One cause, and, perhaps, the most rational, to which this ittal appearance among the starry bosts may be attried, is the exhalutions of decomposed matter from the surfice of the earth. The great mortality that has prevailni in pur city for more than a year past, has filled our reveryards with human bodies; and the heavy rains we have and joined to the present sultry weather may have given birth'to miasmatic air, composed of hydrogen, sul-Prair, surbonated and phosphoriogas, and decayed animal rould have a tendency to ascend like smoke, its density being less than the pure atmosphere. particular alleation of the reader. The attempt to revive the differences that formerly existed between those gentlemen, and which have long since been amicably adjusted, must, most certainly eminate from a growthing spirit.—Such supporters, to a virtuous and intelligent mind, must appear as so much dead weight to the cause they capouse, and as a disguese to any party to which they may attach themselves. Is our opinion, no enlightened community, can uphold dishonor, let it emanate from whetever source it man.

Mansassutta, Oct. 26, 1833.

Dear Sir—As the s'eamboat came over the Lake to-lay a gentlemen on board asked me if I had seen your address to the electors; I told him no—asked when it cairs out—he said about ten days ago, and was supprised that I had not seen it, as it used my axime very often. I expressed my astonishment at it, and told him I could not believe it such that I could not account for it; and did not believe it. In a few minutes, however, the matter was explained to me by another passenger, who arrived in the same boat, and who had been more particular as to dates ac. than my first informant. The mystery was explained by him in this way, which relieved ane much from the mystery of the first communication. He told me that he had seen in the Moreantile, of New Orleans, some ten or more days ago, a letter published, which transpired seven years ago, in our uncleas and unprofitable contest, in A. D. 1896. I immediately equired for the paper in this place; but could not find it—but on further enquiry with my last informant, found that it was a tetter of yours, written to me during our controversy in 1926, which had been recently published in a paper in the city unfillending to your election of governor, and intended to injure yourself. Whether the publication of it at this time, unconnected with the other correspondence, would have that tendency or not, I cannot say,—But from the relations subsisting at present, (at I understand them) between me and yourself, I feel it due to you to state to you personally, that I am to this day at the first knowledge of the delication of the publication of the publ ever as respects their real merit. Much of this is no double true; but it ought to be remembered at the same time, that many of the faults and follies, which we are apt to regard as characteristic of the present age, have existed in all tomer time, and will probably continue to exist in time to come. Those of which we are now writing were the subject of as much complaint in the last century, as they possab've can be now, and we fear that they will not wholly sub'y can be now, and we fear that they will not wholly vanish, so long as newspapers endure. There is hardly a single fubble, peccadillo or down right crime lashed by the moralists of this nineteenth century, which is not treated with as much effect, and as little ceremony in the Spectator. We are far from unilertaking to defend this system of reviewing, or to assert, that the plan of indiscriminate and universal sulogy is either useful or agreeable: but it is at least satisfactory to know, that the will arising from both, or either, is by no means as great as it would become by a little alteration in the system. If editors continue to review books without reading them, very little would be gained books without reading them, very little would be gained to the cause of good marals or sound criticism. he shows to the cause of good morals or sound criticism, by aban-doning the pulling system, in order to tutroduce the oppo-site one of invective and abuse.
