitch movement has just occurred. At the last sitting of the Royal Academy of Belgium, in the Fine Arts class, M. Fetis read a report on the question whether it was expedient that Belgium should imitate France in adopting the measures which have there been taken with respect to the new diapason. The learned professor came to the conclusion that the diapason should be fixed as it at present exists, but not lowered. M. Fetis probably wishes that the C-sharp, "de poitrine" of certain exceptionally gifted tenors, should lose none of its marvellous character.

Mad. Carvalho is now at Nantes, where, after singing at a concert given by the Société des Beaux Arts, she is giving a series of performances at the theatre. There is an excellent operatic troupe there under the direction of M. Solié.

The opera balls under the direction of Strauss, whose orchestra will be employed, are to commence on the 15th of this month, previous to which there will be a ball for the pension fund of the establishment.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. The new opera of M. Offenbach, Burkoulf, which has been put off on account of Mlle. Saint Urbain's illness, has caused the manager of the Opéra Comique to bring unexpectedly forward a little opera called L'Eventail, which its authors had given up all hope of seeing performed before next year, if at all. The words are by MM. Barbier and Carré, and the music by M. Ernest Boulanger.

M. Offenbach's opera will, it is said, be produced on the 20th inst., and Mlle. Marimon will take the part intended for Mlle. St. Urbain.

At the Italian Opera Marta has been revived, and Mad. Albini has made with her brilliant singing and consummate acting in the part of Naney, a complete sensation.—London Musical World, Dec. 22.

SAN FRANCISCO.—The English opera troupe that for a long time has been singing here, has brought its performances to a close, and, at the latest dates, was upon the point of sailing for Australia.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 19, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha," Piano Solo.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

FIRST SATURDAY EVENING CONCERT, JAN. 12.

1. Septette, in E flat, op. 20.....Beethoven
For Violin, Viola, Violoncello, Bass, Clarinet, Horn and Bassoon.
- Introduction and Allegro, Larghetto, Minuetto, Theme, with variations, Scherzo, Finale, Adagio and Allegro
2. Recitative and Air, "Che farò," from Orpheus.....Gluck
Mrs. J. H. Long.
3. Fantaisie for flute, on a Russian Air.....Heilmeyer
Fred'k Zohler.
4. English Ballad, "Through Meadows Green".....Hasse
Mrs. J. H. Long.
5. Fourth Concerto for Violin.....DeBeriot
William Schultze.
6. Song without words, in G, No. 4, Fifth Book.....Mendelssohn
7. Scotch Ballad.....Eurus
Mrs. Long.
8. Finale, 2d Act "Robert le Diable".....Meyerbeer
Arranged by T. Ryan.

At this concert we had the pleasure of hearing Beethoven's Septet played by MESSRS. SCHULTZE, violin, MEISEL, viola, W. FRIES, violoncello, STEINE, bass, RYAN, clarinet, HAMAN, horn, and HOHNSTOCK, bassoon. This beautiful, genial work, one of the master's earliest being op. 20, is like a garden full of lovely flowers, the fresh morning air wafting far their fragrance over pleasant vales and hills under an azure sky in spring time. It was his spring time, it was his time of happiness when he wrote it, and here he has gathered up that delicious feeling of youth with its hopes and joys, with its unbounded confidence and self reliance, with its frankness and genial warm love for the universe; gathered them up in undying strains of rapturous melody and sweet sympathetic harmony. He did not like it, after he had grown older; he did not want to be reminded of it, wishing he had never written it. But genius, towering above other mortals in stature, has its own proportionate standard. Its ideal aspirations enlarging and ripening into fruits, more sweet and luscious as time passes on, grow more and more exacting. Genius is its own severest critic. Contemplating its own earlier works genius may miss the vigor, the depth of emotions, the ripeness of feeling, in short the maturity of experience, at which it arrived in the course of its own progress. But we have a right to admire even such works as bear the marks of younger days, of less perfect mental development. Indeed we cannot help finding them beautiful. They seize upon us, they wake up to delicious reality the joys of our own youth long laid by and covered up with the ponderous duties of to-day. Such is this septet, and so pleasant and true to life, that one never thinks of the time it takes, (it being quite long,) but is carried on and on, from pleasure to pleasure. The work is so well known in the four hand arrangement for the piano, that it is unnecessary to speak of its contents at length. It was well performed, and excepting some uncertainty in the ensemble of a few of the opening and closing chords in some movements, it went finely together, the performers evidently enjoying it as much as the audience. The Adagio alone might have been improved we think by a slower movement. It was begun in the proper tempo, but soon it increased, taking away some of the delicious sweetness of the quiet flow of its Adelaide-like melody. We also beg to dissent from the manner in which the cadenza in the Finale was performed. A longer stop at the pauses and more breadth and hesitation in the closing portamento tones would have materially improved it. There is a marvellous effect in the rhetorical pause; half, nay the fiftieth part of a second added to a pause or to a note in a leading-over passage often adds great dignity. Messrs. Haman and Wulf Fries deserve especial mention for the fine taste with which they performed their soli. The bassoon very good for the most part was somewhat too explosive, a superabundance of air escaping, which marred the effect sometimes. It was a very good performance, generally speaking, and we applaud the Club for bringing out this work, which we hope they will repeat in the course of their concerts.

Mrs. LONG contributed to the performance two charming songs, very familiar to those who attended the Jullien and the Sontag concerts. She sang them admirably as regards voice, intonation and execution, but they seemed lacking in spirit and life and characteristic expression. Her rendering of the song of Orpheus, Che farò was quite faultless, and gave much pleasure.

Messrs. Schultze and Zohler appeared to great advantage in their solos which commanded liberal applause, both gentlemen playing with a singular purity and sweetness of tone that never fails to appeal to the ear of an audience. The experiment ventured by the Club seems to have met with undoubted success, and we congratulate them on being successful in attracting so large an audience. The second concert takes place this evening.

FIFTH CONCERT OF THE SERIES OF EIGHT.

PART I.

- 1. Quartette, in D, No. 10.Mozart
Allegro—Adagio—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro.
- 2. Fantaisie for Violoncello, on an original theme.Weber
Wulf Fries.
- 3. Adagio and Scherzo, from the 3d Quintette in B minor.Spohr

PART II.

- 4. Oetette, in F, op. 163.Franz Schubert
For 2 Violins, Viola, Violoncello, Bass, Clarinette, Horn and Bassoon.
Introduction and Allegro—Andante—Scherzo, Allegro
Vivace—Finale, Andante and Allegro.

In spite of the rain and bad walking the hall was well filled. The piece of the greatest interest at this concert being given in the regular order, Tuesday the 15th of January, was Schubert's Oetette. Whatever we hear of Schubert, from his little German dances, musical epigrams as it were, and his Waltzes and Polonaises up to his Symphony, gives us pure delight. Noble, impressive melodies, full and original harmonies, with wonderful changes, and a rhythm all his own, make his compositions excellent above many others. Schubert's genius was of a very high order and his fertility in pieces that are classical and will live for ever, astonishing. This is his 165th work, and yet it is as fresh as if it were one of his earliest. There is hardly a repetition of ideas, a reminiscence in his writings. Mendelssohn frequently repeats himself. Some melody in almost all his larger works bears a strong resemblance to his two-part songs or songs or his songs without words. With Schubert, on the other hand, everything is fresh, new, not heard of before. That is genius. This oetette for two violins, viola, bass, clarinette horn and bassoon was played by the gentlemen who took part in the Septette of Beethoven on Saturday last, except that Mr. ZOHLER played the Viola and Mr. MEISEL second violin. Each of the movements, has its own beauties and the whole is a work of uncommon excellence. We will defer a more detailed account of it until after a second hearing, which we are to have to-night. We merely add that the rendering was very spirited, each of the gentlemen doing his best. The other pieces played at the concert helped to make a very satisfactory programme. Mozart's Quartette is well known, so that we need not speak of it more than to say, that the portion we heard of it was finely rendered, pure as to intonation and with good expression. Mr. WULF FRIES played the Fantasia for Violoncello, by Weber, on an original theme to great acceptance. It is originally written with an accompaniment for the whole orchestra; but for this occasion the accompaniment was arranged for seven instruments. In an abbreviated form Weber published this piece in the 2d book of his exquisite "12 Pieces faciles," op. 10, for 2 or 4 hands. It is very pleasing and effective. Especially happy is the variation in a dance-rhythm, where in the second part the bassoon has a short imitation of the melody as played by the violoncello. The Adagio and Scherzo, by Spohr, was very good, and the concert, both in programme and execution one of the best we have heard the Club give.

Let none of our Boston readers fail to hear the Oetette to-night. They will be amply repaid even if they should have to come through slesh and rain.

In the notice of the Orpheus Quartette Club concert, in our issue of Jan. 12th, a misprint occurs which we wish to correct here. On the concert programme, distributed at the door, the title of Mr. Eichberg's second piece in the second part was misprinted Favane. Our types made it Fabanna. It ought to be Pavanne, being the name of a solemn, antiquated dance, the title being given to it on account of its resemblance to the majestic, measured steps of the peacock.

Musical Correspondence.

BROOKLYN, JAN. 14, 1861.—Mr BAGG'S New Year's compliments to Dwight's Journal and reports this very pleasant city to be in a state of snow storm, and musically, quite excited, for the Brooklyn Academy of Music (just finished) is to be formally opened to-morrow (Tuesday) evening with a grand instrumental and vocal concert, the programme being rendered by the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society, with the brilliant voices of Madame COLSON, Signori BRIGNOLI, FERRI, and SUSINI. EISELDT conducts, NOLL leads and MUZIO directs the vocal part. The same admission card (Price $5) admits to a promenade Concert and Ball for Thursday next, after which this magnificent opera-house will be considered fully dedicated to the various muses.

The 2d regular Philharmonic Concert is to be given on Saturday evening next. It was to have been on the 5th, but was postponed so as to take place at the Academy, which is now engaged by the directors for all future concerts and rehearsals. The first concert (in November last) was attended with such a rush that your humble servant (Mr. Baggs) along with at least five hundred other disconsolate individuals was unable to get in, although on hand a full half hour before the time of performance. The Atheneum is really a fine concert room and will hold fifteen hundred people, but it is entirely too small for any such flourishing institution as the "Brooklyn Philharmonic." The programme for next Saturday is rich indeed and includes Mendelssohn's Third Symphony in A minor, "Recollections of Scotland," Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," and a novelty in the way of an overture by Litolff, the "Bride of Ky-nast."

Next week inaugurates our first Italian Opera season. Tuesday we are to have COLSON, BRIGNOLI, FERRI and SUSINI in Mercadante's "Il Giuramento," and on Saturday, the young American Prima Donna ISABELLA HINCKLEY, in "Lucia." As your correspondent has had an intimate acquaintance with Miss Hinckley for many years, and has watched her artistic course with the most particular interest, he is anxious to know the verdict of the public on her voice and talent. She is by no means a novice, but has been before an European audience for the last two years, and completed a successful engagement in Berlin just prior to her return to America. Miss Hinckley is a native of Albany, N. Y., and was a pupil of George Wm. Warren. She went to Italy in the spring of 1857 and after fifteen months' lessons from the justly celebrated Romani was pronounced by him as complete in lyric art as he could make her. She then made her début at the Concerts of the Philharmonic Society of France and was lauded in the musical papers of the day, extracts of which have appeared in many of our principal papers.

Her first operatic engagement was proffered by the grand old composer and master Pacini, but it unfortunately fell through, on account of the war, which at that time put a stop to all musical matters in Italy. She then procured a most excellent engagement for Holland and en passant gave a very successful concert at Paris. She has sung in all the principal cities of Holland and in many of Germany and is now "home again" just in time to be involved in Mr. Ullman's annual failure and the "inevitable crisis;" Muzio has however come to the rescue, and if I am not very much mistaken la belle Hinckley will make a sensation.

I wanted to send you the programme of the Christmas Music at the Church of the Holy Trinity, and many other minor items, but will leave all for my next, and also apologize for the unusual length of this letter. As Mr. Baggs don't profess to write as correspondents ought to—that is regularly and elegantly. He would be happy to hear from "Trovator" and "—t—" on Brooklyn matters. By consulting the New York papers of to-day, they will find that the competition of the Academy of Music is "the musical event of the week" and I may add a great thing for Long Island (which by the way still remains in the Union). The attractions will now be worth the ferry-ride and the trouble, and the "wandering minstrel" will meet your New York correspondents at the landing, and do the honors with all possible gusto and pleasure. Long wave the union of New York and Brooklyn, now even in "Philharmonic" and Opera House, so come over Mr. Trovator and take "—t—" with us and spend a musical evening, and if you need any extra inducement, we'll execute (most summarily) our celebrated solo on the historically cracked but still charming clarinette, and as "we never stop short of a shilling,"

Will remain your everlasting, JEM BAGGS.

Musical Chit-Chat.

MASON & HAMLIN.—The extensive Melodeon factory of this firm, of whose instruments we made some mention last week, was entirely consumed by fire on Monday of this week. The contents of the building were completely destroyed, and so rapid was the progress of the flames that some of the occupants had to beat a hasty retreat to save their lives. The loss of Messrs. M. & H. was considerable, but we trust that they may soon be able to begin again the business which they have so honorably and successfully carried on, and we join most sincerely in the sympathy felt for their disappointment and loss in this community.

NEW ORLEANS.—Here PATTI has for some weeks continued to bewitch the opera goers, playing in her usual round of characters. The papers are unanimous and loud in her praise.

A Benefit at Paris.

Benefit performances rarely prove profitable here. I know there are exceptions, and three, four, and sometimes six thousand dollars have been cleared over all expenses; there was Rachel, who invariably cleared $1,000 for the beneficiary, whenever she would condescend to play; and I dare say Grisi and Mario may perform the same miracle still. There is not in the whole catalogue of actors any other name so potent. The other actors, when they give a benefit performance are obliged to torture their invention to discover some way of pleasing the public. They endeavor to skim the theatres of their most popular actors, they endeavor to hit upon some mode of appealing to the public which shall strike attention—no easy feat in a great capital, where thousands of people are constantly soliciting attention. When they have done their best in this way, they must apply to the police for permission to give the performance, give it the written permission of every manager whose actors figure at his benefit, and lay his bill of fare before it. If the police is satisfied, it grants permission to give the performance, and gives the beneficiary liberty to increase the prices of admission. Then comes the great difficulty; getting a theatre. As every theatre in town is occupied by its own company during the winter, and their managers are not only averse from the feverish preparations made to carry the benefit performance to a successful close, but if they have a successful play they cannot easily be prevailed upon to interrupt its run—managers of theatres, like most heirs of hazard, are superstitious creatures. If they do not refuse the use of their theatre, they place it at a most extravagant rent, which absorbs every sou the beneficiary can reasonably hope for. This is the reason most benefit performances here take place very late in the season: in the winter the theatres are sure of being full, so great is the number of people in town; when summer approaches the audiences grow thinner and the manager's terms diminish. But then the poor beneficiary's chance of obtaining anything for his performance, decrease likewise, in a most alarming proportion. Nor is the rent of the theatre the only expense antecedent to the performance: there is the orchestra to be paid—the gas to be paid—the police to be paid—the printer to be paid—the bill sticker to be paid—the poor tax to be paid—the author's copyright to be paid—the carriages for the actors and actresses to be paid—the bouquets for the actresses to be paid—the claque to be paid—in short, the poor beneficiary hears "to be paid" so often he feels he is a mere gambler, who is risking a very large sum of money to obtain a very small gain. Even though his purse be empty; his troubles are not ended, he must make up his "poster." Actors, somebody has said, are the best fellows in the world upon condition each has a great deal more success than his comrades. Now, in making up a "poster," the beneficiary must strive to attain two things; attract the public and please the vanity of the performers who figure on it. I read some time ago, the confession of a person who gave a benefit, and he says, speaking of the difficulty of making up the "poster:" "Whenever an actor is left to choose a part, a scene, or a piece, he is sure to make a bad selection. Have you ten singers? They insist upon singing ten long airs, full of trills and quavers, the longer the better, and they insist their 'time' shall be placed neither at the beginning nor at the end of the performance, but all in the middle. You have six actresses? They all insist upon playing the chief part of a different play, and you can find nobody to give the answer. Then how are their names to be printed on the 'posters?' Of course every name must be in capitals; but then in what order must they be placed? Will you begin with dancing or singing, comedy or drama? Will you adopt the rank of the theatres or the rank of the artists? There is a very simple order which can be easily adopted—the alphabetical order—but precisely because this is the simplest method it will satisfy nobody. At last your 'poster' is on the wall, and then the public begins to make this calculation: Twenty sous for the celebrated tenor, twenty sous for the celebrated singer, twenty sous for the celebrated tragic actress, ten sous for the bass singer, ten sous for the baritone, twenty sous for the danseuse, twenty sous for the fourth act of the 'Huguenots,' fifteen sous for 'Galatée,' ten sous for 'Gil Blas,' five sous for each comic song; the pianist is thrown in to boot; total, ten francs; and so he goes and buys his ticket. If you give the public nothing very tempting, he turns his back on your fine 'poster,' and walks off. If you give really a tempting performance, the ticket buyers purchase instantly every ticket, leap into their cabriolets, visit every hotel in town, sell their tickets to foreigners, double and triple the price paid for them, and put in their pockets the largest profits the benefit gives to anybody, and is no way of preventing them from driving this trade. The beneficiary is assailed with requests of all sorts all the day long. Friends he has neither seen nor heard of for ten years, remind him how old and ardent their friendship is; relations he never heard of before come up from their provinces expressly to go to his benefit; daguerreotypists beg him to give them a sitting and a seat; they have promised to take his portrait to complete their collection of eminent people, and his portrait everybody is asking for; the artists who lend the beneficiary their assistance only ask for one box for their family, one box for their friends, some tickets for the third tier for their porter, their hair dresser, their chamber maid, and fifty seats in the pit for their accustomed claqueur, as he alone understands their 'points,' and knows how to take care of their 'entries' and 'exits.' At last the time draws near when the performance is to begin. The beneficiary is trembling from head to foot. The artists who are to appear do not come: each tries to come later than the other to avoid beginning the performance.

The greatest confusion reigns in the green room; temporary dressing rooms have been erected everywhere; some are dressing in the manager's private room; others are dressing in a corner of the green room; these are dressing in a passage; those are dressing in hacks at the door: hair dressers rush madly about in every direction; dressing maids are so bewildered they do not know what to do; this actor bawls for his breeches; that actor screams for his wig; the 'first young lady' calls for her crinoline; the 'first young gentleman' asks for his calves: the haritone gargles his throat; the songstress practices her trills and quavers: the stage manager yells orders which nobody obeys. 'Clear the stage!' The curtain rises. The entertainment is fatiguing, long and disconnected. The order of the bill has been changed. The public is ill humored: it purchased its places in the street, or from the wine shop, paying three times the price asked at the ticket office, and it is angry with the actors for the cheat put upon him; the actors, furious in consequence of their comrade's success, or their own want of success, lay all the blame on the beneficiary, although he isn't to blame, for he took every precaution to assure that every artist should have the same quantity of applause, the same number of 'calls out,' and the same number of bouquets. He made a contract for this in advance, and heaven knows what these ovations cost him, at what a d—l of a sum of money the bill for 'enthusiasm' amounts to.

The performance ends about two o'clock in the morning. The theatre then is about two-thirds empty, for the audience have departed one by one, cursing the fellow that gave the benefit, the fellow that sold the tickets, the fellow that played. The exasperated danseuse vows she never in all her life before was exposed to such an insult, and she never will so expose herself again! What! lose her most beautiful entrechats, wantonly throw away her ronds de jambe, caper before empty benches! And all through the fault of the fool who organized his benefit so stupidly! Poor beneficiary! Overwhelmed with reproaches, tired to death, heels over head, nervous, sick, depressed, disheartened, he asks the treasurer of the theatre for his account. A legion of supplementary expenses, which no imagination could have conceived, makes its appearance in formidable figures—extra fees to the machinists, extra fees to the musicians, extra fees to the chorus, fine for ending the performance after midnight, drayage for scenery, copying music, pour boire to hack drivers, and so on on on on on. The bills are settled, and then the beneficiary says to himself, wiping his forehead: 'Thank heaven! all is over now. I have run from one end of Paris to the other; I have lost a fortnight in the course of which I have been able neither to play nor to rehearse; I have caught a rheumatism, which will keep me in bed for at least three weeks: I have worked like a galley slave; I have discontented the public, and put all my comrades out with me; I have lost nothing by the benefit, for after all the expenses are paid I have twenty francs profit coming to me. Gads! there's no room to complain after all, for it might have been a deuced sight worse!' The beneficiary has scarcely these words out of his mouth, just as he is about quitting the theatre, a 'Please, sir!' greets his ear. He turns and discovers a bouquet, with half a dozen fellows behind it. 'Hallo!' exclaims he, suspecting there is a snake lurking beneath those flowers, 'and what may that be?' 'It is a bouquet, sir, we have the honor to present to you. Don't forget the callboys, please sir! 'You are very kind, vastly kind, my lads, and I am mightily obliged to you, 'pon my word I am; here's twenty francs for your bouquet; it's all I made by my benefit!'—Corr. N. O. Picaque.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

A mid the glad throng here to-night. Ballad.

Langton Williams. 25

A song of decided beauty and power, which will be quickly recognized by all singers who are on the "qui vive" for something new and good.

I wandered by the brookside. Balfe. 24

A new musical setting of a favorite poem. There has been a melody written to it some time ago by Hime, which the public received with much favor. The probability is that Balfe's air will far exceed the other in popularity. It is undoubtedly a fine song.

A maiden fair and young. R. S. Pratten. 25

Composed for and sung by Mrs. Henri Drayton in the charming operetta of "Diamond cut diamond." It is eminently pleasing, and one of the prettiest songs which the amiable prima donna essayed.

Instrumental Music.

Drowsy Polka. E. Beyer. 25

This polka is just now universally popular all over Germany. It is introduced into every farce, with words improvised on subjects of the day and closes with a refrain in which a chorus joins. Part of the original words have been printed with the music. It is easy.

A beautiful dream. (Nebelbilder.) Oesten. 25

One of a series of little melodious and original pieces, for which young people ought to be particularly thankful to the talented author, as they are positively charming.

Autumn Reverie. Tremolo Etude. D. H. Hood. 25

A pleasing original melody varied in the Tremolo style. Good practice for the fingers.

Riverside Barcarolle. W. H. Clarke. 35

A first effort which shows the young composer to possess the rare gift of melody and a good sound knowledge of the practical part of his art. We dare say that pretty well advanced players will derive great pleasure from the perusal of this piece.

Etude Mazurka. Four hands. A. Talex. 50

A dashing mazurka, perhaps the most brilliant of any pieces of this class, in the form of a duet. The arrangement is by the author.

Lettres musicales. Nocturne. C. A. Shaw. 25

A meritorious composition of medium difficulty.

Our Polka. R. Harrison. 25Unadilla Waltz. G. W. Beardsley. 25

Pretty Dance Music.

Books.

THE OPERA OF MARTHA. Arranged for Piano Solo. 2,00

A new and attractive volume of the popular Series, "Ditson & Co.'s Edition of Standard Operas." Every person of musical taste should be the possessor of this elegant and valuable library of the best works of the best composers.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 460.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 26, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 17.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

SACRED MUSIC.

III.

FROM HUGH CAPET TO ST. LOUIS, A.D. 987—1226.

Having thus rapidly passed in review the condition of music in France under the first two Dynasties, let us now see what happened in the interesting period from Hugh Capet to the close of the reign of Louis IX.—that king so brave, so virtuous, so constantly occupied with the good of his subjects. Ecclesiastical Art developed, the science of Music advanced, but the chanson, that form so eminently national attained still grander proportions, thanks to the heroism of the feudal spirit, to the noble sentiments of chivalry, and to the enfranchisement of the communes, which went so nobly hand in hand with the sweeping enthusiasm of the Crusades.

And, first, to speak of sacred music, we remark that Robert the pious (996) often figured among the singers of his chapel. He was to be seen in his silken cope, wearing the crown, and marking the measure and rhythm with his sceptre. We possess hymns, sequences and responses by that monarch. His wife, Constance, whose haughty and imperious character caused him much trouble, wished to be the subject of one of his compositions and would take no denial. Knowing no means to put an end to her pressing entreaties, he wrote a hymn in honor of the martyrs, beginning with the words, O Constantia martyrum. The queen saw in these words an allusion to her name, and King Robert, profiting by her error, gave her to understand that it was written in her praise, though his design had been but to celebrate the constancy of the martyrs.

During the eleventh and twelfth centuries the most distinguished hymnologists were, Fulbert, Bishop of Chartres; Saint Odilon, abbot of Cluny; Raynald, Bishop of Langres; Hildebrand de Lavardin, Archbishop of Tours; Geoffroy, Abbot de la Trinité; St. Bernard; Peter the Venerable; Adam, Canon of St. Victor; Maurice de Sully, Bishop of Paris; and the famous Abelard, from whose pen are 96 hymns in manuscript, still preserved in the Library of the Dukes of Bourgogne at Brussels.

In 1214, Guerin, Bishop of Senlis, drew up the army in order of battle in the field of Bouvines. Guillaume le Breton, chaplain to the king, Philip Augustus, standing behind his sovereign, entoned with such vigor, first the psalm, Benedictus Dominus and then the Exurgat Deus, as to contribute not a little to the splendid victory gained by our brave warriors on that memorable day.

But by the side of the liturgic music, a new form of the art was developing itself keeping step with the progress of the vulgar tongue, the first movement of which is the famous oath pronounced by the troops of Louis the German and Charles the Bald, who had formed an alliance against Lothaire, Emperor of Italy.*

During the time of Philip I., the chanson française had appeared above the horizon and its most famous adepts during the twelfth century were, Count de Bethune, Giles de Beaumont, Jean de Neuville, Helinand, Count de Soissons, Christian de Troyes, Auboin de Sezanne, Perrin Dangecourt, Blondel de Nesles, Gace Brûlé, Raoul de Coucy, and above all, Thibaud IV., Count de Champagne and king of Navarre.

The most ancient form of the chanson is the lay, a sort of plaintive elegy upon the pleasures and pains of love. The chansons royales, so called because sung at court, had usually five couplets; to this was added the envoi, a dedication composed generally of three or four verses. The songs, called among the Provençals, tensons, were a form of the chanson in dialogue, which turned upon some point debated by two interlocutors. This species of the duo alternate took at a later period the title of jeu-parté. The servente was a form of satire, in which the poets attacked the vices of their time. The sonnet was the chansonnette of the time; the renverdie celebrated the return of verdure and the spring time. The music of the chansons was noted in the longs and breves of the plain chant—square notes, without bars to measure the rhythm and written upon a staff of four lines.†

These simple and natural melodies needed the aid of tradition to be sung so as to produce their full effect, they were executed either solo or with the accompaniment of either harp or viol. The harp of that age had 24 strings; an old poet has given each an allegorical name. The rote was a hurdy-gurdy, named thus (Latin, rota) from its wheel. Finally, under Philip of Valois, the different kinds of musical instruments were increased to the number of thirty. But let us not anticipate.

The Jonglerie, which originated about the twelfth century, was composed of four distinct orders; 1. The Trouvères, who were poets and authors; 2. The Chanterres, who executed the works of the preceding; 3. The Conteurs, who finally became historians; and the Jongleurs, who played upon instruments. Philip Augustus having driven them from the French Court (doubtless for their immorality), they travelled from city to city; but after this banishment their profession declined. Meantime many of them had acquired considerable fortunes, and a few great lords followed their example in cultivating poetry and music, though merely as an indulgence of their taste and not for profit.

The principal didactic author of the period of which we are speaking is the illustrious Guido d'Arezzo; he invented the staff[?], the clefs, and various musical exercises or formulas, which would be found even now excellent for rendering

* The first writers were Norman; we owe to them the Roman du rou and that of Alexandre, which gives us the term, Alexandrine verses. After the Normans the Provençal troubadours cultivated the gaie science, which extended to Paris and the surrounding provinces.

† The fifth line of the staff was added towards the end of the reign of Louis IX., at the beginning of the 13th century.

voices true and supple. Adopting as his basis the simple and pregnant divisions of the Monocord, he deduced from them the modern gamut, to which he united the eight ancient tones or modes. His works are truly masterpieces, and it would be of great service to music to publish a complete edition of them with a translation and illustrative notes.‡ To Guido, music without lines was "as a well without a rope." As a teacher he was so excellent that his pupils sung at sight with one month of instruction.

In the second volume of Gerbert's Scriptores ecclesiastici de Musica Sacra § are found the following works of Guido; 1. his Micrology, a short exposition of his method of teaching music; 2, a treatise in Latin verse, giving an excellent view of his method; 3 and 4, rules and an epistle upon the chant inconnu. He gives in it the famous gamut drawn from the hymn of St. John, excellent exercises for striking intervals, and the advice to color the lines C yellow and F red. These various and remarkable improvements gained him great praise from Pope John, who then occupied the chair of St. Peter. The 5th treatise of Guido is a corrective for the crowd of errors which had crept into the Gregorian chant. What would the venerable monk say if he could come back to earth now? The 6th and last shows how music is founded upon arithmetic, but it is not certain that Guido was its author.

Be this as it may, counterpoint was developed during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, under the learned and skillful pens of Bernon, John Cotton, Guido de Chablis, John de Garlande, Francon de Cologne, Aristote, Aribou the scholastic, Peter Picard, John de Bourgogne, Jerome of Moravia and Walter Odington. We leave it to the learned to elucidate their barbarous and doubtful texts; for our part let us examine the musical documents of that epoch which we have been able to procure, and which are still little known.

The music of the chansons of Count Thibaut is stamped with grace and nature; it is still but a kind of unmeasured plain chant, though, here and there, we find melodic forms full of beauty. I cannot say so much upon the rondos in three parts by Adam de la Hale, nor of the dechants and motets in two and three parts with or without imitations, which M. Coussemaker has edited with so much pains. The youngest pupils of counterpoint in the Conservatory at Paris would write more correctly and at the same time more agreeably for the ear.

Among the specimens contained in the beautiful volume of Mr. Coussemaker, we have always remarked, the Lamentations of Rachel, consoled by an angel; this has both sentiment and color. We may say the same of two pieces pretty well wrought out and which appear to us to be the origin of the mysteries and liturgic dramas, so numerous in the middle ages. The Wise and Foolish Virgins is a sort of short oratorio, not wanting in interest; it begins with a choral after which many stanzas alternate between the wise and the foolish virgins. Merchants interrupt the declamation of the latter, and then, after some words of Christ, demons seize the foolish virgins and send them to hell headlong.

‡ This work is now promised by M. Adrian de La Fage.

§ This work is in the Boston Public Library.

The Prophets of Christ form a series of recitatives analogous to our key of F major. After a general prologue by the precentor, he addresses, successively, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, David, Elizabeth, John the Baptist, and even to Virgil, Nebuchadnezzar and the Sybil and all reply each in his own manner, that Christ will come and that he will be adored by all the nations of the universe.

The dance air of the thirteenth century, drawn from the Library at Lisle, appears to us beautiful in character; it resembles the ancient bourrées, which are still sometimes heard from country fiddlers. I have noted it from the manuscript, very differently from the learned M. Coussemaker; I prefer, as my own, my version to his, and yet I dare not affirm mine to be the more correct. As the measure is not indicated, the melodic sentiment and intuition must in some degree here supply the fault owing to the fact that notation was then in its infancy.

The words of this air are very moral; they signify that "nobility adorned with good morals has nothing equal to it in the world."

But we have reached a period of decay; it is that in which we see, upon solemn words in Latin, upon fragments of the psalms and Evangelists, a dechant in the vulgar tongue and thoroughly profane. We are involuntarily reminded of the obscenities in stone, which may be seen in nooks and corners of our old cathedrals, or of the gross illuminations, which sometimes disfigure precious manuscripts of pious and mystic prayer-books.

There is then an angel and a demon in our poor humanity, and the above is a most complete and irreputable proof of it. How else could they sing a galliard during the Introit, a jest during the Graduale, words like these "God! I could not sleep at night" while others sang "Et vide ed inclina aurem tuam." They mingle the most opposite elements,—profane art with sacred—farce with solemn instruction.

Here probably is the justification of the banishment of the Jongleurs by Philip Augustus, and, at a later period, the reason for the famous bull of John XXII., against the abuses of ecclesiastical music. A little more and music would have been banished entirely from the churches, and if God had not raised up a genius like Palestrina, it would have been all over with music in the old basilicas. But such a fall was not yet to take place. Before its disappearance, the Art of the middle ages, between the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries, produced all its flowers and fruits; it was only upon the revival of art letters, that it by degrees gave up its territory to antique and pagan art. We hope that in our epoch, it may revive, profiting by the knowledge acquired by study and experience and employing it in a still more grand and profitable manner for the progress and happiness of humanity.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Diarist in Paris.

PARIS, Dec. 26, 1860.

The short-visaged, taciturn Spectator, during his visit to Sir Roger de Coverly, was pleased with the old gentleman's arrangements in relation to preaching; instead of calling upon his curate to deliver a weekly discourse of his own apropos to nothing, he gave him all his time for parochial duties, preferring on Sunday to have him read a sermon in strong English and fullness of thought of the old masters of the art, Taylor, South, and others like them. How often I have wished that this might be done not only in old England in Sir Roger's chapel, but in New England in many a meeting-house, where I have suffered out my hour!

The principle is a good one in other matters than preaching; where the right thing has been well said, why strive to say it again? If a man has no impulse within to say something, which is truly his own, why labor to fill so many pages of manuscript?

Now this is in fact an apology, if one is needed, for not undertaking to make a mass of matter upon certain musical topics here and, instead thereof, giving you a letter or two, made up mainly from translations. A man, who signs himself Alexis Azevedo, is the musical critic of the Opinion Nationale. He gives a weekly article and this article I find always entertaining and instructive. He says, what he has to say, much better than I can, and moreover, if I give specimens of his articles you will have the satisfaction of knowing thereby something of the tone in which actors, singers and composers are here spoken of. There is plain speaking, and pointed; faults are not smoothed over, nor deserved praise withheld. Besides this, the critics know what they are about, at least judging from the French point of view.

I go back five or six weeks and begin with the first appearance of Mlle Sax at the Grand Opera, she having been previously at the Theatre Lyrique.

At the time of this young lady's appearance at the Lyrique, says M. Azevedo, we were among the first to bid her welcome. Her magnificent voice, and the intelligent manner in which she sang the part, and so delicate and self-sustained, of the countess in the Marriage of Figaro, were in our opinion the best promise of a brilliant future. Others have shared our opinion as is proved by her call after a short stay at the Lyrique to the Grand Opera to take the leading mezzo-soprano parts.

So long as the young songstress was making her first attempts between Mad. Carvalho and Mad. Ugalde—those excellent and devoted god-mothers—there was little necessity of giving her counsel; for she was learning both from precept and example. But at the opera things are not in the same fashion—precept is often wanting, and the examples are not all to be followed. Moreover the parts for a mezzo-soprano are essentially dramatic, written mainly for declamation, sometimes even for screaming, and are therefore not the thing for a young, not thoroughly educated beginner.

Now, a soprano, singing the parts of Mathilde or Lucie, may by this exercise reach the perfection of her art. So can a contralto, in the single part of Leonore in La Favorite. But Alice, Valentine, Rachel are parts better fitted to form the actress than the singer. These being her parts, we have an opportunity to address certain observations to Mlle Sax, the only object of which is to aid her in preserving her fine organ as long as possible.

Mlle Sax sings rather by instinct than from knowledge; she owes more to nature than to art. Her voice ample and of fine quality is wanting in ductility and is sometimes a little out of tune in passages requiring much force.

To soften her fine voice, and gain the power of producing fine shades and contrasts and conquer an immovable firmness of pitch, she needs to study vocalization and the producing of pure tones with some Italian master of the old school. Above all she must husband her resources, seek out her faults, and not give up to fatigue and the bad vocal tendencies of the parts given her at the opera, as so many have done.

The part of Rachel (in Halévy's Jewess), in which we more particularly marked the performance of Mlle Sax, is one which demands infinite care and extreme skill to prevent the loss of the purity and freshness of a frail voice. Had we leisure we might make a complete analysis of the Jewess in proof of this assertion; but time and space both are wanting for so formidable an undertaking. We may perhaps do it some day, nevertheless. Meantime, we assert, without fear of contradiction that the music of Rachel is not precisely a gushing warbling, and that a young person whose voice needs both firmness and suppleness cannot find in it that fine vocal style which is needful to her profession. In fact it is not written in a good vocal style; we desire no other proof of this than that fine (?) skip of the voice—an interval of eleven notes—between the words 'Dieu' and 'vengeur'—an interval doubtless placed there to glorify the grammatical rule, that the adjective must agree with the noun! We need no other proof than the tormenting accompaniments, roaring, impenetrable to the human voice, which often tempt us to exclaim, "for mercy's sake, halt a moment, and let us hear the rest of the song," and which with an implacable persistence seem to reply, "well don't you wish you may get it?"

No, Mlle Sax ought not to engage in a contest with these invincible accompaniments, of the result of which there can be no doubt. She should perfect herself in the art of singing out of the theatre, and at the theatre her tactics should be such as we take the liberty of suggesting the principal points of; viz., to produce her "effects" in places where the accompaniment allows the voice to be heard and to make up, in passages of powerful orchestration, for the want of great loudness and exertion of the lungs, by a neat articulation and strongly accented syllables and by such appropriate gestures, as will make her presence more felt in the midst of the tempest, than by the most evident efforts and most dangerous straining of the voice.

By means of such care and precautions Mlle Marie Sax may with right aspire to the position of a worthy, perhaps a great artiste. At all events she will last longer than her predecessors, which, as it seems to us, is not to be disdained.

The D. finds the above to be good and sensible words, conveying a lesson, which may be studied profitably, also out of Paris; and by others than Mlle Marie Sax.

Now to what M. Azevedo says of Ronconi.

After an absence of more than three years Ronconi makes his appearance upon the stage of the Italian Opera in the part of Figaro. Ron-coni is one of the greatest artists, one of the most extraordinary dramatic individualities of our time. If any comparison was necessary we might compare him to our own Frederick Lemaître. Everything he touches bears the impress of his originality. But is this the idea of the authors, that he should render them in the manner in which he conceives his parts? It may be permitted, indeed we are forced to doubt this. It is rather his own, Ronconi's, ideas, which he expresses, the piece being but his medium. But then what genius in his transformations, what knowledge of scenic effect in his rendering!

One can hardly speak too strongly of what he has made the part of Figaro. It is certainly no longer the Figaro of Beaumarchais and Rossini, which adds a few cunning tricks to a torrent of fun without parallel; it is another Figaro, master of himself and of the others, a diplomat, a dry old file—a cat in a bird cage. He plays with the passions of those about him, as with chess-men, utterly without sympathy. Not only do they excite no answering emotion in him, but he does not even seem to comprehend them except as means to aid him in his projects. With what disdainful, skeptical cruel raillery, he receives the letter which Rosina sends to Lindor. Certes, this Figaro can never love, nor, what is more, be jealous of Suzanne; this man makes the marriage impossible.

The stealthy manner in which he listens to the air of Bartolo, on calumny, is in itself a poem. With a few steps, gestures and attitudes the artist makes of this scene of espyal one of surpassing interest.

It is strange that notwithstanding the deal of originality which Ronconi impresses upon the Barber of Beaumarchais and Rossini, he never tires with filling his part with the most astonishing buffooneries; yet true to himself he executes them with an imperturbable coolness; his comrades can hardly restrain themselves, and sometimes do not. For instance on the first evening he had worked out a sort of trill or shake, by a curious intermixture of three or four different voices; seeing that Mad. Alboni could hardly keep her countenance at such an unheard of trill, he made a horrible grimace of the sort which Panurge executes when he is endeavoring to abash the Englishman. The most hardened could not see that memorable grimace without a smile. Mad. Alboni was obliged to take refuge for a moment behind the scenes. We should never end if we undertook to describe all the tricks played by him with the napkin in the shaving scene, Bartolo's great cane, where he chases Bazile from the stage, and a multitude of other drolleries, which we do not approve of such abundance, but which still are worthy of notice, being executed with such incredible skill.

French words scattered through the Italian dialogue were not wanting, as may easily be believed. In the serenade scene, Figaro, handing the guitar to the count, said "It is tuned to the normal pitch." Mario for the first time singing in new pitch, made the most natural gesture of astonishment in the world.

Speaking of the normal pitch, permit us to make a slight digression. People think this a new thing. Not at all; why, in the year 2284 before Christ, Chun, successor of Yao, Emperor of China, established uniformity of weights measures and musical pitch throughout his empire.* The means employed by the Chinese to regulate this matter is curious enough. They take a hollow bamboo of a certain determinate length, and fill it with grains of millet. If the grains prove to be of the exact number prescribed, this bamboo will give their normal pitch of A. If not they change the bamboo until one is found of the same length of course, and of the right diameter to exactly hold the millet. One sees instantly, that they have not reached quite the nicety of our experimenters!

But return we to Ronconi; in the trio of the Barber where the count and Rosina instead of hurrying away down the ladder from the balcony, stop to sing of love and relieve their feelings in never-ending roulades, this Figaro's impatient movements are really exciting to the audience. He goes and comes; stamps his foot; bites his lips, folds his arms; pulls the count by the cloak. There is a marvellous intelligence in such play.

Now we shall doubtless be asked if Ronconi preserved his voice and talents as a singer. We honestly answer—we do not know. We shall not be able to satisfy the curious on this point until we have heard him in a part where the singing is more than the acting. Now, in the Barber he acts more than he sings; or rather he is continually in action and never singing.

Of Mario our critic says:—

Mario has returned to us! Has he preserved his voice and vocalization? Has he gained? Has he lost? It is difficult to say; be it the fatigues of his journey, the new pitch, to which he must become accustomed, or has he caught cold, nothing is so uncertain as M. Mario; now rising to artistic heights now sinking to depths incredible. All that we can affirm is, that there is nobody within our knowledge able to sing the opening cavatina of the Barber like him.

Now read M. Azevedo on Mad. Viardot and Gluck, and see what a good lesson he gives to vocalists.

The return of Mad. Viardot to the Theatre Lyrique gives us again the immortal Orphée of Gluck. However it be with others, we do not cease to hear and admire this music at once so clear and profound, grand and simple as the antique, pathetic as tragedy, descriptive as painting, in which through the careful use of the simplest means, the grandest possible effects are produced every moment. Full of power, emotion and a sacred fire which she radiates upon all about her, Mad. Viardot proves herself at every repetition, as upon her first appearance,—a great lyric tragedienne throughout the piece, an extraordinary singer in the final air of the 1st act. Let us linger a moment upon her manner of singing this air, for it is the last living vestige of the art of vocalization in the serious style as practised by her illustrious father and his contemporaries. They sang their ornaments and roulades with the full voice, with fire, strength, feeling. With them they were not mere scales, trills, divisions, but means of expression as pathetic, true, touching as the accents of the recitative or the pure melody. And here we have defined in a word, the "lyric tragedy in ornate style." When, for instance, a work like the Otello was executed by the performers of genius, who added to their natural endowments the true vocal culture, both the characters and the alterations of the piece gained largely from music in energy and relief. Now-a-days, the singers in executing ornaments and showing off their vocal agility, only employ about an eighth of their voices—Othello coos, Iago cackles and crows.

* See, Historie general de la Musique et de la Danse by de la Fage, vol. I. p. 48. I think the work is in the Boston public Library.

Thus the intention of the composer disappears, the tragedy vanishes, and nothing of Otello remains but beautiful melodies and charming feats of vocalization. And yet we live at a period when all the strength of the human voice is called into requisition both in season and out of season. Why not then use it where it is so necessary to the composer's idea? Alas! people no longer know how to sing!

A little piece just brought out at the Bouffes is spoken of thus:—

At the Bouffes-Parisiennes a short one act piece has come upon the stage, entitled L'Hotel de la Poste, music by M. Dufresne, composer of the Valet de Gascogne. The score is markworthy for its abundance of natural melodies and by a very intelligent application of music to the demands of the theatre. It has a serenade, two quartettes and many other striking things of the right sort. The more we hear the music of Dufresne, the more we are assured that this composer, by his view of melody, his spirit and scenic tact, might keep up, with happy and brilliant success the traditions of our truly national comic opera, now obscured by the mists and fogs which come to us from beyond the Rhine. Will then an opportunity be given this gentleman to exhibit his fine capacities, by intrusting to him a good text to be composed for good singers? We doubt it, for the composer is guilty of the greatest of faults—he is a Frenchman!

Goethe and Mendelssohn.

THE FIRST MEETING BETWEEN THE POET AND THE COMPOSER.

M. Le Ballstab, a German writer of considerable reputation, has recently published in Germany two volumes of his autobiography, replete with interesting gossip about distinguished men. He tells the following tale of the meeting of the author of Faust and the composer of Elijah:—

In the evening we assembled in Goethe's rooms to tea, for he had invited a large party of his Weimar musical acquaintances, to make them acquainted with the boy's extraordinary talents. Presently Goethe made his appearance; he came from his study, and had a habit—at least I generally noticed it—of waiting till all the guests were assembled ere he showed himself. Till that period his son and daughter-in-law did the duties of host in the most amiable way. A certain solemnity was visible among the guests prior to the entrance of the great poet, and even those who stood on terms of intimacy with him underwent a feeling of veneration. His slow, serious walk, his impressive features, which expressed the strength rather than weakness of old age, the lofty forehead, the white, abundant hair, lastly, the deep voice and slow way of speaking, all united to produce the effect. His "Good evening" was addressed to all, but he walked up to Zelter first, and shook his hand cordially. Felix Mendelssohn looked up with sparkling eyes at the snow-white head of the poet. The latter, however, placed his hands kindly on the boy's head and said, "Now you shall play us something." Zelter nodded his assent.

The piano was opened and lights arranged on the desk. Mendelssohn asked Zelter, to whom he displayed a thoroughly childish devotion and confidence, "What shall I play?"

"Well, what you can," the latter replied, in his peculiarly sharp voice; "whatever is not too difficult for you."

To me, who knew what the boy could do, and that no task was too difficult for him, this seemed an unjust depreciation of his faculties. It was at length arranged that he should play a fantasia, which he did to the wonder of all. But the young artist knew when to leave off, and thus the effect he produced was all the greater. A silence of surprise ensued when he raised his hands from the keys after a loud finale.

Zelter was the first to interrupt the silence in his humorous way, by saying aloud, "Ha, you must have been dreaming of kobolds and dragons; why, that went over stick and stone!" At the same time there was a perfect indifference in his tone, as if there were nothing remarkable in the matter. Without doubt the teacher intended to prevent, in this way, the danger of a too brilliant triumph. The playing, however, as it could not well otherwise, aroused the highest admiration of all present, and Goethe, especially, was full of the warmest delight. He encouraged the lad, in whose childish features joy, pride and confusion were at once depicted, by taking his head between his hands, patting him kindly, and saying jestingly, "But you will not get off with that. You must play more pieces before we recognize your merits."

"But what shall I play," Felix asked, "Herr Professor?"—he was wont to address Zelter by this title—"what shall I play now?"

I cannot say that I have properly retained the pieces the young virtuoso now performed, for they were numerous. I will, however, mention the most interesting.

Goethe was a great admirer of Bach's fugues, which a musician of Berka, a little town about ten miles from Weimar, came to play to him repeatedly. Felix was therefore requested to play a fugue of the grand old master. Zelter selected it from the music book, and the boy played it without any preparation, but with perfect certainty.

Goethe's delight grew with the boy's extraordinary powers. Among other things he requested him to play a minuet.

"Shall I play you the loveliest in the whole world?" he asked, with sparkling eyes.

"Well, and which is that?"

He played the minuet from Don Giovanni.

Goethe stood by the instrument, listening, joy glistening in his features. He wished for the overture of the opera after the minuet; but this the player roundly declined, with the assertion that it could not be played as it was written, and nobody dared make any alteration in it. He, however, offered to play the overture to "Figaro." He commenced it with a lightness of touch—such certainty and clearness as I never heard again. At the same time he gave the orchestral effects so magnificently that the effect was extraordinary; and I can honestly state that it afforded me more gratification than ever an orchestral performance did. Goethe grew more and more cheerful and kind, and even played tricks with the talented lad.

"Well, come," he said, "you have only played me pieces you know, but now we will see whether you can play something you do not know. I will put you on trial."

Goethe went out, reëntered the room in a few moments and had a roll of music in his hand. "I have fetched something from my manuscript collection. Now we will try you. Do you think you can play this?"

He laid a page, with clear but small notes, on the desk. It was Mozart's handwriting. Whether Goethe told us so or it was written on the paper I forget, and only remember that Felix glowed with delight at the name, and an indescribable feeling came over us all, partly enthusiasm and joy, partly admiration and expectation. Goethe, the aged man, who lays a manuscript of Mozart, who had been buried thirty years ago, before a lad so full of promise for the future, to play at sight, in truth such a constellation may be termed a rarity.

The young artist played with the most perfect certainty, not making the slightest mistake, though the manuscript was far from easy reading. The task was certainly not difficult, especially for Mendelssohn, as it was only an adagio; still there was a difficulty in doing it as the lad did, for he played it as if he had been practising it for years.

Goethe adhered to his good-humored tone, while all the rest applauded. "That is nothing," he said; "others could read that too. But I will now give you something over which you will stick, so take care."

With these words he produced another paper, which he laid on the desk. This certainly looked very strange. It was difficult to say were they notes or only a paper ruled and splashed with ink and blots. Felix Mendelssohn, in his surprise, laughed loudly. How is that written? Who can read it?" he said.

But suddenly he became serious, for while Goethe was saying, "Now, guess who wrote it?" Zelter, who had walked up to the piano and looked over the boy's shoulder, exclaimed, "Why, Beethoven wrote that! any one could see it a mile off. He always writes with a broomstick, and passes his sleeve over the notes before they are dry. I have plenty of his manuscripts. They are easy to know."

At the mention of the name, as I remarked, Mendelssohn had suddenly grown serious—even more than serious. A shade of awe was visible on his features. Goethe regarded him with searching eyes, from which delight beamed. The boy kept his eyes immovably fixed on the manuscript, and a look of glad surprise flew over his features as he traced a brilliant thought amid the chaos of confused, blurred notes.

But all this lasted only a few seconds, for Goethe wished to make a severe trial, and give the performer no time for preparation. "You see," he exclaimed, "I told you that you would stick. Now try it; show us what you can do."

Felix began playing immediately. It was a simple melody; if clearly written a trifling, I may say no task, for even a moderate performer. But to follow it through the scrambling labyrinth required a quickness and certainty of eye such as few are able to attain. I glanced with surprise at the leaf, and tried to hum the tune, but many of the notes were perfectly illegible, or had to be sought at the most unexpected corners, as the boy often pointed out with a laugh.

He played it through once in this way, generally correctly, but stopping at times, and correcting several mistakes with a quick "No, so;" then he exclaimed, "Now I will play it to you." And this second time not a note was missing. "This is Beethoven, this passage," he said once turning to me, as if he had come across something which sharply displayed the master's peculiar style. "That is true Beethoven. I recognize him in it at once."

With this trial-piece Goethe broke off. I need scarcely add that the young player again reaped the fullest praise, which Goethe veiled in mocking jests, that he had stuck here and there, and had not been quite sure.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

SPOHR AND THE VIOLIN.—Of Spohr's distinguished merits as a composer of quartets, enough has been said in the analytical programmes of the Monday Popular Concerts. The reproduction of a few sentences will suffice to explain, to such as have not hitherto been in the habit of attending these performances, the opinion entertained of the late Kapellmeister of Hesse-Cassel as a fertile and ingenious producer in this particular branch of his art. As a composer of quartets—it was urged—and indeed of all varieties of chamber music,—for stringed instruments, Spohr eminently excelled. Only Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn can be said to have surpassed him; while, on the other hand, he produced in this department almost as much as the last three in common. Here, however, his darling instrument was at command, and none will refuse to admit that, as a writer for the violin, Spohr was unrivalled. No predecessor or contemporary has done so much or so well for the first of orchestral, as it is the first of solo, instruments. His compositions for the violin (as a performer on which, in many respects, he equally transcended all competitors) form one of the most important and valuable bequests that genius has made to art. He represented, moreover, and pre-eminently, the great German school of playing, the most solid, legitimate, and classically pure, if not the most graceful, impetuous and brilliant. "All the composers for the violin put together, since legitimate music was provided for that instrument, could not," says a modern critic, "make one Spohr." This was the domain in which he knew no rival, and in which, whether as producer or executant, he distanced all competitors. Spohr was the rock against which the so-called virtuosity of his time could make no head. In an age of semi-charlatanism he retained for his darling instrument its classic character, and dedicated works to the fiddle which are likely to survive while music continues to be cultivated. Violinists, indeed, of every category, those alike who aim at mere display and those who entertain a worthier ambition, are infinitely his debtors; since, through the method he inculcated, and the writings he published, he not only regulated taste and developed style, but, more than any predecessor or contemporary, helped to advance the mechanism of the instrument, and thus to multiply its resources and vary its means of effect. His quartets (of which he produced about three times as many as Mozart, and twice as many as Beethoven), his quintets, and other examples of what it termed chamber music, form a library of themselves.—Programme of the Monday Popular Concerts.

Ristori.

Dreary December has brought in its train the season of Advent. In the welcome given to an interminable catalogue of religious festivals, we have taken a solemn addios of theatrical amusements—solemn, not on account of the excessive brilliancy of the autumnal pleasure campaign, but because the suggestion of a good thing is liable to create pleasant emotions in the mind; whereas, the absence of suggestion causes an emotional vacuum. Besides influenzas and perpetual rain diluted, at rare intervals, by a few stray sunbeams, were made indurable in the consolation of Bellini's heart vibrations and Meyerbeer's intellectual outpourings. Influenzas and rain remain—poor substitutes for melody and harmony of sound.

Adelaide Ristori inaugurated the autumn season by giving six representations at the cosy little Niccolini theatre. Ristori possesses to so eminent an extent the power of fascination, that much time must elapse before sober, calm criticism can be released from the captivity in which it is enthralled by this actress. It is difficult to listen to reason when the sight, that most susceptible of our senses, is under the spell of enchantment; for as long as men are mortal, beauty will have more or less worshippers. Ristori, personally, is very attractive. They say that, when she was a girl, so wonderful was her beauty that her mere presence upon the stage was sufficient to create a furor amounting almost to frenzy. At that time she was simply a comedienne, and was not considered by Florentines to be possessed of more than ordinary dramatic talent. It is only within the last ten years, since her fame has been acknowledged abroad, that she has assumed an eminent position in her profession. Even now the Italians are not willing to accord her that meed of praise which is lavished upon her by foreign nations. Ristori's appearance is quite anomalous. It is of a type quite frequent in America. Her hair is brown, her complexion fair, her eyes of that bluish gray cast so charming in its expression and variety; her features are finely cut and regular; she has a beautiful mouth, and equally beautiful teeth; her height is noble, without towering above the woman measure, and her entire figure is exquisitely proportioned. Her hand and arm are a study, and did all Italian women possess as pretty a foot, their reputation in this respect would be quite different from what it is at present. Ristori is not only beautiful on the stage, but sympathetic, also, and many an artist at Rome has sought her as a model for Madonnas. Her voice is of contralto calibre, and most sonorous. It is managed with that colloquial art (so rare in America,) by which its power and purity are preserved through hours of most exhausting exercise.

As a comedienne Ristori is unrivalled. Her elegance of manner, dress and action, her conversational tone, her natural esprit and charming smile, eminently fit her for the personation of modern life. I never saw anything more refreshingly natural than her acting in a petite comedy called "I Gelosi Fortunati," in which a husband and wife both equally jealous and equally without reason, play at cross purposes. No amendment could have been suggested; complete satisfaction pervaded the mind; but in the tragedy, with sorrow do I confess it, she must yield the precedence to Rachel. Rachel was so grand, so consummate in and true to her art, that she never condescended to sacrifice the artistic for that which would produce greater momentary effect and call forth indiscriminating applause. Ristori has a disagreeable mannerism of closing her eyes, imagining that she is adding effect to the situation. In this she may be imitating Rachel, who occasionally contracted her eyes, but only occasionally, when the action was a natural one. As imitators invariably distort, so Ristori has confirmed into an unpleasant habit what Rachel used with extreme delicacy.

Then again, Ristori is exaggerated. This fault is probably owing, and therefore partly excusable, to her almost constantly performing before foreign audiences who have no knowledge of the Italian language, and in consequence she is tempted to interpret her author by pantomime, which really is most wonderful and comprehensive. Still, once resorting to excessive action leads to melodramatic style, which, however acceptable to English and French, who demand a key to unintelligible words, must necessarily be severely criticised by Italians and those acquainted with Italian, to whom the language is no mystery. And when Italians object to gesticulation, which is one of their great characteristics, you may be very sure that it is more than superabundant.

Ristori is artful in her art, and therefore not the highest order of dramatic genius; nevertheless, she is probably the first of living actresses. Certainly England and America have no one in the least comparable to her, and her acting never fails to give infinite pleasure. "Giuditta" and "Medea" are considered to be the characters which she best portrays. The former tragedy, founded on a well known scriptural subject, is a late production of Giacometti, a Genoese poet, and though it cannot take a high rank in literature is very effective upon the stage. It was written for Ristori, and therefore is adapted to the displaying of her peculiarities. The scenes where Giuditta determines to go to the camp of Holofernes, and slay the arch enemy of her tribe; where, upon appearing before him in all the splendor of her beauty, heightened by gorgeous dressing, she quells his anger by fascinating him with the most marvelously assumed expression of seductive love; finally, where, before completing her vengeance, she fears her inability to accomplish the self-imposed deed; the despair which overwhelms her, when upon seizing Holofernes' scimitar, the only weapon upon which she can rely to execute the bloody work, she is unable to sift its immense weight—the unexpected appearance of Holofernes' mistress, with the intention of murdering her rival, whose presence hastened the moment of exaltation, when the scimitar became as light as air, and waving it aloft, Giuditta rushed to the barbarian's couch and slays him—all are bits of tremendous acting. In Medea she depicts more varied emotions with equal power. Admirable are her transitions from vengeance to love, from love to pathos, and when maternal feelings are eclipsed by lover's hate and retaliation, she looks the very personification of the heathen tigress, Medea. Horribly natural is Ristori's portrayal of Myrrha in Alfieri's tragedy of that most abominable of heathen subjects. Alfieri materially alters mythology by making Myrrha guilty in thought only. Through four long acts she depicts the one dreadful passion of incestuous love for her father, which she struggles against, for which she hates herself, but to which she is doomed by Venus, under whose curse she lives and dies. When her father, Cinyras, forces her to the last act, to reveal to him the cause of her mysterious suffering, and her vindictive tempter forces her to disclose her crime in these insinuating words:

"Oh madre mia felice! almen concesso
A lei sarà—di morir—al tuo fianco."

(Ah, too happy is my mother! at least it will be permitted to her to die by thy side,) the expression of Ristori's face, and her delivery of these two lines positively made one's blood run cold; and the gesture which the dying girl directed to her father, imploring him to conceal from her mother her impious revelation, was worthy of being perpetuated in marble.

Notwithstanding the literary merit of "Myrrha," and Ristori's accurate conception of her character, the tragedy should be banished from the stage, for it can be productive of no good, and only fills the audience with horror and disgust. It is a wonderful tour de force on the part of Ristori, which must be quite as repulsive to herself as to her audience. But enough of Ristori for the present.—Cor. of N. O. Picayune.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 26, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha," Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

No. III.

BERLIN, Dec. 26, 1860.

The day after Christmas! A sober, quiet day, and snowing fast. Seasonably has the brilliant sky of yesterday curtained itself for the rest of all who had returned as it were to childhood for the last day or two, breathing the quick oxygen of renewed youthfulness and joy in larger doses than our care-worn systems can endure long at a time. And what a happy, holy, and whole-hearted day the German Christmas is! It lasts all this week; and really it has been a tree growing, and budding, and blossoming into the full flower of yesterday, for three or four weeks past. All this time, dull and sunless as the short, short days have been, has the whole air been full of coming Christmas. I met it in the eyes of all the happy, eager children trooping home from school, the boys with knapsacks on their backs—a pretty uniform, but—sadly suggestive of the next livery which the military fatherland will put upon them when they reach the proper age! The shop-windows under the Lindens have been irresistibly attractive with all sorts of beautiful books, engravings, jewelry and toys. Weihnacht was everywhere the word; Weihnachts-geschenke and Weihnachts-anstellungen, Christmas gifts and Christmas exhibitions, have filled all the newspapers with curious and fantastic advertisements. Every great square held and still holds continual market, covered with booths, richly spread with everything to tempt the wondering desire of childhood; a gay and chattering scene, where you walk through endless labyrinths of charming, dazzling, comical inventions, as if it were the heyday of elves and gnomes and cobolds reëstablished in the busy and prosaic streets of a great artificial nineteenth century city. Crossing, some three weeks since, the great Sehiller Platz, on which I "take my comfort in mine inn," to the royal Schauspiel-Haus, or theatre, that stands between the two great domed churches, occupying with them the middle of the square—to buy my ticket to the evening's performance of Goethe's "Egmont," with Beethoven's music, I had to make my way to the door through long winding narrow paths, of fragrant little hemlocks, pines and tannen, as through a Birnam wood of a night's growth. This they call "unter den Pyramiden." Curious roots the tree pyramids all had to-wit, little four-legged wooden crickets, painted of all colors. These were Christmas trees for sale. So in the larger square between the Palace and the Museum, on my way to pay another visit to the Giottos and the Fra Angelicos and Lippo-Lippis, to Titian's daughter, and Corregio's "Io," and the Raphael Madonnas, of which there are a half dozen here, to Murillo's Antony of Padua holding the beautiful Christ child—to the marvellous old altarpiece of the Van Eycks, to the old German masters, and the Rembrandts, Vandykes, Rubenses, &c.—I found the whole space occupied with green and rustling pyramiden. And in the great Schloss-markt, and in the Neu-markt over in the old city, and about the gates of Berlin as you go out towards Potsdam, or elsewhere, all is overgrown and waving with these groves and forests of commercial Christmas. For those who despise nature, and prefer Art or miracle, there are artificial trees, such as never grew beneath the sun, except it were in some Catholic legendary heaven, with green paper foliage and gold paper blossoms—"California Blumen"!

In the afternoon, returning from my walk over the snow under the sober woods of the Thiergarten musing along and alone, and owning the sweet and soothing influence of nature even in this blackened, wintry aspect, warmed by the joy of pretty children happy in the snow, and of the skaters on the little lakes and rivulets,—hailing too, with an inward thrill of consolation and of new faith, the Christmas emblems in the exquisite fairy frost work that has woven itself about the branches of those grand old mossy trees—I meet on the main avenue, that leads out from the propylean Brandenburg gate, a constant succession of curious, long, boat-shaped wagons, in which are huddled together parties of strange old women, with great baskets, some asleep and some laughing and chatting loudly in the broad North German peasant dialect. These are the presiding spirits of the tree markets we saw in the morning. They have "struck their tents like the Arabs," leaving the square to helmeted policemen, and the flocks of plump little birds that come peeping and sprinkling themselves down over the snow.

But we did not intend to go into all this childish description; the spirit of the season must excuse it. I hasten to the richer experiences of Christmas proper. First, however, remarking that this most poetic, childlike Christian festival, while more and more is made of it every year, seems to have assumed a very calculating and commercial character, as all things do and must do in this commercial phase through which our race is passing, also remarking, on the other hand, that the German Christmas has by no means lost its sincerity and heartiness. Its heavenly meaning is not all forgotten in mere trade. Even in the eager clamor of the market squares there mingles much of the hearty ring of cheerfulness and good will, and faces beam with kindness, with hope of a good time for all, even in the heat of puffing and parading one's own wares. The charm and feature of the German Christmas seems to be, that it is a day when all are thinking of the children, and happy in their happiness. The tree is lighted for the little ones, and all hands and hearts are occupied in busily preparing and in lighting the old surprise whose whose magic is still fresh and perfect to the all-believing and imaginative child mind. Christmas here is not so much, as it is with us, a season for the exchange of gifts between friends of all ages. The home part of the festival is chiefly for the children; and when we are all occupied with what we most wish for our children, can it be possible that purer, kindlier, more childlike thought and aspirations should not take possession of ourselves? How beautiful it is to see in every house the fanciful, mysterious work preparing—the little prying and suspicious rogues excluded, kept as much as possible in wondering ignorance till the wonder-tree shall burst upon them in full radiance and golden bloom! and to see all the elders, not merely mothers, aunts and sisters, but papa himself and the good uncle, whether he be tradesman, scholar, grave official, or mechanic, busying himself willingly and happily for once in this innocent child's work! Did I not call at my good friend's, the Professor's, the evening before Christmas Eve, and was I not instantly pressed into service with the rest, to help gild the walnuts and hang up the golden fruit, under the instructions of papa and the brave old uncle who had served in Lützow's famous troop in the heroic days, while more delicate and cunning fingers cut out California magnolias from golden paper! and all for the surprise and joy of one little matchen, whose quick senses have divined all, more than all, I dare say, already.

Nature, the wise mother, seems this time to have dealt with us all as children in the same way, and to have kept us for a long time in a dark room with all the windows of heaven curtained and the folding doors drawn to, while she prepared her full flower of a Christmas day, that was to burst upon us in perfect winter splendor, a day of quite ideal weather, with an air so nimble and so full of oxygen that no mean man could live in it—a very Christmas tree of a day, flashing with gems and golden fruit, and springing upward to the purest heavens. For weeks, nay for two months preceding, nearly all the days had been of the most dull and murky character; a mild, moist, muddy, sunless winter weather. The days were growing shorter and shorter by the almanac, while practically there seemed to be no day at all. The sun rose and set constructively. A dead leaden sky prolonged the winter of our discontent until it should be glorious Christmas. Yet under the darkness, as with those who wake before day-dawn, what hopes and pleasant plans were cheerfully astir, what eager expectation and excitement! When the days are near the shortest and the turning of the year at hand, a thrill of new life and encouragement creeps musically through all the fibres of our being; and it is as if the very heart of the planet leapt in unison with all our private hearts. And so, if the days were short, the wintry period itself seemed shorter, and Heilige Nacht, or Christmas Eve, was soon upon us; and with it came the moon out like Madonna through the clouds, that "turned their silver lining to the night," and hosts of stars like cherubs leaned upon the pearly clouds admiring, and the air grew colder, yet more warming with a vitalizing heavenly warmth. For there are two kinds of cold weather; one a negative, a bitter, black, denying kind of cold, that chills like Mephistopheles; the other a celestial, crystal, clear, exhilarating cold, that seems at once to warm and purify the blood, and puts the finest nerves in tune, and sharpens every sense, and quickens all good impulses, and sets us in a right believing, wholesome and unshrinking frame. And such celestial cold it was that chased away the hosts of darkness that had so long encamped around and overshadowed Berlin. This is your true Christmas cold.

And in this quick, stimulating cold, under this glorified sky, over the glad sparkling snow, walk with us now (it is five o'clock, and the sun has been down a good hour and a quarter), up the brilliant, stately avenue of the Lindens, past houses and hotels and palaces, with the light of the Christmas tree breaking through many a window, over the bridge with its white statues looking doubly ideal over the snow, through the crooked narrow ways among the booths across the royal square or Lustgarten, to the royal church or Dom Kirche. A gloomy, homely looking pile it is, but this evening the angels are to sing "Peace on earth, good will to man" in it. There is to be a "liturgical service," consisting nearly all of music. We make our way through the crowd, to the farther end of the long, narrow, tubular interior, spanned by a continuous arch for ceiling, and groping along past the old electors and Teutonic Ritters, stretched at full length in bronze upon their monuments, find standing places in the gallery above. Far away, in the opposite end gallery, are the organ and the singers, boys and men, the famous Dom-chor, half screened behind the great confused, lifeless altar picture in which some artist has endeavored to convey his notion of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. And suddenly there was a sound, as of the heavenly host—I can hardly help using the Bible language—so pure, so clear, so richly, sweetly harmonized were those sixty or seventy voices that then softly swelled upon the air, and sang through a long anthem, in such perfect tune, without accompaniment. It was the Psalm: "Why do the heathen rage," &c., ending with an elaborate ascription and amen. The composition, which seemed to be modern, was not particularly fine or striking in itself, but in good style, appropriate; quite as interesting as many of those old Flemish and Italian pieces which this choir are so fond of singing for the antiquity of the thing; at all events beautiful so sung. Is there any sound so exquisite, so holy as that of a mass of voices blended in perfect purity and which really sing together? The silvery soprano of the boys was heavenly; the alto just rich and positive enough; the tenors warm and ringing, unforced, and obedient as by instinct to the least hints of expression; the basses full and sonorous; and of each kind just enough; each furnishing in quantity and quality just what the harmony required. I do not say that a choir of men and boys is better than one of mixed voices, or for most purposes so good. But here was something singularly perfect and effective of its kind. When we are in the wrong way or despairing, may such sounds fall upon the darkness of our soul!

And now, as if to break the spell for a moment and remind us that we are yet of earth and discord, comes the painful shock of the organ commencing miserably out of tune. A poor, dead, heavy, unsonorous sort of organ at the best; the more so now that it had lost the truth. With this uncertain and unquickenng sound it gives out the chorale; and the congregation join in the first verse with quite as little unity and clear ring of concord, though with a good will,—nay with some dreadful croaking close by, very likely, to preoccupy your private ear, if you happen to find yourself in a neighborhood where the will is very much better than the deed. But hark!

the organ ceases, and the second verse is the same chorale glorified and sounding in the heavens; it is sung now in true harmony instead of in false unison, by that fine choir alone. The organ and the congregation have, however, the last word. And now enters the minister before the altar, and reads in short sentences the simply liturgy, interspersed with responses from the congregation, and from the choir (some of these latter of exquisite beauty); short readings from the gospels; two or three anthems; two or three more chorals, alternating between choir and congregation as before, types of the angelic and the earthly—but no sermon—how weak one would have sounded amid such transporting strains of a more universal, pure soul language!—and the service is concluded in a single hour, one beautiful and holy hour—and all walk out again, refreshed and edified, tuned to the true tone of Christmas, into the moonlight and starlight gleaming on the snow, each to the happy home where the children wait the lighting up. There are no operas, theatres, or shows that evening—I wonder if that can be said of any other evening in the whole year in Berlin—all is sacred to the merry meeting round the tree in every home; the ideal was not to be sought abroad, it comes and waves its lily wand in every house.

The next morning was right cold and clear; a brilliant day with a dry vivifying air, as unlike all the days I had yet experienced in Berlin as possible, and like our finest winter days in dear New England. I took a long walk over the Kloster Strasse, to the Parochial Kirche, and attended morning service. There you find a really superb organ, one of remarkable power and lifesome equality of tone. Its pipes speak as though they had life in them, and were not afraid, not conscious of bad habits. The tones leap out lustily as if glad and fit to praise the Lord and celebrate the Christmas. It was built in Berlin. I entered during the singing of a chorale by the people; one of the grandest of the old chorales; a solemn minor tune, but with a warm Christmas glow in it. How different the impression from that of the evening before in the Dom Kirche. Here the organ was in tune, and in master hands, those of Haupt, who is one of the very first, if not the first, of the real classical organists in Germany, who build upon Bach. (A man of about fifty; pupil of Mendelssohn, of Zelter; intimate friend of Felix as long as he lived; a true man of a true, clear spirit, wise and thinking, thoroughly the artist, alive to all that is high and true, without a taste of vanity or meanness, and only not widely famous because he loves to stay quietly at his post, as Bach did.) Upheld by the rich, ringing, true tones of that organ, the voices of the people sounded also true; and though verse after verse was sung, with brief inspiring interludes, I did not weary of it, but grew to love its sameness; one's soul could bathe in the pure, strengthening flood of such tone. A glad, clean spirit seemed to pervade all. The place was as cheerful as sunshine. The interior of the church is nearly square, or rather, round; for each of its four sides, from the corners, opens back into a wide, deep recess, richly vaulted. In the gallery thrown across the one opposite that which contains the organ, was a large choir of both sexes, including boys, all holding broad music sheets before them, waiting to begin, and looking like some of the choirs in the religious paintings of the old masters. They sang without accompaniment, a beautiful anthem or Te Deum, with very harmonious effect, and frequently afterwards took their turn in the same manner in the responses between the pastor and the chorales of the people. The church was by no means crowded; when at length the vacant pews were unlocked to those who had been standing in the aisles, we took our seat in one and found inscribed upon the front the names of each of its lawful occupants (how curious are names); one was "Viollet," and that immediately before me "Tannenbaum" (or Christmas tree); no wonder that he had to keep at home. Mingling with the music and the prayers, came down occasionally from the tower the silvery chimes, which rang out the notes of another Christmas chorale dear to the hearts of Germany. The sermon was sincere and good, and not too long, and the whole service one of the most edifying that I remember anywhere. I had hoped for a good organ fugue, though, at the close; but the organist, with whom I walked out, explained to me that the warming of the church had put certain portions of his instrument out of the fit condition. Few persons have to wrestle hand to hand with the icy Winter like your organists; he must do all his practising in cold churches and be always his own stove. But to compare this congregational singing with the other—what a difference it does make, to be sure, if music be in tune or out of tune! The moral correspondence is most intimate; singing, which is out of tune, strikes into our moral consciousness; we listen with a sense of all our sins cling about us and dragging us down; whereas perfect tune sets all that is strong and hopeful in us ringing, relates us to the stars, and redeems us back in triumph to the whole world's harmony.

I will not attempt to describe the liveliness of Berlin throughout the day; thronged streets; the sleighing, and the skating parties in the Thiergarten; the bands assembled at noon to play by the guard-house; the crowds of officers decked out with a fabulous variety of splendid uniforms; the children reflecting the same military fancy in the streets, parading in their Christmas presents, in hat and plume or velvet—several small youth's I met in suits of complete armor, knights in miniature; joy and kindness in all faces, even in the helmeted, long-skirted policemen, who to the stranger commonly seem to creep about him everywhere with surly vigilance as if eager to arrest him on some technical conclusion.

Concerts and operas offer less than usual in the Christmas holidays; the public entertainments are mostly of the most light and popular character. Yet Leibig is still faithful to his calling. He gave one of his cheap classical concerts yesterday afternoon (Christmas day); five of them during the week; the programme each time containing two symphonies, three overtures, and something else. They add up as follows:

SYMPHONIES. HAYDN: No. 16 (E flat); No. 17 (E flat); Weihnachts Symphony; military do—MOZART: "Jupiter," in C.—BEETHOVEN: No. 8 (in F); No. 5 (C minor); No. 2 (in D); No. 4 (B flat); Scherzo from No. 9.—SCHUMANN: No. 3 (E flat).—MENDELSSOHN: No. 3 (A minor).

Overtures. MOZART: Clemenza di Tito. BEE-THOVEN: Prometheus; Coriolan.—GLUCK: Iphigenia in Aulis.—TAUBERT: Fest Overture.—SCHUMANN: Manfred.—ROSSINI: "Tell;" La Gazza Ladra.—MENDELSSOHN: Hebriden; Sommernachtstraum.—CHERUBINI: Lodoiska.—ONSLow: Hausirer.—LORTZING: Fest Ov.—GADE: "Ossian."—WAGNER: Tannhäuser.

Miscellaneous. Song from Tannhäuser. Procession of women in Lohengrin. Finale from the Zauberflöte. Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." Prelude from Bach, with melody by Gounod, &c., &c.

A pretty solid snappy for one week! The Royal Opera seems mostly given over to the Italians this week. But on Friday night comes the Iphigenia in Aulis by Gluck. And for the same night is announced Bach's famous Mass in B, by the Stern'sche Gesangverein. Perhaps, however, this is only a rehearsal.

Christmas dramas, spectacles, and tableaux are drawing thousands to a dozen theatres every night. But there is one exhibition, which has been open in the Royal Academy building for some weeks past, of a really artistic character. At least the idea in itself is admirable, although in the execution I was somewhat disappointed. The artists, to increase this fund for the relief of unfortunate artists and their families, arrange every year at this time an exhibition of transparent paintings, of a sacred character, each picture accompanied by some piece of old modern church music sung by the Dom Chor. This time I doubt if the paintings be as fine productions as in the last years; and the singing seems to be by only a delegation of the Chor. D.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

SECOND SATURDAY EVENING CONCERT.

PART I.

1. Allegro Moderato, from the Quintette in C, op. 7. V. Lachner
2. Romanza. "Il Sogno," with Violoncello Obligato. Henry Draper. Mercadante
3. 1st Air Varie. for Clarinette. Klose Thomas Ryan.
4. Canzonetta, from the Quartette in E flat, and Song without words, in G, No. 4, Fifth Book. Mendelssohn
5. Entre Act and Air, from "Le Pre aux cleres". Herold

PART II.

6. "Echoes des Alpes." Solo for Violoncello. Alard Wulf Fries.
 7. Song, "Le chemin du Paradis." (The way to Paradise.) Henry Draper. Blumenthal
 8. Octette, in F, op. 166. Franz Schubert For 2 Violins, Viola, Violoncello, Bass, Clarinette, Horn and Bassoon.
- Introduction and Allegro—Andante—Scherzo, Allegro Vivace—Finale, Andante and Allegro.

This concert, on January the 19th, offered, as will be seen from the programme, several excellent pieces, chief of which, of course, was the Octette. The rendering was very good and the piece made new friends. It is so full of fine melody and harmony, all so tastefully worked up, that its strength is almost hidden by the beauty of it. After a thoughtful introduction, Adagio in F, which foreshadows both the melodies in their principal motives, comes in the Allegro, full of nerve and strength in the first and sweetness and grace in the second melody. It rises to a strong climax in the second part, followed by a few measures of deep-felt breathings of the mind—instruments answered plaintively by the strings; after which the third part breaks forth with fresh energy like the first, and is closed by the second theme played by the horn at the close of the coda, which, of course, also introduces the first in piu Allegro movement. The first melody of the Andante in B flat is given to the clarinette. It is a simple melody, kind and quiet, rather musing withal; and is finely contrasted by a second melody, for the violin, entering at once in G flat, assuring and loving. These two melodies are the material for the movement. With many beauties it yet ranks, to our taste, lower than the three other movements, which is no disparagement, the others being so very beautiful. The Scherzo in F has two melodies, made of a part of the first motive in the first movement. It is a frolicking movement with a good deal of archness and grace. The clarinette, piping away on f, f, g for four measures, accompanied by harmonies in the strings that sound as if they were full of mischief, adds much to the exhilarating effect of the piece. In the second part it introduces the second melody, full of good-natured glee. After a few measures of dissembling plaintiveness the sport begins anew, more whirling and giddy than before. The Trio in C major is rather quiet, almost out of keeping with the rest, but for the last four measures of each part, which connect it in character with the first two parts. The movement has nothing in common with Beethoven's later Scherzos, but stands in between them and some of Haydn and Mozart. Full of real glee and fun like the latter and nearly as variegated, though not as deeply colored as those of the former, it combines good humor with a touch of seriousness that befits it well. Very striking is the short introduction to the Andante molto to the Finale, Allegro. A solemn, impressive tremolo measure by the Violoncello brings forward the first motive of the first movement. In that introduction it began its course, half timidly as if groping its way; here it steps in strong, almost triumphant at first coming to a passive stop after a less triumphant repetition, when the last movement begins Allegro. Its first melody played piano has a rhythm quite peculiar and original, the first sentence of the period having rhythms of three, three and two measures, which gives it a marked, wilful and determined expression. Of fine effect is the repetition of the theme forte. In contrast with this, the second Melody is all grace and loveliness. Gradually several of the rhythms of the first movement are introduced, giving one a pleasant sensation of the unity of the piece. The two melodies mingle, oppose, flee each other and unite again, imparting an uncommon union of strong life and brilliant beauty to the movement. The coda begins with the introduction to the movement, this time absolutely victorious and certain. Like the true artist he is, the composer represents the musical idea in the three stages of feeling at the beginning, in the progress and at the end of its development, uncertain at first, more assured, almost triumphant in the middle, victorious at the end.

The rest of the Coda, Allegro molto, is filled with the first melody of this movement. It is needless to speak of the masterly treatment of the instruments, or of the working up of the motives and themes or of the fine effects in harmony and rhythm. It is enough to say that the piece is a masterwork full of undying beauty. It is the more beautiful since force and grace are so intimately blended that at first hearing one might undervalue the strength, while at second hearing or when looking it over again, a growing sense of power comes upon one, so well balanced are these two elements of which the work consists. The rhythm as well as the harmony give a character of originality to the work, which is made almost gorgeous in some places with the splendor of its harmonious combinations.

Whether we speak the mind of the majority, we know not; but we for one should feel grateful to the club if they would let us hear it once more during the winter.

With exquisite grace the gentlemen played the Canzonetta from the well-known Mendelssohn Quartette; and with vigor and true taste the piece by Lachner. Mr. FRIES was as successful in his solo as Mr. RYAN in his, both reaping great applause. Messrs. DRAPER and ZÖHLER the first in his songs and the last in the flute part of the Mendelssohn song without words did not please us, whatever may have been the applause of the public, which was liberally bestowed. Both gentlemen lack feeling. Mr. Draper tries to make up for it by a constant tremulando and overstraining. The former has the effect of putting the listener in a feeling of uncertainty. One has not the opportunity of a moments repose on a distinct and clear tone of the same number of vibrations, but is wearied by a constant unrest. The latter makes the voice of Mr. Draper sound harsh in the forte passages. If it were possible to accustom himself to a true and better intonation, Mr. Draper ought not to think any amount of quiet steady scale practice misapplied. Mr. Zöhler played that exquisite melody of the song without words just as coldly as it seemed possible for a person who observes forte and piano marks, as he did. The gentlemen who played the accompaniment with good taste, very properly attempted to diminish and slightly to retard at the end of the melody; to no purpose however. We are not surprised that the song was encored; its beauty warranted it; but true and fine taste shows in little things, which, to be sure, pass unheeded by the ears of the multitude.

The accompaniment to the songs was played by Mr. Mayer with great delicacy and fine shading, he doing himself a great deal of credit.

The hall was crowded to the utmost. It seems as if the club might fill a larger hall, so many persons had to stand. We are glad of their prosperity and hope that it will continue.

We shall have to make some remarks about the use these Saturday concerts might be put to by the club in our next number. For the present we will make a suggestion. How would it be if the club kept expanding and as it progressed from quartettes and quintettes to septettes and octettes, enlarged to smaller symphonies, such as father Haydn left in untried numbers; or even several of Mozarts might be performed. Haydn's symphonies are almost unknown in this part of the country. But enough for to-day.

To-night we have another Saturday concert, and the next concert of the regular series of eight takes place on Tuesday next, January the 29th. *†

Harvard Musical Association.

The twenty-fourth annual meeting of this society took place at the Revere House, on Monday evening of this week. Many of the same familiar faces of college days were there, many younger members, and others whose kindred tastes have caused them to be sought for as members of the association.

The usual routine of business occupied the early hours of the evening, the reports of the treasurer and librarian showing the fund and library of the association to be in an unusually prosperous state.

Then the officers were chosen, the old board being unanimously reelected, viz: Henry W. Pickering, Esq., President; John S. Dwight, Esq., Vice President; Hon. John P. Putnam, Treasurer; Dr. J.

Baxter Upham, Cor. Secretary; Henry Ware, Esq., Rec. Secretary; Dr. F. E. Oliver, Charles F. Skinner, Esq., Directors at Large.

After the election of the new members the festive features of the meeting were initiated by the singing of Non nobis Domine, after which the company took their seats at the beautiful table arrayed by the good taste of Mr. Bingham, the superintendent of the Revere House. A fine statuette of MOZART, new to our eyes, occupied the President's end of the table, and beautiful flowers decorated it at intervals. At the opposite end was a truly grand Chickering pianoforte, and near it the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who were the welcome guests of the Association for the evening.

As reporters do not have seats within the circle of this board, we cannot fully give any account of the good things that sparkled from the lower quarter of the table, interspersed with choice music from the skilful artists who were the guests, from the Glee Club of the Association and rare piano music contributed by Messrs. J. C. D. Parker and J. H. Wilcox, members of the H. M. A.

But we cannot at this time forbear to allude to the spontaneous rising of the company as the instruments rung out the "Star Spangled Banner," in response to the remarks of one of the speakers, and to the speech then made by another, expressing the hope at some early day we should have a noble and real National Anthem, worthy to stand by the side of the grand English melody, God Save the Queen and the Marseillaise of France. He said that we had ten poets, here in the ranks of our own body, that includes the names of Holmes, Longfellow and Lowell, to name no more, and might we not find the composer too, who could worthily complete the work? He would say nothing in disparagement of the airs we already have that to some extent stir the blood and the patriotism of us all, but might we not look forward and hope for some better one, more worthy to be accepted as a National Anthem?

An allusion to the poet Burns called out one of the older members, one, however, whose whole-souled enthusiasm never cools or grows old, who exhibited to the company a lock of the hair of that "Highland Mary," who has inspired some of the rarest songs that the world has among its treasures of song.

But, we trespass a little upon the courtesies of the occasion, and will say no more than that the evening passed into the morning, in the interchange of the social pleasures of the meeting, before it was dissolved, all, as usual, looking forward with pleasant anticipations to the return of the next annual festival of the association.

FORMES, STICELLI, PATTI. — All lovers of Italian music will rejoice to see the nouncement of a concert by these artists, to be given on Monday evening. It will be the last of Formes, as he leaves us for Europe in a short time.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

MR. EDITOR. — Will you permit me to call the attention of those seeking a music teacher, to the rare merits of a young person, recently a pupil of Otto Dresel. Miss LAURA LINCOLN BROWNE is the only child of the late J. W. Browne, of the Suffolk Bar, whose sudden death last summer, threw mother and daughter upon their own resources.

I have heard this young lady play, and find her not only a worthy scholar of a distinguished master, but possessed of an essentially fine musical organization. Add to this, that she is modest, earnest and faithful, and her terms, by advice of friends, made very reasonable, and you will feel safe in joining in my recommendation of her.

Her residence is at No. 9 Kingston Street, and she is permitted to refer to Miss Graupner, 131 Tremont Street; Mr. Dresel, Hotel Pelham; Mr. Aphorp, 17 State Street. E.

Nathan Richardson and his New Method for the Piano.

An article having been published by Messrs. Russell and Tolman, reflecting severely upon the motives of Nathan Richardson in publishing the New Method for the Piano, we have waited for a reply from some member of his family. But the whole matter is so complicated, and the quarrel so fratricidal, that the widow of Mr. Richardson, who is the principal sufferer from this attack, shrinks with instinctive delicacy from coming before the public to disprove assertions recklessly made, and which no one but he who rests in the quiet grave, could positively expose. The whole tenor of Mr. Richardson's life, his letters, his conversation and confidence with his wife and friends give abundant evidence of his honor, integrity and singleness of heart, and endeared him to all who were not influenced by motives of selfishness or envy. Believing that Mr. Richardson while stricken with disease became the victim of designing men, and that the history of the last year or two of his life, if revealed, would make them sink into insignificance, or cause them to desire to do so, we extend to the aggrieved widow our respectful sympathy.

For ourselves we have a few words to say:—The fame acquired by Mr. Richardson as author of the "Modern School," gave assurance that a new work prepared by him after many years of experience, would be valuable to teachers and pupils. When, therefore, to our great surprise Messrs. Russell & Tolman refused to publish the "New Method" and it was offered to us, we at once agreed to accept the terms, provided we became satisfied that the work was all that it was represented to be.

The ms. was immediately placed for thorough examination, in the hands of eminent teachers fully competent to judge of its merits. The result was entirely satisfactory. Mr. L. P. Homer, an intimate friend of Mr. Richardson's, who had assisted him in preparing the book and had a better knowledge of its value than any one excepting the author, did much towards giving us a favorable opinion of it, and assisting in completing the bargain.

Far better would it have been for Messrs. R. & T. to have accepted the proposition for its publication, than to have allowed the necessity of paying a part of the price in advance for Mr. Richardson's immediate wants to have deterred them from doing so, and thus saved themselves much time, money and unhappiness in endeavoring to depreciate the forthcoming work.

From the moment it was known that the "New Method" was to be published by us, no steps were left untaken by Messrs. Russell & Tolman to defeat its success and injure its future prospects. The price of the "Modern School" was reduced, an abridgement of that work with English fingering, issued, and one of that firm travelled through the country, book in hand, bartering and exchanging until the market was actually glutted with the "Modern School." Hostility to Mr. Richardson's new book was the grand moving power of this expedition. It was hoped that those who were thus burdened with quantities of the "Modern School" would feel interested in forcing that book upon their customers and would use their interests against the "New Method." But the crowning effort of unfairness was the "New Modern School."

We have no objection to the rehash of the "Modern School," for water will find its level, but when it is called "dastardly" to defend him who is in the grave, what epithet shall be applied to those who attempt not only to blast the fair fame of the lamented dead but to lacerate the wounded feelings of his relatives?

Why was this decidedly unique collection called the "New Modern School," if not to appropriate one half of the title of the "New Method?" Why was it stated upon the title page that it contained "all that is original, important and valuable in Mr. Richardson's former works," if it were not to give the impression that it was a later work by Mr. Richardson than the "New Method?" Why were the illustrations used in the "New Method" imitated, and even the new feature of "Amusements" copied, if not to deceive the purchasers into the belief that it was the "New Method?" Why was the name of Mr. Richardson placed in conspicuous characters upon the title-page of the "New Modern School" if not to give the impression that he was the compiler? And to cap the climax of ingenuity and deception, why was the portrait of Mr. Richardson placed in the book in seeming respect of the illustrious dead, if not to give the work a currency which it could not otherwise obtain, and thus, by the appearance of doing him honor, endeavor to deprive his widow of her only means of support?

In the publication of the "New Modern School" an unscrupulousness has been manifested which is perfectly marvellous to observe. The "Modern School" was recommended to the public by a host of composers and teachers of the first class, consisting of Thalberg, Knorr, Breyschock, Otto Dresel, J. G. Webb, the Masons, Trenkle, etc.

Messrs. R. & T. seem to consider that these names having been once obtained by Mr. Richardson in the approval of his first work, are lawful property, and may be used with impunity for any dish which circumstances may induce them to serve up. The names of these well known and respected parties have been paraded not only in the advertisements of the "New Modern School," but in that classic morceau itself, in the most audacious manner. Even the oft reiterated "caution" of Messrs. R. & T. which failed to explain why the "New Modern School" was palmed off as the last work of Mr. Richardson embraces these names. Probably the "New Modern School" has not been seen by these gentlemen, else in justice to themselves, if not from sympathy for the lamented Mr. Richardson and his widow, they would have insisted upon the withdrawal of their names.

While soothed with the flattering unction attributed by Messrs. R. & T. as the means whereby the "New Method" has been so thoroughly successful, we must deny the soft impeachment, and insist that, if by their published acknowledgements, the "Modern School" was deserving of high encomium, it is reasonable to suppose that the maturer judgment of years, larger experience, the advice of the wisest teachers, and the knowledge of the short comings of the "Modern School" should have admirably fitted Mr. Richardson for the task of preparing a work that stamps his name with honor, and entitles him to the lasting gratitude of teachers and pupils.

The real cause of all this discussion—these attacks upon the defenceless, lies in a nut shell. The "Modern School"—the abridgment of the same, and the grand compilation named the "New Modern School" are unsaleable, while the chef d'œuvre of Mr. Richardson, the "NEW METHOD" has become the standard work of Pianoforte instruction throughout the country.

OLIVER DITSON & CO.

LUTHER was a lover of music, and has himself written a treatise on the art, as also several highly melodious songs. It is to this circumstance he owes his surname of the Swan of Esleben; but there are certain compositions of his which prove him any thing but the gentle swan, in which he rouses the spirit of his followers, and excites himself to the wildest ardour. The songs with which he made his entrance into Worms, followed by his companions, is a genuine war-song.

The old Cathedral trembled at the unwonted sounds, and the crows rose affrighted from their murky nests on the summit of its towers. This hymn (the "Marseillaise" of the reformation) has maintained, up to the present day, its energetic influence; and, perhaps at no very distant period, we may shout in similar contests these old sonorous and iron-clad words—

"God is our refuge and strength," &c.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

O take me to thy heart again. M. W. Balfe. 25
A very pretty new ballad.

Captain Kidd. Ballad. 25

A song of olden times, lately revived by the Old Folks' troupes, particularly Father Kemp's.

The Star at Home. R. S. Taylor. 25

Flowers from foreign lands. L. W. More. 25

Simple and melodious songs.

Instrumental Music.

On yonder rock, from "Fra Diavolo," 4 hands. Beyer. 15

March from "Moses in Egypt." " 15

Hear me Norma, from "Norma." " 15

Market Chorus, from "Masaniello." " 13

Little hand pieces useful for instruction. The melodies are of the very prettiest, such as are most likely to be caught by the young, untrained ear of the pupil.

Overture to Egmont. Beethoven. 50

An overture which will probably never disappear from the repertoire of orchestral societies. It has proved one of the most popular of Beethoven's. The piano arrangement is full and effective, yet but moderately difficult.

Salut a la France. Four hands. Beyer. 15

Air in "I Capuletti." " " 15

Air in "Belisario." " " 15

Short and pretty. Written for the assistance of teachers. They are sweetmeats for pupils in the second quarter.

La Prière d'une vierge, (Maiden's Prayer.) Varied by Chas. Grobe. 50

Since the air of this sparkling piano piece has found so many admirers it may be predicted that the same in a new, elegant and richly ornamented dress, prepared by the popular Grobe, will be highly successful.

Annie Laurie. Impromptu. J. S. Drake. 25

A short, but very brilliant arrangement of this favorite air.

Books.

ONE HUNDRED SONGS OF IRELAND. Words and Music. 50

A capital collection, including the best sentimental, patriotic, traditional and humorous Songs and Melodies of "the land of sweet Erin," and one that cannot fail to be heartily welcome to the tens of thousands who look over the waters to "that green isle 'mid the ocean" as the home of their earliest recollections. It is, undoubtedly, the most complete compilation of Irish songs, published in connection with Music, obtainable in this country. Amongst the number will be found several of Moore's best songs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 461.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 2, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 18.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

SACRED MUSIC.

IV.

FROM LOUIS IX. TO THE END OF THE 15TH CENTURY, 1226—1500.

We now come to the noblest period of the middle ages; that in which we find their fullest development—and their close. In fact the preceding epochs were but the preparation for this; in art the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were as the bud, flower and fruit of that chivalrous and marvellous period, when religious faith was the ruling power, and ennobled all sentiments, all hearts, all ideas and all works. How far removed was everything from the indifference, egotism and mercantile spirit of our days!

Its architecture gives to my feelings a perfect idea of the artistic development of that magnificent period. In the 13th century, the pure and simple Gothic with its pointed arch forms, which almost everywhere superseded the round Roman arch. In the 14th and 15th centuries the art blossomed, its ornaments became radiant and splendid, so, too, music plain and simple became figurative—counterpoint blossomed into many parts and the apogee of the scholastic vocal forms may be decidedly fixed at the end of the 15th, or, at the very latest, within the first half of the 16th century.

Let us, then, without disparaging Greek art, or denying the superiority of the forms of the antique, study with zeal and affection the precious remains of the middle ages, and we shall see that an epoch which gave us the sublime inventions of the mariner's compass, of gunpowder and printing, may, without fear, compete with our own, which has given us railroads, photography and the electric telegraph.

In the middle ages great men had the advantage of being eminent; while now specialities are carried to such an extreme as to cut off views of grand generalities and of the synthetic harmony of human knowledge. For instance, why have we no longer such church fathers, such men of universal learning as Dante, Thomas Aquinas and Pie de la Mirandole, who could compose theses on all subjects—de omni re scibili.

Knowledge did not separate itself from wisdom or become, as too often in our time, a mere pretentious varnish of erudition.

But a truce to general considerations, and return we to the sacred melodies most filled with divine inspiration. The office of the holy sacrament composed by Thomas Aquinas, by command of Pope Urban IV., is really a masterpiece; we know not which to admire most, the poetry or music; we bow before that gigantic composition, which already comes to us down the current of six centuries losing nothing of its splendor and majesty.

In the 16th century what more graceful than the Stabat mater of Jacopone? What more touching than the Prose in honor of St. Yves, composed by the blessed Charles de Blois, Duke of Brittany? What more delicious than the offices of the Presentation, Visitation, Transfiguration and Compassion of the Blessed Virgin, written by Philip Macerius, Raymond de Capoue, Jacques Gil and Jean Trithème.

The Rational, or manual of divine offices, by Guillaume Durand, Bishop of Mende, is a colossal liturgic Encyclopædia, which ran through no less than ninety-four editions, in the space of two centuries. This beautiful work now, for the first time translated from the Latin into French by Mr. Charles Barthelemy of Paris, has been published by Mr. Louis Vivés in six volumes, 8vo.

Guillaume Durand was born in 1230 at Puy-misson, in the diocese of Beziers. He began the study of the canon and civil law at Montpellier, and at the age of twenty-four closed his university course in Paris. Having received his doctor's degree, he became professor successively at Bologna, and Modena, and was present in 1274 as an actor in the 14th General Council, at Lyons. Having been papal Legate under Nicolas III., Martin IV., Honorius IV., and Boniface VIII., Durand was consecrated Bishop of Mende in the Cathedral at Clermont, May 16th, 1287. Three years previously he had finished the eight books of his Rational, in which he teaches that "such ceremonies of the church as are without meaning should be abolished." This work, a true summary, is a collection of all the more pure religious and artistic traditions. The learned Benedictine, Gueranger considers it as "the last words of the middle ages upon the mystical character of the ceremonies of divine worship." The first edition was finished at Mayence, Feb. 6, 1496, by J. Fust and P. Schaeffer (Gernzheim). This book, the first printed upon metallic types, varies in price from $200 to $650.

The most remarkable composers of this epoch, now but little known, are;

1. Jehannot Lescurel, of whom rondeaux in three parts are extant;
2. Guillaume de Machault, who composed among other things a mass executed at the coronation of Charles V. Two folio volumes by this author now exist in the Imperial Library in Paris; they contain about 80,000 verses, consisting of complaints, lays, ballads, chansons with music, &c.;
3. Eloy, who wrote in 1440 a mass in five parts, beginning with the words, Dixerunt Discipuli;
4. Guillaume Dufay, one of the first regular composers in that transition epoch, author of French chansons, motets, masses in four parts, &c.;
5. Busnois and Binchois, chapel masters of the Dukes of Burgogne, Philip the Good and Charles the Rash;
6. Ockeghem, a Belgian, pupil of Binchois and chapelmaster of Charles VII.;
7. Joan Cousin, of the chapel of Louis XI.;
8. Josquin Després, chapelmaster of Louis XII.

But corruption had crept in; the profane and sacred were mixed to a degree indecent and licentious. Pope John XXII. uttered the bull, Docta Sanctorum, the object of which was to call back church music to the simple, primitive chant and to punish those who abused the plain chant by small notes, sudden breaks, lewd songs and vulgar motets.

The principal didactic authors upon music of the 13th century were Marchetto of Padua, and Master Philip de Vitry in whose treatise we first find the celebrated plea for using sequences of perfect chords in direct motion, that is, the octave and the fifth. The 12th century offers us upon rhythmical music the works of Francon of Cologne, Elie Salomon, Imbert de France, and Jean de Muris, Doctor of the Sorbonne canon of the church at Paris and Rector of the University in 1350.

The Somme (summary) of Jean de Muris is a very curious view of the musical art of that epoch. His work is divided into twenty-three chapters, alternately in prose and verse. He cites Saints Ignatius, Ambrose, Gregory, Odon, Guido, Salomon and Hermann; he intersperses his work, moreover, with quotations from pagan authors, as Aristotle, Horace, Terence, &c. It has surprised us to find in Jean de Muris, the musical hand, which we now find used in the Method of Wilhelm; whence it appears that the practice of counting notes (or intervals?) upon the joints of the fingers is not a modern invention.

In the speculative part of his work, Muris speaks of the tetrachord of Mercury and Orpheus, and divides the monochord into 2, 3 and 4 parts, which give the octave, fifth and fourth. In his treatise on practical or rhythmical music, Jean de Muris explains of pauses and of simple, double or triple longs*. Finally, discussing music in parts, he treats of five species of prolationes—the maxime, the long, the breve, the semibreve and the minim. He defines the "perfect long" as a note measured in a single respiration (sub uno accentu) by the time of three breves, and the "imperfect long" equal in duration to two breves. After speaking upon this point, he explains the art of singing and develops his doctrine of musical proportions.

In the 15th century, appeared the treatises of Tinctorius and Adam of Fulda. In the work of the latter, finished on Friday, Nov. 5, 1490, is to be seen the figure of our double crochet (?) called at that period semifusa. But the theatre had already come into existence with the Mysteries represented by the Brotherhood of the Passion M. Danjou has published in his Revue de musique religieuse, a Mystery of Daniel, with notes, which we trace back to the 13th century, and M. Fetis cites the Jeu de Robin et de Marion as the most ancient comic opera known. Its author was Adam de la Hale, surnamed le Bossu d'Arras, who was born about 1240 and died about 1286. We shall develop in the next paper the question of the origin of the modern theatre, which coincides with the discovery of the chord of the seventh and the dominant, attributed by M. Féti's to the composer, Monteverde.

* The ancient square notes called longas or longs as opposed to the breves, or shorts,—of which we still retain a few.

Be this as it may, before entering upon the history of the modern art, let us say a last word upon the serious and beautiful liturgic music, which is older and the mother of all other. Let us not forget that Christian religious music is higher and more noble than any other branch of the art, since it raises our hearts and minds to the author of every good gift.

Too often, alas! theatrical music excites instead of moderating the passions, and is therefore perhaps dangerous to minds frivolous and sensual in character. Let us not forget the precept of the apostle Paul, who enjoins us to "be filled with the Spirit, speaking to ourselves in psalms, hymns and spiritual songs." This recommendation, addressed by the apostle to the Ephesians, he repeated to the Corinthians and Colossians, because he knew the efficacy of religious songs to fill our hearts with divine grace, with the love of God and our neighbor, a precept which, according to Christ, fulfils all the law and the prophets. Like St. Paul, Tertullian, Eusebius and St. Clement of Alexandria recommended the employment of music in the church; heretics even employed it as a means of propagating their errors, and the council of Antioch put the religious song of Paul of Samosata into the Index. The Council of Laodicea even sanctioned the practice of singing unauthorized canticles in church.

Meantime melodies inspired by the Christian spirit appeared still from time to time. The Stabat mater, already mentioned, as well as the Dies Irae, was attributed to various authors, and the Salve Regina has been considered the work of Hermann Contract, Peter de Momoro, Adhemar, Bishop of Puy, and even of St. Bernard. Arevalus and Daniel have published collections of precious Spanish and German hymns; it is to be desired that France should produce a methodical collection of all which belongs to her.

But already satires had multiplied and given birth to the theatre. Gantier de Châtillon wrote verses against the prelates; Peter de Vignes pointed out the disorders of the hierarchy; Thomas a Becket stigmatized the Simonites. These essays all tended to form a Christian theatre, in which vice was censured but to reform abuses. Before going into details upon this interesting topic, let us remark, that the first grand liturgic drama was, undoubtedly the sacrifice of the mass, repeated daily in commemoration of the sacrifice of blood on Calvary. Nothing is so grand (to a Roman Catholic) in fact, as the simple dialogue and the mutual confession, which forms the introduction to the most sublime of mysteries. Who can show us anything more touching than the Kyrie, that plain song of repentance and hope; more joyous than the Gloria, that real canticle of the angels; more solemn than the Credo, more humble than the Offertory, more elevating than the Sanctus, or sweeter than the Agnus and the Communion? How beautiful a subject for a great musician! but to equal it, he must have both faith and genius — and these qualities are rare in all eras.

Madame Bisaccianti, though she sings at a cheap concert saloon in California, receives, it is said, a prima donna's salary of not less than $50 per week.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Diarist in Paris.

PARIS, Dec. 28, 1860.

I have been to hear the Trovatore at the Italian Opera. It is a good thing to hear Trovatore at the Italian opera if one must undergo it. There were Mario and Alboni, and Rosa Peneo, and Graziani for singers—and how gloriously they sang—and what abominable trash they had to sing!

"But, Mr. Correspondent, the public judges otherwise." Indeed then I am wrong. I do not like yellow-covered novels of blood and thunder—but they sell enormously. Of course I am wrong again.

Peneo with a delicious organ, is wiggle-voiced, so that she afforded me but very little pleasure; but oh! Mario and Alboni! Those pure, flowing, grand tones—when Verdi gave any opportunity for them to employ them! 'Tis wonderful. The Alboni sort of voice is of all the most charming to me. The deep full tones are so full of feeling—so passionate—they flow down into the heart so luxuriantly. Do you remember Angri's singing the Ah mio figlio, from the Prophets? That is one of my musical experiences, which never grew old, and which I never forget. The stuff which Mario and Alboni had to sing in Trovatore is so commonplace and flat, that I could give myself up to the mere charm of their voices, and surely that is an immense gratification, if only indulged in occasionally. Think of Alboni's voice in Gluck's Orpheus—if she would only sing it once!

I never heard Mario before and whether he was in good or bad voice, I do not know,—but Titchachek at Dresden is the only tenor I have heard, who approaches him.

Graziani is a very fine baritone—but is a stick of an actor. The opera house is not very large. It is very beautiful and well fitted for sound. The stage appointments, the scenery, and orchestra very fine. The audience talking, now and then humming the airs and melodies in your ears, exclaiming and fussing generally is abominable. So much for this.

Doubtless in the older volumes of the Journal of Music will be found recorded at divers times and in sundry manners, the fact that at Berlin young men who receive prizes in any of the arts, receive them in the form of a small annuity, to enable them to travel for improvement two or three years. This is a thing, which I wish to "keep before the people" in the hope that sometime or other some rich, heirless bachelor, or somebody else may leave a fund for the aid of musical students. Something of the sort exists here, and I turn to my pleasant feuilleton in the Opinion Nationale, to give you what M. Azevedo says about the musical prize just won, the work which won it, and the young man who is to have it. I like the man's ideas—if you do not—answer them or omit them, as you will.

He says:—

If there was any demand for them, we might have in France a multitude of new composers and any quantity of new music; we need no other proof this than M. Paladille, whose piece has come upon the stage of the Grand Opera after receiving the first prize of the Institute, commonly called the Roman Prize (prix de Rome). That composer is only sixteen years of age.

And first we ought to applaud with all our might the resolution taken to perform M. Paladille's cantata at the opera. Its execution on a grand stage and before a large audience is true encouragement, is giving real opportunity for gaining knowledge, is the best reward to a composer. But so excellent a thing must not be an exceptional favor, an ephemeral thing. It must become a regular institution, and annually the prize-work be given to the public on the stage.

We have too often and too distinctly said, that only an invasion of the musical realm by a great force of new composers and vernal compositions, can prove a remedy for that snoring lethargy, so much like death, in which we see music with us gradually sinking and dying—to be misunderstood in what we are about to say. No one can sincerely accuse us of wishing to cast prospective shadows over the pleasures of a young composer of sixteen years, rejoicing in the twofold approval of the Institute and the public; nevertheless both for his own interest and that of his fellow-students, we introduce here certain reflections and questions:

"—— Il faut parler
Il faut en se moment si flatteur et si doux,
Si d'angereux pent etre
Qu'un fils de l'Institut apprenne tuo connaître!"

Now after this twofold success what is M. Paladille going to do? According to custom and proverb he is going to Rome? What can he learn there? What will he do? Well he will hear the singing of castrati. But he might have that pleasure without quitting Paris. He will learn that music is taught better here than anywhere else,* he will do just what his predecessors have done, and that is mighty little!

When institutions are founded, there are always excellent reasons why they should exist. And it is just for this that they are founded. But when after two centuries nothing save the institutions themselves remains unchanged, it would be a miracle if they now fulfilled the intentions of the founders.

When Louis XIV. established a French academy at Rome, music so to speak had no existence, with us; Lulli, to get his singers to keep time was obliged to beat the measure upon the floor with a heavy cane. One day he unluckily hit his own foot, wounded it, gangrene ensued and he died of the injury. In those days the art both of tone and rhythm, transformed by the discovery of Claude Monteverde flourished in Italy in prodigious splendor. To draw the pure water from the abundant and limpid fountain was the dictate of good sense, the right of genius, to say all in one word, was but reasonable. But it is at least useless to pour out such water upon desert sands, and for this purpose to undertake long, expensive journeys.

In the Rome of to-day there is no theatre which can compare with our Italian Opera, no orchestra which can compete even with ours of the second rank, no school approaching our conservatory in excellence. A musician then educated in Paris can learn nothing there.

But still the eternal assertion remains, "Travelling forms youth." Well no doubt it does form it. Change of place, seeing, comparing are good for anybody; but while our young prize composers are seeking inspiration from the marvels of nature and the plastic arts, they lose their ties with and their props in the musical world at home, that Ariadne's thread which in vile prose is called the routine of the workshop, and when they come back they find in Paris monuments of which all Greek, Roman, Byzantine, Florentine, Gothic architecture could never lead them to expect the existence,—that is to say, theatres, which have for singers and the public "practicable" doors, "opening or shutting" as the leases have it, while for composers they have doors painted on the wall against which they can break their heads, happen they to attempt to pass through.

* In which we do not agree with Mr. [Azevedo, by any means.

Now, clearly, there is no use in spending three years in ecstasies before the frescos of Michael Angelo and the Madonnas of Raphael to gain ability to contemplate a bit of scene painting for the rest of life.

If there is really a desire to raise up composers, there is, we repeat, but one way of doing so; and that is to enable them to make themselves heard often and under favorable condition. No one can become a good swimmer out of the water.

In hearing the cantata of M. Paladilhe, it is hardly possible to believe it the work of so young a man, so much experience and skill are revealed. A few harmonies rather strained, occasional or orchestral effects rather forced, are the only blemishes which his school have left remaining. The recitatives are all easy of declamation, and the melodies free and singable if not very original. The horn solo in the introduction, the Russian air sung by M. Michot, the phrase in the middle of the duet, and the trio are the brilliant points in this short work, in which here and there among the energetic effects which the subject demands, we hear passages striking for their grace.

Taking Ivan IV. for what it really is, namely, a sample card of its young author's talents, we may infer that he will be no less at home in the opera comique than in the Grand Opera. And now, just starting for Rome if he dared, he would reply to the offer of paying for this journey, what one of Henri Monnier's characters said upon an invitation to dinner, "I should much rather receive my part in money." So, M. Paladilhe would above all things like to remain upon the scene of this his first success and continue his career without interruption. But the rule commands, he must obey. We wish then this young man, who some day may take his place among the masters of the French school, a happy voyage and a prompt return. Above all we wish him upon his return a more generous and encouraging hospitality than that which his predecessors have obtained for their works.

From all which, good friends of the Journal, we may conclude that in this man's opinion, the heaven of Paris is not quite the Elysium for young composers which some have represented it to be; and that Southard is not the only man who at home can find no chance of producing a Scarlet Letter or an Osmano.

A certain Monsieur Wekerlin produced at a concert in the Italian opera house (Dec. 19,) one of those musical hybrids, or in this case perhaps, better amphibia, called odes symphoniques, this particular one being Les Poemes de la Mer.

My jolly Frenchman begins his notice of it with a story. Some ten years ago, says he, Eugene Lepoittevin, the fine marine painter, having just finished a house at Etretat on the sea shore, determined to have a house-warming—a sort of picnic and invited a pretty large company of friends of both sexes. For the purpose of regulating the details of the festival, he called a preliminary meeting of the company, at which the following resolutions passed:—

1. That each should furnish his or her own candle.

2. That each should furnish one dish.

3. That the dishes should be determined by lot, in order to avoid the inconveniences of too much of one thing, not enough of another and the like. So next day the lots were drawn. Fortune, often so malicious, played no very bad trick upon the author of the lines; at first the roast ducks, it was thought, fell to him; but it proved to be a mistake in reading the card, and he was let off with his fright, and the furnishing of the kidney beans a la crème.

Madame Dorus Gras the great songstress drew the coffee. This was certainly rather an unlucky lot for her, as she had no coffee service except a small travelling pot just large enough for a single cup. But pains and patience conquer the greatest difficulties; our amiable companion by thirty-two several boilings discharged her obligations, and with coffee so perfect that the recollection remains among our cherished memories.

Madame Anicet-Bourgeois had the tarts and and to M. Pingret the Medal Engraver, fell the roast beef (roasts-beef, the printer has it here.) This roast beef, a huge piece, had its comical adventures; the head cook at the hotel, had so carefully hidden it in his oven, for fear of its being stolen by his understrappers, that when it was called for, no one could find it; however, about the middle of the dessert, all at once it appeared—a little too much done perhaps and curiously shrunk.

Finally, the fish fell to the part of our bard, Eugene Lepoittevin. This rejoiced all of us greatly, for in fishing ports, it is hardly possible to get fish; we can only enjoy the odor. The fishermen are hardly ashore before their booty is on its way to Paris. But our painter had made himself the friend, sponsor, crony, counselor, and benevolent giver of old clothes to all the fishermen in the place, and could therefore be sure of obtaining the desired fish. He was safe enough, where all the rest of the world might have run aground.

It came, the day of the grand repast, and we took our seats at a table, lighted with 32 candles of which 28 were extinguished a moment afterwards by a gust of wind strong enough to displace the bundle of hay, which filled a window provisionally, while awaiting the good offices of a glazier. The candles being relighted and the bundle of hay restored to its place, then and there was served that fish, which we owed to the munificence and decisive influence and decisive influence of Eugene Lepoittevin. And such a fish! Good heavens! Pliny and Daubenton never described its like. Cuvier alone in his hypothetical descriptions of lost species, could have conceived a fish of such length and thickness. All the colors of the rainbow, and a multitude of others showed resplendent upon its scales. It was a more extraordinary animal than the famous bear of Lagingeole. Never in the days of Nero did the ancient circuses resound to the plaudits so uproarious as the prodigious shouts with which we hailed this prodigious fish. When our admiring excitement had somewhat subsided, the owner of an oyster park, as one, who ought to know more in matters pertaining to fish, offered to divide and serve the dish. His face was radiant with delight at the opportunity of dissecting so rare a specimen. Rising the fish-slice with a magisterial air he said, "Trust me, this fish will prove as fine as it is large, for I feel no bones." He raised a slice of the fish. But what a change in his face—what a catastrophe—for the slice slipping from the knife, fell upon the table and flew into a thousand pieces! Then and not till then, we discovered that the famous fish was of clay, which the skillful Lepoittevin, unable to obtain the real thing, had modelled and painted with perfection sufficient to deceive anybody.

But give us some account of the Poemes de la Mer, cry our impatient readers.

Softly, gentlemen, that is just what we are going to do. As Lepoittevin's fish had the form and colors of a real one, so the Poemes de la Mer have the forms and colors of a true ode-symphony—but within it they are all clay. The substantials, such as invention, originality, inspiring melody, just expression, and real description, are all wanting perchance, we declare with all humility, that we could not perceive them.

Do you want proofs? Well, here are a few. The author makes us hear a revery—to which the vocal part is made up of the same one note, constantly repeated. The accompaniment to this is varied to the limits of possibility, and is sufficiently ingenious, we admit; but a revery is an indeterminate succession of vagrant ideas; and can this be expressed in a song of one note? Why it is perseverance, or rather obstinacy, which one would express in this manner. A fixed light would hardly give one an idea of a shooting star. The "Rising of the Waves" is a continuous crescendo; but waves have a habit of changing every moment. To imitate them, one should write a multitude of crescendos periodically interrupted and constantly renewed—and not a single and unvarying movement. "Sunshine on the Sea" closes with a sort of fugue; is this a formula to express the setting of the sun? Why this closes with a forcible movement, when certainly a decrescendo is the only means of imitating musically the sinking of the star-of-day. If not, what does the composer mean by his fugue? We know not; but for our part we never saw the least analogy between the sun and the fugue.

We will not pursue this matter farther; choosing to add that the "Song of the Cabin Boy" very sweetly sung by Mlle. Balbi, and the "Promenade" a sort of a barcarole lullaby, sung by Felix Levy, very sympathetically, were encored.

This experiment, unluckily a very costly one to M. Wekerlin, cannot be without its value to him. The manner in which the audience evidently favorably disposed, took the more ambitious parts of the work, and the great applause bestowed upon some pieces hardly up to the romances of an album, show him clearly the path he should follow in future. By not looking too high, and by shunning the path of that artist so difficult to follow, Felicien David, this gentleman with his undoubted aptitude for arrangement and orchestration may find good employment for his talents.

Rather plain speaking, this; but I have not heard that M. Wekerlin has taken up the pen like our new men in Germany, to prove the critic wrong, and that people must and shall like his music, in spite of their ears.

Last week was given at the Grand Opera the 400th performance of Rossini's Tell!

At the Bouffes they have not yet withdrawn the burlesque Orpheus, which has reached now about 340 representations.

Wednesday, Dec. 19, Joseph Wieniawski, gave a concert at the Salle Pleyel. Mendelssohn's Trio for Pianoforte violin and 'cello in D minor, with the exquisite Scherzo—which is not a reproduction of the Summer Night's Dream Scherzo, was the leading piece. A sonata, waltzes and other like pieces for the pianoforte, composed and played by Wieniawski, and some airs and songs made up the rest of the programme.

W. is a little fellow, hardly larger than Mozart in person, certainly not as a composer. The sonata was dreary—the smaller pieces lively and pretty. As a pianist, he ranks high, though not to my notion up to Rubinstein, Thalberg and Dreyschock.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Ludwig von Beethoven's Life and Works.

BY ADOLF BERNHARD MARX.

Translated from Dr. F. Brendel's Review, by G. A. Schmitt.

(Continued from page 340.)

It was, after BACH, Beethoven's work, to develop ideal expression on the piano, to free the tones from the limitations of the republican orchestra, to unite the world of tones in all its harmonious fullness under the monarchical rule of the piano-player. But it is a well-known fact, that great players learned just by studying Beethoven's piano works to give the right coloring to the works of the Leipzig maestro. Opus 1 of Beethoven's works consists of three Trios for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, compositions that will remain fresh forever. HAYDN did not think the third one in C minor suitable for publication. Posterity nullified that opinion. Just this Trio we like best. "The close of the Finale," says Marx, "has in it something like delicate clouds, like a veil of mist. Does not, in the first movement and in the first theme of the Finale, Beethoven decidedly show already the Faust-like character of a number of his later works? We have to forego following in a dry review, the masterly analyses, which Marx gives of a number of works from the latter years of the last century. We pass by Beethoven's unhappy love for the countess Julia Guicciardi, and the Sonata quasi una Fantasia in C sharp minor, op. 27, No. 2, breathing forth his sufferings from love. Of the fate that struck him with hardness of hearing, increasing with the years, we shall speak below, and we turn now to his first two Symphonies. According to Marx's opinion, the first Symphony in C major, op. 21, was written about 1799 or 1800. From the outset Beethoven enlists new troops for his symphonic triumphal processions. "While Beethoven's great predecessors are satisfied without oboes or clarinettes, Beethoven makes use of them from the beginning; to this basis are added afterwards, where it is necessary, trombones, piccolo flutes and the serpent (a large wooden bass instrument), also the big drum. That is Beethoven's orchestra," (p. 213). Thus armed the master marches forth to battle. It is a different banner, decidedly, from that of MOZART, that waves over the regiments of his scores, and only a prejudiced opinion could discover in the C major Symphony nothing but a clever study after the model of Mozart. Oulibicheff, quick at comparisons, as all the people of the salons, finds the prototype for Beethoven's work in Mozart's C major (Jupiter) Symphony. Marx proves incontrovertibly, that besides the key of the beginning, C major, both works have not the least relation as to ideas. It is sufficient to compare the beginning of both works as Marx quotes them:

Allegro con brio. BEETHOVEN.

Allegro vivace. MOZART.

"Just here," says Marx, and every one of his readers will agree with him, "Mozart is farthest from Beethoven, consider only the artless playing with contrasts of Mozart, and the compact energy of Beethoven." It deserves praise, that Marx defends this Symphony against those that would underrate it. We should but little honor the memory of Beethoven by making light of the beauties of his earlier works, because afterwards he created mightier ones. Though it is Beethoven's own fault, he having so lavishly poured forth gigantic works on us. In his Grand Symphony in D major, op. 36, he already rises above his preceding work. We need not quote the ALLEGRO CON BRIO, conscious of victory, nor the sweet chiar-oscuro of the Larghetto. Here is a longing for love, transfigured by sweet moonlight, German and truly poetic, a fullness to overflowing of rapture and pain of love. Every one hears, we dare say, like Marx, in the Finale the words, "the matter is settled, over, victoriously ended." And what a climax in the close of the Finale, this welling up again of the tones before the pause, and the endless jubilee of the close! Beethoven's biographer closes with the analysis of this symphony his first book, comprising the time from 1770—1804. We now enter the realms of the Eroica.

A New Crotchet.

"VANITY FAIR," is the only comic paper that approaches in any way to the famous "PUNCH," that has yet been published in this country. "Vanity Fair" is often equal both in pictorial illustration and in the real wit of its articles, to its London prototype. The last number has an article under the above heading, upon the text that "Music is the food of Love," showing that, as we have but five musicians to about every hundred people, the supply is wretchedly inadequate to the demand. The writer then gives samples of a simple system of learning music, "of furnishing one's own love food." Probably our own enlightened readers will not be very much puzzled by wind was blowing from the when JOHN and MARY climbed the that crossed their path. JOHN, leaning on his , descended the hill, and managed to reach the early, but MARY slipped, and came down by the Falling down precipice, she hurt her arm, which began to and JOHN cried from above, "You'd better not that experiment!" He then procured a and drew her up the side of the precipice, where they both sat down to .

LESSON I.

The insuperable advantages of my New Method have so firmly impressed me, that I believe the time will yet come when whole novels will be written in this manner, and will give the reader as much pleasure from their musical as from their literary character. Think of a romance, the heroine of which should always be introduced with a plaintive minor melody, while her lover—the hero—should make, with every word, a sweet and rotund base to her harmonious life! I have partly finished a book of musical fables, beginning with BLUEBEARD, set in the Key of B. The Key is of course, the fatal one, and B stands for the tyrant's name. I succeeded excellently in explaining the Sensitive Seventh, in this little book, by means of the story of the Old Man with Seven Sons, six of whom were bold, brazen fellows, and the other, a timid, retiring youth. The work, however, fell through, in consequence of my inability to find a noble illustrative of the Tetrachord.

Another kind of exercise, adapted to the study of orthography, is as follows:

Who would think that this little melody, so touching and plaintive, possesses an inner meaning! Yet, read the notes, as they come. The first bar is A. The second, D E A F. The third B A B E! A deaf Babe! No wonder the air is sad. But how infinitely more touching it becomes, by playing D, instead of F, at the close of the second bar!

Why is it that this simple score excites such disgust? Read it and see!

A B A D E G G. Enough, in faith to disgust anybody. And here is an instance of combination, which I consider one of the finest pieces of culinary music ever composed. Try this air gently on the piano, and see what a gusto it has!

The harmony off E G G and B E E F, changing from base to treble, is delicious, and the F E D, in unison at the end, comes in charmingly. How appropriate, too is the Rest that terminates this exercise!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 2, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha," Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

[The following letter from Mr. Dwight should have preceded the one published in our last number, but having, in some way miscarried, must appear at this time.]

NEW SERIES.

NO. IV.

A WEEK IN DRESDEN.

BERLIN, Dec. 10, 1860.

Dresden! the beautiful. Lucky stars beckoned the wanderer that way in those last days of October—those sad, golden days. It was a deviation from the programme, and a new postponement of long needed rest. The week in Leipzig was a passive opportunity availed of on the way to Berlin, whither one looked forward to some sort of settled life and centre for the winter, whence long excursions could be made from time to time to Leipzig, Dresden, and the other spots where music has her choice temples. But rest is neither found by seeking nor by shunning. Nor is it always well to cleave to any plan or purpose as if our own will were destiny. There are times when a higher power, mysterious, doubtless all-wise, assumes the whole control of all our movements, and we can but be passive, aspiring to no greater virtue than a childlike trust, a patient faith that all is ordered for the best. Drifting, drifting, under a cloud apparently, and without compass; but sometimes into some little haven, where, as it was the traveller's experience this time, there is yet peace and sunshine to be felt, with zest of companionship, yea friendship—besides solid furtherance to one's main purpose in a European journey. For those four months of roving had been only incidental; the real motive of the journey was to pass a musical winter in Germany, that, enriched by its experiences, he might be fitter for his work. Did he not owe it to himself, to Art, to the position which he occupied as editor of this Journal of Music, to know music and the musical life, by direct observation, in the most musical country? And here now he reads one evening in the Zeitung, which he happens to take up while yet fresh from the Gewandhaus Concert, with the wild Schumann harmonies (the "Manfred" music) ringing in the brain, that on the morrow evening two of the noblest interpreters of the noblest in German Art, whom more than any two perhaps he wishes to hear and know, and to whose fame the readers of this Journal are not strangers, would commence a series of three musical soirées in the Hotel de Saxe at Dresden. Is it not enough to say that these were CLARA SCHUMANN AND JOACHIM!

It is but four hours by the railroad. So off we start in the cold, foggy morning, seeing nothing nor caring much to see, while whirled across those flat, uninteresting battle plains that stretch beyond Leipzig. A white, dry fog; there is a sense of promise in it; and by the middle of the forenoon the warm sun glows through, revealing through a hazy and poetic atmosphere, a picturesque succession of red-roofed towns, and little vine-clad hills (northernmost region of the grape this!), with pretty glimpses of the Elbe sparkling across green fields, and, beckoning in the distance, the domes and spires and palaces of Dresden. At noon we cross the stone bridge, over the swift, broad river that comes sweeping round through "Saxon Switzerland," whose hazy purple outline already tempts you on the far horizon,—the blue Elbe cradled in Bohemia—and enter the stately cheerful city, and are soon housed in the pleasant hotel in which the concert is to be. Seated at the table d'hôte, there is a vacant chair beside us. Presently a sense of somebody entering and asking for somebody; and somebody introducing himself with cordial hand-grasp, and sorry to have been engaged in rehearsal when our letter was sent in, and "shall we talk German or English?" (of course we choose the latter), has taken the vacant seat, and we are in full tide of eager conversation, as clear to one another as old friends, and in instant rapport on most topics of most interest to both. We talk of the "Diarist," whom he knows and esteems; of music, from Bach to Wagner, of the first of whom he is one of the truest exponents, entering into the very spirit of him, while he can afford to admire much in the latter; of Art, mutually pleased to find that each has been thinking of Kaulbach as a sort of Meyerbeer in painting. We talk of Emerson, of whom he is a warm admirer, familiar with all his writings, and delighting in such free, quickening mountain air of thought; of America, whose generous idea and destiny he understands and has interest and faith, more than I have found before in Germany; of England, and the rival musical critics, Davison and Chorley, both of whom he esteems, and Macfarren more than either; of what music has to offer me in Leipzig and in Berlin, in Dresden and Vienna, and in his own Hanover; of Schumann and his noble artist widow; of Liszt at Weimar, and of his partie in Germany, and what not.

Our companion is a strong, broad-shouldered, manly looking fellow, of two or three years under thirty; with a massive, overhanging brow, Beethoven-like; a heavy mass of rich dark hair; large grey earnest eyes; pale face, full of intellect, of firm will and genial good feeling; a certain gleam of genius in those eyes; a somewhat knotted habit of the brows, as from intense concentrated brain-work, and a strongly marked, almost severe look when the face is in repose; but quickly lit up with glad recognition, or softened with tender sympathies; the sunshine of a cordial, generous, social nature breaks out in an instant from those eyes. Decidedly a strong, fresh, wholesome individuality; generous and sunshiny; full of friendliness; moody withal, and capable of feeling bored; high-toned, brave, and genial, both in our English sense of hearty, and in the German and artistic sense, implying imaginative, creative energy—the adjective of genius. A large and catholic view of men and things; and a strong character. You do not often find all these traits in a virtuoso; and this is no mere virtuoso; this young man is JOSEPH JOACHIM; who, though his chief medium has been the violin, has made himself more known and deeply felt by a certain magnetism of genius and of character that works behind all that.

And now—begging our friend's pardon for thus unceremoniously and bunglingly attempting his portrait—let us leave him to the drudgery of putting on strings, while we talk a walk on the Brühl terrace along the Elbe, over the bridge and back, and by the the royal palaces and church and theatre, coming unexpectedly upon the newly erected bronze statue of Weber by the way; and back to the hotel to find ourselves in the evening in the pretty concert-saal, where are assembled all the beauty and refinement of Dresden musical society, awaiting the beginning of the first concert. It is a small hall, holding perhaps from six to seven hundred persons, and is completely full. This is the only regular concert hall in Dresden, strange to say; and even the symphony concerts of the fine large orchestra, which Rietz directs, have to be given here. Here is the programme:

1. Sonata (D minor, Op. 121) for piano and violin played by the concert givers.....Schumann
2. Cavatina, from the "Swiss Family,".....Weigl
3. Ballade (G minor), piano, played by Clara Schumann.....Chopin
4. Allegro brillante, 4 hands, by Fr. Marie Wieck and Mme. Schumann.....Mendelssohn
5. Sonata for Violin, by Joachim.....Tartini
6. 3 Lieder: a "Im Freien".....Schubert b "Schneeglöckchen" }
c "Er ist's" }.....Schumann
7. Sonata (A minor, Op. 23), for piano and violin...Beethoven

Of the first piece, as a composition, I can hardly venture to speak after a single hearing and at this distance of time. It certainly interested me much, and impressed me with that sense of depth and power and passion, with passages of playful fancy of quite exquisite individuality, that Robert Schumann almost always gives me. But it was one of his latest and by no means clearest works. It is a high and worthy mission which Madame SCHUMANN takes upon her, of interpreting to the world, through her wonderfully perfect pianism, so genial and so classical, the, as yet but poorly understood and undervalued creations of her talented husband's genius. Of her I can speak, for the impression is distinct; how could it fail to be. She has the look, the air and manner of the true artist and the noble woman. Her face is full of sensibility and intellect; large dark eyes, full of rich light, and lips that always quiver with the exquisite sense of music. A large broad forehead, and head finely shaped, with rich black hair. The profile is just that of the twin medallion portrait which represents her with her husband; but the face and head are wider than that had suggested to me, and indicate a greater weight and breadth of character. The features are in constant play, lit with enthusiasm, as if the music never ceased. Her technique as a pianist is beautifully smooth, clean and perfect; she has mastered all that years ago under the severe but admirable teaching of the old Wieck, her father. There is an inexhaustible energy in her playing, when she deals with the strong tone-poets such as Beethoven; you miss none of their fire and grandeur. I never heard more sustained nobility of play, nor more facile, nor more finely finished. But such an artist does not play to exhibit her own skill; but to bring out and present in all their individuality, in just the right light, the beauties she discerns and feels in those creations of the masters which are worthy of such illustration and will live. She is a thorough musician; has a clear and true conception of all the classics, the inspired tone-poems of the piano; and an equal contempt for all trivial or weakly sentimental show-pieces; to the performance of mere operatic fantasias, and the like, she never condescends. Mere brilliancy is nothing; she knows the real gem from the bit of glass that also sparkles in the sun. Her thorough acquaintance with her memory of all the principal sonatas, trios, &c., of Beethoven and other masters is remarkable; in the rehearsals her memory often is the test to which the correctness of differing editions of the parts is referred. I have heard no more satisfactory rendering of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart or Haydn. Of Schumann's music she is of course the interpreter.

The Ballade of Chopin, and all that I have heard her play of him, were most admirably executed by her, especially the brilliant side of Chopin; but I would not dare to say that I had never heard the peculiar individuality and fineness of that poet par excellence of the piano brought out with a more intimate and sympathetic truthfulness. Altogether CLARA SCHUMANN seems to me the noblest, truest type of the artistic woman that I have known, with the exception of Jenny Lind. Not that she has the same force of genius, or the same all-conquering magnetism. Without magnetism, of course, a great singer were inconceivable. But she has the same artistic feeling and entire devotion to the pure ideal. She is a living impersonation of the artist conscience, aided by rare native faculties and rare educational experiences. She is gifted alike with sharp, discriminating insight, and with unflinching enthusiasm. Some think she has not so much warmth as critical correctness. But she is a woman, large-hearted, loving, full of sensibility, as well as a skilled, clear-sighted, critical musician. Her art is religion to her; relates itself to the very ideal end of life. If she has not creative genius, if she does not compose, if she gives readings, no one can doubt the fervor with which she loves her authors, nor the deep genuine joy with which she reproduces them.

It surely was a privilege, and not a shade of disappointment in it, to sit there and hear sonata-duos of Schumann and Beethoven rendered by those two large-brained artists. They have played much together, sympathise in tastes and principles, maintain the same uncompromising attitude of loyalty to truth in Art, agree in their conceptions of what they play together, are equally above all drawbacks of uncertain skill, and so are perfectly sure of one another in what they undertake. It is rarely that such artists meet in any work.

Of JOACHIM'S playing one owns first of all its magnetic, searching, quickening quality. It is not a violin, but a man that speaks. There is a feeling of depth and breadth conveyed in what he does. He draws the largest and most marrowy tones out of his strings that we have ever heard. There is force of character in every sound; and yet the most subtle, fluid modulation through all shades of feeling, the tenderest as well as the strongest. And nothing seems dramatically got up for mere effect; it all comes so natural, so real that you yield yourself entirely to the music, and never think to analyze, to mark just what is done. It is alike full of passion and of self-possession; strong emotion and repose. We have heard that Sonata of Tartini, with the trillo del diavolo, finely played before; but never did it present itself in half so vivid colors as when he played it. In Joachim's playing I never thought to notice in what particular technical feats or qualities he shone, or how he compared in any of them with others. These were all forgotten in his music. Nor did he, the virtuoso, ever place himself between you and the music. Dignity, nobility of style, depth of feeling, and a certain intellectual vigor characterized his playing. But if we are asked, wherein above all he shows the master, it is in what may be called contrapuntal playing. This is much more than giving out full chords with the melody; it is the giving of a distinct individuality to each of the four parts in the harmony; it is the eliciting of a virtual quartet from a single violin. This makes him preëminently the player of the violin sonatas, preludes and fugues, toccatas, &c., of Sebastian Bach; and indeed this art he must have learned from his deep, close study of the violin works of Bach and from his earnest penetration into the very spirit of Bach, into the very soul of his method. Among all violinists, and all virtuosos Joachim is the greatest Bach-ist. That height won, all the rest is easily and of course his.

The only disappointment of this evening was that there was no Bach in the programme. But I was easily reconciled, knowing how soon that satisfaction was in store for me. The next morning we had more long talk together in the artist's room, and then he fulfilled his promise of playing to me Bach's Chaconne, the noblest of all violin solos that I had ever yet heard. It was without accompaniment, complete in itself as Bach wrote, and, as Joachim plays it, not to be improved by even Mendelssohn's piano part. How the inspired sounds filled the room like a great flood of tone, and filled the soul of listener and player, and how the former felt that those whom he will never see on earth again must hear (for what so bridges over the gulf between time and eternity, as music that is so true and great?), it were idle to attempt to tell. In that listening I incurred a great debt which only a renewed life can pay. Visitors came in; Kapellmeister Rietz, Concertmeister Schubert, Hans Christian Andersen, the Danish novelist, and an intelligent, enthusiastic, gentlemanly musician, the conductor of the Tonkünstler-verein, a social club mostly of accomplished musicians, who compose an orchestra, and meet once or twice a week to practice the less known works of Bach, Handel and other old writers; and he invited us to the club room in the evening to hear so rare a curiosity as a couple of the famous Hautboy Concertos of Handel. From there I went to the Royal Gallery of Paintings, and was soon seated in wonder and transport before the incomparable "Dresden Madonna" of Raphael. Was it not a work of inspiration? The parallel between Raphael and Mozart has been often drawn. I could not but feel the force of it after seeing this picture. As Mozart said of his own music, here was a work which must have stood before its author's mind at once, whole and entire in all its parts, completely realized in one fusing instant of genius at its full heat. It is beauty, loveliness, holiness itself. Was not that a morning to thank God for? The Chaconne of Bach interpreted by Joachim, and the loveliest of all Madonnas, realized by Raphael! Nor was that all. D.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

THIRD SATURDAY EVENING CONCERT.

These concerts are in a fair way of becoming an institution. They are always crowded and we think, the Club might feel warranted in taking a larger hall. It is just large enough for the Tuesday concerts but uncomfortably crowded on Saturdays. The pieces presented were very acceptable in the main; the same cannot be said of the rendering of some of them.

Miss PEARSON is a débutante and as such entitled to some leniency on the part of the critic. We will say for her that the two arias selected were good pieces enough. So was "Savourneen Deelish," in its way. When Miss P. shall have learned to sing with a pure intonation; when her fioriture come somewhat nearer the mark in the way of finish and fluency; when she shall have learned to enter into the spirit of the compositions she is going to sing; then will be the time to give an opinion about her merits or demerits, as the case may be. For the present we will add merely, that embellishments are entirely out of place in a simple national air such as the Irish ballad she sang; that in rendering them the only admissible addition to the music is soul.

In the two movements from the Trio by Beethoven Mr. HAMANN proved that he entered into the spirit of the composition. It was evident, however, that his technical powers were not always entirely sufficient, to make his playing perfectly satisfactory, there being some unevenness in the left hand. In the septette the same gentleman played the horn-part with rare grace and ability. This piece was rendered finely; and without entering into the details of the performance we may say that Mr. STEIN this and the first time when the piece was played, handled his instrument with great taste and mastery. We were glad to notice an improvement as to the movement of the Adagio cantabile, which was misstated on the programme as Larghetto; the cadenza in the last movement, was also played better by Mr. SCHULTZE than formerly. The ensemble of the chords at the beginning and end of movements was perfect. The strong Allegro from Mozart's G minor Quartette was done very well. And in the same manner Mr. MEISEL acquitted himself in his solo, which was enthusiastically received. Saturday audiences have this merit over Tuesday ones, that they applaud with a will, which is a commendable practice in an audience, especially where applause is deserved.

SIXTH CHAMBER CONCERT.

TUESDAY, JAN. 29.

PART I.

1. Quartette, in G, No. 75. Haydn
Allegro—Adagio—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro Vivace.
2. "Elogy of Tears," Schubert
Mrs. Harwood.
3. Grand piano Trio, in E flat. F. Schubert
Allegro—Andante con moto—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro.
Messrs. Parker, Schultze and Fries.

PART II.

4. "Ye Faded Flowers," (Troek'ne Blumen) Schubert
Mrs. Harwood.
5. Second Quintette, in C, op. 29. Beethoven
Moderato—Adagio—Scherzo—Finale, Presto.

A gem of a programme finely set. Father Haydn, the giant Beethoven and the splendid Schubert are excellent company. Their poetry emanated from hearts that were suffused with the glow of broadest humanity and from heads on which the laurel of immortality sits well.

The artists did well to make their programme as chaste and select as it was. And they did still better in varying it out so well. Mrs. HARWOOD who seems to grow more youthful as the years pass on, sang her part to full satisfaction, and was deservedly called back after her second song. Her voice not less than the good use she makes of it, her fine expression and the evident feeling with which she sings, make it ever pleasant to listen to her. The accompaniment to the first song might have been softer and more delicate. The Quintette by Beethoven, is surprisingly strong and beautiful. It grows upon us, devolving new beauties at every hearing. The piece was played well throughout, especially so the last movement. The second part of Goethe's Faust was not out when this quintette was written. But one might suppose Beethoven had contemplated a musical transposition of the character of Euphion in this last movement. So full of the flashes of genius, so wayward, so bold in the highest flights of fancy; it seems in listening as if Faust and Helena were standing and looking with delight not unmingled with secret apprehensions at their phantom son as he rises from crag to crag. The beautiful genial melody, Andante con moto which twice interrupts the Presto, finely sets in relief the striving and pressing Finale.

Schubert's Trio in E flat, with a ballad for its Andante, almost rising to the dramatic power of the Erlking its genial Scherzo, a canon nearly throughout, its strong Adagio and Finale was played finely. The technical difficulties in the Finale were felt as such however; and in the piano-part which was on the whole quite well played by Mr. PARKER, a few little technical things were observable, capable of improvement. But as a whole the piece was very satisfactory and was very well received.

The Quartette by Haydn, sparkling, amiable and graceful, was played with fine taste by the gentlemen. We were surprised not to find more applause bestowed on it. Is it because we hear so little of Haydn?

This was a concert, that is an honor to the club. The hall might have been fuller. But we are satisfied that those that went will not forget this evening for a long time.

To-night the fourth Saturday concert takes place, which we hope to see as well attended as the preceding ones were. *† Stigelli's Concert.

The concert on Monday evening last, at the Music Hall, was attended by the largest audience we have seen this season. Every seat was filled in a few minutes after opening, and soon the ample stage was completely covered. Formés did not appear, being indisposed, so that the burden fell mainly upon Stigelli and Mlle. Patti. But the audience was good-humored, and the singers in capital spirits and voice, and the great basso, though for a moment regretted, was soon forgiven. Our readers do not need to be told anything about STIGELLI; his energy, enthusiasm and thorough artistic culture have been fully exhibited here before. And we have never heard him under more favorable circumstances than on this occasion; his voice was clear and ringing, and in the vast space it sounded mellow in spite of its force and volume. The pieces he sang have mostly been heard here before; but the ballad entitled "The Little Brother and Sister," composed for the occasion, was novel and striking. The music is not at all ballad-like, but rather descriptive, full of dramatic points, and capable of thrilling effects when rendered by such a master of passion as Stigelli.

Mlle. CARLOTTA PATTI gave the audience a most agreeable surpriso. She has a voice of great compass, — reaching to E in alt. — clear and full of melody though not powerful, much resembling that of her sister Adalina; and she has, what none of her sisters have, a brilliancy of execution that will not suffer by comparison with the best artists we have ever heard. She did not attempt any music that required much depth of feeling or sustained power; her choice seemed to fall upon compositions in which to display her facile grace and inborn taste for ornament. In the aria from the Magie Flute and in the Venzano waltz she showed herself perfect in all the nameless arts of floriture, and, in stereotyped phrase, brought down the house in a storm of applause. The public will be pleased to hear this charming vocalist again.

Mr. LANG played Liszt's transcription of "La Charité" and Thalberg's fantasia on themes from "L'Elisire d'amore," with his usual correctness and elegance. If this accomplished pianist fails to arouse enthusiasm by the exhibition of great power or feeling at least he always pleases by the beauty of his touch and the faultlessness of his style.

The ORPHEUS CLUB sang four pieces, with their usual perfection of light and shade, and in more absolutely good tune than we have ever heard in their performances. The harmonious blending of tone was exquisite, and the unanimous applause of the audience showed how heartily the singing was enjoyed. Altogether the concert, though not a great event, was highly agreeable and satisfactory. In the dearth of music this winter it was enjoyed with a zest we have rarely experienced.

Mlle. Patti, our readers will be glad to learn, announces a concert for this evening, which we suppose will be substantially a repetition of the one noticed above. Whether the same substantial reward will be reaped, remains to be proved.

New Publications.

THE SHADOW IN THE HOUSE.—A Novel. By John Saunders. New York: M. Doolady. Boston: A. Williams & Co. 1861.

With some defects of construction, such as vagueness in the plot, and an amusing feminineness in the treatment of some matters of business that hardly seem characteristic of the manly name of John Saunders, the Shadow in the House is nevertheless a book which the intelligent reader will read through to the end with much pleasure. The characters are few in number but skillfully drawn and the story interesting and novel.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE, for January. Contents: The political Year; the Parist Prayer-book; Uocivilized Man; English Embassies to China; Horror, a true tale; What's a Grilse?; Norman Sinclair, Part 12; A Merry Christmas; The Indian Civil Service. Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co.

Cassell's Illustrated Family Bible. Cassell's Popular Natural History. Cassell's Illustrated History of England.

We have received from the publishers numbers 20 of the Bible and the Natural History, and No. XI. of the History of England, and can only repeat the commendations that we have before given both of the illustrations and the letter press of these publications.

THE TRIBUNE ALMANAC, for 1861 A. Williams & Co.

This has become an almost indispensable publication to every citizen, from its copious and minute statistics of the political state of the country, in which musicians too, have some interest.

LEE & WALKER'S MUSICAL ALMANAC, for 1861, edited by Charles Grobe op. 1300.

But more to the purpose of the musical reader is the Almanac whose title is given above. It is edited by Charles Grobe and contains much matter useful and interesting to musical persons. A catalogue of "Our musical contemporaries," giving the name, date and place of birth and residence of all the persons most concerned in musical art, literature or trade, is contained in it. Many well selected articles fill the rest of the work, with a catalogue of the publications of Messrs. Lee & Walker. It also includes the usual calendar pages of an almanac.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER'S CONCERT, advertised in another column, is an attractive one in its programme to the lovers of the best piano music, and we need not say to his many friends in this vicinity that there will be little danger of any disappointment in the performance. Mr. Parker's merits as a pianist have been so often set forth in our columns that we need not repeat our praises at this time. We can only wish him a crowded house on Tuesday evening.

THE BOSTON MOZART CLUB.—The amateur club mentioned in these pages some weeks ago, gave its first concert to its associate members and invited friends on Monday evening, at Messrs. Hallett & Cramston's pleasant little hall, which was filled, in spite of the attractions offered at the Music Hall.

PART I.

Symphony in D major.....Mozart
Allegro—Andante—Miuetto and Trio Fioale Allegro Vivace.

PART II.

1. Overture, "Promethus".....Beethoven
2. Transcriptions for Orchestra.....Suck a Spanish Song: "La Naranjera."
b Lied.
3. Solo for Violoncello with Quartette accompaniment.
Kammer
4. Concert-March.....Suck
5. Overture "Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart

A good programme, everyone will admit, and very well was it performed by an orchestra of over thirty members, we should think, under the lead, (as they have been under the instruction) of Mr. SUCK. Quite strong in the string department, both in numbers (having six first and six second violins) and in excellence, it will be seen that it was well constituted to give an adequate rendering of a Mozart symphony and we can say that the performance was exceeding enjoyed, the more so, as the symphony was one not very familiar to our concert goers; vigorous, lively, and truly Mozart-like in its character. We regretted that a conflict of duties drew us to the Music Hall, so that we did not hear the whole of the programme.

We congratulate the Club on its success, and look upon it as a good omen for the future success of public concerts of orchestral music, that so many gentlemen amateurs, from various walks of life, of such well known influence in the musical community, can be brought together often enough, and have skill enough, to give so creditably such a programme. Such a Club must do much to revive and create a desire for such music. In the next letter from our editor abroad, he alludes to this Club, in an account of a similar organization in Dresden.

We regret that a line in the letter of our correspondent "Trovator," (Jan. 12,) should have given pain to a distinguished New York organist, Mr. W. A. KING, who writes us that in twenty-six years he has never been absent from any festival of the church where he is engaged, until last Christmas day, when detained at home by sudden illness in his family.

One page of our last number failed to receive the usual editorial supervision. We beg our readers to substitute wind for "mind-instruments," in the concert notice. We also called the poets of the "Harvard Musical Association" true, and not "ten," as the types made it.

Musical Chit-Chat.

St. CECILIA.—A gentleman travelling through France, saw, in a collection of pictures, a portrait of St. Cecilia playing on an organ, surrounded by a number of little angels on wing. On asking of a Frenchman an explanation of the picture, he replied that the Saint, on one occasion, played and sang with such superlative effect, that the chapel became suddenly full of cherubim, who had been attracted from heaven by the divine strains. The fair Saint, feeling for the fatigue consequent upon their prolonged flutterings, requested them to be seated, in these words; "Asseyez-vous donc, mes enfaois." "Merci, Madame, merci, — mais nous n'avons pas de quoi," ("we have not wherewithal") replied the all-winged, no-bodied celestials.

C. M. VON WEBER was very jealous of what he conceived to be a leaning in his friend and fellow-pupil, M. Meyerbeer, towards the Rossinian style. He thus expresses himself on the subject in a letter to M. Godefroy Weber; "Meyerbeer is becoming Italianized (ist ganz Italien verfallen) — where are now all our brilliant expectations?" He afterwards says, "Meyerbeer is going to Trieste to bring out his Crociato; he will afterwards return to Berlin, where, perhaps, he may write a German opera. God grant he may! I have made several appeals to his conscience."

LITTLE PICCOLOMINI IN A NEW CHARACTER.—Piccolomini, the charming little opera singer, is now the Marchesa della Fargua. A correspondent of a London paper, who recently visited her, says: "I was during a fortnight at a charming villa, three miles from Sienna, the residence of the parents of our beloved and most celebrated artist, Maria Piccolomini, now Marchioness della Fargua, of the Dukes Caetani, and it was by a miracle that this dear creature did not find herself in tumult and great peril on the return of the Swiss, headed by that assassin, the too infamous Schmidt, in the city of Pieve. When I arrived at the Villa Piccolomini I found all the family re-united. Her sister Laura had, on the 8th of October, married a young Siennese, 23 years old, very rich, who possesses divers villas and a beautiful palace in Sienna. An heir to the family of La Fargua is expected in April."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 22, 1861. — Another operatic enterprise has been started here, by the Associated Artist's Troupe, consisting of BRIGNOLI, SUSINI, FERRI, COLETTI, Madame COLSON and Miss PHILLIPPS. They opened the season last night with Mercadante's Giuramento which has not been played here for ages. It was very well done, except in the choral department, which was shocking. Colson sang superbly and Miss Phillipps was equally good, this delightful contralto constantly showing signs of improvement. There are hordes of opera singers here, just now, who are busy in getting up concerts, and ANNA BISHOP had a concert last week, at which FREZZOLINI sang and threw into doleful contrast the long list of nobodies who also took part. Madame Bishop sang as well as I have ever heard. A Gratias Agimus Tibi, with flute and voice bravura passages was admirably done. Miss ROWCROFT, a new concert singer, sang last week at Dodworth's with fair success.

Ullmann prophesies — I fear his ominous prediction will be fulfilled — the speedy downfall of the present operatic dynasty. The attendance on the first night of Il Giuramento was not near as good as it ought to have been. Ullman thinks that it would be a good idea for all the operatic singers in the country to go back to Europe, and then opera might be tried here with a new batch — but not at present — Ullmann is content to manage "but oh! not now."

Horrible times for musicians. I don't see how they manage to live, but live they do, and live well — at least opera singers do under any circumstances.

TROVATOR.

NEW YORK, JAN. 28. — We have had a pleasant operatic excitement in the debut in Lucia of the Boston prima donna, Miss HINCKLEY, who sang Wednesday night, the 23d. She is young, pretty. In person she is of good height, excellent figure, brown hair, superb teeth and possesses an expressive and pleasing face. When on the stage is quite free from affectation, but tries to act well, and for a novice is quite successful. Her voice is a soprano, with capital low notes, and not piercing high ones. She sang very well, with fairly brilliant execution and made a decided success. She will do better in heavy parts for which her great power and compass of voice well qualify her. Last Saturday she sang in Brooklyn, at the new Academy of Music, with even greater acceptance than in this city. The audience was immense. Indeed, Brooklyn is just now ahead of New York in operatic appreciation, the audiences there are large and enthusiastic and in this city small and sleepy. Il Giuramento was played for the second time to an audience which barely paid for the gas-light. So the managers intend giving for the present three performances a week in Brooklyn, and only two in New York. So we are playing second fiddle to our sister city.

ANNA BISHOP is organizing an English opera company, from the remains of the late deceased Cooper Opera Company. Brookhouse Bowler will be the tenor, Aynsley Cook the baritone, and Miss Kemp the contralto. Madame Bishop has sent out for the music of Macfarren's Robin Hood, but will cut her own throat by opening the season with an English version of some Italian opera, in which we have heard, in the original, far better singers than any in her new opera company. TROVATOR.

CHICAGO, JAN. 19, 1861.—The third Philharmonic Concert on Monday, Jan. 14, was a complete success. Every seat in the house was filled.

PROGRAMME.

1. Overture, "Le Vampyr".....Lindpaintner
2. Quartette, from Second Act of "Martha".....Flotow
3. Funeral March.....Chopin
Free transcription for Orchestra, by Hans Balatka.
4. Piano Solo, "Il Trovatore".....Prudent
Performed by Miss Irma de Pelgrom.
5. Solo for Mezzo Soprano. O mio Fernando, from "La Favorita".....Donizetti
6. Andante from the Fifth Symphony.....Beethoven
7. Quartette and Finale, from the first Act of "Gemma di Vergy".....Donizetti
8. Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream"
Mendelssohn

The orchestral parts of the programme were excellently performed, especially the Andante from Beethoven's fifth Symphony, and the Funeral March by Chopin, transcribed for the orchestra by Balatka. The quartets from Martha and Gemma di Vergy and the solo, O Mio Fernando, for amateur performances, were creditably rendered.

The great surprise of the evening was the announcement of the President of the Society, E. J. TINKHAM, Esq., that Mad. FABBRI, who had just arrived from St. Louis and attended the concert, would favor the audience with an aria from La Traviata. She made her appearance amidst great enthusiasm, and was often interrupted during her singing by the unrestrained applause of the audience. At the close she was called to the stage three times, and finally consented to an encore. The audience were fairly electrified with her magnificent singing, and the universal verdict ranked her as the very best cantatrice who has ever appeared upon the Chicago stage.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 19, 1861.—CARL GAERTNER'S Second Soirée was given at Chickering's Saloon last evening. It was well attended by an encouraging audience, who, as they had good reason to be, seemed delighted with every part of the following programme:

1. Quartette in G minor: Piano, Violin, Viola and Violoncello.....Mozart.
2. Solo, for Violoncello: (by Mr. Engelke).....Kummer.
3. Concerto, op. 47: (by Mr. Gaertner).....Spohr.
4. Ballade, op. 32: (by Mr. Jarvis).....Chopin.
5. Quintette, in C major, op. 29.....Beethoven.

Mr. Gaertner did full justice to his parts in the Quartette and Quintette. His bold style and full round tone made the Spohr Concerto a most happy selection.

Mr. ENGELKE, formerly of the Jullien orchestra, and, since, conductor of the Drayton Parlor Operas, is a violoncellist of great execution and fine taste. He played the Kummer's fantasia on "Robert" in his usual style.

Mr. JARVIS, who can play everything else and "Chopin" into the bargain, gave us the Polonaise (op. 22) of Chopin, as an encore.

The op. 39 of Beethoven (agreeable remembrance of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club) was, with the exception of the second movement, beautifully performed. In the Adagio one of the gentlemen dropped a measure and was obliged to travel over five or six to find his way into the quintette.

There was nothing else to mar one of the most agreeable musical entertainments ever enjoyed by Philadelphians — at home. MINOS.

WORCESTER, JAN. 23, 1861.—We have been favored with the first of a series of concerts by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. The programme embraced a fine selection and well rendered.

The Mozart Society gave a concert in Fitchburg last evening, which was a complete success. The spacious Town Hall was crowded by a highly appreciative audience, who testified their approbation of the entertainment by continued applause and repeated encores. The programme was miscellaneous, embracing selections from the Messiah and Seasons, with Songs, Duets, &c. Miss Fiske sang "I know that my Redeemer liveth" with much taste and fervor; Miss Doane sang "Come unto him," with good taste, and has improved much since we heard her last. The song and chorus "Ye winged Winds," brought Miss Todd a second time before the audience.

The Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Burt, acquitted themselves admirably and are a great acquisition to the society. Messrs. Reidle and Fischer, gave a "Grand duo Concertante" for the flute and clarinet, which was well rendered, but quite too lengthy. Messrs. Heywood and Dorman gave "Oh! di qual," from Ernani, arranged as a cornet duo with fine effect.

The Mendelssohn Coral Club, of which I spoke in a former letter, is composed of about twenty members under the direction of Mr. B. D. Allen, and at present is rehearsing "Mendelssohn's four part songs." We also have a Trio Club among us.

Prof. Frost is doing a good work for us here, and creating an interest in the right direction. He has two large classes besides directing the the Mozart Society, and is decidedly popular with all.

The second of the series of Concerts by the Quintette Club is announced for Friday next. M.

FLUSHING, (LONG ISLAND), JAN. 21, 1861.—Musical matters in this place have been very quiet for a few months past; nothing in the way of concerts, since the Gearys sang here, having taken place.

The Episcopal church in this village has, within a month past secured the services of an excellent musician as organist and director of music, in the person of Mr. Frank Gilder, who has trained a fine choir of boys.

There are some eight or ten boys, who sing the treble and alto parts, besides several gentlemen to sing tenor and bass. The choir has been a very great success and there is not a choir in the village that can excel, if any can equal them. No choir that has before sung in the church ever gave such universal satisfaction. Some of the boys are the possessors of very fine voices. The leading soprano and alto have remarkably rich and powerful voices. They sing the chants very effectively, the "Gloria in Excelsis" particularly sung in a manner that produces a most splendid effect, and all the chants which have been selected with the greatest care, are rendered in a very effective manner.

I understand that Mr. Gilder intends soon to give a concert in Flushing, we hope such is the case as he is a very fine pianist, and is very popular here.

MUSICUS.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Call of the fairies. Trio for female voices.
B. Richards. 50

A brilliant and highly pleasing trio, in the style of Glover's favorite compositions of the same class.

There are kind hearts everywhere. Ballad.
J. R. Thomas. 25

A pretty, simple ballad, worthy of the pen that wrote the "Cottage by the sea," and "Bonny Eloise." The poetry is very fine and the song is no doubt destined to be popular.

The old farm gate. Song. R. S. Taylor. 25

A fireside song which has much in it to recommend it. It is easy.

Bury me in the sea. Handel Pond. 25

A thrilling ballad.

Call me pet names. Mrs. Mary Bloede. 25

A new and fair musical rendering of these words, which have been set to music by several composers before.

Instrumental Music.

Le Pre aux Clercs. (Bouquet of melodies. Beyer. 50

Extracts from Auber's celebrated opera, which is full of gay, lively airs, well known all over the world, while the opera itself has remained comparatively unknown outside of France.

Minnie Clyde. Varied. Chas. Grobe. 25

A new number of the well-known "Melodies of the day," a collection of familiar airs set for young pupils with the addition of a pretty variation or two.

Overture Nahucodonosor. Verdi. 75

This splendid overture is familiar to Boston from numerous performances by various bands during late years. The piano arrangement is full and effective.

Still in my dreams thou'rt near. Varied. Grobe. 50

This will be good news to the large class of piano players for whose fingers Grobe knows so well how to write. The beautiful melody — by Foley Hall, the composer of "Ever of thee" — is or ought to be a household air.

L'Etoile aimée. (Thou art so near and yet so far.) J. Ascher. 50

A brilliant transcription of Reichardt's beautiful melody.

Books.

ONE HUNDRED SONGS OF IRELAND. Words and Music. 50

A capital collection, including the best sentimental, patriotic, traditional and humorous Songs and Melodies of "the land of sweet Erin," and one that cannot fail to be heartily welcome to the tens of thousands who look over the waters to "that green isle 'mid the ocean" as the home of their earliest recollections. It is, undoubtedly, the most complete compilation of Irish songs, published in connection with Music, obtainable in this country. Amongst the number will be found several of Moore's best songs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 462.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 9, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 19.

Hofer.

From the German of Schenkendorf.

When the Landlord of Passeyer
Insbruck town by storm had taken,
All the students, full of fire,—
Book and bench that day forsaken,— Thronging came, at noon, a greeting
And a serenade to bring him,
And his noble deeds repeating,
Songs of praise and thanks to sing him.

But the hero silence beckons,
Then he speaks, "lay down the viol,
God's war-trumpet stern thought wakens,
Meet we all the last sore trial.
Not to hear my poor deeds chanted
Left I wife and children weeping,
Earthly foes I meet undaunted,
Fixed on heaven my eye still keeping.

Kneel beside your rosaries rather,
Them I count the fairest viols;
Eyes upturned to God the Father
Help shall find in mortal trials.
One low prayer for me, poor servant,
For your Emperor then pray loudly,
'Give good rulers praises fervent!'
That song makes my heart beat proudly.

"I have now no time for praying,
Go and tell the Lord, your maker,
How it stands; what seed decaying,
Swells in many a blood-dyed acre;
How we're fasting, watching, toiling,
And how many a gallant ranger
Shoots no more, has done with smiling—
God alone is our avenger!"

C. T. B.

(Translated from W. H. Riehl's "Musikalische Charakterköpfe," by Fanny Malone Raymond.)

A Dramatic Ballad Singer and a Musical Aristocrat.

I.

WENZEL MÜLLER.

Were you ever at a representation of "The Devil's Mill on the Wienerberg," the old Austrian "Magical comic-spectacle-opera," which once so much delighted our grandfathers, who liked more substantial sport than that of to day? The Devil's mill, with its iron-clad knights, its languishing Minne-singer, the wicked miller who ground up his wife for amusement, and the Falstaff-Caspar, who rides off through the air on the miller's ass? The Devil's Mill, with its abrupt music, where every aria is a country ballad, and every orchestral theme a carnival dance? The piece is some times given now-a-days, for the amusement of the gallery and the little children; but a cultivated, grown-up, and reasonable public gets out of the way of such mad drollery. As for myself, I have always remained uncultivated, childish, and unreasonable, and could not withstand the temptation of going to see the Devil's Mill, which, with its abrupt, carnivalesque ballad music, made a wonderful impression on me. Certainly there is some secret charm in these old tunes, patched together by Wenzel Müller; but they must be heard with child-like simplicity and faith, in order to enter fully into the spirit of it. It is the charm of the people's song, but not the humorous or sentimental one which is so much fancied at present. Here we listen to songs overflowing with a rough abandonment to merriment, and also some of those half comic, half horrible people's songs, as they are still sometimes sung to the barrel-organ, before a painted canvass: in which the tendency of the people to the horrible, monstrous, and superstitious seeks an artistic satisfaction, and seems, at the same time, to be laughing at itself. Wenzel Müller's mastership lies in the fact that he reflects the true, unaltered people's song in his farce of enchantment, and that, too, in an inimitable manner. He is the greatest ballad singer of whom the entire history of German music can boast; a man who recognized the germ of the poetical, the strength of German nationality, even in the rhapsodical fair melodies (and the penetration of genius was necessary for this); who brought the people's song, in all its divine, rough force on the boards; and, besides that, a true Austrian, an unmistakable child of Vienna, full of fresh, harmless humor, and good-hearted gaiety; to whom a Ländler, even listened to from a blind, wandering fiddler, was dearer than all the Italian flourishes in the world, a really national tone-poet!

In the history of Wenzel Müller's life, but few original passages are to be found; but these characterize the man. In the people's theatre of the Viennese Leopoldstadt he had flourished the baton for many years; here his ballads and musical uncertainties had become celebrated. There the original master, who, according to Devrient's impression, nailed the Viennese drolleries to every ear, so that it was impossible to resist them,—was invited to Prague, to fill the post of opera director in a far more advantageous and brilliant manner. But he had not long given himself up to this wider circle of action, than he felt it unsuited to him; he could no longer bear his distinguished position as chapel-master; he was homesick for his national farces, and had no rest until he found himself once more comfortably settled within the narrow limits of his Leopoldstadt theatre. There is the true Wenzel Müller, as he lived in his harmless, hearty songs, taken from the mouths of the people; who, contented with ballad-singing, felt at home and happy in it alone.

This romantic opera, which a grown-up, cultivated public avoids, once delighted all Germany. The old popular tales, that, a generation before, had taken refuge in Vienna, as their last sanctuary, began, illustrated by Wenzel Müller's irresistible melodies, a truly triumphal progress to the northern ocean and the Baltic, and over the seas into England. And even the greatest and most ideal master of German composition, could not withstand the influence that, flowing from the great ballad-singer of the Leopoldstadt, inoculated the whole of Germany. The humor of the Austrian popular song, was the prototype of all the German musical humor.

Wenzel Müller, was only a "little master." I do not know whether, in his whole life, he ever finished one thoroughly worked out musical creation. But the little master who sang such a song as "He who never was drunk" and a hundred as good, has done something that very many great masters could not imitate. With some of his songs, one is doubtful whether he stole from the people, or the people from him. One must not be led astray, because he composed to a piteous flat and unpoetical text, that does not sound at all like national poetry. I have tried to wed some of his most graceful and child-like melodies to those truly natural and spiritually related poems by Hoffmann von Fallersleben, and they went together as it from one mould. One fancies that the poet and the musician must have been one person, so admirably do words and music suit each other. This proves that the old Viennese composer and the modern poet drank from the self-same spring of national song; it proves that both struck the right tone, too, spite of the immense difference in aim and means, and the different view of the world which each man had.

Wenzel Müller, the father of the resuscitated Viennese farce, was taught by Dittersdorf, the great founder of German comic opera; but Dittersdorf, fluently, humorously as he carried out his ideas, was a thoughtful, learned musician, nay a pedant, beside the gay, sanguine Wenzel Müller; he is a refined coquettishly elegant cosmopolite, beside the frank, thoroughly Austrian man of the people. But often as Müller wrote for the theatre; none of his pieces deserve the name of operas; they are comic romantic-ballad-dramas! He is seldom humorous in the highest sense, but simply merry and low-comic; he often writes himself out, is tiresome at times, and flat to the borders of triviality; he has not the patience to carry out artistic forms in a rich manner; he is no sorcerer in the technical treatment of his subject. These weaknesses are also native to the actual popular song. The people's song is commonly only fine in part; just so with Müller; only on his ballad-singer side is he the true wizard. He is as national as Hauswurst, Nastel, or Casperl.

This dramatic ballad-singing, although really of mean origin, still can boast of an old name, a long art-historical row of ancestors, a proud pedigree. Its roots are firmly fixed in those old tunes of the middle ages, that were played in the streets between the sacred mysteries.

In Vienna burlesque had kept the field since the old days; longer here than elsewhere did Hauswurst lord it on the boards; and in the Viennese theatres, improvisation, the very nerve of the national drama, was long in vogue, after it had been done away with in other places. Hauswurst would not allow himself to be proscribed as in Northern Germany, and when North German pedantry had just hunted him from the boards, the merry Viennese, by means of Wenzel Müller's melodies, sang themselves into a new Hauswurst, although he was called Kasperl or something of the sort. What remains to us of the respectable firm, under the names of Frankfort Hampelmann, Berlin Bummeler, &c., on the stage, has been spared through Wenzel Müller; but for his music, no one could have borne the ancestors of these characters in the Viennese farces. Since he has preserved to us the last remains of the historical Haanswurst, and fought, with his bold naturalness, against the pedants of the schools, he the ballad-singer, must be respected as a fellow-combatant of the literary "stormers and drivers," the Lessings, Schillers, and Goethes, unclassic as his apparition may seem in such classic company.

The Viennese popular opera, brought to its fullest bloom by Wenzel Müller, was not a base return to the old merry-Andrewisms,—a mere chain of intrigues for Hanswurst to hang his pranks upon; it mirrored, in grotesque caricature, all that the thin dramatic present could offer; and that, too, in the happiest manner. The flourishing chivalric spectacle of the day, with its grim, serious heroes, and loveable ladies, was united to the newly opened world of fairy and spectral enchantment. It is difficult to say, whether the thing is intended in jest or in earnest. The horrible is mixed up with the drollest ideas in such a manner, that even the later romantic school might learn something from it. The Shakespeare enthusiasm of the cultivated may here find its popular companion-piece. Is it not a charm resembling that which lurks in Kauer's "Donau-weibchen;" a tender, romantic breath of the spirit world, a piece out of the "Midsummer Night's Dream"—music and poetry both Germanized in the style of a Viennese suburb? Is it not the voluptuous, gloomy horror of an old ballad, which at times causes a cold thrill to run over one, that touches the listener, in certain parts of Wenzel Müller's "Devil's mill?"

In this great ballad-singer's time, the literary and critical enthusiasm for the German people's song, had just sprung into new life. From these literary tendencies the worthy Viennese chapel-master was certainly very far removed; in the simplicity of his heart he borrowed from the national melodies, because they pleased every one, and sounded so gay and intelligible; and he thought no more about it. And how do we know how much the charm and success of his songs helped to kindle the enthusiastic researches of certain admirers of national melody? And these investigators are held in honor; but no one thinks any more of old Wenzel Müller. Wenzel Müller lived long to prosecute his merry occupation. That is easily understood. He shook more than two hundred musical farces and fairy operas from his sleeves. That agrees with the species of production. He who cannot shake such things out of his sleeves, should let the business alone; and he whose conscience is not easy enough to take for granted the sins of a composition that one can shake out of one's sleeves, is no born ballad-singer. In his old days, Wenzel Müller often declared that he could not imagine why people made such a fuss about Mozart. Mozart wrote only seven operas; but he, Wenzel Müller, wrote over two hundred of them, besides a heap of music for the church. This valuation characterizes the old ballad-singer.

Müller died just before his seventieth year was completed. He had outlived his fame, but not his works. This is a rare destiny. The grey beard heard his songs in the mouths of the people every day; heard his thoughts and forms imitated, added to, and worked out; but people no longer remembered that these thoughts and forms originated from him; and had the old man declared that it was so, he would have been less willingly believed than another. Such an inognito has a charm of its own, but it would be martyrdom to an ambitious soul. But Wenzel Müller could scarcely have been such an one.

Let no one despise Wenzel Müllerish farces, for they are a great historical proof of the triumphal strength of national song in Germany. For it is a prerogative of the Germans, not only to possess fine national melodies of their own, but also a talent for appropriating any fine national music. The history of the Dessauer March is an excellent proof of the assimilating power with which the German popular mouth stamps and almost re-creates a foreign melody. This march is altogether an Italian composition. When Leopold of Dessau besieged Turin in 1706, the vanquished Italians marched forth to meet him, playing this air. The pealing battle piece pleased the Germans, their own trumpeter began to blow it, the popular mouth took up the catching melody, Germanized its Italian turns, claimed the tune as German property; and thus the Turin march of homage has become a German battle-song, the material of which we won in Italy with the sword.

Wenzel Müller has had many pupils and imitators; none of them excelled him, but rather retrograded. He is the beginning and the end, the only competent dramatic ballad-singer. The Viennese farces still vegetate, and thrive fungus-fashion, but Germany is no longer enraptured with them. The right musician, the real ballad-singer is wanting. Raymond strove to ennoble the texts of these popular buffooneries. He finished some fine things; and yet, when he had completed his best effort, his admirable "Prodigal," he wanted to throw the manuscript in the fire; and after poetizing a little longer, he shot himself through the head.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

SACRED MUSIC.

V.

THE 16TH CENTURY, 1500—1600.

We now come to the most interesting modern epoch; that in which the scholar turned back to antiquity and grafted the study of it upon the science of the middle ages. The combination somewhat hybrid in the result gave this century less of unity and another character than that which had distinguished which had preceded it. But it exhibits an intellectual movement with which, as it seems to me, that of none of the ages immediately preceding can be compared. This magnificent era, which is known as that of the Renaissance, or of the Revival of Letters, because Leo X. and Francis I. gave new birth to, or revived in it, the study of ancient art and literature, produced Michael Angelo, Raphael and Palestrina—that sublime trinity in art—embracing in its grasp architecture, sculpture, painting, poetry, and music. If, rending the bosom of the Roman church, the sixteenth century had the misfortune to produce Luther and Calvin,* the old faith can offer as an offset to these pretended Reformers numerous illustrious saints, such as St. Charles Borromeus, St. Theresa, and St. Francis de Sales. King Francis I. founded the College of France and the royal printing press. Jodelle, Marot, De Thou, Montaigne and Rabelais wrote their masterpieces. The Tuileries and the Pont Neuf were begun, and the popular Henry IV. put an end to the wars caused by differences in religion by the celebrated edict of (1598).

* The reader must not forget that a devout Roman Catholic speaks

The council of Trent reformed many abuses and produced grand and previous results. In France, Clement Jannequin composed in the time of Francis I. the cries of Paris, a curious medley treated with much art, and the Chant de la Bataille de Marignan, which is also brilliant and well written. To the celebrated Josquin Deprés succeeded his pupil John Mouton, master of the grand chapel-music in 1520. This eminent composer had the glory of instructing Adrien Willaert, one of the chiefs of the Belgian school. Under Henry II., Catherine de Medicis called an Italian musician, Baltazarini, to Paris, creating for him the office of chamber musician.

Charles IX., a fine singer and violinist (his instrument is preserved in the Library of Cluny,) invites the famous Roland de Lattre (Orlando Lasso) to take direction of his music. In his time appeared the composer Goudimel, a Hugonot, born at Besancon. This son of Franche comté had the glory of forming the divine Palestrina, and perished miserably in the sad and fatal night of St. Bartholemew.

Enstache du Carroy, born at Beauvais, was chapel-master under Henry III. and Henry IV.; he contributed powerfully to the conversion of the latter and during the king's abjuration at the church of St. Denis caused a magnificent Te Deum to be executed.

We may mention as composers of the second rank, Jean de Milleville, Gilbert Colin, Arcadet, Maillart, Certon, Manchicourt, Phinot, Claude Lejeune, of Valenciennes; also Beaulien and Salomon, masters of the chambermusic under Henry III. Of these composers we have a vast number of masses, motets, chansons, etc., published by Attaignant, the first music printer of Paris, 1527. This publisher, the earliest known in France left a precious collection in 5 volumes, now unhappily very rare. It would be well worthy the dignity of the Imperial press to publish a new edition.

But the French theatre had already ended its first phase, the exclusively religious; as that period is little known it may be well to enter upon some details which may prove interesting to our readers.

We would recommend the learned and curious work of Charles Magnin to such as wish to penetrate into the Origin of the Modern Theatre.* For our part, we will speak only of the ordinance against players (789) by Charlemagne, and the mandate d' Eudes of Sully, Bishop of Paris, published in 1198 against La Fête de Four, which had gradually obtained footing in all the churches of France. The impure remains of Paganism gave way to the real Christian theatre, which had its origin actually at the tomb of Christ, after pilgrimages to the holy land, so frequent in those devout ages. On returning from the holy places, the pilgrims composed canticles upon their travels, introducing into them the story of the life and death of the Son of God, they chanted also the miracles of the saints, their martyrdom, and legends of the time, giving also in public places a sort of theatrical entertainment, fitted to instruct the people while amusing them. This exhibition pleased and excited the piety of the divers citizens of Paris, who furnished funds to erect a theatre for the representation of mysteries upon festival days. "The first essay was made at the borough of Saint Maur, two short leagues from Paris. They took for their subject the 'Passion of our Lord,'—which appeared very novel and gave the spectators great pleasure."

Some twenty or twenty-five years later, Charles

* "Origines du Theatre moderne," 1 vol. 8vo. Paris, Hac-hette, 1838.

VI. by letters patent granted, Dec. 4, 1402, permitted the Brotherhood of the Passion to give public representations. The Brotherhood established in the Church of the Trinity, rue St. Denis, at Paris, was authorized "afin qu'un chacun par devotion se puisse et doiboe adjoindre et mettre en leur compaignie à iceux maistres, gouverneurs et confrères de la Passion Nostre Seigneur, etc." This theatre had great success during the reigns of Charles VI., Charles VII. and Louis XI. Mysteries were also exhibited at Rouen, Angers, Le Mans, Metz, &c., and the Brotherhood obtained in 1518, a confirmation of their privilege by Francis I.

The performances were continued at the hospital of the Trinity until 1539, and then in the hotel de Flandres to 1543.

July 16th, 1548, the Brotherhood gave its Masters and Governors power to purchase part of the hotel de Bourgogne in the rue Manconseil. A decree of the Court, Nov. 17, 1548, maintained the sole right of the Brotherhood to represent pieces upon that theatre; but it is ordained that they shall play none but secular, licensed and moral pieces, and they are forbidden to represent any sacred mysteries. It would seem that these pieces had degenerated into a monstrous medley of morality and buffoonery. The Brotherhood then leased their theatre to a troop of comedians reserving to themselves the "two boxes of the Masters." Besides this Brotherhood, two other lay associations gave dramatic representations.*

I. The Clerks de la Bazoche, who were organized in the time of Philip the Fair; their arms were three inkhorns of gold upon a field azure; their orchestra consists of a kettle-drummer, four trumpets, three hautboys and a bassoon. In 1442, they played moralities, farces and buffoon pieces, which were first examined by the Parliament. But abuses very soon crept into the company, for in 1476 a decree suspended their performances, down to the accession of Charles VIII. (1497). Louis XII. re-established the liberties of the theatres, "thinking thus to learn many things, which it would be impossible for him otherwise to know." During the reign of this prince the Bazoche arranged their theatre upon a marble table in the grand hall of the palace, which was destroyed by fire March 6, 1618.

2. The Youths of Sans-Soucy, young people of rank, educated and fond of pleasure obtained patents from Charles VI. Their chief had the title of Prince of Fools. This association at first kept themselves within bounds. A sensible and inoffensive criticism was the basis of their pieces. Later, the Prince of Fools gave the Clerks de Bazoche permission to play his pieces, and in exchange was allowed to represent farces and moralities. Some time after, the Brotherhood of the Passion added also to their plays the Prince of Fools and his subjects. This company had the protection of Louis XII, who permitted them freely to exhibit the faults of all classes not even excepting himself from their criticism so long it was just. The principal dramatic authors of this curious period were:—

1440. The brothers Grebau, ecclesiastics, authors of the Mystère des Actes de apôtres par personnages.

1470. Jean Michel, d'Angers, author of the Mystère de la Passion, represented at Angers towards the end of August 1486, and at Paris in 1507. This remarkable man was appointed first Physician to Charles VIII. and afterwards counsellor of the Parliament at Paris.

1500. Eloy d'Amernal, priest and master of the boys in the choir of Bethune, where he was born. We owe to him La Grande Deablerie, printed in 1508.

1508. Simon Bougouin, valet de chambre of Louis XII. wrote the morality l'Homme juste et l'Homme Mondain. He published also a Traité de l'Epinette (Treatise on the Spinnet).

* The company called "Les Confreres de la Passion"—the Brotherhood of the Passion.

1510. Pierre Gringore, called Vaudemont, author, actor, and undertaker of mysteries. This poet renounced the theatre to devote himself to works of piety. He was buried in Notre Dame.

1510. Jean du Pont Alais, contemporary and cousin of the preceding, was hunch-backed and a companion of Louis XII. and in the passage near the Church of St. Eustache at the time the pastor was delivering his sermon. The priest descended, went to Pont-Alais, and asked, "How dare you play the tamborine while I am preaching?" "And how dare you preach, while I am playing?" returned the other insolently. The priest complained to the magistrate, who imprisoned Pont-Alais. It was six months before he obtained permission to resume his tamborine.

1524. Barthélemy Aneau, born at Bourges, was professor of Rhetoric at Lyons and was stoned to death June 21, 1565. He was a Lutheran and had (it was affirmed), hurled a large stone at the consecrated wafer and the priest who carried it. We owe to him a Mystère de la Nativité, composed in imitation verbale et musicale.

1530. Jean Parmentier, born at Dieppe in 1494, composed loyal songs, ballads, rondos "good and excellent moralities," among which was one "very elegant," for ten actors in honor of the Virgin Mary. (Pub. Paris. 4to. 1531.)

1649. Louis Choquet put into French rhymes with dramatis personæ the book of Revelations of St. John, which was represented at Paris in the hotel de Flandres in 1541 and was printed in folio.

1549. Margaret de Valois, sister of Francis I., wife of Charles, Duke of Alençon, afterwards of Henry d'Albret, King of Navarre. This queen composed comedies and moralities, which were represented by the maids of her court. She died at the chateau of Odos in Bigorre and was buried at Pau. Her works were printed in 1547.

The most celebrated actors of this interesting period were Clement Marot, Jean de Serre, comte de Salles and Jacques Mernable.

The most ancient and most celebrated of all the mysteries beyond contradiction, that of the Passion, of which the first edition appeared in 1490. A magnificent performance of this immense masterpiece was given by order of Conrad Bayer, the 75th Bishop of Metz. God was represented by Seigneur Nicolle de Neufchatel in Lorraine, who was pastor of the church of St. Victor of Metz, and another priest, Messire Jean de Nicey, had the part of Judas. On the day of the first performance at Angers, grand mass was celebrated in the place prepared for the mystery, and vespers were put off that the canons and singers might assist in the play.

The principal mysteries, which followed were Gris-elidis, or the Miroir des dames Mariées (of 2,000 verses, printed in black letter, in 4to.) Mysteres de la Resurrection; Mysteres du Vieux Testament; the Sacrifice d'Abraham, played at the hotel de Flandre in presence of Francis I.; St. Catherine; St. Barbara; La Sainte Hostie; St. Denis; St. Christophe, &c. These pieces were all divided into many journees, and interspersed with songs, dances and symphonies. This was the real Christian opera of the middle ages.

An organ, placed in the paradise of the stage, accompanied the voices of angels and of the numerous partakers of the action, who, as a rule, closed the performance by a grand and solemn Te Deum.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Diarist in Paris.

PARIS, JAN. 4, 1861.

My paper this morning contains the advertisements of the following theatres; Grand Opera, Theatre-Français, Opera Comique, Odeon, Theatre Italien, Theatre Lyrique, Gymnase, Vaudeville, Varietés, Palais Royal, Bouffes Parisiennes, Porte St. Martin, Gaité, Ambigu Comique, Theatre du Cirque, Theatre Dejazet, Folies Dramatiques, Delassement Comique, Theatre Beaumarchais, Luxembourg, Theatre San Marcel; beside which there are several smaller places of dramatic amusement, divers casinos, public balls attended by "public" characters, and the like. There are then some twenty theatres, of all classes, open of an evening; the two principal operas playing but four or five nights a week. The first impression is, what a theatre-going, amusement-seeking people these French! Twenty theatres a night for a population perhaps a half larger than New York, and four or five times that of Boston and suburbs! But, per contra, these theatres are nearly all small; I doubt if the Bouffes, for instance, can seat 500 people, and the grand opera, I think, must be crowded with an audience of 2000. Again theatricals are almost the only public amusement; concerts are very few and far between, and are attended by small heavily paying audiences; public lectures, public meetings of all kinds are unknown. I have had this matter in my thoughts during all my stay here, and conclude, upon the best information that I can get, that upon any given evening a much larger number of individuals will be found amusing themselves in public places in New York than in Paris.

Just look at it; estimate the number of people which are in the New York theatres alone, from the Academy of Music (How much there is in a name!) down to the German playhouse in the Bowery, and how much short of the number of auditors in the Paris playhouses would the aggregate be? Then the crowds attending that American product, negro minstrelsy; the concert goers; the audiences of the popular preacher and lecturer; the crowds enjoying the excitement of public political, charitable and other meetings; well, now, does it turn out that the Parisian population is more given to public amusement than our own?

There is one point worthy of note in relation to the theatres here and that is the large amount of music during the performances. Pieces semi-musical seem to be as much demanded as in Germany; and very nice little orchestras there are, and singers which answer all purposes. Great voices and great execution are not demanded, and moderate abilities somewhat cultivated please. Occasionally, one appears and exhibits both voice and talent, and such an one makes the small stage but the steppingstone to a larger sphere of action. So it is in Germany. For my part I can enjoy a neat little piece with pretty, not great singers, a hundred times more than some ambitious attempt at great things, where, with the exception of the two, or at most, three singers of world-wide reputation, all else, scenery, orchestra, chorus and minor parts are utterly inadequate to the representation of the composer's and librettist's ideas.

Oh for a Boston or New York Shikaneder! Not because of his love of wine and women, his gluttony his debts and his carelessness for the morrow—but because he gave, in his little booth of a theatre in the "Free house auf der Wieden," piece after piece, in which, in the language of the people with all the extravagance and low drollery, which marked them, there was always an appropriate music at least, and which led his audience by degrees up to that appreciation of good music, which secured the marvellous success of the Magic Flute, so soon as the novelty of its glorious music was worn off!

The oldest operas now performed anywhere in the world are those of Gluck, Mozart, and Dittersdorf's "Doctor and Apothecary," Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, and some other products of the German and French schools of comic opera. And these two schools grew up out of the popular pieces given in small theatres for popular audiences.

Oh, for an Emanuel Schikaneder in Boston! A man who has so much faith in public taste for music as to venture to engage a respectable orchestra, and give, if not original works, at least translations of pieces, which without making great pretensions have real value both as plays and musical compositions. But where are the singers? The demand would soon find its supply. Better voices, as nature has made them, you will find nowhere than at home. We do not need Sontags and Albonis to give us pleasure — so long as we are contented with simple natural melodies. I grant that we do need them if we are to have nothing sung but grand airs expressly written for musical phenomenal men and women. (Is there anything more distressing than to hear a great scena made familiar to us by Lind and Sontag, sung by a pupil after two quarters with Signor Contrapanti?)

The average size of the theatres which I have seen in London, Germany and Paris is less than that in our large cities and, of course, only in very few are voices of uncommon power needed; yet ours are not too large to be filled by voices such as may be found in numbers among our singers — provided they were properly taught. (An immense amount of talent runs to waste with us.) I would not propose that a Shikaneder try to do anything in the Boston Theatre or Academy as you have now dubbed it, for that is worse constructed for sound than any other I was ever in — the deviser of it evidently forgetting that the audience wishes to hear as well as see. But such a place as the Museum would be excellently fitted for him. It is good for sound, and is larger than several stages upon which world renowned works were first brought out.

Not to pursue this point farther, let it be added that the real German and French opera grew up from small beginnings — from popular pieces written for popular audiences — and that the same cause, until human nature is changed, will produce the same effect; even among us.

Great epoch-making works are not an every-day product — neither in literature nor in any of the arts. In opera Gluck gave us the two Iphigenias, the Orpheus and the Armida; Mozart the Marriage of Figaro, Don Juan, and the Magic Flute; Beethoven, Fidelio; Cherubini, the Water Carrier (Les deux Journées) and Lodoiska; Weber, Der Freyschütz and Oberon; Rossini, the Barber and William Tell; Auber, Masaniello; Meyerbeer, three, and Halevy, one, &c. The number in proportion to the aggregate of new works is small. They stand out as do the few great books of the last hundred years, or the few great paintings, or the few great works in sculpture. But as thousands of books, thousands of paintings, thousands of statues, not great, during these years, given the world in the aggregate more pleasure and delight than the few, so it is with opera. No one can compare Rossini's Barber in the points which we consider as deserving the epithet great, with his Tell, and yet it has probably delighted a hundred fold more auditors than its more ambitious sister. Oh for a Shikaneder!

Experience has given us the truism,—the demand creates the supply. Look at our list of lectures in America, our troops of blacked minstrels, our political orators, our men who sell themselves soul (if they have any) and body for office. So here, there is never a want of new pieces for the stage — not "great" always, but in a large proportion of cases, having something in them which causes them to live their day, and pay their authors, an adequate compensation for time and labor. I notice that the list of new theatrical pieces in Paris for the quarter ending Dec. 31, gives the number as being twenty-nine — not including the catch-penny, blood and thunder comedies and laughable tragedies of the minor theatres, which do not attain to the dignity of a notice in the papers.

Of these, the following may be classed as belonging to the musical drama, although the part played by music in the vaudeville is small—that species of plays being, as nearly as I can describe it, a farce with songs.

Oct. 8. Une Tasse de The. Vaudeville in 1 act, at the Vaudeville Theatre. Music by Derley.

" 8. La Famille d'Horloger. Vaudeville 1 act, at the Palais Royal. Music by Deslandes.

" 8. Un Gros Mot. Vaudeville, 1 act, Palais Royal. Music by Dumonstein.

" 10. Le Docteur Mirabolan. Opera in 1 act, at the Opera Comique. Music by E. Gautier.

" 15. Ce qui plait aux Hommes. Vaudeville, 1 act, at the Variétés.

" 29. Un Troupier qui Sait les Dames. Vaudeville, in 3 acts. Variétés. Music by Morand.

Nov. 8. Le Guide de l'Étranger en Paris. Vaudeville, 1 act, Variétés.

" 28. M. Tyrant en Sabots. Vaudeville, 1 act, at the Gymnase. Music by Lafarge.

" 28. Le Passage Razinwill. Vaudeville, 3 acts. Palais Royal. Music by Thilboust.

Dec. 3. Le Papillon, pantomime ballet at the Grand Opera, 2 acts. Music by Offenbach.

" 17. Les Mutaines de l'Ami Pontet. Vaudeville, 2 acts. Variétés. Music Mehel Carré.

" 17. La Maitresse du Mari. Vaudeville. 1 act. Variétés.

" 17. Le Passe de Nichette. Vaudeville, 1 act. Palais Royal. Music by Thilboust.

" 29. l'Éventail, comic opera in 1 act. Opera Comique. Music by Boulanger.

" 29. Les Pêcheurs de Catane, operatic piece, 3 acts, at the Theatre Lyrique. Music by Aimé Maillard.

" 31. Le Roi Barkouf. Comic opera, 3 acts. Opera Comique. Music by Offenbach.

" 31. Une heure avant l'Overture. Vaudeville, 1 act, L'Étincelle, do. 1 act. Both at the Vaudeville Theatre.

Most of these you see, are slight pieces, with no great strivings after effect, and nearer in character to our farces, than anything else upon our stage. Suppose we make a few notes upon some of them,—notes mainly stolen by the present writer.

Le 'Éventail (the Fan) is a pretty little piece in one act, teaching the great moral "it will not do to play with love." The scene opens with a serenade which Fabrice, a young poet, gives to a beautiful widow, of whom he is enamored. She is not in love with him and gives him a gentle hint of the fact by sending four bullies, armed with clubs, to attack him. Capt. Annibal, a fine looking, drinking, gambling, jolly fellow devoted to adventure, hearing the noise rushes from the inn where he is drinking to Fabrice's aid, and the ruffians are driven off. Hearing the young man's story, he determined to assist him to vengeance, and they devise a plot by which the captain shall pay his court to the widow, and when he has obtained permission for an interview with her, Fabrice is to go in his stead, and give the lady a piece of his mind. They have forgotten to withdraw to some private place before their conversation and the widow hears it all from her balcony.

Phœbe the widow's sister has fallen in love with Fabrice, and so deeply as to tell him of it directly. Lucky chance for him, he thinks—he will pretend to return it and thus find opportunity to get satisfaction upon the other.

Well, the captain lays siege to the widow, and finds her so agreeable, that he falls in love with her. She intending to mystify him loses her heart. Fabrice's pretended love for Phœbe becomes real—and so there are mystifications all round save for poor Phœbe. At length the fan comes in, of which the widow understands the use as well as if she had read the essay in the connoisseur. She drops it to give the captain an opportunity of paying her a visit to restore it. But Fabrice now demands it as the means of carrying out their little complot. But the captain is now in love and refuses. They get angry, draw swords,—but conclude to cast the dice for it. The poet obtains it, and Phœbe, the good angel in the piece prevents any bad use of it. The widow refuses the captain's heart and hand until he brings the fan. He is in trouble; but Phœbe persuades Fabrice to go in the night and give the fan to the captain who restored it to the widow, and all marry and have until this present writing so far as is known lived happily.

There is not much dialogue, the piece being full of songs, serenades, and what not. M. Boulanger's music is very much praised for its liveliness, appropriateness, melody and fine instrumental accompaniment. Of the particular pieces noted are the serenade and drinking song, a duet and an air "I am twenty-one."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 9, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha," Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

No. V.

A WEEK IN DRESDEN, CONTINUED.

BERLIN, Dec. 10, 1860.

My last letter was to have recorded a rich week in Dresden; but with the space given the two principal figures, I only succeeded in writing out the first twenty-four hours. The rest shall come straight from pocket notes, in diary fashion.

Oct. 27. After such a morning (the Chaconne of Bach played by Joachim, and the "Dresden Madonna,") one felt well in the open air; Nature in her October garb, rich, but without the brilliancy of our autumnal woods, seemed doubly lively and responsive. There was a warm glow of promise in the sadness. A long walk by the river's side, and through the fine parks outside of the beautiful city. The moon stood almost full, against the fading purple of the sunset; and from the chill of evening I took refuge for a short time in the large and elegant restaurant and concert-room on the Brühl terrace, that overhangs the river. Here are concerts every afternoon or evening; sometimes orchestral, sometimes vocal: commonly the former. This time it began at six, and as we sipped our coffee, men, women, children, around little tables, we listened as long as we liked to music by "the Kapelle of the Herrn Stadtmusik-director Hartung, under the direction of the Herrn Kapellmeister Puffholdt." Entrée two and a half neugroschen (between 6 and 7 cents); but expected to take coffee, beer, or something for the inner man. It was a decent little orchestra of about 24, and played quite well; one of three or four such Kapellen, which play almost every day, in rotation in places of this sort. Not so large, nor so good an orchestra as Liebig's in Berlin, nor so exclusively classical in its programmes. Yet once a week, at least, they play a Symphony, and always several solid pieces mixed with lighter. The programme this time was one of the richest, and also miscellaneous. A large card hung in front of the stage, always told the number of the piece up for performance. The pauses mean coffee and kellers obligato.

PART I.

1. Overture to "Hans Helling,"..... Marschner
2. Aria and Duet from "Euryanthe"..... Weber
3. "The Adventurer's," Waltz..... Lanner
4. Finale from "Wassertrüger,".....Cherubini

PART II.

5. Overture: "In the Highlands,".....Gade
6. "Night," from Symphony "The Desert,".....F. David
7. Adagio, from "Moonlight Sonata,".....Beethoven
8. Overtures, "Iphigenia in Aulis,".....Gluck

PART III.

9. Symphony (B flat, No. 2).....Haydn

PART IV.

10. Overture: "Schauspiel director".....Mozart.
11. Serenade (new).....Kitzler
- 12 and 13. Waltz and Polka.....Strauss, &c.

The scene was what chiefly interests me:—the free and easy, cheerful, sociable, respectable looking company. In many instances it was the family circle transferred to the café-concert; the German substitute, if not equivalent, for our home tea-parties. And, all alive and sociable as everything was, what listening silence so soon as the orchestra commenced! A single "hush" from the humblest individual is instantly respected. I tell it to my young countrymen and countrywomen, that they may know there is such a thing recognized in the world as good manners in a concert-room.

But I must go without the symphony; for Herr R. is to call for Joachim and me, to take us round to the club-room of his Tonkünstler-Verein, to hear the Hautboy Concertos of Handel. We enter a long room, across one end of which are rows of music stands for an orchestra of 25 or 30. The gathering crowd through which we are led, of members and of guests, all real music-lovers, is very talkative and lively, and the reception right artist-like and cordial. J. of course is a popular hero in all such assemblies of the faithful, and every brother must seize his chance to grasp the strong hand and exchange some pleasant words with him; so that we are some time in reaching the seats assigned to us before the orchestra.

The bond of union is purely art and the society of artists; they meet to practice the music simply for the love of it (particularly the less known works of older masters), not to rehearse for any business purpose. It is something like the "Amateur Orchestra," that for many years existed, perhaps still exists, in Boston; only these are not amateurs, but mostly skilled musicians who hold places in the Royal Kapelle, &c. Herr R., their leader, an intelligent gentleman, learned in the history of music, and enthusiastic about the great old masters, plays, I was told, a trombone in the Kapelle. He prefaced the performance with a few remarks to the listeners on the history and peculiar structure of the two concertos about to be tried. We found them very interesting; full of the broad, jubilant, strong life of Handel, his unsentimental tenderness, his sweetness and nobility of melody, his thoroughly ingrained, spontaneous contrapuntal unity, his darling quaint conceits and mannerisms—which may fatigue, but cannot nauseate, like those of the modern operatic stage. They seemed not so much concertos for a solo instrument, in our present sense, as orchestral pieces (concertstücke) with oböe or both oböes, obligato—and that only in some movements. They come as near to the Symphony form, almost, as that one which I have since heard by Emanuel Bach. But perhaps the term "suites" for the orchestra would best describe them; each presenting a succession of different movements related in character and key. There were the strong, billowy figures, in which giant Handel delights, kept up in massive combinations of all the strings, and answered by flutes, oboes, bassoons and horns. And here one could see the sense of that construction of the orchestra in Handel's time, which strikes us as so odd when we read about it. Who does not always feel,—when the overture to the "Messiah" or "Samson" is given, for instance,—that there is something ridiculously pinched and feeble when the strong phrases of the whole body of strings with double-basses are answered by a pair of starveling flutes and oboes? Handel had hautboys and bassoons by tens and twenties in his bands. Such points naturally were discussed in these reunions of musical inquiries. The oböes were beautifully played; and one of them had a most lovely melody to play, or rather sing, in an Adagio Cantabile of rare beauty, that would seem modern alongside of Schubert and Weber, both in its melody and its accompanying figure.

We had to leave this pleasant sphere of musical spirits, when the desks and seats were thrust aside for long tables with beer, cigars and regular evening commerz; not before inscribing our names in their books, and receiving pressing invitations to come again and often; particularly one, which we accepted, for an evening of the next week, to hear Handel's "Fire" and "Water" music; but which, to our regret, did not take place, owing to the absence of some essential instrument. Now that can really be called a musical city, in which the best musicians can be socially and musically at home one or two evenings in the week in this way. And could such societies exist in Boston, it would be one of the best means of making that a really musical city.

We go out into the moonlight, and, turning some dark corners—my companion leading—enter one of those smoke holes, swarming with beer-drinking life and laughter, distributed about in which, according to affinities, you may find the larger part of the intellectual, as well as the duller population, on any evening, in every city of Germany. The object is to find an old man, who is supposed to "kneip" here, and who, in his way, is quite a character. And presently there rose from the cigar smoke, in the further corner, the white head of a tall and rather courtly personage,—high intellectual forehead, strong profile—a face combining severity with companionable humor and a spice of drollery even—who greeted us very cordially, and entered eagerly into talk about America, and about the musical signs of the times, the old school and the new, &c., Plainly an oracle amongst his younger con-sodales in that corner, most of whom appeared to be musical. This was father WIECK, fond of having his own way evidently, but genial, witty, and proud (as he might be) of his daughters, Clara Schumann and the fräulein Marie. He knows well what is good in music; is a sharp, true critic, and is still as he long has been, one of the very best teachers of the piano living. Princes seek his tuition for their daughters, and pay him princely prices; and that his method is a good one, he has at least two notable examples in his own family to show. He is a thinker and not a mere man of routine; and he carries himself not only with dignity, but with freshness of youth still; good for conviviality and good for work. The old man and our strong young violinist were evidently on the best of terms together. It was pleasant to see them; and so it was to see with what a mixture of admiring affection and respect the young men would address their questions and remarks to the "Herr Concertmeister," as Joachim is styled at the court of Hanover, where he controls the music upon terms worthy of the independent spirit of an artist, and does not have to drudge in royal church and theatre like the Kapellmeisters of Dresden and most German courts. But, reader, it is time to take you out of this smoky, although genial, atmosphere, which we have only entered because it seems to bring one more into the heart of German, and particularly musical German life. Out in the crystal cold October night air again, we breathe new life, and, with the great shadowy dome of the Frauen-Kirche looming before us grandly against the chaste stars, and the world dreaming in moonlight around us, we walk back to our hotel, to a sweet sleep (mingled with whatever sadness) after so beautiful a day.

Oct. 28.—Sunday. Attended morning service in the Court Church or Cathedral—Catholic Court of a Protestant people! But then some old Elector of Saxony, successor of Luther's foremost political friend and champion, was glad enough to get the crown of Poland at the easy price of turning Catholic; and so it has stood ever since, his family piously adhering to his example. Princes have convenient consciences in these matters. Crowns make creeds convertible; you can change all so long as the first and central article, "the divine right of kings," remains untouched. The church is an elaborately decorated structure in the Italian style, in somewhat oval shape, with a crowd of tall statues, more imposing by their size and the great shadows that they cast than beautiful, keeping watch and ward around the roof. It is of a blackened stone color, and connected by a bridge with the still more black and habby looking royal palace. Opposite to it is the theatre, more elegant, eclipsing both. And the royal orchestra, or kapelle, from the theatre is transferred to the church choir on Sundays. Inside, the church has some splendor, several large paintings, fine, but not first-rate, and some frescoes on the ceiling which seem to emulate the style of Michael Angelo. A line divides the whole length of the church, and the women sit or stand on one side, the men on the other, less in the royal box, on one side of the altar, sat the old King John, looking rather sleepy and blasé; he should have more sympathy with free and noble spirits than to have consented to the delivering up the Count Teleki to Austria, for he himself translated Dante. There was a fine Silbermann organ; a fine orchestra, and a fine choir of boys, as well as of mixed voices; and the music is commended to strangers by the guide-books. This time a new mass was performed, the composition of one of the kapellmeisters, KREBS, who conducted in person. It was smooth enough, sweet sounding, commonplace production, rather sentimental than expressive, quite as much Italian as German, and not deeply expressive even in the crucifixus. The short choral and liturgical strains sung by the boys spoke to me more.

The rest of this day does not belong to you, O reader—until the evening, when from the solitary walk I hasten back across the bridge,—the perfect beauty of the full harvest moon reflected on the Elbe—to be in season for the opera, Mozart's Zauberflöte. With all the excellent drollery and extravaganza that is mixed up in it, the prevailing impression of that opera on my mind has always been religious and sublime; few things come nearer to the character of great sacred music, than does those portions assigned to Sarastro and the priests, and the music of the trials in the last act. It was written in the same period and in the same state of mind with the Requiem. (This suggestion is not made here for the first time in this Journal.) And the plot itself, what is it, with all its fantasticalities, but the initiation, through the trial and sacrifice of two young souls into the mysteries of the higher life, of a pure, immortal love? Who will say the music is not equal to the theme? The theatre is indeed a beautiful one, but had a somewhat old and dingy look inside; and those who sit in the parquet are more crowded than in our Boston Theatre; nor is it quite so large as either of our "Academies of Music." But the arrangements, decorations, &c., are most tasteful; and the stage effects, and scenery far beyond what we have.

The piece was very finely performed; the great excellence being in, what we had been led to expect of German theatres, the perfection of the ensemble. It was good enough as a whole to reconcile one to considerable inadequacy in two or three leading parts. The maiden part of Pamina, for instance, was hard and soulless in the rendering of Fränlein Baldamus; and I felt this the more after the beautiful and touching manner in which I had heard the same part sung, and seen it acted, in Munich, by a young debutante of remarkably fresh, soulful quality of voice, (Fr. Stehle), who entered admirably into the pure and innocent feeling of the music. The Sarastro had a ponderous voice enough, but no priestly dignity and air of wisdom; round-faced and beardless like a lazy tavern-keeper. The tenor, Herr Rudolph, as Tamino, was fair, and sang at least in good taste. The Queen o' Night, Fran Janner-Krall, had a good degree of brilliant vocalism for those high bravura passages, and made one feel too that there is character and passion in that music. Papageno (Herr Dettmer) was delightfully droll and clever, making the grotesqueness of the part poetical and true to the music. Then certain parts, which have some of the finest and heavenliest music, the Three Ladies and the Three Genii, always abridged and murdered on our stage, were here entrusted to really good singers, and nothing was left out. The choruses of priests were given with sublime effect; so admirable in a male chorus I had never heard. Nor in any opera, so admirable an orchestra, unless perhaps in the Grand Opera, in Paris. It seemed to me even more perfect than the Gewandhaus orchestra; the wind band certainly was so. And Herr RIETZ was the model of a conductor, all alive and life-inspiring. It was a perfect luxury, apart from the singing, to hear the Mozart music brought out by that orchestra. The scenic displays and transformations too, were marvellous; everything artistic, ideal, up to the intention of the music, cooperating with it; instead of making burlesque of the whole thing, as we so often see in the hurried, bungling, pompously heralded attempts to get up some grand opera in the short "seasons" of our speculator impresarios in Boston and New York. I went away, although it was a theatre, with thoughts solemnized and at the same time exalted; far more so than from the church mass in the morning. We talked late and long that night.

Oct. 29. A bright, cold day. The morning goes off rapidly in the gallery of paintings. First—there is no resisting it—another look at Raphael's heavenly Madonna. She seems to glow with a yet heavenlier loveliness, to have soared to a yet higher sphere, since the first visit. I never saw a picture that was so full of soul. Its influence is like music. From the good copies you can imagine that; but you must come to the original to realize it. Next, we slip into the small side cabinets and traverse the whole twenty of them till we find ourselves in the corresponding hall at the other extremity of the long building, before the also admirable, but by no means equally inspired, Madonna and child of the younger Holbein, with the old Burgermeister and his family of Basel kneeling before them. This is the great treasure of the gallery in German art. Before many other curious, often beautiful German works we stop; one or two only by Diirer—you must go to Munich for him; many by Cranach; a few by Van Eyck, Hemlin, &c. There are fine Rubenses; particularly fine Rembrandts and Van Dycks. The Spanish school, too, is rich: Murillo, Velasquez, Herrera, Spagnoletto (his St Maria of Egypt kneeling before her grave, an angel throwing her grave-cloth over her—dismal situation, but wonderful picture). And there is no end of exquisite little pictures by the Dutch masters:—Ostade, Teniers, Netscher, Wouvermann, Metsu, &c., &c.,—and Mieris, whose minutely finished, charming little character pieces seem to contain the germ, if not almost the model, of this new modern French school of Frères, &c., so much imitated by our young American artists. But, next to the Madonna of Raphael, the picture before which I lingered longest was a small one by Titian, called the "Zinsgroschen," i. e. "the tribute money." Two heads only, that of Christ and of the Pharisee holding up the coin. The former is the most beautiful, spiritual, reverence and love inspiring face which I have yet seen in any painter's imagination of the subject; for they are of course all failures. The color seems actually breathed upon the canvas—or rather, wood—it does not seem like paint or anything mechanical. Next in point of interest was Correggio's Adoration of the Shepherds, commonly called Correggio's "Night," and half a dozen other of that master's more important works.

I hurry back, belated, to the rehearsal of our two artists; too late to hear much, but not for the beginning of a pleasant acquaintance with the Frau Clara Schumann.

After dinner a walk alone into the yellow woods of the royal Grossgarten, or Great Garden, the finest and most extensive of the beautiful parks about Dresden. Tastefully laid out roads and walks, elegant palaces and groups of statuary surprising you at various turns, and cafés as big as palaces, &c. It was one of these last that the wanderer sought, a long time bewildered in the pleasing labyrinth; for he had seen a concert announced there. Luckily belated! for he entered just in time to hear only the two middle pieces of the programme, which were all he wanted. Such was the profound, attentive silence of the groups around the coffee-tables at that moment, that he almost feared to enter; but he must creep to a seat, or lose what the orchestra had just commenced, a symphony (No. 1, in C) by Weber. That romantic composer he had never met before in this form. It was interesting, not poor in Weberish ideas and warmth of instrumentation; in the andante and the Finale (Presto) beautiful; but not a great symphony. The other piece was the Coriolan overture of Beethoven, in point of fiery, concise, concentrated, complete utterance his best. And during both these pieces the beer mugs and coffee cups refrained from rattling, as did thoughtless tongues, and women plied their knitting-needles all so quietly and listened, as if that was what they had come for. Is not this a musical people? It was a nice orchestra, directed by one Mannfeldt.

The evening brings the second Soirée of CLARA SCHUMANN and JOACHIM, and we are seated in another brilliant audience, more numerous and enthusiastic than before. Programme:

1. Sonata (A major), piano..... J. S. Bach
2. Leier: "Waldesgespräch" (Eichendorff.) } Schumann
"Dein Angesicht" (Heine)..... }
3. Sonata, (B minor) piano..... Clementi
4. Rondo brilliant (op. 70), piano and violin.... Schubert
5. Adagio, and Scherzo, violin..... Spohr
6. Lieder: "Geständniss (Geibel.) } Schumann
"Der Hjalgo" (Do.) }.....
7. Sonata (op. 47, A major), piano and violin... Beethoven

You may imagine that the "Kreutzer Sonata" was played on this occasion about as grandly and inspiringly as it could be played. No violin, no strings, that I have ever heard, vibrate so strongly out of the soul of Beethoven, as Joachim's; and Mme. Schumann so far, take it all in all, impresses me as the best interpreter of Beethoven on the piano. Joachim, too, gave us the best side of Spohr that evening. Could Spohr himself have presented himself to better advantage? The Sonata by old Bach was of course one of the newest, freshest things, which one can hear in these barren days of virtuoso-dom and "Zukunft's" music. A most charming and really edifying variety in this programme was furnished by the songs of Robert Schumann, four of his most felicitous and beautiful. And they had the advantage of a singer, a young tenor from the Royal Opera, Herr SCHNORR VON CAROLSFELD (a son, I think, of the distinguished painter, who designed the Niebelungen frescoes at Munich), who in warmth and sweetness of voice, purity and style, and delicate truth of expression and feeling excels any German tenor I have heard, and can sing such German songs as satisfactorily as one can ever hope to hear them.

Another long letter already, and yet not done with Dresden! D.

Mr. J. C. D. Parker's Musical Soiree.

PART I.

1. Quartette.....Haydn
2. Variations Concertantes, for Piano and Violoncello.
Mendelssohn
3. Aria: "Quando miro".....Mozart
4. Piano Sonata, op. 7.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio, Largo, Allegro, Rondo Grazioso.

PART II.

5. Grand Duo. Two Pianos. "Homage à Händel"
Moscheles
6. Songs: { "Sun of the sleepless," (from Byron's "Hew Melodies"),.....Mendelssohn
"Love's Messenger".....Fesca
7. { Presto Scherzando.....Mendelssohn
{ Valse, op. 18.....Chopin
Miss Fay.
8. Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello.....Schubert
Allegro, Andante con moto, Scherzo, Finale. Allegro.

As will be seen from the programme, the selection of pieces by Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Schubert was a very good one. In fact there was too much of a good thing, the programme was too long. Mr. PARKER had the assistance of Mrs. HARWOOD, Miss MARY FAY and the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. He appeared in four pieces, one solo and the other concerted. Best of all we liked his playing in the Variations by Mendelssohn with Violoncello and in the Trio by Schubert. In the latter we found great improvement since the last hearing at the Mendelssohn Quintette Club Concert. It was played with energy and taste, smoothly and effectively. It was a pity, however, that we had to go without the Scherzo, certainly the most pleasing movement to the public. We understand, of course, that the lateness of the hour was the reason for the omission. Yet we would gladly have staid the four minutes longer, to hear it. The variations gave real pleasure, being played finely by Messrs. Parker and WULF FRIES. The Duo by Moscheles, "Homage à Händel" likewise went very well with the exception of the Introduction which was taken somewhat too slow. It is a beautiful, strong and noble composition and pleased much. We should have liked less rubato playing in the Beethoven Sonata. The earlier sonatas of Beethoven, in fact all but the very last, require strict movement, and lose of their chaste character by a different treatment. With Beethoven all is on a large scale. Expression in his works depends principally on contrasting period against period, one large mass against another. Much less than in Chopin's or Schumann's works is it to be left to the arbitrary feeling of the player. It is only in his latest works that he employs a frequent change of tempo in the same movement of the sonata and there he always states it. So for instance in the A flat Sonata, op. 110, where in the last three movements the tempo frequently changes. The Allegro (Scherzo) would have been improved, we think, by a little more ease and abandon. The first two parts are full of roguish grace, which an easier, more lively style would have brought out. The trio, minore, was played somewhat louder in the first part than seems admissible. There the faint melody is to be surrounded by a halo of tones, shrouded in an atmosphere of sombre hues by means of the arpeggios which are to be as delicate as possible. The Rondo was less finished as to the mechanical part than the other movements.

Mrs. Harwood sang the aria in the first part in the right manner and with much feeling and expression. Her voice was not as clear as usual in the second part. The song by Mendelssohn, though it was sung so as to produce the sad melancholy mood in which it is written, would have been improved by a trifle more of feeling; it sounded slightly monotonous. The song by Fesca was the only piece that did not merit a place on the programme. It is taking, and was encoored; but it is not of sterling merit. It bears the strong family-likeness of a number of boleros, without excelling in original ideas. Mrs. Harwood acted in good taste not to repeat it, but to substitute the beautiful song by Schubert, "Faded flowers," which she sang beautifully.

Miss Fay acquitted herself finely in the Duo by Moscheles, where she played with marked taste and precision. Commendable is her touch. She brought out finely the nicest shadings, and in the piano passages exhibited a warmth and sweetness of tone that was truly pleasing. She also played very well the Presto scherzando by Mendelssohn. Less good was her version of Chopin's Valse in E flat. It lacked tenderness and nice shading and was hurried in many places, especially so at the close.

Members of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club assisted in the first and the last piece on the programme. They played well in both, especially so in the E flat Trio by Schubert.

In the place of the first piece, however, we had two movements from Mozart's D major quartette (No. 10), the first and third. The practice of playing parts only of a quartette or any piece in the sonata form is a bad one. We had occasion to make the same remark some time ago. It is especially so in a chamber concert like this, where we expect choice pieces entire. The same applies to repetitions of parts; in the Beethoven Sonata, as well as in the Trio by Schubert, a repetition of parts was omitted. Now we have no doubt, that Mr. Parker is as convinced as we are of the necessity of carrying out the intentions of the composers in this particular as in every other, and, as remarked before, ascribe these omissions to the length of the programme. But then it would have been better to curtail the programme and let us have entire pieces as the composers intended them. The Adagio in the Mozart Quartette lost much by not being preceded by that naïve and graceful Minuetto and followed by the lively, sparkling Allegro Finale. It sounded dead, tedious.

We applaud Mr. Parker for his good intentions in presenting so rich a programme to the public. In these days, when so many persons think it best to come down to the taste of the public, it is refreshing to see a faithful devotion to what is best and noblest in art. We wish the public had shown themselves as interested in the classical music offered by filling the hall better. *†

Popular Concerts.

"It is ill wind that blows nae body gude," says the Scotch proverb. In the dearth of our concert season the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB conceived and carried out the good idea of giving Saturday evening concerts, which were to be of a "quasi popular" character, as a contemporary happily styles it. They have given three thus far, in each of which they presented pieces of sterling merit. And an especial gain it was for us, to have converted pieces for wind and string instruments such as the septette by Beethoven, which was repeated. The Octette by Schubert was first played at a concert of the regular series, but was repeated at the second Saturday concert and Mademoiselle Patti's concert, which took the place of the fourth Saturday concert. The aria from Orpheus by Glück, the Allegro from Lachner's Quintette, the Canzonetta from Mendelssohn's Quartette and the Songs without words, though arrangements, all belong to what may be called strictly classical music. This selection is highly commendable and we do not find fault with the other pieces presented at those evenings.

There is a large class of persons, who either from a natural defect, or want of practice in listening to the best, or from a habit of listening to bad music, are unable to find enjoyment in what some people sneeringly term "classical" or "scientific" music. We almost wish those terms had never been employed. They are so often used as an excuse for disliking good music, that it would have been better had such people been left in ignorance of the distinction between compositions conveyed in those words. There are naturally those, who find anything tedious that is written by Bach or Handel; musical critics (save the mark!) who find the Messiah antiquated, who call the Octette by Schubert "broken-crockery music," going into ecstasies over the Haymakers and La Traviata. Now such people are to be pitied; for surely they would wish to admire the best, if only they could. And from their individual point of view they admire the best, in La Traviata or the Haymakers. There are such people in literature and every art. What would the New York Ledger, to name the prominent representative of a large class of papers, do without patrons in literature? How would the dabblers, who make those pictures that we receive periodically by the ship load from across the Atlantic, be able to earn a living, if it were not for just such persons, who admire the fearful specimens of the art of "the first European artists," as the advertisements of the auctioneer invariably read? We cannot expect that every one should stay away from the theatre, when "sensation pieces" are on the stage for weeks in succession. We cannot expect people suddenly to fall in love with Shakespeare, Milton, Spenser and Chaucer, and leave off reading stories "that are not continued." In short, we cannot expect people as a mass to like what is best, to have a tendency for the ideal. The mass of people, on the contrary, have a tendency to what is mediocre or commonplace, and so we have flourishing "opera houses," nightly thronged by "appreciative audiences," places that derive a principal attraction from the fact, that the natural color of the face and hands is changed to a more sable hue. And therefore we have no orchestral concerts, no "Philharmonic Society" this winter, because there is not interest enough in the mass of the people to pay $2.50 for six concerts.

There is demand for music of a low or at least common place character, and therefore that demand must be satisfied. And it will be satisfied. But this is a fact so well understood that it were hardly worth the ink shed in writing these paragraphs, if there were not people who conceive it to be their especial duty, to put in a plea for such music. It is scarcely a twelve month since a musical paper, not far from the town where we are writing, was inaugurated by a leader setting forth, that the concerts in Boston had been of too elevated a character; that they needed to be popularized; the public desired another class of music; and that therefore the programmes in future ought to be of a mixed character so as to attract large (mixed?) audiences. This reminds me of the preface to an instruction-book, in which the author alleges, that the majority of persons that learn music, do not desire or comprehend good music, and that in view of this fact (undeniable, to be sure,) pleasing music ought to be put in instruction books. Which the good man did, and thus supplied the "longfelt want." There is no danger, therefore, of that want for music of a lighter character ("Dixie," &c., &c.) being unsupplied. It is taken care of in the places proper for it. But where it ought not to be supplied, is just in the Music Hall or any other place where good concerts are given. We know there is music of a lighter kind, which is not as bad as Dixie; quite good in fact, of its kind, such as good waltzes and polkas and other dances, a number of operatic songs, without much lasting value, but as useful as candy or checkerberry lozenges. That too, is furnished generally in its proper place by bands, in afternoon concerts, &c. We have not the least objection to its being performed at its proper time and place. But to advocate the introduction of lighter music in "Philharmonic concerts" proves the incapacity of such persons or papers to take an intelligent part in the discussion of musical matters.

city of such persons or papers to take an intelligent part in the discussion of musical matters.

The mass of the people remain children, intellectually and morally. And therefore they ought to be treated as such. Generally speaking we have the idea that in the case of children a progressive course of instruction is best, proceeding from the rudiments up to the higher branches. Well then, if the public be like children, let them be musically instructed, proceeding from the A B C among musical composition to the nobler effusions of the human heart, from simplest national air or waltz and polka up to "classical or scientific" music.

The M. Q. Club have undertaken to give "quasi-popular" concerts. They have shown by their programmes, what was to be expected, that they have the due regard for what is best, by introducing such excellent pieces at those Saturday concerts, as they have. We will conclude this article by repeating a suggestion made in the Journal before, and adding another. Among Haydn's 37 Symphonies there are six for eight, two for nine, seven for ten, five for eleven performers and one for twelve. Fifteen only of the thirty-seven require an orchestra of from thirteen to nineteen performers. As the Club have already brought out a Septette and an Octette, some of these symphonies might be put on their programmes; so introducing Boston audiences to much that they would hardly have heard, if we had orchestral concerts. "It is an ill wind that blows nae body gude."

Another suggestion would be, to place the pieces of sterling value in one and those of less importance in another part of the programme, so that one might not be obliged to hear pieces of little interest, while waiting for those held in higher esteem. This would work both ways. Persons who wish to hear lighter music need not sit out a classical piece and vice versa.

We wish to say more on this subject in a future article. *†

Mlle. PATTI'S CONCERT attracted a large audience last Saturday evening. The Mendelssohn Club contributed the Schubert Octette, divided into two parts, which was more effective in the great hall than we should have supposed it could be.

Mlle. PATTI abundantly confirmed the good impression she made at the concert of Stigelli, and was enthusiastically applauded in all she did. And of STIGELLI what can we say that we have not already said. Mr. EICHNER played a violin solo in his usual faultless manner, and Mr. S. B. MILLS, the pianist of the evening, showed himself an artist of remarkable skill, and made upon the audience the marked impression that we anticipated in hearing him some months ago, in private. The audience, we think, would have been better pleased with a Chickering piano, as the Steinway grand used at this concert was certainly no better an instrument than we are accustomed to hear in concerts here, and the New York chef d'œuvre failed to excite the admiration anticipated, or to bear the comparison with the Chickering's Erard piano.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB are going to present at their next Tuesday's concert for the first time in Boston a Quintette in F minor for Piano and strings by Dussek, also to play the grand quartette in E flat, op. 127, by Beethoven, which so took with the public last year, truly a splendid project.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. — OUR readers will be glad to see the announcement of a concert tomorrow evening by this Society, in connection with Stigelli and Mlle. Patti. The programme embraces sterling selections of choruses from St. Paul, Elijah, Solomon and the MESSIAH, and Stigelli will sing the Cujus Animam of Rossini which he is so well adapted to give in the best way.

Musical Correspondence.

ST. LOUIS — FABBRI, has been here, and gave three concerts, assisted by Abelli Baritone, and Herr Müller, Pianist. Do you expect to be bored with a criticism? If you do, you won't. It is the fault of our geographical position that we do not hear any body till you get all the information you wish. The merits of all the artists are fully discussed before we get our chance. So we can only say that Fabbri has been here, through the liberality of Mr. Boernstein. You know how she sang, and how we were delighted.

But something remains for us to speak of. The state of the music in our city amongst ourselves, or in other words, the welfare of our Philharmonic Society. The spirit is still kept up and it is making rapid progress. Mr. Sobolewski, conducting orchestra and vocal both with the same facility.

PART I.

1. Overture, "Le Nozze di Figaro,".....Mozart
2. {a} Chorus, "Arise up, arise," } from Orato- (Mendelssohn
 {b} Choral, "Sleepers awake," } rio St. Paul. } Bartholdy
3. Bravura Song "Happy Birdling," with flute accompaniment.....W. V. Wallace
4. Piano Solo, "Concert Stueck,".....C. M. Von Weber
5. Duett, "While thus around joy," from La Favorite.....Donizetti

PART II.

1. Overture, "Fingal's Cave,"Mendelssohn Bartholdy
2. Chorus, "Happy and blessed are they, from St.
 Paul.....Mendelssohn Bartholdy
3. Violin Solo, "Je suis le petit tambour,".....F. David
4. Scherzo from 7th Symphonie.....Beethoven
5. Solo and Chorus, "Conjunction et Benediction," from
 "Les Huguenots,".....Meyerbeer

The very elements conspired to make this a success. The weather was settled, and the full moon shone with a softer and mellow light than ever is seen in your colder latitudes—and to crown all it was—think of it, it was in St. Louis, splendid sleighing.

It is three years since I have seen a sleigh, and as I listened to the sweet music of the soft bells, and the crisping snow, and watched the sleighs, driving up and depositing their precious burdens until 2400 were anxiously waiting for the overture, I again fancied myself in your city. Never did concert prove a more perfect success. Miss McGunegle sang the Happy Birdling, Mr. Carr of course playing the Flauto obligato, Mr. Chas. Balmer presiding at the piano. Mr. Bodie, played the Concert Stück, and suffice it to say that nothing more could have been desired in its performance. The duett from La Favorita was sung by Mr. Crowell and Miss Walker, and the Violin Solo by Prof. Anton.

The overtures and choruses were well received. I know not how now many there were in the chorus, I counted 165 from where I sat.

In the "Benediction" Miss Annie Dean Mr. Catherwood and Mr. Labatski took the prominent parts and many times have we heard worse singing, even in the great metropolitan troupes. Does not the Society deserve credit for bringing it out and doing it well, and all the rest of that programme besides? The influence of such a society as ours, can hardly be over-estimated. people are beginning to think of other music than "Dixie." The society is now firmly established and has over $7000. The Director is a man of the highest ability, the members are talented and hard-working and the community are being more and more interested every day, and we wish you to take notice that New York and Boston will have their most formidable rival in our great Western Metropolis. A. C.

CINCINNATI, JAN. 28, 1861.—The third concert of the Cecilia Society was given on Friday, 25th inst., with the following excellent programme :

PART I.

- Vintager's Chorus from the "Seasons,".....Haydn
 Duo for Violin and Pianoforte.....Heller and Ernst
 Aria from "The Marriage of Figaro,".....Mozart Adagio and Finale from "Sonata," F Min.....Beethoven a "Passage Birds Farewell," } For Soprano and Alto, b "Flowing and Ebbing," } Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Scene from "Tannhäuser,".....R. Wagner

PART II.

- Hunting Chorus from the "Seasons,".....Haydn
 Concert Song.....Eckert
 Concerto for Violin.....De Beriot
 Three Songs.....Rob. Franz a Love in Spring.
 b Autumn Sorrow.
 c He has come in Rain and Storm.

Finale from the uncompleted Opera "Lurelin," Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

The magnificent finale from Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, Lorelei, was the gem of the evening, and to Mad. Rivé we are under especial obligations for the excellent manner in which she sustained the difficult Soprano Solo.

Owing to the illness of Mr. Howard Vaughan, who was to have made his first appearance in public here, the Duo for the Violin and Piano and the Concerto were omitted. The disappointment which the announcement created was relieved in a measure by the substitution of Beethoven's 6th minor Sonata, performed by Mr. Andrés. In the last movement of this Sonata we should have preferred a more strict adherence to the tempo in which it was begun; the Adagio and Allegretto however were faultless. The scene from Tannhäuser was given as well as could be expected from a feeble piano accompaniment. For a more thorough appreciation of the three songs by Robert Franz we could suggest a repetition of the same in the next concert. J. A. D.

THE GREAT ENGLISH TENOR.—There is a great tenor singer in London, who has not yet been heard in this country. His voice combines the power of Braham, the pathos of Incedon, and the sweetness of Sinclair, all names of renown in the English ballad line. This famous tenor receives fifty pounds—two hundred and fifty dollars—every time he sings, whether it be in opera, oratorio, concert, or isolated entertainment. People go many miles to hear this vocalist, and people are often disappointed, for no Italian prima donna assoluta, no dainty and idolized primo tenore from the Scala or the San Carlo, ever had such a talent for "sudden indisposition." For some time the impression was strong that the gentleman was given to potations of inordinate strength; but this notion wore away when it was discovered that the great tenor labored under such nervous and neuralgic affections that he was obliged to resort to resort to the electric baths, and smaller nostrums, every day in his life. He really was ill, and no mistake. We observe, by the London papers, that it is now the fashion to turn the famous tenor's sickness to account. He is, for example, announced to play "Robin Hood," or to sing at a matinée, Morris's "Star of Love," or "Woodman, spare that tree." He is taken ill; but the audience have paid their money, and they go away, after hearing an indifferent substitute performance, hoping for "better fortune next time." A few days elapse, and then comes the announcement, "Fra Diavolo," by our hero, "his first appearance since his hoarseness." There is a rush. For three consecutive nights he sings. Again a stoppage and then a new excitement: "Elvira," Mr. ———'s first appearance since he was upset in the buggy." We see, by the Times, that the uncle of the distinguished vocalist has just died. A decent pause, and then we may expect to read, "Come into the garden, Maud," will be sung by the popular favorite, his first appearance since he lost his uncle!" really the liberties which vocalists and their "managers" take with an enlightened public, in trying to make capital of disasters and domestic affairs, would be intolerably offensive if they were not insufferably ridiculous.—Home Journal.

THE MYSTERY OF MUSIC.—What a mystery is music—invisible, yet making the eye shine; intangible, but making all the nerves to vibrate; floating between earth and heaven; falling upon this world as if a strain from that above, ascending to that as a thank-offering from ours. It is God's gift, and it is too lofty for anything but his praise; too near to the immaterial to be made the minister of sordid pleasure; too clearly destined to mount upwards to be used for inclining hearts to earth. O, that the churches knew how to sing; making music a joy, a triumph, a sunshine. a song of larks, as well as a midnight song of the nightingale!—Arthur's Italy in Transition.

REV. DR. GUTHRIE, the distinguished Scotch divine of Edinburgh, says the correspondent of the Banner, recently made a statement in regard to postures of public worship, which has created a sensation. He expressed from the pulpit, a few Sabbaths ago, a wish to "disburden the conscience" on a matter which had long pressed upon it:

"He said that the proper attitude for singing was standing—proper because it was an act of worship, and proper because it was the better fitted for the act of singing. He said that he believed that there were a prejudice in favor of sitting during the singing of the psalms on the ground that it was a good old Scotch custom. This was an entire mistake. The good old Scotch custom was to stand, and sitting was first introduced in Scotland by the recommendation of the Westminster Commissioners, who wished that there should be an uniformity in worship in both parts of the island. It was introduced in Scotland in compliance with English prejudices.

"In like manner," said Dr. G. "kneeling at prayer, and not standing, is the proper attitude. He could himself testify that standing is a constrained attitude, in a narrow pew, distracted the attention and rendered it very difficult to follow the clergyman."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Gold rules the world. From "Bianca, the Bravo's bride." 25
 My childhood's days. " " " 25

Two Songs from Balfe's new Opera. As Balfe did not bring out a new opera last year and is said to have taken more than usual pains with this latest work of his, there will be considerable curiosity to see the gems. The opera has been eminently successful in London. Other songs, duets, &c., will follow immediately.

- The Balm of Gilead. H. T. Bryant. 25

A very funny song, which has often been executed at Excursions, Picnics, Camp-meetings, &c., during the last few years, and is now printed for the first time.

- The reaper and the flowers. Song. J. R. Thomas. 25

The well-known beautiful poem of Longfellow's, very finely set to music.

- Clean and I. Ballad. J. H. McNaughton. 25

A simple song for young singers which will prove very acceptable.

- Amongst the village swains. From "The Marriage of Georgette." 25

A popular song from a new comic operetta, by Victor Massé, lately brought out in London with great success.

Instrumental Music.

- Liberty Duet in "I Puritani." Four hands. 15

- Fra poco a me, in "Lucia," " 15

Easy arrangement for pupils in the second quarter.

- I know that my Redeemer liveth. Four hands. 15

Rimbault.

- With verdure clad. Four hands. " 15

Very easy arrangements.

- Overture, Merry Wives of Windsor. Nicolai. 75

A standard overture, and one of the very prettiest. It will soon become as familiar as the overtures to Zampa, Martha, &c.

- Austrian Medley. Chas. Grobe. 50

A potpourri of melodies peculiar to Austria, consisting chiefly of Tyrolean airs.

Books.

- DINORAH (Le Pardon de Plöermel). A Romantic Opera in Three Acts, with Italian and English Words. The latter by Henry T. Chorley.
 The Music by G. Meyerbeer. 3,00

An elegant volume is here presented as the seventeenth of the Series which, under the general title of "Standard Operas," has been issued during the past five years by Ditson & Co. This new opera of Meyer-beer contains many attractive features and has already attained a marked popularity with the admirers of the class of music it so ably represents.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 463.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 16, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 20.

(Translated from W. H. Riehl's "Musikalische Charakterköpfe," by Fanny Malone Raymond.)

A Dramatic Ballad Singer and a Musical Aristocrat.

II.

ASTORGA.

Emanuel von Astorga, ordinarily entitled "the Baron," was an Italian singer and composer, who lived in the first half of the eighteenth century.

I picture Astorga to my self as a proud, tall, noble form, a little bent by the weight of secret sorrow; a bold, yet finely cut profile; a dark, burning eye; a pale, spiritual face, formed by locks of long, raven-black hair. Don't tell me that he wore, in all probability, a long peruke, or at least powdered his dark hair; his thoroughly romantic character, gives the lie to peruke and powder. His manners were those of a man of the world; but under this thin mask of custom and education looks out the Poet, who, forced to live amid the splendor of courts, would more willingly have lived alone. Not merely his compositions, glowing with southern fire, stamp him as the musical romanticist of those "pig tail" days, but also his very personality, the destiny that wove the events of his life into a poem. In that life re-echoes the primeval story of a soul, repulsed from the world of action, and withdrawing into the cloistral sanctuary of art.

We first meet the youth of twenty—on the Rabenstein, held fast by the executioner's assistants, lest he should turn his eyes from the yet palpitating corpse of his father. It was the weak mind of Phillip the Fifth of Spain, who, by such means kept down the spirit of revolt in his island of Sicily; Astorga's father had been one of the heads of the party that drew the sword to further the independence of this island. His mother's heart broke. It is said of the son, that he remained some weeks, in dull unconsciousness, on the place of execution, and that the fearful picture of his youthful anguish had more effect on the susceptible Sicilians than the fear of punishment. Then it was that the countess Ursini, the celebrated "governess to the queen" (rather to the king) had him removed to the convent of Astorga in Spain.

From this came the musician's pale face under its black locks; from this the breath of melancholy that floats over all his works. But this trait of melancholy in Astorga's creations is separated, from the root up, from the sentimentality of most modern artists with—pale faces. He really lived through a most tragical life; he might have truly said "Out of my great sorrows, I make my little songs." It was not the hospital air of the study, but the woe of a cruel, historical hour, that laid such pallor on his cheek.

The deepest obscurity hangs over the beginning and the end of his life. His own name is not known. King Philip had his esentecheon broken up, his family estate confiscated; and the family name of the outlaw has disappeared, and is entirely forgotten. From the silent cloister, where Emanuel drew new interest in life from art, he took the name of Astorga. It can scarcely have soothed the anger of the King, when he found that the son of the condemned man won for his new name, a letter-patent of artistic nobility, that probably softened his grief for the extirpation of the old one. A cloud rests upon the master's end. He retired to a Bohemian cloister, no one knows where. And between this mysterious entrance and end, lies a romance.

From the Spanish convent Astorga went to the court of the Duke of Parma. Here the poetic youth became enamored of the Prince's daughter, in much such a manner as Goethe has pictured in "Tasso." Astorga was at once more and less happy than Tasso. The duke, who saw through the affair, sent him to Vienna, the most musical court of those days; and thus the artist was ushered, against the will of the lover, into the great musical world, and a disappointed passion was the price he paid for his entrance into an admirable school of art. Good musicians were then sure of a welcome at the Vienna court. The chapel-music of Leopold the first, employed about one hundred of them. The emperor himself tried all who wished to become members of his court as artists; he often deserted the study of political counterpoint for that of music, and was more at home among musicians than ministers. When he felt his last hour approaching, he sent for his musicians, and expired in the midst of a concert.

The unhappy Sicilian nobleman found a friendly asylum in Leopold's court, and the emperor favored him with his friendship. On the death of the latter, Astorga travelled through half of Europe, on an artistic tour. It was a very aristocratic pilgrimage. The composer most commonly rested in the palaces of princes. He left the fame of his genius behind him everywhere, but only once did he appear publicly, at the representation of an operetta.

Although he saw many towns and countries, he veiled his face from his fatherland, and never saw it again. But although the singer probably wished to forget his fatherland, it was impossible for him to disown it. In the tender melodious flow of the rondos in his chamber-cantatas, the national Sicilian melodies pierce through.

It seems as though the "Siciliano," the original of the graceful rhythm of the softly gliding six quaver bar, was ringing in the composer's ear continually. Often, while listening to one of Astorga's love songs, we have heard in fancy the "O Sanctissima" of the Sicilian sailor, lightly striking out his oars to the measure, while a soft evening wind bore the trembling, re-echoing sound over the boundless plain of a peaceful sea.

Critics have doubted some of the peculiar features in Astorga's life romance. They have found too little prose, too little of the philister in it, to give it the stamp of probability. But the scanty remains of Astorga's works prove the truth of these peculiar features, as much as their harmony and melodious form witness common facts of his outward life.

It is probably by something more than accident, that Astorga composed the "fac ut animæ donetur, Paradisi gloria" of his glorious Stabat Mater, in such a wonderful manner. Is not that the soul, that has swam through seas of sorrow, and th a even in the sight of the glories of Paradise, cannot express an echo of melancholy? And then the spot where the sword pierces the heart of the mother of God! Pertransivit gladius! The basses cry out the words demoniacally, in chromatic passages, against the swelling upper voices, and cut, with the sharpness of a sword, through the woof of the melody. Few composers, in this repeatedly composed passages, thrill the listener, through marrow and bone like the usually gentle Astorga. It is the sword, that on the place of execution, cut through the father's life, and pierced even to the soul of the son, he has probably here written down in notes, the history of his own sufferings, unconsciously.

Another great church composition of the master's, his Requiem, has been but lately discovered, in fragments. Obscurity closes about this man; but the little of his that we know and possess, is so precious, that it only makes one hunger after what is probably lost altogether.

Let us take the chamber cantatas by Astorga. A cantata "for solo voices" taken from those pig-tail lays, is usually a dry, rattling, sheepish love song, an endless quavering sigh of trills and passages. Always the same litany of betrayal, inconstancy, and all the woes of love, in minor, or else the undescribable delights of love in major. Such cantatas are tedium embodied in notes. They generally strike us as not merely old fashioned, but unnaturally wrinkled and hoary. It is as if Methuselah were making a declaration of love to some maiden of seventeen, in bag-pipe trills. In Astorga's cantatas we find the verses trite, and the form the outward one of the day. But we forget these defects for the sake of the deep, warm, soulfull glow, that gushes from the tones that overflow the meagre text. Astorga's chamber music takes the same place beside the compositions of his musical contemporaries of the Neapolitan school, as the pictures of Murillo beside the latter fruits of Italian painting in the seventeenth century. It is the musical Tasso, languishing for his Leonora at the court of Parma, who steps before us in these hymns of love, and not the stiff schoolmaster Nicolo Porpora, who wrote solfeggi over oaths of love. It is the romantic glow, the warm coloring of a southerner, that separates Astorga so sharply from the generality of his cotemporaries, and that brings him so near to the present day. And yet, amid all the glow of passion, he never entirely forgets his musical aristocracy, never throws aside his dignified, refined reserve in all artistic forms.

In the whole history of music, it is probable that no two characters can be found, so completely opposed to each other, as Wenzel Müller and Astorga. It seems even a grotesque conceit to group them together at all.

But both were characters in the fullest sense of the word; both original, genial, only moving apart as regards object and means. Müller wrote for the people, Astorga for the small number of poetical devotees; one was a lonely spirit, the other lived with the mass. Müller is little esteemed, because he was too popular; Astorga little known, since he was too aristocratic. Both were ignored by the pedants of the school; Astorga, because he had too much poetry, Müller, because he had too much nature for them. Astorga's influence was insulated; Müller was surrounded by scholars. One led a jolly citizens' life, the other was driven from adventure to adventure. Of Müller's circumstances we know very little, while his works are pretty well circulated; Astorga's history is comparatively well known, but few of his compositions have reached us. Here we know the artist through his life—there the artist's life in his creations.

The silent joy, the scarcely to be restrained delight, the Columbus-like consciousness of the amateur, who discovers, under a heap of paltry pictures, some masterwork, veiled in the dust of centuries, has often been described, in just and earnest terms. The enthusiast becomes a child once more, the pleasure of long past Christmas eves, lives again for him. All this I myself experienced, when, among some musical manuscripts, which I had obtained from an old collection in Holland, I found two "new" cantatas by Astorga, those very love-songs by the Parmesan Tasso which I have mentioned above. When one discovers such buried treasures in poetic literature, one's first thought is to publish them. With musical discoveries it is generally the last thought. There are few paying people, who will interest themselves for an Astorga. Then the thought of being the only one to possess and enjoy a masterpiece, has a great, though probably a selfish charm. Only on the hundredth anniversary of the death of Sebastian Bach, the glory of the German nation, was a Bach-foundation established, in such a manner, as to give every one, at length, the opportunity of procuring, by subscription, a correct and complete copy of our most national composers' works! No other art can offer a counterpart to their shameful example.

It has appeared to us a mere mockery, when we have observed how much a certain church aria of Stradella's has been lately sung in concerts, solely because it has pleased a libretto-poet to take an anecdote from the old musicians, life, and travesty it in opera form. On a sudden, the long-forgotten Stradella has become interesting, and every one is curious to know how the man really sang, who cut such a sentimental figure on this board as tenor amoroso.

Some admirers of Astorga had his finest work, the Stabat Mater, engraved (a few years ago); it was not done for the sake of gain, but to give their enthusiasm the satisfaction of exciting a sympathetic feeling in others. The name of a publishing firm does not appear on the title-page of the score; it is simply decorated with a cross. It is the cross, on which the ideal tone-poetry of the past has been crucified, by some of our modern musicians.*

* A poetic writer on the same subject, asks, "Has this cross reference to the unknown and forgotten grave of the dead, or the heavy burden that the living bore?"

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Diarist in Paris.

PARIS, JAN. 4, 1861.

Les Pêcheurs de Catane (the fishermen of Catania) at the theatre Lyrique is having quite a success, and yet as a play it is severely criticized, apparently with reason. In act I, the fisherman Cecco is in love with Nella, but without return, on the excellent grounds that she loves Fernand, a Spanish Lamartine, a great lord, nephew of the Governor of the island. It follows that she is not only in trouble herself but the cause of it to others. This must not be, and so, to make all right—she does that which makes all wrong—enters a convent. A heroic and decisive act enough, and we expect now that she will be heroic and decided all through the play. Being in a nunnery unluckily does not make her happy, and she groans behind, as Cecco does before, the grates, while the old folks make up a match between Fernand and his cousin Carmen, daughter of the governor. But the young man being in fact in love with Nella continues to put off the marriage for the present and hopes to get her from the cloister forever, when she comes to spend the usual three days at home before taking the vows. When she leaves the convent to this end, Cecco in his delight sings unutterable joys—if the expression be not too Irish—but Fernand does no more than give her a bouquet in which are concealed the magic words "I love you!"

In act II. we see the fishermen engaged at their occupation by torchlight, protected by an image of the Virgin, lighted by a red lantern. Cecco meeting Nella sings her a touching song expressive of his love and jealousy, at which she is so moved as to shed a flood of tears and the auditor expects her at last to give way and comfort the poor fellow with her hand. But after Cecco departs and before she dried her eyes, Fernand appears. At the sight of him she forgets everything; Cecco, the nunnery, her tears her vows, even the madonna illuminated by the red lantern and exclaims to her beloved "Ask of me whatever you will!" Hereupon the writer, from whom I am stealing, engages in somewhat severe criticism upon M. M. Cormon and Michel Carré the authors of the text for making their heroine guilty of such an untheatrical proceeding and one so unnatural, as this throwing herself into the arms of Fernand under the circumstances, without a word of reflection, regret, shame, clearly is. The music might save the situation—but does not. Sure of Nella Fernand determines to carry her off, and sends her a note appointing her rendezvous and requesting her to sing that his boat may follow hers. The person to whom the note is confided gives it to Cecco—a grand burst of jealousy—who causes Nella to sing—Fernand follows and is siezed by some insurgent fishermen, who are overtaxed by the governor, and who intend to keep him as a hostage until their demands are satisfied. In spite of a tempest Nella, accompanied by Cecco, goes in her boat to the castle and obtain the means of releasing the prisoner.

In the third act, Carmen who is waiting her intended, has obtained mercy for the revolted fishermen and an amelioration of the laws affecting them. But she is so full of marriage thoughts that the papers are lying forgotten among the trifles upon her dressing-table; but the appearance of Nella praying for aid for Fernand brings them to light again. Nella is enchanted to have saved her lover, but finds marriage with him out of the question, and as she cannot and will not love and marry Cecco, she has no resource but the convent—into which she does not enter for the very good reason that she goes mad and dies—like the Lucia and Traviata business.

M. Maillart's music finds a considerable degree of favor. The introductory chorus; the religious and feeling song of Nella on leaving the convent, her air, half Sicilienne, half tarantelle; the orchestration in the fishing scene by torchlight; the swallow song, and the touching romance, "I am jealous," are noted as fine. The third act is the feeblest but, why did the writers of the text go over ground which has been treated before and upon which Donizetti and others have exerted their talents?

The burlesque Orpheus with Offenbach's music ran on to about 350 representations—of course this great number being partially due to the smallness of the place—but that the music had much to do with it, is shown by this fact, that before it was withdrawn two other works of his were acting, one, the ballet Le Papillon at the French opera, the other le Roi Barkouf, a comic opera at the Opera Comique.

King Barkouf is sadly treated by the critics—that is the text—and the music too, for that matter, as being too much of the burlesque order. The man of the Presse begins, "M. Offenbach must complain of the absurd poem to which he has been condemned, and M. Scribe has also cause of complaint, if indeed Barkouf, be his last work, as it is said. This would be closing his career with the song of a goose. What a strong faith a writer must have in the patience of the public to produce before it such nonsense. What a contempt of justly acquired reputation and for the literary Mr. Grundy (qu'en dira-t-on), is shown in the signing of a celebrated if not illustrious name, to such a farce, unworthy of the booth at a fair!" and so on. "Barkouf is a monster without head or tail, an indigested potpourri of silly situations and insipid jests," and so on. The other critics, whom I have read, talk in a similar manner.

But who is "King Barkouf?"

The people of Lahore were much given to sedition, and their kings, appointed by that old Public Functionary, the Grand Mogul, however an easy life they may have led of it, came in divers cases to uneasy ends; for instance, King Barkouf's illustrious predecessor, they had thrown out of the window, a process so bad for his health, that he then and there gave up the ghost. The Grand Mogul was justly incensed at this treatment of his viceroy, and appointed Barkouf king in his stead. Barkouf is a dog, that once owed Maïma as his mistress. He reigns, as do many Public Functionaries, by the advice and consent of his ministers, or cabinet, he having only to sign papers, that is put the stamp of his paw upon them. To Maïma he is a lamb, but to Vizier Balababeek he is a veritable tiger. On the whole the new king, to whom are shown all the honors, and who has his court and all sorts of sovereign powers, under the Mogul, does pretty well signs papers, and lives in clover,—but occasionally he gets his temper up and plays the very what-is-it? with his inferior understrappers. In one of these transports of fury, the tiptop cupbearer of his majesty brings a paper for his sign-footal. This act is one commanding officer Saib to espouse the rather over-ripe daughter of the said cupbearer. Barkouf, it would seem, understands all the horror of condemning that fiery young man to the withered charms of that particular dame, and utterly refuses his signature. Now Mariam and the said Saeb are—keep it dark—lovers, and pretty far gone in the disease. She comes, and seeing at a glance that Barkouf is her old companion offers to do the needful and bring him into subjection. They will not admit her at first expecting to see her torn in pieces, but she perseveres and to their astonishment, is received by the dog with every mark of affection. She has heard of the project of marrying Saeb to her withered rival and determines to prevent its execution. From this time Maima is "interpreting secretary" to his majesty, and Labore under her wise government becomes the land of Cockayne. The imprisoned insurgents are pardoned, and Saeb is not forced to marry against his will. The courtiers and members of the cabinet find their projects defeated, and prefer rather than lose their offices, which have become almost hereditary, to secede from the Grand Mogul's empire, and call in to their aid England and Louis Napoleon—pshaw, I mean, the Tartars, poison King Barkouf, and have everything their own way again. It is the cupbearers business to do the poisoning, and he mingles the drug with the dog's drink. But Maima finding out the plot commands in the name of Barkouf, the conspirators to drink of it. Of course they will not; of course, this unmasks them; of course this is very original and effective! Well, the Tartars approach the city, Barkouf, Saeb and the army attack and route them, the dog falling fighting valiantly. The great Mogul is in high good spirits at the result. He commands Maima to select a new king. She chooses Saeb, they marry on the spot, and, it is to be hoped if they are not dead that they are alive still.

The Presse is severe upon the music; so is the Opinion. But the latter finds much sweet melody in it. It says, "melody reigns in the work as Barkouf did at Lahore. So long as Maima is interpreter all goes well. But when the great public functionaries mingle in all goes badly. In fact it is not melody which they sing but a sort of rhythmic harmony, or still better, a harmonic hash of which here is the recipe for the use of such persons as desire to find an easy amusement in composition of this sort:

Take the principal note of a chord, or a some aggregation of a sound; lay it upon a chopping block; cut it into quarters, eighths or sixteenths, according to the necessities of the syllables; press the hash to give it form, between two sham pauses, then sauce it with orchestration and serve promptly. This is precisely the way in which cooks make meat-balls."

The grand fault, which the critics find is that Offenbach, in writing for another stage and another audience than those at the Bouffes, has not written in another manner, that he still remains the maker of burlesque music, in placethere, but not here.

In farther commendation I will add some passages from the Patrie upon Offenbach, for if he is destined to become a great composer, it is well to know how his early efforts are received, and if not, we shall see how nearly French newspaper criticism hits the truth.

After speaking of the many difficulties, which beset the path of young composers—another proof that Paris is not quite an Elysium for musical students—he adds that now and then a lucky individual appears and to the number of these favored existences, these happy destinies, must be added the name of M. Offenbach.

"Very young when he began his career which was a virtuoso, he drew attention immediately and everywhere. His instrument was the violoncello; he was one of the most distinguished performers whom we have heard, and rapidly acquired a sort of reputation; in his case it was legitimate, but with what pains and efforts have so many others alone been able to gain it? But this was not enough for M. Offenbach. He dreamed of theatrical success and the more enduring glory of the composer. So he wrote and in his first essays made his mark as he had done as a virtuoso.

Then the direction of a theatre was entrusted to him. Master of himself, judge of his own works, and able to appreciate his own merits at their proper value, his ambition now encountered fewer obstacles than ever. Eulogiums almost unanimous, an unusual kindness on the part of the public, the press encouraging him with a benevolence almost amounting to partiality, roused his ambition too high and misled the young author as to the real grasp of his talents, the true measure of his powers. Hence the first check, which the constant good fortune of M. Offenbach has received. From this first error proceeded his first disappointments. It is an easy thing for a man to give way to the suggestions of vanity, which will creep into the most diffident and modest heart. Can we blame Offenbach, then, for having given way? At all events it must be admitted that his genius was restricted upon the narrow stage, where it alone had play; that it wanted a larger field, a broader horizon. The author of the new Orpheus thought so and resolved to strike a decisive blow for fame.

"Eminent composers regard it as a distinguish-honor, as an unheard-of happiness to have their works brought out at the Grand Opera or the Opera Comique. M. Offenbach has boarded both at the same time. The idea of appearing upon both stages at once, and of obtaining on the same day a double triumph, was a beautiful dream; but one which only a genius could make real. Such extreme satisfaction of an honorable pride is to be purchased only by men, who can pay for it with masterpieces. Now whatever idea we may have of Offenbach's talents, it cannot be admitted that they are of a nature to authorize such pretensions and to justify such rashness. For when the power is less than the wish, courage degenerates into temerity. M. Offenbach shines at the Bouffes Parisiennes, but is eclipsed on stages of greater pretensions. We have proved this in case of the ballet Le Papillon, we see it again in the opera Barkouf. In the first of these there are qualities incontestably good in the midst of numerous weaknesses; in the second we find much less to praise. Barkouf is a check—but let us add in justice, that the authors of the text are in great measure responsible.

"We insisted in our last article upon the necessity of a composer having a good subject; but we did not expect that so striking a demonstration of the principle would so soon be afforded."

Then the writer proceeds to say that reduced to one act and brought out at the Bouffes it might do, but that at the Opera Comique it is utterly out of place and ought never to have been admitted there. Scribe, too, is by no means complimented for having his name added to that of M. Boissaux as one of its authors. I will only add one sentence of the many upon the music. "There is not a salient melody, nor an original one in Barkouf; all is sought; the ideas are elaborated by efforts, labor takes the place of inspiration, the will that of creative energy."

Plain speaking this—now just suppose, the man was an American and had produced his work in Boston or New York, and that any one had ventured to talk in this strain?

This evening (Jan. 9), at the Bouffes are to be given La chanson de Fortunio and Le Savetier et le Financier, music of both by Offenbach; and the Popillon at the Grand Opera.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

SACRED MUSIC.

VI.

1600—1800.

Before continuing the history of the theatre in France and showing how by degrees the various dramatic forms assumed their social character, let us cast a rapid glance at the condition of sacred music during the two centuries which have preceded our own.

The liturgic unity of the Roman church, established with so much care in the 16th century, was soon broken, so to remain with no attempt to renew it, until our own days. The Council of Trent was opened in 1545, under Pope Paul III., but was adjourned from time to time. Paul III. and Paul IV. had passed away, and Pius IV. came into the papal chair.

A project of reforming the liturgy was formed at Augsburg, by Charles V., Emperor, in which he demanded that the prayers of the church should be conformed to the institutions of the ancient Fathers. In 1562 a representation was made to Cardinal Lorraine of the necessity of "purifying divine service. Pius V., who had now succeeded Pius IV., took in hand the manuscripts of Paul IV. and all the papers of the Grand Council. He put in force again the canon of Gregory VII., upon the selections from the Scriptures in the morning lessons; the homilies of the holy fathers were selected with remarkable discernment and the legends of the saints were rigorously purged of all that was apocryphal. [?] When this work was ended Pius V. promulgated the new edition of the Roman Breviary at St. Peter's on the 7th of the Ides of July, 1568. In 1570 he made a special purpose of promulgating the new missal.

At this epoch the French churches had a liturgy formed upon the Roman one introduced by Charlemagne, and of customs, which they had the right to maintain by the express provisions of the Bull. The University of Paris had always exhibited a vigorous orthodoxy in regard to the liturgy, and the council of Rouen, held in 1581, recommended conformity to the constitutions of Pius V. In 1583 the councils of Rheims, Bordeaux and Tours made the same recommendation. In the following years Bourges, Aix, Toulouse and Narbonne received the bull of Pius V. and other provinces adopted similar measures for liturgic reform. The reformed Roman service books were also introduced into the chapel of the King by order of Henry III. but the parliament exhibited an opposition of evil augury to the old principles of the liturgy.

The Gregorian chant had so degenerated that Pope Marcellus thought seriously of banishing music entirely from the churches. Palestrina saved the art by his masterpiece, — the mass known by that pope's name — and disarmed the enemies of sacred music. The council of Trent prohibited all lascivious and secular airs, both upon the organ and in the vocal music of the service, but recommended the study of ecclesiastical singing in the seminaries of theological learning. Gregory XIII. reformed the calendar, and promulgated the Roman martyrology. Pope Sixtus V. established the congregation of Rites, and published an edition of the Vulgate; Clement VIII. published the Pontifical and the Roman ceremonial.

Why need this universal liturgy, so dear to the hearts of all true Catholics and again adopted by the general assembly of the French clergy in 1605, have been invaded and caused to degenerate during the reigns of Louis XIV. and Louis XV.? Why that individualism, which separates, rather than that heartfelt sympathy, which unites?

Meantime, in the 17th century, a few champions of the old order of things ardently opposed the "pretended reform" of the liturgy; among the more noted names we may mention Cardinal Bonæ (in his Rerum liturgicarum, and his De Divina Psalmodia; the Benedictine monk, Benoît de Jumilhac, Nivers, Mabillon and Martène. In the 18th century, when faith was so feeble and tottering, it is pleasant to be able to recall the names Bergier, Lebenf, Poisson and Gerbert. But let us return to our special domain, that of music. Formé and Picot, sub-master of the music of Louis XIII.; that king himself composed motets, an office for Ash-Wednesday and a de profundis upon occasion of sickness. The Bournonvilles and Anxousteanx were fine organists for that period, Gantez and Gobert famous chapel-masters.

In the time of Louis XIV. the orchestra joined the voices in the performance of sacred music.

Dumont, born at Liege in 1610, author of the celebrated mass in plain song, which still remains popular in the French churches, refused, as did his colleague Robert — both being sub-masters of the royal chapel — to submit to the orders of Louis XIV. The two artists, holding to the decisions of the council of Trent, resigned their places. Harlay, Archbishop of Paris, decided that the council did not forbid instrumental symphonic music in the church. Dumont persisted, withdrew and died the next year, (1684).

Lulli then proposed to divide the duties among four masters, and obtained one of the places for his pupil, Colasse. Abbé Robert, who had also retired, recommended his protégé, Goupillet, to the king. The archbishop of Reims besought his Majesty to receive Minoret, and, for the fourth, Louis chose Miche, Richard de Lalande, born at Paris, Dec. 15, 1657. Twenty candidates having presented themselves, the king had selected from them eight composers of similar merit, and caused them to be shut up, each by himself, to compose music for the psalm Beati quorum. Lalande bore the prize away.

The four organists, who divided the service in the chapel, were J. Tomelin, Nivers, Buterne and Lebegue. The Archbishop of Reims, grand almoner master of the chapel royal, gave orders to grant all the French musicians liberty of offering their services to the king.

They sent to Italy for singers and instrumental performers; the royal music-corps was increased to the number of twenty four. Madame Lalande and her two daughters sang at chapel pieces expressly composed for their beautiful voices. Lalande himself who rose to be superintendent of the royal music and chevalier of the order of St. Michael, was the fifteenth child of a merchant tailor. In childhood he was one of the boys in the choir at St. Germain d'Auxerrois and a pupil of Chaperon, and in manhood distinguished himself both as organist and composer. He wrote sixty motets for grand chorus during the forty-five years of his service under the king.

Having lost his wife, Anne Rebel, in 1722, he petitioned for liberty to divide three-quarters of the duties of the chapel-mastership without reserve among other musicians. This being granted he selected Campra, Bernier and Gervais, a choice which gained him as much honor as did his disinterestedness. The king gave him a pension of 3000 livres during his life, which closed June 18, 1726. Lalande reached the age of 67 years. We owe to him the music of Melicerte, the ballet Les Elements, and grandly effective choruses. His most celebrated motets are the Dixit dominus, Exurgat Deus and Te Deum. He had shared with the younger Lulli the superintendence of the royal music.

A curious general remark is suggested by the foregoing facts; it is this, — sacred music declined in France in proportion as dramatic music improved. In the 17th century, Louis XIV., who, 'spite of his faults knew how to encourage both literature and art, determined to have Lalande to superintend his sacred as he already had Lulli to take charge of his theatrical music. The great king encouraged carefully the nascent merit of the young artist, and hastened his progress as much by his commendations as by his liberality, Lalande having broken his violin, upon Lulli's refusal to admit him into his orchestra, studied the organ and harpsichord and finally became, at the same time, organist to four churches in Paris; these privileged parishes were St. Gervais, St. John, the great Jesuits, and Petit St. Antoine. He had also excellent pupils, whom he taught with great assiduity.

His two daughters died within twelve days of each other, of small pox, at the ages of 24 and 25 years. The king, who had just lost his son, had the kindness to call the artist, and speaking sorrowfully of their analogous misfortunes, added, pointing upward, to the broken-hearted father, "Lalande, it must be submitted to!" In 1723 Lalande married his second wife, Mlle. de Cury, daughter of the physician of the princess de Conti. Three years afterward he was attacked by an inflammation of the lungs, which carried him off; he died a Christian, leaving one child, a daughter of 21 years, the recipient of the royal favor even in the cradle. Lalande's love of labor was extreme. He felt the life of man too short for reaching perfection, and continually retouched his works yet never fully satisfied himself with them. Toward the end of his life his only occupation was the revision of the productions of his youth.

The long and scrupulous criticism to which he subjected his works prevented him from publishing them himself. His widow, devotedly attached to the memory of her illustrious husband, made it her only study to render that memory immortal, by her care in bringing out his remarkable compositions. Lalande took great delight in reading the Psalms, which excited in him strong emotion. He was a rare accompanist and the least praise made him blush. Difficult as to his own compositions, he gladly played what was fine in the works of others.

Like all great men he suffered from the envy of others. He was unjustly accused of plagiarism. He had no doubt studied profoundly the music of preceding ages, surpassing in erudition all the musicians of his time [in France] — but so have the most celebrated authors, Moliere, Despreaux, Racine, &c imitated the ancients; but it is the work of genius to transform the ideas of others, and however much originality one may possess there is always apparent something of tradition. De Blamont, disciple of Lalande, borrowed in his compositions from his master, — his marvellous treatment of the voice; his exquisite harmonies; his exquisite adaptation of his music to the sentiment of the words. A lover of grand and sublime ideas, Lalande was at the same time learned and profound, simple and natural. His constant aim was to touch the soul by his richness of expression and the vivacity of his pictures; he calms our emotions by the grace of his themes and by the lovely episodes, which he so tastefully introduces into his most labored choruses.

Philidor the elder, librarian to Louis XV. brought together a most precious manuscript collection of all sorts of popular airs, fugitive pieces, Christmas carols and French ballets, which is now preserved in the Library of the Conservatory at Paris. After the death of Louis, the Regent made desperate reforms in the chapel and dismissed half of the executive musicians, Destouches succeeded Lalande as chapel master, and, later, Mondonville, Blanchard and Mardin took the places of Gervais, Campra and Bernier. The organists of that period were Calviere, Daquin, Landin and d'Agincourt.

Under Louis XV. Rebel, Blanchard, Burg, Ganzargues and Mathieu were the masters of music, and Rebel and Francoeur had the superintendence. In 1768 a prize was offered for the best motet upon the psalm Super flumina. Twenty-five compositions were sent in and François Giroust gained the gold medal.

The king named him, in 1775, master of the music in his chapel, and later, superintendent of his music. He wrote an oratorio on the subject of the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea and a Regina celi after a picture of the Resurrection. He was born at Paris, April 9, 1730 and died at Versailles, correspondent of the Institute, April 28, 1799.

From the 10th of August, 1791 until July 20, 1802, occurs an interval of eleven years, during which sacred music, already in deep decay, totally disappeared in France, borne away by the turbulence of the Revolution.

Ludwig Rellstab.*

The place occupied by Rellstab's efforts in the more extended sphere of polite literature will be properly appreciated by the biographer, who enters into all the details of the case. We propose merely to throw a light over the influence exercised by his writings and opinions on matters connected with art-culture in Berlin. With him there has been extinguished a prominent mental element in society here. To him we possessed, for many years, the prompter of all movements whence art-culture was developed, or by which it was purified — the representative of public opinion on it. The man who was able to guide the views of the masses, and fascinate them by his words must have possessed a peculiar power, most unmistakably conscious of its effect, and imbued with all the more authority from the fact, that it cannot capriciously talk people over, but demands an independent judgment.

Next to his talent, and talent under all circumstances pursues its own path, the peculiar course of culture distinguishing Ludwig Rellstab's life, will aid materially in explaining his importance. The years of his childhood and youth date back to the time of fertile ideas and imposing deeds in the German fatherland. Classic literature had just penetrated, body and bone, into the educated world, and romanticism was putting forth its most luxurious blossoms. Between the two, among the people, were the rough contrasts of debasement and elevation, all exciting circumstances, which necessarily assisted a boy of a peculiar and strongly marked disposition. The family relations and domestic matters by which the boy's first notions were suggested, were likewise of a favorable description.

At the period when Ludwig Rellstab was born in Berlin (April 12th, 1799), his father, a man of liberal education, especially on the subject of music, possessed a considerable establishment as a bookseller music publisher, and printer. Regular concerts, with a full band, used to be given in his house, so that the artistic feeling of his son was awakened by hearing the works of Sebastian, Emanuel, and Friedemann Bach, Mozart, and other masters. During the summer, the family resided at a small villa in the Thiergarten,† which, being then in its natural uncultivated state, afforded the boy plenty of places to play in, while it also excited the most delicious feelings in his poetical mind. His mother was a model of the most noble womanly qualities. On the occasion of his making a journey, in the year 1821, to Weimar, Zelter recommended him to Göthe, "for the sake of his excellent mother, of whom he had been very fond.

* Translated for London Musical World from the Vossische Zeitung.

† Zoological Gardens, now a favorite resort of the people of Berlin.

The incitement, also, to action which he derived from his playfellows, especially from his cousin, Wilhelm Häring (Willibald Alexis) may not have been without influence upon his growing capabilities.

For the nonce, however, as we learn from Rellstab's own confession, these capabilities were principally displayed in the manufacture of pasteboard articles and fireworks, and in executing conjuring tricks, it being an interesting and curious fact, that the first notice Rellstab wrote for the Vossische Zeitung was a criticism on a conjuror, who gave his performances near the house of Rellstab's father, in the Thiergarten. Rellstab was then twelve years of age. His father, who used, as a musical critic, to furnish articles for the paper, from time to time—prevailed on the boy, who was rather advanced in his German school studies, to write the report, which was kindly accepted by the then editor, Professor Cotel. In other branches of learning, it is said that the performances of the young author were not particularly conspicuous, although at the Joachimsthal and Werdener gymnasiums, which he attended, he enjoyed the good fortune of being under such celebrated teachers as Bernhardt, Zumpf, Twosten, Lange, and Spillecke. It is true that the period in question was that of the most lively and enthusiastic sympathy for the welfare of the Prussian and German fatherland. When the pupils of the third class, who were old enough to bear arms, although tolerably ill acquainted with their Latin dictionary, advanced in brilliant uniform to meet their younger schoolfellows; when the masters, who had previously bestowed only blame on them, shook hands at parting, and pressed them to their heart, we do not think they were adopting the best plan to keep up the taste for Curtius or Julius Cæsar in the youngsters left behind. "Tears of the tenderest emotion," so Rellstab himself tells us, "fill my eyes even now, as with hair grown grey, and my life drawing to its close, I write down these lines recalling the sad and yet never-to-be-forgotten delicious hours of my youth and boyhood." That the great events of the time did not produce a merely transient impression upon him, was proved by his most determined resolution to embrace the career of arms. His father used frequently to have violent disputes with him on this subject.

Meanwhile the second campaign had begun, and his father had died suddenly of apoplexy while out walking. The youth, now in his sixteenth year, could no longer resist the impulse of his heart; Körner's songs of freedom, set to Weber's vigorous melodies, were whirling around on his brain. He offered himself as a recruit to the Colomb'sches regiment of hussars, and was accepted. He was, however, dismissed after his first period of service, because one of his eyes, which was weak, became entirely useless. His determination was extraordinary, possessing a touch of obstinacy. He succeeded in prevailing on his guardian to allow him to enter the Military School, and it was not long before he was promoted to be mathematical master and officer. The assiduous youth had thus gained a starting-point for independent exertion, and, with his restless love of work, a sentiment shooting out in the most opposite directions, he was enabled to concentrate his strength and fix his eye steadily on certain objects.

The peaceful state of affairs in Germany—a state of affairs continually affording fresh foundations for artistic activity—awakened or collected in Berlin all kinds of intellect, and introduced Rellstab into the midst of the busy throng. Ludwig Berger and Bernhard Klein constituted the centre of a new musical epoch. The youthful Rellstab joined them. Ludwig Devrient shone as a star of the first magnitude in the theatrical world; Zelter occupied the place of honor among the representatives of serious, respectable old men; E. T. A. Hoffman was an original on the domains of music, painting, poetry, and even jurisprudence; old Körner and Streckfuss furnished, in their way, considerable incitement to literary efforts; while Rungenhagen, W. Bach, and C. Reichardt joined the narrower circle of musical activity. It was said that men so universally gifted ought to light and maintain the fire of intellectual and artistic life at one common point of reunion. At such a point, the younger Liedertafel was founded by Rellstab, Klein and Berger. Zelter did not hesitate becoming an honorary member. Rellstab was the poet of the association, and that which was called into existence by the free intercourse of the members resounded far and wide, exercising a decided influence on the taste for art evinced by the educated classes.

Rellstab's musical studies, which, during this time, had been neglected, but for which his strict father had laid a solid foundation, were again resumed. Berger and Klein, who not unfrequently used to take a delight in listening to the young officer's extemporizing on the pianoforte, took him as their pupil, guiding him to correctness of composition, reading scores with him, and initiating him into the depths of Mozart's and Beethoven's compositions.

On a course of such irregular, although serious work, his duties as teacher at the brigade school exerted, besides many other disagreeable results, a paralyzing effect. Rellstab always spoke of the military profession with the highest respect, and among his most intimate friends he numbered officers of high rank; the sympathies of his life, however, had their roots in a very different soil. He resigned his commission, and as, after the decease of his mother, he had inherited a competency, he was easily enabled to discover the paths which conducted his talent to maturity.

His friends had long perceived and appreciated his poetical powers. It was partly owing to their influence and partly to a plan which he had formed in his own mind, that he resolved on attempting to divert German opera into new channels, so that the literary foundation for the music might be included in the domain of independent art, properly so called. He wrote the words of Dido, and Klein composed the music. Berger was enraptured with the subject and its treatment, of which he had been informed by Rellstab; C. M. von Weber, in Dresden, Tieck, and Jean Paul valued the work highly (Rellstab's correspondence contains proofs of this), and formed their estimate of the author's talent accordingly, although a considerable number of lyrical poems had already laid the earlier foundations of his reputation. The first representation of Dido took place on the 13th of October, 1823, the birthday of the present king. The opera was revived in the year 1827, and once more performed in 1854, but it never achieved a decided success. We will return to Rellstab's theatrical labors presently.

(To be continued.)

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 16, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS WEEK'S JOURNAL.—The May-Bells and the Flowers, a Vocal Duet by Mendelssohn.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

NO. VI.

A WEEK IN DRESDEN, CONCLUDED.

BERLIN, Dec. 20, 1860.

Oct. 30. That Tuesday shall be memorable for a long day's excursion, in company with Clara Schumann, and the daughter, (a blooming maiden with musical voice and the father's features), and the sister Marie, and our strong-tone hero Joachim—in a great open carriage—only think of it, with real horses—and a driver that would lose the way, so as to prolong the pleasure—and the finest of October days, though far from warm—out to one of the most characteristic and romantic points of the so-called "Saxon Switzerland," the Bastei. When such artists have holiday, it is a good thing to be of the party;—that is, if they want you. And was it not a charming way to take, to make the stranger acquainted—a stroke of hospitable genius on the part of the warm-hearted artist women, ever occupied with earnest cares and duties, mother of seven children, thrown upon her Art for their support, busy with the concerts, busy with a thousand artistic relations, and with the laborious practice necessary to maintain, as she fully does, her pre-eminent position among genial classical pianists? A few hours' drive brings us to the path down in the famous Uttewalde Grund, through which wonderful ravine we thread our way afoot, winding upwards find ourselves upon a narrow gallery of rock, perched high in air, some six or seven hundred feet above the Elbe that sweeps right round its base, and this is the Bastei, and you look off over a vast plain, broken by low mound-like mountains, round and flat like huge Titanic mill-stones, each entirely by itself, with miles of deadest level between it and the others. The sun is just dropping down in the West, purpling the water and the skies (how short the days!), and the great round moon is already taking color and serenely throned above the whole magnificent, cold scene. Art has contrived curious towers, and bridges, sacred niches and inscriptions all about our rocky perch; and feudal legends, of robber knights who used to swoop down upon their prey on that quiet river, are not wanting; while close around us, springing from the plain, and rising to an equal height with us, are strange fantastic shafts of rock, a sort of Giants' Causeway, only all set apart, as if the whole sandstone mass had been cleft this way and that way to the very bottom, as we see a block of wood cleft into a bunch of matches. But I am not going to describe the Bastei; you will find it very well done in Murray. Suffice it to say the only title of this region to be called a "Switzerland" lies in the fact that it is as unlike Switzerland as possible. That is the very charm of it. It has no snowy mountains, no glaciers, no blue peaks and needles, no cols, no mountain chains, nor valleys, nor pasture Alps and matten—nothing that is Swiss, and nothing that is grand. But it is a wild kind of beauty on a smaller scale, entirely sui generis and unlike anything else; a weird, romantic beauty; some strange old poetry and magic seems to haunt there; the tones of the wind seemed fraught with mystical suggestion as they swelled and died away around the gasthaus, in which our merry company were sitting after yielding to the fascination of the scene outdoors as long as cold and hunger would permit. I wonder if their secret did not pass into the strings of that matchless violin, whose soul and master we had with us!

What a cold drive we had home under that harvest moon! The fields and hills spread white as snow around us, blanched it the pale moon gleam. And when we reached the broad part of the river where we had to cross, behold, the ferry boat was on the other side, and Charon song asleep, insensible to our repeated shouts, or hearing in his dreams the halloos and shrill whistles of our driver mellowed into the wild hunter's waldhorn or the Wunderhorn of Oberon. Happy boatman. What cruel delusions waits thee! Still we shiver. A whole half hour we stand there at the water's edge and freeze; the glistening air itself is frozen white and solid. At last a light begins to wave reluctantly and sleepily about the cottage; and there are sounds of chains and paddles, and a boat steadily approaching through the small eternity it takes to cross a rapid stream in such an hour, and brisk exchange of tongue artillery between our charioteer and Charon,—and we are underway again—or underweigh—chilled into society of silence, like a Quaker meeting—musing on the rich day we had had, and owning the majestic beauty of the night, grateful for all this to Nature, although her handgrasp just now is none of the gentlest. But we were soon thawed, we two, after we bid good night to our fair entertainers, and were snuggled over a good fire and other good things in our hotel, just in the mood of talk, and quite agreed that such a day was worth the freezing.

Oct. 31. A sharp, clear air, fit to be breathed upon this day of the Reformations Fest—proudest anniversary of Protestant Germany. And where should it be celebrated if not here in Saxony, in spite of the anomaly of a king one of whose Elector ancestors slid back to Rome and then picked up a crown? The shops are closed, and the streets have an almost New England Fast or Thanksgiving aspect. All the large churches—the court church excepted—are thronged two or three times during the day for solemn, cheerful service; and the old Lutheran hymns ring out with a will from thousands of united voices, and the debt of Germany, of civilization to Luther, with the duties thence arising, is the theme of many a glowing preacher. I go in the morning to the most curious and interesting, perhaps, as well as one of the largest of these old churches, the Sephien-Kirche. There we may hear perhaps some organ-playing by the most famous of the German organists now living, the old Johann Schneider. His post of duty is here, at the old Silbermann organ, stuck up in the gallery in a corner of the vast and unsymmetrical interior. Such was the crowd, standing in every aisle, that there was no penetrating beyond a place directly underneath the organ gallery. If there had been any fugue or voluntary before service, I had lost it. But it did edify and thrill one somewhat to stand there part and parcel of that crowd, when there went up from young and old the mighty intonations of Ein feste Burg, sustained by the great flood of organ harmony. Many stanzas were sung; and between them were short interludes, often of a very brilliant character, which showed a master hand indeed, but not a very sober taste. One could not help thinking that the old man had taken a strange time to figure in the character of virtuoso and indulge in such fantastical surprises.

Then came an hour of chamber music of Bach and violin, all by ourselves. A beautiful Andante of the old master was played to an audience of one—and it is probable that not so much as one was thought of when the thing was written. That full brook flowed just as steadily and sweetly in the unbroken solitude, as when the world looked on. And so it would have kept on running (for it was the right master hand that smote the rock, that is the strings) that morning, but that a visitor, a poet, dropped in full of talk, Hans Christien Andersen, the Dane, a homely, tall, good-natured, lively, gaily dressed, enthusiastic individual, pleased with his own echo in the world. And should he not feel pleasantly? Had he not just been bidden into the presence, to read before his Saxon Majesty, the royal Uebersetzer of the more than royal Dante, his last drama, romance, or what not in ms.? But now adieu! auf Wiedersehen! because my lady waits. We step across the hall, into the concert room, where the two artists must rehearse for their last Soirée. So, after cordial inquiries and assurance on all sides that all are safely thawed out after the last night's cold adventure (for surely Charon, the real mythological old fellow, never had a colder, stiffer set of ghosts to ferry over—though "we were no ghosts, nor that stream a Lathé, (as these presents show), the audience of one is ensconced in a corner, and the morning's business proceeds. Sonatas for piano and violin, one by Mozart and one by Haydn, are the subject. Fine specimens of their authors' finest art and genius, and not-dismissed until the rendering was so faultless, that one saw the genial masters in a fresh light and conceived a new love for both of them. It is a good thing, after long preoccupation with such deeper spirits as Bach or Beethoven, to be reminded, in such a way as a pianist like Clara Schumann can remind one, of a Clementi, a Haydn, &c. Such interpreters as these two, know how to place them all in the right light, relatively before you.

Nov. 1. Another morning rehearsal. Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven (glorious Sonata), Bach. After dinner a long walk, over the bridge, through the Neustadt, and round towards the right bank of the river, to the place of entertainment called the Linkische Bad, where there is another large and sumptuous café-concert hall. The programme was rich; containing, besides lighter things, the "Pastoral Symphony," Gade's "Ossian" overture, Duet from "Jesondia," Overture to "Egmont," Andante and variations from Haydn's 12th Symphony, Overture to "Nozze di Figaro," and to the "Swiss Family," Lieder ohne Worte by Mendelssohn, and an arrangement from a very striking song by Schubert, the Greisengesang (Song of the Old Man), which impressed me as one of the best things for this kind of treatment, if we must have such things served up by an orchestra. The frigid chords (so Schubert like) which describe the wintry snows of age upon the head ("the roof"), contrasted with the warmer harmonies of the summer that abides within, are quite effective. It would be a good change in our Music Hall "Rehearsals" from the "Serenade" and Lob der Thränen, now so staled by repetition.

In the evening came the third and last Soirée of Clara Schumann and Joachim, with the assistance of Frau Garrigues-Schnorr von Carolsfeld as singer. The illness of Herr Schnorr, the husband, caused a real disappointment, and some change of programme, making it as follows:

1. Sonata (F major), piano and violin :
Allegro, Variations. Tempo di Minuetto.Mozart a "Thränenregen," (Wir sassen so traulich beisammen.)
b "Mein." (Büchlein, lass dich Rauschen sein)
3. Sonata (op 101) for piano.Beethoven
4. Three Duettinos, piano and violin.R. Schumann
5. a Romanza, for violinBeethoven
b Bourrée and Double, do.J. S. Bach
6. a Ballad: "Heinrich der Vogler".Lübe
b "Lithuanisches Lied".Chopin
7. Sonata (G major), piano and violin: Andante—Adagio.—Cantab.—Finale all' Oogarese.Haydn

The piece by Haydn is found as a Trio; but the violoncello, which scarcely more than doubles the bass in the piano, could be left out without loss—by such players. It is one of the happiest strokes of Haydn's genius; the best movement exquisitely sunny, like Jack o' lantern on the wall. It was played con amore, with the most accurate and nimble fingers, and such nice and vital accent as the best player only can command when all the nerves are rightly strung. These variations by Mozart could not have been more generally perfect and Mozartish in the rendering. It certainly was a notable achievement for a woman to bring out clearly, finely, warmly, grandly, as Mme. Schumann did, the beauty, force and meaning of a Sonata which is one of the most difficult alike to comprehend and execute, of those remarkable works of the last period of Beethoven—and one of the most richly imaginative and original. If there is any part of it into the sense of which perhaps a man might enter more completely, it is that singular quick march, the like of which no other hero mood of genius ever marched by; for that treads airy heights for which methinks, only a man's brain can be at once enough intoxicated and enough self-possessed. Talking the thing over together, afterwards, we did not find the lady fully sympathise with our admiration of that particular movement. (Among the "Davidsbündler"—Ensbibus, Mester Raro, and the rest—there would have been none to say us nay). As Joachim dealt with it, there seemed a great deal more in that often played Romanza of Beethoven, than there ever had before. It held the audience in ecstasy. The Bourrée (old dance rhythm) and Double (or Variation), was given with masterly vividness and truth of outline, and afforded still new evidence that old Bach is the youngest man alive in music, as well as the ripest. The vocal selections were choice; each with a characteristic charm; the singer could not be charged with neglect of expression; there was only too much of it; a certain extra dramatic infusion of energy, which let the melodies have no peace to "flow at their own sweet will." The three little instrumental Duos by Schumann were a nice substitute for some Duets of his which were to have been sung. More rare or charming song selections one can scarcely hear, than graced these concerts. Robert Schumann is never more genial, more felicitous than in his songs; and where should one expect to make their acquaintance in the right way, if not in just these concerts, which are pious tributes to his memory and genius, by one who has the best right to interpret him?

The concert over, now imagine a very pleasant, sociable symposium in an upper room of this same nice Hotel de Saxe. It is a genuine German sit-down, where everybody is expected to be just as free and happy as he can. And everybody can be just as happy as he has a right to be; and no more, nicht wahr? It is at once an artist and a family Gesellschaft. All of the Wieck and Schumann representations are there, who chance to be at hand. But the Amphytrion is our hero of the victim, who would insist upon the mountain's coming to Mabomet.

There's magnetism in the man, as we have said; and where do you ever find power, that is not tyrannicaly used? So, not content with "ascending me into the brain" in the form of Beethoven and Bach, he must needs start other subtle effervescing spirits on the same track. We are a dozen all told. Three generations of that musical family of Dresden represented. A right German party! But it is not complete, the younger branches are not happy, nothing can go on, until the grandpapa is found, dragged from his Kneip, led in triumph and installed with all due honor and uproarious rejoicing at the head of the table. Then all are very happy; the middle-aged and youngest very talkative and jokeative, and the dear old lady looks a deal of silent happiness; and Altmeister Wieck is very wise and fatherly and witty in his chair of state, and jokes about the Wunderkindervater, as the father and the teacher of two such artists as Clara and Marie, with such a son-in-law as Robert Schumann, may well call himself. Not a few sharp criticisms he drops, too, on the new school music—all in fun of course! And very comical and to the point are some of his illustrations of prevailing tricks in fashionable false schools of singing. For this old man possesses the true art of disciplining the voice as well as the fingers. The daughter Marie, who is full of generous good nature and good sense, as well as musical talent, is a fine singer, has a rich mezza-soprano admirably developed, and sang one evening in my hearing Mendelssohn's Auf Flügeln des Gesanges, and that impassioned song of Beethoven, to Goethe's verses, Herz, mein Herz, in a way to make them felt. I think I forgot, in speaking of the first Soirée to mention the artistic touch and finished tasteful execution with which this young lady played the upper part in the "Allegro Brillante" of Mendelssohn with her sister. I have heard her also play Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations, and some of those bewitching little quicksilver clavier movements of Bach, with a spirit and a nicety not to be surpassed. Good for the Wunderkindervater! Health!

D.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

SEVENTH CONCERT OF THE SERIES OF EIGHT.

The programme presented some excellent pieces. The beautiful Quintette in D by Mozart, the Capriccio in B minor by Mendelssohn and last and best of all the gigantic Quartette in E flat by Beethoven, which we heard for the first time in Boston last year, were in themselves enough to make a most satisfactory programme. The other pieces, the Piano Quartette by Dussek and the Clarinette solo were pleasant additions. The club deserve a good deal of credit for the large amount of good music given on one evening.

PART I.

1. Quintette in D. No. 4.Mozart
Introduction and Allegro—Andante—Minuetto—
Finale, Vivace.
2. Quartette, for Piano and string Instruments, in F minor, Op 41.Dussek
Moderato ma con fuoco—Adagio espressivo—Finale,
Allegretto. (First time in Boston.)
3. Andante Pastorale, from the Clarinette Concerto in E flat.Crusel
Thomas Ryan.
4. Capriccio, in B minor for Piano, with Quartetto Ac-compniment.Mendelssohn
B. J. Lang.
5. Twelfth Quartette, in E flat, Op. 127.Beethoven
Maestoso and Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro.

The Mozart Quintette went very well, and we take pleasure in noticing the smoothness and brilliancy with which each performer carried out his part. The Quartette by Dussek is a pleasing composition and was rendered well by Messrs. LANG, SCHULZE and WULF FRIES. For a variety it is well to hear such a piece, though Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Schumann and Schubert have superseded the style of Dussek by a more vigorous, inspired and brilliant one. Of the composers who wrote concerted pieces for the piano in the style of Mozart, Hummel alone besides Mozart produced some works that will be handed down as classical to posterity. But here, where we hear so little music, where in chamber-concerts some of the best composers thus far have been represented almost exclusively, every addition of good or even respectable music is a gain in the knowledge of musical literature. Dussek's work is good. It was very well received. Mr. Lang played the Capriccio with fine execution and correct taste. He gave genuine pleasure, and we compliment him for his performance.

The Quartette of Beethoven came upon us with new magnificence and force, lifting up the mind high into the regions of beauty, of the ideal. Sublime, tender, with a tinge of sadness and almost playful; most loving and warm, impetuous and good-humored, with hidden strength; satisfied, triumphant and cheerful, the melodies run on through the four movements, borne up and permeated by most unexpected harmonies and an original vigorous rhythm. A work full of the perfection of ripe age, the result of a strong individuality, written in the happy mood of a man above his fate and his time, it stands a monument of beautiful life for all time. We might not be quite satisfied with some of the tempi; might wish for more tenderness in the first movement; in some places for a more marked pianissimo in others for a stronger fortissimo. But we are grateful for the opportunity of hearing so grand a work and shall be very happy if a repetition can be granted us at some future concert.

Mr. RYAN's clarinette solo so pleased the audience that it was enthusiastically encored, and played again. Simple melodies are easiest comprehended.

The house was quite full, which in consideration of the bad walking and travelling generally is a pleasing evidence of the popularity of the club.

We are unavoidably prevented from attending last Saturday's concert. We put the programme on record, which it deserves for the Clarinette—Quintette in A major by Mozart and some of the pieces by Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. We are glad to notice that the best piece is placed in the middle of the programme, thus accommodating such persons as would only care for this one. We hope that this plan of placing the best pieces in the middle will be kept up.

PART I.

1. Moderato, from the Quintette in Cop. 29. Beethoven
2. Cavatina, "Or la Sull'onda." Il Giuramento. Mercadante
Mrs. Kempton.
3. Adagio und Scherzo, from the Piano Trio in D minor. Mendelssohn
Messrs. Lang, Schultze and Fries.
4. Fantaise for Flute, on favorite themes. Briccialdi
Fred'k Zohler.
5. Quintette in A. op. 108, Clarinette principale. Mozart
Moderato — Larghetto — Minuetto — Finale, Tema con Variazioni.
6. "Song Without Words," for Piano. Mendelssohn
Mr. B. J. Lang.
7. English ballad.—"The breeze that wafts my sigh to Thee." Wallace
Mrs. Kempton.
8. "Les Rivals," grand Duo Concertante, for Violins.
Kalliwoda

Messrs. Schultze and Meisel.

This evening a Nonette by Onslow, for Violin, Viola, Violoncello, Bass, Flute, Oboe, Clarinette and Bassoon is promised, which will be played for the first time in Boston. The club show a commendable zeal in presenting concerted pieces, new to Boston audiences, for which they deserve reward in the shape of crowded houses. *†

Handel and Haydn Society.

The concert given on Sunday evening by this Society with Mlle. PATTI and STIGELLI, drew a good house but opened with a bad omen, an apology for the latter, who was indisposed. The programme of the concert was therefore little aid to the hearer, as regards the solo pieces, as it was little adhered to. Except to occasional concert goers, the performance was not an attractive one, made up as it was of choruses selected from various works by various composers, which, though all of the very best, inevitably lose their power and effect thus taken out of their connection. How even the Hallelujah chorus of Handel, perhaps the grandest of all choruses, fails to stir one as it does when the mind is led up to this grandest of climaxes, as it does in its place. The choruses on this occasion, it seemed to us, lacked life and the orchestra was frequently not to be heard.

Mlle. PATTI, who sang the sacred aria of the Queen of the Night, from the Magic Flute, soaring up to the transcendental tones, impossible to most mortals, and who deemed it advisable to improve Schubert's Ave Maria, by another one of these feats of vocal high and lofty tumbling, was about the only person that was applauded vigorously. STIGELLI did better than the audience, after the apology, had any reason to expect, although evidently not in good voice. As to fioriture, melody and expression his Preghiera, which he sang with Mlle. Patti, might have been some aria di bravura; that by Verdi from Joan d'Arc, sung by Mlle. Patti, might have been a march. The composer probably wished to mark as it the prayer of a military person. Now in view of the fact, that before Him to whom prayers are addressed, there is no respect of person, the idea of introducing a march-movement into a prayer seems slightly ridiculous. However, as Verdi has to answer for so many violations of good taste, this may as well go with the rest.

THE ORPHEUS CLUB.—The Bards. Our readers will not forget to attend the performance of Die Barden, by this Society this evening at the Boston Theatre. They will find the libretto in the columns of the Boston Musical Times, a useful guide at the performance. We cut from a letter in the Evening Transcript, some statements in regard to the Club, which may be perhaps new to some of our readers:

"What I observed particularly in it, was, that it brought forward quite prominently the fact that the Club are amateurs and do not sing for compensation, except so far as to pay the expenses of their hall, leader, sheet music, &c. I was not aware before that there was any doubt about the object of the Club in meeting regularly to rehearse, and occasionally giving a Concert or offering these services to others, but find upon inquiry that many persons in Boston suppose them to be professional singers. Of course such a supposition is entirely erroneous and objectionable to several members of the Club, who would never think of staging with them as professional singers. The Club meet regularly twice a week to rehearse, and pay a regular monthly assessment. All the proceeds of the Concerts go to the treasury, or are voted to other persons, as in the case mentioned in the article in the New Bedford Mercury. The Club voted to send the proceeds of the Concert in that city to the family of Zöllner, a German composer, lately deceased."

The new Catholic church at the South end, one of the largest edifices in the country, will be inaugurated on next Sunday evening by a sacred concert, in which eminent soloists and a large chorus take part. The programme is quite good, comprising selections from the best masters. The whole is under the direction of the Organist of the Church, Mr. J. H. WILLCOX.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, JAN. 31, 1861.—The concert of the Philharmonic Society, given on Monday night, Jan. 28, was a decided success, pecuniarily and otherwise. The musical constellations were in their glory, and FABRI was the planet, around which they all revolved. Never before has any musical artiste won such a triumph, and never before, in this city, did so vast a concourse of people turn out to hear one. Long before eight o'clock every nook and corner where a chair could possibly be placed, was occupied and hundreds were turned away, unable to gain admission. Whenever Fabbri appeared, the audience were in raptures, and we do not remember a time, when applause came so heartily, so enthusiastically as on this occasion.

PART I.

1. Overture, The Merry Wives of Windsor. Nicolai
2. Attila, Grand Aria. Verdi
Sung by Madame Fabbri.
3. Grand Concerto, in A minor. Hummel
For Piano and Orchestra, performed by Mr. E. Muller.
4. Maria di Rohan, Andante and Aria. Donizetti
Sung by Signor Abelli.
5. Der Auswanderer, The Emigrant. Mulder
With accompaniment of Violoncello, Madame Fabbri and Mr. Melms.

PART II.

1. Andante from the Fifth Symphony. Beethoven
2. La Rosa di Firenze, Grand Rondo. Perugini
Sung by Madame Fabbri.
3. By general request, Grand Duo Concertant. Mulder
For 2 Pianos, Performed by Messrs. Pecker and Mulder.
4. La Naranjera, The Orange Girl, Popular Brazilian Characteristic Song. In full national costume.
Sung by Madame Fabbri.
5. Rakoczy March, Ancient Hungarian Melodies.

Of the concert we can only say that it was everything that the most sanguine could have wished.

Fabbri added new laurels to her crown, and Chicago will long remember her, always ready to give her a generous welcome, whenever she returns. The Philharmonic Society may safely assert, that they got up the best and largest concert that has ever been given in our city. The orchestra, under BALATKA's judicious baton, is fast approximating completion, and will perform Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony at the next regular concert, which occurs on Saturday, Feb. 9th.

NEW YORK, FEB. 4.—There has rarely been such a dearth of musical matter in our good city, as there is this winter. The opera—our share of it, at least—is not worth speaking about; in Brooklyn the novelty of the thing puts more spirit into it, but, not yet having been able to accept Mr. Jean Baggs' kind invitation, (for which I am much obliged to him), I cannot inform you whether the performances there are really so much better than here. There have been a few straggling concerts, fine ones, too, such as one by Mr. Satter, another by the Arion Singing Society, &c.; but as they were hardly advertised, and the givers thereof were very chary with their favors to the press, few persons knew of them. So the Philharmonic, last Saturday, stirred us up considerably, not only by giving us some music once more, but some very good music. By way of a striking contrast, we had a Symphony by Schumann and one by Haydn—certainly the two extremes of symphonic writing. The first, in E flat, has never been produced here before; it is in five movements, of which the first three are decidedly the finest. The second, particularly, a little Intermezzo, is a gem, so quaint and thoroughly original. The fourth, Largo Solenne, would probably appear to much greater advantage, did it not follow immediately upon the Adagio, but so much slowness becomes wearisome. The Symphony by Haydn, No. 2, in B flat, is one that we have frequently heard from the Philharmonic orchestra; it is very pretty and graceful, but by no means as fine as several others of Haydn's, and it is surprising that the Society prefer constantly repeating this particular one, to making their public acquainted with others by the same master. One of the most charming of them all, in E flat, we never hear; nor has the Military Symphony ever been produced here. The overture to Tannhäuser, ever welcome, was the third orchestral piece, and sent home glowing with excitement even those to whom it was most familiar. It is certainly one of the most stirring, effective compositions I know of, whatever other objections it may be liable to. Mr. SCHREINER played a couple of solos for his instrument, the cornet-a-piston, with his usual, almost faultless excellence, and the remainder of the programme was taken up by the noble chorus of the Liederkrantz, who made a decided sensation, which they undoubtedly deserved, for they sang very beautifully. Their rendering of the first piece, "Frühlings-Nahen" (Approach of Spring), by Kreutzer, showed a wonderful skill in shading and expression. They were encored, and after taking all the trouble of marching off the stage, the whole body filed back again, and sang Mendelssohn's "Froher Wandersmann" (the happy wanderer). In the second part they sang a beautiful composition by Schubert, "Nachtelle," which was likewise encored and repeated. Altogether, the concert was one of the most satisfactory we have ever heard. —t—

FEB. 12. A larger audience than usual assembled at Mason and Thomas's Soirées last Tuesday, but it proved none the less appreciative. Mr. Bergmann's place at the violoncello was supplied by Mr. Bergner, and the latter filled his post in a manner which made it impossible for any one to regret the change. The programme was a most artistic one, the usual solos were omitted, and it consisted of only three members—two Quartetts and a Trio. All the greater, therefore the enjoyment of it, and it is to be wished that other concert-givers might take a lesson from this arrangement; at least in point of brevity. A Quartette in E flat, by Cherubini, was a novelty which was more interesting than attractive. If I am not mistaken this is the first time that any of this composers quartets has been performed here. He wrote but three, and, though scientifically worked out, they can hardly, as a whole, be called pleasing. In the one in question, the Scherzo was an exception; it has the rhythm of a Bolero, and is spirited, and very striking. Schubert's Trio in E flat, Op. 100, and the A minor Quartet of Schumann, were old beloved friends, ever fresh in their beauty and originality, and always welcome. The performance of all these compositions was admirable; it could hardly be otherwise where the artists feel how devoutly they are listened to. The mood of the audience has, of course the greatest influence on that of the players. —t—

THE GREAT LABLACHE.—Among other distinguished artists with whom I become intimate during my association with theatrical affairs, was Lablache—old Lablache, the incomparable basso, the inimitable buffo—whose voice and presence moved us to tears in "Norma," or made our sides ache with laughter in "Barbieri." Dear old Lablache! with your fund of anecdote and bon mots you have left us, and your pretended successors do but prove the irreparable loss we have sustained. I was constantly in company with the great basso, and often had my pity excited by the inconvenience he suffered from his colossal proportions. No ordinary made chair was safe beneath his enormous weight; a servant, where it was practicable, carried one about for his especial use. It was difficult to get a carriage whose door was wide enough for him; in London he had, of course, his own brougham in attendance. On one occasion the rehearsal at the theatre terminated sooner than was expected, and Lablache, anxious to reach home, ordered a street cab to be called. The driver looked alarmed when his fare issued from the stage door. "He'll never get in, sir," said the man despairingly to me, as I was shaking hands with Lablache, who also seemed to have his doubts upon the subject. We approach the vehicle—the door was opened wide. Sideways, headways, frontways, backways, the prize basso tried in vain to effect an entry. Without assistance it was impossible. Two men went to the opposite side and dragged with all their force, while two others did their utmost to lift him in. "Is no go," cried the cabman; "he'll ruin my cab." One more effort. A long pull, a strong push, a pull and push together—the point was gained—Lablache inside, puffing and blowing from the exertion. But the difficulties had not yet terminated—he had inadvertently sat down on the wrong seat, with his back to the driver. Wishing to change the position, he rose, in turning round the whole of his prodigious weight was upon the few slender boards forming the bottom of the cab. Imagine the horror of the cabman, the astonishment of Lablache, and the surprise of a large crowd which had been attracted by the terrible struggle we had when the boards gave way and his two feet were seen standing in the road. The cabman swore, Lablache grinned, and the crowd roared. No scene in a pantomime could have been more ludicrous. Fortunately Lablache received no injury; had the cab been in motion, the consequences of the accident might have been serious. The same process of shoving and pulling, but reversed, was necessary to get him out again. Whether greater violence was used than at first, or not, the door in this instance was torn from its hinges, and the cab (previously a good looking vehicle) now presented the most melancholy appearance of a perfect wreck. The driver uttered curses both loud and deep, but was pacified by the assurance that the damage should be repaired and his loss of time remunerated. I am not aware that the portly basso ever attempted to ride in a hack cab.

FROST MUSIC.—I was once belated in Canada on a fine winter day, and was riding over the hard snow on the margin of a wide lake when the most faint and mournful wail that could break a solemn silence seemed to pass through me like a dream. I stopped my horse and listened. For some time I could not satisfy myself whether the music was in the air or in my own brain. I thought of the pine forest which was not far off; but the tone was not harp-like, and there was not a breath of wind. Then it swelled and approached; and then it seemed to be miles away in a moment; and again it moaned as if under my very feet. It was, in fact, almost under my very feet. It was the voice of the winds imprisoned under the pall of ice suddenly cast over them by the peremptory power of the frost. Nobody there made air holes, for the place was a wilderness; and there was no escape for the winds, which must moan on till the spring warmth should release them. They were fastened down in silence; but they would come out with an explosion when, in some still night, after a warm spring day, the ice would blow up, and make a crash and racket from shore to shore. So I was told at my host's that evening, where I arrived with something of the sensation of a haunted man. It had been some time before the true idea struck me, and meanwhile the rising and falling moan made my heart thrill again.—Once a Week.

PARIS.—On his side, the Count de Morny, under the name of Mr. de St. Rémy brings himself out as a musical composer at the minor theatre of the Bouffes Parisiens. His operetta, "Le Mari Sans le Savoie," is agreeable enough; the piece and the little airs in it are heard with pleasure. This however, did not prevent a malicious wag finding that the trifle itself was badly named. According to him, the true name that it should have borne is "Le Musicien sans le Savoir." But Mr. de Morny may have fellow-laborers; it is probable, nay it is certain. Still he has shown that he knows how to select them well. Only I ask myself what is to become of authors by profession, if it pleases great lords thus to invade their domain. Let the rich and influential cultivate literature and Art—nothing could be better; but, for mercy's sake, don't let them monopolise the theatres and the literary periodicals, already so difficult of access to poets, and to men of conscientious talent. Since I have been studying Parisian society, I have been struck with the slender encouragement awarded to genuine artists. Poetry is disdained; nobody reads it; and the Revue des Deux Mondes has the good habit of not paying a sou for the most charming bit of verse. As for musicians, they have the resource of giving lessons and concerts. Poor musician! Be possessed of genius! Be incomparably virtuoso! So shall you be condemned to listen to the false notes all the blessed day; and then, the evening having come, to hurry from drawing-room to drawing-room, to play, to sing your latest productions, to lay yourself out to please with unwearied complaisance—in the hope that, after several months of these cruel exercises, your admirers may be disposed to patronize your annual Concert! I understand now the expression of the greatest composer and virtuoso of the day, Henri Viouxtemps. He said to me once: "If ever I have a son, he may perhaps make shoes; but he shall certainly never play the violin!"

There are nevertheless in Paris several Professors who have acquired wealth and standing. There are some even who receive company, and do the honors well, and whose drawing-rooms are by no means the least attractive of those so which a stranger here craves entrance. I will not speak to you to day of the reception of Rossini, where excellent music is heard every Saturday. This sovereign of the monarchs of melody charms the evening of his life by composing scraps for piano or voice, which he refuses to publish, but which some of his favorites are permitted to read in his presence. The soirées of Rossini cannot but be very interesting, whether he himself deigns to accompany Badiali, or whether he contents himself with encouraging by a kindly word, with stimulating by a piquant remark, the zeal of his fervent admirers and disciples.

Yet certain assemblages more modest, and presided over by divinities less exalted, deserve mention none the less. In the first rank of those inestimable and much esteemed Professors, to whom I alluded just now, I must place Mademoiselle Josephine Martin, who also is "at home" every Saturday evening. This pianist, whose fingers are rapid and light and charming, has the merit of playing with exquisite distinction, and of composing pieces at once brilliant and original. One must hear her interpret her own Fantarella, her delicious Mennet, her Ouvertures des Chasses, and her Spanish Fantasia, to appreciate fully her double merit as an accomplished musician—a merit which she enhances by a modesty and a gentle grace, that many artists might take as models. Mlle. Josephine Martin occupies an enviable and envied position in the Parisian world; her drawing-room is the rendezvous of the best company, and of the best and the best-liked among artists.

Henceforward the amateurs of music will only have the embarrassment of choosing. The Conservatoire opens its doors on Sunday next; and the Quartette parties, the Matinées, and the Soirées Musicales, are announced as numberless as the locusts of Egypt, of ill-omened memory. But I will not drown you in this deluge of harmony, though I will endeavor to hear what is worth listening to, so as to be able to trace in a few lines the portraits of those select artists who are to be fêted this winter in Paris, and to point out to the lady readers of the Albion such novelties as may be worthy their attention and their favor.—Corr. of N. Y. Albion.

ADVICE TO BEGINNERS.—Never learn a piece of music without bearing in mind the title, and particularly the composer's name.—Never learn a piece without counting.—When learning a piece, never hurry the time. Practice it slowly, at first, until you become able to play it in the proper tempo with a clear and firm touch.—Always mind the fingering which is printed, or marked by your teacher.—Never bungle a piece; always learn to play it.—It is better to play simple pieces well, than difficult music wretchedly.—Don't let your exercise-book become dust-covered from neglect.—Practice your scales daily.—Never miss an opportunity of hearing good music.—Read good musical papers. (We recommend Dwight's Journal of Music.—Easton Times.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Once more upon the path of life.

From "Bianco, the Bravo's Bride." 25

'Twas he my only thought. " " " 25

Glorious wine. Drinking Song. " " 30

Three more of the best numbers in Balfe's Opera, which is running on the boards of the Pyne and Harrison opera-house, in London, with unabated success. The above numbers are nightly encored.

I'm a rover o'er the mountain. S. Glover. 25

A pleasing new song of this popular song-writer, with a lively, taking melody.

The Irishman. Humorous Song. J. R. Thomas. 25

As sung in New York by John Brougham, Esq., and also by the composer with great success.

Cloe Bell. Song and Chorus. T. B. Bishop. 25

In the popular style.

Instrumental Music.

Santa Lucia. Chansonette Napolitaine. Transcription. Charles Voss. 35

A popular Neapolitan ditty which prominent European singers have made very popular lately. The arrangement is of very moderate difficulty.

Il faut partir. From "La Fille du Regiment."

Transcribed by Marc Burtj. 50

A fine arrangement of Maria's favorite Romanza, "Now we must part." Of medium difficulty.

La Favorite. Grand Morceau de Concert. J. Ascher. 60

Of medium difficulty, lying within reach of most players of two years' practice. It introduces the most sparkling airs from the Opera. Teachers will find this a very useful piece.

The Mountain stream. Romanza. A. Lindahl. 30

By the composer of some popular pieces, and likely to become a favorite.

Grand Caprice en forme de Valse. H. A. Wollenhaupt. 75

Our best players will be eager to have a look at this latest work of this highly esteemed composer, and will no doubt be highly enraptured with it.

Overture Night in Granada. C. Kreutzer. 50

One of the most pleasing overtures, often heard in the concert room, and one whose beauty will never fade out.

Books.

THE CHILD'S FIRST MUSIC BOOK. For the Pianoforte. By J. T. Craven. 50

The popularity of this book for beginners has induced the publishers to issue this new and greatly improved edition. For the youngest scholars it will be found exceedingly useful.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per page. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 464.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 23, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 21.

A Lost Chord.

By Adelaide Anne Proctor.

Seated one day at the organ,
I was weary and ill at ease,
And my fingers wandered idly
Over the noisy keys.

I do not know what I was playing,
Or what I was dreaming then;
But I struck one chord of music,
Like the sound of a great Amen.

It flooded the crimson twilight,
Like the close of an Angel's Psalm,
And it lay on my fevered spirit
With a touch of infinite calm.

It quieted pain and sorrow,
Like love overcoming strife;
It seemed the harmonious echo
From our discordant life.

It linked all perplexed meanings
Into one perfect peace,
And trembled away into silence
As if it were loth to cease.

I have sought, but I seek it vainly,
That one lost chord divine,
That came from the soul of the organ,
And entered into mine.

It may be that Death's bright angel
Will speak in that chord again,
It may be that only in heaven
I shall hear that grand Amen.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

SACRED MUSIC.

VII.

1800—1860.

In 1791 of the 130 dioceses in France, 80 had abandoned the Roman Liturgy; but the church at Aby, Aix, Amli, Arles, Bordeaux, Bourges, Cambrai, Embrun, Narbome, Tours, Vienne, Strasbourg, Avignon and some others remained faithful. In 1797 came the constitutional schism and the pretended liturgic unity of Gregory. At length after ten years of persecution the churches were opened again. That of the Carmelites, where the pontiffs had received the martyrs crown, became the rendezvous of the pastors, decimated by the scaffold. At Lyons from 1801 the procession of the Fête-Dieu again passed through the streets, and the Concordat, ratified by Pius VII., was finally promulgated April 18th, 1802 by Cardinal Caprara. At the same period appeared the Genius of Christianity by the immortal Chateaubriand, who again placed literature and art upon their true basis.

Napoleon I, was consecrated Emperor in Notre Dame by Pope Pius VII., but the imperial chapel employed the Parisian liturgy, instead of the Roman rites. Later, Louis XVIII. re-established the Roman liturgy in the Royal chapels, and, in 1831, Louis Philippe caused the name of the king to be added to the prayer Domine Salvum. Finally, July 1st, 1840, the Roman liturgy was officially re-established at Langres by Bishop Parisi, which gave one of the earliest impulses to a return to unity.

The Archbishop of Paris revived liturgic science by his admirable pastoral letter upon ecclesiastical studies. We may then believe that soon and throughout our beautiful land, we may again repeat the old axiom, Legem credendi statuat lex supplicandi.

In 1811, Choron published a pamphlet upon the necessity of re-establishing the chant of the Roman church in all the churches of France. His school was suppressed after the revolution of 1830. He had meantime produced singers of great merit—Nourrit, Duprez, Wartel, &c., &c. Choron rendered great services to the music of France; besides his Dictionnaire des Musiciens, in two volumes, he published in connection with his pupil and friend Adrien de la Fage, an Encyclopédie complete de la Musique, both vocal and instrumental.

In December 1853, a new school of sacred music was established at Paris, under the patronage of the Minister of public instruction and church affairs, M. Louis Niedermeyer is the acting director. He was born at Nyons, a small place in the canton of Vaud, of a family originally French and Protestant, but has since claimed and obtained the right of French citizenship. Quitting Switzerland at the age of 16 years, he studied for two years at Vienna, the pianoforte with Moscheles and harmony with Forster. He spent the next two years at Rome and Naples, studying composition with Fioravanti, chapelmaster at St. Peter's and Zingarelli, director of the conservatory at Naples, and at the age of 19 produced an opera entitled Il Reo per amore. He settled at Paris at the age of 21 where he has published a large number of melodies, upon texts by Lamartine, Victor Hugo, Casimir Delavigne, Emile Deschamps, Milleveve, Manzoni, &c. His Lac obtained a European reputation. In 1827 he produced upon the Italian Theatre a work in two acts La Casa nel bosco; then successively at the Grand Opera, Stradella, Marie Stuart and La Fronde. With the valuable assistance of M. Dietsch, the skillful chapelmaster of the Madeleine, and recently appointed chief of the orchestra, at the opera as successor to Girard, deceased and of M. d'Ortigue, author of the great Dictionnaire Liturgique published in 1854 by Abbe Migne, there is no doubt that Niedermeyer will produce pupils worthy of his pure and classic taste. Familiar with the music of the great old masters through his participation in the concerts of the Prince of Moskwa, he will be able to give a healthy impulse to contemporary sacred and effectually oppose the fall of the art.

The Abbot of Solesmes, Prosper Guéranger, has also rendered eminent services to the liturgy by his important publication. (Institutions Liturgiques, Année liturgique, and Historie de Sainte Cecile.) But let us return to the history of the chapel music.

The imperial chapel at the Tuileries was solemnly dedicated, Feb. 2, 1806. Lesueur was appointed director: Rey, Master of music, Rigel and Piccini organists and accompanists. Before this Paisiello, director of the chapel of the First Consul, had had a salary of 12,000 francs per annum, with a dwelling and carriage free. He composed 16 complete services, a grand mass for double chorus, a Te Deum and prayers for the imperial coronation.

Jan. 1. 1812, an order was sent to Zingarelli, then chapelmaster of St. Peter's at Rome, for him to compose a solemn mass for choir and orchestra for the imperial chapel. For this work, which was composed in 8 days, and was executed Jan. 12th, 500 francs were paid. In 1814 and 1815, great changes occurred in the chapel, Lesueur became joint superintendent of the music to Louis XVIII., with the illustrious Cherubini. Later, Plantade joined these eminent artists in the capacity of master of the music.

March 14, 1820, a Requiem by Cherubini was sung at St. Denis, at the funeral services for the Duc de Berry.

May 29, 1825, were executed at the coronation of Charles X. at Reims, a mass by Cherubini, anthems and a Te Deum by Lesueur. July 25, 1830 the last mass by the Chapel Royal, was sung at St. Cloud. King Louis Philippe, having suppressed the chapel this old institution was not revived until our own day by the present Emperor, Napoleon III., who who has given its direction to Auber, the illustrious pupil of Cherubini.

In closing this paper let us rapidly review the main facts in the history of (Roman Catholic) sacred music, as exhibited in the excellent cours complet de plain-chant published by M. Adrien de la Fage. He divides plain-chant into four sections: 1. Recitation, 2. Psalmody; 3. Plain-chant properly so called, 4. Hymnody. In the remarkable appendix to his works, he makes these four divisions correspond to the four historic epochs of sacred music. His first epoch extends from the Christian era to the time of Constantine, A. D. 300; the second, from Constantine to Gregory the Great, 300—600; the third from Gregory to Guido of Arezzo, 600—1000; the fourth from Guido to the time of figurative music, 1000—1400. La Fage adds to them the epoch of decay—that is from the 15th century to our era. In fact, dramatic music has soared so high in our time, as to far outstrip its mother; but we are of opinion that the latter may yet be renewed and elevated if composers of talent in general would occupy themselves seriously with it and could be properly rewarded for their labors.

The most ancient hymn of christianity is doubtless that sung at the Last Supper by Jesus and his disciples, after the example of their master James and Paul recommended the singing of hymns and spiritual songs. Justin and Origen mention hymns sung by the early Christians; Eusebius, John Chrysostom, and Clement of Alexandria recommended song without instrumental accompaniment. At first the psalms of the Jews were used, then the septuagint Bible, then the old Latin version, which is still in use in the Bastile of St. Peter at the Vatican. Hymns in verse date from the third century.

Recitation with a sustained pitch and musical accent, was performed in the synagogue by a principal singer, called the Khasan; by the Greeks Protopsalte; by the later's Cantor.

The canonical Hours, or seven daily prayers, and the divisions of the year into determinate periods, were introduced in the second epoch.

"The usages of the East and Greece were introduced into the West by Pope Damasus and through the exertions of St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, to whom is attributed the music of the Prefaces.

There was a regular ceremony of investiture, accompanied with a benediction, when one entered the ranks of the singers; and the candidate was exhorted to sing with his mouth, what he believed in this heart and to prove his faith by his works. (Vide ut quod ore cantas, corde credas; et quod corde credis operibus comprobés.)

A singing school was established under Pope Sylvester and St. Hilaire; the Graduale an important part of the ritual, the execution of which was given to the most skillful artists, was named from the Ambon, the slight elevation or step, where they recited the Gospels, epistles and canons. In 450, in the time of Theodoric, appeared the fine books de Musica by the learned Boethius. The school of St. Gregory, directed by a primicier, was continued until 1377, in time of Gregory XI.

Charlemagne introduced the Roman ritual into his chapel in France and the organ gave great vigor to the progress of musical composition.

The first missal dated at Paris saw the light in 1507 and the Graduel des Chartreux was printed in the same city in 1578.

Palestrina was charged with the revision of the offices by Gregory XIII.; before his death he had reached the end of the Graduale, De tempore; after that event his son caused the work to be finished by an unknown musician and sold the whole as the work of his father. The fraud was discovered, the contract was annulled, but unfortunately the original manuscript disappeared.

Guidetti, a pupil of Palestrina, published the Directoire du Choeur, the Office of the Holy Week, the Passions and the Prefaces; all of which had been revised and appeared by Palestrina.

In 1614 and 1615 an edition appeared at Rome containing the reformed chant, by order of Paul V., this work was probably directed by Giovanelli, the successor of Palestrina, and chapelmaster at the Vatican. Similar editions appeared at Paris after the year 1636, published by Vitray and Cramoisy.

We refer to the above mentioned work of La Fage for the bibliography of works upon the plain-chant. He gives a learned and detailed list of all the principal works to be consulted upon this subject; we note in it:—

1. Flores Musicae omnes Cantus Gregoriani, published at Strasburg in 1458;
2. Antiphonarium et Graduale, Paris, 1649, 1655;
3. The Editiones at Nevers, 1658, 1696 and 1734;
4. Methods of plain-chant by Jumilhac, Poisson, Lebeuf, Gerbert, Abbé Roze, Fetis, Clement, Nisard;

5. Gerbert's Collection in 3 vols. 4to;
6. Antiphonary of St. Gregory, edited by Lambillotte;
7. Ortigue's Dictionaire liturgique.

We add to this list the Traite d'accompagnement du plain-chant by our learned friend, Stephen Morelot, and we have all the necessary works.

The revive the ancient liturgic traditions in all their purity, it is desirable to establish in the Holy Chapel at Paris, a model ritual, which may serve as a type for other churches and which would be marvellously suited to the beautiful architecture of the edifice.

A word in closing upon choral singing in France, which it would seem must be improved and extended by the multiplication of the Orphons. Choron, Wilhem, Hubert, Gounod, Chené and other professors less known have developed in the laboring classes a taste for such music which may well be considered a preservative against bad passions.

Here we have precious elements for a glorious future of the art; we have but to learn to direct them and we shall soon obtain grand resources for all the festivals and solemnities both civil and religious.

NOTE.—M. M. Bazin and Pasdeloup have just succeeded M. Gounod in the direction of the Orphons. M. Delaporte devotes himself to this matter with indefatigable activity.

On Rudimental Instruction on the Piano.

BY F. PETERSILEA.

NO. III.

Finger, Wrist, and Elbow Action; Mechanical and Melodious Touch—have been spoken of in the former letter; it has also been stated, that mechanical and melodious touch stand to the pianist in the same relation as pencil and brush to the painter, that the beginner has nothing to do with the latter. Even as nature employs the elements of matter in endless variety and combination without showing classification, so does the artist in his limited sphere; but the beginner needs the most systematical arrangement, division and subdivision, whether he studies Chemistry, Natural history or Music.

To secure a correct mechanical touch, it is of the most importance, that each action (Finger, Wrist, and Elbow), should be separately taught in a suitable course of exercises and studies; that Wrist action must not be employed, until Finger action is thoroughly learned. It is therefore self-evident, that five finger exercises claim our first attention; but before I can move another step, I must speak of Accentuation, the first element of a correct mechanical touch.

In looking at the first little lesson an intelligent pupil may naturally inquire. What is the object of these numbers 2-4, these barlines and measures, as you call them? I will tell you. Music is somewhat like the language you speak and read. Words are arranged in the sentences, phrases and periods, without which arrangement language would be unintelligible; a right application of Accent or Emphasis is also needed, to prevent confusion. When you read a poem, you may notice particularly an accented syllable regularly followed by one or two unaccented ones; this arrangement is called Rhythm. It is even so in music. These numbers 2-4 show, that in every measure are two notes—quarter—of which the first is the good note (nota buona) the second the bad note (nota cattiva) or call them the accented and unaccented note; if you like it better. But as your lessons will soon become more difficult, and have a greater number and variety of notes in every measure, I will show you a little table, by which you can learn at once a correct accentuation for all future occasions; It is the ingenious work of Gottfried Weber.

A measure or bar contains either two or three beats; in the first case it is Even time (common), in the second Uneven time (triple).

A. Even time with even divisions.

Even time with uneven divisions.

B. Uneven time with even divisions.

Or in smaller notes.

Uneven time with uneven divisions.

The figure ^ indicates the greater, / the smaller accent.

In the group accents fall on the 1, 3, 5, and 7 note; the fifth is twice as strong as the third and seventh, the first twice as strong as fifth; there is consequently but one heaviest note in every bar. These accented notes are beats to be counted; accustom yourself, while doing so to indicate their relative force by a corresponding tone of voice, don't say: o-o-one, two-o-o, drawing out each word as if you were measuring tape. Speak each word short, brisk; but one with particular energy. Notice further, that it is better to count one, and two and, if four beats must be counted, instead of one, two, three, four; speak the word and in the lightest manner, and drop it, as soon as the counting of two beats only becomes advisable.

I return now to the Five Finger exercises or lessons.

It is a strange mistake, to occupy the scholar for the first few months with the useful but uninteresting, unharmonious, unmelodious five-finger exercises of Aloise Schmitt, Hummel, Herz and others of the same description, for they have in the first place no musical interest, attraction, and secondly furnish no opportunity for reading bass notes or playing an independent part with the left hand; but the eye must at the very start be made accustomed to overlook to parts, and to read the lower before the upper, or no future period will ever entirely repair the mischief of merely reading the melody and giving only occasionally attention to the accompaniment.

If the first lessons are to be of any service, they must possess the following qualities:

1. Compass of five keys. 2. All the attraction of Melody and Rhythm, which any good tune ought to have. 3. A suitable bass, by which the left hand is trained equal to, and independent of the right. 4. Last but not least: The same note must not occur twice or more times in succession: for the same key cannot be repeated correctly, except by a motion of the second finger-joint (as in the Tremolo) or by wrist-action, neither of which the scholar has learned yet. The unavoidable consequence would be a stiff movement of finger and wrist action combined. The lesson must be so constructed, that the notes can be played in an uninterrupted legato, until a correct finger action is thoroughly secured.

The easy little tunes, recreations and amusements, (not possessing this quality) which are usually intermixed with the dry, repulsive finger exercise like sweetmeats with bitter pills will not only neutralize all the good of the latter, but force even on the best scholar a stiff, entirely unmechanical touch, in spite of all the teacher may say.

(To be continued.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Ludwig van Beethoven's Life and Works.

BY ADOLF BERNHARD MARX.

Translated from Dr. F. Brendel's Review, by G. A. Schmitt.

(Concluded from page 356.)

II.

It is not granted to the artist of the nineteenth century to stand in the frigid elevation of clouds and let the nations and their fate pass beneath him, as if wrapped in mist. From the eighteenth century Goethe carried over into the nineteenth the spirit of an age complete in itself, the spirit of plastic quiet. "Nothing of politics," said Stein* to Arndt,† as the latter saw him walk with Goethe, through a cathedral at Cologne, "the man is too great to take a part in our struggles." Let us rather say, Goethe's soul was gifted by nature with a double vision. He looked back on the still, peaceful world of the eighteenth century and then again an endless perspective full of future generations opened before him. The time of strife he had passed through in his youth. Finished, self-sufficient, he could not but be cold and unsympathising with the ideas of the times. A different case it was with Beethoven. He first came upon the stage in the time of struggle, as a son of the epoch beginning in 1789. He saw the world without in endless strife, all the forces unchained; and just so fate had ordained it for him, to pass within his own heart through one of the hardest struggles that ever fell to the lot of mortals. It is well-known that he was hard of hearing already in the time of the 2d symphony. Afterwards he became deaf. Weak-minded critics, as an excuse, as it were, for his grandest works, pretended that he was crazy too. Others attempt to deduce his "errors" from this deafness. Marx, however, clearly proves — if there be need of proof at this day — that his deafness did not affect his musical creative genius; that it merely entered the "outer halls" of his art, merely injured his (piano)-playing.

The result of his struggles and this lively sympathy with the world without him, is his third symphony, the Eroica. It was first dedicated to Napoleon Beethoven, full of the grand ideas of the republic of Plato, saw in him the hero, who endeavored as a tyrant, as a dictator, in the sense in which the Greeks understood the word, to restore a disjointed commonwealth. To celebrate this hero, Beethoven wrote the symphony, "Bonaparte." When the news reached him that this hero had "soiled himself by a grease-spot," as Heine expresses it, Beethoven changed the title and the work appeared, entitled, "Sinfonia eroica composta per festeggiare il sovvenire d'un grand' uomo." It is ascertained, beyond doubt, that "the Eroica" was finished before Beethoven received the news of Napoleon having declared himself emperor. This refutes all the nonsense concerning changes which Beethoven was said to have made in the Eroica in consequence of the fall of the French republic. Marx took the trouble of thoroughly proving this untrue. His refutation of Oulibicheff is one of the most splendid passages of the book. The Russian holds, like Féti's, the opinion, that the second movement of the Eroica was really nothing but the Finale of the symphony in C minor. The difference in key, the absolute absence of all connection between the two movements, then the historical facts, and last of all the C minor symphony itself, as we shall see, are sufficient proofs that this view is superficial and arbitrary.

It is a different thing with Wagner's view. Wagner does not take the historical facts into account. His explanation of the Eroica is based on the inner life, on motives simply taken from the nature of man. He sees in the hero the full, the whole man. In accordance with this, Wagner states the artistic contents of the work as the manifold, powerfully mingled emotions of a strong, perfect individuality to which nothing human is alien, but which contains within itself all that is truly humane, and sets them forth in such a way, as to arrive, after most openheartedly showing all the noblest passions, at a most satisfactory perfect statement of its nature, combining most sympathetic tenderness with most energetic strength, &c. (Marx I. 283.) This view is not in opposition with the work. It merely generalizes, as Marx correctly observes, the idea, which prompted Beethoven to write the work. This "music of the idea" was the momentous progress on the path of which Beethoven entered in the Eroica. While music until then had only expressed emotions, it now began to represent life, that is to say, complete situations of life, with its own means, according to the idea, to the idealized image, which had formed itself in the artist (Marx I. 281). Music proceeded in the opposite direction with poetry. The latter began with the epos and ended with lyrics; the epic element was introduced into music at the beginning of our century by Beethoven. We have to deny ourselves the pleasure of following Marx in the excellent analysis, which he gives of this instrumental epic. We merely mention, what real pleasure his exposition of the Finale gave us. To us likewise it always appeared like the image of peace, the object of war.

We need not be astonished that the Eroica pleased less than a symphony by Eberl, according to a statement in the "Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung." The thinking-apparatus of the public is ponderous, and the critic is as a rule but the obliging tribune of this unorganic mass of people, called public. That need not surprise us. Oulibicheff, after all a man of esprit, hears in one place of the first movement, the death-rattle, expressed with that "truth too faithful," which becomes an untruth in the domain of art. Marx (I. 303) reminds him of the man possessed by an evil spirit in Raphael's Transfiguration, of Lear, Othello, Æschylus, Dante, &c. Useless labor! Why trouble such persons, that find to this day, Lear too awful, Richard III too fearful

(To be continued.)

Ludwig Rellstab.

(Continued from page 373.)

Meanwhile, he transferred his place of residence to Frankfort-on-the-Oder, in order to be able to undertake, free from interruption, greater works. He here drew up the plot for his tragedy of Karl der Kühne, which he afterwards completed at Weimar. He now commenced his travels, continuing them almost every year to his death, for the purpose of obtaining on the one hand, by intercourse with eminent persons or suggestive characters in the social and artistic world, matter for his productions, and, on the other, in order to elevate himself by the charms and magnificence of nature, which he loved like a child.

To accompany him with interest to Dresden, where, during 1821, he passed a pleasant time—associating, as he did, with C. M. von Weber and Ludwig Tieck—and, especially, took a great interest in the celebrated evening readings of Tieck; to Baireuth, where Jean Paul most cordially welcomed him in the bosom of his family, and where in the "Fantaisie" and "Eremitage," now so well known through the "Siebenkais," and more especially in the little hostelry of the wonderful "Frau Rollwenzel," he enjoyed many hours of the most interesting conversation, and conceived the highest respect for the great poet; to Weimar, where he made a lengthened sojourn; where he was a constant visitor of Goethe's daughter-in-law, Ottilie von Göthe, and where on, several evenings, he was present, with Zelter, at the parties in Goethe's house, often deeply moved by the great poet, but, as a general rule, not feeling captivated by his aristocratic and reserved demeanor, particularly when he remembered Jean Paul. We here find him making the acquaintance of Johanna Schopenhauer—the mother of the celebrated philosopher—Hummel, Riemer and Eberwein. We likewise are informed of an interesting evening at Goethe's, when Zelter introduced his pupil, Felix Mendelssohn, then twelve years old, to the prince of poetry, filling the latter with surprise and admiration at the boy's great musical talent.

In Heidelberg, Rellstab formed the acquaintance of Krenzer, and that original, Thibaut, so esteemed for his old Italian Gesangverein, and whose work, on the Purity of Music, created a sensation in its time. Welcker, Moriz Arndt, A. W. von Schlegel, F. Hebel, and Caroline Pichler pass before our gaze, and we possess from Rellstab's pen characteristic sketches, which, with as much penetration as love, exhibit to us the sayings and doings of these various individuals. What captivates us most, however, is Rellstab's intercourse, in 1825, with Beethoven, the sick genius, nearly crushed by his mournful fate. What we glean from this residence of Rellstab in Vienna is not important in an artistic light; he often visited Beethoven, and conversed with him by means of a writing-tablet; but, as far as Rellstab is concerned, the Beethoven conversations are worthy of attention, because the touching tenderness with which the young poet was treated called forth, in his Reise Mittheilungen, one of those admirable sketches, where overflowing sensibility and respect for the object described go hand in hand with the most artistic form of style.

If we cast a glance over the career of our friend up to this time, and also recollect the condition of political newspapers at that period, as well as the limited interest possessed by the articles for the general reading public, it cannot be denied that a man of Rellstab's talent, thus cultivated and precisely in its prime, would, if gained over for a journal, invest with preponderating importance any paper for which his services might be secured. In addition to this is the fact, that on returning from his interesting travels in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy to Berlin, Rellstab found that capital in a state of art-enthusiasm produced by Henrietta Sontag, and which formed a glaring contrast to his travelling impressions. A reflex of his opinions on this head is to be found in the saucily satirical sketch of character, published under the title of Die schöne Henrietta, a sketch, in which so delicately clear a light, speaking in in a literary sense, was cast upon sundry individuals in Berlin, besides the fair idol of the day, that the author's reputation in the capital was firmly established from that moment. For a feuilleton writer the ground was sufficiently prepared; the only thing needed was the seed from which not only the varied pictures of Berlin society, but also the serious truths of scientific and artistic life shut up.

The then editor of the Vossische Zeitung was Herr Lessing, a commissary of justice, and descended from a branch of the family of the celebrated poet and critic of the same name. This gentleman secured the young author's services. On the 31st October, 1826, Rellstab's first criticism appeared in the Vossische Zeitung. His talent for communicating art impressions, and conveying in his writings the innermost thoughts of the public, went on increasing year by year, and attained its culminating point in 1847, after which date the political life of Germany, nay, more, of Europe, entered a completely new phase. Pecuniary losses, occasioned by the year of the revolution, and many other dispiriting causes, crippled, in some degree, his mental energy. His opinions and feelings would not accommodate themselves to the new development of political life, and he abandoned a considerable portion of his usual labors. We must, therefore, bear in mind the period we have mentioned if we would properly appreciate the services he rendered to newspaper literature.

* Prussian minister.

† Professor at Bonn and famous champion of the German cause against Napoleon.

With the greatest possible impartiality—for the love of truth shall have as great a share as friendship in our sketch—we will go through Rellstab's musical criticisms belonging to this part of our subject. We are presented with a picture gallery of the artistic individualities who shone, during a period of more than twenty years, in the art-firmament of the educated world. We first read notices of Mad. Sontag, Catalani, Schechner, Sessi, Heinefetter, and Milder. Subsequent years make us acquainted with Hummel, Fräulein von Schätzel, Paganini, and Schröder-Devrient. To these we must add the names of Mendelssohn, Kalkbrenner, Wild, the brothers Müller, and Mad. Schechner-Wagen. After 1835, there appear in the foreground artists better known, and more popular at the present day. Among these we make the acquaintance in their most brilliant impersonations of the more or less important members of the Theatre Royal, who belonged for some time to that establishment. Herren Bader, Martins, Krause, the ladies Von Fassmann, Louise Schlegel (Mad. Kröster), and Tuczeck, excite our lively interest, while the concert-room, as well as the stage, is from time to time transiently illuminated by stars of the greatest splendor. Clara Novello and Pauline Garcia, the Sisters Milanollo and Jenny Lind, Vieuxtemps, Thalberg, De Bériot, Liszt, and other great artists come under this category. There is no scarcity either of elaborate judgments on eminent art productions, both novelties and revivals. We read with lively interest minutely critical notices of Bach's Passionsmusik, of Fidelio, of Bernhard Klein's David, of Löwe's Sieben Schlüfer, of Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and of other works

(To be continued).

Church Music in New York.

Trinity Church Corporation is the richest religious institution in the country, and has under its management one church (Trinity) and three chapels, viz; Trinity Chapel, St. John's and St. Paul's.

Trinity Church stands on Broadway, at the head of Wall street, and is widely known for the beauty and purity of its architecture, and the height of its steeple, which is the tallest on Manhattan Island. It is in the lower, or business part of the city, and its congregation is composed mainly of the floating population—hence it has been designated the Metropolitan Church.

The music of Trinity, which is of the ancient ecclesiastical style, has always been quite celebrated for its excellence, and a large sum of money is appropriated annually to its maintenance. Dr. Hodges, who officiated as organist here for many years, and had many admirers in all parts of the Union, was afflicted with paralysis some two years since, from which he has never fully recovered. He is now residing at West Point, and has been succeeded by Mr. H. S. Cutler; formerly of the Church of the Advent, Boston, who fully sustains for the music of this church the high reputation which it has always borne.

The organ is the largest, as well as the most extensive, ever constructed in this country, with one exception—that built for St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church at Albany, by Simmons & Willecox, of Boston. It cost about twelve thousand dollars, and was built in the year 1846, by Henry Erben, of this city, under the supervision and after the designs of Dr. Edward Hodges. It has three manuals, the keys of each giving a distinct foot tone, and contains 44 stops, which is not an unusual number, but each one of these represents a much greater number of pipes than in most organs: there is one thirty-two foot stop in the organ.

The base is a beautiful piece of workmanship of the Gothic order, in harmony with the architecture of the church, 40 feet in height, of solid oak, richly carved, and was designed by Richard Upjohn, Esq., architect of the church.

The music of this church is what is technically termed the choral, or cathedral service, which consists in introduction by the Priest or Minister on a given monotone, with responses by the choir in full harmony, and it is the only church in this country where it is carried out in its integrity. The choir is composed of boys, sixteen in number, who sing the soprano and alto parts, with six men to balance them in tenor and bass. All are placed in the chancel after the English style, which is said by the highest authority in such matters to be the only proper place. They are robed in white surplices, and ranged on the Decani and Cantoris sides, facing each other; the chants, psalms, etc., are chanted antiphonally, the full choir coming in with excellent effect on the Gloria. In connection with the church a Chorister's School has been established for the education of the choristers, who belong mostly to the middle and wealthy classes. Two hours each day are devoted to their musical instruction, which is directed most efficiently and thoroughly by Mr. Cutler, organist of the church. None are admitted to this school except those who can pass a critical examination, both as regards natural musical capacity and quality of voice. Their ages range from ten to sixteen years. Mr. Cutler has discovered that one of these boys, Walter Fernandez, of Spanish birth, and now about 12 years of age, possesses a soprano voice most remarkable for its upward compass, which extends to C in alt.—almost the highest note ever attempted by the most noted female soprano singers. Mr. Cutler's voluntaries are short, and always extemporized.

Trinity Chapel is located on 25th street, near Broadway, and was built in 1855 at a cost, including ground, of $225,000. It is a remarkably substantial structure in the Gothic style, and measures 180 feet in its extreme length inside. The walls are built of free stone and lined with the French Caen stone. The internal decorations and ornamentations are of the polychromatic style, finished in the highest style of art, and are in perfect keeping with the architecture throughout. It is located in one of the most fashionable quarters of the city, and its congregation is made up of the dite of New York society. The organ, when completed, will be one of the first class, with 44 stops, but at present not more than half that number are in use; it is placed to the left of the chancel, entirely concealed from the view of the congregation. The design and peculiarities of arrangements are those of Doct. Hodges of Trinity Church, and the builders are Messrs. Hall & Lorbagh of this city.

The organist, Mr. William H. Walter, is a gentleman of much experience, having served in this parish fifteen years, and played in all of its churches; he is the author, or rather compiler, of a very superior collection of music, and his style of playing shows that he is possessed of a most thorough and cultivated taste. He is fortunately not at all hampered by the caprices of clergy or congregation in his selections, which occupy a position midway between the ancient English, and modern secular quasi operatic schools, and embrace within their scope the compositions of such as Purcell, Boyce, Doct. Nares, Clarke Whitfield, Jackson, and Doct. Hodges, together with many of his own; his voluntaries are selected mainly from the chefs d'œuvre of Mozart and Haydn. The choir is a double quartette, comprising six professional singers and two amateurs; we can safely say that, as a whole, it is second to none in New York; in fact the congregation—being a very appreciative one—would only tolerate the best of music. The sum of $2500 is appropriated annually for music in this Chapel.

Many of our church choirs contain amateurs who become eminent in the course of time as musicians, and these are great incentives to their joining in this capacity, for, in the absence of Conservatoires de Musique in this country, many persons, finding themselves possessed of musical abilities, enter the service of the church, in order to enjoy the facilities here extended for practice; and, at last, the finest voices and most skillful performers, grow into notoriety through this means. Such has been the case with not a few of our public singers.

At St. John's Chapel, in Varick street, there is an organ built by Thomas Robjohn, in 1841, which, though over twenty years old, is a very good one, and celebrated for its diapasons. It is enclosed in a rich black-walnut case, of the Grecian style, very highly ornamented. Mr. George F. Bristow, formerly of St. George's Church, is the organist, and, as his merits are well known, we will not speak of them in detail on the present occasion. The choir is a quartette, made up of the following: soprano, Mrs. Holder, alto, Mme. Stæpel; tenor, Mr. J. W. Good; and basso, Mr. Henry Tucker. Their execution of the music displays much beauty and grace.

St. Paul's Chapel, on Broadway, adjoining the Astor House, is one of the most ancient of our city churches, and contains an organ built in England by one England of London, some sixty years ago. It was a good one in its day, but has been very materially altered, and the character of it entirely changed

It is presided over by Mr. Michael Erben, a brother of Henry Erben, the celebrated organ builder, and son of Peter Erben, formerly organist of Old Trinity Church. He is a most able performer, and one thoroughly qualified in every way to direct the music of this church. The choir is a double quartette, and the music is finished and thorough in every particular.—Evening Transcript.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 23, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha," Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

NO. VII.

A WEEK IN DRESDEN, CONCLUDED.

BERLIN, Dec. 27, 1860.

Much more might be told of that week; but I must make an end of it, simply recalling of the next day's experiences (Nov. 2), first a morning delightfully spent, with an artist for a guide, and with a musician, full of fresh enthusiasm for all things beautiful, for companion, among the famous paintings. We went first to the atelier of Professor Hübner, who has so admirably catalogued the Dresden gallery, and spent a pleasant half hour in examining his poetic designs for the Treppenhaus, or entrance hall or stairway, of the royal gallery, in which the rise and progress of Art and Civilization are presented in a series of exquisite allegorical frescoes—for he too is one of those industrious geniuses, who,—like Cornelius, like Kaulbach (in the Treppenhaus of the Berlin Museum), Schnorr (in the Niebelungen frescoes at Munich), Schwind (in his legend of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, and of the minstrel contest at the Wartburg—the best of them all, to my mind)—keeps perpetually weaving, over all the walls of German palaces, the rainbow web of classic and Teutonic fable, and heroic memories, and moral meanings. With this obliging, informed Virgil for a guide and an interpreter, we ascended into the Paradise of the Royal Gallery. (Pardon the inaccuracy—Virgil, I believe, never got beyond the Inferno;—much that you find in these galleries, however, would justify the use of the latter term; for it is surprising how few of the old painters could resist the fascination of such subjects as the Last Judgment and the agonies of sinners.) And so we saw the Raphael Madonna, and the Correggios, and the Titians, and the Holbein, and the other immortals; saw much in each that we should not have seen with our mere dilettanti laymen's eyes; among the rest a little picture from the earliest period of Da Vinci, of which the authorship was first discovered by internal evidence by the Professor, and afterwards conclusively confirmed by documents. The exposition of the evidence, in the painting itself, was such a lesson in Art as one seldom gets in wandering through famous galleries, who is not himself a painter. Our guide is; so we must let him return to his rainbow weaving; while we, left like two children in a field of flowers, roam about awhile longer, from picture to picture, wherever anything attracts, without aim or method, without haste or rest, until the sense is weary and one sees more with the eyes shut than open. Everybody knows that no occupation fatigues brain and body so soon, as looking about in a picture gallery. The reason is, because it is neither the one thing nor the other, neither occupation nor release from it, neither study nor amusement, neither work nor rest; but a sort of uncertain, contradictory distracting limbo between both states; it has neither the active repose of concentrated and creative thought, nor the passive repose of pure abandon, flinging all thought away; a hundred things half occupy you, but none occupies entirely; a hundred lovelinesses seem to fascinate and to seize hold of you, but not one has possession of you. Such is the fatality of "doing" picture galleries; while he who goes to study or to copy, in right earnest, may stay there all the hours of daylight and come away no more fatigued than mother Earth by spinning on her axis. Yet do not suppose that it is not good to look and see all one can. The lesson of all this is, simply, do not try to see more than you can, at once; leave off when the brain grows weary; look as long as looking is a real delight, and not a fancied one painfully pressed upon you by an avaricious sense of duty. In such fresh hours some things, the best things, at any rate the best things for you, will certainly commit themselves to your memory, without much trouble or anxiety on your part. To be sure, there is much to be said for one who is in a hurry, who, like all travellers, finds himself continually in the tantalizing dilemma of splendid opportunities and short time. But we are continually reminded that opportunity is twofold; there is both outward and inward opportunity, or, in the technical phrase of metaphysics, objective and subjective opportunity; and either without the other profiteth a man little. Food is good, but not without appetite, and appetite is fever without food.

Secondly, a play of Shakespeare in a German theatre. One could strain a point, and even go out of time and out of mood, to seize such an opportunity. (How inconsistent we, like most preachers, are!). For have we not often heard it said, that nowhere can one see a play of Shakespeare so well done, so conscientiously and so artistically in all its parts, as in the Royal theatre in Dresden? And that there are few Shakespearian actors in our day superior or equal to Herr Dawson. So we went to see him enact King Richard III. He certainly has many of the qualities of a great actor, though I should not (at least from this experience) think of comparing him to the elder, or even to the younger Booth. He has thoroughly studied and conceived his part, and gives you a consistent individuality. There is subtlety and magnetism in him. You are impressed with power, and of the masculine imaginative sort. But we in America have certainly seen greater. In his utterance he is not free from a certain French nasal tone, which seems to be a common trick of German actors. In Berlin one might take this for a tradition from the times of Frederic the Great. The acting and scenic presentation of the piece, too, as a whole, was good, better than one sees on an American stage—so far as it went. But the expectation of completeness was not met. There were large and most extraordinary omissions and curtailments. Here, to be sure, were no bad actors; several were excellent:—refreshing contrast to our cheap, demoralizing system of trusting to the attraction of one great actor, while all the secondary parts are caricatured. In Germany you see artistic conscience even in a theatre.

There was one thing, however, that could but annoy a lover of Shakespeare, and all the more if he chanced also to be musical. The tent scene of Richard, the vision, was accompanied by fits and starts of miserable melo-dramatic music in the orchestra (Rietz did not conduct that night);—not such music as Beethoven put to "Egmont," or Mendelssohn to the Fairies, but a poor, sulphurous, blue light kind of instrumental spukerei by some obscure composer, no doubt manufactured for the occasion, which seemed entirely untrue to the character and dignity of German Art. I must believe it to be exceptional. For an overture, too, was played that by Cherubini to Elisa, a thing of an entirely different character from Richard.

Nov. 3. The golden harvest moon episode is over. A cold Novemberish day, colorless and black, for my last in Dresden. But if the morning frown without there is summer within. The violin is willing; preludes and fugues of Bach, toccatas, passacailles, what not, pass off the forenoon very satisfactorily, interspersed with chat with artists.

In the evening Weber's Preciosa at the Opera—or rather, somebody's four-act Gipsy drama of Preciosa, with dance and music by Weber. This was an experience to give one a new faith in the stage. It was the pure ideal of romance; a thing so free from any taint of coarseness, commonness, flat sentimentality or dullness, that it seemed rather to enact itself immediately in the visionary chambers of the brain, than in an artificial theatre. It was altogether beautiful, in music, scenery and action. The impression it produced was fresh and sweet as spring. Mere light and pretty fancy as the little play is in itself, it becomes so ethereal and transparent in von Weber's music, and somehow music, stage-machinery and actors all conspired so happily to make an exquisite poetie whole of it, that its effect on the mind was far more edifying than that of many things which contain more matter and aim higher. One only wished that there were more of the music; for what there is of it is of the very finest, most imaginative that ever came from Weber's brain. The overture, the song of Preciosa, the Gipsy dances and marches, are perfect in their way; and rendered that time by an orchestra and chorus, under Rietz's direction, not to be surpassed. That scene of the Gipsy encampment in the woods by moonlight, with the well known chorus: Im Walde, was the most ideal whole of music, scenery and grouping that I ever witnessed. The moonlight was real. The perfection to which the arts of scenery and stage effect are carried in the best theatres in Germany would astonish some of our friends, who rest so happily in the belief that the Boston Theatre and the New York Academy of Music beat the world in these ingenious contrivances. Let them see Preciosa as I saw it in Dresden, or Oberon as in Munich, or "Midsummer Night's Dream" as in the Berlin Schauspielhaus, or Lohengrin as in the Berlin Royal Opera house, and they will think Boston and New York a century behind the age in these things. The way that one scene melts into another sometimes is magical; more like "dissolving views" than like any mechanical result of wheels and arms and pulleys. The part of the Gipsy maiden, Preciosa,—of course a stolen child of noble parentage—who exercises a supreme sway among the swarthy lawless tribe through the pure spell of her beauty and her goodness, and who like a clear star therefore radiates a steady, holy lustre through the clouds and wild woods of the story, found a quite poetie presentation in the person, voice and action of Fräulein Ulrich. Dawson, as the Gypsy chief, seemed perfectly at home. It was a delightful thing to see and hear for once; and I should fear to see it a second time, lest the complete charm could not be repeated. The music, every bit of it, was choice and healthy. Having to leave Dresden very early in the morning, one could not carry away a more charming last impression of it. And that journey was to take me to the Weihnachts Cantata, or "Christmas Oratorio" of Bach the next afternoon, in Leipzig! D.

FLORENCE, JAN. 17, 1861. — A crowded audience—among whom was a large deputation of Americans—assembled at the Pergola last night to witness the first performance of Anna Bolena; it being also the occasion of Miss CHAPMAN'S debut in opera. It was a judicious act on the part of this young lady not to assume the task of carrying the opera through upon her own merits; a mistake into which most novices, both upon the Dramatic and the Lyric stage are apt to fall; wisely enough the part of the heroine was sustained by Mlle. MASSON, of Parisian fame, while our young countrywomen were cast in the less assuming, but somewhat arduous part of Lady Jane Seymour. It was surely no small thing for a young American girl to appear for the first time before an audience which has the reputation of being the most critical and the least merciful in Europe. Miss Chapman must have summoned to her aid her whole stock of self control to avoid being utterly overwhelmed with that most deplorable of catastrophes, a stage fright. She succeeded, however, in preserving a perfectly calm, dignified and yet thoroughly modest demeanor throughout the evening, which, together with her really imposing presence and an unusual share of beauty, seemed to impress the Florentine public favorably; upon whom personal attractions are never thrown away.

Miss Chapman's first cavatina, which has in itself not much to recommend it, and which neither displays the singer's voice nor execution, was well delivered, and met with a complimentary reception. Her voice is a little too much for her yet and she does not quite get it under her control when she first begins to sing. It sounds a little bit hard as if needed oiling; but this oiling or mellowing comes as she goes on, and after the first two or three phrases it came out rich, full and pure, showing her hearers that this first requisite of a singer she possesses in an eminent degree, and of a rare and fine quality.

An unfortunate part of the performance for singers, audience, and certainly for the poor man himself was the terrible fiasco which the basso made in Henry the Eighth, from the moment he sang the first note, and which he increased and completed with every note he sang. As most of his part was sung with Miss Chapman it is wonderful that she was not involved in his ruin; but she had been instructed to go straight through with her part, and trust the keen ears of her audience to detect the culprit in the duo and trio both of which were utterly ruined by the false notes of the incompetent basso. His name is of no consequence and the sooner a kind oblivion covers it the better. "Non ragionam' di lui ma guarda e passa," at the close of the first scena between Lady Jane and the King there was a good deal of hearty applause and the king appeared leading the favorite by the hand. They bowed and retired, but this would not do; the applause continued louder than before. Again they appeared, and this time the applause was mingled with hisses and groans. The two retired once more, and then there were loud cries of Sola! Sola! and the young debutante came out alone amid most hearty cheers and vivas, testifying that these severe critics were as anxious to encourage her for doing well, as these were determined to mortify and disgrace the other for doing badly.

The long scene in the second act between the Queen and Lady Jane was the gem of the evening and one of the bright spots in a dragging and uninteresting opera, despite a great deal of lovely music that is in it.

I may congratulate our young countrywoman upon having made a most favorable impression upon a public, willing to express approval if pleased, but who are most cold blooded, — not to say brutal — in their condemnation of mediocrity. Here there is no such thing as "damning with faint praise, as with our good natured audiences; but a smart shower of hisses, and even sometimes loud shouts of "Bestia" and "Animale" are the sure punishment of perhaps, such a trifle as a false note.

Miss Chapman, of course, is yet ignorant of stage business; that can be obtained only by practice and familiarity. Her best friends must desire to see her continue as at present in parts of second importance, till she has accomplished all that well-directed industry has in store for her.

At present the voice of Miss Chapman is a pure soprano, remarkably fine in the upper notes, but most pleasing in the middle register. It has a clear penetrating quality which will render it effective in the largest theatres. It has not much of the warmth or sympathetic quality of the best voices that I have heard. Neither is it a willing voice like Alboni's; but yet it is a voice that will make her fortune anywhere after it is thoroughly broken in. To the zeal as well as skill of her accomplished teacher, Signor Luigi Vannuccini belongs a great deal of praise for the excellent method he has observed in his course of instruction, as well as for the thorough manner in which he prepared Miss Chapman to go before so critical a public in this past.

In conclusion let me say that all of Miss Chapman's defects are memorable blemishes on a field of fair promise; her future is in her own hands. She has every thing to hope for, if she will let hope be the word and back it with effort.

J. L.

The Bards.

The Orpheus Club attracted a great audience on last Saturday evening that quite filled the Boston Museum, to hear the operatic travesty, "the Bards." We can give no better notion of the plot than by copying the abstract which was distributed to the audience. The performance was in German, but no one who did not understand the language could fail to understand the main points, so admirably was it acted.

"The Bards" are a set of Drunken Druids, who, while vowed to abstinence from spirits, exhibit in their persons and manner a frequent departure from their vows. The opera opens with a chorus in which they relate their laws and duties. One Bard accuses Stiefel of having drunk beer, and his instant punishment is demanded. He is accordingly led away to await his doom. The Chief being left alone indulges in a private eulogium upon his favorite beverage, gin. While thus employed, the Grand Priest enters and detects him in the forbidden enjoyment. But instead of being angry, he is induced to pay his own respects to the bottle and they conclude with a mock heroic duet. Freia and Piefke then enter. She was once a servant maid named Julia in a Berlin tavern, where she was met and won by Piefke, a cockney tailor. He leaves her, and after being turned away, she strays among the Bards and becomes one of them. There she attracts the notice of the High Priest who makes love to her, but unsuccessfully. Piefke finds her out, and while she is telling her story, they are discovered by the jealous Priest. They beg his forgiveness with burlesque pathos and fire; but, on hearing that they are married and have a son, he calls in the Bards, denounces them, and they are led away to prepare for death.

The Second Act opens with Piefke bemoaning his fate alone. The Chief enters and informs Piefke that he is his uncle, and was once a cobbler. He promises Piefke, that if he will aid him in exposing the Grand Priest, who has also broken his vow, and whose place the Chief is desirous of obtaining, his own life and that of Freia may be saved. The Bards then enter leading Freia, and Piefke is struck with terror. But, gaining courage, he accuses the Grand Priest of having broken his vow. The latter is searched and a gin-bottle is found in his pocket. The Grand Priest, in his turn, accuses the Chief, and both are led away to execution. Piefke then implores Freia to fly with him to Berlin; but she upbraids him with cowardice. While thus debating, the Bards without proclaim Piefke their Chief. At first he refuses to accept, but Freia says, that if he does not, she will kill herself and Fritzen, their son; he finally consents. Fritzen, a tall, blonde, gawky youth, is brought forward. The old men are pardoned, and the opera ends with a grand hurrah over the new Chief.

Of course, the whole thing is a broad burlesque, the music as much so as the words, although such burlesque music as only a real artist could write. The trills, roulades, cadenzas, were of the ultra Italian operatic style, while the dramatic situations, poses and points, reminded you of all the operas you had ever heard up to this time.

The music we should have stated is by Julius Frondenthal, director at the Court of the Duke of Brunswick.

The whole force of the "Orpheus" made up such a male chorus, as no opera company ever vouchsafed us, of musical voices, and perfect training it is superfluous to say. In the costume, of the priests in Norma, their action was spirited and funny, most refreshing to behold, after the conventional gestures and movements of the opera choruses, to which we have been so long accustomed.

The principal solo parts were taken by Messrs. Langerfeldt, Schraubstädtler and Jansen, and very admirably were they given. Beside being as our readers very well know, perfectly at home in the music, with voices of the best, they were perfectly at home in all the stage business, as few amateurs are whom we have ever seen upon the boards. The first named gentleman as Freia, the priestess (dressed à la Norma) was inimitable; his gentle movements and feminine graces would have put to shame some Normas of the stage, and only the tall stature and flowing manly beard betrayed the sex. If there were a fault it would be that the Freia, half servant girl half priestess, was made too lady like. A funny contrast was the lover Piefke (Mr W. Schraubstädtler) in blue swallow tailed coat, white hat and all the airs of the Berlin tailor so ludicrously in contrast with the priestly robes of the others. The grand duo of the chief priests, after the manner of the Puritani duet, was rapturously applauded and repeated, the aged priests waving little star spangled banners (of thirty-four stars, we trust) after the fashion of Bndiali & Co. Nor should we forget the blonde four old Fritzen, whose infantile tricks added much to the effect of the denouement.

The piano accompaniments were finely given by Mr. Leonhard, the orchestra parts not having arrived. A crowded house would attend to witness a repetition of the Bards.

Vivat hoch! Long live the Bards! — at least such jolly bards as our old friends of the Orpheus represented. Little music we have had in these troublous times, whilst listening for the first gun from Fort Sumter; little music of a grand, or even grandiose style; all the more welcome, therefore, this delightful mess of nonsense, this musical farce, fit to be done on Twelfth Night, before the Abbot of Unreason, with Don Quixote on one side of his chair and Bombastes Furioso on the other.

The libretto has been spiritedly rendered by our townsman, Mr. C. J. Sprague, but no translation can give a full idea of the mock-heroic doggerel, the bombastic commonplaces, the verbal infelicities of the original. The music, though intended as a burlesque upon the Italian school is, for the most part, really excellent, with flowing melodies, strongly marked rhythm, and finely wrought cadences; and much of the fun of the opera depends upon the linking together of the absurd nonsense or prosaic sentiments with music of a stirring character. Throughout the first act we have a travesty of the style of Bellini and Verdi; in the second act the composer has paid his compliments to Meyerbeer with laughable effect. Unfortunately the orchestral parts could not be obtained in season, and the performance was accompanied only by a grand piano; but it was easy to see that the tricks of the operatic composers are most cleverly taken off here, as well as in the vocal score.

The Bards are dressed in imitation of the Druids in "Norma," and many of the situations are suggested by that opera. They are bound to abstinence from alcoholic drinks and yet are obliged each to carry a bottle; from which, of course, they drink in secret, and as was said of Old Simon the Cellarer;

— "ho! ho! his nose doth show
How oft the black jack to his lips doth go."

Piefke, a tailor turned poet, is the hero, most artistically represented by Mr. Wilhelm Schraubstädtler, the well known tenor and teacher of music. In Germany a tailor is known by the slang name of buck; so that when in a duet with his mistress the syllable ma is repeated in the tone of a bleating kid, the allusion brings roars of laughter from those familiar with the language. The goddess of his idolatry, Freia, (the name of a Scandinavian divinity) was formerly a bar-maid, and had been secretly wedded to the aspiring tailor. Being surprised in their interview by the Chief of the Druids, they are condemned to death; notwithstanding which they fall on their knees and beg for his blessing. "Nein," he sternly answers. "Your blessing!" they cry. "Nein!" "Just a little blessing!" "Nein!" "The least bit of a blessing!" "Nein!" "Then let it alone; we'll do without it." Piefke is the personification of a coward and his tremors are as amusing as the fright of Bob Aeres; but in the end, for no reason whatever, he is made chief, after stipulating that he shall have a thousand dollars salary; and the first act of his reign is to allow an unlimited drinking of schnapps.

Freia we had supposed would be either a tame failure, or a broad bit of impropriety; but nothing could be better than Mr. Langerfeldt's performance of this part. His costume was so absurdly like Norma's, and the feminine walk, air, management of long skirts, and mode of holding a handkerchief were delightfully hit off. Indeed, we should have supposed that this gentleman, as well as Mr. Schraubstädtler, had been old stagers, familiar with the boards, and instructed in all the by-play that fills out the ensemble of the scene.

The chief, a solemn personage, was Mr. Jansen, a basso of considerable power and sterling merit. Orobustes (quasi Orobates) was represented by Mr. Carl Schraubstädtler with admirable spirit. At one point he and the Chief sing a very heroic duet, and being recalled they rush down to the footlights, as we have seen our Italian baritones in I Puritani, hearing little flags, and roaring out the refrain with ridiculous emphasis and over-gesticulation.

Some of the changes are very sudden and mirth-provoking. Thus in a chorus Schlaetet ihn—Kill him &c., conceived in a truly tragic vein, the music shifts imperceptibly into a polka movement, and all the rage ends in froth. And in the last act when Freia sings a ballad (of which Meyerbeer himself might have written the music) and the chorus join in a lugubrious strain, leaning on each others shoulders, the ternary rhythm becomes at once a waltz, and all go spinning round like tops.

Perhaps the finest portion of the music is in a martial quartette near the close, a magnificent four-part song; but this, as usual, is set to the most nonsensical words.

Fritzen should not be forgotten. Although supposed to be four years old, he comes on the stage a man in size but wearing nankin jacket and trousers, and greatly addicted to molasses candy.

Throughout there is a mixture of languages, German, French and Italian; the hackneyed phrases of the opera appearing in every burst of passion; e. g. O crudel Piefke mio. O Piefke mai, and the like.

The choruses were admirably sung; full, sonorous, well balanced and vigorous. It would be a treat to hear a serious opera with half as good a chorus. We must give our thanks to Mr. Kreissman and his associates for a series of hearty laughs, a pleasure not often enjoyed in these serious days. And so Vivat hoch!

We understand that the performance will be repeated within three weeks.

CONCERT BY MR. J. EICHBERG.—Mr. Julius Eichberg is going to give a concert at the hall of Messrs. Clickerings a week from this day (2d of March). As the former concerts of this artist presented music to please the most fastidious, so this promises to be one of rare excellence. Mr. E. is going to play among other things a Sonata with piano by Bach, the piano part being taken by Mr. O. Dresel; the Chaconne by Bach and a Violin Concerto by himself. The Orpheus Quartette Club will sing three songs, Mrs. Kepton two and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club will play Mozart's Quintette in C. This programme together with the excellence of the performers ought to attract a full house. The Sonata by Bach alone would be worth going for, being played by two artists like Messrs. Dresel and Eichberg.

Concert at the New Catholic Church.

A new Catholic church has been erected on Harrison Avenue in this city, called the Church of the Immaculate Conception. It is a very large edifice of white granite, in the renaissance style; and whatever may be its faults to critical eyes, it has by far the most imposing interior of any place of worship in our city. It was opened to the public for the first time last Sunday evening for a sacred concert given under the direction of Mr. J. H. Willeox the accomplished organist of the church. The choir consisted of twenty persons, among the most cultivated of our singers. The programme embraced some of the well known masterpieces of church music; the Benedictus from Mozart's Requiem Mass, the Kyrie, from his Mass No. 7, Hummel's Alma Virgo, a magnificent Ave Maria by Donizetti, and Handel's I know that my Redeemer liveth. The music was admirably performed and its effects was greatly heightened by the grand acoustic properties of the building.

It might be invidious to speak of individual excellences, but we must mention Mrs. Harwood's splendid success in the great air from the "Messiah," Mrs. Fowle's fine performance of Hummel's great solo, and Mrs. Kempton's feeling and graceful singing of Franz's Ave Maria. Mr. Powers, whose sonorous voice and finished style are well known, was unfortunately under a cloud, being quite ill and hoarse, and therefore unable to do justice to Pro peccatis.

As a whole the concert was truly delightful and was enjoyed by the audience, we are sure, more than any similar performance for a long time. The vast church was densely thronged, every seat being taken, and the ample aisles, as well as the enclosure of the altar and the singer's gallery being completely filled. Indeed, some people, who ought to have known better, appropriated the seats of the choir, so that not only the gentlemen but the ladies, fatigued with the day's duties in church, were forced to stand during the whole evening.

The concert will be repeated to-morrow evening, and we have no need to bespeak a full house as it is sure to be crowded.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The novel attraction of the Bards, drew us away from the Mendelssohn Concert on Saturday evening, but we learn that the concert was well attended; and the programme is worth putting on record.

1. Introduction to the Bohemian Girl.....Balfé
2. Adagio, from Quintette No. 6, op. 100.....Reicha
For Flute, Oboe, Clarinette, Horn and Bassoon. (First time.)
3. "Souvenir de Haydn," Solo for violin.....Leonard William Schultz.

4. Aria, "Possenti numi,"—Magic Flute.....Mozart
Mr. J. W. Emerson.
5. Nonette, in D minor, op. 77, (First time.). G. Onslow
For Violin, Viola, Cello, Bass, Flute, Oboe, Clarinette, Horn and Bassoon.
Allegro—Scherzo—Tema con variazioni—Finale, Introduction and Allegretto.
6. "Souvenir de Spa,"—Pantaisie for Violoncello. Servais
Wulf Fries.
7. Finale. 2d act of "Robert le Diable.".....Meyerbeer
Arranged by T. Ryan.

At their concert this evening the Nonette of Onslow is to be repeated.

THE ORCHESTRAL UNION.—All will be glad to see announced in another column, a series of afternoon concerts at the Music Hall, to commence on Wednesday next, Feb. 27th.

The mere announcement of orchestral music should be enough to fill the hall to overflowing, after so long a fast from everything of the sort in this city.

Their programme embraces the Fifth Symphony, the Tannhäuser Overture and many other good things.

THE DIARIST IN ENGLAND.—The Athenæum gives the following notice of our "Diary," Alexander W. Thayer, Esq., from which we learn that he is in England. The columns of this Journal ever since its first number, bear witness to the industry and zeal with which he has pursued his labors and we hope that the suggestion of Mr. Chorley will meet with a cordial response from those who can aid him in the prosecution of his researches.

Mr. Thayer, the American gentleman who has been for some years collecting materials for a life of Beethoven in all parts of the Continent, is now in England, with a view of making researches here. His gatherings, we believe, have been extensive, and made with a scrupulous desire for accuracy. It would be only courteous in any real admirer of music and of Beethoven, belonging to this country, who may have contributions in store, to afford this gentleman the opportunity of examining them. We shall be happy, in default of better means, to be the medium of communication with him.

MISS HENSLEY.—At a concert recently given at the royal palace, Lisbon, Gazzaniga, Miss Hensley and the father of the young King of Portugal took part. Gazzaniga, says L' Eco d' Italia, after the concert was presented by the King with a diamond brooch. This prima donna is not the only musical character of that name. There was a Signor Gazzaniga (born at Cremona in 1743, and died in 1817), who was a voluminous composer, and who wrote an opera on the old plot of "Don Giovanni."

CLASSICAL MUSIC.—In a notice of Mr. Carl Gärtner's concert in the Phil. Bulletin, we find the following:

There are many who fancy that because music is Classical, it is too dark and hidden to be understood by ordinary hearers. All we would ask of such, is, have you an intelligent, educated mind? Then go and listen, not once, but two or three times, and we think you will decide there is some interest for you in the highest field of musical art. We look at and enjoy the finest paintings and statuary, not because we understand how the artist selected and arranged his palette; how he directed his lights and shades; how he shaped and rounded the bust so full of life's breath; how he modelled the head, telling of the strong intellect; but because his mind speaks to ours through the great work his Maker has given him the talent to create. And so it is with the musical art. We feel a great spirit is speaking to us in his language which appeals to our sense of hearing, just as the other spoke to us in his language through the sense of seeing.

We scarcely hope these matinees will become popular. A purely intellectual entertainment, perhaps, never can be so. But we trust they will be patronized by those who feel life has higher aims than the rapid making and frivolous spending of money, and who believe an hour so spent must be more profitable to themselves and children, than in the idle walking of our fashionable thoroughfares, or the reading of much of the literature of our present times, the enervating effects of which we must daily lament.

SILENCE IN NATURE.—It is a remarkable and very instructive fact that many of the most important operations of nature are carried on in unbroken silence. There is no rushing sound when the broad tide of sunlight breaks on a dark world and floods it with light, as one bright wave over another falls from the fountain, millions of millions of miles away. There is no creaking of axles or groaning of cumbersome machinery as the solid earth wheels on its way, and every planet and system performs its revolutions. The great trees bring forth their boughs and shadow the earth beneath them—the plants cover themselves with buds, and the buds burst into flowers: but the whole transaction is unheard. The change from snow and winter winds to blossoms and fruits and the sunshine of summer is seen in its slow development, but there is scarcely a sound to tell of the mighty transformation. The solemn echant of the ocean, as it raises its unchanged and its unceasing voices, the roar of the hurricane, and the mighty river, and the thunder of the black browed storm: all this is the music of nature—a great and swelling anthem of praise, breaking in on the universal calm. There is a lesson for us here. The mightiest worker in the Universe is the unobtrusive.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 12, 1860 — Last night Verdi's Ballo in Maschera was produced according to the announcements. The house was crowded, and the illuminations used at the Prince of Wales Ball were again brought into service and with admirable effect. It was, indeed, a brilliant sight, the ladies were superbly dressed in the full opera costume, which of late had been abandoned. There was one lady in a left hand proscenium box, who attracted great attention from her resemblance to the Empress Eugenie. She was tall and slender, had a queenly bearing, an arching neck and wore her hair brushed back, while her head was adorned with a magnificent gold crown—head-dress it could not be called—on which were clusters and flowers of emeralds and rubies, spangled with dew-drops of diamonds. An elderly lady in the same box, dressed in deep black, and wearing a white cap served as a contrast to the gorgeousness of the Crowned Lady. The entire party were strangers, and during the intermissions between the acts attracted the attention of thousands of curious admirers.

There was also that delightful rustle of satisfaction about the house which a full and well-dressed audience always induces. Everybody saw acquaintances on the opposite side of the house, and the bobbing and nodding gave quite an animated appearance to the scene. The artists of the opera were themselves amazed at the superb coup d'œil, and afterwards declared that never, even in Europe, had they beheld such a magnificent sight as that which met their eyes from before the footlights.

But what about the opera. A good deal about it. I suppose you will clip from the New York papers a description of it. I enclose the critique of the Times of this city which I fully endorse and you can use it if you please, and save yours to command, a vast amount of trouble. You can print it or not as you please. (Next week, Signor Trovator.)

I wish I were a person of huge importance, for then my opinion would be worth having, and I would write to Mr. Verdi a letter something like this:

Dear Sir: I believe I am acquainted with all your best operas, and I don't think that, all things considered, you have produced anything yet superior to your Lombardi and Ernani. Your Ballo in Maschera exhibits a great deal more scientific research than either, and is the most dramatically consistent of all your operas, notwithstanding its ridiculous plot. The finale of the second act is the most effective thing of the kind you have ever written, and I say this with a full recollection of the Miserere scene, of the quartet in Rigoletto, and of the finale to the second act of the Vespers. You have done for opera writing something akin to what Thalberg did for pianoforte composition. He, taking a melody, added to it an accompaniment, thus enabling one performer to play simultaneously the two parts—something scarcely ever thought of before. You have managed to delineate simultaneously on the stage, by the most appropriate and characteristic music the most diverse passions, so that, unlike other Italian composers of concerted pieces, the strain which serves for one character will not serve for another, but sung together they produce the most admirable harmony, like the different colors in a great painting. A celebrated composer wrote a waltz in two parts, either of which played separately was a perfect waltz in itself, is much boasted of by his admirers; but you, Mr. Verdi, have carried this art to perfection, and his waltz is a mere toy that one can pull into grotesque shapes by a string, while your great concerted pieces are like earnest, living humanity.

Why then when you can do things so well, do you stick in the Ballo those soft commonplace airs, as I suppose they must be called, which have no melody but which are mere sequences of notes without anything to recommend them? You know you can write real melodies, and if you had thrown some more of them into your latest opera, it would have been better for its popularity.

Come over to America. You would be received with delight by all excepting a few American Dutchman. By these I mean a class of Americans who have embraced more Teutonic ideas about music than the Teutons themselves and who view Italy as a musical Nazareth, whence no good can come. Fortunately these people though they talk a great deal are quite harmless.

You are the greatest living composer, excepting, perhaps, Meyerbeer and Rossini, and just now are more popular than either of these two; the Americans like your bold, vigorous style, and it would be a great card for you to write an opera for an American house, and to come over and get it up yourself with Muzio. I don't suppose people would go wild about you as a general thing or get up noisy ovations; but you would receive a welcome from the great body of our music lovers such as no other living man could as spontaneously call forth; and Verdi, with all his European popularity, might consider such an ovation from the New World as the most royal and gratifying he has ever received.

So, Mr. Verdi, I close with thanks for the great enjoyment your music has afforded to many of my countrymen and countrywomen; and gratitude that I did not live and die before the composer of the Ballo in Maschera is one of the strongest emotions experienced by TROVATOR.

CHICAGO, FEB. 14, 1861.—The fourth Philharmonic Concert, last Saturday evening, Feb. 9th, was another decided success for the managers of these excellent entertainments. Nothing else of the kind has ever gathered so much of the culture, the refinement, the wealth and fashion of the city as these occasions. FABBRI seems to be greatly pleased with the cheerful patronage and warm appreciation extended to her in our city, and she continues to draw long after the novelty of a first impression is worn off. The more the public hears, the more it wants to. Her resources are inexhaustible. On the stage, she is ever amiable, complaisant and self-possessed, while she never disappoints the expectant public by negligent attire, or careless and indifferent singing. This, superadded to her matchless powers, is one great secret of her popularity here. She tries to please and always does please.

1. Sixth Symphony—Pastoral—, Op. 68, in F major.
Beethoven.
2. Aria, from "Belisario".....Donizetti.
Mr. C. R. Adams.
3. Grand Scena and Aria from "Nabucco".....Verdi.
Madame Fabbri.
4. Piano Solo.....Mulder.
Mr. Richard Mulder.
5. The brightest eyes, (By request).....Stigelli.
Mr. C. R. Adams.
6. Das Schwabenmadel.....Proch.
Madame Fabbri.
7. Carnival de Rome, Burlesque, arranged by....Balatka.

The performance of the Symphony was most creditable to Mr. Balatka and to the orchestra, and its effect upon a large and appreciative audience, which, for nearly an hour, gave unremitting attention, was a reward indeed. Mr. ADAMS, of Boston, kindly assisted at the concert. He has a sweet tenor voice and a very correct intonation. In the Aria from Belisario the large orchestra was almost too heavy for his powers. His style suits the oratorio and simple song. In the latter he gave us the "Brightest Eyes" most admirably.

New Publications.

OLIVER COLLECTION OF HYMN AND PSALM TUNES, SENTENCES AND CHANTS. A National Lyre for use in the Church, Family or Singing School. By Henry K. Oliver. Boston: Oliver Ditson.

No book of sacred music (by which in this connection, we mean psalm tunes), has more commended itself by its intrinsic excellence than the "National Lyre," edited some years ago, by the compiler of the work under notice, in connection with Messrs. Tuckerman and Baberoff. Especially to quartette choirs has it proved a most acceptable and useful book, by the care with which the music has been arranged for the use of such choirs by the pleasing character given to the individual parts and its agreeable harmonies, quite remote from the commonplace see-saw of most books of this character.

"Oliver's Collection" has the same characteristics as the National Lyre and we see that many of the best tunes of the latter collection are transplanted bodily into the new one. A longer experience has suggested to the editor, (who is an amateur well known in the community as the late Mayor of the City of Lawrence, and former head of one of the great manufacturing corporations there) a large number of tunes which he has added: some of them quite new to this generation, although by the best English composers of this kind of music. Of the contributions of the editor himself, we need only say that the beautiful and familiar tune Federal Street, is one of his compositions, to prove that they are not the lowest in the order of merit in the book. The original tunes contributed by Dr. J. F. Tuckerman (also an amateur) are likewise worthy of note, as among the most pleasing and useful in the collection. The usual elementary instructions commonly prefixed to such collections are omitted so that the whole book is devoted to music, embracing besides, the tunes, anthems, motettes, chants, &c. We know that some are a little disposed to sneer at a new book of psalm tunes, and would look upon the space and time as wasted that is devoted to noticing such a collection. But this book is not one manufactured to sell, but is the result of a long and loving service in the music of the church, and a selection guided by such an experience of what is best adapted to the ordinary service of our Protestant churches in this country, is likely to commend itself at once to our church choirs.

DINORAH—LE PARDON DE PLOERMEL. Our publishers have added this new and to us unknown work of Meyerbeer's to their series of operas. We observe by an exchange that it was to be performed in New Orleans Feb. 4th, and in the course of time we shall doubtless hear it in Boston. Meanwhile it will be pleasant for our opera loving readers to become familiar with its melodies and prepared to listen to its performance with intelligence. This edition is printed from English plates, uniform with the vocal score of Don Giovanni, published some time ago. The type is clear, both of the music and the words which are given in English and Italian, (the translation by H. F. Chorley, Esq.)

MARTHA.—The piano solo arrangement of Flotow's Martha, now in course of publication in these pages, has just been issued complete by the publishers. No opera perhaps is better adapted for transcription for the piano than the bright and sparkling Martha, and it will be a pleasure to many to revive by this outline the pleasant memories of the admirable performances of this charming opera which we have heard in Boston.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, for January, (Republished by L. Scott & Co., New York, received from Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co. Contents: Ancient Ballads; Alcohol; What becomes of it in the Living body; Canada; Bible Infallibility; "Evangelical Defenders of the Faith;" The Neapolitan and Roman Questions; American Slavery; the Impending Crisis; Cavour and Garibaldi; Dante and his English Translators; Contemporary Literature.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW, for January. Contents: Canada and the Northwest; The Welsh and their Literature; The United Netherlands; The Iron Manufacture; Italy; The dogs of History and Romance; The Income Tax and its Rivals; Essays and Reviews.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW for January (L. Scott & Co's edition) has been received by Nichols, Lee & Co. Contents: Church Expansion and Liturgical Revision, Japan and the Japanese, The Victoria Bridge, Political Ballads of England and Scotland, Ocean Telegraphy, Autobiography of Dr. A. Carlyle, Motley's History of the United Netherlands, Forbes and Ryndall on the Alps and their Glaciers, The Kingdom of Italy, and Naval Organization.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

From my childhood. Duet.

From "Bianco, the Bravo's Bride." 25

Another favorite number in the string of gems from this opera which has just been published.

Child of my heart. Song. C. E. Kimball. 25

A very attractive parlor song of medium difficulty.

New England left out in the cold.

C. E. Kimball. 25

Received with great applause at the concerts of the author in the Eastern States.

Allie May. Song and Chorus. G. A. Cargill. 25

A new minstrel song with a taking air, easy to sing.

Yes, I dreamt I was Queen of Air. S. Glover. 25

One of those pretty lively airs in strongly marked rhythm, of which Glover's facile pen has furnished so many, most of which please young singers immensely.

Instrumental Music.

Fra Diavolo. Ferd. Beyer. 50

From the Boquet of Melodies set, containing the familiar gems of the Opera, of medium difficulty.

Reward of love. I. Oesten. 35

A new number of the "Bygone hours," a collection of highly interesting piano-pieces in the style of the "Sounds of Love" and not less beautiful than these.

Ecume de perles. (Champagne.) Grand Etude de Concert. C. Voss. 75

A sparkling "Brindisi" which well deserves the fine sounding name the author has chosen for it. It is not more difficult than Voss's popular operatic arrangements. Taken altogether it is perhaps the most pleasing piece of this class which has been issued for many a day.

Governor Grey's Schottisch. Maria J. Jones. 50

A pleasing Schottisch with a handsomely illustrated title-page.

Danish Polka. (Lotte is dead.) Jul. Weel. 25

A new contra-dance which is becoming very popular. A description of the figure is added to the music.

Books.

ZUNDEL'S MELODEON INSTRUCTOR.—The complete Melodeon Instructor, in seven parts. Designed as a thorough Instruction Book for the Melodeon, Seraphine, Eolian, Melopean, Organ, or any similar instrument. By John Zundel. 2,00

This work is not only an "Instructor" but in every sense a "complete" instructor for the melodeon and instruments of like nature. Its contents embrace all that can possibly be looked for in the form of instructions, examples and exercises. It is universally pronounced the most thorough instruction book of the kind, and is recommended by Lowell Mason, Emilius Girac, Wm. B. Bradbury, and every one who has examined it.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 465.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 22.

The Union.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

Still sail thou on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O UNION, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
We know what Master laid thy keel,
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast, and sail and rope,
What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!
Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale!
In spite of rock and tempests' roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our ears, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, — are all with thee!

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

VIII.

OPERA.

1548—1700.

We spoke in a former paper of the introduction by the Brotherhood of the Passion of the theatre into France through the performance of mysteries—grand show pieces in which music played an important part. From 1528, the period in which the Parliament put a stop to the representation of religious subjects, plays of *profane character, but always lawful and decent, were given in the theatre of the hotel de Bourgogne. Jodelle imitated the ancients and was followed by Grevin, Garnier, Hardy, Saint-Gelais, Theophile, Racan, Mayret, Gombault, Rotron, Senderz, du Rycer, and finally by the immortal Peter Corneille.

We refer those of our readers, who are curious to study thoroughly that interesting epoch to the history of the French Theatre; we will only remark that Jodelle, in 1630, filled the entr'actes of his tragedies by the singing of verses of a moral character, and that at a later date an orchestra took the place of these singers.

To show farther that the theatre was originally held to be a proper place of amusement, and that if immoral pieces have occasionally crept upon the boards, it was only through abuse and corruption, we cite an extract from the Declaration of the King, Louis XIII., upon the subject of the Comedians, given at Saint Germain, April 16, 1641.

"Fearing that the comedies represented with such good effect for the amusement of the people are sometimes accompanied with improper performances, which leave bad impressions upon their minds, we have formed the resolution to give the orders necessary to put a stop to such improprieties. To this end, we forbid, by these presents, signed, with our own hand, all comedians to represent any improper acts, to use any words of lascivious or double meaning, which can offend the modesty of the spectators, and this under the penalty of being declared infamous.

"In case the comedians aforesaid contravene our present declaration, it is our will that our judges interdict the theatre, without however empowering them to inflict heavier penalties than fine and banishment. In case the said comedians so regulate the performances of the theatre as to free them from all impurity, it is our will that their profession, which is one to divert the people from divers bad occupations, shall not be imputed to them for blame, nor shall prejudice their reputations in the public opinion. And this we do, to the end that the desire of escaping the reproaches to which they have subjected themselves hitherto may be as strong a motive for restraint within the limits of their duty in the public performances which they give, as the fear of the penalties which will be inevitable in case they contravene the present declaration."

The opera is an Italian creation; the first essays are generally considered as the work of Peri, Caccini, Emilio del Cavaliere and Monteverde, who flourished in the 16th century.

In 1570, Charles IX granted letters patent to Antoine de Baif for the foundation of an Academy of Music. In February, 1577, the first Italian troupe, gli Gelosi, gave a performance to the Estates of Blois, under Henry III., then in session at Paris; and on Sunday, May 19, in the theatre du Petit Bourbon, rue des Poullies.

In the same year Baltazarini was called from Piedmont to Catharine de Medicis by Marshal de Brissac. This composer assumed the name, Beaujoyeux, and wrote in 1581 for the nuptials of the Duc de Joyens the Ballet Comique de la Royne. The libretto text by d'Aubigne turned upon the adventures of Circe; Salmon and Beaulien, chapelmasters to Henry III., wrote a part of the airs and recitations. The lyric part was by Lachesnaye, almoner to the king. We find in this work pieces for cornets and flutes; also airs for dancing, recitatives, chansons, &c., of pleasing melody. How companies of Italians came to France in 1584, 1588, 1608, and 1623. From the beginning of the 17th century, the lyric drama triumphed in Italy. Pope Clement IX. rhymed texts for operas, and Urban VIII. sent the Nuncio, Cardinal Alessandro Bichi to Louis XIII. who demonstrated to the king the possibility of giving operas in French.

In 1645, Cardinal Mazarin brought a new Italian Troupe to Paris, which opened at the Petit Bourbon, Dec. 24, with the Festa teatrale della finta Piazza, a melodrama in five acts, by Balbi and Torelli, and according to Castil-Blaze the first French opera was given the following year at the Episcopal palace de Carpentras, under the title of Akebar, roi du Mogol.

In 1652, a seventh Italian opera troupe became stationary, and played with success Orfeo e Euryclea, and an opera ballet in three acts, entitled Nozze di Teti e di Peleo (Jan. 26, 1654). Innocent X. sent Cardinal de la Rovère to Paris; this Nuncio counselled Louis XIV. to cause French operas to be performed and gave the subject of a lyric drama to Abbé Perrin, who called in Cambert, organist of the church of St. Honoré, to compose the music.

Cambert, the first French dramatic composer, was born at Paris, about 1628, and became pupil of Chambounières upon the harpsichord. His first work was the celebrated Pastorale en musique, performed for the first time in April, 1659, in the chateau of M. de la Haye, at Issy. Its success was immense. There were seven characters represented, a bass, a barytone, a tenor, a contralto and three soprani. The principal parts were performed by the Milles, de Sercamanan, and the Count and Chevalier Fiesque. The king and Mazarin were so well pleased, that the work was again represented at Vincennes and Cambert was appointed superintendent of music to Anne of Austria. At length, June 28, 1669, the first operatic patent was granted to the Poet, Abbé Perrin, the composer, Cambert, the Marquis de Sourdeac, principal machinist, and Champeron, financier.

In 1661, Cambert wrote Ariane, which was rehearsed at Issy, but not represented owing to the death of Mazarin. In 1662 he composed Adonis, an opera which has been lost; but it was not until March 19, 1671, that the first performance of Pomone took place, but which ran eight months in succession.

There were in the first regular French opera five solo men's parts, four of women, fifteen chorus singers and thirteen instrumental players. The dances were directed by Beauchamps. Perrin's share of the profits, about a quarter, was some 30,000 livres.

Les Amours de Diane et Endymion, by Sablières (text) and Guichard (music) was performed at Versailles, Nev. 3, 1671; and Les Peines et les Plaisirs de l'Amour, a Pastoral, in five acts, by Gilbert, Cambert and Sourdeac saw the light at Paris, April 8, 1672. Lulli could not bear this series of triumphs; the cunning Florentine obtained the privilege of Perrin and put an end to the performance of the Ariane of Cambert.

Cambert went to London, produced his opera in presence of Charles II., and was appointed by that king superintendent of his music. But the blow was fatal. Cambert, who loved his country could not bear the success of an odious rival, who had driven him into exile. He died of regret and despair at London, in 1677, at the age of only 49 years.

In this manner France has too often sacrificed her national artists to strangers. It would be worthy of our opera to avenge the memory of the illustrious and unhappy Cambert by reproducing a work of this first French composer, whose glory it was to lay the foundation of our still existing imperial academy of music.

* As we say "profane history."

Jean Baptiste de Lulli was born at Florence, in 1633. Having studied the works of Rouetta, Cavalli, &c. he left Italy at the age of thirteen year and became scullion to Mademoiselle de Montpensier. His talents, as a violinist were greatly admired by that princess; but her favor was very soon lost. He was dismissed from her house on account of a satyric song. The author of the famous air au clair de la Lune studied the harpsichord and composition under the organists Metree, Roberdet and Gigault. He was naturalized in 1662 with the title of Esquire, and, after invading the places of Lazarin, Cambepont, Michaël Lambert, he usurped in June, 1672, the letters patent of Perrin and Cambert, and erected a theatre in the tennis court of Bel-Air, rue de Vauvignard. His associates were the architect Guiebard and the machinist Vigarani, of Modena. On the 15th of November, 1672, the house was opened with Les Fêtes de l'Amour et de Bacchus, in five acts, with a prologue.

Cadmus, Alceste-Thesée followed in order. A contract was made with Quinault, the poet, who received the 4,000 Livres for each book, and 2,000 Livres as a "gratification" sent by Louis XIV.

After the death of Moliere, Feb. 17, 1673, Lulli obtained the hall in the Palais Royal, where the operas was established from June 15th, 1673 to 1781.

Le Triomphe de l'Amour, opera-ballet by Ben-serade. Quinault and Lulli, was represented for the first time May 16, 1681. Mad'le de la Fontaine was the proclaimed queen of the dance.

Fifteen operas were composed by Lulli, from 1672, to his death, which occurred March 22, 1687. Among them we note Psyche, Bellerophon, Proserpine, Amadis, Roland. The other most successful ones were Atys, called the opera of the King; Iris called the opera of the musicians; in which was the beautiful Trio of the Fates; Phaeton, the opera of the people; and Armida, opera of the women. Acis and Galatee, the last work of Lulli, was first performed six months after his death. He was himself a very fine dancer and had composed twenty-five ballets.

In 1677, Dumenil, a cook, made his first appearance as a tenor singer in Isis, and therefor-ward divided such parts with Clediere. After Rossignol and Beaumavielle, Gaye, Hardouin and Lafrêt distinguished themselves as bass singers. Thevenard, barytone, appeared first in 1675 in the Grotte de Versailles (in the part of Tircis) and continued upon the stage until 1730, when retired with a pension of 1500 livres. Mlle. Castilly created the part of Pomone; Mlle. Verdier gave Flore in Atys and later Mlle. Saint-Christophe distinguished herself as first songstress.

In 1680 Marthe Le Rochois, a pupil of Lulli, created the part of Arethuse in Proserpine, and afterward the beautiful one of Armida. This actress was not beautiful, but was admirable in recitative; she held the place of prima donna down to the year 1698. Her pension, upon retiring from the stage was but 1000 livres, but the chronicler adds that the Duc de Sully gave her an annuity of 500 livres.

The most remarkable dancers of that period were Beauchamps, Saint André, Pecourt, Dolivet, Bonteville and Balon.

Lulli gained a fortune of 800,000 livres* in fifteen years. In his character this illustrious composer was extremely violent; we are assured, that during his rehearsals he at times conducted himself towards the actors and even the actresses with a harshness amounting to brutality. His death is said also to have been occasioned by a movement of passion, viz., striking the cane with which he conducted with great force downward, instead of the floor he hit his foot. The wound became gangrenous and caused his death.

After Lulli, his son-in-law Francine obtained the privilege of the opera, of which the profits amounted to 60,000 livres per annum; and on the 30th December, 1698, Dumont was joined with him by the king. A period of decay in the opera followed which continued to the time of Ramcan, (1733).

Not to break our chronology let us say here a few words upon this period of transition.

Louis and Jean Louis Lulli, brother-in-law of Francine, played without success Orphee in 1690 and Alcide in 1693. Calasse, pupil of Lulli, who directed the orchestra, as well as Lauloutte (its chief to 1677), and who instrumented his master's works from the hints given him, brought out in 1687, Achille et Polyxène, and followed it up with eight other operas among which we may note Thetis, Pelée, and Jason. Colasse became an alchymist. He afterwards obtained the patent of the theatre at Lille, was ruined by a fire, and died finally poisoned by the vapors of his laboratory.

Teobaldo di Gatti, a Florentine, and for fifty-two years first violoncellist at the Academie composed for the theatre Coronis and Scylla. Marin-Marais, a celebrated viola performer produced Ariane, Alcione and Semele. Desmarests, superintendent of the music of Philip V., gave to the opera Dido, Circe, and Theagene et Chariclee. Carpentier, pupil of Carissimi, produced his first work, Medee; Gervais gave Methuse in 1697; Mlle. de Laguerre composed Cephale et Procris; Lacoste brought out seven operas well forgotten in our times.

All these secondary works soon disappeared to make way for the Europe galante of Campra, which had a great success in 1697. The libretto was by La Motte. Its charming choruses are worthy of remark. Marthe le Rochois created the parts of Cephise and Roxane in the Ballet opera; and Mlle. Maupin aroused the enthusiasm of the public in the part of Clorinde in Tancrede, and Minerva in Cadmus, operas by the same author.

Campra was born at Aix en Provence, Dec. 3, 1660. We are indebted to him for the celebrated air, Furstemberg, and twenty operas, of which the most distinguished are, Le Carnaval de Venise, the Ballet des Ages, Hesione, Camille, Tancrede, Iphigenie en Tauride, etc.

Gaultier de la Ciotat, director of the theatres at Marseilles, Toulouse and Montpellier, produced a work, both the text and music, le Triomphe de la Paix.

The Phaeton of Lulli had great success at Lyons during the carnival, but the instrumental performers were not brilliant. The director was obliged to cry gare t'ut! (look out for the seventh!) when the note occurred upon the higher strings, and the player recoiled from the difficulties of the Medee and Philomele of Carpentier. (The air Songes d'Atys was the great stock piece in these times for violinists; La Tempête d'Alcyone took its place as such in 1706. Corelli's sonatas did not appear until 1715.)

*Supposing the old livre to equal the present franc, we have here about $150,000. Money was then more valuable than now—would purchase twice or thrice the quantity of necessaries.

The origin of the word brioche, synonymous with the mistake or oversight in music, may naturally find place here. The members of the orchestra being loudly blamed evening after evening by the Parterre for their faults of execution, resolved to be more careful in future and laid a fine of six sous upon every mistake or error made in public. With the proceeds of these fines, an immense brioche was purchased and eaten at the month's end—good care being taken to "wet" it properly. The guilty ones figured at the supper with a small brioche of pasteboard at the button hole.

The last work of any interest represented at the opera during the 17th century was Isse of Destouches, which brought its author a present from the king of a purse containing a 100 Louis d'or. Louis XIV. by the letters patent dated Feb. 25, 1699, granted to the general hospital at Paris a sixteenth of the receipts at the academy. Such was the origin of the droit des pauvres (rights of the poor) ever since deducted from the receipts of the theatres.

Zelia Trebelli.

Signor Zelia Trebelli is of French descent, born in Paris, where her father holds a high government office. Her real name is Gilbert. Her musical talents manifested itself early; she therefore received instruction in piano-playing when she was only six years old, her first teacher being a German, which circumstance has greatly influenced the direction of her musical taste. These instructions on the piano were continued for ten years and made her an excellent pianist. The young girl was most fond of the study of Beethoven's sonatas and the well-tempered clavier by Bach. The parents, not thinking to make an artist of their daughter, brought her up for the elevated social circle in which they moved. When Zelia was sixteen years old she took a fancy to have singing lessons and her father desiring she should become able to sing ballads acceptably, secured a teacher for her in one Fr. Wartel, a German, who had formerly earned a fine reputation as an interpreter of Franz Schubert's musical poems, and of late has been connected with the Grand Opera in Paris. Wartel at once discovered the talent of the young girl, and persuaded the parents, by no means easily, to have her educated for the lyric stage. When their consent was obtained, Wartel devoted all his time, energy and knowledge to the instruction of his promising pupil. Zelia seeing that the Italian language would be of great service to her in the development of her voice studied it and subsequently resolved to go over the Italian lyric stage altogether.

In the fall of 1859, Signora Trebelli left her teacher and made her debut in Madrid with an Italian troupe. During the whole winter season she had such a success as beginners rarely attain. She first appeared as Rosina in the "Barbie," with Mario for the count. Her second essay was the Page in the "Huguenots." Her engagement in Madrid terminating in April, 1860, she returned to Paris and resumed her studies with Mr. Wartel, until July 1860, when Merelli engaged her for his Berlin troupe. She made her first appearance in Germany in the old city of Cologne, as Arsaces in "Semiramide" with the most decided success. She then went to Hamburg and finally to Berlin, where everybody went crazy about her. Her repertoire up to this day consists of Pierotto in "Linda," Orsini in "Lucrezia," Rosina in "Barbieri," Arsaces in "Semiramide," Fidalma in "Matrimonio Segreto," Urbano in "Ugonotti," Duchess in "Luisa Miller," Countess in "Tre nozze," Azucena in "Trovatore," Madalena in "Rigoletto," Cenerentola in the opera of the same name, Isabella in "Italcia in Algieri.—New Zeitschrift.

Ludwig Rellstab.

(Concluded from page 380.)

Rellstab's musical education reposed upon undoubted talent. The latter was, however, not so highly developed, so far as technical matters and the syntax of the art were concerned, as to enable him to write a symphony or a quartet. That the power of doing so is necessary to a critic, will, however, be asserted only by an artist who may, perhaps, have learnt something, but who is deficient in the best and most requisite qualification. It is true that the technical and theoretical education of the critic must not be so far below the productions criticised, that he cannot see his way clearly everywhere, even in the score of a great work of art. But it must be remembered, that Rellstab wrote for a political paper, and for readers who desired to be informed from day to day, of what was going forward in the world. This object is satisfied by an innate taste for art, a general æsthetic education, the power of describing a thing popularly, and a warmth of sentiment which can excite sympathy and enthusiasm for art and artists. Critics like Fink, Gottfried Weber, and in some degree, Rochlitz, can give the musician many a suggestion worth remembering; but whether the divine spark lurks within his work or production, they will not always be competent to say. In difficult cases, Rellstab could not do the first, but he was always able to do the last.

The task which he more particularly imposed on himself was to introduce the susceptible and educated men of the non-professional public and dilettanti into the magic realms of tone, and to foster in them a love for what is beautiful and grand in art. His decisions were, therefore, in most cases, of a positive nature, and seldom crushing; it was only when vanity and arrogance, qualities so frequently found in artists, came glaringly under his notice, that he cast into the scale the whole weight of his eloquent language and love for what is unconditionally beautiful. In all things, but more especially in his dealings with his opponents, he was frank and outspoken, accepting the combat even where he foresaw a defeat. All the worse for him! Openness and truth were fundamental traits in his character. Was he defeated in his contest with Spontini? The evidence is now tolerably complete. What share personal excitability had in the quarrel we will not inquire; both the persons concerned suffered and were punished.

With creative artists, Rellstab was mostly conscientiously severe. In this he was swayed by moral motives; art occupied so high a position in his eyes that he regarded an unsuccessful artist's career as the most unfortunate of all existences. Whoever starts with the notion that a critic must never be mistaken, and that it is a capital crime for him to contradict himself once in his life, may take as an answer many a beautiful confession of Rellstab's, such, for instance, as:—"With regard to my artistic errors and mistakes—how many have I committed, and how frequently, even now, am I doubtful whether I was right at first or afterwards. I do not spare myself, but give myself up with my contradictions and changing views. I stick to the French proverb, that 'he who never changed his opinion never had one.'" Rightly understood, this proverb contains a truth well worthy of our attention. When looking back over Rellstab's criticisms, we linger with heartfelt delight over the notices more especially dedicated to some particular impersonation or to the artist individually. This delication of Leonore and Donna Anna, as performed by Mad. Schröder-Devrient in the year 1831; of the funeral service in honor of Klein, in 1832; of Fräulein Schecher in Iphigenia and Fidelio, in 1829; of Liszt's concerts, in 1841-43; but above all, his criticisms on the sisters Milanollo, the parts played by Jenny Lind from 1844 to 1846; and the artistic, loving memorial erected by him, in 1847, to that noble pair, Fanny Hensel and her brother Felix Mendelssohn, are specimens of characteristic musical criticism, in which fine critical perception plays quite as important a part as an ardent disposition entirely engrossed by its subject and held captive by the omnipotence of art.

Notwithstanding many an erroneous opinion with regard to details, Rellstab was always right in the long run. For the impressions of what is conditionally and what is unconditionally beautiful he possessed a degree of susceptibility which seized on anything certainly and quickly, and had the right word, the most intelligible and frequently most happy turns for what was to be described. This delicacy of perception on his part was not acknowledged by unprofessional men alone, but even by artists, and we recollect some expressions of approval, nay, more, of astonishment, on the subject from Mendelssohn, who, as is well known, never hesitated to say freely what he thought. We are rendered acquainted with the humorous side of Rellstab's criticism—his gentle nature never turned to satire—in the twelve annual series of the little musical periodical, Iris, which was discontinued at the end of the year 1840. In this publication Rellstab discussed those musical matters of the day which came under his notice, and did not give him any particular trouble.

Rellstab's labors for the Vossische Zeitung extended, however, far beyond his duties as a musical critic. The editorship of the French article was for a long time in his hands, and he discharged his task with great prudence; occurrences in municipal and social circles, when described by him, always excited the interest of the reader; novelties in literature introduced by his pen scarcely needed any other advocate. He was, moreover, employed for a large number of periodicals published in other places; he educated singers, both male and female, for the stage, and wrote many-volumed romances, tales, dramas, and poems. We possess his collected works, as published by Brockhaus, in Leipsic; but if we were to put all he has written into the shape of books, we might fill a whole library. Such restless activity required unusual natural gifts, quite as much as an iron will and unexampled industry. Among his works in the department of the belles lettres, besides some of his tales, the two romances "1812," and the one he wrote last, Drei Jahre von dreissigen, occupy the first place. There is no doubt that Rellstab's talent was most to be relied on in the description of occurrences and impressions. It happened, however, that he ignored this predominating faculty of his. In the project of recasting German opera, the noble end in view was worthy of praise; but Rellstab's strength was not sufficient for it; his dramatised Eugene Aram obtained a respectable success, because the original work came to his aid; his Feldlager was borne up, and that for a few years only, by Meyerbeer's music. For the course of the action arising from the most marked opposition of the various personages, for striking combination, by which the interest of the public is concentrated, for that shortness and sharpness of expression which dramatic composition requires, his pen was too lyrically soft, and his views of things too broad. Nature had created him to be a writer of epics, a narrator. He willed, however, and, even in this instance, his will achieved a certain success. Just as his partiality for acknowledged tendencies in art sometimes caused him to appear unjust towards ideas newly sprung up, in opposition to his many years' experience, he not unfrequently over-rated the measure of those artistic abilities which tallied with his own views. In such instances, his prejudices and his good heart ran away with him. This enables us to explain, on the one hand, his repugnance to Spontini, and, on the other, his exaggerated valuations of Bernhard Klein and Ludwig Berger, to whom he erected monuments of love and respect in his monographs.

Rellstab was very happily married as far back as 1834, and from period looked upon his existence at home, in the bosom of his family, as an oasis, which invited him from a whirlpool of exciting troubles to cheerful repose and recreation. It always afforded him the greatest pleasure to collect around him, in his own house, esteemed friends, whom he used to captivate by his humor, his happy talent of narration and his kindly disposition. This kindness in his family circle was not, however, confined merely to the surface, but extended to his most intimate relations.

He had long set all his worldly affairs in order. The recollection of the way in which his father died, and the warnings he received during the last two years of of his existence, impressed him with the probability of his soon sinking to rest. When we take into consideration the fact that his mind could not remain quiet, and that, according to human experience, he must have fallen a victim to a more terrible weakness, we must despite all the grief of his family and friends, consider his lot a happy one. A higher will than that of man wished to show his kindness towards him. In the midst of cheerful prospects the evening hour of farewell was approaching, to be followed by a tearful morning-greeting. The night of the 27th to the 28th November was for him the day of eternal light. He achieved reputation, honor, and love; they will survive him!

Un Ballo in Maschera.

Verdi's new opera bearing this title was produced at the New York Academy (Jan. 11th):

Many years ago, says the N. Y. Times, AUER composed music to the plot of this opera, and succeeded in putting a very strong mark to a galop in the last act, which became famous in consequence. The libretto, then newly from the hands of the young and ambitious SCRIBE, was regarded as a failure, and "Gustavus the third" owed all its success to the decorations and the particular splendor of the last ball scene. The ingenious Italian who has annexed the Verdian version, changed the venue from Stockholm to Naples. Instead of the unfortunate Swedish monarch, the hero became a Duke and a Governor. In this shape the work was prepared for the San Carlos Theatre, but the Government of the late lamented King BOMBA objected to its performance on the ground, possibly, that Naples being a despotism, the catastrophe might suggest the political wisdom of tempering it with assassination. Subsequently, the hero, thus originally transmogrified from a Swede into a Neapolitan, was subjected to another change, and came out as a red-coated British Governor domiciled officially in Boston, as Governor thereof, and surrounded by two worthies, named respectively Samuel and Tom—which a French paper injuriously asserts, are names of negroes baptised by the Methodists. BOMBA did not object to have a British Governor assassinated in his presence, and so the new version passed master in Naples, but the French appetite was differently affected, owing, perhaps, to the new commercial treaty. To suit the Parisian taste, therefore, the hero was turned into a Spaniard, and as such is nightly being poiarded in the gayest metropolis of the world. It will be perceived by this brief history that the libretto is a very happily constituted production, and flourishes in one clime as well as another. It should be remembered, however, that the local coloring of some of the music has been damaged by the various changes to which it has been subjected. It is very proper (to illustrate,) for the hero to sing a barcarole, being a Neapolitan and in Naples, but as an Englishman in Boston—the character we have him in here—it would be better to give him a convivial song of the good old two-bottle stamp, or a square out psalm-tune in common metre.

We give the plot in the fewest words possible. Ricardo, Count of Warwick, and Governor of Boston, (Signor BURGOLI) finds himself surrounded by an opposition party, which he has resolved to effect his overthrow by assassination. The count, courageous and gallant to all the world, entertains privately a strong sentiment of attachment for the wife of his Secretary, Reinhart, (Signor FERRI,) but, like an honorable man, determines to conquer it. He meets the lady (Mme. COLSON) during the progress of the play, accidentally, under circumstances which excite the suspicions of the husband, who, imagining that his friend has been perfidious to him, becomes furious, and blindly joins a plot against his life. He it is who assassinates him at the grand masked ball of the last act. The Governor expires, after performing poetical justice (which means exorcism) on the heroine, exempting her wholly from participation in his guilty passion. The heroine, who as a matter of course loves the count, seeks the intervention of a sorceress, and by that lady's advice goes to a certain spot at midnight to gather a powerful herb by which her unholy desires may be governed. The part of this sorceress possesses but little weight or interest, and is an extremely ungrateful one for a singer of Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPP's ability. Adding in this place that the opera is written in three acts, but for convenience is played in four, we proceed to a consideration of the salient morceaux, and a further elucidation of the points.

As to the music of the new opera, the critic continues:

The acknowledged admirers of the composer are divided about its merits, some classing it with the "Trovatore" and others ranking it with the "Sicilian Vespers." Without trying to balance a nice question of comparative excellence, we will say that it is scarcely likely to obtain the popularity of the one, or merit the trifling consideration of the other. In the "Masked Ball" VERDI attempts more vehemently than heretofore, and as we think more successfully, the portrayal of dramatic passion. His concerted pieces are never merely exercises for the vocal display of so many voices; they are always well-devised contrivances for the exhibition and illustration of the varied emotions of the scene. The more detached morceaux are characterised frequently by rare originality, and by a certain rhythmic crispness which scarcely suggests the master's ordinary waltz-like mode. There are two characters which have received the strongest delineation—the Page and R Reinhart—representatives of thoughtless gaiety and of intellectual sobriety. The melodies given to each are frequently superb, and never sink into insignificance. The soprano part is evidently written for the present generation of sopranos, and is good, but not all important. We need scarcely add that Mme. COLSON was more than equal to its requirements. The orchestration is admirable throughout; thoroughly thoughtful and musician-like, yet not pedantic or labored. We are disposed in regard to the work as one of the best dramatic productions of the modern Italian stage, and as a certain monument of the genius of the composer. If we may judge by the applause, last night, the public will soon be of the same opinion.

The Tribune gives the following criticism of the music:

The music is the chief thing, and merits notice. The composer has sought and succeeded in making his music dramatic—means adapted to ends, with the qualification that the melodies are inferior to his earlier works. The first act is, as a whole, uninteresting. As the action proceeds, the music is intensified; and some dramatic situations are capitally set forth. The pieces may be briefly mentioned as follows: An orchestral introduction paints the first scene—the supposed repose of the Earl, and the dark mutterings of the conspirators. The first chorus is good—the contrasts between friends and enemies being clear, and the brevity due the situation being held to. In instrumental music the composer may be as long as he chooses—the dramatic composer must be guided and restrained by the scene. Hence the nonsense of comparisons between operas and symphonies, or parlor critiques on stage music. After some interlocutory work, a graceful andante, with an unmeaning doubling of the voice part throughout by certain wind instruments, follows, nicely delivered by Brignoli. An andante sung by Ferri, of no very striking merit, follows. A song—a washed-out sort of little melody—given by Miss Hinkley, is next in order. This young lady is capable of doing better things than page's parts. The concerted piece after this is not much. The Witch solo music is large and solemn, and was well rendered by Miss Phillips. The talk-like trio which follows has no independent musical interest, but is a stage requirement. A sailor-song in barcarole time is very pretty. The phrasing under the words con laeere vele e l' alma in tempesta indicates the genius of the composer. The concerted piece, E scherzo od e follia, is admirably written and the dramatic contrasts clean-cut. The chorus, O figlio d' Inghilterra, is excellent—resonant, vigorous and to the point. The air Ma dall' arido stelo divulsa, is a laudable effort in the direction of novel phrasing—agitated and broken—the orchestra filling the gaps. In vocal music the composer must follow syllables and lines and in intervals such as God and nature allow; in instrumental music he may make chaos come again, as we too often see in the things called original—written invariably by men who cannot compose for the voice, and therefore incapable of the highest, most expressive, and most concentrated form of musical thought. Madame Colson sings with the accuracy of the Parisian school, and always intelligibly. The duet, after some want of the love on the slow movement, settles into an allegro where the composer uses the open notes, 1st, 3d, and 5th, to express the easy currency of the way cleared up, and is very elegant and ideal. This was handsomely sung by Madame Colson and Signor Brignoli. The trio, Odi tu come fremono, would—less the hurried desperate character—be liable to the cheap criticism of dealing in hard unisons, instead of harmonies due three distinct voices; but the situation and the common impulse of the characters, establishes the logic of the procedure. Brevity, too, here is another sign of intelligence. This trio was most effective, especially for those who, in dramatic music, look for means adapted to ends. The concerted piece Ve' se di notte qui colla sposa, is beautifully written, and shows the author possessed of the comic element. All contributed to its effect; our friends Sam and Tom, Messrs. Colletti and Dubrenl, doing the laughing part. The Minor Andante, sung by Madame Colson, Morrà nu prima in grazia, is very good, but not sufficiently distinctive from haughty elegies in ordinary. The melody Eri tu, for Baritone, by Ferri, was nicely delivered—less the tremolo style. It is very artistic, and borders on an inspiration. The conspirator music, Io son vostro, is admirable and effective. There is the economy of means manifested. Blaring instrumentation is avoided, up to the climax. A little bit, Di che fulgor, nicely sung by Miss Hinkley, leads to a well-arranged concerted piece. A tenor air, Ma se m'e forza perderti, is well adapted to the situation, and effectively presented by Brignoli. The ball music—the dancing music is inferior to Auher's masked ball—but is well managed as to instrumentation. The military band and orchestral dialoguing is brilliant; and the three-four movement on stringed instruments behind the scenes, with the tragic dialoguing on the stage, while the dark intentions are hinted in the orchestra, is thoroughly well managed.

A first hearing of an opera is more or less unsatisfactory. Until the themes become familiar, the audience is not too well pleased. The best parts of Un Ballo will grow with additional hearings.

The critic of the Albion says: The briefest statement of the merits of the work may be thus made: There are about seven or eight numbers of positive excellence out of an aggregate of twenty-nine. In the balance, the musician will find much that is excellent, and the public a great deal that is readily memorable. The third act is equal to anything Verdi has ever written, and the same may be said of a good portion of the second and fourth acts. That we regard the work as unequal will be readily perceived by what we have said, but we do not look upon it as a "comparative" failure. It is unquestionably a more meritorious work than the "Sicilian Vespers," but does not approach the "Trovatore" or "Traviata" in sustained interest or in the general salencies of melodic invention. The freshness that is in it is of so singularly an original kind, that we shall be greatly mistaken if the work does not enjoy a long and prosperous "run."

PARIS, JANUARY 23.—There is nothing I have to tell you this week equal in importance to the production of the new opera by Verdi at the Theatre Italien last Sunday week. Un Ballo in Maschera is precisely identical in subject with the Gustavus III. of Auher, but M. Somma, the young poet to whom the libretto is due, has not followed Scribe's example in writing a ballet-opera, but has simply composed a lyrical drama, to the perfection of which neither dance music, nor the legs, nor the arms of choreographers are required. This same M. Somma was once what is called regis seur at the Trieste theatre, but has given himself up since to the muses collectively, and has produced, it is said, many good things, among which is cited, Parasina, a tragedy composed for Madame Ristori. But to our opera. Originally it was to have been brought out at the San Carlo in Naples for the carnival of 1858; but the authorities then and there could no more abide conspirators than Dame Quickly could abide swaggers, and so teased and plagued the composer during the rehearsals, wanting this dramatic effect, and that burst of emotion to be sacrificed to police squeamishness, that one fine day he rolled up his score, put it in his pocket, and walked home, defying the threatened law proceedings of the manager, who modestly laid his damages at 10,000*l.* The proceedings in the suit of Garibaldi and others versus Francis Bomba having commenced in the meanwhile, and not being likely to terminate favorably to the defendant, the manager's action has been postponed sine die. After a year's interval the composer spied a chance for his work at the Apollo Theatre in Rome. Here too the censorship had to be reckoned with; and, to conciliate the papal government, the action of the piece was transferred to Boston in America, of all places in the world where since its first foundation by the Puritan forefathers of its present inhabitants, there never yet in all likelihood was seen even a single masquerader. The King of Sweden was changed into an English Governor, and in this shape the work was represented at the carnival of 1859 with the most complete success.

The critics here have a way of regarding everything produced on a Sunday to be as good as damned before it has seen the lights, the managers being supposed to reserve their most doubtful attempts for that day. But M. Calzado has reversed this state of things, and seems to have adopted the maxim, the better the day the better the deed; for he could not have entertained any doubt that Verdi's opera would turn out as it has done, a thorough success. The cast of the characters comprehends the names of Mads. Alboni and Penco, Mlle. Battu, and MM. Graziani and Mario, all of whom, with the exception perhaps of the last named, who is laboring under illness, exerted themselves with marked effect. The latest work of the Italian composer is pronounced by those who are better entitled to be heard on the subject than your humble correspondent to rank with his best works, and in some respects to surpass them notably in the orchestration, which is more careful, and evinces more signs of thoughtful elaboration than is usual with Verdi. The general character of the opera is something between the Trovatore and the Traviata, having much of the vigor of the former bleeded with the lighter graces of the latter.

M. NABICH, the celebrated trombonist, is now in Paris, as his neighbors, wherever he is living, will pretty soon learn to their sorrow. When he was in London he lived in Newman Street, where his memory will be for ever embalmed in the curses of the inhabitants at his furious blasts when practising to retain his mastery over that dolorous implement of torture. The shabby mansions of that gloomy thoroughfare were impelled as by an earthquake (a trombonement de terre) or a tornado, for the man blew a hurricane through his brazen tube. Some thought it was the crack of doom, and an old applewoman at the corner fell down on her knees, and confessed her sins aloud. Nabich is in Paris.

Bristow's Oratorio "Praise to God."

Timothy Trill, in the N. Y. Dispatch, has an article on our native composers and their works. After speaking at some length of Mr. W. H. Fry, he proceeds as follows:

Mr. George F. Bristow's name comes second on the short list of native composers, after which come Mr. J. M. Deems, G. H. Curtis, Charles Hommann, F. Benkert, Foster and others. Mr. Bristow is a younger man than Mr. Fry, and his works have been very differently characterized. A concert-overture, four orchestral Symphonies, an opera "Rip Van Winkle," and an oratorio are the works which have thus far been submitted to the public for their verdict. His concert overture and two of his Symphonies have been produced at the New York Philharmonic Society, and one of his Symphonies (No. 2) had a great success at Jullien's concert at the same time that Fry's Santa Claus was brought out. The latest of Mr. Bristow's works is his oratorio "Praise to God," produced for the first time in public last Tuesday evening.

I may be mistaken in my ideas, but it seems a pity that such a title should have been given to a work having the mere words of an ordinary Cathedral morning service for a libretto. Then again, I rather consider an Oratorio that which custom has led to being defined "a musical drama, in whose performance there is neither scenery, action, nor costume, and whose subject is generally scriptural." Now the "Te Deum" is certainly neither scriptural, nor is it dramatic. There is no variety in the dramatis personæ, nor is there any plot, consequently to my ideas a "Cantata" would much better suit the composition, which would also be better sustained by the character of the music I imagine, than the name of "Oratorio" is.

However, I merely advance the above as an individual opinion of a very unimportant person, and not as in any manner affecting the main characteristics of the work in a scientific point of view, since the music must hold its own, whatever be its title.

The "Praise to God" is founded upon the words of the "Te Deum Laudamus" and "Benedictus" of the Episcopal Liturgy, and is divided into nineteen numbers, analogous to the Oratorio form. Of these there are 9 choruses, 2 bass solos, 2 duets, 1 trio, 1 tenor solo, 2 quartets, 1 alto solo, 1 soprano solo, and a fine orchestral introduction, descriptive of the assembling together of the nations before they join in the glorious hymn, "WE PRAISE THEE O GOD!" This introduction is a great and noble feature of the work, and is a fine specimen of close and harmonically observant instrumentation, and the opening motivo strikingly enunciated by the trombi is woven into the finale of the composition in a very happy manner.

In order to give a correct analysis of the work as calling into action the main requisites of a successful composer, a few words in general may not be esteemed misplaced.

Firstly, ideas would certainly seem to be necessary although so many persist in writing without them! Secondly, the proper form in which to present those ideas; and, thirdly, the manner of instrumentating those forms—and we will here treat the voice as a variety of instrument. Now, if I were to be asked to compare the three men, Berlioz, Fry, and Bristow, judging from my limited opportunities of studying their works, I should base my opinions upon their relative development of those three requisites. I should say that Berlioz had the last of the three; Fry, the first; and Bristow, the second, in disproportionate degrees. Be it understood that I desire not to be considered as expressing myself disrespectfully in relation to these gentlemen; on the contrary, I venture to draw this close comparison with that feeling of delicate reserve which I think always becomes a mere critic, who has selected so exalted and sacred a theme as his subject; and while I point out the especial and predominating characteristics in their common musical proclivities, I would be worse than a fool to intimate their total want of the other two requisites of successful composers.

With the exception of Charles Hommann, of Philadelphia, I think Bristow is the most complete master of the Symphonic form of any American candidate for the composer's laurels. This is observable not only in his strictly orchestral works, but gives an appearance of solidity, and even with a classic odor—if I may use the term—even his freer compositions, which, to the indiscriminate hearer, seems like an indulgence in reminiscences of Mozart and Haydn; while, at the same time, such objectors could not for their lives tell from what works of those masters such passages were taken! * * *

The "Praise to God" has been published in most fascinating form by Ditson & Co., of Boston, and I should certainly think would be hailed with acclamations by all the choral societies in the country as a new, fresh, and easily comprehended work; at all events it certainly deserves to be.

Of its performance, it was the best I ever listened to from the time-honored honest old "Harmonic," and did great credit to all concerned. The single Alto solo was charmingly sung by Mrs. Jameson, who received a well merited encore, and Miss Brainerd was unexceptionable, as she generally is when she confines herself to sacred music or ballads. Mr. Thomas was also excellent.

The next thing this society should do is to attack Fry's Sabat Mater, and until they do so I shall give them no peace. It is a work which has been published for two years, and yet has never been heard in this city.

Ferdinand Hiller on the Music of the Future.

FIRST LETTER.

"The Music of the Future; a Letter to a French Friend, as a Preface to a prose Translation (into French!) of his operatic Poems," is the title of a pamphlet, which has recently appeared by Richard Wagner. The subject of the pamphlet is, as the author himself declares, to enlighten the Parisian art-critics with regard to his point of view as a composer, and "dissipate a large amount of error and prejudice," in order, at the approaching representation of Tannhäuser, to divert the judgment of the public from "an apparently suspicious theory," wholly and solely to the work itself. As the pamphlet, which is tolerably short, contains the pith of Wagner's views, and as it is not very probable that the majority of the public has been enabled to become acquainted with them from his long-winded books, allow me to direct, on the one hand, the attention of your readers to these views, and, on the other, to subjoin a few observations to as concise an analysis as possible of them.

Wagner's Letter, to all intents and purposes, is divided into two parts, although these are somewhat jumbled up together in a not inartistic manner. In the first place, it contains the author's views on the development of music, as well as the opinion of some of the greatest masters and the principal school of national art, with, further, an explanation of his own development and present point of view. As it is not my intention to produce a new edition of the pamphlet with marginal notes, I will take the liberty of compressing as much as possible of Wagner's opinions concerning the historical portion of our art, and of then passing on to his individual point of view, although it is in the nature of things that the opinions which guide an artist in his productions are most intimately connected with those which he has adopted concerning the development of his art and the most striking specimens of it.

"Among the Greeks we know music only as the companion of dancing; the motion of the latter gave music, as well as the poem sung by the singer to a dance-tune, the law of rhythm, which laws determined so decisively the verse and the melody, that Greek music (under which term poetry was nearly always implied) can be regarded only as dancing expressing itself in tones with words."

I willingly leave persons more learned than myself to come to an understanding with Wagner concerning these assertions. As we are told, the choruses in Greek tragedies, as well as, moreover, most of the magnificent songs of the Hellenic poets, were sung in a certain manner, and even sung with instrumental accompaniment, though this singing may have been of only a declamatory description!—if the immortal poems of the Greeks were in reality only dances expressed in tune and words, the fact presupposes a kind of dance more wonderful than all the great things antiquity has bequeathed us.

But let us return to Wagner's development. These Greek dance-tunes, he proceeds to say, were employed by Christian congregations in

Divine service, after they had been stripped, on account of the solemnity of the ceremony, of their rhythmical ornamentation, and thus endowed with the character of our present choral. That such transformations were effected, at the period of the Reformation, with the popular national songs, is an undoubted fact; but it is, perhaps, less convincingly proved that the first Christians pursued the same course with the songs employed at heathen festivals. Be this, however, at it may, Wagner is guilty of a piece of injustice to the Greeks, in all other cases so honored by him, when he dwells on the "uncommonly small expression in antique melody, after it had been deprived of the ornamentation of rhythm;" for the rhythm is not the ornamentation of a melody, but a considerable part of its individuality. In the most concise manner possible (against which no objection can be made) Wagner comes to the employment of harmony and polyphony in the music of the Christian Church, and speaks in terms of enthusiastic laudation of the "highly-consecrated" (hochgeheilten) masters of the old Italian school. The views to which he now gives utterance concerning the development of Italian music, are, however, so incomprehensible, that we must quote them textually, in order not to cause those versed in such matters to suppose we have misunderstood our author:—

"The decadence of this art in Italy, simultaneously with the development of the operatic melody on the part of the Italians, I cannot designate otherwise than as a relapse into paganism. When with the decay of the Church, the worldly desire for the employment of music gained the upper hand among the Italians, they gratified their wish most easily by restoring to melody its original rhythmical quality, and using it for singing just as it had formerly been used for dancing. I will not here stop to notice especially the striking instances of incongruity between modern verse—developed in accordance with Christian melody—and this dance melody imposed on it; I would merely direct your attention to the fact that this melody has nearly always been kept quite indifferent to this verse, and that, lastly, its variation-like movement has been solely dictated by the vocal virtuoso. But, what more than aught else, induces us to designate the development of this melody as a relapse, and not as a step in advance, is that most indisputably it could not turn to account the extraordinary important invention of Christian music: harmony, and polyphony, which embodied it. On an harmonic foundation of such scantiness, that it can conveniently dispense with all accompaniment, Italian operatic melody, even as regards the disposition and connection of its parts, has been contented with so poor a periodical structure, that the educated musician of our own time contemplates with sorrowful astonishment this meagre and almost childish form of art, whose narrow limits condemn even the most genial composer, when he has aught to do with it, to a complete formal stand-still."

In the face of this statement we read in the history of the music of the last two or three hundred years, as follows:—In the beginning of the 17th century, opera sprang up in Florence from a wish to resuscitate Greek tragedy. It was soon felt that polyphonic song, which alone prevailed at that period, as a form of art, and employed pretty well the same style for the Church and for poetry (in the madrigal), could not be retained, since the object in view was to exhibit, musically, events and persons, and allow them to express themselves. Hence the composer cultivated monophonic song accompanied by instruments both in the freest declamatory form (the recitative), and in the fixed, melodically-marked form of the aria and concerted pieces. It was thus that music began to enter on the task which one feels inclined to claim for it, nowadays, almost exclusively, namely: to be the interpreter of human passion—out of the style of the old church music, obeying the most restrictive laws of harmony and rhythm, however great results it may have effected in its way, nothing could have been produced bearing the remotest resemblance to modern music. Though from the important part assigned to the solo singer, vocal virtuosity has attained to the most objectionable abuse of its strength, and even though the Italian serious opera may have long been ossified, the comic opera of the Italians (the opera buffa), on the other hand, laid the foundation for the entire rich development of modern music. The greatest composers, Handel, Gluck, Haydn, and Mozart have to thank the Italian school principally for the expansion of their powers. Not only would there have been no Don Juan without this "relapse into paganism," but we should have no sonatas by Bach, no symphony by Beethoven, and no Tannhäuser by Wagner. That which we nowadays term melody, and which constitutes the soul of music, could not by any means, have been obtained without the "original rhythmical quality;" and if we owe this also to heathendom (a fact, however, anything but proved), we have reason to be more grateful to it than we imagined, even after all the treasures it has lavished upon us. As matters stand, we cannot, without being altogether unjust, deny the extraordinary, and, in the main, happy influence which the Italians have exerted upon the development of music. Even the Oratorio, which, at the latter period, was raised by a certain Handel (whom Wagner passes over without naming) to importance in the history of civilisation, took its rise among the Italians; nay, even in the domain of instrumental music, the Italians have not only given great impulses to others, but have produced considerable works themselves.

(To be continued.)

The President elect at the Opera.

While Mr. Lincoln was in New York he attended the performance of the Ballo in Maschera at the Academy. The N. Y. Herald gives this account of the ovation that he received:

Mr. Lincoln did not enter his box until some time after the conclusion of the overture to the opera, and after the singers had appeared on the stage. The place assigned him and his friends was the first private box from the stage, on the second tier, on the right side of the house. His entrance was made very quietly, and sans ceremonie, and it was not until he had been for a long time seated that any one in the body of the building knew of his arrival. But as he was expected, people naturally began to look about for him, and as those who knew the location of his box were perpetually pointing in that direction, there soon began to be a general movement of eyes to that point. At first, the plain black cravat, the neat shirt collar turned over the neckcloth, the incipient whiskers and good humored face, that sat so demurely in the box, left no doubt on the public mind that Abraham Lincoln of Illinois was among them. All this time the opera singers were doing their best; the chorus chaps were expending their unwearied lungs to the extent of their second class abilities; and the trumpeters and drummers were blowing and thumping their instruments in the most approved style. But it was no go at this particular moment. The President elect was the superior attraction for the time being, and the opera folks had to be content with little or no attention from their usually very attentive auditors. Presently the first act was brought to a close, and the scene descended amid a perfect storm of enthusiasm, half of which was no doubt intended for the players and the other biggest half for "Honest Old Abe."

The intelligence that Mr. Lincoln was in the house now began to spread from box to box, and from the lower auditorium to the gallery above, with something like electric speed. Shout after shout of applause arose from the lower boxes and seats, and were taken up and re-echoed from those above. The demonstration of respect and reverence to the chosen President of America at length became so general and enthusiastic that no person present could he said to be a non-participant in it. At first, the object of this genuine outburst of patriotic feeling sat as still as when he first entered, only occasionally bowing from his seat; but as this did not seem to satisfy the clamorous audience he presently arose to his feet and his tall sinewy form was then seen in its full proportion, towering above his friends in the box a full head and shoulders, like Saul among his brethren. With his rising the applause and enthusiasm seemed to have reached its apogee; gentlemen waved their hats and caps over their heads; the ladies did the same with their handkerchiefs, while the whole audience, without exception, joined warmly in the applause. The scene was most animated and exciting, and it may well be considered one of the most flattering ovations yet offered to Mr. Lincoln in the Empire State, and coming as it did from a class of citizens whom the President elect could not have had so excellent an opportunity of seeing assembled together under any other circumstances,—and in consideration of the wealth, intelligence and respectability of those who were so met together—the demonstration becomes doubly valuable, and will not, as it should not, be readily forgotten by Mr. Lincoln.

On resuming his seat the applause broke out again and again, from all parts of the house, though not so enthusiastically as in the first instance; and before the last echoes of the final burst had subsided, the scene went up and discovered the whole force of the opera troupe on the stage with their unrolled musical scrolls, preparing to enchant their audience with the deservedly beloved national hymn, "The Star Spangled Banner." With one of the artistic flourishes of Muzio's magic baton, the harmonious tones of the accompaniment trembled through the orchestral instruments and resounded through the house. The audience was inclined to applaud even this first faint foreshadowing of the anthem's stirring strains; but they were prevented by the advance of Miss Hinkley to the front, who, turning to Mr. Lincoln's box, and yet partially facing the audience, sang in her clear, sweet voice the first stanza of the popular hymn. The chorus was taken up in a most spirited manner by the whole troupe, and it seemed to want very little to induce every one in the audience to join. Just before the first verse was begun there were cries "All up," to which the audience unanimously responded, and all with common consent rose to their feet. Mr. Lincoln and his attendants were about the last to rise, and not long after he was on his feet the chorus was concluded amid rapturous applause, as the words were echoed:

The star spangled banner—oh! long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

A splendid Union American banner blazing with the full glory of thirty-three stars, was dropped from the proscenium with an effect that words can scarcely convey. The enthusiasm and excitement of the people was unbounded, and there could be no doubt that he was greatly affected by the solemnity of the manifestation.

The second verse of the anthem was sung by Miss Phillips, and so on through the song alternately with Miss Hinkley. The last verse was sung with great pathos and feeling, and at the conclusion the applause that followed was indeed a flattering tribute to the talented artistes who so well did their part.

Before the applause subsided, Muzio started the other national song "Hail Columbia," from the orchestra. It was received with loud applause.

Cheers were then given for Lincoln from the upper boxes, followed by cheers for Muzio and the opera singers; after which the excitement gradually subsided, and the opera was allowed to proceed with its usual harmony.

Mr. Lincoln did not remain longer than to the close of the second act of the performance. He left immediately after, and did not return, though every one thought he would come back. His departure was effected as quietly as his entrance; and thus ends the operatic demonstration in honor of Abraham Lincoln.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 2, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Commencement of "The Hymn of Praise (Lobgesang) a Cantata by Mendelssohn.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

EIGHTH AND LAST CONCERT.

This concert passed off excellently, the house being literally crammed, so much so that even ladies had to stand. The programme was an attractive one and was well carried out.

1. Quartette, in E minor No. 2, op. 44. Mendelssohn
Allegro appassionato — Scherzo — Andante — Finale, Presto.
2. "Boquet D'Immortelles, solo for Violoncello. Bockmühl
Wulf Fries.
3. Andante, con Variazioni and Finale, from the D minor
Posthumous Quartette. F. Schubert
4. Meditation, on Bach's first Prelude, for Violin Obliga-
to. Gounod
Carl Meisel.
5. Nonetto in F, op. 31. Spohr
Allegro—Scherzo—Adagio—Finale. Vivace.

The principal piece was the NONETTE by SPOHR. With regard to this piece we confess to a pleasant surprise. We had not expected so sound and beautiful music from this composer, who in his latter works had a tendency amounting almost to a morbid mannerism, to constant modulation. A feature that makes it actually painful to listen to them. But here we have simple, graceful melodies, worked up in a pleasing manner, splendid in instrumentation and a grateful abundance of most charming orchestral effects. The tenor of the whole piece is wholesome and its effect elevating. Of the four movements the first is the most satisfactory, worked up in the richest manner, with quaint, surprising imitations, especially of the first theme. The second theme is beautiful, has a subordinate share, however, in the treatment of the motives. The Scherzo has a good deal of humor in it. The Adagio requires more breadth of tone in the strings, suffering somewhat from the want of it at last night's rendering. It is, it seems to us, and we say it without meaning disparagement, as a composition the weakest movement of the four. The last movement having in its first theme a rhythm much like a dance, is beautiful in itself, but compared with the first it is not grand enough. Yet with all these shortcomings the piece is one, that has much intrinsic worth and is a valuable addition to the repertoire of the club. It was performed very well with the exception of the Adagio, of which we made mention above. Messrs. SCHULTZE, Violin, MEISEL, Viola, WULF FRIES, Violoncello, STEIN, Bass, F. ZOHLER, Flute, RIBAS, Oboe, RYAN, Clarinette, HAMANN, Horn and HOHNSTOCK, Bassoon, gave us a pleasing combination of sounds, and performed their various parts finely, with much taste and precision. Especially well done was the point of culmination in the first movement, where the composition rises to dramatic effect, the whole movement, indeed, having much in it, that reminds one of a scene in a drama. Quaintly the oboe came in in the Finale with its sharp, clear tones, in a very original leading over passage. We hope to hear the piece before long again at one of the Saturday concerts. The well-known Quartette in E minor by Mendelssohn was played masterly, especially so the genial, sparkling Scherzo with just a tinge of weird, elfin enchantment about it. More of this weird, erl-king music is in Schubert's D minor Quartette of which two movements were played. We hope the "broken-crockery critic" was not present; they would have pained him, they were so beautiful.

In Gounod's Meditation, on the prelude to Bach's first fugue in C major (the violino obbligato played very well by Mr. Meisel), we wished more prominence had been given to the piano part, which is the principal one, and ought to come out with a clear ring to it. Mr. Wulf Fries did himself much credit by his Violoncello Solo on "immortal airs" by Mozart, playing very tastefully and with great mechanical excellence the composition which is in many places quite difficult.

Altogether it was a pleasant concert, a fine close to the series, which brought us many valuable novelties, for Boston audiences, at least. We are very glad to see the enterprise and tact of the club, shown in the production of concerted chamber-music exceeding the limits of the quintette, so well rewarded as they were this season. Doubtless one reason for their full houses was the absence of orchestral concerts and the general meagreness of our musical season thus far. They were almost the only persons that furnished music periodically this winter.

We are glad, however, that at the close of their regular series, the Orchestral Union under Mr. Zerrahu takes up the good work, promising regular Wednesday afternoon concerts. Of the first of them we shall have to speak presently.

We hope the Mendelssohn Quintette Club will add a few more Tuesday evening concerts, say half a series, so as to lead us musically through March and April. We have scarcely any doubt as to their success, should they conclude to do so.

The audience was very enthusiastic, applauding every thing, and demanding a repetition of Gounod's meditation. The best feeling evidently animated both audience and performers and we pronounce the concert a decided success. *†

Concert at the New Catholic Church.

On Sunday evening last another concert was given in this beautiful church, essentially a repetition of the one noticed in our last, with some variations in the programme. Mrs. Harwood being indisposed some of her parts were assumed by other ladies and some of them omitted. The most artist-like and perfect among the solos was Mrs. Kempton's singing of the Ave Maria by Robert Franz, which was in every respect admirable, in feeling, in execution, in beauty of voice, and in the marked effect produced upon the audience upon which no note was lost, in this immense church, seventy feet longer than the Music Hall. Certainly it is the finest building for sound, either for music, or (to judge by the effect of an announcement made from the choir concerning Mrs. Harwood's absence), for speaking. We know of no hall, large or small to compare with it in this respect. The old organ of the Franklin Street Cathedral, which is a mere pigmy to what should stand in the lofty and ample space of the choir gallery, sounded almost grand and noble, as heard from the chancel.

Next to Mrs. Kempton's solo, we should rank those of Mr. Powers, who gave very excellently the Tuba mirum and Pro peccatis with true feeling and full and admirable voice. Miss Pearson's facile voice gave the due effect to the florid intricacies of Gnglielmi's Gratias agimus tibi; but we think such music as this, made up largely of echoes and imitations, utterly out of place in such a programme and such a place. Such imitative music would not be tolerated upon the lyric stage, we are sure, and seems strangely incongruous in the House of God. Florid and ornate as the music of the Catholic Church may well be, and yet accord well with the splendors of its service, it seems to us that such as this passes the bounds that properly limit the sphere of sacred music. Of the choruses, by far the most effectively sung was the beautiful Kyrie from Mozart's 7th Mass, it was even more impressive than the chorals. The heavens are telling, which was given by a larger number of voices.

Mrs. Fowle sang the Inflammatum, from the Stabat Mater and an Alma Virgo by Hummel with all the good qualities of voice and style that have become familiar to Boston audiences.

Mr. J. H. Willcox who directed the concert, and to whose good judgment is due the selection of an excellent programme and fine performance, played the accompaniments upon the organ assisted by Mr. B. J. Lang. With such skilful accompanists it will be seen that there was nothing wanting to please the immense audience that more than filled every seat in the church, though it was not so uncomfortably crowded as on the former occasion.

Orchestral Union.

1. Overture, "Fra Diavolo" Auber.
2. Two-Part Song Mendelssohn.
(For two Cornet-a-Pistons.) Messrs. Heioecke and Piuter.
3. Symphony, No. 5, (C minor) Beethoven.
4. Overture, "Tannhäuser" Wagner.
5. New Waltz, "Forget me not" Carl Zerrahu.
6. Miserere, from "Il Trovatore" Verdi.
7. Galop, "Marseillaise" Lumbye.

The first afternoon concert saw the Music Hall entirely filled—a good omen for the success of the undertaking. The programme was a very good one and so too was the performance, though we should have been glad to see a stronger force of violins in the Symphony and the Tannhäuser overture. These were, however, well played and were indeed a rich treat after so long an abstinence from any orchestral music. The lighter part of the programme was also pleasing, and we cannot omit to notice the nice bit of violoncello playing by Mr. FRIES in the Miserere scene from Il Trovatore.

We trust that this full house will inaugurate a fashion of full houses for the season, and that many such fair and spring-like days will tempt all true music-lovers to come again.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 26. — To my great regret indisposition has again obliged me to postpone my report of last week's concerts till the last moment, when I have no time for any but a hasty notice. I had the pleasure of being present at two of several entertainments of the kind that were given. The first was the concert of Mr. SATTER, on Tuesday evening, when the programme was as follows:

1. (By request.) Illustration de la "Juive".....Satter. Gustav Satter.
2. Sonata, C sharp minor, Op. 27.....Beethoven. Gustav Satter.
3. "The Jewish Maiden".....Kneeken. G. C. Rexford.
4. (a Nocturne, (E flat).....Chopin. (b Song without Words, (Duo, A flat).....Mendelssohn. (c Minuetto, 6th Symphony, (E flat).....Mozart. Gustav Satter.
5. Concert Solo.....Aptommas. Aptommas.
- 6 "Fair Stars".....Proch. G. C. Rexford.
7. (a "Printemps d'Amour," Mazurka.....Gottsehalk. (b "Lullaby," Cradle Song.....Wm. Mason. (c Sextett of "Lucia".....F. Liszt.
8. Concert Solo.....Aptommas. Aptommas.
9. (By request.) Improvisation. Gustav Satter.

Mr. Satter played as he always does, with most wondrous execution, and, for the most part, exquisite taste. His rendering of the Minuet in Beethoven's Sonata could not be surpassed; his interpretation of the other two movements did not satisfy one quite as well. The first was a little too pianissimo, so that several notes were lost; the last he took too rapidly, and did not put enough variety of character into it. Of the three pieces which he played, the "Duet" by Mendelssohn and Minuet by Mozart were deliciously rendered, while technically speaking, none of the others left anything to be wished for. Mr. REXFORD a debutant, hitherto unknown and unheard of, labored under the disadvantage of supplying the place of Sig. Stigelli, who had been announced to sing at this concert. The gentleman has a fine voice, but exhibited certain airs and habits in his singing and gesture which savored strongly of the amateur.

On Thursday night Madame ABER made her appearance once more, after a long pause. Her concert was well attended, and in every way a success, but I shall have to leave a mention of its details and merits for my next week's letter. — t —

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 23, 1861.—A large audience greeted Mr. Gärtner and his associates at his Soirée last evening, at Chickering's Saloon. I send you the Programme for the occasion.

1. Quartette, in C major.....Haydn
2. Romanze for Violoncello.....Engelke
3. Concerto in D minor for Piano.....Mendelssohn
4. Introduction and variations.....David
5. Grand Duo, for two Pianos.....Schumann Andante and Variations.
6. Quintetto, in E flat.....Beethoven

All the items were satisfactorily rendered by those to whom their performance was respectively intrusted. In the Haydn Quartette with the magnificent Emperor's Hymn, Mr. Gärtner's great ability as a quartette player was conspicuously preëminent.

The Mendelssohn Concerto found a capable and faithful interpreter of its many beauties in Mr. Jarvis, whose rank as among the first of American pianists, is so generally recognized, that a commendatory comment here, upon his playing, would be superfluous. The Andante, with variations, of Schumann, for two pianos, was very smoothly performed by Messrs. Jarvis and Cross. Scientifically considered, this composition has undoubtedly great merit as a musical work; yet an impartial critic could not hesitate to pronounce it somewhat dull, and rather deficient in point of melody, of which there must be a little in the most classical music. To our mind the air being an Andante might have been performed at a less accelerated tempo, without any injury to good taste.

Mr. Engelke's Romanza for violoncello, without reflecting a great deal of credit on his ability as a composer, is very pretty, and Mr. E's playing is all that could be desired in richness of tone and facility of execution.

We have decided objections against even as great a musician as Ferdinand David, transforming the immortal "Lob der Thränen" into a tarantelle, for the sake of manufacturing variations; and although Mr. Gärtner performed the solo better than we have ever heard him play anything before, yet we could not but wish that the "variator" had selected an air better suited to the purpose of turning and twisting it about so that its most intimate friends would not know it. There are some airs, you know, which are so remarkably deficient in beauty, that the more they are disguised the greater your delight; such are especially adapted to the wants of the getters up of variations,—of Ferdinand David, for instance.

The Quintetto in E flat, Beethoven,—with its peculiarly graceful Scherzo, closed a concert, which as regards the individual efforts of the performers, was the most successful that Mr. Gärtner has yet given.

The Germania,—our "peculiar institution" still holds its own in the affections of musical people,—and considering the quantity of "talk" that abounds of a Saturday afternoon in the Musical Fund Hall, one might say of the most unmusical people, as well. The Germania is fashionable, even if it is but a "shilling concert," after all. Practically, its influence in the formation of a popular taste for the best music, is, and has long been, very great.

People who pretend to know anything hereabouts, read the very entertaining and pleasantly written Editorial Correspondence in "Dwight," and express their great delight therein. R. D. C.

* To coin a word. These men are not always composers, pas du tout.

WORCESTER, FEB. 25. — Washington's Birthday in Worcester. — Ten years ago, Dr. Lowell Mason and Prof. William Russell lectured upon music and elocution before a New Hampshire Teachers' Institute. The appreciative and graceful allusions made from time to time, by each of those accomplished instructors to the department of the other, called attention to the relation existing between elocutionary and musical expression, and the result was a classical and pleasing entertainment in which the two gentlemen united. Prof. Russell read brief selections from different authors in his own happy style, which owes its superiority no less to his thorough appreciation of all that is best in literature than to his eminent mastery of that most wonderful instrument, the human voice. After each reading, Dr. Mason, at the piano improvised a song without words upon the theme thus furnished. The repeated transitions from the interpretation of ideas by speech, to their interpretation by musical composition, produced a series of counterparts often spoken of since with the most delightful recollections.

A more elaborate effort of the same nature was made in Worcester, on the evening of the 22d instant. Prof. RUSSELL read to a large and attentive audience a few scenes from Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," in connection with the rendering of Mendelssohn's music for the play, by Mr. B. D. ALLEN, who was assisted at the piano by Mrs. E. B. DAME. The vocal parts were sustained by Miss ELLEN FISKE and the ladies of the Worcester Mendelssohn Choral Club. It was a privilege to listen to the Wedding March in its own place, preceded and followed by fairy music that must haunt the future of its hearers with sweet memories of Mendelssohn. The solos and choruses elicited the highest praise from those who could appreciate them. The greatest charm of Prof. Russell's reading was that no exertion was apparent in it. Whatever the part, the sportive discourse of fairies or the conversation of mortal lovers, the poet's tribute to his maiden queen or the well-known passage in which the poet's office is itself so worthily magnified, the anger of Egeus or Oberon or the blunders of a low-bred Athenian stock-company, the reader did not "mouth it as some players do," but illustrated constantly the true office of elocution, to be a pure medium for the communication of thought and language; not a prism, transmitting only distorted and falsely-colored forms, but the vital air, itself invisible, through which we look without illusion at landscapes and planets and stars. The most beautiful feature of the entertainment was the mutual deference shown by the talented musician who arranged it and the venerable professor whose reputation added numbers to the audience. Mr. Allen offered only a musical accompaniment for the reading. Prof. Russell insisted, meanwhile, that the reading should only serve to introduce the different portions of the music. Other excellencies may be those of mere performers. This was an attribute of genius. So, we may imagine, would Shakspeare and Mendelssohn yield to each other the precedence and the palm. Both yielded on this occasion to a patriotic impulse: for, previous to the commencement of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," our national hymn, "My country! 'tis of thee" &c. was sung with thrilling power, as if in recognition both of the anniversary and the present crisis of the Union.

LINDA.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE "ORPHEUS" IN SALEM. — The Germans have a word, which is untranslatable as far as the sentiment of it goes. "Musikanten-Fahrten" literally is musician's travels; but the two words have not any of the frolicking, jovial ring to it, that makes the German word so pleasant to German ears. We do not allude to the sound of the words but to the reminiscences called up by them. One needs to have seen a company of German "Liederfänger" (glee-singers) on a visit to a neighboring "Lieder-Tafel," marching gaily through meadow and wood, over hill and dale, making the air vocal with their merry "Wanderlieder;" or in the pleasant summer-garden sitting round their "Tafel" with things before them, containing a certain home beverage made of hops and barley, which the Maine liquor law forbids to use lawfully (except in the original packages), or, perhaps still better, some of nature's most genial gifts to man, grown on grape-vines, which said law likewise consigns to ignoble disdain; we say, one should have seen them to know the full meaning of the two words, "Musikanten-Fahrten." Such a mirthful jolly trip was the one the Orpheus made to Salem on Friday evening last, Washington's birthday, to give a concert for the celebration of the Sixth Anniversary of the Young Men's Union of that city. The programme was a very rich one and, to judge from the rapturous applause bestowed on the songs, of which several had to be repeated, much pleased the audience. Being "one of them," we modestly refrain from a criticism.

The Club, accompanied by some of the passive members went and came in an extra train. And though the national beverage of the Germans was wanting, and a substitute to be had only in homoeopathic doses from the bounty of some of the more provident members, yet what with cigars, and singing and shunting and stories the time passed swiftly. We would gladly expatiate on this topic, would say a word, for instance, of the mock-heroic representation of the mock-heroic opera "DIE BARDEN," which was acted, as far as the scenic accommodations of a railway car would permit, not even Fritshen refusing to obey the summons of the stout arms of the "call-boy" (ought to be "man," but in default of such a word the technical one is retained); or mention the march from the Eastern railroad depot, to some nameless place, (unmentionable because of said Maine liquor law), with "Sing und Sang" through the drowsy streets of Boston. But the character of this journal as a critico-musical organ forbids the discussion of outside matters, and so we forbear.

*†

A MUSICAL COMMUNITY.—An English magazine says: "In a Kentish village numbering hardly more than five hundred inhabitants, the children, the young men and women, even several of the old men who work on farms, have become singers. Every Christmas and Easter, for some years past, they have performed an oratorio of Handel or some other great master; they cherish their church music, and they live together with their minds awakened to such a sense of harmony that for years past not one of them has been punished for, or accused of, offense against the law."

MUSIC OF A PINE GROVE.—It was extremely hot, and we waited impatiently for the coming of the sea breeze, which flows regularly from off the ocean. As yet all was quiet as the grave, and not a pine tree stirred its tendrils. Did you ever hear the voice of a pine forest? There is nothing else in the world at all like it. I have heard music when the intonation of the organ ceased, and a single voice, almost angel-like in sweetness, seized the strain and carried it up to heaven; and again, when the full bands of wind and string instruments sounded in harmonious unison; but not these, nor the roar of artillery, nor yet the deep boom of the ocean on a sounding shore could ever awaken one half the emotion within my breast, as can the melancholy wail or unbroken thunder of a sea of mountain pines. On the present occasion, the silence was overpowering and we were almost gasping for relief, when there was a sound as faint as the last dying cadence of a vesper hymn, and instantly every tree became instinct with life.

The sound increased in volume until the dark aisles of the forest were pealing with a sullen roar, and soon it burst upon us in the full tide of its strength, and rejoicing in its power. It came like the clashing of bucklers, like the roll of thousand drums—music fit to usher in the morning of some mighty day in the history of mankind—giving the idea of countless armies, or the triumph of a Roman Emperor. Down the cañons and gorges of the mountains it surged, swept like a whirlwind over the surface of the lake, rushed up the rugged sides of Uncle Sam, till from his savage battle-front, he growled back response to our own mountain peak, which all the while kept thundering to him aloud.

ANECDOTE OF BEETHOVEN.—The following amusing anecdote is told in the "Autobiography of Louis Spohr," recently published in Germany. "Beethoven was accustomed, when conducting, to guide the orchestra by the most vehement and extraordinary gestures and motions. At the last concert he gave in Vienna, he was playing a new piano-forte piece of his own. He soon forgot that he was performing a solo, and began to direct in his usual fashion. At the first sforzando, he flung his arms so widely asunder, that he hurled both lights off the piano to the floor. The audience laughed; and Beethoven was so put out by the disturbance, that he began over again. A friend, fearing that, at the same passage, the same occurrence might be repeated, ordered two chorus boys to stand one at each side of Beethoven, holding candles in their hands. One came unexpectedly near the performer. When the eventful sforzando broke in, he received from Beethoven's right hand, suddenly flung out, so downright a box on the ear, that the poor lad, in affright, let his candle fall to the floor. The other boy, who had more prudently followed all Beethoven's movements with anxious looks, barely succeeded, by a rapid ducking of his head, in avoiding the blow just reaching him. If the audience laughed before, they now broke fairly out into a bacchanalian shout of mirth. Beethoven became so enraged that he snapped half-a-dozen strings together. All the attempts of the real lovers of music to restore quiet and attention proved for some time fruitless. The first allegro was wholly lost on the audience. Since this mishap, Beethoven never again could give a concert."

We find in the Berlin musical paper "The Echo" a few pertinent remarks by Dr. Zopff, well known to our readers by original contributions to our pages in past years. He says: "There is now a great confusion of ideas as to the meaning of good and bad, classic and light in music, and this confusion is fast getting worse and worse. Very soon nobody will know which is which. One striking example of the lack of character in our art at the present day is offered by the lax treatment of the great or perfect third. Probably no interval is so generally taken too low as the major third. This is most noticeable when it is played on low instruments or sung by bass-singers, as the lowest note of a chord. Then it is sometimes impossible to tell whether the chord is major or minor. Yet this interval is the most decisive in the scale! How many of our professed music lovers would not be seriously embarrassed if they were asked to tell the mode of a piece, whether major or minor, after only hearing it? In a great measure responsible for this is the machine-like, lifeless scale practice on the piano-forte, where major thirds, for reasons of the temperament, are all tuned too low. Such music is the surest means to make the juvenile ear unsusceptible."

AN IMPROVED PIANO ACTION.—Mr. Irving L. Harwood, of this city, well known to all musical people through his long connection with Chickering & Son, has recently invented and patented an improvement on piano-forte actions, which is applicable to instruments of all styles. It is a valuable invention, and the results, which the pianist is able to accomplish by its means, will be hailed with great satisfaction by pianists. It allows of the reiteration of a note with the utmost rapidity and certainty, while the key is depressed to nearly its full extent, without any liability to that "catching" which troubles pianists in such passages, rendering them unequal. So we learn from the Post.

LIGHTS IN THEATRES.—At the first sitting of the French Academy of Sciences this year, the president sent in a paper on the foot-lights of theatres, and other matters relating to their construction. The competition opened by government, he observes, for a new opera-house, invests the subject with peculiar interest, and it is therefore essential to take the following circumstances into account:

1. That the foot-lights in their present position are extremely hurtful both to the eyes and voice of the actors, especially in the case of singers.

2. That the communication existing between the stage and the lower story by means of trap-doors, cause drafts of cold air which are highly prejudicial to the actors.

3. That it would be highly advantageous both to the actors and to the public, if the foot-lights were replaced by systems of illumination from above, invisible to the public, and exercising no noxious influence over the performers.

VERDI IN POLITICS.—We have already announced the fact that Verdi was a candidate for a seat in the Italian Parliament, meeting this month, and that his chances are good. This news will not surprise those acquainted with the sentiments of the illustrious composer. Before he became a great composer, Verdi was noted for his patriotism; and his music, in which that feeling is everywhere visible, is but the reflection of a generous nature devoted to the freedom of his country. The Italians, by sending him to Congress, will not only reward the greatest of their musicians, but also one of her staunchest patriots.—N. Y. Evening Post.

AUTHOR OF "HOME, SWEET HOME."—How many eyes have been dimmed with tears—how many hearts have been stirred with sorrow—over the exquisite pathos of "Home, Sweet Home!" But how few of the thousands who have murmured its sweet words and drank its divine melody, know that its author was a sad and weary exile, to whom the joys of home and kindred were unknown, and the tender influence of love denied! How few know that the last years of his life were spent in poverty and exile in strange lands and among alien people; that his last hours were soothed by no loving hand, and no weeping friends followed him to his grave. A few miles from Tunis, within sight of the ruins of Carthage, overlooking the blue sea, the poet sleeps his last sleep. A monument, erected by the United States government with the following inscription, says the Globe, marks his grave, says the "Globe":

In Memory of
HONORABLE JOHN HOWARD PAYNE, Twice Consul of
The United States of America, for
The City and Kingdom of Tunis,
This stone is here placed,
By a grateful Country.
He died at the American Consulate, in this City,
After a tedious illness,
April 1st, 1852.
He was born at the city of Boston,
State of Massachusetts.
His fame as a Poet and Dramatist is well known wherever the English language is understood, through his celebrated Ballad of "Home, Sweet Home,"
And his popular tragedy of "Brutus," and other similar productions.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal Beauties of Verdi's new Opera "Un Ballo in maschera."

La rivedra nell' estasi. (I shall never behold).
Romanza. Tenor. 25

A short, melodious strain, full of delicate shadings and very effectively introduced in the opera.

Alla vita che t'arride. (To thy life with smiles abounding). Cantabile for Baritone. 25

A very pretty movement in Bolero time, which has made a decided hit in New York, and will find its way to the great singing public.

Volta la terrea. (Lift up thine earthly gaze.)
Rondo for Soprano. 25

A Bravura Song for a Soprano voice, in two-four time, with a melody at once pleasing and characteristic.

Di tu se fedel. (Declare if the waves). Barcarolle for Tenor. 35

A perfect gem both in and apart from the opera, in the form of a Gondola-Song in six-eighth time. When rendered by a skilful vocalist it must create a great sensation.

Morro, ma prima. (I die, but first in pity.) For Soprano. 25

This song will soon be familiarly known as the "Prayer from the Masked Ball." It is a beautiful movement.

E sei tu che macchiavi. (It is thou who hast blighted). 40

A capital Baritone Song.

Ma se m'è forza. (But if compelled to lose thee now). Romanza for Tenor. 30

A beautiful piece, in a minor key, but closing with a bright strain in major, coming in about as relieving as Manrico's Song from the duologue dispelling the doleful minor of the Miserere music.

Saper vorreste. (You'd fain be hearing). Canzonet for Soprano. 25

A lively Arietta in Waltz time, short and not at all difficult.

T'amo, si t'amo. (Fondly I love thee). Duet for Soprano and Tenor. 40

This is the great Duet in the Opera, into which the composer has infused the best of his talent. The melodic texture is dramatic. The Orchestra accompanies with a Waltz which flows on gracefully and forms a charming contrast to the dramatic notes of the singers.

Books.

THE PARLOR GLEE BOOK. Containing all the Principal Songs and Choruses, performed by "Orway's Æolians." 1,00

One of the most attractive music books of the season. It contains a large number of choice and popular pieces, most of which have been rapturously enjoyed by large audiences in this and other cities. Its elegant appearance and its charming contents render it a very desirable acquisition to every young lady's collection of favorites—an ornamental and useful accompaniment to the pianoforte.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 466.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 23.

The American Flag.

BY DR. DRAKE.

When Freedom from her mountain height,
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night,
And set the stars of glory there.
She mingled with the gorgeous dyes,
The milky baldrick of the skies,
And striped its pure, celestial white,
With streakings of the morning light;
Then from his mansion in the sun,
She called her eagle-bearer down,
And gave into his mighty hand
The symbol of her chosen land.

Majestic monarch of the cloud!
Who rear'st aloft thy regal form,
To hear the tempest trumping loud,
And see the lightning-lances driven,
When strides the warrior of the storm,
And rolls the thunder drum of heaven;
Child of the sun! to thee 'tis given
To guard the banner of the free,
To hover in the sulphur smoke,
To ward away the battle stroke,
And bid its bleedings shine afar,
Like rainbows in the cloud of war,
The harbingers of victory.

Flag of the brave! thy folds shall fly,
The sign of hope and triumph, high.
When speaks the signal trumpet tone,
And the long line comes gleaming on,
Ere yet the life-blood warm and wet,
Has dimmed the glistening bayonet,
Each soldier's eye shall brightly turn
To where thy meteor glories burn,
And as his springing steps advance,
Catch war and vengeance from the glance;
And when the cannon-mouthings loud,
Heave, in wild wreaths, the battle shroud,
And gory sabres rise and fall,
Like shoots of flame on midnight's pall,
There shall thy victor glances glow,
And cowering foes shall sink beneath
Each gallant arm that strikes the blow,
That awful messenger of death.

Flag of the seas! on ocean's wave
Thy stars shall glitter o'er the brave,
When death careering on the gale,
Sweeps darkly round the bellied sail,
And frightened waves rush wildly back,
Before the broadside's reeling rack,
The dying wanderer of the sea
Shall look at once to heaven and thee,
And smile to see thy splendor fly,
In triumph o'er his closing eye.

Flag of the free heart's only home,
By noble hands to valor given,
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven.
Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe, but falls before us;
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,
With Freedom's banner waving o'er us!

Mme. Plessy, the comic actress, went recently to witness Offenbach's "Orphée aux Enfers," and being asked how she liked it said:—"I have been greatly amused. I fancied myself at Bedlam on the chief turnkey's birthday, which all the lunatics were celebrating.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

IX.

OPERA.

1700—1800.

In our last paper we saw the establishment of the royal Academy of Music by Cambert and Lulli. The style of these masters was large and severe, although one feels still a little of the heaviness and monotony of the plain chant. This could not be otherwise at a time when the dramatic music of France was still in its infancy, and was still moving along, so to speak, in company with religious music properly so called.

In the grand 18th century, which is so variously but perhaps not decisively judged, we shall see the opera twice transformed under the powerful hands of Rameau and Gluck, without reckoning the intermediate periods of transition which are a sort of providential interposition, that the works of men of true genius may be more brilliant in their success. Lulli died in 1687, at the moment when the Ariane of the unfortunate Cambert was represented at Nantes.

Let us now note the more remarkable events in the history of the Opera during the thirty-three years which elapsed between A. D. 1700 and the appearance of Rameau. Campra, a native of Provence, was the only composer of superior merit who helped to fill out this period of transition. His first production, and a successful one, was the Europe galante, an opera-ballet by La Motte two years later followed the Carnaval de Venise, a work of the same character. In 1700 he gave the theatre Hesione a piece in which Mlle. Clairon, of the French Comedy, afterwards performed the part of Venus. Tancrede, Iphigenie in Tauris, Téléphe, Camille and many ballets are the principal productions of the facile pen of Campra. His last opera was Achille and Déidamie, first performed Feb. 24, 1735. His style was elegant and graceful, but wanting in force and grandeur.

Destouches, born at Paris in 1672, was superintendent of the royal music and inspector-general of the opera for the period of thirty-six years. After his Issé he produced le Carnaval et la Folie, an opera ballet, which was often revived between 1703 and 1755, and several other works which did not keep the stage. His last dramatic production was entitled Les Stratagemes de l'Amour. As a composer he was not above the second rank. He made a voyage to Siam with the Abbé de Choisy, and died at the age of seventy-seven.

Mouret, a native of Avignon, son of a silk merchant, is the last musician of that period whom it is worth while for posterity to remember. Appointed superintendent of the music of the Duchess of Maine in 1707, he produced many operas and ballets, among them Les Fêtes de Thalie and Les Fêtes de Diane. His opera, Ariane, attracted notice. The death of the Duc de Maine having deprived him of these offices which he held and an income of 5,000 francs, he became insane and died at Charenton, Dec. 22, 1738.

For the sake of completeness, we mention also, Bourgeois, a counter-tenor singer, author of two ballets; Roger, author of Pyrrhus; Montclair, to whom we owe the opera, Jephté, and the introduction of the contra-bass into the French orchestra.

Meantime the Regent, who was a composer, had produced Pantheé, Jerusalem and Hypermetre; Tribou had succeeded the tenor Muraire; Chassé, an excellent barytone, had gained great applause for his fine voice and dramatic talent; Mlles. Le Maure, Petitpas and Pelissier disputed the palm of vocal art, while Dupré and Mlle. de Camargo reigned in the dance; when at last the illustrious Rameau of Dijon appeared upon the scene. Like so many great men he had struggled many years before succeeding in proving to the world his great powers. Already celebrated as organist and for his profound knowledge of musical theory, he desired to add to this double crown the laurels of the theatre. At the age of forty-four years, having never yet had a text entrusted to him for composition, he applied to the Abbé Pellegrin, who imparted to him, not without much hesitation, the poem Hippolyte et Aricie taking his note for 500 livres tournois. The first act was very soon composed and copied, and it was determined to rehearse it at the house of the Farmer-General, La Pouplinière, a Mécenas of the time. Pellegrin was present. Struck with the originality of the music, he fell upon the neck of Rameau, lavished his praises, and tearing the note in pieces, exclaimed, "Such a musician needs give no security." Oct. 1, 1733, Hippolyte et Aricie was performed at the Academie Royale and a violent opposition arose against this masterpiece. Its complete success was nevertheless not long delayed; it became very soon astonishing. Campra being asked by the Prince de Conti as to the real value of the work, replied, "Monseigneur, there is enough in this score to make ten operas: this man will eclipse us all." It was not long before the Academie and its friends were divided into two hostile camps, the Lullists and the Rameauists, as at a later date we shall find the parties of the Gluckists and Piccinists. Les Indes galantes performed August 23, 1735, proved to the public that Rameau understood the ballet as well as the opera. At length Castor and Pollux, given for the first time in 1737, established the glory of the new composer and made him absolute master of the stage until his death in 1764.

Les Fêtes d'Hébé, Dardanus, Les Fêtes de Polymanie, le Temple de la Gloire, Zaïs, Pygmalion, Les Fêtes d'Hymen et de l'Amour, Platée, opera buffa, Nais, a ballet, and Zoroastre, a grand opera in 5 acts, text by Cibusac, showed successively the wonderful flexibility of the genius of Rameau. La Guirlande and Aeanthe et Cephise were given in 1751, the same year in which the great composer celebrated at Versailles the birth of the Duc de Burgogne, Lysis et Delie, Daphnis et Egle, Les Surprises de l'Amour, ballets of Marmontel, Callé and Bernard were followed by the Paladins, the last work of a composer, now almost an octogenarian.

Rameau had perceived, during a journey to Milan, that it is melody alone, which gives life to dramatic musical works. Grand harmonist as he was, and he may perhaps justly be called the founder in France of the important science of harmony, he did not neglect the vocal parts, which, let us repeat, form the first foundations of a good opera. Instrumentation owes also to Rameau great progress. The overture to Hippolyte et Aricie, somewhat in the style of Handel, is far superior to the meagre symphonies of Lulli. The chorus, "Dieux vengeurs lancez le tonnerre!" the tempest which follows and the enharmonic trio of the Fates are movements of an energetic and striking effect. What more beautiful than the chorus in Castor and Pollux, "Que tout gemisse!" what more pathetic than the famous air, "Tristes apprêts, pâles flambeaux!" what more fresh and graceful than the minuet, "Dans ce doux asile!" The rhythm of his airs, the free and daring movements of his choruses, and the comparative richness of his instrumentation secure to Rameau a place in the highest rank of the musical art; his contemporaries gave him full recognition; and we, in our day, should confirm their judgment could we have one of his masterpieces reproduced with due care. To crown Rameau's success Louis XV. appointed him chamber composer, gave him a patent of nobility and bestowed upon him the grand cordon of St. Michael. But Rameau, independent almost to brutality, was enraged to find that he must pay the expenses at the chancellor's court of his patent of nobility, and exclaimed in a passion, "I purchase letters of nobility! Castor and Dardanus gave me them long since; I can use this money to far better advantage." As his refusal might become a cause of scandal they gave him the decoration; the patent of nobility lapsing for want of registry. He died at the age of eighty-two. In his honor the magistrates of his native town released him and his family from taxation forever.

During the reign of Rameau few remarkable works by others saw the light [in France.] We ought, however, to record the success of La serva Padrona by Pergolesi, in which La Tonelli and Manelli appeared in all the splendor of their fame, and of Daphnis et Alcimadura, a Languedoc opera, both words and music by Mondonville.

The Devin du Village, of J. J. Rousseau, appeared on the stage March 1, 1753. Castil-Blaze affirms the music to have been by a citizen of Lyons, named Granet. We do not take the responsibility of this assertion.

By this time the troop was almost entirely changed. Mlle. Chevalier had succeeded Mlle. Petitpas, Mlle. de Fel Mlle. Pelissier. Jeliotte, tenor singer and composer, had given a marvelous representation of the fine part of Castor; the ravishing Sophie Arnold, who made her first appearance Dec. 15, 1757, clothed in a magnificent lilac robe embroidered with silver, had shown the great expression of her touching voice in the important parts of Thelaine and Iphise. La Guimard had appeared in the ballet of which she very soon became the ornament, when suddenly, April 6, 1763, was destroyed by fire, the hall in the Palais Royal, built in 1637, by Lemercier, and which so often had resounded to the melodious strains of Lulli and Rameau. From Rameau to Gluck was a period of ten years, during which were produced Aline reine de Golconde, by Sedaine (text) and Monsigny (music); Sylvie by Lanjon, Berton and Trial; Ernelinde by Poinsinet and Philidor; Ismène et Ismenias, music by La Borde; Endymion, a ballet by the celebrated Gaëtan Vestris; and Sabinus, a work correct but cold of Chabanon and Gossee. All these works have but a secondary merit.

At length, April 19, 1774, Iphigenie en Aulide by the Chevalier Gluck made its first appearance in the new hall of the Palais Royal, which had been opened Jan. 26, 1770, with a beautiful revival of Rameau's Zoroastre.

At 5 1-2 P.M., the Dauphin and Dauphiness, the Count and Countess of Provence took their places in the royal box. The whole court, resplendent with pearls and diamonds, had preceded them. After the first recitative of Agamemnon (played by Larrinée an excellent barytone, formerly hairdresser of the opera, Marie Antoinette, the declared protectress of the new composer, gave the signal, and a thunder of applause interrupted both singer and orchestra, both equally astonished at the immense success. Eight operas written for theatres in Italy had placed Gluck at the head of the operatic composers of his day; two works written for London had not obtained the like success. The master had come to the conviction that all operatic music should be made to correspond to the situation which it was to express; the force of the rhythm and the accent of the words, was the basis of his new style.*

M. le Bailli du Rollet, an attaché of the embassy at Vienna had, to this end, transformed the Iphigenie of Racine into an opera, at the second performance of which the enthusiasm of the audience manifested itself still more strikingly than at the first. Madame de Barry, favorite mistress of Louis XV., was determined to continue her system of opposition to the Dauphiness, Marie Antoinette. With the assistance of the Neapolitan ambassador, she negotiated an engagement with Piccini, with the promise of 2000 crowns per annum if he would establish himself at Paris. Some three months after the death of Louis XV., Gluck's Orpheus was introduced and enchanted the Parisians. The chorus of the demons, and the admirable pathos, which characterizes the entreaties of the Spouse of Eurydice make a masterpiece of the second act, which will always remain one of the finest productions of human genius. Legros, and in our own times Delsarte as well as Madame Viardot have given this scene in a manner truly sublime.

* It may not be within the plan of M. Poiset to give an account of Gluck's history at Vienna—or will he ignore it? See the article Gluck in the New American Encyclopedia.

The Organ.*

TWELFTH STUDY. THE INFLUENCE OF FORM OR QUALITY OF TONE CONTINUED. THE FORM OF THE MOUTHS AND TONGUES OF THE PIPES.

Since the vibrations, which produce the sound in an organ pipe, depend for their character on that of the vibrating apparatus, the dimensions of this apparatus in all its parts must necessarily influence the quality of the tone. In the case of pipes with mouths, as distinguished from reed pipes, it is of the greatest importance, and most essential, to make the lips exactly parallel to one another, first, for their effect on the eye, then for their effect on the ear; for if the proportions of the mouth are destroyed, it is no longer possible so to train it as to get from it those effects which are proper to it, and which it is most desirable it should produce. A low mouth, one, that is, in which the lips are at no great distance from one another, will yield a feeble sound, but a cutting quality of tone. This is due to the quick rush of the wind, which, on first issuing from the throat † of the pipe, dashes headlong against the cutting edge of the upper lip, at the very outset of its flight, and at the top of its speed. In this case the upper lip has great hold upon the current of air on its first issuing from the throat of the pipe; but in proportion as the lips are removed to a greater distance from one another, the upper lip will have less hold upon this current, and the result will be a less cutting quality of tone. The higher, the more gaping a mouth is, the weaker also will be the sound emitted by it, and the quality of its tone will be then somewhat hollow and without much body, not wholly unlike the voice of a singer who opens his mouth too wide. From this defect his voice loses in vigor, and becomes dull. Perfection would seem to consist in a certain roundness of tone lying midway between the two extremes.

There is a measure for the length of the lips, which admits of no deviation, and this is, that they should be as long as the fourth part of the circumference of the pipe. But the height of the mouths, the distance—that is, from lip to lip—varies, as we have already seen, according to the nature of the stop; and the great variety of flue-pipes, open and stopped, especially in Germany, shows us how builders are able to make use of the greater or less distance of one lip from the other for the production of an almost infinite variety of qualities of tone, and even shades of the same. We also find in the scales or measures laid down by German and French builders, that the third or the fourth, and even two-sevenths of the length of the lips, is given for the height of the mouths of the open pipes, and that for stopped pipes, for the obvious reason that they are more dull in their sound, their mouths are opened almost to the half of the length of their lips. A difference, too, is made in determining the particular measures between the pipes of metal and those of wood, but this regards the builder only; all that it concerns us to notice is the influence that this or that particular kind of lip has upon the quality of the tone.

We have noticed the effect that follows from the lips being at a greater or less distance, when one is perpendicular to the other; we have next to consider the effect of their being at various distances in a diagonal direction. This diagonal distance has more effect, properly speaking, upon the speech of the pipe than upon the quality of its tone, though, as has been already shown, the quality of the tone does undoubtedly very closely depend upon the relative proportions of all the sound-producing parts of the pipe. We know very well that for the pipe to speak properly, or yield its true quality of tone, the air coming from the throat ought to be directed by the lower lip against the cutting edge of the upper lip. This upper lip is then made for this reason a little in arrear of the lower one, and it is the greater or less departure of the upper lip from the perpendicular line that falls between it and the lower lip which regulates the sound and quality of the tone. If the upper lip is either too much in front of the lower lip, or too much in arrear of it, the pipe will not speak at all, for the air in either case does not then get that sort of cut against the edge of the upper lip, which is absolutely necessary for it, in order that it may make the pipe speak. If this lip (the upper that is) is not far enough in arrear, within the pipe, the pipe will speak its octave; if, on the other hand, it is too far back, the pipe will be slow to speak, and in both these ways the quality of tone is very sensibly modified.

From what has been now said, it will be clear-

† This is perhaps more commonly called the wedge.

* From L'Orgue, sa Connaissance, son Administration, et son Jeu, by Joseph Regnier.

ly seen that the wind may be said to find the centre of its action in the mouth of the pipe. The lips are subject to a perpetual and not inconsiderable tremulous emotion, which would very soon change their form unless they were made thicker than the rest of the pipe, and that more especially about the base of the mouth. Some builders even, for the sake of greater solidity, edge the mouths of their open metal pipes with a thin plate of metal fixed at right angles to each extremity of the mouth. This they are obliged to do in the case of their stopped metal pipes, because otherwise they would not be able to tune them, the tuning of these pipes being effected either by pressing these plates of metal, or ears, as they are called, closer together, or by separating them further apart. After the lips, we have to consider that part of the vibrating apparatus which is called the language. This is a small piece of metal which, according as it is set at a greater or less distance from the lower lip, and according to the angle which it makes with it, has a most material influence on the character of the sound. Its edge, by almost meeting the lower lip, forms, with it, the throat of the pipe, and the more cutting this edge is, the more cutting also will be the quality of the tone. Its thickness is a matter of considerable importance, for if it were too thin it would yield to the pressure of the wind, and though it might not lose its hold, it would at least get out of place and lose its proper position exactly opposite the lower lip. Hence it is better to make it of tin than lead, because tin is less flexible and less easily oxidised by the air than lead. In thickness it should be about the third of the height of the mouth, and it should be inclined to the lower lip at an angle of about sixty degrees. It is quite as important for the language to be parallel to the lower lip as it is for the lips to be parallel the one to the other. Its office is to direct the current of air against the upper lip. If then the language is inclined at too great an angle to the lip, the air will be directed by it into the body of the pipe and not against the lip; if it is not inclined enough, the air will be directed by it wholly outside the pipe; if, again, the language is depressed on one side, and raised up on the other, it will no longer be of any use at all as a means for directing the current of air. Hence, the least movement in the language from its true position has great influence on the sound, and consequently on the quality of the tone, for if it is so inclined as to direct the air too much to the inside of the pipe, the quality of the tone will become dull and unmusical; if too much to the outside of the pipe, the quantity of the sound will not be so great in amount, and the quality of the tone will become hard and wanting in body. If the language is too near the lip, so as to form with it too narrow a throat, the pipe will not be supplied with a proper quantity of sound, and hence its quality of tone not being in proportion to its scale, will be wanting in sufficient body of sound; if the language, on the contrary, is too far removed from the lip, it will make the throat too large, and, in this case, the quantity of wind, which it will allow to escape, will be more than the vibrating apparatus requires for its proper action, and hence the quality of tone will again become not only unmusical, but also what is technically called windy. The same effect will be produced if there are too many of those teeth or notches, which it is necessary to make in the edge of the language in order that the pipe may speak with greater promptness. If these notches are only lightly marked it will not be difficult to obtain a biting quality of tone; if they are cut deep and near together, they will have a very considerable influence in diminishing the force of the air, because by their roughness they will put a hindrance in the way of its passing freely through the throat. In general, if the throat is too narrow, the pipe has great difficulty in speaking, but when it will speak well under such straitened circumstances, the quality of its tone will be much more clear and keen; when, on the contrary, this same aperture is only a little too wide, the sound and quality of tone will be somewhat more mellow, but the quality will lose something of its keenness, and be deficient both in steadiness and vigor.

In the reed pipes, the vibrating apparatus, the reed, that is, and all that is necessary for the proper sounding of the tongue, have no less an influence on the quality of their tone than that which is necessary for their speech in the pipes, of which we have been just speaking. Shortness in the reed † is the cause of sweetness and thinness in the quality, length in the same enables builders to put strong tongues, the tone of which will be equal in brightness to its strength. "It is remarkable," says Dom Bédos, "that reeds varying in length find favor with all the most skillful builders. . . . So made, they must of necessity yield sounds differing from one another in power, and each sound good in its kind. Without pretending to decide which system is best; whether, that is, it is better to use long or short reeds, I certainly think that short reeds are better for organs intended for small churches, because in their case the builder is obliged to voice them soft. Large reeds require to be voiced loud, and therefore they would have a very good effect in large churches."

The hardness of the tongues, attained by cold beating, and their thickness, are also an important element towards forming the quality of the tone of reed pipes. If the tongue is harder than it ought to be the quality will be also hard, poor and feeble if the tongue is also feeble. "If they are much beaten," says our author, "they must be smaller than if they are only moderately beaten, or not beaten at all. As in the flue pipes, it is necessary for the lips to be exactly parallel to one another and to the language, so also in the case both of striking reeds and free reeds, regularity of movement in the tongues, and an exact proportion between their length and thickness, are most essential elements towards purity and brightness in the quality of their tone." This observation, taken together with what has been said about the reed and its parts, the vibrations of which perform the same office as those of the column of air in the open or stopped flue pipes, makes it quite evident that if the smaller pipe of such stops yields a fine and thin quality of tone, the small tongues of reed pipes will yield also a quality of tone every way analogous to this. In fact, the quality depends on the mass of air made to vibrate, and the mass of air made to vibrate depends on the size of the tongue; the greater, then, the surface of the tongue striking the air, the greater, also, the column of air made to vibrate under its blows. From this follows a singular phenomenon, which science finds it more easy to attest than to account for, and this is, that though the length and thickness of the tongues act very powerfully upon the pitch of reed pipes, so as even to make it vary a note higher or lower, their breadth acts upon nothing but the quality of their tone. And hence it is certain, that, however much the breadth of the tongue is either increased or diminished, as long as the length and thickness of it remain the same, the number of the vibrations will remain the same also, and, consequently, that the note or pitch of the pipe will not vary. All the difference that will arise from this variation in the breadth either way will be, that narrowness in the tongue will yield the quality of tone of all the finer kinds of scales, and that breadth will yield that of all those scales which allow to the wind a fuller and more ample range, while an exact proportion between the parts will assure to them both roundness and vigor. In all these respects there is so great a correspondence between reed pipes and open or stopped flue pipes, that which is said of the one class may with equal propriety be said of the other.

† This is called the beak in German building manuals. A better term, as giving rise to less confusion.

Ferdinand Hiller on the Music of the Future.

FIRST LETTER.

(Continued from page 389.)

When Wagner, with daring strides, comes to speak of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the three pillars of instrumental music, he again puts forward, with exaggerated one-sidedness, the influence of "dance-melody" upon the wonderful productions of this kind of composition. It is not to be denied that many dance-poems and rhythms are at the bottom of these productions (for the dance, to which belongs the march, is that pure music which is most intimately connected with our most primitive life-utterances); it was not, however, only the other forms of art, such as the figures, &c., also mentioned by Wagner, but likewise the developed forms of vocal music, the employment of the orchestra in the lyric drama, and, finally, the free invention of the more considerable instrumental performers, which together constituted the base on which to raise a branch of art which is able, nowadays, to bring forth such an extraordinary effects.

These effects are appreciated by Wagner according to all their mysterious strength, and he expresses the opinion that the "conventional development of languages," which scarcely any longer furnish "purely human feeling" with the organ necessary for its expression, are, perhaps, the reason that this feeling in Beethoven's instrumental music opened itself, as it were, a new road by which it might uninterruptedly flow forth. We would pass over the question of languages—a very difficult one at the present day—did it not lead Wagner to a conclusion which cannot well be given otherwise than in his own words:—

"In the face of this irrefutable recognition," he exclaims, "there can henceforth be only two modes of development open to poetry: either an entire passing-over into the domain of the abstract, a pure combination of ideas and representation of the world by an explanation of the logical laws of the process of thinking—and this poetry does as philosophy—or intimate blending with music, but with that music whose endless power has been laid open to us by the Beethovenian symphony."

This is pretty nearly tantamount to a death sentence on poetry, for what poetry (?) does as philosophy is no longer poetry (or is not philosophy)—while if it is confined to the blending with music, it is altogether deprived of independence, and can no longer speak as a mental art, pure and free, to our mind. This assertion of Wagner's proceeds, however, so directly from the views which most peculiarly individualise him, that the present is the proper time to pass on to those passages of his Letter which he has dedicated to the inward, and although with very most brevity, to the outward course of his development.

I am acquainted with no great composer who did not feel, in his tenderest age, attracted, almost with the force of instinct, to music, and who did not, in his earliest youth, in one way or another, by singing, playing, or composing, manifest the musical capabilities with which he was gifted. It is a very important fact, if we would understand Wagner's individuality, that matters took a completely different course with him. Although he felt a certain taste for music, and was greatly fascinated by certain productions, especially by those of Weber, it was not till later, and then, too, through poetry, especially dramatic poetry, that he came to devote himself more carefully to the study of music. He had written a tragedy, for which he wished to compose music to be played between the acts, &c., and so he took lessons in harmony and thorough-bass. The taste for composing or playing music for its own sake alone had been denied his youth. He had never, with unceremonious ingenuously buried himself in the treasures of our instrumental compositions; purely musical thought, although, at first, seldom anything else than the reproduction of what has been learnt, played, or heard, never became a habit with him. From the very commencement, he beheld in music the companion, or, rather, perhaps, the higher interpreter of poetry, and moreover, of dramatic poetry, and as soon as he had learnt sufficient to achieve "technical independence," he set about composing the music for the librettos he had written.

When he had arrived thus far, he found much to annoy him in opera generally, as well as in the condition of the German operatic stage. It is a mournful truth, but we Germans possess no

German opera, although we have produced the greatest operatic composers. Whether it results from the still prevailing taste for what is foreign, or from the management, destitute of all national feeling, of our lyrical stage, such is the fact. A Mozart, a Beethoven, and a Weber produced half-a-dozen masterpieces; but an opera, built on a foundation of genuine patriotic thought and feeling, and developing itself full of life, such an opera as not Italy alone, but France also, possesses (in her Opera Comique), entirely fails us. Every author who writes an opera-book, and every composer who sets it to music, begins, if he does not borrow French or Italian forms, with the whole structure of the work, so to speak, from the very commencement. That, on this plan, a creation of great originality now and then is produced, is quite as undeniable as that such isolated creations do not suffice to form a decided taste, or, indeed, any taste at all, and that, in the confused medley offered them, the great mass of the public must be deprived of any point of support, and any opinion.

A man of passionately artistic nature, like Wagner, must have been affected by this state of things in a doubly disagreeable manner. As musical director at various theatres, he was placed in the very midst of all these miserable doings, and compelled to busy himself, down to the minutest details, with the flattest and most rapid trash. What he says on this head, will, as far as Germany is concerned, certainly meet with the most general assent. So many repulsive impressions did not, however, render him blind to isolated instances of what was beautiful; many of the works of Spontini and Weber, and especially, the performances of Mad. Schröder-Devrient, filled him with enthusiasm, and prevented him from losing sight of his ideal of a dramatic-musical work of art. Greek tragedy, in its religiously poetical magnificence, was present to his mind; but it is in vain that he seeks, at the present day, for an Athenian public. He has stated his views concerning the connection between politico-social and artistic matters, in a small work entitled Art and Revolution. We cannot well blame him for contenting himself, in the midst of imperial Paris, with this much, and not saying any more on this subject to his French friend.

To the attention paid by him to the Greek theatre, Wagner connects the ideas which led him to compose that one of his works which—by the title at least—is most generally known, namely, Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft. He sees the decadence of the Greek theatre principally in the endeavor of the various arts to be regarded as so many separate ones, instead of remaining united, and thus producing the greatest possible effect upon the stage. But was this union, to the extent Wagner attributes to it, ever found in Greek tragedy? Were the propylæa a theatre? Did Phidias work for Sophocles? Was not the magnificence of the Greek theatre merely one of the blossoms of the wonderful civilization of the Greeks? And did it not perish, because an eternal law ordains that even what is most beautiful springs into life but to die?

No matter! At all events, Wagner is indisputably right when he attributes to the connection of certain arts a most particular collective result; not only the past but the present is continually furnishing us with proofs that, from the earliest times, every one was of this opinion. We decorate profane and religious edifices with the works of painting and sculpture; we perform music in churches: and the most intimate connection of poetry with music has been, since the very commencement of civilization, felt to be requisite by man. Opera, too, although, according to Wagner's statement, bearing the same relation to his ideal, "as an ape to a human being"—opera, since its birth, has always kept in view this union of the arts in the connection of dramatic poetry with dancing, music, painting and architecture. Wherein, therefore, lies "the fundamental faultiness of operatic composition," in which Wagner does not find even "prepared" the ideal of such a dramatic work of art as the greatest minds have attempted to realize? It lies, in his opinion, in the magnificence of the drama (libretto) offered by the poet to the musician. The poet, he tells us, found certain fixed musical forms, with which he thought he must not interfere, ready to his hand, and their restrictive power restrained him from anything in the shape of a really important creation, while not permitting, as a rule, "really great poets" to have any connection with opera. "The ideal perfection of opera is dependent on a total change of the character of the poet's participation in the work of art." The poet himself, we are furthermore informed, must be finely conducted, by his endeavor to work more and more purely and immediately on the feelings, to the limits of his "branch of art," "and, therefore, that work must be considered by us as the poet's most successful one, which, in its last degree of completion, becomes wholly music." "The ideal subject," we are informed, "is to be found in the myth, and only the extraordinarily rich development, unknown to former centuries, to which music has attained in our day," can render possible the execution of the work of art. In this course of thought, which, however, is only implied, lie the strength and the weakness of Wagner's views.

FERDINAND HILLER.

Church Music in New York.

In the former article on "Church Music in New York," the author asks us to make the following corrections. For distinct toot tone, read sixteen, for introduction read intonation, and for base read ease.

Most of your readers are already aware that in the Roman Catholic Church, Music ranks even higher than symbolism as the primary attractive feature, around which all else is made to revolve; it is the pivot, the centre of attraction, and a large sum of money is annually expended by this church to secure in its service a high order of talent. But, in the Protestant Episcopal church, whilst it is more of a secondary consideration, it cannot be denied that the choral part of the service holds a very important place; and it is gratifying to all lovers of the good and beautiful in art to observe, that particular care has been bestowed upon this element of our worship, during the past few years, with a view to render it finished and artistic in its character.

One of the most noted churches of the latter denomination in New York, is Grace Church,—Rev. Dr. Taylor's—which is located on Broadway, near Tenth street. It is built of marble, in the Gothic style of architecture, and attracts universal attention from strangers visiting the city; externally, from the symmetry of its proportions and commanding position; internally from the eloquence of its distinguished Rector, and the attractive quality of its music, which is directed by the well-known organist, Mr. George Washburn Morgan—a native of Gloucester, England. The organ was built by Henry Erben; it formerly stood in Grace Church, Barclay street, and has occupied its present position about fourteen years. It is not an instrument of great power, but it is well proportioned to the size of the building, and is full, even toned and mellow in its diapasons. It is enclosed in a highly ornamental case, representing a model of the west front of Milan Cathedral. It has three ranks of keys and thirty-six stops. The pedals are arranged in a semi-circular, or rather oyster shell form, after a plan of Mr. Morgan's which has also been introduced into the organ of a church in Providence, R. I., and the Tabernacle in this city. It is a valuable invention, enabling the performer to sweep over the pedals with much greater ease than the method now in use.

The choir is a quartette, comprising the following talent: Soprano, Mrs. Badstein, (formerly Miss Julia Northall); Contralto, Miss Demorest; tenor, Mr. George Simpson; and bass Mr. J. Connor Smith. As these singers are well known to the musical public, we will not at this time enter into details of their characteristics, but content ourselves simply with saying that they are an ornament to the musical profession of the city. The style of music is less ecclesiastical, and more ornate than at the churches described in my last, and consists mainly of selections from the works of Beethoven, Mozart, et als, interspersed with original compositions of Mosenthal, King, and Mr. Morgan. To convey an idea of the capabilities of the choir, I annex a programme of the music sung on Sunday morning last: Opening voluntary, from Beethoven's second Symphony in D; Gloria, from Hauptman's mass; Jubilate, Morgan; Psalm 34th, King's collection; Hymn 96th, arranged by Edward Schermerhorn, Esq.; closing voluntary, Fugue in F, Hesse. A large number of listeners may be seen lingering in the aisles at the close of service each Sabbath, who remain until Mr. Morgan has finished the concluding voluntary; this is always very elaborate and in the morning consists of a fugue or some classical selection, whilst in the afternoon it usually partakes more of the light and popular style.

Mr. Morgan's playing was so admirably described by Willis, in the Home Journal, a few weeks since, that I have scarcely anything to add. A recent writer, speaking of his style, says it is founded on the teachings of the English school of sacred harmony, and he seldom indulges in the Italian morceau species. We are less reminded of the Trovatore, and more of the Creation, when hearing him play." Undoubtedly he has no superior in the world as a pedal performer, but few equal him manually.

The congregation of Calvary Church, Rev. Mr. Hawkes, corner of Fourth avenue and 22d street, is one of the most refined, intelligent and aristocratic in the city; the music, under the direction of Mr. J. Mosenthal, deserves particular notice. Mr. Mosenthal is known throughout the land as a most gifted artist and musician, besides being a composer of great ability. The music is rendered with as much taste and genuine artistic thoroughness of execution here, as at any other church in the city. The repertoire is extensive and varied, comprising adaptations from the masses, selections from the collections of Greatorex, King, etc., with original compositions of the organist. The choir is quartette; the soprano and alto parts are sustained by the two sisters, Misses Madeline and Mary Gellie, and the tenor and bass by Messrs. Cooke and Philip Mayer. The organ is a very good one, built by Stuart in 1847, containing 40 stops with three manuals. During the summer season, a vesper service is held at this church in lieu of the regular afternoon service, to which this merit, at least may be ascribed: that it is a great relief to both clergy and parishioners. We think that the example could be profitably followed by other churches, both in and out of New York. It consists simply of the reading and singing of the liturgy, without sermon, and with two or three additional pieces of music. The valuable musical resources and facilities of this choir give them every possible advantage for carrying such a service to a high state of perfection.

The music at St. Thomas's Church, Broadway, corner of Houston street, is worthy of a passing notice. Miss Hattie Andem is the leading soprano, whilst the other three singers composing the quartette choir of this church are amateurs. Mr. John F. Huntington, the organist, is a pupil of Dr. Hodges, of Trinity Church, and the music partakes largely of his style. Mr. Huntington is himself a composer of some repute, and occasionally introduces compositions of his own. On festival days, when the Church Committee leave everything to the judgment and management of the organist and director, the music is superior, and many are attracted thither for the express purpose of hearing it. The organ is a very good instrument, with 34 stops, built by Hall & Lorbagh.

In times past the choir at the Church of the Holy Communion (Rev. W. A. Muhlberg's in 6th Avenue, has been noted for its excellence; but, at present, does not rank so high as formerly. It is composed of sixteen boys, with six men, as at Trinity Church, divided into two equal portions, forming distinct choirs, who sing responsively; but, as many of those qualities which render famous the choir of Trinity, and give such grand effect to the music, are here entirely lacking, no comparison can be instituted to their relative merits. Mr. Fitzsimmons is organist, and Mr. Johnson leader and director of music.

There are other Episcopal churches in the city, of which the music deserves particular mention; they will furnish material for one more letter; after that, we propose to pass in review the choirs of leading churches of all other denominations.—Transcript.

The Messiah at St. Paul's Cathedral.

For the first time since its erection by Sir Christopher Wren, an oratorio has been heard in our magnificent metropolitan cathedral. The occasion, as our readers need hardly be informed, was in aid of the funds for the purchase of the large, and equally fine organ, which formerly did duty at the Panopticon—or Alhambra, as it is styled by the present proprietor. In addition to this, money is also wanted for the completion of the decorations now in progress; and the capitol chest being (according to official statements) at remarkably low ebb, an appeal to the general public, in the shape of a grand musical performance, was deemed the most fitting method of replenishing it, and thereby aiding the "good work."

The intention may be, and undoubtedly is, excellent; but whether the means adopted were the best for the end, may be a question for future consideration. At present, we can do little more than chronicle the event of yesterday (Friday), and must reserve detail until our next.

On the whole, the performance of the Messiah egregiously disappointed us, as we had expected, from the enormous size of the building and the immense height of the cupola, a somewhat similar result to that of the "festivals" at the Crystal Palace.

This was, however, far from being the case. We heard every note as distinctly as if it had been at Exeter or St. James's Hall. In more remote parts of the cathedral it might have been different. Those, for instance, who were ranged along the nave might have lost much of the effect of the solos; but still the fact is proved beyond dispute (and we speak with some experience of cathedrals and music-halls) that stone is unquestionably a better medium for the concentration of sound than glass and iron. The new organ—respecting the placing of which some curious information is afforded in the official programme—is fixed at the back of the south transept, the chorus and band extending to its boundary and junction with the nave; the body of the church immediately beneath the cupola being absorbed by the reserved seats, the southern transept also occupied by the audience, seats in the nave, extending to the western entrance, also completely filled, and some few persons in the choir—from four to five thousand forming the total present.

Mr. Goss, the accomplished organist of the cathedral, wielded the baton over the six hundred who composed the band and chorus; and, taken altogether, a more solemn and impressive rendering of the master-piece of Handel, which assuredly was "not for an age, but for all time," has never been heard in the metropolis. True that in some places, critically speaking, there was a tendency to retard the times, but with the present vivid impression on our minds, we are not disposed to take exceptions, and must rather speak in laudatory terms of the performance in its entirety. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, to whom was allotted the whole of the principal soprano music, sang charmingly, her particularly clear and distinct enunciation of the words being especially worthy of praise. The whole of the tenor part was given to Mr. Sims Reeves, who more than ever distinguished himself, being in remarkably fine voice, and infusing all the pathos, tenderness and energy of which he is so thorough a master, into his singing from first to last.—Musical World.

THE DUKE AND THE "FRIENDLY SINGERS"—The Duke of Saxo-Coburg has been honored by a distinction not often accorded to princes. In Vienna there is a singing club, which takes upon itself to reward the composers of good vocal music, by conferring upon them the greatest gift in the bestowal of the society. This consists of a letter of congratulation, accompanied by a ducat (a five florin gold piece), the club thinking too highly of the quality of its own applause to back it up by anything more than a mere symbol of approval. The Duke, who is a very active composer, has of late produced a new anthem for the German Fatherland, which the club in question has acknowledged in the usual manner. Letter, ducat, and all duly found their way to Coburg. To this extraordinary mark of merit, the brother of Prince Albert replied in an epistle too characteristic of its royal writer not to be given in extenso:

"Gentlemen,—My friendly singer's greeting in reply to yours. Permit me to express to you my agreeable surprise at the receipt of your letter and metallic accompaniment. If I ever entertained the depressing idea that it was the performance of a prince which caused general recognition of my national anthem, you have furnished me with a most conclusive and most gratifying proof to the contrary. By bestowing upon me the same mark of approval which you are in the habit of awarding to composers of every rank and degree, you have conferred upon me a greater distinction than by a pompous acknowledgment out of the usual course. Among all the memorials which I possess, or, with Divine assistance, hope to be able to deserve as a son of my country, your ducat will certainly not be the least prized. You, gentlemen, occupy an equally high place in my estimation by the genuine German confidence with which you have taken me for what I should like to be in reality—an equal among equals. As such I give you my hand with the sincerest respect, and ever remain yours truly.
ERNEST.
"Coburg, Dec 4."

Peeps Behind the Scenes.

MR. WISP AT THE OPERA.

He Goes upon the Stage—His Debut in the Ballo in Maschera—His Costume—Glimpses at Hineckley—Colson, Brignoli, &c.—Mr. Wisp's Singular Courage and Hardihood—The Disastrous Fall of Brignoli—End of the Op."

"Signor Muzio will introduce a grand gallop, composed expressly for the occasion, which will be danced by the corps of ballet amateurs and those patrons of the opera who may wish to be on the stage during the masquerade scene."

These words the reader will find in the daily advertisements of the opera company at present performing at our Academy of Music, and he has probably felt more or less of an inclination to join those "patrons of the opera" who may trip it on the light fantastic on the stage of our metropolitan opera-house.

Mr. Wisp experienced such an inclination. Though he had for ages attended the opera with undeviating regularity, and boasted that he had heard every opera and every singer in New York, for the last ten years, he had never penetrated the sacred mysteries of the footlights and side wings, and had only worshipped the operatic stars from afar off. It is, generally, by the way, the best to do so, as admiration frequently decreases in exact proportion to the approximation of the admirer to the admired object.

Mr. Wisp, on purchasing his ticket, after having made heroic but vain endeavors to get in as a dead-head, secured a check entitling him to admission behind the scenes during the last act of the "Ballo." Twenty of these checks are issued each night, and are quite insufficient to meet the demand for them. The way to get them is to apply at the box-office when you purchase your ticket, or else to make direct application to Mr. Grant, the general manager of the minutiae of operatic affairs under the present regime.

Mr. Wisp waited with considerable impatience for the end of the third act, while the nervousness incidental to a début prevented him from fully appreciating the presence even of Mr. Lincoln and the Prince of Rails, who were in one of the proscenium boxes, accompanied by sundry and divers western people. He could, however, observe that Mr. Lincoln is by no means familiar with operatic performances; that he has no very clear understanding about them, and that he is more ready to pick out the ludicrous incidents of the plot and action, than the beauties of the music. Mr. Wisp was also vastly disappointed to notice that the President elect retired before the best portions of the opera were performed.

MR. WISP GOES BEHIND THE SCENES.

After the laughing chorus was over Mr. Wisp left his seat, and going around the north lobby presented himself at the stage door, in company with about a dozen other people bent on the same errand.

A Cerberus, apparently a member of the chorus, dressed in seedy blue velvet and tinsel, stood at the door demanding checks of strangers, but admitting without hesitation everybody who either was or looked like an Italian singer—and as no American can ever assume the indescribable air of gentlemanly laziness peculiar to this select class of community, he had no difficulty in deciding at a glance.

Once past Cerberus, Mr. Wisp found himself one of a noisy, babbling crowd of persons of both sexes, dressed in the most diverse styles of costumes. There were lords and ladies, peasants, ballet dancers, prime donne, dominoes, devils, a bear, a harlequin and civilians. There were small boys and old men—military looking individuals with fierce moustaches, and by contrast a few meek looking women in flabby bonnets and shabby shawls. Through this motley crowd Mr. Wisp pushed his way, asking loudly for Bruschi.

THE OPERATIC COSTUMER.

Bruschi, it must be known, is the costumer of the establishment, and a slender, active little Italian, with a little black moustache and little black eyes. His command of the English language does not reach the fluency of a Chapin or a Beecher, but he is very obliging, and Mr. Wisp is under eternal obligations to him for the privilege of examining his treasures of costumes and masks, and selecting therefrom.

The room where Bruschi presides is the green-room. It is furnished with a few tables, a number of settees around the wall, a piano-forte and a triolodeon. Here the members of the chorus assemble between the acts, or when not wanted on the stage, and here the ballet dancers rehearse their steps before bounding before the footlights.

Mr. Wisp was soon too deeply absorbed in his own personal troubles to pay much attention to these objects and persons. He was distracted between the rival attractions of a blue muslin domino with a pink hood, and a yellow one with a green hood. Neither was he by any means indifferent to the charms of a white species of shirt, with white overalls, and an immensely high peaked sugar-loaf hat, with which dazzling costume a number of individuals were attiring themselves. After mature deliberation he decided in favor of a black domino, which he donned with considerable difficulty and the kind assistance of Signor Bruschi. The black domino and the black kid gloves he wore imparted to Mr. Wisp a sombre, not to say funereal aspect which he felicitously relieved by perching on his head a little blue velvet hat with a red feather.

Thus accoutred, Mr. Wisp surveyed himself in the large mirror with evident self-satisfaction, the hair, Signora Elena, the premiere danseuse, three blue dominoes, five individuals in the white peaked hats, Signor Susini in citizen's dress, three chorus ladies and divers other persons, taking the same opportunity to catch a glimpse of their reflected forms.

Just then Mr. Wisp bethought himself of the masks, and rushing frantically to Bruschi, demanded one. The obliging Signor presented such an array that the vacillating Wisp was again plunged into the profoundest perplexity. Here was a mask with a lopsided nose about six inches long; here one with huge bulging cheeks; here one with two noses; here one with a pug nose turned up as high as the forehead, and indeed in every instance the nasal organ was distorted in some very singular and incredible manner. Then there were black and brown masks and devil's faces. There were also those genteel little half-masks with lace depending therefrom. While Mr. Wisp was, however, giving the subject due reflection, and had for the moment turned his face from the collection of masks, the Philistines came and despoiled him; that is to say, a number of "patrons of the opera" presented themselves to the gentle Bruschi and quickly snapped up the false faces; so that when Mr. Wisp had decided in favor of a highly elevated pug nose, the masks were all gone.

The distress of Mr. Wisp at this discovery could be but feebly portrayed in words. He wandered disconsolate, like the old man in Rogers's "Geneva," looking for something he knew not what. Nor was his anguish assuaged by the fact that his companion, Bister Barritz, Esq., rejoiced in the possession of a mask with a nose that was trying to run around the left side of his cheek to his ear, and which certainly became him very well indeed, making him look more fascinating than ever he did before.

Pulling the hood of the domino over his head, Mr. Wisp set off on an exploring expedition. At the north side of the stage he found Brignoli's dressing room, neatly furnished, with a large mirror, on either side of which were two gas-burners, protected by wires, while a pair of lighted wax candles stood upon the dressing-table. Then there were scattered here and there ribbons, and trinkets and bits of finery which suggested the making of dolls for a fancy fair rather than the apartment of a respectable bachelor.

THE STARS.

In one place Mr. Wisp joined a group gathered around Miss Hineckley, who is quite as beautiful away from the footlights as when before them. Her dress of the page in the Ballo, which becomes her so admirably, was the theme of admiration, and the luxuriant hair which she disposes of in such fascinating curls is, good reader, real, and not of Celestin Dibblee's manufacture, unless Mr. Wisp is very much deceived. Sprightly in conversation, as well as prepossessing in appearance, Miss Hineckley will, it is to be feared, be spoiled by flattery before she has time to become a first-class prima donna.

Talking about first-class prime donne, there, by one of the wings, is that elegant creature Colson. She is so bewitchingly lady-like and fascinating as she stands there in the rich white watered silk robe, trimmed with down, which she wears in the last act of the Ballo, that Mr. Wisp feels as if he would give indefinite sums for the glove she is so gracefully drawing over her jewelled fingers. Pretty soon Susini heaves in sight and comes to anchor near Colson; other human barks shoot out from nooks and corners, and in a little while the prima donna is the centre of the admiring circle.

Adelaide Phillips, seated on a bench with a comfortable shawl drawn around her, is so amiable looking that Mr. Wisp is amazed to think that she was the Ulrica, the magical witch of the second act. Italian artists in swarms are attracted to her side, and the young men who are not (but whose rich fathers are) "patrons of the opera" hover around her, and are peacefully happy.

GETTING A MASK.

All this time they are singing on the stage; Ferri has finished his beautiful air with the harp accompaniment, and, with Coletti and Dubrenil, is engaged in that rather tedious trio. No one behind the scenes pays the slightest attention to them; and indeed it is curious that though so near in fact, the voices of the singers sent out into the vast auditorium can scarcely be heard here, and Mr. Wisp gnashed his teeth to think what large quantities of "glorious opera" he is losing. Suddenly he is addressed by a mysterious man who stands in the doorway of a little closet near the entrance to the stage:

"Wont a mask?"

Mr. Wisp does want a mask, and so the Mysterious Man gives him a bit of fragmentary evidence in the shape of a false face without any nose, with only one string, and with the left cheek gouged out.

Mr. Wisp mildly remonstrates. The Mysterious Man wants to know if nobody is to take the old masks. He thinks that perhaps Mr. Wisp would have them get new masks every night.

Mr. Wisp, rebuffed by this taunt, snatches up a characterless-looking mask, with a nose of only human dimensions, though certainly coming to a somewhat preternaturally sharp point. By the aid of pins and Bister Borritz's facile fingers the mask is adjusted, the blue hat with the red feather tipped jauntily on one side, the hood thrown over the back of the head, the muslin domino wrapped majestically around the form, and W. Peleg Wisp, Esq., stands prepared for his début in Italian opera.

* * * * *

MR. WISP MAKES HIS DEBUT.

The eventful moment has at last arrived! Mr. Wisp makes his début.

The whistle is sounded and he hurries behind the central scene. It is rolled slowly up, disclosing first the nose of the prompter, then the head of Muzio, the heads of the people in the parquette, the balcony, the first tier, the second, the amphitheatre and the rich and elaborate frescoed ceiling. What a gorgeous sight! Heads, lights, heads, lights, faces, gas jets, bonnets, flowers, handkerchiefs. Parquet parti-colored; balcony whiter, dress-circle very white and gorgeous; family circle dark and clerical; amphitheatre very dark, with a perspective of illimitable gloom. Such was the effect produced by the garments of the occupants of the different portions of the house.

Muzio gives the signal for the ballet, and off dash the dancers, while the chorus and the "patrons of the opera" and Mr. Wisp stands in long groups at one side. The "Prince of Rails," the son of the President-elect, is near by, in a quiet-looking domino. Next him is a venerable lady of the chorus; then the dandyish young son of a prominent Broadway clergyman; then two or three "supes" of Irish extraction, in seedy moth-eaten tights, and very dirty hands; then a ballet dancer with low-necked short dress; then some more "patrons of the opera," and "supes" and chorus-singers in abundance.

Peeping out from behind the scenes are artists—Susini, Stigelli, Carlotta Patti, Madame Strakosch, Miss Kellogg.

MR. WISP'S SENSATIONS—THE SCENE CLOSES.

Soon following the stream, Mr. Wisp begins to promenade down the side of the stage and across by the footlights and in front of the prompter. Though outwardly calm, he is inwardly perturbed. Supposing his mask should drop off! Supposing his domino should be pulled away in the crowd! Horrible suppositions!

Peeping through the eyelets in his mask he discerns his own unoccupied seats, and almost wishes he was back in them. He sees people staring persistently towards him with opera glasses, and hears the tramp of the ballet dancers rushing upon him. So he skurries to the other side of the stage just in time to avoid a collision with the two principal dancers, and seeks refuge behind a lady connected with the chorus.

This lady is not attenuated. Far from it. She is quietly dressed in scarlet and yellow, and so Mr. Wisp, in his black domino, is quite eclipsed by her. Reassured, in this hidden retreat, he ventures to loosen his mask, to take it off to pull his hood across his face, leaving space enough to look out, however. He then takes his opera-glass and coolly scans the audience. There is Snooks with a very pretty young lady. Who can she be? He recognizes Jenkins with his cousin. There is old Blobkins as sleepy as he can be, forced to go to the opera with his wife and daughters. There is Bunsby the historian, as solemn as a Sphinx. There is—ah! but here comes Colson, so perfectly queenly in that snowy white costume, and with the little black mask on her face. She is searching for her lover to warn him of the impending assassination. She looks for him among the chorus women; she searches for him vigorously in the vicinity of Mr. Wisp, and at last catches a sight of him on the opposite side of the stage. Then follows that remarkable duo in which the voice of the distracted woman is heard above, but does not interrupt the gay though not exuberant ball music. The conspirators approach, Ferri, Dubreuil and Colletti in their becoming blue dominoes. The duet continues. Mr. Wisp, who has been reading Mrs. Mowatt, is seized with a sudden dread lest some machinery will fall from the top somewhere and crush him when suddenly Ferri stabs Brignoli, who drops heavily on the sofa, breaking it, and making Miss Hinecky turn round to hide her laughter from the audience. But Colson, earnest and effective actress as she has become, maintains her identity with the part to the end, and does not betray if she feels any symptoms of mirth; and so the curtain falls, and in rapid succession the amphitheatre, and the family circle and dress circle, and the balcony and the par-quette, and Muzio's head and the prompter's nose, disappear. The opera is over, and the dead Brignoli revives, and immense buzzing and gabbling suddenly springs up, while Mr. Wisp doffs his domino and goes home a happier and wiser man.—New York Evening Post.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 9, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of "The Hymn of Praise," (Lobgesang), a Cantata by Mendelssohn.

Mr. Julius Eichberg's Soiree.

This concert, which took place Saturday, March 2nd, at the hall of Messrs. Chickering, was the musical event of the week for the lovers of classical chamber music. It was an unusual week for music-lovers, having ushered in the first of orchestral afternoon-concerts this year. And Mr. Eichberg's concert came in as an harmonious Finale. The attractions of the excellent programme, together with the well-known mastery of Mr. EICHBERG and the artists that assisted him, drew a crowded house, filling every seat and sending some persons into the ante-room.

1. Quintette, (No. 1, in C).....Mozart.
Moderato—Adagio—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro.
Messrs. Eichberg, C. Meisel, Th. Ryan, F. Zohler and Wulf Fries.
2. Die Capelle.....C. Krentzer.
Messrs. W. and C. Schraubstaedter, Langerfeldt and Jansen.
3. Chaconne, for Violin.....S. Bach.
(With the Piano accompaniment by Mendelssohn.)
Messrs. J. Eichberg and Otto Dresel.
4. Aria: "Che faro senza Euridice," from the opera Orpheus.....Gluck.
Mrs. J. Twichell Kempton.
5. Sonata, for Violin and Piano, in G, op. 30, No. 3.
Beethoven.
Messrs Otto Dresel and J. Eichberg.
6. { a Ich grüesse dich.....Haertel.
b Abendständchen.....Kreutzer.
Messrs. W. and C. Schraubstaedter, Langerfeldt and Jansen.
7. Ave Maria.....Schubert.
Mrs. J. Twichell Kempton.
8. Concert-Allegro for Violin.....Eichberg.
The Accompaniment by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, Messrs. C. Mayer and C. Friese.

We regret that Mr. Eichberg did give us too little, and, paradox as it may seem, we at the same time regret that he gave us too much. He gave us too little of the Quintette of Mozart. In looking at the Venns of Milo or at the famous Torso, we never can suppress the disagreeable feeling, resulting from the symmetry and harmony of these wonderful works being destroyed; it mars our enjoyment, however often we resolve to enjoy what is left. The same feeling we have, when hearing fragments, torsos of works of musical art. It was regretted by many persons around us that the Quintette was broken off after the second movement, some of them expecting to see the gentlemen come back after they had tuned their instruments. This regret was felt the more keenly as Mr. Eichberg's masterly first violin lent fresh charms to the beautiful work. When an artist unites perfect mastery over the mechanical with deep feeling and poetical conception of musical works, then the listener may give himself up to the beauties of the composition with unalloyed pleasure. It was therefore to be regretted that Mr. Eichberg gave us too little of the Quintette. As by shortening the programme the whole of it might have been played, it is to be regretted that he gave us too much of other good things. He was worthily seconded by the members of the Quintette Club. The efforts of the gentleman playing the first viola, though they came not up to Mr. Eichberg's masterly playing, are worthy of praise. Mr. Eichberg's playing of the Chaconne and the Beethoven Sonata with Mr. DRESEL gave perfect delight. The great difficulties of the first piece he overcame without any effort and both pieces were played with artistic mastery by the two artists. The last movement of the Beethoven Sonata, a perfect torrent of most intense enjoyment, was electrifying to the audience. It is hardly fair to be dissatisfied with the choice of this beautiful work, indeed we were very glad to hear it, and enjoyed it. Yet we have heard this sonata often while of Bach's violin sonatas one hardly hears any. But while we personally should have preferred a Bach Sonata, we doubt not that the Beethoven Sonata was more enjoyable to the audience. The Concert-Allegro, accompanied by Mr. CARL MAYER on the Piano, the CLUB, and Mr. FRIESE on the Double-bass, is a piece written in a noble style, with many happy touches, showing the thorough musician in every particular. The first motive is excellent, full of nerve and energy. As matters of taste we may say, that it seemed to us unnecessary for effect, to have laid the second melody in two octaves; and that the accelerando and Presto at the end as well as the entire treatment of the close of the piece seemed to us disproportionately grand. In general, however, the piece is very enjoyable, having a solid musical foundation, on which a skillful hand raised a structure satisfactory and pleasant to hear. Mr. Eichberg's playing in this and in the other pieces he performed was a new proof, if such were needed, of the gentleman being a thorough artist. There is so much soul in his tone, so much feeling that comes and goes to the heart, so nice a shading and phrasing in his performance, and so perfect a mastery over the mechanical difficulties of this most difficult of all instruments, except the human voice, that it is great pleasure to listen to his playing.

Mrs. JENNY TWICHELL KEMPTON gave great satisfaction to the audience by her two songs. She sang with much feeling and her sonorous voice made the wonted pleasant impression. A little less rubato in the Ave Maria, which she repeated in answer to the calls of the audience, would have improved it. But why change the close by going up to the Fifth instead of the Third before the last tone? The composer, who had good taste enough, knew what he intended to have when he wrote the piece. No one has a right to change his reading.

The singing of the ORPHEUS QUARTETTE CLUB was as well done as we are accustomed to hear these gentlemen, the flower of the Orpheus musical society. A slight deviation from perfect tune in the beginning was amply made up by the beauty of their singing. They did not escape an encore which they answered by the ever favorite "Walzer," by Vngl.

A very pleasant concert it was, and we wish we could hear Mr. Eichberg soon again. Such concerted pieces as the Beethoven Sonata, played by such artists as Messrs. Dresel and Eichberg, we hear much too little of in our concerts. This ought not to be. We have several artists that can play such works. It is a pity they do not oftener bring out such works of intrinsic value, in which the mechanical ability of the performer is not made the principal thing, as is the case in the majority of pieces for the violin, but where it is made use of as a means, more than which it is not, to give life and existence to the idea emanating from the mind of the composer.

We are under obligation to Mr. Eichberg and his assistants for the pleasure this concert gave us, and repeat the wish to hear him soon again. *†

Italian Opera.

With spring come the singers, and however unfrequent their visits may be during the winter months, we are always quite sure of a flying visit from the opera troupes, as the days grow longer and the evenings shorter. Not a few of our readers will rejoice to see the announcement of the Company of the associated artists, of a short season, (which we hope, may as heretofore, turn out to be a long one) of Italian opera at the Boston Academy. The list of associated artists embraces well known names—Colson, Adelaide Philipps, Brignoli, Stigelli, Susini, to mention no others of those well known, and several new aspirants for the good opinions of the Boston public, who have never yet been heard here, among whom are Miss Hineckley and Miss Kellogg, of whom our readers have heard something from New York.

The season opens with an old favorite opera Martha, in which Colson, Adelaide Phillipps, Brignoli and Susini appear. Then new operas are to follow. First Il Giuramento; not absolutely new to us, who can never forget the charming Truffi of past years, but to younger opera goers, quite unknown, and which will be a welcome addition to their operative knowledge. Then comes new and famous operas, Un Ballo in Maschera, the last work of Verdi. La Juive of Hailey, and last but not least in interest, the immortal Moses in Egypt of Rossini, which will revive pleasant memories of the first season of Italian opera in this city, when the now famous Tedesco, by her youthful beauty and her almost incomparable voice, so took us all by storm.

The programme for the season then, is a an exceedingly attractive one, and the scale of prices a reasonable one. We trust to see the theatre filled, and in spite of the season of Lent, which will prevent many from attending, we doubt not that crowded houses will reward the company, as it often has in past times, with a full treasury during the short season of opera promised us in this city.

Martha will be given on Monday evening next.

Orchestral Union.

The last afternoon concert was listened to by a crowded house, every seat of the Music Hall being occupied. The programme was an excellent one, the 5th Symphony of Beethoven being repeated by request, and very excellently played, as well perhaps as could be by the present force of the orchestra. We have said the concert was listened to by the audience, and are glad to say that this was literally true, as the audience was more quiet and attentive than afternoon audiences commonly are, and we are glad to be able to record improvement in this respect. We append the programme, and regret not to have heard the whole of it.

1. Overture, A Night before Granada.....Kreitzer.
2. Romanza, From Don Sebastian.....Donizetti.
Horn Obligato, by M. Hamanu.)
3. Symphony, No. 5. (C minor), (by request). Beethoven.
4. Overture, Don Giovanni.....Mozart.
5. Concert Waltz.....Strauss.
6. Eulogy of Tears.....Schubert.
7. Grand National Potpourri.

MOZART CLUB.—We would call attention of the members and associate members of this club to the advertisement of the next entertainment of the Club which will take place at the Mercantile Hall Summer street.

The last Saturday Evening concert of the Mendelssohn Club takes place this evening. Spohr's Nonetto will be repeated. The programme will be found in another column.

On Saturday evening next the Orpheus, we understand, will repeat the "Bards," with orchestral accompaniment.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 4.—My last letter ended with a mere notice of Madame Abel's Soirée and a promise to give you this week a more detailed account of it which it merited. It was a very fine concert, with the only drawback, as I have heard several persons say, "that there was not enough of it." Madame Abel proved that her long retirement from the public has been used to good advantage, in spite of illness and other obstacles to progress. She never played better than on this evening, and, I am happy to say, appeared entirely free from the nervousness which heretofore has so often prevented her from doing herself justice. She was assisted by Messrs. Bergner and Centmeri. With the former she opened the concert by playing Chopin's Polonaise for the piano and 'cello, a brilliant and effective composition, but hardly characteristic of its author. In the second part these two also played Gounod's Meditation on Bach's first Prelude, which, however, is not as well adopted for the violoncello as for the violin. Madame Abel's Solo pieces were the magnificent first movement of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 53, Chopin's Polonaise in C sharp minor, an Etude on the Barcarole of Weber, by Stamatz. The latter is the only one of these three which is not well known to most of your readers. It is a charming moreau, like the whole set of Etudes on Themes from Weber's Oberon, from which it is taken. I need not say that Mad. Abel did ample justice in every way to all the characteristics of these totally dissimilar pieces.

Mr. Bergner played a Pièce de Salon, by Strausky, exceedingly well; it consisted of variations on the Sounds from Home, or a similar theme, and was better than most arrangements of the kind.

Sig. Centmeri, who has been quietly working his way into the public favor for a few years past, has a fine baritone voice and an excellent school. He was rather hoarse on this occasion, but still sang a Romanza from Maria Padilla, and an Aria from Le Pardon de Floërmel very acceptably. It is to be hoped that the success of this Soirée will tempt Madame Abel to give us another treat of the same kind before long.

Last Tuesday Mason and Thomas gave another Soirée, which was, however, not quite as interesting as a whole as some of its predecessors. It opened with a trio in G. minor by Schumann, a work very difficult to understand, and acknowledged to be one of his weakest compositions of the kind. This was followed by a solo from Mr. Bergner, the same which he played at Mad. Abel's Soirée, which however suitable it might have been for a miscellaneous concert, was entirely out of place in one of these Classical Soirées. Those who attend the latter, come with the expectation of hearing none but really classical music, or at least such as from its more elevated character and style can be brought under that head. Mr. Mason's Solos, for instance, though not laying claim to any great profundity, were totally different from from this mere show-piece. They were a couple of little Reveries, "Au Matin" and "Au Soir," of which the first was particularly pleasing and graceful, and a Valse-Caprice much after the manner of Chopin, although not enough so to lose its originality. Mr. Mason is very happy in his piano-compositions; they are always attractive, and of infinitely more sterling value than most works of our young composers, which, unfortunately, is not saying much after all. The last piece on the programme was Beethoven's Quartette in F, Op. 59, No. 7.

This stupendous work though a marvellous piece of instrumentation, is almost beyond the limits of a string quartette, and requires the most elevated mood and perfect mental and physical freshness in both players and listeners to be perfectly rendered and fully appreciated. These requisites were a little wanting on Tuesday night, and the impression was not quite what it might have been. Still, one received enough to carry home a sense of very deep enjoyment of the beauty and awe at the grandure of the composition, together with a longing to hear it again before this impression should have died away entirely.

Mr. Satter made quite a successful move in giving a Matinée last Thursday. Dodworth's pretty room was crowded, mostly with ladies. There were hardly twenty gentlemen in the room. The pianist seemed in his element, and for the greater appreciation of his powers (by eye and by ear) had his instrument placed in the middle of the room, so that the play of his nimble fingers could be more generally watched. I subjoin the programme.

1. Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
2. Sonata, A flat, Op. 26.....Beethoven a Andante con Variazioni. b Minuetto.
c Marcia funebre. d Finale.
3. a Impromptu.....Chopin
b "Tennessee," (Mazourka.).....Götschalk
c "La Voix du Coeur," (Poesie).....Satter
4. Overture, "Tannhauser,".....R. Wagner

The first and last numbers are well known, and who has not admired Mr. Satter's reproduction of these overtures? His rendering of the Sonata was perfect, technically so, of course, but also in the spirit of it. So too with Chopin's Impromptu, which I have never before heard played satisfactorily, and which seemed only too short. At the request of several ladies, the pianist interpreted an improvisation on Italian airs, which created new astonishment at his powers in this direction. He gives another Matinée next Friday, which is to be hoped will be as successful as the first. —t—

ST. LOUIS, FEB., 1861.—We wish all those who are opposed to teaching music in our schools could have heard the thousand children in the Library Hall, Friday evening, the 22d. They would have been forced to admit that, at least, the children improve their opportunities and really sang very well. The audience loudly cheered and encored the Union.

We had two fine concerts given by the Swiss Bell Ringers, a band of this city. As good a concert on the bells as I ever heard.

Monday evening the 25th, our Philharmonic Society gave another concert.

- PART I
1. Overture, "Titus,"W. A. Mozart
 2. Chorus, "How bright and fair," from "Guillaume Tell,"G. Rossini
 3. Aria, (Tenor), "This image is enchanting fair," from "Zauberflöte,"W. A. Mozart
 4. Concertante, (first part) four violins.....L. Maurer
 5. Terzetto, "Ferna Crudele," from "Eroani,"G. Verdi
- PART II.
1. Overture, "Oberon,"C. M. von Weber
 2. Recitative and Aria, (Soprano) "Ah! perfido!"
L. van Beethoven
 2. Andante, from "5th Symphony,"L. van Beethoven
 4. Aria (Baritone), "Lonely in distant land" from "Nabucco,"G. Verdi
 5. Grand March and Chorus, from "Tannhauser,"
R. Wagner

The Andante from the symphony in the second part and the Concertante for four violins pleased me most. The last chorus was very fine. I do not know what guided them in their selection of soloists, without it was the principle of "give each one his turn."

The orchestra now is very fine indeed — and the chorus members 170. The audience numbered 2,500, and everything seems marching along to success.

As my signature of A. C. leads many unjustly to blame my friend Catherwood, I will in future sign my real name. B.

A NEW CANTATA.—"Holyrood" is the title of a new work of Messrs. H. F. Chorley and Henry Leslie and was produced (Feb. 1) at St. James' Hall. The Musical World gives an abstract of the plot and sums up the matter thus:

Holyrood is, we think, his best lyric production. The four characters — the Queen, Mary Beatoun, Rizzio, and Knox (soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass)—are skilfully proportioned out, and happily contrasted with a view to musical treatment, and had the prophecy of Mary's crimes and fate, which is wholly repulsive to the unexciting (but by no means uninteresting) character of the rest; been omitted there would be little fault to find. In selecting the period of Mary's innocent life, Mr. Chorley would, we suggest, have done more wisely, and carried out the ends of poetry more legitimately, had he abstained from all hint of the terrible future, and confined the part of John Knox within the limits furnished by history. We should then have had an unsullied picture, and a far more agreeable one, while the composer would have been saddled with a task from which (with the context in view) Meyerbeer himself would have recoiled.

Mr. Henry Leslie, too, in the music of Holyrood, has written what, in our opinion, if not his most ambitious, is in a great measure decidedly his most genial and spontaneous. As a mere composition, there is very little in the work against which criticism could take exception; while in expression it is invariably unaffected and real, only falling short at that one incident which, as we have already said, had better be left out. He has treated the situation where the Queen's revels are interrupted by the Puritan singers admirably, adding both force and solemnity to the repetition of the psalm-tune (a very good one), enriching the accompaniment (so called "moving bass")—which at first (like the tune itself) is in unison — with harmony. His dance-music in both instances is excellent; the minnet (with its pretty vocal trio, "Fal, la, la") being as sober and stately as the quick step; appropriately ushered in by an imaginary bagpipe and introducing, as in duty bound, those "consecutive fifths" recognized as a traditional inheritance of Scottish dance-music, is bustling and lively. The whole of this scene, indeed, to make use of an old phrase, is "musick'd" with an unflinching spirit. The three songs, too, have each their individual merit and marked character. The pretty ballad of Mary Beaton, "There was once a maiden," would, however, be just as acceptable without the melodic jerk at the end of each verse, which does not render it a bit more Scotch, or a bit more engaging. Rizzio's canzonet, "Colla stagion novella" (words by L. Carrer), is on a larger plan, and naturally of a more refined character. It consists of a graceful slow movement and vigorous allegro, evidently modelled on the Italian manner, though (in the case of the first especially) rather modern Italian than what may be supposed to have been Italian in the time of Rizzio. But best of all is Mary's French ditty, "In my pleasant land of France," in which are most effectively alternated a plaintive minor theme, and a melody waltz time, ending in the major, the whole set off with a gay and brilliant peroration (codu). The duet for the Queen and Knox, "E'en if each should wholly fail me," a sequel to the incident of the prophecy, is vocal, melodious, and impressive, a grateful relief, moreover, to the gloomy matter that precedes it. The recitative, solo or in dialogue, are everywhere well composed, and show Mr. Leslie an adept in the art of putting vocal declamation to music. Equally worthy of praise are the choruses, whether the short and in some degree fragmentary ones, "Will she not listen?" and "Hark! 'tis her foot," the unison psalm-tune of the Puritans, already named, or the more extended pieces which commence and terminate the work—"The mavis carols in the shaw," and "Hence, with evil omen," the first (in three divisions, with solo for contralto, after the Scotch manner) tuneful and eminently pastoral at the outset, expanding in vigorous treatment and interest with the allusions to the Queen, the last appropriately jubilant and lively throughout, both (like all the rest of the cantata, by the way) instrumented for the orchestra with unvarying skill and proportionate effect.

PRINCE GALITZIN'S CONCERTS.—The Concert recently held by Prince George Galitzin in St. James's Hall, was one of remarkable and varied excellence. A first-rate band, led by that practised English violinist, Mr. Willy; a chorus, exclusively of amateurs, giving the music set down for them as perfectly as though they had been a body of expert professors; and solo singers, thoroughly up to their work, constituted the executive force. The programme had the double merit of being excellent in itself and almost entirely new; and this, combined with the unquestionable talent of Prince Galitzin, whether regarded in the light of composer or conductor, stamped the whole entertainment as one of genuine and uncommon interest.

A large part of the selection consisted of Russian music. Prince Galitzin had already afforded the English public an opportunity of estimating the pure national genius of Bortnianski at its proper value. No. 7 of the Cherubini's Songs was heard with unequivocal satisfaction in June, 1860; and on Wednesday night No. 6 ("Adoramus"), from the same original and striking series, justified all the praises lavished on its companion. The music of the Russian church more than three quarters of a century ago elicited the lively sympathy of foreigners. From Sarti, Cimarosa, Galuppi, and Paisiello—the four most renowned Italians who, by munificent offers, were persuaded to visit and compose for the Russian capital—to Boieldieu, "the French Mozart," as he has been not unfairly styled, and who wrote several operas for the Russian stage, we hear nothing but eulogistic allusions to its simplicity and grandeur. Of all the Russian composers for the church, Bortnianski was the most justly eminent. Although a serf in the Ukraine, he had a generous master, who, struck with his early aptitude, sent him to Rome to study under Galuppi; and not the least merit in Bortnianski was, that after his return from Italy, when appointed chorus-master to the Imperial Chapel, he rendered himself famous by the production of music as unlike that of Galuppi as possible. But this same Bortnianski possessed undoubted genius; and it is a fair question whether, if Galuppi had gone to Russia, to practice with Bortnianski, instead of Bortnianski going to Italy to practise with Galuppi, there would have been much difference in the end. The music of the Russian has an earnestness to which that of the somewhat trivial and (not quite undeservedly) forgotten Italian can lay no pretension. Another Russian composer was brought forward on Wednesday night by Prince Galitzin. We allude to Lamakin, whose works, though for the most part existing in manuscript, are highly esteemed, and, as the well-written and extremely interesting comments on the programme remind us, marked "by a simple and devotional character rarely obtained except by the greatest masters." The chorus of Lamakin presented on this occasion illustrates one of the most solemn incidents of High Mass, and is a very favorable specimen of his manner. The most striking features of Prince Galitzin's proconcert, nevertheless, were the vocal and instrumental selections from Glinka, who, as a musical composer, is to Russia what Mozart is to Germany, Rossini to Italy, Auber to France, Gomes to Spain, and Bishop to England. Glinka is not only the greatest genius of Russia, but universally accepted as the national composer of that country. Of his opera, Life of the Czar, we have spoken more than once, and we were positively charmed with the air, "Wittern Wahrheit," introduced for the first time on the present occasion, and well suited to the magnificent bass voice and energetic delivery of Herr Joseph Hermanns, whose impersonation of the Comendatore at her Majesty's Theatre made so great an impression in the summer. A "Persian chorus"—so called, the melody being pronounced of Persian origin—afforded some idea of Glinka's second opera, Lousslan and Loudmila, which many connoisseurs even go so far as to prefer to his Life for the Czar. Into this question it is not necessary to enter, but if all the rest of Rouslan and Loudmila equals the "Persian chorus," it must be a work of a high and imaginative class. The chorus is for women's voices, and the ladies of the choir may be fairly complimented for the unexceptionable style in which it was given. Not satisfied with presenting his favorite as an operatic composer, Prince Galitzin enriched his programme with a "page" from Glinka's instrumental works, in shape of a scherzo for orchestra, entitled Kamarinskaia. This, in its way, as genuine a masterpiece as could be heard, is founded on two national melodies, the one a popular air frequently sung at betrothals, the other an ancient Russian dance-tune. The orchestration is as fanciful as the themes are graceful, piquant, and suggestive, and the conduct of the entire movement just as ingenious. It was played by the band to absolute perfection, enthusiastically redemanded, and repeated. A brighter example of Glinka's skill and invention as a composer for the orchestra could hardly have been picked out, although, as doubtless, in forthcoming concerts, Prince Galitzin will make the English public aware, that some of the great Russian musician's so called "fantasia-overtures" are well worth an attentive hearing. A "selection" from the first act of Life for the Czar—in which (after the manner of the late M. Jullien's pot-pourris) several of the most striking themes and musical situations are interweaved—and a vocal trio, called "Les quatre soupirs" (sung, and well sung, by Miss Susannah Cole, Miss Lascelles and Mr. Henry,) were the other specimens from Glinka. The "selection," arranged for the orchestra with masterly skill by Prince Galitzin, was splendidly executed, the solos (for flute, oboe, cornet and ophicleide) by Messrs. Pratten, Lavigne, Levv, and Hughes, being warmly and repeatedly applauded.

Some pieces of Prince Galitzin's own composition afforded unequivocal pleasure, and among these may especially be named the Chanson Bohemienne, with solos for contralto voice and oboe (Miss Lascelles and M. Lavigne), the melody of which strongly recalls the principal theme in the passionate last movement of Beethoven's quartette in A minor; a delicious polka entitled Lelia, as short and concise as it is sparkling; and the Russian Quadrille, founded on the national airs, "Santze na zakate" ("The sun is setting,"), "Mnie markatno molodienci," &c.; the last and most vigorous of which Glinka's own Russian hymn, introduced at the end of his Life for the Czar, excited the utmost enthusiasm and was unanimously encored. A more effective and brilliant production of its class than this Russian Quadrille has not been heard for years, nor could a finer performance have been desired, even by the composer himself.

Last, not least (to end with the beginning), the concert opened with Beethoven's grand and truly superb overture in C major (Op. 124), prepared for the inauguration of the Josephstadt Theatre at Vienna, on the occasion of the Emperor of Austria's fête (1822). This overture was dedicated by Beethoven himself to Prince Nicholas Galitzin (Prince George Galitzin's father); to whom also were inscribed, and for whom were expressly composed, the three renowned quartets ("Posthumous," as they have been incorrectly styled) in E flat, B flat, and A minor, Op. 127, 130 and 132. The execution of the overture, under the Prince's direction, was quite worthy its transcendent merits, and inaugurated with appropriate "pomp and circumstance" an entertainment which must have interested and thoroughly satisfied every amateur present. Prince George Galitzin cannot be too highly praised for his manner of conducting, which is at once clear, emphatic, and thoroughly musician-like. He takes rank, in short, with the ablest orchestral directors of the day.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Santa Lucia. Concert-Rondo for a Mezzo Soprano voice. C. Braga. 40

The melody which forms the theme of this brilliant Aria is a charming Neapolitan chansonette, or street-song, as it were, somewhat resembling the well-known song of the Duke in "Rigoletto." Around this air the arranger has thrown a cluster of beautiful variations. Mad. Borghi-Mamo, of the Paris Italian opera, first introduced it in the "Barber of Seville," and it has now entirely superseded in Europe the Ricci and Venozano Waltz and similar Bravura pieces of the concert-room. A fine English version is added to the Italian text.

Market Chorus. (Acorrete giovinette.) From "Martha." 25

Printed from the plates of Ditson & Co.'s edition of Standard Operas for the convenience of Singing Societies and Classes. The music embraces the whole of the celebrated market-scene to the appearance of Martha.

O Charlemagne. (O sommo Carlo). From "Ernani." 25

The celebrated Finale of the third Act, one of the finest ensemble-pieces in the whole range of Italian Opera. This is exactly as sung in the Opera, got up in this cheap form for the benefit of Societies which use a large number of copies.

Hail to the Lord. Sacred Quintet. D. B. Worley. 25

Available for church-service. Quite pleasing and not difficult.

The Lark and the poet. Mrs. L. A. Denton. 25

A charming song, and must prove a great favorite. It is the production of a very talented lady, a much respected teacher and vocalist in Buffalo. Her compositions are all of high order and give evidence of the true artist.

I sing, I sing of a wondrous thing. S. Glover. 25

A little pleasing Song, quite delightful for singing people who are neither too young nor too old.

Father Molloy. As sung by Henri Drayton in his Parlor Operas. 25

All those who have visited the charming entertainments of Mr. and Mrs. Drayton during their sojourn in this country will recollect this gem of a comic Song, which was introduced in the operetta "Diamond cut diamond." It is capable of being made very effective, as Mr. Drayton has amply proved.

Books.

THE PARLOR GLEE BOOK. Containing all the Principal Songs and Choruses, performed by "Ordway's Æolians." 1,00

One of the most attractive music books of the season. It contains a large number of choice and popular pieces, most of which have been rapturously encored by large audiences in this and other cities. Its elegant appearance and its charming contents render it a very desirable acquisition to every young lady's collection of favorites—an ornamental and useful accompaniment to the pianoforte.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 467.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 24.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

IX. (Continued.)

OPERA.

1700—1800.

At this epoch the harpsichord used in the orchestra for accompaniment gave place to the harp. Three personages only figure in Orpheus; Orpheus, Eurydice, and Amor (Cupid), Legros and Mles. Arnould and Rosalie represented them. The dance (pas de trois) executed towards the end of the piece, by Vestris, Gardel and Mlle. Heinel, was regarded as a prodigy in its kind. "Now that I have enjoyed so much in two hours, I conceive that life may be good for something," said Rousseau as he left the theatre at the close of the first representation. Abbé Arnaud, after listening to the air of Agamemnon, "Au faite des grandeurs," in the first act of Iphigénie, said, "With that air one might found a religion!"

Louis XVI. abolished, as contrary to good morals, the article in the rules of the Académie, which destroyed at the doors of the Opera the authority of father, mother, and spouse. Until that time it had been sufficient for a wife or daughter to be inscribed upon the books of the theatre, even if no proof of talent had been exhibited, to make her perfectly free and independent in all her actions.

April 23, 1776, Alceste, by Gluck, played by Mlle. Levasseur, afterwards by Mlle. Laguerre, was produced upon our first lyric stage. The first two acts were generally applauded, the third appeared monotonous. Gluck made some changes in it, but said that his music would, by and bye, find full recognition if not immediately. And in fact, before the end of the year, the Alceste, better understood, took its place beside the Iphigénie and Orpheus.

A mystery had been made of the engagement of Piccini. Le Bailli du Rollet made it known to Gluck in a letter dated Jan. 15, 1777. The composer was at the time in Vienna engaged upon the score of his Armida. He showed some temper upon learning that the Roland of Marmontel had been entrusted to his antagonist; for he had already begun another Roland upon the text by Quinauet. The engagement of Piccini led him to abandon the work. He said, however "If the Roland of Piccini succeeds, I shall take it up again." From that time the contest raged; pamphlets inundated the green-room of the theatre; the newspapers were filled with epigrams, bonmots and even abuse. Suard, Arnaut, Coquean, du Rollet led the Gluckists; Marmontel, Laharpe, Ginguené and d'Alembert the other party.

The musical public was in the height of its excitement when Armide appeared upon the scene (Sept. 23, 1777) and gained but a doubtful success. The Lullists now demanded the reproduction of the music of that master, and organized the next day a powerful opposition to a second representation of the new work. Gluck wished them to give Lulli's Armide immediately; but they would do nothing of the kind and the great master was forced to go to Versailles to petition the (now) queen, Marie Antoinette, to come again to his protection. She acceded to his wishes; the blow was warded off; the presence of the queen prevented the hissings intended.

Gluck was by nature intriguing, jealous and very self-interested [?]. He caused the performances of Sacchini's Olympiade to be suspended, and afterward arrested the performances of the same work upon the stage of the Italian Comedy. All Paris revolted at these manœuvres; they brought great disfavor upon the German musician, whom the French nation had loaded with honor and rewards. Gluck revenged himself by treating the music of Rameau with little favor. There was in fact much resemblance between the two masters. Both sought truth of declamation. Gluck, who was a great student of Homer, had perhaps penetrated more deeply into the spirit of the antique and attained to greater breadth in his recitative; but after all, he did but continue the development of the dramatic and lyric school of the great French master, whom he did not surpass in the qualities of grace and delicacy.*

The Roland of Piccini came upon the stage Jan. 27, 1778. Notwithstanding many faults of execution, the public received the work with marked favor. The queen was present but did not applaud. Still Piccini was taken to his home in triumph. The charms of its melody made a lively impression, and although the opera offered but one really fine scene, that in which the wrath of Charlemagne's nephew is contrasted with the naïve and tranquil joy of the shepherds who witness the loves of Angelique and Medor — the success of the Italian maestro almost balanced that of the German meister. Gluck now dreamed only of crushing his rival, and this he effected by the representation of his Iphigénie en Tauride, which took victorious possession of the theatre, May 18, 1779. While the musical war was at its height, Berton, director of the opera, undertook to restore peace, by making friends of the two chiefs, whom he invited to meet each other at a grand supper. Gluck and Piccini embraced and took places at the table side by side. During the dessert, Gluck, exhilarated with wine, said to his neighbor, loud enough to be heard by the others; "My dear friend, the French are good people but they make me laugh; they wish us to give them song, and they do not know how to sing. You are a man celebrated through all Europe; and you think that to sustain your glory, you have but to write beautiful music, and to reach higher perfection in art. Believe me, one should think of making money here, and of nothing else."

* That Gluck was deeply impressed by the strong character of Rameau's music and by its novelty, no student of universal history will deny. But oh, M. Poiset, do you make Gluck a mere developer of his school? and if so, are you right?

Piccini replied that Gluck's example proved that one might labor at the same time both for glory and for time. They parted with demonstrations of friendship, which seemed sincere; but the war of which they were the subject continued none the less.

Devismes, the new director, who gave to the theatre an activity until then unknown (in Paris), brought out at the opera the best Italian works of Paisiello, Anfossi, Sacchini and Traetta; † he desired also to bring about a match between Gluck and Piccini by giving them the same subject. He therefore gave to each a different text, with the same title, Iphigénie en Tauride.

Gluck in the savage drama, which had fallen to him, found scenes analogous to his energy of style, to his vast power of expression. Piccini, on the contrary, found in his text, badly constructed as it was, an interest more tender, and one which inspired him with a music of a touching character. However, after the vigorous impression of his rival's opera, the softer emotions produced by the work of Piccini, following too the other, seemed feeble and trifling.

How was it possible, in fact, to struggle against the air of Thoas, de noirs pressentiments, or against the choruses and dances of the Scythians, preceding the sublime dream of Iphigenia! What could be opposed to the admirable parts of Orestes and Pylades, to the choruses so full of religious feeling, and to the instrumentation so vigorous, so full of fire and soul! At the last rehearsal of this masterpiece of Gluck, a young man stole into the back of a dark and empty box. Burning with the desire to witness the first public performance of a work, which had stupified him with admiration, he had decided to pass the night in the theatre and go without food or drink all the next day.

An inspector making his rounds found the intruder and took him to Pierre Gardel, the dancer. He proved to be a young musician, and his name was — Mehul. He confessed ingenuously that he had endeavored to conceal himself in the theatre, because his purse was too empty to allow him to purchase a ticket. Gardel, touched by the circumstance besought him to accept a ticket, and this was the foundation of a firm friendship between the two artists. The dancer afterwards presented Mehul to Gluck; the young man became a pupil of the great master and in process of time rose to be his worthy competitor and successor.

For the Iphigénie in Tauride Gluck received not only the 12,000 livres previously stipulated, but 4,000 as a "gratification."

Emboldened by this unexpected profit he demanded 20,000 livres for his score of Echo et Narcisse. After long discussion, 10,000 was accepted. But even at this price the speculation proved unfortunate for the manager. Four months only after the recent triumph Gluck received a rude check. Echo et Narcisse could not keep the stage in spite of the aid of Noverre's ballets; still the hymn to love, the closing chorus is a remarkable piece. Strongly touched by its ill success, Gluck quitted Paris, never intending to return again. He departed to Vienna, notwithstanding the wishes of the Queen. He intended to close his career with Les Danaïdes, but an attack of paralysis forced him to give up the work, and he transferred the text to his pupil Salieri. Six years afterward, Nov. 25, 1787, a second attack of apoplexy took Gluck from his friends and the musical art at the age of seventy-nine years.

† Some very fine descriptions and analyses of works by Traetta, well worth translating, may be found in Heise's "Hildegard von Hohenthal." The book is in the Boston Public Library.

Piccini, to whom the retreat of his rival had left the field free, brought out successively Atys (1780) and Iphégenie en Tauride, Jan. 23, 1781. On the 11th of May of the same year Gluck wrote from Vienna; "Do not believe the current reports of my return to Paris. I will not see that city again until the French have made up their minds as to the kind of music one shall write for them. That fickle people, after having received in the most flattering manner seemed to become disgusted with all my operas; and now here is the Seigneur bienfaisant † taking all their attention; they are apparently wishing to return to their popular songs; well, let them go."

† In three acts, text by Chabannes, music Floquet, first given Dec. 14, 1780.

On Rudimental Instruction on the Piano.

BY F. PETERSILEA.

(Continued from page 379.)

Wrist Action.

After the scholar has made a reasonable progress in such studies, in which only Finger action, uninterrupted legato, regular accentuation and strict time has been the object, it is well to admit pieces in which the members and phrases are to be separated, where the same note also may be repeated. But this demands first an explanation of Wrist action.

Once more I will request the scholar to draw the chair to the table. Rest your arm upon it; form the same position of the hand and fingers as formerly explained; viz., the hand fully expanded and level, the knuckles depressed, the thumb straight, fingers well curved, see that the extreme finger joints are not bent so much inwardly as to bring the nails in contact with the table, nor be turned outwards, but rest perpendicular. The nails must be kept short enough, never to project beyond the tip.

Exercise 1. Now throw your hand upwards and let it fall, striking the table with the four finger tips and the whole length of the thumb, but do not stir the arm; repeat the movement a number of times; not in quick succession, leave a little pause between every throw and fall in order to perceive whether the hand and fingers retain their position and remain motionless; for there must be no motion either in the arm or fingers, only in that joint by which the hand is attached to the fore arm.

Exercise 2. Repeat the same stroke, but let only one finger come in contact with the table. Commence with the thumb. Keep it straight and motionless, the hand level and extended as before, but the fingers only slightly bent and up-lifted, so that each finger-tip is about half an inch above the table, while the thumb lays with its whole length upon it. Try now the first finger. Set its first joint perpendicular, all other fingers up-lifted, thumb straight, knuckles low. Don't stir a finger, particularly the one which strikes. In like manner proceed with the others.

N. B. This is the manner in which you have to strike the same key a second time with the same finger, also the first note of a group unconnected with the preceding one. This stroke from the wrist causes a separation and accentuation of groups and answers, therefore a two-fold purpose. But beware of withdrawing the hand with a jerk for the instant you do so, the wrist joint becomes stiff. I cannot avoid speaking here of a certain figure,  the slur, well understood by every violin player, but used in such an unlimited sense in piano music, that many writers and players consider it only a sort of fantastic flourish of the pen, answering the same purpose as similar dashes and scratches in common writing, id est; to show the bravura of a Don Quixote, making professional passados at a windmill. The true meaning of a slur is; to indicate closely united groups, distinctly separated one from another, and suspended accentuation. There can be but one heaviest note in a slurred group, at the commencement, if the tempo is Allegro and the execution mechanical; in the centre, if the passage occurs in an Adagio or Andante movement, requiring the melodious touch, the crescendo and diminuendo. The slur is always understood to have the latter meaning, if drawn over dotted notes. The greatest caution ought to be used by composers and music engravers to point the slurs correctly. It is almost impossible to find a single piece of piano music entirely free from mistakes of this description. This is a great evil in any case, but particularly so for the beginner; it causes either confusion, misunderstanding or utter neglect of this important mark.

Exercise III. Strike with two fingers, viz.: x and 2 — 1 and 3 — 2 and 4 — x and 3 — x and 4 — 1 and 4.

Exercise IV. Strike with three fingers: x, 2, 4 — x, 1, 3 — 1, 2, 4 — 1, 3, 4.

N. B. This is the manner in which you have to strike chords. Positively no other movement is admissible, until a correct mechanical wrist action is formed.

In the preceding letter I mentioned the fact, that a good touch could not be acquired without a knowledge of Rhythm, based upon strict time and accentuation; to this I will now add, that Rhythm may be considered yet in a more extended view or on a larger scale. There is not only perfect symmetry in every bar or measure, but each measure (taken as a unit) is but a fraction of a higher rhythm, according to which musical sentences or periods are formed. The systematic arrangement of a piece of music is similar to that of a poem. Popular tunes have generally periods of eight measures; the half period of four members is called a Phrase, this may again be divided in two parts of two measures each, called Members. This is the most simple rhythm, most easily understood, therefore popular. Now observe: The same law of rhythm, according to which the first note in the measure is better than the second, the third better than the fourth, the second and fourth equally light, the first the strongest, — is equally true in regard to four measures forming a phrase. The greatest accent falls on the first note of the first measure, &c.

(If the tempo is of a slow description requiring expression, the best note is generally placed in the centre of the group; of four quarters in a bar the third is the best; of four bars in a phrase the third requires the most tone. In the mode of accentuation lies the chief mark of distinction between the Allegro and Adagio. But in speaking thus, I allude to a more advanced stage of the pupil).

By means of correct accentuation and separation of the different Members and Phrases a musical sentence becomes intelligible; without it, feeble, clumsy, at any rate confused. If the attention of the scholar is fixed at the very beginning on this subject, there can be no difficulty in not only distinguishing the relative importance of the notes contained in each measure, but also that of the different measures forming the Phrase; for rhythm is natural to every human mind, is based on the love of order, regularity, symmetry; even people not at all gifted with an ear for music may have this quality developed in an eminent degree: the drums, tambourines, castanets produce rhythm without melody. No one but the deaf can fail to understand rhythm.

Any amount of force necessary for correct accentuation can and ought to be produced without pressing or straining by a judicious employment of Finger, Wrist, and Elbow action.

Ferdinand Hiller on the Music of the Future.

SECOND LETTER.

(Continued from page 396.)

Is it possible for a poet, following quite freely and without any obstruction of his poetic fancy, to produce a dramatic work of art, which shall, in the highest sense of the words, require the aid of music (musikbedüftig ist)? This is plainly not possible; even if released from all consideration for so-called musical forms, he must restrict himself to those regions which, as a rule, still contain sensations expressible by music. Can a composer, when he sets about the composition of an opera, proceed with the same freedom, limited only by the nature of the laws of music, as if he were composing a symphony? Certainly not; he must satisfy the internal and external dramatic requirements of the subject, and lay aside the purely musical standard. As we see, it is an alliance between two powers, which, in order to co-operate, are compelled to make reciprocal concessions. The determination of the measure of these concessions is just the question which, since the time of Gluck, has so often thrown men's minds in commotion. When stripped of a mass of empty phrases and secondary details, it forms the pith of the noisy Wagner-question, which sets so many pens going. The real answer to it can be given only by works of art, and not by æsthetical conflicts of words. To conceive a drama in which the struggles represented are, in the main, confined to such as proceed from the world of sensations; whose action shall, with circumspect swiftness, so proceed as to keep the sympathies of the audience always alive, without, in consequence, preventing the music from being developed with the requisite breadth; whose poetical dialogue, finally shall not express so much as to render music superfluous, or so little as to render it impossible. and whose diction shall not, by its superabundant beauty—or platitude—reduce the composer to despair, is certainly no easy task, but, at the same time, it is not one which has never hitherto been accomplished. Nor is it an easy task for the composer—while striving in his expression to do justice to each situation, each character, and each word, as well as to the general tone of the drama—to avoid depriving his work of musical beauty, and, while doing so much for the poem, not to impinge upon the rights of his own art. Wagner's complaint against opera hitherto (and, in far too many instances, he is certainly not wrong), is that the musician has demanded too great concessions, which the poet has but too willingly made; our complaint against Wagner is, that he has often, somewhat criminally, attacked music, and the deepest conditions of its existence, in favor of the stage. His followers may not allow this; we, however, cannot agree with the assertion that the most important operas hitherto produced, not with regard to the music alone, but to the poems as well, hold the same relative value to his works (for it is only by means of these that we get anything like an idea of his ideal), that "the ape does to a human being,"—and if there has been, in any quarters, so strong an opposition against him, one principal reason for this is to be found in the fanatical exuberance of many of his partisans, who endeavor to raise him to an eminence to which he had no claim.

The peculiar and genial feature in Wagner's character consists in the varied nature of his talent. When he produced his Tannhäuser in Dresden (people were then far from making a kind of poetically musical Messiah of him), every person who left the theatre must have said to himself, that, despite all objections that might be raised, the most sincere recognition of his ability was due to the man who had conceived the subject of such an opera, who had worked it out, both linguistically and musically, and who, lastly, had so admirably got up and produced the work upon the stage. From this, however, to a combination of the powers of a Shakespeare with those of a Beethoven, in a single head, was a great stride; and, while every educated person allowed that Wagner's poem rose, by its conception and execution, above the operatic writing prevalent in Germany, it could as little be considered a literary production of the first rank, as the music, despite much that was interesting and effective, placed by the side of what our great composers have done, while in those parts which many have praised as the most important in the opera, people saw deficiency rather than progress; in other words, a frequent immolation of the truly musical in favor of the declamatory element, a fact on which I must speak somewhat at length.

The theories of an artist have their first and deepest roots in the powers and inclinations with which he was born. We have seen that, from the very commencement, Wagner was filled with passionate impulse for the stage; but an impulse in which music did not find a place until afterwards. He is deficient in the primitive and instinctive delight in what is purely musical, however full he may be of the creations of Beethoven. The Letter we are now discussing points often enough to this fact. The so-called "opera melody" he always treats with sovereign contempt; while, on the other hand, he goes into raptures with the endless melody. There is not, however, any endless melody, any more than there are special opera melodies. There are musical thoughts which flow with a more rapid or broader stream, which are constructed after some model, or originally, and which are expressive or inexpressive, trivial or noble. But a recognisable form must possess some musical thoughts, if it would combine in itself character and sensual charm. Wagner may still continue to see an "idealised dance-form" in the wonderful structure in which a man like Beethoven connects and carries out his ideas, repeating them in the most animated turns. It is a fact, however, that the treest of all masters was so great in this, because he knew how to give his melodies a form as strong and firm as though they had been cast in bronze. But a Beethovenian composition is by no means "a single melody, accurately connected;" it is a chain of melodies, carried out into a work of art full of unity. That most primitive gifts of musical invention, which is granted to all men of great musical genius, which above all things, is manifested in the creation of such, so to speak, palpable motives, is the weaker side of Wagner's talent. It is, however, a piece of ingratitude in him to be so evilly-disposed towards the "opera melody," for in his operas, it is to those pieces in which he has managed to give us melodies, and, consequently, "opera melodies," such, for instance, as the chorus of pilgrims and the festive march in Tannhäuser, that in spite of anything that can be said, he owes his greatest musical success.

In stating that Wagner had been denied the power of purely receiving good music, I was led to the assertion by some other passages in his Letter. For instance, after speaking of the symphony as "a revelation from another world," which forces itself upon us with such overpowering force, and determines our feelings with such certainty, that our logicising reason is totally confused (?) and disarmed (?) by it, he says, shortly afterwards, that the question about the "Wherefore" is not completely silenced, even at the hearing of a symphonic composition, but is actually productive of "a confusion in the casual conceptive power of the hearer, a confusion not only capable of disturbing him, but of becoming the ground of a false judgment." The mysterious element in the impression produced by the higher kind of instrumental music, may and should urge the philosopher to seek the "wherefore;" that the unmusical hearer, but one not destitute of fancy, may start the question, not as to the "wherefore," but as to "what does that mean?" may pass; but that the musical hearer, and much more the musician, should not receive a symphony by Beethoven as a creation perfect and complete in itself, and completely satisfying musical logic, the only logic with which we have here ought to do, is scarcely credible. Whoever, after the enjoyment of such a work, asks for any kind of explanation, may possess a highly educated mind, but decidedly no really musical nature.

"To answer this disturbing, and yet so indispensable, question, in such a manner that it may be eluded by the silencing of certain measures, can be only the work of the poet," Wagner goes on to say, adding that this must be done in the drama.

"The drama, at the moment of its being really scenically represented, immediately awakes in the spectator an intimate interest in an action so truly imitated, at least as far as is possible, from actual life, that in this interest man's sympathetic feelings of themselves are worked up to a state of ecstasy, in which he forgets the mysterious 'Wherefore,' and at once, in the greatest excitement, willingly delivers himself up to the guidance of those new laws, in conformity to which music makes itself so wonderfully intelligible, and, in a profound sense, immediately alone answers rightly the 'Wherefore?'"

Or, to express ourselves simply: When music is sung to words by certain individuals, and in clear situations, every one knows what it is meant to express. But little is gained by this; for if the music is not beautiful, no heart is warmed by the "wherefore" being answered; while if, in its beauty it exercises its power, the force of this power is as wonderful when the music has a substratum of words as when such is not the case. Nay, it becomes even more wonderful, for the power of words, the highest power on earth, vanishes before it.

Who has not experienced the truth of the very common fact, that the most magnificent poem is incapable of producing any effect in a bad composition, while a middling libretto not only does not injure fine music, but through it, is actually raised into a higher sphere? It is a truth which cannot by any means be disputed, that in the connection of poetry with music, the immediate and the stronger effect is produced by the latter. When we reproach Wagner with sacrificing far too frequently the really musical to the declamatory element, even in cases when this, in a certain degree, is not at all rendered necessary by the importance of the words, we find, at the same time, an excuse for him in his double capacity of author as well as composer of his dramas. But we must protest against the result of a totally individual endowment, which may be called simultaneously over-complete and incomplete, being elevated into a law—against deficiency being pronounced advancement. Grant that Wagner's example may tend to better lyrical dramas being offered by better authors to the composers, who did not previously know it, that it is not necessary to work on a French or Italian model for the purpose of producing effect; there is certainly no objection to this; but the composers who have sworn allegiance to the banner may rest assured that they will sink into a bottomless abyss, if they do not present us, even on the stage, with what is independently musically beautiful; for besides, and above all the charm exerted by action, legends, figure, and rhyme, men require, if they do hear music, that it shall be genuine music.

But Wagner's successes speak in his favor; he says so himself. Yes and no. After a great many, mostly superfluous, wordy disputes, Wagner's operas have been received into the repertory, where they find a place among the works of the composers of all nations, without affecting the impressions produced by those works—a proof that, on the one hand, they do not differ so very much from the latter, and, on the other, that they are not sufficiently strong to act in a really reformatory manner on the public taste. This, by the way, Wagner himself confesses, at least as far as Tannhäuser is concerned; for he says, "If I should have the pleasure of seeing my Tannhäuser favorably received by the public of Paris also, I feel sure that I shall owe my success for the most part to the very evident connection of this opera with those of my predecessors, among whom I will particularly remind you of Weber." (The connection between Lohengrin and Weber is perhaps not much less evident.) He hints, however, that Weber made concessions to the "Gallery," while he himself (Wagner) has abstained from so doing. We cannot here enter into the consideration of these concessions, our only object being at present to state the most material views of our author; but if the refusal to make certain concessions is a proof of courage, it is not always a proof of wisdom.

Wagner will not, however, at any price, allow us to expect from his earlier works "the most stringent" of the conditions resulting from his theoretical maxims; he will permit us to do this only in the case of his newest work, Tristan und Isolde, which, although published has never been performed. "Not," he tells us, "because I formed it according to my system, because all theory was completely forgotten by me, but because, in this case, at last I proceeded with the greatest freedom, and the most entire disregard of all theoretical considerations, in such a way that, during its execution, I became aware that I soared far above my system." In this opera he has had recourse to the orchestra of the symphonist, and allowed the poet (himself) to call to him:—

"Stretch out your melody boldly, so that it may flow like an uninterrupted stream through the whole work. In it do you say what I pass over in silence, while you alone can say it, and silently will I say everything, because I lead you by the hand.

"In truth, the greatness of the poet is mostly to be measured by what he passes over in silence, in order to allow us, also silently, to say what is inexpressible; it is the musician who converts this silence into clear tones, and the infallible form of his loud-sounding silence is endless melody." (!)

The orchestra is here to assume towards the drama a relation somewhat similar to that taken by the tragic chorus of the Greeks towards the dramatic action; and yet again this is not so; for the relation of the chorus was of a reflective kind, and stood apart from the action, while the orchestra takes a most lively share in all the motives of the latter, and the great total of this symphonetic opera (I am giving only a short but accurate outline of what Wagner says) will produce the impression, which nature, full of life, produces, in the forest for instance, with her thousand voices, on him who gives himself up to her.

The score of Tristan und Isolde has been published, and I have read it through as carefully as I could. I should not think, however, of giving an opinion on it now. What completely distinguishes the music of this opera from all that has hitherto been created in the domain of music, is that it contains only slight indications, not of no model-like "opera-melody," but of no vocal melody at all. The orchestra forms an unceasing and ery complicated web of tone, and gives us by ar the principal part of what the composer is attempting to express. If Wagner succeeds in effectively producing this work, we shall, with reason, be able to say of him, that he has done not only what never has been heard, but also what never has been heard of.

I must now notice several detached observations contained in the Letter. Wagner says he wrote his theoretical works in an "abnormal" state, which "oppressed in a strange manner" his brain; and he almost appears to regret what he has penned. It is possible that his operas (if I may be allowed so to designate his dramatic works) would have met with more impartial appreciation without the works in question, but the appreciation would then have been far less noisy. It is not to be disputed that the critics were partly very much opposed to Wagner, though again, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that his partisans filled the press with their laudation in a manner which had never been witnessed even in the case of the greatest productions. When Wagner says that his known operas were so scurvily treated by the musical critics, partly on account of his theories, although these compositions were written before the appearance of his literary works, he should not forget that these very works have been adduced, by his partisans, as proof of the excellence of his ethical views. What is right for the one set of men is just for the other.

As people are accustomed to hear Wagner and Liszt mentioned as obeying the same views, the following apothegm of Wagner's, in reference to Liszt's Symphonische Dichtungen, must appear worthy of remark:—"It is not a programme, which excites more than silences the obstructive question as to the 'wherefore,' which can therefore, express the importance of the symphony, but only dramatic action itself, scientifically carried out."

The ominous expression, "Music of the Future," which forms the title of the Letter, is treated, quite incidentally, as one erroneously derived from the idea of the Kunstwerk der Zukunft. Every one, who has really the interest of music at heart, will be heartily glad to see "the Spectre of the Music of the Future," as Wagner designates it, disappear, and return to the simple designations of good and bad, beautiful and trivial music.

Although I have given utterance to only the most inconsiderable portion of the thoughts that the perusal of Wagner's pamphlet has suggested to my mind, I will conclude my letter, which is already, perhaps, far too long. May these hasty lines in some degree help to "dissipate a large amount of error and prejudice," and to bring people back from extreme views, which are calculated to produce more mischief the longer they obtain.

FERDINAND HILLER.

Music and Musical Criticism.

SCUDO ON VERDI—CIMAROSA'S MATRIMONIO SEGRETO—THE ITALIAN OPERA AT PARIS, &c., I.

Scudo, in a late number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, has one of his characteristic and clever articles on the influence of criticism. He says criticism is simply reason clothed with feeling; it does not create the principles on which it bases its judgments; it draws them from history, and from master pieces of the human mind.

In speaking of the arbitrary meanings attached to the words beautiful and ugly, false and true, just and unjust, the errors we are apt to make in forming our opinions, and the presentiments, as he calls them, existing in the conscience, of that which is really beautiful and true, he says finely, that time develops these premonitions; these presentiments of native conscience "become facts, and transform themselves into monuments, which monuments accumulating, stand as land marks of the different eras of civilization which have existed on earth."

As usual he takes occasion to protest against Verdi; a protestation he has been making religiously for a decade of years. He says Verdi is not a great composer. The musical language he creates is violent and often rough. He writes badly. He is almost ignorant of that art which is so important to the creative artist,—the art of developing an idea and drawing from it the legitimate consequences. His effects are abrupt, and he violates the passions instead of evoking them with management. His characters are almost always in a fury, with a dagger in their hands. His monotonous and bloody melodramas have spoiled the taste of Italy, made her forget how to laugh—she who laughed so well; taken from her the fine traditions of the art of singing, and excited in this highly gifted, but idle and passably ignorant nation, a senseless pride.

Quite an array of charges against Verdi, who has, however, for his comfort, the possession of present popularity. The imitators of Verdi meet with no gentler words of course; they are as Dogberry says "tolerable and not to be endured," because, says M. Scudo sharply, the manner of this master is entirely individual and he himself is not able to modify it. It is only genius seconded by science that can renew and transform itself, and M. Verdi is a man of talent simply, who has practice without true knowledge. His music produces on the public the effect the red mantle does on the bull. Its confused sonorosity is intoxicating, over exciting the material sensibilities, and rendering them incapable of tasting the qualities of a superior art, which art speaks to the imagination, awakens the fancy, and gently penetrates to the depths of the soul."

"This is what we have written," he adds sturdily, "for ten years, and all the success of the author of Ernani, Rigoletto, and Il Trovatore has not been able to shake our convictions. We shall not contend with the public as to the pleasure that certain operas of M. Verdi gives it; but it must permit us to say that it deceives itself as to the equality and merit of the object which flatters its taste, as well also as to the nature of the æsthetic or mental pleasure which it fancies it is receiving."

In this same article is a resumé of the music given in Paris this last autumn at the Italian and Lyric Theatres and Opera. On the 30th October Il Matrimonio Segreto was sung at the Theatre Italien by Zucherini, our old favorite Badiali, Alboni, Penco and Batta.

This causes M. Scudo immense satisfaction of course. He ejaculates with orthodox zeal: Voilà de la musique jeune, éternellement jeune! The day when this ensemble of grace, sentiment and serene gaiety—that gaiety which arises like a day-dawn in a satisfied soul, and not that which springs from malice of the mind—the day when this simple history of an honest family, troubled momentarily by the little entanglements of a youthful and discreet love, shall no longer be understood and appreciated, except by a few tardy amateurs, a sad revolution shall have taken place in the musical art and the moral order. We shall be no longer here, God be praised!

Alboni, he tells us, was charming in the part of "Tidama," the old merchant's rich sister, and she restored that delicious air, which she sang with a spirit and sweet irony which set well on her smiling and full blooming face. Madame Penco, who has studied hard in order to merit the favor of the Parisian dilettanti, was very good in the part of "Carolina," whose honest indignation and naïve tenderness she brought out cleverly. She sang the fine recitative of the cantabile in the second act, with breadth and in an elevated style.

"E vero che in casa Io sou la padroca."

This account given by Scudo con amore, has been read on a sweet spring-like morning, the soft west wind blowing, February though it may be, with a tenderness such as Scudo describes the love in the "Matrimonio Segreto," printanier et discret; it breathes in at the window over the pretty Madeira vine, whose tender twining branches are running up the wall, making picturesque frames for the lovely Mozart and Raphael heads hanging there.

What can be done that would be more in keeping, than to fill the west wind with Cimarosa's melodies? There is the opera score on the music shelf, and there the open piano and an hour or two of sweet leisure just the open window, "printanier," if not discret. The little hound terrier, tired of play, sleeps in her basket, giving low growls at the last peals of merry child laughter. The old poplar tree bole spreads out a summer-like shadow on the grass which is always green in our lowland country. The quiet is almost voluptuous, and Spring is very winning, peeping in on us in this pretty way, here when it might be mid-winter counting by dates.

The Matrimonio Segreto music sounds beautiful in these surroundings. Like the poor tenore at the Theatre Italien, M. Gardoni, we may estropie the incomparable airs, but we have no M. Scudo audience to shock; only our own indulgent easily pleased ears.

The original play, from which the libretto of this

Opera was taken, was written by Garrick; but the English story is very different from that of the playful Italian comedy, for it is horrible and tragical, while the Opera is as graceful in the plot and management as in the music.

It is the most popular Opera ever written, taking its immediate and marvellous success and long continued favor together; and it was composed by Cimarosa with the greatest ease. He wrote several of these lovely airs in an evening, with a party of friends around him. The celebrated "Pria che spunti" in the second Act, Paolino's great air, was written at Prague after he had spent a fortnight there in doing nothing but walking about the town and amusing himself.

Cimarosa was in the service of the Emperor Leopold, of Austria, at the time he wrote this Opera, 1792. The night of its first performance it had a droll success, such as no other opera ever had. After it was over, the Emperor invited composer, singers and orchestra to a fine feast, after which they all returned in a body to the theatre and repeated the Opera the very same night.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

(To be continued.)

Church Music in New York.

In the service of the Romish church, from time immemorial, the talents of the best composers have been availed of to render the music as attractive and at the same time as impressive as it could be made; to this end have the abilities of such minds as Haydn, Mozart, Cherubini, and contemporaneous composers been directed, whilst in the Protestant church of all denominations, the power of music to elevate and purify the mind has been, until within a brief period, almost entirely ignored or overlooked.

The ancient and severe English style is rapidly going out of use, and giving place to the more effective and less solemn modern school. Of course there are exceptions (such as Trinity Church), but such is the general tendency. In some of our Catholic churches, the music approximates very closely to what one hears in the cathedrals in Paris and Germany: foremost among these is the Church of St. Francis Xavier, in Sixteenth street, where the music is under the direction of Prof. William Bergé, a graduate of one of the first universities in Germany, who has been in this country about fifteen years. The music of this church is of an imposing description, and the choir capable of executing the most difficult compositions extant. They receive every month manuscript masses from the pen of Mercadante—at present sojourning in Italy. Prof. Bergé is himself a composer of much ability, and produced at this church, Christmas day, a mass of his own composition, which has withstood the most searching criticism, and was accorded to possess singular beauty and merit. On this occasion the soloists were—soprano, Mrs. Cooper; contralto, Madame Colletti; tenor, Mr. C. Hubner; and baritone, Mr. C. Werneke. A powerful chorus assisted. The World, in a recent number, said of him:

Bergé divides the palm of merit with Morgan, so far as strict organ playing goes, but is said to excel him in point of brilliant execution, and a power to produce wonderful orchestral effects with his instrument. His reputation is European as well as transatlantic, and it is doubtful whether Catholic music is interpreted with as much brilliancy and finish anywhere out of Italy, as at the Jesuit chapel in Sixteenth street. He has done more towards encouraging a taste for brilliant church music than any other organist that was ever among us, native or foreign.

The Church of the Immaculate Conception, in Fourteenth street, was completed some three years since, and contains an organ built by Erben of this city, which is an instrument of unusual power. The music is directed by Herr G. Schmitz, organist of the church, a player of no ordinary capacity, with surprising powers of execution, manifest even in the plainest Gregorian chants. His accompaniments and extempore voluntaries compare favorably with those of the best European organists. The first soprano singer is Mme. Caradori; contralto, Miss Frost; tenor, Mr. H. Schmitz, a brother of the organist; and basso, Mr. Durlion. On the eighth of December, at a musical festival in commemoration of the anniversary of the "Immaculate Conception," at this church, some thirty of the leading musical talent of the city took part. We attended vesper service here yesterday, and heard the brilliant "Tantum Ergo," composed by Rossini for the coronation of the Pope, rendered in a manner not soon to be forgotten.

At St. Stephens in Twenty-eighth street the music is of a highly finished and artistic character. Dr. Cummings, the prelate of this church, is known to many of your Boston readers, having delivered the address at the laying of the corner stone of a large educational institute in Roxbury a year ago; also from having lectured before the Young Men's Christian Association, at the Hollis Street Church, in November last—almost the only case on record of a Catholic Priest having occupied a Protestant pulpit. He is personally a good judge of music, and has frequently been known to pay a good premium for an extra soprano solo. The regular choir consists of Madame Isadora Clark, first soprano; Madame Berger, alto; Signor Quinto, of the Academy of Music, tenor; and Signor Centemani, barytone, with a chorus of amateurs. Occasionally the *Prima Donna*s of the various operatic troupes take part in the music of this church, and the writer has heard such singers as Gazzaniga, Patti, and Carl Fornés there. The organist, Mr. C. Wels; is a very superior performer, and one of our best pianists, who has succeeded W. A. King, formerly of Grace Church, and author of the celebrated "Grace Church collection of music." The latter now officiates at Rev. Dr. Tyng's.

There is a large German Catholic Church in Third street, where there is an orchestra, in addition to the organ and choir: it is scarcely necessary to add that the music is more noisy than beautiful. There is also a French Catholic Church in Twenty-third street, where the music is superior.

At St. Patrick's Cathedral, in Mott street, where Archbishop Hughes officiates, the music is not of so high an order as in the above, neither at St. Peter's, in Barclay street, although in both of these it is far above mediocrity, and comprises selections from the favorite composers. There are several minor Catholic Churches in this city and Brooklyn, where the music is good; but my space forbids mentioning them in detail.—Transcript.

Eugene Scribe.

This most prolific and successful of all dramatic writers, died recently in Paris at the age of seventy, a good old age, but an extraordinary age for a literary man to attain. Scribe, however, was not a man of genius. He was a man of talent, understood scenic effect admirably, and wrote with great point and neatness. He never attempted in his works the delineation of passion; but he knew well how to appeal to the sensibility of an audience. His sentiment domestic dreams in one and two acts at the Gymnase (then the favorite theatre of the Court and the Duchess de Berri), first made his reputation. Among these the best were the "Happiest Day of My Life," "A Daughter to Marry," "A Marriage of Reason," etc., etc. He afterwards wrote for the Theatre Francais several good five act comedies:—"A Chain," "The Minister and the Mercier," "A Marriage of Money," etc. Mlle. Mars was then still on the stage and many of the pieces were written expressly for her. For Rachel, Scribe wrote "The Czarina." His name is associated with the great works of Auber, Donizetti, Halevy, Meyerbeer and Verdi.

Dramatic literature is the most productive of all literary labor in France. No wonder then that Scribe realized an immense fortune. Scribe was the author of three hundred vaudevilles, one hundred comedies, one hundred operas, ninety-two comic operas, twenty ballets, twenty two dramas, and about thirty volumes of novels and tales. It is not, however, to be supposed that Scribe actually wrote all these, though most certainly all his earliest works are his own. Latterly he adopted Dumas' fashion of giving the skeleton of the play and getting it written by various authors; or he would take a play already written and offered to him for approbation, putting in the finishing touches, which ensured its success. It is said that, looking over the best of his dramatic works, he discovered that he had titles beginning with every letter of the alphabet except X, and that, anxious to complete the list, he immediately wrote the piece entitled La Xacarilla. He was no less successful as a writer of opera librettos, having written those of Robert le Diable, Le Juive, Les Huguenots, Le Prophète, La Dame Blanche, Le Cheval de Bronze, Fra Diavolo, L'Ambassadrice, Le Domino Noir, L'Etoile du Nord, &c.

Scribe also wrote several interesting novels, among others, Piquillo Alliaga. In 1836, he was elected Academician, and was commander of the legion of honor. He had by the frequent repetition of his plays amassed an enormous fortune. However he continued to the last a most laborious life. The two following lines were engraved over the gate of his Chateau at Sérécourt:

"Le Théâtre a payé cet asyle champêtre Vous qui passez, merci; je vous le dois peut-être."

It was always his pride, that all he possessed he owed to his pen. In his residence is a series of paintings, representing the first poor beginnings of that career, and also his successes until the day when he drove in his own coach into the court of his chateau which he was proud to think and tell the theatre had paid for. Scribe, late in life, married Mme. Biclery, the widow of a liquor dealer in the Fauburg St. Antoine. She was immensely rich, so that M. and Mme. Scribe lived in great style. They were exceedingly hospitable, receiving much company, both in Paris, in his mansion built by himself, on the Rue Pigale and at his country house of Mortolaise. Scribe had no affectation of artistic life. He was not a Bohemian, but a sober citizen, a man of business, honest, amiable and good tempered. Having no pretensions to high birth, (being the son of a shop-keeper,) he himself, chose his own armorial bearings, just as the knights did of old, from their own achievements. He chose a pen, (a graceful quill, not a stiff steel pen,) with the appropriate motto, "Inde Fortuna."

German Piano-fortes.

Pianoforte playing is perhaps more general in this country than in any other. It is a common accomplishment of both sexes—one that is cultivated by the members of all classes and professions. I have met military men to whom the compositions of Bach and Beethoven are as familiar as the word of command. And have many a time wondered at the seeming incongruity of a captain booted and spurred, sitting down to the pianoforte, and playing off many a long fantasia, while his charger was neighing impatiently for its rider. All the most eminent pianists, those who by their practice skill and by their writings have developed the resources of the instrument are, with one or two honorable exceptions, of German origin. And yet in Germany hardly any advance in the structure of the pianoforte has been made for the last fifteen, indeed I might say twenty, years. Those improvements in the mechanism of the instrument which have been introduced at different times by the manufacturers of England and France, and which have tended so considerably to its perfection, have not been adopted by the German makers, from whose factories pianofortes are still produced, remarkable for the primitive simplicity of their action and similarity of tone. It is not that the improvements and recent inventions are unknown or unheeded, but whenever they have been copied, the result has not been favorable; the old principle has always been found the most profitable, and is consequently adhered to. Economy is urged as the chief object of the German manufacturer, and any innovation to increase the expense in making an instrument therefore eschewed. The price of pianos in Germany is considerably less than in England and France, eighty or ninety pounds being as much as can be expected for a grand, and the average charge much lower.

Notwithstanding their adherence to the old system of construction and mechanism, the German makers turn out some very excellent instruments. Those of Bosendorfer are acknowledged to be the best that are made in Vienna. This firm has but lately opened a new establishment, in which are to be found the factory, a magnificent suite of show rooms, a concert room to accommodate 600 or 700 people, and a princely residence for the proprietor, all under the same roof. It is a splendid building, situated in Neu Wien, a Vorstadt consisting entirely of modern houses, which in point of solidity and appearance, surpass those of Vienna proper. At the invitation of Herr Dachs, a talented pianist of the classical school, who may some day be as well known in England as he is respected in his own country, I visited Bosendorfer's new premises last week. They are admirably fitted up with every contrivance for the expeditious manufacture of the pianos in the different stages, from the very commencement to the moment when they are exhibited for sale in the show rooms. There are 300 men employed, who finish, upon the average, 30 pianofortes per week, a small number, perhaps, compared to the supply of such houses as Erard, Broadwood, and Collard, but adequate to the demand, which it must be remembered, is almost limited to Austria and Southern Germany.

The building is handsomely decorated. In the reception hall stands a colossal statue of Beethoven, as the sole ornament, giving the visitor a favorable impression of the taste of the proprietors, an impression which is confirmed by every object he sees throughout their model establishment.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS A LIBRETTIST.—"And will a once good and kind master of mine in the craft of letters be angry with his old apprentice and journeyman in these desultory reminiscences? I set down among the fasti of the St. James's Theatre a certain opera called the Village Coquette, to which he, a very young man then, with long silky hair, and a cataract of white satin for a cravat, as you see him in Mr. Maclise's picture, wrote the libretto, and in which John Braham enacted the part of a convivial but dissolute squire (in a scarlet velvet coat and top boots of shiny leather)? The Village Coquettes! I remember almost every line of the words and every bar of the music. John Parry, the vivacious, the genial, the evergreen prince of buffo-singers was among the dramatis personæ. There was that charming song of "Autumn Leaves," which I sincerely wish somebody would revive now. John Braham had a wondrous song about "Snipe shooting in the snow." Whether are fled the days of the Village Coquettes? The squire in the scarlet velvet coat is dead. There was a gentleman attached to the St. James's Theatre, who mited the functions of treasurer and writer of burlesques, and whose name was Gilbert Abbott à Beckett. He lived to be a writer of leaders in The Times and one of the most upright magistrates that ever sat on the bench. He died very sadly and prematurely, too soon for friendship but not too soon for fame. Laughing John Parry laughs yet, and carols gaily. The writer of libretto is alive and famous to all the world. His name is Charles Dickens; and did I need a further excuse for routing up these old memories, it would be in the fact that he who composed the music to the Village Coquettes also lives, a good and honorable and just man? He has unhappily fallen upon evil days, and in life's wane has to begin the world again; but the author of the words to his songs has no more forgotten the old days than I have; for at the head of a committee for raising the funds for a testimonial to John Hullah I find the name of Dickens."—GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA (Temple Bar).

VIENNA.—At the Opera House, Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord was given on Sunday, Feb., 3rd. With this exception there has been little doing in the way of music since I last wrote.

The chief topic of conversation among musical people, is whether Madame Csillag will return here next autumn. Those who pretend to be good authorities on the subject assert that her engagement with Ullmann has been forfeited by the bankruptcy of that American impresario, and that the lady has an extraordinary offer of an increased salary (according to the official list she already receives more than any of the other artists) if she will renew her contract at the Kärntnerthor Theatre. Whether this be true or not, it is certain Madame Csillag cannot well be spared from Vienna, and I can easily understand the new director, Signor Salvi, advising his imperial master to induce her to remain. There are few prime donne anywhere with such répertoire at her command, and no one who is so popular with the Viennese.

A new theatre is spoken of, to be erected on the Schotten Glacis. There will be no Italian opera this spring in Vienna.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 16, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of "The Hymn of Praise," (Lobgesang), a Cantata by Mendelssohn.

Italian Opera.

Just as Mr. Rarey has come to tame his wild horses upon the platform of the Music Hall, under the very nose of Beethoven, the Academy of Music has been purged of the Centaurs that have held it. The ring is gone, the clown and the riding master have departed, the crack of the whip is no longer heard within its walls, the saw dust is swept away, and Music reigns again supreme in her beautiful temple.

The company of associated artists were welcomed, on Monday evening of this week, by the fullest house that we remember ever to have seen on an opening night. People here generally wait to see what a day may bring forth and are slow to trust their dollars to the uncertain fortunes of the opening night; but on Monday the sparkling and lively Martha filled the house, the upper tiers and parquet being entirely full. Such an audience could not but be a sympathetic one, and the old favorites, Mad. COLSON, ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, BRIGNOLI and SUSINI were most cordially welcomed as they successively appeared.

There is little to be said of the performance of an opera so familiar to us and by singers so well known. Mad. COLSON is admirably fitted in every respect for the character of the Lady Harriet, her artistic style and flexible voice giving the fullest effect to the flowing lively music, and her ladylike elegance and beauty being in keeping with the character she assumed, especially in the Fair scene, where she well represented the lady in disguise, while, in the other parts of the opera, she did not have to disguise herself as a lady, as some do. Of Miss PHILLIPPS, there is little to be said, as her fine singing and sprightly acting in this opera are familiar. SUSINI is too ponderous and stately in his ways to give the character of Plunkett with the life that Formés threw into it, but he sang the music excellently. BRIGNOLI shone with undiminished lustre in parts where he could be conspicuous, as in M'appari tutto amor, but we wish him a sounder artistic conscience, and could not help reflecting how curiously a trio or quartet would sound, if soprano, alto, or basso should follow the example of the great tenore, and sing only where they can sing alone. Brignoli's incomparable voice is all his own, and so is his sluggish nature. We cannot find fault with him, if he does not act with the fire of Formés or Stigelli, for it is his nature, but we may, at least, claim an honest and conscientious rendering of music where the "silver voice" is as necessary to the due effect of the whole, as it is in the beautiful solos in which he (as well as his audience) takes delight. The chorus was meagre in numbers and power; the orchestra good. As to the costumes of which the programme had a good deal to say, we could not but think that the "original sketches" for the dresses of Brignoli and Susini could have come only from the "Book of British Costumes" by one Mr. Punch, for surely no English yeomen were ever so arrayed before.

Lucia di Lammermoor was given on Tuesday night for the debut of Miss ISABELLA HINCKLEY, the young American prima donna; a real native American this time—American born and bred. She at once attracted the attention and good will of the audience by her beauty, and the first notes of the opening scene, Ancor non giunse, showed us that she had a voice fresh and sweet as spring flowers, a mezzo soprano of large compass and sympathetic quality; of much natural capacity for the execution of difficulties, equal to the performance of the most intricate music, although frequently betraying some lack of confidence in the approaching and attacking of difficult and dangerous passages that we should naturally expect in a young novice, but which study, care and good schooling will, in no long time, remove. Her voice is admirably true in tune, but her enunciation is indistinct, so that words are recognized only with difficulty; a striking contrast to the rotund distinctness of the native Italian, of which the utterance of Brignoli is so beautiful and absolutely perfect a model, both to singers and speakers. Indeed, there can scarce be a better study for a public speaker in this matter, than to mark with care this feature of Brignoli's singing. It is worth of score of lessons in elocution.

Miss Hinckley's performance through the opera was well sustained to the end, confirming all the impressions which we received of her early in the evening, and showing, in addition, a decided dramatic talent in her acting of the more intense passages of the opera. She was vehemently applauded, and we must consider her debut to have been marked by unusual success.

STIGELLI sang the music of Edgardo with all his peculiar charm and gave to the exciting scene of the Malediction an energy and intense verisimilitude that has never been surpassed or indeed equalled here, by any other tenor. With Miss Hinckley he succeeded in giving an éclat to the sextette that was hardly to be expected, when the important part of Ashton was given not only sotto voce, but actually inaudibly, by Signor FENNI, who thus not only deprived the singers of important support, but defrauded the audience of what was necessary to the completeness of the rendering of the music. Generally, an attentive, conscientious and pleasing artist, he has never before appeared to so little advantage. We can pardon or at least tolerate the constant tremolo, attributing it to a mistaken theory or a bad school, but neither audience or critics, can endure such noticeable and marked neglect on the part of an artist, or long fail to remind him that he does not fulfil his part of the contract he has entered into with the public. Signor BARILI filled the rôle of Raimondo with credit; Signor LORTI sang very well the Arturo music; and an opera would hardly be one without the familiar presence of the useful Mad. AVOGADRO, who has filled certain characters for so many years.

The performance, which as a whole, it may be seen was an unequal one, was brought to a brilliant close by the superb singing of Stigelli in the finale. In him we have an artist who always throws his whole soul and his whole talent, and all that he has to bring to his audience (which he always has in mind) into every effort that he makes. Would that we had more such as he! The house was not so full as on the first night, still a very large and paying audience was assembled.

Wednesday night gave us Il Giuramento of Mercadante, which has not been heard here since the days of Truffi and Benedetti. We must confess to recalling but very little of the beautiful music of this opera, save a few morceaux that have long ago become common property, and also to being entirely mystified by the intricate complications of the plot. The opera was preceded by Verdi's overture to Giovanna d'Arco, which was well played by the orchestra and pleased the audience much. The opera was admirably rendered by all the artists. Indeed it gives rare opportunities to each of the characters to display their best points separately, and it likewise abounds in beautiful passages of concerted music.

Mad. COLSON, as Elaisa, sang with rare excellence and made the character, by her spirited and admirable acting, one of great interest. In fact, in no respect does Mad. Colson ever disappoint her audience; she is always up to what is required of her, and always does her whole duty as well as it is possible for her to do it and in a manner that few can equal.

Miss PHILLIPPS admirably supported her throughout the opera. The music that falls to Bianca is elaborate and difficult of execution but she met and conquered all difficulties, in the most triumphant and satisfactory manner. The beautiful duet, Dolce conforto al misero, was most exquisitely sung by these ladies, and its repetition was imperatively demanded and acceded to.

BRIGNOLI had those opportunities which he delights in and never fails to improve, abundantly given him in this opera, his very first entrance upon the scene being in the beautiful aria, Bell'adorata imagine. In the finale he was quite spirited in action, and we cannot remember the occasion when he has appeared so animated or so entitled himself in this respect to higher commendation; while to praise his matchless singing, is a superfluous, though always agreeable, duty. After Mario, there is no such tenor voice within our knowledge.

So, Signor FENNI was admirable in his singing, this evening, receiving the most enthusiastic applause. The prayer, Alla pace, was very beautifully rendered by him. His dress and personal bearing were exceedingly appropriate and picturesque.

The whole opera was well given and is full of beauties, and was formerly a very popular one in Boston. The distractions of the plot, however, and the novelty of the music (to ears a little surfeited with Verdi and Donizetti,) demanding an incessant attention on a first hearing, may account, in some degree, for the moderate applause and some apparent want of enthusiasm on the part of the audience, which would, no doubt, be different in a more intimate acquaintance.

This afternoon Ernani is offered, with Mad. Colson and Stigelli, and the last act of Lucia, Miss Hinckley taking that character. On Sunday evening the opera troupe and the Handel and Haydn Society unite their forces, and give Rossini's Stabat Mater at the theatre.

On Monday, Miss KELLOGG, another new American artist, will appear in the pretty part of Linda de Chamounix.

PRIVATE CONCERTS.—Mr. George E. Whiting's and the Mozart Club.—Both these concerts offer something worthy of note.

On Mr. WHITING'S programme of the entertainment given March 1st, at the Tremont Temple a good deal of classical music appeared. Mendelssohn's F minor Sonata (op. 65, No. 1) a Fugue by Bach in G minor, one by Schumann on Bach's name, the chorus "Fixed in his everlasting seat," by Handel, were pieces showing that the gentleman is in earnest. That this is really the case Mr. Whiting's own Fantasia proved, which is written in a dignified mood, becoming the solemn and grand instrument for which it is written.

We may add that Mr. Whiting showed considerable dexterity in the treatment of manuals and pedals. We would urge upon Mr. Whiting to continue the study of such masters as he presented in his concert.

The audience enjoyed the selection highly and especially after the minor pieces, such as Mendelssohn's Wedding March or Mozart's F minor Fantasia for a musical clock, applauded very heartily.

We should have noticed this entertainment in our last week's issue had not the pressure of other matter prevented it.

A very pleasant surprise the "Second Social Orchestral Entertainment" of the Boston Mozart Club gave us. We were not prepared to see so many amateurs together, much less to hear them play so well. It certainly reflects much credit on their leader, Mr. Suck, to have trained his orchestra of about thirty performers so well. The programme included the E flat symphony by Haydn, probably the most beautiful he wrote, the overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" by Mozart, and the Concert Overture by Kalliwoda in C. We noticed as especially good the string-quartette and the horn. This way of meeting together for the love of music solely without an eye to the dollar is a pleasant sign of progress among us. We hope the B. M. C. will flourish and prosper, and by giving such fine entertainments as this was, do their share in the good work of improving public taste. They have our congratulations and best wishes. *

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—We regret to have lost the last afternoon concert, which offered unusual attraction, as may be seen from the programme which we subjoin. We learn that the house was crowded again.

1. Overture—Der Freyschutz.....Weber
 2. Marcia Funebre.....Chopin
(Arranged for the Orchestral Union) by G. Kopitz.
 3. Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
 4. Les Préludes.....Liszt
 5. Selections from Huguenots.....Meyerbeer
- The next concert we are promised Mendelssohn's Symphony, No. 1; Suppe's Overture, "The Farmer and the Poet," Romanza "L'Eclair," and Lanner's Concert Waltz "Jubil."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 11.—Before this letter reaches you, the opera company lately playing in the city will have appeared in Boston. The season here has been totally successful until the last week when the receipts fell off fearfully.

Miss Kellogg has been the chief novelty after the new opera Un Ballo in Maschera. She sang moderately well on the occasion of her debut, and exceedingly well at a matinée performance of Linda on Saturday. The opera season has altogether been the longest ever known in the history of our Academy. The new opera has proved a genuine success and is already very popular. The foreign music dealers have sent on for additional copies of the score, and our home dealers have given commissions to arrangers, to prepare piano arrangements of the principal airs.

There has been considerable concertising of late. Gustave Satter has given two matinée performances, both of which were well attended and have done the pianist much credit. Rapetti the violinist and opera conductor gives a concert to-night at Irving Hall, at which his daughter sings and several instrumental soloists assist. To-morrow Miss Emma Roweroft gives a vocal matinée, the first part composed exclusively of sacred music.

As the first of May approaches, there is commotion and agitation among church choirs and many important changes will take place this season. At St Stephen's Roman Catholic church, where Charles Wels plays, and Isadora Clark sings, there will be quite a revolution. A Signor Speranza who made a fiasco at the Academy of Music some months ago under Strakosch's regime, will take charge of the choir and young Morra, a son of the useful Madame Morra who takes the subordinate parts in the operas will be the organist. In Episcopal choirs revolutions will be numerous and complete. TROVATOR.

NEW YORK, MARCH 12.—On Friday last Mr. Satter gave a second Matinée, which was, however not quite as well attended as the first one. Among the audience assembled, however, there were sundry very restless spirits, who, by constantly changing their seats, or standing up in the middle of the room, close by the piano, and consulting about the best place, not only annoyed other people exceedingly, but obliged Mr. Satter to make a very inappropriate pause between the movements of the piece he was playing. This latter was the Pastoral Symphony, in Liszt's two-hand arrangement. It is about as perfect a reproduction of the orchestra as it is possible for the piano to give, and Mr. Satter played it exquisitely. In the second part he gave Fantasies of his own on the Huguenots and Don Pasquale and a banquet of short pieces, consisting of Chopin's lovely A minor waltz, a Midnight Barcarole by J. Hopkins, a very pleasing and original composition indeed, and a Ballade, "Loreley," by himself, also a striking piece. A request for an improvisation was handed in, but with no effect this time. And indeed, one ought to be satisfied with the variety and many-sidedness of Mr. Satter's repertoire. Technically, he is equally successful in every possible style of music, whether this can be said of the spirit of his interpretations, every one must judge for himself, and by his own feeling and taste.

Another Matinée is announced for next Friday. A Miss Lesermann, a singer, made her debut last week in a miscellaneous concert at Irving Hall, assisted by a number of our leading artists. Last evening Sig. Rapetti brought out his daughter, Miss Cecilia R., in the same capacity at a similar concert, and it is said with great success. A third vocal débutante, a Miss Emma Roweroft made her appearance at a matinée this afternoon. Add to these our two new operative acquisitions, Misses Hineckley and Kellogg, and no one can say that vocal music is not flourishing among us. You will hear from other sources of charming little Miss Kellogg's success in Linda. She seemed just made for the part, and there is something so winning and ladylike about her, as if she had just stepped from our midst upon the stage, that we cannot help feeling the warmest interest in her progress and success. — t —

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 12.—Messrs. Editors: The preponderating taste of this musical municipality appears to be for popular orchestral concerts; the Germania Rehearsals have always paid; the Promenade Concerts at the Academy of Music were always successful; and at different times the crowded audiences that greeted Gungl and Jullien, show proof that the efforts of a well trained and well directed orchestra are sure to meet with appreciative support and encouragement in Philadelphia.

On Monday next a series of popular concerts, after the style of Jullien, are to be inaugnated at Concert Hall; we are then promised the production of the best works by the best composers; with the assistance at times of a numerous and competent chorus. The management of affairs, musical and financial, is to be in the hands of Mr. ENGELKE, well known as a musician of the greatest ability and, par excellence, as a gentleman. He has in his possession for reproduction the best part of the orchestral scores, originally belonging to the great Jullien, with which great man he was long associated on terms of the most friendly professional intimacy. Mr. Engelke certainly brings ability sufficient for its accomplishment to the undertaking, and with the assistance of the people he can make these concerts a great and permanent success.

The monotony pervading our musical life is to be agreeably relieved in a few weeks by a short season of opera, including representations of "La Juive," "Un Ballo in maschera," by way of novelty, and the old stock of "Martha" and "La Traviata," by way of novelty, too, I suppose. * * * *

An incorporated institution of many years existence here is the Quartette party at the house of Mr. M., on Market street, on an afternoon of the week, which, since I write from Philadelphia shall be nameless. Mr. M., has the finest quartette of stringed instruments perhaps in the country; his repertoire, of its kind and its way, is very full and very perfect; and of a consequence the resident talent here most do congregate. Should you be so fortunate as to drop down among us at any time, you must get the Directory, or call on the Mayor, who being a religious man will doubtless direct you to the spot.

MERCUTIS.

MONROE, MICH., FEB. 23.—The celebration of our cherished anniversary—Washington's Birth-day, was not confined to large cities, or particular sections of the country, and if we, of the Western country, outside of the cities, do not always make so much of a show of our enthusiasm it is no less heart-felt and earnest.

Among the demonstrations of the day in this quiet little city was the concert given at the Seminary, a programme of which I append, which was received with marked favor and shows I think a good degree of conscientious desire for good music in a Female Seminary as also the manner in which the music was received, an appreciation of music above the dance-music of the day.

PART I.

1. Duo—a 2 Pianos—"Recollections".....Miss Chandler and Mr. Chamberlin.
2. Piano Solo—Andante, op. 32.....Thalberg
Miss Gustine.
3. Vocal Duett—"Speed My Bark".....Neukomm
Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlin.
4. Piano Solo—"Yankee Doodle".....Strakosch
Miss Chandler.
5. Song—"Friend of the Brave".....Caleott
Mr. Chamberlin.

PART II.

1. Piano Solo—Sonata, op. 26.....Beethoven
1 Andante. 2 Marcia funebre. 3 Allegro.
Mr. Chamberlin.
2. Vocal Duett—"Swallow's Farewell".....Kucken
Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlin.
3. Piano Solo—"Moise".....Thalberg
Miss Chandler.
4. Song—"Our Native Song".....Russell
Mr. Chamberlin.
5. Piano Solo—"Silver Spring".....Mason
Mr. Chamberlin.

The city paper in speaking of the concert uses the following language:—

THE CONCERT AT THE SEMINARY.—The concert at the Young Ladies' Seminary on Friday evening last, given by Prof. Chamberlin and his pupils, in honor of the officers and members of the U. C. D. Society, was very largely attended, and was a pleasant affair. The study hall was filled to its utmost capacity. The performances both of Mr. Chamberlin and his pupils, Misses Chandler and Gnstine, were excellent. The "Swallow's Farewell," sung by Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlain, was excellently done, and by request was repeated. "Our Native Song," and "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," were both well performed by Mr. Chamberlin. C.

WORCESTER, MASS., FEB. 27.—Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream was read at Mechanic's Hall, on the evening of the 22d inst., by Prof. Russell of Lancaster, with Mendelssolin's music which was performed by a select choir and by Mr. B. D. Allen and Mrs. E. B. Dame, pianists. The reading did not meet the expectations of the large audience, but the music was exceedingly well performed, thanks to Mr. Allen, to whose direction it had been intrusted.

On Sunday evening the Mozart Society gave a concert for the benefit of a pet object of our charities, the Orphans' Home, and a most successful concert it was. Under Mr. Frost's direction the choruses went off finely. It is rare to hear them sung with such expression, and in such excellent time. The singers, a hundred and fifty in number, took them up readily, and sang in truth, with "spirit and understanding." We must mention, as especially good, the "Wonderful" chorus, All we like Sheep, Behold the Lamb of God, and the Hallelujah, which always carries inspiration with it. Mr. Stocking sang Comfort ye, with smoothness, and correct execution; also, Thou shalt dash them. Mrs. Pierce's musical alto, with more earnestness of manner, would have made us pleasantly remember O thou that tellest. Mr. Lawrence gave The people that walked in darkness with very good effect. Miss Fiske sang well in Rejoice greatly; and, I know that my Redeemer liveth, that great song of faith, she sang as one feeling its mighty truths. Miss Muzzy, whom we heard for the first time, sang Come unto Him with much sweetness, but there was a lack of correct intonation. Mrs. Hill's He was despised, was one of the fine things of the evening. Mr. Sargent, a new-comer, astonished and pleased all by his artistic rendering of Why do the nations, and The Trumpet shall sound. One rarely hears recitatives better sung than they were by most of the singers. The orchestra, fifteen members, rendered efficient aid under Mr. Burt's direction, and Mrs. Hammond's piano-accompaniments were deservedly commended.

Popular and patriotic concerts are the fashion this week. Miss Lizzie Heywood and Master Rentz appear at one to-morrow night. A concert by resident talent will be announced next week, the proceeds to be added to the Kansas contributions. The Mendelssolin Quintette Club give the last concert of their series on Friday evening, with Mrs. Kempton vocalist. Their programme is hardly up to the usual mark. It contains, however Mozart's Clarinetto Quintette, and the Fifth Symphony Adagio. S.

Another American Singer.

In the Signale, (Leipsic) we find the following notice of Miss Jenny Busk a young lady of Baltimore, Md., who has been studying music for eight years in Germany.

The cantatrice, Miss Jenny Busk, a young American, who has finished her studies in the conservatory at Leipsic, has lately attracted much notice. We remember that this genuine child of the New World excited already, while at school, extraordinary hopes, which now seem about to be realized, as she has lately sung in the cities in the vicinity of Leipsic with great success, as we learn from the reports now before us. Dr. E. Baldamus speaks, in the Cothen Gazette, concerning her concert given on the 12th of December, as follows:—"This cantatrice unites all excellencies of a good school with a pleasant voice, pure and certain intonation, perfect control over her means, symmetric formation of sound, extreme purity and elegance of the colorature, noble tact in the accents of her performance, and, above all, the spirit of a clear perception, together with an enthusiast appreciation of the art and the composition. We desire that Miss Busk should appear before a Leipsic public and grant them the enjoyment of her fine talents."

Music Abroad.

PARIS.—At the Theatre Imperial Italien, The Barber, H Matrimonio Segreto and Don Giovanni have been given lately. The Gazette Musicale says that Mozart's chef d'œuvre demands an ensemble of artists very difficult to be found, and that the cast this year left much to be desired in several rôles. Mme. Penco alone was complete in that of Donna Anna. M'lle Marie Battu gave with much taste and life the part of Zerlina. M'lle Dalmondi who made her debut as Donna Elvira had a feeble or exhausted voice, with no medium tones, singing true however, — a great quality. Gardoni and Zucchini filled well the parts of don Ottavio and Leporello. As for Mario, he was entirely Don Juan in his splendid black dress à la Henri II., in his sword, his cane and in the serenade Deh! vien alla finestra which he sang deliciously.

He seemed however to care but little for the rest and sang the Fin che dal vino almost like couplets in a vaudeville, rather spoken than sung. But what odd stage play had he conceived for the finale of the first act? Instead of the sword he has only a poniard, with which he threatens Leporello, and, in the moment of the general tumult, when every body is against him, his valet brings him two enormous pistols, beautiful works of art, no doubt, but which, in the hands of a gentleman of that epoch, produce a very singular effect. Why does not Mario understand that Don Juan and the revolver ought to have nothing in common? Why not a rifled cannon? The masked trio was encoered, (just as it always is here) and Mme. Penco was complimented with a bouquet.

LEIPSIK.—The Neue Zeitschrift reports that "In a concert given by F. Menzel in the Schützenhaus, Mr. Carl Hause from Boston took part. He played only compositions of his own, and was applauded for the mechanical dexterity which he displayed and which is quite commendable. We refrain from saying more until we have heard him in works of other composers."

London.

At Her Majesty's Theatre Fra Diavolo has been produced with M'lle Parepa as Zerlina. Wallace's Amber Witch was announced as to follow. At the Royal English Opera, Stoepel's Liwatha was brought out (Feb. 11) by Miss Pyne and Harrison with Mad. Stoepel, (Matilda Heron) as reader of the poem. The Musical World speaks favorably of the composition. Balfe's Satanella followed with Miss Pyne and Harrison. Concerts are numerous. The Monday Popular Concerts at St. James' Hall gave a programme made up entirely of Beethoven. The Musical World says of it:

The entire programme was devoted to Beethoven, and comprised no less than four chefs d'œuvre of the great "tone-poet"—two for the first time, at the Monday Popular Concerts. The Quartet in C major (op. 59), which has been already heard at these concerts (Nov. 14, 1859), and is the last of the three dedicated to Count Rasoumowski, the Russian ambassador at Vienna, and, as all our readers know, one of the most strikingly original of the stringed compositions of the great master. Enough to say that in the hands of Messrs. Vieuxtemps, Ries, Schreurs and Piatti, the performance left nothing for the most fastidiously hypercritical taste to desire. So in the trio in C minor for violin, viola and violoncello (the last of four), which was equally faultless in execution, and made a worthy commencement to the second part, the performers being summoned forward at the end.

To Miss Arabella Goddard the musical public is in a great measure indebted for the resuscitation of Beethoven's latest piano-forte solos—the envy and despair of those with less intellectual grasp and manipulative skill who consequently pronounced these works as meaningless and unplayable—the truth being that they lacked the comprehension to understand and the fingers to execute such wholly exceptional compositions. Opus 111—the thirty-second and last of the sonatas of Beethoven—was introduced by Miss Goddard some time since at one of her memorable soirées, and its reproduction at the Monday Popular Concerts was looked forward to with much interest, the op. 109 (E major) having been so well received in March last year. That the expectation formed was by no means deceived may be readily understood by those who know how thorough a mistress of her part is Miss Goddard, the audience showing the most strict attention and the warmest appreciation of this truly magnificent sonata, after her matchless execution of which she was unanimously recalled into the orchestra and applauded with the heartiest enthusiasm.

The last piece formed an appropriate climax to the very admirable selection of the evening,—every note of the now familiar Kreutzer sonata being enjoyed to the full and applauded to the echo. Indeed it has rarely been our lot to listen to such a marvellously spirited performance—Miss Goddard and M. Vieuxtemps outshining even themselves, and both being ing recalled at the end.

FATHER KEMP'S OLD FOLKS.—An American entertainment without the nigger element is a novelty to commence with. Here we have a troupe of minstrels, wanting the conventional blackened faces and red ruled shirts, illustrating the various actions and passions of humanity by the power of music, and making themselves agreeable without bones, banjos, and muscular contortions. Father Kemp's Old Folks have the least possible pretensions to anything out of the way. Their sole peculiarity consists in their costume, which professes to be that of "one hundred years ago," and which certainly look odd enough to belong to a century or two more remote. The troupe consists of thirty ladies and gentlemen, part forming the orchestra, part chorus, and a few soaring into the empyrean of single voices. The orchestra is not very powerful, nor is the choral force remarkable for its strength, but they sing and play well together, and Father Kemp marshals them in a skillful manner. Of the solo singers we must specify—Miss Emma J. Nichols, "the favorite young American vocalist," as she is styled, who may without violence, though young, be denominated the vocal soul of the Old Folks. Miss Nichols has a very fine, powerful contralto voice of peculiarly telling quality, and which she manages with sufficient ease, although apparently without much art. To a real vocaliser such a voice would prove an immediate fortune. The young lady is an immense favorite already with the audience of the lower room at St. James' Hall, where the Old Folks are now exhibiting, and gives some of her songs nightly—more especially "The captain with the whiskers," with an effect hardly to be described. The rest of the company do not number among them any Sims, Reeveses or Louisa Pynes.

VERDI IN PARLIAMENT.—Our readers who now and then hum "Il Balen," "La mia Letizia," and dozens of other popular melodies, will be glad to hear that Verdi, who is an ardent liberal (not republican) politician, has been elected a member of the Italian parliament. Through the spirited medium of Reuter's telegraph, we have received an anticipatory report of his maiden speech, which is as follows:—Care campagne e voi teneri amici, I am glad to meet you on the parliamentary stage of our beloved country, and I trust my humble efforts may be instrumental introducing concord and harmony in our deliberations, and composing our fears. Let us, amici miei, act together in concert, and soon our beloved Italia will no longer be a Traviata among nations. Under the guidance of our Ré Galantuomo, we will also soon free la Bella Venezia from Austrian tyrants, and when he cries to us, "Suivez moi" and "Vieni in Roma," let our response as a band of brothers, be Guerra, guerra! and if our words are piano let our blows be forte, so that the finale of our operations may be a blaze of triumph, such as Il Signor Bunn, miò coro amico Ingles, never dreamed of in his most poetic flights. With such a leader and conductor as Vittore Emmanuele and chefs d'attaque like Garibaldi, Cialdini, Persano, and other great warlike artists, we must succeed; and though the Pope and Francis Joseph, on the score of some of my works being produced in Rome and Venice, style me a double base traitor, my aria d'entrata shall ever be Viva P Italia Unita. Let us repeal overtures on any other terms, either from foreign, royal, and imperial managers, or the sediziosi voci of Bombastic bravoes and reactionary prompters. This speech which was delivered in recitative, excited the greatest furor, and the members were so excited, that for several minutes the cries of "Bravo" and "encore" shook the building.—Liverpool Porcupine.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Speak to thy lone one now. Song and Chorus.

Fred. Wilson. 25

A sweet song, nightly encoered at Wilson and Morris' minstrels.

Angel of youth. (L'ange des jeunes filles.) Song.

Concone. 25

A charming French Romance, well adapted for young French students.

Go from the city. (Della Citta.) Terzetto in Verdi's "Un ballo in maschera." 50

One of the finest ensemble pieces in the Opera. All the other gems are also published.

Instrumental Music.

Yankee Doodle. Varied by A. Baumbach. 35

There has long been wanting just such an arrangement of this venerable air, as is here furnished. It is written for the great mass of players. Those wanting elaborate arrangements will find those of Charles Voss and Krug both interesting and brilliant.

Kyrie from Mozart's 12th Mass. 4 hds. Rimbault. 15

Bona nobis pacae. " " 15

The marvellous works. " " 15

Vital spark of heavenly flame. " " 15

Very simple arrangements.

God save the Queen. Varied. A. Baumbach. 35

An excellent arrangement of medium difficulty.

Union Quadrille. J. S. Knight. 35

Fine, spirited music, calling to mind some of Strauss' vigorous strains with whose best Quadrilles the author is evidently familiar. It is composed for the Union Sociable and is first rate to dance by. Figures are added.

Moreau de Concert en forme de Polonaise.

H. A. Wollenhaupt. 75

The last of a series of four compositions which have been announced through these columns. The good Pianists all over the States cannot help taking notice of these pieces. They will soon be heard in Exhibitions, Concerts, in the music-room of the professor and the parlor of the fashionable dilettante.

Books.

DITSON & CO'S STANDARD OPERA LIBRETTOS, each 25

The librettos of twenty-three Standard Operas are now published of this admirable Series, rendered popular by their correctness of text, excellence of typography, and convenience of size. During the present season of opera in this city they have been found quite indispensable with those who sought to enjoy, understandingly, the performance; and we have no doubt that in all other localities they will be found equally desirable. They contain an Italian and English text, an epitome of the plot, and the music of all the principal Airs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 468.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 25.

Il Giuramento.

In the year One thousand four hundred and blank
A lady performed a most singular prauk,
For against all precedents anywhere heard,
The female in question did keep her word;
Which fact is so queer,
You may fancy to hear
How such a phenomenon chanced to appear.

Taormina (the name of a town you must know,
In Lippincott's Gazetteer put down just so,
And not, as Librettos might lead you to think,
A man or a woman, or something to drink)
Taormina, I say,
A Sicilian cite.

Was the scene one time of a brilliant soirée;
Though if the Academy shows it up fair
I'm not very sorry I wasn't asked there,
For it seems a witch Sabbath of frightful old girls
With very thick ankles and very false curls,
And gents who, unvouchered for as princes and earls,
Would show a clear cross between cut-throats and ehurls.

You'd be frightend to meet
Such a set in the street,
If the watchman, per custom, was far from his beat.
Which leads us to drop this small inquiry, in—
Why choruses always are ugly as sin?

But while Sicily's upper-ten belledom and beaux,
Are singing away more or less through the nose,
Viscardo (Brignoli) stark straddles ahead,
With his larynx of silver, and pedals of lead.

And makes a great show
Of sighing and wo,
About an old sweetheart, lost some time ago.
Yet methinks all his grief may be all in my eye,
For he's having a very good time on the sly,
With a much fairer lady, hight Colson, that is Elaisa—which seems the Italian for Liz—
Who's thick too with Count Manfred, unprincipled dame!
She's flirting with both in a deep double game!

And when caught making eyes
At the wrong man, she lies,
And says she's but thinking of dad in the skies,
And a Vow to be paid,
An incognito maid,

Who saved that papa in a John Brownish raid.
But no one was good in that dissolute day,
For the Count, too, behaves like a perfect roué,
Quite horrid to see in a gent fiancé!

Now a certain Brunoro, at singing a stick,
But in mouthing and gestures, the very old Nick,
Hates Bianca, Manfredo's intended that is,
Since in stealing a kiss, he got slapped on the phiz,
So he hints the new bride that his countship has got,
Is the same girl that Viscardo is trying to spot,

Then, to add to the fun,
Tells Eliza she's done,

For her lover is off and her rival has won.
Thus, when the foud pair try to bill and to coo,
They suddenly get in no eud of a stew,
For Eliza pops in, like a jealous old shrew,
And cries with great gout

For the Count and his crew
To settle the hash of the amorous two.
But just as you wait for the mischief's own row,
She finds that Bianca's the girl of her vow,
Whom she's bound to befriend though thick and through thin!
So you see what a peckle Eliza is in!

Then she dowses her jib,
Tells a whopping big fib,
And the Count rests content with his destinate rib,
When the men, in the notion that everything's right,
Stir their stumps to go off on a jolly good fight.

But Cupid soon after will put in his oar,
And get the poor lovers in troubles once more.

So Viscardo the true,
As from hattle he flew,
Must needs send his lady a small billet-doux,
Which gets to Manfredo and gives him the cue.
Why won't swains be content with whispers and busses,
And not send these letters to get them in fusses!
For the Count works his soul to a terrible fume,
And shuts up his bride in his family tomah,

And thereupon asks, with politeness surprisin'
She'd drink to his health in a cup of cold pisiu!
But Eliza is minding her P's and her Q's,
And her friend, by her aid, prussic acid eschews,
Takes Daffy's elixir and gets a good snooze.

But oh! lackaday!
There's the dickens to pay!
Eliza won't live when her beau's gone away,
And thinks that her hopes will be satisfied wholly
If she could only die by the hand of Brignoli!

So tells fib number three,
Says she killed his Amie,
And gets stabbed by her sweetheart as pat as can be.
But,—all lady-killers take note if you please,—
This slaughtering damsel is not the right cheese

For just after the blow,
When the victim cries "O,"

Bianca wakes up and asks what's the go;
So Viscardo finds out in his folly and fury
He's like to be tried by a Coroner's jury.

Then Colson, before she goes off in a fit,
Wants Brignoli to pet her a little wee bit;
But he's under a han,
The unfortunate man!

Either acting 's a science he never could span,
Or public affection is not in his plan,
So poor Colson dies in the best way she can.

MORAL.

The point of this tale

Remember! don't fail!

It may save you from premature kicking the pail—
Don't swear! yea and nay are the best institutions,
And 'tis fearfully rash to make good resolutions!

And ladies! take warning besides, from the rhyme.

Don't favor two lovers at any one time!

You'll be sure to be hurt,

If so greedy a flirt;

And between the two stools you will fall in the dirt!

Philadelphia Bulletin.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

IX, (Continued.)

OPERA.

1700—1800.

June 8th, 1781, another fire destroyed the new opera hall of the Palais-Royal. As after the last work of Rameau, so, one may say, after that of Gluck, the fire was determined to prevent that vaulted roof still echoing to the sublime accords of the master, from being long profaned by the vulgar and paltry airs of his unworthy rivals. Be that as it may, twenty-one human bodies were found in the ruins. Three capuchins perished victims to their duty. Rey, chief of the orchestra, saved with great difficulty the score of his Coronis from the flames, and Lefebvre, the librarian, faithful to his post in the danger, did not quit the spot until the last manuscript had been placed in safety. Opera, houseless for sixty-six days, found a refuge in the hall of the Menus-plaisirs, where the Devin du village and then Echo et Narcisse were reproduced. Lenoir, the architect went rapidly on with a new building; and in less than three months finished the theatre of the Porte-Saint-Martin, which was opened to the public Oct. 27, 1781.

To recompense Lenoir, the queen, who had just given birth to a Dauphin, granted him the order of St. Michel, and a pension of 6,000 livres.

From this time to the Revolution of 1789, the principal successful works performed at the Academie Royale, were:

1. Colinette a la Cour, by Gretry, Jan 1, 1782.
2. Renard, by Sacchini, an Italian composer, befriended by the Queen.
3. Didon, by Piccini, in which Madame Saint-Huberti gained real triumphs.
4. La Caravane du Caire, text by the Comte de Provence, music by Gretry.
5. Les Danaïdes, music by Salieri, pupil of Gluck, (1784).
6. Le Deserteur, a delicious ballad, by Maximilian Gardel.
7. Panurge, a happy work of the Comte de Provence and Gretry.
8. La Toison d'or, text Desvieux, music Vogel, (1786).
9. Œdipe a Colone, a magnificent success for Guillard (text), Sacchini and the actor Cheron.
10. Tavane, opera in 5 acts, text Beaumarchais, music Salieri (1787).
11. Le roi Theodore, by Paisiello, followed by Cherubini, who was then beating between the styles of Piccini and Gluck.
12. Les Pretendus, by Lemoyne, an opera the success of which caused Sacchini to die of chagrin, in his despair at seeing the Queen forced to support, to his detriment, a French rival.
13. Finally, the Demophon of Vogel; this opera had a posthumous success, as in case of the Œdipe a Colone, and in our own times Les Puritanis of Bellini, and Le Pre aux Clercs, of Herold.

Vogel, worn out by disappointment, died at the age of thirty-two; he had waited seven years to see the ninth performance of the Toison d'or, a score of much merit, dedicated to Gluck. Dauvergne, director of the opera, had advanced him the money for his manuscript, to get him out of trouble. Meantime, from 1782, Louis XVI. had paid attention to the Academie; he began by reducing to the half its excessive cost, and, in 1784, he established a number of prizes for operatic texts. Then he bought the theatre of the Porte-Saint-Martin, laid a stamp upon music, the revenue of which went towards the expenses of the school of singing and declamation established by the Baron de Breteuil; and in 1787, issued a set of wise ordinances for the regulation of the theatre. But the tempest's voice was heard already growling in the distance; Sept. 20, 1791, the royal family appeared for the last time at the opera. The play was Castor and Pollux.

The revolutionary period had begun. July 30, 1790, the actors of the opera executed, in the church of Notre Dame, the Prise de la Bastille, a sort of musical drama by Mare Antoine Desaugiers. A profitable reproduction of Rameau's Castor and Pollux, retouched by Caudeille, took place June 14, 1791; the liberty of the theatres was proclaimed in the laws of the January 13 and March 2 following.

The actors' names were, for the first time, printed upon the posters, on occasion of the performance of the Offrande a la Liberté, an operaballet, by Pierre Gardel and Gossec. It was a putting in action of the Marsellaise, Mlle. Mail-lard, placed upon a small mountain, representing Liberty.

From the 1st of April, 1792, the city of Paris eeded the opera to citizens Francoeur and Cellerier, and in 1793,—that year of dark memories,—Hebert made out a list of 22 names, which held the members of the opera within due limits by the fear of the scaffold. They played the Triomphe de la Republique, by Chenier; Siegè de Thionville, by Jadin; Apotheose de Marat et de Lepelletier, executed upon the boulevard in front of the opera house. Suddenly, Sept. 16th, Francoeur was imprisoned at La Force, where he remained a year upon an accusation of having put malicious obstacles in the way of bringing out an opera on the subject of the Passion de Jesus Christ. Sixteen persons belonging to the theatre perished by violence from 1792 to 1794.

In the midst of these sanguinary horrors, was celebrated in Notre Dame, Dec. 10, 1793, La Fete de la Raison et de la Liberté, in which the beautiful Madame Sophie Momoro, the wife of a bookseller, was forced by her husband to represent the principal part. The unhappy creature wept with vexation, and shivered, naked to the public gaze, the thermometer being below freezing point. Next day at four o'clock was a second performance, which terminated in a veritable orgie and in bacchanalian excesses of the lowest kind.

In 1794 were played Horatius Cocles, by Arnault and Mehul; a Sans Culottide, in 5 acts, a lyric medley, by Maline and Porta, under the title of the Reunion du 10 Août; and the Rosiere republicaine, by Marechal and Gretry. On the 8th of June of the same year, Louis David, the painter, and Maximilian Robespierre had caused to be performed an ambulatory ballet in the public squares, entitled Fête a l'Etre supreme, (Festival in honor of the Supreme Being!). A hymn, text by Desorgnes, music by Gossec, beginning with the words, Père de l'Universe, was distributed gratis in thousands of copies among the people.

That was a time of hymns of every sort; le Chant du depart by J. Chenier and Mehul, was contrasted with the Reveil du peuple, music by Pierre Gaveaux. A decree of Jan. 4, 1796 forbade the singing of the latter piece, as being tainted with royalism.

That was surely an extraordinary period in which we find behind the scenes of the opera, the Marquis de Louvais, performing the functions of assistant machinist, Perne and Villoteau, men worthy of seats in the Institute, reduced to the humble employment of singing in choruses.

After the fall of Robespierre, the architects Cellerier and Fontaine caused the busts of Marat and Lepelletier, which had been placed (Oct. 23, 1793,) in the proscenium of the opera, to be destroyed; and, Aug. 7, following, the theatre was transferred to the Rue Richelieu, upon the site of the hotel Louvais, by virtue of a decree of the committee of public safety, dated April 14, 1794.

It is said that Henriot, a believer in the uselessness of reading, had expressed the hope, in supporting this proposition, that through the vicinity of a building so likely to be destroyed by fire, his horrible motion to burn the Library, might thus be effected.

With the change of place the opera changed its name to Theatre des Arts. Now, for the first, seats were placed in the parterre. Masked balls were introduced Dec. 20, 1796, but no novelty was produced during the sixteen months from Aug. 10, 1795 to Jan. 17, 1797. On this day Gretry obtained a splendid success by his Anacreeon, which was produced with the celebrated singer, Lays. Worthy of remark were an air of the tyrant Polystrate, sung by Adrien, and a solo for clarinet, played to perfection by Lefèvre. The public became gradually disgusted with the eternal performance of republican plays, and the old operas again came upon the stage; purified, however, by democratic arrangers.

July 28, 1798, the performances were suspended upon occasion of the triumphal entry of the works of art from Italy—the plunder of Gen. Bonaparte. The entire operatic troop figured in the procession. After being closed some two months, the theatre, splendidly refitted, opened its doors again, when Mlle. Chevalier made her first appearance in the part of Antigone. She was afterward the celebrated Madame Branchu.

In 1799 the concerts of Garat, Rode and Duvernoy brought receipts to the amount of 15,000 francs.

June 4, Adrien, by Hoffman and Mehul, had a fair reception; Mehul was an imitator of Gluck; he had not yet risen to the height which he afterwards attained. The salaries of the premiers sujets, which, in 1776, were 6,000 livres, were now raised to 12,000 francs. At this time the principal singers were Cheron, Lays, Lainez, and Mesdames Maillard, Cheron and Latour; dancers, Vestris, Milon, Gogon and Mlles. Clotilde, Chevigny and Gardel. Catel was accompanist, and Rey head of the orchestra.

Nov. 11, 1799 was the second day after the 18th Brumaire. The opera was Les Pretendus, and the words of the quartet struck the entire audience. As Julie and her lover sang "Victoire! victoire éclatante!" the applause was great. The Pretendus reply "C'est notre retraite qu'on chante." The applause became furious when the latter added to their refusal, "Mais attendez au moins que nous soyons partis."

Nov. 27, Hero et Leandre, a ballet in one act, by Milon, had a complete success, Mlle. Ninette Duport made her first appearance in the part of Amour, and Mlle. Clotilde-Pallas danced the pyrrhic with a grace only equalled by her vigor and nobleness of mien.

Finally, Dec. 31, 1799, there was a grand production of Armide, upon a scale of vast luxury and splendor. The price of the tickets for amphitheatre and orchestra was raised to 10 francs for the first three representations.

Armand Vestris made his first appearance in the Caravane, being brought forward by his father and his uncle—a new triumph for that family. Cellerier was now joined by Devismes and by Bonet de Treiches, an ex member of the convention, in the direction of the opera.

We have omitted to mention that upon the 20th of March, 1793, a translation of Mozart's Marriage of Figaro had been produced. This masterpiece, so very successful at a later period, was not at first comprehended. True the delicate music of this master of masters, must have been in singular contrast to that of the Apotheose de Beaupaire or the Siege de Thionville. Mozart had been in Paris from the 23d of March to the end of October, 1778, but had been unable to obtain the composition of any work for the stage. In one of his letters he writes: "It is very difficult to find a good text, the old ones, which are the best, are not framed after the modern style, and the new ones are good for nothing; for poetry, the only thing of which the French may be proud, is declining daily; and it is just here that the poetry ought to be good, since they knew nothing of music. There are but two texts which would suit me. The first, in two acts, is Alexandre et Roxane. The second, in three acts, is Demophon, translated from Metastasio, diversified by choruses and ballets, and adapted to the French stage. If they should order an opera of me, I should have much to trouble me; but that causes me little disquietude; I am already used to that. And then this wretched French language is abominable for music. It is really a pity. German is divine in comparison. And the singers, Good God! They do not deserve the name, for they do not sing; they scream, they bowl with full strength of lungs, through their throats and noses." We see, that the opinions of this Raphael of music, expressed in 1778, are perfectly apt to our own epoch.

Music and Musical Criticism.

SCUDO ON VERDI—CIMAROSA'S MATRIMONIO SEGRETO—THE ITALIAN OPERA AT PARIS.

I.

(Continued from page 404.)

The sweet spring has suddenly departed; clouds have passed over the bright sun; the soft west wind has changed and become fitful and moaning; heavy gray clouds come looming up around the horizon, and the little hound terrier grows restless and wakeful.

We have searched out and dwelt on all our favorite passages in this lovely Opera. The "E vero che in casa," which makes one think of Mozart and of Grètry's saying that Cimarosa put the pedestals in the orchestra, and the statue on the stage, while Mozart did just the opposite.

In this passage, the orchestral pedestal is covered with such lovely relieves, that the petulant little Fidama statue is comparatively quiet.

The sun was beaming very brightly when we enjoyed that cantabile movement of Carolina, in which she expresses her short lived, but honest indignation at the "Disgrazia meschinella!

Io rival di mia sorella!"

Such exquisite taste is displayed in this. A Verdi would have thrown this "Deh lasciate ch'io respiro" into an "Ercles vein;" but the discreet Cimarosa knew how such a quiet little woman as Carolina ought to express her indignation; it was not of the Bohemienne or even the poor artist form, "full of sound and fury, often signifying nothing" alas!—but the quiet expression of a conventional anger, that always means something.

And here we have come to the Farinelli duo finale, just as the window has to be lowered, the fire stirred up, and the sombre grey of February winter accepted after all the sweet hopeful promise of the morning. So we shut up the opera book, put it back on the music shelf, take up the fretful little terrier who is protesting in howls as sharp as M. Scudio's criticisms against the music, and return to the magazine article.

Ah! here we come across some other musical people we know of—Mario and Ronconi. They sang in November, at the Theatre Italien, in the Barber of Seville. Mario still looks young, Scudo says; but his voice, which might formerly have softened the hearts of savage beasts, can do so no longer. He possesses only a few notes, now, of that fine key board which was once his; he shortens his passages, breathes at every syllable, and often sings false.

Ronconi, too, who has not sung in Paris for a decade of years, shows alas! that he is human. His "Figaro" Scudo pronounces a burlesque, and he says the fastidious Parisian audience were little pleased with the attempt which he and Mario made, of putting a lively little dialogue in the place of Rossini's music.

The troupe of the Théâtre Italien has some familiar names in it: Mmes Alboni, Penco and Battu. The chef d'orchestre, M. Bonnetti, is sadly displeasing to M. Sando. He only understands Verdi's music, and such an one is not a good chef d'orchestre.

"We shall never cease repeating this common place truth," he says; "the power of music, as that of all arts, consists in the careful observation of shades; without this attention to the delicate lights and shadows, which make up the character of a work, music is no more than gross effects of rhythm and sonorosity, which soon fatigue us."

At the French Opera, there appeared in October, a singer who delighted the Philadelphians one bright spring some ten years or so ago—Tedesco. We remember, she was the prima donna of a Havana troupe, which troupe left, as its musical waves swept back, Perelli, high and dry on the shores of our amateur musical society. He gave up the training of gay young Tedesco opera singers, and took to teaching the young Miss Grundys "to aggravate their voices," so that, like "sweet bully Bottom," "They could roar you as gently as any sucking dove, aye, an 'twere any nightingale."

In the meanwhile, his buxom Tedesco pupil has grown and waxed strong in fame and voice. Scudo says she is a placid, good humored singer, who never gets in a passion; she never tries "the Ereles vein the part to tear a cat in, to make all things split;" she preserves religiously her fine voice and health, which are both as fresh as if no fatal decade of years had passed over them.

She lacks only one thing to make of her a great dramatic singer,—that which Roland's horse needed—un certo non so che, a soul, a spirit, a breath, as the Bible calls it.

In M. Scudo's passing notice of the Theatre Lyrique he makes this characteristic remark apropos of Gluck's Orpheus:

"In the order of sensations which the Fine Arts give us, the romance in Orpheus, 'J'ai perdu mon Eurydice,' and the music in the Elysian scene, second act, are worth more, yes, count more in the sight of God and man, than thirty other operas I could name. But we must submit to circumstances and acknowledge that in this life as in the other, there is a little circle of elect for whom alone are destined certain works of the human mind."

Southern European as M. Scudo is—Venetian we believe—he works and thinks more like an Anglo-Saxon than a "foreigner." He is the Ruskin music critic of the present day, full of prejudices and dogmatism but he has also healthy, true enthusiasm, and a great deal of tender feeling. He is a strong, suggestive writer, of information and culture, and however one may differ from him, it must be admitted that he is honest, and endeavors as much as lies in his power, to fulfil his own definition of the critic's mission—"to awaken public conscience to protest against evil, excite and encourage true talent generously, and prevent corrupt forms of art from making artists forget things which are eternally true."

Where he fails it arises from inherent defects in his earnest, true nature; defects which are like spots in the sun, springing from the very brightness of his eager, warm temperament.

All reformers, it has been said, must be like the entering wedges in wood-splitting, made of strong, coarse material; and the true critic must have the ardor and heart of youth with the head of age, and a face like Dante's astrologers, turned backward forever toward the tradition of the past.

M. Scudo concludes the article as follows:

"In terminating this chronicle of 'faits accomplis,' in the art of Mozart and Rossini, would that we could add the report of some good news which the future has in reserve for us. From what side of the horizon shall rise up the man predestined to renew vital forms and to communicate to art, which is degenerating more and more, the fertilizing impulse of which it has so much need?"

"Shall it be regenerated Italy, Germany or France that shall give birth to this prophet of nations, this ideal musician, who shall put to flight the cobblers and tinkers who overwhelm us with their rough, shabby work? From whatever place this revealer of a new beauty shall arise, he shall be welcome. We are dying of ennui and inanition; mediocrity oppresses us. Reputations which depend on merit about as deep as the surface given by veneering or electrotyping, are becoming a scandal to, and turning the consciences of people of taste.

"There is a difficulty in defending oneself against the corruption of the crowd which invades the theatres and concert halls. It seems that the very soul has lost its power of assertion; that there is a mercenary politeness towards individuals shown, and unworthy arrangements for mere interest's sake are being made, all of which take from us the courage to love boldly that which is beautiful, or repulse that which is ugly.

"We no longer dare blame or hate anything, and all mental works whatever may be their merit are received with an equal benevolence, which kills emulation and discourages true talent."

Thus we see that even among the fastidious Parisians there is as much cause for complaint of the insincerity and worthlessness of public opinion, as we may have fancied was peculiar to our own country, and which has been curiously peculiar to every aujourd'hui, from the days of the Athenians to the present.—Philadelphian Evening Bulletin.

Death of Eugene Scribe.

The North Briton brings us intelligence of the death of the most celebrated and prolific of modern dramatic authors—Augustine Eugene Scribe—to whom, more than to any other one man, the modern French stage owes its popularity and pre-eminence, and to whose facile pen and ingenious brain, English and American dramatists are so frequently indebted for the plots and incidents which they palm off as original.

We have as yet received no particulars as to the death of this distinguished writer, but merely the bare announcement of his decease. He was quite an old man, having been born in the Rue St. Denis, Paris, on the 24th of December, 1792. His father, who was a prosperous silk-mercer, sent Eugene to the college of St. Barbe, where he showed his aptitude in the line in which he afterwards achieved so high a rank. When twenty-one years old he wrote his first composition for the stage—a vaudeville for the Gymnase—and for nearly half a century since that time he has written incessantly, his works including some twenty-five comedies, over one hundred and fifty vaudevilles and as many operas. He was a member of the French Academy, and had received decorations from almost every sovereign in Europe.

To give a list of the successful plays of Scribe would fill a column. So perfectly did he understand all the details and minutiae of stage life, and so familiar was he with the effect of dramatic incident and stage situation, that his later works never failed, and very many of them have been again and again translated and played under different titles at the various theatres in this country and England. But Scribe is known here quite as much from his opera librettos as from his plays. Almost all the great operas produced by other than purely Italian composers are based on his plots and language. With Auber and Meyerbeer he has long been a literary partner, and he has also been associated with Verdi, Halevy and Donizetti. The librettos of the "Star of the North," "Robert le Diable," "Le Prophete," "Pardon de Ploermel," "Sicilian Vespers" (composed by Verdi for the French opera), "Masaniello," "Gustave III." (and through that, of the "Ballo in Maschera"), and indeed almost all of Auber's works, and Halevy's "Magicienne," "Tempesta," and "La Juive," are samples of the extraordinary versatility of Scribe. They prove that, admirable and popular as he was in comedy, his talent was by no means confined to this; for there are scenes and situations in these opera plots which are unsurpassed in the entire range of modern drama. For instance, the great cathedral scene in the "Prophet," in which John of Leyden, without speaking to her, makes his mother deny her son; the scenes with Robert, Bertram and Alice in "Robert le Diable," and several situations in "La Juive."

The last work of Scribe was a comic opera, in three acts, to which Auber composed the music, the entire affair thus being the result of the joint labors of a septuagenarian and an octogenarian, for Scribe was seventy and Auber over eighty years old when they produced "La Circassienne," which was first played at Paris about six weeks since. Yet, both words and music are as fresh and happy as though Scribe and Auber were in the prime of life, or rather the hey-day of youth. Perhaps the world will never see again such a remarkable pair of "young old men" as these. Paris critics term "La Circassienne" a veritable model of a comic opera.

Oscar Comettant, who will be remembered as having passed some years as a pianist in New York, and who is now connected with the Paris Art Musical, relates a recent interview with Auber.

"It is a difficult and thankless trade," said the author of Masaniello, "this of a musical composer. To practically succeed so as to enjoy the fruits of one's labor requires both luck and talent; and, generally, more of the former than of the latter."

"But good luck usually follows real talent," said Comettant.

"Not always," replied Auber; myself, for instance to whom many people award some little merit—"

"It is deserved," interrupted the other.

"Very well," continued Auber, smiling. "I owe whatever reputation I may enjoy the coöperation of M. Scribe.

"This is but modesty on your part."

"It is justice. If, after my first few failures, I had not made the acquaintance of Scribe, whose admirable facility lent itself readily to musical fancies, and who often wrote his words to music I had composed in advance, I am convinced that fortune would not have treated me like a pet child, as it has frequently done. Yes, my fortune is M. Scribe himself."

Scribe has been also the fortune of Meyerbeer, Halevy, and of theatrical managers all over the world. Nor was fortune chary of favors to himself. He received a princely income from his works, had his hotel at the French capital, his domain in the country, and an elegant villa at Mendon, near Paris. Scarcely a man of the present generation could have prepared a more delightful autobiography. For years he had mingled with the best literary and musical society of Europe, and associated intimately with the leading celebrities of his age. It is to be hoped that a man who has enjoyed such unusual facilities has left behind materials for a memoir which could not fail to prove lively and interesting.

Bristow's New Oratorio.

The New York Albion, which is usually chary and cautious in its praise, speaks in the following terms of this new work!

On the same evening Mr. Bristow's new oratorio, "Praise to God," was repeated, for the second time, at Irving Hall. We designate the work in accordance with the composer's classification, but without, in the slightest degree, recognizing the word "Oratorio" as properly used in this connection. A sacred drama, having action, or, at least, a dramatic contrast of emotions, is what we regard as an Oratorio. This, most assuredly, is not the characteristic of the Song of Praise in the Episcopal service. The responsibility, however, rests with Mr. Bristow. He uses the word to describe an entertainment of a sacred character. So be it.

Mr. Bristow does not occupy the position in American Art that he is fairly entitled to. He is not only the best composer the country has produced, but the only one (except Mr. Fry) whose works have crossed the Atlantic. For these facts he should be famous, instead of remaining comparatively obscure. When Julien was here, Mr. Bristow was one of the first to enjoy his kindly appreciation. The good bearded conductor not only brought out some of his works, but actually made a speech about their merit; and so hoastly was he convinced on this subject that shortly afterwards, when he returned to London, the same productions were revived to a Metropolitan audience, and we believe with success. The Pyne and Harrison troupe secured an opera from Mr. Bristow, and "Bip Van Winkle" enjoyed much popularity. It was to have been brought out in London, but other works have crowded it from the bills, although it still occupies the most favored place in the repertoire of the company. In addition to what Mr. Bristow has thus accomplished, he is the author of many miscellaneous pieces, and finally of the so-called Oratorio, "Praise to God." There is no country in the civilized world where sacred music occupies so low a station as it does here. If we go into the churches we hear frivolous music, sung by a quartet of voices, and accompanied by an organist who would be rapturously appreciated in a lager beer cellar. John Wesley could not assert now that the devil has all the best tunes. If we go into the Concert room we hear, once a year, the "Messiah," and semi occasionally a Cantata, performed in a rudimentary manner by a small number of ladies who are no doubt highly respectable and delightful companions, but hardly first class artists even in a choral point of view. Of that hearty enthusiasm for sacred music which prevails everywhere in England, and which frequently embarrasses the conductor with the amount of resources at his command, there is absolutely none. It will be seen then that Mr. Bristow's self imposed task has been a matter of love rather than prospective profit. And the more we examine the work, the more we become convinced of the fact. Every page reveals the devotion of a classicist who has studied thoroughly the school in which he belongs and believes implicitly in its tenets. Those who expect to discover innovations of style and form, such as characterized some parts of Mr. Costa's "Eli," will be disappointed. Mr. Bristow's ideas are fresh and original—singularly unborrowed indeed—but his manner of conveying them is identical with that adopted a century ago. We do not say that he is wrong in adhering to the old plan: we do not even pretend that it can be materially changed. But in the present day, when Art is moving onward with giant stride, it is at least curious to come across a work that ignores progress, and boldly swears by the models of the past. Judged by these same models, Mr. Bristow's work deserves to rank high. There are some choruses in it, which, in boldness of outline and happiness of general completion, would not suffer by being compared with the best Handel, the master of the art, has left us. The concerted pieces are frequently very good, although, as there is no dramatic interest in the poem, the responses are mere alliterations, having none other than harmonic significance. The solis are, musically considered, in advance of the other portions of the work, and although somewhat cold in their character, are laid out more in accordance with the modern idea of that just balance of phrases which should constitute a melody than we are apt to find elsewhere. It cannot be denied, however, that Mr. Bristow rambles occasionally, even as Handel did, and without seeming to have the slightest apprehension of the singer who is to interpret his thought; thus we find the bass running the gauntlet from E below the bass staff to E on the second line above, a sweep which will not always be rendered as clearly as it was by Mr. Thomas on Thursday. Our space is now so limited that we must accord our verdict in the fewest possible words. Here it is: Mr. Bristow's Oratorio is the best work of its kind that we have heard or seen, after the great masters. It is not a progressive work. It accepts as a truism that Handel was right and absolutely perfect. It does not try to get away from Handel, but, on the contrary, draws closer to him in every great emergency. Judged then by the Handelian standard, Mr. Bristow's "Praise to God," deserves to rank as a great production.

Music.

Strange how the mystically mingled sound
Of voices rising from these rifted rocks
And unseen valleys—whence no organ ever
Thundered harmonious its stupendous notes,
Nor pointed arch, nor low-browed darksome aisle,
Rolled back their mighty music—seems to me
An ocean vast, divinely undulating,
Where bathed in beauty, floats the enraptured soul:
Now borne on the translucent deep, it skirts
Some dazzling bank of amaranthine flowers,
Now on a couch of odors cast supine,
It pants beneath o'erpowering redolence:—
Buoyant anon on a rejoicing surge,
It heaves, on tides tumultuous, far aloft,
Until it verges on the cope of heaven,
Whence issued, in their unity of joy,
The anthems of the earth creating Morn:
Yielding again to an entrancing slumber,
In sweet abandonment, it glideth on
To amber caves and emerald palaces,
Where the lost Seraphs—welcomed by the main—
Their lyres suspended in their time of sorrow,
Amid the deepening glories of the flood;
There the rude revels of the boisterous winds
The tranquil waves afflict not, nor dispart
The passionate claspings of their azure arms.

[Motherwell.]

Music Abroad.

UN BALLO IN MASCHERA.—From all parts of the great capitals of Europe we have accounts of the brilliant success of Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," so well received at our Academy of Music. At Naples the superintendent of the theatres has written to Verdi, asking him to come and assist in the production of the "Ballo," which was written for the San Carlos theatre, but forbidden by the Bourbon censors. If Verdi accepts the invitation, the work will be sung in Naples by Medori, soprano, Dory, contralto, Negrini, tenor, and Coletti, baritone. At Rome, where the Pontifical government has suspended the representations both of Trovatore and Traviata, and where the "Ballo" was first produced, this latter opera has been revived, with Bendazzi, Tati, the tenor Gaziani, and the baritone Bartilini. The success of the opera has been greater this winter than last, and the singers have been called before the curtain twenty times each night. At Milan the "Ballo" is in rehearsal for the debut of the baritone Butti. At Lisbon the popular opera has been sung by Madame Fricci, Miss Hensler and others. At Barcelona it has been produced with a splendid cast, including Carozzi-Zucchi, Brambilla and Naudin. At Paris, with Penco, Alboni, Badioli and Mario, it has met with the same success. Musard has introduced his "Ballo in Maschera" quadrilles at his concerts, and Oscar Comtant, the pianist, well known here, has written a caprice de salon for the piano, on themes from the new opera. Indeed, the "Ballo in Maschera" promises to become Verdi's greatest hit.—N. Y. Evening Post.

PARIS.—The Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Albion gives the following account of Auber's new opera La Circassienne:

I pass therefore to the Opéra Comique; and in assisting at the representation of La Circassienne, we have not quite done with carnivalesque disguises, though I need not go through the libretto of this last work of Messrs. Scribe and Auber. It is a tissue of improbabilities and impossibilities in which one sees a painter sent by the Emperor of Russia to take out-of-door sketches in the midst of a rigorous winter and in a country where one must camp beneath snow and ice; and in which one makes acquaintance with a Sultan and the customs of a Harem, such as are exclusively known to Mr. Scribe himself. The tricks of the author of the "Crown Diamonds" cannot be analysed; every one knows that he has reduced dramatic art to a series of surprises sprung upon you. La Circassienne is the work of a veteran and belongs to a libertine age; but it is a remarkable instance of what may be effected by an unrestrained imagination, seconded by a wondrous knowledge of the stage and by a dramatic tact absolutely consummate.

But it is not the piece—neither the prose or verse of Mr. Scribe—that draws me to the Opéra Comique. It is the music of Mr. Auber, of that remarkable man whom I meet taking his daily promenade on the Boulevards, and who, at the age of 79, has more of youth in him than the young men of to-day. His last opera, the thirty-ninth that he has written if I don't mistake, contains a number of "motifs," agreeable, lively, piquant, and artfully disposed. It is not passionate music; it does not carry you away; but there is something sprightly and charming in it, as in Voltaire's small pieces of verse. Far inferior to "Fra Diavolo" and to the "Domino Noir," La Circassienne is a work that I place about on a level with "L'Haydée." The overture, without ranking with the best, is destined to become soon popular; and it closes with a waltz movement, slow and voluptuous, which occurs again in the second act of the opera, and which forms indeed the most original and the best-relished page. All the first act is delicious, and the only fault in the work is that its musical interest becomes more feeble as it progresses. The law of crecendo should always be observed, but one can forgive an octogenarian not being faithful to it, seeing that in so many instances he has shown how well he can follow it.

At the Theatre Lyrique, has been given Mr. Clappon's 3 act opera, Madame Grégoire, the heroine of Bérange, so dear to lovers of song. The joyous old gossip of the poet is singularly metamorphosed in the piece, and has not inspired in any extraordinary manner the author of "La Fanchonnette." It is true that, in losing Madame Miolan Carvalho, the Theatre Lyrique has lost its nightingale.

At the Opéra the Tannhäuser is in active rehearsal, and it will soon break forth with its explosions of trombones and instruments germanico-philosophico democratic. Already Liszt has arrived in Paris, where all the "musicians of the future" have agreed to meet, to swell the triumph of their king-prophet, Richard Wagner. Waiting my doom to undergo these deafening tempests, or these instrumental riches destined to hide a great paucity of ideas and a plentiful lack of invention, I continue to enjoy to the full the splendid concerts of the Conservatoire, the delightful Matinée musicales of the violinist Alard, and the soirées of Jules Schulhoff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 23, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of "The Hymn of Praise," (Lobgesang), a Cantata by Mendelssohn.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

NO. VIII.

ROYAL ORCHESTRA SINFONIE CONCERTS.

Berlin, Feb. 1861.

In the distribution of the elements it has been usual to assign to the Germans the kingdom of the air. It must be confessed that they administer it very badly. It is not enough to say, that they ignore the air; they seem to positively hate it, and try altogether to exclude it. They abhor it, as nature does a vacuum. They have the same proud affection for this kingdom of theirs, and rule it with the same tender mercy, that Phillip I. did the Netherlands; they smoke out any vital atom of it as composedly and cruelly as that benign and gracious monarch, that innocent, sublime Defender of the Faith, burned the souls out of his live subjects. They do not condescend to persuade the world, as they have long since persuaded themselves—they tranquilly assume it as a settled principle, and act accordingly, (at your expense, however much you may protest), that human lungs were never made to breathe fresh air, but only to inhale tobacco smoke. Every breath that man drew previous to this state of grace, which came in with the discovery of "the weed," was hopelessly profane and subject, of course, to the condemnation of the natural man. This is the chief weapon wherewith they arm themselves against the Legion that lurks invisible in the unsanctified circumambient element. This is one way they have of keeping order in their kingdom; the sovereign method of fumigation and extinction. This is one way by which they fancy they maintain due subordination among the subtle, dangerous spirits of the air. And so in every little coupé of the railroad train, in every place of waiting, every café concert, every kneip and supper room, in all streets, and especially in dense crowds going in and out of places, the inevitable cigar is lighted; and the denser the smoke, the stronger and more disagreeable the smell, the better for you, so you seem to read in the complacent smile of your tormentors. (It reminds one of the answer of the boy in one of our backwoods States, who was expostulated with for watering his horse in a muddy ditch: "Why sir, the dirtier you get it into him the better for him, so as the animal don't complain!") With this difference, though: that you, poor victim of the smoke diet, may complain all day by every pantomimic sign and gesture of annoyance and distress, and your seasoned German, who is so exquisitely unfailingly polite in a thousand technical superfluous ways, who takes his hat off to you on the least occasion, begs your pardon without any provocation, and who cannot take up a newspaper laying three yards off from you without saying "By your leave, sir," and "are you not reading it," or enter a seat half a dozen from you without first asking you if it is besetzt (reserved for a friend of yours),—will smoke in your face and smother you so that you cannot talk with him; sociably inclined as he may show himself, without ever betraying the least symptom of a suspicion on his part that it is possible to be selfish or uncivil in the exercise of the smoking prerogative, or possible that any human individual can be otherwise than benefited by what comforts him. Tacitly and as a matter of course he demands your sympathy, if not your participation, in this odorous protest against Nature. It does seem as if Nature on the other hand, with subtle satire, had anticipated her revenge in this very invention of the cigar to be the type and correspondence of selfishness, just as the lily is of Purity, the violet of Friendship, and soon. Walk under the Lindens and meet the sallow insolent face, with knit brows, fierce or anxious eyes, hurried and important gait, mingled look of defiance and uncomfortableness, rushing past you with the inevitable cigar cloud (of the meanest quality, perhaps, but not the mildest) streaming full in your eyes and nostrils, and does he not look to you the incarnation of low arrogance and selfishness? What cares he for you or anybody, as he steams along completely fortified in the rank cloud which he diffuses round him to shut out your sphere? You go to buy your ticket at the railroad office, and in the eager crowd that besets the window you have a bad cigar thrust into your face on one side, and a vile pipe on the other, at the risk of fire as well as smoke, all which you must endure or yield your place to such well armed competitors and after-comers. Or you stand admiring before some fine engraving that has caught your eye in one of those rich windows on the Lindens, and presently a fellow with a cigar—a gentleman perhaps?—pushes before you without ceremony and supplants you; in vain for you to contend against such odds; he has the advantage over you; he fights instinctively with the same weapon as a certain formidable little animal does that shall be nameless.

But, good friends, let us—we who love a world well aired, and do not like smoked suppers nor smoked symphonies (such as one gets at Liebig's)—let us not be selfish in our turn. Some smokers are not selfish; some are genial, generous and noble; just the best fellows in the world; poets, artists, men of genius even, who, if they love to draw the soothing, fragrant cloud and halo round them; do it to exclude the petty cares, the acrid consciousness, the staring prose and common place of the confusing and impertinently near-to-day; that so they may isolate themselves in a poetic atmosphere and realize the glorious, tranquil freedom of the soul, and that the soul may have as it were a canvas whereupon to breathe its exquisite ideals, be they music, poetry or picture, for the delight and inspiration of us all. The humblest of us have the element of genius in us, if we are not geniuses—inasmuch as we have souls—and can therefore appreciate and need a comfort of this sort. Joy to any mortal who finds comfort in it, so long as he can do so with due decency and a regard for others.

But this is wandering with a vengeance. Actually in the midst of a moral essay on tobacco, when our theme was music! We began with air; but music is made of air. To come one step nearer to our subject. Smoke, we have said, is one way in which the Germans rule their kingdom of the air as if they would exterminate it. Their other way is, to confine it until it be dead; to carefully exclude all quickening draughts of fresh air. Of ventilation they will stubbornly know nothing. Their ever present terror is a draught; so they keep out of the air as much as possible, that they be as unfit for it as possible, whenever they must come into it. So you must endure the martyrdom of closed windows in cars, and more than a summer heat without a vitalizing breath of summer air in lecture rooms and concert halls and theatres. However spacious and however splendid, it is at the risk of suffocating that you sit through the grandest operas or symphonies in these halls, unless you happen to be fortunately placed. In crowded rooms, in close, stale air, the famous university professors hold their lectures, as if one must cease to inhale breath before he can imbibe ideas; as if the brain became a better passive recipient of doctors' lore by cutting off its vitalizing supplies of oxygen. You wonder if the German is as afraid of pure water as he is of air? Pray do not ask.

And now we have reached our subject. The "Sinfonie Concerts" of the Royal Kapelle, or Orchestra, in Berlin, are perhaps the best of the kind that Germany or the whole world affords. They are given in a moderate sized concert room in the Royal Opera House, architecturally the most exquisite and tastefully rich room for the purpose that I ever beheld. You fancy yourself in one of the choicest Art sanctums of a king's palace. In fact the place is the king's; it is where the royal family and court take their symphonies; it is fashionable; and admission, although not costly is a privilege. But it is always, upon these occasions, crowded to the utmost, and most miserably unventilated. The hall holds eight or nine hundred people. Nearly all the tickets are held by subscribers, mostly by families who have a sort of pre-emption right of long standing; indeed the right of subscribing is often inherited through generations in a family. As a rule all the seats upon the floor, where alone the heat and close air are endurable, are pre-occupied in this way. It is the same case with the concerts of the Conservatoire in Paris. The newcomer can only bring a ticket to the balcony, which surround the hall high up underneath the ceiling, answering chiefly the purpose of architectural ornament and serving as a sort of continuous crown or capital to the system of pilasters, which divide the arches of the four walls and which terminate in large and beautiful caryatides, like water nymphs, holding their rich arms in various graceful postures and bending their beautiful necks to uphold its weight. An exquisite, classically, chaste, light gallery to look up to from the floor, but a suffocating Tophet of a place to the poor musical enthusiast who finds a seat in it. There all air seems absolutely shut out (except the airs that vibrate with enfeebled spirit from the instruments below); and all escape of hot and dead air just as absolutely barred. Three times has your reporter's eagerness to hear the orchestra doomed him to this experience, and three times he has had better luck. The concerts are given at irregular intervals, usually on Saturday evenings, and on these occasions there is no performance at the Opera, for it is this noble orchestra which lends more than half the glory to Fidelio, and Don Juan, and the Iphigenias, &c., as you see them splendidly and thoroughly brought out in this theatre. I have attended five of the six concerts composing the first "cycle," and the first of the new cycle of three. These have been the programmes:

November 10.

- Symphony in D.....Mozart
- Overture to "Faust".....Spohr
- Overture to "Athalia".....Mendelssohn
- Symphony No. 7, in A.....Beethoven

December 22.

- Overture to "Jessonda".....Spohr
- Symphony in D minor, Ch. Phil. Emanuel Bach
- Scherzo (G minor) from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
- Symphony No. 8, (F major).....Beethoven

January 21.

- Overture on the Chorale: "Ein' feste Burg," Otto Nicolai
- Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
- Overture to "Coriolan".....Beethoven
- Sinfonia Eroica.....Do.

January 26.

- Symphony in G major.....Haydn
- Overture to "Anacreon".....Cherubini

- Symphony No. 1 (C major).....Beethoven
- Overture in "Leonore" (No. 3).....Do.

February 2.

- Overture to Goethe's "Iphigenia".....Bernhard Scholz
- Symphony in A major.....Mendelssohn
- Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
- Symphony No. 4, (B flat major).....Beethoven

February 11.

- Symphony in E flat.....Haydn
- Overture to "Vestalin".....Spontini
- Overture to Byron's "Manfred".....Schumann
- Symphony in C major.....Mozart

The list, it will be seen, includes principally the well-known and greatest works; particularly the best specimens of the three great symphony masters. What a pleasure it was to hear these, even from the balcony aforesaid, may be imagined when you reflect that the orchestra of eighty is perfect in all its parts; perfectly balanced; fine in every single instrument, the player of each being a finished artist "fully grown up" (as the Germans say) to every task that can legitimately come before his instrument; that they are kept in constant discipline and sympathetic play together, as severely nice and careful for the theatre work of every evening, as for the symphony of now and then; that they have one of the most experienced and admirable musicians living, TAUBERT, for a conductor; that they have royal patronage, and play before an audience as enlightened and appreciative in these things as could be anywhere assembled. These concerts, too, are not pecuniary speculations; their pay for them does not depend upon their audience; they have not to compromise the highest demands of Art and taste for popularity. All the money received from the sale of tickets goes to a fund for their widows and orphans. (In fact, very few, if any concerts are given by societies in Berlin to make money; nearly all the concerts are ostensibly for charity, or for some public cause; he who would air a new composition of his own must get musical friends to unite with him in the name of some charitable object.)

How much more pleasant it was of course, to hear the music from a good seat on the floor! There, besides a chance to breathe, you feel the magnetism of so fine a company; you may smile more or less at much that seems mere fashion, rank, convention, vanity; but there is a general average of high intelligence and character; you see it in the faces; you have the best society of Prussia about you; although in respect of personal beauty the eye misses the rich field of blossoms over which it has been wont to rove in many an American audience. There too you can fairly see and get to feel a personal interest in the orchestra; particularly in Taubert. He is the very model of a conductor in firm, gentlemanly, graceful, quiet, yet decisive manner. There is an air about the man that wins and engrosses everybody. You feel an entire confidence in him. His face is singularly interesting, full of character and kindly feeling. There is a certain something like Beethoven in it, only milder and much happier. You know from his look and his whole air that he is genial and wise, that he is true and kind. He is not a great genius, has not a very marked creative individuality as a composer; yet is he a graceful characteristic, fine composer, one of the masterly musicians, and with a right genial vein in him. It certainly was something to produce those exquisitely fanciful and quaint children's songs of his—or rather, songs of childhood for older people. And I must own that the music of his opera of "Macbeth" afforded me a charming evening, one of beautiful and fresh sensations, little as I can now recall of it. It is true that he has not all the fire in him of some younger conductors. It is possible, it would be quite natural, that he sometimes in his comfortable and long accustomed position, should sink a little into the vice of routine. This I have heard said of him by high authority; but I must confess that so far I have not been able to see it. D.

Italian Opera.

Since our last we have had the somewhat unusual excitement of the production of a new opera of Verdi's and the debut of a new American prima donna, whose claims are perhaps stronger in respect to nationality than those of any who have preceded her, being, as we learn, American in birth and education, having received her entire musical instruction in this country. Music, to be sure, is a universal language and the birth place of her servants is of small moment, still it is pleasant to see the result of a purely home education so satisfactory and even brilliant as in the case now under notice.

ERNANI on Saturday attracted an audience that would doubtless have been a large one, had the weather been more promising. Mad. Colson appeared as Elvira, Stigelli as Ernani, Susini as Silva and Ferri as the king. The performance was an exceedingly spirited one, and was constantly rewarded by the most enthusiastic applause. Mad. COLSON was never in better voice and gave us all the music of Elvira in the best manner, STIGELLI too seemed inspired to unusual efforts, even for him, who always does his best; FERRI and SUSINI looked these parts with picturesque dignity and effect, the former singing in his best manner. All the artists entered with a zeal into the performance that is a little uncommon at a "Grand gala matinée." The Finale was given with fine dramatic effect and worthily closed an uncommonly good performance of this favorite opera. The orchestra was frequently at fault, more so than is pardonable in an opera so familiar to every one. Miss ISABELLA HINCKLEY then appeared in the mad scene of Lucia. She gave much pleasure by her intelligent and in many respects effective rendering of this scene, receiving generous and well merited applause.

UN BALLO IN MASCHERA.—To hear a new opera, hardly known yet abroad, never yet performed in London and only within a few weeks brought out in Paris, is quite an event in the operatic experience of Boston. We cannot fall back upon the received opinions of Europe as we may in the case of older works, and we surely cannot pin our faith to what the New York papers have told us. In fact, in making up our opinion we have to rely wholly upon our own impressions.

We have had two opportunities since our last, of hearing Verdi's new work; it having been given on Friday of last week and on Monday of the present week.

We have already given from other sources some sketch of the plot, which in itself is a good one, simple and easy of comprehension with but little aid from the libretto.

To be sure, the incongruities and absurdities were more than numerous, as seen by us, sitting here in Boston, in the old province of Massachusetts Bay, where the scene is laid. The scenery, the costumes the manners and customs of the people and even the surface of Nature itself, as it was represented (to say, nothing of what was beneath the surface, in that wonderful witch's cave), were ludicrous in the extreme. We doubt whether the old Province House (the mansion of our royal governors) ever saw any such fantastic mummery as a masked ball, unless, in our own day, the "Minstrels" who now hold it, may have enacted one within its walls.

Setting all this aside, however, the plot is dramatic, well constructed and easily understood, and the cast was admirable. Brignoli as Ricardo, Ferri as Renato, Colson as Amelia, Adelaide Phillips as Ulrica and Miss Hinckley as Oscar, filling their respective rôles in an admirable manner that left little to be desired. Nor shall we omit to notice Barili and Dubreuil in the important parts of the two conspirators, Sam and Tom.

The impression made at the first bearing by this opera, and entirely confirmed by a second, was very satisfactory and pleasing. The music is characteristic of Verdi, of course, yet free from his more marked mannerisms and tricks of composition, free from the almost stereotyped phrases, both of melody and of instrumentation to which we have become accustomed. In fact, the Ballo in Maschera seems to mark the beginning of a new style in the works of this popular composer, and we should incline to the belief that he has taken a leaf from the experience and practice of Meyerbeer. Particularly in the treatment of certain dramatic situations are we reminded of the latter. The music of the two conspirators, who perpetually hover round the scene like birds of evil omen, recalls vividly Meyerbeer's treatment of the somewhat similar characters of the Anabaptists in the Prophet. The orchestration of the whole opera moreover, while bearing strong marks of the hand from which it came, is in a different vein. It is softer, more subdued, more varied, and the instrumental combinations are often novel, for the work of Verdi. The concerted music is remarkably beautiful, fresh and novel, especially, we might mention the trio and laughing chorus, at the end of the third act, as being ingeniously elaborated and singularly effective and dramatic, as illustrating perfectly the thing which the composer had to describe. The trio, Odi tu come fremono, a hurried passionate scene, is one of these passages of intense dramatic effect. The solemn dark phrases of the conspirators are always in wonderful contrast to the action and music of the other characters on the scene, and they are throughout conspicuously before the mind and the eye of the spectator. The receding voices of the conspirators and chorus as they leave the scene produce a marked effect. In strong contrast to Sam and Tom is the character of the page, Oscar, which is made very attractive by Miss Hinckley's graceful impersonation of it, and musically is very interesting from its sparkling pretty songs so different from the sombre mood of Renato and from the mysterious character of the conspirators. Indeed the whole opera is one of strongly marked contrasts. The governor and his secretary, the wife and the sorceress, the page and the conspirators, are constantly set off against each other, making a most attractive musical chiar' oscuro.

Each of the principal characters has beautiful solos, which we need not say with this cast were beautifully given. Very sparkling and fresh is the lovely barcarole sung by Brignoli in the cave of the witch and admirably adapted to his voice. Indeed he sings throughout this opera, evidently con amore. We have no space to remark upon these more fully now. The character of Ulrica is perhaps the least interesting; and the incantations of the witch came short of the proper effect, although Miss Phillipps made of the part all that can be, we should imagine, which is not small praise, since Alboni, in the same character, has failed of success.

Mad. COLSON sang exquisitely and acted with her accustomed fire and grace, at the first representation, especially in the moonlight scene, but on Friday was ill, yet unwilling to disappoint the audience, did her best, although obliged to omit some of the music.

FERRI gave his part of Renato, with excellent conception and artistic style. His dress was picturesque and his bearing and action exceedingly effective. He sang beautifully the air E sei tu che macchiavi.

In short, we have been much pleased with the new opera, and are not content with what we have heard of it. The first act is less interesting than the others but the dramatic and musical interest progress and increase gradually till the climax is reached. It certainly adds much to Verdi's reputation, is a work which does honor to him in every way, and has in it many of the elements of extended popularity and a long life.

At the first performance the theatre was packed from top to bottom, even standing places being hard to be obtained. A large audience witnessed the second performance, and many will be glad to learn that it is to be given for the third time this afternoon.

Linda di Chamounix was selected for the debut of Miss CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG, on Tuesday evening. The sweet simplicity of the young Savoyard peasant girl is easily reproduced by the powers of a young girl, coming within the sphere of her experience and not forcing her to counterfeit passions of which youth and innocence can have but small conception. The opera is thus well adapted for a debutante.

We have rarely had occasion to record a more complete and genuine success than was won by Miss Kellogg on this occasion. An entire novice upon the stage, having appeared only some half dozen times in all, coming to us almost unheralded and unprepared, indeed almost unknown, she has stepped into the position of a public favorite, at a single bound. In person she is slender and graceful, with a pleasing face, intelligent and intellectual, rather than a beautiful one, capable of the most varied expression. Her voice is a pure high soprano, of that thin and penetrating quality that cuts the air with the keen glitter of a Damascus blade, wanting now, of course, in that volume and power which age and time will give, yet sufficient for all practical purposes; of course, furthermore, not so full in the lower register as it will be in time. She reminds us much of Adeline Patti as to the quality of her voice, and indeed in her execution, which is finished and thoroughly artistic, savoring little of the novice, but worthy of the experience of a longer study and maturer age. Every thing attempted is done with admirable precision, neatness and brilliancy that leave little to be desired. In the opening cavatina, O luce di quest' anima, she exhibited at once these qualities, giving the air in a way that brought down the house in spontaneous applause. As she proceeded she evinced a rare dramatic talent and an apparent familiarity with the business of the stage that was truly remarkable. The grace and simplicity of manner that mark her, are, however, native and not acquired, and seem a real gift of nature. Through all the changes of the opera, she showed herself always equal to the demands of the scene, so that, as an actress, we should set her down as possessed of a rare instinct, if not, indeed, of positive genius. We do not remember any one in the character of Linda who has given it more acceptably than she.

She was admirably supported by Miss PHILLIPPS as Pierotto, who eclipses all without exception who have sung this charming character, from Signora Sofia Marini in 1847, down to the present time. No one has sung the music more perfectly, no one has ever acted the character so well.

BRIGNOLI sung delightfully and we have seldom heard more marked applause than that which followed the duet between him and Miss Kellogg.

FERRI was very effective as Antonio; indeed his conception of every character that he assumes is of the highest excellence, and on this occasion his singing was unusually pleasing.

DUBREUIL made an excellent Marquis, deserving favorable notice. The only drawback to a very perfect performance was the severe hoarseness of SUSINI, whose appearance should have been preceded by an apology, so large a part of the audience being strangers to him and his usually excellent singing. He acted however with much spirit. Miss Kellogg impresses us as an artist full of the best promise. We trust that she may not be forced too fast, nor overworked, that the freshness of her voice and the life and energy of her young nature may not be prematurely injured by labors too great or by an unwise ambition. We are glad to learn that no necessity obliges her to go upon the stage, but that a true love for art is the only impulse. The studies so well begun, it must be remembered are only begun. There is no end to study in so high an art, for a person of so much promise, to whom such high achievements seem possible.

Jamaica Plain.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

A series of three concerts at Eliot Hall in the above place has just come to a close March 7th. The kindness of a correspondent enables us to give a short account of the labors of the club in that beautiful village. Three concerts were got up by subscription through the efforts of a gentleman of Roxbury, who on similar occasions before has shown his love of music. The first concert unfortunately came on that memorable Thursday, February 7th, when a spring-like morning was followed by a night so intensely cold as to prevent a large attendance; and the following nights there were full houses and enthusiastic audiences. In the second concert the club were assisted by Miss Houston of the Old South choir, who sang two songs to great acceptance.

Of classical pieces the club played Mozart's Quintette No. 4 in D, Beethoven's Quintettes in B flat No. 6, op. 18, and in C. op. 29 entire; and the following parts of pieces: Andante and Variations from Schubert's posthumous Quartette in D minor, and the Andante and Canonetta from the Quartette in E flat by Mendelssohn. There were arrangements from Robert Le Diable and from Don Giovanni, and overtures, besides the usual soli on the violin, violoncello, flute and clarionette, played to the great satisfaction of the audience.

PRIVATE CONCERTS.

There were last year and are going on this year musical gatherings at Jamaica Plain, which we think a good proof of the love that is borne there to good music. We say good music advisedly, as we happen to know several of the parties that usually entertain the company, and their taste and love for the best in music, and as we have been permitted a glance at their programmes. The first "Musical" came off on March 8th, and comprised beside some vocal and instrumental pieces by other composers, selections from Weber.

Such gatherings are pleasing evidences of the spread of musical taste among us. It is a true pleasure that cannot be replaced by any other way of enjoying music, to make music together in the home-circle. There is the delight in music, where the heart has a share too. Here around us are all those whom we love best, uniting, for the pure love of it, in the production of music. The way we play may be mediocre, it may be inferior, if judged by a critical standard. But the sweet sounds and the love flowing over in them please and elevate nevertheless. The next way of enjoying music in company is at such musical gatherings of friends and acquaintances. A little more formal, requiring somewhat more of a preparation, still social, free from the stiffness of the concert-room and genial. There is an indescribable charm in anything we have done or are doing ourselves. And thus the feeling of satisfaction makes up, in a great degree, for whatever may fall below the standard of the artist. It is a desirable way of spending evenings, very useful to the spread of good taste and commendable in the highest degree. There may be such gatherings in other places. If so, we would be very glad to hear from them. *†

THE SACRED CONCERT.—The post of a lobby member of the legislature or of Congress may be an agreeable and useful one; that of a lobby member at the Boston Theatre, however, is neither the one nor the other. We, therefore, did not avail ourselves of the complimentary (?) ticket sent to us to the concert of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Opera troupe on Sunday last; having, moreover, a well founded distrust of such a union of uncoagenial elements, performances so given having never reflected credit upon either body engaged in them.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The last concert was attended by a crowded house. Some Hercules should have cleansed out the Augean stable and purged the Music Hall from the sigas of the presence of Mr. Rarrey's horses. We annex the programme, and regret that we have not space to give more particular notice of the performance.

1. Overture, "Dichter und Bauer," (first time)...Suppe.
2. Romanza, from the Opera L'Eclair (for Flute and Corn, Anglaise).
- Messrs. Ribas and Zohler.
3. Symphony No. 1. (1st time in Boston)...Mendelssohn.
4. Les Preludes.....Liszt.
5. Grand Ballet, from "Robert le Diable"...Mendelssohn.

A. P. HEINRICH.—We translate the following from the New York Abendzeitung, and trust that some of Father Heiarich's friends here may be able to relieve his necessities in his sickness and old age. Further information may be had at the office of this Journal.

"There is among us an aged artist, numbering eighty years. Every reader of this paper knows him as a highly gifted musician. His many valuable manuscripts fill large trunks, and in face of these riches, the old man lies sick and without money in the second story of the house, No. 33 Bayard Street. ANTHONY PHILIP HEINRICH is too illustrious a person to be suffered to make his debut before the world in the character of a beggar. He has worked much and the world owes him. Will you not, my fellow citizens, liquidate part of this debt? I trust that the German-American part of our population will see to it that this venerable old man is not only relieved but done justice to."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 18.—MR. SATTER seems so well satisfied with the success of his Matinées, that he repeats them weekly, and as he tries to please every class of listeners in his programmes, he is likely to continue to draw fair audiences (in two senses) for some time longer. Last Friday he produced Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony in a two hand arrangement. The very obvious difficulties of the latter he surmounted with the most perfect ease, and played the whole in just the right spirit. The Andante, particularly, was very beautiful, and the Scherzo a marvel of delicacy and nimbleness of finger. The Finale was so dependent on orchestral effects, that even more skilful hands could not have made it appear to entire advantage on the piano; however, it presented no drawback to the enjoyment of the whole. This number was followed by another little bouquet, (not "banquet," as your printer makes me say in my last) of minuets, by Haydn, Beethoven, and Mozart, all of them exquisitely rendered; the individuality of each brought out and contrasted with the others most truthfully.

After this came a graceful, dance-provoking waltz by Mr. Satter himself, in compliment probably, to the preponderating element in the audience, as it was called "Les Belles de New York." This being encored, Mr. Satter responded by an improvisation or Fantaisie on the Serenade and Eulogy of Tears, by Schubert, and ended the concert by a Fantaisie on Traviata. This last was the merest show-piece, and not worthy of one who is capable of so delighting even the most critical, as Mr. Satter. Any one claiming the name of artist ought never to lower himself to please even a portion of his public. Even modern Italian Opera airs can be arranged and worked up with genius, and need not be spoilt by ornaments and variations entirely inappropriate to their character, but when these same flourishes are applied to the beautiful melodies of Schubert, or, as in the Fantaisie on the Hugueaots, the sublime choral "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," is dressed up in a fancy costume of roulades, trills, etc., thus being robbed of all its grandeur and solemnity, this is still less excusable. Such clap-trap performances should be beneath the dignity of one who can interpret the Pastoral and Scotch Symphonies, Beethoven's Sonata, op. 26, Chopin's Impromptu and the like compositions as Mr. Satter can.

On Saturday our fourth Philharmonic Concert took place, attracting the largest audience that the Society has had this season. Even the amphitheatre was comparatively full, while below not a seat was vacant. Beethoven's ever beautiful Seventh Symphony headed the programme. Then came a novelty to us at least, in the shape of Mozart's Piano Concerto in D. major, rendered I may say to perfection, by Mr. Hoffmann. If I am not mistaken you have heard this beautiful work several times in Boston; here it was produced for the first time, and appeared to afford the greatest enjoyment to every one but a party of young ladies and gentlemen in one of the proscenium boxes, who were so persistent in carrying on a loud conversation, that only repeated and energetic hisses from all parts of the house could at last silence them. It would be advisable for these individuals, if they cannot possibly converse as well at home as at the Philharmonic concerts, to choose at least some point in the house which is less conspicuous, and not so much like a whispering-gallery, from whence the sound of their voices is carried over all the house, not even excepting the amphitheatre. The second part opened with Schumann's Overture to Genovefa, also unknown to us heretofore, and concluded with that to les Francs-Juges, by Berlioz—both very effective; but the former of more intrinsic value than the second. Between these Mr. Mollenhauer played one of his indescribable—compositions they can hardly be called—rather combinations of every possible trick and tours-de-force for the violin. Mr. Hoffmann played a couple of solos, the second of which, a Polonaise by Lubeck, was very effective and powerful. Both solo-players were encored with enthusiasm, and replied by short pieces. —t—

NEW YORK, MARCH 18.—MISS CECILIA RAPETTI, a daughter of the well-known violinist and opera leader, made her debut, last Monday evening, at Irving Hall, before a large audience. She is young and talented, possessing a good mezzo soprano voice with excellent low notes, and, moreover, gifted with those rich sympathetic tones which are so much more grateful to the ear than the most difficult but mechanically executed cadenza. She was very much frightened but did not show it, and she sang very well, though the selections made were poor, her principal songs being the hacknied Aria di Sortita, from Traviata, and the corresponding aria in Trovatore. The allegro to the Traviata air the young vocalist omitted.

There were a great many personal friends in the room, but even without their aid, the debut would have been considered a success. To be sure one surly old music teacher went into the green-room between the parts and said that the debutante might do for the parlor but was wholly unfit for the concert room. But all this was bosh. Miss Rapetti is now a pleasing and delightful singer, and, with further development of years and physical strength, will please even the surly musical teacher unless he be an obstinate idiot.

I spent a delightful hour the other day with GUSTAVE SATTER. He lives at 154 Waverley Place, in this city, and has a large parlor, in which the principal article of furniture is one of Steinway's grand pianos. Of this instrument Satter speaks in the highest terms. He has had it for two years, has taken it with him, by sea and by land, has visited with it various parts of both South and North America, and yet finds its tone as brilliant and gratifying as ever. This is certainly a proud testimonial for the makers of the instrument, who are now fairly rivalling the Chickering's. The Steinways, it may be remarked, are recovering from the business prostration into which all kinds of trade have been thrown during the past winter, and now give again full work to their large body of employees.

But to Satter. He plays in a private room and to one person quite as well as in a concert hall before a large audience. It was a treat indeed to hear his admirable fantasia on La Juive and his brilliant arrangement of Ernani airs in the finale of the third act was finely worked up. Then he played some pieces of his own composition and closed with a wonderfully long and difficult fugue of Handel's, composed for some festival at Westminster Palace. All these, Satter played from memory. He never uses notes when playing before any one. Unlike other eminent pianists here, he does not teach, devoting his whole time to concert giving and practise. He has taken up his permanent residence in New York.

Miss EMMA ROWCROFT gave a matinée concert the other day. She is a vocalist of considerable merit, and the daughter of a British ex-consul to Cincinnati. She has come to New York to settle down as a teacher, and has given one or two concerts. At her last matinée, she gave, among other things, the "Shadow Song," from Dinorah, and did it very well, too.

Talking about Dinorah reminds me of ADELINA PATTI, who is singing with such acceptance in that opera at New Orleans. She has been engaged to stay there another month. Her sisters are in this city at the home of the Strakosches in 22d street. Such an ineffably musical family never was heard of. You know that Mrs. Strakosch was formerly Amalia Patti, the contralto. The sister, older than she, Clothilde Barilli was Mrs. Thorne and was a good prima donna. She died some years ago. Then came Amalia. Then Carlotti Patti, who has recently appeared as a concert singer with eminent success. Then Adelina, who is a real musical wonder. The portraits of these four gifted sisters hang up, side by side, in the 22d street house.

The father of the Patis and Barillis was in early life a tenor, and was associated with Sanquirico and Palmo in one of the earliest operatic enterprises of New York. The mother was a prima donna. Then there are the two sons Ettore and Nicolo Barilli, and nobody knows how many musical relatives may exist in Italy. But certainly there is no such a musical family in this country. The Strakoschs are not musical with the exception of Maurice, and he and his brother Max are the only members of that family in the country.

Musical people here are quite anxious to hear how the Ballo in Maschera will take in Boston. It is much liked here by all except a few bigots and will now draw as good a house as any other opera that can be named. Brignoli sings excellently in it, although they say that Mario in Paris, can't do anything with the part of Ricardo. Brignoli can.

That reminds me. Funny story about Brig. They say that he has a certain talisman or treasure which he carries about with him wherever he goes. It is not a cross of gold, nor a mystic vial, nor a saintly relic; but the head of a buck! The animal was shot some time ago in the western wilds and Brignoli had the head stuffed, with the antlers preserved, the whole forming a unique and pleasing ornament. He is very fond of it and probably you may see it by applying to him in Boston.

There will be a number of changes in church choirs this spring. I have already notified you of the revolution in Dr. Cumming's choir, where Isadora Clark sings. At Dr. Cheever's church also, a revolution takes place. The congregation has been much weakened by repeated secessions, in consequence of the political views of the pastor, and cannot afford to keep their excellent but expensive choir, of which Mrs. Jameson, the best singer of sacred music in the city has for years been the leading soprano. At Christ church in this city where two Boston singers Mrs. Mozart and Mr. Millard form half of the choir there has also been a change, the organist, Mr. Schmidt having gone to San Francisco. His place is temporarily supplied by Mr. McKorkell, the harpist and organist. At Dr. Hagne's new Madison Avenue Baptist Church, there has been a squabble, and Mr. Beals the English organist engaged there has left after playing some two months, a Mr. Thompson succeeding him. It is now-a-days quite the cheese for our resident musicians to have regular weekly reception nights at which music and talk form the entertainments. Musical soirées are also becoming more frequent in private circles. Aptommas, the harpist, has regular weekly receptions on Saturdays, and that on Saturday last is a sample of the kind. By the annexed programme, you will observe that several professional artists, the wife of the senior editor of the N.Y. Express and a number of amateur pupils of Aptommas were among the performers.

Inflammatus—Stabat Mater, Mme. De Ferussac and chorus
"Read your Hearts"—Mr. Cook
Organ Solo—(Meditation Religieuse). Mr. Villanova
Ave Maria (with Bach's Fugue). Miss Gaynor
Accompanied upon the Harp, Organ and Violin, by Messrs. Rapetti, King and Aptommas.
"Rest in the Lord"—Elijah. Mrs. Elliott
"Pro peccatis"—. Mr. J. R. Thomas
Harp Solo—Sacred. Mr. Aptommas
Duo Religioso. Mr. Millard and Miss —
"Fac ut Portem"—. Mrs. Elliott
L'Annociation—For Harp and Organ.
Messrs. Villanova and Aptommas
"Lord Remember David"—. Mr. Millard
Cantique de Noel, (with harp and organ). Miss Gaynor
II Preghiera—Mose in Egitto—Solos by Messrs. Cook and Thomas and Mrs. Gottendorff Accompanied on four harps by Mrs. James Brooks, and the Misses Gaynor, Brooks and Van Buren.
Hymn—by all. "From all that dwell below the skies"

I have frequently in my letters to Dwight given gossip about church choir affairs. Let me now give a specimen of meanness on the part of a church which is well worthy of notice.

There is in this city a wealthy congregation who have recently erected a new church edifice and placed in it a splendid organ built by Erben. At the opening of the church, several other choirs and a first soprano well known in Boston, were called upon to lend them aid. A skilful English organist was chosen, and a double quartette choir engaged. Soon the leader of the choir squabbled with the bass of the auxiliary quartette, then he quarrelled with the organist who with quartette No. 2 left the church.

Now the church is rich. Remember that. There's no necessity of the trustees doing a small thing. But they did it. A distinguished organist of another church managed to get one of his pupils in the vacant place, promising himself to play at the evening services gratuitously. Thus he ensures a pupil at $50 a quarter.

Now where's the meanness. Not so much in the teacher—not as much in the amateur pupil, but in the church trustees, who think they make a great bargain, getting an organist or two of them for a trifling sum, and thus keeping some good, deserving and perhaps needy organist out of a place which can really afford a good salary. Now, that this is a very contemptible style of economy is the opinion of Trovator.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Here with thee. (Tecco io sto.) From Verdi's
"Un ballo in maschera." 75

Duet in the second act between Richard and Amelia
(Soprano and Tenor). It is a piece of much beauty of melody and fine dramatic power, and has been unhesitatingly acknowledged here as one of the lasting gems in the opera.

O thou wert bright as op'ning day.

E. C. Sebastiani. 25

A pleasing song.

If I could change as others change. Song.

M. W. Balfe. 50

A Parlor Song, which is much admired in England, and is deserving of a wide popularity.

The man who didn't take a paper. L. Heath. 25

A pretty comic song in that happy vein which the author has so successfully touched in some previous songs, as, for instance, the "Woman's resolution," or the "Matrimonial jars," both of which have taken immensely wherever they were performed.

Instrumental Music.

Forget me not Waltz. Arranged by

Carl Zerrahn. 50

As played twice by the Orchestral Union in their afternoon concerts. For a long time no waltz has so generally pleased, and the calls for it previous to its publication have been very numerous. It will no doubt continue popular.

Let me kiss him for his mother. Variations.

Chas. Grobe. 50

Ordway's popular air nicely varied. Of the difficulty of the "Shells of Ocean" and other popular pieces of the celebrated author.

Air d' Isabelle in "Robert le Diable." Transcription. Otto Dresel. 50

The air of which this is an elegant arrangement opens the second act and begins in the Italian version "In vano il fato." Those teachers who are afraid to use classical music with their advanced pupils will find this an unobjectionable substitute. The treatment is thoroughly artistic, and everything arranged to the best advantage. Operatic arrangements of such intrinsic merit are rare.

Books.

DITSON & CO'S STANDARD OPERA LIBRETTOS, each 25

The librettos of twenty-three Standard Operas are now published of this admirable Series, rendered popular by their correctness of text, excellence of typography, and convenience of size. During the present season of opera in this city they have been found quite indispensable with those who sought to enjoy, understandingly, the performance; and we have no doubt that in all other localities they will be found equally desirable. They contain an Italian and English text, an epitome of the plot, and the music of all the principal Airs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 469.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1861.

VOL. XVIII. No. 26.

Spring.

[From the Dublin University Magazine.]

A flush of green is on the houghs,
A warm breath panteth in the air,
And in the earth a heart-pulse there
Throbs underneath her breast of snows :

Life is astir among the woods,
And by the moor, and by the stream,
The year as from the torpid dream,
Wakes in the sunshine on the buds :

Wakes up in music as the song
Of wood bird, wild, and loosen'd rill
More frequent from the windy hill
Comes greening forest aisles along ;

Wakes up in beauty as the sheen
Of woodland pool the gleams receives
Through bright flowers, overbraided leaves,
Of broken sunlights, golden green.

She sees the outlaw'd winter stay
Awhile, to gather after him
Snow robes, frost-chrystall'd diadem,
And then the soft showers pass away.

She could not love rough winter well
Yet cannot choose but mourn him now ;
So wears awhile on her young brow
His gift—a gleaming icicle.

Then turns, her, loving, to the sun,
Upheaves her bosom's swell to his,
And, in the joy of his first kiss,
Forgets for aye that sterner one.

Old Winter's pledge from her he reaves—
That icy cold, though glittering spar—
And zones her with a green cymar,
And girdles round her brow with leaves.

The primrose and wood-violet
He tangles in her shining hair,
And teaches elfin breezes fair
To sing her some sweet canzonet.

All promising long summer hours,
When she in his embrace shall lie,
Under the broad dome of bright sky,
On mossy couches starr'd with flowers.

Till she smiles back again to him
The beauty beaming from his face,
And robed in light glows with the grace
Of Eden-palaeed cherubim.

O Earth, thy growing loveliness
Around our very hearts has thrown
An undimmed joyance all its own,
And sunned us o'er with happiness.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

X.

OPERA.

1800—1830.

Dramatic music, like literature and the plastic arts, reflects in every age the predominant spirit which governs the ideas and manners of a people; this art—doubtless more powerful than any other, since it combines them all, as it were, in itself—renders obvious to sense, if we may so speak, the picturesque side of the human soul, and gives the careful observer a daguerreotype of the mobile and varied physiognomy of the ages as they pass.

Just as the musical era of Cambert and Lulli seems to us to correspond exactly with the grandeur of the times of Louis XIV. so Campra represents the affectations of the Regency, Rameau paints for us the inimitable gracefulness of the epoch of Louis XV. and Gluck the austerity of manners under Louis XVI—a king who vainly strove against the dissoluteness of a corrupt court. We shall see during the first thirty years of the 19th century, Lesueur and Spontini faithfully rendering the grandeur and mystery of the Imperial era, and the immortal Rossini brilliantly reflecting, during the more quiet times of Louis XVIII. and Charles X., the important literary transformation effected by the consecutive labors of Chateaubriand, Lamartine and Victor Hugo.

The time of the Consulate, which was but a preparation for the Empire, is essentially a period of transition. We therefore find little to notice in the annals of the Theatre of Arts from 1800 to 1804, except La Dansomanie, a ballet by Gardel and Mehul; Praxitée, which we owe to the pen of Madame Devismes, wife of the Director of the Opera; Les Mysteries d'Isis a pasticcio by Moreland Lachnith from Mozart's Magic Flute and works of Haydn; the Cantata composed by Lesueur in honor of peace and the heroes of France (April 14, 1802); the Semiramis of Catel, a work correct, but cold; Tamerlan, by Winter, which had but a dozen representations; produced at Notre Dame, on occasion of the solemn proclamation of the concordat, a mass performed by an aggregate of 400 singers and instrumentalists; and finally the Anacreon of Cherubini, in which Lays, crowned a wreath of ivy, grape leaves and roses rejoiced,

Animé du triple desir
Des Vers, de l'Amour et du vin.

A conspiracy of the republicans against the first Consul Bonaparte was to be executed on the 18th Vendemiaire, de l'An IX. (Oct. 11, 1801); and the Opera house was selected as the place to for the deed. The play was the Horaces by Porta. The chorus of the Oath was designated by the leaders as the right moment for simultaneous action by the band, which was to be scattered through the theatre. Sixty of them were seated in boxes taken for the purpose, or were mingled in the crowd of spectators. Their plan was to extinguish between the acts, the lamps which lighted the corridor of the first boxes and to hurl from the upper rows a great number of fuses and crackers on fire, which would naturally frighten and confuse both spectators and actors. Profiting by this moment of general terror, tumult and confusion, the conspirators would be able to assassinate the First Consul and his companions. One of the traitors, struck with remorse, went during the night and made known all the details of the plot to the prefect of Police. Bonaparte to whom the matter was revealed at 4 o'clock in the morning held a council with his chief officers. In the evening he went to the theatre; the general officers clothed in citizens' dress, mingled themselves in the crowd and acted their part so skillfully, that it was impossible to suspect them of knowing all the particulars of the plot. They went directly to the boxes of the conspirators, and besought the occupants to retire peaceably and without noise. At length the elder Horace upon the stage came to the passage,

Jurez donc devant moi, par le Ciel qui m'écoute
Que le dernier de vous sera mort ou vainqueur.

This, the preconcerted fatal signal fell upon the ears of the First Consul; but, the conspirators, taken with their hands filled with arms and fireworks were already under guard beneath the staircases of the theatre. Before the end of the third act, they had been carried to their prisons in carriages. During all these proceedings the spectators were hardly aware that anything extraordinary was taking place. Some slight excitement was visible in the lobby which was filled with people, but no one knew precisely the key to the enigma.

On the 3d Nivose (Dec. 23d) of the same year a new conspiracy was indicated by the explosion of the infernal machine. Without exhibiting the least trace of emotion, Bonaparte, who was on his way to the opera house at the time of the explosion, entered that building to hear the first performance of Haydn's Creation. Garat, Cheron, and Mesdames Barbier, Valbonne and Branchu sang the principal parts in that master work.

Daniel Steibelt had exhausted all his skill in adjusting the barbarous text, as translated by a hack writer, to the admirable melodies of the great German master, and in spite of the disadvantages of the translation, the oratorio produced an immense effect. 156 vocalists and as many instrumentalists, with a pianist to accompany the recitatives, in all 313 performers took part in the work. The receipts on this occasion reached very nearly the large amount of 24,000 francs. It had attracted the notice of the first consul that 17 boxes, containing 94 seats were occupied gratis by the municipal officials of the government. Struck by this wrong, as the reason of the annual losses of the theatre, he wrote with his own hand a note, still preserved in the collection of the Comedie Francaise, of which the following is a copy:—

“A datter [sic] du 1er nivôse, toutes ces places seront payées par ceux qui les occupent.

BONAPARTE.”

It was not long before the conqueror of Italy was proclaimed Emperor, and Dec. 2, 1804, the musicians of the opera joined those of the chapel in executing the Mass of Paisiello at the coronation of Napoleon and Josephine, which took place in Notre Dame.

The two most important works executed in the Imperial Academy from 1804 to 1814 were, beyond controversy Les Bardes by Lesueur and la

Vestale by Spontini. But before going into details upon these two remarkable productions, we will note rapidly;—

1. A translation of Mozart's Don Juan, sung by Rolland, Luby, Derivis and M^{lle} Armand;

2. Nephtali by Blangini, the performances of which, having been interrupted by the Emperor's absence in Poland, were renewed upon his return by his order;

Of less note were Paul et Virginie a ballet by Gardel and Kretzner; le Triomphe de Trajan by Esmenard, Lesueur and Persuis; Aristippe and La Mort d' Abel by Kreutzer, imitated by the Mort d' Adam of Guillard and Lesueur; Fernand Cortes by Spontini, which ran eighty nights consecutively; Les Bayaderes by Catel; Jerusalem by Persuis; and Les Abencerrages by Cherubini. The first representation of Les Bardes was upon the evening of July 10, 1804. After the third act, Napoleon sent Marshal Bessières to call Lesueur, that he might express in person the lively satisfaction which the work had caused him. After some complimentary words, Lesueur was about leaving the imperial box, when Napoleon holding him by his coat said, "Remain here and enjoy your triumph to the close." He afterwards added "your fourth act is superb but the third is unapproachable; I give you the cross of the Legion of Honor."

Some days after the Emperor sent Lesueur a small box of gold containing bank notes to the amount of 6,000 francs. On the edge of the box inside was engraved "L'Empereur des Français a l'Auteur des Bardes."

The first performance of La Vestale was upon Dec. 15, 1807. Spontini, already known by several works, had at length obtained a text from Jouy, composed it and submitted the score to the judges of the Imperial Academy. They found 'good things' in it, but with one voice condemned its extravagance of style, the boldness of its innovations, its abuse of loud instrumentation and the hardness of many of its progressions. The decision was that the work should not be performed. Thanks to the Empress Josephine Spontini surmounted the opposition of the jury. The opera was put in preparation by order of the court, when suddenly Spontini was forced to bow his head and submit his score to Persuis and Rey, who manipulated it at their ease but did not succeed in completely spoiling it. So at last the work was produced and received with enthusiasm. The execution was very fine. Lainez, Lays and Derivis filled the parts of Licinius, Cinna and the high priest.

Madame Branchu gave Julia, and M^{lle} Mailard the grand vestal. The entire second act is a masterpiece of sentiment and expression; it is both charming and vigorous. The prayer, the "Impitoyables dieux!" the cavatina of Licinius, the finale duett, and the stretto in three kinds of time—all this produces a marvellous effect; and yet without the high protection, which sustained the efforts of the composer, this masterpiece might never, perhaps, have passed the threshold of the theatre. The changes which Spontini had been forced to make in his music raised the expenses of copying to the enormous sum of 10,000 francs.

As we have seen, Napoleon strongly favored the encouragement of letters and the arts; a sufficient proof of this we find also in the remarkable report made by Chenier at the instance of the Emperor on the state of literature at the end of the 18th and the beginning of the 19th centuries.

Decennial prizes were instituted by an imperial decree, dated at the palace of Aix-la-Chapelle. 24 Fructidor an XII. By this decree 10,000 francs are granted to the composer of the best opera at the Imperial Academy of Music, and by a posterior act, of Nov. 28th, 1809, grand prizes of a second class are proposed, first, to the author of the best lyric poem set to music, and secondly, to the composer of the best Comic Opera represented upon any of the principal stages. Nov. 9, 1810 there was a grand distribution of the prizes.

The poem of the Vestal, by M. de Jouy and the music of the same work carried off the two prizes. A "very favorable mention" was accorded to the Semiramis of Catel, and a grand prize of the second class to the Joseph of Mehul. Les Deux Journées by Cherubini, Montano et Stephanie, by Berton, Ariodant by Mehul, and L'Auberge de Bagnères by Catel only obtained "honorable mention."

Four years later hostile armies approached and menaced Paris. Jan. 31, 1814, an occasional piece was hastily arranged, called the Oriplanne, the object of which was to revive the hatred of the French against the strangers. It was but a short time however before the Russians and Prussians laid siege to the capital and on the first of April following the Vestale was played at the opera in presence of Alexander and Frederick Wilhelm III.

May 17th Louis XVIII. visited the Academy Royale de Musique, once more, on which occasion were given Œdipe à Colone and Le Retour des Lis, a ballet improvised for the occasion. Dec. 14th Castor et Pollux was revived; and April 18, 1815, Napoleon in turn was present at a performance of the Vestale, followed by the ballet Psyche.

July 9th, Louis XVIII again entered the opera, now in company with the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, Iphigenie en Aulide and la Dansomanie, were performed, and Lays sang the Vive Henri IV.

An ordinance of the King, of Jan. 18, 1816, regulated the rights of authors. The same year two successful works were produced, le Carneval de Venise a ballet by Kreutzer and Persuis and le Rossignol an opera in one act by Lebrun. The Fêtes du Cythère was hurriedly put together for the marriage of the Due de Barry by Dieulefoi, Brifant, Berton, Kreutzer, Spontini and Persuis. Reproductions were successively, Fernand Cortes, Les Danaïdes, Tarare and the Caravane of Gretry. Les Jours Floraux by Bouilly and Aimon had but a moderate success. The Olympie of Spontini was played but twelve times though mounted a cost of 170,000 francs.

But the unlucky 13th of February 1820 put a sudden stop to the performances in the Academie Royale. The Due de Berri was assassinated at the opera on the last Sunday of the Carneval. Horrible and touching contrast! the unfortunate prince stretched upon his bed of death, while the actor Elie was receiving the applause of the spectators in the part of Punchinello. The entire royal family in tears, hardly separated by a thin partition from an audience convulsed with mirth—was not this a most energetic instance of the sorrow and vanity of things of this world?

The last sacraments were administered to the dying duke, on the spot where the crime was committed, upon condition that the opera house should be demolished. Such was the will of de Quelon, archbishop of Paris.

The opera fled to the Salle Favart on the 7th of April. M^{lle}. Bigottini obtained there a good success in the ballet Clari; and Sept. 29 the birth of the Due de Bordeaux was celebrated there by the performance of the Choruses of Athalie, music by Gossec, and the ballet Paris. Fine composers, too, joined to celebrate the baptism of the new prince, in an occasional opera entitled Blanche de Provence; they were, Berton, Boieldieu, Cherubini, Kreutzer and Paer.

The present opera house in the rue le Pelletier was opened August 16. 1821. The performances were the variations by Paer upon the Vive Henri IV, Les Bayaderes of Catel and le Retour de Zephyre, a ballet. Adolphe Nourrit, a pupil of Garcia made his first appearance as Pylades in Iphigenie en Tauride. Nov. 31. Habeneck succeeded Viotti and Kreutzer as orchestral director. Aladin ou la Lampe merveilleuse, music by Nicolo and Benincori obtained great success. Feb. 6, 1822. But a new revolution was approaching in the realm of music. Castil-Blaze had invigorated the public taste already by bringing to its knowledge foreign masterpieces, in his pasticcios of the Folies Amoureuses, La Forêt de Senart, and by his translations of the Barber la Pie voleuse, Otello, Marguerite d'Anjou, the Marriage of Figaro, Tancrede and finally Robin des Bois [pirated and altered from Weber's Freyschütz] which latter, at first coldly received obtained afterwards an uninterrupted series of 387 representations at the Odeon. Herold and Anber began to be known in 1823 by the Lasthenie and the Vendôme en Espagne. Pharamond was given June 10, 1825, on occasion of the coronation of Charles X.

After the Don Sanche of Theaulon and F. Liszt, was represented May 6, 1826. La Chasse du Jeune Henri a picturesque symphony by Mehul, put into action by Gardel. Oct. 9, the benediction of the flags in Rossini's Siege de Corinthe was applauded. What can we say of the Moise first given Feb. 26, 1827; of the Muette di Portici the masterpiece of Auber (Feb. 29, 1828), of Comte Ory, that delicious work of mixed style; of Guillaume Tell, the brilliant reproductions of which do but add to its eternal youth? What is most to be admired in these works, the vocal melody or the orchestration which is so brilliant without being bellowing as in the great works of the present time?

That was also a beautiful epoch in song when one could hear on the same evening Mesdames Sontag and Malibran of the Italian Opera, uniting in the performance of Tancred, Moise or Don Juan. A magnificent performance Jan. 24th, 1830, brought into the treasury for the poor more than 50,000 francs!

John Hullah.

A ladder with the Latin motto "Per scalam ascendimus," mounting by the scale (or ladder), stood over the fireplaces of St. Martin's Hall, was destroyed by fire. The master of the hall was Mr. John Hullah, the most effectual musical reformer whose good influence has been felt by the people of England in our day, or in any day before it. His energetic hand has held the ladder by which other men have mounted; but it has been to him no ladder of fortune. Even before he was burnt out by fire the other day, he was burnt out by zeal.

In a Kentish village numbering hardly more than five hundred inhabitants, thanks to Mr. Hullah's scales, the children, the young men and women, even several of the old men who work on farms, have become singers. This Christmas, and every Christmas, and every Christmas and Easter for some years past, they have performed an oratorio of Handel or some other great master; they cherish their church music, and they live together with their minds awakened to such sense of harmony, that for years past not one of them has been punished for, or accused of, against the law. The vicar and his parish are as one family together. At one of their mid-winter oratorios a young woman did not come in till after the music had begun. Her house had been snowed up, but her father, a farmer, had been getting his laborers together, and they had all cleared a way for her, that she might go and take her part in the sublime strain.

At the bottom of this what do we find but Mr. Hullah's music books? Some of them found their way by chance to Piteairn's Island, where men have learnt from them to make the desert blossom with their songs. Year after year Mr. Hullah has taught classes. His disciples have taught in the provinces with a steady zeal, of which we shall best show the force and the effect by an example.

Twenty years ago, there was no popular taste in this country for anything but dance music, comic songs, and sentimental ballads of the weakest texture. Nobody then believed England to be what everybody now sees it is—a musical nation. English opera then was a tradition more than half suspected to be, like other traditions, fiction. Now, the two largest theatres in London vie with each other in producing it, and we have discovered that our nation begets not only singers and good judges of song, but musicians and composers who in the new atmosphere of national appreciation will know how to hold up their heads in presence of the foreigner.

It seemed to Mr. Hullah in those bygone days that a diffused knowledge of the elements of music would be a great gain to his country. He was first struck by the deficiency, not in observation of the lower, but of the middle and upper classes. When polite folks came together they bored one another with had solo singing, and concerted music was almost impossible, because there were few vocalists who could really read music at all.

About the end of eighteen thirty-nine, Mr. Hullah, having become acquainted with Dr. Mainzer's system in Paris, again went thither; for he had heard of M. Wilhelm, and he found him carrying out his system of teaching on a very extensive scale, having direct government sanction and support so far as his school for the poor, whether children or adults.

Twenty years ago, Mr. Hullah proposed to the Committee of Council on Education, of which Dr. Kay was then secretary, to open singing schools for schoolmasters of Wilhelm's system in London; and these singing classes soon grew into classes for all kinds of persons; but their growth was impeded by want of a place of meeting, ample, convenient, and not costly. St. Martin's Hall, of which the first stone was laid by Lord Carlisle in June, 'forty-seven, was built; but, alas! St. Martin's Hall, in the phrase of the money getter, "did not pay." It is difficult to estimate the value of the work done in it for the education and refinement of the people. The effort to maintain it had drained all the resources of its founder and its maintenance began to seem impossible when the recent fire brought the whole case to a final issue. Yet, during the past twenty years one hundred and ninety-five classes of adults, of both sexes, averaging seventy persons in each class, have been taught by Mr. Hullah himself, and by a loyal body of assistants, of whom the foremost were Mr. May and Mr. Monk, and two other gentlemen presently to be mentioned by name. The sale of the musical publications has been enormous, and among these, each set of large sheets represents a class somewhere—a single book often the study of a teacher; parents have learnt that they might teach their children. Brothers and sisters have taught one another. The men in the lighthouse on the North Foreland, having got hold of one of Mr. Hullah's manuals, worked through the exercises together, helping and correcting one another as they best might. Others had used, and are now using the book. That is a part only of what the sale of one copy represented.

Mr. Hullah's earnestness and skill were soon appreciated. At the outset of his career he was appointed professor of vocal music at King's College, where he still, as professor, teaches church singing to students of the theological department. In 'forty-four, a class of about fifty was formed for a daily lesson, on Mr. Hullah's system, at Trinity College, Cambridge. Its members were heads of colleges, tutors and masters of arts. The ladies of the same families had their own class in the hour following. In four or five months these students sang glees, madrigals, part songs, anthems, and motets of rather more than ordinary difficulty. The lessons were resumed after the long vacation, and at the end of the year several private choral performances were given at Trinity Lodge. A class for the under graduates had been at work also; and there were classes for townspeople of divers grades. Mr. Banister, who represented Mr. Hullah in this leaving of Cambridge with a sense of music, taught also in London a class of wives, sisters, and daughters of mechanics, who, attending themselves, several hundred strong, to be taught by Mr. Hullah, begged that a class might be formed also for their women folk. The result was a class of seventy, to which the women came half an hour before time to secure good places, anxiously conning their last lesson while they waited, and at which they made progress with a speed only to be accounted for by those who could picture the home evenings in which the husband and father joined with his own household in song, and while comparing the fruits of their lessons they all helped each other.

A more striking illustration of the diffused influence of Mr. Hullah's enthusiasm, is to be found in the result of the labors of Mr. Constantine among the mountains of Cumberland and amidst the whirl of the machinery of northern England, among a people famous in these days for their good choral singing. When, in 'forty-two, Mr. Constantine began working Mr. Hullah's system, under the direction of Mr. Crowe, at Liverpool, he taught the first mixed class of ladies and gentlemen in the National Schoolroom at Birkenhead, and gradually undertook the following round as his week's work. We begin it in the middle: Wednesday, the first business, was to get to Ulverston, twenty-two miles distant; the way being across the sands of Morecombe Bay. This journey in winter time, had to be made often in the dark, because the low tide and the morning sun would not always keep in harmony together. The winter fogs, too, are, in Morecombe Bay, not very welcome to a lonely rider travelling on horseback, and obliged to rely on his horse's knowledge of the track. Class day in quiet Ulverston was always a gala day. The singing master's horse was sure to be well looked after. For Ulverston, the town farthest north in Lancashire, stands on a tongue of land where there was nothing to enliven its work, but the market day, till the musician came. The four thousand inhabitants yielded three singing classes. One contained about fifty ladies and gentlemen, another forty children, and the other was a general class of a hundred. The excellent organist kept up the work, and has conducted a musical society from that time, we believe, to this. People came from miles away to be taught in these classes. A cart-load of poor children used to be sent by a kind lady from Bardsea. A hale old clergyman walked, in all weathers, nine miles into Ulverston and nine miles home again, to qualify himself for teaching, upon Mr. Hullah's system, his school-children and parishioners, that so he might elevate not only the music in his church, but also the happiness, and even the morals of his district. He was rewarded with a success beyond his expectations.

On Thursday the lecturer went on to Ambleside, a ride of twenty-one miles, to a place that is, in winter, very quiet, with its five or six hundred inhabitants sorely in need of wholesome entertainment. Here, where there used to be the most horribly nasal and inharmonious imitation of church music, there is now sung by the people a plain musical service, irreproachable in taste. On Friday the round was from Ambleside, fourteen miles on, to Kendal, where there were four pretty good classes, but these did not live to a second course. Sixteen miles on, next day, Saturday, brought the teacher to Casterton schools. Having taught there, a ride of seventeen miles to Preston was followed by a railway journey to Lancaster and back to meet classes there. Sunday was spent at Preston. A ten-mile ride, on Monday, to Blackburn, carried the music master to three classes, the last a very large one, chiefly composed of factory maids. On Tuesday the Lancaster classes were revisited by way of Preston, and so the week's round ran for one of Mr. Hullah's propagandists, in the winter of the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-three. The elementary classes led to the forming of an advanced class, for the practice of Part Music in Preston, Lancaster, Ulverston and Ambleside. The largest classes, however were those at Penrith. The same teacher afterwards taught in other towns both in the North and West of England. At the present time sixty or seventy students leave every year the Home and Colonial schools, and twice as many are in training. The national training schools—St. Marks, Chelsea; Battersea College; Whitelands—each yield about fifty teachers every year, teachers who have had some musical training. At very many schools—indeed, in all parts of the country—the good work is going on. In Mr. Hullah's personal teaching the interest has been so strong, that some members of his first upper school, formed twenty years ago, have abided by the classes until their recent dispersion. One energetic pupil walked twelve miles to a railway station, thirty miles distant from London on his class nights, and was punctual in attendance. The head of a private school at Tunbridge attended a course, travelling to town for every lesson, and repeating what he had learnt to his own pupils after his return.

It has been found that the number of people who are supposed to have "no ears" is wonderfully small; while only a few may have true genius for music, all can learn its grammar, and by patience with attention learn to hear their part not disagreeably in madrigals and psalms. Thanks to these singing schools the national ear has improved, and the national taste has been raised. Witness the enormous multiplication of concerts in which the choral performers are amateurs; witness the increase in the demand for musical publications and in the sale of musical instruments, especially of pianofortes and harmoniums; witness the great improvement in church music, and the admission even of chants into dissenting chapels. Wherever there is a large town it is now possible to form a chorus at a minute's notice, and it will be a chorus of singers, who are most at home in the best music, and enjoy its performance for the music's sake, far more than anybody can enjoy the act of listening.—All the Year Round.

Church Music in New York.

The law of supply and demand is one of the first in nature, applicable alike to all material, social, intellectual or moral requirements. Thus, when an era in the progress of nations is reached, which calls for great men to take the helm and guide the Ship of State, the supply is always commensurate with the demand, and they are sure to be forthcoming. So it is in all departments of human affairs. At the present time, in accordance with this law, and the advancement of the age in matters pertaining to science and art, a demand exists in all branches of æsthetic culture for something of a better and higher order than our fathers and the generations which preceded us enjoyed. This we find applies particularly to the subject under consideration. The distinguished foreign artists—such as Leopold de Meyer, Herz, Thalberg, and Jenny Lind—who have visited this country, have done much toward creating and developing a taste for fine music among us; as a natural consequence, the want of able performers has been felt, and they have appeared. Many of them have grown up in our midst, and some are from other countries, who, coming here with the intention of remaining but a short time, have preferred to make this their permanent residence.

It has recently been stated in some of the leading German papers, that New York contains more first-class resident pianists than any city in Europe, and we think the same may be truthfully said of organists. Prominent among them is the organist of St. George's Church, in Stuyvesant Square, of which Rev. Stephen H. Tyng is rector. This is, without exception, the largest church in the city, and will seat 2500 persons comfortably; its congregation is one of the most wealthy and fashionable in New York. Of the vocal part of the music at this church we do not propose to say much at present, as a change is soon to be made in the organization of the choir—the quartette of amateurs, of which Miss Dingley is the soprano, being about to give place to a double quartette better adapted to the size of the building. The character of the music is similar to that of Trinity Chapel—described in a previous letter—occupying a position midway between the ancient ecclesiastical and modern secular style. Of the instrumental portion of the music we cannot speak too highly. The organ was built by Henry Erben—by many thought to be the best builder in this country—and, next to that of Trinity Church, is the largest in this city; it contains forty stops, many of which are to be found only in this instrument—one of them is an imported German Gamba, of peculiar richness. The Pedal Organ contains seven, of which one—the Gamba—is a thirty-two foot stop.

Mr. Wm. A. King, a native of London, and son of M. P. King, the celebrated composer, and author of the Oratorio of the Intercession—is the organist. He is the "king" of performers upon the "king of instruments," and has been in this country about twenty-six years, during which period he has officiated as organist at most of the leading New York churches, including Grace, Calvary, and St. Stephen's, Roman Catholic. He has great natural abilities, received his early education at the Royal Academy, London, and played the organ with skill at the age of twelve years. As an extempore performer, he is unexcelled, and his reputation as such has long been established. Overtopping all others of his style, and maturing a great gift in this direction, added to his long experience, he now stands confessedly at the head of the school to which he belongs. His accompaniments are masterly, and in this department he has few superiors; his execution throughout is most delicate and beautiful, characterized by faultless taste, and yet few can produce more power when occasion demands. We were present last Sunday evening, when he extemporized a closing voluntary, which held in wrapt and undivided attention an audience of at least two hundred persons, to the close. His playing is imbued with a feeling and energy that transports the hearer's thoughts far above the limits of what the mere instrument can effect. It has been truly said that a large and powerful organ in the hands of a master in one of his best moments of musical inspiration, is inferior to no source of the sublime in absorbing the imagination, and awakening the finer feelings of our natures.

Before concluding our comments upon the Episcopal Church Choirs, we must not omit to mention that of St. Bartholomew's in Lafayette place, corner of Great Jones street, a large and plain, old-fashioned structure. It contains an organ built by Erben many years ago, which is not an instrument of the first class, but the music is artistic and finished, consequently, worthy of notice. Dr. Clare W. Beames, who was formerly connected with the Italian opera and well known as a vocal teacher, is organist and director. He filled the same position at St. Peter's (Catholic) Church, in Barclay street, from 1838 until 1845, and since then seven years at the Church of the Ascension; during which time he presented to the public many of the classical works of Haydn, Mozart and other composers, hitherto unknown in this country. This choir is a quartette. Miss Marie Brainerd, the celebrated vocalist, sustains the soprano; Miss Lindsey, contralto; Mr. Cafferty, the well known artist, (in painting) tenor, and Dr. Roath, bass, the latter three are amateurs in music. Miss Brainerd is a very fine singer in oratorio, and is considered among the best in sacred music; she has also met with considerable success as a singer of miscellaneous pieces in concerts. The whole form a very effective choir, and the music comprises selections from the classical composers, the Grace Church and Greatorex collections, with anthems, chants, &c., of Dr. Beames's own composition.

Brooklyn is fast becoming one of our most musical cities, and the opera has met with more patronage there this season than in New York, but this is owing in part, to the general desire experienced by the public to view the interior of the new Academy of Music. For the same reason, the concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society—which are given at the new Academy—have been attended by upwards of three thousand persons this winter. Church music receives a large share of attention, and, in some of its many churches, the music rivals in brilliancy with that of the leading ones in New York. The largest, handsomest, and most costly of all of them is the Church of the Holy Trinity, located on the heights, corner of Clinton and Montague streets, near the new Academy of Music. Much attention is here bestowed upon the music, and the choir is very thoroughly drilled. The plan upon which it is arranged is antiphonal or responsive, with eight voices on each side, including a fine quartette, of which Miss Comstock, a very superior singer, is soprano and leads the Decani side; Miss Chase leads on the Cantoris side. Miss Smith is a favorite alto singer, and Messrs. Comstock and Haynes bassos of considerable merit. The class of music here produced is of about the same school as that sung at Trinity Chapel and St. George's, New York; services composed by Mr. Warren, the organist, are sometimes chanted. Mr. Warren has it in contemplation to train a number of boys, in addition to the present choir. The organ is a large one, containing forty stops, two octaves pedals, and three ranks of keys. It was built by Crabb, of Flatbush, Long Island, and has recently had several new stops added by Johnson, of Westfield.

Mr. George Wm. Warren, the organist and musical director, is a native of Albany, and acted in the same capacity at St. Paul's Episcopal Church in that city for thirteen years. There, he had a large and fine choir, and became extensively known throughout the country as a teacher and professor. Miss Hinkley, the present popular prima donna of the Italian Opera, was one of his pupils, and a member of St. Paul's choir for three years previous to her departure for Italy. Mr. Squires, the celebrated American tenor, was another one of his pupils. Mr. Warren received a call to this church, and came to Brooklyn in August last; here the purity of his style, the total absence of all effort in his performance, and the true musical feeling with which he is endowed, have won for him an enviable reputation as an artist of the first rank. It has been stated in some of the papers that the sum of $3000 per annum was paid Mr. Warren, as salary for his services; this is an error. The amount of $2000 is appropriated for the music of the church, of which about one-half is for the vocalists. Mr. Warren's voluntaries are of a classical description, comprising selections from Mozart and others, and are sometimes extempore. We observe that he always improvises a prelude before giving out a psalm or hymn, after an English custom lately adopted by some of the first organists in New York and Philadelphia; it is an excellent plan, calculated to afford rest to the minister, besides adding grace to this portion of the services, but we cannot hope to see it generally introduced, as it requires more ability and originality than the majority of organists possess.—Transcript.

Signor Arditì.

Of all the foreign musical artists who have established themselves in this country, there is no one more deserving the esteem of the profession than this well-known chef d'orchestre and composer. A few details of his career, during which he has been associated with the most celebrated vocalists and instrumentalists of the present day, cannot but be interesting to our readers. Luigi Arditì was born at Crescentino, a small town in Piedmont, in 1822. Evincing great musical talent when very young, he was placed under the celebrated Professor Caldera, with whom he rapidly acquired a proficiency in violin playing and composition. At the age of fourteen, by the advice of Caldera, his father sent him to the Conservatoire at Milan, where he devoted himself to a serious course of study, and distinguished himself by the production of an opera entitled I Briganti, which was performed with considerable success during the carnival of 1841. In 1842 he gained, for the third time, the prize at the Conservatoire for composition, as well as for violin playing, and on this occasion was presented with a violin by Viceré, as an especial mark of approbation. He took leave of the institution in the autumn of 1842, and may be said to have commenced his public career early in the following year, when he was engaged as orchestral conductor at Vercelli. He afterwards performed in several of the principal towns in Italy, and returned to Milan in company with the sisters Milanollo, for whom he composed and arranged some of their most effective duets. During 1844 Arditì extended his travels to Rome and Verona with Bottesini. Their success was unprecedented. Encouraged by the results of their concerts, they had determined to visit England together, when an advantageous engagement for America, offered by the impressario Marty, induced them to set sail for that country, where they arrived in September, 1846.

Arditì was appointed conductor of the Italian Opera at the Tacon Theatre in the Havana, Bottesini being in the orchestra under his direction. At the conclusion of their engagement with Marty, they made a tour through the United States, and remained some time in New York. Recalled by Marty to conduct the opera at the Tacon Theatre, Arditì remained in the Havana until the end of 1850, during which season the company included the well-known names of Bosio, Steffanone, Tedesco, Salvi, Bettini, Lorini Badiali, Beneventano, Marini, &c. When in the Havana he was generally called "Créolo," from the many graceful dances he composed which became popular. In 1852 he was engaged by Alboni to accompany her during her tournee through the States, and then, desirous of holding the reins of management as well as the conductor's baton, he became impressario in partnership with Mad. Devries, and maintained the enterprise successfully for fourteen months.

He was subsequently under an engagement to Sontag at New Orleans, at the expiration of which his services were secured by Mr. Hackett to direct the operas and concerts given with Grisi and Mario during their visit to America. At this time he conducted the performances on the opening of the Academy of Music at New York.

It will thus be seen that Arditì was connected with every musical undertaking of importance in the New World for a period of ten years, or from the time of his first contract with Marty, in 1847, to the moment of his leaving the United States for the purpose of revisiting his native country, in 1856. Upon his return to Europe, he accepted an engagement as conductor at the Naum Theatre at Constantinople, where new honors awaited him, and where he was decorated by the Sultan with the Order of the Medjidie. Upon leaving Constantinople, Arditì returned to Milan, here his reputation and ability as a maestro induced the indefatigable Lumley to make an engagement with him, which has continued up to the present time, and thanks to which, his remarkable talent has become known to the English public.

During the last twelvemonths Arditì has published many of his compositions, some of which have become popular. Among these will be remembered the Valse Chantante in D, entitled "Il Baccio," which was sung with so much effect by Piccolomini, for whom it was expressly composed. One of his works which is still unpublished, is an opera called "La Spia," of which those who have heard it speak in the highest terms.

It has afforded us much gratification to have been able to give this brief outline of Signor Arditì's successful career, his musical acquirements and amiable qualities making him in every respect worthy of the social and professional position he has attained in this and every other country he has visited.—Lond. Mus. World.

A DANCE FOR LIFE.—Espinosa, the little ballet dancer with the big nose, who was attached to the Ravel company some years ago, and made quite a hit in "Esmeralda" at the Boston Theatre, and who had in reality an unusual degree of dramatic and salutory talent, is said to have experienced a singular adventure since he was last seen here. On one of those tours taken by theatrical people in search of the golden fleece, in which they sometimes make the most marvellous perambulations and undergo the most moving accidents by flood and field, Espinosa found himself in the Rocky Mountains; not intending to set up a ballet where Fremont raised the American flag, but with a view to eventually reaching California and discovering a placer.

However, he was destined to perform before a very different audience from those which had applauded his pirouettes in the parquette at Boston. He was captured by a tribe of Indians and doomed to torture. While his masters were gamboling around him in their uncouth style, it suddenly occurred to the young Spaniard that his own remarkable friskings might amuse them, or else he was shocked at the bad style in which they performed, and became anxious to instruct them in the movements with which he was familiar.

At any rate he induced them to loosen his bonds, and began to dance. His pranks were so outlandish and extravagant, his gestures so novel and unprecedented, his twistings and turnings, his jumpings and vaultings so entirely surprised the unaccustomed audience that they stared in stupid amazement. It must have been a strange scene. The naked dusky Indians grouped around this little Spaniard, ready so soon as he tired or as they tired of him, to put an end to his life as well as his dancing, and he capered away madly for their amusement. This was indeed "the dance of death." But he intended it should be "the dance of life."

He so fascinated the savages that they became intent on nothing else; and finally when they gathered around him a complete circle he introduced a dance, that many New Yorkers must have laughed at and wondered at when they saw it on the stage; he began running right and left, backwards and forwards, hitting here one and there another, dispersing his audience, touching one with his arm, another with his feet, completely absorbing and delighting them; and while their surprise and pleasure were at the height, suddenly leaped into a vacant saddle on one of the fleetest horses of the band.

The Indians thought this too one of the pranks of his performance, and did not discover their error till Espinosa had shot so far out of their reach, that no effort sufficed to recapture him. He arrived safely at the company from which he had originally strayed more fatigued than after any of his dances in the opera. His audience shouted and screamed, but not with admiration, at the last; and he could boast of having created a more genuine sensation even than Ellsler or Cerito, or any of les deesses de la danse.

VERDI AS A POLITICIAN. The celebrated composer of the "Ballo in Maschera" has been elected a member of the Italian Parliament. He recently wrote the following letter to the President of the College of San Domine, of which he is a deputy:

President: The honor spontaneously offered me by the College of Borgo San Domine deeply affects me. It proves to me that I enjoy esteem as an honest and independent man, dearer far to me than the little glory and small fortune bestowed on me by art. I thank you, then, President, and beg you warmly to thank for me the electors, who have entrusted me with the honorable charge. Would you kindly assure them at the same time, that if it is not given me to carry into Parliament the splendor of eloquence, I shall carry into it independence of character, a scrupulous conscientiousness, and the firm will to co-operate with all my might toward what is good for the honor and closer union of this our native country, so long afflicted and divided by civil discords? Now, to the end that this long and hitherto fond desire of seeing a united country may be satisfied, fortune sends us a king who loves his people. Let us rally, then, all around him, since, if he shall be acclaimed before long the first King of Italy, he will also be, perhaps, the only one who has truly loved his people more than his throne. I beg you to accept the sincere expression of the esteem with which I take pride in declaring myself your devoted servant,

G. VERDI.
Sant' Agata di Villanova, Feb. 6, 1861.

The critic of the Boston Atlas and Bee, who went to a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, got in, but found no seat—talks some plain common sense to managers and people connected with performances generally, as to the amount of courtesy they display towards those from whom they habitually receive ten or twenty times the worth of the free admissions rendered. After opening his mind pretty freely on the subject, the critic furnishes the following "bill of particulars" of things suffered and enjoyed in his professional tour. It is very much as the experience of nearly every one of his brothers foots up at some time or other:

The Handel and Haydn Society
In account with Caput Mortuum.

	Dr.
For two car tickets.....	$	08
" damages from a wet foot.....		25
" swearing while going back.....		10 00
" extra tobacco smoked.....		05
	$10	38
	Cr.
Per contra.
By wear and tear of conscience saved in not having to puff the concert.....		39
By comfort in giving a piece of his mind.....		9 99
	$10	38
	Cr.

—Exchange.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 30, 1861.

IN THIS NUMBER the usual pages of Music give place to a Title-page and Index of Vols. XVII. and XVIII.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

No. IX.

ROYAL ORCHESTRA SINFONIE CONCERTS.

(Concluded.)

Berlin, Feb. 1861.

I will not enter into any premature comparison between the Royal Orchestra of Berlin and that of the Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig. At all events, it would be unsafe to declare the superiority of the former on the strength of a single hearing of the latter, such as I have before reported. Certain it is, that, taken at that moment the Leipzig orchestra was not so perfect, and probably not up to its own standard. The strings were all that could be wished, but in the wind band there was harshness, blur and indecision. It was the animating verve and spirit of the rendering that saved it; and yet there was complaint of falling off in this respect. In Taubert's orchestra the balance is perfect; the reeds and brass are all as true and pure in tone, as sure and clear in outline, and as delicately subordinated as the rest; always present in just the right degree of force, and furnishing the right characteristic color, spoiling no effect by over-prominence, and falling short of none. Each man blows and fingers with the skill and certainty of a consummate virtuoso, but without the virtuoso's egotism; a common classical feeling, an artistic loyal instinct merges each in all. It often seemed to me as if Herr Taubert sat at the keyboard of a single universal instrument, and that one master mind played the whole, to whom every tube and string were as responsive, each with exactly the right shade of tone, as are the keys of the pianoforte to the masterly interpreter of Beethoven or Chopin. Now this, to be sure, is only saying what every orchestra ought to be; it is the abstracting of all the bad from all the good qualities; it is describing an ideal orchestra. A thing more easily described than found. Such generalized fine talk is commonly dangerous, and so overshoots the mark in respect to anything actual, that it describes nothing. But here is just the place for it, when one at last does find something so complete and faultless; something in hearing which you are relieved of all sense or dread of interfering mechanism; in which you meet the composer mind to mind, and the music seems breathed upon you from the source that first inspired it. That certainly is the best orchestra in which you forget the orchestra itself, and deal solely and directly with the composer's thought. And that I could do all too easily for one who has to make a critical report about it.

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was as fine a test as one could have, on the first evening, of the virtues of such an orchestra. Or rather, to put the right foot first, such an orchestra could not do you a more edifying service than to let you hear the Seventh Symphony. There was only one disappointment; we were in the gallery, the air was dead, and of course the sounds could not vibrate with their full resonance upon the ear; your reason recognized how full, how perfect the orchestra was, but subjectively to you the effect was deadened, it needed room to ring in, needed freedom, it reached you partly paralyzed. (Ventilation of rooms has more to do with acoustics than we are wont to imagine.) Such an experience is like listening with wool in your ears. But even with these dampers on the strings (the nerves of hearing), the symmetry and nicety of the rendering were unmistakable. I shall never forget the impression made upon me by the exquisite pianissimo with which that mysterious Allegretto (second movement) was commenced by the low strings, and how the stream grew richer and stronger by a crescendo that held one one in breathless interest. It is almost worth coming to Europe for to hear a pianissimo for once in one's life. I think we have only taken the will for the deed at home, and not a very united will at that. In Leipzig, listening to Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, I was surprised and charmed (whether I mentioned it or not) by the exquisite fineness, neatness and precision with which the whole body of violins ran through those long sustained passages of staccato triplets in the Allegro. It was the same here too. And that work furnished one chance for comparison of the two orchestras in the same task. I should say that the performances were in the main about equally good, with the exception that in the Leipzig one the brass in the strong passages was sometimes coarse in quality and overpowering; the horns in the Trio stammered, &c. In the Andante, the melancholy church-like movement, the reeds here were marvelously expressive; such bassoons and oböes, with such characteristic individuality of sound, I have not heard elsewhere.

But what else of Beethoven? The Eroica came out much more clear and majestic, more like a grand, consistent whole, to me, than it ever did before; although that work still lacks to me the perfect unity of form, the suggestion of a single and successful east, which is so undeniable in the other great ones, teeming as it is with glorious passions, with most original and frequently sublime ideas. But the Marcia funebre is the grandest thing of its kind, and was made uncommonly impressive in this rendering. It was for this, doubtless, that this Symphony had been selected.

It was played in honor of the late king, Friedrich Wilhelm IV., who had died on the first of the month; and the concert was the first after the expiration of the Trauer period of 18 days, during which all public music, all theatres and entertainments of all kinds were absolutely suspended, and even formally forbidden. How could Germans, especially Berliners, manage to exist so long without music? You wonder that they submit to the compulsory mourning at so severe a sacrifice. But they submit to anything in the name of loyalty and court tradition. Heavy is the tax which Europe pays to etiquetterei. When the king dies the whole land must go into mourning; it is not left free to each one's feeling; it is not treated as a matter of feeling; it is an outward observance ordained and imposed on every one; those of such and such a rank must wear such and such crape, and dress so and so, for so many weeks or months; and all must go without music and all public entertainments for a period arbitrarily appointed for them, since it is not safe forsooth to trust the matter to the sincerity of private grief. The nation is the royal house, the people are the royal family, according to the king theory, and are expected to don the livery of the establishment to swell the pomp of its funerals. And so Berlin, so all Prussia, actually existed the first eighteen days of January without theatres or concerts. Of course it was a ruinous interruption of business to some of the dealers in these articles; but good for the keepers of cafés and beer saloons; these became the sole resource for the evenings; for no matter how much crape he wears, how loyally he puts on all the shows of mourning which the Court prescribes, how many black flags wave from palaces, hotels, and fashionable fancy and drygoods shops, how outwardly complete and rigid the so-called Landestrauer, construing God's sunshine out of existence for such period as pleases the powers that be, still your Berliner must enjoy himself, must drink and smoke, and reserves one sovereign right against any infringement of which the whole nation would be most sure to rebel—to-wit, the right of Beer. By a curious coincidence the only real Winter we have had in Berlin began and ended with those eighteen days; during that period the presence of his icy majesty was very near and palpable, his freezing breath upon us; the temperature was most of the time below zero and yet never so cold as in the coldest days of our less northern Boston; the climax of the cold, the one day that might have passed for a fair specimen of a right clear, cold New England winter day, was that on which your correspondent nearly froze his feet at Potsdam watching the funeral procession of the King. With the return of music came the melting airs of Spring; the snow departed, not yet to return, and the weather on an average has been milder than our April. (This is the middle of February.) But the Trauer is observed much longer by the court and all officials and their families; and to this fact it was owing that many subscribers' tickets to the Sinfonie Concerts were not used, but were offered at sale for the last evenings to some of us outsiders, so that we have heard the music to the best advantage from good seats on the floor.

Of the other Beethoven works in the above programmes, I enjoyed most the overtures to Leonora (No. 3), and to Coriolan, certainly the two grandest which he or any one has written, and that warm, impassioned, exquisite love Symphony — the Symphony in which the sentiment of "Adelaide" and the "Moonlight Sonata" has found its largest expression — the Symphony in B flat, No. 4. This last was just the kind of piece to hear in such a room, from such an orchestra; the impression of its beauty was as pure warm and complete, as that of one of Raphael's loveliest creations.

I should hardly have thought it possible for me to listen with much interest again to that hacknied Symphony of Haydn's, which goes by the name of the "Surprise." But here the marvellous perfection of the rendering lent such a charm to the mere elegance and perspicuity of Haydn's style, that any one could sit through it with delight. And so with the other Haydn Symphony. Judge then how unalloyed the pleasure must have been of hearing from the same orchestra the symphony by Mozart in G minor, which, the more one knows it, the more he is inclined to regard it as a perfect Symphony, one of the very best existing models of the form, so beautiful and so spontaneous as well as logical in its entire development, as to show that the Symphony form is really not arbitrary, not the fashion of an age, the slavish copy of some one man's success, but founded in the very nature of music and the human soul. The great "Jupiter" of Mozart, too, was superbly played; it was easy to trace the four mingling fugue themes in the last movement, in so faithful and distinct a rendering.

Of works more out of the beaten concert track of these days, the Symphony by Emanuel Bach, the son of John Sebastian, naturally excited the most interest, and it had been revived a few weeks before in Leipzig. It was written before the Symphony (or Sonata) form had reached its development, and before the modern orchestra existed. The string quartet of the orchestra is but passingly relieved and colored in it by a few wind instruments. In point of form it seems to occupy the most important step between the old Bach and Haydn. It has three well defined movements, leading without break into one another; and it is full of life and fire, with not a little freakishness, particularly in the finale, where a famous trill is executed by nearly the whole orchestra en masse, the double basses included. I must say I enjoyed it, but must hear it more than once in order to know it. Another rarity, comparatively, but very different, was the overture to "Anacreon," by Cherubini; this is one of the most lifesome, stimulating, original, and altogether felicitous productions in the shape of overture that I have ever heard, as sparkling and as wholesome as its subject could suggest.

The two overtures by newer composers, Nicolai and Bernhard Scholtz, were both interesting. The latter, to Goethe's "Iphigenia," has much of the dignity of Gluck, but more enriched with modern orchestration, and made at least a succes d'estime. The former, founded on the choral: Ein feste Burg, is called a religious festival overture, and was composed in 1844 for the third centennial festival of the University at Königsberg, whose foundations were laid in the same time with those of the Reformation, when these grand old chorales, which form the true heart and subject matter of the great Protestant sacred music, (Bach's motets, cantatas, &c.), as the Canto fermo did of the Catholic, sprang into being. It was a true thought, therefore, to choose for the substance of his overture this most representative one of the Lutheran chorals. He gives it out at first solemnly and grandly, and skilfully and justly harmonized, in massive chords of the whole orchestra (accompanied in the original performance by chorus and organ). Then out of fragments of the subject an elaborate and interesting double fugue is developed, in quite a Handelian style, and the overture concludes with the chorale en masse, as it began. The work exhibits the composer of that graceful, pretty trifle, the opera "Merry Wives of Windsor," in a more serious and important aspect. There are traces of a happy inventiveness already in the opera, especially the overture; but as a whole it is a failure; and of course the idea of setting Sir John Falstaff to music was simply absurd. But those who knew Otto Nicolai well, lament his early death, as well as his somewhat troubled and eccentric life, as that of a man who had real musical genius in him. Certainly this overture shows depth and grandeur of conception and of feeling, as well as musicianship in the sterling contrapuntal sense. A Motet of his, sung lately by the Dom Chor, confirmed the impression. D.

Italian Opera.

Mosé in Egitto, which was to have been given on Wednesday, was postponed to Thursday. The tremendous snow storm of that evening however, diminished the size of the audience, which would, under other circumstances have been a very large one, as, in the early days of Italian opera, Moses was one of the most popular of all operas, and as the frequent performances by the Handel and Haydn Society of it in its oratorio form have made the music quite familiar to very many people.

It was indeed refreshing once more to hear so grand a work from the hand of the great living master, whose mind seems to be the inexhaustible fountain of melody ever fresh and ever new. Then the prodigal wealth of ornament, and the richness of accompaniment make any thing from the pen of Rossini a rare feast to ears that have been fed long upon the thinner diet offered by his, in some respects, degenerate successors. Our wonder never ceases at his surprising fertility and variety in the points that we have alluded to.

The day gained by the postponement was an obvious advantage to SUSINI, who, in the condition in which he undertook to appear in Linda on Wednesday, could not have sustained the burden which the shoulders of Moses have to bear. The improvement in his voice was very marked, so that he went through the evening quite successfully as regards the music, while his imposing personal presence, and careful attention to the acting of the character, made his impersonation on the whole quite effective. It was a serious drawback however, that his noble voice so inadequately carried out his intelligent and artistic conception.

FERRI as Pharaoh was a worthy representative of the Egyptian king. His bearing and manner were truly royal and he gave good effect to the stirring incidents of the scene.

STIGELLI of course left little to be asked in his rendering of the music of Amenofi. The character is one of little interest dramatically, hardly more so than that of Pollione in Norma, thus giving scarce any opportunity for the energy and fire characteristic of the best efforts of Stigelli.

The duet between Pharaoh and Amenofi was splendidly sung by Stigelli and Ferri, and the audience would only be contented when the curtain which had fallen upon the second act was raised and the duet repeated. The duet with Mad. COLSON was very brilliantly done, and prodigiously applauded. The character of Anaide is not one well adapted for this lady, for the purpose of displaying her personal graces and her elegance of manner, and the dress is one severely trying to a pretty woman whose good instinct in matters of the toilet is so conspicuous. She sang however, with all her accustomed effect and brought down the house by her brilliant rendering of the music.

Miss PHILLIPPS as Sinaide appeared to great advantage and her reliable character as a singer, saved some of the concerted pieces, none of which went very smoothly, from the discredit of entire failure.

The spectacle and tableau at the end was as ludicrous as ever it was in old times, but perhaps was as well done as it can be here. The choruses were tolerable and in respect to costume and scenery the opera was quite well presented.

Rigoletto was performed on Friday with Miss Kellogg as Gilda, Stigelli as the Duke and Ferri as Rigoletto. The opera is not nor will it ever be a popular one, and is full of some very unmusical music. For its effect it depends upon the character of Rigoletto, which on this occasion was most admirably represented by Signor FERRI, who gave it all the pathos and passion that it requires. It was one of the best personations that Ferri has ever given us, excellent and versatile as he has proved himself. It is no small credit to appear as he has on every night in characters of such different natures, and to have given them all so faithfully and so well. Ashton, Renato, Antonio, Pharaoh, the King (in Ernani) and lastly Rigoletto, have all been rendered with the same zealous attention, artistic conception and admirable effect, and have done much to place this artist, in spite of some vocal drawbacks, very high in the scale of public favor.

STIGELLI sang La donna e mobile finely, but no time can efface the recollection of Mario in this air. He was hardly in a congenial element, playing the dissolute deceiver of the Jester's daughter, but the music was faithfully and effectively given.

Miss KELLOGG "renewed her triumphs" as the bills said, in the character of Gilda, giving it with admirable conception and excellent and artistic style, though somewhat wanting in force in the great quartette, pitted against three such voices as were with her. Miss PHILLIPPS was an incomparable Maddalena and gave great life and spirit to the scene.

Un Ballo in Maschera was promised for Saturday afternoon upon the bills, "without abridgement or curtailment," and the performance was perhaps as near to the promise as it is possible for an opera company to keep its word with the public. Have such people no consciences? We have rarely heard an opera more mutilated and more thoroughly shorn of its fair proportions, by leaving out the best part of it, than on this occasion. For example, the whole of the first scene of the second act, which Mad. Colson omitted at the previous performance in indisposition, was again omitted, apparently without this excuse, the audience thus losing one of the finest passages of the opera musically, one also of great dramatic interest. Again the long and important scene that begins the third act, between Renato and Amelia was entirely omitted, very essential to the correctness of the plot, which moreover includes the finest air that Ferri has to sing in the whole opera, whose admirable rendering of it we noticed last week. The scene is also of exciting interest, from the great effect with which it has been given by Colson and Ferri at the previous performances.

BRIGNOLI too, followed suit by cutting the exquisite air of the fifth scene of this act, Ma se m'e forza perderti. The performance however, was made to last the usual time by intolerably long intervals between the acts, so that it occupied exactly the time that it did when given complete the first evening. In other respects this was a very spirited and good performance. Indeed the beauties of the opera grow upon us so that we are loath to lose any of them, even if they are not specially promised. As so many of the prominent solos were omitted at this performance, Miss Hinckley in the part of Oscar became almost the most prominent among the characters, and she sang them all with much spirit. The sprightly, light air Volta la terra at once fascinates the audience in favor of the pretty, saucy page and fixes attention upon him, whenever he appears to cast a gleam of sunshine upon the dark passions of the scene. Of this kind of music we know scarce any thing more fascinating than the page's song in the ball room, Saper vorreste, which is invariably encored by the audience. The melodies of the opera prove to be of the kind that fix themselves in the memory, and will soon be welcomed as familiar friends.

Il Trovatore. The performances of this week began with this opera, with Miss HINCKLEY as Leonora. We have become so accustomed to identify her with the handsome little page in the Ballo, that we were fairly surprised at seeing the beautiful Leonora of this evening come upon the stage, lovely enough in truth to captivate Manrico and the Count di Luna and excite them to deeds of desperation to win her. Miss Hinckley's performance of Leonora was a succession of triumphs throughout the evening, and we were also not a little astonished at the power and fine effect with which she gave the spirit of the character. We dare say that some sagacious critic with score in hand will have discovered that some little passage of difficulty may have been omitted, that some lofty feat of vocal gymnastics that we have heard from a Lagrange perhaps may have been missed from her rendering; this may be true, but it is equally true that the real inner spirit of the character and the music has not often been more vividly, faithfully and artistically presented. The most vigorous applause and repeated calls before the curtain rewarded her for all her efforts and frequent bouquets were thrown at her feet. The Miserere scene was finely given and frantically applauded, (not by the claque, for the deadheads do not sit in the amphitheatre), and its repetition insisted upon by the most prolonged and vociferous demonstrations of delight. Signor Brignoli declined, (although, doubtless, for good and sufficient reasons) to make the additional effort, and thus placed the young prima donna in the awkward position of coming forward to the footlights to respond to the call and being obliged to retire again. The handsome tenor might at least have made his bow and acknowledgement, and the gentleman might have been more considerate of the feelings of the lady. A quite general tribute of hisses was his reward, when, after a long interval, during which the audience would take no denial of its request, the scene was repeated. Another avalanche greeted Signor BRIGNOLI when he appeared upon the scene, which he endured with an imperturbable gravity that quite conquered his enemies, and he took his revenge by singing more exquisitely than ever the remaining music that fell to him, extracting applause from the unwilling hands of those who only just before had hissed him. Miss PHILLIPPS as Azucena, made unusual efforts and gave the part with wonderful spirit and dramatic effect. FERRI is an admirable Count di Luna and Barili well sustained the part of Ferrando. Altogether the performance was a very spirited and excellent one, and Miss Hinckley has every reason to congratulate herself on so successful a debut in a difficult part in which the achievements of very great artists are familiar to the audience before which she appeared. This opera always draws a good house, and the intense passion of some of its characters and the intense music illustrating it, produces an undeniable effect upon the hearer. We have scarcely ever enjoyed the opera, as a whole, more than in the representation of Monday evening. We are glad to have had this opportunity of hearing Il Trovatore while the impressions of Verdi's later work are so fresh, and glad to find that our favorable impressions of the latter are even strengthened by comparing it with the earlier work of such universal and undeniable popularity.

"Moses in Egypt," performed as an oratorio on Sunday evening was not a very marked success. Choral societies for oratorios, and Italian artists for operas! They cannot exchange places with advantage. The music, we hardly need say to a public familiar with it for these dozen years, is wonderfully melodious and sparkling, and is just as enjoyable now as when it was first brought out. It did not derive any new significance or power from the last rendering. Many of the solos, however, were finely sung; the choruses and accompaniments were good considering the number of performers; and if the principal singers had not utterly spoiled two of the finest quartettes by their jarring tempos, we should have had a much pleasanter memory of the concert.

Linda was repeated on Tuesday, Miss KELLOGG in no respect falling short of the impression she made on her hearers at her debut. SUSINI was unable to sing, and Barili, at short notice, was substituted for him. It therefore became necessary to omit considerable portions of the opera. Miss PHILLIPPS, BRIGNOLI and FERRI sang excellently and except for the large omissions mentioned above, the performance was spirited and satisfactory. The duet A consolarmi affrettisi was encored and the duet between Linda and Pierotto was very brilliantly delivered by Misses Kellogg and Phillipps. Signor DUBBEUIL improved much in his personation of the old marquis and contributed largely to the good effect of the performance.

La Juive.—Halévy's famous opera was given for the first time on Wednesday evening. The announcements of the management had considerably raised the expectations of the public as to its attractions and merits, so that the theatre was again filled to its utmost capacity, offering a most agreeable spectacle to the associated artists, suggestive of large receipts. It is of course impossible to speak with any minuteness of the music of a new opera by a composer almost unknown to us except by name. It gave us little of the melody that one carries away in the head, although it is brilliant and effective from beginning to end, and admirably fitted to the dramatic, even melo-dramatic requirements of the scene.

Several of the choruses are carefully elaborated and were quite well given. The scene of the feast of unleavened bread was also very impressive and finely sung by SIGELLI with some of the principals and chorus. But the chief attraction of the opera as given by this troupe, at least as it strikes one at the first representation, was the marvellous impersonation of the old Jew Lazarus, by Sigelli, which was one of the most effective and masterly performances that we have ever heard from him. Both in the general effect and in its minutest details it was done with admirable perfection. His dress, facial expression, gait even, were studied with the greatest care and all contributed to the vivid portrayal of the character, on which the whole interest of the opera twins. We need not say that the music was rendered with the finest effect. Mad. COLSON too, shone as a star of the first magnitude, being in the best voice, costumed to the last degree of picturesque perfection, and a beautiful realization of the lovely Jewess. SUSINI made a most imposing Cardinal, but still seemed to suffer from indisposition, although he gave with sufficient effect the music of the part. Signor SCOLA whose name has appeared thus far upon the bills as stage manager, appeared before the public in bodily presence for the first time, as Leopoldo, quite good looking and princelike, but with the merest thread and shadow of a voice, which however, he managed well and intelligently carried out the business of his part.

Miss HINCKLEY looked very charming as the Princess Eudoxia, and sang well, acquitting herself creditably in the close comparison into which she was brought with Colson.

The spectacle was quite imposing; supernumeraries abounded in gorgeous array, and made an almost interminable procession. The interest of the plot and the music culminate in the final scene, where the Jewess refuses to aljure her faith and is plunged into the boiling cauldron, just as the Cardinal, who presides over the auto da fe, learns that she is his lost daughter, and not, as had been supposed, that of the Jew Lazarus, who is to share her fate. The composer, himself a Hebrew, reserved his best efforts for the climax of this closing scene, illustrating the noble fidelity to the faith of the chosen people, that in all ages has been its leading and most honorable characteristic.

Orchestral Union.

AFTERNOON CONCERT.—An excellent programme and a "very middling" audience, to use a common phrase. Four out of the six pieces suitable for any philharmonic concert! That is doing very well for an afternoon concert.

1. Overture, Fidelio. Beethoven.
2. Grand Concert Waltz. Strauss.
3. Concerto in E flat, for Pianoforte. Mozart.
(With Orchestral Accompaniment.)
Performed by B. J. Lang.

4. Overture, Tannhäuser. Wagner.
5. Andante from "Hymn of Praise". . . . Mendelssohn.
6. Bedouinen Galop. Lumbye.

The Orchestra, as well as the pianist, Mr. LANG, played with exquisite taste. The purity and crispness as well as the nice shading in the concerto in E flat were charming. The fine Chickering grand showed no signs of striking its colors or surrendering to the invading force of the Steinways.

Mrs. C. VARIAN JAMES, whom we at last have been permitted to hear, made a mistake in not having her name announced on the bill. "Who is she?" was the general question, and from what we heard yesterday, Mrs. James need not be afraid of coming out known to all. She sang a Scena ed Aria from Verdi and showed that she sings with spirit and bravour, has unusual routine, and as far as we could judge, has a strong and round voice. Some of her tones did not show the smoothness and fullness of the others, especially the lower ones. Yet we should like to hear her again before saying more and with better understanding on the subject. We hope she will soon come out again, and by a varied programme make us familiar with all her powers. Our first impression was a pleasant one. *† ORGAN CONCERT.—Mr. GEORGE E. WHITING, whose recent concert we noticed at the time, will give another, at the Tremont Temple, on Thursday, April 4 (Fast Day), at 3 o'clock. His advertisement will be found in another column.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 26.—I send you the programme of Mr. SATTER's last Matinée, which was better attended than the two preceding ones. (Why did you not enclose the programme, — t—?) The pièce de resistance was the Sonata, which Mr. Satter interpreted very finely, particularly in the second and third movements. To the exquisite Adagio he did the fullest justice by the delicacy and feeling with which he played it. The Overture, like all Mr. Satter's similar arrangements, was marvellously transcribed, and played with an effect like that of a small orchestra. The three pieces which formed the second number were totally different in style, but neither of them particularly interesting, Goldbeck's too fantastical and effect-seeking, Pattison's rather monotonous, and that of Gottschalk a fantasia on the "Old Kentucky Home," with the banjo accompaniment, which he is fond of imitating and introducing. The Fantasia on La Juive is one of Mr. Satter's best. Previous to it he played, by request, his waltz, Les Belles de New York.

At the close of the concert, Mr. Satter thanked his audience for their patronage, and announced that he would give his next Matinée on the 4th of April, for the benefit of the German Hospital in contemplation here. — t—

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The meetings at Alard's are devoted to the performance of sonatas, trios, quartettes, and quintettes, of the classical masters; and chamber-music can be heard there better than anywhere else in Paris. Alard's style of playing is marked by vigor, animation, and emphasized, accentuation; his mechanism leaves nothing to be desired, and his bowing is excellent. He is a man of about forty-five years of age, with a gaunt figure, tall and emaciated. His manners betray an iron will, and the history of his life would show that his physiognomy speaks the truth. Sprung from the lowest class of society, this skillful artist possesses now a well-merited reputation, and a considerable fortune which does not hinder him from continuing to live as the most modest of professors. His father-in-law, Mr. Vuillaume, is the first musical instrument maker in France; and at his house I have seen some authentic Stradivarius and a superb viola di gamba which once belonged to Francis I. The neck of the royal instrument is magnificent, and ornamented with all the attributes of a King of France. The backboard is still more remarkable; on it there is a plan of Paris in 1515, and above this a copy of Raphael's St. Luke. Alard is in a better position than any one else, for obtaining violins that have belonged to celebrated masters. He has four, upon which he is accustomed to play, a Stradivarius, a Guarnerius, a Stainer, and an Amati. Mr. Franchomme, a cold violoncellist, but correct and pure in taste, plays by the side of Alard—who uses a magnificent bass viol of Stradivarius—on a violoncello once in the possession of the illustrious Dupont, for which he paid 22,000 francs, if I may believe what rumors says. Notwithstanding Mr. Franchomme's precious instrument, I prefer, to this astute virtuoso, Mr. Jacquard, whom I have heard with the greatest possible pleasure execute one of Mendelssohn's sonatas de concert with Jules Shulhoff. The two soirées of this eminent pianist gave me an opportunity of judging of his last works; they are more elaborate, but less melodious, than those in his first style. His Souvenirs de St. Petersburg (mazurka), his Polonaise, and his Grande Marche, are his compositions which please me most. He plays them very well, but makes undue use of the loud pedal, and betrays a nervous abrupt manner, which seems to indicate a man whose health is impaired. Jules Shulhoff is barely thirty-eight or forty years of age; and is said to be one of the most modest and amiable of men; and if it be true that his mind has already been in a measure affected, it is to be hoped that the temperate climate of France and England, where he is soon going, will contribute towards restoring his health.—Albion.

Cologne.

Musical Solemnities in Commemoration of Frederick Wilhelm IV. of Prussia.—At noon on Sunday the 20th ult., the Cölnner Männergesang Verein, under the direction of Herr F. Weber, royal music director, executed in the large hall of the Casino, a musical service in memory of the late King. A numerous audience, headed by the principal military and civil authorities, had responded to the invitations, by especial cards of the committee, and completely filled the area of the hall and the galleries.

The Verein regarded the ceremony as an act of profound reverence to the deceased king. In the year 1855, His Majesty received the congratulations of the society on his birthday, and honored with his gracious attention and approbation the performance of several vocal pieces, in the apartments of the palace of Sans Souci. He also presented the society with the large gold medal for art, and endowed them with corporative rights. The hope that His Majesty would take the society under his especial protection remained unfulfilled, but only in consequence of the inscrutable decree of providence which lately plunged the country into consternation and grief.

The programme was carried out in a manner worthy of the occasion, and one deeply impressive from the feeling way in which the music was sung. The choral, "Jesus, meine Zuversicht," by B. Klein, commenced the ceremony. Next came the "Bardenchor," by Silcher, with new words for the first and second strophes; "Ecce, quomodo movitur Justus," by Palestrina; and "Hoffnung," by J. C. Schärtlich. Herr L. Bischoff, who is an honorary member of the society, then recited a poem, written by himself for the occasion, and entitled: "Der Sänger am Grabe des Königs" (The Singer at the Grave of the King), which was instantly followed by the "Lacrimosa dies illa," and "Pie Jesu Domine," from Cherubini's Requiem. Then came Silcher's chorus: "Stummschläft der Sänger," G. Sollmer's "Salvum fac regem" closing the ceremony, which had been listened to by all present with the deepest sympathy and devout attention.

The sixth Gesellschafts-Concert, in the Gürzenich, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, had been set apart, by the managing committee, as "A funeral service in honor of his late Majesty King Frederick Wilhelm IV.," and took place on Tuesday evening, the 22d ult. The hall presented a deeply moving spectacle. The whole of the chorus and audience—numbering about fifteen hundred persons—were dressed in mourning. The front of the stage was adorned with velvet and silver hangings, while sacrificial flames burned in high golden candelabra round with flags.

After an "elegiac march," composed for the ceremony by Ferdinand Hiller, Herr Laddey recited a poem: "Zür Erinnerung," by Wolfgang Müller. Hereupon were heard the first chords rose and joined in Mozart's "Requiem aeternam dona eis Domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis." It was a very solemn moment. The imperishable monument of Mozart's genius once again—by the union of purely human feeling, religious sentiment and artistic conception, which, in his case, had blended into unity and into the peculiar expression of his artistic nature, directed to the highest objects—filled all hearts with comfort and elevating devotion.

The solos were sung by Mlle. Rothenberger, Mad. B. Herren, A. Pütz and K. Hill Malapert, from Frankfurt-on-the-Maine.

What else would follow the Requiem in honor of the memory of the deceased monarch, but the sublime composition by Beethoven, which he called the Sinfonia Eroica? The execution was admirable. Added to this was the solemn frame of mind of the spectators, so that, perhaps, the great thoughts, the wonderfully interwoven melodies, and the striking specimens of harmony, especially in the first movement and the funeral march, were scarcely ever so grasped by the performers, in all their significance and profundity, as on this evening.

Munich.

Now that the Prince Carnival has again definitely grasped his all-powerful sceptre, and handed over the concert-rooms to dancing and masquerading, I am enabled to furnish you with a tolerably complete sketch of the first portion of our musical doings during the months of last November and December.

The Musikalische Akademie, under the direction of Franz Lachner, performed at its four Odeon-concerts, an overture for a full wind band (first time), by Mendelssohn; an andante for eight wind instruments, by Beethoven; a prelude and fugue for full band, by Franz Lachner; an air from Orpheus and Eurydice, by Joseph Haydn; two of the most recently published vocal quartets of M. Hauptmann ("An der Kirche wohnt der Priester," and a song from Mirza Schaffy); and lastly, two charming vocal quartettes, for soprano and four male voices, by Ferdinand Hiller ("Lebenslust" and "Die Lerchen.") Besides these, we had Beethoven's symphonies in D major and A major; Mendelssohn's symphony in A major; and the symphony in D minor (introduction, allegro, romance, scherzo and finale), by R. Schumann; the overture (No. 3) in C, to Leonore, by Beethoven; the overture to Euryanthe, by Weber, and the Scotch piece, In Hochland, by Gade. Herr Lauterbach played Lafont's sixth violin concerto; and Herr Walter, Molique's third (that in D minor). Mlle. Stöger sang Beethoven's concert air in E flat, while Mlle. Stehle, alone, gave us an air with obligato pianoforte accompaniments by Mozart, and with Mad. Diez, a duet from Idomeneo.

The Oratorio Association, under the direction of Herr von Perfall, repeated, at its first concert, Handel's Messiah; at its second, it performed, for the first time, a motet for eight voices ("Herr höret mein Gebet," by Hauptmann; the "Christnacht," by Ferd. Hiller, and the "Pilgerfahrt der Rose," by R. Schumann.

Chamber music was satisfactorily represented at the concert of Herren Werner and Venzel, aspiring young members of the Court orchestra, and at two concerts given by the pianist, M. Mortier de Fontaine, as well as that got up by him, for a select circle, on the anniversary of Beethoven's death. Two orchestral concerts of Herr Seidel presented us as a novelty, with a symphony (in G minor) by Mehul and one by Rommel, who is a professor at the Conservatory here. Finally, in the way of virtuosi, we heard, in addition to that excellent pianist, Mad. Kolb-Daunin, at present stopping amongst us, the brothers Holmes, violinists, at three concerts, in which the public was especially pleased with the admirable manner in which they played together in Spohr's duet compositions.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

'Tis all an idle folly. (E scherzo ed e follia.)
Quintet from "Un ballo in maschera." 60

The great Quintet in the second half of the first act, for Soprano, Alto, Tenor and two Basses, one of the most taking things of that kind ever written. It had to be repeated here at every representation of the Opera. Private singing clubs, always on the look out for good novelties should at once write for a copy.

The angel at the threshold. Ballad.
W. H. Beecher. 25

A very pleasing sacred song.

The Captain's pride. J. W. Turner. 25

By the author of many popular songs. Likely to take well with young singers.

The Fairy Invocation. E. C. Sebastiani. 25

Written in a brilliant, florid style. For Mezzo Soprano.

The old Playground. Song. E. Clark. 25

A nice song on an attractive subject.

Instrumental Music.

Union Inauguration March. F. Scola. 25

Composed by an eminent band leader in Washington for the last inauguration and performed by his band during the procession. A fine piece.

Overture to "Poet and Peasant." (Dichter und Bauer.) Suppe. 50

A favorite Overture which has been played often here at various occasions, and under various names. Most of those in the habit of hearing Orchestra Music will find it familiar. It is of the French school, light, sparkling, melodious.

Queen's Lancers Quadrille. A. Leduc. 85

New music to the ever popular figures of the Lancers, much better than the average of those many "new" Lancers which have been written in imitation of the popular set.

La Belle Rose Mazurka. R. R. Trench. 35

A pleasing parlor piece in the form of a fashionable dance.

Books.

BERBIGUIER'S METHOD FOR THE FLUTE. To which are added Dronet's Twenty-Four Studies in all the Keys. Price $2.50.

This is a course of lessons of real, practical ability; one which is prepared, not merely for the object of getting up a book, but with the far higher aim of furnishing to all who wish to acquire a good knowledge of the use of the Flute the means of doing so in a thorough, masterly manner. The book has been successfully employed by the best teachers in Europe, and to beginners, as well as to those who, having some acquaintance with the Flute, wish to obtain a better knowledge of it, we recommend this Method as one of unusual excellence, and one that cannot fail to give them entire satisfaction.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

D W I G H T ' S

JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

+517901

A Paper of Art and Literature.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

VOLS. XIX AND XX.

BOSTON:

PUBLISHED BY OLIVER DITSON AND COMPANY, 277 WASHINGTON STREET.

1862.

86680

Geo. Ticknor, Esq.

June 15, 1846.

INDEX.

- Abdül Aziz, sultan of Turkey.....151
A Beethoven matter (A. W. T.).....274
A chapter on bells.....194
A concert in the South Pacific.....229
Adelaide or Alice?.....325
A hint to musicians.....63
Akers, Benj. Paul, Sculptor.....202
Alceste (Gluck's), revived in Paris.....268
Albert, Prince, anecdote of.....332, 335
— as a musician.....381
American Composers.....3
Amadio, Alessandro, death of.....115
Amina and the Mill Wheel.....140
A monster Concert.....238
A musical gymnast.....382
Année Musicale (reviewed).....57
Analysis of Bird Music.....61
Audi Alteram Partem (Wagner).....66
An Artistic Concert.....101
An hour with Meyerbeer.....157
An organic complaint.....111
A new instrument.....22
A play at the Tuileries.....101
A poet among the soldiers.....135
Army Hymn, Singing of the.....95
Artists' Exhibition.....359
Arne's (Dr.) Music to "Comus".....341
Architecture, Parliamentary Views on.....152
Artist Trio, The.....174
At Home.....270
- Bach and Handel.....250, 341
— as Organist.....315
— His Mass in B minor.....256
Bach, J. S. (Deutsche Musik-Zeitung).....129, 139, 147, 155, 166, 177, 198, 217.
— The study of.....284
Balfe's "Puritan's Daughter".....314, 323
Bariere di Seviglia.....64
Beethoven; his Schottischen Lieder.....274
Beethoven, recollections of, (Cipriani Potter).....302, 308
Beethoven's Fidelio, (Liszt).....219
Beethoven's music to Egmont.....194
Behind the scenes at the theatre.....220, 228
Bells, A chapter on.....194
Berlin Court Singers.....389
Berlin, The Music Gardens of.....100
Berlioz and Wagner (Louis Ehlert).....265
Berlioz, Hector.....178
Birmingham Festival.....112, 221
Boston Mozart Club.....262
— Musical Fund Society.....46
— Music Hall Association.....87
— Music Teachers, 263, Music in the Public Schools of.....299
— Musical Times.....95
— Public Library.....182
— Public Schools, 68th Annual Festival.....134 — " " Report on Music in.....299, 307
Bosio.....215
Brainerd, Miss.....270
Brooklyn Academy of Music.....335
Brown Papers, republished.....252, 295
Browning, Mrs. E. B. Death of.....135, 180
- Cambridge Commencement.....127
Castelli, Memoirs of my life.....163
Chamber Concerts.....278
Charity children in St. Paul's Cathedral.....136
Charlatanism in Music.....58, 65, 81, 94
Chevé's System of Musical Instruction.....49, 70, 86, 101
Chicago, organ for.....111
Chickering's Pianos.....12
Chimes.....340
Chinese music.....12
CHIT-CHAT.....23, 63, 70, 79, 96, 119, 126, 135, 142, 159, 167, 182, 190, 207, 214, 223, 238, 261.
Chopin's Mazurkas and Waltzes.....30
— a letter about.....171
— Mazurkas (Louis Ehlert).....235
— Sixteen Polish songs by.....364
Christmas services at Trinity Ch. N. Y.....316
Church Bells.....159
Church Music.....116
Church Music in New York.....11
Church music in St. Louis.....45, 96
Church music in the hands of the Reformers.....68
Cimarosa and Paisiello.....125
Cincinnati Musical Association.....24
Classical Music, on the pretended love for.....323
Commemoration of Victory.....390
- Composers, a prize for.....167
CONCERTS:
Boston Mozart Club.....23, 46, 311, 366, 415
Church of the Immaculate Conception.....383
Handel and Haydn Society, (Messiah).....6, 30, 39
Handel and Haydn Society, 311. Christmas performance of the Messiah. 318; Te Deum and Hymn of Praise.....390
Kreissmann, Leonhard and Eichberg.....270, 286, 294
Madlle. de la Motte.....63
Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, (old South Church).....358
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.....30, 278, 294, 327, 342, 366, 382, 391, 406.
Miss Mary Fay.....342, 351, 366
Mr. Bendelari.....55
Mr. John K. Paine.....254, 350, 366
Mr. Petersilea.....39
Mr. S. B. Ball.....15
Mr. Whiting's (Organ).....15
Mrs. Charlotte Varian.....39, 46, 70, 215, 223, 238, 270
Mrs. J. H. Long.....63
Music Hall.....262
Orchestral Union.....23, 30, 39, 70, 79, 351, 359, 366, 375, 383, 391, 399, 406.
Orpheus Musical Association.....30, 215, 255, 414
Patti Matinée.....262
Philharmonic Concerts.....334, 358, 374, 398, 414
Pierian Sodality and Glee Club.....62
Polyhymnia.....15
Concert programmes.....102
Concert Spirituel.....56
Concone, death of.....151
Conducting.....116, 133, 148
Contraband singing.....182
- CORRESPONDENCE:
Aurora, N. Y.....181
Alhany, N. Y.....373
Brooklyn, N. Y.....134, 271, 359, 374
Burlington, Vt.....221
Buffalo, N. Y.....366
Chicago.....7, 111, 118
Cincinnati.....16, 30, 357, 415
Cumberland, Md.....366
Dorchester, Mass.....399
Finland.....255
Gettysburg, Pa.....21
Hartford, Conn.....259, 277
Leipzig.....309
New Bedford.....319
Milwaukie (Wis).....271, 343, 373
New York.....6, 21, 22, 37, 47, 126, 175, 197, 216, 248, 253, 263, 319, 359, 365.
North Weymouth, Mass.....8
Paris.....7, 15, 55, 62, 72, 301
Philadelphia.....16, 86, 327, 357, 359, 365, 373, 383, 389
Pittsfield, Mass.....16, 151, 389
Providence, R. I.....359
Rome.....110
Springfield, Mass.....86, 285, 316, 333
Sweden.....263
St. Louis.....8, 38, 79, 316, 358, 399
St. Petersburg.....118
Terre Haute, (Ia.).....16
Toronto.....44, 391
Townsend, Mass.....101
Venice.....110
Vienna.....190
Weimar.....85, 223
Worcester, Mass.....86, 231, 253, 319
- CORRESPONDENCE, EDITORIAL, NEW SERIES:
No. X. Grell's Mass—Sing-Akademie.....4
XI. Symphonies for the People—Liebig.....13
XII. Liebig and his concerts.....19
XIII. Music in Berlin—Bach.....63
XIV. London.....117
XV. ".....125
XVI. ".....133
XVII. " Hallé's Beethoven Recitals.....141
XVIII. " Monday Popular Concerts.....150
XIX. " Philharmonic—Art Union—Jenny Lind.....158
XX. " Don Giovanni at Covent Garden.....188
XXI. " William Tell.....205
XXII. " The Book of Leviathan.....236, 245
XXIII. " Musical Summer in London.....252
XXIV. " Mad. Lind-Goldschmidt, in Elijah.....260
Cushman, Charlotte.....173
Czillag, Mad. Rosa.....23
- Darmstadt, a day in.....292
David the Composer.....101
Death behind the scenes.....196
" De Gustibus".....326
Dettingen Te Deum, The (Chorley).....286, 290, 299
— performed by the Handel and Haydn.....390
- Development of the Musical Faculties (Dr. Marx).....83, 90, 109, 113, 121, 132
Diarist, (the) in London.....130, 137, 145, 153, 161, 169
— in Vienna.....190
Diapason, The.....144
Don Giovanni.....93
Don Giovanni in London, (1861).....143
Dramatic Music.....156
Dussak, Dussek, Duschek, (A. W. Thayer).....211, 218, 223, 232, 241.
Egmont, Beethoven's music to.....143
English national music.....194
Exhibition of 1862, (London).....143
- Facing the Music.....303
Falkenstein, J. his new mass.....54
Fechter's Orhella.....283
Fifteen years ago—Italian and German—Verdi.....347
Fine Arts (Athenæum gallery).....38
— Artists' Exhibition.....359
First Impressions abroad.....282
Foley, Margaret.....174
French Musical History (Sketches of).....1, 9, 17, 25, 33, 41, 50, 123.
Fry, W. H.....3, 11
- Genesee, N. Y. Normal Academy of Music.....190
Geuzinger not Geuzinger (see Haydn).....410
Germania Band.....262
Glover, (Howard) his opera Ruy Blas.....276
Gluck's "Alceste".....268
Gottschalk.....366
Grisi, Julia.....93, 96, 166, 167
Guilmette (Dr.) Lecture on Vocal Culture.....31
- Handel and Bach.....342
Handel and Haydn Society, Annual Meeting.....69, 87
Handel and Haydn Society, The Messiah.....6
Handel, Chrysander's life of, reviewed.....2
Handel's Messiah (N. Y. Tribune).....335
Hanover Square Rooms, The.....258
Harmonichord, The.....340
Hawthorn's wonderful "Marble Faun".....286
Haydn and the Music seller.....221
Haydn, Joseph, Twenty six letters to Mad. Geuzinger.....317, 354, 363, 387, 395, 410
Hayes, Catherine, death of.....181; biography of.....197
Heinrich, A. P. death of.....47
Hereford Musical Festival.....231
Hiller, Ferd: Letters about Music.....266
Hinckley, Miss, marriage of, to Susini.....255
Hints to Musical Misses.....181
Homeward bound.....222
Hymns and Chords.....80
Homer, L. P., death of.....407
- Improvement in keyboards of pianos, &c.....186
Israel in Egypt, (H. F. Chorley).....195
Italian and German—Fifteen years ago—Verdi.....347
Jaell, Alfred.....151
Japanese music among the.....204
Jarves' collection of old Masters.....333
Joachim as a composer.....43
Joachim's Concerto.....372
Keyboards of pianos, improvement in.....186
Knorr Ju'ius, death of.....151
Kreissle, Heinrich von, see Schubert.
- Le Domino Noir.....137
Lesueur, Biography of.....186
Lily of Kilarney.....413
Liszt in Paris.....115, 142
Lithophone, The, Nature's Piano.....26
London, a new Musical Conservatoire in.....293
London Monday Popular Concerts.....291
London Operas and Pattigraphs.....301
Lorini, Virginia Whiting.....47, 96
- Madrid, Music in.....239
Managers and Music Halls.....107
Mario as a Teacher.....115
Marschner, Dr. Heinrich.....341, 397
Marseilles Hymn, The.....91
Marseillaise, The, Who wrote it?.....68
Mason and Hamlin's Melodeons.....44
Mayer's (Carl) Piano Improvement.....343
Memoirs of my Life, Castelli.....163
Mendelssohn a Musician (Edin. Rev.).....397
Mendelssohn and his Letters (Edin. Rev.).....388
Mendelssohn's Elijah.....348, 356,
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.....134
Modern Music.....340

- Mendelssohn's Travelling Letters, 209, 214, 222, 227, 243, 249, 269, 273, 289, 297, 305, 313, 329, 337, 345, 353, 361, 369, 377, 385, 393, 401, 409.
- Meyerbeer, an hour with, 157; Meyerbeer and Rambeau..... 293
- Mozart and the Chimes..... 412
- Mozart and the Orchestra..... 143
- Mozart, What he was paid..... 56
- Mozart, W. A., (by Otto Jahn)..... 75, 82
- My Whistling Neighbor..... 164
- Munich, Music and Sculpture in..... 282
- Music..... 47
- A Cure affected by..... 10
- Among the Japanese..... 204
- a Means of Preserving Health..... 191
- an Amusement of the Home..... 188
- A new Light in..... 3
- as Art, Language, Prophecy..... 403
- at Home..... 230 302
- At the West Church..... 223
- Dramatic..... 156
- English National..... 293
- for this Season..... 247
- Gardens of Berlin..... 100
- in Common Schools..... 198
- in Legislative Halls..... 63
- in Madrid..... 239
- in Primary Schools..... 101
- in Russia..... 173
- in the Army..... 262
- Influence of..... 203, 234, 244, 250
- Irish..... 70
- Letters about (F. Hiller)..... 266
- Mimetic..... 29, 31, 33
- Modern..... 340
- Of the Future..... 18
- Remarks on the Present State of, (Dr. Marx)..... 139.
- Report on, in the Boston Schools..... 299, 307
- To Mabeth..... 23
- Trade, the Board of..... 111
- without Noise (Punch)..... 325
- Musical Societies in New York..... 27, 35
- Devotions, Vespers..... 322
- Education, Objects of..... 97
- Education, Remarks on (Dr. Marx), 42, 76,
- Genius..... 47
- Glasses, how to Play on..... 238
- Instruments, Ancient..... 61
- Journals, in Italy..... 381
- Literature..... 28
- Phenomenon..... 238
- Season, The..... 261
- Terms..... 148
- MUSIC in Vol. XIX.
- No. 1. The Hymn of Praise (Lobgesang) Mendelssohn, continued.
- 2-3. Opera of Martha, for Pianoforte, continued.
4. Chopin's Waltzes, op. 64, No. 3.
5. Martha continued.
- 6-9. Hymn of Praise, continued.
- 10-18. Martha, continued.
- 19-26. Hymn of Praise, continued.
- MUSIC in Vol. XX.
- No. 1. Hymn of Praise, continued.
- 2-7. Martha, continued.
8. Martha, (Title page and Argument).
- 9-11. Hymn of Praise, continued.
12. " " Title and Words.
- 13-18. Chopin's Mazurkas
- 19-26. The Messiah, (Handel) continued.
- MUSIC ABROAD.
- Aix la Chapelle..... 360
- Amsterdam..... 143, 302
- Barcelona..... 168
- Berlin..... 160
- Berlin, 40, 88, 104, 160, 168, 191, 215, 239, 288, 303, 311, 320, 327, 352, 363, 391, 406.....
- Birmingham..... 221, 376
- Bremen..... 326, 226
- Brunswick..... 191, 360
- Brussels..... 71, 384
- Bologna..... 320
- Cassel..... 368
- Cologne..... 72, 102, 199, 301, 304, 320, 326, 343, 352, 375
- Dresden..... 168, 272, 304, 320
- Dublin..... 239
- England..... 40, 79
- Florence..... 296
- Frankfort..... 239, 320
- Gotha..... 406
- Haarlem..... 271
- Hamburg..... 72, 312, 406
- Hanover..... 320, 335, 406
- Havana..... 207, 320
- Hereford..... 231
- Ivrea..... 168
- Italy..... 368
- Leipzig, 112, 288, 295, 301, 311, 320, 343, 351, 360, 384, 405.....
- Liverpool..... 236
- London, 12, 24, 47, 61, 71, 80, 88, 103, 119, 127, 191, 215, 239, 296, 312, 325, 344, 351, 376, 391, 400.....
- Madrid..... 270, 320
- Manchester..... 336, 376
- Mannheim..... 168
- Marieburg..... 215
- Mayence..... 268, 303, 360
- Melbourne..... 207
- Mexico..... 71, 319
- Milan..... 128, 168, 270, 320, 375
- Moscow..... 112
- Munich..... 301, 304, 350, 406
- Nuremberg..... 191, 199
- Paris, 12, 24, 44, 71, 79, 87, 102, 112, 127, 151, 159, 168, 183, 191, 199, 207, 231, 253, 261, 269, 275, 277, 288, 295, 320, 327, 368, 375, 399.....
- Pesth..... 39
- Prague..... 127
- Russia..... 191, 288
- Rouie..... 320, 368
- Stockholm..... 223
- Stuttgart..... 239, 288
- Turin..... 320
- Vienna, 6, 40, 112, 128, 280, 287, 295, 304, 312, 320, 335, 359, 377, 384.....
- Weimar..... 207, 223, 350
- Wiesbaden..... 191, 312, 406
- Napoleon, Prince, Boston Festival in Honor of..... 206
- National Anthems..... 91
- National Hymn, The..... 101, 132, 149
- National Hymns..... 257
- Nature's Piano. The Lithophone..... 26
- New Publications, 23, 63, 70, 87, 95, 118, 142, 183, 198, 207, 223, 239, 255.....
- New Orleans..... 5
- New York. Church Music in, 11; Musical Societies in..... 27, 35
- Niedermeyer, Louis..... 52
- Nigger Minstrelsy in England..... 98
- Night hath Songs..... 117
- Novello, Vincent, Obituary of..... 188
- Life and Labors of, by Mary C. Clarke, 346, 355, 371, 380, 404.....
- Old Masters, The Jarves Collection of..... 333
- OPERA, ITALIAN IN BOSTON.
- Bely..... 277
- Don Giovanni..... 14
- Il Barbiere..... 14
- I Puritani..... 14
- La Juive..... 6, 14
- La Sonnambula..... 6
- Les Noces de Jeannette..... 279, 287
- Lucrezia Borgia..... 287
- Martha..... 287
- Un Ballo in Maschera..... 279
- Opera, The..... 203
- Opera and Theatre in Venice..... 105
- Opera Hunting in Germany..... 291
- in Italy..... 81
- Opera, our Early Troupes..... 19
- Organ, The..... 29, 59, 106, 179
- Organ Concert, Mr. Whiting..... 15
- Concerts at Leeds..... 184
- for Buffalo..... 300
- Organ for Chicago..... 111
- for Christ Church, Cambridge..... 262
- for Detroit..... 135
- for Dr. Gannett's Church..... 319
- for Jamaica Plain..... 182
- for Vine street, Roxbury..... 206
- for West Church, Boston..... 206
- Organs, a Gossip about..... 187
- Orchestra of the Crystal Palace..... 388
- Our Music Pages..... 310
- Paesiello and Cimarosa..... 125
- Paine, J. K., the Organist..... 60, 135
- his Concert in Portland..... 149, 166
- Concert in Boston..... 254, 295, 343
- Paris, The new Grand Opera House at..... 183
- Patti, Adelina, in London..... 84, 125
- at Berlin..... 365
- Patriotic Piccolomini..... 231
- Paying the Piper..... 231
- Philadelphia Continental Theatre, Fire at..... 199
- Phillips, Adelaide..... 182
- in Paris..... 254
- Phonography, the new Science of..... 183
- Piano Thrumming..... 94
- POETRY:
- A Crimean Episode. Bayard Taylor..... 201
- A Day in June. J. R. Lowell..... 81
- A Woodland Reverie..... 105
- Bell Songs. Rose Terry..... 73
- Cavalry Song. C. O. Leland..... 153
- Chimes. Arlington Street Church. (Transcript)..... 313
- Farewell to the Swallows. Thomas Hood..... 225
- Hymn to the Flowers. Horace Smith..... 209
- I Love to Sing. Rev. Dr. Bethune..... 177
- June, W. C. Bryant..... 97
- Lotos-Land. Rose Terry..... 89
- Mountain Pictures. (J. G. Whittier)..... 377
- "Not Yet." Bryant..... 116
- Ode to an old Violin..... 196
- Our Country. O. W. Holmes..... 228
- Our Country's Call. W. C. Bryant..... 249
- Our River. John G. Whittier..... 137
- O Mother of a Mighty Race. Bryant..... 115
- Protogue. Belmont Theatrical Company)..... 350
- September Rain..... 217
- Sonnet. Fanny Malone Raymond..... 1
- The Celestial Army. T. B. Reed..... 129
- The Flower of Liberty. O. W. Holmes..... 265
- The Great Bell Roland. Theodore Tilton..... 25
- The Lark in the City. Thomas Hood..... 185
- The North and the South. (E. B. Browning)..... 281
- The Origin of Language. (Blackwood)..... 385
- The Rising of the People. E. J. Cutler..... 193
- The Two Armies. Vanity Fair..... 145
- The Washers of the Shroud. J. R. Lowell..... 257
- Under the Cloud and through the Sea..... 169
- War Song. W. W. Story..... 114
- Portuguese Music..... 119
- Practical Answers to Practical Questions..... 172
- Prime Seventh, the, as an Element in the Musical System. (H. W. Poole)..... 77
- Psalms and Psalmody..... 308
- Public, The Judgment of the..... 262
- Puritan's Daughter, Balfe's New Opera,..... 314, 323
- Ramcau and Meyerbeer..... 293
- Roger's Mode of Singing..... 74
- Rossini at Home..... 11
- Rossini's "Titans"..... 340
- Russia, Music in, (Trovator)..... 173
- Russian National Music..... 154
- Ruy Blas, (Howard Glover's Opera)..... 276
- Satter, G. in Paris..... 271
- Schmitt, Geo. A., Capt..... 127, 263
- Schraubstaedter, William..... 151
- Schubert, Franz, Manuscripts of..... 295
- Schubert, Franz..... 122
- his Musical Remains..... 279
- Schubert, Franz, a Biographical Sketch (H. von Kreissle), 281, 290, 298, 306, 313, 321, 331, 339, 346, 355, 370, 402, 411.....
- Schumann, Robert..... 175
- Scrihe, Eugene..... 36
- Seville, September Music in..... 251
- Shaw, Oliver J., Obituary of..... 142
- Song, the Essentials of..... 182
- Southard, L. H..... 47
- Spohr and Boucher..... 389
- Spohr in London..... 315
- Staudigl, death of..... 47, 51, 59
- Star Spangled Banner, The..... 37, 39, 46
- Stebbins, Emma..... 174
- Steinhilf, Daniel..... 372
- Stigelli..... 215
- St. Louis, Church Music in..... 45
- Sunday Music on the Common..... 99
- Surry Music Hall..... 114
- Tannhäuser at the Stadt Theatre..... 119
- Tannhäuser in Paris..... 63
- Tate and Brady..... 382
- Teachers and Methods of Teaching..... 121
- Thooft's Symphony (Charles V.)..... 143
- Through the Country of the White Hills..... 89
- Titius, Mlle..... 176
- Tom, the Blind Pianist..... 55
- Trovator: Letter from Finland..... 255
- from Sweden..... 263
- from Haarlem..... 271
- from Dresden..... 272
- from Vienna..... 280
- Opera Hunting in Germany..... 291
- A Day in Darmstadt..... 292
- Trenkle, Mr. J., Letter from..... 295
- Truth about Music and Musicians..... 208, 212
- Ullmann's Benefits..... 238
- Un Fanatico per la Musica..... 100
- Verdi..... 73, 114, 347
- Vespers, Musical Devotions..... 322
- Victory, Commemoration of..... 390
- Virtuoso, The..... 364
- Vogler, (Abbé) and his Pupils..... 36
- Wagner and Berlioz (L. Ehlert)..... 265
- Wagner, (Audi alteram partem)..... 66
- Wagner's Flying Dutchman..... 72
- Wagner, Johanna..... 323
- Wagner's Music of the Future Reviewed..... 18
- Wagner, Richard..... 242
- Walewski's (Count), Address at the Conservatoire..... 185.
- War Song. W. W. Story..... 114
- Washington, Music in..... 55
- New Picture for the Capitol at..... 285
- Weimar, The World of..... 45
- Weber and the Harmonichord..... 340
- What makes things Musical..... 61
- Whiting, Geo. E. (Organist)..... 15
- Yankee Doodle, the Origin of..... 107
- Zelter, Carl Friederich..... 201, 213

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 470.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 1.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sonnet.

When fleecy cloudlets float about the moon,
When dews fall—her pure tears—and her sweet breath

The night wind, like some pious Sabbath tune,
The passionate heart to peace attempereth,
Then in my quiet room I sit, and sing
Such songs as solitude and I love best;
Then evil's self seems a harmonious thing,
And life's sad cares resolve in tranquil rest.
Then do I feel that all are sanctified
To noble ends, and purely should aspire;
All, who in song's novitiate here are tried,
Ere they may join the immortal stary choir.
Then thrills of rapture through my being start,
As though the hand of God had touched my heart.

FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

XI.

OPERA.

1830—1860.

The Revolution of July (1830) may be said to have taken place to the music of the duet in Masaniello, "Amour sacré de la patrie," and to the song la Parisienne, which Nourrit sang with such wonderful expression. After being closed fifteen days the theatre was opened again, Aug. 4, with Auber's la Muette, (Masaniello), a work fitted as if written for the occasion.

The following 13th of October, they gave Le Dieu et la Bayadere, another charming work of Auber, in which Marie Taglioni and Perrot, a pupil of Vestris, executed prodigies of grace and elegance.

March 1, 1831, Veron succeeded Lubbert in the direction of the opera, with a brilliant and profitable success. He gave successively Le Philtre, a new masterpiece of Auber, in a lighter style; Robert le Diable (Nov. 21), which produced a real revolution in the grand dramatic style; Le Serment and Gustave, by Scribe and Auber; Ali Baba, the last production of the now old Cherubini; and then La Juive, the masterpiece of his pupil, Halévy, who may be well called the French Meyerbeer.

Robert the Devil really is the standard-bearer of the new romantic school. This immense work, to which all schools, melted together in the crucible of a patient, learned and eclectic genius, have contributed, will ever remain an imperishable monument of the second transformation of the art in the 19th century. The first was the work of Rossini.

The middle ages and chivalry, happily substituted for the thoroughly used up old clothes of the Greeks and Romans, the eternal contest of Right and Wrong, so admirably personified in the parts of Alice and Bertram, give to this marvellous poem all the attractions of a legend based upon the principle of Christianity. The fugged introduction which precedes the rising of the curtain is at once learned and melodious; the choruses of the Norman nobles, who emulate each other in the praises of pleasure and love, are of an infinite grace and freshness; the Fêtes of the tournament are of magic splendor; the scene of the nuns has a terrible and sombre effect; finally the closing trio in which the angel overthrows the demon and heavenly voices mingle with sad cries from the realm of darkness is sublime.

And then such execution! Nourrit, Levasseur, Madames Damoreau and Dorus! and Cornélie Falcon, who, after making the part of Alice her own, became the admirable personification of La Juive! Person, voice, action, dramatic enthusiasm, that great tragedienne united all the qualities so rare, which go to form the consummate lyric artist. What can we say of the orchestration of Meyerbeer? What vigor, sonority, picturesque coloring, exactness in the smallest details! On the other hand, what luxury in the decorations, the costume, the stage appointments! During the rehearsals of this splendid work, public opinion was utterly unfavorable to it; even the actors far from expecting success foresaw but its fall. Robert le Diable, that sublime manifestation of genius, was regarded as a labored and fantastic conception, with no melodic value, an opinion which very soon would be justified by the public.

After Rossini and Weber we have had Meyerbeer; after Meyerbeer and Auber we come to Halévy. This master, so profound in his science, so elevated in his inspirations, has continued the romantic movement of which we have been speaking, and which corresponds to that transformation in literature at the head of which Victor Hugo has been proclaimed chief actor. In the works of Halévy, to a great richness of orchestration are added a great knowledge of the voice and a perfect appreciation of prosody and dramatic truth. We know not what to praise most highly in La Juive, the pomp of the introduction, the solemn Te Deum, the magnificence of the processions, the energy of the choruses, or the beauty of single pieces. Can there be anything more pathetic than the sublime second act, in which the Jewish type is so finely sculptured! What touching simplicity in the scene of the Passover. What emotion in the romance "Il va ceder;" what passion in the final duet and trio! And then how grandly is the character of the Cardinal painted in the majestic air of the first act, the awful anathema of the third, and the dramatic duet of the fourth! What can be said of the air of Eleazar, "Rachel, quand du Seigneur," the text of which is by Nourrit, and in which palpitate all the sentiments of tenderness, love and religion which a paternal heart can contain. Is there not something in that funeral march of the penitents in the fifth act, which causes one to shiver with a sort of alarm and terror? That supplication of the young and beautiful Rachel, the sad decorations, the short notes of the executioner to the "Il est temps!" all combine to make this work one of the most touching exhibitions which can be offered to the sensibilities of an audience.

Veron alternated his operas with the most seductive ballets, as La Sylphide, par Mlle. Taglioni; La Tempête, L'Île des Pirates and Le Diable Boiteux by Mlles. Therese and Fanny Ellsler.

Add to all this, reproductions of the Armida, La Vestale and Don Juan, and a troop perfectly balanced, and the prodigious success of the opera at that time is no longer astonishing.

Director Veron was succeeded by Duponchel, under whom we had Meyerbeer's second great work, Les Huguenots, Feb. 29, 1836.

Nothing new can be said upon the bacchic spirit of the chorus of the orgies, upon the grace of that of the bathers, upon the magnificent septette of the duel scene, upon the celebrated fourth act, in which the sombre conjuration precedes the sublime duet, which will never be surpassed upon the stage. What was there wanting to inspire such artists as Nourrit and Mlle. Falcon.

The fifth act finely closes these scenes of war and love. The ball at which Raoul presents himself dripping with blood; the scene in the convent in which the voices of the Huguenots die away by degrees; and the final tableau in which Marcel unites the two lovers and the choral of Luther, vigorously sung by the three martyrs, appals the ferocious assassins; then the marvellous stage scene in which the quays of Paris, strewn with the slain, appear in shadow, while the massive towers of Notre Dame are relieved in all their jagged outlines against the azure sky all sparkling with stars; nothing could so picturesquely close so bloody and terrible a drama. Reports of firearms mingle with the groans of the victims; the savage cries of the murderers resound from all sides; the curtain falls upon this scene of horror at the moment when Queen Marguerite reënters her palace, escorted by her pages and brilliantly lighted by the torches, which flame about her splendid litter.

The production of La Esmeralda, by Mlle. Bertini, and Stradella, by Niedermeyer and the retirement of Adolphe Nourrit from the stage before the debut of Gilbert Duprez were contemporaneous.

Duprez had an immense success as Arnold in William Tell, in Masaniello, Les Huguenots and La Juive. His large and noble style of recitative, the great strength of lung with which he gave the high C with the chest voice, filling the theatre with the tone, his neat and sonorous declamation, and his true and expressive method very soon gained him the suffrages of all. Unluckily, imitators, who had neither his genius or his physical powers, in their endeavors to copy him, very soon gave us cries in the place of singing and loudness instead of expression. This tendency to a false taste ruled alike in the provinces and in Paris, and the true vocal art would soon have disappeared among us but for the combined efforts of Bordogni, Banderali, Pouchard and Garcia.

After the appearance of Madame Stolz in Guido et Ginevra (March 5, 1838) the Grand Opera gave in succession, Benvenuto Cellini, by Berlioz; Le Lac des Fees, by Auber; La Xacarella, by Marliani; Le Drapier, by Halevy, and Les Martyrs, by Donizetti.

M. Leon Pillet, appointed Director June 6, 1840, put the theatre into thorough repair, and opened his administration brilliantly with La Favorite, in which Mad. Stolz, Baroilhet, Duprez and Levasseur gained great applause. In 1841, Mario, who had appeared in Robert with remarkable success, quitted the opera to join the Italian company. Baroilhet represented Don Juan with a tropical fire; Carlotta Grisi captivated the public in Giselle, a delicious ballet, by Adam; and La Reine de Chypre, by Halevy, gave new opportunities for triumph to Mad. Stolz, Duprez and Baroilhet. On the 15th of March, 1843, Charles VI., by the same master, added a new wreath to the laurels of the great French composer. Nobody can forget the well merited success of the air of the king, the duet of the cards, the popular chorus Guerre aux tyrans, the picturesque recitative of the man of the Forest du Mans and the entire part of Odette.

The Don Sebastian of Donizetti was given not long before the death of the famed and illustrious composer. But masterpieces became now more rare. The new works which followed in order were Le Lazzarone, Richard en Palestine, Marie Stuart, in which her touching farewell is remarkable, L'Etoile de Seville, in which Duprez played and sang the part of Edgar so finely, David by Mermet, L'Ame en peine by Flotow, and finally Robert Bruce, a feeble pasticcio after Rossini, which might have caused a smile of pity on the face of his marble statue, so unhappily placed behind the comptrollers of the theatre.

At length Madame Stolz,* who had created a void about her by causing the removal from the theatre of all who displeased her, even to the dancers, left the scene, Pillet at the same time giving up the direction and leaving debts to the amount of 400,000 francs to his successors, M. M. Duponchel and Roqueplan, (1847.) At this period, Cerrito and Saint-Leon gained a fine success in La Fille de Marbre, and Duprez raised himself to the level of Talma in the famous scene of the degradation of the Chevalier in Verdi's Jerusalem.

The Revolution of 1848 broke in upon the successful performances of Carlotta Grisi in Griselidis, a ballet by Adam, whose death is a loss to art. Nisida by Mlle. Plunkett, Da Vivandiere, by Pagni, and Jeanne la Folle, by Clapissou, complete the contingent of that year of political troubles.

At length, April 16, 1849, Le Prophete, the third great work of Meyerbeer, was given to the public under the auspices of Roger, the graceful deserter from the ranks of the Opera Comique. The pastorale was given by that singer with delicious taste; Madame Viardot Garcia created the part of Fidès with a dramatic force of expression which raised the fourth act to an incomparable excellence; then Alboni, with her commanding voice, adding to a calm dignity a freedom and fullness of breadth, which transports us back to the days of Rubens and Teniers. The Arioso in the second act reminds us of Gluck, the air of Zacharie of the solidity of Handel; the hymn of triumph, the march of the coronation and the entire scene in the cathedral have a pomp and splendor almost supernatural; and finally, during the lovers' last embrace, amid fire and flame, and falling walls, the tableau, imitating the death of Sardanapalus, has an effect truly striking and marvellous. The chorus which opens the first act and almost rivals the first chorus of Rossini's Tell for its freshness and odor of the country, the call to arms so vigorous and martial in its rhythm the delightful ballet of the skaters, the air of Fidès in the 5th act, the bacchanal song of John of Leyden, and above all the dream and chorus of children in the 4th act—all this has a surprising richness of melody and accompaniment. Without attaining the extreme popularity of those which preceded it, owing to the nature of the subject, still, this score of Meyerbeer, fully imbued with a German eclecticism, is perhaps the most interesting of all his works for the amateur and artist.

* M. Poisot treats the matter very gingerly. The fact seems to be, as we have learned it from other sources, that Stolz was Pillet's mistress, and used her power as queen of his affections to retain her place as queen of the stage, by admitting no rival upon it.

After the Prophet they produced L'Enfant prodigue of Auber, Dec. 6, 1859, and the Demon de la Nuit by Rosenhain. The Sappho of Gounod was both for the composer and for Madame Viardot-Garcia, the occasion of a success solid and honorable. La Corbeille d'oranges gave Alboni opportunity to exhibit her exquisite talents and Le Juif errant of Halevy showed in full contrast the beautiful voices of Massol and Mad. Tedesco.

Dec. 2, 1852 the Academie Nationale de Musique, again resumed the title of Academie Imperiale, and after the unsuccessful Orfu, gave Luisa Miller, composed by Verdi for Madame Bosio. To the La Fronde of Niedermeyer, succeeded Le Maitre Chanteur of Limnander. Then followed the great success of Madame Rosati in Jovita, a ballet by Labarre; but this did not prevent M. Roqueplan from resigning the direction, June 30, 1850. Since this time the opera has been attached to the Emperor's household and under the same administration.

La Nonne Sanglante, by Gounod, in spite of the monotony of the poem, gave Mlle. Wertheimer and Gueymard passages worthy of their talents. Gounod, the last pupil of Lesueur, recalls the large style of his master. At times his melody is curtailed but the idea is never wanting in elevation and nobleness. His choruses and accompaniments are written with a master hand; the symphony of the 2d act of La Nonne is worthy of Weber for color and originality.

Since 1855 there has been nothing very remarkable, unless we except Les Vepres Siciliennes of Verdi, which gave Mlle. Cruvelli (Sophia Cruvel, a German) opportunity to display the varied resources of her fine organ. Marco Spada and Le Cheval de Bronze by Auber, passed from the Opera Comique to the Grand Opera. The bringing together in this manner, and, perhaps we may say, this confounding of the two grand classes of opera, let us hope will be but the step towards separating them hereafter with more exactness.

If we grant that vocal art has been sensibly declining for some years, this may perhaps be from two causes worth mentioning:

1. The elevation, gradually and constantly, of the normal pitch or diapason.
2. The augmentation of the orchestral forces, which numbered but fifteen in the time of Cambert, but now amount to more than a hundred.

The present director is Dietsch, successor of Girard.

Note: The Translator adds here a list of the Directors of the Grand Opera during the present century.

1800. Bonet, commissioner of the Government.

1801. Cellerier.

1802. The First Consul put the Opera under the charge of a prefect of the palace, with Morel as Director. Lemoine directed it fifteen days during this year.

1803. Bonet again.

1807. Picard, Napoleon's first chamberlain.

1814 The Minister of the Royal household had the Opera added to his duties.

1815. Papillon de la Ferté, director-general for the ministry. Choron, manager. Pertuis, inspector of music.

1817. Courtien, administrator.

1818. Pertuis, director.

1819. Viotti, "

1821. Habeneck, "

1824. Duplantys, "

1828. Lubbert.

1831. Veroc undertook the opera at his own risk

1835. Duponchel, director.

1840. Duponchel and Monnier.

1841. Leon Pillet.

1847. Duponchel and Nestor Roqueplan.

1848. Roqueplan.

1854. Nestor, Imperial administrator.

1854. Crosnier.

1856. Alphonse Royer.

The Life of Handel.

By Frederick Chrysander. Leipzig, Breitkopf and Härtel. From the Deutsche Musik Zeitung.

The Second Volume of Chrysander's book on Handel has recently appeared. The first was contemporaneous with the publication of the Leipzig Society's edition of Handel's Collected Works, and thus the foundations were simultaneously laid for two monuments in honor of the master, who had become a stranger in his native land; monuments which will not only hand down his memory to the remotest ages, but also, by their intellectual influence, be of indisputable importance for our own further progress in art. Both enterprises, Handel's Works and Chrysander's Biography, proceed hand in hand towards the same result, namely, to render the life and acts of one of our great masters, in all their truthfulness, the common good. Of his compositions only a few were really known, while some few more were known only by tradition to the larger portion of the public, so that merely indistinct notions of his all-comprehensive musical labors were floating about among the people. Just as, in the case of Bach, until about twenty or thirty years ago, we were contented with the limited side of his art, that is to say, his eminent technical excellence, and did not until very lately begin to penetrate to his really intellectual qualities; we shall, in a short time, change our inadequate notion of Handel's art for others more correct and complete, and, in the place of the few anecdotal narratives from which the large mass of public derived their ideas of his life and disposition, without attaining a truthful and definite picture of his character, we shall now acquire, thanks to Chrysander's work, a knowledge of the complete and mighty course of development pursued by the mind of one who was as elevated in morals as he was in art.

Both undertakings have come at the right time. It is an indisputable fact that the musical art of the present day possesses in itself, as a counterpoise to that extravagance and pretensions of mere technicality, of which it is generally the victim, a profound impulse to maintain what is true, and to return to what is primary. The attraction towards direct knowledge—a feeling that takes us back to those sources whence the art of our forefathers flowed in never turbid clearness, appears, indeed, to be of a firm basis for vigorous progress. Since the art of our own time does not appear to go further than the Past in achieving a result that may serve as a standard, and does not, moreover, possess in itself the productive power for the purpose, there is nothing better left for it to do than, by popularising the perfect work of certain definite periods, to lay down among the people the foundation for future structures. That is the great end which our editions of the works of Handel and Bach have to fulfil. Even at present, people have not as yet come to a clear understanding concerning their relative position. Our first wish in contemplating the work under consideration is that Bach and all our greatest masters may find such historians as Handel has found in Chrysander, or that the latter himself may be their historian.

The endeavor, by means of old art generally, to prepare a secure foundation for our vigorous development must not be misunderstood as a wish to return to antiquated forms and notions. As far as Handel is concerned, such a thing is entirely out of the question; though as a matter of course, certain works of his sprang up under the momentary influence of his age, it might very easily happen that, on examining our productions now-a-days, the question: What of ours had not originated under the same circumstances as the perishable portions of Bach and Handel's works, while, on the other hand, what had risen to such a height of ideality as their great works? would remain unanswered, if we were not sincere enough to own the true state of the case. We hope that our increasing appreciation of the past and its great masters will speedily put an end to complacent theory of the "surmounted point of view," and its two obstetric aids, heaven-storming egotism and unthinking delight in its equal by birth, fashionable feebleness. No one, without rendering himself altogether ridiculous, can any longer give utterance to such opinions as those which recently appeared in a musical paper on Handel's Israel in Egypt.

There is now evident throughout Germany a great amount of zeal for the restoration of old masterpieces, not in the isolated cases of collectors and historians, but combined with the wish to place these treasures within the reach of the large mass of the public. Even in our own time the spirit of indefatigable progress towards something higher does not rest a single moment, although we may not be able to perceive its workings in violent revolutionary attempts, but rather in the effort to obtain a correct view of our progress. The task of making the riches bequeathed to us by our great forefathers in art the common intellectual property of all, secures, if it be rightly performed, an honorable position even for our own age. At all events, if the highest ideas of our particular epoch have become the free property of its posterity, and thus placed an entire nation in a higher position and rendered them capable of receiving what is new to them, fresh and more extensive views are opened up in the domain of the mind, until these views are themselves realised in the endless process of intellectual development, and become the foundation for further efforts.

As yet, however, we have absorbed and rightly worked out hardly a tenth part of what art offers; for this reason, putting all other considerations aside, the revivifications of Bach and Handel, on the extensive scale on which it is now practised, is of undoubted importance to us. The notions of church music and oratorios have, at present, disappeared, as much as it was possible, from among us. Consequently we require for both of them complete models, more defined in their form and ideas—models, such as Bach, Handel, and the older masters have bequeathed us—if these kinds of composition are not to give up their ideal empires and sink down into a mere semblance of life in consequence of a combination of subjects and means of expression negating each other. Church music, which finds its idea in man's relative position to the highest intellectual ideas, must fall a prey to a mere over-sensual poetastering of the feelings as little as to the non-independent playing of understanding with pure form. In our own age—which we cannot deny possesses an impulse to render clearer the views of religion, obscured by forms, although for the moment it has not got beyond a dim humanism—church-music, when it has not altogether descended to a mere concert style, has been subjected to mere sentimental ecstacy quite as often as to abstract intellectual formalism. In the works of old church-music, up to its highest exponents, Bach and Handel, the matter and the expression constitute indivisible unity, while the form of expression although determined by the circumstances of the age, is always natural, and springs from the subject. On this account, the study of the old masters is the best invigorating means for the benefit of our own religious art, but only if we endeavor to discover, and, in conformity with the present view taken of things, to render evident in our works the inward relations between outward appearance and the living idea contained in it, and not content ourselves with the mere contemplation and imitation of outward form and peculiarities.

We are no better off now-a-days, with oratorios, whenever we happen to come across them. Our present music, based entirely upon subjective sensation, does not possess the strength to wed itself to a purely objective conception of the matter given it, and declines into eadness and outward painting. The discordance between the great historical figures of the Bible and our modern sentimentality is generally very great in modern oratorio. The purely historical character of the oratorio is entirely misunderstood—it was so even by Mendelssohn, who introduced into his oratorios the lyrical church elements, namely, the choral, certainly with Bach's Passions music as a model, but without perceiving that the latter was a series of special works for divine service, while oratorio is only more distantly related to the purely church view of things, or even has nothing at all to do with it. Mendelssohn wanted to invest oratorio with an additional religious significance, which was quite as foreign to him personally as to the whole polite world in which he lived.

Handel was born to create and carry out Oratorio. It is a sufficient proof of the greatness and importance of this highest form of musical art, that a man of such a mind as Handel had to live a long life of active employment in every way, in order, in his greatest strength and maturity, to complete, in his greatest works, that form in which the passing of idea into reality could be effected in a manner most appropriate to music, namely, the oratorio, in which the feelings enter with the epic view of matters into a compact for the purpose of representing a real action and definite characters, that is to say, in which the feelings become objective, while the action does not step forth outwardly into life, but remains ideal, so that there is nothing to disturb the music, as is not unfrequently the case with visible action.

American Composers.

W. H. FRY.

Among the appointments which, apart from party reasons, do honor to the new administration, as recognizing the claims of men of distinction in letters and art to honorable posts in the civil service of the country, is that of Mr. Fry, to be Secretary of Legation at Turin. Mr. Fry has been for many years one of the editors of the N. Y. Tribune, and is well known to our readers by his musical articles, often copied or quoted in these columns. He is also a composer of no small merit, and has a rare fortune among composers, to become a diplomatist. In the N. Y. Dispatch, "Timothy Trill" gives the following account of Mr. Fry and his works, among other "American composers."

First on this list comes by all right the name of Wm. H. Fry, Esq., whose opera, "Leonora," was the first and grandest work of that calibre ever composed by a man of American soil, and whose other works, especially for orchestra, entitle him to the most honorable and distinguished position among the hundreds of self-styled composers with which our country actually swarms, and who, alas! are continually publishing but never performing their works! ("Nor any other man!")

Mr. Fry's heaviest works are his opera, (composed when he was but 17 years old!) his Santa Claus Symphony, the Pastoral Overture "A Day in the Country," the romantic tone-poem "The Broken Heart," and his truly grand sacred work, the "Stabat Mater," a much larger and more serious Oratorio by far than that by Rossini on the same subject.

Besides these, Mr. Fry has been an earnest devotee to a class of composition for which he has rarely gotten any credit; namely, the Chamber Quartet. He has written over a dozen of these, one of which, (No. 11,) was produced several years ago by Mr. H. C. Cooper's efforts at one of Dr. Guilmette's Concerts, and one movement of which was encored, a very rare honor for this species of music.

Mr. Fry's music is characterized by marked melodie features, imaginative instrumental symbols, and predominance of climacteric force, more than by contrapuntal equilibrium, strictness of classic form, or breadth of Orchestral treatment.

He believes with Berlioz, that no matter how nice the pudding may look, its appearance will not save the oaths of its eaters if it prove to contain nothing but ashes, or the dry chips of Albrechtsberger's and Hauptman's strictures, while at the same time, no one could be more severe with himself than he is, to prove which, one need only glance at one of his fine-written, complicated, altered, interpolated, scratched and blotted scores, a Chinese puzzle to a Conductor, and the dread of the copyist.

This mention of Berlioz urges me on to remark how often I have been struck by the many points of resemblance between him and Mr. Fry in their peculiar views. They remind one of Bentham among philosophers, or of Fitch among inventors, and neither has had any chance of being influenced by the other, for they carry out each other's theories instinctively, while the weak practical points of each are the firmly sustained theories of the other.

Thus Fry's abundant flow of melody and the predominance given to it in all his works, are quite the reverse of Berlioz who might study for a lifetime without being able to supply a small barrel-organ with six or eight tunes. They look at the position of the latter as the mighty King of the Orchestra, and the perfection of detail with which his scores are worked up, and the marvellous effects produced by the mere instrumentation alone, in which even the Germans confess themselves inferior. The points of similarity in these two original men, are a firm belief in the sacred truth of tone-painting, (which so many classicists scoff at,) and in the appropriateness of expression in the music of our churches. Liszt, Wagner, Berlioz and Fry have all created much and envenomed disension on account of their peculiar views, scorn of established customs and contempt for the well-worn paths of science. And why? Because innovators are always the longest in being understood, and old ears are like old dogs, and cannot (soon) be "taught new tricks."

Was not Wagner's sublime overture to "Tannhauser" ten years in existence before "the notes ever had a resurrection into life from the death-white paper?" Did not Beethoven actually die, having never heard his own Ninth Symphony? Did not Schubert die before the parts were even so much as drawn out from his Symphony in C minor, it having been left for the enthusiasm and devotion of a Schumann to give the work its first hearing?

A Whitfield or a William Pitt may address the applauding thousands of London, and yet fail to keep sleepy Hottentots awake, but are they not same shining oratorical lights in either case? How can we then despair at the dullness of appreciation which has hitherto marked the public presentation of certain musical works, of whose merit critics are agreed, and of whose genius fellow-composers stand confessors?

A NEW LIGHT IN MUSIC.—We have received the following circular which we give for the benefit of our readers who may never have heard of this great genius—

Eugene A. Wiener, No. 765 Broadway, (near 9th street)—up three pair of stairs—New York. (Portrait of Mr. Wiener).

According to editorial prints, of the first order, one of the greatest living pianists and musical writers! Without an equal as an extemporizer upon any given melody. Acknowledged by the public and the press of the Old and New World.

His method to develop any voice for "song" or "speech" and to remove any morbid obstructions of the voice, invariably surpassing any system known in musical art and science.

His method of teaching the Piano from the beginning to the highest perfection never failed to surround him with enthusiasts.

The effect—whenever imparting his musical knowledge and skill—always proved "instant" and "startling!"

The testimonials of the most competent critics and distinguished people here and abroad, express wonder, and the opinion that they never before have witnessed such a decided success!

Eugene A. Wiener approves of the "modern school" as far as represented in "some" productions of Richard Wagner, Hector Berlioz, Franz Liszt, Giacomo Meyerbeer or Henselt, Thalberg, Kullack, Taubert and others. It is a matter of course, that Wagner, the author of "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" must prove correct in his leading idea, when pointing at a "Future of Music" inasmuch as the progress of each age being the natural law of expansion, leaving behind the imperfect formations of the past, however venerable they may be.

"Thought" is the creative Power of the Creator, above as well as "within us!" Speculative philosophical audacity is promotive for art and science, "if" the go-ahead principle is realized with that caution, neglected by the otherwise gigantic Robert Schumann, Mendelssohn Bartholdy and Nicolaus Lenau.

Friedrich von Schiller once exclaimed: "Give me a handful of earth, that I may go out of myself!" Eugene A. Wiener thinks, it is better to say within ourselves, avoiding the risk, to be shattered to atoms against rocky abstractions!

Eugene A. Wiener's "Charitable performances" in this Metropolis attracted large audiences and have been listened to with considerable popular favor, while the proceeds caused a great deal of relief to the distressed!

His splendid Musical Library includes his own writings! Free admission for ladies and children.

Church Music in New York.

The music at the Fifth Avenue Dutch Reformed Church (Rev. J. M. Macaulay's) has for many years been under the charge of our first musicians, and in consequence, noted for its excellence. It is at present directed by Dr. C. A. Guilmette, the renowned baritone singer, favorably known to the Boston public from his performances there in oratorio. The choir numbers about thirty: most of them are from Cooper Institute classes, where Dr. Guilmette is professor. It is very thoroughly drilled, and notwithstanding their numbers, they render the music with very delicate shades of expression. Mrs. H. Westervelt is the leading soprano singer. The style of music is varied, but always adapted to the sentiment of the words—whether grave or gay. Mr. W. H. Currie is the organist, and succeeded Wm. A. King in this capacity. He is a native of Dublin, Ireland, and has been in this country about ten years, of which four or five were passed at Chicago and the West. He is a wonderful executive organist, possessing correct taste, with great creative fancy, and plays with a force and sentiment which give the music far more than its individual effect.

Of the merits of the organ we cannot say much at present, as it is in an incomplete state; but it promises to be one of the first-class when finished and will contain forty-four stops, with two and one-half octaves of pedals. It is in the hands of Thomas Robjohn, to whom the contract was given four years ago. At present not more than one-half its intended complement of pipes and stops have been put in. The pneumatic action was tried upon this organ, for the first time in this country, but has proved defective and troublesome. A new hydraulic apparatus for supplying wind is about to be applied to it, and will soon be experimented with and tested.

Mr. Wm. Mason, a son of Dr. Lowell Mason of Boston, is one of our most talented organists. His merits as a pianist are well known and appreciated by all lovers of classical music; but it is not generally known that he also stands in the front ranks as a performer upon the organ. His playing belongs to the strict school of sacred music, and he ignores entirely the modern secular style, as inappropriate to the service of the church. He formerly played at the late Rev. Dr. Alexander's Church (Presbyterian) in Fifth avenue, but is now temporarily engaged at the New Jerusalem Church in 35th street, of which Mr. Silver is pastor. The services of this Church do not admit largely of musical display, although more is perhaps attempted in this particular one than in many of the same denomination. The opening voluntary is always extemporized by Mr. Mason; then follows a motette, selected from the highest compositions of this class—sung by the quartette choir of amateurs; after which follow chants, at the close a hymn intended to be congregational. The congregation is dismissed without a closing voluntary. Of Mr. Mason's capabilities, the "Diarist," in Dwight's Journal of music, has thus spoken:

"Some two years since a small party remained in Dr. Alexander's church, in New York, after service, and William Mason extemporized upon the organ. That it impressed me strongly is clear from the fact that, notwithstanding all the great organ playing I have heard before and since, that half hour's performance remains fresh and vivid in my memory. In nine cases out of ten, you know beforehand what is to come next in an organ voluntary, just as you know how nine out of ten newspaper stories are to end—or, if your ear is disappointed, it is because the organ knows not where to go nor what to do next. But Mason's themes were so fresh, his episodes so unexpected yet so pleasing, the forms adopted so varied—now a solo with answering chorus from the vox celestis, now the full rolling masses of tone from the grand organ, and at last a fugue moving onward with stately steps—that the ear was constant and delightfully disappointed, the fancy continually excited, and the musical sense filled with enjoyment."

Of the many edifices erected for religious purposes in this city, the Tabernacle (Congregational) corner of Sixth avenue and 34th street, is perhaps one of the finest and most substantial. The society worshipping here has been for many years under the pastoral charge of Rev. J. P. Thompson, widely known as an intelligent and able preacher. They formerly occupied the old building on Broadway, in the lower part of the city, known as the Broadway Tabernacle, which was used for concerts and other miscellaneous purposes; but, at length, in the march of improvement and the rapid growth of the city, the site of the old building was wanted for a block of stores, it was disposed of at a great advance on first cost, and with the proceeds of this sale, the building which they now occupy was erected and completed about two years since.

It contains a very fine organ, built by Stuart Brothers, after the design and under the superintendence of Mr. G. W. Morgan of Grace Church, with thirty stops, extending throughout its full compass, and two and a half octaves pedals, which are arranged on Mr. Morgan's plan, described by a previous letter. It is played by Miss Marion McGregor of Rochester. As a general rule, ladies are considered inadequate to the control of a large organ, and seldom attempt it; but those who have succeeded rank high as performers. Among these may be mentioned Miss Tillinghast of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Chicago, and Mrs. Belknap of San Francisco, a pupil of William A. King. One of our first organists informs me that he generally has from three to six pupils. Miss McGregor is generally acknowledged to be second to none as a player of strictly sacred music; her style is of the Dr. Hodges school, so called. The soprano singer of this church, Mrs. Eliot (formerly Miss Anna Stone), is a native of Boston, and no doubt well known to many of your readers. Miss Ellen Meyer sings alto, and the tenor and bass parts are sustained by Mr. George N. Seymour and J. T. Lewis respectively—the whole forming a quartette of great efficiency. The music is directed by Mr. H. Camp, who succeeds William B. Bradbury in this department.

Rev. Dr. E. H. Chapin's church, in Broadway, is a large and comfortable edifice, and is always crowded by a large and attentive audience, attracted by the eloquence of this distinguished preacher. The music is furnished by a choir of seventy-five children, chosen from the Sabbath school, numbering about three hundred and fifty. They are drilled in the singing school connected with the church every week, and sing, in good time, very plain hymns and tunes, with pleasing effect. Mr. Eickhom acts as superintendent of the Sunday school and director of the choir, Mr. Wilson as leader, and Mr. Anthony Davis (a native of Germany) as organist. The organ was built by the Messrs. Hook of Boston, has 34 stops, three ranks of keys, and is a very fair instrument.—Transcript.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 6, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha," Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

NO. X.

GRELL'S SIXTEEN-PART MASS—THE SING-AKADEMIE.

Berlin, Feb. 21, 1861.

It is almost idle to date these letters. The experiences which they record accumulate so fast, with such full, strong current, never ceasing, each new novelty preoccupying the mind against the last before there is time to write about it, or hardly even to review it in the mind, that all that remains possible for me is to select from the portfolio of memory from time to time, as the painter does from his sketch-book, whatever one happens to feel in the humor for working up, or whatever there may seem to be a call for. Chronological sequence must be given up;—and what of that? The mind's ardor is of more importance than the almanac and has a right to turn it up-side down and supersede it. The music which I hear to-day is heard not always for to-day; but quite as likely for the supplying of a lost link far back in the chain of knowledge and experience, or to save up one against the time of need hereafter. The squirrel does not crack his nuts as fast as he finds them; it were a poor time to do that just as one has the chance (which may not come so soon again) to stuff his pockets. So henceforth we abandon all thought of sequence, as we already have done practically, with the best will to the contrary. The matter for the weekly letter shall be sometimes the last yield of to-day or yesterday, sometimes of an older vintage; whatever has survived unspoiled some weeks or months, will taste the better. This time I will speak of what last happened, while the impression of it is as fresh and fit for service as it probably ever will be.

A musical work was produced here for the first time last evening of a form and magnitude unexampled in these days, remarkable for any age, but more like one of the most earnest and ambitious products of the days of Palestrina and Orlando Lasso, and the learned Flemish and Italian masters of church music, than like anything that is wont to grow under our nineteenth century culture. It was a complete Mass for sixteen distinct voice-parts, composed by the grey-haired director of the Sing-Akademie, Professor GRELL, and sung by the Akademie, the composer himself conducting. The Mass is purely vocal, a capella; voices unsustained by any sort of accompaniment, except that the sub-director BLUMMER touched occasionally a bass note or a chord on the piano as a touchstone of true pitch. There were from three to four hundred singers, with a delegation of sixteen soli in front, who sang some movements wholly by themselves, and in other movements alternated with full chorus, with a view to vary, relieve and adorn the great, broad, curiously involved, slowly and majestically moving mass of harmony. The performance had been long expected and much talked of. The Mass was supposed to be the masterpiece of Grell in his peculiar sphere, that of the severe and learned old Italian church style, of which he is thought to be at the present day the foremost representative in Germany; devoted to it with a somewhat pedantic and one-sided life-long persistency (for indeed he seems to be a very dry old man), but with a mastery that entitles to respect in any real branch of Art. The rehearsals had been many and most careful; the Sing-Akademie lending themselves with a most patient loyal zeal to the work, resolved to do their best (and they never do anything that is not marvellously good), to make their director's work tell to the best advantage. The hall of course was completely filled by the most musically enlightened audience of Berlin, including a host of music-directors, professors and composers.

The impression which the work made upon me (and I should judge upon most listeners) was mixed and very curious. Many of the choral effects were positively sublime; and indeed all that was sung en masse by the whole choir, so greatly subdivided, sounded rich, full, widespread and majestic to a degree seldom realized. The mere sound of it, of such a broad, deep stream of tone, in which sixteen several streams were blended, was really a new, a glorious sensation, filling one now with awe and now with ecstasy. Some of the climaxes, where all the voices climb through modulations, as in the Gloria, the Quoniam tu solus, the Sanctus, and especially in Hosanna in excelsis, were enough to make one breathless with wonder. Of course literal sixteen-part harmony, simultaneous, realized in each instant, is impossible, within the range of all kinds of human voices. That is to say, vocal harmony in chords of sixteen notes is out of the question. The problem is solved only by the contrapuntal process of figuration, imitation, echoing and distributing about of little melodic phrases and fragments amongst the sixteen parts. Everything must be said more than once, in order that all may have a share in singing it. This has its inconveniences, its questionable consequences, to which we shall afterwards allude. But at times and for certain purposes it was exceedingly effective, used as it was with such consummate skill, so as to make a consistent, clear, euphonious whole out of the mingled risings and subsidings of so many little single waves, so many independent voices, each as it were eager to distinguish itself by some individual way of saying the same thing which all had to say. You felt it, for instance, when the whole air seemed cut up into little Amens, as fine as the words engraved all over the face of a bank bill. The Credo and Resurrexit found wondrous confirmation in all this answering of independent voices, this mastering and reconciling of differences and contrasts. Such words as visibilium omnium et invisibilium lent a beautiful occasion for this sort of treatment. There was once a passage where the contralto voices ran in triplets, varying the theme, whilst the general mass moved on in longer tones, which sounded exquisitely. On the other hand the yielding of the interwoven, figurative style now and then to a brief passage of soft, smoothly flowing harmony, as in propter nostram salutem descendit and in another intended to represent the lovely image of the Virgin (ex Maria virgine), produced a heavenly feeling. It was as when the ocean that has so long tossed in waves, becomes a mirror glassing the heavens' blue. Always had the composer adapted his music fitly to the thought and to the word of the Latin text. There was no such discrepancy as we find in so many of the more secular sorts of Catholic masses, even some of Haydn's in which the supplicating Kyrie eleison is made to revel in careless, florid bird-like warblings. Solemn themes, like the Crucifixus, were made profoundly impressive.

On the other hand, the vast design, so well accomplished, carries its own condemnation along with it, in the fact the necessary fact, of its inordinate length. The Mass lasted two hours. However grand in certain points, however interesting and impressive during moments, however full of new suggestion for the technical musician (and doubtless there was much to be learned from it, especially if one would study the score), still the impression as a whole was tedious and exhausting. To carry out such a plan, to give fair play to sixteen voices, required much room, more than the subject warranted in some of the movements. It had to be as long as it was broad. The bread had to be broken among such a multitude that it took a long time to get round. And that, too, in each single movement, or separately treated text, of the Mass. First, for the sake of contrast, movements were treated alternately by the sixteen solis and by the whole chorus. Not only did this double the length of everything, but it operated most of the time more as a foil, than as a contrast in itself agreeable. You were too glad always to have the chorus come back. The solis sounded hard, un-genial, thin; the crossings of voices often laid bare dangerous places on the uncomfortable verge of discord, such as you did not feel in the sublime and as it were self-rectifying harmonic masses of the chorus of four hundred. The Benedictus, however, which was sung only by the solis, was very beautiful and spoke to the feelings. The Kyrie and Christe were particularly over-long: first by solis, then by chorus, then solis again, each time treated at exhaustive length; and then a going back to the beginning and summing the whole up by the full choir. Had it begun with the last division, omitting all that went before, the effect must have been finer, one would think.

Grand as the thing was, you listened with impatience. It did not seem to get forward; it continually hung back, after it had fully passed you with its thought and put you in the mood of going on. A certain nightmare spell, the penalty of its own greatness, seemed to have invisibly bound its feet. We have already seen the reason. In treating sixteen voices, something must be found for each to do; they cannot move in four-fold common chords; the voice does not command so many octaves. Accordingly each theme, each motive, each musical statement has to be pulled to pieces and divided about among them in little figurative repetitions, answers, variations, melodic phrases of a moment's length. If this be well done, as it certainly is in this case, it lends a wonderful fullness, and sense of crowded, swarming life, yet quite harmonious, to the whole mass. But it can scarcely be called contrapuntal, or real polyphonic writing, in the high sense; for, though each of the sixteen parts manifests a certain amount of individual motion, it can only move a very little way, it can only go the length of its tether; there it stands tied to its post of a fixed harmony, with liberty to play a little around that, making little variations on it; but it does not move on in continuous self-development, twining itself with other individualities into a polyphonic whole, as in the works of Bach. The separate motion, the little melodic figuration of the parts, adds nothing to the thought and does not lead to anything; it only increases and enriches, so to speak, the sonority of the whole tone-mass at each given moment. It does not amount to creation; it has nothing to do with that part which genius plays in every composition; it is after all an art of effect; it is studied skill. Such a chorus dispenses with all orchestra; it needs none; it clothes itself with its own accompaniment. But in a way that prevents a natural rate of going forward. To accompany itself thus it has to repeat and multiply itself in little, and take many steps without advancing.

How different the polyphony of Bach, of Handel and other great ones! Four-part harmony is enough for them—as a rule. Five parts, six parts or a double choir, exceptionally and occasionally, serve for peculiar effects. The four voice parts have real, independent, characteristic and continuous progress; and for further enrichment, for color and support drawn from wider octaves, they employ instruments, which give a more piquant and decided contrast, and which add interesting accessory ideas. The sound of Grell's sixteen-part choir was unspeakably grand and beautiful sometimes; but you grew weary of it; it was positively a relief to our ears to hear again some four-part harmony, happily afforded in the second part of the concert by another new composition of his, a Te Deum, also a capella, and very fine. Introduced occasionally in the course of four-part compositions, for certain purposes, as for instance for the illustration of certain grand texts like some in Handel's "Israel," these sixteen-voiced sublimities might be admirable. But used through the whole length of a Mass, for two hours, they show you that the experiment is after all a failure, that the principle is wrong. It is chiefly as a curiosity therefore that this work is interesting. It proves abundantly the learning, the mastery of Grell. But it is not an achievement for which music can be thankful more than once.

Wonderful as the composition was, in its way, a greater wonder was its almost perfect execution by the Sing-Akademie. To sing through an entire Mass, in sixteen voice-parts, without any accompaniment whatever, during two hours, keeping the most complicated tone-web always whole and clear, entering always at the right time with promptness and decision, never lost or faltering, giving the right shade of expression, the right degree of force to every passage, the tones all pure and musical, the balance admirable, was an achievement which presupposes a remarkable average of ability and culture in the ranks, as well as indefatigable devotion and loyalty to a common end, and the most patient and well-directed practice. We have had something to boast of in the way of oratorio chorus singing in our own Boston; but nothing that could be compared to this. It was the crowning achievement of a society, who, every time that I have heard them have astonished me by the singular unity and perfection of their renderings. The Sing-Akademie, which was the life-work of Fusch and Zelter, to be whose successor therein Mendelssohn aspired, only to be defeated by an inferior candidate, and which stands now higher than ever before, probably, under Grell and Blummer, counting three or four hundred ladies and gentlemen of the most cultivated families of Berlin among its members, and having its own noble building, which contains house-room for its Director, a fine concert hall for its great performances, elegant ante-rooms, with busts and portraits (oil paintings) of the great composers meeting the eye at every turn, with a nice little upper hall for chamber concerts, and all sorts of conveniences—a completely furnished establishment in fact, is very properly the pride of Berlin and the object of much fostering care on the part of Prussian Princes, especially his late majesty King Frederick Wilhelm IV., the record of whose acts in furtherance of a high musical taste and culture in his capital is a rich and long one. The Sing-Akademie is such a musical society as we need in Boston, and in all our large cities, and I must endeavor soon to give a more detailed account of it. D.

NEW ORLEANS—Le Pardon de Plöermel.—Mr. Bondousquie has wisely decided no longer to delay the production of Meyerbeer's new opera, "Le Pardon de Plöermel." M^{lle} Adeline Patti, having perfected herself since she has been here, in the leading role, that of Dinorah, as that in which it is her intention to make her debut, on the London lyric boards, has been engaged to sing it here; and to-morrow evening the long-looked for opera, with its charming music, its new and elegant scenery, and its appropriate costumes and properties, will be produced—M^{lle} Patti, M^{mes} Richer, Pretti and Maillet, and Messrs. Melchisedec, Carrier, Genibrel, Chol, Delamarre and Debrinay forming the cast.

Italian Opera.

La Sonnambula was given on Thursday of last week, on the occasion of the benefit of Signor Brignoli, with Miss Kellogg in the part of Amina, Brignoli as Elvino and Susini as the Count. A Mad. Parazza, whose face has been long familiar in the ranks of the chorus, attempted the important rôle of Lisa. BRIGNOLI, of course, did his best, and that, in music so congenial to his powers, was of an excellence that can scarce be equalled. It is idle to enumerate the particular passages of an opera so thoroughly familiar as this, in which Signor Brignoli would excel, for it would be merely to give the titles of all the songs of the part of Elvino, from the beginning to the end of the opera. Add to this, that he never sang better and the whole story is told.

SUSINI made an effective Count Rodolpho, so far as good acting makes one, but was still not in good voice.

MISS KELLOGG, in many respects, was an admirable Amina. Her conception of the part was perfect, and generally both her voice and action carried out successfully her idea of the character and the intentions of the composer. In all the arias her neat execution, good style and acute perception of the requirements of the situation contributed to make her efforts satisfactory and pleasing, but in the concerted pieces she was wanting in sufficient power to cope with the more vigorous voices of those who surrounded her. The grand finale, Ah non giunge, was admirably executed and elicited much applause. A great drawback to this performance was the utterly incompetent representative of Lisa, who was hardly able to do enough to keep up the thread of the story, even with the omission of all the airs that she should give. The part is an important and very interesting one, and in the hands of Miss Hinckley, for example, (for it is by no means one beneath her), the opera would have been adequately represented. A young and ambitious prima donna could almost create this part before our audiences by giving it careful study. Who will do it?

La Sonnambula was repeated on Tuesday evening of this week for the benefit of Miss KELLOGG, which could have been but little benefit, by reason of the almost unparalleled severity of the snow storm which kept people effectually at home. This evening BARILI took the place of Susini, and consequently much more of the opera was omitted, even Vi ravviso. So the opera was practically given with no Lisa and no Count! Which will be omitted next, Amina or Elvino? Miss Kellogg and Brignoli did their best, and the beneficaire received an offering of flowers at the close of the first act, on being called before the curtain.

La Juive has been twice performed, since our last; on Friday of last week and on Monday of this week. The attention of the hearer, at the first representation, was much disturbed by the intense dramatic interest of the plot, (which is one of the most successful of the works of the late Eugene Scribe), by the pomp of the spectacle, and by the unfamiliar character of the music itself, which fails to make a very marked impression upon the first hearing, beyond a very general one. A second and a third hearing have made its character better understood, and its beauties stand out now quite clearly and distinctly, although they are not of the sort that are easily retained in the memory, the melodies being short and broken, the composer looking always, more to the dramatic than the musical effect of his score, and thus making his music more largely of the nature of recitative and of concerted pieces than of the melodies which characterize the works of other popular composers of the day. These later hearings revealed many passages of much interest. The opening chorus of the third scene, Celebriam, is one of much brilliancy and well introduces the great scenic display that follows. The music of the first scene that begins the second act, is full of solemnity, and of a quaintness that seems in keeping with the religious character of the Jewish festival. The trio between Eudoxia, Leopoldo and the Jew, later in this scene, is one of much beauty and dramatic effect; but we longed to hear such a voice from the Prince as would fill out the harmony with the power that was intended, whereas Signor Scola was almost inaudible.

The portion of the opera which follows, the scenes between Rachel, Leopold and Lazarus, though of great dramatic interest, became a little wearisome from being unduly spun out, unrelieved by any melodies standing in relief from the general monotony of the music. The trio, however, at the end of the act is perhaps the more effective from this contrast and brilliantly closes it. The third and fourth acts do not equal the first and last in interest, with the exception of some beautiful airs sung by Stigelli. The last act is a grand climax to the whole opera, and the solemn dead march that opens it, to which such a thrilling effect of horror is given by the shrill piercing tones of the life that mark its rhythm, make a most effective introduction to this exciting and almost painful finale. Very impressive, and solemn too, are the sombre and strange harmonies of the unaccompanied chorus that announces to the martyrs that the fatal hour has come, freezing the soul of Rachel with terror, and filling the mind of Lazarus with distracting and cruel doubts, whether to save her, or to permit her to suffer as a martyr. These violent passions are adequately and forcibly painted by the music of Halévy taken in connection with the effects of stage and scenery that it requires. How it would strike one apart from these it is not easy to say.

COLSON and STIGELLI again won new laurels by their wonderful impersonation of the characters of the Jew and his daughter, singing with unusual brilliancy and effect at the second performance which was by far the best of the three. Martha was repeated to a large audience on last Saturday afternoon, and we are glad to learn that we are to have still another opportunity of hearing La Juive this afternoon, which is the very last performance of this troupe which leaves for New York to open at the Academy on Monday.

We go to press too early this week, on account of the annual Fast, to be able to give any report of the later performances.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—THE MESSIAH. — The time-honored Messiah exerted its accustomed influence in filling the hall completely, on Sunday evening March 31st. Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS is much to be praised for singing with inmost feeling. Especially moving was her air: "He was despised." She proved again, that she is a true and worthy artist. Mr. STIGELLI likewise sang with dignity and feeling, in many instances rising to a high degree of expression. Both these artists added very greatly to the enjoyment of the evening. Misses KELLOGG and HINCKLEY are yet too young to have experienced enough in the oratorio style. Deep feeling, dignified expression both being based on the emotion the artist himself experiences, are necessary requisites for a success in oratorio, which the ladies will yet have to acquire. Dr. GUILMETTE ought to sing with a more even tone. His wavering takes away much of the interest in his performance. Most of the choruses were done well. Some runs might have been smoother. *†

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—By an oversight in furnishing the plates for the music pages of this number of the Journal, a continuation of "Hymn of Praise" is presented instead of "Martha," as announced in the usual place.

Music Abroad.

Vienna.

The most important event last week was the appearance of Joseph Joachim. In years gone by, the Viennese had, it is true, heard him as a wonderful child, but the wonderful man still remained a stranger to them. Vienna, the cradle, if not of Joachim himself, at least of his reputation, as well as the place of his education, had some reason to complain of the manner in which she had been invariably overlooked by the artist in the course of his long travels. Young as he is, Joachim has been considered, for nearly the last ten years, the first of living violinists, and the fact of Vieuxtemps having been, now and then compared to him, proves that those who used such a standard were aware that they had to deal with greatness of no ordinary kind. It was no easy task for an artist to satisfy such high and long-cherished expectations of a public as experienced as ours. And yet Joachim has accomplished it in the most brilliant manner.

He began with Beethoven's concerto in D major. After the very first movement, it must have been evident to all that they had before them not only a most astonishing virtuoso, but a man of great importance and originality. With all his bravura, Joachim is so totally merged in the musical ideal, that he might be described as a perfect musician, who had passed through and gone beyond the most brilliant "virtuosity." His playing is grand, noble, and free. There is not the slightest tinge of "virtuosity" about it; whatever, in the solos could remind us of vanity or self-esteem is passed over, without our perceiving the faintest trace of it. This nobleness of artistic conviction is so prominent in Joachim, that it prevents our thinking until afterwards of the appreciation due to his magnificent technical skill.

What fullness and power in the tone which Joachim's grand and certain bowing draws from the instrument! It struck us, on the first occasion of our hearing Joachim, that, even in the most emphatic treatment of the lower violin passages, there was none of that peculiarly material scraping and shuffling on the string which we have at times heard in the playing of the most celebrated violinists. Joachim's shake is incomparable for purity and equality while his polyphonic playing is, at one and the same time, so well combined, and yet so sharply distinct, that the listener frequently fancies he hears two performers. In the course of his concerts Joachim will enable us to form a still nearer acquaintance with his technical skill. After once hearing him, it strikes us that it would not be quite safe to pronounce even a general opinion on his merits, since he will probably exhibit his art to us under other aspects. After his first concert, we certainly felt inclined to believe that the expression of what is great, noble, and pathetic was the task best adapted to his nature. He must show us, in other compositions, whether he is as great a master of light grace, easy wit, and fresh humor. His rendering of Beethoven's concerto—especially his execution of the adagio, which he gave with deep feeling, but with such a degree of freedom that he almost appeared to be extemporising—afforded proofs of the most decided independence of conception. The concerto was more brilliant and more animated under Vieuxtemps' bow. Joachim exhibited greater depth of feeling, and by truly ethical power, surpassed the effect which Vieuxtemps' playing produced by his gushing temperament.

The second piece was an adagio by Spohr, the uniformity of which lost everything like ponderousness in the vigorous and, at the same time, varied manner in which Joachim gave it; but it was in Tartini's Teufels-Sonate that he struck us as most astonishing. We feel sure that violinists will agree with us when we say that this specimen of colossal and, at the same, classically refined, technical skill, was something never previously equalled. The most difficult bravura passages in this piece—passages which the performer is generally contented to get over with unpretending mediocrity—Joachim not merely produced with ease and certainty, but absolutely in countless instances, impressed an accent pregnant with meaning on this noisy, seething, confused mass of sounds; he "gets up lights" which lent the whole thing a new and expressive character. To sum up, we remember scarcely a second virtuoso whose entire performance completely in one and the same mould, and consequently so pure and harmonious in its effect.—Musical World.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 2.—Alas! for the consequences of being in a hurry, as shown in my forgetting to enclose Mr. Satter's programme in my last. I send it to you now, hoping that you will not consider it as coming too late to be of any value.

1. Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor,"... Otto Nicolai
2. a "Drusenthal," Fantasie-stück,..... R. Goldbeck
b Sentiment Poétique..... J. N. Pattison
c "Columbia," Caprice Américain... L. M. Gottschalk
3. Sonata, D minor, Op. 31..... Beethoven a Allo molto. b Adagio. c Finale.
4. (By request), Grand Fantasie sur "La Juive,"... Satter

On Tuesday Mason and Thomas gave their fifth Soirée. Mendelssohn's posthumous quintette, in B flat, opened the programme. The first movement was a little marred by the instruments not being quite in tune; the effect, probably, of the very warm, damp atmosphere. Indeed, neither this movement nor the Finale were as clear and melodious as most of Mendelssohn's compositions and not by any means as pleasing as the Andante scherzando and Adagio, which were well worthy of their composer. This piece was followed by Beethoven's moonlight Sonata, played by Mr. Mason, and a Sonata for Piano and Violin by Raff, in which the same gentleman was joined by Mr. Thomas. This latter was interesting as a novelty, and showed a great deal of vigor and talent, but it had the fault of extreme length, and thus became wearisome. The whole concert would have been more enjoyable if it had been left out altogether. In that case, however, the audience would have missed the very fine performance of Mr. Thomas. An exquisite quartette of Mozart, No. 6, in C, verified the adage of "All's well that ends well," thus sending home the audience with the remembrance of only the many enjoyable points of the concert, and forgetfulness of the few drawbacks which it presented. Another uncommonly fine concert was given on Thursday night, by the Arion Singing Society. The programme was excellent, as you may judge for yourself.

1. Symphonie No. 4 in D minor. R. Schumann
2. Song of the Spirits on the Face of the Waters. Schubert
Grand double Chorus with Orchestra.
3. Concerto for Violin. Mendelssohn Bartholdy
Joseph Noll.
4. Goethe March (First time). Fr. Liszt
5. Overture, "The Magic Flute," Mozart
6. The Forest. Haeser
Chorus without accompaniment.
7. Concerto for Violoncello. Golttermann
Henry Mollenhauer.
Cantilene and Finale. (First time.)
8. March and chorus from "Tannhäuser," R. Wagner by the "Arion" and the Ladies Chorus of the New York Singing Academy.

The orchestra, consisting of the best part of the Philharmonic, under the direction of Mr. Bergmann did fullest justice to the beautiful Symphony, and Mozart's ever fresh overture. So also to Liszt's Goothe-march, which was, however the least enjoyable number of the programme. The Arion sang very finely, and gave evidence of Mr. Anschütz' spirited and careful training. The last chorus in which they were assisted by about 20 ladies, gave universal satisfaction. Mendelssohn's Concerto was not interpreted as well as it might have been by Mr. Noll, whose performance lacks entirely the delicacy, refinement and soul which this composition requires. In any thing where vigor and breadth are needed, Mr. Noll leaves nothing to be wished for, he should confine himself to such works. The concerto played by Mr. Mollenhauer was admirably calculated to show off the beauties of the instrument of which this artist is a master; which made his performances exceedingly satisfactory. — t —

PARIS, MARCH 15, 1861.—The new opera house will, it seems now decided, not be built on the site of the old one. The committee charged with making a report upon the plans submitted to them has pronounced the space allotted too small. For a capital as large as Paris, increasing daily in pleasure-seekers and art-lovers, a building larger than the one proposed would be required. The Grand Opera now accommodates 1,800 spectators, the new Academy of Music will, it is computed, not seat more than 2000. When it is considered that the 25 theatres of Paris and the 145 places of amusement are crowded nightly, the demands for a more suitable opera house than the temporary building now in use will be appreciated.

There are few places more uncomfortable than the interior of the theatres of this capital. Even in the best places it is difficult to take one's seat without causing many persons to rise. There is no room: the lobbies are narrow and close. This is no new matter of complaint, and in consequence the Parisian shuns the theatre in summer. When the present government is displaying such magnificence in the construction of public edifices it will certainly erect for art a monument worthy of the reign that is transfiguring Paris on each side.

The committee then have not accepted any of the plans proposed. These plans which were on exhibition for several days at the palace of industry presented some beautiful façades, though as a general thing there seemed to be a lack of originality. There was much of that classicism of the nineteenth century which stamps the architecture of the reign of Napoleon III.

Great care was bestowed by the artists upon the entrances. The vestibules and stairways were planned in such dimensions that there was cause to fear that the new Academy of Music was to be all exterior. The hall was forgotten in the study for monumental effect.

Prizes were awarded to the authors of five of the plans though none was deemed worthy of acceptance. The exigencies were indeed great upon the architect. The space too small. Carriage ways had to be provided, passages for pedestrians, a private entry for the Emperor all covered and made to tally with the monumental character of the edifice. The boxes were to be preceded each by a sitting-room, and room allotted for the imperial escort. These demands and others were from the first pronounced as incompatible with the space allowed. Several artists in fact sent in their designs disregarding the conditions. The result of the trial was the abandonment of the locality proposed.

And where will the new opera house then be situated? A place contiguous to the Place Vendome has been suggested. The garden of the Tuileries is seriously proposed. The Place de Rouen so far seems the most advisable, but it is not large enough. However, Paris knows how to demolish if needs be. Since 1852 streets enough have been cleared away not to be frightened at the demolition of some hundreds of houses.

The new Theatre Lyrique and opposite to it the new Cirque Impériale will, it is hoped, be completed in summer. The work progresses night and day. Those who cross the Atlantic in July may be in time to be present at the first representations.

The receipts for the month of February in the theatres of Paris are 1,751,362 francs. In the month of February last year the receipts were 1,765,398 francs, showing a decrease of above 14,000 francs.

Of new pieces produced with the last two weeks may be mentioned "Une femme emballée" comedy by M. Laurencin played at the Folies Dramatiques. "La servante à Nicholas," operetta by Mm. Nérée Désarbres and Nutter, music by M. Erlanger. "Je vous aime," by the son of Victor Hugo, M. Charles Hugo, at the Vaudeville. At the Opera Comique, Le jardinier galant by M. Ferdinand Poise has taken the place of Madame Gregoire, which it resembles in plot. Light, easy music, quick, gay action. Neither of these operettas have superseded the Circassienne which still draws as at first. At the Odeon Le portrait d'une jolie femme, by M. Rochfort is a weak comedy composed in a pretentious style.

The Comédie Française has produced nothing new since Les Effrontés which are still being played, though with occasional rays of light along the rows that were so crowded on its first appearance.

At the Theatre Lyrique, the representations of Le Val d'Andorre are drawing to a close. A new piece La Statue, opera in three acts is announced.

The Massacres de Syrie, at the Theatre du Cirque Impériale still attracts crowds among which the military are conspicuous who come to see the manoeuvres of the camels. A red placard is affixed to the bill posted at the door, informing the public that the camels will make their first entry at eight o'clock precisely, and besides, that "other camels from Africa appear in the grand march at ten." They are pealed, shabby looking creatures those "African camels," however, the spectacle is in its way truly "exciting," that's the word. But the massacres must give way next week to a new play by M. Alexander Dumas, "Le prisonnier de la Bastille, Fin des mousquetaires." Are we then to see the last of these Guardsmen? M. Maquet unceremoniously interposes before the production of this last play of Dumas and demands "his share" in the honors and profits. The prolific novelist is not eager to accept the claims of his ancient collaborators, but Maquet has redressed himself by appeal to the tribunals more than once, and we shall probably see on the hills, in spite of the author of Monte Christo, "par Mm. Dumas et Maquet."

Mlle Dejazet whom an indisposition had prevented from appearing for some time, has resumed her roles at her theatre of the Boulevard. Mme. Ristori has returned from Russia and is now in Paris preparing herself to appear in "The Madonna of Art" of M. Ernest Legouvé. She is to play at the Odeon and in French.

Ravel of the Palais Royal is engaged for St. Petersburg at the rate of 70,000 francs per season.

Wagner's Tannhäuser has at last been produced—Wednesday was the first representation. The Emperor was present. It was at his special wish that this German "music of the future," is heard now for the first time in Paris. The first production of Tannhäuser is an event even here. Mad. Tedesco personated Venus, and Herr Niemann seems to have satisfied the most exacting.

I must not remain silent concerning the scope of work that has called forth whole volumes of criticism in musical Germany. A magazine has been lately started which openly declares Tannhäuser to be the starting point of modern art. The enemies of the new style are bitter in the epithets they apply to it. I have heard a worthy professor in Munich, Riehl lose all patience when having occasion to mention that "new style which is enough to send dogs howling away." And Riehl is a talented critic, and man of exquisite taste; his "musical letters" recommend themselves by the depth of their views and the application the author finds to the sister arts with which music is so intimate linked. The admirers of Wagner on the other hand, are no less celebrated. At any rate it has become a fashion to sneer at the "music of the future." I cannot be one of the sneerers, I have seen of late too many horrid puns and caricatures in the weeklies of Paris.

There was opposition at the first representation of Tannhäuser on last Wednesday. There was some hissing, still [the applause drowned these demonstrations. The work has to battle against the ridicule of the press. A dangerous opponent in France. It is too soon to be able to know the sentence of these Sunday critics. In my next I shall recount the failure or success of the work of Richard Wagner.

F. B.

CHICAGO, MARCH 16, 1861.—The fifth Concert of this Society on Monday, March 11, was, as usual, well attended, for the mere announcement of a Philharmonic Concert is sufficient to fill Bryan Hall. The Society, with their efficient conductor, HANS BALATKA, is doing a good work in the cultivation of a high order of musical taste in our city.

1. Overture, "Egmont" Beethoven.
2. Scene for Baritone, "Page Eueyer et Capitaine."
Mr. DePassio. Membree.
3. Solo for Violoncello. "Souvenir de Spa," Servais.
Mr. Melms.
4. Aria, from fourth act of "Martha," Flotow.
Miss Smith.
5. { a Notturmo, } "Midsummer Night's Dream"
{ b Scherzo } Mendelssohn.
6. Overture, "Girondists," Litloff.
7. Trio, Finale, "Ernani," Verdi.
Miss Dewey, Mr. Smith, Mr. DePassio.
8. Fantasia on a National Theme, for Orchestra. Balatka.

Madame FABRI, we regret to say, has left us, and is now opera-ting with great success, in Detroit and Cincinnati. The best proofs of her popularity and of the great triumphs which she achieved during her stay here, are the ten concerts, in which she appeared before our best and most select audiences, and in all of which she met with the most cordial reception and with an unprecedented success, such as no artistes, who have appeared before her, can boast of. When shall we hear her like again?

For the next Philharmonic Concert Mozart's Symphony, No. 3, in E flat, is announced.

NORTH WEYMOUTH, MASS., MARCH 12 — Presuming your readers may be interested in musical matters at Weymouth, I thought I would send you an account of the "Union Choral Society." It was formed last fall, and has about seventy-five male members. The officers are:

President: H. C. Webb.

Vice President: F. B. Bates.

Clerk and Treasurer: Oliver Lord.

Directors: E. Hunt, L. Curtis, J. W. Bartlett, L. Stetson, C. L. Pratt.

Conductor: H. C. Webb, of Boston.

They brought out the "Messiah" and performed it very creditably at Weymouth Town Hall twice, and at Quiney, Hingham, and Braintree Town Halls once each, with an orchestra of 18 pieces and chorus of about 100 voices. The orchestra, with one exception (Hohnstock, of Boston) reside in Weymouth or its vicinity. It was led by Mr. N. U. Torrey, of the Howard Athenæum orchestra, one of our best native born violinists and a Weymouth boy.

The concerts, although costing the Society about $50 cash resulted in a loss of but $2.23. This we think doing well for Classical Concerts.

At a Town meeting held last Monday it was voted the Society have the free use of the Town Hall for rehearsals and concerts.

The performances this winter are an honor to the place, and, with the more than ordinary vocal and instrumental talent there is in Weymouth and vicinity, its excellent Conductor, and the encouragement given it by the town, it is hoped and believed that it will be a permanent institution.

The Society is now rehearsing the "Creation," although it will probably not bring it out this Spring but will give one or two miscellaneous concerts.

WARREN.

ST. LOUIS, MARCH, 1861. — Our Philharmonic Society had afforded to the inhabitants of this city, this winter, the first opportunity they ever had of hearing, regularly, classical music. I have been closely watching the effect. Previously, you never heard the subject mentioned save among a few. Now, the whole city has become aroused. Some, because it is fashionable, and they spend all their time at the concerts whispering, and comparing clothes; while the most, I am glad to see, are actuated by an earnest endeavor to learn. This Society has done the cause of music more good than any thing else that has ever been done west of the Alleghanies, as they have aroused the people to a consideration of classical music.

One word here, as to an occurrence that happened; some of the papers criticized the last concert a little, and gave much offence. The editors were informed that they had no right to criticize because tickets were free; they did not deny the truth of the criticism. This is wrong. If 2500 give their time they have a right to criticize. Besides the tickets are not free, as each member paid fifty dollars for seventy tickets. The Society must learn to stand criticism, good or bad, and endure remarks, even ill-natured ones. We are glad to learn, however, that the objections to being criticised were raised by some of the very young members, part of whom were the ones criticized, and that their course was heartily condemned by all the rest. We did intend to make long complaints about those who go to the concerts as they go to a fair, whispering all the time, but we came across this extract and hope you have room for it, or a part at least. I wish the Society would let me make a speech to the audience.

"One who keeps his eyes and ears open," makes in The Ledger the following true remarks on that most intolerable class of people, those who whisper at concerts:

"After attending the Philharmonic Concerts of New York for ten years, we make up our minds that there could scarcely be found as many polite people in New York as there were righteous people in Sodom. The music seemed to be designed only as a cover behind which young and frivolous people could whisper. When the instruments rose up into great volumes of sound, of course whispering was drowned, but when the flow of sound subsided, and the more exquisite passages were murmuring gently, we have often lost the whole effect by the sibilant whispers all around. Go where we would, change from parquette to gallery, from one side to the other, everybody was busy in disturbing all who came for music. In the pettishness of disappointment we sometimes have been disposed to place these ill-mannered whisperers in the Apostle's catalogue of offenders, it is certain that they stand high in the court of ill-bred people. A person may be intelligent, well dressed, and amiable, his connections may be high, his parents wealthy, and he may proudly claim to belong to the first society; but a person who whispers at opera or concert, is to be pronounced ill-mannered—and that without appeal or benefit of clergy! Nor is that all. Parents cannot have done their duty whose children do not know any better how to behave on public occasions. And when people who are cheated out of all the pleasure for which they have come to a musical festival, are smarting with this annoyance, they inwardly blame the mother rather than the daughter, and pity children that have been suffered to go out into society with so little knowledge of what is proper. A person who is truly polite at a concert or opera will be polite anywhere."

The material of the Society proves to be excellent, first class, and their energy is unequalled. Besides they have another important element of prosperity, plenty of money. So we promise ourselves great things.

The sixth Concert was Monday evening, March 25th, and by far the best yet, both in number, performers and finish of execution. The St. Louis Opera House, and the theatre are closed and Mr. Vogel with his orchestra joined the Society. The audience, to the number of twenty-five hundred were densely packed in the hall an hour before the time, although it was raining very hard.

PART I.

1. Overture, "Magic Flute".....W. A. Mozart
2. Chorus: "How lovely are the messengers," from Oratorio "St. Paul".....Mendelssohn
3. Scene and Aria; "Wie nahe mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz".....C. M. von Weber
4. Allegro and Finale, "5th Symphony".....Beethoven
5. Flute solo, "Air Suisse".....Boehm

PART II.

6. Overture, "Midsummer Night Dream" (by particular request).....Mendelssohn
7. Chorus: "Oh! great is the depth of the riches," from Oratorio "St. Paul".....Mendelssohn
8. Grand Aria, "Le Pardon de Plermel".....Meyerbeer
9. Male chorus, "Hunting Song".....Mendelssohn
10. Song: "Thou art so near, and yet so far".....Reichardt
11. Finale from "La Traviata".....Verdi

The solo from Der Freischütz, sung by Miss Tournay was the best that we have heard so far in these concerts; we confess to have entertained a prejudice against her heretofore, but last night wholly removed it. The orchestral accompaniment was just what it should be, and it all harmonized so well, that the girl behind me, who had a fine ear for music, exclaimed, "Why, how much her voice sounds like the violins, I can't tell when she is singing, and when she aint." "However," as the man said about St. Paul, "That's where you and I differ."

Mr. Carr's Flute Solo was received with genuine delight. We can say no more of this gentleman than we have. The aforesaid young lady remarked to her bean, "He plays pretty well for an amateur." Allow us to assure the young lady, with our compliments, that Mr. Carr does play pretty well for an amateur, and if there is a professional in the United States that can excel him, (I except one) I would like to hear him. Right in here the young lady behind me interposed another remark which I leave for your readers to answer, "Is it the thing for the singers in a concert to wear black gloves" as many did.

The grand Aria Mr. Sabatski sung very well, and the "song" by a pupil of his showed great training. The Overtures, Choruses and Finale could hardly have been better. Too much credit can hardly be given to so young a society, for their rendering of such music. B.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Resignation. Miss Lindsay. 30

This song has quickly found its way into almost every musical family in England. It is of a truly devotional character, the words breathing a true Christian spirit, the music lofty and elevating.

Thoughts of thee. Julius E. Muller. 25

This composer of many fine and useful Piano pieces has tried his hand very successfully in a song, which has all the graces of melody and a rich harmonic fundament.

The sunny South. L. B. Barnes. 25

A melodious, pretty ballad, bright as the genial atmosphere and clear sky of the Southern zones.

Misereere. Sextet. "Trovatore." 25

Got up in this cheap form for Singing-clubs and Societies. It is printed precisely as sung in the Opera without change of key or any attempt at simplification. This is only one number of a long list of "Operatic Selections" for Choral Societies which are now being published at low prices. Among those out already the "Market Chorus" from "Martha," and the splendid Finale of the fourth act of "Ernani" deserve mentioning.

Instrumental Music.

Key City March. Helen M. Spaulding. 25

Physicians' Quick March. C. A. Stewart. 25

Two good military marches, easy to play.

Un Ballo in Maschera. Beauties arranged in 2 books, by Adolph Baumbach, each 50

Since this new Opera of Verdi's has gained such a decided hold upon our music lovers here that the demand for a piano arrangement of its sparkling melodies has become immense, this series written in the style of the well-known Trovatore selections by the same author will be hailed with gratification. The gems are all there: the splendid Quartet, the sweet Tenor Romanza, the dashing Barcarolle, the Laughing Chorus, the charming Songs of the Page, the galop-like Chorus of the ball-scene. None of the favorites will be missed.

Books.

THE AMERICAN MUSICAL CLASS BOOK. Designed for Female Colleges, Institutes, Seminaries, and Normal and High Schools. Containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises and Solfeggios, and a Valuable Collection of Duets, Trios, and Concerted Pieces. By T. Bissell. 50

Among the numerous works of the kind this cannot fail of a prominence, since its peculiar features are such as will commend it at once to the patronage of those for whom it is chiefly intended. Its rudimentary lessons proceed with a regularity of precision that cannot fail to fix permanently on the mind of the pupil the essentials of success in future studies—the exercises are in a form to attract the attention, and the selection of music one of the best if not the superior of all similar collections. Principals of Educational institutions, music teachers, and others interested in books of this class will find it advantageous to examine this volume.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 471.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 2.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music

Sketches of French Musical History.

XII.

THE CHANSON AND VAUDEVILLE.

1050—1860.

According to Berquin, in the Petite Encyclopedie poetique, the Romance de Roland is the earliest piece of verse known in the French language. This song of war, which of yore animated the soldiers of Charlemagne when marching to combat, gave way very soon to the romance of love which flourished among the Provençal Troubadours. From Provence, the "gay science" spread into Languedoc, then into Picardy and shortly after even into Normandy. About 1050 the joyous science was known throughout France. As poets of the middle ages we have already cited the names, Abelard, Helinand, and Thibaut Count of Champagne. The courts of love became numerous in the 12th and 13th centuries, and the Roman de la Rose appeared Ou tout l'art d'amour est enclose.

This fine old poem began by Guillaume de Lorris, who died in 1262, was finished by Jean de Meung, surnamed Clopinel.

In 1324 the celebrated Clemence Isauze founded at Toulouse the Academy of the "Jeux floraux" which is still in existence.* Under Charles V. (of France) a new impulse was given to literature; the royal Library was founded—containing then only 900 volumes. Soon after, Alain Chartier, (born 1386, died 1458) gained the title Father of French eloquence. To him the old story refers, of a poet, who one day sleeping in a gallery of the Palace, was kissed by Margaret of Scotland, wife of the Dauphin (afterwards Louis XI). The maids of honor expressing their surprise at such honor being conferred upon the poet, Margaret replied, "I do not kiss the man but the lips, which flow with such sweet and beautiful thoughts."

Martin Franc, author of the Champion des Dames and Francois Villon, celebrated for his ballets and rondos, flourished in the time of Charles VIII. Georges Châtelain, educated at the court of the Dukes of Bourgogne, Guillaume Coquillard an official at Reims, René d'Anjou, Count of Provence, and Clement Marot a pupil of Villon, successively attracted the public attention. Jean le Maire born in 1473, Octavien and Melin de Saint-Gelais, came upon the scene a little before the birth of Francis I., which took place at Cognac, Sept. 12, 1494. Of this gallant and cultivated king's epoch the poetical works now most esteemed are those of Bonaventure Desperiers, Marguerite de Valois, Clement Marot and Ronsard. The latter, born in the Vendome in 1525, received, as a present from the magistracy of Toulouse, a Minerva wrought in massive silver. A celebrated club in the time of Charles IX., called the Pléiade, consisted of Ronsard, Jodelle, du Bellay, Baif, Thyard, Belleau and Dorat. It was to Ronsard that the verses of Charles IX. were addressed:—

Tous deux je les également nous portons des couronnes,
Mais, roi, je les reçois; poëte, tu les donnes.

At length Malherbe comes and then the poets of the great century: Corneille, Moliere, La Fontaine, Racine, Boileau; in the 18th century, Voltaire, by his fecundity, wit and facility ruled the French literary world. The chanson [song, ditty] which had reached great perfection in the 17th century in the rhymes of Master Adam, a carpenter at Nevers, who died in 1662, came into new life in the last century in the merry numbers of Collé. Favart, Gallet, Lattaignant, Florian, Panard, Piron, Vadé and Marmontel. Monerif and Berquin wrote delicious romances, and this form of poetry—so often wrecked on the rock of insipidity—has been continued to our own day by the labors of Romagnesi, Berat, Masini, Panseiron, Loisa Puget, Paul Henrion, Etienne Arnaud, &c.

But the chanson got the better of the romance. By turns gallant, erotic, bacchinal, satyric and moral, it gained new life at the dinners du caveau [of the wine cellar] founded in 1773 by Piron, Crebillon the younger and Collé. This Society which at first met at Gallet's, was increased by the addition of Crebillon the Elder, Sallé, Fuzelier, Saurin, Duclous, La Bruere, Bernard, Monerif, Boucher, Helvetius and Rameau; it afterwards transferred its Penates to the rue de Buci, not far from the café Procope, near the carrefour.

This epicurian association lasted ten years. In 1762, it was revived by Piron, Crebillon the younger and Bernard, and met at the cabaret de Landelle. The most distinguished members during the second period of its existence were Panard, Laujon, Lemiere, Favart, Colardeau, Vadé, Dorneval, Salieri, Goldoni, Freron, Delille the writer of fables, Philidor, Albanèse and Vernet. Crebillon suppressed the penalty of a glass of water, to which authors of epigrams either unjust or silly had previously been sentenced. A rolling fire of joke and jest filled up the sitting, and all was wit, gaiety and humor. This club continued but five years. Then come the chanson writers of the transition period, Garnier, Laborde, Lattaignant, Boufflers and Parny.

Sept. 22, 1796 the first of the Vaudeville dinners took place. Of the twenty-two members of this jolly company the more distinguished were Laujon, Pils, Barré, Radet, the three Segurs, Armand Gouffé, Dupaty, Dieulafoi. The breakfasts of the "Garçons de bonne humeur"—jolly companions—were eaten by a club of ten persons, Etienne, Desaugiers, Sewrin, Perissins, etc.

Dec. 20, 1805, the dinners of the caveau moderne were established, which given on the 20th of each month at the Rocher de Cancale. Pils, Laujon, Cadet-Gassicourt, Gouffé, Desaugiers, Jony, Ducrai-Duminil were the heroes of this monthly meeting. Beranger was admitted member in 1813, and the year following succeeded Gouffé as perpetual secretary. But the events of 1815 put an end to the Caveau moderne. A second series of meetings began in 1825 at Lemardelay's under the presidency of the witty Desaugiers.

In 1835, a new Caveau club was formed at the instance of Albert de Montémont. The Ancelots and Scribes have not despaired to join these witty and interesting meetings, where excellent wine fires the spirit and warms the feeling of friendship. But now, the goodhearted Desaugiers and the immortal Beranger have departed leaving their mantle to Gustave Nadaud, incontestably the most remarkable of our present writer of chansons. At the same time poet, musician, singer and accompanist, he by his fourfold talents is a worthy heir of his many and illustrious predecessors.

The chanson, that eminently national product of the French mind, was parent of the Vaudeville. The invention of this form, is generally attributed to Oliver Basselin, a fuller at Vire in Normandy, who lived about 1450. The Chansons of this author used to be sung at the foot of a hill called les Vaux, which rose from the shore of river Vire. The words Vaux de Vire became by corruption Vaudeville. The chansons of Basselin were revised in the next century by Jean le Houx.

The Vaudeville is essentially of a satyric character; hence the saying, that Ancient France was a monarchy moderated by chansons. The court, the members of the Parliament and high personages were always exposed to the rhymes. They all declared war against the chansons and their authors. Then the comedies made upon the events of the day or upon scandalous anecdotes took the name of Vaudeville. At a later date the same term was applied to the couplets sung in turn by the actors at the close of a play.

But the Vaudeville, properly so called in our day, originated in the Italian comedy and at the fairs of St. Germain and St. Laurent. And so followed chronologically the theatres of the Vaudeville, the Varietés, the Gymnase, the Palais-Royal, &c.

In 1737, Panard brought out at the Fair of St. Germain a piece entitled Le Vaudeville. Momus opened the play with his daughter dressed in a costume representing the Fair. She tells her father that she is sad because she loves the Vaudeville, which is a kind of literature which the comic opera will not recognize. Momus consols his daughter and obtains the consent of Bacchus and Joy, father and mother of the Vaudeville. Upon which she, in her character of the Fair of St. Germain, puts on an advocates robe and pleads the cause of the Vaudeville before Apollo; she proves that it has been well received every where else, that it is droll, playful satyric, amusing, witty, in short that it will please as well in the city as in the village. Fully convinced,

* This academy offers a prize for the discussion of the question, "Why in our times does the high comedy disappear from the stage, and give place to hasty improvised dramas in which morality is no less outraged than Art?"

Apollo issues a decree by which the vaudeville is put in possession of all the rights of Parnassus.

Sedaine, who detested this kind of play, afterwards introduced into one of his comic operas, a song expressing his detestation of the Amours d'été and the Vendangeurs, vaudevilles by Piis and Barré, which were then attracting crowds to the Italian comedy. This song* led Piis and Barré to build the Vaudeville theatre. But we must go back. In the "Theatre Italien" of Gherardi (Paris, 1717), there are few songs; in the "Nouveau Theatre Italien" (Paris, 1773), there is a considerable number of very pretty vaudevilles.

About 1739 Favart devised the 'pastoral' or village vaudeville. Annette et Lubin had a fine success. The verses were not without affectation, but were written with elegance.

In 1780 Piis and Barré gave the vaudeville new and vigorous life. Down to that period prose and verse had been mingled, Piis made vaudevilles entirely in verse. His essays were well received and at the comedie Italienne were played successively Les Amours été, Les Vendangeurs, and La Veillée villageoise. But Sedaine, who was giving melodramas, was disgusted with the success of the vaudevilles, and his strenuous opposition led by degrees to the disappearance of the vaudeville from the posters of the comedie Italienne. The first work of this form by Panard, Piron, Favart, Vadé, Lesage, d'Orneval, Fuselier, Anseaume, &c., were played at the fair of St. Laurent. The comic opera having been joined with the Italian theatre, the vaudeville was subordinated there to Italian pieces, to pieces with ariettes, to comedies and dramas, and was thus at length driven from that stage. The verses of Sedaine, spoken of above, led to the establishment of the theatre in the rue de Chartres. Piis having sought and been refused a moderate salary at the Italian comedy conceived the idea in 1790 of removing to another theatre. There was at the time in the rue de Chartres a ball-room called the Winter Vaudeville. Here the architect Lenoir built the Theatre Vaudeville, which was opened Jan. 12, 1792 with a piece by Piis in 3 acts entitled Les Deux Pantheons. Barré, Monnier and Chambon became associated with Piis and Rosières in carrying on the undertaking. Radet, Desfontaines, the two Segurs and others, soon began to write for it. During the revolutionary period Radet and Desfontaines were imprisoned six months for a bold sentence in their Chaste Susanne; they had put into the mouth of the judge the following words addressed to the two elders; "you are accusers, and cannot therefore be judges." The entire audience saw in this an allusion to the case of Maria Antoinette, whose trial was then in preparation. The two authors finally gained their liberty by some verses of a different tenor. It was long the custom at the vaudeville upon occasions of a new piece to sing a sort of a prologue, which was often written to celebrate this or that remarkable circumstance, and the two imprisoned poets took such an occasion to gain their freedom.

Fanchon la vielleuse, a piece by Bouilly and

* Bonhomme Vaudeville
Laissez-nous donc tranquilles,
Amusez-nous par vos propos
Et par vos jolis madrigaux;
Mais ve quittez pas vos hameaux
Bonhomme Vaudeville.

Joseph Pain had a prodigious success. Madame Belmont created the beautiful part of Fanchon by her talented performance. Dieulafoi, Desaugiers, Moreau, Francis, Rougemont, Dumersan, Theaulon, Dartois, Dupaty, Merle, de Jouy, Dupin, &c., brought out at this theatre parodies and satyric pieces of exceeding piquancy. Virginie Dejazel and Jenny Vertpré distinguished themselves among the first comic actresses of their time.

In 1816 Desaugiers became director of the Vaudeville. Then Scribe came upon the scene, and with him a new generation of authors; Melesville. Delestre-Poirson, Mazerès, Carmouche, de Courcy, Saintine, Bayard, Dupenty, de Vilneuve, Vanderbursch, Delurieu, Sauvage and others. In 1819 Delestre-Poirson obtained the Gymnase and drew Scribe thither, who wrote at that time his charming Repertoire du Theatre de Madame. De Guerchy and Bernard-Leon succeeded Desaugiers, and they were followed by Etienne Arago in 1829. Then followed the dramatic successes of M. and Madame Ancelot, and in 1838 the Vaudeville Theatre in the rue de Chartres was destroyed by fire. At present the Vaudeville is established in the theatre on the place de la Bourse formerly occupied by comic opera.

[Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music by THOMAS RYAN.]

A Cure Effected by Music.

The imagination has often played an important part in medical cures, and our most celebrated physicians do not hesitate to make use of some ingenious ruse to help and cure invalids. It would be easy to multiply the examples of happy effects obtained with pills of micapanis, acqua saccharifera and the use of twenty other substances, insignificant in themselves and without any virtue in pharmacy. The greater part of the so-called miracles effected by homœopathy and the infinitesimal doses employed by it, have no other cause than the effect produced on the minds of invalids by the attraction of the marvelous and by strong faith.

Be that as it may, Dr. Gorré Gassicourt corresponding member of the Academy of Medicine, has communicated to that learned body, a curious and somewhat dramatic case in which the art of Thalberg and Batta has replaced the purging and bleeding so much laughed at by Moliere, who we know consulted his physician, following none of his directions and yet became perfectly well. It is not enough known that Moliere was as hypochondriac as he was jealous and in railing so much at the "malade imaginaire" and "les Maris ridicules" he reproduced and mocked his own weakness.

Let us return to Dr. Gassicourt, whose little work is entitled, "Some Generalities on the Subject of Medicine of the Mind."

After having developed some very ingenious and true ideas on moral effects as a means of cure, Mr. Gassicourt recounts the following:—

"In June 1837, I was called into an English family of which I was the medical adviser, to see a young lady of sixteen or seventeen, who had been recently brought from England, and whose health caused her family the most serious fears. Having tried every expedient, the doctors advised her removal to the continent, hoping for some benefit from the change of air. I found my young patient in bed; she had not quitted it for two months. Her complexion was as white as ivory, blue eyes deeply sunken and without any life, hollow cheeks, lips without color, voice completely gone, everything betokened profound decay. To my questions she only replied by monosyllables, and when I wished to feel her pulse, she could hardly raise her arm to allow me so to do. A constant fever sapped her drop by drop and a few spoonfuls of broth was all that for several weeks her stomach consented to admit.

The peculiar character of her physiognomy, indicated to me some moral malady, some heart trouble. I was not mistaken. A brother, tenderly beloved by the young girl, had three months before, lost his life while sea-bathing; she received the distressing news without a sigh or even shedding a tear. Since that terrible day, she had fallen into this mournful, deaf and dumb state, that Montaigne speaks of, when overwhelmed by accidents beyond our power of bearing up under.

What had been done thus far for her? Medicine of course had not the slightest success, the most affectionate care, the language of heart, even the recitation made by my advice, of the unhappy event that had so terribly stricken that young soul, affected her not at all, and it seemed impossible to renew the delicate thread so nigh breaking, of that existence but lately so rich in the future and so full of hope. To escape from that concentration of the grief that was slowly but surely undermining the springs of life, required so e shock, a movement of expansion, something to break up the centralisation of thought; anything that loosens grief and will cause tears to flow, following the expression so true of Montaigne, gives release to the soul, separates it more at large and puts it at ease.

I wished to cure my young patient. The wish, in the practice of medicine often gives the power. The idea came into my mind to inquire if she was anything of a musician, they told she loved music passionately. For that reason, replied I, she must love the best music. Mozart and Beethoven completely possess her! Good, cried I, Beethoven and Mozart will save her! They thought I was dreaming, but allowed me full play. That same evening, at the desire of the patient, a piano was installed in the adjoining room, and the next day during my visit, while seated at her bed side, the marcia funebre by Beethoven, played with a sentiment, worthy of the work, revealed itself all at once to our ears.

While charmed myself by that admirable piece, written by the master under heavenly inspiration, I followed and studied with an anxiety easy to comprehend, on the visage of my fair patient, the expression of the sensations that were working within her. Inert at first, I soon saw attention depicted on her physiognomy; then, like a flower exposed to the rays of the sun brightening on its stem, her head, lowered the instant before, was now raised. She listened! Suddenly her eyes sparkled with an unusual light, her cheeks were white and red by turns, her respiration became freer and more frequent tears in abundance (the first shed since the deplorable catastrophe) fell mingled with sobs; at last, convulsively agitated a cry escaped, "Let her come!" and immediately her arms opened to give a sisterly embrace to the dear friend who had just caused her to taste the unexpected benefits of those delicious emotions. From that day, her life was saved, Mozart and Beethoven aiding, for music, you may well believe was not abandoned. I could follow with pleasure the gradual coming back of strength and vigor to her frame. Some weeks after, my young patient, her mind serene, happy to return again to that life which is so charming at sixteen, beautified with all the graces of her age, left France and returned to the mother country, leaving in my memory an impression the most profound, yet the sweetest perhaps, that a physician can enjoy in the exercises of his profession.

Behold the power of music; behold another example of the marvels performed by the medicine of the heart. S. HENRI BERTHOUD.

Rossini at Home.

When in Paris for a few days last week, I was fortunate enough to receive an invitation from Rossini to attend his Saturday evening reception, a musical levée, at which all artists and professors of distinction assemble weekly to pay their respects to the illustrious musician.

Rossini lives on the Boulevard des Italiens, at the corner of the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, in a magnificent suite of appartements, au seconde. It is here he holds his court surrounded by a galaxy of brilliant women, whose wit and conversation are more sparkling than the diamonds of any duchess in St. Germain, and a host of chevaliers, from whose button holes dangle the gaudy decorations of every potentate in Europe. The hour of reception is nine o'clock, the amusement of the evening, music; no tea or coffee, no ices are allowed; the entertainment is purely intellectual, practically musical. And the tea and coffee are not missed; the music and bon mots of the amiable host offered far more enjoyment than the most refreshing ice.

The principal salons are thrown open to the guests. As I entered the first room, and tried to make my way through the crowd which blocked up the entrance to the music hall, peering over the shoulders of the visitors, I saw Rossini seated at the pianoforte, accompanying the Sisters Marchisio in a duet he has composed for his two protégées. In a brown shooting jacket of the loosest fit imaginable, the sleeves almost covering the tips of the fingers, a very bad wig, nearly of the same color as the coat, the figure at the pianoforte might, at first sight, have been taken for that of an old country gentleman retired from public life, and fattening to any extent upon the rich produce of his goodly acres. But wait awhile. The duet has but just begun. Let the accompanist warm up. His indolence leaves him, he sits erect, and becomes excited. See how the loose sleeves flap about, look at the drops of perspiration on his forehead, observe the fire and brilliancy of his eye as he turns round to each of the singers, urging them to a greater effort, in some crescendo passages or cadenza.

Yes, there's genius in that figure at the pianoforte, now no longer resembling an old country gentleman, but easily to be identified as that of Rossini. The duet finished amid the most enthusiastic applause of the assembled guests, applause perhaps heartier and louder than is usual at an evening party. Bravo maestro! Bravo da vero! Everybody crowded round the host as he left the pianoforte to go to his own particular chair in the adjoining room. There was a pause in the music. The courtiers busied themselves with congratulating the two sisters, and through them saying a word of flattery to the composer, who every now and then convulsed the room with laughter by some witty remark, which would be carefully noted in the pocket-book of a soi-distant wit, to be the next day retailed as his own.

After a short interval, Badioli and Solieri sung the duet from "Il Barbiere," then Badioli volunteered the bass song in the "Stabat," after which a very clever amateur, whose name is, I think, Sampieri, joined Solieri in the Elisir duet, and nearly eclipsed the tenor by his remarkable skill in managing a very fine voice and effective declamation.

Seated next Rossini was an elderly lady, slim in figure, and somewhat wrinkled in feature. She wore what is I believe called a robe montante, and evidently was averse to crinoline. She was familiarly addressed by some as Marietta. "Who is that vivacious matron to whom everybody pays so much attention?" "That," said my friend, "is Madame Tagliani." "Not the Tagliani, the celebrated sylphide?" "Yes the same." I looked again, and fancied I could just trace a resemblance in the elderly lady in the black silk dress to that portrait of a danseuse, standing in an impossible position on one leg, which hangs in Mitchell's shop in Bond Street, covered with the dust of ages. It was a difficult task, the portrait having on a robe montante the very reverse of that which the lady wore who was before me.

Another celebrity of a time gone by was also present—Carata, the composer of La Prigione d'Edinburgo, Le Valet de Chambre, and a hundred other operas now forgotten, the delight of a former generation.

The old gentleman is far from being in the same excellent condition as his comrade Rossini, but he nevertheless appears to enjoy life, and to carry his age remarkably lightly. Rossini having listened attentively to the songs and duets mentioned, sent his cara sposa, one of the most active housewives I ever met with, to request the Marchisios to sing again. They complied, and he led them to the pianoforte, introducing them to different visitors as they went along in the most eulogistic terms. This time he did not accompany, but stood by and encouraged the young artists with many a "bravo" and smile of approbation. Eleven o'clock was drawing near, and at that hour the "Reception" always terminates.

The last performance of the evening was by M. Nadland, who sang some wonderfully lengthy French songs with a sweet voice and great expression.

Then every one prepared to go. Rossini had a kind good-night for all. In passing through the ante-room he showed me Dantan's two caricature statues of himself and Meyerbeer, in which he is represented sitting in a dish of macaroni, hugging a lyre and Meyerbeer as writing for dear life half a dozen operas at once, Rossini seemed to enjoy the joke, and to chuckle at his own idleness compared to the constant activity of Meyerbeer.

Mr. W. H. Fry.—In the N. Y. Albion we find the following kindly notice of Mr. W. H. Fry, the newly appointed Secretary of Legation at Turin.

We refer to Mr. W. H. Fry, the composer of innumerable works that have received encomium in these columns, notably of the opera of "Leonora," which was played not long since at the Academy of Music; of a very fine "Stabat Mater," which has not yet received any attention from music-givers; and of several symphonies played by Julien's Band here and in Europe, with invariably success. Mr. Fry, in addition to being a musician, was also a critic. We are humble enough to believe that he has never received his proper reward for what he has done in the cause of Art. But he was also a politician, and genius, even when perverted, is still a power in the land. For making sundry speeches, he has been chosen by his country as a representative of its dignity abroad. The only satisfaction the writer of these lines enjoys is that he is sent to a musical land. Mr. Fry's official residence will be in Turin—the capital of United Italy. The country loses a composer and critic of the first class, and gains a diplomat. Shall we be pardoned if we add that in our judgment the country gets decidedly the worst of the bargain! Do you not see that, whilst there are hordes of diplomats, there are but few masters of the "divine art," and—it is vanity to add—no flux and overflow of gentlemen who, by natural aptitude, education, and susceptibility, are capable of wielding a truthful and fearless pen in the cause of Art.

Critics are so often and so much occupied with mild complainings ament the grievances of others, that they seldom find time to think of their own;—never to speak of them. But behind the trenchant pen often fags a wearied mind. That aesthetic nonentity, created by the mandates of taste, who plods from day to day steadily through a world of mediocrities to the goal where comparative criticism is no longer human, has a heart for which no one gives him credit, filled with tender yearnings, asking for sympathy but winning contempt, insisting on justice but brewing hatred. Among the thousands who criticize criticism, how few are there who think of the critic. What indeed, asks the artist, is a critic but a miserable maggot of the brain who crawls through ideas to spoil them; who takes a fancy and batters it with a fact; who seizes an illusion and flattens it out with a reality. To each of that army of musicians, actors, and painters, who has not been praised more than ninety-nine times out of a hundred, the critic is worse than a superfluity. It is only to the art public that he is a necessity; a portion of the daily meal, a fragment of the early breakfast. He comes punctually like the milk in the morning, and perhaps is not much more invigorating. But, Messieurs the public, that punctuality is the test of his faithfulness, and is purchased with health, even life itself. To secure it, he toils long into the night until his eyes grow dim and the buzz of the yellow flickering gas sounds like the drone of the Fates in his ear. His reward is either absolute oblivion, or the public contumely of those it has been his misfortune to assail. He is never out of his coat of type; never without an enemy to point out how ridiculous it is. Could we strip it off, we should find beneath a kindly human creature with every generous impulse to lead a helping hand to the weak and struggling—and doing it more often than people believe, too; we should find sometimes a sentinel who has grown faint with long watching, we should find in short a gentleman like Mr. Fry, broken in health but strong in purpose, hopeful of the future, but weary, very weary of the present.

To a brother journalist and critic, who has fought nobly in the cause, and retires from the field disabled but covered with honors; to a gentleman of wide attainments and wide susceptibilities, and to a composer of distinguished merit, the critic of this paper pays his homage, and expresses the hope that warmth of an Italian sky may quickly restore him to health. Italy is the mother of Art. It is well that the children of art should go there for comfort and strength in their hour of trial.

Church Music in New York.

The Madison Avenue Baptist Church, built for the society of Rev. Dr. Hague, was completed and dedicated in January last. It is a very handsome brick edifice, and contains a new and superior toned organ of 36 stops, built by Henry Erben, at a cost of $5000, the peculiar qualities of which were exhibited on Monday evening last, by Mr. Morgan of Grace Church, to a large and select audience. The regular organist of the church, Mr. John H. Thompson, is an amateur player, and pupil of Wm. A. King; he has been in Europe, studying music, for the past three years, and is yet quite a young man, but bids fair to become, in time, one of our first organists. The choir is made up as follows: soprano, Miss Trull; contralto, Miss Barclay; tenor, Mr. Miranda; bass, Mr. J. Conkey—the whole forming one of the best quartettes in the city. The style of the music is left to the option of the organist, who shows excellent taste in his selections.

In many respects, the choir at the Church of the Messiah (Unitarian), Rev. Dr. Samuel Osgood's, on Broadway, opposite Fourth street, is second to none other in the city, and the music of this church is justly celebrated. Mr. Henry C. Timm, the President of the New York Philharmonic Society, officiated as organist here for fifteen years, and has been succeeded by Mr. Edward Howe, Jr., the present incumbent, who has filled this position during the past five years. Mr. Howe is a gentleman of liberal education, has been a professor of music in New York for eighteen years, and has brought to bear in this department an amount of scientific and theoretic as well as practical knowledge, which has greatly enhanced the value of this portion of the church service. The choir is composed of the following talented vocalists: Miss Grenelle, soprano; Miss Rushby, contralto; Mr. Mills, tenor; Mr. Jewett, basso. They use the "Greatorex Collection of Music," the "Church and Home," recently put forth by George Leach, who was for many years connected with this choir, and other books of that class. The music is given in a finished and classical manner, and Mr. Howe's accompaniments are particularly appropriate and adapted.

The organ is an old one, built by the Messrs. Hook, of Boston, but was remodelled, and had important additions made to it, some ten years since, by Crabb, of Flatbush, L. I. It is enclosed in a fine mahogany case, has two ranks of keys, extending from G to F, 26 stops, and a full complement of pedals. The swell is unusually full and fine. When the instrument is used, a jet of gas is kept burning inside of the swell box, the object of which is to keep the swell organ in tune with the great; it is under the control of the organist, and, by the use of this simple arrangement, the pitch can be changed one half tone when it is affected by changes in the temperature. It is the only arrangement of the kind in the country, with the exception of a similar one in the immense organ at Dr. Beman's church, Troy. Both were made by Thomas Robjohn, who has charge of this organ.

The Unitarian Church at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twentieth Street, which has been named "All Souls," and is used by the society of Rev. H. W. Bellows, D.D., presents a very unique appearance externally, as well from the style of its architecture, as from the peculiar arrangement of the building materials in alternate layers of French Caen stone and Philadelphia pressed brick. Internally, it is one of the most elegant and comfortable churches we have. The experiment for increasing the power of the speaker's voice, by placing a paraboloid back of the pulpit, which was so successfully made in Trinity Church under the supervision of Prof. C. W. Hackley, has been repeated here. It is about eight feet in height, in the form of a shell, with a concave surface, painted with a dark ground, upon which is a cross in gilt, surrounded with a "halo" or "glory," and each Sabbath the light of two gas burners is cast upon it. This is, to some extent, carrying out the favorite theory of the pastor, Dr. Bellows, who advocated symbolism connected with worship, in his renowned sermon "The Suspense of Faith." Some radical changes are on the point of being made in the musical department of this church, and, in view of these contemplated changes, we shall not furnish the detail concerning it, with the minuteness which we have observed in speaking of other churches. The organ is a fine one of 34 stops, built by Ferris of this city, and, in architecture, corresponds with the style of the church, the Byzantine. It is played by Mr. Ruopfeldt, who succeeded Mr. Wm. Scharfenberg. Both are German by birth, and artists of some repute.

The music at the new Unitarian Chapel (Rev. Samuel Longfellow's) on Clinton Street, Brooklyn, deserves more than a passing notice. The well-known vocalist, Miss Mary E. Hawley, sustains the contralto part in the quartet choir, and much attention is bestowed upon the musical portion of the services. Every alternate Sabbath evening, a vesper service is held, which is almost entirely musical, and highly attractive. The organ, built by Stuart of New York, is small, but adapted to the size of the building, and is very efficiently played by Mr. Colby. The pastor (a brother of Henry W. Longfellow, the poet) is at present in Europe.

At Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's church in Brooklyn, the singing is congregational, led by a large choir under the direction of Mr. J. Zundel, a composer of considerable note, who was formerly organist of St. Ann's Church, St. Petersburg, and latterly of St. Georges, New York. The organ is small, and not such an one as this rich and influential society should possess. One may hear at Mr. Beecher's Church, the finest congregational singing we have in this country. The "Plymouth Collection" is used by choir and congregation; this contains the music as well as the words, and generally it is a well arranged collection. The house is always filled, the congregation a united one—the result of the attachment entertained toward the pastor by his people—and the effect of their 3000 voices heartily united in singing is sometimes thrilling.

In concluding our observations upon this subject, we would remark that with many minds, an erroneous impression exists that the music of some of the churches described in these letters, partakes of an operatic character. The most effectual method of rectifying this error would be for those who experience it to visit some of our churches and note the impressions made upon the mind by the music ordinarily selected.

The manifest improvement in sacred music of late years is due, in part, to the great advance made in the nature of the books published. The books of old and worn out tunes hitherto considered standard, are fast being supplanted by the more modern "Grace Church Collection" of Wm. A. King, "Greatorex Collection," by the former organist and director of music at Calvary Church, the "Mozart Collection," and others. Among a large class of our people, there exists a demand for music of a more classical character than was called for a generation since. The time has passed away when selections from the "Billings and Holden" collection would be acceptable to worshippers, and there is no doubt that the generation of Psalm-tune books which followed this collection, will eventually furnish material for another series of "old folks concerts."

The demand of the age is for something elevating and inspiring, which, at the same time, can meet the call of the intellect. Those who attend church service seek, as well from the music as from the preaching, to experience an elevating and holy influence; and while some can experience this from listening to the tunes with the harmony as ordinarily arranged, others require new and varying combinations. By the genius of such as Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn is better appreciated than the combinations of our modern psalmody composers. In the Grace Church collection of music some of the masterpieces of the great composers are embodied, and it is without exception the finest work of the kind ever published. The organ accompaniments are arranged separately, and are of themselves a study; in their complete harmonization, many of the resources of musical art have been employed, and they can be used with only a soprano or tenor voice to sustain the melody as well as in full chorus. This work, printed from engraved plates in the highest style of art, was originally published by Stanford & Delissier of this city, but the plates have been purchased by Oliver Ditson & Co., of Boston, who now publish it in the original form.

The Greatorex Collection (also published by Ditson & Co.) is a very superior work, containing much good music selected from the standard composers, it is more popular than the Grace Church Collection as the price at which it is published brings it more within the reach of the masses, and it has deservedly attained a wide circulation. These works, although written for use in the Protestant Episcopal Church, more particularly, are equally well adapted to churches of other denominations, and we hope to see them generally adopted, their tendency being to develop a pure and correct taste in this direction.

Music is the highest language of the soul. It is the highest inspiration next to the prophetic, and the time has come when this department of worship has begun to receive its proper attention in our Protestant Churches. We trust that as the age advances in art, science and intellect, more and more thought and attention will be given to develop this inspiring art, and that genius will be well supported and sustained which shall devote itself to the production and performance of this, the truest prayer and praise.—Transcript.

CHICKERING'S PIANOS.—Sitting in the New York Academy of Music at the late Philharmonic concert, we were particularly charmed with the piano performance. Mr. Hoffman is well nigh an imitable player, but certain it is that the best of players cannot make good music except from a good instrument. From Chickering's piano, which was played on the occasion, every run, scale, phrase, or isolated note reached our ears in its perfect integrity. Not a sound was lost, from the great sweeping chords and ponderous octaves to the most delicate chromatic scale, or pianissimo trill. This is not the case with all pianos. Those from many other factories, although possessing many points, are yet unequal in tone, and the bass not unfrequently entirely drowns the treble. The listener misses the clear, bell-like silvery sweetness of a genuine Chickering, which makes this piano so great a favorite in the parlor, and which was so highly appreciated by Thalberg and Gottschalk. They are the pianos fit for a musical poet. The great reputation which the Chickering's have earned during the past forty years is well-deserved.—Independent.

CHINESE MUSIC.—There is a story afloat that a Chinese maestro, Lusing is about to visit Europe on a musical mission, to combat the errors of modern music, and spread throughout the barbarian world the true principles of Chinese music. He will bring with him a Chinese orchestra to produce the compositions of Fo-hi a contemporary of Noah, and those of Pochery To Tis, the Rossini of China, who died only about two hundred years ago. This story L'Eco d'Italia gives without comment. It needs none, and will be gladly welcomed by those musicians who can see nothing good in modern music, and chiefly value compositions on account of their age. As they now profess to despise Donizetti, Meyerbeer and Verdi, and gloat on Gluck and Bach, we expect they will soon despise these worthy Teutons, and fasten their affections on Fo-hi, the contemporary of Noah.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

It is said that Meyerbeer's opera, L'Africaine, will follow next in succession—that is to say, unless Les Troyens, by Hector Berlioz, should find its way to the foot-lamps of the Academy instead—an event which is spoken of, and would beyond gainsay be an act of justice. There have been so many slips between the cup of publicity and the black lips of Meyerbeer's heroine, that she would scarcely be affected by the consequent delay. On the 23d of this month it is announced that there will be an extraordinary performance at the Imperial Opera House. Two hundred exccutants will perform a selection from the symphonic works of Felicien David, under the conductorship of the composer himself. The Desert, the fourth part of Christophe Colomb, the overture to La Perle du Bresil, and the finale of Moïse au Sinai, will be included in the programme.

The manager of the Italian Opera has just engaged Mlle. Trebelli for five years. The terms are said to be 200*l.* a month the first year, 280*l.* the second, and 320*l.*, 360*l.*, and 400*l.* for the third, fourth, and fifth years. These are not bad terms even for an Italian cantatrice, and the lady, who will make her debut in Tancredi, is said to be indebted for so advantageous an engagement to the two brilliant seasons which she has recently carried through at Berlin and Madrid. The Nozze di Figaro is in preparation. Mad. Penco, whose engagement has just been renewed, will play Susanna, Mad. Battu the Countess, and Mlle. Dalmonti, whose *debut*s will continue, the Page. Meanwhile, the Italian pianist, of whom I gave you some notion not long since, is astonishing the audiences at the Salle Ventadour each night of performance with his executive feats. He has himself accompanied by an orchestra, which would seem quite a superfluous measure in his case, for the ubiquitous power of his fingers on the keyboard supplies the place of another pair of hands. One thing is to be said in favor of this hard-hitting gymnast, this "harmonious blacksmith," he conceals the physical effort his feats cost him with a placidity of exterior truly Spartan in its heroism.

Propos of Mad. Penco's reengagement, and the terms received by Italian artists, it is said that M. Calzado had to submit to an increase in that lady's demands, and has signed an agreement to pay that 252,000 fr. (10,080*l.*) for three seasons of seven months, a private box on the stage, and a multitude of other privileges great and small. Signor Gardoni is to be succeeded by a tenor leger, Montanaro by name whose voice is said to be very fresh and very flexible. Signor Angelini, wishing to go to Russia with Signor Graziani, has been allowed to give up his engagement, the management making no demand for compensation, which may be flattering or otherwise as a man may regard it. Mad. Tagliafico, in her normal capacity of comprimaria, will form part of the company. I told you how Signor Beneventano was to supply the place of Signor Graziani, making up in stones' weight of too solid flesh the deficiencies of the spirit. Not even his title of Baron della Piana can, however, exactly be taken in compensation for the defect in his title to rank as first barytone in a first-rato establishment.

The first concert of the season was given last Wednesday at the Tuileries. Their Imperial Majesties do not seem to fare much more delicately in their musical entertainments than do our own Sovereign and consort at their palace of Buckingham. For curiosity's sake, I will transcribe the programme:—1, Trio, Pré au Clercs; 2, Duo, Chaste Suzanne; 3, Les Noces Basques, pastoral scene for the harmonicon of Debain, by M. Lefèbre Wely; 4, Air, Songe d'une Nuit d'Été; 5, Chorus and air, La Circassienne; 6, Quatuor, by Alary; 7, Duo, Les Voitures Versées; 8, Cantique, Le Domino Noir; 9, Variations, les Diamants de la Couronne; 10, Scena, La Circassienne. M. Alary presided at the piano, and the orchestra was conducted by M. Tilmant. A chef de cuisine who should place relatively so vulgarly inspired a carte before his Imperial master and mistress as their programme, would receive the Imperial sack, and most deservedly, nay, would merit exile to an English club-house. The chef de musique of the Imperial household is, on the contrary, "personally felicitated." His Majesty's subjects are either more faithfully served by their music purveyors, or have a better taste which they impose on the programme-maker. For instance, M. Le Président du Sénat, alias M. Troplong, had a concert the other day, a portion whereof were the principal scenes from the Armidé and Orphée of Gluck, "interpreted" (vile word) by Mad. Viardot. Mad. Jardier de Maleville, moreover, played Mozart and Haydn to the guests of the same dignity of State. To go on with private musical entertainments—musique de société—let me mention, first, that Rossini's "Saturday evenings" are brought to a close—dying most Pesaro swanlike and melodiously. On one occasion M. Duprez organised a concert, the personnel of which was entirely composed of his pupils, his own daughter, and M. Vandenhuevel, her husband inclusive, and never were the maestro's salons so crowded. To this succeeded a quieter Saturday, when only four artists exhibited their talents, the basso, Signor Badiali, the new tenor, Signor Montanaro, Signor Perelli, and Signor Bazzini, instrumental, exccutants, to whom must be added, supplementarily, the Vicomtesse de Grandval.—Musical World.

London.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The programme on Monday night was in all respects irreproachable, and in one instance (we allude to the last piece) unusually interesting. We subjoin it in extensio :—

PART I.

Sinfonie in C.....	Mozart
Ario, "Sombre forêt" (Guillaume Tell).....	Rossini
Septuor in D minor.....	Hummel
Duet, "Come, be gay" (Freischütz).....	Weber
Overture, "Alehymist".....	Sporh

PART II.

Sinfonia in A, No. 7.....	Beethoven
Aria, "Idole de ma vie" (Robert le Diable).....	Meyerbeer
Overture in C major (M.S.).....	Mendelssohn

Conductor, Professor Sternsdle Bennett Mus. D.

Still more worthy of being dwelt upon was the very admirable performance of Mendelssohn's overture, which is so rarely heard that it came upon the ear with all the freshness of novelty, and on that account, if on no other, was the most striking feature in the programme. The history of this composition, which only exists in manuscript, may not be generally known. In 1833, on the occasion of his second visit to England, Mendelssohn was deputed by the Philharmonic directors to write some pieces for their concerts. The result of this commission, which reflected the highest credit alike on the judgment and spirit of the society, was the overture in question (which, in consequence of the prominence of a particular instrument in the score, Mendelssohn used to call the "Trumpet-Overture"); the scena "In felice," for soprano, since abridged, otherwise modified, and published; and the Second Symphony (in A major), now enjoying such universal celebrity under the title of the Italian symphony—a title invented after Mendelssohn's death, probably by some one who knew more about the composer's intentions than the composer himself. The "Trumpet-Overture," although in some passages reminding us more of Mozart than any other production of Mendelssohn's pen, is a masterpiece in the fullest acceptation of the word, and so delighted every hearer as to warrant its repetition at an early period, when, we beg leave to suggest, it might appropriately be assigned the place of honor in the programme. This, by the way, is one of the many pieces so inconsistently and so obstinately withheld from publication by Mendelssohn's executors. Happily, the Philharmonic Society, having the score and the orchestral parts in their possession, cannot be prevented from introducing it now and then at their concerts. If the rest of Mendelssohn's unpublished compositions are no weaker, there is no conceivable plea for suppressing them. It is to be hoped that before long some reasonable explanation of the line of conduct it has been necessary to pursue with reference to these interesting manuscripts than has been hitherto vouchsafed may be afforded by those from whom the musical world has an unquestionable right to demand it. At all events, the MS. overture on Monday night was a wonderful success.

THE OPERAS.—Her Majesty's Theatre.—Mr. Wallace's Amber Witch has now been performed four times, and, as we anticipated, with each repetition, has made strong headway with the public. Deficient in the bright and sparkling, and, consequently taking music of Maritana and Lurline, it no doubt disappointed many the first night who expected the Balfian and Wallachian tune to prevail everywhere. But Mr. Wallace was determined this time to dig a little beneath the surface, and strive to bring up a great treasure to the light. That he has done so, we believe. The Amber Witch is all to nothing his best work—best, not merely because it is more masterly and ambitious, but also because it is more melodious—not perhaps “tuney,” but “tuneful;” as the public are beginning to find out already. In fact, the popular composer of Maritana has raised himself higher than ever in the estimation of thinking men by his last opera, and has converted many a sceptic into an admirer. As we shall have next week to give a detail analysis of the music in our review department, we shall not enlarge upon the merits of the opera in this place, but content ourselves with a brief explanation of the book, and a few words about the performance.

The plot of the Amber Witch is taken from Dr. Weinhold's well-known novel of that name, which created so profound a sensation in Germany many years ago. The story is divided by Mr. Chorley into four acts. The first reveals Mary, the Amber Witch dispensing food and clothing to the inhabitants of Coserow and its vicinity, who are reduced to famine by the consequences of prolonged and disastrous war (the “Thirty Years' War”). She has inspired both an illicit and an honorable love. The Commandant of the district (of Usedom) endeavors to enveigle her affections through the intervention of his own servant and Mary's jealous rival Elsie; while Count Rudiger, who has saved the life of her father, a village pastor, woos her in disguise of a peasant, and enlists her sympathy at once. The king being about to visit Coserow in state, Mary is chosen to present him with the congratulations of his loyal subjects; and in the act of discharging this responsibility, is made aware that her supposed peasant lover is Count Rudiger, a favored courtier of the monarch. Nevertheless, the young nobleman finds opportunity to abate her scruples, and amid the bustle of the ceremony, persuades her to grant him an interview at night. In the second act this interview takes place, the scene being the Streckelberg, a hill supposed to be haunted by witches. Here Mary had discovered the source of that secret wealth by means of which she is enabled to relieve her famished compatriots. An exceptional hill, the Streckelberg, contains a vein of amber, the existence of which is only known to our heroine, and which she gathers and sells at market through the immortality of her father. The meeting of the lovers leads to much the same as that of Romeo and Juliet in Capulet's garden. They plight eternal troth, but, meanwhile, have been overheard by Elsie and her confederates, who, aided and abetted by the jealous commandant, are devising means of having Mary publicly accused of witchcraft. Their machinations are successful, and in the third act we find the unfortunate Amber Witch awaiting her trial in prison. Her only plea is unavailable, a storm having completely swept away the vein of amber. The proffered intercession of the Commandant being indignantly declined, on account of the unworthy conditions that accompany it, Mary is arraigned before the judges, until, moved in an equal degree by the affliction of her father and the threat of torture, she confesses her guilt, and is condemned to the stake. In the interval, Count Rudiger has been incarcerated by his own father, who, informed of his ignoble attachment through the agency of the commandant, is resolved to prevent its consummation at any cost. The young lover is thus deterred from taking steps on behalf of his mistress; and it is not until the fourth act—when a serviceable coup de théâtre makes the obdurate “heavy-parent” die of the effects of a fall from his horse, and installs Count Rudiger in his place, as “Master of Revenstein,” that the latter is enabled to “rush to the rescue.” He arrives with a competent band of armed retainers at the nick of time. Mary is not to be burnt on the Streckelberg, the scene of her presumed transactions with the evil one, and she having repulsed the proffered aid of the commandant, she is at that instant awaiting her doom. Another opportune arrival, that of the king, is further instrumental in averting the catastrophe. The result will be anticipated. Mary is saved, the Commandant degraded and banished; Elsie dies, as some interpret it, of chagrin and disappointment, while others, judging by the words which Mr. Chorley has put in the mouth of the Commandant—of poison; and the faithful lovers are made happy.

Wright's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 13, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of Mendelssohn's “Song of Praise,” (Lobgesang).

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

NO. XI.

SYMPHONIES FOR THE PEOPLE.—LIEBIG.

Berlin, Feb. 23, 1861.

The last letters have described musical opportunities of the selecter sort;—the Sinfonie Concerts of the Royal Orchestra, not accessible to the many: the Sixteen-part Mass of Grell, not enjoyable to the many, even were it perfect of its kind. Let us now glance for a moment at the popular side of musical opportunity and culture here in Berlin. Instead, therefore, of proceeding at once to chronicle those experiences which have been worth most, personally, to the writer, and which have been, as it were, new revelations to him of the infinite significance of Music as unfolded in its great forms by great masters; instead of recalling the concerts of the Bach-Verein, the operas of Gluck, the “Fidelio” of Beethoven, the “Paradise and the Peri” of Schumann, the stringed Quartet concerts, &c., &c., let us come back to our indefatigable friend, the people's friend, LIEBIG.

Truly he is a great public musical benefactor, this same Liebig—this grey-haired and fatherly, but yet fresh and rosy-faced, clean, wholesome looking, tranquil, smiling, kindly, energetic, self-possessed, enthusiastic gentleman, who for many years now, four times every week and more, the whole year round, has stood at the head of his well-trained orchestra, now numbering fifty instruments, discoursing to the people,—to men, women and children, assembled in a social, free and easy way, sipping their after-dinner coffee, plying their knitting-needles, or crocheting—discussing all the finest Symphonies and Overtures of Beethoven and all the masters;—playing no trash (at least no longer than until it shall have been ascertained to be trash), but only the noble and immortal tone-poems, the true works of genius. For the people, I say; for the price of admission to such luxury, such refining education of the taste, such opening of genial springs of inspiration amid the dull and slavish routine of most lives, is a mere song—three silver groschen, or say seven and a half cents. (Five groschen for a single admission). He takes the people as he finds them; does not ask the mountain to come to Mahomet, but brings Mozart and Beethoven to them, into their social haunts, as they take their coffee (and their cigar), “their custom of an afternoon.” The little that they pay more for the music, is scarce worth considering.

Liebig is a musical Providence to the Berliners and Berlinerinnen. Without him, how would they (the general public, I mean) get any chance to hear a Symphony? The concerts of the Royal Orchestra, as we have seen, the Sinfonie Concerts, par excellence, are a very aristocratic and exclusive institution. The hall is small, and nearly all the tickets are held, and even handed down as heirlooms, in favored families. All the other evenings of the week, that orchestra is employed in the Royal Opera, and not available for concerts. Part of the charm, to the favored few in the Sinfonie Concerts, lies probably in their very exclusiveness. Let them rejoice in their brilliant chandelier light, multiplied in costly mirrors; we of the humbler sort can richly afford not to envy them; for does not Liebig flood us with whole skies full of unobstructed musical sunshine! They get perhaps a dozen Symphonies in the course of a year; we get some hundreds, if we are constant to our Liebig.

And this is not his only service. Music in Berlin has still another cause for gratitude to Liebig. He furnishes the orchestra for most of the great performances of choir and orchestra combined. What would the Sing-Akademie, what would the Bach-Verein, the Stern'sche Gesangverein, and the other important societies do without him? Where would they go for such an orchestra? Neither of them could afford to keep one of its own; and one picked up for the occasion could not answer so well. But if there is to be an oratorio of Handel, or the Paulus of Mendelssohn, brought out by the Academy; or the Passion music and the great Cantatas of Bach by the Bach-Verein; or Schumann's “Paradise and the Peri,” or Bach's great Mass, by Stern's Society,—why, there stands Liebig ready with his orchestra of fifty, all trained to hand, kept in continual practice the year round, like any regiment of the Prussian army, all accustomed to one another, all familiar with the whole repertoire of classical composers. He also, in order to maintain an equal standing, to show himself ebenbürtig (as the Germans say), or equal-born, with regular kapellmeisters, gives in the winter a selecter series of Sinfonie Concerts in the hall of the Sing-Akademie, which differ from the others only in the higher admission fee, and in the absence of cigars and coffee—the programmes being not a whit better. Our business now is with the cheap concerts.

Here are data from which to form an estimate of the amount and variety of fine orchestral music, which Liebig brings within the reach of every music-lover, during every year, in Berlin. I have before me the programmes of thirty-four of these concerts, the whole or parts of which I have heard, since the second week in November. And this by no means includes all the concerts that were given. Allowing for the three weeks of total abstinence from concerts during the period of public mourning after the death of the king in January, they represent about as much as one man could well find time or appetite to hear out of three month's worth of Liebig's performances.

Each programme, as a general rule, contains two Symphonies, three Overtures, and some other piece, besides commonly some favorite tit-bit of the public thrown in for an encore. The thirty-four programmes show the following

SYMPHONIES.

EMANUEL BACH. No. 1, (twice played).
 HAYDN. Nos. 7; 12 (in D); 13 (C); 14 (D); 15 (B flat), twice; 16 (E flat); 17 (E flat); 19 (C); 21 (E flat), twice; 28 (A), twice; and the Military Symphony (twice).
 MOZART. No. 1 (in D); 3 (E flat); 5 (D); 10 (C), not the "Jupiter"; 11 (B flat); 12 (G); 13 (G minor), twice; 14 (D); 15 (E flat); and "Jupiter" in C.
 BEETHOVEN. Nos. 1 (in C), three times; 2 (D), three times; 3 (Eroica); 4 (B flat); 5 (C minor) three times; 6 (Pastorale); 7 (A), twice; 8 (F), 4 times; 9 (without the chorus).
 WEBER. Sinf. No. 1 (in C).
 ROMBERG. In E flat major (twice); Trauer Sinfonie.
 MENDELSSOHN. In A minor ("Scotch"), twice; in A major ("Italian"); early Sinf. in C minor; Lobgesang.
 SCHUMANN. No. 3 (in E flat), three times.
 DORN. Sinf. in F major, twice.
 ULRICH. In B minor.
 L. MAURER. In F minor.
 A. FISCHER. In A major, twice.

OVERTURES.

GLUCK. Alceste; Iphigenia in Aulis.
 HAYDN. Introd. to "Creation."
 MOZART. Zauberflöte, (twice); Titus; Idome-neo; Villanella rapita; Don Juan, (twice).
 BEETHOVEN. Egmont (3 times); Leonora, No. 1 (twice); No. 2 (three times); No. 3 (twice); Fidelio (twice); Coriolan (three times); Men of Prometheus.
 WEBER. Oberon (three times); Euryanthe (twice); Freyschütz (twice); Jubilee (twice).
 SPONTINI. Die Vestalin; Olympia.
 CERUBINI. Lodoiska (twice); Anacreon.
 RICHINI. Armida.
 ART VOGEL. Demophöon.
 SPOHR. Jessonda (twice); Faust (three times).
 MEHUL. Joseph and his Brethren.
 BOIELDIEU. La Dame Blanche (twice); Caliph of Bagdad (twice).
 ROSSINI. William Tell (twice); La Gazza Ladra (twice).
 ONSLOW. Der Hansirer (the pedlar).
 MENDELSSOHN. Midsummer Night's Dream (3 times); Ruy Blas (twice); Athalia; Hebriden (twice); Paulus; Antigone.
 SCHUMANN. Genoveva; Manfred.
 GADE. Echoes from Ossian.
 LINDEPAINER. Faust (twice).
 NICOLAI. Merry Wives of Windsor.
 WAGNER. Tannhäuser; Introduction to "Lohengrin" (twice).
 RIETZ. Concert Overture.
 URBAN. Concert Overture.
 MARIE MOODY. Conc. Overture, No. 1; Do., No. 2; Do., No. 3 ("Leear and Cordelia").
 WUERST. Ein Märchen (Fairy Legend).
 DEPPE. Don Carlos (twice).
 REHBAUM. Dornröschen.
 MEJO. On the Choral: "Ach, bleib' mit deiner Gnade."
 SCHULZ. Faust.
 G. VIERLING. Im Frühling (twice).
 TAUBERT. Fest Overture (three times); Blue Beard (three times).

MISCELLANEOUS PIECES.

BEETHOVEN. The entire "Egmont" music (entr'actes, &c.) (twice). Andante from Sonata in A, (arranged for orchestra). Turkish March, from "Ruins of Athens." Septuor, entire, in original form. "Adelaide," for Orchestra. Adagio from 9th Symphony. Scherzo, do. First movement, do. Romanza in E, (violin and orchestra. Parts of the Choral Fantasia (twice).
 MOZART. "Die Dorfmusikanten," Comie Sextet (twice). Fantasia and Sonate, in C minor, arranged (three times). Finale to Zauberflöte. Finales to both acts of Don Juan (twice).
 WAGNER. Procession of women from Lohengrin. Song from Tannhäuser. Bridal Chorus, from Lohengrin.
 HANDEL. Pastoral Symphony, from "Messiah."
 MENDELSSOHN. Scherzo from Sommernachts Traum. Finale to Lorelei. Spring Song, arranged for orchestra (a dozen times).
 GOUNOD. Bach's first Prelude with modern melody (repeatedly).

ART VOGEL. Andante from Symphony (twice).
 WEBER. Invitation to the Dance, arranged by Berlioz (repeatedly).
 SCHUMANN. Chorus from "Paradise and Peri," arranged for orchestra.
 ROSSINI. Cujus animam, for orchestra.
 PRINCE RADZIWIILL. Choruses to "Faust."
 MEYERBEER. Schiller March (twice).

This is a mere catalogue, to be sure. But every musical person will find it significant. It contains all the best and well known Symphonies of the four great Symphonic masters, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, besides many of their works which elsewhere seldom or never find their way now into public performance. It contains pretty copious and varied specimens of other writers in this form, both of the most modern, and of older ones which have chiefly a historical interest. In the overtures and other important works of the same composers, it is equally rich. Is there another city in the world where so much as a title of all this is accessible, in any three months, or three years, to the great mass of the music-loving people? Is not this a privilege, in respect to culture, to refining influences and cheerful opportunities, to be envied? Truly in this respect the Berliners are a favored people, although they lack some great advantages of our free land too precious to be exchanged even for Art and Music,—advantages, however, of which we ourselves shall never know the real value, and never be quite secured in their continuance, until they shall go hand in hand with these.

— But here time cuts me short. I wish to notice more particularly the manner in which Liebig makes up his programmes. D.

Italian Opera.

The troupe of the "Associated Artists" has left us after a prosperous season of four weeks, in which, we are told by a contemporary curious and well informed in such statistics, their receipts amounted to twenty-four thousand dollars, leaving them a clear profit of six thousand, after paying full salaries to the members of the company. A goodly return for performances often given during storms of unusual severity.

Don Giovanni was given on Wednesday of last week to a full house. Mad. COLSON was the Donna Anna, of course, and sang it admirably, giving with much fine effect the generally omitted air, Non mi dir. We have heard many good Donna Annas here, and Mad. Colson will bear the comparison with any of them. STIGELLI was the Don Ottavio and sang Il mio tesoro finely, but the insipid lover of Donna Anna is no congenial character for him, and beyond the beautiful song he finds little scope in the part for his best efforts. Miss PHILLIPS was the Zerlina of the evening, and gave the music better than we should have supposed the natural range of her voice would have permitted her, singing with taste and discretion, and we need not say, acting the part effectively and in good taste. Perhaps, her Zerlina was scarcely simple enough for Mozart's little peasant girl, who listens at one moment to the artful flatteries of Don Juan and the next weeps over the piteous tale of Masetto, hardly knowing what she is about in either case, her foolish head completely turned by the soft words of either. Miss HINCKLEY, we were told by the bills, kindly consented to assume the part of Donna Elvira! A wonderful condescension indeed! What is art coming to, if it is blazoned as a favor on the part of a young singer, to be willing to take a leading part in this immortal work of Mozart. Is it not the artist who is honored by being thought capable of filling it, and is it not a worthy object of ambition for any singer to aid in giving completeness and due effect to the production of this masterpiece? Miss Hinckley did it very well, perhaps as well as any of her predecessors in the character. FERRI was a fair Don Giovanni, and SUSINI an amusing Leporello, singing some things very well, being in better voice than usual. The whole performance was a reasonably satisfactory one, the parts being equally balanced and intelligently supported.

The Barber was given on Thursday instead of Moses which had been promised, the change of opera, of course making a thin house. The performance was a lively merry one, as it generally is, the artists seeming to enjoy the fun as well as the music, and to enter into it with a zest that is apt to hurry them a little beyond due bounds. FERRI was the Figaro and a very satisfactory one. BRIGNOLI, SUSINI and BARIILI taking the Count, Bartolo and Basilio, and all very effectively. Miss HINCKLEY was the Rosina, and acquitted herself with much credit. She sang the Una voce, in very good style and introduced a brilliant bravura waltz in the singing lesson, which she sang finely, being enthusiastically applauded and obliged to repeat it. She entered with spirit into the comedy, and the whole performance, in spite of some imperfections and a little excess of fun at times, was on the whole a very enjoyable and pleasant one.

I Puritani was sung on Friday and Miss KELLOGG attempted a hold and not altogether successful experiment in venturing to assume the rôle of Elvira. This part in which the memory of Grisi is still so fresh, is one that requires more maturely developed powers than those of our young prima donna, to render with proper effect. She did some things well, nevertheless. Son Vergine vezzosa, was sung with brilliant execution being warmly applauded, and rewarded by the customary tribute of bouquets. But as a whole, she did not make a marked impression in this character, and will never be recollected in it or identified with it as she may be with Linda or even La Sonnambula. Very much too, of the music was omitted, probably to adapt it to her powers of execution or endurance. With this we have fault to find. A true artist should not, would not attempt a great part in this skeleton fashion, giving only sparkling morceaux and cutting other parts vitally essential to the dramatic unity of the plot. Better not soar so high till the wings are strong enough to complete the flight, so will the artist be safe alike from the perils of falling from the dizzy height and from being touched by the shafts that are levelled by critics on every side. BRIGNOLI sang in his usual faultless manner and Ferri and Susini well represented the Puritan colonels, exciting the accustomed popular enthusiasm by their spirited singing of the famous Suoni la tromba. The important part of the Queen Henrietta, in the hands of Mad. Avogadro, was worse than nothing. Here was another opportunity for some of the ladies of the troupe who were competent, to show a true artistic ambition by filling the part, thus aiding to give a complete and worthy representation of a great work. When shall we have singers who are also true artists, who so love their art as to be willing at times to assume a place a little lower than the highest, for the honor of Art?

La Juive was performed for the fourth time on Saturday afternoon, being the last performance of the season. We need not say that we enjoyed this additional chance of hearing this opera. The only change was the substitution of Lotti for Scola, in the part of Leopoldo; a somewhat smaller man with a somewhat larger voice than his predecessor. The music written for this character demands a first-class tenor, and the dramatic importance of the part is very great. We could not but wish to hear BRIGNOLI in the part, and speculate what Stigelli might not make of it, were he Leopoldo and not the Jew. With such a voice as either of these in this part, what a fine cast we should have had of La Juive. It is vain to hope for such good fortune as to see two such tenors singing together in the same opera. Here is the chance. When will Signor Brignoli improve it? The orchestra was reduced to its usual size, at this performance, and the opera was given almost complete, with such short pauses between the acts that it was compressed into three hours.

So ends a season of Italian opera very pleasant to the hearers, and very creditable to the artists. They have given us two new operas of great interest, two native prima donnas of great promise and good performance, who will be remembered here with pleasure and have left a decided impression of unusual talent upon the audiences who have heard them. They will always be welcomed with pleasure. They have had another prima donna, Mad. COLSON, of long acknowledged talent and a reputation that increases with every effort that she makes; two rival tenors, each unrivalled in their way, a contralto, a Boston girl, who is not without honor in her own city but always gladly welcomed, not only esteemed for her talent as an artist but respected for her excellent private character. Add to these such voices as those of Ferri and Susini, and we must confess to having been favored with a troupe of unusual talent.

Signor Muzio, the conductor, has done his work well, and is entitled to be honorably mentioned in a review of the season. The business management has been well conducted, as is evinced by the pecuniary success of the troupe and the comparatively few disappointments of any kind that the public has suffered during the season. If the company had done some things in the way we have suggested they might have been done, we should have little fault to find.

Organ Concert.

The Organ Concert at Tremont Temple, on Fast-day, given by Mr. GEO. E. WHITING, came too late to receive a notice in our last week's issue. Here is the programme :

PART FIRST.

1. Grand Sonata in F minor, (Op. 65, No. 1.) . . . Mendelssohn
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
2. Chorus; Mighty Jehovah, "Lucrezia Borgia" . . . Donizetti
Bowdoin St. Choir.
3. { a Organ Fugue in G minor Bach
 b Overture, "Oberon" Von Weber
 Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
4. Chorus, Joy is over, "Lucrezia Borgia" Donizetti
Bowdoin St. Choir.
5. Fantasia for Organ in E minor G. E. Whiting

PART SECOND.

1. Prelude and Fugue in C minor, (Op. 37, No. 1.)
Mendelssohn
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
2. Chorus, The Regatta, "Lucretia Borgia" Donizetti
Bowdoin St. Choir.
3. { a Variations on "God save the Queen" Riak b Andante from Mendelssohn's 4th (Italian Symphony).
 Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
4. Chorus, Father in Heaven, "Masaniello" Auber
Bowdoin St. Choir.
5. Overture, "Guillaume Tell," (by request) Rossini
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.

Mr. WHITING is a very young man and is said to have studied by himself with the exception latterly of a short course of instruction. If so he deserves great credit for having dared to attack such a programme as that above. The word "attack" seems exactly to express his style of playing, indeed a musical friend who sat by our side would fervently ejaculate at the close of each piece "tremendous execution!" He is a very nervous man, evidently, and his nervousness crept into his performance, more evident in the fugue perhaps, than elsewhere, which as he played it was a grand rush, the time all too fast and consequently one tone hard on the heels of another. The movement of a fugue should certainly be clear and distinct, preserving a certain dignity in its greatest haste.

We are certainly right in supposing that the test of an overture upon the organ, is successful imitation of the orchestra. The organ has the materials, as many of its stops are voiced expressly to imitate the orchestra, truly instrumental. Mr. Whiting's overtures, by this standard, fell short, he did not make good use of his materials, and we missed that perfect connection between the passages so satisfying in a superior orchestra; there was too much patchwork. However, Mr. Whiting is a most promising musician and in his Fantasia he was very successful. It has a character of its own, making it truly original. Many of these compositions are original only in virtue of their want of character. The choruses were only well rendered, showing faithful drill, but needing sadly the electrifying influence of a resolute baton. There was an unpleasant see-saw in the time between the organ and chorus in the first pieces. However, the audience were delighted, either with the music or the swift heels of the organist, and we have no right to complain.

Mr. S. B. BALL gave his annual concert last Tuesday evening, at the School-street Church. Beside his quartette, he had the volunteered assistance of a number of ladies and gentlemen, many of whom are his pupils. The church was well filled, and the programme, which consisted of choruses, part songs, solos, &c., was quite creditably performed, considering that it was amateur talent. Some of the solos deserve particular mention, but we have not space. Mr. Ball was agreeably surprised at the close of the concert, by the gift of a valuable diamond pin, from his pupils.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Mendelssohn Quintette Club are to conclude their series of parlor concerts in this place by a public concert in Lyceum Hall, on Friday, April 19th, and will give Beethoven's Septette and Schubert's Oelette, on their programme. Our Cambridge readers should not forget this concert.

The Polyhymnia, a vocal organization consisting of boys and men from the Church of the Advent choir gave a well attended concert at Williams' Hall, on Fast Day eve. The programme comprised a variety of sacred and secular music. Among the former were some of the fine old English Anthems. These pieces were sung correctly but without animation and suffered much from a too heavy organ-accompaniment. Occasionally only, we got a glimpse of the heavenly tone-body of the boys' voices. To our taste the merest outline of an accompaniment would have sufficed. The boys did not need any support from the organ; they came in promptly and firmly as well as true in pitch. This chorus might do a great deal of good by bringing to our hearing part of the Berlin Dom-Chor's repertoire of pieces. Love songs of which the second part had some, are of doubtful propriety for boy's voices, whose tone-color very naturally lacks that warmth which is necessary to portray emotions of the heart.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, MARCH 29, 1861.—All the scenic display of the Grand Opera, the preparations that had lasted for six months, the coöperation of the best artists could not ensure the success of Tannhäuser. On the evening of the first representation it might well be doubted whether the failure was real or only apparent. The very novelty of the performance elicited a degree of attention which prevented the full explosion of the discontented. Ulterior performances the piece however, can leave no doubt in the minds of those who were still unwilling to abandon the hope of success on the first evening.

Wagner attacks in every portion of his work what he styles the conventional rules of the Italian opera. Even the most sanguine admirers and upholders of system had not calculated upon the co-operation of the musical critics of the capital. Indeed Wagner has always made light of the opinions of the press. He does not hesitate to assert in one of his theoretical works that he believes himself to be prejudged by the writers of the musical feuilletons. It is to the public he appeals, "that public whose taste has not been altogether corrupted by Italian melody." The Paris public must in Mr. Wagner's opinion now, be as corrupted in taste as the Paris critics, for it has judged his Tannhäuser with even less respect. The press had praised certain passages of the work at least, these very passages were received with hisses and interrupted at the second representation.

It seems pretty certain now that the work will be withdrawn. The tumult was so great last Sunday that it was expected every moment that some representative of police authority would make his appearance on the stage requesting the public, in that polite way which is in order in France, to desist from any manifestation of satisfaction. The presence of the Emperor is generally all sufficient to keep the most turbulent audience within bounds. In this case it was not so. Although he himself gave the signal of applause, that applause was immediately met by hisses and occasionally by works little complimentary to those who seemed to conform to the Imperial taste. On the second evening when the applauders and hisses were about divided, in the middle of the second act, the Emperor appeared in his box. All who saw him make his appearance immediately turned and applauded. Those on the same side of the house as the Imperial loge not comprehending the cause of the increased applause made a counter demonstration. It was several minutes before the tumult could be appeased. Such scenes were renewed several times. The orchestra, the actors found favor with the public. It was the composer himself on whom the dissatisfaction seemed to concentrate. Once Niemann, who personated the character of Tannhäuser threw up his arms and and stopped as if begging the audience for silence. This action was met by unequivocal marks of encouragement for the artist. Nothing but the music itself was the subject of disapprobation.

The failure of the Tannhäuser may be better appreciated from a few citations. The general spirit of criticism may be inferred from the following specimen. It is Florentino who writes.

"People imagine that an imperturbable assurance is sufficient to impose one's self upon a public the most railing, skeptical and keen-sighted in the world. There were the other evening at the opera twenty French composers who each have written works superior to anything Mr. Wagner has ever done, and it is in presence of these masters he comes and erects himself into an inspired reformer, an infallible genius."

Little enough is said about the music, perhaps those gentlemen whom the composer seems to have treated with little deference do not deem it worthy of criticism but only of abuse. This they give plentifully. And the legend, the plot, even they cannot digest.

"The legend of Tannhäuser is popular in Germany. The celebrated Tieck has converted it into a tale which we are told is taught to children. Happy young German intellects that are fit from the cradle for such heavy food!"

Without wishing to defend Wagner's system one cannot but be impressed with the injustice, the shallowness, the narrow-mindedness of the spirit that has called forth the majority of the remarks that have been current in the Paris press respecting a work which if it deserve nothing more, deserves at least a serious refutation of the principles upon which it is constructed.

We may expect soon a parody of the piece by Delacour and Lambert-Thibonst. It is to be produced at the Varieties under the title of Ya mein Herr. A large caricature in one of the weekly papers represents a bard accompanying his song with a harp, his hearers falling asleep about him. Beneath are the words, "Germany still uneasy in the possession of her Rhine-provinces sends the Tannhäuser to Paris to put the French asleep."

Of the new pieces of the last fortnight may be mentioned: At the Odeon Le Jaloux du Passé by M. Scholl; at the Palais Royal Arçons les frais; at the Gaité, La Fille des chiffonniers a melodrama by Anicet Bourgeois and Dagné; at the Bouffes-Parisiens, Le Pont des Soupirs, opera-bouffe in two acts by Crémieux and Halévy, music by Offenbach. At the Vaudeville La femme est troublée by Dumanoir and de Courcelles.

At the Gymnase a beautiful little Vaudeville was represented last week. It is entitled Les Trembleurs, and is written by Dumanoir and Clairville. The hero Monsieur Bruncau trembles constantly at the political state of affairs. He scents war, revolution, invasion in every breeze. He never fails to read the journals which by their detailed accounts of insurrections, and disaffections in every part of Europe render his nights sleepless. The piece is full of pointed couplets which applying well to the present are received with great applause.

At the Italian Opera Mozart's Nozze di Figaro was given last week.

The reception of the new ballet by Derley and Petitpa at the Grand Opera contrasted with that of the Tannhäuser. Graziosa was composed expressly to show the power of Mme. Ferraris in its fullest relief.

It was on Monday last, March 25, that Madame Ristori made her first appearance at the theatre of the Odeon in the new piece of Ernest Legouvé La Madone de l'Art. Having been unable to witness this performance I shall in a future letter revert to this great Italian artist who now presents herself before the French public acting in a language not her own.

It is said that the work of M. Legouvé was inspired by Mad. Ristori herself. The subject is the love of a German prince for a great tragic actress Beatrix. His rank is an unsurmountable barrier to their union. "I love you but never will be your mistress," is the declaration of Beatrix, who henceforth has no other love but art. The moral aim of the piece is to show how really great genius is when it walks hand in hand with virtue. To-day being Good Friday, all the theatres of the capital are closed. F. B.

PITTSFIELD, APRIL 3, 1861.—Notwithstanding the severest snow storm that ever descended from April skies, a select company were assembled last evening at a "soirée musicale" given here by the pupils of the Mendelssohn Musical Institute. Had you been present, Mr. Editor, I doubt not you would agree with me in the opinion that the performances were as well worthy of being styled a "Grand vocal and instrumental concert," as many given under that name in our cities. I send you a programme, by which you will see that the pieces performed were indeed worthy of artists, and were such as those who are ambitious to enter the heaven of the Tone-art, and realize all its glorious wonders, will appreciate and enjoy.

PART I.

1. Overture—Guillaume Tell.....Rossini
Misses Julia C. Clark and Harriet A. Hall.
2. Scotch Ballad.....
Miss Helen Macgregor.
3. Polonaise—Op. 26.....Chopin
Miss S. Louise Monroe.
4. Terzetto—"Era stella del mattino".....Mercadante
Misses Macgregor, Clark and Hall.
5. Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Miss Elizabeth F. Merrill.
6. Aria—"Dove sono".....Mozart
Miss S. L. Monroe.
7. Moonlight sonata.....Beethoven
Miss H. Macgregor.

PART II.

8. Grand Duo—Op. 114.....F. Schubert
Misses S. L. Monroe and E. F. Merrill.

A taste of the sweet and gentle sadness of Chopin, of the weird and fairy-like harmonies of Mendelssohn, one of the noblest of Mozart's melodies, the wonderful sonata of Beethoven, so gentle and so sad in its beginning, so overwhelming the astonished listener, as it proceeds in its wild movement;—and then, how can I do justice to that "grand" work of Schubert, in the weakness of language and pen? One must hear and enjoy it, in order to realize its beauty and power. May you soon have opportunity to enjoy it as well as I did last evening. The execution of these and all the pieces of the programme was rare indeed, called for no indulgence on the score of dilettantism. The performers must indeed possess natural talent, and also have had the advantage of rare training in all those departments which enable the pupil to render the meaning and intentions of such authors with such skill.

I learn from their catalogue just published that this Musical Institute thus closes its fifth year, having instructed one hundred and fifty-three pupils, of whom twenty-two are or have been teaching successfully, in various parts of the country. May the teachers emulate their master in the high standard to which he earnestly endeavor to raise all who come within his influence, in regard to the class of Music which should receive attention and the manner of teaching and studying it. L. M. R.

TERRE HAUTE, (Ia)—Being compelled about six weeks ago to stay over night in Terre Haute, Indiana, your correspondent was induced to visit an exhibition concert given by the pupils of Mr. Meininger, Prof. of music in the Female College of that place. Having some knowledge of music, I am compelled to say that I was so astonished with the performance of those scholars, both in vocal and instrumental music, that I determined to speak of it to the public through your worthy journal, as sufficient praise can hardly be bestowed upon the professor for his ability and faithful discharge of his duty. One young Miss (whose name I have since forgotten) played the piano in a style, that is not often found in this country from older hands. A. K.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH, 22, 1861.—Not seeing any notice of the Harmonia First Concert in your interesting paper and knowing the scarcity of musical news in this city I take the liberty of giving you a sketch of the concert of 21st inst.

The programme contained a choice selection of concerted pieces and solos given by the best talent of the society. The choruses were well rendered, particularly the "Morning Prayer" from Dr. Meignen's "Deluge," and the Bacchanalian Chorus from Darley's Cities of the Plain. The gentleman who sang the Bass Solo in Moses, needs considerable study and finish before attempting such parts, but as a whole this chorus was well sung. A duet from Semiramide by two young ladies was very well given, although one might desire a little expression in singing dramatic music. The Trio from Belisario was sung with spirit and feeling, the soprano having a voice of unusual sweetness and clearness, the bass and tenor were of unusual good quality for amateurs. The aria from Nabucco for mezzo-soprano was rendered tolerably; the singer evidently prides herself upon her low notes which are not however, as good in quality as the higher ones, being too husky, and it will be necessary for her to study Italian as her pronunciation is horrible. A Quartette from the Bohemian Girl was very well rendered and appeared to give satisfaction, in fact it was not as well sung by the last opera troupe in this city. Prof. Bishop's Ballad was given in his usual style and well merited the hearty applause it received. "Una voce," from the Barbiere was tolerably well given by a statue-like young lady; the time was entirely too slow, it being a lively piece requiring the quickest movement and most brilliant execution. A Duet called "Addio," by Donizetti was very well sung but was lacking in expression. An Aria from Gemma di Vergy was next given by the soprano before spoken of in the Trio. The rendering of this piece was the gem of the evening the execution style and expression being faultless, this young lady appears to possess a voice of unusual register, singing from "C" in alt down to "A" in this piece and with uncommon strength. The next a male quartette by Darley, was well rendered (if we except a mistake made by the bass), and met with hearty applause, then followed a Duet from Trovatore for mezzo-soprano and tenor, very effectively sung, and we were reminded rather forcibly of Brignoli by this tenor who possesses a fine full chest-voice of unusual sweetness; he should apply himself to study and a few years hence he will occupy a prominent place among the talent of this city, the lady acquitted herself with great credit, singing with expression, showing the proper appreciation of the music; in fact, this piece has been very seldom, if ever sung better on the stage. The closing feature was the "Star Spangled Banner," solo and chorus. The solo parts were sustained by a young lady dressed in costume supposed to represent the Goddess of Liberty, quite a novelty at a Harmonia Concert, and a young gentleman formerly a member of the Cooper Opera Troupe filled the tenor and he sang with great spirit and expression, the lady however sang through her nose, which marred the effect considerably, probably the heavy crown of stars surmounting her head was the cause. I do not like fancy ball costumes in the concert room, particularly when given by a sacred musical society.

The audience rose whilst singing the national anthem, and although it met with much applause still it was not encored. Taking the concert as a whole it was a success, we must not expect to find perfection in amateurs, but all engaged may with study become good if not first class concert singers.

Yours,

VERDI.

CINCINNATI, MARCH.—The Cecilia Society performed in their fourth regular concert—fifth season Gade's composition "Erking's daughter," for Soli, chorus and orchestra in a highly creditable manner. In the first, miscellaneous, part of the concert Miss Raymond the Contralto, and Mr. Werner, the Pianist, distinguished themselves.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Rock me to sleep, mother. Frank Wood. 25

A very pleasing composition, the more than charming words by "Florence Percy." The public will not be slow to recognize its merits, and we predict for it a wide popularity.

Annabel Lee. Song. E. F. Falconnet. 60

A piece which has evidently been a work of love with the author. Its general plan is well conceived and the details are carefully finished and show consummate taste and musician-ship.

O the dear delight of dancing. Montgomery. 25

A humorous song; easy and very amusing.

I'd be a star. With guitar accompaniment.) C. J. Dorn. 25

Molly Bawn. " " Curtiss. 25

Two popular songs, newly arranged for guitar players.

Instrumental Music.

Russian Medley. Charles Grobe. 50

Russia has a great many airs which are peculiar to her. They have always been favorites with arrangers. From Thalberg to Beyer almost every composer of note has paid tribute to the beauty of these Russian melodies. In this medley they are gathered like a bunch of flowers, each in its own plain and beautiful garb, unadorned by the glittering network of embellishments which they are often hidden in. It is a very pleasing combination.

Willie's favorite Quickstep. S. A. Earle. 25

Great Western Galop. A. Rossi. 25

Two pretty trifles. Good recreation pieces for scholars.

La mia letizia. (In tears I pine). Cavatina from "I Lombardi." Transcribed. A. Baumbach. 35

An effective arrangement of this popular air of Verdi's, just difficult enough to make it attractive to even the advanced pianist. As there has not been any arrangement of this melody, well-known and much admired as it is, our amateurs will not be slow to get a copy.

Lilla March. Junior. 5

Nightingale and Cuckoo Waltz. M. Perabo. 10

Prairie Polka. Ernst Perabo. 15

Pretty trifles, for beginners.

Books.

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE VIOLIN. 50

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE GUITAR. 50

These volumes are the first of a new series of attractive low priced books of instruction and music; for all kinds of musical instruments. They are exceedingly neat in typography, the types being clear and distinct and the paper and printing unexceptionable. The contents are of a popular kind, comprising excellent instructions, and a very choice collection of the best music of the day.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 472.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 3.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

XIII.

COMIC OPERA.

1595—1800.

As the ebanson engendered the Vaudeville so the Vaudeville was parent of the Comic Opera. The latter in fact was the child of both, since in the Vaudeville airs had succeeded the old slow moving tunes.

At first Allard and Bertrand, associated with Widow Maurice and Decelles, had the theatrical exhibitions of the Fair in their hands alone. They afterwards shared them with Dolet and Laplace and were succeeded by Octave and Dominique. Their successors were Saint-Edme and Madame Baron, after whom came Françoise and Lalauze. At length Ponteau obtained from the Academy of Music the right to establish the comic opera, which he held until its suppression in 1742.

The Theatre de la Foire began with farces in which rope dancers mingled their performances. In course of time they began to give fragments of old Italian pieces, to the great discontent of the French comedians, who obtained a prohibition of the giving any piece in dialogue or monologue by the actors of the Foire. They immediately had recourse to the plan of giving the text to the spectators who sang, while the orchestra played the tune; but afterward they obtained from the opera the right of singing.

Lesage, Fuzelier and d'Orneval began immediately to compose pieces different from the vaudeville, being in peculiar, rhymed couplets, and the new form took the name of Opera Comique.

The first Comic Opera mentioned by Desboulmiers, in his "Histoire du Theatre de l'Opera Comique" is a piece in one act entitled Le Retour d'Arlequin à la foire. It was represented Feb. 12, 1712. Then came La Querelle des Theatres and in 1718 des Funerailles de la Foire, a piece referring to the suppression of the Opera Comique through the combined influence of the French and Italian comedies. It was not revived again until the Fair of Saint Laurence in 1721, when a piece in one act was performed called Le Rappel de la Foire a la Vie. At length after numberless vicissitudes Monet—whose motto was Monet, mulcet, movet—reopened the comic opera at the Fair of St. Germain in 1752; and ten years later the company was officially reunited to the Italian comedy. In 1780 the Italian actors withdrew, Carlin excepted; but it was not until 1793, after the law granting liberty to the theatre, that the concern took again a national name, Opera Comique, though originating at the Fair, in dramatic exhibitions which go back to the year 1595. In fact so long ago as Feb. 5, 1596, the Theatre de la Foire St. Germain had been duly recognized and had its privileges upon the payment of the two crowns per annum to the Brotherhood of the Passion.

After Lesage, Fuzelier and d'Orneval, the most successful authors for the comic opera during the 18th century were, Piron, Panard, Carolet, Fagan, Favart, Delisle, Marivaux, Antreau, Boissy, Vadé, Laujon, Anseaume and Sedaine. The most distinguished composers of that era were Gilliers, Dauvergne, Duni, Philidor, Monsigny and Gretry. Of the second rank, Blavet, Aubert, Alexandre, de la Croix, Mouret, Lacoste, Larnette an excellent actor, Blaise, Desbrosses, Trial, de La Borde, Dezede, Martini. To Jean Claude Gilliers, a composer very well forgotten now, is due a fame no less than that of having been the creator of that national French form of the musical drama, the comic opera. His airs are distinguished by frank gaiety neatness of rhythm and a melody easy to fix in the memory. Gilliers was born in Paris in 1667 and died there in 1727, aged 70 years. He began his career at the Comedie Française as a violinist, where he wrote the music for the dances in the small pieces of Regnard and Dancourt. As Fétis has not given a list of the works of this founder of the French comic opera, we add partly to fill the gap, the titles and dates of all his pieces, which we have been able to find.

1. L' Hyménée royal, an entertainment, text by Pellegrin, 1699.

2. Céphale et Procris, 3 acts, text by Dancourt, at the Comedie Française 1711.

3. La Foire de Guibray, text by Lesage, at the Fair of Saint Laurent, 1714.

4. Le Tombeau de Nostradamus, 1 act, Lesage, 1714.

5. Parodie de Telemaque, for the opening of the theatre of St. Edme, 1715.

6. La Ceinture de Venus, 2 acts, Lesage, 1715.

7. Les Dieux à la Foire, a prologue, 1724.

8. L' Amante retrouvé, 1 act, Largillière, Aug. 6, 1727.

9. Sancho Pança, 2 acts, Thierry; Aug. 28, 1727.

10. La niece vengée, 1 act, Panard, Aug. 28, 1731.

11. La Comedie sans hommes, Panard; Feb. 3, 1732.

12. La Fille sauvage, 1 act; July 7, 1732.

13. Le Pot-Pourri comique, 1 act; pantomime by Panard, 1732.

14. Sophie et Sigismond, 1 act.

15. La première Representation, Lesage; June 26, 1736.

It is true that all those pieces are far from deserving the title of real musical works, especially in their orchestration. But at that time they did not put the pedestal upon the stage and the statue in the orchestra—to use the fine simile of Gretry. Let us here express our regret that the bust of Gilliers has not been placed in the lobby of the Opera Comique. He was the originator of this form, a fact which should not be forgotten.

After Gilliers and his contemporaries, Mouret, de la Coste, de La Croix, Grandval, Aubert, Alexandre, &c., Dauvergne, (born at Clermont 1713 died at Lyons 1797) attracted public attention by his comic opera Les Troqueurs, given in 1753. Down to this time, music had mingled with the dialogue of the comedies only in the form of songs, suited to the action, or in the vaudevilles at the end of the plays. Les Troqueurs on the other hand, was written in imitation of the Italian Intermezzos—the Serva Padrona of Pergolese for instance, performed at Paris in the autumn of 1752—that is, with recitatives to connect the musical pieces and gave a new impulse to the development of this child of the comedy—vaudeville. Hence it deserves some description.

Four persons, two men and two women, comprise all the elements of this little drama. Lucas and Lubin are to marry Margot and Fanchon; but before the knots are tied they fall into serious reflections upon the characters of their future spouses. The one is hot-tempered and headstrong as a devil, the other so easy as to be almost sleepy. The lovers conclude that each has a hard bargain and agree to exchange greatly for the worse. So having proved that the exchange has the balance on the wrong side, each takes his own again.

Le Jaloux corrigé by the flutist Blavet, born at Besancon in 1700, obtained a merited success; but soon after this was given there came to Paris an Italian composer, who wrote a series of works full of nature, grace, gaiety and comic power. This was Duni, born at Matera in the kingdom of Naples, Feb. 9, 1709, the tenth child of an obscure chapel master. He received his musical education at the conservatory dei Poveri di Gesu Cristo at Naples under the celebrated Durante, then at its head. Receiving a commission to compose the opera Nero for Rome, Duni found himself put in competition with Pergolese. The score of the latter was superior to Duni's, but the Neapolitan gained a success by being the first to proclaim in all companies Pergolese's superiority. After travelling extensively Duni was appointed music teacher to the crown prince of Parma. As French was a common language at that court, the composer was called upon to write several little operas in that language. He obtained a distinguished success with his Ninette a la Cour (1755), text by Favart, and was then contrasted with the composition of La Chercheuse d'Esprit and le Peintre amoureux de son modele. He settled in Paris in 1757, where he wrote eighteen operas in the course of eighteen years. The most known are Nina et Lindor, (Sept. 9, 1758), la Fille mal gardée (1758), l'Île des Fous (1761), la bonne Fille (1762), les Chasseurs et la Laitière (July 21, 1763), la Fee Urgele (1765), Clochette (1766), les Moissonneurs (1768) Thémire (1770).

A dozen Italian and twenty French comic operas form a handsome aggregate of musical labor for Duni, who died at Paris June 11, 1775. All his works are full of grace and freshness; his instrumentation was usually extended only to the stringed quartette, sometimes two hautbois or two flutes being added. The vocal parts are, however, delicious, full of taste, nature and true and well conceived expression. The melodies are such as come from the heart, not leaving it void, like those of our day. When art has degenerated into handicraft elsewhere, its decay is rapid; Let us hope for a revival also in music.

François André Danican Philidor, whose bust is still wanting in the lobby of the Opera Comique was a contemporary of Duni. He was born at Dreux, Sept. 7, 1727 of an old and distinguished musical family, and was admitted among the boys of the royal music at vaudevilles at the proper age, where he studied his art under Campra. Settling in Paris he gave instruction in eking out a living as a copyist. It was at that he studied chess for which he had remarkable talents. The nine years from 1745 to 1754 he spent in Germany, Holland and England, occupying himself much more with chess than with music. His first work for the theatre of the Fair of St Laurent was given March 9, 1759, and obtained a brilliant success. It was entitled Blaise le savetier; this was followed by l'Huitre et les Plaideurs, le Soldat magique, and le Jardinier et son Seigneur. Philidor became composer to the Opera Comique, ruling that stage for which he wrote thirteen works. The most remarkable of them are Le Marechal, in 1 act, le Bâcheron, le Sorcier, Tom Jones (1764), and l'Amitié au Village, (Oct. 31, 1785).

In 1777 he printed at London his Analyse du jeu d'échecs. May 23, 1786, he produced an unsuccessful work at the Grand Opera, Themistocles, in three acts, from which time he gave himself up entirely to his passion for chess at the café de Regence. The revolutionary troubles led him to return to London where he died Aug. 30, 1795. His music is free, natural and melodious; he drew his effects from nature and often produced picturesque and original rhythms. His instrumentation is simple, though horns and bassoons are added to the old hautbois and flutes.

Monsigny, a composer of noble family, was born two years after Philidor, at Fauquemberg, near St. Omer, Oct. 17, 1729. He was destined by his family to a financial career, but afterward entered the service of the Duke of Orleans, as Major Domo. Until his thirtieth year he lived quietly in the high circles, whence he gained that elegance of manner, which he preserved through life. A performance of Pergolesi's la Servante maitresse, awakened in him the impulse to write for the stage. He began the study of composition immediately with Gianotti, and after some informal essays of his powers, wrote the score of the Aveux indiscrets—and a piece given at the theatre de la Foire in 1759. Its success encouraged him to follow it with two more works upon the same stage in 1750, Le Maitre en droit and le Cadi dupé. The comic force shewn in the latter called from the poet Sedaine the expression, "there is the man for me!" The two authors joined their forces and wrote together a large number of dramas and comic operas, one of which was On ne s'avise jamais de tout, (Sept. 17, 1716).

Monsigny's success was so great as to excite the jealousy of the Italian comedy, which succeeded in causing the Theatre de la Foire to be closed.

The next year, 1762, the two theatres were united and Monsigny wrote successively, during the following years, le Roi et le Fermier, Rose et Colas, Aline reine de Golconde, l'Île sonnante, le Déserteur, his masterpiece (March 6, 1769), le Faucon, le Bal de Arsène, le Rendezvous bien Employé, and Felix ou l'Enfant trouvé, (3 acts, 1777). This was his last work. His rare sensibility was exhausted; this had been his good genius, for it inspired him with a constant supply of melodies so touching as to render his works immortal. In 1798, the directors of the Opera Comique gave him a pension of 2,400 francs. In 1800 he took the place of Piccini as inspector of Instruction at the Conservatory. He succeeded Gretry as member of the Institute in 1813 received the cross of the Legion of Honor in 1816 and died at Paris, Jan. 14, 1817 at the great age of eighty-eight years.

Gretry was as remarkable for his feeling of scenic effect as Monsigny for the exquisite sentiment of his melody. He was born at Liege, Feb. 11, 1741, the son of a poor musician and began life as a singing boy at the collegiate church of St. Denis. Leclerc, Renekin and Moreau were his teachers; but the influence of the Operas of Pergolesi, Buranello, &c., upon the future master, decided his vocation for the theatre; at the age of eighteen he went to Rome, where he studied counterpoint under Casali and at length produced at the theatre Alherti an Italian interlude, entitled, la Vendemmiatrice.

The score of Monsigny's Rose et Colas gave Gretry an insight into the characters of the French comic opera. He then came to Paris, stopping at Geneva on the way where he produced his Isabelle et Gertrude. At length after conquering a thousand difficulties he brought out Le Huron, a comedy in one act by Marmontel, Aug. 20, 1758). To this succeeded Lucie, then le Tableau parlant, a masterpiece of drollery, Zemire et Azor, la Rosière de Salency, l'Amant jaloux, l'Épreuve villageoise and Richard Cœur de Lion (1785) which sealed the fame of its author. At the Grand Opera La Caravane, Panurge and Anacreon obtained a merited success. His last works showed plainly the decay of his peculiar genius.

A true vein of melody and expression suited to his text are the distinguishing qualities of Gretry's music. His instrumentation is feeble and has often been retouched in our time. But such touchings are always a very delicate matter and it is at least a very rare thing to succeed; hence we much prefer the naive defects of the author to the deafening noise introduced by modern writers. In 1789 and 1797 Gretry published two very interesting volumes of Essai sur la Musique, which we recommend to the attention of all composers. He was appointed inspector at the Conservatory in 1795, and was elected to one of the three chairs of the musical Section of the Institute then formed. Gretry died at Montmorency Sept. 24, 1813, crowned with glory and honor.

"The Music of the Future."

RICHARD WAGNER.

PARIS, MARCH 29.

1. Quatre Poèmes d'opera traduits en prose française précédés d'une lettre sur la musique par Richard Wagner—(Le Visseau Fantome—Tannhäuser—Lohengrin—Tristan et Iseult)—Paris. A. Bourdilliat et Cie 1861. 1 vol. grand in 18 pp. LXXIII—317.

2. "Zukunftsmusik"—Brief an einen französischen Freund als Vorwort zu einer Prosa-Uebersetzung seiner Operndichtungen von Richard Wagner. Leipzig. Verlagsbuchhandlung von J. J. Weber, 1861. 1 vol. 8° pp. 53.

Richard Wagner has proved himself a writer of talent no less than a musical composer. His works "Art and Revolution,"—"Art of Future"—and "The Opera and the Drama" are noble expositions of his theories of art, and vigorous defences of his own method of composition as well as bold attacks upon prevalent and hitherto universally adopted rules. Wagner presents himself as an innovator. The principles upon which former composers have worked he treats as radically false, his severity falling especially upon the Italian school, whose best productions he qualifies with the name of table music. It would be foreign to our purpose to enter into any details in regard to this æsthetic discussion which has occupied so much space in the German press, we merely wish to record the appearance of Wagner's last production, one addressed more particularly to the general reader and prepared by him previous to the representation of his Tannhäuser at the Grand Opera in Paris.

It was at the request and under the auspices of the Emperor himself that the Tannhäuser was received. From the first announcement of the intention, now, nearly two years ago, a portion of the Paris press showed itself averse to the step about to be taken. The Presse baptised the foreign composer with the name of the Marat of music. An epithet goes far in France in influencing public opinion. The Marat of music! Such was the note of introduction announcing to the Paris public the creator of what other laughers beyond the Rhine had called "The music of the future," from a misinterpretation willing or otherwise of the title of his second work.

The volumes heading this notice were prepared by Wagner to answer or rather to precede the criticism with which he naturally expected his Tannhäuser to be met. The letter addressed to M. Frédéric Villot explains concisely the nature of the innovation he has labored to introduce in the treatment of the opera. Then follow prose versions of his operas except the Nibelungen, for Wagner, unlike foreign composers has always written the text to his own music. The Phantom Ship, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, and Tristan and Iseult are all based upon popular traditions, that are worked up with dramatic interest. They are not mere librettes where all is sacrificed to the music, where a few lines or words are repeated to satiety, where are found platitudes which seem to justify the saying of Voltaire that "what is too foolish to be spoken must be sung." The development of the action is complete. They are poems as they are justly styled in the title page: Poèmes d'Opera.

However all these preparations, all the splendors of the scenery and costumes of the Grand Opera could not save the Tannhäuser from being mercilessly hissed on its first representation in Paris. We do not wish to quarrel with the judgment pronounced by the public on this occasion. This is no place either to attack or defend Wagner's music, only we would remark that there was in the reception of the Tannhäuser every evidence of a parti-pris long beforehand, to meet the innovation with sneers and to greet the new music with laughter and hisses. The house was noisy, turbulent, uneasy. Third and fourth rate critics talked in groups. No attention was given except at intervals. Wagner was the Marat of music, a German innovator. The little papers of the capital, unable to touch politics had found matter of joke and caricature for three months back in this Musique de l'avenir. It was judged beforehand and the next Sunday there was a wonderful unanimity in the Paris feuilletons in regard to the ridiculous pretensions "of this dreamer who set himself up before the wittiest and keenest audience in the world as an innovator"—and the unanimity was so unusual in those who spoke first, so perfect that even similar expressions, comparisons, bons-mots a little disguised might easily be discovered trickling through all. It was the small talk of the foyer retailed to the Parisian public. And thus are reputations done and undone.

The merit of the letter preceding the translation of the Opera Poems is that it is adapted to the general reader, musical terms are avoided as much as possible. The general outline of the new system is sketched in as few words as could well have been done. These explanations have been severely criticised. Granting to the opponents that they are perfectly right, the criticism with which Wagner's words of evident conviction were met, seems none the less unfair. It does not touch upon the point at issue. It dwells on minor details. Detached passages and assertions which indeed seem paradoxical are reproduced and exposed to ridicule. To an impartial reader siding with neither party but seeking for information only, the answers of late produced do not deserve a moment of serious attention.

The letter is written in a tone of sincerity that recommends it to the attention of all. The author expresses his sentiments and views in that honest straight-forward way that wins respect of any one who seeks for more than the mere quarrels of art-schools. The very essence of the Italian opera is attacked. Its origin is detailed as also the grand outlines of music in Germany. The author demands a perfect conformity between the music and the dramatic action. They must interpret, complete each other; when words cease to express, music must go beyond, and the words must always be in exact concordance with the feelings called up by the melody. There must be no artificial pauses, no rests. The action must progress as it does in nature, which has caused the opponents to say that Wagner's music was one noisy recitative. In view of this concordance between the two arts, the musician demands the fullest co-operation on the poet. Thus may language, the instrument of abstract ideas act upon the sensibility. Music will be giving to poetry beyond the rhyme and adornings it already possesses, a new element of power. There would be a marriage of both into one work. Each would find in the other that which each alone lacks. And thus would be satisfied in the Opera, that involuntary desire in him that listens to a poem or to a symphony, for something more, something which is neither in the words, nor in the music alone but in both thus combined. The orchestra would then be with the drama in a relation somewhat analogous to the chorus of the Greeks with the tragic action. Only the relation would be much closer, the orchestra being united to the work of the poet by an intimate participation and interpreting it. Such is the theory of Richard Wagner viewed aside from all the means employed by him to attain this end. These means, the chief element of the innovation proposed by him, we are not prepared to discuss, nor does he dwell upon them in the works under notice.

It is to metaphor that he turns in conclusion to characterize the grand melody as he conceives it embracing the whole drama. And above all it is a quiet contemplation he demands on the part of his hearer. When thus listened to, "It must at first produce on the soul an impression like that caused by a beautiful forest at sunset upon him that has just escaped the noises of the town." There must be a perception of silence. When permeated with the feeling of stillness, we seem endowed with a new sense that reveals to us the harmonies of nature, we acquire new modes of perception, the ear is keener. He that is thus prepared to listen to the voices of the words in their infinite variety—"Hears some which he believes never to have heard before;—as their numbers augment so also strongly increases their intensity; they become more sonorous;—as he hears a greater number of distinct voices, he recognizes in these sounds which take a definite character, which swell in his ear and overpower him, the grand the sole melody of the forest; it was the very melody that had produced upon him from the first a religious impression. It is as if in a beautiful night the deep azure of the firmament riveted his look; the more he abandons himself wholly to the contemplation of this spectacle, the more the starry host appears clear, distinct, scintillating, numberless. This melody will leave in him an eternal re-echoing; but to tell it would be impossible. To hear it again he must return to the forest and return there at sunset. What would be his folly to wish to seize one of the graceful singers of the woods, to have it brought home and teach him a fragment of the grand melody of nature! What could he hear then unless perhaps—some Italian melody?"

Our Early Opera Troupes.

1. Chorus and IntroductionBy the whole Company
 2. Aria, "Cujus Animam"Signor Salvi
 3. Duetto, "Quis est homo,"
Signorina Costini and Signora Vietti
 4. Aria—"Pro peccatis"Signor Cesare Badiali
 5. Chorus and Recitative—"Eia Mater"
Signor Corradi Setti and Chorus.
 6. Quartetto—"Sancta Mater"
Signorina Costini, Signora Vietti, Signors Lorini and
C. Badiali.
 7. Cavatina—"Fac ut portem,"Signorina Tedesco
 8. Aria and Chorus—"Inflammatu," Signorina Steffanone and Chorus
 9. Quartetto—"Quandum corpus morietur," Signorine Steffanone, Tedesco, and Signori Lorini and Corradi Setti.
 10. Grand FioaleBy the whole Company
1. Overture—"Semiramide" (Rossini)By the Orchestra
 2. Romanza from "Roberto il Diavolo," (Meyerbeer)
Signora Angela Bosio
 3. Duetto from "Nabucco," (Verdi)
Signorina Costini and Signor C. Badiali
 4. Romanza from "Giovanna d'Arco" (Verdi)Sig. Vietti
 5. Duetto from "Profeta," (Meyerbeer)
Signorine Steffanone and Tedesco
 6. Romanza—"Il mio tesoro," "Don Giovanni," (Mozart,)
Signor Salvi
 7. Duetto from "Huguenots," (Meyerbeer)
Signora Bosio and Signor Mariui
 8. Prayer from "Moses in Egypt," (Rossini)
By the whole Company

Tickets, $1 each—for sale at the principal Hotels, Music Stores, and at the Door. Doors open at 7—commence at 8 o'clock.

We reprint, above, the programme of a concert given here some years ago. We do this to recall to our readers the music and singers which Boston has enjoyed in times gone by. In spite of this, we Bostonians are called on, from time to time, to admire and pay for singers who would scarce be paralleled with those quoted above; and we are thought to be fault-finding, particular, cold, dull, for not going into raptures over them. Look at the many enumerated above in one single concert. Can it be expected that those who have sat delighted to listen to these, are to go into a fever of delight at every soprano, tenor, baritone or bass that chances to come along? And when the public stays away from some entertainments which are not sufficiently attractive, is it necessarily non-musical? Or, if it fails to applaud a second rate performance, is it any reason for the artists to turn up their noses at it altogether? It is well, now and then, to go back and look over our musical antecedents. The fact is, we have heard a great deal of good music here.—Boston Musical Times.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 20, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

No. XII.

LIEBIG AND HIS CONCERTS, (CONCLUDED).

Berlin, Feb. 23, 1861.

So then—forty-two different Symphonies, fifty-nine Overtures, besides other famous things, in a portion only of the concerts of three months! But it is not only in the quantity of good music which they present, that LIEBIG's programmes are so remarkable. Not only in this cumulative aspect do they challenge attention, but also by the individual and peculiar method of their making up. Liebig has his fancies as a programme maker. He shows his character in it. In the complexion of each programme you detect a certain educational design, partly in allusion to the present moment and its chance opportunities, partly in pursuance of a serial plan or course. There is certainly an idea running through each programme. Thus, much of the time we find him giving the Symphonies of Haydn and Mozart in course, one after another, almost in the order of their numbers; contrasting them continually with Beethoven, as with the highest standard, the consummate flower of the symphonic art; while at the same time, on the other hand, he also contrasts with him the greatest efforts of his followers, Mendelssohn and Schumann, and frequent specimens of what may be called the period of decadence, the Symphonies of various now living or quite new composers. He is catholic as to men and styles, and tries to represent all, and do justice to all claims of any dignity; and this chiefly that his audience may compare and learn, may have a reason for their opinions about great and little, new and old composers. He is also very hospitable to the efforts of newly risen aspirants. He gives one, sometimes two or three hearings to the Symphony or Overture of some young composer, until it may be fairly said to have had its chance with a public which he is doing his best to make appreciative. For example, one week he brought out three concert overtures by an English lady, Miss Maria Moody, who had come over with the scores to Berlin; they were short flights, showed fair musicianship in respect to form, instrumentation, &c. (the fruit of German studies), passed off with a succes d'estime, and were forgotten. Another time he bored his hearers terribly with a new Symphony, by one Fischer, a very weak dilution of Mendelssohn, and an intolerable deal of it; as also with a young Overture that tried to rage like Beethoven, without even matter, not to say method in its madness; but we were at once refreshed and compensated by a touch of the true thing in the fiery Coriolan of Beethoven, and a delicious, genial Symphony of Mozart. The lesson learned was worth the patience.

Of course, too, in these programmes he pays his compliments to the musical magnates here, (for our Liebig is a courteous gentleman, and he, also, has a "Hof" prefixed to his title):—to Taubert especially,—to Vierling,—to Meyerbeer, not too much (be it said to his praise), not so much as to his wronged and greater predecessor, Spontini, whom he (Meyerbeer) supplanted, to the regret and shame now of most musical Berliners. Often the programmes have a reference to other performances, and answer a subsidiary purpose as preparations for, or as reviews upon, what is to be heard elsewhere. If Goethe's "Faust" is produced (as it has been lately in incomparable style) upon the royal stage, Liebig takes care to give us several different Faust overtures, including that by Lindpaintner, used in the theatre, and also at another time, soon after, an orchestral review of the Prince Radzywill's Faust choruses and melodramatic fragments. If the "Midsummer Night's Dream" is announced at the Schauspielhaus, with Mendelssohn's music, Liebig takes the opportunity to bring the Overture, the Scherzo, &c., into his concerts. If "Egmont" is the play, he treats us with the entire Egmont music of Beethoven,—enough to rob us of all disposition to quarrel with our coffee. When Taubert, with the Royal Orchestra brings out Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the exclusives, that is a signal for the people's kapellmeister to do the same thing for them; while to those who can attend both, it serves for a rehearsal and for deeper acquaintance with the work. Taubert revives a forgotten, interesting antiquity, a pre-Haydnite Symphony, by Emanuel Bach; and Liebig instantly proceeds to play the same repeatedly, until the sound thereof becomes familiar. Again, he does not neglect anniversaries; his programme sometimes reminds us of the birth or death of some great master. Thus on the 27th of January we found a lauded bust in front of the stage, and the selections were entirely from Mozart: Overture to Zauberflöte; Fantasia and Sonata; Overture, Finale to first act, Finale to second act, of Don Juan; Symphony in C, with the Fugue ("Jupiter"). Even if we suppose that in many instances the programme is made up at random; if we look not beyond whim, accident, or the convenience of the moment for the whole secret of his method, still the chances are of finding something interesting, something to one's purpose in the concerts, take them as they come. In most cases, however, he is plainly governed by some principle of selection and association. Let me recall a few examples.

Here is one of the oddest — the "Faust" programme already mentioned:

Overture to "Faust".....Schulz.
Sinfonie in F major.....Dorn.

Overture to "Faust".....Spohr.
Aria from "Stabat mater".....Rossini.
Overture to "Faust".....Lindpaintner.

Sinfonie in E flat (No. 3).....Mozart.

Faust number One, by a young composer, was a clear, respectable performance, not extravagant or overstrained, and not particularly deep. Spohr's shows his usual mastery, and the freshness of his happiest creative period; not so sickly sweet and cloying as much of his music is; but certainly no musical peer for Goethe's poem. Lindpaintner's is the most elaborate and most imposing, with full strength of modern orchestra, all agitato and would-be exciting, as if full of the delirious tumult of the senses and of all wild dreams and insatiable passions; but still no work of genius. This was the one used in the performance of the drama. Dorn's Symphony seemed also full of Hexen-brauererei, "a true witch element;" and you could not help suspecting that Liebig had introduced it from a fancied analogy with that side of "Faust." I know not whether the Dorn here named is the kapellmeister here, Taubert's colleague, and author of the Niebelungen opera, or a young composer in Vienna. Certainly this symphony is one of the most wilfully wild, eccentric extravaganzas that ever reached my sense of tune and rhythm; full of flings of audacious fancy, sometimes for a moment interesting and even beautiful, but just as disappointing and unwholesome as the sweet visions summoned by the witch charms, and as instantly vanishing. He seemed to be catching ideas, or rather conceits, by their tails as they ran away (why not let them go?) and dragging them mercilessly back into his wicked conjuring circle. Sometimes it seemed to me as if the composer had caught the first hint of his Symphony from one of those old Dutch paintings of St. Anthony's temptation. There were many hisses mingled with the applause that followed, and just then — so fatally well-timed, that Mephisto himself must have been invisibly present — a tremendous crash of broken crockery among the coffee tables! Why Rossini's Cujus Animam was put in such company, I was puzzled to conceive. It casts a broad gleam as it goes by. Decidedly the most genial thing of the evening until we Mozart. Had it been placed immediately before that, and after all the "Faust" business, one could have taken it for the "flaming sword," the wall of separation between all this diablerie and the Paradise that followed. For it was like Paradise to get back to Mozart. Such a warm, genial, spontaneous Symphony! Such beautiful, innocent, pure music! the inspiration, as it were, of the child soul, the new created, that walks face to face with the Creator. It was good in Liebig to land us there; it was like returning from long nightmare cruises along Colchian shores, amid Medea sorceries and dragons, and finding oneself safe again beneath sweet Ionian skies, where Beauty has her temples in the isles of Greece. I forgot to mention that we did get a bit of relief after the Dorn Symphony, by the introduction of some of those delightful variations out of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia." Those are real fancies, and not struggles after fancy. Liebig often gives them for an encore piece.

Here is the programme for Dec. 18th, in the week of the birthdays of Beethoven and of Weber:

Overture to "Euryanthe" } C. M. von Weber.
Sinfonie in C major,..... }

Overture to "Fidelio"..... }
Romanza in F, (violin)..... } Beethoven.
(Choral Fantasia)..... }
Overture to "Leonore" (No. 2),..... }

Sinfonie in C minor.....Beethoven.

Here is another, of the week during which I heard Fidelio, greatest of operas, with the single exception of Don Juan, at the Royal Opera House. It is doubly interesting: first, as affording such a study of Beethoven's working processes, of the manner in which he recast his idea, until it satisfied himself; and, secondly, unfamiliar (now) examples of the elegant and even style of Symphony, as first set by Haydn, and followed, at an humble distance, by composers who neither could, nor cared to, go beyond his depth:

Overture to "Leonore" (No. 1).....Beethoven.
Symphony in E flat.....A. Romberg.

Overture to "Leonore" (No. 2).....Beethoven.
Andante from Symphony.....Abt Vogler.
Overture to "Leonore" (No. 3).....Beethoven.

Symphony No. 13 (C major).....Haydn.

And now look at this one, curiously compounded:

Concert Overture.....Maria Moody.
Marcia alla Turca.....Beethoven.
Symphony in C minor.....Mendelssohn.

"Die Dorfmusikanten," Comic Sextet..Mozart.

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven.
Symphony No. 10 (C major).....Mozart.

The Moody overture was, as I have hinted, a pretty fair success of woman in male costume; she enacts Symphony about as well as Signorina So and So does Romeo. It consisted of passages passably put together. On the whole not edifying. How all the faces brightened at the magical sounds of Beethoven's Turkish March (out of the "Ruins of Athens" music, the whole of which was played a few evenings before in one of Radecke's concerts)! The whole work is worthy of Beethoven's good hours; and this march seems to realize the rhythmic pulse of Oriental life by quite as true an imaginative instinct (to say the least) as that by which Mendelssohn is supposed to have caught the fairy vein of Shakespeare. This dimple of sunshine would enliven some of our murky March and April "Afternoon Rehearsal" concerts in the Boston Music Hall. Mendelssohn's early Symphony does not count among his great ones. Its somewhat slender material is worked out to tedious length, but of course in a right musicianlike manner and with elegance and sweetness. Interesting for once to the musical inquirer. It was once given, I think, in Boston, by the "Germanians." The Sextet (for quartet of strings and two horns), is one of those exquisite drolleries with which Mozart's ever buoyant, childlike nature overflowed in social hours, in moments of rest and reaction from severe work. It is a burlesque on the ambitious attempt of a club of village musicians to do the classical thing, i. e., perform a piece in several movements in Sonata form (original, of course). It is somewhat such a thing in music, as Peter Quince's tragedy of Pyramus and Thisbe, and quite as laughable and enjoyable. Such solemn, formal emptiness! All the forms are in a ludicrous manner kept up, as long and pompous as court ceremonies; but without the shadow of an idea to put into them. The emptiest periods and phrases are repeated, imitated, answered with the utmost gravity; with awful pauses after nothing said — but said emphatically. And such comical blunders! horns in fifths, &c. Attempts to trill in instruments least fitted for it and getting the alternate note a semitone out of the way! In the last movement the double bass leads off with a startling fugue theme (in the lowest depths), and there stops short while another instrument takes it, and so round — and that is a fugue! The best musician could enjoy such fun! The Symphony in C was not the well-known "Jupiter"; if not so great as that, it added to one's stock of Mozart, who left nothing not worth having — although we found the adagio of this a little prolix.

Here is a programme rich in new and old:

Overture to "Titus".....Mozart.
Symphony No. 3 (E flat).....Schumann.

Overture to "Prometheus".....Beethoven.
Scherzo from 9th Symphony.....Beethoven.
Overture to "Iphigenia," with R. Wagner's conclusion.....Gluck.

Symphony No. 16 (E flat).....Haydn.
(Overture to "Coriolan").....Beethoven.

Here is another:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini.
"Frühlingslied".....Mendelssohn.
Overture: "Ein Märchen".....R. Wuerst.

Grand Septet.....Beethoven.

Symphony (No. 12) G major.....Mozart.
Overture to "Freischütz".....Weber.

I cite this programme chiefly for the sake of mentioning what a peculiar and enhanced effect the well-known Beethoven Septuor derived from the manner in which it was treated. The first and second violin, and the viola parts were played each by four instruments; and there were four 'cellos strengthened by two double basses. Of course the clarinet, fagotto and horn were single. This lent a certain largeness and positiveness to these [for Beethoven] somewhat commonplace movements, as they have sometimes seemed, which rendered them again fresh and vigorous. It was like the interest sometimes restored to too familiar objects by a magnifying glass. Wuerst is one of the most gifted of the young composers who reside in Berlin. His overture, which might be called "a fairy legend," impresses me, after repeated hearings, as one of the happiest things in that vein since Mendelssohn. I shall perhaps some time speak of a very successful Quartet by him. The Frühlingslied of Mendelssohn, here named, is the well-known Song without Words. It cannot possibly sound so well for orchestra, as in its original piano form; and Liebig takes it altogether too slow. Still it is one of his popular make-weights, which he throws in very often.

And how does Liebig's Orchestra play? Not so well as the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig; but I may safely say, upon the average quite as well, and often better than our Symphony orchestra in Boston. Bear in mind that it is about fifty instruments strong; that they are kept in continual play together the whole year round; and that they are found good enough to do all the accompanying here in oratorio, in concerts of the Bach-verein, of the Sing-Akademie, of Radecke's series, &c. Naturally they fall more or less into a certain hacknied routine way. They play too often, to take enthusiasm always at the flood tide. But they also have their lucky moments; and I have once heard the C minor Symphony played better by them, than I ever heard it, except in the Gewandhaus. The instruments all have good sounds, especially the oboe and bassoon; and the general sound of the orchestra is rich and fine.

It is not to be denied that there are some drawbacks to the pleasure and convenience of these tone-feasts of the bountiful Liebig. In three, at least, of his four locales, you have to go very early to secure a seat. You had better take a book with you, if you have got eyes. An individual comes an hour beforehand—a solitary woman of a family, or of a knot of cronies—and turns down all the chairs around the table where she sits, perhaps several tables; and this sign of first discovery and possession is scrupulously respected by all after-comers; attempt to seat yourself in one after another of fifty places which appear vacant, and you are politely informed that it is besetzt—kept by the one who has come in reserve for the friend who will come, or some chance friend who may come. There is more or less of jar and disturbance, too, from the rattle of coffee cups, and beer seidels, and small change; since, of course, the kellners must do all the business they can for the proprietor and keeper of the house. Yet it is wonderful how quietly all this goes on; it only needs the pervading instinct of musical good manners; and that comes with such love of music as you see here. You have only to "hush," and the offenders are as still as mice.

The worst annoyance, probably, at least to many, is the bad cigar smoke. Fond as you are of Symphonies, you may not be partial to smoked symphonies. Especially should it chance to be the Ninth Symphony, as it was once my experience, when the crowd drove me into the gallery, where the smokers fancy themselves sheltered, above notice and above decency. Abstinence from "the weed," however, is commonly requested on the programmes, and with considerable, sometimes complete, effect; it is like the caprices of the weather; there are smoky and there are clear days; you cannot forestall them. But it is not possible wholly to suppress the nuisance in a free and easy German audience,—especially where it is made up in large part of students, saucy and proud of their duelling scars; for German students, it is well known, as a general rule, are anything but models of refinement.

Can we have Liebig concerts in our American cities? Can we change our whole way of life? D.

NOTE.—Our readers are desired to make the following corrections in the new series of Editorial Correspondence.

In the Christmas Letter (No. III.), Haupt is called the pupil of Mendelssohn. I wrote "pupil, with Mendelssohn, of Zelter." Again, middle of next column, for "velvet" read helmet.

In Letter No. IV, within the first dozen lines, for "passive opportunity" read passing; strike out "long" before "excursions"; for "choice" read "chosen temples."

For "talk a walk" (!) read take.

For "talented (!) husband's genius," read lamented.

In Letter No. V. (Journal of Feb. 9), 3d column, 4th line, for "musical inquiries," read inquirers. Middle of 4th column, "the men on the other, less in the royal box," &c., put a full stop after "other," and commence new sentence, "Up in the royal box," &c. Top of next column, "the initiation, through the trial and sacrifice of two young souls," &c. read, "the initiation, through trial and sacrifice, of two young souls." 43d line, "so admirable in a male chorus," strike out "in." Six lines from end of letter, for "purity and style," read "of style." "Sieg, siag," too, is a case where the half is better than the whole.

Letter VI. Third column, for "Lathe," read Lethe. 4th column, for "the best movement," read last. For "these variations," those. For "Eusebius, Mester Raro," Eusebius, Meister Raro. Bottom of the same column, for "representations," read representatives; and (horrible dirty), "our hero of the victim!" should be "of the violin." 11th line, last column, "led in triumph," should be "led in triumph."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 9.—All the concerts which have not taken place during the winter, are being crowded together into these last five or six weeks of the season. Every week brings two or three, and those for the most part good ones. But unfortunately the greatest musical attractions bring nothing but small audiences, and one can only wonder that so many artists have the courage to get up any thing of the kind. On Thursday Satter gave a matinée in aid of the German Hospital Fund which is being raised. The audience was entirely different from that generally present at these concerts, and consisted almost exclusively of German ladies. Mr. Satter produced some new gems from the inexhaustible store of his repertoire, in the shape of a Marche Triomphale for two pianos, by himself, Liszt's stupendous arrangement of the Fifth Symphony, and the Overture of Oberon. In the last two pieces, he exhibited even more marvellous powers of execution than usual. The Marche Triomphale, in which Mr. Pattison took the second piano, is exceedingly spirited. Improvisation concluded the concert, in which airs from Martha, Freyschütz, Don Giovanni, Tannhäuser, &c., seven in all, were brought up successively and interwoven with each other in a very skilful manner. Mr. Satter was assisted by Miss Roweroff, a singer of considerable ability, but not very agreeable voice, and Mr. Appy the violinist, who played a fantasia on Massanello. He has much energy and vigor of stroke but very little softness and sweetness. The latter deficiency may however have been owing partly to his instrument, which was very harsh.

On Saturday night a concert was given by Mr. Bruno Wollenhaupt, the young violinist who made so successful debut at a Philharmonic concert a year or two ago. He has but once since appeared in public, at a soirée of Mme. Abel's last season. He is too excellent a player to have lain perdu so long, and more than one music-lover heartily welcomed this occasion of hearing him once more. The programme was a very fine one, but had several faults aside from the character of the music. In the first place it was too long, then it contained too many solos, and finally Beethoven's second Symphony, which was beautifully played by a small orchestra, was put at the very end, when the listeners were wearied, and their powers of enjoyment and attention weakened by all that had come before. The orchestra played besides, the Overture to Oberon, and Sig. Centemeri sang arias from Attila and Le Pardon de Plöermel; his fine baritone showing to best advantage. Mr. Wollenhaupt played four times, and proved himself equally excellent in various styles of composition. His first piece was the Violin-Concerto of Viextemps, to which he did full justice. Then he gave us an arrangement of Hungarian airs, by Ernst, and subsequently a Fantasia on "Les Hirondelles," by David, composed by himself. This is a work of much merit, and very pleasing and interesting. He was encored, and played a short fantasia on Home, Sweet Home. Mr. Wollenhaupt combines all the requisites of a first-rate player. He has force and vigor, but at the same time great delicacy and purity of power, he has also great mechanical skill, but more than all these a degree of fire and feeling in his playing, that proves how his whole soul is wrapped up in his art. May he soon give us an opportunity of strengthening this impression.

A concert was given last evening at Irving Hall, (fast becoming a favorite locality for such entertainments) for the benefit of the same German Hospital Fund for which Satter gave his last matinée. It was arranged chiefly by the Ladies Union which has been organized for this object, and was hardly made known among the American public, being advertised only in the German papers. This was not the wisest course. The programme was so good that many who might not have been induced to attend by the specially German object would have been attracted by it, and the room might have been much fuller. You will see that the programme, in regard to quality, was almost unexceptionable, but it had again the too frequent fault of extreme length, so that but few listeners must have been at the end.

PART I.

1. Overture "Julius Cæsar".....R. Schumann.
2. Harfner's Lied von Goethe.....Zimmermann
3. Sonata op. 47, f. Piano und Violine (2 uad 3 movements).....Beethoven
4. March and chorus from "Tannhäuser".....R. Wagner

PART II.

5. Sinfonia Eroica.....Beethoven
1. Allegro con brio. 2. Marche funebre. 3. Scherzo.
4. Finale.

PART III.

6. Overture "Fingal's Hochle".....Mendelssohn
7. Concert in E Moll, one movement.....Chopin
8. Gesang der Geister über den Wassern.....Schubert
9. Fackeltang.....Meyerbeer

The performances were very satisfactory throughout, and showed in their spirit that they were given for a national object. It was quite interesting to compare the three vocal societies, the three best in the city. The Teutonia made its first public appearance if I am not mistaken, and did great credit not only to themselves but chiefly to their leader, Mr. Mosenthal, who has only had them in training during the past winter. The members are rough, unpolished mechanics, but they have fine fresh voices, know how to manage them, and sing with accuracy and precision, as well as with much nicety of shading and a great deal of expression. — t —

GETTYSBURG, PA., APRIL 8, 1861.—Mr. Editor. Of course you are interested whenever people are stirred about the "art divine." For this reason your Journal must have an account of a musical occasion unusual in this part of the world. Concerts do not often occur here. The town is small, and out of the way, and traveling companies do not think of going so far round the corner. But there is in the place a large circle of sincere admirers of sweet sounds, and the presence of a college and theological seminary tends to elevate taste and refinement. A traveling company did not come, but a concert was started by an amateur orchestra, "The Quaver Club," composed of students and other young men. Where professional orchestras are wanting, amateur societies can be very useful in beginning the work of musical cultivation. To the orchestra was added a good strong chorus, formed by selections from different choirs. Thus equipped, "Mozart's Gloria," an Anthem by Zundel, and "Sail, Sail," from Lurline were put under rehearsal. These with solos and orchestral pieces made out a miscellaneous programme. The performance took place April 4th. Of course it was not a rendering from professional hands, nevertheless it was very creditable.

One benefit is certain to follow,—an increased interest in musical study among the college students here,—a study refining and elevating, and at the same time as effective mental discipline as any Latin, Greek or Mathematics.

But I must not forget the principal feature,—the part of the performance which was professional. Mrs. Mozart from New York was present. There is no need of telling; you know of her abilities. The auditors hardly knew what to do with themselves after her clear tones and charming execution. First came a silence from pure wonder, then unbounded enthusiasm. The lady sang very prettily Comer's "Song of the Lark," and very skillfully the Cavatina from "Beatrice." The "Last Rose of Summer" was on the programme; "Home, Sweet Home" and "Comin' thro' the Rye" were given on encores. Mrs. M. is successful in oratorio; last Christmas your correspondent heard her perform admirably the soprano of the Messiah at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia; but she is particularly successful in simple ballads, perhaps as much so as any who attempt them. Her natural grace and temperament give the assistance by means of which these melodies become so touching. The people were delighted too to find her more than an artist, a finished lady. Her amiability won the affections of all.

The whole performance pleased so much that a repetition was called for. A new programme was made out, and a second concert given the following night.

NEW YORK, APRIL 15, 1861.—We have had one week of opera by the associated artists, alternating between this city and Brooklyn. Un Ballo, Sonnambula, La Juive, Linda and Moses in Egypt have been given, with fair success. The last opera was performed as an oratorio on Saturday night and horribly mutilated. Such a poor performance has not been heard here recently. Stigelli was the only singer who appeared to advantage. Miss Hinckley did not sing the part of Anaide near as well as Adeline Patti. The company have now gone to Philadelphia.

There are any number of concerts announced for this week, but the political excitement, rendering people indisposed for quiet enjoyment will seriously interfere with their pecuniary success. The Mendelssohn Union has given a fair performance of Wallace's "Lurline" to invited guests and will next perform it at a public concert. They will then rehearse "Moses in Egypt."

There have been this month more changes in church choirs than were ever known before at any one time. An amusing circumstance which has been gossiped about considerably is the recent squabble between C. Jerome Hopkins and the pastor of the Church of the Incarnation. The quarrel hinged on the question as to who should select the tunes. Hopkins as the organist maintained his right to do so but the rector thought his rights paramount, and ludic-rons blunders in the selections not unfrequently occurred. War ensued and Hopkins relieved himself by a documentary protest as long as the moral law but vastly more original and amusing.

Father Heinrich is in this city in a state of poverty but not without friends. A brief sketch of his career I have gathered from his own lips. He was born in Schoenliaden, in Bohemia, (Austria), on the 11th of March, 1781. He was educated for a mercantile life, and became the principal in a very extensive banking house, the branches of which were established in Prague, Vienna, Trieste and Naples. From early youth, Mr. Heinrich was of an adventurous spirit, which immense wealth enabled him to gratify at will.

His very extended commercial business, frequently made it necessary for him to travel, and on one occasion he visited the island of Malta, where the passion for music seemed first to have taken decided possession of his soul; there he obtained a Cremona violin, to which he became ardently attached; this instrument lasted through all his wanderings and strange vicissitudes, until its accidental destruction by the carelessness of a musician of the Drury Lane Orchestra.

For long, long years this violin and maestro were inseparable friends, being together day and night, in the western wilds of America, and in the crowded cities of both Hemispheres. Father Heinrich has crossed and re-crossed the Atlantic many times; his biographer tells us, that he sailed from Lisbon for this country, in 1805, and that it was when he was Director of music, at the Southwark theatre of Philadelphia, he received the sad news of the failure of his banking house and its branches. He soon left Philadelphia for Pittsburg, crossing the Alleghanies on foot, and finally settled in a log cabin in Bardstown, Kentucky, where he began writing music; he was about this period about thirty years old, and he attributes some of his best compositions, to his study of Nature in those then solitary wilds. The log-hut is still most carefully preserved, and is pointed out to all visitors, with great interest, by the family of the late Postmaster General, in whose garden it now stands.

Having satisfactorily overcome the shock of his loss and his necessary change of position in the financial world, Mr. Heinrich proceeded to London, where he remained five or six years, officiating among the leading violinists of the orchestras of Drury Lane and Covent Garden, and publishing many of his compositions, which made him widely known in that metropolis.

Subsequently he returned to America, dividing his time between this city, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore, in the prosecution of his profession, sometimes leading, at others performing in the Orchestras.

Father Heinrich has composed over one hundred works, comprising Oratorios, Symphonies, Overtures, concerted pieces and songs, many of which are distinguished for great originality, varied expression, patriotic sentiment, as well as for the curiously constructed stories which adorn their title pages.

There are many who remember his mammoth concerts given here in years gone by, which drew together the musical profession, from the principal cities of the Union, and enlisted public interest.

In 1857, Mr. Heinrich made his last trip to Europe, he then had the happiness to hear some of his best works, performed by the societies of Prague and Vienna. In 1860 he returned to his adopted country (the United States), and till the present time has quietly lived in this city, where this octogenarian and probably the oldest musician living, is now fast fading away. His life has been one of the most varied conditions, begun in opulence, with hosts of friends to cheer him and partake of his rare hospitality, full of youth, vigor and hope, now the picture has changed, and he truly needs the sympathy and respect of the world.

TROVATOR.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

A New Instrument.

IMPORTANT TO ORGANISTS AND COMPOSERS.

UNITED STATES HOTEL, Lake George, N. Y., }
APRIL 8, 1861. }

Mr. Editor:—Some time ago, I was in quest of a Pedal-Pianoforte suitable for organ practice; and was advised to import one. The instrument was delivered to me last autumn, in perfect order, having been cleverly packed in an air-tight box, inlaid with zinc. It is in the cabinet or boudoir form, has seven octaves in the manual, and over two octaves of pedals. To each key of the fingerboard, there are three strings; excepting in the extreme base octave, which has two. To the pedals, there are three, two and one strings respectively according to a judicious distribution of tone. The pedal strings, which are in rear, extend lengthwise with the piano, and of course are tuned in unison with those of the manual. The entire action is perfect, the pedals responding at once to the touch; and when the lids are raised before and behind, the tones are nearly as powerful and as clear, as are those of the largest grand action pianoforte. For chamber music, it is sufficiently loud with the lids closed. The pedals may be easily detached, but in order to play them, the piano has a regular organ-bench, that spans them, and that extends as far as the key-board. This is so constructed that it may be taken to pieces, and packed alongside of the piano if necessary for transportation. The case has a rose-wood veneering, and prevents the appearance of an ordinary Boudoir Piano, except that it is a little deeper. It is of great beauty, and would be an ornament to any salon; actually occupying less space than a common piano, being easier tuned, from the position of the sound boards, as well as more readily removed upon occasion. It is in fact two in one, a foot and a hand piano; the two separate actions being placed in the closest possible juxtaposition. With this, an organist can execute a fugue of Bach or Handel with the same facility, as upon a first-class organ, and thoroughly prepare himself for the choir, or the concert-room.

Yours truly,

H.

P. S. The following are the proximate dimensions:

	Feet.	Inches.
Height.....	5
Depth, (exclusive of key-board) . . .	1	8½
Width.....	4	4½

Pedals 2 octaves, key-board, 7 octaves. Price in Berlin, 375 Prussian Thalers, (reckon about 75 cents to a Thaler).

These instruments called "PIANINO-PEDALS," are manufactured by Julius Hellmünd 40 Potsdamer Strausse Berlin, at the above price and will be sent to any desired address in the United States.

(Pianos with pedals are now made in Boston, one was exhibited at the late Mechanic's Fair.)

NEW YORK, APRIL 16th.—Mr. Satter's Sixth and last matinée, which took place last Friday, was very poorly attended. The programme was not quite as interesting as usual, as, for the first time in any of these matinées three out of the six pieces played were not new. These were the overture to Tannhäuser, Liszt's arrangement of Sextuor from Lucia, and Mr. Satter's fantasie on Don Pasquale. Besides these, Mr. Satter gave us the waltz in A flat by Chopin, and two entire novelties in the shape of Prelude and Fugue (No. 5, in G) by Rubinstein, and Variations on a theme of Schumann, by Brahms. Both were exceedingly difficult, and most original. The first was peculiar in respect to the subjects of the fugue being much more melodious than is generally the case and which had a very fine effect. The latter was totally different from any other variations, and sometimes rather far-fetched both in rhyme and harmony. Mr. Satter played both pieces splendidly.

Next Saturday we have the Philharmonic, the last of the season, and on Thursday the third of the Arion concerts. Gottschalk announces a series of concerts in conjunction with Carlotta Patti and minor stars are constantly appearing only to vanish again forever.

When one considers how little is made by most of these concerts, which are, indeed, more frequent by losing affairs, it is surprising that musicians can still venture upon such undertakings. However, we music lovers are all the more obliged to them.

— t —

New Publications.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW for February, 1861. L. Scott & Co. From Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co.

BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE, for March, (L. Scott & Co., American Reprint) is published with the following table of contents.

The Indian Civil service, its Rise and Fall, Part 2; The Physical Geography of the Sea; Lee's History of the Church of Scotland; Iron-Clad Ships of War and British Defences; Norman Sinclair an Autobiography, Part 14; Recent Natural History Books; Wilson's German Campaign of 1813; The China War of 1860.

Price $3, a year; Price for four Reviews, $8 a year; "Blackwood" and the four Reviews, $10.

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY BIBLE. Parts 27 and 28.

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY. Part 24.

These excellent popular works continue to appear with their customary punctuality. The present numbers have copious indexes and tables of contents that greatly increase the value of the works. The illustrations are abundant and up to their usual standard of excellence.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE MUSIC TO MACBETH.—It is about time there should be new music written to Shakespear's "Macbeth." The music now allied with it and which has become hallowed by long use, was no doubt considered proper and attractive by the good people who first heard it, a long time ago, but to our modern ears it utterly fails to convey the idea of anything that has any connection with what happens on the stage. This operatic part of the performance of "Macbeth," in which girls of the chorus are made to sing dry solos to a fugued accompaniment, of a generally inefficient orchestra, inwardly trembling all the time lest they or the orchestra should lose the thin thread of melody, until the chorus chimes in with a strain which would be just as appropriate at any old English merry-making, and winds up with an echo behind the scenes, to catch the applause of the galleries, is to musical persons very annoying, to say the least. A song is a very good thing in the right place, but a sad bore in an improper one. Good actors may be, and are very often, poor singers. If we are to have music, let it be melo-dramatic. Why does not somebody try to reform this evil?

B.

THE BOSTON MOZART CLUB, (Amateur), gave its third social Orchestral Entertainment to the Associate and Honorary Members, on Monday evening, last at Mercantile Hall. The following was the Programme.

PART I.

First Symphony in F Minor..... Kalliwoda
Adagio; Allegro—Andante—Minuetto and Trio—Finale, Allegro con brio.

PART II.

1. Overture, "Don Giovanni"..... Mozart
2. Concert Waltz, "Windsor Klage"..... Strauss
3. Andante and Minuet..... Beethoven
From First Symphony in G. major.
4. "Song." For Horn and Cornet obligato; arranged by..... Suck
5. Lily Polka..... By a member of the Club
6. Overture, "Nozze di Figaro"..... Mozart

THE ORCHESTRAL UNION gave its eighth afternoon concert on Wednesday, April 17, at the Music Hall, which was well filled in spite of the stirring scenes going on in the streets. The following was their programme:

1. Overture, "Martha".....Flotow
2. Symphony, No. 6, "Pastorale" (Op. 68.).....Beethoven
3. Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
4. Fantasia, (for Clarinet).....C. G. Reissiger Performed by T. Ryan.
5. Fivale, "Eine Sommernacht in Danemark".....Lumbye

DR. GUILMETTE, well known to our concert goers as an accomplished vocalist, and public singer, especially in oratorio, proposes to deliver lectures here upon the human voice. His advertisement in another column gives some particulars of his lectures, which we have no doubt will be very useful and interesting, as his experience is the double one of a professional man and of an artist.

MRS. CHARLOTTE VARIAN, whom some of our readers heard a few weeks ago at the Music Hall, at one of the afternoon concerts, announces a concert at Chickering's, for Friday next, assisted by Mr. Simpson (tenor) and Mr. E. Hoffman, pianist.

"THE MUSIC OF THE UNION."—This it is which today echoes through the city of our usually peaceful streets; to this every heart beats and every foot keeps step, while with one voice all agree to uphold the honor of the flag that floats everywhere before our eyes. The occupations and the places devoted to Art even are freely offered to the service of the Union.

The Evening Transcript tells us that "the free use of the Music Hall has been offered by the Directors to the Commonwealth as a dormitory and place of rendezvous for the troops during their temporary stay in this city. The provisions made for their comfort and accommodation by the city were of so ample a nature, that the offer was courteously declined by the Governor, who remarked that he should regret, except in case of extreme urgency thus to disturb or disarrange that building."

ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY.—Our readers will notice the advertisement of the Concert of this Society this evening and of the repetition of the Bards on next Saturday.

TO MAKE A LIBRETTO.—The modern poet should completely abstain from reading the ancient writers, for this reason that the ancient never read the moderns. Before entering upon his task he will take an exact note of the quantity and quality of the scenes which the manager is desirous of introducing into his drama. He will compose his poem verse by verse, without giving himself any trouble as to the action, in order that it may be impossible for the spectator to comprehend the plot, and that curiosity may thus be kept alive to the end of the piece. By the way, he will not forget to close the piece with a brilliant and magnificent scene, terminating with a good chorus in honor of the sun, the moon, or manager. He will have recourse as frequently as possible to the dagger, to poison, to earthquakes, spectres, and incantations. All these expedients are admirable; they cost but little, and produce a prodigious effect on the public.

Never bore people with ugly music merely because it is the work of some favorite composer; and do not let the pieces you perform before people not professedly scientific, be too long.—Grove's Musical Lacon.

MUSIC.—CHARLES READE, in a noble defence of Music, says: "Music was the nursing mother of Poetry, the highest of all arts. The verse did not create itself; it arose in all its primitive forms out of musical division. For centuries after its birth, Poetry could not walk alone, either in the East or in the West. Those incomparable lyrics which are called the 'Psalms of David,' where description and moral teaching, piety and nature, earth and heaven, blend so sweetly, were songs, composed in happy moments of musical as well as poetic heart, by David and many other harpers; and but for music, these gems of poetry and praise had never embellished language. And it is not too much to say, that here alone, where Poetry and Music meet, is the spirit of the Old Testament as manifestly and constantly Divine as that of the New. Many forgotten harpers sang before Homer, and to their divisions we owe the majestic Hexameter. Homer, like his own Achilles, was a harper.

"The Iliad was sung or chanted, and where the same words are repeated, there was a sort of refrain with a more marked melody. But for Music, then, the greatest Poem would never have been created; but for Music again might well have slipped off the memory of the hearers.

Poetry came West at Music's apron string. The Arabs who brought it into Europe were songsters. The Spanish troubadours who caught it from them were songsters; so were the French trouvères, who had it from them; so the Dutch minstrels, and the Irish and Welsh bards.

For centuries Poetry could not walk alone nor please by its own rhythm. And even that rhythm it owes to primæval Music.

This is but a small part of the debt mankind owe to this art, now outlawed by a caprice of demi-civilization. That debt is hundreds and thousands of years older than any claim Painting can put in to our gratitude. Why pick our old benefactor out from among a hundred pettier arts, to outlaw her? Her modern feats, are they so very contemptible? The brilliant operas, the mighty oratorios, the learned quintets, the profound symphonies, the pious masses and anthems, where the boy's sweet, mellow voices rise so young and pure above the pealing organ, and waft the same to Heaven; the thrilling songs that nations take to heart, and love, and sing, and feel for centuries; are all these trash?

Music is an universal language. Unlike the writers, the composer's text can be printed or played by all the human race, pure as it came from the master's mind. God has given the lovely art this world-wide advantage over the writers, to compensate its inferiorities, a noble compensation. For thus Music mitigates the curse of Babel, a terrible curse to man."

LONDON—MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The concert of last night, March 19, devoted, like many others given during the present season, to the works of Beethoven, was attended most numerously, the more expensive places being occupied by company belonging to the highest classes of society. The programme included, amongst other masterpieces, Beethoven's great pianoforte sonata in A major, Op. 101, played on this occasion for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts by Miss Arabella Goddard, who, judging by her performance of this and other sonatas of Beethoven's so-called "third period" (need we remind our readers of her triumphant successes with the 106, 109, and 111?) seems to have discovered the clue which can alone direct the executant through the new world of sound which the mighty Ton-Dichter created, and to have penetrated the interest of these golden mists, "dark from excessive light," which enshroud, like a sunny haze, the inspirations of the poet "hidden in the light of thought." For Miss Arabella Goddard, Beethoven, the most inventive and imaginative of musicians, has no secrets. She knows him by heart; and, what is more, can put her heart into her fingers, and thus render him intelligible and delightful even to the ears of a mixed audience, such as that of the Monday Popular Concerts, which (such is the gradation of the admittance fees) included nearly every class of the community. Never did the great English pianist, who so chivalrously plays superb works in public which no other pianist can, or at any rate does attempt to, except perhaps for the delectation of the "select few" who may patronise a quasi private chamber-concert—never did the "reine et le roi aussi" of the most fashionable instruments distinguish herself more honorably than on this occasion. The exquisitely beautiful love-song with which the sonata commences, the vigorous march movement so utterly unlike any other march composed before or since, and the sterlingly brilliant finale, with its charmingly capricious humor and fugue, ingeniously wrought as it is difficult to execute, were one and all played to perfection. A few more such performances cannot fail to work what many consider a kind of artistic miracle—that is, to render Beethoven's sonata in A major, Op. 101, generally popular.—Morning Post

MADAM ROSA CZILLAG.—This eminent artist has arrived in London, to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. The Viennese papers speak of her last appearance at the Kärntnerthor Theatre, in Traviata, on Saturday last as a remarkable scene of public excitement and expression of regret at the departure of such a favorite. On this occasion it would appear that all "rules and regulations" were set at defiance, contrary to the laws of the Imperial Theatres, which forbid any artist "de réparation après la fin du spectacle sous quelque prétexte que ce soit, et surtout d'adresser la parole au public." (Art. XIX.) Mad. Csillag was recalled innumerable times after the opera, and in a short speech, almost inaudible from her emotion, bade farewell to an audience before whom she made her first appearance on any stage, about ten years ago, and since which her name has always been the most attractive of the artists forming the Opera Company at the Kärntnerthor Theatre.—Mus. World.

Mr. S. LASAR, has accepted the post as organist in the 14th Street Presbyterian Church in New York, (Rev. A. D. Smith, D.D. Pastor), from the 1st. of May next, a position he formerly held in the church.

CINCINNATI MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—Officers for 1860-'61:

President—R. W. Burnet, Esq.
Vice President—William F. Colburn.
Secretary—Henry J. Appleton.
Treasurer—Dr. O. D. Norton.
Librarians—James Gates, E. L. Norton.
Musical Directors—Victor Williams, Henry J. Smith.
Trustees—John Shillito, Dr. S. L. Hamlen, S. Davis, Jr., W. H. Comstock, S. N. Pike, Edmund Dexter.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—Saturday, March 16, would have been the last night of the season, but that the theatre was closed that night, peremptorily, by order of the Lord Chamberlain, in consequence of a recent bereavement in the Royal Family. That all places of public amusement should be closed on certain occasions, where the feelings of the highest personage of the realm are deeply involved, we think can hardly be gainsaid: nevertheless, we think the hardship involved so great, the grievance so universal that Government should be called upon to make some compensation. On Saturday night so great was the demand for tickets at the two English Opera houses, that many could not be supplied. Here was a wind-fall for the managers after a season characterized by no brilliant success. But at the eleventh hour comes the authoritative firman—the theatre is shut up—the public is disappointed—the managers lose hundreds—the servants of the establishment are mulcted of a day's pay (how little some are able to afford it, need we aver)—and no one person benefitted thereby. This is the way to go in mourning indeed; but we cannot help feeling it would be more agreeable to reason and good policy to allow everybody to purchase his own crape and wear it after his own fashion. It certainly was most unfortunate, as far as the two theatres were concerned, that the royal death should have occurred the day it did. The managers, however, had nothing to do but to bear it and make no sign.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The order which prohibited the opening of the theatres in London on Saturday se'night, in consequence of the death of the Duchess of Kent, did not extend to the Palace at Norwood, for the Saturday concert took place as usual. The feature of the programme was a pianoforte concert by Mr. Henry Baumer, a King's Scholar of the Royal Academy, a selection from an oratorio of whom occasionally is performed at the Crystal Palace orchestral concerts. A composer naturally takes all possible pains with the performance of his own work but the firm, clear, and decided pianoforte playing of Mr. Baumer should not be passed over without a word of acknowledgement. The pièce de resistance of the concert was Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor. With many gleams of the poetic beauty which is never totally absent in Schumann, the fourth symphony is less satisfactory than the first—in B flat—which Mendelssohn is said to have highly esteemed, and the performance of which he once conducted. Mendelssohn's glorious violin concerto was played in masterly style by M. Sainton, whose unaffected expression—untainted as it is by the slightest tinge of exaggeration—makes us listen to his performance with a pleasure more completely unalloyed than that excited by many more celebrated virtuosi. M. Sainton also played his own Rigoletto fantasia, which is always well received, because the charming melodies are allowed to tell their tale in all their original simplicity. The fresh voice of Miss Emily Spiller, a débutante, gained her an encore in Schloesser's "Queen of the Sea;" and she also sang the scena, "Ah! forse è lui." Madame Sainton-Dolby showed such good taste in selecting Haydn's lovely "Spirit-song," that we were surprised at her choosing "The skipper and his boy," the absurdity of which even fine singing can never conceal. The orchestra, under Mr. Mann's direction, performed with great care, although want of sufficient rehearsal was at times perceptible. The number of visitors amounted to 2,966.

Paris.

TANNHAUSER.—"A second trial has come off, far from being more successful than the first. On the contrary, the public disapprobation was manifested with increased energy, and we do not recollect such another evening in the arena, ordinary so calm and serene, of our Grand Opera. We coveted a decisive judgment, and begged the judges to preserve a grave demeanor; but advice of this kind is easier to give than take. True that we can manage to dispense with hissing; but to avoid laughing is another affair; and, on the very first night, we involuntarily yielded more than once to the feeling which had irresistibly laid hold of the entire audience. On the second night precautions had been taken to guard against such inconvenient manifestations. The oboe solo after the 'Herdsman's song,' the redoubtable trait de violons, the pack of hounds, at the end of Act I., and the re-appearance of Venus in the third were one, and all suppressed. Curtailments, too, had been effected in various places, and the rose ganze curtain (so decorously shutting out a logical but undramatic contingency) sent back to the property-room. But, alas! nothing could save Tannhäuser. This time there was less laughter, perhaps, but a great deal more hissing; and for a plain reason—the applauders (claque?) being numerous, the vigor of the disapprobation was regulated by that of the approval.

We have been assured, nevertheless, that Richard Wagner continues obstinate, attributes the check he has received in Paris to a cabal organized against him by his enemies. In his double capacity of poet and composer, the author of Tannhäuser, is, doubtless, furnished with a double dose of pride, and should, therefore, perhaps be accorded a double amount of indulgence. This last we willingly extend—nay, we can even pity him, for we know of nothing more sad and hopeless than the fatality, too common now-a-days, which induces authors to contemplate and admire themselves in their works, and to pronounce in a tone of sovereign authority, without the slightest deference to public opinion, that those works are good. Et vidit quod esset bonum.

The second performance of Tannhäuser merely served to bring out in still bolder relief the talent and courage of the singers, who had to answer in person for the sins of the composer. The tenor, M. Niemann, especially distinguished himself in this painful struggle, and the audience took care to make him understand his reputation was not at stake. Mads. Tedesco and Marie Sax, MM. Morelli, Cazeaux, Coulon, and the rest, equally deserved protection from the storm of disapprobation, which even the august presence of their majesties, the emperor and empress, was powerless to allay.—Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris, March 24.

On Sunday the Tannhäuser was played for the third and last time. The theatre was crowded, the receipts reaching 10,000 francs. The performance was the stormiest of all. Never was there such an uproar in the Opera House. The spectators were provided with whistles, and the whistling was heard in cadences and roudades. Wagner is certainly the first composer ever hissed by the aristocratic public of the Grand Opera. The proscenium box, situated above the Emperor's was filled with hissing in straw-colored kids. The few partisans of Wagner and his music tried to defend him. In the midst of the tumult I heard the cry "Hiss, but hear." They hissed but it was impossible to hear. The storm raged not only in the theatre, but the foyer was also excited; the hubbub resembled the roar of the sea, or the clamor of the Bourse on a settling day. Nevertheless the opera, betrayed by its own interpreters, was carried on to the end.

A burlesque of the Tannhäuser, called "Ya Mein-herr," by MM. Delacour and Lambert-Thiboust, is about to be produced at the Varieties Theatre.

At the close of the third performance of Tannhäuser, Mr. Wagner wrote the following letter to the Director of the Opera:

"Sir—The opposition that is shown to the Tannhäuser proves to me how right you were when, at the beginning of this business, you made some remarks about the absence of the ballet and other scenic conventionalities, to which the subscribers of the Opera are accustomed. I regret that the nature of my work has prevented me from conforming to those exigencies. Now that the violence of the opposition does not even allow those who wish to hear it to give the attention necessary to appreciate it, I have no other honorable course to take than to withdraw it. I beg you to make known this decision to his excellency the Minister of State. Very respectfully,

RICHARD WAGNER.

"Paris, March 25, 1861." —Phil. Bulletin.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

O give me back my childhood's dreams. Ballad. S. Glover. 25

A pretty song, more especially recommended to young singers.

Weep not fond heart. Song. Kücken. 25

This new song of the popular German composer is a real gem. Everybody who recalls the deeply touching strains of his "Good night, farewell" or "The Jewish maiden" will know what he has to expect. Written for a Mezzo Soprano or Baritone voice.

Come ferry me o'er. Mrs. Groom. 25

Companion to a noted song of the same authoress, "Over the sea, a Jacobite song."

Flores mariani, a collection of Catholic music, by Wiesel, complete. 1,00

Ave Maria. Trio for female voices. 50

O vos omnes. Motet for mixed voices. 25

Sub tuum praesidium. Quartet. 50

These pieces make capital offertories. Organists will find them of great practical usefulness as well as sterling compositions, which will wear well with singers and hearers.

Matin Song. Heurion. 25

A popular French song, with the original words added. A pleasing effect in imitation of bells is introduced in the accompaniment.

Instrumental Music.

Un ballo in maschera. F. Beyer. 25

A fascinating arrangement for young players, containing most of the gems, recognized as such here. It makes a good piece for instruction, also, as the melodies are easily caught up by the ear, and thus make study easy.

Dixie's Land. Arranged for a Brass Band. D. C. Hall. 1,00

Bands who are not yet in the possession of a good arrangement of this familiar air should at once get a copy. It is conveniently printed on stiff cards and suits any number of instruments from 8 to 14.

Ne plus Ultra Polka Quadrille. J. S. Knight. 35

The Polka Quadrille has of late become so fashionable that the very few which are printed with figures do not satisfy the demand. Both music and figures of this Quadrille have the unqualified endorsement of a number of "belles and beaux" in this metropolis, who have often tried it and found it really ne plus ultra.

Books.

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE VIOLIN. 50

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE GUITAR. 50

These volumes are the first of a new series of attractive low priced books of instruction and music; for all kinds of musical instruments. They are exceedingly neat in typography, the types being clear and distinct and the paper and printing unexceptionable. The contents are of a popular kind, comprising excellent Instructions, and a very choice collection of the best music of the day.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 473.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 4.

The Great Bell Roland.

[Motley relates that the famous bell Roland of Ghent was an object of great affection to the people, because it always rang to arm them when liberty was in danger.—N. Y. Evening Post.]

BY THEODORE TILTON.

I.

Toll! Roland, toll!

—High in St. Bavon's tower
At midnight hour
The great bell Roland spoke:
And all who slept in Ghent awoke:
—What meant its iron stroke?
Why caught each man his blade?
Why the hot haste he made?
Why echoed every street
With tramp of thronging feet—
All flying to the city's walls?
It was the call
Known well to all
That Freedom stood in peril of some foe:
And even timid hearts grew bold
Whenever Roland toll'd,
And every hand a sword could hold:—
For men
Were patriots then,
Three hundred years ago!

II.

Toll! Roland, toll!

Bell never yet was hung
Between whose lips there swung
So true and brave a tongue!
—If men be patriots still,
At thy first sound
True hearts will bound,
Great souls will thrill—
Then toll! and wake the test
In each man's breast,
And let him stand confess'd!

III!

Toll! Roland, toll!

—Not in St. Bavon's tower
At midnight hour—
Nor by the Scheldt, nor far off Zuyder Zee,
But here—this side the sea!—
And here in broad bright day!
Toll! Roland, toll!
For not by night awaits
A brave foe at the gates,
But treason stalks abroad—inside!—at noon!
Toll! Thy alarm is not too soon!
To Arms! Ring out the Leader's call!
Re-echo it from East to West
Till every dauntless breast
Swell beneath plume and crest!
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till swords from seabards leap!
Toll! Roland, toll!
—What tears can widows weep
Less bitter than when brave men fall?
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till cottager from cottage wall
Snatch pouch and powder-horn and gun—
The heritage of sire to son
Ere half of Freedom's work was done!
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till son, in memory of his sire,
Once more shall load and fire!
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till volunteers find out the art
Of aiming at a traitor's heart!

IV.

Toll! Roland, toll!
—St. Bavon's stately tower
Stands to this hour,—
And by its side stands Freedom yet in Ghent
For when the bells now ring,
Men shout "God save the King"
Until the air is rent!
—Amen!—So let it be:
For a true King is he
Who keeps his people free.
Toll! Roland, toll!
This side the sea!
No longer they but we
Have now such need of thee!
Toll! Roland, toll!
And let thy iron throat
Ring out its warning note
Till Freedom's perils be outbraved,
And Freedom's flag, wherever waves,
Shall overshadow none enslaved!
Toll! till from either ocean's strand
Brave men shall grasp each other's hand
And shout, "God save our native land!"
—And love the land which God hath saved!
Toll! Roland, toll!

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

XIV.

COMIC OPERA.

1800—1830.

We have before remarked that literature and the fine arts always reflect the general ideas current at any given point of time in the civilization of a people. We find a new proof of this remark in the rapid notice which we are to give in this paper of the lives and musical characteristics of the six composers, Dalayrac, Mehul, Berton, Catel, Nicolo and Boieldieu.

Dalayrac was born at Muret, in Languedoc, June 13, 1753. From his infancy, a taste, amounting to a passion, drew him to music in spite of of his father, who intended him for the bar. The young composer, preferring art to the Digests, used to spend his evenings in the garret of the house where he could practise the violin without being heard. Some nuns in the next house discovered his secret, and the persevering artist was allowed to follow the bent of his nature. He was sent to Paris in 1774 to enter the guards of the Count d'Artois, where he immediately placed himself under the instruction of Langlé, a pupil of Caffaro, who gave him lessons in harmony. His first publications were some stringed quartets under an assumed name. In 1781 he produced two comic operas which were performed with success at court, Le Petit souper and le Chevalier à la mode. Encouraged by these fortunate attempts he made his first appearance at the Opera Comique in 1782 with his Eclipse totale. Within thirty years from that time he had composed, almost always with success, fifty operas, of which the more known are Nina (1786), Azémia, Raoul de Créqui, les Deux petits Savoyards, Vert-Vert, Camille enle Souterrain, Romeo et Juliette, Gulnare, Alexis, Adolphe et Clara, Maison à Vendre (1800), Picaros et Diego, Une heure de Mariage, Gulistan and le Poete et le Musicien, (1811).

The music of Dalayrac is graceful, flowing and easy. It contains a great number of pleasing romances and airs which have become popular. His orchestration is simple and never overpowers the voice. His score to Camille is of high dramatic color; his Nina is full of sentiment and interest; in short, all his works exhibit happy inspirations. The talents of Dalayrac were ennobled by his personal character. In 1790, when a failure had deprived him of the fruits of his industry and economy, he annulled the will of his father, which had benefited him at the expense of his brother, a cadet. He was made one of the Legion of Honor at the institution of the order; and died at Paris, Nov. 27, 1809, just as he finished putting his last work upon the stage. His life has been written by Piérxécourt. A pamphlet printed in 1791, entitled "Reponse à MM. les directeurs de spectacles," which argued against certain of their decrees in 1789, was from Dalayrac's pen.

If this composer was a representative of the elegance of the old regime, Méhul, on the contrary, paints well the republican epoch and the first empire.

Mehul was born at Givet (Ardenne), June 24, 1763, the son of a cook, who was hardly able to pay the expense of the boy's education. At first his only instruction in music was from a poor, old, blind organist; but his progress was such that the organ of the church of the Recollets, at Givet, was entrusted to him at the age of ten years. Two years later the boy was introduced to Hanser, the celebrated organist of the abbey de Lavaldieu, who took him as his pupil. The Abbot put him upon the footing of a novice, and he repaid this kindness afterward by two years' service as assistant organist. Mehul seemed now upon the point of passing his life in a cloister, when the colonel of a regiment, foreseeing the destiny of the precocious youth took him to Paris at the age of sixteen and confided him to the skillful instruction of Edelmann. In 1781 two works, sonatas, by Mehul, were published by Lachevardière; these productions only show that the genius of their composer had found its true path. Adding the dramatic style to the instrumental, and profiting by the counsels of the illustrious Gluck, Mehul became one more great master of the French school. At the concert spirituel in 1782, he brought out an ode dedicated to J. B. Rousseau, and then wrote three operas under the direction of Gluck, Psyche, Anacreon and Lausus et Lydie. Next came Alonzo et Cora which was accepted at the opera, but was withheld from the stage six years. Irritated but not discouraged by this injustice, he turned his attention to the Opera Comique, and composed the drama Euphrosine et Coradin, which was performed in 1790. This work exhibits the talents of its author in their full maturity. Noble vocal parts, instrumentation much more brilliant and powerful than had been heard in France up to this time, a true feeling for the demands of the stage and great vigor of expression in the painting of strong situations, these were the qualities, which he showed in this, which may be considered as his first great opera. Then came Cora, followed by Stratonice, in which the air "Versez tous vos chagrins" gained great applause, and a quartet, the admiration of artists. The overture of the Jeune Henri aroused enthusiasm and the Irato gained deserved success; Uthal was too monotonous in color. But it was in his Joseph, that the author displayed all the grandeur of his style, the copiousness of his melody and his truth of sublime expression. Joseph is a biblical poem, a sort of oratorio, which gained much by being produced at the opera. La Journée aux Aventures was the last work of Mehul. His health was gradually undermined by an affection of the chest, and he died Oct. 18, 1817, aged fifty-four years.

Berton, son of a distinguished composer, was born at Paris, Sept. 17, 1797, four years after the birth of Mehul. He began the study of music at the age of ten and at fifteen entered the orchestra of the grand opera as violinist. He studied composition first with Rey, then with Sacchini, who gave his pupil, so happily endowed by nature, excellent advice upon the disposition of melodic ideas, upon modulation and the management of dramatic scenes. Drawn to the theatre by an irresistible impulse, Berton took the Frascatana of Paesiello as his model. He procured the text of an opera entitled La Dame invisible, and set it to music. Sacchini, finding in it marks of real talent, wanted the young author to come daily and work at his house. In 1786 Berton produced oratorios and cantatas at the concerts spirituelles and the following year gave at the Italian comedy les Promesses de Mariage, his first opera publicly given, and one which was favorably received. In les Rigueurs de Cloître, text by Fiévée, Berton began to exhibit his own peculiar style. Ponce de Leon, Montano et Stephanie, and le Délire are the works in which the characteristics of his simple, expressive, touching style are best seen. In 1795 he was appointed professor of harmony in the conservatory at Paris. He was director of the music of the opera buffa from 1807 to 1809, during which time he brought out Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, that masterpiece which developed the taste of the French for truly beautiful music. Leaving the Italian Opera he was appointed vocal director at the Grand Opera, under Picard. In June, 1815, the number of the members of the musical section of the Institute being increased from three to six, Berton, Catel and Cherubini were joined by Gossec, Monaigny and Mehul. Soon after the king Louis XVIII. made him chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and at the new re-organization of the conservatory Berton obtained the chair of high composition and was placed upon the examining committee.

An instinctive perception of stage effect is a predominating quality in the style of Berton; but we find in him also a certain originality of melody, harmony, modulation and instrumentation. Montano et Stephanie may probably be distinguished as the masterpiece of this composer, not denying however the great merits of Aline reine de Golconde and les Maris Garçons. A complete list of his works may be found in Fétis "Biographie." We will only add that beside his fifty scores, we owe to him a Traité d'harmonie, 4 vols. 4to, and a pamphlet, Epître à Boieldieu, upon music mechanical and philosophical.

Among the serious artists whom a too frivolous generation will be disposed to let fall into undeserved oblivion must be named Catel. He was born at Laigle in June, 1773, and came very young to Paris to perfect himself for his musical career. Sacchini caused him to enter the royal school of singing and declamation, founded in 1783, by Papillon de la Ferté, the director of the Menus-Plaisirs. There Catel studied the piano-forte under Gobert, and was initiated into the principles of harmony and composition by Gossec. He was appointed professor in the school in 1787, accompanist at the opera from 1790 to 1802, and at the organization of the conservatory, Sarrette named him professor of harmony. Being appointed to prepare the Traité d'harmonie for the school, he, at a meeting of the professors, presented a work which still forms the basis of solid instruction in the science. In 1810 he was joined to Gossec, Mehul and Cherubini as inspector of the conservatory, but resigned the place in 1814. From that time he accepted nothing but his nomination to the Institute in 1815, and the cross of the legion of honor, which was conferred upon him in 1824, without solicitation on his part.

His opera, Semiramis, brought out in 1802, had not the success which its merit deserved. The general impression was, it was "too learned." Be that as it may, l'Auberge de Bagnères and les Artistes par occasion were successful at the Opera Comique in 1807. Les Aubergistes de qualité, a composition rather cold, but the melodies of which are exquisite in taste, appeared in 1812. Le Premier en date, and the Siege de Mezières were followed by Wallace in 1817, which must be held worthy of honor as Catel's masterpiece. We find in this work a very powerful dramatic sentiment and a local color perfectly appropriate to the subject. Notwithstanding his successes Catel became disgusted with the theatre. His operas upon the whole obtaining neither popular ovations nor productive receipts, he ceased to write, seeking in the encouragement of young artists and in the delights of a peaceful life, a pure and noble compensation for triumphs, which he could not gain upon the stage. The collection of musical pieces for national festivities contains much from Catel's pen: he wrote also chamber music and in 1815 published a second edition of the excellent solfeggio exercises of the Conservatory. To an understanding, most just and fine, he added a character of the severest probity and all the qualities of a pure soul. His gratitude to his early protector never faltered; his kindness to young musicians knew no limits.

That which above all gives the breath of life to dramatic music is melodic idea and scenic sentiment; these qualities will cause the works of Nicolo and Boieldieu to live.

Nicolo Isouard, son of a French father, was born at Malta in 1775. He came early to Paris to enter the navy, but afterwards accepted a situation at Malta as clerk in a banking house; but he already felt his vocation to be music and dreamed of dramatic successes. An old teacher of counterpoint, Michael Angelo Vella, took a liking for him and instructed him in the elements of harmony. Azzopardi, chapel-master to the Knights of Malta, put him afterwards to the study of fugue in the old healthy Italian method. His father, however, now sent him to Palermo to forget his music in the dull routine of a counting house. But spite of his numerous duties, Isouard continued his studies under the direction of Amendola, who formed his taste by causing him to play the accompaniments of the last works of Leo, Durante and Clari. At a later date being employed by some German bankers at Naples he finished his pupillage in the study of composition with Sala and Guilielmi. From this time, in opposition to the wishes of his family, he abandoned commerce to devote himself entirely to the cultivation of music.

Coming to Florence he wrote there his first opera, Avviso ai Maritati, and soon after brought out at Leghorn Artaserse, which had deserved success. De Rohan Grand Master of the Maltese order, now called him home in capacity of organist, and afterwards appointed him chapel-master. Upon the arrival of the French at Malta and the suppression of the order, Nicolo employed his leisure in the composition of operas, some of them translations from the French, others original Italian texts, for the theatre of the place. After the capitulation Gen. Vaubois took him to Paris as his secretary. There Nicolo met Rudolph Kreutzer, who like a devoted friend aided him with his purse and influence in smoothing the path to success.

Le Tonnelier (1799) was Nicolo's first opera produced at Paris. This essay was followed by La Statue, Baiser et la Quittance and the Petit Page. Thus far the talents of the young composer excited no great attention; but Michel Ange, (1802) les Confidences, le Medecin Turc, Leonce ou le Fils adoptif, and above all l'Intrigue aux fenêtres (1805) placed him among the favorite composers of the public. Between 1805 and 1811 he added fourteen operas to this list—the best known of which is les Rendezvous bourgeois (in 1 act, 1807). His chosen co-laborers were Hoffmann and Etienne. Upon Boieldieu's return to Paris, Nicolo added breadth and grandeur to his style, and composed Cendrillon, Joconde, and Jeannot et Colin (1814) works which remain in the repertory of the Opera Comique, as types and models of sentiment, freshness, naiveté and melody. Nicolo died at Paris, March 23, 1818 in his forty-third year, leaving his Aladin ou la Lampe merveilleuse unfinished.

Nature's Piano.

HOW MUSICAL SOUNDS COME FROM FOSSILS—THE "LITHOPHONE."

(Correspondence of the Evening Post.)

PARIS, MARCH 20, 1861.

Though the greatest of poets has declared that there are "sermons in stones," the most learned of geologists have failed to discover that there is music in fossils; a discovery which has nevertheless been made by an amateur brother of the craft, Monsieur Bords, an ingenious Frenchman, equally addicted to rhyming, music-making, sketching and geologising, the happy possessor of an hereditary estate in the Perigord, a patrimony which rejoices at once in the euphonious and suggestive designation of "Le Petit Paradis" for the richness and variety of the fossils found within its borders.

That the owner of even a "little" paradise should be the first to reveal to the ears of later ages the mysterious harmonies that have lain dormant ever since the flood might almost be anticipated as the result of a preëxistent fitness in the nature and relationship of things; at all events, this gentleman, after twelve years of incessant tapping and hammering on tens of thousands of "specimens" dug up by his people all over his estate, has at length succeeded in obtaining eighteen sonorous fossils, which, when struck with a piece of stone, give out a clear, defined musical sound, in quality much resembling the tones of musical glasses, and constituting, to the extent of these eighteen "keys," a complete and perfect musical gamut of tones and semitones, following each other in regular order, and forming a sort of fossil piano. This instrument, unique in its way, has been brought to Paris by its maker, who is exhibiting it for the edification of the curious, under the name of "the lithophone, or natural piano." The Academy of Sciences has named a commission to report upon this original instrument, and upon the many other curious fossils found by M. Bordas in his own grounds, and brought by him to Paris.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE LITHOPHONE.

The lithophone consists of a rough plank, about five feet long and six inches broad, placed in a rustic frame composed of moss-covered twigs; straight ones, roughly nailed together, forming the bottom of this frame; others, bent into semi-circles and nailed upon these, forming the sides. In this frame—which is supported by rustic legs and looks very much like a rude magnified jardiniere—lies the afore-mentioned plank, and upon this plank are placed the fossils which constitute the keys of the lithophone. The fossils are not fastened down in any way, but are merely laid on the plank side by side, one after the other. The progression of the tones is the same as in the piano; the deepest being to the left of the performer, and the scale ascending, in tones and semitones, to his right. The fossils on which he performs by striking them with the pieces of stone he holds in each hand, are of various shapes and sizes; differences which seem, however, to have nothing to do with the differences of the tones they emit on being struck.

ITS NOTES.

The first and deepest key is fossil No. 1. It is a queer, thin, spreading three-cornered piece of the root of a tree, which presents the appearance of having been sawn across in its wooden days; it is warped or bent, like the top of an overgrown mushroom, and each of its two principal ends gives out a distinct note, forming together a perfect fifth. Between the two notes furnished by this fossil there is a gap which is not filled by the notes of any of the fossils; fossil No. 2 forming the note next above the highest of the two notes given out by fossil No. 1, and the sounds of the others following in the same order as the notes of a piano.

The sounds given out by these fossils, though clear sweet, loud, and as truly musical as those of any other instrument, possess a peculiar wildness and freshness of tone that impart a very original character to the music of the lithophone, and seem naturally to carry the hearer's fancies among woods, waters, winds and mountains, calling up thoughts of country scenes and sounds. Bells, peasants' dances, the songs of birds and cries of insects, seem to blend in the tones of this curious instrument with the more orthodox developments of musical expression. The pieces played by M. Bordas on his fossil piano are, for the most part, his own composition, and are really as charming as original.

ITS ORIGIN.

The idea of "forming an instrument made solely by nature" seems to have suggested itself to the amateur geologist in this wise. He had been engaged for several years in making a collection in an empty greenhouse of the fossils found on his estate, when, happening to strike one of these with a stone, he was struck by its emission of a pure musical sound, and hung it up at the door of his "museum," with a piece of stone beside it, that visitors might amuse themselves by striking it on arriving, instead of ringing the bell. A year or two afterwards when going over a hilly part of his grounds to attend a singing meeting got up by him among the neighboring peasants, he chanced to strike his foot against what he took to be a loose stone, which rolled down the side of the ravine, striking right and left against the stones in its descent, and giving out, every time it struck against them, a musical sound as distinct as that of the deputy bell, but of a different pitch.

"When I heard that second tone," says M. Bordas, "I paused in my rapid walk towards the singing school; the idea of the lithophone presented itself to my mind. I struck my forehead with my finger thus (smiting the gesture to the word), and I cried 'Eureka!'"

But though "the idea" had presented itself fully formed in that luminous moment to the mind of the owner of Le Petit Paradis, its realization in "pure silex" has occupied the inventor for twelve years. The search after fossils was prosecuted with fresh vigor, exercising, one may infer, an unfavorable effect on the surface beauty of the Perigourin Eden and on every fossil and every bit of stone disinterred by his workmen did the indefatigable seeker bestow an interrogatory tap. But in no instance has he been able to elicit a musical sound from any species of stone; fossils only, as far as his experience goes, having this property, and in the proportion only of one to many thousands. Whenever he found a fossil possessed of sonority he carried it home forthwith and deposited it in triumph upon the plank which he had appropriated for the purpose, and which he now retains in the completed instrument as a souvenir of the hopes and fears, the despondencies and elations of the long and patient search into which he has put all the intense and concentrated enthusiasm peculiar to the votaries of hobby-horses.

CURIOUS RESULTS.

As he obtained the sonorous fossils in question he ranged them in their proper order, leaving spaces between them to be filled by future waifs, and at length had the pleasure (as he says, "the happiness") of seeing the interval between the upper and lower notes of his pet invention, really filled by the consecutive series of intermediate sound necessary to constitute a perfect musical scale. Singularly enough, in his twelve years' search, though he has found duplicates of a few of the tones in his gamut, he has never found a fossil giving a note either higher than the highest, or lower than the lowest of the fossil-piano he has succeeded in forming.

The fossils forming the keys of the lithophone have not been touched by saw or chisel, but are exactly as when taken out of the earth; nor can M. Bordas offer any explanation of the fact of their exceptional sonority.

Among the fossils he has brought to Paris are figs and other fruits still to be found in that region, with others not now known. On one curious fossil vegetable a cockle fastened itself, and has become a fossil in its turn. One of the figs shows the bite of some animal that has eaten away one side of it; proving, thinks the inventor of the "natural piano," that the immersion to which these fossils are due must have taken place in the autumn, the fig being ripe, and very suddenly, as, though ripe and partly eaten, the form of the fruit is otherwise perfect as it would not be if it had remained exposed many days to the action of the air.

Musical Societies in New York.

NEW YORK, APRIL 10, 1861.—Editor of the Transcript:—Our nation is one which is hardly yet entitled to be called "musical," although the initial steps which are to make us one have been taken, and we may expect a new era in music to dawn upon us at an early period.

We cannot yet boast of large musical societies, such as exist in England, France and other countries which sustain Conservatoires de Musique, and offer every facility to render smooth the royal road to knowledge in the "Art Divine;" but progress is the law, and the time is rapidly approaching when we shall stand on an equal footing with other nations in matters pertaining to the fine arts, as we now do in all that belongs to the practical and useful.

That this condition will ultimately be brought about, we have assurance in the many influences at work tending to such a consummation, among which may be mentioned particularly the large number of artists residing in our midst who have been educated in the schools of Europe, or are natives of those countries where wealth is lavishly expended in the encouragement of art. In order to exhibit the present condition of our people in matters relating particularly to musical art, I propose to present your readers with a sketch of the history and attainments of the leading choral societies of this city, in accordance with a promise made some weeks since.

As a general rule, our societies meet once or twice per week for practising the standard works of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, etc., as well as the more modern productions of some of our own native composers. Only those who have gone through the necessary rudimental instruction, and can read music at sight, are admitted to membership, as their design is to practice rather than instruct.

The New York Harmonic Society, established in the year 1852, was founded with a view to the promotion and encouragement of the musical interests of New York, by holding stated rehearsals for the practice of the highest class of sacred and secular music, giving public performances, and such other means as might be deemed desirable. Its first officers were Isaac M. Phyle, President; E. M. Carrington, Vice President, and Archibald Johnston, Treasurer. Mr. George F. Bristow was unanimously elected conductor, and has so continued to the present time. In 1857 it became a body politic, by the issue of its charter on April 16 of that year. The management of the affairs of the society is vested in a board of fifteen officers, subdivided into committees, of which are two standing, four tenor, and four bass. This board meets the first Tuesday in every month for the transaction of the general business of the society. The members assemble for rehearsal every Monday evening throughout the year at their rooms in Dodworth's Academy on Broadway. They have no vacation during the summer months and never miss a rehearsal of some kind, on the stated evening, under any circumstances.

Most of the productions of the great masters have become familiar to the Society, and many publicly performed, averaging four or five in the year. The "Messiah" is invariably performed by them on the evening of Christmas Day. In some instances these public appearances have been of a very interesting character; among them may be mentioned the Jenny Lind concerts, the opening of the Crystal Palace, the great Musical Congress under the direction of M. Jullien, the Atlantic Cable celebration, the Bristow Testimonial, etc. There were other performances of the Society, with Jullien and his famous orchestra, and still others of greater or less note. Its more recent productions have been the new oratorio by Geo. F. Bristow, "Praise to God," produced three times—the last at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which proved a complete success. This Oratorio, which I have already noticed at some length, is the first American production ever performed with such signal marks of approbation. As a work of art it is most excellent, an honor to the composer, a credit to his country; it suffers nothing from comparison with standard works, and will rank high as a masterpiece—criticisms from all quarters abound in panegyrics.

Among the earliest performances of the Society was the "Messiah" with Jullien's orchestra. The leading vocalists were, Miss Maria Brainerd, soprano, Madame Picc, contralto, and Signor Badiali, basso; on this occasion, Miss Brainerd made her first appearance in oratorio, and greatly distinguished herself, singing the entire soprano part, seven solos, with unanimous approbation. This performance of the "Messiah" has been considered the finest and most successful ever given here. The receipts were nearly $4,000. It was given in the Metropolitan Hall (since destroyed by fire)—the only complete and elegant concert hall New York could ever boast of.

The Society numbers 240 members. Of the male members there are two divisions, corporate and associate the former paying $10 per annum, having the sole direction of its affairs, &c., and the latter paying $4 per annum, having no voice in its management. Although the enterprise has not received the cordial support and encouragement it merits, it has, nevertheless, not only maintained its ground, but has been successful thus far, and is now in a flourishing condition. The Society owns an extensive and valuable library containing all the most celebrated oratorios, and very many of less merit; it owns, also, one of Steinway's excellent grand pianos. Its present prosperous condition may be attributed to the exertions of its indefatigable President and Treasurer, as also their Conductor, Mr. Bristow.

One feature of this Society is particularly worthy of attention. Although there is nothing in the constitution or by-laws to that effect, it is generally understood that no professional musician—excepting, of course, the conductor—shall hold office, and to this regulation it is generally conceded that the society owes, to a great degree, its success—as the proverbial chiqueism which ruins all societies is by this means avoided.

The "Mendelssohn Union"—one of our best societies—was formed in the year 1853, by a number of ladies and gentlemen who felt the necessity of an institution which should study and bring before the public works of more varied class than any then existing. The great design of those directly interested was mutual pleasure and improvement, and a desire to elevate the musical taste of its patrons.

As its name indicates, the society has bestowed the larger share of its labors to the production of the works of Mendelssohn. It was first organized with Dr. James M. Quinn as President, and the talented Messrs. H. C. Timm and George W. Morgan, as alternate pianists and conductors. Mr. Morgan has been without interruption, the conductor since its foundation, and Mr. William Bergé—the distinguished organist of St. Francis Xavier's Catholic Church in Sixteenth street—the regular pianist during the past five seasons. It only admits to membership professors, and such amateurs as are competent and correct readers of music at sight, and now numbers nearly one hundred performing members, who, with the celebrated organists and pianists, Messrs. Berge, Currie and Beal, form a company equal to the requirements of almost any of the grand works of the great composers.

A new and peculiar feature which has been added to their season performances consists of an aquatic moonlight festival and concert, for which purpose a large steamboat is chartered. The first of these, inaugurated in the summer of 1859, was so highly successful and popular, that another was undertaken last summer; and it is probable that they will be continued annually.

Its founders intended that the society should be self-supporting, through the yearly dues of its members and subscribers, without any appeal to the public by sale of tickets at concerts or otherwise. This plan was eminently successful until the fifth season, when the plan of selling tickets was adopted, which resulted unfavorably. The "Union" has since adhered to the course originally marked out, and its present financial condition clearly demonstrates this as the most successful mode of establishing such a society upon a firm basis.

The rehearsals are held every Thursday evening, in the lecture room of Rev. Dr. Ganse's church in Twenty-third street, and within a year or two have become matters of interest, attracting large numbers of visitors and lovers of music. During the past five months, the choruses of Wallace's new opera, "Lurline," have been in rehearsal, and it was successfully produced at a public concert last Saturday evening. It is proposed to take up next the "Amber Witch," Wallace's latest work, by many thought to be superior to "Lurline." Mr. Bergé is writing an oratorio, "St. Peter," and Mr. Morgan is also engaged upon one, to be called "St. Paul"—both for this society. Neither is as yet completed.

Among the works practiced and performed by the "Union," are Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," "Elijah," "Lobgesang," "Loreley," "Athalie," "Walpurgis-night," etc.; Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," Haydn's "Creation" and "Seasons"; Mozart's celebrated "Requiem"; Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" and "Stabat Mater"; Spohr's "Last Judgment"; Costa's "Eli" and Stoepel's "Hiawatha." Of these, "St. Paul," the "Creation," "Loreley," "Eli" and "Hiawatha" were accompanied by full orchestra—the last named at the Academy of Music, and all of them in a style equal to anything previously heard in this city.

The "Union" is now in its seventh season; its list of yearly subscribers has slowly, but constantly increased, and we trust that the time is not far distant when its design will be appreciated by lovers of music, and that it may be placed on a sure footing among the permanent institutions of the city.

The New York Philharmonic Society, which is, without exception, the first society of the kind in this country, was organized in the year 1841, and is consequently now in the twenty-first year of its existence—an honor and an ornament to our city.

It is made up of the best resident musical talent, and is very thoroughly drilled and ably conducted by Messrs. Theodore Eisfeld and Carl Bergmann, under whose direction fifteen public rehearsals and five concerts are given at the Academy of Music each season, affording to its subscribers an opportunity of hearing the greatest chef d'œuvres of musical art and some of the finest specimens of vocal and instrumental execution.

This society now numbers 27 subscribing members or those who pay ten dollars per season and are entitled to three tickets to each of the five concerts; 1128 associate members, who subscribe five dollars per season and receive a ticket to each of the public rehearsals and one to each of the five concerts; and 204 professional members who pay a fee of three dollars, and are entitled to the same privilege as the associates. The orchestra numbers about 80 performers.

In my next, I shall speak of some of the societies in Brooklyn, and the German societies in this city.—Transcript.

(From the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.)

Musical Literature.

What shall the next generation do without a Scudo? and what musical student is there who has not on his book shelves, or scattered among the heaps of music on his table or piano, the various volumes of "Critique et Littérature Musicale," "Année Musicale" and "Chevalier Sari"?

The contents of these books are articles collected from various French reviews for which Scudo has been writing for many years. The Revue des Deux Mondes continues almost monthly to have one of his charming criticisms, which we may read scoldingly, probably, but always with pleasure and profit. These criticisms are often full of dogmatism, prejudice, and sharp, severe, even bitter judgment; but every liberal minded, good-natured artist cannot help liking them, nevertheless; must consult them, and rely on them as authority.

He brings to his critical duty a highly cultivated and well stored mind. Liszt and Berlioz and Lacombe write charmingly about music, but they write like rhapsodists many times, and always like musicians, interesting the musical student only, so do Wagner and Schumann, and several others; but the musician who desires to see his art better comprehended by the intelligent and refined, by those who enjoy painting and sculpture, and architecture, and all the other grand chapels in the superb cathedrals of art, must rejoice most over Scudo, for he writes upon music sensibly and without nonsense or ecstasies, giving to our divine art a literary dignity and charm, that its sister arts have long possessed, a species of æsthetic criticism, which is written in such an intelligent and agreeable style, that men and women of refined tastes and reading habits, who may not be musicians even, can enjoy it as they do the writings of a Winckelman, a Schlegel or a Ruskin, and through it comprehend better this great art of Palestrina, Pergolesi, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

His most ordinary articles, those which are simply notices of new publications, have their own peculiar cleverness, and the regular reader of Scudo never passes them over hastily, for one always feels sure of finding something suggestive in them. In the Revue des Deux Mondes for the first part of January of this year, is a short one on Hengel's edition of Semiramis for voice and piano, M. de Vaucorbeil's songs, Cherbuliez's Collection of Sacred Music and M. Mathias' (the pianiste) edition of six grand symphonies of Mozart.

When noticing the new edition of Rossini's Semiramis, he gives a running critique upon the manner in which Mmes. Penco and Albouvi sung this opera, this winter, at Theatre Italien, in Paris, which he says they did with un bonheur d'exécution that deeply touched the audience. Mme. Penco's true feeling and perfect comprehension of the grand rôle of the Queen of Babylon made M. Scudo pardon her shortcomings in the way of voice and vocalization, and he thought her especially clever in the first part of the grand finale of the first act.

Albouvi was a little too elegiac in Arsace—that is what she was thirteen years ago, according to M. Paul Scudo. In his fine article on "L'Art du Chant en Italie," written in January, 1848, while giving the then young cantatrice almost enthusiastic praise, he said, "One only desired in such an exquisite talent, a little more force, accent and depth," in this same part of Arsace. But she must have advanced some little at least in this part, for he says she sung the grand duo in the second act with Semiramis (Mme. Penco) with rare perfection, the Ebben a te ferisci! which was one of Mme. Pisaroni's triumphs over thirty years ago, when this opera and its creator were young, and the musical world was drinking its first draught of this celebrated Cyprus wine, the fruit of a revolutionary vintage, for Rossini was the result of that time, as the melodramatic Verdi is of the intervening one.

Scudo compliments M. Hengel by saying of him that he is an intelligent editor and very zealous for the interests of the artists he loves to gather around him. This edition of Semiramis he has had arranged for voice and piano with much care, from the score as they sing it at the French Opera; the French translation follows the Italian text of the libretto; and the book is adorned with two fine lithographic portraits of the great maestro author, Rossini, "one of him at the happy age of twenty-eight, with a smile on his lips and his eyes sparkling with genius, the other representing him as he can be seen daily, enjoying peacefully his incontestable and imperishable glory."

He winds up his notice of this Semiramis book with a remark that shows his nice, exact taste—that, after all, the Semiramis, as represented at the French Theatre, even with the two sisters Marchisio and the fine choruses, compare with the true Semiramis, such as was given at the Theatre Italien, only as a good translation of a fine poem compares with the original.

The notice of M. de Vaucorbeil's songs makes one wish to hear them; not that they receive good, hearty praise, but enough to create interest. French songs of society, "ballads," as we call them, are, for the most part, delicious. They have all the tenderness without the monotony and solemnity of German songs. Who does not remember Bérart's "Normandie" and Grisar's "La Folle" and that little green and gold album of Masini peeping out on the music shelves reminds us of "Ou va mon ame" and "Ton image" delicious creations of this "Bellini de la Romance," as Scudo called this charming song writer quite ten years ago.

But to return to M. de Vaucorbeil. Scudo's remarks on him are worth translating; he says:

"An amateur, a man of taste, a quasi artist, who has for a long time hesitated between a certain literary world, where his mind has developed, and the purely musical one into which he enters but timidly, M. de Vaucorbeil has published a collection of melodies which are more remarkable for the elevated, poetical idea which has preoccupied the author, than for any freedom or novelty in the musical phrase.

"The first time that I happened to hear in a drawing room some light compositions of M. de Vaucorbeil, sung by M. Roger, I was struck by the disparity between his conceptions which is sometimes elevated—as in "Les Chèvres d'Argos," for example—and the representation of his thought, which is meagre and expressed with a character of préciosité, showing more of the literary man than the musician.

"Nevertheless, M. de Vaucorbeil understands music. He loves and knows how to appreciate true masterpieces, and his refined taste does not allow itself to be easily taken with fallacious theories. But his compositions want life, and have not that healthy air which pleases every one; they cannot be sung with success except before a select and artificial society; before women, men of letters, painters, artists, in a word, who are pleased with ingenious creations of the mind, and the casuistry of cours incompris.

"M. de Vaucorbeil will be astonished, perhaps, when I say of him, with all due respect to his own individuality, that he is subject to the same style of illusions which are peculiar to M. Berlioz: He believes he has expressed in his songs thoughts which have haunted his delicate imagination, but which he only reveals to us in an incomplete manner, and under a form which has in it less of the musician than of the poet. M. de Vaucorbeil is too young and too intelligent not to be able to make a victorious reply sometime in the future to our objections."

In speaking of M. Cherbuliez's collection of sacred music, Scudo alludes to the deplorable state of religious music, in France; a state it is in almost everywhere; and the attempts that are being made to restore it to its primitive devotional form. These attempts, though laughable, are almost in vain, one might fear. There is little of the tranquil, pious spirit of old Christian art remaining in either music or painting. Then the hardest thing an artist has to struggle with now is the total absence of deep, simple, childlike faith in, and feeling for, any thing—which characterizes our time—"deep feeling which that profound æsthetic master, Schlegel, said well, was the only true source of lofty art."

The whole world, the old world and the new, seem to be in every point falling into what the French political writer, Forecard, calls a vast work of dissolution and into something which is at least the symptom of a general revolution, if it is not a revolution itself."

Then in such unsettled times, when all faiths are shaken, political, social, and artistic; old monarchical governments seek liberty and bestowing freedom; young democratic countries questioning the wisdom of their free institutions, everything in a state of feverish ferment, how can we expect to see reproduced anything like those works which were the pure quiet growth of a simple believing age? "Every effort will be useless, it seems, unless artists and their audience, the world, shall be completely transformed, and become endowed with earnest, religious feeling, genuine devotion, and immortal faith. Fancy sporting with the symbols of catholicism, uninspired by that love which is stronger than death, will never attain exalted Christian beauty." So wrote Schlegel about painting at the commencement of this present human phase of affairs, and very well it applies to music now. But let us hear what M. Scudo has to say.

"Religious music, the expression of that profound but indefinite feeling which the soul experiences when collecting itself and bowing before the grand idea of God, and which feeling encloses so many mysteries, has always pre-occupied a great number of distinguished minds. Of all styles of music, religious music in France is in the most deplorable state. A Congress has been formed at Paris to consult upon the means of elevating religious art and to know what should be done for the restoration of that chimera called the Gregorian chant, and to give to the Catholic faith the musical form which belongs to its spirit.

"We shall follow the labors of this Congress, without indulging in any illusions, however, as to the result of their debates. The cause of this evil which is being deplored is not a simple one. As to our opinions, we propose some day, in a moment of leisure, to develop them, at present we shall only say some words on a collection of sacred songs for one and several voices, which, under the title of Alleluia, has been published by M. Joel Cherbuliez.

"It is the pious and careful work of a protestant minister, M. Theodore Paul, who lives in the environs of Geneva. Composed of the finest passages of Handel, Mozart, and above all of the great Sebastian Bach, this collection is divided into two series, forming two well engraved volumes with French and German words. The second series, which is a more remarkable selection than the first, contains, forty-two passages taken from Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Weber, Leo, Marcello, Lotti, Vittoria, &c.

"We might very well make some remarks on the merit of (and often strange prosody of) the French words which the author has put above the original text; but we will refrain and only ask why did not M. Paul indicate the particular works of the Masters from whom he has selected these passages. There is no fear of being too explicit in these sort of publications, which address themselves to the humblest minds."

The Organ.

THIRTEENTH STUDY.—QUALITY OF TONE CONTINUED, AND ITS SECOND PRINCIPAL CAUSE, FORM—THE FREE REED.

The quality of the tone of reed pipes does without doubt most especially depend on the relative proportions of the pipe, the tongue, and the reed; but it depends, above all, on the way in which the reed itself is constructed. It is well known that reeds are of two kinds, the free reed, and the striking reed. This last kind produces a sharp metallic quality of tone, and this mainly arises from the tongue striking sharply against the edges of the groove. That sharp, trumpet quality of tone, which so takes the fancy of those who admire orchestral music, has for a long time been a cause of offence to persons who are not so wholly prejudiced in its favor, especially when they meet with it in a church of small dimensions, where there is but little sounding room, and they or others have often compared its tones, harsh and ill-proportioned to the size of the place, to the grating sound which is produced by dragging a heavy wooden bench over a stone pavement. Nor was it until long after science had ceased to devote its energies exclusively to the interests of ecclesiastical art, that, at the beginning of this century, when the sacred fire of zeal for the ancient traditions was again lighted up, a certain learned admirer of organs, M. Grenié, was inspired with the means of softening the quality of the reed pipes used in their construction. This he did by so arranging the tongue, with regard to the reed, that one might pass evenly within the other without meeting with any resistance. The two pieces are in fact so exactly fitted one to the other in his system, that the tongue would seem to be cut of the reed. Its action may be described as follows:—

When the tongue, which is a thin piece of metal, is set in motion by the wind, on its passage upwards from the foot of the pipe into the reed, it gives way under its pressure for so much of its length as is pliant enough to do so, and is then brought back to its former position by its own spring-like nature. This alternate action of air upon the tongue, and of the tongue upon the air, lasts as long as the wind is supplied to the foot of the pipe, and results in the production of a quality of tone as delicate as it is penetrating. The tones also of a reed thus constructed are far better suited to blend with those of the flue pipes than those of reeds made in the ordinary way.

There is little more than the above to say about the free reed. It is generally fitted to pipes, the bodies of which are made to a length which has been found by experience to be the best for the still further development of its tones, and somewhat shorter than those of the striking reeds. These last speak best, as is well known, with pipes which are three quarters of the length of flue pipes of the same note, while the free reed speaks well with a pipe which is not more than half the length of the flue pipe. With even shorter pipes than these, M. Grenié has made free reeds, which speak the note of a 16-foot open pipe, with all the regularity and vigor which is required of them, though not with a tone which is equal in these respects to that of the French reed-stop, called the bomharde.*

The dimensions of the tongue, with regard to length, width, and thickness, are of as much importance in the construction of free reeds, as they are in that of the striking reed. If these details are not attended, it will be subject to various irregular movements in its wrestling with the wind. As the end, when the tongue of the free reed is fastened, is firmly fixed, no amount of wind can possibly make it vary in pitch; but this does not prevent it from being affected by an accident to which all metals are liable, namely, a change in the temperature, and to this it is most sensitive. Hence heat makes it get flat, cold makes it get sharp, so that in winter a free reed will sometimes be as much as a quarter of a tone sharper than it is in summer. An extra pressure of wind has no more effect on the free reed than to widen the range of its beats, and consequently to give greater vigor to its power; a diminished pressure has, of course, a contrary effect; but in neither case is the pitch of the note altered. The case with which its sounds may be thus augmented or diminished, according to the pressure of the wind, has given rise to its being used for the production of those effects of expression which are generally understood by the words crescendo and diminuendo. These effects are not, it is true, wholly inadequate for the expression of human feeling, though, after all, in a very imperfect way, and to apply them to the great organ, whose tones are throughout even and equal, is as contrary to the qualities of music in general, as it is to the traditions of music of the church.

We would allow, then, the introduction of the free reed into an organ intended for the service of the church, not as an expression stop merely, by which the feelings of the faithful may be moved, or their attention distracted, but because it points out to us a way, as brilliant as it is sweet, by which we may get rid both of that hard quality of tone of the striking reed, and because it will tend to put a stop to the noisy clatter of French organ-playing leaving us with nothing to fall back upon, as is the case with the Germans, but the dull monotony of wood and metal flue pipes. It may be added, that the introduction of free reeds into our larger church-organs, is, in the first place, due to a member of the French magistracy, M. Hamel, a judge at Beauvais. Of his skill and practical knowledge we have already had occasion to speak in terms of praise. In the year 1827, he superintended in person the building of the large organ of the cathedral of Beauvais, and for the first time applied the free reed system to this very remarkable instrument.†

* This system may be found reproduced in the organ's expression made by M. Muller, Rue Ville l'Évêque, Paris.

† It appears that, in the organ built by M. Hamel, the free reed stops were supplied with wind from a bellows of their own. For we find, in an account published by M. Daunjon for the Orange Building Society, of which he says he has the artistic direction, an additional fact in the history of the origin of the free reed. "The firm of MM. Daublanc, Callinet, and Co." writes M. Daunjon, "offers to our notice, at this moment (1844), an improvement in organ building, which consists in employing for the production of expression on their stops, the wind from the ordinary organ bellows. The extra pressure required for this wind is not by means of a pedal, which is at the command of the foot of the player. Henceforward, then, a separate bellows for these expression stops is no longer necessary. For this interesting invention the firm of MM. Daublanc and Callinet has received a patent."

Mimetic Music.

When Joseph Haydn, in his days, was composing the music of Bernardoni's ballet, "Le Diable Boiteux," a sea storm, incidental to that piece, as Madame Dudevant tells us, cost him a world of pains, the remembrance of which would make him laugh at fourscore. Bernardoni wanted the tempest to be an out-and-out—a regular high-flying hurricane—a witches' burly-burly of thunder, lightning, wind and rain—in the very best marine manner. But Joseph was no mariner, and felt as though any such marine piece was beyond him. He was at a loss how to describe in crotchets and quavers what he had never seen, and could only land-lubber like guess about. So we read that his good friend and ally, the Porporina, pictured to honest Beppo the Adriatic in a storm, and sang the mournful plaint of the waves, those sad sea waves, not without laughing at the imitative harmonies which require to be aided by blue cloths, shaken from scene to scene by vigorous arms—a very sad sort of sea waves indeed. One night, however, the young German's perplexity was happily relieved by a colloquy on the subject with the experienced maestro, Porpora himself. That able authority assures Haydn that he might labor for a hundred years with the best instruments in the world, and the most intimate knowledge of wind and waters, without being able to translate the divine harmonies of nature. This, contends the master, is not the province of music, which is merely guilty of folly and conceit when it runs after noisy effects and endeavors to imitate the war of the elements. Its domain he affirms to be that of the emotions: its aim is to inspire them, as its origin is from their inspiration. What the young composer has to think of, then, is of a man abandoned to the fury of the waves, and a prey to the deepest terror: he is to imagine a scene at once frightful and sublime; the danger imminent; and then, placing himself in the midst of this distress, this disorder, this confusion and despair, to give expression to his anguish, assured that his hearers, intelligent or not, will share it. "They will imagine that they hear the groaning of the timbers, the shouts of the mariners, the despair of the helpless passengers. What would you say of a poet who, in order to depict a battle, should tell you in verse that the cannon uttered boom, boom, and the drums dub, dub? It would be a better imitation than any image, but it would not be poetry. Painting itself, descriptive art par excellence, does not consist in servile imitation. The artist would trace in vain the dull green sea, the dark and stormy skyscape, the shattered bark. If his feelings do not enable him to render the terrible and poetical whole, his picture will make as little impression as any alehouse sign." And therefore would old Porpora have young Haydn, on this tentative occasion, seek to inspire his whole being with the idea of some great disaster; for thus, and only thus, would he make his storm-scene tell on the feelings of others. Thus and only thus, might and must his sea-piece

Suffer a sea change
Into something rich and strange, instead of remaining poor and common.

Ariel's song reminds us by the way, in connection with the same subject, but in the case of another great German composer, that Beethoven is said to have hinted that Shakespeare's "Tempest" was in his mind when he composed his Sonata Appassionata (which has been described as shining resplendent among his other sonatas, like Sirius amongst the stars). And musical critics hold that the fancy will find much to support this derivative suggestion. The first movement for instance, wild and gusty, has been compared* to the course of a vessel over a boundless ocean, now pelted with storms, and anon scudding cheerily before the gale; while the second, "solemn and dirge-like, with its mysterious bass—in which certain singular retardations are introduced, giving an effect somewhat like a peal of bells, recalls Ariel's song, "Full fathom five thy father lies." The depths of the ocean, with its hidden splendors, seem to be opened to us." The last movement is one prolonged storm, suggestive of a sea on which no ship can live, of powerless endeavor and remorseless wreck.

Mr. Hogarth's Musical History contains an account of Haydn's early difficulty, in finding himself "at sea" (in a double sense), or in a composer's sea of troubles—in hardly a metaphorical one,—which is more prosaic and less elegantly didactic than that introduced in George Sand's æsthetic romance. Haydn's own report of the matter, in after years, is that upon which our musical historian's narrative is based. Neither the librettist, Curtz by name, nor Joseph, had ever looked on the sea, so that their notions, individually and conjointly, of its appearance when tempest-tossed were necessarily somewhat vague. However, they must brew a storm between them, somehow: so Haydn sat at the harpsichord, while Curtz paced about the room, and tried to furnish the composer with ideas. "Imagine," said he, "a mountain rising, and then a valley sinking,—and then another mountain and another valley;—the mountains and valleys must follow each other every instant. Then you must have claps of thunder and flashes of lightning, and the noise of the wind; but, above all, you must represent distinctly the mountains and valleys." Haydn, meanwhile, kept trying all sorts of passages, ran up and down the scale, and exhausted his ingenuity in heaping together chromatic intervals and strange discords. Still Curtz was not satisfied. At last the musician, out of all patience, extended his hand to the extremities of the keys, and bringing them rapidly together, exclaimed, "the deuce take the tempest.—I can make nothing of it." "That is the very thing!"† shouted Curtz, in rapture at this chance-medley solution of the problem. Curtz and Popora had different ideas of high art and sound practice.

(Continued on page 31.)

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Waltz by Chopin, Op. 64, No. 3.

Concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in aid of the Government.

Arts as well as laws are silent when the country is under arms. Our readers, therefore, can expect but a meagre chronicle of musical matters for some time to come. Indeed, it would be almost impossible to find any one who could calmly sit down to hear a concert, and still more impossible to find one who could calmly write about one. When the blood is boiling with indignation at the humiliation of our country's flag before the army of traitors who beleaguered its little band of defenders, when every heart is beating with one patriotic pulse, when but one voice and one mind exists throughout this people which has risen as one man to the defence of the Nation's Capital, and to vindicate the honor of the Nation's flag, at such a time, there are few who can listen patiently to the instruments of peace, when the clang of the trumpet, the stirring beat of the drum and the shrill voice of the fife are heard in our streets, calling to arms.

Our readers will notice the advertisement of the Handel and Haydn Society, which, with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society and the Germania Band, will give a concert at the Music Hall, of miscellaneous, patriotic and national music, this evening. Every thing connected with this concert is freely given, and the proceeds are to be handed to His Excellency the Governor of this Commonwealth, for the purpose of aiding in the arming and equipping of troops. The programme will be found on the first page, and in these times such music will be sure to touch a chord of patriotism in the heart of every hearer who is disposed in this way to contribute his mite for the common good. We trust that the Music Hall may be crowded as it never was before, and that a substantial sum may be handed over to the treasury of Massachusetts.

Concerts.

We have to record three concerts since the printing of our last issue, all of which had but a slim attendance, and one afternoon concert with a goodly number of hearers.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, gave an extra parlor concert at Cambridge in Lyceum Hall on Friday, April 19th, offering on their programme two such sterling pieces as Beethoven's Septette and Schubert's Octette.

1. Septette, in E flat, op. 20. Beethoven
For Violin, Viola, Violoncello, Bass, Clarinette, Horn and Bassoon.
Introduction and Allegro—Larghetto—Minuetto—Theme, with variations—Scherzo—Finale, Adagio and Allegro.
2. The celebrated Adagio, ("God save the Emperor," with variations from Quartette No. 77. Haydn
3. Fantaisie for violon, on Hungarian themes. Molique
Wm. Schulze.
4. { Adagio, from the Second Quotette in B flat, op. 87
Mendelssohn
Song without words in G, No. 4, 5th book Mendelssohn
Arranged for Quintette, by Thomas Ryan.
5. Octette, in E, op. 165. F. Schubert
Scherzo, and Finale, Adagio and Allegro.

The first of the two might have received in the pp passages and in those places where staccato notes occur more attention from some of the performers. The portion of the Octette from the Scherzo beginning, which was the only one performed, was played finely. So were the other pieces, Mr. Schulze rendering his solo with the true Hungarian impetuosity. At the close of the concert the gentlemen played patriotic airs to the great acceptance of the company, who rising to their feet applauded heartily, almost succeeding in an encore.

MISS MARY FAY'S MATINEE, took place at the Hall of the Messrs. Chickering at noon on Saturday, April 20th. We were not personally present, but learn from a friend that the audience was much pleased with the performance, in which Miss Fay was assisted by Messrs. LANG, EICHBERG and FRIES.

1. Piano Trio in C minor (Op. 49). Mendelssohn
Allegro ag. lto—Andante con moto—Scherzo—Allegro
2. Reminiscences de Lucia de Lammermoor. Liszt
3. Andante con Variazioni, from Sonata in A dur (Op. 47). Beethoven
4. Bolero. Hiller
5. Grand Fantaisie on Norma, for two pianos. Thalberg
6. Fantaisie on Moses in Egypt. Thalberg

A musical friend reports to us his utter astonishment at an occurrence which ought not to go unnoticed. This most unusual feat was the introduction of the wonderful variations from Beethoven's Kreutzer-Sonata by some measures of a tune commonly called "Dixie." We should really like to know what object the fair concert-giver had in doing so? Other comments seem to be unnecessary.

THE ORPHEUS MUSICAL ASSOCIATION gave a concert on Saturday evening, April the 20th, at the Music Hall, assisted by Mrs. KEMPTON and Mr. Wm. SCHULZE.

- PART I.
1. Chorus—The Lord is my Shepherd. Schubert
(234 Psalm.)
 2. Aria—From Tannhauser. Wagner
C. Schraubstädter.
 3. Chorus—Abschied vom Walde. A. Kreissmann
 4. Cavatina—All Sestjato. Mercadante
Mrs. Kempton.
 5. Chorus—She is mine. Hartel
 6. Fantaisie on a Scotch theme, for the violin. David
Wm. Schulze.
 7. Aria—From "Die Entführung". Mozart
A. Kreissmann.
 8. Walzer—(By request). Vogel
- PART II.
1. Chorus—The Cheerful Wanderer. Mendelssohn
 2. Song—O Welcome Fair Woods. Franz
A. Kreissmann.
 3. Chorus—"Das Kirchlein". Becker
 4. Quartette—Serenade. A. Kreissmann
(By request.)
 5. Song—We met by Chance. Kücken
Mrs. Kempton.
 6. Trio—From "Die Entführung". Mozart
Messrs. Kreissmann, W. and C. Schraubstädter.
 7. Chorus—Auf den Bergen. Aht

They sang the choruses and solos with their usual excellence. Mrs. Kempton in the song by KÜCKEN and in the second verse of the Star Spangled Banner, which was substituted for the Chorus of ART, retarded and accelerated the movement constantly. We think this wrong. Such simple airs as that by Kücken and people's songs require as much of evenness, naturalness and simplicity in their rendering, as compatible with sentiment and expression.

Mr. Schulze played a difficult solo by Concertmeister DAVID of Leipzig finely, and with commendable purity of intonation. Mr. Kreissmann sang "O welcome fair woods," beautifully.

The concert was given for a benevolent object, in aid of the Christian Unity, a society for the assistance of the poor, of which Rev. E. E. Hale has the management, and we are told there were tickets enough sold to fill the hall; but it was the day after the second battle of Lexington, and in such times cannon and drums are more congenial sounds than the sweet concord of tones.

THE WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERT, April 24th, was well attended. The programme was excellent.

- PART I.
1. Overture—"Coriolanus". Beethoven
 2. Concert Waltz—"Marian". Lanner
 3. Symphony, No. 3—(Scotch). Mendelssohn
By request. (Op. 70.)
- PART II.
1. Marcia Funebre. Chopin
(By request.) Arranged for the Orchestral Union by Koppitz.
 2. Solo on the English Horn.
Performed by A. L. DeRihias.
 3. New Polka—"Appropos". F. Suck

In this point, indeed, these concerts are unsurpassable, considering the price of admission. To have Coriolan, Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony and Chopin's funeral march in one afternoon is a boon to music-lovers. As to this last piece we would say, that the first part, in B flat minor, which sounds by far better on the piano, than in the arrangement, might be made more effective by the bass instruments holding the B flat D flat of the bass, extending over the first 14 measures, their full length. The upsoaring phrase in D flat major, which follows on the contrary sounds better with the orchestra than on the piano. The second part, in D flat major, might have been played somewhat more tenderly and softly. And this is a remark which we have to make with regard to the playing of the orchestra generally. We find that pianissimos, even pianos are frequently left unheeded, the piano often sounding as loud as mezzo-forte ought to sound. It was noticeable in BEETHOVEN'S eighth symphony, they played some weeks ago, and again very strongly in the MENDELSSOHN symphonies, the Italian and the Scotch. Fine effects are constantly lost in this way. To quote but one instance in the place of many. The fine climax at the beginning of the second part of the symphony where the rising of the angry winds and the turbulent waves is depicted in tones, from the perfect, hushed, expectant lull to the furious onthreak, was spoiled in this way by beginning mezzo-forte instead of pianissimo. The only part perfectly free from this neglect, and in this respect coming up to the expectations of the most exact critic, was the second movement, which delighted us much. And the second melody was as fine a pianissimo, even after the string quartette was joined by the reeds and brass, as one could desire. It is to be hoped that the Union will pay more attention to this point for the sake of the immortal masters and their own. Mr. Suck's Polka has some fine parts. Mr. RIBAS' solo on the English Horn was deservedly much applauded. *†

Musical Correspondence.

CINCINNATI, APRIL 22.—Mr. F. L. Ritter, leader of the St. Cecilia Society, gave a "Concert Symphonique" at the new hall of the Catholic Institute, on last Thursday evening. It was Mr. Ritter's intention to have made this concert the first of a series, the programmes of each composed of the chefs d'œuvre of the best masters; but the great political excitement that now absorbs all minor interests, may probably interfere with his plan.

Mozart's Symphony in F minor, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Mendelssohn's "Athalia" march, Kalliwoda's Concert Overture; these were the orchestral selections, smoothly played by an orchestra of twenty-six members.

Howard Vaughan gave us a concerto by De Beriot; this young violinist is an acceptable soloist and will prove a valuable addition to our small number of reliable orchestra players. Weber's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was played with considerable aplomb by Mr. H. G. Andres.

This concert, wholly as regards the selections, and partly as regards the execution of these, was the best we have had here for years. Such a programme as that of Thursday, refines the taste of the public and excites respect for the artists concerned in its arrangement and execution. Such noble music is a delight at any time; but in an hour of feverish anxiety like the present, it is a peaceful and elevating relief to ear, mind, and heart.

In spite of telegrams, and the patriotic volunteering, drilling, leave-taking, &c., going forward, the attendance at this concert was numerous and encouraging.

The new hall possesses admirable acoustic properties—at least so far as the orchestra is concerned. ANABESQUE.

Chopin's Mazurkas and Waltzes.

Our publishers have just issued a volume containing the Mazurkas and Waltzes of Chopin, which are universally recognized as among the most brilliant and beautiful works that have been added to the repertoire of the modern pianist. It is needless here and now to go into any description of these compositions, many of which are familiar to every accomplished pianist and to every intelligent listener to concerts of the best music. It is sufficient to say that the volume under notice is neatly printed, as our readers who recollect the specimen pages that have occasionally appeared in this Journal will admit, on good fair white paper, and neatly bound in cloth. Liszt's article upon Chopin, which appeared some years ago in these columns, is prefixed to the volume. Many of our readers will recollect this interesting criticism, which gives an idea of the personal qualities of the composer himself, by one who, of all men, was most fitted by nature, by kindred pursuits and by culture, to appreciate the rare genius of the composer and to describe him to others, so that they too might understand the character of the man and of his works. A biographical sketch of Chopin, by Mr. Davison, is also prefixed to the volume, adding much to its interest and value. We give in our music pages this week a waltz taken from this volume, (Op. 64, No. 3).

DR. GUILMETTE'S LECTURE ON VOCAL CULTURE.

—Having been prevented from attending this lecture, we copy from a daily paper, the following notice. We learn that Dr. G. has formed classes for instruction in this matter, so vitally important to every public singer and speaker, and indeed to every one, if considered simply in its relations to health and vigorous life.

A few days since we had occasion to commend a pamphlet on Vocal Culture, by Dr. Guilmette, of New York. On Tuesday evening we had the pleasure of hearing him expound and illustrate his views, in a lecture, at Chickering's room. His audience, as might be expected at a time when the minds of men are absorbed by one exciting theme, was small, but highly attentive and appreciating. The lecturer's personal appearance is of a kind which at once arrests and commands attention. He is a little below the average stature, but his massive build creates the impression of height. A striking head and face rises from shoulders of Atlantean breadth; and his deep, cubic chest is a practical commendation of his system of gymnastic training. The purity of his tone, and the distinctness of his enunciation, approved themselves to the ear as much as his aspect did to the sight. His English is nearly perfect in structure, and only a very slight foreign accent is perceptible. He commenced by asking the indulgence of the audience for the nervous exhaustion under which he was laboring, on account of the severe labors he had recently been through; but his fatigue was revealed only a very deliberate and quiet manner, which was exactly to our taste, and entirely appropriate to the matter of his lecture, which was entirely didactic and expository.

He proceeded to give an anatomical description of the organs of speech, aided by a model, in illustration of the cardinal doctrine of his system, that the voice is simply vocal breath. There is no analogy between the organs of speech and any stringed instrument. His expositions were very clear, and made extremely interesting by the model used in illustration. He explained the functions of the windpipe, the lungs, and the diaphragm in the production of vocal and articulate sounds; denying the assumed importance of the abdominal muscles. He gave a brief sketch of the literature of the subject; characterizing the writers who had treated of the voice, and stating their merits and defects. Many curious experiments were performed; and the lecturer gave a practical exemplification of his own capacity of expiration and inspiration. The latter part of the lecture was mainly occupied with a practical explanation of the various exercises used by the lecturer in his teachings, for the improvement of the vocal organs, and the strengthening of the muscles of the chest.

Dr. Guilmette combines qualities not usually met together. He is a good anatomist and physiologist, and also a professional singer of a high order. His lecture was at once instructive and interesting; free from everything rhetorical or extravagant; and his manner we should characterize in one word as very gentlemanly. We regret that he has come among us at a time so inauspicious to himself.

Concluded from page 29.)

That Haydn—despite the old maestro's supposed harangue on the imitative powers of music—cherished a certain weakness for mimetic effects in orchestral composition, more than one mature production of his will sufficiently prove. Madame de Staël records how her enjoyment of the performance of his "Creation," at Vienna, by a band of four hundred, was marred by some of the composer's crotchets (not technically speaking). How at the words, "let there be light: and there was light," the instruments played at first very softly, so as scarcely to be heard, and then suddenly broke out into a tumultuous crash, to signify the genesis of the daylight:—upon which stroke of art a certain wit, homme d'esprit, pleased madame by observing that "à l'apparition de la lumière il fallait se boucher les oreilles."‡ Then again Staël the Epicene, as Byron rather ambidextrously styles her, noted with disapproval how the music trailed and dragged while the serpents were being created, and recovered its brilliancy and animation with the birth-song of the birds. In Haydn's "Seasons," she complains, these allusions are multiplied exceedingly; concelli she calls them, which a healthy taste would reject. Not but that certain combinations of harmony can recal some of nature's many marvels, but these analogies (she maintains) have no reference to imitation, which is never anything better than a jeu factice.

The real resemblances among the fine arts one with another, and those which exist between the fine arts and nature, are dependent upon feelings of the same kind as those excited by them in our souls by a variety of means.§ One cannot but agree with Lady Eastlake that Haydn's servile representations of the tiger's leaps, of the stag's branching horns, of the pattering hail—why he gave a pert staccato triplet accompaniment to the rolling of "awful thunder" is not so easily accounted for.¶—are so many blots on his glorious "Creation." The verdure-clad fields, the purling brook, the mild light of the moon as she "glides through the silent night," delight us not so much from the correctness of the musical image, for the same music would express other words, as from the intrinsic sweetness of the melody, the exquisite song with which Haydn always overflows. But, as Lady Eastlake adds, his "rising sun with daring rays" is an utter failure—and is by her compared to a watchman's lantern striking down a dark alley, not the orb of day illuminating the earth.

Again, in the fine trio, "Most beautiful appear," while the bass voice sings the words, "Upheaved from the deep, the immense leviathan sports on the foaming wave," the lashing of the water by the animal's tail, as Mr. Hogarth remarks, is imitated by some whisking passages on the double-bass. "Then we have the roar of the lion, the sudden leaps of the tiger, the galloping of the horse, the whirl of the cloud of insects, and the crawling of the reptile. Nothing can be more ingenious than these imitative passages; but then they are amusing, which nothing ought to be in a work of this exalted class."*

That Mr. Hogarth, provided the amusing be excluded, can go far enough in his estimate of music's potential imitativeness, is clear from his criticism on Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. In that work he tells us we seem to feel the freshness of a summer morning—to hear the rustling of the breeze, the waving of the woods, the cheerful notes of the birds, and the cries of the animals: to stray along the margin of a meandering brook, and listen to the murmuring of its waters; to join a group of villagers, keeping holiday with joyous songs and dances; to watch the sky grow dark, hear the thunder growl, and witness a storm burst on the alarmed rustics, whose cries of dismay are audible amid the elemental strife. "The clouds pass away, the muttering of the thunder is more and more distant, all becomes quiet and placid, and the stillness is broken by the pastoral song of gratitude. Nothing can be more beautiful or more true to nature than every part of the representation. It requires no explanation, but places every image before the mind with a distinctness which neither poetry nor painting could surpass, and with a beauty which neither of them could equal." It was remarked at the time, by an Edinburgh Reviewer, that in this passage the enthusiasm of the author had carried him off his feet; and that the concluding part of the last sentence put one not a little in mind of a certain captain mentioned in "Peter Simple," who describes his mother as being so splendid a pianoforte player, that upon one occasion, when she was delighting her friends with her performance, she introduced an imitation of thunder so exquisite, that the cream for tea became sour, besides three casks of beer in the cellar. The reviewer insists that this is scarcely more ludicrous than it is to say, that the descriptive powers of the Sinfonia Pastorale, great as they undoubtedly are, or any instrumental music unaccompanied by words, ever can place imagery before the mind, with a distinctness equal to poetry or painting. Beethoven himself, it is added in corroboration of this view, has furnished us with an explanation, in words, of the different scenes he intended to delineate; which implies his consciousness, that the graphic power of his pencil, without such explanations, could never be made to convey any definite idea of visual objects, or to give anything more than the general character of certain emotions, or to excite certain trains of association.‡ For executants of Lieder ohne Worte, who claim to see a perfect and unmistakable meaning in every bar, need to be reminded, in their too far-reaching clairvoyance, of the subjective philosophy of Coleridge's line,

O lady, we receive but what we give.

Grant that music may be said to paint nature: but how? Rousseau says that it commonly abandons the impossible attempt to paint nature direct, for the practicable one of throwing our feelings, by means all her own, into a state resembling that which the object to be painted would actually produce. Instead of painting a tranquil night,‡ which is in itself impossible, music imparts to the soul the same sensation, by exciting the self-same feelings that a tranquil night is apt to inspire.

Goethe's essay towards fixing an "aesthetic base" for music, in the shape of certain axioms which assume that it must be either sacred or profane, either solemn altogether or altogether joyous, has naturally been contested with spirit. M. Charles, in his impeachment of it—beginning, "What! music can be nothing but either joyous or solemn! The expression of impassioned love and of tender melancholy pertains not to music! The wailings of wounded spirit are beyond its range!" &c., &c.,—goes on to maintain, that music is on the contrary, an almost infinite science, the domain whereof let no Goethe dare restrict or curtail; and concludes: "There are but two usurpations which must be forbidden to music:—the pretence of painting to the eye, which is an absurd trespass on the grounds of painting itself, and that of reasoning, which is a silly aggression on the province of thought."§

Gustave Planche, again, in his critique on Mozart's masterpiece, argues at some length the question of the limits of musical expression. To seek in music for a means by which to translate the human passions, individually, one by one; to try to express by sounds, not only the tumultuous movements of the soul in their most striking generality, but also the details, and minutæ even, of those movements,—is nothing less, in M. Planche's opinion, than to ignore or betray the the mission of musical art. But, on the other hand, to see in music a mere amusement, more or less lively, an occupation for the ear only and not at all for the brain; to exclude passion from the orchestra and from the voice; to deserv nothing in the combination of sounds, beyond an ingenious artifice, designed to produce certain impressions which sometimes excite to an intoxicating degree, which at others are so voluptuous and nonchalantes as to induce balmy sleep; this he accounts a no less important mistake. He would have a musician abstain from trying to express, in dramatic music, sentiments of a limited or exact kind, such, for instance, as ambition or jealousy; and to choose the most general and indefinite, the most constant and vivid, of emotions, such as joy, anger, tenderness, and never to risk an entrance on those narrower routes which can be trod by the poet alone without stumbling.¶

For music, as all but those who have no music in their souls well know, is capable, in the words of Hartley Coleridge,¶ of expressing and evoking any simple emotion; it may imitate the rapid succession or dazzling alternation of feeling, or, dying away to silence, may symbolise the fading of passion into pensiveness. It may also, to a certain extent, he says, express action, as action consists in motion; but beyond this it cannot go. "It cannot narrate, describe, or reason. It is of little assistance to the understanding, and though it may stimulate, it cannot inform the imagination. True, words may supply all these deficiencies, and true, there is no narrative, description, reasoning, or imagination, that is truly poetical, but what involves or engenders a pleasurable feeling, nor any feeling of which some modification of numerous sounds is not a conductor. But, nevertheless, those compositions will be found best accommodated to musical expression, for which music supplies a natural and universal language, and such are love, grief, and devotion; because in all these the feeling suggests the thoughts, and not the thoughts or imagery the feeling." These remarks are apropos of certain analogies of expression between music and poetry. and an anonymous essayist of Hartley Coleridge's school (if not Hartley himself), in a tractate on Poetical Description, has pronounced the imitative quality of poetry to differ altogether from that of painting, but to bear a strong analogy to that of music, her consorted sister in days of old. While painting, as he says,  acts immediately upon the eye, and only mediately upon the intellect, music and poetry pay their first addresses to the ear, and both are capable of suggesting infinitely more than words can say. "Painting provides ready-made images. Poetry, like music, disposes the soul to be imaginative, by exciting sympathy." Virgil's line, imitatively graphic, with its five dactyles in a row.

Quadrupedante putrem sonitū quatit ungula campum, is meant to express the thundering gallop of horse, as Mr. deQuincey points out, in which the beats of the hoof return with regular intervals; and Homer in a celebrated line has sought to express mimetically the rolling, thundering, leaping motion of a stone. The critic just named assumes either poet to have sought a picturesque effect; but he reminds us that picturesqueness, like any other effect, must be subordinated to a higher law of beauty. "Whence, indeed, it is that the very limits of imitation arise for every art, sculpture, painting, &c., indicating what it ought not to imitate. And unless regard is had to such higher restraints, metrical effects become as silly and childish as the musical effect in Kotzwarra's "Battle of Prague," with its ridiculous attempts to mimic the firing of cannon, groans of the wounded, &c., instead of involving the passion of a battle in the agitation of the music."†† Yet how many of us, in our pianoforte days, held those "Battle of Prague" mimics to be first-rate, and declared the accuracy of imitation to be perfect—especially (what we knew such a deal about) the cries of the wounded. Was it not your case, madam?—unless indeed you are, happily, one of a generation that are yet in their teens. You were impressed by the old-fashioned mimetics of that ambitious exercise, for they were impressed by the old-fashioned mimetics of that ambitious exercise, for they were childish and you were a child. And when you were a child, you, like others, apostles included, thought as a child, spoke as a child, understood as a child; but now that you are become a—woman of a certain age, you have long ago put away childish things, among them the "Battle of Prague." You will never wear pinafore or fight that battle o'er again.

Art, according to Goethe's English biographer, is picture painting, not picture writing. "Beethoven in his Symphonies, may have expressed grand psychological conceptions, which, for the mind that interprets them, may give an extra charm to strains of ravishment; but if the strains in themselves do not possess a magic, if they do not sting the soul with a keen delight, then let the meaning be never so profound, it will pass unheeded, because the primary requisite of music is not that it shall present grand thoughts, but that it shall agitate the soul with musical emotions."*

Music, then, must tell on the feelings to be music at all. And as an instrument of expression, it deals with feelings in general classes, not in individual illustrations. Sydney Smith rules that music "can express only classes of feelings; it can express only melancholy, not any particular instance or action of melancholy." The tune of Lochaber no more, for example, is referred to, as expressing the pathetic in general; actual words must be employed before we can recognise in it that particular instance of the pathetic, where a poor soldier takes leave of his native shore, and his wife Jean, with a presentiment that he shall see them never again. Whenever we hear an air to which we know no words, it can inspire only general emotion; when poetry applies the general emotion to particular instances, musical expression has attained its maxim of effect. It is said, continues the portly priest of St. Paul's, "that the 'Pastorale,' of Corelli was intended for an imitation of the song of angels hovering about the fields of Bethlehem, and gradually soaring up to heaven; it is impossible, however, that the music itself can convey any such expression—it can convey only the feelings of solemnity, of rapture, of enthusiasm; imagination must do the rest."‡ Had the Reverend Sydney happened to be in his average mood of jocularly, one can imagine the exuberance of fun he could have poked at, or out of the pseudo-pastoral theory about Corelli's Pastorale.

A fellow reviewer of his, starting from the same text, of Scottish melodies, indulged in some reasonable strictures on that craving for novelty which has led composers into the field where music is weakest,—that of direct imitation of natural sounds by musical notes,—a species of rivalry, the hopelessness of which makes us feel the good sense of Agesilans' answer, when asked to hear a man sing who could imitate the nightingale,—“I have heard the nightingale herself.” Musicians are shown to have attempted not merely to imitate sounds by notes, but even to represent motion—to describe the seasons—to convey the impressions of color—or even to narrate the incidents of a battle or a campaign; for the ingenious organist of Ferdinand III, Froberger, is said to have presented a very striking musical representation of Count Thurn's passage over the Rhine, and the danger of the transit, “in twenty-six cataracts, or falls of notes.”§ Indeed, adds our reviewer, “when a taste for this sort of mimetic music is once introduced (the proper sphere of which would be the comic opera), it is wonderful how even the greatest genius gives way to the contagion, and follows the herd,—for a greater than Froberger, Handel, has now and then ventured upon similar tricks of sound. In the 'Messiah,' at the passage, 'I will shake the heavens and the earth,' he has introduced a sort of musical pun, by repeating the word several times on a chain of musical shakes, 'as if,' says a critic, 'the quavering of the voice could represent the commotions of the world.' And in his 'Israel in Egypt,' he has undertaken to represent, by musical notes, two of the plagues of Egypt, viz. the buzzing of flies and the hopping of frogs.”||

(To be continued.)

* See the Saturday Review, No. 80.

† See George Hogarth's Musical History, Biography, and Criticism, vol. i. pp. 292 sq.

‡ Compare, or contrast, with this cavil at Haydn's Fiat Lux, the following ardent tribute by the present King of Hanover:

“But, above all, how impressively, with all the powers of music, does the composer delineate the moment—And there was light—called forth by the creative words Let there be light! At these words the orchestra breaks out in a truly electrical manner, producing an entire bewilderment. The listener feels the full impression which the actual happening of this awe-inspiring miracle of the Almighty would make upon him, and that sublime achievement is thus most speakingly and convincingly brought home to the senses of the earthly man, through this picturing by tones, in the only mode in which a sensible image of it could be presented to him.”—Ideen und Betrachtungen über die Eigenschaften der Musik. Hanover, 1839.

To which estimate of a musical Monarch may be here appended that of a critical Queen's Counsel:—

“The burst of a fine orchestra will seldom fail to produce an electrical rush of feeling, faintly reflective of the actual occurrence of the miracle; but the sole resemblance will be found to consist in the fullness and suddenness of the shock.”—Hayward's Biog. and Crit. Essays, II. 223.

§ De Stiel, Des Beaux-Arts en Allemagne.

|| See the eloquent essay on Music in Quarterly Review for September, 1848.

* Musical History, &c., by George Hogarth, vol. i. p. 311.

† See Edinburgh Review, vol. lxiii. p. 41.

‡ See De Steodhal's Correspondance Inédite, Ire série, xi.

§ Etudes sur l'Allemagne: Goethe, § 1.

|| Etudes sur les Arts: Mozart.

¶ Biographia Borealis: William Roscoe.

 What is Poetical Description? Blackwood, 1839.

†† De Quincey's Homer and the Homeridae, part iii.

‡ G. H. Lewes, Life and Works of Goethe, II. 426.

§ Sketches of Moral Philosophy, lect. 13.

¶ Which reminds us, by the way, of an incidental remark of Mr. Hayward's in his essay on the Imitative Powers of Music (reprinted from the Quarterly Review.)

“On the whole, we are inclined to think that, when Lock's blind man said that the sound of a trumpet suggested the idea of scarlet to his mind, he unconsciously prescribed the precise limits within which the legitimate powers of the higher kind of music are confined.” &c.—Biographical and Critical Essays, by A. Hayward, Q. C., II. 223.

§ Sir J. Hawkins, vol. i. Preliminary Disc., p. 3.

|| Edinburgh Review, vol. lxix. p. 199.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

If thou must sing to-night. Moliere. 25

By the composer of the sterling oratorio of "Abraham" lately received in England with the greatest praise. A master-hand shows itself in trifles as in the above song.

Commencement Day. (Greeting and Valedictory). For a Young Ladies' School. E. Falk. 1, 25

A composition, which, we should think, meets a great want. It is just the thing for the occasion. The whole is effectively devised, and although written for female voices only, yet by interspersed solos for various classes of voices, change of rhythm, &c., the interest is constantly kept up. The melodies are well invented.

Instrumental Music.

America. Brilliant transcriptions of Hail Columbia, Star Spangled Banner and Yankee Doodle. Charles Foss, each 35

Fine arrangements, such as every good player should now-a-days have at his fingers' ends. They are short and to the point. The well-known airs come out with all the brilliancy modern pianism can give them. They are treated in truly grand style, yet only moderately difficult.

St. Petersburg Quadrille. (Colored Vignette.) D'Albert. 50

A stirring Quadrille of this favorite writer of Dance music introducing national airs of Russia. The title-page is handsomely illustrated with a colored view of the palace-studded capital of Russia.

Rainbow Waltz. L. O. Whitney. 25

A pleasing piece of moderate difficulty.

Galop from the "Masked Ball." Verdi. 25

The capital Galop in the famous ball-scene of the last act, a piece which is remembered with pleasure by every one who has witnessed the opera.

Books.

COMPLETE COLLECTION OF MAZURKAS AND WALTZES. By Frederic Chopin. To which is prefixed his Biography and a critical review of his works, by Fr. Liszt. Bound in cloth. 3, 00

Of these brilliant and altogether inimitable productions of the subtle genius of Chopin, Mr. Davidson, the eminent English critic, and editor of the London Musical World, says: "Chopin excelled less in works of long measure than in those of smaller pretensions. His Valses, his Nocturnes, and, above all, his Mazurkas, are quite enough to save him from oblivion. The variety with which in the Mazurkas he has said the same thing some fifty times over, will go further than anything else to prove that Chopin's genius was decidedly inventive. Some of them are gems, as faultless as they are attractive; others are less happy, but not one of them is destitute of points that appeal to the feeling, surprise by their unexpectedness, fascinate by their plaintive character, or charm by their ingenuity." It may be well here to remark that this is the only really complete edition of both Mazurkas and Waltzes, ever published. The publishers have taken the greatest possible precaution to guard against errors, and can safely pronounce this edition correct.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 474.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 5.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

XV.

COMIC OPERA.

1800—1830.

We come now to Adrien Boieldieu one of the first glories of the French school. He was born at Rouen, December 15, 1775, son of a secretary to the archbishop, and began life as a singing boy in the cathedral. He was a pupil of Broche, the organist of the church, whose pitilessness and severity filled "little Boiel" with such terror at even the sight of him, that one day, having accidentally let a drop of ink upon a book belonging to his ferocious master, he fled alone on foot to Paris to escape the danger to which he was exposed. At the age of sixteen he was already a very fair performer upon the pianoforte, possessed happy melodic ideas and some slight knowledge of harmony.

Meantime a passion for the theatre was becoming strong. His slight savings were used only to enable him to hear the works of Gretry, Dalayrac and Mehul; and often for want of money he contrived means to hide in the theatre, during the morning before a performance.

A comic opera, which had proved successful at Rouen decided Boieldieu to go and try his success in Paris. He therefore disappeared one day at the age of nineteen from his father's house with his score under his arm, thirty francs in his pocket and hope in his heart. On the second day he entered Paris, covered with dirt and worn out with the fatigue of his foot-journey. The Opera Comique was naturally not anxious to put a work of an unknown author upon the stage; he had therefore nothing to do but wait, search for a new text, give lessons and for want of scholars to tune pianofortes.

He had however faith in himself. The Erards received him kindly and he also made the acquaintance of Rode, Garat, Mehul and Cherubini. He began to have a reputation in society. Garat and all the amateurs delighted in singing his graceful romances, for which his publisher paid him the insignificant sum of twelve francs each. In 1795 Fiévée gave him to compose la Dot de Suzette, a little opera in one act, which had a success, thanks to the freshness of the music and to the fine and spirited performance of Madame Saint Aubin. The next year Boieldieu composed La Famille suisse, a score in which reigned a style simple and natural, and a charming gracefulness.

In 1798 Zoraine et Zulnare, a drama in 3 acts, established the author's position upon the stage of the Theatre Feydeau. At the same time his instrumental works,—a concerto for the pianoforte, sonatas 1, 3, 4, 6, 7 and 8, four duets for the harp and pianoforte, concerto for the harp, and three trios for harp, pianoforte and violoncello—led to his admission into the number of the professors of the pianoforte at the conservatory Beniowsky, and le Calife de Bagdad—the latter of which has been performed over seven hundred times, fixed forever the high reputation of the composer. In 1802 Ma Tante Aurore was the fashion to an unexampled degree; but Boieldieu, unhappy in marriage, which had joined him, March 19, of that year, with the danseuse Clotilde, went off to Russia in April, 1803. The Emperor Alexander gave him the appointment of chapelmaster, on having met him upon the frontier, and the composer wrote for the imperial theatre of St. Petersburg Rien de trop, la jeune Femme colere (a comedy by Etienne), Amour et Mystere, Abderkan (text by Andieux), Calyppo, Aline reine Golconde, les Voitures versés, Un Tour de soubrette and music to the choruses of Athalie.

The political clouds between France and Russia having been dissipated, Boieldieu felt a desire to see France again; he obtained his dismissal towards the close of the year 1810, after seven years' residence in St. Petersburg. On reaching Paris he found the sceptre of the Opera Comique in the hands of Nicolo. Dalayrac was no more; Catel had nearly given up composition; Cherubini, disgusted with the obstacles which met him in his career, had ceased to write; Mehul displeased with the inconstancy of the public seldom gave a new work to the stage. Nicolo alone exhibited an inexhaustible fecundity; it was in contesting the field with his new rival, that Boieldieu's genius took a novel and magnificent flight. Two female singers at this time divided the favor of the Parisian public; one Madame Duret possessed a voice of great extent, sonorous and, even but slightly thick and her respiration was short; the other, Mlle Regnault (afterwards Madame Lemonnier) had a charming voice, great intelligence and a marvellous facility of vocalization. Nicolo had given both opportunity to distinguish themselves in his Cendrillon; but he preferred the talents of Madame Duret which was one reason for Boieldieu to give Mlle. Regnault the powerful aid of his genius. Jean de Paris, represented early in 1812, obtained a splendid success at the Theatre Feydeau; Elleviou, Martin, Juliet, Mlle. Regnault, and Mad. Gavaudan seconded the composer by an irreproachable execution. The connoisseurs noticed in the score a correct style, and an instrumentation brilliant and full of color. Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village, performed in 1813, gave its auditors a new model of scenic perfection. Then followed a number of occasional pieces, after which the public received with great applause La Fête du Village voisin. Notwithstanding the poverty of the text, the music embroidered upon that canvass is full of spirit and melody. Boieldieu had aided Herold in gaining a footing upon the stage by writing with him the opera Charles de France; at a later date too he sought and obtained for Catel the cross of the Legion of Honor.

In 1817, after Mehul's death, the Institute having elected Boieldieu to the vacant chair, the new member felt himself obliged to justify their choice by a new masterpiece. Le chaperon rouge (July, 1818) was a perfect triumph. Its style is grander, ideas more abundant, and color more varied than in the author's preceding works. But the great labor bestowed upon it, threw Boieldieu into a state of health, which made a long period of rest necessary. For a time he retired into the country; but, being appointed a professor of composition in the Conservatory, he amused and recreated himself by imparting to the young pupils the result of his long experience.

In 1821 he joined Kreutzer, Berton, Cherubini, and Paër in the composition of Blanche de Provence. In 1824, he composed also one act of Pharamond. At this time Boieldieu doubtful of the public favor hesitated to re-enter the theatre with a work entirely of his own composition.

Guilbert de Pixérécourt, then director of the Opera Comique, persuaded him with much difficulty to make the experiment, and Boieldieu composed La Dame blanche which was received with unanimous transports of enthusiasm, Dec. 10, 1825.

This masterpiece has never left the stage and is, we believe the only work, which never was omitted from the list of acting works after its first representation. Nothing new can be said upon its solo pieces, its duets, trios, chorus and finales. It belongs to that type of the Comic opera which can never grow old, no more than Richard, le Deserteur, Montano, and Joconde. Simple its modulations, with no forced harmonics, and full of real melody, this score retains the grand style of its author, who remains always himself, in the midst of the general movement impressed upon the music of that time by the influence of Rossini. But in this work Boieldieu's power culminated; he dreaded the idea of producing inferior works.

He therefore caused the text of des Deux Nuits, entrusted to him by Bouilly to be revised by Scribe. But notwithstanding skilful and extensive changes, the play did not completely satisfy the public, upon its production in 1829. Hope deceived gradually brought Boieldieu to the tomb. Having resigned his place as professor pecuniary anxiety as to the future was added to laryngial pthisis. He made a journey to Pisa without benefit. Forced at length to return to his employment as professor, his health grew still more feeble. The baths of the South were ordered him; but reaching Bordeaux, he became frightened at the progress of his disease, and returned to his country seat at Jarey near Grosbois where he breathed his last in the arms of his family and friends, Oct. 8, 1834.

Mimetic Music.

(Concluded from page 32.)

The present King of Hanover signaled himself, while Crown Prince, by a treatise on Music, which advances not a few rather hazardous interpretations of imitative effects. His Majesty's blindness may have tended to intensify his quickness of ear, in catching at remote resemblances, and hearing a voice we cannot hear, and understanding in detail what only affects us in the mass.

This exceptional acuteness is observable in some at least, of his musical hermeneutics, while in others he but expresses what the average mind may be presumed to feel. One or two of his favorite examples may be worth glancing at. In Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" the royal critic sees presented the pride of a ruler, the arrogance of a priest, the affection severally of a father, mother, and daughter, the gentle ties of love, the courage of a hero, a people's cry for vengeance, the pains of separation, the agonies of death, the exulting overflow of rapture at unhop'd deliverance, all exhibited not only with "inimitable art," but with incomparable completeness." Weber's "Summons to the Dance," as a musical representation of an incident in social life, is alleged to be remarkable for the truth and precision with which all the peculiarities and trifling occurrences of a ball are sketched; "the invitation of the gentleman, the acceptance of the lady, the dance itself, the conversation during the interval, the repetition of the dance, and the leading back of the lady to her seat, with the grateful acknowledgments of the gentleman—all this is accurately conveyed to the ear of the listener by the music." Est-il possible? may some stolid souls exclaim, who never expected a tittle of the meaning in Weber's pièce de circonstance. But all this comes of having good ears, and a working brain between them; just as some ingenious criticism on Shakspeare's text, or Spenser's, may be due to good eyes, not only of microscopic but of milestone piercing power. But once again, and more seriously; in the introduction to "Norma," we are told, may be found "the representation of a neighboring wood in the most exalted style of art. Beginning with deep tones, it unfolds in gloom-inspiring harmonies, and truly reflects the impression which the gloom of an extensive wood produces on our feelings. Occasional glancing and disconnected tones appear to betoken light, breaking through the darkness of the grove; and this is the first drop-scene of the opera—the grove of sacrifice—filthy delineated. Assuredly the striking qualities of this tone picture will still more forcibly suggest themselves to the reader, when I mention the exclamation of a person deprived of sight, who on first hearing this introduction, instantly exclaimed that the scene then actually represented on the stage must be a forest." The prince's Quarterly Reviewer inferred that he was doubtless himself the blind listener in question, and accepted the fact as one no-way surprising; for* with an ear cultivated to the highest degree of delicacy, a memory stored with images of natural beauty, and a heart overflowing with sympathy, the slightest, faintest, train of association—a passage, note, or tone, indicating any one of the characteristic features of forest scenery—might suffice,

And as a fort to which beleagu'ers win
Unhop'd for entrance thro' some friend within;
One clear idea, center'd in the breast.
By memory's magic, lets in all the rest.

"But when it is formally inferred, from anomalous instances of this kind, that a succession of sensible images, including both sounds with their varieties and landscapes with their details may be brought home to the ordinary run (or even to any considerable class) of listeners, through the medium of instrumental music, our thoughts recur involuntarily to Dick Tinto's picture, or Lord Burleigh's nod, or those victims of mesmerism who undertake to ascertain the contents of a long letter by sitting on it. Set a chosen body of connoisseurs to hear Beethoven's 'Symphony' or 'Weber's Summons to the Dance' for the first time, without telling them what the composer is aiming at, and we much doubt whether they will exclaim in chorus, at the proper time, 'That is a troop of reapers, and that the rippling of a brook!' 'Now the storm is coming on, and now it is going off!' 'Now they are flirting between the dances, and now he is taking her back to her mamma!'" It might be edifying to summon a large jury of good men and true, in matters musical—say a septuagint of them—to investigate the meaning of some fresh and untried Lied ohne Worte, in all its broad lights and supersubtle shades of symbolism and significance—to shut them up, each man in a separate cell, like the Seventy of Alexandria, and require from each man separately a full and particular account of what language the music under examination did verily speak. The result—an amalgam of three-score and ten interpretations—would surprise some people, the composer himself not the least; for he, honest man, would no doubt be quite as much astonished at finding all he meant, without meaning it, as ever was Monsieur Jourdain himself, at the incredible apocalypse of his lifelong (but hitherto unconscious and unpremeditated) achievements in prose.

Knowing ones there are, beyond all question, connoisseurs and something more, who could throw new and dazzling light on the meaning mentally attached by Mendelssohn to every movement in his overtures, say, for example, that to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Neither would they be persuaded though he rose from the dead to deny it. Of course that allegro vivace is Philostrate (master of the revels) stirring up the Athenian youth to merriment. Of course that pomposo passage is Theseus wedding Hippolyta with pomp, with triumph, and with revelling. That roulade is Puck putting a girdle about the earth in forty minutes. That prestamente bit is Helena on the scamper after Demetrius. That moto contrario expresses the perplexity and cross-purpose of the lovers in the wood. Surely you recognize at once in that fantastico interval the craze of Titania for ass-headed Bottom? And who can fail to identify that carezzando movement with her stroking his amiable cheeks, and sticking musk-roses in his sleek smooth head, and kissing the fair large ears of him, her gentle joy? As unmistakably does that asprezza betoken the coarse prosaic manner of bully Bottom, as though he were actually (as he wished) munching your good dry oats, and disposing audibly of a peck of provender or a bottle of hay. That allegro vivo as literally represents the ministrations of Peasblossom, Cobweb, Moth, and Mustard-seed. Nor less manifestly does that burlando or burlesco import the performance, by Quince & Co, of the most lamentable comedy and most cruel death of Pyramus and Thisbe—including the agitato of the nervous Prologue, the debile of Flute's small voice, the furioso of Bottom's bluster, and the con veemenza of Lion's roar.

It has been observed by one whose words come with authority, on a subject like this, that, properly speaking, the whole science of music is a storehouse hung round with materials of expression and imitation, for the use of the composer; but it depends upon his instinctive feelings whether the object to which he devotes them lie within the legitimate province of music. "Delusion in music, as in painting, is only the delight of the vulgar." We may love the idea of the dance conveyed in a light, tripping measure, or the "sense of the fresh echoing greenwood given by prolonged bngle-like tones;" but we have another feeling for the mimicry, instrumental or vocal, of the greenwood choir, pretty warblers as they are. Let not him therefore who, in this sort of servile imitation, and mechanical mimicry, would tune his merry note

Unto the sweet bird's throat, let not him come hither, come hither, come hither, but betake himself elsewhere, out of hearing—"anywhere, anywhere out of the world" of art and good taste. As an accomplished critic, already quoted, has remarked, the mind feels the exceeding sorrowfulness of the "Lachrymosa" in the Requiem, the faltering tones of "qua resurget," which seem to remind the hearer that here the dying Mozart burst into tears; our hearts sink as we hear how "the children of Israel sighed!"—sighed!—sighed!—by reason of the bondage;" but we care not for the closest imitation of a sob given in the duet of the Gazza Laddra. "The broad humor of the catch and glee family, as well as the practical buffoonery of the time, led to a great deal of burlesque imitative music, both in Germany and Italy, in the seventeenth century. The cackling of hens all on one note and ending with a fifth above, the mewling of rival cats in nice chromatic order, with a staccato of course by way of a spù, were favorite pastimes of the severest German contrapuntists; and even Marcello, the Pindar of Music, as he was called, has left two elaborate choruses, one for soprani, the other for contralti, which baa like like sheep and mou like oxen. These were the avowed absurdities of men who liked occasionally to drop their robes of dignity; but at all times the close power of imitation which music affords has been a dangerous rock for the musician."† Dulce est desipere in loco; but even the sapient are liable to trifle occasionally out of place.

It is agreed that all dramatic music must be full of imitation; and herein has been said to lie its greatest charm and its greatest snare. The vague yet forcible suggestiveness of really characteristic melody, may be illustrated by what Mr. Thackeray remarks of Irish scenery—that he thinks it just like Irish melodies—sweet, wild, and sad, even in the sunshine. "You can neither represent one nor the other by words; but I am sure if one could translate 'The Meeting of the Waters' into form and colors, it would fall into the exact shape of a tender Irish landscape. So, take and play that tune upon your fiddle, and shut your eyes and muse a little, and you have the whole scene before you."‡ Henri Beyle discourses admiringly on certain cantilenes which express the passions, and avers (in contradiction to an argument we have previously referred to) that jealousy is expressed by the aria Vedro mentr'io suspiro, sung by Count Almaviva in Mozart's Nozze di Figaro: he adds,§ that in the whole of Rossini's Otello he can discover nothing so expressive of jealousy, "ce tourment des cœurs tendres," as in Mozart's air aforesaid. Of that passionate serenade in the Don Giovanni, Deh vieni alla finestra, which "breathes the very soul of refined sensuality," Mr. Leigh Hunt once said, that you see the gallant before you, with his mandolin and his cap and feather, taking place of the nightingale for that amorous hour; and you feel that the sounds must inevitably draw his mistress to the window. "Their intenseness even renders them pathetic; and his heart seems in earnest, because his senses are."|| The notes of the dramatic composer must tell the incident as well as the text, often instead of it, says Lady Eastlake; the composer must give us definite thoughts; his skill lies between defining them over much and over little; it is his art so to treat the subject that you feel it is subservient to him, not he to it—making you forget even the thing imitated in the resources it has developed. Of this, "what grander example is there in the world than Handel's Hailstone Chorus? It begins with the closest imitation. There are the single decided ominous notes, like the first heavy lumps of ice striking the earth in separate shots. They fall faster, yet still detached, when from a battery which we have felt hanging suspended over our heads,

Down comes the deluge of sonorous hail, shattering everything before it: and having thus raised the idea, he sustains it with such wonderful simplicity of means—the electric shouting of the choruses 'Fire! Hailstones!' only in strict unison—the burst of the storm changing only from quavers into semiquavers—the awful smashing of the elements only the common chord of the key, and that the natural key—till we feel astonished how the mere representation of the rage of the elements should have given occasion for one of the grandest themes that musician ever conveyed."

So writes one of the devoutest of devout Handeliens, one who is, perhaps, more than a little kind, not to say just a little blind, to a lapse or a foible here and there, on the great master's part, in the exercise of his mimetic faculty. Handel, as another critic observes, must have felt prouder of the vague tumultuous feeling of awe and veneration called forth by the choruses in his "Messiah," than of the resemblance discovered, or thought to be discovered, between a passage in one of his serenatas and the walk of a giant††—

See what ample strides he takes;

and the "attempt to represent the sun standing still, in the oratorio of 'Joshua,' almost reduces him to the level of the ingenious inventor (first brought into notice by the late Charles Mathews), who, to illustrate his scheme of imitative action, used to give his hands a rotatory motion at the mention of the globe." †† In every art and science there are quackeries afloat, by which quacks make a name, and from which genius has not always the self-respect to turn aside.

Some themes there are which, by their very nature, afford a tempting subject to imitative ingenuity—and an indulgence in which is not without apologists among even the strictest sect of high-artists. Storms and tempests, for example, convey a sense of sublimity which, "however frequently vulgarized by the mere tricks of performers," must ever, as Lady Eastlake §§ says, make them favorite subjects for audiences and composers. Freely she avows that even that old favorite, Steibelt's Storm, in spite of strumming schoolroom associations, when the lightning used to break time, and come in at the wrong place, and then have to begin all over again, has a moral as well as a dramatic meaning which justifies the predilections of childhood. It was not, she says, the noise and din of two handfuls of notes with all the pedals down, which juvenile amateurs declare to be "just like thunder," but at which she felt inclined to stop her ears with an instinct of the profaneness of the attempt; but it was the gradual lulling of the winds and hushing of all nature which preceded the crash, and then the clearing of the air after it, the tinkling of the rain-drops all sparkling with light that is bursting out in the west, and finally that happy chorus of birds in the return of the gay chirping ritornel, in four sharps, which tells you all is over and no harm done to any one. Beethoven's Tempest also, in his Pastoral Symphony—which, by-the-by, is like Thomson's Seasons set to Music—is the grandest and most fearful of storms, as M. Oulibichef says, "which ever thundered in the basses, whistled in the flutes, bellowed and blustered in the trumpets, and lightened and hailed in the violins;" but who can resist the sweet enchantment of those modulations, when the thunder is heard retreating in the distance, and timid sounds of inquiry rise up from leaf and flower, and birds answer, and steps emerge, and in a moment

'Tis beauty all, and grateful song around!

At the same time, her ladyship contends that it is not from any work of imitative music, however enchanting, that the highest musical pleasure can be derived. The grand object and highest prerogative of all the fine arts, according to another Quarterly Reviewer, is, or ought to be, the same: to present the images of power, beauty, and sublimity, capable of expanding, refining, or elevating the mind; and excite passions, feelings, affections, or emotions, corresponding with those which the most striking scenes in nature or the most touching passages of human existence might call up. "Even in painting, necessarily the most imitative, mere facility of imitation is a vulgar quality at best; and Parrhasius's curtain, which his rival attempted to lift up, or the supposed door at Greenwich Hospital, which visitors were wont to run against, rank in art far below the most outrageous libel on nature which Fuseli himself ever perpetrated. We would therefore rather rest the fame of the acknowledged masterpieces in musical composition . . . on the broad general impression produced by them than on their imitative facilities." ††† It is not, avers the fairer critic, in the likeness of anything in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth, that the highest musical capacity can be tried. "It is not the dipping passage like a crested wave in 'The flood stood upright as an heap,' or the wandering of the notes in 'All we like sheep have gone astray,' in which Handel's intensest musical instinct is displayed; for beautiful as are these passages, and full of imagery to eye and ear, they smack of a certain mechanical contrivance; but it is in the simple soothing power of the first four bars of the first song in the 'Messiah,' which descend like heavenly dew upon the heart, telling us that those divine words, 'Comfort ye,' are at hand. This we feel to be the indefinable province of expression, in which the composer has to draw solely upon his own intense sympathies for the outward likeness of a thing which is felt and judged of only in the innermost depths of every heart." ††† Comparatively speaking, one might say of mere imitation, as Hamlet of flute-playing that 'tis easy as lying,—and too many of us know how easy that is, especially if white lies may count. But the eloquence of real musical expression is of another quality—the gift of the cleft—one of those prerogatives which pertain to the chosen few, and mark them out a right royal priesthood, a peculiar people—the chartered expositors of a language which the adroit may can second-handly imitate, but which only themselves can originally and adequately express.

* See Quarterly Review for July, 1859.

† Lady Eastlake.

‡ Thackeray: The Irish Sketch-book, ch. xxiv.

§ Œuvres Posthumes de Stendhal, Lettres à ses Amis, I, 43.

|| The Round Table, essay xxxix.

 Lady Eastlake's Essay on Music.

†† Polyphebus, in "Acis and Galatea."

‡‡ Hayward's Essays, II, 221.

§§ See her essay as reprinted in Murray's Railway Series, pp. 4-5, 51-55, passim.

||| Quarterly Review, No. 132, p. 510.

††† Lady Eastlake.

Musical Societies in New York.

The "Liederkränze," formed in 1847, is the oldest German Society in the city, and now numbers 600 members, of which number about 200 are active and take part in the rehearsals and concerts. The whole society meets for rehearsal twice each week, and the male voices meet once alone for the practice of glees, etc. They are able, with patient and careful drilling, to perform most of the classic music of the old masters. Three or four public performances are given each season, and they are frequently called upon to sing the choruses at the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society. They have done so twice this year, and are at present rehearsing Schumann's new work, "Paradise and the Peri," for performance at the next Philharmonic concert. It is a first-class society, ranks high as being one of the most careful and well trained in the city. They are ably conducted by Mr. A. Pauer, and have for President Mr. Fred. Rapp. Whatever is undertaken by them is sure to be done well. They have been quite prosperous, and are about to build a hall for their own accommodation. The proceeds of their public concerts are devoted entirely to charitable objects.

The "Arion" Society is also composed of Germans, and was formed in January, 1854, from the "Liederkränze." It now numbers 150 members, of which 50 to 60 are singers—all males. They are conducted by Carl Bergmann and Carl Anschütz—two of the most popular German musicians in the city—and meet for rehearsal Tuesday and Saturday evenings. They give three vocal and instrumental concerts each season. This year they have been particularly successful, and were sustained by an orchestra of 50 performers, with some of the best soloists to be found in the city. The music was of the highest order, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt and Wagner being represented in the programme. They are sometimes called upon to sing the choral parts of the opera at the Academy of Music, and 40 voices from this society rendered the famous drinking chorus in the first act of Halévy's opera, "La Juive," with fine effect, when it was produced here last winter. In July of last year they took the prize at the great musical festival held at Buffalo.

The "Teutonia Männerehor," another German society, was formed in 1852, and numbers about 100 members male and female. They are prosperous and enterprising, under the lead of Mr. J. Mosenthal, the distinguished organist of Calvary Church, and meet twice a week for rehearsal.

The Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn was incorporated pursuant to a general act of the Legislature, on the 5th of May, 1857, since which time it has been steadily increasing, both in size and public favor, and now numbers 948 associate, 150 professional, and 100 complimentary members—in all 1198. Five public concerts and fifteen rehearsals are given annually. During the past winter, each of their concerts given within their spacious auditorium of the Academy of Music—an enterprise, by the way, that originated in the success of this society—was attended by upwards of 3000 persons; their programmes comprised the highest class of musical compositions, rendered by a full orchestra of 40 performers, and the best vocal talent of the opera troupes of New York.

All pecuniary receipts over and above the expenditures are devoted to elevate the character of their performances. Mr. Theodore Eisfeld, here, as with the Philharmonic Society of New York, officiates as conductor at both rehearsals and concerts, and Mr. J. Noll as leader.

A Society styling itself the "Polyphonic Association," was organized for the purpose of the encouragement and promotion of music and musical talent in Brooklyn, Oct. 4, 1860, which has increased rapidly in size, and bids fair to become a large and influential society. It already numbers nearly 200 members, among whom are some eminent artists and professors, though it is composed mainly of young men, amateurs, who derive much benefit from it as a means of musical intercourse and social advancement. They meet twice each week for rehearsal, and hold semi-monthly "reunions," to which members with their friends only are admitted. Besides these, they give five private concerts, to which none but members of the association are admitted, and all the pieces are performed by artist and amateur members. Five public concerts are given each season. These are rendered attractive by the auxiliary aid of artists who do not belong to the Society. At the last one, given at the Brooklyn Athenæum, Dr. Clare W. Beames, with his pupil, Miss Marie Brainerd, Mr. George Simpson, and Mons. Henry Appy, the violinist, all from New York, assisted. Its government is vested in a board of 25 directors, chosen annually, who appoint the President and other officers. A different musical conductor is appointed for each concert. It is supported by entrance fees, fines, assessments, proceeds of concerts, &c.

Unlike most of the older associations, this one combines instruction with practice, and classes are taught by Professors who are members of the Society. This is an excellent plan, but the present system of teaching is sadly defective, and we regret to observe that upon this subject much ignorance prevails among our countrymen, which it will require time and experience to remove. Many persons argue that not all, but only a select few can learn to sing, on the ground that all do not possess the voice. Even professors and teachers fall into this error, and most unphilosophically undertake to cultivate the voice without any reference to the ear and understanding. Two years ago, when a large free class for musical instruction was formed in this city, from two to three hundred applicants were refused admission, because the "Professor" in attendance decided that they had no voice! Many who aspire to learn, and feel that they are capable of attaining a great degree of proficiency, are denied the pleasure, as well as deterred from undertaking it, on account of the difficulties to be surmounted and obstacles overcome. This arises from the want of method and system in the usual mode of teaching, which presents it as an empirical, rather than a positive and truly mathematical science, which it really is—a science as easily accessible to all as chemistry, mathematics, or any other of its departments.

That all who are able to speak, are also able, with a proper system of instruction, to sing; and that all should be as well able to read music at sight, as to read language, has been abundantly proved, as well by the experience of our public schools,—in almost all of which music is successfully taught,—as by the more complete and decisive experiments which have been in continual operation for upwards of ten years in Paris and throughout France. The classes of Monsieur Emile Chev , whose system has been adopted by the Conservatoire, and is now recognized by the highest authority throughout Europe, as the only scientific and practical method of teaching music,—numbering from 800 to 1000 pupils, (composed mainly of the ouvrier population of Paris) can sing part music at sight, in the most difficult intonations of the major and minor modes with perfect aplomb and command of voice, without any instrument to guide them; and not only do they become one and all executors, but complete masters of the science. As an illustration of their capabilities in this respect, I annex a paragraph, translated from "L'Opinion Nationale" of March 13th, 1860:

"One evening, a few weeks ago, Mr. Richard Wagner presented himself at Monsieur Chev 's class-room, where eight hundred pupils were hearing a lesson, and handed to the professor a manuscript piece which he had just composed and desired to hear read. M. Chev  gave his class in charge to his son, went into an adjoining room, transcribed Mr. Wagner's composition (a fugue for eight voices), on a huge blackboard, and had it taken to the pupils. Instantly, the whole class, without the aid of any instrument, without any other indication than the tone by a tuning-fork, sang Mr. Wagner's music—note, Mr. Wagner's music!—and sang it with such ensemble, such perfection of intonation, solidity of rhythm, and correctness in the shades of expression, that it was more like finished execution than reading at sight. Monsieur Wagner went away confounded with astonishment, after having thanked the unique choristers and their admirable Professor, saying he had never witnessed such a feat in his life.

Such results are truly extraordinary. Pupils of a course where hundreds are taught together, where all who present themselves are received without any choice whatever, do what artist choristers of the Conservatoire Society and of the opera could not do. But some will say, such results can be obtained only after years of labor. We answer: the pupils of the course held by M. Chev , at the Polytechnic School, as we ourselves witnessed, read at first sight in parts after a very few lessons. After a few months they were able to read at sight without any hesitation, all the pieces of the repertoire of choral music."

A powerful contrast is here presented with our societies, where notwithstanding the members are picked, and none admitted except those who are supposed to be able to read music at sight, a piano accompaniment—or one of some kind—is obligato, and an incessant drilling is required to attain even mediocre perfection.

Perhaps the best illustration of our poverty in this respect is to be found in the small, weak and inefficient choruses which appear at our operatic entertainments, offering a strong contrast with the powerful and well trained corps of the Haymarket, London, the Grand Opera, Paris, and others on the Continent. There is no reason why ours should be so much inferior, except that from want of a proper system of teaching, the science has not yet been brought within reach of the masses. A great error, to which our people are liable, is to suppose that noise and velocity constitute music.

Such ideas as these were suggested by listening to the performance of an oratorio, a short time since, and observing the imperfect manner in which it was rendered, in spite of the regular weekly rehearsals of the same piece, during the previous five months.

If my space permitted, I could give some interesting facts concerning the shallowness of some of our "reputed" musicians, their lack of real knowledge of the science, and the mode pursued by them to hide their defects; but these must be reserved for another occasion.

To all who perceive the great influence music is destined to exert in furthering the development of race, and reflect upon the significant truths above quoted, this subject commends itself as one of some importance.—Transcript.

Eugene Scribe.

During something like half a century, the bright and indefatigable dramatic author—who has just died suddenly—filled the stage of Europe; and with works of such a variety, in every prose form of composition as to suggest the presence of a well-spring of perpetual youth in the man who could be so fertile, so buoyant, so ingenious to the last. Instead of our wondering at his living held out so long, the surprise of his having died late or soon, comes like a shock.

Of the story of Scribe's early life—his parentage and training—we are not in case for the moment to speak. Probably since the year 1815, or thereabouts, the only biography of special interest which could be written of him would be a list of his plays. On many of these it would be interesting to annotate with reference to the changes which have passed over French society during the last marvellous fifty years. In his earlier works will be found traces of the Empire, with its confusion of ranks and families, for the arrangement of which even the first Napoleon's strong will and grasp over organization proved insufficient. Then came the reigns so fondly looked forward to by the nobles of the Faubourg as periods of blissful rehabilitation for their order, and which proved, when they came, so unsatisfactory in any thing like progress or fulfilment. Their conventionalities, too, will be found reflected in Scribe's "Th atre:" which, during its first twenty years of production, was principally restricted to pieces of a limited scale and peculiar quality befitting a minor theatre at Paris. Such was the Th atre de Madame, in spite of its protection from La Duchesse de Berri. It was not till Louis Philippe came to the throne that those with Academical honors in view—the quest of which has turned so many a staid French brain—Scribe entered on five-act prose plays, which were to bring him into comparison with Beaumarchais and other predecessors who had eschewed verse. Of these, the first, and the most famous, perhaps, was "Bertrand et Raton." In this, an amount of sly, political satire was put forth, such as, under the reign of Charles Dix, Scribe knew his world to well to have ventured. There is a group of these heartless comedies, all more or less clever. From this style the academician, once set in his seat, passed into those dramas of intrigue and complicated incident by which we have most lately known him. It may be doubted whether anything analogous to these is to be found in any other literature—whether any other dramatist has ever employed so much power of their interweaving into a tissue countless incidents, which never could happen in one and the same history—and this with such exquisite adroitness and hardihood, that the spectator was enthralled into forgetfulness of the absurdities inherent in the combination. Scribe worked much with collaborators; and, provided that any inexperienced man brought him an idea or a situation (character, of course, in such authorship can go for little), he could find in those sufficient material and suggestion. Then, he had the art of commending the compound and the structure by an ease of style, a common sense—a common-place, too—of sentiment—a neatness of expression—a neatness of reply, a use of wit, sparing and never soaring, which went far to reconcile the wildest contradictions. There was no depressing genius or superiority about him, to stir antagonism among the gifted, or to oppress the thoughtless by too deeply troubling them to think.

One more outline must be added to the above few and rapidly sketched ones of a man whose complete portrait must wait for some future day—this in commemoration of Scribe, as a writer for music. His opera-books are many; the verse in all of them is miserably flat and prosaic; the stories of some are excellent—of one (we mean "La Juive") incomparable. In this capacity M. Scribe will go down to posterity as the companion of MM. Auber and Meyerbeer.

The outward man in society was cheerful, simple, and gay—rarely, if ever, brilliant. The fortune he amassed by his dramatic rights and copyrights must be something very large—it being understood that, as regarded all matters of gain and profit, he knew how to bargain shrewdly as well as to save discreetly. For better, for worse, however we see at present no one within or without the precincts of the French theatres in the least qualified to take his place.—London Athenaeum.

Abbe Vogler and his Pupils.

(From the German, by J. H. KAPPES.)

Almost every morning, about ten o'clock, even in stormy weather, a short, thick, somewhat stooping man, in the simple black dress of an Abb , might be seen hastening either into the castle or old theatre of Darmstadt. Usually, a number of young men were collected around him, with whom he joked and laughed. In the theatre, he conducted rehearsals for morning concerts and theatrical representations; in the castle, he conversed on musical theory, with the grand duke, who, since the year 1807, had employed him in Darmstadt, as spiritual counsellor and court chapel-master. Together, they played the newest duets, criticized operas, or counselled concerning their chapel. Occasionally, the grand duchess Louisa would be present, and participate in the conversation of the thoughtful artists. Since the Prince had left the military service of Russia, and undertaken the government of his own lands, music had been the favorite art, into the depths and purity of which, he had penetrated far, by his own study and the aid of Vogler.

At that time the means necessary for bringing out a great musical work were, indeed, scarce. An orchestra must be created, a theatre constructed, and a musical library founded. Vogler quickly conceived a plan to accomplish these objects.

The most skilful hautboist, who had been employed in the army, was elevated to the post of court-musician, and accomplished masters of a single instrument were attracted thither from all parts of Germany. Vogler understood the establishment of a chapel quite perfectly, for he had already called into existence a similar institute at Mannheim and Stockholm. Still, male and female singers were required, by whom the chorus of the opera and mass could be performed. These also were soon supplied. The prince collected in one of the great halls of his castle, the so-called concert hall, many females from the most cultivated families, and gave to all the best advantages for a musical education. Numerous male amateurs soon presented themselves, and music became to many an individual the stepping stone of promotion.

By desire of the grand-duke, Vogler had constructed an immense organ, according to a simplified plan of his own, upon which he conducted a choir. The grand-duke stood, usually, by his desk in the middle of the hall, gave the time with his b ton, and thus directed the whole performance. On Good Friday, these sacred concerts reached a culminating point. All the company were then collected in the concert hall in mourning dresses. Vogler elicited from his gigantic instrument the deepest notes of pain and joy; and two hundred cultivated, noble voices sang a requiem of the great master's. More sublime and highly finished music could not be heard at that time, in all Europe; and it is said, Vogler oft-times strove in vain to conceal the tears which his own playing excited.

The power of his masterly execution is further illustrated by the following incidents: During one of his long journeyings, he stopped at Swabia. There he heard that the gifted Schubert, whose songs and poetry for the people he greatly admired, had been already ten years in Hohenasberg condemned to trial for a political offence; there, in a rocky prison, far from music and song, of which he possessed profound knowledge, he disgracefully pined. The commander of the castle, after many entreaties, permitted Vogler to see and speak to the fettered Prometheus, on the plea that he was a poor musician, who desired to make trial of his skill on an instrument of his own invention, the Orchestron, before so competent a judge. Vogler began to play, permitted the tones to resound with tremendous power, then die away in gentle cadences. One might hear the thunder roll, the storm howl, and the rain pour down. Schubert could not longer restrain his emotion, but, falling on the musician's neck in an ecstasy of delight, he cried "Either you are the devil or Abt Vogler." And from that hour the two became intimate friends. Schubert soon after received his freedom and a situation as chapel-master in Wirttemberg service.

At one time, also, the study of Vogler's great pastoral mass was pursued with all musical skill and diligence, in the city church of Darmstadt. The master himself played the organ, and, in rehearsals, the grand-duke stood, with head bent forward, the b ton in his hand, upon the chancel opposite the organ. The effect of the interludes was so impressive, that after the conclusion of one such, the grand-duke exclaimed in the highest excitement: "Thunder and the devil, Vogler, play not so skilfully; no one can sing after such playing, and I surely cannot keep time!"

A circle of remarkable young men had gradually collected around the first composer and theorist of his time. They were come from all parts of Germany, in order to become initiated into the depth and purity of the musical art, under him who had been a pupil of the great Father Valotti at Padua.

To Vogler, it was reserved to revive an old, almost dead art, and to give each and every piece a peculiar character, by his skilled instrumentation. In this his greater pupil, C. M. von Weber scarcely approached him.

In the year 1810, circumstances brought together, as pupils of Vogler, those young men, who, at the present day, are regarded as masters in the musical world. They were Carl M. von Weber, G nsbacher, Meyerbeer, Peter von Winter, and Freiherr von Poissl. The first three dwelt with Vogler in his own house, which the grand-duke had caused to be vacated for his use. There this artist family practised a strange housekeeping. The earliest morning found all the company assembled in the saloon, where they conversed Socratically on musical composition and the art of singing. Each brought to the teacher his recent exercises. Vogler condemned or praised without reserve, while he always gave reasons, or pointed out errors, according to his own system. Sometimes he corrected with his own hand, and gave many striking examples from the old masters. Here was truly a musical academy. Many times Vogler, in enthusiastic excitement, would step before the table, the young men standing around in a circle, and extemporize profound lectures concerning the art of composition, fugues, and singing. His pupils listened in silent amazement, for, at those times, words flowed from his lips, such as could not be daily heard. When the hours of labor were passed, lighter performances succeeded, but those usually led to earnest study.

Vogler was accustomed, in order to test the genius of his pupils, to place before them such exercises as the following: He would take one of his numerous musical snuff-boxes, place it upon the piano and cause it to play. The pupils must then extemporize variations to the snuff-box, upon the piano, violoncello, violoncello or flute.

In this ingenious art of musical improvisation C. M. von Weber principally excelled; and him he always declared to be his most productive scholar.

Vogler never permitted an entire opera to be composed under his direction, but induced his pupils to study—to investigate thoroughly the most difficult music by the best authors, and thus to comprehend the true spirit of the art. "You must think freely and independently," he would always; "your genius must be restrained by guidance. When you are able to spell, you can learn to read by yourselves." In this manner Von Weber transposed Voglers opera Samori, for the piano, and also composed many variations. Meyerbeer wrote his cantata, "God and Nature;" also later in the same place, but independent of Vogler, the opera "Jephtha." Gänsbacher wrote organ pieces. By careful analysis of the most superior works, the pupils were led to discriminate; and by never attempting any great work of their own, they acquired skill in originating musical ideas, and secured the aid of Vogler in the great art of instrumentation.

After the conclusion of theatrical or concert-rehearsals, Vogler usually hastened into the castle to dinner; for he was a constant companion of his princely friend, at whose table the graces and muses always presided, and where keen wit was esteemed the best seasoning. Whenever Vogler appeared in state costume, he was an object of undisguised amusement. Short and thick, with head somewhat bent forward, his long hands, with long fingers, (which in their full extent, could reach two octaves) hung almost to the ground. In the character of an Abbé and Knight of the golden spur, his dress consisted of short black trowsers, terminated by stockings one red and the other white, black shoes, with a golden spur on the right foot. From the collar of his wide-skirted dress-coat fell the little mantle, upon which was affixed the sign of his order, and with which the wind often made wild sport. On a red band he wore the emblem of merit from the house of Hessen Darmstadt, and on the left side, a huge sword. While now the jovial master devoted himself, at the rich table of his friend, to the enjoyment of the repast and social conversation—to the spirit of Champagne and Hockheimer, the gifted scholars, at home, stormed the well-filled cellar—and destroyed the life of many a bottle, until one after another, as evening approached, looked around for a quiet little place in which to repose. When the master returned, late at night, he always noticed with alarm the death-like stillness of the house. He knew immediately that strange spirits had been at work—and in order only to preserve the reputation of the house, though inwardly smiling, he sometimes reproved in this manner, "You little children, what have you been doing here?" To which they humorously replied; "Papa would you pull your own?"—thus, in the language of an old adage, the staggerers triumphantly put the staggerer to bed.

The richest among the young men was Meyerbeer, the poorest Carl M. von Weber—but as all possessed one spirit, so they all carried but one purse; and, in after years, under all pressing circumstances, the noble Meyerbeer became a banker for his friends.

Each one was accustomed, after having completed his work to engage in some favorite pursuit. Meyerbeer, for instance sat often for the whole day, in some one of the various pleasure gardens and listened to the singing of birds. Von Weber delighted to spend an hour, frequently, at a famous inn, opposite the castle, especially because there, the country people from the Odenwald, Oberhessen or the Rhine found accommodation. For he loved the peasant life, and ever listened with pleasure to their simple ballads. There it was, from the lips of those peasant vocalists, that he procured some of the most beautiful melodies for the songs and later operas.

Vogler loved his pupils as children—they him as a father. He flattered none, but expressed to each an opinion of his peculiar ability. Thus, he foretold to the composer of "The Freischütz" and "Oberon," a splendid future—and he assured Meyerbeer, that he was possessed of remarkable talent which by untiring industry, would enable him to accomplish great things—and that he would become distinguished for the original construction of his music.

On the 6th of May 1814, Vogler died, from a sudden stroke of apoplexy. Two priests and a few friends followed his coffin ornamented with a golden Lyre and a laurel wreath to the grave, in the old church yard, near the chapel, where his princely friend caused a marble monument, with a suitable inscription to be erected to his memory. His pupils had been previously scattered in various parts of the world, but the fame of their increasing celebrity had reached the ears of the old master. One of them, before his journey to London, in Jan. 1826, visited the burial place of his revered instructor. Little did he then anticipate, that his own spirit, so consecrated to music, would ere five months should elapse be enjoying the harmonies of a higher sphere. Yet so it was, and his body soon lay mouldering in Moorfield's chapel London.

Gänsbacher lived as a valued organist in Vienna. Poissl conducted, for many years the opera at Munich. Winter died in the same place having acquired an enviable reputation. Meyerbeer has celebrated his world's triumph in the world's metropolis according to the prediction of his prophetic teacher.

The Star Spangled Banner.

In 1814, when the British fleet was at the mouth of the Potomac River, and intended to attack Baltimore, Mr. Key and Mr. Skinner were sent in a vessel with a flag of truce to obtain the release of some prisoners the English had taken in their expedition against Washington. They did not succeed, and were told that they would be detained till after the attack had been made on Baltimore. Accordingly, they went in their own vessel, strongly guarded, with the British fleet as it sailed up the Patapsco; and when they came in sight of Fort M'Henry, a short distance below the city, they could see the American flag distinctly flying on the ramparts. As the day closed in, the bombardment of the fort commenced, and Mr. Key and Mr. Skinner remained on deck all night, watching with deep anxiety every shell that was fired. While the bombardment continued, it was sufficient proof that the fort had not been surrendered. It suddenly ceased sometime before day; but as they had no communication with any of the enemy's ships, they did not know whether the fort had surrendered or the attack upon it been abandoned. They paced the deck the rest of the night in painful suspense, watching with intense anxiety for the return of day, at length the light came, and they saw that "our flag was still there," and soon they were informed that the attack had failed. In the fervor of the moment, Mr. Key took an old letter from his pocket, and on its back wrote the most of this celebrated song, finishing it before he reached Baltimore. He showed it to his friend Judge Nicholson, who was so pleased with it that he placed it at once in the hands of the printer, and in an hour after it was all over the city, and hailed with enthusiasm, and took its place at once as a national song.

We add to the original words the new verse (the 5th), by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Oh, say, can you see, by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming?
Whose broad stripes and bright stars, through the perilous fight,
O'er the ramparts we watched, were so gallantly streaming;
And the rockets' red glare, the bombs bursting in air,
Gave proof through the night that our flag was still there:
Oh, say, does that Star-Spangled Banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?
On that shore, dimly seen through the mists of the deep,
Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,
Where is that which the breeze, o'er the towering steep,
As it fitfully blows, now conceals, now discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,
In full glory reflected now shines in the stream:
'Tis the Star-Spangled Banner; oh, long may it wave,
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

And where are the foes who so vauntingly swore
That the havoc of war, and the battle's confusion,
A home and a country should leave us no more?
Their blood has wash'd out their foul footsteps' pollution;
No refuge could save the hireling and slave
From the terror of flight, or the gloom of the grave;
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph doth wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

Oh, thus be it ever, when freemen shall stand
Between their loved homes and the war's desolation!
Blest with victory and peace, may the heaven-rescued land

Praise the Power that hath made and preserved us a nation!

Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust."

VERSE BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

When a land is illuminated by liberty's smile,
If a foe from within strikes a blow at her glory,
Down, down with the traitor that dares to defile
The flag of her stars and the page of her story!
By the millions unchained when our birthright was gained,
We will keep her bright blazon forever unstained!
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave
While the land of the free is the home of the brave!

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 22.—There has been no winter, in my recollection, when we have had so many really good concerts as during the past. I have again two to record. On Thursday the third concert of the Arion took place, with the following programme.

PART I.

1. Sinfonie in C—"Jupiter,".....Mozart
2. Thurmerlied, Double Chorus and Orchestra. (First time).....G. Rebling
3. Fantaiste for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra. Beethoven Solo Piano, W. Barth, member of the "Arion." Ladies Chorus of the N. Y. Sing Academy and "Arion." (First time.)
4. Choral Overture.....O. Nicolai Organ, Chorus and Orchestra. (First time).

PART II.

5. Overture—"Rienzi".....R. Wagner
6. The Church, Chorus without accompaniment...Becker
7. Drinking chorus—"La Juive".....Halévy
8. Raczky March.....H. Berlioz

Several of these pieces were new to us, which made them all the more interesting. In the Fantasia of Beethoven, the choral part reminds the hearer strongly of the fourth movement of the Ninth Symphony; the airs are similar, the whole treatment of the one is very like the other, and the resemblance even holds good in the difficulty and unsingableness of the vocal part, which is extremely high and fatiguing. This is one of the reasons that the performance of this number was not as satisfactory as all the others. The piano, too, was in the hands of a gentleman who played well for an amateur, but could not give the artistic rendering which the composition needs to make it thoroughly appreciable.

Another interesting feature was Nicolai's Choral Overture, of which Mr. Dwight has spoken so ably in one of his several letters, that I need not touch upon it further. The choruses were admirable, and the orchestra did ample justice to the compositions which it was their part to reproduce.

I must turn to upon the all-absorbing, exciting topics of the day even here. The music of the drum and fife is understood by every one, and is at this time fast superseding all others. The spirit of the times was manifested at the Philharmonic on Saturday night, as it takes the first place everywhere else. Owing to the departure of many members of the Society and frequenters of the concerts with their several regiments, the audience was not quite as large as usual; but there were still quite enough persons present to represent the general enthusiasm. In the audience almost every one, lady or gentleman, wore the red, white and blue, in some shape, and the members of the Liederkranz were all decorated in a similar way. The concert was an uncommonly fine one, and had the merit of being just long enough. Mozart's G minor Symphony opened the programme—and was exceedingly well played. Then followed an aria by Mendelssohn, "Infelice," from Miss Brainerd. This lady, who has but rarely appeared before the public of late, and kept herself so quiet that some of her friends do not know where to find her, sang very well indeed, and looked all the better, in the eyes of the patriotic audience for wearing a sash of the Union colors across her breast. When she had finished her aria, there was a call from various quarters for the "Star Spangled Banner," upon which Mr. Eisfeld came forward, and announced that the piece desired would be sung by Miss Brainerd and the Liederkrantz, with accompaniment of the orchestra, at the end of the programme, and that the audience were requested to join in the chorus.

Mr. Saar next played a solo on the piano. This was a transcription of his own, from Tannhäuser, a most effective piece, eminently characteristic of the whole opera. The Overture to Egmont, the martial elements of which made it quite appropriate, ended the first part. The second part consisted of Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Nacht, very finely sung by the Liederkrantz. It made a much finer impression, with a large chorus, and full orchestra, than when it was sung some years ago by the same Society, then not as large as now, for a charitable purpose. The solos, however, with the exception of the tenor, Mr. Steinway, were hardly worthy of so fine a chorus. The music must be heard more than once or twice to be appreciated; it does not fall easily upon the ear, like most music of Mendelssohn's. The last two choruses, however, are uncommonly fine.

This finished, Miss Brainerd reappeared, sheets of paper with the words of the song were distributed among the audience, the American flag was suspended from the proscenium, and the orchestra played the introduction to the Star Spangled Banner. Unfortunately it was set very high for Miss Brainerd, which marred the effect of the solos; but the choruses were grand! Four or five verses were sung, and during the last the enthusiasm rose to the highest pitch. Flags and handkerchiefs were waved, cheer followed cheer, and there was a tumult such as the decorous, sober Philharmonic has never yet witnessed. It was soul-stirring and exciting to the last degree, yet underneath lay the mournful thought of how many of these brave large hearts would be stilled, how many others would bleed with anguish, before another winter would reassemble some of us within those walls!

—t—

ST. LOUIS, APRIL 28, 1861. — This is the programme of our last Concert but one. The musical year ends in May.

1. Overture, "Don Juan".....Mozart
2. { a Chorus, "Lord! thou almeo art God!" } Mendelssohn
3. { b Chorale, "To God on high" } Bartholdy
4. Cavatina, "Come per me sereno," "Sonnambula".....Bellini
5. Violin Solo, "Première Concerto".....De Bériot
6. Chorus, "Crucifixus".....Lotti
7. Overture, "Meeres-Stille und glückliche Fahrt".....Mendelssohn
8. Duo for two Pianos, "Variations brillantes et Rondo".....H. Herz
9. Andante from "Symphonie in C".....Beethoven
10. Duo from "Othello".....Rossini
11. Finale from "Lucrezia Borgia".....Donizetti

Next year our only music promises to be that of military bands. It may not come to the worst, and should we escape war, we may again have a "Philharmonic." This concert was in nothing behind the others, and as to care and effectiveness a good way ahead, in some things. The Overtures could hardly have been better, and the Andante was perfect. The orchestra proper was composed of only fifty-one performers, as the theatre orchestra has gone. The chorus number now over one hundred. The Cavatina was sung by Miss ANNIE DEAN. The violin solo was by Mr. KARST, CHARLES BALMER at the piano. These were executed in a style and with a finish that left little to be desired. The Duo for two pianos, by Mr. BODIE and Miss LIZZIE CUTTER, an effective arrangement of Dolce Concerto, was received with great favor, and was indeed well played. It being a very warm evening and warmer political times being also on hand, there were only about 2,600 in the audience.

The finest block of marble buildings in the West has just been erected by Mr. DARBY, and in them the Society have secured new and elegant rooms, finished expressly for them and furnished with every convenience. They are the best rooms I ever saw. Their first year will soon end. It has been a perfect success, being conducted by musicians, having talent, energy and money. As to the second year, we shall see what we shall see.

Prof. SANATZKY gave a grand amateur concert here for the benefit of the church of the Annunciation. It proved to be a success, and lightened their hearts while weighing down their purses. Every such concert develops more latent musical talent than I ever gave this city credit for. One young lady played a beautiful air on the harp, a thing not often done. I have commenced a series of articles on the "Churches and Church Music of St. Louis." We have some splendid organs, together with first-class organists and choirs, and I intend to make several readable articles out of and concerning them. More anon.

Blind "Tom," the celebrated negro boy pianist gives a grand concert here next week, and we shall see how he bears out the puffs we have so often read.

"BROWN."

Fine Arts.

Athenæum Gallery of Fine Arts.

This is the first time in our experience when anything in public affairs has made it seem of doubtful propriety to bestow especial attention upon topics belonging exclusively to the fine arts. In this day of threatening, undefined calamity—in this hour of peril to law and order, from accumulative treason and organized outrage—in this moment of mortal conflict between the positive principle that upholds liberty and equality by order self-imposed, by individual freedom and opportunity voluntarily limited for the general good, and which secures stability by organic subordination of the parts to the whole; and the negative principle which would displace them by tyranny of a class and slavery of the mass, it seems almost like treason to think of aught that does not directly concern our national danger. And yet it must be proper to take some thought about its possible consequences to the institutions of the State in its normal condition, thus rudely broken, among which art holds an important place and demands particular consideration as being more seriously menaced by the advancing misfortune whose front aspect proclaims the overthrow of the only existing government that maintains the inestimable blessings of law and equal rights, and the loosing in its place, fell anarchy! whose demoniac shape now hovers on the Southern horizon, with fiery eyes glaring upon us all through the lurid clouds of civil war.

We are to note, this is not an ordinary war. War has its different phases of evil and virulence; and its most malignant, hateful form appears when members of the same national family (all alike blessed with unprecedented prosperity) engage in mortal struggle—the one side, for mere defence of life, the other for desecration, destruction and spoil. The simple state of hostilities, when one nation is contending with another, by means of their regular armies, upon territorial or commercial pretences; or, as we may say, arguing questions of national privilege with their bayonet tongues and cannon mouths, does not necessarily, or even ordinarily preclude the continuance of peaceful occupations. This should be observed, although the actual presence of any war is always, certainly inimical to art—especially to its domiciliation. But even in such cases, still the labors of the artist are often the highly valued auxiliaries to the soldiers' harder duties;—as the deeds of destruction of the latter frequently afford the potent matter for the former's most successful creations. Works of art in music and poetry, if not also, in painting and sculpture, in their power of varied inspiration, are oftener than might be supposed, the prime cause of the noblest deeds and aspects of arms in "glorious war." In true chivalric combat, the warrior's invincible mail is woven with the subtle threads of sentiment from the poem's web, and his heroism repays that service with themes for new warp and woof in the poet's lofty strain, which shall again sweep round to become the hero's strength and nobleness. But in a war like this now over the country, threatening return towards barbarism, and involving all classes in its dire scope, no citizens are more vitally interested in the speedy victory of the right than the artists. Revolution, aiming at anarchy, in its progress—imprisons art; in its triumph—annihilates it. Perhaps, in even this calamitous kind of strife, many or all the mechanic arts, with agriculture and local trade, may live and here and there, sometimes thrive amid the havoc of hostile armies; but the fine arts, with poetry, literature and pure science, sink or perish with sudden blight, touched by the bloody hands, or darkened by the sulphurous clouds of such a war. All the spiritual powers of order beauty, and goodness, are driven before the diabolical forces of sacrilegious riot. It is an unnatural convulsion, and its elements are chaotic. It rends the symmetrical fabric like an earthquake, and its work is ruin and horrible noise. It is unlike a disingenuous natural strife, of honest purpose, in its necessitous course, evolving power and beauty, and in its result establishing a new good for man; as the elemental tempest, in drenching the fields and ravaging the forests, purifies the air and increases the fertility of the earth. And as there may be music in the wildest war of wind and water, a tuneful note in the "rattling thunder;" so in the mere clash of arms, there is a melody in the cannon's roar, time and dreadful rhythm in the rallying drum-beat or the deadly "conghings of musketry;" but before the infernal howling of a mob, all the ministers of harmony, strong or weak, vanish from the disastrous land.

The passing evils of war, in respect to art, are as nothing to its possible consequences in the subversion of righteous government. Immaculate law of freedom, government, serene in power and permanence of right, with order of enlightenment producing unity, are only the first of the essential conditions to the existence of a true and prosperous art. Exchange of these for anarchy, not merely removes them (which with all other conditions, are blotted out) but it destroys the very life of art in its germ. An illiberal, even a tyrannical government, if stable for a period, is not incompatible with some show of grand art. Artists, in many instances, have achieved brilliantly, if not nobly, under despotic law, which seemed secure; but without law, and within the baleful folds of rebellion and revolution, they are lost and forgotten.

There is another view which it is expedient the artist should take at this juncture. In time of general war, art should not, nor can it be projected from its source in the mind and feeling to appear on external matter; but it ought to work within, and by its inspiration amalgamate art with man's personality to embody itself in his acts, which will then be heroic, poetic or pictorial. Nay, more, there is a moral beauty in self-sacrifice and noble deeds of men, on the perilous field, which developing in combined movements along the marshalled lines of battle flow into measured and sweet cadence, and the "still, sad music of humanity," living and tangible, rises and swells to a sublime strain with the watchword of civilization, liberty and law!

In contemplation of their own relationship to this crisis, they should not be unmindful of the fact, while all classes must be ready to make sacrifices for the common cause and eager to respond to the call of duty however dangerous, that not themselves alone must give up their cherished pursuits, their honorable culture, and their exalted hopes, perchance, at the moment when years of self-imposed discipline have

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 4, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

The Star Spangled Banner.

It would be difficult to say how many times we have heard this, the best of our national airs, within the last two weeks; at concerts, declaimed with fiery energy by accomplished singers, in the streets and in the public meetings by the sonorous tones of brass bands, often sung in spontaneous chorus by all who had heart to feel or a voice to sing, it has met us everywhere, and everywhere it is heard with a loyal enthusiasm and earnest excitement that prove that there is something in it, something that has, perhaps, been overlooked and not sufficiently appreciated. On another page will be found the words and an account of the circumstances under which they were written. In the days of peace that have gone by, this generation has perhaps thought these lines to be bombastic, and that they deal in forced and artificial figures of rhetoric, but none can read them now, with the commentary furnished by contemporaneous events upon the record of our earlier history, who will not find the glow of truth in every line, who will not see a terrible reality in what we had thought to be only far fetched and exaggerated figures of poetic speech, who will not feel in every word the ardent glow of a patriotic fire which burns as brightly now as it did in the breast of him who penned them long ago. And to-day, there are thousands who not long since may have inquired with a sneer if we have any national airs, whose voices will tremble with emotion as they join in the stirring strains and whose eyes will kindle with fire as they behold the stars and stripes flaming through the air wherever they may turn their gaze. Two weeks have proved the existence of an universal loyalty, without exception or reservation, to the sacred Flag and the Government whose emblem it is.

The song has great merits that have not generally been allowed to it heretofore. A competent critic says of it—

This song has one of the noblest melodies ever written. In breadth and grandeur of theme, in intensity of musical effect, in magnetic inspiration, it is almost unrivaled. It is far in advance of the French Marseilles Hymn, the British "God save the Queen," or the Austrian "God save the Emperor," and its only rival in the world is the Russian national hymn by Lvoff. But unfortunately, it has some defects which injure it for a popular melody.

In the first place, it is not American in origin.

In the next place, the melody has so wide a range from low to high that few voices can be found capable of singing it with effect.

And thirdly, the tune is not capable of an easy and convenient arrangement into parts, so that it can be sung, in chorus, by male voices alone; for it is, of course, by such that it must be given, as a general thing.

The English Anthem is much better in all these respects, though it lacks the fire and spirit of the Star Spangled Banner.

The flag is looked upon with a loyal veneration and enthusiasm that in our day, at least, it never knew before, and the song has taken a place in the hearts of this people that was never given to it before and from which it will be long before it can be displaced. With all its faults, it has taken that place, and the poet and the musician will be indeed immortal whose genius can give us a better.

Concerts.

That of the Handel and Haydn Society on Saturday evening, in aid of the Government was quite well attended; and we are told that the receipts amounted to nearly 400 dollars. Three concerts by Morris Brothers, Pell & Trowbridge's Minstrels gave $525, and a performance at the Howard Athenæum, on Saturday evening, yielded some $300. A very substantial result for these patriotic efforts. The prepared for successful effort, and turn to devote themselves to the strange, abhorred task of self-defence against savage, unprovoked attack. * * *

We must ask indulgence for having so far delayed the leading purpose of this article, which was to refer to the somewhat novel impressions we have derived in visiting the Athenæum Exhibition at this exciting and momentous period.

In other times, in the presence of collections of works of art, our thoughts and feelings were wholly impersonal, having reference only to external matters and abstractions. Now, we feel a social element perhaps, allied to the sentiment of friendship; as if their presence somehow isolated and protected us from the actual circumstances which surround us so distressfully without. The personifications, and embodied characters of art, seem to look out upon us from these silent scenes, with expressions of sympathy. And for that, they become more beautiful and dear to us. The quiet and the harmonious repose of the galleries, cast a grateful influence upon our over-excited minds, under which too active thought is soothed to the resting state favorable to the happy sway of emotion and imagination. And, as we have seen, in the real world, the fragrant morning dew impart purity and brilliance to the soft or rugged forms of nature, so do our moistened eyes shed upon the mimic scenery of art a more tender brightness and a more winning splendor, revealing, withal, many charms unseen before. The motionless faces of familiar portraits, beam upon us with unwonted beauty or strange tenderness of significant expression. Landscapes grow more alluring, their fields appear in softer verdure, their untroubled skies seem clearer with brighter gold and deeper sapphire, and the shadows of the clouded heavens wear a melancholy cast. And in the subjects of human import, the various tableaux seem to hint a strange meaning, showing sometimes an almost startling reference to eve its now passing and not complete.

Allusion has been made, above, to the unfortunate necessity which compels the artist from his settled vocation and all its attendant habits. But, of course, not every individual is likely to be included in the practical requisition, and not all of those who are will experience the change to the full or an equal extent. Very many will still be privileged to ply their art in some way; and to all these the changed course of events will be portentous of change in the spirit and matter of art.

It has already been observed that the exigencies of the times were developing fine traits in mankind, not new, perhaps, but seldom shown in times of peace. In every direction, self-sacrifice, courage and other noblenesses, are constantly being manifested, which will afford matter for the artists' work, of far greater potency than exists in the subjects which have most engaged them during the last ten years. Life episodes, of thrilling interest, of melting pathos, and of grand import, will supersede the hacknied idealities of sentimental or romantic art, the commonplace materials and compositions of genre, or landscape, or the yet lower objects of still-life. And the pantheistic or materialistic method and tendency of the present schools, may rapidly give place to the higher and more vital influences of the new schools, which will reëstablish the severed union of art and nature—of the ideal and the real. And, haply, on the return of the armies, whose going forth gave the motive of the change, men shall behold on the painter's canvas and the sculptor's marble, renewal of the scenes and acts of life in which themselves were actors, or deeply interested witnesses.

Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, assisted by Mrs. J. H. LONG, gave a social musical Soirée at the rooms of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., on Wednesday Evening last, April 24. We regret that we were led to suppose that the concert would not take place as announced, and so did not attend. We learn, however, that it was well attended, and that Mr. P. won good opinions from his hearers.

Handel and Haydn Concert went off with much spirit, as may be well imagined from the programme, which was given in last week's Journal. The patriotic airs were brilliantly given, and applauded with the utmost enthusiasm. Some stirring Handel choruses were well sung, and the audience joined in the noble strains of America with the Society and orchestra.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION Concert on Wednesday was poorly attended. The more solemn music of the Dead March in the streets claimed the attention of all who had ears to hear. The next Concert, and last but one, will take place Wednesday Afternoon, May 8th.

Mrs. VARIAN has come here at an unfortunate time. Public attention is turned into other directions than to any form of art and has no enriosity for any new thing or person, so that the large and refined audience that assembled on Friday evening (of last week) was a most flattering evidence of the desire to hear her.

Mrs. Varian showed herself to be quite a remarkable singer, in extent and power of voice, certainly, and in the spirit and intelligence with which she sings. Chickering's room is too small, however, for her to appear to advantage, and the Music Hall would give a wider scope to her best points. Every song was much applauded and several were encored. At the end of the concert she sang with fire and effect, "The Star Spangled Banner," giving the new verse by Dr. Holmes, which the reader will find on another page. A scarf of the stars and stripes, and the Phrygian cap of Liberty on her head, made a graceful and appropriate costume and added to the effect. The song was prodigiously applauded and cheer upon cheer rang through the hall, at the close. Mr. SIMPSON gave great pleasure by his expressive style and his singularly sweet and sympathetic voice, such as no tenor among us possesses. Mr. HOFFMAN showed himself a skillful pianist, and was cordially applauded.

Music Abroad.

Pesth.

We would fain inscribe Joachim's name in letters of fire in the heaven of art, for all those who have sought only passing comets and meteors, where a vivifying sun sends forth its warm beams. Let us allow the most glorious phenomena of a single day with their satellites and attendant moons, to pass by; they never loved art, and were never penetrated with its sunny rays, for the light with which they shone played on the surface only, while all within is cold and dark. What is Hecuba to them? If, by means of the hollow Trojan horse of their vanity and desire to please, they can subdue the multitude, the Troy of art itself may afterwards be ruined, and the high queen perish for what they care. Among the very few apostles of music who preach the pure unsophisticated doctrine of the divinity, and whose soul is filled with faith and enthusiasm, we must reckon, without question—Joseph Joachim. Look at him yonder, with his quiet, unpretending demeanor, externally resembling a bronze statue, though he is inwardly a flaming volcano, which speaks electrically, through his finger-tips, to your heart! Not producing momentary heat, but permanent warmth; not dazzling but illuminating, not merely extensive, but much rather intensive—such is Joachim's play. That he is the greatest violinist of the day is a fact attested by all who by greatness, understand—greatness of soul. What coyness, incomparable purity and neatness, there is in his execution! It seems as though Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven, whose quartets he plays in such an unrivalled manner, could all be heard at once, in his feeling and ravishing tones. In the most difficult passages, or in the simple sustained tone, it is the same—in every instance we find song; in every instance the deeply penetrating determination to produce music, and music alone; nowhere is there the slightest ostentation displayed in difficult and rapid passages, which the unprofessional hearer does not remark—nay, the existence of which he does not even suspect—and which sweep by us with the same placid repose as a fleet upon the wide ocean. Of all living violinists, Joachim is the most perfect representative of the classical style; nay, his whole being is classicality and sterling merit itself. With the greatest outward calm he executes the most elevating, feeling, and powerful productions that musical art can produce. Not only do the great composers live again in him, but also the old Italian violinists, such as Tartini, Pugnani, &c., telling us how in times gone by, they played and trilled before the devil himself, Trille du Diable.

Berlin.

The Singakademie gave, at their late concert, Rudolph Schachner's oratorio, Israel's Return, a work preceded by so favorable a report as to excite great expectations in musical circles. Emanuel Geibel has arranged the text from Moore's "Sacred Songs," with connecting passages from Holy Scripture. The oratorio describes in four cantos, named respectively "Captivity," "Deliverance," "Reconciliation," and "Promise;" Israel's fall into sin and subjugation, its release from the Babylonish captivity, the returning favor of God, and His call to his chosen people. The idea of the oratorio has, in the oldest times of church-music, found the most various interpretations; and in the freedom which the composer has permitted himself with regard to the old established rule of church-music, we cannot therefore see any authorized subversion of its principles, nor can we in any way represent the work as faulty in its own peculiar department. With regard to the strictness and form of the music, the composer as a rule adheres to the main conditions of the oratorio; he oversteps, however, in many respects, the customary uniformity of the biblical elegiac mode of composition, and gives to his work the general lyric form, which produces more warmth, and excites deeply the sensibilities of the hearer. In but one instance have we to criticize the composer for having overstepped the usual limits in this respect; it is in the quartet and chorus at the end of second part, "So when the dread clouds of anger." Here he has exceeded the general boundaries of sacred music, and has fallen into the operatic style. The general impression of the work is, however, that the composer has been perfectly equal to his difficult task, and that he has gained for himself a good name among the first composers of sacred music of the past and present. We think more highly of the work, as it moves in a certain freedom of invention, without in any way transgressing the main principles of its allotted sphere. A most imposing effect is produced by the choruses of male voices in unisons, with orchestral accompaniment, quasi-recitative, a style we meet sometimes in Glück's and Weber's works. In its lyrical element, the work is remarkably rich and exciting; it is likewise so in the language of sound, whether in expressing the deepest feelings, or in describing the situation. The effect of Herr Schachner's being perfect master of the most modern instrumental effects assists not a little in giving this work an advantage over many solid older compositions. Schachner's inventive genius and his thorough musical accomplishments are most fully seen in the chorus, No. 12. "Go forth to the mount," with the (as fugato treated) "Since the time." We hope soon again to have the pleasure of hearing this well-deserving work. As to its performance by the Akademie, we may say that it was performed in such a manner as to procure the best introduction to the composer's work. The solos, in the hands of Mad. Harriers Wippen, Fraulein Boer, Herren Geyer and Krause, left nothing to desire.—Berliner Blatt.

Vienna.

Joachim has taken leave of us, but we trust, only to return very soon. This worthy man, as genuine and admirable in his private as in his professional character, must, on his side, have contracted friendly feelings for a city, which, like Vienna, has been so lavish in its marks of approbation. The recollection of Austria will, we feel sure, follow him like some warm spring breeze from the south, as far as the heaths of Lüneburg. May Joachim soon experience home-sickness. This is the only ill we wish him. His third concert, the last but one—in the Musik-Verein—began with Spohr's concerto in E minor, Op. 7, played with all the roundness and sweetness by which Spohr himself once enchanted his hearers, and, at the same time, with a grandeur of tone peculiar to Joachim. Beethoven's Violin Romance in G major followed as pendant to that in F, which was performed some days previously. A Fantasia with full band (Op. 131), by Schumann, was new to us. As Joachim possesses none of the vanity of a virtuoso, it was, we suppose, a feeling of tender respect that induced him to select this piece which is as difficult as it is unsatisfactory. Schumann wrote it in the decline of his faculties, and dedicated it to Joachim. It is a dark chasm, over which two great artists stretch out their hands to each other. Tortured, gloomy and obstinate, the Fantasia drags on its length in continuous figuration and with very little melodic substance. It is extremely seldom that the wearisome effect produced by it is broken by a clever instance of harmony or orchestration.

On taking leave of the Viennese public, Joachim followed up the more select soirées in the rooms of the Musik-Verein, by a grand musical rout. Since the concerts of Jenny Lind, we never remember having seen the grand Redoutensaal so full, or the Josephsplatz so besieged and barricaded by carriages. On the occasion, Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus merely served as a march to usher in the numerous late-comers, who wandered in long files to their places. The audience were not perfectly settled before the "Hungarian Concerto." This, which Joachim had performed at his second concert, was repeated by desire. In so doing, he rendered a service to the public, and to his own reputation as a composer. The "Hungarian Concerto" is one of those characteristic pieces which interest us at first time of hearing, and please at the second or third.

Like many others, we ourselves thought the work more expressive and sympathetic than we did at its first performance, which, by the way, was given in two confined a space. Grand and richly scored compositions, like fresco paintings, require distance in order to be properly appreciated. In the first movement there were many lengths—among them the cadence—the existence of which we can no more deny than the restless monotony of the finale, but the pathetic grandeur, which pervades the entire work, the marked character of the motives, and the clever manner in which they are worked out, not merely greatly excited our feelings, but, moreover, satisfied us, artistically speaking. The remaining pieces Joachim played were a fugue by Bach, and Mendelssohn's oft-heard concerto in E minor. Joachim's great aim was the plastic and well-marked expression of sustained melody, and grandeur combined with unity of style. How perfectly the softest tenderness and the most transient brilliancy may be united with the above qualities was proved by his rendering of the adagio and of the final movement—the latter being taken in the most rapid time. The public seemed to find it a difficult task to part from him. It was not till he had been called on several times that he took leave of us—a conqueror and a friend.

England.

MS. OF BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONIES.—Can any reader of the Musical World give information where the original manuscripts of Beethoven's First Symphony (in C), second ditto (in D), and Sixth, the "Pastoral," are now preserved?

The score of the "Pastoral," was sold in Vienna some years ago to a "gentleman in Holland," according to the statement of one of the firm of Artaria & Co., the well-known publishers. Should the ms. be still preserved in that country, its possessor would confer a favor upon the public by publishing its title exactly, together with the date, if (as Beethoven was in the habit of doing) the composer has dated it himself.

Ries says of the ms. of the Second Symphony that Beethoven presented it to him, but that some one borrowed and never returned it. As it is not likely to have been destroyed, any information relating to it would be of importance, especially the date of its composition.—A. W. T.—Musical World.

HERR FORMES.—This great German bass arrived in London yesterday. There is no longer any doubt about his engagement at the Royal Italian Opera. The probability expressed in the Covent Garden prospectus is changed to a certainty. Herr Formes will make his first appearance at the new theatre—his first at the Royal Italian Opera for five years—next week, or the week following, as Walter in Guillaume Tell.—Mus. World, Apr. 6.

FESTIVAL OF THE THREE CHOIRS.—The arrangements for the next festival of the three choirs of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester (to be held at Hereford), are complete, so far as the engagement of the principals, band, and chorus, and the fixture of the programme is concerned. Mr. Townshend Smith, the conductor and talented organist of Hereford Cathedral, has succeeded in securing the services of the principal vocalists: Mlle. Titiens, Miss Louisa Pyne, and Mrs. Weiss, sopranos; Mad. Sauton-Dolby and Susan Pyne, contraltos; Mrs. Sims Reeves, Signor Guglielmi, and Mr. Montem Smith, tenors; and Mr. Weiss and Mr. Winn, bass. This is an unusually bright array of talent for Hereford, but the festival is to eclipse all that has gone before. The performance of sacred music will be as follows: First morning, Mendelssohn's Elijah; second morning, The Last Judgment and part of Samson; third morning, "Spring" (Haydn), "Requiem" (Mozart), and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise; fourth morning, Handel's Messiah. There will be morning prayers at the cathedral each morning, as at Worcester last year. At the evening concert Benedict's cantata Undine will be given, among the instrumental pieces will be Beethoven's pastoral symphony, and Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, with the overtures to Euryanthe (Weber), and Anacreon (Cherubini).

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

That handsome volunteer. Emile Berger. 25

A song for the times. It is very pretty and will doubtless become popular.

Memorare. Quartet and Chorus. Lambillotte. 50

A fine Offertory for Catholic Church service. Lambillotte's compositions for the church, on account of their flowing melody, simplicity of construction and the little difficulty they offer to organists and singers, have long enjoyed the greatest popularity among choirs of moderate ability, and need no recommendation.

The birds' awakening. Trio for female voices.

Concone. 30

Can be sung by single voices or by a chorus of fifty on a part. This and the other numbers, forming a set of similar pieces, under the title of "Les Harmonicans," are adapted to operatic selections by Concone, author of the celebrated Singing exercises, and are highly popular in the female academies of France.

Sing for the night. Song & Chorus. H. Pond. 25

Simple and pleasing.

Moon behind the hill. (Guitar accompaniment.)

T. B. Bishop. 30

A well known song and a great favorite.

Instrumental Music.

The girl I left behind me. Quickstep. Turner. 25

This old air—none the less pretty for that—has received new significance in the present times. All the bands play it. This Quickstep is very prettily arranged, easy of execution and should be committed to memory by every patriotic young lady.

Merry midnight Polka. Henry Farmer. 25

A fresh, graceful little Polka, very good to dance by.

Miserere, from "Il Trovatore." Transc. C. Foss. 35

Notwithstanding the large number of arrangements of this air, which are now circulated, this piece will soon obtain precedence with advanced pianists. It is a perfect adaptation, bright and finished.

Young Recruit Grand March. Brinley Richards. 35

A lively march with Kucken's spirited air for its principal theme.

Books.

MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE DRUM, containing Full Instructions and a Choice collection of Music for the Fife and Drum, including all the Signals and Calls used in Military Service. By O. W. Keach and B. A. Burditt. 50

This work is offered to the public as a thorough and concise method of learning the art of Drumming. Hitherto, books intended to give instruction in Drum beating, have been almost useless, owing to the unintelligible manner or system of instruction. In the "Modern School," the System of Professor Keach, (recommended by Edward Kendall, who excels as a Drummer as well as a Bugler), is adopted as being the best, imparting to the pupil, who faithfully adheres to the rules and practice, all that is needful to make a good Drummer.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 475.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 6.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sketches of French Musical History.

XV.

COMIC OPERA.

1830—1860.

HEROLD, ADAM, AUBER, HALEVY.

The desire of giving some analysis of the finest works of the French school forces us to pass in silence the names of composers of the second rank; and yet, although our attention must necessarily be given to the best composers, there appear, from time to time, works, which though of inferior excellence, cannot well be omitted from the library of a man of cultivated musical taste; such works are included in our list of select comic operas, given as an appendix to the present work. We confine ourselves here to compositions of superior merit.

Herold, son of a pianoforte teacher, originally from Germany, was born at Paris, Jan. 28, 1791. Notwithstanding his natural disposition to music, his father did not destine him to that difficult and ungrateful career. He was placed at the age of ten years in the school of M. Hix, rue de Matignon, and there the precocious child distinguished himself in those solid studies, which are so useful, however much one may be gifted by nature, to enable a man the better to comprehend and impart to others the ideas to which he may devote himself. Herold learned art as an amusement, but the premature death of his father led him to adopt it as his vocation. In October, 1806, he entered Louis Adam's pianoforte class in the conservatory, and obtained the first prize at the examination in July, 1810. He studied harmony under Catel and composition under Mehul with such success that after one year and a half of study he was able to obtain the first prize of the Institute, in August, 1812. His composition on this occasion, Mademoiselle de La Valliere, exhibits proofs of a remarkable genius for music. In November of the same year, Herold journeyed to Rome, where he spent the three happiest years of his life. He then went on to Naples. Here its beautiful sky, pure air, and the enthusiasm of the people developed in him an irresistible desire of production. This found vent in a two-act opera, which was brought upon the stage entitled la Gioventù di Enrico Quinto, and which was quite to the taste of the Neapolitan public.

Upon his return to Paris, toward the end of 1815, Herold found in Boieldieu, who had discerned his genius, a generous protector. That master gave him a part of an occasional piece Charles de France, to compose, and, under this high patronage, in 1816 he made his first essay upon the Parisians; his share of the music was so successful, that the text of the Rosieres was immediately confided to him. We feel in the three acts of this work the inexperience of the young man, but still certain strokes of fancy are strikingly beyond the general average of the music of that day. La Clochette followed. In the score of this work there is far more dramatic force and passion than in its predecessor; there was immense progress also in his instinct for scenic effects, but the novelty of his instrumentation was not at once comprehended. During the next eighteen months Herold wrote fantasias for the pianoforte, and other works of the kind; tired at length of waiting for a good text, which is not always at hand, he at last wrote the music for the Premier Venu, a cold though intellectual comedy in three acts, which Vial had received from the theatre Louvais. In spite of an excellent trio by three men, feigning sleep, the opera obtained no success. Abandoning the text writers, Herold adapted new music to the old opera of the Troqueurs; but that superannuated form was not to the taste of an audience of 1819. A fatality seemed to pursue the great composer. A piece entitled L'Amour platonique reached its general rehearsal; but then it was found to be so feeble that its author withdrew it, and it was never performed in public. In 1820 Planard gave Herold L'Auteur mort et vivant. This comedy was not adapted to music and its success did not equal the hopes of the composer. Discouraged Herold gave up dramatic writing for three years, composing music for the pianoforte and filling the duties of accompanist to the Italian opera. But the desire to write for the stage began again to torment him. Le Muletier, brought out in 1823, established itself after a struggle in the list of acting works, and was followed by Lasthénie and Vendôme en Espagne, which forced a just recognition of the author's talents. Le Roi René and le Lapin blanc failed; for Herold had allowed himself to fall into an imitation of Rossini. But Marie, an opera given in 1826, marks his return to his own style. Almost all the several pieces of this work gained a deserved popularity. He had now become the director of the vocal music at the opera, and wrote ten ballets and the fine overture of Missolonghi, executed with success at the Odeon. L'Illusion, a piece full of charms gained Herold the decoration of the Legion of Honor. Emmeline, brought out in 1830, was unsuccessful. The next year Zampa came and placed the author in the first rank of the French school. We find in this work an abundance of themes, dramatic force, and a genius for instrumentation and accompaniment, which have not yet been surpassed. The subject is one peculiarly fitted for opera by the amplitude of its forms, and the richness of its concerted pieces.

Meantime the health of Herold began to fail. After la Medecine sans Medecin, a little piece in which one feels the touches of genius, le Pré aux Clercs was brought out just before the death of the French Rossini. The man of genius had no time in which to enjoy his triumph. He died of consumption, Jan. 18, 1833, at Thernes, near Paris, and was buried in the cemetery of Pere Lachaise, not far from his master Mehul. He left one unfinished score, Ludovic, which was completed by Halevy and given successfully in 1834.

Adolphé Adam was born in Paris, July 24, 1803. His school education was begun at the establishment of M. Hix, where he was a fellow-pupil of Herold, and concluded at the College Bourbon, his family intending him for either the law or medicine. But the bent of his nature was towards dramatic music. His earnest importunity at length obtained for him a teacher of musical composition, M. Widerker. In 1817, he entered the conservatory, studying the organ with Benoit harmony and counterpoint with Reicha. Boieldieu afterward instructed him in free composition. To this excellent course of instruction he owes the freedom of his melody, the clearness of his accompaniment, and that brilliant and lucid orchestration, which always serves as a relief to the voice, but never smothers it. His father who knew the difficulties of a musical career, still opposed him, but Adam persevered, became an organist, then entered the orchestra of the Gymnase as triangle player, was soon advanced to the kettledrums, and then became chorus leader at the same theatre. During this period he composed a great number of graceful airs for the Vaudevilles, most of which became popular. Everybody remembers la Bateliere, Hussard de Felsheim, Mal du Pays and other pieces famous at that time. Having obtained the second prize of the Institute in 1825, Adam, now 22 years of age, made a journey to Holland, Germany and Switzerland, where he had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of Scribe. The celebrated author proposed to the young man to compose the airs of one of his vaudevilles destined for the Gymnase. Adam accepted the proposition with joy, obtained a great success, and refused the money sent him by Scribe, with the remark that he was fully paid by the honor of having been joined with him in a work. This disinterestedness gained him in process of time, the excellent text, the Chalet, which made and fixed his reputation throughout Europe.

Adam's first appearance as composer at the Theatre Feydeau, was in February, 1829, in a piece by Saint-Georges, entitled, Pierre et Catherine. He then composed Danilowa, Josephine, le Morceau d'Ensemble and le Grand Prix, after which he went to London and brought out an opera and ballet. But the fogs of the Thames were not to the mind of Adolphé Adam.

Le Proscrit and Une bonne fortune announced his return to the Opera Comique; and on Sept. 25, 1834, he brought out le Chalet. This is in every respect a success, a masterpiece; it is the type of a complete whole, which has not been equaled since. We shall not undertake to give a complete list of Adam's operas; but will cite such as obtained the most decided success. They are la Marquise, le Postillon du Lonjumeau, le Fidele Berger, le Brasseur de Preston, la Reine d'un jour, le Roi d'Yvetot, le Toreador, Giralda, le Farfadet, la Poupée de Nuremberg, Si j'étais Roi, le Bijou perdu, le Sourde, and finally, les Pantins de Violette, which latter was brought out anonymously at the Bouffes Parisiennes. He also finished Lambert Simnel, which the unfortunate Monpou author of the Deux Reines and Piquillo, had left incomplete. Nor must we forget a long list of ballets for the Grand Opera, of which should be mentioned la Fille du Danube, Giselle, la Jolie fille du Gand, le Diable à quatre, Orfa, and le Corsaire. In 1846, Adam founded the Theatre Lyrique, and thus opened a new sphere for young composers. He also revived the Aline and Felix of Monsigny and many other old works forgotten by the present generation. He was Berton's successor in the Institute. Among his pupils are Saint-Julien, Poise, Cohen, &c. He wrote many pieces of church music full of sentiment, and handled the critic's pen in the Constitutionnel and in l'Assemblée nationale with a spirit, erudition and impartiality very remarkable. Struck down suddenly in the midst of all these labors, Adolphe Adam died May 3, 1856, regretted by his family, his friends and the Parisian public, which knew and loved the inextinguishable fire of his eminently French style.

Although Auber, born at Caen in Normandy, Jan. 29, 1784, was nineteen years older than Adolphe Adam, we have spoken of the latter before the present head of the French school, because pitiless death so prematurely put an end to the career of one of our most fruitful and graceful composers. We now come to the most illustrious of our contemporaries. Auber, the son of a picture dealer, and pupil of Ladurner upon the pianoforte, was sent while still quite young to London, to enter upon a mercantile career. Returning to France, he wrote as an amateur, romances, a trio for pianoforte, violin and violincello, concertos for the latter instrument for Lamare and one for the violin, which was played by Maras at the conservatory. Julie, a comic opera with quintette accompaniment, had a success in a private theatre, and a second work with orchestra composed for the theatre of Prince de Chimay presaged the future glory of its author. He studied composition with Cherubini and wrote at that time a mass for four voices from which was taken long afterwards the noble prayer in Masaniello. Reverses of fortune led him to devote himself to art, when to use his own simple expression, he had the happiness to become acquainted with Scribe. For a dramatic composer it is a necessary condition that he find in the writers of his texts, that analogy of ideas and sentiments, which may give to their works the unity without which is no durable success. In 1813 Auber brought out his first work for the stage of the Theatre Feydeau, a piece by Bouilly entitled le Sejour militaire. Six years after, le Testament ou les Billets doux was unable to sustain itself upon the boards of the Opera Comique; but la Bergere Chatelaine, Emma, Léicester and above all la Niece (1823) made the talents of the young master most favorably known. Le Concert a la Cour and le Maçon, masterpieces of sentiment, spirit and taste obtained for this author in May, 1825, the well merited cross of the Legion of Honor. Fiorella followed and then the year 1828 saw the birth of two more masterpieces totally opposed in style, but of the first order; La Fiancee, a comic opera as graceful as it is excellent and La Muette (Massaniello), which had the glory of preceding Guillaume Tell and Robert le Diable, and still maintains itself side by side with those immortal works.

Fra Diavolo, an opera in three acts, introduced its author to the Institute in April, 1829. With le Philtre, le Serment and Gustave followed, and Leslocq and le Cheval de bronze gained new successes at the Opera Comique. In 1836, Acteon, a delicious piece, introduced the celebrated songstress, Madame Damoreau, to the public. She triumphed anew in l'Ambassadrice and le Domino Noir. Les Diamants de la Couronne, la Part du Diable and la Sirene (1844) are the last works in what may be called Auber's second style. Delicacy, subtlety and an intellectual art take in them the place of the sentiment and breadth of expression, which are so preëminent in Le Maçon, La Muette and Fra Diavolo, the masterpieces of his first manner.

Haydée, to our apprehension, marks the third and last manner of the author. In it the comic opera is ennobled and almost touches the line of the grand opera. Marco Spada (1852) gave Battaille the opportunity of winning laurels, and Jenny Bell and Manon Lescaut have since given Mlle. Duprez and Madame Cabel scenes in which to bring out in high relief their peculiar excellences and exhibit their admirable talents. Marco Spada and Le Cheval de Bronze have had ballets added to them and have been transferred to the stage of the grand opera; they still delight the ears of the public with the immortal freshness of their melodies.

Auber's style never grows old. His vocal music is always fine; his harmony is irreproachable for its skill and purity; his instrumentation is clear, elegant, and sonorous; it is still a model of style for the French comic opera. His overtures are generally excellent. The auditor feels that his style is formed in the school of Mozart, Haydn and Rossini. It is neat, precise, firm, always original, never extravagant. His music is always recognizable from all other. He possesses individual character, and this is the stamp of genius with which the deity seals his elect. Auber has also written religious music in the purest taste. At present he is the chapel master of Louis Napoleon and director of the Conservatory.

We have already spoken of our illustrious master, Fromenthal Halévy. He was the son of Israelitish parents, and was born at Paris, May 27, 1799. The "French Meyerbeer" was admitted into the conservatory and joined the sol-feggi class of Cazot, Jan. 30, 1809. He studied pianoforte with Charles Lambert, harmony with Berton, counterpoint, fugue and composition with Cherubini. He was allowed to contest the prizes of the Institute in 1816, and three years later bore off the highest with a cantata entitled Herminie. After two years in Italy, Halévy made his first theatrical attempt at the Theatre Feydeau, in 1827, with l'Artisan, a comic opera in one act, text by Saint Georges.

This essay was followed by le Roi et le Batelier written in conjunction with Rifaut; then by the Dilletante d'Avignon, which gave the young artist a favorable reputation. La langue Musicale came next, text by Saintine; in 1833 he gave at the Opera Comique Les Souvenirs de Lafleur, text by Martin, and then produced the Ludovic of Herold, the score of which he had completed. He was appointed professor of sol-feggi at the conservatory in 1815, and succeeded, in turn, Daussoigne as professor of harmony, and Fétis as professor of high composition. In 1835 La Juive and L'Eclair, two works, totally diverse in form, opened the doors of the Institute to Halévy.

He was elected as Reicha's successor in July, 1836. In L'Eclair universal applause was bestowed upon the duet of the two sisters, in which the characters of the coquette and of the sentimental girl are so happily contrasted; the air of the sailor, where the vicissitudes of his calling are so finely brought out; the delicious duet of love, "Ah! si tu voulais finir ma peine"; and the sweet melody "Quand de la nuit l'épais nuage." Elevation of idea here is combined with delicacy of sentiment.

Le Guittarrero gave the tenor, Roger, opportunity to display his remarkable talents, which afterward shone with such lustre in Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, a delicious work brought out in 1846. Le val d'Andorre was a new success for its author; Battaille, who created the part of the old goatherd, made of that eminently picturesque character a striking type of truth and nature.

La Fée aux roses and La dame de pique brought out all the light and easy vocalization of Mlle. Lefebvre and the great talents of Madame Ugalde. Then came Le Nabab in which Coudere played so finely, in which Bussine and Madame Miolan sung with such perfection: this was followed at the Theatre Lyrique by Jaguarita l'Indienne for Madame Cabel, and at the Opera Comique by Valentine d'Aubigny, in which Mlle. Duprez played the principal part with her usual distinction. At the opera was brought out the Juif Errant and La Magicienne.

M. Halevy is the only composer who has had equal success both at the Grand and the Opera Comique, a double glory too rare not to deserve particular notice.

Moreover, the illustrious professor has produced a school already numerous and distinguished. Among his more known pupils, we may name Boulanger, Gounod, Bazin, Victor Masse, Deldevez, Danola, Hignard, Delieux, Mathias, Semet, &c. We close this notice with the remark that Halevy is a man of high education, and is a fine writer, as his notices of David d'Angers, Paul Delaroche and Adolphe Adam prove.

The duties of perpetual secretary of the Academy of Fine Arts could not be confided to a man more capable.

Musical Education and Instruction.

By DR. MARX, of Berlin.*

THE RIGHT OBJECT AND THE RIGHT MEANS.

What is really the proper object of all musical education and employment?

Joy in the Art—we declare as the first object. A joyless occupation in it—and how frequently do we meet it! how common is the observation, unfortunately, that in the learning and practising of music, the original delight is quickly extinguished, never to be felt again in its pristine vigor and productiveness—is fatal to the artistic sense, and is, indeed, more injurious than total disoccupation, since it not only misapplies the time which might have been otherwise profitably employed, but also destroys our capacity of receiving satisfaction from art.

But the joy must be really artistic—not foreign; and still less must it be opposed to art. We would hereby deprecate the tickling vanity which loves to make a display of extraordinary technical facility, and plumes itself on difficulties overcome. Nothing is more foreign nor further than this littleness from true art, whose high calling it is to raise us from the narrow limits of personal feelings, into the region in common, of universal joy, love, and inspiration; nothing is more inimical and destructive to the true sense and enjoyment of art, than this poisonous mildew, which overlays artistic activity and its productions. Nothing more surely draws the mind from the purifying atmosphere of art, into the petty, narrow strivings and contentions of self-seeking vanity; than this eager ostentation of personal skill; and, in fine, nothing manifests more clearly to an intelligent mind, the wide gulf which separates vain from true art, than this exchange of its outward means, for its inward soul and object. How general, however, is this striving in our parties and concerts! How rarely is the joy of the listeners the object of our concert players and amateurs! How much nearer have they not at heart, to astonish the less proficient, and to startle the unartistic crowd with newly invented contrivances, with a technical composition of a Chopin, or a study of a Thalberg, or whatever the latest finger-artist may be called. And how often is it not the teachers who urge their pupils to this pernicious competition, simply in order to obtain more scholars! The lowest, most unreflecting, merely corporeal pleasure of music, the most superficial enjoyment of a skipping dance, is more artistic, more productive and nobler, than this monstrosity, which is so widely diffused amongst us. The feeling performance of the most trivial song or the most simple waltz, is a stronger proof of the ability of the scholar and of the teacher, than those precocious and forced, though in reality cheap productions of vanity.

* Reprinted from Novello's Library for the diffusion of Musical Knowledge. Vol. II. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction; translated by George Macrone.

The corporeal pleasure caused by art, awakens by itself a spiritual participation; and this spiritual participation in art, we regard as the highest object to which our employment therein is to be directed. If we do not close our heart and sensibilities, by caprice and ill-directed exertion,—if we do not ourselves destroy our feelings, and the natural operation of our minds, emotion will spring of itself from the corporeal apprehension of the artistic work; a more elevated life will flow through our nerves, and joy through our mind, such as the pure enjoyment of art alone can produce: the assurance of community, of well-being, will loosen the hard crust of egotism from our hearts, and bind us the more closely in sympathy and affection with the friends who participate in our pleasures. The heart opens itself willingly to new sensations and an altered state of mind occasioned by works of art, and receives them devotedly, pure, and free from all dross and sharp asperities of real personality; it is a communion of one soul with others, full of the internal feelings of humanity, and yet exempt from all oppressive materiality, or other disturbing objects. And thus this shadowy being, invoked by the musician's art, waves its life of high significance before us; we live in it, in pleasure or pain, as the spirit of the artist wills; with him, faultless and untouched, our personality becomes involved in a manifold spiritual existence, and we experience in ourselves the countless riches of this spiritual life, together with our narrowly-limited corporeal reality. Herein we behold long-departed beings and circumstances—those pure forms which Gluck evoked from Greece and the enchanted East: the patriarchal simplicity and dignity of that people, out of whose darkness the light of the world was to come, in Handel's songs: the mad confusion of the Pharisees and their party, before the holiness of the new covenant, in Bach's immortal works. All these pass before us; ages long in oblivion, seem sensibly present.

Whatever can move the human heart in innocence, joy, delicacy, and childish humor, the most lovely play of the imagination, and the most mysterious sensations of our spiritual essence,—all that Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven could feel or imagine, is laid open to us, and becomes our own.

The real indwelling in art, and sincere devotion to it, are essential conditions in artistic education; without them we cannot participate in its inestimable gifts; they are absolutely indispensable.

It is not the possession of great artists, nor of great works of art, which insures to a nation or to its gifted individuals, a genuine artistic education, and thereby the full enjoyment of the art. If such were the case, no nation could be more assured than ours of the highest musical education; since, during the last century, at least, our musicians have produced the most lofty and most pregnant ideas that have ever been embodied in sound. We have, on the other hand, experienced within a single century, after three noble exaltations, in the day of Bach and Handel, of Gluck—Haydn and Mozart,—and of Beethoven; also three several depressions from our upward flight; nay, if we will believe the loudest and most numerous voices of the day, it would seem that in many minds even the remembrance were lost of what in former days were universally acknowledged to be our brightest landmarks to excellence.

Playing and hearing only, cannot be relied on as a sufficient means of education, although they must be the foundation and companions of musical cultivation; for we hear bad music as well as good; and we know that the weak and the spurious produces its effect (often quicker and to a greater extent) as well as the elevated and genuine. We must herein the more readily acknowledge the power of sound, that even in its perverted employment it still exerts a vast influence over the mind and senses,—apart, moreover, from the effect of secondary objects, of prejudice, and of fashion. Indeed, it is not to be denied, that the corporeal effect of sound acting in large masses, in conjunction with considerable talent, magnified, perhaps, by partiality into great superiority, in the performers, is capable of producing from very moderate or indifferent works an effect which may surprise artists of judgment; but the cause of that effect is not in the composition—it is the attributes of the large body or volume of sound, and of the influential partiality for the performers. Hence we may perceive how small the claims may be of many a vaunted work of art, whose pretensions have been estimated by its immediate consequences. Those persons, however, are acting very injudiciously, who desirous of no further struggle, seem contented and satisfied with the good that exists. It will indeed endure, without further exertion. It will be conveyed from artist to artist, and the magnificent structure of art will be completed, so far as may be permitted to humanity. But the communication the participation of artistic, and therewith civilized elevation to our contemporaries, cannot be allowed to remain stationary. The history of the world is reckoned by centuries, and at wide intervals. The moments of improvement progress like stars in the heavens, and with them as they roll; but the limited space of human life cannot dispense with its portion of their beneficent illumination.

In fine, the mere external, technical, mechanical, formal education, does not reach to the deep spring, where the lifestream of art is generated and preserved. It is but too often observable, unfortunately, how empty and unproductive this false external cultivation leaves the mind; how, in its pursuit, year after year, full of the noblest germs of life, and capable of the highest joys of art, are allowed to fade and wither away. It has been remarked but too frequently, that these disciples of technicality, these virtuosi, these amateur dilettanti, these thorough bass cognoscenti, and aesthetical critics, have the most unsatisfactory conceptions of art, that they have little sympathy with it, and are utter strangers to its nature and operation.

True artistic education, like true art, is not concerned merely with the technicalities, which make only a handicraftsman, nor with mere outward consideration, which, instead of living art, produce nothing but dead abstractions. It is governed by the essential nature of its duties, and assumes for its object the bringing into life and action the highest and fullest conception of art in each individual, and in the greatest number of individuals in the whole nation. In the pupil, it searches for the germ of artistic susceptibility and capacity. This spark it cherishes and frees from obstructions, and nourishes and strengthens into the power of life. It then contemplates the regions of art, and examines what has hitherto been produced. Of all this, and of that which is most worthy, it endeavors to convey as much as possible to the scholar, according to the power of each individual. This education does not move the hand and fill the ear alone, but penetrates by the senses into the soul; through the deeply moved sensibilities it awakens the inward consciousness. And now the waves of sound may surge and roll—what the inward consciousness has apprehended, that which has become a sentiment and property of the mind, can be safely preserved and extended.

This, in brief, is the object of true artistic education,—to elevate the capabilities, mental and corporeal, to the highest point. This is the indispensable process, without which, high attainment in art is not possible. This is more or less the enlightened struggle of all who either wholly or in part devote their life and powers to artistic employment; this, whether it be acknowledged or not, it is the absolutely undeniable and indispensable obligation of all teachers to produce.

Shall it be considered an empty dream to desire for our country, so deeply gifted in the art of sound, a general popular education in music, in that high and only true sense? Does not this want and right proclaim itself from the deep in-born feelings of the people, from the overflowing abundance of their conceptions, from our countless artists, from our display of the richest productions of art in advance of nations? Shall our festivals be never more joyous with our national songs, which are more abundant, more varied, more melodious, and more deeply touching than those of any people on earth? Shall the evangelical church be perpetually deprived of her own appropriate music, which centuries ago was created for her? Shall the Catholic church, in whose sacred service music assumes so important a function, suffer in our country so deep a degradation as it has endured in Italy, where movements from Rossini's and Bellini's operas, and Auber's overtures, disgrace the most holy moments of the service? Or in Spain, where in recent times, church music is dumb, even to the psalmody of the priesthood? We fear it not, and those who with us have a higher trust, will labor incessantly with all their strength, and on all occasions, to attain the highest object. We, a laborious people, strong in body and mind, must strive for a higher elevation than tender nature has conferred on her southern children to amuse their happy hours.

In so important a matter, however, the word or deed of individuals can do but little. The State only can produce the accomplishment of our aspirations. From this source much must be expected, if to good will, the power of finding fit agents,—not handicraftsmen who would propagate their own peculiarities, but men who would add the spirit of art to its form, mind to technicality; in short, men who have made true art the object of their lives.

We must at the same time, acknowledge that the condition and progress of art are entirely dependent upon the state of the political and moral relations and movements of the people. This has been already observed by many in the direction of art during the last ten years. But the history of art proves that her destiny in this regard has been governed by the highest wisdom and goodness. Let, therefore, each individual in joyful confidence do all he ought, and may, and earn; and tranquilly await the result of doing his duty.

(To be continued.)

Joachim as a Composer.

It is in vain we listen for the most distant approach to a false note; it is in vain we wait for the slightest trick, such as those now practised by modern virtuosos, who, by false sentimentality, by distorting the notes, or by inordinately raising or lowering them, parody the feelings; it is in vain we seek to read on his features how difficult this or that passage is; it is not thus that he announces what he is going to play; he expresses in eloquent, true and warm words. It is not, however, only as an instrumentalist that he occupies the highest position; he does so also as a composer, as he has proved by his "Concerto in Ungarischer Weise." Thus artistically, and, above all, nobly connected, Hungarian music has a truly great future in store for it. Joachim has taught us how great and elevating a work of art may be created out of the pregnant materials of Hungarian music, rendered on the violin. This is the means by which the type of Hungarian national music will ripen into artistically historical and universal significance; and we have a double reason for being delighted that Hungary possesses in its patriotic countryman a great instrumental artist, who bears the spirit of Hungarian music upon eagle's pinions through the wide world.

The concerto consists of three parts: "Allegro maestoso," "Romance," and "Finale à la Zingara." We might fancy we were enjoying the effect produced by a Symphony of Schumann's, in so correct and searching a mode has Joachim treated his Hungarian theme. The solo violin is the Speaker of the House, who descends from his official chair to commence with the other members—the orchestral parts, the debate, the members often obtaining, with their objections, the best of the argument. But the logic of reason, respect for the laws, and perseverance achieve a victory. The sparklingly free fancy of the first movement is succeeded by a wonderfully beautiful romance, while in the last movement the ennobled shades of Lavata, Csermak, Bihari, and Rózsavölgy flit up and down, in inspiring staccatos and runs, before us. The difficulties to be overcome in playing the concerto can be appreciated only by violinists. The success achieved by its performance was truly something extraordinary; we trust it may induce the "composer," Joachim, to continue his labors in the branch of his art, to the glory of his fatherland and of Hungarian music. Bach's Chaconne and Tartini's Teufelssonate were the other pieces selected by the concert-giver. Did we not fear having already afforded the artist's extraordinary modesty grounds for recrimination by the above true, though weak expression of our feelings, we would speak only in dithyrambic verse; but we forbear, and on this occasion will praise the audience, who knew how to honor not only patriotic sentiments but art in the artist—art which, it is true, by the way, streamed forth with most overwhelming power. Bach's Chaconne, notwithstanding the fact that Schumann and Mendelssohn wrote pianoforte accompaniments for it, is certainly more characteristic without any accompaniment at all, as it originally stood, and as Joachim played it. The combination of the conflicting parts, the strong and truly antique conception, and the sublime earnestness of the old master, can be grasped only after such an interpretation of them. Who can have played this difficult piece in Bach's lifetime, we wonder! We fancy that the Chaconne could, in those days, have been performed as a trio or quartet at the utmost. A no less sterling composition is Tartini's Trille du Diable. The inspiration and poetry exhibited in the execution of the first andante movement, which is so unaffectedly simple, weigh down a whole legion of virtuoso tricks. The last movement with the double trill which the devil played to Tartini in the latter's dream, and whence the sonata afterwards sprang, enjoyed, in truth, a demoniacal success. The audience, even when the piece had been repeated, would hardly leave the rooms. But who likes to part with such an artist, who keeps in his magic bow a host of spirits, all obeying the soul of their master, Mlle. Méry kindly assisted the concert-giver by singing several songs.—Pesth Lloyd Zeitung.

Mason & Hamlin's Melodeons and Harmoniums.

The manufacturing of these instruments in Boston has become a branch of industry of much importance, calling into requisition no small amount of capital and giving employment to numerous operatives. We presume that everybody knows that they are extensively used in churches and public halls in place of the more expensive and cumbersome organ; in fact, nearly all our village churches now use the Organ Harmonium, an instrument not much larger than a pianoforte, but which gives the full swell and volume of sound of an organ itself. (?)

The principal manufacturers of these instruments, Messrs. Mason & Hamlin, of Boston, have just completed an entirely new and extensive manufactory on the site of their old one which was destroyed by fire, and in so doing have shown that degree of Yankee energy for which Massachusetts men are so celebrated. Their old works were burned down the 14th of last January, on the 10th of April following, less than three months after, a large five story building was completed on the same spot, corner of Cambridge and Charles streets, complete in all its departments, with machinery of the most approved description. The new machinery and improvements in this factory, give it a decided advantage over any other of the kind in the country.

The whole building throughout is heated by steam, supplied by a splendid 20 horse-power steam-engine, made by the Corliss Steam Engine Co., of Providence, which also drives all the machinery of the factory; the boiler is situated in a building entirely separate from the main building, the shavings and fuel kept in a fire-proof brick vault, and other precautions taken to render the premises secure against accident by fire.

The lower or basement floors contain large drying rooms, where the stock used in the manufacture of instruments is subjected to a thorough heating and drying process; a portion of the first story is used for the wareroom and offices, while the other half is occupied by numerous planing machines, circular saws, jig saws, turning machines, boring machines, &c., of the latest and most improved description. Upon this floor is also the testing or finishing room, in which every instrument is thoroughly examined and tested by an expert before it is packed for transportation, in order to prevent all mistakes and ensure satisfaction to the purchaser.

Above, in successive stories of the building, and in different rooms, the various departments of the work are carried on—the veneering, the polishing, fitting the keys, varnishing, action making, tube board making, turning, fly finishing, &c. Various machines are in operation in these different rooms driven by the motive power of the establishment, and performing work with almost human intelligence. In the glue, varnish and staining rooms the heating of those materials is done by steam, artificial heat being obtained from no other source. The ceilings in all the rooms are plastered, quite unusual in factories, but a further preventative against fire.

We have spoken above of the popularity of these instruments. We are informed by Messrs. Mason & Hamlin that some four hundred churches have, up to this time, been furnished with their Harmoniums, which are much preferred to pipe organs by churches of moderate dimensions. The instruments made by this firm have also been sold in every State in the country, besides being exported to Europe, Asia, Africa, South America and the Sandwich Islands,—like all Yankee inventions, penetrating every part of the known world. Their superiority is attested by the fact that they have invariably received the first premium where they have been brought into competition with others at exhibitions. No less than twenty-six awards have been received by the manufacturers the past five years from institutes, &c., in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and other cities. They are also preferred and recommended by all musical instructors and organists.

Of the Harmoniums there are five different sizes, made with from six to twelve stops, with and without pedal bass, at prices varying from two to five hundred dollars. Of the Melodeons there are eight styles. They are made with one and two sets of reeds, one and two banks of keys, and range from four to six octaves. The prices of these are from forty-five to two hundred dollars. The high reputation which these instruments have attained is due not only to a liberal expenditure of means, but also to the thorough and efficient manner in which they are made, the strictest attention and care being given to every detail in their make, thereby producing a perfect whole.

The establishment of Messrs. Mason & Hamlin is among the best appointed manufactories in the city limits. It is open, we understand for the inspection of the public, and is well worth a visit from musical amateurs and those interested in industrial progress a model establishment of the kind.—Commercial Bulletin.

Musical Correspondence.

TORONTO, APRIL 27, 1861.—Dear Journal:—After a long drought in musical circles, we have at length been favored with a stream of gushing melody from that celebrated artiste, Madame Inez Fabbri, who not long since astonished your Boston public with her extraordinary powers of voice and dramatic execution. And it is to express my extreme satisfaction with all I have heard of her that I now write.

From all I can learn her fine talents are already sufficiently known and appreciated, in your city to render further comment on my part useless. But I would, nevertheless, add my mite to the ample store of praise so deservedly bestowed upon her by all American Journals, among which in regard to musical matter yours ranks first in Canadian estimation.

Mad. Fabbri is considered by most of our musical critics as the greatest artiste who has visited us since Jenny Lind. The wide range of her talents was evinced in her skilful rendering of the aria from the first act of Traviata, the tragic scene from Nabucco, and a grand scene from Martiri, all of which were produced in a style deserving of the highest encomium.

Herr Richard Mulder, is a pianist who ranks in our estimation very high, perhaps second to none. He surmounts the difficulties of the instrument with the greatest ease, and his fantasia on airs from Lucia, and "the Cascade," show him to be a fine composer.

Mr. C. R. Adams, of Boston, is probably well known to you. He possesses a fine tenor voice the peculiar sweetness of which renders all his selections exceedingly effective, and in the scene and duo from Martiri, with Mad. Fabbri showed also some pretensions to being an actor.

I enclose programme of the concert and until further news (musical of course) presents itself, remain

Truly yours,

BERTRAND.

PROGRAMME—PART I.

Grand Fantaisie de Lucia, for Piano—Mulder—Executed by Richard Mulder.
Ernani—Verdi—Grand Scene of the First Act, Sung by Madame Fabbri.
La Favorita Romance (Spirto Gentil),—Donizetti—Sung by Mr. Adams.
Homage a Bellini (Fantaisie Brillante),—Mulder—For the Piano, executed by R. Mulder.
Nabuco, Tragic scene (in appropriate costume)—Verdi.

PART II.

La Cascade, Etude for the Piano—Mulder.
La Traviata, Scene of the First Act—Verdi—Sung by Madame Fabbri.
Come into the Garden Maud—Balfé—Favorite Ballad, Mr. Adams.
The Universal Carnival—Mulder—For the Piano, executed by R. Mulder.
I Martiri (in appropriate costume) Grand Duo and Scena. Paolina..... Madame Fabbri
Polito..... Mr. Adams

PARIS, APRIL 19, 1861.—A young artist has made her début at the Italian Opera who promises to take her rank among the celebrities before long. Her name is Trechelli, her family name Gillebert. Thus it will be seen that her real name spelt backwards with the G left out gives her assumed stage name Trebelli. So much for an Italian termination. Young and handsome she proved the power of her voice and the excellence of her playing in Il Barbire di Scriglia also in Rossini's Semiramide. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano and is pronounced by many here the equal of Alboni's, in some respects. Her success was decisive.

At the Théâtre Français M. Legouvé gives a new piece Un jeune homme qui ne fait rien—However this may be his Madone de l'Art which is still being played at the Odeon is not calculated to increase the fame of this illustrious academicien. "The Madonna of Art" is simply a poor weak play that lives only by the talent of Mme. Ristori. An Italian actress Beatrix loves a German prince and is loved by him in return; but Beatrix is as virtuous as she is talented, she will not be his mistress, she cannot be his wife though he presses her to accept his hand. She is the first to show him the fallacy of such a marriage and with an excess of generosity not explained in the play she abandons all thoughts of love to become a Madonna of art. Such is the whole plot, good in its fundamental idea, but weakly carried out. It was a happy thought however, for the Italian actress thus to appear for the first time in a French play in the character of an Italian. The very irregularities in her pronunciation thus cease to be a blemish, for Mad. Ristori has not yet divested herself of the intonations of the language of Alfieri. It is in the simplest phrases that this Italian tone, it would be too much to call it accent, is the most sensibly felt. When there are outbursts of passion that very cadence adds force to the evenness of the French phrase. One realizes how great is the talent of the artist who has had the courage to act in a language not her own when seeing her side by side with the artists of the Odeon, these who at other times appear so good, seem unnatural and forced in their play. There are in the Madonna of Art two episodes as it were in which Beatrix can show her power a little in spite of M. Legouvé. In that small unnamed German principality where she is a guest she is asked to recite some passage, she does so choosing a scene from Schiller's Joan of Arc and one from Romeo and Juliet. Here the author has merely weakened the original of both scenes and yet those are the passages in his play which alone enable Mad. Ristori to display a talent equal to the situation to be rendered. "La Madone de l'Art" is played five times a week and long before the performance commences every seat in the house has been taken.

At the porte St. Martin a Spanish legend has been worked up with all the extravagance of melodrama by G. Vaqueric son-in-law of Victor Hugo, the piece is called Les Funerailles de l'honneur. It was hissed at the first representation. This theatre is now closed for a few days as the Tour de Nesle is to be reproduced soon.

Of novelties there are few enough of importance. At the Bouffes Parisiennes Le Pont des Soupirs by Offenbach. At the Theatre Dejazzet another parody on Tannhäuser by Clairville Le panne aux Airs. At the Variétés l'Amour en Sabots, a vaudeville by Labiche and Delacour. At the Delassements Comiques, Photographies Comiques by A. Flan and Ernest Blum. At the Folies Dramatiques Césarine Borgia vaudeville by Tréfeu and Les seize ans de Lucienne by Elie Trébant.

Three German operas are about to be produced. "King George," by Ehrlich—"Wittekind," by Raphael and "The Love Ring," by Stukersky.

A new opera "Shakespeare," by Maestro Benvenuti, is announced in the Italian journals.

Staudig the German singer died on the 24th of last month. His intellect has failed him a few years ago. In early life he was on the point of taking monastic vows. He never succeeded in the Italian opera.

For Easter music we have had at the opera Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The church music during holy week has been noticed in some of the Paris papers in connection with concerts &c.

The receipts of the theatre of the capital during month of March were 1,606,868 francs.

To night at the Opéra Comique will be given Royal cravate, music by the Duke de Massa, words by the Count of Mesgrigny. F. B.

Church Music in St. Louis.

ST. LOUIS, MAY, 1861.—In speaking of the churches of St. Louis we will take the church of Rome first, surpassing as it does in numbers, both of churches, congregations and wealth all others together. No other city in the world has so many nationalities, so equally represented, as this. Here, true to her principles, the Catholics in their appeals to the sense have spent immense sums on buildings and decorations, and of course, while so much is done for the eye, the ear has received its due share of attention, consequently we have the same fine old organs, and the same thrilling music we have so often listened to in the cathedrals of the old world. In our rambles let us stop first at St. John's Church, corner of 16th and Chestnut. This is a new church, one of the most costly, and has the finest organ and choir in St. Louis. Father Brannon takes the greatest interest in the choir. They have a nice room fitted up by the side of the organ, and furnished with sofas, easy chairs, a library of classical music, &c., &c. Nothing more comfortable. The first organ ever heard in public worship in this country was sent from London to the King's Chapel in 1714. The organist came with it, there being none in America. The first organ ever built in this country was made by Edward Bronfield, who died Aug. 18th, 1776.

The fact is stated on his tombstone. The organ in St. John's Church is excelled by few in the United States. We have not room for a detailed statement, but we question if there is an organ of two sets of keys on the continent which can be compared with this one in effectiveness. The number of pipes or stops is not always a true index of the capacity of an organ. In this organ there are no half stops. The largest metal pipe is 16 feet high and 39 inches in circumference its tone being C C C. The largest pipe is C C C C 32 feet Bourdon. The pedal organ contains double stop diapason, violoncello and viola or octave viol, being the most powerful in the country, except the pedal organ of the instrument in Tremont Temple, Boston. The whole number of pipes is 1529 and 34 stops. The organ is supplied with a set of composition pedals whereby the player gains the effect and variety of 3 banks of keys. The compass of the pedal organ is from C C C C to C C and the great and swell organ from C C to G in alt. The case is 21 feet by 33, beautifully finished in white, but space forbids us from saying more.

The organist is worthy of his instrument. He is a young man who used to play when a boy in Dr. Gray's church, Poston, and afterwards in the Tabernacle, New York. He has no rival in the whole West, and many a player have I listened to in, even your city, who could not hope to bear from him the palm. It would be useless for me to describe a first-class organ player, your readers know what that is as well as I do. His name is A. J. Ulman. No organist is better supported.

Arnold Scharvens, bass, is one of our best singers, having enjoyed all the advantages of Europe. It is impossible for us to notice each one in particular and to do each justice. A. W. Howe, baritone, Wm. Anderson, 1st tenor, Geo. Dennison, 2d tenor, are among our best singers. Anderson is also from Boston, and used to belong to the Handel and Haydn Society there. The soprano, Miss Virginia C. Ivory and Miss Fanny Lord and the alto singers, Miss Julia Orcutt and Miss Dora Sutherland complete the principal solo singers, the choir having an effective chorus. There is not in this city a better singer than Miss Ivory; we were very much surprised indeed when we first heard her, as we knew of no such voice in any choir. This choir sing all of the music of the Catholic church and while we have listened to the glorious music of Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini, &c., we could not but think, what we now affirm, that we would like to see the equal of this choir in the West. "BROWN."

The World of Weimar.

It must not be supposed that because Schiller and Goethe are no more, and that because the bappy contingency which united a literary circle in Weimar in the time of Karl August does not favor the times of Karl Alexander, that that prince is doing nothing to keep up the Athenian character of his tidy little capital.

It is now, if not the metropolis of literature, at least the metropolis of music; by no means, however, a republican metropolis, for the Government has become a perpetual dictatorship in the hands of Liszt, who reigns supreme as ever over the piano, and tells the prince and people of Weimar what they ought to believe in and to love. Whether Liszt however great a genius, may be called a great composer, some may be inclined to doubt; for the music in which this maestro glories is anything but composing, and, to uninitiated ears like my own, the nearest idea that it conveys is that of a melodious and harmonious thunderstorm, mixed with occasional broadsides from half a dozen line-of-battle ships. It is music which, a German critic has said, would make a deaf man hear, and a hearing man deaf. It is heard in perfection in those whirlwind operas of Wagner, in which the harmony mounts and mounts and mounts, with a swing and sweep which seems to take all the house up to the ceiling with it, until it busts and falls about our ears in a general explosion of bravos, scattering clapping of kid-gloves like crackers.

The apotheosis of this distinguished artist has taken place in his lifetime. He is everywhere the oracle on matters of musical taste. He has a fine house on a height commanding the city, said to have nine pianos among its furniture. Here he receives the homage of torchlight processions and gifts from fair maidens' hands. At every musical exhibition he alone, by common consent, is allowed the privilege of a "bravo," while his silence is the severest censure that any artist has to apprehend, unlike that of the severer count in Lord Byron's "Beppo." For Liszt is a thoroughly genial genius. When he appears in a room, with his long, large, enthusiastic face, spare figure, flashing eyes, and streaming hair, all know that the reign of matter-of-fact and daylight disagreeables is past, and the advent of the artist is hailed by all as the beginning of enjoyment, as might have been the coming of the musical sun-god Apollo, when he shed his vocal beam on Memnon's statue. He is surrounded by a host of lesser stars; and a greater treat for the ears can scarcely be conceived than any musical entertainment at Weimar under his auspices. He is in his glory at the court-concerts, where he directs the band. If Liszt is the prince of the piano, so we have here a fair muse of vocal melody in the person of the Frau von Milde. This lady's voice seems to have been created expressly for the Weimar theatre. It is never astonishing in its strength, like that of Grisi or Alboni; but, without the exact measure of fulness, it approximates, in its weird sweetness and delicate flexibility, to that of Jenny Lind. But Jenny Lind would have been too much for our quiet little theatre, as we wish to dine pleasantly every day, and not to feast; so we are perfectly pleased, evening after evening, by the singing of our sweet prima donna. As an actress, she is not demonstrative, and rather falls short of than overleaps the mark in action; but in dignified quiet parts—the parts of princesses, especially in the romantic operas of Wagner—she is quite at home. By some she is considered beautiful, but none will deny that the expression of her countenance is as angelic as her notes. Perhaps the most pleasing of all her parts is that of Fidelio, the lady in page's dress who rescues her husband from death in prison. She is supported by another singer of very high merit, and a decidedly good actress, the Fräulein Wolf; and there are other ladies who sing well, as well as some who look very well—for instance, Fräulein Baum. The gentlemen, also, are fully adequate to the parts they have to sustain. We have the Herr von Milde, the fortunate husband of the prima donna whose imposing face and figure fit him well to sustain the parts of heroes and warriors; Αχιλλος, a Hungarian of sweet and delicately-managed voice, as barytone, the latter gentleman being also a very good comedian; Roth as basso, and, from his portly figure, a good king or emperor; Mefist as tenor. This gentleman's action, at first somewhat extravagant, has been moderated since his residence in the tasteful Weimar; and he often gives general satisfaction. Schmidt and his lady are also good, both as actors and singers. In fact, the whole singing staff, including the inferior parts, is excellent. When we pass to tragedy and "drame," we are pleased by the fine acting of Fräulein Daun, especially in such parts as those of Minna von Barnhelm of Lessing; while other parts, especially those where maidenly naïveté is a characteristic, are appropriately rendered by Fräulein Röckel, a young, beautiful, and daily improving actress.

The weakest part of the theatrical repertoire is the ballet; the strongest is perhaps the band, as would be expected in the musical metropolis. This is generally under the direction of Herr Lassen, the composer of the opera of Frauenlob, in the style of Wagner. Weimar has to lament the recent death of another distinguished resident composer, Monsieur Chelard, formerly "Capel-meister." His opera of Macbeth, altered from Shakespeare, is occasionally given, with vociferous applause from those who love the romantic opera, or Music of the Future, as it is somewhat quaintly called by its admirers, its claims being modestly allowed to be not fully admitted at present, or being more pretentiously put forward as too great for the understandings of the present generation.

Whether the operas of Wagner will ever be popular in England, depends much on the set of the tide of fashion—fashion being there in some measure independent of taste; and we should think it highly probable that before long they will have their day, and keep it till the fashion is over and the houses cease to fill. In France, however, I should doubt if the experiment, which is to be tried shortly, will succeed, French taste being as yet too strongly wed to the classical school of music; and French taste is one of those few things in France which is essentially conservative and unchangeable. The object of these Wagnerian operas is the reproduction of the costumes and life of the middle ages with the same faithfulness with which Kean has restored on the English stage the periods of the Shakspearian drama. This object is effected with success at Weimar by the diligence of the costumier, and the rich state of theatrical properties. Crowds of people are placed on the stage, till the actors nearly outnumber the audience, and long and splendid processions, civil and ecclesiastic, defile round; and there is great flourish of trumpets and loud music everywhere—in front, in the middle, and behind—with an echo also, if an echo is admissible by means of rocks or buildings. The spectacle is certainly imposing on these occasions, but there appears to be a proportionate sacrifice of individual parts. We are withal strangely reminded of the decline of Roman art, as complained of by Horace in his epistle to Augustus. And, strangely enough, what we have said of the stunning noise of these representations found its parallel in the Augustan age. But I need not say that the taste of Horace was, of course, classical; and I rather fear I shall be considered to be espousing the heretical side, and perhaps be burnt—at least in effigy—in front of the Göthe-Schiller statue, for the Wagnerists, like all new sectaries, are intolerant of opposition. Their noblest aims consist in endeavoring to give a more national character to the operatic drama and to infuse a high moral into it. * * *

The practical objections to these Wagnerian operas consist in the expense and trouble of putting them on the stage, as contrasting with what is required for those of simple construction, and in the sacrifice of melody to harmony, the individual voice being generally greatly subordinated to the tempestuous music of the band. I confess, possibly through ignorance, that Fidelio and the Barbiere di Siviglia give me more pleasure, even when sung in a German translation. What is called in England the legitimate drama still holds its own at Weimar. Shakspeare receives honors which are seldom accorded to him in the land which he has helped to make immortal. The adaptation of Winter's Tale, translated by the Intendant, the Herr von Dingelstadt, is truly admirable; and Lear is done full justice to by the new tragedian Herr Lehfeldt; while Fräulein Röckel is a perfect impersonation of Cordelia. On the occasion of the representation of that stormy and exaggerated piece The Robbers of Schiller, a singular scene is presented in the Weimar theatre. The students of Jena come over in large numbers, and sit in the place of the orchestra, distinguished by the motley caps which denote their native provinces. Then they join in the songs which occur in the course of the piece, and interpolate one or two of their own. The full burst of their young voices is a fine variation of the usual musical accompaniment. This eccentric privilege was first granted to the students of Jena by the Grand Duke Karl August. The Weimar theatre does not correspond to its world-wide fame, either in external appearance or internal decorations. No one would know it to be a theatre from the outside; if it were in England, it might be supposed to be a kind of building devoted to the miscellaneous and somewhat incongruous purposes of Exeter Hall, or perhaps a tabernacle for popular Spurgeonism, while we were ourselves misled, on entering Weimar, by the much more than trivial appearance of the pillared building of the Reading Museum. The double statue of Schiller and Goethe which stands before it in the Carlplatz, gives it, however, a dramatic character which it does not possess of itself.

Besides the Goethe-Schiller statue, there stand in the public spaces of the town two other statues, one of which represents Wieland standing near a fountain in the square called by his name, a kind of antiquated beau of benignant expression, and otherwise reminding the beholder of Voltaire; and the other, Herder, close to the scene of his labors, the large church of the town. This statue appears the least remarkable in any way, but it presented lately a very quaint appearance, when the head and shoulders were covered with snow, being as a contrast of a portentous black aspect.

While I have been taking you round to see the statues, I forgot the interior of the theatre. The Weimar theatre, though not beautiful, has a characteristic which has been often observed before, that of friendliness. It seems by its construction to make the whole audience what has been called "altogether." The Grand Duke's box par excellence is in the middle, opposite the orchestra, and he has two other private boxes at each side of the stage. When he is present, and supposed to be present, he sits, as also the Grand Duchess when she is present, in the exact centre of the state box. The right and left balconies diverge on each side. The people taking places in them are supposed to be in the company of their Royal Highnesses, and therefore in evening dress. When the Grand Ducal party arrive, they all rise and bow, their Highnesses bowing to the right and left; and the same ceremony is repeated at the close of the representation. When their Royal Highnesses are present, but supposed not to be, they sit in the private boxes, and in like manner do those members of the audience who wish to be incog., taking their places in the pit or the orchestra stalls. The gods in the gallery are the best-behaved Olympians that it has ever been my fortune to know of, forming a perfect contrast to the screaming, whistling, bear-garden of an English gallery. The utmost enormity they are ever guilty of is that of letting fall a play-bill or two on the heads of the inhabitants of the nether world. As for the actors and actresses, they are personally dear to the spectators, and seem more like private friends than artists ministering to their amusement. If they do not sing well or play well, one is sorry for them, but there is not a thought of expressing disapprobation. If they surpass themselves, they are called for and receive their homage gratefully and gracefully, and the hearty hand-clapping expresses less surprise at the performance than love of the performer. In connection with this loving relationship between the stage and public of Weimar, is the entire respectability of the lives of the members of the dramatic body at Weimar. Scandal would almost as soon dare to attack the established clergy.

In fact, the family-party nature of the Weimar theatre makes it a not much greater effort to feminine feeling to appear on the stage, than to act at private theatricals or to take a part in a charade. There is so much good-feeling that Hettstedt, the favorite comedian, interpolates jokes on his fellow actors, and even on the audience, which are invariably well received. In connection with all this good behavior, as connected with the performances, is the perfect accessibility of the theatre. Ladies come and go unattended with as much ease as if they were visiting at the house of a friend. The hats and cloaks are left in the corridors unticketed, and nothing is ever lost. The theatre at Weimar is a model of what every theatre ought to be in everything but external and internal appearance, which might certainly be improved.—Blackwood for April.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 11, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of "The Hymn of Praise," (Lobgesang), a Cantata by Mendelssohn.

Concerts.

MADAME VARIAN'S concert last Friday evening drew a full house and was in many respects highly successful. We understand that she was seriously ill and therefore was not able to do herself full justice; still she showed her power and culture and was heartily encoired in nearly every piece. Mr. Simpson has so sweet a voice that it makes one regret he does not sing better. He rarely uses his chest tones, and never opens his mouth sufficiently; and besides his lips are so immovable that it is impossible to understand whether he sings in English, Italian or German; he might as well give us a series of vocalises. As we said before his voice has a very smooth and pure quality of tone, and his taste is evident in every strain. It is a pity he could not open his mouth, articulate clearly, and enter with more spirit into the music. His selections were admirably made, and in spite of his defects he was heard with pleasure. Mr. Hoffman, the pianist, accompanied the singers tastefully, and in his solos showed some skill. His scales are even and true, and his power much beyond the average. We did not discover in his playing much sentiment or poetry, and his banjo-imitations in answer to an encore were far from agreeable to our ears.

BOSTON MOZART CLUB.—We omitted last week to mention the excellent concert given by this club, complimentary to their conductor Mr. F. Suck. The hall was well filled so that the compliment must have been a substantial one, as the Club departed on this occasion from its usual rule, and sold tickets.

The programme was an admirable one and performed throughout in a manner that would have done credit to many orchestras that we have heard here in old times. Especially full and strong in the strings, the elub is weakest, as those old orchestras were, in the wind instruments. Doubtless skilled amateur players will in time spring up to fill these parts also, thus rendering it unnecessary to ask professional aid.

PART I.

1. Quartette for stringed instruments.....Haydn
Allegro—Minuetto and Trio—Andante—Finale, Allegro vivace.
2. Fantasia on an original theme. Solo for Violin, with Orchestral Accompaniment.....F. Suck
3. Concert Overture.....Kalliwoda

PART II.

1. Variations on the Austrian National Hymn for Stringed Quartette.....Haydn
2. Grand Symphony in D Major.....Mozart
Allegro Moderato—Andante—Minuet and Trio—Finale;
Allegro con brio.

The Mozart Club has made a most successful and creditable beginning. Another season will doubtless give it increased strength, and skill. We shall look forward to its next season's entertainments with pleasing anticipations.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION concert on Wednesday afternoon attracted a crowded house. The programme was one that deserved such an audience.

PART I.

1. Union March.....Fahrbach
Arranged by A. Heinicke.
2. 7th Symphony, (Op. 92).....Beethoven
1. Poco Sostenuto. 2. Allegretto. 3. Presto.
4. Finale Allo con brio.

PART II.

3. Overture—"William Tell,".....Rossini
4. Potpourri—From "La Juive,".....
Arranged by A. Heinicke.
6. Turkish March—From the "Ruins of Athens,".....
Beethoven
6. Grand Finale—From the opera of "Tannhäuser,".....
R. Wagner.

The Germania Band performed the first and fourth numbers of the programme in a very effective style. The Symphony was not played throughout with the same excellence with which the first movements were given. The Turkish March is the one to which Mr. Dwight referred in one of his recent letters. Its harbaric quaintness is exceedingly interesting and characteristic. The next concert is to be the last of the series.

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER.—Our types last week made Dr. Holmes's new verse to this song anything but what the author intended. We reprint it therefore, as it should be.

When our land is illumined with Liberty's smile,

If a foe from within strike a blow at her glory,

Down, down with the traitor that dares to defile

The flag of her stars and the page of her story!

By the millions unchained when our birthright was gained,

We will keep her bright blazon forever unstained!

And the Star Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave

While the land of the free is the home of the brave.

The original song by Mr. Key was first published in the Baltimore Patriot on the 20th of September,

1814, under the title of "The defence of Fort

McHenry." The melody, we believe, is an old

English one and in Moore's Melodies appears as

"Anacreon in Heaven."

BOSTON MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting of this Society, the following officers were reelected by a unanimous vote:

President—Thomas Comer; Vice-President—F.

Suck; Secretary—Louis Rimbach; Treasurer—S.

S. Pearce; Librarian—C. H. Eichler; Auditor—C.

F. Frieze; Associates—Messrs. Rametti, A. Stein

and A. Kamerling; Trustees—Messrs. T. E. Chickering, George T. Bigelow, J. P. Bradlee, S. E.

Guild and John Bigelow.

ANTHONY PHILIP HEINRICH died in New York, on the 3d of May, after an illness of four months. Our readers will recollect an interesting sketch of his life and works in a letter of our correspondent Trovator, in this Journal of April 20th. The enthusiasm for his art which first led Father Heinrich to adopt it as his profession seems never to have left him even in his sickness and old age, as his occasional contributions to these columns attest. His circumstances were very straitened during the latter part of his life, and his most pressing wants were recently relieved by the ready kindness of his early friends in this city and New York.

MR. SOUTHARD, the musical composer, formerly of this city, and lately a resident of Hartford, has organized a Light Artillery company there to be enlisted for the war. The company numbers 90 men and embraces the best personnel we have ever seen in a volunteer corps. About half a dozen are skilful musicians; one is a French teacher who formerly served in the Chasseurs de Vincennes; one is an English artilleryman; besides there are blacksmiths, wheelwrights, teamsters, machinists, gunsmiths, tailors and laborers; all stalwart, earnest and temperate men. So that in case of emergency the gun-carriages can be mended, the horses shod and groomed, arms repaired, clothes and tents made, and the camp enlivened with music.

A concert was given last week for the benefit of the company which resulted in a handsome sum.

The transition from giving piano lessons and playing church voluntaries, to "the tented field" where rifled cannon and howitzers are ready to hurl the missiles of death against traitors, must be sufficiently startling. But our friend though slight in person has an indomitable spirit, and we have no doubt if his health is spared he will distinguish himself whenever there comes an opportunity. We may have a new "Lyre and Sword" song, or another "Piff-paff," or Battle Symphony. The awful grandeur of an actual contest must be very different from the conception of it which a man has in the privacy of his chamber.

MR. L. HINSDALE SHERWOOD, who has been a diligent laborer in the field of music, as the principal of a musical academy at Lyons, New York, has lately transferred the Institute to Springfield, Ohio, to be connected there with the excellent female seminary of that place.

NEW YORK, MAY 6. — MASON & THOMAS' Series of Soirées was brought to a worthy close last Tuesday, by one of the finest concerts it has ever been my good fortune to listen to. There were but three pieces on the programme, which, however, in point of value and interest could not be surpassed. They were some of the best specimens of three distinct classical epochs in music; the old Italian, the German of half a century ago, and what may be called the Renaissance, i. e., the modern school of the same nation. The most modern, however, the Music of the Future, was not represented. The compositions performed were Tartini's Trille du Diable, performed by Mr. Thomas in a manner that satisfied even those who had heard the same piece repeatedly from Joachim, Beethoven's marvellous Quartette in E flat, op. 74, and Schumann's Piano Quartette, in which Mr. Mason took part. The two last mentioned pieces have been produced here before, but the first was entirely new to a New York audience. It is wonderful, in its large, broad, melodious opening, and those weird, mysterious trill passages, which can well be imagined as being composed after a supernatural pattern.

And so we bid adieu to these artists, thanking them for many an hour of pure, elevated enjoyment, and hoping that another winter will let us greet them again in renewed vigor and increased excellence.

— t —

MUSICAL GENIUS.—"Seek not, young artist," says Rousseau, "the meaning expressed by the word genius. If you are inspired with its flame, you feel it. Are you destitute of genius, you will never be acquainted with it. The genius of a musician submits the universe to his art. He paints objects by sounds; he gives a language even to silence itself; he renders ideas by sentiments, sentiments by accents; and the passions he represents are drawn from the recesses of the heart. By his aid, pleasure assumes new charms; the grief to which he gives utterance draws forth our sighs; he is continually burning, but never consumed. He expresses with fire even the coldest subjects; in painting the horrors of death, he conveys to the soul that sentiment of life which never abandons it, and which he communicates to all hearts formed for its reception. But alas! his strains avail nothing to those in whom seeds like his own are not implanted; and his prodigies are scarcely felt by those who are incapable of imitating the fervor that gives them birth. Do you wish to know whether any spark of this devouring flame inspires you? Be quick! hasten to Naples—listen to the masterpieces of Leo, Durante, Jomelli, and Pergolesi. If your eyes are filled with tears, if you feel your heart palpitate, if joy agitates your bosom, if sorrow involves you in transports, take Metastasio in your hand, and labor: his genius will inflame yours; you will form a creation after his example. Stimulants like those will animate your genius; and the eyes of others will afterward restore you the tears your masters have caused you to shed. But if the charms of this grand art leave you tranquil and contented, if you feel no ravishing transport, if you discover nothing beautiful, dare you ask what is genius? Vulgar mortal! profane not the sacred appellation. What would it avail thee to know it—thou who canst not feel it? Compose in the French style and peaceably retire."

MUSIC.—Why do we all enjoy music? Because it sounds sweet. But why does it sound sweet?

That is a mystery known only to God.

Two things I may make you understand—two things which help to make music—melody and harmony. Now, as most of you know, there is melody in music when the different sounds of the same tune follow each other, so as to give us pleasure; there is harmony in music when different sounds, instead of following each other, come at the same time, so as to give us pleasure.

But why do they please us! and what is more, why do they please angels? and still more, why do they please God? Why is there music in heaven? Consider St. John's visions in the Revelations. Why did St. John hear therein harpers with their harps, and the mystic beasts, and the elders, singing a new song to God and to the Lamb; and the voices of many angels round about them, whose number was ten thousand times ten thousand?

In this there is a great mystery. I will try to explain what little of it I seem to see.

First—There is music in heaven, because in music there is no self-will. Music goes on certain laws and rules. Man did not make these laws of music; he has only found them out; and if he be self-willed and break them, there is an end of his music instantly: all he brings out of his discord and ugly sounds. The greatest musician in the world is as much bound by those laws as the learner in the school; and the greatest musician is the one who, instead of fancying that, because he is clever, he may throw aside the laws of music, knows the laws of music best, and observes them most reverently. And therefore it was that the old Greeks, the wisest of all the heathens, made a point of teaching their children music; because they said it taught them not to be self-willed and fanciful, but to see the beauty of order, the usefulness of rule, the divineness of laws.

And therefore music is fit for heaven; therefore music is a pattern and type of heaven, and of the everlasting life of God, which perfect spirits live in heaven; a life of melody and order in themselves; a life of harmony with each other and with God.—Kingsley's Sermons.

Music Abroad.

HERR STAUDIGL.—Staudigl died (in a lunatic asylum at Vienna) on the 24th of last month, aged fifty-four, the greatest German singer whom the past quarter of a century has seen. It is noticeable that his peculiar voice, a sound, strong, extensive bass, has always "grown" (as is said of plants) greatest, both as to quantity and perfection, in North and South Germany; but his distinction was, that he could turn that voice to fullest account everywhere, save in opera in Italian. There he failed; where countrymen of his, in every musical requisite his inferiors, have succeeded. Staudigl entered into life, if we mistake not, as one destined to take monastic order. His intellect had failed him some years prior to his decease. As a hearty, genial man, a great musician, with a noble voice (for whom, by the way, Mendelssohn wrote the part of Elijah), kindly farewell and regret are due.—Athenaeum.

MADAME LORINI.—Virginia Whiting Lorini has just concluded an engagement at Berlin, and is now at Brussels, where she is creating a furor. The Independence Belge of March 5, writes thus of our Boston prima donna:

Virginia Lorini achieved last night, if possible, a still greater success than last year in the performance of Semiramide, carrying away the audience by her energy, fire, and inspiration. She should be heard in the cavatina "Bel raggio lusinghiero." The tenderness and purity of her phrasing formed a marvellous contrast to the large, majestic style of her rendering the story which precedes the oath. She has proved herself a true artist. There are few prime donne who can be said to know by heart thirty operas. This does Madame Lorini; and more, she renders them in a manner which places her in the highest rank of lyric artists. She never descends to trickery, never transposes, but sings the composer's own music in the truest manner, there being no difficulty too great for her to master by the perfection of her method.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the third concert of the season, the newly-constituted orchestra, which now obeys the baton of Professor Bennett, gave still more convincing proofs of its efficiency. The selection was as follows:—

PART I.

Symphony, in B flat, No. 3.....Haydn
Air, "O cara imagine".....Mozart
Concerto, E flat, pianoforte.....Beethoven
Overture (Athalia).....Mendelssohn

PART II.

Sinfonia Pastorale.....Beethoven
Aria, "Sei miei sospiri".....Stradella
Overture (Oberon).....Weber

Each of the instrumental pieces is a masterpiece, and so well known that comment would be superfluous. The execution, more especially of the two symphonies, was splendid. Signor Gardoni made his first appearance this season. His charming voice is admirably suited to give expression both to the well-known air from Die Zauberflöte, and the expressive melody of Stradella. The concerto of Beethoven was executed by Mr. Otto Goldsmidt. The members of the orchestra applauded him loudly at the conclusion of his performance.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—La Favorita was repeated, and further opportunity was afforded of examining the merits of Signor Tiberini. The new tenor has certainly created a favorable impression, but as yet we do not feel bound to chronicle him as the successor of Mario. As he had been proclaimed a true singer of the Rossinian school, it would hardly be fair to pronounce an opinion on his capabilities from hearing him in Donizetti's French opera; and, under the circumstances, we do not think the management was politic in bringing him out in Fernando. First impressions go a long way, and it may, by and by, come to pass that it would have been more to Signor Tiberini's advantage had he appeared in the Barbiere, or La Gazza Ladra. Signor Tiberini's voice is a pure tenor, part chest, part head. The quality is not particularly sweet, nor sympathetic, and there is a slight huskiness about the middle tones, as if the voice had undergone a good deal of wear and tear—which, however, we do not think is the case. The falsetto is beautiful, and managed with great art. It is in the employment of the head voice, indeed, that the new tenor produces its best effects, and that he occasionally recalls the manner of Rubini. As a vocal artist we are inclined to rate Signor Tiberini highly, although certain eccentricities in the romance of Fernando, "Spirto Gentil"—the triumphs of Signor Mario and Giuglini—inclines us to qualify our verdict. At present we shall refrain from expressing ourselves further. Signor Tiberini appears to-night as Arturo in I Puritani, one of the most trying parts in opera, and no doubt next week we shall be enabled to estimate him at his real value.

On Thursday evenings, April 18 the Prophète was given for the fourth time with brilliant success, to the greatest house of the season. The novelty on this occasion was the substitution of Mad. Rudersdorff for Mlle. Corbari in the small but important character of Berta. The powerful voice, dramatic accent, and intellectual acting of Mad. Rudersdorff gave a prominence and interest to the part. The performance of the Prophète ought to attract the town for some time to come; but as Guillaume Tell is positively to be brought out on Thursday, the opportunities for hearing Meyerbeer's great work must consequently be limited.

This may be the place to add a report everywhere current, that Mad. Grisi and Signor Mario have rejoined the Royal Italian Company.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The principal feature at the third concert was the reappearance of Mr. Ole Bull, after an absence of more than twenty years. The hearty reception accorded to the Norwegian violinist showed that his old admirers had forgotten him, while those to whom he could only be known by reputation (the majority present?) were no less ready to give him a welcome on that account. In the school of playing which he has adopted, Mr. Ole Bull is no doubt a master, and acceptable to a section of the musical public. This was proved by the applause and "encores" to both his solos. The first a fantasia of Paganini's, on "Hope told flattering tale," was a remarkable and original display after its fashion—the air sustained while the left hand gave a pizzicato accompaniment, "harmonies" in abundance, "double stopping" (ditto), all sorts of variations, tricks and devices calculated to astonish his hearers. Instead of repeating the fantasia, Mr. Ole Bull substituted a short dance-tune, which showed still further his fertility in eccentric resources. Mozart's "La ci darem" formed the subject of the second fantasia; and certainly never was its character, its charming melody, more thoroughly caricatured. The audience insisted so strenuously upon an "encore," that there was nothing left but to comply, and an arrangement (with prelude) of "God save the Queen" again exhibited the peculiar qualities we have already mentioned. That a great many will go to hear Mr. Ole Bull, there is no doubt; but that he will retain a permanent hold upon a London public we question. Within the last twenty years a more healthy taste has been engendered. Certain it is that those who go week after week to hear the quartets and sonatas of Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn at the Monday Popular Concerts, will not care to listen a second time to playing which, sacrificing everything intellectual to the mere trickery of execution, can never be dignified by the name of art.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The musical public owe a deep debt of gratitude to the Monday Popular Concerts, for making them acquainted with a number of compositions, which are not only "caviare to the general," but, in many instances, unknown even to musicians; except the few whose opportunities and research are quite quite exceptional. It was a good thought to give Mendelssohn's Ottet and Spohr's double quartette in E minor, both on the same night, as it afforded an occasion to contrast works, equally great in their way, although utterly opposed in character. Both produced a marked impression, and as the players in each instance were MM. Vieuxtemps, Ries, Wiener, Watson, Schruers, Webb, Paque and Piatti, the execution left nothing to be desired. The novelty of the evening was one of the early sonatas of Beethoven's Op. 26, in A flat, for pianoforte alone, played by Mr. Charles Hallé (from memory) with all the correctness and refinement for which he is famous. This being the most universally familiar of all the sonatas of Beethoven, needs no description. Andante con variazioni and the Marcia funebre sulla morte d'un Eroe, appeared to make the most impression; but the whole work was so well received as to induce us to hope that we may hear it repeated. The sonata of the 26th was composed about the year 1801, when the success of a funeral march in Paer's Achilles, of which every one was talking, prompted Beethoven to show what he could do in the same style; hence the Marcia funebre (the 3d movement), than which it is impossible to imagine anything more solemn and impressive. M. Vieuxtemps' own admirable and interesting sonata in B flat, for viola and pianoforte, was given for the second time, and although the latter instrument plays but a subordinate part, it being rather a solo for tenor with accompaniment, the excellent taste of Mr. Charles Hallé added materially to magnificent playing of M. Vieuxtemps, who is as eminent a master of the viola as of the violin. The vocal pieces were confined to two: Mozart's "O cara imagine," and Mendelssohn's "Garland," both rendered with admirable expression, intelligence and neatness, by Mr. Tennant, who is fast (and deservedly), rising in public estimation.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Beethoven's Mass in D, was given on Friday, the 12th inst., before an audience which filled every part of Exeter Hall. A work which occupied the illustrious musician more than three years in composing, and takes but an hour and a half in its performance, may well be accepted as a masterpiece; and being quite exceptional, in style and character, if not thoroughly understood at first hearing, the deficiency must be attributed rather to the want of pretension on the part of the auditors, than to any shortcoming of one who was unquestionably the most intellectual and profound musician of his age. How long is it since the last pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven were declared to be incomprehensible,—wild emanations of a disturbed mind,—written when the composer had lost his hearing, and could not judge of the effect? Were not the same remarks applied to his later quartettes, and yet these are now not only understood but familiarized to the public and appreciated by large audiences each week at the Monday Popular Concerts. If there are portions of the Missa solennis that may sound strange to unaccustomed ears, let us be sure that whatever Beethoven did was with a purpose; and as the work was written when he was in unusual health and spirits, and was not finished until nearly two years and a half after the occasion for which it was designed (the installation of Beethoven's pupil, patron, and friend, Cardinal Arehduke Rudolph), we may conclude that further acquaintance with the work will make clear that which may at first appear obscure. The Mass in D has been but little heard in England. At the festival for the inauguration of Beethoven's monument at Bonn, in 1845, it excited such interest that its production was deemed advisable by the London Philharmonic, who gave it shortly after. It was not until 1854, however, that the Sacred Harmonic Society ventured on the Missa solennis; nor was the experiment over successful.

On the present occasion, however, a vast improvement was exhibited. The music taxed both singers and players to the utmost; and if the realisation occasionally fell short of the conception, the elaborate complications of the work must be remembered, and the credit allowed for the generally admirable style in which it was rendered by hand and chorus. Mad. Rndersdorff and Sain-ton Dolby, with Messrs. Sims Reeves and Thomas, were the soloists, and their very arduous duties were accomplished with the most artistic skill. A word of high praise must be given to M. Sain-ton for his masterly performance of the violin obbligato to the "Benedictus." As the Mass is to be repeated at the next concert of the Society, we may recur to the subject.

EXETER HALL.—On Wednesday evening Herr Molique's oratorio of Abraham was performed for the first time in London at a grand concert given in aid of the funds of the Middlesex Hospital, and with all the success to which its great merits so justly entitle it. When this admirable work was produced last year at the Norwich Festival we gave a full analysis of it, and can add nothing now to the praise then bestowed, unless it be the statement that a fresh audition served to confirm us in the highly favorable opinion already expressed. Herr Molique, on the occasion under notice, was assisted by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mad. Sain-ton-Dolby, Mr. Santley, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Wallworth and Mr. Sims Reeves; a band of first-rate efficiency, including nearly all our ablest orchestral performers, and a chorus selected from the best choirs, whether amateur or professional, which the metropolis can boast. Thus Herr Molique's oratorio was afforded the best possible chance of being understood and felt by the London public, and the general result, so frequent was the applause, so numerous were the encores, must have completely realised the anticipations of the most elevated admirers of the eminent German composer. The fine march in E flat was enthusiastically remanded; and similarly honored were the chastely harmonised and beautiful trio "Let all those rejoice," sung with perfect precision and expression by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Wallworth, and Mr. Sims Reeves; the touching air "Hear my prayer," most sympathetically rendered by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington; and the song "Pour out thy heart before the Lord, given by Mr. Sims Reeves with all the fervor and mastery skill by which his singing is always distinguished. Mr. Stanley's powers were most strikingly exhibited in the heroic war-song, "Arise, and let us go by night," and the deeply pathetic air "The joy of my heart is ceased." Mr. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Wallworth did ample justice to the parts entrusted to them, and Mad. Sain-ton Dolby fully sustained the high reputation she has long enjoyed, by her inimitable execution of the principal contralto music. The band and chorists were highly satisfactory throughout, under the guidance of Herr Molique, who conducted his own work with the skill and tact of a consummate master. In short, Abraham was thoroughly successful, and will, we hope, be shortly repeated in London, either by the Sacred Harmonic or some other great musical society capable of doing it justice. The hall was crowded in every part, and judging from the high prices paid for admission, the pecuniary result must have proved very beneficial to the excellent institution in behalf of which the concert was given.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Once more with thee. Song. F. Woolcot. 25

A melodious song, well justifying the reputation of the author of "Bell Brandon."

Rose of Hazeldean. Song. J. W. Cherry. 25

Cherry has given to the singing dilettanti a host of light graceful ballads, which, if not destined to live down to the next generation, are among the best productions of the day, and will always be heard with pleasure. This ballad is of just this class.

When a lover kneels. (Vien nn giovin.)
"Der Freischütz." 35

A new and carefully corrected copy of this playful air of Annabel, with the Italian words added.

I'm not such an ugly man. Comic Song.
J. Herbert. 25

Most of our comic singers could make a capital thing out of this song. Let them try it.

Where the warbling waters flow. Duet. Guitar accompaniment. Curtiss. 25

Salut a la France. Guitar accompaniment. " 25

O haste crimson morning. Duet. " " 25

Vocal gems, long familiar to the musical public, now for the first time made accessible to the Guitarist.

Woodland Belle. E. Chapin. 25

An easy little song, written in a popular vein.

Instrumental Music.

The Music of the Union. Medley on National Airs. C. Grobe. 50

Comprising the melodies of The Star Spangled Banner, Hail Columbia, The Red, White and Blue, Washington's March and Yankee Doodle, arranged effectively, yet not too difficult. As these airs have never before been put together into such compact and practical shape, the demand will be very large.

Bclmont Polka. E. D. Ingraham. 25

Pleasing, and rather easy.

Woonsocket Quickstep. Handel Pond. 25

A very pleasing composition, by the author of various popular marches.

Books.

JOHNSON'S HARMONY. Practical Instructions in Harmony, upon the Pestalozzian, or Inductive System; teaching Musical Composition and the Art of Extemporizing Interludes and Voluntaries. By A. N. Johnson. 1,00

This work is designed for the class of persons designated in the language of music teachers as "new beginners." It imparts a knowledge of Harmony, by exercises which the student is to write; or, to speak by a progressive series of problems which the student must solve. The utmost simplicity of language has been used in the explanations, and an attempt made to guard against misapprehension, even on the part of an undisciplined mind.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 476.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 7.

Cheve's System of Musical Instruction.

NEW YORK, APRIL, 1861.

This system is due to the conjoined labors of Galin, Paris, and Chev e of France, who elaborated the crude ideas suggested by Jean Jacques Rousseau upon the subject of musical notation, and have brought the system to its present state of perfection: in the country where it originated it is known as the "GALIN-PARIS-CHEV E" system. By its means, music is easily, thoroughly, and rapidly acquired, both theoretically and practically, and the voice and ear developed, even when these organs seem almost entirely wanting; large masses of people are taught in a very brief period of time to sing the most difficult music at sight, to sing well, to write from ear, and to comprehend the science perfectly. It also facilitates instrumentation, as the development of ear and voice, together with a knowledge of the principles of the art and of Thorough Bass, is the only rational preparation to thorough execution on any instrument. A superior execution is speedily attained, because the mind and ear being educated by the vocal and theoretical course, the hand will readily obey them; one who has perfectly mastered every possible effect of intonation and time, as well as the science, will have but little trouble in obtaining almost any desired effect upon the instrument.

There is no other system which can accomplish such results; other prevailing methods can no more compete with this, than can the old-fashioned stage with the railway. On this point, fourteen professors of music in the Government Schools of the city of Paris, in a letter to Monsieur Chev e, said; "We would not venture to bring in competition with your pupils of six months, the best part of those of ours who have had two years of severe schooling in the old system. The means by which pupils can be enabled to attack every difficulty of intonation and time in your method are infinitely superior to anything that has existed to this day."

It is admirably adapted for teaching in classes, giving rapid and positive results; it is also eminently adapted for the training of Choral and other Musical societies. A large society, called the "Galini-Paris-Chev e-Society" has been founded in Paris, which stands in high repute. It was called out on the occasion of the visit of the Queen of England to Napoleon, and is the only Choral Society ever called on by the Emperor on grand occasions. It underwent a severe test, and most thoroughly vindicated the merits of Chev e's system on the occasion of a trial of skill between the new system and any others which might venture to compete with it, proposed by a jury of twenty-four of the most eminent composers and professors resident at Paris, comprising, among others, Meyerbeer, Felicien David, Emile Prudent, Vieuxtemps, Ferdinand Hiller, A. Elwart, Lefebure W ely, and others, with Hector Berlioz as President. The programme, sent to all the societies of France, was found so difficult that none other dared attempt it, and on the day appointed no other society appeared to undertake the task.

The following account, translated from "Le Souvenir" of June 28, 1858, is worthy an attentive perusal:

"We witnessed, on the 12th inst., a "trial of skill" which took place at St. Cecilia's Hall under the presidency of Monsieur Henri R eber, assisted by the elite of our artists and composers. A gold medal, tendered by Monsieur Chev e, was the prize to be offered to the Choral Society who might fulfil the conditions imposed by the programme. These conditions, we must confess, were so difficult to fulfil with equal success, that we were not surprised when, at the last meeting of the Jury, of which we had the honor to be a member, the Secretary, Monsieur Tajan Rog e, made known to us that, notwithstanding the programme had been sent to all the singing societies of France, not one had responded to the appeal.

"On the day of the trial, 200 of Monsieur Chev e's pupils, stood alone on the field in the presence of 1500 spectators, comprising the elite of musical amateurs. In this emergency it was unanimously voted by the jury that the Galin-Paris-Chev e Society, there present, should go through the programme proposed by themselves, to which they immediately proceeded.

"First, a Kyrie of Lesueur was admirably sung; after which, a chorus, drawn by lots, by the jury, among twelve, composed expressly for the occasion, and which had been delivered to the Society twenty-four hours only before the time of the performance. This chorus was so beautifully rendered that it was vehemently encored. Then came a fugue in four parts, drawn also by lots among others, composed expressly for the occasion to be read at sight. This was a solemn moment, and the two hundred performers, who read off this piece with an ensemble truly extraordinary, produced such a sensation on the audience that the hall rang again with the applause and the encores, in which the jury joined lustily. Next, the charming chorus and the "Prayer" in "Count Ory," of Rossini, were most brilliantly executed. Then came the musical dictation, one of the most striking features of the system, and one of the greatest benefits it confers on its disciples. How many artists would wish to be enabled to write under their own dictation a melody of such difficulty as this one of Professor Schlo esser's, composed by him expressly for the occasion! Professor Schlo esser's Solfeggio, dictated by Monsieur Chev e, was written down, then translated into all the different clefs and keys by the performers, and then sung by them. After this truly remarkable feat, the concert terminated with the chorus of "the Reapers" and "the Storm," from Elwart's Symphony of "Ruth and Boaz." These two pieces, which contain eight real parts, and offer extraordinary difficulties, were followed by tremendous applause from the whole room and jury together.

"The decision of the jury relative to the prize to be awarded, was unanimous with that of the audience. It was not Monsieur Chev e's fault if no competitors had come to dispute the medal with him. His pupils had fulfilled all the conditions of the programme with honesty, cleverness, and skill. The jury, twenty-four in number, awarded the medal.

"All the pieces were sung without any instrument."

The system has withstood the severest test of criticism and experiment in France and throughout Europe, for the last fifteen years, and has won there an unbounded popularity, vanquishing both routine and prejudice; it has at last superseded the old system in the Conservatoire of Paris.

An interesting and highly successful experiment was made at Lyons, France in 1842-43, by Mons. Chev e upon some soldiers of the Military Gymnasium of that city, a brief account of which we condense from the official report. "Lieut. General Baron de Lascours commanding the 7th division, confided 150 soldiers to the professor, by whom they were accepted without regard to their respective ages, capacity, or talent for music, and, on the 1st. October, 1842, the first lesson took place. The men, with few exceptions, began the course very reluctantly, and, only to obey orders. At the end of the first month, the Professor, wishing to classify the voices, made each man sing separately. The result would have been discouraging to most teachers. More than three-quarters of the men were not able to sing the scale. Twelve declared most positively that they would not open their mouths. These were immediately dismissed. The rest, that is 138 men, were kept, notwithstanding the complete absence of musical talent of the greater part, many not being able to distinguish one tone from another. Many confessed that they had not sung a note since the course had begun, but promised that in future they would take part in all the exercises.

"The number of lessons were five a week. No practice was required between the lessons. It must be observed that during the months of October, April and May, there were several weeks' interruption on account of service.

"In December, Lieutenant-General de Lascours, accompanied by many of his friends, came to a lesson. The visitors were much struck with the progress made by the pupils. They had acquired wonderful proficiency in intonation and time, read easily all the different clefs and keys, and sang part music at sight, without any instrument to guide them—one of the peculiarities of the system being that no instrument is ever used in teaching.

"On the 25th of April, 1843, seven months after the opening of the course, the General and other officers with Madame Lascours and many ladies, and in fact all the notabilities of the city received an invitation from the class. The programme was as follows: 1. A Quartette by Webbe. 2. A Languedocian air for three voices, by Des Rues. 3. A trio from the opera of "Edipe   Colonne," by Sacchini. 4. Reading at sight every kind of interval, major or minor. 5. Reading at sight upon all the clefs. 6. Two canons for three voices, by Silher. 7. A quartette from the "Clemenza di Tito," by Mozart. 8. The quartette in "Iphigenia in Aulis," by Gluck. 9. A trio from the "Magic Rose," by Berton. 10. Finding the tonic on all the clefs and keys. 11. Writing from ear. 12. Reading (at first sight) a trio from the "Magic Flute," by Mozart. 13. An "Ave Maria" for three voices, by Choron. 14. "The Gondolier," a canon in three parts, by Des Rues. 15. A Quartette from the "Magic Flute," by Mozart. 16. A chorus from the opera "Tancredi," by Rossini. 17. The prayer in the opera of "Joseph," by Méhul.

"It would be difficult to express the astonishment of the audience. The surprising accuracy with which the men, one and all, sang at sight the most difficult intonations in the major and minor modes, the facility with which they read all the clefs and keys, the readiness and exactness with which they all, without any exception, wrote down tones vocalized to them, struck all present in the most forcible manner, and fully convinced them that the means employed by Mons. Chev  are infallible in their results, and that, as soon as they are used on a large scale for the benefit of the whole population, the foolish prejudice that some people cannot sing will be done away with forever."

Twenty-five thousand of the operatives in Paris have studied under this system, and its patrons include the Emperor and Aristocracy, the Polytechnic, the Normal and the Preparatory schools. We translate the following notice bearing upon this point, from "La Presse" of Dec. 30, 1860: "To-day at one o'clock, the Galim-Paris-Chev  Society will give their second musical entertainment in the hall of the Cirque-Napol on. More than four thousand invitations have been given out by the committee, which is composed as follows: Count de Morny, President; Rossini and the Prince Poniatowski, Vice-Presidents; Felicien David, Lef bure-W ly, the celebrated composer and organist at La Madeleine, and a number of other equally distinguished musicians; with Ernest L pine as Secretary. Many personages of the highest rank will by their presence enhance the  clat of this artistic f te." The names of this committee are a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the system and of the esteem in which this Society is held in Paris. Nor is the knowledge of it confined entirely to France, but it is taught in the principal cities of England, Belgium, and many parts of Germany. It was lately introduced into Russia, under the auspices of the Emperor Alexander.

In America it is comparatively little known as yet, and we have but one representative of the system among us, but many advanced and intelligent minds have scrupulously examined into its merits and given in their adhesion; among these might be mentioned Mr. Henry C. Watson, Editor of "Frank Leslie," who thus speaks of it:

"NEW YORK, December 1, 1860.

"I have examined the famous system taught by Mons. Chev  in Paris, and consider it eminently practical. It has reduced the theory of music to a comprehensive system, which can be readily understood by pupils of ordinary intelligence. The many obscurities and incongruities of the old system, both in construction and nomenclature, are dispensed with and scientific arrangement has been made a means of simplifying a study which should be universal, but of which the groping of pedants hitherto, by surrounding it with unnecessary difficulties, circumscribed the knowledge to a very narrow circle.

"Every good citizen must wish this system to succeed, for by it thousands can be taught to enjoy the rational amusement of singing in concert at sight, and well; receiving at the same time a clear knowledge of what they are doing and how they do it—advantages which no other system of class teaching affords. The more the practice of music prevails among the people, the more domestic, orderly, and happy the people will become.

"The certificates of the remarkable results of the teaching by this system, as tested in Paris, are signed by many of the most eminent composers and professors of music now living. A system which has met with the unqualified approval of such men as Wagner, Hector Berlioz, Meyerbeer, Vieuxtemps, F. David, F. Hiller, Prudent, Elwart, &c., must have in it the elements of sterling and singular excellence, which should recommend its adoption by the community at large—a consummation which, for the sake of the art and of social improvement, I most earnestly and sincerely desire."

Mr. Henri L. Stuart, of New York, speaking of the effects which would follow its introduction into the schools and among the people of this country, says: "The young would become intelligent critics upon the pretensions of their teachers; the mature would be improved and enlightened; professional empiricism would give place to rational and scientific instruction; and charlatans in music, under this system, would be as readily exposed as in any other branch of knowledge common among the people, such as reading or spelling."

Its results, if once fairly introduced here, would be so much greater than in the countries above-mentioned—owing to the superior intelligence of our people, their progressive tendencies and the wonderful eagerness with which they seize upon every improvement in educational methods—that we sincerely hope the day is not far distant when our countrymen will turn their attention in this direction, and think less of the "Almighty Dollar," and more of those things which are less perishable.

AMATEUR.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music

Sketches of French Musical History.

XVI.

THE OPERA COMIQUE OF THE PRESENT DAY.

We shall close the series of contemporary composers who have obtained letters of naturalization upon our second lyrique stage by favor of the public with notices of Clapisson, Thomas, Grisar and Mass . Should this series of papers attain to the honor of another edition, we engage to give in it additional notices of new and successful candidates for the good will of the public.

The family of M. Louis Clapisson was originally from Lyons, and not from Bordeaux as is generally supposed. His grandfather was a musical instrument maker at that city, and his father after making the Egyptian campaign, married a Swiss woman and settled at Naples under King Joachim Murat. He had been a pupil of the celebrated hornist, Puntolo, and was appointed first hornist at the theatre of San Carlo; in 1775 he took the same position in the theatre at Bordeaux. The son of a virtuosos and skilful composer, the boy Louis, who was born at Naples Sept. 16, 1809, developed very rapidly his fine and happy musical organization. Continually at the theatre, he soon became familiar with the masterpieces of our repertory and had already attained a high degree of skill upon the violin and pianoforte, when his vocation drew him to Paris, whither he came in 1829, in spite of his father, and with but fifty francs in his pocket to defray all his expenses during a winter of extreme rigor. Strolling along the Boulevard des Italiens the young Provincial became hungry and entered mechanically the restaurant of the Bains Chinois. There a sumptuous breakfast was set before him; green peas (in winter), fine wines, the best of everything—nothing was wanting. But the bill; away went more than half the small capital of the poor musician, who had not dreamed of such a termination to his breakfast. Some days later, after he had payed his last half franc in a caf , the future member of the Institute knew no longer what course to take, when by chance—or rather providentially he cast his eye upon the small street advertising placards. One of them noted a place for a violinist in the orchestra of the theatre Comte; he applied for it and was lucky enough to be accepted; he then confided his sad position to the skillful and kindly director, who hastened to give him an advance payment of his small salary to relieve his immediate necessities. He afterwards studied in the elder Habeneck's class at the conservatory, joined successively the orchestras of the Vari t s Gymnase, and the Italian opera, and finally entered that of the Grand Opera, as a second violin, like the distinguished Berton. He studied composition with Reicha and wrote a string quartette which was executed by the brothers Tilmant, was praised by Onslow and published by Frey. Some time afterwards Clapisson composed his vocal quartets and choruses to Vieux Paris, which were successfully executed at the conservatory. In 1837, Madame Lemoine published the first "Album de Louis Clapisson" in which was the famous Postillon de mam' Albou. A great number of Melodies, chansonnettes, romances, &c., made the name of the young author popular, whose productions are always characterized by the elegance of the vocal part and tunes of harmony as correct as they are original.

Aug. 24, 1838 the young master produced his first work at the Opera Comique, La Figurante ou l'Amour et la Danse, revealed to the public the graceful talents of the composer. With this work Clapisson paid his compliments to the city of Bordeaux, his adopted home; it was a just tribute of remembrance and gratitude. The next year, he composed for Mari  La Symphonie, text by Saint Georges. In this work a novel and permanent effect in his harmonies, produced by all the stringed instruments of the orchestra is worthy of remark. La Perruche, a piece by Dumanoir and Dupin, gave the actor Chollet and the composer Clapisson, opportunity for a new and well-earned success. After Le Pendu and Fr re et Mari, appeared the Code Noir, a work in 3 acts, greatly appreciated by artists. Les Bergers Trumeau preceded Gibby la Cornemuse, in which Roger, Bussine and Mlle. Delille were applauded to the echo. Jeanne la Folle and les Myst res d'Udolphe had not all the success desired. But La Promise, which at the Theatre Lyrique, preceded la Fanchonnette and Margot, established definitively the reputation of the author, who was now judged worthy of a chair at the Academy. The instrumentation of la Promise is every way remarkable. Clapisson has gained his own position by steady and laborious efforts; he will encourage none in the composer's career but those, who are really worthy.

Amboise Thomas, the son of an artist, was born at Metz in Lorraine Aug. 5, 1811, and began at a very early age the study of the violin and pianoforte, delighting parents and friends by playing to them little airs of his own composition. In 1828 he came to Paris to pursue his studies in the conservatory. Endowed with an extraordinary musical memory, thoroughly acquainted with the old works in the repertory of the theatre, the young Thomas made rapid progress, studying the pianoforte under Kalkbrenner and Zimmermann and composition under Dourlen, Barbereau and Lesneur. He gained the first prize for the pianoforte in 1829, the Roman prize in 1832. During the tour which the latter prize enabled him to make he learned to appreciate the Italian school thoroughly in its melodic and vocal excellence. While fully recognizing its vicious abuses mere formulas and its frequent commonplaces, it cannot be denied that the true traditions of the art of singing come from Italy; that it is the land where one meets most frequently beautifully full and sonorous voices thanks to the influence of that warm and generous climate. At Vienna Thomas found a lively class of German composers, who willingly admitted the Italian style into their works to a certain extent, leaving to their compatriots in the North the cold expression of an obscure germanism.

After three years of travel, Thomas returned to Paris, the place above all others, of the purest dramatic taste (?). In 1837 he brought out la Double Echelle, his first work for the Opera Comique, and one generally appreciated. At that time he published a quartette, a quintette, trios and other chamber music, with or without the pianoforte; these various works prove both his talent as a pianist and the thoroughness of his studies in composition. Abandoning instrumental music for the theatre, he gave in order le Perruquier de la Regence, in 3 acts by Chailot, Le Panier Fleuri, a piece reproduced at the Theatre Lyrique, and Mina, in which Mlle. Darcier and Roger contested for victory as actors and singers.

Thomas's modesty and indisposition to intrigue withdrew him now for a time from the stage. But in 1849 his position was fixed at the Opera Comique by the success of the Caid, a delicious farcical piece in two acts, and of the Songe, a fine score in which color and style are perfectly sustained. Raymond, a melodrama, still continually upon the stage in Germany, and La Tonelli, in which Madame Ugalde was captivating for her fire and effective performance, were followed by La Cour de Celimene, a comedy rather cold, written by Madame Miolan. Psyche, a work exceedingly touching and finely played by Mlle. Lefebvre preceded the Carnaval de Venise destined for Mad. Cabel. The eminent merits of Thomas's works led to his appointment as assistant to Halevy in the Conservatory, and finally to fill the place of Adam, as professor. He has already succeeded Batton, as general inspector of the branch school of the Conservatory.

Many ballets, among which the Gipsy had a real triumph, a solemn Mass de Saint Cecile, &c., prove the flexibility of the talents of M. Thomas. Having been elected in 1851, successor to Spontini in the Institute he now owes us a pendant to la Vestale; the amplitude of his style, the richness of his orchestration, his great knowledge of vocal resources, whether solo or in chorus, are important qualities, which he possesses in a high degree, and lead us to foretell his advent upon the broad stage of the Grand Opera. Should he find a subject suited to his noble powers, the list of grand French works will be enriched by another masterpiece. As this goes to press we are happy to confirm the success of the Roman d'Elvire a new comic opera by him.

Albert Grisar, born at Antwerp, Dec. 26, 1808, was destined to a commercial career in his infancy and sent to Liverpool to fit himself for that profession. But his tastes did not coincide with the designs of his parents. Music had been taught him as a part of his education—he desired to make it the business of his life. He therefore stealthily left Liverpool in July, 1830, for Paris and sought the counsels of Reicha. From that time bookkeeping gave place to harmony. Meantime revolution broke out in France and Belgium, and Gisar during the siege of Antwerp still continued his studies.

A simple romance, la Folle, laid the basis of his reputation; its melody, was so expressive and original in form as to become the fashion. Le Mariage impossible, a comic opera played at Brussels in the spring of 1833, gained the young composer a gift of 1,200 francs to aid him in completing his musical education. He returned to Paris and published a great number of delicious romances. In 1836 he made his first appearance as composer upon the stage of the Opera Comique, with a work in two acts entitled Sarah, in which is a considerable degree of dramatic force. L'An Mil, in one act brought out in June, 1837, had perhaps the fault of being too grand a subject for so small a framework. Then came Lady Melvil and the Travestissements, pieces at first played at the theatre de la Renaissance, after which Grisar was long silent. He then went to Naples to gain inspiration in the native land of buffo music. Upon his return he brought with him l'Eau merveilleuse, a rich subject already treated by Auber and in le Philtre and l'Elisir d'Amore;* he then wrote Gilles ravisseur, a masterpiece which may well be placed beside the Tableau parlant and the Rendezvous bourgeois. His farcical, Bonsoir Monsieur Pantalon, has continued to draw out peals of laughter, now rare in the theatre; true, the text was marvellously to the composer's purpose. Les Porecherons, a work in 3 acts, was greatly applauded. Nothing is fresher than the chorus of gardeners, which opens the first act; nothing more vigorous than the bacchanal scene at the rising of the curtain for the third. Le Carillonneur de Bruges and les Amours du Diable were less fortunate; yet in the first of these, the beautiful chorus upon the national flag and in the second, a trio of the grandest dramatic effect must be mentioned. Le chien du Jardinier, a piece in the vein of the l'Eprouve villageoise of Grétry, marks the return of Grisar to his natural style.

We will close this rapid notice of our living composers with Victor Massé, the only one of the younger generation, who has as yet gained a position in the theatre. Born at Lorient, in Brittany, he began his musical studies as a fellow pupil of Rachel at Choron's school. After the suppression of that useful establishment, from which so many fine musicians have preceded, Massé entered at the Conservatory, the pianoforte class of Zimmermann. He studied harmony with Dourlen and the higher branches of composition with Halévy, gaining the first prize of the Institute in 1844. He then journeyed to Italy and studied profoundly, whatever that classic land of art possessed of wealth in poetry, painting, sculpture and music. The beauty of the climate, the superior organization of its inhabitants, the wonders of nature and art impregnated the happy imagination of the young artist. He is possessed of great sensibility and understands profoundly all the resources of the orchestra; hence Victor Massé has an immense talent as a colorist. He is the Diaz* of music. Harmony, in his skillful hands becomes a pallet from which he draws his tints and shades. His orchestration managed understandingly and most skillfully for effect, adds to the magic of his warm and picturesque style. He is a conscientious artist, one who loves his work, and will not quit a phrase until he feels it impossible to improve it. He may deceive himself at times, for no one is infallible; but at least he never allows a work to leave his hands until he has exhausted all the resources of his brilliant powers. When he has succeeded in rendering an idea, he seeks to accompany it in a manner conforming to the scene to which it belongs, and exercises his wits to find all the forms in which it may be clad, so as finally to gain a full assurance, that it could not be better expressed. In this manner alone can assiduous labor cause a new idea to produce its best fruits.

Victor Massé's first work for the Opera Comique, was la Chantreuse volée in one act, text from the facile pen of Scribe, and was brought out in November, 1850. It was a Spanish subject and so plastic as to be peculiarly fitted for his genius. Mlle. Lefebvre, who was then in all the splendor of her fresh youthful talent, lent the fortunate composer, the best efforts of her marvellous vocalization and her graceful natural acting. Audran was all that could be wished in the character of the painter Velasquez, and Bussine made a fine contrast with his powerful and sonorous voice. Massé's instrumentation, which was perhaps rather redundant, cleared itself in Galatée, a piece in two acts written by Michel Carré and Jules Barbier. The poem is from the Greek adapted to our epoch. Pygmalion gives life to his statue but dissatisfied with the faults of the woman, prays Venus to change her again to a statue. This termination, though not conforming to the fable, has furnished the musician with scenes, new and varied, upon which to employ his pencil. The choruses belied the scenes are of an exquisite character; the invocation to Venus sung by Mlle. Wertheimer, produces a powerful effect; the air of Paresse, so well given by Mocker, the drinking song, a little overdone, perhaps by Madame Ugalde; the part performed by Sainte-Foy, and as well, all combined to render the whole a complete masterpiece.

* Diaz one of the most famous living Parisian painters in respect to color.

The success of the Noces de Jeannette, revealed to the public Masse's talents in rural subjects. The romance of the needle, deliciously sung by Mlle. Miolan, offered a happy contrast to the part of Coudere, the actor, who is the very type of the rustic; the song of Margot given with full lungs, exhaled the true country odor. La Fiancée du Diable, a work in three acts, had little success; Miss Fauvette hardly more. Les Saisons, from its descriptive character, was better fitted for a ballet or an oratorio than for the stage. La Reine Topaz obtained a success at the Theatre Lyrique. Venetian color abundantly applied upon a picture of large dimensions, the prodigious vocal agility of Mad. Cavalho in his songs of l'Abeille and the Carneval de Venise, the beauty of the costumes and decorations, the perfect adaptation of Meillet, Froment and Balanque to their parts, all these were elements of powerful attraction to the public.

Les chaises à porteurs is a pretty picture in the style of Boucher. Victor Massé is sometimes a little too much of the realist—never to forget the ideal is the true source of perfection to the artists.

Joseph Staudigl.

Born April 14th, 1807. Died March 28th, 1861.

Wöllersdorf, in Lower Austria, was Staudigl's birthplace. His father, one of the imperial rangers, wished to bring him up as a gamekeeper, and, in after life, the celebrated singer certainly distinguished himself as a sportsman. His real vocation, however, soon manifested itself under the guidance and fostering care of the village schoolmaster at Wöllersdorf. In 1816, the boy went to Wiener Neustadt, where he was placed under the chorus-master, Herzog, and when his treble had changed into a powerful bass, received, as a novice, into the Benedictine "Stift" of Molk, the prelate at the head of which was an ardent lover of music. Staudigl next proceeded to Vienna, and, after enduring considerable hardships, obtained an engagement as chorister in the Kärnthnerthor Theatre. It was here that the manager, Herr Düport, became acquainted with him, and, on the occasion of one of the principal singers being suddenly taken ill, gave him the part of Pietro in Masaniello. Staudigl was successful, and his artistic career, properly so speaking, now commenced. Not all at once, but gradually, and by most incessant industry and indefatigable practice, he imparted to his voice that evenness, richness, flexibility and power of endurance, which everywhere excited admiration. He devoted, likewise, although not until in after years, the greatest attention to dramatic expression. He could never, it is true, manage to get rid entirely of the Austrian dialect, or divest himself of a certain negligence inherent to his personal appearance; but his performance during his best period—that is to say, from about his thirtieth to the end of his fortieth year—were efforts of the highest rank, being mostly insurpassable, in a purely musical sense, and distinguished, as a whole, for their agreeable evenness and imposing certainty.

It was not, however, till after his visit to London that his talent was generally appreciated to the full extent it deserved. The admiration entertained for him by his countrymen received an evident impulse from the applause and money he gained from the unmusical, but in many respects artistically inclined, and artist honoring capital of England. He remained at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, under Ballochino, till 1845; he was then secured for the new operatic enterprise in the Theatre an der Wien (under Franz Pokorny), where he undertook the duties of a sort of upper stage-manager, and sang with Jenny Lind, in the remarkable performances, never to be forgotten by the lovers of music, given by that lady.

The unsuccessful result of Pokorny's enterprise, and the straits of his former comrades at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, during the crisis of 1848, caused Staudigl to return to the scene of his earliest triumphs. He was appointed stage-manager-in-chief under Holbein. He was engaged with Cornet a year (1853—1854), and then dismissed, because his voice and, still more, his memory were seriously impaired, but he was dismissed in a manner which, although not unexampled in the Austrian imperial theatres, could not fail to wound the feelings of an artist who had been so generally admired, and whose merit had been proved, for a long series of years, by such admirable performances. If, in addition to this, we take into consideration the bitter effect produced by criticism, even though perfectly justified, when it tells a singer—as it is bound to tell him—when his best period has been passed, and the moment for honourable retirement has arrived; if, moreover, we take into consideration pecuniary losses (simultaneously with the loss of his engagement), a shattered constitution, and other causes of distress, occurring at the same time, we shall have no great reason for immoderate astonishment at the fact of Staudigl's mind becoming deranged in the summer of 1856.

Staudigl's last new part was that of Falstaff, in Thomas's Song d'une Nuit d'Été, in the season 1853—1854, while his last appearance took place on the 18th February, 1854, as Ruben in Auber's Fils Prodigue. His last new oratorio part was that of Zacharias, in J. Hager's oratorio Johannes der Täufer, on the first of March, 1855, and his last public appearance that on Palm Sunday, 1856, at the Burg-Theatre, as St. Paul, in Mendelssohn's oratorio of the same name.

Staudigl's voice was one of those which we may call beautiful (schön), without running any risk of being accused of abuse of that much-abused term. It flowed forth, with exactly the amount of force that might be desired, in every portion of its natural compass; hence its incomparable correctness, guided by the finest musical ear; hence the irreproachable gradation of tone; and hence the power, so often admired, of preserving clearness of enunciation under all circumstances, and, at the same time, despite the difference of the words, of invariably commanding a degree of agreeable roundness and fulness, frequently quite extraordinary, and always satisfactory; and hence everything constituting the first foundation of perfection in the art of singing. This correct intonation—which, also, is a greatly abused and misunderstood term, for let the reader reflect, for a single moment, how few singers can at once pitch their voice properly, without the help of an aspiration, and a hundred other objectionable means—this correct intonation, we repeat, enabled Staudigl to pass, on the one hand, without any sudden break, from great vigour to gentleness of tone, and, on the other, to develop to a certain degree, the flexibility of his voice—a flexibility usually known, in the widest acceptance of the term, as bravura. Rossini's runs and roulades were, perhaps, somewhat out of Staudigl's line, but the bravura of the German, as well as of the French style—of Handel, on the one hand, and of Boieldieu on the other—not forgetting the magnificent shake, which is so prominent a feature in both these schools, found in Staudigl a perfect master. We may, therefore, safely affirm that flexibility of voice cultivated to such a pitch, without any sacrifice of quality, a flexibility in which most basso singers are totally deficient, was quite sufficient for the comprehensive round of parts it fell to Staudigl's lot to undertake.

To excellence of intonation, light and shade, strength, softness, and flexibility, were added a most happy, natural, and unconstrained connection of the registers, and a power acquired by incessant and systematic application, of drawing breath only at long intervals (langer Athem)—all tending to increase the natural value of so rare a voice. The pleasing impression produced by its peculiarly agreeable and harmonic sound, flowing, we might almost say, from the singer's very soul, cannot be recalled by words, or satisfactorily described; and, when we speak of its melting and metallic character, of its softness and richness, of its evenness and certainty, we are giving only an approximate idea of something which a person must himself have heard to appreciate properly.

If we reflect on the manner in which an artistic education is commenced, we are instantly struck by the absurd and defective plan usually pursued. Yet this fact is taken too little into consideration. People reproach artists with having learnt little or nothing, forgetting that nothing has been done even now, to afford them an opportunity for learning anything. For instance, can the incipient actor find a school for dramatic, rhetorical and mimetic instruction, by means of which he may hope to mature and develop his natural gifts? But the incipient singer is still worse off. Though the actor does not find a school, he finds particular models which he can follow, and certain theatres in full activity, where, under a simultaneous course of diligent self-study, and the healthy influence of others he may work himself in, and rise to high artistic excellence. The instrumentalist, again, finds in his conservatories, however one-sided and limited their field of action may be, in addition to the requisite elementary instruction, a starting-point for further artistic development. In this case, also, we have to do only with exclusively musical qualities and acquirements. How different, and how much more difficult, is the position of the operatic singer! How much is expected from him! He must have enjoyed a musical education, just like the instrumentalist; but he must develop, to the highest possible pitch, the tone, strength, evenness, and flexibility of his voice, and, by continuous and careful application, keep up all these qualities at their proper height, a task infinitely more difficult to accomplish with the human voice than with an instrument;* he must acquire a natural, healthful, and noble style; he must obey the rules of musical intonation as strictly as the instrumentalist, at the same time preserving clearness of enunciation, and giving the words correctly, both in a declamatory and colloquial sense; in addition to his musical qualification, he must, the moment he goes on the stage, make himself master of those external aids—such as walking, standing, and regulating his features and demeanor—which alone are found quite sufficient to tax the powers of the actor; he must, finally, combine with musical conception and working out of his part, the dramatic treatment, which is all that the actor has to consider, and create out of all this a complete artistic whole. He must become a good actor, without ceasing to be a good musician. It is enough for us to enumerate such demands as these, to see at once the difficulty of satisfying them, if only approximately.

A knowledge of the great difficulties which the singer has to overcome, should teach us not to be immoderate in our demands upon him, and, keeping within the bounds of possibility, though invariably advocating ideal excellence, which the critic cannot entirely avoiding doing, not to lose sight of the peculiarities distinguishing each separate branch of art. The singer ought to have in him something of the actor, a something which he should endeavor to develop; but he must not become an actor, if he would not entirely ruin the singer. Staudigl was more especially an accomplished singer, and, although the histrionic part of his performances was open to many objections, the general impression of those performances was an especially satisfactory one, and not only the musical, but also the musically-dramatic effect, was indisputably artistic. The peculiar nature of this state of things, by no means infrequent with operatic artists, is to be best explained by a specification of the various good qualities and defects which are mixed up in such individuals.

* An instrument is ready to our hand, while well-defined and universally valid rules teach us how to use it. Now, although in cultivating the voice, we pre-suppose certain general rules, much of the practical treatment depends on the disposition of each individual, and the state he happens to be in. The voice itself is subjected to the varying influence of the body and mind; it is not a lifeless thing on which we must foster, tend, watch, etc.

Louis Niedermeyer.

The tomb has again opened for one of our contemporary celebrities. Louis Niedermeyer departed this life at Paris, on the 14th inst. in his fifty-ninth year. Born on the 27th April, 1802, at Nyon, in the Canton of Vaud, Switzerland, situate on the shores of the Lake of Geneva, Niedermeyer was descended, through his mother, from a Protestant family, which had been compelled to leave France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. His father, a native of Wurzburg, had settled and married in Switzerland. Being himself endowed with great musical talent, he was the first master his son ever had. Louis Niedermeyer, when fifteen years old, was sent by his parents to Vienna, where, for the space of two years, he received lessons on the piano from Moscheles, and in composition from Forster. After having published, in the above city, some of his first essays, consisting of pieces for the piano, he proceeded to Rome, where he continued the study of counterpoint, under the tuition of Fioravanti, master of the Pontifical Chapel. He next went to Naples, where Zingarelli undertook to complete his musical education. It was during his stay in Naples that the young artist composed his first opera, entitled Il Reo per Amore, and produced at the Teatro del Fondo. He was then eighteen years of age. In 1821 he had returned to Switzerland. To this epoch belongs one of the most charming inspirations of his youth, an inspiration subsequently destined to be crowned with complete success. We allude to the music of Le Lac, which he composed to M. de Lamartine's words, and in which the musician proved himself as much a dreamer and a colorist as the poet. In the following year he proceeded to Paris, where he first attracted attention by several sterling compositions for the piano, and afterwards, thanks to the friendship and patronage of Rossini, who had been acquainted with him in Naples, was enabled to get a two-act opera accepted at the Théâtre Italien. It was entitled Casa nel Bosco, the book being translated from the comic opera, Une Nuit dans la Forêt. This work was performed in the month of July 1828, but despite a certain melodic charm about it, with only trifling success.

Gentle, timid, and modest, Niedermeyer was little calculated for the incessant struggles to be expected by every dramatic composer at the outset of his career. He soon gave way to a feeling of disgust, and, notwithstanding the reputation he had already achieved by the publication of various pieces of vocal and instrumental music, left Paris in 1833, for Brussels, where he took a lively interest in the institution founded by M. Gaggia. Here he discharged, for eighteen months, the duties of professor of the piano. A situation of this kind did not afford many opportunities for a composer to distinguish himself; Niedermeyer resolved, consequently, to return to Paris, and once more to try his fortune at the theatre. At length the doors of the Académie Royale de Musique were flung open to him, and, on the 3rd March, 1837, he brought out at that establishment Stradella, an opera in five acts, words by M. M. Emile Deschamps and Emilian Pacini. This grand score, on which the composer had founded justifiable hopes, was at first coldly received. Subsequently—in 1843—Stradella was revived, reduced to three acts, and in its new form ran for a considerable number of nights. Several pieces from it obtained, and still continue to obtain, great success at concerts. In the month of December 1844, Niedermeyer, in conjunction with M. Théodore Anne, produced, at the same theatre, Marie Stuart, an opera in five acts, containing, among other remarkable pieces, a most charming romance, which has become a popular favorite. In the following year, government did justice to the talent and character of the artist, by creating him a knight of the Legion of Honor. In 1846, he was summoned by Rossini to Bologna, for the purpose of working under his direction, at the adaptation of the Donna del Lago for the French stage. This adaptation was performed, in the month of December in the same year, at the Grand Opera, under the title of Robert Bruce. Lastly, in the month of May 1853, Niedermeyer brought out his five-act opera, La Fronde, words by M. M. Maquet and Jules Lacroix. About the same time he conceived the idea of establishing, on the model of the old institution founded by Choron under the restoration, but suppressed after the revolution of 1830, a School of Religious Music, intended to form, by the study of the chefs-d'œuvre of the great masters of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, singers, organists, maitres de-chapelle, and composers of sacred music. By the assistance of M. Fortoul, then Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, he obtained a subsidy from the State, and in the course of the year 1853, opened his school, M. Dietsch being appointed to assist him as "Directeur des Etudes." This establishment, situated in the Rue Neuve Fontaine-St.-Georges, Paris, and in which a literary education, as far as the subjects of the third form, is given to the pupils simultaneously with their musical instruction, was not long in prospering and sending out a number of distinguished proficient, who have been appointed to various cathedrals and churches in France.

Niedermeyer watched over the interests of his school with unvarying solicitude, and neglected nothing which could tend to improve the course of study there. Thus, by no means satisfied with the altogether arbitrary manner in which the plain-chant is generally accompanied, he devoted his most serious attention to this interesting part of religious art, and, in 1855, published, in conjunction with M. J. d'Ortigue, a Traité d'Accompagnement de Plain-Chant, founded upon new principles. It was, also, with a view to diffuse among all classes a taste for religious music, that, in 1856, he established a paper called the La Maîtrise, the editorship of which—now entrusted to M. d'Ortigue—he resigned in 1858. He was employed in terminating a grand work on the accompaniment, for the organ, of the plain-chant of the church service, when death suddenly surprised him. His funeral took place on the 17th instant, in the Cimetière du Nord. Two speeches were delivered, one by the Pastor Coquerel, and the other by M. Elwart, before his prematurely opened tomb, and in the midst of his pupils and numerous friends, who had hastened to pay him this last mark of respect.

Niedermeyer leaves a son, aged twenty, and two daughters, to whom he bequeaths no fortune, save an unblemished name. He obtained long since the recognition of his right to French nationality. We have already mentioned the works he produced on the stage. He wrote, also, a great many separate vocal pieces. Among the best known are: "Le Lac," "L'Isolément," "Le Soir," "L'Automne," "La Voix humaine," on poems of M. de Lamartine; "La Ronde du Sabbat," "Océano-Nox," "La Nuit," "Puisqu'ici bas toute Ame," to words by M. Victor Hugo; "La Noce de Léonore," "Une Scène dans les Apennins," and several other pieces, to words by M. Emile Deschamps. He also set to music Manzoni's ode: "Il cinque Maggio," Millevoys's "Poète Monrant," and Casimir Delavigne's "Ame du Purgatoire;" besides composing several masses, one for grand orchestra, and a large number of religious pieces for the voice and for the organ, etc., etc.—From the Revue et Gazette Musicale.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 18, 1861.

Editorial Correspondence.

NEW SERIES.

No. XIII.

MUSIC IN BERLIN—BACH.

With the musical wealth of a whole winter in Germany opening before me two expectations, two desires were uppermost. One was, to hear as much as possible of the operas of GLUCK; the other, as much as possible of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. For these are just those noblest legacies of musical genius, which an American cannot have at home, however intimate he may be with Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and all the rest. He must go to Germany for them, as he must go to Italy for Raphael and Titian, or to Vienna for St. Stephen's cathedral, to Venice for St. Mark's. The former wish was reasonably well gratified, although (in respect to quantity) not well enough.

Berlin was just the place for it; the only place where Gluck comes frequently, with all due honor and fair treatment, upon the stage. I was fortunate enough to hear there the Orpheus and Eurydice twice, and the Iphigenia in Aulis, and Iphigenia in Tauris each once; and with one of the true lyric queens of our day, (although her voice is sadly damaged), Fran Jachmann (Johanna Wagner), in the parts of Orpheus and of Clytemnestra. Enough here to say, that all my anticipations were made good; that all that I had been told of the classical dignity, the truth to nature, the unflagging dramatic interest, the absence of all forced, false or sickly expression, and the inspired, pervading beauty of each work as a whole, in Gluck's operas was fully realized. The only regret was, the impossibility of repeated hearings, so that one might really get to know the noble strangers. More of this hereafter.

With regard to BACH, too, my opportunities have been abundant; and it is simple truth to say, that nothing else in this Art tour has, nothing else could have, so met the deepest want, or so enriched my musical experience. Each new leaf that I have turned of him has deepened my conviction that he was as great in genius as in learning; that his ideas are as wonderful, as inexhaustible as his skill in handling them; that there is feeling, soul, religion in his music, and not mere contrapuntal mathematics; that his fugue work is more beautiful, and more appealing to the inmost soul of us, than curious,—more like happy inspirations, tipped with true imaginative fire, than like calculated combinations; and that Nature, after all, the rich imaginative, poetic nature of the man, played the largest part in it. But above all, his music testifies to the profound religious nature of the man; it was the daily, hourly offering of a sincere, a rich, all-absorbing, manly, cheerful, childlike piety; an offering in which all his faculties gathered themselves up for a complete, ideal act, to realize the beauty of holiness. His music is the type and the expression of those experiences, those instincts in us, which relate us to the Infinite and make us conscious of a spiritual world and destiny. Hence it is, that we feel something mystical (in the best sense, not opposed to clear) in his music and his life; and that his Fugues awaken somewhat the same wondering and infinite sensation, the same insatiable appetite, with which we gaze and are charmed upward and upward by the soaring, fluid lines and details of an old Gothic cathedral tower and spire; endless variety ascending, losing itself in the sublime whole, which but repeats, or rather realizes, the type of form of each particular. These two types of form, the Gothic cathedral in architecture, seem in its great specimens, and the Bach fugue in music, have a wonderful affinity with what is deepest in us; one listens with insatiable appetite, like love. Their suggestion is a story without end, and never tedious.

It is the idlest kind of talk, this, which treats the partiality for Bach, and for such polyphonic, such fugue music as he wrote, as mere pedantry. It is ignorance or impudence to say that such things are wholly done by rule, that they are the cold and uninspiring product of the mere mathematical, combining intellect. No art could live a century upon such capital. A posthumous enduring and increasing fame is a thing that has roots and grows. The interest which the best musicians and the most musical persons now take in Bach, after his works had lain a good part of a century almost forgotten or rather not yet known, (like Shakspeare), is proof enough that there must be something in him; that his fugues, church cantatas, arias, &c., are made of more immortal stuff than any skill or learning. Musical Germany finds no task more rewarding, more inspiring, than the exploration of those countless scores in manuscript which he has left; and it is doubtful whether any music at the present moment is exerting a greater influence,—not directly on the great mass of music-lovers, but not the less surely through those who have penetrated the nearest to the sanctuary in the temple of this divine Art. The great "monster concert" master, Jullien, was once complimented on a certain something like a fugue, which he had introduced into his opera "Pietro il Grande," (which brought a hundred horses upon the stage). "Oh," said the great man, "that is nothing; any musician can compose a fugue. It is wholly mechanical; it is only to take a little theme, and treat it according to the rules, and all the rest follows precisely as it must; there is no room for invention in it." He had nothing to answer to the question: "How then comes it, inasmuch as everybody wrote fugues in Bach's and Handel's time, that their's have lived, and nearly all the rest have passed away? Does it not appear that while some fugues are sticks, others are living branches from a tree with roots? and that there may be all the difference between one man's fugue and that of another (on the same subject too), that there is between a song by Shakespeare, such as "Hark, hark, the lark," and one by one Miss Matilda in the poet's corner of a newspaper?"

But I did not intend an apology for Bach, or a defense of fugues. And this is no time to go into the discussion of deep questions. I am simply reporting what I have seen and heard, with some hint of the impressions it has made on me. Whether the Bachists be right or wrong (and so far as any are exclusives they are wrong), it is certainly a fact that no composer, old or new, so occupies the attention of the most earnest musicians and amateurs in Germany just now, as Bach. No works are sought out, edited, studied, practised, professed, listened to, talked over and written about with more eager curiosity and enthusiasm than his. It is that people feel that they have opened here a well of living waters; that they have found here something old, long buried out of sight under the rubbish of the past which really is fresher, newer, more original and more refreshing, than any thing produced in our own time. And what a monument to the man's memory, what a witness to the power with which his music speaks to the best musical and spiritual instincts and perceptions of the present age, is that magnificent edition of his works, from the press of those princely Leipzig publishers, Breitkopf and Härtel, of which a volume is put forth yearly under the auspices of the Society for the publication of Bach's works! Ten noble volumes are already before us—the most beautiful specimens of music engraving and printing (these and a similar edition of Handel, since commenced), which exist in the world. And let us take a little pride in knowing that the series has some eight subscribers in our own Boston! None of us may live to witness the completion of the series; for the unpublished manuscripts which Bach has left are as innumerable, as the scores are in almost every case important and elaborate. The publication enriches nobody but the subscribers and the world. That is to say, there is no money made by it. It is published purely as a monumental work by the Bach Society; the price covers the expense of the publication and no more; so that the subscribers are really themselves the publishers, and the Society is their committee, which manages the thing for them. It really adds to the value and attraction of the books, that they are free from all taint of trade.

A traveller through old cities has many treasures shown to him. But nothing which I have seen, in palaces and churches, in galleries and libraries, has seemed to me so rare a treasure as one which I saw in the Royal Library in Berlin. The musical department of that library contains 50,000 works. (Our "Diarist" has told us that before and has written us many a letter from the midst of his labors in its recesses, copying out the "conversation books" of Beethoven, in which people pencilled their questions and remarks to the deaf giant during so many years). There, near a window, so as to be readily removed in case of fire, stands a huge chest of drawers and shelves, full almost to bursting with autograph scores of Bach. Besides those of the published works, the great Mass in B minor, the Passion music, both according to the text of Matthew and of John, the Christmas Oratorio, the Organ Preludes and Fugues, the "well-tempered Clavichord," &c., here are found upwards of 270 different church Cantatas,—elaborate compositions, consisting of Symphonies, Chorals, Fugues, Arias, Duets, &c., of which Bach wrote a fresh one for each Sunday of the year, for many years, while he was cantor of the Thomas Church in Leipzig. Many of these are among the grandest and most wonderful creations of religious music; and not a tithe of them are yet published or known. Many more are hidden here and there, no one knows where, or are destroyed. The librarian has even picked a loose shred of a rumor, that some of them have found their way, a long while ago, to America. Surely so rich a collection must in time draw to itself whatever scattered manuscripts of Bach exist.

While speaking of this library, let me name some other treasures which it possesses. I saw there Beethoven's complete manuscript of the Ninth, or Choral, Symphony! a strange mass of hieroglyphics, filled with erasures, alterations, and mere hints and sketches; yet very fascinating, (and as if they would fain tell their meaning picture-wise) the tangled, sprawling curves and dashes looked. I saw, too, books full of first sketches, mere jottings down of principal ideas, for works which he designed to write; among them, a design for each of the several movements of a tenth Symphony. What a contrast between the look and character of these autographs, and that of an autograph opera by Mozart! In the latter no erasures, no corrections; all as neat and clean as if it had been copied for a photograph edition. And such was Mozart's creative method as he himself tells us in the letter to the Count. Every thing came to him whole and complete; all its parts lay clearly in his mind at once, in due relation and proportion; he had only to copy out thence upon paper. It was the pure way of inspired genius, the Raphael way. Many works of Palestrina, and the old Italians, of Orlando Lasso, Handel, Haydn, all the lesser Bachs, of Cherubini, of nearly all the known, and many unknown, masters exist here in manuscript, or in the only known printed copy.

Of course Bach does not reign equally in all the German cities. His great works are chiefly to be heard in Leipzig and Berlin. In the former place the Bach movement, so to speak, of these times began; for there are centred the Bach traditions, and there Mendelssohn sounded the signal of the newly awakening interest in him. There his Passions-music and other great religious works are performed in the church, and from the choir, where Bach himself was cantor; and there it has been my good fortune to hear his Weinachts-Cantata (or Christmas Oratorio) and his Johannis Passion, produced by the indefatigable, single-minded, modest laborer in the pure cause of Art and Bach, Herr Riedel, with the singing society which he has raised up for the purpose. Berlin, as the great northern capital of Germany, and with great resources and ambition, must have everything, and upon a larger scale than anybody; and so her many excellent societies bring out more great works of Bach in the course of a season, than can be heard anywhere else. It was my luck to secure much and to lose much of this. Could I have staid there until Passion week and later, I should have heard both the Matthäus and the Johannis Passion, and also the great Mass in B minor, called his greatest work. Or could I have contrived to be upon the Rhine that week, I might have heard the Matthew Passion upon three successive days in Darmstadt, in Aix-la-Chapelle and in Cologne—the latter under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller, who is the right man to keep alive an interest in Bach in those regions. But what I did hear in Berlin makes a formidable list. For instance, five of the Cantatas, including two of the grandest works I have ever heard, even by the side of Handel's Oratorios, namely one upon the Choral: Ein' feste Burg, and one commencing: Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss; performed by that admirable society, the "Bach-Verein," which has for its director one of the most sterling musicians and composers of the day, George Vierling. Also many Motets and Chorals, many organ Preludes, Fugues, Toccatas, Sonatas, &c., violin music, arias sung in mixed concerts, &c.

In Vienna, where I arrived just before Easter, Bach is little cultivated. Ever since Beethoven and Schubert's time, the Italian taste has reigned among the light-hearted Viennese. As a musical city, it is more like Paris. But there is already an awakening in a higher direction. There is a circle of young musicians in Vienna, among whom I may name Hellmesberger and his fine Quartet, Eppstein, the pianist, Ruffinaccia, &c., who serve the highest cause of classical Art in a right noble spirit. These men love Bach, as well as Beethoven. Joachim is an immense favorite there, and through his masterly violin performances, has even made Bach more than palatable to Viennese audiences. Vienna, too, has the honor of publishing altogether the best and most high-toned musical journal, which now appears in Germany. Its editor, Herr Selma Bagge, is an enlightened, earnest and unselfish champion of the True in Art; and whoever among German musical men has an earnest word to say upon any important topic is very apt to seek the Vienna journal for his organ. There has appeared recently, in several numbers of it, a review of Robert Franz's admirable arrangements of Bach's arias, which shows the most profound and delicate appreciation of Bach's style and genius, and of his mission in the world, that I have ever seen. It is said to have been written by a young composer of much promise, living in Halle, a pupil and friend of Franz, by name Saran.

Let this pass for an introduction, and in another letter I will try to recall more particularly what I have heard of Bach. D.

A New Mass.

Mr. J. FALKENSTEIN, who has been the organist and musical director at the Endicott street Catholic church for a term of years invited some of his friends to a rehearsal of a Mass composed by him and executed by the choir and orchestra of the church with the aid of some of our resident musicians on the evening of May 4th. Mercantile Hall, where the rehearsal took place, was filled with an appreciative audience.

Composing a new piece of music may be set down as an undertaking much more delicate, at the present day, than writing a new book. Not only have the various emotions of the human soul been treated in tones in the most varied manner, but they have been so expressed by the immortal masters in ways beyond which hardly anything seems possible. From the Mattheus-passion of Bach, to the Missa solennis in D by Beethoven—mentioning these two works merely as outposts of a host of glorious, sublime compositions and not forgetting the Requiem by Mozart nor the Masses by Haydn, Mozart, Cherubini and others; from Handel's Susannah, Judas Maccabens to Mendelssohn's Elijah—so much grand, devout and truthful musical expression has emanated from the minds of these chosen men that it is, in this as in other departments of musical art, an almost hopeless endeavor to find a new form wherein to clothe a new musical idea.

The musical critic has a difficult task to perform with reference to new compositions in church style. Filled with the severe and yet so warm and deep beauties of Bach and Händel, having the grand and solemn mysteries of the Requiem by Mozart and the Missa Solennis by Beethoven indelibly graven in ones memory, it is difficult to disengage oneself from these impressions in order to find the standard, by which to measure a new applicant for musical fame. Having to consider the means with which a composer has to work, if writing for practical purposes, it was well for an impartial critic to have had occasion of hearing the composition, the name of which heads this article. And after observing that a part of his orchestra is not of the highest order, we are surprised at the happy tact and practical skill with which Mr. Falkenstein worked out the instrumentation of his modest composition. Indeed we think in some places Mr. F. attained orchestral effect with his limited means, which do him much credit and show that he is a practical musician of great ability. Proofs of this are furnished throughout the whole of the work. The orchestration, as far as the middle parts are concerned, suffered somewhat from the absence of violoncellos and bassoons, which could not be procured. This caused certain passages to sound thin, especially where, as is often done and we think not to advantage, the violins go unisono with the singers. We especially observed this in the "Incarnatus." The "Kyrie" is good, so are various parts of the "Gloria," in which imitations in the bass instruments produce quite a good effect. The first movement of the "Sanctus" struck us as especially good, expressing happily a mysterious holy emotion. In the "Benedictus" and the "Agnus Dei," the soprano singer has some fine soli, and revealed a full sympathetic voice, which, with proper cultivation, we think, would be a valuable addition to the ranks of our resident singers. A fine part occurs also occurs also in the "Dona nobis pacem." Some of the finest instrumental effects are in some pieces for the brass instruments in the "Gloria," "Credo," and the "Hosannah" of the "Sanctus." Especially good was the chorus of the "Agnus Dei," with its accompaniment of brass instruments. And so was the "Amen" at the close of the mass.

The style of the composition reminds one of Mozart. Although there are no positively new ideas in the work, and the harmonies, though very good in many places, have been used before, yet there is so much skill in the Mass, many graceful flowing melodies in the various brief movements and so much practical ability in the very short and modest work, that we sincerely think Mr. Falkenstein ought to essay some greater work or at least a more elaborate orchestral composition. We might add that portions of the mass seemed to have more of a lyrical, operatic character than is desirable for a mass. But then we remember what good old father Haydn said, when similar objections were raised against some passages in his masses, "Why should I not pray to my God with merriment and rejoicing?" said the good old man. Every one ought to do all things in his own way is surely a good and just maxim.

If we may take the liberty, we should suggest to Mr. Falkenstein a study of the works of Bach. There are some passages in his mass that show that he likes to write in a severer style. The old maestro is the best food for aspiring talents and we think Mr. F. would find it to his great advantage to make himself familiar with the motettes and airs of Bach as well as his masses and oratorios. *†

THE LAST AFTERNOON CONCERT of the season was given by the Orchestral Union on Wednesday, May 15th, before a crowded house. There did not seem to be a seat vacant. The programme was unusually rich.

1. Overture—"Die Hebriden".....Mendelssohn
2. Concert Waltz—"Gedanken Flug".....Strauss
3. Symphony No. 9—(op 88).....Mozart
4. Overture—"Oberon".....Weber
5. Romanza in G—(For the Violin).....Beethoven
Performed by Carl Meisel.
6. Armeo Ball Polka.....Strauss
7. Soldiers' Chorus, Prayer and Barcarole.....Meyrbeer

The four classical pieces were very well rendered. We were glad to find a delicate shading of pianissimo to fortissimo in all of them. Mr. MEISEL played the Romanza by Beethoven with much purity and taste and received a deserved applause. All the other pieces especially the very effective extract from the "Star of the North," were performed very well, and the concert formed a brilliant close to a successful series.

We see with pleasure that the "Orchestral Union and the Germania Band propose to give a series of Saturday evening concerts. Particulars see in another column. *†

Mr. Bendelari's Concert.

Mr. AUGUSTO BENDELARI, with his musical club, made up from his pupils, gave a concert at Mercantile Hall, on Saturday evening last, for the benefit of the families of the Boston Volunteers. We need not say that such a body of singers, drawn from the most cultivated society of the city, did not fail to draw a crowded house, or to give a most substantial benefit. The programme gave us the names of some fifty ladies and twenty gentlemen who make up Signor Bendelari's club, and we should be well pleased to be able to give some fuller account of this very delightful concert. The voices were all very fresh and beautiful, and several of the singers showed the highest style of amateur accomplishment and cultivation, most creditable to their instructor. The concert closed with a spirited air and chorus, composed by Signor Bendelari, who, like most of our adopted citizens, is full of patriotic ardor, which found spirited expression in this song, Rule Columbia, which was admirably sung by Mrs. HARWOOD and full chorus. This was the programme:

- PART I.
1. Chorus, I Lomhardi, Oerusalem.....Verdi.
 2. Solo, Linda, O Luce.....Donizetti.
 3. Duet, Maria Padilla....."
 4. Solo, Giuramento, Manegli.....Mercadante.
 5. Solo, Tancredi.....Rossini.
 6. Duet, Bianco e Faliero....."
 7. Solo, Separazione....."
 8. Pezzo Concertato, Mabeth.....Verdi.

PART II.

1. Ave Maria.....Florimo.
2. Solo, Lucia, Regnava.....Donizetti.
3. Duet, Giuramento.....Mercadante.
4. Solo, Jeanne d'Arc.....Borodine.
5. Quartette, Carnevale di Venezia.....Petrella.
6. Solo, Cenerentola, Noo piu mesta.....Rossini.
7. Rule Columbia.....B. Anguste
Mrs. Harwood, and Chorus. [A. Bendelari.]

MUSIC IN WASHINGTON.—Our troops in the Federal City, beside giving proofs of their expertness as mechanics of every sort, show that there are not a few among them possessed of no little skill in the divine art of Music. We read that on the Sunday after the arrival of a Massachusetts regiment, divine service was performed by its chaplain, one of the privates officiating as organist, while others made up an efficient choir.

We have received (with a complimentary ticket) the following programme of a concert to be given, May 9th, by the LIGHT GUARD, Company A, 71st Regiment, New York) at the Navy Yard Barracks at Washington—a Matinée d'Invitation. We regret that circumstances forbid our acceptance of the invitation, and hope that some friend may send us a Washington letter. With HARRISON MILLARD (a private in the regiment) for conductor, and Dodworth's famous hand for orchestra, our readers will readily believe that the concert was well worth attending. Here is the Programme:

1. Quickstep, "Thou art far away".....Millard.
Dodworth's Band.
2. Song, "Yes! let me like a soldier fall".....Wallace.
Mr. Millard.
3. Quartet, "Come where my love lies dreaming".....Foster.
Glee Club.
4. Song, "The Monks of old".....Glover.
Mr. Camp.
5. Finale of "La Traviata".....Verdi.
Dodworth's Band.
6. New National Ode, "The flag of the free".....Millard.
Mr. Millard and Chorus.
7. Trio, "Love's young dream".....Moore.
Millard, Woodruff, and Camp.
8. Fantasie on "Il Ballo in Maschera".....Verdi.
Dodworth's Band.
9. Miserere from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi.
Mr. Millard, H. Dodworth and Chorus.
10. Duetto, "I would that my love".....Mendelssohn.
Dodworth's Band.
11. Patriotic Song, "Viva l'America".....Millard.
Mr. Millard.
12. Full Chorus, "Star Spangled Banner".....Rey.
Director, Mr. Harrison Millard.
Band Leader, Mr. Harvey Dodworth.

ST. LOUIS, MAY, 1861.—"Tom" was born in Georgia, owned by a man named Jones. He was an idiot from birth. His father and mother were offered for sale. Price $1,500 without Tom; $1,200 with him. A Dr. Bethune purchased him. His daughters had a piano and used to play a little; the kind of music girls play, not much of anything. Tom used to spend his time rolling in the mud, but as soon as the piano struck up come in the house he would; there was no keeping him out. One night the piano was heard after the family had retired. They went in the parlor, and there was Tom playing every tune he had ever heard; the first time trying. Tom is blind; has not common sense, cannot converse on any subject, although he will go to church and coming home, repeat every word of the sermon. Sightless from birth and untutored, his soul runs over with the spirit of music. He produces the sweetest melody that we can conceive of, with the utmost accuracy. His brain is a repository of the richest musical gems, which scintillate and flash beneath his ebony fingers, assuring us that this unenlightened little child could only have been taught by the finger of God. Without a moment's instruction, the son of ordinary Southern field hands, he sustains himself a linguist, composer, and musician. He claims to be the only person who can play three airs at once, but I have heard Theodore M. Brown do that often, and Gottschalk play four, in Buffalo. Tom repeats any piece no matter how long or difficult on hearing it once. He repeats the music correctly and the words, verbatim, of any song in any language. He does not understand a single rudimentary principle of music yet composes gems of rare artistic ability. He sits down to the piano, plays any duett with any one, never having heard it before, and then changes stools and plays the other part, thus composing and remembering. He plays also with his back to the piano, standing up, completely reversing his fingers. He does not know a flat from a sharp, nor the name of the key. He plays the most difficult operatic music without missing a note, or striking a false one. He was caressed and petted as all negro children are on a plantation, especially those affected with the terrible infirmity loss of sight. But when the veil of darkness was drawn over the sight of this poor negro boy, a flood of light was poured in upon his brain, and his mind became an opera of beauty written by the hand of God in syllables of music.

I have sat in some considerable impatience sometimes; I did the evening I heard Jenny Lind, the first ever I heard Lagrange—but I confess I was more impatient to see Tom. The door opened and a gentleman led forward a grinning, idiotic, Congo boy, whom with some trouble he controlled. Tom is a full-blooded negro, and appears more like an ape than a man. He is eleven years old. He bowed as if his head was coming off, and while the gentleman was talking, kept playing and grinning, rolling his eyes, &c. During the evening he would drum on the piano, at intervals, clap and laugh when the audience did, and had to be closely watched all the time. He was led to the piano and took his seat. He threw his head back, and commenced with all the ease, yet vim of a master. He did all they claimed for him. Beautiful, and difficult selections from the various operas, and, in short, all the modern piano music. I am astounded, I can not account for it, no one can, no one understands it. Sunday afternoon I visited him, and for the first time we discovered a new property. I placed him at the other end of the room, and as I struck the piano at random, he immediately told every note I struck, whether black or white. He does not know their names. I struck very quickly, giving him no time to think, and kept him saying black and white as fast as he could speak; he never missed once. Monday evening they did the same at the Concert. His hand is very peculiarly shaped. From the ball of his thumb up to the first finger is an inch longer than common. The organs of time and tone are entirely wanting. He can be taught nothing. He has no intelligence. He is in all respects, save in music, a blind, idiotic negro, can not carry on any conversation. We well know the difficulty of giving concerts on the piano alone, and I never knew but one man who could do it, Wm. Mason. Tom gave fifteen in Louisville, but the troubles here broke up all concerts. To show his wonderful imitative powers he delivered a long speech of Senator Douglass' which he heard him deliver in Virginia. It was perfect, and yet Tom did not even know the meaning of a word. In playing at a concert, he does not know his pieces by name, for he does not know the names. The agent says, "Now, Tom, play the piece you played such a time," &c. Tom runs the chromatic scale with his thumb and first fingers only. In fact, his whole fingering is unlike everything else before known. He plays his pieces in any key. No matter what the piece, he will play it in a dozen different keys, full chords and all, right off, changing as fast as you wish.

His playing arises partly from his strong imitative powers, even himself not understanding why. If the audience clap so does Tom. If they should hiss he would hiss too. In the midst of his concerts he will say, "Oh, I feel like playing such a piece," and plays it. All he plays he has learned in a year.

Now, in conclusion, you may ask me one question, "Do you wish us to understand that Tom plays as well, all things considered, as Wm. Mason, Gottschalk, &c. Fairly, then, I do not. But Tom has never heard them yet. He can only play what he hears, and as he hears it. He has only heard the best players of the Southern States. He has not failed yet. Whether he will meet one who can play a piece he cannot, is a problem. He cannot come North, as he is a slave. (Bring him on! He will be safe, even in Boston; our word for it.—Ed.) He goes direct to Europe, and we shall see what we shall see.

It is the most wonderful sight I ever witnessed, to see that blind, idiotic, repulsive negro, who looks and acts much more like an ape than anything else, at the piano, discoursing such music. What is passing in that mind, walled in as it were by a wall of adamant? He cannot tell. No one can. BROWN.

PARIS, APRIL 26, 1861.—At the Théâtre Lyrique the new opera La Statue is a decided success. The music is by M. Reyer, words by Jules Barbier and Carré. The plot is taken from the Arabian Nights. Hector Berlioz thus speaks of the music of Reyer: "The partition of M. Reyer reveals from the first a musician loving style, character, and true expression. The form of some of his pieces is not always strongly marked, but in all there may be found the qualities that are the chief charm of Weber's works, a depth of sentiment, a natural originality in melody une harmonie coloree, and an energetic instrumentation free from all brutality and violence."

Alternating with La Statue, Gluck's Orphée is being given at the Lyrique, which is justly called the Odeon of the opera. Mad. Viardot ensures the success of this classic music.

At the Italiani Donizetti's Poliuto has been much applauded. Pacani, Penco, and Graziani personated the chief characters. On the Emperor's birth-day, both he and the Empress were present for the representation of Un Ballo in maschera.

At the Grand Opera, the Huguenots continues to draw more strangers than Parisians. Mlle. de Taisy has continued her débuts in Lucie de Lammermoor.

Royal-Cravate is played at the Opera Comique. It is by two young noblemen, the sum of whose years would not amount to fifty, MM. de Mesgrigny and de Massa.

By special favor the Salle du Conservatoire has been accorded by the Minister of State to Leon Kreutzer, who is to give a grand concert on the 4th of May. Among the concerts of the fortnight may be mentioned those of Mme. Anna Barthe, of MM. Marchesi, Jacquard, and Lefort. A beautiful concert may also be mentioned, given by the blind of the Institution Imperiale des jeunes aveugles. They were seconded by several artists of the Conservatoire. A Christmas Carol, by Gounod, was sung by the blind pupils, also a beautiful composition executed by them entitled Les Saisons, the work of M. Paul, their professor.

The chief theatres have produced nothing new. At the Odeon, Mad. Ristori still continues as Beatrix in the Madonna of Art. A parody of this piece is announced at the Palais Royal, under the title, La Matrone de l'Art. M. Lagouvé then alone occupies the two principal theatres of Paris. At the Français his Un jeune homme qui ne fait rien and at the Odeon his Beatrix do not seem to be on the point of being soon replaced.

La Tour de Nesle has been in preparation for some time and is announced to-night. After some difficulty the role of Buridan has been given to Mélingue, who formerly identified himself with this character. After the Tour de Nesle, the Porte Saint Martin is to give a great drama entitled "Nero," by MM. Latour de Saint-Ybars and Edouard Plouvier. Tailade will play the chief role.

The Theatre des Varietes has given two pieces, Menuet de Danae, by Meilhac and Ludovic Halevy — a half sentimental drama — and Hercule et une jolie femme, a gay vaudeville, by Varin and Michel Delaporte.

The Hippodrome resumes its representations next Tuesday. A military drama is to be given, entitled, Souvenirs d'Afrique or Les Cretes de Beni-Fraoussen. M. Arnault was the first to introduce these pantomimes with such display of scenery in the open air. This year he proposes to offer the spectacle of a combat on rugged mountain sides. Arabs, Zouaves, Chasseurs d'Afrique are to take part in the action. It will be the first time that such equestrian manœuvres will be seen at the height of several stories. But this is not all the Hippodrome promises. There are among other novelties to be a parody of a bull-fight and a Ballet of frogs.

It is needless to say that "The Prisoner of the Bastille" is drawing crowds and will probably continue to do so for the next month or two. F. B.

Concert Spirituel.

This was the name given to a class of concerts established at Paris, in 1725, by Anne Danican-Philidor, a brother of the celebrated chess-player. The first performances were all in Latin, but afterwards this restriction was abandoned. The managers of these concerts obtained a license from the Royal Academy of Music, and all artists were obliged to appear at these entertainments. They took place during Easter, when the theatres were closed, and among the performers who appeared during their continuance might be seen all the actors, more or less celebrated, who were attached to the Royal Academy through a number of years. Some of the exercises must have been strange in appearance. It was the custom for debutants to appear first on the stage in short prologues, and not to undertake, at once, the impersonation of a long character. When the Concert Spirituel was inaugurated, these debutants were made to appear in character, and perform certain Latin compositions. Imagine an assemblage of musicians and choristers assembled for the performance of music. Upon the stage successively appear the candidates for theatrical honors. They are not clad in the costumes of the surrounding crowd, but in the garb of some fanciful character which they are ultimately to assume on the stage. A shepherd bedecked with ribbons, arrayed in satin, crook in hand, a shepherdess with abbreviated skirts, and a liberal display of charms unconcealed by an indiscreet bodice, nymphs and bacchantes in drapery yet more degagé, warriors, kings, magicians, successively appear to sing psalms, litanies and other Latin religious compositions. A strange incongruity of effects, surely; as bad as the anachronisms of some old painters who dressed Adam and Eve in pourpoint and petticoat, and the angel Gabriel in cuirass and philibeg. At a later period the Latin psalms were given up, and the debutants were allowed to sing the music of the parts they were to assume in their own vernacular tongue. To be sure our modern concerts, where occasional pieces are "sung in costume," bear some resemblance to these old entertainments; but we should think it strange now-a-day to see little Miss Francis standing in pink tights on our Music Hall stage, trolling out a Credo, or Signor Ferri, in his feather costume of Papageno, thundering forth a De Profundis. To arrive at a full understanding of the effects of past customs and manners, we must put our own people in the same conditions upon our own platforms and judge accordingly.

Besides these vocal performances were instrumental compositions emanating from the first composers of the day; and the Parisian public was made acquainted for the first time with the power and effects of individual instruments in the hands of skillful soloists, as well as the orchestral effects of the early symphonies.—Boston Musical Times.

What Mozart was paid.

The German papers inform us that Castelli, the Austrian literary Nestor, now in the eighty-fourth year of his age, has just published the first volume of his Memoirs. From these, among other interesting matters, we learn that his dramatic poem of The Swiss Family,* which has been translated into every language, and played hundreds of times at Vienna, brought him in altogether, for his rights as author, the sum of eight florins!

This fact will nevertheless cause little surprise; theatrical annals furnish us with only too many instances of the kind; and those who are curious about the fortunes of composers in former days, may satisfy themselves to their heart's content by examining the contents of Herr Jahn's last great work. Thanks to the zealous, diligent, thoroughly impartial, and extraordinarily voluminous biography of Mozart, we know how much the compositions of the illustrious German musician realized for him in the shape of pecuniary emolument—at least in the most important instances.

In the Registers of Accounts of the Vienna Theatre (an interesting and valuable collection), we read, for 1788-1789, page 45:

* Paid to Ponte (Loreozo), for writing the book of Don Giovanni, 100 florins."

And a little further on, (page 47):

† Paid to Mozart (Wolfgang), for composing the music of Don Giovanni, 225 florins."

For the score of the Magic Flute (such is the genuine title of this masterpiece, not the Enchanted Flute,† as many have been accustomed to call it, owing to a careless translation of the title on the score printed in Germany), for the score of the Magic Flute, 160 ducats were paid by Schickaneder, manager of the Imperial Theatre, who reaped an immense profit by the bargain. No other work of Mozart's has enjoyed such continued popularity and success throughout Germany. The first representation of Die Zauberflöte took place on the 30th September, 1791.‡ In the month of October the opera was played twenty-four times; the bills of the 23d November, 1792, announced its hundredth, and those of the 22d October, 1795, its two hundredth performance.

Again, the same munificent honorarium was the gerdion of Mozart, respectively on account of Die Entführung and Le Nozze di Figaro.

And what about those operas of Rossini which were originally produced in Italy? One example may suffice. The incomparable Barbiere di Siviglia was disposed of for an "obolus," which not only purchased the right of republication but that of representation also! It must be admitted that the composers of the present day look more carefully after their interests.

* Set to music by Weigl.

† The flute is not enchanted, but enchanting. In plain language, it enchants others. The Italians were therefore right in calling the opera Il Flauto Magico, and not Il Flauto Incantato.

‡ Little more than two months later (Dec. 5, 1791, at Vienna) Mozart died, in the 36th year of his age.

—London Musical World.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

So you're going to the wars, dear. G. Danskin. 25

The sentiment of this ballad fits so precisely the situation of thousands of families in the North, and the music to it is so well written, that it will surely make a hit.

Over the rippling sea. T. Cattrau. 25

Pretty words adapted to the beautiful Neapolitane air "Santa Lucia," omitting the florid and difficult Finale by Braga, with which this melody made its first debut. The air impresses itself at once so vividly upon the memory that it must, in course of time, become a universal favorite.

Give me thy blessing, mother. J. W. Cherry. 25

A gem for musical evenings at home. It is plain and lies naturally in the voice. The title-page is handsomely illustrated with the picture of a young sailor taking leave of his mother.

I'll twine a wreath of roses fair. F. Woolcot. 25

A simple and pleasing ballad.

Instrumental Music.

Rifle Corps Waltzes. D'Albert. 35

Rather easy and eminently pleasing. It is one of the most melodious sets of waltzes by this favorite author.

Quintet finale from "Martha." Transcription. A. Baumbach. 35

One of the most striking and best recollected pieces in the Opera, which has furnished the composer the leading theme for the Overture, and which, in this piano arrangement comes out with all the splendor that anything short of the brass-chorus of an orchestra can give it.

Shells of Ocean for three Performers. T. Dissell. 30

Very good for class-practice, quite easy. It will teach children to keep time better than anything else.

Il suon dell' arpe. Duet from "Poliuto." Transcribed. A. Baumbach. 35

A brilliant arrangement of this deservedly favorite duet, acknowledged as one of the finest and most inspired creations of Donizetti, and linked with some of our most pleasant recollections of Piccolomini.

Books.

JOHNSON'S HARMONY. Practical Instructions in Harmony, upon the Pestalozzian, or Inductive System; teaching Musical Composition and the Art of Extemporizing Interludes and Voluntaries. By A. N. Johnson. 1,00

This work is designed for the class of persons designated in the language of music teachers as "new beginners." It imparts a knowledge of Harmony, by exercises which the student is to write; or, so to speak, by a progressive series of problems which the student must solve. The utmost simplicity of language has been used in the explanations, and an attempt made to guard against misapprehension, even on the part of an undisciplined mind.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 477.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 8.

L'Année Musicale.

L'Année Musicale ou Revue Annuelle des théâtres lyriques et des concerts, — des publications littéraires relatives à la musique et des événements remarquables appartenants à l'histoire de l'art musicale — par P. SCUDO — Deuxième année — Paris — Librairie de L. Hachette et Cie 1861. 1 vol in 18, pp. 405.

Since Louis Figuier's excellent scientific annals have met with such deserved success, the example has been followed by others, so that now every art yearly gives rise to a work in which its progress and history during the preceding year are minutely recorded. This is but as it should be and the general reader as well as the special student has thus laid before him a series of facts, which otherwise he might seek for in vain in files of old journals and magazines.

Scudo, the musical critic of the Revue des deux mondes has now given us the second year of his Année musicale comprising the chief events of the art of 1860. The name of the author, whatever may be thought of his particular views and exigencies, is a recommendation to a work that has no pretensions above that of stating facts clearly agreeably, and fully. There is no need of being a musician to feel the tenderness of his well-known romance Le fils de la Vierge, much less to appreciate the literary qualities of his sketches in Critique et littérature musicales — La musique ancienne et moderne and in Le chevalier Sarti. In the present volume Scudo, as far as the nature of the details in which he enters permitted, has preserved those valuable qualities of style, that elegance and ease which make his criticism acceptable to all classes. Musicians accept the work as a valuable repository of facts, while the general reader is thankful to the author for the light he throws upon subjects in which all must be interested.

"The Musical Year" is not universal, it is merely national, comprehensive for France merely, detailed for Paris only. Forty pages, no more, are devoted to the rest of Europe. Whatever has been presented in the capital is studied at length. Thus the new compositions produced by the four lyric theatres, the Grand Opéra, the Opera Comique, the Théâtre Italien and the Théâtre Lyrique, as well as accounts of the various concerts fill the first five chapters; the remaining five being taken up with musical bibliography, the obituary notices and news, home and foreign.

The work opens with a notice Pierre de Médicis by Prince Poniatowski, a detailed criticism such as the author gives at the appearance of every new composition of interest, to the readers of the Revue des deux mondes. Farther on Offenbach is treated rather unceremoniously. Offenbach and Richard Wagner, we beg the pardon of the exclusive friends or foes of either, even musical party animosity runs high now; Offenbach and Wagner, strange as the collocation of the two names may seem, are the antipa-thies of Scudo. To the latter he devotes several pages when giving an account of his three concerts at the Italian Opera. He does not look upon Wagner as an ordinary artist, but "like almost all remarkable men of our time he is gifted with more ambition than fecundity, with more will than inspiration." It is the love of effect he condemns. Rhythm and harmony he accords to the author of Lohengrin and Tannhäuser. "His instrumentation, powerful in grand effects is wanting in variety and suppleness," the various parts of the orchestra are in direct opposition with each other; there is little originality. "The style is monotonous in spite of the efforts of a vigorous will and the resources of an incontestable talent."

When Scudo keeps within such criticism, we can like and follow him. We remain free to judge for ourselves whether by applying the rules of art we may have mastered or by appealing to our own natural sentiments. Though some technical learning may be necessary to explain beauties and defects in art, we may be thankful that it is within the reach of all to feel them according to our capacities. The writer who can clearly show us the secret springs of our feelings is welcome as a teacher. In his company, under his guidance we shall be willingly led to higher appreciation. But let the critic in art as well as in letters never fall into the personalities of a partisan. We are right in mistrusting him at the first step he makes in the path. Abuse justly calls forth sympathy and he who descends to it has half lost his cause. Scudo has descended to it in his notice on Richard Wagner; even more in that on Offenbach when speaking of the Papillon.

A valuable feature of the "Musical Year" is the multiplicity of facts presented. Thus the changes in the personnel of the various lyric theatres are given. The orchestra and singers of the Grand Opera number 215. The names of the chief are given in classes, thus we find four first tenors, seven baritones, ten soprani, &c. The numerical divisions of the chorus and orchestra are also given. The musical bibliography is all interesting showing what France has contributed within the last year. Quotations are freely given showing the character of the works cited, foreign productions are not passed over in silence. The musical method of Chev , who has now public courses in Paris, gave rise to several pamphlets which are analyzed.

The details in regard to musical publications, the notices of the chief publishers, all contain valuable information. In 1860 no less than 4,051 pieces were published in France, being nearly three times the amount issued in 1850; of this according to the author's statistics more than 7,600 pounds were sent to the United States; the whole amount exported having been above 53,400 pounds. The same calculations are made for musical instruments. The new regulations for the military bands are given; each regiment having for infantry 40, for cavalry 27 musicians. There are pages in every portion of the work that are of interest beyond the special information they contain, as those on Chinese music for instance. A letter from a French officer in China upon this subject being inserted at length.

The Année Musicale concludes with a few pages that may serve to show the musical tendencies of Scudo as well as the general appreciation of art in France.

"The year of which we have recounted the facts has produced nothing very remarkable in the art which is the object of our studies. No new composer has arisen nor any salient work calculated to learn a lasting impression. At the theatre, as well as in the other parts of the vast domain of music, all that has been done is mediocre, and nothing announces that the laborious period we are traversing is near an end."

We abridge, else the quotation would be too long. Men of talent abound; the secrets of the art are studied, but we live on the fruits of the past. Weber, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, have found successors, only unequal imitators in Germany. In Schumann and Wagner Scudo sees a reaction of which Liszt is the ne-plus ultra. France though not richer is at least freer, there is "no false theory" it waits that some artist may come to dispel "the moral numbness that seem to have settled on the public for the last ten years."

"If it is difficult to deny the state of poverty and languor into which the spirit of musical invention has fallen within fifteen or twenty years, there is another fact quite as undeniable; it is that the taste for this consoling art is spreading more and more and is penetrating new layers of the population. Without speaking of Germany, of Holland, of Belgium, of Switzerland and of the whole North of Europe, where music has always been popular and taught to children with the first elements of the language of country, France has also taken part in the movement of regeneration. Never has the administration been kinder to the men who devote themselves to elementary musical instruction, and never has it been better disposed to recognize the salutary power of this civilizing art."

In the communal schools music is now taught: The Orpheon under the direction of MM. Pasedeloup and Bazin gives instruction to poor workmen. The teaching of Emile Chev  is organized on an extensive scale. "All these means of propagation," the author proceeds, "prove that the knowledge of music penetrates into the heart of the nation and that it becomes an element of public instruction."

The Philharmonic societies that exist in a large number of cities, the numerous professors formed by the Conservatoire de Paris, who go and reside in the provinces, spread both in the middle and in the higher classes, the knowledge of instrumental music and better taste. The multiplied editions of the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn prove that France which invented the Vaudeville and the Science du gai savoir is aspiring to become a musical nation. Professional artists have never been better versed in the principles of their art, never better educated, or more enlightened than in our time. A knowledge of the principle of harmony, counterpoint; the composition and history of music generally spread among our artists and among many distinguished amateurs. In fine, the musical art, as well as that of design, the treasures of intelligence as well as that of material wealth are spread over a vaster surface and are no longer the exclusive portion of a chosen few. This is the true character of modern civilization in which music plays so important a role." F. B.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Charlatanism in Music.

I.

THE LION-PIANIST AS A COMPOSER.—SKETCHED BY BENDA.

According to a common belief, every man who makes music his profession, is also a composer. This is an error. One may be an excellent performer and yet be incapable of inventing an original melody of only eight measures. The goddess of music does not always dwell entire in her devotees; she prefers to surrender herself but half, either as the performing or the creative genius; and it is only when she falls desperately in love that she abandons herself entirely, heart and hand, to her chosen favorites. Then the world receives its Mozarts, Beethovens, Mendelssohns, Spohrs, and others, who are equally great as composers and players.

It is no more difficult for the musician, who is endowed with creative talent and has practiced the rules of composition to a good degree, to compose a piece of music than it is for the gifted literary man to write a poem. The musician, like the poet, takes his seat at the table and writes down what his imagination suggests or what he conjures up from the depth of his mind. Only now and then he resorts to the instrument for a moment, merely to have the key, or just to hear how a new and complicated harmony sounds on which he may have ventured. For the rest he trusts to his lively imagination, which clearly reflects not only every tone, but every combination of tones; and even when composing a piece for the instrument itself (the piano) he writes down the most brilliant, and at the same time the most practicable passages without the aid of that instrument. Of Mozart it is said that he generally had the whole piece ready in his brain before committing it to paper. There is nothing surprising in this. Music to the true composer is a language; he may think over before, or during the art of writing what he has to say in that language. Some persons when about to write a letter have the whole epistle ready before they seize the pen; while others first take pen and paper, expecting that one thought will suggest another, as they write along. The same is the case with composers of music.

However, all is different with our hero, the Lion-Pianist. A delightful performer, with a touch so exquisite that he produces magical sounds indeed, he is nevertheless entirely destitute of productive talent and unable to fancy to himself a single tone. But compose he must, lest he should fail in his mission and the world be deprived of the fruits of his muse. Therefore, he makes it his business to ransack the scores of opera-composers, whose melodies he extends by certain liquid passages, of which a number, say two or three, have imprinted themselves on his nimble fingers with such tenacity that they ever after reappear in all he plays and writes. Thus he advances rapidly from one opus to another; but if we take a couple of these his works and compare them, we shall find that they resemble each other as closely as ever twin-brothers did. Notwithstanding their inferior value, inferior in every respect, his pieces are eagerly sought by the publishers and dearly paid for. They are beautifully, nay, daintily printed, and generally dedicated to persons of high rank and fortune, who return the compliment in the shape of breast pins and diamond rings, or even a saddle-horse, if the pianist has been known to evince equestrian proclivities.

There are, however, moments when he is disgusted with the occupation of transcribing and paraphrasing the music of others, and when he feels as if he must compose a piece that shall be all his own, not a tone borrowed. So he resolves to write a Méditation élégante et mélodieuse, as he calls it. He is determined now to practice the noble virtue of temperance, so as to abstain from all intoxicating feats of modern piano-trickery; in brief, the piece is to be in the classical style. As he is unable to compose one measure without the aid of the instrument, as before intimated, he sits at once down at his favorite Grand and thunders away for a while, just to fructify his imagination a little. Presently he stops, draws a long breath and sets out in search of a melody with which to begin his intended Méditation. He grinds out one note after the other, and when he has collected a number, sufficient to form a strain, he finds to his consternation that it is nothing but the fac-simile of a worn-out melody, with which everybody is acquainted. "That won't do!" So he jumps up from the stool and walks a few times about the room when his attention is caught by the large mirror, which adorns the apartment. He places himself right before it and is delighted, as ever, with his elegant figure, his graceful attitude and his expressive features, which he cannot but admire anew. Thus inspired with fresh courage, and after a twist or two at his moustache, he lights a cigar and cheerfully resumes his seat at the instrument. The result is the same as before. After a few more vain attempts he gives it up for the present, thinking he is not in the right mood and must wait for a more favorable moment. But I will not tire the reader with a long description how this composer (?) finally manages to have the piece done. Be it known that it is a most painful work, of which those only can form an idea, who have watched it. You would split wood, or work at a blacksmith's shop for a whole day than engage for an hour in this tantalizing occupation.

The Méditation élégante et mélodieuse has since been published — as usual in the most beautiful type — and is already in the hands of many of the lovers of musical tit-bits. It is spread over more than a dozen pages; but if we cancel the many repetitions, and, besides, divest it of all the superfluous flourish with which it is fringed and freckled, there will hardly remain music enough to cover half a page. The matter of the piece may be best defined in the language of the poet Percival, as "poor and vapid thoughts which peep from out the cumbrous ornaments that overload their littleness." Nevertheless, the composer himself is infinitely fond of it, and well he may be, considering the infinite pains it has cost him.

Now, what is it, that can induce a man, who by nature, by habit and occupation is destined to lead the gay, happy life of a butterfly, to take upon himself at times such a cross? Vanity and ambition are the principal motives which ere this have impelled inferior natures to perform miracles. As his style of playing is of the most showy, dashing kind, an exhibition of technical feats and artifices, intended to astonish the multitude, — so he avails himself of whatever may serve him to indulge this same unartistic propensity for display. He is not satisfied with the reputation of a skilful performer, too ambitious to leave the path of the composer untried. How much more the world would admire and applaud him with the laurel of the tone-poet wreathed around his brow!

It will be necessary here to mention that the lion-pianist is rarely without an aide-de-camp, who has, to take upon him a part of this Sisyphus like labor, to fill up certain gaps, and copy the illegible places, in the manuscript. This aid, it must be known, is also a pianist, but of inferior ability. He pretends that his real object in attaching himself to the virtuoso is to catch the secret of his exquisite touch or to receive occasionally a lesson from him, though he knows as well as any one that a lion-pianist considers giving instruction equal to taking an emetic. At first sight it would seem that he acted as the agent of the great performer, that he planned and arranged his concerts and transacted similar business for him; but this is rarely the case, for he is anything but a business man. The truth is, he has more time than he can usefully employ; besides he deems it a great distinction to be called the companion of "the man, whose every hand represents an orchestra." The lion in his turn, being an exceedingly sociable fellow, likes to have some one about him, with whom he can smoke, talk and laugh, and to whom he can relate his love adventures (we can easily fancy that the girls are wild with him). Thus the aide is invited to share the lion's champagne dinners and suppers, and sometimes to accompany him on a short professional tour. However, if we watch the twain closely, it appears doubtful, whether their connection is that of friend and friend, or of master and servant; for he, the aide, is despatched on all sorts of errands and often spoken to in a commanding tone. But then, the champagne suppers, the delicious havanas and the capital "sundries" compensate for a good deal of humble treatment and easily reconcile him; though there doubtless have been cases when he thought it better to "secede."

The career of a lion-pianist, we may add, so long as he is young, is an enviable one; but, when age approaches, he becomes an object rather of pity. The public have long since given him to understand that they are weary of his five or six pieces; and the critics told him that he plays worse than fifteen years ago, and by this time they are convinced he is a charlatan of the first order. The poor devil has now to atone for the folly, which both the public and critics committed in making a lion of him. They feel ashamed of having worshipped a false idol and now take revenge. Then the lion grows pensive and begins to reflect on his position, till he at last concludes to finish his erratic course and prepares him a home. If this thought prevails, we shall see him turn up again as the husband of a half decayed countess—or a princess even—himself a newly created baron and appointed chamber-virtuoso to her royal highness, the reigning grand-duchess of Reuss-Schleitz-Kimmelbach; which distinction was conferred upon him to raise him in some measure up to the level of his high-born bride. There are, however, many other forms, which he is likely to assume. He may come forth as publisher and dealer in sheet-music; or as the manager of an Italian opera company. But, not always does he succeed in suppressing his nomadic instincts. In that event we shall one day hear of him as concertising in remote, half-civilized countries, among the antipodes, where he treats the semi-barbarians to the same five or six pieces with which he has made all cultivated nations disgusted. As China and Japan are now open to foreigners he will surely not wait very long to wend his way thither in the hope of being once more the petted lion and enjoy the Indian summer of his former triumphs.

The Organ.*

NINETEENTH STUDY.—CLASSIFICATION OF PIPES INTO REGISTERS, WITH A GENERAL DIVISION OF THE REGISTERS OR STOPS OF THE ORGAN.

We have done nothing as yet but examine the pipes. This prosaic name, "pipe," becomes singularly poetical when the sonorous bodies, ceasing to be regarded as isolated objects, are put together into those many distinct classes of homogeneous qualities of tone in which we find each of the influences we have last considered, such as scale, form and material, harmoniously blended one into the other. For then, each of the various classes of pipes occupies an important place in the musical system of the divine instrument, and takes a new name, that of a register, or stop. The organ, considered as a mass of pipes, without division or classification amongst them, may be compared to a chrysalis, a creature shut up within a case, and without any apparent powers of acting,—it takes its wings and begins to show signs of life as soon as it has got its registers.

The necessity of putting pipes of the same quality of tone upon the same register is so obvious, that it seems almost superfluous to mention it. If, first of all, an open pipe, wood or metal, were put upon the sound-board, and then next to it a reed-pipe, so that in putting down the note C E G on the key-board, a wooden flue-pipe would speak; and in putting down the note D next to it, a reed-pipe would speak, and so on indiscriminately, and by jerks as it were throughout the register, without any regard to different qualities of tones, it is but too evident that the result would be an unendurable concert of ill-matched voices, even though the notes followed one another in the proper order of the scale. One pipe would emit a harsh sound, the next to it a weak, feeble sound; cries and sighs would be jumbled together, expressions of anger would be heard alongside tones full of a plaintive sweetness; in fact, there would be nothing but a series of sounds clashing one against the other, and each upsetting its neighbor in a way contrary to all right notions of musical unity and propriety.

The rule is, then, to put as many pipes of the same quality of tone in each register as there are notes upon the key-board. If this is not always done, that is to say, if there are not always as many pipes in a series of the same quality of tone as there are notes upon the key-board, this is because, in some cases, if pipes of the same quality were carried through the whole extent of the key-board, either above or below, the quality would become too feeble in volume in the upper notes, and too full in volume in the bass notes.

Each series of pipes of the same quality of tone is planted in a line upon the sound board, and each stop or register, for these tones are synonymous, obeys the action given to the small movable slide of wood, the mechanism of which has been already described. It is this slide, which is called a register, because it acts as a register or rule, to direct or control the wind in its way to the feet of the pipes. The same name is given to the knob which is fastened to it, and appears in front of the organ-case ready to the hand of the player. Upon this knob, or immediately under, is inscribed the label, which designates the special quality of tone that particular series of pipes will produce when, by means of this mechanical contrivance, the wind is brought into connection with them. If, for example, the player wishes to produce the effect of an orchestra, instruments of a bright and brilliant quality, he draws the knobs of the trumpet, the clarion, and the bombard, and he has at once upon his keyboard those stops or qualities of tone which, by their grand and solemn sounds, supply him with the effect he desires. If he wishes to produce the effects of sweet and soft-toned instruments, he pushes in these high-sounding registers and draws out the viol-da-gamba and stops with open pipes, wood or metal: and when the massive voice of the people intones that venerable plain chant, the origin of which may be traced up to the very first beginnings of Christianity, the player, who is the director of their song, draws out a number of stops which, combined together with a skill no less original than it is admirable, form, in fact, but one stop, under the common name of plein jeu. It is this stop which, while it calls to mind combinations in harmony the most ancient, is for this reason all the more suited to be the accompaniment to large masses of persons singing in unison.

The player, then, of the organ has at his disposal sounds of all kinds, and we can well understand how, for him as well as for the composer, it is most important he should have a profound knowledge of the resources which he has at his command, in order that he may know how to use them with the best effect on every occasion, either separately as solo stops, or when all are combined together in full chorus.

From the above description of them we shall have no difficulty in recognizing those distinct classes of organ stops: 1. Open flue pipes, wood or metal, called also foundation stops; 2. Musical or mutation stops; 3. Reed stops, which the Germans also call loud stops, starken Stimmen.

* From L'Orgue, sa Connaissance, son Administration, et son Jeu, by Joseph Regnier.

Joseph Staudigl.

Born April 14, 1807. Died March 28, 1861.

(Continued from page 52.)

Staudigl enjoyed more especially a musical education. An innate taste for what is musically logical, and a zealous course of study for the improvement of his voice, were of the greatest service to him. He pleased, nay charmed, his audience by the unerring correctness of his musical accentuation, by the fervor of his musical declamation, by the well-calculated distribution and regular gradation of the various phrases and periods, by the unrivalled clearness of his musical exposition, and by his artistic repose, which nothing could disturb. He was, indeed, sometimes led away by the consciousness of possessing so fine a voice, and took undue advantage of it. He did not, it is true, go so far as to make the tone appear forced; but still, by dragging the time, merely to show off his own powers, he laid himself open to censure.

Staudigl neither possessed what is termed specific histrionic talent, nor was his education of such a kind as to enable him to make up for his early deficiencies by a course of after-study. His bearing was always slovenly; his dress was wanting in neatness and taste; and, indeed, his whole demeanor and appearance were marred by the absence of dignity and ardor. His features, although not without expression, could not express with sufficient rapidity any sudden change of feeling, any more than delicacy or tragic grandeur of soul; while, finally, his pronunciation always retained traces of the local Viennese dialect, disagreeable even in spoken dialogue. So many and such indisputable defects necessarily affected his performances in a highly prejudicial manner. He compensated, however, for a great deal by his remarkable power of conception and happy reproduction, which, partially resulting from instinct and partially wrung with great labor from adverse elements, was always realized in strictly musical outlines, admitting the dramatic element, so to say, only as a component part, among many others, of the musical expression.

The satisfaction given by almost each of Staudigl's impersonations, as a whole, as well as the greater or less musical perfection and the greater or less histrionic weakness of every separate part are readily explained by what has been said. Of his Figaro and Leporello, for instance, it might justly be asserted that the musical portion, taken by itself, was adequately rendered, while the attempt made to invest the parts with dramatic character was a failure. Leporello was a mere dull, stupid jester; while in Figaro, which Staudigl had studied with great care, and of which his conception was by no means incorrect, the subtlety or even sly keenness he intended to portray was never satisfactorily apparent. In the Italian barytone parts, such as Ashton in Lucia, Alfonso in Lucrezia, and Chevreuse in Maria de Rohan—which, yielding to that immoderate desire to sing which led him beyond the natural limits of his voice, he was fond of playing—the highness of the music sometimes prevented him from doing the latter full justice, while the outward bearing and appearance, which are of more account with Italian "tyrants" than the portrayal of inward motives, did not find a fitting representative.

But, while we see that characters partly of a subordinate description, and partly not adapted for Staudigl's artistic idiosyncrasy, were not represented in a completely satisfactory manner, his finest and most praiseworthy efforts were in far more difficult and important bass parts. Unfortunately, the restricted extent—which, it not increasing, is, at any rate, permanent—of our operatic repertory, limited Staudigl's field of action. It is, however, sufficient for us, if we would prove his excellence, to remind our readers of his Sarastro, Osmin, Rocco, Caspar, Jacob, Bertram, and Marcel. These were performances worthy even of a "dramatic" vocalist, parts on which the masters of old and new opera lavished their melodious treasures, and decked with grandly planned or delicately worked-out touches of character, parts which must be played, if due effect is to be given them. Now Staudigl gave them this due effect. Without any special histrionic powers, without a prepossessing personal appearance, but, on the contrary, with a great number of personal imperfections (already mentioned), he managed to present us with art-pictures, distinguished, as it is impossible to deny, for admirable conception and imposing, sure realization, the result of long and assiduous study. The effect he produced was grounded on a perfect knowledge of musical style, on an intimate acquaintance with the particular dramatic expression contained in melody and in musical compositions, and capable of being musically realized, as well as, lastly, on the consciousness that his task was a predominatingly, if not an exclusively, musical one.

Staudigl's own disposition, about which there was a certain mild phlegmatic character, naturally enabled him to appear with more advantage in the part of Sarastro than in any other part of his repertory. Anything lyrically sentimental also suited him, as is proved by the part of George in Bellini's Puritani. Even if we consider such comic characters as Osmin in Die Entführung, and Staudinger in the Waffenschmied, in opposition to those more delicately drawn, as being the ones best adapted to Staudigl's artistic taste, and therefore easier for him to play, there still remain the characters previously mentioned, as well as many others, the execution of which is beset by the most varied difficulties, and yet which were never so magnificently played by any one as by him. Thus, for instance, there was, in the first place, his Rocco, a wonderful conception, carried out, to the very finest touches of character, despite his defective pronunciation, with a degree of dramatic roundness and finish no actor could ever surpass, and that too with the most scrupulous and unvarying regard for the correct musical intonation; there was his Marcel, a fine picture of a bluff, good-hearted man; there was his Caspar, and there was his Bertram, both unmistakably, and yet so differently, marked by the demoniacal element. In Caspar we behold keen but vulgar wickedness; even the short passage, "Nur ein keckes Wagen ist's, das Glück erringt," was alone sufficient to prove Staudigl a master of dramatic singing, not to mention his rendering of the wild and boisterous drinking song or of the stormy vengeance-air. In Bertram, on the other hand, the supernatural character of the gloomy knight, though marked with great clearness, was never degraded into the likeness of a demon of melodrama. Staudigl gave great prominence to the knightly element, to which he imparted, by a certain air of crafty observation, a coloring obtained by no other representative of the art, not even excepting the wildly-genial Formes. Cool and temperate, but not the less deeply cutting, was the irony, the bold and deliberate contempt for every bitter feeling, while the boisterous passion, by which Bertram is distinguished from a mere cold and negative Mephistopheles, was brought out with fearful energy. But the distinguishing mark, and the peculiar excellence of this impersonation—an excellence, by the way, which can never be sufficiently praised—consisted in the fact that the dramatic accent was never strongly marked at the expense of the musical intonation, but that, on the contrary, the magnificent whole—as we cannot too often repeat—sprang naturally from a thorough comprehension of the musical exigencies of the part. Proofs of this are afforded by nearly every separate passage in it; for instance, "Ich lache," then "Robert, ja, dich lieb' ich mehr als mein Leben," and, above all, the unrivalled "Du hast's gewollt, du zarte Blume," &c.

Was it not by the irresistible power of fine singing that Staudigl charmed all opera-goers, as Edmund in Nicolai's Heimkehr? The assumption of this part—which, as the first step to Staudigl's unfortunate mania of singing music distressingly high for him, was certainly a most fatal one—proved indiscribably effective, on account of the dash and spirit he infused in it. Was it not the same power of song which enabled him to create so energetic an impersonation out of Rossini's Tell? We might name other parts; but our consideration of Staudigl as a histrionic singer has already led us very far, and we have still to speak of him viewed in a different light.

That Staudigl should, from time to time, have undertaken to instruct vocal aspirants, is simply a proof of his good nature. His lessons were never lucrative. His imitators, too, have not been fortunate, with the sole exception of the dilettante and Imperial vocalists, Panzer, who really has something of the master about him.

Staudigl was invariably most unfortunate in all operatic matters with the guidance of which he was mixed up. At any rate, the fact of his being stagemanager-in-chief could not effectually check the failure attendant on Pokorny's laudable speculation, which began so brilliantly. As a member of the committee at the Kärntnerthor Theatre, in 1848, he manifested the most active zeal without much greater success: while, as stage manager-in-chief there, under Holbein, he certainly reaped no laurels, although, as is usual in such regions, it was impossible to find out what the stage manager might do, as well as what he really had done and had neglected to do.

Staudigl was always distinguished for his talent as a singer of sacred music—as distinguished, at least, as the partially defective management and organization of the Imperial Chapel at Vienna would allow him to be. His thorough musical education proved here of great use to him, and he was far from paying any respect to the tolerably general prejudice that sacred music should be sung without expression.

This last remark calls to our remembrance the admiration universally and justly entertained for Staudigl as an oratorio-singer. In the concert-room the singer, in his black dress-coat, with his music in his hand, together with the narrative form in which recitative runs, all necessitate a kind of expression somewhat different from that employed in the operatic style. When, however, narrative rises to animated description; when prayer assumes a more than ordinarily pressing and urgent tone; when some deeply-moving situation is depicted, and music is to be the interpreter of the singer's continually-changing emotions, a greater amount of vivacity in words and tone, and a highly dramatically-objective expression, properly so called, may be justifiable even in oratorio. The most reassuring guarantee that Staudigl would, in most cases, not overstep the proper limit, was afforded by his own moderation as an individual. It is therefore far from astonishing that many persons should maintain that oratorio was more especially suited to his talent; but in saying this, and in awarding more than due praise to the oratorio-singer, they were plainly guilty of injustice to the theatrical singer. It was more especially in oratorio that his mode of delivering recitative showed how much of his inspiration he drew from the exciting influence of the stage.

After oratorio comes the concert-room, with its airs, its ballads and its songs of all sorts—an endless field in which much that is good is mixed up with a great deal that is worthless and absurd. For a long series of years did Staudigl labor in this branch of his profession; and our sketch would be incomplete if, after having described the histrionic singer, as well as the master in the sacred and semi-sacred style, we were not also to mention the world-renowned song singer (Liedersänger). In his mode of singing songs, we again come across all the good qualities and some of the defects we have already mentioned, namely, beauty of tone, correctness, warmth of expression, and clearness of exposition, but at the same time touches of the Viennese dialect a partial dragging of the time, for the purpose of showing off his voice. His conception was certain, intelligent, and calculated for dramatic effect, such as was not adapted, perhaps, to the alla camara expression of the "Lied," taken in its original acceptation, but admirably suited to the enlarged proportions which it has now assumed.

There was sometimes, it is true, just cause for complaint that, in the choice of the songs as well as in the other details of his professional labors, Staudigl was not sufficiently penetrated by true artistic feeling, but, on the other hand, we must, in mere justice to him, recollect that the period when his powers were in their prime was the period of "virtuosity," a period when our musically-renowned Vienna was in a state of musical incapacity. Had Staudigl, whose mind was for five years plunged in darkness, been able to take part in the great change for the better which came over musical matters during the years of his affliction, it is very certain that he would have valiantly aided in rebuilding the new temple of music in Vienna; for, though he had undoubtedly sung rubbish enough in his day, he not only sang good music well, but was fond of singing it, and greatly pleased whenever he had an opportunity of doing so.

John R. Paine, the American Organist.

The Berlin Voss'sche-Zeitung, of April 21st, contains the following notice of a young organist and composer, with whose name the readers of the Journal of Music have already been made acquainted:

If now-a-days more than one of our organ-players of no small pretensions would tremble at the thought of being tested by Mattheson's 'Exemplarischer Organistenprobe,' still there are some masters of the instrument before whom Mattheson redivivus would respectfully uncover his head. True, their number is small, and the harvest of young men in this, as in all fields where we seek pure musical talent, is remarkably thinly sown. So much the more gratifying is it, therefore, to find such a talent engaged, with hearty zeal and indefatigable practice, in acquiring thorough command of the grandest of instruments—that for which Sebastian Bach alone composed a series of works extensive enough to occupy an organist for life. And such a talent we found on Friday last in a young musician, John R. Paine, of Portland in the United States. He played before an invited audience a series of pieces by L. Thiele, Sebastian Bach, and Mendelssohn, in which he exhibited a perfect mastery over the mechanism of the instrument, and an almost equal power over the peculiar difficulties which make a satisfactory performance of Bach's works so rare an event. Mr. Paine's style is clear and smooth, and his pedal playing is superb. These qualities he exhibited in a marked degree in the first movement of Sebastian Bach's organ trio in G. To give the three voices (for two manuals and pedals) clearly and with equal individuality, and yet to produce them as a beautiful whole, and in the joyous character intended by Bach, is one of the most difficult tasks that can be given to the organist. Equally successful was the performance of the other pieces, especially Bach's fugue in G, the majestic character of which could not have been brought out with a more free and dramatic expression by any one except the very greatest masters.

Mr. Paine also exhibited himself as composer in the best light. He played variations of his own upon the Old Hundredth psalm tune, a choral in universal use in America (in England, too, for that matter) and concert variations upon Haydn's Austrian Hymn. These pieces were so happily laid out in form that their interest constantly rose to the close; they proved his sound contrapuntal knowledge; his great taste in the combination of the stops of various color; and the author's possession of a fine fancy, from which much may be hoped and expected. In but a passage or two—in the first and second variations upon the choral—did it seem to us that Mr. Paine had not yet fully emancipated himself from the school. As we learn, he is a pupil, both on the organ and in counterpoint, of our unsurpassable organist and contrapuntist, A. Haupt. Hence we the more rejoice to greet in this young foreigner, who, now returning to his native land, will be a proof equally distinguished and honorable of the high state of German (musical) art, and the greatness of one of that art's ablest representatives.

Mr. Paine is at present in London, and we learn will soon be furnished with an opportunity of appearing before a London audience, both as an executant and as a composer.

EASTER CELEBRATIONS AT BETHLEHEM, PA.—I want to tell you about the Moravian exercises during Passion Week which I had the pleasure of attending.

A distinguishing feature of the Moravian Cultus is the love of music which everywhere exhibits itself in the beautiful forms and ceremonies of their religion. Great pains is taken to form a correct musical taste, and the study of it is begun very early in life. Reared from infancy among the delightful associations of tone, enjoying the instructions of competent masters, and acquiring a knowledge of the productions of the best composers, they become able to separate the chaff from the wheat, and this accounts for the pure harmony that distinguishes the Moravian choral service. A great portion of their music was composed for the church and exists only in MSS. This is of the highest order, and is, for the most part, written in full orchestral score.

The exercises of Passion Week are very impressive, and attract great numbers of visitors from all parts of the country. They begin on the Sunday preceding Easter with a recital of that week's life of our Savior, beginning: "And as he went, a very great multitude spread their garments in the way, and others cut down branches off the trees, and strewed them by the way." This is continued throughout the week, the Acts of each day being read, and a number of beautiful German chorals are introduced at certain interesting points of the narrative, expressive of such sentiments as the congregation is supposed to feel.

The exercises on Good Friday are particularly interesting. On this day, some of the most solemn scenes of Holy Writ are passed in review and every remarkable passage in the sufferings of Christ is accompanied by a suitable hymn sung during the intervals. In the morning and afternoon the choir sang two fine anthems one of which was from Gregor, the other I was not familiar with, most probably one of their MS. selections. In the evening, the choir and the orchestra of the church rendered three of their German anthems in a most beautiful manner. The full-toned organ, the sweet, plaintive tones of the violins, the subdued melody of the flutes, the soft, dream-like obligato of that most beautiful toned of all stringed instruments, the violoncello, and the voices of the choir blending together so harmoniously, and according so perfectly, impressed me with feelings that I shall never forget.

On Saturday afternoon, the general Love Feast, was held, and printed odes, part in German, and part in English, were distributed throughout the congregation. As soon as the bell ceased ringing, a quartette of trombones began playing a number of chorals which floated through the air entrancing every listener. On this occasion the music performed were selections of the highest classical order. First, the Kyrie eleison from Beethoven's Mass in C; then a fine anthem "Holy Redeemer," by La Trobe; a selection from Spohr's "Last Judgment," and another very fine selection from their MSS.

On Easter morning at four o'clock the sweet tones of the trombones were heard greeting the sleeping and the sleeping inhabitants with an Easter choral. At half past four we were wending our way to the church where service similar to what I have already described was gone through with, until sun-rise, when the congregation, preceded by the orchestra, proceeded in procession to the grave-yard, where the Liturgy of the Resurrection was gone through with. Here was a scene not soon to be forgotten! The sun was just rising, and the little clouds floating about were streaked with faint rays of light. The robin and the lark were pouring forth their morning hymns, which was the only sound that disturbed the solemn stillness of the moment. Then the voices of all present accompanied by the orchestra, arose upon the air in hymn, while the impressive words of the Litany, and the outpouring of the harmonious themes to which the trombones are so well adapted, and the entire services, summoned up thoughts which will ever be held in remembrance.—Cor of Easton Times.

ANCIENT MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Our Paris correspondent writes:—"Among the instruments collected by M. Clapisson, and now purchased by the French government for the Museum of the Conservatory of Music, are many of great interest in an artistic and archæologic point of view. One of these is a harpsichord, with two key-boards, dated 1612, but the work of several artists and different epochs. The body of the instrument dates from Louis XIII.; the stand from Louis XIV.; contains panels by Teniers and Paul Baille. Among the spinets are an Italian one of the time of Louis XIV., with ornaments of engraved amber, and garlands of flowers, Cupids by Poussin; another, of the reign of Francis I., in ebony, richly inlaid with ivory, with the inscription Francisci Portalopis Veronen Opus, 1823; and a third, of the sixteenth century, in marquetry, the corners of the key-board being ornamented with carvatures exquisitely carved in box-wood.

"A small piano, made at Vienna, of the time of Louis XIV., in the form of a harp, has a sounding-board of gilt wood and Chinese lacquer, ornamented with Venetian looking-glass, beautiful paintings in Martin varnish, and inlaying of turquoises. Among the harps is one that belonged to the Princess de Lamballe, bearing her name inside; among the lyres, one which belonged to Garat, bearing his initials, and enriched with paintings by Prudhon. There are theorbs in ebony and ivory; guitars in tortoise-shell, ivory and marquetry; mandolines and mandores of all nations; odd-looking instruments played by turning a handle; violins of all dates and countries, several of them in tortoise-shell, beautifully inlaid; specimens of all sorts of string and wind instruments, showing the starting point and gradual progress of the instruments now used in orchestras.

"The collection also contains a numerous gathering of nondescript instruments of various style and form, many of them of a most extraordinary character, showing how much abortive industry has been devoted to the endeavor to create new species of musical instruments. Immense patience and research have been employed by the collector in getting together the assemblage, unique in its way, and of great value to those who make a study of the history of music."—N. Y. Eve. Post.

WHAT MAKES THINGS MUSICAL.—"The Sun!" said the Forest. "In the night I am still and voiceless. A weight of silence lies upon my heart. If you pass through me, the sound of your own footstep echoes fearfully, like the footfall of a ghost. If you seek to break the spell, the silence closes in your own words, like the ocean on a pebble you throw into it. The wind sighs afar off among the branches, as if he were hushing his breath to listen. If a little bird chirps uneasily in its nest, it is silenced before you can find out whence the sound came. But the dawn breaks. Before a gray streak can be seen, my trees feel it, and quiver through every old trunk and tiny twig with joy; my birds feel it, and stir drowsily in their nests, as if they were just murmuring to each other, 'How comfortable we are!' Then the wind awakes, and tunes my trees for the concert, striking his hand across one and another, until all their varied harmonies are astir; the soft, liquid rustlings of my oaks and beeches make the rich treble to the deep plaintive tones of my pines. Then my early birds awake one by one, and answer each other in sweet responses, until the sun rises, and the whole joyous chorus bursts into song to the organ and flute accompaniments of my evergreens and summer leaves; and in the pauses countless happy insects chirp, and buzz and whirl with contented murmuring among my ferns and flower-bells. The sun makes me musical," said the forest.

What makes things musical.—"Storms!" said the Sea. In calm weather I lie still and sleep, or, now and then, say a few quiet words to the beaches I ripple on, or the boats which glide through my waters. But in the tempest you learn what my voice is, when all my slumbering powers awake, and I thunder through the caverns, and rush with all my battle-music on the rocks, whilst, between the grand artillery of my breakers, the wind blows its wild trumpet-peal, and the waters rush back to my breast from the cliffs they have scaled, in torrents and cascades, like the voices of a thousand rivers. My music is battle-music. Storms make me musical," said the sea.

What makes things musical.—"Suffering!" said the Harp-strings. "We were dull lumps of silver and copper-ore in the mines; and no silence on the living, sunny earth is like the blank of voiceless ages in those dead and sunless depths. But, since then, we have passed through many fires. The hidden earth-fires underneath the mountains first moulded us, millenniums since, to ore; and then, in these last years, human hands have finished the training which makes us what we are. We have been smelted in furnaces heated seven times, till all our dross was gone; and then we have been drawn out on the rock and hammered and fused, and, at last, stretched on these wooden frames, and drawn tighter and tighter, until we wonder at ourselves, and at the gentle hand which strikes such rich and wondrous chords and melodies from us—from us, who were once silent lumps of ore in the silent mines. Fires and blows have done it for us. Suffering has made us musical," said the Harp-strings.

ANALYSIS OF BIRD-MUSIC.—A correspondent, whose letter is dated "Oak Valley, Mid-Mare," has favored us with a long and pleasant account of the aspects of nature in the spring time, as they appear around him, from which we are happy to give the following extract. The remainder of his letter would hardly be appreciated in a political and commercial newspaper like the New York Evening Post:

"The golden day is past. Another opens, untired with its new future. It bears the product of its predecessor—the birds which the 'sweet south' brought on its golden wing. Do the birds arrive at night? for we behold them first in the morning, though I have seen thrushes arrive at nightfall. It may be they escape our notice, which, in the morning, is attracted by their singing. And they seem not to regard the fatigue consequent upon their long flight; but, true to their industrious instinct, chime the note of arrival at the first peep of dawn. I thus became aware of the presence of the blue-bird, whose song was the first sound that fell upon my ear early in the morning, half mingling with my dream ere I was well awake. It had just arrived, the old familiar note—faint, not from fatigue, but the tranquility of the bird's nature seen also in its flight. It is a spiritual bird, with a celestial hue, warbling in our springs, and building often about the habitations of men, seeking a home in the ark of the martin, which it enchants with the circles of its gentle flutterings.

"All welcome the birds. The first messenger note springs a thrill of joy in the winter-bound heart. Childhood leaps up at the sound; the maiden elaps her hands; and age feels its youth at the accustomed surprise.

"Different from the blue-bird is the phœbe, a plain domestic, with its dual note, yet piping the cheeriest of any, because bearing the happiest burthen in its song, 'Spring day! spring day! spring is coming!'

"One thing I have always observed with pleasure—it is the variety in the bird choir. No two species sing alike—none badly. Take your position in a grove or meadow, and mark the tone—which gives you the character of the bird—and see what diversity there is in that. You can see a resemblance to words in some notes. The happiest expression is on the wing; the most plaintive on water. We love a bird best when it sings among grasses and in the shrubs and tree branches, or in deserted dwellings—at least the pensive-minded and the meek do. Some birds seek an elevated position to sing—the groundbird its stake; the robin its tree; the bobolink sings every where, in the grass, upon a twig of slender reed, but most rapturous on the wing. The crow is a music-spoiler; he has no devotion in his song, no uplifting of the bill, but a rapacious cry for plunder.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—It was no wonder that the revival of I Puritani (April 20th) should create excitement among the frequenters of the opera. There were many reasons. Signor Tiberini in Arturo was to essay his second part, one indeed, in which Rubini alone, of all tenors, had made a lasting impression, although Signor Mario looked and acted the cavalier nobleman infinitely better. Mad. Tiberini-Ortolani, too, was to make her first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera in Elvira; and Herr Formes, after several years' absence, again to exhibit his splendid voice and dramatic talents in the part of Giorgio—undertaken for the first time, we believe. No wonder, then, that the stalls were anxious and the boxes eager. Another cause of attraction might be cited in Signor Ronconi, who resigned his old part of Giorgio, the music of which was too low for him, for that of Riccardo, in which he was perfectly suited, and felt at his ease. So much for expectation. The performance, if it fell something short of what was anticipated, was excellent in the main. Signor Tiberini sang even more skillfully, and exhibited a more thorough command of his voice as Arturo than as Ferdinando. His singing in the quartet, "A te, o cara," was in its way perfect; and in the duet, where the Puritan Colonel stops Arturo, as he is about to effect the escape of the Queen, he exhibited the finest declamatory powers and a largeness of style for which we had not given him credit. It seems, however, that Signor Tiberini could not have been in his best voice on Saturday, as he evaded the high passages in the aria, "Ella e tremante," in the last scene, whereby he disappointed sundry of his admirers. He made amends, nevertheless, at the second performance on Tuesday, and sang the famous passage of Rubini with infinite ease and perfect intonation. The debutante, wife of Signor Tiberini, is, no doubt, as our readers have guessed, the lady-like and light-voiced Mlle. Ortolani, who so much pleased the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre some few years since in this very part of Elvira, creating quite a fièvre in the polacca, "Son vergin vezzosa," and winning distinction by her skill, both as vocalist and actress. Mlle. Ortolani is not Crisi nor Bosio, but herself, and will doubtless do the theatre real service in many characters for which she is well suited. Her voice still vibrates as of old, but she has gained strength or facility, and betokens decided improvement. In places where she had not to form her notes, such as the opening movement of the aria, "Qui la voce," and some cantabile bits in the first finale, she sang charmingly and with much grace, and won universal praise. Herr Formes had been laboring under indisposition for some days previously, and was hardly up to the mark. He showed, nevertheless, that the power and depth of his voice remained unimpaired by his transatlantic trip, and that his energy and feeling were as striking and superabundant as ever. Indeed it was generally remarked that the voice of the great German bass was more rounded and mellowed by time, a matter of congratulation to his numerous admirers. The music of Giorgio is not quite in Herr Formes' line, nor does it lie altogether within his register, his voice being far deeper than that of La, blache. His finest efforts were in the duet with Elvira (act 1, sc. 2), and the grand duet with Riccardo. "Suoni la tromba," in which he and Signor Ronconi declaimed so vociferously that they might have been heard—if not quite at Bologna, as Rossini wrote of Tamburini and Lablache, but at Boulogne. Signor Ronconi is more at home in Riccardo than in Giorgio which we are glad to see he has resigned, as the music was too low for him. His performance of Riccardo is a remarkable one, historically speaking, the best by far since Tamburini, and the music of Bellini is thoroughly congenial to his real Italian style and method.

After the opera Mlle. Salvini appeared in the ballet divertissement, Les Amours de Diane, and achieved great success in sundry striking and original pas.

The first performance of Rossini's Guillaume Tell, which was to have taken place on Thursday night was postponed until Monday, in consequence of the indisposition of M. Faure.

GRISI AND MARIO.—The report that these popular singers have rejoined the Royal Italian Opera, is now verified.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Twenty hearings would not suffice to make the general public thoroughly comprehend a work so extraordinary as Beethoven's Mass in D, which was repeated on Friday week. To the Society especial thanks are due for affording an opportunity of hearing a composition so little known, or likely to be known, its difficulty and exceptional style placing it beyond the means of any other body of executants. While protesting against the alterations that have been effected (having unbounded faith in Beethoven) we must compliment Mr. Costa for the energy and perseverance conducting to a result so highly satisfactory. Band and chorus entered thoroughly into their task, and as the Missa Solennis has twice attracted an attendance in no way inferior in number to the crowds who usually flock to the better known masterpieces, we have but little doubt but that the next season it may be repeated, and eventually become familiarised to the public, although it can never be as well known as the oratorios of Handel or Mendelssohn. Mads. Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, with Messrs. Sims Reeves and Lewis Thomas were again the soloists. Handel's Israel in Egypt is announced for next Friday.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The fourth concert, on Monday, April 29th, was attended by the largest audience of the season. The selection was as follows:—

PART I.—Sinfonia in C minor, No. 1 (Mendelssohn); Aria, "Un'aura amorosa," Cosi Fan Tutte (Mozart); Solo, contrabasso (Mayseder); Overture in C major (Beethoven).

PART II.—Sinfonia in F, No. 8 (Beethoven); Recit. and aria, "Thus my cherish'd love," Jessonda (Spohr); Concerto, violin, in A minor, No. 5 (Molique); Duetto Il Conte Ory (Rossini); Overture, Anacreon (Cherubini). Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett.

A column might be written about such a programme, more especially as the general character of the performance was quite on a par with its variety and excellence. Nevertheless, our crowded space will admit of but very few remarks. Mendelssohn's symphony was played to perfection. Additional interest was attached to this, as the work which first introduced its composer to the Philharmonic Concerts, and, indeed, to England. It is one of the freshest and most vigorous of his earlier productions; and, though classed in his own catalogue as "Symphony No. 13," the first of his published symphonies for the orchestra. Thus, among other things withheld by those who have the superintendence of Mendelssohn's MSS., there are no less than 12 symphonies, any, or all of which, if only half as good as the one in C minor, should be brought to light forthwith. The scherzo, as it now stands, is an abridgement of that belonging to the famous octet arranged expressly for the Philharmonic Society, and a clear foreshadowing of the magical fairy music in A Midsummer Night's Dream. The execution of Mendelssohn's symphony; of that of Beethoven in F—the bridge that conducts from the "second" to the "third" style of the great "Tone-poet;" of the overture in C major (Op. 115) by the same master (for which again the musical world is indebted to the Philharmonic); and of Cherubini's familiar dramatic prelude, were further proofs of the judicious discipline exercised by Professor Bennett, and of the highly efficient materials he has to work with. The palmist days of the Philharmonic—when it stood "alone in its glory"—could hardly furnish an instance of a more admirable performance than that of the symphony in C minor.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The programme of the eighteenth concert, in the instrumental part, was taken from the works of Mendelssohn, and included—quintet in B flat (executants, MM. Vieuxtemps, Ries, Doyle, Schreurs and Piatti); Presto Scherzando, in F sharp minor, for pianoforte alone (Mr. Charles Hallé at the instrument); grand sonata in D major (op. 58), for pianoforte and violoncello (played for the first time); and (also first time of performance) the players being Mr. Charles Hallé, M. Vieuxtemps, Mr. Webb and Signor Piatti. After the sonata, Mr. Charles Hallé and Signor Piatti had to appear on the platform. A finer specimen of the master than that with which the concert closed could not have been presented, and few left their seats until the last notes of the quartet in B minor had finished. The grand air "In diesen hel'gen Hallen," from the Zauberflöte, and a song from Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, displayed to advantage the deep and powerful voice of Herr Hermanns, who appeared at these concerts last season.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Mlle. Titiens, who made her first appearance as an oratorio singer, created something much stronger than a merely favorable impression, her début being a complete success. Mlle. Titiens is a mistress of the art of enunciation, her words being clearly articulated and correctly accented, which is so much the more noticeable as her experience of our language must be necessarily limited. With the power and quality of Mlle. Titiens' voice the public is already familiar, and we have no doubt that in the new line she has chosen the German songstress will become as great a favorite as she is on the lyric stage. To attempt any description of Mr. Sims Reeves's singing in The Creation would be superfluous; suffice it that he was in magnificent voice throughout,—that he sustained the whole of the tenor music by which the oratorio was a decided gainer, and that his delivery of the recitative "In splendor bright," and the air "In native worth," was wholly irreproachable, while in the concerted music his voice rang out with a clearness and beauty that charmed all hearers. In the first and second parts Herr Formes contributed his services as principal bass, and the value of so splendid an organ and so weighty a style of delivery, may be easily imagined. To Mad. Rudersdorff and Mr. Stanley fell the music of our first parents (Part III.), and both were in the highest degree satisfactory. After the oratorio the national anthem was sung, Mlle. Titiens taking the first and last solo verses. The duet between the barytone and bass (Mr. Santley and Herr Formes) in the other verses, was beyond our comprehension. There were 13,000 present.

THE SISTERS MARCHISIO.—The gifted and celebrated sisters Carlotta and Barbara Marchisio, after the great sensation they have created in Paris, are achieving a series of brilliant triumphs in the French provinces and in Belgium. We find in the Brussels journal, L'Independance Belge, accounts of the début of both sisters in that city. They first appeared in the Sonnambula, Mlle. Carlotta sustaining the character of Amina, while Mlle. Barbara, with a true artistic feeling, supported her sister by taking the secondary part of the heroine's mother, to which she gave new interest and importance. Their next appearance was in the Trovatore, in the characters of Leonora and Azucena, in which last part Mlle. Barbara produced an immense effect by her powerful acting, her beautiful contralto voice, and her perfect style and execution. The above journal describes the public as being enchanted, and says that there never had been such a performance of this opera in Brussels.—Illustrated London News.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, MAY 3, 1861.—A pamphlet has just appeared entitled Richard Wagner et Tannhäuser à Paris. It is by Charles Baudelaire the translator of Edgar A. Poe's works. It seems to be a defence of the German composer against the ungenerous attacks of French press. If it possesses more than the mere merit of a propos I shall speak of it later.

The musical season is drawing to a close, the Conservatoire has given its last concert. The fragments of the Dannation de Faust by Hector Berlioz are spoken of as having attracted much attention.

At the Italiens Mad. Penco has appeared as Norma; no novelties are spoken of either here or at the Grand Opera, which continues to give the Huguenots.

At the Opera Comique we have had Salvator Rosa, represented for the first time last Tuesday, April 30. This is an opera in three acts by Duprato, words by MM. Eugène Grangé and Henri Trianon. The libretto presents a charming series of incidents, it is in itself a touching piece worthy of the composer. The artist who contributed to the success of Salvator Rosa were, Crosti, Warot, Lemaire, Nathan, Paliati, Madame Lemercier and Mad Saint-Urbain.

It is to be remarked that of late three pieces of 1832 have been revived. Of these one is well known to the American public, La Tour de Nesle is rather more known in the United States than in France though it always enjoyed great popularity. The piece is given at the Porte Saint-Martin with the display of scenery that may be expected from this stage for fairy spectacles. There is a slight change even to admit of all the prestige of scenery. There is a solemn entry of the king into the old, old streets of his good city of Paris. He is on horseback under a dais between the Queen and Buridan, also on horseback. The people follow in crowds, there are soldiers and a numerous cortege.

It is a lesson in the history of the middle ages. The provost of Paris, the various guilds, the university corps, the Parliament, the peers of the realm with their pages—all with their respective emblems form a curious, entertaining spectacle. The clarions sound, the King, surrounded by his court takes his seat, the stage presents a most picturesque group when suddenly other men and women rush in, mariners from the port de la Grève, who, with more beauty than art-truth execute a charming ballet. In this appear Epinosa and Mad. Montplaisir. Beyond this La Tour de Nesle in the drama as we all know it. At the especial wish of M. Gaillardet, the name of Alexander Dumas figures as collaborateur.

Of other old dramas may be mentioned Atar Gull which has met with a legitimate success. The Furberailles de l'honneur by M. Aug. Vaquerie of which I mentioned the failure has given rise to several pamphlets on the present state of the dramatic art in France. It is expected that M. Vaquerie's piece will be presented again at the Odeon under more favorable circumstances. F. B.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 25, 1861.

Soiree of the Pierian Sodality and Harvard Glee Club.

We had the honor of an invitation to this soiree, which took place at Lyceum Hall in Old Cambridge on Thursday, May 16.

1. War Song.....Kucken
2. Pether Waltzes.....Lanner
3. Topper's Glee.....Zelter
4. Serenade. (Quartette).....Mendelssohn
5. Symphony—Piano Quartette—Adagio Caotabile—Andante Miuetto—Finale Allegro.....Haydn
6. Soldier's Love.....Kucken
7. Hark above us.....Kreutzer
8. Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
9. Parting. (Quartette).....Otto
10. O wert thou.....Kucken
11. Andante, from Symphony No. 7.....Haydn
12. { Serenade.....Kreutzer
- { Chapel.....Eisenhofer
13. L'Etoile du Nord. (Quadrilles).....

The programme was, with one exception, made up of German pieces, the audience of a majority of young ladies and gentlemen. Both went very well together. The audience admired the Germans (next to the performers of course) and the Germans (we can speak for one of them at least, whom we know to have been present) admired both the audience and the performers. Mutual admiration-society, is it? Well we confess, we do admire youth. "In juventute delectus." There is something refreshing and fascinating in youth and we enjoyed the delightful influence.

The Glee Club was especially happy in its selections and was encored after every piece if we remember rightly. And right well did they acquit themselves both in their pieces on the programme and those sung in answer to the enthusiastic calls for more. The Pierians would have increased the effectiveness of their performances by altering their instruments to a pitch somewhat more uniform. However, their pieces were well practiced together and played with spirit. They also received several encores. The liberality of the Glee Club was manifested by a medley of patriotic and other airs, "thrown in" after the 13th number of the programme. Altogether it was a festive and gay evening, furnishing new evidence that the liberal Arts still furnish at our venerable yet ever young Alma Mater, and that there are some at least among her sons who beside their other studies find time and inclination to devote themselves to the production of the "sweet concord of sounds."

May the PIERIAN SODALITY and the GLEE CLUB continue to flourish. *†

MRS. J. H. LONG'S CONCERT.—A concert complimentary to this lady was given on Saturday evening last at the rooms of Messrs. Hallett & Davis. Mrs. KEMPTON and Miss WHITEHOUSE assisted with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and Mr. CARL PETERSILEA as pianist. Mrs. LONG was in unusually fine voice, so, too, were Mrs. Kempton and Miss Whitehouse, and the vocal portions of the programme were admirably rendered by the three ladies. We regret not to have heard the first part of the programme, but learn that Mr. Petersilea performed very creditably the Sonata by Weher. Liszt's Concerto Paraphrase requires a degree of power and unerring facility beyond what he yet possesses. A large audience was in attendance. The following is the programme:

PART I.

1. Quartette, in E flat.....Mozart
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
2. Aria, "Ah mon fils".....Meyerbeer.
Mrs. Long.
3. Grand Sonata in C, op. 24. (first time).....Weber.
Carl Petersilea.
4. Song, "Ye merry birds".....Gumbert.
Mrs. Kempton.
5. Duo, "Fra Queste Braccia".....Donizetti.
Mrs. Long and Miss Whitehouse.
6. Ballad, "Tyrolienne".....Haas.
Mrs. Long.

PART II.

7. Trio, "On the Ocean".....Concone.
Mrs. Long, Mrs. Kempton, and Miss Whitehouse.
8. Canzonetta, from Quartette in E flat.....Mendelssohn.
Quintette Club.
9. Duet, from "Giuramento".....Mercadante.
Mrs. Long and Mrs. Kempton.
10. Two Part Song, "The Wanderer".....Franz Abt.
Mrs. Kempton and Miss Whitehouse.
11. German Song, "Farewell, Good Night".....Kucken.
Mrs. Long.
12. Concerto Paraphrase, on Mendelssohn's Wedding
March and Fairy Dance.....Liszt.
Carl Petersilea.

CAMBRIDGE.—The detachment of the battalion of the College students now on guard at the State Arsenal embraces some of the best of the singers of the college, who make the neighborhood resound on these pleasant moonlight nights with the brightest of the gems of German song. The Turkish Drinking Song, Integer Vita, the Sword Song, and other choice pieces for men's voices, including many of Mendelssohn's four-part songs, we have heard admirably sung there in a style that would do no discredit to the famous Orpheus Club. It is pleasing to observe the steady progress of the art of Music in the University, since it has become a regular study, and no little credit is due to the efforts of Mr. L. P. Homer, the instructor in this department.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—Our city and suburban readers will not forget the concert of this evening, which commences the new series of evening concerts. The programme is an excellent one.

New Publications.

The ATLANTIC MONTHLY for Juue. Ticknor & Fields.

Contents: Agnes of Sorrento; Greek Lines; The Rose enthroned; A bag of meal; Napoleon the Third; Concerning things slowly learned; American Navigation; Denmark Vesey; New York Seventh Regiment; Army Hymn; The Pickens and Stealins Rebellion; Recent American Publications.

The April number of the LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW has been sent us by Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co.

Contents: 1. Pearls and Mock Pearls of History.

2. Euphuism; 3. Lord Dundonald; 4. Spiritual Destitution in the Metropolis; 5. German, Flemish, and Dutch Art; 6. African Discovery; 7. Lord Stanhope's Life of Pitt; 8. Indian Currency, Finance and Legislation; Iron Manufacture. These are published by L. Scott & Co., New York, at $3, or all the four great English Quarterlies and Blackwood's Monthly for $10.

Musical Chit-Chat.

TANNHAUSER IN PARIS.—Tannhäuser, the modern German Opera, par excellence, has suffered a most decided defeat at the hands of the Paris public. Notwithstanding the august presence of both Emperor and Empress during the first two representations, the genteel audience manifested their disapprobation by vehement hissing, but principally by a merriment which to the author must have been very provoking. After the third performance which took place on a Sunday evening when the house is mostly filled by persons from the middle classes, who might reasonably be supposed to be unprejudiced, the piece was withdrawn. As the bonus of the author was stipulated at 500 francs for each performance, of which half went to the translator of the book, Mr. Wagner has realized the sum of 750 francs.

The reader will recollect that Tannhäuser was brought out at the express command of the Emperor. Rumor said it was the penalty which the Emperor had to pay to the Princess Metternich, wife to the Austrian ambassador, for a lost bet. The Princess showed herself, at any rate, a zealous partizan of her countryman. When the storm in the audience first broke out, she and her suite from a prominent box tried very hard to turn the tide. But it only caused the hissers to turn towards her. She left the theatre before the curtain fell. When she passed down the corridor, one of the marshals of France, meeting her, said, "Ah, Madame, to-night you have taken a most cruel revenge for Solferino." The story is good. The Frenchman says now, Je tannhause, instead of Je m'ennuie.

The Germans console themselves, as well they may, that France has never yet seen the greatness of Shakespeare, nor acknowledged the genius of Goethe and Schiller, nor understood Gluck, Mendelssohn, Weber, and Schumann, and is therefore not very likely to be charmed by an opera which, book and music, is at least as peculiarly Teutonic as Weber's Freischütz or Spohr's Jessonda. Besides, Wagner the writer had much damaged the cause of Wagner the composer. If Mr. Wagner, instead of heralding his views as the salvation of the lyric drama and his works as the beginning of a new musical era, claiming precedence of all the great masters whom France worship, if, instead of all this he had relied solely on the inherent power of his music, his opera might have fared better. To be sure, the legend of Tannhäuser, which to the German mind has deep significance and many fine poetic traits, has nothing fascinating to the Frenchman. It is the difference of nationalities more than anything else which will forever prevent the acceptance by the Paris musical public of the Tannhäuser as the great work which it really is.—Leipscic Signale.

HONOLULU.—The dilettanti of the Sandwich Islands have established a Philharmonic Society, which, not satisfied with rendering plain classical music, has gone into the grand opera business. Startling, as it may appear, Verdi's Trovatore has been performed in Honolulu. His majesty, Kamehameha, who fortunately possesses a very fine voice, took the role of Manrico, and his royal spouse filled that of the Gipsy Azucena.

MUSICAL SOIREE.—Last evening Mlle. Gabrielle de la Motte gave a musical soirée at her residence in Hancock Street, to which the parents and friends of her pupils, including several distinguished amateurs, were invited, forming a brilliant society. The programme was very interesting, consisting of a duet by Von Weber, nine solo compositions played by the youngest pupils of the school, Duet Sonata by Mozart, Nocturne by Gutmann, Allegretto and Moonlight Sonata by Beethoven, Allegro by Mendelssohn Home, Sweet Home by Thalberg, Nocturne by Chopin, Sonata Pathétique by Beethoven, and Duet by Von Weber. The performances of these difficult compositions by youthful pupils was a complete vindication of the excellence of the class system of piano-forte instruction which Mlle. Gabrielle de la Motte has been teaching in this city for the past five or six years. When we heard girls eight or nine years old, taught in classes, playing one of Weber's duets, and the solos which followed, and playing them well, and young ladies of from thirteen to sixteen interpreting with such intelligence, purity and vigor the other portions of the programme, we were more than satisfied with the results of a system which we have so often commended and advocated. The unequivocal approbation of the refined and competent critics who were present at Mlle. de la Motte's last soirée, justifies the confidence which the public have placed in her abilities, and guarantees her continued success.—Evening Transcript, May 17.

MUSIC IN LEGISLATIVE HALLS.—Music hath charms for our Legislature. A majority of the representatives have musical ears, good voices, and know how to tune them aright, either for the grand old chorals or the patriotic songs that are just now sung in halls and churches, on the streets and in the drawing-rooms, at work benches and in the schools. The members lifted up their voices yesterday forenoon, in melodious song, and again in the afternoon, after adjournment. They did the "Star Spangled Banner" in splendid style, as if the banner were advancing at a charging step upon the enemy; "America" was given grandly; "Old Coronation" majestically, and "Auld Lang Syne," as a closing exercise, soothingly. And why should they not sing, these legislators? Let them break forth in song. They have done good works for the old Bay State; they have endorsed the spontaneous uprising of the people; given a strong and willing helping hand to the government of the Union, and their aid, without stint or mercenary calculation, to uphold the honor of its flag.

The members review their labors with satisfaction; they look upon the mailed hand of the general government raised to strike all enemies to its peace, prosperity and integrity, and they see through the cloud that now envelopes us, peace once more establishing its benignant sway; returning prosperity and the hum of productive industry for the harsh notes of war. Do they not do well to sing, and make the old Representatives Hall vocal with their gladness, and the venerable cod which has overlooked the discussions of half a century, a participator in their joyful hopes for the future? If the "chivalry" are disposed to ridicule psalm singing Massachusetts, we bid them remember that the "Old Ironsides" of Cromwell, from whom some of us, at least are descended, were valiant in battle and "mighty men of war," notwithstanding that, before they engaged in the conflict they sang the psalms of David. Men who put their trust in God, the justice of their cause and keep their powder dry, are not to be encountered with impunity.—Atlas and Bee, May 23.

A HINT TO MUSICIANS.—See the effect of a long piece of music at a public concert. The orchestra are breathless with attention, jumping into major and minor keys, executing fugues, and fiddling with the most ecstatic precision. In the midst of all the wonderful science the audience are gaping, lolling, talking, standing about, and half devoured with ennui. On a sudden there springs up a lively little air, expressive of natural feeling, though in point of science not worth a half-penny. The audience all spring up, every head nods, every foot beats time, and every heart also; a universal smile breaks out in every face; the carriage is not ordered; and every one agrees that music is the most delightful, rational entertainment that the human mind can possibly enjoy. In the same manner the astonishing execution of some great singers has in it very little of the beautiful; it is mere difficulty overcome, like ropedancing and tumbling; and mere difficulties overcome, as I have before said, do not excite the feelings of the beautiful, but the wonderful.—Sydney Smith.

Had I children, my utmost endeavors would be to breed them musicians. Considering I have no ear, nor yet thought of music, the preference seems odd; and yet it is embraced on frequent reflection. In short, as my aim would be to make them happy, I think it the most profitable method. It is a resource which will last their lives, unless they grow deaf; it depends on themselves, not on others; always amuses and soothes, if not consoles; and of all fashionable pleasures it is the cheapest.—Horac Walpole.

Il Barbiere di Seviglia.

It is interesting to read the anecdotes of the first productions of celebrated works, the changes made in them in accordance with the experience of their first effects, and the manner in which they were received. We translate some of the incidents attendant upon the production of the now celebrated Barber of Seville.

The overture was originally composed in 1814, for Aureliano in Palmira, then changed to Elizabetta, regina d'Inghilterra, both of them serious operas, and was afterwards attached to the Barber.

The air which Bertha, the duenna, sings, is nothing but a Russian contra-dance, which was in vogue in Rome at that time. Rossini is said to have introduced it in compliment to a captivating Muscovite lady. Certain passages of this buffo air re-appear in the allegro, and in the fine cavatina of Malcolm in la Donna del Lago.

The motive of the allegro of the trio fine Zitti, zitti, is borrowed from the bass air sung by Simon, in Haydn's "Seasons." Simon sings it in C, while Rosina, Almaviva and Figaro sing it in F.

Signora Giorgi-Righetti mentions many circumstances regarding the first production of the opera which have the value of coming from one who shared in its performance. Sterbini was the author of the libretto, and when it was known that Rossini was to rewrite the work which Paisiello had made famous, his enemies endeavored to injure him by talking of it everywhere as a contemptible thing to do. This was the merest nonsense, as the lyrical dramas of Metastasio had all been, dozens of times set to music by as many composers. Paisiello was no stranger to these intrigues. A letter of his was shown to Rossini, in which he charged a friend of his in Rome to make every exertion to ensure its failure. However this may have been, on the day of its first representation at the Argentina, the enemies were at their post, and the friends, somewhat disheartened at the recent failure of Torvaldo, did not exhibit any great warmth of support. Signora Giorgi-Righetti says that Rossini was weak enough to allow Garcia, whose ability he greatly admired, to replace the air sung under Rosina's widow with a Spanish melody of his own; thinking that, as the scene was laid in Spain, this might give a local coloring to the work. But the public sentiment rendered this an unfortunate thing.

Almaviva's guitar had not been tuned, and Garcia had to tune it on the stage. A string broke, which the singer was obliged to replace; and in the mean time the laughter and hisses had become general. The song was foreign to the Italian taste, and was badly received, while the pit began to hum over Spanish fioritures. After the introduction came Figaro's cavatina. The prelude was at first listened to; but when Zamboni entered with another guitar, a shout of laughter went through the audience, and the hisses made such a noise that the aria was not to be heard. When Rosina appeared on the balcony, the public, who admired the lady, was ready to applaud her air; but when it heard only the words; Segui, o caro, deh segui così, they were the signal of a new outbreak. The duet of Almaviva and Figaro was accompanied by shouts and hisses, which completely drowned it; and the work seemed to be an utter failure.

Finally Rosina appeared and sang the cavatina, the youth, and beautiful voice of Signora Giorgi-Righetti, joined to the favor which she enjoyed among the Romans, combined to procure for her a brilliant success. Rossini arose from the piano, bowed, and turning to the cantatrice, said in a low voice:—"Oh natura!"—"You may give it your thanks," replied Signora Giorgi, "for without it you would never have left your seat."

But this happy moment was of short duration, for the hisses recommenced at the duet between Rosina and Figaro. All the hisses in Italy seemed to have met in the theatre, and the music was utterly lost in the noise they made. When the curtain fell, Rossini turned to the audience, shrugged his shoulders, and clapped his hands. The public was touched at this contempt for its opinion; but no mark of disapprobation was returned. It revenged itself at the second act, not a note of which could be heard. Rossini remained calm throughout, and left the theatre as quietly as though it had been the work of a stranger. When Garcia, Zamboni, Botticelli and Signora Giorgi-Righetti went to his rooms, after changing their dresses, to console him for his failure, they found him sound asleep.

The next day he wrote the beautiful cavatina Ecco ridente in cielo to replace Garcia's unfortunate air. Garcia sang it the same evening at the second performance. Rossini hastened to prune from his work everything which might be justly condemned, then went to bed and pretended to be sick, that he might not be obliged to officiate in the evening. The Romans went the second time with altered dispositions, and desired to hear the work to which they refused to listen the evening before. This procured the triumph of the composer; for it was impossible that a people so musical should not appreciate the beauties profusely spread through this delightful work. The silence of the audience was only broken this time by applause; still there was no enthusiasm. But the success grew at each representation, and finally became a transport of delight. In Rome, as elsewhere, there were connoisseurs who at once comprehended the merit of the work, and went to Rossini to compliment him on its excellence. This change of fortune and opinion did not astonish him; he was as sure of success on the evening of its first reception as he was a week after.

It is rather singular that the first representation of the Barber at Paris was a repetition of the Roman failure. The same cause produced the same effect; for Paisiello's work was there again opposed to that of Rossini. It is true that Mme. Ronzi de Begnis did not inspire the part of Rosina, for which she was not fitted. By a singular fancy, the public at once demanded Paisiello's Barber, and nothing could have more contributed to Rossini's success. Paër, who was troubled regarding the young rising maestro, Paër, director of the Théâtre-Italian, appeared to yield to the importunate request of the public, which, perhaps, he had instigated. He hastened to produce Paisiello's opera, not doubting of the success which awaited it; but the result was the opposite of what he expected. The traditional power of his music had lost its vitality; nobody knew how to sing it in its pristine simplicity. Besides this, the form was old-fashioned; there were too many airs and recitatives; concerted pieces were rare, and the instrumentation meagre. It was an utter failure. Rossini's work was resumed, and possessing, as it did, all the advantages which its rival lacked, it enchanted the whole public. Mme. Fodor had assumed the part of Rosina, and the representation was given with a perfection yet unequalled. Garcia and Mme. Fodor were the models of Almaviva and Rosina; Pellegrini, a gay, intelligent Figaro; de Begnis an excellent Basilio; Graziani, a vivacious and malicious Bartolo. To give an idea of Garcia in this rôle, which he made entirely his own, I will say that Rubini always seemed to me a mediocre Almaviva, when I remembered the bold, marked rounded accents of Garcia's full voice. Who can give us that sonorous avalanche of notes when the exasperated Count curses the unfortunate troupe of musicians:

Ah! maledetti andate via,
Ah! canaglia via di qua?

It was sublime!

(There must have been some trifling difference between such a performance and the buffoonery to which we Bostonians are accustomed in this scene.)

Rossini had written several portions of his opera, when Sterbini brought him several pages of verse. "There is considerable," said he, "for Figaro's entrance; but you can take what you want, and leave the rest. Rossini immediately began to hum as he read. "I will not suppress a verse, not a word," said he, "they shall all move to the clarinets." After a second reading, he sat down to the piano, and sang Largo ad factotum, with its instrumental coloring. "Bravo! perfect!" cried Sterbini. "Yes! that may be made into a pretty good cavatina. I will keep it a few days in my head, and give it a little polish, and write it out afterwards." "Not so! you shall write it out at once, just as it is. I want it just so. The diamond sparkles enough as it is. We must secure it for fear of losing it."

Like very many other chefs d'œuvre of the human mind, the Barber, unrecognized at first, depreciated and condemned, has become one of those universal favorites which never lose their charm and rank among the foremost efforts of musical genius.—Boston Musical Times.

A NEW NATIONAL HYMN.—A committee of prominent citizens of New York, consisting of Gulian C. Verplanck, Charles King, Hamilton Fish, George Wm. Curtis, Richard Grant White, Luther Bradish, John A. Dix, Moses H. Grinnell and others, announce that a prize of five hundred dollars will be awarded for a national hymn, which must be, not a war song, but purely patriotic; to consist of not less than sixteen nor more than forty lines, exclusive of a chorus or burden, which is regarded as essential, and to be of marked rhythm and popular melody. For the words and music from the same hand, five hundred dollars will be paid, or a gold medal of that value will be awarded. For the hymn alone, or for the music alone, (if original), two hundred and fifty dollars will be given.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Ah, do you still remember. F. Woolcott. 25

A very pleasing sentimental song, requiring but little range of voice and moderate practice on the piano.

The song of the absent one. Karl Reeder. 25

A melodious parlor song.

Love thy mother, little one. G. F. Root. 25

A cradle-song or lullaby of very simple construction, perfectly in accordance with its intent and purpose. Melody and harmony are nevertheless striking and show the clever pen that has written so many popular melodies.

On to the conflict, on! J. W. Turner. 25

One of the many soul-stirring songs which the impending war has given rise to. It will, no doubt, have a fair share of the patronage now bestowed on patriotic songs.

His hand upon the latch. R. Denton. 23

Charming words, describing the young wife's happy anxiousness while expecting the husband's return from his daily toil, until "his hand is upon the latch." The music is not less fine.

Instrumental Music.

America. Transcription. F. Beyer. 25

A full and telling arrangement of the National Anthem, "My country, 'tis of thee." It is one of the well-known and comprehensive collection of the National Airs of all Countries, edited by Beyer.

When the swallows homeward fly. Transcribed. Ad. Baumbach. 35

A fine arrangement with which the composer has evidently taken great pains. Its general excellence will ensure a large circulation for it notwithstanding the many arrangements of the same air which are now in the market.

Books.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES, with symphonies and accompaniments, by Sir John Stevenson, and characteristic words by Thomas Moore. With a portrait. Price, $1,50; in cloth, $2,50; cloth, full gilt, $3,00.

In a very neat, convenient, and durable form we have in this volume the fine old Melodies of Ireland wedded to the charming ballads which have, more than any other of his works, immortalized the name of Moore, and made it a familiar household word throughout the civilized world. There has been, and always will be, a peculiar charm about the music and the poetry of this work, and though the expression in reference to a new book, has become somewhat hackneyed that "no library is complete without it," we may venture to say, that used in connection with this elegant edition of "Moore's Melodies," it will come to each of our readers as a very truthful declaration. There are many editions of these Melodies published in this country, but this is the only one in which the words are accompanied by the music, and here we may mention that with Moore the words and the music are one. "So intimately," says an English writer, "were they united in his mind, that the sight of the songs crowded together in one volume unaccompanied by music notes inflicted on him positive pain."

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 478.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 9.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Charlatanism in Music.

II.

THE FASHIONABLE CONDUCTOR.—SKETCHED
BY BENDA.

This charlatan is of quite modern origin. His rise commenced with the decline of the classical school, which is now so much lamented. In proportion as the means were made the end, in proportion as external show and stunning noise took the place of true music,—our friend gained ground, till finally we see in him the personification of what may be called the clap-trap art. At present—thank Heaven!—he is still an exotic plant in America, but in feudal Europe, in the fashionable capitals, as Paris, Berlin, London, he is an institution, an indispensable ingredient to metropolitan high life. He ministers to the wants of the blasés, whom he feeds with musical confectionary, with polkas, gallops, or fragments from Italian operas. But this is not his object. According to his advertisements he gives cheap concerts with an orchestra of fifty performers—for the sake of improving the public taste! May be that the public taste is an object of his earnest solicitude; but in quite a different sense; for, surely, as soon as a better taste and judgment are diffused among the public they will no longer listen to his music. Our friend is too shrewd not to know this; therefore, he exerts himself to the utmost to keep the popular taste down. He is passionately fond of his baton, particularly as it affords him nightly an opportunity to glorify himself, to show himself off. A more self-conceited fool was never born. The show-bills announce in big letters that the concert this evening will be given under the personal direction of Monsieur le maître de chapelle. Though he is never missing; though he conducts every night in person, yet the public must be put in mind of the grand fact.

Now let us go to see him. The musicians are already at their desks waiting for the chief. There he comes! Look, how carefully his hair is curled! How matchless his cravat, his vest, his dress coat, in short, everything down to his patent-leather boots! He advances up to his stand. What a graceful bow! How pleasantly he smiles! (Believe it who may; it has often been said that many go to his concerts merely to see him make that capital bow). Presently he seizes the bâton, looks about him if the performers are ready and gives the signal to strike up.

Monsieur is too polite to conduct with his back turned to the audience, as small conductors do, who suppose their business to be alone with the players, and accordingly front the latter. Oh, no! This would not only imply a breach of etiquette but would mar the whole affair in many respects. The musicians are grouped so that he stands quite prominently out from among them, his front to the public, who now may enjoy the full unobstructed view of his glorious figure. The piece played is an opening march on operatic airs composed by the chapel-master himself. Monsieur fights the air terribly with his stick, throwing a savage glance now to the player on his right, now to that on his left, or behind him, who may be a little too slow or too fast. Anon he puts on an air of approval, he nods, he is pleased with the performance; he begins to smile; he looks as if he were moved by the music, as though he were lifted and carried along by the gentle waves of harmony. In fact, his face expresses far more than the music. It is finished. Monsieur throws down his baton and retires quite fatigued as it seems. He draws his embroidered and perfumed handkerchief—which he has his own way of displaying—to wipe the perspiration from his heated forehead. He then sits down on a sofa in the background of the stage, but so that he can see the audience and be seen by them; the latter is of infinitely more consequence. Occasionally he takes his lorgnette and eagerly looks about as if to search for some acquainted face. Of course, he takes it for granted that all present have come merely to see and admire him; especially the ladies, whose heads he supposes he has completely turned the wrong way.

The programme, made up of the highest kind of music, as intimated above, culminates in a grand potpourri, also arranged or composed by Monsieur himself. In this piece he has recourse to all sorts of mechanical contrivances in order to produce the most striking effects, from which it takes his auditors frequently a good deal of time to recover. The potpourri is to represent, musically, some scene or scenes from common life, as detailed on the programme. Sometimes it is a railroad catastrophe which is being unfolded to our ears. The train is ready to start. We hear the rushing of the escaping steam, the bell, the rattle and clatter of some dozen cars, dashing along with lightning speed. Suddenly the alarm whistle sounds, but too late; the catastrophe, a general smash-up, is inevitable.

At another time it is perhaps a chase to which Monsieur treats his listeners. The stag is flying by, the hounds are close behind him; and such capital barking! But the best joke is when he represented how light grew out of chaos. A few minutes before the commencement the gas is lowered so that an almost total eclipse reigns all over the house. The music begins with low, dissonant, long-drawn chords, resembling the growls of bears and wolves before supper. The audience seem fairly frightened, when, all of a sudden, a clear, full, triumphant major chord resounds, played by the whole body of instruments as loudly as possible,—and simultaneously with it—a great conductor!—appears the dazzling blaze of some three hundred restored gas flames. Thus it grew light.

While these jokes are passed off, which, as before observed, form the climax of his programmes, Monsieur is perfectly excited. Besides his baton he sometimes takes his foot, his head, or both his arms, to indicate the time. Occasionally he calls out in an angry voice to the drummer, or to the man who has charge of the barking machine, to play with more spirit. His chief attention, however, is directed to the audience; he is anxiously watching what effect tricks produce on them, expecting every moment that a storm of applause will break loose. And, indeed, he has not to wait very long before they give vent to their delight in the most vociferous acclamations. Yes, applause never fails him. He is firmly settled in the favor of his auditors. Both the public and the press extol him and promulgate his fame. He is called the prince of leaders, the Napoleon of conductors. But this shall not prevent us from opening their eyes and showing their pet to be in fact the prince of charlatans, the Napoleon of musical quacks. How such an individual comes to command an orchestra composed of the ablest performers, as they generally are, would be a puzzle, if we did not know that shrewdness, cunning, arrogance, impudence, recklessness and similar qualities, have frequently risen to a position which for true virtue it was impossible to obtain. He is indefatigable in aping the fashionable world. He employs as his hairdresser the first Parisian coiffeur, who counts his customers chiefly among lords and barons; and so in similar things. When, for instance, it has become the fashion among the aristocracy to learn Spanish, Monsieur quickly engages the most fashionable master of languages and learns Spanish too, and then takes good care to make it known among his friends.

Though most of his musicians are far better artists than himself, he treats them as if they were ten times his inferiors; he often rules as a despot, especially at such times as his receipts are good and he is able to pay them their salaries promptly, knowing that it is difficult for an orchestra performer to find lucrative employment. He places his men under heavy fines for any breach of good conduct, while he himself continually violates those rules. Thus, for instance, a member is fined so much for coming a few minutes too late to the rehearsals; but he, our Monsieur, is rarely if ever punctual and cares nothing if the whole orchestra are waiting for him ever so long. It has frequently happened that he has ordered a rehearsal to take place, say at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and the musicians were punctually each at his place; but where is our master, where is the conductor, where is Monsieur? A deputation is finally dispatched to his residence (at the most fashionable hotel in the city) to see what has befallen him; perhaps he may be sick. The deputation returns with the information that they found the master still resting on his laurels which he freshly gathered last night, where a new potpourri of his, with many new tricks, was performed. They found him still sleeping. On opening his eyes he told them he had been invited to a late supper at Lord Horse-neck's, and that, my Lord having urged him so much to drink he could not resist the temptation of taking a glass too much of his Lordship's choice wines and in consequence he felt terribly sick in his head and unable to rise.

On the other hand he has proved the most unscrupulous swindler, who instead of money has paid his musicians with promises, till, finally he has escaped to parts unknown, leaving some fifty young men looking in vain about for means to pay their board.

But the avenging Nemesis sometimes overtakes him when he is least aware of it. I have seen a whole orchestra rise as one man against such a charlatan conductor after they had patiently borne his despotic sway for a long time; as sometimes a whole country with an inexplicable unanimity after long and patient sufferings, shakes off the yoke of a tyrannical prince and establishes itself as a republic. They ordered Monsieur to get him hence, chose one of their members for a conductor and continued the concerts much to the benefit of the public taste and the art in general. Monsieur seeing that it was impossible to regain his position and being unable to appease the cries of his seven children for their daily bread came back later and begged to be received as a common member of the society. His fate excited sympathy so that it was proposed by some to give him a situation as kettle-drum player of whom the society just then stood in need. However, on mature reflection it was resolved not to engage him by any means, since from his intriguing spirit it was reasonably to be feared he would leave no opportunity unused to disturb the harmony of the society, secretly undermine it and ultimately cause its dissolution, in order to establish his autocratic sway again.

He went about for a while dressed in the same fashionable style as formerly, still boasting of his many acquaintances among the aristocracy. It is true he was sometimes seen with the before mentioned Lord Horseneck; but this is easily explained when we remember that my Lord was not only a great lover of music but himself the composer of several Grand Quadrilles which frequently, under a fictitious name, were performed by our Monsieur at the concerts. Far from envying him such acquaintances we sincerely wish his Lordship may not so soon cast him off, but exert his influence to save him from the brink of destruction to which he is hurrying on rapidly. And so we will leave him.

Audi Alteram Partem.

RICHARD WAGNER, in Re himself and "TANNHÄUSER."

"TO THE EDITOR OF ———"

"Paris, 27th March, 1861.

"MY DEAR FRIEND.—I promised I would, some day or other, give you a full account of everything relating to the Paris Tannhäuser business. Now that this has taken so decided a turn, and that I am enabled to obtain a comprehensive view of everything connected with it, it affords me a kind of satisfaction to come to a conclusive opinion of the whole from a calm narrative, written as if for my own perusal. None of you can, however, form a correct idea of the true state of matters, without my touching upon the real motives which induced me to go to Paris in the first instance. Let me, therefore, start from this point.

"After having been prevented, for a space of nearly ten years, from refreshing myself, if only periodically, by witnessing some good performances of my dramatic compositions, I at last felt irresistibly impelled to think of settling in some place where in time it might be possible for me to enjoy that living contact with my art which was so necessary for me. I hoped to be able to find such a place in some retired nook in Germany. In the summer of 1859 I made the most earnest appeals to the Grand Duke of Baden—who, with the most touching kindness, had previously promised that my latest work should be brought out at Carlsruhe under my own direction—to use his influence, so that, instead of making only a temporary stay, I might be allowed to take up my permanent residence in his dominions, since I should otherwise have no course left open to me than to proceed to Paris, and settle there. The fulfilment of my request was—an impossibility!

"I proceeded to Paris in the autumn of the same year, still calculating upon the performance of my Tristan, for which I thought I should be summoned to Carlsruhe on the 3d December. I believed, that when the work had once been brought out under my own superintendence, I might then trust it to theatres of Germany. The prospect being able to pursue the same course with all my subsequent works was enough for me; and, such being the posture of affairs, the sole charm Paris possessed for me was the fact, that from time to time I might bear an admirable quartet or a first-rate orchestra, and thus at least keep up a refreshing connection with the living organs of my art. But everything was suddenly changed, on the receipt of letters from Carlsruhe, informing me that the production of Tristan there had proved impossible. My painful position immediately suggested to me the notion of inviting, for the following spring, some well-known and clever German singers to Paris, so that, with their assistance, I might get up, at the Italian Opera, the model-performance, which I so much desired, of my new work. To this performance it was my intention to invite the managers and stage-managers of such German theatres as were well disposed towards me, thinking that by the plan I should obtain the result I had hoped to achieve by the performance of Carlsruhe. But, as it would have been impossible to carry out the plan without including the Parisian public, it is necessary that I should endeavor to enlist their sympathies for my music beforehand. It was with this object that I gave the three concerts in the Italian Theatre. The highly gratifying result of these concerts, as far as success and approbation were concerned, could not, unfortunately, further the principal enterprise I had in view. I became fully aware of the difficulties besetting an enterprise of the sort, while the impossibility of obtaining the simultaneous attendance of the German singers I had selected compelled me to abandon my design.

"While, thus hemmed in with difficulties on every side, I was again casting my eyes, borne down by heavy care, towards Germany, I heard, to my great astonishment, that my position was warmly discussed, and my cause kindly advocated, at the court of the Tuileries. This kind interference on my behalf I owed to the extremely friendly feeling of many members of the various German embassies in the capital, a feeling of which I had previously been in complete ignorance. Matters went so far that the Emperor, having heard a most flattering account of my work, generally known as Tannhäuser, from a German princess whom he particularly respects, gave orders for the immediate production of the opera at the Académie Impériale.

"I cannot deny that although, in the first instance, highly gratified at this unexpected testimony of the success of my works in circles from which I had for so long kept personally so far aloof, I soon began to look forward with great anxiety to a representation of Tannhäuser in the theatre mentioned; for who saw more clearly than I did that this great operatic theatre had long been estranged from every earnest artistic tendency; that requirements very different from those of dramatic music had asserted their supremacy and that opera had become simply an excuse for ballet? The truth is, that of late years I have had very many applications to bestir myself about the performance of one of my works in Paris; I never thought, however, of the so-called Grand Opera, but—for an experiment—rather of the modest Théâtre Lyrique. This I did for two reasons; at the latter theatre no particular class of the public leads the taste of the rest, and—thanks to the poverty of its resources—the ballet, properly so-called, has not yet grown up to be the centre around which everything else in art revolves. The manager had, however, been obliged to give up all idea of a performance of Tannhäuser, after having repeatedly considered it of his own free will, principally because he could find no tenor equal to the difficult task of supporting the principal character.

"Now, at my very first interview on the subject with the manager of the Grand Opera, I was given to understand that the most necessary condition to ensure a successful performance of Tannhäuser was the introduction of a ballet, and that, too, in the second act. I did not perceive the full import of this condition until I declared it was impossible for me to stop the action of the second act, above all others, by a ballet, in every respect meaningless; but that, on the other hand, a particularly appropriate pretext for a ballet was afforded by the voluptuous court of Venus, in the first act, where, when I first conceived the drama, I had myself thought it impossible to dispense with dancing. In fact, I was excited by the idea of strengthening this part of my work, a part which was unmistakably the weakest point in my original score, and I drew up an elaborate plan by which the scene in the Venusberg would be rendered a most important one. The manager peremptorily rejected this plan, and told me plainly that, in the performance of an opera, he had not only to consider the ballet itself, but so to arrange matters that it should come on in the middle of the evening, for it was not until that time that those subscribers to whom the ballet almost exclusively belonged entered their boxes, as they usually dined very late; a ballet executed in the beginning of the evening could not, therefore, I was informed, satisfy these persons, as they were never present during the first act. The same and similar explanations were subsequently repeated by the Minister of State himself, and all chance of a successful result represented as so dependent on my fulfilling the conditions in question, that I began to think I should be obliged to throw up the whole affair.

"While I was reflecting more seriously than ever on returning to Germany, and anxiously looking around for some spot where I might be enabled to produce my latest works, I was most favorably impressed with the value of the Imperial order, for it placed at my disposal all the resources of the Grand Opéra, and authorized me, in the most unreserved and unconditional manner to make whatever engagements I might deem necessary. Everything required by me was instantly carried into effect, without the slightest consideration of the cost, and an amount of care, of which before I had not the slightest idea, was bestowed upon the mise-en-scène. Under such unusual circumstances, I became gradually more and more impressed with the belief that I might possibly behold a complete, nay ideal performance. The notion of such a performance of one or other of my works, no matter which, had seriously engrossed my thoughts for a long time, in fact from the time of my withdrawal from our own operatic theatre. An opportunity which had never before been anywhere placed within my reach, was now most unexpectedly offered me in Paris, and that, too, when no exertions on my part had been able to procure me any favor at all approaching it on German soil. I frankly confess that this thought filled me with an ardour I had not known for a long time, and which a certain bitterness, mingled with it, only served, perhaps, to augment. I now saw nothing save the possibility of a completely beautiful performance; and, absorbed by my constant and anxious care to realize this possibility, every cause for distrust lost its power of affecting me. 'If I can only attain what I am justified in considering possible'—I said to myself—'what do I care about the Jockey Club and their ballet?'

"From this moment, all my attention was devoted to the performance. No French tenor, I was told by the manager, could be found for the part of Tannhäuser. Having been informed of the brilliant talent of the youthful tenor, Herr Niemann, I pointed to him, though, it is true, I had never heard him myself, as the representative of the principal part, especially as he spoke French easily. An engagement, most carefully brought about, was concluded with him, at a great sacrifice. Several other artists, such, for instance, as the baritone Morelli, owed their engagements solely to my desire to secure their services for my work. As for the rest, I preferred certain rising and talented young artists—because I thought I might form them more easily to my style—to some first-rate singers already favorites here, because their too forward manner exercised a disturbing influence on me. The amount of care, totally unknown among us, with which the rehearsals at the piano was conducted, astonished me, and under the intelligent and delicate guidance of M. Vauthrot, the Chef du Chant, I speedily beheld our efforts attain a rare degree of maturity. I was especially gratified at observing how young French talent gradually understood my work, and warmed into a love of its task.

"In this way, I myself felt a new affection for this old work of mine. I once more went through the score with the greatest care; I completely remodelled the scene with Venus, as well as the ballet-scene preceding it; and more especially endeavored to adapt the vocal music most accurately to the words of the translation.

"I had devoted my whole attention to the performance, and disregarded every other consideration; but now my anxiety commenced as the truth flashed upon me that the performance would not be distinguished by that degree of invariable excellence I had expected. It is a sad thing for me to tell you in what respects I, at first, found I was doomed to disappointment. The most serious circumstance was, decidedly, that the singer of the difficult principal part grew more and more desponding the nearer we approach the night of the performance. The flattering hopes I had cherished during the course of the pianoforte rehearsals, sank lower, the more we had to do with the stage and the orchestra. I perceived that we were declining to the level of an ordinary operatic performance, and that all those expectations, which soared far above this, would necessarily remain unfulfilled. Viewed in this light, in which at the beginning I naturally had not viewed it, the only thing that could elevate such an operatic representation was wanting; I mean some highly talented individual, already an established favorite with the public, while I came forward with nearly all novices. I was finally, most disheartened by the fact that I could not succeed in withdrawing from the usual conductor the direction of the orchestra, and undertaking it myself, for this would have enabled me to exercise a great influence on the spirit of the performance; and the fact of my having been thus compelled, with sorrowful resignation (for I had not been allowed to withdraw the score as I desired), to consent to a tame and spiritless performance of my work, is still a cause of real grief to me.

"Under these circumstances, I was almost indifferent as to the manner in which my opera would be received; the most brilliant success would not have induced me to be many times present at its performance, so far as I from being satisfied with it. But, concerning the real character of its reception, you have hitherto, it strikes me, been purposely kept in the dark, and would, therefore, act very wrongly, were you to form an opinion unfavorable to the general Parisian public, however flattering that opinion might be to us Germans. I still think, on the contrary, that the Parisian public are distinguished for very estimable qualities, among which may be reckoned great quickness, and a truly large-hearted love of justice. The fact of an audience, an entire audience, to whom I was personally a complete stranger; who had been told, day by day, by the papers and idle prattlers the most absurd things about me; and who were the objects of all sorts of attempts to prejudice them against me—maintaining my cause repeatedly, for a quarter of an hour at a time, by the most exhausting manifestations of approbation, against a clique, must, even were I the most indifferent being in the world, fill me with feelings of the warmest description. But an audience actuated, as every dispassionate observer immediately perceived, by the most violent prejudice against my work, had been assembled on the night of the first performance, thanks to the zealous care of those who had the sole distribution of the places, and who rendered it almost impossible for me to introduce my few personal friends. If to this audience you add all the members of the Parisian press, who are officially invited on such occasions, and whose hostility towards me their notices alone are sufficient to prove, I really think I am entitled to speak of a great victory, when I inform you, in the strictest truth, that there was louder and more unanimous applause at the performance of my work, although that performance was far from being too spirited a one, than I myself ever heard in Germany. Several of the musical critics, or rather all of them, who were the real leaders of the opposition, which, at first, was, perhaps, nearly universal, exerted themselves to the utmost to prevent the public from listening to my work, but they were evidently alarmed, towards the end of the second act, lest they should be compelled to witness a complete and brilliant success. They, therefore, had recourse to a plan of bursting out into horse-laughter at certain cues, which they had agreed upon among themselves at the general rehearsals and by this means produced considerable confusion at the conclusion of the second act, for the express purpose of weakening the effect of a strong manifestation at the fall of the curtain.

The same gentlemen had also observed, at the general rehearsals, which I was unable to prevent their attending, that the success of the opera depended, in a great measure, upon the mode in which the third act was performed. An admirable scene, by M. Despléchin, representing the Valley of the Wartburg in the light of an autumnal evening, exerted, even at the rehearsals, on all present a charm which strengthened the proper feeling necessary for the following scenes, and, indeed, rendered it irresistible. As regards the artists, these scenes were the gem of the whole performance. The procession of Pilgrims was sung and placed upon the stage in a most admirable manner; Elizabeth's prayer, rendered by Mlle. Sax with touching and expressive perfection; and the fantasia for the evening star, given by Morelli with elegiacal tenderness, introduced so happily the best part of Niemann's performances, namely, the account of the pilgrimage, which always obtained for him the warmest marks of approbation, that it appeared probable to my most bitter opponent that this third act would prove exceptionally successful. It was, accordingly, this very act that the individuals in question attacked most virulently, endeavoring, by outbursts of violent laughter, as pretexts for which they were obliged to seize on the most trifling things, to prevent anything like the necessary devout, calm feeling reigning among the audience. Not led astray by these repulsive demonstrations, my singers neither allowed themselves to be discouraged, nor was the audience to be restrained from paying the most sympathetic attention to their performance, often rewarded with loud applause; at last, the artists having been called on with the most boisterous signs of approbation, the opposition was kept completely under.

"That I was not wrong in looking upon the result of this evening as a complete victory, was proved by the behavior of the public at the second performance, for it was then evident who were the opponents against whom, I should, in future, have exclusively to contend. I refer to the Jockey club, which I have a right to name, since the public themselves did so openly, by crying out "à la porte les Jockeüs." The members of this Club, whose right to be considered the lords and masters of the Grand Opera I need not inquire into more nearly, and who, by the absence of the usual ballet at the time of their entrance into the theatre, that is to say, about the middle of the performance, thought their dearest interests grievously injured, had discovered, to their horror, that, at the first performance, not only had Tannhäuser not failed, but had actually been a triumph. From that moment it became their business to prevent this balletless opera from being presented to them evening after evening. With this object, they had, on their way from dinner to the Opera, purchased a number of dog whistles, and such like things, which, immediately after the entrance of these gentlemen, were employed against Tannhäuser in the most ingenious manner. Previously, that is to say, during the whole of the first act and up to the middle of the second, there had not been the slightest sign of any further opposition, and the most continuous applause had accompanied, unopposed, those portions of my opera which had first gained favor with the public. From this moment, however, no demonstration of satisfaction was of any avail. It was in vain that the Emperor himself, together with the Empress, proved, for the second time, his favorable opinion of my work; the condemnation of Tannhäuser had been irrevocably pronounced by those who regarded themselves as the masters of the theatre, and who all belong to the highest aristocracy of France. Until the conclusion of the performance, all the applause bestowed by the public was accompanied by whistles and flageolets.

"In consequence of the total inability of the Management to do aught against this powerful club, and of the evident disinclination of the Minister of State himself to become involved in any serious dispute with its members, I felt I could not expect the performers, who had served me so truly, to continue subjecting themselves to the horrible excitement so unconscientiously inflicted on them (of course for the purpose of making them throw up their parts). I gave the management notice that I withdrew my opera, consenting to a third performance only on condition that it should take place on Sunday, that is to say, on a non-subscription night, by which plan the subscribers would not be irritated, while the house would be rendered available for the general public. It was not considered advisable to comply with my wish that this performance should be advertised in the bills as the 'last,' and I could only inform my acquaintances personally that such was the case. These precautionary measures were, however, insufficient to allay the anxiety of the Jockey Club. The body fancied it perceived, in this Sunday performance, a bold demonstration, attended with danger to its interests, since, if the performance were an undisputed success, the hated work might then easily be forced upon the members. No one had the courage to believe in the sincerity of my assertion, that, in case of such a success, my withdrawal of Tannhäuser would only be the more certain. These gentlemen, consequently, gave up their usual amusements on the evening in question, and returning, once more fully equipped to the theatre, repeated the proceedings which distinguished the second performance. The indignation of the public, who were to be completely debarred from following the opera, rose to a pitch, which, I was assured, was perfectly unprecedented, and the social position of these elegant rioters—which it would seem is altogether unassailable—was, perhaps, the only thing that saved them from personal violence. Let me state at once that, astonished as I was as the unruly behavior of the gentlemen of this club, I was equally struck and touched by the heroic exertions of the public, properly so called, to see justice done me; and that it would never once enter my head to enter my head to entertain the slightest doubt of a Parisian audience, provided it assembled on neutral ground belonging to itself.

"My official notification of the withdrawal of the score, placed the Management of the Opera in a position of really great embarrassment. The Management acknowledge, openly and emphatically, that in the case of my opera they see one of the greatest possible successes, for they do not recollect another instance of the public declaring themselves with such warmth the par-tizans of a work opposed by a particular set. They think they are sure of exceedingly high receipts from Tannhäuser, the house having been already let for several nights in advance. They are continually receiving information of the increasing indignation of the public, who find themselves prevented, by a party of most limited numbers, from calmly listening to and appreciating a much-talked-of work. I also hear that the Emperor is still most kindly disposed in the matter, while the Empress wishes to declare herself the patroness of my opera, and obtain guarantees against any further disturbances. At this moment, there is being circulated among the musicians, painters, artists and authors in Paris, a protestation addressed to the Minister of State, and referring to the unbecoming proceedings at the Opera House. It is, as I have been informed, signed by a large number of persons. Under these circumstances, I ought easily to pluck up courage and allow my work to be resumed. But a grave artistic consideration prevents my doing so. As yet, my work has not enjoyed a calm and dispassionate hearing; its true character, depending indispensably on the audience being thrown, in accordance with my intention, into a frame of mind embracing the whole of my production, and different from that of the ordinary opera-public, has not yet dawned upon the public, who on the contrary, could only confine themselves to brilliant and catching external features, which serve me merely as scaffolding, but which the audience remarked and received with lively sympathy. If I could and did obtain a quiet hearing for my opera, I fear, from what I have already hinted at, concerning the character of the performance here, that the inward weakness and tameness of the latter, which are no secret for those who are intimately acquainted with the work, and for the removal of which all personal intervention on my part was prohibited, must gradually be revealed, so that, for the present, I should not be able to look forward to a sterling and not merely an external success. Let, therefore, all the unsatisfactory events connected with this performance be kindly buried under the dust of the three battle-nights, and the various persons who bitterly disappointed the hopes I had founded on them, console themselves with the belief that they fought and fell in a good cause!

"For the present, the Paris Tannhäuser has been played out. But, if a wish of certain earnest friends of my art be fulfilled—if a project, seriously entertained by competent individuals, and which aims at nothing less than the speedy foundation of a new opera house for the realization of the reforms here mooted by me, be carried out—you may, perhaps, hear once more, even from Paris, of Tannhäuser."

"Be assured that you now know the complete truth as regards everything that has, as yet, taken place in Paris, in connection with my work; as your guarantee for this, accept the simple fact, that I cannot possibly be satisfied with a mere appearance, when my inmost wish has remained unfulfilled, and this wish can be gratified only by the consciousness of having produced a really intelligent impression."

"With cordial good wishes, I remain, yours,
"RICHARD WAGNER."*

* The editor of the Niederheinische Musik-Zeitung observes, on the subject of the above letter:—"With regard to this modest example of self-defence in opposition to the decision of public opinion, we will simply refer our readers to the commencement of Cicero's Oration against Verres: Nemo quemquam tam audacem, &c., arbitratur, qui tam multis testibus convictus—auderet. EST IDEM, QUI SEMPER FIT."

Church Music in the Hands of the Reformers.

Exclusive choir singing was one of the abuses which crept into the Romish church, in connection with its gradual declining piety, in the centuries succeeding the third. The change from the primitive method was gradual. It commenced in the fourth century, at which time the choir was not expected to monopolize the singing, but only to lead it. This, however, gave them the opportunity of introducing a style of music, not only unfit for the church on account of its theatrical associations, but unfit for the use of the congregation on account of its intricacy.

The introduction of tunes too difficult for any but trained singers to execute, was the first step towards debarring the people from their ancient privilege of praise. They might still unite in some simple chorus or response, but this was rather by privilege than by right. Even this privilege was at length denied them and they were taught that the singing of God's praise was too sacred a duty for the lips of the laity, and belonged to the clergy alone. And the clergy, to make their monopoly of the singing still more exclusive, sang only in Latin. By the sixth or seventh century the voices of the people were effectually silenced, and for nearly a thousand years God was no longer praised as at the first. But this long night of darkness and silence slowly rolled away, and the light of returning day in Germany was ushered in with song. Its approach had been heralded by song a century before this, in Bohemia, in the time of John Huss and Jerome; and even in the fourteenth century, while "The Morning Star of the Reformation" was still visible, praise broke the silence of the waning watches in England. As in the mornings of the long days in summer, a few woodland notes may be heard here and there in the groves in advance of the general chorus which hails the day, so there were voices before Luther, both in England and on the continent, which anticipated the melodies of his time. But when the empire of the night was fairly broken, and this great chorister of the Reformation arose, he awoke the whole forest into harmony.

One of the first efforts of Luther in fulfilment of the great mission of his life, was to publish a psalm-book. Both hymns and tunes were composed mainly by himself. About sixty hymns were written by him, at a time when the history of fifteen centuries could not furnish more than two hundred hymns that had been used in Christian congregations. In this great undertaking he had a two-fold object: first, to restore to the people their ancient and long-lost New Testament right to the use of psalms in public worship in their own tongue; and secondly, by the graces of verse, and the charms of melody, to lodge the word of God effectually in their memory. He took care to embody in his verse the great foundation truths of the Bible, that, being sung over and over by the people, they might never be forgotten. This object he announced in a letter to Spalatin, written in 1524, in which he says: "It is my purpose, after the example of the ancient Fathers of the church, to make psalms or spiritual songs for the common people, that the word of God may dwell among them in psalms, if not otherwise. We are looking around everywhere for poets. I entreat you to help us. I would that new and courtly words might be avoided, and that the language be all suited to the capacity of the people, as simple as possible." So successful was Luther in this endeavor, that priestly influence might in vain have attempted to check the progress of the Reformation by destroying the Bible. Its doctrines were the soul of his songs, and the songs were embalmed in the people's memory.

They were sung everywhere. The singing habits of the early days of Christianity were fairly revived. "The hymns spread among all classes of people, and were sung not only in the churches and schools, but also in the houses and in the work-shops, in the streets and in the market-places, in the barns and in the fields." Wherever the principles of the Reformation were received whether in Germany, France, or Britain, psalm-singing was an almost universal practice. This was the blossom which the root of the new doctrines invariably produced. So contagious was this practice, and so wonderful the power of Luther's psalms in propagating his doctrines, that his enemies were obliged to adopt the same practice in self-defence. "The papists, finding that the people would sing them, and were almost running with delight in doing so, published hymn-books of their own, in which, with slight alterations, they incorporated almost all of the Reformer's pieces." The hymns found their way even into the French court; but they contained seeds of truth which it was not for the interest of the Romish church to have planted, and about the middle of the sixteenth century all Papists were prohibited from singing them. From that time, the name of "psalmodist," or "psalm-singer," was applied to the Protestants in derision. It became synonymous with Reformer, Huguenot, Calvinist, Heretic.

"Next to theology," said Luther, "it is to music that I give the highest place and the greatest honor." He had reason to say this, for it was music next to theology, and sometimes more than theology, that gave success to his cause. "In the city of Hanover, the Reformation was introduced, not by preachers, nor by religious tracts, but by the hymns of Luther, which the people sang with delight." A Protestant contemporary of Luther says: "I doubt not that the one little hymn, 'Now rejoice, dear Christians, all,'

(the first one that Luther published,) has brought many hundred Christians to the faith. . . . The noble, sweet language of that one little song has won their hearts, so that they could not resist the truth; and, in my opinion, the spiritual songs have contributed not a little to the spread of the Gospel."

But all the reformers, German, Swiss, English, and Scotch, were equally zealous that the people shall consider praise as appropriately and peculiarly their part in the services of the sanctuary. With great effort did they achieve for the people this "freedom to worship God." And now, the advocates of exclusive choir singing in America are surrendering again, to Popery, the very territory which was acquired in the battles of the Reformation. They willingly relinquish to the Man of Sin a stronghold captured by the sturdy valor of such men as Luther and Calvin, and John Knox, and are content that the praise of God should be sung in Protestant churches in the Popish manner.—Hymns and Choirs.

Who wrote the "Marseillaise?"

The question as to who is the real composer of the "Marseillaise" is again raised. A correspondent of the Gartenlaube, a Leipzig paper, asserts it to be composed by a German, Holtzmann of Meersburg, Hof-Capellmeister of the Count Palatine. The organist, Herr Hamma, at Meersburg, is said to have discovered Holtzmann's manuscript, which leads to the curious result that the song, afterwards known as the "Marseillaise," was originally sacred music, and copied by Rouget de Lisle from Holtzmann's Credo in his "Missa Solemnis," No. 4, and adapted to his words. It was always wondered how a dilettante in music, like the engineer-officer Rouget, could have produced in a couple of hours in one night, such a splendid poem of many stanzas in the most perfect poetical form, and at the same time the beautiful air, without which the song, although fiery and enthusiastic, would hardly have acquired its historical fame. It was, therefore always supposed that Rouget made use of the musical reminiscences for his words. But whence the reminiscences of such a fine air, was a question which puzzled many a critic. During the last two or three years it has particularly occupied the French musical savants, especially MM. Kastner and Castil-Blaze. Prof. Bischoff, of Cologne, in reference to this new discovery, publishes a short historico-critical treatise on the subject, in the Kölnner Zeitung, from which we gather a few more interesting facts. So long ago as the year 1793—8 a rumor was current that the tune of the French National Hymn was a German air; it went so far as to ascribe poem and melody to George Forster. This rumor was hushed for a long time, till it rose again in 1830, when the "Parisienne" was sung to an air notoriously German, a German national song, well known to the English-German Legion and the Hanoverian troops in 1814—15.

At that time a note was found in Bouchey and Roux's "Histoire Parlementaire de la Révolution" (xvii., p. 204) to the effect that the "Marseillaise" had originally been composed by a German for Biron's army. In contradiction to this, Rouget de Lisle says himself in a collection of French songs: "I made the air and the words of the song at Strasburg in the night following the declaration of war, end of April, 1792." It is related that the daughter of the Maire Dietrich played it on the piano on the following morning. M. Kastner, in his attempt to vindicate the composition for Rouget, repeats the words of the sculptor David, of Angers, who told him, "Rouget made the stanzas of the song in the night, and accompanied himself with the violin." But this would speak more against than for him, as he could not have composed words and music at the same time. M. Castil-Blaze, in the "France-Musical" of 1852, gives very different explanations. He states that on the private theatre of Madame de Montesson, who was secretly married to the Duke of Orleans, in 1782, a German song, with chorus and burden, was performed for the first time, which those who had been among the auditory recognized ten years afterwards as the melody to the world-inspiring song of Rouget's. German music in Paris at that time came into vogue through Gluck and his success. A. M. Julien, sen., violinist at the Italian Opera House, had produced that song in Madame Montesson's concert; it was received with enthusiasm by the highly aristocratic company, against which it turned such a sharp weapon afterwards. M. Deslauriers, publisher of Gluck's operas, and M. Imbalt, who directed the orchestra, were both present on that evening, and confided their secret to Castil-Blaze in the eighth year of the Republic, although Imbalt, who became music vender, in contradiction to his own opinion, from speculation and regard to the public voice, had printed the "Marseillaise" himself, in 1792, with Rouget's name as the composer.

Both assured M. Castil-Blaze, that the melody originally, with its first words, had a mild religious character. With Rouget's words, the song became first a Chant de l'Armée du Rhin, which the regiments at Strasburg and in Alsatia sang and played as a March. From there the song traveled to the south of France; and from thence, with the Marseilles batallions, to Paris, where it was ascribed to the above-mentioned M. Julien, and others, as Gossec, Pleyel, and particularly Méhul, who had set it more completely. M. Castil-Blaze quotes several examples where entirely change the character of the tune: he comes very near the truth and the latest news from Meersburg, when he says: "If you hear in our churches the song 'Sainte Cité, demeure permanente,' and when the singers intonate the finale, 'O ma patrie, O mon bonheur,' do you see everybody get excited and rush to arms? By no means; you have heard the sentimental tune a hundred times, and you never dreamed that it was one and the same with the faithful burden: 'Aux armes, citoyens! formez vos bataillons!'"

Prof. Bischoff observes, that neither by the older works of Walthar and Gerber, nor by the newer musical biographical dictionaries, nor by any authority to which he has access, can he learn anything nearer of the Capellmeistr and composer Holtzmann; but, he continues, there have always lived in the south of Germany, and there are still living, a number of composers of sacred music, of whom no one, beyond the narrowest circle of their activity, ever hears anything.—Athenæum.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 1, 1861.

Handel and Haydn Society.

The annual meeting of this Society was held on Monday evening the 27th ult., at Chickering's Hall, the Vice President in the chair. From the Treasurer's Report it appears that the financial condition of the society remains much as it was at the last annual meeting; the profit or the performance of the Messiah at Christmas, together with some two hundred dollars, and upwards, contributed by members, just about squaring out the expenditures of the season.

The obligations of the Society amount to $1,362.58, to meet which, two first mortgage railroad bonds, valued in the present depressed condition of all such securities at $1,400 and on which the interest is paid semi-annually, are held; exclusive of the valuable library and other property belonging to the society.

The reading of the Secretary's Report was listened to with interest, particularly those portions having reference to a change in the By-Laws, whereby a better attendance may be secured at rehearsals; and also in relation to an annual assessment; as a necessity of the times.

We call attention to the Secretary's report, below, for other valuable suggestions of vital importance to the society, and which, if adhered to must prove of inestimable value to the society.

Dr. J. Baxter Upham was unanimously nominated for the office of President, and a Committee appointed to wait on him, and ask his acceptance. The meeting was then adjourned to Tuesday evening, June 4th, when a choice of officers will take place.

SECRETARY'S REPORT, MAY 27, 1861.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Handel and Haydn Society.—Another twelve month has passed since we met for the purposes which have brought us together at this time, and another year has been added to those already numbered in the age of our honored institution; but, as your recording officer I have little to communicate beyond the simple announcement of the number of public performances which the Society has given during that time, and the general result of the same.

Early in the season, your Board of Trustees conceived the plan of carrying through a series of subscription concerts, to consist mainly of standard Oratorios by the great masters; but owing, it may be, to the peculiarly unsettled state of the country at that time, the project failed for lack of sufficient encouragement.

The usual weekly rehearsals were commenced at this new hall on the 30th September. The Messiah was performed, according to long established custom, at Christmas; and the result, both pecuniarily and artistically, was highly satisfactory.

Three other concerts were given during the season, each in connection with foreign vocalists, but neither one proved to be of any pecuniary advantage to the Society.

A concert in aid of the Massachusetts Volunteers was given by the society at the Boston Music Hall on the 27th of April, which was cordially cooperated in by prominent vocal and instrumental talent, rendering it a highly attractive entertainment; and, as every service connected with it was voluntarily proffered, it was confidently expected that a large sum would be realized, but, for certain inexplicable causes the total receipts were but $378.50 which amount was handed over to the Governor of the Commonwealth in accordance with a vote of the Board of Trustees. Small though the sum was, it may contribute something towards upholding the honor of our national flag, and in bringing peace once more to our borders. With this concert the season closed.

The Society has appeared but five times before the public during the season, but the regular weekly rehearsals have been continued as usual, numbering since the commencement thirty-three. Four meetings of the society have been held during the season, and the Board of Trustees has been called together nineteen times. Nine persons have been admitted to membership, and three have been discharged.

I might here close my report, but it seeming highly proper that matters relating to the material interests of the Society should be freely discussed at times like the present, when we are met in council together; I venture one or two suggestions for your consideration.

It has become, I think, a well established fact that no Society can, in the present state of the public mind, sustain itself by its performances, relying on the public patronage entirely for support. It might have been so when this society was the only avenue through which musical compositions of importance could be brought before the public; but those times have long since passed, and we must prepare to meet the new demands made upon us. I speak of these things in no discouraging tone, but that we may look the facts squarely in the face, and thereby be enabled to unite in adopting some line of policy which may add to our usefulness as a choral society. I do not find that there are any societies in this country, so far as my knowledge extends, and I have taken some pains to inform myself on that point, that look to a series of public performances for their support. On the contrary, those existing under similar organizations to our own, and for similar purposes, are, without exception, supported by yearly assessments on the members. The Sacred Harmonic Society of New York assesses ten dollars each, and many others I could name have larger or lesser sums as the price of yearly membership. In view of those facts I would respectfully suggest the propriety of amending the By-Laws of the Society as to admit of an annual assessment of five dollars on each member. This sum would pay the current expenses of Conductor, Organist and rent of the Library room, with such librarian assistance and docr-keepers as we should require. The advantages to be derived from the adoption of this amendment to our By-Laws would be manifold. It would not only enable us to meet our current expenses without the necessity of giving concerts in the vain hope of realizing a sufficient sum above the expenses to meet those obligations; but it would do vastly more for the Society in enlisting the hearty coöperation of each and every member who may remain as such, in whatever may be undertaken; and it would insure a fuller attendance at rehearsals; for when we pay for our privileges, we are more inclined to prize them, than we are when furnished without cost. I consider it a privilege to belong to an association of this kind, and more particularly so when it is the first of the kind in point of age, numbers, and efficiency in this country. In no other way can we become familiar with those great sacred creations of genius that have been but partially revealed to us, as yet; and were it not for the Handel and Haydn Society, or some similar organization, those works would have remained to us forever as sealed books.

Another, and a still greater advantage to be derived from this proposed change in the internal management of our society, would be found in the entire freedom from all "entangling alliances," temporary though they be, whereby we are too often forced to appear before the public wholly unprepared, in connection, it may be, with those who care nothing for us or the audience to which we introduce them, and as unprepared as ourselves for rendering satisfactorily the music assigned them. We have often voluntarily assumed positions before the public like that described above, in the vain expectation of realizing a sufficient sum thereby, to help out the yearly expenses, and have, as often been doomed not only to disappointment, but to the mortifying consciousness of having been engaged in an exhibition in no wise creditable to our musical reputation, or profitable to our treasury. From all such connections we could, if we would keep entirely aloof; and yet we should not be unmindful of the fact that vocalists in every respect competent to the requirements of the Sacred Oratorio are often among us, from abroad, and that the public should have an opportunity of testifying their appreciation of such artists. Many of our own resident vocalists are so incomparably superior to those who have been associated with us from time to time in Concerts and Oratorios, that the public will learn to distrust the merits of all unknown artists who may be put forward by us, if more care is not exercised in the future.

Another important addition to our By-Laws is required by which the attendance of members upon rehearsals may be secured, on penalty of forfeiture of membership in certain cases without the tedious process of advertising in "three or more daily papers" for a roll-call, as now. This regulation is imperatively demanded, if we would retain our present high position among the musical societies of the country; and should our number be lessened from this, or any other cause, our efficiency as a choral body would not, in my judgment, be materially injured; for, although large bodies of choristers are quite essential to a correct rendering of the massive, and sublime works of Handel and Mendelssohn, yet a smaller number, well disciplined, would be far more effective than a large, but imperfectly drilled chorus can possibly be made. As at present, there is too little personal responsibility manifested by many of the members in the operations of the Society. With a little additional effort, our rehearsals might be better attended, and our public performances vastly improved.

A very material reduction of our annual expenses has been effected in the occupation of this hall, so generously tendered us one year ago by the Messrs Chickering, and it may be thought advisable to make yet other retrenchments, corresponding to the times, even should the annual assessment referred to above be decided on.

It might, perhaps, be well in furtherance of the object, to go back for a season to the accustomed mode of conducting the rehearsals in the early days of the Society.

The By-Laws provide, Art. 4, that "at all meetings for the performance of music, the President may conduct the same, or a suitable musical director may be appointed at the discretion of the Board." It is only within a comparatively short period in the history of the Society, that a regular conductor has been engaged; the early Presidents always assuming that duty, and I would not now recommend such a course, except as a necessary retrenchment. Should it be deemed advisable to make such a change, the President could wield the baton, or some member of the Society might be selected who could undoubtedly do it acceptably. I know we should sadly miss the aid and guidance of the skilful hand which has so long and so well controlled our movements, and it may not be thought expedient to resort to it; but should it be made trial of, we should hardly, even then, feel like undertaking a public performance without an experienced conductor; though our rehearsals might be made both profitable and pleasant without one.

A properly conducted sacred music society, in a community like this, I regard as second only in importance and influence to the church itself, and that as such it should be encouraged and supported. Indeed the church is indebted more than is generally conceded or understood, to all such associations, for that which is to many, the most pleasing, and to all an important portion of Christian worship. The music of the church, in its influence on the worshippers, cannot be too highly estimated, and we should so shape our course as to avoid the possibility of the accumulation of a debt, until the return of more prosperous times, that we may not suffer our usefulness in this, or any other particular, to become impaired. If we would elevate the character of our Society above the ordinary occupation of concert-giving, in competition with every class of vocalists who may happen for the time to be among us, we must do something more than spend an hour in this hall once a week for our own gratification or amusement; or if we would interest the liberal and wealthy in our behalf, we must first interest ourselves in the true and legitimate business of a Sacred Music Society, incorporated "for the purpose of extending the knowledge and improving the style of performance of church music." Ours should be an educational institution for the benefit, as well, of those who participate in the performances as for those who listen; and such was the original intention of those who first conceived the plan of, and obtained the act of incorporation for, this institution. We have departed widely from that intention, but circumstances seemed to force the necessity upon us. Entirely dependent on our own resources for support, we have often been induced to do that, which, under other circumstances I am quite sure we should not have attempted.

Gentlemen, I am encouraged with the thought, — and not without due reflection and assurances from those who are interested in our welfare, — that we may before the lapse of many years, be placed in possession of a permanent fund, through the liberality of some of our fellow-citizens, the interest of which shall be sufficient to defray our annual expenses at least; but if we would deserve this munificence at the hands of any number of our benevolent citizens, we must look well to our path of duty, and not allow distracting counsels or flattering appearances to entice us from our true course.

In the present disturbed condition of our country, when trade is in a great measure diverted from its accustomed channels, and almost the only occupation of our citizens consists in the arming, equipping, and fitting out of troops to serve in defence of the liberties of our common country; when the music of the fife and drum alone attract attention; I say, in times like these, we can do nothing.

Did I say we could do nothing? Have we not already commanded the Muse and brought her into the service of our country's cause? We have but just given a concert for the benefit of the troops, and paid the proceeds over to the Governor of the State for that purpose. May we not hope that our trouble will soon cease, and that peace may be proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of our land?

Then will we again unite in a grand triumphal jubilee of welcome to those who have fought our battles and contributed of their might to the upholding of the majesty of the laws.

Respectfully submitted,

LORING B. BARNES, Secretary.

We trust that the newly elected President will accept the office tendered him. His well known energy and enthusiasm in any good cause that he takes in hand, cannot fail to be of service to the best interests of this old association, and we doubt not that he will infuse into it a new life by his well directed efforts. We need not remind our Boston readers that to Dr. Upham more than to any one else is due the successful accomplishment of the project of building the Music Hall, and its great embryo organ, or that the brilliant success of the Boston School Musical Festivals is also to be mainly attributed to his labors.

MAD. CHARLOTTE VARIAN gave her third and last concert prior to a tour in the British Provinces on Saturday evening last. We can assure our British provincial cousins that they will find her an artist of great merit and deserving of their patronage. Mad. Varian was assisted at this concert by Mr. Rudolphsen, a baritone formerly well known here and by Mr. Hoffmann, as before. We regret not to have received the expected notice of this concert of which the following was the programme:

PART I.

1. Solo Piano—Martha.....Jaell
Mr. E. Hoffmann.
2. Aria—I Lombardi.....Verdi
Madame C. Varian.
3. Song—Wake, dearest wake.....Miller
Madame C. Varian.
4. Aria—Il Balen (Trovatore).....Verdi
Mr Rudolphsen.
5. Recitative e Cavatina—Ma la sola, ahime! Sou lo.....Bellini
Madame C. Varian.

PART II.

1. Song—The heart bow'd down (Bohemian Girl)...Balfé
Mr. Rudolphsen.
2. Scotch War Song—McGreggor's Gathering.....
Madame C. Varian.
3. Solo Piano—Il Trovatore.....R. Hoffmann
Mr. E. Hoffman.
4. Scena Ed Aria—Traviata.....Verdi
Madame C. Varian.
5. Song—The little fat Gray Man.....Blewitt
Mr. Rudolphsen.
6. Star Spangled Banner.....
Madame Varian.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. — The first Saturday evening Concert of the new series, was given by the Orchestral Union last Saturday. The programme was of essentially the same character as those of the Afternoon Concerts, perhaps better, if anything. The Eroica, not played here since the days of the great Festival, was given very acceptably, and will, we are glad to hear, be repeated to-night. Beside this we had Glink's Iphigenia Overture, a piece of solid build and interesting detail, as well as some lighter pieces, as for instance a Potpourri from Verdi's Masked Ball, a waltz, and Meyerbeer's Torchlight dance, the latter decidedly too big for any concert hall. Unfortunately a sudden storm half an hour before concert time prevented a full attendance. There will be an improvement in point of numbers on the part of the audience with each succeeding concert.

GERMAN OPERA IN PARIS.—There is a talk of establishing a German Opera-house in Paris, with Dr. Marschner as conductor.

CHEVE'S SYSTEM. — The recent article upon this famous system of musical instruction, published in this Journal, April 18, has called forth quite a number of inquiries from our readers, especially from those who are concerned in teaching music, what precisely, this system is, and how it differs from the plan of musical instruction in vogue in this country, of which Dr. Lowell Mason was the efficient pioneer. We hope that our correspondent "Amateur" will enlighten us as fully as he may be able, as to the merits and prominent features of the system which he has introduced to our notice.

New Publications.

THE CANTILENA, a Collection of Songs, Duets, Trios, and Quartettes, arranged with Pianoforte Accompaniment, and adapted to the use of the School, the Choir, the Family, and the Social Circle. By George F. Bristow. Published by Abbey & Abbot. New York. 240 pp.

A neatly printed volume of "such music as had not, generally, found its way into books, thereby presenting the choicest gems of musical literature in a form and at a price within the reach of all."

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW, for May. Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co. $3 a year.

Contents; 1. Present Movement in the Church of England; 2. Alexis de Tocqueville; 3. The Poems and Plays of Robert Browning; 4. Bishop Herd and his Contemporaries; 5. Railway Accidents; 6. Motley's United Netherlands; 7. Berkley's Idealism; 8. Dr. John Brown's Horæ Subseciæ; 9. The Educational Question in Scotland; 10. The Christian Architecture of Europe; 11. The American Secession.

Musical Chit-Chat.

IRISH MUSIC.—Every nation has its peculiar melodies. Irish historians contend that their country is the celebrated Hyperborean isle, and that music is the native production of the soil. Cambrenis, who was one of the earliest libellers of the Irish, was obliged to admit their perfection in music. After he had heard the minstrels who attended the Irish chieftains at a banquet given to them in Dublin, by Henry II., he wrote to one of his friends in England, that "of all nations within our knowledge, this is, beyond comparison, the chief in musical composition." When the celebrated Italian composer, Gemiani, heard some pathetic Irish airs in London, he exclaimed—"Ha! that is the music of a people who have lost their liberty. I have heard nothing so sweet and plaintive and of such an original turn on this side of the Alps."

Handel, it is said, often declared that he would rather be the author of Carolan's "Aileen Aroon," than of all his own compositions. This Carolan seems, from the descriptions we have of him, to have been a genuine representative of the ancient bards. Though blind and untaught, yet his attainments in music were of the highest order. He excelled in all that was tender, romantic, and pathetic. He was an universal favorite; wherever he went, the doors of the nobility were opened, and an honorable place was assigned to him at the table. He thought the tribute of a song was due to every house where he was entertained, and he paid it in his usual simple, touching, and elegant manner. He wandered with his harp from town to town, and, oh, how skillfully he swept its chords, when depicting emotions of joy, or sorrow, patriotism, anger, love, or despair. Many of the lovely Irish airs, rescued by Moore from oblivion were, no doubt, the composition of the blind Orpheus, Carolan.

O'Connor in his Dissertations, says—"Military music made part of the studies of the Irish warriors. It filled them with courage and a contempt of danger, and it was by the help of the military song, they sounded the charge, rally, retreat, &c.

The Irish are essentially a musical people. Their songs are sung throughout the world, and are everywhere admired and applauded. While there is a love for the simplicity, sentiment, and beauty in the heart of man. Moore's melodies will be read, sung, and cherished.

SINGING PSALMS.—Archbishop Laud very quaintly observes:—"The difference between singing and reading a psalm will be easily understood if you consider the difference between reading and singing a common song that you like. Whilst you only read it you only like it; but as soon as you sing it, then you enjoy it—you feel the delight of it—it has got hold of you—your passion keeps pace with it; you feel the same spirit within you that seems to be in the words. If you were to tell a person who had such a song that he need not sing it, that it was sufficient to peruse it, he would wonder what you meant, and would think you as absurd as if you were to tell him that he should only look at his food, but need not eat it; for a song of praise not sung is very like any other good thing not made use of."

When the battle of Leuthen had been fought, and the victors, fatigued almost to death, were sinking down in the chilling rain among the slain that lay scattered on the bloody field; then, in the darkness of the night, a single voice broke forth with the old choral: "Nun danket alle Gott!" (Now let us all praise God): soon a second voice joined, then a third, and so more and more, until the whole army took up the hymn; and thus the single song—in which the feelings of patriotism and military glory, united with the consciousness of having accomplished the great deed, and pious gratitude towards the mighty Ruler of battles—inspired the hearts of these men with new life, and strengthened them to follow up the victory they had so nobly won.

THE FRENCH ORPHEONISTES.—There is to be another gathering of the French Orphéonistes in Paris on September 12th, in the Palais d'Industrie.

M. FAURE AND MEYERBEER'S NEW OPERA.—The Journal des Débats states that M. Faure has signed an engagement for the Grand Opera of Paris, to appear in the Africaine, or rather Vasco de Gama, by M. Meyerbeer.

Herr Reichardt has left London for Frankfurt; from thence he proceeds to Darmstadt and Wiesbaden, to give a series of representations at the theatres in those towns. The admirers of this talented vocalist will not therefore have the pleasure of hearing him at any of the fashionable concerts till late in the season.—Musical World.

Herr Franz Abt, the well-known composer of "When the Swallows," &c., and Capellmeister of the Dneal Opera at Brunswick, intends visiting London in the course of the season.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—After two disappointments, caused by the indisposition of M. Faure, Guillaume Tell was produced on Tuesday week, and, we need hardly add, filled the theatre in every part. The amphitheatre, and amphitheatre stalls, above all, were crowded to suffocation, and, indeed, from this part of the house proceeded the real applause of the evening; for there, in consequence of the abridgment of the pit, were congregated all the musical spirits of the metropolis, drawn thither in anticipation of a grand performance of Rossini's grand work. Everything tended to the expectation of such a result:—the seeming completeness of the cast, the great resources of the theatre, the efficiency and power of the basses and chorus, the energy of Mr. Costa, than whom Rossini has no more ardent admirer. The cast was as follows; Guillaume Tell—M. Faure; Arnold—Signor Tamberlik; Walter—Herr Formes; Melehtal—Signor Polonini; Gessler—Signor Tagliafico; Fisherman—Signor Neri-Baraldi; Mathilde—Mad. Tagliafico. Guillaume Tell was first produced at the Royal Italian Opera—the old theatre, of course—in 1848, M. Roger sustaining the part of Arnold, Tamburini of Guillaume Tell, and Mad. Castellan of Mathilde. It was played once only that year, in consequence, as was said, of the indisposition of the French tenor. A year or two later the opera was produced with Herr Ander as Arnold, but did not create any great sensation. Subsequently, it was revived with Signor Tamberlik in the principal tenor part, and the Italian was found immeasurably superior to his French and German rivals. Had Signor Tamberlik, indeed, sustained the part of Arnold in the first instance, a thorough success, we believe might have been reckoned on. Every one who knows music and feels its power must recognise the immense merit of Guillaume Tell; but most unfortunately the climax is attained at the end of the second act, and the interest decreases thence to the last finale. In fact, the opera, like most French operas (which are almost interminable), is too long. The quantity of music in the first two acts alone of Guillaume Tell is at least equal to the whole Fidelio. The director of the Royal Italian Opera, notwithstanding was determined to give Rossini's masterpiece another chance, and for this purpose called in all the resources of the establishment; but as the performance commences so late at the Royal Italian Opera it was impossible to give the whole work, and curtailments were indispensable.

That the management has done everything possible to render the performance complete we feel assured. Signor Tamberlik is by far the best Arnold we have seen in this country. M. Faure, although the music of Guillaume Tell is too low for him, sings like a thorough artist, and acts with great force and intelligence. The Walter of Herr Formes would be inimitable in every way, if only his vocal power was economised a little in the magnificent trio of the second act. That the music of Mathilde would not suit the voice of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, was to be expected. Occasionally, when the voice has not to be forced, Mad. Carvalho sings with infinite sweetness and delicacy; but this cannot extenuate the fault of embroidering the air and subsequent duet with ornaments of her own manufacture. All the remaining characters are entitled to unqualified praise, and nothing better could be desired in their respective ways than Mad. Rudersdorff's Jemmy—a signal success—Signor Neri-Beraldi's Pescatore, Signor Polonini's Melehtal, Signor Taliafico's Gessler, and Mad. Taliafico's Edwige.

To the performances of the band and chorus we can apply the term "magnificent," with few reservations. Every evening the audience, after the great scene of the "oath of liberty," is unbounded on all occasions. One of the greatest hits of the performance is, of course, the famous air in the last scene, "Suivez-moi" ("Corriam, corriam") which Signor Tamberlik electrifies the audience with an "Ut de poitrine" that Duprez himself might have envied in his best days. The scenery is marvellously beautiful, and the appointments and dresses all in the best taste. Guillaume Tell was repeated on Thursday night for the third time.

Perhaps Il Trovatore was as good an opera as could be selected for the first appearance of Mad. Penco and Signor Graziani. Both received on Tuesday night the hearty welcome due to their merits and popularity. Mad. Penco, although comparatively a new-comer, is even now a general favorite, and, indeed, considering the rarity of first-class dramatic sopranos in the pure Italian school, is entitled to a distinguished place.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The third concert was given on Monday night, and attracted an immense crowd, the engagement of Mlle. Titieni and Signor Giugliari, no doubt, greatly enhancing the attraction. The following programme was given:—Overture, Ray Blas, Mendelssohn; Grand Scene, Der Freischütz, Weber; Aria, "Dalla sua pace," Mozart; Symphony, "Power of Sound," Spohr; Cavatina, "Con'è bello," Donizetti; Concerto, G major, pianoforte, Mozart; Aria, "Aurora che sorgerai," Rossini; Duet, Lucia, Donizetti; and Overture, Preciosa, Weber. This was a grandly constructed programme, and the execution was universally worthy of music.

Paris.

A new institution, called La Fondation Beaulieu, for the performance of classical vocal music has just commenced its second series. The programme included specimens of the vocal music of Felice Anerio, Orlando Gibbons, Handel, Pergolese, Marcello, Grand; Haydn, Mozart and Cherubini. Mad. Viardot and M. Bataille were the chief vocalists. Selections from Haydn's oratorio of Tobias were executed at the commencement and at the close of the concert. Among the most curious as well as the most showy items of this semi-antiquarian entertainment was a bravura air from the Britannicus of Grænan, chapel master to Frederic the Great, which was admirably sung by Mad. Viardot, who (as you must frequently have heard her do in London), with the true feeling of an artist, gave its full value to the substratum of passion which underlies the cumbrous adornments systematically resorted to by composers of that day.

At the Opera, Mlle. Guymard is in full career as the acknowledged representative of Valentine in Les Huguenots, which is drawing large houses. She has restored the romance in the fourth act, cut out by her predecessors; and Meyerbeer has written a coda to append to it, expressly for her. M. Faure, who is now with you at Covent Garden, where he is engaged for three years, has just signed a three years' engagement at the Grand Opera, at 5000 fr. per month for the first year, 6000 for the second, and 7000 for the third. A congé from April to July enables him to fulfil his English engagement concurrently. Felicien David's Herculanum, it is said, will be shortly revived, and also the Muette de Portici, on a magnificent scale. It is currently reported that Signor Alary, of sacrilegious note (inventor of the dish Fricassée de Mozart, à la maitre de chant), has composed a comic opera to a libretto by Scribe, called La Beauté du Diable, which is speedily forthcoming. The gentleman who has the toupet (Anglicè et vulgo, "cheek") to adapt Don Giovanni to the exigencies of an ambitious tenor and of his own notions of taste, ought to do something original. This was hardly the case, however, with the Tre Nozze, in which Lablache danced to a polka warbled by poor Sontag. Mario, by the way, has again, according to his wont (or shall we say according to his cant?), announced himself indisposed; and Montanaro, the slippery gentleman who jilted Mr. Beale, replaces him in Count Almaviva. So I hear that Grisi is again at the Royal Italian Opera. Is this to be another farewell engagement?

"Fare thee well, and if for ever, Still for ever fare thee well."

has been fitted with a new reading, illustrating the confusion that may arise between bidding farewell for ever, and for ever bidding farewell. Norma, with her sickle for ever cutting and for ever coming again, might stand now as a female companion to Chrono, with his scythe. By the way, our experience of this artist may legitimately find a new idiom a contrast to the expression taking "French leave." As this means to leave without giving notice, so Italian leave would to give notice without leaving. Mlle. Trebelli has just bidden adieu to the public of the Italian opera here in Rossini, after making a decided impression. Managers must be on the look-out, for there is very little doubt this young contralto is likely to prove a prize of importance. Mad. Penco has appeared in Norma, in which she shows so much dramatic power, assisted by a new Adalgisa, under the name of Blondini. Her real name is Mlle. Euneguit, and she is a pupil of M. Masset. Her nervousness rendered it impossible to judge of the capabilities of Mlle. Euneguit.

BRUSSELS.—Only the other day a theatre at Barcelona was burnt down, and now another at Brussels has shared in the fate which seems sooner or later to await buildings devoted to the drama. The Théâtre des Nouveautés, the establishment in the Belgian capital I allude to, was built only eighteen years ago. Like the fire at Covent Garden, it seems to have originated in the lofts above the audience part. Letters from Berlin announce that Mad. Lagræna has arrived in the Prussian capital, and will make her appearance in Nourmahal, and in Spontini's Vestale.—Musical World.

MEXICO.—Letters from Mexico give a more encouraging account of operatic affairs there. Maretzek arrived with his troupe on the 10th of April, and commenced his season on the 13th. The "Trovatore," "Ernani," the "Barbiere," "Norma," "Lucrezia Borgia," "L'Italiani in Algieri," and "Martha," have been successively given, with very fair success. The sisters Natali had made a most favorable impression, particularly Agnes. Madame d'Angri had also become very popular, and Bischi, the new basso, is spoken of in terms of high praise. It was in contemplation to produce the "Prophete" as soon as the necessary preparations could be got through. The mise en scene was to be on a scale of great splendor.

Galignani's Messenger of May 1st says: "M. Mario starts immediately for London, having in consequence of Smith's resigning the direction of Her Majesty's, where he had accepted an engagement for the season—again come to terms with his former manager, Mr. Gye. M. Belart, whose singing of the music of Rossini is now the best by far on the stage, is engaged by M. Calzado as second tenor for three years. Mme. Albou is on a tour, singing in public concerts, in Ireland. Herz's well filled salle a few evenings since afforded one of the most reliable tests of the favor enjoyed by Mlle. Ida Boullée, one of our best lady professors on the piano, and a composer of taste and elegance. She was also much admired in "Morceaux" from Liszt and Chopin. She was assisted by M. Leon Lafant and Mme. Requier Delaunay. The crowning treat of the soirée was, however, the concerto, the orchestra being capably led by M. Tilmant."

PARIS, MAY 10, 1861.—The pamphlet entitled Richard Wagner et Tannhäuser à Paris, which was merely mentioned in the last letter deserves more attention than could be devoted to them. The author Charles Baudelaire merely reproduces with few modifications a paper published in the Revue Européenne, adding under the heading, "A few words more," a dozen pages upon the failure of the work at the grand opera. The unsuccessful trials he explains on several grounds, some of which have already been mentioned in your journal. He concludes by asserting that the French public has not heard Tannhäuser, that the opposition was systematic, the work of the abonnés "who care more for the physical charms of the dansesuses" than for any music, and who never could pardon Wagner for banishing the ballet from his work and leaving their protégées, to use a milder term than the author, in the back ground. There might perhaps have also been a secret opposition to the Emperor. However Charles Baudelaire augurs well from even the too quick passage of Tannhäuser. He speaks of a reaction as manifested in various circles in favor of the work.

The Grand Opera has been giving special attention of late to the ballet. Mad. Ferraris in Graziosa continues to be the chief attraction—Le marché des Innocents is in preparation. This is a Russian importation to be adapted to the French stage by Petipa for his sister-in-law Mad. Petipa. The music is by Pugnî. The eminent Italian choregraph Borri is preparing for autumn a grand ballet in which Mad. Ferraris is to appear.

Of more serious productions, the Alceste of Gluck with Mad. Viardot is spoken of. The Freyeschütz is in active preparation. We had the other night David's Herculanium.

At the Theatre Français and at the Odeon still Lëgouvé's pieces. It is enough to a satiety of the Academician.

The representations of Salvator Rosa at the Opera Comique were interrupted by the indisposition of Mlle. Lemercier. Mlle. Belia however, is continuing the success of the work. The Circassienne is still played occasionally. Bataille is engaged at the Opera Comique. He is to make his first appearance June 1st in the Fée aux roses.

A Russian tenor Nikolski is much spoken of. A new opera by Schliebler "The Count of Santarem" has been represented at Leipzig.

The public mind is for the present somewhat diverted from the musical productions by those of the plastic arts now in exposition at the Palace of Industry. F. B.

COLOGNE.—A new Symphony by Th. Gouvy (No. 3 in C) has been performed here, the author conducting, and was received with warm applause. It is asserted that this composition denotes a great progress since the first two Symphonies were written.

THE MARSEILLAISE.—The "Gartenlaube," an extensively read German periodical, shows that the melody of the "Marseillaise" was composed by a German, a certain Holtzmann, chapelmaster at one of the small Rhenish Courts. The melody originally belongs to the Credo of Holtzmann's Missa solennis No. 4, lately found among old rubbish by the third or fourth successor of the old organist. The Marseillaise is not a reminiscence of it but a close copy. As in the times of the outbreak of the French revolution music for the Catholic church was circulated mostly in manuscript, the organists all over Germany and France being a large fraternity were constantly in communication with each other, exchanging music and observations on the merit of the same, this is not at all so likely as it might appear at the first moment. Rouget de Lisle, the poet, was no doubt a good Catholic, and may have been a good musician, too. Of course this explodes Lamartine's romantic story about the origin of the Song and air, which is rather a pity.

HAMBURG.—Mad. Louisa Michael-Michaeli, a Swedish singer, gave two concerts in this city last month. Her selection embraced every style; Schumann, Weber, Meyerbeer, Verdi. She is reported to be a singer of the very first rank. With a voice, pure as gold of true feminine character, reaching through two octaves up to D, she masters every difficulty, with the greatest ease. She is engaged in London for the coming season. She has been instructed by Günther in Stockholm, and for the last year by Mad. Lind-Goldschmidt. Her voice is much like Clara Novello's, when in her prime.

A German traveller writes from the West Indies, that the colored sailors on board a steamer plying between Vera Cruz and St. Thomas, sang and danced to Kücken's well-known air, "The young recruit," provided with English words. In course of time it may get into the States as a new Ethiopian melody.

WAGNER'S FLYING DUTCHMAN.—Once more Mr. Richard Wagner. Since witnessing the Tannhäuser we had some vague misgivings that we might have been hasty in our judgment of his merits as a composer, and we seized the first opportunity of again hearing his music, while yet in the land of his birth. The Grand Opera offering to its patrons and the public generally, the "Zwischenakt," "Der Fliegende Holländer," (Flying Dutchman), by the author above named, we determined on being one of the invited. The opera house is not such an one as we had expected to see in this great capital of Germany; as, however, Government has under consideration plans for the construction of a new one, we will be silent in any blame merely occupying ourselves with the scene. The plot of the "Flying Dutchman" is exceedingly simple: A Norwegian vessel, on a homeward voyage, is compelled by stress of weather to enter a port only a few miles from her destination. She has not more than cast anchor and furled sails when another ship makes for the same haven. It is the phantom ship, or Flying Dutchman. The two captains get into conversation, the Norwegian informing the Hollander that his home is within a few miles of their landing; the latter, without any ceremony, invites himself home with the Norwegian salt, and to make himself the more welcome, presents a coffer full of pearls and similar valuables, brought from his vessel to his host. They progress rapidly in each other's favor, and the question of a daughter, passing fair is discussed and a marriage agreed upon. They leave for the home of the Norwegian, and act first ends.

The second act brings us in the midst of a bevy of Norwegian maidens, busy with the spinning wheel. The daughter, dressed like a countess, seems to be nursing a silent sorrow.

There is an old nurse of course—and a young huntsman; the latter during the absence of the maiden's parents, has been quite sweet upon the daughter, and they appear to have broken the "sixpence." When the scene opens however, an old portrait, which it appears had never seriously occupied their attention, rises all at once into a formidable rival of the young deerstalker. The daughter feels instinctively that her fate is connected with this portrait, she is interrupted in the expression of her sentiments by the arrival of her father accompanied by the Dutchman whose portrait, wonderful to relate, is the one in question. The father, like a sensible old fellow, leaves the pair to mutual explanations. The mysterious navigator goes at once into the matter, explains that he is seeking a wife who will be faithful under all circumstances. The young lady declares she has been a long time expecting him, and that she is willing to be his at all hazards—and the act closes.

The final act commences with a scene between the young hunter and the fair maiden, the former, in the warmth of his affections to the affianced bride begins to get rather spooney. She acknowledges that once she had rather a liking for him, but now her duty, &c., &c., that she would always consider him as a friend, &c., &c. The Dutchman, who has been eaves-dropping—instead of appearing satisfied with the declaration of the young girl, rushes off declaring that his fate calls him hence. His ship, very conveniently placed, starts at once with her commander, amid a terrific storm of blue lights, rattling of shot, shaking of sheet iron and the thundering of the big drum. The young maiden, with strength beyond what one could expect, tears herself from the grasp of her father and some half dozen others, rushes to a cliff, calls to the flying Dutchman that she will be faithful even in death—and throws herself into the rolling—canvas.—Vienna Cor. of N. O. Picayune.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Massachusetts Line. Campaign Song.
Air "Yankee Doodle." 25

The words of this song, which nobly chime the praise of our old Bay State, have been written by the Rev Robert T. S. Lowell, to the air of "Yankee Doodle." They have been extensively copied by the newspaper press of New England, and no volume of Camp Songs issued will not be without them.

A whisper from the heart. Frank Mori. 25

A very acceptable Song, by a popular English balladist, who always writes well, and as his own ballads always form the larger part of his concert programmes, writes also with a view to proper effect and the instant appreciation of an audience. He has well succeeded with this song.

Instrumental Music.

God save the Queen. Transcription. F. Oesten. 25

A very brilliant arrangement of this air, adopted by us as one of our national Odes. The piece demands hardly more experience in the performer than Oesten's well-known operatic Fantasias. In these times when all the patriotic airs are at a large premium, every good performer on the piano should add good arrangements of any of them to his or her portfolio.

He was despised. "Messiah." 4 hrs. Rimbault. 15

Cujus animam. "Stabat Mater." " " 15

In Jewry is God known. Anthem. " " 15

Sound the loud timbrel. " " " 15

O had I Jubal's lyre. " " " 15

Very easy arrangements for little players. These are arrangements of sterling sacred airs. They make capital Sabbath-music and are instructive when practiced with a tesseher.

My Waltzes. E. M. Flanders. 25

Easy and melodious.

Books.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES, with symphonies and accompaniments, by Sir John Stevenson, and characteristic words by Thomas Moore. With a portrait. Price, $1,50; in cloth, $2,50; cloth, full gilt, $3,00.

In a very neat, convenient, and durable form we have in this volume the fine old Melodies of Ireland wedded to the charming ballads which have, more than any other of his works, immortalized the name of Moore, and made it a familiar household word throughout the civilized world. There has been, and always will be, a peculiar charm about the music and the poetry of this work, and though the expression in reference to a new book, has become somewhat hackneyed that "no library is complete without it," we may venture to say, that used in connection with this elegant edition of "Moore's Melodies," it will come to each of our readers as a very truthful declaration. There are many editions of these Melodies published in this country, but this is the only one in which the words are accompanied by the music, and here we may mention that with Moore the words and the music are one. "So intimately," says an English writer, "were they united in his mind, that the sight of the songs crowded together in one volume unaccompanied by music notes inflicted on him positive pain."

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 479.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 10.

Bell-Songs.

BY ROSE TERRY.

NO. 1.—"FUNERA PLANGO."

Toll, toll, toll! soar thou passing bell,
Over meadows green and quiet,
Over towns where life runs riot;
Do thine errand well!
Sing thy message, sad and calm,
Cold and holy as a psalm,
Hush us with thy knell!

Toll, toll, toll! over wind and wave:
Through the sunshine's sudden fading,
Through the pine-tree's voice upbraiding,
Where the wild seas rave.
Snow-drifts for the summer wait;
Slumber for the desolate;
Silence in the grave.

Toll, toll, toll! through the quivering sky;
Chime thy song of wintry weather;
Cruel through the rapturous ether,
Call the bride to die.
Chill, with thy relentless tongue,
Eyes that smiled and lips that sung;
Bid delight good-by.

Toll, toll, toll! heaven is in the sound!
Sad alone to souls unready.
They whose lamps were trimmed and steady
Christ rejoicing found.
On the rolling waves of tone
Float I to the Master's throne,
Life and love abound.

NO. 2.—FULGORA FRANGO.

Swinging slowly through the thunder,
Thrill the vivid bolts asunder,
Make the storm-wind quail.
Hurl thy challenge, stern defender,
Fierce against the tempest's splendor,
Past the hissing hail.

Leaping through affrighted heaven,
Swift the wrathful flames are driven,
Flashing death and fear.
Speak thou bell! with sullen clangor,
Overcry the tempest's anger,
Force the storm to hear.

Unrelenting, burning, streaming,
Red o'er livid oceans gleaming,
Lightnings rend the sky.
Break the thunder's fearful chorons,
Lift thy peal of triumph o'er us,
Floating strong and high.

Tell the soul thy signal story,
How its own inherent glory
Nature's might shall quell.
Ring a pæan for the spirit
Fire nor flood shall disinherit.
Praise thy makers, bell!

NO. 3.—SABBATA PANGO.

Calmly dawns the golden day,
Over mountains pale and gray.
Man, forsake thy sleep and pray.
Come, come, come!

Swinging through the silent air,
Lo! the call itself is prayer
Fence thy soul from sin and care.
Come, come, come!

Like a dream, serene and slow,
Through the dawn's aerial glow,
Hear the restful cadence flow;
Come, come, come!

Think that in my pleading tongue,
Through the dewy branches swung,
Christ himself this word hath sung:
Come, come, come!

Toil and battle, rest in peace,
In the holy lights increase,
Weary heart from labor cease;
Come, come, come!

Lo! up-rising from the dead,
God's own glory on His head,
His pure lips thy prayers have sped.
Come, come, come!

Verdi.

P. SCUDO, L'Année Musicale.

I have always done justice to the incontestable talent of this vigorous and passionate composer, who for twenty years has intoxicated Italy and charmed all Europe. I have not failed to recognize the splendor of his short-breathed melodies or the powerful sonority of various morceaux d'ensemble, or the originality of certain feats of the voice and of some formulas of accompaniment that are to be observed in his best operas; but I cannot forget that I have heard in my life the the greatest works of Gluck, Mozart, Weber, Cimarosa, Rossini, Donizetti and Bellini; I cannot obliterate from my memory the impressions and recollections that have been left by the charming masters of the French school, Grétry, Méhul, Cherubini, Boieldieu, Hérold and Auber; I cannot shake off two hundred years of musical civilization and tradition which envelope and support my soul; in a word, it is not in my power to repel the influence of the glorious inheritance that has been left to me and of which I myself am one of the products, nor can I help preferring one page of Virgil to all the Pharsalia of Lucan; a sketch by Raphael to a hundred modern pictures that I could name; the Pavillon de l'Horloge in the Court of the Louvre to all the buildings erected in Paris within the last fifty years, the William Tell of Rossini to fifty operas by M. Verdi. I well understand the objections that can be raised against this way of contemplating the phenomena of Art. "Do you not like variety?" they say, "Do you not admit progress?" Each civilization impresses upon Art the physiognomy peculiar to it and the ideal of beauty which it has conceived. Virgil has not continued the epic of Homer, and the moral world that he has evoked resembles in no respect that of the Divina Commedia of Dante; Raphael has expressed a different ideal of beauty from that which inspired Apelles or Zeuxis; Praxiteles does not resemble Michel Angelo, who himself can in no way be confounded with any of his numerous successors. In the theatre and in music, this variety of types and horizons is still greater. What is there more unlike than the language and the moral world of Sophocles compared with the vast, bloody and complicated drama of Shakspeare? The tragedies of Corneille and Racine reproduce morals and paint characters that are not to be found in the profound and naïve works of the English poet. The Faust of Goethe, the Wallenstein of Schiller, neither resemble the drama of Shakspeare or the French tragedy of the age of Louis XIV. Is the opera of Gluck the same as that of Mozart? The Freyschütz of Weber has no relation with Don Juan, the manner of Rossini does not resemble that of Cimarosa, and between the Freyschütz and William Tell, Meyerbeer has placed the combined type of Robert le Diable. Genius is not an absolute force which produces always and alone the same result. A work of art is the fruit of two elements which interpenetrate and are confounded with each other; of the individual inspiration of the artist and of the manners and tendency of the society for which he labors. M. Verdi, who is above all a dramatic composer, neither wished nor was able to continue simply the manner and style of Rossini. Endowed with another genius and responding to different wants he has produced a work full of passion which pleases the public and is played in all the theatres of the world. You are wrong to fight, as you have done, the only musician who remains standing, since the death of Donizetti, and who has sustained for twenty years the enfeebled sovereignty of Italy. The public is always right in applauding what pleases it, and when it is amused by a work of art, it pays little heed to the vain protests of criticism, which has never put anything down, or raised anything up. Variety is an imperious necessity of the human mind, which perpetually craves something new, even if there no more in the world, for it tires of everything, even of what is exquisite — even of pâtés d'anguille.

I do not think I have in any way weakened the language used by the admirers of M. Verdi. It would not be difficult however, to prove to them that one may be of a different opinion without failing to appreciate the value of the object which excites their enthusiasm. Criticism, it might be said to them, has not the ridiculous pretensions attributed to it. He knows well that it is not in her power to prevent the river from flowing or to create life where the breath of God has not passed. As a preventive power, criticism, when exercised with moderation and sagacity awakens good taste, establishes order in intellectual affairs excites the brave, supports the weak and sometimes brings back the erring. Criticism does not create the principles upon which its judgments rest, she deduces them from history and the works accomplished by the human mind. Either it must be conceded that justice and injustice, truth and falsehood, beauty and ugliness are only words, having an arbitrary signification and that there are only sensations that are of any value and which cannot be discussed; or we must recognize with the human race that error is possible and that man possesses in himself notions, presentiments of what is just, beautiful and true. Time develops the notions; these presentiments of a tender conscience become facts and are transformed into monuments, and these accumulated monuments mark the different civilizations that succeed each other upon the earth. Placing itself in this last point of view, and it is difficult, not to say impossible to choose any other without destroying the foundations of all credibility, criticism has a mission perfectly defined, and its part is so important that it need have no desire to fill a higher place. Armed with the immutable principles which govern the human mind, enlightened by History and knowledge of the processes that make up the traditions of every art, criticism, which is nothing more than reason clothed with sensibility, has the right to say, even to genius, that it deceives itself and that the work which draws down upon it such brilliant acclamations is not worth the price that is attached to it. Criticism can go still further in promoting the taste of a nation by scourging out, as did Boileau, bad poets and bad writers who obstruct the highways and usurp the place and the honors due to true merit; by exciting the pride of a people to shake off the yoke of imitation and create for itself a national literature, as did Lessing in Germany. It would be a fine task worthy of an enlightened mind (like M. Sainte Beuve) to write the history of criticism from the time of Aristotle, its founder, passing through the school of Alexandria, the Augustan age, the Renaissance, the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries down to the period of expansion in 1852, when when its voice gave forth a note which made an integral part of that glorious concert of the triumphal youth. It would be easy to prove how useful this noble faculty of the mind has been to civilization in enlightening genius, in divulging its secrets, in propagating sound doctrines, and in making popular great works that should excite an eternal admiration. And, to return to the subject before us, it would be proved that, without the lively and just reprimands of criticism, Rossini would never have given to the world his William Tell.

M. Verdi is not a great musician; the language that he has adopted is violent and often rude; he writes badly and is almost ignorant of the most important art of developing an idea and deducing from it its legitimate consequences. He dashes off effects, and storms with the passions instead of evoking them with skillful management; his characters are almost always in a fury with poniard in hand. The monotonous and bloody melodramas of M. Verdi have spoiled the taste of Italy and have taught her to forget to laugh who had known how to laugh so well! They have made her lose the fine traditions of the art of singing and have excited in a nation admirably endowed, but slothful and tolerably ignorant, a senseless pride. The imitators of M. Verdi are not to be tolerated because the manner of the master is altogether individual, and he himself could not modify himself; it is only Genius, seconded by science that can renew and transform itself and M. Verdi is only a man of talent who has experience without true learning. His music produces the same effect on the public, that the scarlet cloth does that is flaunted before the bull. It intoxicates it with a confused sonority, over-excites its material sensibility and renders it incapable of enjoying the qualities of that higher art which speaks to the imagination, awakens the fancy and penetrates gently into the depths of the soul. This is what we have been writing for ten years past nor have the successes of the author of Ernani, Rigoletto and Il Trovatore been able to shake our convictions. We do not dispute with the public the pleasure that it experiences in hearing certain operas of M. Verdi, but we do allow ourselves to say to it that it deceives itself as to the quality and worth of the object which pleases it, as well as in respect to the nature of the æsthetic or moral pleasure that it experiences.

Roger's Mode of Singing.

From the German of W. H. RIEHL.

Roger is more than a singer; he is a dramatic poet. By his wonderful power of acting he creates new situations, new causes of action, which are found neither in the text nor in the score; he gives such an abundance of individualization to his parts, that without our perceiving it, the opera hero is transformed into the more highly developed hero of tragedy. We hear an opera, and, when the curtain falls, it seems as if we had seen one of Shakespeare's dramas.

Eleazar, in Halevy's La Juive, sits in the vestibule of the court-house. He struggles with himself whether he shall deliver Recha over to death, or whether he shall save her. Only a few measures of ritornello give time for this dumb play. Most singers in this situation would do nothing more than indicate the inward struggle by looks and movements. But this does not suffice for Roger. He only gradually unfolds the situation in short but measured play. We do not only read one sensation in his face; but he shows us how thought follows thought, how feeling gives way to feeling; in these few measures of a ritornello he unfolds the whole series of thoughts, which is to be given to us musically hereafter by the aria, in a unique, logical clearness by this play alone. He composes a sort of by-plot in his face, he adds what poet and composer have forgotten, what they thought too general, what they have not satisfactorily individualized. But through this wonderfully active individualization, Roger often forgets the essential characteristic of tragic style; he weaves genre-pictures into the drama. Upon the whole the manner in which Roger conceives his tragic parts does not remind us of the historical, classical style of the old French tragedy, but of that modern school of historical genre-painting, now so much in vogue with French artists, but attempted only by a few as yet, to our knowledge, in the dramatic art. Perhaps the circumstance that Roger began his career in comic opera, for a long time gave himself entirely up to it, and only commenced much later to use his powers in tragic, will give us a useful hint. For even in tragic opera the comedian appears in him, wherever the situation allows.

Several of the greatest tragic actors have commenced their career as comedians. While tragedy is apt to lead to mere declamation, comedy produces a finer portraying of individual character. He who has acquired the art of acting by means of comedy is armed with the best protective against the very contagious disease of over-declamation. To be sure, this is a severe cure, and only a strong, really artistic mind can stand it. And for such a one, just on this account, it proves the more effectual. Roger treats the music in comic opera just as the French comedian treats the dialogue. He strives for single musical points, he concentrates the musical expression just in the place where it seems necessary to him, as in an epigram, he sings waggishly, jocosely, and—if the expression be not too daring wittily, not humorously. By his charming play he excites the powers of the intellect, mingling but rarely a flavor of graceful sentimentality. A German singer of the same rank would, notwithstanding all the witty points, in the end appeal to the secrets of the heart. French comic art is based on the idea of wit, the irony of form, the satire of outward deeds and appearances; German comic art upon the idea of humor, that is, the satire of the inner nature of man.

In Germany, the public was struck by the manner in which Roger treated even the purely musical portion of the comic opera. Having heard nothing similar before, it had nothing to compare him with, and, therefore, perhaps unjustly considered him as superior in his comic parts. For, even if it happens very seldom that we hear a German singer sing with humor, it was totally unheard of that such a one should sing wittily. Roger makes his points even in the coloring of the tone; he imparts to it, according to the circumstances, a tinge of whining or of bawling, or he lets the tone sink to the tuneless recitative, in order then suddenly to jerk it up to the highest power, by which means he produces such a drastic comicality, that we can not avoid laughing at passages which to judge from their rendering by German singers, we should never have dreamed to be comic. As the caricature purposely introduces misshapen figures in order to obtain the appearance of the ridiculous, so Roger boldly brings in what, under other circumstances, we should consider as a fault in vocal execution.

Roger sings entirely like a Frenchman; but he avoids French mannerism, elevating it by the power of his style. His singing is declamation; all French music, from Philidor to Halevy, wherever it was truly original, was at bottom more than declamation. It is true, indeed, that Roger, as far as regards science, was formed in the Italian school; but if you overlook the portamento, the intonation, in fact all that must be considered as acquired, as study, his whole delivery belongs to the French declamatory style. He avails himself of the mechanical advantages of the pure Italian school, in order thereby to render clearer and purer the true French mode of delivery. In fact, there are good singers of two kinds. The first sing in opera for the sake of the music; for the other, the music is only a means for the purpose of dramatic action. On the one side are the Italians, on the other the French and Germans. But Roger sings in such a manner that you at last entirely forget that he is singing. You consider his singing as his natural language. No doubt, there are singers with more colossal voices than that of Roger—singers with more dazzling exterior art, but perhaps none who by their singing make us forget that they are merely singing, so completely as Roger.

People have wondered that Roger sometimes uses so little voice. Just as if an opera character were for the voice, and not rather the voice for the character. How childishly they yet judge concerning the delivery in the musical drama! The time has long gone by when it was demanded of an actor that he should constantly use the full power of his voice; it is well known that just the timely dropping of the voice adds much to the heightening of dramatic expression. Nobody at the present time thinks of estimating the artistic worth of SEYDELMANN or of DOERING* by the power of his voice. But in opera they still do so. The public thereby places itself upon the same grade of criticism towards the opera as it occupied a hundred years ago in respect to the drama, when the audience always applauded, above all things, the loudest tones of the actors.

During the last century, notwithstanding many backward movements, the opera has adopted more from the drama. A further cultivation of the opera is indeed only practicable in such a manner that it may take the more individual characteristic from the drama and amalgamate it with its own organization. Roger has placed himself upon the boundary stone of the new epoch. Formerly when actors and singers sat together at the festive table, it was customary that an actor should bring a toast to the prosperity of the opera, and in return, a singer to the success of the drama. And during this ceremony each party shook their fists, under the table, at the others, and wished them in a place not to be mentioned to ears polite. There was a deep truth, and, at the same time, a bitter irony in this ancient custom. In course of time, however, it has ceased. In the time of Faustina Hasse, the composer cared, by the simplicity and naturalness of his vocalization, that the physical means of the singer should be able to finish the opera. Nowadays the singer himself must care for this by using his voice in an economical manner. In considering the opera as a musical drama, however, this external necessity is also justified aesthetically. Thus Roger knows to save the power of his voice exclusively for the decisive points in the drama, and thereby acquires a tenfold effect for it. For although it already possesses great intensity of tone, naturally, still it would never be considered as among the first in power, if the singer by his wise economy did not practice a very allowable deception upon us. And then when we hear the full power of his chest-voice suddenly come forth, we believe ourselves transported back to that old time of vocal wonders when Balthazar Ferri could with the greatest ease take passages of fifty seconds' duration in one breath; when Farinelli was able to sing with such power as to drown the fortissimo notes of the loudest trumpet. And then, also, we can believe the assertion of one of our best teachers, Nehrlich, when he says that it is only the laziness and stupidity of our present singers which make them declare such deeds of the masters of the olden time to be impossibilities, mere fables.

The art of increasing the force of the voice far above its natural power rests, with Roger, however, not only upon this wise economy of his. He also possesses the power of using, according as the text requires, entirely different kinds of voice; now the soft metallic tone of the D string of the violin; now the sharp, piercing toneless notes of the vox humana of the organ; now again the crashing trumpet-sounds of the tenor's fullest chest voice, or the sweet flute tones of his falsetto. The actress RACHEL made a similar use of different kinds of voice, in a masterly manner in the Alexandrine verses of French tragedy. On the German ear this has a singular effect; for it seems as if the verses were being sung in a sort of primitive chant of nature. In an opposite manner the same thing appears in Roger, so that it seems as if, in his musical tones, the performer were speaking the natural language of tragedy. Thus, even here, the favorite modern idea of the fraternization of opera and drama finds its realization. Roger, the singer, is to such an extent an actor that he usually abstains from painting, lest the finesse of the play of his countenance should be destroyed by the red color. The ancient opera hero, who came upon the stage with a dozen arias in one evening, was only satisfied with himself when his appearance was imposing. With Roger this is not at all so. On the contrary, you see that he was he in fact not born to be a delineator of heroic characters. Even his outer build obliged him to form that style of historical, genre-painting in tragic opera which marks him so uniquely. He is small in stature, too small for a hero. But when in the second act of Lucia he appears at the top of the steps which lead into the festal hall, his countenance ghastly, his hair standing wildly on end, each motion awfully fixed, and measured, then this horrible figure glows before our eyes, surpassing every thing, so totally does the scene which we see with our mind destroy all proportion for the scene which is before our bodily eyes.—Musical Review and World.

*Celebrated German actors.

W. A. Mozart.

BY OTTO JAHN.—(FOURTH PART.)

I

We do not think we could begin a new annual volume of the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung better than by announcing the appearance of the fourth part of an artistic biography, the equal of which we should seek in vain among the literature of all civilized nations. With the fourth part of this work, Otto Jahn has given the finishing touch to the monument he has erected to the greatest master of any age—a monument which not only like a sculptured memorial, recalls to our mind and renders present to us him in whose honor it was raised, but which breathes intellect and life in every page, and opens the gates by which we arrive at the depths of genius. The work, too, is a monument of the earnest industry peculiar to the scholars of Germany. But, however meritorious industry and labor, together with thorough and conscientious investigation, may be, their invaluable results give the author only a partial right to the acknowledgement and gratitude of his contemporaries. That which, in the eyes of the musician and the lover of art, imparts to the book in its greatest value, is not so much historical as its critically aesthetic contents. The analysis of Mozart's works affords us a clear insight into the master's process of working, for the author penetrates, as far as it is permitted to human eye to penetrate, into the mysterious mode in which genius creates, and then exhibits to us, with conscious clearness, and not with fantastic sentimentality, the perfect beauty of the completed work of art, measuring and proving its truthfulness by the agreement which exists between its purport and its form. A rich treasure of musically aesthetic knowledge is contained in this book, especially in the last part, whose worth, when compared with the shallowness of our present art-philosophy, cannot be too highly estimated. May this treasure be drawn upon every possible manner—that is to say, in the best acceptance of the words—in order that it may become the common property of all establishments for musical education, and in all circles where musical art is loved and practised, as well as in all those where men discuss and gossip about it. It is impossible to find a more powerful antidote against that stupor of healthy feeling for what is musically beautiful, which has overpowered a portion of the youth of the present age, than Mozart's music, the explanation of its essential qualities, and of the reason of its especial beauties, as conditions of musical beauty generally.

Before we notice the rich contents of the fourth part, now before us, we cannot refrain from at once giving, in proof of what we have said, out of the first section (Book four, 12), which treats of Mozart's pianoforte music, a few of the principal passages referring to the sonata (the fundamental form, at the same time, of the symphony, the quartet, &c.)

"After the contrapuntal treatment of a theme in the strictly close style was abandoned, there arose in the development of the sonata, as the starting point, the characteristic extension of certain motives, in opposition to the style with figures and passages, and particularly, side by side with the principal theme, a second theme, independently enounced, and, by sharply defined limits, standing prominently forth, which, in conformity with a rule soon established, commences in the dominant of the principal major key (C major, G major), or on the parallel of the principal minor key (C minor, E flat major), these are the two principal supports of the movement; their farther working out, their connection, by means of intermediate members, and conclusion of the part, were not fixed by rules, except in so far as that the conclusion of the part followed in the dominant. In the place of a more or less elaborated transition into the principal key, came the important second part, the working-out. One or more of the motives used in the first part, or even completely new ones, are subjected to a treatment, at one time more peculiarly harmonic and at another thematic, which—by causing, with vivifying force, blossoms and fruit to spring forth from the germs contained in the former part—heightens the interest, and at the same time, organically effects the return to the first part; here, also, is artistic strength concentrated, geniality and mastery being especially manifested in the modulation and return to the first theme. The repetition of the first part takes place with various modifications partly necessitated by the fact that the second theme now appears in the principal key, in which the movement closes; besides this, there may be introduced changes in the grouping of the separate elements, abridgment or extension of certain details, but especially a lengthening and heightening of the conclusion, which cause the first part repeated to appear as the third, not only as regards its arrangement, but its importance.

"Mozart found these elements and their organization ready to his hands, but he extended and stamped them in a manner corresponding to his own nature. With him, the second theme, which is here the principal subject of consideration, not only appears as an independent one, as it is always very definitely announced, but, in its whole character, as a counter-theme to the principal one, which, as such, stands out prominently in a remarkable manner from the mass of the whole part. It is in the formation of the themes, however, that Mozart's peculiarity is especially exhibited; its most prominent character is vocality (das Gesangmässige), in which Nägeli (Vorlesungen über Musik, p. 156), in consequence of a one-sided view of the freedom of instrumental music, beheld an abuse of style, and the ruin of pianoforte playing. We may say much more truly that Mozart essentially promoted what Ph. E. Bach considered to be the task of the pianoforte player and composer (I., p. 10), and what Haydn adopted from him, namely, the task of writing vocally. There is a fact too, which is not without significance: Mozart's musical education commenced with vocal music, and his inclination tended towards it in a higher degree than was the case with the composers above mentioned. Just as the pianoforte composer gave up the polyphonic style, and just as it was no longer a question of inventing a theme, to be worked out in certain forms according to rule, but of free melody, capable by its beauty and symmetry, of becoming the satisfactory expression of artistic feeling, song necessarily became the starting point for the formation of melody. We would not say that certain forms created for song should, without more ado, be transferred to the pianoforte; these could only constitute an analogy, and the laws on which they were based must necessarily be applied in conformity with the exigencies of the nature of the instrument. Hence, we never find in Mozart's pianoforte or instrumental compositions generally the forms of the Italian cantilena; a cursory glance at his Italian operas will prove the difference in the treatment of the melody. Where, in the instrumental works, there is an affinity with vocal compositions, it points to German opera, especially Die Zauberflöte, and this is very intelligible, for, in his instrumental music, Mozart gave his feeling the nearest and natural form of expression, without, as in Italian opera, being restricted to any particular form; as, in the German opera, he treated song with the same freedom, the inevitable result was that the forms, already developed, of German instrumental music, presented him, in many points, support and analogies. The general condition of a beautiful melody, as grounded on the mutual relations of interests, rhythms and harmony, were perfectly appreciated in the pianoforte compositions. Each separate melody is completely developed as well as symmetrically organized, and possesses in itself character and significance, an excellence of formal construction, rendered still more striking by that peculiar charm or harmony and delicacy inseparable from Mozart's being. In the execution of such melodies the most beautiful excellence or Mozart's pianoforte-playing, that something which, according to Haydn's assertion, went to the heart, was perhaps especially prominent; it is sometimes astonishing how, for instance, in the concertos, the principal effect is concentrated on the execution of a long, simple, and sustained melody, which he must have understood in a masterly manner.

"To this advance in the song-like and significant treatment of the separate melody is joined an extraordinary richness of melodies generally.

In the place of those connecting members which usually form runs and passages deduced from the principal motives, or introduced independently, Mozart, however, as a rule, substitutes completely developed melodies, and thus wreathes a garland of beautiful melodies, where people had been accustomed to hear merely musical turns.

"Two essential advantages were gained. By this sharp juxtaposition of the developed melodies, the musical phrase, the merely effectuating turn, the simple playing with figures, for the purpose of getting on, was excluded, or, at any rate greatly circumscribed. Such expedients are commonly very rare with Mozart. He mostly uses figures and passages as ornaments twining around and adorning a definite and solid kernel, but not constituting independent members of the whole. When, too, mere formula of transition appear indispensable, he employs them mostly without much ado, just as in architecture the pillar is applied as an artistic motive in such a fashion that its constructional importance is clearly apparent. To this head we must refer the emphatic and broad treatment of the finales, and half finales, which are now so striking that they appear to many people as a specific peculiarity of Mozart's style; they are, however, no such a thing; they were, at that period, general, and proceeded from the necessity of being maintained fixedly and definitely in the key, a necessity on which, at that time, especial stress was laid. That composers have become freer in this respect, and learnt to introduce varied, charming, and exciting traditional turns instead of a plump common-place, is an undoubted advance; but that, notwithstanding, Mozart is not deficient in delicate and interesting turns, any one may convince himself by observing his returns to the theme in the second part, and, for instance, merely the richness to which the simple fundamental force of the point d'orgue, is developed, in the most beautiful and most charming modes of appliance.

"The second advantage was the comprehensive clearness of the plan of a musical movement, a clearness which is as intelligible as in an architectural ground-plan, and which, both in great little things, is one of the unalienable excellences of Mozart's art. By means of this, the principal points of a thoroughly developed organization were fixed. These, necessary in themselves and sufficient for the object in view, could in their turn become the points of support for a rich and copious amplification, and before such a detailed and thorough development was possible, it was necessary that the simple scheme should be clearly and securely fixed.

"Mozart has in no wise exhausted the substance of the form of representation thus founded by him; others have merely imitated what he did. Beethoven entered on the intellectual inheritance, and has shown what depth and fullness there lay concealed in it, but whatever astonishing results he may have obtained, all the germs are far from being developed. Our own age, whose invention and skill are preponderatingly apparent in interesting and delicate forms of transition, and in a consistent spinning-out of small motives, which can lay claim only to a subordinate place in a great whole, is, above all things, to be reminded of the fact, that well-developed, firmly articulated melodies, should constitute the fundamental elements of a composition.

"In the choice and arrangement of them, so that the one shall set forth the other in the most varied manner, is Mozart's delicate feeling invariably evident. He has the skill more particularly, in some part of the work where we least expect it, to surprise us by a new melody of peculiar beauty, as for instance, immediately after the first theme, which generally causes a certain satisfaction, a completely different motive is introduced. But, above all, he produces an inimitable effect by bringing forward, when everything is tending rapidly to the end, a melody decked out with all the charms of freshness and sweetness, and which not only again excites our interest, but gives a new turn to the whole. To adduce a striking example of this, and one known to every one, I would remind the reader of the first symphony in C major. Who has not, with ever-reviving astonishment, been entranced by the melody introduced at the last, and which, like a gleaming meteor, darts forth a flood of light and gaiety? Similar effects, if not always so brilliant, are by no means rare; they have never been equalled, and, indeed, scarcely attempted by any one else. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the partiality evinced by Mozart for placing in a strong light the conclusion and some other points, not generally so prominent, injured the second theme properly so called; and which is usually the weakest portion. The cause of this is partly, perhaps, attributable to the fact that, in opposition to the principal theme, it was intended to have a more tender and lighter character; but, compared with the other motives, it is frequently not important enough, and even sometimes produces the impression that it is neglected.

"The further extension of the fundamental scheme thus obtained could not be effected by the interpolation of mere outwardly connecting phrases between the principal members, but by the development of their purport by means of thematic treatment. We have seen above how, by the study of Bach and Handel, Mozart was guided to this course, and this tendency is very decided in later pianoforte compositions. It does not appear, however, as the return to the metrical style (gebundene Schreibart) in certain strict forms, as of the canon and the fugue, but as the free development of those general laws, on which the essential attributes of polyphonic representation and contrapuntal form depend generally. Instrumental and most especially pianoforte music, after it had been freed from the shackles of strict form, was in danger of following one-sidedly the direction of homophonic representation, and thus of becoming shallow. It is one of the services rendered by Mozart that, in the modifications, which the altered character of the conceptions and representation generally, and the nature of the instruments required, he did justice to the polyphonic and thematic mode of treatment in free and beautiful forms. This is apparent, as is natural, more especially in the modulating portions, on which the principal weights necessarily fall, and which, by this treatment, could first obtain due importance. Although Mozart did not bestow on them that extension and powerful elaboration to which they were developed by Beethoven, they yet appear in his works—even when, scantily elaborated, they are still presented as a transition—as the culminating point of the whole movement, on which its motive powers are concentrated in more lively activity. The mode of treatment is free, like the choice of motives brought into play; but it is nearly always essentially a thematic course of treatment, and frequently one very skilfully planned out and intricate, on which the effect depends. Still, at the same time, the harmonic element is by no means thrown into the background—as is well-known, it is here that the boldest and most original modulations are usually found; on a closer observation, however, we shall find that the really vivifying element is the thematizing element, and that the fashioning impulses proceed from this quarter. Thus, there are developed movements full of life, and, if we have not always an overpowering catastrophe, a knot is tied, and we are anxious to see it untied, which it always is, with agreeable certainty and ease.

"The slow movement is, as a rule, founded on the song (das Lied); it is consequently, according to its first plan, frequently bipartite, but the plan has only exceptionally been developed with the breadth and richness which have become usual in the first movement; the single or manifold repetition of the fundamental theme, which, in conformity with the custom at that time, did not often occur without ornament and decoration easily led to a treatment in the fashion of variations. In every case, the first requisite was the invention of a melodious movement, important both in substance and form, which should not be appreciated simply as a motive through the treatment, or from connection with others, but which, of itself, afforded a full and satisfactory expression for sentiment. It has already been noticed (I. p. 577) how the tendency, followed by the feeling of the time, favored the development of exactly such movements, which undoubtedly must be classed among the most beautiful creations even of Mozart. These simple and impressive melodies, beautifully articulated and steadily carried out, which die away, as in a long full breath, redolent of warm deep feeling, without sentimental weakness, appear to be a happy inheritance of that period, which produced likewise the purest strains of our lyric poetry. In the repose by which they are mostly pervaded, the pleasure and satisfaction of artistic creation are superseded in an uncommon manner; in the unlabored and easy way also in which, by a partial working out of the fundamental thoughts, by variations of the latter, by freely introduced and often contrasting under parts, these monuments are built up, without departing from the fundamental tones of feeling first laid down, we perceive how naturally and freely this mode of expression forced its way through the musical sentiment and soared to such a height. Without entering here into the details of the working-out, we may still direct attention to the delicacy and grace with which Mozart, in this case also, understood how to prepare and bring about the conclusion, so as to lead the hearer up to it with a continuous feeling of perfect satisfaction."

(To be continued.)

Of the Disposition or Vocation for Music.

Considering the importance which we attribute to musical education, and the large demands on time and powers which application to it requires, the question becomes serious; what result can be reasonably expected by each individual from his exertions in this pursuit?

This education, in order to be profitable, assumes certain predispositions in the pupil; and many a person may be drawn into a chain of labors and sacrifices, which, from want of natural appliances, may remain unrewarded. Many indeed, not ungifted individuals, capable of participating to a certain extent in art, being seduced by its charms, devote their whole lives to it and discover too late that their musical power is not sufficient for the profession, although it enables them to increase their enjoyment of art, and to have a deeper inward perception of its richness and beauty. The danger of a grave error, perhaps of a life thrown away, is more considerable to a gifted individual, than to one not so endowed; and even in the minor case of a mere amateur, the question is so important, that we cannot pass it over in a serious view of musical education, although we cannot hope to give a general and particular answer, which shall be in all cases satisfactory.

All men, with extremely few exceptions, have a disposition for music. They have even more disposition than is generally attributed to them; more than they themselves are accustomed to think. But nothing is more common than that this disposition, unrecognized by hesitating prejudice, neglected through idleness and indifference, or led astray by erroneous treatment, should become suppressed. The extremely rare exceptions are manifested by a perfect indifference to music, even to its corporeal effect, or, indeed, in some cases, by a physically perceptible repugnance to it. In this case, pleasurable sensations can be derived from the measure, or from the rhythm only.

It is much more difficult to decide, how far the disposition of any determined individual extends; what may be expected from its cultivation; and whether it be such as to justify the adoption of music as the special vocation of life.

It may be asserted in general, from hundreds of experiments and instances, and from the contemplation of the subject, that

The disposition of each individual is equivalent, and is worth cultivation, in proportion, to the pleasure felt by the individual in the art itself.

The pleasure in the art itself, not in the many subsidiary gratifications it may produce, and which may accompany an artistic life—not, therefore, the caprice of fashion, to learn music because others do—not the vanity of being better educated, nor of gaining the highest prize by redoubled exertion; all these pleasures abandon us, either before or soon after we have accomplished our object; they have been our reward such as it was, but they were not the true pleasures of art, which in the real artist grow with his growth, and are immortal as the soul that feels them. Hence, we see so many scholars, discontinuing, as soon as the days of instruction are past, all connexion with art; and hence, also, many a master, when his daily task is done, drags on the burthen of a weary life in an unloved profession, in useless sighs or resigned indifference.

But that the disposition exists in the proportion of our love of art, will be confessed by every keen observer of experience; and even without experience, we might infer that such would be the fact, since it would be purposeless to have a faculty implanted in us, which we have no power of calling into action.

He who takes pleasure in music, will soon try to imitate it; as we may remark in the youngest children, who generally sing, after their fashion, before they speak. It is chiefly in the means of musical employment, from ignorance of technicalities, that errors occur. A person may be seized with a desire to sing, but have only an indifferent voice, or rather, more probably, whose voice has been injured; or he may devote himself to an instrument, for the performance on which he is deficient in power or in corporal structure. But even in this latter case, nature will often maintain her rights, if the musical desire be original (not instilled or caught from example), and the insufficient organ will at last be developed, or it will be sustained by other powers, and completed or replaced. In all such cases, however, it is advisable to seek counsel from the skilled in the matter.

If, apparently contrary to our views, the disposition for and pleasure in music be so often concealed, or, indeed, seemingly absent,—or, if the advance or delay of the learner vary from our expectations, we shall be led to acknowledge the probability of our departure from the system required by nature for education in music, in addition to our doubtful judgment, as to the musical disposition. This disposition is composed of several powers, which are sometimes found singly, and sometimes in combination, but each of which must be separately sought and nourished, long before musical instruction, commonly so called, begins. We must come to a clear understanding upon these points. They are decisive as to the question, whether music ought to be comprehended within the course of our occupations, and very important in the consequences of its admission.

Every participation in music presupposes that it makes some pleasurable impression either corporeal or mental. The most immediate is that which is produced by the mass of sound, or any particularly agreeable character of sound, the crash of a brass band, or the silvery tone of a little bell, &c. It is simply of an elementary and material nature, and warrants no mental participation, and therefore no mental disposition. It is only in the higher region that the spiritual effect of sound is perceived, and the corporeal sensations then show themselves to be a distinct portion of the disposition for art.

Our attention is next called to motion, measure, and rhythm. A deep meaning may be in rhythm; and the forms of bars are susceptible of endless variety, whereby significance is endeavored to be shown. The groundwork of all this is the placing or distribution of more or less emphatic moments in equal measures of time. Rhythm and measure depend upon the fixing or estimating one tone to be twice, four times, or half, one fourth part, &c., as long as another. The process is facilitated by placing together parcels of moments collectively equal (though unequal among themselves) into equal divisions of time, which time within the divisions is divided in the simplest manner possible, by two or three, forming the bars of two or three parts, or of more parts in the same ratio. This is a matter merely of the understanding, of measuring and reckoning. The distinguishing of the chief and secondary parts of the bar, by accentuating the first, is also purely mechanical. We may therefore consider the rhythmic disposition to be within the capacity of any rational being. We may conclude further, from the multitudes of raw recruits who march in exact time, and of threshers, who wield the flail in perfect three or four-part order, that the idea that men in general are defective in the perception of measure in time, is a mere prejudice.

A higher qualification, quite distinct from the preceding, is the perception of tone; the capability of distinguishing different tones, and of forming a determined and more or less durable conception of their relation to each other.

The pitch, or height or depth of a tone, is represented scientifically by the number of vibrations of the sounding body which produces it. Leibnitz has even described Music (mathematically considered) as a concealed mental arithmetic, making unconscious calculations. But it seems more probable that the immediate apprehension of tones depends on a sympathy between the nerves of the hearer and the vibrations of the sounding body. The vibrations, however, of even inanimate bodies, produce sounds in other bodies similarly tuned, and moreover, call forth different but related sounds: and we find also, that trained or imitating birds, and the youngest infants, when they begin to learn singing or whistling from us, become imbued with, and can reproduce tones and successions of tones simply from hearing them.

Hence we may presume that also the faculty of a musical ear is common to most, if not to all men, so far as they can hear at all. But in this particular quality, the degrees of endowment are widely different, according to inward disposition or foreign assistance. The Author has never met with an instance of any person incapable of perceiving the difference between low and high; but it is common to find persons unable to distinguish with certainty a tone from half a tone, a third from a fourth, or a fourth from a fifth, until after some instruction and practice. Smaller intervals, as for example, a comma, or even what is called a quarter-tone, are often unappreciable to otherwise gifted musicians, especially pianists; while on the other hand, the finest gradations are usually perceptible to persons not possessed of any considerable musical qualifications, such as experimenters in acoustics, and pianoforte-tuners, who have educated the ear to such minute discrimination.

It is very common to confound this appreciation of sounds, with talent for music; or at least to consider it as an indication of that talent. This, however, must not be assumed without many allowances. If this faculty be deficient or manifestly feeble, we may certainly suppose that the original powers of the mind have not been applied to the living sounds of music; nevertheless, more than one example can be named of very small or very imperfectly developed appreciation of tone, accompanied by very considerable susceptibility for music.* On the other hand, the keenest perception of tonic differences, is by no means a sign of, nay—it is not essentially necessary for musical talent. Still less are certain external capabilities of this faculty, which are not uncommon, to be considered of any importance. Thus, there are persons not at all remarkable for musical talent, who can carry home with them from the orchestra the pitch of any piece of music, and reproduce it at pleasure. This is certainly not a useless faculty of memory, but it has no connection with deeper powers, and may indeed rather indicate a diminished activity of the imagination, unless it have been acquired by long habituation to the orchestra. On the other hand, it occasionally happens that highly-gifted singers and violinists permit themselves certain deviations from abstract purity of intonation, not from any want of perception, but from an impulse of the original and natural relations of sound, as distinguished from our artificial temperaments, or possibly from exaggerated expression.

If to these fundamental qualifications we add memory for musical compositions, a moderate activity of intellectual comprehension, and a certain degree of courage or confidence, with the necessary dexterity of limb, member, voice and speech,—we shall have assembled all the qualifications necessary for the cultivation of music. We should, however, never delay encouraging the growth of the higher faculties—the sensibility of the mind, and feelings for the significance of compositions, and of the forms of composition, and that direction of the mind which tends to give musical form and embodiment to sensations and ideas—the potent spell and mystery of the poet-musician.

We have thus endeavored to give a determined idea of the disposition for music. It is, as we have seen, a combination of properties, and is therefore found in different states of completeness. It is rarely denied altogether to any individual, but seems to exist in the most diversified gradation and variety. But as aptitude, like every other human faculty, is capable of indefinite extension and improvement, it is never possible, at least in the beginning or before some cultivation, to predict how far we may expect any specified individual to advance. We must return to our original assumption—

Every one will advance or be led so far as his sincere but unalloyed pleasure in music calls him.

He, therefore, who has a susceptibility for music, and feels pleasure in it, may with confidence devote so much time and labor to it as his peculiar calling and circumstances may allow. So long as it is a labor of love with him, it will be a labor profit also; and thus, to such a one, instruction will be no unnecessary nor useless burthen, until the limits of his faculties be attained. And let every one remember, that the chief end of all artistic education is no other than the exaltation of our susceptibility of, and participation in art, for our greater happiness and improvement. In this view, neither will a heated imagination drag us into a professional life against nature and intention; nor will the poor ambition of showy attainments, quite foreign to the true idea of art, rob us of the genuine reward of our exertions.

He, however, who thinks he feels an impulse to devote his entire life to music, should examine seriously whether this impulse be not imaginary; whether it be not rather a feeling of occasional and momentary enthusiasm, than a permanent and steady love for art. Whether the chief inducement be not, perhaps, the apparently unrestrained and joyous tenor of artistic love, or ambition excited by the brilliant career of others. These outward seductive allurements are, for the most part, bitterly repented of when too late. There are, indeed, examples of success attained under such insufficient motives, but rarely accompanied by inward satisfaction, and generally embittered by the loss of the real pleasure of art, and of bodily health.

Those, finally, who consider themselves called upon to adopt composition as a profession for life, should undergo a most rigid self-examination. Their calling is the highest, but it is also the most exacting and uncertain; and no one can counsel them with well-grounded decision. No person ought to dedicate himself to this branch of the profession, unless constrained by every impulse of his soul; no one who can endure with patience any other occupation—who is not willing to sacrifice, for the satisfaction of that vehement and resistless vocation, all the security and comfort of his existence, and who cannot look with firmness on the chance of missing the chief aim of all his exertions. Such a vocation is generally, if not always, indicated in early years, by fanciful preluding, and attempts at composition. He who waits to compose, until he has learned the rules of composition, will rarely, if ever, be a composer. It is also to be considered, that a disposition thus early manifested, and in some degree fostered and nourished, has had time for development before the application of scientific rules,—that it is therefore in a more expanded and invigorated state, and gives the scholar the inestimable advantage of many imaginings and experiences, whereby confidence has been acquired, equally remote from timidity and from presumption. This advantage, however, is not indispensable. True love and perseverance, although later in the field—but not too late—may still gain the victory.

A composer by profession will, however, soon discover that his occupation cannot be the exclusive business of life, for the simple reason, that no one can compose always. Poetry, whether in tones, or words, or colors, demands the most vivid moments only of our existence; and with all the requirements for its production and exhibition, must still leave much of our lives in vacancy; the brightest and richest genius has no other destiny, neither would any be endurable. Further still from the student, must be the vain and unhallowed hope of obtaining a competence by his productions. The greatest artists, such as Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, were not able to accomplish that object. Such, indeed, has been sometimes effected by fashionable composers of the Italian Opera, patronized by the caprice of prime donne, but then only in advanced age. A subsidiary occupation has always been found necessary to a composer, such as singing, playing, conducting, or teaching; and notwithstanding the hindrance or burthen this occupation may perhaps now and then seem, it will be found a salutary and invigorating companion. Each of these occupations has a favorable and important aspect to the composer—one or more of them he must embrace, and this circumstance should have due weight in the choice of the profession.—Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

* This seems to be particularly the case among the mass of the people of France. In that country, singing is perpetual, and yet it is, in an incredible proportion, false and unsteady in tone. The small development of the musical faculties, in this instance, seems to arise from the manner of life, more external than intellectual, of the nation. It is indicated by the circumstance, that, notwithstanding general education and a great susceptibility for music, so few great composers have been produced in France, and that the most remarkable advances in art in that country have been occasioned by foreigners, namely, Lully, Gluck, and Spontini. We Germans, however, remember with gratitude that our Gluck acquired his perfection and recognition in the bosom of the refinement and intellectual activity of that highly distinguished nation in his days, and that the susceptibility of that nation has shown an equally noble appreciation of Haydn and Beethoven.

On the Prime Seventh as an Essential Element in the Musical System.

By HENRY WARD FOOLE, Engineer, Boston.

It is now ten years, since, by original investigation in the mathematical, mechanical, and practical departments of music, I was led to the belief that this science was a solid foundation in the relations of numbers, and that all the supposed impossibility of Just Intonation and the necessity of Temperament, have their origin only in the short-sightedness of the theorist, and the unskillfulness of the practitioner.

Having settled upon the rule that musical ratios must not exceed a certain limit of simplicity (the limit to be determined by the ability of the ear to appreciate them), it was stated* that those ratios only were admissible which were derived from the prime numbers 2, 3, 5, and 7. That the three lower primes 2, 3, and 5, belong to the musical system has been universally admitted; but no one, before myself, so far as I know, has made this claim for the prime seven.†

The interval 4:7 derived from the prime seventh has not been unnoticed, as a curiosity in acoustics; and it is occasionally referred to as the "Za" of Tartini. A living writer,‡ whose statements are entitled to the highest respect, and whose works contain most able arguments in favor of Just Intonation, says of the sounds produced from the prime seventh: "They may be called anomalous. They are wheels, but not wheels which will fit in with the previously constructed parts of the machine, and therefore they are left on one side."

The sound 4:7 has been known to be the seventh harmonic of the horn and æolian string, but has been called a "false" note, and has been rejected even by the advocates of just intonation, as opening the way for inextricable complication in theory and practice. It will from this, appear necessary to make the declaration which is the subject of this paper, and which is as follows:

The Prime Seventh belongs to the Musical System; its ratios are altogether appreciable by the common ear; and are in constant use in common music. It is this which constitutes, when added to the common chord, the concord (falsely called the discord) of the Seventh, and this element, combined with the other prime chords of Octave, Fifth, and Major-Third, makes the great variety of noble harmonies in which cultivated and uncultivated ears delight.

The prime seventh is necessary to complete the series of simple ratios, which extend as far as 10; and it was by noticing the blanks which its omission would leave that its necessity was discovered. The series is as follows:

1:2, 2:3, 3:4, 4:5, 5:6, [6:7, 7:8.] 8:9, 9:10 or, if written as below, we shall have the natural series of harmonics, or what may be called the primary or

HARMONIC SCALE.

1:2:3:4:5:6:7:8:9:10.

As some reason should be assigned to the mathematician for not extending the series by the introduction of the Prime Eleventh, it will be found in the inability of the human ear to appreciate such complicated relations. The "Chord of the Eleventh" exists in nature, and I am able to tune it and to recognize its harmony in combinations specially made for the experiment; yet, so far as my examination of the works of the masters has extended, it has not been used by them in their written music, and perhaps never, unless possibly in the harmonics of a Paganini. I do not claim for it a place in our practical system of music, but leave it where all the former theorists have set the Prime Seventh. The Eleventh may hereafter be admitted, when the musical faculties of men have been sharpened by familiarity with the more simple concords in their purity, and when music is carried to a higher degree of refinement.

From the Harmonic scale may be derived, by combination of its chords, an indefinite variety of other scales. The Octave is divided into eight intervals, which are convenient for melodic use, and the result is popularly called the Diatonic Scale, which, although generally taken as the basis, in explaining music, is not a primary, but a secondary Scale. The method of forming it, according to all former treatises, is to take common chords (4:5:6) upon the tonic, dominant, and subdominant. Thus, the scale of C is tuned by taking a Fifth and Major-Third on C, on G, and on F, and bringing all the notes within the same octave.

But the introduction of the prime seventh allows of another division, in which only two fundamentals are employed; namely, the Tonic (E) with its common chord, (C, E, G) and the Dominant (G), on which is taken the chord of the seventh and ninth (G, B, D, F, A) in the ratios 4:5:6:7:9. To distinguish these scales, I have called the first Triple Diatonic, and the last the Double Diatonic. Assuming the tonic or the keynote, as C, with 48 vibrations, the two scales will stand as follows:—

TRIPLE DIATONIC.

(With common Chord on C, on G and on F.)

C	D	E	F	G	A	B	C
48	54	60	64	72	80	90	96
8:9	9:10	15:16	8:9	9:10	8:9	15:16

DOUBLE DIATONIC.

(With common Chord on C: and Chord of 7 and 9 on G.)

C	D	E	(F)	G	(A)	B	C
48	54	60	63	72	81	90	96
8:9	9:10	20:21	7:8	8:9	9:10	15:16

It thus appears that the fourth and sixth notes may be taken differently in intonation; and that this is done, can be easily observed by giving attention to singers. The Triple Diatonic has but three different intervals, namely, 8:9, 9:10 and 15:16. The Double Diatonic has, in addition, two others; namely, 20:21, and 7:8; and in combinations its variety is greatly superior to the Triple Scale, whose chords and intervals are rather duplicates of one another.

And the remarkable fact is, that this Double Diatonic, which no theorist has defined, is more in practical use than the Triple, which stands in all the elementary books. A familiar example of the former is the "O dolce Concerto" of Mozart, and the principal movement of the "Dead March in Saul" of Handel. The melody of the "Hundredth Psalm" is the Triple Diatonic. The two scales often interchange, and an example of this is to be found near the close of "O dolce Concerto," where for a single measure the dominant seventh and ninth yield, to admit the fourth and sixth of the Triple Scale.‖

If it be feared that the distinctions which have been described as belonging to the scale will complicate it for those learning to sing or play, let it be added, that singers naturally observe them all, and need have no other instruction than to hear the sounds given by the teacher. What is here set down is of interest to him who wishes to know what is, and what ought to be done. It may not be necessary for the singer to be even told the dimensions of any of his intervals; and it perhaps does no harm (except to the one who utters the falsehood) to say that all intervals are compounded of "semitones" or artificial twelfths of the octave.

It is true that when all the four primes have furnished their numerous chords and intervals, we shall have assembled a large number of notes, and it is not impossible that those unacquainted with music may fear that the number will be unmanageable, and prefer the compromises and limitations of temperament. As the experiment has been practically made, such persons may be assured that the musician can most easily produce his desired effects, when he has the full and abundant materials which the system of just intonation gives him.

The singers and players upon the free instruments, of their own accord, use the true intervals to the best of their ability; and in spite of the tempered instruments with which they are sometimes obliged to join. It is for men of science to indicate to the makers of imperfect instruments the way to perfect them; and to withhold their approval from players, who, from indolence or incapacity, only make a pretence of interpreting the music of the great masters. There are wanted no more apologies for, or speculations upon, the choice of temperaments; that subject has long ago been exhausted; and nothing more can be done than is now done with twelve tempered notes in the octave. When some economical astronomer shall propose to reduce the bulk and expense of the Nautical almanac, by sacrificing that accuracy which gives it priceless value, the men at Greenwich will regard him as the scientific musician will, at a future day, look on those who would restrict him to the meagre and barbarous system of temperaments of twelve notes. —Mathematical Monthly.

* American Journal of Science, Second Series, Vol. IX. pp. 68, 199.

† I do not wish to conceal the fact, that even now the principle of just intonation (or the possibility, in theory or practice, of exact fifths, thirds, &c.) is denied by high mathematical authorities. Sir J. F. W. Herschel, in his treatise on Sound, declares, that singers, violin players and others who can pass through every gradation of tone, must all temper, or they could never keep in tune with each other or themselves." [The work of Herschel not being at hand, this extract is copied from the treatise on Sound, by Professor Benjamin Peirce of Cambridge, who has reproduced (with his indorsement, it is presumed,) these and like views of Herschel.] By a late letter from Sir John Herschel, dated Collingwood, June 14th, 1859, addressed to the Musical Pitch Committee, at the Society of Arts, he evinces his continued belief in Temperament as inherent in music, and his opinion that this temperament gives some peculiar character to the different signatures or keys in music in general. He says, in regard to the concert pitch:—

"All are desirous that when once lowered, it should be kept from rising [1] again, to which there is a continual tendency arising from a distinct natural cause inherent in the nature of harmony; namely, excess (amounting to about eleven vibrations in ten thousand) of a perfect fifth over seven-twelfths of an octave, which has to be constantly contended against in upward modulations, whenever violins or voices are not kept in check by fixed instruments. But perhaps all are not aware that the evil of fine ancient compositions having thus been rendered impracticable to singers in their original normal key involves the sacrifice of the adaptation of the peculiar character of the key (a character intended and felt by the composer), and the substitution of a totally different incidence of the temperament [2] in the series of notes in the scale, and goes therefore to mar the intended effect, and injure the composition, as much as an ill-chosen tone of varnish would damage the effect of a fine Titian."

1. There is nothing better to test the "natural tendency" in this respect than a good glee-club without accompaniment. If they start with too low a keynote and are in good spirits, the tendency will be to rise to the better pitch. It does not appear that temperament affects the concert pitch.

2. Observe the same glee-singers. They sing in every key with the same relative intervals, and do not use a "different incidence of temperament," in different keys. Did any composer of glees wish such temperament? If so he should indorse his score something after this manner: "Four flats, equal temperament" (as the composers of fugues for the organ have actually done;) or "Four flats, with a great wolf in A flat, and a whelp in E flat."

I only desire here to put on record for historical reference the most respectable authorities of this day against Just Intonation, and to prove that the views I put forth have such opponents, and hence need to be told.

‡ Gen. T. Perronet Thompson. Just Intonation. p. 72. 2d Edition. London, 1857. See also his "Exercises, Political and Others." London. 1843. 6 vols. Both are in the Boston Athenæum.

§ In view of the numerous names required, and to supply those needed for these unnamed intervals, I have proposed (at least for mathematical and theoretical uses) names derived from the ratio. A fifth then will be "two-three," a major-tone "eight-nine," a diatonic semitone "fifteen-sixteen," the interval (unnamed) between the third of the scale and the dominant seventh, is the "twenty-twenty-one." The next interval (dom. seventh to fifth) is the "seven eight." This proposition as yet needs the approval of other theorists. The desideratum is accuracy and clearness.

‖ Not to disfigure these mathematical pages with musical types, I have chosen examples with which every one is familiar. Every composition will furnish others. If a choice is to be made in the examples of the profuse employment of the prime seventh, there may be taken any of the vocal scores of Haydn, Mozart, or Rossini.

Musical Correspondence.

ST. LOUIS, JUNE, '61.—This article is headed St. Louis for obvious reasons, although I am in the beautiful village of Penn Yan, Yates county, New York, and am improving the first day of country leisure by giving you an account of our last concert for this year.

PART I.

- 1. Finale from "First Symphony".....Beethoven
- 2. Chorus, "Bone Jesu".....Meyerbeer
- 3. Cavatina, "Tanto siccome gli angeli".....Cantueri
- 4. Andante from "Second Symphony".....Beethoven
- 5. Sextette, from "Lucia" (by general request).....Donizetti

PART II.

- 1. Overture, "Leonora".....Beethoven
- 2. Chorus, "Bone Jesu".....Palestrina
- 3. Duo for two Flutes, "Rondo brilliant".....Furstenau
- 4. Sextette and Chorus, from "Nabucco".....Verdi
- 5. Duo from "Puritani"—"Suoni la Tromba".....Bellini
- 6. Overture, "Jubilee," introducing the Air: "God Save America".....C. M. von Weber

It was a sight calculated to awaken many reflections, to see all, forget for a few brief moments, their politics, which would cause us almost to cut each others throats, and sit down together for the last time this year to listen to the glorious old music. Over 2,700 were in that room, and the concert gave more than satisfaction, if possible, than any before. At the conclusion of the Jubilee Overture the enthusiasm exceeded all prescribed bounds, and "God Save America" caused such a commotion as never I saw before in that city. Ladies waved handkerchiefs, gentlemen cheered till they could articulate no longer. There is no mistaking the feeling. No other tune could have done it, and tears of joy stood in more than one eye.

The orchestra part was perfect almost. The Overture (Leonore) was admirably performed, especially the latter part; the orchestra numbering sixty-seven. The Andante (Second Symphony) was also fully up to the standard. In short could you have been present and heard what our Society, only one year old did, you would give us all the credit we claim for energy and talent.

The Cavatina was sung by Miss McGonegal, the "Soprano solo" of the evening. Miss Annie Dean sang the part of Lucia in the Sextette assisted by Miss Harlock, and Messrs. Sabatzky, Catherwood, Barrel and Pfeiffers. Miss McGonegal and Miss Dean even exceeded the anticipations of their friends. I hope my praise will be believed and taken without discount, for I am only the cool critic. I am not acquainted with any of the members of this Society whose names appear in your paper, and never see them save at these concerts. I only wish to have their real talents known and appreciated. This Society has developed fifty times the amount of talent I ever supposed was in the city. The Sextette and chorus (Nabucco) was sung by Miss Tourney. Mrs. Allen of whom I intend particularly to speak in a future article on "Church Music"—Miss Foster, Sabatzky, Spalding and Zell.

The "Duo" by Catherwood and Capen—in in which Catherwood gained fresh laurels by that voice of his.

The rehearsals will continue all summer. The money matters are all right—and you know how important that is. The next concert will be in October, unless Missouri and her people should be involved in a common ruin. This is no place for a political essay. Yet upon politics depends now the existence of our Society. Missouri is outwardly calm, but how long she will remain so, no one can tell. Indications are for peace, and I see by the papers that the eleven Kansas regiments have "resolved to discountenance any invasion of Missouri for the present." No one feels a deeper interest in Missouri than I do, but she could easily now bring upon herself a ruin, swift as the thunderbolt and appalling to think of.

My next article on "Churches and Church Music" will be ready in a few days; subject, "Trinity Church," Episcopalian. BROWN.

Max Maretzek commenced his operatic season in the city of Mexico, April 13th, and we learn the prospects were encouraging. The new basso Bischi, is highly spoken of, and the sisters Natali are also warmly praised.

Night's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 8, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Our readers can hardly, in these times, ask even an apology for a thinly spread banquet at the Editorial table. Concerts are ended, here and everywhere; operas are unheard of and unheard; correspondents have buckled on their armor and are thinking of other things; exchanges even, to a considerable extent, have suddenly fallen off, under the government regulation withdrawing the mail service from the Southern States. "Trovator" and "——" have gone abroad; the "Diarist" is flitting over Europe, now here, and now there, pursuing the faintest shadow of a rumor about his loved Beethoven; the editor, at the last date, wrote from Venice, but seems to have eaten of the Lotus and relapsed into silence in the charmed air of Italy. We hear nothing from any of them, and are left, single-handed, to glean such meagre crumbs of intelligence as we are able, which is all that we can offer. Of such things enough is as good as a feast.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The second concert of the new series of evening concerts, offered the following programme:

- 1. Symphony No 3, "Eroica." (Opus 55).....Beethoven.
 - 1. Allo con brio. 2. March Funebre. 3. Scherzo and Minuetto. Finale, Allegro Molto.
- 2. Overture, "Meeresstille".....Mendelssohn.
- 3. Potpourri, from the Opera "La Juive".....Halévy. By the Germania Band. Arranged by A. Heinicke.
- 4. Polonaise, from "Struensee".....Meyrbeer.
- 5. Duet, "William Tell".....Rossini.
- 6. Fackeltanz, (Torchlight Dance).....Meyerbeer. By the Orchestral Union and Germania Band combined.

It is hard to anticipate the time when any organized body or any individual can engage in any new concert enterprise, so that this series of concerts will probably be the last opportunity for an indefinitely long time, for hearing good music. The chance should not be neglected by any who love good music.

A Baltimore musician has published the Declaration of Independence of the United States, "arranged and adapted for vocal and instrumental music, as the great national chant, and dedicated to the world." The title is embellished with a lithograph of the room in Independence Hall in which the Declaration was signed, and the fourth page contains fac similes of the signatures of the signers.

Music Abroad.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—"The projected Leeds Musical Festival for 1861 has been abandoned, a resolution to this effect having been passed at a special meeting of the Committee held on Thursday last. The causes which have decided the Committee to take so important a backward step, are—the visit of the Royal Agricultural Society to Leeds a few weeks only prior to the time fixed for holding the Festival; the dullness of trade consequent on the American crisis; the exorbitant demand made by vocalists whose services are considered indispensable; the meeting of the British Association at Manchester during the first week in September, being the identical days of the proposed Leeds Festival; the resignation (from illness) of Mr. Walker Joy, one of the hon. secretaries; and the conduct of the chorus-master with respect to the selection of a chorus.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—We annex the programme of the fifth concert.

- PART I.—Sinfonia in C, No. 1 (Beethoven); Recit. and aria, "Zum Liedn," Mad. Rieder, Zauberflöte (Mozart); Fantasia appassionata, violin, M. Vieuxtemps (Vieuxtemps); Scena and romanza, Signor Delie Senie, Maria Padilla (Donizetti); Overture, Freischütz (Weber).

- PART II.—Sinfonia in G minor (Mozart); Aria, Signor Delie Sedie, "Deh, vieni alla finestra" (Mozart); Concerto in D minor, pianoforte, Signor Nacciarone (Mendelssohn; Duet, "Ai Capricci," Mad. Rieder and Signor Delle Sedie (Rossini); Overture, F'Alcade de la Vega, (Onslow). Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—At the second opera concert, on Friday week, Madame Grisi made her first appearance this season. Her voice, though showing signs of wear and tear, has lost none of its charm, and the first movement of "Qui la voce" was listened to by a very numerous and fashionable company with great delight. The Cabaletta was delivered in that perfect manner which has for years been Madame Grisi's characteristic, though, perhaps, only less brilliant than when it issued in time past from the same lips. The prima donna's other song was "Home, sweet home." It was sung in English, and was encored.

PARIS, MAY 17, 1861.—The Univers Musical publishes two items, side by side, that show the two extremes of artist life.

1. "One of the most celebrated artists of Germany, Joseph Staudigl has just died in a hospital of Vienna, where he has been since 1854. The concourse of people at his obsequies was so great that the body had to be exposed in the court of the hospital that the crowd might be allowed to go through the ceremony of sprinkling holy water.

"This manifestation of popular sympathy honors the artist who has deserved it more than it shows the solicitude on the part of the Austrian administration for art and artists."

2. "The pretensions of singers have no more bounds. The celebrated cantatrice Czillag lately demanded from the director of the theatre of Vienna 10,000 florins a month for an engagement of eight months, that is to say, 40,000 florins more than the apauage of an archduke."

The authors of the five plans that were rewarded at the late concourse for the construction of a new opera house have been invited by the Minister of State to present other plans. The time allotted is, however, pronounced to be too short as the designs must be handed in by June 15.

We have had a concert at the "Italiens" this week rich enough to inspire a just amount of enthusiasm even in this fault-finding capital. It was given by the "Société de l'union des Artistes," on last Tuesday. The orchestra numbered over eighty members, the chorus sixty. The general director of the concert was M. Tilmant director of the orchestra of the Conservatoire. With such artists as Roger, Cazaux, Gourdin, Mlle. Rey, success was assured.

The programme presented the following, unpublished as well as published music, it will be seen:

PART I.

- Meeres-Stille and Glückliche Fahrt, Mendelssohn
- Benedictus from Mass in Re.....Beethoven
- Allegro from Concerto in Re minor. J. S. Bach
- Ave Verum (unpublished).....Gounod
- Solo by Mlle. Rey.

Symphonie in La (Andante and Finale).....

Beethoven

Le Jugement Dernier.....Felicien David

PART II.

- Fingal (Opera de Concert), words by de Flobert, music by E. Membreé—Roger as Fingal, Cazaux as Ullin, Gourdin as Camil and Mlle. Key as Comala.

At the Theatre Lyrique Prince Poniatowski has produced a light opera "Au Travers du Mur,"—different in every respect from his "Pierre de Mediceis."

At the Opera Comique "Salvator Rosa" still maintains its vogue. This is the season of benefits and rather mixed representations. To-night Mad Viardot has her benefit at the Lyrique. We are in consequence to have two acts of Gluck's Alceste—one of Otello—a comic operetta Le Buisson Vert by Gasinel. Besides all this Mad. Ristori is to recite Lamartine's Isolement and the fifth canto of the Inferno of Dante.

Speaking of Ristori I am reminded that I have seen in several journals, not French, words of blame on account of what is styled "an abandonment of the artist's native idiom." Now nothing seems farther from Mad. Ristori's thought than to abandon the Italian language. It is but the other day that she appeared again as Medea. To-night I hope to hear her read Dante. A countryman of her's Giacometti is preparing a new play for her. The success of her French Beatrix will assuredly not be sufficient to cause her to neglect the language in which alone she succeeds fully. But she will not stop at French and in a letter has already expressed the wish of appearing before a Spanish audience in a national play, acting in Spanish. This may show mastery of language, but it is a dangerous game and may prove destructive of much originality. F. B.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—La Sonnambula, on Tuesday, May 14, was one of the most interesting performances we have witnessed at the Royal Italian Opera. The success of Mlle. Adolina Patti—now, indeed, the principal topic in London Musical circles—took everybody by surprise, except those who had been present at the rehearsal, and who were let into the secret. The reports of American journals, alluded to in our last, although apparently overcharged and extravagant, must really be received as a close approximation to the truth. The writers in the London papers on Wednesday, except in one or two instances, are as high-flown, uncompromising, and enthusiastic in the young artist's praise as their contemporaries of the New Orleans and Philadelphia press, whose articles we have published. Mlle. Patti is even now, at eighteen years of age, in many respects, a great singer. Her voice is beautiful in quality—a real soprano equal in every part of the register, without the slightest tendency to tremulousness, and reaching to F in alt. with astonishing ease. It is, moreover, extremely flexible, and is managed with more than ordinary skill. The young lady, indeed, is almost a thorough mistress of vocalization, and has evidently devoted her whole soul to her profession. One so young and so accomplished on the operatic boards we never heard, and no doubt the highest destiny awaits her in her future career. It would be ungracious just now, after a single hearing, to endeavor to find out faults in Mlle. Patti's method and style. We shall prefer hearing her again before pronouncing an adverse or even qualified opinion on any one point. It is much more agreeable to declare that we were surprised and delighted beyond measure with her performance of Amina, which created the greatest sensation we have known at Covent Garden for years. Mlle. Patti's histrionic—if not so marked as her vocal—powers, everywhere betray the true instinct of genius; and there are some parts of her acting in the Sonnambula which could hardly be surpassed for truth, grace, and intensity of feeling. Her second appearance in the Sonnambula is announced for Wednesday. Signor Tiberini was Elvino, and Signor Tagliafico Count Rudolph.

Don Giovanni was given for the first time this season on Monday—an extra night—and filled the house in every part, as it has never failed to do for many years. Although three of the prominent parts were sustained by foreigners, or more strictly speaking, by non-Italians, the performance recalled old times, and was in most respects worthy the best days of the opera. An ideal Giovanni is hardly to be looked for now, and the comparison of the last new aspirant with Signor Tamburini becomes tiresome perforce of repetition. When we have said that M. Faure has neither the grace nor the spirit of Tamburini, and that his voice has neither the richness nor the flexibility of his renowned predecessor, we have merely stated what might have been assumed in advance by those acquainted with his talent. On the other hand, it may be fairly asserted that, viewed as a whole, the Don Giovanni of the French barytone is superior to any that has been seen on the boards of the Italian Opera since Tamburini retired from the arena of public exhibition. M. Faure has more of the required nobility of presence, and enters more thoroughly into the dramatic exigencies of the character, than nine out of ten who have essayed it during many years past. He has, besides, completely mastered the musical text, and displays an equal degree of fluency in the recitatives—which, being in what is called the "Parlante" style, are extremely trying to a Frenchman—the airs, the duets, and the concerted pieces. His performance, indeed, both in a musical and histrionic sense, is one of level and well-sustained excellence, correct to the utmost nicety of expression, note-perfect, and always prepossessing from its gentlemanly ease and naturalness. It was an unqualified and, what is more, a well-merited success.

Mad. Csillag's Elvira is not only the best the London stage can boast just now, but the best in our remembrance of Don Giovanni. Critical justice, however, has been awarded to this; to the Don Ottavio of Signor Tamberlik; to Signor Tagliafico's Commendatore; and to the Leporello of Herr Fornes, whose last scene is a powerful conception, and upon whom—as was evident from the manner in which he kept his voice under control in all the concerted music—well-intended counsel has not been thrown away. Of Mad. Penco's Donna Anna and the Zerlina of Mad. Miolan Carvalho—both new to the English public—we must speak on another occasion, premising that there is much to call for enlogy in both impersonations. Signor Ronconi's Masetto—one of the most racy and perfect embodiments ever witnessed of a subordinate part—gave unusual strength to the "caste." A character generally thought unworthy the attention of a first-class artist, became, for the first time, one of the most important features in the opera, simply because the admirable Italian barytone (whose versatility is unrivalled) made Masetto what Mozart intended him, a well-defined and complete portrayal, and not the proposterous nonentity to which the artists of the Italian stage have accustomed us. The strange association of earnestness and weakness, of the anxious solicitude and genuine desire of a sincere lover, with the awkwardness and imbecility of a boor, worried almost beyond redemption by the insolent invasion of his rights at the hands of a rich and profligate nobleman, was depicted to the very life; and although Signor Ronconi in his long career has played many more arduous parts, he certainly never distinguished himself more honorably.

Hymns and Choirs.

From a work published at Andover, entitled Hymns and Choirs, which contains many excellent æsthetic ideas on the important subjects of Hymnology and Congregational singing,—we copy the closing directions. They contain some things inapplicable to our service (Episcopal); but in those things which do apply they are excellent. They also show that in many other Christian denominations, our own church ideas are being adopted; as, for example, in the 1st, 2d, 3d, 14th, and 15th.

These changes are mainly due to the learning, taste, and conservatism of Dr. Lowell Mason, who has not only imparted general instruction, but has never failed to alter and improve his own idea on the subject of Congregational singing, upon good cause.

1. The congregation should stand when they sing.
2. They should rise, simultaneously and promptly, when the organist, in giving out the tune, has reached the beginning of the last line.
3. They should stand, in the usual attitude of worship, facing the pulpit.
4. If the help of a choir of singers, well disposed toward congregational singing, can be secured, they may be of great use in leading the congregation. But if the congregation are not led by a choir, they should be led by a precentor.
5. The organ and choir precentor should be in front of the congregation, near the pulpit, and on the same level with the pews.
6. Children should be instructed in singing, at home and in the schools, and should be encouraged to sing with the congregation.
7. The greater part of the congregation, male and female, should sing upon the treble of the tunes. It is indispensable that there be men's voices in this part.
8. Let the hymns and tunes that are used be made familiar by frequent rehearsals, both in public and in families.
9. Use any given hymn always with the same tune.
10. Use a book in which the hymn and tunes are upon one page.
11. Let the singing be in steady uniform time from the beginning to the end of the hymn, without any noticeable acceleration or slackening of the time.
12. Let there be no forced pauses for the observance of punctuation, nor any needless delay at the end of the lines.
13. Let there be no labored effort after "expression" by means of frequent and sudden changes from soft to loud and the reverse, or by the swelling and tapering of the voice, or by studied accentuation.
14. The connection of the hymn should not be broken by organ interludes, or needless, long pauses.
15. The singing of a familiar hymn will often be more spirited if the reading of it from the pulpit is omitted.
16. Use tunes that are strictly congregational in their structure. But, until these are learned, it may be advisable to use such choir tunes, judiciously selected, as are already familiar.—Banner of the Cross.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Cavalier's Serenade. W. Lee Apthorp. 25
Words from Mrs. Stowe's new novel "Agnes of Sorrento." The setting shows taste and musical ability.
- Jonathan, what say? Patriotic Song. 25
Turning on the war. There is a pretty touch of humor in it. The music is easy and intended to offer as little difficulty as possible. The melody is good.
- Ellen of the Lea. Song. S. Glover. 25
One of those cheerful, pretty, little songs, which, next to his sparkling Duets, have made Glover's name familiar to young singers. As a lesson it will be found both useful and appropriate, as the words are free of ought objectionable.
- Once more upon the sea. F. Buckley. 25
If a few good stagers find out this ballad, whose prettiness is striking and undeniable, it cannot fail to become popular.

- Give me thy blessing, dear mother. Cherry. 30

A boy going off to sea is taking leave of his mother. There is a sort of naturalness about this song, which makes it quite touching. The title-page is handsomely illustrated.

Instrumental Music.

- Brindisi from "Traviata." Transcribed. A. Baumbach. 35
A brilliant arrangement of the famous air, of medium difficulty.
- Fest March, for three performers on one Piano. T. Bissell. 35
Nothing is better calculated to make pupils good timists than to make them take part in four or six hand pieces, the latter being even preferable to the former. For this purpose Gungl's well known and strongly marked Fest March, in this clever arrangement, makes a very good piece.

- German Choral, "Mach's mit mir," for the Organ. Fischer 25

This piece is quite a curiosity for the student of harmony and counterpoint. It is a masterpiece of contrapuntal writing. The piece is written in three parts, of which the treble sustains the melody of the choral (Cantus firmus) while the other two perform a canon, the second beginning it, and the bass imitating a seventh lower, note for note, to the end, being always half a bar behind the second.

Books.

- CAMP SONGS. 10
This is a collection of all the popular National Songs, with several home favorites, published in a very neat and convenient style. It will serve to enliven the soldier's life, and will prove a source of much enjoyment and recreation to all into whose hands it may fall.
- BIRD'S VOCAL MUSIC READER. 12

This is the first number of a series of instruction books in vocal music, prepared by J. Bird, author of the "Singing School Companion," and is designed for quite young pupils, to whom it will prove useful and attractive.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 480.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 11.

A Day in June.

And what is so rare as a day in June ?

Then, if ever, come perfect days :

Then heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,

And over it softly her warm ear lays :

Whether we look, or whether we listen,

We hear life murmur, or see it glisten ;

Every clod feels a stir of might,

An instinct within it that reaches and towers,

And, groping blindly above it for light,

Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers ;

The flush of life may well be seen

Thrilling back over hills and valleys ;

The cowslip startles in meadows green,

The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,

And there's never a leaf nor a blade too mean

To be some happy creature's palace ;

The little bird sits at his door in the sun,

Atilt like a blossom among the leaves,

And lets his illumined being o'errun

With the deluge of summer it receives ;

His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings,

And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings ;

He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest —

In the nice ear of nature which song is the best ?

Now is the high tide of the year,

And whatever of life hath ebbed away

Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer,

Into every bare inlet and creek and bay ;

Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it,

We are happy now because God wills it ;

No matter how barren the past may have been,

'Tis enough for us now that the leaves are green ;

We sit in the warm shade and feel right well

How the sap creeps up and the blossoms swell ;

We may shut our eyes, but we cannot help knowing

That skies are clear and grass is growing ;

The breeze comes whispering in our ear,

That dandelions are blossoming near,

That maize has sprouted, that streams are flowing,

That the river is bluer than the sky,

That the robin is plastering his house hard by ;

And if the breeze kept the good news back,

For other couriers we should not lack ;

We could guess it all by your heifer's lowing—

And hark ! how clear bold chanticleer,

Warmed with the new wine of the year,

Tells all in his lusty crowing !

Joy comes, grief goes, we know not how ;

Everything is happy now,

Everything is upward striving ;

'Tis as easy now for the heart to be true

As for grass to be green or skies to be blue —

'Tis the natural way of living :

Who knows whither the clouds have fled ?

In the unscarred heavens they leave no wake ;

And the eyes forget the tears they have shed,

The heart forgets its sorrow and ache ;

The soul partakes the season's youth,

And the sulphurous rifts of passion and woe

Lie deep 'neath a silence pure and smooth,

Like burnt-out craters healed with snow.

J. R. LOWELL.

THE OPERA IN ITALY.—An attempt is being made to revive the fortunes of opera at Naples and Milan. In the latter city, a new opera by Maestro Pedrotti, Guerra in quattro, is to be played during the spring.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Charlatanism in Music.

III.

THE MUSICAL FANATIC, OR THE COMPOSER-PIANIST.—SKETCHED BY BENDA.

The subject of this sketch may be compared to the charlatans in religion; those saints, who keep their eyes continually turned up to heaven, supposing themselves to be the very essence of christianity, while their hearts are full of hatred and ill-will towards their fellow-men. And if you call their attention to the fact that all their pious demonstrations are of no use so long as they daily violate that commandment, which bids us love our neighbor as ourself; if you remind them that the doors of the heavenly kingdom shall not open for those who have no love or charity, or, still better if you are bold enough frankly to tell them that they are just the opposite of what in their immeasurable self-conceit they pretend to be; then these charlatans will grow pale with astonishment that you dare to smite them with such language. But you are much mistaken, if you suppose that you have in the least shaken their confidence in their superior worth. Nay, if the eloquence of all the world united should try to convince them of their error they would not believe it. They no saints? They pretenders, charlatans, quacks, fanatics? Ridiculous, absurd, malicious!

So our hero may call it absurd, or malicious, that we count him among the charlatans in music. He considers himself such a model of musical excellence, such a pattern of artistic purity and integrity! And, indeed, he is regarded so not only by himself, but by many others, who are too inexperienced in musical matters to know what title he has to such lofty pretensions. He loves to style himself a composer pianist: but he is neither a composer nor a pianist; he is a little of both, although his talent for composition exceeds in some measure his qualifications for a performer. If, first, we regard him as a pianist we find that his execution is stiff and inelegant. He may know how a piece should be played, but his fingers do not obey him, and his listeners are frequently obliged to "take the will for the deed." He essentially lacks that confidence, freedom and boldness, which are among the first manifestations of a born player. Even his own compositions sound harsh and clumsy under his fingers, if he manages to go through them without actual blunders, that are likely to happen every moment. In the works of the older masters up to Beethoven he has the freak of never employing the pedal, however much their effect might be improved thereby. He also keeps in his study an old clavichord, which he uses exclusively for the works of Sebastian Bach, presuming that the the great master himself never played but on such an instrument and that, therefore, the true power of his music cannot be realized through a pianoforte. His culture, taste, sentiment and expression, according to his own estimation, are of such a high order that all must be enchanted, who are fortunate enough to hear him. This illusion and the wish to play before a select audience prompt him to fix the price of admission ridiculously high when he gives a concert, which for the sake of honor and reputation he thinks necessary once or twice every year; and when, naturally, his auditors appear in so select a number that it is difficult, even with lantern in hand, to find them out among all the empty seats, he begins to complain of the indifference, bad taste, want of appreciation and so forth, that characterize the community where he resides. As he has not the means of engaging first-class performers to assist him he calls in for his aids some of the third-rate singers who abound in every town and are the bane of the public. The pieces which make up his programme are mostly such as any advanced amateur may play for himself at home. From principle he never performs the work of a composer still living, except himself. We see then how much cause he has for his lamentations respecting the indifference of the public.

Now, sir, if you are resolved to test the sympathy of the music-lovers; if you wish for a select, but numerous audience; or if you desire to know, who is to be blamed for the empty seats at your concerts,—why don't you give us pieces, which are too difficult and too rare to be accessible to ordinary players, and to hear which every true friend of art would gladly pay a high price, even higher than it is your pleasure to charge? The reason why "he don't" will easily occur to every one; it is because "he can't."

Regarded as a composer we find his style to be dry and pedantic, scrupulously squared and pruned. He strictly observes every rule, never permitting himself the most harmless license. His orchestration is thin and meagre; he is always afraid of overdoing the matter, and therefore, rarely avails himself of all means at his command. This he does in part on the authority of Mozart and other masters of the past who likewise (but for better reasons) did not always employ the whole body of instruments, which constitute the orchestra. Authority, tradition, conventionalism—these are among the chief forces which guide the fanatic in his creations. It is of significance, in order to obtain a just conception of the man, to know that he never attempts to write an opera, because he deems it profane. He thinks it also profane to compose a dance, though he almost weeps with joy at those little Minuets, that are to be found in the smaller Symphonies, Quartets and Sonatas of Haydn and some of his contemporaries, and which in reality are nothing but dances, many of them as light, or as frivolous, if you will, as ever a waltz was. The same principle he carries out as a teacher. We need hardly say that he supports himself by giving lessons. His scholars are not permitted to play anything that bears the name of Quadrille, Waltz, Polka or Galop, though he does not scruple to give them plenty of such as rejoice in the title of Fandango, Siciliano, Bolero, Tarantella and so forth. But we will not subject him to any criticism in his capacity as a teacher; he don't pretend to be one; he only—as he has it—gives instruction. Yet, notwithstanding, he considers himself the sole person competent to teach and seizes every opportunity of slandering all others engaged in that profession.

We have now viewed the fanatic as both a player and a composer, and my impartial readers may judge for themselves, if it be absurd or malicious to class him among the charlatans. But, we have not done with him yet; he shall not so easily escape our fangs; full justice shall be meted out to him. We have yet to consider more particularly how far in his life and dealings with his fellow-men he realizes the object of true art, of which he believes himself so superior an exponent. If neither his playing nor his compositions gave promise of his ability to represent the beautiful in a beautiful manner, we can hardly expect that the man should redeem the musician. With such beings life and art are so closely united that they must be considered as one. It is an established fact that no where are to be found instances of such passionate devotedness to the chosen vocation as in music; and in consequence no other artist is so likely to become a fanatic as the musician. So we may say of our hero that the man is completely merged in the artist; as is the latter so is the former; nay, he is no man at all, he is merely a musician. His love for the art knows no bounds; he considers it the only occupation compatible with the dignity of man. Accordingly, he looks upon all outsiders with a kind of scornful pity; especially on all bankers, brokers, jobbers, dealers, traders, farmers and other innocent people whose occupation is more prosaic, more substantial and material than his. It is, however, a mistake to infer from this that he regards those belonging to his own craft with a milder view. He is rarely on friendly terms with his fellow artists; because weighed in his balance they are all too light, not solid, not orthodox, not classical enough. Neither does his selfishness permit him to take any interest in the musical doings of the community where he resides, except so far as he can become the centre thereof. Without him any enterprise is likely to go the wrong way. He disparages every man and every thing. For the classical composers alone, for Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart and the earlier Beethoven his love and admiration know no bounds, and he is proud of it. You just try to engage him in a conversation about these composers and you will hear in what a torrent of superlatives he gives vent to his enthusiasm. If you are not completely overwhelmed by the force of his speech it is because his mouth is too full and one word chokes another. He will give you by the way to understand that he has some claim to be heard, since none can love, understand or appreciate those masters better than himself, being a somewhat kindred genius. Should you be able to silence him for a moment in order to ask him what he thinks of Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, and their followers,—your question will immediately be answered by a counter-torrent of invectives, which will sweep these men clean of the last marks of honor and respectability and leave them bold adventurers, pretenders or charlatans. He means to persecute them till his last breath and to whatever extent his small influence may permit him. He can never forgive them that they dared to shake the sacred ground of tradition and authority and set up a theory of their own. Take heed that he does not suspect you to be yourself among the admirers of those musical reformers; he would speedily turn upon you and give you what he thinks his duty; friend, or foe, it matters little when his fanaticism is roused. In general his tirades are harmless, for, if you permit him to speak out all he has to say, he feels easy after such an outburst and goes on his way, rejoicing as before in his own superiority. It sometimes happens that a deluded critic becomes so interested in him as to advocate his cause publicly, or that he himself ascends the editorial chair,—then his narrow, illiberal views and notions may cause much damage to the art and artists of the community in which he lives. It has happened in cities whose size, situation, social institutions, and so forth, peculiarly favored fanaticism, that all enlightened musicians have been driven out, while the fanatic and his crew kept their black and white colors victoriously waving amidst the vehement applause of the sour-faced inhabitants. However, these cases are rare; he seldom attains to such importance as to become the leader of a party; generally he is too shy, too timid; he loves to walk in silence and commit secretly whatever mischief his supposed duties prompt him. Sometimes he professes a total indifference to everything beyond his own dear self. It is then that he boasts of never reading a newspaper or any other paper relating to art and science, those treating of musical matters not excepted. The latter he is afraid might contain something about himself, which, when read, would perhaps tend to perplex him or make him falter in his righteous course. But this is not the chief reason; there is a more substantial one. Who is there that presumes to know more about music than Mr. Fanaticus? Who dares venture to suppose he could teach Mr. Arrogance? Now, it is plain, if he subscribed to such a paper he might be suspected of keeping it merely in order to learn from it. He knows what he is about.

It might perhaps be expecting too much of such a narrow-minded, short-sighted being, though he thrice blessed himself every morning on opening his eyes that he is an artist—to suppose he should know that an artist should, in his appearance manifest taste and expression, the cultivation of which in music he has made the purpose of his life. The fanatic is utterly ignorant of this fact. His manners are blunt, awkward, nay, boorish; his dress is shabby and always anticipates the coming fashion by ten years. He gives as an excuse that it is the prerogative of genius to set fashion and etiquette at defiance. Yet it would be a mistake to fancy that he is not vain and that he does not with much satisfaction behold his own profile; that would be entirely inconsistent with his love of self. When he is to appear before the public at his concerts he takes much pains to ornament himself tastefully, as he imagines; and even several days in advance he devotes some minutes every time to practicing the bow or obeisance before a glass; yet when the time for exhibition comes he cuts the same sorry figure as before. His body is not an agile one. He is on the whole averse to locomotion. You may be sure to find him ten years hence occupying the same rooms in which he now lives.

The home of the musical fanatic, I will state in conclusion, is in all countries where the climate is ungenial and life laborious. Thus, while he thrives well in the Northern States of the American Union, in England, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, &c., he begins to dwindle in France and farther south, as in Italy and Spain, disappears altogether. A certain degree of culture in the more serious kinds of music is necessary for a country, which may pretend to favor his growth. Strictly speaking he is a product of the very laudatory movement to establish the art in her purest and highest forms; but a mishapen product, an excrescence, which in our days—alas!—is multiplying to an alarming extent.

W. A. Mozart.

BY OTTO JAHN.—(FOURTH PART.)

(From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.)

II.

(Continued from page 76.)

The Fourth Part embraces the second half of the history of the last ten years of Mozart's life (1781—1791), the period during which his genius produced his greatest creations, which have rendered him immortal. It contains the sections from 12 to 25 of the Fourth Book, the first eleven comprising the contents of the third volume of this work. While the latter treat mostly of Mozart's material circumstances, the historical element is thrown more into the background in Book Four, since, except the account of two professional journeys—to Berlin and to Frankfort-on-the-Maine—only the moving narrative of Mozart's death and its immediate consequences belong to the biographical portion, properly so called; while the analysis of his works, on the contrary, together with the most careful accounts of their production, carrying out, &c., take up most of Volume Four, which is the thickest of all, containing 748 pages of text, 40 pages of appendix, a complete catalogue of names and facts, 16 pages of supplementary notes, and a portrait of Mozart, after a picture painted in Verona in 1770, when he was fourteen years of age.

The mere comprehensiveness of the list gives us a foretaste of the rich contents of the last volume; a cursory sketch will teach the reader what he has to expect, and what he will find carried out in a manner which, from beginning to end, attracts, fascinates and instructs.

The first three sections (from 12 to 14 inclusive) show us Mozart as a pianoforte player and composer of instrumental music. Section 12 discusses his works for the piano, the variations, rondos, fantasias, sonatas for the pianoforte alone, and with violin accompaniment, the trios, the quartets, and the quintet (in E flat), as well as the concertos. In the catalogue of the latter, pp. 51 and 52, we find the concerto for two pianos (printed in Offenbach, by J. André, as Op. 73, Edition faite d'après la Partition en Manuscrit;) but not with the orchestra (quartet, two oboes, two horns, two bassoons), which is not mentioned either in any part of text.

In relation to the concertos, the author brings prominently forward services rendered by Mozart towards the combination of the orchestra and the solo instrument into one whole, as eventually, and in the received form, creating something new, and shows how the orchestra has full symphonic justice done it, not merely in the tutti movements, but as continually introduced into the piano part, also participating directly in it. "An art of blending all the various kinds of sounds in the orchestra, which at once proves an uncommonly fine sense, supported by the most accurate knowledge of instrumental effects, for what is harmonious." "The happy nation," the author observes further on, "in the close combination of the various instrumental resources into one whole is so completely successful, that in this particular Beethoven, who made an especial study of Mozart's pianoforte concertos, as every one who knows them at all thoroughly will easily perceive, has not, in any essential point, gone further; the higher importance of his grand pianoforte concertos has another foundation. It is true that, with Mozart, there was something more than the mere delicately-fostered sense for the appropriate mixtures of the various kinds of sound; the invention, treatment, and distribution of the motives were conditional on the nature of the means for their manifestation; it was necessary in the first sketch that the different resources should be well considered, if they were to have justice done them in the mode in which they were carried out; even in the bud, the various motives must have been endowed with the faculty of free development under various conditions. The result is a race between different agents, the orchestra and the pianoforte—and the principal charm of those concertos rests upon the lively interworking of the opposite elements, by means of which process the separate motives, as if under an ever changing light, are grouped into a rich and brilliant picture."

It is very correctly remarked that Mozart's concertos require, "besides a clear and song-like execution, especially of the melodies, which are often greatly spun out," "the calm, steady" hand, which "causes the" roudades (Passagen) "to flow like oil." Nearly all his roudades depend upon the scale and the broken chords. His aim was not a number of notes (he purposely rejected runs of octaves, sixths and thirds), nor any kind of mass-like effect, but clearness and perspicuity. At any rate, the clear unfolding of the peculiarities of the piano, in contradistinction to the orchestra, was the right way to the development of technical skill on the piano."

"But the principal importance of the concertos lies in their musical purport. In their conceptions and treatment, they exhibit great dash and perfect freedom: it is clear that it was not only the greater and more important means which called forth a corresponding degree of mental activity, but that Mozart felt the more pleasure in giving free scope to his powers, because he used to perform these compositions himself. The fact of their being concertos, destined to produce an instantaneous impression on the public, explains, also, why he allowed himself more liberty here than anywhere else in the employment of strongly exciting means of expression, and it is a very characteristic trait, that he endeavors to produce this effect, not by virtuoso-like effects, on the piano, but by the increased charm of musical expression."

Section 13 treats at length of the violin quartets and quintets. The author has already spoken, in Vol. III., of Mozart's relations towards Joseph Haydn, from which, as a sign of the highest respect, sprang the dedication of the first six quartets to that master. These belong to those compositions which Mozart wrote, without any immediate external cause, not to order, but for his own satisfaction. Jahn first enters on the essential elements of the quartet—as he does afterwards of the quartet generally—and on the peculiarities of these compositions of Mozart for chamber-music. Without subjecting them singly to a strict analysis, he gives us, in general touches, an excellent and characteristic account of them. It is only the C major quartet and the G minor quintet that he discusses at any length. The difference in style between the last four quartets (especially of three of them, written for Friedrich Wilhelm II., King of Prussia) and of the first six is, also, charmingly described.

Especially welcome is all that is said concerning the quintets. We are delighted that Jahn stands up for these magnificent compositions, explains their character—which is different from the last quartets, and approximates again to the style of the first six—and describes their beauties. It is an indisputable fact that Mozart's quintets are too much neglected in the public quartet associations which nearly every town of note possesses. It is true that the signal was given by a great composer of the modern school, who always used to leave the room when one of Mozart's quintets began. This is partly true even of the quartets, for how many lovers of music are there at present who have heard—not once, perhaps, but frequently—all the ten written by Mozart? We hope, too, that the eulogy which Jahn pronounces, which is but the echo of our own sentiments, on the grand trio on E flat major, for violin, viol, and violoncello, will direct the attention of associations for chamber-music to the gem of its kind. He justly calls it, "one of the most wonderful of Mozart's works, a genuine cabinet specimen of chamber music." (Page 94).

Well worthy our consideration is the analysis of the G minor quintet, containing the expression "of a passionately excited frame of mind, of grief conscious only of itself, and of a struggle of the heart with it, changing, in the finale, to the opposite mood (a gushing dithyrambus), which, however, belongs to the same nature, that is rendered with perfect fidelity and truth." Hereupon we read, at page 103.

"Involuntarily, with such physiological development, we seek the man in the artist, and who can deny that the most evident marks of Mozart's own nature are impressed on the work of Art? If however, we tried to find a definite inducement in his immediate circumstances, for its production, we should most certainly be led astray. Mozart's circumstances were at that time (1787), generally speaking, good. He had not long returned, richly rewarded with success and money, from Prague and in the Jacquin family enjoyed the society of those who satisfied both his mind and his heart. It is true that, shortly afterwards (26th May), he lost his father, but whoever carefully weighs the letter he wrote his father on the 4th of April, at the thought of the possibility of death (III., p. 279)—at the same time he was engaged on the first quintet in C major—must own that the tone of the G minor quartet could not be suggested by the thought of a dying father. The springs of artistic creation flow too far below the surface to be immediately called forth by every emotion in common life. It is true that the artist can give no more than what is in him, and what he has himself gone through; but even of the musician does Goethe's assertion hold good, that in a work of art there is nothing which the artist has not experienced, only not as he has experienced it.

"A second question now forces itself upon us: Does a piece of music which, like this one, unrolls before us a true soul-painting, follows the course of psychological development with the strictest consistency, and exhibits sharply and characteristically the tottering emotion of passionate sensations in the most delicate touches—does, we repeat, a piece of music like this obey also the formulas and laws of musical construction and technics? Without doubt, any one who chooses to disregard entirely the psychological development can show, by a purely technical analysis, how this quintet, which constrainedly obeys the conditions of musically beautiful form, by the most uncommon combination of invention and discernment, reaches a high degree of formal perfection, and whoever follows these indications will become aware that both the truth and strength of the psychological development, and the purity and beauty of the artistic form, coincide, and are one and the same in their essential manifestations."

Lastly, in this section, the author treats in a similar manner the composition for reed-bands (Harmonie-Musik) and the seven symphonies which Mozart wrote in Vienna. Concerning the improvement of the orchestra by Mozart, concerning his contrapuntal art, as a free phenomenon of artistic beauty and concerning the union of this art with the free employment of the various kinds of sound, the author says much that is very excellent and characteristic of Mozart's genius. In the fact that the three grand symphonies in E flat major, G minor and C major (with the fugue), were written within six weeks (from the end of June to the 10th of August, 1788), and, though equally rich and equally profound in purport, are yet most different in their character, Jahn justly perceives a fresh proof: "that, amidst the most manifold impressions of life, the artist's soul is always laboring and producing, while, in secret, the threads of which the work of art is woven are continually and mysteriously converging."

The Development of the Musical Faculties.

We must have recognized that nature has given musical capabilities to most individuals; but that these powers and susceptibilities exist in the most manifold variety of gradations. The germ of these faculties, like that of all our other powers is strengthened and unfolded by all the appearances and impressions of the outer world on us, from the moment of our birth; and when placed at the disposal of the instructor, it has already undergone a certain degree of expansion from the unconscious tuition of daily experience.

The development of the musical faculties, however, as far as regards the meaning of sounds, labors under disadvantages, particularly in northern climates, from which our other faculties are comparatively free. The most pressing wants and constantly urging requirements of life, call chiefly into action that other spiritual sense, the eye, in combination with the understanding. The child learns to distinguish earlier by the eye than the ear; while its understanding is almost incessantly employed in seizing the significance of sounds, as indicative of the objects of sense by which it is surrounded, rather than the meaning of sound in any musical relationship; a kind of affinity, which to the uneducated ear remains, perhaps, through life unknown. The musical element has less occasion to be exhibited by us more silent Germans, than among our southern and western neighbors. It is, nevertheless, as deeply significant, well defined, and powerful in our language, even as in the Italian, which, indeed, can claim superiority only in some degree of clearness, and an old prejudice in its favor.

Long continued neglect and suppression, indeed, of musical qualifications, are much to be lamented: more particularly during musical education itself, when such neglect operates most severely. Parents and teachers are more apt to complain of the want of disposition in their pupils, than to seek in themselves the cause of that deficiency. Only when the delays and the misapprehensions shall be attacked on all sides, and overcome, will our conviction be complete, that the musical qualifications given to most men are much more considerable than is generally believed.

OF THE TIME PREVIOUS TO LEARNING.

This period requires domestic care and solicitude, as a preparation for the directing hand of the master; and here it is, that the mother, as monitor of the awakening senses of her child, is called upon to exercise the budding susceptibilities on salutary objects, and shield their tender impressiveness from violent and distracting sensations. Certain determined sounds have an incalculable and lasting effect on the infant mind and senses, when presented to them without constraint or obvious intention. The pure sound of a little bell, the combined sounds of two or three glasses, producing, for example, $c-g$, and then $g-d-b$, the contrast of high clear sounds and low murmurings are best calculated to affect the infant perceptions. It can easily be imagined, how at a later period, listening to the rolling thunder, to the whispering and rustling of the evening breeze, to the murmuring brook, to the moan of the impending storm, to the warbling of the nightingale, may penetrate into, and influence the yearnings and aspirations of fresh youthful existence, wherein are imbedded those bright germs of thought, whose future expansion and manifestation are exhibited in the high productions of genius, at once the glory and the despair of each succeeding age! But how many circumstances conspire to disturb, counteract, and disenchant these beautiful and fructifying moments of early youth, particularly in large cities! How necessary is help, where nature cannot be left alone! How harassing and destructive, while the precious moments of culture are so few, that the delicate and tender perceptions should be jarred by the harsh rolling of the streets, the deafening crash of brazen bands, and the rough growl of drums; that their fine organizations should be either rent or palsied by coarseness or force, while yet scarcely awake to their legitimate functions! Let, therefore, every mother who has a perception of the charms of music, and of its civilizing influence, weigh well the importance of the early education of the senses. Her simple song, in which perhaps the infant voice is blended is the most natural, and often the most fruitful lesson. A march of the most simple melody, and merely drum rhythm, which the boy and his father perform together, round about in their apartment, inspires more delight and feeling of measure, than many a half-year's instruction. If by great good fortune the tender ear of childhood should be indulged with the delicious enchantment of an opera, the few enraptured hours thus spent may cast a broad and glowing beam of sunshine to the latest days of life. For such an initiation we could wish every child to enjoy the dear old, but ever fresh and young Zauberflöte, that child's fairy play, which Mozart has immortalized with the power of prolonging and reproducing all our lives the earliest and most innocent blossoms of youthful delight. In this play, congenial childhood enters with the sweetest self-devotion into the wondrous and inconceivable passions of maturer age, and is carried away at last to the perception of the truth, to the dreaded dagger; but, with such guileless purity, such forgetfulness of self, that the star flaming queen can scarcely be reproached when she rises delicately, and without effort, in melting harmonies, from the midst of her sufferings. On the other hand, we would withhold from the young sensations, the old and revived operas of mere show and exaggerated effect; and more especially those prosaic representations of ordinary life, in which the music sinks with its subject into mere triviality and nothingness. In like manner we would spare our young pupils the infliction of chamber or social music, which in general they do not understand; and lastly, we recommend moderation in quantity. The first opera once,—the full organ in the church, when empty,—seldom warlike music, and still more rarely, a concert. These are important moments in the young and impressive existence, and must be of extraordinary occurrence. Moreover, we would petition for the liberty for all children to play freely after their own fashion, on the pianoforte; to invent, and search, and lose themselves as they please, so long as they do not injure the instrument. This ad libitum playing is mostly prohibited, particularly if the days of instruction have begun. The child is told to employ itself more usefully, in finger exercises or written compositions. But how shall the individual musical feelings, or the yet feeble inventive imaginings, be fostered and educated to self-power and trustfulness, if the only, and at this age indispensable means of cultivation be withheld? We are delighted to hear of the infant Mozart, who, in the third year of his short life, sought to arrange sounds in musical combination; and at the same time, we forbid the like practice to our own children, or disturb their often burning dreams of harmony with our short-sighted and self-sufficient wordly prudence.

We wish to say another word in these nursery details, concerning speech. It might almost be maintained, that we, in Germany, have more men who write, than speak well; so hollow and uncertain, so feeble and oppressively restrained does our magnificent, copious, and universally appropriate language appear in speech, while its perfections have only attained for it the calumnies of undistinguishing foreigners, and the neglect of our own countrymen, who have mistaken, disfigured, and corrupted it. How seldom do we hear any one among us speak openly and freely from the chest! How rare is the pure, full sound of the vowels, or the clear distinctness of the manifold characteristic varieties of the consonants! When do we hear modulation of the voice in speaking? and rarer still, any attempt of raising or depressing the intonation, without the most abrupt helplessness? Much of this defective condition of our speech is probably owing to the rarity with us, of public speaking, and other restricting circumstances; but we doubt not that early education, and want of attention in after life, are, at least, equally culpable, in not removing these disadvantages, whose baneful influence indeed does not affect music alone.—Dr. Marx.

Adelina Patti in London.

Many of the friends and admirers of our young prima donna, will be glad to see the following extracts from the principal papers of London.

It is delightful to experience a new sensation—more especially in art, in which the highest excellence is the greatest rarity nowadays. Good actors and good singers are so seldom to be found, and disappointments are of such frequent occurrence, that we have long since relinquished our faith in new-comers on the dramatic or operatic stage, even when the trumpet of fame has been sounded loudest and longest in advance. The cry of "Wolf" has lost all its power, and we quietly determine to trust nothing but our own eyes and ears. Such were our feelings when we went to the Royal Italian Opera on Tuesday evening to witness the debut of Mlle. Patti. We had read about the lady in foreign journals, and had written about her no later than last week; but, although all we had read was highly eulogistic, and though we presented her in the most favorable light to the reader—as far as we were enabled to do, not having heard her without compromising ourselves, we were by no means sanguine as to the result. The general audience, of course, who knew nothing whatsoever about Miss Adelina Patti, was apathetic in the extreme, and there was not the least excitement manifested. The theatre, though subsequently full, at first, indeed, was badly attended, and little interest or curiosity was betokened for the débutante. A few, however, who learned what had taken place at rehearsal, were anxious and excited, and these were her solitary friends; and so Mlle. Adelina Patti made her first appearance in England with little or no hope or expectation from any feeling previously created in her favor. Never did singer make her début in this country with so little known of her antecedents, and with so little stir made about her beforehand. Generally speaking, a new candidate for lyric and dramatic honors, as soon as announced, becomes the topic in musical circles, and affords matter for speculation in clubs and drawing-rooms. A new "first lady" in the operatic world is a great fact, and subscribers prepare their opera-glasses as astronomers their telescopes on the advent of an unexpected comet. Mlle. Patti, however, had not figured in the programme of the season and her name had only appeared four days in advance of her début, and without a single remark in the advertisements. Not only was the young lady unheralded by puff of any kind, but the usual, indeed indispensable, statement as to who she was, and where she came from, was omitted altogether. Did the director, assured of success, follow this unprecedented mode of securing a sensation? Or did he fear for the result, and so hold his peace? We think the latter most probable, as the temptation to disclosure involved in the complete conviction of having something great to exhibit would be almost too much for managerial forbearance. Mlle. Adelina Patti, we may therefore conclude, came out with out any extraordinary hope on the part of the director—at all events until after rehearsal, when announcement was too late—and with no expectation on the part of the public.

Never was surprise greater, nor result more triumphant, Mlle. Patti was welcomed with the warmth due to her extreme youth and prepossessing appearance; but there was no enthusiasm. The utmost attention, however, was paid to the recitative preceding Amina's address to her companions, and the first hearing was satisfactory. The young artist for a moment or two betrayed nervousness; but she instantly shook off all fear, as if conscious of her strength, and executed a passage di bravura, which completely electrified the house. The audience was indeed all ears, and Mlle. Patti's success may be chronicled as a perfect climax, rising from the first scene, and attaining its culminating point in the famous rondo finale, "Ah! non giunge." What our opinions of the débutante are will be found in our notice of the young lady's performance in its proper place. Meanwhile, we may assert emphatically that Italian Opera has obtained an accession of strength in a certain line which we did not expect to witness in our own time. Mlle. Adelina Patti is a triumphant refutation that art and genius have deserted the operatic stage. Having now obtained the legitimate successor of Bosio, Persiani—we were about to add (and why not?) Jenny Lind—why may we not look for another Pasta, Malibran, Catalani, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache? Why should not the advent of Mlle. Patti fill us with hope for the fortunes of Italian Opera? We may indulge imagination so far. At all events we have experienced a new sensation, and that is something.—Musical World.

The London Times speaks thus of our young prima donna. We copy the whole article:

A new Amina does not usually excite much curiosity among frequenters of the Opera. There have been since the days of Malibran so many Aminas, and nineteen out of twenty of them commonplace. Even the announcement of a new singer, irrespective of Amina, or Lucia, or Arline, or Maritana, or any other character, Italian or English (not excepting the Traviata herself)—so strong the re-action against preliminary flourish—is now-a-days received with something like indifference. How many Pastas, how many Grisis, how many Jenny Linds ("nightingales," of course), have suddenly come forth and as suddenly vanished, or at best, remained, content to occupy a second, third, or fourth rate position. The musical public has sunk into a sort of lethargic and cynical incredulity, the result of many sanguine hopes raised, and just as many wofully disappointed. At present, we may venture to suggest, the most prudent way to obtain an impartial and indulgent hearing for a new aspirant to lyric honors, is to say nothing in advance. Mr. Gye has adopted this course of action, or inaction, with regard to a very young lady who made her first appearance last night as the heroine of "La Sonnambula," and who, we may add at once, created such a sensation as has not been paralleled for years. It was simply advertised, late last week, that on Tuesday, May 14, Mlle. Adelina Patti would assume the part of Amina, in Bellini's well-known opera. Apart from those who had visited the United States, or those in the habit of perusing the musical notices of American journals, no one had ever heard of Mlle. Adelina Patti; and thus, although the house was brilliantly attended (it being a "subscription night,") there were no symptoms whatever of a more than ordinary degree of expectation. As that diverting necromancer, Gospadin Frikell, used to declare, there was "no preparation;" certainly there was no "claque"—no disposition to anticipate favor or extort applause. The débutante was at first calmly, then more warmly, then enthusiastically—judged; and she who, to Europe at any rate, was yesterday without a name, before to-morrow will be a "town-talk."

And now comes the difficult part of our task. "Is Mademoiselle Adelina Patti"—it will naturally be asked—"a phenomenon." Decidedly yes. "Is she a perfect artist?" Decidedly no. How can a girl of scarcely eighteen summers have reached perfection in an art so difficult? It is simply impossible. We are almost inclined to say that she is something better than perfect; for perfection at her age could be little else than mechanical, and might probably settle down at last into a cold abstraction, or mere commonplace technical correctness. No, Mlle. Patti has the faults incidental to youth and inexperience; but these in no single instance wore the semblance of being ineradicable; on the contrary, they are in a great measure the consequence of an ardent ambition to attain at a jump what can only be attained with years of laborious application. The management of the voice, the gradation of tone, the balance of cadence, the rounding off of phrase, are all occasionally more or less defective; but to compensate for these inevitable drawbacks, there is an abiding charm in every vocal accent, an earnestness in every look, and intelligence in every movement and gesture that undeniably proclaim an artist "native and to the manner born." And let it be understood that these qualities of charm, of earnestness, and of intelligence are not merely the prepossessing attributes of extreme youth, allied to personal comeliness, but the evident offspring of thought, of talent—we may almost add of genius, but assuredly of natural endowments, both mental and physical, far beyond the average.

Mlle. Patti's first appearance on the stage seemed to take the audience by surprise. So young an Amina, young enough in appearance to be the daughter of her Elvino (Signor Tiberini), an Amina, in short, not yet done growing, had never before been witnessed. The recitative, "Care compagne," however, showed at once that in this particular case youthfulness and depth of feeling might be found both naturally and gracefully united; while long before the termination of the air, "Come per me sereno," with its brilliant cabaletta, "Sovra il sen la man mi posa," a conviction was unanimously entertained by the audience that a singer of genuine feeling, rare gifts and decided originality stood before them. A high soprano voice, equal, fresh and telling in every note of the medium, the upper "E flat," and even "F" at ready command; admirable accentuation of the words, considerable flexibility, dashing and effective use of "bravura," expression warm, energetic and varied, while never exaggerated, and last, not least, an intonation scarcely ever at fault—such were the valuable qualities that revealed themselves in turn during the execution of Amina's well known apostrophe to her companions on the auspicious day that is to unite her to Elvino, and which raised the house to positive enthusiasm. A thing that must have astonished every one was the thorough ease and "aplomb" (an excellent term) with which so young a stranger confronted so formidable an assembly, in the midst of difficulties that at times are apt to unsettle the oldest and most practised stage singers. Too much self composure, it might be urged, for one of Mlle. Patti's years, were it not that the ingenuous confidence of youth, when unchecked by the susceptibility of a nervous temperament, often makes it unapprehensive of danger and careless of results. At any rate, Mlle. Adelina Patti's first essay was a veritable triumph, and her ultimate success thus placed beyond a doubt. When the applause at the end of "Come per me sereno" had subsided, there was a general buzz of satisfaction. The consciousness of a new sensation having been unexpectedly experienced, seemed universal among the audience, who in grateful recognition might have addressed the new songstress in the language with which the village chorus apostrophize Amina:

Vivi felice! e questo
Il com un voto, o Adelina!

The history of Mlle. Patti's first appearance is told in the foregoing. The descent of the curtain was the signal for loud and long continued plaudits. For the third time Mlle. Patti was led forward by Signor Tiberini; and then, in obedience to a general summons, she came on alone to receive fresh honors. To conclude, if Mlle. Patti will rightly estimate the enthusiasm caused by her first appearance before the most generous (although, perhaps, the most jaded) of operatic publics, and—not regarding herself as faultless—study her art with increased assiduity, a bright future is in store for her. If, on the other hand—but we would rather not contemplate the opposite contingency.

There never perhaps was a lyric part with musical and histrionic traditions so firmly established, or so obsequiously followed. It is really enterprising in such a case to attempt anything novel; and Madlle. Patti's performance was more than enterprising, and new, for it was at the same time sterlingly good. This praise, he it understood, applies specially to her singing. All, or nearly all, the cadences, variations, and embellishments introduced by Mlle. Patti were original. The particular grace and fancy by which they were honorably distinguished were her's alone; and thus in a musical sense, the debutante's Amina was a creation. To say that Madlle. Patti must prove a valuable acquisition were recognise too coldly the merits quite hors deligne of this gifted young lady. It should rather be predicated of her that she will presently become a very "bright particular star" that all musical London will do homage to. Mlle. Patti's success with the public was immense; and that rarest of all enjoyments, a "new sensation" of pleasure, was, we are quite sure, drawn forth by her fresh and delightful vocalisation.—Post.

A new star—a star of the very first magnitude—has suddenly and unexpectedly appeared on our musical stargazers. This star is a young girl, Adelina Patti—a name till now unknown in this country—who appeared last night in the Sonnambula, and achieved a triumph such as we have never seen surpassed during our not very brief theatrical experience. Her powers of execution are something astounding. The compass of her voice seems to have no limits; she disports herself in those regions of the scale which all other singers that we have ever heard can reach only for a few notes with a great and painful effort. In the invention of original and varied passages her imagination seems exhaustless, and she executes them with the ease and certainty of a Joachim or a Vieuxtemps on his violin. Mozart's celebrated airs of the Queen of Night, in the Zauberflöte, seem intended to tax to the utmost all the powers of the female voice; but these airs, in respect to difficulty, are mere children's play compared to the achievements of Madlle. Patti in the air we are speaking of, and still more in the famous "Ah, non giunge," the finale of the opera. Were these things merely feats of execution—tours de force and nothing more, we should not attach any great value to them. But, with this young singer, execution is only the means to an end—that end being the expression of feeling and passion. Of every variety of expression, too, Madlle. Patti is mistress. The few simple notes, breathed by the sleeping girl as she unconsciously suffers the withered flowers to drop from her hands, were as heart-touching as when they were uttered by Lind herself—more they could not be.—News.

The American journals have asserted that Mlle. Adelina Patti is the legitimate successor of Sontag and Bosio, and have prophesied that her claim would be acknowledged directly she was heard in London or Paris.

The American writers were correct both in their assertion and their prophesy. The success of Mlle. last night was enormous, unparalleled, indeed, since the first appearance of Jenny Lind. Nor was success ever more legitimate, ever more free from prejudicial anticipations from party, from claque, from preparation. On Friday last the name of Mlle. Patti appeared in the advertisements of the day, unheralded by puff or special comment. No doubt hundreds asked, "Who is Adelina Patti?" and few could answer them. To-morrow the name of the young artist will be wafted abroad on the four winds of Heaven, and her reputation will be universal. Then the cry will be, "A new phenomenon of song has at last appeared, and she is called Adelina Patti."

We cannot enter into a minute description of Mlle. Patti's qualifications at this hour. It will be enough to say, at present, that her voice is a pure soprano, of wonderful extent in the upper register, reaching, with positive ease, to F altissimo. It is clear, powerful, sonorous, bright, and firm as a rock; not a single vibrato being evidenced last night, even when tremulousness might naturally be expected. Moreover, her voice is invariably correct in the intonation—one of those fresh voices, indeed, which cannot sing out of tune. Mlle. Patti's facility is immense. She sings the most difficult passages without an effort, runs the chromatic scale with the perfectness of a player on a tuned instrument, and has an incomparable shake. She indulged in several tours de force last night and created a fièvre, and astonished beyond measure the best judges of singing, in the house. If we were inclined to be hyper-critical, we might assert that Mademoiselle Patti was not invariably perfect when she attempted these astonishing flights of fancy, but we cannot stoop to find a fault in what was really so dazzling and so enchanting on the whole. We must say, indeed, that no other artist since Malibran has afforded us the same delight, and filled us with the same astonishment in Amina, and we believe that every unprejudiced person will say the same thing. As an actress, Mlle. Patti is intense rather than demonstrative. She is always earnest, and her attitudes and motions are invariably natural, and sometimes irresistibly beautiful. There is not much display in her acting, but when occasion calls it forth she shows herself possessed of great impulse and great power, as exemplified in the bedroom scene, and in the rondo finale. At present we shall say no more than that every auditor in the theatre was enchanted beyond measure, and that the young artist has already made herself famous.—Chronicle.

At the Italian Opera the plaudits come from the amphitheatre (vulgo, the gallery). The fashionable style of applause of Sir Fopplin Flutter in the orchestra stalls, and Lord Fitz Hanaper in the private box, is to tap two gloved fingers gently upon a gloved palm. To the singers the more generous and inspiring encouragement of the amphitheatre audience is so invaluable that it would answer the purpose of lessee and artistes, nay even of De Boots himself, to let them in without payment in return for the exertion they are good enough to undergo in clapping their hands violently together, shouting "bravo" and "encore." The more distingue audience down stairs, if left wholly to themselves, would, I fear, paralyse the singers, and envelope the entertainment as in a wet blanket. But on Wednesday night Mlle. Patti fairly broke the ice of fashionable coldness and reserve. Gloves of the whitest kid, in pit and orchestra stalls, came together with explosions that would have done honor to the gallery of the Victoria or the pit of the Surry. Old gentlemen became red in the face with clapping and shouting. A low and involuntary murmur of "bravo" ran round during the passages justly held sacred against interruption. And finally, when in "Ah non giunge," that brilliant and uncontrollable burst of joy, the debutante carolled and trilled, and heaped up intricacies and difficulties for the express purpose of showing how easily she could surmount them, you might have thought yourself in La Scala of Milan, or the San Carlo, at Naples, with their impressionable audiences, rather than among cold reserved Englishmen. The music of "Sonnambula," so seldom heard in these days of Prophètes and Huguenots, seemed like the music of one's boyhood, beautiful in its elegant sensibility and pure flow of melody, but having no more in common with the grand and difficult orchestral combinations of Meyerbeer than the barley sugar and currant wine of early days with the claret and olives of the epicure.—Manchester Express and Guardian.

The judgement of European connoisseurs will, we feel satisfied, endorse the favorable opinions of her Transatlantic critics. Her voice is a high soprano, extensive in compass, and exquisitely pure and sweet in quality. Its perfect freshness is one of its most charming features, and her upper notes are deliciously round, and at the same time of bird-like brilliancy. Her remarkable natural powers of florid vocalisation have been cultivated with striking success. Nothing could well surpass the graceful fluency, the delicate precision, and the faultless intonation which characterise her delivery of elaborate passages, which are given, too, without the slightest appearance of effort. Equally worthy of praise is the tenderness and pathos with which she gives more subdued phrases—singing them in a clear, even, and thoroughly natural style, with no tinge of that affected tremulousness which some vocalists have recourse to as a substitute for genuine feeling. In her case, an organ rich in natural resources has been trained in the best school, and her eminent vocal abilities are allied to equally remarkable dramatic powers. Viewed merely as an histrionic impersonation, the character of Amina has never been, within our recollection, more admirably played than it was by Mlle. Patti last evening.—Star.

Musical Correspondence.

WEIMAR. — We are permitted to make the following interesting extracts from a letter by a young lady from this city who is pursuing her musical studies at Weimar:

"I have been to a court concert a few days ago. It was given in the palace to the guests of the Duke, and in the gallery around the hall were places where people could go by paying. Liszt directed it, and it was a very fine concert. A full orchestra, a violin, piano, and flute solo. A young lady played the piano but I did not like her. The Court people were all in full dress. Some of the gentlemen's dress coats were covered with orders. One old General was completely covered, from his neck down to his waist. The orders were set in precious stones, diamonds, emeralds and rubies, and looked very brilliant. The ladies were all handsomely dressed. I could hardly realize that I was not at the theatre, and that all these people were not parading back and forth through the hall for my amusement, as long as I had paid to go in. After all, there is very little difference between real kings and queens and those in a play. "Tis distance lends enchantment to the view." Last week there was an artist's festival, in honor of the birthday of Franz Schubert. It commenced with a concert. Afterwards there was a supper and at the end a ball. At the concert, Liszt played. He has not played in public before for ten years. When he sat down at the piano, there was a perfect storm of applause, which lasted five minutes or more. He bowed and bowed, but the people would not stop applauding. He plays wonderfully. There is a certain charm about his playing, which distinguishes it from that of any one else. Other people may play the piece just as perfectly. Bendel, for example, plays just as astonishingly as Liszt, but Liszt inspires his hearers just as a fine orator does. You get quite carried along with him, and he is complete master of his audience. When the music is animated you are exhilarated, when it is plaintive you feel like weeping. The music has complete mastery over you, and it is not the music either, but the playing of it, which is so effective. It is the result of his genius. Any one else might play the piece and seemingly play just as well and it would not have anything like the same effect on an audience. No player ever affected me so much. And it is so with every one who hears him. In Leipzig and other places there is a great prejudice against his compositions, and they are not brought out at all. One of these people was at this concert, a thorough hater of Liszt and his music. When he had finished playing, this man turned to a friend with him, and said, 'I declare, that man must be a devil! When I hear him play I have no longer a mind of my own. I feel willing to accept all his musical eccentricities, and am completely under his influence while I listen to him.' This is the secret of Liszt's immense fame and great personal influence. He almost magnetizes people with his playing. No artist will ever again create the enthusiasm which he has created, and would still, if he were to play in public. He devotes almost all his time to composition."

SPRINGFIELD, MS., JUNE 6, 1861.—At last we have had a concert after a dearth lasting I can hardly say how long. Mills, Hinkley, and Taunt (I place them according to their degrees of excellence) visited us last Tuesday evening and drew a fine house. As you and most of our readers have heard these artists, any extended criticism from me is unnecessary; so I will only give you some of the impressions they made a Springfield audience.

Almost every one was pleased with Mr. Mills, who did himself much credit, though laboring under many disadvantages and perhaps not in the best humor in consequence. He had only a square piano—a Steinway, and a poor one at that—which to increase his troubles, was miserably out of tune. Still, he showed himself a pianist of no ordinary ability and his listeners left with a desire to hear him again under more favorable circumstances. Some would have been better suited with his selections, if he had treated us to something more solid than fantasies. As it was, the one by himself on "Le Pardon de Plöermel," seemed in many respects superior to the others.

From the glowing reports concerning Miss Hinkley, some of them emanating from high sources, we had a right to expect some really fine singing from her, but I believe the general feeling of the audience was that of disappointment; and I cannot help thinking that, for some reason (indifference perhaps), she failed to do herself justice. She has certainly a flexible voice—her lower tones being by far the best—but it is not "in perfect command" and by no means always "in excellent tune," as was remarked in one of the dailies. She made some downright failures, that at the close of the rondo from "Don Pasquale" being one of the most apparent. She endeavored just at the finale to reach a note somewhere in the upper regions, found she couldn't do it in tune, and gave it up. A like failure in Boston by any singer however beautiful and popular would have been hissed. But she was not hissed here and because we were not rapturous "Miss Hinkley thinks she was not well received in Springfield!" Very likely she would have been more successful in opera.

Miss Hinkley's programme was made up of selections from different operas and the usual number of national airs. Of the former the polacca from "I Puritani" was sung very nicely and justly merited the encore it received. We had among the latter, the Star Spangled Banner, the rendering of which was said by the papers to be incomparable, but it was open to criticism, especially in the matter of enunciation. It will be a happy day for music when our public singers learn that a simple melody "unadorned is adorned the most" and that the stereotyped embellishments of the Italian opera are in such instances wholly misapplied. Some old master (who was it?) on being told of the remarkable execution of a young singer inquired, "can she six plain notes?"

On the whole, we rarely hear a singer who varies as much from quite good to quite poor as did Miss Hinkley on Tuesday evening. It was evident more than once that she can in time become a good singer, but at present she attempts more than she accomplishes.

A word concerning the balladist, Mr. Taunt has a pleasant but not remarkable voice and is praiseworthy in singing what he can sing—Irish ballads. In his last song, however, he was occasionally the trifle of half a tone flat—something, I need not say, which might have been remedied or at least made less apparent by the accompanist, Mr. Mills. R.

PHILADELPHIA, JUNE 1.—Messrs. Wolfsohn and Thomas gave the last of their series of Concerts to a larger audience than their most sanguine friends could have expected. In spite of hard times, "war and rumors of war," the Foyer of the Academy was uncomfortably filled, and that too on a sultry evening. I give you the programme:

PART I.
Sonata appassionata (F minor, Op. 57).....	Beethoven
a Allegro assai.	b Andante con moto.
c Allegro ma non troppo e Presto.
Carl Wolfsohn.
PART II.
1. "Le trille du Diable".....	Tartini
	Theodore Thomas.
2. Rakoczy March.....	Liszt
	Carl Wolfsohn.
3. Andante con moto (from D minor Quartett).....	Schubert
	Messrs. Thomas, Kammerer, Hassler, Schmitz
4. Grand Duo concertante "Les Huguenots".....
	Wolfsohn and Hopkinson
	Carl Wolfsohn and Theodore Thomas.
PART III.
Quintett (D major).....	Mozart
a Larghetto e Allegro.	b Adagio.
c Minuetto.	d Finale. Allegro.
Messrs. Thomas, Kammerer, Hassler, Muller, Schmitz.

I was unable to reach the Academy before the beginning of Part II. Tartini's strange "Trille du Diable" (as manipulated by Vienxtemps) was played with the usual correctness of Thomas. I can say but little else of this performance. There is one melancholy air, affording scope for the display of taste and feeling, while all the other parts remind one more of the Etudes of Kreutzer than of anything else. Divested of the interest lent it by its age and the Tartini legend, it is truly an ungrateful solo both to performer and listener.

The best features of the soirée were undoubtedly, the Andante from Schubert's D minor Quartett and the Mozart Quartett in D major. Both of these were played in a style that left nothing to be desired. There was not a feature in the performance of either to mar the pleasure inseparable from good music well rendered. The Andante by Schubert seemed a new treasure to Philadelphia amateurs. The charming melodic figures and pleasant surprises in modulations of the author are ever new. In an earlier soirée Messrs. W. and T. introduced his E flat Trio. Though it is not very clear to the uninitiated, at first hearing, it was very favorably received.

And here let me say that Thomas' Quartette playing is infinitely more acceptable than his Solo playing. His neatness of execution and "cold passion," to me, seem more appropriate in those concerted pieces in which the violin, though sustaining the leading part, should not be too prominent.

