THE present Volume embraces that period of our Parliamentary History, which is, perhaps, the most interesting of any ; namely, from the Restoration of Charles the Second in the year 1660, to the Revolution, in 1688. For this period, the Proceedings and Debates, in both Houses, have been, for the most part, collected from the following works : 1. The Journals of the House of Lords ; 2. The Journals of the House of Commons ; 3. That portion of the Parliamentary, or Constitutional History of England, which contains the proceedings of the Convention Parliament, from its meeting on the 25th of April, 1660, to its dissolution, on the 24th of December following, at which epoch the editors of this able performance conclude their labours ; 4. The Life of the Earl of Clarendon, written by himself, containing some interesting Debates, in both Houses, during the period between the Restoration of the King and the banishment of the said Earl, in the year 1667, which Debates never yet found their way into any Collection ; 5. The Proceedings of the House of Commons touching the Impeachment of the Earl of Clarendon, with the many Debates in that House upon the subject ; 6. The Works of the celebrated Andrew Marvell, who, from 1660 to 1678, regularly transmitted to his constituents of Hull, a faithful account of each day's proceedings ; 7. The Debates of the House of Commons, from 1667 to 1694, collected by the Honourable Anchtell Grey, who was thirty years a member for the town of Derby ; 8. The Debates in the House of Commons on the Bill of Exclusion, in the year 1680, first published in 1681, in a small duodecimo volume, and afterwards republished in 1716, and again in 1807, with the addition of the Debates in the Short Parliament held at Oxford, in the month of March, 1680-1, the proceedings of which related chiefly to the same subject ; that is to say, the Exclusion of the Duke of York from the succession to the crown ; 9. Timberland's History and Proceedings of the House of Lords ; and, 10. Chandler's History and Proceedings of the House of Commons.

ADVERTISEMENT.

It will, doubtless, have been observed by most persons who have much attended to the matter, that, for the period from the Restoration to the year 1743, the two last mentioned works, that is to say, those of Timberland and Chandler, have hitherto been regarded as a regular and complete collection, and the only regular and complete collection, of the Proceedings in Parliament; and that, as such, they have been introduced into, and enjoyed a distinguished place in, almost every public and great private library in the kingdom. Therefore, in preparing the present volume for the press, it might naturally have been expected, that considerable assistance would have been afforded by these works. It is, however, a remarkable fact, which may be verified by a reference to the proceedings of any single session, that very little assistance indeed has been received from them. To say the truth, a discovery of the extreme imperfection of these works produced one of the motives which led to the present undertaking. On comparing their contents with those of the authentic works before enumerated, they were found to be so extremely defective and incorrect, that they could, in hardly any case, be relied upon with safety. In them, King's Speeches are, in numerous instances, either wholly omitted, or very much curtailed. Scarcely any of the Speeches of the different Lord Chancellors, delivered at the opening of the several Sessions, though those speeches generally contain an outline of the state of the national affairs, are preserved. The Journals appear to have been rarely consulted. Scarcely a Motion or Resolution, is given as it stands in those authentic records. Explanatory notes there are none; and, in only one or two instances have the compilers deemed it necessary to favour the reader with information as to the source, whence they have drawn their materials; which would seem, indeed, to have been moulded into the form of volumes for the mere purpose of filling up a chasm in a book-case.

Besides resorting to the above-recited works, recourse has been had to the best historians, and contemporary writers. From Burnet, Echard, Kennet, Oldmixon, Rapin, North, Ralph, Marvell, Reresby, Temple, Walpole, and the Work of the late Mr. Fox, recently published, many Notes, historical and biographical, have been introduced; and, for the sake of connection, a short account of the principal Occurrences, during each recess of Parliament, has, where necessary, been inserted.

ADVERTISEMENT.

By way of Appendix to this volume, is subjoined a Collection of scarce and valuable Tracts, purely parliamentary, taken from the State Tracts, privately printed in the reign of Charles II. and James II. ; from the Harleian Miscellany ; and from the noble Collections of Lord Somers. Through these, a more lively image of the times is conveyed, than could be received from any general description, from however eloquent a pen it might proceed. From their scarceness, it is impossible that they should, in their separate state, be generally known ; and, as the utility of them, when accompanying the Parliamentary History of the times in which they were written, must be manifest to every one, the compiler does certainly consider them as not the least valuable part of his work.

Parliamentary History.

MEETING OF THE CONVENTION PARLIAMENT.]
 April 25, (1660.) This day, the New Parliament met according to appointment. The Journals of both Houses now begin again; but before we enter upon the Proceedings of this ever-memorable Convention of two Estates, we shall present the reader with the names of those members who composed the lower of them, viz. the House of Commons; reserving a List of the Peers to another place, when more of them were assembled together, with their King in the midst of them :

A List of the Names of the Knights, Citizens, Burgesses, and Barons of the Cinque Ports, of England and Wales, as they were returned to the Crown-Office, for the Parliament begun at Westminster, April 25, 1660, commonly called the CONVENTION PARLIAMENT, which was sitting at the Return of King Charles, and voted his RESTORATION.*

Proceedings of the House of Lords.] April 25. This day the house of lords met. As we have been long strangers to them, we think it proper to give their first five days proceedings, as they are entered on the Journals. The lords present were, the earl of Manchester, appointed to be Speaker pro tempore, the earls of Northumberland, Lincoln, Suffolk, and Denbigh, viscount Say and Sele, lords Wharton, Hunsdon, Grey de Werk, and Maynard.

Ordered, That Monday next be appointed to be kept, by this house, as a day of Fasting and Humiliation, for seeking a Blessing from God by prayer, upon the Meeting of both Houses of Parliament, in order to a Settlement of this Nation; and the place to be the Abbey Church in Westminster for the Peers, wherein the house of commons are to be desired to do the like for their house. A message was sent to the commons, to let them know that the lords have appointed to keep Monday next as a Fast-Day, for seeking of God for a Blessing upon the meeting of both houses, in order to a Settlement of this nation, and to desire their concurrence for the same day to be kept as a Fast by their house.

The earls of Northumberland and Lincoln, the lords Wharton, Hunsdon, and Grey de Werk, were appointed to consider of the Draught of an Order for Henry Scobell, esq. to deliver all Acts, Records, and Journal-Books, and all Papers and Writings whatsoever, that are in his custody, belonging to the Peers, to John Brown, esq. clerk of the parliament, and likewise the Stone Tower and dwelling-house belonging thereunto, and report the same to this house. Their lordships to meet presently.

Resolved, That George Monk, esq. is nominated and appointed, by this house, to be Captain-General of all Land Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the concurrence of the commons be desired therein.

The earl of Lincoln reported from the committee, the Order concerning the Records of this house, which was read and approved of, and ordered to be signed by the Speaker of this house, viz.

"Whereas Henry Scobell, esq. is now in the possession of the dwelling-house in the Old Palace Yard, at Westminster, belonging to the clerk of the parliament, who attends as clerk to the house of peers, and hath in his custody the Acts, Journals, and other Records of that house: it is ordered by the lords in parliament,

That the said Henry Scobell shall, upon sight hereof, forthwith deliver unto John Brown, esq. clerk of the parliament, or his assigns, the possession of a certain stone building, standing within the said dwelling house, commonly called the Tower, wherein the Records were usually kept, and the keys and other things belonging to the same: as also the Acts, Ordinances, Journals, Records, Writings, and Papers appertaining, or any wise belonging to the said office. And lastly, That the said Henry Scobell shall deliver the quiet possession of the said dwelling-house, with the appurtenances, unto the said John Brown, or his assigns, within 14 days next after the date of this Order, and hereunto obedience is required accordingly."

The earl of Northumberland, lord visc. Say and Sele, with the lords Wharton and Hunsdon, were appointed to consider of such lords as shall have Letters written to them, to desire their attendance on this house. To meet presently in the Prince's Lodgings.—The lord Wharton reported the Names of those lords, and likewise a Draught of the Letter, which were read and agreed to, viz. "My lord; I am commanded by the house of peers, hereby to signify their pleasures, that you do repair to attend the house with what convenient speed you can: and so rest, Your, &c. Manchester. Speaker pro tempore."

The earls of Northumberland, Suffolk, and Manchester, viscount Say and Sele, and the lords Hunsdon, Grey de Werk, and Maynard, were appointed by the house to go to the lord-general Monk, to deliver this Message to him, from the lords in parliament, and the earl of Manchester, Speaker, was to speak it, viz. "The peers in parliament assembled, have commanded me to own your lordship's valour and prudence in managing the great affairs intrusted to you; and they likewise return your lordship their acknowledgements for the care and respects which you have expressed to the peers, in restoring them to their antient and undoubted rights. And they hope that God will still bless you in the use of all means for the procuring a safe and well-grounded peace, according to the antient fundamental government of this nation, wherein they shall employ their councils and utmost endeavours in concurrence with you."

April 25, p. m. Ordered, That Dr. Reynolds and Mr. Hardy are appointed to preach before the lords on the Fast-Day; and that the house be called to-morrow.

April 26. The messengers sent yesterday to the house of commons return with the Answer, That they concur with this house in keeping Monday next a Fast-Day.

Ordered, That the antient Order of this house be revived for the Lords to pay coming after Prayers, viz. every earl 2s. and every baron 1s.

The earls of Northumberland, Lincoln, Dorset, &c. were ordered to prepare an Ordinance in pursuance of the Vote made yesterday by this house, concerning the lord-general Monk. Their lordships, or any four of them, to meet to-morrow morning at 8 of the clock, and Mr. Rich and Mr. Eltonhead to be assistants.

The Roll of the standing Orders of this house was read.

The earl of Manchester reported, that his lordship and the rest of the lords committees delivered to general Monk what this house had directed yesterday; and the general expressed himself to this effect: "That he took it for a great honour and civility from the house of peers; and said he would be ready to carry on all things that tend to the Safety and Settlement of this nation; and desired that their lordships would be pleased to look forward and not backward, in transacting of affairs."

A Message was brought from the commons by James Herbert, esq. who said, "He was commanded by the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons in parliament assembled, to acquaint this house, that they have resolved that this day fortnight be set apart for a Day of Thanksgiving to the Lord, for raising up his excellency the Lord-General, and other eminent persons who have been instrumental in the delivery of this nation from thralldom. Also they have resolved, That this day fortnight be the day set apart for a Day of Thanksgiving for that house, and within the cities of London and Westminster, and the late lines of communication; and this day month for the whole nation. To all which the house of commons desire their lordships concurrence."—The Answer returned to this Message was, That the Lords do, with thankful hearts, acknowledge God's great mercy in delivering them out of their long thralldom, confusion, and misery, and do fully concur with you in setting apart those public Days of Thanksgiving.

April 27. Ordered, That Mr. Hodges is appointed to preach before the Lords, the next Day of Thanksgiving, in the Abbey-Church.

Signification being given to the house, that divers Lords were in the lobby, ready to attend the service of this house, having never sat in parliament since the death of their ancestors, the house gave the gentleman usher authority to call them in to sit in their places in this house. The names of the aforesaid lords were, the earls of Oxon, Derby, and Stafford, lord viscount Conway, and the lords Cromwell, Gerrard, Tenham, and Capell.

Ordered, That the Speaker of this house do write several and respective Letters to the earls of Leicester, Bedford, and Clare, and lord Paget, to give their attendance on this house as peers.

The earls of Oxon, Northumberland, Rutland, &c. were ordered to frame an Ordinance for the constituting of a Committee of Safety of both houses, and to report the same to this house.

Resolved, That the earl of Manchester is hereby nominated and appointed one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal of England, and to send to the house of commons for their concurrence.

Lords Committees appointed to consider of the Privileges of this house, viz. Earls of Oxon, Northumberland, Derby, &c. Their lordships, or any 9 of them, to meet in the Prince's Lodgings when they please, and to adjourn from time to time, as they shall see cause.—Ordered, That it is referred to the Lords Committees for Privileges to consider of the different cases of those lords that have late come to sit in this house, and those that do not; and also what assistants that formerly sat in this house, and are now alive and capable of being admitted, to be assistants to this house.

Ordered, That a conference be had with the house of commons, to consider of some way and means to be found out to make up the Breaches and Distractions of this kingdom. This conference to be on Tuesday next in the Painted Chamber: and the earls of Oxon, Northumberland, Bedford, &c. were appointed to consider and draw up Heads for this conference.—A Message was sent to the commons by Mr. Rich and Mr. Eltonhead, to desire a conference on Tuesday next, at ten of the clock, in the Painted-Chamber, in order to the Settlement of the great Affairs of this kingdom.

April 30. Ordered, That the Lords of this house do receive Sacrament in the Abbey Church of Westminster; add, as concerning the time, it is referred to the committee of privileges to consider of it, and report the same to this house.

The lords, before they went to the Fast Sermons, made a Collection for the Poor, which was to be distributed as the house should thereafter appoint. Then the Lords went from this house together, in their order, to keep the Fast in the Abbey Church.

Proceedings of the House of Commons.
April 25. The Journals of the house of commons begin with acquainting us, That on this day the members of that house first went to Margaret's Church, Westminster, to hear a Sermon, and then repaired to their own house; where, on a motion made by Mr. Pierepoint, sir Harbottle Grimston was chosen Speaker,* and placed in the chair by the lord-general

* " Sir Harbottle Grimston had been a member of the Long Parliament, and continued, rather than concurred, with them till after the Treaty of the Isle of Wight; where he was one of the Commissioners sent to treat with that king, and behaved himself so well, that his majesty was well satisfied with him; and after his return from thence, he pressed the King's Concessions; and was thereupon in the number of those who were by force excluded the house. His election to be Speaker at this time was contrived by those who meant well to the King; and he submitted to it out of a hope and confidence that the designs it was laid for would succeed." Lord Clarendon, vol. vi. p. 755.

Monk,* Mr. Hollis, and the said Mr. Pierpoint. Next Wm. Jessop, esq. James North-folk, esq. and Ralph Darnall, esq. were chosen clerk, serjeant at arms, and clerk assistant.

The Clerk of the Crown attended with a Book, containing an account of the members chosen to serve in this present parliament, by which the house was called over; and those members who were present did, upon their naming, withdraw into the committee chambers and gallery above. Afterwards, when the Book was gone through, they returned and took their places in the house.

On a Message from the lords, the house agreed to hold a Fast on Monday the 30th; and that Mr. Calamy, Dr. Gauden, and Mr. Baxter; be desired to assist in carrying on the work of Fasting and Humiliation, on that day, at Margaret's Church, Westminster, in order to seek the Lord for a blessing on these distracted nations.

A large Committee for Privileges and Elections was appointed, with full powers for that purpose.—A Day of Thanksgiving to the Lord was appointed, for raising up his excellency the Lord General, and other eminent persons, who have been instrumental in the delivery of this nation from thralldom and misery. May the 10th to be the day, and that the lords concurrence be desired herein. Ordered also, That Mr. Price, the Lord-General's Chaplain, be desired to carry on the Work of Thank-giving, before this house, at Margaret's Church, Westminster; and that Dr. Clargis do give him notice thereof.

Solemn Thanks given to General Monk.] Resolved, That his excellency the Lord-General Monk have the Recognition, Acknowledgment, and hearty Thanks of this house, for his eminent and unparalleled services done to these nations. Accordingly, the Speaker gave the Thanks of the house to the Lord-General, standing in his place, to the effect following: "That he was commanded by this house to take notice of his eminent services, his wisdom being such, and God having so blessed him in his great affairs, that he hath made a conquest of those who are enemies and disaffected to the government, happiness, and welfare of this church and state, without a bloody nose: That this hath much advanced the honour of his services, having been effected without the expence of blood or treasure, of both which the nation had been so much exhausted, that nothing but a necessity could rationally have satisfied any man to draw out more: that his lordship hath been our physician; and hath cured us with his lenitives: that statues have heretofore been set up for persons meriting much of their country; but his lordship hath a statue set up higher, and in another place, as high as may be, in the hearts of all well-wishers to the good of this nation, and a crown of glory, he doubts not, laid up for him in heaven: that God hath made him instrumental, by his helping hand, to keep the nation from sinking, when no way was represented to our understanding, whence deliverance should arise; so that God's raising him up, accompanying, blessing, and assisting him in his counsels, in such sort as to accomplish his work to that height, cannot be otherwise owned by those that look upon him, and his actions, than as a miracle: and therefore, in the name of the house, he returns to his lordship the hearty Thanks of this house; adding, he was sure his lordship would believe it if he had not said so."

Then it was resolved, That col. Ingoldsbys should have the Thanks of the house, for his former and late great and eminent services done for this nation, which the Speaker accordingly gave him to the effect following: "That he is commanded by the house to take notice of his former services, and of his late action, wherein God hath made him instrumental to do so great and eminent a service to the nation, for which he returns him their hearty Thanks; having made him as high in favour as he is in his own merit, for adventuring himself so far in the public cause; and that the house's good acceptance thereof is the more valuable, being taken notice of on the same day with the great services performed for the nation by his excellency the Lord-General."

April 27. Ordered, That the great business, touching the Settlement of these Nations, be taken into consideration on Tuesday the 1st of May, at 8 o'clock; to which day the house adjourned itself, reserving power to all Committees to sit and act in the mean time, notwithstanding this adjournment.

During this short interval of the Commons, for the Lords did not adjourn at all, there happened an affair, which Dr. Price has given us, and is a piece of secret history very necessary to be known previous to their next meeting. This author tells us, "That, in this short recess, the General and sir John Grenville consulted together about the delivery of his Message, Letters, &c. from his majesty to both houses. That which was superscribed to the General, to be by him communicated to the Army and Council of State, was, by his appointment, delivered to him at the door of the Council-Chamber, where Grenville attended, and into which, as col. Birch, one of the Members of it, was entering, Grenville requested him (but unknown) that he might speak with my Lord-General; who, upon Birch's intimation, came to the door, and there, in the sight of his guards attending, received Grenville's Letters, but not with much regard either to his person or his business; of which the General seemed to understand somewhat by the seal, and asked him if he would stay there till

* "The general was elected a member, unanimously, by the university of Cambridge; which honour, Dr. Gumble says, he ever remembered with thankfulness. But being at the same time returned one of the knights of the shire for the county of Devon, he chose to represent the latter as his native country."—Dr. Gumble's Life of General Monk, p. 288.

he had his Answer, otherwise his guards should secure him, commanding them to look to him. So his excellency produceth his Letters to the Council of State, Grenville is sent for in, and Birch protested that he neither knew the gentleman nor his business. The lord-president of the council examined Grenville from whence those Letters came, whose they were, and how he came by them, (for as yet they were not opened) he told the president that the King, his master, gave him them with his own hands at Breda: so the opening of them was deferred till the Parliament sat. Grenville was to have been sent into custody, but the General was his bail, who said he knew the gentleman, (being his near kinsman) and would take his parole to appear before the parliament."

The King's Letter to the House of Peers.]

May 1. The two houses met. After the Lords had done some other business, and ordered a call of their house to be on the 3d instant, they were informed, That there was a gentleman, sir John Grenville, in the lobby, who had a Letter to deliver to this house from the King; the house thereupon was adjourned during pleasure, and the Speaker was appointed to go to the lower end of the house, and receive it at the hands of the messenger. The house being resumed, the Speaker reported, "That sir John Grenville delivered to him a Letter, which he said he received from the King, his master, to deliver to the house of peers." Hereupon, the house commanded the said Letter, with a Declaration inclosed therein, to be read twice; which was done accordingly, and are as follow:

"To the Speaker of the House of Peers, and to the Lords there assembled.

"C. R. Right trusty and right well-beloved cousins, and right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: We cannot have a better reason to promise ourself an end of our common sufferings and calamities, and that our own just power and authority will, with God's blessing, be restored to us, than that we hear you are again acknowledged to have that authority and jurisdiction which hath always belonged to you by your birth, and the fundamental laws of the land: and we have thought it very fit and safe for us to call to you for your help in the composing the confounding distempers and distractions of the kingdom, in which your sufferings are next to those we have undergone ourself; and therefore you cannot but be the most proper counsellors for removing those mischiefs, and for preventing the like for the future. How great a trust we repose in you, for the procuring and establishing a blessed Peace and Security for the Kingdom, will appear to you by our inclosed Declaration; which trust, we are most confident, you will discharge with that justice and wisdom that becomes you, and must always be expected from you; and that, upon your experience how one violation succeeds another, when the known relations and rules of justice are once transgressed, you will be as jealous for the rights of the crown, and for the honour of your king, as for yourselves, and then you cannot but discharge your trust with good success, and provide for and establish the peace, happiness, and honour of king, lords, and commons, upon that foundation which can only support it, and we shall be all happy in each other: and as the whole kingdom will bless God for you all, so we shall hold ourself obliged, in an especial manner, to thank you in particular, according to the affection you shall express towards us. We need the less enlarge to you upon this subject, because we have likewise writ to the house of commons, which we suppose they will communicate to you; and we pray God to bless your joint endeavours for the good of us all: and so we bid you very heartily farewell. Given at our Court at Breda, this 14th day of April, 1660, in the 12th year of our reign."

The King's Declaration.] His majesty's Declaration from Breda to all his loving Subjects, inclosed in the foregoing, was as follows:

"C. R. "Charles, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all our loving subjects, of what degree or quality soever, greeting: If the general distraction and confusion which is spread over the whole kingdom, doth not awaken all men to a desire and longing that those wounds, which have so many years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all we can say will be to no purpose; however, after this long silence, we have thought it our duty to declare how much we desire to contribute thereunto; and that as we can never give over the hope, in good time, to obtain the possession of that right which God and nature hath made our due; so we do make it our daily suit to the Divine Providence, that he will, in compassion to us and our subjects, after so long misery and sufferings, remit, and put us into a quiet and peaceable possession of that our right, with as little blood and damage to our people as is possible; nor do we desire more to enjoy what is ours, than that all our subjects may enjoy what by law is theirs, by a full and entire administration of justice throughout the land, and by extending our mercy where it is wanted and deserved.—And to the end that the fear of punishment may not engage any, conscious to themselves of what is past, to a perseverance in guilt for the future, by opposing the quiet and happiness of their country, in the Restoration both of king, peers, and people to their just, antient, and fundamental rights, we do, by these presents, declare, That we do grant a free and general Pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to pass under our Great Seal of England, to all our subjects, of what degree or quality soever, who, within 40 days after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall, by any public act, declare their doing so, and that they return to the loyalty and obedience of good subjects; excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by parliament, those only to be excepted. Let all our subjects, low faulty soever, rely upon the word of a king, solemnly given by this present Declaration, That no crime whatsoever, committed against us or our royal father before the publication of this, shall ever rise in judgment, or be brought in question, against any of them, to the least endamagement of them, either in their lives, liberties, or estates; or (as far forth as lies in our power) so much as to the prejudice of their reputations, by any reproach or term of distinction from the rest of our best subjects; we desiring and ordaining, that henceforth all notes of discord, separation, and difference of parties be utterly abolished among all our subjects, whom we invite and conjure to a perfect union among themselves, under our protection, for the Re-settlement of our just Rights and theirs, in a Free Parliament, by which, upon the word of a king, we will be advised.—And because the passion and uncharitableness of the times have produced several opinions in Religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animosities against each other, (which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of conversation, will be composed, or better understood) we do declare a Liberty to tender Consciences, and that no man shall be disquieted or called in question; for differences of opinion in matter of Religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom; and that we shall be ready to consent to such an act of parliament, as, upon mature deliberation, shall be offered to us; for the full granting that indulgence.—And because, in the continued distractions of so many years, and so many and great revolutions, many grants and purchases of estates have been made to, and by, many officers, soldiers, and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to actions at law upon several titles, we are likewise willing that all such differences, and all things relating to such grants, sales, and purchases, shall be determined in parliament; which can best provide for the just satisfaction of all men who are concerned.—And we do further declare, That we will be ready to consent to any act or acts of parliament to the purposes aforesaid, and for the full satisfaction of all Arrears due to the officers and soldiers of the Army under the command of general Monk, and that they shall be received into our service upon as good pay and conditions as they now enjoy. Given under our Sign Manual and Privy-Signet, at our Court at Breda, this 14th day of April, 1660, in the 12th year of our reign."

The King's Letter to the House of Commons.
May 1. In the house of commons, Mr. Annesley reported from the Council of State, a Letter from the King; unopened; directed, 'To our Trusty and Well-beloved' General Monk, to be communicated to the President and Council of State; and to the Officers of the Armies under his command,' being received from the hands of sir John Grenville. The house being informed that sir John Grenville, a messenger from the King, was at the door, it was resolved that he should be called in; which being done, and he at the bar, after obeisance made, he said, 'Mr. Speaker, I am commaunded by the King, my master, to deliver this Letter to you, and his desires that you would communicate it to the house.' The messenger being withdrawn, the Letter was read to the house by Mr. Speaker, and was as follows:

"To our Right Trusty and Well-beloved the SPEAKER of the House of Commons:

"C. R. Trusty and Well-beloved, we greet you well: In these great and insupportable afflictions and calamities under which the poor nation hath been so long exercised, and by which it is so near exhausted, we cannot think of a more natural and proper Remedy, than to resort to those for council and advice, who have seen and observed the first beginning of our miseries, the progress from bad to worse, and the mistakes and misunderstandings which have produced and contributed to inconveniences which were not intended; and after so many revolutions, and the observation of what hath attended them, are now trusted by our good subjects to repair the breaches which are made, and to provide proper Remedies for those Evils, and for the lasting Peace, Happiness, and Security of the kingdom.—We do assure you, upon our royal word, that none of our predecessors have had a greater esteem of parliaments than we have; in our judgment, as well as from our obligation, we do believe them to be so vital a part of the constitution of the kingdom, and so necessary for the government of it, that we well know, neither prince nor people can be, in any tolerable degree, happy without them: and therefore you may be confident, that we shall always look upon their counsels as the best we can receive, and shall be as tender of their Privileges, and as careful to preserve and protect them, as of that which is most near to ourself, and most necessary for our own preservation.—And as this is our opinion of Parliaments, that their authority is most necessary for the government of the kingdom; so we are most confident that you believe and find, that the preservation of the King's Authority is as necessary for the preservation of parliaments; and that it is not the name, but the right constitution of them, which can prepare and apply proper Remedies for those evils which are grievous to the people, and which can thereby establish their Peace and Security: and therefore we have not the least doubt but that you will be as tender in, and as jealous of, any thing that may infringe our honour, or impair our authority, as of your own liberty and property, which is best preserved by preserving the other.—How far we have trusted you in this great affair, and how much it is in your power to restore the nation to all that it hath lost; and to redeem it from any infamy it hath undergone, and to make king and people as happy as they ought to be, you will find by our inclosed Declaration, a copy of which we have likewise sent to the house of peers, (see p. 16): and you will easily believe that we would not voluntarily, and of ourself, have reposed so great a trust in you, but upon an entire confidence that you will not abuse it, and that you will proceed in such a manner, and with such due consideration of us who have trusted you, that we shall not be ashamed of declining other assistance, (which we have assurance of) and repairing to you for more natural and proper Remedies for the evils we would be freed from; nor sorry that we have bound up our own interest so intirely with that of our subjects, as that we refer it to the same persons to take care of us, who are trusted to provide for them. We look upon you as wise and dispassionate men, and good patriots, who will raise up those banks and fences which have been cast down, and who will most reasonably hope, that the same prosperity will again spring from those roots from which it hath heretofore and always grown. Nor can we apprehend that you will propose any thing to us, or expect any thing from us, but that we are as ready to give as you to receive.—If you desire the advancement and propagation of the Protestant Religion, we have, by our constant profession and practice of it, given sufficient testimony to the world, that neither the unkindness of those of the same faith towards us, nor the civilities and obligations from those of a contrary profession, (of both which we have had abundant evidence) could in the least degree startle us, or make us swerve from it. And nothing can be proposed to manifest our zeal and affection for it, to which we will not readily consent. And we hope in due time ourself to propose somewhat to you for the propagation of it, that will satisfy the world that we have always made it both our care and our study, and have enough observed what is most like to bring disadvantage to it.—If you desire Security for those, who, in these calamitous times, either wilfully or weakly have transgressed those bounds which were prescribed, and have invaded each other's rights, we have left to you to provide for their Security and Indemnity, and in such a way as you shall think just and reasonable; and, by a just computation of what men have done and suffered, as near as is possible, to take care that all men be satisfied; which is the surest way to suppress and extirpate all such uncharitableness and animosity, as might hereafter shake and threaten that Peace, which, for the present, might seem established. If there be a crying sin, for which the nation may be involved in the infamy that attends it, we cannot doubt but that you will be as solicitous to redeem and vindicate the nation from that guilt and infamy as we can be.—If you desire that reverence and obedience may be paid to the fundamental Laws of the Land, and that Justice may be equally and impartially administered to all men, it is that which we desire to be sworn to ourself, and that all persons in power and authority should be so too.—In a word; there is nothing that you can propose, that may make the Kingdom happy, which we will not contend with you to compass; and, upon this confidence and assurance, we have thought fit to send you this Declaration, that you may, as much as is possible, at this distance, see our heart; which when God shall bring us nearer together, (as we hope he will do shortly) will appear to you very agreeable to what we have professed. And we hope that we have made that right Christian use of our affliction, and that the observation and experience we have had in other countries hath been such, as that we, and we hope all our subjects, shall be the better for what we have seen and suffered.—We shall add no more but our prayers to Almighty God, that he will so bless your counsels, and direct your endeavours, that his Glory and Worship may be provided for, and the Peace, Honour, and Happiness of the nation may be established upon those foundations which can best support it. And so we bid you farewell. Given at our Court at Breda this 14th day of April, 1660, in the 12th year of our reign."

The King's Letter to Gen. Monk, and the Council of State.] After reading the foregoing, with the Declaration inclosed, the following Letter from his majesty to general Monk was also read:

"To our Trusty and Well-beloved General Monk, to be by him communicated to the President and Council of State, and to the Officers of the Armies under his Command.

"C. R. Trusty and Well-beloved, we greet you well: It cannot be believed but that we have been, are, and ever must be, as solicitous as we can, by all endeavours, to improve the affections of our good subjects at home, and to procure the assistance of our friends and allies abroad, for the recovery of that Right, which, by the laws of God and man, is unquestionable, and of which we have been so long dispossessed by such force, and with those circumstances, as we do not desire to aggravate by any sharp expressions; but rather wish that the memory of what is past may be buried to the world. That we have more endeavoured to prepare and to improve the affections of our subjects at home for our Restoration, than to procure assistance from abroad to invade either of our kingdoms, is as manifest to the world: and we cannot give a better evidence that we are still of the same mind than in this conjuncture, when common reason must satisfy all men that we cannot be without assistance from abroad, we chuse rather to send to you, who have it in your own power to prevent that ruin and desolation which a war would bring upon the nation, and to make the whole Kingdom owe the Peace, Happiness, Security, and Glory it shall enjoy, to your virtue; and to acknowledge that your armies have complied with their obligations for which they were first raised, for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, the Honour and Dignity of the King, the Privileges of Parliament, the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and the Fundamental Laws of the Land; and that you have vindicated that trust which others most perfidiously abused and betrayed. How much we desire and resolve to contribute to those good ends, will appear to you by our inclosed Declaration, which we desire you to cause to be published for the information and satisfaction of all good subjects, who do not desire a further effusion of precious Christian blood; but to have their Peace and Security founded upon that which can only support it, an Unity of Affections amongst ourselves, an equal Administration of Justice to men, restoring Parliaments to a full capacity of providing for all that is amiss, and the Laws of the Land to their due veneration.—You have been yourselves witnesses of so many Revolutions, and have had so much experience how far any power and authority, that is only assumed by passion and appetite, and not supported by justice, is from providing for the happiness and peace of the people, or from receiving any obedience from them, without which no government can provide for them, that you may very reasonably believe that God hath not been well pleased with the attempts that have been made, since he hath usually increased the confusion, by giving all the success that hath been desired, and brought that to pass without effect, which the designers have proposed as the best means to settle and compose the nation; and therefore we cannot but hope and believe that you will concur with us in the Remedy we have applied; which, to human understanding, is only proper for the ills we all groan under; and that you will make yourselves the blessed instruments to bring this blessing of Peace and Reconciliation upon king and people, it being the usual method in which Divine Providence delighteth itself to use and sanctify those very means which ill men design for the satisfaction of private and particular ends and ambition, and other wicked purposes, to wholesome and public ends, and to establish that good which is most contrary to the designers; which is the greatest manifestation of God's peculiar kindness to a nation that can be given in this world. How far we resolve to preserve your interests and reward your services, we refer to our Declaration; and we hope God will inspire you to perform your duty to us and to your native country, whose happiness cannot be separated from each other.—We have intrusted our well-beloved servant sir John Grenville, one of the gentlemen of our bed-chamber, to deliver this unto you, and to give us an account of your reception of it, and to desire you, in our name, that it may be published; and so we bid you farewell. Given at our Court at Breda this 14th of April, 1660, in the 12th year of our reign."

The King's Letter to the Lord Mayor and City of London.] Besides the foregoing, the following Letter from the King was sent to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London:

"C. R. Trusty and Well-beloved, we greet you well: In these great Revolutions which of late have happened in that our kingdom, to the wonder and amazement of all the world, there is none that we have looked upon with more comfort than the so frequent and public manifestations of their affections to us in the city of London, which hath exceedingly raised our spirits, and which, no doubt, hath proceeded from the Spirit of God, and his extraordinary mercy to the nation, which hath been encouraged by you, and your good example, to assert that government, under which it hath so many hundred years enjoyed as great felicity as any nation in Europe, and to discountenance the imaginations of those who would subject our subjects to a government they have not yet devised; and, to satisfy the pride and ambition of a few ill men, would introduce the most arbitrary and tyrannical power that was ever yet heard of. How long we have all suffered under those and the like devices, all the world takes notice, to the no-small reproach of the English nation, which we hope is now providing for its own security and redemption, and will be no longer bewitched by those inventions. How desirous we are to contribute to the obtaining the peace and happiness of our subjects without further effusion of blood, and how far we are from desiring to recover what belongs to us by a war, if it can be otherwise done, will appear to you by the inclosed Declaration; which, together with this our Letter, we have intrusted our right trusty and well-beloved cousin the lord viscount Mordaunt, and our trusty and well-beloved servant sir John Grenville, knt. one of the gentlemen of our bed-chamber, to deliver to you, to the end that you, and all the rest of our good subjects of that our city of London, (to whom we desire it should be published) may know how far we are from the desire of revenge, or that the Peace, Happiness, and Security of the kingdom should be raised upon any other foundation than the affection and hearts of our subjects, and their own consents. We have not the least doubt of your just sense of those our condescensions, or of your zeal to advance and promote the same good end, by disposing all men to meet us with the same affection and tenderness, in restoring the fundamental laws to that reverence that is due to them, and upon the preservation whereof all our happiness depends: and you will have no reason to doubt of enjoying your full share in that happiness, and of the improving it by our particular affection to you. It is very natural for all men to do all the good they can for their native country, and to advance the honour of it: and as we have that full affection for the kingdom in general, so we would not be thought to be without some extraordinary kindness for our native city in particular, which we shall manifest on all occasions, not only by renewing their Charter, and confirming all those Privileges which they have received from our predecessors, but by adding and granting any new favours which may advance the trade, wealth, and honour of that our native city; for which we will be so solicitous, that we doubt not but that it will, in due time, receive some benefit and advantage in all those respects, even from our own observation and experience abroad: and we are most confident we shall never be disappointed in our expectation of all possible service from your affections; and so we bid you farewell. Given at our Court at Breda the 14th day of April, 1660, in the 12th year of our reign."

After reading these Letters, with the Declaration, in the two houses, the Lords ordered sir John Grenville to be called in again, and the Speaker, by direction of the house, gave him Thanks, in their name, for his care in bringing this gracious Message from the King. They also ordered, That the King's Letter to them and the Declaration should be forthwith printed and published, with this title, 'His Majesty's gracious Letter and Declaration, sent to the House of Peers by sir John Grenville, 'knt.' Lastly, the Lords appointed a Committee to consider of a Letter of Thanks to the King for his gracious Message sent, this day, to the house, and to present it for their lordships consideration.

Mr. Rich, and Mr. Eltonhead, Masters of the Chancery, being sent by the Lords, with a Message, desiring a conference with the Commons this day (May 1) at 11 o'clock, in the Painted-Chamber, in order to the Settlement of the great Affairs of the Kingdom, the messengers were called in, and the Speaker acquainted them, That the house had considered their Message, and would return an Answer by messengers of their own.

Then it was resolved, nem. con. "That an Answer be prepared to his Majesty's Letter, expressing the great and joyful sense of this house of his gracious offers, and their humble and hearty Thanks to his majesty for the same, with professions of their loyalty and duty to his majesty; and that this house will give a speedy Answer to his majesty's gracious proposals."—Mr. Finch, Mr. Annesley, sir Auth. Ashley Cooper, the Lord-General, sir Wm. Lewis, Mr. Morris, and Mr. Hollis, were ordered to prepare the said Answer.

It was also resolved, nem. con. "That the sum of 50,000*l.* be presented to the King's majesty from this house; and the Committee appointed to draw up the Answer to the King's Letter were ordered to go to the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, to consider with them how the said sum of 50,000*l.* may be raised; what security they will desire for the repayment thereof with interest after the rate of 6*l.* per cent. and to offer such security as they shall think fit, for repayment thereof to the persons who shall advance the same."—Resolved, That it be referred to the same Committee appointed to consider with the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, about a further sum to be raised and applied for the paying of the Army, and to consider how the Arrears of the Army may be satisfied.

A Conference having been desired by the lords with the other house, the commons sent up sir George Booth to let them know, that they were ready for it as they desired. The committee appointed by the commons to manage this conference, were, Mr. Annesley, Mr. Finch, Mr. Turner, lord Falkland, Mr. Piercypoint, serjeants Hales and Brown. The subject was the Settlement of the Government of these Nations.

May 1, p. m. Mr. Annesley reported the Conference had with the lords: That the earl of Manchester had acquainted the committee of this house with the lords' receipt of a Letter from his majesty, and of a Declaration inclosed. He told us, it was a maxim, "Where the Word of a King is, there is power;" and where the Word of our King is, as it is now received, there is truth; and Power and Truth are the best supports of government: he wished us to consider the mistaken maxims of some politicians, that distrust and jealousies are the nerves and sinews of wisdom; but he hopes, that we will rather consider that Wisdom from above, which is first pure, * *, easy to be intreated; and that all distrust and jealousy might be laid aside: he took notice of some new State-Builders, that had been framing imaginary states of government; which brought into consideration our antient government, the best in the world: and thereupon took notice of a Vote in the lords' house, concerning the Government of this kingdom, to the tenor following, viz. The lords do own and declare, 'That, according to the antient and fundamental laws of this kingdom, the government is, and ought to be, by King, Lords, and Commons.'—Then he proceeded further, and took notice of the great revolutions and changes that have been, and the occasion of them to be, the separation of the head from the members; and therefore he acquainted the committee with another Vote of the lords, viz. 'That the lords, having a deep sense of the miseries and distractions that this kingdom hath been involved in, since the violent attempts to dissolve the established government; and conceiving that the separating the head from the members hath been the chiefest occasion of all our disorders and confusions, they desire that some ways may be considered how to make up these breaches, and to obtain the King's Return again to his people.' And that he also acquainted them with a third Vote of the lords, in order to a further proceeding on the former, viz. 'That a committee of the house of commons may be appointed to meet with a committee of the lords, to prepare such things as may be in order to these good and necessary ends; and to frame a Letter of Thanks and Acknowledgments to his majesty for his gracious 'Letter and Declaration.' And, lastly, his majesty's said Letter and Declaration, sent to the lords, was read there; and that they had intrusted the committee with them, that they might also be read here, and a Resolution given upon the whole.

After hearing this Report, the commons ordered the King's Letter to the lords, with his majesty's Declaration there inclosed, to be read; and then it was Resolved, "That this house doth agree with the lords, and do own and declare, that, according to the antient and fundamental laws of this kingdom, the Government is, and ought to be, by King, Lords, and Commons."—Ordered also, That the following committee be appointed to peruse the Journals and Records, and to examine what pretended Acts or Orders have passed, which are inconsistent with the Government by King, Lords, and Commons, and report them, with their opinion thereon, to this house; and also to offer such expedients, as may carry on the Courts of Justice of this kingdom; and how fines, recoveries, assurances, judgments, and decrees, passed, may be confirmed and made good. Mr. Prynne, Mr. Finch, lord Falkland, Mr. Turner, sir Wm. Lewis, serjeant Hales, sir Walter Erle, sir Anth. Ash. Cooper, lord commissioner Tyrrel, sir A. Cope, serjeant Glynn, lord commissioner Widdrington, sir John Courtop, and all the gentlemen of the long robe.

May 2. The commons were busy, this day, in altering and correcting the form of an Answer to the King's Letter to them; which, being all read, was agreed to, and ordered to be superscribed, 'To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.'—Ordered, that sir John Grenville be called to the bar, and that the Speaker return him Thanks for his care, moreover the house voted him 500*l.* to buy him a Jewel, as a testimony of their respects to him, and as a badge of honour, for bringing so gracious a Letter from the king's majesty to this house.

Alderman Robinson informed the house, That he was commanded, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London, to acquaint them that they had received a Letter, (see p. 21) and Declaration from the king's majesty, by the hands of the lord visc. Mordaunt and sir John Greaville; and that they desire the leave of this house to give an Answer to them; to which the house agreed.

The Answer of the House of Lords to the King's Letter.] May 3. This day, in the house of lords, the earl of Manchester reported the draught of an Answer to the King's gracious Letter to their house; which, being read, was approved of, and ordered to be sent to the king by the earls of Oxford, Warwick, Middlesex, viscount Hereford, lord Berkeley, and lord Brooke; who were to consider what time they desire to prepare themselves to go. A Message was sent down to the commons, to acquaint them with this Vote. The Letter of the Lords to the King was as follows:

"For the KING's Most Excellent Majesty, "Most gracious Sovereign; Your loyal subjects the Peers, now assembled, do, with all humility and thankfulness, return their acknowledgments to your majesty for your gracious Letter and Declaration; and do esteem it their greatest honour that your majesty is pleased to express a confidence of their counsels and endeavours for the composing the sad and unhappy distractions of your kingdoms; and they own this as their great advantage, that they may now act in discharge of their own duty by your maj.'s command. Your majesty's great and many sufferings have long affected their hearts with deep resentments of trouble and sorrow; but the same power that usurped and profaned your sceptre, divested them of their rights and privileges, and kept them under such pressures and difficulties, as they were rendered incapable of serving your majesty in order to those ends, to which their duty and allegiance did engage them. It hath been their constant desire that the nation had continued happy and innocent; but your majesty's piety and wisdom hath shewed you to what degree your clemency is to be extended; and we hope all your subjects will answer your majesty's grace and favour to the utmost point of fidelity and obedience. The peers have a just ground to own a more particular dependence and subserviency to the throne of majesty, not only by the prescriptions of law, but by that affection and duty which is fixed in their hearts upon the foundations of loyalty, which gives them the privilege to stile themselves Your majesty's most loyal, most dutiful, and most obedient Subjects and Servants.—Signed in the name, and by the command, of the said House of Peers, by E. MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers pro tempore. Westminster, May 3, 1660."

This day, the lords made an Order, That the Statutes of the late king's majesty be set up again in all the places from whence they were pulled down: and that the Arms of the Commonwealth be demolished and taken away wherever they are, and the King's Arms be put up in their stead: That the king's majesty be publicly prayed for by all ministers in their churches: and, lastly, that some place be considered of where general Monk's Statue may be set up. All which particulars were referred to the committee of privileges to consider of and make report to the house.

May 3. A Committee of the Commons had been appointed to go to the city of London, to borrow Money of them for the present occasions; who returning, Mr. Annesley reported from them, That they had treated with the lord mayor, &c. for a Loan of 100,000*l.* which the city was willing to advance on the security of an Ordinance for 3 months assessment; the money arising from it to be paid into the Chamber of London; and that their Chamberlain should be receiver for the whole: The house agreed to this proposal; and also voted 6 per cent. interest, from the time of receiving to the paying in the sum. An Ordinance for 3 months Assessment was ordered to be brought in the next morning. The Committee were also to consider how the 50,000*l.* which was voted to be presented to his majesty may be remitted to him, to his best advantage, and so that there be no loss upon the exchange:

Sir John Grenville thanked by the Speaker of the H. of Commons.] The commons being informed that sir John Greaville, who brought the King's Letter, was at the door, he was called in to receive the Thanks of this house, according to the order of yesterday; who, standing at the bar, the Speaker said to him, in effect, as followeth: "Sir John Grenville, I need not tell you with what grateful and thankful hearts the commons, now assembled in parliament, have received his majesty's gracious Letter: 'res ipse loquitur' you yourself have been 'ocularis & auricularis testis de rei veritate': our bells and our bonfires have already proclaimed his majesty's goodness, and our joys. We have told the people that our king, the glory of England, is coming home again; and they have resounded it back again in our ears, that they are ready, and their hearts are open, to receive him. Both parliament and people have cried aloud to the King of Kings, in their prayers, 'Long live King Charles the Second'!—Sir, I am likewise to tell you, that this house doth not think it fit that you should return back to our royal sovereign, without some testimony of respect to yourself: they have therefore ordered and appointed that 500*l.* shall be delivered to you to buy a Jewel, as a badge of that honour which is due to a person whom the king hath honoured to be messenger of so gracious a message: and I am commanded, in the name of the house, to return you their very hearty Thanks."*

The Answer of the House of Commons to the King's Letter.] After this, the house sent a message to the lords by sir Wm. Lewis, to acquaint their lordships, That they had prepared an Answer to his majesty's gracious Letter sent to their house, and that they intended to send

* "So great and sudden a change was this, that a servant of the King's, who, for near ten years together, had been in prisons, and under confinements, only for being the King's servant, and would, but three months before, have been put to have undergone a shameful death, if he had been known to have seen the King, should be now rewarded for bringing a Message from him! From this time there was such an emulation and impatience in Lords, Commons, and City, and generally over the kingdom, who should make the most lively expressions of their duty and of their joy, that a man could not but wonder where those people dwelt who had done all the mischief, and kept the King so many years from enjoying the comfort and support of such excellent subjects." Lord Clarendon, vol. vi. p. 761.

the same by some members of their own.—Resolved, That, for determining what members of this house shall carry the Letter to his majesty, the several members of it shall put in papers of names; and that it be referred to a committee to view those papers, and make report to the house who have the greatest number of voices.—Ordered, also, That the Letter agreed to by this house, in Answer to his majesty's gracious Letter, shall be kept by the clerk, under such privacy, that no copy thereof may come to any hand, till it hath been communicated to his majesty.—The Letter was as follows:*

To the KING'S Most Excellent Majesty,
 "Most Royal Sovereign; We your majesty's most loyal subjects, the commons of England assembled in parliament, do with all humbleness, present unto your majesty the unfeigned thankfulness of our hearts, for those gracious expressions of piety and goodness, and love to us, and the nation under your dominion, which your majesty's Letter of April 14th, dated from Breda, together with the Declaration inclosed in it, of the same date, do so evidently contain; for which we do, in the first place, look up to the great King of Kings, and bless his name, who hath put these thoughts into the heart of our king, to make him glorious in the eyes of his people, as those great deliverances which that divine majesty hath afforded unto your royal person from many dangers, and the support which he hath given unto your heroic and princely mind, under various trials, make it appear to all the world, that you are precious in his sight.—And give us leave to say, That as your majesty is pleased to declare your confidence in parliaments, your esteem of them, and this your judgment and character of them, That they are so necessary for the Government of the kingdom, that neither prince nor people can be in any tolerable degree happy without them; and therefore say, that you will hearken unto their counsels, be tender of their privileges, and careful to preserve and protect them: so we trust, and will with all humility be bold to affirm, That your majesty will not be deceived in us, and that we will never depart from that fidelity which we owe unto your majesty, that zeal which we bear unto your service, and a constant endeavour to advance your honour and greatness.—And we beseech your majesty we may add this further, for the vindication of parliaments, and even of the last parliament convened unto your royal father, of happy memory; when, as your majesty well observes, through mistakes and misunderstandings, many inconveniences were produced which were not intended: that those very inconveniences could not have been brought upon us by those persons who had designed them, without first violating the parliament

itself; for they well knew it was not possible to do a violence to that sacred person, whilst the parliament, which had vowed and covenanted for the defence and safety of that person, remained entire. Surely, sir, as the persons of our kings have ever been dear unto parliaments, so we cannot think of that horrid act committed against the precious life of our late sovereign, but with such a detestation and abhorrence as we want words to express it.—And, next to wishing it had never been, we wish it may never be remembered by your majesty, to be unto you an occasion of sorrow, as it will never be remembered by us, but with that grief and trouble of mind which it deserves, being the greatest reproach that ever was incurred by any of the English nation; an offence to all the Protestant Churches abroad, and a scandal to the profession of the truth of Religion here at home; through both profession and true professors, and the nation itself, as well as the parliament, were most innocent of it, having been only the contrivance and act of some few ambitious and bloody persons, and such others as, by their influence, were misled.—And as we hope and pray that God will not impute the guilt of it, nor of all the evil consequences thereof unto the laud, whose divine justice never involves the guiltless with the guilty, so we cannot but give due praise to your majesty's goodness, who are pleased to entertain such reconciled and reconciling thoughts; and with them not only meet, but, as it were, prevent your parliament and people; proposing yourself, in a great measure, and inviting the parliament to consider further, and advise your majesty what may be necessary to restore the nation to what it hath lost, raise up again the banks and fences of it, and make the kingdoms happy, by the advancement of religion, the securing our laws, liberties, and estates, and the removing of all jealousies and animosities which may render our peace less certain and durable; wherein your majesty gives a large evidence of your great wisdom judging aright; that, after so high a disemper, and such an universal shaking of the very foundations, great care must be had to repair the breaches, and much circumspection and industry used to provide things necessary for the strengthening of those repairs, and preventing whatever may disturb and weaken them.—We shall immediately apply ourselves to the preparing of these things; and in a very short time, we hope, be able to present them unto your majesty; and, for the present, do, with all humble thankfulness, acknowledge your grace and favour, in assuring us of your royal concurrence with us, and saying, That we shall not expect any thing from you, but what you will be as ready to give as we to receive. And we cannot doubt of your majesty's effectual performance, since your own princely judgment hath prompted unto you the necessity of doing such things; and your piety and goodness hath carried you to a free tender of them to your faithful parliament. You speak as a gracious king, and we will do what befits dutiful, loving, and loyal subjects, who are yet more engaged to honour, and highly esteem your majesty for your declining; as you are pleased to say, all foreign assistance, and rather trust to your people, who, we do assure your majesty, will, and do, open their arms and hearts to receive you, and will spare neither their estates nor their lives, when your service shall require it of them.—And we have yet more cause to enlarge our praises and our prayers to God for your majesty, that you have continued unshaken in your faith: that neither the temptation of allurements, persuasions, and promises from seducing papists on the one hand, nor the persecution and hard usage from some seduced and misguided professors of the protestant religion on the other hand, could at all prevail upon your majesty to make you forsake the Rock of Israel, the God of your Fathers, the true Protestant Religion, in which your majesty hath been bred; but you have still been as a rock yourself, firm to your covenant with your and our God, even now expressing your zeal and affection for the Protestant Religion, and your care and study for the propagation thereof. This hath been a rejoicing of heart to all the faithful of the land, and an assurance to them that God would not forsake you; but after many trials, which should but make you more precious, as gold out of the fire, restore your majesty unto your patrimony and people with more splendour and dignity, and make you the glory of kings, and the joy of your subjects; which is, and ever shall be, the prayer of your majesty's most loyal subjects the commons of England assembled in parliament. Signed HARBOTTLE GRIMMOND, Speaker."

Resolved, That a committee of this house be appointed to consider of the king's majesty's Letter and Declaration, and for preparing of Bills accordingly. This committee have power to prepare a Bill for taking away Tenures in Capite, and by Knights Service, and Socage in Capite, and also of the Court of Wards; and to consider and propound to this house, how 100,000*l.* a year may be raised and settled on his majesty, in compensation for Wardships and Liveries, and the Court of Wards.

May 4. The committee, according to order, had now began to prepare Bills, to be offered to the king on his return, for the Security of the Parliament itself, and of their properties who had purchased lands, &c. under titles depending wholly on the late revolutions. And, first, Mr. Finch did this day exhibit a Bill to the house, declaring the Continuance of this present parliament, which was read a 1st and 2nd time, and committed. The said gentleman also brought another Bill, concerning Lands purchased from the trustees of the late parliament, which was likewise read twice and committed.

A Declaration was ordered to be prepared, to give notice to the people, That there will be no proceedings in Westminster-Hall next Easter-Term, upon causes depending in any of the courts, till the two last returns of the said term. Agreed to by the lords.

The Recorder of London, aldermen Vincent, Robinson, and Bludworth, had leave given them by the house to go to the King, with a Letter from the City, in Answer to the one the City had received from his majesty.

A Declaration of Parliament for keeping the Peace, &c.] May 5. Mr. Annesley, from the Council of State, informed the house, That there were many distempers in several parts of the kingdom; and that unquiet spirits might make an advantage to foment new troubles and distractions, by pretence and colour that the sheriffs, and other public ministers of justice, are not empowered, in this present juncture of affairs, with sufficient authority to dispense the ordinary acts of justice belonging to their respective places, for preserving of the public peace. The council of state did desire, That a Declaration should be set forth, for requiring all officers of justice to attend their places, and the duties thereof, as by commission they are enjoined; that so the public peace may be secured, and the justice of the nation carried on without any interruption. The commons appointed a committee to draw up a Declaration accordingly, which was done and agreed to by the lords, as follows:

"The lords and commons assembled in parliament, having received several informations that there hath been divers tumults, riots, outrages, and misdemeanors, lately committed in sundry parts of this realm, by unquiet and discontented spirits, to the disturbance of the public peace, and fomenting of new troubles, do hereby order and declare, That all sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, constables, and other ministers of public justice, that were in office the 25th of April, 1660, shall be continued in their respective offices, and shall exercise the same in the king's majesty's name and style, and shall use their best endeavours to suppress and prevent all riots, tumults, unlawful assemblies, and misdemeanors whatsoever against the laws and peace of the realm; and all treasonable and seditious words, reports, and rumours against his majesty's royal person and authority, and proceed against all offenders therein according to law and justice: and all military officers and soldiers, and all others, are to be aiding and assisting to them therein."

The house proceeded to the election of 12 of their members, who were to go to the King, with their Letter, which was done by ballot in the same manner they used to elect their Council of State. The number of the members then in the house were 408, of which 4 were appointed for tellers, who received a paper from each member in a glass, with 12 names wrote in it; all which were delivered to the committee, who were to examine and report the greatest number of voices at their meeting on Monday next,

May 7. The lord Howard brought in the numbers, when it appeared, that sir George Booth, lord Falkland, Mr. Hollis, sir John Holland, sir Anth. Ashley Cooper, lord Bruce, sir Horatio Townshend, lord Herbert, lord Castleton, lord Fairfax, sir Henry Cholmley, and lord Mandeville, were duly elected by a majority, to carry the Answer to the King's Letter from the house, who were all separately put to the vote, and approved on by them.

This day both houses agreed, that the King should be proclaimed on the next; but, previous to this ceremony, a committee of 4 Lords and 8 of the commons were agreed on to meet to consider of the manner, time, and other circumstances, to be observed on that occasion. The report of this to be made the first thing the next morning.

Another Committee had been appointed to draw up some Orders, relating to Ministers praying for the King, &c. and this day Mr. Finch reported two Votes, which were agreed to, viz. "Resolved, That all and every the Ministers throughout the kingdoms of England and Ireland, the Dominion of Wales, and Town of Berwick upon Tweed, do, and are hereby required and enjoined, in their public prayers, to pray for the king's most excellent majesty, by the name of our sovereign lord Charles, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. and for the most illustrious prince James, duke of York, and the rest of the royal progeny."—"Resolved, That the Ministers who are appointed to officiate before this house upon Thursday next, being the day appointed for a public Thanksgiving, and all other ministers within the cities of London and Westminster, and the late lines of communication, who in their several churches and chapels are to carry on the duties of that day; and also all other ministers who are, on that day fortnight, to perform the like duty throughout the kingdom of England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, shall be, and are hereby enjoined, to return Thanks to Almighty God, for his majesty's several gracious Letters to both houses of parliament, and to the commanders in chief of the forces both by land and sea, and to the lord mayor and common council of the city of London, together with the Declarations inclosed, and the just and honourable concessions therein contained; and for the hearty, loyal, and dutiful conjunction of the lords and commons now assembled in parliament, and the universal concurrence of all the commanders and forces both by land and sea, to receive his majesty into his dominions and government; according to their bounden duty and the laws of the land; and that the Ministers upon Thursday fortnight be enjoined to read his majesty's Letters and Declarations to both houses, in their several churches and chapels at the same time."—These Votes being communicated to the lords, were agreed to by them.

Form of a Proclamation of the King.] May 8. A Form of a Proclamation, agreed on by a committee of lords and commons, was read and approved of by both houses, as follows:

“ Although it can no way be doubted but that his majesty’s right and title to this crown and kingdoms is, and was every way, completed by the death of his most royal father, of glorious memory, without the ceremony or solemnity of a Proclamation; yet, since Proclamations in such cases have been always used, to the end that all good subjects might, upon this occasion, testify their duty and respect; and since the armed violence and other the calamities of many years last past, have hitherto deprived us of any such opportunity, wherein we might express our loyalty and allegiance to his majesty: we, therefore, the lords and commons now assembled in parliament, together with the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, and other freemen of this kingdom, now present, do, according to our duty and allegiance, heartily, joyfully, and unaniously, acknowledge and proclaim, That, immediately upon the decease of our late sovereign lord king Charles the imperial crown of the realm of England, and of all the kingdoms, dominions, and rights belonging to the same, did, by inherent birth-right, and lawful and undoubted succession, descend and come to his most excellent majesty Charles II. as being lineally, justly, and lawfully, next heir of the blood-royal of this realm; and that, by the goodness and providence of Almighty God, he is of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, the most potent, mighty, and undoubted king; and thereunto we do most humbly and faithfully submit and oblige ourselves, our heirs, and posterities for ever. God save the King.”

The King proclaimed.] Ordered, That a copy of this Proclamation, to be signed by the Speakers of both houses, be forthwith sent to the lord mayor of the city of London; and that the members of the house of commons, who serve for the several counties, cities, and boroughs, in England, Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, do take care, forthwith, to send the sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, and other head officers of these counties, &c. for which they served, the Proclamation for proclaiming the king’s majesty, that it might be done accordingly.—At the same time was sent down a Declaration, touching Acts which were preparing to be passed, to be read along with the Proclamation.—It was then ordered, That the lords commissioners of the great seal, in their gowns, with the purse and mace before them; the lord president of the council of state, with his mace, should attend the Proclamation, next after the Speaker of the house of commons. And both houses, with their Speakers, went in their coaches, in procession, at the solemnity; which was performed this day, with great pomp and ceremony; and all imaginable demonstrations of joy, first at Whitehall, then at Temple-Bar, where they met the lord mayor, sheriffs, aldermen, common council, and other officers, &c. of the city; as also at the Fleet, Conduit in Cheapside, and the Royal Exchange. The same Proclamation was soon after made over all the three kingdoms.

May 9. Both houses received Letters from admiral Montagu at sea, intimating, That he had received his majesty’s Declaration, and a Letter directed to general Monk and himself, to be communicated to the Fleet, which he had done accordingly. That all the commanders, officers, and seamen, were desirous that they should express to his majesty their great joyfulness of heart for the Declaration, and favours to them, in the said Letter; as also their loyalty and duty to him. Therefore they humbly intreated the houses to know their pleasure, whether such an Answer should be returned to his majesty or not. Both the Speakers were ordered to write to the admirals, to give them Thanks for their respects shewn to them, and gave them leave to send such an Answer, either jointly or severally, as they should think fit.

Mr. Pryntne, from the house of commons, brought up several Votes, which they had passed, and desired their lordships concurrence to them, viz. That the king’s majesty be desired to make a speedy return to his parliament, and to the exercise of his kingly office.—Votes enjoining all Ministers to pray for the King.—A Bill, intitled, ‘An Act for removing and preventing all Questions and Disputes concerning the Assembling and Sitting of this present Parliament.’—That the Arms of the Commonwealth, wherever they are standing, be forthwith taken down, and that the King’s Arms be set up in their stead: the commons having lead the way, by altering the Arms over their Speaker’s chair, in the same manner. All which the lords ratified and confirmed.

The lords appointed a Committee to consider and take information where any of the King’s Goods, Jewels, or Pictures, were placed; and to advise of some course how the same might be restored to his majesty.

The house of commons had resolved, That all Proceedings should go in the King’s Name, from the 1st of May inclusive; and that in all cases where the Great Seal shall be necessary to be used, all proceedings do pass accordingly. Also, that for carrying on and expediting the Justice of the kingdom, the Great Seal, now remaining in the custody of the earl of Manchester, and the rest of the commissioners, be used till further orders. In like manner all the Seals belonging to any other courts should be so used; and all process and proceedings there run in the King’s Name. The lords agreed to the last part of this Vote; but, as to the Seals, they ordered it to be laid aside.

The lords appointed a Committee to consider how the King was to be received on his Return; and when to be sent for, and by whom. Both houses also ordered, That admiral Montagu do observe such commands as the king’s majesty shall please to give him, for the disposal of the Fleet, or any part thereof, in order to his return. A committee of 12 lords and 24 commons was appointed to meet and prepare Instructions for those who were to go with the Letters from both houses to his majesty, and they were ordered to set forward on Friday the 11th instant.

Instructions for the Commissioners of both Houses, appointed to go to the King.] May 10. This being the day appointed for the Thanksgiving, both houses attended their devotions in the forenoon; but, in the afternoon, they both met again to do business. The commons sent up a copy of the Instructions for the Commissioners who were to go to the King; which being read, some alterations were made in them, concerning the Arms of the Commonwealth, and then they were agreed to by the commons. They were in these words:

"You are to begin your Journey towards his majesty on Friday next (May 18) and make a speedy repair to such place where his majesty shall be, and humbly to present the Letters wherewith you are respectively intrusted by both houses of parliament.—You are to acquaint his majesty with what great joy and acclamation he was proclaimed, in and about the cities of London and Westminster, upon the 8th day of May instant, and present the Proclamation itself to his majesty; and to acquaint him with the Orders of both houses to have the same proclaimed throughout the kingdoms of England and Ireland, dominion of Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed; and that both houses have ordered, That all and every the Ministers throughout the kingdoms of England and Ireland be enjoined in their public Prayers to pray for his most excellent majesty, and for the most illustrious prince James duke of York, and the rest of the royal progeny. And also that they have ordered, That the assumed Arms of the late pretended Commonwealth, wherever they are standing, be taken down, and that his majesty's arms be set up instead thereof: and you are to communicate to his majesty the Resolutions of both houses relating to this Instruction.—You are to acquaint his majesty with the earnest desire of both houses, That his majesty will be pleased to make a speedy Return to his parliament, and to the exercise of his Kingly Office, and that in order thereunto both houses have given directions to general Montague, one of the generals at sea, and other officers of the Fleet, to observe such commands as his majesty shall please to give him or them for disposal of the Fleet, in order to his majesty's return: and you are to communicate to his majesty the Resolutions of both houses relating to this Instruction.—That the Committee from both houses do beseech his majesty that they may know where he purposeth to take shipping, and to land at his coming over, that preparation may be made for his reception; and which of his majesty's houses he intendeth to make use of at his first coming to London, and whether he will come all the way by land after he comes on shore, or whether he will please to come by water from Gravesend to London; and that his majesty will declare in what manner he is pleased to be received."

Mr. Denzil Hollis's Speech to the King at Breda.] When the commissioners arrived at Breda, they were immediately admitted to an Audience of the King. Upon this occasion, Mr. Denzil Hollis* addressed his majesty as follows:

"Dread Sovereign; Your faithful subjects, the commons of England, assembled in parliament, have sent us hither, twelve of their number, to wait upon your majesty, and, by their commands, we are here prostrate at your royal feet, where themselves are all of them present with us in the sincere and most loyal affections and desires of their hearts, and would have been in their persons, if your majesty's service, and the trust reposed in them by all these several parts of the kingdom did not necessarily require their attendance and continuance in the place where they now are, and where all their thoughts and endeavours are wholly taken up and employed in those two great and main works, which are the proper and genuine ends, of all parliaments, the advancement of their king's service, and the discharge of their country's trust.—And certainly, sir, we can speak it with a great deal of joy, and with no less of truth, that never parliament made greater demonstrations of zeal, affection and loyalty to any of the kings of England than this parliament hath done, and doth, and we hope, and doubt not, nay we know it, that it ever will do, unto your majesty, our liege lord and king. Their hearts are filled with a veneration of you, longings for you, confidence in you, and desires to see and serve you; and their tongues do, upon all occasions, express it, and in so doing they are (according to the nature of Parliaments) the true representative of the whole nation; for they but do that in a more contracted and regular way, which the generality of the people of the land, from one end of it to the other, do in a more confused and disorderly manner, yet as heartily and as affectionately, all degrees, and ages, and sexes, high and low, rich and poor (as I may say) men, women, and children, join in sending up this prayer to Heaven, 'God bless king Charles! long live 'king Charles!' So as our English air is not susceptible of any other sound, and echoes out nothing else; our bells, bonfires, peals of ordnance, volleys of shot, the shouts and acclamations of the people, bear no other moral, have no other signification but to triumph, in the triumphs of our king in the hearts of his people.—Your majesty cannot imagine nor can any man conceive it but he who was present to see and hear it, with what joy, what cheerfulness, what lettings out of the soul, what expressions of transported minds, a stupendous concourse of people attended the Proclaiming of your majesty, in your cities of London and Westminster, to be our most potent, mighty, and undoubted king: the oldest man living never saw the like before, nor is it probable, scarce possible, that he who hath longest to live will ever see the like again, especially (and God forbid he should) upon such an occasion, for we wish and heartily pray that your majesty may be the last of men of the generation now in being, who shall leave his place to a successor.—We have here the Proclamation itself to present unto your majesty and the Order of the two houses enjoining it to be proclaimed throughout England, Ireland, and your dominions of Wales; and, likewise, their Orders for all Ministers in their public Prayers to pray for your majesty, and for the illustrious Prince the duke of York your majesty's brother, and for the rest of the royal progeny; and another Order of theirs for taking down every where the assumed Arms of the late pretended Commonwealth, and setting up the arms of your majesty in their stead.—[Here he tendered the Proclamation and the several Orders unto his majesty, offered to read them, but then said, he thought that his majesty had already received them from the Lords, and that, therefore, it would be but a trouble to his majesty to hear them again. To which his majesty answering, that he had received them, was pleased further to enlarge himself in some discourse to this effect; expressing his sense of the miseries which his people had suffered under those unlawful governors which had ruled over them, and of his gladness for their returning unto him, with those good affections, which they now shewed towards him; adding, that he had always made it his study, and ever would, to make them as happy as himself; which was the aim and substance of what his majesty said.—To which was replied, with humble thanks for those gracious expressions,*] "That his majesty would ever find both parliament and people to be full of loyalty and obedience unto his majesty; as his majesty was of grace and goodness towards them." [And then he went on with his Speech relating to those Orders and Proceedings of parliament; and said,] "These are some testimonies of their love and affection unto your majesty, such as can as yet be expressed by them, which are but as a picture in little, of a great and large

* "Hollis was a man of great courage, and of as great pride: he was counted for many years the head of the Presbyterian Party. He was faithful and firm to his side, and never changed through the whole course of his life. He was well versed in the records of Parliament, and argued well, but too vehemently; for he could not bear contradiction. He had the soul of an old stubborn Roman in him. He was a faithful but a rough friend, and a severe but fair enemy. He had a true sense of religion, and was a man of an unblameable life, and of a sound judgment when it was not biased by passion. He was made a lord for his merits in bringing about the Restoration." Barnet, vol. i. p. 98.

* "The King was at this time thirty years of age, and, as might have been supposed, past the levities of youth and the extravagance of pleasure. He had a very good understanding. He knew well the affairs of state both at home and abroad. He had a softness of temper that charmed all who came near him, till they found how little they could depend on good looks, kind words, and fair promises; in which he was liberal to excess, because he intended nothing by them but to get rid of importunities and to silence all farther pressing upon him. He seemed to have no sense of Religion: both at prayers and sacrament he, as it were, took care to satisfy people, that he was in no sort concerned in that about which he was employed. So that he was very far from being an hypocrite, unless his assisting at those performances was a sort of hypocrisy, (as no doubt it was;) but he was sure not to increase that by any the least appearance of Religion. He said once to myself, he was no atheist, but he could not think God would make a man miserable only for taking a little pleasure out of the way. He said often, he thought government was a much safer and easier thing where the authority was believed infallible, and the faith and submission of the people was implicit: about which I had once much discourse with him. He was affable and easy, and loved to be made so by all about him. The great art of keeping him long, was the being easy, and the making every thing easy to him. He had made such observations on the French government, that he thought a king who might be checked, or have his ministers called to account by a parliament, was but a king in name. He had a great compass of knowledge, though he was never capable of much application or study. He understood the mechanics and physic; and was a good chymist, and much set on several preparations of mercury, chiefly the fixing it. He understood navigation well; but, above all, he knew the architecture of ships so perfectly, that in that respect he was exact rather more than became a prince. His apprehension was quick, and his memory good. He was an everlasting talker. He told his stories with a good grace; but they came in his way too often. He hated business, and could not be easily brought to mind any: but when it was necessary, and he was set to it, he would stay as long as his ministers had work for him." Burnet, vol. 1. p. 93.

body, which far exceeds in its true and natural dimensions, the whole compass of a small piece of cloth, on which, notwithstanding, it is drawn and represented to the life.—And may it please your majesty to give us leave to say, that as the affection, so your subjects expectations of you are high, and their longings after you great and vehement. And both expectations and longings have increased by the long time that your majesty hath been kept from them.—Hope deferred makes the heart sick; and the sickness still augments till the thing hoped for be obtained.—You who are the light of their eyes, and the breath of their nostrils, their delight and all their hope, to have been so long banished from them into a strange land, it is no wonder that the news of your return should put a new life into them: what then will it be when their eyes shall be blessed with the sight of your royal person? And, therefore, are we commanded humbly to acquaint your majesty with the earnest desire of both houses for your speedy return unto your parliament, and the exercise of your Kingly Office; and that, in order to it, they have given directions to general Montagu, one of the generals at sea, and to the other officers at sea, to observe such commands, as your majesty shall please to give them for the disposal of the Fleet: and we have it in our Instructions further to beseech your majesty to let your parliament know when, and where, your majesty purposeth to take shipping, and where to land; and after your coming on shore, whether to come all the way to London by Land, or by water from Gravesend; and which of your houses your majesty intends to make use of at your coming to London; that, accordingly, provision may be made for your majesty's reception: for then, and, not till then, will be the completing of your subjects rejoicing.—True it is (as your majesty was pleased just now to touch upon it) that, in your absence, other lords have had dominion over them, have reigned and ruled over their bodies, and estates; but their better part, their hearts and minds and souls were free, and did abhor such rulers, and still continued faithful and loyal to your majesty, their rightful lord and sovereign; and with you, and under you, they now expect to re-enter into the possession of their ancient Rights and Privileges, to enjoy again their laws, and liberties: and, which is above all, their religion in purity, and truth; of all which those lords (who called themselves so, and made themselves so, that is, to be so called, but in truth were not so, for they were nothing less) those kind of lords, I say, had so long deprived them. This is our expectation from your majesty, and we are more than confident, we shall not be deceived in it, but that your majesty will answer and go beyond all that can be expected from you: a king of so many vows, and of so many prayers, cannot but crown the desires of his people.—Sir, to tell you what men think, and say, and wish, and even are assured of in relation to your majesty and the happiness which your government will produce, would seem a description of the Golden Age, that poets fancy. Truly we dare not undertake it, in your majesty's presence, lest we should be thought to flatter, and should offend the sacred modesty of your ears, and of your princely mind. Though it would all be but a real truth; yet looking like that, which you do not like, we fear you would dislike it for the look's sake; great princes will not be flattered, but really and truly served, and we desire to serve your majesty in your own way.—Your majesty hath been pleased to declare your royal intentions unto your parliament, in your gracious Letters to either house, and the two houses have severally given unto your majesty a faithful account of that grateful sense, wherewith they have received them, and of their humble submission unto and compliance with, all your majesty's desires, which by their Letters, in answer unto your majesty's, they make bold to signify. That from the house of peers hath been already presented, and we who are before your majesty, are intrusted by the house of commons with the delivery of theirs; an honour not more conferred upon us beyond our deservings, than embraced and received by us, with an excess of joy, and with all due respect, which is the errand upon which we are now come. That Letter and the Proclamation and the several Orders, together with ourselves, our lives and fortunes, and the vows and services of those who sent us, we do with all humbleness lay at your majesty's feet, lifting up our hearts and hands to the God of heaven, for your majesty's long and happy reign over us, and speedy return unto us."

This day, the commons voted the sum of 5000*l.* for the duke of York, and the same sum to the duke of Gloucester, for their present supply and accommodation; but afterwards, that of the duke of York's was made 10,000*l.*

Necessaries to be provided for the King's Household.] Mr. Annesley reported, from the Committee appointed to consider of the Manner of the King's Return and Reception, and of Preparations requisite to those ends, three Lists of Things necessary to be provided for his majesty's Service, viz.

I. Things necessary to be provided for his Majesty's Service, and his Brothers, the Dukes of York and Gloucester.

"A rich Bed, to be of velvet, either embroidered with gold or laced, and lined with cloth of silver or sattin, as shall be best approved of; with a high chair of state, two high stools, one foot-stool, and two cushions, all suitable to the bed. Two great quilts or mattresses of sattin, suitable to the lining of the bed. Two thick fustian quilts, to lie under the sattin quilts; one down bolster, one pair of fustian blankets, and one pair of Spanish blankets. One close-stool suitable to the bed. Six pair of Holland sheets, having 24 ells of Holland in a pair, at 10, 11, or 12*s.* the ell. Two beds more for the king's majesty, to be removing beds, either of scarlet cloth or of velvet, all lined with sattin; and all necessaries to each bed as to the former bed, except sheets. And for the present, two beds, of the like goodness, to be made for the duke of York and the duke of Gloucester, with all particulars as the others, and 6 pair of sheets for each of the duke's beds. For the present 20 large pallet beds, with bolsters, 30 large tapestry counterpains, 20 pair of good large blankets, 40 pair of good Holland sheets, of 18 ells in each pair, being of Holland of 3s. 6d. per ell for those beds. 20 good double yellow ground carpets, of Turkey making, and 6 hides, 6 cart canvasses. There must be provided also tenter-hooks, hammers, tacks, and such like necessaries for the wardrobe. For Table Linen for his majesty, 12 damask table-cloths for his majesty's own table, as many towels, and 6 napkins for every table cloth. The like for each duke, if they eat asunder; but if they eat together, half the proportion. For other diets for the great lords, though table linen was allowed them, yet they used their own linen. Inferior diets had Holland or flaxen table-cloths, but no napkins.—A rich Coach also, the inside crimson velvet, richly laced and fringed; Liveries for two coachmen and two postillions suitable. The footmen should have liveries and coats suitable.

II. A Particular of what is at present necessary to be provided for his Majesty's Service, humbly offered to the consideration of this Honourable Board.

"Two Coaches, the one for travelling, the other to be a rich one. Two sets of coach horses. Liveries for two coachmen, 2 postillions, 6 grooms, and 10 footmen. Two rich saddles for the great horse: 6 pad-saddles: 4 sumpter-horses and cloaths to them. 2 horses for the great saddle. Provisions of all sorts to be had into the Mews against his majesty's coming.

III. "A Memorial of Flags, &c. for the Fleet.

Naseby,	{	A Standard, - - - -	} Silk,
		A Jack, - - - - An Ensign - - - -
		A Suit of Pendants - -

Rear-Admiral.		Jacks, - - - - Ensigns, - - - -
		A Suit of good Kersey Waist Clothes.

In most of the Frigates there will need the king's Arms, either carved or in painted cloth. Carvers, painters, and a glazier, for every flag ship will be necessary. The general's cabin to be new glazed with square glass. Wardrobe men and upholsterers to be brought down. Mr. Kennerley will be very useful to confer with about what is necessary herein. Beal's Galley, and a Standard. Beale and Simpson, and a choice noise of trumpets. Singleton's Music."

Resolved, That this house doth agree with the Committee, that the Particulars, contained in the three Lists now presented, be forthwith provided and furnished for the Service and Accommodation of his majesty. Ordered, That it be referred to the Council of State, to cause the same to be provided and furnished accordingly; and that they are empowered to charge any part of the public revenue, for raising of monies to pay for the same. *

An Act of General Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion, was this day read a 2nd time in the house, and some Votes in the Journal of Dec. 12, 1650, concerning the Trial of the late king, were also read, as also a record, intituled, 'A Journal of the Proceedings of the High Court of Justice, erected by an Act of the Commons of England, for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, King of England,' was read. After which, divers members of the house, then present, who were named commissioners in the said Act, stood up in their places; and did severally express how far they were concerned in the said proceedings, and their sense thereupon.

Mr. Lenthall severely reprimanded by the Speaker.] One Mr. Lenthall, a member of the house, happening to speak in the debate on the Bill of Indemnity, said, 'He that drew his sword against the King committed as high an offence as he that cut off the King's Head.' Exception was taken at these words, and Mr. Lenthall was ordered to the bar; when the Speaker, by order of the house, gave him the following Reprimand: "Mr. Lenthall, The house hath taken very great offence at some words you have let fall, upon debate of this business of the Bill of Indemnity; which, in the judgment of this house, liath as high a reflection on the justice and proceedings of the lords and commons, in the last parliament, in their actings before 1648, as could be expressed. They apprehend there is much of poison in the words, and that they were spoken out of design to set this house on fire; they tending to render them that drew the sword to bring delinquents to condign punishment, and to vindicate their just liberties, into balance with them that cut

* The celebrated Andrew Marvell, who was a member of the Convention Parliament, alludes to these resolutions in the following lines:

"Of a tall stature, and of sable hue,
Much like the son of Kish, that lofty Jew;
Twelve years compleat he suffer'd in exile,
And kept his father's asses all the while.
At length, by wonderful impulse of fate,
The people call him home to help the state:
And what is more, they send him money too,
And cloath him all, from head to foot, anew:
Nor did he such small favours then disdain,
Who in his thirtieth year began his reign."

off the king's head; of which act they express their abhorrence and detestation, appealing to God, and their conscience bearing them witness, that they had no thoughts against his person, much less against his life. . Therefore I am commanded to let you know, That had these words fallen out at any other time but in this parliament, or at any time in this parliament but when they had considerations of mercy, pardon, and indemnity, you might have expected a sharper and severer sentence than I am now to pronounce: but the disposition of his majesty is to mercy; he hath invited his people to accept it, and it is the disposition of the body of this house to be healers of breaches, and to hold forth mercy to men of all conditions, so far as may stand with justice, and the justification of themselves before God and man. I am therefore commanded to let you know, that that being their disposition, and the present subject of this day's debate being mercy, you shall therefore taste of mercy; yet I am to give you a sharp reprehension; and I do as sharply and severely as I can (for so I am commanded) reprehend you for it."

May 14. The house of commons began at this time to question the Regicides, and an Order was made, That all those persons, who sat in Judgment upon the late King's majesty, when the Sentence was pronounced for his condemnation, should be forthwith secured: also that Mr. John Cooke, Andrew Broughton, John Phelpes, and Edward Denidy; those two persons who were employed for the Execution of his majesty, and one Matthew, who boasted that he was an instrument in the said Execution, and had a reward of 300*l.* for it: likewise Cornet Joice,* who seized upon the person of his late majesty at Holmbay, should be all secured.—A List of the Names of those who sat in Judgment on the late King, was ordered to be delivered to the serjeant at arms attending this house; and all officers both civil and military, were required to be assistants to the serjeant, or his deputies, in securing those persons, or such others as are named above. The house being informed that Mr. John Cooke was in custody in Ireland, they ordered him to be sent over hither with all speed.—Resolved, on the question, That the number of seven, of those who sat in the Judgment, when Sentence was given upon the late King, shall be excepted, for life and estate, out of the Act for General Pardon and Oblivion.—The commons ordered secretary Thurloe to be secured by the serjeant at arms, on a charge of High Treason exhibited against him; and appointed a committee to take his Examination that afternoon.

Ordered, "That sir Henry Mildmay, Mr. Cornelius Holland, and Mr. Nicholas Love, do attend the Committee for the King's Reception; to give an account what was become of the crowns, robes, sceptres, and jewels, belonging to his majesty; and that such other robes, or sceptres, as have been provided at the public charge, be forthwith brought to the said committee, by such persons as have them in their custody." It is probable these Regalia were not easily found: for the commons, this day, appointed Thomas Langhorn, citizen and skinner, of London, to provide new Robes of Ermines for his majesty; and alderman Vynner to provide a crown and sceptre, the estimate of which amounted to about 900*l.* To which the lords also agreed.

The commons next resumed the debate upon the Bill for a General Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion: and, after some time spent therein, it was resolved, "That John Bradshaw, deceased, late serjeant at law, Oliver Cromwell, deceased, Henry Ireton, deceased, and Thomas Pride, deceased, be some of those who shall be attainted, by act of parliament, for the Murder of the late king's majesty: and that their attainders shall take place from the 1st of Jan. 1648."

The late King's Statue, now at Charing Cross, discovered.] May 16. The lords were informed, that the earl of Portland had lately discovered where a Brass Horse, with his late majesty's Figure upon it, was hid; which, in justice, the earl supposes belongs to him; and there being no courts of justice now open, wherein he can sue for it, doth humbly desire the lords to order it to be removed from the place where it now is; not defaced nor otherwise disposed of, till the title be determined at law to whom it belongs. The lords ordered accordingly. This was the famous Statue since set up at Charing-Cross.

Expence of the King's Reception.] The earl of Dorset reported, from the committee for the King's Reception, that yesterday they had before them several of the king's servants, who gave in these Estimates following, viz.

Also, that the Records, Books, Papers, and other writings, relating to the public, in the hands of Mr. John Phelps, be forthwith secured by Mr. Pryne and col. Bowyer, members of this house, and such as have been removed and secured, in whose hands soever they may be found. An Order was made likewise, That all the Books and Papers belonging to the Library of the abp. of Canterbury, and now, or lately, in the hands of Hugh Peters, be forthwith secured.

May 17. The lords heard a Report, from their Committee of Privileges, by the lord Roberts, That it was their opinion, that when a Message is brought from the commons, the Speaker of this house is to go to the bar alone, and receive the Message; the rest of the lords sitting in their places; which the house approved of, and ordered it to be added to the Roll of the Orders of this house.

The Commons ordered, That all the Titles of Honour received from the late Protectors, Oliver and Richard, or from Henry Cromwell, son of the said Oliver, by any person named a commissioner in the Ordinance for 3 months Assessment, be omitted and struck out of the said Ordinance.

Proceedings against the late King's Judges.]
May 18. A Message was brought from the commons, by Mr. Fryane and others, with several Votes, whereunto he desired their lordships concurrence, viz. "Resolved, upon the question, by the and commons assembled in parliament, That all the persons who sat in Judgment upon the late King's majesty, when Sentence of Death was pronounced against him, and the estates, both real and personal, of all and every the said persons (whether in their own hands, or any other in trust for their or any of their uses) who are fled, be forthwith seized and secured, and the respective sheriffs and other officers whom this may concern are to take effectual order accordingly.—2. That nothing in the Orders touching the seizing of the persons or estates of those who sat in Judgment upon the late King, do in anywise extend to colonel Matthew Tomlinson or his estate.—3. That the Council of State do forthwith take Order for stopping of all the ports, to the end that none of those who are ordered to be apprehended, as having sat in Judgment upon the late king's majesty, may make his escape beyond the seas.—4. That these Votes, with a List of the Names of those who are to be secured, be sent up to the lords and their concurrence desired, viz.

John Bradshaw, serj.	John Okey,
at law, president of	John Hewson,
the pretended High	William Goff,
Court of Justice.	Cornelius Holland,
John Lisle,	John Carew,

The earl of Lincoln, visc. Say and Sele, and lord Roberts being appointed by the house to consider of the said Votes, with the List of the Names, they went out of the house presently to consider of the same.—Lord Roberts reported, That the committee thought fit, instead of the first Vote, to have this Order following to be made, viz. "Upon complaint made this day, by the commons in parliament assembled, That all these persons, viz. John Bradshaw, John Lisle, and the rest, (except Matthew Tomlinson) who sat in Judgment upon the late King's majesty when Sentence of Death was pronounced against him; and the estates, both real and personal, of all and every the said persons (whether in their own hands, or in the hands of any in trust for their or any of their uses) who are fled, be forthwith seized and secured; and the respective sheriffs and other officers whom this may concern, are to take effectual order accordingly."

The house; after some consideration of the said Report, consented unto the Order accordingly; and ordered, that the same, with the List aforesaid, shall be printed and published. And touching the rest of the said matters in the Votes, the lords sent a Message to the commons for a conference to be had with them the next morning in the Painted-Chamber.

May 19. This day the said conference was held between the two houses, when the earl of Manchester, deputed by the lords, offered the following Reasons: He was to let the commons know, "That their lordships do not agree to these Votes as they were brought up, in respect they do intrench upon the antient privileges of this house; Judicature in parliament being solely in the lords house, and the Votes brought up were such. That, notwithstanding, their lordships were so careful of the matter as they would not lose time for the manner, and therefore have issued out an Order of their own for doing that which was desired; in which Order colonel Tomlinson is omitted, according to the desire of the commons. That the 3rd Vote relates to a Council of State, which the lords conceive not in being, and therefore have resolved that such emergencies as shall necessarily arise during his majesty's absence, and until his pleasure be further known, for his majesty's service and the peace of the kingdom, shall be transacted henceforth by the committee of lords and commons appointed for the Reception of his majesty, wherein their lordships desire the concurrence of the commons."

The commons, in a grand committee, went upon Ways and Means for the speedy raising of a considerable sum of money, for the satisfaction of the Arrears due to the Army and Navy; and came to a Resolution, That a Poll-Bill should be brought in for raising 400,000*l.* for that purpose.

May 21. The commons heard the Report of the late conference with the lords, concerning their Votes for securing the persons and estates of the King's Judges; and appointed a committee to peruse their own Journal-Books, state the matter of fact upon the whole, and prepare Heads for a free conference with the lords about it. They also ordered that all the ports should be stopped, and that none of those persons should make their escape beyond the seas: and that no money or bullion be exported without the approbation of parliament.

May 22. Another Conference was held between the two houses, on the subject of the last, and of which we find this Entry in the Lords Journals. The earl of Manchester reported the effect of the free Conference this morning, which his lordship said was managed by Mr. Annesley; who said, The commons had an earnest desire to continue a fair correspondence between both the houses; and they were sensible what distempers have been for many years past; and they desired that all breaches might be healed; that this conference was to preserve a good understanding. The commons said, "That they had seen a printed Paper, which was printed and published from their lordships, without their concurrence or a conference, or taking notice of it: the Paper is dated the 18th instant, which mentions, That, upon complaint made by the commons in parliament, it is ordered, by the lords in parliament, That divers persons should be secured, who sat in Judgment upon the late King's majesty, when Sentence of Death was pronounced; which Order leaves them out, contrary to their Resolution, as they presented it to this house for concurrence. The commons take notice that there was no Complaint in this case made by the commons, nor is there any Entry thereof in their Journals. If there had been a Complaint preceding, the lords could not have proceeded as they have, in a judicial way, without consent of the commons.—As this case is, the point of Judicature is not in question. 1. The Order sent by the commons to the lords for their concurrence, is not in a judicial, but in an extraordinary way, and for a notorious and transcendent crime. 2. The law allowed no such proceedings regularly before conviction. 3. This was in order only to bring them to a judicial proceeding. 4. The lords sent several Orders to the commons in the cases of sales, securing rents, and hindering of cutting or selling of wood or timber; wherein the commons concurred, and this before the parties heard; and this is a case of members of the lords house, all being assented unto as cases of extremity.—The commons say, they cannot admit the lords Judicature so largely as they assert it; but judicature, as aforesaid, not being in question, they decline this dispute. They conceive the lords intrench upon the commons privileges; for col. Hutchinson, a member of the commons, could not be under such an Order of the lords, upon any account, unless the commons Order had been consented to. By this way, if allowed, the lords may vary from any Orders sent up by the commons, without a conference, and ground their variation upon pretended Complaint of the commons when there is none. The printing of the lords Order before the conference with the commons, or their assent, is a further intrenching upon the privilege of the commons."

Hereupon the lords appointed a committee to consider what Answer is fit to be returned to the commons, upon the matter of this free conference, whereby a good correspondency may be kept between the houses, and the privileges of this house preserved.

Several peers had leave given them to attend the King on his Landing; the same leave was given to general Monk by the commons, and to such other members of that house as he should desire to accompany him.

Letter from the Committee of Lords sent to the King.] May 23. The following Letter from the lords who were sent by their house to his majesty, was read:

For the right hon. the earl of MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers,

"My lord; We have delivered the Letters and Message intrusted to us by the house of peers, and found a most gracious reception from his majesty, who is pleased to declare (which we desire your lordships to communicate to the house) that he intends to depart from hence on Monday next, being the 21st of this month, to land at Dover; and, after a short stay at Canterbury, to continue his journey to London, and there to reside with his Court at Whitehall. This we are commanded to impart to your lordships from his majesty, and remain, Your, &c. Oxford, Middlesex, visc. Hertford, Berkley, Brook."

Another Letter was sent, of the same date, to the house of commons, from their members sent to the King, but it is not entered in their Journals.

Another Letter from the Speaker of the House of Lords to the King.] May 25. Both houses agreed to send congratulatory Letters to their committees with the King, to deliver to his majesty on his landing in England; which he was now very near doing, as the reader will find by a subsequent Letter from admiral Montagu to the lords. The Letter from the house of commons to the King is only mentioned in their Journals, as reported and approved of by that house, but not entered: that from the lords ran in these words:

"To the KING's Most Excellent Majesty; "May it please your Majesty; The sense your faithful subjects the peers, now assembled, have of your majesty's safe arrival into this your realm of England is so great, as obligeth them, by all dutiful acknowledgments, to express the same by these lines, before they have the honour and happiness to do it personally to your majesty; which they intend to perform so soon as they shall receive signification of your majesty's pleasure when, where, and in what manner they shall wait upon you. And, as your faithful council, do humbly offer to your majesty's deliberation so to consult the safety of your royal person, wherein they are highly concerned, that, in your return to London, the security thereof be preferred to all external considerations; which, out of our zeal to your majesty, is humbly offered by, Your majesty's most humble, faithful, and obedient Subjects and Servants. Signed in the Names, and by the command, of the said House of

Peers, by E. MANCHESTER, Speaker pro tempore. Westminster, May 25, 1660."

The Letter from general Montagu was as follows:

"To the right hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Peers.

"About ten leagues from Scheveling, May 23, 1660.

"My lord; Having appointed a rendezvous of as many ships as could be got together in the Bay of Scheveling, that I might the better receive his majesty's commands, in order to his happy return to England, it pleased his most gracious majesty, this day about noon, to embark himself in the Nazby, riding before Scheveling. Their royal highnesses the dukes of York and Gloucester, the princess royal, queen of Bohemia, and the prince of Orange, accompanied his majesty on board; and, about 3 hours after, the duke of York embarking in the London, the duke of Gloucester in the Swiftsure, the princess royal, the queen of Bohemia, and prince of Orange, returned to Scheveling; and the fleet set sail, by his majesty's command, bound for the port of Dover, whither I trust God will give us a speedy and prosperous passage. I apprehend it my duty to give your lordships the soonest advertisement thereof I could, and so remain, Your, &c.

"E. MONTAGU."

The commons read a 2d time, and committed, a Bill for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and all Tenures in capite, or by Knights Services; and, on the question, resolved, "That the sum of 100,000*l.* a-year be settled on the king's majesty, in lieu of the said Court and Tenures."

The King's Letter to the Lords after landing.] May 28. The Speaker of the house of lords acquainted their lordships with a Letter he had received by the hands of Mr. Berkeley; which, being opened, appeared to be a Letter from the King, and was read as follows:

"To our Trusty and right Well-beloved the SPEAKER of our House of Peers, to be communicated to the Lords there assembled;

"C. R. Right Trusty and intirely-beloved cousins, right trusty and right well-beloved cousins, and right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: After we had received your invitation, we made all possible expedition to embark, and return to our native kingdom. It hath pleased God to bring us safe to land, and we hope that peace and happiness shall be brought to our kingdoms with us. We know our own heart to have nothing but affection to the good of all our people; and we cannot doubt of God's blessing on our councils and endeavours, for the advancing the honour and happiness of our kingdoms. We cannot distrust but that you will answer the professions you have made of your loyalty and affection to our service; and, you may be sure, that we will be deficient in nothing that becomes a gracious prince to his faithful subjects. We hope shortly to see you, and do intend to set forward from hence on Monday next, and we hope to arrive at London on Tuesday in the afternoon, and will then give you timely notice where, and when, to attend us; and, in the mean time, we bid you heartily farewell. Given at our Court at Canterbury, this 26th day of May, 1660, in the 12th year of our reign."

After the foregoing Letter was read, the lord Berkley, one of the Commissioners sent over to the king, acquainted the house, That he was commanded by his majesty to let their lordships know, the King intended to be the next day at Whitehall, at 12 o'clock, where he expected their lordships to attend him in a full assembly.

Another Letter, to the same purport as the last to the lords, from the King, was presented to the commons by lord Falkland, and was read by their Speaker.

The late lords commissioners of the Great Seal, according to the Order of the house, did this day bring the Great Seal, in their custody, to the clerk's table, and delivered the same to the Speaker: and a smith being sent for forthwith, he was ordered to deface and break in pieces the said Seal at the bar, the house then sitting, which was done accordingly, and the pieces thereof were delivered to the late Commissioners as their fees.

Both Houses wait upon the King at Whitehall.] May 29, p. m. The lords met for the purpose of going in the forenoon of this day from their own house, in procession, to wait upon the King at Whitehall. The earl of Manchester was appointed to speak what his lordship thought fit, to express the joy of that house for his majesty's safe return to his throne.

The commons did nothing material in the forenoon of this day, but resolve, nem. con. "That the king's majesty be pleased to give order, that the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance be administered according to the laws and statutes of this realm now in force."

In the afternoon they met again, read and committed a Bill for Confirmation of the Privileges of Parliament, Magna Charta, Statutum de Talagio non concedendo, the Petition of Rights, and other Acts: after which we find the following Entry in their Journals: "The King's majesty having, by Letter to this house, signified his pleasure to be at Whitehall this day, and the lord Herbert having communicated his majesty's intentions to give a meeting to this house there, the house did, after their adjournment, walk on foot from Westminster to Whitehall, divers gentlemen going before Mr. Speaker; and, after them, the clerk, and clerk-assistant of this house; and next, before Mr. Speaker, the serjeant at arms attending this house bearing his mace, (being all uncovered) the members of this house following Mr. Speaker three in a rank; and, being come to Whitehall, they went up into the Banqueting-House, and there attended his majesty's coming to Whitehall; which being about 7 of the clock, his majesty, about half an hour after, came into the Banquetting-House, and there placed himself in his chair of state: whereupon Mr. Speaker, being before retired to the lower part of the room, and the way being clear to the chair of state, did, after his humble obeisance, walk up towards his majesty; two members of the house going, one on one hand, and another on the other hand of him, and divers other members following him, the serjeant going immediately before him, with the mace turned downwards; and, in his way, made two other obeisances to his majesty; and, coming up to his majesty, he did address himself to him, in the name of this house, by an eloquent oration, to which his majesty gave a gracious Answer: which being performed, the members of this house, then attending, kissed his majesty's hand: and, after that, his majesty retired out of the Banquetting-House; and Mr. Speaker, and the rest, thereupon departed."

Speech of the Speaker of the House of Lords to the King at Whitehall.] May 30. The two houses having congratulated his majesty on his Return to his dominions and the exercise of his kingly office, by the mouths of their distinct Speakers, they met again this day to proceed in national affairs, which were now to be carried on according to the ancient government of this realm, by king, lords, and commons. The Speech the earl of Manchester, Speaker of the house of lords, till a lord chancellor, or lord keeper of the great seal could be created, made to the king, is entered in the proceedings of this day, in their Journals, as follows:

"That this day may prove happy to your majesty, is the hope, the expectation, and the earnest desire of my lords the peers, whose commands are upon me to make this humble tender to your majesty, of their loyal joy for your majesty's safe Return to your native kingdom, and for this happy Restoration of your majesty to your crown and dignity, after so long, and so severe, a suppression of your just right and title.—I shall not reflect upon your majesty's sufferings, which have been your people's miseries; yet I cannot omit to say, that as the nation in general, so the peers, with a more personal and particular sense, have felt the stroke that cut the gordian knot, which fastened your majesty to your kingdom, and your kingdom to your majesty.—For since those strange and various fluctuations and discomposures in government, since those horrid and unparalleled violations of all order and justice, strangers have ruled over us, even with a rod of iron: but now, with satisfaction of heart, we own and see your majesty, our native king, a son of the wise, a son of the ancient king's, whose hand holds forth a golden scepter.—Great King! Give me leave to speak the confidence, as well as the desires, of the peers of England. Be you the powerful Defender of the true Protestant Faith; the just asserter and maintainer of the Laws and Liberties of your subjects; so shall

' judgment run down like a river, and justice 'like a mighty stream;' and God, the God of your mercy, who hath so miraculously preserved you, will establish your throne in righteousness and in peace.—Dread Sovereign! I offer no flattering titles, but speak the words of truth. You are the desire of three kingdoms, the strength and the stay of the tribes of the people, for the moderating of extremities, the reconciling of differences, the satisfying of all interests, and for the restoring of the collapsed honour of these nations. Their eyes are toward your majesty, their tongues, with loud acclamations of joy, speak the thoughts and loyal intentions of their hearts; their hands are lift up to Heaven with prayers and praises: and what oral triumph can equal this your pomp and glory?—Long may your majesty live and reign; a support to your friends, a terror to your enemies, an honour to your nation, and an example to kings of piety, justice, prudence, and power; that this prophetic expression may be verified in your majesty, 'King Charles the Second shall be greater than ever was the greatest of that name.'"

The King's Answer.] To the above speech his majesty made the following Answer:

"My lord; I am so disordered by my journey, and with the noise still sounding in my ears, (which I confess was pleasing to me, because it expressed the affections of my people) as I am unfit at the present to make such a reply as I desire; yet thus much I shall say unto you, That I take no greater satisfaction to myself in this my change, than that I find my heart really set to endeavour, by all means, for the restoring of this nation to their freedom and happiness: and I hope, by the advice of my parliament, to effect it. Of this also you may be confident, that, next to the honour of God, from whom principally I shall ever own this Restoration to my crown, I shall study the welfare of my people; and shall not only be a true Defender of the Faith, but a just asserter of the Laws and Liberties of my Subjects."

Speech of the Speaker of the House of Commons to the King at Whitehall.] The Speech of the Speaker of the House of Commons on this occasion is not entered in the Journals. It was, however, afterwards printed, as follows:

The Speech of Sir HARBOTTLE GRIMSTON, Bart. Speaker of the Honourable House of Commons, to the King's Most Excellent Majesty, delivered in the Banquetting-House, at Whitehall, May 29, 1660, the Members of that House being then present.

"Most gracious and dread Sovereign; I all the reason and eloquence that is dispersed in so many several heads and tongues as are in the whole world, were conveyed into my brain, and united in my tongue, yet I should want sufficiency to discharge that great task I am now enjoined.—The restitution of your majesty to the exercise of your just and most indubitable native right of sovereignty, and the deliverance of your people from bondage and slavery, hath been wrought out and brought to pass, by a miraculous way of Divine Providence, beyond and above the reach and comprehension of our understandings, and therefore to be admired; impossible to be expressed.—God hath been pleased to train your majesty up in the school of affliction, where you have learned that excellent lesson of patience so well, and improved it so much for the good of your people, that we have all just cause for ever to bless God for it, and we doubt not but your name is registered in the records of Heaven, to have a place in the highest form amongst those glorious martyrs of whom it is reported, that, through faith in Christ and patience in their sufferings, they converted their very tormenters, and conquered those barbarous bloody tyrants, under whom they then suffered, inasmuch as they themselves were many times enforced to confess and cry out, ‘Sat est vicisti Gallilæus,’ they had their ‘vicisti,’ and that deservedly; but your majesty must have a treble vicisti, for with the same weapons, faith and patience, you have overcome and conquered the hearts and affections of all your people in three great nations, the hearts and affections of all that are worthy the name of good Christians, or reasonable men.—It is God, and God alone, to whom be the glory, that hath made your majesty so great a conqueror; indeed your conquest is incomparable, no story can instance the like, or furnish us with an example to parallel it withal. It was a use and custom amongst the Romans, when any of their commanders had done eminent services abroad, at their returns, to honour them with triumphs, and riding through their streets; there they received the praises and applauses of the people, with this inscription upon their laurel crowns. ‘Vincenti dabitur.’ But your majesty’s victory is of another nature; and as it differs much from theirs in the quality of it, so your triumph must differ as much from theirs in the manner of it. They conquered bodies, but your majesty hath conquered souls; they conquered for the honour and good of themselves, but your majesty hath conquered for the honour and good of your people; they conquered with force, but your majesty hath conquered with faith; they conquered with power, but your majesty hath conquered with patience; and therefore God himself hath written your Motto, and inscribed it upon your royal crown, ‘Patienti dabitur.’ Their triumphs were in narrow streets, but your majesty’s triumph must be in large hearts; their triumphs lasted but for a day, but your majesty’s triumph must last for all your days, and after that to triumph in Heaven to all eternity.—I have read of a duke of Burgundy, who was called Carolus Audax, the Historian tells us that his father was called Carolus Bonus: an Observer hath this Note upon it, ‘That goodness doth ever produce boldness.’ Sir, you are the true son of such a good father; and so long as you serve our good God, he, who is goodness itself, will give you boldness, a princely virtue, and the best foil your majesty can use, to set out the true lustre of all your other most eminent and lovely graces.—Most Royal Sovereign, I have yet a few words more, and to doubt your patience, who is the mirror of patience, were to commit a crime unpardonable and fit to be excepted out of that Act of Oblivion, which your majesty hath so graciously rendered unto your people; therefore, with an humble confidence, I shall presume to acquaint your majesty, that I have it further in command to present you, at this time, with a Petition of Right, and humbly, upon my bended knees, to beg your royal assent thereunto. Sir, it hath already passed two great houses, Heaven and Earth, and I have Vox Populi, and Vox Dei, to warrant this bold demand. It is, That your majesty would be pleased to remove your throne of state, and to set it up in the hearts of your people; and as you are deservedly the king of hearts, there to receive from your people a crown of hearts. Sir, this crown hath three excellent and rare properties, it is a sweet crown, it is a fast crown, and it is a lasting crown; it is a sweet crown, for it is perfumed with nothing but the incense of prayers and praises; it is a fast crown, for it is set upon your royal head, by him who only hath the power of hearts, the King of Kings; and it is a lasting crown, your majesty can never wear it out, for the longer you wear this crown, it will be the better for the wearing; and it is the hearty desires and most earnest prayers of all your loyal, loving, and faithful subjects, that you may never change that crown till you change it for a better, a crown of eternal glory in the highest heavens; and the Lord say Amen.”

“I shall not trouble you with many words, for really I am so weary that I am scarce able to speak: But I desire you may know thus much, That whatsoever may concern the good of this people, the defence and confirmation of your Laws, and the establishment of your Religion, I shall be as ready to grant as you shall be to ask: And I shall study nothing more than to make them as happy as myself.”

Account of the King's Entry into London.] Before we go on with the Proceedings of both Houses of Parliament, we shall revert a little, to give some Account of the King's Landing at Dover, and the public Entry he afterwards made into his City of London, and to that palace to which he was then so great a stranger. The Author we shall quote from is Dr. Gumble, who wrote the Life of General Monk, and who accompanied his master down to Dover, to meet and receive the King on his Landing.—“On Saturday, May 26, his majesty landed at the beach on Dover Pier, with the dukes of York and Gloucester, and many other noblemen and gentlemen: The General received him with an affection so absolutely entire and vehement, as higher could not be expressed from a prince to his subject; he embraced and kissed him. Our Author says, he had the honour to be at the General's back when this happened, and was the third person that kissed the hem of his majesty's garments after he set foot in England: That he set himself to observe his majesty's countenance on his first Landing, where he did see a mixture of other passions besides joy in his face. Certainly, adds this Author, he had the remembrance of the cruel persecutions of both his father and himself, besides the numbers of people shouting, the great guns from the-ships in the road, and from the Castle, thundering with all the expressions of glory that were possible: these, with a reflection of things past not many years before might as well amaze as rejoice his royal heart."—We shall not trace this Author any further in the King's Journey from Dover* to London, where he says, "his majesty pressed to be, that he might enter his capital on May 29, the day of his birth;

* "The first mortification the king met with was as soon as he arrived at Canterbury, which was within three hours after he had landed at Dover; and where he found many of those who were justly looked upon, from their own sufferings or those of their fathers, and their constant adhering to the same principles, as of the king's party, who with joy waited to kiss his hand, and were received by him with those open arms and flowing expressions of grace, calling all those by their names who were known to him, that they easily assured themselves of the accomplishment of all their desires from such a generous prince. And some of them, that they might not lose the first opportunity, forced him to give them present audience, in which they reckoned up the insupportable losses undergone by themselves or their fathers, and some services of their own; and thereupon demanded the present grant or promise of such or such an office. Some, for the real small value of one though of the first classis, pressed for two or three with such confidence and importunity, and with such tedious discourses, that the king was extremely nauseated with their suits, though his modesty knew not how to break from them; that he no sooner got into his chamber, which for some hours he was not able to do, than he lamented the condition to which he found he must be subject, and did in truth from that minute contract such a prejudice against the persons of some of those, though of the greatest quality, for the indecency and incongruity of their pretences, that he never afterwards received their addresses with his usual grace or patience, and rarely granted any thing they desired, though the matter was more reasonable, and the manner of asking much more modest. But there was another mortification which immediately succeeded this, that gave him much more trouble, and in which he knew not how to comport himself. The general, after he had given all necessary orders to his troops, and sent a short dispatch to the parliament of the king's being come to Canterbury, and of his purpose to stay there two days till on which day, being got as near Blackheath, he found the Army drawn up, and these expressed their dutiful allegiance in an humble Address, offering to sacrifice their lives, or whatsoever could be more dear to them, for his service, against whatsoever opposers; and would shew their obedience better in their actions than in words. This sight did please his majesty very much, and he took a full view of them. They were as brave Troops as the world could shew, appearing to be soldiers well disciplined, and seemed to be men of one age and one mind. His majesty did like rather to have them loyal subjects, as they now protested, than (what some of them had been formerly) violent enemies. These men had bought wit at the hazard of their souls, as well as by the loss of some blood, and now resolved loyalty into their nature and principles, and, I hope, the next Sunday was past, he came to the king in his chamber, and in a short secret audience, and without any preamble or apology, as he was not a man of a graceful elocution, he told him "that he could not do him better service, than by recommending to him such persons, who were most grateful to the people, and in respect of their parts and interests were best able to serve him;" and thereupon gave him a large paper full of names, which the king in disorder enough received, and without reading put it into his pocket that he might not enter into any particular debate upon the persons, and told him "that he would be always ready to receive his advice, and willing to gratify him in any thing he should desire, and which would not be prejudicial to his service." The king, as soon as he could, took an opportunity when there remained no more in his chamber, to inform the chancellor of the first assaults he had encountered as soon as he alighted out of his coach, and afterwards of what the general had said to him; and thereupon took the paper out of his pocket and read it. It contained the names of at least threescore and ten persons, who were thought fittest to be made privy counsellors; in the whole number whereof, there were only two, who had ever served the king, or been looked upon as zealously affected to his service, the marquis of Hertford, and the earl of Southampton, who were both of so universal reputation and interest, and so well known to have the very particular esteem of the king, that they needed no much recommendation. All the rest were either those counsellors who had served the king, and deserted him by adhering to the parliament; or of those who had most eminently deserved him in the beginning of the rebellion, and in the carrying it on with all fierceness and animosity until the new model, and dismissing the earl of Essex: then indeed Cromwell had grown terrible to them and disposed them to wish the king were again possessed of his regal power, and which they did but wish. There were then the names of the principal persons of the Presby-keep this resolution to this day. At St. George's Fields the lord mayor and aldermen had pitched a glorious tent, and provided a sumptuous collation, and there, upon their knees, did their duties; and the lord mayor delivered his sword, and received it again. After a short stay his majesty hastened to see Whitehall, being gladdened with the ceremonies of the day. Princes need their solitudes and retirements, and certainly he must be wise to a miracle, that is never alone and always himself.—All the streets were richly adorned with tapestry, the conduits flowing with the richest wines, every window filled with numbers of spectators, and upon scaffolds built for that purpose, and all other places of conveniency. There were ranked, in good order, the Trained Band forces on the one side of the streets, and terian party, to which the general was thought to be most inclined, at least to satisfy the foolish and unruly inclinations of his wife. There were likewise the names of some who were most notorious in all the other factions; and of some who in respect of their mean qualities and meaner qualifications, no body could imagine how they could come to be named, except that, by the very odd mixture, any sober and wise resolutions and concurrence might be prevented.—The king was in more than ordinary confusion: with the reading this paper, and knew not well what to think of the general, in whose absolute power he now was. However, he resolved in the entrance upon his government not to consent to such impositions, which might prove perpetual fetters and chains upon him ever after. He gave the paper therefore to the chancellor, and bade him "take the first opportunity to discourse the matter with the general" (whom he had not yet saluted) "or rather with Mr. Morrice his most intimate friend," whom he had newly presented to the king, and "with both whom he presumed he would shortly be acquainted," though for the present both were equally unknown to him. Shortly after, when mutual visits had passed between them, and such professions as naturally are made between persons who were like to have much to do with each other; and Mr. Morrice being in private with him, the chancellor told him "how much the king was surprised with the paper he had received from the general, which at least recommended (and which would have always great authority with him) some such persons to his trust, in whom he could not yet, till they were better known to him, repose any confidence." And thereupon he read many of their names, and said, "that if such men were made privy counsellors, it would either be imputed to the king's own election, which would cause a very ill measure to be taken of his majesty's nature and judgment; or (which more probably would be the case) to the jurisdiction and power of the general, which would be attended with an ill effect." Mr. Morrice seemed much troubled at the apprehension, the several companies in their liveries on the other. From Temple-Bar to Whitehall the Trained Bands of Westminster and the parts adjacent on one side, and some companies of the Army on the other, to whom was joined a company of the late king's officers, commanded by sir John Stowel. This was one of the pleasantest sights that ever England beheld, to see a good prince and an obedient people striving who should exceed in love and affection. May there never be other contention between them.—The procession was led by major-general Brown, who had a troop of 300, all in cloth of silver-doublets; then followed 1200 in velvet coats, with footmen in purple liveries attending them; then another troop, in buff coats, led by sir John Robinson, with sleeves of cloth of silver, and very rich green scarfs: After and said, "the paper was of his handwriting; by the general's order, who he was assured had no such intention; but that he would presently speak with him and return," which he did within less than an hour, and expressed "the trouble the general was in upon the king's very just exception; and that the truth was, he had been obliged to have much communication with men of all humours and inclinations, and so had promised to do them good offices to the king, and could not therefore avoid inserting their names in that paper, without any imaginations that the king would accept them: that he had done his part, and all that could be expected from him, and left the king to do what he had thought best for his own service, which he would always desire him to do, whatever proposition he should at any time presume to make to his majesty, which he would not promise should be always reasonable. However, he did still heartily wish, that his majesty would make use of some of those persons," whom he named, and said, "he knew most of them were not his friends, and that his service would be more advanced by admitting them, than by leaving them out."—The king was abundantly pleased with this good temper of the general, and less disliked those, who he discerned would be grateful to him, than any of the rest: and so the next day, he made the general knight of the Garter, and admitted him of the council, and likewise at the same time gave the signet to Mr. Morrice, who was sworn of the council and secretary of state; and sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, who had been presented by the general under a special recommendation, was then too sworn of the council, and the rather because having lately married the niece of the earl of Southampton (who was then likewise present and received the Garter to which he had been elected some years before) it was believed that his slippery humour would be easily restrained and fixed by the uncle. All this was transacted during his majesty's stay at Canterbury." Lord Clarendon's Life, written by himself, p. 5.

these a troop of 150, with blue liveries, laced with silver lace, with 6 trumpeters and 7 footmen in sea-green and silver. Then a troop of 220, with 30 footmen in grey and silver liveries, and 4 trumpeters richly clothed; then another troop of 105, with grey liveries, and 6 trumpets; and another of 70, with 5 trumpets. Then 3 troops more, two of 300, and one of 100, all richly habited and bravely mounted; after these came two trumpets with his majesty's arms; the sheriffs men in red cloaks, richly laced with silver lace, to the number of 80, with pikes in their hands. Then followed 600 of the several companies of London, on horseback, in black velvet coats with gold chains, each company having footmen in rich Liveries attending.—After these came a kettle-drum, 5 trumpets, 3 streamers, and many rich red liveries with silver lace: After these 12 ministers, and then another kettle-drum and 4 trumpets, with his majesty's life-guard of horse, commanded by the lord Gerrard. Then 3 trumpets in rich coats and satten doublets, and the city marshal with 8 footmen in French green, trimmed with crimson and white, the city waits, and all the city officers in order; then the two sheriffs, and all the aldermen in their scarlet gowas and rich trappings, with footmen in liveries, red coats laced with silver, and cloth of gold and silver; the heralds and maces in rich coats; then the lord mayor carrying the sword bare, and next to him the duke of Buckingham and the General, and then the king's majesty betwixt the dukes of York and Gloucester; after which followed a great troop of his majesty's servants; then followed a troop of horse with white colours; then the General's life-guard, commanded by sir Philip Howard; wherein, beside the established number, rode several noble persons; in the first rank were such as had 100,000*l.* per ann. of inheritance among them; after them 5 regiments of the Army Horse, led by col. Knight; and then two troops of noblemen and gentlemen to close the procession.*

May 31. The earl of Berkshire acquainted the lords, That he was commanded by his majesty to signify his desire to this house, that those who were created peers by patent, by his late majesty at Oxford, should sit in the house. On which the lords ordered the same lord to attend the king, and acquaint him,

* "The concourse was so great, that the king rode in a crowd from the Bridge to Whitehall; all the Companies of the City standing in order on both sides, and giving loud thanks to God for his majesty's presence. He no sooner came to Whitehall but the two Houses of Parliament solemnly cast themselves at his feet, with all vows of affection to the world's end. In a word, the joy was so unexpressible and so universal, that his majesty said smiling to some about him, 'he doubted it had been his own fault he had been absent so long; for he saw nobody that did not protest he had ever wished his return.'" Clarendon, v. vi. p. 773.

That matters of honour did belong to his majesty, and this house did acquiesce in his pleasure. And agreed, That the Order formerly passed, for excluding any lords made at Oxford from sitting in the house, should be cancelled, nulled, and made void, and that the lords sub-committee for Privileges, &c. should see this done and executed accordingly. Also, that the said lords should meet to consider of placing the seats and forms of the house, for making more room for the peers.

The King comes to the House.] June 1. The King came to the house of lords for the first time, and, sending for the commons, his majesty made a short speech to both houses, and then commanded the lord chancellor (Hyde) to deliver his mind further to them, which he accordingly did, say the Journals, in a large one; but neither of them are entered in those authorities. Nor have we met with them, at length, elsewhere; there is only a short abstract of the chancellor's Speech preserved in history*, which he made after the king had given his royal assent to these 3 Bills, viz. 1. "An Act for preventing and removing all Questions and Disputes, concerning the Assembling and Sitting of this present Parliament. 2. An Act for putting in Execution an Ordinance mentioned in the said Act. 3. An Act for Continuance of Process, and all judicial Proceedings. After which,

The Lord Chancellor told both houses, "With how much readiness his majesty had passed these important Acts, and how willing they should at all times hereafter find him, to pass any other that might tend to the advantage and benefit of the people; in a particular manner desiring, in his majesty's behalf, That the Bill of Oblivion, in which they had made so good a progress, might be expedited: that the people might see and know his majesty's extraordinary gracious care to ease and free them from their doubts and fears; and that he had not forgotten his gracious Declaration made at Breda, but that he would in all points make good the same."

Thanks returned to the Committee sent to the King.] The Commons resolved, That the gentlemen, the members of this house, who were sent to his majesty with a Letter from this house, have the thanks of this house, for their eminent service. Accordingly, the Speaker said, "Gentlemen, I shall not need to tell you what notice the house hath taken of the eminent service you have performed in your late employment to his majesty; you have brought home the ark, the glory of England, his majesty's person, in safety; and truly, if ever a service deserved to be called a service of ever-blessed memory, this is such a service: therefore the house hath commanded this service to be singled out from all your former eminent and worthy services, and to do it per excellentiam, as much exceeding all that ever hath been done before for this nation. And since the merit thereof is such, that no thanks can be proportionable thereunto, but the thanks of this house, I am therefore commanded, in the name of this house, and of all those they represent, the commons of England, to return you their very hearty Thanks."

At the same time, Mr. Hollis informed the house, That he having been sent, with the other worthy members, to the king, some aspersions had been cast upon him, as if he had, in his Speech to the king, (see p. 36) transgressed the Instructions given him by the house: on which the house ordered, 'That he should have leave to print the Speech he made to his majesty, as also the King's Answer to it, for which he had the king's leave, as well as the Instructions of the house, for his own vindication.

June 4. The commons sent up Mr. Prynne, and others, to the lords, to desire their concurrence in sending to his majesty, to desire him to issue out his Proclamation, against those that had a hand in the horrid Murder of his late majesty. The lords agreed to this, and the king consenting, a Proclamation was published accordingly.

Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance to be taken by the Members, &c.] The commons were busy most of this day in taking the Oaths to the new government, or rather to the old one re-established. The right hon. James, marquis and earl of Ormond, lord lieutenant of Ireland, and lord steward of his majesty's household, came into the lobby at the door of the house of commons, where a table being set, and a chair prepared, being attended by the clerk of the crown, and the clerk of the commons house, with the Rolls of such members as were returned to serve in this parliament, his lordship gave the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance to several members, whom he had, by his commission, deputed to administer the same to other members in his absence.

Form of the Oath of Supremacy.

"I, A. B. do utterly testify and declare in my conscience, That our sovereign lord king Charles II. is the only supreme governor of this realm, and of all other his majesty's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things, or causes, as temporal; and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm: and therefore I do utterly renounce and forsake all foreign jurisdictions, powers, superiorities, and authorities; and do promise, that from henceforth I shall bear faith and true allegiance to the king's majesty, his heirs and lawful successors; and, to my power, shall assist and defend all jurisdictions, privileges, pre-eminences, and authorities, granted or belonging to the king's majesty, his heirs and successors; or united or annexed to the imperial crown of this realm:

So help me God, and by the contents of this book."

Form of the Oath of Allegiance.

"I, A. B. do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare, in my conscience, before God and the world, That our sovereign lord king Charles II. is lawful and rightful king of this realm, and of all other his majesty's dominions and countries; and that the Pope, neither of himself, nor by any authority of the Church or See of Rome, or by any other means, with any other, hath any power or authority to depose the king, or to dispose of any of his majesty's kingdoms or dominions, or to authorize any foreign prince to invade or annoy him, or his countries; or to discharge any of his majesty's subjects of their allegiance and obedience to his majesty; or to give licence or leave to any of them to bear arms, raise, tumults, or to offer any violence or hurt to his majesty's royal person, state, or government, or to any of his majesty's subjects, within his majesty's dominions.—Also, I do swear from my heart, That, notwithstanding any declaration, or sentence of excommunication or deprivation, made or granted, or to be made or granted, by the Pope, or his successors, or by any authority derived, or pretended to be derived, from him, or his see, against the said king, his heirs or successors, or any absolution of the said subjects from their obedience, I will bear faith and true allegiance to his majesty, his heirs and successors; and him and them will defend, to the uttermost of my power, against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever, which shall be made against his or their persons, their crown and dignity, by reason or colour of any such sentence or declaration, or otherwise; and will do my best endeavour to disclose and make known unto his majesty, his heirs and successors, all treasons, and traitorous conspiracies, which I shall know, or hear of, to be against him, or any of them.—And I do further swear, That I do, from my heart, abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and position, That princes, which be excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever. And I do believe, and in conscience am resolved, that neither the Pope, nor any person whatsoever, hath power to absolve me of this Oath, or any part thereof; which I acknowledge, by good and full authority, to be lawfully ministered unto me; and do renounce all pardons and dispensations to the contrary: and all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to these express words by me spoken, and according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation, or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever: and I do make this recognition and acknowledgment heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the true faith of a Christian. So help me God."

June 5. The commons were still busy in carrying on the Act of Indemnity and general Pardon, and this day it was proposed to except seven persons for life and estate. And it being likewise proposed, That they should be then named, Thomas Harrison, Wm. Say, John Jones, Thomas Scott, Cornelius Holland, John Lisle, and John Barkstead, were agreed on for that purpose.

June 8. The commons proceeded to except more persons out of their Act of Pardon, when John Cooke, Andrew Broughton, and Edward Dendy, solicitors and agents at the late King's Trial, were excepted both as to life and estates. And having examined some Witnesses, touching the person who executed the late King, they resolved, That those two persons, who were upon the scaffold in disguise, when the detestable and traitorous sentence upon the late King was executed, be excepted out of the general Act of Pardon for life and estate.

The commons, in carrying on the Act of Oblivion, were still seeking out for such as were to be excepted out of it, and had appointed a committee to inform themselves, by perusing the Journal of the pretended High Court of Justice, for the Trial of the late King, what persons not sitting at the said Trial on the 27th of Jan. 1648, did sit at the said trial, in Westminster-Hall, any of the days preceding, and to report their Names to the House.

June 9. Accordingly, Mr. Prynne, from the committee, brought in several Names of such persons, with the times of their sitting at the Trial; on which the house resolved, That Wm. lord Munson, Thomas Challoner, James Challoner, John Fry, Francis Lascelles, sir H. Midway, Rob. Wallop, sir Gilbert Pickering, sir James Harrington, Tho. Lister, and John Phelps, one of the clerks under the pretended High Court of Justice, should all be excepted out of the Act of general Pardon and Oblivion, for and in respect only of such pains, penalties, and forfeitures, (not extending to life) as shall be thought fit to be inflicted on them by another Act, intended to be hereafter passed for that purpose.—At the same time, the following persons were voted to be spared for life, though all sat in Judgment on the late King; the lord Grey of Grooby, sir Harless Waller, Valentine Wauton, Edw. Whalley, Isaac Ewer, sir John Danvers, sir Tho. Maleverer, sir John Bourchier, Wm. Heringham, Isaac Pennington, Henry Marten, Wm. Purefoy, John Blakiston, Gilbert Millington, sir Wm. Constable, Edm. Ludlow, sir Michael Livesey, Rob. Tichborne, Owen Rowe, Robert Lilburne, Richard Deane, John Okey, John Hughson, Wm. Goffe, John Carew, Miles Corbett, Francis Allen, Peregrine Pelham, John Moore, John Allured, Henry Smyth, Humphry Edwards, Gregory Clement, Tho. Wogan, sir Gregory Norton, Edm. Harvey, John Venn, Thomas Andrews, alderman of London, Wm. Cawley, Anthony Stapely, John Downes, Tho. Horton, Thomas Horton, Tho. Hammond, Nich. Love, Vincent Potter, Augustin Garland, John Dixwell, Geo.

Fleetwood, Simon Mayne, James Temple, Peter Temple, Daniel Blgrave, and Thomas Wayte.

June. The house resumed the debate on the Act of general Pardon and Oblivion, when a Letter from William Lenthall, esq. the Speaker of the Long Parliament, was read, and the question being put, That he be one of the 20 persons to be excepted out of the general Act of Pardon, to suffer such pains and penalties, life only excepted, as should be thought proper to inflict upon him? The house divided, and it was carried against him by 215 to 126. Sir Henry Vane was also voted to lie under the same dilemma, without any division.—The above-mentioned Letter was addressed to the Speaker, and was as follows:

“ Mr. Speaker; I find it not possible for me to take off the misapprehensions of some persons, misled by arguments, of my great gains which I got when I sat in your chair, and especially that of Compositions, where it is thought I had 5*l.* of every compounder. It is true, both houses did so order it, but very shortly it was again disannulled; so that what I received of that was very inconsiderable, as may appear by examination of the books of the house, and the serjeant at arms; and the clerks first reserving their parts, paid mine unto me, which is a check upon me. And as to the profit concerning passing of private Bills, as it is paid by the clerks, so it is checked as aforesaid.—Before his late majesty's going from London, the house took into consideration my great and extraordinary charge and loss, and gave me, by vote, 6,000*l.* but I never to this day received the one half of it; besides which I never had gift of land or money, nor any part of that 5*l.* per diem which is due to the Speaker, as Speaker, whilst he so continues. I shall desire you, sir, to offer so much of this as shall be necessary to express me, with all humillity, to the house; but not as a justification of myself, but to shew the truth of my condition. And this will very much oblige, Mr. Speaker, W. LENTHALL.*

* William Lenthall, esq. died Sept. 3, 1662, and very penitent, as appears from the following Account, in a Letter from Dr. Ralph Bridcock, who visited him in his last sickness.—“ When,” says he, “ I came to his presence, he told me he was very glad to see me, for he had two great works to do, and I must assist him in both; to fit his body for the earth, and his soul for heaven; to which purpose he desired me to pray with him: I told him the Church had appointed an Office at the Visitation of the Sick, and I must use that; and he said, ‘ Yes, he chiefly desired the Prayers of the Church,’ wherein he joined with great fervency and devotion. After prayers he desired absolution; I told him I was ready and willing to pronounce it, but he must first come to a Christian confession and contrition for the sins and failings of his life. ‘ Well, sir,’ said he, ‘ then instruct me to my duty.’ I desired him to examine his

The lords had had an affair of their own Privilege before them for some time, relating to the Choice of their own Speaker in some cases : and, a committee being appointed to examine into this business, the lord Roberts reported their result to the house : " That it is the duty of the lord-chancellor, or lord-keeper of the great seal, of England, ordinarily to attend the lords house of parliament; and that in case those great officers be absent from the house, and that there be none authorized, under the great seal, by the king, to supply that place in the house of peers, the lords may then chuse their own Speaker during that vacancy." The house confirmed this report, and ordered it to be entered in the Roll amongst the standing Orders of the house : and, soon after, the king thought proper to grant a commission, under his great seal, to sir Orlando Bridgman, lord chief baron of the exchequer, to execute that place whenever the lord chancellor should be absent.—The lords also appointed a committee to consider of the great Violation that hath been committed upon the Peers of this realm, by restraining their persons, burning them in the hand, refusing their Privileges when they have been claimed, and many other Breaches : and that the said committee have power to send for all offenders in those kinds, and after examination thereof, to report it to the house.

June 13. The commons agreed that the following persons should be of the 20 who were to be excepted out of the Act of Pardon, for pains and penalties not extending to life, viz. Wm. Burton, serj. Rd. Keeble, Oliver St. John, John Ireton, sir Arthur Haslerig, col. Wm. Sydenham, John Desborough, and Daniel Axtell. The Trial of Bulstrode Whitlocke, a person well known in these and former times, came also on; and the question being put, Whether the main question be now put, it passed in the negative, 175 against 134; so life by the Ten Commandments, and wherein he found his failings, to fly to the Gospel for mercy. Then I read the Ten Commandments to him in order, mentioning the principal sins against each commandment. To pass by other things, (under the seal of the office) when I came to the fifth commandment, and remembered him, That disobedience, rebellion, and schism, were the great sins, against this commandment, 'Yes, sir,' said he, 'there is my trouble;' my disobedience, not to my natural parents, but against the pater patriæ, our deceased sovereign. I confess, with Saul, I held their cloaths whilst they murdered him; but herein I was not so criminal as Saul was, for, God thou knowest, I never consented to his death; I never prayed and endeavoured what I could against it, but I did too much, God forgive me! I then desired him to deal freely and openly in that business, and if he knew any of those villains that plotted or contrived that horrid murder, who were not yet detected, he would now discover them. He answered, 'He was a stranger to that business, his soul never entered into that secret; but what concerns myself,' said he, 'I will confess freely. Three things are especially laid to my charge, wherein, indeed, I am too guilty: That I went from the parliament to the Army; that I proposed the bloody question for trying the king; and that I sat after the king's death. To the first I give this Answer, That Cromwell, and his agents, deceived a wiser man than myself; that excellent king, and then might well deceive me also, as they did. I knew the Presbyterians would never restore the king to his just rights, as those men swore they would. For the second, no excuse can be made, but I have the king's pardon, and I hope Almighty God will shew me his mercy also; yet, sir,' said he, 'even then, when I put the question, I hoped the very putting the question would have cleared him, because I believed there were four to one against it; but they deceived me also. To the third, I

'make this candid confession, That it was my own baseness, cowardice, and unworthy fear, to submit my life and estate to the mercy of those men that murdered the king, that hurried me on against my own conscience to act with them; yet then I thought also I might do some good, and hinder some ill. Something I did for the Church and the Universities; something for the king when I broke the Oath of Abjuration, as sir O. B. and yourself know; something for his Return also too, as my lord G. M. J. T. and yourself, know: but the ill I did over-weighed the little good I would have done. God forgive me for this also.' After this I remembered him, That the Fathers of the Church had also been murdered and ruined, and asked, Whether he had any hand, or gave any consent therein? He answered, 'No; for I always did believe that was the primitive and best government of the Church;' and said, 'I die a dutiful son of the Church of England, as it was established before those times; for I have not seen the alteration of the Liturgy.' After this office, wherein, indeed, he shewed himself a very hearty penitent, he again desired the Absolution of the Church, which I then pronounced, and which he received with much content and satisfaction; 'For,' said he, 'now, indeed, do I feel the joy and benefit of the Office which Christ hath left in his Church.' Then praying for the king that he might long and happily reign over us, and for the peace of the Church, he again desired prayers. The next day he received the Sacrament; and after that work I desired him to express himself to Mr. Dickerson, (a learned physician, fellow of Merton College, who received the Sacrament with him) concerning the King's Death, because he had only done it to me in confession; which he did, to the same effect as he had done to me. The rest of his time was spent in devotion and penitential meditations to his very last." From an Original in Dr. William's MS. Collections, vol. viii. No 127.

that Mr. Whitlocke was respited for that time.—The commons continued to except persons out of their Act of Pardon, but though it had been voted to except no more than 20, yet they went on with their exceptions for Pains and Penalties, and col. John Lambert, Christ. Pack, alderman of London, and John Blackwell, of Mortlack, were named for that purpose.

The celebrated John Milton comes next to be questioned for writing two Books, one intitled, "Johannis Miltoni Angli pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, contra Claudii Anonimi, alias Salmasii Defensionem Regiam;" the other, an Answer to a Book called, "The Portraiture of his late Majesty in his Solitude and Sufferings." At the same time, one John Goodwin was mentioned for writing another Book, intitled, "The Obstructors of Justice," in defence of the traitorous Sentence against the late king. These two persons were ordered to be taken into custody by the serjeant at arms, to be prosecuted by the attorney-general; and, lastly, the king was desired to issue out his proclamation to recall their Books, along with such other Books as should be presented to his majesty, in a schedule from the house, in order to their being burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

The King's Message relative to the Act of Indemnity. } This day, Mr. Secretary Morrice* acquainted the commons that he had a Message from his majesty in writing; which he was commanded to deliver to that house, and desired it might be read. It was as follows:

"C. R. We have had too ample a manifestation of your affection and duty toward us, the good effect whereof is notorious to the world, to make the least doubt of the continuance and improvement thereof, or in the least degree to dislike what you have done, or to complain of what you have left undone. We know well the weight of those affairs, which depend upon your counsels, and the time that must unavoidably be spent in debates, where there must naturally be difference of opinion and judgment, amongst those whose desires of the public peace and safety are the same; and, neither we nor you must be overmuch troubled, if we find our good intentions, and the unwearied pains we take to reduce those good intentions into real acts, for the quiet and security of the nation, mis-represented and mis-interpreted by those who are, in truth, afflicted to see the public distractions, by God's blessing, so near an end; and, by others, upon whose weakness, fears, and jealousies, the activity and cunning of those ill men have too great an influence.—How wonderful and miraculous soever the great harmony of affections between us and our good subjects is, (and that is so visible and manifest to the world, that there scarce appears the view of any cloud to overshadow or disturb it) yet, we must not think that God Almighty hath wrought the miracle to that degree, that a nation so miserably divided for so many years, is so soon and entirely united in their affections and endeavours, as were to be wished; but that the evil consciences of many men continue so awake for mischief, that they are not willing to take rest themselves, or to suffer others to take it: and we have all had too sad experience of the unhappy effects of fears and jealousies, how groundless and unreasonable soever, not to think it very necessary to apply all timely and proper remedies to those distempers, and to prevent the inconveniences and mischiefs which too naturally flow from thence: we well foresaw, that the great violation, which the laws of the land had for so many years sustained, had filled the hearts of the people with a terrible apprehension of insecurity to themselves, if all they had said and done should be liable to be examined and punished by those laws which had been so violated; and that nothing could establish the security of king and people, but a full provision, that the returning to the reverence and obedience of the law, which is good for us all, should not turn to the ruin of any, who are willing and fit to receive that protection hereafter from the law, and to pay that subjection to it that is just and necessary; and, therefore, we made that free offer of a general Pardon, in such a manner, as is expressed in our Declaration; and how ready and desirous we are to make good the same, appears by our Proclamation, which we have issued out upon, and according to, your desire.—However, it is evident, that all we have, or do offer, doth not enough compose the minds of our people, nor, in their opinions, can their security be provided for, till the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion be passed; and we find great industry is used by those, who do not wish that peace to the kingdom they ought to do, to persuade our good subjects, that we have no mind to make good our promises, which, in truth, we desire to perform for our own sake as well as theirs: and we do therefore very earnestly recommend it to you, that all possible expedition be used in the passing that most necessary Act, whereby our good subjects generally will be satisfied, that their security is in their own hands, and depends upon their future actions, and that they are free for all that is past, and so all the endeavours of ill men will be disappointed, which would persuade them not to do well now, because they have heretofore done amiss. And we are the more engaged to this our recommendation, because, upon the reflection of your eminent zeal and affection for our service, and hearty concurrence with us in all we have desired from you, men are apt to persuade others, though they do not believe it themselves, that the passing the Act is therefore deferred, because we do not enough press the dispatch of it, which we do desire from our heart, and are confident you will the sooner do, upon this our earnest recommendation."

* "Sir William Morrice, who was allied to general Monk, was, for his own merit, and that of his illustrious kinsman, preferred to the office of Secretary of State. He was a man of learning and good abilities, but was not completely qualified for his great employment, as he knew but little of foreign languages, and less of foreign affairs. The Secretary spoke Latin fluently, understood Greek, and acquitted himself during the seven years that he continued in office without reproach. He died Dec. 12, 1676. He was author of a Book entitled, 'The Common Right to the Lord's Supper asserted.' One singularity is recorded of him, That he would never suffer any man to say grace in his own house beside himself; there, he said, he was both priest and king." Grainger, vol. iii. p. 350.

After the reading of the above Remonstrance from the king, the commons desired the Secretary to return their humble Thanks to his majesty for his gracious Message; and to acquaint him, That the house would make it their endeavour to give a speedy dispatch to what is mentioned in the Message; and to all other matters relating to the public.

Debate on the Act of Indemnity.] Accordingly, the house resumed the Act of Indemnity; when, after debate, it was resolved, That Charles Fleetwood, John Pyne, Richard Dean, major Richard Creed, Philip Nye, John Goodwin, clerk, colonel Ralph Cobbet, William Hewet, and Hugh Peters, should be excepted out of the act of general pardon and oblivion; the two last for life.

A curious Manuscript,* which has certainly been the Note-Book of some member of this parliament, and which was sent in to the Editors of the 'Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England,' informs us, That when this debate was entered into, at this time, sir Henry Cholmley moved, That all such members as had sat in any High Court of Justice should withdraw, but refused to name any. This motion was seconded by sir Wm. Vincent; to which Mr. Charlton and Mr. Prynne added, all those that abjured, or signed the Instrument of Government. Mr. Goodrick spoke to lay that business aside; and sir George Booth, not to question them now, but to go to the business of the day. Lord Falkland moved to exclude them; as did also sir George Ryves, and col. King. Some other speakers are named in the MS. for and against the motion: the house did not divide upon it, but went to the business of the day, which was to name the 30 persons who were to be excepted out of the general Pardon. Mr. Prynne moved first against col. Fleetwood, which was answered by sir Ralph Knight, for him; but Mr. Palmer and col. King, speaking also against him, he was voted to be excepted; making the 14th man. Lord Falkland named col. Pyne; which Mr. Swanton and Mr. Chafe, seconding, saying, He was called the King of the West, and was a great tyrant, upon the question, he was voted to be excepted, being the 15th man. Mr. Philip Jones was named next; but, on reading a Petition from him, justifying himself that he was not guilty of the king's death, and Mr. Annesley and Mr. Finch speaking for him, his affair was dropt. Mr. Prynne moved against Richard Cromwell; but, no one seconding, the house proceeded no farther against him at that time. The same member named major Salway, but Mr. Dolewell delivering a Petition from the major, and he and Mr. Knightley speaking for him, he was also passed by. Sir Tho. Clarges moved against Rd. Dean; saying, There was a suspicion that he had lately dispersed dangerous papers in Scotland, and was an Anabaptist; upon which he was voted amongst the excepted, and made the 16th man.

The case of Mr. Whitlocke, the Memorialist, who had acted in high stations in every revolution since the late king's death, came on again this day. Mr. Prynne first moved the house against him, which was seconded by sir Ralph Ashton and sir Henry Finch, who said Whitlocke was as much an ambassador as St. John was; was for fining him, but not to exceed the value of two years income of his estate. Mr. Annesley was for not quitting him, but to set some mark of disfavour upon him only, by reason of his numerous family. Mr. Charlton also spoke against him, but moderately; and Mr. Palmer moved to spare his estate for his children's sake. For Whitlocke spoke Mr. Willoughby, sir Henry Cholmley, Mr. Turner, lord Howard, sir Geo. Booth, sir John Robinson, and sir Rd. Brown, who said, Mr. Whitlocke preserved him from being taken; and sir John Holland, who urged his sending the king over 500*l.* and his securing Lyme for him, of which his son was governor. On the whole, Mr. Whitlocke was again acquitted.

The next person who was named was major Creed, and only major Archer spoke for him; however, the house divided twice on this affair; first, Whether the question should be then put; which was carried, 147 against 101; and the main question being put, Creed was cast by 133 to 103: so he made the 17th man.

Sir William Wyde moved the house against Philip Nye, a minister: he was seconded by sir Henry Finch; who said, Nye had enriched himself very much in those times of plunder and rapine; and that there needed no particular charge, since the hue-and-cry was general against him. Mr. Turner also urged it home against Nye, and said, That he being the grandee at the committee for bestowing Benefices, a young man of learning and merit would not pass with him, when a worthless good-for-nothing fellow was always preferred. Sir Rd. Temple moved to charge Nye with some capital crime; but the house was more moderate, and one Mr. Folie speaking for him, he was only excepted as above, and made the 18th man.—John Goodwin, the Author before-mentioned, was next named by Mr. Prynne, and voted to be the 19th man.*

* This Manuscript is by way of Diary, and begins with June 18, 1660; but is broken into sometimes by lacerations, &c. It is written in the hand of the times, coincides exactly with the Journals of the commons, but is much more particular in the names of the Speakers in each debate. It was communicated to the Editors of the 'Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England' by the Rev. Charles Lyttelton, LL.D. Dean of Exeter.

Col. Cobbett was moved against by Mr. Hopkins; sir Henry Finch seconded; but not to put him on the list of the 20, but except him by himself as capital: but this not being agreed to, it was resolved, That Cobbett should only stand for pains and penalties, and he made the 20th man.

Judge Thorpe was named at the same time with Cobbett, by col. King, seconded by Mr. Winfield and Mr. Prynne; who mentioned one Thorpe, that was a Judge in Edw. 2nd's time, who, for taking bribes and other misdemeanors, was punished; and therefore desired that this Judge Thorpe might also suffer the same: but several members speaking in behalf of Thorpe, he was acquitted, and Cobbett taken in his place.

The case of Hugh Peters, the pulpit incendiary, came next to be considered. Serjeant Tyrrel produced an information against him, from one Dr. Young, a physician in Wales: that Peters, being very sick and like to die, told him, that it was he and Cromwell consulted together how to dispose of the late king. Hewlett, the man suspected to have cut off the king's head, was also named with Peters, there being two witnesses ready to swear against him: on which the house thought proper to except them out of the Act for life, and leave them to the law.

July 2. The business of raising money for the present exigencies of the State came first on the carpet, in the house of commons, the beginning of this month: which, the MS. Diary acquaints us, was first moved for by Mr. secretary Morrice, in an excellent speech for that purpose. This motion was seconded by Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Annesley, who were for doing it speedily. But sir Wm. Lewis argued, That it was best to proceed with the Act of Indemnity first, that people might be more ready to pay. Sir John Northcot spoke on the same side, as did also Mr. Prynne and Mr. Knightley. However, lord Falkland, speaking in behalf of the first motion, which was to raise money speedily to pay the Debts of the Nation; and Mr. Pierepoint saying, That the charge of the Army and Navy, and the interest. came to 6000*l.* a day; that it was inconsistent for an army and parliament to subsist together, and that the Trained-Bands were sufficient: To all which, col. Birch adding, That the people's liberties were not safe with such an army; that, though he was a member of it himself, yet he moved it might be paid off; and said, that 260,000*l.* would disband ten regiments of foot; the house agreed to set aside every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, to go upon means to raise money for that purpose.

The same day, the house went upon the Act of Indemnity; in which a strong debate and a division upon it ensued, which we give from the authority of the aforementioned MS. Diary. A proviso was put into the house by some unknown member, to be added to the Bill; which was, to disable all the persons of the High Court of Justice; all decimators, major-generals, abjurors, and all those that petitioned against the king. Hereupon a hot debate began; Mr. Annesley moved to have it thrown out, which was seconded by sir John Northcot; Mr. Goodrick to throw it out, saying, It was as dangerous as a hand-granado in a barrel of gunpowder. Sir Henry Finch for throwing it out; saying, It did include all men. Sir Tho. Clarges for the same, adding, That it was a most dangerous thing, and an indulgence not to inquire who brought it in, for he deserved to be called to the bar. On the other side, there were several members who spoke for the whole proviso, and others to mitigate and take part. Mr. Prynne was for the whole, seconded by Mr. Charlton, who added, That he who said the person who brought it in deserved to be called to the bar, deserved it himself; and moved against those that petitioned against the king, or sat in parliament in the years 1647 and 48, and in the High Court of Justice: Also, against all those who were the contrivers of the Instrument of Government, those that were imposers of taxes under Oliver, major-generals, and decimators; adding, That though he never pressed the death of any man, yet, to secure the future peace of the nation, he could not be silent. Col. King was likewise for receiving the proviso; saying, It was not prudence to set up those in power that now lay under their feet: nor that any in the house who were guilty of such crimes, should plead their own causes.—The mitigators were, first sir Henry Chomley, who moved to take in the Proviso in part. Mr. Trellany was only against major-generals and decimators. Mr. Palmer against all abjurors, major-generals, and High Court of Justice men. Sir Wm. D'Oiley was for referring the proviso to a committee. Mr. Knight urged, That the proviso was too large and not to be mended. Sir Thomas Meeres to amend it, if possible; but he feared it was impossible. But serj. Hales, being for rejecting the whole Proviso, argued, That it was contrary to the king's desire, and even the Act itself, which excepted but 20 persons for pains and penalties; and therefore moved, in order to cement all differences, to reject it. And Mr. Young saying, That though he was not concerned in the proviso, yet he was against it, because it was against the king's desire. Mr. Thomas concluding, That this ought to be laid aside, and to take another something like it. At last the proviso was ordered to be laid aside. But this debate begat another, for col. White immediately moved the house, That any Proviso brought in, read, and nobody owning it, might be laid aside. This was seconded by col. Shapcot and sir George Booth. Mr. Knightley was for owning of it the first time of reading it; Mr. Stevens, to subscribe their names; Mr. Trelany, to cast it out the first reading, if none spoke to it; and though Mr. Charlton argued, That if the gentleman that brought in the Proviso be out of the house, and no one speak to it, then to reject it, yet no Order was made on this motion, says the Diary, nor is there any such thing in the Journals.

* Nye was a leading Independent preacher: "He was put into Dr. Featly's living at Acton, and rode thither every Lord's day in triumph, in a coach drawn with four horses, to exercise there." See Levite's Scourge, 1644, p. 61. "At the Restoration it was debated several hours together, whether Philip Nye and John Goodwin should not be excepted for life, because they had acted so highly (none more so, except Hugh Peters) against the King; and it came at last to this result, That if, after the 1st of September, the same year, they should accept any preferment, they should in law stand as if they had been excepted totally for life." Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 369.

The commons resuming the affair of the Bill of Indemnity, another Proviso was offered; the debate on which was stronger than any we have yet met with; lasting, as the MS. says, above two hours. Col. Jones spoke first, very strongly, to it, in every particular. This Proviso was to cause all Officers, during the Protectorate, to refund their salaries. Particularly aimed against Mr. Prideaux for the post-office; likewise against the High Court of Justice men, the Council and Committee of Safety, commissioners for excise and customs, the trustees for king and queen's lands, dean and chapter's commissioners, with all those that were commissioners of sequestrations, or concerned in the Prize-Office. This motion was seconded by Mr. Prynne, in all its articles; who said also, That he knew those persons had received above 250,000*l.* for their iniquitous doings, and therefore moved that they might be made to refund it. Col. King spoke on the same side very warmly, saying amongst other things, It was fit such sponges should be squeezed.—But this motion for refunding met with a very warm repulse. Sir Tho. Widdrington was the first who pleaded strongly against it. He ended his arguments by saying, That if he was included in the Proviso, he had much better have been wholly excluded the Act. Sir Heneage Finch said, That most of these complaints were already named in the Act, and particularly Accountants excepted, but not their heirs, which this proviso would include. Mr. Stevens said, That those were not accountants, but might be included in the proviso notwithstanding the Act, if some little amendments were made in it. Mr. Charlton said, The proviso might be amended, and moved that it might stand. Sir Wm. D'Oiley was also for receiving the proviso, but to refer it to two or three persons to word it better, and to leave out the Judges. Some other members, spoke for the proviso; but all ineffectual: for several members spoke on the other side of the question, as sir Tho. Clarges, Mr. Young, serj. Littleton, Mr. Bodardo, and Mr. Briscoe, who said, Such rigour would confound men, whereas mercy would convert them. To which Mr. Goodrick, on the same, argued, That the refunding would be to some a greater punishment, than to be one of the 20 excepted persons; and that all the soldiers were included; and, lastly, sir Anth. Ashley Cooper closed the debate, with saying, He might freely speak, because he never received any salary; but he looked upon the proviso as dangerous to the peace of the nation; adding, That it reached gen. Monk, and admiral Montagu, after the house had given them thanks, and thousands besides. On all which the question being called and put, Whether the Proviso should stand or be laid aside, the house divided, when the numbers were, for standing, 151, for the latter, 181.

The last Proviso offered this day, was against such as shall not take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy; to which Mr. Turner added, 'or shall refuse them.' A great debate followed on this also, many members speaking for and against this Proviso. The most remarkable on each side were these, Mr. Trevor, in behalf of the Papists, said It was not fit to make an Oath the price of pardon. Mr. Bamfield was for not imposing the oaths so rigorously; for then, he said, they would force persons, for saving their lives and estates, to damn their souls. Mr. Knight moved to leave out the Oath of Supremacy, and then none would stick at the other. Mr. Hollis moved to consider more of this motion, and to be very tender in imposing oaths; asking, Whether this was intended to destroy all Catholics, which it would infallibly do; that he was as much against Papists as any man, but thought this Proviso was better laid aside.—There were many advocates for the motion; on which side sir Wm. Morrice speaking, said, There seemed to be something lay hid in the opposition to it: which words Mr. Hollis took exception at, because he had spoken against it. On the whole, this proviso was rejected, without a division.

July 6. Another warm debate took place on a Proviso offered to the Bill of Indemnity, which was, To question any Attorney or Solicitor, that acted for the Protector, or in any high court of justice. This was first spoken to by Mr. Prynne, who was for questioning them, and then to leave them to the law for recovery of damages. Several members spoke against this proviso to have it laid aside: till Mr. Charlton moved not to reject it, but to amend it; and particularly moved against one Mr. Ellis, who was solicitor at Dr. Hewitt's Trial. Col. Shapcot spoke against the proviso, and in favour of the Solicitor, and said, Dr. Hewitt did not refer himself in time to the court; for sentence being once given, the solicitor told the doctor the court could not hear him then: to which Mr. Raynesford answered, in behalf of the Solicitor, That he never sat in court but one day, and never said any such word as was laid to his charge. To which Mr. Grey added, That he heard Dr. Hewitt say, If any judge or counsel would say he ought to plead, he would have done it. At last, the question being put, Whether the Proviso should be laid aside, the Speaker gave it for the Ayes; but sir Rob. Brook said the Noes had it; upon which the house dividing, sir Tho. Widdrington said, There were two gentlemen gone out. Several motions ensued on this, to divide the house notwithstanding; and after that it took up an half an hour's debate, Whether the Ayes or Noes should go out; but the Speaker saying the Ayes should, although several old members in the house said the contrary, their numbers were 138 for the Proviso, and 163 against it; so that this also was laid aside.

Debate in the Commons on Religion.] July 9. The grand committee for Religion sat according to order; the debate on which we shall give at large, from the MS. Diary, observing, that now was the contest whether the Presbyterian Church Government, or the Church of England formerly established, should reign.

Sir Trevor Williams opened the debate, by moving for the established Religion, according to the 39 Articles; which he said was not only according to the Old and New Testament, but was as much as all that own Christianity profess.—Several members after him spoke for and against this motion; as, Mr. Gower, Dr. Clayton, col. King, Mr. Broderick, Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Throgmorton; who said, All Protestant Churches did profess according to the Scripture, and moved that the 39 Articles should be inserted in the Bill. Lord Richardson and sir John Northcot, for the same.

Serj. Hales said he was for the 39 Articles; but thought it not fitting to join them with the Old and New Testament, in the same paragraph, but in some other.

Mr. Broderick was for the Articles; saying, He had often conversed with those of several churches abroad, and, that all professed Religions were according to the Scriptures; and moved for a National Synod.

Lord Falkland spoke on the same side, and said, It was not fit to debate the whole Bill in that house, but to leave the doctrinal part to a Synod.

Mr. Peckham was not for altering our Religion without proper judges of it, as by a Synod; and urged a case in a trial in Westminster-Hall, where the judges sent for a falconer about a hawk; saying, 'Quilibet in arte sua;' and therefore moved for a Synod in this case, lest, going further, they should be like little boys, who, learning to swim, go out of their depth and are drowned.

Sir Henage Finch spoke most excellently concerning this subject, and said, That not one letter of the Bill made good the title of it; that the Religion of our church was not to seek, but we have enjoyed it long; and therefore should not now be inquiring for it. However, he moved this should be referred to an Assembly of Divines, for which they ought to petition the king; for he knew no law for altering the government of the Church by Bishops. And, lastly, as for liberty for tender consciences, he said no man knew what it was.

Mr. Prynce spoke very honestly and passionately for the paragraph in the Bill; and concluded with saying, The determination of the Synod must be confirmed by the king and parliament. To whom.

Sir Henage Finch again said, That the original of the paragraph was from Cromwell, and he did hope they would not cant after him; but that, if the faith grounded upon Scripture, and the discipline according to the laws, were put in the paragraph, he then would give his consent to it.

Several more members spoke, till at last it was moved to adjourn it to another time, which was opposed by others; and the committee sat an hour in the dark, before candles were suffered to be brought in, and then they were twice blown out, but the third time they were preserved, though with great disorder; till at last, adds our authority, about ten at night it was voted, "That the king should be desired to convene a select number of Divines to treat concerning that affair, and the committee not to sit again till the 23d of Oct. next."

The Act of Indemnity passes the Commons.] July 11. This day the long-expected Act of Indemnity passed the commons; it was intituled, 'An Act of free and general Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion;' and was ordered to be sent up to the lords.

Debate on the Bill of Sales.] Another Bill of great consequence had been brought into the commons, and read once, called, 'A Bill of Sales.' This was to consider the cases of those who had been purchasers of the king's, queen's, and church's Lands, during the late times of plunder and devastation. And this day the said Bill coming to be read a 2nd time, a Debate arose, of which the MS. Diary gives this abstract:—It was opened by col. Jones, who moved the house against those who had bought the king's Lands and Woods, as also of Deans and Chapters; to examine what money the purchasers had paid for them; but to consider the Soldiers under general Monk at the same time. A Petition from the purchasers of St. James's, and St. Martin's in the Fields, being offered to the house by sir Anth. Irby, col. Shapcot opposed the reading of it there; but moved for a committee to receive Petitions.

Mr. Palmer spoke very high and excellently against the whole Bill; and moved that the king's Lands, as well as those of others, should be restored to them implicitly.

Sir Tho. Wroth seconded this motion, and said, That, as to his own case, whatever he had bought, he did freely give back again, though he had paid 18 years purchase for them.

Mr. Prynne said, That no compensation should be made to those who had bought the king's Lands; that it was against their oaths to suffer it, except to those who were antient tenants, who had bought the same in order to preserve themselves and titles; and, in that case, to petition the king: also to consider those who had purchased land in and about Westminster, which then was worth nought; but, having now built fair houses upon them, the rents amount to a considerable value, and will be so for the future.

Mr. Goodrick spoke also for the old tenants that were forced to buy or be turned out, and to commit the bill. Mr. Barton and Mr. Gewen for a commitment also; but the former was not for confirming any Sale to those who sat after 1648, or High Court of Justice men: the latter urged, That it was the king's interest to have the bill committed. Whether it was that this last assertion stirred up the zeal of another member, or from some other cause,

Mr. Calvady moved to have the bill cast out; or else, if they would commit it, to commit it to the necessary-house above. Which motion, as it might properly enough be called, Mr. Annesley rebuked, as unbecoming such an assembly.

Mr. Stevens argued against the bill, saying, That they ought not to encourage evil-doers; but, instead of confirming estates, to punish the purchasers: he moved also for an act of resumption, wherein they were to be left to the king's mercy; but was for committing the bill.

Mr. Knight was against it; saying, He could not in conscience consent to it, as he should answer at the day of judgment.

Sir Ant. Cope would have all persons in the house to imitate sir Tho. Wroth, and restore their purchased Lands; which, he said, would be a good example to others without.

Mr. Lawther was against the bill; saying, The old proverb was, 'That he that eats the king's goose should be choaked with the feathers'; and that he was against the bill by reason of his oath.

Sir Tho. Meres desired the house not to have a greater care of the king than they had of the church; and said, The purchasers had already paid themselves; and moved for resumption and a grand committee.

Several members were for committing the bill; the last to have all major-generals and rumpers excepted out of the bill: not one member speaking directly in defence of it, except sir Tho. Widdrington, who might be a person deeply interested in its consequences.—

Lord Falkland moved the house in behalf of the Queen, and to refer her case to a committee. Sir Geo. Ryves spoke also in behalf of the Queen, and against the Purchasers; and said, It was not fit the French, who all this while durst not demand the Queen's jointure, should now be suffered to do it; but that they should prevent them, and give her it themselves.—Upon the whole, it was ordered, That all the king's and queen's Lands, Rents and Profits, be left out of the bill; and to be referred to a grand committee of the whole house.

General Monk created Duke of Albemarle.]

July 13. The lord-chancellor informed the house of lords, That his majesty had conferred the honour and title of Duke, of Albemarle on the lord-general Monk; whereupon the house ordered, That he should be introduced between the duke of Buckingham and the marquis of Winchester, the lord great-chamberlain, without robes, Garter king at arms going before him. Being thus brought in, he delivered his patent, on his knees, to the lord-chancellor, who delivering the same to the clerk of parliament, it was publicly read; after which Garter king at arms delivered back the patent to the lord-general Monk; who, by this grant from his majesty, was created 'Baro de Potheridge, Beauchamp et Teya, comes Torrington, et Dux Albemartie.' The ceremony aforesaid being ended, the duke was placed, by Garter, between the duke of Buckingham and the marquis of Winchester. The lords ordered also, That the lord great-chamberlain and the lord Berkley should wait upon his majesty to give him Thanks, from that house, for the honour he had been pleased to confer on the duke of Albemarle; and that he be added to the committee of privileges.

Debate in the Commons on Religion.]

July 16. We have already given, from a MS. Diary, the substance of a debate on Religion, by a Committee of the commons appointed for that purpose. The same authority gives us another, which happened this day.

Sir John Northcot began the debate, by speaking very highly against Deans and Chapters; but spared the Bishops, saying, The former did nothing 'but eat and drink and rise up to play,' or something worse: upon which Mr. — stood up and reproved him; but he was justified by sir Walter Erle.

Mr. Prynne said, He could not be for bishops, unless they would derive their power from the king, and not vaunt themselves to be Jure Divino.

Mr. Walpole was for putting the question, Which was the Protestant Faith, according to the scriptures and the government of the Church, and according to law.

Mr. Knightley was for the clergy in general, saying, The faults of private persons ought not to make the function criminal.

Sir Tho. Widdrington said, The question, as it was, was not for a committee, or even a parliament; but moved to make two questions of it.

Mr. Grove said, The question was complicated, and desired that the first part might be put; adding, That the king was then consulting with divines about the discipline of the Church.

Dr. Clayton said, That discipline was as necessary with doctrine, as life in a natural body.

Mr. Stephens said, The first part of the question they should all agree in; but, for the second, not to anticipate the king, who was, at that time, consulting about it.

Mr. Howard, argued for the whole question. He said, That as monarchy had been so long interrupted by rebellion and faction, so had episcopacy by schism and heresy; and that no one that spoke against episcopacy offered any thing better.

Mr. Young was for dividing, and not to mix the doctrine and discipline together; yet, he said, he was for episcopacy, though he did not think it an article of faith: and urged the king's Declaration for tender consciences formerly, and his present endeavours for settling of peace amongst all people.

Sir John Temple argued for a division of the question, saying, the former discipline was the occasion of their former troubles; and moved for a synod.

Col. King said, That no man could tell what the discipline according to law was; and therefore moved to divide the question.

Mr. Throgmorton spoke highly for Bishops, saying, That, except Scotland, there was scarce any Reformed Church but what had Bishops.

Mr. Bunckley said, He thought a moderate episcopacy might take in the good of both parties; and urged the king's present inclinations and endeavours for it: that episcopacy, in its extent, was more boundless than monarchy; adding, That some of the Bishops gloried in putting down all lectures in a country, and it was a fault to preach twice a day; but concluded, That government by episcopacy, if circumscribed, was to be wished; and moved to divide the question.

Sir Heneage Finch said, The first part was not to be put singly, after 140 years practice.

Sir John Talbot said, Those that formerly desired to hasten the Settlement of Religion, now strove to obstruct the question.

Sir Gilbert Gerrard said, He could not give his vote for the question, until he knew whether it was against the Covenant. This was seconded by col. Shapcot, who argued, That many things in the Liturgy might be amended; and hoped that men would not be imposing on other's consciences: that he was not against Bishops, but their power; and moved to divide the question.

Sir Tho. Wharton said, He was in his judgment episcopal; but moved the question might not be put at present, because the king was in consultation about it.

Mr. Bunckley, again, was now for laying the whole question aside; because, he said, If it was put and carried, all ministers made since 1648 would be abolished.

Sir John Northcot again moved in behalf of the ministry, and said, Many of those who were ordained by Presbyters, were active in bringing in the king.

Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper said, Our Religion was too much mixed with interest; neither was it ripe enough now to handle that subject; and moved that this debate be now laid aside, and the whole committee adjourned for 3 months.—After 7 hours debate, about 10 at night, it was at last agreed to refer the matter to the king, and to such divines as he should please to chuse; and, to adjourn this Committee to the 23d of October next.

The Earl of Bristol's Speech on the Bill of Indemnity.] July 20. The lords adjourned themselves into a committee, to consider of the Bill of Indemnity; and, after some time, the house was resumed, but no report was made of their proceedings therein as yet.—At the same time, the lords received a quickening Message from the commons to hasten the dispatch of that Bill; and another for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings: alledging these two reasons for it, That, unless the latter Bill be passed, there can be no Assizes kept, tho' they are appointed; and, unless the former be the same, the animosities of the people will be increased, and thereby the peace of the kingdom greatly disturbed.—On the receipt of this Message the lords went again into a committee on the Bill of Indemnity; and the house being resumed, the lord Roberts reported the opinion of the committee was, That all those persons who gave Sentence of Death upon the late king, or signed the Warrant for his murder, shall be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity: and, that to know who those persons are, the original evidences shall be desired from the house of commons for their lordships information: which opinion the house confirmed.—In the debate, this day, on the above Bill,

The Earl of *Bristol addressed their lord in these words: "My lords; Being to speak unto your lordships somewhat more extendedly than what is my use, and upon a subject wherein there may be, perhaps, not only difference, but even fervour of opinions, I find myself obliged, by somewhat that happened to me here the other day, to beg a favour of your

* London, printed in the year 1660. "The earl of Bristol was a man of courage and learning, of a bold temper, and a lively wit, but of no judgment nor steadiness. He was in the queen's interest during the war at Oxford. And he studied to drive things past the possibility of a treaty, or any reconciliation; fancying that nothing would make the military men so sure to the king, as his being sure to them, and giving them hopes of sharing the confiscated estates among them, whereas, he thought, all discourses of treaty made them feable and fearful. When he went beyond sea he turned Papist. But it was after a way of his own: for he loved to magnify the difference between the Church and the Court of Rome. He was esteemed a very good speaker; but he was too copious, and too florid. He was set at the head of the Popish party, and was a violent enemy of the earl of Clarendon." Burnet, vol. i. p. 101.

lordships, that, if I should chance to err in forms and orders of the house, or that there should slip from me, unawares, any expression that may be dissonant to the ears of those who understand better than I the force and propriety of words, you will not be severe unto me; but be pleased to consider, that I have been 16 years out of my country, and in a profession far different from what I am now a-doing: in confidence of this indulgence I shall proceed.—My lords; you have here before you, in this Bill of Indemnity, the most important business that, perhaps, the house of peers hath at any time had in deliberation; it is that upon which the honour or eternal reproach of the nation abroad, and its happiness or confusion at home, seems (next under God's inscrutable providence) most principally to depend: for, on the one side, how abhorred a nation must we be to all others, if the infamy of our sovereign's murder should not be thoroughly washed away, by justice, in the blood of the guilty? And, on the other, what happiness or quiet can we hope for at home; nay, what new combustions ought we not to apprehend, if the criminal and the misled, (between whom the eye of the law can make little distinction) making up so numerous a part of the nation, their fears, which might urge them to new crimes, should not be secured, by the firmest assurances of impunity? Punishing and securing are, certainly, the two principal ends of this Bill; and wherein, as certainly, every one of your lordships doth concur; but whether the means of attaining those ends have been sufficiently lighted upon by the house of commons, in this Bill, that, I suppose, is the present question; and wherein I think myself in duty obliged to express unto your lordships, with freedom and sincerity, my judgment, in all humble submission unto yours.—As for that part of the Bill which relates to our sovereign's murder, I find it so short, and so much out of the way of what we owe, both to the severity and solemnity of that revenge, that I cannot but think it, in some sort, (pardon the expression) a profanation of the due right of that sacred expiation, to handle it in the same Bill, promiscuously, with other more vulgar things. My motion therefore shall be, That there be forthwith a committee appointed, to consider of all things fit to be done, for the washing away of that stain from the nation, and from the age wherein we live; and to draw up an Act purposely and solely for that end. In confidence that this motion will either be embraced by your lordships, or that, if it be opposed, I shall have the liberty to fortify it by my reasons, I shall set that business apart, and apply my discourse to what concerns this bill, in all other relations; in which I shall not make nice to tell your lordships, that I think it defective in many things reasonable, and redundant in some things unreasonable; and yet, notwithstanding, not only my humble motion; but my most earnest pressure, as far as with humility I may, shall be, That we may proceed immediately to the passing of this Bill, with little or no alteration.—This, my lords, may appear a surprising motion from a person thought to be, as indeed I am, as much inflamed as any man living with indignation at the detestable proceedings of the late usurped power, so pernicious to the public, and so injurious to my own particular; in whom the motion may seem yet more surprising, when I shall have told you, with truth, that I am irreparably ruined in my fortune for my loyalty, if this Bill of Indemnity to others for their disloyalty, should pass as it is here offered unto your lordships: but the ground I go upon is this received maxim, as to all public sanctions, Better a mischief than an inconvenience; yea, better innumerable mischiefs to particular persons and families, than one heavy inconvenience to the public.—My lords; I profess unto you I find myself set on fire, when I think that the blood of so many virtuous and meritorious peers, and persons, and others of all ranks, so cruelly and impiously shed, should cry so loud for vengeance, and not find it from us. That many of the wickedest and meanest of the people should remain, as it were, rewarded for their treasons, rich and triumphant in the spoils of the most eminent in virtue and loyalty, of all the nobility and gentry of the kingdom. What generous spirit can make reflection on these things, and not find his heart burn into rage within him? Here it is, my lords, that we sufferers have need of all our philosophy. But when I consider that these are mischiefs only to the sufferers, and that, to insist upon a remedy, might perhaps expose the public to an irreparable inconvenience, I think God I find, in an instant, all my resentments calmed and submitted to my primary duty.—My lords; we have here in our view a kingdom tossed, and rolling still with the effects of past tempests; and though, God be thanked, the storm be miraculously ceased, we cannot say that the danger is, until we get into still water: that still, that smooth water is only to be found in the generality's security from their guilty fears, and in the two houses' union between themselves, and with their sovereign. Whether the latter may not be endangered, if we should enter into controversy upon the particulars of this Bill, I leave unto your lordships to judge. But, certainly, as to the former, there can be hopes of raising militias, or disbanding armies, or of settling that happiness and tranquility which we all sigh for, of being governed under our gracious sovereign by the antient and known laws of the land, whilst universal fears shall subsist by the delay in passing this Bill.—My lords; I shall sum up unto your lordships my whole drift in a few words. I think that, in this Bill, there are many things wanting, which solid and important reasons would require to be added, and many things inserted into it, which justice to his majesty's interest, and to particular persons, would require to be omitted, or rectified: but, I conceive, at the same time, that the mischiefs of the delay in passing it, do far outweigh all the advantages of improving it. My lords, I shall conclude my discourse, and your lordships trouble, with the application, to this purpose, of a memorable saying of that illustrious minister, the cardinal Mazarine, at a council in the wars of France, whereunto I had the honour to be called. It was, That in the great affairs of the world, he had not known any thing do more hurt than these two words, faisons mieux, let us do better: for, said he, whilst good wits endeavour, by debates, to bring good councils to a greater perfection, they do, for the most part, lose the opportunity of timing things rightly; which, in great actions, is of far more importance than the preference, according to refined reason, betwixt good and better. Upon this ground, my conclusion is, That that part which concerns the king's death, being put in the way proposed, we should proceed to the speedy passing of this Bill, without losing any time in emendations; but if we be destined to so fatal a loss, by ravelling into particulars, I shall, in that case, desire leave to offer unto your lordships therein my reflections also."

July 28. The lords made an Order, That the lieutenant of the Tower should examine colonel Hacker, touching the original Warrant* for execution of the late king, who soon after came down to the house, and acquainted their lordships, That he had examined the colonel, and that he confessed he had the Warrant at his house in the country, and that he believes it agrees with what was printed. But his wife and family being in town, he could not get it, without sending her down to fetch it. Hereupon the lords ordered, That the wife should go into the country to fetch the Warrant, and that the gentleman-usher of that house should send a man with her for that purpose.—The lieutenant of the Tower also acquainted the lords, That he had asked colonel Hacker if he knew the person that executed the late king, and he told him he heard it was a major, but did not know his name; but he would endeavour to find it out.

The lords ordered Lists to be made out from the Journal that came from the house of commons, of all those persons concerned in the Murder of the late king. After the reading of the said Lists, an Order was made, That all those in the beforesaid Lists should be absolutely excepted out of the Act of Indemnity; and that all their persons should be forthwith secured.

July 27. The duke of Ormond † was in-

* For a Copy of the Warrant, see vol. iii. p. 1280.

† "After the earl of Clarendon, the man next in favour with the king, was the duke of Ormond; a man every way fitted for a Court: of a graceful appearance, a lively wit, and a cheerful temper: a man of great expence, decent even in his vices, for he always kept up the form of religion. He had gone through introduced into the house of lords, by the stile and title of baron of Lanthony, and earl of Brecknock.

The King's Speech to the Lords relative to the Act of Indemnity.] This day, the King came down the house of lords, and made the following Speech to them:

"My lords: When I came first hither to you, which was within two or three days after I came to Whitehall, I did, with as much earnestness as I could, both by myself and the chancellor, recommend to you and the house of commons, the speedy dispatch of the Act of Indemnity, as a necessary foundation of that security we all pray for. I did since, by a particular Message to the house of commons, again press them to hasten that important work; and did likewise, by a Proclamation, publish to all the kingdom, That I did with impatience expect, that that Act should be presented to me for my assent, as the most reasonable and solid foundation of that peace, happiness, and security, I hope and pray for, to myself, and all my dominions. I will not deny it to you, I thought the house of commons too long about that work, and therefore, now it is come up to you, I would not have you guilty of the same delay. I thank God, I have the same intentions and resolutions now I am here with you, which I had at Breda; and I believe that I owe my being here to God's blessing upon the intentions and resolutions I then expressed to have. I will read to you what I then said. 'And to the end that the fear of punishment may not engage any, conscious to themselves of what is passed, to a perseverance in guilt for the future, by opposing the quiet and happiness of their country in the Restoration both of king, peers, and people, to their just, antient, and fundamental rights, we do by these presents, declare, That we do grant a free and general Pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to pass under our great seal of England, to all our subjects, of what degree or quality soever, who, within 40 days after the pub-many transactions in Ireland with more fidelity than success. He had made a treaty with the Irish, which was broken by the great body of them, though some few of them adhered still to him. But the whole Irish nation did still pretend, that, though they had broke the agreement first, yet he, or rather the king in whose name he had treated with them, was bound to perform all the articles of the treaty. He had miscarried so in the siege of Dublin, that it very much lessened the opinion of his military conduct. Yet his constant attendance on his master, his easiness to him, and his great sufferings for him, raised him to be Lord Steward of the Household, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He was firm to the Protestant Religion, and so firm to the laws, that he always gave good advices: but when bad ones were followed, he was not for complaining too much of them." Burnet, vol. i. p. 95.

‘lishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall, by any public Act, declare their doing so: and that they return to the loyalty and obedience of good subjects, excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by parliament. Those only excepted, let all our loving subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the word of a king, solemnly given by this present Declaration, That no crime whatsoever committed against us or our royal father, before the publication of this, shall ever rise in judgment, or be brought in question, against any of them, to the least endamagement of them, either in their lives, liberties, or estates, or (as far forth as lays in our power) so much as to the prejudice of their reputations, by any reproach, or term of distinction from the rest of our best subjects. We desiring and ordaining, that henceforward all notes of discord, separation, and difference of parties be utterly abolished among all our subjects, whom we invite and conjure to a perfect union among themselves under our protection, for the re-settlement of our just rights and theirs, in a free parliament; by which, upon the word of a king, we will be advised.’ My lords, if you do not join with me in extinguishing this fear, which keeps the hearts of men awake, and apprehensive of safety and security, you keep me from performing my promise, which if I had not made, I am persuaded neither I nor you had been now here. I pry let us not deceive those who brought, or permitted, us to come together. I knew well there were some men who could neither forgive themselves, or be forgiven by us; and I thank you for your justice towards those, the immediate murderers of my father: and I will deal truly with you, I never thought of excepting any other. I pray think well upon what I have offered, and the benefit you and I have received from that offer, and encourage and oblige all other persons, by not excluding them from the benefit of this Act. This mercy and indulgence is the best way to bring them to a true repentance, and to make them more severe to themselves, when they find we are not so to them. It will make them good subjects to me, and good friends and neighbours to you; and then we have all our ends, and you shall find this the securest expedient to prevent future mischief. Therefore I do earnestly desire and conjure you to depart from all particular animosities and revenge, or memory of past provocations, and that you will pass this Act, without other exceptions, than of those who were immediately guilty of that murder of my father.—My lords, I have told you my opinion, and I hope you will be of the same. If any persons appear of such dangerous and obstinate principles, that the peace of the kingdom cannot be preserved whilst they have liberty in it, some other course may be taken, that they shall not be able to do hurt; and I assure you, there is nothing can enable them to do so much harm, as the deferring the passing this Act—I hope I need say nothing of Ireland, and that they alone shall not be without the benefit of my mercy. They have shewed much affection to me abroad, and you will have a care of my honour, and of what I have promised to them. I do again conjure you, that you will use all expedition in the dispatch of this Bill.”

July 28. The king came again to the house, of lords in order to pass some Bills that then lay ready for the royal assent. The commons being sent for as usual, and come up; their Speaker presented his majesty with two Bills; one, For a Grant of Tonnage and Poundage; the other, For a Continuance of Excise. After which, he made a short speech to the king, to this effect: “That it never was the custom of parliaments to charge the people with payments, until their liberties and grievances were first confirmed and redressed; yet, out of the greatest trust and confidence that ever subjects had in a prince, the house of commons did now go out of their old way, and had now supplied his majesty’s necessities with the greatest gift that ever prince of this kingdom had ever given him by his people.”—The Bills were then read by the clerk of parliament, and passed the royal assent.

The King’s Message releasing all Arrears to the Crown.] July 30. The lords continuing to go into a committee every day, on the Bill of Indemnity, it was ordered, That the lord-chamberlain should go and acquaint his majesty with the great sums of money in Arrears in the Court of Wards, which are mentioned in the Act of Indemnity; and to know his majesty’s pleasure therein. The next day, the said lord brought back from the king the following Answer in writing:—

“C. R. His majesty is very well informed of the value of these Concessions, which are to pass in the Act of Indemnity, which relate intirely to his majesty’s profit, and which have little or no relation to the war: he knows well that the Arrears of the wars, the Licences of Alienation, and Alienations without Licence, Purveyance, Respite of Homage, the Arrears of Rent still in the hands of the tenants, and the other particulars, amount to a great and vast sum; all which are released and discharged by this Act. But his majesty is so well satisfied of the good affection of his house of commons, and of their intentions and resolutions to settle such a Revenue upon his majesty as may preserve the crown from want, and from being undervalued by his neighbours; that he is resolved not to insist upon any particulars which the house of commons desired his majesty should release: and therefore, as his majesty thanks the house of peers for the information they have given him, and for the care they have expressed of his majesty’s profit, so he is well contented that that clause shall pass in such manner as the house of commons hath set down: and continues his earnest desire, that all expedition be used in passing the said Act in the manner he hath formerly expressed.

This Answer the lords thought proper to communicate to the commons at a conference; who immediately appointed a large committee to sit and consider of settling such a Revenue on his majesty, as should maintain the splendour and grandeur of his kingly office, and preserve the crown from want, and from being undervalued by his neighbours.

Further Proceedings of the Lords on the Bill of Indemnity. Aug. 1. The lords continued to scrutinize very closely into the principal actors of the late King's death; and this day col. Tomlinson, who commanded the guard at St. James's, and conducted the king to Whitehall, was examined; but by the evidence of Mr. Seymour, a member of the other house, who said that the late king told him, That the colonel did carry himself civilly towards his majesty in all respects, therefore their lordships, because it did not appear that the said col. signed the bloody Warrant; acquitted him, and ordered him to be left out of the List of excepted names in the Act of Indemnity.

The lord Roberts reported, from the committee on the said Act, That it was their opinion that col. Hacker, sir Henry Vane, sir Arthur Haslerig, col. Lambert, and col. Axtell, should be wholly exempted out of the Bill of Indemnity. Then was read the rest of the Clause, wherein the aforesaid persons were named in the Bill; and the question being put, Whether this clause should be left out of the Bill, it was carried in the affirmative.

August 2. The lords reported, from the committee on the Bill of Indemnity, that their further opinion was, That if any of the persons following, viz. Wm. Lenthall, Wm. Hurton, Oliver St. John, col. Wm. Sydenham, col. Desborough, John Blackwell, Christ. Pack, Rd. Keeble, Ch. Fleetwood, John Pyne, Rd. Deane, maj. Creed, Philip Nye, John Goodwin, col. Corbet, and John Ireton, shall hereafter accept, or exercise, any office, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, or any other public employment, within this kingdom, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed, or in Ire-

* "Secretary Nicholas was a man of general good reputation with all men, of unquestionable integrity and long experience in the service of the crown; whom the late king trusted as much as any man to his death. He was one of those who were excepted by the parliament from pardon or composition, and so was compelled to leave the kingdom shortly after Oxford was delivered up, when the king was in the hands of the Scots. The present king continued him in the office of secretary of state, which he had so long held under his father. He was a man of great gravity, and without any ambitious or private designs; and had a just friendship with the chancellor (Clarendon) for many years." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 4.

land, that then such person or persons that do so accept or execute as aforesaid, shall, to all intents and purposes in law, stand as if he or they had been totally excepted by name in this house.—All which the lords agreed to.

August 9. The lord Roberts reported from the above committee, That it was their opinion all those who sat in any High Court of Justice shall be made incapable of bearing any office, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, within this kingdom, &c. And that all such persons shall be liable to such further penalties as by any future act of parliament may be inflicted upon them, not extending to life; which the house confirmed.

The Commons urge the Lords again to pass it. Notwithstanding the diligence the lords used to finish this business, yet the king and the house of commons thought them very slow in the matter. This day the commons sent up a Message to the lords to desire a conference with them on matters of importance: which being granted, and the lords returned, the lord-chancellor made the following Report of it, viz.—“That the house of commons desired earnestly the keeping of a good correspondence between the two houses, and to acquaint their lordships, That they had sent up several Bills to charge the people of this kingdom with Payments, contrary to former precedents of parliaments before Acts of Grace; for, as yet, there had been no such Act of Grace and Pardon to satisfy their representatives: and as we had a king, exceeding his predecessors in goodness and grace towards his people, so, the house of commons say, they have exceeded in their duty and proceedings beyond all former parliaments: that they had brought up divers Bills of great and public concernment to the king and the whole kingdom; as, the Bill of Indemnity, the Bill of Judicial Proceedings, one for Confirmation of Magna Charta; and the subjects cannot go on in cheerfully paying their taxes, until the passing these Bills, especially that of Indemnity, which the houses have been so pressed for; first, by his majesty's Letter from Breda, and his Speech and Message, to give Expedition to.—And the house of commons further say, That they have such great and urgent occasions for present Monies, that they must be forced to desire a Loan of 100,000*l.* of the city of London, wherein they desire their lordships concurrence; but they had little hopes to obtain it, in regard of their fears, by the not passing the aforesaid Bill: that they had that day received a Message from the King concerning providing of Money speedily, for the Army and the Navy, who are in great necessity for money; there being 24 ships lately come into harbour for want of provisions, which cannot be got without money; also, for want of passing the Bill of Judicial Proceedings, the Judges cannot go their circuits, whereby the subjects suffer in their properties, estates, and lives; therefore the commons desired their lordships to give all possible expedition to the aforesaid Bills.”

After the hearing of this Remonstrance, the lords went into a committee on the Indemnity Bill; and, being resumed, the lord Roberts reported from them, That the opinion of the committee was, That, for the more speedy dispatch of this Bill, no further Addition or Exception shall be made to it, unless in the business of Ireland; which opinion was confirmed by the house.

The Lords pass the Indemnity Bill, with many Amendments.] August 10. The lords passed the Bill of Indemnity, with divers Amendments and Alterations; and ordered it to be sent down to the commons for their concurrence; as were, a few days after, the Bills for Poll Money and for Confirmation of all Judicial Proceedings.

Debate in the Commons, whether the Money Bill should precede the Act of Grace.] Before we proceed with the business of the house of lords, it is necessary to look back a little into the proceedings of the commons, after they had sent up the Bill of Indemnity.—And, first, we find in the MS. Diary so often quoted, That, on the 27th ult. when the commons had prepared the Money Bill, and it only waited for the royal assent, a motion was made by Mr. Annesley, for carrying it up; on which

Sir John Northcot said, That his duty to his king, and his love for his country, made a conflict within him; and desired the Bill for Money might not be carried up before the Act of Indemnity was passed: to which

Mr. Pierrepont answered. That, notwithstanding the lords delay, yet they ought not to stop the Money Bill; considering the great occasion the state had for money; and moved, rather to desire the king to quicken the lords.

Sir George Downing said, That it was not proper to distrust the king, but to pass the Bill for Money, without making conditions with him; and leave it to his majesty to hasten on the Bill of Indemnity.—Col. King and col. Jones spoke for sending up the Money Bill, and to trust the king.

Mr. Secretary Morrice said, That they were afraid of their own fears; for fear did take things as they might happen; that they should have charity; and charity with reverence to princes; that, after having the king home without conditions, they should not then distrust him: adding, that confidence was the greatest obligation; that he had commands from the king to speed the Bill of Indemnity; but that they should shew their duty, and trust their king.

Sir Henry Mungford said, He could not be jealous of his majesty, but the lords gave great cause for jealousy, in retarding the Bill so long; and desired the king might be moved to quicken them.

Mr. Hollis next said, If he thought the stopping the Bill of Indemnity, at present, was meant to injure the subject, he would not open his mouth for the Money Bill; but, as he was assured the king would do, and had done, all he could to hasten the Bill of Indemnity, if after this, it stop only at the house of lords, the commons had acquitted themselves.

Mr. Prynne moved against the delay of the lords in other bills, as well as the last; especially in that against priests and jeuits: and, after all, it was voted, That the Bill for Money should pass; and the king be desired to appoint a time when the house should wait upon him with this and other Bills for the royal assent. At the same time, the members of the privy council and others, who were appointed to carry up this Message, were also to represent to his majesty, "That although Acts of Grace ever preceded Acts for Money, yet the house of commons had such confidence and assurance in his majesty's grace and goodness, that they do present the Bill for Money first, and shall wait his majesty's pleasure for speeding the Act of Grace."

This Message was carried to the king by Mr. Hollis, and others; and, at their return, Mr. Hollis reported the King's Answer to the Message, which was in these words: "That, if he knew his own heart, he took this kindness of the house so kindly, that he knew not how to be revenged of it; and, for the confidence they had in him, he only desired this, that they would retain it until he deceived them." And then he appointed the next day at 11 o'clock. (What was then done, at the king's coming to the house of lords, is already given at p. 90).

Debate in the Commons on the Ministers' Bill.] July 30. A Bill for settling and restoring Ministers in their Ecclesiastical Livings and Promotions, was read a 2nd time; and on which a long debate ensued, for which we are solely indebted, as well as for the former, to our MS. Diary.

Serj. Littleton moved against this bill, because, he said, it was to continue all scandalous Ministers out, and not remove all scandalous ones that were in.

Sir Wm. Wheeler was for committing the bill, and to refer the consideration of their characters to the justices of the peace in their respective counties.

Mr. Palmer was for stopping all extravagant preaching.

Sir Tho. Clarges moved against one Bond, a preacher, that writ a Book to justify the King's Murder, and produced the book.

Mr. Prynne moved to send for Bond; which was ordered.

Mr. Thurland moved, that all those who were to be continued, should read the 39 Articles.

Sir Tho. Meres seconded this motion; and spoke against the Triers at Whitehall, who put persons of un baptistical principles into good livings; saying, They would put any body into mean livings; but none but those of their own humour into a great one.

Mr. Swinfen spoke for the bill; and that those who have now two livings may have but one; the present possessor to enjoy till Mich. aelmas; and not to impose all the Articles upon them; but only such as concern doctrine and not discipline; saying, It was too grating to the conscience. He moved also to bring the Bill in again by a committee speedily.

Sir Heneage Finch said, The Bill was not brought in according to the Votes of the committee; and moved against all such Ministers as will not conform to the laws of the land; saying, They could not punish the papists with any justice, if they did not punish their own Ministers for refusing to be regulated according to law. He added, That there was not a line in the Bill which provided against the scandalous, who were then incumbents; but that there was one against the ejected, and against those also who had two benefices. Lastly, he moved against all those Ministers who were presented against the consent of the patron, and were allowed to have grace but no allegiance: not to confirm any such; nor abate one of the 39 Articles, or the Oaths, to those that should stay in, but to leave them to their several patrons to be prosecuted according to law.

Mr. Prynne was for all Ministers to take the oaths; but their presentations to be good throughout, though not by the right patrons, in times of trouble.

Sir John Masham was for setting aside the whole Bill, or bringing in another; saying, That it was needless, or unjust, to confirm those persons in their livings against the patrons; and, having voted the king all his lands and appurtenances, this confirmation would contradict that act.

Mr. Allen was not for taking care of the patron if he neglected to present within six months; but, if he did, he said it was fitting there should be care taken to name very choice men, in the respective counties, to examine the matter, what sort of men they presented.

Sir John Bowyer said, There was before the house what was fit and what was just to be done; that he was for the just; and moved for the Oaths and the 39 Articles to be taken and subscribed by all priests; but moved, more especially, against those who were instrumental against the king.

Mr. Trevor spoke next, for mixing prudence with justice, and restoring all those who were truly deserving to their benefices: but yet to consider those who are in, that were as deserving too. He moved also against patrons, pro hac vice, and said, There was no provision in the Bill against those who are scandalous, and were then in.

Mr. Charlton spoke against the referring the Bill to a committee, but to refer it to the law; so as to let every man then in possession continue so, if he can prove the right owner scandalous; but, if he do not, then to be liable to arrears: He hoped the house would not be more cruel than Harry 8th, who allowed his turned-out priests maintenance for their lives; and therefore moved for all arrears of fifts only to be restored; but that no one man that was a Trier, and had a living then given him, should enjoy it.

Mr. Hungerford was for prudence and moderation, and committing the bill.

Mr. Thomas was for none to have the benefit of their livings that would not conform to the law; nor that justices or commissioners should be any judges of this business, but refer all to the law.

Mr. Stephens, was for restoring the orthodox, and against the scandalous; saying, He knew one that said, 'The Devil take the flock so he had the fleece;' and was for having six orthodox divines to join with the commissioners.

Mr. Barton was for having all to take the Oaths and read the Articles; but none to stay in that would not conform to the law; also to have some divines joined to the commissioners.

The Indemnity Bill sent down by the Lords to the Commons: Their Debate upon it. August 11. After a long debate, the Bill of Indemnity was brought down from the lords with several Amendments and Alterations. The commons went immediately upon it; and, first, voted to agree with the lords for pardoning the Arrears of Papists on Sequestration, and Mr. Thurloe. Upon the lords excepting all the King's Judges, sir George Booth stood up in behalf of those who came in upon the Proclamation: he produced two Papers in favour of the lord Grey of Grooby, to testify his penitence for his being against the king, and moved to have his name left out of the Bill. Col. King moved to agree with the lords in excepting all. Sir John Bowyer was for adhering to his former vote. Sir Heneage Finch was not for adhering wholly, nor for agreeing; but, to save all, he was for banishing those who were not executed. Sir Anth. Irby moved for a conference with the lords, concerning those that surrendered. Mr. Annesley was for adhering to those that came in, and a conference for the rest. In the end, it was voted to adhere to those that surrendered.

Aug. 13. The debate was re-assumed. The house agreed with the lords in pardoning sir Gilbert Pickering and Tho. Lister, esq.; and for the other 24 in that classis, it was carried to adhere to their former Vote about them, as to pains, &c. Voted also, To agree with the lords to except col. Hacker for life; which they had added to the Bill. A question was put, Whether to agree with the lords in pardoning Mr. Lenthall, and the other 15 in that classis, the house divided upon it; when the Yeas carried it by 197 against 102.—Another question was then started, Whether to agree with the lords about the excepting of Lambert, Vane, Haslerig, and Axtell, or to adhere to their former Vote, as to pains and penalties not extending to life; voted to adhere. Col. Scrope, whom the lords had also excepted, was voted to come off for a year's value of his estate. Col. Wauton, with the others of that classis, whom the lords had condemned for life, the commons reprieved for pains and penalties: but then they voted, That all the foregoing persons, as well as those who sat in any high court of justice, should never bear any office, civil or military, in the kingdom. In this debate the Diary informs us, That col. Shapcot, speaking in favour of the High Court of Justice men, was charged by col. Jones with being one himself. To which Shapcot replied, That if col. Jones was not careful of other men's credit, he desired he would be so of his own; and denied that he ever sat in any.

Conference between the two Houses, concerning the Indemnity Bill.] Aug. 16. The Bill of Indemnity, with such Alterations as the commons thought fit to make in the Amendments of the lords, had been returned to that house; and this day their lordships sent to desire a free and speedy conference about it: which being agreed to and ended, the commons ordered, That the Report of this conference should be made to them the next day. Accordingly,

Aug. 17. Sir Heneage Finch reported, That according to the commands of this house, the committee attended the lords at a Conference yesterday; and that the substance of the said Conference was as followeth:

“ That the matter thereof was about the Bill of Indemnity: to shew wherein they did adhere to their former Amendments; and wherein they do agree with the Alterations made by this house.—That the lord Finch did manage the conference for the house of peers; and was pleased to tell us, in the first place, That in the Clause concerning Ireland they were willing to agree with this house, with some amendments;—(which the reporter did particularly open; and are specified in a Paper, then delivered to be communicated to this house;—and these being agreed, it will comprehend their agreeing to some other words in the Bill, touching his majesty's dominions.—His lordship told us, That, to that clause, which concerns several persons that were Judges of his late majesty, they adhered, as they formerly sent it down; that is, to the blotting out of that Clause, whereby they were reserved to future penalties; and to the excepting of them for life, for which he offered some reasons, That though it be true we are now upon an Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, yet, they hoped, we would not make it an Act of Oblivion of our duty to God, the king, and the safety and honour of the kingdom.—He took notice, That this kingdom having now arrived to a miracle of preservation when the pit of destruction was open, and the privileges thereof, in all the parts of them, invaded; when the Murder of the King had been committed, against all the laws of God and man: this ought to stir up in us a sense more than ordinary; and, therefore, he thought it fit for us to consider our duty to the king, a gracious prince, and a prince endeared to us by the miraculous preservation of his person by the hand of Heaven; a prince that had suffered great afflictions, like Joseph in Egypt, lying long in fetters; and that such as entered into his soul, like David, when he was hunted as a partridge in the wilderness; and that had received deliverance like to that of David's and Joseph's, being both in the 30th year of their age: and the afflictions that beset this good king, were the effects of the counsels of these unen that are now in question.—He said, We are next to consider the Safety of the kingdom: their lordships did not think it fit nor safe for this kingdom, that they should live: here they cannot live, nor abroad with safety; for danger to a kingdom is not always within doors: their life may give them opportunity of tampering to the working of mischief abroad. Then for the honour of the kingdom; first, in point of justice, blood requires blood; and he instanced in the Gibeonites, the shedding of their blood could not be expiated but by the shedding of blood.—He took notice, That his majesty's honour was concerned in the infamy, which the shedding of that royal blood hath brought upon this nation, in the eyes of foreign nations; and that this is the only opportunity to take it off.—He took notice of an objection, from the Proclamation, issued by his majesty, on the desire of both houses; and, before he gave Answer to that, he observed the wonderful moderation the king and house of peers had shewed in their proceeding towards the punishment of offenders at this time. His lordship observed, That to petition to bring a king to justice; to summon him to justice; to sit upon him, when he was summoned to justice; and to abuse the people by suggestions that might lead them to approve this action, made them so criminal, as none could excuse them: these proceedings were all high treason in themselves; and yet all these are pretermitted in the Act of Oblivion: these are those who murdered his royal father; those that sentenced him, and signed the Warrant: which moderation he made use of to shew, that they might have been more strict in this case. And to the objection from the Proclamation, he said, Something sure was intended by it: but, first, the Proclamation was but negative in the words of it; and that which can be gathered from it, is only implications out of a negative. He took notice how the Proclamation runs; first, ‘ That because divers persons are fled from justice, that they cannot be brought to a legal trial, therefore they are summoned to re-ader themselves: Whence it was argued, that the meaning thereof was suitable to the recital, ‘ To bring them to Justice.’ He observed, That this Proclamation calls in, among the rest, Lisle and Say: it might have added Baxter and Scott; and yet none will say it intended to pardon them: therefore, he gathered, there could not be supposed an absolute intention in that Proclamation to pardon all that came in upon it: for the very persons instanced in, had they come in, had yet not been pardoned. He observed, That the Proclamation says, they must come in, under pain of being excepted from pardon and indemnity, for life and estate; and that we ourselves had resolved to confiscate their estates, notwithstanding the rendering of themselves; and thence his lordship argued thus: If it be just to take away their estates, it is as just to take away their Lives: If it be not just to take away their lives, then it is not just to take away their estates.—His lordship said farther, If these persons, thus excepted for life and estate, should, by us, be not excepted for life, but subjected only to future penalties, then the consequence would be, that we shall adhere to the pardon of some to life, who are more guilty a great deal than some of the persons whom we have excepted for life; some of them having been at all the sittings on the king, diligent attendants thereon all the while; some of them designing the place of slaughter before his own house. It is true, he said, the thrones of kings are established by judgment and mercy; but mercy had been shewed already, and nothing remains now for support of his throne but justice: And therefore his lordship concluded this point with advice, 'Let the wickedness of these men fall on their own heads; but let the throne of our king be established for ever.'—To the exception of the 4 persons that follow in the Clause concerning Vane, Lambert, &c. they also adhere, that they should stand excepted for life: His lordship said, indeed they were not excepted as murderers; but he took notice, that the king, of whose wisdom none can or doth doubt, and of whose wisdom, he knows, this house hath as great a veneration as any, his majesty himself, sitting the parliament, (who could not but take notice of it) thought fit to commit these persons to the Tower of London * * * intimated, by some Letters of his majesty's in print, 'If there be persons dangerous to the safety of the nation;—and, as such, he looked on these: but he said withal, if they were capable of mercy, no question but the king, the fountain of mercy, would extend it to them. In the mean time, their lordships thought it fit to leave them to the mercy of the king, and so he hoped this house will too.—To the Exception of those other 4 persons, that sat in the several high courts of justice, their lordships also adhere. He observed, It was some moderation in the house of peers, that they take no more than one a-piece. He said this was done among them suddenly, and at the table, without conference with any other persons, or meditating a revenge, to shew the candour and plainness of their proceedings; he confessed, it was equal and just, there should be a like expiation for the breach made on the privilege of the commons, and that some persons should be excepted on their account: But their lordships were as careful of the privileges of this house as of their own, and having more reason to expect it from us, than to send it to us, therefore they omitted that.—To the Proviso, whereby the 16 are sent down under an incapacity of all public employment, their lordships do agree, being content to acquiesce in their incapacitating only; and to omit the adjourning of them to future pains and penalties."

Debate thereon.] After the hearing of this Report, the commons read over the Amendments the lords had a second time made in the Bill, and a long debate ensued upon them, which we give from the Diary.

Sir Wm. Wyld, Recorder of London, said; That he was not convinced by what had been read, nor could he concur with the lords, so as to except all the King's Judges for life, because of the Proclamation.—Mr. Stevens, col. Shapcot, Mr. Trevor, and Sir John Bower, moved to adhere to their former Vote. Sir John Northcot, to petition the king. On the other side, sir A. Broderick was for agreeing with the lords.

Mr. Charlton said, He did not understand how a Vote of the house should be a contract, because they broke it as to Vane and Lambert, Haslerig and Axtell; and was for agreeing with the lords.

Sir Edw. Turner said, They were between two rocks, the honour of that house, and the desire of the lords; that they were masters of their own votes, and had pardoned Thurloe, whom before we condemned, and added Hacker, whom they never thought on: he also was for agreeing.

Mr. Annesley said, He would willingly do justice for the king's blood, and yet preserve the honour of the house, and moved for a committee to recollect and state all that had been done in it before.

Sir Heneage Finch put a question to the house, Whether it was better to venture the shipwreck of the whole vessel, or throw a few over-board? And said, That if they spared their lives they could not take one acre of their estates by the Proclamation. He added, That if any one of them should fly to a foreign prince, the war would be just if that prince would not render him up: that it was for the safety of the nation to throw Sheba's head over the wall: and, lastly, that the sparing of these people was the way to lose the Act of Oblivion to all; for who would think themselves obliged, when every one was pardoned; therefore he was for agreeing with the lords.

Mr. Prynne argued, That he was for excepting all at first, and was so still; and if they were not all so, they themselves must be guilty of the king's blood, those being such horrid traitors as never yet were known: that our oaths bound us much more than our votes, which we alter daily: what would the world say of us, adds he, but call us regicides? And said, they were bound, in conscience and honour, to agree with the lords.

Sir Rd. Temple, intimated a desire to agree with the lords; but did not conclude positively, but left it to the judgment of the house.

Col. King said, Though they passed a Vote for seven, the lords did not; and moved to have a greater regard for their own safeties than for such men, and therefore to agree with the lords.

Sir Dudley North spoke for the same; lest it should retard the whole Bill; but then to enter the Vote in the Journal, that it was only done for that end; and to petition the king to extend mercy to those that came in upon the Proclamation.

Serj. Hales said, That there never was so high a crime committed: that, if there was a case shewn by the lords, they must alter their Vote; but the question was, Whether the lords had shewn that cause? But the case, he said, was here, That now they were in their power they could not let them go; and moved to have a true representation of the matter of fact, and then to judge.—Upon which, a committee was ordered accordingly.

The next day this debate was resumed; when Sir Wm. Wyld, from the committee, made a Report concerning the Bill of Indemnity, and the Examination of the passages therein. To which.

Mr. Allen said, That he was not in the house when the first Vote was made: but that the fact of taking off the king was most barbarous, and the not bringing those men to justice would retard the Act: but then, on the other side, the honour of the house was to be preserved by reason of the Proclamation; and yet neither the Vote nor Proclamation were so binding, but the house might agree with the lords; for the Proclamation did not express mercy to those that came in: yet, he added, they did come in upon that Proclamation, and therefore he moved to have those pardoned; so was for adhering.

Sir Harry North replied and said, That had he a brother or an only son, he would not spare him in such a case: that the Vote was not binding, because it was relative as to the lords; and, for the proclamation, he said, they should be favoured in their estates for their wives and children, but not for their lives; and concluded for agreeing with the lords.

Mr. Knight spoke for an Agreement also, saying, That these people's lives were but as a bucket of water to the ocean, in regard of so many more as were to receive benefit by the Act of Pardon.

Mr. Young said, It would be a miserable thing if the act should be hindered by not agreeing with the lords; but yet, the vote of the house being passed, he thought it was obligatory, especially as the general himself had moved as earnestly in their behalf: that he could not recede from his vote; but desired to have another conference with the lords.

Mr. Thurland said, The Votes of the house were alterable, without breach of honour or trust: and, for the Proclamation, it was no law nor a contract, and their coming in was but ex debito justitiæ; and moved for taking their lives, but to be favourable to their estates.

Col. King said, Their coming in upon the Proclamation was, that God had instructed them to bring them to justice; 'qui Jupiter vult perdere prius dementat,' and that they were not injured by the house.

Mr. Swafson said, That he desired to be rightly understood, that no one who spoke in behalf of these men, should be thought to allow of their fact; but what he spoke was for the honour of the house: that the Proclamation was obligatory, though there was no positive promise in it; yet it was as much security as that house could give; and that it would discourage all for the future from trusting to any such thing: he therefore moved for another conference with the lords, and to put the question, To agree with them or not.—On the contrary was

Col. Jones saying, What will the world think of those that speak for the king's murderers?

Sir John Northcot got up, and desired he might be called to the bar, or explain himself: Upon which the colonel stood up again and said, He did not reflect upon any person.

Sir Rd. Brown, the younger, said, He was for mercy; but it was for all the people in the land, and not for such horrid murderers as these were.

Sir John Northcot moved to have a free conference; and if the lords would not agree with them, then to agree with the lords as to their exceptions.

Serj. Hales said, That the Proclamation did not imply that those who came in should be pardoned, though they did presume upon it; nor would he plead for such offenders, but for the honour of the king and the house. Adding, that if they had not been invited by the Proclamation they had been safe, which now they were not; and to refer them to the king was but to take a thorn out of their own foot, and put it into his.

Sir Heneage Finch said, It was only honour to observe the Vote, which pleaded against justice. He was for agreeing with the lords.

Col. Birch argued for sticking to the Proclamation; saying, That if he should give Articles to a garrison, he should think himself very unworthy to break them.

Sir Edw. Turner answered the colonel, and said, The king might summon any person that went beyond the sea to come over, and he was not bound to pardon him if he did.—As length a Conference was agreed to.

Second Conference between the two Houses, concerning the Indemnity Bill.] Aug. 21. A Report was made in the house of lords, of the effect of the free Conference yesterday had with the commons, concerning the Bill of Indemnity. viz. "The house of commons say, That they abhor and detest the horrid Murder of the late king; but they hold themselves bound to insist upon the number of 7 to be excepted for life and estate, because they conceive that many came in upon the king's Proclamation, and they are obliged to consider those persons that came in upon the public faith, and the king's honour is concerned in it. They said further, That the king's Message from Breda was intended to pardon all, excepting such persons as should be excepted by parliament: That the commons do propound an expedient, that those that came in upon the Proclamation should stand in the Bills as they are brought up from the commons, and a Bill to be brought in hereafter to proceed against them as the parliament shall think fit, both for life and estate. Concerning their lordships excepting Vane, Haslerig, Lambert, and Antell, for life and estate, the commons say there is nothing appears to them to give that sentence upon them; therefore they desire that those 4 persons may stand in the classis as they came up in the Bill. Concerning the 4 persons their lordships had excepted for life and estate, upon account of sentencing to death the 4 peers, the commons say that one of those 4 is dead, and another is as good as dead; and they do not insist upon the shedding of blood upon the account of the death of commoners, and they hope their lordships would not have the sacrifice of the king's blood to be mingled with any other blood. Concerning the business touching Ireland; the commons do agree to their lordship's Alterations, and they desire that their lordships would concur with them in the aforesaid particulars, as they are brought from the commons."—And, after a long and serious debate of this business, it was ordered, That the lord who managed this free Conference with the commons, with the Addition of the Duke of Gloucester, earl of Southampton, and the lord Seymour, shall meet and consider of Reasons, according to the sense of this debate, to be offered at a Conference with the commons to-morrow morning, to fortify their lordships Resolutions herein, and to offer such expedients as they conceive may tend to a good conclusion of this business between the two houses; and to report the same to this house to-morrow morning.

Third Conference between the two Houses, concerning the Indemnity Bill.] Aug. 22. The lords sent a message to the commons, to desire a present free Conference with them, on the matter of the last, relating to the Bill of Indemnity; which being passed on the following day, sir Heneage Finch reported the substance of the said Conference as follows:—"The Conference," he said, "was managed by the lord chancellor (Hyde,) who applied his Reasons to these heads: 1. To the persons involved in the Exception for life and estate, as murderers of his late majesty: 2. To the 4 that are excepted for life and estate, viz. Vane, Haselrig, Lambert, and Axtell: 3. To those who sat in high courts of justice upon the peers. He told us the lords had weighed the Reasons offered from this house, with a great desire of concurrence, and willingness to retract from their own reason, if they had found cause. His lordship observed, the Reasons urged were taken partly from his majesty's Declaration, and partly from the Proclamation issued by advice of both houses. He took notice, that his majesty had frequently interposed, and been solicitous, for the dispatch of this bill; yea so far that (as he expressed himself) no guilty person in the kingdom did more desire the passing of it than himself: and, for the Declaration at Breda, he said it was not to be doubted but his majesty would most religiously observe it. But whereas it had been offered that his majesty tendered an absolute pardon to all persons, and that the exception mentioned was in the nature of a defeazance thereunto, and that, if a bill had been tendered, without an exception, his majesty had been obliged to pass it. To that his lordship answered, True it was so; and had a Bill been tendered to the king, without any exception at all, he had been much absolved by concurring with the houses, though much against his judgment: But his majesty was confident, when he sent that Message, that we would be as forward to do him and the nation justice, as he to desire it: And, withal, he desired us for take notice, that Declaration came inclosed in a letter, which reposed an intire confidence in the houses of parliament; and in which there is this clause: "If there be a crying sin in which the nation may be involved in the infamy that attended it, we cannot doubt but that you will be as solicitous to redeem and vindicate the nation from that guilt and infamy, as we can be:" And his lordship said, His majesty could never doubt but the parliament could have as great resentment of that parricide, as the honour and justice of the nation is greatly concerned in it. He told us, His majesty (who was duly sensible of the great wound he received in that fatal day, when the news of it came to the Hague) bore but one part of the tragedy, for the whole world was sensible of it; and particularly instanced, that a woman at the Hague, hearing of it, fell down dead with astonishment*. His lordship told us, by the way, He had the honour to be then employed as the minister of his publick affairs, in the court of Spain; and that the king's majesty, that now is, gave him in special command, and as part of his Instructions in that negotiation, that, when he treated with the king of Spain, he should avow and declare, that the Murder of his father was not looked upon, by him, as the act of the parliament or the people of England, but of a very wretched and very little company of miscreants in this kingdom: and that his majesty bath the same opinion still; not doubting but, if no Letter had been sent with the said Declaration, to intimate by way of restriction, what use should be made of his Declaration, yet the parliament of England would be as forward to except his father's murderers from pardon, as the thing merits: And he desired us to consider, if God had wrought this miracle of restitution within a month, or year, or another short time after the fact committed, how full of zeal, how full of vengeance, had the spirit of the nation likely to have been. His lordship took notice: "That his majesty's Proclamation was pressed, by us, out of a ten-

* "The barbarous stroke," says lord Clarendon, "so surprized the king, that he was in all the confusion imaginable, and all about him were almost bereft of their understanding. The truth is, it can hardly be conceived, with what a consternation this terrible news was received by all, even by the common people of that country. There was a woman at the Hague, of the middling rank, who, being with child, with the horror of the mention of it, fell into travail, and in it died." Vol. v. p. 476.

ness we had to the honour of the nation, the king, and both houses of parliament, which are involved in it; and out of a desire that public invitations might not prove snares: To which his lordship said, That the lords themselves, being involved in the same honour with us, (aye, and the king too) hope the Reasons, which did satisfy their lordships, and had satisfied his majesty, would satisfy this house. He did profess, that the peers never had any other sense of this Proclamation, than as a process or summons, under pain of being excepted from any pardon of life or estate, if they came not in. He said, It was the sense of the king too; and it was not credible any man could imagine that the king would ever have joined with the houses in such a Proclamation, unless he had been confident the houses would have meant so likewise. His lordship pressed further, That, let the world judge of this Proclamation, they cannot but believe it was the sense of this house too; for it could not be imagined, that if Lisle, Say, Barkstead, and Scott, who were all inserted into the Proclamation, had come in, they should have had the benefit of their lives. It is true (his lordship observed) the Exception of these men, by our votes, was before the publishing of the Proclamation; but he desires pardon, if that seems not, to the peers, of any great weight; for, whatsoever our Votes were, the snare was the same upon such of the persons concerned, who took notice of our Votes, not of the Proclamation; as Scott pleads, he heard of the Proclamation, not of the Votes. He pressed us duly to consider the honour and justice of the nation; and what a reproach it would be if such offenders should escape justice, after such a crime. He put us in mind of some circumstances of aggravation: First, A libel is lately spread abroad, that justifies the Murder of the King with a bare face; yea, justifies it, as necessary; and that on such wicked grounds and arguments, as, in the logic of it, extends to the person of our sacred king that now is, should be fall into their hands. He told us, one of the persons we contend for larks still; and that a serjeant at arms being sent to apprehend him, he rescued himself; yea, the sheriff of that county being required to give assistance therein, he refused. For the expedient offered; the lords look upon it as that which tends to the making of these men's conditions better than now they are; an expedient to put off the discourse, and to make the Reasons, their lordships had given, of less weight hereafter than now.—To the other part, wherein they do adhere, as to the excepting for life Vane, Lambert, Haselrig, and Axtell, his lordship said, He did not believe that we of this house looked on these persons as innocent men; or as men so happy as not to have any crime laid to their charge. He thinks that, had we that good opinion of them, we should not ourselves have excepted them for future pains and penalties. He took notice to us, That the king's Speech to the House of lords, when they had passed this Act of Indemnity as far as they could, and included all these men, his father's murderers, in that fatal exception, gave them thanks for their justice on the immediate murderers of his father; and that, in that speech, there was a subsequent clause, which, if any persons be dangerous to the state, recommended it to the lords to have a care of them also. Now, for one of them, that is Axtell; the ground of excepting him was this: they had received information from Ireland, (where he is best known) which was first presented to the council, and by them to their lordships, that in the year 1648, while the Murder was acting and carrying on, he pressed the soldiers, with violence, to cry and clamour for justice; and when the violence had gone so far that the bloody Sentence was pronounced, he urged them to cry out, 'Execution! Execution!' For Lambert, his lordship intimated, That we could not but take notice how near he was to give a turn to all the present settlement we enjoy. For Haselrig and Vane, his lordship observed, That they were persons whom the secluded members, after their restitution, and when they were preparing the way for the great and good work, which is now effected, looked upon as fit to be secured and confined: That, after the king was come in, these gentlemen, notwithstanding the censure on them by the secluded members, and the blessed end of the Long Parliament, returned to town; never applying themselves to the king, but lurked up and down, without giving any account of themselves: and his lordship added, That they look on them as persons of a mischievous activity; and therefore their lordships desire to leave them to the mercy of the king; with this further intimation, That they would be ready to join with this house in a Petition to the king, that mercy might be shewed them; and that his severity might not extend to their lives; and he did not doubt but the intercession of the houses would be effectual for that. For the last four, who sat in the High Courts of Justice; his lordship observed, That we, of the house of commons, had departed very much from our own passion and provocation, in urging it as a reason why we could not agree, because we could not mingle the expiation of the blood of peers with the expiation of the blood of the king; but that, he said, was not the motive, but justice itself upon so high a breach of the law: and offered to consideration, whether it would not amount to justify those courts, if some severity was not used: but this was not much pressed, nor long insisted on."

"When his lordship had made an end, some worthy gentlemen, that attended the Conference, offered something of Reply; and I may do them some wrong in repeating it: but they are here, and can do right to themselves. It was observed, That this Proclamation was but in the nature of a process: to which it was said, Then at least they should have been heard before they were excepted; which they were not.—Secondly, In the summoning part of the Proclamation, there is not one word relating to a Trial; but the parliament were busy in proceeding upon the Act of Oblivion, and issued the Proclamation, that they might know in what rank to place these men: and admitting that this Proclamation, as to the holding forth of benefit to those that came in, amounts at highest to an implication; yet, being an implication, on which men have put their lives, it was dishonourable (as a worthy member enforced it) to retract the benefit held forth by the Proclamation. It was likewise observed, by the same worthy member, That to except them as to a trial signifies nothing; for they that do not come in are, however, excepted as to a trial. To which his lordship answered, It is true, that in the consequence of it, and as things now stand, it is so: those that come not in will have the benefit of a trial if they be taken, as well as those that do come in: but, at the time of the Proclamation, it might have been expected to be otherwise; and that those who did not render themselves should have been, ipso facto, attainted, and executed whosoever found. His lordship instanced the example of Scott, who professed, for himself, that he rendered on the account of the Proclamation, though his render will not serve his turn: for that render, which will save his life, must be a render to the Speaker or sheriff; to which he cannot pretend. But his lordship added, That if that be the meaning of the Proclamation, to extend benefit of life to all that rendered themselves, the equity is the same, as to him: for if a man hear of the Proclamation, and that he should have the benefit of it if he rendered himself to the Speaker or sheriff, and hastens to do it, but, being not able to do it within the time, renders himself to a public minister, it would be hard to make him incapable of the benefit intended by the Proclamation. Therefore his lordship observed, those that rendered themselves must not necessarily have the benefit of their lives.—It was then urged, that their lordships had excepted persons that are dead; Constable, Mauleverer, Danvers, and others; and that the excepting of them out of the Act of Oblivion signifies nothing: but the place where the commons had put them, was, that their estates should be subject to future penalties: a bare exception subjects not their estates to future penalties; but, when the Act passes, the heir and executor is discharged, though the ancestor be excepted. To which his lordship replied, They knew the exception of itself operated nothing; but they supposed and believed the persons excepted by this Act would (as well as Beadshaw and Cromwell) be attainted, for their guilt was equal, and they might deserve alike. For the 4 persons; it was observed, That to except Wane and the rest, so as to involve them in the danger of life and estate, and in the mean-time to petition for their pardon, was repugnant in itself. To which his lordship made no reply, other than that still they were at the king's mercy, which way soever the proceedings passed."

Debate thereon.] After this Report was ended, the commons fell again into a debate on the question, Whether they should agree or not agree with the lords in this matter.—Mr. Prynne moved first for agreeing, and was seconded by sir Roger Palmer.—Mr. Howard said, That the late king clothed them in scarlet, and had turned their iron into brass, their brass into silver, and themselves into gold: that this prince should be murdered at his own door, would make them seek out such a punishment for it, as the exquisite of a woman could invent: but the honour of the house being engaged, he moved to adhere; and to banish or maimure them, that they should never see the sea more, which would be worse than death.—Sir Heneage Finch could not agree with the lords as to those who were dead; nor with them, as to those who were set upon the lords; and was willing to leave Vane, Haselrig, Lambert, and Axtell, to the king.—Sir George Booth moved for another conference with the lords, in hopes there might be some other expedient offered.—Mr. Baynton was for reading all petitions that came from these men.—Mr. Trevor was for adhering, and not to violate the public faith which had been given.—Mr. Gott was for adhering also, because he did advise some friends to come in.—Sir Gilbert Gerrard said, that he invited several to come in on the Proclamation; and therefore could never give his vote to agree.—Both these last gentlemen moving, also, for another free Conference with the lords, it was voted; the same managers as at the last, were deputed for this also.

But before this last Conference was desired, the Heads of it, as drawn up by the committee, were read in the house and approved of by them. These Heads are entered in the Journals of the commons; but since they will be better understood by the Report of them made afterwards in the upper house, and from the MS. Diary, we postpone them. Observing, that the commons, in order to bend somewhat to the lords, and that this last Conference might be made final and conclude this affair, entered previously into the following debate about it:—Mr. Trevor, who reported some things to be offered at the next Conference with the lords, said, That such of the king's judges as were excepted against might be banished, never to return. If that was not yielded to, then to refer them to another act for life, but to spare them in this. Sir Heneage Finch told the house, That if they spared Vane, Haselrig, Lambert, and Axtell, they did it not out of favour, but to leave them as living monuments of their villainy, and the houses dislike: urging that saying of David, 'Slay them not lest thy people forget it.'—After this, the house voted to agree with the lords, as to except Axtell for life.

Mr. Thomas moved to have somebody die for the kingdom as well as for the king, and named sir Henry Vane. Sir Ralph Ashton said, That sir H. Vane told him, after the battle of Worcester, when the king escaped, and sir Ralph Ashton asked him, 'Where is your Providence now, which you have so oft spoke of, since the king is escaped?' To which he replied, 'If the man was above ground they would have him.' Sir Auth. Irby said, That since they had taken all he had, they might well spare his life. Mr. Hollis said, It was his majesty's pleasure to except only those who were his father's Judges, which Vane was not.—But one Mr. Lowther speaking against Vane, it was voted, To agree with the lords, as to except him for life.

Next, came on the trial of gen. Lambert, who was also excepted by the Lords; when it was moved by sir Allen Broderick to put him to a short question: Mr. Annesley moved, To read his Petition first. Sir George Booth spoke in Lambert's behalf. Mr. Swinfen moved to agree with the lords; but to petition the king to be merciful to them.—The question being called for, and put, it was voted, That Lambert should also be excepted.

Lastly, a motion was made against sir A. Haslerig. Mr. Tomkins said, That sir Arthur told him, when the first short parliament was dissolved, That the king should repent that day's work with every vein in his body. On the other hand, the knight had many speakers in his behalf. Mr. Petry moved for him, because the General engaged for him. Mr. Annesley spoke also in behalf of him; and to bear his Petition before the question was put. Mr. Young for him, alledging his rashness, which made him not a dangerous person.—Lord Aocran said, He was the main man that stirred up the Vote of no more Addresses to the late king; saying to the Speaker, 'Shall we believe that man of no faith?' and moved to put him to the question. Sir Roger Palmer said, That sir Arthur told him, 'If Charles Stuart do come in, it was but three wry mouths and a swing;' and therefore moved against him.—Sir A. A. Cooper was for executing nobody but those who were guilty of the king's blood, and said, He thought this man not considerable enough; but moved to put him with the rest. Col. Birch, by desire of the general, spoke for him. Sir John Bowyer was for having him walk to the gallows with the rest, and then come back again. However, at last, the question being put, the house divided upon it, Whether sir A. Haslerig should be included with the rest? The numbers on the division, were 116 to 141.

After this last Vote was passed, and sir Arthur spared, Mr. Pierpoint moved, That the king might be petitioned, that Lambert and Vane should not be tried for their lives by law; which was agreed to.

The last Conference between the two Houses on the Indemnity Bill. Aug. 25. The lords sending to desire another Conference with the commons, they met accordingly, and the Report of it was made in that house afterwards, by sir Heneage Finch, in these words:—"The lord-chancellor told us, how unhappy soever former conferences have been, this, he doubted not, would be happy to the king and kingdom, and heget a cheerful submission of all people to the determination of the parliament: he said he would repeat nothing of what he had formerly said; for though the lords might have insisted, in the Reasons they formerly offered, yet they have now complied with this house in effect, though not in form. The expedient for a final conclusion of the difference was this; That those gentlemen that rendered themselves on his majesty's proclamation, should stand in the same classes as in the lords Amendments formerly sent down; that is, as persons generally excepted for life and estate: but, to qualify that, they offered a clause to be added by way of Amendment, wherein the names of those persons who rendered themselves (their lordships know them not, and so have left the Paper with a Blank for that) upon an opinion, that they might safely do so, and have not fled to avoid the justice of the parliament, (who, he conceived, will be looked upon otherwise, as persons that have lost the benefit of the Proclamation) may be inserted by this house; and, he supposed, a special care would be had of securing their persons."

And then the reporter read the said Clause, being as followeth: "But in regard the said have personally appeared, and rendered themselves according to the Proclamation, bearing date the 6th of June, 1680, to summon the persons therein named, who gave judgment, and assisted in the said horrid and detestable Murder of our said late sovereign, to appear and render themselves; and do pretend thereby to some favour, upon some conceived doubtful words in the said Proclamation: be it enacted by this present parliament, and the authority of the same, (upon the humble desires of the lords and commons assembled in parliament) That if the said , or any of them, shall be legally attainted for the horrid treason and murder aforesaid, that then, nevertheless, the execution of the said person and persons, so attainted, shall be suspended until his majesty, by the advice and assent of the lords and commons in parliament, shall order the execution, by act of parliament to be passed for that purpose."

The Reporter proceeded: "For that, relating to the persons dead, (whom their lordships had put in that fatal clause, with an expectation that we would pass an Act for the future attainder) their lordships have departed from their resolution in that point, and permit them to continue in the classes wherein we placed them; whereby they are adjourned to the penalties which shall be inflicted on them by a future act; expecting only a bill of attainder of Ormwell, Bradshaw, Ireton, and Pryde.—For the other part, wherein we have agreed for excepting Axtell without further expectation, and Vane and Lambert with expectation of a further address on their behalf, their lordships agree in that. For that wherein we differed about sir Arthur Haslerig, upon what was offered by a member of our house, and since, by the duke of Albemarle, they found his case distinguished from the other two, and agree with us as to him.—And for the last 4; though their lordships saw very great reason to adhere to that for justice and example sake; yet, having taken our Reasons into consideration, and believing the good report we gave of some of them, their lordships departed from that reason in that point, and leave them to disability only, as we propounded.”—Resolved, That this house doth agree with the lords in the matters communicated by the lords at the said Conference. Ordered, That it be referred to a committee to dispose the Alterations, made by the lords this day, into their proper places in the Act of Indemnity; and to inform themselves, which of the Judges of the late king's majesty rendered themselves upon his majesty's Proclamation; and which of them are now in the serjeant's custody; or how they are otherwise disposed.

The Bill of Indemnity concluded.] All obstacles being now removed, and matters entirely settled between the two houses, concerning the Bill of Indemnity, Mr. Hollis was ordered to return it to the lords. At the same time to desire the lords humbly to intreat his majesty, that he would please to come to the house the next morning, to pass it and the other Bills which were ready for the royal assent. To which Mr. Hollis brought Answer, That the lords would do as desired.

The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Bill of Indemnity, &c.] Aug. 29. This day the King came to the house of lords, and his majesty, sitting in his chair of state, commanded the gentleman-usher of the black rod to give notice to the house of commons, that it is his majesty's pleasure they come up, who being come up, their Speaker addressed his majesty in the following terms:

“Most Gracious Sovereign; Not many months since England was but a great prison, where the worst of men were our governors, and their vilest lusts the laws by which they governed. The great and most wise God conveyed divine intelligence into your patient and pious soul, and taught you how, by suffering for us, to deliver us from our sufferings; to knock off our shackles, and set your people at liberty, when neither power nor policy could effect it. So soon as your majesty set your foot upon your English shore, our prison was turned into a paradise of pleasure, and the whole nation filled with joy, and love, and peace.—Sir, this great blessing is already registered in your people's thankful hearts, and they desire that the memory thereof may be perpetuated; and therefore they have laid it up amongst their choicest jewels, and annexed it to their Magna Charta; which they are willing to pawn unto your majesty, upon condition, when they forget this, to forfeit that and all.—Sir; amongst your many illustrious titles, which, like fair and beautiful flowers, do adorn and bedeck your royal crown, there is one exceeds and excels all the rest, as well in virtue as in beauty, and that is your title of ‘Defender of the Faith.’ Sir, as that title is your honour, so the truth of it is our happiness. Neither the highest provocations, nor the strongest temptations, that ever prince met withal, have been able to shake your victorious faith, nor abate your holy zeal; witness your first Act, after your return to the exercise of your regal power, in your early and timely suppressing profaneness, and discountenancing debauched persons, who know not how to express their thankfulness unto God for mercies, but by a sinful drinking them away; a practice your soul abhors.—And as it is your highest honour to be the Defender of that Faith which we profess; so it is the greatest interest, prerogative, and privilege your majesty can be endowed and invested withal in this world, and will be your most lasting comfort in the world to come, that God, who hath hitherto been a sun to direct you, will be a shield to protect you; and that faith which you defend will defend you against all your enemies, maugre the malice of the Devil and all his wicked instruments.—Royal Sir, your eminent virtues, and those excellent qualifications that God hath bestowed upon you, to make you every way worthy and fit for government, invites us at this time, with joyful hearts, to make our humble addresses unto your majesty, and to give you a cheerful account of our proceedings this parliament, wherein we have spent our whole time upon public Bills; some, we must confess, of very great concernment to your majesty and all your people, are not yet ripe, nor brought to perfection: but though, like an after-crop, yet, with the fair weather of your majesty's wonted patience, we hope likewise to inn them well at last, to your majesty's full satisfaction, and the great contentment of all your loyal and faithful subjects.—Some Bills are passed both houses, and already lodged here, which attend and wait for your majesty's royal assent, and I shall humbly beg the favour only but to touch upon some of those of most public concernment by the way, and in transitu, to that Bill here in my hand.—Sir, there is one bill now before you, intituled, ‘An Act for the Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings.’ The scope and intendment of that bill is to settle men's estates, which is the way to quiet their minds; and, when their minds are at rest, there will be no fear of their breaking the peace, or forfeiting their good behaviour any more in time to come.—There is another Bill, intituled, ‘An Act to prevent the taking of excessive Usury.’ The restraining men of avaricious minds, whose concupiscences are as large as their bags, will be a great ease to your people, and an enablement to your merchants the better to go on with their trades. They are the laborious bees, that bring in honey into your majesty's hive; and users are the lazy idle drones that rob your hive of the honey.— There is another Bill, intituled, 'An Act for a perpetual Anniversary Thanksgiving to be observed and kept upon the 29th of May.' A day that God himself was pleased to honour and adorn with a new additional star, never seen before nor since; a star of rare aspect, which declared, to all the world at once, the happy news of your majesty's blessed nativity: and as it was your majesty's birth-day, so it was the day of your Restoration to your kingdoms, parliament, and people; and likewise the day of your people's re-creation out of a chaos of confusion and misery: and therefore they humbly pray, That not only we (for there would need no act for that so long as we live) but that our posterity, and the ages that shall succeed us, might for ever be obliged to set apart that day as a holiday, to dedicate their praises and thanksgivings up unto Almighty God for his miraculous deliverance of this poor nation, when it lay in dust and ashes, in a most miserable, desperate, forlorn, and deplorable condition. There is another Bill, intituled, 'An Act of free and general Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion.' It may well be called a free Pardon; for your majesty was pleased to offer it before we had confidence enough to ask it, and at a time when your people had most need of it: And it may as truly be called a general Pardon, in respect of the extensiveness of it. But looking over a long, black, prodigious, dismal roll and catalogue of malefactors, we there meet not with men but monsters, guilty of blood, precious blood, precious royal blood, never to be remembered without tears; incomparable in all the kinds of villainy that ever was acted by the worst of miscreants, perverters of religion; subverters of government; false to God; disloyal to the best of kings: and perfidious to their country: and therefore we found an absolute and indispensable necessity incumbent upon us, to except and set some apart for treacle, to expel the poison of sin and rebellion out of others, and that they might be made sacrifices to appease God's wrath, and satisfy divine justice. And now I am come to that Bill here in my hand, which I am commanded humbly to present your majesty withal.—Royal Sir, Your commons, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled in parliament, taking into consideration the great and insupportable burden of the Army and Navy, that your people do now groan under; and knowing, as Money is the steam of war, so, as the state of affairs now stand, that it is likewise the best medium that can be used, in order to the attaining that end we have all so much desired and so long prayed for, the Settlement of a happy Peace: and therefore they have passed this Bill, intituled, 'An Act for a speedy Provision of Money to pay off and disband all the Forces of this Kingdom both by Sea and Land,' upon which they hope such a sum will be advanced and brought in, as may be sufficient fully to discharge and dispatch that work: And they humbly pray your majesty's gracious acceptance thereof, and your royal assent thereunto:—I am further to inform and assure your majesty, that your people have passed another Supply and Revenue unto your majesty, which far surmounteth all they have already done in value, and that is, their hearts and affections; having their hearts, your majesty may command their Purses.—Most royal sovereign, We have nothing more to offer, or to ask, at this time, but your majesty's gracious favour, so soon as your service and the public affairs will permit, that we might have leave to go into our countries, where we shall make your people sensible of their happiness, in having such a king to govern and rule over them; and as we praise your majesty, so likewise to pray for your majesty, that you may live long, and reign prosperously."

The King's Speech.] Then his majesty was pleased to give his royal assent to the said Bills; after which, he made the following very gracious Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen of the house of commons; I have been here sometimes before with you, but never with more willingness than I am at this time; and there be few men in the kingdom who have longed more impatiently to have these bills passed, than I have done to pass them; and, I hope, they will be the foundation of much security and happiness to us all. I do very willingly pardon all that is pardoned by this Act of Indemnity, to that time which is mentioned in the bill; nay, I will tell you, that, from that time to this day, I will not use great severity, except in such cases where the malice is notorious, and the public peace exceedingly concerned. But, for the time to come, the same discretion and conscience which disposed me to the clemency I have expressed, which is most agreeable to my nature, will oblige me to all rigour and severity, how contrary soever it be to my nature, towards those who shall not now acquiesce, but continue to manifest their sedition and dislike to the government, either in action or words. And I must conjure you all, my lords and gentlemen, to concur with me in this just and necessary severity; and that you will, in your several stations, be so jealous of the public peace, and of my particular honour, that you will cause exemplary justice to be done upon those who are guilty of seditious speeches or writings, as well as those who break out into seditious actions: And that you will believe those, who delight in reproaching and traducing my person, not to be well-affected to you and the public peace. Never king valued himself more upon the affections of his people, than I do; nor do I know a better way to make myself sure of your affections than by being just and kind to you all; and whilst I am so, I pray let the world see that I am possessed of your affections.—For your Poll Bill, I do thank you as much as if the money were to come into my own coffers; and wish, with all my heart, that it may amount to as great a sum as you reckon upon. If the work be well and orderly done to which it is designed, I am sure I shall be the richer by it in the end; and, upon my word, if I had wherewithal, I would myself help you, so much I desire the business done. I pray very earnestly, as fast as money comes in, discharge that great burden of the Navy, and disband the Army as fast as you can; and, till you can disband the rest, make a provision for their support.—I do conjure you, as you love me, let me not hear the noise of Free-Quarter, which will be imputed to my want of care and government, how innocent soever I am; and therefore be sure you prevent it.—I am so confident of your affections, that I will not move you in any thing that immediately relates to myself; and yet I must tell you I am not richer; that is, I have not so much money in my purse as when I came to you. The truth is, I have lived principally, ever since, upon what I brought with me; which was indeed your money, for you sent it to me, and I thank you for it. The weekly expence of the Navy eats up all you have given me by the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage. Nor have I been able to give my brothers one shilling since I came into England, nor to keep any table in my house but what I eat myself: And that which troubles me most is, to see many of you come to me at Whitehall, and to think that you must go somewhere else to seek your dinner.—I do not mention this to you as any thing that troubles me; do but take care of the public, and for what is necessary for the peace and quiet of the kingdom, and take your own time for my own particular; which I am sure you will provide for with as much affection and frankness as I can desire.”

The Lord General's Plan for disbanding the Army.] Aug. 30. Sir Wm. D'Oiley made a report from the Committee for the Army, and delivered in a Paper, sent to them by the lord-general as a Plan for disbanding the Army; which was read in the house, and is entered in the Journals, as follows;

1. “That the Officers and Soldiers who were in pay, in army or garrison, the 25th April, 1660, shall have their just Arrear, paying or defalking for their Quarters, in prosecution of his Majesty's Declaration, and my Engagement to the Army, upon the Address by them made, to acquiesce in the judgment of the parliament. 2. That for the present subsistence of the Army, the month's pay, appointed by ordinance of parliament, in part of the 6 weeks pay now due upon the new account, may be forthwith issued; that so the Army and Garrisons may be put into a condition of subsistence, until so many of them shall be disbanded, as shall be thought fit by his majesty and the parliament. 3. That the forces, that of necessity for the present must be continued for defence of the garrisons in Scotland, are 3 regiments of foot, and one troop of horse: the residue now there, are 3 regiments of foot, and 11 troops of horse; which may be disposed of as shall be thought fit. 4. As to the forces in field and garrison within this kingdom, appearing upon the List annexed, so many of them may forthwith be disbanded as shall be thought fit. 5. And, for the manner of disbanding, the money being prepared, I shall, upon notice from the commissioners appointed for that purpose, draw the regiments to the most convenient places and nearest to their quarters, where the arms may be secured for his majesty's service, (that is to say) the foot arms, except swords, which are their own; and for the horse to deliver up what defensive arms they have; their horses, swords, and pistols, being their own likewise.—This being done, the field officers of every regiment, to give passes under their hands and seals, to all under their command, to go into their respective countries.—As to the last part of the Order, I have already given direction, that no soldiers be henceforth listed in any troops or companies; and I shall take care that no officers be from henceforth commissioned into the room of any that shall die, or be removed.”

Debate thereon.] After the reading of this Paper, the house fell into a debate on this important point, in which there were many difficulties to get over.

Mr. Prynne moved to pay no Arrears to those that were with Lambert and others, and did not submit.

Sir John Northcot argued, That Scotland should pay towards the disbanding of the Army.

Sir Wm. Morrice was for having the Army disbanded on all accounts, and said, That gunpowder was made of the same ingredients that caused an earthquake; and that, as long as the soldiery continued, there would be a perpetual trembling in the nation: that they were inconsistent with the happiness of any kingdom; and compared the keeping of an Army on foot to a sheep's skin and a wolf's skin; which, if they lie together, the former would lose its wool. And again: if a sheep and a wolf be put into two several grates, by one another, the sheep would pine and die at the sight of the other. Neither, said he, could the nation appear like itself, whilst the sword was over them; and moved to pay off and disband the army.

On which, the house came to the following Resolutions: 1. “That all the forces now of the English establishment, whether in England, Scotland, or elsewhere, be disbanded with all convenient speed. 2. That such of the officers and soldiers in army or garrison, who were in actual service on the 25th April, 1660, and not discharged since for not taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, shall have their just Arrear; paying or defalking for their quarters, in prosecution of his majesty's Declaration, and the lord-general's Engagement to the Army, upon the Address by them made to acquiesce in the judgment of the parliament.”—Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee of the Army to prepare a Bill for disbanding of the Army, and bring it in to-morrow morning.

Message from the King concerning a Recess.
 Aug. 31. A message from the lords came down to the commons, to desire a conference; which being agreed to, the lords communicated the following Message to them, which they had received from the King:

“C. R. His majesty being frequently desired, by several members of the house of peers, to dispense with their absence from the service of the house, and to give them leave to go into the country for their healths and their affairs: and finding that the circuits will carry many of the members of the house of commons into their several countries; where, he doubts not, they will much advance his majesty’s service, and the peace of the kingdom; and the house of commons having, by their Speaker, desired his majesty’s leave to go into the country, his majesty is graciously pleased that both houses shall have a recess upon Saturday the 2th of next month: In which time he doubts not care will be taken for the raising such money as shall be necessary for the payment of the debts of the Navy, disbanding the Army, and supporting it till it shall be disbanded; which his majesty desires as much as any man. And his majesty intends that both houses shall meet again upon Tuesday the 6th of Nov. next.”

On the reading of this Message the commons ordered, That no private business, depending in their house, be proceeded in till the day of adjournment. But, at the same time, several debates arose concerning the word ‘Recess’ in the king’s Message; whether to adjourn or no; or what the word meant; to adjourn, or to determine; and ordered another conference with the Lords, about it. But that house being risen before the message was sent, this matter was dropped for that time. However, two days after, a conference was held; when the lord-chancellor declared it was his majesty’s pleasure that the parliament should be adjourned according to former usage; and not that he meant, by the word ‘Recess,’ a dissolution.

Sept. 4. The commons resolved, That his majesty should be desired not to dispose of any of the Manors or Lands of the persons excepted from pardon by the late act, until his brothers, the dukes of York and Gloucester, were provided for. At the same time, they ordered the sum of 10,000*l.* to be charged on the receipt of the excise, for the use of the duke of York, and 7000*l.* for the duke of Gloucester, to be paid for their present necessities; also 5000*l.* more for the repair of his majesty’s houses.

State of the Revenue of the Crown.] A committee had been appointed to consider the State of the present Revenue of the Crown; and this day, sir Heneage Finch reported from the Committee to whom it was referred to consider of a Revenue to be settled on the king’s majesty, and the State of the late king’s Revenues, an Estimate of the present Revenue of his majesty, and several Resolves of the said committee; that is to say, “That, according to the best information the committee could receive from the officers heretofore employed about the Revenue, the total of the revenue which came unto his late majesty amounted, from the year 1637 to 1641 inclusive, communibus annis, unto 895,819*l.* 5*s.* whereof 210,493*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* did arise by Payments, partly not warranted by law, and partly expired: and that the Expences of his said late majesty’s government did amount, communibus annis, to about 200,000*l.* a-year above the Receipt; in which computation the incomes arising by Ship-Money are not comprehended: and that, by Estimate, the present Revenue of his now majesty may be computed at 819,398*l.* or thereabouts; that is to say, by

The Composition for the Court of Wards - - - - -	100,000
The Revenues of Farms and Rents	263,598
The Office of Postage - - - - -	21,500
The Proceeds of Deane Forest - - - - -	4,000
The Imposition on Sea-Coal exported - - - - -	8,000
Wine Licences, and other Additions	22,300
	819,398

“Of which sum 45,698*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* part of the said 263,598*l.* for Farms and Rents, is casual, and, for the most part, lost; viz. for the Mint, Allum, Transportation of Gold, New-Years-Gifts, and installed Debts.”

He also reported some Resolves of the said Committee, viz. “That a Bill be tendered to the house, for establishing and regulation of the office of Post-master: That the like Bill be tendered to the house, for Wine Licences: That a Bill be prepared for settling the Lands of the Crown, so that no grant of the inheritance shall be good in law; nor any lease more than for 3 lives, or thirty one years, where a third part of the true yearly value is reserved for a rent, as it shall appear upon the return of a survey; which that Act is to take order for, that it may be speedily had and taken: that the house be desired to move his majesty, that there be a forbearance to make Leases of Lands, or other grants of the Revenue, till the said Act be passed: and That the said committee think fit that the Revenue, for the constant yearly support of his majesty, be a Revenue of 1,200,000*l.* a-year.”

The question being propounded, That the present king’s Revenue shall be made up 1,200,000*l.* a-year: it was put, and passed in the affirmative.

Resolved, That this house doth agree with the Committee, that a bill be brought in for establishing and regulation of the office of Wine Licences; and that another bill be brought in for settling the Lands of the Crown, so as that no grant of the inheritance shall be good in law; nor any lease for more than 3 lives, or 31 years, where a third part of the true yearly value is reserved for a rent, as it shall appear upon the return of a survey, which that Act is to take order for, to be speedily had and taken.—Resolved, That this house doth agree with the Committee, that the king's majesty be humbly moved, to forbear to make any Leases of Lands, or other grants of the Revenue of the crown, till the said last mentioned Act be passed.—Resolved, That his majesty be humbly moved that he will be pleased to forbear the exercise of his prerogative, in making use of his Tenures, till this house shall have settled a Revenue in compensation thereof; which is already in an effectual way of settling.

Petition to the King from both Houses, on behalf of Vane and Lambert.] Sept. 5. A Petition was drawn up, and read in the house, to be presented to the king, from both houses, in these words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty: The Humble PETITION of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, “Sheweth; That your majesty having declared your gracious pleasure to proceed only against the immediate murderers of your royal father, we your majesty's most humble subjects, the lords and commons assembled in parliament, not finding sir Henry Vane or col. Lambert to be of that number, are humble suitors to your majesty, if they shall be attainted, yet execution, as to their lives, may be remitted. And, as in duty bound, we shall ever pray, &c.”

Mr. Prynne was ordered by the house to carry up this Petition to the lords for their concurrence. To which their lordships agreed; and, on presenting it to his majesty, he was also graciously pleased to grant the same.

Debate in the Commons, relative to the King's Marriage.] Sept. 12. This day, a remarkable debate took place in the house of commons, of which the Journals take not the least notice, nor any historian that we know of. We are indebted to the MS. Diary so often quoted, for this piece of intelligence.

Mr. Banfield moved, That the king should be desired to marry, and that it should be to a Protestant.

Mr. Annesley said, That he thought this motion was not timely offered; and that when queen Elizabeth was put in mind of such a thing, she said, They ought to look to matters that concerned themselves.—Sir Gilbert Gerard spoke for the motion, as also Mr. Bunckley, for marrying a Protestant, and that the Speaker should move this matter when he went up with the Bills to the house of lords.

Serj. Hales said, It was not reasonable to confine his majesty; urging how much the peace and good of the nation was bound up in him.

Sir Heneage Finch argued, That the motion was very sudden, and wished they might not be too sudden in their resolves upon it: that they had no reason to think the king would marry a Papist, being then at liberty to make his own choice, when before he was under Catholic princes, and might have been induced to marry amongst them. He desired to be satisfied, whether any one could propose a convenient Protestant match, and said, the world would think strangely of them, if they confined his majesty to a Protestant: that the cause of the late troubles was said to be the marriage of the king's father to a Papist, which he did not believe. And that now, to propose such a thing to him, when he had no time to consider of it, would savour very ill. He added, that he did not know the ambassadors, which were then come over, came to offer the king any match; but, if they did, he believed his majesty would be very wary in accepting one; though he might be induced, for the advantages which might be made to the kingdom, to hearken unto them.

Mr. Boscawen was for referring it to a committee to draw up a Petition for it. Mr. Hollis said, It was better to refer it to their next meeting; and Mr. Annesley, Sir John Temple, and Mr. Prynne, saying, That it was not reasonable at that time, the affair intirely dropped. The last member said, That the king having lived so many years unmarried, and had not yet thought of it, it was not fit to prescribe rules to him, but leave it to himself.

13. His majesty came to the house of lords this day; and, sitting in his chair of state, commanded the gentleman-usher of the black rod to give notice to the house of commons, that they speedily attend his majesty, who being come up, their Speaker made the following Speech:

“Most Gracious and Royal Sovereign, Your commons, the knights, citizens, and burghesses, have commanded me to present your majesty with the sacrifices of their hearts, most humble thanks, for their often and frequent admissions unto your royal presence; and for the freedom you have been pleased to allow them, upon all occasions, of making their wants and desires known unto your majesty.—Sir, this royal favour and fatherly kindness unto your people hath naturalized their affections to your person, and their obedience to your precepts: And as it is their duty, so it is their desires to manifest and evidence the truth and reality thereof, by supporting and upholding that grandeur and splendour which is due to the majesty of so meritorious a prince as you yourself: And therefore they have resolved, uno flatu, et nemine contradicente, to make up your royal majesty's constant and ordinary Revenue 1,200,000*l.* per annum.—But finding as to some part of the settlement of that Revenue, that there will be a necessity of making use of the legislative power; and that the Bills, already brought into the house for that purpose, cannot possibly be perfected, dispatched, and made ready, for your royal assent, until the next meeting of your houses of parliament again; therefore they have taken into their consideration your majesty's present Supply; and, first, how to raise it in the most expeditious way, to answer your majesty's present occasions; and then how to lay it, with the most ease and equality, upon your people; and at last wrapp'd up their affections to your majesty, and the trust reposed in them by the people, in one of these Bills here in my hand, intitled, 'An Act for the speedy raising of 100,000*l.* for the present Supply of your majesty,' to be levied by way of Land-Rate, within the space of one month, to begin the 29th of this instant Sept. and to be paid in to your majesty's exchequer before the end of Oct. following. Sir, They have likewise passed another Bill, with Rules and Instructions, to impower and direct your commissioners how, and in what manner, to disband your Army and Garrisons, and to pay off some part of your Fleet, and to begin with those ships now in harbour: But not knowing for certain what the monies upon the Poll-Bill, which is designed for that purpose, will be sufficient fully to defray that charge: and being unwilling that any thing should be wanting on their parts to perfect and complete so good a work, so acceptable to your majesty, and so grateful to all your people, they have passed another Act for raising 140,000*l.* 70,000*l.* per annum, to begin the 1st Nov. and to be paid to your majesty's treasurers, in that Bill nominated and appointed, before the 25th of Dec. next ensuing: both which Bills I am commanded, in the name of your commons, humbly to present your majesty withal; and to pray your gracious acceptance thereof and your royal assent thereunto. Sir, there are other Bills likewise which wait and attend for your royal assent; one, intitled, 'An Act for regulating the Trade of Bays,' which is the only way to keep up the credit of that, which at this time is in some danger to be lost. When the credit of trade begins to decline, the trade itself decays with it, and is never long-lived after it.—Sir, many thousands of your people depend wholly upon that trade for their livelihood, and sustenance of them and their families: and as the loss of that trade would be a great damage unto your people, so your majesty would likewise find the loss of it in your customs; for that commodity hath its vent in Spain and Portugal, from whence we have always rich and quick returns: And, to prevent the loss of both, both to prince and people, that Bill is humbly tendered to your majesty.—Sir, there is another Bill, intitled, 'An Act for encouraging and increasing Shipping and Navigation;' which will enable your majesty to give the law to foreign princes abroad as your royal predecessors have done before you: and it is the only way to enlarge your majesty's dominions all over the world; for so long as your majesty is master at sea, your merchants will be welcome wherever they come; and that is the easiest way of conquering, and the chiefest way of making, whatsoever is theirs; and when it is ours your majesty cannot want it.—Sir, there is another Bill, intitled, 'An Act for restoring some Ministers into their Places out of which they have been long and injuriously ejected and exposed; and for the confirming others in vacant Places.' Crazy titles need your majesty's help, as much as crazy bodies need the help of physicians: and by what your majesty hath already done, in that kind, to this parliament, and what you are now about to do, and what you have ever expressed your readiness, if we could be as ready to receive as your majesty is to give, we hope to vanish and banish all fears and jealousies out of men's minds for the future; and teach them how, with much confidence and contentedness, to rest and wholly rely upon your majesty's grace and goodness for what may be thought further necessary to be done hereafter, when a fitting opportunity shall be offered, at the next meeting of your houses of parliament.—Royal sir, We humbly beg your pardon for making thus bold with your patience; and therefore, to pretermitt and pass over some other such Bills, which are not of such public concernment as those I have already mentioned, we most humbly crave your majesty's favour and leave to conclude all our work, at this time, with that which is our delight as well as our duty, to pray for your majesty's long life, and happy, blessed, and prosperous reign over us.'

The King's Speech to both Houses on the Adjournment.] His majesty having given the royal assent to the Bills presented to him, made the following Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; If my presence here had not been requisite for the passing these many Bills, I did always intend to see you together before your adjournment, that I might again thank you for the many good things you have done for me and the kingdom; and, in truth, I do thank you more for what you have done for the public, than what you have done for my own particular; and yet I do thank you too for that, with all my heart. But, I confess to you, I do thank you more for the provision you have made to prevent Free-Quarter during the time the Army shall be disbanding, (which I take to be given for my satisfaction) than I do the other present you have made me for my own particular occasions: And I do promise you, which is the best way I can take to gratify you, I will not apply one penny of that money to my own particular occasions, what shift soever I make, till it is evident to me that the public will not stand in need of it; and, if it do, every penny of it shall be disbursed that way, and I dare say I shall not be the poorer for it.—I cannot but take notice of one particular Bill I have passed, which may seem of an extraordinary nature, that concerning the duke of Somerset; but you all know it is for an extraordinary person, who nath merited as much of the king my father and myself, as a subject can do; and I am one of those who think that subjects, by performing their duties in an extraordinary manner, do not oblige their princes to reward them in an extraordinary manner. There can be no longer from such a precedent; and I hope no man will envy him, because I have done what a good master should do to such a servant.—My lords and gentlemen; I will not deny to you that I had some inclination, when I consented, upon your desire, to your recess, to have made a session, which I thought most agreeable to the ancient order of parliaments; and I hope you will all join with me in reducing the proceedings of parliaments to the ancient rules and orders of parliaments, the deviation from which hath done us no good, and I think there were never so many Bills passed together, as I have this day given my assent to, without a session: But upon the desire and reasons given by the house of commons, for an adjournment without a session, I did very willingly depart from that inclination, and do as willingly give you leave, and direct you, that you adjourn yourselves till the 6th day of Nov. when I hope you will all meet again; and, in the mean time, that you will be all welcome to your countries, and do me much service there.—I have many other particulars to say and recommend to you, in which I cannot enough trust my own memory, and therefore I shall command the chancellor to say the rest to you.”

The Lord Chancellor's Speech.] After his majesty had ended his speech, the Lord Chancellor Hyde said as followeth:

“My lords and gentlemen; The king tells you that he hath commanded me to say many particulars to you; and, the truth is, he hath charged me with so many, that I have great reason to fear that I shall stand in much need of his mercy, for omitting many things he hath given me in command; at least for delivering them in more disorder and confusion than matters of such moment and importance ought to be to such an assembly, for which the king himself hath even a kind of reverence, as well as an extraordinary kindness. I am to mention some things he hath done already, and many things he intends to do during this recess, that you may see, how well content soever he is that you should have ease, and pleasure, and refreshment, he hath designed work enough for himself.—The king hath thanked you for the provision you have made, that there be no Free-Quarter during the time the Army shall be disbanding; and hath told you what he will do with that money you have given him, if here should want wherewithal to disband it. And now I hope you will all believe that his majesty will consent to the Disbanding: He will do so; and yet he does not take it unkindly at their hands, who have thought that his majesty would not disband this Army; it was a sober and a rational jealousy; no other prince in Europe would be willing to disband such an army: an army to which victory is entailed;

and which, humanly speaking, could hardly fail of conquest wheresoever he should lead it. And if God had not restored his majesty to that rare felicity, as to be without apprehension of danger at home or from abroad, and without any ambition of taking from his neighbours what they are possessed of, himself would never disband this army; an army, whose order and discipline, whose sobriety and manners, whose courage and success, hath made it famous and terrible over the world; an army of which the king and his two royal brothers may say, as the noble Grecian said of Aeneas,

*Contulimusque manus, experto credite, quantus
In Clypeum assurgat, quo turbine torquet hastam.*

They have all three, in several countries, found themselves engaged, in the midst of these troops, in the heat and rage of battle; and if any common soldier (as no doubt many may) will demand the old Romans privilege for having encountered princes single, upon my conscience, he will find both favour and preferment. They have all three observed the discipline, and felt, and admired, and loved the courage of this Army, when they were the worse for it: and I have seen them in a season when there was little else of comfort in their view, refresh themselves with joy, that the English had done the great work, the English had got the day, and then please themselves with the imagination what wonders they should perform at the head of such an army: and therefore, when his majesty is so intirely possessed of the affection and obedience of this army, and when it hath merited so much from him, can it be believed or imagined that he can, without some regret, part with them? No, my lords and gentlemen, he will never part with them; and the only sure way never to part with them is to disband them: should it be otherwise, they must be exposed to the daily inportunity of his great neighbours and allies; and how could he refuse to lend them his troops, of which he hath no use himself? His majesty knows they are too good Englishmen to wish that a Standing Army should be kept up in the bowels of their own country; that they who did but ‘in Bello pacis gerere negotium;’ and who, whilst an army, lived like good husbandmen in the country, and good citizens in the city, will now become really such, and take delight in the benefit of that peace they have so honestly and so wonderfully brought to pass. The king will part with them, as the most indulgent parents part with their children for their education, and for their preferment. He will prefer them to disbanding, and prefer them by disbanding; and will always retain such a kindness for them, and such a memory of the service they have done him, that both officers and soldiers, after they are disbanded, shall always find such countenance, favour, and reward from his majesty, that he doubts not but, if he should have occasion to use their service, they will again resort to him with the same alacrity, as if they had never been disbanded. And if there be any so all amongst them (as there can but be very few, if any) who will forfeit that favour and protection they may have from him, by any withstanding his majesty's commands, and the full and declared sense of the kingdom, his majesty is confident they will be as odious to their companions, as they can be to any other honest men.—My lords and gentlemen; I am, in the next place, by the king's command, to put you in mind of the Act of Indemnity; not of any grants or concessions, or releases he made to you in that Act; I have nothing of that in charge; no prince hath so excellent a memory to forget the favours he doth; but of what he hath done against you in that act, how you may be undone by that act, if you are not very careful to perform the obligations he hath laid upon you in it. The Clause I am to put you in mind of is this: 'And to the intent and purpose that all names and terms of distinction may be likewise put into utter oblivion, be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That if any person or persons, within the space of 3 years next ensuing, shall presume, maliciously, to call, or alledge, or object against any other person or persons any name or names, or other words of reproach, any way leading to revive the memory of the late differences, or the occasion thereof, that then every such person, so as aforesaid offending, shall forfeit, &c.' It is no matter for the penalty, it is too cheap a one; the king wishes it had been greater, and therefore hath, by his just prerogative (and it is well for us he hath such a prerogative) added another penalty more insupportable, even his high displeasure, against all who shall swerve from this clause in the Act. Give me leave to tell you, That as any name or names, or other words of reproach, are expressly against the letter, and punishable accordingly: so evil and envious looks, murmuring and discontented hearts, are as directly against the equity of this statute, a direct breach of the Act of Indemnity, and ought to be punished too; and I believe they may be so. You know kings are, in some sense, called Gods, and so they may in some degree be able to look into men's hearts; and God hath given us a king who can look as far into men's hearts as any prince alive: and he hath great skill in physiognomy too; you would wonder what calculations he hath made from thence; and, no doubt, if he be provoked by evil looks, to make a further inquiry into men's hearts, and finds those corrupted with the passions of envy and uncharitableness, he will never chuse those hearts to trust and rely upon. He hath given us a noble and princely example, by opening and stretching his arms to all who are worthy to be his subjects, worthy to be thought Englishmen, by extending his heart, with a pious and grateful joy, to find all his subjects at once in his arms, and himself in theirs; and shall we fold our arms towards one another, and contract our hearts with envy and malice to each other, by any sharp memory of what hath been unneighbourly or unkindly done heretofore? What is this but to rebel against the person of the king, against the excellent example and virtue of the king, against the known law of the land, this blessed Act of Oblivion?—My Lords and Gentlemen, the king is a suitor to you, makes it his suit very heartily, That you will join with him in restoring the whole nation to its primitive temper and integrity, to its old good manners, its old good humour, and its old good nature. Good nature, a virtue so peculiar to you, so appropriated by God Almighty to this nation, that it can be translated into no other language, hardly practised by any other people; and that you will, by your example, by the candour of your conversation, by your precepts, and by your practice, and by all your interest, teach your neighbours and your friends how to pay a full obedience to this clause of the statute, how to learn this excellent art of forgetfulness.—Let them remember, and let us all remember, how ungracious, how indecent, how ugly, the insolence, the fierceness, the brutishness of their enemies appeared to them, and we may piously and reasonably believe, that God's indignation against them, for their want of bowels, for their not being Englishmen, (for they had the hearts of pagans and infidels) sent a whirlwind in a moment to blow them out of the world, that is, out of a capacity to do more mischief in the world, except we practise their vices, and do that ourselves which we pretend to detest them for.—Let us not be too much ashamed, as if what hath been done amis proceeded from the humour and the temper of the nature of our nation. The astrologers have made us a fair excuse, and truly I hope a true one: all the motions of these last 20 years have been unnatural, and have proceeded from the evil influence of a malignant star; and let us not too much despise the influence of the stars. And the same astrologers assure us, that the malignity of that star is expired: the good genius of this kingdom is become superior, and hath mastered that malignity, and our own good old stars govern us again; and their influence is so strong, that with your help they will repair in a year what hath been decaying in 20, and they only shall have no excuse from the star who continue their malignity, and own all the ill that is past to be their own, by continuing and improving it for the time to come.—If any body here, or any where else, be too much exalted with what he hath done, or what he hath suffered, and from thence thinks himself warranted to reproach others, let him remember the story of Nicephorus: it is an excellent story, and very applicable to such distempers: he was a pious and religious man, and, for his piety and religion, was condemned to the fire. When he was led to execution, and when an old friend, who had done him injury enough, fell at his feet and asked his pardon, the poor man was so elated with the triumph he was going unto, with the Glory of Martyrdom, that he refused to be reconciled unto him; upon which he was disappointed of his end, and for this uncharitableness the spirit of God immediately forsook him, and he apostatized from the faith.—Let all those who are too proud of having been, as they think, less faulty than other men, and so are unwilling to be reconciled to those who have offended them, take heed of the apostacy of Nicephorus, and that those fumes of envy and uncharitableness, and murmuring, do not so far transport and intoxicate them, that they fall into those very crimes they valac themselves for having hitherto declined.—But, my lords and gentlemen, whilst we conspire together to execute faithfully this part of the Bill, to put all old names and terms of distinction into utter Oblivion, let us not find new names and terms to keep up the same, or a worse distinction. If the old reproaches of Cavalier, and Round-Head, and Malignant, be committed to the grave, let us not find more significant and better words, to signify worse things; let not piety and godliness grow into terms of reproach, and distinguish between the court, and the city, and the country; and let not piety and godliness be measured by a morosity in manners, an affectation of gesture, a new mode and tone of speaking; at least, let not our constitutions and complexions make us be thought of a contrary party; and because we have not an affected asperity in our looks, that we have not piety in our hearts. Very merry men have been very godly men; and if a good conscience be a continual feast, there is no reason but men may be very merry at it.—You, Mr. Speaker, have this day made a noble present to the king. Do you think that if you and your worthy companions had brought it up with folded arms, down-cast looks, with sighs and other instances of desperation, it would not have been a very melancholic present? Have not your frank and dutiful expressions, that cheerfulness and vivacity in your looks, rendered it much more acceptable, much more valuable? No price in christendom loves a cheerful giver so well as God Almighty does; and he, of all gifts, a cheerful heart. And therefore, I pray, let not a cloudy and disconsolate face be the only or the best sign of piety and devotion in the heart.—I must ask your pardon for misplacing much of this discourse, which I should have mentioned when I came to speak of the Ministers Bill; they, I hope, will endeavour to remove these new marks of distinction and reproaches, and keep their auditories from being imposed upon by such characters and descriptions. The king hath passed this Act very willingly, and hath done much to the end of this act before; yet hath willingly admitted you to be sharers and partners with him in the obligation; I may say, confidently, his majesty hath never denied his confirmation to any man in possession who hath asked it; and they have all had the effect of it, except such who, upon examination and inquiry, appeared not worthy of it; and such who, though they are pardoned, cannot yet think themselves worthy to be preferred. His majesty well knows that, by this Act, he hath gratified and obliged many worthy and pious men, who have contributed much to his Restoration, and who shall always receive fresh evidence of his majesty's favour and kindness; but he is not sure that he may not likewise have gratified some, who did neither contribute to his coming in, nor are yet glad that he is in: how comes it else to pass, that he receives such frequent information of seditious Sermons in the city and in the country, in which all industry is used to alienate the affections of the people, and to infuse jealousies into them of the king and his government. They talk of introducing Popery, of evil counsellors, and such other old calumnies as are pardoned by this Act of Indemnity.—His majesty told you when he was last here, what rigour and severity he will hereafter use, how contrary soever it is to his nature, in these cases, and conjured you, my lords and gentlemen, to concur with him in this just and necessary severity: which I am sure you will do with your utmost vigilance, and that you will believe that too much ill cannot befall those who do the best they can to corrupt his majesty's nature, and to extinguish his mercy.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I told you I was to acquaint you with some things his majesty intends to do during this recess, that you may see he will give no intermission to his own thoughts for the public good, though for a time he dispenses with your assistance. He doth consider the infinite importance the improvement of Trade must be to this kingdom, and therefore his majesty intends, forthwith, to establish a Council for Trade, consisting of some principal merchants of the several Companies, to which he will add some gentlemen of quality and experience; and, for their greater honour and encouragement, some of my lords of his own privy council.—In the next place, his majesty hopes that, by a well-settled Peace, and God's great blessing upon him and you, this nation will in a short time flourish to that degree, that the land of Canaan did, when Esau found it necessary to part from his brother. 'For their riches were more than that they might dwell together, and the land wherein they were could not bear them, because of their cattle.' We have been ourselves very near this pinnacle of happiness, and the hope and contemplation that we may be so again, disposes the king to be very solicitous for the improvement and prosperity of his Plantations abroad, where there is such large room for the industry and reception of such who shall desire to go thither. And therefore his majesty likewise intends to erect and establish a Council for those Plantations, in which persons, well qualified, shall be wholly intent upon the good and advancement of those plantations.—There are two other particulars which I am commanded to mention, which were both mentioned and recommended to you by his majesty, in his Declaration from Breda: the one for the Confirmation of Sales, or other recompence for Purchasers; the other, for the composing those differences and distempers in Religion, which have too much disturbed the peace of the kingdom. Two very weighty particulars, in which his majesty knows you have spent much time, and concerning which he should have heard from you before this time, if you had not met with great difficulties in the disquisition of either.—For the first; his majesty hath not been without much thought upon the argument, and hath done much towards the accommodation of many particular persons; and you shall not be at your journey's end, before his majesty will put that business, concerning Sales, into such a way of dispatch, that he doubts not you will find a good progress made in it before your coming together again; and I believe the persons concerned will be very much to blame, if they receive not good satisfaction. And some of you who stay in town shall be advised and consulted with in that settlement.—The other, of Religion, is a sad argument indeed. It is a consideration that must make every religious heart to bleed, to see Religion, which should be the strongest obligation and cement of affection, and brotherly-kindness and compassion, made now, by the perverse wranglings of passionate and froward men, the ground of all animosity, hatred, malice, and revenge. And this unruly and unmanly passion (which no question the divine nature exceedingly abhors) sometimes, and I fear too frequently, transports those who are in the right, as well as those who are in the wrong, and leaves the latter more excusable than the former, when men, who find their manners and dispositions very conformable in all the necessary obligations of human nature, avoid one another's conversation, and grow first unsociable, and then uncharitable to each other, because one cannot think as the other doth. And from this separation we intitle God to the patronage of, and concernment in, our fancies and distinction, and purely for his sake hate one another heartily. It was not so of old, when one of the most antient Fathers of the church tells us, That love and charity was so signal and eminent in the Primitive Christians, that it even drew admiration and envy from their adversaries. 'Vide, iniquit, ut invicem se diligunt?' Their adversaries in that in which they most agreed, in their very prosecution of them, had their passions and animosities amongst themselves: they were only Christians that loved, and cherished, and comforted, and were ready to die for one another; 'quid auc illi dicerent Christiani, si nostra viderent tempora?' says the incomparable Grotius. How would they look upon our sharp and virulent contentions in the debates of Christian Religion, and the bloody wars that have proceeded from those contentions, whilst every one pretended to all the marks which are to attend upon the true Church, except only that which is inseparable from it, charity to one another.—My Lords and Gentlemen, This disquisition hath cost the king many a sigh, many a sad hour, when he hath considered the almost irreparable reproach the Protestant Religion hath undergone, from the divisions and distractions which have been so notorious within this kingdom. What pains he hath taken to compose them, after several discourses with learned and pious men of different persuasions, you will shortly see by a Declaration he will publish upon that occasion; by which you will see his great indulgence to those who can have any protection from conscience to differ with their brethren. And I hope God will so bless the candour of his majesty in the condescensions he makes, that the Church, as well as the State, will return to that unity and unanimity which will make both king and people as happy as they can hope to be in this world.—My Lords and Gentlemen, I shall conclude with the king's hearty thanks to you not only for what you have done towards him, which hath been very signal; but for what you have done towards each other; for the excellent correspondence you have maintained; for the very seasonable deference and condescension you have had for each other, which will restore parliaments to the veneration they ought to have. And since his majesty knows that you all desire to please him, you have given him ample evidence that you do so; he hath appointed me to give you a sure receipt to attain that good end; it is a receipt of his own prescribing, and therefore is not like to fail: be but pleased yourselves, and persuade others to be so; contrive all the ways imaginable for your own happiness, and you will make him the best pleased, and the most happy prince in the world."

The Lord Chancellor having concluded his Speech, both houses adjourned to the 6th of November.*

* "During the recess of parliament, the object, which chiefly interested the public, was the trial and condemnation of the Regicides. The general indignation attending the enormous crime of which these men had been guilty, made their sufferings the subject of joy to the people: but in the peculiar circumstances of that action, in the prejudices of the times, as well as in the behaviour of the criminals, a mind, seasoned with humanity, will find a plentiful source of compassion and indulgence. Can any one, without concern for human blindness and ignorance, consider the demeanor of general Harrison, who was first brought to trial? With great courage and elevation of sentiment, he told the court, that the pretended crime, of which he stood accused, was not a deed performed in a corner; the sound of it had gone forth to most nations; and in the singular and marvellous conduct of it had chiefly

“His Majesty's DECLARATION to all his loving Subjects of his Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs.

“C. R. How much the peace of the State is concerned in the peace of the Church, and how difficult a thing it is to preserve order and government in Civil, whilst there is no order or government in Ecclesiastical affairs, is evident to the world; and this little part of the world, our own dominions, hath had so late experience of it, that we may very well acquiesce in the conclusion, without enlarging ourself in discourse upon it, it being a subject we have had frequent occasion to contemplate upon, and to lament abroad, as well as at home.—In our Letter to the Speaker of the house of commons from Breda (p. 17), we declared how much we desired the advancement and propagation of the Protestant Religion: that neither the unkindness of those of the same faith towards us, nor the civilities and obligations from those of a contrary profession (of both which we have had abundant evidence) could, in the least degree, startle us, or make us swerve from it; and that nothing can be proposed to manifest our zeal and affection for it, to which we will not readily consent: and we said then, That we did hope, in due time, ourself to pro-appeared the sovereign power of heaven. That he himself, agitated by doubts, had often, with passionate tears, offered up his addresses to the divine majesty, and earnestly sought for light and conviction: he had still received assurance of a heavenly sanction, and returned from these devout supplications with more serene tranquillity and satisfaction. That all the nations of the earth were, in the eyes of their Creator, less than a drop of water in the bucket; nor were their erroneous judgments aught but darkness, compared with divine illuminations. That these frequent illapses of the divine spirit he could not suspect to be interested illusions; since he was conscious, that for no temporal advantage, would he offer injury to the poorest man or woman that trod upon the earth. That all the allurements of ambition, all the terrors of imprisonment, had not been able, during the usurpation of Cromwell, to shake his steady resolution, or bend him to a compliance with that deceitful tyrant. And that when invited by him to sit on the right hand of the throne, when offered riches and splendour and dominion, he had disdainfully rejected all temptations; and neglecting the tears of his friends and family, had still, through every danger, held fast his principles and his integrity.—Scot, who was more a republican than a fanatic, had said a little before the Restoration, that he desired no other epitaph to be inscribed on his tomb-stone than this; ‘Here lies Tho. Scot, who adjudged the king to death.’

pose somewhat for the propagation of it, that will satisfy the world, that we have always made it both our care and our study, and have enough observed what is most like to bring disadvantage to it. And, the truth is, we do think ourself the more competent to propose, and, with God's assistance, to determine, many things now in difference, from the time we have spent, and the experience we have had, in most of the Reformed Churches abroad, in France, in the Low Countries, and in Germany; where we have had frequent conferences with the most learned men, who have unanimously lamented the great reproach the Protestant Religion undergoes from the distempers and too notorious schisms in matters of Religion in England: and as the most learned amongst them have always, with great submission and reverence, acknowledged and magnified the established government of the Church of England, and the great countenance and shelter the Protestant Religion received from it, before these unhappy times; so many of them have, with great ingenuity and sorrow, confessed, that they were too easily misled by misinformation and prejudice, into some disesteem of it, as if it had too much complied with the church of Rome; whereas, they now acknowledge it to be the best fence God hath yet raised against Popery in the world: and we are persuaded they do, with great zeal, wish it restored to its old dignity and veneration.—When we were in Holland, we were

He supported the same spirit upon his trial.—Carew, a Millenarian, submitted to his trial, ‘saving to our Lord Jesus Christ his right to the government of these kingdoms.’ Some scrupled to say, according to form, that they would be tried by God and their country; because God was not visibly present to judge them. Others said, that they would be tried by the word of God.—No more than six of the late king's judges, Harrison, Scot, Carew, Clement, Jones, and Scrope, were executed: Scrope alone, of all those who came in upon the king's proclamation. He was a gentleman of good family and of a decent character: but it was proved, that he had a little before, in conversation, expressed himself as if he were no-wise convinced of any guilt in condemning the king. Axtel, who had guarded the high court of justice, Hacker, who commanded on the day of the king's execution, Coke, the solicitor for the people of England, and Hugh Peters, the fanatical preacher, who inflamed the army and impelled them to regicide: all these were tried, and condemned, and suffered with the king's judges. No saint or confessor ever went to martyrdom with more assured confidence of heaven than was expressed by those criminals, even when the terrors of immediate death, joined to many indignities, were set before them. The rest of the king's judges, by an unexampled lenity, were reprieved; and they were dispersed into several prisons.” Hunt.

attended by many grave and learned ministers from hence, who were looked upon as the most able and principal asserters of the Presbyterian opinions, with whom we had as much conference, as the multitude of affairs, which were then upon us, would permit us to have; and, to our great satisfaction and comfort, found them persons full of affection to us, of zeal for the peace of the Church and State, and neither enemies (as they have been given out to be) to Episcopacy or Liturgy; but modestly to desire such alterations in either, as, without shaking foundations, might best allay the present distempers, which the indisposition of the time, and the tenderness of some men's consciences, had contracted: for the better doing whereof, we did intend, upon our first arrival in this kingdom, to call a Synod of Divines, as the most proper expedient to provide a proper remedy for all those differences and dissatisfactions which had, or should arise in matters of Religion; and, in the mean time, we published, in our Declaration from Breda, a liberty to tender consciences; and that no man should be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matter of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom; and that we shall be ready to consent to such an act of parliament as, upon mature deliberation, shall be offered to us for the full granting of that indulgence.—Whilst we continued in this temper of mind and resolution, and have so far complied with the persuasion of particular persons, and the distemper of the times, as to be contented with the exercise of our religion in our own chapel, according to the constant practice and laws established, without enjoining that practice, and the observation of those laws, in the churches of the kingdom, in which we have undergone the censure of many, as if we were without that zeal for the church which we ought to have, and which by God's grace, we shall always retain, we have found ourselves not so candidly dealt with as we have deserved; and that these are unquiet and restless spirits, who, without abating any of their own distemper, in recompence of the moderation they find in us, continue their bitterness against the church, and endeavour to raise jealousies of us, and to lessen our reputation by their reproaches, as if we were not true to the professions we have made. And, in order thereto, they have very unreasonably caused to be printed, published, and dispersed throughout the kingdom, a Declaration heretofore printed in our name, during the time of our being in Scotland, of which we shall say no more than that the circumstances, by which we were enforced to sign that Declaration, are enough known to the world; and that the worst and greatest part of that nation did even then detest and abhor the ill usage of us in that particular, when the same tyranny was exercised there by the power of a few ill men, which, at that time, had spread itself over this kingdom; and therefore we had no reason to expect that we should, at this season, when we are doing all we can to wipe out the memory of all that hath been done amiss by other men, and, we thank God, have wiped it out of our own remembrance, have been ourself assaulted with those reproaches, which we will likewise forget.—Since the printing this Declaration, several seditious Pamphlets and Queries have been published and scattered abroad, to infuse dislike and jealousies into the hearts of the people, and of the army; and some, who ought rather to have repented the former mischief they have wrought, than to have endeavoured to improve it, have had the hardness to publish, That the doctrine of the Church, against which no man with whom we have conferred hath excepted, ought to be reformed as well as the discipline.—This over-passionate and turbulent way of proceeding, and the impatience we find in many for some speedy determination in these matters, whereby the minds of men may be composed, and the peace of the Church established, hath prevailed with us to invert the method we had proposed to ourself, and even, in order to the better calling and composing of a Synod (which the present jealousies will hardly agree upon) by the assistance of God's blessed spirit, which we daily invoke and supplicate, to give some determination ourself to the matters in difference, until such a Synod may be called as may, without passion or prejudice, give us such farther assistance towards a perfect union of affections, as well as submission to authority, as is necessary: and we are the rather induced to take this upon us, by finding, upon the full conference we have had with the learned men of several persuasions, that the mischiefs, under which both the Church and State do at present suffer, do not result from any formed doctrine or conclusion which either party maintains or avows; but from the passion, appetite, and interest of particular persons, who contract greater prejudice to each other from those affections, than would naturally rise from their opinions; and those distempers must be in some degree allayed, before the meeting in a Synod can be attended with better success than their meeting in other places, and their discourses in pulpits have hitherto been; and till all thoughts of victory are laid aside, the humble and necessary thoughts for the vindication of truth cannot be enough entertained.—We must, for the honour of all those of either persuasion with whom we have conferred, declare, That the professions and desires of all, for the advancement of piety and true godliness, are the same; their professions of zeal for the peace of the church, the same; of affection and duty to us, the same: they all approve Episcopacy; they all approve a set Form of Liturgy; and they all disapprove and dislike the sin of sacrilege, and the alienation of the revenue of the Church. And if upon these excellent foundations, in submission to which there is such a harmony of affections, any superstructures should be raised, to the shaking those foundations, and to the contracting and lessening the blessed gift of charity, which is a vital part of Christian religion, we shall think ourself very unfortunate, and even suspect that we are defective in that administration of government with which God hath entrusted us.—We need not profess the high affection and esteem we have for the Church of England, as it is established by law, the reverence to which hath supported us, with God's blessing, against many temptations; nor do we think that reverence in the least degree diminished by our condescensions, not peremptorily to insist on some particulars of ceremony; which, however introduced by the piety, devotion, and order of former times, may not be so agreeable to the present; but may even lessen that piety and devotion, for the improvement whereof they might haply be first introduced, and consequently may well be dispensed with: and we hope this charitable compliance of ours will dispose the minds of all men to a cheerful submission to that authority, the preservation whereof is so necessary for the unity and peace of the Church, and that they will acknowledge the support of the Episcopal authority to be the best support of Religion, by being the best means to contain the minds of men within the rules of government. And they who would restrain the exercise of that holy function within the rules which were observed in the primitive times, must remember and consider, that the ecclesiastical power, being in those blessed times always subordinate and subject to the civil, it was likewise proportioned to such an extent of jurisdiction as was most agreeable to that. And as the sanctity, simplicity, and resignation of that age, did then refer many things to the Bishops, which the policy of succeeding ages would not admit, at least did otherwise provide for; so it can be no reproach to primitive Episcopacy, if, where there have been great alterations in the civil government from what was then, there have been likewise some difference and alteration in the ecclesiastical, the essence and foundation being still preserved. And upon this ground, without taking upon us to censure the government of the church in other countries, where the government of the state is different from what it is here, or enlarging ourself upon the reasons why, whilst there was an imagination of erecting a democratical government here in the state, they should be willing to continue an aristocratical government in the church; it shall suffice to say, that since, by the wonderful blessing of God, the hearts of this whole nation are returned to an obedience to monarchical government in the state, it must be very reasonable to support that government in the church which is established by law, and with which the monarchy hath flourished through so many ages, and which is in truth as antient in this island as the Christian monarchy thereof; and which hath always, in some respects or degrees, been enlarged or restrained, as hath been thought most conducing to the peace and happiness of the kingdom: and therefore we have not the least doubt but that the present Bishops will think the present concessions, now made by us to allay the present distempers, very just and reasonable, and will very cheerfully conform themselves thereunto.—1. We do in the first place declare our purpose and resolution is, and shall be, to promote the power of godliness, to encourage the exercises of Religion both public and private, and to take care that the Lord's Day be applied to holy exercises, without unnecessary divertisements; and that insufficient, negligent, and scandalous ministers, be not permitted in the Church. And that as the present Bishops are known to be men of great and exemplary piety in their lives, which they have manifested in their notorious and unexampled sufferings during these late distempers, and of great and known sufficiency of learning; so we shall take special care, by the assistance of God, to prefer no men to that office and charge, but men of learning, virtue, and piety, who may be themselves the best examples to those who are to be governed by them; and we shall expect, and provide the best we can, that the Bishops be frequent preachers, and that they do very often preach themselves in some church of their diocese, except they be hindered by sickness or other bodily infirmities, or some other justifiable occasion; which shall not be thought justifiable if it be frequent.—2. Because the Dioceses, especially some of them, are thought to be of too large extent, we will appoint such a number of Suffragan Bishops in every diocese, as shall be sufficient for the due performance of their work.—3. No Bishop shall ordain, or exercise any part of jurisdiction, which appertains to the censures of the Church, without the advice and assistance of the presbyters; and no chancellor, commissary, or official, as such, shall exercise any act of spiritual jurisdiction in these cases, viz. excommunication, absolution, or wherein any of the ministry are concerned, with reference to their pastoral charge. However, our intent and meaning is, to uphold and maintain the profession of the civil law, so far, and in such matters, as it hath been of use and practice within our kingdoms and dominions: albeit, as to excommunication, our will and pleasure is, That no chancellor, commissary, or official, shall decree any sentence of excommunication or absolution, or be judges in those things wherein any of the ministry are concerned, as is aforesaid. Nor shall the archdeacon exercise any jurisdiction without the advice and assistance of six ministers of his archdeaconry, whereof 3 to be nominated by the bishop, and 3 by the election of the major part of the presbyters within the archdeaconry.—4. To the end that the Deans and Chapters may be the better fitted to afford counsel and assistance to the bishops, both in ordination and the other offices mentioned before, we will take care that those preferments be given to the most learned and pious presbyters of the diocese;

and moreover, that an equal number (to those of the Chapter) of the most learned, pious, and discreet presbyters of the same diocese, annually chosen by the major vote of all the presbyters of that diocese present at such elections, shall be always advising and assisting, together with those of the chapter, in all ordinations, and in every part of jurisdiction which appertains to the censures of the church, and at all other solemn and important actions, in the exercise of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, wherein any of the ministry are concerned: Provided, That at all such meetings, the number of the ministers so elected, and those present of the Chapter, shall be equal, and not exceed one the other; and that, to make the number equal, the juniors of the exceeding numbers be withdrawn, that the most antient may take place. Nor shall any Suffragan Bishop ordain, or exercise the fore-mentioned offices and acts of spiritual jurisdiction, but with the advice and assistance of a sufficient number of the most judicious and pious presbyters, annually chosen as aforesaid, within his precincts. And our will is, That the great work of Ordination be constantly and solemnly performed by the bishop and his aforesaid presbytery, at the four set times and seasons appointed by the church for that purpose.—5. We will take care that Confirmation be rightly and solemnly performed, by the information, and with the consent, of the minister of the place, who shall admit none to the Lord's Supper, till they have made a credible profession of their faith, and promised obedience to the will of God, according as is expressed in the considerations of the Rubrick before the catechism; and that all possible diligence be used for the instruction and reformation of scandalous offenders, whom the minister shall not suffer to partake of the Lord's Table, until they have openly declared themselves to have truly repented, and amended their former naughty lives, as is partly expressed in the Rubrick, and more fully in the Canons; provided there be place for due appeals to superior powers. But besides the Suffragans and their Presbytery, every Rural Dean, (those deans, as heretofore, to be nominated by the bishop of the diocese) together with three or four ministers of that deanry, chosen by the major part of all the ministers within the same, shall meet once in every month, to receive such complaints as shall be presented to them by the ministers or churchwardens of the respective parishes; and also to compose all such differences betwixt party and party, as shall be referred unto them by way of arbitration; and to convince offenders, and reform all such things as they find amiss, by their pastoral reproofs and admonitions, if they may be so reformed. And such matters as they cannot, by this pastoral and persuasive way, compose and reform, are by them to be prepared for, and presented to, the Bishop; at which meeting any other ministers of that deanry may, if they please, be present and assist. Moreover, the rural dean and his assistants are, in their respective divisions, to see that the children and younger sort be carefully instructed by the respective ministers of every parish, in the grounds of Christian Religion, and be able to give a good account of their faith and knowledge, and also of their Christian conversation conformable thereunto, before they be confirmed by the bishop, or admitted to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.—6. No Bishop shall exercise any arbitrary power, or do or impose any thing upon the clergy or the people, but what is according to the known law of the land.—7. We are very glad to find, that all with whom we have conferred, do, in their judgments, approve a Liturgy, or set form of public worship, to be lawful; which, in our judgment, for the preservation of unity and uniformity, we conceive to be very necessary. And though we do esteem the Liturgy of the Church of England, contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and by law established, to be the best we have seen, and we believe that we have seen all that are extant and used in this part of the world) and well know what reverence most of the Reformed Churches, or at least the most learned men in those churches, have for it; yet, since we find some exceptions made against several things therein, we will appoint an equal number of learned divines, of both persuasions, to review the same, and to make such alterations as shall be thought most necessary, and some additional forms (in the Scripture phrase as near as may be) suited unto the nature of the several parts of worship; and that it be left to the minister's choice to use one or other at his discretion. In the mean time, and till this be done, although we do heartily wish and desire that the ministers, in their several churches, because they dislike some clauses and expressions, would not totally lay aside the use of the Book of Common Prayer; but read those parts against which there can be no exception, which would be the best instance of declining those marks of distinction, which we so much labour and desire to remove; yet, in compassion to divers of our good subjects, who scruple the use of it as now it is, our will and pleasure is, that none be punished or troubled for not using it, until it be reviewed and effectually reformed as aforesaid.—8. Lastly, concerning Ceremonies (which have administered so much matter of difference and contention, and which have been introduced by the wisdom and authority of the Church, for edification and the improvement of piety); we shall say no more, but that we have the more esteem of all, and reverence for many of them, by having been present in many of those churches where they are most abolished or discountenanced: and it cannot be doubted but that, as the Universal Church cannot introduce one ceremony in the worship of God, that is contrary to God's word expressed in the Scripture, so every National Church, with the approbation and consent of the sovereign power, may, and hath always introduced such particular Ceremonies, as, in that conjuncture of time, are thought most proper for edification, and the necessary improvement of piety and devotion in the people, though the necessary practice thereof cannot be deduced from scripture: and that which before was, and in itself is, indifferent, ceases to be indifferent after it is once established by law; and therefore our present consideration and work is, to gratify the private consciences of those who are grieved with the use of some Ceremonies, by indulging to, and dispensing with their omitting those ceremonies, not utterly to abolish any which are established by law, (if any are practised contrary to law, the same shall cease) which would be unjust and of ill example, and to impose upon the consciences of some, for the satisfaction of the consciences of others, which is otherwise provided for. As it could not be reasonable that men should expect that we should ourself decline, or enjoin others to do so, to receive the blessed sacrament upon our knees, which, in our conscience, is the most humble, most devout, and most agreeable posture for that holy duty, because some other men, upon reasons best, if not only, known to themselves, chuse rather to do it sitting or standing. We shall leave all decisions and determinations of that kind, if they shall be thought necessary for a perfect and entire unity and uniformity throughout the nation, to the advice of a national synod, which shall be duly called, after a little time and a mutual conversation between persons of different persuasions hath mollified those distempers, abated those sharpnesses, and extinguished those jealousies which make men unfit for those consultations. And upon such advice we shall use our best endeavour that such laws may be established, as may best provide for the peace of the church and state. Provided, That none shall be denied the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, though they do not use the gesture of kneeling in the act of receiving.—In the mean time, out of compassion and compliance towards those who would forbear the Cross in Baptism, we are content that no man shall be compelled to use the same, or suffer for not doing it: But if any parent desires to have his child christened according to the form used, and the minister will not use the sign, it shall be lawful for that parent to procure another minister to do it; and if the proper minister shall refuse to omit that ceremony of the Cross, it shall be lawful for the parent, who would not have his child so baptized, to procure another minister to do it, who will do it according to his desire.—No man shall be compelled to bow at the name of Jesus, or suffer in any degree for not doing it; without reproaching those who, out of their devotion, continue that antient ceremony of the church.—For the use of the Surplice; we are contented that all men be left to their liberty to do as they shall think fit, without suffering in the least degree for wearing or not wearing it.

Provided, That this liberty does not extend to our own chapel, cathedral, or collegiate churches, or to any college in either of our Universities; but that the several statutes and customs for the use thereof in the said places, be there observed as formerly.—And because some men, otherwise pious and learned, say they cannot conform unto the Subscription required by the Canon, nor take the Oath of Canonical Obedience, we are content, and it is our will and pleasure, (so they take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy) that they shall receive ordination, institution, and induction, and shall be permitted to exercise their function, and to enjoy the profits of their livings, without the said Subscription or Oath of Canonical Obedience. And moreover, That no persons in the Universities shall, for the want of such Subscription, be hindered in the taking of their degrees. Lastly, That none be judged to forfeit his Presentation or Benefice, or be deprived of it, upon the statute of the 13th Eliz. c. 12. so he read and declare his assent to all the Articles of Religion, which only concern the confession of the true Christian Faith, and the doctrine of the Sacraments, comprised in the Book of Articles, in the said statute mentioned. In a word; we do again renew what we have formerly said in our Declaration from Breda, for the liberty of tender consciences, That no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom; and if any have been disturbed in that kind since our arrival here, it hath not proceeded from any direction of ours.—To conclude, and in this place to explain what we mentioned before, and said in our Letter to the house of commons from Breda, That we hoped, in due time, ourself to propose somewhat for the propagation of the Protestant Religion, that will satisfy the world that we have always made it both our care and our study, and have enough observed what is most like to bring disadvantage to it: we do conjure all our loving subjects to acquiesce in, and submit to, this our Declaration, concerning those differences which have so much disquieted the nation at home, and given such offence to the Protestant Churches abroad, and brought such reproach upon the Protestant Religion in general, from the enemies thereof, as if, upon obscure notions of faith and fancy, it did admit the practice of Christian duties and obedience to be discountenanced and suspended, and introduce a licence in opinions and manners, to the prejudice of the Christian Faith. And let us all endeavour, and emulate each other in those endeavours, to countenance and advance the Protestant Religion abroad, which will be best done by supporting the dignity and reverence due to the best Reformed Protestant Church at home; and which, being once freed from the calumnies and reproaches it hath undergone from these late ill times, will be the best shelter for those abroad, which will, by that countenance, both be the better protected against their enemies, and be the more easily induced to compose the differences amongst themselves, which give their enemies more advantage against them. And we hope and expect, that all men will henceforward forbear to vent any such doctrine in the pulpit, or to endeavour to work in such manner, upon the affections of the people, as may dispose them to an ill opinion of us and the government; and to disturb the peace of the kingdom; which if all men will, in their several vocations, endeavour to preserve with the same affection and zeal we ourself will do, all our good subjects will, by God's blessing upon us, enjoy as great a measure of felicity, as this nation hath ever done, and which we shall constantly labour to procure for them, as the greatest blessing God can bestow upon us in this world.—Given at our Court at Whitehall, this 25th of October, 1660."

Nov. 6. This day both houses met pursuant to adjournment. The house of lords being informed that, since their recess, the king had been pleased to confer the honour of peerage on the lord-chancellor Hyde, their lordships ordered his introduction in the usual manner; and, being created baron of Hindon, he was placed on the barons seat as the youngest baron, where he sat a-while, and afterwards resumed his place again, on the woolsack, as Speaker.

The first thing the commons did, after their meeting, was to vote the sum of 10,000*l.* to be presented to the princess Henrietta, the king's sister; who, since their recess, had come over with the queen-mother from France; the latter after an absence of 19 years. It was also moved, by Mr. Stroud, to congratulate the Queen's safe arrival. Both which were agreed to by the lords.

The King thanked for his Declaration concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs.] Sir Anth. Irby moved to return the King most hearty Thanks for his great care of the Church-Government, in his late gracious Declaration concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs, and to make an Act for confirming it. This motion was seconded by Mr. Bamfield and Mr. Stevens; which last said, They might see by this, that when the king was separated from his people in body, yet he was not so in heart. Mr. Lowther moved, That the whole house might go to the king to give him thanks; which was voted, nem. con. to be done that afternoon. Mr. Barton was not for making a law, as yet, upon the King's Declaration, because it referred to the calling of a Synod. Seconded by Mr. Chafe and Mr. Harris; and that the Book of Common Prayer should be read in the house. Sir Tho. Clarges said, That he was not against the last motion, but that the Common Prayer was never read in the house, and moved to have a law to confirm the Declaration. Mr. Annesley was for referring it to a committee to consider of it, and present it to the house. Mr. Allen, for appointing a day purposely to take this matter into consideration, and not to do it too suddenly. Sir Tho. Meres was against making any Act at all, but to leave it to a Synod. Sir John Masham, against taking it now into consideration. Mr. Bodurda was for it. However, Mr. Prynne and Mr. Jo. Stevens moving for a reference to a committee, it was voted accordingly.—Mr. Tomkins resumed the other argument about the Common Prayer, and was for having it read in the house, in which he was seconded by Mr. Finch. The Speaker said, He never heard it read in the house; but added, There was a form of Prayer in the Journal-Book, which was used to be read by the Speaker. The lord Bruce moved for having the Common Prayer read in the house, or some other set form, and not to leave it to the spirit of men. Sir Walter Erle proved his lordship for speaking so meanly of those who prayed by the Spirit. Mr. Bamfield said, He found nothing amiss in the minister's prayers. Mr. Clayton, for a set form; and Mr. Prynne moving for the old form, it was voted to refer it to a committee to inquire out the old Form, and present it to the house.

Nov. 7. The last affair was renewed. After the minister had officiated, Mr. Bamfield moved, That a Form of Prayer might not be enjoined him till the committee had made their report; and said, That the Mass might be introduced as well as a good Form, if it was done without order. Upon this, the Speaker excluded the minister from any more service till the Form was ordered.

Sir Henrage Finch brought in a Bill for an Anniversary Fast on the 30th of Jan. unless of a Sunday, for ever. Also, to attaint Oliver Cromwell, and divers others, actors in the horrid Murder of the late King, who had already suffered, or were dead. This bill was read a first time; and Mr. Prynne saying, That since the traitors heretofore read their Act for the Trial of the King twice together, he desired this might be read again, which was done and committed. Mr. Prynne also moved, That it should be referred to this committee, Whether the rest that are condemned should be executed. Sir Anth. Irby moved, That all their just debts should be considered and satisfied; but that their estates might remain to the crown for ever.

Debate on the Lord's Day Bill.] Nov. 10. Sir Wm. Wheeler reported some amendments in the Bill for the better Observation of the Lord's Day. Sir John Masham moved not to engross the bill, because it was taken care of in the King's Declaration. Sir Walter Erle spoke for it; and said, That in a former parliament, he knew a gentleman who, denying such a bill, fell down dead in the house, he giving his voice first for it, and afterwards against it. Upon which, the bill was ordered to be engrossed without any more debate about it.

Mr. Bamfield moved to have the bill read against profane Cursing and Swearing; which was done. Mr. Stevens approved it, and desired there might be a course taken against drinking of Healths.

Debate on the Alimony of Wives living apart from their Husbands.] Mr. Ferrers brought in a Bill for preventing the voluntary Separation, and living apart, of Women from their Husbands: that they should not be allowed Alimony, or have their debts paid, if they went away without consent; which was read a first time, and on which a debate ensued, as given in the MS. Diary.—Sir John Northcot said, It was not improper for an old man to speak in behalf of the women; that perhaps a young man, marrying a rich old woman, might also take it into his head to part from her, and so the woman might be ruined; therefore he moved to throw out the bill. Sir John Potts was not for falling too hastily on this matter. Mr. Knight moved for casting out the bill, because there were laws already against it; and said they ought not to be so severe to the female kind. Mr. Stevens, That the Bishops Court would take care of such things; and moved to do nothing in this matter. Mr. Hoskins, to read it again; saying, He knew a gentleman who paid 500*l.* for his wife's debts in 6 months time. Mr. Bamfield said, That it was fit women should have a livelihood; and yet not to have power to ruin their husbands by their own debts. Mr. Knightley moved to lay the bill aside; but Mr. Prynne humorously saying, That if they did, those that had ill wives would call for it again within a day or two, the question was put, Whether this bill should be read a 2nd time on the 15th inst. the house divided, Yeas 116, Noes 96.

State of the Public Debt.] Nov. 12. Sir Tho. Clarges reported the State of the Public Debt; of which he gave in an Estimate as follows:

The Estimate of the Debts of the Navy, in Charge before his majesty's coming in.

For Discharge of the Officers and Mariners Wages, Provision of Victuals and Stores, and to the Office of the Ordnance, and the extraordinary and extraordinary Expences of the several yards, the Account is estimated to 678,000*l.* Whereof the Officers and Mariners Wages, to the 10th Nov. is exactly stated (over and above the 25 ships now under consideration, and besides that number of ships his majesty receives into his pay) to amount to 248,049*l.* 8*s.* The Commissioners for disbanding the Army have estimated what money they conceive will be brought in upon the bill for Poll Money, and the Assessments; and compute that there will be wanting, to disband the remaining part of the Army, and such of the 25 ships which are not yet discharged, the sum of 422,819*l.*—His majesty's commissioners for managing the Affairs of the Navy do also offer, to be humbly represented to the consideration of the house, that all his majesty's stores are now empty, both of victual and all other necessaries for the fleet; and that the charge of renewing them will amount to 200,000*l.* Which raises the whole sum to 1,300,819*l.* 8*s.* Of which sum that which will require a present supply and

Debate thereon.] A debate arose on the stating this Account, which the MS. Diary gives in this manner: Mr. Knight first moved to raise money to pay these debts by a six-months Assessment. Mr. Prynne said, The Poll Bill had not yet raised 210,000*l.* and moved to nominate a committee to find out some other way to raise Money to pay the Public Debts. Sir John Northcot moved to borrow money of the Hollanders, and give the excise for security at 6 per cent. Mr. Stevens was for having every member examined, whether he had paid to the Poll Bill, according to his degree and estate. Sir Wm. Morrice, in a set speech, said, The Debts of the Public would be like that serpent in America, which would eat a cow at a meal and, falling asleep, the birds of prey devour him; but if they break not the bones of him he grows as big as before: so would the debts of the nation, he said, if not fully satisfied and paid off together: or like the woman's hen which she roasted with a faggot, stick by stick till the faggot was spent, and the hen still raw. But said it was fitter to do as one did in Spain to the inquisitor, who, sending to him for a dish of his pears, the man sent him the whole tree, because he would not be troubled with the inquisitor again. He concluded with moving for a year's Assessment, at 70,000*l.* a month, to do it all with credit: for the city he said, was too backward in lending money though they had got more since the king came in, than in some years before.—This motion was seconded by Mr. Pierpoint and Mr. Annesley; the latter urging, That it should be set forth that no more such tax should be laid upon the people. Mr. Young argued against borrowing the money from the Hollanders, to the dishonour of the nation. Several members beside speaking for a Grand Committee, the same was ordered to be the next morning.

Nov. 13. The house resolved into a Grand Committee for consideration of the Public Debts. Mr. Knight moved to raise money by a Land-Tax. Sir John Northcot was for not paying any of Cromwell's debts; and to leave the raising money by a land-tax to the last way of all. Serj. Maynard moved for a land rate; Mr. Trevor, for a monthly tax; and Mr. Annesley, for a year's tax. Mr. Eyrn moved to raise 800,000*l.* half by the excise, and the other half by a land-rate; and all that would advance money to be allowed 8 per cent. Mr. Palmer urged the stating the Debts; which Mr. Prynne did, but could not state them all; on which the further consideration of this business was again referred to the next morning.

A Book, then printed, intituled, "The Long Parliament revived, by Thomas Phillips, Gent." was offered to the consideration of the house as a matter wherein their privileges were much concerned. Ordered, That the said

Phillips be sent for into custody, and the matter referred to the committee for privileges.

Nov. 14. The Bill against Women, for refusing to cohabit with their Husbands, if deceased, was read a 2nd time. Mr. Ferrers spoke in behalf of it, and offered a proviso to it. Sir Wm. Lewis was for casting it out. Mr. Prynne said he was for the bill, though he never had a good or bad wife in his life. Mr. Walpole, That this was so severe a bill upon the Women, that, if a bridge was made from Dover to Calais, the women would all leave this kingdom: that it therefore inverted the proverb; and England, that was formerly the heaven, would be now the hell for women. However, the bill was committed.

Debate on the Militia Bill.] Nov. 16. Mr. Knightley brought in a bill for settling the Militia of this kingdom; which was read a first time, and on which a debate ensued, which we give from the Diary.—Mr. Pierrepont moved for casting out this bill, because there was martial law provided in it; which, he said, would be a strange grievance laid upon the people, and desired another bill might be drawn without it.—Sir Heneage Finch said, That whoever brought in martial law deserved to be made the first example of it. Neither could he ever consent to bring themselves to be wards to an army, when they were endeavouring to free themselves from being so to the king: but was for a 2nd reading, for the better understanding of this bill.—Sir Walter Erle said, He never knew any bill that ever entrenched so far upon the subject's privilege as this did, and moved for another bill. Mr. Knight spoke for this bill.—Mr. Goodricks said, It was one of the best and worst bills that could be made, and moved for an alteration. Sir Edw. Turner said, That it was fitting there should be great care taken for the settlement of the Militia; but could not agree to set up such a martial law as Mr. Pierrepont spoke of. Lord Falkland said, That the settling of the Militia heretofore occasioned all their last mischief, and therefore advised a 2nd reading.—Sir Wm. Lewis moved that the bill might be read again on that day se'nnight, since many objections might arise, the bill being of so great importance as to require much consideration about it. Serj. Charlton said, There was reason for compulsory justice for those who refuse to obey orders; and therefore moved to amend the bill speedily, and read it the next morning.

Mr. Drake questioned for writing a Book called, "THE LONG PARLIAMENT REVIVED." Nov. 17. Mr. Secretary Morrice acquainted the house, That he had found out and examined the Author of the dangerous Book, called 'The Long Parliament revived.*' That his name was William Drake; that he had confessed to him he wrote the said Book, which struck at the root of their proceedings; and that he was in custody at the door.—Captain Titus said, That he knew the man to be a loyalist, and a great sufferer for the king, but did not believe he wrote the Book, though he had the vanity to own it. This was seconded by Mr. Hollis. And Mr. Bamfield moved for slighting the business, as the best way to get rid of it. However, the prisoner was ordered to be called in, and being at the bar, the Speaker asked him, Whether he wrote that Book which was then stewn him? He confessed he did write it, but said, It was out of his depth of loyalty and integrity to the king, and for the benefit of the kingdom: that he had been a great sufferer already for the royal cause, and it would be hard indeed to make him now suffer again for doing what, he thought, was right for his sovereign. The Speaker again asked him, Whether he had the help of any one else in it? He answered, No, he had no help but only of the lord Coke's Books; and that he had put the name of Phillips to the Book, because he himself, being a merchant, could not be thought to write such a book. Mr. Drake being withdrawn, sir John Frederick and sir Edw. Massey both spoke in his favour. Mr. Prynne moved to refer it to a committee. Sir Heneage Finch said, That he could not think any thing more dangerous than the writing this Book at such a time; that it blew up this parliament totally, and damned the Act of Oblivion; and the author had shewed himself the greatest incendiary that could be, and all his former merits could not countervail this action. Therefore he moved to proceed to justice with him, and that he should stand committed, and the business be referred to the committee of privileges. All which was ordered; and that they should read over the said Book, examine and state the material points that are offensive there, and report them to the house.

Debate on the Court of Wards.] Nov. 19. This day, the commons fell into a debate on the business of the Court of Wards, and the Settlement on the King in lieu thereof. Sir Henry Cholmley said, That if the king's present Revenue was made up 1,200,000*l.* a year, the Court of Wards might be spared, without any further trouble. Sir Samuel Jones and sir Tho. Widdrington moved to raise it by the Excise. Mr. Knight was for laying 2*d.* in the pound on all the Lands in England. Mr. Pierrepont against a Land Rate; but to lay it on the Excise of Ale and Beer. Sir Tho. Bludworth against the Excise, and for a Land Rate. Mr. Annesley was for placing the tax upon Land; which, he said, ought to pay, and not to charge it upon the poor people, by way of Excise. Sir Heneage Finch moved for referring it to a committee, to propose a method for raising the sum required. Mr. Knightley and sir Walter Erle spoke for a Land Rate; which was objected to by serj. Charlton, who said, He never knew a land rate perpetual, as this must be. Sir George Reeves was rather for regulating the Court of Wards, than burden the people with taxes. Sir John Frederick for laying it upon the land, which ought to pay it.—Upon the whole, it was resolved to adjourn the debate till the 21st instant.

Resolutions against Mr. Drake's Book.] Nov. 20. Serjeant Raynesford reported that the committee appointed to examine Mr. Drake's Book had come to the following Resolutions: 1. "That the pamphlet, intituled 'The Long Parliament revived,' &c. is seditious in those particulars which were alledged at the committee. 2. That the house be moved to order, that the said Pamphlet be publicly burnt by the hands of the common hangman. 3. That the house be desired to appoint a committee for the drawing up an Impeachment, in the name of all the commons of England, against Wm. Drake, for penning and publishing of this seditious Pamphlet, to be presented to the lords. 4. That the house be moved, That the said Wm. Drake may be kept under such restraint, that none may have access to speak with him."

Debate thereon.] The MS. Diary tells us, that sir Edw. Massey presented a Petition to the house, from Mr. Drake, acknowledging his faults as a rash and inconsiderate action; that he had ever retained his loyalty, and humbly begged the king's pardon and the favour of the house. Sir Edward spoke also in his behalf, saying, That he looked upon him to be dis-temper'd, and therefore desired the favour of the house for him. Mr. Secretary Morrice said, That punishment in the Greek was the same as example, and that he ought to be made one, because he did not own their power; and moved to agree with the committee. Captain Titus spoke highly in his favour, saying, He did not think him infallible, though he knew him to be extremely loyal; but he wanted that temper of mind which he ought to have; and added, that his former merits should compensate for his present slip. Lord Falkland was for condemning him first, and then leave him to the king's mercy. Sir Harry North said, It was true he had been loyal, but did not know whether he was so then; and was for agreeing with the committee. Mr. Hyde moved to examine him again, whether any one saw this Book, and approved it before it was published, and was for agreeing with the committee. Mr. Palmer was for making him an example. Sir Heneage Finch said, The price of the book was raised, and that every one hoped all would be turned up-side down again; that the burning the book was too tame a punishment; that no man had merit enough to expiate the setting the kingdom in a flame again; and moved to agree in all with the committee. Mr. Annesley said, He did agree that the Book was seditious, but the man repented of it, and had formerly merited; that it was hard to ruin a man for the first fault, and moved to forbear a while the severity of his punishment, but to burn the book. Sir John Northcot said, It was not safe nor honourable for them to spare him; and moved to agree in all with the committee but the imprisonment. Mr. Howard, That, he was a person who was writing a 'Mene Tekel' upon the wall against them, and that they would not so much as rap him upon the fingers; that he ought to be severely punished, by being tied up to the gallows, whilst his Book was burning below it; for if he, being a friend, wrote in that manner, what would their enemies do? Sir John Potts moved to have him make a public recantation whilst his book was burning. Mr. Knight, to make an example of him, notwithstanding his former merits.—At last Mr. Harris moving to put the Resolves of the committee, singly, to the question, it was voted, nem. con. That the Book was seditious; that an Impeachment be drawn against Mr. Drake; and that sir Heneage Finch go up to the lords with it, the next morning, and carry the Book along with him.—But though this prosecution against Mr. Drake was ordered in so warm a manner, we do not find that the commons made any great haste in it. For, though the Impeachment was brought in, read, and ordered to be ingrossed, on the 26th instant, and the manner of presenting it to the lords ordered to be considered of on the 29th, we hear no more of the matter till the 4th of the next month, when the Impeachment was actually sent up to the lords by the lord Falkland; as will shortly be seen.

Further Debate on the Court of Wards.] Nov. 21. The commons went again on the business of the Court of Wards, when sir Heneage Finch opened the debate, by moving, That the annual Income to be settled on the king, in lieu thereof, might be raised by an Excise on Beer and Ale, and to take away Purveyance also. And that half of this Excise might be settled for the king's life, and the other half for ever on the crown. This motion was seconded by Mr. Bunckley and Mr. Pierepoint; but sir John Frederick, Mr. Jolliffe, sir Wm. Vincent, Mr. Annesley, and some others, spoke against it. The last-named gentleman saying, That if this bill was carried, every man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow must pay Excise, to excuse the Court of Wards, which would be a greater grievance upon all, than the Court of Wards was to a few. Sir A. A. Cooper spoke against the Court of Wards, and for the Excise. Mr. Prynne, against the Excise, saying, it was not fit to make all house-keepers hold in capite, and to free the nobility; and inveighed passionately, says the Diary, against the Excise; adding, That those Lands which ought to pay, being held in capite, should pay still. Mr. Bamfield said, He was against an everlasting Excise, and for laying the tax on lands in capite. Mr. Bainton also was against an Excise, saying, If it was carried so, they might expect that, one time or other, there would be some strange commotions by the common people about it; that he was rather for keeping the Court of Wards, regulated in its proceedings, than submit to an Excise, which, if it was kept up, an army must be so to sustain it. Sir Tho. Clarges was against the Excise, saying, That the rebellion in Naples came from impositions and excises.—This debate was ended by serj. Maynard and Mr. Trevor, who both spoke for an Excise, though the last said, that nothing but the Court of Wards taking away should have moved him to it. At last, the question being called for, the house divided, the numbers 151 against 149, when it was resolved, “That the Moiety of the Excise of Beer, Ale, Cyder, Perry, and Strong Waters, at the Rate it was now levied, shall be settled on the king’s majesty, his heirs and successors, in full recompence and satisfaction for all tenures in capite, and by knights service; and of the Court of Wards and Liveries; and all emoluments thereby accruing, and in full satisfaction of all Purveyance.” Resolved also, That the further consideration of settling a Revenue of 1,200,000*l.* a year, on the king’s majesty, be adjourned to the 23d instant.”

Message from the King concerning a Dissolution.] Nov. 23. The commons received a Message from the lords desiring a present con-

* “Soon after the Restoration,” says Mr. John Hampden, in a Tract intitled ‘Some Considerations about the most proper way of Raising Money in the present Conjunction,’ “the house of commons expressed a desire, as their predecessors had often done, to take away the Court of Wards, and they had long deliberations how to settle upon the crown a recompence for it; many ways were proposed (as is usual in such cases) but at last it was thought best to lay it on Land; and they agreed the sum to be 100,000*l.* per ann. and appointed a committee to settle an equal rate upon every county towards it. This would have procured another great advantage to the nation, and especially to the associated counties and others, that are over-taxed in the Monthly Assessment, by bringing in a just and equal way of taxing all the lands of England, according to their true value. The committee, in pursuance of the order of the house, having taken great pains in settling a new Rate, at length agreed upon one, and reported it to the house, and it is entered in the Journal. But while they were taking all these pains, the court was privately informed, by some self-designing men, that it would be of much greater advantage to them, to get a Grant of the Excise upon Beer and Ale, since the value of that was unknown; and they assured them, that it would amount to a sum vastly beyond what the parliament intended them in lieu of the Court of Wards. These men encouraged the court to undertake this work, and promised their assistance and endeavours for the success of their proposal: hereupon the court resolved to push for the settling of the whole Excise, and by threatening privately the memference in the Painted-Chamber, about a Message they received yesterday from his majesty; which being agreed to, Mr. Hollis reported the substance of the Conference as follows, viz. That the lord-chancellor was pleased to acquaint them, That, in order to that good correspondence which hath been continued, and which he desires may ever be held, between the two houses, that house had been careful to acquaint the house of commons with all matters of consequence which did occur: and that the lords having received a Message from the king’s majesty yesterday, which they desired then to have presently communicated to you, and sent their messengers to that purpose; but the important business of the house not then permitting, the lords had therefore desired this conference with them, to communicate his majesty’s Message to them; which Message was as followeth:

“C. R. In consideration of the season of the year, and the approach of Christmas, when members of parliament will desire to be at their houses in the country; and, in regard of his majesty’s Coronation within a month after Christmas, the preparation for which will take up much of his majesty’s thoughts and time, and the time of the servants, which

bers of that house with a dissolution; and by giving to some considerable places, they got a question put, to settle one Moiety of the Excise (which had been invented and raised on evident necessity, in the time of civil war, and not granted longer than a few months) upon the crown in fee, in lieu of the Court of Wards, and the other moiety on the king for his life. The former part, to give the moiety in fee in recompence of the Wardships, was carried in the affirmative, though in truth, it was the giving 300,000*l.* a year for one, for which that house is justly blamed, and will be so, as ill husbands for the kingdom, and unfaithful to their trust. A great parliament-man, late deceased, undertook to make out, it was the giving away the Barley-Land of England. The other part, viz. to give the other Moiety for Life (as much as that house was influenced by the court) was first carried in the negative, which enraged them to such a degree, that, the next day, a Message was sent to the house, to let them know they were to be dissolved a month after. This was a strange and unusual Message; they might have been quickened to dispatch public Bills, and told, the session would be but short; but the Message, as sent, put men throughout the kingdom on supplanting them. If the members staid in town (and go they could not without leave of the house) their several interests in their counties, were endangered. If they went down, the settling the Excise, for life, might be carried in their absence. This was the dilemma the court had brought them to, and accordingly it was granted before that session ended.” See APPENDIX to the present Volume.

therefore should be vacant from other business, his majesty hath thought fit to declare, That he resolves to dissolve this parliament on the 20th day of the next month, and to call another with convenient speed; and that this his purpose may be forthwith communicated to his houses of parliament, that they may the more vigorously apply themselves to the Dispatch of the most important business that depends before them. Given at our Court at Whitehall, the 20th Nov. 1660."

Further Debate on the Court of Wards. Nov. 27. The state of the King's Revenue, and the Settlement for the Court of Wards, was again taken up. Mr. Prynne began the debate, by moving the house to consider, first, what legal things might be offered to make up the king's Revenue, before they fell upon the Excise; and named the Customs of Ireland and Scotland, the Post-Office, and several others. Sir George Downing said, The Customs did not amount to 400,000*l.* a-year; and, for the improvement of the King's Parks, there were divers grants made by the late king to his servants, which were then claimed; so that those could not be valued till they were surveyed and settled; and therefore moved to settle the other Moiety of the Excise upon the king. Col. King and Mr. Boscawen moved for inquiring into the state of the king's present Revenue first, and what was wanting there, before they voted an addition. Serj. Charlton said, It was scarce possible to know exactly the value of the king's Revenue, and therefore moved for putting the question for the Excise. Hereupon, an Estimate was read of the value of the king's Revenue; which, by computation, came to 819,000*l.* odd money. To this col. Birch said, That, by his computation, he could not make it amount to more than 110,000*l.* and therefore moved to refer it to a committee to examine. Sir John Northcot said, The king's Revenue was under-rated; and moved that the Excise might be settled in full for the Revenue. Sir Heneage Finch said, It was not material whether the words 'in full,' or 'in part,' were inserted, and moved for the question; which being called for, the house, without dividing, voted, "That the other Moiety of the Excise on Beer, Ale, Cyder, Perry, Strong Waters, Chocolet, Coffee, Sherbet, and Metheglin, be settled upon the king during his life, in full of the 1,200,000*l.* per ann. revenue resolved to be settled on his majesty."—1. Resolved, "That the several particulars of Chocolet, Coffee, Sherbet, and Metheglin, be added to the former Vote for settling a Moiety of the Excise of Beer and Ale on his majesty, in compensation for the Court of Wards and Purveyances. 2. That the time for commencement of that part of his majesty's Revenue, which is to arise from the Excise of Beer, Ale, &c. be the 25th Dec. 1660. 3. That the Committee for his majesty's Revenue be revived; and that they do meet, de die in diem, in the Queen's Court."

On a motion of the lord Valentia,* it was resolved, "That it be referred to the Committee for his majesty's Revenue to state the several particular Heads from which the yearly Revenue of 1,200,000*l.* for his majesty is to arise; and to prepare Bills, as they shall find necessary, for the settling and making the same effectual, and to report the whole to the house."

Debate on the Lord's Day Bill. Nov. 28. Two religious Bills were read a 2nd time, one against the Profanation of the Lord's Day, the other against profane Cursing and Swearing, &c. Sir John Masham spoke against the former, and was for throwing it out, not being satisfied which day in the week was the Lord's Day, that ought to be kept holier than the rest, but said, It was novelty. On which Mr. Prynne got up and spoke for the Bill, alledging several reasons, and vouching divers authorities for the antiquity of the custom. Sir Ralph Ashton moved, That the Speaker should reprove sir John Masham, for what he said relating to the Sabbath. Sir John said, He spoke against the bill only because it was a transcript of one in Oliver's time, and therefore he could not consent to any thing that was done by him. To which sir George Booth answered, That the Devil spoke Scripture sometimes; and moved for both the bills to pass; which was ordered accordingly.

Debate on the King's Declaration concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs. The same day, a Bill for making the king's Declaration touching Ecclesiastical Affairs, effectual, was read a first time; on which a long debate ensued, which we give also from the MS. Diary.—Sir Allen Broderick moved to lay the bill aside, saying, The king would suddenly call a new parliament, and with them a Synod; and moved to let this alone till then. Mr. Stevens was for having the bill read again, as it would not stand with the honour of the parliament to lay it aside. Sir George Reeves was against the bill, and to be satisfied with the king's Declaration. Sir Clement Throckmorton said, That the bill gave too great a toleration, and made the Bishops no more than 'vox et præterea nihil.' Mr.

* Arthur Annesley, esq. who, by the death of his father, was then viscount Valentia, afterwards earl of Anglesey. "He was very learned, chiefly in the law. He had the faculty of speaking indefatigably upon every subject; but he spoke ungracefully, and did not know that he was not good at rallery, for he was always attempting it. He understood our government well, and had examined far into the original of our constitution. He was capable of great application, and was a man of grave deportment, but stuck at nothing, and was ashamed of nothing. He was neither loved nor trusted by any man on any side, and he seemed to have no regard to common decencies, but sold every thing that was in his power: and sold himself so often that at last the price fell so low that he grew useless." Burnet, vol. i. p. 97.

Buckley said, That without a bill the Declaration would be insignificant; that it was very fitting that many things in the Liturgy should be altered. He produced a Book, printed in 1641, which was the Opinions of the bishops of Armagh and Lincoln, Dr. Prideaux, Dr. Ward, Dr. Featly, and Dr. Hacket, that several things in the Liturgy should be rectified; and moved for another reading of the bill. Mr. Henry Hünigerford moved, That all those, who pretended to so much loyalty, should agree with the king's desire, that they might all go down into the country, and be well accepted there; which, he said, they could not better deserve, than by setting this great affair in order before their dissolution.—Mr. Howard said, That the present business was of the highest concernment that ever yet was brought before them, wherein the honour of God was so much concerned, as well as the peace of the nation. He moved, therefore, that the bill should be read again in 3 days. Sir Rd. Temple said, That there was no repugnancy between the Declaration and the bill; and moved for having it read again at the same time.—Sir Tho. Meres spoke against the bill, and said, That to make this bill a law was the way to make all papists and other heretics, rejoice, since it would wholly remove all conformity in the church; and therefore moved to lay the bill aside, and leave it to another parliament and a Synod. Mr. John Stevens said, The King had taken much time and deliberation to consider it well, before he published his Declaration. To this Mr. Secretary Morrice added, That the same man who was sick might be cured with a medicine at one time, which would not help at another; and that some things are reasonable now, which were not so at another. That matters were not only to be done, but well done. Sometimes a wound would heal of itself, if you applied nothing to it; and added, that time would rather do that good which they desired, than to have it enforced by a bill; and therefore he was for laying it aside.—Mr. Young said, He had rather the bill had never been brought in, than that it should now be laid aside; that the Ceremonies of the Church were not of that great weight, as to embroil us again in a new war: but that some indulgence ought to be given to such as had ventured their lives for the good of all. He said, he could not hope for any benefit to be had by a Synod, because the spirits of the clergy, for their late sufferings, would be much higher in resentment than the minds of the house were there; and moved for a 2nd reading. Sir Solomon Swale spoke against the bill, but for the Declaration, saying, That since the government of the Church was despised, how were they fallen into confusion? And moved, that the laws established might suffice, and not frame this into a new one. Mr. Bourdard said, The king, by his Declaration, having desired an indulgence, he hoped they would not resist it; and therefore he moved the bill might pass, till the first session of the next parliament. Sir John Masham said, They had before them an excellent Declaration, metamorphosed into a very ugly bill; that the king's intention was for a settlement of Religion amongst us, which surely this bill did thwart; and moved to throw it out. Mr. Pryune answered the last speaker, and said, The Declaration was to settle peace in the kingdom only, which the bill did not confirm; and what a wonder would it be, after they had given the king thanks, to throw out the bill. Mr. Thurlaud said, It was very disputable, whether such an excellent Declaration would make an excellent law: he thought not, giving so great a toleration, and endeavouring to lessen the Liturgy. He added, that he never knew a Declaration, by wholesale, voted into an act; and moved to lay this aside for the present. Col. Shapcot said, That the king's honour and the honour of the house, were both concerned in this bill. That Ireland was highly pleased with the Declaration, and begged for bowels of mercy one towards another; and was for the bill. Sir Heneage Finch was as much for indulgence to tender consciences as any; but said, It must then be used and allowed to such as could not consent to such a liberty as the bill offered: neither did he think it was the king's desire to have it put into a bill; that the Catholics would upbraid them with doing injury to them, for so many years, for not going to Church, when we were going, says he, by an act, to tolerate it in others. He was not for taking away the rule of conformity, nor yet for throwing out the bill; but he wished it had never been brought in, and moved for a 2nd reading some other time, rather on that day se'nnight.—Mr. Swinfen was for having the bill read again in 3 days, saying, Nothing was more hoped by the people, than the passing this bill; and therefore they ought not to deceive them: that he thought it would not grate the Bishops at all, because they were with the king at the framing the Declaration. Lord Bruce said, They might as well make every act of grace from the king into a law as this, which he was utterly against; and moved to adjourn the debate. Serj. Maynard concluded this long debate, in saying, He was against passing the bill, because it gave too great a liberty, yet would not seem to reject it by a vote, because the king's Declaration, on which the bill was built, was so pleasing to every one. He moved rather to put the question, Whether the bill should be read a 2nd time? The house dividing upon it, the numbers were 157 for, and 183 against, a 2nd reading.

Debate on the Restitution of the Title of Duke of Norfolk.] Dec. 3. The bill for the Restitution of the Earl of Arundel, &c. to the Title of Duke of Norfolk, was brought from the committee to whom it was referred, unaltered, and was read a 3rd time.

The MS. Diary informs us, that Mr. Stevens spoke very earnestly against passing the bill, saying, That the earl was always bred amongst those who were enemies to the protestants; that the earl was distracted; and that if he was here, it was a question whether they would confirm the Title; for, in his opinion, it was giving honour to the man in the moon. Sir Robert Paston said, That the earl's want of senses should rather gain him more advocates than enemies; that the lords had already examined witnesses concerning his present condition of mind, and were satisfied with it; that he himself was not satisfied fully concerning the death of the late duke of Norfolk, but thought the restoration of the honour could be no prejudice to any one; and therefore moved to have the bill pass. Mr. Prynne spoke against the bill, saying, It was nonsense, because it did not express from whence the first honour came, nor to whom given; that here was no patent produced, nor any form how the late duke was attainted; and said, the earl ought to have petitioned for his honour; but that here was no such thing. Sir Rd. Onslow moved for the bill, saying, That he was one of the guardians, and thought it very fit it should pass. Mr. Thomas moved to have that part of the bill, which reflected upon queen Elizabeth, amended at the table, and then to pass it. Serj. Charlton said, The house was not ready yet for passing the bill, without examining the record and the indictment of the late duke; that it was fitting the earl himself should be here, but if he was so far distracted, it was better to take his honour from him, and bestow it upon the next worthy person in the family; adding, that it was fitter to use the earl as Nebuchadnezzar was, to send him amongst beasts, for he had not the ordinary cleanliness of one; and moved to re-commit the bill.—Mr. Bamfield said, he did not understand why they should confer honour upon a mad man; neither was it fit to give an act of grace to those of the Popish religion.—Serj. Raynesford was against bestowing honours upon any of the Popish religion, which he understood this family was of; and unless they took the oaths he was against the bill. But, lastly, Mr. Trevor and sir George Reeves, speaking for the bill, the question was called for, and, being put, the house divided upon it, yeas 187, noes 116.

Debate on the Bill of Attainder.] Dec. 4. Mr. Thomas reported to the house, from the committee, some amendments and three provisos to the bill of Attainder, which were read. Mr. Ratcliffe moved for an allowance to be made of just debts, legacies, and funeral expences, out of this Forfeiture of those four persons estates who have been attainted after their deaths, viz. Cromwell, Pride, Bradshaw, and Ireton. Sir John Northcot was against paying the Funeral Expences of Cromwell and Bradshaw. Mr. Allen and lord Valentia moved in favour of the executors, That they might not be ruined for what they had paid, because they were compelled to pay the legacies by law; but that a proviso might be added to the bill concerning it. Sir Heneage Finch said, That this bill was the prime sacrifice to justice that the parliament had made; that neither the queen, nor any of the royal family, had the least relief from those people, but were left to starve in exile; and moved that, if the debts on bond be allowed them, the book-debts should be so too; that the bill should be engrossed, and such provisos taken care for as were proper to be received. Mr. Hollis said, He had as great an abhorrence of that black crew as any one; and therefore moved rather to consider the poor creditors, their wives and children, and the executors, by a proviso. Serj. Charlton said, That, in Scripture, we are told that the whole familia of traitors were destroyed: that the case was not alike in private bonds, as it was in this, where the persons were attainted. He moved to leave it to the law, whether to allow any legacies or not; but added, It was reasonable the legatee should refund. Sir A. A. Cooper said, There was reason to allow Settlements before marriage, or as far retrospect as 1647. Col. Shapcot said, That to deny the payment of their debts, was to punish the honest creditors, not the offenders; and therefore moved to consider those poor people, by a proviso large enough for the purpose. Mr. Prynne spoke against any proviso, saying, There were none for the Gunpowder Traitors, nor any else that ever were traitors before. Captain Titus ended this debate, by observing, That execution did not leave traitors at their graves, but followed them beyond it: and that, since the heads and limbs of some were already put upon the gates, he hoped the house would order that the carcasses of those devils, who were buried at Westminster, Cromwell, Bradshaw, Ireton, and Pride, might be torn out of their graves, dragged to Tyburn, there to hang for some time, and afterwards be buried under the gallows.—This motion was agreed to, says the Diary, nem. con.: this is confirmed by the Journals, where the Order is entered at large. Ordered also, That James Norfolk, esq. serjeant at arms, should see execution done upon the bodies; and that capt. Titus do carry up the Order to the Lords for their concurrence; which was agreed to the same day.*—The Bill to be engrossed.

Articles of Impeachment against Drake for publishing a Pamphlet intitled the "Laws

* This Order was not executed till January 30, after the dissolution of this parliament, when a chronological Historian of these Times gives us this Account of it: "This day, Jan. 30; 1660-1, the odious Carcasses of Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, and John Bradshaw, were taken out of their graves, drawn upon sledges to Tyburn, and being pulled out of their coffins, there hanged at the several angles of the triple tree, till sun-set; then taken down, beheaded, and their loathsome trunks thrown into a deep hole under the gallows. Their heads were afterwards set upon poles on the top of Westminster-Hall." Gesta Britannorum: or a succinct Chronology, &c. By sir George Wharton. London, 1667.

PARLIAMENT RESTORED."] This day, also, the long-designed Impeachment against William Drake was ordered to be carried up to the lords, by the lord Falkland, and delivered at the bar of that house, in the name of the house of commons, and of all the commons in England. This Impeachment is entered in both the Journals, as follows:

"The Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons, in the name of themselves and all the commons of England, do hereby declare, complain and shew, against William Drake, citizen and merchant of London;

"That whereas this present parliament, through the blessing of God upon their endeavours, and the incomparable grace and goodness of his majesty's royal condescensions, have proved the happy instruments of repairing the breaches of this kingdom, restoring the antient foundations, and passing many good and wholesome laws for the safety and quiet of the people, and are daily preparing such others as may yet seem to be wanting.—Nevertheless the said Wm. Drake, in contempt of his majesty's crown and dignity, and of the laws and government of this kingdom, and out of a wicked and malicious intention to scandalize and subvert the authority and being of this present parliament, and to raise and stir up sedition and division in this kingdom, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, hath lately, that is to say, upon or before the 18th day of Nov. last at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, written, printed, and published, in the name of one Thomas Phillips, gentleman, a certain false, wicked, malicious, and seditious Pamphlet, intituled, 'The Long

'Parliament revived; or An Act for Continuation, and the not dissolving the Long Parliament, called by king Charles the First, in the year 1640, but by an act of parliament, with undeniable Reasons deduced from the said Act, to prove, that That Parliament is not yet dissolved. Also Mr. William Prynne's five Arguments fully answered, whereby he endeavours to prove it to be dissolved by the King's Death, &c. By Thomas Phillips, Gentleman, a sincere Lover of the King and Country." In which said scandalous and seditious Pamphlet the said Drake, amongst many other wicked expressions, clauses, and assertions therein contained, doth falsely, maliciously, and seditiously affirm and declare, 1. That all other Parliaments have no legal capacity, till this (meaning the Long Parliament, called in the year 1640) be legally dissolved. 2. The Act (meaning the Act of Parliament to which the title of the Pamphlet refers) is herein express, That by no other way or means, but by an act of parliament, it shall be dissolved; which, as it cannot be done by the dead king, but may be done by the successor, it ought to be so dissolved; or else it must and doth by virtue of this act, still remain legally in full being and authority. 3. How much it were to be wished, that the legislative authority might revert into that chanel (meaning the Long Parliament aforesaid) by which the peace and settlement of the nation, through his majesty's most gracious influence, might durably, and without question, be provided for and preserved. 4. If that be a lawful parliament, (speaking of the Long Parliament aforesaid which he elsewhere affirmed to be in being) then this can be none, nor no other, till this be legally dissolved.—All which practices for stirring up of sedition, the commons are ready to prove, not only by the general scope of the said Book, but likewise by several clauses therein contained, besides these before-mentioned, and such other proofs as the cause, according to the course of parliament, shall require. And do pray, that the said Wm. Drake may be put to answer all and every of the premises; and that such proceeding, examination, trial, judgment, and exemplary punishment, may be thereupon had and executed as is agreeable to law and justice."

The lords ordered this Impeachment to be read, after which they made another Order That the said Wm. Drake should be apprehended as a delinquent, by the serjeant at arms, and brought before them the next morning, to answer to his charge; which being done, and he confessing his fault, the lords, in consideration of the shortness of time for proceeding further in this business, left him to be prosecuted in the King's Bench by the attorney-general; where what further was done with him we know not.

Debate on the Bill of Attainder renewed.] Dec. 7. This day, Sir Hencage Finch delivered in the Bill of Attainder engrossed. Mr. Prynne observed upon the providence of God, That the bill should be brought in at the very time, which was upon the same day 19 years, that the King's Trial was agreed on. He therefore moved, that some others of the regicides, who had surrendered themselves, should be put into this bill and now executed, particularly the lawyers, and named Garland. Captain Titus seconded this motion, and named sir Hardress Waller, who, he said, was a pensioner to the late king, saying, The Turks would not eat the bread of any man they meant to betray; and that a Roman servant, who betrayed his master, though for the publick good, was executed.—After some further debate the Bill passed. The title of it was, 'An Act for the Attainder of several Persons guilty of the horrid Murder of his late sacred majesty king Charles I.'

Resolutions for taking up the Bodies of Cromwell, &c.] Dec. 8. The lords returned the Order sent up to them before, for taking up the Bodies of Cromwell, &c. with a small addition to it, which was agreed to. The Order, as entered in both the Journals, stands thus, viz. "Resolved, by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, That the Carcasses of Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, John Bradshaw, Tho. Pride, (whether buried in Westminster-Abbey, or elsewhere) be, with all expedition, taken up, and drawn upon a hurdle to Tyburn, and there hanged up in their coffins for some time; and, after that, buried under the said gallows: and that James Norfolk, esq. serjeant at arms, do take care that this Order be put in effectual execution by the common executioner for the county of Middlesex; and all such others, to whom it shall respectively appertain, who are required, in their several places, to conform to, and observe, this Order, with effect; and the sheriff of Middlesex is to give his assistance herein, as there shall be occasion; and the dean of Westminster is desired to give directions to his officers of the Abbey to be assistant in the execution of this Order."

Protest on a Bill to vacate certain Fines.] Dec. 13. An Act to vacate certain Fines unduely procured to be levied by sir Edw. Powel, knt. and bart. and dame Mary his wife, was read a 3rd time. The question being put, whether this Bill shall pass for a law? It was resolved in the affirmative. Upon which the following Protest was entered:

"Whereas before the question was put for passing the said Bill, leave was desired for entering Protestations in the behalf of the lords here underwritten, in case the vote upon the said Act should be carried in the affirmative, we, in pursuance thereof, do enter our Protests against the said Act for these reasons following: That Fines are the foundations of the assurances of the realm, upon which so many titles do depend, and therefore ought not to be shaken; nor hath there any precedent occurred to us, wherein any Fines have been vacated by judgment or act of parliament, or otherwise, without consent of the parties; the eye of the law looking upon Fines as things always transacted with consent, and with that reverence, that no averment whatsoever shall be good against them when they are perfected; and farther, we conceive, that by a future law to vacate assurances, which are good by the standing law, is unreasonable and of a dangerous consequence, especially in this case, where Skinner and Chute, purchasers of a considerable part of the lands comprized in the said Fines, have petitioned, and yet have not been heard upon the merits of their case, which is contrary, as we conceive, to the statute of 28 Edw. 3. c. 3. which saith, 'No man shall be put out of his land or tenement, nor disinherited, without being brought to answer by due process of law.' (Signed) Edw. Hyde, C. F. Montague, W. Say and Seale, T. Culpeper, T. Willoughby, Portland, Sandys, Will. Petre, Cha. Hatton, Ch. Richmond and Lenox, Manchester, Tho. Coventry, W. Roberts, Brecknock, Norwich, Brudenell, L. Howard, W. Grey, Albemarle, Berkshire. A. Capell, Ro. Lexington, Suffolk, Stafford, Fr. Dacre, P. Wharton."

Debate on the Bill for settling the Excise on the King for Life.] Dec. 14. Sir Heneage Finch brought in a bill from the Committee, for settling on the King, during his life, the other Moiety of the Excise on Beer, Ale, and other liquors;* which was read twice, and ordered to be referred to a Grand Committee, who were to sit de die in diem till that business was dispatched.—As it has ever been the custom of parliament to go upon Grievances whenever subsidial Bills were in agitation, so now, when this grand Settlement on the Crown was before the commons, this old affair was resumed, but it was somewhat singular to talk of Grievances in a government so newly established, though upon its old foundation. On this occasion, Sir Walter Erle moved to do somewhat for the good of the people, in lieu of these great payments, and complained of some disorders in the Army. He said, That soldiers had come into some houses he knew of, and calling the people 'Roundheads, had done much mischief; which he moved might be taken care of. This

* The celebrated Andrew Marvell, in his first Letter to the Corporation of Hull, writes thus: "The Excise bill for longer continuance (I wish it prove not too long) will come in next week. And I foresee we shall be called upon shortly to effect our vote made the former sitting of raising his majesty's Revenue to 1,200,000*l.* per ann. I do not love to write so much of this money news, but I think you have observed that Parliaments have been always made use of to that purpose, and though we may buy gold too dear, yet we must at any rate be glad of peace, freedom, and a good conscience." Vol. i. p. 4.

Dr. Granger in his Biographical History of England speaks thus of Marvell: "He was an admirable master of ridicule, which he exerted with great freedom in the cause of liberty and virtue. He never respected vice for being dignified, and dared to attack it wherever he found it, though on the throne itself. There never was a more honest satirist. His pen was always properly directed, and had some effect upon such as were under no check or restraint from any laws human or divine. He hated corruption more than he dreaded poverty; and was so far from being venal, that he could not be bribed by the king into silence; when he scarce knew how to procure a dinner. He was chosen member of parliament for Kingston upon Hull, before and after the Restoration. The people of that place, who honoured his abilities, but pitied his poverty, raised a contribution for his support. This was probably the last borough in England that paid a representative. As even trivial anecdotes of so ingenious and so honest a man are worth preserving, I shall subjoin the following, taken from a MS. of Mr. John Aubrey, who personally knew him: 'He was of a middling stature, pretty strong set, roundish faced, cherry-cheeked, hazel eyed, brown haired. He was, in his conversation, very modest and of very few words. He was wont to say, he would not drink high or freely with any one, with whom he would not trust his life.'" Vol. iii. p. 357 and vol. iv. p. 49.

motion was seconded by sir John Northcot, who moved for a Committee to consider of it, and present the Grievances to the lords; and if they would not redress them, then this house to remonstrate to the king. Col. King complained against the arbitrary power of lord-lieutenants, particularly the lord Derby. Mr. Stevens said, That as he had lived an Englishman, he desired to die so, and not to leave his posterity slaves. He spoke also against the lord-lieutenants, and moved for a Committee to examine all Abuses. Sir George Booth for the same; saying, There were very great abuses abroad. Mr. Palmer moved to check col. King, who mistook his information concerning lord Derby. Mr. Harry Hungerford spoke also against the exorbitancies; averring, That, to his knowledge, in some places, 2s. 9d. a-day was exacted for each trooper, and this especially whilst the parliament is sitting; and moved to acquaint the king with these Grievances.—Sir Heneage Finch said, The remedy was to be had without going out of the door; it was but to resume the Debate of the Militia, whereby all these abuses might be regulated. He moved against any Remonstrance; which, he said, was the wilderness in which at first they wandered to destruction; and was not for having them sully the glory of their offering the Revenue, with a complaint to the king at the same time.—The debate still continuing, lord Howard said, That these complaints were not so universal as some would make them. He justified the district where he had to do from any such thing; but that it all might be remedied by resuming the Militia bill. Mr. Bunckley was satisfied that there were such Abuses done; but said, That in his county all was quiet, by the care of the lord-lieutenant there; yet was for a bill to restrain all. Mr. Bamfield acquainted the house, That he had a petition given him, by one, against the lord Derby, about a minister kept out of his church, whilst another was put into it by lord Derby's soldiers, who had taken possession of the minister's house: that they knocked him down several times, crying, 'Is the rogue living still?' That they also knocked down his wife, which made her miscarry; and, after thus injuring her, turned them both out of doors. But yet, he said, That, in all these complaints, there was no reflection thrown upon his majesty, but on those employed under him. He thought the bill for the Militia could not now be finished in time; but moved to acquaint the king with these matters, and desire his care and reproof therein. In answer to this charge against the lord Derby's soldiers, Mr. Rigby stood up and said, That he came through the town where the minister lived, and dwelt himself not far from thence, and he heard nothing of this great complaint made by Mr. Bamfield: since he got to town, he heard that this minister, Mr. Jesop, refused to give obedience to a replevin, which caused a great opposition by the sheriff's officers, and some violence was offered him on that account: that he got guns into his house to oppose the lawful minister, who was come to take possession; and therefore left it to the house to consider of this complaint.—Sir Samuel Jones moved for the Militia bill, that they might know, he said, how to govern and be governed. Lord Falkland told the house, That the king had taken care for all these things; and moved to go to the business of the day. Sir A. A. Cooper said, Those things had no approbation from his majesty, but checks; and moved for a law to know how to walk by a rule; but to pass over such things as could not be justified. At last, Serj. Maynard moving for some Amendments to be made to the old Militia bill, it was ordered, That the grand committee do meet that afternoon about it.

Dec. 14. This day somewhat remarkable happened, in regard to the Rules of the house of commons. Serj. Maynard moved, That the Speaker would reprove all persons that he observed talking, or but whispering, or reading a paper. Very soon after, and whilst a bill was reading, the Speaker took notice of some gentlemen that were talking near the bar; whereupon it was ordered, "That every member of this house, who shall stand in the passage by the door of this house, shall forfeit 12d. to be paid to the serjeant to the use of the Poor of Westminster."

Dec. 15. The first Bill for settling an Equivalent on the king for taking away the Court of Wards, was passed in the commons, after a great number of additions, alterations, and amendments made to it. The Bill for settling the other Moiety, &c. was referred to Monday.

Dec. 17. The celebrated Mr. John Milton having now laid long in custody of the serjeant at arms, was released by order of the house. Soon after, Mr. Andrew Marvel complained that the serjeant had exacted 150*l.* fees of Mr. Milton; which was seconded by col. King and col. Shapcot. On the contrary, sir Heneage Finch observed, That Milton was Latin secretary to Cromwell, and deserved hanging. However, this matter was referred to the committee of privileges to examine and decide the difference.

The second Bill of Settlement passed.] This day, also, the bill for the other Settlement on the King was read and passed.

Sir John Northcot made a motion, That there might be 5 or 6000*l.* given to the king to buy Jewels for the Crown, the rest being stolen from it; seconded by the lord Valentia, and to make it up 10,000*l.* as a mark of the favour of the house, having taken away such a jewel from the crown as the Court of Wards. Mr. Prynne was also for the motion; but for sir Henry Mildmay to pay it, having, as he said, stolen the former.—Lord Howard was for the motion, as also sir Wm. Lewis, who moved for laying a Month's Assessment to raise the money, rather than charge it on the Excise, according to others. Sir Heneage Finch seconded this last motion; and, accordingly, it was ordered, "That a Month's Assessment, after the rate of 70,000*l.* per mensem, be granted to the king towards the charges of his majesty's Coronation, and to buy Jewels for the crown, suitable to his honour and grandeur, and as a memorial of the respect and affection of this house to his sacred majesty."

Debate on the Post Office Bill.] Captain Titus reported the bill for the Settlement of the Post-Office, with the amendments; which were agreed to. Sir Walter Erle delivered a Proviso for the letters of all members of parliament to go free during their sitting. Sir Heneage Finch said, It was a poor mendicant Proviso, and below the honour of the house. Mr. Prynne spoke also against the proviso. Mr. Buncley, Mr. Boscawen, sir Geo. Downing, and serj. Charlton, for it; the latter saying, The council's letters went free. The question being called for, the Speaker was unwilling to put it, saying, He was ashamed of it; nevertheless the Proviso was carried and made part of the Bill.

Dec. 21. Mr. Hollis acquainted the house, That he had just met the lord chancellor, who told him the king had expected, ever since yesterday, to hear from the house that their business was ready, that he might dissolve the parliament: therefore he moved, That this day and to-morrow all might be dispatched, so as they might have nothing to do on the next, but wait upon the king.

An accident happened this day in the house of commons, which occasioned some merriment amongst them. The lords sent down two messengers with some bills they had passed, with some amendments; to which the bearers said, The lords humbly desired the concurrence of that house. When these were withdrawn, the MS. Diary says, a hearty laughter ensued at the word humbly, and some moved to have it so put down in the Journals, as a precedent.

Dec. 22. The lords sent down the Post-Office Bill with an alteration, That the letters of the members of the house of commons should not go free; to which that house assented.

Message from the King concerning a Dissolution.] Dec. 22. A Conference was desired by the lords concerning a Message from the King; which, at their meeting, the lord chancellor reported, That he had delivered the King's Message to the commons, which ran in these words, viz.

"His majesty hath expected, ever since Thursday morning, to be informed, that his two houses of parliament had been ready to present such Bills to him as they had prepared for his royal assent, and hath continued ever since in the same expectation, and hoped that he might, this day, have finished the work, and dissolved them according to his signification; but being informed that there are yet depending in both houses some few Bills of great importance to his and the public service, which are not yet ready to be presented to him; and being desirous to part with his two houses of parliament, who have deserved so well of him, in such a manner, that they may not be obliged to use more expedition in the dispatch, than is agreeable to the affairs which are to be dispatched, his majesty is graciously pleased to declare, That he will be ready to pass such Bills as are necessary, in point of time, to be passed, on Monday morning; and then that the houses adjourn till Thursday, so that they may have that day and Friday to put an end to those most public Bills which are not yet finished; and his majesty will on the next day, being Saturday the 30th of this month, be present with them, and dissolve the parliament; and his majesty desires both houses, against that time, to lay aside all business of private concernment to finish all public Bills."

Dec. 24. The commons received a Message from the King, commanding the Speaker and the house to attend him in the house of lords: on which they all went up; when the Speaker, as the Diary says, presented his majesty, in a handsome speech, with the Bill for taking away the Court of Wards and Purveyance, to which the king gave his consent: likewise the Bill for setting the Moiety of the Excise on Ale, Beer, and other Liquors, for increase of his majesty's Revenue during Life. For which the king, in very few words, gave thanks at present; but said he would enlarge himself on Saturday following, the day appointed for dissolving the parliament.—On the return of the Commons to their own house, sir Heneage Finch moved to adjourn to the 27th, in regard the lords did so. Mr. Pierepoint desired that the King's last Letter might not be entered in the Journals, lest it should be thought the house adjourned solely upon that Message, which might be construed a Breach of Privilege (though he himself did wholly submit and comply with the king's desire); for, he said, That the king could not adjourn the house, though he could dissolve it; but that the house must adjourn, as an act only of itself. This was the reason the Letter was not entered as usual.

The King dissolves the Parliament.] After this, the commons reassumed, once more, the Bill on the Arrears of Excise, and had proceeded in the debate so far as to order the blanks in the bill to be filled up; when the usher of the black rod came to the door, and the house being informed of it, the Speaker, with the rest of the members, went up to the house of peers.

The Speaker of the House of Commons' Speech to the King.] His majesty being seated on the throne, the Speaker addressed himself to him as follows:

"Most gracious and dread sovereign; The knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled in parliament, being the representative body of your commons of England, are, as conduits, or quills, to convey the streams of your people's dutiful affections and humble desires into your royal presence; and that being done, they need no other Speaker but yourself, for they know your skill, and have had experience of your will: and yet, royal sir, though they have no cause to complain, they cannot but take notice of your partiality; for when any thing in point of right, or but conveniency, hath fallen out to be, as we use to say, a measuring cast, a disputable case, between yourself and your people, without any regard or respect had to your own right, or the advantage that might accrue to yourself by asserting the same, if the good of your people hath come in competition with it, you have always cast it against yourself, and given it on your people's side.—Royal sir; thus to undo yourself to do your people good, is not to do as you would be done unto; and can we do less than, by a grateful retribution, cheerfully to pay your majesty the just tribute of our dutiful obedience unto all your royal commands; and, upon all occasions, ready to sacrifice, se et sum, all that we have or enjoy, lives and fortunes, in the service of such an incomparable sovereign?—But, royal sir, it becomes not me to fill your majesty's ears with air: loquere ut te videam is the only rhetoric the people ought to use to such a king of kindness, and a prince so full of good works; and therefore, as I am commanded, I must humbly assure your majesty that the many healing expedients propounded by yourself, in your several most gracious Declarations, have been the subject-matter upon which your commons have wrought all this parliament: and, in the first place, they took into consideration the great and growing charges which then lay upon your people for the Pay of your Army and Navy; and they conceived it necessary to begin with that part thereof next at hand, wherein your people would receive the most ease and the greatest security and satisfaction, which was the disbanding your majesty's forces by land, and the paying off 25 of your ships then in the harbour, and of no use; and this led them to the consideration of such Ways and Means as were to be used to raise money for that purpose; and that for Poll-Money being propounded and passed, some were of opinion that that alone would have over-done the work, others having had experience of a former bill of the same nature, and upon the like occasion, fearing it might not answer expectation, and being unwilling to be deceived the second time, especially in such a business as this, wherein a mistake was like to prove so penal, moved for a further supply (which, after some debate, was agreed upon) of a two-months Assessment, at 70,000*l.* per month; and both have not yet fully done the work for which they were designed; but with the help of two other Bills here in my hand, the one intituled, 'An Act for the levying the Arrears of the 12 months Assessment, commencing June 21, 1659, and the 6 months Assessment, commencing Dec. 25, 1659;' and the other intituled, 'An Act for the speedy provision of Money, for disbanding and paying off the Forces of this kingdom, both by land and sea,' they hope this account will be fully cleared off at last.—Sir, your commons have likewise taken into their consideration the charge of your Summer Fleet; which, besides that part thereof, your majesty is pleased to take upon yourself for your ordinary guard of the seas, will amount to a very great sum; and as it is a great debt; so it is a growing debt: in a few months it doubles. There is a saying, 'qui cito dat, bis dat;' I am sure it must be true in this case, qui cito solvit, bis solvit, to pay his debt readily is the way to pay but once; and to take time to pay it is the sure way to pay it twice; and therefore your commons, laying aside the sad thoughts of their long sufferings, and those miserable devastations and pressures they have lain under for many years last past; and looking upon the necessity of affairs, which call importunately, and must be answered effectually, 'hath passed another bill here in my hand, intituled, 'An Act for 6 months Assessment of 70,000*l.* per mensem, to begin the 1st of Jan. and to be paid in, the one moiety thereof before the 1st of Feb. and the other moiety, being the remaining part, by the 1st of April next ensuing;' which is to be applied wholly in paying off the Arrears of your majesty's Army and Navy.—I have three other Bills in my hand, which have relation to your majesty's Revenue, and are branches thereof; the one intituled, 'An Act for the better ordering the selling of Wines by retail, and for preventing of abuses in mingling, corrupting, and vitiating of Wines, and for settling and limiting the prices of the same;' and the bill is tendered unto your majesty for preventing all further disputes touching the legality thereof, for we know it is your majesty's desire, that nothing might be done by any of your officers or ministers that act under you, sine figura justitię et warranto legis. Another is intituled, 'An Act for erecting and establishing a Post-Office;' and this being likewise legally settled, will be of very great use to all your majesty's people, and especially your merchants, for holding intelligence with their correspondents, factors, and agents, in foreign parts, literę sunt indices animi; and without the safe and speedy dispatch and conveyance of their letters, they will never be able to time their business, nor carry on their trade to an equal advantage with the merchants of other countries. The other Bill provides for the increase of your majesty's ordinary and constant Revenue, by the grant of an impost to be taken upon Ale, Beer, and other beverages therein particularly mentioned and expressed, to hold to your majesty for life, which God long continuę. And as it is the desire of your commons that your majesty might never be necessitated to resort to any extraordinary or unparliamentary Ways and Means, for the raising of Money upon your people, so they likewise acknowledge it to be their desires to support and uphold, to the utmost of their powers, the honour and grandeur of your majesty's royal state and dignity.—And for a further evidence of your commons dutiful affections to your majesty's most dear and royal person, they have passed another Bill for the raising of 70,000*l.* for your majesty's further Supply; all which bills I am commanded humbly to present your majesty withal, and to pray your gracious acceptance thereof, and your royal assent thereunto.—There are other bills likewise, of public concernment, which have passed both houses, and do now attend upon your majesty, waiting for your royal assent; the one is intituled, 'An Act for the Attainder of several persons guilty of the horrid Murder of his late sacred majesty, your royal father of ever blessed memory.' There is another Bill, intituled, 'An Act for the confirmation of Leases and Grants from Colleges and Hospitals;' this will tend much to the quitting many men's estates that in the late unhappy times were enforced to renew and change their estates much for the worse, were it not for the favour your majesty intends them in this Bill: there is another bill to prohibit the exportation of Wool, Wool-Fells, Fullers Earth, or any other scouring earth: woollen manufactures, besides the duties they pay for your majesty's customs here at home, have great impositions laid upon them in foreign parts where they are vended, in the Low Countries 16 or 17 per cent. and in Portugal 20 per cent. at least; but those who, for their own filthy lucre sake, having no regard or respect to the public good, that steal over the materials of which those manufactures are made, pay not one penny here or there, and by that means strangers do make those manufactures of our wool upon such easy terms, that they can afford, and do undersell your merchants; which is the occasion of a double loss, first, to your majesty in your customs, and, in the next place, to your people, who are thereby disheartened and discouraged; and in a short time, if not prevented, will be utterly beaten out of that ancient native staple trade, upon which many thousand families do wholly depend for all their livelihood and subsistence.—There is another Bill, intituled, 'An Act to prohibit the planting, setting, or sowing of Tobacco in England and Ireland.' This climate is so cold that it never comes to any maturity or perfection; for we find, by experience, though it be ever so well healed, and made up with the greatest art and skill that can be possible, yet it is impossible, after it is made up into the roll, to keep and preserve it from putrifying above 3 or 4 months at the most; and therefore physicians, even those that love it best and use it most, conclude, generally, that it is unwholesome for men's bodies; besides many other great damages and inconveniences will follow upon it, if it should be permitted, the abatement of your majesty's customs, the destruction of your plantations abroad, the discouragement of navigation, and so consequently the decay of shipping, which are the walls and bulwarks of your majesty's kingdom.—There is another bill, intituled, 'An Act for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, together with Tenures in capite, Knight's Service, Tenures, and Purveyances.' This bill, ex re nata, may properly be called a bill of exchange; for as care is therein taken for the ease of your people, so the supply of that part of your majesty's revenue, which formerly came into your treasury by your tenures, and for your purveyances is thereby likewise full provided for by the grant of another imposition, to be taken upon ale, beer, and other liquors, to hold to your majesty, your heirs and successors for ever; and that they should not look upon the considerations, mentioned in this bill, as a full compensation and recompence for your majesty's parting with two such royal prerogatives and ancient flowers of the crown, if more were not implied than is expressed; for, royal sir, your tenures in capite are not only turned into a tenure of socage, (though that alone will for ever give your majesty a just right and title to the labour of your ploughs and the sweat of our brows) but they are likewise turned into a tenure in corde. What your majesty had before in your Court of Wards, you will be sure to find it hereafter in the exchequer of your people's hearts. The king of Spain's mines will sooner deceive him than this revenue will fail you, for his mines have bottoms; but the deeper your majesty sinks yourself into the hearts and affections of your people, the greater you will find your wealth to be, and the more invincible your strength.—Royal sir; we have nothing more to offer or to ask, but must conclude all our work this parliament with an humble and thankful acknowledgment of God's infinite goodness and mercy, in restoring your majesty to your royal and imperial crown, throne, and dignity, and for making you the restorer of that which is dearer unto us than our lives, our religion; in which, through God's blessing and gracious assistance, we are resolved to live and die: as likewise for restoring us to our Magna Charta liberties, having taken the charge and care of them into your own heart, which is our greatest security; and more than a thousand confirmations.—Royal sir; you have denied us nothing we have asked this parliament; indeed you have out-done your parliament, by doing much more for us than we could agree amongst ourselves to ask, and therefore must needs be a happy parliament: this is a healing parliament, a reconciling peace-making parliament, a blessed parliament; a parliament propter excellentiam, that may truly be called, 'Parliamentissimum Parliamentum.' No man can say, that hath made the most curious search into books and records, that there ever was such a parliament as this; and it is our unspeakable joy and comfort that no man can say, so long as your majesty lives, but we may have such another, for you have set your royal heart upon it to do your people good.—And as we have nothing more to say, so we have nothing more to do, but that which will be a-doing as long as we have a being, the pouring out of our souls unto Almighty God for your majesty's long, long, long, and most happy, blessed, glorious, and prosperous reign over us."

The King's Speech.] After which, the Speaker presented his majesty with 11 public, and 21 private bills. All these Bills being passed, the King was pleased to make the following Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; I will not entertain you with a long discourse, the sum of all I have to say to you being but to give you thanks, and I assure you I find it a very difficult work to satisfy myself in my own expressions of those thanks; perfunctory thanks, ordinary thanks, for ordinary civilities are easily given, but when the heart is as full as mine is, it is a labour to thank you; you have taken great pains to oblige me, and therefore it cannot be easy for me to express the sense I have of it.—I will enlarge no further on this occasion than to tell you that, when God brought me hither, I brought with me an extraordinary affection and esteem for parliaments. I need not tell you how much it is improved by your carriage towards me; you have out-done all the good and obliging acts of your predecessors towards the crown; and, therefore, you cannot but believe my heart is exceedingly enlarged with the acknowledgement. Many former parliaments have had particular denominations from what they have done; they have been stiled learned and unlearned, and sometimes have had worse epithets; I pray let us all resolve that this be for ever called 'The Healing and Blessed Parliament.'—As I thank you, though not enough, for what you have done, so I have not the least doubt, by the blessing of God, but when I shall call the next parliament, which I shall do as soon as you can reasonably expect, or desire, I shall receive your thanks for what I have done since I parted from you, for I deal truly with you. I shall not more propose any one real good to myself in my actions and in my councils than this, What is a parliament like to think of this action or this council? and it shall be for want of understanding in me, if it will not bear that test.—I shall conclude with this, which I cannot say too often, nor you too often where you go, That, next to the miraculous blessing of God Almighty, and, indeed, as an immediate effect of that blessing, I do impute the good disposition and security we are all in, to the happy Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, which is the principal cornerstone that supports this excellent building, and creates kindness in us to each other; confidence being our joint and common security. You may be sure I will not only observe, religiously and inviolably, myself, but also exact the observation of it from others; and if any person should ever have the boldness to attempt to persuade me to the contrary, he will find such an acceptance from me as he would have who should persuade me to burn Magna Charta, cancel all the old laws, and to erect a new government after my own invention and appetite.—There are many other particulars which I will not trust my own memory with, but will require the Chancellor to say the rest to you."

The Lord Chancellor's Speech.] After his majesty had done, the lord chancellor Hyde came from his place, and kneeled down close by his majesty's chair, and received his majesty's directions what to say further; and being returned to his place, he said as followeth:

"My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; There cannot be a greater manifestation of an excellent temper and harmony of affections throughout the nation, than that the king and his two houses of parliament meet with the same affections and cheerfulness, the same alacrity in their countenance, at the dissolution, as when they met at the convention of parliament. It is an unquestionable evidence that they are exceedingly satisfied in what they have done towards each other, that they have very well done all the business they came about; this is now your case, you have so well satisfied your own consciences, that you are sure you have satisfied the king's expectation and his hope, and the desire and wishes of the country.—It was very justly observed by you, Mr. Speaker, that you have never asked any one thing of the king which he hath not (with all imaginable cheerfulness) granted; in truth, his majesty doth, with great comfort, acknowledge that you have been so far from denying him any thing he hath asked, that he hath scarce wished any thing that you have not granted; and it is no wonder that, having so fully complied with your obligations, and having so well composed the minds of the nation, you are willing to be relieved from this extraordinary fatigue you have submitted so long to, and to return to the consideration of your own particular affairs, which you have so long sacrificed to the public; and this reasonable wish and desire hath brought the king to comply with you, and, which nothing else could do, to part with you with an equal cheerfulness; and he makes no doubt but all succeeding parliaments will pay you their thanks for all you have done, and look upon your actions and your example with all possible approbation and reverence.—The king and you have given such earnest to one another of your mutual affection; you have been so exact and punctual in your proceedings towards each other, that you have made no promise, no profession to each other, of making good, to the performing of which the world is not witness. You declared at the adjournment, in Sept. last, your resolution to settle a noble Revenue on the crown; you have done it with all the circumstances of affection and prudence: the king promised you to establish a Council of Trade, a Council for the foreign Plantations, a Commission for composing all differences upon Sales; all this he did before your coming together, and with very good effect, and you shall hear that the proceedings in every one of them are more vigorous and effectual after your dissolution. His majesty then promised you that he will give up all his endeavours to compose the unhappy differences in matters of Religion, and to restore the languishing Church to peace and order: Constantine himself spent so much of his own time in private and public conferences; to that purpose his majesty, in private, conferred with the learned men, and heard all that could be said upon several opinions and interests apart; and that, in the presence of both parties, himself moderating in the debates; and less care, and diligence, and authority would not have done that work; and God hath so blessed his labour, and made his determination in that affair so generally agreeable, that he hath received Thanks from his houses of parliament; that is, from the whole kingdom: if, after all this, his majesty doth not reap the full harvest he expected from those condescensions; if some men, by their writing and their preaching, endeavour to continue those breaches, and very rashly, and I think unconscientiously, keep up the distinctions, and publicly justify and maintain what hath heretofore been done amiss, and for which the Act of Indemnity was the best defence, I shall say no more than that I hope their want of modesty and obedience will cause them to be disclaimed by all pious and peaceable men; who cannot but be well contented to see them reduced by laws, to the obedience they owe to law: and his majesty is confident that this his beloved city, towards which his heart is so gracious and so full of princely designs to improve their honour, their wealth, and their beauty, will discountenance all these seditious designs; and, by returning and fixing themselves upon their good old foundations, make themselves the great example of piety, of loyalty, and of hearty affection to the whole kingdom.—This discourse puts me in mind to say to you, that though the king wonders much more at the many great things you have done than that you left any thing undone, yet he could have wished, and would have been glad, that your other weighty affairs had given you time to have published your opinion and advice in the business of the Militia; that the people, after so many disputes upon that argument, might have discerned that the king and his two houses of parliament are as much in the same mind in that as in all other things, as no doubt they are; but since that could not be done, you may all assure yourselves that the king will proceed therein with all imaginable care and circumspection, for the ease, quiet, and security of his people; and as he did before the last recess, by the unanimous advice of his privy council, issue out his commission of lieutenantancy for the settling the Militia in the several counties, to prevent any disorders which many apprehended might arise upon the disbanding the Army, so he will now again recommend it to themselves to put it in such a posture, as may disappoint any seditious designs which are now on foot; and there cannot be too much circumspection and vigilance to frustrate those designs.—You have heard of many suspected and dangerous persons which have lately been clapt up; and it was high time to look about. His majesty hath spent many hours himself in the examination of this business, and some of the principal officers, who, before they came to his majesty's presence, could not be brought to acknowledge any thing, after the king himself had spoken to them, confessed that their spirits were insensibly prevailed upon and subdued, and that it was not in their power to conceal their guilt from him: they have confessed that there is a party of the late disbanded officers and soldiers, and others, full of discontent and seditious purposes, and a resolution to attempt the change of the present government, and to erect the republic: they acknowledge that they did purpose to have made their attempt for the rescue of those wretches who were so justly condemned at Newgate, and so worthily executed, and that Ludlow should have then appeared at the head of them; that they made themselves sure at the same time, by parties and confederacy, to have surprized the Tower of London and the Castle of Windsor, but that they found, or at least apprehended, that their design was discovered; which so broke their spirits, that they concluded they must acquiesce for the present, and stay till the Army should be disbanded; which, they said, was generally debauched; that is, returned to an honest and fast obedience to the king; and that it is evident they were betrayed by those who were most intirely trusted by them, and they were in the right. The king had notice of all their designs, what progress they made, and the night they intended to surprize the Tower and Windsor, and gave notice to the several governors; and so, without any noise, that mischief was, by God's goodness, prevented. They acknowledge that they have since recovered their courage and resolution, and were about this time to make their full attempt. They have been promised some considerable rising in the West under Ludlow, and in the North under others; but this place was the scene of greatest hopes; they made sure of a body here, I think they say of 2500 men, with which they resolved, in the first place, to secure (you know what that security is) the person of the General the duke of Albemarle, with whom they have so much reason to be angry, and at the same time to possess themselves of Whitehall: you know the method used in such possession, kill and take possession. And this insupportable calamity God hath again diverted from us; though I must tell you the poor men, who seem to speak honestly, and upon the impulsion of conscience, are very far from being confident that there will not be some desperate insurrection and attempts in several parts of this kingdom, within a short time, which all possible care will be taken to prevent; and, in truth, this very good city so well requires the king's abundant grace and kindness to it, that not only by the unwearied pains and diligence of the worthy lord mayor, but by the general temper and constitution of the whole city, the discontented and seditious party (which can never be totally extirpated out of such a metropolis) is like to have little encouragement to pursue their desperate councils.—The king doth not believe that all those persons, who, at present, are apprehended and in custody, will be found guilty of this treason; it is a vulgar and known artifice to corrupt inferior persons, by persuading them that better men are engaged in the same enterprize, and the king will make as much haste as he can to set those at liberty, against whom the evidence or conviction is not too treasonable. In the mean time, they who, in truth, are innocent, must confess, that the proceedings towards them hath been very natural and full of clemency; and no man will wonder if his majesty be very desirous that, in this conjuncture, and in order to prevent or suppress these two visible distempers and machinations, his majesty in all places be in good order and preparation; and you may assure yourselves that, in the forming and conduct of it, he will have so great a care for the ease and quiet of his people, that if any person trusted by him shall, through want of skill or want of temper, satisfy his own passion, or appetite, in grieving or vexing his neighbours, his majesty will be so sensible of it, that, if it can be cured no other way, his trust shall be quickly determined: and he is not at all reserved in giving those animadversions and reprehensions when there is occasion, and his ears will be always open to receive those complaints.—My lords and gentlemen; You are now returning to your countries, to receive the thanks and acknowledgements of your friends and neighbours for the great things you have done; and to make the burden you have laid upon them easy, by convincing them of the inevitable necessity of their submitting to them. You will make them see that you have proceeded very far towards the separation, and even divorce, of that necessity from them, to which they have been so long married; that they are now restored to that blessed temper of government, under which their ancestors enjoyed, so many hundred years, that full measure of felicity, and the misery of being deprived of which they have so sensibly felt; that they are now free from those midnight alarms with which they have been so terrified, and rise off their beds, at their own healthy houses, without being saluted with the death of a husband, a son, and friend, miserably killed the night or day before, and with such circumstances killed, as improved the misery beyond the loss itself. This enfranchisement is worth all they pay for it. Your lordships will easily recover that estimation and reverence that is due to your high condition, by the exercise and practice of that virtue from whence your honours first sprang; the example of your justice and piety will inflame the hearts of the people towards you, and from your practice they will make a judgment of the king himself. They know very well that you are not only admitted to his presence, but to his conversation, and even in a degree to his friendship, for you are his great council; by your example they will form their own manners, and by yours they will make a guess at the king's; therefore, under that obligation, you will cause your piety, your justice, your affability, and your charity, to shine as bright as is possible before them. They are too much in love with England, too partial to it, who believe it the best country in the world; there is a better earth, and a better air, and better, that is a warmer sun in other countries; but we are no more than just when we say, that England is an inclosure of the best people in the world, when they are well informed and instructed; a people, in sobriety of conscience, the most devoted to God Almighty; in the integrity of their affections, the most dutiful to the king; in their good manners and inclinations, most regardful and loving to the nobility; no nobility in Europe so intirely beloved by the people; there may be more awe, and fear, and terror of them, but no such respect towards them as in England. I beseech your lordships do not undervalue this love; they have looked upon your lordships, and they will look upon your lordships again, as the greatest example and patron of duty; to the king, as their greatest security and protection from injury and injustice, and for their enjoying whatsoever is due to them by the law; and as the most proper mediators and interposers to the king, if, by any failure of justice, they should be exposed to any oppression and violence; and this exercise of your justice and kindness towards them will make them the more abhor and abominate that party upon which a commonwealth must be founded, because it would extirpate, or suppress, or deprive them of their beloved nobility, which are such a support and security to their full happiness.—And you gentlemen of the house of commons, who are now returning to your country, laden with a trust not inferior or less weighty than that you brought from thence: you came up their deputies to the king, and he returns you now his deputies to them; his plenipotentiaries to inform and assure them, that he thinks himself the happiest and greatest prince in the world, not from the situation of his dominions, and the power of his great navy, with which he can visit his neighbours, and keep them from visiting him; or from the noble revenue you have settled upon him, which he will improve with all good husbandry; but being possessed of the affections and hearts of such subjects, that he doth so intirely love them and depend upon them, that all his actions and all his councils shall tend to no other end but to make them happy and prosperous; that he thinks his honour and his interest principally to consist in providing for, and advancing the honour and interest of, the nation.—That you may have the more credit in what you say, he will not take it unkindly if you publish his defects and infirmities; you may tell them that he is so confident in the multitude of his very good and faithful subjects, that he is very hard to be persuaded that his few ill and unfaithful subjects can do him much harm; that he so much depends on the affections of honest men, and their zeal for his security, that he is not so solicitous and vigilant for his own safety as he ought to be, amidst so many combinations of which he is so well informed, that his servants, who with grief and anguish importune him not to take so little care of his own safety, can obtain no other answer from him, than what Cæsar heretofore gave to his zealous friends, 'mori me nialle quam timere': he will die any death rather than live in fear of his own subjects, or that they should be in fear of him. You may tell them, as a great infirmity, that a troubled and discontented countenance so afflicts him, that he would remove it from them at his own charge, as if he himself were in the fault: and when he hath been informed of any less kind or jealous thing said amongst you, (as your windows are never so close shut, but that the sound of your words goes to the several corners of the town) his majesty hath been heard to say no more but, 'What have I done? I wish that gentleman and I were acquainted, that he knew me better.' Oh! gentlemen, you cannot be yourselves, nor you cannot make yourselves too zealous or too jealous for such a prince's safety, or too solicitous for such a prince's satisfaction and content, to whom we may very justly say, as the king of Tyre writ to Solomon, 'Because God hath loved his people, he hath made thee king over them:' even his own defects and infirmities are very necessary towards the full measure of your prosperity.—My lords and gentlemen: God hath enabled us to invert one argument, which I hope may, to a good degree, repair the much mischief it hath heretofore done: it hath been urged very unreasonably, yet successfully urged, in the worst times, that it was not faith, but presumption, to expect that God would restore a family, with which he seemed to have a controversy, and hath humbled so far; that he would countenance a party that he had so much discountenanced, and almost destroyed. We may here much more reasonably, and therefore, I hope, as effectually, press the miracles that God Almighty hath lately wrought for king and people, as an evidence that he will not again easily forsake them. We may tell those who are using all their endeavours to embroil the nation in new troubles, that it is not probable that a nation, against which God hath seemed, these late years, to have pronounced his judgments in the very language of the prophets, 'Go ye swift messengers to a nation scattered and peeled; to a people terrible from the beginning hitherto; to a nation rooted out and trodden down, whose lands the rivers have spoiled; the Lord

'hath mingled a perverse spirit in the midst thereof;' that he should reduce that perverseness to the greatest meekness and resignation; that he should withdraw his judgment from this nation, and, in a moment, restore it to all the happiness it can wish, and to no other end but to expose it to the mercy and fury of a few discontented persons, the worst of the nation, is not easy to be believed.—We may tell those who still contrive the ruin of the Church, (the best and best reformed church in the Christian world, reformed by that authority, and with those circumstances, as a reformation ought to be made) that God would not so miraculously have snatched this church as a brand out of the fire; would not have raised it from the grave after he had suffered it to be buried so many years, by the boisterous hands of profane and sacrilegious persons, under its own rubbish, to expose it again to the same rapine, reproach, and impiety. That Church which delights itself in being called catholic, was never so near expiration, never had such a resurrection. That so small a pittance of meal and oil should be sufficient to preserve and nourish the poor widow and her family so long, is very little more miraculous than that such a number of pious, learned, and very aged bishops should so many years be preserved, in such wonderful straits and oppressions, until they should plentifully provide for their own succession. That after such a deep deluge of sacrilege, profaneness, and impiety had covered, and, to common understanding, swallowed it up; that that church should again appear above the waters, God be again served in that church, and served as he ought to be, and there should be some revenue left to support and encourage those who serve him; nay, that many of those who seemed to thirst after that revenue till they had possessed it, should conscientiously restore what they had taken away, and become good sons and willing tenants to that church they had so lately spoiled, may make us all piously believe that God Almighty would not have been at the expence and charge of such a deliverance; but, in the behalf of a church, very acceptable to him, and which shall continue to the end of the world, and against which the gates of hell shall not be able to prevail.—We may tell those desperate wretches who still harbour in their thoughts wicked designs against the sacred person of the king, in order to the compassing of their own imaginations, that God Almighty would not have led him through so many wildernesses of afflictions of all kinds, conducted him through so many perils at sea, and perils by land, snatched him out of the midst of this kingdom when it was not worthy of him, and when the hands of his enemies were even upon him, when they thought themselves so sure of him that they would bid so cheap and so vile a price for him; he could not, in that article, have so covered him with a cloud, that he travelled, even with some pleasure and great observation, through the midst of his enemies. He would not so wonderfully have new modelled that army, so inspired their hearts and the hearts of the whole nation, with an honest and impatient longing for the return of their dear sovereign; and, in the mean time, have so tried him (which had little less providence in it than the other) with these unnatural, or at least unusual, disrespects and reproaches abroad, that he might have a harmless and an innocent appetite to his own country, and return to his own people with a full value, and the whole unwasted bulk of his affections, without being corrupted or biased by extraordinary foreign obligations. God Almighty would not have done all this but for a servant, whom he will always preserve as the apple of his own eye, and always defend from the most secret imaginations of his enemies.—If these argumentations, gentlemen, urged with that vivacity as is most natural to your own gratitude and affections, recover as many (and it would be strange if they should not) as have been corrupted by the other logic, the hearts of the whole nation, even to a man, will insensibly be so devoted to the king, as the only conservator and protector of all that is dear and precious to them; and will be so zealous to please him, whose greatest pleasure is to see them pleased, that when they make choice of persons again to serve in parliament, they will not choose such as they wish should oppose the king, but therefore chuse because they have, and because they are to like to serve the king with their whole hearts; and, since he desires what is best for his people, to gratify him in all his desires. This blessed harmony would raise us to the highest pinnacle of honour and happiness in this world: a pinnacle without a point, upon which king and people may securely rest and repose themselves, against all the gusts, and storms, and temptations which all the malice of this world can raise against us: and I am sure you will all contend to be at the top of this pinnacle.—I have no more to add but the words of custom, That the king declares this present parliament to be dissolved; and this parliament is dissolved accordingly.*

* “ Thus ended the famous Convention, about eight months after the first meeting, and seven after the Restoration, when it received the royal stamp of Parliament: an assembly that began with the greatest expectation, and ended with the greatest satisfaction of all people. Never was so glorious a harmony between the king and parliament of England for many years before. And here we may observe, with an ingenuous modern writer, that it looks as if Heaven took a more than ordinary care of the English, that they did not throw up all their liberties at once, upon the Restoration of the King; for, though some were for bringing him back upon terms, yet after he was once come, he so intirely possessed the hearts of his people, that they thought nothing too much for them

FIRST SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT OF KING CHARLES II. COMMONLY CALLED THE LONG OR PENSIONARY PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech.] May 8. 1661. This day the New Parliament met. The King, being arrayed in his regal robes with his crown on his head, ascended his seat of state; the Peers being in their robes, and the Commons being below the bar, his majesty made a short Speech, declaring the cause and the reasons for his summoning the present parliament as followeth:

“ My lords and gentlemen of the house of commons:—I will not spend the time in telling you why I called you hither; I am sure I am glad to see you here. I do value myself much upon keeping my word, upon making good whatsoever I promise to my subjects: and I well remember when I was last in this place, I promised that I would call a parliament as soon as could be reasonably expected or desired; and truly, considering the season of the year, and all that has been done since we parted, you could not reasonably expect to meet sooner than now we do. If it might have been a week sooner, you will confess there was some reason to defer it to this day, for this day: we may without superstition love one day, prefer one day before another, for the memory of some blessings that beset us that day; and then you will not wonder that the memory of the great affection the whole king-to grant, or for him to receive. Among other designs to oblige him, there was one formed to settle such a Revenue upon him for life, as should place him beyond the necessity of asking more, except in the case of a war, or some such emergency. And as to particulars, another Writer informs us, That Mr. Alex. Popham, a man of intrigue and great capacity, offered the king, with the assistance of a party he had in the parliament, to procure an Act for settling on him and his successors, above two millions a year by way of Subsidy; which, with the Revenue of the Excise and other duties, must have made him a very rich prince. The king was well pleased with the proposal, especially since the want of money had occasioned his father's unfortunate projects; but advising about it with chancellor Hyde, that minister told him, ‘ That the best Revenue he could have, would be the gaining the hearts of his subjects; that if he would trust to them, he would find such Supplies as should never fail him in time of need.’ Therefore it may be added, with another Writer, It is to his memory, that we owe our being a free people; for he, with his two great friends, the duke of Ormond and the earl of Southampton, checked the forwardness of some who were desirous to load the crown with prerogative and revenue. He put a stop to all this, which being afterwards odiously represented, brought on that great and lasting, but honourable disgrace.” Echard, p. 783.

dom shewed to me this day twelve-month, made me desirous to meet you again this day, when I dare swear you are full of the same spirit, and that it will be lasting in you. I think there are not many of you who are not particularly known to me; there are very few of whom I have not heard so much good, that I am sure, as I can be of any thing that is to come, that you will all concur with me, and that I shall concur with you in all things which may advance the peace, plenty, and prosperity of the nation: I shall be exceedingly deceived else.—My lords and gentlemen; you will find what method I think best for your proceeding, by two Bills I have caused to be prepared for you, which are for confirmation of all that was enacted at our last meeting: and above all, I must repeat what I said when I was last here; ‘That next to the miraculous blessing of God Almighty, and indeed, as an immediate effect of that blessing, I do impute the good disposition and security we are all in, to the happy Act of Indemnity and Oblivion: that is the principal corner-stone, which supports this excellent building, that creates kindness in us to each other, and confidence in our joint and common security.’ I am sure I am still of the same opinion, and more, if it be possible, of that opinion, than I was, by the experience I have of the benefit of it, and from the unreasonableness of what some men say against it, though I assure you not in my hearing. In God’s name, provide full remedies for any future mischiefs; be as severe as you will against new offenders, especially if they be so upon old principles, and pull up those principles by the roots. But I shall never think him a wise man who would endeavour to undermine or shake that foundation of our public peace, by infringing that Act in the least degree; or that he can be my friend, or wish me well, who would persuade me ever to consent to the breach of a promise I so solemnly made when I was abroad, and performed with that solemnity; because, and after I promised it, I cannot suspect any attempts of that kind by any men of merit and virtue. *—I will not con-

* Lord Clarendon, in the Continuation of his Life, p. 96. says, “That this warmth of his majesty upon this subject was not then more than needful: for the armies being now disbanded, there were great combinations entered into, not to confirm the Act of Oblivion; which they knew without confirmation would signify nothing. Men were well enough contented that the king should grant indemnity to all men that had rebelled against him; that he should grant their livcs and fortunes to them, who had forfeited them to him: but they thought it very unreasonable and unjust, that the king should release those debts which were immediately due to them, and forgive those trespasses which had been committed to their particular damage. They could not endure to meet the same men in the king’s highway, now it was the king’s highway again, clude without telling you some news; that I think will be very acceptable to you; and therefore I should think myself unkind and ill-natured, if I should not impart it to you. I have been often put in mind by my friends, That it was now high time to marry; and I have thought so myself ever since I came into England: but there appeared difficulties enough in the choice, though many overtures have been made to me: and if I should never marry till I could make such a choice, against which there could be no foresight of any inconvenience that may ensue, you would live to see me an old bachelor, which I think you do not desire to do. I can now tell you, not only that I am resolved to marry, but to whom I resolve to marry, if God please: and towards my resolution, I have used that deliberation, and taken that advice, as I ought to do in an affair of that importance; and, trust me, with a full consideration of the good of my subjects in general, as of myself: it is with the daughter of Portugal. When I had, as well as I could, weighed all that occurred to me, the first resolution I took, was to state the whole overtures which had been made to me, and, in truth, all that had been said against it to my privy-council; without hearing whose advice, I never did, nor ever will, resolve any thing of public importance. And I tell you with great satisfaction and comfort to myself, that after many hours debate in a full council, for I think there was not above one absent; and truly, I believe, upon all that can be said upon that subject, for or against it, my lords, without one dissenting voice, yet there were very few sate silent, advised me with all imaginable cheerfulness to this Marriage; which I looked upon as very wonderful, and even as some instance of the approbation of God himself; and so took up my own resolution, and concluded all with the ambassador of Portugal, who is departing with the whole Treaty signed, which you will find who had heretofore affronted them in those ways, because they were not the king’s, and only because they knew they could obtain no justice against them. They could not with any patience see those men, who not only during the war had oppressed them, plundered their houses, and had their own adorned with the furniture they had robbed them of, ride upon the same horses which they had then taken from them upon no other pretence, but because they were better than their own; but, after the war was ended, had committed many insolent trespasses upon them wantonly, and to shew their power of Justice of Peace or Committee men, and had from the lowest beggars raised great estates, out of which they were well able to satisfy, at least in some degree, the damages the other had sustained. And those and other passions of this kind, which must have invalidated the whole Act of Indemnity, could not have been extinguished without the king’s influence, and indeed his immediate interposition and industry.”

to contain many great advantages to the kingdom: and I make all the haste I can to fetch you a queen hither, who, I doubt not, will bring great blessings with her, to me and you. I will add no more, but refer the rest to the Chancellor."

The Lord Chancellor's Speech.] After his majesty had finished his Speech, the Lord Chancellor (the earl of Clarendon), having first conferred with his majesty, spake as followeth: "My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burghesses, of the house of commons;—The king hath called you hither by his writ, to assist him, with your information and advice, in the greatest and weightiest affairs of the kingdom; by his writ, which is the only good and lawful way to the meeting of a parliament; and the pursuing that writ, the remembering how and why they came together, is the only way to bring a happy end to parliaments. There was no such writ as this, no such presence as this, in the year 1649, when this unhappy kingdom was dishonoured and exposed to the mirth and reproach of their neighbours, in the government of a Commonwealth. There was no such writ as this, no such presence as this, in Dec. 1653, when that infant Commonwealth, when the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, were delivered up into the bloody and merciless hands of a devouring Protector, and sacrificed to his lust and appetite. There was no such writ as this, no such presence as this, in the year 1656, when that Protector was more solemnly invested and installed, and the liberty of the three nations submitted to his absolute tyranny by the humble Petition and Advice. When people came together by such exorbitant means, it is no wonder that their consultations and conclusions were so disproportioned from any rules of justice or sobriety. God be thanked, that he hath reserved us to this day, a day that many good men have died praying for; that, after all those prodigies in church and state, we have lived to see the king at the opening of the parliament; that we have lived to see our king anointed and crowned, and crowned by the hands of an archbishop, as his predecessors have been, and that we are come hither this day in obedience to his writ.—The king tells you, he hath caused a Bill or two to be prepared for the Confirmation of all that was enacted in the last parliament, and commends the dispatch of those to you with some earnestness. The truth is, it is a great part of the business of this parliament, to celebrate the memory of the last, by confirming or re-enacting all that was done by that parliament, which, though it was not called by the king's writ, may be reasonably thought to have been called by God himself, upon the supplication and prayer of the king and the whole nation, as the only means to restore the nation to its happiness, to itself, to its honour, and even to its innocence. How glad the king was of it, appears by what he writ to them from Breda, when he referred more to them than ever was referred to parliament: he referred in truth (upon the matter) all that concerned himself, all that concerned religion, all that concerned the peace and happiness of the kingdom, to them; and to their honour be it spoken, and to their honour be it ever remembered, that the king, religion, and the kingdom, have no reason to be sorry that so much was intrusted to them, nor they to be ashamed of the discharge of their trust. It would have been a very unseasonable scruple in any man, who should have refused to bear his part in the excellent transactions of that parliament, because he was not called thither by the king's writ; and it would be a more unreasonable scruple now, in any man, after we have all received the fruit and benefit of their councils and conclusions, when in truth we owe our orderly and regular meeting at this time to their extraordinary meeting then, to their wisdom in laying hold upon the king's promises, and to the king's justice in performing all he promised, and to the kingdom's submission and acquiescence in those promises; I say, it would be very unseasonable and unreasonable now, to endeavour to shake that foundation, which, if you will take the king's judgment, supports the whole fabric of our peace and security. He tells you what he shall think of any who goes about to undermine that foundation; which is a zeal no prince could be transported with but himself. It might have seemed enough for a king who had received so many injuries so hardly to be forgotten, undergone so many losses so impossible to be repaired, to have been willing to confirm and to re-enact the Act of Oblivion and Indemnity, when you should present it to him; but to prepare such an act for you, to conjure you by all that is precious by your friendship to him, to dispatch those acts with expedition, is such a piece of fatherly tenderness and piety, as could proceed from no heart but such a one in which God hath treasured up a stock of mercy and justice and wisdom to redeem a nation. And truly, my lords and gentlemen, for ourselves, if we will consider how much we owe to those who with all the faculties of their souls contributed to and contrived the blessed change, the restoring the king to his people and his people to the king, and then how much we owe to those who gave no opposition to the virtuous activity of the other (and God knows a little opposition might have done much harm), whether we look upon the public, or upon our own private provocations, there will remain so few who do not deserve to be forgiven by us, that we may very well submit to the king's advice and his example; of whom we may very justly say, as a very good Historian said of a very great emperor, and I am sure it could never be so truly said of any emperor as of ours, 'Facere recte civis suos, princeps optimus faciendo docet; cumque sit imperio maximus, exemplo major est.' nor indeed hath he yet given us, or have we yet felt, any other instances of his greatness, and power, and superiority, and dominion over us, 'nisi' (as he said) 'aut levatione periculi, aut accessione dignitatis;' by giving us peace, honour, and security, which we could not have without him; by desiring nothing for himself, but what is as good for us as for himself; and therefore, I hope, we shall make no scruple of obeying him in this particular.—My Lords and Gentlemen; Though the last parliament did great and wonderful things, indeed as much as in that time they could, yet they have left very great things for you to do: you are to finish the structure, of which they but laid the foundation; indeed they left some things undone, which it may be they thought they had finished: you will find the Revenue they intended to raise for the king very much short of what they promised: you will find the Public Debts for the Discharge of the Army and the Navy, which they thought they had provided for sufficiently, to be still in arrear and unpaid: and here I am, by the king's special command, to commend the poor Seamen to you, who, by the rules which were prescribed for their payment, are in much worse condition than (without question) was foreseen they would be; for, by appointing them to be paid but from 1658 (which was a safe rule to the Army), very many are still in Arrear for 2, 3, or 4 years service; and so his majesty's promise to them from Breda remains unperformed. Some other losses, which resulted from other rules given for their payment, have been supplied to them by the king's own bounty. They are a people very worthy of your particular care and cherishing; upon whose courage and fidelity very much of the happiness and honour and security of the nation depends; and therefore his majesty doubts not you will see justice done towards them with favour.—My Lords and Gentlemen; You are now the great physicians of the kingdom; and God knows, you have many wayward, and froward, and distempered patients, who are in truth very sick, and patients, who think themselves sicker than they are; and some who think themselves in health, and are most sick of all. You must, therefore, use all the diligence, and patience, and compassion, which good physicians have for their patients; all the cheerfulness, and complacency, and indulgence, their several habits, and constitutions, and distempers of body and mind, may require. Be not too melancholic with your patients; nor suffer them to be too melancholic, by believing that every little distemper will presently turn to a violent fever, and that fever will presently turn to the plague; that every little trespass, every little swerving from the known rule, must insensibly grow to a neglect of the law, and that neglect introduce an absolute confusion; that every little difference in opinion, or practice in Conscience or Religion, must presently destroy Conscience and Religion. Be not too severe and rough towards your patients, in prescribing remedies, how well compounded soever, too nauseous and offensive to their stomachs and appetite, or to their very fancy. Allay and correct those humours, which corrupt their stomachs and their appetites: if the good old known tried laws be for the present too heavy for their necks, which have been so many years without any yoke at all, make a temporary provision of an easier and a lighter yoke, till, by living in a wholesome air, by the benefit of a soberer conversation, by keeping a better diet, by the experience of a good and just government, they recover strength enough to bear, and discretion enough to discern, the benefit and the ease of those laws they disliked. If the present Oaths have any terms or expressions in them that a tender conscience honestly makes scruple of submitting to, in God's name let other oaths be formed in their places, as comprehensive of all those obligations which the policy of government must exact: but still let there be a yoke: let there be an Oath, let there be some law, that may be the rule to that indulgence, that, under pretence of Liberty of Conscience, men may not be absolved from all the obligations of law and conscience.—I have besought your good-nature and indulgence towards some of your weak patients, if by it they can be brought to follow and submit to your prescriptions for their health; nor is it reasonable to imagine that the distemper of 20 years can be rectified and subdued in 12 months. There must be a natural time, and natural applications, allowed for it. But there are a sort of patients that I must recommend to your utmost vigilance, utmost severity, and to no part of your lenity or indulgence; such who are so far from valuing your prescriptions that they look not upon you as their physicians, but their patients; such who, instead of repenting any thing that they have done amiss, repeat every day the same crimes for the Indemnity whereof the Act of Oblivion was provided. These are the seditious Preachers, who cannot be contented to be dispensed with for their full obedience to some laws established, without reproaching and inveighing against those laws, how established soever; who tell their auditories, that the Apostle meant, when he bid them stand to their liberties, that they should stand to their arms; and who, by repeating the very expressions, and teaching the very doctrine, they set on-foot in the year 1640, sufficiently declare that they have no mind that 20 years should put an end to the miseries we have undergone.—What good christian can think without horror of these Ministers of the Gospel, who by their function should be the messengers of peace, and are in their practice the early trumpets of war, and incendiaries towards rebellion! How much more Christian was that Athenian nun in Plutarch, and how shall she rise up in judgment against these men, who, when Alcibiades was condemned by the public justice of the state, and a decree made, that the religious, the priests, and the nuns, should revile and curse him, stoutly refused to perform that office, saying, 'That she was professed religious, to pray and to bless, not to curse and ban!' And if the person and the place can improve and aggravate the offence, as no doubt it doth before God and man, methinks the preaching rebellion and treason out of the pulpit should be as much worse than the advancing it in the market, as the poisoning a man at the Communion would be worse than killing him at a tavern: and it may be, in the catalogue of those sins which the zeal of some men declares to be against the Holy Ghost, there may not be any one more reasonably thought to be such, than a Minister of Christ's turning rebel against his prince, which is a most notorious apostasy from his order; and his preaching rebellion to the people as the doctrine of Christ, adding blasphemy and pertinacy to his apostasy, bath all the marks by which good men are taught to know and avoid that sin against the Holy Ghost. If you do not provide for the thorough quenching these firebrands; king, lords, and commons, shall be their meanest subjects, and the whole kingdom kindled into one general flame.—My Lords and Gentlemen; When the king spake last in this place before this day, He said, 'When he should call the next parliament, he should receive their thanks for what he had done since he had dissolved the last; for he said, he should not more propose any one rule to himself, in his actions or his councils, than this, What is a parliament like to think of this action, or of that council? and that it should be want of understanding in him, if it would not bear that test.' He told you but now, 'That he values himself much upon keeping his word, upon performing all that he promises to his people.' And he bath the worst luck in the world, if he hath not complied with this promise, and if his understanding bath failed him in it. It was in a very little time after the Dissolution of that parliament, his majesty giving himself a few days to accompany his royal mother to the sea side, the only time he bath slept out of this town near these 12 months, that the most desperate, and prodigious Rebellion brake out in this city, that hath been heard of in any age; which continued two or three nights together, with the murder of several honest citizens. Let no man undervalue the treason because of the contemptibleness of the number engaged in it. No man knows the number; but, by the multitude of intercepted letters from and to all the counties of England, in which the time was set down wherein the work of the Lord was to be done, by the desperate carriage of the traitors themselves, and their bragging of their friends, we may conclude the combination reached very far. And in truth we may reasonably believe, that if the undaunted courage and the indefatigable industry of the lord mayor, who deserves to be mentioned before king, lords, and commons, and to be esteemed by them, had not prevented it; I say, it is probable this fury would have not been extinguished, before this famous city, or a great part of it, had been turned into ashes.*—If you

* The Chancellor alludes to the Insurrection of the Fifth Monarchy Men, under Venner, of which Insurrection archdeacon Echard gives us the following account? "While the affairs of the nation seemed to be in peace and tranquility, in the beginning of the new year 1660-1, there happened a strange and unparalleled action in London, which strengthened the belief of those secret Plots and Conspiracies mentioned by the lord chancellor. This was occasioned by a small body of Fifth-Monarchy Men, who hating all monarchy, and the appearance of it, had formerly made an attempt against Cromwell's government, but escaped beyond expectation. The head of them was one Thomas Venner, sometime a wine-cooper, who by the king's indulgence held a conventicle in Coleman-street, where he, and others, used to preach to them out of the Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelations, and from thence drew strange inferences, persuading their congregations to take up arms for King Jesus, against the powers of the earth, the king, the duke of York, general Monk, &c. assuring them, 'That no weapons formed against them should prosper, nor a hair of their heads be touched; for one should chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight.' Upon which they got a Declaration printed, entitled, 'A Door of Hope opened;' in which they said, and declared, 'That they would never sheath their swords till Babylon, as they called monarchy, became a hissing and a curse, and there be left neither Remnant, Son, nor Nephew: that when they had led captivity captive in England, they would go into France, Spain, Germany, &c. and rather die than take the wicked Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance: that they would not make any leagues with monarchists, but would rise up against the carnal, to possess the Gate, or the world, to bind their kings in chains, and their nobles in fetters of iron.' And so to accomplish this heroic design, they observed so much policy as to put it in execution when the king was attending his mother and sister to embark at Portsmouth, for their return into France. Accordingly on Sunday the 6th of Jan. being fully animated by the sermon, which hinted to them, 'that they had been praying and preaching, but not acting for God,' they sallied out well armed from their Meeting-House, and marched to St. Paul's Church-Yard in the dark of the evening. Here they mustered their party, amounting to above 50, and placed their centinels for the time, one of whom killed a poor innocent man, who upon demand had answered, 'He was for God and king Charles!' This gave an alarm to the city, and the lord-mayor, sir Rd. Brown, and the trained-bands being upon the guard, some files of men were sent against them, whom these enquire what the king did upon this unheard-of provocation, what vengeance he took upon those whose professed and avowed principle was not to distinguish between him and another man, nay, to kill him sooner than any other man, you will find, as was said of Cæsar, that 'libentius vitam victor jam daret, quam victi acciperent;' that his mercy hath been no less obstinate than their malice and wickedness; that few persons have suffered; and that he hath restrained the law from being desperate men quickly routed, and so marched on to Bishops-gate, where they passed without opposition, and from thence to Cripple-gate, where they came into the city again, and so to Alders-gate. Here threatening the constable, who was weakly attended, they were let out again. Then they declared themselves for King Jesus, and thus proceeded to Beech-Lane, where they killed a Headborough that opposed them, and so hastened to Cane-Wood, between Highgate and Hampstead, where they reposed themselves for that night.—The noise of this strange Insurrection caused the General to send a party of horse and foot the next day, who drove them out of the wood, and took some of them prisoners, who were committed to the Gate-House. The rest having rallied again, on Wednesday morning returned to London, with assurance by Venner their leader, 'That no weapon formed against them should prosper: therefore they might look upon the example of Gideon: it was the same thing to God, whether he saved by a few or a multitude.' Their first appearance was in Threadneedle-street, behind the Exchange, where they beat back a party sent by the guard there. But, upon the advance of more forces, they retreated to Bishops-gate-street; where after a sharp encounter, two of each side being slain, they gradually slipped away and disappeared. A while after, like the gathering of clouds, they were seen again at College-Hill and Maiden-Lane, where they designed to sacrifice the lord-mayor. But missing of him, they crossed Cheapside, and passed into Wood-street. Here began a cruel fight, wherein they shewed skill as well as great valour; and having ruffled some trained-bands, and repelled the horse-guards that came to assist them, they did not give way till Venner was knocked down and severely wounded, and Tuffney and Cragg, two of their fiercest preachers and combatants, were slain. Whereupon the greatest part of them retreated to Cripple-gate, firing in good order in their rear upon the aided-bands, who were in close pursuit of them. Col. Cox, who commanded, lodged ten of them in an ale-house near the postern, which house they obstinately maintained. The house being surrounded, some of the soldiers untiled the next house, and shot in upon them, being in the upper room, who still refused quarter: at the same time another party of musketeers got up the stairs, broke down the door, and entered their garrison. Six of them severe to many, who at the same time continue their guilt, and undervalue his compassion; that there hath not been a week since that time, in which there hath not been combinations and conspiracies formed against his person, and against the peace of the kingdom, which before this time would have taken effect, if God had not put it into the hearts of some who were trusted in the councils, to discover the design, time enough for prevention. And upon all these alarms, and the interception of

were killed before, another refusing quarter was first knocked down, and then shot with a musket. The rest being demanded why they did not ask quarter before, answered 'They durst not fear their own fellows should have shot them.' In this Insurrection 20 of the king's men were slain, and as many of the rebels. Those taken were Venner himself, Hodgkins, Gowler, Allen, Pym, Ashton, Prichard, Fall, Hopkins, Wells, and about as many more, not much worth the naming; who blasphemously alledged, 'That if they were deceived or mis-led, it was God that deceived them.'—These, to the number of 20, were soon after arraigned at the Old Bailey for treason and murder; which being fully proved, with all the forementioned particulars, they were all found guilty, except Hopkins and Wells, against whom the evidence was not full, and against one Patshul only a single witness: wherefore they were acquitted by their jury. When sentence was pronounced against them, and the lord chief justice Foster seriously charged Venner with the blood of his unhappy accomplices, he impudently replied, 'It was not he, but Jesus that led them.' Three of them confessed their crime, and craved mercy, but the rest continued obstinate. Being sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, Venner and Hodgkins were on the 19th of Jan. executed over-against their Meeting-House in Coleman-street. The former spoke little but in vindication of himself and his fact, and something of his opinion, with an assurance 'That the time was at hand when other judgment would be;' highly reflecting upon the present government. Hodgkins raved and cursed in the manner of praying, 'calling down vengeance from Heaven upon the king, the judges, and the city of London;' nor would he desist, till the executioner put an end to all his extravagancies. Two days after nine more were executed in five several places of the city, without being quartered, as the two first were. All persisted, like the Regicides, in justifying their crimes, except one young man, who shewed great signs of repentance.—Thus ended a Rebellion of a very strange nature, which was begun and carried on with such infernal rage, that if their numbers had been equal to their spirits, they would have overturned the city, and the nation, and the world, which in their imagination they had divided among themselves." P. 784.

such letters as would in all other countries have produced the rack for further discoveries, and under the late government in this would have erected high courts of justice for their punishment, he hath left the offenders to the judges of the law, and those judges to the precise forms and ordinary rules of the law.—My Lords and Gentlemen; If the new licence and corruption of this time hath exceeded the wickedness of former ages, that the old laws have not enough provided for the punishment of wickedness they could not foresee or imagine; it will become your wisdoms to provide new Remedies for new diseases, and to secure the precious person of our dear sovereign from the first approaches of villany, and the peace of the kingdom from the first overtures of sedition.—If you will not provide laws to do it, the king will not do any thing extraordinary, even towards his own preservation. You see the rule by which he hath walked; and as he hath made good his promise to you, so, I doubt not, you will make good his prophecy, and that he shall receive thanks for what he hath done since he was last here.—He hath told you now what he hath done; that he is resolved to marry, and resolved whom to marry: which, I believe, is the most grateful news that the whole kingdom hath longed for, or could receive, from the first day of his landing here. And when they shall know the great deliberation he hath used before that resolution, and the circumstances in resolving it, they will surely have cause to confess, that never king, in the disposal of himself in marriage, took so great care for the good and felicity of his people.—Within a very short time after his landing in this kingdom, he was moved by the ambassador of Portugal, to renew a Treaty lately made between that crown and the Usurper; a treaty in very many respects the most advantageous to this nation that ever was entered into with any prince or people; a treaty by which, at this time, that crown is paying the penalty (which the Usurper exacted from it) for the most noble and heroic act of honour and friendship, performed by that king to our master, that ever was performed by any prince towards another prince in distress. And yet the king was nothing forward to ratify this Treaty; though it is very true, every Article in it but one was entirely for the benefit of this nation, for the extraordinary advancement of Trade, for the good of Religion, and for the honour of the crown: yet there was one, one single Article, that must oblige the king, as it did the Usurper, to supply Portugal with an army for his assistance, when he should require it; that is, Portugal should have power to make levies of 10,000 men for their service. This, the king foresaw, might produce a war with Spain, which he was very unwilling to undergo for that engagement; and yet his Council represented unto him how heart-breaking a thing it would be to his people, to lose the possession of so great a trade, and those other immense advantages they had by that Treaty; and that it would be judged an irrecoverable error in policy, if Portugal should be suffered again to be swallowed up by Spain. However, the king was resolved, not precipitately to engage himself in such a treaty as might be attended with such an inconvenience; but to take time, fully to consider of it; and this delay the Portugal could not be pleased with, and so the ambassador returned home to his master. About this time, the house of commons sent up a Bill to the lords, for the annexing Dunkirk and Jamaica to the crown of England, which seemed to have the most universal consent and approbation from the whole nation that ever any bill could be attended with: yet the same consideration which retarded the Treaty with Portugal made the king less warm towards the advancing of that Bill; and the Spanish ambassador was as solicitous to obstruct it, as he hath been since to obstruct the Match with Portugal. This being the case, and the Portugal ambassador returning with such particular overtures to the king for a Marriage with the daughter of that crown, that, both in respect of portion, and many other transcendent advantages for the advancement of the trade and empire of this kingdom, the like hath not been offered in this age; and his majesty having received as full information and satisfaction in the beauty and excellency of that renowned princess as can be had without a personal interview (a circumstance very rarely admitted to princes), it was not in his majesty's power to be without some approbation and inclination to this alliance: yet even then he would not trust himself in this great affair, which so nearly and so dearly concerns himself, and himself above all others. Though the benefit and advantage could but appear the same upon further consultation, yet there might possibly be some mischiefs, or some inconveniencies be discerned, which he had not foreseen. He resolves, therefore, to call his council; tells them some days before, that he had an affair of great importance to impart to them, and to receive their advice in; and therefore appointed an extraordinary day, that they might all appear (and truly, I think, there was but one lord absent, who was then indisposed in his health). In this council he stated the whole matter, all that was offered of benefit and advantage, all that occurred of hazard or inconvenience, without the least discovery of his own inclinations, further than that you would have believed he had seen the picture of his mistress; it having been a speech he hath often accustomed himself to, that he would not marry a woman he had not some reason to believe he could love, though she could bring him the empire of the world. He did not conceal from my lords what the Spanish ambassador had offered against this Marriage (who is not over-reserved in giving counsel, nor in communicating the counsel he gives), what proffers he had made of others, what threats of war in one case, what advantage of dowry in another; that he is so solicitous for the advancement of the Protestant Religion, that he had offered several Protestant princesses to whom his master shall give a portion, as with the Infanta of Spain; and truly, less than the universal monarch could not dispose of so many princesses without the least consent or privity of their own. His majesty commanded all my lords to deliver their counsel and advice freely, upon a full prospect of what might appear good and happy for his people as well as for himself; assuring them, as he hath done you now this day, that, as he never did, so he never will do, any thing of great importance, without consulting with them. You will believe that my lords of the council are solicitous enough for the advancement of the Protestant Religion, upon which the welfare of this kingdom so much depends. But they were very apprehensive, that the first Protestant daughter that ever any king of Spain had, would not probably bring so great advantages to it as was pretended. They have no mind to encourage the king to a war; we have had war enough: but they do not think he should so much fear a war, as, out of the dread of it, to be at the disposal of any other prince; and that when he hath freed his own subjects from Wardships and from Liveries, that he should himself become a Ward to the king of Spain, and not marry without his approbation and consent. They observed, that in the same Memorials (I do not mean that which he last printed, but a former) in which the Spanish ambassador threatens war if the king marries with Portugal, he presses very earnestly the delivering up of Dunkirk and Jamaica; and it is plain enough, he would have that recompence for the portion he would give. And, in truth, whosoever is against the Match with Portugal, is for the delivery of Dunkirk and Jamaica; war being as sure to follow from the latter as the former, and from neither till the king of Spain find it convenient for himself, which I hope he will not yet do. I will not enlarge upon the many reasons. The king hath told you the conclusion. There was never a more unanimous advice from any council, not any dissenting voice, in the beseeching his majesty to make this Marriage, and to finish it with all the expedition imaginable. Upon this, he sent for the Portugal ambassador, declared his resolution to him, hath writ himself to Portugal, and is preparing his fleet to fetch home our queen. And I hope now he hath deserved all your thanks, both for the matter and the manner; and that not only ourselves, but the ages that are to succeed us, shall have cause to bless God and his majesty for this resolution that he hath taken, and that he hath declared to us this day, and hath reserved for this day, having obliged his council to secrecy, that he might himself communicate it to his whole kingdom at once.—There are some other particulars of weight; but he will not mingle them with this great important one, which must so much fill your hearts and your heads; but will reserve them till he sees you again after you have chosen your Speaker, which he now leaves you to do, and to repair to your house for that purpose, that you may present your Speaker to him at 4 of the clock upon Friday."

Before we enter upon the Proceedings of this New Parliament, we think it proper to present our readers with the following Lists of the Members of both Houses:

* "The representatives," says Rapin, "for the most part, were elected agreeably to the wishes, and without doubt by the influence of the court. The greatest part were high-churchmen, that is, violent enemies of the presbyterians, great assertors of the minutest ceremonies of the church, and most devoted to the king and the royal prerogative. This parliament may be said to be composed by chancellor Hyde, prime minister, and on the 20th of April, created earl of Clarendon. Let it also be added, that it was called the 'Pensionary Parliament,' because it was afterwards discovered, that many of the members received pensions from the court. It is true, many will not allow that this was so at first, but pretend, that by length of time, and changes upon death, the new members suffered themselves to be bribed. I cannot; however, help remarking, that, at the very beginning, this parliament did things in favour of the king, which no other had ever done, and that it was not till afterwards that they retracted their extravagant maxims, concerning the royal prerogative. It may be judged how favourable this parliament was to the king, since it continued almost 18 years, on which account it was more justly called the Long Parliament, than that of 1640." Vol. xi. p. 213.

A short time previous to the dissolution of this parliament, a curious Tract was published, entitled, 'A Seasonable Argument to persuade all the Grand Juries in England to petition for a New Parliament: or a List of the Principal Labourers in the great design of Popery and Arbitrary Power, who have betrayed their country to the Conspirators, and bargained with them to maintain a Standing Army in England, under the command of the bigoted Popish D. who, by the assistance of the L. I.'s Scotch army, the forces in Ireland, and those in France, hope to bring all back to Rome.' A Reward of 200*l.* was offered, by Proclamation, to such as would discover the Author of this piece. As it is now very scarce, a copy thereof is preserved in the APPENDIX to the present Volume, No. II.

The Speaker's Speech to the King.] May 16. The king being again set in his royal throne, in his regal robes, the lords being also in their robes, the commons presented unto his majesty sir Edward Turner, knight, solicitor to the duke of York,* for their Speaker; who, being brought to the bar, with great reverence began his speech in this manner:

“ May it please your most excellent majesty;—The knights, citizens, and burgeses of the commons house of parliament, being there assembled by virtue of your majesty's most gracious writ, have been pleased (I dare not say to choose, but) to name me their Speaker.—It is an undoubted privilege of every member in that house, to be heard speak, much more when he speaks for or against himself. But, sir, whether more out of favour to me or injury to themselves I cannot tell, they were not pleased to hear, at least they would not accept, my just apology and excuse from this service.—Therefore, from this their judgment, if I must so call it, I do most humbly appeal to your sovereign justice; beseeching your majesty, for the errors that are too visible and apparent in their proceedings, that you will review and reverse the same. My inexperience in the Customs and Orders of the house, my inability to collect their sense, and state the questions rising upon long and arduous debates, do justly render me unfit, and therefore unworthy, of this weighty employment.—Your majesty well knows, when a ship puts forth to sea, she should be provided with manners of all sorts. In case a storm doth rise, some must trim and lower the sails, some must watch aloft the decks, some must work at the pump; but he had need be a very good seaman that is the pilot. Sir, I hope I may be useful to this your sovereign vessel in some of these inferior places; but I dare not undertake to be their steersman.—I do most humbly therefore beseech your majesty, that you will not take us at our first word; our second thoughts are best. Pray, therefore, be pleased to command the members of the house of commons to return into their house, to recollect themselves, and to present your majesty with a better choice."

This being said, the Lord Chancellor, having first conferred with his majesty, answered as followeth:

"Mr. Speaker; You have not discredited yourself enough to persuade the king to dissent from his house of commons in the election they have made. If he had never seen you before, you have now spoke too well against yourself, for his majesty to suspect you are no good Speaker: but you have the honour to be well known to the king; have spoken very often before him; and his majesty well knows that you are not without any of those parts; of knowing the Orders of the house, where you have sat long; or collecting and stating and putting the Questions aptly, which must constitute a right good Speaker. Therefore his majesty is so far from thinking the house hath made an ill choice, that he believes they could not have made a better; or from admitting your excuse, that he confirms their election, and thanks them very heartily for making it; and requires you to submit to it, and to betake yourself with all alacrity to the service."

His majesty having thus denied Mr. Speaker's Excuse, and approved of the Commons choice of him; Mr. Speaker proceeded, and said, "He that knows his master's will, and doth it not, is worthy to be beaten with many stripes. I shall therefore humbly and cheerfully, to the best of my poor skill and knowledge, apply myself to the performance of my duty; not doubting therein to obtain your majesty's gracious pardon for all involuntary transgressions; for it is a rule in law, and in conscience too, 'Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea.'—And, since I have found this favour in the sight of my lord the king, pray let me beg your majesty's patience for a while, to make a stand, and from this place to look about me. Sir, a weak head is soon giddy;

but the strongest brain may here be turned: the presence of this glory, and the glory of this presence, do transport me. Whilst I contemplate the incomparable beauty of this body politic, and the goodly order of this high court of parliament, where at once I behold all the glory of this nation, I am almost in the condition of St. Paul, when he was taken up into the third heaven. All he could say upon his return was, 'he saw things unutterable.'—God, that made all things for the use of man, and made him governor over all his works, thought it not fit to leave him to himself, nor to live without a law and government. The forms and species of governments are various; monarchical, aristocratical, and democratical: but the first is certainly the best, as being nearest to divinity itself. Aristocracy is subject to degenerate, and run into faction; but democracy naturally runs into confusion. Then every man becomes a tyrant over his neighbour; 'Homo hominilupus, homo homini dæmon.'—This famous island, historians tell us, was first inhabited by the Britains, then by the Romans, then by the Saxons, then by the Danes, then by the Normans; and during all these successions of ages, and variety of changes, though there was sometimes 'Divisum imperium,' yet every division was happy under a monarchical government.—Since the entrance of the Norman race, 25 kings and queens, famous in their generations, from whom your sacred majesty is lineally descended, have swayed the royal sceptre of this nation.—The Children of Israel, when they were in the Wilderness, though they were fed with God's own hand, and eat the food of angels, yet they surfeited, and murmured, and rebelled against Moses. The same unthankful spirit dwelt in this nation for divers years last past. The men of that age were weary of the government, though it was refined to the wonder and envy of all other nations; they quarrelled with our Moses, because he was the Lord's anointed. 'Nolumus hunc regnare,' was their first quarrel; but leveling, parity, and confusion followed; then tyranny and usurpation was the conclusion. We read of the emperor Adrian, when he lay a dying, he complained that many physicians had destroyed him; meaning, that their contrary conceits and different directions for his recovery had hastened his death. So it is with us: we were sick of reformation; our reformers were of all ages, sexes, and degrees; of all professions and trades. The very cobbler went beyond his last. These new statesmen took upon them to regulate and govern our governors: this was the sickness and plague of the nation. Their new laws were all written in bloody letters; the cruelty of their tribunals made the judgment-seat little differ from a slaughter-house: the rich man was made an offender for a word; poor men were sold for slaves, as the Turks sell heads, twenty for an asper: yet for all this villainy there was at length found a Protector.—No amendment at length would serve these reformers turns; no concessions, though the most gracious that could be imagined, would satisfy these usurpers; but root and branch, all must go. Our late sovereign lord, of blessed memory, must be offered up a sacrifice to their lust; your sacred person (great sir) proscribed, and all the royal family exiled. Monarchy itself was voted burdensome, and therefore they must try a Commonwealth; and, the better to digest it, the people were intoxicated with a belief that they should all, like themselves, be princes in their turns.—Amongst the Persians, after the death of their governor there was used to be, ἀνεμία ὡς ἡμέραν, 'a five days lawlessness,' in which time every man might do what he listed: during those five days there was such killing, and robbing, and destroying one another, that, before they were ended, the people longed again for their old government.—After the death of your majesty's most royal father, here was the like licentiousness; but, alas! is continued more than twice five years: liberty they called it; but it was 'Libertas quidlibet audendi.' Your loyal subjects were a prey to wolves and tygers; and to the most cruel of all beasts, unreasonable men. Every man did what seemed good in his own eyes; for in those days there was no king in our Israel.—But, as the former spirit of reformation at first brought us into this misery; so the spirit of giddiness, which God sent amongst our reformers, at length cured us. The Brazen Serpent was the best cure for those that were bitten by the Fiery Serpent. The divisions and subdivisions of those that exercised dominion over us, weakened their own power, and stirred up the hearts, and strengthened the hands, of your loyal subjects, to restore our ancient government, and to bring your sacred majesty back to your royal throne in peace, as, to the joy of all our hearts, we see it this day. This was the work of God, and it is admirable in our eyes. And as we have cause at all times to bless God, that he hath thus brought your majesty to your people; so we have just cause at this time to return our hearty thanks unto your majesty that you have thus brought your people to yourself. The sun exhales the vapours from the earth, and sends them down again in showers of plenty. So we, to our great joy, do find that our obedience and affection to your majesty are returned upon our heads, in plenty, peace, and protection.—The last meeting here in parliament was happy, in healing the bleeding wounds of this nation. They were blessed also, even for their works sake. Your sacred majesty did bless them; and therefore they shall be blessed to all posterity. But, sir, we hope you have a blessing left for us too. That was your parliament by adoption, but this is yours by birth-right. This parliament is free born. I hope this honour will beget in us an emulation to exceed the actions of our predecessors; and not only to meet your majesty as our sovereign with the duty of subjects, but with the love of sons to a most indulgent father.—Next to the glory of your majesty's royal throne, I cannot but observe the brightness of this second orb. This firmament is richly deckt with stars of several magnitudes; each star appears like the morning star, and yet each star differs from another in glory. You cannot want Commanders, either by sea or land, to manage your designs, whilst all these sons of Mars stand candidate to serve you in the wars. You cannot want Counsellors, to advise you in the great affairs of the nation, whilst all these statesmen, senators, each fit to be a consul, contend who shall most ease you in the thorny cares of the government.—Amidst these noble English Barons are placed the Reverend Judges of the land, the sages of the law; men so learned and expert in the customs and statutes of this land, that if Wat Tyler, or Jack Cade, or the new fanatics of this latter age, had burned our books, they were able to restore our laws in purity and perfection.—And next to these, though in a lower orb, appear the worthy knights, the prudent citizens and burgesses, of the house of commons, being the third estate of parliament.—When the fame of Solomon's wisdom had filled the neighbour nations, the queen of Sheba could not contain herself at home; but, with many camels, laded with spices, with gold, and precious stones in abundance, she comes to Solomon, to commune with him of all that was in her heart.—Great sir, Whilst this your native country was unworthy of you, foreign nations were made happy in the knowledge of your person, your piety, and your wisdom. And now the Lord our God hath brought you home, and set you on your throne, your subjects long to see you. What striving and rejoicing was there, at your first landing, to see our rising sun! What striving was there, at your Coronation, to see the imperial crown set upon your royal head! What striving hath here lately been, in all the counties, cities, and boroughs of this nation, who should be sent up to hear your wisdom, and confer with you in parliament!—Royal sir, these chosen worthy messengers are not come empty-handed; they are laden, they are sent up to you heavy laden, from their several counties, cities, and boroughs. If the affections of all Englishmen can make you happy; if the riches of this nation can make you great; if the strength of this warlike people can make you considerable at home and abroad; be assured, you are the greatest monarch in the world. Give me leave, I beseech you, to double my words, and say it again, I wish my voice could reach to Spain and to the Indies too, You are the greatest monarch in the world.—I fear your royal patience may be tired. I will therefore speak no more my own words; but, in the name of the commons of England humbly present unto your majesty their accustomed Petitions when first they are assembled in parliament, and so conclude: 1. I do beseech your majesty, That, for our better attendance on the important service of the house, ourselves and our necessary servants may be free, in our persons and estates, from all arrests and troubles. 2. That, debate and disputes being necessary to the disquisition of many matters in the house, your majesty will be pleased to vouchsafe us liberty and freedom of speech; which, I doubt not, we shall use with loyalty and sobriety. 3. That, if the great affairs require it, your majesty, upon our humble suit, will vouchsafe us access to your royal person. 4. That the proceedings of the house may receive a benign interpretation, and be free at all times from misconstructions."

The Lord Chancellor's Speech.] The Speaker's Speech being ended, the Lord Chancellor again conferred with his majesty; and answered,

"Mr. Speaker; The King is well pleased with your obedience, and that you have so cheerfully submitted to undergo that province the house of commons hath designed you to: he promises himself and the kingdom as great fruit and benefit from your joint services, as ever any of his progenitors received from a Speaker and a house of commons. The king did his part, by publishing the very day he intended the parliament should meet, a good time before the writs were sealed; by sending out the writs much longer than was necessary before the day of meeting, that the country might not be surprized in their elections, but that they might send up such, as he might make a clear view and prospect of the affection and desires of his people; and he is persuaded that the commons of England were never more exactly represented than they are at present, in you, the knights, citizens, and burgesses. And yet I have a very particular command from his majesty to tell you, which in truth he meant to have said to you himself the other day, and which he hopes you will not take ill in point of privilege, that his majesty takes notice, indeed he cannot choose but take notice, of one ill circumstance in many elections, which he imputes rather to the vice of the times, a vice worthy your severity, than to any corrupt intention; that is, Excess of Drinking,* which produceth that other scandalous excess in the expence. His majesty doth very heartily recommend it to your wisdom, for the honour and dignity of parliaments, that you will take some course to prevent this inconvenience for the future; and if you think fit to call for any help from him

* "With the Restoration of the king a spirit of extravagant joy spread over the nation, that brought on with it the throwing off the very professions of virtue and piety. All ended in entertainments and drunkenness, which over-run [the three kingdoms to such a degree, that it very much corrupted all their morals. Under the colour of drinking the king's health, there were great disorders and much riot every where." Burnet, vol. i. p. 93.

towards it, you will be sure to have it.—You have made, Mr. Speaker, a very lively description of the extravagancy of that confusion which this poor nation groaned under, when they would throw off a government they had lived and prospered under so many ages, indeed from the time of being a nation, and which is as natural to them as their food or their raiment, to model a new one for themselves, which they knew no more how to do, than the naked Indians know how to dress themselves in the French fashion; when (as you say) all ages, sexes, and degrees, all professions and trades, would become reformers, when the common people of England would represent the commons of England; and abject men, who could neither write nor read, would make laws for the government of the most heroic and the most learned nation in the world; for sure none of our neighbours will deny it to have a full excellency and perfection both in arms and letters. And it was the grossest and most ridiculous pageant that great impostor ever exposed to public view, when he gave up the nation to be disposed of by a handful of poor mechanic persons, who, finding they knew not what to do with it, would (he was sure) give it back to him again, as they shortly did, which makes his title compleat to the government he meant to exercise. No man undervalues the common people of England, who are in truth the best and the honestest, aye, and the wisest common people in the world, when he says they are not fit to model the government they are to live under, or to make the laws they are to obey. Solomon tells us, 'there is a time when one man rules over another to his own hurt;' we have had abundant instances of such a time. It is the privilege, if you please the prerogative (and it is a great one), of the common people of England, to be represented by the greatest, and learnedest, and wealthiest, and wisest persons, that can be chose out of the nation; and the confounding the commons of England, which is a noble representative, with the common people of England, was the first ingredient into that accursed dose, which intoxicated the brains of men with that imagination of a commonwealth; a commonwealth, Mr. Speaker, a government as impossible for the spirit and temper and genius of the English nation to submit to, as it is to persuade them to give their cattle and their corn to other men, and to live upon roots and herbs themselves. I wish heartily that they who have been most delighted with that imagination knew in truth the great benefit under the government. There is not a commonwealth in Europe, where every man that is worth 100*l.* doth not pay more to the government than a man of 1000*l.* a year did ever to the crown here before these troubles. And I am persuaded that monster Commonwealth cost this nation more, in the few years she was begot, born, and brought up, and in her funeral (which was the best expence of all), than the monarchy hath done these 600 years.—You have well done, Mr. Speaker, in taking notice of the great esteem the king hath of the memory of the last parliament. He takes all occasions himself to do it; and it deserved it at his hands: but, as the wisest father takes joy in the hopes his heir will be wiser than he, and the greatest monarch in the hopes that his successor will be greater than he; and if the souls departed feel any joy upon what is done in this world, it is in the case of such an heir, such a successor; so, you may be confident, the ghost of the deceased parliament will be much delighted, much exalted, to see your actions excel theirs, and your fame exceed theirs. It was a blessed parliament; but there are other and greater blessings reserved for you. They began many things which you may have the happiness to finish; they had not time, nor opportunity, to begin many things which you may have the honour to begin and finish. They invited his majesty home, restored him to his throne, and monarchy to the nation. It will be your glory so to establish him in his power and greatness, so as to annex monarchy to the nation, that he and his posterity shall be never again forced to be abroad, that they be invited home, nor in danger to be restored; so to rivet monarchy to the hearts, and to the understandings of all men, that no man may ever presume to conspire against it. Let it not suffice that we have our king again, and our laws again, and parliaments again; but let us so provide, that neither king, nor laws, nor parliament, may be so used again. Let not our monarchy be undermined by a Fifth Monarchy, nor men suffered to have the protection of a government they profess to hate. Root out all anti-monarchical principles; at least, let not the same stratagems prevail against us. Let us remember how we were deceived; and let not the same artifices over-reach us again. Let king, and church, and country, receive more and greater advantages, by the wisdom and industry of this parliament. Let trade abroad and at home be encouraged and enlarged, all vices and excesses be restrained and abolished, by new laws and provisions; let profitable arts and industry find so great encouragement, that all thriving inventions may be brought from all parts of the world to enrich this kingdom, and that the inventors may grow rich in this kingdom. And upon this argument of encouraging industry, I have a command from the king, to recommend to you the encouragement or preservation of a great work of industry, in which the honour and interest of the nation is more concerned than in any work this age hath brought out, it may be in any nation; and that is, all the Drainings in England, which have given us new countries upon our own continent, and brought an inestimable benefit to the king and people, by an act of creation making earth, and mending air by wit and industry. Let no waywardness in particular persons, or consideration of private and particular advantage, give disturbance to works of so public a nature, much less destroy such works; but provide out of hand for the upholding and supporting them by some good law, in which due care may be taken for all particular interests, when the public is out of danger.—I have but one desire more, Mr. Speaker, to make to you from the king, to which the season of the year, as well as your inclinations to gratify him, will dispose you; and that is, that you will use such expedition in your councils of most importance, that the rest may be left to a recess in the winter, after an adjournment; that his majesty may have a time to bestow himself upon his subjects in a Progress, which he would be glad to begin before the end of July. I have leave to tell you the Progress he intends; that he desires again to see his good city of Worcester, and to thank God for his deliverance there, and to thank God even in those cottages, and barns, and haylofts, in which he was sheltered, and feasted, and preserved; and in the close of that progress he hopes he shall find his queen in his arms, and so return to meet you here in the beginning of winter.—Mr. Speaker, All your Petitions are very grateful to the king. You and your servants, in your persons and estates, are free from all arrests or molestations. Your liberty and freedom of speech is very willingly granted to you. When you would repair to his majesty, you shall be welcome. And his majesty will be so far from jealousy of your actions, that he believes it is impossible for him to be jealous of you, or you of him; and, if you please, he will make it penal to nourish that unwholesome weed in any part of the kingdom.”

The Thanks of both Houses given to his Majesty.] These ceremonies being over, the Parliament proceeded to the great affairs of the kingdom; and within three days both houses came to a Vote and Resolution concerning the King's intended Marriage, and accordingly attended his majesty at Whitehall with their humble Acknowledgment and Thanks “for the free and gracious communication of his resolution to marry with the infanta of Portugal; which they conceived to be of so high a concernment to this nation, that they received it with great joy and satisfaction, and did with all earnestness beg a blessing upon, and a speedy accomplishment of it; and they could not but express their own unanimous Resolutions, which they were confident would have a general influence upon the hearts of all his subjects: that they should upon all occasions be ready to assist his majesty in the pursuance of these his intentions against all oppositions whatsoever.” To which the King returned his particular thanks, declaring, “That he did, in the matter of the intended Marriage, as much study their good, as his own.”

The Commons oblige themselves to take the Sacrament, and order the Solemn League and Covenant to be burnt.] While this was transacting, the commons, first, ordered all their Members to take the Sacrament according to the prescribed Liturgy, on pain of expulsion; and then, in conjunction with the lords, on the 20th of May, ordered that the instrument of writing, that had caused so much mischief, called, 'The solemn League and Covenant,' should be burnt by the hand of the common hangman, in the Palace-Yard at Westminster, in Cheapside, and before the Old-Exchange, on the 22d of May; and be forthwith taken off the Record in the house of Peers, and all other courts and places where the same is recorded; and that all copies thereof be taken down out of all churches, chapels, and all other public places in England and Wales.—On the 28th they likewise ordered, the Act for erecting a High Court of Justice for Trying and Judging Charles Stuart, the Act for Subscribing the Engagement against a king and house of Peers; the Act for declaring the people of England to be a Commonwealth and Free-State; the Act for Renouncing the Title of Charles Stuart, and also the Act for the Security of the Lord Protector's Person, to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, in the midst of Westminster-Hall, while the courts were sitting.

The King's Letter for confirming the Act of Indemnity.] June 22. Mr. Secretary Morrice delivered to the Speaker a Letter from his majesty: which was read as follows:

"Trusty and well beloved, we greet you well: At the opening our parliament you were told, That we had a great desire this summer to make a Progress through some parts of our kingdom, which we resolve to begin in devotion to our city of Worcester, that we may pour out our thanks to God for our deliverance there: and the season of the year quickens us in that inclination, as we presume it disposes you to a desire to withdraw from this city, and to visit your countries. But you may remember we told you then, That we had caused some Bills to be prepared for you, for confirmation of what we enacted in our last meeting; and we said all we could to you of the value we set upon the Act of Indemnity (as we have great reason to do) and if we could have used stronger expressions to have conjured you speedily to have dispatched it, we assure you we would have done it. And we did think what we said would have made an impression on all who profess a desire to serve us; and therefore we expected every day, that the same Bill would have been presented to us for another assent. We must confess, we hear you have shewed great affection to us, since your coming together, and that you have already prepared and passed some very good bills (for which we heartily thank you) that are ready for the royal assent: yet we cannot but tell you, That though we are enough concerned to expedite those Bills, we have no mind to pass them till the Act of Indemnity be likewise presented to us, upon which, if you take our word, most of our quiet and good depends, and in which we are sure our honour is concerned.

Vol. IV.

Therefore we must again, and as earnestly as is possible, conjure you to use all possible expedition in passing that Act in the same terms we already passed it (to which we take ourself obliged) and that you will for the present lay aside all private business, that so betaking yourselves only to the public, you may be ready to adjourn by the middle of the next month, which will best suit with all our occasions."

The Act of Oblivion passed.] This Letter did not fail of being received with due respect, and the house resolved to bring in a Bill accordingly; but, as a new instance of their loyalty and duty, proceeded, first, to settle the Revenue on such a footing as might more effectually maintain the splendor and grandeur of the kingly office. Accordingly, this capital point was referred to the consideration of a committee, of which sir Philip Warwick was chairman; who reported, "That on a thorough examination, there was a deficiency of full 265,000*l.* on the different funds, already appointed to answer that end: upon which it was ordered, That forthwith be provided a plentiful Supply for his majesty's present unavoidable great occasions, as well as a Settlement of a constant, and standing Revenue:" and accordingly, a Bill was brought in, "To enable his majesty to send out commissions to receive the free and voluntary Contributions of his people, towards the present supply of his majesty's affairs, &c."

The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Act of Oblivion.] July 8. The commons having completed the above bill, and the bill for Confirmation of the Act of Oblivion and Indemnity, this day the king came to the house of peers, where being seated on his throne, the Speaker of the house of commons spoke thus to his majesty:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; The writ of summons, whereby your majesty was pleased to call together the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the commons house of parliament, gave us to understand, "That your majesty had divers weighty and urgent matters to communicate to us; such as did concern your royal person, your state and dignity, the defence of the kingdom, and the church of England;" and in the same method propounded to us by your majesty, we have applied ourselves to offer you our best counsel and advice.—We found your majesty miraculously preserved, by the hand of God, from the hands of your enemies; we found you peaceably seated in the throne of your ancestors; we found the hereditary imperial crown of these nations auspiciously set upon your royal head: and all this after a sharp and a bloody Civil War.—We held it our duties, in the first place, to endeavour the Safety and Preservation of your majesty's Person and Government; and to that purpose have prepared a Bill.—Next to the safety of your majesty, we took into consideration the state and power that is necessary for so great a prince; and do hope ere long to settle your Militia so, that, by the blessing of God, you need not fear storms from abroad, or earthquakes here at home.—Your majesty was pleased, at the opening of the parliament, to recommend unto us two Bills; one, for confirming of public acts; another, for the private acts that passed the last parliament. They were so many in number, and great in weight, that hitherto we could not consider of them all: but some we have perused; the Act for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings; for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and Purveyances; and also all those that do relate to your majesty's Customs and Excise.—And, that we might with some cheerfulness see your majesty's face, we have brought our brother Benjamin with us? I mean, your Act of Oblivion; I take the boldness to call it Yours, for so it is by many titles; your majesty first conceived it at Breda; you helped to contrive and form it here in England; and, we must all bear you witness, you laboured and travailed till it was brought forth: and since it had a being, some question being made of its legitimation, your royal heart is not at ease until it be confirmed. And now, sir, give me leave to say, by the suffrage of a full, a free, and legal parliament, it is presented to your majesty to be naturalized. Your majesty's desires are fully answered by all the representatives of the people: and their hearty prayer to God is, that all your subjects may be truly thankful to you; and that your majesty may long live to enjoy the fruits of this unparalleled mercy.—Your majesty was pleased to intimate to us on Saturday last, 'That you so valued the quiet and satisfaction of your people, and the keeping of your royal word with them, that, although divers other Bills were made ready for you, you would vouchsafe the honour to this Bill alone, your favourite, to come and pass it.' Sir, hereby you have made this a great holiday; and we shall observe it with joy and thanksgiving. Upon such solemn festivals, there useth to be a second service, an anthem, and a collect, or at least an offering. My anthem shall be, 'Quid tibi retribuam, Domine?' And my collect, a short report of your Revenue. We know, great sir, that money is both the sinews of war, and bond of peace. We have, therefore, taken care of your majesty's Revenue; and do desire to make it in some good proportion suitable both to your grandeur and your merit.—We do believe, the state of our king is the honour of our state; and the best way to preserve our peace, is to be well provided for war. Our time hath not permitted us to finish this work: but, as an earnest of our good affections, we desire your majesty to accept an offering from us.—We cannot enough admire your majesty's patience, providence, and frugality abroad. You did not bring home a debt for us to pay, great as a prince's ransom. And since your return, you have not, with king Edw. III. after his wars in France, or Henry IV.

Henry VII. or Henry VIII. desired: new and great Aids and heavy Subsidies from your people for your supplies.—No, sir; you have been so far from asking, that part of the Money which was given you last parliament for your household provision, you have issued out towards payment of our debts; you have robbed your own table (I had almost said given the meat out of your own belly), to feed the hungry seamen.—Dear sir, these things have a just influence upon the people; they fill our hearts with joy and affection to your majesty. I do not pretend much to physiognomy: but, if I mistake not greatly, the faces of the people do promise great frankness and cheerfulness in your present supplies. What would not your majesty's friends have given, within these 18 months, to have seen your majesty thus happily settled? And what can be too much for those to return, who have received all they enjoy from your majesty's mercy? Great sir, To conclude this solemn service: the commons of England do, by me their servant, humbly present you with this Bill, intituled, 'An Act for a free and voluntary Present,' and wish it a success answerable to your royal heart's desire."

"My Lords and Gentlemen; It is a good time since I heard of your passing this Bill for Money; and I am sure you would have presented it to me sooner, if you had thought I had desired it: but the truth is, though I have need enough of it, I had no mind to receive it from you, till I might at the same time give my assent to this other very good Bill that accompanies it, for which I longed very impatiently. I thank you for both with all my heart; and though there are other good bills ready, with which you will easily believe I am very well pleased, and in which I am indeed enough concerned, yet I chuse rather to pass these two bills together, and to pass them by themselves without any other, that you may all see, and in you the whole kingdom, that I am at least equally concerned for you and them, as for myself: and in truth it will be want of judgment in me, if I ever desire any thing for myself, that is not equally good for you and them. I am confident, you all believe that my well-being is of some use and benefit to you; and I am sure your well-being, and being well-pleased, is the greatest comfort and blessing I can receive in this world.—I hope you will be ready within a few days to dispatch those other Public Bills which are still depending before you, that I may come hither and pass all together, and then adjourn till winter, when what remains may be provided for: and I would be very glad that you would be ready by the 20th of this month, or thereabouts, for the adjournment: which methinks you might easily be, if you suspended all private business till the recess. The last parliament, by God's blessing, laid the foundation of the happiness we all enjoy; and therefore I thought it but justice to the memory of it, to send you Bills for the confirmation of what was enacted then; and I cannot doubt but you will dispatch what remains of that kind with all convenient speed; and that you will think, that what was then thought necessary or fit for the public peace to be enacted, ought not to be shaken now, or any good man less secure of what he possesses, than he was when you came together. It is to put myself in mind as well as you, that I so often (I think as often as I come to you) mention to you my Declaration from Breda: and let me put you in mind of another Declaration, published by yourselves about the same time, and which, I am persuaded, made mine the more effectual; an honest, generous, and Christian Declaration, signed by the most eminent persons, who had been the most eminent sufferers, in which you renounced all former animosities, all memory of former unkindnesses, rowed all imaginable good-will to, and all confidence in, each other.—“My Lords and Gentlemen; Let it be in no man’s power to charge me or you with breach of our word or promise, which can never be a good ingredient to our future security. Let us look forward, and not backward; and never think of what is past, except men put us in mind of it, by repeating faults we had forgot; and then let us remember no more than what concerns those very persons.—God hath wrought a wonderful miracle in settling us as he hath done. I pray let us do all we can to get the reputation at home and abroad of being well settled. We have enemies and enviers enough, who labour to have it thought otherwise; and if we would indeed have our enemies fear us, and our neighbours love and respect us, and fear us enough to love us, let us take all the ways we can, that, as the world cannot but take notice of your extraordinary affection to me, and of the comfort I take in that affection, so that it may likewise take notice of your affection to and confidence in each other; which will disappoint all designs against the public peace, and fully establish our joint security.”

Protest against the Bill to vacate sir E. Powell’s Fines.] July 17. An Act for making void divers Fines unduely procured to be levied by sir Edw. Powell, and dame Mary his wife: The question being put, whether this bill with the proviso shall pass for a law? It was resolved in the affirmative. Upon which the following Protest was entered on the Journals: “Whereas before the question was put for passing the said bill, leave was desired for entering protestations of divers lords, in case the vote should be carried for passing the said bill; we whose names are underwritten do protest against the said bill for these reasons following: 1. That Fines are the foundations upon which most titles of this realm do depend, and therefore ought not to be shaken, for the great inconvenience that is likely to follow thereupon. 2. Such proceeding is contrary to the statute of 25 Edw. 1, now in force, which saith, ‘Foras-

much as fines levied in our court ought and do make an end of all matters: and therefore principally are called fines.’ 3. And to another statute made in the 5th Edw. 3, where it is enacted, ‘That no man shall be forejudged of lands or tenements, goods or chattels, contrary to the term of the great charter. 4. And to another statute made in the 28th Edw. 3, where it is enacted, That no man, of what estate or condition that he be, shall be put out of land or tenement, nor disherited, without being brought in to answer by due process of law. 5. This proceeding by bill, as we conceive, is contrary to a statute made in the 4th of Hen. 4, wherein it is declared, That in pleas real and personal, after judgment given in the courts of our lord the king, the parties be made to come in upon grievous pains, sometimes before the king himself, sometimes before the king’s council, and sometimes to the parliament, to answer thereof anew, to the great impoverishing of the parties, and in the subversion of the common law; it is ordained, that after judgment given in the courts of our lord the king, the parties and their heirs shall be thereof in peace until the judgment be undone by attainr or by error, if there be errors, as hath been used by the laws in the times of the king’s progenitors. 6. The proceedings upon this bill have been, as we conceive, directly against the statutes aforesaid, by calling persons to answer of judgments anew, given in the common pleas, and vacating the same without either attainr or error, and calling persons to answer without the due and ancient process of law, and forejudging the tenants of the lands in question, without ever hearing of them. 7. For that there hath not occurred to us one precedent wherein any fine hath been vacated by act of parliament without consent of parties, the law looking upon fines as always transacted by consent, and with that reverence, that neither lunacy, idiotism, nor any other averment whatsoever shall be admitted against fines when perfected. 8. We conceive, to vacate assurances by a future law, good by the present law, is unreasonable and of dangerous consequence, both in respect of what such a precedent may produce upon the like pretences, as also rendering men’s minds so doubtful, that not only the rude and ignorant, but the learned, may be at a loss how to make or receive a good title. 9. For that it is averred in the said bill, that all the lady Powell’s servants were removed; whereas it appeared by depositions in Chancery, that Antonia Christiana, one who had lived with the lady Powell many years, was not removed. 10. That Dr. Goddard a physician, and Foucaut an apothecary, examined in the said cause, did testify they saw no fear in, or force upon, the lady Powell; and had there been any, we conceive it impossible for a woman to hide the passion of fear from a physician, which is not easily dissembled from a vulgar eye: and Foucaut the apothecary deposed, that he was twice a day with the said lady Powell for one month together immediately preceding her death.—W. Roberts, Campden, Stafford, T. Willoughby, Brecknock, Will. Petre, Montague, Portland, Albemarle, Chr. Hatton.”

A Bill passed for restoring Bishops to their Seats in Parliament.] Before the session was concluded, a Bill was passed for the Répeal of that act of parliament, by which the Bishops were excluded from sitting there. “It was first proposed,” says lord Clarendon,* “in the commons by a gentleman, who had been always taken to be of a Presbyterian family: and in that house it found less opposition than was looked for; all men knowing, that besides the justice of it, and the prudence to wipe out the memory of so infamous an Act, as the Exclusion of them with all the circumstances was known to be, it would be grateful to the king. But when it came into the house of peers, where all men expected it would find a general concurrence, it met with some obstruction; which made a discovery of an intrigue, that had not been suspected. For though there were many lords present, who had industriously laboured the passing the former Bill for the Exclusion, yet they had likewise been guilty of so many other ill things, of which they were ashamed, that it was believed that they would not willingly revive the memory of the whole, by persevering in such an odious particular. Nor in truth did they. But when they saw that it would unavoidably pass (for the number of that party was not considerable), they either gave their consents, as many of them did, or gave their negative without noise. The obstruction came not from thence. The Catholics less owned the contradiction, nor were guilty of it, though they suffered in it. But the truth is, it proceeded from the mercurial brain of the earl of Bristol, who much affected to be looked upon as the head of the Catholics; which they did so little desire that he should be thought, that they very rarely concurred with him. He well knew that the king desired (which his majesty never dissembled) to give the Roman Catholics ease from all the sanguinary laws; and that he did not desire that they should be liable to the other penalties which the law had made them subject to, whilst they should in all other respects behave themselves like good subjects. Nor had they since his majesty's return sustained the least prejudice by their religion, but enjoyed as much liberty at court and in the country, as any other men; and with which the wisest of them were abundantly satisfied, and did abhor the activity of those of their own party, whom they did believe more like to deprive them of the liberty they enjoyed, than to enlarge it to them.—When the earl of Bristol saw this Bill brought into the house for restoring the Bishops to their seats, he went to the king, and informed his majesty, “that if this Bill should speedily pass, it would absolutely deprive the Catholics of all those graces and indulgence which he intended to them: for that the Bishops, when they should sit in the house, whatever their own opinions or inclinations were, would find themselves obliged, that they might preserve their reputation with the people, to contradict and suppose whatsoever should look like favour or connivance towards the Catholics: and therefore, if his majesty continued his former gracious inclination towards the Roman Catholics, he must put some stop (even for the Bishops own sakes) to the passing that Bill, till the other should be more advanced, which he supposed might shortly be done;” there having been already some overtures made to that purpose, and a committee appointed in the house of lords to take a view of all the sanguinary laws in matters of Religion, and to present them to the house that it might consider farther of them. The king, surprised with the discourse from a man who had often told him the necessity of the restoring the Bishops, and that it could not be a perfect parliament without their presence, thought his reason for the delay to have weight in it, and that the delay for a few days could be attended with no prejudice to the matter itself; and thereupon was willing the Bill should not be called for, and that when it should be under commitment, it should be detained there for some time: and that he might, the better to produce this delay, tell some of his friends, “that the king would be well pleased, that there should not be overmuch haste in the presenting that Bill for his royal assent.”—This grew quickly to be taken notice of in the house that after the first reading of that Bill, it had been put off for a second reading longer than was usual when the house was at so much leisure; and that now it was under commitment, it was obstructed there, notwithstanding all the endeavours, some lords of the committee could use for the dispatch; the Bill containing very few words, being only for the repeal of a former Act, and the expressions admitting, that is, giving little cause for any debate. The chancellor desired to know how this came to pass, and was informed by one of the lords of the committee, “that they were assured that ‘the king would have a stop put to it, till ‘another Bill should be provided which his ‘majesty looked for.” Hereupon the chancellor spake with his majesty, who told him all the conference which the earl of Bristol had held with him, and what he had consented should be done. To which the other replied, “that he was sorry that his majesty had been ‘prevailed with to give any obstruction to a ‘Bill, which every body knew his majesty's ‘heart was so much set upon for dispatch; ‘and that if the reason were known, it would ‘quickly put an end to all the pretences of the ‘Catholics; to which his majesty knew he ‘was no enemy.’ The king presently concluded that the reason was not sufficient, and wished ‘that the Bill might be dispatched as ‘soon as possible, that he might pass it that

' session ;' which he had appointed to make an end of within few days : and so the next day the report was called for and made, and the Bill ordered to be engrossed against the next morning ; the earl not being at that time in the house. But the next morning, when the chancellor had the bill engrossed in his hand to present to the house to be read the third time, the earl came to him to the woollack, and with great displeasure and wrath in his countenance told him, ' that if that bill were read that day, he would speak against it ;' to which the chancellor gave him an answer that did not please him : and the bill was passed that day. And from that time the earl of Bristol was a more avowed and declared enemy to him, than he had before professed to be ; though the friendship that had been between them had been discontinued or broken from the time the earl had changed his religion.*

Act for the Security of the King's Person and Government.] An Act was likewise passed, for the ' Security of the King's Person and Government,' by which it was made capital treason to devise the king's death, or imprisonment, or bodily harm, or to deprive and depose him from his kingly name, &c. It enacted likewise, that whoever affirmed the king to be an Heretic, or a Papist, or should by writing, printing, preaching, or other speaking, stir up the people to hatred or dislike of his majesty, or the established government, should be rendered incapable of holding any employment in Church or State. It also declared the Long Parliament to be dissolved, the Solemn League and Covenant to be illegal ; and that there was no legislative power in either, or both houses of parliament, without the king ; and whoever asserted the contrary, were made liable to the penalty of a Premunire.

Act to limit the Number of Petitioners.] Recollecting further the Abuse of Petitioning, in the preceding reign, they prepared a Bill, by which it was enacted, that no more than 20 hands should be subscribed to any Petition or Remonstrance, unless with the sanction of 3 justices, or the major part of the grand jury ; and that such Petition should not be presented to the king, or either house, by above ten persons, on the penalty of 100*l.* and 3 months imprisonment.*

Proceedings against the Regicides.] As the king seemed on one hand to make it a point to perfect the Act of Indemnity, the commons, on the other, appeared as zealous to offer up victims to the memory of his father. Accordingly, they proceeded to the Confiscation of the estates of 21 Regicides deceased. They likewise ordered the lord Mounson, sir Henry Mildmay, and Mr. Robert Wallop, to be brought to the bar of the house of commons ; where confessing their crimes, a Bill was ordered to be brought in to confiscate their estates, as also those of sir J. Harrington and John Phelps, not yet apprehended : and it was farther ordered, " That the lord Mounson, sir J. Harrington, and sir H. Mildmay should be degraded of their several honours and titles ; and that those now in custody, and the other two, when apprehended, should all be drawn upon sledges with ropes about their necks, from the Tower of London to, and under the gallows at Tyburn, and thence conveyed back to the Tower, there to remain prisoners during their lives. Which sentences were solemnly executed upon the 30th of Jan. following.

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the Adjournment.] July 30. This day his majesty came to the house of peers ; and, sitting in his throne, arrayed with his royal robes, the peers likewise sitting in their robes, the king gave command to the gentleman usher of the black rod, to give notice to the house of commons, that they attend his majesty forthwith. And accordingly they came up with their Speaker, who made this Speech following :

" May it please your most excellent majesty ; The Wise Man tells us, ' There is a time to sow, and a time to reap.' Since your majesty did convene the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, they have with unwearied labour consulted for the service of your majesty and the good of this nation ; and now the fields grow white to harvest. In the great field of nature, all fruits do not grow ripe together ; but some in one month, some in another : one time affords your majesty primroses and violets ; another time presents you with July flowers. So it is in the course of our proceedings : some of our fruits are in the blossom, when others are in the bud ; some are near ripe, and others fit to be presented to your majesty. Amongst the number of our choicest ripe fruits, we first present you with a Bill for the Safety and Preservation of your majesty's royal person and government. —Your predecessor queen Elizabeth, of famous memory, in the 13th year of her reign, by Pius Quintus, then bishop of Rome, was excommunicated and anathematized. John Felton posted up a Bull at the bishop of London's palace, whereby she was declared to be deprived of her title to the kingdom, and all the people of this realm absolved from their allegiance to her ; the queen of Scots was then a prisoner in England ; and the duke of Norfolk, for many designs against our queen, committed to the Tower. Historians tell us, the times were very troublesome, full of suspicions and conspiracies. But, sir, what then was only feared, hath in our time been put in execution. No age hath known, no history makes mention of, such sad tragedies. It therefore now becomes your people, after this glorious Restitution, to endeavour all just ways of preservation.—The queen, in her time of trouble and danger, summoned a parliament ; and such was the love of the people to her and her government, that they forthwith made a law for her Security. According to which precedent, we your loyal commons also, who have before them no less cause of fear, but more obligations and affection to your majesty, do humbly tender you a Bill, wherein we desire it may be enacted, "That if any person shall compass, imagine, or design, your majesty's death, destruction or bodily harm, to imprison or restrain your royal person, or depose you, or shall levy war against your majesty within or without your realm, or stir up any foreign power to invade you, and shall express or declare such his wicked intention by printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and advised speaking, being thereof legally convicted, shall be adjudged a traitor."—And, because much of our late misery took its rise from seditious Pamphlets, and Speeches from the pulpits, it is provided, "That if any man shall maliciously and advisedly publish or affirm your majesty to be an Heretic, or a Papist, or that you endeavour to introduce Popery, or shall stir up the people to hatred or dislike of your royal person or government, then every such person shall be made incapable of any office or employment either in Church or State; and if any man shall maliciously and advisedly affirm, that the parliament begun at Westminster the 3rd of Nov. 1640, is yet in being; or that any Covenant or engagement since that time imposed upon the people doth oblige them to endeavour a change of the government either in church or state; or that either or both houses of parliament have a legislative power without your majesty; then every such offender, being thereof legally convicted, shall incur the penalties of a Premunire, mentioned in the statute made 16 Rd. II."—In the next place, sir, give me leave, I beseech you (without any violence to the Act of Oblivion), to remember a sad effect of the distempers in the last age. When the fever began to seize upon the people, they were impatient till they lost some blood. The lords spiritual, who in all ages had enjoyed a place in parliament, were by an act of parliament excluded. Your majesty's royal grandfather was often wont to say, "No Bishop, No King." We found his words true; for, after they were put out, the fever still increasing, in another fit the temporal lords followed, and then the king himself. Nor did the humour rest there; but, in the round, the house of commons was first garbled, and then turned out of doors. It is no wonder, when a sword is put into a madman's hand, to see him cut off limb by limb, and then to kill himself. When there is a great breach of the sea upon the low grounds, by the violence of the torrent, the rivers of sweet waters are often turned aside, and the salt waters make themselves a channel; but when the breach is made up, good husbands drain their lands again, and restore the ancient sewers.—Thanks be to God, the flood is gone off the face of this Island. Our turtle dove hath found good footing. Your majesty is happily restored to the government; the temporal lords and commons are restored to sit in parliament. And shall the Church alone now suffer? 'Sit Ecclesia Anglicana libera, et habeat Libertates suas illasas.' In order to this great work, the commons have prepared a Bill to repeal that law which was made in 17 Car. whereby the Bishops were excluded this house: these noble lords have all agreed; and now we beg your majesty will give it life. Speak but the word, great sir; and your servants yet shall live.—We cannot well forget the method, how our late miseries, like waves of the sea, came in upon us: First, The people were invited to petition, to give colour to some illegal demands. Then they must remonstrate, then they must protest, then they must covenant, then they must associate, then they must engage against our lawful government, and for the maintenance of the most horrid tyranny that ever was invented. For the prevention of this practice for the future, we do humbly tender unto your majesty a Bill, intituled, "An Act against Tumults and Disorders, upon pretence of preparing or presenting public Petitions, or Addresses, to your majesty or the parliament."—In the next place, we held it our duty to undeceive the people, who have been poisoned with an opinion, that the Militia of this nation was in themselves, or in their representatives in parliament; and, according to the ancient known laws, we have declared the sole right of the Militia to be in your majesty. And forasmuch as our time hath not permitted us to finish a Bill intended for the future ordering of the same; we shall present you with a temporary Bill, for the present managing and disposing of the Land Forces; and likewise another Bill for establishing certain Articles and Orders for the Regulation and Government of your majesty's Navies and Forces by sea.—According to your majesty's commands, we have examined many of the Public and Private Bills which passed last parliament; and have prepared some Bills of Confirmation. We have also ascertained the Pains and Penalties to be imposed upon the persons or estates of those miscreants who had a hand in the murder of your royal father of blessed memory, and were therefore excepted in your majesty's Act of Oblivion; wherein we have declared to all the world, how just an indignation we had against that horrid regicide.—We have likewise prepared a Bill for the Collection of great Arrears of the Duty of Excise; which I do here, in the name of the commons, humbly present unto your majesty. The reason, we conceive, why it was not formerly paid, was because the people disliked the authority whereby it was imposed. But, understanding that it is now given to your majesty, it will come in with as great freedom; aliquisque malo erit usus in illo.—Your majesty was pleased, at the opening of the parliament, to tell us, 'That you intended this summer to take a Progress, and see your people, and at your return did hope to bring a queen home with you.' Sir, this welcome news hath made us cast about all ways for your accommodation. And therefore, that no conveniences might be wanting, either for your majesty, your queen, or your attendants, we have prepared a Bill, intituled, 'An Act for providing necessary Carriages, in all your royal Progresses and Remorals.'—Your majesty was likewise pleased, at our first meeting, to say, 'You would not tire us with hard duty and hot service; and therefore about this time intended a Recess.' That royal favour will now be very reasonable; and we hope advantageous both to your majesty and ourselves: we know, in our absence, your princely heart and head will not be free from cares and thoughts of our protection; and when we leave our hive, like the industrious bee, we shall but fly about the several countries of the nation to gather honey; and, when your majesty shall be pleased to name the time, return with loaded thighs unto our house again."

The King's Speech at the Adjournment.] After giving his royal assent to the said Bills, the King made the following speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I perceive, by the thin appearance of the members of both houses this day, that it is high time to adjourn. In truth, the season of the year as well as your particular affairs require it; and therefore I do willingly consent to it.—I thank you for the many good Bills you have presented me with this day; of which, I hope, the benefit will redound to the whole kingdom. I thank you for the care you have taken for the safety of my person; which, trust me, is the more valuable to me, for the consequence I think it is of to you. And, upon my conscience, there is nobody wishes ill to me, but they who would quickly revenge themselves of you if they could.—I thank you for the care you have taken of yourselves, of your own safety and honour, in the Act against Tumults and Disorders upon pretence of Petitions; to which license we owe much of the calamities we have undergone: But I thank you with all my heart, indeed as much as I can do for any thing, for the repeal of that Act which excluded the Bishops from sitting in parliament. It was an unhappy act, is an unhappy time, passed with many unhappy circumstances, and attended with miserable events; and therefore I do again thank you for repealing it. You have thereby restored parliaments to their primitive institutions. And I hope, my lords and gentlemen, you will in a short time restore them to the primitive order, and gravity of debates and determinations, which the license of the late distempered times had so much corrupted; which is the only way to restore parliaments to their primitive veneration with the people, which I heartily wish they should always have.—My Lords and Gentlemen; You are now going to your several countries; where you cannot but be very welcome, for the services you have performed here. I do very earnestly recommend the good government and peace of your countries to your care, and your counsel, and your vigilancy. There are distempered spirits enough, which lie in wait to do mischief, by laying reproaches upon the court, upon the government, reproaches upon me, and reproaches upon you. Your wisdoms and reputation and authority will, I doubt not, weigh down their light credit; and the old and new good laws will, I hope, prevent any mischief they intend. However, you have done very well (and I do very heartily thank you for it) in declaring my sole right over the Militia; the questioning of which was the fountain from which all our bitter waters flowed. I pray make haste to put the whole kingdom into such posture, that evil men, who will not be converted, may yet choose to be quiet, because they find that they shall not be able to do the harm they desire to do.—I know you have begun many Bills in both houses which cannot be finished till your meeting again: And, that they may be finished then, I forbear to make a sessions now; but am contented that you adjourn till the 20th of Nov. when I hope, by God's blessing, we shall come happily together again.—In a word, my lords and gentlemen, I thank you for what you have done; and am confident, that what you have left undone you will dispatch with all alacrity, and to all our satisfactions, at our next meeting. And so you may adjourn till the 20th of November."

The King's Speech at the Meeting of Parliament.] Nov. 20. The parliament met pursuant to adjournment, the Bishops being restored to their seats in the house of peers. Upon which occasion the King was pleased to declare his mind to both houses in the speech following:

"My Lords and Gentlemen of the House of Commons: I know the visit I make you this day is not necessary, is not of course: yet, if there were no more in it, it would not be strange that I come to see, what you and I have so long desired to see, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons of England met together to consult for the peace and safety of Church and State, by which parliaments are restored to their primitive lustre and integrity. I do heartily congratulate with you for this day. But, my lords and gentlemen, as my coming hither at this time is somewhat extraordinary; so the truth is, the occasion of my coming is more extraordinary. It is to say something to you on my own behalf, to ask somewhat of you for myself; which is more than I have done of you or of those who met here before you, since my coming into England. I needed not have done it then; and, upon my conscience, I need not do it now. They did, and you do, upon all occasions, express so great an affection and care of all that concerns me, that I may very well refer both the matter and manner of your doing any thing for me, to your own wisdoms and kindness. And indeed, if I did think that what I am to say to you now did alone or did most concern myself; if the uneasy condition I am in, if the streights and necessities I am to struggle with, did not manifestly relate to the public peace and safety, more than to my own particular otherwise than as I am concerned in the public, I should not give you this trouble this day.

I can bear my necessities which merely relate to myself with patience enough.—Mr. Speaker and you Gentlemen of the house of Commons: I do not now importune you to make more haste in the settling the constant Revenue of the crown, than is agreeable to the method you propose to yourselves; to desire you seriously to consider the insupportable weight that lies upon it, the obligation it lies under, to provide for the interest, honour and security of the nation, in another proportion than in any former times it hath been obliged to: But I come to put you in mind of the crying Debts which do every day call upon me; of some necessary provisions which are to be made without delay for the very safety of the kingdom; of the great sum of money that should be ready to discharge the several fleets when they come home; and for the necessary preparations that are to be made for the setting out new fleets to sea against the spring, that revenue being already anticipated upon as important services which should be assigned to those preparations. These are the pressing occasions which I am forced to recommend to you with all possible earnestness, and to conjure you to provide for as speedily as is possible, and in such a manner as may give a security at home, and some reputation abroad. I make this discourse to you with some confidence, because I am very willing and desirous that you should thoroughly examine whether these necessities I mention be real or imaginary, or whether they are fallen upon us by my fault, my own ill managery, or excesses, and provide for them accordingly. I am very willing that you make a full inspection into my Revenue, as well the disbursements as receipts; and if you find it hath been ill-managed by any corruption in the officers I trust, or by my own unthriftiness, I shall take the information and advice you shall give me very kindly; I say, if you find it; for I would not have you believe any loose discourses, how confidently soever urged, of giving away four score thousand pounds in a morning, and many other extravagancies of that kind. I have much more reason to be sorry that I have not to reward those who have ever faithfully served the king my father and myself, than ashamed of any bounty I have exercised towards any man*. My Lords and Gentlemen; I am sorry to find that the general temper and affections of the nation are not so well composed as I hoped they would have been, after so signal blessings from God Almighty upon us all, and after so great indulgence and condescensions from me towards all interests. There are many wicked instruments, still as active as ever. who labour night and day to disturb the public peace, and to unake all people jealous of each other. It will be worthy of your care and vigilance, to provide proper remedies for the diseases of that kind; and if you find new diseases, you must study new remedies. Let us not be discouraged: If we help one another we shall, with God's blessing, master all our difficulties. Those which concern matters of Religion, I confess to you are too hard for me; and therefore I do commend them to your care and deliberation, which can best provide for them.—I shall not need to recommend, or put you in mind of, the good correspondence that ought to be kept between you, for the good of yourselves and me, and the whole kingdom; and I may tell you, it is very necessary for us all. You will find, whoever doth not love me, doth not love you; and they who have no reverence for you have little kindness for me. Therefore, I pray, let us adhere fast to each other; and then we shall with the help of God, in a short time persuade or oblige all men to that submission and obedience to the law, as may constitute a full measure of happiness to prince and people, and persuade our neighbours to that esteem and value they have formerly had for us."

* "Let no man wonder," says lord Clarendon, "that within so little time as a year and a half, or very little more, after the king's return, that is, from May to November in the next year, and after so great sums of money raised by acts of parliament upon the people, his majesty's Debts could be so crying and importunate, as to disturb him to that degree as he expressed. It was never enough understood, that in all that time he never received from the parliament more than the 70,000*l.* towards his Coronation; nor were the Debts which were now so grievous to him contracted by himself (though it cannot be supposed but

Information given to the House of a Presbyterian Plot.] The commons were no sooner returned to their house, than sir John Packington, member for Worcester, gave Information of a dangerous Presbyterian Plot on foot; and that many of the chief of the conspirators were in prison at Worcester: the members also who served for Oxfordshire, Hertfordshire, Staffordshire, and several other counties, gave in the like Informations.

Nov 21. The lords received a Message from the commons by Mr. Secretary Morrice to let them know, "That the house of commons have intelligence that divers Malecontents, Fanatics, Cashiered and Disbanded Officers and Soldiers, and others, have some Design amongst them, tending to the breach that he had contracted debts himself in that time): all the money that had been given and had been applied to the payment of the Land and Sea forces, and had done neither. Parliaments do seldom make their computations right, but reckon what they give to be much more than is ever received, and what they are to pay to be as much less than in truth they owe; so that when all the money that was collected was paid, there remained still very much due to the soldiers, and much more to the seamen; and the clamour from both reached the king's ears, as if they had been levied by his warrant of the peace of this kingdom; therefore they desire their lordships would join with them, to move his majesty that he would please to issue out a Proclamation, that all suspicious and loose persons may be forthwith sent out of these towns of London and Westminster, and the liberties thereof for some time."

This day, the commons, to shew their readiness to assist the king in his wants, voted "That the sum of 1,200,000*l.* be speedily paid and raised for the Supply of the king's majesty's present occasions;" and so proceeded accordingly. For which the king soon after returned his hearty Thanks, and particularly expressed, how exceeding much he was beholden to the commons for their great gift, and the manner of it, in giving so freely. After which, he declared by a Message to the commons, signifying, "That, making the good of his people the subject of his thoughts, and considering that the calling in the Money, called the Commonwealth's Money, by the last of this month, might be prejudicial to his people, and hazard the exportation of a great part thereof, he was graciously pleased, by the advice of his privy council, to direct a Proclamation to be issued, signifying his majesty's pleasure to accept of the said Money in any payment to be made to him till the 25th of March next."

Proceedings against the Regicides renewed.] Nov. 25. The first parliament having respited the punishments of several of the Regicides, as well those that lay under condemnation, as others not so flagrantly guilty of that crime, the houses resumed the matter, and this day and for his service. And his majesty understood too well, by the experience of the ill husbandry of the last year, when both the army and the ships were so long continued in pay, for want of money to disband and pay them off, what the trouble and charge would be, if the several Fleets should return before money was provided to discharge the seamen; and for that the clamour would be only upon him.—But there was an expence that he had been engaged in from the time of his return, and by which he had contracted a great Debt, of which very few men could take notice; nor could the king think fit to discover it, till he had first provided against the mischief which might have attended the discovery. It will hardly be believed, that in so warlike an age, and when the armies and fleets of England had made more noise in the world for 20 years, had fought more battles at land and sea, than all the world had done besides, or any one people had done in any age before; and when at his majesty's return there remained a 100 ships at sea, and an Army of near threescore thousand men at land; there should not be in the Tower of London, and in all the stores belonging to the crown, Fire-Arms enough, nor indeed of any other kind, to arm three thousand men; nor powder and naval provisions enough to set out five ships of war—From the death those Regicides that came in upon Proclamation were brought to the bar of the house of lords, to answer what they could say for themselves, why judgment should not be executed against them. They severally alledged, 'That, upon his majesty's gracious Declaration from Brøda, and the Votes of Parliament, and his majesty's Proclamation, published by the advice of the lords and commons then assembled in parliament, they did render themselves, being advised that they should thereby secure their lives; and humbly craved the benefit thereof, and the mercy of the houses, and their mediation to his majesty in their behalfs.' Harry Marten briskly added, 'That he had never obeyed any Proclamation before this, and hoped that he should not be hanged for taking of the king's word now.' New debates arose about them, and a Bill was brought in for their execution, which was read twice, but afterwards dropt; and so they were all sent to their several prisons, and but little more heard of them. The difficulty had like to have been the heavier upon them, by reason of several seditious pamphlets published about this time; and likewise by reason of a Message from the King, delivered by the Lord Chancellor in a conference between both houses.†

The Lord Chancellor's Declaration concerning a Plot in agitation.] Dec. 19. The Lord Chancellor acquainted the lords, "That he had a Message to deliver from the King; which was, to let them know, that besides the Apprehensions and Fears that are generally abroad, his majesty hath received Letters from of Cromwell, no care had been taken for supplies of any of the stores. And the changes which ensued in the government, and putting out and in new officers; the expeditious of Lambert against sir George Booth, and afterwards into the North; and other preparations for those factions and parties which succeeded each other; and the continual opportunities which the officers had for embezzlement; and lastly, the setting out that fleet which was sent to attend upon the king for his return; had so totally drained the stores of all kinds, that the magazines were no better replenished than is mentioned before: which as soon as his majesty knew, as he could not be long ignorant of it, the first care he took was to conceal it, that it might not be known abroad or at home, in how ill a posture he was to defend himself against an enemy. And then he committed the care of that province to a noble person, whom he knew he could not trust too much, and made sir Wm. Compton master of the Ordnance, and made all the shifts he could devise for monies, that the work might be begun. And hereby insensibly he had contracted a great Debt: and these were part of the crying debts, and the necessary provisions which were to be made without delay for the very safety of the kingdom, which he told the parliament." Life, p. 145. † Earclard, p. 795.

several parts of the kingdom, and also by intercepted letters it does appear, that divers discontented persons are endeavouring to raise new troubles, to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom, as in many particulars was instanced: which matter being of so great consequence, his majesty's desire is, That the house of commons may be made acquainted with it, that so his majesty may receive the advice and counsel of both houses of parliament, what is fit to be done herein; and to think of some proper remedy to secure the peace of the kingdom."—Upon this, a joint committee of both houses was appointed to sit, notwithstanding the usual recess at Christmas, in order to make discoveries, and prepare a Report against the next meeting; the substance of which, as delivered by the lord chancellor Clarendon, was as follows:—"That there was found with Salmon a List of 100 Officers of the late Army: that it was further discovered that there should have been a meeting in London about the 10th of Dec. and that they intended about the end of Jan. to have made sure of Shrewsbury, Coventry, and Bristol, and that they should rise in several parts at once: that where they were prevalent they should begin with Assassination, which moved one of them to relate, 'That some of the late king's Judges were entertained in France, Holland and Germany, and held constant correspondence with those, and were fomented by some foreign Princes.' That many arms were brought in order to this design, and that they bragged, 'If they once got footing, they should not want means to carry on their work.' That they were discovered by one of their party, and his relation confirmed by such intelligence from abroad, as never failed." He further told them, "That at Huntington many there act under the name of Quakers, that were not so, and rode there in multitudes by night, to the great terror of his majesty's good subjects. That it might be wondered at, that some proposals were not made to remedy this impending evil: but the king had advised with the duke of Albemarle, now present at this committee, and has put two troops into Shrewsbury, and as many into Coventry; who, by the way, have broken a great knot of thieves, and taken twenty. That a rumour was spread, that the appointing of this Committee was only a Plot to govern by an Army; but the committee was very sensible of the real danger, and hoped the houses would be so too; and that since all their adversaries were united to destroy them, so they should unite to preserve themselves."

Corporation Act passed.] Dec. 19. The Act for regulating Corporations was passed. It made a great noise, and met with some struggles in the house. It proved indeed a severe mortification and a blow to one party, and made a mighty alteration in several places, which the court was pleased to look upon as nests of sedition. Part of the Preamble very well shews the design of the Act, namely, That the Succession in such Corporations may be most properly perpetuated in the hands of persons well affected to his majesty, and the established government; it being too well known, that notwithstanding all his majesty's endeavours, and unparalleled indulgence, in pardoning all that is past, nevertheless many evil spirits are still working: therefore, for this, every mayor, alderman, common-councilman, or any other officer in a Corporation, was obliged, besides the common Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, and a particular Declaration against the Solemn League and Covenant, to take an Oath, declaring, 'That it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the king; and that he did abhor that traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those commissioned by him.' And, to put this in execution, the king was authorized to grant a commission to such persons as he thought fit, to last above two years, with sufficient power to answer the ends of the act.

The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Money Bill, and the Corporation Act.] Dec. 20. The Money Bill, the Corporation Act, and two other bills, being ready for the royal assent, the king came to the house of peers. The commons being sent for, came with their Speaker; who made the following Speech:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; The last time the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, had the honour to wait upon you in this place, your majesty was graciously pleased to congratulate with them, for the glorious meeting of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons of England, in this your full, free, and legal parliament.—Great sir, it is our present comfort, and will be our future glory, that God hath made us instrumental for the repairs of those breaches which the worst of times had made upon the best of governments. The late great eclipse in our horizon, occasioned by the interposition of the earth, is now vanished; the stars in our firmament are now full of light; the light of our moon is become like the light of the sun; and the light of our sun is sevenfold.—A man that sees the river of Thames at a high water, and observes how much it sinks in a few hours, would think it running quite away; but, by the secret providence of God, we see that when the ebb is at the lowest, the tide of a rising water is nearest the return.—Your majesty was likewise graciously pleased to speak something to us on your own behalf; and did vouchsafe to say, you would ask something for yourself; withal declaring some uneasiness in your condition, by reason of some crying Debts which daily called for satisfaction.—Great sir, I am not able to express, at the hearing of those words, with what a sympathy the whole body of the parliament was presently affected. The circulation of the blood, of which our naturalists do tell us, was never so sensibly demonstrated as by this experiment. Before your majesty's words were all fallen from your lips, you might have seen us blush: all our blood came into our faces; from thence it hasted down without obstruction to every part of the body; and, after a due consulting of the several parts, it was found necessary to breathe a vein.—We cannot forget how much our treasure hath been exhausted; but we remember also it was by usurping and tyrannical powers; and therefore we are easily persuaded to be at some more expence to keep them out. The merchant tells us, it is good policy, in a troubled sea, to lose some part of our cargo, thereby to save the rest.—With your majesty's leave, we have been bold to look into the present state of affairs; and find those great sums that have been heretofore advanced upon us were raised most of them in bad times, and for ill purposes, to keep your majesty out of this your native kingdom; and when your majesty returned home from your long banishment, you found the naval storehouse unfurnished, which will not easily be supplied. The unsettled humours, and unquiet spirits, that are amongst us, do necessitate a costly guard for your royal person: the honourable accessions of Dunkirk, Tangier, and Jamaica, do at present require a great Supply; but, we have reason to believe, in time to come, will repay this nation their principal with good interest.—Your majesty hath sent a royal fleet upon a happy errand, to bring your royal consort hither: and is there any Englishman will stick to pay the wages of those mariners, whose ships do bring so good a freight?—Upon all these considerations, your royal commons were in pain, until, like prudent and good husbands, they had redeemed the nation from all its public Debts. And that your majesty may at once have a full measure of their duty and affection to yourself, and that your neighbours abroad, as well as the disinterested Commonwealth's men with all their complicated interests here at home, may see the happy correspondence that is between our head and all the members of this body politic; we have cheerfully and unanimously given your majesty twelve hundred and three score thousand pounds; which sum we desire may be levied in 12 months, by six quarterly payments, after the rate of 70,000*l.* per annum, to begin the 25th of this present Dec.; in order whereunto, we humbly pray your majesty's royal assent unto this bill."

The King's Speech thereon.] After passing the said Bill, his majesty was pleased to make this short Speech:

"Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons; You have made me this day a very great and a very noble present; a present that I have received benefits from already, before you presented it: for, trust me, the benefit is not small, which I and you both have already, from the reputation of this present, from the alacrity and affection you have so unanimously expressed in this affair.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I do thank you with all my heart for it; and I will not enlarge those thanks further, than by telling you, that I do not come more willingly this day to pass this Bill, than I will do to pass any other bills which you shall provide for the ease, benefit, and security of my people; and I do verily believe that you and I shall never be deceived or disappointed in the expectation we have of each other." The parliament was then adjourned to the 7th of January.

Message from the King to the Commons relative to the Money Bill.] Feb. 18. Mr. Secretary Morrice informed the commons, "That he had directions from his majesty to desire the house, that they would put a Supersedeas to any further debate upon the Bill for permission to such persons as should advance Money for his majesty's present occasions, to take interest at 10 per cent. That his majesty, finding the Bill might have some ungrateful relish in it, resolved to put himself upon the greatest straits, rather than adventure upon any course that might in the least seem to disgust this house, or prejudice his good subjects; and therefore would endeavour to find some other means to supply his present urgent occasions, and desired the Bill might be laid aside." This Message affected them so much, that they immediately returned their humble Thanks to the king for his tenderness to his people, and ordered, "That his majesty be made acquainted, that this house would leave no means unattempted to advance his majesty's Revenue, and supply his present urgent occasions."

The King's Speech to the Commons in the Banqueting House, concerning his Necessities.] March 1. The King finding his necessities to increase, ordered the commons to attend him at Whitehall, in a body by themselves: which was accordingly done this day; when his majesty addressed them as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons; Finding it necessary to say somewhat to you, I thought once of doing it by a Message, which hath been the most usual way; but when I considered, that speaking to you myself with that plainness and freedom I use to do, hath more of kindness in it; and with what affection you use to receive what I say to you, I resolved to deliver my Message to you myself; and have therefore sent for you hither, which hath been frequently done heretofore, though it be the first time I have done so.—I do speak my heart to you, when I tell you, that I do believe, that, from the first institutions of parliaments to this hour, there was never a house of commons fuller of affection and duty to their king, than you are to me; never any that was more desirous and solicitous to gratify their king, than you are to oblige me; never a house of commons in which there were fewer persons without a full measure of zeal for the honour and welfare of the king and country, than there are in this.—The wonderful alacrity that you showed at your first coming together, in giving me so liberal a Supply, was an unquestionable instance of this; and, I assure you, made our neighbours abroad look upon me, and you with much the more respect and esteem; and I am persuaded, even broke the heart of some desperate and seditious designs at home: in a word, I know most of your faces and names, and can never hope to find better men in your places.—You will wonder now, after I have willingly made this just acknowledgment to you, that I should lament, and even complain, that I, and you, and the kingdom, are yet without that present fruit and advantage which we might reasonably promise ourselves from such a harmony of affections, and a unity in resolutions, to advance the public service, and to provide for the Peace and Security of the kingdom; that you do not expedite those good counsels which are necessary for both. I know not how it comes to pass, but for these many weeks past, even since your last adjournment, private and particular business have almost thrust the consideration of the public out of doors; and, in truth, I do not know, that you are nearer settling my Revenue, than you were at Christmas: I am sure I have communicated my condition to you, without reserve; what I have coming in, and what my necessary disbursements are: and I am exceedingly deceived, if whatsoever you give me, be any otherwise given to me, than to be issued out for your own use and benefit.—Trust me, it shall be so; and, if you consider it well, you will find, that you are the richer by what you give; since it is all to be laid out, that you may enjoy the rest in Peace and Security.—Gentlemen, I need not put you in mind of the miserable effects which have attended the Wants and Necessities of the crown: I need not tell you that there is a Republican party still in the kingdom, which have the courage to promise themselves another Revolution: and, methinks, I should as little need to tell you, that the only way, with God's blessing, to disappoint their hopes, and indeed to reduce them from those extravagant hopes and desires, is, to let them see, that you have so provided for the crown, that it hath wherewithal to support itself, and to secure you; which, I am sure, is all I desire, and desire only for your preservation.—Therefore I do conjure you, by all the professions of affection you have made to me, by all the kindness I know you have for me, after all your deliberations, betake yourselves to some speedy resolutions; and settle such a real and substantial Revenue upon me, as may hold some proportion with the necessary expences I am at, for the peace, and benefit, and honour of the kingdom; that they who look for troubles at home, may despair of their wishes; and that our neighbours abroad, by seeing that all is well at home, may have that esteem and value of us, as may secure the interest and honour of the nation, and make the happiness of this kingdom, and of this city, once more the admiration and envy of the world.—Gentlemen, I hear you are very zealous for the Church, and very solicitous, and even jealous that there is not expedition enough used in that affair: I thank you for it, since, I presume, it proceeds from a good root of piety and devotion: but I must tell you, I have the worst luck in the world, if, after all the reproaches of being a papist, whilst I was abroad, I am suspected of being a Presbyterian now I am come home.—I know you will not take it unkindly, if I tell you, that I am as zealous for the Church of England, as any of you can be; and am enough acquainted with the enemies of it, on all sides; that I am as much in love with the Book of Common Prayer as you can wish, and have prejudice enough to those that do not love it; who, I hope, in time will be better informed, and change their minds: and you may be confident, I do as much desire to see a Uniformity settled, as any amongst you: I pray, trust me, in that affair I promise you to hasten the dispatch of it, with all convenient speed; you may rely upon me in it.—I have transmitted the Book of Common Prayer, with those Alterations and Additions which have been presented to me by the Convocation, to the house of peers, with my approbation, that the Act of Uniformity may relate to it: so that I presume it will be shortly dispatched there; and when we have done all we can, the well settling that affair will require great prudence and discretion, and the absence of all passion and precipitation.—I will conclude with putting you in mind, that the season of the year; the convenience of your being in the country, in many respects for the good and welfare of it (for you will find much tares have been sowed there, in your absence); the arrival of my Wife, who I expect some time this month; and the necessity of my own being out of town to meet her, and to stay some time before she comes hither; makes it very necessary, that the parliament be adjourned before Easter, to meet again in the winter: and that it may do so, I pray lay aside private business, that you may, in that time, dispatch the publick: and there are few things I reckon more public, than your providing for the security of the Fen-Lands, which I have so often recommended to you; and do it now, very earnestly. I pray let no private animosities or contests endanger a work of so great a benefit and honour to the nation; but first provide for the support of the work, and then let justice be done for determination of particular interests.—The mention of my Wife's arrival puts me in mind to desire you to put that compliment upon her, that her entrance into the town may be with more decency than the ways will now suffer it to be: and, to that purpose, I pray you would quickly pass such laws as are before you, in order to the mending those ways; and that she may not find Whitehall surrounded with water.—I will detain you no longer, but do promise myself great fruits of this conversation with you; and that you will justify the confidence I have in your affection, by letting the world see, that you take my concernments to heart, and are ready to do whatsoever I desire for the peace and welfare of the kingdom.”

Hearth-Money Bill.] These assurances of his majesty, had their desired effect. A Bill to lay a duty upon every Chimney Hearth, in each house of above two shillings a year, for ever, was forthwith agreed upon; and his majesty was moreover enabled to raise, for the 3 next ensuing months, one month's tax in each year, after the rate of 70,000*l.* a month, if necessity should so require.

The Press put into the hands of a Licenser.] Nor, says Ralph, did they rest here: the Press had offended as well as the pulpit; the parliament had been treated with the same freedom as the king, and both seemed more disposed to silence clamours, than remove the cause. As therefore the pulpit was to be purged by the Uniformity Act, care was taken to bridle the Press, and put the reins into the hands of a Licenser; who was generally so careful to seal the lips of falsehood and abuse, that even truth and justice could rarely obtain a hearing.

To convince his majesty yet farther, how extremely desirous they were, that the republican spirit should be entirely subdued, they took the affair of the Militia again into consideration, and prepared that Bill, which has put the power of the sword in the king's hand.

The Quakers' Bill passed.] There was yet another Bill, continues the above writer, which had hung in the house of Lords ever since last session, and which was now to be passed into a law: and this was the Bill to oblige the Quakers to take the Oaths. Favourable as the crisis was to every rigorous and penal measure, the lords, as we have already remarked, had not stomachs strong enough to digest quite so fast, as the commons furnished them with this sort of food. Thus, with regard to the Bill now before us, finding the Title had relation only to the Quakers, and that in the body of it, a provision was made for extending the penalties to 'others,' they started exceptions, treated it as an inconsistency at least, and ordered, That it should be limited to the Quakers 'only.' A free conference ensued between the two houses, the commons adhered to the letter of their Bill, and upon the report thereof, their lordships so qualified their Alterations, that all objections were removed, and the bill was passed by commission on the 2d of May.* (Ralph, vol. i. p. 69.)

* "In the late Debates upon the Quakers Bill, &c. reference was made to the horrid impulses of what they called 'the Spirit,' not only dictating the most extravagant opinions, but driving to the most abominable practices. Many of that party had their brains dislocated and displaced. Some whereof have taken their children, and gone and sacrificed them, pretending a particular command, like that God gave to Abraham: as a woman of Dover

"An humble Representation of the sad condition of many of the King's Party; who, since his majesty's happy Restoration, have no Relief, and but languishing hopes. Together with Proposals how some of them may be speedily relieved, and others assured thereof, within a reasonable time.

"What miseries and persecutions we Roy-cut off her child's head, and alledged this Scripture. Others have shut themselves up with a Bible, and resolved to eat nothing, because it is written, that 'Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' Some have killed their cat, because she had taken a mouse on Sunday, but deferred the execution till Monday. Evach ap Evan, near Shrewsbury, killed his own mother and brother in cold blood; having no other quarrel against them but that they loved the Liturgy," &c. Hist. of the English and Scotch Presbyterians.

On the other hand, to discountenance these strange stories, we find the following affecting Petition in G. Fox's Journal: "There being very many Friends in prison in the nation, Richard Hubberthorn, and I George Fox, drew up a paper concerning them, and got it delivered to the King, that he might understand how we were dealt with by his officers. It was thus directed: "For the KING.

"Friend, who art the chief ruler of these dominions, here is a list of some of the Sufferings of the people of God, in scorn called Quakers, that have suffered under the changeable powers before thee, by whom there have been imprisoned, and under whom there have suffered for good conscience sake, and for bearing testimony to the truth as it is in Jesus, 3173 persons: and there lye yet in prison in the name of the Commonwealth 73 persons that we know of. And there have died in prison in the time of the Commonwealth, and of Oliver and Richard the Protectors, through cruel and hard imprisonments upon nasty straw and in dungeons, 32 persons. There have been also imprisoned in thy name, since thy arrival, by such as though to ingratiate themselves thereby to thee, 3068 persons. Besides this, our meetings are daily broken up by men with clubs and arms (though we meet peaceably, according to the practice of God's people in the primitive times) and our friends are thrown into waters, and trod upon, until the very blood gusheth out of them: the number of which abuses can hardly be uttered. Now this we would have of thee, to set them at liberty, that lye in prison in the names of the Commonwealth, and of the two Protectors, and them that lye in thy own name, for speaking the truth, and for a good conscience, &c." G. Fox's Journal, p. 582.

lists have suffered, for 19 years past, no one, we presume, is a stranger to, that could see, or hear. The war began with the plunder of our goods and seizure of our rents, and it ended with the sale of our estates, or, at best, a composition, which engaged us in debts; the burthen whereof, where the parties were either indebted before, or had families to provide for, could not but be ruinous to them: such of us as had no lands, but lived by their honest endeavours, were not only thrust out of their proper employments, but made incapable of any other that could afford them a tolerable subsistence, so as many, the most deserving of their country, have been forced to part with their inheritances to buy them bread: others, of free and generous minds, have languished in tedious imprisonments: few, in comparison of the rest, by singular providence and frugality, have preserved themselves.—With what courage and constancy of affection we have owned our cause, and party, even then, when but to save them civilly was treason, and worse, if worse could be; with what faith and perseverance we have expected our King's return; with what invisible comforts we have supported our feeble hopes, at their lowest ebb of outward possibility, whilst all the politicians derided us as fond and credulous persons, who, with the purgatory of wise men, purchased only the Paradise of Fools; a kind of Alchemists, or Jews, who looked for a Messiah that would come; and this confidence (grounded chiefly on our integrity) how it engaged us in attempts, which, perhaps, were more honest than prudent, by opposing Plots to Councils, and tumults to the best armies; will not, I trust, be forgotten by English men in our days.—Let it not be once objected, that our endeavours were not successful; rather, let it be construed to our advantage, that though our valour was at first unfortunate, yet (through God's blessing) our chearful patience bath at length, fulfilled our hopes, by degrees inclining the hearts of the most obstinate to a relenting; wherein as our trials were, so our triumphs are now the greater; for to prevail by loyal sufferings, is the prerogative of true desert.—We joyfully, indeed, partake in the glory of his majesty's Resurrection, the peace of our country, the security of laws, and the prospect of future Settlements, which are most pleasant to us: but, alas, we are still exposed to the same necessities, nay, many of us are in worse condition, as to livelihood, than ever, partly by exhausting ourselves with unusual expenses, that we might appear (like ourselves) concerned in his majesty's welcome, and commutation; partly, by prosecuting honest, but fruitless, pretences, chiefly by the state of poverty, which seldom continues without increasing, and, for the accomplishments of our misery, hope, which hitherto alone befriended and supported, hath now forsaken us.—Were our pressures moderate, or common, we should never mention them, but wait yet further upon

Providence; for we reckon our martyrdom so honourable, and our cause so dear, that none but extreme exigents would be sensible on that behalf, such poverty being (we are sure) without reproach; had we complied with any of the late usurpers, otherwise than as prisoners must comply with goalers, we should not have dared to look backward, nor presumed to look forward: but innocency and extremity together imbolden, or rather compel us to utter our complaints, where we think we may challenge, at least, a favourable audience.—For, since the cause, we so earnestly contended for, was indeed least of all, our own (who might easily have saved our stakes, as many others of the same persuasion did) and but in part the King's; principally our countries, whose liberty, and even its being was at stake: it may seem a hard piece of justice, that the price of public freedom (when restored) should be the ruin only of such, as with their utmost perils chiefly asserted it; and the nation will appear (at least equally with his majesty) concerned in an expedient, lest if the martyrs and champions of their country be now by it forsaken, (they being disabled by their sufferings, and others by their ill success discouraged) hereafter, in the like exigent, which God prevent, our liberties should find neither champions, nor martyrs.—It grieves us, in all serious companies, to meet with those and the like reflections; how will it discourage our tender plants of loyalty, to be the spectators of its ruin? How will it multiply neuters, to observe noble families extirpated, and their estates possessed, as many will be apt enough to collect, by wiser men? viz. such as took the strongest side. And may not the next generation, from such premises, draw this conclusion, 'He loves danger too well, that loves it for its own sake?'—Certainly, it were too much ignorance in us to suppose, that his majesty is able to contribute, in any proportion, to our relief; rather, we are sensible, that should he impoverish himself, to gratify us, he would soon be in a condition, neither to support us nor himself; besides, we are satisfied of his kindness towards us: but our recourse is (properly) to the parliament, who (being equally concerned) can relieve us more powerfully, and with less exception, wherein, we doubt not of his majesty's gracious concurrence, and furtherance.—Wherefore, not to importune his majesty, (who, no doubt, hath a real and tender sympathy for us) we do (with much freedom, but with all submission) declare to our representatives, as to good Englishmen, That as we on our part, shall for public good, as cheerfully subscribe to the general Indemnity (when by their wisdom confirmed) as any that have benefit thereby; so if they, on their part, shall by confirming it, intercept those Remedies, which the law, our great birth-right, would afford us; we conceive, they oblige themselves to study somewhat of recompence, lest they give us subject of complaint. That, in such an Obligation, they did but too well remember our enemies and only forget us.—And in truth, we hope, that the people in general, whose peace is thereby established, our friends in particular, whose honour is thereby asserted; but especially our late adversaries, whose interests are thereby redeemed at our expense, will frankly approve of such moderate satisfaction to us, as the parliament, in their wisdoms shall think reasonable.—The rather, for that the Arrears of the late Army and Navy, though contracted most of them in times of usurpation, being in effect discharged; those of his majesty's party in Ireland, provided for by special allotments in his majesty's late Declaration concerning that kingdom; the Purchasers of Crown and Church Lands, protected by his majesty's commission in their favour; the Clergy, not only restored to the improved possessions, but to fines of 2) years growth; many private persons rewarded with great gifts, offices, and honours; we only seem abandoned as worthy of nothing but pity from those that will vouchsafe it, unless our condition may be considered for our country in this parliament.—Wherein, for their encouragement, we assure them, our pretences are not lofty, we covet not to engross the plenty of the nation, by purchasing palaces and parks with our debentures: no; the sum of our misfortune is, that in this estate, we are not only burdensome to ourselves and friends, but useless to our king and country; alas, we have too long conversed with ruin, to conceive vast hopes; and if, upon serious scrutiny, greater difficulties should appear, than we imagine, it is our known fundamental to acquiesce in the judgment of our superiors; only we beg, that our case may be judged, to deserve some public consideration; for however, it will much enliven us, to find ourselves not wholly despised, but that expedients to relieve us are, at last, debated, for which we humbly offer these our Proposals. 1. That the greatest services may be most rewarded, but the greatest necessities first relieved. 2. That his majesty would be graciously pleased to take an Account of all his Gifts and Grants, and suspend the conferring of any more, till persons of the highest sufferings and deserts be, in some sort, accommodated. 3. That the sufferings, wants, and merits of pretenders may be examined by select committees, and certified to his maj. and that his maj. would accordingly provide for their relief, by giving express orders for their admittance to such vacant employments as they are capable of, without referring them to subordinate officers, whereby they may be wearied with attendance, and his majesty's grace unto them frustrated. 4. In case Vacancies be not found competent, that then Reversions may be assured to others. 5. That such as have plentiful estates, or have already obtained any considerable grant from the king's bounty, may be postponed, in his majesty's, and the parliament's consideration. 6. That such as shall appear to have unworthily betrayed, or any ways deserted his majeaty's party, may be, from thence, wholly excluded. 7. That deserving tenants of Bishops, Deans and Chapters, &c. may be generally, and effectually recommended to the Church's favour, in their great plenty, to accept of moderate Fines from them. 8. That the like public recommendation may be made to all his majesty's chief ministers, Officers and commanders, for the employing, countenancing, and encouraging, (by all lawful means) such as have eminently deserved, or suffered for his majesty. 9. That for such Soldiers and Sufferers of his majesty's party, as are old, maimed, without callings, or stocks to exercise them, provision may be made, according to their conditions, viz. for some of them good hospitals, the founders wherof, doubtless, could they speak out of their graves, would so direct; for others reasonable sums, or small annuities, but duly paid, that they may no more depend on private alms, which many cannot find, and some cannot seek; this we suppose, will prove rather matter of care, than much charge. 10. That the parliament would lay some public Assessment, such as they shall think reasonable, our country's poverty being considered as well as ours, to be distributed by his majesty's direction, amongst the surviving officers and soldiers of his majesty's armies, and those of the late king of blessed memory, who never received any recompence of their service, whose number being much contracted by time and other accidents, the balk will not prove so great as perhaps it seems. 11. That the children of such as have been sacrificed, or died in the bed of honour, or done any memorable action for his majesty, (whose catalogue is easily known) may, in due time, reap the fruits of their father's martyrdom, and, for the present, receive some character of signal favour from their country to be transmitted to posterity, for the encouragement of them and theirs, to follow the footsteps of their noble progenitors, to stir up in others an emulation of such loyalty and virtue, and leave the justice of his majesty's arms sufficiently vindicated to future ages."

Proceedings in both Houses relative to the Act of Uniformity.] The Act of Uniformity depended long, and took up much debate in both houses. "In the house of peers," says lord Clarendon, "where the Act first began, there were many things inserted, which had not been contained in the former Act of Uniformity, and so seemed to carry somewhat of novelty in them. It admitted 'no person to have any cure of souls or any ecclesiastical dignity in the Church of England, but such who had been or should be ordained priest or deacon by some bishop, that is, who had not episcopal ordination; excepting only the ministers or pastors of the French and Dutch Churches in London and other places, allowed by the king, who should enjoy the privileges they had.' This was new; for there had been many, and at present there were some, who possessed benefices with cure of souls, and other ecclesiastical promotions, who had never received orders but in France or in Holland; and these men must now receive new ordination, which had been always held unlawful in the Church, or by this act of parliament must be deprived of their livelihood, which they enjoyed in the most flourishing and peaceable time of the Church. And therefore it was said, 'That this had not been the opinion of the Church of England; and that it would lay a great reproach upon all other Protestant churches who had no bishops, as if they had no ministers, and consequently were no churches: for that it was well known the Church of England did not allow reordination, as the ancient Church never admitted it; insomuch as if any Priest of the Church of Rome renounces the communion thereof, his ordination is not questioned, but he is as capable of any preferment in this church, as if he had been ordained in it. And therefore the not admitting the ministers of other Protestants to have the same privilege, can proceed from no other ground, than that they looked not upon them as ministers, having no ordination; which is a judgment the Church of England had not ever owned: and that it would be very imprudent to do it now.' To this it was answered, 'That the Church of England judged none but her own children, nor did determine that other Protestant churches were without ordination. It is a thing without her cognizance: and most of the learned men of those churches had made necessity the chief pillar to support that ordination of theirs. That necessity cannot be pleaded here, where ordination is given according to the unquestionable practice of the church of Christ: if they who pretend foreign ordination are his majesty's subjects, they have no excuse of necessity, for they might in all times have received episcopal ordination, and so they did upon the matter renounce their own church; if they are strangers, and pretend to preferment in this church, they ought to conform and to be subject to the laws of the kingdom, which concern only those who desire to live under the protection thereof. For the argument of reordination, there is no such thing required. Rebaptization is not allowed in or by any church: yet in all churches where it is doubted, as it may be often with very good reason, whether the person hath been baptized or no, or if it hath been baptized by a midwife or lay person; without determining the validity or invalidity of such baptism, there is an hypothetical form, 'If thou hast not been already baptized, I do baptize,' &c. So in this case of ordination, the form may be the same, 'If thou hast not been already ordained, then I do ordain, &c.' If his former ordination were good, this is void; if the other was invalid or defective, he hath reason to be glad that it be thus supplied.' After much debate, that Clause remained still in the Act: and very many, who had received Presbyterian orders in the late times, came very willingly to be ordained in the manner aforesaid by a Bishop; and very few chose to quit or lose a parsonage or vicarage of any value upon that scruple.

'There was another Clause in the bill, that made very much more noise afterwards, though for the present it took not up so much time, and in truth was little taken notice of: that is, a Form of Subscription that every man was to make, who had received, or before he received, any Benefice or Preferment in the Church; which comprehended all the governors, superiors, and fellows, in all the colleges and halls of either University, and all schoolmasters and the like, who are subservient towards learning. Every such person was to declare 'his unfeigned Assent and Consent to all and every thing contained and prescribed in and by the Book, entitled 'The Book of Common Prayer,' &c. The subscription was generally thought so reasonable, that it scarce met with any opposition in either house. But when it came abroad, and was to be submitted to, all the dissenting brethren cried out, 'that it was a snare to catch them, to say that which could not consist with their consciences.' They took great pains to distinguish and to make great difference between Assent and Consent: 'they could be content to read the Book in the manner they were obliged to do, which shewed their Consent; but declaring their unfeigned Assent to every thing contained and prescribed therein would imply, that they were so fully convinced in their judgments, as to think that it was so perfect, that nothing therein could be amended, which for their part they thought there might. That there were many expressions in the Rubrick, which they were not bound to read; yet by this Assent they declared their approbation thereof.' But after many tedious discourses of this tyrannical imposition, they grew by degrees ashamed of it; and were persuaded to think, that Assent and Consent had so near the same signification, that they could hardly consent to do what they did not assent to: so that the chiefest amongst them, to avoid a very little inconvenience, subscribed the same.

'But there was shortly after another Clause added, that gave them trouble indeed. When the Bill had passed the lords house, it was sent of course to the commons; where though all the factions in religion had too many friends, for the most contrary and opposite one to another always were united and reconciled against the Church, yet they who were zealous for the government, and who hated all the other factions at least enough, were very much superior in number and in reputation. And the Bill was no sooner read there, than every man according to his passion thought of adding somewhat to it, that might make it more grievous to somebody whom he did not love; which made the discourses tedious and vehement, and full of animosity. And at last they agreed upon a Clause, which contained another Subscription and Declaration which every man was to make before he could be admitted into any Benefice or Ecclesiastical promotion, or to be a Governor or Fellow in either of the Universities. He must first declare, 'That it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the king; and that he doth abhor that traitorous position of taking Arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him; and that he will conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England, as it is now by law established.' And he doth declare, 'That he doth hold there lies no obligation upon him, or any other person, from the Oath commonly called The Solemn League and Covenant, to endeavour any change or alteration of government, either in Church or State; and that the same was in itself an unlawful Oath, and imposed upon the subjects of this realm, against the known laws and liberties of the kingdom;' with some other Clauses, which need not be mentioned because they were afterwards left out. And with this Addition, and some other Alterations, they returned the Bill again to the lords for their approbation.

"The framing and forming this Clause had taken up very much time, and raised no less passion in the house of commons: and now it came among the lords, it was not less troublesome. It added to the displeasure and jealousy against the Bishops, by whom it was thought to be prepared, and commended to their party in the lower house. Many lords, who had taken the Covenant, were not so much concerned that the clergy (for whom only this Act was prepared) should be obliged to make this Declaration; but apprehended more, that when such a Clause should be once passed in one act of parliament, it could not after be disputed, and so would be inserted into all other acts which related to the function of any other offices, and so would in a short time be required of themselves. And therefore they opposed it warmly 'as a thing unnecessary, and which would widen the breach, instead of closing up the wounds that had been made; which the king had made it his business to do, and the parliament had hitherto concurred with his majesty in that endeavour. That many men would believe or fear (which in such a case is the same), that this Clause might prove a breach of the Act of Indemnity, which had not only provided against indictments and suits at law and penalties, but against reproaches for what was past, which this Clause would be understood to give new life to. For what concerned the conformity to the Liturgy of the Church as it is now established, it is provided for as fully in the former subscription in this act, and therefore is impertinent in this place. That the Covenant contained many good 'things in it, as defending the king's person, and maintaining the Protestant religion: and therefore to say that there lies no obligation from it, would neither be for the service of the king or the interest of the Church; especially since it was well known, that it had wrought upon the conscience of many to serve the king in the late Revolution, from which his majesty had received great advantage.' However it was now dead, all men were absolved from taking it, nor could it be imposed or offered to any man without punishment; and they, who had in the ill times been forced to take it, did now inviolably and cheerfully perform all the duties of allegiance and fidelity to his majesty. If it had at any time produced any good, that was an excuse for the irregularity of it: it could do no mischief for the future; and therefore that it was time to bury it in oblivion."—Many men believed, that though they insisted principally on that part which related to the Covenant, they were in truth more afflicted with the first part; in which it was declared, 'that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the king; and that he doth abhor that traitorous position of taking Arms by his authority against his person;' which conclusions had been the principles which supported their rebellion, and by which they had imposed upon the people, and got their concurrence. They durst not oppose this, because the parliament had already by a former Act declared the law to be so in those particulars: yet this went much nearer to them, that by their own particular Declaration (for they looked upon it as that which in a short time must be their own), they should upon the matter confess themselves to have been traitors, which they had not yet been declared to have been; and no man could now justify the calling them so.

"They who were most solicitous that the house should concur with the commons in this Addition, had field room enough to expatiate upon the gross iniquity of the Covenant. They made themselves very merry with the allegation, 'that the king's Safety and the Interest of the Church were provided for by the Covenant, when it had been therefore entered into, to fight against the king and to destroy the church. That there was no one lawful or honest clause in the Covenant, that was not destroyed or made of no signification by the next that succeeded; and if it were not, the same obligation was better provided for by some other oaths, which the same men had or ought to have taken, and which ought to have restrained them from taking the Covenant: and therefore it may justly be pronounced, that there is no obligation upon any man from thence. That there was no breach of the Act of Indemnity, nor any reproach upon any man for having taken it, except what would result from his own conscience. But that it was most absolutely necessary for the Safety of the king's person, and the peace of the kingdom, that they who had taken it should declare, that they do not believe themselves to be bound by it: otherwise, they may still think, that they may fight against the king, and must conspire the destruction of the Church. And they cannot take too much care, or use too much diligence, to discover who are of that opinion; that they may be strictly looked unto, and restrained from doing that which they take themselves obliged to do. That the Covenant is not dead, as was alleged, but still retains great vigour; was still the idol to which the Presbyterians sacrificed: and that there must and would always be a general jealousy of all those who had taken it, until they had declared that it did not bind them; especially of the Clergy, who had so often enlarged in their pulpits, how absolutely and indispensably all men were obliged to prosecute the end of it, which is to destroy the Church, whatever danger it brings the King's Person to. And therefore they of all men ought to be glad of this opportunity, that was offered, to vindicate their loyalty and obedience; and if they were not ready to do so, they were not fit to be trusted with the charge and care of the souls of the king's subjects."—And in truth there were not any more importunate for the enjoining this Declaration, than many who had taken the Covenant. Many who had never taken it, and had always detested it, and paid soundly for being known to do so, were yet very sorry that it was inserted at this time and in this place; for they foresaw it would make divisions, and keep up the several factions, which would have been much weakened, and in a short time brought to nothing, if the Presbyterians had been separated from the rest, who did perfectly hate and were as perfectly hated by all the rest. But since it was brought upon the stage, and it had been the subject of so much debate, they believed the house of lords could not now refuse to concur with the commons, without undergoing some reproach and scandal of not having an ill opinion enough of the Covenant; of which as they were in no degree guilty, so they thought it to be of mischievous consequence to be suspected to be so. And therefore, after they had expunged some other parts of that Subscription which had been annexed to it, and mended some other expressions in other places, which might rather irritate than compose those humours which already boiled too much, they returned the bill to the commons; which submitted to all that they had done: and so it was presented to the king, who could not well refuse his royal assent, nor did in his own judgment or inclination dislike what was offered to him.—By this Act of Uniformity there was an end put to all the liberty and license, which had been practised in all churches from the time of his majesty's return, and by his Declaration that he had emitted afterwards. The Common Prayer must now be constantly read in all churches, and no other form admitted: and what clergyman soever did not fully conform to whatsoever was contained in that Book, or enjoined by the Act of Uniformity, by or before St. Bartholomew-Day, which was about three months after the Act was published; he was, ipso facto, deprived of his benefice, or any other spiritual promotion of which he stood possessed, and the patron was to present another in his place, as if he were dead: so that it was not in the king's power to give any dispensation to any man, that could preserve him against the penalty in the Act of Uniformity."

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the end of the Session.] The Act of Uniformity, and several other Acts, being now ready for the royal assent, the king came this day to the house of peers, and having sent for the commons, he was addressed by their Speaker as follows:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; The glorious body of the sun doth exhilarate the soul of man with its light, and fructify the earth by its heat. In like manner, we, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, do with all humility and thankfulness acknowledge, these frequent accessions to your royal presence do both comfort our hearts, and influence our actions.—Geographers do tell us, the Land of Egypt is a dry soil, but made fertile by the overflowing of the river Nilus; and, according to the degrees of the flood, the inhabitants do prognosticate the fruitfulness of the ensuing year. If it flows to 12 degrees, it presages a good harvest; if to 13, then more plentiful; but if to 14 degrees, their hopes are raised to an expectation of an abundant increase.—Great Sir; Your return into this nation in the 12th year of your reign resembles the flowing of the river Nilus in the 12th degree; that year was crowned with the enjoyment of your royal person. The last year, being the 13th year of your majesty's reign, we were made happy in your Coronation, and by your sanction of many good and useful laws, both for the Church and State. And now our river Nilus begins to flow 14 degrees, we are, by the mercies of God, in an humble expectation of a great jubilee. Our gracious Queen is now happily landed; who, we do hope, and daily pray, may prove a suitable companion to your royal person, and, ere long, a nursing mother in this nation.—If your majesty but please to cast your eyes upon the table, and behold the great number of Bills that there present themselves before you, like so many sheaves of corn bound up and ready to be housed; and will vouchsafe to see how both my hands are filled with no light presents from your loyal commons; and if your royal majesty, the great Lord of the Harvest, shall vouchsafe to crown this day by your gracious concessions to our desires; the world will then see how great a duty your people cheerfully pay both to your royal person and your government; and likewise how great a zeal your majesty hath, by the faithful advice of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons assembled in parliament, to settle the Church in her ancient glory, and to restore the happy people of this nation to their ancient rights and privileges.—Some foreign writers, that envy the happiness of our government, injuriously asperse this nation with a reproachful saying, 'That the crown of England is only maintained by the Benevolence of the people; which never is granted, but in exchange of some royal prerogative.'—Great Sir; We know, the strongest building must fall, if the coupling pins be pulled out: therefore our care hath been, to prepare such constitutions, that the prerogative of the crown and the propriety of the people may, like squared stones, in a well-built arch, each support the other, and grow the closer and stronger for any weight or force that shall be laid upon them.—We cannot forget the late disputing age, wherein most persons took a liberty, and some men made it their delight, to trample upon the discipline and government of the Church. The hedge being trod down, the foxes and the wolves did enter; the swine and other unclean beasts defiled the temple. At length it was discerned, the Smectymnian Plot did not only bend itself to reform Ceremonies, but sought to erect a popular authority of Elders, and to root out Episcopal Jurisdiction. In order to this work, Church Ornaments were first taken away; then the means whereby distinction, or inequality might be upheld amongst ecclesiastical governors; then the Forms of Common Prayer, which as members of the public body of Christ's Church were enjoined us, were decried as superstitious, and in lieu thereof nothing, or worse than nothing, introduced.—Your majesty having already restored the governors and government of the Church, the patrimony and privileges of our churchmen; we held it now our duty, for the reformation of all Abuses in the Public Worship of God, humbly to present unto your majesty, a Bill for the Uniformity of public Prayers and Administration of Sacraments.—We hope the God of Order and Unity will conform the hearts of all the people in this nation, to serve him in this Order and Uniformity.—Next to the Worship and Service of God, we applied ourselves to the settling our great concern, the Militia. We have already, according to our duties and the laws, declared the sole right of the Militia to be in your majesty: and now, with your permission, we humbly tender your majesty a Bill for the better Regulation and Ordering the Standing Forces of this nation; wherein we have taken care to make all things so certain, that your majesty's lieutenants and their deputies may know what to command, and all the people learn how to obey.—And because our late wounds are yet but green, and possibly, before the body politic be well purged, may incline to break out again, whereby your majesty may be forced to draw your sword before your treasury be supplied with Money; we have consented that your majesty may raise, for the 3 next ensuing years, one month's tax in each year, after the rate of 70,000*l.* per mensem, if necessity shall so require.—In the next place, according to your majesty's commands, we have surveyed the wasted Revenue of the Crown; and, in pursuance of our promises, do humbly propound unto your majesty a fair addition. We considered, that great part of your majesty's Revenue is but for life: and both that, and also part of the rest, depends upon the peace, the trade, and traffic of the nation, and therefore may be much impaired by wars with foreign nations. This put us upon the search of something that might arise within our own walls, and not to be subject to such contingencies. We pitched our thoughts at last upon those places where we enjoy our greatest comforts and securities, our dwelling-houses; and, considering even that security is secured unto us by your majesty's vigilance and care in the government; we have prepared a Bill, whereby we desire it may be enacted, That all houses in this kingdom, which are worth in yearly value above 20*s.* and not inhabited by almshouses, may pay unto your majesty, your heirs and successors, 2*s.* yearly for every Chimney Hearth in each house for ever.—When the great Ahitophels of our latter age had by force ravished the venerable laws of this nation (and Absurdo dato, sequuntur mille); then every petty artist in his way, yea, even the very common beggars, had the confidence to offer violence to their chastity. We have therefore been constrained to prepare several Bills for the Regulation of Trade, our Cloathing Trade, our Fishing Trade, our Trade for Stuffs, our Trade for Silks; and, for the better maintenance of intercourse in Trade, to reinforce our former laws for maintaining the Highways, with some additions for decency and pleasure of travellers.—God, in his providence, hath determined that Poor we must have always with us: some are made so by the immediate hand of God; others by their loyalty, duty, and service of your royal person and your blessed father; others by their own wickedness and idleness. We have taken care to relieve the first, to encourage the second, and to reform the last.—Nor hath the case of any private person been unwelcome to us. Those many Private Bills that lie before your majesty do enough confirm this truth, that where we found it just and honourable, we have denied our helping hand to none that prayed it.—And now, Great Sir, after these many months most painful and faithful service of your majesty and our countries, we hope we shall have leave to go home, to visit our relations, to tell our neighbours what great things your majesty hath done for us; what great things (absit invidia verbo) we have done for your majesty; and what great things God hath done for us all; and so pray Almighty God for his mercy to this nation, in the continuance of your majesty's long and happy reign over us."

The King having given his royal assent to 31 Public, and 39 Private Bills, made this gracious Speech following :

“ My Lords, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons ; I think there have been very few sessions of parliament in which there have been so many Bills as I have passed this day. I am confident, never so many Private Bills ; which I hope you will not draw into example. It is true, these late ill times have driven men into great straits, and may have obliged them to make conveyances colourably, to avoid inconveniences, and yet not afterwards to be avoided. And men have gotten estates by new and greater frauds than have been heretofore practised ; and therefore, in this conjuncture, extraordinary remedies may be necessary, which hath induced me to comply with your advice, in passing these bills. But I pray let this be very rarely done hereafter. The good old rules of the law are the best security. And let not men have too much cause to fear that the settlements they make of their estates shall be too easily unsettled when they are dead, by the power of parliaments.— My Lords and Gentlemen ; You have so much obliged me, not only in the matter of those Bills which concern my Revenue, but in the manner of passing them with so great affection and kindness to me, that I know not how to thank you enough. I do assure you, and I pray assure your friends in the country, that I will apply all you have given me to the utmost improvement of the peace and happiness of the kingdom, and will, with the best advice and good husbandry, I can, bring my expences within a narrower compass.—Now I am speaking to you of my own good husbandry, I must tell you, that will not be enough : I cannot but observe to you, that the whole nation seems to me a little corrupted in their excess of living. Sure all men spend much more, in their cloaths, in their diet, in all their expences, than they have used to do. I hope it hath only been the excess of joy, after so long sufferings, that hath transported us to these other excesses. But let us take heed, that the continuance of them doth not indeed corrupt our natures. I do believe I have been faulty that way myself : I promise you, I will reform : and if you will join with me in your several capacities, we shall by our examples do more good, both in city and country, than any new laws would do. I tell you again, I will do my part ; and I will tell some of you, if you do not yours. I hope the laws I have passed this day will produce some reformation with reference to the multitude of Beggars and poor people which infest the kingdom. Great severity must be used to those who love idleness, and refuse to work ; and great care and charity towards those who are willing to work. I do very heartily recommend the execution of those good laws to your utmost diligence ; and I am sure I need not put you in mind so to settle the Militia, that all seditious Insurrections may not only be prevented, to which the minds of too many are inclined, but that the people may be without reasonable apprehension of such insecurity.— You will easily believe, that it is very necessary for the public justice of the kingdom, and even for the preservation of the reverence due to parliaments, that I make this a session. And it will be worthy of your wisdoms, when you come together again, to provide that there be not so great clamour against the multitude of Protections. I will say no more ; but renew my hearty thanks to you all, and refer the rest to the Chancellor.”

The Lord Chancellor's Speech at the end of the Session.] The King's Speech being ended, the Lord Chancellor Clarendon came from his place, and kneeled to the king, and, having received directions, returned to his place, and made this ensuing Speech :

“ My lords ; and you, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons ; It is now little more than a year that the king first called you to attend him here, at the opening of the parliament : then, you may remember, he told you, ‘ That he thought there were not many of you, who were not particularly known to him ; that there were very few of whom he had not heard so much good, that he was (he said) as sure as he could be of any thing that was to come, that you would all concur with him, and that he should concur with you, in all things which might advance the peace, plenty, and prosperity of the nation.’ His majesty said, He should be exceedingly deceived else.—It was a princely declaration, and a rare confidence, which could flow from no other fountain but the sincerity and purity of his own conscience, which, admitting no other designs or thoughts into his royal breast, but such as must tend to the unquestionable prosperity and greatness of his people, could not but be assured of your full concurrence and co-operation with him. It was a happy and a blessed omen, which at the instant struck a terror into the hearts of those who promised themselves some advantages from the differences and divisions in your counsels, and hoped from thence to create new troubles and molestations in the kingdom. And, God be thanked ! the king hath been so far from being exceedingly deceived, that he doth acknowledge he hath been exceedingly complied with, exceedingly gratified in all he hath desired ; and he hopes, he hath not in the least degree disappointed your expectation.”

“ Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons ; You have, like the richest and the noblest soil, a soil manured and enriched by the bountiful hearts of the best subjects in the world, yielded the king two full harvests in one year ; and therefore it is but good husbandry to lie fallow for some time. You have not only supplied the crown to a good degree, for discharging many debts and pressures under which it even groaned, and enabled it to struggle with the present straits and necessities ; debts not contracted, and necessities not run into, by improvidence and excess; you may, when you please, receive such an account, as will clear all such reproaches: but you wisely, very wisely, provided such a constant growing revenue, as may with God's blessing preserve the crown from those scandalous wants and necessities as have heretofore exposed it and the kingdom to those dismal miseries, from which they are but even now buoyed up; for, whatsoever other human causes may be assigned, according to the several fancies and imaginations of men, of our late miserable distractions, they cannot be so reasonably imputed to any one cause, as to the extreme poverty of the crown: the want of power could never have appeared, if it had not been for the want of money.—You have, my lords and gentlemen, worthily provided for the vindication and manifestation of the one, by the bill of the Militia; and for the Supply of the other, by the act for the additional Revenue: and I am confident, both the present and succeeding ages will bless God, and celebrate your memories, for those two Bills, as the foundation of their peace, quiet, and security, how froward and indisposed soever many are at present, who, finding such obstructions laid in their way to mutiny and sedition, use all the artifice they can to persuade the people, that they have not been solicitous enough for their liberty, nor tenacious enough for their profit; and wickedly labour to lessen that reverence towards you, which sure was never more due to any parliament.—It was a very natural and an ingenious animadversion and reflection, which the late incomparable lord viscount of St. Albans made upon that old Fable of the Giants, who were first overthrown in the war against the Gods, when the earth, their mother, in revenge thereof, brought forth Fame: which, he said, is the same when princes and monarchs have suppressed actual and open rebellion, then the malignity of the people, the mother of rebellion, doth bring forth libels, slanders, and taxation of the state; which, he says, is of the same kind with rebellion, but more feminine. And without doubt this seditious daughter of the earth, this spirit of libelling, was never more pregnant than it is now; nor king, nor parliament, nor church, nor state, ever more exposed to those flagella lingue, those strokes of the tongue, from which God Almighty can only preserve the most innocent and most excellent persons; as if repining and murmuring were the peculiar exercise of the nation, to keep it in health; as if England had so much of the merchant, 'Nonquam habendi fructa felix, semper autem querendi cupiditate miserima.'—Men are in no degree disposed to imitate or remember the general excellent temper of the time of queen Elizabeth; the blessed condescension and resignation of the people then to the crown, the awful reverence they then had to the government, and to the governors both in church and state. This good and happy spirit was in a time beyond our memory; but they remember, as if it were but yesterday, how few Subsidies parliaments then gave to that queen, how small supplies the crown then had from the people; and wonder that the same measures should not still fill the coffers, and give the same reputation, and make the same noise in Christendom.—But, my Lords and Gentlemen, how bold soever some unquiet spirits are with you, upon this argument, you are much superior to those reproaches. You know well, and you can make others know, without breaking the Act of Indemnity, how the crown hath been since used; how our sovereign lord the king found it at his blessed return to it. You can tell the world, that as soon as he came hither, besides the infinite that he forgave, he gave more, more money to the people, than he hath since received from them; that at least two parts of three, that they have since given him, have issued for the disbanding Armies never raised by him, and for paying of Fleets never sent out by him, and of debts never incurred by him. You will put them in mind of the vast disparity between the former times and these in which we live; and consequently of the disproportion in the expence the crown is now at for the protection and benefit of the subject to what it formerly underwent: how great a difference there is in the present greatness and power of the two crowns, and what they were then possessed of, is evident to all men; and if the greatness and power of the crown of England be not in some proportion improved too, it may be liable to inconveniencies it will not undergo alone. How our neighbours and our rivals, who court one and the same mistress, trade and commerce, with all the world, are advanced in shipping, power, and an immoderate desire to engross the whole traffic of the universe, is notorious enough; and this unruly appetite will not be restrained or disappointed, nor the trade of this nation supported and maintained, with the same fleets and forces which were maintained in the happy times of queen Elizabeth. Not to speak of the naval power of the Turks, who, instead of skulking abroad in poor single ships as they were wont to do, domineer now on the ocean in strong fleets, make naval fights, and have brought some Christians to a better correspondence, and another kind of commerce and traffic with them, than was expected; insomuch as they apprehend no enemy upon the sea, but what they find in the king of England's ships, which hath indeed brought no small damage upon them, with no small charge to the king, but a great reputation to the nation.—My Lords and Gentlemen; You may with a very good conscience assure yourselves, and your friends and neighbours, that the Charge the crown is now at, by sea and land, for the peace and security and wealth and honour of the nation, amounts to no less than 800,000*l.* a year, all which did not cost the Crown before these troubles fourscore thousand pounds the year; and therefore they will never blame you for any Supply you have given, or addition you have made to the Revenue of the crown. And whosoever unskilfully murmurs at the expense of Dunkirk, and the other new acquisitions, which ought to be looked upon as jewels of an immense magnitude in the royal diadem, do not enough remember what we have lost by Dunkirk, and should always do if it were in an enemy's hands; nor duly consider the vast advantages those other dominions are like, by God's blessing, in a short time, to bring to the trade, navigation, wealth, and honour of the king and kingdom. His majesty hath enough expressed his desire to live in a perfect peace and amity with all his neighbours; nor is it an ill ingredient towards the firmness and stability of that peace and amity, which his royal ancestors have held and maintained with them, that he hath some advantages in case of a war, which they were without.—It was a right ground of confidence, such an one as seldom deceives men, that the great law-maker, the wise Solon, had, when he concluded that reverence and obedience would be yielded to his laws, because he had taken the pains to make his citizens know, and understand, that it was more for their profit to obey law and justice, than to contend and break it. The extravagant times of license, which I hope we have almost out-lived, have so far corrupted the minds, and even the nature of too many, that they do not return with that alacrity they ought to do, into the road and paths of order and government, from which they have so long been led astray; nor, it may be, is there pains enough taken to make them understand the profit, benefit, and ease, which always attends a cheerful obedience and submission to laws and government. I am persuaded, a little pains and kindness, and condescension, in the wise towards the weak, half the diligence and dexterity in conversation and example which hath been used to corrupt the people in their loyalty and understanding, will quickly reduce them to their primitive temper; which is, to be the best neighbours, and the best friends, and the best subjects of the world: and I make no question, but the great piety and devotion, the moderation, wisdom, charity, and hospitality, of my lords the Bishops, in their several dioceses, will in a short time recover the poor misled people. And though the frowardness and pride of some of their teachers may not be yet enough subdued, though some of the clergy still repeat their old errors, for which they have been glad to receive pardon, and do in truth discredit all their other doctrine with the absence of any visible repentance for what mischief they have formerly done; yet I hope the laity will soon return into the bosom of their dear mother the Church, and easily discern the fraud and imposture of their seducers; and that all diligence and dexterity will be used, seriously and heartily to reconcile both clergy and laity, by all means which may prove effectual.—You have, my Lords and Gentlemen, likewise patriots. Upon your observation, that the most signal indulgence and condescensions, the temporary suspension of the rigour of former laws, hath not produced that effect which was expected; that the humours and spirits of men are too rough and boisterous for those soft remedies; you have prepared sharper laws and penalties, to contend with those refractory persons, and to break that stubbornness which will not bend to gentler applications; and it is great reason, that they upon whom clemency cannot prevail, should feel that severity they have provoked. You have done your parts like good physicians, made wholesome prescription for the constitution of your patients; well knowing, that the application of these remedies, the execution of these sharp laws, depends upon the wisdom of the most discerning, generous, and merciful prince, who, having had more experience of the nature and humour of mankind, than any prince living, can best distinguish between the tenderness of conscience and the pride of conscience, between the real effects of conscience and the wicked pretences to conscience, who having 'fought with Beasts at Ephesus,' knows how to guard himself and the kingdom from the assaults and violence of a strong, malicious, corrupted understanding and will, and how to secure himself and the kingdom from the feeble traps and nets of deluded fancies and imaginations: In a word, a prince of so excellent a nature and tender a conscience himself, that he hath the highest compassion for all errors of that kind, and will never suffer the weak to undergo the punishment ordained for the wicked, and knows and understands better than any man that excellent rule of Quintilian, 'Est aliquid quod non oportet, etiamsi licet, et aliud est jura spectare, aliud justitiam.'—My Lords and Gentlemen; Machiavel, who, they say, is an author much studied of late in this kingdom, to extol his own excellent judgment and insight in history, in which indeed he was a master, would persuade men to believe that, the true reason why so many unexpected accidents and mischiefs fall out to the destruction of states and empires is, because their governors have not observed the same mischiefs heretofore in story, and from whence they proceeded, and what progress they made; which, he says, if they had done, they might easily have preserved themselves from ruin, and prevented the inconveniencies which have fallen out. I am sure, you are all good historians, and need only to resort to the records of your own memories. Remember how your peace hath been formerly disturbed, by what contrivance and artifices the people have been alarmed with unreasonable and unnatural Fears and Jealousies, and what dismal effects those fears and jealousies have produced. Remember how near monarchy hath been dissolved, and the law subverted, under pretence of reforming and supporting government, law, and justice. And remember how many honest persons were misled by not discerning consequences, who would as soon have renounced their part in

Heaven as have concurred in the first unwarrantable action if they had suspected what did follow. And if we suffer the same enemy to break in upon us at the same avenues, if we suffer our peace to be blown up by the same trains and machinations, we shall be held very ill historians, and worse politicians.—There is an enemy amongst us, of whom I doubt we are not jealous enough, and towards whom we cannot be too vigilant, and, in truth, in comparison of whom we may reasonably under-value all other enemies; that is the Republicans and Commonwealth's Men, who are every day calling in aid of the law, that they may overthrow and abolish the law, which they know to be their irreconcilable enemy. Indeed, my lords and gentlemen, there is a very great party of those men in every faction of religion, who truly have no religion but as the pretence serves to advance that faction. You cannot be too solicitous, too inquisitive after these men, who are restless in their councils, and wonderfully punctual and industrious in their correspondencies, which they maintain abroad as well as at home; and you cannot doubt they have encouragement enough from abroad. Few of our neighbours love us so exceeding well, but that they would be glad to see us entangled in domestic broils. These men are worthy of your care and diligence, in your speedy settling the Militia which the king hath even now so particularly recommended unto you. I shall conclude with only putting you in mind, that there was scarce ever a more dangerous sedition in the Republic of Rome, than in a time of full peace: when the citizens were sullen, when there was no noise but in whispers, when men neglected their trades, and stayed idle in their own houses, as if they cared not which way the world went; from whence alone their neighbours the Etrurians were encouraged to make a war upon them. 'Novum seditionis genus' says Livy, 'silentium omnique inter cives.' Never any nation under Heaven has less cause of sullenness than we, never more of joy and thanksgiving. We all know that God Almighty loves a cheerful giver, and we may as well know that he loves a cheerful receiver. Besides all other stupendous blessings conferred upon us, he hath given us the most cheerful giver that ever people hath been blest withal; a king that hath with all imaginable cheerfulness given us all we have asked of him, all he hath to give; who would not take or retain any thing we give to him, but for our own sakes; that by receiving and retaining it, he may give it to us again in more abundance in abundance of peace and plenty, and honour, and all the comforts which can make a nation happy.—This time hath made a glorious addition to our happiness, which ought proportionably to increase our cheerfulness. We wanted only one blessing, the Arrival of our Queen, whom God hath now safely brought to us; a queen of such a rare perfection in body and mind, of such endowments of wisdom, virtue and piety, that we may reasonably promise ourselves from her all the happiness we are capable of, and a succession of princes to govern us till the end of the world: and there cannot be a more transcendent instance of the king's love and passion for his people, than that he hath staid these four days to take his leave of you; and that he might give you this day's work, all these good laws, hath denied himself so long the enjoying the greatest comfort he is assured of in this world.—If there be not the most universal joy in the reception of these blessings, if there be not an universal contentedness, and satisfaction in the hearts of all men, and if that contentedness and satisfaction do not break out, and is not visible, in the looks, and thoughts, and words, and actions of the whole nation, to the inflaming the hearts of the other nations under his majesty's obedience by our example; we are guilty of an ingratitude that is worthy to deprive us of all we enjoy, and to disappoint us of all we pray for. And therefore I do most humbly beseech you, my lords and gentlemen, that, as there is a most noble cheerfulness and alacrity visible in you, and hath shed itself over all your countenances, so that you will think it worthy of your pains, to infuse the same good spirit into city and country, that they may all express that joy and delight in the blessings they are possessed of, and cheerfully endeavour to improve those blessings by their cheerful enjoying them, that God may continue those blessings to us, and the king's comfort may be increased, by the comfort he sees we have in him, and in what he hath done for us; and as all princes may take a pattern from him to govern, and make their subjects happy, so that all subjects may learn from us how to obey, by an eminent and innocent alacrity in their acknowledgment.—I am, by the king's express command, to add one particular, which his majesty meant, but forgot to say himself: you cannot but observe, that his majesty hath not passed the Bill that concerns the earl of Derby; which you cannot imagine proceeds from his majesty's want of care of, and kindness to, that noble family, which hath served him so faithfully, and suffered so much for so doing; but all parties having referred the matter to his majesty, he doubts not but to make a better end for that noble earl, than he would attain if the Bill had passed.—I shall only add the king's commands for the Prorogation of this parliament till the 18th day of Feb. And this parliament is prorogued till the 18th day of Feb. next."

Occurrences during the Recess.] As a short account of what took place during the recess of parliament may not be unacceptable to the reader, we shall present him with the following extract from Mr. Hume. "On the 21st of May was concluded, seemingly with universal consent, the inauspicious marriage with Catherine, a princess of virtue, but who was never able, either by the graces of her person or humour, to make herself agreeable to the king. The report, however, of her natural incapacity to have children, seems to have been groundless; since she was twice declared to be pregnant.—The festivity of these espousals was clouded by the trial and execution of criminals. Berkstead, Cobbet, and Okey, three regicides, had escaped beyond sea; and after wandering some time concealed in Germany, came privately to Delft, having appointed their families to meet them in that place. They were discovered by Downing, the king's resident in Holland, who had formerly served the Protector and Commonwealth in the same station, and who once had even been chaplain to Okey's regiment. He applied for a warrant to arrest them. It had been usual for the States to grant these warrants; though, at the same time, they had ever been careful secretly to advertise the persons, that they might be enabled to make their escape. This precaution was eluded by the vigilance and dispatch of Downing. He quickly seized the criminals, hurried them on board a frigate which lay off the coast, and sent them to England. These three men behaved with more moderation and submission than any of the other regicides, who had suffered. Okey in particular, at the place of execution, prayed for the king, and expressed his intention, had he lived, of submitting peaceably to the established government. He had risen during the wars from being a chandler in London to a high rank in the army; and in all his conduct appeared to be a man of humanity and honour. In consideration of his good character and of his dutiful behaviour, his body was given to his friends to be buried.—The attention of the public was much engaged by the trial of two distinguished criminals, Lambert and Vane. These men, though none of the late king's judges, had been excepted from the general indemnity, and committed to prison. The convention parliament, however, was so favourable to them, as to petition the king, if they should be found guilty, to suspend their execution: but this new parliament, more zealous for monarchy, applied for their trial and condemnation. Not to revive disputes, which were better buried in oblivion, the indictment of Vane did not comprehend any of his actions during the war between the king and parliament: it extended only to his behaviour after the late king's death, as member of the council of state, and secretary of the navy, where fidelity to the trust reposed in him required his opposition to monarchy.—However odious Vane and Lambert were to the presbyterians, that party had no leisure to rejoice at their condemnation. The fatal St. Bartholomew approached; the day, when the clergy were obliged by the Act of Uniformity, either to relinquish their livings, or to sign the articles required of them. A combination had been entered into by the most zealous of the presbyterian ecclesiastics to refuse the subscription; in hopes that the bishops would not venture at once to expel so great a number of the most popular preachers. The catholic party at court, who desired a great rent among the protestants, encouraged them in this obstinacy, and gave them hopes that the king would protect them in their refusal. The king himself, by his irresolute conduct, contributed, either from design or accident, to increase this opinion. Above all, the terms of subscription had been made strict and rigid, on purpose to disgust all the zealous and scrupulous among the presbyterians, and deprive them of their livings. About 2000 of the clergy, in one day, relinquished their cures; and to the astonishment of the court, sacrificed their interest to their religious tenets. Fortified by society in their sufferings, they were resolved to undergo any hardships, rather than openly renounce those principles, which, on other occasions, they were so apt, from interest, to warp or elude. The church enjoyed the pleasure of retaliation; and even pushed, as usual, the vengeance farther than the offence. During the dominion of the parliamentary party, a fifth of each living had been left to the ejected clergyman: but this indulgence, though at first insisted on by the house of peers, was now refused to the presbyterians. However difficult to conciliate peace among theologians, it was hoped by many, that some relaxation in the terms of communion might have kept the presbyterians united to the church, and have cured those ecclesiastical factions, which had been so fatal, and were still so dangerous. Bishoprics were offered to Calamy, Baxter, and Reynolds, leaders among the presbyterians; the last only could be prevailed on to accept. Deaneries and other preferments were refused by many.—The next measure of the king has not had the good fortune to be justified by any party; but is often considered, on what grounds I shall not determine, as one of the greatest mistakes, if not blemishes, of his reign. It is the Sale of Dunkirk to the French. The parsimonious maxims of the parliament, and the liberal, or rather careless disposition of Charles, were ill suited to each other; and notwithstanding the supplies voted him, his treasury was still very empty and very much indebted. He had secretly received the sum of 200,000 crowns from France for the support of Portugal; but the forces sent over to that country, and the fleets maintained in order to defend it, had already cost the king that sum; and together with it, near double the money, which had been payed as the queen's portion. The time fixed for payment of his sister's portion to the duke of Orleans was approaching. Tangiers, a fortress from which great benefit was expected, was become an additional burden to the crown; and Rutherford, who now commanded in Dunkirk, had increased the charge of that garrison to 120,000*l.* a year. These considerations had such influence, not only on the king, but even on Clarendon, that this uncorrupt minister was the most forward to advise accepting a sum of money in lieu of a place which he thought the king, from the narrow state of his revenue, was no longer able to retain. By the treaty with Portugal it was stipulated that Dunkirk should never be yielded to the Spaniards: France was therefore the only purchaser that remained. D'Estrades was invited over by a letter from the chancellor himself in order to conclude the bargain: 900,000*l.* were demanded: 100,000*l.* were offered. The English by degrees lowered their demand: the French raised their offer: and the bargain was concluded at 400,000*l.* The artillery and stores were valued at a fifth of the sum. The importance of this sale was not, at that time, sufficiently known, either abroad or at home. The French monarch himself, so fond of acquisitions, and so good a judge of his own interests, thought that he had made a hard bargain; and this sum, in appearance so small, was the utmost which he would allow his ambassador to offer.—A new incident discovered such a glimpse of the king's character and principles as, at first, the nation was somewhat at a loss how to interpret, but such as subsequent events, by degrees, rendered sufficiently plain and manifest. He issued a Declaration (26th Dec.) on pretence of mitigating the rigours contained in the Act of Uniformity. After expressing his firm resolution to observe the general indemnity, and to trust entirely to the affections of his subjects, not to any military power, for the support of his throne, he mentioned the promises of liberty of conscience, contained in his Declaration of Breda. And he subjoined, that, 'as in the first place he had been zealous to settle the Uniformity of the church of England, in discipline, ceremony, and government, and shall ever constantly maintain it: so as for what concerns the penalties upon those who, living peaceably, do not conform themselves thereunto, through scruple and tenderness of misguided conscience, but modestly and without scandal perform their devotions in their own way, he should make it his special care, so far as in him lay, without invading the freedom of parliament, to incline their wisdom next approaching sessions to concur with him in making some such act for that purpose, as may enable him to exercise, with a more universal satisfaction, that power of dispensing which he conceived to be inherent in him.' Here a most important prerogative was exercised by the king; but under such artful reserves and limitations as might prevent the full discussion of the claim, and obviate a breach between him and his parliament. The foundation of this measure lay much deeper, and was of the utmost consequence.—The king, during his exile, had imbibed strong prejudices in favour of the catholic religion; and according to the most probable accounts, had already been secretly reconciled in form to the church of Rome. The great zeal, expressed by the parliamentary party against all papists, had always, from a spirit of opposition, inclined the court, and all the royalists, to adopt more favourable sentiments towards that sect, which through the whole course of the civil wars, had strenuously supported the rights of the sovereign. The rigour too, which the king, during his abode in Scotland, had experienced from the presbyterians, disposed him to run into the other extreme, and to bear a kindness to the party most opposite in its genius to the severity of those religionists. The solicitations and importunities of the queen-mother, the contagion of the company which he frequented, the view of a more splendid and courtly mode of worship, the hopes of indulgence in pleasure; all these causes operated powerfully on a young prince, whose careless and dissolute temper made him incapable of adhering closely to the principles of his early education. But if the thoughtless humour of Charles rendered him an easy convert to popery, the same disposition ever prevented the theological tenets of that sect from taking any fast hold of him. During his vigorous state of health, while his blood was warm and his spirits high; a contempt and disregard to all religion held possession of his mind; and he might more properly be denominated a deist than a catholic. But in those revolutions of temper, when the love of raillery gave place to reflection, and his penetrating, but negligent, understanding was clouded with fears and apprehensions, he had starts of more sincere conviction; and a sect, which always possessed his inclination, was then master of his judgment and opinion.—But though the king thus fluctuated, during his whole reign, between irreligion, which he more openly professed, and popery, to which he retained a secret propensity, his brother, the duke of York, had zealously adopted all the principles of that theological party. His eager temper and narrow understanding made him a thorough convert, without any reserve from interest, or doubts from reasoning and inquiry. By his application to business he had acquired a great ascendancy over the king, who, though possessed of more discernment, was glad to throw the burden of affairs on the duke, of whom he entertained little jealousy. On pretence of easing the protestant dissenters, they agreed upon a plan for introducing a general toleration, and giving the catholics the free exercise of their religion; at least, the exercise of it in private houses. The two brothers saw with pleasure so numerous and popular a body of the clergy refuse conformity; and it was hoped that, under shelter of their name, the small and hated sect of the catholics might meet with favour and protection."

SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.]
Feb. 18, 1662-3. This day parliament met after a recess of nine months; upon which occasion his majesty made the following Speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I am very glad to meet you here again; having thought the time long since we parted, and often wished you had been together, to help me in some occasions which have fallen out: I need not repeat them unto you; you have all had the noise of them in your several countries, and (God be thanked!) they were but noise, without any worse effects.—To cure the distempers and compose the differing minds that are yet among us, I set forth my Declaration* of the 26th of Dec. in which you may see I am willing to set bounds to the hopes of some, and to the fears of others; of which when you shall have examined well the grounds, I doubt not but I shall have your concurrence therein: The truth is, I am in my nature an enemy to all severity for Religion and Conscience, how mistaken soever it be, when it extends to capital and sanguinary punishments, which I am told were begun in Popish times: Therefore, when I say this, I hope I shall not need to warn any here not to infer from thence, that I mean to favour Popery. I must confess to you there are many of that profession, who having served my father and myself very well, may fairly hope for some part in that indulgence I would willingly afford to others, who dissent from us.

* The said Declaration consisted of the following particulars, viz. That it had been alledged against him; 1. That he intended nothing less than the observation of the Act of Indemnity. 2. That upon the pretence of Plots, he intended to introduce a Military Way of government. 3. That, notwithstanding his promise from Breda, and Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, he had fetter'd the scrupulous by the Act of Uniformity; and 4. That he was indulgent to Papists to such a degree, as might endanger the Protestant Religion. To all these he gave particular and direct answers; but as to the Act of Uniformity, he declared his own firm adherence to it; only, for the sake of others he was ready and willing to dispense with some matters in it. In the conclusion he promised, 1. To punish by severe Laws that Licentiousness and Impiety, which since the dissolution of the government, had overspread the nation. 2. As well by Sumptuary Laws, as his own example of frugality, to restrain the Excess in men's expences, which was grown so general and exorbitant, beyond all bounds, either of their qualities or fortunes. 3. So to retrench all his own ordinary and extraordinary charges, as to bring them within the compass of his settled Revenue, that thereby his subjects might have little cause to fear his frequent pressing them for new assistances. And lastly, so to improve the good consequences of these three particulars to the advancement of Trade, that all his subjects finding the advantage of them in that prime foundation of plenty, they might all with minds happily compos'd by his indulgence, apply themselves comfortably to their several vocations, in such a manner as the private interest of every one might encourage him to contribute to the general prosperity. Echard, p. 805.

But let me explain myself, lest some mistake me herein, as I hear they did in my Declaration: I am far from meaning by this, a toleration or qualifying them thereby to hold any offices or places of trust in the government; nay, farther, I desire some laws may be made, to hinder the growth and progress of their doctrine.—I hope you have all so good an opinion of my zeal for the Protestant Religion, as I need not tell you, I will not yield to any therein, not to the bishops themselves, nor in my liking the uniformity of it as it is now established; which, being the Standard of our Religion, must be kept pure and uncorrupted, free from all other mixtures: And yet, if the Dissenters will demean themselves peaceably and modestly under the government, I could heartily wish I had such a power of indulgence, to use upon occasions, as might not needlessly force them out of the kingdom, or, staying here, give them cause to conspire against the peace of it.—My Lords and Gentlemen, It would look like flattery in me, to tell you to what degree I am confident of your wisdom and affection in all things that relate to the greatness and prosperity of the kingdom: If you consider well what is best for us all, I dare say, we shall not disagree. I have no more to say to you at present, but once again to bid you heartily welcome.*

Address of the Commons to the King, relative to the Indulgence to Dissenters from the Act of Uniformity. The commons being withdrawn, appointed the 25th for taking into consideration, both his majesty's Speech and the Declaration mentioned therein: at which time they unanimously resolved, That the Thanks of the house should be returned to the king for all that was contained in the Declaration, except what related to the Indulgence; with regard to which, they appointed a Committee (who chose sir Heneage Finch † the king's solicitor, for their chairman) to draw up an Address, which, after several amendments and additions, was presented to his majesty, by the Speaker on the 27th: It was as follows:

“May it please your most excellent majesty; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, in parliament assembled, having, with all fidelity and obedience, considered of the several matters comprised in your majesty's late gracious Declaration of the 26th of Dec. last; and your most gracious Speech at the beginning of this present session; do, in the first place, for ourselves, and in the names of all the commons of England,

* About this time a very remarkable piece was published under the whimsical title of ‘A Speech visibly spoken in the presence of the Lords and Commons assembled in parliament, by a Ghost in a white sheet of paper, &c.’ It will be found in the Appendix No. IV.

render to your sacred majesty the tribute of our most hearty thanks, for that infinite grace and goodness, wherewith your majesty hath been pleased to publish your royal intentions of adhering to your Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, by a constant and religious observance of it: and our hearts are further enlarged in these returns of thanksgiving, when we consider your majesty's most princely and heroic professions, of relying upon the affections of your people, and abhorring all sort of military and arbitrary rule. But, above all, we can never enough remember, to the honour of your majesty's piety, and our own unspeakable comfort, those solemn and most endearing invitations of us your majesty's subjects, to prepare laws, to be presented to your majesty, against the Growth and Increase of Popery; and, withal, to provide more laws against Licentiousness and Impiety; at the same time declaring your own resolutions, for maintaining the Act of Uniformity. And it becomes us always to acknowledge and admire your majesty's wisdom, in this your Declaration; whereby your majesty is pleased to resolve, not only by Sumptuary Laws, but by your own royal example of frugality, to restrain that excess in men's expences, which is grown so general, and so exorbitant; and to direct our endeavours to find out fit and proper laws for advancement of Trade and Commerce.—After all this, we most humbly beseech your majesty to believe, that it is with extreme unwillingness and reluctance of heart, that we are brought to differ from any thing, which your majesty hath thought fit to propose: and, though we do no way doubt, but that the unreasonable distempers of men's spirits, and the many mutinies and conspiracies, which were carried on during the late intervals of parliament, did reasonably incline your majesty to endeavour by your Declaration, to give some alay to those ill humours, till the parliament assembled; and the hopes of an Indulgence, if the parliament should consent to it; especially seeing the pretenders to this Indulgence did seem to make some title to it, by virtue of your majesty's Declaration from Breda; nevertheless, we your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, who are now returned to serve in parliament from those several parts and places of your kingdom, for which we were chosen, do humbly offer it to your majesty's great wisdom; that it is in no sort advisable, that there be any Indulgence to such persons, who presume to dissent from the Act of Uniformity, and Religion established; for these reasons:—We have considered the nature of your majesty's Declaration from Breda; and are humbly of opinion, That your majesty ought not to be pressed with it any further; because, it is not a promise in itself, but only a gracious Declaration of your majesty's intentions, to do what in you lay, and what a parliament should advise your majesty to do: and no such advice was ever given, or thought fit to be offered: nor could it be otherwise understood; because there were laws of Uniformity then in being, which could not be dispensed with, but by act of parliament.—They, who do pretend a right to that supposed promise, put their right into the hands of their representatives, whom they chose to serve for them in this parliament: who have passed, and your majesty consented to the Act of Uniformity.—If any shall presume to say, That a right to the benefit of this Declaration doth still remain, after this Act passed; it tends to dissolve the very bonds of government; and to suppose a disability in your majesty, and your houses of parliament, to make a law contrary to any part of your majesty's Declaration, though both houses should advise your majesty to it.—We have also considered the nature of the Indulgence proposed, with reference to those consequences which must necessarily attend it. It will establish schism by a law; and make the whole government of the Church precarious, and the censures of it of no moment or consideration at all. It will no way become the gravity or wisdom of a parliament, to pass a law at one session for Uniformity; and, at the next session (the reasons for Uniformity continuing still the same), to pass another law, to frustrate or weaken the execution of it.—It will expose your majesty to the restless importunity of every sect or opinion; and of every single person also, that shall presume to dissent from the Church of England. It will be a cause of increasing sects and sectaries: whose numbers will weaken the true Protestant profession so far, that it will, at least, become difficult for it to defend itself against them: and, which is yet further considerable, those numbers, which, by being troublesome to the government, find they can arrive to an Indulgence, will, as their numbers increase, be yet more troublesome, that so, at length, they may arrive to a general Toleration, which your majesty hath declared against; and, in time, some prevalent sect will, at last, contend for an establishment; which, for aught can be foreseen, may end in Popery. It is a thing altogether without precedent; and will take away all means of convicting recusants, and be inconsistent with the methods and proceedings of the laws of England.—Lastly, it is humbly conceived, that the Indulgence proposed will be so far from tending to the peace of the kingdom, that it is likely rather to occasion great disturbance: and, on the contrary, that the asserting of the laws, and the religion established, according to the Act of Uniformity, is the most probable means to produce a settled peace and obedience through the kingdom; because the variety of professions in religion, when openly indulged, both directly distinguish men into parties, and withal, gives them opportunity to count their numbers; which considering the animosities that, out of a religious pride, will be kept on foot by the several factions, doth tend, directly and inevitably, to open disturbance: nor can your majesty have any security, that the doctrine or worship of the sever-ral factions, which are all governed by a several rule, shall be consistent with the peace of your kingdom.—And, if any person shall presume to disturb the peace of the kingdom, we do, in all humility, declare, That we will for ever, and upon all occasions, be ready, with our uttermost endeavours and assistance, to adhere to, and serve your majesty, according to our bounden duty and allegiance.”

The King's Answer.] To this Address, his majesty gave this gracious Answer: “That he gave them hearty thanks for their many thanks; that never any king was so happy in a house of commons, as he in this; that the Paper and Reasons were long, and therefore he would take time to consider of them, and send them a Message; that they could never differ but in judgment, and that must be when he did not rightly express himself, or they did not rightly understand him; but their interest was so far linked together, that they could never disagree.” According to this promise, on the 16th of March, he sent this Message to the house of commons: “That he was unwilling to enlarge upon the Address lately made to him by his house of commons, or to reply to the Reasons, though he found what he said not much understood; but he renewed his hearty thanks to them, for their expressions of so great duty and affection, and for their free declaration, That if any person shall presume to disturb the peace of the kingdom, they will for ever, and upon all occasions, be ready with their utmost endeavours and assistance, to adhere to, and serve his majesty; and did very heartily desire them so to enable him, and to put the kingdom into such a posture of defence, as that if any disturbance or seditious designs arose, they might be easily suppressed.”—To all which the commons returned their particular thanks and promises.

Petition of both Houses to the King, against Jesuits and Priests.] March 31. The house having thus manifested their zeal against Dissenters, proceeded next, in conjunction with the lords, to draw up an humble Representation to the king, concerning Romish Priests and Jesuits; which was as follows:

“The humble Representation and Petition of the Lords and Commons sheweth;

“That notwithstanding your majesty's unquestionable affection and zeal for the true Protestant Religion, manifested in your constant profession and practice, against all temptations whatsoever: yet, by the great resort of Jesuits and Romish Priests into this kingdom, your good subjects are generally much affected with jealousy and apprehension, That the Popish Religion may much increase in this kingdom, which your majesty hath most piously desired may be prevented; and so the peace both in church and state may be insensibly disturbed, to the great danger of both. Your two houses of parliament are therefore humble suitors to your majesty, to issue out your Proclamation to command all Jesuits, and all English, Irish, and Scottish Popish Priests, and all such other Priests as have taken orders from the see of Rome, or by authority thereof, (except such Foreign Jesuits or Priests, as by contract of marriage are to attend the persons of either of the Queens, or by the law of nations to attend Foreign ambassadors) to depart this kingdom by a day, under pain of having the penalties of the law inflicted upon them.”

The King's Answer.] This Petition having been read to his majesty, he immediately made the following Speech:

“My Lords, and Gentlemen; You do not expect that I should give you an Answer, presently to your Petition, yet I tell you, that I will speedily send you an Answer, which I am confident will be to your satisfaction. It may be the general jealousy of the nation hath made this address necessary; and indeed I believe nothing hath more contributed to that jealousy than my own confidence, that it was impossible there should be any such jealousy, and the effects of that confidence; but I shall give you satisfaction, and then I am sure you will easily satisfy and compose the minds of the nation. I confess, my lords and gentlemen, I have heard of one jealousy, which I will never forgive the authors of, That I had a jealousy of your affections; that I was offended with the parliament to that degree that I intended to dissolve it. They say men are naturally most angry with those reports which reflect upon their understanding, which make them thought weak men: truly, I should appear a very weak man, if I should have any such passion, any such purpose. No, my lords and gentlemen, I will not part with you upon those terms. Never king was so much beholden to a parliament as I am to you, and if my kindness to you and my confidence in you be not proportionable, I am behind-hand with you; which, God-willing, I will not be.—Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, I am willing to take this occasion to give you my particular thanks for your great kindness in taking hold upon an easy intimation, rather than an invitation from me, to enter upon the consideration of my Revenue: It was kindly done, and I shall never forget it. I have given order, that you may be fully informed of the true State of it, and then I know you will do that which is good for me and you: and I pray pursue your good resolution, in putting the kingdom into such a posture, that we may prevent, at least not fear, any desperate insurrection.”

The King's Second Answer.] The king, according to his promise, the very next day sent an Answer to the Petition in writing to the house of lords, which, in a conference between both houses, was likewise delivered to the commons, and was as follows:

“His majesty having seriously considered and weighed the humble Representation and Petition of his lords and commons assembled in parliament, and the great affection and duty with which the same was presented to him; and after having made some reflections on himself and his own actions, is not a little troubled, that his lenity and condescensions towards many of the Popish persuasion (which were but natural effects of his generosity and good-nature, after having lived so many years in the dominions of Roman-Catholic princes; and out of a just memory of what many of them had done and suffered in the service of his royal father of blessed memory, and of some eminent services performed by others of them, towards his majesty himself in the time of his greatest affliction) have been made so ill use of, and so ill deserved, that the resort of Jesuits and Priests into this kingdom hath been thereby increased; with which his majesty is, and hath long been highly offended. And therefore his majesty readily concurs with the advice of his two houses of parliament, and hath given order for the preparing and issuing out such a Proclamation as is desired, with the same Clause referring to the Treaty of Marriage, as was in the Proclamation; which, upon the like occasion, was issued out upon the advice of both houses of parliament in the year 1640. And his majesty will take further care, that the same shall be effectual, at least to a greater degree than any Proclamation of this kind hath ever been. And his majesty further declares and assures both his houses of parliament, and all his loving subjects of all his dominions, that as his affection and zeal for the Protestant Religion and the Church of England hath not been concealed, or untaken notice of in the world; so he is not, nor ever will be so solicitous for the settling his own Revenue, or providing any other expedients for the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, as for the advancement and improvement of the Religion established, and for the using and applying all proper and effectual Remedies to hinder the growth of Popery; both which he doth in truth look upon as the best expedient to establish the peace and prosperity of all his kingdoms."

State of the King's Revenue.] The commons proceeded next to take the State of the King's Revenue into consideration; and found upon enquiry, that the whole did not amount to quite 1,100,000*l.* That is to say, according to the following Estimate, which was made the preceding year, and is called, as high and true an Estimate as can be made of the King's Revenues:*

June 12. But while they were thus employed, his majesty, by a Message, demanded their attendance at Whitehall, where he received them with the following Speech:

" Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I have sent for you this day to communicate with you, as good friends ought to do, when they discover the least jealousy growing, which may lessen their confidence in each other. It is a freedom very necessary to be used between me and you: and you may all remember, that when there was lately a little jealousy amongst you, upon somewhat I had said or done, I made all the haste I could to give you satisfaction; for which you all returned me your hearty thanks, and were, I think, satisfied. Gentlemen, it is in no man's power, no, not in your own power, to make me suspect, or in the least degree imagine it possible, that your affection or kindness is lessened or diminished towards me: I know very well, that the people did never in any age use that vigilance and circumspection in the election of persons of known and try'd affections to the crown, of your good principles and unquestionable inclinations to the peace of the Church and the State, for their representatives in parliament as they did when they chose you. You are the very same men, who at your first coming together, gave such signal testimonies of your affection and friendship to my person, of your zeal for the honour and dignity of the crown, and liberal support of the government, and of your horror and detestation of those men, whose principles you discerned keep them awake to take all occasions to disturb the peace of the kingdom, and to embroil us in a new civil war; which is as much their endeavour now as ever, and it may be not enough abhorred by others, whose principles and ends are very different from them. You are the same men, who, at your first meeting, by a wonderful and cheerful harmony and concurrence in whatsoever I could wish, gave me reputation abroad and security at home, made our neighbours solicitous for our friendship, and set a just value upon it. And, trust me, such a reputation is of such a vast importance, as made my evil subjects even despair of bringing their wicked purposes to pass, And is it possible that the same persons can continue the same together, without the same affection for me? I am sure it is impossible.— And yet, I must tell you, the reputation I had from your concurrence and tenderness towards me, is not at all improved since the beginning of this session; indeed it is much lessened. And I am sure I never stood in more need of that reputation than at present, to carry me through the many difficulties, in which the public is at least concerned, as much as myself. Let me and you think never so well of ourselves, if all the world knows or believes that we are poor, that we are in extremity of want, if our friends think we can do them no good, or our enemies believe we can do them no harm, our condition is far from being prosperous. You cannot take it amiss, (you shall use as much freedom with me) that I tell you there hath not appeared that warmth in you of late in the consideration of my Revenue, as I expected, as well from some of your Messages, as my own confidence in your care and kindness. It hath been said to myself, that it is usual for the parliament to give the crown extraordinary Supplies upon emergent occasions, but not to improve the constant Revenue of the crown. I wish, and so do you, that nothing had lately been done in and by parliaments but what is usual: but if ill parliaments contrive the ruin and disinherison of the crown, God forbid but good parliaments should repair it, how unusual soever it is. If you yourselves had not in an extraordinary manner improved my Revenue, the government would not have been supported; and if it be not yet improved to the proportion you have designed, I cannot doubt but you will proceed in it with your old alacrity. I am very well contented that you proceed in your inspection; I know it will be to my advantage, and that you will neither find my receipts so great, nor my expences so exorbitant, as you imagine; and for an evidence of the last, I will give you an Account of the Issues of the twelve hundred thousand pounds you so liberally gave me: one penny whereof was not disposed but upon full deliberation with myself, and by my own order, and I think you will all say for the public service. But, gentlemen, this inquisition cannot be finished in the short time we can now conveniently stay together: and yet, if you do not provide before we part, for the better paying and collecting what you have already given me, you can hardly presume what it will amount to: and if you do not support what you have already given me by some addition, you will quickly see lawful ways found to lessen the Revenue more than you imagine: and therefore I cannot but expect your wisdoms will seasonably and speedily provide a remedy for that growing mischief. Believe me, gentlemen, the most disaffected subjects in England are not more unwilling to pay any tax or imposition you lay upon them, than I am to receive it; God knows, I do not long more for any blessing in this world, than that I may live to call a parliament, and not ask or receive any money from them; I will do all I can to see that happy day. I know the vast burdens the kingdom hath borne these last 20 years and more; that it is exceedingly impoverished: but, alas! what will that which is left do them good, if the government cannot be supported; if I am not able to defray the Charge that is necessary for their peace and security? I must deal plainly with you, (and I do but discharge my conscience in that plainness) if you do not, besides the improving my Revenue in the manner I have recommended to you, give me some present Supply of Money to enable me to struggle with those difficulties I am pressed with, I shall have a very melancholic summer, and shall much apprehend the public quiet.— You have heard, I presume, of the late design in Ireland for the Surprize of the Castle of Dublin, which was spread all over that kingdom, and many parliament-men were engaged in it. There is an absolute necessity that I forthwith send over a sum of money thither, for the payment of the Army, and putting the Garrisons there in good order. You will not doubt but that those seditious persons there, had a correspondence with their friends here: and I pray let us not be too careless of them. I assure you, I have so great occasion for Money here, which my Revenue cannot supply me with, that I every day omit the doing somewhat that is very necessary for the public benefit. These sure are just motives to persuade you to give me a Supply, as ever moved a house of commons. And therefore I con-jure you to go cheerfully about it, and let me not be disappointed in my confidence of your affections: and I pray remember the season of the year, and how necessary it is that we wake a recess at or about midsummer. I have enlarged much more to you upon this occasion than I have used to do; and you may perceive it hath not been very easy to me: but I was willing that you should understand from my-self what I desire and expect from you: and the rather, because I hear some men have confidently undertaken to know my mind, who have had no authority from me, and to drive on designs very contrary to my desires. I do pray heartily that the effect of this day's conversation may be the renewing of our confidence in each other, and raising our joint reputation, which will be our strongest security, with God's blessing, the kingdom can have for its peace, plenty, and full prosperity: and upon my word, you shall have great comfort in what you shall do for me, upon this very earnest and hearty recommendation."

Four Subsidies voted.] This Speech did not fail of its desired effect, for, shortly after, the house voted his majesty four Subsidies.

Sir Rd. Temple accused of sending a Message to the King by the Earl of Bristol, undertaking for the Compliance of the House, in case a Supply should be demanded.] June 13. Upon information given to the commons, by Mr. Coventry, That his maj. had commanded him to impart to the house that a Message was delivered to his maj. by a person of quality, from sir Rd. Temple, to the effect following; viz. 'That sir Richard was sorry his majesty was offended with him that he could not go along with them that had undertaken his business in the house of commons: but, if his majesty would take his advice, and intrust him and his friends, he would undertake his business should be effected, and Revenue settled, better than he could desire; if the courtiers did not hinder it.' It was ordered, That a committee be appointed to examine the said matter, and report it to the house.

June 20. It was resolved, That the king be humbly desired, that he would be graciously pleased to name the person that did deliver the Message to his majesty from sir Rd. Temple: and that his majesty's two principal secretaries of state, Mr. Treasurer, and sir William Compton, do attend his majesty, and acquaint him with the desires of this house.

June 26. Mr. Secretary Morrice acquainted the house, That he had received command from his majesty to declare to the house, That the earl of Bristol was the person that did deliver the Message from sir Rd. Temple to his majesty. Upon which it was resolved, That a copy of the first Message sent by his majesty, against sir Rd. Temple, be sent to the earl of Bristol: and he be made acquainted, That the king hath sent word to this house, That he brought the Message to him, from sir Richard; and his Answer desired, Whether sir Richard did desire him so to do: and that Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Garraway do attend the earl with this Message.

June 27. Mr. Vaughan reported, "That he and Mr. Garraway had attended the earl of Bristol; and had acquainted him with the order of this house; and with the transcript of so much of his majesty's Message, as did relate to the Message which he did receive from sir Rd. Temple: and that his lordship did render his most humble and hearty thanks to this house, That, in such an important matter, and so much concerning his honour, they did signify their desires to him in so obliging a manner: but, in regard the thing was of so great consequence, partly relating to his majesty, and also concerning his own honour, and the reputation of a member of this house, he could not intrust any other person to deliver his Answer, for fear of mistakes which might thereby happen; and because he might probably if present clear any matter which might further accrue: and, therefore, that he might give full satisfaction to so illustrious a representative of his country, he desired a day might be prefixed, when he might be admitted to give an account to the house, in person, concerning this matter: and that he would make his address to the lords, that he might be permitted so to do." Upon this, it was resolved, That Wednesday next be appointed for the earl of Bristol personally to give in his Answer to the house.

The Earl of Bristol's Speech, before the Commons, thereon.] July 1. The house having received information, that the earl of Bristol was at the door, and did pray admittance into the house, to give an account, in person, of the matter concerning sir Rd. Temple, his lordship was, by direction of the house, placed in a chair, set for him on purpose, on the left side of the house, within the bar: and Mr. Speaker did open unto him his majesty's Message, and the votes and proceedings of the house thereupon, concerning sir Richard Temple. This being done,

The Earl of Bristol rose and addressed the house as follows:—"Mr. Speaker; Were I to be wrought upon by the arts and menaces of my enemies, or by the alarms of my friends in my behalf, contrary to the firmness and assurance which a clean heart and a good conscience does always uphold in a man of honour, I should have appeared in this place with such fear and trembling, as could not chuse but disorder any man's reason and elocution: the niceness of the subject upon which I am brought hither, were enough to discompose one; but over and above that, I am not ignorant what personal prejudices I am under, and how industriously they have been improved among you. But when I look round this illustrious assembly, and see three parts of it composed of men who wear, as I do, a sword by their sides, and who have drawn it so often for the king's service, gentlemen of birth, integrity, fortune, all apprehensions vanish from a man, who hath served and suffered for the king as I have done. Mr. Speaker, I know the time of this house, upon whose prudent deliberations the happiness of the king and kingdom depends, is too precious to have any part of it spent in vindication of me: but, since not only the reputation and innocence of one of your members depends upon what I shall say, but even his majesty's honour may in some sort be concerned in the right apprehension of it, I hope it will be thought no presumption in me to beg of you, as I do, in all humility, one quarter of an hour's patience and attention.—Mr. Speaker, I am here exposed as the Bearer of a Message to his majesty from sir Richard Temple, which he hath thought worthy to be complained of to this house, and which sir Rd. Temple affirms he never sent. Lay your hands upon your hearts, gentlemen, and say truly, does not your innate candour pity my condition, brought into a straight, in all appearance so inextricable? For, on the one side, if I avow to have carried from sir Rd. Temple the Message, which his maj. has been pleased to make so high and so unusual an expression of his being offended at, and which sir Rd. Temple denies to have sent, how can men of honour forgive me so ungentlemanly a proceeding towards a person who hath trusted me, as a friend, to do him (as he thought) a good office with his majesty? On the other side, Mr. Speaker, should I disavow the having delivered the Message from sir Rd. Temple, which his majesty hath thought fit to affirm, that he received from him and by me, what subject can be strong enough not to sink for ever under the weight of such a contradiction to his sovereign? I ask you again, gentlemen, does not the condition you see me brought into, by the arts of my enemies, move you at the same time to pity and indignation? Mr. Speaker, when David was put to his choice of one of the three calamities, he made election of the plague. And why? that he might fall into the hands of God, and not of men. In like manner, Mr. Speaker, if one of the two extremes, with which I am threatened, be, as it appears, unavoidable, let me fall into the hands of God's vice-gerent the king: the world will never pardon me an unworthy action; his goodness, I am sure, would in time pardon a generous fault. But when you have heard me out, gentlemen, I am confident you will find, that I shall need neither the world's pardon nor the king's, but only yours. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to clear sir Richard Temple, which I here do upon my honour, that he never sent by me a Message to the king, that had in it the least tincture of an undertaking of his; which I conceive could be the only part that could give offence to his majesty, or be a ground for the Complaint made against him.—In the next place, if the king, who, the law says, can do no wrong, hath thought fit to affirm, that I brought him that undertaking Message from sir Rd. Temple, it must needs be true, and I do with all submission avow whatever his majesty is pleased to affirm of me; but, having discharged that duty towards my sovereign, I hope I may be allowed to lay the fault home upon myself, and to tell you, that my tongue, I know not by what distemper, delivered that which, I protest to God, was never in my thoughts; I was so far from thinking to deliver such a Message from sir Rd. Temple, that I did not think myself charged with any thing by way Message. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that, being full of indignation at ill offices done him, I made a warm address to his majesty in sir Rd. Temple's behalf, wherein I expressed his grief, that his majesty should be offended with him, and having joined thereunto some reasonings of his to justify his conduct, in relation to his majesty's service, very agreeable to my own sentiments, I pursued his expressions with such of my own, as (all circumstances considered) the most unattentive person, and the most biassed with passion against sir Richard Temple, might have easily understood it to be no undertaking of his, but only a warm discourse, and confident undertaking of my own.—Sir Rd. Temple being thus cleared, without the least contradiction to his majesty, if to undertake for you, gentlemen, be a guilt, it is only I that stand guilty before you. But you are too noble, I am sure, and too just, to condemn me in your judgments, before you have heard the nature and circumstances of my undertaking; which, with your leave, I shall declare to the full, taking the matter (as I must needs, to be rightly understood) from an higher original. Mr. Speaker, having had the honour heretofore of discharging, with approbation, a place of so high trust, as that of Secretary of State to his majesty's father of blessed memory, and to himself: and since my quitting that place, being admitted so frequently to the happiness of his princely conversation, you cannot imagine, but that sometimes he vouchsafed to speak to me of business, especially of parliaments, where I have the honour at present to be a peer, and have heretofore been as much versed, as some of my contemporaries, in the proceedings of the honourable house of commons. I confess, that, before this last assembling, he did it more than once, and the opinion I most constantly delivered concerning this house was, that never king was so happy in a house of commons, as he was in you; a house composed of so many gentlemen of birth and fortune, eminent in their faithfulness to him, and such as could never be suspected of any sinister designs, or of any other dependance, but upon the crown, and upon the care of those that chose them, and such as in the last sessions had manifested their affections to him by such large Aids and Supplies; adding, that nothing could be more important to his service, than to make and preserve you still popular with those that sent you. To which end I took the liberty to tell him, that if the necessity of his affairs, (of which I, having no part in his council, was no good judge) could admit of it, he ought not in prudence to let you give him any Money this sitting, but rather to oblige you wholly to apply yourselves to the making of such laws as might endear both him and you to the people; by which means, at another meeting, he would be master of the hearts and purses of his subjects. But in case his necessities should urge him to press you, before the rising, for a new Supply, that he ought, by all means, to let it be accompanied, if not preceded, by some eminent Acts for the Reformation of former Abuses, and for the securing his subjects from the like for the future—I persisted, Mr. Speaker, in pressing, upon all occasions, this advice to his majesty, till within some few weeks after their meeting; when finding myself (I know not by what misfortune) fallen under some prejudice, I thought that a total forbearance from speaking to him of any business, would be the best way of my serving him. And I protest unto you, gentlemen, with all sincerity, that from that time, until that of his majesty's expressing to me some displeasure against sir Rd. Temple, I never once opened my lips to him of any public affair whatsoever: it is true, Mr. Speaker, that a ground being given me to enter again with his majesty, upon a subject which my heart was still full of, I laid hold on the occasion, and in pursuance of what I had said in behalf of sir Rd. Temple, told his majesty, perhaps with more freedom and fervour than did become me, that I found his courtiers gave him wrong measures, both of the temper of the house of commons, and of the means to attain from them any new Supplies, whether by way of present, gift, or of such establishments in his revenues, as might indeed put him out of necessity; since there could be no reasonable hopes of obtaining from them any such assistance, but by a committance, if not a precedence of such Acts, as might be grateful and beneficial to his subjects, and secure them, that what shall be given hereafter should be better managed for his majesty's service, than those vast sums that had been formerly granted: that if his majesty, in his princely wisdom, should think fit to drive on his business upon solid grounds, and not upon the false and self-interested measures of some courtiers, he had a house of commons composed of members so full of affection to his person, and zeal for his prosperity and glory, that not only sir Rd. Temple, but the most unprejudiced and wisest men of the kingdom, as well as myself, durst undertake for them. See here, gentlemen, the bold undertaking that such a house of commons would never let him want such present Supplies, as the true necessity of his affairs should require, nor such an established Revenue, as is fit to support the greatness and honour of his crown. If this was a criminal undertaking, you have, before you, gentlemen, contentemur reum; and whilst I am endeavouring to clear sir Rd. Temple, and to vindicate or arraign myself, according as you shall be pleased to understand it, by telling you what passed from me to his majesty, I must not omit to give him the honour due to him for the kingly Reply he made to me upon this occasion, which was, 'That he had a true sense of the merit of the house of commons towards him, even far beyond what I had expressed, and this was the reason why, relying so entirely as he did, upon the affections of that whole body, he was, and ever should be offended at any proposition to carry on his business there by officious undertakings and cabals, either of his courtiers or others.' An expression fit to be written with the rays of the sun, that all the world may read it; an expression which cannot chuse but inflame the affections of all this noble assembly that hear me, and carry you to make good these happy impressions of you, which are so deeply stamp'd in his royal breast: such as I should think it a crime to doubt, but that all suspicions being now vanished of his majesty's owning the Supply desired, to any acts or contrivances of others, your own zeal for his service will, even in the proportion and timeliness of that, exceed the vain proposals of all pick-thank undertakers.—Mr. Speaker, I should have here put a period to your trouble of hearing me, did I not think I might incur the imputation of much weakness and supineness in my own highest concernments, if, valuing, as I do, above all earthly concernments, the favour and the esteem of my country, of which you are the illustrious representatives; and knowing what industry has been used to blast me with you, I should not lay hold on this just occasion to remove from me some unjust prejudices under which I have laboured. And this Mr. Speaker, I humbly beg leave to do in very few words. I appeal, gentlemen, to numbers of you, that hear me, whether I have not been represented unto you for the giver of advice of a far different tenor from what you have heard upon this occasion; whether I have not been painted out unto you for an inflamer of his majesty against his parliament; for an enemy of the Church of England, and for a dangerous driver on of the Papistical interest. It is true, Mr. Speaker, I am a Catholic of the Church of Rome, but not of the Court of Rome; no Negotiator there of Cardinal's Caps for his majesty's subjects and domestics, a true Roman Catholic as to the other world, but a true Englishman as to this: such a one, as had we a king inclined to that profession (as on the contrary, we have one the most firm and constant to the Protestant Religion, that ever sat upon the throne) I would tell him as freely as the Duke of Sully, being a Protestant, told his grandfather Henry IV. That if he meant to be a king he must be a constant professor and maintainer of the Religion established in his dominions. Believe me, gentlemen, Roman Catholic as I am, there is no man amongst you all, more thoroughly persuaded than I am, that the true pillars, that can uphold this monarchy, must ever be the maintenance of the subjects just rights and liberties, and the careful preservation of that State Ecclesiastical, whereof his majesty is the supreme governor; and I do clearly profess, that should the Pope himself invade that Ecclesiastical right of his, I should as readily draw my sword against him as against the late usurper. Mr. Speaker, one prejudice more I am under, which ought to have great weight indeed with this honourable house, if there were a real ground for it; and that is, that the earl of Bristol is one of those, who by the vast Grants that he hath got of the king, hath, in part, contributed to the groans of the people, to find their king still in such necessity, after such unexampled charges laid upon the subjects for his Supplies. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that though I have neither offices to keep, nor offices to sell, his majesty's gifts to me have been great, in proportion to my merit, which is none: for in serving and suffering for him with faithfulness, I did but my duty, which carries a reward with itself, enough to raise a comfort to me, from the very ruin of my fortune. It is also true, I have had the satisfaction from his majesty, that he never refused me any thing I asked him for myself. But I hope I shall make it appear also, that I have not only been a very modest asker, but also a most careful one, to ask nothing considerable, but what carried advantage with it, as well to his majesty's interest as my own. I know well, Mr. Speaker, that, with so kind and so generous a nature as our king is, an ill proportion of bounty to merit, and consequently the largeness and kindness of his royal heart that way, may have contributed much to the present streights he is in. Happy is the nation that hath nothing to fear for the public, but from the virtues of their prince. It is your proper work, gentlemen, to reduce the effects of them to a right temperament, by your prudent inspection; and may you begin it with all my concerns, which I most readily lay at your feet, humbly begging of you to appoint a time, when I may display them all faithfully before you; in hopes that no man, who hath been a partaker of his majesty's bounty, will prove himself so unworthy of it, as not to follow the example. Mr. Speaker, If having thus poured out my soul before you, I have been so happy as to have begot in this honourable house a right persuasion of the sincerity of my heart, I expect and implore two gracious effects of it. The first, that you will be pleased to grant me your pardon, if the same zeal for his majesty's service, and the good of my country, which made me presume (being no counsellor) to press upon his majesty my opinion in matters of such importance, has transported me also, at this time, in some sort, so as to become your adviser. You have heard, gentlemen, of the dumb man, whose tongue was set free by the imminent danger of his father's life; wonder not then, gentlemen, that such a lover of his king and country as I am, having seen them, within these three years in a prospect of such glory and happiness, both at home and abroad, and finding to what a sad condition things are now reduced, (by what means it is more proper for you to enquire, and may Heaven bless your inspection;) wonder not, I say, gentlemen, that a man so affected as I am, should, by some eruptions of heart, let you see, that periculum patriæ ought to have a more powerful effect upon a man of public soul, than periculum patriæ, and is capable, if I were a mute, to make me become a counsellor. The next is, Mr. Speaker, that if (as I said before, I have been so happy in what I expressed, as to have raised in you some more favourable thoughts concerning me, you would vouchsafe me some demonstration of it, whereby I may no more be made, by my enemies, such a bugbear as I am: as if a gracious look of his majesty upon me, were enough to ruin all his affairs with you. I shall then continue the way I am in with comfort; but if I be so unfortunate, as that there still remains in this incomparable representative of my country, any umbrage of danger to it by my access to his majesty; as dear as the conversation of the amiablest prince that ever breathed is to me, I shall banish myself for ever from his sight, into the obscurest part of his dominions, rather than continue upon me the jealousy of those on whom his prosperity depends; or if this be not enough, I shall once more try my fortune abroad, where, I trust, this sword, this head, and this heart shall make me live as heretofore, in spite of my enemies, with lustre to myself and some honour to my nation."

After the earl had finished his speech he withdrew; the house then proceeded in the debate of the matter and came to the following Resolutions: "That this house is satisfied, that sir R. Temple hath not broke any privilege of this house, in the matter in question concerning him. That this return be made from the house, to the Answer of the earl of Bristol: viz. That the earl of Bristol, in the account which he hath given this house, in the matter concerning sir R. Temple, hath carried himself with all dutifulness towards his majesty; hath cleared the member of this house; and that the house is well satisfied with his respect to them."—His lordship was again called in: and Mr. Speaker acquainted him with the return of the house.—Ordered, That such members of the house, as are of his majesty's privy-council, do acquaint his majesty with the said Vote: That sir Rd. Temple have the leave of this house, to petition his majesty for his favour; and to give him satisfaction, as to the other informations mentioned in his majesty's Message.

Articles of High Treason, exhibited by the earl of Bristol against Lord Clarendon.] July 10. This day the earl of Bristol exhibited into the house of lords, the following ARTICLES OF HIGH TREASON, and other heinous Misdemeanors, against Edw. earl of Clarendon, lord Chancellor of England.

"That, being in place of highest trust and confidence with his majesty, and having arrogated to himself a supreme direction in all his majesty's affairs both at home and abroad, he hath wickedly and maliciously, and with a traitorous intent to draw scandal and contempt upon his majesty's person, and to alienate from him the affections of his subjects, abused the said trust in manner following:—That he hath traiterously and maliciously endeavoured to alienate the hearts of his majesty's subjects from him, by words of his own, and by artificial insinuations of his creatures and dependents, "That his majesty was inclined to Popery, and had a design to alter the Religion established in this kingdom." That in pursuance of that traitorous intent, he hath, to several persons of his majesty's privy council, held discourses to this effect: 'That his majesty was dangerously corrupted in his Religion, and inclined to Popery; that persons of that Religion had such access and such credit with him, that, unless there were a careful eye had unto it, the Protestant Religion would be overthrown in this kingdom.' And, in pursuance of the said wicked and traitorous intent, upon his majesty's admitting sir Henry Bennet to be Principal Secretary of State in the place of Mr. Secretary Nicholas, he hath said these words, or words to this effect, 'That his majesty had given 10,000*l.* to remove a zealous Protestant, that he might bring into that place of high trust a concealed Papist;' notwithstanding that the said sir Henry Bennet is known to have ever been, both in his profession and practice, constant to the Protestant Religion.—That, in pursuance of the same traitorous design, several near friends and known dependents of his have said aloud, 'That, were it not for my lord chancellor's standing in the gap, Popery would be introduced into this kingdom;' or words to that effect.—That in pursuance of the aforesaid traitorous design, he hath not only advised and persuaded the king to do such things, contrary to his own reason and resolutions, as might confirm and increase the scandal which he had endeavoured to raise upon his majesty as aforesaid, of his favour to Popery; but more particularly to allow his name to be used to the Pope and several Cardinals, in the solicitation of a Cardinal's Cap for the lord Aubigny, one of his own subjects and great almoner at present to his royal consort the queen.—That, in pursuance of the same wicked and traitorous design, he had recommended to be employed to the Pope one of his own domestics, Mr. Rd. Beling, a person, though an avowed Papist, known to be trusted and employed by him in dispatches and negotiations concerning affairs of greatest concernment to the nation.—That, in pursuance of the said traitorous design, he, being chief minister of state, did himself write, by the said Mr. Rd. Beling, letters to several cardinals, pressing them in the king's name to induce the Pope to confer a Cardinal's Cap on the said lord Aubigny; promising, in case it should be obtained, exemption to the Roman Catholics of England from the penal laws in force against them: by which address unto the Pope for that ecclesiastical dignity for one of his majesty's subjects and domestics, he hath, as far as from one action can be inferred, traiterously acknowledged the Pope's ecclesiastical sovereignty, contrary to the known laws of this kingdom. That, in pursuance of the same traitorous design, he hath called unto him several Priests and Jesuits, whom he knew to be Superiors of Orders here in England, and desired them to write to their generals at Rome, to give their help, for the obtaining from the Pope the Cardinal's Cap for the lord Aubigny as aforesaid; promising great favour to Papists here, in case it should be effected for him.—That he hath promised unto several Papists, that he would do his endeavour; and said, he hoped to compass the taking away all the penal laws against them, which he did in pursuance of the traitorous design aforesaid, to the end they might presume and grow vain upon his patronage, and, by the publishing their hopes of a toleration, increase the scandal endeavored by him and by his emissaries to be raised upon his majesty throughout the kingdom.—That, in pursuance of the same traitorous design, being intrusted with the Treaty of the Marriage betwixt his majesty and his royal consort the queen, he concluded it upon Articles scandalous and dangerous to the Protestant Religion.—That, in pursuance of the same traitorous design he concluded the said Marriage, and brought the king and queen together, without any settled Agreement in what manner the rites of marriage should be performed; whereby, the queen refusing to be married by a Protestant bishop or priest, in case of her being with child, either the succession should be made uncertain for want of the due rites of matrimony, or else his majesty be exposed to a suspicion of having been married in his own dominions by a Romish priest, whereby all the former scandals endeavoured to be raised upon his majesty by the said earls as to point of Popery might be confirmed and heightened.—That, having thus traiterously endeavoured to alienate the affections of his majesty's subjects from him upon the score of Religion, he hath endeavoured to make use of all the malicious scandals and jealousies which he and his emissaries had raised in his majesty's subjects, to raise from them unto himself the popular applause of being the zealous upholder of the Protestant Religion, and a promoter of new severities against Papists.—That he hath traiterously endeavoured to alienate the affections of his majesty's subjects from him, by venting in his own discourses, and by the speeches of his nearest relations and emissaries, opprobrious scandals against his majesty's person and course of life; such as are not fit to be mentioned, unless necessity in the way of proof shall require it.—That he hath traiterously endeavoured to alienate the affections of his highness the duke of York from his majesty, by suggesting unto him jealousies as far as in him lay, and publishing abroad by his emissaries, That his majesty intended to legitimize the duke of Monmouth.' 'That he hath wickedly and maliciously, contrary to the duty of a privy counsellor of England, and contrary to the perpetual and most important interest of this nation, persuaded his majesty against the advice of the lord general to withdraw the English garrisons out of Scotland, and to demolish all the forts built there at so vast a charge to this kingdom — That, his majesty having been graciously pleased to communicate the desires of the parliament of Scotland, for the remove of the said garrisons, to his parliament of England, and to ask their advice therein, the said earl of Clarendon not only persuaded his majesty actually to remove those garrisons, without expecting the advice of his parliament of England concerning it, but did, by menaces of his majesty's displeasure, deter several members of parliament from moving the houses, as they intended, to enter upon consideration of that matter.—That he hath traiterously and maliciously endeavoured to alienate his majesty's affections and esteem from this his parliament; by telling his majesty, 'That there never was so weak nor so inconsiderable a house of lords, nor never so weak nor so heady a house of commons,' or words to that effect; and particularly, 'That it was better to sell Dunkirk, than to be at their mercy for want of money,' or words to that effect.—That he hath wickedly and maliciously, contrary to his duty of a counsellor, and to a known law made the last sessions, by which money was given and particularly applied for the maintaining of Dunkirk, advised and effected the Sale of the same to the French king.—That he hath maliciously and contrary to law enriched himself and his creatures by the Sale of Offices.—That, contrary to his duty, he hath wickedly and corruptly converted to his own use great and vast sums of public money raised in Ireland, by way of subsidy, private and public benevolences, and otherwise, given and intended to defray the charge of government in that kingdom; by which means a supernumerary and disaffected army hath been kept up there, for want of money to pay them off; and their want of pay, so occasioned, seems to be the cause of the late and present distempers in that kingdom. That, having arrogated to himself a supreme direction of all his majesty's affairs, he hath with a malicious and corrupt intention prevailed to have his majesty's Customs farmed at a far lower rate than others did offer, and that by persons with some of whom he goes a share in that and other parts of monies resulting from his majesty's Revenue. BRISTOL."

"In pursuance of this Charge, it is desired, That the person of the earl of Clarendon may be secured, That his majesty's counsel learned in the law be appointed to draw up a Charge in form, according to these Heads and such others as the earl of Bristol shall exhibit, and to prosecute in the king's behalf. That there be a liberty granted of additional Charges, according as the earl of Bristol shall be enabled to make out proofs of new matter. That Commissions be granted for examination of divers witnesses, both in Scotland and Ireland, according to the List the earl of Bristol shall give in. That order be taken, that the lord Aubigny and Mr. Rd. Beling, two most important witnesses, depart not the kingdom, till they have answered fully to the interrogatories which are to be proposed unto them.

"BRISTOL."

To which Articles the Lord Chancellor* made a short speech extempore to some of the particulars, and declared his innocence.

* Lord Clarendon's own account of this transaction is as follows: "The earl of Bristol came one morning to the house of peers with a Paper in his hand; and told the lords, 'that he could not but observe, that after so glorious a return with which God had blessed the king and the nation, so that all the world had expected, that the prosperity of the kingdom would have far exceeded the misery and adversity that it had for many years endured; and after the parliament had contributed more towards it, than ever parliament had done: notwithstanding all which, it was evident to all men, and lamented by those who wished well to his majesty, that his affairs grew every day worse and worse; the king himself lost much of his honour, and the affection he had in the hearts of the people. That for his part he looked upon it with as much sadness as any man, and had made enquiry as well as he could from whence this great misfortune, which every body was sensible of, could proceed; and that he was satisfied in his own conscience, that it proceeded principally from the power and credit and sole credit of the Chancellor: and therefore he was resolved, for the good of his country, to accuse the Lord Chancellor of High Treason; which he had done in the Paper which he desired might be read, all written with his own hand, to which he subscribed his name.'—The Paper contained many Articles, which he called Articles of High Treason and other Misdemeanors; amongst which one was, 'that he had persuaded the king to send a gentleman (a creature of his own) to Rome, with letters to the Pope, to give a Cardinal's Cap to the lord Aubigny, who was almoner to the queen.' The rest contained 'his assuming to himself the government of all public affairs, which he had administered unskilfully, corruptly and traiterously; which he was ready to prove.'—The Chancellor, without any trouble in his countenance, told the lords, 'That he had had the honour heretofore to have so much the good opinion and friendship of that lord, that he durst appeal to his own conscience, that he did not himself believe one of those Articles to be true, and knew the contrary of most of them. And he was glad to find

Then the house ordered, "That a Copy of the aforesaid Articles should be prepared, and delivered to the king, that so he might be made acquainted with them.—And the Lord Chancellor is to have a Copy of them; and another Copy is to be made, and delivered to the Judges."—And this ensuing Order was also made; viz. "Ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That a Copy of the Articles of High Treason exhibited this day, by the earl of Bristol, against the Lord Chancellor, be delivered to the lord chief justice, who with all the rest of

'that he thought it so high a crime to send to Rome, and to desire a Cardinal's Cap for a Catholic lord, who had been always bred from his cradle in that faith: but he did assure them, that that gentleman was only sent by the queen to the pope, upon an affair that she thought herself obliged to comply with him in, and in hope to do some good office to Portugal; and that the king had neither writ to the Pope, nor to any other person in Rome.' He spake at large to most of the Articles, to shew the impossibility of their being true, and that they reflected more upon the king's honour than upon his; and concluded, 'That he was sorry that lord had not been better advised, for he did believe that though all that was alledged in the Articles should be true, they would not amount to High Treason, upon which he desired the Judges might be required to deliver their opinion;' the which the lords ordered the Judges to do. It was moved by one of the lords, 'That the Copy of the Articles might be sent to the king, because he was mentioned so presumptuously in them;' which was likewise agreed; and the Articles were delivered to the lord chamberlain to present to the king.—The Chancellor had promised that day to dine in Whitehall, but would not presume to go thither till he had sent to the king, not thinking it fit to go into his court, whilst he lay under an accusation of High Treason, without his leave. His majesty sent him word, "That he should dine where he had appointed, and as soon as he had dined that he should attend him." Then his majesty told him and the lord treasurer all that had passed between the earl of Bristol and him in the presence of the lord Aubigny; and in the relation of it expressed great indignation, and was angry with himself 'that he had not immediately sent him to the Tower,' which he said 'he would do as soon as he could apprehend him.' He used the Chancellor with much grace and told him, 'that the earl of Bristol had not treated him so ill as he had done his majesty; and that his Articles were more to his dishonour, and reflected more upon him, for which he would have justice.'—his majesty commanded the lord chamberlain to return his thanks to the house 'For the respect they had shewed to him, in sending those Articles to him: and to let them know, 'that he

the Judges, are to consider, whether the said Charge hath been brought in regularly and legally? and whether it may be proceeded in? and how? and whether there be any Treason in it, or no? and to make report thereof to this house on Monday next, if they can, or else as soon after as possibly they can."

Opinion of the Judges upon the said Articles.] July 13. This day being appointed for the Judges to deliver their Opinion upon the Articles of High Treason exhibited by the earl of Bristol against the Lord Chancellor; the lord chief justice Bridgman, by the agreement, and

looked upon them as a libel against himself more than a charge against the chancellor, who upon his knowledge was innocent in all the particulars charged upon him; which report the lord chamberlain made the next morning to the house: and at the same time the Judges declared their Opinion unanimously, 'that the whole Charge contained nothing of treason though it were all true.' Upon which the earl of Bristol, especially upon what the lord chamberlain had reported from the king, appeared in great confusion, and lamented his condition, 'That he, for endeavouring to serve his country upon the impulsion of his conscience, was discountenanced, and threatened with the anger and displeasure of his prince; whilst his adversary kept his place in the house and had the Judges so much at his devotion that they would not certify against him.' The Chancellor moved the house, 'that a short day might be given to the earl, to bring in his evidence to prove the several matters of his Charge; otherwise that he might have such reparation, as was in their judgments proportionable to the indignity;' The earl said, 'He should not fail to produce witnesses to prove all he had alleged, and more: but that he could not appoint a time when he could be ready for a hearing, because many of his most important witnesses were beyond the seas, some at Paris, and others in other places; and that he must examine the duke of Ormond who was lieutenant in Ireland, and the earl of Lauderdale who was then in Scotland, and must desire commissioners to that purpose.'—But from that day he made no farther instance: and understanding that the king had given warrants to a serjeant at arms to apprehend him, he concealed himself in several places for the space of near two years; sending sometimes letters and petitions by his wife to the king, who would not receive them. But in the end his majesty was prevailed with by the lady and sir Harry Bennet to see him in private; but would not admit him to come to the court, nor repeal his warrants for his apprehension: so that he appeared not publicly till the Chancellor's misfortune; and then he came to the court and to the parliament in great triumph, and shewed a more impotent malice than was expected from his generosity and understanding." Life, p. 209.

in the name, of all the rest, delivered in this unanimous Answer following; viz. 1. "We conceive, That a Charge of High Treason cannot by the laws and statutes of this realm be originally exhibited by any one peer against another unto the house of peers; and that therefore the Charge of High Treason by the earl of Bristol against the lord chancellor hath not been regularly and legally brought in. 2. And if the matters alledged in the said Charge were admitted to be true (although alleged to be traiterously done), yet there is not any treason in it."

The King's Message thereon.] July 13. The Lord Chamberlain presented to the house the following Message for the king: "His majesty, having received from his house of peers a Copy of the Writing which the earl of Bristol had delivered in, containing Articles of supposed High Treason and other Misdemeanors against the Chancellor of England, doth give your lordships very many thanks for your great care and regard in transmitting the same to him; upon view of which, his majesty finds several matters of fact charged, which upon his own certain knowledge are untrue. And his majesty cannot but take notice of the many scandalous reflections in that Paper upon himself and his relations, which he looks upon as a libel against his person and government; for which, and other things, his majesty will in due time take such course against him as shall be agreeable to justice."

Resolutions of the Lords concerning the said Articles.] July 18. The lords resumed the debate, upon the above opinion of the Judges, and the question being put "whether this house doth concur with the opinion of the Judges herein;" it was resolved in the affirmative, nem. con*.

* "The earl of Bristol's friendship with Clarendon, which had subsisted with great intimacy during their exile and the distresses of the royal party, had been considerably impaired since the restoration, by the chancellor's refusing his assent to some grants, which Bristol had applied for to a court lady: and a little after, the latter nobleman, agreeably to the impetuosity and indiscretion of his temper, broke out against the minister in the most outrageous manner. He even entered a charge of treason against him before the house of peers; but had concerted his measures so imprudently, that the judges, when consulted, declared, that, neither for its matter nor its form, could the charge be legally received. The articles indeed resemble more the incoherent altercations of a passionate enemy, than a serious accusation, fit to be discussed by a court of judicature; and Bristol himself was so ashamed of his conduct and defeat, that he absconded during some time.—Notwithstanding his fine talents, his eloquence, his spirit, and his courage, he could never regain the character which he lost by this hasty and precipitate measure. But though Clarendon was Protest against the Bill for Encouragement of Trade.] July 21. A Bill entitled, 'An Act for the Encouragement of Trade,' being this day read the third time, and ready to be put to the question for passing into a law; it was moved, and granted by the house, that if the question passed in the affirmative, such peers as were against the Bill might enter their Protestation; and accordingly we whose names are subscribed do protest against the said Bill being made a law, for the reasons following: 1. Because, in the free liberty given for transporting of money and bullion, this Bill crosseth the wisdom and care of our ancestors in all ages, who by many laws and penalties, upon excellent and approved grounds, have restrained such exportation, and thereby preserved trade in a flourishing condition; 2. There appearing already great want of Money in his majesty's dominions, and almost all the gold of his majesty's stamp gone, notwithstanding the restraint made by law, and the importation of foreign commodities (which are grown to so great an esteem and use amongst us) being much greater than the export of our native and simple commodities, it must necessarily follow, by this free exportation, that our silver will also be carried away into foreign parts, and all trade fail for want of money, which is the measure of it. 3. It will make all our native commodities lie upon our hands, when, rather than stay for gross goods, which pay custom, the merchant, in a quarter of an hour, when his wind and tide serve, freights his ship with silver. 4. It trencheth highly upon the king's prerogative, he being by the law the only exchanger of money, and his interest equal to command that, as to command the Militia of the kingdom, which cannot subsist without it; and it is dangerous to the able to elude this rash assault, his credit at court was sensibly declining; and in proportion as the king found himself established on the throne, he began to alienate himself from a minister, whose character was so little suited to his own. Charles's favour for the catholics was always opposed by Clarendon, public liberty was secured against all attempts of the overzealous royalists, prodigal grants of the king were checked or refused, and the dignity of his own character was so much consulted by the chancellor, that he made it an inviolable rule, as did also his friend Southampton, never to enter into any connexion with the royal mistresses. The king's favourite was Mrs. Palmer, afterwards created duchess of Cleveland; a woman prodigal, rapacious, dissolute, violent, revengeful. She failed not in her turn to undermine Clarendon's credit with his master; and her success was at this time made apparent to the whole world. Secretary Nicholas, the chancellor's great friend, was removed from his place; and sir Harry Bennet, his avowed enemy, was advanced to that office. Bennet was soon after created lord Arlington." Hume.

peace of the kingdom, when it shall be in the power of half a dozen or half a score rich, discontented, or factious persons, to make a Bank of our coin and bullion beyond the seas for any mischief, and leave us in want of money; and it shall not be in the king's power to prevent it, the liberty being given by a law; nor to keep his mint going, because money will yield more from than at the Mint. 5. Because a law of so great change, and threatening so much danger, is made perpetual, and not probationary. 6. Because, in the restraint laid on Importation of Irish Cattle, common right and the subjects liberty is invaded; whilst they, being by law native Englishmen, are debarred the English markets, which seems also to monopolize the sale of cattle to some of his majesty's English subjects, to the destruction of others. 7. It will, we conceive, increase the king's charge of Ireland, by calling for revenue from England, if that, which is almost the only Trade of Ireland, shall be prohibited, as in effect it is; and so the people, we conceive, disabled to pay the king's dues, or grant subsidies in Ireland. 8. It threatens danger to the peace of the kingdom of Ireland, by universal poverty; which may have an unhappy influence upon the rest of his majesty's dominions. 9. The restraint upon Importation of Irish and Scotch cattle will, we conceive, be decay of two of his majesty's cities of England, Carlisle and Chester, make a dearth in London, and discommode many other parts of England. Other reasons are forborne, which time will produce. ANGLESEY."

A Bill for the better Observation of the Sabbath, lost off the Table of the House of Lords. July 27. The house being informed, by the clerk of the parliaments, That the Bill for the better Observation of the Lord's-Day hath been, during the sitting of the house, taken from the table, and is not now to be found, the lords thought fit, in a business of this high concernment (the libe being never known or heard of to have been done before), that every lord and assistant to this house should declare himself, whether he hath it or not, or can tell what is become of it. To that end, the clerk of the parliaments and the clerk assistant had their oaths given them; who, upon the said oath, did aver that the said Bill now missing was upon the table, in a bag, this morning, amongst the other bills which were to be presented to the king for his royal assent this day. And being commanded by the house to tell, 'Whether any lords were at the table, meddling with any of the said bills, this morning?' They did depose, 'That divers lords were at the table this morning, and did take the Bills out of the said bag, and scattered them upon the table; whereupon the clerk of the parliaments, taking the said bills into his custody, telling the number of them, found one to be wanting; and immediately examining the titles by the list, found the said Bill for the better Observation of the Lord's-day wanting.'—Upon this, every lord was called by name; and those present did make their purgation; and the assistants likewise did particularly clear themselves. But, in regard some lords were now absent who were present this morning, the house did order, That if any member or assistant of this house hath taken the said Bill away; and doth not bring it again time enough to have it pass the royal assent this day, this house will proceed against them severally for the same.

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the Prorogation.] This day the king came down to the house of peers, and gave command to the gentleman usher of the Black rod, to signify his pleasure to the house of commons, That they should presently come up, with their Speaker, to attend his majesty. Who accordingly being come, the Speaker made this Speech following:

"May it please your most Excellent Majesty; The knights, citizens, and burghesses of the commons house of parliament, have, since their last meeting, in many weighty and arduous affairs, presented your mejeesty with their humble advice, which, with all thankfulness they acknowledge, never wanted a most gracious reception. Never any prince did so freely commune with his people; and never any people did with more joy and duty commemorate their happiness.—The last session of parliament, our care was chiefly to secure the being of this nation under our ancient, happy monarchical government. This session, we have endeavoured to advance the peace and well-being both of Church and State.—Material structures are best secured by deep foundations in the earth; but the foundations of true happiness are from above. We have therefore, in the first place, perused the laws which do enjoin the Observation of the Lord's-day; and where we found any defect, either in rules or penalties, we have with great care supplied them; well knowing that he who doth not remember on the first day of the week to observe a Christian Sabbath, will hazard before the week comes round to forget he is a Christian.—We read in the story of Lewis the 9th of France, when he took his voyage into the Eastern empire to assist the distressed Christians, the fame of his holiness moved the king of Tartary to send his ambassadors, to offer him friendship, and to acquaint him he had a desire to become a Christian; whereupon Lewis sent him preachers, to instruct him in the Christian religion. But the Tartarians observing the lives of the Christians were not answerable to their profession, they returned with the shame of their own ill lives upon them, whose doctrines were so famous.—That which in those days was the reproach of those Christians, is much more at this day the shame of this nation; we know more, but practice less, than they did: we generally love a sceptical rather than a practical religion; and are contended to spend that time in study of curious deceitful notions, which ought to be employed in the practice of known truths. Too many amongst us are of the sect of the gnostics, hunting after novelties and phantasms, till variety of notions makes them mad. Hence do arise all those sects and schisms in the Church, which, being nursed up in pride, refuse to conform to any laws, and make religion itself the cloak of all their separations; whereas true religion is the band of society, the sinews that hold fast the joints of the body politic. If these be broken, the body must be dismembered; if they be but sprained, the whole body is in pain, and the members made unuseful.—At the opening of this session, your majesty was most graciously pleased to call upon us to prepare some laws for the prevention of the Growth of Popery; and we have heartily laboured therein, both to prevent the Growth of Popery and all sorts of Sectaries and Non-Conformists. But, as the rankest corn and the fullest ears are aptest to be laid, so fares it in this matter: these fruits are not yet ready for the harvest. But we are confident, by the wisdom of your majesty's government, and the readiness of your faithful subjects to support it by the just and due execution of the laws (especially if such persons be intrusted with the execution of the laws as do love them), these persons will either be persuaded to conformity, or forced into a peaceably and orderly conversation.—To this purpose, I am commanded, by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, humbly in their name to beseech your majesty, that you will be pleased to issue out your Proclamation, for the putting those laws which now are in force, against the Popish Recusants, Sectaries, and Non-conformists, in effectual execution.—I am likewise commanded to desire your majesty, that you will be pleased to issue out another Proclamation, for the Prevention of that Prophaneness, Debauchery, and Licentiousness, which, to the high displeasure of Almighty God, the dishonour of your majesty's government, and the grief of all good men, is now practised amongst us: and, for the better securing the peace of the nation against the united counsels of all the Dissenters to our Religion and established discipline, we have prepared an additional Bill for the ordering the Forces of the kingdom, whereby your majesty's lieutenants and their deputy lieutenants will be enabled to train, discipline, and keep together, such a party as will be able to prevent disorders, and sufficient to check any insurrections, till the great body of the Militia can come in to their assistance.—During the late unhappy wars in this nation, our neighbours eyes were open, to spy out all advantages of spoiling our Trade, and to advance their own; but, by the several good bills made ready for your majesty's royal assent, we hope, we shall restore and increase the flourishing Trade of this nation.—Great Sir, I have but one word more; and that is by command from your majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects the commons of England. They have duly considered the present unsettled condition of this nation, and the great expence which must attend such distractions; and do humbly beseech your majesty to accept an Aid from them, consisting of four entire Subsidies; two of which are to be paid by the 1st of Nov. next, and the other two by the 1st of May next following."

"My lords and gentlemen; I thank you for the present you have made me this day; and I hope your countries will thank you when you come home for having done it. I am not conscious of having brought the streights and necessities I am in upon myself, by any improvidence or ill husbandry of my own: I know the contrary; and, I assure you, I would not have desired or received the Supply you have now given me, if it were not absolutely necessary for your peace and quiet as well as mine. And, I must tell you, it will do me very little good, if I do not improve it by very good husbandry of my own, and by retrenching those very expences which in many respects may be thought necessary enough. But you shall see, I will much rather impose upon myself than upon my subjects; and if all men will follow my example in retrenching their expences, which (it may be) they may do with much more convenience than I can do mine, the kingdom will in a very short time gain what you have given me this day.—I am very glad you are now going into your several countries, where your presence will do much good? and I hope your vigilance and authority will prevent those disturbances which the restless spirits of ill and unquiet men will be always contriving, and of which, I do assure you, they promise themselves some effects this summer.—There have been more pains and unusual ways taken to kindle the old fatal fears and jealousies than I thought I should ever have lived to have seen, at least to have seen so countenanced.—I do desire you and conjure you, my lords and gentlemen, to watch this evil spirit and temper with your utmost care and prudence, and secure the persons of those whom you find are possessed with it, that the peace of the kingdom be not sacrificed to their pride, humour and madness.—I did expect to have had some Bills presented to me against the several Distempers in Religion, against seditious Conventicles, and against the Growth of Popery: but, it may be, you have been in some fear of reconciling those contradictions in religion, in some conspiracy against the public peace, to which, I doubt, men of the most contrary motives in conscience are inclinable enough, I do promise you to lay this business, and the mischiefs which may flow from the licenses, to heart. And if I live to meet with you again, as I hope I shall, I will myself take care to present two Bills to you to that end. And, as I have already given it in charge to the Judges, in their several circuits, to use their utmost endeavours to prevent and punish the scandalous and seditious Meetings of Sectaries, and to convict the Papists; so I will be as watchful, and take all the pains I can, that neither the one or the other shall disturb the peace of the kingdom.—I shall not need to desire you to use all diligence in levying and collecting the Subsidies you have given me; and heartily wish the distribution may be made with all equality and justice, and without any animosity or faction, or remembering any thing that hath been done in the late ill times, which, you know, we are all obliged to forget, as well as to forgive. And indeed, till we have done so, we can never be in perfect peace; and therefore I can never put you too much in mind of it.—I think it necessary to make this a session, that so the current of justice may run the two next terms without any obstruction by privilege of parliament; and therefore I shall prorogue you till the 16th day of March, when I doubt not; by God's blessing, we shall meet again to our joint satisfaction, and that you shall have cause to thank me for what I do in the interval."

His majesty, having ended his aforesaid Speech, called unto him the Lord Privy Seal, who was Speaker this day, and gave him directions what to say further; who returning to his place pronounced these words: "My lords and gentlemen; The king doth prorogue this parliament until the 16th day of March next. And accordingly this parliament is prorogued until the 16th day March next, 1663."

THIRD SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session. March 16, 1663-4. This day both houses met, and on the 21st, the king opened the Session with a Speech from the throne, as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; You see, God be thanked, you have met together again at the time appointed: and I do assure you, I have been so far from ever intending it should be otherwise, that I do not know one person who ever wished it should be otherwise. Think, therefore, I pray, what good meaning those men could have, who, from the time of the prorogation to the day of your meeting, have continually whispered, and industriously infused into the minds of the people, that the parliament should meet no more; that it should be presently dissolved; or so continued by prorogation, that they should be kept without a parliament. I pray, watch these whisperers all you can, as men who use their utmost endeavours to sow jealousies between you and me. And I do promise you, they shall not prevail with me; and I do promise myself, they shall not prevail with you. And the truth is, we are both concerned they should not; and we shall then, with God's blessing, prevent all the mischief they intend.—You may judge by the late Treason in the North, for which so many men have been executed, how active the spirits of many of our old enemies still are, notwithstanding all our mercy. I do assure you, we are not yet at the bottom of that business. This much appears manifestly, that this conspiracy was but a branch of that which I discovered as well as I could to you about two years since, and had been then executed nearer-hand, if I had not, by God's goodness, come to the knowledge of some of the principal contrivers, and so secured them from doing the mischief they intended. And if I had not by the like providence, had timely notice of the very hour and several places of their rendezvous in the North, and provided for them accordingly, by sending some of my own troops, as well as by drawing the trained bands together, their conjunction would have been in greater numbers than had been convenient.—You will wonder, but I tell true, they are now even in those parts, and at this time, when they see their friends under trial and execution, still pursuing the same consultations. And it is evident they have correspondence with desperate persons in most counties, and a standing council in this town, from which they receive their directions, and by whom they were advised to defer their last intended insurrection; but those orders served only to distract them, and came too late to prevent their destruction. I know more of their intrigues than they think I do, and hope I shall shortly discover the bottom; in the mean time, I pray, let us all be as watchful to prevent, as they are to contrive, their mischief.—I cannot omit, upon this occasion, to tell you, that these desperate men in their counsels (as appears by several examinations) have not been all of one mind in the ways of carrying on their wicked resolutions. Some would still insist upon the authority of the Long Parliament, of which, they say, they have members enough willing to meet; others have fancied to themselves, by some computation of their own upon some clause in the Triennial Bill, that this present parliament was at an end some months since; and that, for want of new writs, they may assemble themselves and choose members of parliament; and that this is the best expedient to bring themselves together for their other purposes.—For the Long Parliament, you and I can do no more than we have done, to inform and compose the minds of all men. Let them proceed upon their peril. But methinks there is nothing done to disabuse them in respect of the Triennial Bill. I confess to you my lords and gentlemen, I have often myself read over that bill: and though there is no colour for the fancy of the determination of this parliament, yet I will not deny to you, that I have always expected that you would, and even wondered that you have not considered the wonderful clauses in that bill, which passed in a time very uncaredful for the dignity of the crown, or the security of the people.—I pray, Mr. Speaker, and you gentlemen of the house of commons, give that Triennial Bill once a reading in your house; and then, in God's name, do what you think fit for me, and yourselves and the whole kingdom. I need not tell you how much I love parliaments. Never king was so much beholden to parliaments as I have been; nor do I think the crown can ever be happy without frequent parliaments. But, assure yourselves, if I should think otherwise, I would never suffer a parliament to come together by the means prescribed by that Bill.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I must renew my thanks to you, for the free Supply you gave me this last session, of 4 subsidies: yet I cannot but tell you, that that supply is fallen much short of what I expected, or you intended. It will hardly be believed, yet you know it to be true, that very many persons, who have estates of 3 or 4000*l.* a year, do not pay for those 4 subsidies 16*l.* so that, whereas you intended and declared that they should be collected according to former precedents, they do not now arise to half the proportion they did in the time of queen Elizabeth; and yet sure the crown wants more now than it did then, and the subject is at least as well able to give.—The truth is, by the license of the late ill time, and ill-humour of this, too many of the people, and even of those who make fair professions, believe it to be no sin to defraud the crown of any thing that is due to it. You no sooner give me Tonnage and Poundage, than men are devising all the ways they can to steal custom; nor can the farmers be so vigilant for the collection, as others are to steal the duties.—You give me the Excise, which all people abroad believe to be the most insensible imposition that can be laid upon a people. What conspiracies and combinations are entered into against it by the brewers, who, I am sure, bear not that burden themselves, even to bring that revenue to nothing, you will hear in Westminster hall.—You have given me the chimney-money, which you have reason to believe is a growing revenue, for men build at least fast enough; and you will therefore wonder that it is already declined, and that this half year brings in less than the former did. I pray, therefore, review that bill; and since I am sure you would have me receive whatsoever you give, let me have the collecting and husbanding of it by my own officers; and then I doubt not but to improve that receipt, and will be cozened of as little as I can.—I will conclude with desiring and conjuring you, my lords and gentlemen, to keep a very good correspondence together, that it may not be in the power of any seditious or factious spirits to make you jealous of me, till you see me pretend one thing and do another, which I am sure you never have yet done. Trust me, it shall be in nobody's power to make me jealous of you.—I pray, contrive any good short bills which may improve the industry of the nation. And, since the season of the year will invite us all shortly to take the country air, I desire you would be ready for a session within two months or thereabouts; and we will meet next earlier in the year. And so God bless your councils."

The King's Speech upon repealing the Triennial Act.] April 5. In compliance with these instructions from the throne, the house immediately set about repealing the obnoxious Triennial Bill, which they stigmatized as derogatory to the prerogative of the crown, and, as a short compensation, prepared another short one, which provided that parliaments should not be intermitted above three years. This was no sooner ready, than his majesty went to the house on purpose to give the royal assent to it: which he accompanied with the ensuing Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; You will easily believe that I have come very willing to give my assent to this bill. I do thank you very heartily for your so unanimous concurrence in it, and for your desiring me speedily to finish it. And if I understand any thing that concerns the peace and security of the kingdom, and the welfare of my subjects (all which I study more than my prerogative, and indeed I consider my prerogative in order only to preserving the other) every good Englishman will thank you for it: for the Act you have repealed could only serve to discredit parliaments, and to make the crown jealous of parliaments, and parliaments of the crown, and persuade neighbour princes that England was not governed under a monarch. It could never have been the occasion of frequent parliaments. I do promise you, I will not be an hour the less without one for this act of repeal, nor I am sure will you be the less kind to me in parliament. I do again thank you for your excellent temper and respect to me, and desire you so to proceed, that the session may be within the time I proposed to you last. And I do assure you upon my word, and I pray believe me, that I will have no other thoughts or designs in my heart, but to make you all happy in the support of the religion and laws established: and if my own wants and necessities are at any time grievous to me, it is only as I apprehend I may not be able sufficiently to provide for those, and for the peace and security of the kingdom. And therefore I am confident, that you and I, who agree in the end, shall never differ in the way."

Resolution of both Houses against the Dutch.] April 22. The following Resolution passed both houses, viz. "That the wrongs, dishonours, and indignities done to his majesty by the subjects of the United Provinces, by invading his rights in India, Africa, and elsewhere; and the damages, affronts, and injuries done by them to our merchants, are the greatest obstructions of our foreign Trade: and that the same be humbly and speedily presented to his majesty: and that he be most humbly moved to take some speedy and effectual course for redress thereof, and all other of the like nature, and for prevention of the like in future: and in prosecution thereof, they will, with their lives and fortunes, assist his majesty against all oppositions whatsoever."

The King's Answer thereto.] April 27. Upon this occasion both houses waited upon his majesty at the Banqueting-House, and the next day received the following Answer in writing:

"His majesty, having considered the Address made to him by his two houses of parliament, is very well pleased with the great zeal they have expressed for the advancement of the Trade of this kingdom, and removing all obstructions which may hinder the same; being wholly convinced, that it is that which contributes most to the honour and glory of the nation, and the prosperity of his people: and therefore his majesty will examine and peruse the particular Complaints which have been represented to his parliament; and thereupon, according to their advice, appoint his minister at the Hague to demand speedy justice and reparation from the States-General, and also use his utmost endeavours to secure his subjects from the like violences for the future: in the prosecution of which, or upon the denials of justice, he depends upon the promises of both houses to stand by him, and returns them his hearty thanks for their frank declaration therein."

Mr. Prynne censured for altering the Draught of a Bill.] May 13. Mr. Prynne, having taken the liberty to alter the draught of a Bill relating to Public-Houses, having urged in his excuse, 'That he did not do it out of any ill intent, but to rectify some matters mistaken in it, and to make the Bill agree with the sense of the house;' the house ordered him to withdraw, and after debate, being again called in, the Speaker acquainted him, 'That the house was very sensible of this great mistake in so ancient and knowing a member as he was, to break so material and essential an order of the house, as to alter, amend, or interline a bill after commitment: but the house had considered of his Answer and Submission, and were content at this time, in respect thereof, to remit the offence.'

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the Prorogation.] May 17. The business of the Session being now brought to a period, the king came to the house of peers, and being seated on the throne, the Speaker made the following Speech to his majesty:

"May it please your most exc. majesty; At the opening this session, your maj. was pleased to recommend several things to the care of your two houses of parliament; the which we have deliberately considered, and unanimously presented our humble advice thereupon.—The first thing we took into consideration was, the Act made in the 16th year of the late king of glorious memory, for Triennial Parliaments: when we had given it a reading, we found it derogatory to the essential prerogative of the crown, of calling, holding, and dissolving parliaments; we found it unpracticable, and only useful to learn the people how to rebel: therefore we melted it down, extracted the pure metal from counterfeit and drossy alloys, and then presented it to your majesty, to be new stamped, and made current coin, for the use of the nation. We do return our most humble thanks to your maj. that you were pleased to accept our advice, and to pass our Bill; but more especially for those gracious expressions your maj. was pleased to use at that solemnity, whereby we are assured, not only of your personal affection to parliaments, but of your judgment also, that the happiness of the crown consists in the frequency of parliaments.—In the next place, we reviewed the Act for Chimney-money, which we intended a great branch of your majesty's Revenue, although by some mistakes it is fallen short; and, in hopes your maj. may improve that receipt, we have prepared a Bill for the collecting that duty by such officers as your maj. and your successors shall from time to time think fit to appoint.—Whilst we were intent upon these weighty affairs, we were often interrupted by petitions, and letters, and motions, representing the unsettled condition of some countries, by reason of Fanatics, Sectaries, and Non-conformists. They differ in their shapes and species, and accordingly are more or less dangerous: but in this they all agree, they are no friends to the established government either in Church or State; and if the old rule hold true, 'Qui Ecclesie contradicit non est pacificus,' we have great reason to prevent their growth, and to punish their practice. To this purpose, we have prepared a Bill against their frequenting of Conventicles, the seed-plots and nurseries of their opinions, under pretence of religious worship. The first offence we have made punishable only with a small fine of 5*l.* or three months imprisonment, and 10*l.* for a peer. The second offence with 10*l.* or 6 months imprisonment, and 20*l.* for a peer. But for the third offence, after a trial by a jury at the general quarter sessions or assizes, and the trial of a peer by his peers, the party convicted shall be transported to some of your majesty's foreign plantations, unless he redeem himself by laying down 100*l.*: 'Immedicabile vulnus esse rescindendum, ne pars sincera trahatur.'—We have had much thought how to improve the industry of the nation, and prevent that idleness and licentiousness which too fast grows upon us, especially by excessive and disorderly Gaming. Men are not contented to sport away their precious time, and play away their ready money; but to lose or pawn their houses and lands, their manors, and their honours also. For the prevention of the growth of this disease, we have prepared a bill, to make all Securities for Money won at play, whether real or personal, to be void.—We have examined also the reasons of the Decay of Trade. In the first place, we found our merchants are undermined by fraud and practice, and sometimes beaten out, in the East and West Indies, in Turkey and in Africa, by our neighbours the Dutch, who, besides the unsufferable indignities offered to your royal maj. have in a few years spoiled your subjects to the value of 7 or 800,000*l.*: for remedy whereof, we have made our humble Address to your majesty, and received a gracious Answer; and have no cause to fear but a short time will produce a just and honourable satisfaction.—The next Obstruction to our Trade hath been, a base and dangerous practice of some seamen, who are willing to be robbed by pirates, that they may share in the prize. We have therefore prepared a bill for the punishment of such treacherous actions, and for the just reward of those honest seamen that shall preserve their owners goods, and manfully maintain the honour of our English nation.—Some other discoveries we have made, which may be the subject matter of future bills; but, in respect of your majesty's intimation of a short session, we were not willing to attempt more than we could reasonably dispatch.—And now, great sir, give me leave with joy to remember that unparalleled unanimity that hath this session attended our counsels. Our constancy and resolution hath been tried beyond the precedent of former parliaments, or any other session of this parliament.—The heathens were wont to observe, and envy the Christians, for their unity and love of one another: 'Ecce ut invicem se diligunt Christiani!' and may this happy correspondence between your royal majesty and your two houses of parliament increase, and grow to be the envy of the world, till all your majesty's enemies are forced to cry, 'Ecce ut invicem se diligunt Auglicani!'

After passing the said Bills, the king made the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I did desire and conjure you, at the opening of this session, that you would keep a very good correspondence together, that it might not be in the power of any seditious or factious spirits to make you jealous of each other, or either of you jealous of me; and I desired you to be ready for a session within two months or thereabouts. I must confess to you, you have complied very fully with me, for which I can never thank you enough: you have performed those good respects towards me, and kept so very good correspondence towards each other, that you have exceedingly disappointed those ill men, who both at home and abroad had raised great hopes and expectation of new troubles and confusions; you have gratified me in all I desired, and are now ready for a session within the time proposed. This harmony will (with God's blessing) make us all esteemed abroad, and secure at home; and these obligations cannot but make me think the time long till we meet again. The season of the year and your own affairs will invite you into the country; and your presence there is of great importance to my service, and to the public peace. You will watch those unquiet spirits, which are still lurking and ready to embrace all opportunities to involve the nation in new distractions, under what specious pretences soever; and you will carefully inform the people, how much it is in their own power to be as happy as they can wish to be: indeed, if they are truly sensible of their present happiness, it will quickly be improved. I will add no more, but that I thank you all and every one of you; and if God bless us till Nov. we will meet here again: I name Nov. to you, because, if nothing extraordinary fall out, I resolve not to meet till then: but, because somewhat extraordinary may fall out, you shall be at present prorogued but till August; and before that day you shall have reasonable notice, by proclamation, not to give your attendance, except there be occasion; and then Nov. will be the time."

FOURTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech at the opening of the Session.] Nov. 24. This day the parliament met, and the session was opened by his majesty, in a Speech from the throne, as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; When we parted last in this place, I told you that I did not think we should meet here again till Nov. though I prorogued you but to a day in August. But I must now tell you, that if I could have suspected, or reasonably have imagined, that our neighbours would have dealt so unneighbourly with me, and have forced me to make such preparations as they have done for my defence, at so vast an expence; I say, if I could have foreseen in Aug. that they would have treated me thus, I should not have prevented your coming together then. Yet truly I have reason even to be glad that it hath been deferred thus long. You have had leisure to attend your own conveniencies in the country, and the public service there; and I have been able to let our neighbours see, that I can defend myself and my subjects, against their insolence, upon the stock of my own credit and reputation; and that, when I find it necessary for the good of my people, I can set out a fleet to sea, which will not decline meeting with all their naval power, even before the parliament comes together; which, I am persuaded, if they had believed possible, they would not so importunately have pressed me to it. I will not deny to you, I have done more than I thought I could have done; which I impute to the credit your vote gave me, and to the opinion all men have, that I did what you wished I should do. By borrowing very liberally from myself out of my own stores, and by the kind and cheerful assistance the city of London hath given me, I have a fleet now at sea worthy of the English nation, and (to say no more) not inferior to any that hath been set out in any age, and which (that I may use all freedom with you) to discharge to-morrow, and replenish all my stores, I am persuaded, would cost me little less than 800,000*l.*—What hath passed between me and the Dutch; and by what degrees, accidents, and provocations, I have been necessitated to the preparation and expence I have made, you shall be told when I have done. I shall only tell you, that if I had proceeded more slowly, I should have exposed my own honour and the honour of the nation, and should have seemed not confident of your affections, and the assurance you gave me to stand by me in this occasion.—That which I am now very earnestly to desire, and indeed expect from you, is, that you will use all possible expedition in your resolutions; lest that, by unnecessary formalities, the world should think that I have not your full concurrence in what is done, and that you are not forward enough in the support of it; which I am sure you will be, and that, in raising the Supplies, you take such sure order, that when the expence is obvious and certain, the Supplies be as real and substantial, not imaginary as the last Subsidies were, which you all well enough understand.—Master Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I know not whether it be worth my pains to endeavour to remove a vile jealousy, which some ill men scatter abroad, and which I am sure will never sink into the breast of any man who is worthy to sit upon your benches, that, when you have given me a noble and proportionable Supply for the support of a war, I may be induced by some evil counsellors (for they will be thought to think very respectfully of my own person) to make a sudden peace, and get all that money for my own private occasions. I am sure, you all think it an unworthy jealousy, and not to deserve an answer. I would not be thought to have so brutish an inclination, as to love war for war-sake. God knows, I desire no blessing in this world so much, as that I may live to see a firm peace between all Christian princes and states: but let me tell you, and you may be most confident of it, that when I am compelled to enter into a war, for the protection, honour, and benefit of my subjects, I will (God willing) not make a peace but upon the obtaining and securing those ends for which the war is entered into; and when that can be done, no good man will be sorry for the determination of it.—To conclude: my lords and gentlemen, I conjure you all, in your several stations, to use all possible expedition, that our friends and our enemies may see that I am possessed of your hearts, and that we move with one soul; and I am sure you will not deceive my expectation.”

A BRIEF NARRATIVE of the late Passages between His Majesty and the Dutch, and His Majesty's Preparations thereupon.

“C. R. His maj. doth not doubt but that his two houses of parliament do well remember the Address they made to his maj. about the end of April last, upon the general representations which had been made to them of the great injuries and oppressions the subjects of this nation sustained in the East and West Indies, and in other places, from the Dutch, and the universal obstruction they brought upon the Trade of this kingdom; and the warm and vigorous Vote they then presented his maj. with, if he could not otherwise remove that mischief. The Answer they received from his maj. was so full of candour, as if he thought his good allies the States General would never put him to use extreme remedies, but would meet the complaints of his subjects with just and proportionable satisfaction; and that he did really believe, as well as wish, that they would do so, is manifest, by his having provided for that season a much less guard of ships than he had set out ever since his happy restoration, intending, by the saving that unnecessary expence (as he then thought) to have plentifully supplied his magazines and stores, which is a treasure he hath always laboured to have still in readiness by him.—His maj. took this occasion to require his minister at the Hague to press the States General very earnestly for expedition in doing that justice, which for above a year he had in vain pressed them to do, and in which, he told them, the oppressions his subjects underwent could not bear longer delay. Instead of returning any Answer to his maj. which for some months they deferred to do, they with great passion and noise sent orders to their several admiralties, to prepare and equip a great number of ships of war, the number whereof they increased every 10 or 12 days; with unusual orders, that no time should be lost in making the preparations, but that they should work night and day, as well the Sundays as the other part of the week; and great numbers of landmen were likewise appointed to be raised for their expedition.—This strange kind of treatment, together with many rude pamphlets and insolent expressions, which can hardly be prevented in popular governments, prevailed with his maj. (although he yet believed himself secure in the wisdom of the States General against any rash attempt in the violation of the peace) to take speedy course for the putting 10 or 12 ships into a readiness (which yet he meant should be no further than rigging), if they should pursue their present distempers.—In August, they received news that capt. Holmes, who, with one of his majesty's ships, had convoyed some merchants of the royal company to the coast of Guiney, had by assault taken and possessed himself of a fort near Cape de Verte, belonging to their West Indian Company; whereupon the States General sent a wonderful brisk Message to the king, at once complaining of the injury, and requiring, in very peremptory terms, that his majesty would forthwith give order for the re-delivery of the said forts to them. The king assured the ambassador, upon his princely word, ‘That he had given no commission or order to capt. Holmes for that purpose, nor did know upon what grounds he had proceeded to that act of hostility; that he expected him shortly at home; and that he would then proceed in a very strict examination of his proceedings, and would cause exemplary justice to be done, as well in the re-delivering the fort, as in punishing the person if his carriage and demeanor deserved it.' This Answer had no better luck than the former Message: new orders for more ships, for raising of money, for raising of men, publishing in their prints, that what was done by capt. Holmes was by his majesty's warrant and authority; and within a very short time after they had the confidence to demand of his maj. in express terms, that he would give it under his royal hand to them, that he would cause the fort to be delivered within such a time.—His maj. did not yet, after all these provocations, lay aside all hope of awakening the States General to a more temperate consideration of what had passed. He desired them, in an Answer which he made to some of their propositions, and which he transmitted to them under his own hand by their ambassador, to reflect a little upon the method of their proceeding with him, and the course he had observed towards them: not to mention those loud affronts, indignities, and injuries, he had put into oblivion in his late Treaty with them, he put them in mind that, since that treaty, he had given them redress upon their complaints, in many particular cases, with that expedition, that he had not put them to the formalities even of courts of justice; that, instead of any return in this kind from them, his minister at the Hague had importuned these 18 months for about 20 ships taken from his subjects upon the coast of Guinea, and very great affronts and damages sustained by others in the East Indies, without any other shadow of right, but being the stronger, and able to oppress. And yet, since the Treaty required such formalities in the demand of reparations, how slow soever their justice was, he had thus long forborne to be his own carver. He wished them to consider, whether their order of proceeding towards them had been pursuant to the Treaty, or agreeable to the respect that was due to him: that, upon the first information of an act of violence committed by the captain of one of his ships upon their subjects, disowned and disavowed by his maj. himself, and justice and reparation being promised, they have upon the point declared war against his maj. in resolving to recover by force of arms what they could not expect by the course of justice. He conjured the States General to remember the obligations of their own sovereignty, by which they entered into alliances with their neighbour princes: that, if they suffered their particular societies of merchants to involve them in a war with their neighbour nations for their particular interest and benefit, and to support their furious and extravagant assuming a dominion against the law of nations, (putting them in mind, of what he had often demanded justice for, of the Declarations published by their commanders both in the East and West Indies, interdicting all trade and commerce to all other nations, to the natives of those countries, because they call them their subjects,) they would make themselves insupportable to their neighbours, and their friendship inconsistent with the liberty of all the world but themselves.—And, upon this occasion, his maj. thinks fit that his two houses of parliament should know the very compendious way these States have found out to make themselves monarchs of the sole trade of the whole East and West Indies. They have, it is very true, by their very commendable industry, and by other acts of horrible injustice and cruelty, planted themselves in stronger factories than any prince in Europe hath done, especially in the East Indies, where their naval power is very great. When they find the natives inclined to traffic with other nations, as they do generally desire to do, being in truth universally weary of the yoke the Dutch lay upon them, some Dutch ships are sent to lie before those ports, and then declare that they are in war with this or that prince or that city, and thereupon inhibit all other nations to have any traffic or commerce with them; and, by this new reason of state, they inhibited and restrained the English ships, under the command of the earl of Marlborough, 2 years since, to go to Porcatt, and to take in a great cargason of goods provided there by the East Indian company here, and forced his majesty's ships to return empty home: and being exalted with this success in the East, they have published the same Declaration in the West Indies, and not only hindered the English boats and other vessels from going on shore to traffic with the natives, but have very frankly sent to some of the factories, requiring them to remove from the places they are in, because they are resolved they shall not live so near them: and, after all this, to shew how good neighbours they would be at any distance, they hired the king of Fantine, at the price of a great sum of money, arms and ammunition, to surprize his majesty's fort at Cormantine, which he endeavoured to do, by two strong assaults; but, being driven off with loss, he confessed, with sorrow and shame for his own infidelity, being in terms of friendship with the English, that he had been corrupted by the Dutch to that undertaking: his majesty's garrison having had the good fortune to surprize a good part of the arms, ammunition, and grenades, which the Dutch sent to the natives. When the king complained to them of this infamous and treacherous proceeding of their chief officers in those parts, of which he hath as full evidence as he can have that there are English and Dutch ships on that coast, or that he hath a Fort called Cormantine, they do assure him, 'That his maj. is misinformed, and desire him not to give any credit to it; for that they have received letters from their commanders there, which mention no such thing, and which informs them that the king of Fantine had taken a particular exception to the English governor;' taking no notice that the king had likewise charged them, that their ships came at the same time, and lay before the Fort, kept several of the English vessels and boats from landing, and took the boats, and kept the men prisoners, till they found the enterprize had miscarried.—To conclude: his maj. used all the arguments he could, to decline these hostile preparations, and to betake themselves to those ways for the preservation of the public peace as were prescribed by the Treaty; assuring them, that as he expected reparation for the damages his subjects had sustained, and security for the future against the like excesses, so he was as ready to give them all the satisfaction for any injuries done to them, which justice could require.—The Answer they gave his maj. to his expostulation for their so sudden giving direction for the provision of so many ships of war, only upon his demanding justice for injuries done, and damages sustained, ought to be made known to you. They answered, 'It was easy to judge how much they were troubled and surprized by the tricks and devices of those that forestalled the parliament of England, and had obliged them by evil informations to carry such sharp complaints against them and their country to his maj.; and therefore it was not strange that, in the utmost quietness and disturbance which the animosity of the parliament did give them, they had prepared an extraordinary equipage, to be upon their guard.'—When the king found that his moderate way of proceeding was so far from abating any of their preparation, that it did but render them the more confident and exalted; and the ambassador himself had told his majesty, 'That they had given instructions to the admiral of their fleet, that was then going for Guiney, to take their Fort near Cape de Verte by force, and to take any English which had had a hand in doing them injury;' his maj. gave speedy directions for the setting out those ships to sea, towards which he had before only made some light preparations; and declared that he would send his cousin prince Rupert admiral of that fleet, to protect his subjects upon the coast of Guiney. This was no sooner known and published amongst them, than in truth their choler somewhat seemed abated, though their preparations were not diminished: and they then sent, 'That they had a wonderful desire to preserve the peace between the two nations, and to prevent the effusion of Christian blood, which would probably happen, if, in a conjuncture of so much jealousy, two such fleets as were new prepared for Guiney should meet in those seas;' and thereupon proposed, that the fleets on either side might be detained within the harbours, and not suffered to put to sea; and that some expedients might be found out by Treaty for each other's satisfaction, they having, at the same time when they made this plausible overture, sent orders to their fleet in the Streights, under the command of De Ruyter, to make all possible haste to Guiney, to execute all those instructions which they had given to their fleet here, which they seemed to be contented, upon those motives of charity, should remain in their ports; and it is now about 2 months since De Ruyter left the Streights upon that expedition, since which time they have done all within their power to make their other fleets ready to convoy each other through the Channel, and which, by the blessing of God, in the cross winds, they have been hitherto restrained from doing; and now his maj. is very willing they should attempt it.—It is a very unpleasant circumstance to his maj. in these proceedings, to find that it hath been in the power of the Dutch West Indian Company to involve their own and this country in a war, without the consent or privity of the States General, whose alone security his maj. hath for the preservation of the peace between the two nations. And his maj. is well assured, that the States General have given no order for this expedition of De Ruyter, though their subjects in general are like to be sufferers in the war thus made by them; for it cannot be imagined but that his maj. will take all the ways he can, that he may have wherewithal in his hands to satisfy his good subjects for the damages he expects to hear, after this denunciation of a war, they have sustained by De Ruyter on the coast of Guiney and other places; and another damage and indignity which, there is too much cause to fear, we shall shortly hear of concerning Polaroon; for, though his maj. cannot expressly say that the delivery of it up is denied to that ship which is gone to receive it, yet, by the carriage of the governor of Batavia to that ship and the officers thereof in its passage to Polaroon, and upon the discourse of that subject, there is too great a presumption that it is not yet delivered up, and in truth that the East India Company in Holland never intended it should be. The States General having likewise begun, without colour of right, by an embargo of ships bound for this kingdom, and driven into their ports by the foulness of the weather, as particularly a Swedish ship laden with masts and cordage bound for London, upon the account of several English merchants here.—This being the true state of what hath passed in this affair; and his maj. having been, by these furious proceedings, and, in truth, denunciation of a war against him, forced to put himself into the posture he is now in, for the defence of his subjects, at so vast an expence, doth not in the least degree doubt but that his two houses of parliament will cheerfully enable him to prosecute the war with the same vigour he hath prepared for it, by giving him Supplies proportionable to the charge thereof. C. R."

Thanks to the King for making Preparations against the Dutch.] Nov. 25. Both houses came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That the humble Thanks of both houses be presented to his majesty for his most gracious Speech and Narrative, to his two houses of parliament, and his great care of the preservation of the honour and safety, and trade of the nation, by his Preparations for the defence thereof against the Dutch; and that his maj. would give leave that his speech may be printed: 2. That the Thanks of both houses be given to the city of London for their forwardness in assisting his majesty; and in particular by furnishing him with several great sums of money towards his Preparations for the honour, safety, and trade of this nation."

Lord Clarendon's Account of a Meeting of some Lords and principal Commons, to concert Measures to dispose Parliament to grant a Supply for a Dutch War.] The following curious Account of what took place at a meeting of some lords and principal commons, to concert measures to dispose parliament to grant a Supply for the carrying on of a Dutch war, is given by the then lord chancellor Clarendon: "The parliament still promised fairly, and entered upon consultation how and what money to raise. And now the king commanded the chancellor and the treasurer to meet with those members of the house of commons, with whom they had used to consult, and to whom the king had joined others upon whom he was told he might more depend, and to adjust together what sum should be proposed, and how and in what manner to propose and conduct it. The meeting of those persons the king appointed was at Worcester-house, where the chancellor and treasurer (who were known to be averse from the war) told the rest, 'that there was no more debate now to be, war or no war: it was come upon us, and we were now only to contrive the best way of carrying it on with success; which could only be done by raising a great present sum of money, that the enemy might see that we were prepared to continue it as well as to begin.' They who were most desirous of the war, as sir Harry Bennet and Mr. Coventry (who were in truth the men who brought it upon the nation), with their friends, were of the opinion, 'that there should not be a great sum demanded at present, but only so much as might carry out the fleet in the spring, and that sufficient provisions might be made for the summer service: and then, when the war was once thoroughly entered into, another and a better Supply might be gotten about Michaelmas, when there was reason to hope, that some good success would dispose all men to a frank prosecution of the war.' Whereas these gentlemen had hitherto inflamed the king with an assurance, 'that he could not ask more money of the parliament than they would readily give him, if he would be engaged in this war which the whole kingdom so much desired.'—The chancellor and the treasurer were of opinion, 'That the house of commons could never be in a better disposition to give, than they were at present; that hereafter they might grow weary, and apt to find fault with the conduct, especially when they found the country not so well pleased with the war as they were now conceived to be: whereas, now the war was begun, and the king engaged in it as much as he could be after ten battles, and all upon their desire and their promise; they could not refuse to give any thing proposed within the compass of that reason, which all understanding men might examine and judge of. That it was evident enough, that the true ground of all the confidence the Dutch had was from their opinion of the king's necessities and want of money, and their belief that the parliament would supply him very sparingly, and not long to continue such an expence, as they very well knew that a war at sea would require; and they would be much confirmed in this their imagination, if at the beginning they should see the parliament give him such a sum of money, as seemed to be implied by what had been said. That they therefore thought it absolutely necessary, that the king should propose as much, that is, that his friends should move for such a sum, as might upon a reasonable computation, which every man would be ready to make, and of which wise men upon experience would easily make an estimate, carry on the war for a fall year; that is, for the setting out the present fleet and paying it off upon its return, and for the setting out another fleet the next spring. If this were now done, his majesty would not be involved in importunate necessities the next winter; but he might calmly and deliberately consult upon such farther supplies, as the experience of what would be then past should suggest to be necessary: and that this would give his majesty such a reputation with all his neighbours, and such terror to his enemies, that it would probably dispose them to peace.' They concluded, 'that a less sum than two millions and a half ought not to be proposed, and being once proposed ought to be insisted on and pursued without consenting to any diminution; for nobody could conceive that it would do more than maintain the war one year, which the parliament could not refuse to provide for in the beginning, as there was so much in truth of it already expended in the preparations and expedition the duke had made in November, when he went to sea upon the fame of the Dutch fleet's intention to convoy their Guinea ships through the channel.'—There was not a man in the company, who did not heartily wish that that sum or a greater might be proposed and granted: but they all, though they agreed in few other things, protested, 'that they could not advise that so prodigious a sum should be as much as named; and that they did not know any one man, since it could not be thought fit that any man who had relation to the king's service should move it, who had the courage to attempt it or would be persuaded to it.'—The two lords continued very obstinate, 'that a less sum should not be named for the reasons they had given,' which the other confessed to be just; and they acknowledged too, 'that the proposition ought not to be made by any man who was related to the court, or was thought to be in any

grace there that might dispose him, nor yet by any gentleman, how well soever thought of, who was of a small estate, and so to pay little of so great a sum he was so liberal to give.' They therefore desired them to name some of those members, who were honest worthy men, and looked upon as lovers of their country, and of great fortunes, unsuspected to have any designs at court; and if they were not enough acquainted with them, the lords would find some way by themselves or others to move them to it.' Whereupon they named five or six persons very well known, of whom the house had a very good esteem, but without any hope that any of them would be prevailed with to undertake it. The lords said, 'they would try what might be done, and give them notice the next day, that if it were possible it might be the business of the following day.'—The Chancellor and the Treasurer chose three Norfolk gentlemen of those who had been named, because they were good friends and grateful to each other, and desired them the next day 'that they might confer together.' They told them, 'that they knew well the state of affairs; the parliament had engaged the king in a war, that could not be carried on without a vast expence: and therefore if at the entrance into it there should be a small or an ordinary Supply given, it would blast all their hopes, and startle all other princes from joining, with whom the Dutch were not in favour, and who would be inclined to the king, if they saw such a provision for the war as would be sufficient to continue it for some time. And therefore they desired to confer with them, who upon all occasions manifested good affections to the king, and whose advice had a great influence upon the house, upon the whole matter how it might be conducted.' They all consented to what had been said, and promised their own concurrence and utmost endeavours to compass what the king should desire. The lords said, 'They promised themselves more from them, and that they would not only concur, but propose what should be necessary to be granted.' And thereupon they enlarged upon the charge which was already in view, and upon what was to be expected, and concluded, 'that two millions and a half were necessary to be insisted on;' and desired, 'that when the debate should be entered upon, which they hoped might be the next day, one of them would propose this sum and the other would second it.'—They looked long one upon another, as if they were surprised with the sum. At last one of them said, 'that the reasons were unanswerable for a liberal Supply; yet he did not expect that so prodigious a sum, which he believed had never yet been mentioned in parliament to be granted at one time, would be proposed: however he did not think it too much, and that he would do the best he could to answer any objections which should be made against it, as he doubted many would; but he confessed he durst not propose it.' Another was of the same mind, and with many good professions desired to be excused as to the first proposing it. The third, who was sir Robert Paston, a person of a much greater estate than both the other, who had yet very good fortunes, and a gentleman of a very ancient extraction by his father (and his mother was daughter to the earl of Lindsey), declared very frankly, 'That he was satisfied in his conscience, that it would be very good for the kingdom as well as for the king that such a sum should be granted; and therefore if they thought him fit to do it, he would propose it the next morning, let other men think what they would of him for it.'"

"The lords gave him the thanks they ought to do, and said what was necessary to confirm him, and to thank the other gentlemen for their promise to second him, and gave notice to the rest of the resolution, that they might call for the debate the next day; which was entered into with a general cheerfulness, every man acknowledging the necessity and the engagement of the house, but no man adventuring to name the proportion that should be given. When the house was in a deep silence expecting that motion, sir Robert Paston, who was no frequent speaker, but delivered what he had a mind to say very clearly, stood up, mentioned shortly the obligation, the charge of the war, and 'that the present Supply ought to be such as might as well terrify the enemy as assist the king; and therefore he proposed that they might give his majesty two millions and a half, which would amount to five and twenty hundred thousand pounds.' The silence of the house was not broken; they sat as in amazement, until a gentleman, who was believed to wish well to the king, without taking notice of what had been proposed, stood up, and moved that they might give the king a much less proportion. But then the two others, who had promised to second, renewed the motion one after the other; which seemed to be entertained with a consent of many, and was contradicted by none: so that, after a short pause, no man who had relation to the court speaking a word, the Speaker put it to the question, 'Whether they would give the king five and twenty hundred thousand pounds for carrying on the War against the Dutch;' and the affirmative made a good sound, and very few gave their negative aloud, and it was notorious very many sat silent. So the Vote was presently drawn up into an Order; and the house resolved the next day to be in a committee, to agree upon the way that should be taken for the raising this vast sum, the proportion whereof could no more be brought into debate."

* Mr. Secretary Bennet, in a letter to lord Hollis at Paris, alludes to the above debates in the following words: "My last told your excellency of the opening of the parliament by his majesty's Speech, and the next day, to jus-

The Speaker's Speech on presenting the Money Bill to the King.] Feb. 9. The grand Money bill being ready for the royal assent, the king came this day to the house of peers, where the Speaker of the house of commons presented his majesty with the said bill, and made the speech following :

"May it please your most excellent majesty ; The last session of this parliament, the lords and commons did humbly represent unto your maj. the many wrongs and indignities that were done to your maj. and the many injuries done to your merchants, by the subjects of the United Provinces: and did most humbly beseech your maj. that some effectual course might be taken for redress thereof.—Your maj. at the opening of this session, was graciously pleased to acquaint your two houses, that, in pursuance of their desires, you had, by your agent, required satisfaction; but that way proved ineffectual, and many fresh provocations were offered, whereby your maj. was necessitated to a warlike preparation; by the speedy Dispatch whereof, you had let your neighbours see, that you could defend yourself and your subjects against their insolence, upon the stock of your own credit, before your parliament came together.—And now, sir, give me leave to say, your neighbours may see how a great king is made greater by his parliament. Your loyal commons, after they convened, did not suffer full four and twenty hours to pass, before they most cheerfully gave your maj. more than four and twenty hundred thousand pounds.—Historians tell us, that in Biscay, a signiory of Spain, when the king entered into the frontiers of the country, the lords and gentlemen there dwelling proffer him some few brass pieces, called Maravedis, in a leather bag hanged at the end of a lance: but withal they tell him, that he must not take them.—Great sir; Your lords and commons will not only yield obedience to you with their tify all the fair hopes we had of their supporting cheerfully this war, the house of commons voted the raising to his majesty, in 3 years, two millions five hundred thousand pounds sterling: but coming the next day to debate the manner of raising it, they did not agree so well, but parted late in the evening with great heat: notwithstanding which, they have this day concluded very peaceably, that the committee of the whole house do proceed to consider of the raising of the 2,500,000*l.* in a regulated, subsidiary way, reducing the same to a certainty in all counties, so as no person for his real or personal estate be exempted. The great strife hath been between subsidies and land-tax: the first will make a great noise, and one of uncertain value; the last was the child of these ill times, hath been renounced since the king came home, and, at the best, is unequally laid upon all the counties; so that your excellency must not be surpris'd, if you hear some days have been spent in making the manner effective, since all agree in the quantum."

bodies, but with their purses also: in token whereof, I do, in the name of all the commons of England, present unto your maj. this Bill, whereby we have given unto your maj. a royal aid of 2,477,500*l.* to be paid in 3 years, by 12 quarterly payments, to begin from the 25th of Dec. last. And we do humbly beseech your maj. to accept it, as a pregnant demonstration of our most unfeigned duty and thankfulness to your majesty."

The King's Speech.] After passing the Bill, his majesty made the following short Speech: "Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the house of Commons; You have given me a very noble present, worthy of yourselves, and worthy of the Vote you passed on the 22d of April last; for which I thank you as much as is possible for me to do. I hope that your liberality herein will appear to be good husbandry. And I assure you that the monies shall be employed as you yourselves would wish. My Lords and Gentlemen; I perceive by the Bill, that you have put an engagement upon yourselves to be suddenly in the country; and therefore I desire you to hasten your councils, that so I may put an end to this session as soon as is possible. I have no more to add, but again to give you my hearty thanks."

The King's Declaration of War against the States of Holland.] Feb. 22. The parl. having thus shewn the sense of the people by this royal aid, and the hearts of the trading part of the nation being now entirely turned against the Dutch, the king ordered the drawing up of a formal Declaration of War, signed and approved this day, and is as follows:

"Whereas upon complaint of the several injuries, affronts, and spoils done by the East and West India Companies, and other the subjects of the United Provinces, unto and upon the ships, goods, and persons of our subjects, to their grievous damages, and amounting to vast sums: instead of reparatiou and satisfaction, which hath been by us frequently demanded, we found that orders had been given to De Ruyter, not only to abandon the consortship against the pyrates of the Mediterranean seas, to which the States-General had invited us, but also to use all acts of depredation and hostility against our subjects in Africa. We therefore gave order for the detaining the ships belonging to the states of the United Provinces, their subjects and inhabitants: yet, notwithstanding we did not give any commission for Letters of Mart, nor were there any proceedings against the ships detained, until we had a clear and undeniable evidence that De Ruyter had put the said orders in execution by seizing several of our subjects ships and goods. But now finding by these fresh injuries and actings of theirs, and the intelligence we have had of their great preparations for war, and their granting of Letters of Mart against our people, that both our forbearance, and the other remedies we have used to bring them to a compliance with us, have proved ineffectual, and that they are resolved what they have done by wrong, to maintain by arms and war against us:—We have therefore thought fit, by and with the advice of our privy-council, to declare, and do hereby declare to all the world, That the said states are the aggressors, and that they ought in justice to be so looked upon by all men: so that as well our fleets and ships, as all other ships and vessels that shall be commissioned by Letters of Mart from our dear brother the duke of York, lord high admiral of England, shall and may lawfully fight with, subdue, seize, and take all ships, vessels, and goods belonging to the States of the United Provinces, or any of their subjects or inhabitants within any of their territories. And we do hereby command as well all our own subjects, as advertise all other persons of what nation soever, not to transport or carry any soldiers, arms, powder, ammunition, or any other contraband goods, to any of the territories, lands, plantations, or countries of the said States of the United Provinces; Declaring, That whatsoever ship or vessel shall be met withal, transporting or carrying any soldiers, arms, powder, ammunition, or other contraband goods to any of the territories, lands, plantations, or countries of the said States of the United Provinces, the same being taken, shall be condemned as good and lawful prize. And we do further declare, That whatsoever ship or vessel, of what nation soever, shall be met withal, having any goods, merchandizes, or any number of persons in her belonging to the said States of the United Provinces, or any of their subjects or inhabitants, the whole being taken, shall be adjudged as good and lawful prize. As likewise all goods and merchandizes, of what nation soever, whether of our own or of foreigners, that shall be laden aboard any ship or vessel that shall belong to the States of the United Provinces, or any of their subjects, or any inhabiting with them, and shall be taken, the whole shall be condemned as good and lawful prize; except the said ship or vessel hath ours, or our dear brother's Letters of Safe Conduct granted to them. And to the end that due intimation and publication of this our Declaration may be made, and public notice thereof be taken, it is our will and pleasure that this our present Declaration be published in due and usual form.*

Account of the Act for taxing the Clergy in Parliament.] During this session there began, says archdeacon Echarde, a very extraordinary change in the liberties and properties of the Clergy of England, by altering the way of taxing themselves as formerly, and being taxed in common with the people in parliament. It is to be observed, that by the original constitution of the nation, the lords spiritual and prelates and Clergy were esteemed one of the three estates of the realm, and therefore met in Convocation on the civil account of giving their own Money, and securing their own secular rights and liberties. This right of taxing themselves, and of not being taxed by parliaments, had been inviolably observed before, as well as after the Reformation; only with this small difference, that, after the Reformation, their grants of subsidy, for the more certainty of collecting of them, were usually confirmed by acts of parliament; and yet they gave Benevolences as formerly, to be levied and paid according to rules and constitutions of their own making. The Rebellion in the late reign, and the following usurpations, were the first that broke in upon this peculiar privilege: for the ministers of those times, either out of voluntary compliance, affectation of popularity, or for want of proxies to represent their body, had their benefices taxed with the laity, in the pretended parliaments then held. But at the king's Restoration, this ancient right of the Church was recovered with him; and thus the matter continued for the first 4 years. But now, as it appeared, some of the bishops and clergy fell into sentiments very different from those of their predecessors. They began to think this customary method of taxing themselves somewhat burthensome: they probably thought the expectations of the court might be set too high upon them this way; and that the commons were often discontented, unless they over-charged themselves, and swelled their Subsidies beyond a reasonable proportion. We shall not examine how well these jealousies were founded; but it is said, that the apprehension of these and other inconveniences, brought abp. Sheldon, and some other leading prelates, into a concert with chancellor Clarendon, treasurer Southampton, and some others of the ministry. And now, at a consultation, it was concluded, that the Clergy should silently waive the ancient custom of taxing their own body, and suffer themselves to be included in the Money-Bills prepared by the commons: and to encourage their assent to this cession, two of their 4 Subsidies, they had granted last year, were to be remitted; and over and above they had the promise of a clause for saving their ancient rights.—This being complied with, the security was accordingly given, and a very clear comprehensive Proviso inserted in the 'Act for granting a Royal Aid unto the King's majesty,' which ought not to be forgot. It stands thus: 'Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all spiritual promotions, and all lands, possessions or revenues annexed to, and all goods and chattels growing, or renewed upon the same or elsewhere, appertaining to the owners of the said spiritual promotions, or any of them, which are or shall be charged, or made contributing to this act towards the payment aforesaid, during the time therein appointed, (which was to be raised, levied, and paid in the space of 3 years) shall be absolutely freed and discharged from the two last of the 4 Subsidies granted by the Clergy to his maj. his heirs and successors, by an Act made in the former session of this present parliament, entitled 'An Act for confirming of 4 Subsidies, granted by the Clergy,' any clause or thing in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be drawn into example, to the prejudice of the ancient rights belonging unto the lords spiritual and temporal, or clergy of this realm, or unto either of the said universities, or unto any colleges, schools, alms-houses, hospitals, or cinque ports.' Notwithstanding this saving Proviso, which has expressly secured all rights, the Clergy seemed to have acquiesced for the future, and never after resumed their great claim; and from this time, during the whole reign, the Convocation met principally for form sake. The parochial Clergy however gained one privilege, which they had not before, which was their voting for members of the house of commons: but whether they were gainers or losers in the whole, has been a matter of some dispute; yet we think a very little consideration will determine whether the gaining of the latter privilege be a full compensation for the waving, if not the losing the former.*

* It is observable that though this Declaration was approved of by no less than 29 of the privy-council, whose names are placed in the front, yet we find that neither the chancellor Clarendon, nor the treasurer Southampton, were, or would be concerned in this great and difficult affair. Richard, p. 317.

Proceedings in the H. of Lords, relative to a Bill for granting Indulgences for Liberty of Conscience.] The following curious account of the Proceedings relative to a Bill for granting of Indulgences for Liberty of Conscience is given by the lord chancellor Clarendon †.

"In the former session of the parliament," says his lordship, 'the lord Ashley out of his indifferency in matters of Religion, and the lord Arlington out of his good-will to the Roman Catholics, had drawn in the lord Privy Seal, whose interest was most in the Presbyterians, to propose to the king an Indulgence for Liberty of Conscience: for which they offered two motives; the one the probability of a war with the Dutch, though it was not then declared; and in that case, the prosecution of people at home for their several opinions in Religion would be very inconvenient, and might prove mischievous.' The other was, 'That the fright men were in by reason of the late Bill against Conventicles, and the warmth the parliament expressed with reference to the Church, had so prepared all sorts of Non-Conformists, that they would gladly compound for liberty at any reasonable rates: and by this means a good yearly revenue might be raised to the king, and a firm concord and tranquillity be established in the kingdom, if power were granted by the parliament to the king to grant Dispensations to such whom he knew to be peaceably affected, for their exercise of that religion which was agreeable to their conscience, without undergoing the penalty of the laws.' And they had prepared a schedule, in which they computed what every Roman Catholic would be willing to pay yearly for the exercise of his religion, and so of every other sect; which upon the estimates they made, would indeed have amounted to a very great sum of money yearly.—The king liked the arguments and the project very well, and wished them to prepare such a Bill; which was done quickly, very short, and without any mention of other advantage to grow from it, than 'the peace and quiet of the kingdom, and an entire reference to the king's own judgment and discretion in dispensing his dispensations.' This was equally approved: and though hitherto it had been managed with great secrecy, that it might not come to the knowledge of the chancellor and the Treasurer, who they well knew would never consent to it; yet the king resolved to impart it to them. And the Chancellor being then afflicted with the gout, the committee (that used to be called was appointed to meet at Worcester-House: and thither likewise came the Privy Seal and the lord Ashley, who had never before been present in those meetings.—The king informed them of the occasion of their conference, and caused the draught for the Bill to be read to them; which was done, and such reasons given by those who promoted it, as they thought fit; the chief of which was, 'That there could be no danger in trusting the king, whose zeal to the Protestant Religion was so well known that nobody would doubt that he would use this power, when granted to him, otherwise than should be for the good and benefit of the church and state.' The Chancellor and the Treasurer, as had been presaged, were very warm against it, and used many arguments to dissuade the king from prosecuting it, 'as a thing that could never find the concurrence of either or both houses, and which would raise a jealousy in both, and in the people generally of his affection to the Papists, which would not be good for either, and every body knew that he had no favour for either of the other factions.' But what the others said, who were of another opinion, prevailed more; and his majesty declared, 'That the Bill should be presented to the house of peers as from him, and in his name; and that he hoped none of his servants, who knew his mind as well as every body there did, would oppose it, but either be absent or silent.' To which both the lords answered, 'That they should not be absent purposely, and if they were present, they hoped his majesty would excuse them if they spake according to their conscience and judgment, which they could not forbear to do; with which his maj. seemed unsatisfied, though the lords of the combination were better pleased than they would have been with their concurrence.—Within few days after, the Chancellor remaining still in his chamber without being able to go, the Bill was presented in the house of peers by the Lord Privy Seal, as by the king's direction and approbation, and thereupon had the first reading: and as soon as it was read, the Lord Treasurer spake against it,

‘as unfit to be received and to have the countenance of another reading in the house, being a design against the Protestant Religion and in favour of the Papists,’ with many sharp reflections upon those who had spoken for it; and many of the Bishops spake to the same purpose, and urged many weighty arguments against it. However it was moved, ‘That since it was averred that it was with the king’s privy, it would be a thing unheard of to deny it a second reading:’ and that there might be no danger of a surprisal by its being read in a thin house, it was ordered ‘that it should be read the 2nd time upon a day named,’ with which all were satisfied. In the mean time great pains were taken to persuade particular men to approve it: and some of the Bishops were sharply reprehended for opposing the king’s prerogative, with some intimation, ‘that if they continued in that obstinacy they would repeat it;’ to which they made such answers as in honesty and wisdom they ought to do, without being shaken in their resolution. It was rather insinuated than declared, ‘That the Bill had been perused,’ some said ‘drawn, by the Chancellor,’ and averred that he was not against it: which being confidently reported, and believed or not believed as he was more or less known to the persons present, he thought himself obliged to make his own sense known. And so on the day appointed for the 2nd reading, with pain and difficulty he was in his place in the house: and so after the 2nd reading of the bill, he was of course to propose the commitment of it. Many of the Bishops and others spake fiercely against it, as a way to undermine religion; and the Lord Treasurer with his usual weight of words shewed the ill consequence that must attend it, and ‘that in the bottom it was a project to get Money at the price of Religion; which he believed was not intended or known to the king, but only to those who had projected it, and it may be imposed upon others who meant well.’—The Lord Privy Seal, either upon the observation of the countenance of the house or advertisement of his friends, or unwilling to venture his reputation in the enterprise, had given over the game the first day, and now spake not at all: but the lord Ashley adhered firmly to his point, spake often and with great sharpness of wit, and had a cadence in his words and pronunciation that drew attention. He said, ‘it was the king’s misfortune that a matter of so great concernment to him, and such a prerogative as it may be would be found to be inherent in him without any declaration of parliament, should be supported only by such weak men as himself, who served his maj. at a distance, whilst the great officers of the crown thought fit to oppose it; which he more wondered at, because nobody knew more than they the king’s unshakable firmness in his religion, that had resisted and vanquished so many great temptations: and therefore he could not be thought unworthy of a greater trust with reference to it, than he would have by this bill.’

—The Chancellor having not been present at the former debate upon the first day, thought it fit to sit silent in this, till he found the house in some expectation to hear his opinion: and then he stood up and said, ‘That no man could say more, if it were necessary or pertinent, of the king’s constancy in his religion, and of his understanding the constitution and foundation of the Church of England, than he; no man had been witness to more assaults which he had sustained than he had been, and of many victories; and therefore if the question were how far he might be trusted in that point, he should make no scruple in declaring, that he thought him more worthy to be trusted than any man alive. But there was nothing in that Bill that could make that the question, which had confounded all notions of religion, and erected a chaos of policy to overthrow all religion and government: so that the question was not, whether the king were worthy of that trust, but whether that trust were worthy of the king. That it had been no new thing for kings to divest themselves of many particular rights and powers, because they were thereby exposed to more trouble and vexation, and so deputed that authority to others qualified by them: and he thought it a very unreasonable and unjust thing to commit such a trust to the king, which nobody could suppose he could execute himself, and yet must subject him to daily and hourly importunities, which must be so much the more uneasy to a nature of so great bounty and generosity, that nothing is so ungrateful to him as to be obliged to deny.’—In the vehemence of this debate, the lord Ashley having used some language that he knew reflected upon him, the Chancellor let fall some unwary expressions which were turned to his reproach, and remembered long after. When he insisted upon the wildness and illimiteness in the Bill, he said, ‘it was Ship-Money in Religion, that nobody could know the end of, or where it would rest; that if it were passed, Dr. Goffe or any other apostate from the Church of England might be made a bishop or abp. here, all oaths and statutes and subscriptions being dispensed with:’ which were thought two evicious instances, and gave his enemies opportunities to make glosses and reflections upon his disadvantage. In this debate it fell out that the duke of York appeared very much against the Bill; which was imputed to the Chancellor, and served to heap coals of fire upon his head. In the end, very few having spoken for it, though there were many who would have consented to it, besides the Catholic lords, it was agreed that there should be no question put for the commitment; which was the most evil way of rejecting it, and left it to be no more called for.—The king was infinitely troubled at the ill success of this Bill, which he had been assured would pass notwithstanding the opposition that was expected; and it had produced one effect that was foreseen though not believed, in renewing the bitterness against the Roman Catholicicks. And they, who watched all occasions to perform those offices, had now a large field to express their malice against the Chancellor and the Treasurer, 'whose pride only had disposed them to shew their power and credit in diverting the house from gratifying the king, to which they had been inclined;' and his majesty heard all that could be said against them without any dislike. After 2 or 3 days he sent for them both together into his closet, which made it generally believed in the court, that he resolved to take both their offices from them, and they did in truth believe and expect it: but there was never any cause appeared after to think that it was in his purpose. He spake to them of other business, without taking the least notice of the other matter, and dismissed them with a countenance less open than he used to have towards them, and made it evident that he had not the same thoughts of them he had formerly.—And when the next day the Chancellor went to him alone, and was admitted into his cabinet, and began to take notice 'that he seemed to have dissatisfaction in his looks towards him;' the king, in more choler than he had ever before seen him, told him, 'his looks were such as they ought to be; that he was very much unsatisfied with him, and thought he had used him very ill; that he had deserved better of him, and did not expect that he would have carried himself in that manner as he had done in the house of peers, having known his majesty's own opinion from himself, which it seemed was of no authority with him if it differed from his judgment, to which he would not submit against his reason.' The other, with the confidence of an honest man, entered upon the discourse of the matter, assured him 'the very proposing it had done his maj. much prejudice, and that they who were best affected to his service in both houses were much troubled and afflicted with it: and of those who advised him to it, one knew nothing of the constitution of England, and was not thought to wish well to the Religion of it; and the other was so well known to him, that nothing was more wonderful than that his maj. should take him for a safe counsellor.' He had recourse then again to the matter, and used some arguments against it which had not been urged before, and which seemed to make impression. He heard all he said with patience, but seemed not to change his mind, and answered no more than 'That it was no time to speak to the matter, which was now passed; and if it had been unseasonably urged, he might still have carried himself otherwise than he had done; and so spake of somewhat else."

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the Prorogation.] March 2. The Bills being ready for the royal assent, and a prorogation being resolved on, the king came this day to the house of peers, where the Speaker of the commons addressed his majesty as follows:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; The knights, citizens, and burghesses of the commons house of parliament, having in the beginning of this session applied themselves to the aiding your majesty in your naval preparations, have of late considered of some Bills that may be most grateful to the people, either in redressing things that are grievous to them, or in advancing their trade and commerce, which are the soul and life of the nation.—Evil manners produce good laws; but the best laws in time may grow obsolete: and such is the wicked nature of man, that which he cannot by force break through a law, he will by fraud and tricks endeavour to evade it.—I may with great truth affirm, the Common Law of England is the best municipal law in the world; and yet, if the legislative power were not ready to countermine the works, and make up the breaches that are daily made upon it, the sons of Zeruiah would be too strong for us.—We have now presented your maj. with several Bills for the Regulation of the Law, which will serve to prune some exuberant branches, and to pull away the ivy that robbed this tree of her just nourishment: and if your majesty now be pleased graciously to shine upon her, she will yield her fruit in great abundance, to the content of your majesty and all your people.—Cosmographers do agree, that this Island is incomparably furnished with pleasant rivers, like veins in the natural body, which conveys the blood into all the parts, whereby the whole is nourished, and made useful; but the poet tells us, he acts best, 'qui miscuit utile dulci:' therefore we have prepared some Bills for making small Rivers navigable; a thing that in other countries hath been more experienced, and hath been found very advantageous: it easeth the people of the great charge of land carriages; preserves the highways, which are daily worn out with waggons carrying excessive burdens; it breeds up a nursery of watermen, which, upon occasion, will prove good seamen; and with much facility maintain intercourse and communion between cities and countries.—We have been much affected with the cries and wants of the poor this hard season, especially those about this town, who are ready to starve for want of fuel, the price of coals being so unreasonably enhanced by the extorting engrossers. We have, therefore, for their present and future ease, prepared a Bill authorizing the lord mayor and the court of aldermen in the city of London, and 3 justices of peace in the country, whereof one to be of the quorum, from time to time, to set the prices of Coals, having regard to the price paid to the importer, and other emergent charges.—And now, great sir, having finished our present councils, we hope your majesty will give us leave to return for a time into our countries, where, in our several spheres, we shall be ready to serve you with our persons and our purses, and also with our prayers to the great God of Hosts, that he will be pleased to strengthen your hands in the day of battle, and make your majesty victorious over all your enemies both at home and abroad."

The King's Speech at the Prorogation.] After passing the Bills, his majesty made a short Speech, the effect of it was: "He told the lords and commons, he had very little to say more than again to renew his thanks to them for the present they made him when he met them last here.—He desired the gentlemen of the house of commons, that, when they are returned into their countries, they would take care for the equal rating the Taxes laid upon the people.—His majesty told the commons, He had been at some charge himself, that no counties might be over-rated; and he persuaded himself, that if the members of the house of commons and the rest of the commissioners will take care that it might be equally taxed in the several countries, it will be the more readily and cheerfully paid in. And his majesty desired those that were lieutenants and deputy lieutenants, that they would take care to preserve the peace of the kingdom; for, his majesty did assure them, the republican party have still their councils on foot, and are yet in hopes to make some advantage to themselves, upon the score of the present war. But his majesty did not doubt but, by God's blessing upon his and their endeavours, their expectations would be frustrated.—His maj. said, his intentions were, that the houses should not meet here again till this time 12 months. But, lest there should be any occasion of his needing their assistance sooner, he did intend the prorogation shall be only till June next; before which, he should by a timely proclamation give notice of the next meeting, if it hold not at that time."

Both houses were then prorogued to the 1st of June; afterwards to the 1st of Aug. and lastly to the 9th of October.

FIFTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT. HELD AT OXFORD.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] Oct. 9, 1665. The Plague raging in London and Westminster, the parliament met this day at Oxford, where the University-Schools were prepared for the reception of both houses: notwithstanding which, the king commanded both houses to attend him in the Great Hall at Christ-Church, and, on the 10th, opened the session with the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I am confident you all believe, that if it had not been absolutely necessary to consult with you, I would not have called you together at this time, when the Contagion hath so spread itself over so many parts of the kingdom. I take it for a good omen to see so good an appearance this day; and I doubt not but every day will add to your number; and I give you all my thanks for your compliance so far with my desires.—The truth is, as I entered upon this War by your advice and encouragement, so I desire that you may, as frequently as is possible, receive information of the conduct and effects of it; and that I may have the continuance of your cheerful Supply for the carrying it on. I will not deny to you, that it hath proved more chargeable than I could imagine it would have been: the addition they still made to their Fleets beyond their first purpose, made it unavoidably necessary for me to make proportionable preparations, which God hath hitherto blessed with success in all encounters. And as the enemies have used their utmost endeavours, by calumnies and false suggestions, to make themselves friends, and to persuade others to assist them against us; so I have not been wanting to encourage those princes who have been wronged by the Dutch, to recover their own by force; and, in order thereunto, have assisted the bishop of Munster with a very great sum of ready money, and am to continue a Supply to him, who is now in the bowels of their country with a powerful army. These issues, which I may tell you have been made with very good conduct and husbandry (nor indeed do I know that any thing hath been spent that could have been well and safely saved); I say, this expence will not suffer you to wonder, that the great Supply which you gave me for this war in so bountiful a proportion is upon the matter already spent, so that I must not only expect an assistance from you to carry on this war, but such an assistance as may enable me to defend myself and you against a more powerful neighbour, if he shall prefer the friendship of the Dutch before mine.—I told you, when I entered upon this war, that I had not such a brutal appetite, as to make war for war-sake. I am still of the same mind; I have been ready to receive any propositions that France hath thought fit to offer to that end; but hitherto nothing hath been offered worthy my acceptance: nor is the Dutch less insolent; though I know no advantage they have, but the continuance of the contagion. God Almighty, I hope, will shortly deprive them of that encouragement. The Chancellor will inform you of all the particulars."

The Lord Chancellor (Clarendon's) Speech, detailing the State of Public Affairs.] The Lord Chancellor then rose and spoke as followeth:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the house of commons; The king is not content, to leave you to yourselves, to make a state of the war, and the success that hath attended it, by your own observation, and the general communication of all that hath fallen out, which in truth have left few men ignorant of any thing, who have had any curiosity to inform themselves; but takes care that you be informed by himself, that you may know all that he knows, that so you may be able to give him your counsel upon the clearest evidence.—In order to this, it will not, I hope, be unreasonable or ungrateful to you, to refresh your memory, by looking some years backwards, even to the time of his majesty's happy restoration, that we may take the better prospect of the posture we are now in, and how we have come into it. What inclinations his maj. brought home with him to live in amity with his neighbours of Holland, though he had received indignities enough from them, and in truth had been little less proscribed there than he had been in England, needs no other manifestation, than that he chose that place to embark himself in, when he was pressed by the two neighbour kings, from whom he had received more civilities, to have made use of their ports.—It cannot be denied but that his reception in Holland was with great civility and lustre, and a sufficient evidence that they had a full sense of the high honour his maj. had vouchsafed to them, and the departure from thence was with equal and mutual satisfaction in each other; which made many men the more wonder, that, albeit the ambassadors who were to follow had been nominated before the king left the Hague, there was so long an interval before their arrival here, that the two neighbour kings and many other princes had finished their embassies of congratulations, before we had heard any more from the United Provinces.—You all remember how long it was before the armies were disbanded, and the fleets paid off; during which time his maj. lived upon his credit, and easily contracted a great debt, for the mere support of himself and his household, which was not so easily discharged afterwards. There was one thing that exceedingly surprized him, when he found (which will be incredible to posterity) that a triumphant nation, that had made itself terrible to Christendom, by having fought more battles than all the neighbour kingdoms and states together had ever done in so few years, and seemed to be in a posture ready to fight them over again, that had so long reigned over the ocean in formidable fleets, should, at the time of his majesty's happy return, as if on the sudden all their arms had been turned into plough-shares, and their swords into pruning-hooks, not have in all the magazines, in all the stores, arms enough to be put into the hands of 5000 men, nor provision enough to set out ten new ships to sea; which his maj. did not desire should be known to his best neighbours, how little soever he suspected their affections, nor did indeed so much as make it known to his parliament; but made it his first care, without the least noise, and with all imaginable shifts, to provide for the full supply of those important magazines and stores, which have been ever since replenished as they ought to be.—He had not the least imagination, that any of his neighbours would wantonly affect to interrupt the happy calm that he and themselves enjoyed; and therefore resolved to retrench the vast expence of the Navy, under which he found the nation even to groan, and out of that good husbandry to provide for more necessary disbursements. Yet, that the world might not think that he had abandoned the Ocean, and that the memory of the glorious actions the English had so lately performed upon it might not vanish in an instant, after he had provided such a guard as the Narrow Seas never ought to be without, in the Spring he sent a strong fleet against the pirates of Argiers and Tripoli (who had grown to that strength and boldness that they interrupted the whole trade of Christendom), as the only enemies he would choose to have.—It was a design of great glory and equal expence, crowned in the end by God Almighty with the success we could wish, and with an entire submission to the English flag, and as great security to all his majesty's subjects in their trade as the engagement and honour of infidels can give; and this agreement ratified with all formality (the like whereof had never been before) by the Great Turk himself.—Hereupon the king again renewed his resolution for a further retrenchment of his naval expence, even to the lessening the guard in the narrow seas, his merchants in all places receiving less interruption in their trade than they had in any former time undergone, until he received intelligence from the Straights, that the faithless people of Argiers, who had so lately submitted to him, had committed new insolencies upon some of his subjects, or rather upon foreign persons taken by his subjects into their protections, and which the Turks pretended they might do without violation of the Treaty. But his maj. resolving to admit none of those elucidations, lost no time in sending a new strong fleet into the Mediterranean Sea, to chastise those perfidious pirates; and after a chargeable war made upon them for near or full 12 months, and after having taken several of their ships from them, and upon the matter blocking them up in their harbours, he received a second submission from them, with better and more advantageous conditions than the former.—I must not omit one circumstance, that about this time the Dutch, who received much more prejudice and damage from the Turks than the English had done, besought his maj. that he would once more send a fleet into those seas against those pirates, and that it might upon all occasions join with one they were likewise ready to send out to the same Christian end, and for the extirpation of those sea robbers; and within a very short time after the English Fleet was gone, they likewise sent De Ruyter with a good fleet thither, which was so far from any conjunction with us, that when our ships chaced any Argier men near them, they never offered to obstruct their flight, but quickly made it manifest that they rather brought money with them to buy a dishonourable and disadvantageous peace, than to make a war upon them.—Matters standing thus, the king's fleet being gone into the Straights against the Turkish pirates, and there remaining few ships in the Narrow Seas, we began every day to hear of depredations by the Dutch upon our merchants in all parts. Instead of delivering up the Island of Poleroone in the East Indies, as by the Treaty they ought to have done, they, by their naval power in those parts, hindered our ships to take in their lading of such merchandize as the factors had provided and made ready for their freight, upon pretence that those ports where the merchandize was ready to be embarked were in the dominions of some princes who they had declared to be their enemies, and so they would not suffer any traffic to be maintained with them; and they published the like declaration, and challenged the same sovereignty, in Africa, and by virtue thereof would not suffer our ships to trade upon that coast, where we had a trade long before the Dutch had any footing in those parts.—These insolencies made that noise in the world, that the English merchants felt the effects of it in all places, till it reached the ears of the parliament, which in April was 12 months presented the same to his maj. and besought him that he would take some speedy and effectual course for the redress of those wrongs, dishonours, and indignities, which were the greatest obstructions of our Trade; and declared, that, in the prosecution thereof, they would with their lives and fortunes assist his maj. against all opposition whatsoever.—My Lords and Gentlemen; You very well remember, that though his maj. was very well pleased with the great zeal you shewed for the Advancement of Trade, he was far from resolving to make a war upon the warmth of that Declaration; but told you, that he would examine and peruse the particular complaints which had been represented to his parliament, and would thereupon demand justice and reparation from the States General; which demand he appointed his minister residing there to make in a short time after. What effect that candid way of proceeding found, is enough known to the world: instead of other application, they declared themselves wonderfully offended with the declaration of the parliament, with many insolent expressions, suitable to the manners of a Commonwealth. They gave present order for equipping a very great fleet, and the raising many land soldiers, making greater preparations for war than they had done in many years before. They had made a complaint to his maj. that a captain of one of the ships which his maj. had lent to the royal company had, in his voyage thither, taken a Fort belonging to them, near Cape Verte, for which they demanded satisfaction. The king assured them, that he had not the least commission or authority from him for so doing: that he expected him home very speedily; and then he should be sure to undergo that punishment which the nature of his offence required, when the matter should be examined; and they should be sure to receive full reparation. This satisfied them not; but, in a great fury, they resolved to send forth a strong fleet to Guinea, and granted a commission (which they took care to publish) to the commander in chief, to make war upon the English in those parts, and to do them all the mischief they could.—The king found himself now obliged, in what straight soever, to provide for the protection of his subjects in those parts, and for the support of that trade, which, I doubt, is not enough taken to heart, and the value thereof not enough understood; and, in order thereunto, with great speed, caused a fleet to be made ready for that expedition, under the command of his highness prince Rupert, who was under sail for the voyage, when his maj. found it necessary to stop the prince's further prosecution of it, upon good intelligence that the Dutch had appointed their admiral, with a fleet of 50 sail, to convoy the other fleet designed for Guinea, through the Channel, in contempt of his maj. who had a very small fleet in readiness; and that De Ruyter was likewise sent out of the Straights from prosecuting the Turks, to make war upon the English in Guinea, when at the same time they had earnestly pressed the king, upon many professions of desire to prevent a war, that prince Rupert's fleet might stay in harbour, as theirs should do, till some means might be found for an accommodation of all differences; and, in truth, this very difficult stratagem, of pretending one thing and intending another, of promising with all solemnity and never resolving to perform, of swearing this day not to do a thing when they had served their turn by having done it yesterday, that nobody could know, is the highest pinnacle of their wisdom of state, by which they govern their affairs, and delude their neighbours.—The winds were not favourable to this triumphant design. And now the king found the value of the Vote and Declaration of his parliament; it was a rich and a massy vote, which in a short time he coined into 200,000*l.* ready money, in the Chamber of the city of London, with which he gave order forthwith to make ready more ships: and the duke going himself to the fleet, by his indefatigable industry, with incredible expedition, added so many good ships to those under the command of prince Rupert, that in Nov. he put himself on board the fleet, resolving to stop the Dutch, if the wind gave them leave to pursue their former resolution, which, from the time the duke was known to be at sea, they fairly declined, and were content rather to be safe in their own harbours, than to look to the security of their merchants. It was high time now to seize upon as many of their ships as came in our way, to satisfy the damages we had reason to believe we should sustain from De Ruyter's expedition into Guinea with the commission mentioned before; but there was not the lading of one ship sold, or disposed of, till his maj. received full information of De Ruyter's having begun the war upon the coast of Africa, by seizing upon our ships, taking our forts, and committing all the acts of hostility which his commission directed him unto; his maj. likewise at the same time receiving new advertisement of their refusal to deliver up the Island of Poleroone to him, which they were bound to by their Treaty. And will you not wonder, after all this, at the confidence of these men; and more, that any neighbour prince should have that confidence in them, as to declare, that the king our master is the aggressor, that he first began the war?—From this time the war began to be more in earnest, and to be carried on at another expence. Though his royal highness ventured himself in Nov. in a fleet consisting of little more than fifty ships, to stop the Dutch from passing through the Channel; yet, in April (which was within few days after your prorogation at the end of your last session), he went again to sea, with a much stronger fleet, and more proportionate to the great preparations the enemy had made; and even after he was gone to sea, upon great additions of strength every day made by the Dutch, more good ships were sent to reinforce the Fleet; insomuch as, upon that glorious 3rd of June, when they had the courage to visit our coasts, after the duke had in vain called upon them at their own doors, and took many of their merchants ships in their sight, the English fleet consisted of very few less than 100 sail. The action and blessing of that day hath been celebrated in all the churches in England, and in the hearty devotions of all true Englishmen; and therefore I shall say no more of it here, save only, that whether the public joy then, even upon the solemn Thanksgiving-day, was superior to the universal consternation that spread itself over the nation before, I appeal to the breasts of all here present. We, who had the honour to be near the king at that time, observed him to be in that agony that cannot be expressed, an agony himself could not have long endured, even when, by all the intelligence he received hourly from the coast, he had reason to assure himself of the victory. In that great action, we sunk, burned, and took, 18 good ships of war, whereof half were the best they had, with the loss of one single small ship of ours, but of many noble and gallant persons, of too much value to be ventured (if there had not been a greater venture) against such trash, and whose memories ought ever to be preserved, and extolled, and made precious to posterity. No diligence was omitted, but all imaginable expedition used in refreshing, repairing, and setting out the fleet again; in order to which the king himself made a journey thither, and stayed till he saw all ready, and fit to sail; but then, no intreaty, no importunity, could prevail with him to venture his brother again, though his family and all preparations for the voyage were still on board. His maj. too well remembered, and still felt, the impressions he had undergone the 3d of June; and having got his brother into his arms again, he would not return without him, committing the charge of the fleet to the earl of Sandwich, who had acted so good a part in it.—Within few days after, the beginning of July, the earl of Sandwich went again to the coast of Holland, with a fleet in no degree inferior with the former, and rode before the Texel, to invite the Dutch to a new engagement, they having used all the arts at home to conceal the loss and dishonour they had undergone, and pretended to be very ready and solicitous for another battle, when there was no appearance of their purpose to come out: and upon sure intelligence that the East India fleet was coming about by the north, he received orders to go for Norway, upon such encouragement as was not made good, so that he was disappointed of the expectation he had very reasonably carried with him thither, and at a season when that climate gives little encouragement to abide in those seas. I am not yet to enlarge upon that matter, till we hear a better account from some of our friends; however, though he could not meet with their whole fleet as he endeavoured to do, yet he hath had the good fortune, in two encounters, to take 8 of their great ships of war, 2 of their best East India ships, and about 20 of their merchant ships, all under the protection of their fleet, or ought to have been; and was then, by tempest, and other reasons which no wisdom of his could prevent, obliged to put into our own harbours.—I do not mention the great number of prisoners we have taken, an army of prisoners, who in truth do us more harm at land than ever they did at sea: and are a charge that never fell under our estimate and computation. I would not be understood that we had entered upon a war and never thought of prisoners, and sick and wounded men; but that the prisoners and wounded men should bring upon us so prodigious an expence, and of which we can yet see no bottom, insomuch as in one place, I think Colchester, that charge comes to 1200*l.* the week; I say, such an expence never came into our computation.—The king tells you, He hath enabled the prince and bishop of Munster to demand justice from those who have so notoriously oppressed him with such outrageous circumstances of insolence and scorn as are enough known to the world; and he hath demanded it bravely, in such an equipage as hath not been made for little money, in which he can take as well as ask satisfaction.—After all this, since there is a justice due to the worst enemies, we must do them this right, that they do not at all seem weary of the war, they do not discover the least inclination to peace.—It is true, the French king hath offered his mediation; and truly, if he intends no more than a mediation, it is an office very worthy the most Christian king. I wish with all my heart that (as a mediator) he would make equal propositions, or that he would not so importunately press his maj. to consent to those he makes, upon an instance and argument that he holds himself engaged by a former Treaty (of which we never heard till since the beginning of this war, and had some reason to have presumed the contrary) to assist the Dutch with men and money if his maj. doth not consent.—His maj. tells you, that he hath not an appetite to make war for war-sake, but will be always ready to make such a peace as may be for his honour and the interest of his subjects; and no doubt it will be a great trouble and grief to him, to find so great a prince, towards whom he hath manifested so great an affection, in conjunction with his enemies. Yet even the apprehension of such a war will not terrify him to purchase a peace by such concessions as he would be ashamed to make you acquainted with; of which nature you will easily believe the propositions hitherto made to be, when you know that the release of Poleroone in the East Indies, and the demolishing the fort of Cabo Corso upon the coast of Guinea, are two, which would be, upon the matter, to be content with a very vile trade in the East Indies, under their controul, and with none in Guinea; and yet those are not propositions unreasonable enough to please the Dutch, who reproach France for interposing for peace, instead of assisting them in the war, holdly insisting upon the advantage the contagion in London and some other parts of the kingdom gives them, by which, they confidently say, the king will be no longer able to maintain a fleet against them at sea, and as if God Almighty had sent this heavy visitation upon the kingdom on their behalf, and to expose it to their malice and insolence.—They load us with such reproaches as the civility of no other language will admit the relation. The truth is, they have a dialect of rudeness so peculiar to their language and their people, that it is high time for all kings and princes to oblige them to some reformation, if they intend to hold correspondence or commerce with them.—My Lords and Gentlemen: You see in what posture we stand with reference to our neighbours abroad, who are our declared enemies. Their malice and activity to make others declare themselves so too, the great preparations they make, and even declarations that they will have another battle, towards which they have in readiness an equal number of new, greater, and better ships to those they have lost, furnished with larger and greater artillery, so that if they were to be manned with any other nation than their own, they might be worthy our apprehension. What preparations are to be made on our part, you can best judge.—I have fully obeyed the command that was laid upon me, in making you this plain, clear, true Narrative of what hath passed. I have no order to make reflection upon it, nor any deduction from it. The king himself hath told you, that the noble unparalleled Supply you have already given him is upon the manner spent with all the animadversions of good husbandry that the nature of the affair will bear. What is more to be done, he leaves entirely to your own generous understandings: being not more assured of any thing that is to come in this world, than that the same noble indignation for the honour of the king and the nation, that first provoked you to inflame the king himself, will continue the same passion still boiling in your loyal breasts, that all the world may see, which they hoped never to have seen, that never prince and people were so entirely united in their affections, for their true, joint, inseparable honour, as the only, sure, infallible expedient to preserve their distinct several interests.—My Lords and Gentlemen: Having yet only presented you a short view of your foreign enemies, it may not be altogether unreasonable that you take a little prospect of those at home; those quiet and restless spirits in your own bowels, upon whose infidelity, I doubt, your enemies abroad have more dependence than upon their own fleets. I must appeal to every one of your observations, whether the countenances of these men have not appeared to you more erected, more insolent, in all places, since the beginning of this war, than they were before. In what readiness they were, if any misfortune had befallen the king's fleet (which they promised themselves), to have brought the calamity into your fields and into your houses, is notoriously known.—The horrid murderers of our late royal master have been received into the most secret counsels in Holland; and other infamous prostituted persons of our nation are admitted to a share in the conduct of their affairs, and maintain their correspondence here, upon liberal allowances and pensions. Too many of his majesty's subjects, who were lent by this crown to assist and defend this ungrateful state against their enemies, have been miserably wrought upon, for the keeping a vile mean subsistence, rather than livelihood, to renounce their allegiance, and become enemies to their native country; some of whom have wantonly put themselves on board the enemy's fleet, without command or office, purely out of appetite, and delight to rebel against their king, and to worry their country. It is great pity these men should not be taught, by some exemplary brand, that their allegiance is not circumscribed within the four seas; but that they have obligations upon them of duty and loyalty towards the king, in what part soever of the world they shall inhabit.—Their friends at home, impatient of long delays for the successes they had promised themselves, and for the succours which others had promised to send to them, made no doubt of doing the business themselves, if they could appoint but a lucky day to begin the work; and you had heard of them in all places upon the 3rd of the last month (their so much celebrated 3rd of Sept.), if the great vigilance and indefatigable industry of the good general, who is always active for the king's safety and the peace of the kingdom, had not two days before apprehended the seditious leaders, and given advertisements for the securing others in most parts of the kingdom; by the confessions of many of whom, their wicked design is enough manifested, and ready for justice; yet some of the principal persons are not yet taken, and some others got themselves rescued after they were apprehended.—My Lords and Gentlemen: Let it not, I beseech you, be said of us, what was heretofore said of the senate of Rome, when they were prosperous enough, and when they had obtained greater victories over their enemies abroad than we have done, ‘Excellentibus ingenii citiùs deficit ars, quàm civem regant, quàm quàm hostem perdant.’ Let not those scorpions be kept warm in our bosoms till they sting us to death: let not those who hate the government, would destroy the government be sheltered under the shadow and protection of the government.—It is possible, and God knows it is but possible, that some men, who are not friends to this or that part of the government (for you are not to believe that they always discover what in truth they are most angry with), who would not buy those alterations they most desire at the price of a civil war they would bring it fairly about, wait for a godly parliament, and do all by their consent: yet those persons must not take it ill that we cannot desire they should ever have it in their power to bring those alterations to pass, by these means they now seem to abhor: and I do heartily wish, I am sure they will not be the worse men nor the worse subjects for it, that they would a little reflect upon what is past, remember how much they have outdone, more than they intended to have done; nay, what they heartily abhorred the thought of doing; and they will then find the only way to preserve themselves innocent is to keep their minds from being vitiated by the first impressions, by jealousies, murmurings, and repinings, and above all, by their conversations with those men, or indulgence towards them, who would sacrifice the peace of the kingdom to their own ambition, pride, and even to their humour.—If you carefully provide for the suppressing your enemies at home, which will put you to little other expence than of courage, constancy, and circumspection, you will find your enemies abroad less exalted, and in a short time more inclined to live in amity with you than to make war upon you, especially when they see you do ‘in bello pacis gerere negotium;’ and that you take the carrying on the war to heart, as the best and the only expedient to produce a happy and an honest peace.”

*A Supply of 1,250,000*l.* voted.]* In consequence of the above Speeches, the commons with great unanimity came to these two Resolutions: 1. “That the humble and hearty Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty for his care and conduct in the preservation of his people, and the honour of this nation: and that this house will assist his majesty with their Lives and Fortunes against the Dutch, or any other that shall assist them in opposition to his majesty. 2. That the humble Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty for the care he hath had of the person of h. r. h. the duke of York.” To both which Votes the lords gave their cheerful concurrence.—The commons, to make good their promise, voted a new Supply of 1,250,000*l.* to be raised by a proportionable Addition to the Monthly Assessment to begin at Christmas next; all which soon turned into a Bill. After which they ght in another Bill for a Month’s further ment of 120,000*l.* to commence from the expiration of the former Assessment, to be granted to his majesty, with a desire to his majesty to dispose of it to h. r. h. the duke of York.

The famous Five Mile Act passed.] During this short Session the famous Five Mile Act was passed, which gave occasion to such grievous complaints. By this Act it was enacted, “That no Non-conforming Teacher, under what denomination soever, shall dwell, or come, unless upon the road, within five miles of any corporation, or any other place where they had been Ministers, or had preached after the Act of Oblivion, unless they first took the following Non-resisting Oath: ‘I, A. B. do swear, that it is not lawful, under any pretence whatever, to take up Arms against the king, and that I do abhor the traitorous position of taking Arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such commissions; and that I will not at any time endeavour any Alteration of government either in Church or State.’ The penalty was 40*l.* and 6 months imprisonment, unless they took the said Oath before their commitment.—The reason of this severity given in the Act is, That these Teachers had settled themselves in divers Corporations, sometimes three or more in a place, and took opportunity to distil the poisoned principles of schism and rebellion, to the great danger of the church and kingdom.

An Attempt to impose the Non-Resisting Oaths on the whole Nation, frustrated.] In the house of peers, however, the above Act met with some opposition; and that not only from the lords Ashley and Wharton, who were more than half Non-conformists themselves; but even from the lord treasurer Southampton. But neither the authority of the one, nor the arguments of the other, had any weight: on the contrary, a hint was taken, from those very arguments, to bring in another Bill in the house of commons, by which the said Oath, and Declaration, were to have been imposed on the whole nation. But, on the question, it was rejected by 3 voices; “who had the merit,” says Mr. Ralph, “of saving their country from the greatest ignominy which could have befallen it; that of riveting as well as forging its own chains.”

Thanks of the Commons to the University.] Oct. 31. The Commons resolved, “That the Thanks of this house be given to the Chancellor,

• “The providence by which it was thrown out was very remarkable: for Mr. Peregrine Bertie, being newly chosen, was that morning introduced into the house by his brother, the now earl of Lindsey, and sir Thomas Osborne, now lord treasurer, who all three gave their votes against the Bill; and the numbers were so even upon that division, that their three voices carried the question against it.” See Mr. Locke’s Letter from a Person of Quality, in the Appendix to the present Volume. No. V. p. xl.

Scholars, and Fellows of the famous University of Oxford, for their eminent loyalty to his maj. and his father of ever-blessed memory during the late Rebellion; especially for their unparalleled zeal and courage in refusing to submit to be visited by the usurped powers, and to subscribe the Solemn League and Covenant, and for those excellent Reasons they published to the world to justify their refusal, and to assert his majesty's righteous cause."

The Speaker's Speech to the King, at the Prorogation.] This day, the king came to the house of peers, in order to pass the several Bills, and to make a prorogation: at which time, the commons being sent for, their Speaker, in presenting the Bills, delivered himself thus:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; The knights, citizens, and burgeses of the common house of parliament, in obedience to your majesty's writ of adjournment, came cheerfully to this city of Oxford, to receive your royal commands. And when your maj. was pleased to speak to them, and acquaint them with your great Expences this summer, and the continuing insolencies of the Dutch, they were so inflamed with an affection and zeal for your majesty's service, that they could not suffer the least puncto of time to pass, before they had made a return suitable to their engagements, that they would assist your majesty with their lives and fortunes against the Dutch, or any others that should assist them, in opposition of your majesty, 'Tibi nos, tibi nostra supellex, ruraque servivimus.'—The Englishman useth to speak as he writes, and the English parliament to speak as they think. No security upon earth can be greater than the engagement of your two houses of parliament. 'Sed quid verba audiam, dum facta videam?' As a demonstration of their fidelity, I am commanded to present unto your majesty this Bill, whereby they have given you, for a present Supply, 1,250,000*l.* to be levied in 2 years, to begin from Christmas next, by quarterly payments, added to the former royal aid.—And, to the end your majesty's occasions may be supplied with ready money before this additional aid can be raised, we have by this Bill prepared an undoubted security for all such persons as shall bring their money into the public Bank of your exchequer: as the rivers do naturally empty themselves into the sea, so we hope the veins of gold and silver in this nation will plentifully run into this ocean, for the maintenance of your majesty's just Sovereignty on the Seas.—Great Sir; When first we besought your maj. to correct the insolencies, and to repair your subjects against the rapines of the Dutch, we did reasonably suppose, that the justice of your majesty's demands, would at least have had a fair and ingenuous reception: but the Dutch resolved, with Machiavil, to keep by force what they had got by wrong, and to return their answer by the thundering voice of their cannon. The Great God of Hosts, to whom vengeance belongs, hath eminently appeared in your majesty's quarrel, and sharply rebuked the insolence of that proud people, whose heart is hardened, even to destruction.—'Tis true, our sins do cry aloud, as well as theirs; but God is pleased in mercy to correct us himself, whilst by our hands he doth punish them, and make them fly before us. I hope this mercy will invite us to a national repentance: and 'if God be with us, who then can be against us?'—We cannot but take notice of the sordid defection of some English Fugitives, who have traiterously joined with the Dutch, both in their councils and actions, against your majesty and this their native country. We therefore have prepared a Bill, whereby they are enjoined to return by a day, and answer to the law; or else they shall be attainted and be subject to the pains and penalties of condemned traitors.—It hath been an old observation, "That scandalous Livings make scandalous Ministers;" and this most frequently falls out in cities and corporate towns, where are little or no predial tythes; and therefore the preachers, for mere want, are forced to chant such tunes as may best please the rich men in their parishes: for prevention of this for the future, there is a Bill prepared, for the uniting of small Churches and Chapels in cities and towns corporate by the consent of the patron, reserving all other parochial rites distinct as they were before.—This being a time wherein your maj. needs great Supplies, we held it our duty to ease the people in some unnecessary expences; and therefore we have prepared a Bill for the more effectual proceeding upon Distresses and Awoories for Rents; another to avoid Circuitry of Actions; and a third to lessen the Charge of unnecessary Suits in Law: there is an ancient Fee received in your majesty's courts of law, called Damage Clear, or Damna Clericorum, which is the tenth penny of such damages as are there recovered in many actions. This was first introduced for the encouragement of clerks, to employ themselves to the study of drawing special pleadings, which are grown so familiar by the disuse of real actions, that the fee now is looked upon as a grievance, especially when the plaintiff is forced to pay it upon the signing of his judgment, and perhaps the defendant is not able to answer any part of the execution: therefore we have prepared a Bill for the regulating of this for the present, and after 7 years to take it quite away.—Tacitus hath a saying, 'Such as are false in their love, are true in their hate:' and this rule we find verified in our Non-conformists. Whilst they were in the bosom of the Church of England, they were like inward vapours and inward bleedings, always oppressing and strangling the body of the Church; and now they are ejected and excluded from their ministerial function, they have more malice, and no less opportunity to propagate their principles, than they had before. Some of them are objects of pity. They submitted their reason to their leaders of a higher classis, who failed them in their hopes, and left them to the rigour of the law. These poor creatures have seen their error, and feel the smart, and would live peaceably; but their Jesuitical leaders keep up their spirits, and herd with them in cities and corporate towns, where, by pretence of persecution and self-denial, they move the pity of good-natured people, and with their charity keep up their party, lessen the maintenance of conforming ministers, and spread their contagion amongst the youth of the nation: for the prevention of this growing mischief, we have prepared a Shiboleth, a Test to distinguish amongst them, who will be peaceable and give hopes of future Conformity, and who of malice and evil disposition remain obdurate. The one we shall keep amongst us with all love and charity; the other we shall exclude from cities and corporate towns, like those that have an infectious disease upon them.—It is not unusual for the commons, at the close of a session of parliament, by their Speaker, to present a Petition to their sovereign; and, with your majesty's leave, I am now commanded that service.—We do, with all humble thankfulness to God, acknowledge our great happiness, that we are governed by a prince, whose prudence in counsel, whose valour in action, and whose fatherly care in protection of his people, is eminent through all the world: and it is not the least mercy, both to your maj. and your people, that God hath blessed you with a Brother so like yourself.—The name of his royal highness is already enrolled amongst the heroes of other nations: but this his native country had not so great experience of him, till your maj. was pleased in this summer's Expedition to trust him with the conduct of the most royal fleet that ever sailed upon the British seas, wherein he shewed that prowess, and that prudence; and, by the blessing of Almighty God, was crowned with that success against the Dutch, that we cannot pass it by in silence; and yet we are at a loss how to express our thanks both to your maj. and to him. I am commanded, therefore, to beseech your maj. that you will vouchsafe to let us make a present to you, of a Month's Tax, to come in the rear, after the 24 months of your majesty's royal aid; and that your maj. will be pleased to bestow it upon his royal highness.—And now, Great Sir, I have no more, but to beseech Almighty God, who hath so miraculously preserved your royal person and your two houses of parliament from all sickness and contagion, during this session, that he will be pleased to send health throughout the nation; that he will crown all your designs against your enemies with victory and success, and give your majesty a long and happy reign over us."

The King's Speech at the Prorogation.
After passing the Bills, the King made a short Speech to this effect:

"His majesty told his two houses of parliament, That he did not compliment with them, when he should tell them, that they had done for him all that he could wish they should have done; and therefore thanked them heartily.—His maj. further said, That he believed that no one there would imagine that he would have called them hither at this time, if there had not been an absolute necessity for it. He thanked them with all his heart for their affections shewed to him in this present Supply; which though it is not to be supposed that it can last till the end of the time in which it is to be raised (if the war should so long continue), yet his maj. said, He could not expect that his two houses should do more than they had done at this meeting, considering the deadness of trade through the whole nation, by reason of the Contagion, which addeth to the many streights they have to struggle with. And his maj. said, That for their kindness to his Brother, he thanked them no less than if what they had done for his brother had been done for himself; he having deserved so well of himself and the whole nation.—His maj. told them, that it is probable they should not meet till April next; but yet, lest he might have occasion for their assistance sooner, he had given order for the proroguing this parliament but till Feb. next; and if there should be no occasion of coming together then, he would, by a proclamation, give timely notice thereof."

SIXTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

September 21, 1666. This day, the parliament, after several prorogations, and a long recess of ten months and three weeks, met again at Westminster, where his majesty from the throne thus declared himself to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I am very glad to meet so many of you together again; and God be thanked for our meeting together in this place! Little time hath passed, since we were almost in despair of having this place left us to meet in: you see the dismal ruins the Fire hath made; and nothing but a miracle of God's mercy could have preserved what is left from the same destruction. I need make no excuse to you for dispensing with your attendance in April. I am confident you all thanked me for it. The truth is, I desire to put you to as little trouble as I can; and I can tell you truly, I desire to put you to as little cost as is possible. I wish with all my heart, that I could bear the whole charge of this war myself, and that my subjects should reap the benefit of it to themselves. But we have two very great and powerful enemies, who use all the means they can, fair and foul, to make all the world to concur with them; and the war is more chargeable (by that conjunction) than any body thought it would have been. I need not tell you the success of this Summer, in which God hath given us great success, and no question the enemy hath undergone great losses. And if it had pleased God to have withheld his late judgment by Fire, we had been in no ill condition.—You have given me very large Supplies for the carrying on the war. And yet I must tell you, if I had not, by anticipating my own revenue, raised a very great sum of money, I had not been able to have set out the Fleet this last spring: and I have some hopes, upon the same credit, to be able to pay off the great ships as they come in. You will consider what is to be done next, when you are well-informed of the expence. And I must leave it to your wisdoms, to find out the best expedients for the carrying on this war with as little burden to the people as is possible. I shall add no more, than to put you in mind that our enemies are very insolent; and if they were able this last year to persuade their miserable people, whom they mislead, that the contagion had so wasted the nation, and impoverished us, that we would not be able to set out any fleet, how will they be exalted with this last impoverishment of this city, and contemn all reasonable conditions of peace? And therefore I cannot doubt but you will provide accordingly."

* The King did not till now understand the damage he had sustained by the Plague, much less what he must sustain from the Fire. Monies neither could be collected nor borrowed where the Plague had prevailed, which was over all the city and over a great part of the country; the collectors durst not go to require it or receive it. Yet the fountains yet remained clear, and the waters would run again: but this late Conflagration had dried up or so stopped the very fountains, that there was no prospect when they would flow again. The two great branches of the Revenue, the Customs and Excise, which was the great and almost inexhaustible security to borrow money upon, were now bankrupt, and would neither bring in money nor supply credit: all the measures by which computations had been made were so broken, that they could not be brought to meet again. By a medium of the constant receipts it had been depended upon, that what had been borrowed upon that fund would by this time have been fully satisfied with all the interest, whereby the money would have been replaced in the hands to which it was due, which would have been glad to have laid it out again; and the security would have remained still in vigour to be applied to any other urgent occasions: but now the Plague had routed all those receipts, especially in London, where the great conduits of those receipts still ran. The Plague and the war had so totally broken and distracted those receipts, that the farmers of either had not received enough to discharge the constant burden of the officers, and were so far from paying any part of the principal that was secured upon it, that it left the interest unpaid to swell the principal. And now this Deluge by Fire had dissipated the persons, and destroyed the houses, which were liable to the reimbursement of all arrears; and the very stocks were consumed which should carry on and revive the trade." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 366.

A Committee appointed to receive Informations of the Insolence of Priests and Jesuits. About this time, a Committee was appointed to receive and certify Informations of the Insolence of Popish Priests and Jesuits, and of the Increase of Popery. Of this Committee, Mr. Hungerford was chairman: they sat till the latter end of Oct. examined a cloud of witnesses, delivered in a variety of informations, and, at last agreed upon a Resolution, which had the approbation of the house, as follows: "Resolved, That, in order to the suppressing the Insolency of the Papists, his majesty be humbly desired forthwith to issue out his Royal Proclamation, for the Banishment of all Priests and Jesuits out of this kingdom, within 30 days to be therein limited, other than such (not being his majesty's natural born subjects) who are obliged to attend upon the queen-consort, or the queen-mother: and that, if any Priest or Jesuit shall happen to be taken in England, after the said days, that the laws be put in due execution against them." The house moreover resolved, "That, in the said Proclamation, proper orders should be given for the putting the laws in execution against popish Recusants, and such as were suspected of being so: That his majesty be humbly moved, that, considering the present juncture of affairs, all popish Recusants, and such as, being suspected so to be, shall refuse to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, being tendered to them, may be forthwith so disarmed, as to remove all apprehensions from the people, of their possibilities to disturb the public peace of the nation: and that all officers, military and civil, and soldiers, as shall not within 20 days take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, may be disbanded and displaced:—That the Commissaries of the Musters be commanded and enjoined, upon penalty of losing their places, not to permit any officer or soldier to be mustered in the service and pay of his majesty, till he or they shall have taken the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the laws and usage of the Church of England.' Also, That his maj. be humbly desired to issue out a new commission, for tendering and administering the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to the members of both houses."

Discontents in the House of Commons.] Lord Clarendon tells us, * that, "When the numbers of the members increased, the parliament appeared much more chagrined than it had hitherto done; and though they made the same professions of affection and duty to the king they had ever done, they did not conceal the very ill opinion they had of the court and the continual riotings there: and the very idle discourses of some (who were much countenanced) upon the miserable event of the Fire made them even believe, that the former jealousies of the city, when they saw their houses burning at such a distance from each other, were not without some foundation, nor without just upprehension of a conspiracy, and that it had not been diligently enough examined; and therefore they appointed a Committee, with large authority to send for and examine all persons who could give any information concerning it. When any mention was made of the declaration the commons had so lately passed, for giving the king a Supply and 'that it was high time to dispatch it, that all necessary provisions might be made for the setting out a fleet against the spring;' it was answered with passion, 'that the king's wants must be made first to appear before any Supply must be discoursed of: that there were already such vast sums of money given to the king, that there was none left in the country; nor could any commodities there, upon which they should raise wherewith to pay their taxes, be sold for want of money, which was all brought to London in specie, and none left to carry on the commerce and trade in the country, where they could not sell their corn or their cattle or their wool for half the value.'—They who had not sate in the parliament at Oxford were exceedingly vexed, that there had been so much given there, so soon after the two millions and a half had been granted; and said, 'if the king wanted again already, that he must have been abominably cheated, which was fit to be examined. That the number of the ships, which had been set out by the king in several fleets since the beginning of this war, was no secret; and that there are men enough who are acquainted with the charge of setting out and manning and victualling ships, and can make thereby a reasonable computation what this vast expense can amount to: and that they cannot but conclude, that if his maj. hath been honestly dealt with, there must remain still a very great proportion of money to carry on the war, without need of imposing more upon the people, till they are better able to bear it. And therefore that it was absolutely necessary, that all those, through whose hands the money had passed, should first give an exact Account of what they had received, and what and how they had disbursed it: and when that should appear, it would be reasonable to demand an addition of Supply, which would be cheerfully granted.'*

A Bill brought in for inspecting the Public Accounts.] And for the better expedition of this, continues the noble historian, it was proposed, 'That forthwith a Bill should be prepared, which should pass into an act of parliament, in which such commissioners should be appointed as the houses should think fit, to examine all Accounts of those who had received or issued out any Monies for this War; and where they found any persons faulty, and who had broken their trust, they should be liable to such punishment as the parliament should think fit:' and a Committee was presently named to prepare such a Bill accordingly. This proposition found such a concurrence in the house, that none of the court thought fit to oppose it; and others who knew the method to be new, and liable to just exceptions, thought it to as little purpose to endeavour to divert it: and so all notions for present Supply were to be laid aside till a more favourable conjuncture; and the overture had been contrived and put on by many who seemed not to like it, which is an artifice not unusual in courts or parliaments. The persons who were principally aimed at were sir George Carteret the Treasurer of the Navy, through whom all that expense had passed, who had many enemies upon the opinion that his office was too great, and the more by the ill offices sir Wm. Coventry was always ready to do him; and the lord Ashley, who was Treasurer of all the money that had been raised upon Prizes, which could not but be a great proportion. The former was a punctual officer and a good accomptant, and had already passed his Account in the exchequer for 2 years, upon which he had his quietus est; which was the only lawful way known and practised by all accomptants to the crown, who can receive a good discharge no other way: and he was ready to make another year's account. But what method commissioners extraordinary by act of parliament would put it into, he could not imagine, nor he well satisfied with. The other, the lord Ashley, had more reason to be troubled, for he was by his commission exempted from giving any other Account but to the king himself, which exemption was the only reason that made him so solicitous for the office; and he well knew that there were great sums issued, which could not be put into any publick account: so that his perplexity in several respects was not small. And they both applied themselves to the king for his protection in the point.—His majesty was no less troubled, knowing that both had issued out many sums upon his warrants, which he would not suffer to be produced; and called that committee of the privy council with which he used to advise, and complained of this unusual way of proceeding in the house of commons, which would terrify all men from serving his maj. in any receipts; to which employment men submitted because they knew what they were to do, and what they were to suffer. If they made their account according to the known rules of the exchequer, their discharge could not be denied; and if they failed, they knew what process would be awarded against them. But to account by such orders as the parliament should prescribe, and to be liable to such punishment as the parliament would inflict, was such an uncertainty as would deprive them of all rest and quiet of mind; and was in itself so unjust that his maj declared 'that he would never suffer it: that he hoped it would never find a consent in the house of commons; if it should, that the house of peers would reject it; but if it should be brought to him, he was resolved never to give his royal assent.' There was no man present, who did not seem fully to concur with his maj. that he should never consent to it: 'however that the best care and diligence should be used, that it might never be presented to him, but stopped in the houses; and to that purpose that the members should be prepared by giving them notice of his pleasure.'—The Chancellor upon this argument, in which he discerned no opposition, enlarged himself upon what he had often before put his majesty in mind of; 'that he could not be too indulgent in the defence of the privileges of parliament; that he hoped he would never violate any of them;' But he desired him 'to be equally solicitous to prevent the excesses in parliament, and not to suffer them to extend their jurisdiction to cases they have nothing to do with; and that to restrain them within their proper bounds and limits is as necessary, as it is to preserve them from being invaded. That this was such a new encroachment as had no bottom; and the scars were yet too fresh and green of those wounds which had been inflicted upon the kingdom from such usurpation.' And therefore he desired his majesty to be firm in the resolution he had taken, and not to depart from it; and if such a Bill should be brought up to the house of peers, he would not fail in doing his duty, and speaking freely his opinion against such innovations, how many soever it might offend.' All which discourse of his was in a short time after communicated to those who would not fail to make use of it to his disadvantage.

A Bill brought into the House of Commons against the Importation of Irish Cattle.] There had been for many months a great murmur, rather than complaint, 'of the great damage the kingdom in general sustained by the Importation of such great quantities of Irish Cattle, which were bred there for nothing, and transported for little, that they might well undersell all the cattle here; and from hence the breed of cattle in the kingdom was totally given over, and thereby the land would yield no rent proportionably to what it had ever done: and that this was a principal cause of the want of money in the country, which could only be remedied by a very strict act of parliament to forbid the Importation of any sort of Cattle out of Ireland into this kingdom.' And some of them who had most thought of the matter had prepared a Bill, and brought it into the commons, where it was read. At first it underwent very calm and reasonable debates. Very many members of several counties desired, 'that their counties might not undergo any damage for the benefit of other individual places.' They professed 'that their counties had no land bad enough to breed: but that their great traffic consisted in buying lean cattle, and making them fat, and upon this they paid their rent; and if the bringing over Irish cattle should be restrained, their counties must be undone.' And this appeared to be the case of very many counties in England. And the complaint was of so new a nature, that it had never been heard of in England till some few months before this meeting in parliament; only it had been mentioned in the parliament at Oxford, as a grievance to the Northern counties, which complained no less of the Scots than of the Irish Cattle; and the Bill that was at this time brought into the Commons provided as well against the one as the other. The bill was carried with great difficulty, and long opposition given to it by those members of several counties, which professed, 'that the bringing over the Irish Cattle was so much for their benefit, that they could not live well without it,' and were exceedingly perplexed that it should pass; which yet they hoped would be prevented in the house of peers: and so the Bill was in great triumph, and by all the members (as in cases they much delight in is usual), presented to the house of peers.*

The Bill for inspecting Public Accounts passed by the Commons.] The commons no sooner repaired to their own house, than they assumed the debate upon the Public Accounts, with the same fervour they had pursued the other bill of Ireland, and with the same declaration, 'That they would not enter upon the subject of Money, till they saw what success that bill would likewise have; and appearing every day more out of humour, expressed less reverence towards the court. And some expressions were frequently used, which seemed to glance at the license and disorders and extravagant expence of that place, not without some reflections which aimed at the lady, and at the exorbitant power exercised by her. And this imperious way of proceeding confirmed those in their wariness, who had no mind to oppose or contradict the party that they would and meant should prevail: but they the more endeavoured, to render themselves gracious to the leaders, as being willing to administer fuel to the fire the others intended to kindle; and, so they might preserve themselves, were very willing to expose other ministers to the jealousy of them, who they thought would not be quiet without some sacrifice. And thus they alarmed the king with the new apprehensions, 'that the house, which had yet dutiful intentions, if they were crossed in what they designed for his service, might be provoked to be holder with his majesty than they had been yet, and to mention the prevalence of the lady,' which every body knew the duke of Buckingham would have been glad to have contributed to.† And with these continued

† "There was a correspondence by this time begun and warmly pursued between some discontented members of the house of peers, who thought their parts not enough valued (and the duke of Buckingham was at the head of them), and some members of the house of commons, who made themselves remarkable by opposing all things which were proposed in that house for the king's service, or which were like to be grateful to him, as sir Rd. Temple, Mr. Seyrepresentations, but especially with their old argument of casting it out by the house of peers, where his power could not be doubted, they at last prevailed with the king to leave all men to themselves in the business of the Accounts, as he had done in the Irish Bill: and so that bill likewise was transmitted to the lords.*

Great Animosities in the H. of Lords upon the Bill against Irish Cattle.] Oct. 16. The house of peers was no sooner possessed of the Bill against Irish Cattle, but it was read, and a marvellous keen resolution appeared in many to use all expedition in the passing it; though if the matter itself had been without exception, there were so many clauses and provisos in it so derogatory to the king's honour and prerogative, that many thought it a high disrespect to his majesty to admit them into debate. The duke of Buckingham appeared in the head of those who favoured the Bill, with a marvellous concernment: and at the times appointed for the debate of it, contrary to his custom of coming into the house, indeed of not rising till 11 of the clock, and seldom staying above a quarter of an hour, except upon some affair which he concerned himself in, he was now always present with the first in a morning, and stayed till the last at night; for the debate often held from the morning till 4 in the afternoon, and sometimes till candles were brought in. And it grew quickly evident, that mour, and Mr. Garraway, and sir Rob. Howard; who were all bold speakers, and meant to make themselves considerable by saying, upon all occasions, what wiser men would not, whatever they thought. The duke of Buckingham took more pains than was agreeable to his constitution to get an interest in all such persons, invited them to his table, pretended to have a great esteem of their parts, asked counsel of them, lamented the king's neglecting his business, and committing it to other people who were not fit for it; and then reported all the license and debauchery of the court in the most lively colours, being himself a frequent eye and earwitness of it. He had a mortal quarrel with the lady, and was at this time so much in the king's displeasure (as he was very frequently), that he forbore going to the court, and revenged himself upon it by all the merry tales he could tell of what was done there.—It cannot be imagined, considering the loose life he led (which was a life more by night than by day) in all the liberties that nature could desire or wit invent, how great an interest he had in both houses of parliament; that is, how many in both would follow his advice, and concur in what he proposed. His quality and condescensions, the pleasantness of his humour and conversation, the extravagance and sharpness of his wit, unrestrained by any modesty or religion, drew persons of all affections and inclinations to like his company; and to believe that the levities and the vanities would be wrought off by age, and there there were other reasons which caused so earnest a prosecution of it, above the encouragement of the breed of Cattle in England: insomuch as the lord Ashley, who next the duke appeared the most violent supporter of the Bill, could not forbear to urge it as an argument for the prosecuting it, 'that if this Bill did not pass, all the rents in Ireland would rise in a vast proportion, and those in England fall as much; so that in a year or two the duke of Ormond would have a greater revenue than the earl of Northumberland;' which made a visible impression in many, as a thing not to be endured. Whereas the duke had indeed at least four times the proportion of land in Ireland that descended to him from his ancestors; that the earl had in England; and the revenue of it before the Rebellion was not inferior to the others. But nothing was more manifest, than that the warmth of that prosecution in the house of peers in many lords did proceed from the envy they had of the duke's station in one kingdom, and of his fortune in the other.—And the whole debate upon the bill was so disorderly and unparliamentary, that the like had never been known: no rules or orders of the house for the course and method of debate were observed. And there being, amongst those who advanced the Bill, fewer speakers than there were of those who were against it, those few took upon them to speak oftener than they ought to do, and to would enough of good be left to become a great man, and make him useful to his country, for which he pretended to have a wonderful affection and reverence; and that all his displeasure against the court proceeded from their declared malignity against the liberty of the subject, and their desire that the king should govern by the example of France. He had always held intelligence with the principal persons of the Levelling party, and professed to desire that liberty of conscience might be granted to all; and exercised his wit with most license against the church, the law, and the court. The king had constant intelligence of all his behaviour, and the liberty he took in his discourses of him, for which he had indignation enough: but of this new stratagem to make himself great in parliament, and to have a faction there to disturb his business, his majesty had no apprehension, believing it impossible for the duke to keep his mind long bent upon any particular design, or to keep and observe those hours and orders of sleeping and eating, as men who pretend to business are obliged to; and that it was more impossible for him to make and preserve a friendship with any serious persons, whom he could never restrain himself from abusing and making ridiculous, as soon as he was out of their company. Yet with all these infirmities and vices he found a respect and concurrence from men of different tempers and talents, and had an incredible opinion with the people." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 369. * Life, p. 374.

reply to every man who declared himself to be of another opinion: and when they were put in mind of the rule of the house, 'that no man should speak above once upon the same question,' they called presently to have the house resolved into a committee, which any single member may require, and then every man may speak as often as he please; and so the time was spent unprofitably without the business being advanced. In the mean time the commons proceeded as irregularly, in sending frequent Messages to hasten the dispatch of the Bill, when they knew well the debate of every day: and it was frequently urged as an argument, 'that the commons was the fittest judge of the necessities and grievances of the people; and they having passed this Bill, the lords ought to conform to their opinion.' In fine, there grew so great a license of words in this debate, and so many personal reflections, that every day some quarrels arose, to the great scandal and dishonour of a court that was the supreme judicatory of the kingdom.*

The Lord Ossory challenges the Duke of Buckingham.] The duke of Buckingham, who assumed a liberty of speaking when and what he would in a dialect unusual and ungrave, his similes and other expressions giving occasion of much mirth and laughter, one day said in the debate, 'that whoever was against the above Bill had either an Irish interest or an Irish understanding;' which so much offended the lord Ossory, who was eldest son to the duke of Ormond, that meeting him afterwards in the court, he desired the Duke that he would walk into the next room with him, and there told him, that he had taken the liberty to use many loose and unworthy expressions which reflected upon the whole Irish nation, and which he himself resented so much that he expected satisfaction, and to find him with his sword in his hand: which the duke endeavoured to avoid by all the fair words and shifts he could use, but was so far pressed by the other, whose courage was never doubted, that he could not avoid appointing a place where they would presently meet, which he found the other would exact to prevent discovery, and therefore had chosen rather to urge it himself, than to send a message to him. And so he named a known place in Chelsea Fields, and to be there within less than an hour.—The lord Ossory made haste thither, and expected him much beyond the time; and then seeing some persons come out of the way towards the place where he was, and concluding they were sent out to prevent any action between them, he avoided speaking with them, but got to the place where his horse was, and so retired to London. The duke was found by himself in another place on the other side of the water, which was never known by the name of Chelsea Fields, which he said was the place he had appointed to meet.

The Duke of Buckingham informs the House of the Affair.] Finding that night that the lord Ossory was not in custody, and so he was sure he should quickly hear from him, and upon conference with his friends that the mistake of the place would be imputed to him, he took a strange resolution, that every body wondered at, and his friends dissuaded him from. And the next morning, as soon as the house was sate, the lord Ossory being likewise present that he might find some opportunity to speak with him, the duke told the house, "that he must inform them of somewhat that concerned himself; and being sure that it would come to their notice some other way, he had therefore chose to acquaint them with it himself:" and thereupon related "how the lord Ossory had the day before found him in the court, and desired him to walk into the next room, where he charged him with many particulars which he had spoken in that place, and in few words told him he should fight with him; which though he did not hold himself obliged to do in maintenance of anything he had said or done in the parliament, yet that it being suitable and agreeable to his nature, to fight with any man who had a mind to fight with him, (upon which he enlarged with a little vanity, as if duelling were his daily exercise and inclination), he appointed the place in Chelsea Fields, which he understood to be the fields over against Chelsea; whither, having only gone to his lodging to change his sword, he hastened, by presently crossing the water in a pair of oars, and stayed there in expectation of the lord Ossory, until such gentlemen, whom he named, found him there, and said, 'They were sent to prevent his and the lord Ossory's meeting, whom others were likewise sent to find for the same prevention.' Whereupon, concluding that for the present there would be no meeting together, he returned with those gentlemen to his lodging, being always ready to give any gentleman satisfaction that should require it of him."—Every body was exceedingly surprized with the oddness and unseasonableness of the discourse, which consisted, with some confusion, between aggravating the presumption of the lord Ossory, and making the offence as heinous as the violating all the privileges of parliament could amount unto; and magnifying his own courage and readiness to fight upon any opportunity, when it was clear enough that he had declined it by a gross shift: and it was wondered at, that he had not chosen rather that some other person might inform the house of a Quarrel between two members, that it might be examined and the mischief prevented. But he believed that way would not so well represent and manifest the lustre of his courage, and might leave him under an examination that would not be so advantageous to him as his own information: and therefore no persuasion and importunity of his friends could prevail with him to decline that method.—The lord Ossory seemed out of countenance, and troubled that the contest was like to be only in that place, and cared not to deny any thing that the duke had accused him of; only wondered, that he should say he had challenged him for words spoken in the house, when he had expressly declared to him, when his grace insisted much upon the privilege of parliament to decline giving him any satisfaction, 'that he did not question him for any words spoken in parliament, but for words spoken in other places, and for affronts, which he had at other times chosen to bear rather than to disturb the company.' He confessed, 'He had attended in the very place where the duke had done him the honour to promise to meet him;' and mentioned some expressions which he had used in designing it, which left the certainty of it not to be doubted.—When they had said as much as they had a mind to, they were both required, as is the custom, to withdraw to several rooms near the house: and then the lords entered upon debate of the transgression; many insisting upon the magnitude of the offence, which concerned the honour and safety of the highest tribunal in the kingdom, and the liberty and security of every member of the house. That if in any debate any lord exceeded the modest limits prescribed, in any offensive expressions, the house had the power and the practice to restrain and reprehend and imprison the person, according to the quality and degree of the offence; and that no other remedy or examination could be applied to it, even by the king himself. But if it should be in any private man to take exceptions against any words which the house finds no fault with, and to require men to justify with their swords all that they say in discharge of their conscience, and for the good and benefit of their country; there is an end of the privilege of parliament and the freedom of speech: and, therefore, that there could not be too great a punishment inflicted upon this notorious and monstrous offence of the lord Ossory, which concerned every lord in particular, as much as it did the duke of Buckingham; who had carried himself as well as the ill custom and iniquity of the age would admit, and had given no offence to the house, towards which he had always paid all possible respect and reverence.—They who considered the honour and dignity only of the house, and the ill consequence of such violations as these, which way soever their affections were inclined with reference to their persons, were all of the opinion, 'That their offences were so near equal that their punishment ought to be equal: for that besides the lord Ossory's denial that he had made any reflection upon any words spoken in parliament, which was the aggravation of his offence, there was some testimony given to the house by some lords present, that the lord Ossory had complained of the duke's comportment towards him before those words used in the house by him, 'of the Irish interest or Irish understanding,' and resolved to expostulate with him upon it; so that those words could not be the ground of the quarrel. And it was evident by the duke's own confession and declaration, that he was as ready to fight, and went to the place appointed by himself for encounter; which made the offence equal.' And therefore they moved, that they might be both brought to the bar, and upon their knees receive the sentence of the house for their commitment, the lord Ossory to the Tower, and the Duke to the custody of the Usher of the Black Rod. Which was done accordingly on the 29th of Oct. On the 31st both were brought before the house and released.*

Quarrel between the D. of Buckingham and the Marq. of Dorchester at a Conference.] Dec. 19. Those two lords were no sooner at liberty, but another more untoward outrage happened, that continued the same disturbance. It happened that upon the debate of the same affair, the Irish Bill, there was a Conference appointed with the commons, in which the duke of Buckingham was a manager; and as they were sitting down in the Painted Chamber, which is seldom done in good order, it chanced that the marquis of Dorchester sat next the Duke, between whom there was no good correspondence. The one changing his posture for his own ease, which made the station of the other the more uneasy, they first endeavoured by justling to recover what they had dispossessed each other of, and afterwards fell to direct blows; in which the marquis, who was the lower of the two in stature, and was less active in his limbs, lost his perriwig, and received some rudeness, which nobody imputed to his want of courage, which was ever less questioned than that of the other. The misdemeanour, greater than had ever happened in that place and upon such an occasion, in any age when the least reverence to government was preserved, could not be concealed; but as soon as the Conference was ended, was reported to the house, and both parties heard, who both confessed enough to make them undergo the censure of the house. The duke's friends would fain have justified him, as being provoked by the other; and it was evident their mutual undervaluing each other always disposed them to affect any opportunity to manifest it. But the house sent them both to the Tower; from whence after a few days they were again released together, and such a reconciliation made as after such rencounters is usual, where either party thinks himself beforehand with the other, as the marquis had much of the duke's hair in his hands to recompence for his pulling off of his perriwig, which he could not reach high enough to do to the other.†

Arguments urged against the Irish Cattle Bill, in the House of Peers.] When all things were thus far quieted, the bill was again entered upon with no less passion for the stock that had been wasted. The arguments which were urged against the Bill for the injustice of it were, 'That they should, without any cause or demerit on their part, or any visible evidence of a benefit that would accrue from it to this kingdom, deprive his majesty's two other kingdoms of a privilege they had ever been possessed of. That they might as reasonably take away the trade from any one county in England, because it produced some inconvenience to another county more in their favour. That the large counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Kent, and other provinces, would lose as much by the passing of this act, as the northern and any other counties would gain by it. That those two kingdoms might with the same justice press his majesty's concurrence, that they might have no trade with England, which would bring more Damage to England by much, than it would gain by this act of restraint: and that it was against all the maxims of prudence, to run the danger of a present mischief and damage, as this would produce in Ireland by the testimony of the lord lieutenant and council of that kingdom, only upon the speculation of a future benefit that might accrue, though it were yet only in speculation.'—These, and many other arguments of this kind, which for the most part were offered by men who had not the least relation to Ireland, made no other impression, than that they were content to leave Scotland out of the Bill; which increased their party against Ireland, and gave little satisfaction to the other, who did not so much value the commerce with the other kingdom. And this alteration the commons likewise consented to, but with great opposition, since in truth that concession destroyed the foundation upon which the whole fabrick of the Bill was supported.—Then the debate fell upon some derogatory Clauses, and Provisos very contrary to his majesty's just prerogative and power (for they made his majesty's own license and warrant of no effect or authority, but liable to be controlled by a constable; nor would permit the Importation of 3000 beeves, which, by an act of parliament in Ireland, were every year to be delivered at Chester and another port for the provision of the king's house); which in many respects the house generally disliked, and desired, 'That it might have no other style than had been accustomed in all the penal acts of parliament which were in force, it being to be presumed, that the king would never dispence with any violation of it, except in such cases as the benefit and good of the kingdom required it; which might naturally fall out, if there should happen such a murrain amongst the beasts of that species, as had been these late years amongst horses, which had destroyed so many thousand, that good horses were now hard to be procured. And if the same or the like destruction should fall upon the other cattle, we should have then more cause to complain of the scarcity and the dearth of meat, than we have now of the plenty and cheapness, which was the only grievance now felt, and which kingdom seldom complained of: and in such a case it would be very great pity, that the king should not have power enough to provide for the supply of his subjects, and to prevent a common dearth.'—But this was again opposed with as much passion and violence as had fallen out in any part of the debate; and such rude arguments used against such a power in the king, as if the question were upon, reposing some new trust in him, whereas it was upon divesting him of a trust that was inherent in him from all antiquity: and 'That it was the same thing to be without the Bill, and not to provide against the king's dispensing with the not obeying it, whose inclinations were well known in this particular; and therefore the effect of them, and of the impertunity of the courtiers, must be provided against.' And throughout this discourse there was such a liberty of language made use of, as reflected more upon the king's honour, and indeed upon his whole council and court, than had been heard in that house, but in a time of rebellion, without very severe reprehension: and it so much offended the house now, that, notwithstanding all the sturdy opposition, it was resolved that those Clauses and Provisos should be amended in some places, and totally left out in others. And with these Alterations and Amendments it was sent down to the commons.*

The Commons adhere to their Bill.] When the Bill was sent to the commons with those Alterations and Amendments, they rejected them all, and voted, 'That they would adhere to their own Bill without departing from a word of it, except with reference to Scotland,' from which they had receded. And if upon this very unusual return the house of peers had likewise voted, 'that they too would adhere,' which they might regularly have done, and would have been consented to by the major part of the house if the question had been then put; there had been an end of that Bill. But that must not be suffered: the party that cherished it was too much concerned to let it expire in a deep silence, and were numerous enough to obstruct and defer what they liked not, though not to establish what they desired. Some of them, that is, some who desired that the Bill should pass, though uncorrupted by their passions, did not like the obstinacy of the commons in not departing from some unusual clauses and pretences; yet were not willing to have the like vote for adhering to pass in that house, which it might do when all other remedies should fail; and therefore moved, That a conference might be required in which such reasons might be given as might satisfy them.' Many conferences, and free conferences, were held, in which the commons still maintained their adherence with a wonderful petulance: and those members, who were appointed to manage the conferences, took the liberty to use all those arguments, and the very expressions, which had been used in the house of peers, against leaving any power in the king to dispense; and added such other of their own as more reflected on his majesty's honour; and yet concluded as if they could say more if they were provoked, upon which every man might make what glosses he pleased, and the king himself was left to his own imaginations.

The Bill at length consented to by the Lords.] But there was nothing gotten in all those Conferences, but the discovery of new jealousies of the king and the court, and new insinuations of the discontents and murmurs in the country, that this Bill was so long obstructed. Which being still represented to the king with the most ghastly aspects towards what effects it might produce, his majesty in the end was prevailed upon, notwithstanding very earnest advice to the contrary, not only to be willing to give his royal assent when it should be offered to him, but to take very great pains to remove those obstructions which hindered it from being offered to him, and to solicit particularly very many lords to depart from their own sense, and to conform to what he thought convenient to his service; which gave those who loved him not great argument of triumph, and to those who loved him very passionately much matter of mortification. Yet after all this, and when his majesty had changed some mens resolutions, and prevailed with others to withdraw and to be absent when the Bill should come again to be discussed, it was carried with great difficulty and with great opposition, and against the Protestation of many of the lords.*

Articles of Impeachment against Lord Mordaunt.] January 3, 1666-7. This day, the earl of Anglesey reported the matter of the conference with the commons on the 29th of Dec. last, concerning the Impeachment of John viscount Mordaunt: 'That Mr. Seymour said, he would not trouble their lordships with a large induction, or preface; but deliver the Articles against John visc. Mordaunt, Constable of the Castle of Windsor; which Articles would speak for themselves.' Then the particular Articles of Impeachment being read by Mr. Seymour, he said, The crimes are so fully expressed, that he had little to add; he expressed, that here is an illegal dispossession and arbitrary imprisonment of Wm. Tayleur, esq. by the lord accused, because Mr. Tayleur's daughter would not prostitute herself to his lust. He said, That all the commons of England are wounded through the said Mr. Tayleur: for what the lord viscount Mordaunt hath done arbitrarily against one, he may by his power do against as many others as he please; and then concluded, that the commons would be ready to make good the charge, and attend the prosecution in such ways and time as their lordships shall according to the course of parliament appoint.—Then the lords commanded the said Impeachment to be read, as followeth:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, by the Commons assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the commons of England, against John lord visc. Mordaunt, Constable of the Castle of Windsor, for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors committed by him.

"I. That the said lord visc. Mordaunt, being a peer of this realm, and constable of the Castle of Windsor and commander of the Garrison soldiers there; understanding that one Wm Tayleur esq. (who had faithfully served his late majesty king Charles I. in his wars, and being a great sufferer for his loyalty to him during the time of the usurpation, and by his majesty king Charles II. since his most happy Restoration by letters patents under his great seal of England, promoted to several offices of trust within the said Castle and Honour of Windsor, and in actual possession of certain lodgings with the said Castle, claimed by him as appertaining to his said offices or one of them), did intend to stand for the election of one of the burgesses of the borough of Windsor, to serve in this present parliament (for which writs of summons were issued); in the month of March, 1660 (some weeks before the time of the election), to disparage and prevent the free election of the said Wm. Tayleur, and strike a terror into those of the said borough which should give their voices for him, and deprive them of the freedom of their voices at the election, by colour of a warrant from his maj. on or about the 17th of the said month of March, did, by soldiers, forcibly eject the said Wm. Tayleur, together with his wife (then great with child), family, and goods, out of the said lodgings and Castle, the rude carriage of which soldiers then frightened a young child of the said Mr. Tayleur out of its wits, whereof it soon after died; and moreover, on the 23rd of the same month, the said lord M. did command and cause the said Wm. Tayleur to be forcibly, illegally, and arbitrarily seized upon, by soldiers, in the prison of the said borough, out of the precincts of the said Castle, which soldiers broke open the said prison doors where the said Wm. Tayleur was then prisoner under an arrest for debt, and carried him out of the said prison into the said Castle, without any warrant but their swords, or any lawful cause, and there detained him prisoner, by the said lord M.'s command, from two in the afternoon, till near one the next morning, in a cold low room, some steps under ground, refusing to accept of 2000*l.* bail, then proffered for his enlargement.

II. That the said lord M. at the time of Mr. Tayleur's imprisonment, when 2,000*l.* bail was proffered for his release, being told that the said Mr. T. was the king's servant, and had the king's Great Seal for his place as well as he the said lord M. had for his, in high contempt of his majesty's royal authority and Great Seal, replied, "He would dispose of the said Mr. Tayleur's places, and break the Great Seal, and justify it when he had done."

III. That the said lord M. in March 1664, by letters and otherwise, made sundry uncivil addresses to the daughter of the said William Tayleur; which she rejecting, and threatening to make the said viscount's lady acquainted with them, the said viscount swore, by a most dreadful oath and imprecation, he would persecute her and her family to all eternity.

IV. That on the 23d of Nov. 1665, by order of the said viscount Mordaunt, the said Wm. Tayleur was forcibly and illegally dispossessed, by soldiers, of certain rooms in the Timber-yard belonging to the said Castle, without the walls thereof, claimed by the said Wm. Tayleur as belonging to his offices of pay-master and surveyor of the said Castle.

V. That a warrant, obtained from his majesty by untrue suggestions and misinformations, dated Nov. 30, 1665, but not produced till some months after, upon a Pluries Habeas Corpus, for the restraining of the said Wm. Tayleur from going out of the said Castle, was directed to the said lord M. who, by virtue of his own warrant, not mentioning the said Warrant of his majesty, about the 9th of Dec. following, caused the said Mr. Tayleur to be again forcibly and illegally apprehended and taken into custody, in the said borough of Windsor, without the precincts of the said Castle, by one Rd. Voyle, then marshal of the said Castle, assisted with a file of musketeers, who, by command from the said lord M. carried him prisoner into the said Castle, and there continued and illegally detained him prisoner, during the space of 20 weeks, and 5 thereof a close prisoner, not admitting him to go to church though he desired it; and, locking him up every night, refused to take bail for him, when offered, soon after his imprisonment, whereas his majesty's Warrant was only to restrain him within the Castle; at which time Henry Marten, a traitor, one of the late regicides, then a prisoner there, had liberty to go abroad out of the said Castle without a keeper.

VI. That the said lord M. during the said Wm. Tayleur's imprisonment, illegally refused to return and obey an Habeas Corpus brought by the said Mr. Tayleur for his enlargement; and being afterwards served with an Habeas Corpus by Simondson, servant to the said Mr. Tayleur, for his enlargement, the said lord M. in high contempt of his majesty's authority and laws of this realm, gave the said servant reproachful language, calling him 'rogue' for delivering the said writ; and saying, that was all the answer he would give to it, directly refusing to obey the same: and continued the said Mr. Tayleur divers weeks after a prisoner till set at liberty upon a Pluries Habeas Corpus, by his majesty's Court of King's Bench.

VII. That the said Mr. Tayleur, soon after his enlargement, hearing and fearing that he should be again illegally imprisoned by the said lord M. did hereupon make application to his lordship, by his friends, for a reconciliation; who answered them, 'he would never be reconciled to him;' and threatened to imprison him again; and then, if he brought another Habeas Corpus, he would imprison him again and again, and keep him prisoner as long as he lived, and likewise turn him out of all his employments and offices, and dispose of them to others as he pleased; by reason of which threats and menaces, the said Mr. Tayleur was enforced to desert his wife, family, and employments, at the said borough of Windsor, and to obscure himself elsewhere, till this present session of parliament, to prevent future illegal imprisonments by the said viscount.—All and every of which proceedings are contrary to the Great Charter, and other laws and statutes of this realm, and the rights and liberties of all the Commons and Freemen of England; and of dangerous consequence and example, if unredressed. And the said commons by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said viscount, and also of replying to the Answer to the said Articles, or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises, or any other Impeachment or Accusations that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall (according to the course of parliaments) require, do pray, That the said viscount M. may be called to answer the said several Crimes and Misdemeanors, and receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve; and that such further proceedings may be upon every of them had and used against him as is agreeable to law and justice."

Lord Mordaunt's Answer to the said Articles.]

Jan. 17. The lord Mordaunt gave the house humble thanks, for giving him so long time to advise for the putting in his Answer to the Impeachment of the house of commons against him; and, in obedience to their lordships command, now presented his Answer in writing, with a desire that the same may be communicated to the House of Commons. Then the said Answer was read as followeth:

The Humble ANSWER of John lord visc. Mordaunt, constable of his majesty's Castle and Honour of Windsor, to certain ARTICLES of IMPEACHMENT, exhibited against him by the Commons assembled in Parliament, for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors supposed to be committed by him.

"The lord visc. Mordaunt, not being conscious to himself of any malice or purpose of evil to any man alive, nor having had other displeasure against Wm. Tayleur, in the said Articles named, than what arose from his insolent and provoking deportment towards his majesty, in disobeying his warrants and his lordship in the execution of his office (under whose immediate government he is by the offices he holds in Windsor Castle), and from the variety of complaints which have been reiterated to his ldp. by the country against him for his oppression in those offices, and from the manifest abuses by him committed, in mispending the revenue of the said Castle, and defrauding the artificers, as also clandestinely and fraudulently endeavouring to pass Accompts without controul, which matters are now depending in the courts below at Westminster Hall, accounts it a singular unhappiness, that so worthy a body as the hon. house of commons, for whom his ldp. hath ever had so great respect, should think themselves concerned in that one man's person to accuse him, in their names, and in the names of all the commons of England: and he did well hope that it being offered to that hon. house on his behalf, that he would (with leave from your lordships) be ready to answer Mr. Tayleur in any action at law, and waive his privilege, they would have spared themselves and your lordships the trouble of this examination, and him the misfortune of being accused by them: therefore, praying your lordships that no informality in this his Answer, nor any mistaken word or expression, may be construed to his disadvantage, and saving to himself all privileges and rights belonging to him as a peer of this realm, and all advantages of exceptions to the insufficiency and informality of the said Impeachment, humbly answers,

'To the 1st Article, Which concerns the dispossession of Wm. Tayleur of certain rooms in Windsor Castle, the said lord visc. M. answereth, That he was very ignorant of those faithful services Mr. T. had done to the late king of ever-blessed memory, or of any sufferings upon the account of his loyalty to him; which had he known, they would have obliged him to a due consideration of him; and doth affirm he is yet as great a stranger to his merits, as he was at that time to his person; and heartily wishes his obedience and integrity to his maj. that now reigns could have justified that character of him: but, to satisfy your lordships how ill he deserved from his maj. and the lord M. in the matters of this Article, saith, That, in the year 1660, when his maj. was pleased, on his grace and favour, to confer upon him that important trust of Constable and Governor of the Castle of Windsor, he found Mr. T. in possession of that house which belongs to the Chancellor of the Garter; that, the first installation being presently to be solemnized, his maj. was pleased, by his immediate warrant of the 24th Feb. 1660, to command, that within 20 days the possession of that house, in habitable condition, should be delivered to the Chancellor of the Garter; with which Warrant Mr. T. being acquainted, and having perused it, positively refused to remove upon that warrant; but he was advised by the lord M. to consider better of it: however, he afterwards returned the same answer, with somewhat more stubbornness; and his wife being importuned by his ldp. to persuade her husband to yield obedience, she said, she would acquaint her husband with it: all those fair ways being essayed, and finding no obedience, rather than suffer his majesty's commands to be disputed by his servant, and con-

tumaciously disobeyed in his own house, his ldp. found it necessary, in observance to the said Warrant, to command a serjeant of the garrison, with some few soldiers, to remove his goods and family, yet with all civility imaginable; which they punctually observed, and assisted them in carrying out their goods. As to the affrightment of the child out of its wits, his ldp. cannot think the sight of soldiers in Windsor Castle should have such effect, the child having been seen playing and well after that time of removal, and, as his ldp. is informed, was sick of the worms, and this affrightment never spoken of till this occasion.—The dispossession was indeed by soldiers; the king's commands not being otherwise to be executed there, no sheriff or other civil officer being permitted to come into the king's house and garrison, by order of the place: and these were the only causes of this dispossession, and not any concernment in his election to parliament, which is most evident, in that he did stand for burgess, wherein the election was free, and was elected by the commonalty of the town; but his election afterwards was avoided by the house of commons. As to the seizing Mr. T. by soldiers out of the precincts of the Castle, and carrying him into the Castle, without warrant or any lawful cause, his ldp. saith, That the time of his securing was 3 weeks before his election; and that the place where Mr. T. was apprehended, was within the Jurisdiction of the Castle (as he taketh it), for that the courts were there held by the said Wm. T. as clerk to the Constable of the Castle, who, being a counsellor at law, would not have kept courts there as his lordship's deputy, if the same had been out of the Jurisdiction of the said Castle. And his ldp. saith, That he being informed and assured that the said Mr. T. was not a prisoner for debt; and the said Mr. T. having insolently disobeyed his majesty's commands concerning his own house, and spoken several scandalous and opprobrious words against his ldp. and his family, his ldp. did command an officer and some few soldiers to carry him to the guard, where he was detained some few hours, and after set at liberty; and his ldp. denies that any bail was tendered to him for his enlargement: and his ldp. being constable and governor of the said Castle (it being then a garrison for the king), and believing that it might be a great encouragement to others to disobey commands, if this insolence were not taken notice of and punished; these were the true causes of his being sent for; and hopes it will not be imputed to him as done arbitrarily, or in contempt of the law, to which he hath always shewn ready obedience, and hath asserted its authority in the worst of times, with the hazard of his life.

'To the 2nd Article, he saith, That, as Constable of the said Castle, his ldp. claims to have the disposition of several of those offices in possession of Wm. T. by colour of his patent: but denies any contemptuous words spoken of the king's Great Seal, or otherwise than to the effect and purpose to vacate his patent, which his ldp. was informed by his Counsel to be void in law.

'To the 3rd Article, His ldp. denies any uncivil addresses to Win. T.'s daughter, or of any threats of ruin to her family.

'To the 4th, he saith, That there were several rooms in the Timber Yard in the possession of the said Wm. T. all which (except such as he claimed to belong to him as surveyor of the said Castle) did belong to several artificers, to some by patent, and to others by constant usage and enjoyment; and that, by his majesty's order under his majesty's privy signet of the 28th Feb. 1664, the rooms belonging to the artificers of the said Castle are commaunded to be restored to them; and, that his ldp. might be sure to do no man injury, he desired several gentlemen of the neighbourhood, who had been well acquainted with the offices and usage of the said Castle (whereof the said Wm. T. was one), to make enquiry, and certify concerning the said rooms; which all of them (except Mr. T.) accordingly returned, 'That the Rooms possessed by the said Wm. T. belonged to divers artificers;' whereof Mr. T. having notice left at his house, his wife and family there refused to deliver possession according to his majesty's commands, but instead thereof returned reviling language; and at this time when he was removed from the said rooms, the said Wm. T. was suspended from the place of Receiver by an order of his maj. and council, and Mr. Dudley Rouse placed in the said office, the said rooms claimed to belong to the said office were delivered to the said person that was placed in the said office, and the rest to the artificers to whom they belonged; but the rooms as surveyor are still in his possession, without any disturbance.

'To the 5th Article, he saith, That the suggestions in his majesty's Warrant of the 30th Nov. 1665, for restraining Wm. T. from going out of the said Castle, are true; and that he was taken by the marshal and brought into the Castle without any soldiers, and during his restraint there he was not a close prisoner by his lordship's directions as by his lordship's warrant will appear; neither did he at any time refuse bail for him, for none was tendered. And as for Henry Marten's liberty, his lordship saith, it was not done with his privy or consent; but saith, he hath since enquired thereinto, and finds the fact to be, that the lord Lovelace, being lord lieut. of the county, coming to Windsor, sent to the officer, to desire leave for Henry Marten (his brother-in-law) to dine with him, who accordingly gave him leave, and sent the marshal with him, who brought him back again.

'To the 6th, he saith, That the first Habeas Corpus was returnable immediate, and was delivered in his lordship's absence, he being then attending his maj. at Oxford, and did not know of the same till after the return thereof. The 2nd Habeas Corpus was not delivered to his ldp. till Saturday afternoon at Windsor, and the term ended on Monday following; so as, by reason of the shortness of the time, he could not make return thereof; and his ldp. doth deny that he called the person that delivered the said writ, 'rogue;' or used any reviling or reproachful language against him for the Delivery of the said writ; and upon the Pluries Habeas Corpus, his ldp. made a return thereof in due time, and the court of king's bench saw cause to hold him bound by recognizance to appear the last day of the term, to answer any information that should be exhibited against him for the matters in the Warrant.

'To the 7th he saith, That he knows not what Mr. T. might hear concerning his future imprisonment, nor what his guilt might make him apprehend; but that his lordship had not the least thought of it himself. He assured a noble peer of this house, who writ to him on Mr. T.'s behalf, that he would not imprison him; neither was he afterwards imprisoned by his ldp. or did any warrant or commaund from his ldp. issue to that purpose. And as to the allegation, that he hath been enforced to leave his wife and family, it is surely a great mistake; for he oftentimes since kept courts publicly at Windsor, without interruption, or cause of fear.—Having thus most plainly expressed to your lordships the truth of his proceedings, he humbly submits the same to your lordships judgment."

The said Answer was communicated to the commons, but it does not appear from the Journals that they made any replication thereto.

Disagreement between the two Houses.] Soon after this Impeachment, a difference ensued between the lords and commons, concerning a Poll-Bill, and the Bill for taking the Public Accounts; the former were for doing it by commission from the king, and not by Bill, as was proposed by the commons. The consequence of which was, that the latter in some heat resolved, "That this proceeding of the lords in going by Petition to the king for a Commission for taking the Public Accounts, while there was a bill sent up by this house, and depending before them, for taking the Accounts another way, is unparliamentary, and of dangerous consequence." A few days after, they likewise declared, "That, according to the right and settled course of parliament upon Bills, neither a bill, nor any part thereof is to be communicated to his majesty by either house, until the whole be agreed unto by both houses." As to the Poll-Bill, the lords in a free Conference insisted, among other things, upon adding some names to the commissioners. To which the commons disagreed; but without the least asserting their peculiar rights as to Money-Bills: they only gave this reason for their non-compliance, "That it hath been observed, that in all Acts of Subsidies and of Poll-Money, the greater the number of commissioners, the less money hath been raised; for many commissioners incumber one another, and rather pro-ture the ease of themselves, and their many friends, than the advance of the king's service, and the public benefit."

The Speaker's Speech to the King, on presenting the Poll-Bill.] Jan. 18. The king came to the house of peers, and commanded the attendance of the commons; who being come, their Speaker addressed his majesty as follows:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; Since the two houses of parliament, by your majesty's command, were last convened, they have with great care inspected the state of the kingdom: they find your majesty engaged in a sharp and costly war, opposed by mighty princes and states, that are in conjunction against us. They see with sorrow the greatest part of your metropolitan city buried in ashes. These are 'Ardua Regni' indeed, and fit only for the advice of a loyal parliament. But, sir, looking narrowly into things, we found our body politic entering into a consumption; our treasures, that are the sinews of war and the bond of peace, as much exhausted; the great aids which are given to your majesty for the maintenance of the war are but like the blood in its circulation, which will return again, and nourish all the parts: but a great deal is yearly transported in specie into France, to bring home apes and peacocks; and the best returns are but superfluities and vanities: we have therefore unanimously besought your majesty to stop this issue of blood; and we hope your majesty's most seasonable and gracious Proclamation will prevent the future expiration of these spirits.—We have likewise been alarmed from all parts of the kingdom, by the Insolencies of Popish Priests and Jesuits, who, by their great numbers and bold writings, declare to all the world, they are in expectation of a plentiful harvest here in England: but your majesty, by your gracious Answer to the desire of both your houses, your command for all officers and soldiers in your majesty's pay to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and your Proclamation for the Departure of Priests and Jesuits out of this nation, have in a great measure secured us against those fears.—When your majesty was pleased, at the opening of this session, to speak to us, you commanded us to find out the best expedients we could, for carrying on the war with as little burden to the people as was possible.—The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, have industriously applied themselves to the consideration of this matter. They quickly resolved of a Supply for your majesty, suitable to your occasions, of 1,800,000*l.*: but it hath taken up much of their time, so to lay this aid, that it may not seem a burden. A little weight lying always upon one shoulder will at length become uneasy; but being shifted sometimes to the other shoulder, there will be some refreshment.—The greatest part of the taxes that have been raised these 26 years were laid upon our lands, which made us desire to give them some rest:

we have therefore prepared a Poll Bill; whereby we have brought in all sorts of persons, professions, and personal estates, to give their assistance to your majesty, and to ease the land-tax: 'Multorum manibus grande levatur onus.' This Bill, we hope, will speedily bring in a considerable sum of ready money for your majesty's present use. We have likewise taken care for supplying the remainder by another Bill remaining with us, which in a short time will be ready to be presented to your majesty.—The better to enable your majesty's good subjects to pay these several Aids, and with cheerfulness to supply your majesty's future occasions; we thought it necessary to remove a nuisance out of their way. The infinite number of Foreign Cattle that were daily imported did glut our markets, and bring down the prices both of our home-bred cattle and our lands; therefore we have prepared a Bill for the prohibiting of any Foreign Cattle for 7 years.—We find your majesty's Mint is not so well employed as formerly; and the reason is, because the fees and wages of the officers and workmen is in part paid out of the bullion that is brought to be coined, and what is wanting is made up by your majesty. We have, therefore, for the ease of your majesty and those that shall bring in any plate or bullion to be coined there, made another provision, by an imposition upon wines, brandy, and cyder, imported from any foreign nations.—Having given your majesty this short account at present, we shall, with your leave, return to perfect those bills that still remain with us; and we hope so to finish them to your majesty's satisfaction, that all your majesty's enemies both at home and abroad may see and feel the effects of this blessed correspondence between our gracious king and his loyal parliament."

The King's Speech, on passing the Poll Bill.] After passing the said Bill, his majesty made the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I have now passed your Bills; and I was in good hope to have had other bills ready to pass too. I cannot forget, that within few days after your coming together in Sept. both houses presented me with their Vote and Declaration, that they would give me a Supply proportionable to my occasions: and the confidence of this made me anticipate that small part of my Revenue which was unanticipated for the payment of the seamen: and my credit hath gone farther than I had reason to think it would; but it is now at an end.—This is the first day I have heard of any money towards a Supply, being the 18th of Jan. and what this will amount to, God knows; and what time I have to make such preparations as are necessary to meet three such enemies as I have, you can well enough judge: and I must tell you, what discourses soever are abroad, I am not in any treaty; but, by the grace of God, I will not give over myself and you, but will do what is in my power for the defence of myself and you. It is high time for you to make good your promise; and it is high time for you to be in the country, as well for the raising of money, as that the lords lieutenants and deputy lieutenants may watch those seditious spirits which are at work to disturb the public peace; and therefore I am resolved to put an end to this session on Monday next come sevensnight, before which time, I pray, let all things be made ready that I am to dispatch. I am not willing to complain you have dealt unkindly with me in a Bill I have now passed, in which you have manifested a greater distrust of me than I have deserved. I do not pretend to be without infirmities: but I have never broken my word with you; and, if I do not flatter myself, the nation never had less cause to complain of grievances, or the least injustice or oppression, than it hath had in these 7 years it hath pleased God to restore me to you. I would be used accordingly."

Notwithstanding this intimidating speech, the commons proceeded with the affairs before them; especially the Impeachment of lord Mordaunt, which had likewise given his majesty some offence. Serj. Maynard, sir R. Atkins, Mr. Wm. Pryne, &c. were appointed to manage the evidence at the hearing: and on the 26th of Jan. read the Articles before the house of lords: but with dissatisfaction observed, that, during the reading of them, the lord Mordaunt was within the bar of the house. Of this the commons complained, and moved, 'That, according to former precedents in such proceedings, his ldp. might stand without the bar of the house.' And when one appeared as council for him, was beginning to plead in this matter, they thought fit to interrupt him, acquainting the peers, 'That his ldp. ought not to have any council assigned him to plead for him in matter of fact upon the Impeachment.' This caused a conference, and, indeed, a difference between the two houses: The lords insisted upon their rights and privileges, and on the 4th of Feb. confirmed their Order for the lord Mordaunt's sitting within the bar at his trial, produced two precedents for it, and declared themselves ready for the trial the next morning. The commons upon this were still more dissatisfied, and desired a free conference; in which matters were carried so high, that the lords declared, 'That they desired this conference to preserve a right understanding between both houses; but insisted upon it, that they might deny a free conference with the commons, citing a precedent, 12th Jac. where a free conference was denied the commons in point of one imposition; and that in point of judicature (which the lords insisted on to be only in the king and themselves) they might deny the commons a free conference.

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the Prorogation.] Feb. 8. But all these disputes were ended this day by the appearance of the king in the house of peers, who sent for the commons in order to a prorogation. Their Speaker sir Edw. Turner, having several Bills ready, presented them with this following Speech to his majesty;

"May it please your most excellent majesty; Nothing conduceth more to the happiness of a nation than a right understanding between the prince and the people: and nothing more advanceth this correspondence than frequent meetings in common council. By the wisdom of our fore-fathers, the security of our lives, our liberties, and our properties, is lodged in our English parliaments; and so gracious have your majesty's predecessors been, that, for the satisfaction of their people, they have made several laws, some for Triennial, some for Annual parliaments. Your majesty, by their example, upon the humble suit of your lords and commons, hath in a former session of this parliament, passed an act for Triennial meetings in parliaments; but in this your maj. hath exceeded all your predecessors, that, as your happy Restoration was in a Convention of parliament, so of your own accord, for the public good, and as a demonstration of your extraordinary love to parliaments, you have vouchsafed, ever since your return, to converse with your people in parliament; this being the 6th year, and the 6th session, of this present parliament.—The last time your maj. was pleased to speak to us, you commanded us to make ready all things you were to dispatch this session. In obedience thereunto, we have with all industry imaginable endeavoured so to prepare those matters that were before us, that your maj. and the whole nation may receive satisfaction in our dispatches.—First, it concerned us to keep our words with your majesty, in finishing that Supply which we promised you for the carrying on the war. In order whereunto, I do here present unto your maj. this Bill of 11 Months Assessment upon our lands, to take place in a post-charge after the additional royal aid now current is expired. This act, together with the Poll Bill lately passed, we conceive, will fully make up the 1,800,000*l.* we promised to your majesty.—We must for ever with humility acknowledge the justice of God, in punishing this whole nation by the late dreadful Conflagration of London. We know they were not the greatest sinners on whom the Tower of Syloe fell; and doubtless all our sins did contribute to the filling up that measure, which, being full, drew down the wrath of God upon that city. But it very much reviveth us to behold the miraculous blessing of God upon your majesty's endeavours for the preservation of that part of the city which is left: 'Et fas est resurgere mœnia Trojæ.' We hope God will direct your royal heart, and fortunate hand, in a few days, to lay a foundation stone in the rebuilding that royal city; the hearty and praise whereof shall fill the whole earth.—For the encouragement of this noble work, we have prepared several Bills: one, for the establishing a Judicatory, for the speedy determining all actions, and causes of action, that have or may arise between landlords and tenants, upon this sad accident, Though, I persuade myself, no Englishman would be exempted from making some offering to carry on this pious undertaking, yet the exemplary charity of your majesty's 12 reverend Judges is fit with honour to be mentioned before your majesty: they are willing to spend all their sand that doth not run out in your majesty's immediate service, of dispensing justice in their several courts to your people, in hearing and determining those controversies that may arise upon old agreements, and making new rules between owners and tenants, for their mutual encouragement in this glorious action. We have likewise prepared a Bill for the Regularity of the new Buildings, that they may be raised with more convenience, beauty, and security, than they had before. Some streets we have ordered to be opened and enlarged, and many obstructions to be removed; but all with your majesty's approbation. This we conceive cannot be done with justice, unless a compensation be given to those that shall be losers: we have therefore laid an Imposition of 12 pence upon every chaldler, and 12 p. upon every ton of coals, that shall be brought into the port of London, for 10 years, the better to enable the lord mayor and aldermen to recompense those persons whose grounds shall be taken from them.—Rome was not built in a day; nor can we, in the close of this session, finish the rules for the dividing of Parishes, rebuilding of the churches, and the ornamental parts of the city. These things must rest that we intended, till another session. But we know your maj. in the mean time will take them into your princely consideration, and make it your care that the houses of God and your own royal chamber be decently and conveniently restored.—And now, great sir, having thus happily finished the business of this session, we beg your majesty's leave that we may return to our own homes, there to put in execution the good laws which you have made, and to defend our several countries against all designs to disturb the peace of the nation. And we beseech Almighty God, who hath hitherto wonderfully preserved your majesty's person, and made you glorious in all your achievements, still to prosper your forces both at sea and land, till he hath made your maj. an asylum for all your friends, and a terror to your enemies both at home and abroad.

The King's Speech at the Prorogation.] After passing the said Bills his majesty made the following Speech;

“My Lords and Gentlemen; I thank you for this other bill of Supply which you have given me; and I assure you, the money shall be laid out for the ends it is given. I hope we shall live to have bills of this nature in the old stile, with fewer provisos. I looked to have had somewhat offered to me concerning the Accompts of the Money that hath been already raised since the war; which since you have not done, I will take care (after so much noise) that the same be not stifled, but will issue out my commission in the manner I formerly promised the house of peers: and the commissioners shall have very much to answer, if they do not discover all matters of fraud and cozenage.—The season of the year is very far spent, in which our enemies have got great advantages over us; but, by the grace of God, I will make all the preparations I can, and as fast as I can. And yet I must tell you, that if any good overtures be made for an honourable peace, I will not reject them; and I believe all sober men will be glad to see it brought to pass.—I shall now prorogue you till towards winter, that you may in your several places intend the peace and security of your several countries, were there any unquiet spirits enough working. And I do pray you, and I do expect it from you, that you will use your utmost endeavours to remove all those false imaginations in the hearts of the people, which the malice of ill men have industriously infused into them, of I know not what jealousies and grievances; for I must tell you again, and I am sure I am in the right, that the people had never so little cause to complain of oppression and grievances as they have had since my return to you. If the taxes and impositions are heavy upon them, you will put them in mind, that a war with such powerful enemies cannot be maintained without taxes: and I am sure that the money raised thereby comes not into my purse.—I shall add no more, but that I promise myself all good effects from your affections and wisdoms, where-ever you are. And I hope we shall meet again of one mind, for my honour, and the good of the kingdom. And now, my lord privy seal, do as I have directed you.” Whereupon the Lord Privy Seal declared the parliament to be prorogued to the 10th of October.

Principal Occurrences during the Recess.] The following is a short account of the principal Occurrences which took place during the recess. “Charles began to be sensible, that all the ends, for which the war had been undertaken, were likely to prove entirely abortive. The Dutch, even when single, had defended themselves with vigour, and were every day improving in their military skill and preparations. Though their trade had suffered extremely, their extensive credit enabled them to levy great sums; and while the seamen of England loudly complained for want of pay, the Dutch navy was regularly supplied with money and every thing requisite for its subsistence. As two powerful kings now supported them, every place, from the extremity of Norway to the coasts of Bayonne, was become hostile to the English. And Charles, neither fond of action, nor stimulated by any violent ambition, earnestly sought for means of restoring tranquillity to his people, disgusted with a war, which, being joined with the plague and fire, had proved so fruitless and destructive. The first advances towards an accommodation were made by England. When the king sent for the body of sir Wm. Berkeley, he insinuated to the states his desire of peace on reasonable terms; and their answer corresponded in the same amicable intentions.

Charles, however, to maintain the appearance of superiority, still insisted that the States should treat at London; and they agreed to make him this compliment so far as concerned themselves: but being engaged in alliance with two crowned heads, they could not, they said prevail with these to depart in that respect from their dignity. On a sudden, the king went so far on the other side as to offer the sending of ambassadors to the Hague; but this proposal, which seemed honourable to the Dutch, was meant only to divide and distract them, by affording the English an opportunity to carry on cabals with the disaffected party. The offer was therefore rejected; and conferences were secretly held in the queen-mother's apartments at Paris, where the pretensions of both parties were discussed. The Dutch made equitable proposals; either that all things should be restored to the same condition in which they stood before the war; or that both parties should continue in possession of their present acquisitions. Charles accepted of the latter proposal; and almost every thing was adjusted, except the disputes with regard to the Isle of Pelerone. This island lies in the East Indies, and was formerly valuable for its produce of spices. The English had been masters of it; but were dispossessed at the time when the violences were committed against them at Amboyna. Cromwel had stipulated to have it restored; and the Hollanders, having first entirely destroyed all the spice trees, maintained, that they had executed the treaty, but that the English had been anew expelled during the course of the war. Charles renewed his pretensions to this island; and as the reasons on both sides began to multiply, and seemed to require a long discussion, it was agreed to transfer the treaty to some other place; and Charles made choice of Breda—Lord Hollis and Henry Coventry were the English ambassadors. They immediately desired, that a suspension of arms should be agreed to, till the several claims could be adjusted: but this proposal, seemingly so natural, was rejected by the credit of de Wit. That penetrating and active minister, thoroughly acquainted with the characters of princes and the situation of affairs, had discovered an opportunity of striking a blow, which might at once restore to the Dutch the honour lost during the war, and severely revenge those injuries, which he ascribed to the wanton ambition and injustice of the English.—Whatever projects might have been formed by Charles for secreting the money granted him by parliament, he had hitherto failed in his intention. The expences of such vast armaments had exhausted all the supplies; and even a great debt was contracted to the seamen. The king therefore was resolved to save, as far as possible, the last supply of 1,800,000*l.* and to employ it for payment of his debts, as well those which had been occasioned by the war, as those which he had formerly contracted. He observed, that the Dutch had been with great reluctance forced into the war, and that the events of it were not such as to inspire them with great desire of its continuance. The French, he knew, had been engaged into hostilities by no other motive than that of supporting their ally; and were now more desirous than ever of putting an end to the quarrel. The differences between the parties were so inconsiderable, that the conclusion of peace appeared infallible; and nothing but forms, at least some vain points of honour, seemed to remain for the ambassadors at Breda to discuss. In this situation, Charles, moved by an ill-timed frugality, remitted his preparations, and exposed England to one of the greatest affronts which it has ever received. Two small squadrons alone were equipped; and during a war with such potent and martial enemies, every thing was left almost in the same situation as in times of the most profound tranquillity.—De Wit protracted the negotiation at Breda and hastened the naval preparations. The Dutch fleet appeared in the Thames under the command of de Ruyter, and threw the English into the utmost consternation. A chain had been drawn across the river Medway; some fortifications had been added to Sheerness and Upnore-castle: but all these precautions were unequal to the present necessity. Sheerness was soon taken; nor could it be saved by the valour of sir Edward Sprague, who defended it. Having the advantage of a spring tide and an easterly wind, the Dutch pressed on, and broke the chain, though fortified by some ships, which had been there sunk by orders of the duke of Albemarle, (10th June). They burned the three ships which lay to guard the chain, the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the fifth. After damaging several vessels, and possessing themselves of the hull of the royal Charles, which the English had burned, they advanced with six men of war and five fire-ships, as far as Upnore-castle, where they burned the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James. Captain Douglas, who commanded on board the Royal Oak, perished in the flames, though he had an easy opportunity of escaping. 'Never was it known,' he said, 'that a Douglas had left his post without orders.' The Hollanders fell down the Medway without receiving any considerable damage; and it was apprehended, that they might next tide sail up the Thames, and extend their hostilities even to the bridge of London. Nine ships were sunk at Woolwich, four at Blackwall; platforms were raised in many places, furnished with artillery: the trained bands were called out; and every place was in a violent agitation. The Dutch sailed next to Portsmouth, where they made a fruitless attempt: they met with no better success at Plymouth: they insulted Harwich: they sailed again upon the Thames as far as Tilbury, where they were repulsed. The whole coast was in alarm; and had the French thought proper at this time to join the Dutch fleet, and to invade England, consequences the most fatal might justly be apprehended. But Lewis had no intention to push the victory to such extremities. His interest required that a balance should be kept between the two maritime powers; not that an uncontroled superiority should be given to either.—Great indignation prevailed among the English to see an enemy, whom they regarded as inferior, whom they had expected totally to subdue, and over whom they had gained many honourable advantages, now of a sudden ride undisputed masters of the ocean, burn their ships in their very harbours, fill every place with confusion, and strike a terror into the capital itself. But though the cause of all these disasters could be ascribed neither to bad fortune, to the misconduct of admirals, nor to the ill behaviour of seamen, but solely to the avarice, at least to the improvidence, of the government; no dangerous symptoms of discontent appeared, and no attempt for an insurrection was made by any of those numerous sectaries, who had been so openly branded for their rebellious principles, and who upon that supposition had been treated with such severity.—In the present distress, two expedients were embraced: an army of 12,000 men was suddenly levied: and the parliament, though it lay under prorogation, was summoned to meet.*

SIXTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

July 25, 1667. His majesty having prorogued the parliament to the 10th of October,† and being advised, that the weighty affairs of the kingdom might require a sooner day of their meeting; he therefore, by his proclamation, having summoned them to meet on this day; both houses met accordingly, when the commons were proceeding to business, the Speaker informed them, that his majesty had commanded him to let them know, that, conceiving the house might not be full at their first meeting, he had deferred his coming to acquaint them with what he had to say, till Monday next: and that the house should adjourn till that day. “Whether, says Mr. Ralph, “the house was disgusted with this usage, or met in an ill humour from the ill situation of the public affairs, or wanted to make their own advantage of the public calamities, they did not obey his majesty’s injunction, till they had first come to a Resolution nem. con. “That his maj. be humbly desired, by such members as are his privy counsel,

† It being a current opinion, or rather an unquestioned certainty, that upon a prorogation a parliament cannot be convened before the day, though upon an adjournment it may; Mr. Prynne had been brought privately to the King to satisfy him, that upon an extraordinary occasion he might do it: and his judgment, which in all other cases he did enough undervalue, very much confirmed him in what he had a mind to.” Lord Clarendon’s Life, p. 423.

that when a peace is concluded, the new-raised Forces be disbanded.”

The King’s Speech.] July 29. This day his majesty came to the house of peers and made a short Speech to both houses to this effect:

“He conceived, he could not give his houses of parliament a greater testimony of his affections to them, than by sending for them when he was in such straits as were superior to any other counsels; which now being over, he was confident, he could not better please them, than to dismiss them again to their several countries at such a time as this is. His maj. said, The Peace being now concluded, the Articles would be made public within a few days, which he supposed would seem reasonable to them, and all Christendom as much rejoice at the peace as they were disturbed by the war. His maj. further told his houses, That their own affairs now require their presence elsewhere; and he did hope they would use all industry and severity (for both were necessary) to reduce the people to a better temper than they have been in of late. His maj. further said, He wondered what one thing he had done since his coming into England, to persuade any sober person that he did intend to govern by a Standing Army; he said he was more an Englishman than so. He desired, for as much as concerned him, to preserve the laws; and if others will pay that due respect they owe to the laws, there would be no fear of any such thing. His maj. said, The last year he raised some troops, which he disbanded as soon as the season would permit; and he was certain, he deferred raising forces long enough this year, in that he gave not one commission till the enemy was landed; and he was sure, that the persons now in commission are such as will be as desirous to be out of the employment as to continue in it. He further said, he would say no more, but that he hoped his two houses of parliament should meet here in Oct. next, and that they would then come with such inclinations as may restore the kingdom to as good a condition as it were ever in; and he did assure them he should not be wanting on his part.”—The parliament was then prorogued to the 10th of October.

Principal Occurrences during the Recess—Fall of the lord Chancellor Clarendon.] “The signing of the Treaty at Breda,” says Mr. Hume,* “extricated the king from his present difficulties. The English ambassadors received orders to recede from those demands, which however frivolous in themselves, could not now be relinquished, without acknowledging a superiority in the enemy. Polorone remained with the Dutch; satisfaction for the ships Bona-venture and Good-hope, the pretended grounds of the quarrel, was no longer insisted on; Acadie was yielded to the French. The acquisition of New-York, a settlement so important by its situation, was the chief advantage which the English reaped from a war, in which the national character of bravery had shone out with lustre, but where the misconduct of the government, especially in the conclusion, had been no less apparent.—To appease the people by some sacrifice seemed requisite before the meeting of parliament; and the prejudices of the nation pointed out the victim. The Chancellor was at this time much exposed to the hatred of the public, and of every party which divided the nation. All the numerous sectaries regarded him as their determined enemy; and ascribed to his advice and influence those persecuting laws, to which they had lately been exposed. The catholics knew, that while he retained any authority, all their credit with the king and the duke would be entirely useless to them, nor must they ever expect any favour or indulgence. Even the royalists, disappointed in their sanguine hopes of preferment, threw a great load of envy on Clarendon, into whose hands the king seemed at first to have resigned the whole power of government. The sale of Dunkirk, the bad payment of the seamen, the disgrace at Chatham, the unsuccessful conclusion of the war; all these misfortunes were charged on the chancellor, who, though he had ever opposed the rupture with Holland, thought it still his duty to justify what he could not prevent. A building, likewise, of more expence and magnificence than his slender fortune could afford, being unwarily undertaken by him, much exposed him to public reproach, as if he had acquired great riches by corruption. The populace gave it commonly the appellation of Dunkirk house.—The king himself, who had always more revered than loved the chancellor, was now totally estranged from him. Amidst the dissolute manners of the court, that minister still maintained an inflexible dignity, and would not submit to any condescensions, which he deemed unworthy of his age and character. Buckingham, a man of profligate morals, happy in his talent for ridicule, but exposed in his own conduct to all the ridicule which he threw on others, still made him the object of his railery, and gradually lessened in the king that regard which he bore to his minister. When any difficulties arose, either for want of power or money, the blame was still thrown on him, who, it was believed, had carefully at the restoration checked all lavish concessions to the king. And what perhaps touched Charles more nearly, he found in Clarendon, it is said, obstacles to his pleasures as well as to his ambition.—The king, disgusted with the homely person of his consort, and desirous of having children, had hearkened to proposals of obtaining a divorce, on pretence either of her being pre-engaged to another, or of having made a vow of chastity before her marriage. He was farther stimulated by his passion for Mrs. Stuart, daughter of a Scotch gentleman; a lady of great beauty, and whose virtue he had hitherto found impregnable: but Clarendon, apprehensive of the consequences attending a disputed title, and perhaps anxious for the succession of his own grandchildren, engaged the duke of Richmond to marry Mrs. Stuart, and thereby put an end to the king's hopes. It is pretended that Charles never forgave this disappointment.—When politics, therefore, and inclination both concurred to make the king sacrifice Clarendon to popular prejudices, the memory of his past services was not able any longer to delay his fall. The great seal was taken from him, and given to sir Orlando Bridgeman, by the title of lord keeper. Southampton, the treasurer, was now dead, who had persevered to the utmost in his attachments to the chancellor. The last time he appeared at the council-table, he exerted his friendship with a vigour which neither age nor infirmities could abate. "This man," said he, speaking of Clarendon, "is a true protestant, and an honest Englishman; and while he enjoys power, we are secure of our laws, liberties, and religion. I dread the consequences of his removal."—But the fall of the Chancellor was not sufficient to gratify the malice of his enemies: his total ruin was resolved on. The duke of York in vain exerted his interest in behalf of his father-in-law. Both prince and people united in promoting that violent measure; and no means were thought so proper for ingratiating the court with a parliament, which had so long been governed by that very minister, who was now to be the victim of their prejudices."

SEVENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech at the opening of the Session.] Oct. 10. This day both houses met: his majesty opened the Session with the following short Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; When we last met here, about 11 weeks ago, I thought fit to prorogue the parliament till this day, resolving that there should be a session now, and to give myself time to do some things I have since done, which I hope will not be unwelcome to you, but a foundation for a greater confidence between us for the future. The other reasons of that prorogation, and some other matters with which I would acquaint you, I have commanded my Lord Keeper to declare unto you."

The Lord Keeper Bridgeman's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper* spake as followeth:

* "Sir Orlando Bridgeman was a man of good natural parts, which he very carefully improved by study and application. He was, soon after the Restoration, made lord chief baron of the exchequer; whence he was, in a few months, removed to the common pleas. While he presided in this court, his reputation was at the height: then his moderation and equity were such, that he seemed to carry a chancery in his breast. Upon his receiving the great seal, his reputation began to decline: he was timid and irresolute, and this timidity was still increasing with his years. His judgment was

"My lords; and you knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; This parliament (after many good and wholesome laws made with your advice in several sessions, many great Supplies and Aids given to his majesty, and for the maintenance of the wars, and many other signal testimonies of your affection and duty to him, for which he again and again renews unto you his most hearty thanks) was, as you very well know, prorogued from Feb. last, till this 10th day of Oct.; his majesty having then reason to believe, that there would be no cause of your re-assembling in the mean time.—But, in this interval, the Dutch (who, since the war begun, were strengthened by the union of France and Denmark, having a great fleet) actually invaded the land; and the French at the same time had a royal army in the field, not far from the sea coast, the conjunction of which with the others, in some design against England, or some other of his majesty's dominions, we had then cause to suspect.—In this strait his maj. (who in lesser difficulties had frequent recourse unto his parliament, as his great and faithful council, and therefore hath every year once, often twice, re-assembled you) thought it necessary to anticipate the time, and issued out proclamations for your meeting on the 25th of July last past.—This (though unusual) was done by the advice of his privy council; public necessity and exigencies allowing, or at least dispensing with, many things, which (except in such cases) were not to be allowed, or dispensed withal.—Before that 25th of July, there was a prospect and daily expectation, and (within 3 days following) an assurance of a Peace, concluded with, and ratified, by our three potent adversaries. The storm which threatened us being thus blown over, and succeeded by so great a serenity, it was raised as a doubt by grave and wise men, whether or no, the necessities and difficulties which caused so early a summons being removed, you could sit or act as a parliament before the 10th of Oct. being the fixed time to which you were formerly prorogued. For this cause, together with those others mentioned by his majesty, he, in his princely wisdom, held it necessary, in a matter of so great consequence, again to fix upon this day for your meeting in parliament, about which there can be no dispute; which being thus twice not equal to all the difficulties of his office. In nice points he was too much inclined to decide in favour of both parties; and to divide what each claimant looked upon as his absolute property. His lady, a woman of cunning and intrigue, was too apt to interfere in chancery suits; and his sons, who practised under him, did not bear the fairest characters. He is said to have been removed from his office for refusing to affix the seal to the king's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience." Granger, vol. iii. p. 361. prefixed, and you meeting here upon a double call, his maj. hopes it is a happy omen, that this session of parliament (which in law is but one day, all acts of this session referring to it unless otherwise specially provided) will be happy and prosperous to his majesty, to you and to the whole kingdom.—My Lords and Gentlemen; His maj. supposes that no man would expect, that during your recess he should have refused overtures of Peace; the vicinity, as well as potency, of his united enemies, the great expences of the war, carried on with much disadvantage, by reason of the Plague and dismal Fire in London, the consideration of the posture of affairs abroad (besides many other motives obvious unto you), induced him to embrace the opportunity of concluding a peace.—But you well know, that though the war be at an end, all the effects thereof are not yet ended: it will require time, and your good advice, to remove those obstructions which hinders the current of trade, both at home and abroad; and in this particular, his maj. thinks fit to recommend it to your wisdom, to settle such a balance of Trade between his subjects of this kingdom and those of Scotland, as that we may not be prejudiced, by the import of their commodities hither, nor yet they so discouraged as to leave off trading here, and find out another vent abroad, more dangerous to us. This he finds too hard for him without your assistance, though (upon your recommending it to him) he hath used some endeavours therein.—His maj. formerly promised that you should have an Account of the Monies given towards the war, which his maj. hath commanded his officers to make ready; and since that way of commission (wherein he had put the examination of them) hath been ineffectual, he is willing you should follow your own method, examine them in what way and as strictly as you please. He doth assure you, he will leave every one concerned to stand or fall, according to his own innocence or guilt.—His maj. hath reason to believe, that some disaffected persons (taking advantage of the public necessities) have spread abroad discourses and rumours reflecting upon the government, intending thereby to beget a dissatisfaction in his good subjects. And it is an easy thing to take exceptions, 'cum neque culpam humana infirmitas, neque calumniam regnandi difficultas, evitet.' But his maj. promises himself, from your good affections, that every one of you, in your several places, will endeavour to preserve a good understanding between him and his people; and if any just grievances shall have happened, his maj. will be as willing and ready to redress them for the future, as you to have them represented unto him.—And his maj. doubts not but you will give healing and moderate counsels, and imprint that known truth into the hearts of his subjects, that there is no distinct interest between the king and his people; but the good of the one is the good of both."

Address of both Houses to the King.] Oct. 15. Immediately after, the house of commons took into consideration what had been said to them, and resolved upon an Address of thanks to his majesty, in which they desired and obtained the concurrence of the lords. Accordingly, this day the two houses in a body, with their Speakers, attended the king in the Banqueting House at Whitehall; where the Lord Keeper, as Speaker of the house of peers, in the name of both houses, repeated this following Address to his majesty:

“ We your majesty’s loyal and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, having taken into our serious consideration your majesty’s gracious Speech, wherein you were pleased to let us know, that your majesty thought fit to prorogue this parliament till the 10th of Oct. that you might give yourself time to do something which would not be unwelcome, but a foundation for a greater confidence between your majesty and your people; we find ourselves bound in duty to return your majesty our humble and hearty Thanks for the gracious Declaration of your royal intentions in that your majesty’s gracious Speech, and in that delivered by your majesty’s command by the Lord Keeper. And particularly, ‘ that your majesty hath been pleased to disband the late raised Forces; and to dismiss the Papists from out your guards, and other military employments: for your maj.’s care in quickening the execution of the Act for restraining the Importation of foreign cattle: for causing the Canary Patent to be surrendered and vacated: and, more especially, that your majesty hath been pleased to displace the late Lord Chancellor, and remove him from the exercise of public trust and employment in affairs of state.’ To which Address his maj. was pleased to make this return; ‘ I thank you for your Thanks; I am glad the things I have done have given you so good satisfaction: and for the earl of Clarendon, I assure you I will never employ him again in any public affairs whatsoever.’* ”

* “ When the house of commons came together, one Tomkins, a man of very contemptible parts and of worse manners (who used to be encouraged by men of design to set some motion on foot, which they thought not fit to appear in themselves till they discerned how it would take), moved the house ‘ that they might send a Message of Thanks to the king for his gracious expressions, and for the many good things which he had done, and particularly for his removing the Chancellor;’ which was seconded by two or three, but rejected by the house as a thing unreasonable for them who knew not the motives which had disposed his majesty: and so a committee was appointed to prepare such a Message as might be fit for them to send. And the lords the same day sent to the king, without consulting with the commons, to give his majesty Thanks for the Speech he had made to them in the morning, which commonly used to be done. The king declared himself very much offended that the

PROCEEDINGS RELATIVE TO THE IMPEACHMENT OF THE EARL OF CLARENDON.

Oct. 26. The commons took into examination the conduct of the earl of Clarendon, to proposition in the house of commons for returning Thanks to him had not succeeded, and more that it had been opposed by many of his own servants; and commanded them ‘ to press and renew the motion: that his honour was concerned in it; and therefore he would expect Thanks, and would take it very ill of any of his own servants who refused to concur in it.’— Hereupon it was again moved: but notwithstanding all the labour that had been used contrary to all custom and privilege of parliament, the question held six hours debate, very many speaking against the injustice and irregularity of it; they on the other side urging the king’s expectation of it. In the end the question being put, it was believed the Noes were the greater number: but the division of the house was not urged for many reasons; and so the Vote was sent to the lords, who were desired to concur with them.—But it had there a greater contradiction. They had already returned their Thanks to the king; and now to send again, and to add any particular to it, would be very incongruous and without any precedent: and therefore they would not concur in it. This obstinacy very much displeased the king; and he was persuaded by those who had hitherto prevailed with him, to believe that this contradiction, if he did not master it, would run through all his business that should be brought into that house. Whereupon his maj. reproached many of the lords for presuming to oppose and cross what was so absolutely necessary for his service: and sent to the abp. of Canterbury, ‘ that he should in his majesty’s name command all the Bishops bench to concur in it; and if they should refuse it, he would make them repeat it;’ with many other very severe reprehensions and animadversions. This being done in so extraordinary a manner, the duke of York told his majesty, ‘ how much it was spoken of and wondered at:’ to which his maj. replied, ‘ that his honour was engaged, and that he would not be satisfied if Thanks were not returned to him by both houses; and that it should go the worse for the Chancellor if his friends opposed it.’ And he commanded b. r. l. that he should not cross it, but was contented to dispense with his attendance, and gave him leave to be absent from the debate; which liberty many others likewise took: and so when it was again moved, though it still was confidently opposed, it was carried by a major part, many being absent.—And so both houses attended the king and gave him Thanks, which his majesty graciously received as a boon he looked for, and said somewhat that implied that he was much displeased with the Chancellor; of which some men thought they were to make the best use they could. And therefore, after the king’s Answer was reported to the house of peers, as of course what-whose charge Mr. Edward Seymour* then laid many great and heinous crimes. Upon which there arose a debate in the house how they should proceed upon it, some moving he should be impeached in the name of the commons, till Articles should be formed against him; others urged, that witnesses should be first examined, to see how the Charge might be made good, lest, in case of failure, it might reflect on the honour of the house. After a long debate, a committee was appointed to search records for parliamentary proceedings in the like cases; from which Mr. Vaughan making report on the 29th, that they had found various proceedings in several parliaments, there arose another long debate, which was maintained with great warmth.

Sir Thomas Littleton said, that in cases criminal, they find proceedings to have been, sometimes by Articles, sometimes by word of mouth; but in capital crimes no proceedings appear till the earl of Strafford's case, against whom the house carried up a general Impeachment; the reason whereof seems to be this: some votes were made in the house at which the king takes offence, as if they would proceed upon common fame; whereupon they vindicate their proceedings as done in a parliamentary way, and appoint a committee to withdraw for about half an hour to consider the matter for a conference with the lords about the Charge, and upon their report a general Charge is carried up to the lords' bar;

soever the king says upon any Message is always reported, it was proposed, 'That the king's Answer might be entered into the Journal-Book;' which was rejected, as not usual, even when the king himself spoke to both houses; nor was what he now said entered in the house of commons. However, when they had consulted together, finding that they had not yet so particular a record of the displeasure against the Chancellor, as what he had said upon this Message did amount unto, they moved the house again, 'that it might be entered in the Book;' and it was again rejected. All which would not serve the turn; but the duke of Buckingham a third time moved it, as a thing the king expected: and thereupon it was entered." Clarendon's Life, p. 443.

* Afterwards sir Edward, Speaker of the House of Commons, a Commissioner of the Admiralty, and Treasurer of the Navy.—"The ablest man of his party was Seymour, who was the first Speaker of the house of commons, that was not bred to the law. He was a man of great birth, being the elder branch of the Seymour family; and was a graceful man, bold and quick. He was violent against the court, till he forced himself into good posts. He knew the house and every man in it so well, that by looking about he could tell the fate of any question." Burnet.

"From being a wild spark about town, he came early into the court, and was of that gang that routed the lord chancellor. His the principal Charge then was for advising to bring over the Irish Army, and the single proof was sir Henry Vane, so the Impeachment went up for High-Treason, though no member would positively say he would make the Charge good. So for the bishop of Canterbury there was no Impeachment, but a Charge in general. And if you take not the same course now, but insist upon examining witnesses first, the difficulties will be unanswerable; for is it like that men before they shall see you in earnest will have their names produced against the earl of Clarendon? If this be your proceeding, we must never expect to impeach a great man more. If you think there is nothing in the Charge leave it, but if you think it is worth your while take heed of making such a dangerous precedent as by neglecting it to wound your liberties; but proceed in the usual way with a general Impeachment.

Serjeant Maynard.† I stand not up to give advice, but to speak to matter of fact in the business of Strafford and Canterbury. I attended that business from the beginning: sir J. Clotworthy informed something against Strafford to be direct treason, that he had assumed an arbitrary power in Ireland, and dispossessed one Savage by force of arms, and undertook to prove it. Sir H. Vane also told them that he had a note taken out of his father's cabinet, containing the advice which Strafford gave the king in that case. Namely, the king wanting money, and the question being how entrance was through the parliament; for, being buoyed upon the Western alliance, he was considerable in the house of commons. He served as Speaker there eleven years; and, as such, was called to the privy council. He was ambitious and proud in the highest degree; and was supposed to decline no means that tended to his advancement. When he was of the privy council, he scorned to speak at the lower end, where his place was, but commonly walked up near the king, and standing behind the chairs of the chancellor, or other great lords, spoke to the king. And, as his nature, so his speeches were often arrogant and disrespectful. Once, at the council, he said to the king, 'Sir, how long will your majesty prevaricate with yourself?' The king muttering, repeated the word 'prevaricate' divers times, but made no reply. This, probably, joined with other like tempered speeches, lost him the king's favour." North's Life of the Lord Keeper Guilford, p. 228.

† Of this celebrated lawyer, who lived till after the Revolution, this remarkable story is told by bishop Burnet. He came with the men of the law to wait on the prince of Orange, being then 90 years old, and yet said the lieeliest thing that was heard of on that occasion. The prince took notice of his great age, and said that he had outlived all the men of the law of his time. He answered, he had like to have outlived the law itself, if his highness had not come over.

he should supply it, he replied, 'That if the parliament was refractory and would not, you stand loosed and absolved from rules of government; you have an army in Ireland which you may employ to reduce them.'

Then there was a debate, Whether they should accuse him of Treason. And,

Sir Edw. Herbert (the Attorney) said, if you are persuaded the truth is, as is pretended, you may, and so it was; but when the close committee had examined the business, they moved the house, that some lawyers might be added to them, and had they gone, when they said they were ready, they had not touched one hair of Strafford's head. Then it was considered what was fit to be done: To accuse him of Treason would be a dangerous precedent, as if out of many other crimes a Treason could be drawn, thereupon it was Resolved not to demand judgment from the lords, because some Articles were not Treason. Then it was propounded not to state what his offences were, lest it should give advantage to inferior courts so to proceed; but said he deserved to be accused of Treason, and in conclusion a proviso was added, not to make that case a precedent. For the bishop of Canterbury, the 4 Articles were general, and he was long in prison without any proceeding against him; but after long time he demurred, then new Articles were framed, on which he died.

Mr. John Vaughan.^{*} You have had a charge opened of a strange nature, and I know not what part of it can be proved, but the reputation of this house is at stake, and of the king too; for, where a Charge is brought in by some of your members, whereof one Article is, That he should say such words of the king, as by a statute made by you is a præmunire, and to give council to levy war upon the kingdom; is it agreeable to our duty to the king and kingdom to let it die? For the person concerned, I know not which way his honour can be whole without his giving an Answer to his Charge; for mark the consequence, if the king should take him to favour again, before cleared, will not the world say, a person is received to favour again who gave the king council against the kingdom, and traduced the king, and how can he be whole in his honour this way; (Obj. But it will be said, we must have ground to put him to Answer. Ans. Whether you have ground enough to prove I know not, but you have ground enough to make him Answer to clear himself. Suppose those two Articles had been charged on a member of this house, what would it have become that member to do; should he sit still and say, 'I will make no Answer, but see whether the house will make more proof;' if he should do so, the not making an Answer is reason enough to charge him. I can give you instances of persons charged in parliament, who, though not nominated, yet being (as it were) pointed at, petitioned that they might

Answer, and so would any man; but when this is bruted up and down, will not the world say, You never ask the party whether guilty?—The Duke of Suffolk was charged upon common fame, and if that were a ground for a charge then (which I do not say it was) so it is in this case: but he moved that he might be heard, and though it was desired he might be committed, yet it was justly rejected till he had answered: then for the nature of the Charge, if it be true, it is very high, but whether it be Treason is another matter, it is brought to you under no name, when you make the charge, it becomes you to say what it is; therefore choose a Committee to reduce the accusation into Heads, and bring them to you, without which you cannot right yourselves, nor him, if innocent.—For the way of it, it cannot be thought fit to publish your witnesses and the matter before-hand; if in private causes the defendant and plaintiff should have a publication before hand, no cause would be rightly judged, much less when you have publication of all which concerns the one, but nothing of the other. Again, if a witness be examined concerning matters in his own knowledge, if he gives evidence, where he is not brought judicially to give it, if he hath testified any thing which brings him within the statute of false news, how can he avoid the penalty? For it is not enough for him to say he knows it, but he must have others to justify it.—As for the persons who bring the Charge, they are your own members, which the writs return for honest and discreet men, and if you are satisfied of that, how can you reject their complaint, though grounded upon Common Fame, as all accusations are, seeing they tell you, they can bring proof of what they say?—Then for Common Fame, if a man spends largely, and hath no visible way to get an estate, no man accuseth him to have gotten it unlawfully; yet he may be put to clear himself from what Common Fame chargeth him with. Upon suspicion of felony, I may bring a man before a magistrate to clear himself, so in the course of Indictments, and Presentments, a Charge is given of what things are to be presented; then a proclamation is made, That if any one can give evidence, he may be sworn, but if no evidence appear, yet they may indict.—Then it will be said, the oath is a material thing, but we are proceeding without an oath. To this I answer, What this house shall charge is of more authority than the oaths of ordinary witnesses; peers though not upon oath are supposed to do right, so are we upon the reputation of our honesty and discretion.

Mr. Laurence Hyde.^{*} I am sensible, the house may think me partial, but I shall endeavour to shew myself not so much a son of the earl of Clarendon as a member of this house; and I assure you that if he shall be found Guilty, no man shall appear more against him than I; if not, I hope every one will be for him as much as I: let every man upon his conscience think what of this Charge is true, for I believe that if one Article be proved, he will own himself guilty of all.

* The earl of Clarendon's second son. "He is a man of far greater parts than the eldest. He has a very good pen, but speaks not gracefully. He was thought the smoothest man in the court; and during all the disputes concerning his father, he made his court so dextrously, that no resentment ever appeared on that head." Burnet.

*Sir Henrice Finch. An Impeachment there must be, if there be Cause; such accusations are not to be passed over in silence. I believe not one truth in the law more than this proposition, that there is no such thing as treason by common-law, or by equity, and we hold our lives by that law; before the 25th of Edw. III. a man could scarce speak any thing but it was treason in parliament or out, but no man ought to die as a traitor, who hath not literally offended that law, or some other made since: there is indeed in that law a proviso about the parliaments declaring what is treason, but note the danger of taking declaratory powers, which I fear hath brought us into a reckoning of blood, which we have not yet paid for. The power of parliaments is double, legislative, which hath no bounds, declaratory, by pronouncing judgments. And though I know not what the legislative power of a parliament cannot do, yet it is not in the power of the parliament, king, lords, nor commons, to declare any thing to be treason which is not in the common-law felony before. The proviso in Strafford's case was (it is true) made for inferior courts; but I hope we shall not so proceed as must needs draw after it a 'ne trahatur in exemplum,' and your own act this parliament shews, that all done by Strafford, a part, or together, was not treason: and it behoves us to take heed we thwart not our own argument.

—For the manner then, consider how you should proceed if it were out of parliament, and how the bringing of it into the house alters it. If it were out of parliament, without doubt the accusation should be proved before hand, and those who discover it are guilty of felony. This provides for the subject, that the witnesses must be two, and for the king, that none shall discover the evidence.—But suppose the Charge be for misdemeanors, the trial then is not to be by the lords, but by the commons; for the lords are his peers only in cases capital. How then doth the bringing it into parliament alter the case? If the parliament set aside laws in this case, we should be happy to see law declaring what is the power of parliaments. There is no precedent produced which is singly of weight to guide you, therefore if you proceed, let it be as near as possible to the good old laws; namely, That there be an Accusation founded upon an oath and the evidence kept secret, I propose that way for the very reason that others oppose it, viz. The Accusation goes over the kingdom, and it will bring dishonour to the house, the king, and the earl; for the honour of the house, it will be hard to say, the Charge was brought in upon misinformation; a person accused for advising to bring in arbitrary government, &c. And for saying the king is not fit to govern; if this be true, though it be not treason in the formality of the law, it deserves no less punishment than if it were; but if not found guilty, consider the case. If one say, A. killed a man and it is not so, must not he give reparation? We have an accusation upon hear-say, but if it be not made good, the blackest scandal which hell can invent, lies at our door—Then sir Tho. Meares moving to refer it to the Committee of Grievances,

Mr. Vaughan. You should have put the first question before another had been moved, the earl of Middlesex (Cranfield's Case) will not hold parallel; he was accused of bribery, which might be proved by their own books, but this is for scandalizing the king, &c. And where shall the committee of grievances enquire about it? You say let them hear the persons. But suppose they be of the lords house, can you send for them? Or if you do, will they come and say it? The matter of this accusation is such, that if it lies in the knowledge of a single person, if he delivers it extrajudicially (which he doth, if not upon oath) he may be undone by it, and hazard his person too: at the committee of grievances the persons must be known, and what they can say, and then we may conclude what will follow: besides, their quality may be such as they cannot be brought, or their discretion such as they will not answer.

Sir Rd. Temple. Tell but the lords that a man in public place hath misbehaved himself, and they will sentence him, if he purge not himself; never yet were witnesses examined before the trial in case of treason or felony, for then, if there be two witnesses, a way may be found by poison, or some other way, to take away one. Let not this son of Zeruah be too strong for king and parliament.

® "This was the famous Andrew Marvell, who was representative for the town of Kingston upon Hull. He discharged this trust with strict integrity and fidelity; and was highly esteemed by his constituents, to whom he constantly sent a particular account of every proceeding in the house, with his own opinion thereupon: a conduct so diligently respectful, together with his general obliging deportment towards them, did not fail to endear him perfectly to their affection; and they were not wanting on their side to testify their grateful sense of it, by allowing him an honourable pension the whole time he represented them." Marvell's Life, prefixed to his works, p. 9, 10. persons: would not have a sudden impeachment by reason of the greatness of the person or danger of escape, lord Clarendon not being likely to ride away post.

Sir Tho. Clifford.* It will make an end of all impeachments here, to have witnesses examined.

Serj. Maynard. No man can do what is just, but he must have what is true before him; where life is concerned you ought to have a moral certainty of the thing, and every one be able to say upon this proof 'In my conscience this man is guilty.' Common fame is no ground to accuse a man where matter of fact is not clear; to say an evil is done, therefore this man hath done it, is strange in morality, more in logic.

Upon the whole debate it was voted, "That the Committee do reduce the Accusation to Heads and present them to this house."

Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Clarendon.] Nov. 6. Sir Tho. Littleton reported from the Committee appointed to draw up the Heads of Accusation against the earl of Clarendon, certain Articles, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk's table, which are as followeth, viz :

I. "That the earl of Clarendon hath designed a Standing Army to be raised, and to govern the kingdom thereby, and advised the king to dissolve this present parliament, to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future, to govern by a military power, and to maintain the same by Free Quarter and Contribution.

II. That he hath, in the hearing of the king's subjects, falsely and seditiously said, "That the king was in his heart a Papist,—Popishly affected, or words to that effect.

III. That he hath received great sums of Money for the procuring of the Canary Patent, and other illegal Patents, and ganted illegal Injunctions to stop proceedings at law against them, and other illegal Patents formerly granted.

IV. That he hath advised and procured divers of his majesty's subjects to be imprisoned against law, in remote islands, garrisons, and other places, thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the law, and to produce precedents for the imprisoning any other of his majesty's subjects in like manner.

V. That he hath corruptly sold several Offices, contrary to law.

VI. That he procured his majesty's Customs to be farmed at under rates, knowing the same; and great pretended Debts to be paid by his majesty, to the payment of which his

maj. was not in strictness bound; and hath received great sums of money for procuring the same.

VII. That he received great sums of money from the Company of Vintners, or some of them, or their agents, for enhancing the prices of Wines; and for freeing of them from the payments of legal Penalties, which they had incurred.

VIII. That he hath, in short time, gained to himself a greater estate than can be imagined to be lawfully gained in so short a time; and, contrary to his oath, hath procured several Grants, under the great seal, from his majesty, to himself, and his relations, of several of his majesty's lands, hereditaments, and leases; to the disprofit of his majesty.

IX. That he introduced an arbitrary government in his majesty's Plantations; and hath caused such as complained thereof before his majesty and council, to be long imprisoned for so doing.

X. That he did reject and frustrate a Proposal and Undertaking, approved by his majesty, for the preservation of Nevis and St. Christopher's, and reducing the French Plantations to his majesty's obedience, after the commissions were drawn up for that purpose; which was the occasion of our great losses and damages in those parts.

XI. That he advised and effected the Sale of Dunkirk to the French king, being part of his majesty's dominions; together with the ammunition, artillery, and all sorts of stores there; and for no greater value, than the said ammunition, artillery, and stores, were worth.

XII. That the said earl did unduly cause his majesty's letters patents, under the great seal, to one Dr. Croucher, to be altered, and the enrollment thereof to be unduly razed.

XIII. That he hath, in an arbitrary way, examined, and drawn into question, divers of his majesty's subjects, concerning their lands, tenements, goods and chattels, and properties; determined thereof at the council-table; and stopped proceedings at law, by order of the council-table; and threatened some that pleaded the Statutes of 17 Car. I.

XIV. That he hath caused Quo Warrantos to be issued out against most of the corporations of England, immediately after their charters were confirmed by act of parliament; to the intent he might receive great sums of money from them, for renewing their charters; which when they complied withal, he caused the said Quo Warrantos to be discharged, or prosecution thereupon to cease.

XV. That he procured the Bills of Settlement for Ireland, and received great sums of money for the same, in most corrupt and unlawful manner.

XVI. That he hath deluded and betrayed his majesty, and the nation, in foreign treaties and negotiations, relating to the late war; and discovered and betrayed his secret counsels to his enemies.

* Clifford began (in 1665) to make a great figure in the house of commons. He was the son of a clergyman, born to a small fortune: but was a man of great vivacity. He was reconciled to the church of Rome before the Restoration. He struck in with the enemies of the earl of Clarendon." Burnet.—He was afterwards advanced to a peerage, was made Lord Treasurer, and was one of the CABAL.

XVII. That he was a principal Author of the fatal Counsel of dividing the Fleet about June 1666."

Mr. Edw. Seymour, after having charged the lord chancellor, in general, thus expressed himself: He makes the earth groan by his Building* (the monument of his greatness) as we have done under his oppression: and speaking of the king's being a Papist, said, As if the ills he had done must be supported by greater †.

Sir Tho. Littleton. [On presenting the Articles.] If he did not the crimes alledged, he is able to clear it upon others; he whined after a peace. At the beginning of the war he had no preparations. The wind was wonderfully in a corner, that the Dutch could not come out. He gave perpetual assurance that the French would not come out, he made plots, and a committee of lords and commons were appointed to enquire; but all came to no effect; nothing discovered. He made those plots as a ground to raise an army. The commons do of course send to the lords. The course is, that the lords do desire him to be secured.

Lord Cornbury ‡. If any one article in this charge be proved, lord Clarendon will submit to the rest.

Another particular touching the dividing the Fleet, being delivered in, was added to the rest; and the heads again read at the table; on which a debate arose, whether the heads of the accusations brought in against the earl of Clarendon should be referred to a committee to take the proofs.

* "The king had granted lord Clarendon a large piece of ground near St. James's, to build a house on. He intended a good ordinary house: but not understanding these matters, he was run into a vast charge of 50,000l. Some called it Dunkirk-House, intimating that it was built by his share of the price of Dunkirk. Others called it Holland-House, because he was thought to be no friend to the war." Burnet.—Lord Clarendon says himself, that he was not so much ashamed of any one thing he had done, as he was of the vast expence he had made in the building of his house, which had more contributed to that gust of envy that had so violently shaken him, than any misdemeanour that he was thought to have been guilty of. He adds, that it cost a third part more than he intended. Life, p. 512.

† "After many days spent in close contrivances and combinations, Mr. Seymour, a young man of great confidence and boldness, stood up in the house of commons, and spoke long and with great bitterness against the Chancellor, and of his great corruption, &c. Clarendon's Life, p. 443.

‡ The Earl of Clarendon's eldest son. "He was so provoked at the ill usage his father met with, that he struck in violently with the party that opposed the court." Burnet.—On king James's accession he was made Lord Privy Seal, and died in 1709.

Mr. Dowdswell moves to have the Heads committed to enquire the truth, and argues that common fame is not sufficient to bring him upon the stage.

Sir F. Goodrick seconds it, because new matter was now added to what was formerly charged viva voce in the house.

Sir R. Howard. Suppose the earl innocent, and yet charged and imprisoned (which is the worst of the case) he afterwards appears innocent and is discharged, receiving no more hurt than other subjects have done; namely, one great man lately, (the Duke of Buckingham.) Object. But why should you commit him? Answer. For proof, whether the Articles be true or not: suppose men for self-preservation will not venture to come, not knowing how they may trust themselves, and so you have no proof, he very guilty, and you not able to proceed; is the inconveniency greater for an innocent person if he prove so, to suffer a few days, than for you to loose your reputation for ever. If this man be not brought to his trial, it may force him to fly to that which he counselled, that is, that we may never have parliament more.

Sir John Goodrick would have the gentleman make his own case. Moves that the impeachment may not go out of the house, till recommended to a grand committee.

Col. *Birch said that sir W. Pennyman, an evidence against lord Strafford, was checked for not offering to give his evidence.

Mr. Vaughan. You admit the accusation to be matter for a charge, if the committee find proof; if you intend to make this a distinct case I leave it to you; but if this be to settle the course of the proceedings of the house, I am against it; for this is ordering a way of proceeding in the earl's case, which shall not be a general rule. Though I cannot say one of the articles to be true, yet I know them to be a full charge if made good, and you are prescribing a course neither proper, nor ever practised. A witness who speaks without oath, is subject to damage; not so upon oath, because the law compels him: and whereas it hath been said, if witnesses attest before the house of commons, what judges dare meddle in it; I answer such judges are meddled in the case of sir John Elliot, &c. and the ship money.

* "Col. Birch was a man of a peculiar character. He had been a carrier at first, and retained still, even to an affectation, the clownishness of his education. He got up in the progress of the war to be a colonel, and to be concerned in the excise. And at the restoration he was found to be so useful in managing the excise, that he was put in a good post. He was the roughest and boldest speaker in the house, and talked in the language and phrases of a carrier; but with a beauty and eloquence that was always acceptable. He spoke always with much life and heat; but judgment was not his talent." Burnet.

Sir John Holland. No man impeached in the house of commons but blasted for ever after; therefore we should be wary how we proceed. If any person will undertake to make it good, as sir Henry Vane did lord Strafford's impeachment, he is for an impeachment.

Mr. Seymour, speaking of precedents, said, that precedents in the church by the fathers are rather to facilitate assent, than impose belief—fitter for lower courts than a parliament. As soon as their own matter is accorded, treason is done away, as in the late precedents. One argument of the earl's guilt is, that he has not put himself upon his trial all this while. We are now disputing whether we shall ever impeach any person. Of his own knowledge many persons have been menaced in case they give evidence. 'Serpens qui serpentem devorat fit draco.' Lord Clarendon has reserved to himself the monopoly of bribes. He says, he has a moral assurance of the proof of all his charge.

Sir R. Howard. If we proceed only by the common law, we may be censured at some of the bars below; we must do it to satisfy, and then not satisfy by doing it. Though common law has its proper sphere, 'tis not in this place, we are in a higher sphere. If impeachments of this nature be not allowed, we have no way left of impeaching a great person. M. de la Pole so charged, and lord chancellor, who then governed all, and probably in the fault then.

Sir Henry North says, the amends he can make for any impertinency is not to hold them long. Understands the charge upon common fame only. Being without evidence, moves to have the articles argued head by head, what they amount unto.

Sir Rob. Atkins. We have things at the third hand; persons without doors say they know it by information. Urges the shame of accusing an innocent person; and credulous persons will retain some of the accusations, though false.

Sir W. Lowther. In parliament 1 Car. common fame was a good ground of proceeding in any accusation from the house of commons. Resolved then upon the question in Dr. Turner's case against the duke of Buckingham.

Sir Tho. Strickland. Lord Strafford complained of nothing done before his trial, but at his trial, and put it home to the lords as their own case in accumulative treason. The hardship he rejects, but the easy one in proceeding he would have. Never knew a child named before born, and so would not have the impeachment.

Mr. Waller *. The door was locked in the debate of lord Strafford's and the abp. of Canterbury's case. The reason, because of the greatness of the men. The king might dissolve the parliament before the impeachment.

* "Waller was the delight of the house: And even at 80 he said the liveliest things of any among them. He was only concerned to say that which should make him be applauded. He deserves the character of being one of the

Sir R. Temple. In several impeachments no witness but from impeachments without doors. Grand juries present upon their own knowledge, and if the fact known by any, bound to present. M. de la Pole was impeached for common fame. When voted impeached, then time to inform a committee for accusations.

Sir John Holland. In lord Strafford's case information was to the committee of grievances by sir John Clotworthy—He moves for particular charge before impeached—Torches a-far off make a greater show than near at hand. From lord Bacon.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. Charges him with countenancing the Non-conformists. The question being then put, that the Heads of the Accusation be referred to a committee to take the proofs, and report; it passed in the negative 194 to 128. The house then proceeded on the Heads of the Accusation.

Nov. 7. The house resumed the farther consideration of the Heads of the Accusation delivered in against the earl of Clarendon.

Sir Tho. Osborne *. The king ready to change his religion!—no money remaining—no person in employment, but who can buy it—we are upon our last legs—no one man ever had more employments—threatens any man that gave advice—no vessel to swim without his hand at the rudder—no mouce issued out of the treasury without his approbation.—Sir Wm. Coventry brought orders out of the chancellor's closet, when the king was with him—if any other men had the thoughts, they had not the power—he has no pique against him, but as he is one of the 400 † (of the house of commons) thought by the chancellor useless and inconsiderable.

The Second Article was read.—Lord St. John, persons of great quality have assured him to make it good, and if they perform not, he will acquaint the house who they are.

The Third Article read.—Mr. Rd. Seymour. Sufficient persons will make it good, with this addition, when he received the money, he said, 'so long as the king is king, and I lord chancellor, the patent will stand.'

The Fourth and Fifth Articles read.—Sir R. Temple. Divers have undertaken to make them good; if they do not I will name them.

About the receiving Money of Vintners.—Sir Rob. Car. That he knows who will prove it.

About his getting a great Estate so suddenly. Mr. Seymour. I suppose you need no proof the sun shines at noon day.—Sir T. Littleton. The matter of fact in the Article is easily made out, for his place as chancellor could not be worth above 4 or 5000*l.* per ann.

About introducing an Arbitrary Government in the Plantations.—Sir T. Littleton and sir T. Osborn alleged, that one Farmer and others came from the Barbadoes to complain of it, and lodged their petition in this house, but were imprisoned that they might not be heard.

About frustrating Proposals for preserving Nevis, &c.—Sir Ch. Wheeler. The war, fire, and plague, not so great a loss as Nevis and St. Christopher's; Nevis worth 20,000*l.* per ann. to the king, and he receives not a shilling of it.

About the sale of Dunkirk.—Sir T. Osborne said, a great lord told him that the earl had made a bargain for Dunkirk three quarters of a year before it was known.

Mr. Waller. Paying for Dunkirk would entitle it to the crown, and us to the keeping it. The king might as well sell the Isle of Wight.

Mr. H. Coventry. It is as much treason to part with Dunkirk, as disband the guards; both being mentioned in the preamble of the act for supplying the king.

Sir R. Howard, thinks it was treason to sell the guards, if any enemy was in being. It is the way to confirm somebody else in the sale of Tangier too. A great man has said, if it could not be kept, it might be sold. He has heard the king of France should say, he hoped his next purchase should be London.

Mr. Prynne never heard that the selling a place with the king's consent, and the king had the money, was treason; but delivering a fort before reduced to extremity, is treason.

Mr. Vaughan. Dunkirk was an acquisition by arms, and therefore not alienable: Tangier, a portion with his wife, and therefore he might dispose of it. Dunkirk as much the king's dominion as Scotland or Ireland, and to sell it is treason by the law.

Sir Edw. Harley *. The king, apprehend-

The Act of 1,500,000*l.* does, he conceives, declare it to be part of the king's dominions. He left there, in ready money, as appears, 9,640*l.* according to the settlement of 600*l.* a week. A place of extraordinary relief to us.

Mr. Swynfin, in the charge of corresponding with Cromwell, alleges the act of indemnity.

Mr. Vaughan. The chancellor might, in his defence, plead that or any other pardon, from the king.

Sir R. Howard would have him plead to it, that they may know the king's enemies from his friends.

Mr. Dodswell let slip a word, viz. 'violent stream against the chancellor; called to the bar by many; at last put to explain himself: he professed no reflective intention, and humbly craved the pardon of the house.'

Mr. Hampden * spoke to that part of the act of indemnity, wherein the person grieved should have his treble damages in any court.

Sir Jon. Denham † The lord chancellor could not be out-lawed; but he is not clear in equity.—This Article was accordingly left out.

Mr. Thomas will make good, when it is convenient, the article of council-table-orders, against law.

Sir Edw. Masters asserts the article of Quo Warrantos for the corporation of Canterbury.

The 16th Article was then read.

Sir R. Howard. No man can deny that corresponding with the king's enemies is treason. If it be not, treason has neither name nor definition.

Sir T. Littleton. Deluding his maj. in all foreign treaties relating to the late war. Setting out no navy, in expectation of peace, and has undertaking that the French would not engage against us, this last summer, when we expected a peace in April, and had it not till August.

‡ "This was no sooner said than a young confident man, the lord Vaughan, son to the earl of Carbery, a person of as ill a face as fame, his looks and his manner both extreme bad, asked for the paper that had been presented from the committee, and with his own hand entered these words, 'That being a privy counsellor, he had betrayed the king's secrets to the enemy.'" Lord Clarendon's Life.

Lord Vaughan desires that betraying his secret counsels may be put into the Article; it will be made out by a person of honour, that he would have discovered his secret counsels to his enemies. He spoke thrice to this.

Sir John Holland moves that it may be declared by the members who gave the inducement for this head, whether they received information from a foreigner or not.

Mr. Henry Coventry. Possibly a foreign ambassador, and no oath can be given him.

Mr. Vaughan. Achilles was said to be shot-free, and some would have the king to be treason-free. Positively says, it must be from a foreigner, or no way.

Lord Vaughan. Tied upon his honour not to discover the persons. At last, after some time, brings this answer in writing to the table, 'That lord Clarendon hath deluded his maj. and the nation in foreign treaties and negotiations relating to the late war, and discovered his majesty's secret counsels to his enemies.'

The question being propounded, that it may be declared, by the members that gave the inducement for this Head, whether they received information from a foreigner, or not; and the question being put, that the question be put, it passed in the negative. It was then resolved that these words, 'and discovered and betrayed his secret counsels to his enemies,' be added to that head.—The 16th Article being then read, as amended, and the question being put, that the earl of Clarendon, upon this head, be impeached of treason, it passed in the affirmative 161 to 89.

Mr. Marvell charged Mr. Seymour with saying in his accusation, That the king was insufficient for government, which is now omitted in the Charge, and desires he may declare where he had it.

Mr. Seymour. The party that told me at first, differed something afterwards, therefore I rather withdrew it than to trouble you with uncertainties; but a gentleman in the house can give you farther satisfaction on it.

Sir John Denhan. A peer of the land heard the earl say in a coach, That the king was an unactive person and indisposed for government: this will be made good.—After further debate, the house resolved, "That an Impeachment of Treason and other Crimes and Misdemeanours be carried up to the lords against the earl of Clarendon."

Nov. 12. It was resolved, That Mr. Seymour do carry up the Impeachment to the lords. Accordingly, he went up; where at the bar of the lords house, the lord-keeper Bridgman being come to the bar to meet him, he delivered himself to this purpose: * "The commons, assembled in parliament, having received information of divers traitorous practices and designs of a great peer of this house, Edward earl of Clarendon, have commanded me to impeach the said earl of Clarendon of treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors: and I do here, in their names, and in the names of all the commons of England, impeach Edward earl of Clarendon of treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. I am farther commanded, by the house of commons, to desire your lordships, that the earl of Clarendon may be sequestered from parliament, and forthwith committed to safe custody. They have farther commanded me to acquaint your lordships, that they will, within a convenient time, exhibit to your lordships the articles of the charge against him."

Nov. 15. The lords sent down to desire a Conference in the Painted Chamber: at which the earl of Oxford delivered a Paper in writing (without any debate) the contents whereof were as follows: "Resolved, upon the question, that the lords have not complied with the desires of the house of commons, concerning the commitment of the earl of Clarendon, and sequestering him from parliament; because the house of commons have only accused him of treason in general; and have not assigned or specified any particular treason."

Upon this there arose a warm debate, in which Mr. Garraway, said, 'I had rather the house should lose the punishment of this man, though a great offender, than that this house should lose its privilege; for if this house may at no time impeach a lord without giving in particular Articles, it may fall out to be at a time (as in the duke of Buckingham's case) where a great man by his interest with the king procured the dissolution of the parliament, and then the accusation falls.—The debate ended in a Resolution to appoint a Committee to draw up Reasons of the present proceedings against the earl of Clarendon.'

Nov. 18. Sir Tho. Littleton reported from the said Committee the Reasons agreed by the committee: which were severally agreed to; viz. 1.—"That what can or ought to be done by either house of parliament, is best known by the custom and proceeding of parliament in former times; and that it doth appear by example, that, by the course of parliament, the lords have committed such persons, as have been generally charged by the house of commons for High Treason, to safe custody, though the particular treason hath not been specified at the time of such charge. 2. That a commitment for High Treason in general is a legal commitment; and, if the party so committed bring his Habeas Corpus, and the cause of his commitment thereupon be returned to be for high treason, generally; he may be lawfully remanded to prison, by the judges, upon that return. 3. If, before securing the person, the special matter of the treason should be alleged; it would be a ready course, that all complices in the treason might make their escape; or quicken the execution of the treason intended, to secure themselves the better thereby. 4. If the house of peers should require the particular treason to be assigned, before the party charged be secured, they leave the commons uncertain and doubtful (and that from time to time) how particular they must make their charge, to their lordships satisfaction, before the offender be put under any restraint. 5. The commons conceive, that, if they should desire the lords to secure a stranger, or native commoner, upon suspicion of treason, which the commoners had of him; and which was by them under examination, to be evidenced to their lordships in due time; their lordships, in justice, for the safety of the king and people, would secure such person or persons upon the desire of the commons: and, in such case, there will be no difference, in the consequent, between a lord, and a commoner, so desired to be secured. 6. The proceeding of inferior courts between the king and the subject, or subject and subject, and the discretion of judges in such courts, is bounded and limited by the discretion of the parliament which trusts them; and it is not left to the discretion of judges in ordinary jurisdiction, to give the king, or take from him, inconvenient power for the subject; nor to dispense the law partially between subject and subject, for malice and affection: but the discretion of the parliament, which is the whole public, comprehending the king, lord, and commons, (for the king's presence is supposed in the lords house) is, and ought to be, confined for the safety and preservation of the whole, which is itself. It cannot be malicious to a part of itself, nor affect more power, than already it hath; which is absolute over itself, and parts; and may therefore do, for preservation of itself, whatsoever is not repugnant to natural justice."—Resolved, That a conference be desired with the lords, and the Reasons carried up.

* "By a mistake, instead of the earl of Clarendon's impeachment, the earl of Strafford's, which lay on the table, was put into Mr. Seymour's hands, and he was obliged to trust to his memory when he came to the lords bar; but he afterwards delivered a paper of the impeachment to the clerk." Grey's Debates.

Nov. 21. The lords desired another Conference, to which the commons replied by messengers of their own, giving an account of their proceedings, and intimating that they expected the lords would have desired a free Conference.

Nov. 23. The lords desired a present Conference; at which a Vote of their lordships was communicated, signifying that the commons denial of the late Conference was contrary to the course of parliamentary proceedings; as likewise, their lordships Reasons why it was not yet time for a free conference.

Nov. 25. The commons having agreed to the conference, the committees of both houses met, and the lords declared that they had considered of the Precedents and Reasons formerly sent them by the commons, but were not satisfied to secure the earl of Clarendon, or to sequester him from parliament until some special Treason be assigned.

Report of the Conference about committing the E. of Clarendon on a general Charge.

Nov. 28. The Lord Chamberlain and the other lords appointed to manage the free Conference with the commons yesterday, reported the substance and effect of the said free Conference, as followeth:

"This Conference was managed, on the house of commons part, by sir Robert Howard, Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Swinfin, and Mr. Waller. The introduction was made by my lord chamberlain; who told the commons, That this free conference was desired by them; and though that house had lately declined giving the lords a conference when desired, yet the house of peers upon this occasion had dispensed with some forms, to keep a good correspondence with the house of commons, and were willing to confer freely with them, and ready to hear what they had to say.—Sir R. Howard was the first that opened the business. He said, this conference was not upon particular account of any person, but in relation to public justice.—The lords closed in the same, and were very glad it was so understood; for they had no particular regard to the earl of Clarendon in what they had resolved, but to the justice of the kingdom; in the administration whereof in this particular, nothing was ordered in the case of the peer now impeached which they should not have insisted upon in the case of any commoner.—Then sir R. Howard and the rest of the commons proceeded; and made the subject-matter of this free conference to be some of the Reasons formerly given by the commons, which they enforced what they could; and the proceedings of the earl of Strafford's case, the abp. of Canterbury, lord keeper Finch, and sir G. Ratcliff's. But the precedent chiefly pressed, was the earl of Strafford's; on which by large discourse (which intimated their insisting mainly on that) they urged that precedents did shew best the course of parliaments, which was the law of parliaments; and that the precedents they had vouched, especially that of the earl of Strafford's, were clear in the point: that the end of the act of repeal was to repeal the act of attainder, and the proceedings relating thereto; that the manner of impeachment and commitment, and other proceedings thereupon, were still in force; and that the latest and newest precedents were the best. They descanted long upon the words of the act of repeal, to evince what they had said; and distinguished the first year of the Long Parliament for gravity and wisdom, from the rest, which was disorderly and unquiet; and said, That their precedents were made in the first year; and that proceedings in times of peace, when the courts of Westminster were open, were always allowed for good; and concluded, that the lords ought to commit upon every general impeachment of the commons for Treason: and this grew to be the question stated at this conference: which the commons affirmed, and the lords denied. Some things were also said by the commons, of the credit that was to be given to all the commons of England, which they represented; and that they could not be supposed to intend any thing herein but public justice and safety, &c.—The lords answered, and argued from the very same act for reversing the earl of Strafford's attainder, as followeth: That this precedent was not allowable, being in an ill time; and brauded by an act of repeal, by which it was clear, this very parliament intended it should never be made use of; for besides that the act of attainder recites the very impeachment particularly, and other proceedings thereupon, and stands absolutely and totally repealed, which is enough to condemn the whole, yet they were so careful that this precedent which led on the other three should never rise in judgment again, that they further enacted in express words, That all records and proceedings of parliament relating to the said attainder be wholly concealed and taken off the file, or otherwise defaced and obliterated, to the intent the same may not be visible in after-ages, or brought into example to the prejudice of any person whatsoever; in which general words, every circumstance and passage of that precedent must needs be included, none being excepted, so that this left the course of parliament for accusations and trials for treasons as it was before. And there were no other proceedings previous to the said Attainder, but the said impeachment upon trial, and proceedings thereupon. The lords said, They could not allow all for good that was done in parliament whilst the courts of Westminster sat; nor would the commons, if they reviewed the transactions of the Long Parliament. They absolutely denied the newest precedent to be the best. Antiquity was always venerable; laws, and old precedents, with a constant course of them, were most to be esteemed. They had both for them in this controversy. The lords gave these further Reasons in Answer to the commons, and to shew why they ought not upon every general accusation of treason by the commons to commit to custody the person or persons accused: That there could be no precedent of commitment produced upon a general accusation of treason before the earl of Strafford's case; which must necessarily have been, to make it the course of parliament. The last drops of a river make not a stream or course, but the constant current. So a new precedent, but of yesterday as it were, and within the sad memory of us all, could not be called the course of parliament. It seems contrary to natural justice and reason, that a person accused should be punished before he knows his crime; and though the imprisonment may be said to be for custody, yet there is no person that knows not his fault, but takes it for a punishment; and it is really so, if he come after to be acquitted. It is not suitable to the dignity or trust of judges in inferior courts, much less in parliament, the highest court, that they should be kept ignorant of the crimes, whilst they are pressed to commit to prison upon a general mention of them, or that the prosecutors should conceal what they know from the judges, or have ground to ask what they will, and not let the judges have ground to proceed upon. If the lords ought to commit upon the commons impeachment, they seem rather to be executors of process or orders, than judges; which ever implies a power to consider, and do as they shall be satisfied in judgment. The precedents are contrary; as 14 E. 2. M. 7. abp. of Arundell's case, 21 R. 2. the lord Stanley's case, 38 H. 6.; and W. de la Pole duke of Suffolk's case; as the commons themselves, in the argument at the free conference upon the Petition of Right, by sir Edw. Cooke, acknowledged, and urged strongly, as being in the very point; This was 28 H. 6. No. 16, &c. Such a course of proceeding would not leave it in the power of the house of peers to preserve Magna Charta and the Petition of Right (which favour liberty) from invasion; and herein the lords insist not only for themselves, but for all the commons. Though this be a house of commons excellently composed; yet the admitting this claim of theirs just or warrantable, if ever there should be a house of commons ill disposed or engaged in faction, as such have been, they might by pretence thereof make dangerous inroads upon the justice and ancient government of the kingdom, terrify and discompose the highest judicature, and invade that freedom which ought to be in parliament, and indeed bring the house of lords to as small a number as they please to leave unaccused. Judges in inferior courts may bail for treason specified; à majore, may the house of lords refuse to commit till specification, or bail after. There are no real mischiefs or inconveniences the other way, but many appear by committing before the judges be satisfied in the crimes. The practice of all judges and justices, in favour of liberty, and to prevent oppression, is to examine upon oath the particular crimes before commitment, that the ground may appear to them for commitment, or else they are of duty to bail where the offence is bailable, though the accusation may be laid to be treason? much more should the parliament be careful herein, who gives examples and precedents of justice to all other courts. If the king and his counsel are not to imprison without special crime, as the commons now argue, and did so before in the conference for the Petition of Right, to which the lords agreed, and yet the king is 'caput parliamenti;' whence comes this power of the house of commons by vote to enforce a commitment? And how dangerous is it to the subject! The Petition of Right having concluded, That no man ought to be imprisoned or detained without being charged with something to which they might make answer according to law; how will it stand with that to commit upon generals, to which no man can make answer or defend himself? There were no new Reasons offered by the commons; and therefore the lords told them, That having considered of those they had given, and over-ruled them, after a rule twice given by the highest court, it is not to be disputed but the parties must submit; or, as they resolved last session, there could be no proceedings or dispatch in causes. At this conference, Mr. Vaughan said, The commons do think the judicature so well and safely lodged in the lords, that the commons do not wish any part of it. The commons would not agree, that the case of Wm. de la Pole was upon the Impeachment of the commons; and said, That the case of abp. Arundell was repealed 1 H. IV. But the first the lords evinced clearly, by the record which was present; and the repeal of Arundell's case did not weaken, but strengthen it as a precedent in this case, being in the repeal it was in the least impeached in the point the lords vouched it for. And the chief ground of not repealing the acts of that parliament was, for the hard measure it shewed to the house of York, for maintenance of whose title the said archbishop was a chief instrument. Some members of the house of commons urged their former third Reason before, That if, before securing the person, the special matter of treason should be alledged, it would be a ready course that all complices in the Treason might make their escape, or quicken the execution of the treason intended, to secure themselves the better thereby. To which the lords made Answer, That it would be very hard with the subject, if they should be committed when neither the judge nor the accuser did know the crime; and if, in this case, the house of commons, who were the accuser, did know it, they might safely impart it to the lords, for though in 500 counsellors, there may be allowed to be wisdom, yet there is not to be expected secrecy."—The lords took this Report into consideration; and after a long debate, the question being put, "Whether, upon the Report of the last Free Conference given the house of commons, and upon the whole matter, their lordships are satisfied to commit the earl of Clarendon, and sequester him from parliament, before particular treason specified or assigned?" It was resolved in the negative.

The Lords refuse to commit the Earl.] Dec. 2. The lords confirmed their proceedings, and sent down a Message to the commons to this effect: "That upon the report made to them of the last free Conference, they are not satisfied to commit or sequester from parliament the earl of Clarendon, without the particular treason be mentioned or assigned." This threw the commons into a great ferment, and occasioned several warm speeches.

Mr. Waller said, The lords are a noble estate, but whatever the matter is, they have of late some advice given them, which makes them proceed as they never did yet; for scarce any thing happens, but they encroach upon us. The Militia is now as burthensome to the 50l. man in the country, almost as all other taxes, and the lords have gotten this advantage on us, that they touch not the burthen of it with their finger: so in the time of the Plague, the commons must be shut up, but not they; insomuch that a good act provided to that purpose passed not. We impeached the lord Mordaunt, and could not bring him to the bar, though formerly I have known an earl and a lord brought thither; you desired a free conference about it, but could not obtain one to this day. Rome was at first modest, and only meddled with spirituals, but afterwards concerned themselves so much with other matters, that every thing was made to be 'in ordine ad spiritualia,' and many kingdoms thereupon broke from them. The lords now insist upon one thing, because they say it is in order to their judicature; perhaps hereafter they will tell us we must come to them on our knees, because it is in order to their judgment. Consider therefore whether there be any hope of giving them satisfaction.

Mr. Vaughan was long about precedents and law, upon the latter of which the lords had insisted; and he said, That in the free conference there was much discourse about the Great Charter, and of the Statute of the 28th Edw. 3. but not applied: so that I thought law in a lord's mouth was like a sword in a lady's hand; the sword might be there, but when it comes to cut, it would be awkward and useless. The conclusion must be, that no impeachment by the commons must go on, unless it be by presentment; and so there is an end of all that for which the parliament is principally called; unless we are part of 'those 400 contemptible ones, who are only fit to give money?' that may be reserved for us, but nothing else.

Mr. Coleman argued in favour of the lords: The lords say, that committing upon a general Impeachment was against law, and he thought would appear so: he denied not, but a mittimus without special cause might be legal, and grounded upon the Petition of Right; the reason of which was to secure men against commitment by a special warrant, and a judge ought not to discharge where treason was alledged: but in this case it was different, the judges could not discharge a man committed after examination, but the lords ought not to commit a man, except there were particular treason. That if he came before a justice of peace, and said, I accuse this man of treason, would any wise man commit him? He made his warrant indeed, but he that accused must go farther, and make it more particular, and the special matter must appear before he commits; and this was the present case. The common law was, That no man ought to be committed without particular cause; because no man could commit in capital matters, without taking examination before-hand, otherwise no man could justify a commitment; therefore he was not satisfied, that the lords had not reason to deny it. That the commons were in the nature of a grand jury to present, but the lords were the judges: that commitment was not the judgment, but in order to it; and the lords had a discretionary power in the case: they said not that they would not commit, but that they were not satisfied to do it without special matter, therefore the commons ought to send it up.—After a long debate, the house came to this Resolution, “That the Lords having not complied with the desires of the commons for the commitment of the earl of Clarendon, and sequestering him from parliament, upon the Impeachment from that house, is an obstruction to the public justice of the kingdom, and a precedent of evil and dangerous consequence.” They appointed a committee to draw up a Declaration to vindicate their proceedings.

The Earl of Clarendon withdraws, and leaves a remarkable Apology.] About this time the earl of Clarendon thought proper to withdraw, and having left an Apology for his conduct, addressed to the lords, that house, upon receiving this Address, on the 3d of Dec. sent a Message to the commons, signifying, “That they had received a large Petition from the earl of Clarendon, which intimated that he was withdrawn;” and soon after desired a present conference with them. At which conference the duke of Buckingham, who was plainly aimed at in the Petition, delivered it to the commons, and with his usual way of insult and ridicule said, “The lords have commanded me to deliver to you this scandalous and seditious Paper sent from the earl of Clarendon: they bid me to present it to you, and desire you in convenient time to send it to them again; for it has a style which they are in love with, and therefore desire to keep it.”

The Earl of Clarendon's Apology.] The said Paper was then read, and is as follows:

To the right hon. the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled: The humble PETITION and ADDRESS of Edward earl of Clarendon.

“May it please your lordships; I cannot express the insupportable trouble and grief of mind I sustain, under the apprehension of being misrepresented to your lordships, and when I hear how much of your lordships time has been spent upon the mention of me, as it is attended with more public consequences, and of the differences in opinion, which have already, or may probably arise between your lordships, and the hon. house of commons; whereby the great and weighty affairs of the kingdom may be obstructed in a time of so general a dissatisfaction. I am very unfortunate to find myself to suffer so much under two very disadvantageous reflections, which are in no degree applicable to me.—The 1st, from the greatness of my estate and fortune, collected and made in so few years; which, if it be proportionable to what is reported, may very reasonably cause my integrity to be suspected.—The 2nd, that I have been the sole manager, and chief minister, in all the transactions of state, since the king's return into England, to Aug. last; and therefore that all miscarriages and misfortunes ought to be imputed to me, and to my counsels.—Concerning my estate, your lordships will not believe, that, after malice and envy hath been so inquisitive and so sharp-sighted, I will offer any thing to your ldp.'s, but what is exactly true; and I do assure your ldp.'s, in the first place, that, excepting from the king's bounty, I have never received nor taken one penny, but what was generally understood to be the just and lawful perquisites of my office, by the constant practice of the best times; which I did, in my own judgment, conceive to be that of my lord Coventry, and my lord Elmore: the practice of which I constantly observed, although the office, in both their times, was lawfully worth double to what it was to me, and, I believe, now is.—That all the courtesies and favours which I have been able to obtain from the king for other persons in church and state, or in Westminster-Hall, have never been worth to me five pounds: so that your lordships may be confident I am as innocent from corruption, as from any disloyal thought; which, after near 30 years service of the crown, in some difficulties and distresses, I did never expect, would have been objected to me in my age.—And I do assure your lordships, and shall make it very manifest, that the several sums of money, and some parcels of land, which his maj. hath bountifully bestowed upon me since his return into England, are worth more than all I have amounts unto: so far I am from advancing my estate by any indirect means. And though this bounty of his maj. hath very far exceeded my merit, or my expectation, yet some others hath been as fortunate at least in the same bounty, who had as small pretences to it, and have no great reason to envy my condition.—Concerning the other imputation, of the credit and power of being chief minister; and so causing all to be done, that I had a mind to; I have no more to say, than that I had the good fortune to serve a master of a very great judgment and understanding; and to be always joined with persons of great ability and experience; without whose advice and concurrence, never any thing hath been done.—Before his majesty's coming into England, he was constantly attended by the then marq. of Ormond, the late lord Culpeper, and

“When the chancellor found it necessary to withdraw himself, he thought it as necessary to leave some address to the house of peers, and to make as good an excuse as he could for his absence without asking their leave; which should be delivered to them by some member of their body (there being many of them ready to perform that civil office for him) when his absence should be known, or some evidence that he was safely arrived on the other side of the sea: and that time being come (for the packet-boat was ready to depart when the Chancellor landed at Calais,) the earl of Denbigh said, He had an Address to the house from the earl of Clarendon, which he desired might be read.” Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 438.

Mr. Sec. Nicholas; who were equally trusted with myself; and without whose joint advice and concurrence, when they were all present, (as some of them always were) I never gave any counsel. As soon as it pleased God to bring his maj. into England, he established his privy-council; and shortly, out of them, a number of honourable persons, of great reputation, who, for the most part, are alive, as a committee for foreign affairs, and consideration of such things, as, in the nature of them, required much secrecy; and with these persons he vouchsafed to join me: and I am confident this committee never transacted any thing of moment, (his maj. being always present) without presenting the same first to the council board: and I must appeal to them, concerning my carriage; and whether we were not all of one mind, in all matters of importance.—For more than two years I never knew any difference in the counsels, or that there were any complaints in the kingdom; which I wholly impute to his maj.'s great wisdom, and the entire concurrence of his counsellors; without the vanity of assuming any thing to myself. And therefore I hope I shall not be singly charged with any thing that hath since fallen out amiss. But from the time that Mr. Sec. Nicholas was removed from his place, there were great alterations: and whosoever knew any thing of the court or councils, knew well how my credit hath, since that time, been diminished; though his maj. graciously vouchsafed still to hear my advice in most of his affairs: nor hath there been, from that time to this, above one or two persons brought to the council, or preferred to any considerable office in the court, who have been of my intimate acquaintance, or suspected to have any kindness for me; and most of them notoriously known to have been, very long, my enemies; and of different judgments and principles from me, both in church and state; and who have taken all opportunities to lessen my credit with the king, and with all other persons, by misrepresenting and misreporting all that I said or did; and persuading men, that I had done them some prejudice with his majesty, or crossed them in some of their pretensions; though his majesty's goodness and justice was such, that it made little impression upon him.—In my humble opinion, the great misfortunes of the kingdom have proceeded from the war; to which it is notoriously known that I was always most averse; and may, without vanity, say, I did not only foresee, but did declare, the mischiefs we should run into by entering into a war, before any alliances made with the neighbour princes: and, that, it may not be imputed to his majesty's want of care, or the negligence of his counsellors, that no such alliances were entered into, I must take the boldness to say, that his maj. left nothing unattempted, in order thereunto: and, knowing very well, that France resolved to begin a war upon Spain, as soon as his Catholic maj. should depart this world; which being much sooner expected by them, they had, in the two winters before, been a great charge in providing plentiful magazines of all provisions upon the frontiers that they might be ready for the war; his maj. used all possible means to prepare and dispose the Spaniard with that apprehension; offering his friendship to that degree, as might be for the security and benefit of both crowns: but Spain flattering itself that France would not break with them, at least, that they would not give them any cause, by administering matter of jealousy to them, never made any real approach towards a friendship with his majesty; but, both by their ambassador here, and to his majesty's ambassador at Madrid, always insisted, as preliminaries, upon the giving up Dunkirk, Tangier, and Jamaica.—Though France had an ambassador here, to whom a project for a Treaty was offered, and the lord Hollis, his majesty's ambassador at Paris, used all endeavours to pursue and prosecute the said Treaty, yet it was quickly discerned, that the principal design of France was to draw his maj. into such a near alliance, as might advance their design; without which they had no mind to enter into the treaty proposed.—And this was the State of Affairs when the war was entered into with the Dutch: from which time, neither crown much considered the making of an alliance with England.—As I did, from my soul, abhor the entering into this war; so I never presumed to give any advice or counsel for the way of managing it, but by opposing many propositions, which seemed to the late lord treasurer, and myself, to be unreasonable; as, the payment of the seamen by tickets: and many other particulars, which added to the expence.—My enemies took all occasions to inveigh against me: and, making friendship with others out of the council, of more licentious principles, and who knew well enough, how much I disliked and complained of the liberty they took to themselves, of reviling all councils and counsellors, and turning all things serious and sacred into ridicule; they took all ways imaginable, to render me ungrateful to all sorts of men (whom I shall be compelled to name in my defence); persuading those, that miscarried in any of their designs, that it was the chancellor's doings: whereof I never knew any thing. However, they could not withdraw the king's favour from me; who was still pleased to use my service with others; nor was there ever any thing done, but upon the joint advice of, at least, the major part of those who were consulted with.—And, as his majesty commanded my service in the late Treaties, so I never gave the least advice in private; nor wrote one letter to any person in either of those negotiations, but upon the advice of the council, and after it was read in council, or, at least, by the king himself, and some other: and, if I prepared any Instructions, or Memorials, it was by the king's command, and the request of the secretaries, who desired my assistance: nor was it any wish of my own, that any ambassador should give me any account of the transactions, but to the secretaries, with whom I was always ready to advise: nor am I conscious to myself of having ever given advice, that hath proved mischievous or inconvenient to his majesty: and I have been so far from being the sole manager of affairs, that I have not, in the whole last year, been above twice with his maj. in any room alone, and very seldom in the 2 or 3 years preceding: and, since the parliament at Oxford, it hath been very visible, that my credit hath been very little; and that very few things have been hearkened to, which have been proposed by me, but contradicted, eo nomine, because proposed by me.—I most humbly beseech your lordships to remember the office and trust I had for 7 years, in which, in discharge of my duty, I was obliged to stop and obstruct many mens pretences, and to refuse to set the seal to many pardons, and other grants, which would have been profitable to those who procured them; and many whereof, upon my representation to his majesty, were for ever stopt; which naturally have raised many enemies to me: and my frequent concurring, upon the desires of the late Lord Treasurer (with whom I had the honour to have a long and a fast friendship, to his death) in representing several excesses and exorbitances, the yearly issue so far exceeding the Revenue, provoked in many persons concerned, of great power and credit, to do me all the ill offices they could. And yet I may faithfully say, that I never meddled with any part of the Revenue, or the administration of it, but when I was desired by the late lord treasurer to give him my assistance and advice (having had the honour formerly to serve the crown, as chancellor of the exchequer); which was, for the most part, in his majesty's presence. Nor have I ever been, in the least degree, concerned, in point of profit, in the letting any part of his majesty's revenue; nor have ever treated or debated it, but in his majesty's presence; in which my opinion concurred always with the major of the counsellors, who were present.—All which, upon examination, will be made manifest to your lordships, how much soever my integrity is blasted by the malice of those, who, I am confident, do not believe themselves: nor have I, in my life, upon all the Treaties, or otherwise, received the value of one shilling from all the kings and princes in the world (except the Books of the Louvre print, sent me by the chancellor of France, by that king's direction) but from my own master, to whose entire service, and to the good and welfare of my country, no man's heart was ever more devoted.—This being my present condition, I do most humbly beseech your lordships to retain a favourable opinion of me, and to believe me innocent from those foul aspersions, until the contrary shall be proved; which, I am sure, can never be by any men, worthy to be believed. And since the distempers of the times and the differences between the two houses in the present debate, with the power and malice of my enemies, who give out, that they shall prevail with his majesty to prorogue or dissolve this parliament in displeasure, and threaten to expose me to the rage and fury of the people, may make me looked upon as the cause which obstructs the king's service, and the unity and peace of the kingdom; I most humbly beseech your lordships, that I may not forfeit your lordships favour and protection, by withdrawing myself from so powerful a prosecution, in hope that I may be able, by such withdrawing, hereafter to appear, and make my defence, when his majesty's justice, to which I shall always submit, may not be obstructed or controuled by the power and malice of those, who have sworn my destruction.

When the earl's Apology was read by the commons, it occasioned a new turn, and a new warmth in the debates of that house. Mr. Vaughan among other things said, 'It is the first time that ever I heard an innocent man run away under the greatest charge, with hopes to return again and vindicate himself. Mark one expression; he says, he is as far from corruption, as he is from disloyalty: if he had said he was guilty of neither, he had said something, but by that expression he may be guilty of both. So insolent a paper I never met with in this kingdom, nor have I ever heard the like in any other: so inconsiderable a part of the nation as he is, to lay it upon the nation, who, if innocent, might defend himself; if guilty, why does he charge the nation with persecuting? Therefore, without troubling ourselves with it, do as the lords have done, who, delivered it to us as a scandalous and seditious Paper; it has malice in it, and is the greatest reproach upon the king and the whole nation, that ever was given by man.'—Therefore, in conclusion he put the question, Whether the Paper should be voted scandalous and malicious, and a reproach to the justice of the nation? Which was carried in the affirmative.—Sir R. Howard moved that it should be burnt by the common-hangman; but that was opposed, because the lords desired the Paper to be returned; yet still at last that was carried also in the affirmative.*

* "This Address was no sooner read, in the house of lords, but they who had contributed most to the absenting himself, and were privy to all the promises which had invited him to it, seemed much troubled that he had escaped their justice, and moved, 'That orders might be forthwith sent to stop the ports, that so he might be apprehended;' when they well knew that he was landed at Calais. Others took exceptions to some expressions, 'which,' they said, 'reflected upon the king's honour and justice.' Others moved, That it might be entered in their Journal Book, to the end that they might farther consider of it when they should think fit; and this was ordered. The Address was no sooner read in the other house,

A Bill passed for the Banishment of the Earl.] Dec. 13. A Bill was sent down from the lords for the Banishment of the earl of Clarendon. Upon the reading of which, several objections were made; and it being alledged, That it was an abuse put upon the commons by the lords, and that a Bill of Attainder being proposed, after some debate the house passed this vote; "Resolved, That, this house taking notice of the Flight of the earl of Clarendon, being under an Impeachment of High-Treason by this house, the king's majesty be humbly desired to issue out his Proclamation for summoning the said earl to appear by a day, and to apprehend him in order to his trial: and that the lords be sent to for their concurrence in this vote." But the lords would not concur: and on the following day delivered their Reasons, and particularly declared, "That their lordships upon consideration of the whole state of affairs, and of the kingdom, have, upon grounds of prudence and justice, thought fit, for security of king and kingdom, to proceed in a legislative way against the said earl; and have to that end passed and sent down a Bill of Banishment and Incapacity against him; with which their vote was inconsistent." This brought on a debate concerning the Bill of Banishment, which some thought too little for the crimes alledged; and others too great for the cause in hand. Mr. Swinfen said, 'The lords will neither secure nor summon him, but will condemn him unheard; and this they put you upon, which is against honour and justice, especially to do it upon reason of state. The power of parliaments is indeed great; it hath no bounds but the integrity and justice of parliaments. If reason of state be a motive of parliament to banish one man, so it may be for many. If you go in this legislative way, but they who had industriously promoted the former resolution were inflamed, as if this very instrument would contribute enough to any thing that was wanting; and they severally arraigned it, and inveighed against the person who had sent it, with all imaginable bitterness and insolence. Whilst others, who could not, in the hearing it read, observe that malignity that it was accused of, sat still and silent as if they suspected that somewhat had escaped their observations and discovery, that so much transported other men; or, because they were well pleased that a person, against whom there was so much fury and malice professed, was got out of their reach. In conclusion, after long debate it was concluded, 'That the paper, containing much untruth and scandal and sedition in it, should be publicly burned by the hand of the hangman,' which vote they presently sent to the lords for their concurrence, who, though they had not observed any such guilt in it before, would maintain no farther contests with them, and so concurred in the sentence. And the poor paper was accordingly with solemnity executed by the appointed officer." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 464.

you bring upon yourselves all the dishonour of the business; but the lords will have some excuse, which you cannot; for they looked upon the charge so slight, as not to imprison him. The party is gone, apprehending, he says, the fear of the multitude, not of his trial: so the lords not giving credit to your charge against him, he says, He flies not from justice. Now, if upon this bill you should banish him, it would be said, you could not make good your charge, and therefore laid this sentence upon him. The precedent is also dangerous, if, having gone so far in a judicial way, you should now go in a legislative. If, upon reason of state, lords might be banished, it may be by dozens: as you proceed justly, so you will be justified.'—After several speeches on the 18th, the bill was read a third time and passed, there being 65 for it, and 42 against it.*

* "Lord Clarendon survived his banishment six years; and employed his leisure chiefly in reducing into order the history of the civil wars, for which he had before collected materials. The performance does honour to his memory; and except Whitlocke's memoirs, is the most candid account of those times, composed by any contemporary author.—Clarendon was always a friend to the liberty and constitution of his country. At the commencement of the civil wars, he had entered into the late king's service, and was honoured with a great share in the esteem and friendship of that monarch: he was pursued with unrelenting animosity by the long parliament: he had shared all the fortunes, and directed all the counsels of the present king during his exile: he had been advanced to the highest trust and offices after the restoration: yet all these circumstances, which might naturally operate with such force, either on resentment, gratitude, or ambition, had no influence on his uncorrupted mind. It is said, that when he first engaged in the study of the law his father exhorted him with great earnestness to shun the practice too common in that profession, of straining every point in favour of prerogative, and perverting so useful a science to the oppression of liberty: and in the midst of these rational and virtuous counsels, which he reiterated, he was suddenly seized with an apoplexy, and expired in his son's presence. This circumstance gave additional weight to the principles which he inculcated. The combination of king and subject to oppress so good a minister affords, to men of opposite dispositions, an equal occasion of inveighing against the ingratitude of princes, or ignorance of the people. Charles seems never to have mitigated his resentment against Clarendon; and the national prejudices pursued him to his retreat in France. A company of English soldiers, being quartered near him, assaulted his house, broke open the doors, gave him a dangerous wound on the head, and would have proceeded to the last extremities, had not their officers hearing of the violence, happily interposed." Hume.

Protests relating to the Proceedings against the Earl of Clarendon.] Nov. 20. The house took into consideration the Report of the Conference with the commons yesterday, concerning the Proceedings against the earl of Clarendon; in order thereunto the Reasons of the commons were read, and then these precedents mentioned by the commons were read: 1. The precedent of the Impeachment against the earl of Strafford, the 11th Nov. 1644. 2. The Impeachment against Wm. Laud, abp. of Caunterbury, the 18th Dec. 1640. 3. The Impeachment against the lord Finch, lord keeper, the 22nd of Dec. 1640. 4. The Impeachment against sir Geo. Hadcliffe, the 29th Dec. 1640. And, after a long debate on the first Reason, and the aforesaid precedents, the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th Reasons were again read. And, after a serious debate thereof, the question being put, Whether, upon these Precedents and Reasons of the commons, and the whole debate thereupon, their lordships are satisfied to comply with the desires of the commons for sequestering from this house, and committing the earl without any particular Treason assigned or specified? It was resolved in the negative.

"We whose names are underwritten do according to the ancient right and usage of all the peers of the realm assembled in parliament, enter and record our Protestation and particular Dissents as follow, and for these Reasons: 1. That we are satisfied, in agreement with so much of the Reasons of the commons alledged to that purpose, as upon a very long and solemn debate in this house did concur with our sense, that the earl of C. should be committed to custody, without assigning of special matter, until the particular Impeachment shall be exhibited against him by the commons before the lords in parliament; or else, how shall any great officer of the crown, and his accomplices, be prevented from evading to be brought to a fair and speedy trial? 2. We do conceive, that the four precedents urged by the commons for his commitment as aforesaid, and to justify the way of their proceedings by general Impeachment only, are valid, and full to the point of this case; and that the precedent of Wm. de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, in the 28th of Hen. 6, is no precedent at all to the contrary, in regard that it was no judgment nor appeal in parliament, but rather an appeal to the king from the judicature of the parliament, whilst the parliament was sitting, which is not according to the known privilege and customs of this house. 3. The earl of C.'s power and influence in the absolute management of all the great affairs of the realm hath been so notorious, ever since his majesty's happy return into England, until the great seal was taken from him, that whilst he is at liberty few or none of the witnesses will, probably, dare to declare in evidence, all that they know against him; for defect whereof the safety of the king's person, and the peace of the whole kingdom, may be very much endangered. 4. We conceive, that, in cases of treason and traitorous practices, the commons have an inherent right in them to impeach any peer of the realm; or other subject of England, without assigning of special matter, because treason either against the king's person, or the government established, which are indivisible, is such a speciality in itself alone, that it needs no further specification as to the matter of safe custody; nor can it be suspected, that so honourable a body as the house of commons would have accused a peer of the realm, of the earl of C.'s eminency and condition, without very good cause.—Buckingham, Albemarle, Teynham, W. St. David's, T. Lucas, Cha. Gerrard, Berkshire, Paulett, Howard of Charlton, Pembroke and Montgomery, Rochester, Jo. Duresme, W. Sandys, Jo. Berkeley, Northampton, Kent, Carlisle, Dover, Norwich, Vaughtan, Hen. Herford, Byron, Bathe, Bristol, Arlington, Say and Seale, Powis."

Nov. 21. A message was sent to the commons by sir Wm. Childe and sir John Cole, to desire a present conference, concerning the matter of the last conference touching the earl of Clarendon. The messengers sent to the commons returned with this Answer: That the commons are now in debate of matters of great consequence, and will return an answer presently by messengers of their own.—A message was brought from the commons by sir R. Howard and others, to desire a conference upon the last Message. The question being put, Whether to give the commons a present conference upon the last message? It was resolved in the Affirmative.—"Memorandum. That before the putting of the above question, these lords following desired leave to enter their dissents, if it were carried in the affirmative; which being granted, they do accordingly enter their Dissents, by subscribing their names to the Reasons following: 1. Because the lords having first desired a conference, the commons did not give it. 2. Because there is no precedent, that they can find, of any such proceeding in parliament before this. 3. Because the commons could not tell what was to be offered at the conference desired by the lords. 4. Because, for ought they knew, the lords at the conference intended to agree with the Reasons, or give reasons against them. 5. Because there were no precedents of free conferences (nor can they, as we conceive, be) in points relating to judicature, which is entirely the lords, whose work is to consider the Reasons offered by the commons, and give the rule. Anglesey, Chandos, J. Bridgewater."

Dec. 12. An Act for banishing and disabling the earl of Clarendon, was read a 3rd time. The question being put, whether this Bill shall pass; It was resolved in the affirmative. "I whose name is underwritten do, according to the ancient right and usage of all the peers of the realm assembled in parliament, after due leave demanded from the house in the usual manner and form, as the Journal Book doth shew, enter and record my Protes-tation and dissent as follows: 1. That without having ever been in prison, or imprisonment appointed, or any legal charge brought, it seems unjust to punish the earl of Clarendon for only withdrawing himself; it not being at all certain to the house, that he is gone out of the kingdom; and if it were known to the lords that he were fled beyond the seas, though the fault would be very great in a person who hath lately been in such trust, yet perpetual exile, and being for ever disabled from bearing any office, and the penalties in the Bill, seem too severe a censure. 2. That it may, perhaps, give some occasion for the scandal to have it believed, that the house of commons, and others, by standing so long upon pretence of a privilege to require commitment before special matter of treason assigned, were in doubt, that no proof of treason could be made out against the party accused; and that they had therefore designed, through terror, to make him fly and fear, lest he should yet return to be tried, in case they should bring in special matter of treason, as they ought to do, whensoever they accuse. 3. That by this Bill, power being taken from the king to pardon, it appeareth to be a great entrenchment upon his majesty's royal prerogative. 4. That there can be no such case, as have been pretended, ever to cause a necessity in the house of commons not to acquaint the lords with the particulars openly made known to them, by which they were first satisfied to find ground to accuse. 5. That the commons, so far judging any article to be treason, as to insist upon commitment, without imparting the particulars to the lords, do seem therein to usurp that first part of judicature from the lords, who are the highest court of justice in the kingdom. 6. That to require such commitment seems to be contrary to the Petition of Right and Magna Charta, and the rights not only of the peers and great persons of this kingdom, but the birth right even of the meanest subjects; and therefore those proceedings not having been according to law and the ancient rules of parliament, hath given opportunity to the earl of C. to absent himself. 7. The commitment upon a general Impeachment hath been heretofore, and may be again, of most evil and dangerous consequence; and as is conceived, the lords have yet no way for them so well to justify their fair and upright proceedings in the earl of Clarendon's business, and the true regard that they have had herein to the king and kingdom, as to decline this Bill of Banishment, and to expect a particular accusation of the said earl; and thereupon according to law and justice to appoint him a day for appearance, which if he observe not, without farther process, sentence might lawfully be pronounced against him. Strafford."

"We having this day given our negatives to the passing of a Bill for banishing and disabling the earl Clarendon; and having asked leave of the house to enter our Dissents, to the end that it may appear to posterity that we did not give our consents to that Bill, we do now take liberty to enter our Dissents, by subscribing our names. Berkeley of Berkeley, Holles, Ro. Lexington, T. Culpeper."

Dec. 19. The king by commission passed the above and four other bills. Immediately after, Mr. Secretary Morrice delivered this Message from the king to the house of commons; "His majesty having by a former Message acquainted you, that he intended an Adjournment to the beginning of Feb.; he doth now conceive, that Thursday the 6th of Feb. is a convenient day to which such an Adjournment may be made: and his majesty is willing to adjourn to that time." Accordingly, the Parliament broke up, after it had sat a little above two months, and without any prorogation had now a recess of above seven weeks.

[The King's Speech to both Houses.] Feb. 10, 1667-8.—Both houses met again, when his majesty made the following Speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen, I am glad to see you here again, to tell you what I have done in this interval, which I am confident you will be pleas'd with, since it is so much for the honour and security of this nation. I have made a League defensive with the States-General of the United Provinces, and likewise a League for an efficacious Mediation of Peace between the two crowns of France and Spain; into which league, that of Sweden, by its Ambassador, hath offer'd to enter as a principal. I did not at our last meeting move you for any Aid, though I lie under great Debts contracted in the last war; but now the posture of our neighbours abroad, and the consequence of the new alliance, will oblige me, for our security, to set out a considerable fleet to sea this summer; and because I must build more great ships, and it is as necessary, that I do something in order to the fortifying some of our forts: I have begun something myself in order to these ends; but if I have not your speedy assistance, I shall not be able to go through with it. Wherefore I do earnestly desire you to take it into your speedy consideration; for the loss of a little time now may beget a prejudice not to be repaired. And for the settling a firm Peace, as well at home as abroad, one thing more I hold myself obliged to recommend to you, at this present; which is, That you would seriously think of some course to beget a better union and composure in the minds of my Protestant Subjects in matters of Religion; whereby they may be induced not only to submit quietly to the government, but also cheerfully give their assistance for the support of it."

[The Duke of Albemarle's Narrative of the Miscarriages of the late War.] The commons deferred the consideration of this Speech till after the Committee appointed to enquire into the Miscarriages of the late War, had given in their Reports. In order to which the duke of Albemarle, prince Rupert, and even the duke of York himself, laid each his own Account before them. That of the duke of Albemarle being as follows :

“ I went early on Tuesday, the 11th of June to Chatham, where I found scarce 12 of 800 men, which were then in the king’s pay, in his majesty’s yards; and those so distracted with fear, that I could have little or no service from them. I had heard of 30 boats, which were provided by his royal highness; but they were all, except 5 or 6, taken away by those of the yards, who went themselves with them, and sent and took them away by the example of commissioner Pett, who had the chief command there, and sent away his own goods in some of them. I found no ammunition there, but what was in the Monmouth; so that I presently sent to Gravesend for the train to be sent to me, which got thither about 2 the next day. After I had dispatched this order, I went to visit the Chain, which was the next thing to be fortified for the security of the River; where I found no works for the defence of it. I then immediately set soldiers to work for the raising of two batteries, for there were no other men to be got; and when I employed them in it, I found it very difficult to get tools; for commissioner Pett would not furnish us with above 30, till by breaking open the stores we found more. I then directed timber and thick planks to be sent to the batteries and guns also, that they might be ready to be planted as soon as the batteries were made; and in the next place I sent capt. Wintour with his company to Upnore-Castle, which I took to be a place very fit to hinder the enemy from coming forwards, if they should force the chain: and upon further consideration, though I had horse near the fort, lest the enemy should land there, I commanded sir Edw. Scot, with his company, for a further strength of the place; and gave him the charge of it, with orders to let me know what he wanted for the security thereof.—Having thus provided for Upnore, I considered where to sink ships without the Chain, next to the enemy, as a further security to it. I found 5 fire-ships, and the Unity upon the place; and advising with commissioner Pett, and the master of attendance, and the pilot, how to do it; Pett told me, It was their opinion, that if 3 ships were sunk at the narrow passage by the Muscle-Bank, the Dutch Fleet could not be able to come up: and I, relying upon their experience who best knew the River, gave orders accordingly for the doing of it. But when this was done, they said they wanted two ships more, which I directed them to take and sink. After this, I ordered sir Edw. Spragg to take a boat and sound whether the sinking of those would sufficiently secure the Passage (which the pilot and master of attendance had not before observed) that was deep enough for great ships to come in; I thereupon resolved to sink some ships within the chain, and provide some against there should be occasion. I went then to look after the other ships and batteries, and to see the men and all things ready; but I found the guns, which I had before ordered to be there, nor yet come down; and instead of thick, oaken planks, (of which there was good store in the yards, as it afterwards appeared) the commissioner would only send planks of deal, saying, he had no other; which proved very prejudicial in the use of them: for they were so weak, that at every shot the wheels sunk through the boards, which put us to a continual trouble to get them out.—About noon, before the batteries were quite raised, the enemy came on to the place where our first ships were sunk: I went on board the Monmouth with 50 volunteers, and appointed soldiers in other ships to make the best defence we could; if they had proceeded; but they were so incumbered before they could clear the way through the sunk ships, and find another passage, that the tide was spent, and therefore they made no further advance that day; whereby we had time to consider what to do against the next attempt. There were two ships ordered to lie within the chain, to be ready to sink, if occasion should be: and wanting one ship more to sink in the middle between these two ships, I that night ordered the Sancta Maria, a great Dutch prize, to be sunk in the deepest place between the two aforesaid ships; and I judged it so necessary to be done, that I charged Pett, and the master of attendance, on peril of their lives, to do it by morning; they having time enough before the tide served to provide things to carry her down. Pett, who had received orders from h. r. h. on the 26th of March to remove the Royal Charles above the Dock, had, for about 9 or 10 weeks, neglected those orders: and, when I was getting all the boats I could (for I wanted many) for carrying materials for the batteries, and ammunition and soldiers for the defence of all our places, he came and told me, He would carry her up that tide, if he might have boats, which I could not then spare: for if they were gone, all our batteries must have been neglected, and I could not transport the timber, powder and shot, and men to them, to resist the enemy the next day. And beside, it was advised that instant, if the Dutch should have landed in the marsh by the crane, she might have been useful and have hindered them, having guns on board. Nevertheless, having notice shortly after, that there was neither sponge, ladle, powder nor shot in her, I sent capt. Millet, commander of the Matthias, about ten in the morning with orders to Pett to carry her up as he could the next tide; who pretended he could not then do it because there was but one pilot that would undertake it, and he was employed about sinking of ships. And seeing she was not removed in the morning, I myself spoke to Pett in the evening, in the presence of col. Mac-Noughton and cap. Mainsfield, to fetch her off that tide; but notwithstanding these orders, the ship was not removed, but lay there till the enemy took her. On the same morning, by break of day, I went to see what was done about the Sancta Maria, and found men towing her along to the place intended, and they had time enough to do their business: but soon after I had dispersed my orders to the ships, I looked and saw the Sancta Maria, by the carelessness of the pilots and masters of attendance, was run on ground, at which I was much troubled: for if that ship had been sunk in the place where I appointed, the Dutch Ships could not have got beyond those of ours sunk within the chain, and thereby none of the king's ships within could have been destroyed, in regard that our guard-ships within our batteries would have hindered them from removing our sunk ships.—About ten o'clock on Wednesday, the enemy came on with part of their fleet, and two men of war, 5 or 6 fireships, and some other men of war seconding them. They first attempted the Unity, which was placed on the right-hand close without the Chain to defend it; and they took her; and one of their fireships struck upon the chain, but it stopped it. Then came another great fireship, and with the weight of the two the chain gave way; and then the ships came on in that very passage where the Sancta Maria should have been sunk. They burnt the two guard-ships, and took off the Royal Charles, wherein the gunners and boat-swain did not do their duty in firing her, though they say they attempted it twice, but the fire did not take. This was all that I observed of the enemies action on Wednesday. Our next care was to provide against the tide which served the next day: I enquired what had been done by sir Edw. Scott at Upnore, and sent him as many of those things he needed as I could get boats to carry them to him, and sent likewise a company more than was formerly ordered, to reinforce the place in case of landing; and then directed 3 batteries to be made in the king's Yard; but could not get a carpenter, but two that were running away. I also planted that night about 50 cannon in several places, besides those that came with the train of artillery, which were also planted; I staid all night in the place with the men, and having no money to pay them, all I could do or say was little enough for their encouragement: for I had no assistance from commissioner Pett, nor no gunners or men to draw on the guns, except the two masters of attendance.—On Thursday morning betimes, Upnore was in a pretty good condition, and our batteries ready: I got some captains of ships and other officers, sea-volunteers, and others that came to me, to ply the guns; and other land-volunteers did assist them to draw them on the batteries. About noon the enemy came on again with two men of war, and two fireships, and some more men of war following them: the first two anchored before Upnore, and played upon it whilst the fireships passed up to the Great James, the Royal Oak, and the Loyal London: The two first fireships burnt without any effect; but the rest went up and burnt the three ships mentioned: and if we had had but 5 or 6 boats to cut off the boats of the fireships, we had prevented the burning of those ships; but those being burnt, as soon as the tide turned, they went back, and made no further attempt. I had, in the morning before this action, received his majesty's command to return to London; but I thought it most for his service to stay till the attempt was over: and then, having left upon the place the earl of Carlisle, and the earl of Middleton to command there till further order, I came away about 8 in the evening, and by two in the morning arrived at London."

Some Miscarriages in the late War voted.] From this and other Examinations, the commons discovered and voted several Miscarriages in the late War, and particularly in the Expedition at Berghen; in the plundering the East-India ships while the Dutch passed by; in the not setting out a sufficient Fleet last year; in the separation of those that were out, so that they became useless: in the want of provision and ammunition in the fleet, and in the forts; in payment of the seamen by tickets; in the want of intelligence, and dividing the fleets in the second year of the war; in the business of Chatham, &c. And they particularly resolved, "That, notwithstanding his majesty had 18,000 men in pay, in dispersed ships in the year 1667, there was not a sufficient number of ships left to secure the Rivers Medway and Thames." They strictly examined into one Miscarriage as to the first Battle against the Dutch, in which it appeared, 'That if the orders of the duke of York had been strictly observed, as they ought, in that Engagement, the whole fleet of the enemy had probably been destroyed.' For this, Mr. Brunkard, a member of the house, was accused of giving false orders to sir John Harman to slacken sail, while the duke was reposing himself, and when they were pursuing the enemy with the utmost advantage; for which Mr. Brunkard* was both expelled the house, and ordered to be impeached.

Impeachment of Commissioner Pett.] The Miscarriage at Chatham was so conspicuous, that the house thought they could do no less than impeach Commissioner Pett for so great a delinquency in that affair: accordingly, they drew up Articles against him to this effect:

I. "That the said Peter Pett, being a commissioner especially authorized and entrusted with the care of his majesty's yards, stores and provisions of the Royal Navy at Chatham, and having received orders from the duke of York about the 26th of March last, requiring him to bring up and moor his majesty's ship, the

* "Mr. Brunkard's ill course of life, and his abominable nature, rendered him so odious, that this affair of slacking sail was taken notice of in parliament, and upon examination found to be true; upon which he was expelled the house of commons, as an infamous person, though his friend Coventry adhered to him, and used many indirect arts to have protected him." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 270.

Royal Charles, and other ships, did wilfully neglect and refuse so to do; whereby the said ships were lost, and became a prey to the enemy. II. That his majesty having upon the 11th of June last appointed the duke of Albemarle to repair to Chatham, to secure all things against the invasion of the Dutch; he the said duke found the Royal Charles not brought up, but lying below in a place of danger; and having given orders to the said Pett to cause the said ship to be brought up as high as could be into a place of safety, the said Pett neglected the doing thereof. III. That capt. Brooks, one of his majesty's attendants at Chatham, knowing that the duke had given express orders to cause the Royal Charles to be brought up, did prepare anchors and other tackling ready for the same; and desired the said Pett to give orders for his so doing, which he refused to do. IV. That the duke of York having given orders to the said Pett to provide 30 boats for the defence of the River and Navy, he did not only himself misemploy some of the said boats for the removing some of his particular goods, but suffered the rest to be likewise misemployed, and did also seize a boat belonging to sir Edw. Spragg; so, for want of these boats, many of his majesty's ships were lost, and the security of the rest hindered. V. That the commissioners of his majesty's Navy, having signified to him on the 4th of June, that the Dutch were out, and given him special charge to command all captains on land, to their ships, and to be vigilant in the rest of the charge committed to him; he was so negligent, that of eight hundred persons, which were under his care and command, when the duke of Albemarle repaired thither, there were not above ten ready upon the invasion of the enemy. VI. That the said duke, having appointed soldiers to raise batteries for the defence of the Navy, he to obstruct the service, refused to give them the number of tools required, notwithstanding he had a sufficient quantity in his majesty's stores, as it appeared when those stores were broke open. VII. That the said lord general having sent orders to him to send out of his majesty's yards some oaken planks for his platforms and batteries, he sent only deal boards, which were prejudicial to the service, notwithstanding that there were in his majesty's yards several oaken planks fit for that service.—For all which Crimes and Misdemeanors they demanded justice and condign punishment, &c. at the bar of the lords.*

Impeachment of Sir W. Penn.] Not satisfied with this Impeachment, by means of some Discoveries and Informations, the commons found and singled out sir W. Penn,* another of his majesty's commissioners, and drew up Articles against him to this purpose: "1. Whereas in Sept. 1665, the Golden Phoenix, and the Slothany, two Dutch Ships, were taken at sea as prize by his majesty's fleet under the earl of Sandwich, in which the said sir W. Penn was then vice-admiral; he the said sir Wm. contrary to his duty, &c. did conspire with several persons to open the holds of the said ships, before judgment pass'd in the admiralty-court, and from thence embezzled great quantities of rich goods, whereby his majesty was defrauded of above 115,000*l.* 2. The said sir Wm. in pursuance of the conspiracy, did about the same time repair on board the Prize-Ship the Slothany, with sir Wm. Berkley, vice-admiral under his command, and did therefore give orders to Capt. Waerden, to whose charge the said ship was committed, to follow the directions of sir Wm. Berkley; who thereupon broke open the hold of the said ship, and took out several rich goods of great value, after it was closed and sealed up, and by the assistance of sir Wm. Penn, who sent several men on board for that purpose. 3. He the said sir Wm. got a considerable part of the goods into his possession, and shortly after did sell divers parcels of the said goods, and further warranted the sale thereof. IV. The better to colour the said fraud and embezzlement, orders were obtained from the earl of Sandwich for distributing some part of the said goods among several officers, whereof sir Wm. was chief, to be submitted, as was pretended, to his majesty's further pleasure, though sir Wm. well knew the orders of the earl of Sandwich were void in every respect; And afterwards a warrant for distributing the goods was duly procured from his majesty; whereas the said sir Wm. had, before that, possessed himself of divers of the goods; and, over and above did dispose of a further quantity of goods than was contained in the orders of the earl of Sandwich, or his majesty's warrant, to the value of above 2000*l.* For all which Crimes and Misdemeanors the commons likewise demanded judgment, &c. of the lords."

A Bill for the frequent holding of Parliaments withdrawn.] Feb. 18. Sir Rd. Temple brought in a Bill for the frequent holding of parliaments. He said, in Edw. 3rd's time a statute was made for annual parliaments; but they were too frequent, and therefore laid aside.

Sir Hugh Wyndham. This bill is brought in, I had almost said with impudence: [which expression was taken ill by many, and some said, 'that his words were impudently brought in:'] but his words being asserted, no farther debate arose about them, and he explained not.]

at sea, as Venables was general at land, for which they were both imprisoned in the Tower by Cromwell, nor ever employed by him afterwards." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 239. He died in 1670, aged 49.

* Sir W. Penn was Vice-Admiral of England, and father of the founder of Pennsylvania, "From a common man he had grown up, under Cromwell, to the highest command, and was in great favour with him till he failed in the action of St. Domingo, when he went admiral

Mr. Steward. This bill reproaches the very fundamental laws of England; for without the king's consent it gives the lord chancellor a power greater than the king; viz. That if in three years the king calls not a parliament, the chancellor for the time being, for such default, has power to issue out writs without him.

Sir R. Temple. The king has established all courts by law, which formerly followed his own court wherever it removed, but that was found inconvenient. This bill is no more for the highest court. He said he had forgot his breviate, which the Speaker should have had with the bill.

The *Speaker excepted against it, as likewise that the bill was blotched and interlined, which ought not to be when first presented.—With much difficulty a first reading was obtained: but from that time the gentleman that brought it in did not increase his interest in the house.

Sir John Birkenhead. This bill bottoms itself upon the statute of Edward 3d. for annual parliaments; but there was never any annual parliament. There have been two in a year, and may be one or more in a year, if need be. The question is, if the bill be not felo-de-se, of itself. The plague may alter the time, it being limited to so long time, and no longer impossible to be performed.

Mr. Mallet. Never any king prospered better both at home and abroad, by reason of frequency of parliaments.

Sir T. Littleton. By prorogations the effect of the triennial law is not eluded; which, by the former bill, might be. He knows not a more modest way of compelling the king by law. [Some said 'thing by law,' in excuse of him, for great exception was taken at the expression; but what he said was plainly and organically 'King.']

Sir T. Meres. In regard that leave was not asked, he wonders at the tendering the bill. That it may not put a slur on the former law, would have it laid aside.

Mr. Milward. This bill assures the calling of future parliaments; and an oath to the lord keeper, to issue out the writs. Let us trust the king with this, as we have done his predecessors. This bill does not: so the trust is here transferred, which is upon oath—that makes a difference.

* Sir Edw. Turner, who had held that post from the beginning of this parliament in 1661, and continued in it till 1672, when, according to Mr. North, "it having been discovered that he had taken a small present from the East India company, it so far lessened him in the opinion of the house, and lost him so much of his credit and authority, that it was thought advisable to remove him; which was done by making him lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer." Life of lord Keeper Guildford, p. 52. Oldmixon says, "that he was infinitely fond of speaking, but was so pedantic, so trifling, so full of gingle, and other old fashions, that his harangues are by no means worthy remembrance." Critical History of England, p. 255.

Sir Robt. Howard. If this bill be a 'compelling' the king, all laws do so. Should the people see this bill thrown out, what would they say who have given so much money?

Sir T. Clifford. This is a bill of ill consequence, breeding jealousy betwixt the king and his people. All persons are indicted in the king's name; but this writ the lord keeper is to issue out, quite puts it out. A lion put into an iron cage never leaves roaring.—This bill is contrary to monarchy. Corruption of manners causes laws. Is this proper for the king, who has repealed that act? Is this proper for the king, who has declared so much affection to the parliament? In another country, (Sweden) there is a calling of a parliament by officers; but it is only in the minority of the king.

Sir Robt. Brooke. The bill being interlined, it ought to be laid aside; but would not have it thrown out, lest apprehensions should be in the minds of the people.

Sir Lan. Lake. This bill necessitates the lord keeper to be a traitor. If he does issue out his writ he is a traitor, if he does not he is a traitor. This will make him, as in times of usurpation, a keeper of the liberties of England.

Mr. Solicitor Finch would have the bill withdrawn, only because not orderly brought in. This is a bill to bring in a bill of repeal without leave. No bill, of good manners, is to be brought in, though of money, without leave. That the king may have no negative, would have it withdrawn till leave be obtained of the house.

Sir Tho. Clifford. If the person be voted to have leave to withdraw it, and the person that brought it in will not, then are you possessed of it, it having been read.

Sir R. Temple was then ordered to withdraw the Bill; and it was ordered, That no Bill of this nature should be tendered to the house without leave and order.

The King's Messages to the Commons to hasten the Supply.] Meanwhile, the king believing that these proceedings and impeachments retarded the Supplies he had demanded, sent no less than three Messages, to bring back the stream of business to his favourite channel; the first of which was in these words: "His majesty hath been unwilling hitherto to interrupt you in your proceedings; but considering the posture in which his neighbours now are, and that the spring is already so far advanced, and that his allies (as they have great cause) pressed his majesty to hasten his preparations, he holds it absolutely necessary, in respect of the safety as well as the honour of the nation, that a fleet be set forth with all speed, and that course be taken for fortifying his ports, and building more ships: And therefore he doth again earnestly recommend it to you, forthwith to provide for such a Supply as these occasions shall require: And because you have not yet had satisfaction upon the Bill of Accounts of the former Supply, his majesty is very willing that this be collected and issued for those purposes, by such persons only as you shall think fit." The second and the third Message were only to enforce this: but in the last he let them know that he designed to put a period to this session on the 4th of May. But finding this design not so well relished, he sent a fourth Message to them on the 24th of April, in these words: "His majesty by his former message thought fit to acquaint you, that he intended the present session of parliament should determine on the 4th of May; but, finding the proceedings in many important businesses, now under agitation, would be lost, if there should be a session; and that many things not yet foreseen may happen to induce him to call you together again before winter, hath now thought fit to acquaint you, that he intends only an adjournment for three months; and desires you therefore to perfect the bills for Supplies, and such others as may be made ready by the said 4th of May, so that he may then give his royal assent to them before the adjournment."

[The Commons petition the King for a Proclamation against Conventicles.] The house notwithstanding proceeded with the business that lay before them; and especially the Informations they received from some counties, particularly Staffordshire, of the insolent carriage and Abuses committed by persons in several places, in interrupting and disturbing of Ministers in their Churches, and holding Meetings contrary to law. In consequence of which, after a solemn debate and resolution, they made and presented an humble Petition to his majesty, "That he would issue out his Proclamation for enforcing the laws against Conventicles; and that care might be taken for the preservation of the peace against all unlawful Assemblies of Papists and Nonconformists." The king thought himself obliged to comply with his commons, and accordingly gave this Answer; "I will issue forth my Proclamation according to your desire; and I do not doubt but you will take the second part of my Speech into consideration, according to the Vote."

Debate on the latter Part of the King's Speech, concerning the Union of his Protestant Subjects. March 11. The commons resumed the consideration of the latter part of the King's Speech, about uniting his majesty's Protestant subjects:

Sir John Goodrick moved that the Convocation might take this business into their consideration.

Sir T. Mores. It may be his majesty's Proclamation may reconcile them, finding no countenance from hence.

Sir R. Holt would know what the Nonconformists desire, declared by somebody; if their arguments are not convincing, then to adhere to our former vote.

Col. Sandys never knew a Toleration, without an army to keep all quiet. Let persons concerned propose what they would have.

Sir Humphry Winch. What they will ask, and what they will take is vastly different: thinks we need not give an indulgence, nor make the laws severer. Heresies commonly take root from the innocency of their authors, which has made them increase here. An army is as dangerous to establish by being too strait-laced, as by giving toleration. He had rather new model the Sectaries, than that they should have an interest in future parliaments to model us.

Sir John Eurny would have the Ecclesiastical Courts reformed, which are so obnoxious.

Sir Wm. Hickman. The bishop has little power in the Church but Ordination. The Ecclesiastical Courts are complained of by the bishops as mysterious and troublesome to the people.

Mr. Swynfin. Education in another way has been a great cause of separation. Proposes one question concerning the thing itself, That some condescension from the laws in being may be had, to unite his majesty's Protestant subjects.

Sir Philip Warwick. If we could so relax the law, as not to lose the law, he would willingly condescend to some indulgence, that neither the agenda nor the credenda may be violated. If I prove that a man needs not scruple any thing in the Church, why should he be farther indulged?—Would have care taken, that, after indulgence, they get not a footing to destroy the whole—It is an unreasonable thing to pass a vote, that some condescension may be, before we know what.

Mr. Ratcliffe. Would have the Act of Uniformity revised, to discover what, in that act, is too strict, as renouncing the Covenant, Assent and Consent—Moves that a conference may be allowed, of both persuasions, and to recommend that, in which they all agree, to your consideration; and that if any thing should be established for a law, that an eye may be had to real tender consciences—That Ecclesiastical Courts may be regulated.

Sir Walter Yonge. The case of the Clergy of England with the king, is as a master of a family that has quarrelsome servants; one will not stay unless the other goes away. No good to be had by conference, or the convocation.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. Has a great kindness for the Presbyterians, being assistant in their prayers and endeavours in the restoration of his majesty; but could wish their penitence had been as public as their first offences were, as the custom of the Church ever was—But for the Independents, which are Anabaptists, &c. many of them are not Christians, some Arians, and some Socinians; but the Presbyterians are right as to matters of the first Four Councils, which are indisputable—But when they scruple that of the chancellors in the Church, and other novelties, not above 500 years standing, and if no other thing than reducing things to the first four General Councils, be the case, would have a committee appointed by us and the lords, to consult with both houses of Convocation, and hopes by that to bring in many Papists also.

Sir T. Littleton. Let us do what is fit for ourselves to do; and if we do what is reasonable, and that gives them not satisfaction, it rests not at our door.—The kingdom of Poland has the greatest toleration in the world, and no standing army, but upon occasion of war—Their militia is their only standing army, which is made up of all opinions, and they have never had any wars upon religious accounts; and in their civil wars upon temporal affairs, persons of all opinions have mixed—Barneveldt, in Holland, only offered at a disturbance, and was taken off.—The only party there was Arminian, which he could wish was not so much received amongst our clergy—Predestination and free-will, in our 39 Articles, have occasioned all our disputes in the Church of England.—The Calvinist way has a loop-hole to let Arminianism into our articles—All along queen Eliz.'s, king James's, and king Charles's time, whenever any of these points were disputed, at degree of doctor, all the points were regulated by the Convocation, and then the current of the Church of England ran the Calvinist way—Besides at the synod of Dort—So long as the Church was true to itself, the Nonconformist never hurt the Church; but as soon as innovation and alteration came in by the churchmen, and they favourites with the crown, the Church declined—In Ceremonies we have much alteration; the Communion-table set Altar-manner, whereas it ought to be in the body of the Church, that the guests might come to the table, and the second service might be the better heard—No canon for the bowing at the altar, or, if any, quite laid aside—Now, if new ceremonies have been made, besides putting the tapers (on the Communion-table,) if private persons have dared to intrude these things against law, what will be the end? and none but such as will comply with this innovation shall have any preferment; and as this way has once ruined the Church, he hopes the parliament will not countenance the doing of it again—King Edw. and queen Eliz. prepared all things before they came to the parliament—Would have the king applied to, to give us some subject-matter to work upon.

Sir John Cotton. The Presbyterian tenets are most destructive to our government.—'That the king is but minister Bonorum.' 'he is greater than any one man, but less than the people.' 'Salus populi suprema lex,' and many more such.

Sir John Birkenhead. Theodosius, the emperor, so enjoined the sanctions of the councils, that no man, unconformable to them, could administer the sacraments—Socinus's opinions crept into the sects of Poland, which made the Cossacks always enquire, when they made any inroads, what the sectaries did—

Religion in Holland is subservient to trade—They reproved Mr. Price, the English minister, and sent him away, for preaching against their Sunday markets.—Queen Elizabeth's council advised her to keep Edw. 6th's liturgy, in which she made little alteration, and enjoined conformity; and king James in his acts of indemnity, excepts Nonconformists—Queen Eliz. would never suffer Nonconformity, though the earl of Essex would have given security for the peaceableness of the persons—King James let them have a conference at Hampton Court; he would abate nothing: at last Dr. Reynolds came in and conformed—Queen Eliz. was favourable to Papists, but made severe laws against priests; and when the people had no mass they came to Church—The Articles of the Church of England were drawn so, that both parties might subscribe—The convocation was a very mixed assembly of both persuasions—No canon nor sanction enjoins bowing at the altar—Bishop Morton never did it; it is left at liberty—In Judaism, Paganism, Mahometanism, and Christianity, in none of them a toleration is suffered—The pope may suffer Milan to have St. Ambrose's litany, and Bohemia to administer the sacrament in both kinds; this he may do in one Church, but not several customs in one Church—He would never advise his prince to do what has destroyed his father—He would not have the odium of this business lie upon the king—He would have no application made to him in it—Let there be no conventicles, and Church will be fuller—Must their mother, the Church of England, bow to a few novices? and for the old ones, they have falsified their former oaths and subscriptions—For benefices, no man has three, as is alleged; if any man has three, they are, ipso facto, by law forfeited—Conference has been already at the Savoy—It has done no good—He would have the convocation sent to.

Mr. Coventry. Here is one side against bishops, and other against the silenced ministers; between them both, I fear, we shall have no religion—The king bids us, in his Speech, do it, and we send to the king to do it—Would have the Committee for Religion revived, to receive what shall be proposed.

Mr. Boscawen. The civil wars in England come upon various occasions—Though the occasion of the last was much upon this account, yet it is not probable there will be any more—Many other occasions may bring them.

Mr. Seymour. Will rather veil the infirmities of his mother, the Church, then proclaim them in Gath and Ascalon—He is for comprehension—Two or three of the most eminent presbyters may be made bishops, and so an end of Nonconformity—Would have a liberty, but no farther than whether to wear a plain garment, a fringed or embroidered one, that these persons may be useful to the support of the government—He is for no middle way—If a man finds not his account in the government he lives under, he will never labour to support it—The effects of the Act of Uniformity have been much for the good of Holland, in point of trade—Mischiefs having outgrown public remedies, they must have gentle remedies—He would have an address to his majesty, to give them some liberty that might not endanger the public peace.

Sir R. Atkins* would have his majesty name some persons, such as he shall think fit; not of both persuasions, but persons of prudence.

Sir R. Carr fears that his maj. is possessed that the h. of commons is fond of toleration, and that we are possessed that his majesty is fond of it.—The farther debate was ordered to be re-assumed on the 8th of April.

March 13. Upon some proffers of a debate about the latter part of the King's Speech, which the Bill against Conventicles seemed to cross, Sir Tho. Littleton said, it is dangerous to make laws too big to be executed, although some over-forward men may execute them—The Churchmen are arrived to that pass, as to bring in what ceremonies they please, though they lie under suspicion of popery; and that others must conform to these innovations—What hope can we have of their doing any good from those that should be men of mercy, and carry things with the greatest severity?

Sir Giles Strangeways. When such formidable mushrooms should start up in a night that are too great for the law, no prudent state will suffer their laws to be flown upon—It is a trouble to him to hear the Church of England arraigned—It was upon the suspicion of popery that abp. Laud's head was cut off; and what will they have popery 7 years hence, when asking blessing is now popery?—Is this the way to make union, for every man to be tolerated his profession?—Would have ourselves in this house reformed—He is sorry to hear any thing of toleration countenanced here—No man can blame him for being zealous in his religion, as they are in theirs—Must a father yield his authority to his son?—Leave was given to bring in a Bill for continuance of the former Act against Conventicles.

April 8. The debate was resumed.

Sir Fretchv. Holles moves, after many discourses of decay of trade, That his maj. may be desired by this house to call together what number be pleases, and whom, of Dissenters, as he thinks fit, to hear them.

Sir John Northcote moves to have it referred to the consideration of the Convocation now sitting.

* "Knight of the Bath, and afterwards lord chief-justice of the Common-pleas: but in 1679, from a foresight of very troublesome times, he thought fit to resign and retire into the country. Having been zealous for the revolution, he was made by king William lord chief baron of the Exchequer, and died in 1711, aged 88." Biogr. Brit.

Mr. Progers would have it referred to the Committee of Religion.

Col. Birch says he knows no sect, unless Quakers, that will not subscribe the 36 Articles; three of them not concerning doctrine but discipline—The dissenters are either enemies, or we shall make them so—if so, there must be something to keep them quiet—he much doubts whether it be lawful amongst Christians to use any other weapons than what our master used—much more easy to govern persons of several opinions than one, by setting them up one against another—The dissenters doubt their condition, and secure a good part of their money beyond sea, as a more secure place—for dissenters, the Church will be stronger the fewer it has—this principle of liberty the Pope admits not, to read the Scriptures—the Turks suffer no learning, and the papists pray in an unknown tongue, lest the people should send their own prayers to Heaven, as we do—some would have the Cross, some not; some the surplice, some not—he ever acknowledged prayers to be a convenient thing in the church—he is not against them, but would have us consider of Assent and Consent, and so proceed upon the rest, and the fittest for us only to do.

Sir Walter Yonge is for taking off Assent and Consent, and could wish that Birch was as orthodox in the rest of his discourses.

Mr. Steward expected some proposals from dissenting persons, but for us to be felo de se of our own act, is a strange weakness; and so scan our government, piece by piece—would make a bridge of gold for them if they would come over, but never upon such terms as he hears discoursed of—it is to be frightened out of our government with bugbears—he lives in a county (Norfolk) of much trade; he knows not of a family removed, nor trade altered, and in the country a general conformity, which grows daily upon the people—in Norwich are 20,000 persons, and not 20 dissenters—he believes an interruption of trade, but merely out of design, which he hopes will not take here—the king can call persons of all persuasions without our desires; it was once done when the king came in, but without effect—but when they propose, if any thing be Scandalum datum, or acceptum, he would have it seriously weighed; but not to be felo de se in arranging our own act.

Mr. Waller stands up to prevent the heat that always attends debates concerning Religion—if proposals be made to the house, they will hinder the king's business, now we are ready to part—for the Convocation to consider of it, not proper for them, but absolutely exclusive; for when they altered the book of Common Prayer from what came from us, we allowed it not—Their business is in puris spiritualibus; it is our business to fence about and wall religion, not theirs—so the question is, whether to continue these laws, which were made in terrorem—The king proposed it at Breda, when we were not a people; at the Convocation also, when we were not a people—he wished then he had listened to this business, and is of the same mind still—The sheriffs oath against Lollards is mended since sir Edw. Coke refused that oath—he repents not his being against severe laws—the Quakers, a people abused—he hoped that would have abolished them; but since the severity of the law against them, they begin to be respected—the vulgar ever admire such sufferers as do it almost above nature—he hears the proclamation is not executed—the people of England are a generous people, and pity sufferers—The Justice of the Peace fears the offender will leave his wife and children upon the parish—as our church resembles the primitive church in doctrine, so it does in believers also; amongst us some know not so much as a Holy Ghost; and our clergymen, by their laziness, whip people out of the church—he would have all the opinions address themselves to his majesty—he presumes they will but differ in opinion, and so nothing will be granted, and they kept different—he would not have the Church of England, like the elder brother of the Ottoman family, strangle all the younger brothers—Empson and Dudley were hanged after the death of Hen. 7, not for transgressing the law, but for pressing too much the penal laws, which was the great blemish of that prince.

Mr. Vaughan. It is not proper for us to return this upon the king who proposed it to us—if it goes to the king, we may be apprehended not to deal candidly; and what we are subjected to in this case, the king is the same; and should the king chuse persons that may persuade him, is it likely that we should acquiesce in that persuasion? No.

Mr. Swynfin would have his maj. moved to call some persons to consult with him; it will prepare the business the readier for us—the dissenters increase, and the severity of the law increasing too, is never the way to unite us.

Sir Rob. Howard would have nothing have a tacit fate, but come clearly to you, whether it be fit to do something or no.

Sir Tho. Clifford. The question of going to the king being carried in the negative, is, in effect, a negative to the whole—it may terrify any person from advising the king.

Sir Tho. Meres. Those little things, so called, are nothing less than Ordination, and many other alterations in the government besides, and Toleration at the last—his maj. did acquiesce in our reasons against the Toleration; all the rest of the conference was spent in bitter railing, and invectives, and reflections upon the ecclesiastical government, as in 1640, and so will be again upon conference—the Dissenting party did not generally rest satisfied with the king's Declaration.

Sir Walter Yonge. The address is fit to be made to his majesty; he best knowing the temper of persons; they may be so best consulted with—there has been good use of colloquies, though no good of that at Hampton-Court, nor when the king came in; but in queen Eliz.'s time, and Edw. the 6th's time, very successful.

Sir John Goodrick. These persons would have a superstructure without a foundation: they propose nothing—though at Hampton-Court conference the authority of truth stopped some mens mouths, yet the rest were never satisfied—The Synod at Dort, and the conference in Scotland, as fruitless.

Sir Tho. Littleton sees no reason for apprehending terrifying of counsellors, for addresses of this nature have been formerly done—they take no privilege from the parliament—the king has so large a prerogative, that he apprehends the king may do more than is now desired.

Sir Adam Browne. Suppose they should persuade the king not to put the laws in execution against Conventicles, what a rock do we put the king upon!

Sir Rob. Atkins. Many are of opinion in the house that something should be done, who will be precluded by the negative, if no Address to his majesty; and so a prejudice to them who are friends to the end, but not to the means, by addressing his majesty.

Mr. Hampden. It will be said abroad, Why no proposals from the Nonconformists? Says one, if we grant something, you will have more and more, will you make the law already felix de se? So let what will be proposed, here is a negative in effect—The envy will not come upon his majesty, but upon the last persons that it rests upon, which is the house—this is a thing which has, in all ages, been done, and this Address is most suitable to the occasion.

Sir Tho. Lee moves that the oaths may be taken off, many having fallen from the church since they were imposed, it is probable, if taken away, they may return. They cannot meet without being thought tumultuous, so that we are to grant them, what, in our judgment, we think fit.

Sir Tho. Meres would, before any thing be farther proceeded in, have a vote pass that we shall have no Toleration.

Sir Tho. Littleton would have a toleration of some things; how could people else bow to the Altar, a thing not enjoined in the Rubrick? It is a question of a large extent.

Mr. Vaughan. As long as persons conform outwardly to the law, we have no inquisition into opinion, and a toleration will go a great way in that; but if you generally give it, it is to all Dissenters in point of conscience—he takes Arius and Nestorius to be with Mahometans and Jews, the same reason for all as for one: he would never do it, to introduce anarchy: thinks no man so impudent as to desire it: laws arise from within us, or without us: new laws, or repeal of laws, must be either by petition, or leave asked to bring in a bill: nothing of the toleration being within us, or without us, we mispend our time to no purpose: consider what offence it is to dissuade the people from obedience to the law: it is, in law, to disturb the government, and execution of the law; and then, how far will our interests lead us to it, or rather, a greater word, our obligation!

Mr. Swynfin. It was never thought that the law for Conventicles extended to any other persons than such as were out of all communion with us in doctrine, and hold no salvation in our church: it was never till now construed a Conventicle, the Dissenters being a people in communion with us in doctrine, though different in ceremonies.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. Condescension is as wide as the ocean: tender conscience is primitiæ gratiæ, which, when the devil has done with, he puts a man upon spiritual pride.

Mr. Vaughan. To the one kind of Dissenters, would have the Bill of Conventicles gone on with; for the inconvenience is as great from many others, as from the Dissenters mentioned.

Mr. Coventry. If a bill be brought in, he would not have it countenance the taking away the oath about the Covenant; and he that brings it in, at his peril: but yet would have an oath to alter nothing either in Church or State—by way of tacit consent, not by order of the house, to bring in such a bill.

The question being propounded, That his majesty be desired to send for such persons as he should think fit, to make Proposals to him, in order to the uniting of his Protestant Subjects, it passed in the Negative, 176 to 70.

Debate on the Bill for suppressing Seditious Conventicles.] April 28. An ingrossed Bill, for continuance of a former Act, to prevent and suppress Seditious Conventicles, was read.

Mr. Secretary Morrice. The fire of zeal for suppression of Conventicles may be so hot, that it may burn those that cast them in, as well as those that are cast in.

Mr. Waller. School divines cannot unite them with us: we have united them; what? against both State and Church—make the fire in the chimney, and not in the middle of the room—let the zeal be in the Church—we have seen the fruits of this formerly: let them alone, and they will preach one against another: by this bill they will incorporate, as being all under one calamity.

Mr. Vaughan. To be against this bill, is to cure a disease by doing things against it. Though this be but an adjournment, yet there may be reasons why we shall not meet again; therefore this may be a sufficient reason for passing it. Liberty has been given for any man to bring in a bill for union; no such thing has been done. In my own judgment, I am for indulging the people; the harm is not to be feared from the people: but if persons must be suffered to subvert the laws by seditious teaching, judge the consequence, and prevent it, by passing the bill at this time.

Some words fell from Sir Trevor Williams to this effect, 'That if the Proviso, concerning making the Roman Catholics part of this Bill of Conventicles, be not admitted of, he desires liberty to bring in a Bill to tolerate Popery;'

which discourse gave great offence, and he narrowly escaped calling to the bar; but at length was permitted to explain, which he did, 'expressing much trouble for the offence he had given the house, and that he had no ill meaning in what he had said.'

Mr. Vaughan. The statute of queen Elizabeth has given liberty to the lords to sit in parliament, without test of their religion; the commons not: therefore, if a man should say, the lords would not pass the Bill with the proviso of the Papists, because a great party amongst them are so, it is no reflection upon the lords: it would be otherwise to the commons, they having a test upon them.—The Bill was then passed, 144 to 78.

Great Misunderstanding between the two Houses, in Skinner's Case.] About this time, a Difference happened between the lords and commons, occasioned by Mr. Skinner, a considerable merchant of London, who, having received great damages from the East-India Company, had brought the matter by Petition into the house of lords originally, by whom he was relieved in 5000*l.* cost.* The common hearing of this, after a debate, came to these Votes and Resolves on the 2d of May: 1. "That the lords taking cognizance of the matter set forth and contained in the Petition of Thomas Skinner, merchant, against the Governor and Company of Merchants trading to the East-Indies, concerning the taking away the petitioner's ship and goods, and assaulting his person, and their lordships over-ruling the plea of the said Governor and Company, the said cause coming before their house originally, only upon the Complaint of the said Skinner, being a Common-Plea, is not agreeable to the law of the land; and tending to deprive the subject of his right, ease and benefit due to him by the said laws. 2. That the lords taking cognizance of the right and title of the island in the Petition mentioned, and giving damages thereupon against the said Governor and Company, is not warranted by the laws of this kingdom. 3. That the said Tho. Skinner, in commencing and prosecuting a suit by Petition in the house of lords against the Company of Merchants trading to the East-Indies (wherein several members of this house are parties concerned with the said Company, in particular interests and estates) and in procuring judgment therein, with directions to be served upon the Governor, being a member of this house; or upon the Deputy-Governor of the said Company, is a Breach of the Privilege of this house." In conclusion, they ordered the said Mr. Skinner, for so acting, to be taken into custody of the serjeant at arms.

* "The case was this: Skinner, the plaintiff, was a considerable merchant of London; the defendants were the East India Company, and, in their right, sir Samuel Barnardiston, as their governor. The matter of complaint was, That the said Company had seized a ship and cargo of Skinner's, and assaulted his person. Skinner, instead of commencing his suit in Westminster-hall, has recourse at once to the house of lords, who give him a hearing, and allot him 5000*l.* damages. Sir Samuel and the Company, on the other hand, knowing no balance for the power of one house, but that of the other, appeal to the commons, who vote Skinner's Complaint, and the lords proceedings thereon, illegal. The lords did the same by the Company's Appeal. The commons order Skinner into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms; and the lords did the same by sir Samuel, as likewise sir Andrew Riccard, Mr. Rowl. Gwynn, and Mr. Christopher Boone." Ralph.

Votes of the Commons upon it.] The East-India Company having petitioned the commons, as well as Mr. Skinner the lords, the commons after their three Votes, further resolved, "That the Petition of the Merchants trading to the East-Indies, and the two first Votes of this house now passed, relating to the jurisdiction of the lords, be delivered by a Message to the lords' bar, with reasons for enforcing the said Votes."

The Duke of Buckingham's Speech thereupon, at a Conference with the Commons.] This occasioned two or three Conferences with the peers; in one of which,

The duke of Buckingham delivered the following speech:—"Gentlemen of the house of commons; I am commanded by the house of peers, to open to you the matter of this Conference; which is a task I could wish their lordships had been pleased to lay upon any body else, both for their own sakes and mine: having observed, in that little experience I have made in the world, there can be nothing of greater difficulty, than to unite men in their opinions, whose interests seem to disagree.—This, gentlemen, I fear is at present our case; but yet I hope when we have a little better considered of it, we shall find that a greater interest does oblige us, at this time, rather to join in the preservation of both our Privileges, than to differ about the violation of either.—We acknowledge it is our interest to defend the right of the commons, for should we suffer them to be oppressed, it would not be long before it might come to be our own case; and I humbly conceive it will also appear to be the interest of the commons to uphold the privilege of the lords, that so we may be in a condition to stand by and support them.—All that their lordships desire of you upon this occasion, is, That you will proceed with them as usually friends do, when they are in dispute one with another; that you will not be impatient of hearing arguments urged against your opinions, but examine the weight of what is said, and then impartially consider which of us two are the likeliest to be in the wrong.—If we are in the wrong, we and our predecessors have been so for these many hundreds of years, and not only our predecessors, but yours too: this being the first time that ever an Appeal was made, in point of Judicature, from the lords house to the house of commons.

Nay, these very commons, which turned the lords out of this house, though they took from them many other of their Privileges, yet left the constant practice of this till the very last day of their sitting; and this will be made appear by several precedents these noble lords will lay before you, much better than I can pretend to do.—Since this business has been in agitation, their lordships have been a little more curious than ordinary, to inform themselves of the true nature of these matters now in question before us; which I shall endeavour to explain to you as far as my small ability, and my aversion to hard words, will give me leave: for howsoever the law, to make it a mystery and a trade, may be wrapt up in terms of art, yet it is founded in reason and is obvious to common sense.—The power of Judicature does naturally descend, and not ascend; that is, no inferior court can have any power which is not derived to it from some power above it. The king is by the laws of this land, supreme judge in all causes ecclesiastical and civil. And so there is no court, high or low, can act but in subordination to him; and though they do not all issue out their writs in the king's name, yet they can issue out none but by virtue of some power they have received from him. Now every particular court has such particular power as the king has given it, and for that reason has its bounds: But the highest court in which the king can possibly sit, that is, his supreme court of lords in parliament, has in it all his judicial power, and consequently no bounds, I mean no bounds of jurisdiction; for the highest court is to govern according to the laws as well as the lowest. I suppose none will make a question, but that every man and every cause is to be tried according to Magna Charta; that is, by his peers, or according to the laws of the land. And he that is tried by the Ecclesiastical Courts, the Court of Admiralty, or the high Court of Lords in parliament, is tried as much by the laws of the land, as he that is tried by the King's-Bench, or Common-Pleas. When these inferior courts happen to wrangle among themselves, which they must often do by reason of their being bound up to particular causes, and their having all equally and earnestly a desire to try all causes themselves, then the supreme court is forced to hear their complaints, because there is no other way of deciding them. And this, under favour, is an original cause of courts though not of men. Now, these original causes of courts, must also of necessity induce men, for saving of charges, and dispatch sake, to bring their causes originally before the supreme court. But then the court is not obliged to receive them, but proceeds by rules of prudence, in either retaining or dismissing them as they think fit. This is, under favour, the sum of all that your precedents can show us, which is nothing but what we practise every day; that is, that very often, because we would not be molested with hearing too many particular causes, we refer them back to other courts; and all the argument you can possibly draw from this, will not, in any kind, lessen our power, but only show an unwillingness we have to trouble ourselves often with matters of this nature. Nor will this appear strange, if you consider the constitution of our house, it being made up partly of such whose employments will not give them leisure to attend the hearing of private causes, and entirely of those that can receive no profit by it. And the truth is, the dispute at present is not between the house of lords and the house of commons, but between us, and Westminster-Hall. For as we desire to have few or no causes brought before us, because we get nothing by them, so they desire to have all causes brought before them for a reason a little of the contrary nature. For this very reason, it is their business to invent new ways of drawing causes to their courts, which ought not to be pleaded there. As for example, this very cause of Skinner that is now before us (and I do not speak this by rote, for I have the opinion of a reverend judge in the case, who informed us of it the other day in the house) they have no way of bringing this cause into Westminster-Hall but by this form; the reason and sense of which I leave you to judge of. The form is this, that instead of speaking as we ordinary men do that have no art, that Mr. Skinner lost a ship in the East-Indies: to bring this into their courts, they must say, that Mr. Skinner lost a ship in the East-Indies, in the parish of Islington, in the county of Middlesex. Now some of us lords, that did not understand the refinedness of this style, began to examine what the reasons of this should be; and so we found, that, since they ought not by right to try such causes, they are resolved to make bold, not only with our privileges, but the very sense and language of the whole nation. This I thought fit to mention, only to let you see that this whole cause, as well as many others, could not be tried properly in any place but at our bar; except Mr. Skinner would have taken a fancy to try the right of jurisdictions between Westminster-Hall and the Court of Admiralty, instead of seeking relief for the injuries he had received, in the place only where it was to be given him. One thing I hear is much insisted upon, which is the trial without juries: to which I could answer, that such trials are allowed of in the chancery and other courts, and that when there is occasion for them we make use of juries too, both by directing them in the King's-Bench, and having them brought up to our bar. But I shall only crave leave to put you in mind, that if you do not allow us in some cases to try without juries, you will then absolutely take away the use of Impeachments, which I humbly conceive you will not think proper to have done at this time."

In the close of this Conference, the lords declaring the Company's Petition to the other house scandalous, &c. this raised such a ferment there, as produced the following new Votes and Resolves; as, 1. "That the Petition of the East India Company to this house, touching the proceedings of the house of lords, in the case of Tho. Skinner, is not scandalous. 2. That the delivery of the said Petition of the East-India Company to the house, and the entertainment thereof, and the Proceedings and Votes of this house thereupon, was no Breach of the Privilege or encroachment upon the Jurisdiction of the h. of lords; but very proper and fit for this house, without breach of the fair correspondence, which ought to be between the two houses. 3. That a Message be sent to the lords to acquaint them, That this house doth take notice of the desire of the lords at the last Conference, for a good union to be kept between both houses: And it is the opinion of this house, that the best expedient to preserve such an union is, That all proceedings be forborn upon the Sentence and Judgment of the lords in the case of Tho. Skinner against the East India Company; and that sir Andrew Riccard, sir Samuel Barnardiston, Mr. Rowland Gwyn, and Mr. Christ. Boone be set at liberty; this house being unsatisfied with their lordships Reasons offered at the last Conference." Last of all, after a long debate, they resolved, "That whosoever shall be aiding or assisting in putting in execution the Order or Sentence of the house of lords, in the case of Tho. Skinner against the East-India Company, shall be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the commons of England, and an infringer of the privileges of this house."

The King's Speech, at the Adjournment.

May 8. They had no sooner finished this Vote, but the king, by the usher of the black-rod, sent for them to the house of peers, where, after passing several Acts, his majesty made a short Speech as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; I came hither purposely to pass some Acts which are now ready, and to thank you for the Supply you have now given me; which I hope will be sufficient, our neighbours being now agreed upon articles of peace. I cannot chuse but take notice of what I hear abroad, of some differences between both houses, touching the East India Company. I am as sensible of the privileges of the h. of peers (wherein I am concerned) as I am of the liberty of the h. of commons. But I hope, in this recess, there may be some means found out for an accommodation therein. I am willing you should adjourn to the 11th of Aug. next; and if there be no pressing occasion of your meeting then, I will give you timely notice by proclamation."

On the 11th of Aug. both houses adjourned

* "These proceedings, in regard to Skinner and the East India Company, occasioned a remarkable quarrel between the two houses; and, in order to reconcile them, the king recommended to them to strike out all proceedings relating thereto from their journals." Grey.

to the 10th of Nov. On the 10th of Nov. they again met, and adjourned to the 1st of March 1668-9. Upon which day they met and were prorogued by his majesty to the 19th of Oct. 1669.

New Regulation of the Civil List.] The duke of Buckingham, says Mr. Ralph,* was now as much out of love with the parliament, as his royal master. In order, therefore, that their meeting might be deferred the longer, the Civil List was put under a new Regulation according to the following thrifty Scheme:

“ The remain of 33,525*l.* to be employed (after all the ordinary Charge before-mentioned, with interest and deduction, in manner and order following, as his maj. shall direct) for the payment of pensions: 1. To those who had a hand in the King's Escape from Worcester, &c. 2. To the Coldstreamers. 3. To those who have Pensions or Salaries for present service. 4. To those who have Grants, on valuable consideration. 5. For past-services. 6. For Grants, on mere grace.

Rules for regulating of the Revenue, and easing of the Charge.

All Pensions and Payments hereafter shall be removed from other funds or branches of the Revenue, and made payable only in the exchequer, that the king may have the view of his whole Expence in one place.—A new Establishment to be made of the Expence of the Houshold, in one book.—The Impost of Ambassadors from Michaelmas 1668, to be as in the time of his late maj. Ch. I.—The Papers to be looked out, and new orders to be settled for the establishing and clothing the Yeomen of the Guard.—All that by office or otherwise have houses or lodgings of the king's out of the court, or his houses of residence, to be obliged to keep them, at their own charge, in repair; and the surveyor is to look to it.*

The court itself, likewise, in this long interval, underwent some alterations. Sir Tho. Clifford was made treasurer of the household, in the room of lord Fitzharding deceased, being succeeded by lord Newport, as comptroller, and sir John Trevor, secretary of state in the room of sir Wm. Morrice, who had a donative of 10,000*l.* to dispose him to resign. †

EIGHTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] Oct. 19, 1669. This day the parliament met, after a long recess of one year, five months and ten days. His majesty opened the Session, with the following Speech from the throne :

“ My Lords and Gentlemen ; I am very glad to see you here at this time, and I hope this will be a happy meeting ; for I have had great experience of your affection and loyalty to me, and am very confident of your continuance of it. It is now almost a year and a half since your last sitting ; and though my Debts have pressed me very much, yet I was unwilling to call for your assistance till this time.—What you gave me last, was wholly applied to the Navy, and that extraordinary Fleet for which it was intended. I desire that you will now take my Debts effectually into your considerations. Something I have to propose to you of great importance, concerning the Uniting of England and Scotland ; but it will require some length ; and I have left that, and some other things, to my Lord Keeper, to open them fully to you.”

The Lord Keeper Bridgman's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper spake as follows :

“ My lords ; and you knights, citizens, and burgesses of the h. of commons ; His majesty, in his most gracious Speech, hath expressed his great satisfaction in seeing you here at this time, and his hopes of a happy issue of this meeting : to obtain this, nothing can conduce more than a good correspondency and union among yourselves.—He hath reason to believe that you all come with the same common affections for the general good, and therefore persuades himself there will be no differences between the two houses : but if there should be any such, he earnestly recommends it to you, that, by your moderation and wisdoms, such expedients may be found out as may compose them, and that thereby no delay or obstruction be to your proceedings.—His maj. has also desired you to take his Debts effectually into consideration : I need not mention to you the uneasiness of his condition with that burden ; nor the inconveniences or mischiefs which might fall out if he should continue under it.—It is not unknown to you, that his maj. hath been a happy instrument, by the Treaty at Aix and by the Triple Alliance, to procure peace between the two neighbouring crowns ; the securing of that peace (wherein our own peace is concerned), and his majesty's reputation abroad, will also much depend upon your kindness to him ; and therefore he hopes that you will consider of how great an importance it is, at this time, that his maj. be enabled to bear such a part in the affairs of Europe, as may contribute most to his own honour, and the safety, benefit, and glory, of this nation.—My Lords and Gentlemen ; You may remember that, upon his majesty's recommendation, an Act was lately made, for settling freedom and intercourse of Trade between England and Scotland, which was occasioned upon complaints of new duties imposed in each kingdom upon divers commodities of the growth, production, or manufacture, of the other.—According to this act, commissioners were appointed by his maj. for both kingdoms, to treat upon that affair ; and they had several meetings, which produced no effect, unless it were a conviction of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of settling it in any other way than by a nearer and more complete Union of the two kingdoms.—His maj. is fully persuaded, that nothing can tend more to the good and security of both nations, than such an Union ; and finds that his royal grandfather king James of blessed memory, went so far on towards this good work, that by act of parliament in the first year of his reign, commissioners were authorized to treat and consult with commissioners from Scotland concerning it.—And, in pursuance of their treating, in the 4th year of his reign, an Act was made for the repeal of hostile laws, and the abolition of the memory of hostility between the two nations ; and, after the end of that session, about the 7th year of his reign, it was (by the judges of all the courts at Westminster Hall) solemnly adjudged, in the case of the Post Nati, that those who (after the descent of the crown to king James) were born in Scotland were no aliens in England, and consequently were capable, not only of lands, but all other immunities, as if they had been born here.—By these steps, so great an advance hath been made towards this Union, that his maj. well hopes, that what is yet wanting to the perfecting it may be now accomplished ; the continuance under the same obedience and subjection for near threescore and seven years having begotten the same common friends and common enemies to both nations, and taken off a great part of those difficulties which at the first stood in the way.—And therefore his maj. doth most heartily recommend it unto you, that Commissioners may be nominated, to treat and consult with commissioners from Scotland, concerning this Union. His maj. hath given directions to the earl of Lauderdale, his commissioner for Scotland, to make the like proposal to the parliament which is now sitting there ; and doubts not but, upon the meeting of such commissioners of both kingdoms, those things will be offered to your considerations, in order to the Union, as shall tend to the honour of his majesty and the common good of all his subjects.”

Sir George Carteret expelled.] Instead of taking these speeches into consideration, the commons enquired into the points of Privilege, with relation to the two houses, and were strict in the Examination of the Accounts of the Monies expended by the public ; in the passing of which, they found sir George Carteret, the vice chamberlain, who had the keeping of some of the books, so blameable, that they expelled him the house. But, being much obliged with the king's last Proclamation, they soon resolved, “ That the humble and hearty Thanks of this house be returned to the king's majesty for issuing out his Proclamation for putting in execution the laws against Nonconformists, and for suppressing Conventicles, with the humble desire of this house for his majesty's continuance of the same care for suppressing of them for the future." The concurrence of the lords being desired, and readily obtained, on the 6th of Nov. both houses, in pursuance of this Vote, attended his majesty in the Banqueting-House in Whitehall, where the lord-chief-justice Vaughan, supplying the room of the Lord-Keeper then indisposed, in the name of both houses returned his majesty the fore-mentioned Thanks : for which he returned them this particular Answer, " My lords and gentlemen ; I thank you for this mark of your affection to me : I doubt not of the continuance and concurrence of it in other things, as well as in this of my Proclamation : I recommend to you, that you would well weigh all that I say and desire in it towards the welfare and peace of the nation ; in order to which, as I shall always be ready to contribute my utmost endeavours, so I hope you will never be failing in yours to enable me to do it." After which, the commons appointed a committee to enquire into the behaviour of the Dissenters, who reported, " That there were divers Conventicles and other seditious meetings near the parliament, where great numbers of evil-affected persons frequently meet ; which they conceived, was not only an affront to the present government, but also of imminent danger to both houses of parliament, and the peace of the kingdom." Upon which, the whole house made this Declaration and Resolution, " That they will adhere to his majesty in the maintenance of the government of the Church and State, as it is now established, against all enemies whatsoever." Shortly after, information was given to the house from the Lord General, " Of the great resort of dangerous and disaffected persons to this town, and of their meetings and endeavours to disturb the public peace ; and that he had, and would take care what he could to prevent their attempts." Upon which the commons immediately resolved, " That the thanks of the house be returned to the Lord-General, for his care in preserving the peace of the kingdom." So that the suppressing or restraining of Conventicles was now looked upon not so much a matter of Religion, as of necessity and safety to the government.

Sir S. Bernardiston's Narrative to the House.] As to the point of Privilege, the commons, not having satisfaction in the last session, revived the debate of the Difference between the two Houses, as it stood upon the Case of the East-India Company, and Skinner the merchant ; and, understanding that sir Samuel Bernardiston was a particular sufferer by the lords in this case, they examined him in the matter, who, at the bar of the house, gave them this short account : " Mr. Speaker, as soon as the commons, according to his majesty's command, had adjourned themselves on the 8th of May, 1668, I was presently called as a delinquent upon my knees to the bar of the lords house, and demanded, What I had to say for myself why the judgment of that house should not pass upon me, for having a hand in, and being one of the contrivers of a scandalous Libel against that house : to which my reply was, That I knew not myself to be concerned in any scandalous libel ; but true it was, I did deliver a Petition to the house of commons, in behalf of the East-India Company by their order, being Deputy-Governor ; and I did it out of no other design, than to preserve the Company's interest and estate, according to my oath and duty of my place. Then I was commanded to withdraw, and others were called in : soon after some of the lords came to me in their lobby, and told me, the house was highly incensed against me ; that I should presently be called in again, and if I did not then submit myself, and own my fault I must expect the indignation of the house of peers to fall upon me. And being called in again the second time, it was demanded, What further had I to say for myself, before judgment should pass against me. When repeating my former discourse, adding, That I had no design to create any difference between the two houses, but to preserve the Company's estate : yet if I had offended their lordships, I humbly begged their pardon. Being then commanded to withdraw again, I was afterwards called in : and, being upon my knees, sentence was pronounced against me, to pay 300*l.* fine to his majesty, and to lie in custody of the black-rod till the money was paid. And accordingly, sir John Eyton, usher of the black-rod, kept me in his custody till the 10th of Aug. following, when, at 9 at night, he came to me and said, sir Samuel, I am come to discharge you from your imprisonment, and you may go when, and where you please. I then demanded how this unexpected releasement came to pass, and to whom I was beholden for the same. He replied, You are discharged upon honourable terms, but pray ask me no questions, for I must make you no answer : yet if I see you to-morrow, after the house is adjourned, I will tell you more ; there is a mystery, but I have sufficient authority for what I do."

Resolutions of the Commons thereupon.] Upon hearing of this, the house fell into a warm debate about some expedients for settling the Difference in point of Privilege and Jurisdiction of the two houses, which could not be ended that night ; and after that they resolved to bring in a Bill for that purpose. This appeared to be a matter of too great nicety and difficulty to be effected in a short time. However, after conferences with the house of lords, they came to these Resolutions. " I. That it is an inherent right of every commoner of England to prepare and present Petitions to the house of commons in case of grievance, and the house of commons to receive the same : in evidence whereof, it is one of the first works that is done by the commons, to appoint a grand committee to receive Petitions and Informations of Grievances. II. That it is the undoubted right and privilege of the commons to judge and determine concerning the nature and matter of such Petitions, how far they are fit or unfit to be received; and that in no age they found any person presenting a Grievance by way of Petition to the house of commons, and received by them, that was ever censured by the lords, without complaint by the commons. III. That no court whatsoever hath power to judge or censure any Petition presented to the house of commons, and received by them, unless transmitted from thence, or the matter complained of by them: and that no suitors for justice in any inferior court in law or equity, are therefore punishable criminally, though untrue, or suable by way of action in any other court; but are only subject to a moderate fine or amercement by that court, unless in some cases specially provided by act of parliament, as appeals, or the like. In case men should be punishable in other courts for presenting Petitions to the house of commons, it may deter his majesty's subjects from seeking redress of their grievances, and frustrate the principal end for which parliaments were ordained. IV. Whereas a Petition from the East-India Company was presented to the house by sir Samuel Bernardiston and others, complaining of Grievances therein, which the lords have censured under the notion of a Scandalous Paper, or Libel: the said censure, and proceeding of the lords against the said sir Samuel, are contrary to, and a subversion of the rights and privileges of the house of commons, and liberties of the commons of England; and further, no Petition, or any matter depending in the house of commons, can be taken notice of by the lords, without breach of privilege, unless permitted by the house of commons. V. That the continuance upon record of the Judgment given by the lords, and complained of by the commons, in the last session of this parliament, in the case of Tho. Skinner and the East-India Company, is prejudicial to the rights of the commons of England." In conclusion they added this further Allegation, "That the house of peers, as well as all other courts, are in all their judicial proceedings to be guided and governed by law: but if they shall give a wrongful Sentence contrary to law, and the party grieved might not seek redress thereof in full parliament, and for that end repair to the house of commons, (who are part of the legislative power); that either they may interpose with their lordships for the reversal of such Sentence, or prepare a Bill for that purpose, and for the preventing the like Grievances for the time to come; the consequence thereof would plainly be, That their lordships judicature is boundless and above law, and that the party grieved shall be without remedy." Therefore, as a present Remedy, they resolved upon these two following Propositions to be presented to their lordships: "1. That the lords be desired to vacate the Judgment against sir Samuel Bernardiston, given the last session of this present parliament. 2. That the lords be also desired to vacate the Judgment against the East-India Company, given by them the last session of this parliament."

PROCEEDINGS RELATIVE TO THE IMPEACHMENT OF THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Nov. 25. A Petition of Sir Edw. Fitzharris, bart. and Philip Alder, gent. against the earl of Orrery* was read, containing in substance, raising of moneys, by his own authority, upon his majesty's subjects; defrauding the king's subjects of their estates. The money raised was for bribing hungry courtiers to come to his ends, and if the king would not, he had 50,000 swords to compel him.

Mr. Garraway moves to have the point of time asserted when these things were done: if the petitioners had concealed it long, then his majesty was in danger. The Petitioners were then called in, and affirmed the words spoke and things done, since the Act of Indemnity.

Colonel Sandys moved it to be taken into consideration; and attributed our misfortunes to moneys so disposed of.

Sir R. Carr moves that the treasonable words may be read, and the gentlemen of the long robe may give their judgments what they amount unto.

Serj. Maynard. The charge is general, treason and misdemeanor. He thinks the words are treason. 25 Edw. 3d, is the measure of treason.

Sir Fr. Goodrick. Words make not a treason, but this is by act 25 Edw. 3d.

Mr. Edw. Seymour. We have found that a charge of high treason in the house of commons, is a remedy for the gout. Wonders that the words have been called in question, 'reflecting on the duke of Ormond.' This had never been brought in question, if those had been silenced—Would have him summoned; but if he cannot come, would have his charge sent him.

Colonel Sandys. Would know who the persons are Seymour mentions.

Sir R. Howard. No discourses of well or ill men should come before us, when a person is accused. It is a hard thing these words should have been concealed thus long; no man can make this treason by 25 Edw. 3d.

Lord Cavendish takes him down to the Orders. Not proper to launch into any thing that is not in the business before us.

Mr. Edw. Seymour. The charge had not been brought against lord Orrery, if one had been brought against the duke of Ormond.

Sir R. Howard. The earl of Meath came to acquaint him with his business, which he will tell you more of hereafter—Moves that the business may be prosecuted, and that if lord Orrery cannot come he may be brought in a chaise. What way would you go, pray resolve on presently on 25 Edw. 3d: he cannot be accused; if on 13 Car. II. it lies at their doors that so long have concealed it.

Sir Tho. Lee. Common fame has made these two great lords enemies. He hopes, by their falling out, the king and his subjects may be the better for it.

Sir R. Temple thinks the words are a misprision of the king's government: words though not treason, may be evidence of treason; if they do design to perpetrate some treason, they are treason: Would have the Petitioners called in, to know whether they have two witnesses to prove these words. By too long silence, they might have time to execute their treason. If you conclude it treason, the person must hear his charge read in his place, and his answer, and then withdraw.

Sir Job Charlton cites Pine's case, 'that the king was a fool, and unfit to govern.' The Irish Friar at Lishon, who said, 'he would come over to kill king James,' was guilty of treason.

Mr. Swynfin would be informed how you will proceed, in order to information where he may be tried, the treasonable words being said to be spoken in Ireland. He must first be heard, and witnesses must be examined. The words may be treason, or not treason, according to circumstance: Thinks it a parliamentary way to appoint some short time for examination of witnesses, and then call it what you will, and draw up the charge.

Mr. Garroway would not have him committed, but heard in the house: would have the petitioners give security to prosecute, and the member likewise be secured to appear.

Sir R. Howard. If they be trucking witnesses, to keep this in the dark so long, they deserve a rebuke, and at least to give security to prosecute. Lord Orrery will undergo any torture rather than the torture of not answering his charge.—On a division it was resolved, that Treasonable Matter was contained in this Charge, 132 to 144.

Sir Winston Churchill knew not how we could proceed against lord Orrery, being a privy counsellor. But it was averred he had no Privilege in that case. It was then Resolved, "That lord Orrery be sent for in custody of the serjeant at arms." It was also ordered, That a copy of the Articles against lord Orrery be sent him by the serjeant at arms, and his attendance required, to give his Answer to them; if he be not able to come, then that the serjeant is to leave a keeper with him, to attend him till he is*.

* During the Debate no member was suffered to go out, without leave asked, and when obtained, was enjoined by the Speaker not to communicate any thing that passed in the House.—"It was the sentiment of a great and dangerous minister, sir Tho. Clifford, that he should be able to do nothing in Ireland, while Orrery was president of Munster; and this is the secret of bringing the impeachment against him into parliament. The earl having

The Earl's Defence.] Dec. 1. The earl of Orrery, in his seat near the bar, answers his Charge. Because of his indisposition of the gout * sir Robert Howard asked leave that he might sit, which was granted.—The earl began with acknowledging, with all humbleness, the justice and favour of the house, in leaving the ten Articles sent him. The Articles bring no less than his life and estate, and, what should be more than both, his loyalty, in question; but he has innocence, without which he durst not appear before the house. He should be unworthy to serve his country in this place, should he fly your justice. In some places the Articles are dark, in some places intricate and inmethodical. If, by reason of some months sickness, and a spirit wounded with such a charge, he mis-express himself, he hopes he shall be pardoned.—Art. I. He thinks rather a Narrative than a Charge. The Charge says not that those he corresponded with were traitors or rebels. It is no crime to hold correspondence with the militia, for if they had power to do ill, they had power to keep from ill; they were the interest the king took care of. Should he say, 'England lies a bleeding, now London is burning,' these were words to stir up compassion rather than rebellious. They (the petitioners) accuse him of no bad intention in what he did, and no ill consequence followed upon it.—To Art. II. That he gained to his own use great sums of money, to raise up sedition, and told the purchasers, that unless money was raised to feed the hungry courtiers, nothing would be done; and levied 13,750*l.* to obtain his ends by corrupt means, which moneys were converted to his own use." Answers, It is not his custom to use uncivil language to any, much less to a courtier. The king will find those who exhibited the Articles more apt to rebel than the Irish interest. There were voluntary subscriptions of one penny per acre towards the charge of getting an Act of Settlement. Is it a likely thing that he should put them into rebellion, and not lead them; cheat them of their money, and think to have an interest in them? If this Article were true, he was fitter to be sent to Bed-had timely notice of the design of his enemies, came over, and took his seat in the English house of commons, but being seized with a violent fit of the gout, that opportunity was taken by his adversaries to bring on his affair, and to get him committed." Love's Memoirs of the earl of Orrery.

* "As the earl of Orrery, being scarce half recovered from his gout, was going up the stairs, leading from Westminster-hall to the Court of Requests, one of his friends observing to him that he ascended the steps with great difficulty and pain, 'Yes,' said he 'my feet are weak, but if my heels will serve to carry me up, I promise you my head shall bring me safe down again.'" Morrice's Memoirs of the earl of Orrery, chap. 6. His lordship prophesied right.

lam than to answer it here: he protests he lost 300*l.* by that business: desires that he who received the money, may certify what he received. It is as ordinary to take subscriptions of this nature, as for the fens. This has been these 9 years, and no complaint made: denies the black list: it is strange that 700*l.* raised voluntarily in 1661, should beget a rebellion in 1663: another penny per acre was raised by Act of Parliament: it is not likely he should refuse what is given him by act of parliament.—To Art. III. Imprisoning of people for bringing Certioraries: Answers, If any were punished it was for some insolence done, not for bringing certioraries. Denies letters for non-appearance. He has granted many Petitions: denies incroaching upon any man's freehold, unless in forcible detainers. His court of precedency never meddles with it; but they have power to quiet possessions, after 3 years quiet possession. Fitzgerald * was a person who forfeited his estate by rebellion. There was a letter from a high sheriff, directed to the lord president of Munster, and, in his absence, to the vice-president, complaining of Fitzgerald's forcible detaining a castle, and resisting the sheriff's power; defying his power in open words, as if running into rebellion. The lord chief justice of Ireland said to him, 'he was obliged to assist the sheriff, and his forces to be subservient to the sheriff,' and this in a time when we feared invasion from the French, and a strong place, and the best port in Ireland. Never heard complaint against any man, nor ever hindered due prosecution of law.—To Art. IV. The Article before was of protecting English, now of an Irish murderer †, 'that he should get him bailed, and so he escapes.' If the justice, upon his letter, do bail a man not bailable by law, it was his fault; he knows not for what the man was committed.—To Art. V. †. Has witness to clear this. Sir John Broderick and sir Rd. Osborne will prove the action to be voluntary; that land in his possession, and had set it for 99 years.—To Art. VI. §. Denies any trust from either soldiers or adventurers, but as a friend to both, and a privy-counsellor of England and Ireland.—To Art. VII. † Denies any creatures of his own to have taken to farm the King's revenue. The revenue is openly set at the council-board in Ireland: never saw the lord lieutenant, nor any counsellor, refuse the larger offer. Only the Excise beginning in 1663 and ending 1664, it was not valued at above 20,000*l.* But the aldermen of Dublin proffered, if he would take it, they would give 30,000*l.* rent, and if they might take it, they would secure the rent to Lord Kingston and him. The Article mentions not in what kingdom. It is obscure, as if it meant more than it does express. By this they got but 150*l.* a-piece. They had a warrant after a full hearing to set it for 38,000*l.* and they gave 39,000*l.*—To Art. VIII. † Answers, He paid arrears to the army, according to the king's Declaration at Breda: knows not to have done it either to those out of the army, or to such as opposed the king's Restoration: only one gentleman of quality turned out of the army, for being an Anabaptist, a little before the king's Restoration. This was the man that came eightscore miles to discover the plot at Dublin, to whom he gave 100*l.* which he locked upon with contempt, and protested he would never serve any farther, if rewards were offered him: denies the 'employing the Halberdiers that were the guard at the king's murder.' He turned out a nephew of his own, who had married a daughter of one of the king's judges. To Art. IX*. Denies the selling of a foot of land to any Irish rebels: Denies the buying of any lands of any Irish Papist, except 15 acres near Dublin, for which he paid 400*l.* for the convenience of his horses; had the seller of it been judged nocent, he had lost his title: One acre of land in Limerick is valued at eight in Kerry, and his lot happened to be in Kerry, and so his troop after that rate were satisfied in Kerry, according to the claim; but they have lost both their time and money, for want of due claim by the Act.—To Art. X. and last †. This Article, if true, would

* The charge was, 'That he, by a paper-order, dispossessed one Edmund Fitzgerald of a house, and 3000 acres of land; slew one of Fitzgerald's servants, and mortally wounded others, &c.'

‡ Art. V. This was 'for compelling one Thomas Walsh, of Pilltown, esq. to convey to him lands of inheritance to the yearly value of 600*l.* under pretence of procuring witnesses to prove him guilty of the late rebellion.'

§ Art. VI. This was 'for prejudicing the adventurers and soldiers, to whom the marquis of Antrim's lands were allotted, by granting a lease of a part of them to col. Talbot, who married his sister.'—† Art. VII. This was 'for causing some of his own creatures to take and farm several branches of the revenue, at far lower rates than others had offered.'—‡ Art. VIII. This was 'for converting several sums of his majesty's treasury in Munster to his own use, for ordering payment of arrears for service done for the late usurpers, and for employing some of the guard of halberdiers, who assisted at the late king's murder.'

* Art. IX. This was 'for purchasing lands, before trial, of persons pretending to innocence, and then concealing and withdrawing the evidence against them: and for procuring lands to be assigned to himself and his troop, for service done to the usurped powers.'

† Art. X. This was 'for committing several breaches of trust to his majesty, and tempting the officers of the Treasury by bribes; and evidencing a great ambition and scorn to his majesty's power, by threatening, 'that if his strike him dumb with its weight. The charge is general, and he denies it. All these look rather like aspersions than accusations, and so this general Article he must answer generally, No. He, being one of the council, advises one way for the farming of the king's rents; another, another way: He had nothing to do with what the king would do in mercy; they are only to do what law enjoins them. It is not crime, but difference of opinion, he is charged with. The great point is of 'compelling the king with 50,000 swords;' had it entered into his heart, he durst not have appeared here; and he wishes those 50,000 swords in his heart, if he said the words: hopes that his judges will consider the accusers, and the accused. At least it is not a probable thing he should utter such words in 1659; they had then such tumbings and tossings as were in England. He had then sent a letter to his brother, lord Shannon, then with the king, viz. 'That if your majesty will be pleased to transport yourself into Ireland, to your protestant subjects, we will receive you, and do our best to restore you to the rest of your dominions.' This was as early as any. If doubted, the king will clear it. If this be true, and whilst un-compelled by necessity, and out of choice and duty, is it likely that when the king was actually restored he should say these words? Fitter for Bedlam, if ever he said them, than to be here, and is it likely that in six or seven years he should put nothing in action? 50,000 swords must surely be meant English. He has done several services since the words, but no overt act since the saying them. That a man, at the head of an army seven years, should not do some overt act, is strange. That these words should lie seven years concealed is a misprison of treason. Not accused of any overt act, since only men say it. What he can say in point of law will be ridiculous; yet though the words that were asserted, the judges declared formerly not treason, yet he trusts more in the judgment of the house. 'Concealing his majesty's affairs, and advancing his private fortune,' are generals: Humbly desires no more to be done for him than your justice will put you upon; and so beseeches God to direct the house, and withdraws*.

* majesty did not confirm the estates of a party, at that time headed by the said earl, that his majesty should be compelled to do it with '50,000 swords;' and for exercising high oppressions and extortions; and also for giving his maj. false informations and suggestions."

* "Lord Orrery defended himself so well, that this Charge produced no effect, except opening the eyes of such of his old friends as had differed from him, and who now saw, with how small reason they had taken this step, and how far he was from endeavouring to return it, restraining himself, on the contrary, within the strict bounds of a direct defence, as the answers to the charge show." Biogr. Brit.

The Accusation left to be prosecuted at Law. Sir Wm. Lewis moved to have the Accusation remitted to the King's Bench.

Sir Tho. Clifford. Would not have the sword of this house of Impeachments be blunted upon offences of this nature: stars, in their courses do not amaze us; but comets give us apprehensions. Would have impeachments of this nature upon great and considerable occasions.

Serj. Maynard, considering the time, and the thing, if ever it was, and the petitioners must go into Ireland for their witnesses, and this noble lord's reputation suffer in the mean time, would have it referred to the law. One of the king's council once under the gallery, he remembers, desired, in another case, this might be the question, If any man in his conscience thinks this to be treason, let him say, Aye.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. There is little foundation in lord Orrery's Answer made, to build upon. We may say by his Answer, that the greatest part is not probable, and some things impossible to be true. He affirms words may be treason, or not, according to circumstance; and in a case of blood infinitely to be considered before acted—To say, 'I will kill the king,' ever was treason. By a statute of Hen. 8. it was felony to scatter papers that such and such a man has spoken treason. The words to be treason must be within such a time; for the words should be after the Settlement in Ireland; and what need 'compelling,' when the thing is done, and all the acts concomitant and subsequent have been for quiet and settlement? Let every man lay his hand upon his heart. It is an accusation to this house, and from this house; will you imprison upon out-doors accusation? You may have the house, at this rate, garbled when you please. Would have the accusations transmitted to the lord lieutenant in Ireland, where the offences charged were done, and so represent it to the king.

The question being propounded, That a day be appointed for the accusers to produce witnesses to make good the Charge, the previous question for putting it was carried, 116 to 114. After which the main question passed in the negative, 121 to 118. It was then resolved, "That this accusation against the earl of Orrery be left to be prosecuted at law."

Dec. 10. Sir Robert Carr, moves that witnesses may be sent for by order, there being, he hears, strict proceedings against persons who come over out of Ireland, without leave, by loss of command: would not have the business lie at our doors.

Col. Sandys. The lord lieutenant of Ireland is so strict upon our members, that, if they come over to do their duty here, others must be put into their commands. Moves that some directions may be given to prosecute lord Orrery; for his being quit of his Charge will be the greatest honour that ever came to him.

Mr. Wild said, that when sir John Morley was accused of high treason; he was to answer it at the bar, and it was referred to the law, but no particular direction given in it.

Sir Tho. Meres. The lawyers, unâ voce, said, That the charge was Treason; but that question was not in lord Orrery, who was used very civilly; but would not have us lose our justice in our civility.

Col. Birch, would not have the thing reached into but in a straight line.—It was then resolved to address the king, that Witnesses may have liberty to come over from Ireland*.

The Parliament prorogued.] Dec. 11. The king, by commission, suddenly put a stop to all proceedings, by proroguing both houses to the 14th of Feb. next. Thus ended the eighth Session of the Second Parliament, without passing one Act, although a Supply of 400,000*l.* had been voted for his maj.'s special occasions.

NINTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] Feb. 14, 1669-70. This day the parliament met again, when his majesty, having been attended to the house with the additional pomp of his new guards,† made the following speech from the throne:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I sent forth my proclamation, that there might be a good appearance at this meeting; having most confidence in full houses, where the well-being of the Church, and all other interests of the crown

* "Though the managers of this affair had interest enough to procure a vote for bringing over witnesses, yet they had more wit than to trust the house, or his lordship, with the examination of those witnesses, and so the matter fell." Biogr. Brit.

† "Thus ended this affair. No witnesses ever came, no prosecution was carried on at law, nor was any farther attempt ever made against lord Orrery. Had he continued still president of Munster, it is more than probable, that the name of sir Edw. Fitzharris and master Philip Alder had not been entered, on any occasion, in the Journals of parliament. But when the lion has lost his strength, the wild asses, and all the unclean animals of the wood, trot forth from their lurking-places, and cowardly spurn at him." Preface to the Earl of Orrery's State Papers, published by his great grandson.

‡ "On the 14th of Feb. the king, not in the guise of difficulty and distress, but with unusual pomp and state, being attended to the house by his new guards (which is the first instance we meet with in history, of the sovereign's entering upon the exercise of his legislative power, under the awe and influence of the sword) opened the session with a Speech, which had more the air of the master, than the servant of the Commonwealth. The lord keeper bore his under-part as usual: but though he spoke much longer, added nothing to the purpose, except by asserting, "That the loss which the king had sustained in the Customs, Excise, and Hearth-money, by the war, plague, and fire, amounted to 600,000*l.*" Ralph.

and nation, are best secured. When we met last, I asked you a Supply; and I ask it now again with greater instance. The uneasiness and straightness of my affairs cannot continue without very ill effects to the whole kingdom. Consider this seriously and speedily. It is yours and the kingdom's interest, as well as mine; and the ill consequence of a want of an effectual Supply must not lie at my door: and that no misapprehensions or mistakes touching the expences of the last war may remain with you, I think fit to let you know, that I have fully informed myself in that matter; and do affirm to you, that no part of those Monies that you gave me for that war have been diverted to other uses; but, on the contrary, besides all those Supplies, a very great sum hath been raised out of my standing revenue and credit, and a very great debt contracted; and all for the war.—One thing I must earnestly recommend to the prudence of both houses: that you will not suffer any occasion of Difference between yourselves to be revived, since nothing but the unity of your minds and counsels can make this meeting happy, either to me or to the nation.—I did recommend to you, at our last meeting, the Union of the two kingdoms, and I did the same to my parliament in Scotland: they have made a great step towards it, and I do again seriously recommend that matter to you. I have directed my lord keeper to speak more at large to you."

"My lords; and you knights, citizens, and burgeses of the house of commons; At your last meeting, his majesty did acquaint you with the great occasions he had for a Supply; and that he had forborn to ask it sooner, more in consideration of giving some time for the ease of the people, after the burthen of the war, than that the condition of his affairs could so long have wanted it: and his majesty hath commanded me now to speak more fully and plainly upon this subject.—His majesty hath not only by his ministers, but in his own royal person, examined the Accounts touching the Expences of the last War; and hath thought himself concerned to let you know, that all the Supplies which you gave him for the war have been by him applied to the war, and no part of them to any other uses: nay, so far from it, that if the preparations towards the war shall be taken to be for the use of the war, as they must be, a great part of his own revenue, to many hundred thousands of pounds, hath been employed also, and swallowed up in the charges of the war, and what did necessarily relate to it: to which may be added, the great debts contracted by his majesty in the war, and the great charge in the repairs of the hulls of his ships, and putting his navy into such a condition as it was before.—Besides his majesty thinks it ought to be considered, that when the Charges of the War were at the highest, the inevitable effects of it, and those other calamities which it pleased God (at that time) to bring upon us, did make so great a diminution in his Revenues, that (besides all other accidents and disadvantages) the loss that he sustained in three branches of his Revenues, in his Customs, Excise, and Hearth-money, by reason of the war, the plague, and the fire, did amount to little less than 600,000*l.* Thus you see, that though your Supplies have been great, yet the charges occasioned by the war, and the calamities which accompanied it, have been greater; and that the Debt which is left upon his majesty, and which he complains of, hath been contracted by the war, and not by the diversion of the monies designed for it.—His majesty hath commanded me to say one thing more to you upon this subject: that he did not enter into this war upon any private inclination or appetite of his own. The first step he made towards it did arise from your advice and the promises of your assistance; but if the charges and accidents of the war have outgone all your Supplies, and left him under the burthen of this Debt, he thinks that, as well the justice to your promise, as the duty and loyalty you have always shewed him, will oblige you to relieve him from it; and the rather, when you shall seriously consider, how uneasy this burthen must be to him, and what ill consequence the continuance under it must draw upon all his affairs. In which particular, you, and every person you represent in this nation, will be concerned as well as himself.—His maj. doth therefore command me, in his name, to desire you once more, and to conjure you, by that constant duty and loyalty which you have always expressed to him, and by all the concernment you have for the support of the honour and safety of his government, to provide such a Supply for him at this time as may bear proportion to the pressing occasions that he hath, and to the state of his affairs at home and abroad; and so speedily and so effectually, as may answer the ends for which he hath desired it.—His majesty hath further commanded me to put you in mind of what was at your last meeting proposed to you concerning an Union between the two kingdoms; and to let you know, that the parliament of Scotland hath since declared to his majesty, that such commissioners as his majesty shall name shall be authorised on their part to treat with commissioners for this kingdom upon the grounds and conditions of the Union. His majesty therefore thought fit now again to recommend it to you, to take that matter effectually into your consideration.”

The King's Proposal to both Houses, in the Case of Skinner.] Feb. 22. During this short session, which lasted but about seven weeks, four things were chiefly in debate and agitation, namely the unhappy Difference between the two houses, the Prosecution of the Dissenters, the Union of the two kingdoms, and the Supplies for his majesty's service. The first being revived to such a degree as might hazard the success of the last, the king himself thought fit to interpose, and to make a Proposition of an expedient; which he did to both houses summoned to Whitehall, in the following short Speech:

“My Lords and Gentlemen; I did very earnestly recommend to you the other day, that you would not suffer any Differences between yourselves to be revived; and I think it of so great importance, that I have sent for you again upon the same subject. I remember very well, that the Case of Skinner was first sent by me to the lords. I have therefore thought myself concerned to offer to you what I judge the best and safest way to put an end to the Differences: I will myself give present Order to raze all Records and Entries of this matter in the Council Books, and in the Exchequer, and to desire you to do the like in both houses, that no memory may remain of this Dispute between you; and then I hope all future apprehensions will be secured.”

This had such an effect upon the commons who thought themselves the only persons aggrieved, that they immediately resolved, ‘That in obedience to his majesty's command in his speech, a rasure or vacate be made in the Journal of the house of all the matters therein contained, relating to the business of the East India Company and Skinner.’ Which was not only done, but they further resolved, ‘That the humble Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, in the name of this house, and of all the commons of England, for his majesty's gracious Speech, and favour therein expressed to this house, and the commons of England.’*

Bill for suppressing Conventicles.] March 2. The bill for suppressing and preventing Conventicles † was read the second time.

* “At coming down from the king's presence, a pretty ridiculous thing! (says Marvell) sir James Clifford carried Speaker and Mace, and all members there, into the king's cellar to drink his health.”

† Marvell calls this Act ‘the price of money,’ adding, ‘the king told some eminent citizens, who applied to him against it, ‘That they must address themselves to the houses; that he must not disoblige his friends; and if it had been in the power of the lords, he had gone without money.’ The substance of this act was, that if any persons, upwards of sixteen, should be present at any Assembly, Conventicle, or Meeting, under colour or pretence of any exercise of religion, in any other manner than according to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, where there were five persons, or more, besides those of the said household; in such cases, the offenders were to pay 5*s.* for the first offence, and 10*s.* for the second; and the preachers and teachers in any such meetings were to forfeit 20*l.* for the first, and 40*l.* for the second offence. And, lastly, those who knowingly suffered any such Conventicle in their houses, barns, yards, &c. were likewise to forfeit 40*l.*

Mr. Waller. This bill looks more like a levying of money than a punishment; if one be poor, another must pay it. It may be of great scandal and hindrance to the Church, to make it more penal than that of the papists. Here is a general distrust of the whole nation, in effect; jealousy upon every officer, from the highest to the lowest. The people have a kindness for persecuted people, ever since Hen. 8. and queen Mary. These people are like children's tops; whip them, and they stand up, let them alone and they fall. The lords would not trust trial per pares with the judges. In this bill one justice of peace weighs down all. This is a strange requital for the trust the people have put in us. Should the people be to trust again, it is not likely it should be us, they being not tried by themselves as the papists are. The people naturally have a distrust of those that distrust them. The people of Rome, in their best times, would not be confined to chuse Patricians, but would chuse Plebeians, if they pleased, for officers. When Clodius saw it conduce to his ends to get the Tribuneship (of which he was incapable, because a Patrician) he suffered himself to be adopted. But against this adoption, two exceptions were found; one that he was adopted by a man of a lower rank, a Plebeian, which was unnatural, and by a younger man than himself, which took away the reputation of a father. But the people never did chuse any; no more will the people ever quit any of these men. When people are trusted, they chuse well; when not, it is ever ill; therefore let these men have the same trial as the papists have.

Sir Tho. Meres. The gentleman would have the same penalty upon the conventicles as upon the papists, which is just none at all.

Sir John Birkenhead. Anciently Juria never had any thing to do with Conventicles; but the ecclesiastical power is so enervated, that it can do nothing without the secular power. Edw. I. put out five Proclamations against such Conventicles as are with us now.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. Persecution and punishment are different; the pagans and heathens persecute Christians. No man is compelled to come to Church. This bill is rather a toleration.

Mr. Henry Coventry. The rules of our law are drawn from the civil law, as the more ancient. A man in a riot, and one killed, all are principals. In the militia, men are punished without jury; challenges any man to show what government ever gave leave to all meetings. In effect, it is a government without religion at all.

Sir R. Temple. This promiscuous toleration is more hurtful to the Church than a general one. The French king has reduced his from a mountain to a mole-hill, by allowing them set and limited places for the exercise of religion.

Col. Birch. Would have it considered whether it be your interest, or not, to pass this bill, A man that has no preaching near him, will take it where he can. You want only this bill to make you more miserable than you are, in wanting people. Is it reasonable to punish men when they must go four or five miles for a sermon? This driving it into corners, looks more like toleration, than publicly allowing them churches. The trading part of England is as the soul to the body. To whip them, and not to be able to tell them why you do so, is unreasonable, they having no churches in many places to go to.

Sir Rob. Howard. A general toleration is a spot in any government. Queen Elizabeth's greatest power was her indulgence; though the Protestants broke faith with her at New-haven, yet she kept up all by indulgence. All do conclude that the king of Spain's decay was the expulsion of the Moors by the inquisition, and the duke of Alva in Flanders. The French and Dutch Churches, here, are Conventicles by the king's power; and is it not strange that the king should have this power over strangers, and not on his own subjects? Would have a short act to punish them that the king does not indulge, according to his own wisdom. He thinks the king uses every thing well, and would have him given this.—The Bill was ordered to be committed.

March 8. The commons resolved, "That the Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, for his care in giving Order to bring the Offenders to justice; and that his majesty would be pleased to consider the danger of Conventicles in and near London and Westminster, from the nature of those further offenders, and to give Order for the speedy suppressing them: and, likewise, that his majesty would give Order to put the laws in execution against Popish Recusants; and that leave be given to bring in a Bill for the more easy and speedy Conviction of Popish Recusants." In this Vote the lords unanimously joined; and accordingly, on the 11th of March, they attended the king in the Banqueting-House with the said Vote and Desire, who was pleased to declare, "That effectual course should be taken in both cases."

Several Bills being now got ready, his majesty came to the house of peers; and after passing the said Bills his majesty declared that it was his pleasure that the parliament should be only adjourned, and that to the 24th of October.

March 28. The commons entered into the consideration of the lords Amendments, Provisos, and Clauses, to be added to the Bill for suppressing Conventicles.—First Proviso, "That no peer of the realm shall have his house searched, but by immediate warrant from his majesty, under his sign manual, or in the presence of the lord lieutenant of the county."—Second Proviso. "Provided always, and be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that neither this act, nor any thing therein contained, shall extend to invalidate or avoid his majesty's Supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs, [or to destroy any of his majesty's rights, powers, or prerogatives, belonging to the imperial crown of this realm, or at any time exercised or enjoyed by himself, or any of his majesty's royal predecessors, kings or queens of England; but that his majesty, his heirs and successors, may, from time to time, and at all times hereafter, exercise and enjoy all such powers and authorities aforesaid, as fully and as amply as himself, or any of his predecessors, have or might have done the same; any thing in this act, [or any other law, statute, or usage to the contrary] notwithstanding.*—The words in brackets were rejected by the commons, 122 to 68.

The King attends the Debates on Lord Roos's Bill.] As long, says Mr. Ralph, as the king was in the hands of Buckingham, and the rest of his motly cabal, he was upon ill terms with his brother; and made no difficulty to hearken to projects, to disappoint him of the Succession. Lauderdale or Buckingham, it is uncertain which, one while recommended the legitimating of the duke of Monmouth; and then a divorce; that his majesty might have unquestionable heirs of his own. The last of these projects seems to have been relished most; and, in order to reconcile the public to it, the Bill which lord Roos had brought in against his wife, for adultery, was forwarded by the king, with as much zeal as if the case was his own: the duke, on the other hand, opposed it as violently, having all the Popish lords, and all the bishops except Cosins, Reynolds, and Wilkins, on his side. When it was first read, the debate lasted till 10 o'clock at night: when a question for a second reading being put, it appeared, there were 42 sitting members and 6 proxies against it, and 41 sitting members and 15 proxies for it. Marvell affirms, that lord Arlington had a power in his pocket to annul the Proxies, if there had been a necessity for it. The duke and his party, however, entered their Protests.—On the second reading it was carried for a committee, by a round dozen. The king, afterwards, by the advice of Lauderdale, attended the debates in person, to the great surprize of the house, and dismay of the duke of York, who could not conceal his sense of it. Having seated himself on the throne, he told them it was a privilege he had from his ancestors, to be present at their deliberations; and, therefore, directed to proceed and be covered. This, at some periods, would have been thought a flagrant breach of privilege, as tending to overawe the

* "In this Session," says Mr. Marvell, in his Letters, "the Lords sent us down a Proviso for the king, that would have restored him to all civil and ecclesiastical prerogatives, which his ancestors had enjoyed at any time since the conquest. There never was so compendious a piece of absolute, universal tyranny. But the commons made them ashamed of it, and retrenched it." He adds notwithstanding, "The Parliament was never so embarrassed beyond recovery. We are all venal cowards, except some few."

house, but now it was interpreted into an honour; and the lords with White Staves were ordered to wait upon him with the thanks of the house for it. This kind reception induced him to make his attendance there his daily practice; and he declared, 'it was better than going to a Play.'—But though the Bill was finally carried by a few voices, and the king had said publicly, That he knew no reason why a woman should not be as well divorced for barrenness, as a man for impotency, he made no use of the precedent. Bishop Burnet, indeed, says, 'That Mr. Baptist May, of the privy purse, had told him, that a day was appointed for making the motion in the house of commons, that the king had engaged himself far in the laying of the thing, and in managing those who were to undertake the debates. But then we are assured, by the same authority, that his majesty had given directions to the said Mr. May, to cause that matter to be let alone, for it would not do.'

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the Adjournment.] April 11. This day, the king came to the house of peers, in order to pass the several bills, and to make an adjournment: at which time the commons being sent for, their Speaker, in presenting the Bills, delivered himself thus:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; At the opening of this session of parliament, your majesty was pleased to speak to your two houses, and recommended three things especially to us; Unity amongst ourselves, the Union of your majesty's two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and the Supply of your majesty's present and urgent occasions: in obedience to your majesty's commands, we have industriously applied ourselves to the consideration of these matters. By the blessing of God, all Differences are buried in oblivion. Your majesty's happy Expedient hath, like a strong gale of wind, blown up the rolling sands, and filled up all impressions; Vestigia nulla retrorsum. And as your people will universally enjoy the fruit of this happy Union, so our united prayers to God shall be, that your majesty may be crowned with the promised blessing, 'beati pacifici.' In order to the Union of your majesty's two kingdoms, both your houses of parliament have humbly besought your majesty to name commissioners for this your kingdom of England; and we have prepared a Bill to authorise them to treat with commissioners to be appointed for your kingdom of Scotland, upon such grounds as shall be thought conducing to that end, and to report them to your majesty, and to both houses of parliament of this your kingdom of England, reserving always to your maj. and the two houses of parliament, the entire consideration of the whole, and the allowing or disallowing thereof, or any part thereof, as they shall think fit. We have also considered of a Supply for your majesty's occasions: and I am commanded, by the knights, citizens, and burgeses of the house of commons, to present your maj.

with this bill whereby we have given to your majesty an Imposition upon all Wines and Vinegar imported, after the rate of 8*l.* per tun for all French wines and vinegar, and 12*l.* per tun for all other wines; and have granted this unto your majesty for eight years, to commence from Midsummer next. And I am further commanded to acquaint your majesty, that we apprehended the Revenue arising by the power of granting Wine Licences, settled upon his r. h. by act of parliament, hath been prejudiced by the last imposition upon wines, and will be much more impaired by this present imposition: we therefore added the last year to this bill of Supply with this Vote, 'That your maj. be humbly desired therewith to recompence h. r. h. the duke of York for the damage he hath received, and shall receive, in his revenue of Wine Licences, by this and the last imposition.' Having thus in the first place with all dutifulness obeyed your majesty's commands, we held it necessary to remember those that sent us hither, and to present unto your maj. some Bills that will be of public use for all the people of this nation. There is, first, a Bill for the preventing of seditious Conventicles, whereby no man is hindered the use of his own judgment in the exercise of religion, by himself or in his own family, or in the presence of four strangers: but, because the peace of the nation may be endangered by more populous meetings, contrary to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, we have imposed a penalty of 5*s.* for the first offence, and 10*s.* for the second and every other offence, upon all such offenders, to be levied by distress and sale of the offender's goods. We are informed, that your maj. suffers much by the stealing and embezzling of your ordnance, ammunition, sail cloths, and stores; and likewise your good people are much damnified by a wicked sort of people, who make it their practice, in the night time, to steal woollen cloths and stuffs from off the racks: and they are much encouraged in this their wickedness, by reason they have their clergy: We have therefore prepared a Bill for the taking away the Benefit of Clergy, upon the conviction of all such offenders. We have likewise prepared an additional Bill for the rebuilding the city of London, wherein we have revived the judicatory of your majesty's 12 Judges, empowering them to hear and determine the remainder of causes and controversies, which have not already received a settlement by them; we have also made provision for the widening of many more streets than were mentioned in the former act, and to enable the lord mayor and aldermen of the city of London to give satisfaction to those whose grounds shall be taken from them; and also for laying the foundation at least of the famous Cathedral of St. Paul, and towards the rebuilding of 51 parish churches, we have added an imposition of two shillings for every chaldron of coals that shall be brought into the port of London for the space of 17 years yet to come. *We have likewise prepared a bill for the ascertaining the measures of corn and salt, and provided that one measure shall be used in all the market towns of this kingdom. We have found great inconveniencies by the want of due repairing the Highways of this kingdom; and have therefore taken care for time to come, both to amend them, and to prevent the spoiling of them again, by carrying excessive loads, and drawing them with extraordinary number of horses and other cattle.—Experience tells us, when the consumption of foreign commodities exceeds the use and exportation of our native commodities, the nation must insensibly grow poor, and our treasure will be exhausted: we have therefore prepared a Bill for the Encouragement of Tillage, by permitting the exporting of corn; and also for the encouragement of other sorts of good husbandry, by exporting of horses, swine, and other cattle, and of butter and cheese; and have made them all free merchandize, paying certain duties to your majesty upon the exportation.—Having given your majesty this account of our proceedings since our last meeting in this our short, but happy, session; it is evident we have not mispent our time: but, with the good servant in the gospel, have gained many talents, so that we may with comfort and satisfaction return to our houses; and we hope we shall carry our masters blessing with us."

" My Lords and Gentlemen; I am unwilling to let you go away without telling you, that I am very well satisfied with the success of this meeting, and that you have so well complied with my desires, both in the correspondence between the two houses, and in the progress you have made towards an Union between the two kingdoms. I heartily thank you for the Supply you have given me; and I assure you I will make it go as far I can towards the satisfying of my debts. And because you have been long from home, I am content you adjourn yourselves till the 24th of Oct. next." —The Lord Keeper accordingly declared the parliament to be adjourned to the 24th day of October.

The following interesting account of the leading Occurrences that took place during the Recess, we shall give in the words of Mr. Hume: " We now come to a period, when the king's counsels, which had hitherto, in the main, been good, though negligent and fluctuating, became, during sometime, remarkably bad, or even criminal; and breeding incurable jealousies in all men, were followed by such consequences as had almost terminated in the ruin both of prince and people. Happily, the same negligence still attended him; and, as it had lessened the influence of the good, it also diminished the effect of the bad measures, which he embraced.—It was remarked, that the Committee of Council, established for foreign affairs, was entirely changed; and that prince Rupert, the duke of Ormond, secretary Trevor, and lord keeper Bridgman, men in whose honour the nation had great confidence, were never called to any deliberations. The whole secret was intrusted to five persons, Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale. These men were known by the appellation of the CABAL, a word which the initial letters of their names happened to compose. Never was there a more dangerous ministry in England, nor one more noted for pernicious counsels.—Lord Ashley, soon after known by the name of earl of Shaftesbury, was one of the most remarkable characters of the age, and the chief spring of all the succeeding movements. During his early youth, he had engaged in the late king's party; but being disgusted with some measures of prince Maurice, he soon deserted to the parliament. He insinuated himself into the confidence of Cromwell; and as he had great influence with the Presbyterians, he was servicable in supporting, with his party, the authority of that usurper. He employed the same credit in promoting the restoration; and on that account both deserved and acquired favour with the king. In all his changes, he still maintained the character of never betraying those friends whom he deserted; and which ever party he joined, his great capacity and singular talents soon gained him their confidence, and enabled him to take the lead among them. No station could satisfy his ambition, no fatigues were insuperable to his industry. Well acquainted with the blind attachment of faction, he surmounted all sense of shame: and relying on the subtlety of his contrivances, he was not startled with enterprises the most hazardous and most criminal. His talents, both of public speaking and private insinuation, shone out in an eminent degree; and amidst all his furious passions, he possessed a sound judgment of business, and still more of men. Though fitted by nature for beginning and pushing the greatest undertakings, he was never able to conduct any to a happy period; and his eminent abilities, by reason of his insatiable desires, were equally dangerous to himself, to the prince, and to the people.—The duke of Buckingham possessed all the advantages, which a graceful person, a high rank, a splendid fortune, and a lively wit could bestow; but by his wild conduct, unrestrained either by prudence or principle, he found means to render himself in the end odious and even insignificant. The least interest could make him abandon his honour; the smallest pleasure could seduce him from his interest; the most frivolous caprice was sufficient to counter-balance his pleasure. By his want of secrecy and constancy, he destroyed his character in public life; by his contempt of order and œconomy, he dissipated his private fortune; by riot and debauchery, he ruined his health; and he remained at last as incapable of doing hurt, as he had ever been little desirous of doing good, to mankind.—The earl, soon after created duke of Lauderdale, was not defective in natural, and still less in acquired, talents: but neither was his address graceful, nor his understanding just. His principles, or more properly speaking his prejudices, were obstinate, but unable to restrain his ambition: his ambition was still less dangerous than the tyranny and violence of his temper. An implacable enemy, but a lukewarm friend; insolent to his inferiors, but abject to his superiors; though in his whole character and deportment, he was almost diametrically opposite to the king, he had the fortune, beyond any other minister, to maintain, during the greater part of his reign, an ascendant over him.—The talents of parliamentary eloquence and intrigue had raised sir Tho. Clifford; and his daring impetuous spirit gave him weight in the king's councils. Of the whole Cabal, Arlington was the least dangerous, either by his vices or his talents. His judgment was sound, though his capacity was but moderate; and his intentions were good, though he wanted courage and integrity to persevere in them. Together with Temple and Bridgeman, he had been a great promoter of the triple league; but he threw himself, with equal alacrity, into opposite measures, when he found them agreeable to his master. Clifford and he were secretly catholics: Shaftesbury, though addicted to astrology, was reckoned a deist: Buckingham had too little reflection to embrace any steady principles: Lauderdale had long been a bigoted and furious presbyterian; and the opinions of that sect still kept possession of his mind, how little soever they appeared in his conduct.—The dark counsels of the Cabal, though from the first they gave anxiety to all men of reflection; were not thoroughly known but by the event. Such seem to have been the views which they, in concurrence with some catholic courtiers, who had the ear of their sovereign, suggested to the king and the duke, and which these princes too greedily embraced. They said, that the parliament, though the spirit of party, for the present, attached them to the crown, were still more attached to those powers and privileges which their predecessors had usurped from the sovereign: that after the first flow of kindness was spent, they had discovered evident symptoms of discontent; and would be sure to turn against the king all the authority which they yet retained, and still more those pretensions which it was easy for them in a moment to revive: that they not only kept the king in dependence by means of his precarious revenue, but had never discovered a suitable generosity, even in those temporary supplies which they granted him: that it was high time for the prince to rouse himself from his lethargy, and to recover that authority which his predecessors, during so many ages, had peaceably enjoyed: that the great error or misfortune of his father was the not having formed any close connexion with foreign princes, who, on the breaking out of the rebellion, might have found their interest in supporting him: that the present alliances, being entered into with so many weaker potentates, who themselves stood in need of the king's protection, could never serve to maintain, much less augment, the royal authority: that the French monarch alone, so generous a prince, and by blood so nearly allied to the king, would be found both able and willing, if gratified in his ambition, to defend the common cause of kings against usurping subjects: that a war, undertaken against Holland by the united force of two such mighty potentates, would prove an easy enterprise, and would serve all the purposes which were aimed at: that, under pretence of that war, it would not be difficult to levy a military force, without which, during the prevalence of republican principles among his subjects, the king would vainly expect to defend his prerogative: that his naval power might be maintained, partly by the supplies, which, on other pretences, would previously be obtained from parliament; partly by subsidies from France; partly by captures, which might easily be made on that opulent republic: that in such a situation, attempts to recover the lost authority of the crown would be attended with success; nor would any malcontents dare to resist a prince, fortified by so powerful an alliance; or if they did, they would only draw more certain ruin on themselves and on their cause: and that, by subduing the states, a great step would be made towards a reformation of the government; since it was apparent, that that republic, by its fame and grandeur, fortified, in his factious subjects, their attachment to what they vainly termed their civil and religious liberties.—These suggestions happened fatally to concur with all the inclinations and prejudices of the king; his desire of more extensive authority, his propensity to the catholic religion, his avidity for money. He seems likewise, from the very beginning of his reign, to have entertained great jealousy of his own subjects, and, on that account, a desire of fortifying himself by an intimate alliance with France. So early as 1664, he had offered the French monarch to allow him, without opposition, to conquer Flanders, provided that prince would engage to furnish him with ten thousand infantry, and a suitable number of cavalry, in case of any rebellion in England. As no dangerous symptom at that time appeared, we are left to conjecture, from this incident, what opinion Charles had conceived of the factious disposition of his people.—Even during the time when the triple alliance was the most zealously cultivated, the king never seems to have been entirely cordial in those salutary measures, but still to have cast a longing eye towards the French alliance. Clifford, who had much of his confidence, said imprudently, 'Notwithstanding all this joy, we must have a second war with Holland.' The accession of the emperor to that alliance had been refused by England on frivolous pretences. And many unfriendly Cavils were raised against the states with regard to Surinam and the conduct of the East-India Company. But about April 1669, the strongest symptoms appeared of those fatal measures, which were afterwards more openly pursued.—De Wit, at that time, came to Temple, and told him, that he paid him a visit as a friend, not as a minister. The occasion was, to acquaint him with a conversation which he had lately had with Puffendorf the Swedish agent, who had passed by the Hague in the way from Paris to his own country. The French ministers, Puffendorf said, had taken much pains to persuade him, that the Swedes would very ill find their account in those measures which they had lately embraced: that Spain would fail them in all her promises of subsidies; nor would Holland alone be able to support them: that England would certainly fail them, and had already adopted counsels directly opposite to those which by the Triple League she had bound herself to pursue: and that the resolution was not the less fixed and certain, because the secret was as yet communicated to very few, either in the French or English court. When Puffendorf seemed incredulous, Turenne showed him a letter from Colbert de Crossy, the French minister at London; in which, after mentioning the success of his negotiations, and the favourable disposition of the chief ministers there, he added, 'And I have at last made them sensible of the full extent of his majesty's bounty.' From this incident it appears, that the infamous practice of selling themselves to foreign princes, a practice which, notwithstanding the malignity of the vulgar, is certainly rare among men in high office, had not been scrupled by Charles's ministers, who even obtained their master's consent to this dishonourable corruption.—But while all men of penetration, both abroad and at home, were alarmed with these incidents, the visit which the king received from his sister, the dutchess of Orleans, was the foundation of still stronger suspicions. Lewis, knowing the address and insinuation of that amiable princess, and the great influence which she had gained over her brother, had engaged her to employ all her good offices, in order to detach Charles from the Triple League, which, he knew, had fixed such unsurmountable barriers to his ambition; and he now sent her to put the last hand to the plan of their conjunct operations. That he might the better covert his negotiation, he pretended to visit his frontiers, particularly the great works which he had undertaken at Dunkirk; and he carried the queen and the whole court along with him. While he remained on the opposite shore, the dutchess of Orleans went over to England (16th May); and Charles met her at Dover, where they passed ten days together in great mirth and festivity. By her artifices and caresses, she prevailed on Charles to relinquish the most settled maxims of honour and policy, and to finish his engagements with Lewis for the destruction of Holland; as well as for the subsequent change of religion in England.—But Lewis well knew Charles's character, and the usual fluctuation of his counsels. In order to fix him in the French interests, he resolved to bind him by the ties of pleasure, the only ones which with him were irresistible; and he made him a present of a French mistress, by whose means he hoped, for the future, to govern him. The duchess of Orleans brought with her a young lady of the name of Querouaille, whom the king carried to London, and soon after created dutchess of Portsmouth. He was extremely attached to her during the whole course of his life; and she proved a great means of supporting his connexions with her native country. The satisfaction which Charles reaped from his new alliance, received a great check by the death of his sister, and still more by those melancholy circumstances which attended it. Her death was sudden, after a few days illness; and she was seized with the malady upon drinking a glass of succory water. Strong suspicions of poison arose in the court of France, and were spread all over Europe; and as her husband had discovered many symptoms of jealousy and discontent on account of her conduct, he was universally believed to be the author of the crime. Charles himself, during some time, was entirely convinced of his guilt; but upon receiving the attestation of physicians, who, on opening her body, found no foundation for the general rumour, he was, or pretended to be, satisfied. The duke of Orleans indeed did never, in any other circumstance of his life, betray such dispositions as might lead him to so criminal an action; and a lady, it is said, drank the remains of the same glass, without feeling any inconvenience. The sudden death of princes is commonly accompanied with these dismal surmises; and therefore less weight is in this case to be laid on the suspicions of the public.—Charles, instead of breaking with France upon this incident, took advantage of it to send over Buckingham, under pretence of condoling with the duke of Orleans, but in reality to concert farther measures for the projected war. Never ambassador received greater caresses. The more destructive the present measures were to the interests of England, the more natural was it for Lewis to load with civilities, and even with favours, those whom he could engage to promote them.—The journey of Buckingham augmented the suspicions in Holland, which every circumstance tended still farther to confirm. Lewis made a sudden interruption into Lorraine; and though he missed seizing the duke himself, who had no surmise of the danger, and who narrowly escaped, he was soon able, without resistance, to make himself master of the whole country. The French monarch was so far unhappy, that, though the most tempting opportunities offered themselves, he had not commonly so much as the pretence of equity and justice to cover his ambitious measures. This acquisition of Lorraine ought to have excited the jealousy of the contracting powers in the Triple League, as much as an invasion of Flanders itself; yet did Charles turn a deaf ear to all remonstrances made him upon that subject.—But what tended chiefly to open the eyes of de Wit and the States, with regard to the measures of England, was the sudden recall of sir Wm. Temple. This minister had so firmly established his character of honour and integrity, that he was believed incapable even of obeying his master's commands, in promoting measures which he esteemed pernicious to his country; and so long as he remained in employment, de Wit thought himself assured of the fidelity of England. Charles was so sensible of this prepossession, that he ordered Temple to leave his family at the Hague, and pretended, that that minister would immediately return, after having conferred with the king about some business, where his negotiation had met with obstructions. De Wit made the Dutch resident inform the English court, that he should consider the recall of Temple as an express declaration of a change of measures in England; and should even know what interpretation to put upon any delay of his return."

The King's Speech at the Meeting of Parliament.] Oct. 24, 1670. While these measures were secretly in agitation, the parliament met according to adjournment, when the king made the following short Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; My principal design being the good of the kingdom, and believing that will be best provided for when the houses are fullest, I thought fit by my proclamation to summon you all to be here. My Lord Keeper will open at large the Particulars I have to recommend to you at this present; and what you do, I would have dispatched before Christmas, that you may then have leisure to return home, and that your own domestic affairs may not suffer by the care you take of me and the public. You have given me so many great testimonies of your zeal and affection, that it were to do you an injury to suspect your want of kindness at a time when there is so much need of it; and if you could possibly make any question of the value and love I have for you, I should think myself unhappy, since I have nothing more in my heart than to give evidences of it to the whole world."

The Lord Keeper Bridgeman's Narrative of the State of Public Affairs.] Then the Lord Keeper spake as follows:

"My lords; and you knights, citizens, and burgesees, of the house of commons; When the two houses were last adjourned, this day as you well know, was prefixed for your meeting again. The proclamation, since issued, requiring all your attendances at the same time, shews, not only his majesty's belief that his business will thrive best when the houses are fullest, but the importance also of the af-

airs for which you are so called; and important they are.—You cannot be ignorant of the great forces, both for land and sea service, which our neighbours of France and the Low Countries have raised, and have now in actual pay; nor of the great preparations which they continue to make, in levying of men, building of ships, filling their magazines and stores with immense quantities of all sorts of warlike provisions.—Since the beginning of the last Dutch War, the French have increased the number and greatness of their ships so much, that their strength by sea is thrice as much as it was before; and since the end of it, the Dutch have been very diligent also in augmenting their fleets.—In this conjuncture, whilst our neighbours arm so potently, even common prudence requires that his maj. should make some suitable preparations, that he may at least keep pace with his neighbours (if not outgo them) in the number and strength of his shipping; for, this being an island, both our safety and our trade, our being and our well-being, depend upon our force at sea.—His majesty, therefore, of his princely care for the good of his people, hath given order for the fitting out of 50 sail of his greatest ships against the spring (besides those which are to be for security of our merchants in the Medierranean); as foreseeing that, if he should not have a considerable fleet whilst his neighbours have such forces both at land and sea, temptation might be given, even to those who now seem not to intend it, to give us an affront, at least, if not to do us a mischief.—To which may be added, that his maj. by the Leagues which he hath made for the common peace of Christendom and the good of his kingdoms, is obliged to a certain number of forces, in case of infraction thereof, as also for the assistance of some of his neighbours in case of invasion: and his majesty would be in a very ill condition to perform his part in the Leagues, if, whilst the clouds are gathering so thick about us, he should, in hopes that the wind would disperse them, omit to provide against the storm.—My Lords and Gentlemen; having named the Leagues made by his majesty, I think it necessary to put you in mind, that, since the close of the last war, his majesty hath made several Leagues, to his own great honour, and of infinite advantage to the nation: one, known by the name of the Triple Alliance, wherein his majesty, the crown of Sweden, and the States of the United Provinces, are engaged to preserve the Treaty at Aix la Chapelle, concerning a Peace between the two then warring princes; which League produced that effect, that it quenched the fire which was ready to have set all Christendom on a flame; and, beside other great benefits by it which she still enjoys, gave opportunity to transmit those forces against the Infidels, which would, otherwise, have been embred in Christian blood.—Another, between his majesty and the said States, for a mutual assistance, with a certain number of men and ships, in case of invasion by any others.—Another, between his majesty and the duke of Savoy, establishing a free Trade for his majesty's subjects at Villa Franca, a port of his upon the Mediterranean, and through the dominions of that prince, and thereby opening a passage towards a rich part of Italy and part of Germany, which will be of very great advantage, for the vending of cloth and other our home commodities, and bringing back silk and other materials for manufactures here. Another, between his maj. and the king of Denmark, whereby those impositions which were lately laid upon our trade there are taken off, and as great privileges are granted to our merchants as ever they had in former times, or as the subjects of any other prince or state do now enjoy. And another League upon a Treaty of Commerce with the crown of Spain, whereby there is (not only) a cession, and giving up to his maj. of all their pretensions to Jamaica, and other the islands and countries in the West Indies, in the possession of his maj. or his subjects; but withal, free liberty is given for his majesty's subjects to enter their ports, for victuals and water, and safety of harbour; and return, if storms or other accidents bring them thither: privileges which were never before granted by them, either to the English or any others. Not to mention the Leagues formerly made with Sweden and Portugal, and the advantages which we enjoy thereby; nor those Treaties now depending between his maj. and France, or his maj. and the States of the United Provinces, touching Commerce, wherein his maj. will have a singular regard to the honour of the nation, and also to the trade of it, which was never greater than now it is. In a word, almost all the princes of Europe do seek his majesty's friendship, as acknowledging they cannot secure, much less improve, their present condition without it. His majesty is confident that you will not be content to see him deprived of all the advantages which he might procure hereby to his own kingdoms, nay even to all Christendom, in the repose and quiet of it; that you will not be content abroad to see your neighbours strengthening themselves in shipping so much more than they were before, and at home to see the government struggling every year with difficulties, and not able to keep up our navies equal with theirs. He finds, by his Accompts, that from 1660, to the late war, the ordinary Charge of the Fleet, communibus annis, came to about 500,000*l.* a year, and it cannot be supported with less: If that particular alone takes up so much, add to it the other constant Charges of the government, and the Revenue (although the Commissioners of the Treasury have managed it with all imaginable thrift) will in no degree suffice to take off the debts due upon interest, much less give him a fund for the setting out this Fleet, which, by estimate thereof, cannot cost less than 800,000*l.* His maj. in his most gracious Speech, hath expressed the great sense he hath of your zeal and affection for him: and as he will ever retain a grateful memory of your former readiness to supply' him in all his exigencies, so he doth with particular thanks acknowledge your frank and cheerful gift of the new Duty upon Wines, at your last meeting: but the same is like to full very short in value of what it was conceived to be worth; and should it have answered expectation; yet far too short to ease or help him upon these occasions. And therefore, such a Supply as may enable him to take off his debts upon interest, and set out this Fleet against the next spring, is that which he desires from you, and recommends it to you as that which concerns the honour and support of the government, and the welfare and safety of yourselves and the whole kingdom. My Lords and Gentlemen; You may perceive, by what his maj. hath already said, that he holds it requisite that an end be put to this meeting before Christmas: It is so, not only in reference to the preparation for his Fleet, which must be in a readiness in the spring, but also to the season of the year: it is a time when you would be willing to be in your countries, and your neighbours would be glad to see you there, and partake of your hospitality and charity; and you thereby endear yourselves unto them, and keep up that interest and power amongst them which is necessary for the service of your king and country. And a recess at that time (leaving your business unfinished till your return) cannot be either convenient for you, or suitable to the condition of his majesty's affairs, which requires your speedy, as well as affectionate consideration."

Several Money Bills in Agitation.] This Speech produced a Vote from the house, "That his majesty should be supplied proportionably to his present occasions." Accordingly, they went upon ways and means of all sorts, and in a short time began to form three several Money Bills; the first was for raising 800,000*l.* by way of Subsidies upon real and personal estates: the second was an additional Excise upon Beer, Ale, &c. for six years; and the last was for laying Impositions on Proceedings at Law, which was to continue nine years. While these things were in agitation, sir Samuel Sterling, the late lord mayor, sir Joseph Sheldon, sir Andrew King, and others of the lieutenancy, having committed Mr. Hayes, and Mr. Jekell, for attempting to bribe the magistrates in case of the act against Conventicles; the matter was brought before the house of commons, and being debated, it was thus resolved; "That this house doth give approbation to what was done by the late lord mayor, sir Samuel Sterling, and the lieutenancy of London, in committing Mr. Hayes and Mr. Jekell; and that it was done in order to the preservation of the king, and peace of the kingdom." Notwithstanding this Vote, Mr. Jekell soon after ventured to sue sir Andrew King at law; of which information being given to the commons, they fell into a heat, and resolved, "That Mr. Jekell be sent for in the custody of the serjeant at arms, to answer his contempt in prosecuting his suit at law against sir Andrew King, after the Vote of this house, whereby it was declared, That the commitment of the said Mr. Jekell was in order to the preservation of the king, and peace of the kingdom." And farther, they ordered Mr. Burton, counsel for Mr. Jekell, and Mr. Oden his attorney, to be likewise sent for in custody of the serjeant at arms, for their contempt in moving and acting for Mr. Jekell, after the fore-mentioned Vote: but were afterwards on their submission discharged.

Proceedings relative to the Assault upon sir John Coventry.] While the house of commons was in a committee on Ways and Means, a motion was made, "That towards the Supply, every one that resorts to any of the Play-houses who sits in the box, shall pay 1*s.* every one who sits in the pit, shall pay 6*d.* and every other person, 3*d.:" the house disagreed. This motion was opposed by the courtiers, who gave for a reason, 'That the Players were the king's servants, and a part of his pleasure.' To this sir John Coventry, by way of reply, asked, 'If the king's pleasure lay among the men or women Players?' This was reported at court, where it was so highly resented, that a resolution was taken to set a mark on sir John, to deter others from taking the like liberties for the futur. Accordingly, the house adjourning till after Christmas, on the very night of the adjournment, 25 of the duke of Monmouth's troop, and some few foot, lay in wait from ten at night till two in the morning, by Suffolk-street, and as he returned from the tavern where he supped, to his own house, they threw him down, and, with a knife, cut the end of his nose almost off; but company coming made them fearful to finish it; so they made off. Sir Tho. Sands, lieutenant of the troop, commanded the party; and O Brian, the earl of Inchequin's son, was a principal actor. The court hereupon sometimes thought to carry it with an high hand, to question sir John for his words, and maintain the action. Sometimes again they slugged in their counsels. One while the king commanded sir Thomas Clarges and sir Wm. Pulteney to release Wroth and Lake, who were two of the actors, and taken; but, the night before the house met, surrendered them again.

Jan. 9. The house being called over, according to former order, upon calling the name of sir John Coventry, information being given of an Assault made upon him, on the same night of that day the house did rise before Christmas, by a number of about 15 persons armed, horse and foot, who did assassinate and wound the said sir John Coventry; and that he continues still so ill of his wounds, that he is not in a condition to attend; resolved, That the matter of Breach of Privilege committed, and assault made, upon sir John Coventry, a member of this house, be taken into consideration the first business to-morrow morning.

* Ralph, vol. 1. p. 193.

The Coventry or Maiming Act brought in.
Jan. 10. Sir Tho. Clarges, one of the Justices of the Peace who took the Examination of the business, gave a Narrative to the house thereof.

Sir Edm. Wyndham, knight-marshal, desires to know whether you will proceed in it here, now it is prosecuted at law; and how far your proceedings may hinder the legal prosecution.

Sir John Hotham questions whether the king himself, and we, shall not be under proscriptions, as in Sylla and Marius's time: moves that we may right ourselves in this business, which deserves our vengeance.

Earl of Ancram* knows not how we can have greater vengeance than the law can inflict: if any of these be hanged by law, you have justice sufficient.

Sir Rob. Holt agrees not with lord Ancram: it is the greatest breach that ever was since the first constitution of parliaments. In Charles I. time, remembers what noise the business of the Five Members made: his majesty has a place here when he commands or does justice: if these persons are of his guards, they that will not fear God, will never honour the king: guards have been the betrayers of the empire; the Prætorians did it: thinks the king should have his guards; and amongst them are many worthy persons: would have his maj. moved to inspect his guards; lords poses are as ours are, unless they be of steel: it concerns the lords as well as us, as in lord Ormond's case: this wounds all the commons of England: in a plot, you had a committee of lords and commons, and they sat all Christmas: we may do so too: we know not what a petty jury may do in it: that will not right our privilege: you cannot, Mr. Speaker, at this rate, go home with your mace.

Sir John Monson has been lately in the country, and never saw a greater concern for a business: they fear we shall come under the government of France, to be governed by an army: moves for a Bill for these 16 that assaulted one man, to render themselves by a day, or be banished for ever.

Mr. Hale. Notice has been taken of this horrid fact here, but was not at the relation of it, but bears it in every street. If a man must thus be assaulted by ruffianly fellows, we must go to bed by sun-set, like the birds: the danger of post facto is not in this business: would have them hanged, if they could be caught: seconds the motion of Monson.

Sir Rob. Howard. He that likes this fact would do it; he that extenuates it, would be persuaded to do it: if any condition be to be pitied, it is the gentlemen that did capitulate the business: is sorry any English gentleman should wear a sword to do such a business: is persuaded that no gentleman in England but desires their room more than their company: the guards were fairly delivered to justice: in all companies there may be ill men, as well as in the guards: you may extend your enquiry to those whom the law cannot meet with.

Mr. Garraway would have something added: he would pity the gentlemen accessories who were under command.* In this Bill of yours would have a gate opened for safety for these gentlemen now committed. If they should declare their knowledge of the whole matter, they should plead this bill for their pardon: but will you pardon men who shall persist in a concealing? Would have them pardoned, if they will give an account to the lord chief justice of the thing, provided they were not actors in the assassination.

Sir Rob. Atkins. Until you can discover names, it will be too soon to bring in a Bill: would have you know upon what colour these persons did this assassination upon your member: would have your member heard himself; or, if he be not able, would have some persons sent to him; and you may do more or less, according to the aggravations: would not have any matter proceeded in till this business be over.

Sir Wm. Coventry. Has asked sir John Coventry if he could recollect what moved this misfortune upon him, but he remembers nothing they said that might point out the cause: knows nothing that may come of it, but delay, by farther speaking with him, it being felony, and all involved: it was a great good fortune to have any by-standers; and without some such expedient as Garraway proposed, you cannot possibly find out more.

Mr. H. Coventry. He is bound in point of modesty not to say much; but his relation prompts him to say somewhat: seconds the motion for a Bill.

Sir R. Temple. In Chedder's case, a Bill was brought in for the person that beat him on the highway, and a day was set for his appearance: cannot see how these persons can be witnesses, when attainted.

Lord Richardson,† looks upon these persons as capable of being witnesses, being not yet attainted; the Bill being found only by the grand jury.

Sir Nich. Carew would have something added for the security of your members for the future; and not to proceed in any other business till this Bill be finished: his reason is, that we may have freedom of speech till this Bill be done: without a better guard than Coventry had, he cannot speak freely to any thing else: perhaps this may be a new way of frightening people, that they may be alarmed and afraid: hopes you will add more to maim, and let some general law be included in this particular occasion, for our safety for the future.

* "That matter was executed by orders from the duke of Monmouth; for which he was severely censured, because he lived then in professions of friendship with Coventry; so that his subjection to the king was not thought an excuse for directing so vile an attempt on his friend, without sending him secret notice of what was designed." Burnet.

† A Peer of Scotland. The title is now extinct.

* Afterwards created, by king William, marquis of Lothian, and made justice-general of Scotland. Burnet says, "that he had no principles either as to religion or virtue;" yet adds, "that he had studied the most divinity of any man of quality he ever knew."

Sir Fr. Goodrick. To kill a judge in the execution of his office is treason: that of killing a privy counsellor, is repealed: Stroude's case is a general law: if the judges shall not take notice in their courts of any thing said here, you will not suffer 12 red coats to do it: there is as much due to you as to the judges: would have it Treason and Felony for the time to come.

Mr. Jones. It is the way to make your money come in the better, to punish this horrid un-English act, when there is a sense in the minds of the people of this horrid abuse; that by privilege of parliament being broken, the people are wounded: his soul trembles at the sad consequences: it is a greater thing than he has ever seen here: it concerns the person, justice, and honour of the king, council, and house of commons: great sums have been given, and great sums must be given; there are many malecontents: every ill humour goes to the place hurt: the people say, that the house has met these several years for nothing but to give money; and raising money to that high degree as we have done, they may be displeas'd: moves that by this Act they may right themselves. By this precedent, upon some of the guards, would have the world know you are in earnest: would have been silent, but the weight of the matter charms him: and that the king's business may not wait, would he at this, day and night; and proceed no farther in any business, till this be over.

Sir Job. Charlton. What hath been done for the people these 9 years? When this is over, he will give his vote for money as soon as any man.

Sir R. Temple. If he was jealous that all the Money-Bills should pass before this bill, would have this precede; but this may go with them.

Mr Garroway. Those Bills are so many snares, and sacrifice us to the fury of the people: suspects we shall have nothing, when this of money is pass'd, and therefore presses it.

Sir John Duncombe.* Whilst we are angry at this Bill, why should we hurt ourselves? knows not what effect the hastening of the bill may have, but the obstruction of the king's

* "Duncombe was a judicious man, but very haughty, and apt to raise enemies against himself. He was an able parliament-man; but could not go into all the designs of the court; for he had a sense of religion, and a zeal for the liberty of his country." Burnet. He was at this time a Commissioner of the Ordnance.

business: if the Bill was ready, would have it read now: read it twice in a day; make what haste you will; consents to it.

Sir Winston Churchill. Not to be for this bill, would be to upbraid the house: those persons who sit quiet in their sovereign's blood, wonder this thing should be so press'd: it seems to him a cutting the king over the face. [The words gave offence.] Explains himself, that he said it by way of simile: not only our own affairs, but of Christendom, are upon their crisis; and the king put into a capacity to defend the kingdom: moves that we may, de die in diem, proceed on this bill, which will certainly have a preference to the other: would have these two bills go simul & sevel.

Sir Tho. Meres. The Bill doubtless has been in our thoughts ever since the fact was done: it will take up no time, and it is so far from prejudicing the king's affairs, that it will advance them: wherever your members are intimidated, your laws may be questioned: the lords are included in your privileges: they have adjourned several weeks, we would have but three days for this bill: if we lose this question, we lose all, and begs your leave we may be gone.

Sir Rob. Howard. With what boldness can any man speak here, that must be pulled by the ears at night for what he says? The people say in the country, that unless you right yourselves in this business, your money is not given, but taken away.

Mr. Seymour has found none that speak with the indignation the thing deserves. But because injury has been done us abroad, therefore must we hurt ourselves? Hire some persons to assault some members of this house, and Supply may be hindered at any time: suppose this bill do not pass, must no other business be proceeded upon? Desires other business may not stand still.

Sir John Ernly. Nothing will make the people give more cheerfully than doing ourselves right in this business; and would sit morning and afternoon till it be done.

Mr. Cheney wouders that a thing of common justice, as this is, should be so obstructed: there was some suspension of justice: the lord chief justice was spoke with, and the secretaries, before justice was done; and some by that means escaped: necessity of the nation is at our doors, to take off that arbitrary power upon us.

Mr. Secretary Trevor concurs heartily with what has been done this day; but this deferring will be thought a jealousy, where he hopes there is none.

Mr. Waller has seen a stop in all business till members have been vindicated, and released out of prison: has seen the Petition of Right pass'd before Supply, but no vote pass'd in it: should it be said that the Supply depends upon passing another bill not in the power of us? When the Greeks and Romans had slaves disfigured and marked, it was a dishonour to the master; but that a free man, an ambassador of the people, should be thus marked, is much more horrible. These actions have sometimes wrought reformation; sometimes good effects, and sometimes ill, as the government is affected: we got the Petition of Right by discreet handling the business: the business of the Five Members was so ill handled, that great disorder happened: God brings light out of darkness: must give his No to this question.

Mr. Attorney Finch. The security of your satisfaction is not the question; what then should be the reason of this addition? He thinks you are satisfying the nation in our resentment: this satisfaction is a higher satisfaction than ever was known: 11 Hen. iv, "Any man assaulting a Member going or coming to parliament, if he render not himself to the King's Bench in such a time, they would proceed to fine; and if he do come, and be found guilty by inquest, by examination, or otherwise, he shall pay his double damages found by the inquest, or be taxed by the discretion of the judges, and make fine and ransom at the king's will." Lord Cromwell, 28 Hen. vi, was assaulted in the palace-yard; the offender imprisoned in the Tower for a year: we go about to do more than ever was, or attempted to be, done before: we put, by this vote, a stand to the government: no man can think this question can pass, and all other things stand still: why you should, for an imaginary opinion of the people, set a stop to all things, he knows not.

Mr. Vaughan. Persons argue for giving the king money, and yet would hinder it: you must, in nature, have a father, before you can have a son: if we act not with the same liberty and freedom as our ancestors, we trust as a person would an arbitrator that his adversary has a power upon: the people will tell us that we serve the king, not by law, but contrary to law.

Col. Titus. This has been a thing without precedent, and hopes you will prevent it for the future from being so: would not have you revenged upon yourselves. Whatever urgent accidents shall happen, not to be relieved until this Bill pass.

Mr. Hen. Coventry. Should be an unnatural man to his relation, and undutiful to the house, if he did not resent this; and would rather have all his wounds than hinder the prosecution: it is objected, 'that men may put clogs into a Bill that it shall not pass, and by consequence all business stands;' which he cannot well answer: would have it that this bill shall have a preference to all other bills; and, when it is ready, be read before all bills: would not have the nation believe that any persons that have a share in the government do in any wise countenance this business.

Col. Birch thinks you cannot do too much in this business: for the same reasons that many are against it, he is for it: nothing can be a greater mischief than a division upon this question; and he looks upon these bills of Supply to have their fate accordingly: cannot believe that any in the government had a share in this business, because they would have timed it better: would have the people think you act freely and speak freely: on my word, they think not so now: will say nothing of the nature of the thing: former precedents will not reach us: we must have the people have a good opinion of us (I would they had!): if this bill pass not, we know now to make it (with respect spoken): the other bills will pass this.

It was at length resolved, "That a Bill be brought in for banishment of sir Tho. Sandys, Ch. Obrian, esq. Simon Parry and Miles Reeves, actors in assaulting and wounding sir John Coventry, if they do not render themselves to justice by a day; and that no other business be proceeded in, whilst the Bill is passing."—On the 11th and 12th the Bill was read a first and second time.—Ordered, That it be referred to the committee formerly appointed to bring in the Bill for the banishing sir Tho. Sandys, and others, &c. to prepare and bring in a Clause against to-morrow morning, for preventing mischiefs of the like nature for the future.

Jan. 13. The house went into a grand committee on the Bill to prevent Malicious Maiming and Wounding*. Mr. Coleman in the Chair.

Mr. Attorney Finch. It is against the thing to make it felony: that former law of Hen. iv † gave such a terror that the thing was never done since: laws that look like the products and effects of passion, may not meet with the same passion, at the lords: why not forfeiture of goods, and imprisonment for life? Sir Hen. Spelman tells us of the penalty of cutting off hands and legs, leaving nothing but a living trunk; lex justior nulla, &c. the first fate of that law was upon him that made it.

Mr. Vaughan. The statute of queen Mary says, 'She holds herself safer in the hearts of her subjects than in the severity of law:' would have distinction of offences a hurt a surgeon may cure; dismembering he cannot. You ought to adapt it to this particular case, which gives the occasion of it.

Sir Tho. Lee would not have it go less than to an abjuration of the realm: would have the penalty changed, but the thing continued: were you a perpetual legislature, it were another case: would have those preserved that sent us hither, that we represent: agrees to abjuration.

Sir Wm. Coventry. If foreigners shall do it by being hired, what is the penalty for them to be abjured the realm? We are now more acquainted with them, than when the former statute was made.

Sir Rob. Howard. You will set up men to swear premeditation, and make felony, for every disturbance in the street; the reason of the thing is only applicable to your member; and he would fix it there.

* This was in regard to the Clause ordered the day before, and which probably occasioned the title of the Bill to be altered as above.

† Cutting out of tongues.

Sir Rd. Temple. If you apply a less penalty than felony to this case it will not reach: it is felony now, but by clergy, which is much more than abjuring: they are burnt in the hand, and forfeit their goods: would have it thus put in, 'by surprize, and at unawares;' by day these things are not so commonly done.

Mr. Secretary Trevor. What consideration this will have abroad, he always reflects: the parliament upon this occasion makes a general law upon particular occasions, but knows no reason why it should be for people in general: as parliament-men are now liable to greater hardships than formerly, so would have distinction: when prorogation comes, we are as other men, and lie under hardships for what we say here: soldiers of fortune may live in another country as well as here: would not have it banishment.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Few were saved in Henry's time by clergy, for few could read; so it was severer than now.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. You have precedents of a special occasion for a general law, as Chedder's case: thinks that proper and prudent; and has no inconvenience against making it death: would have it more than abjuration, because to aliens, and such as desire to be abroad—but he must approve; and if he return felony: would have it perpetual banishment, but not death.

Sir Wm. Coventry. For the case of a parliament-man, thinks abjuration proper, but for all people would have it felony.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. Clergy is now a matter of nothing; Clergy at common law was not an absolution from the offence; he then had a writ declared of restoration upon his purgation.

Sir Tho. Clifford. Much more to be said in the bill of lord Clarendon than this, in point of pardon: the second precedent entails things upon you: would not have the people out of power of pardon. It is the first time you have totally put a thing out of the king's pardon.

Sir Rob. Holt. Several crimes as this, of robbing and murder, the king cannot pardon, only respite execution: if they come by a day, would not have power of pardon taken away.

Sir Nich. Carew. If the action be without precedent, why should not the prosecution? This was done by the guards; if they should be pardoned, knows not what they may do to the king, and moves it for his majesty's ease and advantage.

Col. Kirby. A greater offence than this we petitioned the king to pardon, which was his father's murder.

Sir Tho. Meris. This house twice petitioned for execution, and it rested with the lords: therefore that is a mistake.

Mr. Attorney Finch, objects against the bill, that you convict them by the bill: would have it thus, 'in which assault a supposed robbery was done, which they are not yet convicted of.' The things may have been lost. As for pardoning, it is the same thing to pardon and not to execute, which is never done, unless the king's attorney sends the warrant, and that he will not do without command, this clause is a jealousy, and without effect of our ends: it is an indecent thing to shut up mercy: he who advised the emperor to shut up the sanctuary, fled to the horns of the altar, and could not lay hold of it.

Sir Wm. Coventry, would not have the nature of the fact otherwise than it is: 'lost,' instead of 'robbed:' he will have no other thoughts than what the house has of it. What fell from Mr. Attorney, is a reason for confirmation of the clause. He is never desirous of any man's blood; and if you continue this clause, it will reach the end of the member injured, without blood. Let every man consult his heart, whether his blood would not be higher than any philosopher can conquer; for it may put your member upon unchristianly revenge; and appeals to any gentleman what he would do, if he should see such a person walk the streets that had so injured him. Whatever we do here is petition; and it is a greater thing to petition to pardon than not to pardon: for the safety of all Englishmen lies in doing of justice. It is no new thing to find pardons interceding for persons: 51 Ed. iii. the Speaker had order to move the lords for Peirce, &c. It is not new for you, in case of an honourable member. In lord St. John's case, you went yourself with the house, in a body, to ask his pardon: for desire against pardon, 21 Edw. iii.: murders, &c. were frequent, by reason of pardon.

Sir Tho. Clifford. Coventry's precedents were before Henry 6th's time. He has read them, and been told, that before Henry 6th's time, the king put the sceptre upon one clause of a bill that he approved of, and left out another. Now the king passes all, or passes none: these ancient precedents have not the force that is urged by Coventry: moderate it so, that you tie no shackles on his majesty.

Dr. Arras made an extravagant motion for a Bill to be brought in, to punish any man that should speak any reflective thing on the king. By some he was called to the bar; but his explanation and excuse were admitted of. He said, 'He was the only physician of the house, and, humanum est errare: he hoped he should be pardoned.'

Sir Tho. Clifford. Your Chair has not been infallible. Do you know what Martin said, the impunity whereof was a great cause of what followed; and if the majority will not punish seditious expressions, thinks such a bill for the honour of the house.

Sir Tho. Lee, would not have that pass for doctrine, that, because once the majority of the commons have rebelled, hereafter they will do so; and if that be taken for granted, we pass a high reflection on ourselves.

Mr. Hen. Coventry. There was a violence; and should only the person that takes the money, and not they that stand armed to assist the other, be guilty, it would be strange.

Mr. Vaughan. Sands consented to the as-assassination, but not to the robbery; it is altius generis. But here every one is principal, though of one kind, and they present when cutting is committed: lord Dacre's case, when his men went a deer-stealing.

Sir Rob. Howard. Here is more in the case; for these persons were present, and might have prevented; if you will have all accessories incapable of pardon, it will reach many. If he had struck only, and not taken away, &c.

Mr. Attorney Finch. The fear that there should be a general pardon from the king, which you cannot mend, nor add exceptions to, is objected. Answers, he hopes to see such a pardon, but is in no prospect of such a pardon; and this jealousy may hinder such an intution: this is prime inventionis, ingeniously rolled in gentlemen's thoughts; and if ever any such thing was done, will sit down.

Sir Rob. Howard. The king may pardon all but such as actually wounded, maimed, struck, or took away: he would have him named, if he does get his pardon, that mankind may know.

Sir Tho. Meres. Is it imaginable that such persons, so infamous, should hinder an act of grace? Would have added 'unless such persons shall be particularly named in the act.'

Sir John Duncombe. Is not for that clause: knows not but he himself may want an act of grace as much as any man; and knows not whether this clause may not stop it: does not remember, in an act of this nature before, any such thing was mentioned.

Mr. Cheney is persuaded, that if such an act be intended, these words will not hinder it; and therefore would have the persons named.

Mr. Milward would not, to remedy a single person, insaure all the commons of England 'wound, maim, or bruise,' it may be done by mistake: upon a bare proclamation, if the person appeared not, a member should have judgment and double damages: this our ancestors thought a fair distinction of a parliament-man, from another man.

Sir Tho. Higgins. It was never death to strike a senator of Rome, nor now to strike a senator of Venice, out of the senate. Would not have us take more upon us than our ancestors did.

Sir Rd. Temple. The two particular cases beget a general law, of double damages. Would you have any man for double damages venture to beat a member of parliament? Would have a general law, to prevent making more, for the future: the law implies malice, when there is no act of provocation.

Mr. Vaughan. Is against making a bare trespass felony; would have it farther considered.

Sir Rob. Carr would have the law secure those we represent, as well as ourselves; therefore would have another bill brought in.

Sir Tho. Lee. Times and manners are altered, and men are: time was, when none should go armed in parliament-time. What penalty have you now more for a member than another person? We come to provide for the commons of England, as well as for a particular member: we are, upon occasion of speaking, exposed to that which other men are not.

Col. Stroude. We shall, by this, give other provocation, and they not dare to provoke us.

Sir John Birkenhead. Swinnerton quarrelled with Ipstock, and killed him; it was but as killing another man; parliament-men will be afraid of one another: riding armed, forbidden in three several parliaments, 'within the liberties of Westminster, unless his majesty's officer's,' an integral part in that proclamation.

Mr. Hen. Coventry would not only have it felony upon the member, but upon any man: if he may not have a privilege against bastinadoes, cares not for having it against hurts: would have it against cudgels as well as swords.

Mr. Vaughan. We have privileges that other persons have not, from arrests: why should we not have it in other things?

Col. Birch. If we have a greater guard than other men, we shall be less regarded: desires we should be no more distinguished than other men; but to have our noses cut, should be deferred—is against it—if we were a people that went not to plays nor taverns, another thing; but at this rate, no man will play with us.

Sir Job. Charlton. It is not felony if he 'wounds' a man that is chancellor, or judge, executing his office; 'killing' is treason: this making it felony upon one of the house is unreasonable, that it should be more than upon those that represent his majesty's person.

Sir Adam Brown would have care taken to prevent combinations: would not have the clause disjoined from the bill, which occasioned the penning of the bill.

Sir Tho. Clifford. Is for the clause of a general assassinating; and it is not proper to make ourselves, who are not judges born, as the lords are: we are 500 to day, and 500 new men a month hence: there can be no notoriety to the people: would have some gentlemen accommodate this to the bill.

The Bill, with the amendments, was ordered to be ingrossed; and on the 14th, it was resolved, That the Bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act to prevent malicious Maiming and Wounding."

Debate on a Clause in the Subsidy Bill, for doubly assessing Members, defaulters in Attendance. Feb. 16. A Clause for doubly assessing the Members, defaulters in attendance, in the Bill of Subsidies, was moved.

Mr. Attorney Finch. Whoever is so unfortunate as to be in this black list, to be upon record, had better quite be thrown out of the house. What will be the consequence? Suppose they will justify themselves by reasonable cause, will you allow them to deny that which you have voted to be true? If not heard, they are condemned unreasonably. Will the lords pass it without scanning? And do you let them in to examine what are the weighty affairs of this house, and judge it? You have other ways; you have power to fine them; and that you appoint a day to pay it, upon penalty of expulsion from the house. You may do it, but would not have such a clause to stand on record, to the disgrace of so many families.

Sir Tho. Lee. It is no more than an additional penalty to the statute of 8 Hen. viii. for that loss of wages was as notorious as this additional penalty. Mr. Attorney has told you, that after session you have no power to fine them; therefore, this way you take, you have as much judgment in this as the peers, for they had your assistance by that statute to fine their own members, and no man can imagine the peers thought it our judging them. A gentleman born petitioned to be discharged his employment, but could not obtain it: the inconvenience and burthen is now ten years parliament, but that must not be a pretence for absence; but when you come to a division of eightcore, rarely 300, this shews the world that you take it to be your interest to have a full house; and this will carry on the weighty affairs of the kingdom, which are not frivolous, and so the lords can take no exceptions at your preamble.

Sir T. Clifford would have the debate kept to one point. He agrees that the honour of the nation is a full house; see whether this way be a proper way. This way will intimate you have no other way. Can you punish them no other way but to go to the lords for it? Suppose the commons had a vote in the lords punishment; you pretend to have the sole power of punishing your members, and yet you will subject your opinion to the lords: every body for a full house: for a rod and terror, set a day a month hence, and if you are not satisfied in their excuse for their absence, send out new writs. In Edw. ii's time it was so. If you did resolve to punish them, would you do it by this bill? Bills of Supply never stick with the lords, usually not three days time, without conferences. Suppose they petition the lords, as supreme judicature of the nation, that 'such a mulct is put upon us, we desire you to strike us out, and let the bill be amended;' surely you would send him to the Tower that should do it. By this you do not let a man have the freedom of helping himself. As long as the other bills are not passed, you have the rod still, and may punish them by fines, or sending out new writs. If the lords should see you mix Judicature with Subsidy, what will the lords say, the preamble mentioning nothing of it? Here will you punish men that give to the king.

Mr. Garraway. You are told, it agrees not with the preamble of the bill, but thinks those gentlemen would still stay at home, though the French were landed at Dover; as for turning out of the house, so it be without reproach, thinks it an advantage, and would be out himself. The Lords have only their consent, as in other things. Some are half undone by being here, and should they be exempted, weigh it; is it a little thing that summons after summons has been given by the sheriff, and other ways, and they contemn your service?

Sir Rd. Temple. It never came before the commons, such names as should be fined, as is now intended in ours; but they returned their names to the exchequer. Thinks no member would submit Judicature to the lords: it is a mistake that the house cannot fine; they have fined persons 200*l.* and that levied; they have committed a person for printing a scandalous book, and fined him, and he stood committed after the session, until he has recanted his book, and submitted: if you send it to the lords, they will not pass it blindly, without examining things, to be assured of the fact; would have you fine them, and the monies to be distributed in the boroughs or counties they serve for.

Sir Tho. Meres. The great argument is the disadvantage we subject ourselves to. Distinguish the legislative capacity, and we can take nothing ill from the lords. All our proceedings are to the legislature. The greatest evil in the world is a thin house; the very noise of this Clause has sent people up.

Sir Rob. Howard. Not above 40 of 500 are wanting.

Mr. Vaughan. Whoever is elected, is in as great a trust as a man can be capable of; either by his absence he indulges his own private affairs, or neglects your service; and they deserve a mark not to be chosen for the future: they that absent themselves from your judgment, deserve to have your judgment passed upon them. As to those who say, the lords are judges in this case; was not lord Clarendon judged legislatively? The pecuniary punishment is but gentle, and if not inflicted, you may have yet an emptier house next session.

Sir Henry Herbert. Meres said, 'he was cold when the house was empty;' he may be too hot when it is full: doubts whether in punishing these members, we punish not ourselves: privileges of parliament are non so che, as the Italian says, neither described nor circumscribed. Whenever this Clause passes in this bill, you condemn people unheard; you expose your privilege to reference and examination of the lords; and suppose the lords refuse this clause? Offers an expedient—all of a mind to punish nocent persons: from 1621, has observed that this power has not been thus exercised: would have the members sent for in custody.

Mr. Henry Coventry. Generally people say it is of the sharpest: you have been well offered for a Bill to be brought in: it was your fault in not committing your members formerly to the Tower, and fining them. What great charge do gentlemen come at here, by being chosen knights of the shire? Shall not a gentleman go home, and look after his estate, now lands are thrown up? If your rigour be so great, and your session so long, you will have none but such as have nothing else to do: unless you build your house bigger, it will not hold us. Would have enquiry into your members that have not been here for two or three years together. There are many now that miss you but a week, upon some extraordinary occasion; will you make them equal with those that contemn you?

Mr. Waller. Consider what good you have by it; you have had the best effects already in a full house; some afterwards will be gone, and those fined will not come up. If you go to the lords, you do in effect acknowledge you cannot punish without the lords. If we say we cannot punish, do we not invite other courts to do it? For offences must be punished somewhere. He has seen 40 in a morning turned out. Seldon said we could not do it without the lords, and we have had ill consequences of it: would have them sent for, and called to the bar, or sent to the Tower, or what we shall judge fit.

Sir Edward Dering would have the blanks filled up, before the question be put, to make it part of the bill.

Sir John Duncombe. You will punish six, and excuse 250; what justice is there in this? You will put them upon appeals to the lords, and they will have justice there: do you want power to punish, when you can send them to the Tower, and fine them?—The Clause was then rejected, 115 to 98.

Lord Lucas's celebrated Speech on the Subsidy Bill.] Feb. 22. On the second reading of the Subsidy Bill in the house of lords,

The Lord Lucas,* made the following noble speech, his majesty being present:

"My Lords; When, by the providence of Almighty God, this nation recalled his majesty to the exercise of the regal power, it was the hope of all good men, that we should not only be restored to his majesty's royal presence, and the divine laws, but that we should be free from those heavy burthens under which we had lain so long oppressed; we did believe that from thenceforth every man should sit under his own vine, enjoying the fruits of peace and plenty; and that Astrea herself, long since for the sins of men fled up to Heaven, should have been invited, by his majesty's most gracious and happy reign, to return hither and dwell with us, and converse amongst mortals again.

—But alas, we are all fallen very short of our expectations, and our burthens are so far from being made lighter to us, that they are heavier than ever they were; and as our burthens are increased, so our strength is also diminished, and we are less able to support them.—In the times of the late usurping powers, although great Taxes were exacted from us, we had then means to pay them, we could sell our lands our corn and cattle, and there was plenty of money throughout the nation; now there is nothing of this; brick is required of us, and no straw allowed to make it with. For that our lands are thrown up, and corn and cattle are of little value, is notorious to all the world.—And it is as evident there is a scarcity of Money; for all that money called 'Breeches' (as fit for the coin of the Rump) is wholly vanished; the king's Proclamation and the Dutch have swept it all away; and of his now majesty's Coin, there appears but very little; so that, in effect, we have none left for common use, but a little, old, lean, coined money of the three former princes; and what supply is preparing for it, my lords? I hear of none, unless it be of Copper Farthings*†; and this is the metal that is to vindicate; according to the Inscription on it, 'the Dominion of the four Seas.†' And yet, if amidst this scarcity, the vast sums given were all employed for the king and kingdom, it would not so much trouble us; but we cannot, without infinite regret of heart, see so great a part of it pounded up in the purses of other private men; and see them flourish in estates, who, in the time of his majesty's most happy Restoration, were worth very little or nothing: and now the same men purchase lands, and keep their coach and six horses, their pages and their lacqueys; while, in the mean time, those that have faithfully served the king are exposed to penury and want, and have scarce sufficient left to buy them bread.

—And is this, my lords, the reward of our services? Have we for this borne the heat of the day, been imprisoned, sequestered, and ventured our lives and our families, our estates and our fortunes? And must we, after all this, sacrifice so much of our poor remainder to the will of a few particular men, and the maintenance of their vanities?—But suppose all the money given were employed for the use of his majesty, and his majesty were not cozened (as without doubt he is) is there no bounds to, or moderation in giving? Will you say, that if we shall not plentifully supply his majesty, he will not be able to defend us, or maintain the Triple League? And we shall thereby run the hazard of being conquered.—It is true, my lords, that this may be a reason for giving

* "This Speech was burnt by the hangman," says an Address to the Reader "to the great grief and astonishment of all true Englishmen, to whom my lord Lucas's loyalty to his prince, and inviolable love to his country was abundantly manifested."—Mr. Marvell in his Letters writes thus: 'Dear Will; I think I have not told you, that on our Bill of Subsidy, the lord Lucas made a fervent, bold speech against our prodigality in giving, and the weak looseness of the government, the king being present. Copies going about every where, one of them was brought into the lord's house, and lord Lucas was asked whether it was his: he said, 'part was,' and 'part was not.' Thereupon they took advantage, and said it was a libel even against Lucas himself. On this they voted it a libel, and to be burned by the hangman, which was done; but the sport was, the hangman burned the lords Order with it."

something; but it is so far from being an argument for giving so much, that it may be clearly made out to your lordships, that it is the direct and ready way to be conquered by a foreigner. And it may be the policy of the French king, by those often alarms of armies and fleets, to induce us to consume our treasure in vain preparations against him: and after he has by this means made us poor and weak enough, he may then come upon us and destroy us.—It is not, my lords, the giving of a great deal, but the well managing of the money given, that must keep us safe from our enemies; your lordships may be pleased to call to mind the story of Sampson; while he preserved his hair, wherein his strength lay, he was still victor over his enemies; but when, by the enticement of his Dalilah, his hair was cut off, the Philistines came upon him, and overcame him: and so, my lords, if we shall preserve and husband well our treasure, wherein our strength and the sinews of war lie, and apply it to the right uses, we shall still be superior to all our enemies; but if we shall vainly and imprudently mispend it, we shall become an easy prey to them.—Besides, my lords, what is this but no moriari mori, and for fear of being conquered by a foreigner, put ourselves in a condition almost as bad; pardon me, my lords, if I say in some respects a great deal worse; for when we are under the power of the victor, we know we can fall no lower; and the certainties of our miseries are some kind of diminution of them: but in this wild way we have no certainty at all; for if you give thus much to-day, you may give as much more to-morrow, and never leave giving till we have given all that ever we have away; and the anxiety of mind which arises from this doubtful estate is an high addition to our afflictions.—All that I beg, my lords, is, that we may be able to make some estimate of ourselves: would his majesty be pleased to have a quarter of our estates? For my part, he shall have it: would his maj. be pleased to have half? for my part, upon a good occasion, he shall have it: but, I beseech your lordships, then, that we may have some assurance of the quiet enjoyment of the remainder, and know what we have to trust to.—My lords, the commons have here sent us up a Bill for giving his majesty the 20th part of our Estates, at the full extended value; and I hear there are other bills for Money also preparing; which together, according to the best computation, will amount to little less than 3 millions of money; a prodigious sum, and such, that if your lordships shall not afford relief, we must of necessity sink under the weight of so heavy a pressure.—My lords, the Scriptures tells us, that God Almighty sets bounds unto the Ocean, and says unto it, 'Hither shall thy proud waves come, and no farther.' And so I hope your lordships, in imitation of the divinity, will set some bounds, some limits, to this overliberal humour of the commons, and say to them, 'Hither shall your profuseness come, and no farther.'—My lords, either your lordships can deny, or moderate a bill for Money coming from the commons; and if you cannot, all your great estates are wholly at their disposal, and your lordships have nothing that you can properly call your own, and then let us pass this Bill without farther examination; but if you can deny or moderate (as without question you can) your lordships never had, nor possibly will have such a fair occasion to shew it.—My lords, upon the whole matter, I must humbly propose to your lordships, that your lordships will be pleased to reduce the 12d in the pound to 8d.: and truly, my lords, I have reason to hope, that if your lordships will truly reflect upon it, ye will find it do accordingly; for in the first place, it will be so far from being a disservice to his majesty, that your lordships will do his maj. in it the highest service in the world; for although ye shall thereby take from his majesty a part of the sum, you will give him a great deal more in the love and hearts of his subjects; and there his majesty must reign, if he will be great and glorious.—And next, your lordships will acquire to yourselves eternal honour; ye shall thereby endear yourselves to the whole nation, who for the future will look upon you as the Antients did upon their Tutelar Gods; nor shall the House of Commons, but the House of Peers, be hereafter precious in their sight.—My lords, give me leave to mind your lordships, that noble acts are the steps whereby the great men of the world ascend to the Throne of Glory; and can there be a nobler act than to release a distressed kingdom, which lies languishing under so many hard oppressions, and about to be so much more oppressed? I detain your lordships too long, and therefore shall say no more; but must beg your lordships pardon, and submit all to your better judgments."

About this time, the king sent a Message to the commons to acquaint them, "That his majesty was informed, that there had some Bills passed both houses, and that there were others depending upon their dispatch, which he desired them to hasten, especially those for his Supply: and lest they should not be ready for his assent by the 22d of this instant Feb. he had given order for the adjourning of the session until the 10th of March next."

Petition of both Houses against the Growth of Popery.] March 10. But notwithstanding this Message, the commons proceeded to other matters as well as the supplies, and in particular drew up the following remarkable Petition against Popery, in which the lords afterwards joined:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; We your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in this present parliament assembled, being sensible of your majesty's constancy to the Protestant Religion both at home and abroad, hold ourselves bound in conscience and duty to represent to your most sacred maj. the Causes of the dangerous Growth of Popery in these your majesty's dominions, the ill consequences whereof we heartily desire may be prevented; and therefore what we humbly conceive to be some present Remedies for the said growing mischiefs, we have hereunto added, in our most humble Petitions."

"Causes of the Growth of Popery :

"1. That there are great numbers of Priests and Jesuits frequenting the cities of London and Westminster, and most of the counties of this kingdom, more than formerly, seducing your majesty's good subjects. 2. That there are several chapels and places used for saying of mass, in the great towns and many other parts of this kingdom, besides those in ambassadors houses, whither great numbers of your majesty's subjects constantly resort and repair without controul, and especially in the cities of London and Westminster, contrary to the established laws. 3. That there are Fraternities or Convents of English Popish Priests and Jesuits, at St. James's, and at the Combe in Herefordshire, and others in other parts of the kingdom; besides, several schools are kept in divers parts of this kingdom, for the corrupt educating of youth in the principles of popery. 4. The common and public selling of Popish Catechisms, and other seditious Popish Books, even in the time of parliament. 5. The general remissness of the magistrates, and other officers, or clerks of assize and clerks of the peace, in not convicting of Papiests according to law. 6. That suspected Recusants are free from all offices chargeable and troublesome; and do enjoy the advantages of offices and places beneficial, executed either by themselves, or by persons intrusted for them. 7. That the Adowsons of churches and presentations to livings are disposed of by Popish recusants, or by others intrusted by them, as they direct, whereby most of those livings and benefices are filled with scandalous and unfit ministers. 8. That many persons take the liberty to send their children beyond the seas, to be educated in the Popish religion; and that several young persons are sent beyond seas, upon the notion of their better education, under tutors or guardians, who are not put to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and usually corrupt the youths under their tuition into popery. 9. That there have been few Exchequer process issued forth since the Act of Oblivion against the Popish Recusants convict, though many have been certified thither. 10. The great insolencies of the Papiests in Ireland, where do publicly appear archbishops and bishops, reputed to be made such by the Pope, in opposition unto those made under your majesty's authority, according to the religion established in England and Ireland; and the open exercise of mass in Dublin, and other parts of that kingdom, is a further great Cause of the present Growth of Popery; and that Peter Talbot, the reputed abp. of Dublin, was publicly consecrated so at Antwerp with great and public solemnity, from whence he came to London, where he exercised his function, and was all along his journey to Chester treated with the character of his grace, by the Popish Recusants whom he visited; and at his landing in Dublin, he was received with very great solemnity by those of the Popish Religion there; where also he exercised his function publicly, great multitudes then flocking to him, and still continues to do the same. His present residence is within three miles of Dublin, at his brother's col. Rd. Talbot, who is now here, soliciting your maj. as public agent on the behalf of the Irish Papiests of that kingdom.

We, the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in this present parliament assembled, do in all homility represent to your sacred majesty in these Petitions following. 1. That your majesty, by your Proclamation, would be most graciously pleased to command, That all popish priests and jesuits do depart this realm, and all other your majesty's dominions, on or before a short day to be prefixed, at their perils (excepting only such foreign priests as attend her majesty's person by the contract of marriage, and ambassadors according to the law of nations); and that all judges and justices of the peace, and all other ministers and officers of justice, do cause the laws now in force against popish recusants to be put in due execution, and, in the first place, for the speedy conviction of such popish recusants; and that all judges and justices aforesaid do strictly give the said laws in charge unto the juries, at all assizes and sessions, under the penalty of incurring your majesty's highest displeasure. 2. That you would be graciously pleased to restrain and hinder the great course of your native subjects, from hearing of mass, and other exercises of the Romish religion, in the houses of foreign ambassadors or agents, and in all other chapels and places of this kingdom. 3. That your maj. would be most graciously pleased, out of your most princely wisdom and pious consideration, to take care, and cause, that no office or employment of public authority, trust, or command, in civil or military affairs, be committed to, or continued in the hands of any person being a popish recusant, or justly suspected to be so. 4. That your maj. would be graciously pleased to take notice of all fraternities and convents of English and other popish priests, jesuits, and friars, and schools for the educating of youth in the principles of popery, erected within your majesty's dominions; and to cause the same to be abolished, and the said priests, jesuits, friars and schoolmasters, to be duly punished for such their insolencies. 5. That your maj. would be graciously pleased, from time to time, to require and cause, that all the officers of or relating to the exchequer, according to their several duties, do proceed in, and issue forth, the exchequer process effectually upon popish recusants convict, certified thither; and that every such officer as shall refuse or neglect to do his duty as aforesaid, be severely punished for such his failure. 6. That your maj. would be graciously pleased to give order for apprehending, and bringing over into England, one Plunkett, who goes under the name of primate of Ireland, and one Peter Talbott, who takes on him the name of abp. of Dublin; to answer such matters as shall be objected against them. To these our most humble Petitions, proceeding from our duty and zeal for the glory of God, and good care of your sacred majesty, and from the care incumbent on us for the safety and peace of these your majesty's kingdoms; we do in all humility beseech your maj. to vouchsafe a gracious Answer. And we, your majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, shall ever pray for your long and happy reign over us; and, as in conscience we are obliged, shall constantly adhere to, and assist your majesty, in the maintenance and defence of your majesty's Supremacy, and the true Protestant religion now established in your majesty's dominions, in opposition to all foreign powers and popish pretensions whatsoever."

The King's Answer to the above Petition.] To the above Petition his majesty made this most gracious Answer to them; "My Lords and gentlemen; I will take care of all these things; I will cause a Proclamation to be issued out against the Priests; I will cause the judges, and all other officers to put the laws against Papists in execution, and all other things that may conduce to the Prevention of the Growth of Popery. But I suppose no man will wonder, if I make a difference between those that have newly changed their Religion and those that were bred up in that religion, and served my father and me faithfully in the late wars."

The King's Proclamation against Papists.] The houses returned their Thanks for this Answer, and the king accordingly issued out his Proclamation; the substance of which was, "Whereas the lords and commons in parliament assembled, have by their Petition presented to his majesty their fears and apprehensions of the Growth of Popery, together with the Causes thereof, and also such Remedies as they conceive most proper to prevent such mischiefs: which Petition his majesty having seriously considered, and with much contentment approving the great care of the said lords and commons, for the preservation of the true Religion established; to which his majesty declares, as he hath always adhered against all temptations whatsoever, so he will still employ his utmost care and zeal in the maintenance and defence of it. And therefore strictly commands all jesuits and Romish priests to depart out of England before the 1st of May, upon pain of having the penalties of the laws of this realm inflicted upon them. And his majesty commands all judges, &c. forthwith to put the laws in execution against all Popish Recusants, and such as are suspected to be so, in order to their speedy conviction, and due process upon such conviction. And because there may be some priests imprisoned in this realm, unknown to his majesty; all sheriffs,

&c. are within 30 days to advertise some of the lords of the privy-council of their names, and for what cause they were committed, to the end orders may be given for their transportation."

After this, the commons proceeded with all vigour upon the king's Supplies, the Subsidy-Bill, the Excise-Bill, and the Law-Bill; to which three they afterwards added a fourth bill for Impositions on Foreign Commodities.

The great Controversy between the Lords and Commons concerning the Lords making Amendments to Money Bills.] Two Money-Bills remained to be passed, the one 'for Impositions on Proceedings at law,' and the other, for an 'Additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities:' which the merchants esteeming a Grievance, they petitioned the house of lords for relief, who thought their Reasons of such weight, that they demanded a Conference with the commons upon the case in dispute; and this being complied with, a committee from both houses were appointed. The earl of Anglesea was Speaker for the lords, and sir He-neage Finch, attorney-general, for the commons. The particulars of the Conference were as follows:

First Conference between the two Houses, on the Bill for Additional Impositions on Foreign Commodities.] April 17. The earl of Anglesea, and the rest of the lords that managed the Conference with the commons on Saturday last, concerning the Amendments in the bill, intituled, 'An additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities, and for the Encouragement of several Commodities and Manufactures of this kingdom,' reported the effect of the said conference: viz.

"He said, Mr. Attorney General was the first man who spake; and told their lordships, That the commons had desired this conference upon the subject-matter of the last conference, which was concerning the Act of Imposition, intituled, 'An additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities,' &c. He said, in the end of it, your lordships communicated the Form of an Address to his majesty, against the use of, and to discountenance those that do use, foreign manufactures in prejudice of our own; which they cheerfully concur in, and humbly thank your lordships for: they differ so much in the rest, that he fears this is the only thing they agree in; but hope for a good agreement in conclusion, the commons having done as much as they can, to narrow the differences.—He said, In several clauses, we had varied the rates, in sums, in the species, and in the time.—They desire nothing that is not the subject-matter may come into debate between us (that is, concerning the right of laying Impositions on the subject in general); the present question being concerning rates and impositions on merchandize only. And in this there is a fundamental right in the house of commons, both as to the matter and the measure, and the time, unalterable, and which they cannot part with. He told us, we have formerly agreed a Book of Rates without so much as seeing it, signed by the Speaker sir Harbottle Grimston, 12 Carolus ii. confirmed 13 of king Charles, which they sent not up, lest your Speaker might sign it too, whereas never Book of Rates was read in the lords house.—The title they have to the giving Aids, is the only poor thing the commons can value themselves upon to their prince. If there be any fault in this bill, it is that they mentioned any rates at all in particular. If they had sent up a Bill of six lines, referring to a Book of Rates, there could be no reason why your lordships should not have agreed to that, with the same difference to the h. of commons, as you did for the other. Book of Rates 12 Car. ii. We desire we may not dispute what is not the question. The Rates upon Goods and Merchandize is that before us. They sent it this way, to shew their duty to the king, and respects to the lords; and never supposed it would be made a handle of difference to obstruct the gift for ever, as if it were too great to get through.—Your lordships begin a new thing. We find ourselves possessed of it in all ages, and find not one grant of Tonnage and Poundage that is not barely the gift of the commons. They hope your lordships will not now go about to assume this; a right so fundamentally settled in the commons, that I cannot give a reason for it, for that would be a weakening of the commons right and privilege, which we can never depart from, being affirmatively possessed of it in all ages, and negatively as to the lords. But, out of respect to your lordships, we have called ourselves to account upon the Reasons of our proceedings in this Bill; and do find that nothing that we have done in it is against the interest of trade; but no syllable of the variations made by your lordships but is prejudicial to the balance of trade. Some intrusted therewith will present your lordships the Reasons we shall offer; and though the expressions should be somewhat harsh in the maintaining the Right and Privilege of the h. of commons, we desire all may be received with candour and patience, and you would give it a fair interpretation.

“The next that spoke was sir Robert Howard, for the particular Amendments. [Here follow the several Amendments.] He concluded by saying, “your lordships cannot believe we, in the same barque with your lordships, should desire storms: we give freely, to prevent them. We are commanded also to say, we should not pursue our own interest, if we did not labour for accommodation. We have done all we can, to invite the lords to a happy concurrence.”—Then sir Rd. Temple said, “I am commanded to back all with some observations on your lordships precedents: under favour to your precedents, I find at the same time you sent down for a Conference, March 13, 1580, which was reported in the house of commons, and they justified it by the Entry; the issue was, you did proceed on the new bill. The second precedent, 29th Eliz. It was in a private bill, which we have no entry of. I shall now observe, in the year 1660, Dec. 6, ‘An Act against planting Tobacco in England,’ an office and fees was erected in it: we laid it aside, and sent a new one, which the lords passed. It hath been observed to your lordships, the irregularity of sending us down a Bill for Prohibition turned into a Bill for an Imposition; trenching hereby on the right of the h. of commons, in beginning an imposition. The substance is the same in both, we differ only in the way; so that we hope you will agree. Mr. Attorney concluded: ‘My lords; Aids were never more necessary; and this is no common present, a grant for nine years, and cannot miscarry but upon difference between the two houses. We desire that in no place, upon no occasion they may be made wider. There are two differences upon it: 1. Difference in judgment and opinion; we hope we have satisfied you therein fully. 2. In interest and privilege: this is in a narrow compass, we stand upon this; rates on merchandize you never did impose, never diminish. Books of rates have been kept from you, lest you should enquire into them. Nothing so dangerous as differences, nothing so unparliamentary. My lords, pray let nothing be done unparliamentary.’—Upon the report of this Conference and consideration had thereupon: It was resolved, upon the question, by the lords, nem. con. “That the power exercised by the house of peers, in making Amendments and Abatements in the Bill, entitled, ‘An act for an additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities, &c.’ both as to the matter, measure, and time, concerning the Rates and Impositions on Merchandize, is a fundamental, inherent, and undoubted right of the house of peers, from which they cannot depart.”

Second Conference.] April 19. This second conference was desired by their lordships upon the subject-matter of the last Conference, concerning the Bill for Impositions on Merchandize, &c. wherein the commons communicated to the lords, as their Resolution, “That there is a fundamental right in that house alone, in Bills of Rates and Impositions on Merchandize, as to the matter, the measure, and time.” And though their lordships had neither Reason nor Precedent offered by the commons to back that resolution, but were told ‘That this was a right so fundamentally settled in the commons, that they could not give Reasons for it, for that would be a weakening of the commons right and privilege;’ yet the lords in parliament, upon full consideration thereof, and of that whole conference, are come to this Resolution, nem. con.: “That the power exercised by the house of peers, in making the Amendments and Abatements in the Bill, entitled, ‘An Act for an additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities, &c.’ both as to the matter, measure, and time, concerning the Rates and Impositions on Merchandize, is a fundamental, inherent, and undoubted right of the house of peers, from which they cannot depart:”

Reasons of the Peers.

1. “The great happiness of the govt. of this kingdom is, that nothing can be done in order to the legislature, but what is considered by both houses before the king's sanction be given unto it; and the greatest security to all the subjects of this kingdom is, that the houses, by their constitution, do not only give assistance, but are mutual checks, to each other. 2. Consult the writs of summons to parliament; and you will find the lords are excluded from none of the great and arduous affairs of the kingdom and church of England, but are called to treat and give their counsel upon them all without exception. 3. We find no footsteps in record or history for this new claim of the house of commons; we would see that charter or contract produced, by which the lords divested themselves of this right, and appropriated it to the commons, with an exclusion of themselves: till then we cannot consent to shake or remove foundations, in the laying whereof it will not be denied that the lords and grands of the kingdom had the greatest hand. 4. If this right should be denied, the lords have not a negative voice allowed them in bills of this nature; for if the lords, who have the power of treating, advising, giving counsel, and applying remedies, cannot amend, abate, or refuse a bill in part, by what consequence of reason can they enjoy a liberty to reject the whole? When the commons shall think fit to question it, they may pretend the same grounds for it. 5. In any case of judicature, which is undoubtedly and indisputably the peculiar right and privilege of the house of lords, if their lordships send down a bill to the commons for giving judgment in a legislative way, they allow and acknowledge the same right in the commons to amend, change, and alter such bills, as the lords have exercised in this Bill of Impositions sent up by the commons. 6. By this new maxim of the house of commons, a hard and ignoble choice is left to the lords, either to refuse the crown supplies when they are most necessary, or to consent to ways and proportions of aid, which neither their own judgment or interest, nor the good of the government and people, can admit. 7. If positive assertion can introduce a right, what security have the lords, that the house of commons shall not in other bills (pretended to be for the general good of the commons, whereof they will conceive themselves the fittest judges) claim the same peculiar privileges in exclusion of any deliberation or alteration of the lords, when they shall judge it necessary or expedient. 8. And whereas you say, ‘This is the only poor thing which you can value yourselves upon to the king!’ their lordships have commanded us to tell you, that they rather desire to increase, than any ways to diminish, the value and esteem of the house of commons, not only with his majesty, but with the whole kingdom; but they cannot give way that it should be raised by the undervaluing of the house of peers, and an endeavour to render that house useless to the king and kingdom, by denying unto it those just powers which the constitution of this government and the law of the land hath lodged in it, for the service and benefit of both. 9. You did at the conference tell us, ‘That we did agree a Book of Rates, without so much as seeing it; and that never Book of Rates was read in the lords house; and that the said Book of Rates was signed by sir Harbottle Grimston, then Speaker of the house of commons, and not sent up, lest the lords' Speaker might sign it too.’ The Book of Rates instanced in by the house of commons was made in a way different from all former books of rates, and by an assembly called without the king's writs, and which wanted so much the authority of parliament, that the act they made was no act till confirmed by this parliament: Though the work which happily succeeded in their hands, for restoration of the ancient government of the kingdom, will ever be mentioned to their honour, yet no measure for parliamentary proceedings is to be taken from this one instance, to the prejudice of the right of the crown in making Books of Rates, and of the lords in having their due consideration thereof when they shall be enacted in parliament: which was so far from being according to former usage, that the lords considering the necessity and condition of that time, and there being no complaint, passed that Bill upon three readings in one day, without so much as a commitment, little imagining the forwardness of their zeal to the king's service in such a time would have created an argument in the future against their power; and if the lords never did read books of rates in their house, it is as true that the house of commons do not pretend, nor did shew, ever any was read there but this.”

Next, the precedents were reported: thus,

“Though, where a Right is so clear, and Reasons so irrefragable, it is not to be required of those who are possessed of the right, to give Precedents to confirm it, but those who dispute the right ought to shew precedents or judgments to the contrary (not passed sub silentio, but) upon the point controverted; yet the lords have commanded us to offer and leave with you these following Precedents:—“By Records both ancient and modern it doth appear, 1. That the lords and commons have consulted together, and conferred one with another, upon the subject of Supply to the king, and of the manner how the same may be levied; as 14 E. iii. N. 5. ‘Apres grand trete & paroleance entre les grandz et les ditz chivaliers et autres des communes estans en dit parliament, est accordes et assentus par tous les grandz & communes, &c.’ That they grant to the king the ninth of corn and wool.—29 E. iii. N. 11. 51 E. iii. N. 18. certain lords there named, from time to time, to confer with the commons, for their better help in consulting for the raising of Money; and this sometimes by the king's command, as, 22 E. iii. N. 3; sometimes by motion and appointment of the lords, as 5 E. iii. N. 8. and in the case of the great Contract for Tenures and Purveyances, 7 Jac. 14 Feb. 1609; sometimes by the desire of the commons; as, 47 E. iii. N. 6. and 4 R. ii. N. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, upon a great sum demanded for the king, the commons come to the lords, and desire a moderation of the sum, and their consideration how it should be levied; and hereupon was granted, by lords and commons, 12*d.* of every man, &c. It is observable that N. 13, it is said, The lords sent for the commons several times before them, and proposed to them the manner of levying the money; and afterwards it was given.' And again 6 R. ii. N. 14. And in the case of the great Contract before mentioned, 7 Jac. 18 June, 1610, the commons, at a conference, desire to know what project their lordships will propound for levying that which shall be given, other than upon land. And afterwards, at another conference, by the commons, answer was made to the lords proposal; agreed, that the manner of levying it may be in the most easeful and contentful sort that by both houses can be devised. See the whole proceedings of this intended contract, which doth in several remarkable instances shew that the house of commons themselves did allow the house of peers their part in treating and debating on the subject of Money to be levied for his majesty.—2. That, in Aids and Subsidies, the lords have anciently been expressly joined with the commons in the gift; as in the first we can meet with in our statutes, that in the body of Magna Charta, cap. 37, 'The archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, knights, freeholders, and other our subjects, have given unto us the 15th part of all their moveables,' (which must include Merchandizes). This stile the ancient grants of Subsidies and the modern ones too do retain (the troublesome time of the wars between the houses of York and Lancaster only excepted, and even then it was, 'The commons, by advice and assent of the lords, do give and grant' till the beginning of king Charles 1st. By the words, 'We your majesty's loyal subjects in parliament assembled,' implicitly; or by the words, 'We the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in parliament assembled,' expressly; the lords are joined in the grant, as by perusal of the statutes will appear.—3. That, in Subsidies of this nature, viz. Customs, the lords have joined with the commons in the grant of them; and that at the very beginning of these Impositions, as when 40*s.* on every sack of wool (a home native commodity) was granted to E. 1st. in the 3d of his reign, to him and his heirs, the grant is, 'Magnates prelati, & tota communitas concesserunt.' See Parl. Roll. 3 E. i. M. 1. N. 1. And other ancient rolls do also shew that the lords joined with the commons in the gift of Monies; as, Close Roll, 3. E. i. M. 12. in Dorso 3. Grant of a 15th, and Pat. Roll. 3 E. i. M. 6.—4. And more particularly in Impositions of this very species, tonnage and poundage, the lords were even at the first beginning joined with the commons in the grant, as the Parl. Roll in the 47 E. iii. N. 10. the first establishment of it by act doth declare, where it is expressly, 'The lords and commons do grant.' And this stile did continue in acts of this nature till the end of R. ii. After which, in those troublesome times, the stile was various till Hen. viii's time; and then the stile of acts of Tonnage and Poundage, was, 'We the commons, by advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, do give and grant.' This form of gift in Tonnage and Poundage lasted E. vi. Mary, Eliz. and king James's time, as the statutes themselves do declare.—5. And to prove most undeniably that the lords have their share in the Gift of Aids and Supplies to the king, see the act of 9 H. iv. commonly called, 'The Indemnity of the lords and commons,' which provides, 'That the lords shall commune apart by themselves, and the commons by themselves;' and at the latter end enacts expressly, 'That the king shall thank both the lords and commons for Subsidies given to him.'—6. That the lords may make Amendments and Alterations in Bills which grant Tonnage and Poundage (the very question now between us), appears in an eminent Book, case 33 H. vi. fol. 17. (which was a consultation of all the Judges of England, and the master of the rolls and clerk of the parliament, called to inform them of the manner of proceedings of bills in parliament), where it is said, 'That if the commons grant 'Tonnage and Poundage to endure for 4 years, and the lords grant it but for two years, it shall not be carried back to the commons, because it may stand with their grant, but must be so enrolled.' And that the lords have made Amendments and Alterations in bills granting Tonnage and Poundage, appears by the stat. of 1 E. vi. and 1 Eliz. even in the very point now in dispute, such Amendments as do lessen the sum to the king, as the 1st of Hen. viii. &c.—The Proviso itself was read at the Conference.

"We have seriously consulted our judgments and Reasons, to find objections, if it were possible, against this power of the lords; and are so far from finding any, that we are fixed in opinion that the want of it would be destructive to the government and peace of the kingdom, and the right of the crown, in the balancing and regulating of trade, and the making and preserving leagues and treaties with foreign princes and states; and the exercise of it cannot but be for the security of all, and for the ease, benefit, and satisfaction of the subject.—Their lordships are very far from desiring to obstruct this gift, no not for a moment of time, much less for ever, as was hinted to them at the last conference: and therefore they desire the house of commons to lay it to heart, and consider, if it should so happen (which they heartily wish it may not) that there should be an obstruction upon occasion of this difference, at whose door it must lie; those that assume to themselves more than belongs to them, to the prejudice and diminution of the others right, or theirs that do only exercise that just and lawful power which by the very nature and constant practice of parliament is, and for many ages hath been, vested in both houses.—Their lordships had under their consideration and debate the desiring a free conference with your house, upon the Reasons of the Amendments in difference between the houses; but when they found that you had interwoven your general position with every Reason you had offered upon particulars, it seemed to them that your judgments were prepossessed; and they hold it vain and below the wisdom of parliament to reason or argue against fixed resolutions, and upon terms of impossibility to persuade; and have therefore applied themselves only to that point which yet remains an impediment in the way of free and parliamentary debates and conferences, which must necessarily be first removed, that so we may come to a free conference upon the Bill itself, and part with a fair correspondence between the two houses.”

[Third Conference.] April 22. The earl of Anglesey began the Report of this Conference; who said, That Mr. Attorney (sir Heneage Finch), told them, That, because the matter is of moment, the h. of commons have trusted none to give their words but themselves; therefore have ordered it to be in writing, as followeth: “The commons have desired this Conference, to preserve a good correspondence with the h. of peers, and to prevent the ill consequences of those misunderstandings which may possibly interrupt the happy conclusion of this session, and of all future parliaments too, if they be not very speedily removed: wherein the commons are not without hopes of giving your lordships full satisfaction in the point in question, and that without shaking any foundations, unless it be such as no man should lay, much less build upon, the foundations of a perpetual dissention between the two houses. Three things did surprize the commons at the former conference concerning the Bill for an additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities: 1. That where they expected a discourse upon some Amendments to that bill, they met with nothing but a debate of the liberties of their house, in the matter, measure, and time, of rates upon merchandize, with a kind of a demand, that these liberties might be delivered up to your lordships by our public acknowledgement before there should be any further discourse upon that bill. 2. That your lordships should declare so fixed and settled a Resolution in this point, before you had so much as heard what could be replied in defence of the commons. 3. That your lordships should be so easily induced to take this Resolution, if there be no other motives for it than those Precedents and Reasons which your lordships have been pleased to impart to us.—The commons confess, that the best rule for deciding questions of Right between the two houses, is the law, and usage of parliament; and that the best evidences of that usage and custom of parliament are, the most frequent and authentic Precedents: therefore the commons will first examine the Precedents your lordships seem to rely upon; then they will produce those by which their right is asserted; and in the last place, they will consider the Reasons upon which your lordships ground yourselves.—By the nature of the Precedents which your lordships produce, there is an evident departure from the question as the former conference left it. There the doubt was narrowed to this single point, Whether your lordships could retrench or abate any part of the Rates which the commons had granted upon merchandize? Here the precedents do go to a joint power of imposing and beginning of taxes, which is a point we have not yet heard your lordships pretend to, though this present difference prepares way for it: therefore, either these precedents prove too much, by proving a power of imposing; or they prove nothing at all, by not proving a power of lessening. And yet they do not prove a power of imposing neither; for those words ‘the lords and commons grant,’ must either be understood reddendo singula, singulis; that is, the lords grant for themselves, and the commons grant for the counties, cities, and boroughs, whom they represent; or else the word ‘grant’ must be understood only of the lords assent to what the commons grant, because the form of law requires, that both join in one bill to give it the force of a law.—This answers the statute of Magna Charta, c. 37, and those few instances wherein it is said, ‘The lords and commons grant;’ viz. the 47 E. iii. N. 10. 4 R. ii. N. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14. 6 R. ii. N. 14. But what answer can be given to those ancient and modern precedents and acts, where the grant moves, and is acknowledged to come from the commons alone; of which a multitude shall be hereinafter mentioned? The case of the 14 E. iii. N. 5, ‘Apres grand trete et parlarce ‘entre lez grantz et chevaliers et commons, ‘fuit assensus,’ &c. is no grant of the 9th sheaf, as your lordships cited it to be; but an agreement that the monies granted in a former parliament should now be sold, because the money came not in fast enough.—22 E. iii. N. 3, which your lordships cite to prove that the king did sometimes command the lords to consult with the commons about raising Money, proves little of that; but it proves expressly, that the commons granted 3 fifteenths; and as the grant runs wholly in their name, so the record is full of many reasons why they could grant no more, and upon what conditions they granted so much.—And yet all these records, wherein the lords advised with the commons about raising money, though they seem to make a shew in your lordships paper, yet they prove two things of great importance to the commons: 1. That all Aids must begin with the commons; else the lords needed not to have conferred about the aids, but might have sent down a bill. 2. That when they are begun, the lords can neither add nor diminish; else it was in vain to adjust the matter by private conference beforehand, if the lords could have reformed it afterwards; which shews how little service the records of 29 E. iii. N. 11, 31 E. iii. N. 18, can do your lordships in the present question.—From the time of R. ii. your lordships come to 7 Jac. to tell us of the Treaty between the lords and commons touching the Contract for Tenures in capite, wherein the lords and commons being to be purchasers, it was less subject to objection, to confer both of the method and manner how the price agreed might be paid for the satisfaction of the king: but this matter hath so little affinity with the present question of lessening Rates upon Merchandizes, given by the commons, that nothing but a scarcity of precedents could ever have persuaded your lordships to make use of this instance.—As for the precedent of 3 E. i, cited by your lordships, the commons have most reason to rely upon that case.—Your lordships say, in the beginning of impositions, when 40s. upon a sack of wool was granted to E. i. and his heirs, the lords joined in the grant; for the words are, ‘Magnates, prelati, et tota communitas concesserunt,’ wherein there are these mistakes: first, that record was not a grant of 40s. upon the sack of wool, as your lordships suppose, but a reducing of 40s. upon a sack, which E. i. took before Magna Charta was confirmed, to half a mark, viz. 6s. per sack; and it was at the prayer of the commons, as some books say, and cite for it 3 E. i. M. 24. Secondly, the record which your lordships cite is twice printed, once in the 2d part of the Institutes, p. 531, and again in the 4th part of the Institutes, p. 29; and by both those places it is evident that the ‘concesserunt’ is to be applied only to the ‘tota communitas,’ and not to the ‘Magnates;’ for this was a grant of the commons only, and not a grant of the lords; and, to demonstrate this beyond all possibility of scruple, the printed books do refer us to the Statute of 25 E. i. c. 7, called ‘Confirmationes Chartarum,’ wherein it is expressly so declared by act of parliament; for, by the last statute, it appears that the Maletot of 40s. upon a sack was again demanded by E. i. and was therefore now abrogated, saving to the king and his heirs the demi-mark upon a sack of wool granted by the commonalty, which is the very same grant of 3 E. i. cited by your lordships in the present question; but this is also a convincing evidence that those words ‘The lords and commons grant’ are words of form, and made use of in such cases where the grant did certainly proceed from the commons alone. And to clear this point yet more fully by a modern precedent, we pray your lordships to take notice of the statute of the 2d and 3d of Ed. vi. c. 36, where a relief is given to the king by parliament; and the title of the act, as also in the body of it, it is still called all along ‘The grant of the lords and commons;’ yet in 3 & 4 Ed. vi. c. 23, this former act is recited, and there it is acknowledged to be only a grant of the commons.—And as for the case of 9 H. iv. called ‘The Indemnity of the lords and commons,’ these things are evidently proved by it; 1. That it was a grievance to the commons, and a breach to their liberties, for the lords to demand a committee to confer with about aids. 2. That the lords ought to consider by themselves apart. 3. That no report should be made to the king of what the commons had granted, and the lords assented to, till the matter be perfected; so that a plain declaration is made, that the commons grant, and the lords assent. 4. That the gift ought to be presented by the Speaker of the commons. The Book Case of 33 H. vi. 17, is the weakest of all; for the words are, ‘Si les communes grant Tonage p’ 4 ann. and s’n’s grant mes pur deux ans, ceo ne sera reliver aux commoners; mes via versâ, si co’ones grant p’ 2 ans et s’n’s p’ 4. ceo sera reliver.’ Now, 1. This was no opinion of any judge, but only of Kirkby, cl. de parliament. 2. This was a case put by the bye, and not pertinent to the matter in hand. 3. It is impossible to be law, being against the constant practice and usage of parliament; for then your lordships may not only lessen the rates and time, but you may choose whether you will send us the bill or no back again, with amendment, which was never heard of; and if that may be, why was it not done so now? 4. That clerk says, your lordships may increase impositions too, which part of the case you thought not fit to cite, because you pretend not to it. 5. Brooke, parliament, 7, puts a query upon the case, as it deserved. But if the law books are to be heard in this matter, 30 H. viii. Dyer 43, is a judicial authority, where Subsidy is defined to be, a tax, ‘assess par parliament, et grant al roy par les co’ones durant vyde chesc. roy, tantum pour le defence des merchants sur le mere.’—The provisos in the bill of 1 H. viii. which your lordships seem mainly to rely upon, we conceive to be of no force at all, unless it be against your lordships; for, by your lordships Journals, the case was this: the Bill itself did not pass till the 3d of Hen. viii.; and upon the 43d day of parliament, the lords assented to it. Afterwards, upon the 45th day, two provisos came in touching the merchants of the Hans Towns, another touching the merchants of the Staple of Calais; both were signed by the king; and the chancellor and bp. of Winchester did declare that the signing of those provisos by the king’s own hand was enough, without the consent of either house; so that the addition of those provisos prove nothing for which your lordships cited them; because, 1. They were signed by the king: 2. They were brought in, against all course of parliament, after the bill passed:

3. The provisos were nothing but a saving of former rights, usually considered in former acts of that nature: 4. Your lordships Journal declares, that the king without these provisos, might have done the same thing by his prerogative. Only this may be fit to be observed by the way, that as the bill was a grant of the commons alone, so the thanks for that bill was given to the commons alone; and so appears upon the indorsement of that record. The Precedents for the commons, which on the sudden we find, for we have had but few hours to search, are all these following: 11 E. i. Walsingham 471, 'Populus dedit regi tricesimam partem bonorum.' 25 E. i. Walsingham 486, 'Populus dedit regi denarium novum.' 7 H. iv. Walsingham 566, 'postquam milites parlamentares diu distulissent, concedere regi subsidium in fine tamem fracti concessere.' 6 H. iv. Walsingham 564, 'Subsidium denegatum fuit proceribus remittentibus.' So hitherto when granted, the commons give it; when denied, the whole bill rejected, never abated. 1 E. iii. stat. 2, c. 6, The commons grieved, that when they granted an aid, and paid it, the taxes were reviewed. 18 E. iii. c. 1, stat. at large, The commons grant two fifteenths; the great men grant nothing, but to go in person with the king. 36 E. iii. c. 11, the king having regard to the grant made by the commons for three years of wool and leather, grants that no Aid be levied, but by consent of parliament. 21 R. ii. N. 75, is the first grant of Tonnage and Poundage for life; and it was given by the commons alone. 2 H. vi. N. 14, The commons grant tonnage and poundage for two years. 31 H. vi. N. 7, 8, 9, 10, The commons grant Tonnage, &c. for life. 8 E. iv. N. 30, The commons grant two tenths and two fifteenths. 12 E. iv. c. 3, The grant for Tonnage and Poundage for life is recited to be by the commons, and most of the rates mentioned in the bill. The wars of York and Lancaster are so from weakening these precedents, it strengthens them rather; for no man can think the lords were then in less power, or less careful of their rights, than your lordships are now; wherefore, if in those days those forms were approved by those mighty men, it is a sign the right is clear. 1 H. vii. The commons, by assent of the lords, grant Tonnage. 15 H. vii. In Ireland was the first grant of Tonnage and Poundage; but it is said, at the prayer of the commons it is enacted: which in a kingdom where they are not tied to forms, shews the clear right. 1 E. vi. c. 13, 1 M. c. 8, 1 Eliz. c. 19, 'We your poor commons by advice, &c. grant: And also avers the right, time out of mind, to be in the commons in like manner. This statute of the 1st of Eliz. c. 19, gives us occasion to put your lordships in mind of another precedent which appears in your own Journals; for, while this bill was passing, the inhabitants of Cheshire and Wales petition the lords, upon the second reading, That soasmuch as they were subject to pay the queen a certain duty called Mises, that therefore they might be excused of the subsidy, and abated their parts of it. The lords, who then knew they had no power to diminish any part of the Aid granted by the commons, did therefore address themselves to the queen in their behalfs. The queen commands an entry to be made in the Journal of the house of lords, That she was pleased that the Cheshire men and the Welch men should be respited the Mises when they pay subsidies, and respited the subsidies when they pay Mises; which is a strong proof, that as the commons alone grant, so nobody can diminish their grant; else what need had the lords to apply themselves to the queen for it? 17 Car. i. Tonnage and Poundage was granted once for a month, then again for three months; but still the grant was by the commons: in those days, how tumultuous soever, the commons did not rise against the lords: they agreed well enough. And the preamble of this very bill now in question. All grants of the commons; yet none of these bills were ever varied by your lordships or your predecessors; which, if there had been such a right, would some time or other have been exercised, though in very small values, purposely to preserve that right. Thus an uninterrupted possession of this Privilege ever since 9 H. iv. confirmed by a multitude of precedents both before and after, not shaken by one precedent for these 300 years, is now required to be delivered up, or an end put to all further discourse; in which opinion, if it be adhered to, is, as much as in your lordships lies, to put an end to all further transactions between the houses in matter of Money, which we pray your lordships to consider."

The Reasons offered by the House of Commons were these:—"Because it appears not to the commons, any colour from the Precedents cited by your lordships, why your opinions should be so fixed in this point. We suppose the main defence is in the Reasons that have been given for it. That Paper begins with an observation, 'That your lordships have neither Reason nor Precedent offered by the commons to back their Resolution;' and yet concludes with an Answer to a precedent then cited by the h. of commons, viz. the Act of Tonnage and Poundage now in force. And if your lordships heard, but one precedent then, you have now a great number, besides those of 3 Ed. i. and 1 H. viii. and 9 H. iv. and divers others your lordships furnished us with.—Before the commons answer to your lordships Reasons in particular, they desire to say, first, in general, That it is a very unsafe thing in any settled government, to argue the Reasons of the fundamental constitutions; for that can tend to nothing that is profitable for the whole. And this will more sensibly appear to your lordships, if the grounds and foundations of judicature be examined; for there are several precedents in the parliament, and some in Book Cases, which prove that the judicature is not to be exercised by all the lords, but only such as the king is pleased to appoint. So is the Book Case of 22. E. iii. 3. a. b. and so is the Parliament Roll, 25 E. iii. N. 4.—Several other Precedents, where the commons by the king's good pleasure have been let into a share of the very judicature, are 42 E. iii. N. 20, 21. 31 H. vi. N. 10, 8 E. iv. Hugh Brice's Case in the Rolls of parliament.—Some precedents there are, where it was assigned for error in the house of peers, 'That the lords gave judgment without Petition or Assent of the commons.' So is the 2 H. v. N. 13.—Would your lordships think it safe, that a dispute should now be made of the very rights of judicature, because we have such precedents? If usage for so long a time have silenced all disputes touching your lordships judicature, shall that usage be of no force to preserve the privileges of the commons from all further question? Also, there is a precedent of an act of parliament passed by the king and commons alone, without the lords, viz. 1 E. vi. C. 5, and that twice approved, viz. 1 Eliz. C. 7, and 5 Eliz. C. 19, which both allow and commend this act. Shall we therefore argue the foundations of the legislature, because we have such precedents?—But to come to particulars: Your lordships first Reason is, from the happiness of the constitution, That the two houses are mutual checks upon each other. Ans. So they are still: for your lordships have a negative to the whole. But, on the other side, it would be a double check upon his majesty's affairs, if the king may not rely upon the quantum, when once his people have given it; therefore the privilege now contended for by your lordships is not of use to the crown, but much the contrary. 2. Your lordships Reason, drawn from the Writ of Summons, is as little concluding; for, though the writ do not exclude you from any affairs, yet it is only 'de quibusdam arduis negotiis,' and must be understood of such as by course of parliament are proper, else the commons upon the like ground may entitle themselves to judicature; for they are also called to treat 'de quibusdam arduis.' 3. Your lordships proceed to demand, 'Where is that record or contract in parliament to be found, where the lords appropriate this right to the commons in exclusion of themselves?' Ans. To this rhetorical question the commons pray they may answer by another question; 'Where is that record or contract, by which the commons submitted that judicature should be appropriated to the lords in exclusion of themselves?' Wherever your lordships find the last record, they will shew the first endorsed upon the back of the same roll. Truth is, precedents there are where both sides do exercise these several rights, but none how either side came by them. 4. If the lords may deny the whole, why not a part? Else the commons may at last pretend against the lords negative voice. Ans. The king must deny the whole of every bill, or pass it; yet this takes not away his negative voice: the lords and commons must accept the whole general pardon, or deny it; yet this takes not away their negative. The clergy have a right to tax themselves, and it is a part of the privilege of their estate: doth the upper convocation house alter what the lower grant? or do the lords or commons ever abate any part of their gift? Yet they have a power to reject the whole. But, if abatement should be made, it would insensibly go to a raising, and deprive the clergy of their ancient right to tax themselves.—5. Your lordships say, 'Judicature is undoubtedly ours; yet in bills of judicature we allow the commons to amend and alter: why should not the commons allow to us the same privilege in bills of money?' Ans. If contracts were now to be made for privileges, the offer might seem fair: but yet the commons should profit little by it; for your lordships do now industriously avoid all bills of that nature, and choose to do many things by your own power, which ought to be done by the legislative; of which we forbear the instances, because your lordships, we hope, will reform them; and we desire not to create new differences, but to compose the old.—6. Your lordships say, You are put to an ignoble choice, either to refuse the king's Supplies when they are most necessary, or to consent to such ways and proportions which neither your own judgment nor good of the government or people can admit.—Ans. We pray your lordships to observe, That this reason, first, makes your lordships judgment to be the measure of the welfare of the commons of England. 2. It gives you power to raise and increase taxes, as well as to abate, for it may sometimes, in your lordships judgments, be for interest of trade to raise and increase a rate; and then still you are brought to the same ignoble choice, unless you may raise the tax.—But it is a very ignoble choice put upon the king and his people, That either his maj. must demand, and the commons give, so small an aid as can never be diminished, or else run the hazard of your lordships re-examination of the rates, whose proportions in all taxes, in comparison to what the commonalty pay, is very inconsiderable.—7. If positive assertions can introduce right, the lords have no security; but the commons may extend their rights, as they judge it necessary or expedient. Ans. We hope no assertions or denials, though never so positive, shall give or take away a right; but we rely upon usage of our side, and non-usage on your lordships part, as the best evidences by which your lordships or we can claim any privilege.—8. Your lordships profess a desire to raise our esteem with his maj. and the whole kingdom, but not by the under-valuation of the house of peers. Ans. We have great confidence in his maj.'s goodness, that nothing can lessen his esteem of our dutiful affections to him; and we hope we have deserved so well of our country, by our deportment towards his majesty, that we shall not need your lordships recommendations to any who wish well to his maj. or the present government. But we are so far from wishing to raise an esteem by any diminution of your lordships honour or privileges, that there never was any house of commons who had a more just and true respect of that noble constitution of a house of peers; of which your lordships have had frequent instances, by our consenting to several clauses in Bills for securing and improving your lordships privileges.—We are sorry to see your lordships undervalue the precedent of this last Act of Tonnage and Poundage; because, though it were an act of the last Convention, it was confirmed in this. And because the right of the commons there asserted was pursuant to a former precedent in 1642, and possibly had not passed so, if the younger members of that Convention had not learned from some of these great and noble lords who now manage the conference for your lordships, and were then commoners, that this was the undoubted right of the commons.—To conclude: The commons have examined themselves and their proceedings, and find no cause why your lordships should put them in mind of that modesty by which their ancestors shewed a great deference to the wisdom of the lords; for they resolve ever to observe the modesty of their ancestors, and doubt not but your lordships will also follow the wisdom of yours."

To these the Lords proceeded to make some Replies: and, particularly, "as to their having no power to alter the Subsidies of the Clergy, nor an Act for a general Pardon; they said, these were things eccentric to parliaments, and had their motion in another sphere: the Convocation gave one, and the king of his free grace bestowed the other; and the parliament only gave them the force of law, and might chuse whether they would do it or not; and consequently this was no ways to the case in dispute. But to read the commons Money-Bill three times in their house, and to commit it, without any power of debating upon it, was a solemn piece of pageantry, beneath the dignity of a parliament. As to the point of Judicature, they alledged, it belonged to the peers before the very being of a house of commons, rather as the grand council of the nation, than as part of the parliament; and being vested in the king, as well as themselves, might possibly exist without the sitting of a parliament. As to Precedents they alledged, we have several for us; but it were enough for our justification, if there be none against us; and there could be but one of these kinds, either that we have of ourselves disclaimed such a power, or that it hath been denied them when they have claimed it, and whosoever sheweth one of either, 'Erit nobis inagnus Apollo.'"

The Speaker's Speech to the King, at the Prorogation.] April 22. But before a period could be put to this great Controversy, his majesty came to the house of peers in order to a prorogation. The commons being come, the Speaker addressed his maj. to this effect:

"That his majesty was pleased in Oct. last (when the parliament then met), to acquaint them how his Revenue was clogged with Debts; and that the commons, taking the same into consideration, resolved to supply his maj. accordingly; and that, on the 6th of March last, he presented his majesty, from the house of commons, with the Subsidy and Excise bills; and now, by their command, he presented his maj. with the bill for laying Impositions on Proceedings at Law: that he was commanded humbly to beseech his majesty, that the Revenue thereof might be effectually applied to the payment of his debts: and that he had further in command from them, to let his maj. know, That they had enlarged the time for the Impositions on Proceedings at Law to 9 years, that thereby his maj. might be the better enabled to satisfy his Debt owing to the prince of Orange; he begged his pardon, that he called it his Debt, it being contracted for Supplies afforded to his royal father and himself in their unhappy necessities, and therefore not to be forgotten. He said, that geographers write of some Islands called 'Insulæ Fortunatæ,' whose harvest is said to be in March and April; he hoped, that England might be accounted one of those Islands, having afforded his maj. such a crop in March last and this April, which he humbly besought his maj. to accept as a pledge of their dutiful affection to him."

The King's Speech.] After passing several Bills his majesty spake thus:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I give you very hearty thanks, for the Supply you have now given me.—His majesty also proceeded further to thank them for what they had further intended him; and assured them, "That what they had given him should be employed toward the payment of his Debts, and his expences for this year: that it was now time for them to go into their countries; and he desired them to take care that in the laying and collecting of the Subsidy they had given him, it might be improved to what they intended. He said further, That he intended the parliament should be prorogued, not to meet again for almost a year; but hoped that when they did meet, they would come again with the same affections to his service as formerly; and what he had further to say to them, they should understand by the Lord Keeper."

Then the Lord Keeper spake to this effect:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; His maj. hath told you with how great satisfaction he hath accepted your Supplies, as real testimonies of the constancy of your good affections." His lordship further told them, "That many of them being commissioners in the country for the new Subsidy; his maj. desired them to use their endeavours to make it effectual, and suitable to their intentions; and wished them to assure their neighbours, that he would employ the monies entirely towards the payment of his debts."—He then prorogued the parliament to the 16th of April next.*

* The state of the nation, at and about this time, is thus summed up by Marvell, in his

April 16, 1672. Both houses met on the day appointed. The commons, with the clerk of the house, went up to the house of lords, where the Lord Keeper declared his majesty's pleasure for the proroguing, and did prorogue the parliament to the 30th of Oct. next.

Oct. 30. Both houses met accordingly, when the Lord Keeper declared his majesty's pleasure for a further prorogation to the 4th of Feb. next.†

Principal Occurrences during the Recess—The Exchequer shut—Attack of the Smyrna Fleet—Dutch War.] “Long and frequent prorogations,” says Mr. Hume, “were made of the parliament; lest the houses should declare themselves with vigour against counsels, so opposite to the inclination as well as interests of the public. These long prorogations, if they freed the king from the importunate remonstrances of that assembly, were, however, attended with this inconvenience, that no Money could be procured to carry on the military preparations against Holland. Under pretence of maintaining the Triple League, which at that very time he had firmly resolved to break, Charles had obtained a large supply from the commons; but this money was soon exhausted by debts and expences. France had stipulated to pay 200,000*l.* a year during the war; but the supply was inconsiderable, compared to the immense charge of the English navy. It seemed as yet premature to venture on levying money, without consent of parliament; since the power of taxing themselves was the privilege, of which the English were, with reason, particularly jealous. Some other resource must be fallen on. The king had declared, that the staff of Treasurer was ready

Letters: “The court is at the highest pitch of want and luxury; and the house of commons are grown extremely chargeable to the king, and odious to the people, who are full of discontent.”

† They were to have met Oct. 30, but just before the time, when men's minds began to be filled with hopes or fears, a Proclamation came out for a further prorogation; of which the earl of Arlington gives the following account in a Letter to sir Bernard Gascoyn, then resident at Vienna: “The last week his majesty resolved in council on a further prorogation of the parliament to the 4th of Feb. next, by which a great measure of the Hollanders is broken, having fancied to themselves, that they should prevail with many of the members of it, to make them clamorous upon his majesty for a separate Treaty upon easy terms, and with exclusion to France; so that they seeing this trust broken, and finding no great ease to their present calamity from the auxiliary forces of Germany, we persuade ourselves we shall find them very reasonable in a short time; and in Feb. his majesty bringing into parliament a determinate resolution either of peace or war, will much more easily obtain all the ends there.”

for any one that could find an expedient for supplying the present necessities. Shaftesbury dropped a hint to Clifford, which the latter immediately seized, and carried to the king, who granted him the promised reward, together with a peerage. This expedient was the shutting up of the Exchequer (2d Jan.), and the retaining of all the payments which should be made into it.—It had been usual for the bankers to carry their money to the Exchequer, and to advance it upon security of the funds, by which they were afterwards reimbursed, when the money was levied on the public. The bankers, by this traffic, got 8, sometimes 10, per cent. for sums which either had been consigned to them without interest, or which they had borrowed at six per cent.: profits, which they dearly paid for by this egregious breach of public faith. The measure was so suddenly taken, that none had warning of the danger. A general confusion prevailed in the city, followed by the ruin of many. The bankers stopped payment; the merchants could answer no bills; distrust took place every where, with a stagnation of commerce, by which the public was universally affected. And men full of dismal apprehensions, asked each other, what must be the scope of those mysterious counsels, whence the parliament and all men of honour were excluded, and which commenced by the forfeiture of public credit, and an open violation of the most solemn engagements, both foreign and domestic. Another measure of the court contains something laudable, when considered in itself; but if we reflect on the motive whence it proceeded, as well as the time when it was embraced, it will furnish a strong proof of the arbitrary and dangerous counsels pursued at that time by the king and his ministry. Charles resolved to make use of his supreme power in ecclesiastical matters; a power, he said, which was not only inherent in him, but which had been recognized by several acts of parliament. By virtue of this authority, he issued a Proclamation; suspending the penal laws enacted against all non-conformists or recusants whatsoever: and granting to the protestant dissenters the public exercise of their religion, to the catholics the exercise of it in private houses. A fruitless experiment of this kind, opposed by the parliament, and retracted by the king, had already been made a few years after the Restoration; but Charles expected, that the parliament, when ever it should meet, would now be tamed to greater submission, and would no longer dare to control his measures. Meanwhile, the dissenters, the most inveterate enemies of the court, were mollified by these indulgent maxims: and the catholics, under their shelter, enjoyed more liberty than the laws had hitherto allowed them.—At the same time the Act of Navigation was suspended by royal will and pleasure: a measure, which though a stretch of prerogative, seemed useful to commerce, while all the seamen were employed on board the royal navy. A like suspension had been granted, during the first Dutch war, and was not much remarked; because men had, at that time, entertained less jealousy of the crown. A Proclamation was also issued, containing rigorous clauses in favour of pressing: another full of menaces against those who presumed to speak undutifully of his majesty's measures, and even against those who heard such discourse, unless they informed in due time against the offenders: another against importing or vending any sort of painted earthen ware, "except those of China, upon pain of being grievously fined, and suffering the utmost punishment which might be lawfully inflicted upon contemners of his majesty's royal authority." An army had been levied; and it was found, that discipline could not be enforced without the exercise of martial law, which was therefore established by order of council, though contrary to the petition of right. All these acts of power, how little important soever in themselves, savoured strongly of arbitrary government, and were no-wise suitable to that legal administration, which the parliament, after such violent convulsions and civil wars, had hoped to have established in the kingdom.—It may be worth remarking, that the lord-keeper refused to affix the great seal to the Declaration for suspending the Penal Laws; and was for that reason, though under other pretences, removed from his office. Shaftesbury was made chancellor in his place; and thus another member of the CABAL received the reward of his counsels.—Foreign transactions kept pace with these domestic occurrences. An attempt, before the declaration of war, was made on the Dutch Smyrna fleet by sir Robert Holmes. This fleet consisted of 70 sail, valued at a million and a half: and the hopes of seizing so rich a prey had been a great motive for engaging Charles in the present war, and he had considered that capture as a principal resource for supporting his military enterprises. Holmes, with nine frigates and three yachts, had orders to go on this command; and he passed Sprague in the channel, who was returning with a squadron from a cruise in the Mediterranean. Sprague informed him of the near approach of the Hollanders; and had not Holmes, from a desire of engrossing the honour and profit of the enterprize, kept the secret of his orders, the conjunction of these squadrons had rendered the success infallible. When Holmes approached the Dutch (March 13), he put on an amicable appearance, and invited the admiral, Van Ness, who commanded the convoy, to come on board of him: one of his captains gave a like insidious invitation to the rear-admiral. But these officers were on their guard. They had received an intimation of the hostile intentions of the English, and had already put all the ships of war and merchantmen in an excellent posture of defence. Three times were they valiantly assailed by the English; and as often did they valiantly defend themselves. In the third attack one of the Dutch ships of war was taken: and three or four of their most inconsiderable merchantmen fell into the enemies hands. The rest, fighting with skill and courage, continued their course; and, favoured by a mist, got safe into their own harbours. This attempt is denominated perfidious and piratical by the Dutch writers, and even by many of the English. It merits at least the appellation of irregular; and as it had been attended with bad success, it brought double shame upon the contrivers. The English ministry endeavoured to apologize for the action, by pretending that it was a casual rencontre, arising from the obstinacy of the Dutch, in refusing the honours of the flag: but the contrary was so well known, that even Holmes himself had not the assurance to persist in this asseveration.—Till this incident the States, notwithstanding all the menaces and preparations of the English, never believed them thoroughly in earnest; and had always expected that the affair would terminate, either in some demands of money, or in some proposals for the advancement of the prince of Orange. The French themselves had never much reckoned on assistance from England; and scarcely could believe that their ambitious projects would, contrary to every maxim of honour and policy, be forwarded by that power which was most interested, and most able to oppose them. But Charles was too far advanced to retreat. He immediately issued a Declaration of war against the Dutch (March 17); and surely reasons more false and frivolous never were employed to justify a flagrant violation of treaty. Some complaints are there made of injuries done to the East-India company, which yet that company disavowed: the detention of some English in Surinam is mentioned; though it appears that these persons had voluntarily remained there: the refusal of a Dutch fleet, on their own coasts, to strike to an English yacht, is much aggravated: and to piece up all these pretensions, some abusive pictures are mentioned, and represented as a ground of quarrel. The Dutch were long at a loss what to make of this article; till it was discovered, that a portrait of Cornelius de Wit, brother to the pensionary, painted by order of certain magistrates of Dort, and hung up in a chamber of the town-house, had given occasion to the complaint. In the perspective of this portrait, the painter had drawn some ships on fire in a harbour. This was construed to be Chatham, where de Wit had really distinguished himself, and had acquired honour; but little did he imagine, that, while the insult itself, committed in open war, had so long been forgiven, the picture of it should draw such severe vengeance upon his country. The conclusion of this manifesto, where the king still professed his resolution of adhering to the Triple Alliance, was of a piece with the rest of it.—There was no ally on whom the Dutch more relied for assistance than the parliament of England, which the king's necessities at last obliged him to assemble.⁷⁷

TENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

Sir Job Charleton chosen Speaker.] Feb. 4. 1672-3. This day both houses met, and sir Edw. Turner, the last Speaker of the house of commons, having been made lord chief-baron of the exchequer, the first thing they did was to choose a new Speaker; to this end, sir Job Charleton, serjeant at law, was recommended to them, and unanimously elected. Who, being presented to the king, made the following excuse:

"Most gracious sovereign, The knights, citizens, and burghesses of your house of commons, in obedience to your royal command, have proceeded to the choice of a Speaker. They have among them many worthy persons eminently qualified for so great a trust; yet, with too favourable an eye, have cast it upon me, who am really conscious to myself of many infirmities rendering me much unfit for so great an employment. And although my endeavours of excusing myself before them have not been successful, yet they have been so indulgent as to permit me to continue my endeavours therein before your majesty's most piercing and discerning judgment. The veneration due to your majesty, which lodgeth in every loyal breast, makes it not an easy matter to speak before your maj. at any time, or in any capacity. But to speak before your maj. in your exaltation, thus gloriously supported and attended, and that as Speaker of your house of commons, requires greater abilities than I can pretend to own. I am not also without fear that the public affairs, wherein your maj. and your kingdom in this juncture of time are so highly concerned, may receive detriment through my weakness. I therefore, with a plain humble heart, prostrate at your royal feet, beseech that you will command them to review what they have done, and to proceed to another election."

Then the Lord Chancellor, (Shaftsbury) by directions from his maj. returned this Answer:

"Mr. Serjeant Charleton, The king hath very attentively heard your discreet and handsome discourse, whereby you endeavour to excuse and disable yourself for the place of Speaker: In answer whereof, his majesty hath commanded me to say to you, that he doth in no sort admit of the same; for his majesty hath had long experience of your abilities, good affection, integrity, and resolution, in several employments of great trust and weight. He knows you have been long a parliament man, and therefore every way fitted and qualified for the employment. Besides, he cannot disapprove the election of this house of commons, especially when they have expressed so much duty in choosing one worthy and acceptable to him. And therefore the king doth allow of the election, and admits you for Speaker."

Whereupon Mr. Speaker made this Reply:

"Great Sir. Since it is your gracious pleasure, not to accept of my humble excuse, but by your royal approbation to fix me under this great though honourable weight, and to think me fit to be invested with a trust of so high a nature as this is; I take it, in the first place, to be incumbent upon me, that I render your maj. all possible thanks; which I now humbly do, with a heart full of all duty, and affected with a deeper sense of gratitude than I can find words to express. Next, from your royal determination in this affair, whereby you have imprinted a new character upon me, I take courage against my own diffidence, and cheerfully bend myself, with such strength and abilities as God shall give, to the service so graciously assigned me; no way doubting that your majesty will please to pardon my frailties, to accept of my faithful endeavours, and always to look favourably upon the work of your own hands. And now, sir, my first entrance upon this service obliges me to make a few necessary, but humble petitions, on behalf of your most loyal and dutiful house of commons: 1. That, for our better attendance on the public service, we and our servants may be free, in our persons and estates, from arrests and other disturbances. 2. That, in our debates, liberty and freedom of speech be allowed us. 3. That, as occasions shall require, your majesty, upon our humble suit, and at such times as your majesty shall judge seasonable, will vouchsafe us access to your royal person. 4. That all our proceedings may receive a favourable construction. That God who hath brought you back to the throne of your fathers, and with you all our comforts, grant you a long and prosperous reign, and send you victory over all your enemies; and every good man's heart will say, Amen."

Upon which, by his majesty's further direction, the Lord Chancellor said as followeth:

"Master Speaker, The king's maj. hath heard, and well weighed, your short and eloquent oration; and in the first place, much approves that you have with so much advantage introduced a shorter way of speaking upon this occasion. His maj. doth well accept of all those dutiful and affectionate expressions, in which you have delivered your submission to his royal pleasure; and looks upon it as a good omen to his affairs, and as an evidence that the house of commons have still the same heart, that have chosen such a mouth. The conjuncture of time, and the king and kingdom's affairs, require such a house of commons, such a Speaker; for, with reverence to the holy scripture, upon this occasion the king may say, 'He that is not with me, is against me;' for he that doth not now put his hand and heart to support the king in the common cause of this kingdom, can hardly ever hope for such another opportunity, or find a time to make satisfaction for the omission of this."

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] Then his majesty spake as followeth:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I am glad to see you here this day. I would have called you sooner together, but that I was willing to ease you and the country till there were an absolite necessity. Since you were last here, I have been forced to a most important, necessary, and expensive war; and I make no doubt but you will give me suitable and effectual assistance to go through with it. I refer you to my Declaration for the Causes, and indeed the Necessity of this War; and shall now only tell you, that I might have digested the indignities to my own person, rather than have brought it to this extremity, if the interest as well as the honour of the whole kingdom had not been at stake: and if I had omitted this conjuncture, perhaps I had not again ever met with the like advantage.—You will find, that the last Supply you gave me did not answer expectation for the ends you gave it, the payment of my Debts: therefore I must, in the next place, recommend them again to your especial care.—Some few days before I declared the War, I put forth my Declaration for Indulgence to Dissenters, and have hitherto found a good effect of it, by securing peace at home when I had war abroad. There is one part in it that hath been subject to misconstructions, which is that concerning the Papists; as if more liberty were granted them than to the other Recusants, when it is plain there is less; for the others have public places allowed them, and I never intended that they should have any, but only have the freedom of their religion in their own houses, without any concurrence of others. And I could not grant them less than this, when I had extended so much more grace to others, most of them having been loyal, and in the service of me and of the king my father; and in the whole course of this indulgence, I do not intend that it shall any way prejudice the Church, but I will support its rights, and it in its full power. Having said this, I shall take it very ill to receive contradiction in what I have done. And, I will deal plainly with you, I am resolved to stick to my Declaration.—There is one jealousy more, that is maliciously spread abroad, and yet so weak and frivolous that I once thought it not of moment enough to mention, but it may have gotten some ground with some well-minded people; and that is, that the forces I have raised in this war were designed to controul law and property. I wish I had more forces the last summer; the want of them then, convinces me I must raise more against this next spring; and I do not doubt but you will consider the charge of them in your Supplies.—I will conclude with this assurance to you, That I will preserve the true Reformed Protestant Religion and the Church as it is now established in this kingdom, and that no man's property or liberty shall ever be invaded. I leave the rest to the Chancellor."

The Lord Chancellor Shaftsbury's Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor spake as follows:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; The king hath spoken so fully, so excellently well, and so like himself, that you are not to expect much from me. There is not a word in his speech that hath not its full weight, and, I dare with assurance say, will have its effect with you. His maj. had called you sooner, and his affairs required it, but that he was resolved to give you all the ease and vacancy to your own private concerns, and the people as much respite from payments and taxes, as the necessity of his business, or their preservation, would permit. And yet (which I cannot but here mention to you), by the crafty insinuations of some ill-affected persons, there have been spread strange and desperate rumours, which your meeting together this day hath sufficiently proved both malicious and false.—His maj. hath told you, that he is now engaged in an important, very expensive, and indeed a war absolutely necessary and unavoidable. He hath referred you to his Declaration, where you will find the personal indignities by pictures and medals, and other public affronts, his maj. hath received from the States; their breach of Treaties both in the Surinam and East India business; and at last they came to that height of insolence, as to deny the honour and right of the Flag, though an undoubted jewel of this crown, never to be parted with, and by them particularly owned in the late Treaty of Breda, and never contested in any age. And whilst the king first long expected, and then solemnly demanded satisfaction, they diaped his title to it all the courts of Christendom; and made great offers to the French king, if he would stand by them against us. But the most Christian king too well remembered what they did at Munster, contrary to so many treaties and solemn engagements, and how dangerous a neighbour they were to all crowned heads.—The king and his ministers had here a hard time, and lay every day under new obloquies: sometimes they were represented as selling all to France, for money to make this war; Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Hull, were to be given into the French hands for caution. The next day news came, that France and Holland were agreed. Then the obloquy was turned from treachery to folly. The ministers were now fools, that some days before were villains. And indeed the coffee-houses were not to be blamed for their last apprehensions, since, if that conjunction had taken effect, then England had been in a far worse case than now it is, and the war had been turned upon us. But both kings, knowing their interest, resolved to join against them, who were the common enemies to all monarchies, and I may say, especially to ours, their only competitor for trade and power at sea, and who only stand in their way to an universal empire as great as Rome. This the States understood so well, and had swallowed so deep, that, under all their present distress and danger, they are so intoxicated with that vast ambition, that they slight a Treaty, and refuse a Cessation.—All this you and the whole nation saw before the last war; but it could not then be so well timed, or our alliances so well made. But you judged right that at any rate 'delenda est Carthago,' that government was to be brought down; and therefore the king may well say to you, It is your war. He took his measures from you, and they were just and right ones, and he expects a suitable assistance to so necessary and expensive an action, which he hath hitherto maintained at his own charge, and was unwilling either to trouble you, or burthen the country, until it came to an inevitable necessity. And his majesty commands me to tell you, that unless it be a certain sum, and speedily raised, it can never answer the occasion.—My Lords and Gentlemen; Reputation is the great support of war or peace. This war had never begun, nor had the States ever slighted the king, or ever refused him satisfaction, neither had this war continued to this day, or subsisted now, but that the States were deceived in their measures, and apprehended his majesty in that great want of money, that he must sit down under any affronts; and was not able to begin or carry on a war. Nay, at this day the States support themselves amongst their people by this only falsehood, 'That they are assured of the temper of England, and of the parliament, and that you will not supply the king in this war; and that if they can hold out till your meeting, they will have new life, and may take new measures.' There are lately taken two of their principal agents, with their credentials and instructions to this purpose, who are now in the Tower, and shall be proceeded against according to the law of nations. But the king is sufficiently assured of his people; knows you better; and can never doubt his parliament. This had not been mentioned, but to shew you of what importance the frankness and reasonableness of this Supply is, as well as the fulness of it. Let me say, the king hath brought the States to that condition, that your hearty conjunction at this time, in supplying his majesty, will make them never more formidable to kings, or dangerous to England. And if, after this, you suffer them to get up, let this be remembered; The States of Holland are England's eternal enemy, both by interest and inclination.—In the next place to the Supply for the carrying on of the war, his maj. recommends to you the taking care of his Debts. What you gave the last session, did not near answer your own expectation. Besides, another considerable Aid you designed his maj. was unfortunately lost in the birth; so that the king was forced, for the carrying on of his affairs, much against his will, to put a stop to the payments out of the exchequer. He saw the pressures upon himself, and growing inconveniences to his people, by great interest: and the difference, through all his business, between ready money and orders. This gave the king the necessity of that proceeding, to make use of his own revenue, which had been of so great effect in this war. But, though he hath put a stop to the trade and gain of the Bankers, yet he would be unwilling to ruin them, and oppress so many families as are concerned in those Debts. Besides, it were too disproportionable a burthen upon many of his good subjects. But neither the bankers nor they have reason to complain, if you now take them into your care, and they have paid them what was due to them when the stop was made, with 6 per cent interest from that time. The king is very much concerned both in honour and interest to see this done: and yet he desires you not to mis-time it, but that it may have only the second place; and that you will first settle what you intend about the Supply.—His maj. hath so fully vindicated his Declaration from that calumny concerning the Papists, that no reasonable scruple can be made by any good man. He hath sufficiently justified it by the time it was published in, and the effects he hath had from it; and might have done it more, from the agreeableness of it to his own natural disposition, which no good Englishman can wish other than it is. He loves not blood, nor rigorous severities; but where mild or gentle ways may be used by a wise prince, he is certain to choose them. The church of England and all good Protestants have reason to rejoice in such a head, and such a defender. His maj. doth declare his care and concerns for the church, and will maintain them in all their rights and privileges, equal if not beyond any of his predecessors. He was born and bred up in it; it was that his father died for: we all know how great temptations and offers he resisted abroad, when he was in his lowest condition; and he thinks it the honour of his reign, that he hath been the restorer of the Church: it is that he will ever maintain, and hopes to leave to posterity in greater lustre, and upon surer grounds, than our ancestors ever saw it. But his maj. is not convinced that violent ways are the interest of Religion, or of the Church.—There is one thing more that I am commanded to speak to you of, which is, the Jealousy that hath been foolishly spread abroad, of the forces the king hath raised in this war; wherein the king hath opened himself freely to you, and confessed the fault on the other hand: for, if this last summer had not proved a miracle of storms and tempests, such as secured their East India fleet, and protected their sea coasts from a descent, nothing but the true reason (want of money) could have justified the defect in the number of our forces. It is that his maj. is providing for against the next spring, having given out orders for the raising of 7 or 8 regiments more of foot, under the command of persons of the greatest fortunes and quality. And I am earnestly to recommend to you, that in your Supplies you will take into your consideration this necessary addition of charge.—And after his majesty's conclusion of his speech, let me conclude, nay let us all conclude, with blessing God and the king: let us bless God, that he hath given us such a king, to be 'the Repairer of our Breaches' both in church and State, and 'the Restorer of our Paths to dwell in; that, in the midst of war and misery, which rages in our neighbour countries, our garners are full, and there is no complaining in our streets; and a man can hardly know there is a war: let us bless God, that hath given this king signally the hearts of his people, and most particularly of this parliament, who, in their affection and loyalty to their prince have exceeded all their predecessors; a parliament with whom the king hath many years lived with all the caresses of a happy marriage. Has the king had a concern? You have wedded it. Has his maj. wanted Supplies? You have readily, cheerfully, and fully provided for them. You have relied upon the wisdom and conduct of his maj. in all his affairs, so that you have never attempted to exceed your bounds, or to impose upon him: whilst the king on the other hand, hath made your counsels the foundations of all his proceedings; and hath been so tender of you, that he hath upon his own revenue and credit endeavoured to support even foreign wars; that he might be least uneasy to you, or burthensome to his people. And let me say, That though this marriage be according to Moses' law, where the husband can give a bill of divorce, put her away, and take another, yet I can assure you, it is as impossible for the king to part with this parliament, as it is for you to depart from that loyalty, affection, and dutiful behaviour, you have hitherto shewed towards him.—Let us bless the king, for taking away all our Fears and leaving no room for Jealousies; for those assurances and promises he hath made us. Let us bless God and the king, that our Religion is safe; that the Church of England is the care of our prince; that Parliaments are safe; that our Properties and Liberties are safe. What more hath a good Englishman to ask, but that this king may long reign; and that this Triple Alliance of king, parliament and people, may never be dissolved."

"One thing I forgot to mention to you, which happened during this prorogation: I did give order that some writs might issue out, for the election of members instead of those that are dead, to the end the house might be full at their meeting; and I am mistaken if this be not done according to former precedents: but I desire you that you fall not to any other business till you have examined that particular; and I doubt not but precedents will justify what is done. I am as careful of all your privileges as of my own prerogative."

Debate on the Lord Chancellor's issuing Writs and making Elections and Returns, without Order or Warrant from the House.] Feb. 6. The house of commons went into a debate on the matter of issuing Writs, and making Elections and Returns, without Order or Warrant from the house, by the Lord Chancellor, the parliament not sitting.*

Sir John Birkenhead. If you tie up the hands of the lord chancellor, how will you be supplied with members when you come to sit?

Sir John Knight. The king's prerogative is not judged at all, by annulling these writs; you are to take notice of the thing; and therefore moves that these writs may be suspended.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Though some writs were not issued out, it was for want of notice; though the threshold, and his first use of the Seal was for a trick, which, as tricks use, ended in disappointment and shame. There had been a long vacancy of parliament, in which interval divers members of the house of commons were dead, and some taken into the nobility. His lordship had a mind to fill these vacancies, especially such as were in the county of Dorset (where his own estate and interest lay) with creatures of his own. But there he had been formerly opposed by the noble col. Strangways, one of a mighty estate and interest in the west, and, (which was worst of all) an inextinguishable loyalist; who, for his eminent fidelity, was afterwards called to serve the king as a privy counsellor. His lordship thought that now, having power, he might manage the matter so as to get the better of him. And, for that end, he caused the writs, for the new elections, to issue, without staying for the meeting of the parliament and having the Speaker's Warrant, as the use, especially, of late, hath been: for that had given notice of the elections: but so his lordship's men, having the carriage of the writ, and, dodging with it, by surprise, (as was said) carried all against the interest of the loyal colonel, which put him into a great rage. This device was no sooner communicated and understood by the western gentlemen, with the colonel's sentiment of it, but they all determined to join, and get all these elections set aside; and, with that resolution, they came up, and the noble colonel at the head of them. At the first meeting of the house, when the usual forms were over, a member stood up, and looking about, said he observed divers new faces in the house, and did not remember that, before their last rising, the house had been moved for the filling of so many places; so he doubted the regularity of the sitting of those persons, and moved their titles might be examined. Another member, seconding, said he supposed those gentlemen would have the modesty to withdraw, whilst their case was in debate, and not attend the order of the house. So this whole set of new elects, (although mostly loyalists) fled out, and came in no more upon that choice. For, although it was shewed such writs had formerly issued during such prorogations, enough to have served the turn in causa favorabilis, yet the late practice being otherwise, and the current strong that way, and the court party not able to hinder, all the elections, on that foot, were voted null, and new writs ordered to go." North's Examen. p. 56.

it happened now, it is not possible to be so again. It is confessed, on all hands, that no members were chosen so since the Long Parliament; there are precedents before; there are many precedents that the chancellor did issue out writs.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. Conveniency, or inconveniency, is not the question, but right; whether the chancellor has done legally or not—divers precedents even to the Long Parliament: Moves that the several opinions do lay their precedents on the board; if it be with law, we must have a law to take away the inconveniency.

Col. Strangways. Has not had time to search precedents, but here is an usage for many years. It is strange, that, the same week of attendance, the writs should be sent out; both right and crown must subsist together: we are in possession of the thing, and would have gentlemen take the same care that are against it, on one side, as well as the other; let the thing be done clearly.

Mr. Cheney. Mr. Attorney said, 'That the chancellor had precedents, and he would have a committee to examine those precedents.'

Mr. Attorney Finch. Will any man think that this is an universal proposition, that either warrant from the Speaker, or writs from the Chancellor, is an error? Notification from the Speaker to the chancellor is the course if a vacancy be: If there be sent to supply the places of sick persons, or beyond the sea, you may question them: If in prorogation, for a member that is dead, that sat here by a questionable election, that writ is questionable; but sitting by unquestionable right, this writ is not only lawful, but expedient. There never was any age, wherein members were questioned for default of a lord steward [to give the oath of allegiance and supremacy, &c.] persons elected in queen Eliz. by the chancellor's writ, came not in, but when sworn by the lord steward Lincoln, who was absent, admitted. The 7th of James is an authority both ways. No less than 34 now dead, and as many chosen during vacation of parliament. The writs were issued out by lord Ellesmere; some were cases of barons removed, and persons dead, &c. and then voted where members are dead in prorogation, and no contrary usage after, and writs then went out. But six parliaments since king James's time, and will the precedents of six parliaments question those of sixty parliaments? No precedents in 1618 to the contrary. There was a writ in prorogation for Hertford, but not executed. When the parliament met, sir Rd. Wynne kept it in his pocket. A supersedeas may be before, but not after, the execution of the writ; if not executed, no injury done to the borough, or member. Though there was a then supersedeas (Hertford,) yet here we have persons chosen in the room of such whose elections were never questioned. It would be wonderfully hard now to declare a new privilege that was practised before. These privileges, thus, introduced, are particular respects to this great assembly, that signification might come to the Speaker. It is a necessity to the public that things might not be carried in a thin house: a peer may knock at the door, and call for his writ to the chancellor. In privilege-time we ought not to be at the chancellor's pleasure, to send or not send, out writs. If use be made of the ceremony beyond the civil intention, it is burdensome: your displeasure is too great for any man to bear: If any ingredient of displeasure be in your vote, it will lessen the authority of the vote: If precedents in the thing be disputable, would have a committee to inspect and report in time certain, that the world may see you delay not the business.

Sir Tho. Meres. No great man, be he as great as he will, desires to contend with the house of commons for privilege; no man that considers the merits of this house of commons, who have given more than all the parliaments since the Conquest: Many kindnesses we have done, and if privilege be a kindness from the king, we have not the least reason to lose it: We are now upon perfect point of right; have we nothing of right? Must all be prudence and convenience? If you resolve for the same privilege, why should you lose it now more than in the former Speaker's time? Mr. Attorney has granted 'that the writs not executed are superseded,' and those writs, moved for, he would have go out: notification was not the word formerly, nor certificate, but the Speaker, in 1603, sent his warrant to the clerk of the crown.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. In the time of lord chancellor Clarendon, the writs went by way of certificate, not warrant.

Mr. Powle speaks to the merits of the cause: issuing out of writs, the parliament not sitting: it is against reason that an inferior court should judge of the defects of a superior: the inferior courts at Westminster cannot judge the defects of chancery; the chancellor cannot judge of returns. If he issues out writs, he makes himself judge of returns: he must judge that the member is dead, and that the person returned has a right to the place, and so becomes a judge of things done in this house. Formerly the king never chose a Speaker till the house informed him of a defect, much less can he take notice of defects of members. The chancellor does more; he judges of removes out of this house into the lords house—31 Hen. vi. a baron of the exchequer sat then, and now the house thinks it not fit.* Attorney-generals have been discharged the house: and shall the lord chancellor take out of our house so learned a gentleman as Mr. Attorney? Judge Popham was sent for out of the house of lords, when reported to be there. Until 7 Hen. iv. all writs were returned to the clerk of parliament: the King's-bench judges of returns of writs, though issued out of chancery; and though in Hen. iv. a time, writs were returned to chancery, yet that alters not the jurisdiction of this house: if you admit the writs, you admit the chancellor judge of returns—23 Eliz. writs issued out, and members were discharged, so returned; and ordered, That during the sitting of this house, no warrants should be issued out, but according to ancient usage: sitting is in common acceptation from first day of sitting, though in a restrained sense, to the time of parliament actually being here, restrainedly whilst it sits, but in common sense from the first day. They in parliament farther agree, That issuing shall not be at any time without a warrant from the Speaker—3 James, nothing done against it—Hertford writ for election suspended—1 Jam. sir Francis Goodwin was chosen, though sir John Fortescue was recommended, for the county of Buckingham; Goodwin was clearly elected, and not Fortescue; when it came to the council, both writs were voided, and a new election.* Great inconveniences by it—admit the chancellor to judge of these returns, and by consequence he will judge all your returns. The right of judging returns was, in Goodwin's case, pretended to be in chancery, but judged against it here. By this means the chancellor may chuse whom he will, and so no great person ever be called to an account here—There is no time set in these writs, when the member died; no time of death, nor remove to the lords house. And the gentleman that vouched the precedent of queen Eliz. might have done as many in this parliament, if they would serve his turn: the calling of a member into the lords house, must be by our consent.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. If such writs are rightfully issued out, you can put no question upon the superseding them.

Mr. Hampden. The meaning of your order is, to issue out writs for places void here represented.

Mr. Swynfin. Whether such elections are good or no, without referring the matter to a committee, is the question: has not heard one precedent offered where such elections have been allowed of, if notice taken of them; it is but of late usage the moving of the Speaker: how does it appear that the writs, urged as precedents, were not issued out by the Speaker's warrant, the house sitting? These elections out of sitting. The main concern is, he takes the book of this house to be a record. The Statute 6 Hen. viii. makes any person departed the house, recorded in your books, to lose his wages. In any thing that concerns this house, all courts must take your books for a record, and whether a member be or not, your book must testify: how can any court say such a member is dead? They can say he was returned; but that he was a member, your book must be sought: a man may sit here a year, and die, and yet not have been duly elected. If the chancellor has power to send out, he has power to deny, a writ. Now the question is, whether you will search records? Your book must still decide it.

* See the Case between sir Francis Goodwin and Mr. John Fortescue at length, in vol. i. p. 998.

Sir Tho. Strickland. The chancellor has the king's command to issue out writs.

Sir Tho. Charges. The question is not whether the king has power to issue out writs, but whether the chancellor, or the h. of commons, are to judge of vacancies. A member cannot be arrested, and yet the king's authority is preserved: we should not be able to serve our king or country; if our privilege be not preserved: if scrupled, wonders that the reasons are not answered:

Mr. Attorney Finch. On the question of security and satisfaction, you have done it by voiding the elections already passed. You have done it, and outdone all parliaments: it is questioned, How a chancellor can know a member? Answers, by return. He knows he is dead by record, by executors and administrators. If they died since last session of parliament, no warrant could be had from the Speaker. If, instead of 30 or 40, 150 members should be dead, if writs may not go out, the parliament must be dissolved for want of number. Until you have made the thing unlawful, and say so, it is lawful to do so.

Sir Tho. Meres. No government but is subject to objections of all sorts relating to mankind. If such an extraordinary thing should happen once in a thousand years, the king may then, if he please, call a new parliament. Precedents are muddy, not clear, on the best side: the king is as much king of this court as chancery, and those arguments to the contrary are disobliging arguments.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. In committees of privileges, you first send for the mayor or bailiff that returns the election, before you condemn him: will not you hear precedents for the chancellor? All that we have to do is to induce the king to be of our opinion: do you believe the chancellor will acknowledge he has done wrong, by submitting to your supersedeas;

It was at length resolved, "That all Elections upon the Writs issued by the Chancellor since the last Session, are void; and that Mr. Speaker do issue out warrants to the clerk of the crown to make out new Writs for those places."

Declaration of War against Holland.] The Declaration against Holland alluded to in his majesty's Speech was as follows:

"We have been always so zealous for the quiet of Christendom, and so careful not to invade any other kingdom or state; that we hope the world will do us the justice to believe, that it is nothing but inevitable necessity forceth us to the resolution of taking up arms. Immediately upon our Restoration to our crowns, the first work we undertook, was the establishing of peace, and the settling a good correspondence between us and our neighbours: and in particular, our care was to conclude a strict League with the States-General of the United Provinces, upon such equal terms, as would certainly not have been broken, if any obligations could have kept them within the bounds of friendship and justice. This League was maintained intiolable on our part: but in 1663, we were stirred up by the complaints of our people, and the unanimous Vote of both houses in parliament, finding it a vain attempt to endeavour the prosperity of our kingdoms by peaceable ways at home, while our subjects were still exposed to the injuries and oppressions of the States abroad. That whole summer was spent in negotiations and endeavours on our side, to bring them to reasonable terms, which, notwithstanding all we could do, proved at length ineffectual: for the more we pursued them with friendly propositions, the more obstinately they kept off from agreeing with us. Upon this ensued the war in 1665, and continued till 1667; in all which time our victories and their losses were memorable enough to put them in mind of being more faithful to their Leagues for the future. But instead of that, the peace was no sooner made, but they returned to their usual custom of breaking articles, and supplanting our trade. For instance, the States were particularly engaged in an article of the Treaty of Breda, to send commissioners to us at London, about the regulation of our Trade in the East-Indies; but they were so far from doing it upon that obligation, that when we sent over our ambassador to put them in mind of it, he could not in three years time get from them any satisfaction in the material points, nor a forbearance of the wrongs which our subjects received in those parts.—In the West-Indies they went a little farther, for by an Article in the same Treaty, we were to restore Surinam into their hands; and by Articles upon the place confirmed by that Treaty, they were to give liberty to all our subjects in that colony, to transport themselves and estates into any other of our plantations. In pursuance of this agreement, we delivered up the place, and yet they detained all our men in it; only major Banister they sent away prisoner, for but desiring to remove according to the Articles. Our ambassador complaining of this behaviour, after two years solicitation, obtained an order for the performance of those Articles: but when we sent Commissioners, and two ships to bring our men away, the Hollanders (according to their former practice in the business of Poleroon for above 40 years together) sent private orders contrary to those they owned to us in public: and so the only effect of our commissioner's journey thither, was to bring away some few of the poorest of our subjects, and the prayers and cries of the most considerable and wealthiest of them, for relief out of that captivity. After this, we made our complaints by our Letters in August last to the States-General, wherein we desired an Order to their governors there, for the full observance of those Articles; yet to this time we could never receive one word of answer or satisfaction. But it is no wonder that they venture at these outrages upon our subjects in remote parts, when they dare be so bold with our royal person, and the honour of the nation, so near us as in their own country, there being scarce a town within their territories that is not filled with abusive pictures, and false, historical medals and pillars; some of which have been exposed to view by command of the States themselves, and in the very time when we were joined with them in united councils for the support of the Triple League, and the peace of Christendom. This alone were cause sufficient for our displeasure, and the resentment of all our subjects. But we are urged to it by considerations yet nearer to us, than what only relates to ourself; the safety of our Trade, upon which the wealth and prosperity of our people depends, the preservation of them abroad from violence and oppression, and the Hollanders daring to affront us almost within our very ports, are the things which move our just indignation against them.—The Right of the Flag is so ancient, that it was one of the first prerogatives of our royal predecessors, and ought to be the last from which this kingdom should ever depart. It was never questioned, and it was expressly acknowledged in the Treaty of Breda; and yet this last summer it was not only violated by their commanders at sea, and that violation afterwards justified at the Hague, but it was also represented by them in most courts of Christendom, as ridiculous for us to demand. An ungrateful insolence! That they should contend with us about the dominion of these seas, who, even in the reign of our royal father (in the years 1635-6, and 7) thought it an obligation to be permitted to fish in them, by taking of Licences and for a Tribute; and who owe their being now in a condition of making this dispute, to the protection of our ancestors, and the valour and blood of their subjects. Notwithstanding all these provocations, we patiently expected satisfaction, not being willing to expose the peace of Christendom for our particular resentments, while they ceased not on their parts to endeavour to provoke the most Christian king against us: of which they thought themselves so secure, that for above these 12 months their ministers here have threatened us with it. At length, hearing nothing from them, we sent another ambassador to them, who after several pressing Memorials in our name, could receive no answer, till after he had declared his revocation. Then they offered a Paper to this effect, 'That, in this conjuncture, they would condescend to strike to us, if we would assist them against the French; but upon condition, that it should never be taken for a precedent hereafter to their prejudice.' Since the return of our said ambassador, they have sent an extraordinary one to us, who, in a most extraordinary manner, hath given us to understand, 'That he can offer us no satisfaction, till he hath sent back to his masters.' Wherefore, despairing now of any good effect of a further Treaty, we are compelled to take up arms in defence of the ancient prerogative of our crowns, and the glory and safety of our kingdoms: and we put our trust in God, that he will give us his assistance in this our just undertaking, since we had no way left to defend our people from the artifice of that nation in peace, but by the valour of our subjects in war."—The rest of the Declaration was only form, and therefore unnecessary to be inserted; only the conclusion must not be omitted, which was more strange and surprising to some than all the rest. It runs in these words: "And whereas we are engaged by a Treaty to support the Peace made at Aix la-Chapelle, we do finally declare, 'That notwithstanding the prosecution of this war, we will maintain the true intent and scope of the said Treaty, and that in all the alliances which we have or shall make in the progress of this war, we have and will take care to preserve the ends thereof inviolable, unless provoked to the contrary.'"

Declaration of Indulgence.] The Declaration of Indulgence referred to in his majesty's Speech, was in substance as follows: "Our care and endeavours for the preservation of the rights and interests of the church, have been sufficiently manifested to the world, by the whole course of our government, since our happy Restoration, and by the many and frequent ways of coercion that we have used for reducing all erring or dissenting persons, and for composing the unhappy differences in matters of religion, which we found among our subjects upon our return: But it being evident by the sad experience of twelve years, that there is very little fruit of all those forcible courses, we think ourselves obliged to make use of that supreme power in ecclesiastical matters, which is not only inherent in us, but hath been declared and recognized to be so by several statutes and acts of parliament: And therefore we do now accordingly issue out this our royal Declaration, as well for the quieting the minds of our good subjects in these points, for inviting strangers in this conjuncture to come and live under us, and for the better encouragement of all to a cheerful following of their trades and callings, from whence we hope, by the blessing of God, to have many good and happy advantages to our government; as also for preventing for the future the danger that might otherwise arise from private meetings, and seditious conventicles. And in the first place, we declare our express resolution, meaning, and intention to be, That the Church of England be preserved, and remain entire in its doctrine, discipline and government, as now it stands establish'd by law: And that this be taken to be, as it is, the basis, rule and standard of the general and public worship of God, and that the orthodox conformable clergy do receive and enjoy the revenues belonging thereunto; and that no person, though of different opinion and persuasion, shall be exempt from paying his tithes, or other dues whatsoever. And further, we declare, That no person shall be capable of holding any benefice, living, or ecclesiastical dignity or preferment of any kind in this kingdom of England, who is not exactly conformable. We do in the next place declare our will and pleasure to be, That the execution of all and all manner of penal laws in matters ecclesiastical, against whatsoever sort of non-conformists, or recusants, be immediately suspended, and they are hereby suspended. And all judges of assize and gaol-delivery, sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, and other officers whatsoever, whether ecclesiastical or civil, are to take notice of it, and pay due obedience thereunto. And that there may be no pretence for any of our subjects to continue their illegal meetings and conventicles, we do declare, That we shall from time to time allow a sufficient number of places, as shall be desired, in all parts of this our kingdom, for the use of such as do not conform to the Church of England, to meet and assemble in, in order to their public worship and devotion; which places shall be open and free to all persons. But to prevent such disorders and inconveniencies as may happen by this our indulgence, if not duly regulated, and that they may be the better protected by the civil magistrate, our express will and pleasure is, That none of our subjects do presume to meet in any place, until such place be allowed, and the teacher of that Congregation be approved by us. And lest any should apprehend, that this restriction should make our said allowance and approbation difficult to be obtained, We do further declare, That this our indulgence, as to the allowance of public places of worship, and approbation of teachers, shall extend to all sorts of non-conformists and recusants, except the recusants of the Roman catholic religion, to whom we shall no ways allow in public places of worship, but only indulge them their share in the common exemption from the executing the penal laws, and the exercise of their worship in their private houses only. And if after this our clemency and indulgence, any of our subjects shall presume to abuse this liberty, and shall preach seditiously, or to the derogation of the doctrine, discipline, or government of the established church, or shall meet in places not allowed by us; we do hereby give them warning, and declare, we will proceed against them with all imaginable severity: And we will let them see, we can be as severe to punish such offenders, when so justly provoked, as we are indulgent to truly tender consciences."

A Supply Voted.] Feb. 7. The house, in a grand committee, resolved, "That a Supply be given to his majesty of eighteen months assessment, according to the proportion of the last royal Aid, not exceeding 70,000*l.* a month."*

* Amounting in the whole to 1,260,000*l.* On this matter of the Supply, bishop Burnet writes as follows: "The court desired at least 1,200,000*l.* for that sum was necessary to the carrying on the war. The great body of those who opposed the court had resolved to give Debates on the King's Declaration for Indulgence to Dissenters.] Feb. 8. A debate arose on that part of the king's Speech, which related to his Declaration for Indulgences to Dissenters.

Sir Rd. Temple said, the end of this declaration was to invite people into the nation, and is not against a bill of general naturalization—the king of France has naturalized almost all nations, except Spaniards and English—we want people, and this will bring them in.

Mr. Garroway. If we have a general liberty, we may have good as well as bad people amongst us: knows not yet what religion we have ourselves: moves that those who would be naturalized, may be named in several bills, as many as they please at a time, paying 30s. a piece only for the charge: some have come in, but very few, upon that declaration, though used very civilly.

Sir Rd. Ford moves for a committee to enquire into the Declaration, to offer you such an expedient as may be for the good of the nation.

Col. Birch. We hear the Dutch go to Embden, and other places, but few to us; unless you do something of this nature the nation cannot subsist. The staple commodity is corn and wool, and if the people cannot get by it, they will come up by the carriers, as we see daily they do, as if they were guards to them, and so to the plantations, where they may do better: when the bill comes in, then it will be a time to talk to you of their religion.

Sir Lancelot Lake remembers a complaint of Irish cattle coming in, and an imposition on them. Would have an imposition on the Dutch beasts also.

Col. Titus. We want nothing but persons to eat and work, be they of what religion they will. The improvement of lands is a mischief to us. Fullness of markets and few to eat: Old Rome grew rich, by naturalizing all people, and we have naturalized Wales and Scotland. Our workmen are few, and dear, and so wool and other things are cheaper thereby: 5s. for a pair of shoes, that the land-owner gets not 1s. by, there is but such a number of good journey-men about the towns, and they will only 600,000*l.* which was enough to procure a peace, but not continue the war. Garroway and Lee had led the opposition to the court all this session in the house of commons." [The Supply was granted the third day of the session, and these gentlemen had been at the head of the opposition long before.] "So they were thought the properest to name the sum. Above eighty of the chief of that party had met over night, and had agreed to name 600,000*l.* But Garroway named 1,300,000*l.* and was seconded in it by Lee; so this surprize gained that great sum, which enabled the court to carry on the war. They had good reward from the court, and yet continued acting on the other side."

work, or not work, as they please themselves: Would have alien duties free for native commodities.

Mr. Garroway moves to consider the Declaration, that we may the better remove the ill constructions which other persons put upon it, and keep law and prerogative from interfering, which he hopes will be done with that modesty that becomes us. He is far from oppressing tender consciences, but would have the thing settled.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. The king intends not to violate your laws; but the question is, Whether the king be mistaken in his Declaration, or no?—The farther debate was adjourned to

Feb. 10. Lord Cavendish moves, that the Votes of the house in 1662 and 1663 may be read, and the reasons against Toleration; read; which were accordingly.

Sir Tho. Meres, after a silence some time, said, In this affair we are like waters, the deeper the silenter; it is of great weight: he would have us leave the laws as we find them, to our posterity: in the country, upon the first putting out the Declaration, he has conferred with books, and learned persons in the laws, and finds that a general suspension of the penal statutes is against law; if we are mistaken, let us hear it clearly proved.

Mr. Waller. When the state is rightly put, you will find it otherwise: the king says, 'he will stick to his Declaration, and likewise will not invade our rights and liberties.' Something there was of this at his first being in parliament in king James's time; the parliament desired him to put the penal laws in execution against Recusants; not a word then of property. They proceeded to the Petition of Right when property was touched: in the business of Ship-Money, they went to the lords to have the judges punished: opinion of this house clear, no prerogative: our ancestors knew that kings can do no wrong, and, for point of safety, the most unbounded monarchy in the world: the king beats his drum for war, when no man can: Henry vii's proclamations were heard farther than his guns: has observed formerly too much pressing of penal laws: lord Coke says (who was no great friend to prerogative) 'that kings have, and ought to have, power in these things: Empson and Dudley never broke any law, but advised only the setting penal laws on foot; whenever the legal prerogative may supersede: has often heard that the king allows the French churches, for good of trade, as at Venice the Greek churches. Shall the king dispense for trade, and not for peace? Because he is an Englishman, must he not have the benefit of the indulgence by the king's power? has heard it from lawyers, that no prerogative that is legal can be taken away by inferences of state. No branch of the common law must be taken away but in express words; in conceptis verbis. To take away flowers of the crown, we bring stones on our heads. The king pardons trans-tors, who are as bad as Dissenters. 'Arms ornatum et legibus armatum,' says Justip. He believes that the Dissenters repent of what they have done; but that Dissenters should at every session have all hope taken away, can you imagine greater persecution? You will find they will affect your rents, and your trade. In this the king innovates nothing; the Church is part of the state, but the state no part of the Church: Theodosius and Constantine made edicts, and he that disputed them was put into a sack, and thrown into a river: bishops were not as some are now; they were humble and godly men. The ignorant zeal was then as now: the emperors without that power could not keep all quiet. The more supreme power resembles divine, the better it is. God uses menaces as to Nineveh, but does not always destroy: the Petition of Right shall never be altered: must the king beat his subjects with one hand, and Amsterdam with another? You had no mind to take the king's power from him, because your vote in the act of Conventicles does not say so: moves not to strike at a power so near the king, and necessary for the people, and peace.

Mr. Powle would comply with the king, to do in a legal way, as now the Declaration does in an illegal: would know the king's power in temporal laws. He does conceive, if the king can dispense with all penal laws, he may dispense with all laws, with a non obstante. Special cases may so happen, that cannot be executed, but in others the king cannot dispense, but may pardon the offender. In the great case in the Exchequer now about Wine-Licences, a general suspension of law amounts to an abrogation, which none can do but parliament. This being so, by the words of the Declaration, 40 acts of parliaments are suspended, some treason, some felony, banishment, mulcts, and the king cannot dispense them. By the Declaration the king intended no imposing upon his Protestant subjects; but it is clearly so upon the judges and justices of the peace, who are sworn to execute the laws: does not this impose upon causes ecclesiastical and temporal? You make the king equal in ecclesiastical matters to temporal, and no more. Ecclesiastical matters anciently were committed to such persons as the temporal magistrates: no appeals to Rome, no legate, or nuncio, to come into England, without leave of the king: when the Pope and Hen. viii. differed, he resumed his ancient right, by being declared supreme head of the Church, in the convocation, by instrument, which was nothing but the ancient common law restored, which was clearly expressed: 1. Eliz. all causes ecclesiastical restored to her, as well as temporal; no more power in the one than in the other. The Proviso in the Conventicle-Bill might as well have exempted in that bill, and as well put in, in the Bill of the Irish cattle: the king cannot command, but by matter of record: the officers are to pass seals against law at their perils: this is only a paper order

(the Declaration) under no seal; how can the Justices take notice of it? Their commission is under seal. The consequence of this is direful; the king by this may change religion as he pleases; we are confident of him, but knows not what succession may be: something of this nature was in the Spanish match. Bishop Abbot said, 'No toleration could be but by act of parliament;' Williams, the lord-keeper, excepted against it. When the king was rightly informed, in his speech in parliament, he disclaimed it: look into the nation, and you will find nothing ever raised such doubts as this Declaration: if it be found to have these inconveniences, hopes the king will be moved to recal it.

Mr. Seymour. It has not been very unusual that this house has stopped the current of his majesty's grace and favour. To Mr. Powle's argument 'of the magistrates oaths.' By 25 H. viii. which regulates Dispensations, the Judges have declared the right is not taken from the king, in the case of Port and Love: in lord Hubbard: in Hen. iv. dispensation for a bastard to be a priest, against the Pope's jurisdiction; the king had the right then: capital laws cannot be suspended, but punishment pardoned. It may be the penal laws are so lodged in the crown: that of the subject is so mixed with the king in the penalty, the king may dispense with his own part, the subject's part he cannot: the Irish Cattle licet et nunc: 2 Eliz. felony to export money malum prohibitum: laws that relate to government the king cannot part with, and à contra—Sir A. Ingram's case was an office bought, and void, because against law; but in this case here has been no man's property invaded: will you think that this shall have royal assent to bind up the king's hands? If an act restrain the power of the king, these acts are void: if our liberties are invaded, would have an Address to the king, and doubts not of a redress from him.

Col. Strongwaite. Will lay down some postulates of our government: in all kingdoms there must be a legislative power, and in ours not without consent of both houses of parliament; the judges, in doubt, to explain the king's laws. Laws, when first made, were necessary, and in process of time useless, and may be repealed, but still by law. Must not the judges execute the law according to their oaths; and if they do not, are they not responsible? We own the king's power to dispense with the punishment, by pardon; but the king cannot dispense with a man to be a Papist, or Nonconformist: values not ceremonies, but that they are by the magistrate's authority. You grant that indulgence to persons that do not allow that power, in all lawful and honest things. What are we sent for here, if this be not 'arduum negotium'? If justices of the peace have difficulties, they advise with the judges; and those that have the honour to serve the king, might have advised this business with the parliament: ne country in the world where there is this indulgence; but there is a standing army. If the sheriff shall, without occasion, summon the posse comitatus of the county, upon complaint made, he ought to be punished. The king's ministers have done wrong, and by colour of the king's command to justify them!—Would never have the king deprived of the advice of both houses, composed of so many persons of worth and loyalty to be trusted: he counsels the king best, who does it to maintain his laws: an usurper has as much power as a king that breaks his laws. If no settled course be taken, we cannot expect any thing but confusion: it is the law of England that condemns treasons against him, and preserves his person; let us maintain it for his interest: it was his misfortune to sit here when negative voice was denied, and hopes he will not deny us.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. Thinks a positive declaration in this business dangerous; what will become of us all in emergencies, if, in fire, we are restrained from breaking open houses, or, in war, from marching over men's grounds? Would not have us enquire into the just extent of the king's power, but address ourselves to his majesty about it: the master of a ship has power to throw goods overboard in a storm, though it is not consequential in a calm; though all laws are not of the same importance, yet all are of the same authority. This house has made Addresses to the king for a Dispensation for Lent; it is no ecclesiastical thing, but to preserve cattle. You would not move him to an illegal and bad thing: to take away a liberty, and to give, are both alike in power: you desired the king to issue out his Proclamation to forbid bringing in of Wines, that none should be landed after such a time: would tread in those ways we always have done, that when we have any thing that offends us, we may address ourselves to the king to redress it, be it religion, or treaty, or property; but to say that we shall irritate the king to all the penal laws of the kingdom, which if they must be the king's duty, Empeon and Dudley were wrongfully taken away: either the king must have the liberty of dispensing, or else is always obliged to put the penal laws in execution.

Sir George Downing. The king says, 'the power is inherent in him' but if the question must be of the power of the king, he will be tender in it. Gentlemen that make account of their loyalty may give their voices freely in it; he, that has done otherwise*, cannot be so free: we are now modelling the government: in 1641, nothing but calm questions; nothing but securing property. But what followed at last? Monarchy came in, without conditions. Laws are in words; but that government that shall be in words, is destroyed. The Speaker said, "We have been taught by his predecessor, that privilege, whether 20 or 40 days, is not to be put in writing to be circumscribed."—Can government be without arbitrary power? The courts of justice make rules by the judges and chancellors, according to equity, conscience, and circumstances. If every bond put in suit, and loss of evidence, be not relieved, where are we? And yet all this is arbitrary. you must at last go to the lords, and be well armed, to make it out with them.

Sir Philip Warwick. The gentlemen of the long robe have left the dispute to us, being loth to disturb what they have most advantage by.

Sir Tho. Lee. The judges have not changed their charges, in their circuits, upon this Declaration: moves that as pardons are made void by circumstances (many are not) how far a power by dispensation may dispense the law, may be declared: doubts whether, if judges had been consulted in the Declaration, it had passed, or no. Transporting silver, without leave, felony. Laws may be useful to-day, and not to-morrow; but would have the judgment here: would not meddle with prerogative, any more than with your privileges: could something happen that no mortal man could foresee and the king raise money; were necessity so great that all men may see it, no parliament would question it. It is not the first time the king has been deceived in prerogative: hopes that, in this, he will be advised by the two houses of parliament.

Mr. Attorney Finch. The long robe he perceives blamed for being backward in declaring themselves in this business. What is incumbent on him he will discharge. He has been unhappy that his mistakes have been represented to his prejudice, rather than his good meaning to his advantage. There is no question of the king's power of dispensation, where the forfeiture is his own. The penalty, in popular laws, is moiety to the informer; the king may inform for the whole, and dispense for the whole: monopoly nor licence good in many cases: it is no question that the king may not repeal by prerogative. In this case the king does not repeal; undoubtedly the king is not more absolute in ecclesiastical affairs than in temporal: by common law the king grants leave to hold livings in commendam, and unite parishes; and the same power the pope had, the king is restored to by the statute of Hen. viii.; the law is not changed at all. The king by that statute is head; that no foreign power can pretend to; and therefore it was ever the interest of the nation to take a temporal pope for a spiritual one: the canons not to contradict the law of England: necessity cogent that this Declaration should be made for quiet, there was so universal a connivance with an indulging recusants got from their neighbours; and now they may thank the crown. Now the question is, Whether the king cannot dispense with the laws, in order to the preservation of the kingdom, (and we are all miserable if he cannot do it.) There is an impossibility of foreseeing all inconveniences: some laws can never be executed, as the law about cart-wheels, suspended by Proclamation; no complaint made of: planting hemp in Ireland: we have allowed the thing, but differ de modo: would have it laid aside, because the king desires it, and his enemies do not desire it; let us do it with all reverence to the crown: would have us show more affection than learning in it: a mathematical security we cannot have; a moral one we have from the king. The king cannot dispense with common law; religion cannot be changed without act of parliament. You may secure what you would have, without making so hard a vote as is proposed. Some would have a Bill for it; that is hard. Will you tie the king to indulge those consciences whether he will, or no? Now tender, hereafter may not be so: there is a great necessity to keep a bone from betwixt the king and parliament, and hopes you will propose nothing but what the king may well grant.

Mr. Vaughan. When the king may dispense with any law, it must be manifestly for the good of the subject; if it does injury to the subject, it is illegal; if not, it is otherwise; no man is bound to a law, where there is not a punishment; and if this Declaration signifies any thing, the Church of England signifies nothing. He argued the dispensation with Merchant-strangers. You cannot hinder them, by law of nations; if they come for gain to the kingdom, it implies toleration. The king may pardon murder, or treason, but not give licence to do them. If not dispensable to violate the Sabbath; if the king cannot dispense with the law of man, à fortiori, not with the law of God: all sorts and manners of people are dispensed with by this Declaration, Turks, Jews, &c. This Declaration is a repeal of 40 acts of parliament, no way repealable but by the same authority that made them: this Declaration does repeal 14 statutes of this king: those who will take no oaths at all, and so justice cease. It voids all testimony, and takes away my liberty, or estate. It is point-blank opposite to his laws; they and this cannot consist. If monarchs were as lasting as their kingdoms, there could be no danger in this Declaration: we, that are magistrates, lie under the king's censure for our oaths, but in a perpetual danger, in all places, from God. As liberty of the subject consists in his right, so would have it measured by law. This prerogative is illegal, and our vote will say no more than the Declaration does in effect.

Sir Rob. Howard. We are told 'that all is swept away by this Declaration;' but what is the Church, if you come not to the observation of all its ceremonies, church-wardens, visiting, and presenting, &c.? Is it an argument that the Church of England is unsupported, unless every man be compelled to every thing in it? But the Church of England is not concerned in this Declaration. Things are come to that height, we cannot pull them down again: he has expected to hear where property has been concerned; life, liberty, and estate is property; now, would you know how any of these is invaded? You have seen dispensations here, and have not thought them grievances. The abp. of Canterbury, Laud, found fault with the French and Dutch churches. Will you set up another government? The Long Parliament inserted this into one of its Articles; see how parliaments change: an unhappy time was that, and some took unhappy parts in it: nothing can gratify the Pope more than to say the king has no such jurisdiction. It is said, 'what shall the judges and justices of the peace do?' They receive an indulgence, the king has power to grant. It is a strange question to dispute what prerogative is, when all statutes make it so sacred a thing. The king says, 'it is legal, and he will stick to it;' and we say, 'it is not legal, and he shall not.' Is the Black Rod at the door? Shall we so hastily fall into such a vote? If you think your civil rights are in danger, you make the Declaration 'probabilis causa litigandi. Do papists make ill use of it, or any other cause? Then address the king, but vote it not illegal: proceed not this way to the king, else the Hollanders will rejoice.

Sir Wm. Coventry. This is a point tenderly to be handled, and hopes to propose something towards a close of the business: will wave all arguments from an universal claim of prerogative to be universally exercised. Our ancestors never did draw a line to circumscribe prerogative and liberty. He hears no man urge this prerogative more than when the king cannot have a parliament: but when a parliament does come, something, you say, must of necessity be done, else you say it is legal, and that allows it. It has been moved for an Address, but no man says upon what subject-matter: this vote of the subject-matter of great difficulty: but since you may enter into debates you would avoid, he professes your words not his own, but yours, upon the Declaration of Breda. It says, 'Laws then in being, that could not be dispensed with but by act of parliament.'

Sir Thomas Merer. We may, at that time, come nearer his majesty than ever, for now the house of commons having seen how little good force will do, it may be, the reason of the thing will oblige us in a fair legal way of doing what the king has been designing these 12 years. This may prevent those heats that have been, more or less, about ecclesiastical affairs, almost every session this parliament.

Sir Philip Masgrave believes that his maj. had gracious intentions in this Declaration, but it did make disturbances in most loyal hearts: moves to take that way that may have the least reflection on the king: has seen sad effects of it: moves for an humble Address of this house to his majesty, to preserve the Act of Uniformity.

Serj. Maynard. Dispensation of the penal laws to be illegal, is more than you intend to vote. It is agreed on all hands, that the king cannot suspend so as to repeal; else why do we make any law? He may make them as well in ecclesiastical matters: Whether universal dispensation, not limited, does repeal a law, or no, he will not enter into dispute: would distinguish, in the question, 'Popish recusants,' but whether 'legal or illegal,' is too harsh. Rather for an humble Address to the king to remove our fears in the business.

Sir Rob. Carr. When we consider what ways have been taken to quiet people, the thing was dispensed with by justices of the peace, and the people ought not to owe that to the justices, which should be to the king: hears not one instance against property: would have a committee to pen the Address in such words as we may not repent when we have done.

Sir John Birkenhead. Recusants were tolerated ten years in the beginning of queen Eliz. and no laws were made against them, until she was sure she could make them good. The Oath of Supremacy not exacted in the lords house; but the commons got them in, by incapacitating them for offices until they had taken that oath: conformity a thing much in option.

Col. Titus. On both sides gentlemen have acquitted themselves well: Coventry's motion was to alter the words of voting; the Declaration illegal is not the matter: moves for an Address to the king, "That penal Laws in Ecclesiastical matters, may not have their force till the parliament shall declare some act in the business."

Sir Edw. Dering. Is no advocate for the legality of Declarations; we need not look farther back than 3 Charles, liberty infringed; some sent abroad, Hammond and Glanville; banishment, martial law; then an Address was made to the king, that the thing might be redressed: we rather now speak what we fear, than what we feel. The king has given you liberty of Address in all difficult cases, and moves for a committee now for an address to the king.

Col. Birch. If ever men were to answer for a trust, it is this: can laws be any ways suspended but here? Desires, unless some will make it out, that we may pass it by; we must do it; if dispensation cannot be made out, then put the question.

Serj. Keys. The carrying out wool, and bringing in Gascon wines, and transporting bell-metal out of England, were particular things and not at all invading the rights of the subject. From the dispensing with cart wheels to jump to that of conscience, is via parvis ad magnam, that makes us have reason to fear. Patents are judged unlawful every day in Westminster, and voided by scire facias. The laws are no ways to be suspended but by act of parliament.

Sir Tho. Osborne does not wonder that the king expresses these things to be in his inherent right, when his own council thinks so, and his counsel at law: moves that the Address may be referred to a committee,

Mr. Harwood hopes the king will hear the counsel of this house; his great council, as well as his other council.

Sir Tho. Lee. What is the use of his great council of parliament, but to inform the king he has been misled and mistaken by his privy-council? It is our duty to the people, and the king calls you to declare your opinion. It plainly appears to be a mistake in the crown, and you must inform him of it.

Sir Robt. Howard. If a noli pros. be entered by the king's attorney-general, is not this a suspension, and will you hinder that?

Mr. Attorney Finch knows not one of the king's counsel learned in the law, that ever saw this Declaration otherwise than in print, and he never made any other inferences from it than you have done. The king, by his supremacy, may discharge any cause in ecclesiastical courts, they being his. Why do you put an universal term upon a thing particular? Moves that we may humbly petition the king that it may be so no more.

Mr. Cheney would not have it thought abroad that there is such a necessity of this Declaration as is implied, the king having his militia to protect him: would address the king to suspend his Declaration, and form it into a law.

Sir Cha. Harbord. Laws must be altered by the same authority they were ordained by. It has done him more hurt among his father's friends, than good to those indulged: support the prerogative by the affections of the people; they are twins. Is against the question.

Mr. Waller. Words that sound true, and are parliamentary, are better than those that are not. It has been good doctrine, that an Ordinance has had the power of an Act by the king's consent.

Col. Strangways thinks it worth enquiry, whether the late lord-keeper did not refuse the seal; the judges never consented: would not have those that are not lawyers, nor divines, prescribe out of their profession: does not find them consulted: In point of law, would have the king advised by those that profess the law.

Mr Attorney Finch. Some Canons, 1 of king James, the king may dispense with. Is it your intention that the king shall not dispense with them?

Mr. Powle. Those Canons were not passed by act of parliament, nor ever confirmed, and so not within your vote.

It was then resolved, "That Penal Statutes, in matters Ecclesiastical, cannot be suspended but by Act of Parliament, 168 to 116; and a Petition and Address were ordered to be drawn up to be presented to his majesty.

The Commons' Address to the King, against the Declaration for Indulgence.] Feb. 14. Mr. Powle reported the Petition and Address to the king upon the above vote, as follows:

"Most gracious sovereign; We your maj.'s most loyal and faithful subjects, the commons assembled in parliament, do, in the first place, as in all duty bound, return your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks for the many gracious promises and assurances which your maj. hath, several times, during this present parliament, given to us, that your maj. would secure and maintain unto us the true reformed Protestant Religion, our liberties and properties; which most gracious assurances your maj. hath, out of your great goodness, been pleased to renew unto us more particularly, at the opening of this present session of parliament.—And farther we crave leave humbly to represent, that we have, with all duty and expedition, taken into our consideration several parts of your majesty's last Speech to us, and withal the Declaration therein mentioned, for indulgence to Dissenters; and we find ourselves bound in duty to inform your majesty, that penal statutes, in matters Ecclesiastical, cannot be suspended but by act of parliament.—We, therefore, do most humbly beseech your majesty, that the said laws may have their free force, until it shall be otherwise provided for by act of parliament; and that your majesty would graciously be pleased to give such directions herein, that no apprehensions or jealousies may remain in the hearts of your majesty's good and faithful subjects."

Debate on the above Address.] Sir Tho. Littleton. Several motions were made at the committee for an Address to the king 'for ease of tender consciences.' When we say this vote, we ought to do the other; but the committee would not agree to it: moves now for a committee to draw such a Bill, and that the Address may be re-committed.

Mr. Saynsfin thinks you rightly moved by Littleton. Your sense was to go no farther than to secure the law, and preserve the true strength of the statute-law. Nay, farther, it seemed to all men's sense, that some consideration should be had of the indulgence; great reasons were given for the matter of it, as the war, trade, &c. as far as might be for the safety of religion; but the committee could not originally express it, having no authority from you, therefore no haste, it being to be sent to the lords: we have had so ill experience of those laws, that he hopes we shall consider them: if the kings of France and Spain should draw their subjects to prison, and persecute them, they could not preserve unity: sees nothing in the Declaration but you may well dispense with, but the preservation of the laws. If you shall go so far as a law for the Declaration, it will be no difference, only the Declaration turned into a law, and so you have your end in it: moves to appoint a committee to prepare a Bill to that end, which cannot but appear well, both to king and people.

Sir Tho. Meres is one of those that think 'ease fit for tender consciences,' in the words of Breda Declaration, 'for union of the Protestant subjects;' but how shall we proceed? No committee can do it, that is numerous: three men of a committee better to draw a bill, than 18 upon the subject-matter of a vote:

would appoint to-morrow for this end, that no jealousy may be objected: knows how matters will go when money is passed: would not have this debate stop the Address to the king.

Mr. Chency. Would have persons withdraw, to add a few words to the Address, of uniting his majesty's Protestant subjects.

Sir John Monson thinks it not proper to add any thing to the Address, until we have passed this address by vote: moves for to-morrow, to take this business into consideration.

Mr. Crouch. The question is, 'Agree, or not, with the committee;' adding to the Address is but to distract things; and if you agree not with the committee, then it is irregular to debate adding.

Mr. Garraway. It would have looked so like bargaining, if the committee had put it in, that they waved adding any thing to it.

Sir Rd. Temple. The committee left out the addition, because they expected some previous vote from you. Though the manner was not concluded in your debate, yet every man agreed to the matter of the Declaration: will it not be an abrupt Address to the king to find fault with the Declaration, and not say any way you would have the thing remedied in the matter? What difficulty do you put upon the king? Would it not be proper for you now to speak it, that you have it under consideration to provide for relief of dissenting brethren? Would have a vote passed, to take Dissenters into consideration, and have it put into your Address.

Sir Tho. Lee would have you informed by the chairman of the committee, whether ever it was debated to have it part of your Address.

Mr. Powle. No sense of your committee that it should be part of your Address.

Mr. Vaughan denies that it was the sense of the committee: they thought it, unparliamentary to inform the king of any such thing, and they had no ground for it; for until you had voted the thing, they could add nothing to it.

Sir Rob. Howard. You must first put the question of 'agreeing with the committee' before you can add any thing.

Col. Birch does not agree with those gentlemen. It is not parliamentary to add (if you intend it) after having voted the thing. The thing moved to be added, could not appear to be true at the committee: would always have the king thanked by Dissenters. The committee could not do it, the house having not voted the thing of Indulgence: desires it for the honour of the king, that you make a vote for taking the thing into consideration, and then vote your Address.

It was then resolved, "That this house doth agree with the committee in the Petition and Address."

Sir Tho. Meres. What will you do with this Address? The Address must go to the king, and it is usual to send to the king to know when he will command us to wait on him, by some of the lords of the council of our house.

Mr. Garroway has seen many laws passed, with much zeal, against Nonconformists and Dissenters in this house, and much hardship upon the people, but without effect: would have all things done with sobriety and tenderness, and for that end would have a vote from this house, that you will declare so much to his majesty in this Message; we can make no other promise, but that we have such a thing under consideration, though we cannot see the effect upon debate.

Sir C. Harbord. Usually the lords concurrence is asked, and hopes they will agree with you.

Mr. Crouch would know what this Bill should be brought in for, upon what heads, what you would add, or repeal? Seconds the motion for the lords concurrence.

Mr. Seymour. Never thought it fit to persecute or prosecute any person, that believes not as he believes; it may have the power of the sword, but not the power of godliness: when this Address is presented to the king, would have it declared to the king, that this house has it under consideration.

Sir Wm. Coventry is the same man in this to day, as he was the other day at the debate of the Declaration. That thing was knocked on the head at the committee, because no order from you; and the committee thought it not fit to promise that which we were not certain to effect, and that was the great reason at the committee. If we promise, we must perform, though to our detriment: the committee must have heads to work upon: some are for indulging Protestant subjects only, and some for extending it to Catholic subjects. It may be, those great promissory words may amount to more than either you or the king means: would have Monday set apart for the matter of Dissenters to be taken into consideration, though he believes men are, by the discourse of the thing, prepared in their opinions, though not in their judgments.

Sir Tho. Lee thinks it necessary that now you do something, because possibly something in your Address to the king may startle those kind of people, the Dissenters: to pass a general vote may be so construed, that it may perhaps be too general; such a vote, perhaps, never passed here before: moves for a Bill for Uniting Protestant subjects. Here is ground for you, though he would be glad to see a man so happy as to comprehend all your senses in that bill: pass the vote, and I hope something may be done this day.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. Though the thing be of as great importance and large extent as may be, if you intend to thrive in the Address to the king, you must prepare something of such a vote, as is mentioned, to the king: would have no Bill admitted, but upon your vote, and reasons for it.

Sir Nich. Carzo. 'Tender conscience' is of large extent; Turks, Jews, &c. have consciences: would have 'uniting Protestant subjects' added to the question.

VOL. IV.

Sir Rob. Howard. As you would confirm the minds of some, so you would give terror to others. You must do something to indulge as well as unite; it is not fair to bind it up thus.

Sir Rob. Carr is pleased with Carew's motion. For aught he thinks, he that pretends to be one thing, may be a Turk in his heart, and therefore would have it general.

Sir Tho. Meres does believe the word 'ease' is the business which is disputable, whether toleration or comprehension. The words of his majesty's Speech are, 'ease of Protestant subjects in matters of Religion.'

Col. Birch. If you will give indulgence in an act of parliament, your question must be 'for ease of Protestant Subjects.' Moves for it.

Sir G. Downing. You intend this vote to be presented to the king; he should be both you tell the king what we shall not be able to do: would, on Monday, have the house in a grand committee, and stop the Address in the mean time.

Sir John Duncombe. Upon this debate of tender consciences, every man is for himself, and excluding others. He speaks of a tender conscience-man, such as has been born in his religion, and lives peaceably in it: do what is agreeable to charity; lay not your foundation too narrow; let all have the benefit of indulgence. Not an universal ease, but you must qualify it. They all are alike to him. He would consider none of them for indulgence as opposite to the Church of England. The last session, the motion for indulgence was diverted: thinks no peace now without it: would have the debate be 'for ease of tender consciences.'

Sir C. Harbord. The king, in this business, is most troubled of all men. Something must be done, we shall else put the king upon some great necessity: would have a bill 'for ease of tender consciences in matters of Religion,' and that will be capacious enough: has regard to the church, as built upon the state, the monarchy.

Mr. Harwood sees something at the brink of men's lips that will not come out; our aim is to bring all dissenting men into the Protestant Church, and he that is not willing to come into the Church should not have ease. Many of these persons differ not but in discipline, not in doctrine: would have the question 'for Dissenters of the Protestant subjects only.'

Mr. Milward is for debating this business in a grand committee, that persons may reply one upon another. They may be seemingly Protestants, yet not truly so: he has a great tenderness for such as have been brought up in their religion: would have a difference between monarchical dissenters and antimonarchical.

Sir Lancelot Lake would spare tender consciences, because so few make any consciences of their ways: before we proceed, would have us agree in the definition of a tender conscience.'

2 M

Mr. Garroway. In plain English, would not put Romanists in the Bill: would give them some ease, but would have them publicly in all their robes; and if you might see them in all their frippery, believes you would not have so many of them. If the Papists had arrived at their end, you had not sat here now: would have them favoured, but not as trees to bear fruit, only as pillars to be seen, they giving no such liberty in any place of the world, they having inquisitions and persecutions.

Col. Strangways conceives that the Declaration, issued out in the war, was to have peace at home: would not have it in any man's power to hurt the Church; first consider the Protestant interest, and put that to the question.

Mr. Secretary Coventry hopes you will provide something that men may not be outlawed: a preliminary vote cannot be brought in, for you are not resolved whether comprehension or toleration: thinks it a thing of the greatest consequence in the world to bind up yourselves, and not hear reasons first.

Sir Tho. Clarges. It was an insinuation from ill people, that the late king had an inclination to Popery. After Edgehill fight he did declare, 'that the Papists in the parliament's army were equal, if not more, in number, than in his own.' He blamed much the remissness of the Papists in that battle, that they did not their duty: will say nothing to their estates, but to be part of this Bill will destroy all our religion: until 11 Eliz. no difference in Religion; all went to Church, until Pius vth's Bull came forth, dissolving all allegiance of her subjects to her. No acts were made against the Papists until 22 Eliz. In king James's time, the jealousies of that religion were much the cause of what followed: the duke of Ormond made a treaty with that army in Ireland, to the end he might preserve the king's person, then in danger in England, and they were, by those articles, to have liberty of open profession of their religion, and equal numbers of officers in the army there. They fell from this, and declared for the Pope, and so they showed their loyalty; but the parliament army, when they were better informed, laid their arms at the king's feet, under general Monk—Molinus, Zuares, and many other Jesuits, held it lawful to depose kings. One has written a book at Paris, which he is ready to publish when called for, that proves the Jesuits were the authors of the king's death. These people, out of an excellent good intention, commit high treason every day; going to jails to convert people condemned; they get into our houses, perverting people every day; surely his majesty's good intentions are abused.

Mr. Waller. Whether general words of inclusion? thinks rather general words, because he would not have an act of despair on Papists. There are but two ways of changing religion, by act of parliament, or by force; by parliament impossible, none coming in here amongst us. If we were to make new laws against them again, we could not do it: has a sense of kindness for any persons that suffer. Our Saviour had some for him that suffered with him: hopes the Papists may be capable of some favour, as well as other dissenters.

Sir Tho. Littleton. We ought not to make the Address partial as to Dissenters: in the king's Speech the Papists are not spoken of. It is better to reduce the Papist to something, for he is now always in fear, and yet, always escapes: would have a full answer to the king's Declaration.

Sir Tho. Meres. What is it that makes us now so zealous in this question, but our fears of Popery? And he hoped never to have occasion to speak to it here: let us take care that, whilst we dispute the indulging the Protestant subjects, the third dog does not take the bone from us both.

Mr. Attorney Finch. You are labouring to put a question in terms exclusive. It is an unnatural way to exclude case of persons: at a committee you have lately voted an Address to the king. The king may believe that the manner, and not the matter, does displease you. Your thinking his Declaration illegal cannot be grateful to him. Vulgarly speaking, a Protestant is a negative, viz. not a Papist, but, affirmatively, what, is difficult to define. If a Protestant, according to the Church of England, you exclude all persons that differ but in one article. We cannot consider religion in parliament, but as part of the civil government; its doctrine, God forbid we should: does any man hope ever to see the time that there shall be never a Papist in England? He may hope never to see an error, and yet the Scripture says, 'there must be errors, that they that are approved may be made perfect.' In all times there were Roman Catholics, though the Bull of Pius v. in queen Eliz.'s time, and the Powder Treason in king James's time, fired every man with indignation. Priests there will ever be. Queen Eliz. employed lord Clanrickard, a papist, in highest trust. They may do good, when impossibility is taken from them of doing harm: when you go and tell the king he is mistaken, and that no temperament or relaxation, believes it will have no vote: we are masters of our vote, but not of the interpretation of standers-by. Hopes it will suit with all the ends of piety and Christianity, if the vote be general, and it is for your honour to have it so.

Sir Wm. Coventry. It has been said, the word 'Protestant' excludes the Papists: would have have the word 'Protestant' to stand, that they may know you use some other manner of kindness, than to the Papists. The king has restrained his favours to them; I would have you do so too. Believes it is the intention of no man here to equalize them in his thoughts. [Here he stopped a while, and desired leave a little for recollection, and then proceeded.] He supposes the Declaration was to quiet persons in consideration of their numbers, so that the Papists have no claim, if few, then not considerable. If so few as we apprehend and hope, they are not considerable in the war; if many, it is time to look after them, and hinder the growth, and would not mingle them therefore, but retain the word 'Protestant' in the question.

Sir Rob. Carr likes neither the papists nor dissenters, but the papists have fought for the king, the others have not; therefore would have more kindness for them.

Mr. Powle never thought of extirpating the Papists, but would not have them equal to us. Their insolence is the complaint in every street. This has filled the minds of the people with apprehensions. They have abused the king's favour. There are some good and some bad among them. Would have the nation secured of our own religion, especially seeing that some of them have crept into commands and employments: would have the word 'Protestant' in the question.

Sir Henry Herbert is not for enlarging the question, for the Papists at this time enjoy liberties beyond us. They are neither sheriffs, constables, nor tything-men, nor are any laws put in execution against them. Knows very well that at Edgchill battle, the late king complained that they did not their duty, and during the war they lay couchant at Worcester. Religion is to be preferred before all considerations. The best foundation of the state is religion; it makes men more peaceable and better subjects. The Quaker and Anabaptist have no foundation. He has greater apprehensions of the Papists than of any others. Superstitions of religion are horrible. Has travelled, and (he thanks God) came home a better Protestant than he went. Their wine is the better in France by being brought into England, but our geatry worse by going into France. The Papists are wholly excluded out of the question; for they are not quiet and peaceable men, as others are.

It was then resolved, nem. con. "That a Bill be brought in for the Ease of his majesty's Protestant subjects that are Dissenters in matters of Religion from the Church of England."

Debate on desiring the Concurrence of the Lords to the Address.] The question being put, That the Concurrence of the Lords be desired, to the Petition and Address to the King,

Mr. Swynfin said, If you had voted, upon a single vote, what laws to be suspended, and what not, you must have gone to the lords; but now it is involved with other things, you cannot; your Message must have been singly upon the vote. It is a matter in which the lords cannot agree with you, viz. You say you have taken the matter of the Speech into consideration; if the lords have not, they cannot agree with you. For a single judgment uninvolved, you must go to them, and for an opinion in law.

Sir Ed. Temple. No precedent that ever we went single to the king in things of this nature without the lords. You went to the king and offered him reasons for what you could not concur with in his Speech. About relaxation in the Petition of Right, you went to the lords to join with you in petitioning the king, that the laws might have their free course. This Address is to the same effect. We never went alone in a public concern of the kingdom to the king. The matter of your Petition is a judgment in law. Hopes not for a good success if you go without the lords. If you take this course, the lords may justly object, that you declare law without them; the king may possibly say, he will have the advice of the lords before he gives an answer, and will think it unreasonable to do it, without consulting the lords and the judges.

Mr. Attorney Finch. The former going without the lords, about the Declaration of Breda, was no judgment of law. Did you ever desire a Proclamation against the Papists, but by both Speakers, hand in hand? Do you think this matter of less consequence? He granted this indulgence to peers as well as commons. If they shall differ from you, it lies at their doors, and you have discharged yourselves. Will not you acquaint the lords in an universal judgment of law? The king may deny it because not parliamentary. To send it to the lords, is the way to make it more easily pass, and it is for your honour to do so.

Sir Win. Coventry. When you asked liberty of access to the king's person, it was for yourselves, not the lords. In the Petition of Right there was more need than in this, for that had the force of a law. We usually go to the lords when things are in doubt; but may we not by ourselves claim our laws, and that they may have a free course? Some among the lords may be distasted with your vote. It may be, the lords will have conferences to delay. In all the debates we have avoided disputes of prerogative and liberties; the committee would not touch reasons for fear of offence. Will you go from your former precedents, and put hazard of conferences, which will put us upon arguing what we would not argue here, and put ourselves upon that rock we would avoid?

Mr. Milward. In your vote you have declared the law, and now you would avoid the judgment of the highest judicature. The Petition of Right is de jure to be granted, and therefore the lords to be consulted. Before the lords come to Addresses they will consider, and conferences are natural, and can never be avoided in any transaction with the lords.—The Question being put that the concurrence of the lords be desired, &c. it passed in the negative, 125 to 110.

Sir Job Charlton quits the Chair, and Mr. Seymour chosen in his place.] Feb. 15. The Speaker, Sir Job Charlton, being much indisposed*, the house adjourned to Tuesday, Feb. 18; when being met, and the Speaker's indisposition growing still more upon him, that he was not able to attend the service of the house, and having, by letters, desired leave of his majesty and the house to resign the place of Speaker, and retire into the country, Mr. Edward Seymour, eldest son of sir Edw. Seymour, bart. being nominated and recommended, by Mr. Secretary Coventry, as a fit person, both in respect of his ability and experience, as also of his constitution and health of body, for the Speaker; he was accordingly chosen, presented, and approved of by his maj.

Debate on the Bill for granting Ease to Protestant Dissenters.] Feb. 19. The house resolved into a committee, to take into consideration the subject-matter of a Bill for Ease to his maj.'s Protestant subjects, who are Dissenters, in matters of Religion, from the Church of England.

Sir Lancelot Lake, citing a passage in St. John of those who called themselves Jews and were not, moved to have the 39 Articles read, and would have that the test.

Mr. Hale moved to know what the gentlemen concerned in the king's Declaration would move you in, for redress of their grievances.

Sir Tho. Lee. Our debate is from the late vote, who you would have 'eased.' Would have the question to 'Subscribers to the Articles of the Church of England,' and thinks that a good test.

Sir Nich. Carew would have the Church of England as strong as you can against the Church of Rome. Would be loth to ask toleration of them. Would take in 'those that dissent not in matters of doctrine.'

Sir John Birkenhead. The leveller will not have the minister have two livings, nor the gentleman two manors, no emperor, no king. Are such as these the men you would ease? Before you consider what ease to give them, know from them: what they would have, for one thing will not please them all; but says one, Who represents them? By licences granted since the Declaration you may know who represents them. And made a large discourse of our Religion settled by act of parliament.

Mr. Garraway. We are all beholden to Birkenhead for telling us that the parliament makes Religion, and the Articles, valid. Consider your vote and your Address. Dissenters are many, and not one vote can comprehend them all: would make your first steps to bring in the better sort, and if you find the door too strait, make it wider to bring in more. Moves, for the least, so many 'as will agree to the 39 Articles, or as many of them as relate to the doctrine of the Church of England.' We have people that would come in: the Papists are under an anathema, and cannot come in under pain of excommunication.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. It is a good motion, made to see what those out of the Church do desire. A man would give something to get something, but would not give something to get nothing. We confess that things of ceremony are in themselves indifferent, and therefore they keep out, and may have the same arguments with the Papists of salvation in their Church, and not in ours, &c. It is confessed that never any Liturgy was like our Common Prayer. We may suppose that all people here are for the Common Prayer, because said in the house every day. What do we mean by 'taking in?' It may be to be bishops, and bring the Covenant upon their backs. If we take them so in, we leave ourselves out.

Mr. Vaughan. If any one asks, Who are these Dissenters' representatives? We are their representatives, as for other people, and we must judge what is fit for them. Put some test upon them, and then we may know what to be relaxed.

Mr. Crouch. 'Ease' implies a burden of some weight. Would any physician advise with a patient, without knowing what he ails? Would know what it is would satisfy these people, before we proceed any farther.

Sir Wm. Coventry. It is reasonable that you consider them to whom you would 'give ease.' Did not know that the levellers, as many others, were religious, before Birkenhead called them so. And another sort he mentioned, those who believed Christianity because settled by act of parliament, knows not where that sort is. Moves that the persons we shall take care of, may be those that will subscribe to the doctrine of the Church of England, and will take the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.

Sir Tho. Doleman would not have it extend to such, as allow a Dispensation for such as take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.

Sir Wm. Coventry does not rise to controvert what Birkenhead said, but to rectify an error. Does doubt that it may be apprehended that 'such as will take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy' shall be capable of preferment in the Church of England. The test that must be put upon persons to make them capable of preferment, must be a farther thing.

Resolved, at the committee, "That ease shall be given to his majesty's Protestant subjects that will subscribe to the doctrine of the Church of England, and take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy."

Sir Philip Warwick. That you may be able to do something, moves that the Convocation may have the business to consider of it.

Sir Tho. Lee. Thinks this 'ease,' in order to taking them into the Church, may be 'a great ease to them.' By this vote, they may comfortably follow their trades. Ceremonies are necessary for your house, and for the church, as your cloaths are for your person. Would next have it taken into consideration, what shall make them capable of Preferment in the Church.

Mr. Love.^b What would satisfy them, is a question no man here can answer, but for once desires leave to personate these people. Hopes that all, that shall reap the fruits of this bill, will demonstrate their gratitude to the king and this house, by their quiet deportment. He confesses he has no kindness for them that desire so immodest a thing as Preferment in the Church, unless they are conformable to the laws. Nor do they desire to be exempted from all chargeable offices, paying of tythes, to the poor or church, one office excepted, viz. that of church-warden only, and not without being willing to pay a fine for the contempt. They desire that, after the test, you will permit those that are preachers to preach, but not without the magistrates leave, the doors open and in the public churches, when no divine service is there, [This latter motion he retracted, being generally decried.] He said he mentioned 'in the Church' because they could not be thought to plot in such a place. This is the sense of most of the Dissenters, and will please them, and, he hopes, this committee also.

Colonel Strangways. Whatever the parliament shall make to unite, he shall be for it, but never to set up altar against altar. One sort of Dissenters you hope to gain, another you never hope. Does value those Churches that have charity, and damn not all opinions different from them. Would do this business as if he were immediately to answer it to God. If they were things commanded, or forbidden by God, would not alter them. He puts no value upon ceremonies, which are alterable, according to time and prudence. Would consider what you ordain, that things may be obeyed. We may remember what principles brought the king to the block. Those principles were never grounded upon the Church of England. Do what becomes good Christians and moderate men. Would not have these laws of ease made perpetual; would see how they behave themselves upon it.

Sir John Duncombe hopes this house will well consider what they are about, before they make a law. This may sway the very government so as to overbalance it. Will never think it fit that those men should have 'ease,' that, when the Church says, you must suffer or die; and they say you must fight. Invite them to you, but never form them into bodies; lose nothing yourselves. Their principles are not consistent with honest people; let them not set up a government by themselves, for the Presbyterian will ever be for a Commonwealth. Would have trial of them for a year, by some law, and no longer.

Sir Tho. Lee. In 35 Eliz. there was something of this nature. Would have the act to be upon revival, not perpetual, but to try them during this war.

Mr. Secretary Coventry desires that those, that are in the Church, may be clear in the Church. Is for a temporary toleration. In Holland they have no leave for any public religion but that of Calvin. The law favours none else; the rest are by connivance. Would have the indulgence here temporary.

Mr. Poole. To repeal all laws from queen Eliz.'s time against Dissenters would be very dangerous. Would only have the indulgence temporary. To the end of the next session of parliament would have freedom from all penal laws, ecclesiastical or temporal, and then consider of qualifications for preferment.

Sir R. Howard. No laws can be suspended, unless named particularly. They bind not else. It will be a strange thing, at one blow to execute all the laws since queen Eliz.'s time.

Col. Birch. Their argument of things indifferent in ceremonies, we cannot well answer them. Till you have some experience in the thing, would not have one stone taken out of the building. If we must enumerate the laws in this, why not in every thing else? We may say 'any law, statute, &c. to the contrary, notwithstanding.'

Feb. 18. p. m. The Speaker reported, that he had, according to their direction, presented their humble Petition and Address to his majesty, who was pleased to return this answer, 'That it was of importance, and he would take it into his consideration.'

Feb. 20. In a grand committee for preparing a Bill for granting Ease to his majesty's Protestant Dissenting subjects, &c.*

Sir Lionel Jenkins.† As to receiving the

* "Great pains were taken by the court to divert the Popery Bill. They proposed that some regard might be had to Protestant Dissenters, and that their meetings might be allowed. By this means they hoped to have set them and the Church party into new heats; for now all were united against Popery. Love, who served for the city of London, and was himself a Dissenter, saw what ill effects any such quarrels might have: so he moved, 'That an effectual security might be found against Popery, and that nothing might interpose till that was done. When that was over, then they would try to deserve some favour: but at present, they were willing to lie under the severity of the laws, rather than clog a more necessary work with their concerns.' So a vote passed to bring in a Bill in favour of the Protestant Dissenters, though there was not time enough, nor unanimity enough, to finish one this session. But this prudent behaviour of theirs softened the Church party." Burnet.

† "Jenkins was a man of exemplary life and considerably learned: but he was dull and slow. He was suspected of leaning to Popery, though very unjustly. But he was set on every punctilio of the Church of England to superstition, and was a great asserter of the Divine Right of monarchy, and was for carrying the prerogative too high. He neither spoke nor writ well; but being so eminent for the most courtly qualifications, other matters were the more easily dispensed with. All his speeches and arguments against the Exclusion were heard with indignation." Burnet.

Communion twice a year in the parish churches for both lewd persons and sectaries, some persons are of no religion at all, and may be known by being kept from the communion till they amend. Humbly moves that, whatever you would do for these persons, you will support the Church; that a new Altar may not be erected for these persons, and that no new law may erect them any new Churches for public worship.*

Sir Wm. Coventry offers to consideration what we may do to keep persons in the Church, and to bring in such as are out; for when all is done, the preservation of religion must be in the Church of England established by law, and we must strengthen that, wherein our main defence does lie, against popery and policy. Whereas now the Dissenters have the disadvantage of their labours, for want of Preferment, by coming in they may have the benefit of them. Moves that what has been laid on them, without the convocations, may be taken off, as those things laid on since the king came in, by Act of Parliament, as Covenant, Assent and Consent, &c.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. As for removing the Covenant, if we are to increase our garrison, would not do it with those that have the plague. It was a brave vote the burning the Covenant, and by dispensing with the renunciation of the Covenant, you may burn your vote with the Covenant. This is a calling in other men in triumph over the Church of England.

Mr. Vaughan. If the Covenant be a false oath, there is no need of renunciation; taking the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy voids all that. If we say 'no man shall or can be, of the Church of England, that comes not up to all the strictness of the Ceremonies,' it is to make ours as infallible as the Church of Rome makes hers.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. You have condemned the Covenant to be burnt, and will you bring it in again? Shall we be more merciful than God is, to bring in men without repenting?

Mr. Garroway. The case is altered now; we are providing that the Church of England shall not be devoured by the Papist. If we answer not our vote by an Act, wonders not that now we must fence off the thing. Things are not so clear: we are not at the end of the war; let us reconcile persons. Shall we leave the people in confusion? Now we will neither let them out, nor in. Shall we put them out of the nation? It may be, we shall leave few in. Though our medicine may seem empirical, yet, in the danger we are in, we must make use of it. Moves to take off the Oath of Assent and Consent, and the renunciation of the Covenant.

* "Sir Lionel Jenkins was, at the time of this debate, judge of the admiralty, judge of the prerogative court of Canterbury, and principal of Jesus college, Oxford, which last he resigned in 1673, when he was sent plenipotentiary to the treaty of Cologne, as he was also to that of Niméguen, in 1678. In 1679, he succeeded Mr. Coventry in the place of Secretary of State, which he resigned for a valuable consideration in 1684, and died the year after." See Biog. Brit. Mr. North calls him "the most faithful drudge of a Secretary that ever the court had." Life of Lord Keeper Guilford, p. 229.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. Will you have them make subscription to what they neither 'assent' nor 'consent' to? Let one of them be taken in, either 'Assent' or 'Consent.'

Sir Lionel Jenkins does not know what the Dissenters mean by taking away the Oath of 'Assent and Consent.' Who are these contended for? Not the laymen; their ministers only. If they conform, they need not subscribe; if not, they need not contend for it.

Sir John Duncombe. If we knew what would ease them, would willingly hear them; we know not what pains them, and therefore not what will ease them. Does to thus much agree, that he would leave the thing as you found it. If we believed that the Covenant was the only clog, would take that away, but would have the Declaration what it is.

Sir Philip Warwick moves to have the words 'other persons' in the renunciation of the Covenant left, and believes most of the Dissenters will not scruple the rest.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. Many will say they are not obliged by it, because they have not taken it. Thinks we are not to buy those persons off (that think themselves obliged by the Covenant, that have taken it) at so dear a rate.

Mr. Harwood. We are not buying these persons, but you are making an experiment but for twelve months: The Covenant will expire of itself in nine years, in regard it is but temporary. Would have the question put.

Sir Rd. Temple. He that does come into the Church does materially renounce the Covenant. Men will not make forcible confessions; it is voluntary that is required. Many have said 'that by renouncing the Covenant they shall lose their interest with all men.' It is a branch not essential to the Church; it is against the nature of a renunciation to be forced. A man would ask forgiveness for an injury done if not forced to it.

Col. Strangways. We argue the thing now, as a civil consideration, among men of true reputation, not to do an unjust thing. Would have no man come in that does not renounce, with his tongue and heart, this odious Covenant.

Sir Tho. Osborne. Would have as many Dissenters brought in as may be: Does think this most unreasonable, and cannot consent to it; it is both to the king and this house: to the king, because we should seem to encourage the wickedness of those men; to the house, because of the vote, &c. No man, he thinks, will ever come in, and he would exclude them. It is a great scandal to bring them in by special act of parliament. The nation groans under it, and he thinks they would return into rebellion.

Mr. Street. Those that are still fond of the Covenant, suppose you intend them not. He supposes persons will not renounce it for their reputation's sake. This k. James calls, in conference at Hampton-court, 'a Scottish argument.' There were then in England but 49 Dissenters. You will now gratify but a few in dispensing with it. At the Savoy Debate they agreed not what they would have; in the time of the war they made use of it as a snare to such as had not taken it. They that are fond of this idol, let them keep it, but never let it come into the Church.

Sir Wm. Coventry thinks that dispensing with the Covenant will strengthen you against such as will not take the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, who hold any thing lawful that the Pope commands, but would not press it under the notion of a thing that may be of scandal. They desire to speak and to swear only for themselves, and not for others; therefore would have them accept it to themselves, and not to others.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. These persons did take the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy. In keeping out the fox from the flock, shall I let in the wolf?

Mr. Vaughan. This which stands in your Act is a reproach to them that they have been traitors; if it has authority, the Declaration does lessen it already. Desires the distinction only may be removed.

Col. Birch rises up, because some persons here were not old enough to see what was done formerly. After he had the honour to come into this house, some intentions were to renew the Covenant. Cromwell, Ireton, and the rest, would not have it done. He said then, that these men would alter the government, and the house then would have sent them to the tower: he never saw such mettle in this house; he had forty notes sent him, "Stick to the Covenant and you shall die." This was his greatest inducement to stick to it: Not one of these men could be brought to change the government. Love lost his life for it; the Presbyterian party declared against the king's murder. To the Restoration of the king all agreed. Had he not engaged for the king, by the Covenant, he had prevented himself twenty-one imprisonments he has suffered. When the king was restored, these were the men we only durst trust: he had never gone to the king at Worcester, but with sincere intentions. For the Engagement, he cannot find any of that persuasion that took it. It is a harder matter to make a man renounce, repent, and confess publicly, which is so much done in private confession.

Sir Rob. Carr. At the same time that the Covenant was pressed in the house, damnable heresy was coupled with the hierarchy—reflecting on col. Birch.

Sir Tho. Lee is loth, as they were then coupled, that now any protestant should be joined with Popery. But wonders, in all the arguments, that reputation should be "a Scotch argument" and not an English one. The house was of opinion, when the Act of Uniformity passed, that it was a prejudice to the kingdom that the renunciation of the Covenant should be perpetual. It is but for a few years to come.

Sir Tho. Osborne. If there be any one that thinks himself under the obligation of this Covenant, he is no good man. Mr. Calamy discoursed and pressed the bringing in the king on conditions, when he came to him that commanded next under gen. Monk.

Mr. Garroway. Uses this as a counter-poison, and no otherwise, against those that renounce the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy. A great many persons are not concerned in the Covenant—a few old gentlemen. Says nothing of former things, but moves for the present pacification of England.

Mr. Love did hope to see yesterday some good issue. Some men may possibly think what principles he is of, which he is not ashamed to own and justify. Must give his vote, that such as will renounce the Covenant, as to their own obligation to it, without reference to others, shall be left out of the exception? but this will amount to little or no general Ease. Moves for a general Indulgence, by way of comprehension.

Debate on a Motion, to desire an Answer from the King to the Message.] Feb. 22. Sir John Hotham. Moves for "a desire to his maj. for a speedy Answer to the last Address of this house."

Mr. Palmer seconds the motion, for some of the lords of the Council of this house to move his majesty in it.

Sir Wm. Coventry. It is but a few days since we made the Address; and his maj. has taken time to consider of it.

Sir Rob. Dillington. Possibly his maj. may have forgotten our address; and desires he may be minded of it, in all humbleness, for a gracious Answer.

Sir John Hotham, he thought 'a speedy Answer' would be a 'gracious' one, and meant no otherwise by the word 'speedy' without any intention of unmannerliness.

Sir John Duncombe. Will you precipitate an Answer from the king? He has not seen such a thing in the house the twelve years we have sat: why so hasty? No man, in common conversation, is pressed at this rate: Is troubled he must speak against it. Do not let these things interrupt you: Lay these things by; and let the Speaker leave the chair.

Sir Nich. Carew. We sit not again till Tuesday, and it is some time for an answer, Whether Declaration can be a law, or parliament-law, a law? This is only to enable us to pay our money the more cheerfully.

Col. Birch. The house has declared their opinion of the Declaration: thinks that this business to day will not go well without the Message. Dissenters will think, by your vote the other day, they shall have no benefit of this day. This day will prepare you the better for that motion to the king; therefore would not have it made till after to-day.

Sir Philip Musgrave doubts not of an Answer from the king to our satisfaction: thinks the Message too quick: those of the lords of the council hearing your desires, will, he supposes, mind the king of an Answer: is against the question.

The Speaker remembers no precedent of this nature, but towards the latter end of a session.

Mr, Hopkins. In the case of lord Arundel the lords made a much quicker message than this; and hopes we have the same privilege.

Sir Rob. Howard. The king sees our information; and hopes an act of parliament, now towards, will remedy all; which is the only proper means and remedy. Consider what cause you have a-new to make another Address to king: he may possibly hear something of this debate; and possibly of that something may come, of its own nature, much more than your Address may produce: moves to wave it: possibly you may have a good success of your Bill to prevent all fears: doubts not of a fair success without a Message.

Mr. Vaughan stands up in order to the king's service. The slackness of the Money Bill, yesterday, possibly was from the delay of the king's Answer: we have either done too much, or too little, in this business: to contend with the king, during these distractions abroad, if our arguments are not warrantable, will be the destruction of us and the crown itself. If this be the case, we shall be thought persons rather pragmatical than to have right on our sides. If we do not renew our Address, how can we discharge our trust? If properties be not safe, we shall not know what to give, nor to whom to give.

Sir John Trevor. Since this so much concerns our allegiance, and the property of the subject, is moved to speak: differs from Vaughan: the question is not, whether the laws and our liberties are safe; but whether we shall importune the king so unseasonably at this time? Would fain see any gentleman (which he must say according to his profession) bring a precedent that any Answer has been so suddenly pressed: has read Petitions and Answers, 2 and 6 Hen. iv. The king is not obliged to answer but at his own time: jealousies presently whispered abroad, and would not have such a motion chopped in, but to the business of the day.

Sir John Mallet. We have formerly addressed about the Papists, and disbanding the Army: the same day the king gave a gracious Answer; and hopes we shall have so of this.

Sir Win. Coventry. Is against the question, as thinking it too early; not above 3 days since you carried the Address; and the Answer may possibly be the same again, if you send so soon: the privy counsellors of the house will be tender to acquaint the king of your debates, without your order; but they may, as of themselves, inform the king how time slips away, and prevent the impatience of the house of commons.

Sir Tho. Lee. Our laws and liberties are concerned, and wonders at so great arguing against the thing: what was your Petition? That the laws might have their free course: in order to a legislative Address, money and grievances ever went together: would be glad of an effect of this debate, in all the cool manner imaginable; but money now begins sooner than ordinary; formerly, it was last debated, and last ended. The motion not so 'chopped in' as was said: it is most necessary, considering the fears of the people, their laws being at stake. Moves to have it adjourned to Tuesday, if thought too sudden.

Mr. Garraway. It is not so much our fears, as the account we are to give the people. There is no ill-intention in the motion; but with all candour moves to adjourn the debate.

Sir Rob. Carr. It has always been the wisdom of this house to do things with all decency; and if this last motion did do so, would not be against it: no man can find a precedent, and he would not have the debate adjourned.

Mr. Harwood. Has not heard of this in our forefathers time; but, it seems, we are come here to learn manners. It does not look well. It is confessed, but a few days since, we attended the king; therefore would respite the debate till Tuesday, without a farther question.

Sir Tho. Meres speaks to Tuesday: hopes gentlemen are convinced how necessary that vote was: whatever we ask here of the king, is the right we were born to; no new thing: if this be a new Address, the Declaration is as new; and one new thing begets another. No man can show such a Declaration by any counsel learned. The Judges soon going out of town to their circuits; now is the time to advise with them, or they will be gone. It is a great while since our Vote; and it is known about the town. It will be two days till we shall sit, and we, poor country-fellows, may be rude and unmannerly; but we have as good hearts as the finest of them all; we mean as well as the best of them. If we have too much heat (he means zeal for our laws) if we contend for nothing else, shall we fall flat without a question? It may be we shall never have an Answer, because a few plain country gentlemen move for it: it will look like a desertion of the thing, not to have a question for it: if this Declaration be still in force, what signifies your debate? Your hearts are dead like a rotten oak. How can you make any law that you have no assurance, of the execution of? Should not the debate be adjourned, the most unhappy thing in the world.

Sir John Duncombe. If the word 'unmannerliness' has offended, the word 'bold expression' was as much from Meres: how can the gentlemen know, but that some of the Judges are absent, that the king would ask the question of, or some of his council that he would trust? In common conversation, would you refuse a man two or three days time consideration? Much less the king: this adjournment signifies something of indecency. He says it again, if the king has a reason for his delay, doubtless he hears of your impatience. It is not becoming this house: would have the things that gentlemen desire, but moderate courses in it: if by Tuesday you have not an Answer, consider it then.

Lord St. John would pass this Money bill as soon as may be, the time of the year coming on: would, in the mean time, satisfy the minds of men, and is for Tuesday.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Meres has used the terms of 'side and side' of the house; it is not parliamentary: both Country Gentlemen and Courtiers have been loyal; both very good and very bad: desires the gentlemen would leave these reflections: he is as loyal as he or any man; and many have made applications at court* that have missed their ends; and he that will say, 'No Courtier,' may as well say, 'No King.'

Sir Tho. Lee. Is sorry to hear a distinction made from Coventry: no man, that he knows, ever made the distinction before him.

Mr. Garraway. The word Courtier was not made use of, only 'fine man' would not have the house Hectored by any man.

Sir Tho. Lee. There was nothing said of 'Gentlemen living about town.' Country Gentlemen may live about town: desires no reflection may be made; and that Coventry may explain.

Sir Rob. Carr. The words were 'fine gentlemen about the town:' never heard more sharpness here than by Meres: but let us leave off reflections, and go about the business.

Col. Samuel Sandys is not ashamed that he has received the king's bounty: he never begged any thing: he shall serve his country as cheerfully as any man: moves that these things may be laid aside.

Col. Titus. Whatever becomes of the debate of the Address, would have this debate adjourned: believes that many Courtiers would be Country Gentlemen, and many Country Gentlemen would be Courtiers: knows that we would not only not be guilty, but not be liable to the suspicion of ill manners: if this was towards the end of a session, the more reason.

Col. Strangways is troubled at the clashings of the house: would have every man have freedom of speech: those that have fought for the king may be pardoned in their expressions; though not bred at inns of Court and Universities, to furnish their expressions with elegancies: hopes the Message is honest; the Judges are sworn to do things indifferently to king, court, and relative to the subject: would ask any gentleman, Whether he would have the Act of Indemnity voided? Which may be, if the king has power of suspending the laws by his Declaration. The king can do no hurt; those that advise him may do hurt both to king and people: happiness of both king and country depends upon one another: those that crucified our Saviour, and lay in wait for St. Paul, were zealous men; but zeal must be in a good matter, and hopes our zeal is so for this: moves for Tuesday.

Mr. Waller. Consider the occasion of all this debate, and your Address, and consider what reputation your brave Vote for Supply gave his majesty, and that a debate should put this day by: put all in the balance: the Declaration is a year old, and pretended to have done much good: deferring this debate, is pulling down your walls, the ships. See what is at stake. The state is no stronger than they are that defend it: the king is at an end of his credit, and money, without your aid. Let nothing jostle out this bill: avoid this debate for Tuesday.

Mr. Powle. All your Supplies will go on heavily without this; and if laws may be suspended, we have nothing we can call our own. Let any man examine, whether this Declaration has not caused more discontent than has been since the king's happy Restoration: neither Judge, nor any counsel of Westminster Hall, but is of our minds. Lord Arundel's case puts him in mind of sir Dudley Diggs's case of imprisonment. If the king pleases to send us a satisfactory Answer, we may go on cheerfully.

Ordered, That this debate be adjourned to Tuesday the 25th.

The King's Answer to the Address.] Feb. 24. The king's Answer to the preceding Petition and Address was delivered to the house by Mr. Secretary Coventry, and is as follows:

"C. R. His majesty hath received an Address from you, and he hath seriously considered of it, and returneth you this Answer: That he is very much troubled that that Declaration, which he put out for ends so necessary to the quiet of his kingdom, and especially in that conjuncture, should prove the cause of disquiet in his house of commons, and give occasion to the questioning of his power in Ecclesiasticks: which he finds not done in the reigns of any of his ancestors. He is sure he never had thoughts of using it otherwise than as it hath been intrusted in him, to the peace and establishment of the Church of England, and the ease of all his subjects in general. Neither doth he pretend to the right of suspending any laws, wherein the properties, rights, or liberties of any of his subjects are concerned; nor to alter any thing in the established doctrine or discipline of the Church of England: but his only design in this was, to take off the penalties the statutes inflicted upon the Dissenters; and which, he believes, when well considered of, you yourselves would not wish executed, according to the rigour and letter of the law. Neither hath he done this with any thought of avoiding, or precluding, the advice of his parliament; and if any Bill shall be offered him, which shall appear more proper to attain the foresaid ends, and secure the peace of the church and kingdom, when tendered in due manner to him, he will show how readily he will concur in all ways that shall appear good for the kingdom.—Given at the Court at Whitehall, Feb. 24, 1672-3.”

Debate thereon.] Sir Philip Warwick. Is very glad that the king's Answer is come in so soon: it answers all your ends; and he would have it recorded, and the king thanked.

Col. Birch. The thing, if well looked into, is as much as we can desire, and he would have the king thanked for it.

Sir Tho Lee would have the Answer considered, it consisting of many branches: though in one part he would be very ample in our thanks, yet, in such a general Answer, we contradict our vote of the king's power in ecclesiastical matters: it seems to him that our vote will be of great consequence and weight: would be loth to make hard inferences from the thing; therefore would have a due Answer, and no sudden vote.

Sir Rob. Howard. We have now a probable cause of our happiness, but no probabilem causam litigandi. We have that plainly which we have long hoped for: appeals to any man whether he had not a diffidence of mind, from the time of your Message till now: the Answer, in its own nature, is perfectly kind, as the nature of the prince it comes from: “That power you desire is called for by your prince: would have your thanks ordered without a question.”

Sir Tho. Meres. To speak on a sudden to this thing is an unreasonable hardship; It seems here is a distinction made in the king's power in ‘ecclesiastical’ and ‘temporal’ matters. Those of the long robe did declare they knew no such difference. Our Address only mentioned ecclesiastical matters, because it referred to the Declaration: knows that in the king's Message this is implied; he will not do it in ‘temporal’ but that he may do it; and we say it is not to be done: would have some time to consider it; and they are the words of the king: if we answer it in haste, it will look rash; if we give general thanks, being contradictory to our vote, it will look like levity.

Sir Joseph Tradenham thinks this debate a mistaken one; thinks the jealousy vain; for if the king will dispense with what belongs to himself, we cannot be against it.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The objection lies in two points; the king says, ‘He is sorry you should question what never was questioned in the reigns of any of his ancestors.’ The king may complain, and it is a misfortune to him that he is sensible, and we ought to be so too: appeals, if our business be not at an end today. If you will have the penal statutes put in execution, the king tells you what he is willing to do in signing a Bill, and moves you to give the king thanks.

Col. Strangways. The Message consists of several parts, and they are of great moment:

many things involved in it, and it being a point of great tenderness, moves to have it considered to-morrow morning, and would have the thing weighed as it deserves to be weighed.

Sir Rd. Temple. It seems to him fraught with so much condescension as never yet came from a king, and sees no reason to retard the thanks, especially at such a time as this: the king tells you, ‘he designed nothing but taking off penalties, not dispensing with laws, and that if you will pass an Act, he is willing to it; and therefore now the king has given an occasion to delay your thanks, an hesitation in this thing will look like an endeavour to take an exception: moves for thanks.’

Sir Wm. Coventry moves not for giving thanks; that is indecent; it implies that either you must give reasons, and present them; or humbly ask his majesty's pardon for what we have done: sees no difficulty on our parts to thank the king for preserving our properties, and no more.

Mr. Powle. The Message does seem to charge us with undutifulness in ‘questioning the king's power, never done before.’ It is true, too, the occasion was never given before: moves to thank the king for preserving our properties and assurance of them, and ‘that we will take the matter of his Message into consideration.’

Mr. Harwood. No man, in decency and good manners, can deny giving thanks; but the suddenness of the thing would be thought indecent: when he considers the trust reposed in him, cannot agree to a sudden Answer.

Mr. Garroway is glad we have this gracious Answer, therefore moves for a committee to pen it, that we may not commit yet a greater error (if it be one) than our vote.

Sir John Duncombe. Could the king say a more kind thing than his Message? Thinks he desires nothing but peace: the thing troubles the king, and troubles the whole nation: how could the king keep all things quiet but by suspending these laws? Is sorry, that any thing should look like a doubt of giving him thanks.

Mr. Attorney Finch supposes that no new addition shall subtract what was proposed in the former question: would have your address with all gratitude imaginable. It is a mistake that an Answer of thanks excludes farther grace: why should we refuse thanks for this degree his maj. has given us of Answer, when he might have refused us this gracious answer, or any farther answer?

Sir Tho. Lee would have the house understand, that the fear is, whether a power is not asserted in our Answer, whether by priests preaching in English, and mass being said in several places, the laws are not so suspended as taken off by the Declaration: agrees for giving the king thanks, but would be secured that penal laws cannot be suspended but by act of parliament. If he makes too harsh an inference, begs the pardon of the house: it is the greatest question that ever was in parliament, and may shut the door to all Addresses for the future: in our thanks let us not lose our rights and liberties, lest we say, 'we thank your maj. for suspending the laws.' If this be the consequence, let every man lay his hand on his heart, and say, How shall any penal laws be made? Or else your vote signifies nothing.

Sir Lionel Jenkins. The king says, 'He was under a necessity of dispensing;' and having the power of peace and war by his prerogative, he has power of doing things in order thereunto; but 'when a Bill shall be preferred,' his maj. says, 'he will pass it;' he therefore conceives thanks to his majesty requisite and proper.

Mr. Vaughan wonders at Jenkins's inference, 'that power of peace and war, is power of repealing laws;' as much as to say, if power of war, power to determine whether law or no law: would have such thanks, as we may have no occasion of giving more upon this account: as the question is proposed, we thank him for the particulars afterwards: if we thank our king so, we condemn ourselves: would have such an Answer as we may thank him for preservation of us and himself: moves for a committee to consider the Answer and Reasons.

Sir Edw. Dering thinks this Bill of Religion under an ill planet: one day, appointed for it, lost in the king's Answer, and another in our desires for that Answer: would not have such a question determined with incogitancy: no man does think that such a thing, not intended in the question, ought to be crowded in obliquely: moves for the question.

Mr. Waller. Whether the word 'gracious' shall be applied to the whole Answer, or to part of it, is the question: the danger to the whole is contradicting our Address. Says the king, 'it was never in the time of my ancestors questioned,' which is not an assertion of the king's: is not this a gracious thing? And the word 'gracious' may be applied to the whole Answer, for the king not asserting it, is a gracious Answer.

Sir Tho. Meres. In the king's Answer, the power in ecclesiastical matters is plainly asserted. The Message says, 'he only designs to take off that penalty of the statutes;' if any will say, that so taking off penalties be not to suspend laws, what you have voted is not right. If you will thank him for suspending, it is a levity he hopes this house will never be guilty of.

Mr. Secretary Coventry avers there is no assertion in the Message, nor distinction: it joins both our liberties and ecclesiastical matters. In the words of the Message, the king 'never had thoughts of using it otherwise, than for the good of his subjects;' not to properties, nor to alter any thing established by law in church or state.

Mr. Powle. Jenkins said, 'there was a necessity of the Declaration.' The violation of our laws has been necessity. The States of Norwandy desired the king of France not to raise any more taxes but by their consent; his answer was, 'he would not do it but upon necessity;' and that necessity has been ever since, and he has raised money without them: Shall we rest in a doubtful and ambiguous Answer, where our rights and liberties are concerned? Would have the Answer of Thanks and Complaint go together, and how you can do it without a committee, a wiser man than he must tell you.

It was then resolved, "That the Thanks of this house be presented to his maj. for his gracious Assurances and Promises in his Answer to the Address presented by this house."

Feb. 25. Sir Wm. Coventry. It concerns us to proceed with all duty to his maj. for preservation of our laws and liberties: Finds no way more expedient for this business, than going into a grand committee: hopes it may be done substantially, and answer all the ends of the house, and heats avoided: We have always referred Reasons for things to be prepared by a committee, and the house to approve of them; and he thinks it now most expedient to your purpose.

Mr. Powle. Before you refer it to a committee, would open the exceptions we have to his majesty's Answer. It is apparent, that those persons that advised his maj. to this Declaration, still inform him that it is his right. 'Not questioned in the reigns of any of his ancestors,' will seem to imply, an unquestionable right without parliament—3 James, Petition of Grievances; some wholly relating to ecclesiastical matters—The jurisdiction of the High Commissioned Court abused, in pursuance of their citations and excommunications; all ecclesiastical matters—In the next session, complaint of the Canons of 1 James, without consent of parliament, which were then protested against, and complained of. In the next session, complaint that the ecclesiastical laws were not put in execution against non-residents and recusants—The king then, it seems, has been strangely misinformed of his power in ecclesiastical matters: the law gives penalties, not by way of profit or revenue, but for punishment of offenders: If the king can remit penalties, always complained of in parliament, and redressed there, it tends to the overthrow of all things; and hopes this assertion will be waved: taking the co-herence all together, that the king may, for peace, suspend laws, the pretence of necessity may never be wanting.—The saying 'a Bill may be more proper,' implies suspension to be proper: These things have extremely weighed with him: and doubts not but, upon our informing the king, he will be graciously pleased to satisfy us; else the consequence will be an endless dispute betwixt the king and this house.

Sir Tho. Lee hopes that care will be taken, for the future, that there shall be no occasion of this nature. thinks this business too great for a committee.

Sir Tho. Meres would have the committee so far empowered, as plainly to show that the power is not in the king: If not so instructed, time will be lost, and new debates again.

Resolved, "That it be referred to a Committee, to consider what Answer to return to his majesty's last message, and to make report thereof."

The Commons' second Address to the King.] Feb. 26. Mr. Powle reports the following Answer agreed by the committee:

"Most Gracious Sovereign, We your maj.'s most humble and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in this present parliament assembled, do render to your sacred maj. our most dutiful Thanks, for that, to our unspeakable comfort, your maj. hath been pleased so often to reiterate unto us those gracious promises and assurances of maintaining the Religion now established, and the Liberties and Properties of your people: And we do not in the least measure doubt, but that your maj. had the same gracious intentions in giving satisfaction to your subjects, by your Answer to our late Petition and Address; yet upon a serious consideration thereof, we find, that the said Answer is not sufficient to clear the apprehensions that may justly remain in the minds of your people, by your majesty's having claimed a power to suspend penal Statutes, in matters Ecclesiastical, and which your maj. does still seem to assert, in the said Answer, to be 'intrusted in the crown, and never questioned in the reigns of any of your ancestors;' wherein, we humbly conceive, your maj. hath been very much mis-informed; since no such power was ever claimed, or exercised, by any of your maj.'s predecessors; and, if it should be admitted, might tend to the interrupting of the free course of the laws, and altering of the legislative power, which hath always been acknowledged to reside in your majesty, and your two houses of parliament. We do therefore, with an unanimous consent, become again most humble suitors unto your sacred majesty, that you would be pleased to give us a full and satisfactory Answer to our said Petition and Address: and that your maj. would take such effectual order, that the proceedings in this matter may not, for the future, be drawn into consequence or example."

After debate, it was resolved, "That the whole Address be agreed to, as it was brought in by the committee; and that it be presented to his majesty."

Further Debate on the Bill of Ease to Protestant Dissenters.] Feb. 27. In a grand committee on the Bill of Ease to his majesty's Protestant Dissenting subjects,

Mr. Powle said, it was the advice of St. Paul, to 'bear with those that were weak in faith.' Those that are of the same belief with us desire 'Ease,' which must relate to burdens. By the law of queen Eliz. no man was punished that did not teach heretical or erroneous opinions. Now before the last law of Conventicles, no law reached them. Here we have a sort of people that teach nothing but the truth, and knows not why we should deny these people liberty, that have it in all places but where the inquisition is.

Mr. Garroway would confirm to the Dissenters such houses as are already granted them.

Sir Adam Browne. Every sectary will say he is a Protestant and no Papist: You must take care for the other parties as well as the Presbyterians.

Sir Tho. Clarges agrees not to the places already appointed: would have great caution as well to places as to the religion established: would have it penned 'for such places as shall be appointed by act of parliament.'

Sir Wm. Hickman, thinks it not reasonable they should have their meeting-houses out of town; the Act being temporary, they will not build houses.

Mr. Swynfin. You have great expectations upon you, and you have partly intended them the thing under consideration. If then something must be done, consider, that some think it far greater than it is: the Test for subscription of qualifying persons is as much as was in queen Eliz.'s time: compare the Church then and now; there were many professed enemies then, all the opposition the Church of Rome could make, and other dissenters: hopes that this may bring a small number of the Church to be a greater: 'Meeting' must import some place, but how to describe the place? either 'left to their own choice,' and that possibly may have two great a latitude, and then you cannot find them to have the Test: if 'by certificate to the sessions,' then such places as are already allowed by licence; but thinks that gives too much countenance to the Declaration.

Sir Tho. Lee. If at this day they meet at any house without Bible, or religious worship, they are not within your act: these sort of people having a design to do mischief, may meet together, and you cannot punish them: if you find them tumultuous, you need not continue the Bill, but would have the liberty with the largest.

Mr. Crouch. The question is, what place they shall have? Cambridge, the place he serves for, desires that they may not be there.

Sir Wm. Coventry, hoped Crouch did more that they might have been in Cambridge: would have them in the universities, that they may convert them.

Mr. Crouch. They will be disturbed by the youths there with disputing: would not have them there.

Colonel Strangways. Public places are, in our religion, for divine worship, that people may find them; and that no disturbance be made, and no ill doctrine preached: indulgences that were to itinerant preachers 'per totum Angliam,' those disturbed most.

It was then voted, "In such places only as by this Act shall be appointed."

It was next proposed "That the Bill continue but for one year, and from thence to the end of the next session of parliament."

Sir John Duncombe. Would have it stop at one year; you will in that time find inconvenience sufficient both to church and state.

Sir Ch. Harbord. Will you put them into a snare for a year? better let it alone totally. Let them fully in, and they will be concerned for their good behaviour, and you may do good with them.

Sir Wm. Coventry. Would not have them bear offices, nor have the benefit by not bearing offices; but would have them contribute to the charge.

Mr. Crouch, would not have them church-wardens that care not for the Church, and would let it fall: would have them not capable, but time for it.

Sir Wm. Coventry. If he does not execute his office as he should, he will fall into the bishop's hands; and his courts will handle him sufficiently. It is said 'that the bishops cannot handle them'; but you do not take the penalties off any more than in not coming to the Church, and he will have a writ de excom. capiendu, which is not by this Act voided.

Mr. Crouch. This writ will cost 3*l.* to the person that takes it out; and no sooner in the jail but let loose; and no remedy but what is worse than the disease.

Sir Tho. Lee. The ecclesiastical courts in some things have too much power, and in others too little, and the bishops usually the least: this bill has no relation to offices: and if you debate this, you must also the regulating the ecclesiastical power.

Sir John Duncombe. If you let them in to be church-wardens, or overseers of the poor, you will be sure to have all of their opinion well fed, and the rest starved.

Sir Tho. Lee. One church-warden is named by the parson, and the other by the parish, so you are sure that one will be a churchman; and as for the overseers of the poor, chosen by the parish, and allowed of at the justices monthly meeting, there is seldom any distinction in distributing the money; and if there is, the justices may remedy it.

Sir Thomas Meres reported the Heads of a Bill for the ease of Dissenters.—The following are the said Heads, as abridged from the Journal. "To subscribe to the Articles of the Doctrine of the Church of England: to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy: 'Assent and Consent' taken away: pains for meeting taken away: Teachers to subscribe and take the Oaths at quarter sessions: before two Justices of the Peace, out of sessions, to teach till next sessions, doors open: to continue for a year, and from thence to the end of the next session of parliament."

Debate on removing Papists from Public Employments. Feb. 28. Mr. Sacheverell, moves for removing all popish recusants out of military office or command.

Mr. Tho. Lee complained of divers who were got into command lately.

Sir Rob. Carr. Neither Lee, nor any man else, knows that any considerable papists are in arms: if one papist be qualified with 40 or 50 Protestants, there is no danger: if any more be, they are likely to go beyond sea, and not trouble you here.

Mr. Vaughan. Drums beat about the streets; there are many Irish popish officers; and in the coffee-houses they say 'some of us are to be hanged, when the parliament rises': when these men are once raised, we shall not know how to get them suppressed: therefore moves for a vote for an Address to the king, for removing them.

Sir Tho. Osborne. The king was pleased to have the commissions searched, and there were not 16, before these new forces were raised: he considered not their religion, but that they were soldiers and good officers: the king knew them to be good officers, but not Catholics: you will not, he hopes, expect that those of the fleet (so considerable) should be excluded the service.

Earl of Ogle.* He must chuse some Roman Catholics, or he cannot raise the king a good regiment: he must do them this justice, that many of them have been killed, and lost their estates, for the king's service: he has but two officers papists in his whole regiment, and one was put upon him: it does not become us to think of so great danger of Popery.

Sir Rob. Howard. What you are to do now, is to appoint some members to draw a Bill, to exempt them from this trust: he is no great affecter of their religion, but would not have the swords of gallant men taken from them.

Mr. Gurr-way. Has no man in particular to charge. Yet common fame makes them lavish, in saying, they are only able to serve the king: is sorry to have it said here, that we have no persons capable of service, but papists: the greater is the danger of them: we have many young gentlemen, protestants, who may learn, and in time be put in employment: the king, in his speech, has formerly thought them incapable; and therefore he does. As for facilitating the king's business, which gave this day's interruption, when the people shall see we have not forgot them in their fears of Popery, the money will be given with the better will, and their spirits quieted.

Earl of Ogle. Says he is lieutenant of Northumberland, which county is divided betwixt papists and such as have fought against the king: he is the son of a father that has fought for him, and so are they also; therefore it cannot be thought amiss to employ them.

Col. Strangways, is sorry that those of the Church of England are dead, and those alive that have not served the king: many that have served the king cannot get employment: would have lord Ogle carry those abroad that have disserved the king: let us do that which becomes prudent men: he has a kindness for their persons, but would not have power in their hands to do mischief: but will nothing satisfy them but to be in competition with you: would have none of that.

* Son of the famous marquis and duke of Newcastle, whom he succeeded in those titles in 1676, and died without issue male in 1691.

Mr. Powle, would distinguish between old and new converts: putting them in employment looks like a reward of their apostasy: lord Ogle said, 'he had but two, and one put upon him.' He is sorry they have such interest: another said, 'there were not above 15 or 16.' All agree, that amongst the new-raised men, there are many: it may be said, many have served the king: desires not the rigour of execution of the laws; but when such have arms in their hands, knows not but they may make use of them to establish their own power.

Mr. Harbord. Unless you do something more than a vote, you will be under the same power the Presbyterians were in the Long Parliament, awed by the Independents, who had arms in their hands: would have a law for it: there was great rejoicing at Rome, by the Cardinal Protector of the English, for the king's murder: and to those they durst speak their minds to they said, 'they could not prevail upon him for his religion.' Now in this he takes the liberty rather to displease his king than undo him. [The words gave offence.] He explains himself upon the Declaration, that it would undo the king and the subject.

Sir Tho. Meres. The words gave no offence; every man ought to say so, if he be persuaded in his heart 'for what is not of faith, is sin' that it will undo the king.

Sir John Dancombe takes things of this nature with as much humanity, as he would have other men do of him: Harbord knows he has great respect for him: but though the king gives us freedom of speech, yet he never heard the like before here.

Sir Tho. Osborne hopes the words were not as he apprehends them, but would have them asserted.

Col. Strangways thinks the words may be justified, and no hurt in them, take them in the true meaning.

Mr. Attorney Finch. The reason of law why we have liberty of speech, is, that whatever ill is said of us without doors, we may be censured here only for it: supposes the gentleman does sufficiently correct himself for what he has said.

Mr. Garroway desires for the sake of your member, that the words may be asserted, that the things may not be reported without doors which were not said within.

Sir John Dancombe. A man would be troubled for the very approaches of offending this house: it would grieve him to the soul to do it.

Mr. Harbord explains: not at all satisfied with the Declaration; he intended no reflection on the king, and would submit to all the severity in the world rather than be thought such a one.

Sir Tho. Meres could have wished the thing had been better worded, but the sense was good.—[So it passed over, and the debate was resumed.]

Sir Tho. Lee. If the word 'popish' be without 'suspected,' you have not one 'convicted recusant' in England.

Col. Birch. Men will be more able to pay the tax, by the clause of corn, more willing, by recalling the Declaration, and out of fear for the future, by this vote of Popery. Ireland for 50 years, in queen Eliz's time, had no rebellion in it, and good trade; but when the Papists once got into office there cheek-by-jowl with the Protestants, then they rebelled. If you put not a stop to this, all will be ineffectual: when he considers at the first Reformation in Henry viii's time, how few we were, and what a swing it had when once got in fashion,—let men apply it: a great many that took the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy rebelled: what has been done may be done: would have the king and you assured in the business, and that is all he aims at.

Sir John Dancombe. The servant that had so much forgiven him, and took his fellow servant by the throat for a small debt, such people must be looked to. Let men carry humanity about them when they run so into religion. Men that have been locked up in their own walls (as the Romish Fryars) know not how to use their tongues in company, and some are indiscreet through zeal; for zeal and love never were discreet.

Resolved, "That all persons who shall refuse to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and to receive the Sacrament according to the Rites of the Church of England, shall be incapable of all public employments, military or civil."

The King's Speech, complaining of Addresses received from the Commons.] March 1. The king came this day to the house of lords, and made a short Speech as follows:

"My lords; you know that, at the opening of this session, I spake here to your satisfaction: it hath notwithstanding bogotten a greater disquiet in the h. of commons than I could have imagined. I received an Address from them which I looked not for; I made them an Answer that ought to have contented them: but on the contrary, they have made me a reply, of such a nature, that I cannot think fit to proceed any further in this matter without your advice. I have commanded the Chancellor to acquaint you with all the transaction, wherein you will find both me and yourselves highly concerned. I am sensible for what relates to me; and I assure you, my lords I am not less so for your privileges and the honour of this house."

Debate thereon.] This Speech was taken into consideration, and both his maj. and the duke chose to continue in the house, in expectation of the event.—Of the debate which ensued, there is no regular account remaining, though it was one of the most important in our annals. Bishop Burnet has, indeed, made a shift to glean up some particulars concerning it, which he has favoured the public with, as also of the intrigue which followed; and quotes for his vouchers, the duke of York, the duke of Lauderdale, and col. Titus.—According to him, lord Clifford was the hero for the Declaration, and had not only shewed the heads of his speech to the king, but received hints from him. "He began the debate with rough words. He called the Vote of the commons 'monstrum, horrendum, ingens' and ran on in a very high strain. He said all that could be said, with great heat, and many indecent expressions. When he had done, the earl of Shaftsbury, to the amazement of the whole house, said, He must differ from the lord who spoke last oto celo. * He said, while those matters were debated out of doors, he might think with others, that the Supremacy, asserted as it was by law, did warrant the Declaration. But now that such a house of commons, so loyal and affectionate to the king, were of another mind, he submitted his reason to them: they were the king's great council: they must both advise and support him: they had done it, and would do so still, if their laws and religion were secure to them."—The bishop adds: the king was all in fury to be thus forsaken by his chancellor, and told Clifford how well he was pleased with his speech, and how highly he was offended with the other. The debate went on; and upon a division, the court had the majority. But against that Vote about 80 of the most considerable of the house protested. So the court saw, they had gained nothing in carrying on a Vote that drew after it such a protestation. The issue of all was, that, the same day, they waited upon his majesty with the following Address:

"We the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do unanimously present your sacred majesty our humble thanks, for having pleased to communicate unto us, what hath passed between your majesty and the h. of commons; whereby your maj. hath graciously offered the means of shewing our duty to your majesty, and of asserting the antient, just rights and privileges of the house of peers."

Whereunto the King returned this Answer: "My lords; I take this Address of yours very kindly, and will always be affectionate to you; and I expect that you shall stand by me, as I will always by you."

And now from this alliance offensive and defensive, between the king and lords, against the commons, what was not to be feared? No doubt, all who were acquainted with the proceedings of that day dreaded the next: and yet, instead of a storm, which was gathering over-

* "While he was speaking, the duke of York, enraged at him, whispered the king, 'What a rogue have you of a lord chancellor!' The king briskly replied, 'Cod's Fish; what a fool have you of a lord-treasurer?' The debate ended in a ruffie, and the lord Clifford narrowly escaped being sent to the Tower; and finding himself thus given up by the king, like his new opponent, he declared, 'he would serve no prince in the world who had not courage to avow his principles and support his ministers in the execution of his demands.'" Echard.

night, it produced an unexpected calm, the lords voting, "That the king's Answer to the house of commons, in referring the points now controverted to a parliamentary way, by Bill, is good and gracious; that being a good and natural course for satisfaction therein."

"To account," says Mr. Ralph, * "for this sudden and surprising reverse, we must have recourse again to hishop Burnet; for no other author pretends to be enough in the secret to say any thing to the purpose upon it. Lord Arlington possessed Colbert, the French ambassador here, with such an apprehension of the madness of violent councils; and that the least of the ill effects they might have would be, the leaving the war wholly upon the French king; and that it would be impossible to carry it on, if the king should run to such extremities, as some were driving him to at home; that he gained him both to press the king and his brother to comply with the parliament; and to send an expresse to his own master, representing the whole matter in the light in which lord Arlington had set it before him.—In the afternoon of the day, in which the matter had been agreed in the house of lords, the earls of Shaftsbury and Arlington got all those members of the h. of commons on whom they had any influence (and who had money from the king and were his spies, but had leave to vote with the party against the court, for procuring them the more credit) to go privately to him, and to tell him, that, upon lord Clifford's Speech, the house was in such fury, that probably they would have gone to some high votes and impeachments: but the lord Shaftsbury, speaking on the other side, restrained them: they believed he spoke the king's sense, as the other did the duke's: this calmed them: so they made the king apprehend, that the lord Chancellor's Speech, with which he had been so much offended, was really a great service done him: and they persuaded him farther, that he might now save himself, and obtain an indemnity for his ministers, if he would part with the Declaration, and pass the bill (for a Text). This was so dextrously managed by lord Arlington, who got a great number of the members, to go, one after another, to the king, who, by concert, spoke all the same language, that, before night, the king was quite changed, and said to his brother, That lord Clifford had undone himself, and spoilt their business, by his mad speech; and that though lord Shaftsbury had spoke like a rogue, yet that he had stopt a fury, which the indiscretion of the other had kindled to such a degree, that he could serve him no longer. He gave him leave to let him know all this. The duke was struck with all this; and imputed it wholly to lord Arlington's management. In the evening, he told lord Clifford what the king said. The lord Clifford, who was naturally a vehement man, went upon that to the king, who scarce knew how to look him in the face. Lord Clifford said, he knew how many enemies he must needs make to himself, by his Speech in the house of lords: but he hoped, that, in it, he both served and pleased the king; and was therefore the less concerned in every thing else: but he was surprized to find by the duke, that the king was now of another mind. The king was in some confusion: he owned all he said was right in itself; but he said, that he, who had sat so long in the h. of commons, should have considered better what they would bear, and what the necessity of his affairs required. Lord Clifford, in his first heat, was inclined to have laid down his staff, and to have expostulated roundly with the king: but a cooler thought stopped him. He reckoned he must now retire; and, therefore, he had a mind to take some care of his family in the way of doing it: so he restrained himself, and said he was sorry, that his best-meant services were so ill understood. Soon after this, letters came from the French king, pressing the king to do all that was necessary to procure money of the parliament; since he could not bear the charge of the war alone. He also wrote to the duke and excused the advice he gave, upon the necessity of affairs; but promised faithfully, to espouse his concerns, as soon as he got out of the war; and that he would never be easy, till he recovered that which he was now forced to let go."

Address of both Houses against the Growth of Popery.] March 7. Both houses agreed to the following Address to his majesty:

"Most gracious sovereign; We, your majesty's most loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, being very sensible of the great dangers and mischiefs that may arise within this your majesty's realm, by the increase of Popish Recusants amongst us; and considering the great resort of Priests and Jesuits into this kingdom, who daily endeavour to seduce your majesty's subjects from their religion and allegiance; and how desirous your loyal subjects are, that no Popish Recusants be admitted into employments of trust and profit, and especially into military commands over the forces now in your majesty's service; and having a tender regard to the preservation of your majesty's person, and the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom, do in all humility desire: 1. That your maj. would be pleased to issue out your royal Proclamation, to command all Priests and Jesuits (other than such as, not being natural-born subjects to your majesty, are obliged to attend upon your royal consort the queen) to depart within 30 days out of this your majesty's kingdom; and that if any Priest or Jesuit shall happen to be taken in England after the expiration of the said time, that the laws be put in due execution against them; and that your maj. would please, in the said Proclamation, to command all judges, justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, and other officers, to put the said laws in execution accordingly. 2. That your maj. would likewise be pleased, that the lord chancellor of England shall, on or before the 25th of March just, issue out commissions of Dedimus Potestatem to the Judge Advocate and Commissaries of the Musters, and such other persons as he shall think fit (not being officers commanding soldiers, to tender the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to all officers and soldiers now in your majesty's service and pay; and that such as refuse the said oaths may be immediately disbanded, and not allowed or continued in any pay or pension; and that the chancellor shall require due returns to be made thereof within some convenient time after the issuing out of the said commissions. 3. That the said Commissaries of the Musters be commanded and enjoined, by your majesty's warrant, upon the penalty of losing their places, not to permit any officer to be mustered in the service and pay of your majesty, till he shall have taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy; and received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the laws and usage of the Church of England; and that every soldier serving at land shall take the said Oaths before his first muster, and receive the Sacrament in such manner before his second muster.—And this we present in all dutifulness to your majesty's princely wisdom and consideration, as the best means for the satisfying and composing the minds of your loyal subjects; humbly desiring your maj. graciously to accept of this our petition as proceeding from hearts and affections entirely devoted to your majesty's service, and to give it your royal approbation."

The King's Speech to both Houses.] March 8. This day the king went to the house of lords, and, sending for the commons, made the following Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen; Yesterday you presented me an Address, as the best means for the satisfying and composing the minds of my subjects; to which I freely and readily agreed: and I shall take care to see it performed accordingly. I hope, on the other side, you, gentlemen of the h. of commons, will do your part; for I must put you in mind, it is near 5 weeks since I demanded a Supply; and what you voted unanimously upon it, did both give life to my affairs at home, and disheartened my enemies abroad: but the seeming delay it hath met withal since, hath made them take new courage; and they are now preparing for this next summer a greater fleet (as they say) than ever they had yet; so that, if the Supply be not very speedily dispatched, it will be altogether ineffectual; and the safety, honour, and interest of England, must of necessity be exposed. Pray lay this to heart; and let not the fears and jealousies of some draw an inevitable ruin upon us all.—My Lords and Gentlemen; If there be any Scruple remain with you concerning the Suspension of Penal Laws, I here faithfully promise you, that what hath been done in that particular shall not for the future be drawn either into consequence or example; and as I daily expect from you a bill for my Supply, so, I assure you, I shall as willingly receive and pass any other you shall offer me, that may tend to the giving you satisfaction in all your just grievances."

The King's Answer to the Address.] March 8. The lord chancellor reported, That both houses waited upon the king yesterday, and presented him with the Address against the Growth of Popery; and his maj. hath been pleased to return this Answer:

"My lords and gentlemen; I do heartily agree with you in your Address, and shall give speedy order to have it put in execution: there is one part to which I believe it is not your intention that it should extend; for I can scarce say those are in my pay that are presently to be employed abroad; but as for all the other parts, I shall take care it shall be done as you desire."

The King cancels the Declaration of Indulgence.] "There was another particular," the lord chancellor said, "he thought fit to acquaint them with; which, though it was by his majesty's leave, yet it was not by his command: however, he thought it his duty to acquaint the house with it (Mr. Secretary Coventry intending to acquaint the h. of commons with the same): That his maj. had the last night, in pursuance of what he then intended, and declared this morning, concerning the Suspension of Penal Laws not being for the future drawn either into consequence or example, caused the original Declaration under the great seal to be cancelled in his presence; whereof himself and several other lords of the council were witnesses."

All this was so satisfactory to the parliament, that both houses joined in the following vote, 'Resolved nem. con. That the humble and hearty Thanks of these houses be returned to his majesty, for his gracious full and satisfactory Answer this day given to their humble Petitions and Addresses.' This was declared to the king in the Banqueting-House, by the mouth of the lord chancellor at the head of both houses: to which his majesty made this Answer, "My lords and gentlemen, I hope there never will be any difference amongst us; I assure you there shall never be any occasion on my part."

Debate on the Bill to prevent the Growth of Popery; commonly called the Test Act.] March 12. A Bill to prevent the growth of Popery was read a third time in the house of commons.

Mr. Harwood tendered a Proviso 'for renouncing the doctrine of Transubstantiation, for a farther Test to persons bearing office.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. After Consubstantiation, now Transubstantiation. Will you not have God there? Will you exclude him?

Sir John Birkenhead. In queen Mary's time, persons were never put to swear it. Though there are distinctions of 'realiter, et verè et corporaliter,' would not have a scholastical oath: we say God is there, and the difference is de modo: great charge on the Synod of Dort, who would impose swearing controversial points: as the words are now penned, people are put to swear they know not what; and for the dangerousness thereof, would lay it aside.

Mr. Harwood has discoursed this point with able men. Doubts not, but they must make more of the bread and wine in the Sacrament, than bread and wine; what by faith is one thing, and this tends no farther.

Col. Titus thinks the thing of dangerous consequence. If this proviso is to make a Test, you have your end. They hold, that, after Consecration, the elements are turned into the body and blood of Jesus Christ; but we hold, that, after Consecration, nothing remains but bread and wine; and he would have the Proviso no more.

Sir Tho. Higgins. If you intend it as a Test, no Papist, after taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, but will swallow this. Why do not you put renouncing all the rest of the Romish points?

Sir Wm. Coventry. Higgins says, 'the Test is unnecessary, because evaded.' Has studied controversy little: if he errs in the matter, asks pardon: thinks a farther Test requisite. The Sacrament they will take, and the Oath of Allegiance, but not that of Supremacy; certain bulls forbidding them, and the Pope may dispense with his own bulls. This doctrine of Transubstantiation is part of their faith, and the Pope cannot dispense with it; therefore there is need of a farther Test, and this the Pope cannot take away: it would be ill represented abroad to refuse a better and farther Test than the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, and he would have this received.

Mr. Vaughan. The Church of England holds, that our Saviour spoke the words, 'This is my Body,' figuratively: no remembrance but of things absent: the church of Rome says, we hold Christ is mystically there; they, that Christ is as much present then, as when crucified. Cannot but hold, that Christ was but once crucified—[He reads the passage in the Common Prayer Book, of no corporal presence.]

Sir Tho. Clarges is afraid of this proviso: swearing doctrinal points will give offence to the Lutherans: the Papists say, Christ is really there after consecration; and therefore adoration. The Lutherans believe Transubstantiation, but only at the instant when delivered, and communicated: you are told, 'It is matter of faith, and the Pope cannot dispense.' If the Pope can dispense with one thing, he may do it with another. He never heard the Oath of Supremacy dispensed with: in the troops, some few years since here, few soldiers would take the Oaths of Supremacy; they would rather lose their places: in the late times there was an Oath like this Test, which many that now go to mass would take.

Mr. *Solicitor North would have no swearing: he was for the Covenant Test, as a seditious thing; but as this is no way tending to it, but only as to doctrinal points, is against such an oath.

Mr. Waller. The word, 'merely bread and wine,' in the proviso, he excepts against: believes the doctrine of the Sacraments well expressed in the 39 Articles: the thing is of great consequence, and no Clergy here present; we believe the very body, and therefore the word 'merely' is not reconcilable: would have the subscription in the very words of the Articles, which will take off the objection of swearing scholastically.

Sir Rob. Holt. Pope Pius V. offered a dispensation to the emperor Maximilian, as well as to queen Eliz.; you are to renounce all the Articles of the Council of Trent, as well as this: thinks the thing secure enough by the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, but if you will go farther, would have the bishops consulted with.

Earl of Ancram. The Lutherans opinion, as Clergys said, is not Transubstantiation; the Papists say, one body goeth, and another cometh in the place: consubstantiation, which the Lutherans hold, is grammatically 'with it,' and not 'changed into it.'

Sir Rd. Tenpole. If we so scruple the wording it here, it will be much more scrupled in the nation: in Henry VIII th's time, the five Articles were to be subscribed, under the penalty of treason: knows not that the Pope ever gave indulgence for taking the Oath of Supremacy, but believes he grants absolution after the thing is done: besides this Test, would make subscribing the 39 Articles, but pray leave these Oaths of Abjuration in matters so mystical.

Sir Eliab Harvey observes one thing in this Ease: we have been told, we have no Test upon the Papists; if there be none for the Papists, this is none for the Protestants, in the bill of Ease.

Sir John Duncombe fears it will have this effect, that some will let religion and all go, if preferment lies in the way, and so it will make men Atheists.

Sir John Birkenhead. Did ever any Church impose swearing doctrinal points? No Church, either Greek or Latin, ever did it; never was such an oath before.

Col. Strangways. Though great disputes are between us and the Papists, yet all Protestants hold against it: if once we deny our senses, we lose our senses; for every new shift of the Pope, would have another shift from us: you are now making distinction betwixt Protestant and Papist: a criterion you must have; the Pope will never dispense with doc-lord chief justice of the common pleas, and lord keeper, and, in 1683, created lord Guilford. We are told by his nephew Mr. North, "that he was not an orator, as commonly understood, that is, not a flourisher, but all his speech was fluent, easy, and familiar, and he never used a word for ornament, but for intelligence only." Life, p. 332.

trinal points; with human laws of the Church he can: thinks that this Test will puzzle all Priests and Jesuits.

The Bill with the Amendments passed; the title was, "An Act for preventing dangers that may happen by Popish Recusants."*

The Earl of Bristol's Speech in favour of the Test-Act.] March 15. When the Bill came to be debated in the house of peers, in the presence of the king himself, the earl of Bristol, though a professed Roman Catholic, unexpectedly stood up for the Bill in general, and spoke remarkably upon it; of which some account shall be given to shew the temper of the times, as well as the ingenuity of the speaker. —Towards the beginning of his speech he declared himself 'a Catholic of the Church of Rome, not a Catholic of the Court of Rome; a distinction he thought worthy of memory and reflection, whenever any severe proceedings against those they called Papists should come in question, since those of the court of Rome did only deserve that name.' Therefore he insisted, 'That they should not speak here as Roman Catholics, but as faithful members of a Protestant parliament.' Coming to the Bill itself he proceeded thus: "In the first place, my lords, I beseech you to consider, that this bill

* "The Popish party had rendered themselves formidable by their obtaining many places of honour, profit, and trust; but now a Bill was depending that would certainly throw them out of all, and secure all places to those of the Church of England alone. This was called the Test-Act, which was particularly promoted, if not invented by the earl of Shaftsbury, who resolved to strike directly at the duke of York and his friends; though the act reached all sorts of Dissenters. This bill gave a great alarm to many persons, who used all means to oppose it; but it soon passed the house of commons, whose apprehensions of Popery daily increased. By this Act, it was provided, 'That all persons bearing any office, or place of trust, or profit, should take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance in public and open Court, and should also receive the Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper, according to the usage of the Church of England, in some parish church, on some lord's day immediately after divine service and sermon, and deliver a certificate of having so received the Sacrament, under the hands of the respective minister and church-wardens, proved by two credible witnesses upon oath, and put upon record in court: and that all persons taking the said Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, should likewise make and subscribe this following Declaration: 'I, A. B. do declare, that I do believe there is not any Transubstantiation in the Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper, at, or after the Consecration thereof, by any person whatsoever.' This Act, and Test therein prescribed, has been generally accounted a great Bulwark to the Established Church of England." Echard.

for securing of general fears, is brought up to you from the house of commons, the great representative of the people, and consequently the best judges of the true temper of the nation: A house of commons surpassing all that ever have been, in the illustrious marks of their duty, loyalty and affection to the sovereign, both in his person and government; such a house of commons as his majesty ought to consider, and cherish always, with such a kind of love as is due to a wife, never to be parted with unkindly, and not as a mistress to be turned off when our turn is served by her. My Lords, this casual mention of a wife, suggests to my thoughts a pursuance of the comparison. I have observed in the course of my life, that men who have wives somewhat coquets, that is a little subject to gallantries, live easier lives with them, and freer from troublesome contentions, than those who have wives of exact rigid virtue; and the reason is clear: for the more game-some ladies being conscious of the failings in that essential part, are careful to disguise, and repair them by kind and tender compliances with their husband's humour in all other things; whereas wives severely punctual and exact in the chief matrimonial duty, expect and even exact far greater compliances from their husbands, and think themselves as it were privileged by the rigidity of their virtue to be sometimes troublesome in domestic affairs; especially if there be any jealousy in the case. In like manner, my lords, it is not to be much wondered at, if this incomparable house of commons, transcending all that ever were in the grand essentials of duty, loyalty, and affection to their king, should at sometimes be a little troublesome to him in lesser occurrences; especially when once fears and jealousies are on wing. My lords, I shall not pretend to determine whether there have been any just grounds given by any violent men, or by the unseasonable ambition of any Roman Catholics for such fears, and jealousies; it suffices to exact the necessity of a timely remedy, since they have indeed most violently seized, and distempered the minds of the major part of his majesty's Protestant subjects, which certainly no man conversant in the world can deny. Now, my lords, in popular fears and apprehensions, those usually prove most dangerous that are raised upon grounds not well understood, and may rightly be resembled to the fatal effects of panic fears in armies, where I have seldom seen great disorder arise from intelligences brought in by parties and scouts, or by advertisements to generals; but from alarms upon groundless and capricious fears of danger, taken up we know not either how, or why: This no man of moderate experience in military affairs but hath found the dangerous effects of one time or other, in giving a stop to which mischiefs the skill of great commanders is best seen. In like manner, my lords, this great and judicious assembly of the h. of commons, rightly sensible of the dangerous effects which so general a disturbance of mens minds in the concernments of Religion (how groundless soever) might produce, have applied their care to obviate them by this Bill: A bill, in my opinion, as full of moderation towards Catholicks, as of prudence, and security towards the religion of the state. In this bill, my lords, notwithstanding all the alarms of the Encrease of Popery, and Designs of Papists, here is no mention of barring them from private, and modest exercise of their religion; no banishing them to such a distance from court, no putting in execution of penal laws in force against them; all their precautions are reduced to this one intent, natural to all societies of men, of hindering a lesser opposite party from growing too strong for the greater and more considerable one: And in this just way of prevention, is not the moderation of the house of commons to be admired, that they have restrained it to this sole point, of debarring their adversaries from Offices and Places, and from accessions of wealth by favour of the sovereign? And after all, my lords, how few do these sharp trials, and Tests of this act regard? only a few such Roman Catholics as would fain hold offices, and places at the price of hypocrisy, and dissimulation of their true sentiments in religion. My lords, I am irone of those, none of those wherry men in religion, who look one way, and row another. Upon the whole matter, my lords, however the sentiments of a Catholic of the Church of Rome (I still say, not of the Court of Rome) may oblige me, upon scruple of conscience, in some particulars of this bill to give my negative to it, when it comes to passing; yet as a member of a Protestant parliament my advice prudentially cannot but go along with the main scope of it; the present circumstances of time, and affairs considered, and the necessity of composing the disturbed minds of the people."

Debate on ingrossing the Bill for the Supply.
March 15. Mr. Sec. Coventry. Hears that the Dutch call in their privateers, and will be speedily out: Remember Chatham business: Whenever the king neglects execution of the laws, he fails of his duty; and when you neglect to supply him you do not your duty; the king has done his part to the full: moves for a shorter day, for reading the ingrossed Bill.

Captain Legge* gives an account of many men deserting his ship, (the Royal Catherine) upon the rumour that the parliament would give the king no money.

* Created lord Dartmouth in 1682. He was afterwards Master of the Horse to James II, Governor of the Tower, &c. and at the time of the Revolution, he was Admiral and Commander in Chief of the English fleet, which was detained in the Thames by the same wind that brought the Prince of Orange over. In 1691, he was committed to the Tower, where he died of an apoplexy, three months after. Burnet says, "He was one of the worthiest men of king James's court. He loved him, and had been long in his service and in his confidence: But he was much against all the conduct of his affairs; yet he resolved to stick to him at all hazards." † Echard.

Sir Tho. Meres. There was such a time as seamen's deserting us, (within a fortnight) and then there was reason for it; but now, blessed be God! the reason is removed: The motion is good, in relation to the king's affairs: Remembers with what unanimous consent the money was given, intended for his best service; and remembers then who moved for it. The bill may have its due execution, within its time, if delayed a little: As to the affairs of this house, businesses cannot go fairly up to the lords house, now upon our hands: As to the lords, he denies not but things do yet go fairly on. Would not have this bill sent up to hinder them, to make the parenthesis in a business there to interrupt them; he offers the lords leisure, but imposes nothing on them: If any man would have the Money Bill pass in the lords house the next week, concludes that the rest of the bills cannot go with this.

Sir Tho. Osborne, is sorry to hear a day named so far off, you hear the approach of the Holland fleet: and is sorry to have occasion so often to tell you of the backwardness of ours.

Mr. Vaughan. The giving this Bill so speedily out of our hands may call us a kind and bountiful parliament, but never a wise one: The not passing the other bill will expose us to right of conquest again: A greater matter than any thing else: When the king has hearts, he has purses also, and can never want seamen: 'There is that scatters and yet increases; and there is that with-holdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty.'

Sir Rob. Howard. After Chatham business, the king had a greater opportunity to impose than he has now: It looks hard, that after the king has granted so much, you should be jealous: the king has not left any thing to do to us; and must we stop Supply, because other persons (the lords) have not done what you would have them? This bill cannot be ingrossed suddenly: It would look ugly in any man to do it: no man can write the Bill fairly till Tuesday: hopes the thing will be as full of good intentions as ever; but that those intentions, with delay, will be defeated.

Mr. Garroway, hopes in time we shall have an answer from the king, as to the impositions; and possibly some persons, that advised that with the Declaration, may have apprehensions upon them: he forgives them and prays God that he would: hopes for a general pardon, that they may have the benefit of it.

Mr. Powle, conceives it the right of parliament not to enter into debates, so much as of Supply, till redress of grievances; and it seems a tacit obligation upon the king, to redress the grievances, because it smooths the way the better for money: no man can think that we have no more grievances than already complained of: would not delay the bill till all the grievances be redressed, but would till they are stated to the king: sees by authority, a printed paper of imposition on commodities, not imposed by act of parliament: It is said, 'that, by stopping the bill, we shall put a violence on the lords;' but we put none upon them: if this issue with them answers not our ends, we may think of something else: all arguments he hears spoken of, for the hastening this bill, are the tragical fates of necessity; but still asks, Who occasioned this necessity: when it might have been prevented by the parliament's being called in Oct. last; and thinks them guilty of a great crime that were the authors of the advice of prolonging it till now; and hopes to have that, and some other grievances, redressed; your clerk, he hears, sat up all night to ingross part of the Money Bill, and it cannot be retarded by a few days.

Mr. Thomas. We have exposed the person of the king, by answering our grievances of Popery; and thinks the king not safe without removing some persons; and names lord Arundel of Wardour, col. Rd. Talbot, and father Patrick.

Sir John Duncombe, is much surprized at the motions he has heard to day; very unreasonable, and untimely brought forth: no prince ever made such an answer as the king has made; he has done what lies in him: is sorry to see still new clouds rise: nothing is gone from you yet, but the Bill of Popery, and the first moment read in the house of lords, and they are now sitting upon it: why is this? He never heard a question, that after this bill is perfected, it should not be ingrossed: your fears are taken away; if ingrossed, you may stop it still. Is ashamed to tell you of the lowness of the exchequer*; but those arguments are stopped by money: appeals to gentlemen concerned in the revenue and navy-office, if things are not at a stop for want of money: the thing is not graceful, it has not a good countenance; it is so methodical, so easy and decent, the question for ingrossing, that he wonders any man can press against it: no man can take any thing from us: the bill, after being ingrossed, may lie upon the table, and you may call for it as you shall see occasion.

Col. Strangways. Consider the nature of the thing; we owe the removal of our jealousies to the king, who has graciously done it: was it not a great point, the redressing our laws, when attempted to be destroyed at one blow? every man knows, that these Money Bills are ingrossed to your hands: when we follow the steps of our ancestors, we shall do as wise things as they did. 'Let the Bill be ingrossed, and lie upon your table,' say some; but what calling will there be for it then? fears nothing but surprizes: would not force the lords, but would have them pressed by some arguments we use here: is for Friday.

Sir Tho. Lee. If one great and extraordinary grievance be, and that redressed, shall that be an argument for the king to redress us no more? When no more grievances are mentioned, it will be thought we have no more: ~~not to~~ mention other things, besides that of Ireland, the great growth of Popery, and our neighbour's house on fire: hopes that persons concerned will acquaint you with it farther. He loves his ease in the country, and would be there, but would not have the king ignorant of many things: with that of the Order of Council imposing a rate upon coals: hopes, in due time, to have a redress of these things and others.

Col. Birch. Is far from thinking that the king has the least jealousy of the Money Bill, but that we intend his honour and safety, any thing of great or rich he has came from us; when we could not tell who was master when we came hither, thanks God we know now, and hopes no more clouds will be stirring. Impositions against law, the people pressed, and that of Ireland, and should be loth that if any thing farther should be offered of grievances, any man should say, Why have you left these things unrepresented, and the king so gracious, in granting what you have asked? Bills are much more slippery in parchment than in paper: what he moves, is for the king's honour and safety: was the enemy here now, would say nothing of it; but why were we not here in Oct. last? No man can say there has been the least backwardness in this parliament: would have the paper Bill lie on the table till Friday.

Sir Trevor Williams. What he has heard makes his heart bleed; and therefore moves for Monday, to consider redress of Grievances.

Sir Edw. Dering. We all tend to the same end, and let us go the same way: after Friday but a few days to Easter: the Bill of Supply will take up a whole day reading, and some unforeseen delays may stop it: therefore moves for Friday.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The clerk is ingrossing the Bill without order; and you were told another shrewd thing, that a great deal of the Bill was slipped in the ingrossing: would not have any thing doubted hereafter; you are judges of it here, and others, when you have done: would have what is written already, cancelled, and not brought to you.

Mr. Waller. Ingrossing without order! It may be copied in parchment for some gentleman's use, as well as in paper; sometimes we were in such great haste, that the Act of Oblivion, in its confirmation, was not read at all: when a question has been of not putting the question now, has known that question never put at all: if that question should be now, no man can speak to the ingrossing the bill afterwards: are not necessity and speed acknowledged by the house? Are not our grievances redressed, and have not our forefathers taken care to keep Papists out of authority, and we greater? In the late times, this house had a passionate suspicion, and we would have removed Papists, and it was afterwards, by that passion, done much worse; 'never was doubt of a Bill once voted but passed,' it is said; but we may remember, but last session, that a dispute with the lords about heightening and lowering rates, damned our bill of foreign commodities*; our Votes since have lost their credit: is against Popery, and we have both leges et mores against them, law and inclination of the people against them: will you neither trust them, the king, nor God, but trust an enemy in retarding this bill? Would you have them come out to sea, before our Act comes out in print! If you find out a way, there will be 'viam inveniam aut faciam' necessity stamps all things with a face of justice: would have Friday ordered for ingrossing the bill.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Sir Henry Vane was the first that ever proposed putting a question, "whether the Question should be now put," and since, it has been always the forerunner of putting the thing in question quite out: therefore would not have that question put now.

Sir Wm. Coventry. There is great difference between, 'whether the Question shall be put,' and 'now put.' It is no new thing to put that question in point of adjournment; and if it passed in the negative, it never was, but that the house was afterwards adjourned.

Mr. Garraway. It is certainly agreed by us all, that that question of the Bill shall be put; though the question of the day be as is proposed.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. Can any man tell that the Hollauders are not strong enough to come out, or that they, by their confederates, may not invade us? An enemy that can invade us and will not, no man can say: when you shall give it, and the enemy come and gather it, you will put the king upon his necessity: the shew-bread was eaten by David; it was not forbid, but told us for precedent.

Col. Strangways is sorry to hear of these necessities: bring us the men that have been the occasion of these necessities, and he will tell you what to say to them: he that does the necessity is not the judge of it: was not 'salus populi periclitatur' the occasion the Ship-Money was called for? Knows not what belongs to these little bye tricks: great necessity is to be argued in the lords house, not here: those arguments, if used, let them be there; let us hear no more of these arguments; and let us not be reproached with these arguments of necessity, that were not the occasion of it; but let them be laid on persons that occasioned it.

Mr. Garraway. If those gentlemen will join issue on the argument of necessity, let the causers of it be accountable for it.

Mr. Secretary Coventry is not afraid of our's, nor any man's hearing what counsel he gave the king: desires that whoever is faulty, be it any man, he may answer it: when a man has been debauched by another, and falls into a distemper, your first business is to cure the man, and then blame him that debauched him: if there be such men, that have been the occasion of this advice, let them answer it.

Sir Tho. Merca. This thing of 'necessity' was an ill argument at first, and would not have Waller (who proffered to speak again) speak twice to it, to inflame it more.

The Speaker. No man can find any precedent of sir Henry Vane's Question: by that question we can never come to an end of any business: the question in being may be the next day put, and so you usher in an impossibility of bringing things to a period.

Sir Rob. Howard. This Question is like the image of the inventor, a perpetual disturbance.

Mr. Garroway. If you can find out an expedient, that may carry off the heat, is for it.

Col. Titus. Some gentlemen believe the bill already ingrossed; if so, it is more haste than could be wished: the desire of some is to get a competent time to get grievances redressed; others, that the necessity of the king and kingdom require a dispatch: a competent time is agreed on both sides; he thinks Friday so; and then to bring in our Grievances remaining.

Sir Tho. Osborne would know the cause why the rest of our grievances are not alledged: as for the Declaration and Religion, he appeals, whether, when there was a stop of the Money bill, those two things were not the cause then: all that the king could do, he has done: does believe that by Friday we shall have an Answer from the lords: it is necessary, either in this house or out of it, for subjects to give the king time, and a right representation of things: should be sorry that any of the privy counsellors endeavours should be so blasted in this house, that they do not their part, till the king give you farther cause to apprehend so: there needs no jealousy on our parts now: how shall we have assurance, that the king has satisfaction in our intentions? Why should not the marks from this house be undeniable? If this be your case, then to put a question that has dangerous construction in it: Is not for putting it.

Mr. Vaughan. The king has no fault, the law says he has none, and hopes that none say so in this house. Grievances have come before Supply, in right course of parliament, if now they come after, it is an example of great affection, and in few parliaments: if we are content to part with that right, and let it be for the present overlooked, hopes it shall not for the future be urged as a precedent.

Ordered, "That the Money Bill be ingrossed, and brought in on Friday."

Sir John Duncombe. Is against all the Bill:

as far as it is for Union, is for it, and the bringing men into the Church: as to 'assent and consent,' would have it taken away; but that will give men an impunity for not coming to Church; they will never come to Church: offers it to consideration, whether mankind will not generally live after this law: the parliament have overcome themselves, and they make this law 'for a year and to the end of the next session of parliament:' if you should read over and examine your reasons to the king formerly, against Toleration, they would fly upon you: you have provided against Popery, and this is a great party; ambitious men will rise with them, and will support them to your posterity: what will the young men say at the Universities? 'Let us turn our parts to preach sedition and new lights, and return to the Church, as to an hospital, when we are old; which, by subscription, they may get into. No preferment in dull logic.' This will be the effect; they will support one another by marriages and interests; it will be past your power to revoke it with all the interest you have: you are to have an eye over them, and watch them: dreads the consequence of this part of the bill: it will work upon all your concerns and interests: leaves it to God and you.

Sir John Bramstone supposes you would have every man to be of some religion, and to be master of his servants; and have the teacher and his congregation deliver their names to the parson of the parish.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. You are not making a bill to destroy the Church, he hopes: you are not only doing a new thing in the kingdom, but in all the world: here are no limitations in it to churches, no limitations to congregations; it has been no where so, wherever he has been: it is said, 'they are the wiser and richer part of the nation;' the more is the danger. You do a thing never tried before, and you put it out of your power to remedy the inconveniences of it: they, in intermission of parliament, may put the kingdom in an uproar, and in great danger, before you can provide any remedy by parliament.

Sir Ch. Harbord. The severity of the Churchmen has driven 80 families out of town; that has done us irreparable hurt in our manufactures of wool: since the Declaration they have met Pompi Gratia, and yet reduced from two to one; restrain them, and you increase them: a bishop, in the northern parts, has told him, that, since the Declaration, many have come into the Church; this Bill is for that end.—The Bill was ordered to be ingrossed.

March 19. The Bill was read a third time. Mr. Waller said, Usury, during the time of Popery, was unlawful, as supposed to be against the law of God. We know not the will of God, but by his two Books, the law of God and the law of nature: a man gives away all he has, for his liberty, to summa potestas: he may do, and take what he will from his body, but his mind cannot be given or taken; he may command me not to speak my mind, and not to do my mind, and, in a word, to be hypocritical: though this be a violence in general, it will be a violence but upon a few: in the inquisition of Spain, a few shall suffer rather than many. Tacitus calls it 'a good government for a man to do what he will, and speak what he thinks.' Restraint is against the genius and whole complexion of the nation: let these Dissenters alone, and people will despise them; punish them, and the people will have compassion for them: the quakers suffered bravely, and were the more esteemed; the persecuted party ever gets uppermost: in queen Mary's time those of the reformed religion were persecuted, and they soon got uppermost. In queen Eliz.'s time, in our times, 'Prelacy and Popery' were coupled together, and people flocked to Mr. Guaming's congregation: neither sons of cavaliers nor cavaliers were admitted into the Convention, and yet they brought in the king, because that was then the persecuted party: if you believe the king, this liberty has kept peace, and you have had proof of it: this Bill is according to the law of God, law of nations, and complexion of the nation, and he would pass it.

Sir John Duncombe. Appeals, if ever any thing in England of persecution to Dissenters: Waller had liberty in his own house, and his friends, by former acts: nothing now persecuted but Popery, and therefore, by his argument, popery must thrive and be uppermost: this Bill is quite different from the law of God: where are the persons that must visit these congregations, and examine and inspect what doctrine they teach? This is not according to the law of God; smiths, shoemakers, and cobblers preach. If this be according to the law of God, he must read the Bible again: would have gentlemen tell him, that are so much for this Bill in what part of the world the Church has no power to enquire what men preach? By this consequence, you will leave them to say what they will: law after law, reason after reason; has been against them these 12 years, and is against the Bill now.

Sir C. Harbord. Josephus, notoriously known, tells us, 'that the two sects of the Jews, the Sadducees and the Pharisees, held, the one spirits, and the other no spirits, nothing more contrary; but they never divided, they were all united as to the public government'—A book, lately published, "Of the Rise and Progress of the Netherlands," tells you, that mighty things have been done there by what you intend in this act; the severity of Spain, and their Plantations, have ruined them, and will us, if we look not to it: in our maritime towns we have not the sixth part of the people: the populous places of Brabant, by this persecution, have been dispeopled, and Holland has got sufficiently by it, and so did we: he confesses that he has communicated with them in Holland, and will do it again: he has had as good advice, and as learned upon it, as any man can give him, which held it lawful: hopes this people that have ease by the bill will occasion you to continue it.

Sir Philip Warwick. You have the genius of the nation, God, and the complexion of the people, spoken to: as to the genius of the nation, till Popery made us all afraid, he has endeavoured to make the foundation of the Church so full as to abide a good superstructure: look upon the Jewish story of the sects, and they were never there till the time of captivity, and never here till our Rebellion, till the Temple was shaken. Morality is not so planted in man, but that customs and constitutions destroy all that; Cain and Abel owed duty to Adam—Libera mens overthrows all Christianity. Christians at first were but a body of men, and they planted the Church, and Excommunication in the Church; and he was no Christian that was out of it: never were men, by nature, either Jews or Christians. By this liberty you will lose all Registers, Marriages, and Genealogies. Let not great words make a noise; you give them liberty, and not barely indemnity: he is perfectly against the bill.

Col. Birch doubts not but the people will be sheep, quiet and peaceable; and had it been only to mark them in the forehead, he is not against it: doubts not but in a short time we shall see that the enforcing laws upon these people, and crying out against the infallibility of the Pope, are not consistent: you would not have the Papists govern you, and that is not a persecution of them.

Dr. Burwell. They grow numerous: if you pass this act, you give away the peace of the nation: a Puritan was ever a rebel; begin with Calvin: these Dissenters made up the whole army against the king; the destruction of the Church was then aimed at: pray God it be not so now!

Sir John Birkenhead. There was not a Pharisee till the fall of the Persian monarchy; the dispensations then were to the Proselytes of the Gate, viz. Strangers; that is the true case of the Jews: subscription of the Clergy is 'omnibus his articulis'; by this Subscription in the Bill, they will have 26 of the 39 Articles left out, subscribing only the doctrines; you have not in the Creed ten Articles of it, nor ever thought so. Had you a list of these men you ease, the king might have apprized you of some; now you will have preachers that have had their hands in his father's blood: here are 2000 of these preachers already, and there may be 10,000 more: shall the old officers of the army count numbers and know persons? They may come like Venner, the Fifth Monarchy-man, with their arms.*

Sir Rob. Howard. Will not trouble you with the rabbinical law, nor history; but offers to consider, that one time you were against this, and now are changed, thinking it more fitted and calculated for the nation: the parliament must do something at all times: they are not such enemies as is said; the Act of Oblivion has made a grave for that: will you now crush the expectation of the nation in this thing? Thoughts are active in mens minds, when they have hope for something: should have thought of making the king's Declaration a law for a time; but that being not to be done, will you not compose people's minds at home, when all abroad is in distraction? If this bill be too much, or too little; if matters be too short in it you may lengthen them; if inconvenient, you may alter them; you will leave, by laying the Bill aside, as much disorder in the imaginations of the people, as in the thing itself; therefore would pass the bill.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. In the main, we may fling out this Bill, or keep it, and not offend the law of God: there is some inconvenience as to toleration; indifferent without limit: does think the honour of the house engaged by voting and acting he hopes it may be mended in the lords house, and with that hope sends it up.—The Bill was then passed.

Debate on the Bill of Supply.] March 21. The Bill of Supply was brought in, ingrossed, and laid on the table.

Mr. Garroway desires that the Money-Bill may not be read till Tuesday next, because you have the Bill of Popery, with Amendments,* returned from the lords, where he hears we have been strangely represented: we are all concerned to see this Bill of Popery dispatched, and to clear the reputation of this house: therefore would have the Money-Bill for the present, laid aside.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. It is very reasonable that the fears and jealousies of Popery should be removed, but would not defer the Tax-Bill so long: would go upon the Bill of Popery today, and would not have the king think we take any thing ill from him, who has promoted this Bill so much in the house of lords, by his countenancing it.

Sir John Coventry hopes in time we may make this Bill of Popery a good one: this bill has had hard passage hither again: if we believe common fame, it nearly miscarried in the lords house: many more Grievances may come betwixt this and Tuesday, and would have that day for the Tax-Bill.

Sir Tho. Osborne. 'Common fame' came never from nobody, but by somebody; the gentleman ought to tell you by whom it came: we cannot take notice of what is done in the lords house.

Mr. Powle hopes that our zeal for this Bill is not looked upon as an offence to the king, but acceptable to him.—'Common fame!' No man can nominate on the sudden, who—This discourse cannot be without some fire; in time it may come out, and those gentlemen will tell you, when they can, where they had it: moves for Tuesday, and hopes no ill intentions can be made out of it.

* It was returned from the lords, with some Amendments and Provisos, a little before this debate.

Sir John Duncombe would have you look at the end you would be at: go upon this Bill from the lords; you are master of your Orders: go and ask satisfaction of the king for your Grievances, and he is sure you will have it.

Sir Rob. Carr finds no difference among gentlemen in the thing. 'Till we read the Amendments the lords have sent down, we cannot tell whether satisfactory or not; we may possibly agree at a conference. Why will you do things that may look like dislike, when it is not? Would not have a blemish on the Supply; do the one and not the other.

Col. Birch hears much said of 'common fame': it seems to be now the lord keeper, bishop Williams's case, in 1614, or 1616—'common fame from the house of lords!' Would go with safe steps for the king and kingdom; one thing is before you, that the king may not think we stop his business: would have this Tax Bill for Tuesday, and hopes by that time we shall give such advice, as may secure the king and kingdom: stands up to remind you that this is a parliamentary way of 'common fame.'

Sir Courtney Poole thinks we are upon such a point that we have reason to think it will startle the king: 'Common fame' is not a right way for the lords or the king, therefore would not insist upon it.

Sir Tho. Meres tells the Speaker that he turns the question to another thing: he would have the question for the Bill of Popery, and the other question, for Tuesday, firsted and seconded: demands whether he will be pleased to own that to be the question; and demands whether he can deny that that question was firsted, seconded and thirded?

Mr. Cheney. There has been something on your hands these two or three days, which is to be ready with the Tax, 'the Grievances' would not put a certain day for the Tax, and doubts not of redress of Grievances in due time.

Mr. Powle gives an account of the 'Address about Grievances,' which cannot be finished till the committee can see the inspection into the affairs of Ireland, the secretary not having been attended, and could not be dispatched—This is not for the service of the king, his satisfaction, and good of the nation, and therefore we cannot in conscience part with the Money-Bill, till that business of Ireland be determined; but he has reason to take hold of things of 'common fame,' when some great officers have told the king, 'that, if the Money Bill passed not, the king may be supplied otherwise.'

Lord Covendish thinks those Bills now depending, to quiet the minds of the king's subjects, as necessary as any whatsoever: there are Grievances of an high nature, besides what are already depending; some are the root of all those grievances, the authors of these disturbances, and those are evil counsellors: because other grievances are not named, hopes people will not think there are not more, therefore moves for Thursday for 'Grievancies.'

Lord St. John. Should 'common fame' have weight, you would have much to do; therefore would lay it aside: as to the Bill of Popery before you, he has so great love and tenderness for the king's person, that without this bill, neither the king nor we can be safe: would have a little time to consider these things, and would have Tuesday.

Sir Rob. Howard. Are you afraid of any trick being put by the Money Bill? You are masters of every day, and of what is fit to be done.

Sir Tho. Meres. Does any body imagine no other business but this Bill? If there was none, it could not be before Monday: would have this debate on Monday.

The Debate was adjourned to Monday by consent.

The King's Message respecting a Recess. March 24. Mr. Secretary Coventry delivered the following Message from the king:

"C. R. I am commanded by his majesty, in pursuance of his late Message, to acquaint you that his majesty intends you shall rise before Easter, and therefore expects an expedition of such Bills as are of most importance; the bill of Popery, and that of Supply particularly: and for such other bills as concern either the public or particular, and cannot be so soon ready, that they may not receive a disappointment, his maj. resolves to make this an Adjournment till the beginning of Oct. when you may continue their prosecution; in the mean time his maj. will take such care of the Protestant Religion, that you shall have no cause to complain."

Debate on the Bill of General Naturalization. March 24. The Bill of General Naturalization was read a second time.

Sir Rd. Ford. This bill exposes the great immunities of Corporations to be prostituted.

Mr Sec. Coventry supposes you do not intend, by this Bill, that every gentleman shall set up what trade he pleases when he comes over: it is said, that Papists may come in by this bill; you may, to prevent that, put in 'transubstantiation' for a Test: the king has been at great charge this war: it was looked upon, at the beginning of the war, to invite the Dutch; and should this bill be thrown out, you will discourage them here and send them to the French: he shall not by this bill be entertained in a town as a poor man: a Hollander told him, 'if we were certain of a peace, he could bring over 4000 men, much to the advantage of your cloth and other manufactures trade.'

Sir George Downing. Most of our manufactures came from Holland: he is against their being freemen in corporations: if a native must come through the difficulties of 7 years apprenticeship, would not have a town filled with foreigners: but to trades you want would give them encouragements by freedoms; as packers of fish, gold and silver-workers, dyers and copper-makers, and would have such reserved from the penalties of 1 Eliz. of being indicted for not serving 7 years to a trade: many Hollanders get themselves naturalized, or denisoned, and trade here all summer, and then in winter go to Amsterdam, with what they get here: would have great care taken of that in the bill.

Mr. Boscawon. They that come in will be merchants and monied men, who will be willing to get an Act for naturalization: you have more merchants already than you have trade; you want them not for more shop-keepers: you have so many natives, they eat out one another: for artisans, they may be useful to you; the greatest want of all is of them, and would have the bill for the encouragement of them.

Sir John Duncombe thinks it a good bill, but to be committed, with care to be taken, if, after naturalization and the oaths, they go not away back from you, and stay neither here, nor in the Plantations: would have them taken care for to stay; if they go away, to lose their naturalization.

Sir Lancelot Lake. Anciently, in matters of great weight, we went home to our country to advise with them: he would have that now done.

Mr. Attorney Finch. Before commitment of the bill, would well consider, whether possibly a good bill may come out of this: naturalization makes any man equal in privilege to original birth, in the kingdom of England: it is not here as in the Roman state, when admitted a long time to the first degree, and some good distance of time before they were capable of offices: you at one blow beget so many foreigners to be Englishmen: this Bill admits any Protestant born under any prince or potentate; in this you make all the world merchants of England; you grow an opulent nation; that supplies your industry and luxury: lead, wool, and tin, you give them an opportunity to export: by this bill, all your Turkey trade is destroyed in a moment: he that brings salt, is immediately entitled, by that little commodity, to trade and export your commodity; he may live cheaper than you, and crumple with the French consul in Turkey, and you shall be but factors, and stay at home: wonders that now we are naturalizing all the world, no part of the world naturalizes us: you aliens every where, and they naturalized here: if once they are at home here, where will he the distinction between the English and Dutch manufacture? Your lead, wool, and tin, are your Indies; no imposition upon them to stay here with a family; not one line to fix them, neither Oaths nor Tests: it makes their natural subjects, and, unless you otherwise provide, free of Corporations: your ancestors, in queen Elizabeth's time, knew two-thirds of England destroyed by the plague, and yet they had no thoughts of naturalization: you will find them suck your blood: they destroy common and statute law: you make them gentry and nobility: you bring people not to make you rich, but to starve the poor: how comes it to pass, that you think fit now to change your government, and all your municipal laws, and all at the charge of your estates and understandings? would' have many years to consider of this bill.

Col. Birch. It is not fully expressed, but intended, in the bill, that they should reside here: that which he admires, is, that many Turkey merchants are in the house, and they say nothing in this business; they cannot speak so well as the attorney; but he would take it ill, if they should speak in his trade as he does in theirs: we had all our arms first from Germany; and fustians and silks all came from abroad, ninety parts out of an hundred: but if we must stick to our forefathers opinion, he is outdone: if the Scriptures be true, that 'a multitude of subjects is the glory of a king,' this is a good bill.

Mr. Waller spoke to their coming in poor upon our poor. King James desired an union with Scotland; the parliament denied him nothing, but granted him not that; but the lawyers found out a way of the post nati: they are an alterius nos: there was no danger then; now they must either come in with stocks, or go to the house of correction: we have had plague and war, and civil war, and have peopled Ireland with 100,000 souls: 40s. a year, when he was a boy, was a good servant's wages; now in Buckinghamshire, 8l. a year, and are forced to send 30 miles for reapers, and fellers of wood: we labour under a paucity of people certainly: no man was ever denied naturalization here, paying his fees: that which was said by the Ancients, of the 'vivacity of youth and wisdom of age,' [complimenting the Speaker] is in you; you want not the Fees of Naturalization bills in your fortunes, and would have a mark of honour upon you, whilst you are Speaker, for doing it.*

Mr. Vaughan remembers not the reason of the post nati, but thinks it because under our allegiance: is against reading the bill again; the most destructive thing in the world to your interest and government.

The Bill was committed, in the afternoon, 208 to 61.

The Commons' Address on Grievances in Ireland.] March 25, p. m. Mr. Powle reported from the Committee the Address to the King concerning the Irish Grievances, which was agreed to, and is as follows:

"We your majesty's most loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, taking into consideration the great calamities which have formerly befallen your majesty's kingdom of Ireland, from the Popish Recusants there, who, for the most part, are

* "Alluding to the Speaker's giving all his Fees of private Bills to the Poor of St. Giles's parish, in which he lived." Grey.

professed enemies to the Protestant religion and the English interest; and how they, making ill use of your majesty's gracious disposition and clemency, are, at this time, grown more insolent and presumptuous than formerly, to the apparent danger of that kingdom and your majesty's Protestant subjects there; the consequence whereof may likewise prove very fatal to this your kingdom of England, if not timely prevented; and having seriously weighed what remedies may be most properly applied to these growing distempers, do, in all humility, present your majesty with these our Petitions:—That, for establishing and quieting the possessions of your majesty's subjects in that kingdom, your maj. would be pleased to maintain the Act of Settlement, and the explanatory Act thereupon; and to recall the Commission of Enquiry into Irish affairs, bearing date the 17th of Jan. last, as containing many new and extraordinary powers, not only to the prejudice of particular persons, whose estates and titles are thereby made liable to be questioned, but in a manner to the overthrow of the said Acts of Settlement; and, if pursued, may be the occasion of great charge and attendance to many of your subjects in Ireland, and shake the peace and security of the whole kingdom:—That your maj. would give order, that no Papist be either continued or admitted to be a Commander or Soldier in that kingdom; and, because the Irish Papists have furnished themselves with great quantities of arms, that your maj. would please to give directions so to disarm them, that they may not be dangerous to the government there, and that their arms be brought into the public magazines:—That the like order may be given, that no Papist be either continued, or hereafter admitted to be judges, justices of the peace, sheriffs, coroners, mayors, sovereigns, or portreves in that kingdom:—That the titular popish bishops, vicars-general, abbots, and all others exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, by the Pope's authority, and, in particular, Peter Talbot, pretended abp. of Dublin, for his notorious disloyalty to your majesty, and disobedience and contempt of your laws, may be commanded, by proclamation, forthwith to depart out of Ireland, and all other your majesty's dominions, or otherwise to be prosecuted according to law; and that all convents, seminaries, and public Popish schools, may be dissolved and suppressed, and the regular priests commanded to depart, under the like penalty:—That no Irish Papists be admitted to inhabit in any corporation of that kingdom, unless duly licensed, according to the aforesaid Acts of Settlement; and that your maj. would be pleased to recall your Letters of the 26th of Feb. 1671, and your Proclamation thereupon, whereby general licence is given to such Papists to inhabit in Corporations there.—That your majesty's Letter of the 28th of Sept. 1672, and the Order of Council thereupon, whereby your majesty's subjects are required not to prosecute any actions against the Irish, for any wrongs or injuries committed during the late Rebellion, may likewise be recalled.—That col. R. Talbot, who hath notoriously assumed to himself the title of Agent of the Roman Catholics in Ireland, be immediately dismissed out of all command, either civil or military, and forbid an access to your majesty's court.—That your maj. would be pleased, from time to time, out of your princely wisdom, to give such farther orders and directions to your lord lieutenant, or other chief governor of Ireland for the time being, as may best conduce to the encouragement of the English Planters, and Protestant interest there, and the suppression of the insolencies and disorders of the Irish Papists.—These our humble Desires we present to your majesty, as the best means to preserve the peace and safety of that your kingdom, which hath been so much of late endangered by the practices of the said Irish Papists, and, particularly, of the said Rd. and Peter Talbot; and we doubt not but your maj. will find the happy effects thereof, to the great satisfaction and security of your majesty's person and government, which, of all earthly things, is most dear to us, your majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects."

The Commons Address on Grievances in England.] Mr. Powle also reported the following Address to the King, about Grievances in England; which was also agreed to:

"We your majesty's most loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, conceiving ourselves bound in necessary duty to your majesty, and in discharge of the trust reposed in us, truly to inform your maj. of the estate of this your kingdom; and, though we are abundantly satisfied, that it hath always been your royal will and pleasure, that your subjects should be governed according to the laws and customs of this realm; yet finding, that, contrary to your majesty's gracious intentions, some Grievances and abuses are crept in; we crave leave humbly to represent to your majesty's knowledge, and to desire,—That the imposition of 12d. per chaldron upon coals, for the providing of convoys, by virtue of an Order of Council, dated the 15th of May, 1672, may be recalled, and all bonds, taken by virtue thereof, cancelled.—That your majesty's Proclamation of the 4th of Dec. 1672, for prevention of disorders which may be committed by soldiers; and whereby the soldiers, now in your majesty's service, are, in a manner, exempted from the ordinary course of justice, may likewise be recalled. And whereas great complaints have been made, out of several parts of this kingdom, of divers abuses committed in quartering of soldiers, That your maj. would be pleased to give order to redress those abuses, and, in particular, that no soldiers be hereafter quartered upon any private houses; and that due satisfaction may be given to the innkeepers and victuallers where they lie, before they remove. And, since the continuance of soldiers in this realm will necessarily produce many inconveniences to your majesty's subjects, we do humbly present it, as our Petition and Advice, that, when this present war is ended, all the soldiers which have been raised since the last session of parliament may be disbanded.—That your maj. would likewise be pleased to consider of the irregularities and abuses of pressing soldiers, and to give order for the prevention thereof for the future. And although it hath been the course of former parliaments to desire redress in their Grievances, before they proceeded to give a Supply, yet we have so full assurance of your majesty's tenderness and compassion towards your people, that we humbly prostrate ourselves at your majesty's feet with these our Petitions; desiring your majesty to take them into your princely consideration, and to give such order for relief of the subjects, and the removing these pressures, as shall seem best to your royal wisdom*."

Resolved, "That the Addresses be presented to his majesty; and that those members of the council that are of the house, be desired to know his majesty's pleasure, when this house shall attend him with the Addresses concerning Grievances."

The King's Answer.] March 26. His majesty's Answer to the Address of Grievances, was reported by the Speaker:

"That he observed the Address did consist of many different parts; and therefore it could not be expected there should be a present Answer; but for the several particular things contained in it, he would, before the next meeting, take such care, that no man should have reason to complain."

Ordered, "That the Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, for the often accesses they have been admitted to his majesty's person, and for his most gracious Answer to the several Addresses of this house; and,

* "It is worthy observation, that the grand points of 'the irregular Writs,' 'the War,' 'the Alliance with France;' and 'the shutting up of the Exchequer instead of applying for the advice and assistance of parliament,' are not so much as mentioned in this Address: and that in the introduction to these articles are many tender expressions. Now, supposing it was necessary, for decency's sake, to presume, that the king was ignorant of measures transacted in his own name, and well disposed to govern as he ought, it could not be presumed that these measures had no author nor adviser; and that these abuses and grievances had crept in by chance: notwithstanding which, instead of tracing the evil to its source, and making a wholesome example of the wicked ministers, who had so notoriously misled his majesty, and aggrieved and endangered his people, they suffered 'An Act of Grace,' (which was so worded, as to contain an absolute pardon of every offence against the state before the 25th of March, 1673) to be brought in, and passed; which put them out of the reach of justice for ever." Ralph.

particularly, for his last gracious Message, and, for the care he hath declared he will take of the Protestant Religion."

Debate on printing the Addresses on Grievances.] March 29. Mr. Thomas moved to have the Addresses concerning Grievances, and the king's Answer, printed.

Sir John Mallet. Divers Grievances have been by soldiers since the Address, and it is fit the people should have notice of it.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. You will show your complaints to the king of Grievances, but not his Answer, for the king has not yet published any thing relating to it: you have no power to print it.

Sir Tho. Meres. He will not say you have power to print the king's Speech, but we have power to print our own Address; there are many instances this parliament, and it may be of great use.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. By the act of printing, you cannot print.

Sir Tho. Meres. Since that act, sir Edward Turner, late Speaker, has appointed things to be printed several times.

Sir Tho. Clarges will not dispute whether we have power or no; it is a kind of appeal to the people; but printing this will much heighten and increase the love of the people to the king: would have the privy counsellors of the house desire his maj. to cause them to be printed.

Mr. Harwood stands up to second the motion. Some inconveniences have lately been by soldiers: you have had a member lately robbed (Mr. Wharton) by persons like soldiers, armed and horsed; his motion is no more than to keep the people quiet: thinks it a reasonable motion, and would have the king moved in it.

Sir R. Temple. You would not let your transactions be printed in news-books; you have decreed this printing, begun in the Long Parliament, as of ill consequence; let these things, like appeals to the people, be avoided.

Sir Tho. Lec. The motion is far from an appeal to the people; this is only, that the king having given us a gracious Answer, you publish it. To what intent? It will be a means to prevent farther mischief; the people may address the king for remedy for the future.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. To print this, as if it were a statute or a law, will look like remonstrating; the Long Parliament was condemned for it.

Col. Birch. The question is not your directing it to be printed, but desiring the king to cause it to be printed. If this were printed, it would end many disputes in the country about quartering of soldiers.

Sir Rob. Carr. What can this printing be but a mistrust of the king, that he will not do what he has promised? No doubt but the king will do it as effectually as he has promised.

Mr. Vaughan. These are good objections, if the house was to order it to be printed; but we do no more appeal to the people by this than by publishing a law: it is to publish his majesty's gracious favour to his people.

Mr. Cheney. For the ill consequence that hath been made of it, and may be of this, would not have it printed.

Sir Rob. Howard. The first motion is out of doors by the act of printing: as for the next motion, printed things are always the best speakers to the people: to what end should the people think you do this?

Mr. Swayne. It has been debated long, and you cannot rise without a question: as he cannot think the Address improper, or the king's Answer such as you cannot rest upon as satisfactory, therefore he is clear for moving the king to have it printed: it is said 'this is but an Address of this house to the king.' Your usual course is, when your Grievances are not redressed, to have recourse to the lords for a law: in regard you have waved all other ways, and taken this, it is most reasonable to have it printed, that a countryman may have something to show.

Sir Tho. Lec. If you will adjourn now, adjourn the debate likewise to the next session, and let it be upon your books.

The House divided even upon the Question, 105 to 105: the Speaker had the casting voice, and gave it for adjourning.*

Adjournment.] March 29. p. m. Sir Tho. Meres reported, from the Conference had with the lords, upon the Amendments of this house, to the amendments and provisos by them sent to the Bill for Ease of his majesty's subjects Dissenters from the Church of England; those Amendments which the lords insist on; of those sent from them; and those they do agree in; with the Amendments from this house: which he read; and delivered in at the table.—The Lords insisting on their first Amendment, the question being put for candles, upon division of the house 75 were for candles, and 136 against candles. Those that were for candles, were for prolonging the debate, that the black rod might call them up to the house of lords before they had voted, 'adhere;' and though divers motions were made for adjourning the debate till next session, yet no question could be put, the black rod knocking at the door. After passing several Bills, the king made the following short Speech:

" My lords and gentlemen; I thank you very kindly for the Supply you have given me: and, that you may see how kindly I take it, I have given to my subjects a General Pardon, which I have made as large as ever was granted by any of my predecessors. What you have now left undone, I hope you will finish at your next meeting; and so you may adjourn yourselves to the 20th day of Oct. next."—The house was then adjourned by his majesty's desire to Oct. 20.* And so ended this session, on Easter Eve, at 9 of the clock at night.

The Parliament prorogued.] Oct. 20, 1673. The parliament met according to adjournment, and immediately voted "That an Address be made to his majesty, by such members of the house as are of his majesty's privy council, to acquaint his majesty, that it is the humble desire of this house, that the intended Marriage of his royal highness with the princess of Modena be not consummated; and that he may not be married to any person but of the Protestant Religion."†—Upon which, the king immediately prorogued the parliament to the 27th.

* The king came to the house of lords, before the Bill for Ease of Dissenters, and some others, could be fixed, and, besides the Money-Bill (which passed under the title of 'A Supply of his majesty's extraordinary Occasions') and the Popery Bill commonly called 'The Test Act,' passed 8 public Acts. "Thus ended," says Burnet, "this memorable Session. It was, indeed, much the best session of that Long Parliament. The Church Party showed a noble zeal for their religion; and the dissenters got great reputation by their silent deportment."—In consequence of the Test Act, the duke of York himself, who was lord high admiral of England, and the lord treasurer Clifford, both laid down their places. The latter is said to have been so much disgusted at the king's passing that Bill, and some other concessions, that he retired, and died in privacy and discontent, in Devonshire. Sir Tho. Osborne succeeded him as Treasurer, being created lord visc. Dunblain and Earl of Danby, &c.

† "In the former session it was known, that the duke was treating a Marriage with the archduchess of Inspruck; but the empress happening to die at that time, the emperor himself married her, and yet no Address was made to the king to hinder his marrying a Papist. His honour was not then engaged; so it had been seasonable and to good purpose, to have moved in it then: but now he was married by proxy, and lord Peterborough had brought the lady to Paris. Yet the house of commons resolved to make an Address to the king, to stop the princess of Modena's coming to England, till she should change her religion. Upon this, the duke moved the king to prorogue the parliament for a week, and a commission was ordered for it. The duke went to the house on that day, to press the calling up the commons, before they could have time to go on to business. Some peers were to be brought in: the duke pressed lord Shaftesbury to put that off, and to prorogue the parliament. He said coldly to him, 'there was no haste;' but the commons made more haste; for they quickly came to a Vote for stopping the Marriage, and by this means they were engaged (having put such an affront on the duke) to proceed farther." Burnet.

ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] Oct. 29. The king opened the Session with the following Speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I thought this day to have welcomed you with an honourable Peace; my preparations for the War and condescensions at the Treaty gave me great reason to believe so: but the Dutch have disappointed me in that expectation, and have treated my ambassadors at Cologne with the contempt of conquerors, and not as might be expected from men in their condition. They have other thoughts than peace.—This obligeth me to move you again for a Supply, the safety and honour of the nation necessarily requiring it: it must be one proportionable to the occasion; and I must tell you besides, that if I have it not speedily, the mischief will be irreparable in my preparations for the next spring. The great experience I have had of you, gentlemen of the h. of commons, will not suffer me to believe, that the artifices of our enemies can possibly divert you from giving me this Supply, or that you can fail of adjusting the proportion of it.—I hope I need not use many words to persuade you that I am steady in maintaining all the professions and promises I have made you concerning Religion and Property; and I shall be very ready to give you fresh instances of my zeal for preserving the Established Religion and laws, as often as any occasion shall require.—In the last place, I am highly concerned to commend to your consideration and care the Debt I owe the Goldsmiths, in which very many other of my good subjects are involved. I heartily recommend their condition to you, and desire your assistance for their relief. There is more that I would have you informed of, which I leave to the Chancellor."*

The Lord Chancellor Shaftesbury's Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor, going to his majesty, received directions from him, and made the Speech following:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons; His maj. had reason to expect that he should have met you with the olive branch of Peace: his naval preparations, greater than in any former years, together with the land forces he had

* "When the week of the prorogation was ended, the session was opened by a Speech of the king's: which had such various strains in it, that it was plain it was made by different persons. The duke told me, that lord Clarendon during his favour had penned all the king's Speeches; but that now, they were composed in the cabinet, one minister putting in one period, while another made another, so that all was not of a piece.' He told me, 'lord Arlington was almost dead with fear; but lord Shaftesbury reckoned himself gone at court, and acted more roundly.' Burnet.

ready for any occasion, gave him assurance to obtain it before this time; and the rather, because his aims were not conquest, unless by obetynacy enforced: but his condescensions at the Treaty have been so great, that the very mediators have declared, they were not reasonably to be refused: he could not be king of Great Britain without securing the Dominion and Property of his own Seas; the first, by an Article clear, and not elusory, of the Flag; the other, by an Article that preserved the Right of the Fishing, but gave the Dutch permission, as tenants, under a small rent, to enjoy and continue that gainful trade upon his coasts. The king was obliged, for the security of a lasting peace, as also by the laws of gratitude and relation, to see the house of Orange settled, and the Lovesteine* that Carthaginian party† brought down; neither in this did the king insist beyond what was moderate and agreeable to their government, and what the prince's ancestors enjoyed amongst them. Besides these, there was necessary to the trade of England, that there should be a fair adjustment of commerce in the East-Indies, where the king's demands were reasonable, and according to the law of nations; and their practice of late years hath been exorbitant and oppressive, suitable only to their power and interest, and destructive, if continued, to our East India Company. These were all of any moment the king insisted on, as judging aright, that that peace, that was reasonable, just and fair to both parties, would be sacred and durable; and that by this means he should depress the interest and reputation of that Lovesteine party‡ amongst them, who sucked in with their milk an inveterate hatred to England, and transmit it to their posterity as a distinguishing character, wherein they place their loyalty to their country. In return to this candid and fair proceeding on the king's part, his majesty assures you, he hath received nothing but the most scornful and contemptuous treatment imaginable; papers delivered in to the mediators owned by them to be stuffed with so unhandsome language that they were ashamed and refused to shew them; never agreeing to any article about the Flag, that was clear or plain; refusing any article of the Fishery, but such a one as might sell them the right of inheritance for an inconsiderable sum of money, though it be royalty so inherent in the crown of England, that I may say (with his majesty's pardon for the expression) he cannot sell it. The article of the prince of Orange, and the adjustment of the East India trade, had neither of them any better success; and, to make all of a piece, they have this last week sent a trumpeter, with an address to his majesty, being a deduction of their several offers of peace, as they call them, and their desires for it now; but it is, both in the penning and the timing of it, plainly an appeal to his majesty's people against himself. And the king hath commanded me to tell you, He is resolved to join issue with them, and print both their Address and his Answer, that his people, and the world may see how notorious falshoods and slights they endeavour to put upon him. In a word, in England, and in all other places, and to all other persons of the world, they declare they offer all things to obtain a peace from the king of England; but to himself, his ministers, the mediators, or his plenipotentiaries, it may with confidence and truth be affirmed, that to this day, nay, even in this last address, they have offered nothing. They desire the king's subjects would believe they beg for peace; whilst their true request is, only to be permitted to be once masters of the Seas, which they hope, if they can subsist at land, length of time may give them, and if once got, is never to be lost, nor can it be bought by any state or emperor at too great a rate; and what security their agreement with us in religion will afford, when they shall have the power, former instances may give demonstration of. Joint interests have often secured the peace of differing religions; but agreeing professions have hardly an example of preserving peace of different interests. This being the true and natural state of things, his maj. doth with great assurance throw himself into the arms of you his parliament, for a Supply suitable to the great affairs he is engaged in. When you consider we are an island, it is not riches nor greatness we contend for, yet those must attend the success; but it is our very beings are in question; we fight pro aris et focus in this war. We are no longer freemen, being islanders and neighbours, if they master us at sea. There is not so lawful or commendable a jealousy in the world, as an Englishman's of the growing greatness of any prince at sea. If you permit the sea, our British wife, to be ravished, an eternal mark of infamy will stick upon us: therefore I am commanded earnestly to recommend to you, not only the proportion, but the time of the Supply; for, unless you think of it early, it will not be serviceable to the chief end, of setting out a fleet the next spring. As for the next part of the king's Speech, I can add nothing to what his majesty hath said; for, as to Religion and Property, his heart is with your heart, perfectly with your heart. He hath not yet learned to deny you any thing; and he believes your wisdom and moderation is such, he never shall: He asks of you to be at peace in him, as he is in you; and he shall never deceive you. There is one word more I am commanded to say, concerning the debt that is owing to the Goldsmiths;

the king holds himself in honour and conscience obliged to see them satisfied: 'besides you all know, how many widows, orphans, and particular persons, the public calamity hath overtaken, and how hard it is that so disproportionate a burden should fall upon them, even to their utter ruin. The whole case is so well and generally known, that I need say no more: your great wisdoms hath not done it at the first, peradventure, that the trade of Bankers might be suppressed, which end is now attained; so that now your great goodness may restore to those poor people, and the many innocent ones that are concerned with them, some life and assurance of payment in a competent time.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I have no more in command; and therefore shall conclude, with my own hearty prayers, that this session may equal, may exceed, the honour of the last; that it may perfect what the last begun for the safety of the king and kingdom; that it may be ever famous for having established upon a durable foundation our religion, laws and properties; that we may not be tossed with boisterous winds, nor overtaken by a sudden dead calm; but that a fair gale may carry you, in a steady, even, and resolved way, into the ports of wisdom and security."

Debate concerning the Speaker.] Oct. 27.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Many exceptions were taken against your service, when you was last called to the chair: excepts that you are a privy counsellor; hardly a precedent, at least not since the Reformation: Speakers, in queen Mary's time, were chosen for the re-establishment of the Roman religion: you might be made a privy counsellor afterwards, as a reward of your service, but not whilst you are Speaker: other offices you hold inconsistent with that chair, and have admittance to the most secret councils, and how improper is that, we having no man to present our Grievances but you! You are too big for that Chair, and for us; and you, that are one of the governors of the world, to be our servant, is incongruous: and as Carteret, treasurer of the navy, in that place which you hold, took up the main business of a session; by way of supposition, if that should happen again, were it proper for you to be in the chair? For who then will be so much concerned?—Moves for a Speaker, pro tempore, and it is very incongruous you should sit when so immediately concerned.

Sir Tho. Clarges thinks what has been said so rational, that he cannot think that any man can be against it: we entrust you with all our secrets; and in your predecessors times, no Speaker had liberty to go to court, without leave: it is the Order, 'that when any reflection is upon a member, he stands up and speaks his defence, and retires,' and would have it so now.

Sir Wm. Portman. What we say here can be no secret among 400 men; persons in the Hall know what we do: craves leave, that some precedents, out of Hackwell's book, of Speakers being privy counsellors, may be read.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Former ages have known none more fit for Speakers than privy counsellors: sir John Bushell, who was favourite to Rd. ii. was Speaker of all the parliaments in his time: sir Tho More, in 14 Hen. viii. In 4 Mary, Cordell, a privy counsellor: has it ever been objected that a privy counsellor cannot be a parliament-man? We have often made use of privy counsellors to send messages by to the king: the eyes of all the kingdom are upon our actions; it is a mark of the king's favour, that you are in the chair: would have it referred to a committee, but not you to quit the chair, that being a yielding of the question.

Sir John Birkenhead. Never was it an exception against any man before in your chair, that he was a privy counsellor; if any precedent can be of it, then turn me out of the house: the making him Speaker, is the king's and your joint act: if any complaint be against you, answer it, but for causa inaudita, it was never heard of: it is clear that the first Speaker, Hungerford, was of the privy council, and he was ex concilio Domini Regis: Froissard, the Historian, was another, no gown-man: sir Tho. Gargrave, of the queen's honourable council [many may say of the Council of the North] a Speaker, in Henry vijith's time, and a great instrument of the Reformation; this will reflect upon the king's making you a privy counsellor: never any Speaker quitted the chair upon that account.

Mr. Powle is not envious at your promotion, but thinks it an improper thing for you to be in the chair, and both inconvenient to the king and this house; the king's welfare consists in the freedom of this house. When you a privy counsellor, and so near the king, your frowns may be a terror to any man that shall speak how the council have misled the king, and given him counsel to overtop us; you are a public accomptant of the king's revenue, and vast sums must go through your hands, and can we make complaint to you of your own misdemeanors? Or take measures from any person but from the intention of this house? Believes that the precedents will fail; at this time, most especially, would not have it; for, if allowed once, it may be always so by precedent: the precedent of the Speaker, in Rd. ii d's time, an ill one; that Speaker was a minion of the king, but no counsellor, as the Record says; he was greatly the occasion of the misfortunes of those times—1st and 2d of Philip and Mary, unprosperous times; in two parliaments they could do nothing; but when Highems was Speaker, the obedience to the Pope was confirmed: he was not sworn counsellor till ten months after, and Cordell was not counsellor till some time after.

Mr. Wm. Harbord. You expose the honour of the house in resorting to Gaming-houses, with foreigners as well as Englishmen, and ill places; I take this to be a great misdemeanor: as for your being a privy counsellor, I think that no exception, but I am sorry to see the honour of the house exposed. I think you to be an unfit person to be Speaker, by your way of living.

Col. Strangeways. What he has heard to day weighs not with him; exceptions against the Speaker, as a privy counsellor, will be a garbling the house: you are charged here for being a Gamester: wishes men were guilty of no greater crime: the judges may as well be excepted against.

The Speaker rose up and complimented the house to this effect, "That he held no employment a greater honour to him than that which he had in their service," &c.

The question being propounded, That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, and a Speaker, pro tempore, be appointed: The question being put, That that Question be now put; it passed in the negative.

Debate on Sir Paul Neale's sitting in the House.] Oct. 30. Mr. Sackverell. Sees a person [sir Paul Neale] sit in the house, whom he knows not to be a Member; desires to know by what right he sits there?

Sir Paul Neale proffered to speak, but was not suffered; "because if admitted to speak in his place, you allow him to be a member:" by divers he was called to the bar, and explained, "not as criminal, but only as not being allowed a member, as lord Bristol, lord chief justice Keeling, and others have been, not members."

Earl of Ogle. Desired to inform the house by what right sir Paul Neale sat there; viz. as being returned a Burgess for Newark with Mr. Savile, by virtue of the king's charter granted to that borough.

Mr. Sackverell. He is informed that that charter has taken in many towns which were not in the former charter, to their great prejudice, and would have it considered.

Sir Paul Neale did at last withdraw, and the thing was proceeded no farther in.

The King's Answer to the Address against the Duke's Match.] Mr. Secretary Coventry delivered the following Message concerning the intended Marriage of the Duke with the Princess of Modena:

"C. R. His majesty having received an Address from the house of commons presenting their humble desire, that the intended Marriage between his royal highness and the princess of Modena be not consummated, commandeth this Answer to be returned: That he perceiveth the h. of commons have wanted a full information of this matter, the marriage being not barely intended, but completed, according to the forms used amongst princes, and by his royal consent and authority: nor could he in the least suppose it disagreeable to his h. of commons, his highness having been, in the view of the world, for several months, engaged in a treaty of Marriage with another Catholic princess, and yet a parliament held during that time, and not the least exception taken at it."

Upon the Question, "Whether an Address should be prepared to be presented to his maesty, concerning the Match between his royal highness and the princess of Modena," it passed in the affirmative, 184 to 88, and a committee was appointed to prepare an Address accordingly.

Debate on the Test in the Popery Act.] Mr. Cheney, moved for declaring the opinion of the house about the Test, in the Act of Popery, how far it does reach to your own members.

Mr. Garway. Is against the form of the motion, though not against the matter: would have a Bill, that every member may take the Test here; and would have it go higher, into the lords house, that those that have a share in the law-making, should be of the same religion.

Sir Rob. Howard. Without a thorough care, we shall be in a worse condition for Religion than before: the destiny of a heretic determines what they will do with us: would have such a Test fitted for nothing but what the Papists may reject; it is necessary, that where any fountain is, it may be pure; and he would have the Protestant Religion pull up the very roots of Popery, wherever they grow: would have it reach all under the notion of Protestants, and be calculated for Popery only.

Mr. Cheney thinks that his motion is well improved; he would have former laws for Popery inspected.

Sir Nick. Carew thinks it will be too great a clogging the bill, but would have it so as to clear the house of lords, and the court, of Papists.

Resolved, "That a Bill be prepared for a General Test, to distinguish between Protestants and Papists: and those that shall refuse to take it, be incapable to enjoy any office, military or civil; or to sit in either house of parliament; or to come within five miles of the court."

Debate on refusing a Supply.] Oct. 31. Mr. Boscawen. In the king's Speech there is 'money' in the first place, and 'money' in the last; all 'money': therefore would have it debated in a grand committee.

Mr. Cheney. Has heard that the Dutch have some thoughts that we might come into the peace immediately; then there can be no necessity for money: moves, that if the Dutch do not, in some time, agree to an honourable peace, that we may supply the king: it is in vain to give money, if not applied to the purpose we intend it: before any thing of money be, moves that we may come to this vote, 'that if, in two months time, the Dutch come not to an honourable peace, we may assist his majesty as becomes us."

Mr. Sackverell had ever understood, that giving of money ought to be debated at a committee of the whole house, where we may lay open our grievances, which are very many, with the more freedom.

Sir John Duncombe. It has not been usual to go into a committee, without directions from the whole house: for Religion you have proceeded very prudently in: cannot but advise you to make peace at home; people will quiet their passions beat with calming all at home, if men could be satisfied, and not afraid of their own good: would now go into this business of Religion: that burns in every man's heart, and he sees every man's face full of it, and that is the beginning of the king's Speech.

Sir Tho. Meres. There are Orders remaining upon your books, and practice: says, upon search of ancient orders, that the king's Speech was ever debated in a grand committee: agrees with Duncombe, if we may not be surprized with rash votes, that the house may rectify what surprize we may have upon us.

Sir John Mason. In the French Gazette the Pope approves of the progress of the French arms; the last fight was, as if the English and Dutch had been the gladiators for the French spectators*: if the prince had been well seconded, there had been an end of the war, and the Dutch must have begged a peace of us: we gave two millions to set out but part of a navy for a summer: what greater encouragement can be given to the Dutch? Our native commodities give no price; want of coals make us want fire, and floods have destroyed grass and hay: fire and water against us! We have want of people; many are sent away, and he will say nothing of the end for which they are sent; therefore moves against a Supply.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. If the king had wasted his treasure for magnificent buildings, or palaces, would be against giving money; but if, for not paying some few taxes the nation may be lost, would have gentlemen consider of it: svers that the Dutch have not made any proposition, only a piece of one, 'for the Flag;' and 'if we will quit the king of France, they will then tell us more, and they are allied with the king of Spain, and Lorrain, and cannot agree without them.' You yourself, sir Cha. Harbord, have been obliged by the Hollanders; he has served there under them in their army, and honours the Orange family before any, next to that of his own prince, and loves the country; but consider they have provided a great fleet against the summer, and you will give no money, and so have no fleet; which way will you secure the plantations and Tanager? If you think they will give peace, it will be such a one then as to a people they condemn: if you come upon a vote of 'no money,' it will be as fatal as that of the Long Parliament, of 'no farther Addresses to the king.'" Were a man jealous of his wife, would he make her poor and naked, and force her to put herself into the arms of another man? Concludes this vote to be the most fatal blow you can give the nation.

* A desperate engagement had happened with the Dutch, on the 11th of August, in which the brave sir Edw. Spragg lost his life; while the French remained quiet spectators, disobeying, or pretending not to understand, prince Rupert's orders.

Lord Cavendish. Here is money asked of us to carry on a war we were never advised about, and what we have given is turned to raising of families, and not paying the king's debts: there is so little fruit of the Addresses of the last session, that we now find greater Grievances, as articles of war and martial law: the nation's interest is laid aside for private interest: supposes that what we gave the last session may be a sufficient Supply for the war, and moves for a negative 'against Money.'

Col. Strangways. It is a sad condition we are reduced to, and who have reduced us to it is a secret not yet come to his knowledge, and in due time may be considered: if you shall pass negative votes, what advantage do you give your enemies in such a vote? Are you sure you shall have peace? Would never have the king hold his crown of the king of France: desires we may not depend for our security either upon France or Holland: the Hollanders are a trading and a subtle people, and would have a fleet set out: he aims at this; begin with Grievances and your liberty: France has entangled us; the public articles are ill enough; what are then the private articles? We are to provide 60 ships, and the French 30: if the house does not assist the king; then the French come upon us for breach of articles: in a parliamentary way consider first 'Grievances,' and then 'Money.' The house of commons keeps the purse; and never put the question for 'Money,' before you know what you shall have for it: but is against a negative question.

Sir Tho. Lee. When you gave away so much money, then began the alliance with France, and no debts paid, though money given for it: the Dutch were not the aggressors in the last war, when we were weary of fighting alone; now the French are weary of us, and will fight alone; when we gave money for a fleet and had peace without it! Now we are the support of the crown of France, England may be as necessary to France as other countries, and so they may conquer us: the kingdom is ever safe when money is in our purses; we may have occasion to use it perhaps, to defend us against France: must we give 5 millions more to have what we might have had without it? Must money be given both in war and peace? Concurrent aids were never before heard of, money having been the foundation of our Grievances to raise a Standing Army; the marine regiments paid to this day; now, instead of five-pence, they take six-pence for their quarters: France once would invade us, and now is our friend. Still more men are raised; so many in a company are, indeed, disbanded, but the officers remain. This is your Standing Army, and it is Money still that maintains this army: 50 per cent. upon our goods in France, and yet the war with Holland upon account of trade: money for league, and no league, war and peace: moves to have the kingdom once free from taxes.

Sir Rob. Howard is sorry to hear this question moved for in the negative; this will utterly shiver all our hopes in this Vote: consider the arguments; 'to maintain an ill Alliance' we have brought about the French alliance to us, whilst united to Holland, and both navies were against us: religion is not the case, but interest: if money be ill managed, any body may see it; he (as Secretary to the Treasury) will give an account of it, and ask no time to do it, registers being all in order; the money all gone out to public uses: you must have the nation poor if we have peace, if we give no money: what will the Dutch say to this negative? Will you shake the king in it? You say the Papists have power; by this you give more way yet to have it; they have their counsels to give the king by such a Vote: we are going now to make a purchase, and before we get our religion and properties by this purchase, we throw away all by this vote: he must be a God that can say, 'there shall be no enemies, and we shall have peace;' and yet we do so by this negative: let not the word of king and people be lost now—'Seek ye first the kingdom of Heaven,' settle Religion, 'and all things will be added.' Go in a parliamentary way for Grievances and Religion, and think of this vote last.

Mr. Sacheverell. Is one of those that think giving of Money one of the greatest Grievances: it seems to him, that those villainous counsellors, that persuaded the king to make this war, have deceived him in this speech; do not they know of the unpaid taxes granted the last session, with the prizes and the customs? It seems to him like the first design: these gentlemen would have only a Bank, that they may carry on their design, and use you no more: he abhors it: it was said before, 'Give money, and Grievances shall be redressed:' this army is so insolent, that they may turn you out of doors: if redress of Grievances be an argument for 'Money,' you will never want 'Grievances:' will you not heighten France, by giving more money, and make him more friends, that he may at last have Dominion at Sea, which we now contend for? And, by this negative, we may deliver ourselves both from France and Rome.

Sir Eliab Harrey. Giving of money now is certainly to ruin king and kingdom: give money, and you destroy the revenue of the nation, wool: you are letting the king of France be the merchant of the whole world: by falling out with Spain, we spoil the best trade we have: he has kept 100 men at work upon the woollen manufacture, and now cannot keep one: will you set the woollen manufacture up in France? Lose the Straits trade, and you must land all your commodities at Marseilles, and bring them over land, and so France and Holland will out-trade you, by the great expence we must be at by inland carriage.

Mr. Bennet. Both at home and abroad people would be glad of this negative: he has much to do in the world, and knows the poverty of the nation; but would not have it thought that we are unable to raise the king money.

Sir Wm. Coventry is as unwilling to give money for the maintenance of this alliance as any man, it being destructive both to trade and religion: what probability is there, if we beat the Hollander, that we shall get all trade? But it is industry and parsimony, and by underselling us: suppose we beat them, what think you they will be beaten hither? The last summer but one we beat them low enough, but with all the invitation that could be given them, few of them came hither; you may beat them into France, Sweden, or Denmark; any where but here; who will come to us, thus divided, as we are, in jealousies, and fears of Popery? He that knows least, has most fears: a stranger knows not what you have in your heart: we all know that we shall not stay if Popery prevail: pray God they will let us go away alive, considering the Inquisition! He has said enough to give reason for his negative for 'Money.' The Hollanders, in all reason, had better have no quarrels. But upon the king of France's account, if we leave him, his difficulties will increase: it is strange that we and Holland should be divided by one, whose interest is destructive to us both: when we go by ourselves, we may have a fair peace in all probability, going upon a pure national account: would not have it out of the house's power to assist the king: he is not so confident of the Hollanders good-nature in a peace, but doubts not, but upon Money granted upon good grounds, we may be sure of a peace; yet for all this he is not for money.

Sir Henry Capel.* If this war was for the maintenance of the crown and nation, would venture all he has, life and fortune, for it: he is descended from one that lost his life for maintaining of both: would know how we came into this war, before we give money to it: is not for giving money for the war, but not for a negative 'no Money;' and doubts not but the king will redress our Grievances.

Sir Rob Carr moves to proceed in a parliamentary way: proceed to your 'Grievances,' (if you have any) and the king will give you redress. [Laughed at.]

Lord Cornbury. Here is now a question proposed, and he agrees with Coventry's question: it will be wondered that he should be against money: some men have been under prejudice for giving votes, and that may possibly be a Grievance: all he has is from the king, and he would willingly give it again, if he calls for it; he has begged for the king, and wanted for him, and would willingly do so again: Carr says 'if there are any Grievances;' he wonders at it, when so many have been opened to you: the last tax could not be anticipated;

* Second son of lord Capel, (who was beheaded for his loyalty to Charles I, in 1648) and brother to the earl of Essex. He was created lord Capel, of Tewkesbury, in 1692, and died lord lieutenant of Ireland, in 1696.

besides the customs, excise, and the prizes: some cannot get their money due to them, glad to be content with half; those that have interest get all: would vote, 'that Money be not considered till Grievances are redressed.'

Mr. Garraway. Ruin of trade, loss of religion, no Grievance! Papists threaten us in the very lobby, to our faces; soldiers raising money; a war; the French king broke the Pyrenean league, conquered Lorraine, the king of Spain's country, en passant, and this a good Alliance! And now the question, whether money or no Money to maintain this League, and no enquiry made into what remains of what we have already given—Lands turned into our hands, (as it is his good fortune) and no Grievances neither! As to our sea war, the French give us money, and they come to see how we fight for it: one clapped up in the Bastile for fighting: * where will there be an end of the French conquests? If any fleet be to be set out, we may do it time enough: moves, 'That till this tax be expired,' (which will be August first) 'we may give no Money;' and then, if occasion be, would give, but till then, would not.

Sir John Hotham comes from a place so impoverished, [Beverly] that it is impossible to raise money there, and that place is much impoverished by soldiers already; they quarter there in private houses, and one person was fined, because he would not render his house and bed to the soldiers: you have now an army, and it is grown a principle amongst them, (an ill nursery for young men) that parliaments are roots of rebellion, and Magna Charta sprung out of them: money is the way to continue these persons, and no money, to disband them; therefore is against money.

Mr. Attorney Finch, is of opinion that there are grievances, and never expects such a healthful constitution in the body politic, that shall be so equally poised, as to be without them: 'not to give money' is at this time a grievance not to be redressed in many ages: this is an English war, and no other: they are not afraid, in Flanders, of the Protestant religion, because joined with a Protestant army: would treat this matter with more temperance; sorely, for the honour of our prince, we must not treat crowned heads here, in alliance with us, as if they were our enemies: if we have but good trade, the Dutch presently make war with that prince, in alliance with us, that we may have no trade with their enemy; commends much the piety of this, but sees not the policy: you are now in war, and you carry the purse: supposing it such, and the alliance, as is said, yet in the condition we are in, it is absolutely necessary to support the war to the utmost of our power, the king being engaged with a prince who has punctually observed articles: suppose us weary of the war, yet the king of France is actually engaged with us, and has remitted many articles that would have obliged the king to much expence: the war we cannot get out of with a prince loving his honour above his life; you may make it an unprosperous and a ruinous war, but you cannot make it cease to be a war; you may dishearten all the soldiers that are to go over, but if you make the chariot wheels drive heavily, yet they must drive on, if the king please to command it: if that war was now to be made, the discourse would be most seasonable; but now will be ruinous, and wiser men than he think so: the king may engage in a war, but when his people shall storm him out of it, the hour will come that his enemies wish for; for the Dutch will now be upon greater terms, having ever desired such a storm as the king could not allay: it is all one to the king whether his designs be checked at home or abroad: is this agreeable to this house, wherein there is scarce a man that has not bled for the crown? moves, that whatever is grievous, either in church or state, we may go upon, with all calmness and temper, and to do the king that honour (if with submission he may say it) that one day may be for 'Grievances,' and the other for 'Supply,' hand in hand, that the world may see you neither neglect the king nor yourselves.

Mr. Powle. We see priests daily admitted into the king's presence, and our Address (as he is informed) is but lately sent into Ireland: a Papist major general acting in disguise: has not one told you (sir James Smith) that he sat in a council of war when the military articles were agreed to? pressing against so many statutes, may reach your members, and the peers themselves: and this army has done nothing but the famous expedition from Blackheath to Yarmouth*: shall never think that privilege of parliament is not violated as long as a privy counsellor sits in the Chair†: members represented to the king in an ill sense for what they have said here: he that was the contriver of the Declaration‡, made lord privy seal, the third office in the kingdom, and another||, as much concerned, made chief governor of Scotland: this is to bring in Popery in triumph: would be glad to see promises made in parliament, once kept in intermissions of parliament: he cannot go so far in the question proposed, as not to give any farther Supply till ten months; but at this time cannot give his consent to supply.

* "Part of the summer about 6000 troops were encamped at Yarmouth, under the command of count Schomberg; from whence it was understood that they might easily be wafted over to Zealand, as soon as the allied fleet had cleared the sea of the enemy." Ralph.

|| Duke of Lauderdale.

* In the sea fight of the 11th of August, the French rear admiral Martel, who was not in the secret, fought in earnest; for which, at his return to Paris, he was committed to the Bastille, and the relation of the battle, which he had prepared, was suppressed.

Sir Thos Meres. With the length and expatiating of an argument oftentimes the edge of a thing is lost: you will be sure to have Grievances, if that be doctrine, that money must be given when grievances are redressed: if that money, twice given in a session, be not unparliamentary, yet there are 1,200,000*l.* granted in a year: has seen so often Grievances pressed, and so seldom redressed, that he now has little hopes of having it; but it may be answered, we will be redressed first; but have we not seen people's spirits are a little wearied with long sitting, and that a few redressed pleases us? in short we are the best-natured house of commons that ever sat: consider what we do about Popery, in the lords house, by putting out popish lords, a matter of inheritance, which will have conference upon conference, and we under great disadvantages: it was said, that Popery was but the handle for the ambitious and covetous, in 1641, to raise sedition: when we speak of a Standing Army, we are answered, 'cannot the king raise what men he pleases?' and to the French league, 'cannot the king make leagues?' Yet the gentleman said, 'the king cannot have Money without the house of commons: what war can the king make, when the house of commons shall storm him out of it?' To which thus he answers: In such great wars as this, and in most wars, the kings of England have advised with their parliaments; believes that it might be the king's intention to do so, however advised to the contrary; we owned not the war in the last tax: the king may make war, but the house of commons may or may not give money: other Grievances there are, as Evil Counsellors; to which it will be said, 'cannot the king chuse his own servants?' And that is plausible. Should these things be amended, he would give money.

Mr. Stockdale. If we were able, as we are not, it is not now a time to give at all: the question is a single question, 'Whether money or no money, till this tax be out?'

Sir Tho. Lee. This question is for the king's service now, more than ever: has great reason to believe, that the king needs it not; because one has told you (Mr. Attorney) 'that the king of France has released several chargeable articles in the treaty:' as for the carrying on the war, we look upon it as a Grievance. 'The parliament may talk, say the people, but still you give money: fears not proroguing for not giving; but if you show yourselves willing to give no money, the king will be restored to the affections of his people, when they shall see that grievances are redressed without giving of money.'

Mr. Secretary Coventry. Nothing is so wise nor so obligatory to the king, as to redress Grievances without giving money; but as far as he is master of his own life, he had rather lose it, than you should pass this negative vote.

Mr. Garroway. Coventry tells you how the French have conquered; but now the case is altered, it might have been wished the Tripartite League* had stood: Is sorry for the Attorney's expression, of being 'stormed out of a League.' The prince of Orange will be a good advocate to keep the Hollanders in war with the French, that he may be continued general; but would never have such a peace as the French shall assign us: We are more pot to the blush about redress of Grievances, than for any other thing; those that have been the promisers have been the opposers: The proroguing will do us as much good as it did us a prejudice, and, if need be, we may be suddenly sent for again: Is for the question.

Mr. Howe † is dissatisfied with the person that is to have the money in his hands, the Speaker.

Sir Tho. Charges cannot apprehend such an imminent necessity of giving, as Solicitor North says there is: The remaining taxes, the customs, the revenue, and prizes, and for one reason above all, viz. 400,000*l.* given away in donatives: Does not repine at the king's bounty, but apprehends no necessity of giving by it: Thinks that the counsels, now prevalent, design the ruin of the king, the duke, and the kingdom; the Irish Grievances not sent away above ten days ago; priests and the lord almoner at court; 1500 and 2000 guineas given to officers disbanded; 13, 14, 20 Popish officers taken in, and the French regiments filled with them, and some ordered not to muster, to prevent discovery: Acts of parliament can do nothing; as these men have, notwithstanding, taken up arms: It looks like treason in levying war without commission: When he was at Paris, the Holland ambassador told him, "You have broken your faith with the Bankers; France an absolute monarchy, and you a limited one: no help nor advantage by your alliance." The Chancellor is keeper of the king's conscience, and the treasurer, of his word: the Bankers broken, and Exchequer shut up, in Jan. and we to meet in March: they have persuaded the king to ask to pay the Bankers, and they are already paid, by the sale of the free-farm rents, 600,000*l.*—Subsidy, excise, law-bill by this—Where shall we find treasure to supply these exorbitances: these evil counsellors intercept all the king's goodness; no good is to be hoped for till they be removed: it was insinuated that the last Supply would give us peace in a few months; we

* "The Triple Alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden, was formed in 1668. The design of it was to support the Spanish monarchy, restrain the exorbitant power of France, and prevent a dreadful war, in which all Europe would probably have been involved. It was therefore generally applauded, and seemed to be, in all respects, the wisest measure that was taken in England during the whole reign of Charles ii." Smollet.

then considered not the war, nor the alliance: our duty to the king overcame all those enquiries; and since there appears no want of money, put the question at the largest extent, as first moved.

Sir Tho. Littleton cannot imagine that such consequences as are alledged will attend the putting the question, as penned, with the words retained in: is persuaded that, if an effectual course be taken, as things change, men's minds will change, and is not so terribly afraid of it: nor so dismal a vote but as happy.

Sir Edw. Dering. By whose hands are we tied but by our own? Should we be tied by any other, we cannot go back with honour, nor forward with safety.

Mr. Boscawen would make no other use of the Vote but in order to peace: the great grievances have been by pretence of the war, the rest but trivial: the war, at the first, was against the advice of the whole body of the merchants, only some particular men that had losses: thinks the peace a good peace, and the Triple League much for the satisfaction of the nation: some trifling injuries were done to the merchants at Surinam; as if a man, with a flea on his forehead, would strike it off with a beetle: would make use of that Vote, that we might have a peace: it is better to deny an aid to the war than to meddle with a peace: we never deny money when there is a just occasion for it; it were to deny self-preservation.

Sir Wm. Coventry hears it said, 'that the king cannot go off with honour from his alliance with France' and what then shall we say of the Triple Alliance, that the peace of Christendom was so much concerned in, so solemn, as to be sworn to by the king of France, and registered in the parliament of Paris by that king's command, but yet renounced by him, because not consistent with the good of his people: Munster made a war with our money; it was not for the good of his subjects, it seems, and he made peace with Holland: the same did Brandenburg: the king of France, by the Pyrenean treaty, was not to assist the king of Portugal; it was not for the good of his people, and he broke that treaty; Princes have ever done it for the good of their people, and if we live by another rule than they do, we shall have the worst of it; Now has the king of France kept treaty with us, as is said? Knows not what the private articles were, but surely they were made unfortunately, that we should have no share in this conquest; has he kept his word with us? He was to send 30 ships for our 60; had that conjunction been as it should be, they would have fought; has heard but of two captains killed in the French fleet, and one died of an unfortunate disease (the Pox); thinks we had no advantage by their company. One unfortunate gentleman did fight (Martel) and because that gentleman said, (as he has heard) 'That the French did not their duty,' he is clapped up into the Bastile. 'His own squadron,' he said, 'deserted him; his captains said, 'upon secret orders, which they had*.' D'Estrees sent positive orders not to fight, unless by word of mouth, or by writing; and if that man that brought them, had been knocked on the head, no orders could have been had; 'no regard to be had to prince Rupert's signals,' (which is the custom at sea) 'D'Estrees must, by a council of war, know whether the prince's orders were good orders or no;' could a fleet coming with such orders, ever be serviceable to us? Thinks it better we had no fleet; thinks not so highly of the Dutch, nor meanly of ourselves, but that we may do well without the king of France: an indifferent casuist will say, having been so used, that we are absolved from an alliance so ill maintained; the interest of the king of England is to keep France from being too great on the continent, and the French interest is to keep us from being masters of the sea; the French have pursued that interest well; moves to insert in the Question, 'unless it shall appear that the obstinacy of the Dutch shall make a supply necessary.'

Mr. Garraway. Spain says, 'have peace with England, and war with all the world:' we lost 1600 ships in the last Spanish war, great and small: as for Duncombe's argument of building ships futurely, money may be had; the East-India Company had it at 4 per cent. for the prizes; you may have a short Bill for the remainder of the last Supply, which is not at all engaged to any other use.

Sir Tho. Littleton doubts not but redress of Grievances will alarm the Dutch more than any Supply we can give.

The Commons refuse a Supply.] It was then resolved, "That this house, considering the present condition of the nation, will not take into any farther debate, or consideration, any Aid, or Supply, or Charge upon the subject, before the times of payment of the 18 months Assessment, &c. granted last session, be expired: unless it shall appear, that the obstinacy of the Dutch shall render it necessary; nor before this kingdom be effectually secured from the dangers of Popery, and popish counsels and counsellors, and the other present Grievances be redressed."

The Commons Second Address against the Duke's Match.] Mr. Powle reported from the Committee the Address to be presented to his majesty, concerning the Match between his royal highness the duke of York, and the princess of Modena; which was agreed to by the house, and is as follows :

* Dr. Campbell, in his Lives of the Admirals, has preserved the conclusion of Martel's relation of the battle; which, it seems, had found its way to England, and was published in a piece called, 'An exact Relation of the Actions of the Fleet under Prince Rupert, printed anno 1673,' and was to this effect; "That if count D'Estrees would have fallen in with a fair wind upon De Ruyter and Bankert, at their first engaging, when in numbers they much exceeded the Prince, they must of necessity have been inclosed between his Highness and D'Estrees; and so the enemy would have been entirely defeated."

“ We your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the commons, in this present parliament assembled, being full of an assurance of your majesty's gracious intentions to provide for the establishment of Religion, and the preservation of your people in peace and security; and foreseeing the dangerous consequences which may follow the marriage of his r. h. the duke of York with the princess of Modena, or any other person of the popish religion, do hold ourselves bound in conscience and duty to represent the same to your sacred majesty; (not doubting but those constant testimonies that we have given your majesty of our true and loyal affections to your sacred person, will easily gain a belief, that these our humble desires proceed from hearts still full of the same affections towards your sacred majesty, and with intentions to establish your royal government upon those true supports of the Protestant religion, and the hearts of your people) with all humility, desiring your majesty to take the same into your princely consideration, and to relieve your subjects from those fears and apprehensions which at present they lie under from the progress that has been made in that Treaty.—We do therefore humbly beseech your maj. to consider, That if this Marriage do proceed, it will be a means to disquiet the minds of your Protestant subjects at home, and to fill them with endless jealousies and discontents, and will bring your majesty into such alliances abroad, as may prove highly prejudicial, if not destructive, to the interest of the very Protestant Religion itself.—That we find, by sad experience, that such Marriages have increased and encouraged Popery in this kingdom, and given opportunity to priests and jesuits to propagate their opinions, and seduce great number of your Protestant subjects.—And we do already observe, how much that party are animated with the hopes of this Match, which were lately discouraged by your majesty's gracious concessions in the last meeting of this parliament.—That we greatly fear, this may be an occasion to lessen the affections of the people to his r. h. who is nearly related to the crown, and whose honour and esteem we desire may be always entirely preserved.—That, for another age, at least, this kingdom will be under continual apprehensions of the growth of Popery, and the danger of the Protestant religion.—Lastly, we consider, That this princess, having so near a relation and kindred to many eminent persons of the court of Rome, may give them great opportunities to promote their designs, and carry on their practices amongst us; and, by the same means, penetrate into your majesty's most secret councils, and more easily discover the state of the whole kingdom.—And finding that, by the opinions of very many learned men, it is generally admitted, that such treaties and contracts by proxy are dissolvable, of which there are several instances to be produced, we do, in all humbleness, beseech your majesty to put a stop to the consummation of this intended Marriage.—And this we do the more importunately desire, because we have not, as yet, the happiness to see any issue of your majesty's that may succeed in the government of these kingdoms; which blessing we most heartily pray Almighty God, in his due time, to bestow-upon your maj. and these kingdoms, to the unspeakable joy and comfort of all your loyal subjects, who desire nothing more than to continue under the reigns of your majesty, and your royal posterity for ever.”

Resolved, “ That this Address be presented to his majesty, and that the lords of the privy council, members of this house, be desired to attend his majesty, to know his pleasure when he will be attended therewith.”

A Standing Army voted a Grievance.]
Nov. 3. In a debate upon Grievances,

Sir T. Meres said, several Grievances were enumerated the other day: the next Grievance he thinks fit to propose is that of a ‘ Standing Army.’ Some said it was to land to beat the Dutch; but it turned off, it seems, to take Harwich, as you have been told. He has been informed that they are of no service; the king's treasure is wasted by them, so that aids are asked twice in one year: loves not to be the first man that moves a thing, but would now form you a question, ‘ That this Standing Army is a Grievance.’ The reasons for it: it brings in the billeting of soldiers, against the Petition of Right: the last session they took 5d. from persons to be exempted from quartering soldiers, and now it is raised to 6d. not only in inns, and alehouses, but in private houses (a man's house is his castle) contrary to the privileges of the English subjects: you are told also of Martial Law, made for the governing these men, against all the laws of England. Martial law has arbitrary principles and arbitrary power: we like not these arbitrary principles in any councils: this army has the youth of the nation; it debauches them, and fills them with such principles, that towns by them are debauched; common violences they commit. Besides the French League and ‘ Evil Counsellors,’ this is still a terror in our fears of Popery: if any one of these are left out, it will help to set up the other three: asks, at last, That this may be voted ‘ a Grievance;’ the others are ‘ grievances,’ but the army is ‘ a Legion:’ and, to follow the metaphor, hopes they shall not ‘ be choaked in the sea,’ nor cast away beyond sea, to support this alliance, but disbanded.

Sir Eliab Hurvey knows of abundance of petitions that will be presented you against these men: if you send them abroad, they must be turned Catholics, and so many sent us back again: hopes you will vote it ‘ a grievance.’

Mr. Sec. Coventry, would have you agree upon terms, what is 'an Army,' and what 'a Standing Army,' knows not why they are called 'Legions,' for among the Romans a legion was a band of 2000 men: he is unwilling that his country should be exposed; but now you are in a war, thinks not that you intend that the king should fall down, and beg a peace of Holland: they know what your trained bands are, since the business of Landguard point: for the king to raise troops is not against law, but for those troops to be disorderly is against law; but if such a captain, or company, has done ill without order, it is no general grievance: two vintners killed two gentlemen; shall vintners therefore be a grievance? Some merchants robbed upon the highway; must all merchants therefore be a grievance? The gentleman is not well informed about martial law; it is as it ever was: in lord Strafford's command, and the earl of Holland's, when he disbanded the Northern army, and those of lord Essex's army (we may learn of our enemies) these were compared with all articles, and the best were extracted, and you will find them no French articles: hopes you will not say, it is not in the king's power to raise men, but let gentlemen show you any disorders owned by authority, and it is another case: but how will you vote this 'grievance,' when there is no illegality in it, only exorbitances of particular persons? Hopes you will not vote it a Grievance.

Sir Tho. Lee thought, that, though the practice of accumulative treason against lord Strafford was condemned, yet his setting up Martial Law was justly disapproved then: The oaths in the articles, he is sure, are not legal: But you are told of vintners and merchants, and that these exorbitances are not allowed; but if we have no grievances till they are allowed by authority, we shall never have any: but they are to have another sort of trial than other men, and that makes them a terror: You have been told this morning, 'that upon their marches they have been quartered in private houses in Hampshire, and that they made people bring out their provisions, or they would take them by force in their marches.' They are taught to believe that they may do it; and should you make this Address to the king, he would find it 'a grievance' as well as you: you are now arming the king; nothing disarms him more than these exorbitances: But must these dragoons ride over the sea? We have no wooden horses to carry them, and by this you give the Dutch great advantage: We had success by the militia in 1588; you had no army but them at that time: It has ever been the custom, that when men have been thus raised they have been complained of as a grievance, especially we wanting hands and mouths now in the nation; and would now have it voted a grievance.

Sir Rob. Howard. If there be not an intention of 'a standing army,' which we know not, it is too hasty a vote: would not have any distrust betwixt the king and us, and would give no argument to the king to apprehend it:

Present only, 'an army now in being and no occasion for:' lay only your duty before his majesty, 'that it may be a terror to the people, as you apprehend,' and tread in the easier steps to him.

Sir Henry Capel. You have been told how difficult it is for armies and properties to stand together: Is not of that opinion that they are a security to us at home; knows nothing of affairs abroad: Our security is the militia; that will defend us and never conquer us: our defence abroad is our ships; the seaman's pay, and peas, and his coarse diet, well given him: Moves to vote this army 'a grievance.'

Lord St. John. In the former king's time, a much less thing than this was voted a Grievance; and now an army in our bowels all this summer and no employment for them, and for the county he serves, [Hampshire] he is particularly obliged to represent it as a Grievance.

Sir Tho. Clarges will not say it is fit now to disband them all; but at the conclusion of the last war some were made standing regiments, and fears now, after the war, it will be the same again: but the king is not minded of his promises by those that should do it; he is persuaded that the king would do it, but forgets it: but the raising money, and 15 or 16 to quarter in a poor alehouse, full of children, is a Grievance.

Mr. Harwood. The king has many things laid upon him that he has not done: the king raised not these men but his counsellors, who have got by these things: How many Addresses against Popery, and yet papists put into command! He that commands our men in chief is a stranger*, and he next in command a Papist†: Cannot wonder at those persons that have spoke against these things as Grievances. Were he as they, possibly he should say so too; but they cannot think so. We are come to that pass, that no law can restrain these people; houses taken from us, our lives in danger; he cannot say one has suffered death by them, but some have been soundly swinged: would vote it a Grievance.

Sir Rob. Carr. No man can say, that a Standing Army in a time of peace, was ever attempted: most of the forces were about Norfolk and Suffolk, where the Dutch have attempted landing; Your Addresses formerly were 'to disband them, when the war should be ended,' and will you now do it 'the war in being?' It is not for your service.

Sir Rd. Temple. The practice of these men is a Grievance. He knows no law that can empower them to raise money; the continuance of them will be more a grievance, and what is an oppression, is a grievance.

Mr. Powle answers Mr. Sec. Coventry—Whatever body of men are raised for no use, are 'a Grievance;' he thinks 'the raising them a Grievance'—These forces were not raised for the war, but the war made for raising these people: He is no soldier, but has conversed with such as are, and they hold a descent into Zealand impossible; for the enemy might, at any time, get betwixt them and the land with their fleet, and, if landed, hinder recruits: They are glad that the militia may be useless, and the gentlemen that serve in it are put upon chargeable employments, but in Chatham business were not thought fit to command them: which has been such a discouragement, that many have laid down their commissions: When money or honour was to be got, then they were put out of command: As for the fleet, we are in a naval war, at least we are told so, and hopes it so, but the money is all spent upon land soldiers: You know that in your office [the Speaker's] the seamen are not paid; the money being diverted to pay those landmen. Part of those men are drawn out of Ireland, and the Papists, last session, were grown formidable there: why are they not sent back thither? We desire them not here, and they want them there: our laws to be thus awed! The law of England will protect the king: knows not what these men will do; but the veteran bands, at last, chopped, and changed, and sold the Roman empire: the king himself may be no longer king, but at the choice of this army: let the soldiers be paid, and you may have them again when you will: quartering of soldiers, or buying them off, is an intolerable oppression: why should an ale-house-keeper, a subject, buy off his oppressions? Soldiers to present their muskets in the face of a court! Would have it voted 'a grievance.'

Col. Kirby. Hears it said, 'that these men were raised to no purpose.' Had you not had landmen, you would have had none to man your guns, and they would have been much put to it; but for our regiment, you might have had no fleet: before you move the king for disbanding, consider how you will maintain the war.

Col. Birch. Kirby has given you the greatest reason imaginable for disbanding these men; he calls the men aboard a ship, 'our regiment;' and he commands none of the new raised men: he has ever told you, that this war was against the grain of the people, and then against their interest, and we were prorogued on, till the war was so far entered into that we could not come out of it: no people can be governed but by perfect love, or perfect fear: we are asked, 'why this army is a grievance now, and not when we were here last? We saw not then what we see now. He saw them at Blackheath with their swords drawn; it terrified him then, but, thank God, he is pretty well recovered since he came into the house: If this vote makes the Dutch insolent, 'giving money' will be the consequence, and then all is well: the great river of Babylon was cut into small rivulets, and that destroyed the city, when nothing else could; so has our money been diverted, he fears. Would have the Standing-Army voted 'a Grievance.'

Resolved, "That the Standing-Army is a Grievance."

Sir Tho. Meres moved that some gentlemen may draw up an Address to the king, showing in what manner this army is a Grievance. A Committee was appointed accordingly.

Nov. 3. p. m. Mr. Speaker reported, That in pursuance of their commands, he had read, and presented to his majesty, the Address of the house, concerning his royal highness's Match with the princess of Modena; and that his maj. was pleased to declare, "that it was a matter that he would take into his present consideration, and return a speedy Answer."

The Parliament suddenly prorogued.] Nov. 4. After the Speaker, who came not to the house till 10 o'clock, though the house was the day before adjourned to eight, had been called to the Chair by a great voice, he at last took the chair; and then sir Robert Thomas moved to take into consideration the business of 'evil counsellors,' as 'a grievance,' hinted the other day, and would name one, 'the duke of Lauderdale*.' The word was no sooner out of his mouth but the usher of the black rod knocked at the door, and the serjeant gave notice of it to the Speaker, who forbade sir Robert proceeding any farther.*

* "The duke of Lauderdale had been for many years a zealous Covenanter: but in 1647 he turned to the king's interest; and had continued a prisoner all the while after Worcester fight, where he was taken. He was kept for some years in the Tower of London, in Portland Castle, and in other prisons, till he was set at liberty by those who called home the king. He was very learned, not only in Latin, in which he was a master, but in Greek and Hebrew. He was a man, (as the duke of Buckingham called him to me) of a blundering understanding. He was haughty beyond expression, abject to those he saw he must stoop to, but imperious to all others. He had a violence of passion, which carried him often to fits like madness, in which he had no temper. He was the coldest friend, and the violentest enemy I ever knew. He at first seemed to despise wealth; but he delivered himself up afterwards to luxury and sensuality. He was in his principles much against Popery and arbitrary government; and yet, by a fatal train of passions and interests, he made way for the former, and had almost established the latter; and whereas some, by a smooth deportment, made the first beginnings of tyranny less discernible and unacceptable: he, by the fury of his behaviour, heightened the severity of his ministry, which was liker the cruelty of an inquisition than the legality of justice. With all this, he was a Presbyterian, and retained his aversion to king Charles i, and his party, to his death [which happened in 1682.]" Burnet.—Many years after his death there was published a translation by him of Virgil's Aeneid, which had been shewn in MS. to Dryden, and from which he has borrowed many lines.

"My lords and gentlemen; I need not tell you how unwillingly I call you hither at this time, being enough sensible what advantage my enemies both abroad and at home will reap by the least appearance of a difference betwixt me and my parliament; nay, being assured they expect more success from such a breach (could they procure it) than from their arms.—This, I say, shall, whilst I live, be my chief endeavour to prevent; and for that reason I think it necessary to make a short recess, that all good men may recollect themselves against the next meeting, and consider whether the present posture of affairs will not rather require their applications to matters of Religion,

* "The Address (agreed to the day before) was to have been presented this afternoon; but the king disappointed all by coming unexpectedly to the house of lords, and ordering the commons to attend him. It happened that the Speaker and the usher both met at the door of the house of commons, and the Speaker being got within the house, some of the members suddenly shut the door, and cried out 'To the Chair! To the Chair!' while others cried, 'The Black Rod is at the door.' The Speaker was immediately hurried to the chair, and then it was moved, 1. 'That our Alliance with France was a Grievance. 2. That the Evil Counsellors about the king were a Grievance. And 3. That the duke of Lauderdale was a Grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employed in any office or place of trust. Upon which there was a general cry, 'To the Question! To the Question!' But the Black Rod knocking earnestly at the door, the Speaker leaped out of the chair, and the house rose in great confusion." Echard.

"What a dreadful picture have we here of the disorders of these times! Though there was sufficient cause for a close enquiry into the state of the nation, and a firm opposition to the favourite views of the court: and though the alliance with France, and the ruin of Holland, were equally inconsistent with the interest and safety of England; yet surely such violence and fury, without any previous remonstrances or endeavours to bring the court to reason, more resembled the turbulence of a faction, than the regularity and decorum of a Senate." Ralph.

Next day a sermon was to have been preached before them by Dr. Stillingfleet. And Oldmixon asserts, "That some time this session, a wooden shoe, such as the peasants wear in France, with the arms of England drawn at one end of it, and those of France at the other with these words in the interval, Utrum horum majoris accipe, was laid in the house, near the Speaker's Chair."

and support against our only competitors at sea than to things of less importance; and in the mean while, I will not be wanting to let all my subjects see, that no care can be greater than my own, in the effectual suppressing of Popery; and it shall be your faults if, in your several countries, the laws be not effectually executed against the growth of it.—I will not be idle neither in some other things which may add to your satisfaction; and then I shall expect a suitable return from you. And so I shall give order to the Lord Chancellor to prorogue you to the 7th Jan. next."*

* "During the interval, Shaftsbury, whose intrigues with the mal-content party were now become notorious, was dismissed from the office of Chancellor; and the great seal was given to sir Heneage Finch, by the title of Lord Keeper. The Test had incapacitated Clifford, and the white staff was conferred on sir Tho. Osborne, soon after created earl of Danby, a minister of great abilities, who had risen by his parliamentary talents. Clifford retired into the country and soon after died." Hume.

According to archdeacon Echard, Shaftsbury was dismissed in the following remarkable manner: "The earl was sent for on Sunday morning to court, as was also sir Heneage Finch, attorney general, to whom the Seals were promised. As soon as the earl came, he retired with the king into the closet, while the prevailing party waited in triumph to see him return without the purse. His lordship being alone with the king, said, 'Sir, I know you intend to give the Seals to the attorney general; but I am sure your maj. never designed to dismiss me with contempt.' The king, who could not do an ill-natured thing, replied, 'Cod's-fish, my lord, I will not do it with any circumstance as may look like an affront.' 'Then Sir,' said the earl, 'I desire your maj. will permit me to carry the Seals before you to chapel, and send for them afterwards from my own house.' To which his maj. readily complied; and the earl entertained the king with news, and other diverting stories, till the very minute he was to go to chapel, purposely to amuse the courtiers and his successor, who he believed was upon the rack for fear he should prevail upon the king to change his mind. The king and the still chancellor came out of the closet talking together and smiling, and went together to chapel, which extremely surprized them all, who could have had no opportunity to inform themselves what was to be expected; and some ran immediately to tell the duke of York all their measures were broken, and the attorney general was said to be inconsolable. After sermon the earl went home with the Seals, and that evening the king gave them to the attorney-general, a man of great parts and abilities, with the title of Lord-Keeper. And thus ended the reign of the great earl of Shaftsbury, the prevalency of which had continued above

TWELFTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech at the opening of the Session.] Jan. 7, 1673-4. Both houses met according to the prorogation; and the session was opened with the following Speech from the throne :

“ My Lords and Gentlemen; When I parted with you last, it was but for a little time, and with a resolution of meeting suddenly again. That alone was enough to satisfy my friends that they need not fear, and my enemies that they could not hope for, a breach between us. I then told you, that the time of this short recess should be employed in doing such things as might add to your satisfaction: I hope I have done my part towards it; and if there be any thing else which you think wanting to secure Religion or Propriety, there is nothing which you shall reasonably propose, but I shall be ready to receive it. I do now expect you should do your parts too; for our enemies make vigorous preparations for war; and yet their chief hopes are to disunite us at home: it is their common discourse, and they reckon upon it as their best relief.—My Lords and Gentlemen; It is not possible for me to doubt your affections at any time, much less at such a time as this, when the evidences of your affection are become so necessary to us all. I desire you to consider that as the war cannot be well made without a Supply, so neither can a good peace be had without being in a posture of war. I am very far from being in love with war for war's sake; but, if I saw any likelihood of peace, without dishonour to myself and damage to you, I would soon embrace it: but no proposals of peace have yet been offered, which can be imagined with intent to conclude, but only to amuse. Therefore the way to a good peace is, to set out a good fleet; which we have time enough to do very effectually, if the Supply be not delayed: If, after this, a Peace should follow, yet the Supply would be well given; for whatever remains of it, I am willing it should be appropriated for building more ships.—To conclude: A speedy, a proportionable, and above all a cheerful Aid, is now more necessary than ever; and I rely upon you for it. I lately put you in mind of my Debt to the Goldsmiths: I hope a fit time will come, to take that into consideration.—I cannot conclude without shewing the entire confidence I have in you. I know you have heard much of my alliance with France; and I believe it hath been very strangely misrepresented to you, as if there were certain secret Articles of dangerous consequence; but I will make no difficulty of letting the Treaties and all the Articles of them; without any the least reserve, to be seen by a small committee of both houses, who may report to you the true scope of them; and, I assure you, there is no other Treaty with France, either before or since, not already printed, which shall not be made known. And having thus freely trusted you, I do not doubt but you will have a care of my honour, and the good of the kingdom.—The rest I refer to my Lord Keeper.”

The Lord Keeper Finch's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper came from his place where he stood, and kneeling received his majesty's direction; and returning again to his said place, made this Speech:

“ My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons; The King hath already in part told you what he hath done for you since the last recess, what he is still ready to do, and what it is he doth now expect from you; and this in terms so full and so obliging, so generous and so satisfactory, that he whose affections are not raised by that discourse, he who cannot acquiesce in the fulness of this assurance, he whose heart is not established by it in such a belief as may entirely dispose him to the service of the crown, will hardly be recovered to a better disposition by any other expedient: for indeed what better way can be found to undeceive those who have been abused? The king refers you to the time past, not to his promises, but to his performances; gives men leave to judge by what they see of what they hear, by what hath been done since the last session of what is offered you now, and what is likely to be done for the time to come. And doth not every man see that the king hath given new life and motion to such laws as were long dead, or fast asleep; that he hath once more repaired the hedge about our vineyard, and made it a fence indeed, against all those who are enemies to the planting of it, who would be glad to see it trodden down or rooted up, and study how to sap and undermine our very foundations?—Do we not see that the king hath made it his care and his business to do all that is possible to preserve us in our civil rights too; that he makes the laws of his kingdom the measures, not only of his power, but his prudence; that he suffers no man to be wiser than the law; that he thinks he cannot judge of the health or sickness of his state by any better indication than the current of his laws, and suffers nothing to remain that may in the least measure hinder justice from flowing in its due and proper channels?—A very few instances, of many that might be used, will serve to demonstrate it: If the Conviction of all Recusants, and bringing them under the Penal Laws, can suppress Popery; If, without staying for the forms of law in points of conviction, the present forbidding all papists, or reputed papists, to come to court, and the extending this prohibition to his royal palace at St. James's, be enough to discountenance them; If the not extending his prerogative beyond its due limits can secure your liberties; If his majesty's lessening and reducing all his land forces, and maintaining so few extraordinary, that they will scarce be enough to help to man his fleet this summer, can extinguish the fears of a Standing Army; If a rigorous and severe prosecution at law, of all the officers and soldiers in his majesty's ordinary guards, when they misbehave themselves towards the meanest subject, can secure your properties; If the abrogation of all the privileges from arrears, which were claimed by his majesty's servants extraordinary, who are very numerous, can prevent the delays and obstructions of justice: Then surely his maj. hath reason to believe that nothing is wanting which can lawfully be done, or modestly be wished, either for your satisfaction or your security.—These are not single and transient acts, but such acts as flow from habits; these are not leaves and blossoms, but true, solid, and lasting fruits. Long! long! may that royal tree live and flourish, upon which these fruits do grow!—And yet his majesty's Indulgence to you rests not here: he gives you leave to study and contrive your own assurance; and if you think you want any further security, if any thing have escaped his majesty's care, who meditates nothing more than your preservation, you see you have free leave to make any reasonable proposition, and his gracious promise that he will receive it.—This is a satisfaction equal to all your wishes: now, if ever, your joys are full. There wants no more to the improvement of this happiness, but the wisdom of the parliament to use these advantages with a due moderation.—If, therefore, upon enquiry, you shall think it needful to apply any other Remedies, it is extremely to be wished that those remedies may be few, and withal, that they may be gentle and easy too: for they that are sick perish as often by too many remedies, as by none at all; but none fall so fatally and so finally, as they who, being entered into some degrees of convalescence, resolve to recover in an instant, and had rather make some great effort, or try some bold experiment upon themselves, than observe the methods, or attend those gradual progressions, which are necessary to perfect that health, and compleat that recovery.—I must not omit one instance more of his majesty's care for you; and that is, the great industry and application of mind which his maj. hath used all along, in hopes to have obtained by this time, if it had been possible, an honourable and a just peace.—A very few words will serve to give you the whole deduction of it, from the first original to this present moment. Much time was spent in agreeing the place of Treaty, wherein the Dutch were gratified in their desires, and the city of Cologne is accepted for the place.—When his majesty's ambassadors arrived there, the very first meeting with those from the States General made it evident, that their plenipotentiaries came not with any intention to enter upon a serious Treaty, but only to draw the matter out into length, until their affairs might meet with a better and more pleasing conjuncture: for their very credentials or plenipotencies were so penned, that there were no less than four gross equivocations in the body of them; which was so manifest, and without all reply, that they were fain to send to their masters at the Hague, to get them amended.—But that which gave greatest offence of all, and was purposely done for that end, was the Preamble, wherein they take upon them to beg the question, to decide the justice of the cause, and to affirm such matters of fact, as they had reason to believe would never be admitted.—No arguments of our ambassadors, no instances of the mediators, though never so importunate, could prevail then, or yet can prevail, to have it altered.—The Treaty should naturally have stopt here, but that his maj. was resolved to give a beginning to it, and (which was all that could be done) suffered his ambassadors to enter upon it with a protestation. Our demands are no sooner given in, but presently two of the Dutch ambassadors go away to the Hague on pretence to consult their masters, where they staid a full month, without any kind of Answer given, or exceptions taken to his majesty's demands, or any the least step made in this negotiation.—When they came back, their Answer was a Remonstrance rather than an answer, and such a remonstrance as was fitter for a rupture than a treaty: there was scarce one period in it which did not rather give occasion of new offence, than any satisfaction for what was passed.—Their very conversation from that time forward wanted much of its former civility. They waited for the conclusion of a Treaty with Spain; wherein one Article was, That as soon as Spain had broke with France, they would presently break off the Treaty at Cologne. And now this Article is in effect performed; for two of their principal ambassadors are actually gone away from Cologne, as they long threatened they would do, leaving only two other for form sake, who in all probability either must not, or will not, conclude without their colleagues.—His majesty, notwithstanding, hath not suffered himself to be diverted from using all the ways and means that were possible, to facilitate a peace. To this end, he directed his ambassadors, from time to time, to moderate their demands in such particulars as were capable of it; and wholly relaxes some points which were of highest importance to the Dutch to gain, and very considerable abatements of his majesty's just satisfaction; a condescension well received and esteemed by the mediators, though it have not yet found any suitable reception from the Dutch ministers, or their superior lords.—By this time they began to hope that the subjects of England would grow weary of the war, and that they should be able to profit themselves very much by our impatience. To increase this as much as was possible, they prepare a Letter, which they send by a trumpeter, sitting the parliament, or very near it, and cause it to be given out that nothing more could be desired than they had offered.—His maj. quickly made that Letter, and his Answer to it, public; and for that time defeated the design of this Paper Stratagem.—Their next recourse was, to such Proposals as they could procure the Spanish ambassador to deliver on their behalfs; wherein, besides the demands of Restitution of Prizes, which was wholly impracticable, there was a total omission of any regulation of trade in the Indies; no mention made of releasing his majesty's subjects at Surinam, where they remain in a state of bondage; no recompence offered in, or so much as leave asked for, the liberty of Fishing upon our coasts: and yet the Right of our sole Fishing is so clear, that we find in our ancient Rolls of Parliament, in the time of Rd. ii. a Tax laid upon all strangers who fish in our seas; and this not by way of custom when they come into our ports, but by way of Tribute for Fishing in our Seas; and this evidence of his majesty's Dominion within his own Seas hath been in all ages downward preserved in some measure, until the time of the late Usurper, who for private reasons first abandoned it.—As for that satisfaction in the Matter of the Flag which the Proposals mention, it is but reasonable to understand it in that sense wherein they sometimes used to express themselves at Cologne; that is, the thing shall be done, whole fleets shall strike their sails to single ships, and they shall do it out of his majesty's Seas too; but that of Right they ought so to do, will never be acknowledged.—So they desire to change the ancient inheritance of the crown into a new purchase, and to turn that purchase into a matter of civility, which they may equally pay to all crowned heads, and equally resume, according to their good pleasure and occasions.—Now, though these Proposals have been backed with some kind of intimation of a war with Spain in case of a refusal; yet his majesty, who knows the Articles of Peace between himself and that king, and his own care to preserve them, who knows the usefulness of his alliance to that king, and the many good offices he hath been always ready to do for him, and withal considers the great wisdom and prudence of that council, and how carefully they use to deliberate before they come to great and important resolutions, will not easily believe it possible for that king to proceed to such extremities; the rather, because the Dutch themselves have since departed from those very Proposals which they procured the Spanish ambassador so earnestly to recommend; for they afterward sent the ambassador a Reply to his majesty's Answer to their Letter, wherein they abate much of what the ambassador had offered, and seek to reduce things to the state they were in at Breda. So that it is hard to know by what kind of Proposals they intend to be bound; but it is most reasonable to believe they intend those made by themselves, rather than those made for them.—And yet this Reply, besides the disrespect it carried to Spain, whose Proposals it shrunk from, was so offensive to his majesty, that the ambassador, like a wise and a minister, that is, like himself, thought it became him to send it back again, without offering to present it.—Nevertheless this Paper hath since stolen into the press, and is printed at the Hague as a Letter delivered, and hath been sent hither under covers to several members of the house of commons, of that house of commons whom they libeled in the former war for their zeal, and now pretend to reverence for their deliberation; and all this in hopes you will not think them obstinate, who refuse to treat at the place of their own appointment, or to be well understood any where else.—How is it possible to understand these proceedings to be real, and with a true desire of peace? and if they should yet send during this session any new proposal (for who knows the designs of an enemy?), what form soever those overtures may be dressed in, we may justly suspect that their end is, if they cannot divide us, at least to amuse us, and lessen our care in providing for the war. Perhaps it is more than an honourable war doth allow, to go about to raise sedition, though in the country of an enemy; but surely the artifice of appealing in a manner to the people, and making them the judges of peace and war, is a little too plain and open to take any effect here.—I have done with these few instances of his majesty's Care. Those of his Kindness are infinite; that which you have heard this morning is of a transcendent, and indeed a very surprising nature; it is an act of so entire a confidence on his majesty's part, that it can never be repaid by any other tribute on your part, but that of a true and humble affiance in him.—I must now proceed to put you in mind that there are some other things, which his maj. with great justice and great assurance doth expect from you again.—The first is, a speedy and a proportionable Supply; and this is of absolute necessity both for war and peace. His maj. is well assured, his fleet is in such a forwardness, that, if the Supply come in any reasonable time, you will find no time hath been lost in preparation; and it was no small matter to bring it to that pass, that we may be as forward as our enemies if we please, or very near it. If the Supply be at all delayed, it will have as ill effect almost as if it were denied; for we may chance to be found, like Archimedes, drawing lines in the dust, while the enemy is entering into our ports. And if the further progress of this fleet be stopt for want of your concurrence, make account all hopes of peace are stopt too; for, though the fruit of war be peace, yet it is such a fruit as we must not hope to gather without our arms in our hands.—It is not the way to have a brave peace, to shew ourselves weary of the war. Who ever trusted to the good-nature of their enemies? It is a vigorous assistance of the crown, that must make not only your arms considerable, but your treaties too.—On the other side, if the putting of yourselves into a good posture of war should produce a peace, as possibly it may do, yet you will have the best account of your Supply your hearts can wish; for his maj. is content it be appropriated to the building of more ships. Therefore, if the discourse upon this subject be a little more pressing than ordinary, you may be sure the occasion is so too.—There cannot be a higher gratification of your enemies, than to be backward in this point. The very opinion they have that you would be so, hath already done us so much harm, that perhaps it is one great cause of the continuance of the war. Had the enemy despaired of any division here, it is likely his proceedings had been more sincere, and our peace had not been so far off as now it seems to be.—There is one thing more the king hath mentioned, and only mentioned to you; that is the consideration of the Goldsmiths, which involves so many persons and families, that the concern is little less than national: it is an affair the king lays very much to heart, and hopes a proper time will come when a favourable regard may be had of it.—My Lords and Gentlemen; The king doth not only assure himself of your affections to him at this time; but, from such affections so known and so tried as yours, he doth yet expect far greater things than these.—He doth expect that you should do your endeavours to restore and improve the mutual confidence between him and his people, and that you should do it to such a degree, that it may recover its full strength, and quite extinguish all their Fears and Jealousies; for the king takes notice, that the malice of his enemies hath been very active, in sowing so many tares as are almost enough to spoil that harvest of love and duty which his maj. may justly expect to reap from the good seed which he himself had sown.—Among the many venomous insinuations which have been made use of, the Fears and Jealousies of Religion and Liberty are of the worst sort, and the most dangerous impressions. Certainly malice was never more busy than it hath been in these reports, and it hath been assisted by a great deal of invention. But it is to be hoped that no man's judgment or affections will be either misled or disturbed by such reports: for calumnies and slanders of this nature are like comets in the air; they may seem perhaps, especially to the fearful, to be ill prognostics, and the direst forerunners of mischief; but in themselves they are vain apparitions, and have no kind of solidity, no permanence or duration at all; for after a little while, the vapour spends itself, and then the base exhalation quickly falls back again into that earth from whence it came.—Religion and Liberty stand secured by the most sacred ties that are; nay, the king hath a greater interest in the preservation of both than you yourselves; for, as Religion, the Protestant religion, commands your indispensable obedience, so it is a just and lawful Liberty which sweetens that command, and endears it to you. Let other princes therefore glory in the most resigned obedience of their vassals. His maj. values himself upon the hearts and affections of his people, and thinks his throne, when seated there, better established than the most exalted sovereignty of those who tread upon the necks of them that rise up against them. Since the world stood, never any king had so great a cause to rest upon this security. They were your hearts that mourned in secret for the absence of the king. They were your hearts and affections to the king, which tired out all the late usurpations, by your invincible patience and fortitude. It was you that taught our English world to see and know, that no government could be settled here, but upon the true foundations of honour and allegiance. This, this alone, made way for all the happy changes which have followed. And yet posterity will have cause to doubt, which was the greater felicity of the two, that Providence which restored the crown, or that which sent us such a parliament to preserve it when it was restored. What may not the king now hope from you? what may not you assure yourselves from him? Can any thing be difficult to hearts so united, to interests so twisted and interwoven together, as the king's and yours are? Doubtless the king will surpass himself at this time, in endeavouring to procure the good of the kingdom. Do you but excel yourselves too, in the continued evidences of your affections; and then the glory of reviving this state will be entirely due to this session. Then they who wait for the languishing and the declination of the present government will be amazed to see so happy a crisis, so blest a revolution; and ages to come will find cause to celebrate your memories, as the truest physicians, the wisest counsellors, the noblest patriots, and the best session of the best parliament, that ever king or kingdom met with."

Address of both Houses for a Fast.] Notwithstanding these Speeches, both houses soon manifested their discontent at the continuance of the War with Holland, at the exorbitant power of France, the prevalence of Popish Counsels, &c. which they took care to signify, by joining in an Address to his majesty for a General Fast, using these very words: "We your majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, &c. being passionately sensible of the calamitous condition of this kingdom, not only by reason of the war wherein it is at present involved, but many other intestine differences and divisions amongst us, which are chiefly occasioned by the undermining contrivances of Popish Recusants, whose numbers and insolencies are greatly of late increased, and whose restless practices threaten a subversion both of Church and State; all which our sins have justly deserved; and being now assembled in parliament as the great council of this your kingdom to consult on such means as we shall think fittest to redress the present evils, wherewith we are surrounded; we do, in the first place, humbly beseech your majesty, that, by your special command, one or more days be solemnly set apart, wherein both ourselves and this your kingdom may, by Fasting and Prayer, seek a reconciliation at the hands of Almighty God; and with humble and penitent hearts beseech him to heal our breaches; to remove the evils we lie under; and to avert those miseries wherewith we are threatened; to continue the mercies we yet enjoy; and that he will be graciously pleased to bestow his abundant blessing upon your maj. and this present parliament, that all our councils and consultations may tend to his glory, and the honour, safety, and prosperity of your majesty, and all your people."—To which the king readily replied, and the 4th of Feb. was appointed.

Debate on pressing Men for Soldiers.] Jan. 22. Mr. Sacheverell complains of pressing for soldiers men of quality, against Magna Charta, and persons put to death against law: articles of war were complained of in the last session, to set up martial law: you have made particular laws about burning of houses, and yet by those articles they may burn houses and stacks of corn, and death to any soldier that shall disobey: soldiers sent beyond sea, which would stay here, for our safety: therefore it is to no end to proceed to particular business till these things are remedied: he has told you his thoughts, and hopes that other gentlemen will do the like.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. It will not be found out that men have been sent out of England against their wills: in queen Eliz.'s time, she succoured France, and sent men into Ireland, and no act of parliament for doing it then: never heard of any complaint of injuries done by the soldiers, but it was remedied; but the complaint should be, that such things have been done 'by authority:' avers that no such things have been done by the king's authority: the Articles were the same as in lord Essex's army, and lord Strafford's, the best of them extracted, and only to be executed when the army is beyond sea: when you find a fault, then lay it there: let not the disorders of particular men be thought general: the king has told you what he is willing to do, and pray proceed to the king's Speech.

Mr. Sacheverell. The Articles were published by the king's authority.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The king's name may be used, but you will find them by prince Rupert's authority: they determine with his commission.

Sir John Monson. As to the pressing of men in queen Eliz.'s, and Edw. 6th's time, the 16th of Cha. 1. declared it illegal, and an act was then particular for the pressing of men for Ireland: it is said, we have had redress, when complained of, but we cannot but reflect, with what applause the Triple League was entertained, (that was too great a happiness to enjoy) but what we have had since, let every man judge: dates the design from the great persons going into France, and the consequence, shutting up the Exchequer, and the Declaration, which struck at all our laws, temporal and ecclesiastical, and all to countenance Popery: the parliament then was by the same hand prorogued, that we might not consider other things: the forces sent out of Ireland, little to be spared there; the joy of the Papists; but an army was the foundation of their joy, which they flocked to, and had commands in: we have had invasion of property; and till grievances are redressed, we cannot proceed any farther: hopes we shall have time to give those persons thanks who had a hand in the prorogation, declaration, &c. and hopes we shall be rid of popery and popish counsellors.

Mr. Sec. Coventry does say he did not exempt Grievances, when he moved for the consideration of the king's speech.

Mr. Russel. You have had so exact an account, that he has little farther to say of our deplorable condition: with an ill prince we must pray and suffer, but when God has blessed us with so good a king, and yet property, religion, and all invaded, we ought to find out the authors of our misfortunes, the ill ministers about the king, that prorogued the parliament; stopped the proceedings of the courts of justice; broke Articles, in that attack of the Smyrna fleet; shut up the Exchequer: have Pensions from France, and accuse us of being Pensioners to Holland: desires not their ruin but the security of our lives and fortunes for the future.

Debate on Mr. Mallet's reading his Speech.] Mr. Mallet read a long speech.

Sir Cha. Harbord takes him down to order. The precedent of reading a speech is dangerous: the attorney, now Lord Keeper, reprehended him once only for making use of heads in a paper; pray never let speeches be read in parliament.

Sir Tho. Lee. Mallet was irregularly interrupted: if his memory be not so good as others, he may be indulged to make use of his paper, and would have people write what they intend to speak.

Mr. Garroway. It may be Mr. Mallet cannot contract his notions as other men can do, and he would have him read his speech: you may but wink and it is the same thing.

Sir Rob. Howard. Reading all and reading some is the same thing, and he believes he has almost done, as he observes, by the paper in his hand.

Sir Wm. Lewis. The best reason he has yet heard for his going on, is 'that he has almost done:' it may be without doors ill reported, not to let him make an end; though he is not for reading of entire speeches, yet short notes are always commendable; he may go on for this time, but hopes you will not admit it for the future.

Debate on Grievances.] Col. Birch. Is glad to see how merrily we begin, and hopes we shall continue so; it is the great part of an orator to persuade, but hopes, as paper speeches may be laid aside here, they may also be in other places (the pulpits): we have leave to debate our own security by the king's and the lord keeper's speech, and therefore will open our present condition; doubts not but the king will at last find, that they who advise him to follow the parliament's counsel are his best subjects; the Grievances, as to law, have been opened very well, and the remedy, in some part; but thinks all in vain, if, by any means, we are incited to carry on this league with France, and war with Holland; and because of the second article of the treaty with France, 'the setting up the Catholic religion in every conquered town in Holland,' if we must go on in that union, leaves it to every man's conscience in the consequence: would not do by day, what he shall be ashamed of at night, that his conscience shall give him the lie: how we entered into this war he remembers: the Triple Alliance we thanked the king heartily for; how we came out of it, the Instructions will give you an account: the greatest princes have called parliaments to advise in peace and war; but he is still doubting that this parliament was prorogued by strong persuasion: what is under the Great Seal is a man's freehold. We have not had a smile, since the French alliance began, and the second article of that alliance is to set up the Pope; and now we are invited to carry on that war, he cannot consent to it: the consequence would have been, if the French king had continued in his greatness by conquests, we had not been doing here what we do now: either France or Holland must be bigger: if France, we may purchase what we fear; if Holland, they may be too big to grant: would be far from doing any thing derogatory to the king; but when the League is not honourable nor safe for the king, he cannot find arguments to part with our Money for the support of it.

Mr. Sec. Coventry would know what it is he should speak to; several things relating to the war [then he paused—was bid go on.] As to the business of the war, he was ordered to tell Sweden, where he was ambassador, 'that if the king of France invaded any of the Spanish dominions, our king would defend the Triple League: the proposition was, 'in every town the French should have rendered to them, they should have a Papist Church as we would have a Protestant.' Every man must answer in his turn for his actions, as he must do for his; but would not give an opinion to continue a war against the genius of the nation: but you have no peace, nor likelihood of any, but what must come from the conduct of this house, which a good Vote will certainly do, he believes: tell the king your Grievances, but so supply him that the navy may go on, which, you know, needs it: and if you put the king into these straits and desperation, what will be the consequence? Now for the Declaration against the French Treaty; being so deserted, Holland will have no need of you. Can any man have the impudence to say, that because you have a treaty with France; you are obliged to fight to the last man? Secure things in the treaty how you please, that the money may not be attached, and that it may be for shipping (which, under favour, the navy must have): moves that you will propose Grievances, and in the mean time that the kingdom may be secured.

Mr. Garraway. Secretary Coventry desires 'that you would not press the king:' wonders at it: when we were prorogued two months, those that advised it 'pressed the king,' and we must postpone all considerations, without consideration of Religion, Property, or Trade: nothing, but we must carry on a war we know not how long; let those good counsellors that advised it look after it: did our ambassadors give Holland no security by the Triple League and Breda, that we would not fall on them? We are told, 'that our war will ruin our plantations;' since March last we have laid out 300,000*l.* in freight to strangers; our corn vessels, passing from port to port, taken; some of our great ships swept away by the Dutch; our men pressed for sea and land; the gentleman said, the last session 'he would warrant a peace with a vote for money,' but now he says otherwise: Londoners are at a tax upon the collier, and in the country we pay five and six pounds per chaldron: the ploughman finds his wants: it is 300,000*l.* tax to London by proportion, and this is one of the benefits you have by the war, and the effects are upon the counties about London, decay of manufacture! War is a subtle thing; lose a correspondence in trade, and you know not how to get it again; the making bays, a great trade, you have lost by this war; if France can supply Spain with commodities, as they left you in the war so they will do in trade; we employ all foreigners for shipping, and if the war continues, your Act of Navigation will be of no use; pressing of seamen! By the last fatal war you saw that the courage of your nation, when deserted by the French, brought you off; the French may serve you so by land; a war at sea will never make an end of the war; grass grew in Middleburgh streets, now grown rich by depredations this war; is one of those that are for peace, and hopes it is no crime to offer things with modesty; would not depend upon the Spanish ambassador, but upon a war upon the English interest, and never saw want of money or help; cleanse the house at home; know those that have intrigued you; he would not sweep away gentlemen by general Votes; would reach them according to law, and go upon things: the Keeper says in his speech, 'the fleet is in good readiness;' money remains not paid in of the last tax, prizes, and the advance upon the excise farm; therefore would have full enquiry into the state of the kingdom, but not like empirics, to give a catholicism for all diseases; but let gentlemen propose the State of Affairs, and go upon that.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If we had gone on, the last prorogation, things might not have been at this pass; but as those evil Counsellors about the king persuaded him then, they do still exasperate him, that our best counsels will be perverted; this is the great grievance: if it be apparent that any sort of men do design the ruin of the kingdom, so as to prostitute the king's word; and if any new treason be enacted, would have that made one: it is of consequence never to be recovered: no example that ever any war of this nature began without parliament. Instances Edw. i, Edw. iii, and Hen. v, the miracle of men, that (unless our king) never any of more honour and gallantry since Julius Cæsar's time. Hen. viii. as ambitious, perhaps, as any, young, and though his coffers were full, advised, in the 3d year of his reign, with his parliament, about making of war: the best thing to rivet the king and his people, is mutual confidence. 43 Edw. iii, when he was to make peace with Scotland with David Bruce, he advised with his parliament: Rd. ii. would not make peace without subjecting his articles to the parliament: hopes, if so now, we shall do it for the king's honour. We may date a great deal of our misfortunes from the Million Act: submits to all gentlemen's opinions here, the universal hatred against this French alliance: we were so jealous formerly of our ports, that no foreigners scarce with a packet-boat were suffered to enter them without leave, but now whole shoals of them: but it occurs to him, that the alliance with France is broken; all alliances are understood as to circumstances of things when made; it is strange that we should consent to the 'Popish Article:' moves to adjourn the house till tomorrow, that we may enumerate our Grievances before we enter upon the debate of Supply: would have the Test law against Popery revived, and some things added to it, and all to take it that are in the king's counsels, and something for the security of the king's person; and would have Religion, after the king's death, secured, and the Statute of Suggestions, for men to undergo a penalty if they make not accusation; out; but the first thing to enter upon, would have 'the Counsellors;' we have always gracious Answers from the king, but they are still intercepted: Proclamation against papists, and yet priests are walking in Whitehall in defiance of it; Popish commanders at the head of companies; no minister sent with our companies into France to comfort the sick, and to do other spiritual offices, but exposed to Popery: one man has had 7 pardons for treason and murder; shall we not put such out of the reach of pardon? the general pardon would not suffice, but special ones must be obtained since that pardon: would go first upon 'evil Counsellors.'

Lord Cavendish. When we consider the prerogation, and the other misfortunes of the nation, fears we shall have the same advice as long as such 'Counsellors' are about the king: moves in the first place, that we proceed to secure the nation by removing them.

Sir John Monson. When 'Counsellors' have pardons in their pockets, from murder to petty larceny, what security can the kingdom have? Therefore agrees with the motions made before.

Sir Cha. Wheeler, should be glad that the king might have some prospect, through this vote, that, when our Grievances are redressed, we may take his Supply into consideration: we carry on all things for the interest of the nation, and assist him upon the public interest of the nation, and no farther.

Sir Rob. Howard was sorry for the prorogation when it was, but as the king has now invited and trusted, you, make him not jealous of us: the eyes of all the world are upon us now, and should we not do things as amicably as possible, the censures of the people will lie as heavy upon us, as in any other thing: winds up all in this motion, 'To order an Address to the king to give him thanks for his trust and invitation, and to tell him there remains something as to our 'security:' no doubt we want many things, but shall we slip by the king in his invitations? Knows it not in your hearts, and if 'Evil Counsellors' be one thing, and all other things are considered one by one, then you are in a method.

Sir Tho. Lee. The expression of Howard's of 'passing by the king,' is harsh; the war's long debated is not a 'passing by the king.'

Mr. Jones, would always be tender in reflective expressions; he has neither preparation, nor intention, to offer Grievances, but from the greatness of the debate, and the place he serves for, (London) something is expected he should say about their Grievances; he has sufficiently expressed his loyalty in the worst times, but being not a man of trade, knows no more than those that walk the streets speak of: the imposition upon Coals is hard upon the rich, but destructive to the poor: thousands had died for the want of them, but for the favourableness of the weather: he has known London these 45 years, and never knew that impudence in meetings that the Papists have now; they are so in most parts about; a great aggravation of their insolence and increase, that they attempt meeting where it never was: protections from the lords house, and this, ruin trade, together with shutting up the Exchequer; how can we be secure, that the Exchequer be not stopped to-morrow again? If ruin were at the door, and the nation ready to sink, who will send 100*l.* thither? Still the Goldsmiths are postponed; was it their personal concern, would not regard it, but thousands are concerned in it.

The Question being propounded, That the Thanks of the house be returned to his majesty, for his gracious Speech; and the question being put, That the house do now proceed in the debate of that question, it passed in the affirmative, 191 to 139.

Resolved. "1. That this house will proceed, in the first place, to have Grievances effectually redressed, the Protestant Religion, Liberties, and Properties, effectually secured, to suppress Popery, and to remove persons, and Counsellors, popishly affected, or otherwise obnoxious, or dangerous, to the government." 2. "That the humble and hearty Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty for his gracious Promises and Assurances in his last Speech, and for those Acts which he has done since the last prorogation, towards the suppressing and discounteouncing of Popery; and that he would please to give order for the Militia of London, Westminster, and Middlesex, to be ready at an hour's warning, and the other Militia of the kingdom at a day's warning, for the suppressing any tumultuous meeting of Papists, or other malecontent persons whatsoever; and that the house will go with this Address to his majesty in a body."

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE DUKE OF LAUDERDALE.

Jan. 13. Mr. Stockdale. Many Grievances have been represented; the way is now, how you will redress your grievances? the last session produced many good votes as to that, but we were prorogued; and to the intent that that may not happen again, consider that the same Counsellors are interposing, and interpreting our intentions may procure the same prorogation; therefore moves to begin with the last part of the vote first, viz. 'Evil Counsellors.' You cannot have Grievances effectually redressed, without removing those that have advised these things, and, when that is done, he perhaps will name one.

Sir Rob. Thomas. We have a great many Grievances; hazard of Religion, Counsellors advising the king to take away religion and properties: must name one; (by the bye, the Black Rod being called in by you, Mr. Speaker, the last session, before he knocked *, he could not do it then) a person that has contributed as much to our misfortunes as any man; the duke of Lauderdale—You will have proofs of his advice by four of your members; viz. '† Your majesty is bound in honour to justify your Edicts: I wonder at the confidence of any person to deny your majesty's Edicts, and those persons that do, I think, deserve to be most severely punished ‡.' The act of the Militia in Scotland, 'which forces are to be in a readiness to be called to march into England or Ireland, upon any service where the honour, authority, or greatness of the king shall be concerned.' Other gentlemen know more: he has great forces in readiness and pay, and for no other end, he believes, than to awe us.

Sir Nich. Cusw. We should never have

† The expressions mentioned in the Journal are, "Your majesty's Edicts ought to be obeyed; for your majesty's Edicts are equal with the laws, and ought to be observed in the first place."

‡ "A gentleman, there present, informed me, that the king should say to Mr. Penyston Whalley (the person then before the council) 'I wonder that you should withstand my Declaration. Vol. IV.

Grievances, but by such 'Counsellors:' the duke is at the head of a great army in Scotland; desires that we may move the king, that he may keep there and return no more into England.

Sir Tho. Littleton. The words are ready, and desires you will order the gentlemen that heard them, to declare them.

Sir Rob. Thomas names sir Scroope Howe,* Mr. Man, and Mr. Rob. Pierpoint †, who heard the words, and lord St. John.

Lord St. John. The last session, Feb. he was called to do it, but then refused, because there was a dispute then betwixt the duke of Lauderdale and himself; Mr. Howe, then sick, being concerned for Mr. Whalley, desired him to go hear the business at the Council, where Mr. Whalley (a justice of peace in Nottinghamshire) was summoned, who had committed a preacher, contrary to the Declaration. Whalley was to answer the contempt, the parson had no licence to preach, but entry was made of it in the Secretary's Book; a law bound Whalley, and a Declaration did not bind him. Lauderdale then spoke the words mentioned by sir Rob. Thomas, that he wondered at the words and said, 'Lauderdale may be questioned in parliament.' Some members being present, Lauderdale spoke as before, none else of the Council spoke, and all were bid to withdraw.

Sir Scroope Howe averred the words as before; Mr. Pierpoint, and Mr. Man likewise.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Now you are possessed of this, he shall offer his sense: the last session, we were cut off in the beginning: in Scotland, an army is raised by this great duke; though by act of parliament, yet his power is great, and the army under his power: it is in vain to act here, without converting our thoughts to Scotland. Pray God! this be not elsewhere: a man, so principled and arbitrary! You had need look about you; needs say nothing to aggravate, the bare thing aggravates itself: a cloud hangs over us, and it is high time it was scattered; it has made Counsellors in England so much the bolder: moves 'to address the king to exclude the duke of Lauderdale from his Councils in England' keep him from counsels here, and you may shake his authority in Scotland; he is in all respects a commoner ‡, and so we cannot clash with the lords in point of trial: there are 20,000 foot, and 2000 horse, ready in Scotland, and no colour for it: a man of such principles is not fit to be trusted with such an army, nor with

Sir Ch. Harbord has a double charge against him, that of the army in Scotland, and his words at the Council here. You may miss of trial, but an Act may reach him.

Mr. Dalmahoy has heard the duke of Lauderdale deny the words: he was not in Scotland when the Act about the Militia was made: he knows not who was then commissioner.

Mr. Powle supposes that every man is sensible of a pernicious design to alter the government, and these Counsellors have brought us to the brink of destruction: we have a gracious prince, but the great design was, first to abuse the king, and then to oppress the people, fearing his good disposition to us: the Triple League was made to check a great prince: to ruin the Protestant religion was the design, and, without Money, that was not to be carried on, which money was given for the maintaining the Triple Alliance; and then more money was got, by stopping the Exchequer, to the undoing of many hundreds of persons—Then a Declaration for the ease of tender consciences, and, under pretence of Toleration, suspending by it all ecclesiastical laws, and, in consequence, laying all laws aside: upon the declaration of war against Holland, armies were raised, and popish officers at the head of them, and in places of civil authorities, honours, and dignities; then Popish officers are sent over into Ireland, Papists put into trust and office there; then in Scotland, an army is raised to march into England, &c. or for any other cause wherein 'the king's honour or greatness may be concerned;' but the greatness of the king consists in governing a free people: the parliament supplied and brought him from banishment, and, because the king would hearken to their advice, they must be prorogued, the juncture of their time not being fit for the fleet against Holland; they suppose we would give, and, if not, the necessity must justify raising of money: what benefit had we but fruitless battles at sea, and engaging us, by the French, with his allies? The king was persuaded that the parliament would not assist his interest, but doubts not but time will demonstrate the contrary: when we would have reached these men, we were prorogued, and now there is a necessity of giving money: the king's credit lost, the people poor, jealousies great, and all might have been remedied by our meeting—Lauderdale asserted 'Edicts superior to law,' and it was spoken in the presence of the king and council; no greater argument, though some, he doubts not, have done it privately, but he publicly: Hamilton's book asserts the king's authority of raising Money without Parliament, and it was countenanced by Lauderdale in 1667. When lord Rothes was commissioner, then was the foundation of this army, but it came not to maturity till 1669, when Lauderdale was commissioner; it was then kept on foot, and boasted of: it is not unknown at what vast greatness this person has lived, thereby bringing the king into necessity, and disobliging the house, that we should not supply: Lauderdale sued out the king's pardon; a new trick our great men have gotten, fearing our enquiry, and would arm themselves against us with the king's pardon; let this be considered and weighed well: less crimes than these have brought men to the scaffold, but the temper of this house is not desirous of blood. The 5th Rd. ii. counsellors were removed without cause; the people only spoke ill of them. 11 Rd. ii. the duke of Ireland, and sir John Crosby were impeached; the people spoke ill of them. 20 Hen. vi. the lord Dudley, for the same cause: It may be the case of peers of England, and this upon no other article but merely the people speaking ill of them. 3d Ch. i. remonstrance against the duke of Bucks, bishop Neale, and abp. Laud, to be removed, as evil counsellors: moves, "That this great person, the duke of Lauderdale, may for ever be removed from the king's presence."

Mr. Sec. Coventry. To condemn a man, without hearing, he never knew the precedent before in this house.

Mr. Stockdale. If for taking away blood, witnesses must be sworn; but to remove this man you have testimony sufficient to ground an Address to the king; so notorious a man!

Sir Rob. Carr. A person was accused, and you gave a day: moves to consider of it.

Col. Birch. It is true, there was a person had a day, but he had no pardon, and he would have Lauderdale sent where 'Edicts' are in fashion.

Sir John Duncombe. It is hard to condemn a man without being heard; 'removed from the king's presence' is as hard a judgment as a man can have: thinks it worthy consideration to give him a day.

Sir John Trevor. If you proceed merely to suspend him from the king's 'Counsels,' you may do it, but if from the king's 'presence' where no manner of proof is taken, you ought to give him a day: by way of confiscation, or attainder, you give time, but as to 'removal from counsels,' you need give none.

Mr. Hawe. He was the most active person to bring the late king to his murder: he was solicitor from Scotland to bring the late king to the block, and to destroy this king by giving ill advice to him.

Mr. Garroway has often heard that this man brought the Declaration from Scotland to bring the late king to the block, and those people had a horror for the fact: would have him come and answer it here, and all that are concerned with him: he has heard of one Murray, kept in the Tower, by the instigation of Lauderdale, for complaining against him; these are violences, when no writs of Habeas Corpus can be had; and would send to the Gatehouse, where he now stands committed, for the Mittimus: you will find it of his own making, and illegal: agrees to the Address for removing him; and would have a Bill to make it treason if ever he return hither again.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. If he be guilty of this horrid crime alleged, will not defend him; neither will he condemn him without proof.

Sir John Birkenhead. The duke of Ireland, Oxford, and Somerset, had a day assigned them—No man has been banished the king's presence on this formality, though you cannot have greater evidence; it may be he may confess it: many things are law in Scotland, and not so here; would not have a precedent to reach every body: assign him a day, and you will tread more safely, and do him right, and no man wrong.

Sir Tho. Littleton, has heard a great man in the Rump, and a counsellor then, say, 'That Lauderdale did solicit that bloody Kirk-Declaration against the king;' does not name the person, because desired not do it: would have him removed from the king's person and counsels for ever. This thing is not so hard, he at a great distance, and great affairs in Scotland to attend, and so he may excuse himself from coming, and perhaps when come we may not be sitting, and if he will come, at any time, he may be tried by parliament.

Col. Sundys. Since he has heard that Lauderdale had some part in the king's murder, that has raised him; and would have him as much sequestered from the world, as from the King, and would have 'a Bill of Attainder against him.'

Mr. Sacheverell fears that this lord has not lost his old evil principles, but improved them; the Scotch Act of Militia plainly shows it: It puts the king in power plainly to alter any thing in Church or State, and so, by this army, Popery may be set up: not content to keep their law in Scotland, but printed here by authority: it was done this time twelvemonth, when the question was, whether all your laws must be set aside; and therefore is for secluding him for ever from the king's presence, and an Act of banishment.

Col. Strangways would have the words 'obnoxious and dangerous' retained in the Vote: our Saviour pardoned them that persecuted him, but where a man, by after-actions, has done ill, his righteousness shall be forgotten, when transgressing de novo: he abhors the crime; but consider your case; 'sequestering him from the king's presence and the kingdom:' common fame from this house is a greater ground for accusation than thought to be.

Sir R. Temple does not remember that, by any of the precedents, men were sent for, and time given them to answer; this vote is with that moderation, 'to remove' only: would add something, that it may have more strength, viz 'as a man found by this house to be dangerous.' Has heard of his being no less arbitrary in Scotland than here; to have made himself a perpetual commissioner there.

Sir John Monson hears it said, 'that every subject has right to come into the king's presence;' therefore to prevent that, when we are up, would have a Bill, as well as an Address now.

Sir Ehab Harvey would have a Bill ordered to make it treason for him to return to England.

Mr. Waller thinks as bad of this case as any man here: If so much had been against lord Strafford, would not have then been against his Impeachment.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The bill as proposed, is contradictory to what you have spoken of 'removing him from the king's presence.' The king may remove him, by his own power, 'from his presence,' at the request of any private man, and when it is done, it is well done: every subject has a right of petitioning the king, though he be not of his bed-chamber or council; but it is not so easy a thing to exclude any man out 'of the kingdom.' To make a precedent to exclude a man 'the kingdom,' without hearing him, cannot agree to it.

Mr. Boscawen desires that lord Clarendon's Bill of banishment may not be a precedent: that was done somewhat hastily.

Sir Tho. Clarges would have a Bill 'to forbid him coming within 12 miles of the court, wherever the king shall be:' will consent to that, and no farther.

Resolved nem. con. "That an Address be presented to his majesty to remove the duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his presence and councils, for ever; being a person obnoxious and dangerous to the government."

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

A Letter being brought in to the Speaker, signed "Buckingham," on his offering to read it,

Mr. Stackdale said, He would not have the Letter now read, he having something to offer against the duke of Buckingham.* Whatever

* "The duke of Buckingham was a man of a noble presence. He had a great liveliness of wit, and a peculiar faculty of turning all things into ridicule with bold figures and natural descriptions. He had no sort of literature; only he was drawn into chemistry; and for some years he thought he was very near finding the Philosopher's Stone. He had no principles of religion, virtue, or friendship; pleasure, frolic, or extravagant diversion, was all that he laid to heart. He was true to nothing, for he was not true to himself. He had no steadiness, nor conduct. He could never fix his thoughts, nor govern his estate, though then the greatest in England. He was bred about the king, and for many years he had a great ascendancy over him; but he spoke of him to all persons with that contempt, that at last he drew a lasting disgrace upon himself; and he at length ruined both body and mind, fortune and reputation, equally. The madness of vice appeared in his person in many instances; since at last he became contemptible and poor, sickly, and sunk in his parts, as well as in all other respects; so that his conversation was as much avoided as ever it had been courted. The that Letter contains, he has a charge against the person, of as high a nature as the Letter can be : says, it is irregular for the Speaker to bring us a new business ; the Letter—He was interrupted by Sir Ch. Wheeler. To Order of proceedings, in reference to your Vote, after what manner ! Would have some previous consideration, that one man may not prevent another.

Mr. Stockdale. Would have all men concerned, named ; and you are possessed of one against whom he has a charge, the duke of Buckingham ; that, if encouraging or practising, and, he supposes, establishing Popery ; if taking money from the subject, and breaking the Triple Alliance, and engaging us in this French alliance be a Charge, he has a Charge against the duke of Buckingham : the proofs are not so ready as the last, but the particulars will all be proved : offers not an Impeachment : though the crimes may be proved, impeachments take up a long time ; it may be longer than we have to sit : his own letters show corresponding with Peter Talbot, the pretended archbishop. When Ireland was in great danger by Popery, he advised the army to be drawn out of that kingdom, and headed his own regiment with Popish officers. At Knarborough, Whitsuntide last (the Standing Army was then forming) this duke came into Yorkshire to raise men ; a poor man, being pressed, came to the overseers of the poor, and told them, ' You must provide for my wife and children, I am pressed away and cannot maintain them.' The duke sent for the overseer, and beat him for not doing it, and sent a warrant to the marshal of the West Riding of Yorkshire, to keep him, till farther order from him ; the man applied to the duke, and, after 3 days imprisonment, was delivered by the marshal (Wainman) who demanded 30*l.* fees, and got 5*l.* for three days : this was done, when there was a prospect of arbitrary power, and this was the first action of martial law, committed by a martial-man. The next is the duke's taking of money, 2*s.* 6*d.* upon every horse exported at Dover, by virtue of his place of Master of the Horse, against law : breaking of the Triple Alliance : the duke was sent into France, and what treaty he made there we know by the effect ; the Triple Alliance broken : lord Bellasis was sent to Dunkirk, and the duke, though he had no business, yet would go to see the king of France, and has heard what presents he had there, and believes it will be proved : his endeavours to take away the affections of the king's good subjects, by main blame of the king's ill principles, and bad morals, was owing to the duke of Buckingham." Burnet.

Dryden's character of him (under that of Zimri) in his Absalom and Achitophel, and Pope's description of the last scene of his life, which was closed at an alchouse at Helmsley in Yorkshire, in the year 1687, are well known and justly admired.

saying, ' that the king was an arrant knave, and unfit to govern ;' Dr. Williams can prove it : he has defrauded the king's servants of their wages, so disadvantageous to his service ; this is public : now, there is a Petition against him in the house of lords of a strange nature ; killing the earl of Shrewsbury,* and living scandalously with his widow. Not only that, but he has attempted a horrid sin not to be named ; not to be named at Rome, where their other practices are horrid : moves, ' That a person so dangerous to the government, and of so ill a life and conversation, may be removed from the king's presence and from all his employments ; and for ' an Act of Banishment' against him, as against the duke of Lauderdale.

Sir John Coventry. This man has made it his business to sow dissension betwixt the king and this house, but he is not a man to put things in execution when much danger is in the case : when the king had his ministers in France, the duke of B. put many of his servants, incognito, to treat with the ministers of that state, Papists and persons ill affected to our government : it is a sad condition we are in, to have a man so near the king's person that contemns his person : this duke has given night and lanthorn counsels, not to be owned by the rest of the counsellors. He corresponds with a traitor, Peter Talbot ; the letter was burned in the king's bed-chamber, and part remains : some say the duke is not ashamed of that profession ; it is known to you all, that these people have been protected by him : it may be said, that the officers of his regiment are Protestants, but we may thank the commons of England for it : if these things be proved, he desires the duke may be removed from the king's person for ever.

Mr. Howe. Besides all this, when the king was at Windsor, because he would not stay so long as the duke would have him,† he took the bridle from the king's horse, to the great danger of the king's person, and the duke was then Master of his Horse.

Sir Winston Churchill. He that would answer this charge of the duke's may do himself

* This was in a duel, March 16, 1667. " The Countess is said to have held the duke's horse, disguised like a page, during the combat ; to reward his prowess in which, she went to bed to him in the shirt stained with her husband's blood. The loves of this tender pair are recorded by Pope,

Gallant and gay in Cliften's proud Alcove,
The Bower of wanton Shrewsbury and Love.
Walpole's Noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 82, 3.

Of this intrigue, Marvell, in one of his Letters, makes the following mention : " Buckingham runs out of all with Lady Shrewsbury ; by whom he believes he had a son, to whom the king stood godfather : it died young, earl of Coventry."

more wrong than the duke has. Wishes the particulars as easily proved as charged: the business of Windsor he knows: the duke is not far from you, and supposes, if the letter be not of importance, the duke has forfeited his understanding, as the charge makes him forfeit his reputation: men of his quality will not inform you of trifles: the letter may be of concernment; it may discover something you know not (as that in the lords house about a plot) therefore would read it.

Lord Cavendish. Should the artifice of the man put it out of our power to proceed, it would be of ill consequence: would have him removed from offices and councils about the king and suspended his presence till farther proceeded against.

Sir Tho. Clarges would first put the question for 'the Address,' and then read the letter. No great need of particular proof; but all you desire, is, that he may not be near the king's person to pursue these dangerous counsels: in Scotland, did he not correspond with Argyle and ransack the king's close-stool for papers? There were shrewd suspicions of him in the rebellion in the north, and soon after he got his pardon. Is it no crime to kill the husband, and prostitute the wife? He accuses him not, for it may be pardoned; but for us to countenance such things, will bring God's judgments upon us: after so great an accusation, to come so familiarly amongst the lords, his judges, and to do his offices about the king, argues a strange boldness: there are seven persons that have had five Pardons since the Restoration of the king; two by act of parliament, and three under the great seal, for murder, treason, &c. so that you can never lay hold of him: since March last he has got another Pardon, and, as the docket says, 'for all treasons, insurrections, murders, misprisions, manslaughters, &c. committed or done before the 14th of Nov. last.' This is in some sort a confession of the guilt of so many crimes as are enumerated in the pardon: you must give it, by Vote, for the safety of witnesses, and he to be 'removed from the king's person.' Men are awed; and at the reading of the Petition against him, in the house of lords, there was a great silence: he has not common bowels of mercy; he beat an old gentleman for desiring him not to ride over his corn, till the blood ran down his hoary head. At Barnet he beat a poor soldier in bonds about the unfortunate killing lady Shrewsbury's coachman: moves as before.

Sir Edm. Jennings. The Letter may be of consequence. The paper of discovery was read in the lords house, and he would have the duke's Letter read.—The duke's Letter was then read, as follows:

'Mr. Speaker; I desire you to do me the favour to get leave of the hon. house of commons, that I may inform them, in person, of some truths relating to the public; by which you will much oblige, &c. BUCKINGHAM.
'Jan. 13, 1673.'

Mr. Sacheverell. You ought to hear the Duke, because the matter, he pretends, is public, and you may be concerned.

Mr. Garraway hopes you will do justice to all men. If you pass your vote against him, of what validity will any thing be that he can say? Moves that that right may be done to the duke, which you will not deny to the meanest commoner: lord chief justice Keeling, and the earl of Bristol, had a chair set for them: you heard them speak, and Bristol cleared your member, sir Rd. Temple*: would now hear the duke.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This man has done his impieties in the face of the sun; he prevented our meeting in Oct. last. Has he not perverted the king's word? Would only now have him removed from the king's council. My lord of Bristol's coming hither was a voluntary desire, and nothing against him here: is not against his coming in, but would first remove him from the king's person.

Col. Birch. Such things as the duke has done, cannot be without company: would have him come in, and hear him what he can say.

Mr. Sawyer. Your vote may discourage him, that he may say little to you, and possibly he may reveal something in compensation, by way of discovery: would hear him.

Col. Strangways. Hear him what he can say: some vices of the man may not take away a man's testimony.

The Duke of Buckingham was ordered to be called in,† and a chair was set for him on the left hand of the bar, the serjeant standing with his mace on his right hand. Then the duke saluted the house round.

Ordered, "That the Speaker ask him, Whether he owned the Letter he sent him, and what he has to communicate to the house, of concernment?"

The Duke sat a short space, covered; then the Speaker asked him, &c. and showed him the Letter, which the Duke owned. The Speaker then said, "The house is ready to hear what your grace has to say, relating to the public service."

The Duke's Speech to the House of Commons. The Duke, standing, then said, "I have written something," [fumbling a Paper in his hand] "but will trust to my own present thoughts. I give this hon. house humble thanks for the honour done me, in admitting me to come and speak here. I have always made it my business to get the good opinion of this house; I desire that my actions may be examined, and I will stand, or fall, by the censure and judgment of this house: the business against me, I understand, is the breaking of the Triple Alliance; I had as great a hand in making it as † Burnet says, "That the Duke, the first day of his being before the house, fell into such a disorder, that he pretended he was taken ill, and desired to be admitted again. But that next day he was more composed."

any man : my going to Holland was to hinder De Witt's conjunction with France, and I did no ill service in it, and the more the thing is examined, the more my innocence will appear. I was not of the opinion of a war, and France to take all, and give us nothing ; if my advice had been followed, there would have been better effects : it is not my practice to accuse, but it is hard if a man may not clear himself. I have been in as much danger, for my respect to this house, as any man ; have been turned out of all my places at court ; proclaimed traitor ; witnesses hired to swear against me, and confessed so ; no man can be exempted from malicious accusations, and all for favouring Bills from this house ; and, after the proclaiming me traitor, I had a Letter from a sister of mine, which was alledged one from Dr. Haven, a conjurer, but through his name any man might see Richmond and Lenox.* I was not afraid of my enemies in the house of commons, but afraid of being tried for my life, before you met. There have been great desires of having me removed from the king. I can hunt the hare with a pack of hounds, but not with a pack of lobsters.† If this house

* "There was a poor fellow, who had a poorer lodging about Tower Hill, to whom the duke often repaired, in disguise, in the night ; and lord Arlington had caused that fellow to be apprehended, and his pockets and chamber to be searched ; where were found several letters to the duke of Buckingham, and one original letter from the duke to him, in all which there were many unusual expressions, which were capable of very ill interpretations, and could not bear a good one. This man and some others, were sent close prisoners to the Tower, and a warrant being issued, under the king's sign manual, to apprehend the duke, he at last surrendered himself, and, on his examination at the council board, the letter being produced, as soon as he cast his eyes upon it, he said, 'It was not his hand, but his sister's the dutchess of Richmond's, with whom, he said, it was known he had no correspondence.' Whereupon the king called for the letter, and having looked upon it, he said, 'He had been mistaken,' and confessed, 'that it was the dutchess's hand ;' and seemed much out of countenance at the mistake : though the letter gave still as much cause of suspicion, for it was as strange that she should write to such a fellow, in a style very obliging, and in answer to a letter ; so that it seemed very reasonable still to believe, that she might have written it upon his desire and dictating." Earl of Clarendon's Life, p. 430-434.

† "The duke justified his own designs, laying all the ill counsels upon others, chiefly on lord Arlington ; intimating plainly, that the root of all errors was in the king and the duke of York. He said, 'Hunting was a good diversion, but if a man would hunt with a brace of lobsters, he would have but ill sport.' He had used that figure to myself ; but had then applied it desires it, I will remove from the king, and go beyond sea ; no man ought to serve the king, whom the nation has no good opinion of. I have spent an estate in the king's service, when others have got thousands. Beggars that run away with the bags, when a robbery is done, you stop ; but a fine gentleman, riding upon the highway, you let go. I desire to be removed from my place, and to have leave to sell it. Persons are vellement upon me, and would ruin me. I submit myself, and actions, to the good construction of the hon. house." —He then withdrew.

Debate thereon.] Mr. Stockdale desires, that, seeing the duke is of your mind, you may join issue with him, and let him go beyond sea.

Lord Buckhurst.* The duke has informed you of nothing concerning 'public affairs,' and why will you put him out of all capacity ? Though his relation to him were ever so near, or obligations ever so great, would have him answer his accusations : but hear him first.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. This duke's is not the same case with the duke of Lauderdale's. The king may turn any man out of his service, and especially on your desires ; but when it shall be upon record, that the duke has uttered such words against the king, if a man asks whether such words are treason, it may be represented, that he said the words, 'of the king's being a knave, and unfit to govern.'

Mr. Boscawen has no kindness nor relation to the duke, but we ought to hear him. Your judgment will not be thought just, though it is so in truth, by persons that understand not the reasons : would have him acquainted with what is against him, and then you may proceed.

Col. Birch. The duke has not spoken one word of 'public' in what he has offered, but all 'private.' It seems to him, that he would be drawn to accuse, but in modesty would not do it of himself : would adjourn now, and let him know, if he has any 'public' thing to say, we are ready to hear him.

Mr. Garraway would make no false steps in the business ; would adjourn the debate, but would have nothing said to the duke. He seemed discomposed, and fumbled with a paper to prince Rupert and lord Arlington. It was now understood to go higher." Bornet.

† "Son of the earl of Dorset, to which title he succeeded in 1677, having been created earl of Middlesex, 1675. He was a volunteer in the first Dutch war, in 1665, and the night before the engagement, composed the famous Song, 'To all you Ladies now at land,' &c. At the Revolution he was early engaged in the interest of the prince of Orange, and was pitched upon to convey the princess (afterwards queen) Anne, out of the reach of her father's displeasure. He was a great patron of men of letters, who have not been ungrateful in transmitting his name with lustre to posterity. He died in 1705." Biog. Brit.

per, and would 'sell his place,' and could hunt 'with hounds and not with lobsters;' but if any man desires he may be heard on any 'public occasion,' would have him heard, but not any thing 'private' from him.

Lord Cornbury observes that the duke has good intelligence of what we do here; for he began his discourse with the great business of France: if you accuse him, he is pardoned, and has the king's pardon; being so secured, there is no justice to proceed upon these crimes: but suppose he should acquit himself of all the great matters relating to the king, yet here is a crime in the face of the sun, a murder, and his living with that miserable woman in that perpetual adultery. He never was tried for killing her husband, and would be satisfied how you may try him; but how will you reach him? He must be tried by the lords. Every body knows the great friendship that you, Mr. Speaker, have for him; and would not have you write or speak to him; but if he has any thing more to say, you may hear him to-morrow.

Sir Rob. Howard moves to adjourn the debate till to-morrow.

Mr. Powle. In Impeachments, 'by way of justice,' is another way of proceeding, but, 'in point of fame,' every man must lay his hand upon his heart, in his judgment of him.

Sir John Monson has attended this noble lord's speech, but wonders that he should interpret the weighty affairs of this house to be his own private affairs, and believes, that his mind changed from what he had to say at first, upon our debate.

The debate was adjourned till the next day.

The Speaker reminded the house, That it is against Order, that members should salute messengers from the lord's house, as if this house was the School of Compliments: the Speaker only ought to do respect for the whole house.

The Speaker reported, "That he had presented the Addresses to his majesty, who was pleased to return Answer to this effect: "That he was always ready to preserve them in their Liberties and Properties, and to secure the Protestant Religion; and would take care the Militia should be in readiness upon all occasions, to secure the Government,"

Jan. 14. Sir John Monson would know whether the Speaker has any more letters, or intimations, from the duke; and that, if he had, he would produce them.

Sir Eliab Harvey moves to state the question, upon the matter of the debate adjourned yesterday; the question, 'to remove the duke of Buckingham from his majesty's person, and employments, for ever,' to be the Address to the king.

Sir Cs. Wheeler would do things so like an honest man, that, if informed of any other matter, he may not repent him of his vote. The debate arises fairly from the first vote, 'all Papists, and persons obnoxious, to be removed from the king.' That he will stick close to. If the house will add 'all others guilty of murder' &c. and have all scandalous livers removed, he is content: many others may be as perplexed in the vote, and entangled as he is; therefore would come to a fair debate. If any person, be it who it will, is 'so obnoxious,' would fairly give his vote to have him removed: would a man be content that every duke in England, that has killed a man, or lived in adultery, should be comprehended in your vote as dangerous to the government? Whether 'seizing on money,' 'popishly affected' or 'has made a league,' let all these come fairly before us: How carefully did we proceed in the duke of Lauderdale's vote? The duke said 'he was not a man to be an accuser, but, if examined, he would throw himself upon the judgment of the house;' if he did not make the League (French Alliance) he may know who did it: shall we lose such an opportunity, as this offer of the duke's? Though not expressed, yet it is fairly implied, that he can tell you: would set the saddle upon the right horse, and send for him, if he will come.

The Speaker. Dr. Williams addressed himself to him thus: 'that his name, he has heard, was made use of in the house, about what he should hear the duke say of the king; protests he never heard the words, nor said he heard them *.'

Mr. Rob. Philips. Dr. Williams told him, 'That the words were not only spoken once, but frequently, by the duke.'

Sir John Coventry has no malice against the duke, but could not be silent when a worthy member, col. Titus, can tell you as much.

Col. Titus rises, up very unwillingly to speak in the matter, for he has been under a misfortune from this person: will not do a public good for a private revenge: he has heard the same things from Dr. Williams.

Mr. Sacheverell. We are not going to hang the duke, nor try him for his life; we only desire to remove him from the king. The question might have been yesterday, but he being too foul, we would not touch him: Wheeler said, 'affairs are not mended since lord Clarendon's banishment;' but the house is a judge of that, not he; but if this person is not removed, will never move to have any removed more.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The duke told you, 'he had no hand in the French Alliance,' and at the same time that, 'he would have had no ships, but towns.' Averse from the war, and yet would have towns and no ships! When he told you, 'he was not for breaking the Triple Alliance,' a thing of great honour! but 'for putting most of the towns into the French hands,' it was one of the elegancies of speech which men call a Bull: 'would have leave to sell his place:' he has, under the signet, 2,400*l.* a year, in compensation of what he has given for the place of Master of the Horse; and yet he affirms 'he has nothing from the crown.'

the method we take is by common fame here ; the wisest parliaments have taken it before us. Hen. iv. in the case of the Abbot of —, his Confessor, removed him for no other reason but for not being loved by the people, though the king knew nothing against him : many more have been removed at the instance of the commons : would not have a hair of his head touched, but a learned judge (Atkins) said here, in lord Clarendon's case (about removing him) ' Was he a young gentleman, and came to town with money in his pocket, and gave it to a gamester to improve it for him by play, and he lost it, believes he should not put another bag into such unlucky hands to play for him : ' would have the question, ' That he is not a man fit to be about the king.' Whom will you impute your Grievances to? No man will say, to the king ; but if such a man's crimes must be alleviated, he is for the king and the common-wealth : would, perhaps, move you, that no member for the future, whilst parliaments sit, should have the temptation of offices : moves for the single question, as before.

Col. Sandys has met with a servant of the duke's, who informs him, ' that the duke desires to be heard here again ; being under a surprize yesterday, he has something farther to say.'

Sir Joseph Tredenham says the same.

Mr. Russell has no malice against the duke, but would have this question ' for removing him' passed ; fearing the danger the king and the nation are in, ' from a knot of persons that meet at the duke's, who have neither morality nor Christianity, who turn our Saviour and parliaments into ridicule, and contrive prorogations ; and would have such persons removed.

Col. Sandys remembers that my Lord Keeper Finch* desired to be heard, and was heard, but ran away ; but the duke has no reason to do so ; you have dealt favourably with him : but would hear him ; you cannot, it may be, have notice of things without hearing him.

Sir Tho. Lee knows nothing of what the duke intends, but he has been at the head of councils, and knows much : the kingdom is in misery, a little knowledge of affairs may bring you to more, and you may at last know the end : he has no design, nor hopes, but to keep his property in the country : pardous, it seems, in parliament have not served the turn : would call in any man that can inform the house.

Lord St. John is a friend to no man that gives ill counsels : any in the private Cabal that advised against the house of commons, ' to force the house of commons to pass Bills, and, if any refused, to take off their heads† :

would have these things enquired into : he has been told it by one of the CABAL*.

Mr. Sawyer did not expect, yesterday, excuses, from the duke, of his own actions, but discoveries of matters of concernment to the nation, relating to the public ; but would not call him in to do the same thing again, only would have light into those causes that have produced such ill effects. He was called in only for discovery : the house proceeds not by fame of vulgar persons, but upon things as plain as the sun. This new light, a thing called wit, is little less than fanaticism, one degree below madness : of Democritus's family, he laughs always at all religion and true wisdom : we come here to take away examples of such things ; such as this duke, as great as any. This kind of wit's best ornament is most horrid blasphemy, oaths, and imprecations, which have done more hurt, in a few years, than all the Convents and Jesuits could do in a 100 years : prays, that the duke may not be heard to ' matters of excuse,' to acquaint you with that which all the world is satisfied in ; but confined only to matters of discovery.

Mr. Garroway fears not any thing the duke can say, in ' excuse' of himself ; he had little advantage upon us by it yesterday. ' Sequestering him only from his employments, and the king's presence,' is a gentle way, and would have it done in as gentle words as possible : it is likely he may have been as ill an instrument as any ; you have Grievances, but will you not have the causes discovered ? would call him in, and hear him at large : would have lord St. John's question asked the duke, or any other delivered you.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Lord St. John said, ' one of the Cabal told him, &c.' would know what the meaning of the Cabal is.

Mr. Garroway. That is so great a mystery, that he would know it above all things.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. We do things, not voluntarily, but by law ; the king's privy counsellors ! and it is perjury for us to reveal : as for the committee of foreign affairs (of which he is the only man of this house) wishes (he protests to God) that you knew what opinion he has ever given of affairs.

Sir Wm. Lewis. The way is to hear him at large, and then propose your questions, and he has time by it to ask the king's leave to answer : that has been anciently done in these cases.

Mr. Powle commends secretary Coventry for his secrecy. This house has liberty to examine any man, not being a peer, and what he discovers is no breach of his oath ; but if this house must take no notice of things, and persons are rescued from punishment, we may be

* See vol. ii. p. 693.

† Burnet says, " That sir Ellis Leighton assured him, that the duke of Buckingham, and lord Berkeley, offered to the king, if he would bring the army to town, that they would take out of both houses the members that made the opposition to the Declaration."

* The CABAL (so called from the initial letters of their titles) consisted originally of Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, (afterwards Shaftesbury) and Lauderdale. Of these, three only, who were now attacked by the commons, remained ; Clifford being dead, and Shaftesbury having made his peace.—See p. 451.

all destroyed. A privy counsellor may do it safely, without breach of his oath: in lord Strafford's case, examination was upon oath of what was done at the council-table, and no exception was then taken against it: Cabal is a new word, and what is said there is not said in council, any more than in the bed-chamber; and those few men of the Cabal to encroach upon royal power, as the duke of Ireland did! would have that question 'of the Cabal' proposed to the duke.

Sir Tho. Meres. 'Cabal' and 'Council' are different, but we have power over both.

Sir John Birkenhead. In lord Strafford's case, the attorney general, when he was examined here, said, 'he would answer, when he had his master's leave:' it is perjury in any privy counsellor to answer without it.

Sir Cha. Harbord. To give counsel to the king 'to take away privilege of parliament!' no council can protect him.

Serj. Maynard. Supposed this 'of the parliament-men's heads' [said in the king's council] 'to be set upon the house;' will not meddle with that: knows not how the question propounded about the CABAL is understood.

Mr. Sacheverell. The duke said, '3, 4, or 5,000*l.* a year some had got;' would have him asked to every one of them.

The Speaker. The things proposed to be asked the duke he will state; 'the private Cabal to destroy the privileges of this house' 'altering the government, where and by whom?' 'What meant by 4, 5, or 6,000*l.* a year gotten?' 'Who got it?' and by what means the Triple Alliance was broke?' 'The Smyrna fleet set upon?' 'The parliament prorogued?'

Sir Rob. Holmes. He was commanded to fall upon the Smyrna fleet, and has his orders to show from the lord high admiral to do it*.

Sir Nich. Curw. 'By whose advice a Frenchman was made general of an army, when here raised,' another question.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Count Schomberg is far from a Frenchman; his mother was an Englishwoman, and his father a German. He first commanded the Scots under the duke; and would he have been a Papist, might long ago have been Marshal of France.† Though Germany be one country, they are not of one mind in this war; divers princes are now arming in Germany, that will neither obey the emperor, nor the king of France: he came first to marshal Turenne, when he was a Protestant.

Sir Wm. Coventry. What was said from the bar, of M. Schomberg, needs not his confirmation. This gentleman might be abler than another man, it may be reasonably supposed, for the king's service, having served long in Hollaud, and knows the condition of that country: would lay no more weight on this than will be borne: I wish this was our greatest Grievance; the gentleman came only for the command of the army, when intended for foreign service, and when that intention was laid aside, he went away.

Sir Tho. Lee is for avoiding all things that give any umbrage or jealousy: it may be thought as necessary to have 'a foreign army,' as to have 'a foreign general;' they may both give umbrage or jealousy, and therefore would avoid them.

Sir Ch. Wheeler does not believe that an English general would serve for such purposes; but a 'foreigner' has given us great jealousies and would have that one of the questions.

Mr. Love would have it another Question, who advised that the army should be appointed to draw up towards London, to awe this house, to make us vote what they please?

The Duke's Second Speech to the House of Commons.] The Duke of Buckingham was then called in, as before, and spoke thus:

"In the first place, I return this hon. house humble thanks for the honour of twice admitting me; especially when I consider, how ill I expressed myself yesterday: consider the condition I am in; in danger to pass for a vicious person, and a betrayer of my country, all the world over. I have the misfortune to bear the blame of other men's faults. I know that it is laid against me the 'revealing the king's counsels,' 'correspondency with the enemy, in time of war,' and 'having hindered what the Council would have done.' I hope I shall have pardon, if I speak truth for myself. I told you, that, if the Triple Alliance had advantage in it, I had the honour to have as great a hand in it. (I speak it without vanity) as any man: then upon the French ambassador's and other intelligence, I had orders to compliment upon the sad subject of Madame*. I thought it for the service of the king, that the French ought not to endeavour to be considerable at sea; we were jealous of them, that the Dutch should make their peace with them, because they had power to conquer. When I returned, I had all the demonstrations imaginable that the French had no such thoughts, but that the king of England should be master at sea. I pretend not to judge, whether I, or another, was in the right, but leave the house to judge. At that time, I, and lord Shaftsbury, were of opinion not to begin a war, without advice of the parliament, and the affections of the people, that the parliament might join in it; and I believe the king, at the head of his parliament, the greatest prince in the world: this was Shaftsbury's opinion and mine, but not lord Arlington's. Then I was of opinion not to make use of the French ships? but to have half the value of them in money, for English ships, which would have been of more service; the French ships of no use to us, because of no experience, and the use of our seas, learned by them, of great danger to us: lord Arlington was of a contrary opinion. I was sent to Dunkirk to the king of France, Arlington to Utrecht. I endeavoured to have money, instead of ships; at my first audience, the French king was willing to comply with it, but, after some time, by letters and returns from hence, it was altered. I make no reflections, but declare matter of fact. Then lord Shaftsbury and I were of opinion to order the war so, that the French were to deliver towns into our hands; an useful precedent! lord Arlington was of opinion to have no towns at all delivered, for one year, and here is the cause of the condition of affairs, with that of the fleet, and the French army let go on to conquer; they get all, and we nothing, and agree for none neither; consider who it was locked up with the French ambassador †; my spirit moves me to tell you. When we are to consider what to do we must advise with the French ambassador: I will not trouble you with reports. Look not upon me as a peer, but as an honest English gentleman, who have suffered much for my love to my country. I had a regiment given me, which was sir Edw. Scott's: and, not knowing the law of England, I gave him 1,500*l.* for it; no Papists, nor Irish in the regiment. I will say nothing of my extraordinary gains. I have lost as much estate as some have got, and that is a big word. I am honest, and when I shall be found otherwise, desire to die. A man that has not gotten by all this. I leave it to you. If I am a Grievance, I am the cheapest Grievance, after all this, that ever this house had: and so humbly ask pardon of the house for the trouble I have given it."

* This perfidious and piratical attempt on the Smyrna fleet, though performed with the utmost bravery and resolution by sir Robert Holmes, and the earl of Ossory, miscarried. Though the Dutch defended themselves with amazing obstinacy, they could not have escaped, (as they did) if sir Rob. Holmes had condescended to impart his design to sir Edw. Spragge, (whom he met at sea) and desired his assistance. But though sir Robert applied to him for intelligence concerning the game he sought, he kept the secret, that he might engross the whole honour and profit to himself, and thereby fell into the disgrace of undertaking a bad thing, without having the glitter of good success to gild it over." Ralph.

† He was made Marshal in 1676.

* King Charles's sister, the dutchess of Orleans, who, in 1671, soon after her return from an interview with her brother at Dover, was poisoned at Paris, (as was supposed) by the direction of her husband. The duke of Buckingham was sent over, on that occasion, with compliments of condolence.

Questions put to the Duke: with his Answers.]

† Reflecting on lord Arlington. The French ambassador, here mentioned, was M. Rouvigny, a Protestant, whose son was created earl of Galway, by king William, and commanded the British forces in Portugal, in the reign of queen Anne. Burnet says, "he had the appointment of an ambassador, but would not take the character, that he might not have a chapel, and mass said in it."

Then the Speaker told the duke, 'That he was commanded, by the house, to ask his grace some Questions, if he pleased to make answer to them.' The duke answered, 'he was willing.'

Question 1. "Whether any persons have, at any time, declared to him any of their advices, or ill purposes, against the liberty of this house, or propounded any ways to him for altering our government; and if they did, what was that advice, and by whom? Ans. It is an old proverb, 'over shoes, over boots.' This reflects upon one now not living [lord Clifford] and I would have pardon for not naming him, and fear it will be thought a malicious invention of mine. I have said nothing yet but what I can justify; but this not.—2. What his grace meant by this expression yesterday 'that he had gotten nothing, and that others had gotten 3, 4, and 5,000*l.*;' who they were that had gotten it, and by what means? Ans. I had not acquaint you how they got it, because not well acquainted myself with the means of getting money. What the duke of Ormond has got is upon record. Lord Arlington has not got so much, but a great deal.—3. By whose advice the army was raised, and Papists set to officer them, and M. Schomberg to be their general? Ans. I cannot say 'by whose advice,' but, on my honour, not by my advice; but was told by a man that is dead, 'that lord Arlington sent for him,' and it will be easily proved.—4. Whether he knows, that any have advised to make use of the army to awe the debates and resolutions of this house? Ans. This is the same question of a discourse from a man that is dead to a man that is living. If I had desired it, I might have had the command of the army that M. Schomberg had: but I have been told, that lord Arlington would have the government by an army.—5. By whose counsel and ministry the Triple League was made? Ans. Lord Arlington and I were only employed to treat, and finding the danger that we were in of being cheated, pressed the ambassadors to sign before they had power. It was an odd request to the ambassadors, yet they did sign.—6. Who made the first Treaty with France, by which the Triple League was broken, and the Articles thereof? Ans. I made no Treaty.—7. Who advised the shutting up the Exchequer, whereby the orders of assignment and credit of the exchequer were broken and destroyed? Ans. I was not the adviser. I lost 3,000*l.* by it.—8. And the Declaration about matters of Religion made? Ans. I do not disown that I advised it, but no farther only than what might be done by the Declaration by law.—9. And the Smyrna fleet fallen upon, before war was declared? Ans. It was lord Arlington's advice; I was against it; so much against it (as careful of the honour of the nation) that I incurred some anger from the king. Lord Arlington principally moved it: and I might say more.—10. And the second Treaty with the French king at Utrecht, and the Articles thereof? Ans. Lord Arlington and I were sent over to Utrecht, and found in the common people of Holland, in our journey thither, the greatest consternation imaginable: like burning the Rump in England, crying, 'God bless the king of England!' and 'cursing the States;' and had we then gone over and landed our men, we might have conquered the country; the prince of Orange would have had peace with France; but what share would we have had? Though he was the king's nephew, yet the king must be kind to his own country. If peace had been then, we had been in worse condition than we were before: at last, the prince of Orange hoped for a good peace; but I was not for France to have all, and England nothing. The consequence would have been, Holland must depend on France, if France had conquered near Germany. I think it a wise Article, that France should not make peace without us.—11. By whose counsels the war was made, without advice of parliament; and the parliament thereupon prorogued? Answer. Lord Shaftsbury and I were for 'the advice of parliament for the war.' I can say nothing to 'the prorogation' I believe the parliament will never be against a war for the good of England; and so desire the pardon of the house: I know not how words may have slipped me, and lay myself at the feet of the house, as an English gentleman.—The Duke then saluted the house, as before, and withdrew.

Debate on the Duke's Answers.] Colonel Birch. What the duke has told us are personal discourses of one that 'is dead.' He may inform us, if he pleases, of one of those 'living.' Would have him declare them, and have him called in again.

Mr. Sawyer. What came from a dead man can be of no use imaginable; but here is no answer made to 'setting upon the Smyrna fleet.' Probably he is less guilty as to state affairs, but for public scandal, would have the Question put 'for his removal.'

Sir Nich. Carew hoped for great light from the duke, but he gives no light as to persons of a contrary opinion to him.

Sir Courtney Poole, thinks us not so much in the dark: thinks this noble lord will satisfy you farther to-morrow: he named but one about the army, he may tell you more.

Sir Tho. Lee. All he has said terminates in one man; but he believes no man so big as he represents him: it was in his power to have given larger answers if he would: he cannot believe that some one person, without help, could carry counsels against two or three; not one evil against two good: by the same right, you may send for him, as he came before; and if not, you may send to the house of peers for their leave.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. We have little light from the duke without explaining: no oath of secrecy does bind a man to promote an ill act; but as for promoting, or not promoting a league, it is no sin: in one of the Answers, the duke makes lord Arlington instrumental in breaking the Triple Alliance; but it is not the duke's saying it, that makes him so: nor lord Arlington's saying it that makes the duke so: otherwise, happy is the first accuser: would be equal on both sides, but would ask, Whether any man believes that lord Arlington would own all this? You are to have farther light from the duke. Send to him to come again, if he be willing, or, if not, to the house of lords, for leave for him.

Col. Birch would send out two gentlemen to know, whether the duke has any thing farther to say: that is parliamentary.

Sir Rob. Howard. Some things came from the duke that require us to proceed more carefully, than we are about to do; but the question that is pressed is like hearing him after, and condemning him first. Upon the whole, you cannot but think the time of the day, and the thing, great enough to put us upon considering it till to-morrow.

Mr. Russel. If the debate be adjourned, the duke, by his power, may prorogue us again, as he has done formerly.

Mr. Sawyer pities the duke's condition here, and the loss of his estate; but would have you proceed in it.

Sir Nich. Pedley. The duke may have patents for life. The serjeant of your mace has a patent for his place, for life, and it is a freehold in him. You cannot take away the duke's office without legal proceedings against him: by rule of law, there must be a scire facias: you cannot put a man from his freehold; and he would not have the question.

Sir Tho. Lee sees not such danger in this, as is alleged: by impeachments, the lords are judges. By the Address we make to the king, the king cannot grant against law more than is in his power: would clear it to the house. It may fall out to have the same case before you again, and would not have any person out of the power of the house of commons.

Mr. Waller moves, not for the duke's sake, but for his own. You take away from him more than you leave him: common fame against one of the lords is the same thing here: you go with an humble desire to the king to have our judgment put in execution: because you have not liked men, they have been removed: some say, he never said the word alleged against him; others say, others said them—no proof—witnesses may be corrupted: not many men are hanged for want of their pardon, if recorded: never any man was hanged, with his pardon in his hand: this is a great convulsion of state, a peer to come down to your house. If times are so corrupt, I must piece out my innocence with a pardon: if this nation be ever preserved, it must be in this place; and where so great a power is, if not as exact a justice with it, we are not safe: God has given us great power, and thank God for it.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The duke's office is a patent, and a freehold: the duke may have a recompence for his office.

Sir Cha. Harbord. The duke's office cost him a great sum of money, and it may be any man's case: pray be tender in what you cannot put the king upon, in point of law.

Sir Wm. Lewis. We have cause to be tender in the things offered, and 'to desire that the king would be pleased to give him leave to sell his place.'

Lord Cavendish, should not be for the latter part of the question, if it 'took his place' from him, for the king may 'give him leave to sell it.'

Lord Cornbury is not for taking away the duke's life. Would have things rightly understood: it concerns not his freehold; he holds it only during the king's pleasure. Is not against his 'leave to sell it': do you intend to leave 'employment' wholly out of the question? He has a patent for gentleman of the bedchamber, and a pension for it, and his lieutenancy of Yorkshire; and, on the other side, would not recommend him to the king, and not think him fit to be about his person.

Sir John Duncombe has a great compassion for this honourable person's misfortunes: what comfort can a man have, after such a charge, without some compensation for his place: which he moves for.

Mr. Harwood has had great honour for this person, but now must lay all aside here! with what face can you make such an Address to the king? you do nothing to take away the king's charity, in compensation of his places, and doubts not but the king will do it: it is a burden greater than he could wish he had, but would not put it upon the king by our Address.

Sir Wm. Coventry. 'To remove him' is the general sense, but would not wound other men, by destroying his patent, nor wound his freehold, nor take away his blood: would have added to the Question, 'reserving to him the profits of such places, as of right, he has by any inheritance, or freehold.'

Mr. Powle would have him removed out of offices that are granted him at his majesty's pleasure.

Mr. Swayne. Be the offender ever so great, or the offence, you may err in the manner of proceeding: would have you proceed by such rules as agree with justice: in the duke of Lauderdale's case, persons did prove things against him (your members): looks for judicial proof before you; information has been but remembers no proof: it has been, the course that great ministers of state do take out those parliaments, sometimes one or two in a year: as to impeachment, this way was well; for then all evidence on both sides is heard: does not think 'removal from the king's presence' a light thing. Put the case, you had this upon your own members—would you have freeholds taken away without proof? Thinks it an ill precedent: let the case be this, lords or whose it will, we have nothing but justice for our own preservation: whoever shall judge a man, and not hear him to the point, though his judgment be just, he is unjust in judging.

Col. Strongways. There is no freehold in a grant 'at the king's pleasure: will you make 'Lex et consuetudo parliamenti' nothing? We do as a grand jury does, persuaded in conscience that the thing is so—'Neither fornicator, nor adulterer, &c. shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven'—Hopes that virtue will be countenanced here: this vote is only 'to remove such a Counsellor,' to restore the king, and honour and integrity unto the kingdom: no sanguinary law: not for taking away his freehold, but only what he holds at the king's pleasure: hopes that men of sobriety and honesty will be near the king, and would have the duke removed.

Sir Tho. Meres. 'Removing from the king's person' is, in consequence, removing from places and employments: it is also said, 'we are heard as a grand jury, in impeachments;' but, as you proceed now, there are objections; you now give your last judgment, whatever the king will do. Says another gentleman, 'you have heard no proofs;' but these shall not go without an answer: this house had great power in judgment by common fame, as every one of us is told without doors. Lex Parliamentaria. Thirty persons, in Mr. Prynne's books, were desired to be removed from former kings, because the people spoke ill of them; some of them, though not all, were removed: the duke is a fine person, and taking with us, and we have a tenderness; but it does not become this house to countenance selling of places: though common fame is the great prerogative of this house, yet would use it very sparingly.

Sir John Birkenhead is against clancular and clandestine proceedings: in the common law, if the Christian neighbourhood say, 'one keeps another man's wife,' yet upon his oath he may clear himself: lord Bacon calls common fame 'a common liar;' and the precedents cited, of removals, were in ill times: is against the latter part of the question.

Mr. Powle. Birkenhead said, 'the precedents, cited, were of ill times,'—11 Ed. ii. a great while before his deposing: that was done in the 22d. The effects of those censures then kept things quiet, till his deposing: the duke of Ireland was then removed, for encroaching upon royal power: wishes we might ever use this power moderately, and that we had no occasion of using it now:

Col. Birch is one of those who desired no resolution of this matter till another day; and did it then for another reason, not for favour to the duke: it is the custom, that the Speaker call for a clear account, and wishes it had been now from the duke: but cannot a gentleman give a clear opinion in the question? Would not call for it: when once the debate was, in the Convention, of recommending Counsellors to the king, it was answered, 'all the awe you have upon the king's Council hereafter is, if they be such as the people have an ill opinion of, you may remove them;' and it is better for us then to name them, for we must be responsible for them : shall you depart from this, and call for direct proof of persons only, and not things? You have great prejudice by it: you cannot take his freehold from him by your vote, and he is therefore for the question.

Sir Tho. Littleton fears, that you may clash with the lords upon another thing: when the point was of removal from the king's presence, 29 Hen. vi. as now, the king answered, 'he is content to remove them from his presence, except they be lords, unless they approve.' Whether any clear precedent, the commons originally go to the king to remove, in case of peers, is not satisfied: it is not the case of the duke of Lauderdale, who is no peer.

Lord Cornbury. Littleton is mistaken in the precedent of 29 Hen. vi. The duke of Somerset, and the bishop of Winchester, were removed: the words of the accusation were, 'the people spake ill of them:.' the king grants the request of the commons, unless to some few persons that were lords, who are necessary about him: the lords concurrence will beget another debate, but the king is still at the same freedom.

Resolution against the Duke.] At length it was resolved, "That an Address be presented to his majesty, to remove the duke of Buckingham from all his Employments that are held during his majesty's pleasure, and from his Presence and Councils for ever."

The above proceedings induced the lords, on the 15th, to refer it to the committee of privileges to search the Journals, what hath been formerly the practice in such cases. On the 20th the committee reported "That their lordships have searched and perused several precedents; and thereupon conceive that it may deeply trench into the privileges of this house, for any lord of this house to answer an Accusation in the house of commons, either in person, or by sending his Answer in writing, or by his counsel there:." Upon serious consideration had thereof, and perusal of the said Precedents in this house, it is Ordered, "That, for the future, no lord shall either go down to the house of commons, or send his Answer in writing or appear by counsel, to answer any accusation there, upon the penalty of being committed to the Black Rod, or to the Tower during the pleasure of this house." And it is further Ordered, "That this Order be added to the Standing Orders of this house, that the lords may the better take notice of the same."

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE EARL OF AR-LINGTON.

Jan. 15. Sir Gilbert Gerrard. Has a complaint against a great minister of state, the earl of Arlington "all great affairs and transactions go through his hands: he has been the great treasurer; the management of that must pass by him: he has no prejudice to him, or disobligation from him, but it is a duty he owes the king and nation: it was just upon your heels the taking away your liberties, contrary to the laws of the kingdom; and, to back this, an army was raised of dangerous men, unfit to command: nothing has passed for some years but through his hands; the army, the Declaration; he the great conduit-pipe; this instance many within these walls know, and abroad he is reported a Papist, and reconciled to the Church of Rome: in the Journal you may find the Act for suppressing of Conventicles; upon his majesty's power to suspend Laws in the Proviso; upon the division of the house, Arlington staid in for it with not above 30: every thing passed through his hands; all Licences, according to the Declaration.

"Bennet, advanced afterwards to be earl of Arlington, was made secretary of State, by the interest of the Popish party, [in 1662.] He was a proud man. His parts were solid, but not quick. He had the art of observing the king's temper, and managing it beyond all the men of that time. He was believed a Papist.

ARTICLES of treasonable and other Crimes of High Misdemeanor against the Earl of Arlington, principal Secretary of State.

I. "That the said earl hath been a constant, and most vehement promoter of Popery and Popish Counsels; I. By procuring Commissions for all the Papists lately in command, and who made their application to him, as a known favourer of that faction; there being not one commission signed by the other secretary; many of which commissions were procured and signed by him, since the several Addresses of the two houses of parliament to his majesty and the passing the late Act against Popery: 2. By procuring his majesty's Letter, commanding Irish papists and rebels to be let into corporations, and admitted into the commissions of the peace, and other offices of trust military and civil, contrary to the established laws and constitutions of that realm, to the great terror of the king's protestant subjects there: 3. By not only setting up and supporting the aforesaid Papists there, but bringing the most violent and fiercest of them to command companies and regiments of the king's English subjects here to the great dishonour and danger of this kingdom: 4. By openly and avowedly entertaining and lodging in his family a Popish priest, contrary to the known laws of the land; which said priest was

He had once professed it, and when he died, he again reconciled himself to that church. Yet in the whole course of his ministry, he seemed to have made it a maxim, that the king ought to show no favour to Popery, but that all his affairs would be spoiled, if ever he turned that way; which made the Papists become his mortal enemies, and accuse him as an apostate, and a betrayer of their interests." Burnet.—He died in 1683, leaving an only daughter, married to king Charles's favourite son, the duke of Grafton.

a noted solicitor and promoter of the Popish faction, and has since fled out of this kingdom : 5. By procuring pensions, in other mens names, for Papist officers, contrary to, and in illusion of the late act of parliament : 6. By obtaining several grants of considerable sums of money, to be charged upon the revenue of Ireland, for the most violent and pernicious papists there; particularly 2000*l.* for one col. Fitz Patrick, a notorious Irish rebel, whose mother was hanged in the late war, for murdering several English, and making candles of their fat; this grant being procured for the said Fitz Patrick at a time when he was accused to the lord Arlington of high crimes, by the now lord lieut. of Ireland: 7. By procuring his maj. to release several Irish papists (some whereof deeply engaged in the horrid rebellion of that kingdom) the chiefries or head rents reserved to the crown, out of the forfeited estates of Papists there, being a principal part of his majesty's revenue in that kingdom:—II. That the said earl hath been guilty of many and undue practices to promote his own greatness; and hath embezzled and wasted the treasure of this nation; 1. By procuring vast and exorbitant grants for himself, both in England and Ireland, breaking into the Settlement of that kingdom, and dispossessing several English adventurers and Soldiers of their properties and freeholds, in which they were duly and legally stated, without any colour of reason, or suggestion of right: 2. By charging excessive and almost incredible sums for false and deceitful intelligence: 3. By procuring his majesty's hand for the giving away, between his first entrance into his office, the value of 3 millions of sterling money, at the least; the several grants whereof are extant, countersigned by him, and by him only. 4. That the said earl, presuming to trample upon all estates and degrees of the subjects of this realm, the better to subdue them to his will and pleasure, hath causelessly and illegally imprisoned many of his majesty's subjects. 5. That he did procure a principal peer of this realm to be unjustly imprisoned, and to be proclaimed traitor, without any legal proceed or trial; and did maliciously suborn false witness, with money, to take away his life, upon pretence of treasonable words.—III. That the said earl hath falsely and traiterously betrayed the great trust reposed in him, by his majesty, as counsellor and principal secretary of state; 1. By entertaining a more than usual intimacy with the French ambassador; not only lodging him in his house, but letting him into the king's most secret counsels. 2. By altering in private, and singly by himself, several solemn determinations of his majesty's councils. 3. By procuring a stranger to have the chief command of the late raised army, for invasion of Holland, to the great dishonour and discouragement of all the loyal nobility and gentry of this nation. 4. By advising his maj. to admit of a squadron of French ships to be joined with our English fleet; the sad consequence whereof we have since felt, notwithstanding the king of France had agreed to send a supply of money, in order to the having the fleet wholly English. 5. Whereas the king was advised by several of his council to press the French king to desist from making any further progress in his conquest of the inland towns of Holland, whereof England was to have no benefit, and to turn his arms upon those maritime towns that were by the Treaty to have been ours, his ldp. gave the king counsel to desist; whereby that part of our expectation was wholly frustrate. 6. Whereas the king was advised, by several of his council, not to enter into this war, till his maj. was out of debt, and had advised with his parliament, his ldp. was of opinion to the contrary, and gave his advice accordingly. 7. When the French ships were dispersed after the late Fight at sea, and had lost all their anchors and cables, by reason of the foul weather that then ensued, he persuaded his maj. to send them fourscore cables and anchors; although it was then objected, and he knew it to be true, That his maj. had not, at that present time, any more in his stores than would supply his own ships, in case of the like necessity. 8. He hath traiterously corresponded with the king's enemies, beyond the seas, and contrary to the trust reposed in him, hath given intelligence to them."

Debate thereon.] Sir Rob. Carr assures the house that he does not oppose the bringing in the Articles, or any thing objected against lord Arlington; but he has a letter to the Speaker to be communicated to the house.

Lord Obrien knows not but what has been said yesterday may have been the occasion of this Letter, and would have it read.

The Earl's Letter to the House of Commons.] The Speaker moves that he may read lord Arlington's Letter. The Letter was read accordingly, as follows:

'Mr. Speaker; Hearing that the hon. house of commons are informing themselves of public affairs, wherein, I humbly conceive, what I can say may be of use and satisfaction to them, I beseech you to do me the favour, by the means of this house, to obtain leave for me to be heard by the hon. house. ARLINGTON.'

Mr. Tho. Lee moves that lord Arlington may be asked the same questions with the duke of Buckingham, excepting that of M. Schomberg, being one of the Articles lord Arlington is accused of.

Mr. Sec. Coventry hopes that the house will not vote that we shall examine him: no member of the lords house can answer us.

Sir Wm. Lewis. He is at his own pleasure for answering our Questions: he, by his Letter, offers information only.

Sir Tho. Lee. He is judge of his own discretion; you may ask him what you please.

Sir Rob. Carr believes, that any question this house will ask this noble lord, he will answer.

The Speaker reminded the house of making a noise yesterday, and that we ought not particularly to salute any man, because the respects of the house are paid by the Chair; an irregular motion when performed by any else.

Sir Edm. Jennings. If you lose the opportunity of asking him questions here, perhaps you will not see him again.

Col. Birch. Can any thing be more natural than asking of questions? and the Speaker has drawn questions this way and that way, till you have come to the bottom: if he gives full Answers, you need go no farther: it was not so managed yesterday.

Sir Cha. Harbord. If, upon the relation he makes, you find no cause, then would have no Questions asked: you cannot examine a peer nor can you send for him again.

Mr. Sacheverell would have no questions asked him to accuse himself: five of the Questions concern him, and he would have all these laid aside.

The Earl's Speech to the House of Commons.] The Earl of Arlington was admitted into the house, in the same manner, in all respects, with the duke of Buckingham. He then spoke to this effect:

"I acknowledge the honour the house has done me in admitting me to speak here: In private conversation, and at dinners, I have met with a paper of Articles against me, in the nature of an Impeachment, though upon uncertain grounds: had I as much memory as innocence, I assure myself of all favour from this house: I have a bad memory, and so must make use of papers. I reduce the accusations to three heads. 1. Matter of Religion. 2. Matter of War and Treaties. 3. Particular Fortune and Acquisitions I have got since the king's Restoration. 1st, For Religion. I never did one act to derogate from the Protestant religion, neither have I heard mass, nor made any reconciliation to the Church of Rome. I hope you will not rest upon aspersions, unless your hon. member will aver it on his knowledge, and, if so, I am content it should pass for a conviction. I am accused of 'having a part in composing the Declaration for Liberty of Conscience.' I was present in council when it was resolved, that, in time of war, it might be of great advantage to do any temporary thing, till the parliament might consider of it; but, as soon as I was convinced that it was contrary to law, I was the first man that advised to desist from what was not tenable by law: as for what concerns the Papists (Roman Catholics) I suppose, that, according to the function of my place, I might pen it, but it was brought to me changed to what was resolved in council: to the charge of being 'a favourer of Papists,' I answer, In particular I have favoured those of the Church of England; but I have promiscuously obliged men of merit, without distinction of religion.—To the 2nd. 'That I have promoted Irish Papists and Rebels, to be let into corporations and commissions of the peace, offices of trust, military and civil, &c.' This is so ill imputed to me, that I was not at London, at the council, but at my country house, when the order was made. Any gentleman here, that knows the forms in this matter, can tell, that these letters are by the king's particular direction.

—3. 'Bringing the most violent Papists into command of companies and regiments of the king's English subjects, &c. and though they refused the oaths by the act enjoined, procuring them new commissions.' It was affirmed to me, that col. Panton would take the Oaths and Test, and by his looks seemed to accept his commission accordingly. I dare pronounce that not one commission was signed by me, but for such as went into foreign parts, and were not likely to return.—4. 'That I stopped prosecution of the piracy in Ireland, of one Fitzpatrick.' My hand is no way seen in it, but in an order for his prosecution. A letter was sent me from the lord lieutenant of Ireland; but I gave no interruption, directly nor indirectly, to his prosecution.—5. 'Entertaining and lodging in my house a Priest, contrary to the known laws, a noted solicitor of the Popish faction, &c.' I know of none, except father Patrick, that ever frequented my house, unless by chance, upon some sudden emergency.—

6. 'That I was the adviser to begin the war, without consent of parliament.' Whatever others may have done, few had a more positive share in hindering it than myself. There was no such thing as 'constraining the ambassadors to sign,' as was alleged*. What was done was on the other side of the water, and I was sensible of all approaches of violation of the league; in this I can scarce vindicate myself without reflection on others: I cannot affirm, but will lay before you my presumptions and others in this business. France, to bring the duke of Buckingham on their side, contrived his going over to Paris, on pretence of some easy coaches for the king, which he had leave for.

The king warned him by no means to meddle with affairs. The king of France used him well, and gave him a jewel. He counselled me about it; to requite him, I told him in what state matters lay: 'I see you fast to the Spanish interest, if you will procure me a pension from the Spanish ambassador;' the duke took the pleasure of telling the tale, and, upon my honour, I appeal if many have not heard the duke say, with oaths, 'Arlington is to be turned out, and he would furnish the king with a better secretary;' which he might easily have done. The first time the duke discovered himself, he desired to go with a compliment into France, which might have been done by a more ordinary man. He had authority to sound that court, and brought word of the French resolutions for war, and so magnified that king and his ministers, that all wondered at it. He brought accounts of resolutions of France for our interest, but no particulars; sometimes seriously, sometimes pleasantly. The king told me the reports. I answered, 'Examine the thing, and be not guided by particular partiality.' I have leave from the king for my coming hither, for the purgation of myself. I am taxed with having spoiled the treaty with France. Many, that I can name, present in council, have heard the duke say, 'I am persuaded, what lord Arlington says is with reflection. Either I did, or did not say, he changed the Treaty.' I fear the duke has forgot the Treaty. This French treaty confirmed the Triple Alliance; the king established it in the treaty. It is true, the progress of the war has begotten some disturbance; as the business of Charleroy. If France disturbs, this Treaty is violated: France was thus warned. The king of France asked leave for some forces to pass through Flanders; Monteri gave him a civil denial; which being resented by the king, on the behalf of France, diverted the French king from marching. As for 'the delivery of towns to us,' it is so silly a thing, that it deserves not an answer. We have ever pressed France for money instead of ships. France had stores, but could not spare money. The king sent to compliment the king of France at Dunkirk; Buckingham offered himself, and treated of things unknown to me; he hoped satisfaction to wait upon so great a king, so obliging, when we approached so near the war. Ambassador Montagu, under the king's own hand, was commanded not to speak to the ministers, but to the king of France himself; 6000 men for the king to maintain. I pressed the king that Montague might desist from that proposition. Buckingham was the head of them, and his officers. As to my charge of 'being privately shut up with the French ambassador;' my doors were not shut to him, nor the Spanish ambassador; but as for 'pensions,' those that wrote the paper of Articles should have had the good manners to have told mine. As for 'M. Schomberg's being general of the English;' his mother was an English-woman, and he commanded the king's troops in Portugal. If he would have changed his religion, he might have been marshal of France. It was not strange he should be sent for to command, when a descent was intended into Holland, in which country he had long commanded. Though Buckingham is a man of wit and parts, yet his experience is little or none at all in military affairs. Buckingham proposed that he might go to Utrecht, and I be joined with him, to temper him with my slow pace. Hard by, the king of France staid in his camp ten days, expecting the Holland Deputies; neither prince was to treat without the other. I and Halifax were for moderate courses; Buckingham was for exorbitant. As to 'the parliament's not being acquainted with the war by my means;' it was represented, that the king had money to carry it on; it was never moved, nor urged, by any, that the war should come to the parliament. And as for our 'having towns,' what should we have done with them, if the king of France had given us half his conquests? To 'the falling upon the Smyrna fleet before war was declared against Holland,' I remember that my opinion was not prevalent, for I never pretended to maritime affairs; neither do I remember, that I had more concernment in it than others. 'That we should be governed by a Standing Army' None in this house, nor out of it, abominate it more than I. I think it impossible to awe it with 20,000 men. I never heard the thing said, no, not by the duke of Buckingham. It was never in debate, and we never had it in our mouths. As for 'my having had extraordinary Grants from the king, &c.' had I presumed to beg of the king, as others have done, I might have had more; but if I have to maintain half the dignity of my employment, I am the falsest man that lives. I never begged any thing in England, but 'I have had 10,000*l.* out of Ireland.' I have lord Bense's estate, in Ireland, given me, (which I begged) which he forfeited in the Rebellion; worth 1000*l.* per ann. I proved I was never in rebellion, and so I claimed his estates myself. 'Engrossing all affairs into my hands.' I should think myself the happiest man in the world, if I might retire from the management of affairs. Any gentleman of honour or parts, that hath had any business with the king, I have gone with and assisted. I beg pardon for tiring the house with this abrupt paper. I doubt not but to be found an innocent man. If what I have said is applicable to any thing the house desires to be informed of, I will serve the house: I think myself safe in your hands, and lay myself at your feet."

Questions put to the Earl: with his Answers.] Then the Speaker desired to know, 'Whether he was pleased to make answer to some Questions he had in command from the house to ask his lordship?' Who answered, 'he was willing.'

Question 1. "Whether any persons have, at any time, declared to him any of their advices or ill purposes against the liberties of this house, or propounded any ways to him for altering the government; and if they did, what was that advice, and by whom? Ans. I cannot apply this to any discourse I have heard, either public or private.—2. By whose advice the army was raised, and Papists set to officer them? Ans. On account of the war there was a necessity of good officers, and the Papist officers, many of them, were represented more skilful; but cannot apply the advice to any person.—3. And that army to awe the debates of this house? Ans. I can say nothing to it.—4. By whose counsel and ministry the Triple League was made? Ans. It has been suggested by me. Sir Wm. Temple was the fortunate man that dispatched it.—5. Who advised the first treaty with France? Ans. The making that League was the concurrent opinion of us all. I did not expect the French in earnest, if some blots had not happened.—6. By whose advice the Eschequer was shut up? Ans.

You may easily believe I was passive in it. I can say but suspicions only : many things were proposed, but I have nothing to do with the Treasury.—7. By whose advice the Declaration for Liberty was made and published? Ans. It was a concurrent opinion, and, we thought, upon good grounds, and advisable by law ; but when found contrary to law, I detested it.—8. By whose advice the Smyrna fleet was fallen upon? Ans. It was a concurrent advice, and I cannot apply it to any man's particular advice.—9. By whose advice the war was undertaken without advice of parliament? Ans. There was all probability of peace imaginable, and it was ill to show our adversaries any ill distempers, and it was a concurrent opinion.—10. And the parliament prorogued upon it, in Nov. last? Ans. It is a hard matter to say who was the adviser. I protest, I know not the author of it. I may wrong persons. I have presumptions, but no evidence.—Then his lordship, after saluting the house, withdrew.*

Resolution against the Earl.] After several long debates upon the above Articles, the question being put, "That an Address be presented to his majesty to remove the earl of Arlington from all his employments that are held during his majesty's pleasure, and from his majesty's presence and councils for ever;" it passed in the negative, 166 to 127.

It was then resolved, "That the Articles be referred to a committee, and that they report what matter is therein contained, and can be proved, that is fit for an Impeachment." †

* "Lord Arlington spoke much better than was expected: he excused himself, but without blaming the king: and this had so good an effect, that though he, as secretary of state, was more exposed than any other, by the many warrants and orders he had signed, yet he was acquitted, though by a small majority. But the care he took to preserve himself, and his success in it, lost him his high favour with the king, as the duke was out of measure offended at him. So he quitted his post, and was made lord chamberlain." Burnet.

The Author of his Life, in the Biographia, says, "That it was neither his speech, nor his cause, that brought him off, but the personal friendship of a noble person nearly allied to him, viz. the earl of Ossory, eldest son to the duke of Ormond, and then the most popular man of his quality in England, who stood for five days, that the Debate lasted, in the lobby of the house of commons, and solicited the members in his favour as they entered the house."

† Nothing further appears to have been done in this Accusation. "No greater mistake," says Ralph, "can be made by the prosecutors of a bad minister, than to charge him with any one Article which they cannot support with undeniable proofs. If he has it in his power to loosen any one link of the chain, he infallibly makes his escape; and, instead of being punished himself, renders odious his accusers. This was the circumstance in the case

Sir R. Howard. The expences of Elections are grown so vast; that it goes beyond all bounds, the charges considered in the country and here.

Mr. Garroway. It is dangerous for a man to be thrown out for his hospitality in the country: these charges arise commonly from competitors that live in another country: they must be undone by out-doing him that comes from another country, with indirect intentions.

Mr. Swynfin. Some carry elections by awe and force, and some by ability to expend. Unless you do it to some effect, it takes up your time, and the thing will never be practicable: by the effect he observes of sumptuary laws, he believes you will have the same effect of this,—none at all, but for an informer to get by it, and no man else. The examples of the king and court would have more effect than any law you can make, and when you find elections carried thus, and quash them here, that may remedy something. You having as good a law now, which does no good, therefore would forbear a helpless law as this.

Serj. Seys. The penalty of a sheriff, for a false return, is but 100*l.*; and in the spending 1500*l.* the sheriff may be well gratified, by the party returned, for his fine.

Mr. Boscawen. The person elected ought to be resident in the borough or county for which he is chosen, by the statute, but that is antiquated and out of practice; but if you restrain it to persons resident in the county, to be chosen in boroughs, or that have estates in that county, you may do well; though the old statute is really a law, but out of practice: and this may cure all the evils.

Mr. Waller. Let us mend our proceedings here, and we shall mend elections: times are much changed now. Formerly the neighbourhood desired him to serve; there was a dinner, and so an end; but now it is a kind of an empire. Some hundred years ago some boroughs sent not; they could get none to serve; but, now it is in fashion and a fine thing, they before us: these gentlemen had suffered their Charge to outrun their evidence, by dealing in presumptions instead of proofs: lord Arlington saw the opening, and improved it with all the address imaginable: for, being admitted to be heard by the house, in his turn, he so far exploded, or evaded, all that the duke had said the day before, and set so plausible a gloss on his own actions, that the Impeachment died away, and he escaped, even without the least censure: he had been charged in particular with corresponding with the king's enemies beyond the seas: his friends, who had taken heart on seeing him come off so triumphantly, called upon sir Gilbert Gerrard for his vouchers: he was unprovided, would have withdrawn that Article, was not allowed, had recourse to the wretched expedient of desiring time; and, at last, took refuge in saying, that this treacherous correspondence was carried on during the last Dutch war."

are revived. Some bishops and lords for their poverty have been excused : it comes by custom ; there is no appeal from us, and we judge elections with impunity, and what we should take most care of we take least.

Resolved, " That a committee be appointed to bring in one or more Bill or Bills for the Regulating of Elections of members to serve in parliament; and for the better ascertaining of the returns of members to be elected; and for the better attendance of such as are elected and returned; and upon the other debates of the house."

Debate on a Bill for restraining Buildings near London.] Jan. 23. Sir Wm. Coventry moves that there may be a restraint of Buildings here; it will better the houses in the city, and those here: would have a committee appointed to consider what is fit to be done in this business.

Serj. Maynard. This building is the ruin of the gentry, and ruin of religion, having so many thousand people without Churches to go to: this enlarging of London makes it filled with lacqueys and pages; therefore in the Bill would prevent the design of enlarging either the city or places adjacent, which else will ruin the nation.

Sir Wm. Coventry would not have a beauty and uniformity in the city, and a deformity in the king's court. He has no houses, nor intends to build any; (it is not his interest :) he finds that parenthesis sometimes very necessary in this house. The great houses of the bishops and nobility, and all are put into small tenements. That which is your aim is, to suppress the great number of small houses for private profit, there being scarce any new built for a nobleman's or ambassador's use. Such a thing may be by restraining the roofs to so many feet high, which will not turn to account for tradesmen to inhabit, and may be useful for the nobility and ambassadors.

Sir Tho. Littleton. An address to the king, ' That no Licences be granted,' may comprehend all gentlemen's opinions.

Sir John Duncombe. At this end of the town whole fields go into buildings, and are turned into alehouses filled with necessitous people; and should a sickness come, all the gentry would go away and they would be left a burden to the parish: the Council sends forbiddances, and the man has laid his foundation, and where is the law to restrain it? The lords of the Council cannot remedy it. To stop this, confine them to build such an height, 12 feet high, and 4 rooms on a floor: refer it to a Committee, and let them judge what places are fit to build in, and so proportioned, and that will stop the increase of buildings.

Sir Tho. Clarges. They may build in ancient boroughs, by the Law.—27 Eliz. it is prohibited ' within ten Miles of the city of London, and not converting great houses into tenements, and for building of great houses;' but that act was to last but 7 years.

Mr. Garraway. It is worth the honour of the house to have these immense buildings suppressed. The country wants tenants, and here are 400 soldiers that keep alehouses, and take them of the brewers, and now they are come to be Prætorian guards: that Churches have not been proportionable to houses, has occasioned the growth of Popery and Atheism, and put true religion out of the land: the city of London would not admit rare artists, as painters and carvers, into freedom; and it is their own fault that they have driven trade out of London into this end of the town, and filled the great houses with shops.

Mr. Sawyer. Recommend these buildings to the committee, and you must make it a nuisance.

It was then referred to a committee to bring in a Bill for restraining any farther new Buildings in all places within the Bills of Mortality, except the city of London and liberties thereof.

The King's Speech concerning certain Proposals for a Peace.] Jan. 24. The king came to the house of peers, and sending for the commons made the following Speech:

" My Lords and Gentlemen; At the beginning of this session, I told you, as I thought I had reason to do, that the States General had not yet made me any Proposals which could be imagined with intent to conclude, but only to amuse. To avoid this imputation, they have now sent me a Letter by the Spanish ambassador, offering me some terms of peace, upon conditions formally drawn up, and in a more decent stile than before. It is upon this that I desire your speedy advice; for, if you shall find the terms such as may be embraced, your advice will have great weight with me; and if you find them defective, I hope you will give me your advice and assistance how to get better terms. Upon the whole matter, I doubt not but you will have a care of my honour, and the honour and safety of the nation, which are now so deeply concerned."

With this Speech, the king delivered to the two houses copies of the Memorial from the Spanish ambassador, together with Proposals from the Dutch in order to a Treaty. Upon the reading of which, and the Dutch Proposals in the house of commons, they voted their humble and hearty Thanks to be returned to his maj. for his most gracious Speech; and immediately after they resolved, " That, upon consideration had upon his majesty's said gracious Speech, and the Proposals of the States-General of the United-Provinces, this house is of opinion, That his maj. be humbly advised to proceed in a Treaty with the States-General in order to a speedy Peace." The lords also joining in the same Resolution of Advice, it was solemnly presented to his majesty, who returned this Answer; " My lords and gentlemen, I cannot better thank you for your Advice than by following it; which I shall endeavour, and doubt not of your assistance to enable me to perform it."

Debate on the First Reading of the Habeas Corpus Bill.] Jan. 27. A Bill to prevent the Imprisoning of the Subjects in illegal Prisons:

or sending them to Prisons beyond the Seas, was read the first time.

Mr. Attorney North. This bill is of great consequence, and would have it read the second time in a full house.

Sir Tho. Lee. Though it is not your method, yet, that we may be sure of that gentleman's company (the Attorney) desires a day may be appointed for reading the bill.—The 29th was appointed.

Debate on the Second Reading of the Habeas Corpus Bill.] Jan. 29. The Habeas Corpus Bill was read a second time.

Mr. Attorney North. The penalties in this bill are like those in the Act of Popery; but those are remedied by conformity, but here is a perpetual disability of conforming, and loss of office, &c. 'Legal and known prisons;' no imprisonment in law in order to examination or punishment.—If a man commits a murder in Ireland, or Jersey, &c. by this bill there is no law to try him here: if a man is committed to York jail, and lies by the way, that is a prison where he lies. Knows no need of such a law, and mischiefs make a general law. As the law is, no man can be imprisoned, but in a legal prison, nor sent abroad, but in order to trial.

Sir Rd. Temple. Custody, in order to examination, is not a prison: if we have value for our liberties, we would secure them by law. Several have been sent to Tangier, and the islands, since the king came in: thinks your provisions against it, in this bill, not strong enough: reached by actions and indictments; some people may be too great to be reached by actions, and the king may enter a noli pros. upon an indictment, and hopes, upon commitment of the bill, that may be remedied.

Sir Tho. Lee. No penalty is too great or heavy for unlawful prisons. For murder committed beyond the sea, there is a remedy; for treasons, there is a special act of parliament for trial in England; formerly objected against the Bill: less mischief to the English nation, that those men should go unpunished in the place where the offence is done (and few escaping there) than that Englishmen should be sent abroad for offences done here.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. 'Legal and known prisons:' knows not how 'legal' a prison is, when there is a garrison, by the king's commission, where no sheriff can come.

Sir Nich. Carew hopes you will give power for the sheriff, if he has it not already: the Green-Cloth messengers imprison in their houses; they are 'unlawful prisons,' and would have these considered at the committee.

Mr. Powle. Imprisonment to custody is no part of punishment, and so would have excessive jailors fees of prisons stinted and settled.

Sir John Duncombe. It often falls out in the Treasury, that men are taken into custody, for fear of losing the king's money: sending a man to jail, and he meeting ill company there, may ruin him, therefore better for the subject.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The bill is tender in many places; if not committed close prisoner, very inconvenient in some cases, a man informs, that ships are to be burnt at Chatham, or the town to be fired, or a murder; if the party be not kept close, he may be tampered with by his accomplices. Such business cannot be done without it: when the bill is committed, would have such regard had to it, that may make it possible to be practised.

Mr. Waller. 'Common prison'—Sometimes the plague comes into it; sometimes a man is kept in an house, in favour of the prisoner: the Guards is no prison: tells this story: in the Usurpation, some gentlemen of good quality were sent to the Guards, at St. James's. They would have made their escape, and killed the soldier that guarded them: but they would not kill them again, for fear of retaliation in the king's quarters at Oxford. When they were indicted, some counsel told them, they were in no legal prison, and it was not murder, being prisoners of war. There was a brave jury upon them, (he speaks it for their honour) who found them not guilty: would take care that no courts of guards be prisons.

Col. Birch. Consider where our mischief in this has been. It has been very common to commit by the king's or some great minister's warrant: he has heard in this house, that the king cannot commit a man to prison; it is not reasonable he should be both party and judge: knows the king is uneasy by it. A man is first committed by a privy counsellor, and a day after the king's hand to it. Does not like it, that all things should resort to the king's command. If so, all your provisions against it signify nothing. Knows not by what causes and counsels, but put upon the king. The doctrine he has always heard here is, 'the king can do no wrong.' It was told you, 'a person may burn the ships.' Can tell you of many committed, but where is any one proceeded against? When he has nothing left, then turn him out of prison, and no man knows what is become of him (the Herefordshire Priest) no man is committed but cause is shown, and a person found by the lord keeper to prosecute.

Sir T. Byde. A year and a half ago he was sent for by a messenger, and brought to the Green-Cloth, with 4 of his servants. He desired a copy of his accusation. They threatened to lay him by the heels, if he sued the messenger. He paid 5*l.* for Mile-money. The term was not in being, and he could not have his Habeas Corpus, nor any remedy, and he fears it again: sir Wm. Boreman, of the Green-Cloth, told him, 'you must not tell us of statute-law; neither lawyer nor you understand computing-house law, which is our law.' So he paid his fees for being in custody.

Sir Tho. Clarges. More warrants to the Tower under the king's hand now, than in 200 years before. Would have those that subjoin these warrants be answerable for them.—To proceed on the 7th of February.

Debate on an Address for the Removal of the Dukes of Buckingham and Lauderdale.] Sir

Wm. Coventry moves for an Address to the king for the removal of the dukes of Lauderdale and Buckingham.

Lord Cornbury is against an Address, especially at this time. If you have no more Counsellors to remove, nor other Grievances to redress, then you may now do it: concerning one of these dukes, for removal there is no reason; would have gentlemen, therefore, to consider whether they have any other persons to remove, and then resolve, &c.

Sir Nich. Carew differs from Cornbury. Two lords in one Address is enough. Like rods, too many in a bundle, are not easily broken: would take two or three at a time, and hopes at last to remove all the ill ones.

Mr. Sacheverell would not have them both in an Address; it is proper for Lauderdale now for 'maintaining the king's Edicts,' &c. You cannot sit here on these terms: would assign that for a cause.

Sir Tho. Lee would deliver the vote by the Speaker, without any variations or alterations.

Sir Tho. Clarges would have the concurrence of the peers, either at a conference, with reasons, or at their bar; appoint a committee to consider of the manner to begin a thing of this moment. Would not make ill precedents now.

Sir Tho. Meres would have a difference betwixt Lauderdale a commoner, and Buckingham a peer. A precedent, in case of a commoner, was that of sir John Griffith, who commanded Gravesend blockhouses; the commons went to the king, and he displaced him.

Mr. Cheney. You have given yet no reasons for your vote.

Mr. Garroway. To subvert all laws, and to say, 'none shall be, but verbal laws, for the future!'—You cannot be too severe; the king may do what he pleases with him in Scotland; you think him not fit to govern here.

Sir Winston Churchill. Though we are satisfied, yet the king knows none of our reasons, and therefore would mention them.

Col. Strangways. If the king requires you hereafter to give reasons, and thinks your vote unreasonable, you may then present them.

Ordered, "That the privy counsellors of the house do attend the king, to know when this house shall attend him with the vote relating to the duke of Lauderdale."

Sir Nich. Carew would go to the king with this Vote now, and to the lords with the other vote.

Mr. Stockdale is indifferent whether we go to the lords or not, with the Address concerning the duke of Buckingham; you have a great privilege to address the king by common fame; his ill life, &c. Are you ever like to carry this change of common fame to reach this man?

Sir Tho. Lee. Unless you make this as a Vote of favour, you may go to the lords with Impeachment; you may demand it of justice, and not precariously.

Sir Tho. Meres. In 3d Charles, there was a debate about common fame, and your book tells you of what validity it was; would lose no privilege we have a right to, nor exceed that right; would adjourn the debate for two days.

Debate on Members taking Bribes. Sir Nich. Carew. We went not on suddenly after the Vote, and in a few days 5000 guineas were dispersed to adjourn it longer. It may be, so many days more may cost so many guineas, and so make guineas dearer yet.

Col. Strangways. If Carew knows any members that have received these guineas, he should name them; and would have a Test upon us: if any man be suspected of guineas or pension, let him purge himself.

Sir Tho. Lee was told that one Masters, of Lincoln's Inn, had reported, 'That this session a Member had said, that he hoped to get 5000 guineas.'

Mr. Harwood. Both giver and taker manage their business very ill that will discover giver or taker; if any man's condition here be so that he cannot live without a salary, let him have it from the place that sends him; here is common fame in the case, but since the great men were talked of here, many thousand guineas have been paid out in Lombard-street, which you may enquire into; would have a Test to acquit every gentleman of any thing so unworthy.

Lord Cavendish. Many are accused of being Pensioners to the court, for giving money here, and from the States General, for their interest.

Col. Birch has heard such reports, both in town and country. Observe the case, and what need there is to bring you off: how will this reflect upon the king, that it is thought by the people that the king should give us money to do any thing contrary to the interest of the kingdom! You hear one named; if an extraordinary thing, there is an extraordinary occasion for ways to clear themselves; present member by member, and in the presence of God and the house let them clear themselves, as you once did about the Libel: refer it to a committee to examine this Masters, for the honour of the king, and vindication of the kingdom.

Sir Wm. Coventry. So much has been said in it that it is for the honour of the house to have it thoroughly examined; let a committee consider the way, and let Masters be examined at the committee, and not at the bar; that admitting not so thorough a disquisition, the mace being upon the table, and the Speaker not quick enough to ask questions; as Masters may retire, and recollect himself, whilst you are preparing new questions, how to evade your questions for discovery; a Committee is more likely to come to the quick and bottom of the matter.

It was referred to a Committee to examine this matter, and to consider what is fit farther to be done to vindicate the honour of the Members of this house. The Committee soon after met, and Masters was examined as to the words, and, after much unwillingness to discover who said the words, at last said, 'that being at Mr. John Howe's house in Gloucestershire, where he was very civilly entertained several days, (and therefore did give this account with great unwillingness, begging to be excused) he did hear Mr. Howe say, 'That he hoped this session might be worth 5000 guineas to him;' but whether in relation to the Irish Cattle coming in again, or what was precedent or subsequent in the discourse does not at all remember.

The Habeas Corpus Bill passes the Commons.] Feb. 7. The Habeas Corpus Bill was read a third time, passed, and was entitled, "An Act to prevent the illegal Imprisonment of the Subject."*

Resolved, "That the continuing of any Standing Forces in this nation other than the Militia, is a great Grievance and vexation to the people; and that this house do humbly petition his majesty to cause immediately to be disbanded that part of them that were raised since Jan. 1, 1663.

The Speaker reported, That he had attended his majesty with the Vote relating to the duke of Buckingham, and that his majesty had returned this Answer, "That he would take it into his consideration."

The King's Speech, on concluding a Peace with Holland.] Feb. 11. The king came to the house of peers, and sending for the commons made the following Speech to both houses;

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I have pursued your advice, and am come hither to tell you, that, according to your desires, I have made a speedy, honourable, and, I hope, a lasting Peace, signed already.—Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the house of commons; I told you yesterday in the Banqueting house, that I would give you a speedy Answer to your Address about disbanding the Forces therein mentioned; and I do assure you, that before you made your Address, I had given orders for the doing of it, as soon as I should be sure of the peace; and I shall reduce them to a less number than they were in the year 1663, and shall give direction for the march of those who are to return to Ireland, who were brought from thence. And as our forces are lessened at land, it will be necessary to build more great ships; for we shall not be safe, unless we equal the strength of our neighbours at sea: therefore I shall recommend it to your care to give me means for the effectual doing

* " This gave rise to the famous Habeas Corpus Bill, which was calculated to set bounds to the arbitrary proceedings of ministers, and preserve those who fell under their displeasure from being sent into banishment, or otherwise imprisoned, without cause, measure, or relief. But though this invaluable Bill was now perfected by the commons, and sent up to the lords, it did not receive the royal assent till some years after." Ralph.

thereof. And this is all I have to say to you at this time."

This Speech produced an immediate Resolution; "That humble and hearty Thanks be returned to his maj. for his making a speedy Peace, and for his gracious Answers to the Addresses concerning the Standing Forces."

The King's Speech at the Prorogation.] Feb. 24. The king came to the house of peers, where, sending for the commons, he made a short Speech, to this effect:

"That when his majesty was here last, he told them, that the Peace was signed: he was come now to tell them, that it is ratified; and his majesty hopes it will be a happy and a lasting Peace to both nations. This, and the Spring coming on so fast, his maj. said, He knows they will all desire to be at home in their several countries, where they may do their own business and his majesty's also. His maj. therefore thinks it fit to make a recess at this time; the winter being more fit for business and consultation here. In the mean while, his maj. will do his endeavour to satisfy the world of his steadfastness to the Protestant Religion as it is now established; and of his desire for the securing of their properties. And so, his maj. said, he hath given order to the Lord Keeper to prorogue the parliament to the 10th of Nov. next."*

Principal Occurrences during the Recess—Scheme of the Cabal—Campaign of 1674.] Both houses met on the 10th of Nov. and were farther prorogued to the 13th of April 1675. For the following brief account of the principal Occurrences during this long recess, we are indebted to Mr. Hume. "Four days after the parliament was prorogued, the Peace was proclaimed in London, to the great joy of the people. Spain had declared that she could no longer remain neuter, if hostilities were con-
